PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THE work now given to the public is one which has engaged the author's study and reflection, more or less constantly, for a considerable number of years. The magnitude and importance of the subject are such as to demand the most patient and exhaustive research, the most careful collation and weighing of authorities, and the most impartial and reasonable discussion of its disputed points, on the part of any one who attempts a comprehensive and systematic treatment of it. How far the author has fallen short of the fulfillment of these conditions, is for the judgment of those who shall use the book. But the fact that he has constantly kept this ideal in mind, and devoted his best energies to the realization of it, is his justification for the hope that the following pages may be found to possess some interest and value for his brethren of the bar.

The law of judgments, at the present day, aside from local variations in matters of practice, may be regarded as tolerably well settled. There are, however, certain branches of the law of estoppel by record which still present themselves to many a puzzled inquirer as a labyrinthine confusion of apparently irreconcilable decisions. This arises, not so much from any real contradiction or obscurity in the authorities, as from the infinite variety exhibited in the facts of the different cases and the necessity of making nice discriminations in the principles to be applied. At such places, the endeavor has been made to exhibit the result of the decisions in a clear and orderly form, by a methodical classification of the cases, and by a logical and systematic arrangement of topics. In illustration we refer to the discussion of the doctrine of merger as applied to inseverable claims founded in contract or tort, actions for continuing damages, for distinct trespasses, for causes of action distinct though founded on the same transaction, for permanent and recurring nuisances, for periodical liabilities, etc. (vol ii. §§ 731–753). Nor is our general subject wholly free from vexed questions, upon which the authorities are hopelessly at war. In such cases it has been the author's task to weigh and balance the conflicting decisions,—not withholding criticism where he deemed it justified, nor refraining from the positive expression of individual opinion,—and to present what he considered the true rule, or the best rule, or the rule sustained by the preponderance of authorities, supporting his conclusions as well by the reasoning suggested by his own reflections on the subject, as by quotations from the opinions of the courts. Examples of such topics, so treated, may be seen in the discussion of "judgments as contracts" (vol. i. §§ 7–11), the definition of jurisdiction (§ 215), the question of the collateral impeachment of judgments for want of jurisdiction (§§ 270–276), the subject of the conclusiveness of foreign judgments in personam (vol. ii. §§ 825–834), and the matter of jurisdictional inquiries in actions on judgments from a sister state (§§ 894–915) and the plea of fraud (§§ 916–921).

Throughout the work an attempt has been made to preserve an orderly and scientific arrangement, both in the main divisions of the subject and in the sequence of parts and sections within each chapter. Such a plan, it is believed, if perfectly carried out, would greatly facilitate the use of a text-book so voluminous as the present. As to the method of using the authorities, it may be observed that quotations from the opinions of the courts have been quite freely introduced,—not, it is hoped, to the extent of incumbering the pages with needless repetitions, but for the purpose of illustrating and re-inforcing the legal propositions stated by the apt and convincing remarks of learned judges. For the rest, the citations will be found to cover the English and Canadian reports, as well as those of all the American states, with occasional illustrations from the Roman law and other foreign systems. The extent of the author's researches will be apparent from the fact that more than ten thousand cases are cited in these volumes. But he feels confident that to refer to a profusion of authorities is to err (if at all) on the side most easily pardonable by the profession.

In view of the wide circulation of the various periodicals constituting the National Reporter System, it was thought that convenience in the use of the book would be greatly promoted by introducing parallel references in the case of all decisions reported concurrently in an official series and in one of the Reporters. And this has accordingly been done. Where a case is cited from one of the Reporters alone, it is because it was omitted from the official series of reports or has not yet been reached by that series. For reasons similar to the foregoing, parallel references to the American Decisions and the American Reports have been introduced. The citations have been brought down to the time the work goes to press. H. C. B.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

DURING the twelve years which have elapsed since the first publication of this treatise, the law of Judgments, as expounded by the courts and affected by statutory enactments, has undergone a great elaboration and development, though without much change in the cardinal principles upon which its most important rules are based. In the same period the case-law of the subject has enormously increased. It therefore seemed to the author that a new edition of this work would be acceptable to the profession, and would indeed be necessary to its continuance in that career of usefulness of which he has many gratifying testimonies. Accordingly, the book has been subjected to a careful and thorough revision, many parts of it have been wholly re-written, much new matter has been added, and the later decisions, to the number of about seven thousand, have been incorporated in the notes. It is hoped that the work, as thus enlarged and brought abreast of the current of judicial decisions, will be found a reliable guide to the rules and principles on which its subject rests, and a complete repertory of the precedents, both ancient and modern. PART I. THE NATURE OF JUDGMENTS.

§ 1. Definitions of Judgments, Decrees, and Orders.

As, in logic, judgment is an affirmation of a relation between a particular predicate and a particular subject, so, in law, it is the affirmation by the law of the legal consequences attending a proved or admitted state of facts. It is not, however, a mere assertion of the rules of law as applied to given conditions, nor of the legal relations of the persons concerned. It is always a declaration that a liability, recognized as within the jural sphere, does or does not exist. An action is instituted for the enforcement of a right or the redress of an injury. Hence a judgment, as the culmination of the action, declares the existence of the right, recognizes the commission of the injury, or negatives the allegation of one or the other. But as no right can exist without a correlative duty, nor any invasion of it without a corresponding obligation to make amends, the judgment necessarily affirms, or else denies, that such a duty or such a liability rests upon the person against whom the aid of the law is invoked. Further, a judgment is properly neither hortatory nor imperative. It does not advise or recommend, nor, on the other hand, does it prescribe any act or course of conduct. In respect to the latter particular the case is different, of course, with a decree in equity, but we are now using the term "judgment" in its narrowest sense. In general, therefore, it neither counsels nor commands, but simply asserts. Again, although it is the affirmation of the law, it is necessarily pronounced by the mouth of a court or judge. And the decision of any arbiter, self-constituted or chosen by the litigants, is no judgment. The law speaks only by its appointed organs. It is only when the deliverance comes from a true and competent court that it is entitled to be called a judgment. Finally it must be responsive to the state of facts laid before the tribunal. It is elementary law that no court can travel outside the controversy presented to it, to touch other rights or relations not involved. Hence the judgment must be an affirmation in regard to the matters submitted to the court for decision. We may therefore define a judgment as the determination or sentence of the law, pronounced by a competent judge or court, as the result of an action or proceeding instituted in such court, affirming that, upon the matters submitted for its decision, a legal duty or liability does or does not exist.[1]

[1] "A judgment is the final consideration and determination of a court of competent jurisdiction upon the matters submitted to it." Whitwell v. Emory, 3 Mich. 84, 59 Am. Dec. 220. "The decision or sentence of the law, given by a court of justice or other competent tribunal, as the result of proceedings instituted therein for the redress of an injury." Bouv. Law Dict. voc. "Judg-

This is the definition of a judgment in its narrow and technical sense; that is, as it is understood at common law, as distinguished from the modified significance of the term as used in the codes of procedure, and also as distinguished from the definitive sentences of courts of equity, admiralty, arbitration, and others.[2] The term which, in equity practice, corresponds to judgment at common law is "decree." But there are important differences between judgments and decrees, such as to require a distinct definition of the latter; and these we now proceed to consider.

A decree, then, is the determination, sentence, or judgment of equity, pronounced by a competent court, upon the controversy submitted for its decision. Or more specifically, it is "a sentence or order of the court, pronounced on hearing and understanding all the points in issue, and determining the rights of all the parties in the suit according to equity and good conscience."[3] But a decree differs from a judgment both in the process which precedes and determines it and in its contents. Aside from the differences in the courts,—in their organization, process, remedial machinery, rules and methods of investigation, principles of decision, and the scope of their competence,—it is to be noted that while a judgment at law is usually, at least in contested cases, determined by the verdict, the conclusion of law following inevitably as soon as the facts are found, a judge in equity is called upon to decide upon the whole merits of the controversy as it addresses itself to his conscience and sense of fairness, of course within the established rules of equity. Hence while a decree is, equally with a judgment, the deliverance of the law, ment." "The conclusion of law upon facts found, or admitted by the parties, or upon their default in the course of the suit." 2 Tidd, Prac. 930. A final judgment is such as at once puts an end to the action, by determining that the plaintiff is or is not entitled to recover, and the amount in debt or damages to be recovered." it is also, to a considerable degree, the decision of the man who frames it, as the interpreter of that moral standard which equity sets up. Another important particular in which they differ is that a decree is more pliable than a judgment. The latter proceeds upon the determination of a narrow issue, of law or fact, and merely decides upon the existence of an alleged liability as between two contending persons or groups of persons. A decree may be adjusted to meet all the exigencies of the litigation, and to settle all the conflicting rights and claims, however numerous and complicated may be the interests involved. Further, a judgment has in general nothing whatever to do with the means of enforcing the liability which it declares. Certain consequences do indeed flow from it,—as the right to issue execution, the attaching of a lien upon land,—but these are no part of the judgment, nor is it concerned with directions for making its sanction effective. It is, as already stated, a bare assertion. On the other hand, a decree may, and frequently does, contain more or less minute and specific directions for effectuating its object. Also it may prescribe or forbid a specific act or course of conduct, which a judgment never does. Hence it will be perceived that the orbit of a decree in chancery, so to speak, is much wider than that of a judgment at law.

This distinction between decrees and judgments has not always been strictly preserved in American practice. In some of the states there is a sort of border-land where equitable relief is administered through common law forms, the amalgamation having occurred through the lack of separate chancery courts. Thus in Pennsylvania, where an action of ejectment may be brought to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, the sentence pronounced is not regarded as an ordinary judgment at law, but as containing the substance of a decree in equity, since it directs the payment of money by one party and the conveyance of the land by the other.[4]

all distinction between law and equity, so far as relates to pleading and practice, is abolished, and of course the difference between judgments and decrees is also swept away. There being but one form of civil action, the plaintiff may ask therein for any relief which either law or equity would accord him, and the decision in his favor may award him damages, specific performance, an injunction, foreclosure of a mortgage, or any other legal remedy. Hence the final determination of any suit, whether by the proceedings formerly known as equity, or at common law, is, under these codes, a judgment.[5] The most usual definition is "the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding." [6] And the term "decree" is no longer used, except colloquially. It will be observed that the definition quoted, while it enlarges the scope of the word by making it include decisions which were not formerly called judgments but decrees, also restricts it by the exclusion of those determinations which are elsewhere known as interlocutory judgments.

It is also necessary to distinguish judgments and decrees from orders. An order is the mandate or determination of the court upon some subsidiary or collateral matter arising in an action, not disposing of the merits, but adjudicating a preliminary point or directing some step in the proceedings. It is defined by the supreme court of California as "a decision made during the progress of the cause either prior or subsequent to final judgment, settling some point of practice or some question collateral to the main issue presented by the pleadings and necessary to be disposed of before such issue can be passed upon by the court, or necessary to be determined in carrying the execution into effect." [7] It will be observed that orders, under the codes, thus include the judgments formerly called interlocutory. An order is granted upon an application to the court called a motion.[8] The term seems to be practically synonymous (except for its including interlocutory judgments) with "rule." But the latter is more commonly used in those states adhering to the common law practice, while order is generally employed in those which have adopted codes.[9]

§ 2. The Language of a Judgment.

"A judgment, though pronounced or awarded by the judges, is not their determination and sentence, but the sentence and determination of the law, which depends, not upon the arbitrary opinion of the judge, but the settled and invariable principles of justice, and is the remedy prescribed by law for the redress of injuries, and the suit or action is the vehicle or means of administering it; and therefore the style of the judgment is not that 'it is ordered or resolved by the court,' for then the judgment might be their own, but 'it is considered'—'consideratum est per curiam,' which implies that the judgment is none of their own, but the act of the law, pronounced and declared by the court upon determination and inquiry."[10] At the same time there is no magic in this formula; nor is it a conclusive criterion whether a definitive judgment has been rendered that the entry employs or omits the usual phrase, "it is considered." A judgment may be final and subject to review on writ of error, as well when entered without as with that clause.[11] The usual style of a decree is "it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed;" and of an order or rule, "it is ordered," etc.

§ 3. Essentials of a Judgment.

We are not at present concerned with the tests by which the validity of a judgment is to be determined, such as the question of jurisdiction, the status of the parties, the time, place, and manner of its rendition. But the object of this section is to indicate the essential characteristics which must appear on the face of the decision in order to entitle it to be called a judgment for any purpose, even as a preliminary to investigating its validity. And first, it must appear to be the sentence of a court. As already stated, the award of arbitrators or of any self-constituted tribunal is not a judgment. The decision must purport to emanate from some court of justice known to and organized under the laws of the particular sovereignty. At the same time, it is usual to recognize the determinations of certain bodies invested with minor administrative powers, and acting in a judicial capacity in reference to their exercise,[12] as equivalent to judgments of the courts. But it is only by analogy that these decisions can be called judgments. And in general, a paper purporting to be a judgment, but not stating by what court rendered, nor when, nor for what cause of action, is a nullity.[13] Again, unless in the case of purely ex parte proceedings, it must appear to have been rendered between adverse parties, or, in a certain class of actions, between a party plaintiff and some res which stands in place of a defendant.[14] The case of a proceeding against "unknown owners" is no real exception to this rule, for there is always a thing or right claimed, which may be personified as the plaintiff's adversary. And the judgment must of course appear to be in favor of one party and against the other. Again, the judgment must be definitive. It must purport to be the actual and absolute sentence of the law, as distinguished from a mere finding that one of the parties is entitled to a judgment, or from a direction to the effect that a judgment may be entered. "An order for a judgment is not the judgment, nor does the entry of such order partake of the nature and qualities of a judgment record." [15] It has been held that an order of court allowing the plaintiff's attorney to enter up judgment for the plaintiff is in itself a sufficient judgment for the plaintiff for the amount sued for.[16] But it may well be doubted whether this would hold good for all the purposes of a judgment. Where an interlocutory judgment is rendered by default, upon a claim for unliquidated damages, its amount may be left for ascertainment by proper proceedings. But we may say in general that if a judgment purports to be final, and is given upon a money demand, the amount of the recovery must be stated in it with certainty and precision. If the amount remains to be determined by a future contingency, or ascertained by referees, or diminished by the allowance of an unliquidated credit, or is otherwise indefinite and uncertain, it is no proper judgment.[17] It remains to be stated that, in case of ambiguity, a judgment should be construed with reference to the pleadings, and when it admits of two constructions, that one will be adopted which is consonant with the judgment which should have been rendered on the facts and law of the case.[18] But where a court inadvertently determines two matters standing in such opposition as to be incapable of harmonious construction, as, for instance, that the same property belongs absolutely to each of two persons, the decision is of no effect.[19]

§ 4. Consequences of a Judgment.

The first and most obvious consequence of a judgment is that it establishes an indisputable obligation and confers upon the successful party the right to issue execution or other process of the court for its enforcement. But this, it must be repeated, is not an integral part of the judgment. The judgment is merely the affirmation of a liability. The right to use the process of the court for its enforcement is a consequence which the law attaches to it. A decree may direct a particular act to be done; a judgment in rem may specify the property out of which satisfaction is to be made; a judgment in replevin may require a return of the goods; in certain cases a judgment may be entered for a sum payable in a particular kind of money.[20] But with these exceptions, the general principle holds good that the judgment, after performing its office of declaring the existence of a certain liability, leaves the party to pursue the remedies which the law provides.

Another important consequence of a judgment is that it creates a lien upon real estate owned by the debtor, which endures for a certain period, follows the land into the hands of purchasers or other lienors, and may be enforced by seizure and sale of the property subject to it. A separate chapter will be devoted to the consideration of this subject.

A further consequence of a judgment is that it creates an estoppel upon the litigants; so that a judgment rendered upon the merits will bar any further suit upon the same cause of action, between the same parties or their privies; and a point which was once actually and necessarily litigated and decided cannot again be drawn in question, by the same parties or their privies, in any future controversy upon the same or a different cause of action. These topics also will be discussed in later chapters of this work.

Another consequence flowing from the rendition of a judgment is that it may constitute either an evidence or a source of title. This may be illustrated by the result of a real action, by the case of a purchaser at execution-sale under a judgment, by a decree quieting title to lands or enforcing specific performance of a contract for their conveyance. Also in relation to chattels, it is held that satisfaction of a judgment recovered in an action of trespass for their conversion passes property in such chattels to the defendant, and that his title thus acquired takes effect by relation from the time of the conversion.[21]

It has also been said that a judgment constitutes a vested right of property in the creditor, which cannot lawfully be diminished or destroyed by the legislature.[22] Within limits this is no doubt true. But it appears that the right to receive interest on the amount of a judgment, at the rate fixed by law at the time the judgment was rendered, is not such a vested right of property as to be beyond the control of the legislature; and consequently a statute reducing the rate of interest on judgments may validly apply to those in force at the date of its enactment, and interest on such existing judgments can be recovered only at the reduced rate from the time of the passage of the statute.[23] Again, although there was no law allowing an appeal from a particular judgment, at the time of its rendition, it cannot be said that the successful party has any vested right that his judgment shall not be made subject to review by subsequent legislation.[24]

§ 5. Judgment is not an Assignment.

Thus far, in discussing the nature of judgments, we have spoken only of their essential characteristics. It now becomes necessary to distinguish them from certain other legal transactions to which they bear a resemblance. And first, since the result of a judgment may be to deprive the debtor of his property and transfer it (or its proceeds) to the creditor, it has been thought that the judgment, especially where it was confessed, might be construed as an assignment. There is, however, no validity in this position. As has been said: "A judgment is not an assignment. One is the act of the party, the other the act of the law; in the one case the debtor surrenders the dominion to another, in the other he submits without opposition to the course prescribed by law." [25]

§ 6. Judgment is not a Specialty.

A judgment of a domestic court of record is not a specialty, within the meaning of a statute which provides for the limitation of "actions upon the case, covenant, and debt, founded upon a specialty, or any agreement, contract, or promise in writing, within fifteen years." [26]

§ 7. Judgments sometimes called Contracts.

The notion that a judgment is to be considered as a contract appears to have originated with Blackstone.[27] At any rate, the present writer has been unable to discover any authority for such a prop-

And thus it is that every person is bound and hath virtually agreed to pay such particular sums of money as are charged on him by the sentence, or assessed by the interpretation, of the law. For it is a part of the original contract, entered into by all mankind who partake the benefits of society, to submit in all points to the municipal constitutions and local ordinances of that state of which each individual is a member. Whatever, therefore, the laws order any one to pay, that becomes instantly a debt, which he hath beforehand contracted to discharge."

osition in the earlier reports or text-books. But the statement of the learned commentator, to that effect, has been accepted without question or demur by many of the succeeding text-writers, and put forward as a recognized principle of law in numerous American cases.[28] Thus in New York it is said: "A judgment is a contract of the highest nature known to the law. Actions upon judgment are actions on contract. The cause or consideration of the judgment is of no possible importance; it is merged in the judgment. When recovered, the judgment stands as a conclusive declaration, that the plaintiff therein is entitled to the sum of money recovered. No matter what may have been the original cause of action, the judgment forever settles the plaintiff's claim and the defendant's assent thereto. This assent may have been reluctant, but in law it is an assent, and the defendant is estopped by the judgment to dissent. Forever thereafter any claim on the judgment is setting up a cause of action on contract." [29] So, in a Massachusetts decision, in holding that a judgment by default against a married woman, in the absence of an enabling statute, was void, the court said: "A judgment is in the nature of a contract; it is a specialty and creates a debt; and to have that effect, it must be taken against one capable of contracting a debt." [30] But in this country the question has chiefly arisen in the construction of statutory provisions requiring certain formalities, or prescribing limitations, in actions "founded on contract," and in the interpretation of that clause of the federal constitution which prohibits to the states any legislation impairing the obligation of contracts. In regard to the former class of cases, it has been held that a judgment is a contract within the meaning of a statute which provides that several causes of action may be united when they arise out of contract express or implied, and hence an action upon a judgment may be joined with an action for the breach of an express contract.[31] In regard to the latter class of cases, there are decisions to be found that judgments are covered by the prohibition against laws impairing the obligation of contracts.[32]

§ 8. The Opposite View.

On the other hand, a carefully considered English case, subsequent in date to Blackstone, holds that a judgment is not in any sense a contract; and this view is supported by numerous and respectable American authorities.[33] Thus a learned judge has remarked: "The obligation of a debt on a judgment does not arise from any express contract made by the party charged by it. 'Judicium redditur in invitum.' Upon a refined and artificial view of the obligations imposed by law upon every individual, they may be resolved into a contract which he makes with society to obey the laws by which he is protected. And the force of legal obligation has, by some elementary writers, been attempted to be strengthened upon [32] Scarborough v. Dugan, 10 Cal. 305; Weaver v. Lapsley, 43 Ala. 224. But in the latter case the question was upon the constitutionality of a certain statute entitled "an act to declare void certain judgments and to grant new trials in certain cases therein mentioned." And the original cause of action in this litigation (the judgment in which came under the act) was a contract. So that the true ground of the invalidity of the statute was, not that it impaired the obligation of the judgment obtained on such contract, but that, by vacating the judgment, it cancelled the remedy on the original contract itself, and so impaired its obligation. this principle. (3 Bl. Comm. 160.) But contracts of this description are not barred by this part of the statute [of limitations]." [34] So again: "A cause of action on contract or tort loses its identity when merged in a judgment, and thereafter a new cause of action arises out of the judgment whenever it becomes necessary to enforce the obligation by suit. The liability of the debtor no longer rests upon his voluntary agreement, but upon the adjudication of the court into which the former has passed." [35] The last sentence is especially significant.

§ 9. Where the Cause of Action is in Tort.

Whatever may be said in regard to a judgment which is rendered upon the actual contract of the parties, it must be perfectly apparent that a judgment upon a cause of action sounding in tort cannot be considered as in any sense a contract. True, the judgment merges the cause of action. But that means that the plaintiff cannot afterwards sue upon the original claim or use it otherwise. It does not mean that it is metamorphosed into something diametrically opposite to what it was before. And it is held, upon the highest authority, that a judgment in an action for a tort is not a contract within the meaning of that provision of the federal constitution which forbids the states to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.[36] "A judgment for damages, estimated in money, is sometimes called by text-writers a specialty or contract of record, because it establishes a legal obligation to pay the amount recovered, and, by a fiction of law, a promise to pay is implied where such legal obligation exists. But this fiction cannot convert a transaction wanting the assent of parties into one which necessarily implies it. Judgments for torts are usually the result of violent contests, and, as observed by the court below, are imposed upon the losing party by a higher authority against his will and protest. The prohibition of the federal constitution was intended to secure the observance of good faith in the stipulation of parties against any state action. Where a transaction is not based upon any assent of parties, it cannot be said that any faith is pledged with respect to it, and no case arises for the operation of the prohibition." [37]

§ 10. Judgments are not Contracts.

Upon the whole question, we are unable to concede that judgments can properly be considered contracts under any circumstances whatever. So far as concerns the authority of Blackstone, it is not difficult to perceive that in dividing contracts into three classes, beginning with "contracts by record," he was misled by that same love of a neat classification which more than once led him into error. The mistake lies in grouping under the same technical term things which properly belong there and things which belong there only by a remote analogy. Further, his whole argument upon this point rests upon the assumption of an original "social contract"—a theory long since exploded. Admit that society is a natural organism, not a compact, and we look in vain for the implied promises supposed to have been made by each person on entering into the social state.

Of the American decisions sharing this view (not very numerous or very well considered), some have been content to take the statement for granted, without probing the arguments advanced in its support. Others have followed the same specious reasoning which deceived the originator of the theory. And others, begging the question, have decided that a particular judgment could not be valid because it did not answer to the requirements of a contract, as in respect to the capacity of the person to make a contract or incur a debt.[38] But, as we have seen, there is a preponderance of authority in favor of the proposition that judgments are not contracts.

But in point of fact, the most distinctive mark of a contract is wanting, viz.: the assent of both parties.[39] To this there are two apparent exceptions, the case of judgments by confession and judgments by default. But in the former instance, the agreement of the debtor is that the creditor may take a particular means of securing his claim. The judgment is not the agreement; it is the act of the law, invoked by the parties, in executing the agreement. In the latter case, the defendant merely submits to what would, presumably, be done with or without his assent. Nor will the theory of an implied assent fill the gap. If we admit the assumption which lies at the base of this doctrine, it is not difficult to transform any imaginable right of action into a contract. For instance, it is the duty of every good citizen to pay his taxes; yet no one thinks that the entry on the assessor's book is a contract which he has made. If the duty of every member of society to pay the debts which are charged against him as the result of legal proceedings can be construed into his agreement to pay them, it is illogical to stop at causes of action which are strictly and properly ex contractu. It is just as true that he impliedly undertakes to make reparation for any delict which he may commit, as it is that he impliedly promises to pay judgments against him. But it would be rash to conclude that a tort is a contract.[40] Some of the cases speak of this implied assent as a "reluctant assent." But this is practically a contradiction in terms. The submission which is wrung from a party who has made his best defense and can no longer help himself is not the movement of will which goes to the making of a contract.

Another indispensable requisite to a contract is that the parties should be legally capable of forming a binding agreement. And yet

[39] "The most important elements of a contract are wanting. There is no aggregatio mentium. The defendant has not voluntarily assented." O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, 47 Am. Rep. 64.

[40] "A judgment is no more a contract than is a tort. In one sense it is true that every member of society impliedly agrees to pay all judgments which may be regularly rendered against him; and in the same sense does he impliedly agree to make amends for all torts which he may commit. No one will pretend that actions for torts are within the spirit and intent of the statute [in regard to actions upon 'any contract or agreement'], and yet they certainly are as much so as are actions upon judgments." Rae v. Hulbert, 17 Ill. 572, Caton, J.

the immense majority of the cases hold that judgments rendered against infants, lunatics, and other persons who are in law disabled from contracting, are valid and conclusively binding until vacated or reversed.[41] To push this argument one step further: "It is not true that a judgment rests either upon the will or the capacity to contract of the party against whom it is rendered. If a judgment is a contract, and can only be rendered against one who is then capable of contracting by the laws of the forum, there could not be a judgment on a contract made in another state [nor on a judgment rendered in another state], unless by the law of the forum that contract would be valid. This would destroy the rule of comity and international law which makes the validity of a contract and the capacity of the contractor depend on the place where the contract is made or is to be performed, or the domicile of the contractor, as the case may be, and not upon the law of the forum." § 11. The Question considered as one of Statutory Construction.

As already stated, the chief importance of this question arises in connection with the construction of constitutional and statutory provisions. And we are now prepared to formulate the rules which reason and principle seem to point out.

In the first place, a judgment is not a contract within the meaning of the prohibition against laws impairing the obligation of contracts. The cases which hold that it is,[43] proceed upon a misapprehension of the constitutional principle. It is true that statutes have been declared invalid, as obnoxious to this inhibition, which vacated judgments, granted new trials, enacted shorter statutes of limitation, exempted the debtor's property, gave stay of execution, and so on. But it was not because they attacked the judgment, but because they destroyed or desiccated the remedy on the original contract, which, on the authorities, is vital to the maintenance of its obligation.[44] If the cause of action was in tort, the constitutional clause does not apply.[45] But it is impossible to hold that view if every judgment is a contract.

In the next place, if a statute—for example, in prescribing limitations of actions—manifestly intends, on its face, to divide all causes of action into two classes, actions on "contract" and actions on "tort," then a judgment must be considered as falling within the former class. Strictly it belongs to neither. But if the words are used in this extended sense, then "contract" must include "quasi-contract." And a judgment may reasonably be called a quasi-contract; for although it lacks some or all of the elements of a true contract, it is more nearly assimilated thereto than it is to a delict.[46] It is the conclusive evidence of a fixed and ascertained debt, and that is sufficient to distinguish it from a claim in tort.

Finally, if the statute relates only to "contracts express or implied," or intends to divide possible causes of action into a larger number of classes than those mentioned above, a judgment cannot be considered as coming under the denomination of a "contract." In such a case, it must stand in a class by itself, and if not specifically mentioned, it is not within the purview of the act.

PART II. THE CLASSIFICATION OF JUDGMENTS.

§ 12. Methods of Classifying Judgments.

Several methods of classifying judgments have been proposed, none of which, perhaps, is strictly scientific or perfectly accurate. The difficulty is that so many complications arise in pleading and practice that an entirely regular classification cannot well be made without extending the number of groups beyond convenient limits. However, as the chief thing is to obtain an orderly arrangement and enumeration of the different varieties of judgments, the scientific nature of the method pursued is not of prime importance. Abandoning the division commonly acquiesced in, as being too unwieldy, we propose to arrange judgments under the four following heads: 1. Judgments on an issue of law. 2. Judgments upon a verdict. 3. Judgments without a verdict. 4. Judgments against a verdict.

§ 13. Judgments on an Issue of Law.

These judgments are given upon the decision of a demurrer. They are either for the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, and are of the following sorts:

1. For the plaintiff, when the issue raised by a demurrer to any of the pleadings is decided in his favor. This judgment is final and definitive and concludes the right of action. Its style is "quod recuperet," that is, "that the plaintiff do recover." [47]

2. For the plaintiff, when the issue raised by his demurrer to a dilatory plea or plea in abatement is found in his favor. This is called judgment of "respondeat ouster," that is, that the defendant "do answer over" or further. It is not final, since the plea did not go to the merits, but requires the defendant, beaten on a preliminary point, to present a more substantial defense.[48]

3. For the defendant, when the issue raised by a demurrer is determined in his favor. This is a final judgment, and disposes of the case, unless leave be granted to amend the pleading or withdraw the demurrer, as the case may be.[49]

4. For the defendant, when the plaintiff's demurrer to a plea in abatement is overruled, and the plea consequently sustained. The language of this judgment is "quod cassetur breve," or "billam," that is, that the writ or declaration be quashed.

[47] Hale v. Lawrence, 22 N. J. Law, 72; Silver v. Rhodes, 2 Har. (Del.) 369; Pettys v. Marsh, 24 Fla. 44, 3 South. 577. But where defendant demurred for a variance between declaration and writ, and pending the demurrer leave was granted to amend, whereupon the demurrer was overruled, held, that the judgment should be respondeat ouster, and not quod recuperet. § 14. Judgments upon Verdict.

We come next to such judgments as are rendered after the determination of an issue of fact by the verdict of a jury. They may be either for the plaintiff or defendant, and are in all cases final and conclusive, if entered according to the verdict.

1. For the plaintiff, the judgment is "quod recuperet." [50]

2. For the defendant, if upon the merits, the judgment is "nil capiat per breve" or "per billam," that is, that the plaintiff "take nothing" by his writ or declaration. If the plea was in abatement, the judgment is "cassetur breve," as above.

§ 15. Judgments without Verdict.

This class of judgments includes numerous varieties. Those which may be rendered for the plaintiff are as follows:

1. Judgment by default. This is a judgment entered in consequence of the non-appearance of the defendant. Where the defendant omits to plead within the time required, the judgment taken against him for that cause is more properly called "nil dicit," but the term "default" is usually extended to cover this case also. And in the code states, the judgment entered upon the defendant's failure to serve or file an answer within the prescribed period is called a judgment by default.

2. Judgment by nil dicit, which is rendered against a defendant for his failure to plead to the declaration.

3. Judgment by "non sum informatus." This is a judgment which is rendered when, instead of pleading, the defendant's attorney declares that he "is not informed" of any answer or defense to be made.

4. Judgment by confession. This is a judgment which is entered for the plaintiff in case the defendant, instead of entering a plea, confesses the action, or at any time before trial confesses the action and withdraws his plea and other allegations. This is called, in full,

[50] See Texas, S. F. & N. R. Co. v. Saxton, 3 N. M. 282 (Johns.) 6 Pac. 206. Where issue has been joined on a plea in abatement (the only plea in the case), and the issue submitted to a jury, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff, the court should award a peremptory judgment quod recuperet, and not a default for want of a plea. a judgment by confession "relicta verificatione." A more usual form of judgment by confession is that which is entered where the debtor, without suit brought, gives a written instrument confessing that he is indebted to the creditor in a certain sum, and authorizing an attorney to appear for him and enter judgment against him in a court of record.

5. Judgment on motion; a judgment authorized by statute in certain kinds of summary proceedings, rendered ex parte and without trial. This remedy, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly pursued, and the judgment must show on its face all facts necessary to give jurisdiction.[51]

6. Judgment on the pleadings. This is a form of judgment not infrequently used in the practice of the code states. It is rendered, on motion of the plaintiff, when the answer admits or leaves undenied all the material facts stated in the complaint.[52] It cannot be entered, in a suit for unliquidated damages, over an answer stating matters in mitigation.[53]

Of this class of judgments, those which may be rendered for the defendant are as follows:—

1. Judgment of nonsuit. This judgment, given against the plaintiff, is either voluntary or involuntary. It is the former, when the plaintiff throws up his case and consents to a judgment for defendant for costs. It is the latter, when the plaintiff, on being called or demanded, at the instance of the defendant, to be present while the jury give their verdict, fails to appear. Also, where the court decides that the plaintiff has given no evidence on which the jury could find a

But where facts showing the illegality of a contract sued on are sufficiently alleged in the answer, the plaintiff cannot recover upon the pleadings, although such facts are not pleaded or insisted on as a defense. Prost v. More, 40 Cal. 347. And where an issue is distinctly raised by the answer, and submitted to the jury without objection, and a verdict given for defendant, it is then too late for plaintiff to move for judgment on the pleadings. verdict in his favor, an involuntary nonsuit is entered against him.[54]

2. Judgment of nolle prosequi. This is a judgment entered against the plaintiff where, after appearance and before judgment, he declares that "he will not further prosecute his suit." It is used as a means of abandoning one or more counts in a declaration or parts of a cause of action, or releasing one or more of the joint defendants, while holding to the rest.

3. Judgment of non prosequitur, or "non pros." A judgment given against the plaintiff for his default or neglect to take any of those steps in the proceedings which he is required to take in due time; as, a failure to file a declaration or other pleading.[55]

4. Judgment of retraxit. This is a judgment given against the plaintiff when, after appearance, he voluntarily goes into court and enters upon the record a statement that "he withdraws his suit." It is an open and voluntary renunciation of his claim in court; wherein it differs from a nonsuit, which is merely his neglect or default; and by a retraxit the plaintiff's cause of action is forever barred.[56]

In this class of judgments there is one which may be entered for either party, viz.: judgment by consent. It is well known in practice. The attorneys of the respective parties to a suit, it is said, have undoubtedly the right to agree upon terms and what kind of judgment shall be entered; but the judgment must be one authorized by law.[57]

[54] Where plaintiff's evidence is excluded from the jury, the proper judgment is one of nonsuit. Wilson v. Breyfogle, 11 C. C. A. 248, 63 Fed. 379. Also where the court holds that plaintiff cannot recover on his pleadings. Murray v. Southerland, 125 N. C. 175, 34 S. E. 270. But a nonsuit does not warrant a judgment dismissing the complaint on the merits. Thiry v. Taylor Brewing & M. Co., 37 App. Div. 391, 56 N. Y. Supp. 85; McCune v. Eaton, 77 Minn. 404, 80 N. W. 355.

[55] A judgment of non pros. is in effect a judgment by default for laches. Walton v. Lefever (Pa.) 17 Lanc. Law Rev. 203; People v. Reuter, 88 Ill. App. 586. A plea being bad, so that demurrer thereto is improperly overruled, plaintiff is not in default for not replying, and therefore a judgment of non pros. for want of replication is error. Henderson v. Maryland Home Fire Ins. Co., 90 Md. 47, 44 Atl. 1020.

§ 16. Judgment against the Verdict.

Where the plea to the declaration confesses a cause of action in the plaintiff and sets up matter in avoidance, and such matter, though found true by the verdict of the jury, is insufficient in law to constitute a bar or defense to the action, the court will enter a judgment for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto, that is, notwithstanding the verdict.[58] For, "the plea being substantially bad in law, of course the verdict which merely shows it to be true in point of fact cannot avail to entitle the defendant to judgment; while, on the other hand, the plea, being in confession and avoidance, involves a confession of the plaintiff's declaration, and shows that he was entitled to maintain his action."[59] For example, a plea of tender of rent after the day of its falling due is insufficient, and after a verdict on such plea in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto.[60] But in order that this judgment may be given, it is essential that the plea should distinctly imply an admission of the plaintiff's right or title.[61]

There are other cases beside the foregoing in which a judgment non obstante veredicto may be rendered, or an analogous species of judgment. Thus, in some of the states, in cases where the special findings of the jury are in direct conflict with the general verdict, it is the practice to grant a judgment notwithstanding the verdict.[62]

But unless the special findings "are so irreconcilably in conflict with the general verdict as that both cannot stand, the motion must be overruled without regard to the evidence." [63] And the motion for this judgment can be made only by the party against whom the verdict goes; hence, if the general verdict is in his favor, but the special findings do not correspond with it, a motion in that behalf will not avail him.[64]

Another instance in which this form of judgment may be rendered, is where the decision on a "point reserved" negatives the verdict of the jury. If a point of law is ruled provisionally at the trial, but subject to the further consideration of the court, and if its ultimate decision shows that the party in whose favor the verdict goes is not entitled to judgment, the court may enter judgment notwithstanding the verdict. But the record must show the point of law reserved and the specific facts on which it arises.[65] In Pennsylvania, when the court has reserved the question whether there is any evidence entitling the plaintiff to recover, and the evidence has been submitted to the jury, and a verdict has been returned for the plaintiff, the court may then, on the reservation, enter judgment for the defendant non obstante veredicto.[66]

At the common law, a defendant is not entitled in any circumstances to move for judgment non obstante veredicto; if the verdict is for the plaintiff, and the state of the pleadings is such that the latter might have asked for this judgment had their positions been reversed, the only proper course for the defendant is to move that the judgment be arrested,[67] or, in case of conflict between the general verdict and the special findings, to move for judgment on such findings.[68] But in a number of the states, this rule has been relaxed, either by statute or by the decisions of the courts, so as to admit of the entry of judgment notwithstanding the verdict, in proper cases, in favor of the defendant.[69] Thus, in Nebraska, the code of procedure provides that "where, on the statements in pleadings, one party is entitled by law to judgment in his favor, judgment shall be so rendered by the court, although a verdict has been found against such party." This will entitle the defendant to a judgment notwithstanding a verdict for the plaintiff, if the plaintiff's own pleadings show that he ought not to recover; but not merely on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the weight of the evidence.[70] In Minnesota, the law allows an entry of judgment for the defendant, notwithstanding a verdict for the plaintiff, in cases where the facts stated in the plaintiff's pleadings are not sufficient, in point of substance, to constitute a legal cause of action; but not on the ground of such a failure of evidence, in weight or detail, as would warrant the court in ordering a new trial.[71] A similar rule obtains in Oregon.[72] In Pennsylvania, where the plaintiff's evidence is so weak as to amount but to a scintilla, judgment may be rendered for the defendant non obstante veredicto.[73] In Kentucky, in an action for damages caused by defendant's negligence, where a plea of contributory negligence is not controverted, defendant is entitled to judgment notwithstanding a verdict for the plaintiff.[74]

A motion for judgment non obstante veredicto is founded on the record alone, and its determination cannot be influenced by affidavits or extrinsic evidence.[75] In some states, it is held that a party will not be entitled to have a judgment of this kind entered in his favor, unless he has moved to direct a verdict at the close of the testimony; and moreover, after judgment, he must specifically move for judgment non obstante veredicto, a mere motion for a new trial not being sufficient to authorize the judgment.[76] The motion, in the absence of an agreement by the parties that it may be filed and considered in vacation, cannot be considered by the court when so filed.[77] And where one judge presided at the trial of an action, another judge has no authority, on motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, to make findings of fact on evidence not heard by him.[78]

There is one other form of judgment, entered in disregard of a verdict, which must be mentioned in this connection. It is the judgment "quod partes replacitent" (that the parties replead), or judgment of repleader. This is entered in a case where issue has been taken upon a point so immaterial that, notwithstanding the verdict, the court is unable to decide which party should recover upon the merits. It requires the parties to frame their pleadings anew, from the fault which first occasioned the immaterial issue, taking issue upon a substantial ground. A repleader differs from a judgment non obstante veredicto in this, that the latter is granted in a case where the plea is good in form though the matter pleaded is not available as a defense, while the former is only proper where the pleadings do not bring the merits within the issue. Hence the latter kind of judgment is always upon the merits, and never granted but in a very clear case; a repleader is upon the form and manner of pleading.[79]

§ 17. Names of Judgments in certain Special Actions.

Before completing our enumeration of the different kinds of judgments, it is necessary to mention the special names given to the judgments in certain actions. In the action for partition, the interlocutory judgment whereby it is directed that partition be made, is called judgment "quod partitio fiat;" while the style of the final judgment in the same action, confirming the partition made, upon the return of the writ, is "quod partitio facta firma et stabilis in perpetuum."[80]

The interlocutory judgment in an action of account, whereby it is directed that "the defendant do account," is called judgment "quod computet."

§ 18. Cross-Classifications of Judgments.

There are certain methods of classifying judgments and decrees, without regard to the mode of trial, stage of entry, or rendition of a verdict, and hence running across the division above adopted, which are important to be named. And first, they are either final or interlocutory. A final judgment or decree is one which puts an end to the whole action, leaving nothing further to be done or determined by the court. It is interlocutory, if it merely settles some preliminary or subordinate point, without reaching the merits, or if, though directed to the main controversy, it does not dispose of the whole case, but leaves something for the further action or consideration of the court before the rights of the parties are definitely fixed. This distinction will form the subject of the next chapter.

Judgments and decrees are also either domestic or foreign. A judgment is called domestic when it was rendered by a court organized by the same state or sovereignty within whose territory it is sought to be enforced or is invoked as a defense. It is called foreign when rendered by another or independent state or sovereignty.

In Louisiana, a judgment rendered by default is distinguished from a "contradictory judgment;" the latter being one which is given after the parties have been heard either in support of their claims or in their defense.

Judgments and orders may further be classed as absolute or nisi. At common law a judgment nisi was one entered on the return of the nisi prius record with the postea indorsed, which would become absolute according to the terms of the postea, unless the court out of which the nisi prius record proceeded should, within the first four days, otherwise order.[81] It is otherwise defined as "one that is to be valid unless something else should be done within a given time to defeat it."[82] A rule or order nisi is one which is to be confirmed or made absolute, unless cause be shown to the contrary, or something be done which has been required, within a specified time.

Adjudications are also classed as either in rem or in personam. This distinction is one of difficulty and importance, and the former kind of judgments will form the subject of a later chapter, to which the reader is referred for the definitions.

§ 19. Classification of Decrees.

In addition to the divisions indicated in the preceding section, decrees in equity are classed as "by default," "by consent," "on the hearing," and "pro confesso." The last named—a decree that the bill be taken as confessed—is entered where the defendant, by not appearing within the time prescribed, is understood to admit the case made by the bill. It is intended to prepare the case for final decree; and its effect is like that of a default at common law, by which the defendant is deemed to have admitted all that is well pleaded in the declaration.[83] A decree nisi is one entered upon the defendant's failure to appear when the case is called for hearing, granting the relief asked, but coupled with a condition that the defendant is to have a certain time within which to show cause against the decree.

The distinction between final judgments and decrees and such as are merely interlocutory, is one of considerable importance, both as a matter of practice and in respect to the consequences which follow the entry of a final adjudication. As a general rule, it is only a final judgment which has the effect of creating a lien upon the debtor's realty. So also, with certain minor exceptions, it is only a final judgment or decree upon the merits which will sustain the plea of res judicata. At common law, a writ of error could not be brought until the last, or final, decision in the cause. In many of the states, it is provided by statute that appeals may be taken to their courts of last resort only from the final judgments of the trial courts or the final decrees of the courts of chancery.[1] By the federal judiciary act [2] it is enacted that error may be brought to the final judgments at law or decrees in equity of the highest courts in the several states for the purpose of their re-examination by the supreme court of the United States in certain prescribed cases. Thus, for these various reasons, it is often necessary to distinguish final decisions from the interlocutory class of adjudications. The cases in which such a distinction is drawn are numerous, illustrating the wide range of instances in which the question may arise, and not always harmonious; for the practice, or the statute-law, in some jurisdictions, ascribes the character of finality to judgments or orders which elsewhere are considered as merely interlocutory.

§ 21. Definition of Final Judgments.

A final judgment is such a judgment as at once puts an end to the action by declaring that the plaintiff has or has not entitled himself to recover the remedy for which he sues.[3] It is sometimes said that it is the award of the judicial consequences which the law attaches to the facts, and which determines the subject-matter of the controversy between the parties.[4] It is evident, however, that this description is too narrow. For a final judgment means not a final determination of the rights of the parties with reference to the subject-matter of the litigation, but merely of their rights with reference to the particular suit.[5] In other words, it is not at all necessary that the judgment should be upon the merits, if it definitely puts the case out of court.[6] A judgment of nonsuit or dismissal is final, though it does not reach the merits. It is the termination of the individual action which marks the finality of the judgment. But there must be an actual judgment. An order for judgment is not a final judgment; it is final only when it contains the decision or sentence of the law upon the matter contained in the record; the order must be followed by the sentence of the law declaring that the party may recover the sum adjudged.[7] On the other hand, a judgment is as final when pronounced by the court as when entered and recorded by the clerk.[8] Where a motion for new trial has been made and entertained by the court, the judgment in the case does not become final and effectual, for purposes of review, until the date of the overruling of such motion.[9]

A judgment which is not final is called "interlocutory." That is, an interlocutory judgment is one which determines some preliminary or subordinate point or plea, or settles some step, question, or default arising in the progress of the cause, but does not adjudicate the ultimate rights of the parties or finally put the case out of court.

3 Wash. St. 696, 29 Pac. 202. A judgment in a contest to determine whether a homestead is subject to sale on execution is a final judgment from which an appeal will lie. Wright v. Co., 36 C. C. A. 263, 94 Fed. 312.

[6] Where a verdict is returned in favor of plaintiff, and the court sustains a motion in arrest of judgment, and subsequently orders the cause stricken from the docket, the case has reached such an end that an appeal will lie. Daugherty v. Midland Steel Co., 23 Ind. App. 78, 53 N. E. 844. When a controversy between two parties is ended, so far as the court before which it is pending can end it, the judgment is then final, regardless of mere matter of form. Heegaard v. Thus a judgment or order passed upon any provisional or accessory claim or contention is, in general, merely interlocutory, though it may finally dispose of that particular matter.[10]

Under the common law system, an order, made in the progress of a suit and before judgment, will be considered final if it determines the action and prevents a judgment.[11] But an order which does not settle and conclude the rights involved in the action, and does not deny to the party the means of further prosecuting or defending the suit, is not so far final as to be a proper subject of appeal.[12]

§ 22. Interlocutory and Intermediate Orders.

The codes of procedure adopted in several of the states define a judgment as "the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding." Under this system, therefore, there is no such thing as an interlocutory judgment in a cause, the only judgment authorized being one which finally disposes of the rights of the parties.[13] And the office of an interlocutory judgment at common law is, under the code practice, filled by various orders. But as,

[10] But it has been held that a decree allowing temporary alimony and counsel fees is, to all legal intents and purposes, a final judgment, from which an appeal may be taken. Daniels v. Daniels, 9 Colo. 133, 10 Pac. 657. Conditional judgments may be final if they dispose of the case as to all parties before the court and as to the entire subject-matter of the litigation. Thus, a judgment for the sale of a certain tract of land to satisfy a sum adjudged to be a lien thereon, in the event that another tract ordered to be sold shall not be sufficient for that purpose, is a final order from which an appeal can be prosecuted. Tabor v. Payne (Ky.) 41 S. W. 557. Compare Standard Steam Laundry v. Dole, 20 Utah, 469, 58 Pac. 1109.

An unconditional order for the payment of money within a certain time is a final order, from which an appeal lies. Nevitt v. Woodburn, 45 Ill. App. 417. In England, it is said that an order is final only where it is made upon an application or proceeding which must in any event, whether it succeeds or fails, finally determine the rights of the parties. among the various orders which may be made in the progress of a cause, there may be some which, without finally adjudicating "the rights" of the parties, may determine some claim or contention which, from its independence and meritorious nature, ought to be the subject of an appeal, therefore in these states the statutes usually allow appeals from "an order affecting a substantial right" of one of the parties.[14] The qualifying adjective is used to exclude rulings on merely formal or technical points. The code practice is, generally speaking, more liberal in allowing appeals than the common law. Thus in California, "an appeal may be taken * * * from an order granting or refusing a new trial, from an order granting or dissolving an injunction, from an order refusing to grant or dissolve an injunction, from an order dissolving or refusing to dissolve an attachment, from an order granting or refusing to grant a change of the place of trial." [15]

An order setting aside a sale of property made in disregard of an injunction issued in the same suit is a final order and appealable.[16] So also is an order in an equity cause committing a witness, not a party to the suit, for contempt in refusing to testify;[17] and an order confirming a sale;[18] and an order vacating an arrest;[19] and an order directing a sheriff who has possession of warrants, by virtue of Therkelsen, 35 Or. 75, 54 Pac. 885. In Pennsylvania, the act allowing appeals from interlocutory orders was intended to reach only clear cases of error in law, and thus prevent the delay of a trial. certain replevin proceedings, to deliver them to a certain person, made in another suit to which the sheriff is not a party.[20] An appeal will also lie from a judgment sustaining exceptions to a referee's report, and an order thereafter overruling a motion for a new trial;[21] and from an order directing the receiver of an insolvent corporation to sue the stockholders.[22] An order of the trial court, refusing to proceed with the trial of a case, is an interlocutory judgment.[23] And an order overruling a motion to correct the date of a judgment is a final order and appealable.[24]

But an order quashing the service of process in a case is not considered final in such sense as to be appealable.[25] Nor can an appeal be taken from an order granting or refusing leave to amend the pleadings;[26] nor from a judgment allowing a garnishee to file an answer after default;[27] nor from an order granting a change of venue;[28] nor from a refusal to grant a continuance.[29] An order denying a motion to set aside an order contained in the judgment, that execution issue as well against the defendant's person as against his property, is not final nor appealable.[30] And the same is true of an order appointing an assignee in insolvency in place of the one named by the assignor in his deed.[31] Nor will an appeal lie from an interlocutory judgment reassigning a homestead and appointing commissioners to admeasure the same;[32] nor from an order in insolvency proceedings, provisionally passing upon the amount a creditor is entitled to pay on a purchase of the insolvent's assets.[33]

§ 23. Must be final as to all Parties.

As a general rule, a judgment must possess the character of finality in disposing of the rights of all the parties concerned, before it can be considered final with respect to any of them.[34] Thus when suit is instituted against two or more defendants, and judgment is entered for or against all of them except one, who is not mentioned or referred to in the decision, there is no final judgment from which an appeal can be taken, no order appearing for the disposal of the cause as to the defendant omitted from the judgment.[35] For the same reason, a decree dismissing a bill in equity as to one of several defendants sought to be jointly charged is not a final decree from which an appeal may be taken.[36] But these rules do not apply where there are parties who are merely formal parties to the record, or as to whom there are separable controversies. For example, an order dismissing an interpleader,[37] or discharging a garnishee,[38] may be final and appealable. So, the right of appeal is not affected by the fact that there is no decree against one of the respondents, who was not served with process, and who, though a proper, was not a necessary, party to the suit.[39] And a judgment in an action by an infant for personal injuries may be final, though it does not in express terms dispose of his next friend.[40] The same is true of a judgment against one of the members of a firm separately sued on the firm indorsement of a note.[41] And where several actions to enforce mechanics' liens against the same defendant are consolidated, a judgment against one of the plaintiffs is final as to him and may be appealed.[42]

§ 24. Must settle all the Issues.

It is also requisite that a judgment, in order to be final, should determine all the issues involved in the cause. The decision on an issue of law which does not put the case out of court is not of this character. So if there are several issues of fact in the same controversy, the decision of one of them, leaving the others undetermined, the action remains pending as to the other parties. Bunnell v. Berlin Iron Bridge Co., 66 Conn. 24, 33 Atl. 533.

is not a final adjudication. For there cannot be two final judgments in the same action.[43] But this rule does not apply where several distinct causes of action are united in the same suit,[44] or where subordinate or ancillary matters arise in the course of the action, each capable of final determination by itself and independently of the main controversy.[45]

§ 25. Uncertainty of the Amount.

An uncertainty as to the amount of the recovery will often prevent a judgment from becoming final until such amount is liquidated and declared.[46] The test in these cases seems to be, whether the judicial action of the court is necessary to be directed to the question before the amount of the judgment can be settled, or whether, though at present uncertain, it can be determined or computed without the intervention of the court. Thus a judgment by default is interlocutory if the damages remain to be ascertained by writ of inquiry or other judicial proceeding. So a decree which settles the rights of the parties, but does not find the amount to be paid, leaving that for future determination, is not final.[47] The same is true of a decree which, after finding the equities to be in one of the parties, sends the case to a referee or master to ascertain and report the sum which he is entitled to recover.[48] For the report must be examined and confirmed by the court, before there is a final judgment for such sum. On the other hand, where a judgment is entered against one of the parties, to be released on payment of such sum as a third person shall say is due, it is a final judgment; because, to make it absolute so far as regards the amount, no further action of the court is necessary, but only the certificate of the referee.[49] So a decree in chancery which adjudges a certain sum of money to be due from the defendant, and awards execution to collect it, is a final decree, notwithstanding it also allows as payment to be deducted from the amount therein adjudged any note held by the defendant against the complainant.[50] Also, a decree is final, although an order is added to it suspending the decree as to one item of the account, until the decision of another suit, in which that item is in litigation.[51]

§ 26. Judgment of Nonsuit.

This species of judgment is clearly final, since it completely disposes of the action, though without passing upon the merits. "By a final judgment is to be understood not a final determination of the rights of the parties, but merely of the particular suit. Thus, for instance, a judgment of nonsuit, other than where the plaintiff submits to a voluntary nonsuit, is a final judgment, even though no costs be awarded against the plaintiff, inasmuch as he is aggrieved by being defeated of his right of action in that suit and of his costs in prosecuting it." [52] For similar reasons a judgment of non pros. is appealable, being final as to the plaintiff.[53] But no appeal is ordinarily allowed from the plaintiff's voluntary entry of a nonsuit,[54] nor, unless the statute specially grants it, from an order setting aside a nonsuit.[55]

§ 27. Dismissal of Suit.

The dismissal of a bill in chancery or of a suit at law, since it fully disposes of that action, is a final judgment; it is a final decision of the case as against all claims made by it, although it may not be a final determination of the rights of the parties, as they may be presented in some other action.[56] Thus a judgment dismissing a suit for want of prosecution, in which a temporary injunction had been granted, amounts to a determination by the court that the injunction was improperly granted, and is in effect a final judgment in favor of the defendant.[57] So a judgment discharging a garnishee is a final and complete disposition of the cause, and the court has thereafter no jurisdiction over it; so that a judgment against the garnishee for costs, at a subsequent term, is void.[58] But an appeal does not lie from an order directing the dismissal of the suit, but only from the judgment entered on such order.[59] Nor is a judgment appealable which dismisses the suit only as to some among the defendants,[60] nor one which dismisses it conditionally,[61] nor an order dismissing a cross-bill in equity.[62] Where a motion to dismiss is denied, this does not constitute such a final judgment as will be appealable.[63] Nor can plaintiff appeal from an order refusing to reinstate an action which he has himself dismissed.[64] It has also been held that the action of replevin is an extraordinary remedy, and that in such action a judgment dismissing the suit is not final, and error cannot be assigned upon such an order until after final judgment.[65]

tained by a writ of inquiry or other judicial method of computation, then the judgment is merely interlocutory, until such amount is settled and entered on the record.[66] "A judgment by default is interlocutory or final. When the action sounds in damages, as covenant, trover, trespass, etc., it is only interlocutory, that the plaintiff ought to recover his damages, leaving the amount of them to be afterwards ascertained. But where the amount of the judgment is entered by the calculation of the clerk, no further steps being necessary, by a jury or otherwise, to ascertain the amount, the judgment is final." [67] Where suit is brought against two defendants who are jointly and severally liable, and one suffers a default, and the other puts in a plea and goes to trial, the judgment entered against the former defendant, on his default, is merely interlocutory until the case is disposed of as to the other.[68]

"An order that a bill be taken pro confesso is interlocutory and intended to prepare the case for a final decree. Its effect is similar to that of a default in an action at common law, by which the defendant is deemed to have admitted all that is well pleaded in the declaration. The defendant has lost his standing in court, and is not entitled to notice of its further proceedings, but the matters set forth in the bill do not pass in rem judicatam until the final decree." § 29. Judgment on Demurrer.

When the issue of law raised by a demurrer is decided in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment is entered quod recuperet, such judgment is of course final if the amount of the recovery is fixed. Similarly, where such an issue is found for the defendant, and judgment for his discharge is given, it is final;[70] for the decision has the effect of disposing of that particular suit. But all the authorities agree that a decision or order of the court sustaining or overruling a demurrer, but not entering judgment thereon so as to dispose of the case, is merely interlocutory.[71] Hence no appeal will lie from an order sustaining a demurrer, where leave is granted to the party to amend his pleading, or to plead to the merits, as the case may be, unless he elects to stand upon his pleading as it is, or unless the time limited for amendment or new plea elapses without action on his part, and judgment is entered accordingly.[72] Nor can an appeal be taken from an order overruling a demurrer with leave to plead. There is no finality in such an order, though there would be in a judgment entered upon the demurrant's election to stand upon his demurrer or on his failure to plead, and finally disposing of the case.[73] It is to be noted that the general rule is subject to certain exceptions depending on the peculiar nature of the action or the local rules of practice. Thus, a final judgment, in an action to recover a penalty imposed by statute, to be recovered "on conviction," cannot be entered on demurrer, but only on a trial upon the merits.[74] So, in Mississippi, it is said that, under the statute, judgments on demurrers are not final until the end of the term, until which time, on proper showing, they may be set aside.[75]

§ 30. Judgment on Plea in Abatement.

Where issue is joined upon a matter of a plea in abatement and found against the defendant, the judgment for the plaintiff is final.[76] It is different in regard to the decision of a preliminary question of jurisdiction. Thus, in a litigation respecting the distribution of a testator's property, a question arose as to his domicile, and after hearing testimony the court decided that "his domicile was in the city of W.," and "this court has original jurisdiction in the matter of his estate." It was held that this was not a final judgment.[77]

§ 31. Judgment for Costs.

A judgment which merely awards costs to the defendant, without more, is not a final judgment.[78] In order to have that character, it must profess to terminate and completely dispose of the action. Hence, if for the defendant, the final judgment must state that he is dismissed without day, or that it is considered that the plaintiff take nothing by his suit, or otherwise refer to the disposition made of the subject-matter. "The form of the judgment," say the court in Texas, "is immaterial, but in substance it must show intrinsically and distinctly, and not inferentially, that the matters in the record had been determined in favor of one of the litigants, or that the rights of the parties in litigation had been adjudicated. The costs are regulated by statute, and are an incident or appendage of the judgment, and generally are recoverable by the victor in the contest. But, as an incident, they cannot be substituted for the principal; and a judgment for their recovery is not a decision of the matter at issue; and it is therefore no such final judgment as can, by law, come within the revisory power of this court."[79]

§ 31a. Allowance of Claims against Fund.

An application for the allowance of a claim against a fund which is before the court, or for a distributive share of such fund, is generally so far separable from the main controversy as to constitute a distinct, though subordinate, proceeding. Where this is the case, the decision of the court on such an application is to be regarded as final, quoad hoc, and therefore appealable. This rule applies to a decree or order allowing attorneys' fees out of a fund in course of administration by the court,[80] to an order granting or denying alimony or an allowance pending the suit,[81] to an order fixing the compensation of a receiver,[82] or directing him to pay certain claims out of the proceeds of a sale of the property,[83] or to pay a certain rate of wages to his employés.[84] Again, an order of a court of bankruptcy allowing a claim in bankruptcy is a final decision and appealable,[85] and the same is true of an order of the probate court fixing and determining the rights and estate of a surviving husband or wife in the homestead.[86] But it seems that the refusal of a court to distribute a fund before it,[87] or to strike off a mechanic's lien,[88] is, at least in some states, not an appealable order.

§ 32. Granting or Refusing Extraordinary Remedies.

According to the general consensus of judicial opinion, an order or decree granting a provisional or temporary injunction, with a reference to ascertain facts, or directing a trial at law, or otherwise reserving the merits, or a decree refusing to grant, or dissolving, a temporary injunction which is merely an incident of the relief sought, is interlocutory only, not final.[89] But a decree in favor of the complainant for a perpetual injunction, with costs, is final; for that completely adjudicates the relief asked and speaks the last word in the case.[90] And so, generally, is a decree dissolving an injunction, or refusing to dissolve it, where that is the sole or the main object of the bill.[91] It must be noted, however, that these rules may not apply in some of the states where the code practice obtains. In those jurisdictions, orders granting or dissolving an injunction, or overruling a motion to that effect, are frequently found in the enumerated classes of appealable orders;[92] or they may be considered as orders "affecting a substantial right" and hence subject to the revisory power of the upper courts.

On analogous principles, it must be held that an order of the court granting or refusing the writ of mandamus in the alternative, is not a final judgment. But its action in allowing or denying a peremptory mandamus, or in making the interlocutory writ absolute, is final to all legal intents and purposes.[93] And so where the parties to a proceeding for this writ dispense, by agreement, with a return or answer and other formal pleadings authorized by statute, and submit the case upon the petition and an agreed statement of facts in lieu of such pleading, and the case is heard as an application for a peremptory mandamus, and a judgment is rendered thereon dismissing the petition, this is a final judgment reviewable on error.[94]

A judgment or decree appointing a receiver, to take charge of the property in litigation, or to administer the revenues of the defendant, subject to the direction of the court, during the pendency of the suit, is not considered a final judgment.[95] And an order removing a receiver is likewise interlocutory.[96] In a few states, nevertheless, it is held that orders appointing receivers are final and appealable.[97] This is a variance of local practice. But in the system of procedure under the codes, where proceedings of this character are classed as "special proceedings," and an order made in such proceedings which affects a substantial right is final and appealable, it seems reasonable that a decision granting or refusing a receiver should be considered as final for this purpose, since it does not turn upon a formal or technical point, but goes to the claim of the party to secure the property in litigation in the most efficacious manner.[98] An order confirming a sale of property made by a receiver is final and appealable,[99] and so is an order granting or denying an application for leave to sue the receiver,[100] an order authorizing receiver's certificates to issue for past and future expenses and making them a lien superior to the claims of interveners,[101] and an order requiring payment of the receiver's compensation and other expenses out of funds in his hands.[102] An order settling the accounts of the receiver, which embraces all the transactions of the receivership during the entire period of his appointment, is in the nature of a final judgment;[103] but not an order merely directing the receiver to make a partial distribution of the funds in his hands.[104]

An order of a superior court granting a writ of certiorari is not appealable,[105] but if the court, on such writ, dismisses the case and orders execution and a writ of procedendo, this is a final and appealable judgment.[106] So, also, an appeal will lie from a judgment of a superior court dismissing an application for a writ of prohibition.[107] But an order denying an application for the writ of habeas corpus is not a final judgment from which an appeal may be taken.[108]

dict of a jury and refusing to grant a new trial, is interlocutory only, and an appeal or writ of error must be addressed to the judgment entered on the verdict.[110] The same remark is true of an order denying an application for a rehearing.[111] And in a case where the report of a referee appointed by the special term to take proofs and determine as to rival claims to surplus money in foreclosure had been confirmed at special term, and that adjudication was reversed at general term, the latter court ordering a new hearing before another referee to be appointed by the special term, it was held that such order of the general term was not a final order, and therefore not appealable to the court of appeals.[112] But in a few states, it is held that an appeal may be maintained from an order refusing a new trial, although no judgment has been entered on the verdict.[113] And in some other states, it is provided by statute that an appeal may be taken from an order granting or refusing a new trial.[114] But where an order refusing a new trial and dismissing the motion therefor is itself appeal-able, no appeal will lie from an order refusing to revoke a prior order to that effect.[115]

§ 34. Vacating or Reversing former Judgment.

Where, under the code system of procedure, an independent action is brought for the purpose of vacating a former judgment between the same parties and procuring a new trial of the action, and the relief is granted as asked, it seems that the judgment to that effect must be considered as final and appealable. For the issues in the independent suit having been determined and the relief accorded, the decision puts an end to that controversy.[116] But where the application comes in the form of a motion made in the same cause, and the court grants an order opening or vacating the judgment already entered, it is clear that such an order is no final judgment; on the contrary, it merely suspends the finality of the original judgment until the case has been heard and decided anew.[117] Nor is the case otherwise where the court denies the application. ing, and is not assignable for error.[118] "It is settled that when a judgment or order is itself appealable, the appeal must be taken from such judgment or order, and not from a subsequent order refusing to set it aside."[119] A writ of error cannot be taken from the supreme court of the United States to the appellate court of a state on a judgment of the latter court which merely reverses that of the trial court and orders a new trial, such judgment not being final.[120] But a judgment of a superior court remanding a case to an inferior court for entry of judgment, and leaving no judicial discretion in the latter as to further proceedings, is final.[121]

§ 35. Orders as to Interpleader, Intervention, and Joinder of Parties.

An order of court requiring parties to interplead is in general merely interlocutory, since it settles no rights, and merely serves to prepare the case for examination and decision.[122] So an order directing the payment into court of a garnishee fund claimed by a third person, pending the determination of the right to it, is not a final judgment.[123] An order refusing leave to intervene in a pending suit, where such intervention is not essential to the preservation of the petitioner's rights, but such rights may be asserted in an independent suit, is not a final order from which an appeal lies.[124] Nor is an order permitting a party to intervene,[125] nor an order striking out a petition of intervention because not filed in time.[126] Nor can an appeal be taken from an interlocutory order joining parties defendant in a cause.[127]

§ 36. Dissolving Attachments and Executions.

It is held, by the almost universal agreement of the authorities, that judgments, orders, or decrees, quashing or dissolving attachments, or refusing to do so, are merely interlocutory.[128] For an attachment is, in general, only an incident of the suit, and a decision upon its validity or applicability is no more than the settlement of a preliminary and subordinate question, leaving untouched the ultimate rights of the parties and not disposing of the main controversy. Still, in one state at least, a contrary view is maintained, and it is thought that a judgment dismissing an attachment is in its nature final, and error will lie on it, notwithstanding the cause may still be pending below on the declaration to have a recovery on the merits, as if the suit had been brought by ordinary process.[129] There is something to be said for this position. For, as the court observed, the whole attachment element is disposed of by the order for its dismissal. Any judgment which may be thereafter recovered will have no aid from the levy of the attachment. Its lien will rank only from the date of the judgment, and the security of the replevy bond will be lost. "To maintain his attachment, it was the right of the plaintiff to have the judgment dismissing it reviewed by a separate writ of error." [130] Similarly it has been held that a decision of the court upon a rule or motion to quash an execution is merely interlocutory, not a final judgment.[131] But this view also has been denied.[132]

§ 37. Order removing Cause.

An order for the removal of a cause from a state court to the circuit court of the United States, for trial, under the various acts of congress in that behalf, is without question a final order.[133] "An order removing or refusing to remove a cause, civil or criminal, to another court for trial, finally adjudicates a constitutional right of the party affected by the order. And it is regarded as a judgment, from which, according to the nature of the case, an appeal or writ of error may be immediately prosecuted." [134] Conversely, the decision of the federal court upon a motion to remand the cause to the state court from which it came, on the ground of its irregular or improper removal, or for want of jurisdiction, is in its nature final and appealable. But the right of appeal in such cases was taken away by the act of congress of March 3, 1887, which provides that "whenever any cause shall be removed from any state court into any circuit court of the United States, and the circuit court shall decide that the cause was improperly removed, and order the same to be remanded to the state court from whence it came, such remand shall be immediately carried into execution, and no appeal or writ of error from the decision of the circuit court so remanding such cause shall be allowed." [135] Nor will any appeal lie when the circuit court denies the motion to remand, and decides to retain jurisdiction; for this, it is considered, is not a final judgment or decree, but merely an interlocutory decision.[136]

§ 38. Judgments and Orders of Probate Courts.

Orders made by a surrogate or probate court, in the course of the administration or settlement of an estate before it, such as an order appointing or removing an executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee, are interlocutory in their nature and not generally appealable.[137] But when the final stage of the case is reached, and a decree is made for the distribution of the funds or estate under the control of the court, and the discharge of the executor or trustee, this is a final judgment, from which an appeal is generally allowed.[138] An

But it is held that an order of the circuit court remanding a cause to the state court on the ground of want of jurisdiction is not a "final judgment or decree," and hence this statute does not help the party objecting to the remand to procure a review of the order. order of such a court merely requiring a personal representative, guardian, or trustee to file an account, is not in its nature final,[139] nor is an order settling and allowing an annual or partial account of an executor or administrator.[140] But the case is otherwise when settlement is made of the final accounts of such fiduciaries, especially when distribution is ordered and the discharge of the trustee allowed. This is such a final decree as will be the proper subject of an appeal.[141]

According to the usual practice in proceedings for partition of land, a preliminary judgment or decree is rendered, directing that partition be made, quod partitio fiat, and nominating certain persons to effect a division and report to the court. When the report is confirmed, or the method of apportionment otherwise fixed, and all the rights of the parties adjusted and settled, another judgment is entered declaring that the partition shall stand as approved. Now the first decree in these proceedings, establishing the existence of a co-tenancy, ordering that partition be made, and appointing commissioners, is generally interlocutory.[142] But the first decree in partition may be final, and it will have that character, if it settles all the rights of the parties and leaves nothing for the future consideration or judicial action of the court.[143] Thus a decree declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to one undivided third of the land in question, and appointing commissioners to make partition, is held to be a final decree and appealable before the subsequent proceedings are had.[144] And so, where a judgment was passed for the partition of realty among the heirs who were entitled to it, and commissioners were appointed to make the division without further orders of the court, it was considered to be a final determination of the rights of the parties and therefore appealable.[145] But an unauthorized declaration, in the order for partition, that the plaintiff's share of the rents and profits received by defendant as tenant in possession shall constitute a special lien, and that a special execution shall issue therefor, cannot have the effect to convert an otherwise interlocutory order into a final and appealable judgment.[146]

sioners to assess the damages is not a final or appealable order.[149] On similar principles, a decree of confirmation of a report of viewers laying out a road is final until reversed on certiorari;[150] and so is a judgment setting aside the award of commissioners for the assessment of damages upon the opening of a highway.[151]

§ 41. Finality of Decrees.

In drawing the distinction between final and interlocutory adjudications, the greatest difficulty has been experienced in the case of decrees in equity, the confusion arising principally from the peculiar nature of these decisions and the wide range of means which chancery possesses both for informing the mind of the judge and for acting upon the parties concerned. Many tests of finality have been proposed, some proceeding upon opposite principles, some viewing the same principle in different aspects. Thus, several cases hold that a decree is final when it terminates the litigation between the parties on the merits of the case, and leaves nothing to be done but to enforce by execution what has been determined.[152] This is perhaps a little too broad. For, as we shall see, it does not impair the finality of a decree that it has to pass through the hands of a master, for ministerial acts to be done in relation to it, before it is ready for execution. Other cases define a final decree as that which is made when all the material facts in the cause have been ascertained, so as to enable the court to understand and decide on the merits of the case.[153] According to another authority, any decree is final which renders the equities incapable of change in the further progress of the cause.[154] Or where nothing remains to be done which may be the subject of exception or appeal.[155] Or where the decree "completely and finally disposes of some branch or part of the cause which is separate and distinct from the other parts of the case."[156] Another case, coming much nearer to a satisfactory definition, holds that the final decree is not necessarily the last decree rendered, by which all proceedings in the case are terminated, and nothing is left open for the future judgment or action of the court; but it is a decree which determines the substantial merits of the controversy,—all the equities of the case,—though there may remain a reference to be had, or the adjustment of some incidental or dependent matter.[157]

The difficulty appears to arise in relation to those decrees which, while settling the general equities of the cause, leave something for future action or determination. And the true rule seems to be, that if that which remains to be done or decided will require the action or consideration of the court before the rights involved in the cause can be fully and finally disposed of, the decree is interlocutory; but it is none the less final if, after settling the equities, it leaves a necessity for some further action or direction of the court in execution of the decree as it stands.[158]

§ 42. Further Action necessary to settle the Equities.

Adopting the rule set forth in the preceding section, it will now be desirable to give some illustrations of cases in which the decree has been held interlocutory merely, because some further act or decision was necessary before the equities could be completely settled and disposed of. And first, when the further action of the court in the cause is necessary to give completely the relief contemplated by the court, the decree upon which the question arises is not to be regarded as final.[159] Thus, a judgment of foreclosure, directing the sale of the mortgaged premises, and the payment by the defendant of any deficiency which may arise on such sale, is not such a final judgment as that an action will lie upon it, because, on such a judgment, further proceedings, such as the confirmation of the referee's report, etc., must be had before a personal judgment can be entered.[160] So a judgment dissolving a partnership, ascertaining the sum of money due by the copartners to the plaintiff, ordering a sale of the copartnership property and effects, and decreeing payment therefrom of the amount due plaintiff, but providing that in case the amount realized from such sale is not sufficient to pay the judgment, that the plaintiff shall be entitled to a personal judgment against the individual members of the firm for the deficiency, is not a final judgment, but merely an interlocutory decree.[161] So also, a reservation of the question of costs, in a decree which in other respects disposes of the subject-matter of the suit, renders such decree interlocutory.[162] Again, a decree ordering an act to be done before the decree itself can be effectual is interlocutory.[163] And a decree which decides definitely in favor of the complainant in respect to one of the claims presented, but reserves the consideration of another claim, constituting an integral part of the case, is not final.[164] So if it directs an act to be done, but requires a report to be made of the manner of its performance; as where the decree authorizes an executor to sell the real estate of his testator for the payment of debts, and to report his proceedings in execution thereof to the court.[165] But it has been held, by a high authority, that when a decree passes for a certain sum of money, and the complainant is entitled to have it immediately carried into execution, it must be regarded as final to that extent, and appealable, although so much of the bill is retained in the court below as is necessary for the purpose of adjusting by a further decree the accounts between the parties pursuant to the decree passed.[166]

§ 43. Further Action necessary to execute the Decree.

The second branch of the rule above stated is, that although further acts or directions may be necessary to carry the decree into effect, it is still final if it settles the equities. Thus, a decree that defendants should assign a certificate of lands to the plaintiff, provided he should, before a given day and after a tender of the assignment, pay a certain sum of money to them, is a final decree.[167] So where certain of the stockholders in a corporation filed their bill in equity, praying that the proceedings of a meeting of stockholders, and of the directors in accordance therewith, might be set aside as void for fraud, and for the appointment of a receiver, and the court granted the relief prayed in the bill, but added a clause to the decree reserving such further directions, as to costs, etc., as might be necessary to carry the decree into execution, it was held that this was a final decree.[168] Again, a decree which ascertains the sum in the hands of a party to be accounted for, and those who are entitled to it, and orders it to be paid over to the parties entitled, and directs the costs of the suit to be paid first out of the fund, and makes no reference to a master, and seeks to ascertain no new fact, but assumes that the court is in full possession of all the facts, so as to adjudicate between the contestants according to equity and conscience, is a final decree, although it also requires the accountant to report to the court his distribution and dealing with the fund.[169] It is also held that a decree for specific performance, requiring a conveyance, is final, although it directs the submission of the conveyance to the judges for their approval.[170]

§ 44. Decree ordering a Reference.

The most difficult cases in which to draw the line between final and interlocutory decrees, are those in which the decree, after finding the general equities, orders a reference to a master for some specific purpose. Yet there are not wanting principles upon which to base a reasonable and accurate distinction in these cases. As the condensed result of the numerous authorities on the subject, we may formulate the following specific rules. First, where a decree is made disposing of the general equities of the case, but ordering a reference to a master to ascertain damages, or to find certain facts, or to do anything else necessary to be done before a final adjustment of the rights of the parties can be had, if the functions of the master are to be judicial, and not merely ministerial, and the provisions depending on his report are not already incorporated in the decree, then the decree is interlocutory and not final.[171] Second, where a decree ascertains and fixes all the rights of the parties, but a reference is ordered to a master to do or ascertain something that is necessary to carry the decree into effect, if the functions of the master are to be merely ministerial and not judicial, or if all the consequential directions depending on the result of the proceedings before him are given in the decree itself, then the decree is final and not interlocutory.[172]

The distinction above formulated is well brought out in a decision of Chancellor Walworth, from which we quote as follows: "A decree never can be said to be final when it is impossible for the party in whose favor the decision is made ever to obtain any benefit therefrom without again setting the cause down for hearing before the court, upon the equity reserved, upon the coming in and confirmation of the report of the master, to whom it is referred to ascertain certain facts which are absolutely necessary to be ascertained before the case is finally disposed of by the court, or which the chancellor thinks proper to have ascertained before he grants any relief what-

To take a single illustration,—the reference of a case to a master, to take an account upon evidence, and for the examination of the parties, and to make or refuse allowances affecting the rights of the parties, and to report his results to the court, is not a final decree. For his report is subject to exceptions from either side, which must be brought to the notice of the court before it can be available. It can only be made so by the court's overruling the exceptions, or by an order confirming the report, with a final decree for its appropriation and payment.[173]

§ 45. Directing an Account.

According to the rules just stated, a decree directing an account to be taken is generally interlocutory;[174] that is, unless all the steps ever to the complainant. But if the decree not only settles the rights of the parties, but gives all the consequential directions which will be necessary to a final disposition of the cause, upon the mere confirmation of the report of the master by a common order in the register's office, it is a final decree and may be enrolled at the expiration of thirty days, although the amount to which the complainant may be entitled under such decree is still to be ascertained upon a reference to a master for that purpose. Thus, in the ordinary case of a bill for the foreclosure of a mortgage, if the decree merely decides or declares the rights of the complainant by virtue of his bond and mortgage, and refers it to a master to compute and ascertain the amount due to him, reserving all further questions and directions until the coming in and confirmation of the master's report, it is an interlocutory decree merely, as the complainant cannot obtain the benefit of his suit until he brings the cause on to be heard again upon the equity reserved and for further directions as to a sale of the mortgaged premises and the payment of his debt and costs out of the proceeds of such sale. But if the decree, in addition to the reference to the master to compute the amount due upon the bond and mortgage, proceeds further and gives the usual directions in such cases, that upon the coming in and confirmation of the report of the master, the premises shall be sold, and that the master who makes such sale shall pay the amount so reported due, together with the interest and costs, out of the proceeds of such sale, and directing the mortgagor to pay the deficiency reported due upon such sale, the decree is final, although the mortgagor may have the right to except to the master's report of the amount due. For the questions arising upon the exceptions to the master's report, in such a case, are merely incidental to the carrying of the final decree in the cause into full effect." Johnson v. to be taken after the account is ascertained are specifically prescribed in the decree, with no equities or questions reserved and no further directions needed.[175] Thus, where a judgment appointed a referee who was to take an account of rents and profits and improvements upon land, and ascertain the present value of dower, and upon payment by the plaintiff of a certain sum to be ascertained by the referee in the mode specified in the judgment, the referee was to admeasure her dower, and he was to report the evidence taken by him with his findings thereon to the court, and all other questions were reserved until the coming in of such report and the final hearing thereon, it was held that this was not a final but an interlocutory judgment.[176]

§ 46. Decree suspending Rights until further Orders.

Another class of interlocutory decrees comprises those which prohibit a certain act to be done, or hold the rights of the parties in statu quo, until the court shall give further orders or directions.[177] Thus an order that a party is not to pay a sum adjudged against him "until further ordered" is not final.[178] So a decree rendered by the probate court, upon the application of an executor, by which a certain amount is ascertained to be in his hands, a portion of which he is ordered to pay over to those entitled to it, and to retain the balance until the further order of the court, is not a final decree.[179]

§ 47. Decree dissolving Partnership.

Where a bill in equity is brought for an accounting between partners and for a termination of the partnership, the first decree, dissolving the partnership and directing accounts to be taken, is generally only interlocutory.[180] But a decree dissolving a partnership, which directs an accounting and a sale of the firm's assets, and specifically states the manner of their distribution, is final.[181] Where, upon a bill for the settlement of partnership accounts, the decree leaves unsettled the equities as to two items of account, as to which a reference is ordered, it cannot be considered a final decree.[182]

§ 48. Foreclosure of Mortgage.

Upon a bill for the foreclosure of a mortgage, if the decree ascertains the validity of the mortgage and the amount of the debt, orders a sale of the mortgaged premises, describing them, for satisfaction of such debt, directs that the sum due on the mortgage with interest and costs be paid over to the mortgagee out of the proceeds of the sale, and adjudges that the defendant make good any deficiency which may be found to exist after the sale, then the decree is final and complete; for it leaves nothing to be adjudicated or reviewed by the court.[183] But if the decree does not ascertain the amount due; or if it orders a sale but does not give any direction as to the disposition of the proceeds; or if it reserves the question of the distribution of the fund, in order to adjust conflicting claims or liens; or if, without ordering a sale, it directs the cause to stand continued for further order and decree upon the coming in of a master's report, then, and in any such case, it is merely interlocutory.[184] It is to be observed that the judgment for the deficiency arising on a sale of the property, and directing that execution may issue therefor, is not final, so as to be appealable, until there has been a judicial determination of the amount of the deficiency after the sale.[185] But where a petition of intervention is filed, claiming priority over the mortgage or other rights in the property, a decree which settles the rights of the intervener, and directs provision to be made for their satisfaction in the sale or in the distribution of the proceeds, is final and appealable, although the main suit has not reached a final decree.[186]

§ 49. Sending Issue out of Chancery.

An order in equity sending an issue of fact to be tried in the law court is of course interlocutory. In itself it determines nothing. It is merely preparatory to a final decree.[187] And the same is true of a judgment rendered on a feigned issue directed out of chancery.[188] And on similar principles, an order of a probate court adjudging that parties have the right to have issues to determine the validity of a will transmitted to a law court for trial by jury, and framing and transmitting such issues, is not a final order.[189]

§ 50. Confession of Judgment in Pending Suit.

All judgments rendered upon the confession of the defendant may be divided into two classes: 1. Those entered in an action regularly commenced by the issuance and service of process; 2. Those entered upon the confession of the defendant, or his warrant of attorney, without the institution of an action. The former class of judgments are well known to the common law and must be tested and sustained by rules and principles existing independently of statutes, while judgments of the latter class derive all their efficacy from positive law and must conform, in order to be valid, to all the requirements and formalities set up by the legislature. It is frequently a matter of importance to determine whether a particular judgment belongs to one class or the other, because, if not covered by the statute, it is not impeachable for lack of an affidavit, statement of indebtedness, or other support required by the act. This distinction is recognized by the authorities. Thus a statute which provides that any person may, without process, appear in person or by attorney and confess judgment for any bona fide debt, but in such case a petition shall be filed, and other acts be done, does not apply to cases where the party is regularly cited, but only to cases of voluntary appearance without process.[1] So where a defendant accepts service of process and afterwards confesses judgment, the plaintiff's affidavit of the justness of the claim, required in the case of confession without action, is held to be unnecessary.[2] Now judgments entered for the plaintiff upon the defendant's admission of the facts and law, as the same are known to the common law and exist independently of statutes, are of two varieties; first, judgment by cognovit actionem, and second, by confession relicta verificatione. In the former case the defendant, after service, instead of entering a plea, acknowledges and confesses that the plaintiff's cause of action is just and rightful. In the latter case, after pleading and before trial, the defendant both confesses the plaintiff's cause of action and withdraws or abandons his plea or other allegations, whereupon judgment is entered against him without proceeding to trial.[3] In order to sustain a judgment of either of these sorts, it is essential that process, regularly issued, should have been served upon the defendant (though he may accept service with the same effect as if the writ had been served as it usually is [4]); and an agreement in writing made out of court, authorizing the clerk to enter up such a judgment, will not sustain it, where there has been no appearance by the defendant.[5] A judgment by cognovit, after process has been served, may be entered in vacation, without a judge's or commissioner's order, and without affidavits.[6] The other species of judgment by confession, relicta verificatione, is also not unknown to modern practice. Thus, where a judgment recited that "the defendants, by leave of court, withdraw their pleas and say that they cannot deny the plaintiff's cause of action against them, for debt and interest in plaintiff's petition claimed," it was held that this was in effect a confession of judgment, and a jury was not required to ascertain the amount.[7] It is also said that where a party confesses judgment against himself under a mistake of fact as to what the pleadings contain, he may, upon discovering his error, retract the confession, provided it has not been recorded.[8]

§ 51. Confession of Judgment without Action.

One method of confessing a judgment without action or process is by a warrant of attorney. This is an authority given by the debtor to a named attorney, or to any attorney of a given court or in a given jurisdiction, empowering him to appear for the defendant and confess judgment for a designated amount. This differs from a cognovit in that an action must be commenced before a cognovit can be given, but not before the execution of a warrant of attorney.[9] In so far as this procedure may be regulated by statute in any jurisdiction, it must of course comply strictly with the requirements of the law. But in most of the states there are statutes which authorize a judgment to be entered upon the confession of the defendant, without action, upon the filing of a verified statement showing the facts out of which the indebtedness arose, and an affidavit that the debt is just and actual, and sometimes upon the observance of certain additional formalities. This is by far the most usual method of confessing judgments, and therefore will principally engage our attention in this chapter.

§ 52. Authorised by Statutes.

Inasmuch as the proceeding last adverted to depends entirely upon statute for its validity, it is evident that a strict construction must be applied to the statute and that its provisions must be strictly complied with in using the authority it grants.[10] But on the other hand, the judgment must stand or fall by the statute alone, and formalities not therein required are not essential to its validity. For instance, it is not necessary to sustain such a judgment that a declaration should have been filed; the statement required by the statute is sufficient.[11] Again, neither a citation of the defendant nor a previous judgment of default is needed as a preliminary to the entry of judgment on his confession.[12] But in some states it is required that an office confession of judgment be confirmed by the court before it becomes a judgment; and under this rule its incidents as a judgment do not attach until the date of such confirmation.[13] So, again, a provision that the confession must be signed by the party and by witnesses does not admit of evasion.[14] And the same is true of a requirement that the debtor shall appear in person and confess the judgment.[15] Since a judgment upon confession is not in the nature of an adversary proceeding, it is theoretically immaterial whether it is entered during a session of the court or in vacation. And it may be stated as the rule, unless modified by the particular statute, that a judgment of this character may as well be entered in vacation as in term-time.[16] So a warrant of attorney attached to a note authorizing confession of judgment thereon at any time after its date, will support a judgment entered in vacation before the note was due.[17] And a judgment confessed in the clerk's office on the morning of the first day of the term of court, before the court was opened, is a valid judgment.[18]

Although a judgment by confession is to a certain extent founded on the agreement of the parties, instead of a direct adjudication by the court, it is none the less, on that account, a judicial act. And since their consent cannot create a jurisdiction in excess or contravention of that conferred by law, it is equally essential to the validity of a judgment of this character as to any other that it be entered in a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter. As it is to have all the incidents and consequences of any other judgment, and to have the sanction of the law and the authority of the court behind it, it will be invalid unless the court where it is entered might lawfully have rendered the same judgment in a contested action.[19] And where the authority of an inferior court, as that of a justice of the peace, to enter judgments upon confession, is limited by law or hedged round with prescribed formalities, it must clearly appear upon the face of his record that the particular confession came within the limitations and that the requirements of the statute were distinctly met and complied with.[20] Yet after a confession of judgment without exception to the jurisdiction of the particular court (the subject-matter being within its general competence), the judgment rendered is valid.[21] And a judgment entered in the district court, by virtue of a warrant of attorney authorizing the entry of such judgment in the court of common pleas, those courts having concurrent jurisdiction, cannot be set aside as erroneous at the instance of a subsequent judgment-creditor.[22] Such authority, however, will not run into another state. Thus a warrant of attorney to confess a judgment, executed in one state between parties residing there and by its terms to be rendered there, will not support a judgment entered in another state.[23]

[19] Lanning v. Carpenter, 23 Barb. (N. Y.) 402. So where it is required by law that the execution of a power of attorney to confess judgment be proved before the judgment is confessed, such proof must affirmatively appear of record; otherwise the court would have no jurisdiction of the person of the maker, and the judgment would be invalid. Rapley v. Price, 9 Ark. 428. In some states it is held that a judgment by confession can be entered only in a court having jurisdiction of the county or district where the defendant resides, and where alone a personal judgment might be recovered against him in a contested action. Ex parte Ware Furniture Co., 49 S. C. 20, 27 S. E. 9; McClure v. Bowles, 5 Ohio N. P. 327. But elsewhere the doctrine prevails that a confessed judgment is valid if entered in a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and within the state where the note and warrant were made, without regard to the defendant's place of residence, and even though he may have removed from the state. Authority to confess judgment under a power of attorney is not exhausted by a confession of a judgment which is subsequently reversed, but another may be confessed under the same power. "The intention of the power had not been carried out, consequently the object was not accomplished, and the authority was not exhausted by the first act." [24] A more difficult question arises in the case where a judgment by confession is entered upon a bond and warrant of attorney in one county, and afterwards, such judgment remaining in force and unsatisfied, a second judgment upon the same bond and warrant is entered in another county. Here it would seem that the authority conferred by the warrant was fully satisfied by the first confession and nothing remained to sustain the second. But since this would not appear upon the face of the proceedings, the second judgment would not be absolutely void, but at most irregular. It would be vacated or set aside upon application to the court in which it was entered, but the want of authority to enter the second judgment could not be taken advantage of on a writ of error. In the meantime, if a sheriff's sale was had under the second judgment, the purchaser would no doubt take a good title; but in that case the attorney who entered the judgment, or the obligee of the bond, if it was entered by him, would be answerable.[25]

§ 54. Who may confess Judgment.

As a general rule, any person may give a confession of judgment against whom the same judgment might lawfully have been pronounced by the court as the result of a suit regularly instituted and contested. The only difficulty occurs in the case of persons who are under disabilities; and here it must be remarked that if the disability of infancy or coverture is merely a personal privilege which may be waived, then the confession of a judgment is as explicit a waiver as could well be imagined, but if, on the other hand, it is regarded as an absolute incapacity to contract debts, or certain kinds of debts, then a confession of judgment is merely a futile attempt to give validity to that which by law can have none. It has been said that a warrant of attorney to confess judgment executed by a minor is under all circumstances entirely void.[26] But this statement is probably too strong. The marked tendency of the authorities, as we shall see hereafter,[27] is to regard a judgment against an infant duly before the court as valid and effectual for all purposes, unless indeed time is given to him to show cause against it after his majority. And if his defense of infancy is taken away by his failure duly to plead it when sued, it is certain that it is equally waived by his voluntary confession of judgment. The case of confessions by married women we reserve for the succeeding section.

In regard to parties plaintiff in confessions of judgment the parallel rule applies.[28] In cases where the debtor is an officer of the court in which the confession is entered, no difficulty has been experienced in sustaining the judgment. Thus, under a statute providing that judgments may be confessed in the clerk's office, and when recorded by him shall be valid, the clerk, acting as a ministerial officer, may enter a judgment by confession against himself.[29] And it is even held that a judge, in a suit in his own court to which he is a party, may confess a judgment against himself.[30] Of course any person who may himself give a valid confession of judgment may delegate his power to that intent to another. Such authorization of a third person is commonly seen in warrants of attorney, but may also be otherwise conferred. The authority of an attorney appearing in open court, it is said, will be presumed to be regular until the contrary is shown, but in vacation his authority to confess judgment must affirmatively appear and no presumption will be indulged in favor of it.[31] On the same general principle, an agent, within the scope of his authority, may confess judgment against his principal.[32] If the agent transcends his authority and confesses judgment for a sum greater than is actually due, it may be a question whether the principal is bound at all. But it has been held that in such a case, the judgment is valid for the real debt and void only as to the excess.[33] It is also held that a trustee cannot bind the trust estate by a confession of judgment.[34]

§ 55. Confession by Married Woman.

In regard to the power of a married woman to bind herself by a confession of judgment, we find the greatest difference of opinion in the authorities. In fact it is impossible to formulate a general rule; the question must ultimately be referred to the statutes in the several states regulating her status and rights. In proportion as the feme covert is emancipated from the rigors of the common law, her power to confess judgment increases in respect to the variety of obligations upon which it may be exercised. The only safe generalization seems to be, that she cannot confess a judgment for any debt for which she could not be made liable by judgment rendered in invitum. In Pennsylvania, the bond of a married woman, though she join in it with her husband, is held to be absolutely void, and a judgment entered on such bond by virtue of a warrant of attorney annexed thereto, executed by the wife together with her husband, is also void as respects the wife and her estate.[35] According to the late authorities, there is but one exception to this rule, viz.: In the case where the note upon which the judgment is confessed is given for the purchase-money of land conveyed to her, and forms part of the transaction; the judgment will then be a valid lien against the land, though not a charge against the woman personally.[36] On the other hand, where a statute gives to married women the right to sue and be sued in the same manner as if sole, a married woman may confess a judgment to secure a debt contracted by her, and for her use and benefit, in carrying on her separate business.[37] In other jurisdictions, the statute, while enabling a married woman to enter into certain classes of engagements, forbids her to make agreements or contract debts of other kinds. Under this system, "if the contract of the married woman be such as a married woman is still incapacitated from entering into, her warrant of attorney to enter judgment upon it is a nullity, because the obligation to which the warrant of attorney is annexed is invalid, and judgment entered in pursuance of it will be vacated.[38] But if the contract be one that the married woman is enabled to make, and on which she may be sued at law, I think a different result must be reached. With respect to such contracts, any action, suit, or proceeding which is adopted for the enforcement of the obligation is within the reason and spirit of the statutes which confer the capacity to contract and impose liability to actions at law thereon. The obligation being valid, the warrant of attorney is simply a part of the procedure to enforce it—as much so as a suit by summons or a cognovit." [39] A confession of judgment by a married woman, which condemns her to pay her husband's debt, is void. Such a confession is but the complement or consummation of a contract which the law prohibits, and which was consequently null.[40]

It has been held that although a judgment entered upon the confession of a married woman may be invalid, yet it is too late to raise that objection to the judgment after the same has been duly revived by proper proceedings. For the defendant had an opportunity to show cause against the judgment at the time of its revival, and its validity was impliedly adjudicated in that proceeding; for there can be no judgment of revival until it is determined that there is a valid judgment.[41] This proposition, however, has been denied.[42] And indeed, if the particular judgment was one which the woman had absolutely no power to confess, so that it must be held to be a mere nullity, it is difficult to see how any vitality could be imparted to it by the mere fact of revival. No action will lie upon a void judgment. And a judgment of revival, passed upon a nugatory cause of action, is, equally with the judgment revived, merely void.

Another question not without difficulty, which arises in reference to this subject, is in relation to a judgment entered against both husband and wife upon a warrant of attorney executed by them jointly. It has been held that such a judgment, though void as to the wife, will stand valid as against the husband.[43] But there are numerous cases holding that a judgment is an entirety, and if void as to one defendant is void as to all;[44] and these decisions would seem to apply with equal weight whatever may be the ground of the invalidity. It seems certain, however, that a married woman may confess a judgment for a valid ante-nuptial debt, and such judgment will be conclusive and enforceable against her as if rendered by default or upon a verdict.[45] And a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, given by a feme sole, is not revoked by her subsequent marriage, and after such marriage judgment may be entered up on it against the husband and wife jointly, leave being obtained on motion.[46]

§ 56. Married Woman as Creditor.

A married woman may take a confession of judgment, as sole plaintiff, in any case where she could sue for the debt alone, or jointly with her husband in a case where they have a joint right of action. Thus, where a bond and warrant of attorney was given to a woman dum sola, and she afterwards married, the court, upon affidavit of the fact, allowed judgment to be entered in favor of husband and wife together.[47] The indebtedness of a husband to his wife, by note or for money or property, is a sufficient consideration to support a judgment confessed by him in the wife's favor as against his other creditors, when not impeached for fraud.[48] And such a judgment, admitted to be honest, will not be treated as void in law or equity because of the legal unity of the parties; and the relation not appearing in the record, the court will not, at the instance of creditors, inquire into the fact of coverture, when no fraud is alleged.[49]

§ 57. Confession by Partner.

A member of a firm has no authority, by virtue of his mere relation to the partnership or his general power to act as its agent, to confess a judgment against the firm; and if judgment be entered on such a confession, it will be void as against his co-partners, though binding as a personal charge upon himself.[50] And a confession of

Fry, 37 Mich. 236; Richardson v. Fuller, 2 Or. 179; Buchanan v. Scandia Plow Co., 6 Colo. App. 34, 39 Pac. 899. In some states, however, the late decisions show a tendency to relax this rule. Thus, in Pennsylvania, while a judgment confessed against a firm by one partner without explicit authority from his copartners will not bind the other members of the firm personally, yet an execution issued under it may be levied on property of the partnership. Adams v. James L. Leeds Co., 195 Pa. 70, 45 Atl. 666; McIlvain v. James L. Leeds Co., 189 Pa. 638, 42 Atl. 307; Budd v. Shock, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 480. And the debt for which a judgment is confessed by one of the partners in the name of the firm will be presumed to be that of the firm. Evans v. Watts, 192 Pa. 112, 43 Atl. 464. In Illinois and Ohio, a judgment against a firm confessed by one partner without authority can be impeached or questioned only by the other partners, not by creditors of the firm, unless, perhaps, where the judgment is fraudulent. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Coe, 53 Ill. App. 488; Browne v. Cassem, 74 Ill. App. 305; Berg v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 84 Ill. App. 614; George W. McAlpin Co. v. Finsterwald, judgment under seal, in the name of a partnership and of a member of the firm, is binding only upon such member.[51] So a confession of judgment by a former partner against the firm, while good as against the partner confessing it, will not bind property assigned by the firm to a remaining partner under terms of agreement to pay firm debts.[52]

§ 58. Joint Defendants.

In a pending action against two defendants, one of them cannot in the absence of the other, confess judgment against both; and a judgment rendered against both on the confession of one only, without evidence, will be set aside.[53] And where one of several joint defendants confesses judgment so far as concerns himself, such judgment is only interlocutory until the final decision of the cause as to the rest; and the confessing defendant must ultimately receive the same judgment as his co-defendants.[54] In the case of a confession of judgment without action, a question has sometimes arisen as to the effect of an authority for such judgment—whether a warrant of attorney or a statement of indebtedness—which is signed by only a part of the defendants against whom it directs the judgment to be entered. As against those not signing the authority, the judgment is certainly of no force whatever.[55] But whether it may stand as a valid obligation against those who did sign, is not so clear. In one state it is held, on the principle that a judgment is an entirety, that if the warrant authorizes the entry of judgment against a certain number, no judgment can be entered against a less number, and it is void as to all.[56] But other cases hold, and we think with better reason, that the judgment entered will bind those who subscribed the warrant, though nugatory as to the others.[57]

§ 59. By Officers of a Corporation.

A private corporation has a right to confess judgment, as an incident to its power to sue and be sued.[58] But the trend of the modern decisions is to the effect that no officer of such a corporation—whether it be the president, secretary, treasurer, or manager—has authority, merely by virtue of his office, to confess a judgment against the company or sign a warrant of attorney for that purpose. To do this, he must receive authority from the board of directors, or, according to some of the cases, from a majority of the stockholders at a regular meeting.[59] But, in special circumstances, such authority may be inferred from the knowledge and acquiescence of the directors,[60] or the action of the officer signing the confession may be ratified by a subsequent vote of the directors or stockholders.[61] If a judgment note executed by an officer of a corporation is otherwise valid and binding on the company, it is not avoided by the fact that the corporate seal is not attached.[62] Upon a confession of judgment by a corporation, the court in which the action is pending must judge of the authority of the person appearing for the corporation in that behalf; and its decision on the point is final and conclusive.[63]

§ 60. Consent of Creditor is necessary.

A judgment based upon a confession made without any request on the part of the creditor, and without his knowledge and consent, or against his consent, and entered at the instance of the debtor alone, will have no effect in advance of the creditor's acceptance of it; it is voidable, it will not bar an action brought by the creditor, nor will it estop the debtor from denying the facts set forth.[64] This rule proceeds upon the very obvious consideration that if the assent of the creditor were not necessary to a confessed judgment, the debtor might, by confessing for only a part of the real debt, preclude his creditor from recovering the residue. For a judgment by confession is as conclusive as any other;[65] and if it include only a portion of an indivisible demand, no action will lie for the balance. A judgment so entered, unknown to the creditor or against his will, is therefore voidable at his option, and will be vacated on his motion.[66] But on the other hand, he may ratify the debtor's action and accept the judgment, and when he does this, it will have the effect to validate the judgment and place it on the same footing in all respects with one sanctioned by his previous knowledge and consent. The validation of the judgment, however, dates only from its acceptance by the creditor, and it will not affect the priority of other creditors who came in between the entry of the judgment and its ratification.[67] The creditor's assent to the entry of judgment may also be constructive. Thus it is sufficient if done with the knowledge and consent of his attorney in whose hands he has placed the matter.[68] So also, if an action is already pending. Where the creditor has brought suit for a specified sum of money upon a certain claim, and the debtor appears in court and confesses judgment for the amount claimed and costs, the assent of the plaintiff will be presumed; and to entitle him to have the judgment set aside, he must make it appear to the court that he has been prejudiced by such confession.[69] It is held that the confession of a judgment by the defendant in a pending suit, after the death of the plaintiff and before substitution of his representatives, is void, both as regards the representatives of the plaintiff and any third person who may be collaterally interested in the payment of the same.[70]

§ 61. Requisites of Warrant of Attorney.

As already stated, it is the practice in some states to enter confessed judgments upon a written authority, called a warrant or letter of attorney, by which the debtor empowers an attorney to enter an appearance for him, waive process, and confess judgment against him for a designated sum. This warrant should contain the grant of authority clearly and distinctly given, and a designation of the person by whom it is to be exercised, either by name or description.[71] It is usual, however, to confer the authority upon "any attorney" of a particular court or "any attorney of any court of record" in the particular state.[72] Where the warrant authorizes A., or any other attorney of the court in which the judgment is to be confessed, to appear and make the confession, and A. and B., both attorneys of that court, appear together, the judgment will be valid.[73] The warrant should name or describe, with reasonable certainty, the person in whose favor judgment is to be entered,[74] and state the time of entry, though this is usually done by authorizing a confession "at any term" of court, or "at any time."[75] The warrant should specifically state its purpose. But the words used are not of the least importance, and it is held that a warrant to "enter" judgment will be considered as equivalent to a warrant to "confess" judgment.[76] And in a case where the warrant was written upon a printed form of a judgment-note, and the blanks in that part of the note which related to the entry of judgment were not filled out, but the note was otherwise regular, it was held that the warrant was not void.[77] It also appears that a warrant of attorney to confess judgment need not be under seal.[78] Of course if the warrant is annexed to or incorporated in a note or bond, the debt on which it is based will be sufficiently disclosed. But in any other case the cause of action must be described either in a declaration, a sworn statement, or in the warrant of attorney itself.[79] This is required as an evidence of good faith and for the information of other creditors. A judgment so confessed is not necessarily void although the warrant of attorney be void; and such a judgment, it is held, after it has been revived against the debtor's administrator, cannot be set aside for that cause, although the defect in the warrant might have been pleaded in avoidance or given in evidence under a plea of nul tiel record.[80] The warrant of attorney, as the basis of the judgment, must also be placed on file in the clerk's office, and no judgment can be entered on it before it is actually so filed.[81] In some of the states, it is necessary that proof should have been made of the execution of the warrant of attorney before the judgment is confessed, and in the case of a confession out of court, this must affirmatively appear of record, but where the confession is in open court, the evidence of that fact need not be presented in the record, but it will be presumed to have been done unless it appears to have been omitted.[82]

§ 61a. Revocation or Expiration of Warrant.

A warrant of attorney to confess a judgment is not revocable at the pleasure of the principal; though he endeavors to revoke it, yet the court will grant leave to the plaintiff to enter up the judgment.[83] But no judgment can be entered on such a warrant after the death of the defendant. While the latter event may not operate exactly as a revocation of the power, yet there can be no valid judgment rendered against a dead man.[84] Entry of the judgment, however, is not prevented by the supervening insanity of the defendant; for this disability does not revoke any power of attorney which the principal could not have revoked had he remained sane.[85]

It was the settled practice under the common law, founded on a rule of the court of King's Bench (and still operative in this country except where changed by statute or a rule of court), that a judgment could not be confessed on a warrant of attorney executed more than a year and a day before, unless an affidavit was filed showing that the maker was alive, and that the debt or some portion of it was still due, and a rule of court, or order of a judge in vacation, must be obtained granting leave to enter judgment.[86] But entry of the judgment will not be prevented by the fact that the statute of limitations has run against the debt for which the confession was made, since the subject-matter of the power is not extinguished by the limitation.[87] But payment of the debt will cancel the power. A warrant a security effectual, is not properly speaking a warrant of attorney, and is revocable at the pleasure of the maker, so long as it remains unexecuted.

of attorney contained in a note to confess judgment thereon, for example, remains in force only so long as the note remains unpaid; and where the payee, after receiving satisfaction thereof, fraudulently conceals the fact, and procures an attorney to appear and confess judgment without the maker's knowledge or consent, such appearance confers no jurisdiction on the court, and the judgment is void.[88] It is held, however, that judgment may be entered on a note under a warrant of attorney duly executed, but lost or stolen.[89] Strictly speaking the authority of the warrant is exhausted by the entry of one judgment; yet if another judgment is entered on the same obligation under the same warrant, in another county, it will not be absolutely void, but merely irregular, insomuch that a purchaser at a judicial sale under the second judgment may acquire a good title.[90]

§ 62. Affidavit that Debt is due.

Under the various statutes regulating the practice in confessing judgments, it is almost invariably required that the debtor's confession be accompanied by an affidavit showing the bona fides of the transaction. In some jurisdictions this is directed to be incorporated in the statement which forms the basis of the judgment; in others it is to be a separate document. The statute usually prescribes the form of words, as that the debt is "justly due and owing," or is "justly due or to become due." A provision of this character, however, is satisfied by a substantial compliance with the meaning of the law, and if the affidavit details facts which show that the debt is really just and actually due, it is enough, though the words of the statute be not employed. Thus, the affidavit is sufficient in form in stating that the debt is "justly and honestly due," instead of "due and owing" in the words of the statute, when a present indebtedness is shown.[91] Nor is it required that the affidavit go beyond the statute. Hence it is not necessary for the debtor to deny, in specific terms, that the debt has been paid, released, barred, or discharged.[92] A judgment entered upon confession without the affidavit required by statute is voidable only, not void, and it cannot on that ground be collaterally attacked by a stranger to the record.[93] Where the statute requires an affidavit to the justness of the debt only upon a confession of judgment without process, it does not apply where the defendant files an answer admitting the debt, and consents to the judgment.[94]

§ 63. Statement of the Indebtedness.

In many of the states, statutes require a person confessing a judgment to file a written statement, signed and sworn to, designating the amount for which the judgment is to be entered, and "stating concisely the facts out of which the indebtedness arose." This requirement is imperative.[95] The designation of the amount of the debt, in particular, is a vital part of a valid confession; it must be set forth explicitly and not be left to inference; and the omission of it is a fatal defect.[96] The requirement that the facts be stated is secured by bond and warrant of attorney, from entering up judgment before he has paid the notes, although he has assumed their payment, when the payee has not released the maker. Sterling v. Fleming, 53 N. J. Law, 652, 24 Atl. 1001.

intended to enable other creditors to test the bona fides of the transaction by which a particular debt is preferred; and it is said that the statement is sufficient if it sets forth a consideration such as the law recognizes as valuable; and is definite enough to prevent the parties from shifting it, and to furnish other creditors with a basis for inquiry if they desire to attack it.[97] To come to specific illustrations, it is held that a recital in the statement that the indebtedness accrued for "borrowed money" or "money loaned," to the debtor, sufficiently states the facts out of which the indebtedness arose.[98] Another authority, drawing the line more strictly, holds that a statement that the indebtedness "is for a debt justly due from me to said plaintiff for moneys to that amount loaned and advanced to me by said plaintiff," is sufficient as between the parties, though it might be voidable at the instance of a junior judgment-creditor or bona fide purchaser.[99] Probably it is necessary to state the date of the loan. But if the whole sum is made up of various items advanced at different times, the cases rule that the statement is sufficiently explicit in describing the money as loaned to defendant at divers times after a specified day.[100] A confession of judgment for a certain sum for "goods, wares, and merchandises" of a specified value, is held by some of the authorities to be too indefinite; it should state interest since the date of the note, is due and owing thereon, is sufficient to include interest. Rothchild v. Mannesovitch, 29 App. Div. 580, 51 N. Y. Supp. 253. See Tilles v. Albright, 63 Hun, 633, 18 N. Y. Supp. 493.

the nature and quantity of the goods sold, the time of sale, and the aggregate price, if not even the price of the several items.[101] But in New York a much looser rule obtains. It is there held to be well enough if the indebtedness is stated to be for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, with an approximate description of the period at or within which the sale took place.[102] A statement is not sufficient if it merely states and sets out a promissory note executed by the defendant to the plaintiff as the consideration of the indebtedness; for the facts out of which the indebtedness evidenced by the note arose should be clearly stated.[103] But a statement which sets out the execution and delivery "for value" of a negotiable note for $1500, "for money which" the creditor "then and there gave" the debtor "for said note, as a loan, which sum of $1500 is justly due and owing according to the tenor and effect of said note herein described," is sufficient to satisfy the statute.[104] But a statement that the note was "given for goods sold and delivered and money had and received" is not sufficient.[105] And an allegation that the consideration of the judgment is a promissory note given by the debtor for value received, but not specifying the amount or consideration of the note, is defective.[106] So if it is merely stated that the note was for "money due," the judgment entered upon it is prima facie fraudulent as to the creditors of the defendant, though not so fatally defective as to be void.[107] On the other hand, a statement, in effect, that the defendant had purchased of the plaintiff a certain indebtedness (describing it), due to the plaintiff, for which he had given to the plaintiff the promissory notes (describing them) upon which and for the amount of which he confessed the judgment, is a sufficient statement.[108] So the statement is sufficient if it sets forth that the judgment is confessed to secure the plaintiff for a debt justly to become due upon his indorsement, as the surety of the defendant and for his benefit, of bills and notes which are fully described as to names, dates, amounts, and times of payment.[109]

§ 64. Signature to Statement.

The statutes require the statement of indebtedness and confession of judgment to be "made and signed by the defendant." This is construed to mean a signature by the debtor in person. A signature by the defendant's attorney in the case is not sufficient; and where a judgment was entered upon a statement signed by two of the defendants in person and by the attorney of the third, it was held that the consent of those signing was only that judgment might be entered against all; and as there was no authority to enter judgment as to the third party, the judgment was unauthorized and void as to all.[110] In another case, where the defendant had signed the verification, but not the statement, which was written upon the same page, this was considered sufficient, as being a substantial compliance with the law.[111]

§ 65. Verification of Statement.

The requirement of the statute, that the statement of facts accompanying a judgment by confession be properly verified by the oath of the party, intends that in so far as it relates to things within his own knowledge, he should affirm it to be true in unequivocal terms. In regard to other matters he may disclose his information and add a declaration of his belief in its truth. But where the party merely swears that he "believes the above statement of confession is true," the affidavit is insufficient, and the judgment, if entered thereon, will be vacated.[112] The jurat of the notary should also be in due form; but a formal defect in the jurat will not so far invalidate the judgment as to lay it open to collateral attack.[113] The verification of the statement, if faulty but not wholly void, is susceptible of amendment.[114]

§ 66. Amendment of Statement.

A motion by plaintiff to amend the statement of a confession of judgment is addressed to the discretion of the trial court. It is not an amendment which he has a legal right to demand, but is one which the court may in its discretion refuse or grant upon such terms as to it may seem to be just.[115] If the defect in the statement arose through mere inadvertence, an amendment may be permitted as against creditors who have not sought to vacate the judgment;[116] but not against a creditor who has taken steps to have it set aside.[117]

ly void as against creditors.[118] Thus, if it fails to set out all the facts required by the statute, it is for that reason irregular and prima facie fraudulent, but it is not a nullity; the presumption of fraud may be rebutted by proof that the judgment was fair and for a bona fide debt.[119] It has also been held that such a judgment is not void because it does not appear that an affidavit, as required by the statute, had been made.[120] But the true rule appears to be, that if there has been an attempt to fulfil all the requirements of the law, the judgment is at most only voidable, although the execution of such attempt be informal or defective; but, on the other hand, the total omission of any of the steps prescribed by the statute (as where no statement at all is filed) will render the judgment entirely inoperative and void.[121]

But no case has been called to our attention where a court has held that a confession of judgment is merely prima facie fraudulent as to creditors, and not liable to be attacked collaterally, where there was a total absence of the statement of any facts whatever. We know of no instance in which such a case has reached an appellate court. The statement of such facts is a prerequisite to the confession of judgment—it is not a confession of judgment without it." § 68. Valid between Parties.

A judgment upon confession, founded on a statement of facts which is defective or insufficient to answer the requirements of the statute, will nevertheless be valid and effectual as between the parties to it, though voidable at the instance of other creditors.[122] The judgment-debtor himself cannot avoid it, nor can one do so who claims rights of property under him, but whose interests are not prejudiced thereby.[123] And such a judgment, upon proof of its honesty and good faith, authorizes the creditor to impeach a fraudulent transfer made by the debtor, for the purpose of making the lien of the judgment effectual.[124] Where the property of the defendant has been sold under an execution upon a judgment confessed without a sufficient statement, the purchaser's title cannot be impeached by a creditor having no judgment or lien on the property at the time of the levy.[125] At the same time, if another creditor attacks a confessed judgment founded upon a defective or insufficient statement, it devolves upon the plaintiff therein to negative the idea of fraud or collusion, and to show that the judgment is warranted by facts actually existing, although such facts were not included in the statement.[126] The same rule holds true of a judgment confessed without the affidavit to the justness of the debt required by statute; it is valid between the parties, though void or voidable as to other creditors.[127]

§ 69. For what Judgment may be confessed.

The statutes commonly provide that the debtor confessing judgment shall make oath that the debt is "justly due or to become due." It follows of course that if the judgment is for a purely fictitious debt, or is in excess of the real debt so far as to interfere with the rights of other creditors, it is fraudulent and cannot stand. Thus, where a judgment is confessed and execution levied for such an amount that subsequent judgment creditors find nothing to levy on, a combination between the parties having been proved, fraud will be established.[128] It is also essential that the debt be a legal debt,—that is, one which would not be rejected by a court on account of its illegal consideration. Yet it appears that the defendant in the judgment and those claiming under him (for instance, a subsequent mortgagee of his land) are estopped from denying the validity of the judgment, although the demand might not have been recoverable at law.[129] The word "due," as used in these statutes, must not be taken in too narrow a sense. It does not necessarily import a debt which might be recovered in an action at law against any defenses which the debtor might set up. There are certain defenses which the debtor has the option of waiving if he chooses, and he does waive them by confessing judgment. For example, such a judgment is not invalidated by the fact that a part of the claim for which it is given would be barred by the statute of limitations, provided the debt be an honest one.[130] So where a bankrupt, subsequent to his discharge, confesses judgment upon an old debt, the debt is a good consideration for the judgment, and the latter is not affected by the discharge.[131] It is further necessary that a confession of judgment be for a certain and specific sum. A judgment entered by a justice, on the confession of a defendant, for such sum as A. and B. shall award, before the award is declared, is invalid.[132] Where several powers of attorney are given to confess judgment on several debts in favor of and against the same parties, it is proper and competent for the court to consolidate them and enter but one judgment.[133] A judgment cannot be confessed for a claim arising ex delicto. A statute which allows confession of judgment "for money due or to become due" should not be construed as authorizing the confession of a judgment for damages growing out of a tort.[134]

§ 70. Debt not yet due.

Where the language of the statute is that judgment may be confessed for a debt "justly due and owing," it applies only to a debt payable at the time of the confession, for these terms import an immediate liability. But where it authorizes a confession "for money due or to become due," this may well include a claim founded upon an obligation now existing but not yet demandable. Thus the fact that a note upon which a confession of judgment was taken was not due when the judgment was rendered does not deprive the court of jurisdiction, and the judgment will not be vacated on that account.[135] "The fact that a note may not be due at the time of a confession upon it, might be a suspicious circumstance in a contest with other creditors of the debtor, but it would not render the judgment void in the proper sense of that term."[136] So a judgment is not void as to creditors because the action is commenced before the maturity of the note which was the cause of action, and the defendant confesses judgment without service of process.[137] Authority may be given by a warrant of attorney to confess judgment for a debt not yet due, but it must be given in clear and precise terms.[138] Thus where the warrant, attached to a promissory note given in extension of others, authorized the attorney to appear for the maker at any time thereafter and confess judgment "for such amount as may appear to be unpaid thereon," it was held that the authority given was to confess judgment only for the amount actually due, not that accruing.[139] When a warrant of attorney confers authority, in a certain contingency, to confess judgment on a note before it is due, the record must show that the specified contingency had happened, otherwise the judgment is unwarranted.[140]

§ 71. For Future Advances.

A judgment by confession may be taken to secure future advances of notes or other commercial paper to be made by the creditor to the debtor;[141] or to secure both existing and future indorsements for his accommodation.[142] "A judgment or other security may be taken and held for future responsibilities and advances, to the extent of the amount of the judgment or security. But to enable a creditor to hold a judgment or other security for future responsibilities and advances, it must be a part of the original agreement that the judgment, or security, should be a security for such responsibilities and advances. It cannot, as against third persons, be held to meet and cover new and distinct engagements subsequently entered into by the parties."[143] And it seems that advances made or responsibilities incurred, after a subsequent judgment has intervened, will not be covered by the confessed judgment.[144]

§ 72. For contingent Liabilities.

In those jurisdictions where the more liberal statute is in force, a judgment may be confessed to secure a future or contingent liability. Thus a judgment confessed as an indemnity for liabilities incurred by another is good at law against subsequent judgments, and may be enforced before the party assuming the liabilities has discharged them.[145] A judgment on confession may be enforced by execution, and is sustained by the same presumptions as other judgments, notwithstanding it was recovered on a contingent liability.[146] In those states, however, where a judgment can only be confessed for a debt that is "due and owing," the rule is different in this respect. Thus, in a New Jersey case the learned vice-chancellor said: "I think I am bound to consider the doctrine as settled, so far at least as this court is concerned, that a judgment on bond and warrant of attorney, under our statute, can only be entered for a debt actually existing at the time of its entry, and that a simple liability as indorser or surety does not constitute such a debt." [147]

§ 73. Amount of the Judgment.

Where a judgment is entered on a warrant of attorney and includes a greater sum than was actually confessed, it is held to be void only as to the excess, not in toto, unless the excess was fraudulently included.[148] Upon a confession of judgment in a pending action, if the plaintiff's demand is in the nature of a debt which may be ascertained by calculation, it is sufficient to enter judgment generally. The judgment is supposed to be for the amount of damages laid in the declaration and execution may issue accordingly.[149] But if the plaintiff should indorse upon the declaration the actual amount of the debt, and if the defendant complains that injustice has been done, the court on motion, upon a proper case being made out, will grant immediate relief.[150] Where the confession of judgment does not determine the extent of the recovery, and it is not ascertainable by mere calculation, it must be liquidated by the court and not by the clerk.[151]

§ 74. Liquidation of Amount by Clerk.

In the case of a confession of judgment without action, the statutes sometimes authorize the prothonotary or clerk of the court to enter up judgment on a warrant, without the actual intervention of an attorney appearing for the defendant. But such a statute, it is held, does not give him all the powers of an attorney. He can enter judgment only when the amount due appears on the face of the instrument, or is ascertainable by calculation from its face.[152] Thus where judgment was confessed for the value of certain land at the rate of $10 per acre, the quantity to be ascertained by survey, it was held that the prothonotary had no power to enter a judgment.[153] Such a power must also be exercised by the officer without unnecessary delay. Where a judgment was confessed "amount to be ascertained by the prothonotary," and no amount was ascertained for fourteen years, and the plaintiff and principal defendant were dead, the court refused to make an order for ascertaining the amount against the surety.[154]

§ 75. Inclusion of Attorney's Fees.

A judgment entered by confession upon a warrant of attorney may include fees to the attorney appearing in the case (nominally for the debtor, really in behalf of the creditor), if that be authorized by the power.[155] And it is altogether usual to incorporate a stipulation for such fees in the warrant. Such a provision rests upon a valid consideration and is not fraudulent as to other creditors;[156] unless the amount designated as attorney's fees is grossly in excess of any reasonable amount, in which case the judgment, at least to the extent of such fees, is fraudulent and void as against the other creditors of the defendant.[157] And the attorney's commissions authorized in a judgment-note cannot be collected as part of the debt due when the debtor was ready to pay at the maturity of the note.[158] It is customary to specify in the warrant or note the sum which may be incorporated in the judgment as a fee for the attorney. But cases have sometimes come before the courts in which the provision, instead of being explicit, merely designated a "reasonable attorney's fee." This language, it is held, gives to the court in which the confession is made the right to determine what is a reasonable fee; it does not leave it to the option or the conscience of the attorney; it contemplates a judicial proceeding by the court for the purpose of ascertaining the amount which may reasonably be charged up. Hence if the attorney himself fixes the sum of his fees, under a power so worded, and confesses judgment for the whole, he acts in excess of his authority, and the judgment so entered, without the intervention of the court, is void.[159]

§ 76. Recording the Judgment.

Under a statute relating to judgments by confession, which requires the plaintiff to file a sworn statement, and enacts that the clerk shall indorse the judgment upon the statement and enter it in the judgment-book, the two entries should be deemed to have the force of duplicate copies, each having the effect of an original.[160] The power of attorney confessing the judgment should be filed as a part of the record.[161] In Illinois, where judgment is confessed before the clerk in vacation, the formal writing up of the judgment in the court records is held to be essential; and an execution issued before it is so written up is invalid.[162] But in some other states, it appears that the statutory requirements as to the recording of such judgments are merely directory, the statement, affidavit, and other papers accompanying the confession constituting the judgment roll and serving as the basis for an execution.[163]

§ 77. Reversing and Vacating Judgments by Confession.

In what circumstances a judgment entered upon the confession of the defendant may be reviewed in the appellate court, or opened or vacated in the court below, at the defendant's own instance, is a question involved in much doubt. The difficulty arises from the fact that the debtor, by his voluntary action in the matter, must be considered to have waived his strict technical rights to some extent, and yet he should be protected from injustice and from errors sufficient to vitiate the whole proceeding. In the first place, it is held in several states that a confession of judgment operates as a release of all errors in the record, and consequently it cannot be carried to the appellate court either by appeal or certiorari.[164] On the other hand, it is elsewhere held that a confession of judgment, although a waiver of formal errors, does not prevent the defendant from procuring the reversal of the judgment for errors of substance.[165] In regard to the jurisdiction of the court below, it seems to be conceded that it has power to give equitable relief in cases calling for its interposition.[166] "The power of the courts to open judgments entered by confession, or in default of an appearance or plea, is not denied; and it is the duty of the courts to exercise such power wherever it is satisfactorily shown that in equity the judgment ought not to be collected." [167] In order to prevent any question of this kind, the parties sometimes incorporate a release of errors in the confession or warrant of attorney, the effect being, of course, to waive any formal objections or irregularities. But where this is not done, it is proper to examine with care any irregularity in the proceeding, and to vacate the judgment if substantial injustice may have been done to the defendant.[168] The opening of such a judgment is therefore a matter of sound discretion, and whether such a sound discretion has been exercised by the court below depends upon the whole evidence, in which the burden of proof is to show a defense.[169] The judgment should not be opened and the defendant let in to defend, except upon evidence of such weight and clearness as would be sufficient to warrant a chancellor in decreeing that the instrument upon which the confession was founded was void, or should be reformed for fraud or mistake.[170] Whether a judgment against two persons, entered by confession on a warrant of attorney, may be set aside as to one of them and stand good as to the other, is an unsettled point. It depends upon whether, in the particular state, a joint judgment is considered as an entirety or as severable.[171] When the application to set aside the judgment proceeds from another creditor of the defendant, there is less doubt as to the power of the court. It may clearly vacate the judgment for fraud or collusion between the parties, or for a substantial failure to comply with the statutory requirements.[172] Where an application to open a confessed judgment is based on grounds going to the merits, and is contested, the issues raised should ordinarily be tried by a jury; but in Pennsylvania, it is held that the court to which such an application is made, though there is a conflict of testimony, may pass on the weight of evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, without sending the case to a jury.[173] Terms may be imposed upon the defendant, on granting his application to open the judgment; but it is not proper to require that the money supposed to be due should be brought into court, though the judgment may be allowed to stand as security to abide the result.[174]

"In contemplation of law, a judgment on a warrant of attorney is as much an act of the court as if it were formally pronounced on nil dicit or a cognovit, and till it is reversed or set aside, it has all the qualities and effects of a judgment on a verdict." [175] A judgment upon confession is therefore just as conclusive, between the parties and their privies, of the facts and points necessarily involved in and determined by it, and as final a bar to the maintenance by the creditor of another suit for the same demand, as any other judgment.[176]

§ 79. Judgment of Nil Dicit.

When a defendant puts himself in default by failing to plead or file an answer within a time prescribed, although he may have entered an appearance in the action, the judgment given against him is technically called judgment of nil dicit, that is, that he "says nothing" in opposition to the plaintiff's claim, and therefore the latter is entitled to recover.[1] But if the defendant has put in his plea, and issue has been joined, and he then fails to appear when the case is called for trial, this species of judgment cannot properly be entered, for he is not in default for want of an answer.[2] However, the distinction between this judgment and the other varieties of judgment against the defendant for failure to take a required step in the action is no longer strictly observed, and when the judgment is nil dicit when it should have been by default, it is merely informal and will not be reversed on that account.[3] But in Texas it is said that while the proceeding to ascertain the amount of damages is the same on judgments by nil dicit as on judgments by default, "in other respects, a judgment by nil dicit is held by this court to possess a stronger implication in favor of the plaintiff's claim than an ordinary judgment by default; it is regarded as partaking of the nature of a judgment by confession as well as by default."[4] The distinction, however, is not of practical value, nor is it generally recognized.

§ 79a. Judgment for Want of Affidavit of Defense.

According to the practice at common law in some of the states, where an action is brought upon an obligation for the payment of a sum certain in money, if the defendant means to contest it, he is required to file, within a limited time after notice of the plaintiff's statement, an affidavit setting forth the facts on which he means to rely as a defense; if he fails to do this, judgment may be taken against him "for want of an affidavit of defense."[5] If such an affidavit is filed, but the plaintiff deems it inadequate in law to constitute a defense to the action, he may have a rule on the defendant "to show cause why judgment should not be entered against him for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense."[6] A motion for judgment on this ground, being in the nature of a demurrer, admits the facts averred in the affidavit, and denies their sufficiency as an answer to the claim.[7] And if the court decides that the allegations of the affidavit are not adequate to constitute a defense to the action, judgment will be given for the plaintiff, unless, for special reasons, leave should be granted to file a new or supplemental affidavit of defense.[8] If the defense alleged is good as to part of the claim, but insufficient as to the balance, the court may direct judgment for the part insufficiently denied, and allow the plaintiff to try the case as to the remainder.[9] And a statute in Pennsylvania provides that, where an affidavit of defense is filed to a part of the claim sued for, the plaintiff may take judgment for the amount admitted to be due, and proceed to trial for the balance.[10] This applies to any action in which a part of the claim is admitted to be due, irrespective of how the amount is ascertained or the balance computed,[11] but not to a case where the affidavit applies to the whole of the plaintiff's claim, though it may be insufficient in law as to a part of it.[12] In Connecticut, a statute provides that, in causes where an attorney appears for the defendant, the plaintiff may require him to state to the court whether he believes a bona fide defense exists to the action, whether such defense will be made, and whether there will be a trial, and that if such attorney refuses to disclose as required, or shall not satisfy the court that such defense will be made or such trial had, the court may order judgment for the plaintiff. fense, and render judgment because it deems such defense insufficient.[13]

§ 80. Judgment by Default.

Properly speaking, a judgment by default is one taken against a defendant when, having been duly summoned or cited in an action, he fails to enter an appearance. But the term is frequently (and indeed commonly) used in a much wider sense, in which it includes judgments given against the defendant for want of a plea, answer, affidavit of defense, etc., as well as for want of an appearance. The latter is the signification of the word as used in this chapter. The characteristic feature of a judgment by default is that it follows upon the negligence or omission of the defendant, passing over the steps that would otherwise be taken, trial and verdict, and adjudging against him immediately upon his failure to defend.[14] In respect to its effects and consequences,—as the foundation of a suit, as a lien, as a bar or estoppel,—a judgment by default does not differ from one rendered upon a verdict.[15] There are, however, certain distinctive rules, particularly in reference to its rendition and entry, which require separate treatment and which will form the subject-matter of the following pages. The rendition of a judgment by default, it is held, is no violation or abridgment of the constitutional right of trial by jury.[16] The right is one which (at least in a civil action) may be waived by the party, and the defendant cannot claim that the privilege is denied to him if he presents no defense to be tried by a jury.

[14] A judgment is by default where there has been no appearance by the defendant, even though he was not legally summoned. Brown v. Chapman, 90 Va. 174, 17 S. E. 855. But a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace when the defendant is present by attorney, who, however, takes no part in the trial, is not a judgment "by default." Borgwald v. Fleming, 69 Mo. 212.

§ 81. Against Whom may be taken.

As a general rule, a default may be taken against any natural person against whom the same judgment might have passed as the result of contested proceedings. But there are certain exceptions to this statement. Thus, in California, a person summoned as a garnishee may be punished for contempt for disobeying an order whereby he is required to disclose his indebtedness if any, but a judgment by default cannot be taken against him, and such judgment is without jurisdiction and void.[17] In some other states, however, where the court has regularly obtained jurisdiction of the garnishee and there is no answer on his part, it is held that a judgment by default may be entered against him, and such judgment will be sufficient to protect the garnishee if no defense on the merits could have been made.[18] Judgments by default may be entered against non-residents and against persons under disabilities; but the validity of such judgments must be tested by rules which belong to later sections of this book.[19] A default judgment may also be rendered against a corporation; but in order to support it, it must appear of record that the person who, as shown by the return of the officer, was served with process, has such a relation to the corporation that service on such person was tantamount to service on the corporation.[20] Under statutes allowing such a course of procedure, a defendant may proceed with the case upon the failure of the plaintiff to appear, and judgment may be rendered on the merits.[21] But one who is originally a defendant, but afterwards, by leave of court, becomes a plaintiff and files a cross bill, is not entitled to a default judgment against his co-defendants, if they had no notice of his cross bill or that he had changed his status in the case.[22]

The rule of the common law, in regard to actions in which several persons were joined as defendants, was that judgment must be given against all or none of them. The plaintiff could not recover against a part of the defendants and be defeated of his claim against the rest, except in the single case where one of them set up and succeeded in establishing a defense entirely personal to himself, as his release or discharge or his personal disability to contract. Consequently, except in so far as the rule is changed by statute, where several persons are summoned as defendants, and one of them pleads and the other suffers a default, final judgment cannot be entered upon the default until the issue as to the other defendant is disposed of, and not even then unless the plaintiff had a verdict on the issue or the defendant pleading had set up a merely personal defense.[23] But this has been changed, in several of the states, by the statutes, which provide that in actions regularly commenced against several joint defendants the court may, in its discretion, and whenever a several judgment would be proper, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others. Under a law of this character, it would be proper to render a judgment by default against the defendant not pleading, where the cause of action was joint and several. But if the claim were upon a joint contract, such a judgment would necessarily remain interlocutory until the issues raised were finally disposed of, for in that case the defendants must stand or fall together. We shall recur to this subject at a later point.[24] It is also held that where process is served on only one of two defendants, judgment cannot be rendered against both by default.[25] But it seems to be otherwise under the "joint debtor acts," existing in several of the states, in actions upon a joint contract.[26]

In order to the validity of a judgment by default, as in the case of any other judgment, it is essential that the court should have acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant.[27] A judgment entered by default against a party who has not been served with process and who has not appeared in the action, is irregular and void.[28]

[24] See, infra, §§ 208, 209. And due and proper service must appear upon the record before the court is authorized to render a judgment by default;[29] though here it is necessary to recollect the presumptions of jurisdiction by which any judgment of a superior court is sustained when assailed collaterally or made the basis of a new suit. It being necessary, therefore, that the court should have jurisdiction in the case, it is evident that a defect or failure in this respect may arise either from some peculiarity in the process itself or from the manner of its service. Now, to be duly served with a summons is said to imply that the defendant has been duly served with a summons notifying him to appear and answer in the court where the judgment is sought to be taken.[30] Assuming these to be the essentials of a proper notice, it follows that the writ, although properly served, may be so defective in itself as to confer no jurisdiction over the defendant. Such would be the case if it omitted to apprise him of the court in which the action had been commenced or the day on which he was required to appear.[31] It is not true, however, that any irregularities in the process, short of this, may be entirely disregarded. The rule is, that if the notice is defective or irregular, but not to the extent of being substantially worthless, a judgment by default entered thereon will be irregular and liable to be corrected or set aside on motion, or reversed above, but not absolutely void, and hence not open to collateral attack.[32] In the next place, the process, sufficient in itself, must be duly served upon the party or upon some person authorized to receive service in his stead.[33] But here also, slight irregularities, not fatal in themselves, will not have the effect of depriving the court of jurisdiction. "If the court to which the process is returnable adjudges the service to be sufficient and renders judgment thereon, such judgment is not void, but only subject to be set aside by the court which gave it, upon seasonable and proper application, or reversed upon appeal." [34] A voluntary appearance by the defendant will of course be sufficient to confer jurisdiction, and will amount to a waiver of formal and technical defects in the process or its service.[35] But a default obtained without proper service and on an unauthorized appearance, is an absolute nullity.[36] The defendant may also acknowledge service of the writ, and thereby forego his objections to the manner of service or the person executing it. But it is held in some states that an indorsement upon the process, of a written acknowledgment of service, purporting to be signed by the party, is not sufficient, without proof of the authenticity of such indorsement and signature, to authorize the entry of default for want of an appearance.[37] This rule, however, is probably too severe to find general acceptance. On similar principles, in a state where the law is that a judgment by default cannot be entered except upon proof of the personal service of the summons and complaint, an admission of "service," not stating the mode in which the service was made, is not sufficient.[38] To warrant entering a judgment against one who has been made a defendant upon his own motion, there must be notice and proof of no answer, the same as in the ordinary case of a defendant who has been served and has appeared.[39] In fact, the cardinal principle is that a defendant cannot be put in default without due notice of everything which requires him to take affirmative action. Thus in a case where judgment by default was rendered on a substituted petition, the substitution having been made without notice to the defendant or any one authorized to represent him, the judgment was held to be erroneous.[40] to dissolve an attachment on account of irregularity, made by defendant's attorney. Glidden v. Packard, 28 Cal. 649. So where, in foreign attachment, defendant appears merely to move for a rule on plaintiff to show his cause of action, for the purpose of securing a release of the property, it is a special appearance, and not sufficient to authorize a judgment by default. Thus far we have not spoken of judgments by default rendered upon constructive service of process. This proceeding is authorized by statute in many of the states, in actions against non-resident defendants, and cases involving the validity of such judgments are by no means infrequent. The subject properly belongs to another part of this work, and in this connection it is only necessary to remark that the statutes authorizing the entry of such judgments are strictly construed and the prescribed procedure must be strictly followed, and that such judgments have no extraterritorial validity and are not binding on the defendant out of the state where rendered, except in actions in rem and quasi in rem (as in divorce), and in cases where the jurisdiction is based on attachment of the defendant's property found within the state, in which latter instance the judgment is universally valid in so far as it affects to dispose of such property.[41]

no cause of action, a judgment by default thereon cannot stand.[43] "A default is an admission of the cause of action stated in the petition, and that something is due to the plaintiff. But where no cause of action is stated in the petition a default can have no such effect. It is true that a defendant may be concluded by a default where the facts stated in the petition do not constitute a good cause of action in law, or where the petition is so defective as to be vulnerable to a demurrer.[44] But where the petition omits the necessary averment to show liability against the defendant, the court may and should, even upon default, refuse to enter judgment." [45] A view opposite to that here stated has been taken in some of the New York cases,[46] on the ground that, if the complaint is defective in this particular, the remedy by demurrer is open to the defendant, and if he neglects to avail himself of it, he waives any objections which he might thus present, and cannot ask to have the judgment set aside or reversed. But the very obvious answer to this is, that an objection to the complaint, on the score of its failure to state a cause of action, like an exception to the jurisdiction of the court, is never waived; that a default admits nothing more than the plaintiff has chosen to allege, and the silence of the defendant should not be made to help him out; and that if the plaintiff has not stated a case sufficient to justify the intervention of the law in his behalf, he is not entitled to any judgment, whether the defendant answers or not.[47] A petition, for instance, which does not allege an assignment of the claim sued on, when it is not in the plaintiff's name and no assignment is proved, will not sustain a judgment by default.[48] The question is different where the judgment is rendered on a declaration containing both good and bad counts. Here it is said that the insufficiency of one count to sustain a judgment will not impair the plaintiff's right to recover on the other, and hence the judgment will be allowed to rest on the cause of action well pleaded and will not be reversed.[49] There are cases, however, holding that the damages being general, and nothing appearing to show that they were in fact assessed upon the good count only, there is no authority to presume that they were so assessed, and hence (just as in the case of a verdict and general damages, upon a declaration containing a count bad in substance) the judgment will be erroneous.[50] that day has fully expired;[52] and if the last day falls upon a Sunday or a holiday, he is entitled to the whole of the next succeeding day.[53] But a judgment thus prematurely entered is not absolutely void; if the defendant takes no steps to correct the error, he is presumed to have waived it.[54] The time limited is given for the benefit of the defendant, and he may waive it and consent that a judgment be entered against him before its expiration.[55] So if, after due service of summons, judgment by default is entered one day sooner than the statute allows, but the defendant is informed of the date of the entry, both by an attachment served on him shortly thereafter and by a scire facias, duly served, to revive the judgment, several years later, but takes no action until after the judgment has been revived, the irregularity will be regarded as waived, and a motion to strike off the judgment will be denied.[56] A decree pro confesso, signed after the time for answering has expired, is regular, though an order for further time to answer be signed and filed on the same day with the signing of the decree.[57] In case of a default, judg-

of holding that such a judgment would be absolutely void, but it would be set aside on motion of the defendant or reversed on appeal. There appears to be some doubt as to whether the plea should be actually on file, in order to prevent a default, or whether it is sufficient if duly brought to the notice of the plaintiff or his attorney.[60] The question will be governed to some extent by the local practice, and in those jurisdictions where the defendant's answer is to be served on the plaintiff's attorney within a specified time, an entry of default would probably be regarded as erroneous if made after such service, although the pleading were not filed in court. In a case where judgment by default was entered against a defendant, who filed an answer on the same day the judgment was rendered, but it did not appear affirmatively that the answer was filed before the judgment, or that the attention of the court was called to the answer before giving judgment, it was held to be the legal presumption that the judgment was first given.[61] Even though the plea filed by the defendant be bad in form or substance, yet, if it does not admit the plaintiff's case, the latter cannot have judgment for want of a plea; the proper practice is either to move to strike out the plea, or to answer it by demurrer or otherwise.[62] And especially after replying to a plea filed in proper time the plaintiff cannot take judgment by nil dicit; if the plea is bad, he should withdraw his replication and demur.[63]

[60] In an early New York case, where a plea was delivered to the plaintiff's attorney, who searched the clerk's office, and, finding no plea on file, entered a default for want of a plea, the court considered the default as a nullity; the party is to be governed by the pleadings delivered to him, and not search the office to see whether the originals are filed. On similar principles, it is erroneous to render a judgment by default against a defendant who has filed a demurrer to the declaration, when the same remains unanswered and not disposed of in any way, and he has not taken any subsequent step in the cause amounting to a waiver of the demurrer.[64] And a judgment by default, entered while exceptions are pending and undetermined, is erroneous and irregular.[65] So, pending the question whether a suit can be maintained in the court where it is brought, by reason of the alleged non-residence of the defendant, there can be no judgment against him for want of a plea.[66] When a demurrer to the answer is sustained, in the absence of defendant and his counsel, an opportunity must be accorded to the defendant to elect whether he will plead over or stand on the demurrer.[67] But of course, after the defendant's demurrer is overruled and judgment of "respondeat ouster" given, he may be put in default for failure to answer further within the proper time.[68]

For the same reasons, a default cannot be entered while a motion is pending.[69] Thus, while an application for the removal of a cause from the state court to a federal court remains undetermined, it is irregular to enter a default against the party making the application, and a motion to set aside the default in such case should be allowed.[70] So of a motion to dismiss, for want of security for costs by a non-resident plaintiff, made in due time.[71] A motion to quash the return or the summons is no waiver of the right to plead, and in such case a refusal to allow the defendant to plead, and an entry of judgment as upon default, is error.[72] If the defendant's plea is withdrawn, the case then stands precisely as if no plea had been filed. An appearance is entered and a want or defect of service is waived by filing a plea in bar in the action, and if the plea is subsequently withdrawn, that does not operate as a withdrawal of the appearance, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment of nil dicit at any time before another plea is filed.[73] And in general, if the defendant abandons, or fails to establish, any preliminary motion or plea, he must seasonably avail himself of the opportunity accorded to answer to the merits, or he will be liable to be defaulted.[74] Thus, where a defendant filed a motion to quash a summons, which was overruled, and refused to appear further in the action, it was held that a judgment against him, without showing an entry of default, would not be disturbed.[75] Leave to the plaintiff to amend his declaration, and to the defendant for time to plead, is an abandonment of all existing issues, and if the plaintiff amends his declaration, and no plea is filed to such amended declaration, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment by default.[76] Still it is irregular to enter judgment as for want of an answer, where the complaint is amended after answer but no amended answer filed, if the original answer states a defense to the cause of action shown by the amended complaint.[77] Judgment by default, without a rule to answer, should not be entered against a defendant where a motion to strike out a portion of the complaint has been allowed. "We think the defendant should be regarded as standing in the same position as though he had successfully attacked the complaint by demurrer. Even if the order of the court and the circumstances of the case required no formal amendment of the complaint, the necessity for a rule to answer would remain the same."[78] When a default has actually been entered against the defendant, he cannot escape its consequences by filing a plea or answer, unless by consent of the plaintiff or leave of court.[79] But a default may be waived; and it will be considered that this is done, if the plaintiff subsequently permits the defendant, without objection, to participate in the proceedings, as, by filing an answer or a demurrer.[80]

§ 87. Conclusiveness of Judgment by Default.

A judgment taken by default is conclusive, by way of estoppel, in respect to all such matters and facts as were well pleaded and properly raised and material to the case made by the declaration, or other pleadings, and such issues cannot be relitigated in any subsequent action between the parties or their privies.[81] But while a default is conclusive of all that is properly alleged in the complaint, it is conclusive of nothing more, and as a general rule it binds the defendant only in the character in which he is sued.[82] "As applicable, however, to a suit to foreclose a mortgage, or other kindred suits in the nature of a proceeding in rem, where a party is made a defendant to answer as to his supposed or possible, but unknown or undefined, interest in the property, we think that, as against him, a default ought to be construed as an admission that, at the time he failed to appear as required, he had no interest in the property in question, and hence as conclusive of any prior claim of interest or title adverse to the plaintiff."[83] Further, a judgment by default, regularly entered, is as binding as any other, as far as respects the power and jurisdiction of the court in declaring the plaintiff's right to recover, although the amount of the recovery, in some cases, may remain to be ascertained by the assessment of damages.[84] A judgment by default will also operate as a merger of the cause of action or bar to another suit for the same demand. Thus, where the defendant offers to be defaulted for a given sum, and judgment is accordingly entered for the plaintiff for that amount, such judgment is a bar to a subsequent action between the same parties for the same claim.[85] But this effect is attributable only to the final judgment in the action. A judgment by default merely admits a cause of action; but while the precise character of the cause of action, and the extent of the defendant's liability, remains to be determined by a hearing in damages and final judgment thereon, the cause of action is not merged in the judgment, and the rights of the parties, beyond the mere admission of a cause of action, are neither strengthened nor impaired thereby.[86]

Where the defendant makes default, and the nature of the action and of the plaintiff's demand is such that there is no necessity for judicial action in determining the relief to be granted or the amount of the recovery, the statutes generally provide that a judgment may be entered by the clerk of the court, without application to the judge.[87] But in so entering judgment by default the clerk acts merely in a ministerial capacity, no intendments can be made in support of the validity of his acts, and unless he conforms strictly to the provisions of the statute, his proceedings will be irregular and not binding.[88] For instance, under a statute providing that the clerk may enter in vacation a judgment by default upon proof of personal service of a summons on the defendant, a judgment entered out of term by the clerk, unless there is such proof, is void.[89] But where the jurisdiction of the clerk to enter the judgment is not denied, it may be made a question how far his mistakes, misprisions, or irregular actions will impair the validity of the judgment. The authorities would not warrant the statement that the judgment in such case would be entirely void. On the contrary, they hold that it would be merely erroneous, and that the error could be cured by motion in the court below or corrected on appeal. This is the position taken with reference to cases in which the clerk, by mistake, has entered judgment for an amount in excess of the real recovery.[90]

§ 89. Interlocutory Judgment, when necessary.

It is important to be noted that the entry of a default is not necessarily, or not always, the final judgment in the action. In the language of the supreme court of Vermont, "the mere entry of a default does not involve and amount to the rendering of a final judgment. The default is an incident, which entitles the plaintiff to a judgment, but does not determine either the kind or amount of such judgment. The rendering of the judgment is to supervene upon and succeed the entry of the default, and may require intervening proceedings in the case, in order to enable the court to render such a judgment as to law appertains."[91] And the general rule is that if the action is brought on a contract or promise for a liquidated sum of money, or if the amount to be recovered can be ascertained by a mere matter of calculation, then a final judgment may be at once entered for such amount; but if the action sounds in tort,[92] or claims specific relief, or if the damages must be computed or liquidated otherwise than by simple calculation,[93] or depend upon evidence, then an interlocutory judgment will first be entered, and the case proceed to the assessment of damages in some method known to the law, after which a final judgment will be rendered for the amount so assessed. In a case of the latter kind, the prior entry of an interlocutory judgment is important to the regularity of the proceedings, though its omission would probably not be absolutely fatal. In a case where the record disclosed the fact that the court referred the matter to the clerk for the assessment of damages without first rendering an interlocutory judgment against the defendants for want of a plea, as the law required, the appellate court said: "In this we think there is manifest error." [94] An action upon an open account for goods sold and delivered, for services rendered, or the like, is not upon a liquidated demand such that final judgment may be entered for the amount claimed, upon failure to answer.[95] Nor can a final judgment by default be rendered in an action of detinue.[96] Nor is such judgment proper upon a note payable in Confederate money. a writ of inquiry, before the judgment was made final." [97] On the other hand, a demand founded upon a simple promissory note for a sum certain, not expressed to be payable otherwise than in lawful money, will warrant a final judgment upon defendant's default.[98] And the same is true of a claim for sums alleged to have been expended by a mortgagee to protect his security, as, for taxes,[99] and of a claim by a municipal corporation against a tax collector and his sureties upon the official bond.[100]

In some of the states, under statutes authorizing constructive service of process by publication in certain cases, it is provided that an interlocutory judgment by default shall be entered upon the defendant's failure to appear, which can only be made final at the succeeding term of court.[101] There is one other instance in which an interlocutory judgment should precede the entry of final judgment by default in an action, viz: upon the overruling of defendant's demurrer (in certain cases) or dilatory plea. Here the practice is to give judgment that he "answer over," after which, and on his failure to plead to the merits, he may be defaulted. But if the record shows that the defendant had an opportunity to answer over and refused to do so, judgment by nil dicit is good, without an entry of a formal judgment of respondeat ouster.[102]

§ 90. Assessment of Damages.

After the interlocutory judgment by default has been entered in an action for unliquidated damages or an unascertained sum, the next step is to assess the plaintiff's damages. This process, as followed at common law, consisted of the execution of a writ of inquiry, whereby the sheriff was directed to summon a jury of twelve men, over which he should himself preside, and proceed to assess the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff. The verdict being given, the sheriff returned the inquisition, which was entered on the roll in the manner of a postea, and thereupon judgment was rendered that the plaintiff should recover the exact sum of damages so assessed.[103] This common-law method is greatly modified, in the different states, by variations of local practice. In few, if any, is the writ of inquiry still executed by the sheriff; in some, no such writ issues, but the order for assessing damages is executed in court, by the judge, with or without the aid of a jury, or by a referee or auditor.[104] The important question is as to the constitutional right of trial by jury. Under the clause found in many of the state constitutions, providing that in suits at common law, where the value in controversy exceeds a certain sum, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, it has been held that the defendant has an absolute and indefeasible right, guarantied by the constitution, to demand that the question of damages be tried by a jury.[105] There is, however, reasonable ground for the theory that the defendant, by suffering a default in the first instance, has voluntarily renounced his right to have a jury called in any of the proceedings in the action.[106]

§ 91. Evidence on Assessment of Damages.

A default admits the cause of action and the material and traversable avèrments of the declaration, although not the amount of damages; and upon the proceeding for their assessment, the amount of damages is all that the plaintiff is required to prove or the defendant is permitted to controvert.[107] The former must produce whatever evidence is necessary to fix the amount of his claim with precision. Thus a judgment by default in assumpsit, where an account is filed in the declaration, is an admission of indebtedness for the articles charged, but the value of the articles and the amount of the items require to be proved.[108] As for the defendant, he may offer any evidence which is confined to the question of damages solely or which goes in mitigation or reduction of damages; but evidence tending to deny the cause of action, or to show that a right of action does not exist, or to avoid the alleged contract, is irrelevant and inadmissible.[109]

Wimberly, 86 Ga. 46, 12 S. E. 208. Regan v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 60 Conn. 124, 22 Atl. 503, 25 Am. St. Rep. 306. § 92. Amount of the Recovery.

A judgment by default for a sum greater than that prayed for in the complaint is irregular and erroneous.[110] And, generally speaking, where the prayer is for specific relief, the plaintiff is confined to a recovery in strict accordance with what he has asked for.[111] If a plea admits a part of the debt sued for, without a tender, the plaintiff may take judgment by nil dicit for such amount.[112] A judgment by default on a note, upon which is an indorsement of a credit by the plaintiff, ought to be entered subject to such credit.[113] In an action against joint defendants, where one suffers default, but the other proceeds to trial and secures a general verdict against the plaintiff, this is equivalent to a finding that nothing is due from the defaulted defendant, and no judgment can be entered against him.[114]

§ 93. Judgment by Default not aided by Presumptions.

In several states it is held that on appeal from a judgment by default, nothing will be presumed in its favor; the record must show affirmatively the existence of every material fact to give the court jurisdiction, and that all the proceedings were in accordance with law.[115] "It is a well settled rule of practice that where a judgment is taken by default against a defendant in an action, the record must affirmatively show that process had been duly served the required length of time before the default was taken." [116]

§ 94. Opening and Vacating Judgments by Default.

A judgment taken against a defendant by default will be opened or set aside, on his motion, in the court wherein it was entered, for a failure of jurisdiction or for certain classes of errors and irregularities; and also, by statute in some of the states, when it was given in consequence of his "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect." But in respect to the exercise of this power, judgments by default are not differentiated from any other species of judgment, except in so far as certain special statutes are applicable to them, and except that practically they constitute by far the largest class of cases in which applications for such relief are made. And for this reason it is not proposed to examine the subject in detail in this connection, but the reader is referred to the later chapters of this work in which the vacating and opening of judgments in general will be fully discussed.[117]

But in Proulx v Stetson & Post Mill Co., 6 Wash. 478, 33 Pac. 1067, it is said that the ordinary presumption of regularity in the proceedings of a court of general jurisdiction applies in the case of a judgment by default. And in Florida, it appears that, where a final judgment entered by the clerk on a default is not void on its face, but voidable only, because of matters dehors the judgment, it becomes an absolute verity after the lapse of 60 days from the entry of the default, unless set aside or reversed by an appellate court. § 95. Review of Judgments by Default.

An appeal will lie from a judgment entered upon the default of the defendant, in a proper case, as well as from any other judgment. "There may be error in a judgment by default, as well as in a judgment rendered upon issue joined in the pleadings and tried by a jury, and in the former, as well as in the latter case, the error may be corrected on appeal." [118] We have already seen that such a judgment will be reversed when founded upon a pleading which does not state a cause of action.[119] And it remains to be stated that the appellate court has power to deal with it and to correct or reverse it on account of a failure to comply with the statutory directions, or mistakes of the court or clerk, or any errors or irregularities which would vitiate a judgment otherwise rendered.

But in New York, the statute restricts the right of appeal to parties not in default; and consequently the remedy of one aggrieved by an invalid judgment by default is by motion to have it corrected. § 96. Arrest of Judgment at Common Law.

The arrest of judgment is defined as the withholding or staying of judgment, notwithstanding a verdict has been given, on the ground that there is some error appearing on the face of the record which vitiates the proceedings.[1] But the errors which will justify a motion in this behalf must be errors of substance, and not merely clerical or formal mistakes. If they belong to the latter class, they will be cured by the statutes of amendments and jeofails, which have introduced a much more liberal practice in this respect than had formerly obtained. According to Blackstone, "arrests of judgment arise from intrinsic causes, appearing upon the face of the record." And he enumerates the grounds which will be sufficient to prompt this action of the court, as follows:—where the declaration varies totally from the original writ; where the verdict materially differs from the pleadings and issue thereon; and where the case laid in the declaration is not sufficient in point of law to found an action upon.[2] In this country, motions in arrest of judgment, at least in civil cases, are not especially favored. The liberality of the statutes and the indulgence of the courts, in permitting amendments, and in taking defects as cured by the verdict if not duly objected to, have taken away most of the grounds on which a motion of this character could be predicated, and this reduction is still further promoted by the facility of obtaining new trials.[3] Indeed, a motion in arrest of judgment is now usually coupled with a motion for a new trial, the latter being the real and important object of the application. And in some of the states the practice of arresting judgments is entirely abolished. In Maine, for example, it is provided by law that no motion in arrest of judgment in any civil action shall be sustained in the courts of that state.[4] It is of course only the defendant who can move in arrest of judgment. If the defendant has obtained a verdict upon a plea which confesses the cause of action and does not sufficiently avoid it, the proper course for the plaintiff, as we have already seen, is to move for judgment non obstante veredicto.[5] A joint motion by several defendants in arrest of judgment cannot be sustained as to a part only.[6] A motion in arrest of judgment need not be in writing, nor point out the grounds therefor, nor need it be brought into the record by bill of exceptions.[7]

§ 97. When the Motion should be made.

By the English practice, a motion in arrest of judgment may be made at any time before judgment is actually entered up. In the absence of statutes, it is probable that a similar rule would be applied in our own courts. But at all events it seems clear that a motion of this kind cannot be granted after the rendition and entry of a final judgment in the cause; at that stage the only remedy is by motion to vacate or set aside the judgment.[8] But where the law provides that the motion may be made at any time before the adjournment of the term at which the case is finally disposed of, it is held that the defendant's right to so move will not be defeated by the entering up of a judgment by the plaintiff on the record before the adjournment of such term.[9] In some states it is provided that a motion in arrest shall be made within four days of the rendition of the judgment; and when this is the case, the motion is too late if filed after the final adjournment of the term at which the judgment is entered.[10] It is held to be the correct rule of practice not to entertain a motion in arrest of judgment after the overruling of a demurrer to the declaration, at least where the motion is based on any exceptions which might have been considered on the demurrer;[11] and clearly, matter which was objected to by demurrer and decided upon cannot afterwards be urged in arrest of judgment.[12] But a motion of this character may be received after a decision on a motion for a new trial.[13]

§ 98. Grounds for Arrest of Judgment.

As a general rule, a judgment can be arrested only for some matter appearing, or the omission of some matter which ought to appear, on the face of the record itself.[14] And for the purpose of such a motion, the evidence does not constitute a part of the record.[15] "A motion in arrest of judgment reaches only such defects as are apparent on the face of the record, and as are not cured by the verdict or some statute of amendments, or waived by failing to demur."[16] This motion, in other words, "does not perform the office of calling the attention of the court to rulings which constitute matters of exception. It can not, therefore, be used as a substitute for a motion for a new trial. It reaches only those defects which are apparent on the face of the record proper, and does not reach such as require to be brought to the notice of the court by proof aliunde."[17] Much less, of course, can such a motion be supported by matter which becomes part of the record after the motion has been overruled.[18] It is stated to be an invariable rule, with regard to the arrest of judgment, that whatever is alleged for this purpose must be such matter as would, upon demurrer, have been sufficient to overturn the action or plea.[19] That is, motions in arrest are governed in general by the principles applicable to demurrers, and no greater indulgence is shown to the defendant, in respect to his objections thus urged, than if they had taken the shape of a demurrer. In fact, as a consequence of the statutes of amendments and the doctrine of cure by verdict, much greater severity is shown to motions in arrest. So that it is by no means true that any thing which would have supported a demurrer will be good ground for arresting the judgment. "Exceptions that are moved in arrest of judgment must be much more material and glaring than such as will maintain a demurrer, or, in other words, many inaccuracies and omissions, which would be fatal if early observed, are cured by a subsequent verdict, and not suffered, in the last stage of a cause, to unravel the whole proceedings." [20]

§ 99. Defect of Parties.

The objection that there is a defect of parties cannot be raised by motion in arrest of judgment, but only by demurrer or answer, and it is waived by going to trial without exception.[21] So a misjoinder of parties as plaintiffs is no ground for arresting the judgment.[22] Neither is an objection that some of the defendants are non-residents.[23] And where an action was pending in the name of a firm, as plaintiffs, in the style of L. & Co., and L. died before the trial, and the names of the other partners did not appear of record, it was considered that this furnished no ground for a motion in arrest of judgment, the death itself not being shown by the record.[24] Nor will judgment be arrested because of an ordinary mis-spelling of a party's name.[25] On the other hand, where an objection of this character is supported by the face of the record, it may in some instances be adequate ground for arresting the judgment. Thus, where the law requires that suits shall be brought in the name of the real party in interest, a motion to arrest a judgment in favor of the assignor of a note "to the use of" the assignee should prevail.[26]

§ 100. Insufficient or Faulty Pleadings.

A motion in arrest of judgment must be founded on matter of record; and if the declaration or complaint contains a substantial cause of action, the judgment will not be arrested on account of an irregularity or defect which is amendable, or which has been waived by appearance or going to trial.[27] In other words, if the plaintiff's manner of stating his title or setting out his cause of action be objectionable and defective, though the title itself appears to be good in law, advantage must be taken of the defect before a verdict is rendered. But if, giving him the benefit of all intendments and inferences, the title or cause of action itself appears from the declaration to be defective and bad in law, so that his averments do not make out a substantial ground of suit, then judgment will be arrested on the defendant's motion; because such a defect cannot be cured by verdict, and the court cannot presume that a cause of action was proved where none was stated.[28] An admirable illustration of this rule is furnished by a recent decision in Indiana, where an action was brought under a statute which provided that the personal representative of one killed by the wrongful act of another might maintain an action therefor in his own name for the benefit of the widow and children, or next of kin, of the deceased. The petition in this case failed to allege the existence of any widow, children, or next of kin, and it was held that a motion in arrest of judgment was properly sustained, because the existence of persons beneficially interested was essential to the plaintiff's suit, and without that allegation his petition did not disclose a cause of action.[29] But in stating that a judgment will be arrested if the petition fails to disclose a cause of action, reference is of course made to substantial and not formal omissions. The latter are supplied by intendment, and will be presumed after verdict to have been proved. If the defects are merely of omission, and if, when supplied, a complete case would be made out, the omission being of facts which the jury must have found, then the judgment is a legitimate sentence of the law.[30] Thus judgment will not be arrested, stated by Chief Justice Richardson: If the title stated in the declaration be defective, the judgment must be arrested; but if the title be defectively stated, the defect is cured by verdict. The true distinction between the two is this: When any particular fact is essential to the validity of the plaintiff's title, if such fact is neither expressly stated in the declaration, nor necessarily implied from the facts which are stated, the title must be considered as defective and judgment must be arrested; but if such fact, although not expressly stated, be necessarily implied from what is stated, the title must be considered as only defectively stated, and the defect is cured by verdict.

after verdict, for any defect in pleading which would not have been fatal on general demurrer; nor then, if the court can presume the defect to have been supplied by proof before the jury.[31] Further, upon a motion of this kind, the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of any legitimate inference or intendment that can be brought to bear upon the allegations of his declaration. Hence the rule that judgment will not be arrested for lack of an essential averment in the declaration which is contained by implication in the averments used, or which may be considered to have been proved as a part of what is alleged.[32] On a motion in arrest the whole record is before the court, and where a defect in the petition is waived of record by the defendant, the motion will not be granted on account of such defect.[33] Aside from the question of omissions, the general rule also prescribes that irregularities or informalities in the manner of setting out the cause of action are not open to exception after verdict. As an illustration of this, it is held that an objection that the complaint, in an action for damages for breach of contract, treats each breach as a separate and independent cause of action, and sets forth the same in a distinct count, is not available upon a motion in arrest of judgment.[34] Nor need the plaintiff anticipate defenses; it is no cause for arresting judgment that the declaration on its face shows the cause of action to have been barred.[35] Nor that the complaint only warrants a recovery of nominal damages.[36] So again, a traverse by one party of matter not alleged by the other, in addition to the matter properly in issue, is mere surplusage and not a ground of arrest.[37]

Nor can the question of the propriety of allowing an amendment to be made in the pleadings be reached on motion in arrest.[38]

§ 101. Joinder of Good and Bad Counts.

In regard to the misjoinder of counts in a declaration, or the joinder of good and bad counts, the English rule is stated to be as follows: Where general damages are found on a declaration consisting of several counts, which are good but cannot be joined, the proper course is to arrest the judgment; where some of the counts are good and others bad, a venire de novo issues; but in the case of a single count containing good and bad causes of action, the court will neither arrest the judgment nor grant a venire de novo, inasmuch as it will be intended that the damages were given in respect of the good cause of action only.[39] And a similar rule obtains in some of the American states, viz., that if a general verdict for the plaintiff be taken upon several counts in a declaration, and one of the counts is fatally defective, judgment will be arrested on motion, though other counts, not liable to objection, were covered by the verdict.[40] As we have already seen, some of the American authorities manifest a decided reluctance (though this disposition is not universal) to presume in favor of the validity of a judgment which may, for aught that appears on the record, be composed in part of damages given in respect of a bad count.[41] Still, in several of the states, it is apparently settled law that where a general verdict is returned, the judgment will not be arrested unless all the counts of the declaration, or paragraphs of the complaint, are so defective as not to have been cured by the verdict or finding.[42] Thus in New Hampshire, judgment will not be arrested because the declaration may contain some claims that are illegal, if it also contains others upon which the plaintiff may properly recover.[43]

§ 102. Misjoinder of Causes of Action.

A misjoinder of counts and causes of action, apparent upon the declaration, with damages assessed entire, is good cause for arresting the judgment on motion after verdict, or for reversing the judgment by writ of error.[44] Thus a motion in arrest will be granted when the petition contains matters of equitable jurisdiction mixed and blended with matters of legal cognizance, in the states where the distinction is still observed.[45] And in Missouri, where several causes of action are united in the same petition, the verdict, if found for the plaintiff, must be rendered and the damages assessed upon each cause of action separately, otherwise judgment will be arrested.[46]

§ 103. Objections to the Jury.

An objection to the mode of drawing and impaneling the grand jury cannot be made the ground of a motion in arrest of judgment.[47] Nor will any objection to an individual juror, which would not be sufficient ground for a principal challenge, be good cause for arresting the judgment.[48] It appears, however, that when a cause is tried in a court of record before a less number of jurors than a party is entitled to, and his consent to such a trial does not expressly appear of record, he may take advantage of the objection by motion in arrest; and in such case no exceptions to the panel need be saved at the trial.[49] It is generally held—in accordance with the rule that judgment will be arrested only for matter of record—that misconduct of the jury, or improper influence brought to bear upon them, after they have retired to make up a verdict, is no ground for a motion in arrest, although it may furnish cause for granting a new trial.[50] So the fact that the jury, when out, were under the charge of an unsworn officer, is not technically ground for a motion in arrest of judgment, though it may be for a new trial.[51]

§ 104. Irregular or Defective Verdict.

At common law, one of the principal grounds for arresting a judgment is the objection that the verdict is not responsive to the issues, or that it differs in a material respect from the pleadings and the issue formed thereon.[52] So if the verdict is upon an insufficient count, or finds a fact which disaffirms the plaintiff's right to recover, or omits to find a material issue joined in the cause, the judgment will be arrested.[53]

§ 105. Grounds held Insufficient.

[50] Brister v. State, 26 Ala. 107. Connecticut apparently stands alone in permitting a different practice. It is there held that on a motion in arrest of judgment for misconduct of a juror,—as, conversing with one not of the jury upon the merits of the cause,—it must be averred that the party making the motion was ignorant of such misconduct until after the verdict was rendered, otherwise the motion will not prevail. Woodruff v. Richardson, 20 Conn. 238. And in another case, where the jury took with them a paper which had been used on the trial to refresh the memory of a witness, but which was not read or offered in evidence, nor were its contents communicated to the other side, and had the same before them in all their deliberations, and the paper was calculated to affect the verdict, it was held that this was a sufficient ground for arresting the judgment. § 106. Distinction between Rendition and Entry.

The rendition of a judgment is the judicial act of the court in pronouncing the sentence of the law upon the facts in controversy as ascertained by the pleadings and the verdict.[1] The entry of a judgment is a ministerial act, which consists in spreading upon the record a statement of the final conclusion reached by the court in the matter, thus furnishing external and incontestable evidence of the sentence given, and designed to stand as a perpetual memorial

[1] "The whole question, then, appears to resolve itself into this—whether the rendition of judgment is a judicial act, to which the direct agency of the court is indispensable, and to which the mind of the court is to be judicially applied, or whether, after verdict has been rendered, it is a ministerial act, which may be performed by the clerk without an order by the court. When presented in this elementary form, the question appears to me exceed-

of its action.[2] It is the former, therefore, that is the effective result of the litigation. In the nature of things, a judgment must be rendered before it can be entered. And not only that, but though the judgment be not entered at all, still it is none the less a judgment. The omission to enter it does not destroy it, nor does its vitality remain in abeyance until it is put upon the record. The entry may be supplied, perhaps after the lapse of years, by an order nunc pro tunc. But it must not be supposed that this proceeding is required to give existence and force, by retrospection, to that which before had none. As is said by the supreme court of California: "The enforcement of a judgment does not depend upon its entry or docketing. These are merely ministerial acts, the first of which is required to be done for putting in motion the right of appeal from the judgment itself, or of limiting the time within which the right may be exercised, or in which the judgment may be enforced; and the other, for the purpose of creating a lien by the judgment upon the real property of the debtor. But neither is necessary for the issuance of an execution upon a judgment which has been duly rendered. Without docketing or entry, execution may be issued on the judgment and land levied upon and sold, and the deed executed by the sheriff, in fulfillment of the sale, not only proves the sale, but also estops the defendant from controverting the title acquired by it."[3] And it follows, a fortiori, that if the entry, though attempted to be made in due form, does not correctly record the sentence of the court, or is defective or ambiguous or otherwise exceptionable, still this will not weaken the force of the judgment as a judgment.

ingly clear and free from doubt. If there be any one thing done in the progress of a cause, from its commencement to its conclusion, that is peculiarly and emphatically a judicial act, it is the rendition of judgment." Ware, Dist. There are certain purposes, however, for which a judgment is required to be duly entered before it can become available or be attended by its usual incidents. Thus, as above remarked, this is a prerequisite to the right to appeal. And so a judgment must commonly be docketed before it can create a lien upon land, and in some of the states (though not all) the priority among different liens is determined by their respective dates of docketing.[4] And again, the record entry of a judgment is indispensable to furnish the evidence of it, when it is made the basis of a claim or defense in another court.[5] But with these exceptions, a judgment is independent of the fact of its entry. And in all cases, the distinction between rendition and entry is substantial and important.

It is the duty of the court, when the necessary facts have been lawfully determined by regular proceedings, to render the proper judgment, and to refrain from any re-opening of the issues.[6] The performance of this duty by the court may be enforced by the writ of mandamus. But to make this remedy available it must appear that the court had jurisdiction in the premises, that regular and sufficient proceedings were had, that the case is ripe for judgment, and that the complainant has an absolute right to the judgment sought, no constraint upon the judicial discretion of the court being permissible.[7]

The failure of the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiff for an amount admitted by the defendant to be due and tendered in court, is error for which the judgment will be reversed.[8] And a second final judgment or decree cannot be rendered between the same parties upon the same pleadings and subject-matter, until the first has been reversed, or opened and vacated.[9] The authority of the court to render a judgment does not always depend upon the fact that regular proceedings have taken place and culminated in a verdict; it may, in some cases, rest upon the consent or agreement of the parties. Thus a stipulation by the parties that when judgment is entered in a certain cause pending in another county, and a transcript thereof forwarded to the district court of defendant's county, where other causes involving the same question are pending, the judge of the latter court may order similar judgments in the other causes, is valid, and the judgments may be entered in vacation.[10] Where issues are sent from one court to another to be tried, it belongs to the court in which the main litigation is pending to enter any judgment that may be necessary in the case. Thus, where issues are sent by the probate court to a court of law, a judgment for costs should be entered by the former court upon receiving the certificate of the verdict, and not by the court in which the issues were tried.[11]

§ 108. Application and Order for Judgment.

Where judgment follows as the result of contested proceedings and the finding of a verdict, it is usually not necessary for the successful party, in modern practice, to take active measures to secure the rendition of judgment.[12] But an application for judgment is in some instances required by statute, and is probably always necessary in case of default. In California, a statute provides that an action may be dismissed, or judgment of nonsuit entered, "when, after verdict or final submission, the party entitled to judgment neglects to demand and have the same entered for more than six months."[13] But this does not cause the party to lose his judgment when the lapse of the time mentioned was caused by the delay of the court or the negligence of the clerk.[14] It is held that a judgment which has been entered, and to which the judgment creditor was clearly entitled upon the pleadings, will not be disturbed for failure to give notice of the application for the judgment, or for failure of the clerk to enter in his minutes, as required by the court rules, a statement of the application.[15] When the court gives to the clerk an order for a judgment, that is his authority for entering the same, and by that alone he must be guided. Hence a judgment entered by the clerk in pursuance of an express order of the court, will not be void and a mere nullity, although the court, by a subsequent order not noticed by the clerk, have directed the case to be continued, although such a judgment would be irregular and voidable, and liable to be set aside upon seasonable application to the court.[16]

The impression not uncommonly prevails that at common law a judgment required the signature of the court in order to be valid. This notion—arising probably from an ambiguous use of the phrase "signing judgment"—is erroneous; and the ancient practice furnishes but slight aid in determining the same question in modern law.[17] Now in some of the states the statutes require that the judgment itself, or the record in which it is entered up, shall be signed by the judge; and in these states some of the decisions hold that unless this direction is complied with, the judgment will be entirely invalid and of no force or effect.[18] Still, these statutes require the signature only of final and definite judgments which pass upon the merits of a controversy and may constitute res judicata; interlocutory orders, made in the progress of a cause, have their effect without being signed by the judge.[19] And some of the authorities show a tendency to construe such statutes in a liberal manner, instead of requiring an exact compliance with their terms. Thus a judgment which the court was competent to render without the verdict of a jury will be upheld if found entered on the minutes of the day's proceedings, the minutes of the day being regularly signed by the judge, though the judgment itself bears only the signature of counsel. Such a judgment, it is said, is irregular but not void, and can be amended.[20] So the signature of the judge affixed by consent in vacation is a sufficient authentication of a decree in an ordinary action to authorize an execution.[21] Another group of cases goes much further than this, and holds that the requirement that a judge shall sign all judgments rendered in his court is merely directory, and consequently that his omission to do so will not avoid the judgment as to strangers, although it might, in connection with other evidence, be a proof that the judgment was fraudulent or had not been in fact rendered by him.[22] In harmony with these decisions it is also held that an irregularity in the signature of the judge—as, in his placing it in the body of the decree instead of at the foot,[23] or his signing it while he is in another county,[24]—is immaterial. And where the court is composed of several judges, its orders are sufficiently authenticated by the signature of either.[25]

In several of the other states, there being no statutory requirement of this character, it is held to be entirely unnecessary to the validity of a judgment that it be signed by the judge; the presumption is, that if it is entered by the clerk, it was so directed and authorized by the court.[26] And a valid judgment will support an execution issued in conformity therewith, although the formal record evidence of its rendition may not have been in existence at the time execution issued.[27] In New York it is said: "There is no provision of the present law requiring such signing. The judge is to make his 'decision in writing,' and this, it is presumed, he must sign by way of authentication.[28] The judgment itself is to be entered in the judgment-book, and is in theory entered by the clerk."[29] The practice in Kansas is thus described:—the clerk by order or permission of the court enters the judgment in all cases in full upon the journal, and this judgment (as well as every other proceeding) is valid, and has force and effect, as soon as it is entered on the journal, whether it is ever signed by the judge or not, and whether it is ever transcribed into the complete record or not.[30] And it is believed that a practice more or less closely analogous to this is in vogue in a majority of the states; so that only in a few jurisdictions can the judge's signature be regarded as an indispensable requisite to the validity of the judgment.

When a judgment has been rendered in a cause,[31] it becomes the duty of the clerk, according to the usual practice, to make a record entry of it in an official book kept for that purpose.[32] In some states, he is required, at this stage, to make up a complete record of the case from its inception to its close, or a "judgment-roll;" in others, he merely adds an entry of the judgment to the brief history of the case contained in his docket and which consists of consecutive statements of the steps taken in the cause from the issue of the writ on. The object of this entry is to furnish an enduring memorial and incontestable evidence of the judgment, and to fix its date for purposes of appeal or creating a lien. But, as was stated in the beginning of this chapter, this proceeding is ministerial only, and is not essential to the validity of the judgment itself. It is none the less the judgment of the court because not entered by the clerk.[33] And, except for certain special purposes, it does not remain inchoate or unfinished until so entered. Hence the neglect or failure of the clerk to make a proper entry of record of the judgment, or his defective or inaccurate entry of it, will not, as between the parties, operate to invalidate the judgment.[34] "The fact that the clerk did not perform his entire duty in making up the record cannot deprive parties of their rights. Even although he should entirely fail to make up a record, such neglect would not affect those interested in the matter decided, if sufficient could be found upon the files and books of the court to show what had been done. What we call the complete record of a case is nothing but the history of what has been done in the case, copied by the clerk into a bo - called the 'book of records.' It is not the writing of those things in this book that gives them validity. It is the previous action of the court upon the subject-matter. The record is but evidence of this action, and if, in copying, the clerk makes a mistake, that mistake will be corrected by entries made from time to time of the action of the court, and which entries, made in other books of the court, lay the foundation for the complete records."[35] The docket of a judgment, it is held in New York, is no part of the record of the court; the entries upon the docket are directed to be made by the clerk, who, in making them, acts in a ministerial capacity, and his erroneous or false entries cannot conclude the parties, whatever might be the effect of an entry which he was authorized by law to make.[36] In some of the states it is required by law that, before a docket entry is made of a judgment, there shall be filed a "judgment-roll" containing all the papers necessary to be attached according to the provisions of the statute. It appears that unless this provision is complied with, the docketing of the judgment is an unauthorized and illegal act.[37] But it is also held that an order denying a motion to set aside a judgment because of the failure to file a proper judgment-roll is not reviewable in the appellate court. If what was done amounts to a legal nullity, no substantial rights of the defendant are impaired by the denial; and if the roll is not in due form, or the filing for any reason is irregular, the granting or refusing the application is discretionary.[38] According to the law and practice obtaining in other states, to constitute a judgment for the purpose of docketing, it must first be entered in the "judgment-book." docketing without such entry is of no avail, even though a judgment-roll be filed with what purports to be a copy of a judgment in it.[39]

The general principle pointed out in this chapter—that an unrecorded judgment is valid between the parties, though it may not be notice to strangers—is illustrated by an Alabama decision, in which it is held that a statute which requires decrees of the chancery court vesting the title to property in either of the parties to a suit, to be recorded in the office of the clerk of the county in which the land is situated, does not make the vesting of the title dependent on the recording of the decree, but the decree is affected by a failure to have it so recorded just as a deed would be under the registration laws.[40] That a judgment duly entered in the judgment-book was not signed by the clerk is an irregularity and a deviation from the ordinary practice, but it does not vitiate the judgment as to third persons in collateral proceedings.[41]

When the clerk is directed by law to keep certain books for the entry of judgments, or to record judgments in a book specially designated by statute for that purpose, and deviates from the course prescribed, then in either case, for reasons sufficiently stated in the preceding section, the validity of the judgment is not thereby impaired as between the parties.[42] As concerns third persons the case might be different. Probably one would not be bound by notice of a judgment which did not appear in the book designated by law as the proper quarter in which to direct his inquiries, although it might be recorded in a book regularly kept by the clerk but not recognized by law.[43] Still, this would not impair the right to issue execution. So, under the laws of Maryland, the entry of judgment in the "permanent judgment-record" in the first instance, and without any previous entry thereof in the "trial-docket," as required by the ordinary practice of the trial courts, does not render the judgment illegal or so irregular as to require it to be stricken out.[44]

In some of the states, the index to the record of judgments is made, by the effect of the statute, a part of the record; and a judgment is not a lien on real property until properly indexed, as against a purchaser who has searched the index with due care; and third persons cannot be charged with constructive notice of a judgment unless the same is correctly indexed.[45] In Virginia, however, an exactly opposite doctrine prevails; the index is no part of the record and is not essential to the creation of a valid lien.[46] We shall return to this subject in a later chapter.[47]

to make a proper entry of it, provided he shows an absolute loss of his judgment in consequence of such neglect.[48] And the rule that it is the duty of the creditor to see that his judgment is properly entered applies only as between the parties and those affected by the want of constructive notice, but has no reference to the question of the liability of the clerk to the plaintiff whose judgment was wrongly entered.[49]

§ 114. Contents of the Judgment.

No particular form of words is usually considered necessary to show the rendition of a judgment. The record of the judgment is sufficient if the time, place, parties, matter in dispute, and the result, with the relief granted, are clearly stated.[50] So, under the ordinary practice, it is not required to set out in the judgment itself the facts on which it is founded; it is sufficient if they are stated in the pleadings and ascertained by the judgment.[51] And under those systems of practice which assimilate the legal and equitable jurisdiction, it is not necessary that the facts on which a decree in equity is based should be recited therein. The case is preserved in the same manner as in an action at law, and all the material evidence must be incorporated in the bill of exceptions.[52] But it is held that a judgment of conviction should contain the facts judicially ascertained, together with the manner of ascertaining them, and the recorded declaration of the court pronouncing the legal consequences of those facts.[53]

§ 115. Form of the Judgment.

"The judgment is the remedy prescribed by law for the redress of injuries, and the suit or action is the vehicle or means of administering it. What that remedy may be, is indeed the result of deliberation and study to point out, and therefore the style of the judgment is, not that it is decreed or resolved by the court, for then the judgment might appear to be their own, but 'it is considered,' 'consideratum est per curiam,' that the plaintiff do recover his debt, his damages, his possession, and the like; which implies that the judgment is none of their own, but the act of law, pronounced and declared by the court, after due deliberation and inquiry." [54] This being the theory and practice of the common law, there was at one time a disposition on the part of some of our courts to be very strict in requiring the use of this exact formula, and to hold that nothing could be substituted for the word "considered" without fatal consequences.[55] But a more liberal view now obtains, and the cases hold that the terms "decreed," "resolved," "ordered," "judgment rendered," etc., are fully equivalent to the original technical term, provided the entry shows an actual giving of judgment and exhibits what it is required to specify with clearness and precision.[56] It may therefore be stated as the modern rule that the form of the judgment is not very material, provided that in substance it shows distinctly and not inferentially that the matter had been determined in favor of one of the litigants, or that the rights of the parties in litigation had been adjudicated.[57] In other words, the sufficiency of the writing claimed to be a judgment should always be tested by its substance rather than its form.[58] But while this is so, there are certain requisites of a judgment which cannot be dispensed with. In the first place, the entry must purport to be an actual judgment, conveying the sentence of the law, as distinguished from a mere memorandum, note, or recital that a judgment had been or would be rendered.[59] In a case where the record stated as follows: "This cause coming on to be heard on the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition heretofore filed, the court, after hearing the argument of counsel thereon, and after due consideration, sustained said demurrer and rendered judgment for the defendant and against the plaintiff for the costs of this action taxed at $11.20," it was held that this was no judgment, but a mere recital that one had been rendered for costs.[60] In the next place, a true judgment must be

A document of the latter kind has not the force or the characteristics of a judgment, and will not support an execution.[61] It is further to be noted, in connection with matters of form in judgments, that a much less degree of technicality and formality is required in the judgments of justices of the peace and other inferior courts, than is exacted in respect to the judgments of courts of record. In the case of judgments of the former order, it is generally held sufficient if the books and papers disclose with reasonable certainty that a judgment was in fact rendered for one of the parties, and for what amount, or even that a verdict was returned on which no judgment was actually entered.[62] It is also to be remarked that irregularities and defects of form, in judicial proceedings, can be taken advantage of by parties and privies only; third persons have no right to interfere.[63]

"To constitute a valid judgment, the record of it must contain sufficient certainty and precision to enable the clerk to issue an execution by inspection of the entry, without reference to other entries." In the case from which this quotation is taken, the judgment was against "the Captain and Master of the Steamboat Mollie Hamilton," and there was nothing in the record to disclose the name of the captain or master. It was accordingly held that the judgment was void.[64] The decision was undoubtedly correct on the facts of the case, but the general rule announced must not be understood as declaring that the judgment itself cannot be aided in this respect by reference to other parts of the same record. For numerous authorities hold that a judgment expressed to be merely for or against the "plaintiff" or the "defendant" will be sufficient, if the names of the parties thus designated can be ascertained without ambiguity from other parts of the record.[65] And in a suit against two defendants, a judgment against "the defendant," instead of "the defendants," is not so defective as to be void for uncertainty, where the record clearly shows that it is in fact a judgment against both of the parties defendant.[66] So in a case where, although the complaint states no cause of action against any but the defendant, a third person is permitted on his own petition to appear and answer, and a verdict is found against "the defendant," the use of the plural

"defendants" in the judgment will be treated as a merely clerical error, and the judgment be held as one against the original defendant only.[67] So a judgment for a definite amount should not be set aside because it fails to state that it is for the plaintiff against the defendant, where the declaration sets forth a cause of action and the parties thereto.[68] Nevertheless, a patent ambiguity on the face of the judgment cannot be thus cured or aided. In an Ohio decision the court said: "The order of the court was that these instalments should be paid by the parties in partition 'or their representatives or assigns,' and in default that execution should issue therefor. This order is void for uncertainty. A judgment against A. or B. is no valid judgment against either A. or B., and is simply void." [69] On the other hand, in a suit to enforce a resulting trust on payment of money due the holders of the legal title, a decree requiring such holders to convey to "the heirs at law of W. B." is proper, without requiring that the persons intended be individually named.[70] So a judgment rendered against a defendant omitting his Christian name cannot be considered void, but an action may be maintained against him on such judgment, averring his identity, and the plaintiff may prove by parol that he is the person against whom the judgment was rendered.[71] It is sufficient if the memorandum of the style of a cause, made by the clerk, indicate with reasonable certainty to what suit it relates. The description of the parties by the name of their firm is sufficient, and a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendants is sufficient, as the pleadings show who they are.[72] In Ohio it is required by statute that the judgment shall certify which of the defendants is principal and which surety; but this, it is held, only applies where they are sued jointly, and if judgment is recovered in an action against the surety alone, it is not necessary to its validity that it should specify the fact of his suretyship.[73] The title of a case is matter of form only, and a clerical error therein will not vitiate.[74]

§ 117. Designation of the Property.

When a judgment has to do with specific property, it is essential that the property be designated in the judgment with such a degree of certainty that it can be identified without reasonable opportunity for mistake.[75] Thus a decree for the distribution of an estate should set out specifically the property to be distributed.[76] So a judgment of recovery in trespass to try title is void if it does not describe the land with sufficient certainty to identify it.[77] But because there is a want of certainty in the description of land ordered to be sold to satisfy a judgment, it does not follow that the judgment is otherwise bad. Though such want of certainty renders void what it refers to, unless the plaintiff in the execution be dissatisfied no other person has cause of complaint.[78] But here also, as in respect to the designation of the parties, the judgment may be aided by intendments and additional data drawn from the pleadings and other parts of the record. Thus a decree is not void, nor incompetent as evidence, because it contains no description of the land thereby decreed to be conveyed, if it refers to the petition in the action, or other pleadings or documents, for such description, in apt and sufficient words.[79] Indeed the authorities go even further than this. For it has been held that a judgment that plaintiff recover "the property in controversy," or in default thereof a sum fixed as its value, will not be reversed for uncertainty in the recovery, where, although the petition claims several articles, the record shows that the controversy was reduced to two of them.[80]

§ 118. Designation of Amount of Recovery.

The amount of a judgment must be stated in it with certainty and precision. All judgments must be specific and certain; they must determine the rights recovered or the penalties imposed, and be such as the defendant may readily understand and be capable of performing.[81] A judgment, it is said, must be so certain that the clerk can issue an execution by inspection of it, without reference to other entries.[82] Hence a judgment which is uncertain as to the amount which it awards is invalid.[83] For example, a judgment against a garnishee "for the amount of his answer or so much there-

Seale (Tex. Civ. App.) 45 S. W. 171. But in Kentucky, it is said that a judgment should be certain as to the description of real property ordered to be sold; and it is not sufficient that the property may be identified by a reference to the pleadings. of as will satisfy the plaintiff's debt and costs" has been held void for uncertainty.[84] And a finding that a garnishee was liable for one of two amounts, which are to be determined by a future contingency, was not considered a judgment at all.[85]

Nevertheless, "id certum est quod certum reddi potest;" and we are unable to discover any good reason why this maxim should not apply to the amount of a judgment as well as in any other case. An obscure or ambiguous designation of the parties or the subject-matter involved may be construed, as we have seen, with reference to the other parts of the record. And if the pleadings, or the verdict, show the actual amount of the recovery, without any doubt or room for mistake, it would seem that the judgment should not be considered invalid, at least as between the parties, for its failure to specify the sum awarded with precision. It must be admitted that the authorities hardly go to the length of sanctioning the rule here suggested, although the general principle of construing a judgment by the record is not disputed. But the cases certainly justify the statement that if the judgment-entry itself, without naming the amount of recovery, contains data which permit its calculation, a sufficient degree of certainty is attained. Thus a judgment for interest from a day mentioned is sufficiently certain without fixing the amount.[86] So also, if a verdict be found for a fixed and definite amount, and the judgment refers to the verdict in explicit terms (as if it is expressed to be "for the said sum assessed as aforesaid"), it is considered to be sufficiently precise.[87] But it is error to render judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff which fails to state how much he should recover, when all debt is denied by the defendant. In such case the jury should have been requested to retire and find how much the plaintiff ought to recover.[88]

If there are blanks in the judgment, instead of a statement of its amount, this will destroy its force and effect for most purposes, or at least leave it incomplete until the blanks are filled. For instance, a judgment that the party recover "costs of suit taxed at ——," the amount of costs not being inserted in the record, will not support a declaration upon the judgment as for a fixed sum, nor can the defect in the record be supplied by resorting to an entry upon the clerk's docket.[89] So a confession of judgment for "——— dollars," and so entered, creates no lien on the property of the judgment debtor while it remains in that condition.[90] In Pennsylvania, however, it appears to be the rule that a judgment entered for an unliquidated sum will sustain an execution and a sheriff's sale thereon, if the actual amount of the judgment-debt be indorsed on the execution.[91] When the clerk enters a judgment, leaving blanks for the amount of damages and costs, the case being one where such amount can be ascertained by mere calculation, the court has power to order the blanks to be filled up at the next term, the clerk having died during the session;[92] or if the clerk himself fills up the blanks, after the lapse of more than a year from the judgment, his doing so will not invalidate the judgment so far as to expose it to collateral impeachment, although it may be ground for a writ of error.[93] Another question arises in the case of a judgment where a blank is left for the costs alone. Undoubtedly the judgment is not perfect until this blank is filled. But it is held that the record of a judgment which is regular in all respects, except that the costs are left blank until they are taxed by the court, and then inserted, is admissible in evidence in an action of debt on that judgment.[94] A distinction is taken, in one of the recent cases, which we believe to be well founded. It is held that as respects the lien or the validity of a judgment informally entered and docketed without the taxation and insertion of costs therein, the omission is to be treated as a mere irregularity; but for the purposes of an appeal, the prevailing party, seeking to limit the rights of his adversary, is to be held to strict practice, and the judgment is not to be deemed perfected until the costs to which he is entitled are duly taxed and inserted in the judgment.[95]

All judgments rendered in this country should be expressed in the American denominations of money. A judgment given by the court for a certain amount in francs is therefore erroneous, and will be amended on appeal so as to express the amount in dollars and cents.[96] It has sometimes been made a question whether the statement of the amount of a judgment in figures merely, instead of the sum being written out, would impair its validity. There are cases which hold a judgment so expressed to be defective to the point of invalidity.[97] Other authorities seem reluctant to admit that this alone would absolutely avoid the judgment so as to render it open to collateral attack.[98] While the practice is undoubtedly loose and irregular, it is difficult to see in it any sufficient ground for considering the judgment entirely void. If the amount of recovery stated in figures in a judgment differs from that stated in writing, but the recitals in the judgment itself show the former to be the true amount, the error is not sufficient cause for the reversal of the judgment.[99] If the amount of the judgment is written out, the designation "dollars" (or "cents," or both, as the case may be) must be appended to it. Thus a judgment for "four hundred and sixty-one and 53–100 damages" is not for any sum of money and is therefore a nullity.[100] But it has also been held, and by a very high authority, that the omission of the word "dollars" in a verdict for the plaintiff in an action of assumpsit does not affect the validity of a judgment entered thereon according to the manifest intent of the jury.[101] If the amount of the judgment is expressed in figures, the dollar-mark, or some other appropriate sign must be used to show the sum intended. The necessity for a statement of this kind arises from the loose manner of keeping the records of tax-judgments which formerly prevailed in some of the states, and was often brought to the notice of the courts. The rule is that a judgment for taxes is fatally defective if it does not show the amount of the tax for which it was rendered; and the use of numerals simply, without any words, marks, or signs to indicate that they stand for money, and for what denominations of money, is not sufficient.[102]

This rule governs also in case of a judgment for a special assessment.[103] It may be conceded, however, that the use of the dollar-mark is not indispensable, if the amount can be indicated with certainty by any other device or contrivance.[104]

An entry of judgment for the right sum, but inaccurately named "damages" instead of "debt,"—or so much debt and so much damages,—is not reversible error.[105] And where the record of a judgment does not show of what the judgment was made up, it is competent to show that fact by extraneous evidence.[106]

§ 119. Conditions in Judgment.

In an ordinary action at law, the court cannot render a conditional judgment.[107] But "when a judgment is recovered according to the terms and conditions of a written obligation for the payment of money, and those terms and conditions expressly either limit the lien of any judgment which may be recovered upon it, or waive

This decision was declared to be consistent with Tidd v. Rines, 26 Minn. 201, 2 N. the benefit of all laws exempting property from levy and sale on any execution, or waive the right of inquisition upon the delinquent's real estate, and in the entry of the judgment this is set forth upon the docket, it must be held to be a part of the record of the judgment," and therefore will affect subsequent purchasers.[108] But a judgment on an ordinary promissory note, though given for the purchase-money of real estate, should not contain provisions declaring it a lien on such real estate and ordering that the same be sold to satisfy it. It should be an ordinary personal judgment against the defendant, authorizing an ordinary execution to be issued against the property in general of the debtor.[109] In an action of replevin, where the plaintiff obtains possession of the property and retains the same, and is in possession of the property at the time the judgment is rendered, it is neither necessary nor proper to render a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the value of the property in case a return thereof cannot be had.[110] As a general rule, a judgment has properly nothing to do with the means of its enforcement; it merely pronounces the sentence of the law upon the facts ascertained in the case.

§ 120. Joint Defendants.

At the common law, it was an inflexible rule that if an action was brought against two or more defendants jointly, the plaintiff could have judgment only against all of them or none of them; the single exception being in the case where one of the defendants succeeded in establishing a defense, such as his personal disability, peculiar to himself. If one defendant suffered default, no final judgment could be given against him, as we have already stated,[111] until the case was disposed of as to the others, and not even then unless the verdict was in the plaintiff's favor. Under this practice, therefore, it was error to give judgment against one of the defendants sued without disposing of the suit as to the other defendant; a final conclusion must be reached as to all of them, one way or the other, at the same time.[112] But now it is provided by statute in some of the states that "in an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper."[113] In a case where this law was to be applied, the court said: "As no order was made as to the other defendant, the action is still pending against him, and the court had a right to render a judgment against one, and continue the action as to the other; although no order of continuance seems to have been entered, yet the action stood continued by operation of law."[114]

§ 121. Time of entering Judgment.

By the rule of the common law, if a judgment was not stayed by a motion in arrest, or for a new trial, or other appropriate proceeding, within the first four days of the next term after the trial, it was then to be entered upon the roll or record. Statutes fixing the time of entering a judgment upon verdict exist in some of the states, and require notice in this connection. Thus the New York Code prescribes the lapse of four days after the verdict before the rendition of judgment; but it is held that judgment may be entered upon the verdict immediately, and relief may be had against the verdict within four days afterward, if there be ground for it, notwithstanding the judgment.[115] But the case is different under a statute which declares that judgments on the decision of the court may be entered "after the expiration of four days from the filing of the decision and the service upon the attorney of the adverse party of a copy thereof, but not before." Here, it is held, four full calendar days must elapse after the filing of a decision and notice thereof before judgment can be properly entered; and here the rule of interpretation which, in computing time, excludes the first and includes the last day, has no application, the provision being clear and explicit.[116] In Pennsylvania, a law requires[117] that judgment shall not be entered on the report of a referee until after the expiration of thirty days. But in a case where the prothonotary entered a judgment on the same day on which the report was filed, it was considered that this should not, on error, be treated as material, where it appeared that exceptions to the report were subsequently filed and acted upon, and no attention paid to the mistake.[118] On the other hand, the California Code provides that "when trial by jury has been had, judgment must be entered by the clerk, in conformity to the verdict, within twenty-four hours after the rendition of the verdict, unless the court order the case to be reserved for argument or further consideration, or grant a stay of proceedings."[119] But the failure of the clerk to enter judgment within the prescribed time does not, according to the authorities, affect the validity of the judgment afterwards entered; for the injunction of the statute is merely directory and not mandatory.[120] And reading this statute in connection with another law, which provides, as a penalty, that the action shall be dismissed when the judgment is not entered within six months after verdict, it is held that the court does not lose jurisdiction of the cause if judgment is entered within six months after the verdict is rendered.[121] In other states it appears to be required that the judgment be entered at the same term at which the verdict is returned. But the cases rule that if this is omitted, it is competent for the court to enter the judgment at a subsequent term, both parties appearing and being heard.[122]

Rules of the former class—those requiring a certain time to intervene between verdict and judgment—probably obtain in a majority of the states, either by statute or as the settled practice of the courts. Their design is to afford the parties an opportunity of proceeding against the verdict, either by a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, motion in arrest, or motion for new trial, as the case may be. But since the right of a party so to move will not be prejudiced by a premature entry of judgment,[123] and since the judgment itself can be stayed or set aside as well as the verdict, while, on the other hand, it is the right of the prevailing party to have his rights fixed by a judgment as soon as he is entitled to it, it is conducive to justice not to regard a judgment entered in advance of the time as entirely invalid, but to consider the rule as merely directory.

In some jurisdictions, while judgment may be entered immediately upon the verdict, the court may stay the proceedings for a certain number of days, for the purpose of giving time for a motion for new trial. Where this is done, and judgment is entered up before the expiration of the stay, still it is not void. The judgment is only provisional, and it does not deprive the losing party of the right so to move.[124] And even where it appeared that judgment was entered up while a motion for a new trial was actually on file, which motion was afterwards overruled, and all the proceedings occurred at the same term of court, it was held that the fact that judgment was so entered was no ground for reversing the decision on the motion.[125]

§ 122. Date of the Judgment.

The rule of the common law was, that all judgments were presumed to have been rendered on the first day of the term, unless the contrary appeared. And it is also a part of the English practice to consider all judicial proceedings as taking place at the earliest period of the day on which they are done.[126] It is still the rule, in some of the American states, that all judgments docketed during the term shall be deemed to be docketed on the first day of the term; and this, it is held, makes them relate to the first day even where the judge fails to open court on that day.[127] But in some other states, principally in New England, an exactly opposite rule is in force, and a judgment is regarded as rendered on the last day of the term, unless the contrary is shown.[128] But in a majority of the states, a judgment takes effect from the day it is actually rendered or entered.[129] "The term of the court is not with us regarded as one day, and though until the term expires the orders made and judgments rendered are largely under the control of the court, and may be altered, modified, or vacated, yet they have been generally regarded as taking effect from the day on which they were made or rendered, subject to the power of the court, and not from the day the term closes."[130] And the date of a judgment may be fixed by reference to the record of the proceedings in the case.[131] We shall have occasion to discuss this topic more fully in connection with the subject of priority among judgment-liens.[132]

The rule for the construction of ambiguous judgments is clearly stated by the supreme court of Kansas in the following language: "Wherever the entry of a judgment is so obscure as not to clearly express the exact determination of the court, reference may be had to the pleadings and the other proceedings; and if, with the light thus thrown upon such entry, its obscurity is dispelled and its intended signification made apparent, the judgment will be upheld and carried into effect in the same manner as though its meaning and intent were made clear and manifest by its own terms."[133] This rule also applies to decrees in equity. The meaning and effect of a decree may, in case of doubt, be ascertained by reference to the bill and other proceedings, particularly when these are referred to in the decree itself.[134] And for this purpose, recourse may be had to duly attested stipulations between the parties.[135] But where a judgment refers to the findings for certain data, and the findings do not contain the data, but refer again to the pleadings, which are also uncertain, the judgment will be reversed for uncertainty.[136] A mistake apparent on the face of a judgment, amounting to an impossibility, will not destroy the judgment, if enough remains, after it is corrected or eliminated, to disclose the actual judgment rendered. Thus, where a judgment entry recites a demurrer (sustained) as having been interposed by the defendant to his own plea, the appellate court will intend the recital to have been a clerical mistake and that it was the plaintiff who demurred.[137] But a judgment must follow the verdict; and in a case where the jury returned two verdicts, as follows: "We the jury find for the plaintiff and assess his damages in the sum of $800," and, "We the jury find for the defendant on the counterclaim and set-off and assess the damages in the sum of $300," it was held to be error in the court to overrule a motion for a venire de novo, and render judgment for the plaintiff for $500.[138] The presumption in support of the judgment extends to inferring the presence of the plaintiff in court, for the purpose of an act which he only could perform, although the entry only recites the presence of his attorney.[139]

§ 124. The Judgment-Roll, or Record.

It seems appropriate, in this connection, to give some account of the judgment-roll or record of the judgment. At common law the judgment-roll was a roll of parchment upon which all the proceedings in the cause, up to the issue, and the award of venire inclusive, together with the judgment which the court awarded in the cause, were entered. It included as well the pleadings and process as the signing of judgment.[140] In our modern practice, the proceedings are not thus transcribed, although in some states they are required to be copied with more or less detail into books kept for that purpose, and in others a "judgment-roll," consisting of the writ, pleadings, and other papers in the cause, must be on file when the clerk enters judgment. And for the purpose of an appeal, or other similar use, the "record" comprises a full copy of all the papers and proceedings in the cause. The following account of the practice obtaining in Illinois will be found applicable in many of the states. "Under our practice, while the pleadings, process, etc., are not, as at common law, required to be copied on a parchment roll, nor in the record book in which final judgment is entered, they are required to be filed in the office of the clerk; and when a copy of the record of the judgment is required, for the purpose of bringing the case by appeal or writ of error into this court, or bringing suit upon it in another state, or as evidence under an issue of nul tiel record, or to establish a former adjudication of the same subject-matter between the same parties, and indeed in all cases where it is essential to have a complete record of a judgment, the pleadings and process are an indispensable part of it. And the general rule is, that where the copy of a record of a judgment is required, it must be of the whole record, so that the court may determine the legal effect of the whole of it, which may be quite different from that of a part." [141] In Massachusetts, the clerk's docket is the record of the court, until the record is fully extended, and every entry upon it is the statement of an act of the court, which is presumed to be made by its direction, in pursuance either of an order for the particular entry, or of a general order, or of a general usage pre-supposing such an order.[142] A record, it will be remembered, imports absolute verity, must be tried by itself, and cannot be contradicted.[143] or an examined copy thereof, is the only evidence of them that will be admitted." And see Steph. Pl. 24.

§ 125. Supplying Lost Records.

The power of supplying a new record, where the original has been lost or destroyed, is one which pertains to courts of general jurisdiction independent of legislation, and if the statute also confers a power, and prescribes a practice, in that behalf, it does not merge the inherent authority of the courts.[144] Hence if, for example, the notice of a motion for leave to substitute a new record is explicit in describing a judgment and papers alleged to be lost, it is sufficient, although it does not conform to a statute which provides for such a proceeding.[145] The destruction of the record book in which judgments are written, does not destroy the judgment-debts, and though the judgments are wrongfully restored by the court without notice to the debtors, yet when the judgments are revived by scire facias with notice to the debtors, they should make their objection by plea of nul tiel record.[146] On a motion to supply a lost record, the proper practice is as follows. The notice of the motion must specify when the motion will be made, and must contain a copy of that which the plaintiff will move the court to enroll as the substance of the lost record, and the defendant must have reasonable personal service of the notice, and also of the affidavits by which it will be supported, which affidavits may be controverted by counter-affidavits. If the court, on hearing the affidavits, is fully satisfied of the loss or destruction of the original record and of the correctness of

and by the production of the original papers in the case, verified by the testimony of the magistrate, if these, taken together, show clearly all the essential particulars of a valid judgment, and no extended record has been made. McGrath v. Seagrave, 2 Allen, 443, 79 Am. Dec. 797.

the proposed substitute, it will order the substitute to stand enrolled as and for the original.[147] The application must be made to the court in which the record originally remained. The courts of chancery will not entertain jurisdiction of a bill to restore to the judgment-creditor the benefit of his judgment, for the reason that there is an adequate remedy at law, by motion in the court in which the judgment was rendered.[148] "The inherent power of courts to control their own records, and to supply losses therein, is antagonistic to the power of any other court to interfere and make records for them. By this proceeding, one court of special jurisdiction is invoked to take cognizance of, and to supply to another court of general jurisdiction, a record, in lieu of one which has been destroyed. This power, once admitted, will place the records of the courts of common law at the mercy of the court of chancery, and might lead to absurd conflict between the law and equity side of the court over the records of the common law. * * * There is nothing here requiring the exercise of the conscience of the court which may not be attained by a simple proceeding, according to the course of the common law, and therefore chancery has no office to perform." [149]

§ 125a. Entry of Judgments in Federal Courts.

An act of congress provides that "the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil cases, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts [of the United States], shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding." circuit and district courts, in actions at law, to be entered and recorded in the same manner as those of the courts of the state wherein such United States courts sit.[151] Thus, if the state practice authorizes the entry of a judgment upon the report of a referee, without any application to the court, no application will be considered necessary in an action in a federal court in such state.[152] But a state law requiring a judge to give his decision in writing upon every issue made by the pleadings is not binding on the federal courts.[153]

§ 126. Origin and Nature of the Power.

The phrase "nunc pro tunc," "now for then," is used to indicate that something which was omitted to be done at the proper time is afterwards performed with a retroactive effect; that is, it is to have the same force and virtue, and be attended by the same consequences as if it had been regularly done. In relation to judicial proceedings, the performance of acts nunc pro tunc may take place in the various stages of the progress of a suit, and instances are not uncommon of affidavits or other papers filed in this manner. But in this connection we are only concerned with the entry and the amendment of judgments nunc pro tunc, and in this chapter only with the former. The power of the courts, whether of law or equity, to make entries of judgments or decrees nunc pro tunc, in proper cases and in furtherance of the interests of justice, is one which has been recognized and exercised from ancient times, and as a part of their common law jurisdiction.[1] This power therefore does not depend upon statute;

it is inherent.[2] It rests partly upon the right and duty of the courts to do entire justice to every suitor, and partly upon their control over their own records and authority to make them speak the truth. When a judgment is allowed to be thus entered in order that the party may not suffer for what has transpired during a delay caused by the court, it exhibits a practical application of the maxim "Actus curiæ neminem gravabit." But the authority is much wider than this, and the power must not be confounded with the illustration of it. The cases calling for the exercise of this power of the courts are chiefly of two kinds; first, where no judgment was actually rendered, although one might or ought to have been; second, where a judgment was actually rendered, but never entered or put upon the records. We shall first consider the former class of cases.

§ 127. Delay by Act of the Court.

In any instance where a party has brought his case to trial and proceeded to present it on the merits and submit the decision, and before any judgment is rendered one of the parties dies, the court, in order that the time consumed by it in deliberation, without laches of the party who was successful in the suit, may not operate to his disadvantage, will not allow the action to abate, but instead will enter judgment nunc pro tunc, as of the time of the submission.[3] Or, if justice so require, the judgment may be entered as of the day in the term when the last of the evidence was submitted.[4] And a judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc against one of several defendants, as well as against a sole defendant, when death takes place after verdict and before judgment.[5] The same practice obtains, under the same conditions, in chancery. Thus, a party in interest having died since the argument and before the signing of a decree, the decree and orders in the cause should be signed and filed as of the date of the argument.[6] The case may also be put in an irregular position by reason of the death of the plaintiff after a verdict. And here also the salutary power of giving judgment retrospectively may be invoked. By the common law practice, since the delay of the court must not be allowed to prejudice the parties, if the plaintiff die during the time the case is under advisement, judgment will be entered for him nunc pro tunc as of the time of the return of the postea.[7] But in English practice (and probably the rule is general) the power so to enter judgment does not extend to suits in tort.[8] But it is not only the death of a party that will justify the exercise of this power. It may be employed to overreach any event happening while the case is in the hands of the court, and which would otherwise

rob the successful suitor of his judgment.[9] Thus, in a case in Massachusetts, where the action was upon a statute which was afterwards repealed, but before the repealing statute went into operation the action was tried and verdict rendered for the plaintiff, and questions of law were reserved, which, after the repeal took effect, were decided in favor of the plaintiff, the court ordered judgment to be entered on the verdict as of a day previous to the going into operation of the repealing act.[10]

§ 128. Delay by Motions or Appeal.

The principle that a party shall not be prejudiced by the act of the court, or the delay incident to legal proceedings, applies equally where the successful litigant finds his progress obstructed, after verdict, by the pendency of a motion or appeal, during which his adversary dies. Hence, where the defendant, after a verdict is given against him, moves for a new trial, and dies before the decision of the motion, and the motion is subsequently overruled, the judgment may be entered up for the plaintiff, nunc pro tunc, as of the term when the verdict was returned.[11] And conversely, if a verdict be found for the plaintiff, and a motion is made in arrest of judgment, during the pendency of which the plaintiff dies, the judgment will be entered, the motion being denied, as of the day of the verdict, or as of a term after the verdict when the plaintiff was still alive; and in such a case, it is held, it makes no difference whether the cause of action would or would not survive.[12] So also if the plaintiff dies during the pendency of a motion, and the motion is subsequently decided

[9] The general principle is that, whenever delay in entering a judgment is caused by the action of the court, judgment nunc pro tunc will be allowed as of the time when the party would otherwise have been entitled to it, if justice requires it. in favor of the defendant, the latter may enter up his judgment as of a term before the decease of the plaintiff.[13] Where an appeal has been taken, and one of the parties dies before hearing in the appellate court, the proper practice is to affirm or reverse the judgment below nunc pro tunc.[14] So in a case where the cause was transferred for consideration by the court in banc, upon exceptions taken by the defendant, and while it was there pending the defendant died, and afterwards the exceptions were overruled, it was held that the plaintiff should have judgment as of the term when the verdict was rendered.[15] Where an appeal is taken and final judgment not entered, and the appeal is afterwards withdrawn or set aside for irregularity, the judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc on the verdict.[16] And in a case in the supreme court of the United States, where the appellee died after the argument of a motion to dismiss the appeal, the order on the motion was entered nunc pro tunc as of the day of the argument.[17]

§ 129. Laches of Party.

If a delay in the entering of a judgment, after verdict or submission, is not attributable to the act of the court in holding the case under advisement, or the pendency of a motion or other interruption, but is caused by the laches of the party entitled to judgment, and during the interval a party dies, judgment nunc pro tunc will not be allowed.[18] There is, of course, no room here for the application of the maxim above quoted, and the ends of justice do not require that the law should restore to a party an advantage which he may have lost through his own negligence or hesitation.

§ 130. Supplying Entry of Judgment.

We come now to the second class of cases mentioned above—those where a judgment was actually rendered by the court, but was never put upon the records. And the rule is, that in any case where the court did actually render a formal judgment, but the same has not been entered on the record, in consequence of any accident or mistake, or through the neglect or misprision of the clerk, the court has power to order that the judgment once pronounced be entered nunc pro tunc, upon the production of proper evidence to establish the fact of the judgment and to show its terms and character and the relief granted; and this may be done after the expiration of the term at which the judgment was originally given.[19] Thus, where, on a plea of nul tiel record, the court decided that there was such a record, but in consequence of the mistake of the prothonotary judgment was omitted to be entered, after which the defendant died, it was held that the court might, in order to do justice, enter judgment as of the time when it ought to have been entered, although nearly eight years had elapsed, provided third persons were not injured thereby.[20] The rule applies equally to cases of judgment by confession,[21] and to judgments by default.[22] It may be invoked in proceedings in a probate court,[23] and in actions for divorce,[24] as well as in other cases. And its application is not confined to final judgments, but extends also to orders of the court. Entry of an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition may be thus supplied;[25] and, generally speaking, if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that any given order was actually made at a former term and omitted to be entered by the clerk, it may, at any term, direct such order to be entered on the record as of the term when it was made.[26]

"That a court has a right, at a term subsequent to one at which a judgment is rendered, to correct, by an order nunc pro tunc, a clerical error or omission in the original entry, is indisputable. The error, whether of commission or omission, must appear from the record of the proceedings in which the entry of judgment is made."[27] Thus a judgment is not rendered void by an omission to sign it, but may be amended, even after the lapse of ten years, by an order to supply the proper signature nunc pro tunc.[28] And even during the pendency of an appeal a judgment may be amended nunc pro tunc, in respect, for example, to proof of acknowledgment of service of process and to the waiver of exemptions, at a subsequent term of the trial court, and when properly certified to the appellate court, the amendment is before such court for consideration, and will relate back and sustain the judgment.[29] When the clerk is ordered by the court at a subsequent term to supply a clerical omission in the record of a judgment by an entry nunc pro tunc, the proper course for him to pursue would be to enter anew in the proceedings of that term the entire judgment as corrected; and the action of the clerk in supplying the omitted part of the judgment, by an interlineation in the record of the preceding term, is considered as loose, irregular, and reprehensible. Nevertheless such improprieties of the clerk would probably not have the effect of rendering the judgment a nullity.[30]

§ 132. Not a proper Means of changing or revising the Judgment.

The power of courts to order the entry of judgments nunc pro tunc is not to be used for the purpose of correcting errors, omissions, or mistakes of the court; it cannot direct a proper judgment to be thus entered when the fault is that the first judgment is one which should not have been entered in the case, or is imperfect or improper.[31] The object and effect of an amendment nunc pro tunc of a judgment is to furnish proper evidence of acts properly done by the court, but not properly exhibited by its record; and such evidence is furnished in this manner, for the purpose of supporting those acts which, although the proper consequences of a judgment, would seem to be irregular and void because there was no proper evidence of a judgment.[32] Hence the court cannot at a subsequent term change its judgment to one which it neither rendered nor intended to render;[33] nor supply an order which it might or ought to have

The failure of a court to act does not authorize the entry of a nunc pro tunc order or judgment. If no order or judgment was in fact rendered, the court cannot treat such defect as a clerical error. But when it is clear that an order or judgment was in fact rendered, but was not entered upon the journal through the inadvertence or negligence of the clerk, the court has authority to order it to be supplied. In such a case, the record is merely amended by inserting in the memorial of the proceedings of the court that which has been omitted therefrom." Maxwell, J., in Garrison v. People, 6 Neb. 274, 281.

made, but wholly omitted to make.[34] Nor can such an entry be made by the court for the purpose of reversing its action in respect to what it formerly refused to do or assent to.[35] Yet the cases hold that if, in an action by two or more plaintiffs, or against two or more defendants, judgment has been mistakenly entered for one plaintiff only, or against one defendant only, as the case may be, a proper judgment nunc pro tunc may be subsequently entered, without notice, if the record furnishes sufficient ground.[36]

§ 133. Only proper when Final Judgment could be entered.

The rule that a judgment may be entered nunc pro tunc, when such action is necessary in order to save a party from being unjustly prejudiced by a delay caused by the act of the court or the course of legal procedure, must be taken with an important restriction, viz., that such an entry is not proper unless the case was in such a condition, at the date to which the judgment is to relate back, that a final judgment could then have been entered immediately. If it were otherwise, the death of one's adversary, for example, might operate to one's positive advantage. But this is not the object of the practice. It is intended merely to secure that one shall not suffer for an event which he could not avoid. As it has been said, "a judgment nunc pro tunc in case of death is proper only when a party dies after hearing, while the case is under advisement, or after the case has proceeded so far that judgment can be entered, if not as a merely formal act, at least without the need of further inquiry or evidence into matters of fact involved in the controversy." [37] Hence if there is no verdict in the record, the court cannot at a subsequent term order a verdict and judgment to be entered nunc pro tunc; if the record does not show that a verdict was rendered, it cannot be supplied at a subsequent term of the court.[38]

§ 134. Notice of Application.

In Alabama it is the settled practice of the courts that a judgment nunc pro tunc may be entered at a subsequent term without notice to the opposite party, if there is any order or memorandum of record to warrant the entry.[39] In New York, also, it is held that an entry of judgment nunc pro tunc may be ordered without notice, and an improper notice is a mere irregularity, not a fatal defect.[40] But in some other states the view holds, that although a judgment may be entered on a verdict without notice, yet an application to amend a judgment after the term at which it was rendered, must be made upon notice to the adverse party.[41] In general, we may say that the necessity of notice of such an application must depend upon the sources which are to furnish the evidence of the judgment to be entered. If the examination is to be confined to the records, the presence of the defendant could not affect the result, nor would he have room to contest it. But if it is to be based on extraneous proof, it is but just that he should have the opportunity to prepare countervailing testimony.

It is held in several of the states that the evidence which will justify the court in entering a judgment nunc pro tunc must be record evidence; that is, that such entry can only be made upon the production of some note, entry, or memorandum from the records or quasi records of the court, which shows in itself, without the aid of parol evidence, that the alleged judgment was rendered, and what were its character and terms.[42] "We think," said the court in Alabama, "that no judgment can be amended, or one rendered nunc pro tunc, unless such amendment or rendition of judgment be authorized by matter of record, or by some entry made by or under the authority of the court, which entry must be shown by the record of the cause, or at the least by some book belonging to the office of the court and required to be there kept by law."[43] It is somewhat difficult to ascertain from the authorities what will be considered record evidence for this purpose. But it is held that the entry may be based on the judge's minutes or the clerk's entries, or some paper on file in the case, but cannot be made upon the judge's recollection of what took place at the trial or upon outside evidence.[44] So entries on the court and bar docket, which are quasi records, are admissible evidence; and a recital in the amending judgment that the court "is of opinion" from an inspection of said docket, etc., is equivalent to an averment that the court deemed the evidence satisfactory, and is sufficient to sustain the amendment, unless the entries themselves are shown to be insufficient.[45] And where an order approving the report of commissioners in partition, although informal, taken in connection with the report itself, affords sufficient data, there is no error in the entry at a subsequent term of a judgment nunc pro tunc ratifying and giving effect to the report.[46] So a memorandum written by the presiding judge across a motion entered on the motion-docket will authorize a nunc pro tunc order.[47]

On the other hand there are numerous cases which hold that an entry nunc pro tunc may be ordered on any evidence that is sufficient and satisfactory, whether it be parol or otherwise.[48] But the general balance of authority seems to be with the cases holding that so far as concerns the question whether a judgment was ever rendered, that fact must be established by record evidence and cannot be proved by parol,—a rule which, if conservative, is also entirely safe. Thus, when a case stands on the docket as not disposed of, and no entry on the papers or elsewhere is produced indicating any disposition of it, a final judgment cannot be entered nunc pro tunc on parol testimony alone, unaided by the judge's recollection, especially where counsel for one of the parties denies on oath all knowledge of the alleged judgment, and there is no positive affirmative evidence but that of the adverse counsel.[49] But when the fact that a judgment was formerly rendered is established by record evidence, it seems entirely reasonable to admit parol proof for the purpose of showing its date, character, and terms, and the relief granted. And it is so held by many respectable authorities.[50] In order to entitle a party to have a judgment entered on the minutes nunc pro tunc, he must show when it was rendered; certainly at what term of the court, if not on what day of the term.[51]

§ 136. Relation back of Order.

A nunc pro tunc entry of judgment is made as of the time the proceedings of the court actually took place, and becomes a part of the entry of that date the same as if entered then.[52] Hence the entry, by its relation back, will cure any variance between the judgment as originally (defectively) entered and the execution issued thereon.[53] "There can be no doubt that such an entry may operate so as to save proceedings which have been had before it is made. For instance, a judgment is actually made at one term, but through mistake or negligence is not entered of record. Subsequent to the term, the plaintiff, under the impression that the business had all been correctly transacted, prays out execution. The property of the judgment-debtor is levied upon and sold to a bona fide purchaser, who parts with his money in good faith. In such case the court may with propriety enter a judgment, to be considered of the term in which it was actually rendered and should have been entered. Such proceedings should be for the furtherance of justice. It would do no injury to the parties concerned, and would secure the rights of an innocent purchaser." [54] But it is held that for the purpose of a statute of limitations, the date of the entry of a judgment nunc pro tunc is the date of the order of such entry, and not the day as of which the judgment is ordered to take effect.[55]

§ 137. Effect upon Third Persons.

When a judgment is entered nunc pro tunc, its effect, so far as it operates by relation back to the earlier date, must be confined to the rights and interests of the original parties; at least it will not be allowed to work detriment to the rights of innocent third persons acquiring interests without notice of the rendition of any judgment.[56] Thus a purchaser of real estate takes it charged with the lien of only such judgments as are actually existing at the time of the purchase, and it is not competent for a court to bind by a lien the land of a third person by the rendition of a nunc pro tunc judgment against his grantor.[57] So an entry nunc pro tunc of a probate decree of insolvency of the estate of a decedent takes effect, as against claims filed by creditors thereof, from the date of actual entry.[58] In order that such an entry of judgment may bind a person who is not a party thereto (such as a surety in a supersedeas bond given on appeal

AMOUNT AND CHARACTER OF RELIEF GRANTED.

§ 138. Amount greater than Plaintiff's Demand.

149. Statutory Damages.
150. Designation of Amount.
151. Judgment designating Medium of Payment.
152. Judgment for Coined Money.

§ 138. Amount greater than Plaintiff's Demand.

Since judgments are usually rendered for a definite sum of money, and are intended either to enforce the payment of a legal debt, or to establish the existence of a legal right and give compensation for its infraction by an award of damages, it becomes important in this connection to consider the amount and character of the relief which may be granted, the mode of its ascertainment, and the question of designating the medium of payment. These matters will constitute the subject of the present chapter. And first, it is an undisputed rule that if a judgment be rendered for a greater sum, whether by way of debt or damages, than is laid in the ad damnum clause, or claimed in the declaration, petition, or complaint, or notified to the defendant by the demand in the summons, then the judgment will be erroneous and liable to reversal.[1] Thus, where a complaint contains two paragraphs, and there is a special finding of facts by the court, and the facts found support all the material allegations of one of the paragraphs, but not of the other, judgment must be rendered as upon the paragraph that is supported by the findings, and it cannot be for an amount greater than is claimed therein to be due.[2] Nor is the application of this rule confined to contested actions. It is equally true, in cases where the defendant suffers a default, that a judgment for more than the plaintiff has claimed is erroneous, and may be set aside, modified on motion, or reversed on appeal.[3] And a judgment for a greater sum than that laid in the declaration cannot stand, even though the defendant confesses judgment for the larger amount.[4] Nor will the defendant's withdrawal of his pleas authorize or sustain a judgment for a sum in excess of that warranted by the cause of action stated in the petition.[5] But it must be

It is immaterial that the evidence may prove a greater debt, or a greater amount of damage, than was alleged by the plaintiff in his declaration. Denison v. Lewis, 5 App. D. C. 328; Cauthorn v. Berry, 69 Mo. App. 404; Lister v. Vowell, 122 Ala. 264, 25 South. 564. And where the declaration specially alleges the items of damage, in precise and definite sums, there can be no greater recovery than their aggregate, notwithstanding that the ad damnum clause claims a greater amount in a lump sum. Kerry v. Pacific Marine Co., 121 Cal. 564, 54 Pac. 89, 66 Am. St. Rep. 65. But in Indiana, it appears that, where the complaint demands a money judgment in a specified sum, and defendant has answered, judgment may be rendered for a greater sum than that demanded, should the case justify it. observed that a judgment so rendered for an excessive amount is not void.[6] Relief may be had against it, or it may be corrected or set aside, in any appropriate mode; nevertheless it is not a mere nullity. Consequently it will stand as a valid adjudication until the proper steps are taken against it, and will be binding upon the parties and not open to collateral attack. And where this is the only error in the judgment, it may be rectified without the necessity of entirely vacating it. For if a judgment is entered for too great an amount, it may be reformed by remitting the excess.[7] Again, if the plaintiff amends his petition, and issue is joined thereon, his recovery will not be limited to the amount claimed in the original petition.[8] Or, in proper cases, the complaint will be deemed to have been amended so as to demand judgment for the amount actually recovered.[9] It also appears that it is not error to render judgment for an amount of damages exceeding the ad damnum in the writ, after the action, together with other claims of the plaintiff against the defendant, has been referred to arbitrators under a rule of court.[10] It should also be remarked that the rule prohibiting a judgment for a greater sum than that demanded by the plaintiff does not apply to the addition of costs to the amount of the recovery, though the total may exceed the ad damnum,[11] but it does prevent the addition of attorneys' fees in excess of the sum claimed in the complaint.[12]

nitely fixed by the contract or other instrument on which he sues, a final judgment may at once be entered, upon the defendant's default, for such amount; and that the same is true if the amount can be ascertained by a matter of simple calculation. But in other cases, an interlocutory judgment must first be entered, fixing the plaintiff's right to recover, and then the damages assessed by a writ of inquiry or some other proper method.[13] It is therefore erroneous for the court, in an action on an unliquidated claim, to proceed to render final judgment for a specific sum, without the preliminary assessment of damages.[14] And in an action on an open account, in which the defendant was defaulted, the judgment will be set aside if the record does not disclose in what manner and upon what proofs the amount of the judgment was ascertained.[15]

§ 140. Amount indorsed on Summons.

In some of the states, where the code practice is established, it is required by law that in all civil actions for the recovery of money only, the amount for which judgment will be taken, if the defendant fails to appear, shall be indorsed on the summons. When such indorsement is made, the defendant has a right to rely upon it as fixing a limit beyond which the court cannot go in rendering judgment, in case he chooses to make no appearance in the action, and it is error to exceed it.[16]

§ 141. Prayer for Relief as Measure of Recovery.

According to the settled practice in equity, the rule in regard to decrees is similar to that just stated as governing judgments at law, viz., that it is error to decree relief not sought in the bill. In other words, if the complainant has prayed for specific relief in the premises, or relief as to a specific subject-matter, no more extensive relief can properly be accorded to him.[17] But it is usual to join with the demand for specific relief a prayer for general relief also, and where this is done, the court is not limited, in its dealing with the matters in litigation, to the orders or decrees particularly asked for, but may take such other action as may be necessary to fully adjust the equities, provided it be not inconsistent with the allegations of the bill and the facts in evidence.[18] So where there are prayers for both specific and general relief, the court, if it refuses the specific relief asked, may still grant any other appropriate relief under the general prayer.[19] But it is the settled rule in equity that a party must recover according to the case made by his bill or not at all,—secundum allegata as well as secundum probata. Hence, even under a prayer for general relief, the court cannot go outside the case made by the pleadings, and decree in favor of the plaintiff on grounds not stated in his complaint, or grant relief for matters not charged, although they may appear from other parts of the pleadings and be improperly in evidence.[20] But the fact that more extensive relief, of the same general nature, is prayed in the bill than is warranted by the proofs does not preclude giving so much as the evidence will sustain. Thus if the bill asks relief on an allegation of an abandonment of twenty-six acres of land, and the proof is that sixteen acres only were abandoned, the complainant may be relieved as to the sixteen.[21]

Under the code practice, where the forms of action are abolished, and either a legal or an equitable remedy, or both, may be prosecuted under the same method of procedure, the rules already stated will still hold good, though modified by certain statutory provisions, which we now proceed to notice. The codes generally provide that if there be no answer, the relief granted cannot exceed that which the plaintiff shall have demanded in his complaint.[22] A recent decision in California, construing the phrase "cannot exceed," holds that, in case of default, it is improper to grant the plaintiff any other relief than that prayed for.[23] Whence it would appear that if the plaintiff has mistaken his remedy, or otherwise failed to demand the relief appropriate to his case, it would be beyond the power of the court to enter the proper judgment. But this view runs counter to that held in New York, where, the language of the statute being the same, the courts say: "The relief demanded by no means necessarily characterizes the action or limits the plaintiff in respect to the remedy which he may have. If there be no answer, the relief granted cannot exceed that which the plaintiff shall have demanded in his complaint. But the fact that after the allegation of the facts relied upon the plaintiff has demanded judgment for a sum of money by way of damages does not preclude the recovery of the same amount upon the same state of facts by way of equitable relief. The relief in the two cases would be precisely the same; the difference would be formal and technical. If every fact necessary to the action is stated, the plaintiff may, even when no answer is put in, have any relief to which the facts entitled him consistent with that demanded in the complaint." [24] But under this clause, where a complaint contains no prayer for damages, a judgment on default awarding damages is erroneous, although the complaint states facts sufficient to sustain such a judgment.[25] However, under the codes, the extent of the relief to be granted by a judgment is restricted to that prayed for in the complaint only in cases where there is no answer; in all other cases any relief may be granted which is consistent with the case made by the pleadings.[26] Thus, for example, where the complaint in an action relating to land contains proper averments to entitle the plaintiffs to possession, and a general prayer for relief, and there are an appearance, trial, and finding that the plaintiffs are owners and entitled to possession, and defendant is in unlawful possession, judgment for possession is proper, though there is no specific prayer therefor.[27] So, in a case where the plaintiff, in an action to recover a street assessment, asked for a judgment against the defendant's lot but not for a personal judgment, and the court rendered judgment against the lot and also ordered that if the lot should not sell for the full amount of the plaintiff's claim, then a personal judgment for the balance should be docketed against the defendant, it was held that the action of the court was proper, it having jurisdiction of both the subject-matter and the person of the defendant.[28] Again, where the plaintiff alleges facts entitling him to both legal and equitable relief, and demands both, the court may award either that is appropriate to the case made by the proof.[29] Nevertheless this equitable power in the courts will not justify them in awarding to the plaintiff, upon a replication, an entirely different judgment from that prayed for in his petition.[30]

§ 142. Judgment must follow the Verdict.

The judgment must follow the verdict, and if the jury have found a verdict for a specified sum of money, the court cannot render judgment for any greater amount; if the verdict is wrong, the remedy is by a new trial.[31] Or a judgment entered for a sum in excess of what the verdict authorized may be reformed so as to bring it within the verdict.[32] If, on the other hand, the verdict is excessive, being for a greater amount of damages than are laid in the declaration, it is said that judgment may be given only for the amount so laid.[33] But this would appear to be adequate ground for a motion in arrest and for new trial; although it would undoubtedly be good practice to enter a remittitur for the excess and take judgment for the balance.[34] According to the practice of the United States courts, the clerk has no authority to enter judgment for any other sum than the verdict and statute (the action being statutory) call for; hence where the statute requires interest to be added to the verdict, the clerk cannot enter a judgment for the amount of the verdict without interest, even though the plaintiff waives the interest.[35]

In an action on an obligation for the payment of money, on which credits are indorsed, the judgment should be rendered for the real balance due, deducting the indorsements.[36] But where the judgment on a promissory note, on which there was a payment indorsed, was, by mistake, rendered for the amount of the note apparent on its face, without deducting the payment indorsed, it was held that this did not invalidate the judgment and render void the proceedings under an execution issued thereon, but relief must be afforded to the party injured in some other mode.[37] It is also held that payments made pending the suit are to be deducted in making up the judgment.[38] But where the plaintiff is entitled to the entire amount sued for or nothing at all, a judgment in his favor for part of such amount cannot stand.[39] and order the residue to be refunded, inasmuch as the tender admits the whole to be due.[40] The proper practice in such a case would be to set aside the verdict and enter judgment for the amount tendered, the plaintiff being entitled to that much on the pleadings.[41] If the defendant succeeds in establishing a counterclaim, judgment should of course be given in his favor, either for the whole amount or for its excess over the claims proved by the plaintiff, according as the case may be.[42] So a claim for damages for a breach of warranty, interposed by answer to a petition to recover the price of the goods, is in effect a counterclaim, and the court can render judgment for the undisputed portion of the price, and allow the action to proceed as to the sum in dispute.[43] An offer of settlement made by the plaintiff before the commencement of the action, will not preclude him from recovering a larger sum than that contemplated by his offer.[44]

§ 145. Joint Parties.

Embarrassing questions sometimes arise in regard to the amount and character of the judgment in cases where there are numerous parties on one side or the other. And first, in regard to joint plaintiffs, it is the rule that several persons having distinct claims against the same defendant cannot make one suit the vehicle for carrying all their demands into judgment. Their recovery is limited to what concerns them jointly. For instance, all persons whose property is affected by a nuisance, though they own the property in severalty and not jointly, may unite in an action to abate the nuisance; but in such action they cannot have judgment for the damages done to the property of each, but only such relief as is common to all the plaintiffs, e. g., an injunction against the nuisance.[45] Conversely, one of a class of plaintiffs cannot, in suing alone, procure an adjudication which will be binding upon all, unless the others come in as joint plaintiffs or otherwise connect themselves with the action. Thus, where only one of ten distributees sued the administrator in the probate court, it was held irregular for that court in its judgment, without making the other persons interested parties, to do more than adjudicate the rights of the plaintiff and the administrator.[46] Where proceedings are taken concurrently by several persons against the same fund, it seems they stand on an equal footing. Thus, in a Massachusetts case, where two trustee processes were served at the same time, and judgment was recovered in each for an amount greater than the sum held by the garnishee, it was considered that each of the creditors was entitled to one-half of the fund, though their claims were unequal.[47] Where several defendants are sued jointly in an action on contract, the rule at common law was that the plaintiff could only recover judgment against all or none of them. But this has been changed by statute in many of the states, so that now, in such an action, a judgment may be rendered in favor of one of the defendants and against the other, if the facts warrant it.[48] In equity, a decree between co-defendants, grounded on the pleadings and proofs between the plaintiff and defendants, is regular, and in fact the court is bound to make such a decree in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits.[49] But at law one defendant to a suit cannot ordinarily recover a judgment against a co-defendant without a cross-pleading and service of process or an appearance to the cross-pleading by the defendant thereto.[50] In New Hampshire, damages may be apportioned among several defendants by separate judgments, if justice will be promoted by such procedure.[51]

§ 146. Affirmative Relief to Defendant.

In some of the states the code provides that "if a counterclaim, established at the trial, exceed the plaintiff's demand, judgment for the defendant must be given for the excess; or if it appear that the defendant is entitled to any other affirmative relief, judgment must be given accordingly." [52] And aside from statutes of this character, courts possessing equitable powers are disposed to complete the adjudication of controversies brought before them by awarding to defendants any relief justified by the facts. In equity, a decree may be rendered in favor of a defendant where he proves to be the creditor and the plaintiff the debtor.[53] So on the foreclosure of a deed of trust, the decree directing the surplus remaining after paying the plaintiff to be paid to the co-defendant, there being no cross-bill, need not find the precise amount due such co-defendant, but only that there is due him more than the surplus.[54]

§ 147. Interest.

Accrued interest on the demand in suit is of course a legal part of the plaintiff's claim and should be included in the judgment. But a judgment for the gross sum of principal and interest made up to a certain day, with interest on such gross sum, is erroneous.[55] The statutes sometimes require that the debt and the interest shall be separately specified. This being the case, it is erroneous to enter the judgment, in an action of debt, for an aggregate sum, including the debt, interest, and damages, without distinguishing the amount of either.[56] Where, in rendering judgment by default on a demand ascertained by writing, too much interest is calculated and included in the judgment, the error will be corrected on motion, or it may be amended in the appellate court at the cost of the plaintiff in error.[57] It is immaterial that the judgment recites that the money recoverable bears interest from an erroneous date, where it appears that the amount, with interest, for which judgment is rendered does not exceed the amount for which the party complaining is legally liable.[58] In some states, the statutes provide that, when judgment is rendered upon a verdict, interest shall be computed from the date of the verdict to the time of rendering the judgment on the same, and made a part of the judgment. But a judgment is not void for uncertainty because the interest is not so computed.[59] It also appears that where the verdict, in an action on an implied contract, does not mention interest, the court cannot allow interest in entering the judgment.[60]

§ 148. Conditions as to Payment.

In certain classes of cases it is customary for the judgment to contain conditions or directions as to the time or manner of payment. Thus a judgment, directed by the court, in an action upon a contract for the sale and purchase of lands, which ascertains the amounts which will become due to the plaintiff, for principal and interest, at the several times stipulated in the contract, may further direct that, in case the same should at those periods remain unpaid, the plaintiff shall have judgments for their recovery and executions for their collection.[61] So a judgment on a bond for the payment of a debt by instalments should be for the debt in the declaration mentioned, to be discharged by payment of the sum due at the time of suit brought, reserving liberty to the plaintiff to resort to scire facias to recover such other damages as might thereafter arise upon the condition of the bond.[62] Again, in an action of covenant upon a guaranty by which the covenantor became surety for the punctual payment of the bond of another, and undertook that if the obligor made default, he would pay the mortgage mentioned in the bond, the judgment upon such default should not be that he should pay absolutely to the plaintiff the amount due, but that he should pay or cause to be paid and satisfied of record the mortgage mentioned, within thirty days from the date of the judgment, or, in the event of his not doing so, then that he pay the amount to the plaintiff.[63]

§ 149. Statutory Damages.

Where a statute imposes a penalty for the commission or omission of a certain act, the judgment, if for the plaintiff, must be for the full amount of the penalty; the courts have no power to mitigate it, for in so doing they would contravene the expressed legislative will.[64]

In cases where the statutes give double or treble damages for a certain kind of injury, the jury, if they find for the plaintiff, should increase the damages which they find by the statutory multiple; but if the verdict in terms finds only single damages, the court will perform the multiplication and direct judgment to be entered for the increased amount.[65] Under a declaration containing a count for a common law trespass and a count for the statutory trespass, where a general verdict of guilty is returned, it is not competent for the court to apply the verdict to the count under the statute, and proceed to render judgment for treble the damages returned.[66]

§ 150. Designation of Amount.

The amount of a judgment must be stated in it with certainty and precision; an incurable ambiguity in this respect will be sufficient to invalidate the judgment. But the judgment is to be construed with reference to the pleadings and other parts of the record, and if these furnish data from which the amount of the recovery can be ascertained with certainty, it is probably sufficient. All judgments rendered in this country should also be expressed in the American denominations of money; and the amount should be written out, or at least, if expressed in figures, should be accompanied by some appropriate mark or sign to indicate what denominations of money are meant.[67]

As a general rule, a judgment, being merely the sentence of the law upon the facts shown by the pleadings and proof, has nothing to do with the means or the medium of satisfying the debt which it establishes. Hence, where a suit is for a money demand, the court has no power (with exceptions to be noted in the next section), after giving judgment for the amount claimed, to specify in what kind of money it shall be paid; when the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment, the law determines how it shall be satisfied.[68] But where a promissory note was made payable "in the currency of the country but not in Confederate notes," it was held that the recovery should be for such notes as were actually in circulation at the maturity of the note, although greatly depreciated in value.[69]

§ 152. Judgment for Coined Money.

When the "legal tender act" (Act Cong. Feb. 25, 1862) first came before the supreme federal tribunal for interpretation, it was held to be unconstitutional.[70] But this decision was afterwards overruled, and the act was held to be constitutional and valid, both as applied to contracts made before its passage and as to those entered into since; and it was further decided that the treasury notes were equally a legal tender when reissued by authority as upon their original issue.[71] At the same time, the court held that the legal tender act applied only to debts which were payable in money generally, not to obligations solvable in commodities, nor to debts or contracts as to which the parties had agreed that they should be payable only in a specified kind of money. Hence, where a contract for the payment of money is by its terms made payable "in specie," "in coin," "in coined money," or "in gold coin," it cannot be satisfied by a tender in treasury notes; and when a contract so worded is put in suit, the judgment rendered upon it should specify "coined dollars" or "gold coin," or otherwise as the case may be, as the medium of its satisfaction.[72] Notwithstanding these decisions, some of the cases, refusing to accept this construction of the act, or preferring to abide by the rule that the courts have nothing to do with the manner in which a judgment or execution shall be satisfied, held that it would be entirely erroneous to enter judgment for a particular kind of money.[73] But in a majority of the states the courts have followed the lead of the federal decisions, and maintained the rule that if the contract specified gold or silver as its medium of payment, the judgment upon it must do likewise.[74] It is also held that if the contract was only solvable in coin it would be improper to render judgment for the market value of that amount of coin calculated in terms of the treasury notes; the judgment must simply be for so much gold or silver.[75] Also it is considered that interest on the debt can only be paid in coined money.[76] But the costs of the action may be paid in legal tender notes.[77] However, it is only in respect to contracts expressly stipulating for payment in coin that judgments for coin can be entered. In suits for unliquidated damages, such judgments are not permissible.[78] Nor can they be rendered in actions of tort.[79] So a person who deposited gold with a banker is only entitled to recover the amount in dollars and cents in the circulating medium of the country.[80] But a judgment on a promissory note expressed to be payable "in gold coin or its equivalent in United States legal tender notes," rendered simply for gold coin, would be erroneous. The judgment should follow the contract, fixing the amount to be paid if paid in gold, and the amount to be paid if paid in legal tender notes.[81] A condition in a note expressed to be payable in gold coin, that "if it is paid at maturity or before suit brought, it shall be payable in lawful money," does not impair the right, in case it is necessary to bring suit, to recover judgment in gold coin.[82]

In California, and perhaps some other states, the statutes provide that judgments in suits on contracts or obligations in writing for the direct payment of money may be made payable in the kind of money specified therein; and under such a law, a judgment expressed to be payable in "U. S. gold coin" is not erroneous where the note on which it is rendered is worded in the same manner.[83]

A judgment may be incorrect, imperfect, or erroneous, and therefore stand in need of revision or amendment, from either of two causes; that is, either because the entry fails to correspond with the judgment actually intended to be given, in consequence of some omission, mistake, or inadvertence; or because the judgment actually rendered was one that ought not to have been given, the error being due to misinformation or a wrong apprehension of the law. The principles of justice obviously require that what has been done amiss should be set right. But in order to secure stability to the formal and solemn records of the courts, the rules of practice have established important limitations upon the power of a court to correct or revise its own sentences. These limitations rest mainly upon a distinction which originated in the common law, and was there considered of the greatest consequence. During the whole of the term in which any judicial act was done the proceedings were considered to continue in fieri, and even after a judgment was rendered, the record was said to remain "in the breast of the judges of the court and in their remembrance," and therefore the judgment was subject to such amendment or alteration as they might direct. But after the term had passed, the record no longer remained in this nebulous condition. It was then spread at large upon the judgment-roll, and thereupon acquired an inalterable and indisputable character, passed beyond the control of the court, and admitted of no alteration, modification, or contradiction.[1] The distinction between power to act during the term and power to act after the term has survived in many points of modern practice. And in regard to the first part of the common law rule, as above stated, there can be no doubt that it still stands as sound law. The authorities all hold that a court has plenary control of its judgments, orders, and decrees during the term at which they are rendered, and may amend, correct, modify, or supplement them, for cause appearing, or may, to promote justice, revise, supersede, revoke, or vacate them, as may in its discretion seem necessary.[2] Thus an order of record setting aside a verdict may be corrected by the court at any time during the term at which it was rendered.[3] And the court may allow a judgment to be amended as to the name of a member of a firm, so as correctly to describe the firm against which the judgment is given.[4] Nor is it only in respect to clerical misprisions or omissions that this power of amendment during the term may be exercised; it also extends to the errors of the court. Thus, where a court makes an erroneous order under a mistaken view of the law, it may, during the term, of its own motion, correct the mistake by expunging such order and entering an order in accordance with the law of the case.[5] Thus, where an action was tried by the court without a jury, the judge has power, during the same term, to reduce the amount of the judgment if satisfied that it is too great.[6] So a final decree which is incorrect in regard to an item of costs, which error was caused by the court's not being correctly informed, will be corrected in that particular on motion made during the term.[7] Again, where a receiver has been ordered, by mistake, before a final settlement, to pay out more money than is liable to come into his hands as such receiver, the order may be amended and modified, either upon direct and summary proceedings, or by the court upon its own motion.[8] It is even held that the court, in a criminal action, may set aside a judgment made in regular course, imposing on the defendant a fine and the costs of the proceedings, during the same term in which the judgment was rendered, and before any part of it has been performed, and may impose a greater fine than was imposed by the first judgment.[9]

§ 154. Amendment after the Term.

That part of the common law rule which declares that no judgment can be amended after the term at which it was rendered, can scarcely be said to survive, in this country, in all its original inflexibility. Divided between the policy of administering justice liberally and equitably and the habit of ascribing the utmost sanctity to a record once completed, the courts have suffered exceptions to be introduced which are of such importance as to require the rule to be much modified before it will apply to contemporary practice. A conservative statement of the rule as at present observed, and one fully supported by the authorities, would be as follows: After the expiration of the term at which a judgment or decree was rendered, it is out of the power of the court to amend it in any matter of substance or in any matter affecting the merits.[10] It is said by the supreme court of Illinois, "The general rule is that courts, while a cause is pending and the parties before them, have control over the record and proceedings in the cause, and that they have jurisdiction over their judgments and final orders of a pending term, and may, during the term or while the cause is depending, and the parties in court, for cause appearing, amend or set them aside. But after the expiration of the term, unless the cause is still depending and the parties are in court, their power over the record is confined to errors and mistakes of their officers; and these may at any time, upon notice to the parties in interest, and saving such rights as in the interval of time may have accrued to third persons, be corrected so as to make the record conform to the action or judgment of the court." [11] In the following sections we shall endeavor to show that, beside the correction of clerical errors, the courts have power, after the term, to supply omissions in a judgment, and to reform and perfect it, so as to make it conform exactly to the judgment intended to be given in the case; but that they cannot use the power of amendment to correct judicial errors or to enter a judgment which was neither in fact rendered nor intended to be rendered. Taken with these corollaries, the rule as above stated will be found to express the common opinion of the authorities on this point at the present time.

In illustration of the rule, the proposition may be cited that, after the term, the power of the court to amend its own record is limited to such corrections or changes as are in affirmance of the judgment originally rendered; it has no authority to strike out the judgment, to enlarge or diminish it, to change its whole nature, or to render another and different judgment upon the same record.[12] So, after a judgment was rendered and the court had adjourned, it was considered that an error therein could not be cured by the entry of a remittitur of an excess of damages.[13] A decision in Virginia holds that a decree for alimony, affirmed on appeal as to the date at which payments should commence, is final, and when, in subsequent proceedings in the trial court to ascertain its amount, payment is fixed as beginning at a different date, such action is erroneous and will be reversed.[14] In California, the court has no power to amend an order made at a previous term, unless a motion was made or some proceedings instituted at such term to procure the amendment to be made and the motions or proceedings were continued, or unless the record discloses that the order as entered was not the one made by the court.[15] It follows also that a judgment cannot be expunged at

Again, after the term at which a final judgment in replevin was rendered, the court cannot amend that judgment by entering a further judgment for damages and a retorno habendo. Peterson v. a term subsequent to that of its rendition, on the ground that neither the judge's docket nor the clerk's minutes show the rendition thereof. In such case the record of the judgment imports absolute verity and cannot be assailed for the lack of such vouchers.[16] But the rule that the court has no power over its judgments after the expiration of the term, applies only to final judgments, not to judgments which are still in fieri, as an order for a partition.[17] And it appears that the rule which prevents the court from interfering with its judgments after the term does not apply to such action as may be taken in that behalf with the consent of the parties concerned, or at their request.[18] And further, a judgment may be carried over the term by motion; that is to say, if a motion to amend or correct it, or a petition for a rehearing, is filed during the term at which the judgment was rendered, its operation will be so far suspended that the matter may be heard and determined at the ensuing term.[19]

take in entering a decree, which is manifestly a clerical error, which cannot mislead, and which does not prejudice the appellant, is no ground for reversal.[21] A court may, upon motion of one party and due notice to the other, amend a docket entry by inserting the true date of the rendition of the judgment, where a wrong date appears of record.[22] So a misnomer of the term of the court in the entry of a judgment is a clerical error and amendable.[23] And the same is true of a misnomer of one of the parties,[24] or a misdescription of the property involved.[25] So also, a judgment entered against a party in a representative capacity, when it should have been against him individually, or vice versa, or a personal judgment against an executor which should have been against the goods of the estate, may be amended by other parts of the record, on motion, when the mistake is plainly that of the clerk.[26] Again, where a judgment in attachment gives the right of execution to the defendant, instead of to the plaintiff, this is manifestly a clerical error and may be corrected at a subsequent term.[27] And so also where there have been two trials of a case, and the record shows that judgment was rendered on the second verdict, but the clerk entered it for the amount of the first verdict.[28] So again, where it is shown, on motion to correct the entry of a judgment of dismissal of an action as to a party thereto, that the order was not intended or understood by either party to include a dismissal of the cause of action against such party, the error may be corrected.[29] In some states, the courts have authority, by statute to amend a judgment at any time within three years after its rendition, by the correction of any clerical error or mistake, where there is sufficient matter apparent on the record to amend by.[30] And in others, the judge in vacation may correct any miscalculation or misrecital of any sum of money in a judgment.[31]

§ 156. Supplying Omissions.

In regard to the power of amending judgments by supplying omissions, it is necessary not to lose sight of the principle that amendments can only be allowed for the purpose of making the record conform to the truth, not for the purpose of revising and changing the judgment. Hence if anything has been omitted from the judgment which is necessarily or properly a part of it, and which was intended and understood to be a part of it, but failed to be incorporated in it through the negligence or inadvertence of the court or the clerk, then the omission may be supplied by an amendment after the term.[32] If, on the other hand, the proposed addition is a mere afterthought, and formed no part of the judgment as originally intended and pronounced, it cannot be brought in by way of amendment. For example, in the entry of a final judgment against a garnishee, it is the duty of the clerk to recite the fact and the amount of the original judgment against the defendant, but his failure to do so is a clerical error which may be corrected nunc pro tunc at a subsequent term.[33] So a judgment in favor of A. "administrator" may be amended so as to show that it was recovered by A. as administrator of B., deceased.[34] The omission of the clerk's signature to a judgment filed and docketed, where that is required, may be supplied in like manner.[35] Where a decree orally announced as dismissing a bill without prejudice, is drawn and enrolled, omitting the phrase "without prejudice," these words may be afterwards supplied by amendment.[36] And in like manner, where a decree in foreclosure proceedings, by inadvertence or mistake, omits a fractional part of the land described in the mortgage and the findings, the court may amend the decree by including such land.[37] And the power of ordering amendments of this character extends as well to other parts of the record as to the judgment itself. Thus, when the court had in fact jurisdiction of the defendant, but the return of the constable failed to show that fact, the record may be amended after judgment so as to show jurisdiction, if there are no intervening rights to be affected.[38] So where the Christian name of an appraiser was omitted in drawing up a decree for the appraisement and sale of trust property, the court directed it to be inserted in the original decree in the register's minutes, it being a merely formal matter.[39] Again, where a guardian ad litem was appointed at the proper term, but no entry made on the docket, the entry may be subsequently supplied.[40] And in another case, where the omission occurred through the inadvertence of the plaintiff's attorney, and it was necessary that it should be supplied in order to perfect the record, although it would not vary the judgment, the learned judge, in allowing the amendment, said: "I cannot discover any difference, as to the allowing of an amendment, whether the mistake has happened through the omission of an attorney or by that of the clerk. Both are equally officers of the court." [41] But on the other hand, as already stated, the power of amendment cannot be made the means of adding to a judgment or decree something not originally contemplated by it or which is foreign to its intended scope and purpose. Thus, in an Illinois case, it appeared that a decree had been drawn up by the plaintiff's solicitor and accepted and signed by the judge as the decree of the court; afterwards it was discovered that the solicitor had omitted from the decree a clause which he had intended to make a part of it, and application was made to have it added. But it was considered to be no proper case for an amendment, inasmuch as it did not appear that the court had intended to insert the clause in question, and consequently to add it by amendment would be to change the sentence pronounced and revise its own decree.[42] On the same principle, plaintiff is not entitled to an amendment of a judgment in his favor, so as to include the sureties on an appeal bond, where the judgment, as entered, followed the minutes of the court and was properly rendered against defendant alone, and where any judgment against the sureties would necessarily have been for a different amount.[43] pose either additions or elisions may be made. In a case where the judgment pronounced by the court upon motion of the defendant was "that the complaint be dismissed with costs," and the judgment entered by the clerk was that the complaint be dismissed "upon the merits" with costs to the defendant, it was held that the insertion of the words quoted was a material addition to the judgment which the clerk had no authority to make, and was properly stricken out on motion.[45] So an amendment may be made where a judgment of dismissal failed to include a judgment for costs properly chargeable to the plaintiff,[46] or where a judgment is confessed in open court, and the clerk improperly enters it as a judgment by default,[47] or where, on a nonsuit for failure of proof, at the close of plaintiff's case, the judgment is erroneously made to recite a dismissal on the merits,[48] or where, by the terms of a judgment confessed, it purports to be for the benefit of the "several creditors" of the debtor, but there is undisputed evidence that it was intended only for his unsecured "business creditors," [49] or where a cognovit was filed by an attorney at law as such, but the judgment erroneously recites that it was filed by defendant's "attorney in fact." [50] And where a judgment is erroneous on its face by reason of not conforming to the verdict, no other objection being made, it may be corrected on motion.[51] This power of amendment may also be used to clear up ambiguities. Thus it is held that the court has power to amend a judgment for a specified quantity of water, "miners' measurement," so as to relieve it of the uncertainty of that term, the amendment being made on the uncontradicted testimony in the case, made a part of the motion papers. The court remarked: "We do not doubt the soundness of the rule that the trial court cannot at a subsequent time so modify a judgment that the modification is in effect a reversal. That is the province of the appellate court. But the trial court has the power to modify or correct the judgment or record to such an extent that the relief granted may be such as was intended to be granted." [52] On similar principles, the court may amend its record by transferring the proceedings to the proper suit when by mistake they have been filed in a suit to which they do not belong.[53] In this connection, the following observations of the court in North Carolina will be found instructive. "As a general rule, it is unquestionably true that no act of the court, as contradistinguished from the act of its officers or of the parties, can be allowed to be amended, but during the term at which it was done. During the term the record is said to be in the breast of the judge; after it is over it is upon the roll. But this rule applies to such amendments as call into action the judgment or discretion of the court, and not to such as are a matter of course. In such cases, the reasons of the rule no longer operate; for, as much as the law confides in the integrity of the court, it admits a possibility of its being corrupt, and therefore guards it from temptation." [54] It is held that a judgment by consent cannot be corrected by the court without the consent of all parties to it. It is not the judgment of the court except in the sense that it is recorded and has the effect of a judgment. In such case, the court can only correct its own errors in making the entries, as, for instance, the misprision of its clerk.[55]

§ 158. Judicial Errors not to be thus Corrected.

The allowance of an amendment should never be used by the court as a means of reviewing its judgments on the merits, or correcting its own judicial mistakes, or substituting a judgment which it neither in fact rendered nor intended to render.[56] "The power of courts to amend judgments after the close of the term extends to all omissions to enter the judgments pronounced by the court, and to clerical errors in the form of the entry, whether by introducing a fact which ought to appear on the record, or by striking out a statement of a fact improperly introduced, and when the record affords sufficient evidence. But when the defect consists in the failure of the court to render the proper judgment, or arises from a want of judicial action, the record cannot be corrected after the term has closed, the cause being no longer sub judice. The purpose of amendment is to make the judgment conform to what the court intended it should be, to set right the record and make it speak the truth, so that omissions or clerical error shall not prejudice parties litigant. The power to amend nunc pro tunc is not revisory in its nature, and is not intended to correct judicial errors. Such amendments 'ought never to be the means of modifying or enlarging the judgment, or the judgment record, so that it shall express something which the court did not pronounce, even although the proposed amendment embraces matter which ought clearly to have been pronounced.' However erroneous, the express judgment of the court cannot be corrected at a subsequent term." [57]

A judgment, therefore, cannot be amended so as to vary the rights of the parties as fixed by the original decision of the court and the judgment entered thereon.[58] Thus, it is error to amend a judgment by reducing its amount, where the reason for the alteration is that the court has changed its mind; such action may be taken as the means of correcting a miscalculation or other clerical error, but not to set right a judicial mistake.[59] Again, the power of amendment cannot be used as a means of enlarging the judgment originally given, by decreeing additional relief to the successful party,[60] or by adding judgments against parties not originally included in the judgment, or giving a personal judgment in addition to the decree of foreclosure originally pronounced,[61] or releasing from the operation of the judgment parties or property originally affected by it.[62] Nor has the court power or jurisdiction to correct a valid and final judgment, after the term, by readjudging the question of costs and taxing them in a different amount, or distributing them in a different manner, from that originally fixed.[63] So also, a judgment dismissing the complaint, entered after trial, cannot be amended by appointing a referee to pass on plaintiff's claim, unless the dismissal is vacated.[64]

sum too small, as appears on the face of the papers, the judgment may be corrected on motion at a subsequent term, even although the amount for which it was erroneously entered has been paid.[66] So also, a clerical error in the calculation of interest, or in fixing the date from which interest shall run, may be corrected by an amendment.[67] Again, if the clerk, by mistake or inadvertence, enters up a judgment for a sum in excess of that found by the verdict or ordered by the court, the entry may be corrected so as to correspond with the verdict or findings.[68] On the same principle, a court rendering a judgment in excess of the amount which its jurisdiction allows may reduce it to such limit.[69] And where a judgment by default is too large, and the plaintiff remits the excess, the court may correct the judgment to conform to the remittitur.[70] But the fact that the evidence fails to support the full amount of the judgment is properly ground for a new trial, rather than a motion to modify the judgment.[71] If a judgment is erroneously rendered for a sum greater than the amount of the plaintiff's claim, it may be corrected on motion.[72] The same rule applies also if there is a manifest fault in the verdict itself. Thus if the jury bring in a verdict for a sum which is less than that admitted to be due on the face of the pleadings, the judgment, if entered according to the verdict, may afterwards be reformed.[73] Again, in an action of debt, where the judgment was erroneously entered for damages alone, it was held that the defendant in error might, on application to the court in which the judgment was rendered, amend the entry so as to make it a judgment for the debt in the declaration mentioned, to be discharged on payment of the damages found by the jury.[74] And in an English case, the record in a penal action, where the jury by mistake gave damages, being carried by writ of error to the King's Bench, it was held that the plaintiff might enter a remittitur of the damages on the record, and the transcript might be made conformable thereto.[75]

§ 160. Amendment in Respect of Parties.

If the entry of a judgment is open to objection because the parties are incorrectly named or erroneously described in it, it may be amended on motion so as to conform to the other parts of the record.[76] This is also true if the entry, in this respect, is not sufficiently definite or precise. Thus, where a judgment as first entered was defective in not designating the defendants who were personally liable for the debt, but the record showed who they were, it was held that the court had power to amend the judgment at any time by adding a clause specifying the defendants so liable.[77] Also, if the judgment is irregular, as embracing more parties than the record justifies, it is proper practice to correct the judgment in the trial court.[78] Thus if process issues against two defendants, and one only is served, and the pleadings are against that one, but verdict and judgment against both, the entry may be amended at a subsequent term by striking out the name of the defendant not served.[79] So where a firm consisting of three partners was sued, and one accepted service and appeared for all, and judgment went against the three individually, and the two defendants not served then moved for a new trial on the ground that the other had no authority to appear or plead for them, it was held to be in the discretion of the court to reform the judgment, so as to award execution against the firm and against the individual property of the partner served, instead of granting a new trial.[80] Again, where a judgment is rendered against several defendants, one of whom dies previous to its rendition, it may be amended, on motion, by vacating it as to the deceased defendant and continuing its vitality as against the others.[81] If a judgment may be corrected by striking out the name of a party improperly inserted in it, so also may it be amended, after the term, by inserting the name of one of the parties, omitted through mistake, when there is sufficient record evidence by which to make the correction.[82] But if a suit is brought in the name of A. it is held that the record cannot be amended by striking out the word "others" and inserting the name of another party, more especially when the cause had previously been referred to arbitrators, from whose award there had been an appeal.[83] Nor has the court power to modify its own judgment, rendered at a former term, by changing it from a judgment against the plaintiff (who brought the suit, in his official capacity, upon an assignee's bond) to a judgment against the person for whose benefit the suit was brought.[84] But in another case, where, by mistake, a judgment had been entered up in favor of a former administratrix, whose letters had abated by marriage, it was considered proper for the court to amend the judgment so as to make it read in favor of the administrator de bonis non, if he had been duly made a party and was the real plaintiff when the judgment to be corrected was entered.[85]

§ 161. What Courts have Power of Amendment.

All courts, from the highest to the lowest, whose proceedings are preserved in any species of record or memorial, have the power and authority to make such corrections therein as truth and justice require and the rules of law permit; and this power, being inherent, belongs to a court merely as such, and does not depend upon a statutory grant of jurisdiction. An appellate court may modify and change its orders and decrees before they become final, and may, even at a subsequent term, amend its records in respect of clerical errors and mistakes.[86] And its power extends even further than this. For if, on an appeal, the only error assigned is a clerical misprision in regard to the amount of the judgment, such mistake, being amendable on motion in the court below, will be amended by the appellate court at the cost of the appellant, and the amended judgment affirmed.[87] A court of probate jurisdiction may amend its proceedings in a proper case;[88] e. g., after a sale by an administrator under its order, by adding to the administrator's account exhibited his affidavit that the same was just and true, formerly taken in court but not filed.[89] So also a justice of the peace may correct a judgment rendered by his predecessor in office, by a nunc pro tunc order, to make it conform to the truth.[90] And an arbitrator, it is held, after the delivery of his award, may correct a mere clerical error not affecting the merits.[91] But there are decisions to the effect that a motion to amend or correct a judgment cannot be made before a judge other than the one whose judgment is sought to be modified.[92] And the clerk of the court has no ex officio right, without an express order of the court to that effect, to complete, alter, or amend the record kept by a predecessor in that office whose term has expired.[93]

§ 162. Time of making Application.

An application for the amendment of a judgment should be made, by the party in whose interest the correction is required, within a reasonable time after he has discovered the error. If he suffers an undue period to elapse, the court may refuse, on account of his laches, to accord the relief asked, and especially if rights have become vested under the judgment which would be disturbed by its alteration.[94] At the same time, the inherent power of a court to correct or amend its own records in the interests of justice is not lost by the mere lapse of time,[95] unless, as is the case in some states, the time within which such action may be taken is limited by statute.[96] The amendment is generally discretionary with the court, but the circumstances are sometimes such that justice and right rather demand the refusal of the correction than its allowance. Thus, after money has been paid under an erroneous decree, it cannot be so altered or amended as to make a party to it liable to pay the money a second time;[97] although if, in satisfying the face of the judgment, he has paid only a part of that which was really awarded against him, the judgment may afterwards be amended so as to make him liable for the true balance.[98]

So long as the record remains with the court which rendered the judgment, it is of course under its control for proper purposes and in proper cases. But it may be otherwise when the record has been removed to an appellate court. "Although there is some conflict of opinion as to whether an inferior court can amend the record whilst a case is pending upon writ of error in a higher court, we are inclined to think that the weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that the pending of such writ does not prove an impediment to the action of the court below."[99] And in California it is held that the amendment may be made even after the judgment has been affirmed on appeal.[100] But in Alabama, on the other hand, it is considered that when a judgment or decree is affirmed on appeal, the decree or judgment of the court below is merged in the judgment of affirmance, and that court cannot afterwards make any order modifying or altering it.[101] And this seems the more reasonable view, unless in cases where the error was not discovered until after the appellate proceedings were had.

§ 163. Method of Applying for Amendment.

A judgment once entered must be corrected, if irregular or erroneous, by some proper proceeding for that purpose; it cannot be merely disregarded and the proper judgment entered anew.[102] During the term at which the judgment was rendered, the correction may be made by an order of the court upon a mere suggestion of the error.[103] But after the term is ended, according to the practice in many of the states, the amendment can only be made upon the presentation of a formal petition and motion, setting forth the mistake and the alteration prayed for, and after proper notice to the adverse party to appear and show reasons why the correction should not be made.[104] In Indiana, an application to correct a mistake in a judgment should be made by motion, and though made in the form of a complaint it will be treated as a mere motion and not demurrable.[105] It is also to be observed that a motion to amend a judgment cannot be allowed in an action of scire facias upon the judgment, but must be made in the original cause.[106] If a judgment is

other than that resulting from the conclusions of law arrived at by the court, it cannot be corrected by an appeal from an order granting or denying a new trial, but must be reached by an appeal from the judgment.[107]

If the judgment is objectionable in form, the remedy is by motion to correct it in the court below, and an appeal may be taken from a denial of the motion; but an appeal without making such motion is not proper.[108] A defendant in a foreclosure proceeding, who desires the correction of a mistake in the record entry of the decree, does not waive his right to apply therefor by taking a stay of the order of sale.[109] If the motion for correction or amendment is denied, the remedy is by appeal, and not by renewing the motion,[110] nor by applying for a new trial or rehearing of the motion.[111] When the application is granted, the costs of the motion are properly taxed against the party who resisted the application.[112] Mandamus will not lie to control the judicial action of an inferior court to correct a decree which it had full authority and jurisdiction to render, where the petitioner has a full and adequate remedy to correct it on appeal on the final determination of the cause.[113]

§ 164. Notice of Application.

The general rule is well established that a judgment cannot be amended, after the term at which it was rendered, upon an ex parte application. Due and proper notice must be given to the opposite party of the application and the relief asked, that he may have an opportunity to appear and show cause against the proposed correction.[114] Nevertheless if the amendment is to be based upon matter of record only, the necessity of giving notice to the adverse party is not so evident. In that case, any evidence against the amendment which he might produce, if drawn from extraneous sources, would be inadmissible and unavailing; and it is not at once apparent how his rights could be prejudiced by his ignorance of the proceedings. It seems that the same rule should here obtain as in the case of nunc pro tunc entries,—that notice is requisite only when evidence dehors the record will be consulted.[115] And indeed it has been held that if the amendment relates only to a matter of form, the notice may be dispensed with.[116] And the court in Michigan considered the omission of notice as immaterial, in a case where the amendment was not calculated to change the effect of the judgment, but merely to bring its terms into more perfect expression of the meaning which would have been ascribed to it by a proper construction of its language before the amendment.[117] For, as the court observed, any person who was interested in the judgment, or acted on the faith of it, was chargeable with knowledge of all that a proper construction of it would have taught him, and the amendment did not change its meaning.

In the matter of amending records, the rule of English practice forbids the correction of any judgment or decree unless there is sufficient record evidence, or evidence quasi of record, to amend by, and strictly excludes all parol testimony offered for that purpose.

And this rule has been adopted, either expressly or tacitly, in many of the United States, and has become too firmly settled in their jurisprudence to admit of contradiction.[118] It has been concisely stated in the following language: "We think that no judgment can be amended, or one rendered nunc pro tunc, unless such amendment or rendition of judgment be authorized by matter of record, or by some entry made by or under the authority of the court, which entry must be shown by the record of the cause, or at the least by some book belonging to the office of the court and required to be there kept by law."[119] Where this rule obtains it is held that a judgment cannot be amended by the notes or minutes of the judge made upon the docket; they are not considered a part of the record nor evidence for any purpose.[120] Nor can the amendment be made from the judge's memory or knowledge of the fact omitted.[121] Nor by his affidavit in regard to the error to be corrected.[122] And certainly amendments cannot be made from the recollections of witnesses testifying ex parte.[123] It is also the rule, in the states mentioned, that a decree in chancery, equally as a judgment at law, cannot be amended at a subsequent term upon parol testimony, but only upon evidence which is matter of record or quasi record.[124] Further, it is held that where the judgment is sought to be amended, after the term, for clerical errors or formal defects, it is necessary that the error or defect should be apparent on the record; it cannot be pointed out by affidavit.[125]

On the other hand, in contravention of the rule that a judgment can only be amended by matter of record, in several of the states it is decisively held that it may be amended on any evidence, properly admissible, and satisfactory in its weight and character, showing it to differ from the judgment really rendered by the court.[126] In the language of the supreme court of New Hampshire: "We think it clear upon the authorities that the court may make such amendments upon any competent legal evidence, and that they are the proper judges as to the amount and kind of evidence requisite in each case to satisfy them what was the real order of the court, or the actual proceeding before it, what was the proper entry to be made on the docket, and how the record should be extended. * * * Where there is nothing more to rely on than mere memory, the court will act, if at all, with great caution."[127] In a recent Indiana decision it was held that parol evidence was sufficient as a foundation for the correction of a clerical error in the amount of a judgment, the court observing that this was a different matter from making a nunc pro tunc entry of something that had been entirely omitted, in which case it might well be that parol evidence would not be admissible, but only the record itself.[128] The distinction, however, does not appear to rest upon any plausible basis; and the decision cited is a departure from the earlier rulings in the same state.[129] If parol evidence is to be admitted, the notes and minutes made by the judge upon the trial docket will of course be proper sources from which to obtain information as to the action really taken by the court.[130] And indeed they will naturally be consulted in the first instance. But since such memoranda are not a part of the record, and therefore not of controlling authority, it will be possible that they may be overborne by other evidence; and the court cannot be compelled to correct its journal from such minutes.[131]

In Illinois, the present rule appears to be that the court, upon notice to the parties in interest, may amend its record at a subsequent term, if evidence to support the amendment can be drawn from the record, or from some minute or memorial paper, or notes taken by a stenographer, or other document in the nature of a record, made in connection with the case or upon the trial or hearing; but that an amendment cannot be based on oral evidence alone.[132]

The rule that "a record can only be amended by matter of record" seems to rest, in the last analysis, upon the rule that "a record imports absolute verity." Without losing sight of the extreme importance of securing stability and authority to the solemn memorials of the courts, we may still conceive that this rule, if applied with full rigor and severity, might in many cases produce the greatest hardship and injustice. But it is evident to a student of American case-law, that we are gradually working away from the old standards in this respect. The courts are more and more disposed to a liberal practice and to look to the full and perfect administration of justice, rather than to buttress up the sanctity of records by forbidding inquiry into their truth. Hence it is not improbable that the policy of permitting judgments to be amended upon cause shown by any proper and satisfactory evidence, will ultimately prevail. Certainly it is a policy that is commended by reason and justice, and still more by the loose way in which the records of our courts are but too frequently made up. To shut out any light which could help to make the records accurate, complete, and right in themselves, appears to show a too superstitious reverence for the litera scripta.

§ 166. Method of making Corrections.

"An amendment should not be made by simply noting the order to amend, but it should be actually made by turning back to the minutes of the former term, and making the proper correction and entry there, so that the entry will stand and be read as if no amendment or correction had ever been necessary." [133] If the correction consists merely in adding a word or phrase, or adding or substituting a name or date, or altering an amount, or the like, it may be well enough simply to make the change upon the face of the original entry. But in general, interlineations are to be avoided; and the more regular mode of making amendments, after the term, is by an order of court reversing the defective entry, followed by a new order nunc pro tunc.[134] Where a decree already made in a cause is tacitly revoked, during the same term, and a second decree is made on the same subject-matter, it would be more orderly and convenient, in making the second decree, to refer to the first one, and state in what particulars the later is intended to modify, supplement, or supersede the former; but this is not essential if a comparison of the two decrees discloses the changes or modifications made. On the contrary, it is to be presumed that a second decree made within the term is intended to modify a former one just so far as it differs from it, either in length or breadth.[135]

§ 167. Allowance of Amendment is discretionary.

An application to amend a judgment or decree is addressed to the discretion of the court, and its denial is not the subject of exception or review.[136] Hence an appellate court will not issue its writ of mandamus to compel an amendment of the record of an inferior court. The question of amending is wholly a matter for the judicial discretion of the court having the custody of the record. And while mandamus is a proper means of compelling a judge to proceed to his duty, yet it cannot be used as a means of deciding for him what that duty is.[137] It is also true that the regularity of an amendment made by a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be inquired into collaterally.[138]

§ 168. Jurisdiction of Equity.

It is held in some of the states that the judgments of courts of record are of such high verity that their existence cannot be impeached, nor their contents contradicted, falsified, or corrected by parol proof, and consequently that a bill will not lie in equity to correct a judgment, purporting to be rendered upon the verdict of a jury, by showing by parol that the judgment was in reality by nil dicit without a jury, and should have been rendered for a larger sum than that specified on its face.[139] On the other hand, in Iowa [140] and Missouri,[141] it is held that if judgment is by mistake entered for a sum less than the amount actually recovered, so that the creditor, without fault, loses a part of his judgment, equity will assist him, if he cannot obtain relief otherwise. But since the cases must be of very infrequent occurrence in which the law court could not correct a mistake of this kind on motion, there will seldom be an opportunity for chancery to exercise this power. Besides, its well known reluctance to interfere with the records of other courts will preclude action of this kind, unless in a case of very palpable hardship and entire inadequacy of any remedy at law.

§ 169. Effect of Amendments on Third Persons.

An amendment of a judgment or decree will never be allowed to prejudice the rights of third persons—such as subsequent judgment-creditors, purchasers, or mortgagees—who have acquired interests for value and without notice.[142] It is proper to insert, in the order allowing an amendment, a saving of the intervening rights of third persons, but the law will make the reservation whether it is expressed or not.[143] During the term, however, at which the judgment was rendered, or decree made, the court has power to amend or correct it, and a person who acquires an interest in property involved, on the faith of the judgment or decree, but with notice of the proceedings, takes it subject to the possibility that the judgment or decree may be corrected or vacated.[144]

§ 170. Voidable and Void Judgments.

Before proceeding to a detailed examination of the questions which may affect the validity of judgments, it is necessary to point out the important distinction between judgments which are void and such as are merely voidable. The differences, though real and fundamental, are not always marked with sufficient sharpness in juristic writing, and courts have been known to speak of a judgment as "void" when they meant no more than that it was liable to be overturned if properly attacked. Now a "void" judgment is in reality no judgment at all. It is a mere nullity. It is attended by none of the consequences of a valid adjudication, nor is it entitled to the respect accorded to one. It can neither affect, impair, nor create rights. As to the person against whom it professes to be rendered, it binds him in no degree whatever, it has no effect as a lien upon his property, it does not raise an estoppel against him. As to the person in whose favor it professes to be, it places him in no better position than he occupied before; it gives him no new right, but an attempt to enforce it will place him in peril. As to third persons, it can neither be a source of title nor an impediment in the way of enforcing their claims. It is not necessary to take any steps to have it reversed, vacated, or set aside. But whenever it is brought up against the party, he may assail its pretensions and show its worthlessness. It is supported by no presumptions, and may be impeached in any action, direct or collateral. On the other hand, a "voidable" judgment is one which, though not a mere nullity, is liable to be made void when a person who has a right to proceed in the matter takes the proper steps to have its invalidity declared. It always contains some defect which may become fatal. It carries within it the means of its own overthrow. But unless and until it is duly annulled, it is attended with all the ordinary consequences of a legal judgment. The party against whom it is given may escape its effect as a bar or an obligation, but only by a proper application to have it vacated or reversed. Until that is done, it will be efficacious as a claim, an estoppel, or a source of title. If no proceedings are ever taken against it, it will continue throughout its life to all intents a valid sentence. If emanating from a court of general jurisdiction, it will be sustained by the ordinary presumptions of regularity, and it is not open to impeachment in any collateral action. When is a judgment void and when merely voidable? The answer to this question will form the subject of this and the two following chapters. It may be here stated, however, that it is very doubtful whether a judgment can ever be considered entirely void except in the single case where there was a total want of jurisdiction to render it. And even then, in the case of a domestic judgment, it is a serious question whether the lack of jurisdiction must not appear on the face of the record in order to entitle the courts to treat it as a nullity.[1] But there are many possible defects and irregularities which will render a judgment voidable.

Before leaving the subject it is necessary to advert to two words, often used in this connection, and which must be distinguished from those already explained. These are "irregular" and "erroneous." An irregular judgment is one which is rendered contrary to the course of law and the practice of the courts. The meaning of the term is therefore not exactly coextensive with that of "voidable," although the two are often used interchangeably. For while every irregular judgment is also, and for that reason, voidable, there may be other causes besides irregularity sufficient to avoid it. An erroneous judgment is one which, though regularly rendered, is contrary to law, and therefore liable to be reversed by an appellate tribunal. Irregular and erroneous judgments cannot be attacked collaterally. But the former can be vacated by the court which rendered them or by a court of review, according to the nature of the irregularity; the latter only by an appellate court. These distinctions are noted in an opinion of the supreme court of New York, from which we quote as follows: "Although a void judgment, or one that is voidable for irregularity, will not, after being set aside, justify the acts of the party done under it before it was set aside, this principle, I apprehend, has never been applied to a judgment merely erroneous and reversed for error by a court of review. An irregular judgment is called voidable, and when set aside is treated as though void from the beginning, for the party himself is held chargeable with the irregularity; while a judgment pronounced by the court, although upon an erroneous view of the law, and subject therefore to be reversed by an appellate tribunal, is never treated as void, but valid for all purposes of protection to the party acting under it before reversal. The fact that in the one case the party is responsible for the irregularity, and in the other whatever of error there is in the judgment is the error of the court, seems to be the ground of the distinction between the two, and it is manifestly a just and proper distinction. While it may well be held that a party is not justified by a judgment which is subsequently set aside for an irregularity in entering it up, which is his own act, it would seem unjust to hold that a judgment duly rendered by the court shall fail to protect a party acting under it before reversal, because reversed for error committed by the court." § 171. Jurisdiction.

The first and fundamental requisite to the validity of a judgment is that it should have been rendered by a court having jurisdiction. Without jurisdiction the courts can do nothing, and a judgment given forth without jurisdiction is a mere nullity. The jurisdiction required is of three sorts: (1) jurisdiction of the parties; (2) jurisdiction of the general subject-matter; (3) jurisdiction of the particular matter which the judgment professes to decide. But the subject of jurisdiction is of such importance and intricacy as to require treatment in a separate chapter, and is mentioned here only for the sake of logical completeness.

The validity of a judgment may also depend in many instances on the character or status of the party against whom it is rendered. And in the case of persons who are under legal disabilities, judgments may be irregular and voidable for the failure to comply with statutory formalities, or to protect the defendants in the ways prescribed by law, or may even be considered void for the want of power of the courts over them. This subject will be examined in detail in the next chapter.

§ 173. Constitution of the Court.

In order that a judgment should be recognized as valid, it is of course necessary that it should have been rendered by a lawful and duly constituted court; otherwise it is not "the sentence of the law" and is not entitled to carry its sanction.[3] But on principles of public policy and for the security of rights, it is held that the regular judgments of a de facto court, whose existence has afterwards been pronounced unconstitutional and void, are nevertheless valid and conclusive.[4] Thus, in a case before the supreme federal tribunal, it was held that an adjudication made by a Spanish court in Louisiana was not void because made after the cession of that territory to the United States. "For we know historically," said Thompson, J., "that the actual possession of the territory was not surrendered until some time after these proceedings took place. It was the judgment, therefore, of a competent Spanish tribunal, having jurisdiction of the case, and rendered whilst the country, although ceded, was de facto in the possession of Spain and subject to Spanish laws. Such judgments, so far as they affect the private rights of the parties thereto, must be deemed valid." [5]

In regard to the validity of judgments rendered by the courts of the states which attempted to secede from the Union in 1861, there has been a great fluctuation of opinion, and it is only of late that the authorities have come to a substantial agreement. At first, and particularly in some of the reconstructed states, there was a strong disposition to treat all such judgments as mere nullities. This view was based on the theory that, the government of a state organized under the Confederacy being an usurpation and being erected in hostility to the lawful government of the country, all its acts were void; and the same objections which might be urged against its laws would be sufficient to overturn its judgments, both being parts of one whole.[6] But after a time, impressed with the idea that some sort of government existed in those states during the war, and that the courts created or recognized by it were at least considered lawful tribunals by that government, real or pretended, and that respect was paid to their adjudications by the persons who acknowledged that government as rightful, the authorities were inclined to put such judgments upon the footing of quasi foreign judgments. That is, they were not to receive the full faith and credit due to a domestic judgment, but neither were they to be treated as entirely void. They were considered as prima facie evidence, but cause might be shown against their being carried into effect.[7] The position was anomalous in the extreme, and the theory itself quite untenable. For, as pointed out by Dr. Wharton,[8] in suing upon such a judgment it would be necessary to declare as upon a judgment in a state not belonging to the United States, and therefore virtually foreign. But a foreign judgment, rendered in the courts of a state whose independence our own government has never acknowledged, cannot be recognized as a judgment on which suit can be brought. At a still later period, a view came to be recognized which was the exact opposite of that first adopted, viz., that the judgments rendered by the Confederate courts during the war were in all respects legal and conclusive. It was held that the state government, as organized and existing in all its departments in one of those states during the continuance of hostilities, was its rightful de jure government; and accordingly that judgments and proceedings of its courts, which during that time formed a portion of that government, not violative of the constitution and laws of the United States, nor infringing upon the state constitution, were valid and binding.[9] In the meantime the supreme court of the United States had been called upon to consider these questions, and had ruled that an act of the "Confederate Congress" creating a court was void, and that the court itself was a mere nullity and could exercise no rightful jurisdiction.[10] There is no difficulty in accepting this position if we deny to that body the rights and powers of a government. For of course a mere assemblage of private persons, acting in rebellion against the law of the land, cannot create a court of law, and the acts of such pretended court would be destitute of any authority. But on the other hand, if the insurrectionary authorities had no power to create, they had no power to destroy. By no act or proceeding could they strip a lawful pre-existing tribunal of its power and jurisdiction or terminate its existence. Their laws, being altogether void, had no effect whatever upon the courts which had been duly organized before the rebellion began. And still less could any change in the judicial system be effected by the mere declaration of secession. "The objection that the judgment of the supreme court of Louisiana is to be treated as void because rendered some days after the passage of the ordinance of secession of that state, is not tenable. That ordinance was an absolute nullity, and of itself alone neither affected the jurisdiction of that court or its relation to the appellate power of this court." [11] These two decisions outline the view which has prevailed in the supreme federal court and which must now be regarded as the accepted doctrine. Courts organized by the Confederate authorities for distinctively national purposes, and as a part of what was intended to be a national judicial system, had no legal existence, and all their acts were mere nullities. But the courts of the several states, in their individual capacities, had a lawful existence, notwithstanding the usurpation of the state governments by the insurrectionary authorities, and even though they professed to derive their powers from those who, de facto, had possession of the state government. Accordingly, their judgments, so far as they did not tend to impair the supremacy of the federal authority or the just rights of citizens under the constitution, are to be treated as valid and binding.[12] But this is subject to an important qualification, viz., that such judgments could have no effect as against defendants who were residents of other states not sharing in the rebellion. This exception is established by a noteworthy decision in Ohio, where it was held that as between

Order was to be preserved, police regulations maintained, crimes prosecuted, property protected, contracts enforced, marriages celebrated, estates settled, and the transfer and descent of property regulated, precisely as in times of peace. No one that we are aware of seriously questions the validity of judicial or legislative acts in the insurrectionary states touching these and kindred subjects, where they were not hostile, in their purpose or mode of enforcement, to the authority of the national government, and did not impair the rights of citizens under the constitution."

parties residing in the state of Arkansas and within the rebel lines, and a citizen of Ohio, resident within the Union lines, between whom the war made intercourse impossible, there could be no jurisdiction in a Confederate court in Arkansas by which the rights of non-residents could be injuriously affected. Neither could such jurisdiction be acquired by the consent or waiver of an attorney practicing in said court, who was employed and appeared for the non-resident defendants before the war commenced. His general authority as an attorney, before the war, though not revoked by the clients, did not authorize him to waive any of their rights, nor could such consent or waiver confer on the court jurisdiction over the case or over the defendants.[13] Questions have arisen as to the validity of judgments rendered by a tribunal created by a military commander in a district of insurrectionary territory held by him in belligerent occupation. But as these questions chiefly relate to the effect of such judgments as res judicata, the consideration of them is postponed to another place.[14]

§ 174. Disqualified Judge.

The validity of a judgment may often depend upon considerations personal to the judge who rendered it. He may be disqualified from acting in the particular case by reason of his being concerned as a party, or otherwise interested in the event of the suit, or on account of his relationship or affinity to one of the litigants, or because he is not qualified for the office in accordance with the statutory requirements. And first, in regard to his interest in the suit; it is a maxim of the common law that "nemo potest esse judex in propria causa." [15] And indeed natural justice, as well as a regard for the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary, sanction the same rule. Accordingly it is held, under statutes forbidding a judge to act in a cause in which he is interested, that if he should assume to decide a case where his personal interest might come in conflict with his judicial indifference, the judgment so rendered would be entirely null and void.[16] So a judgment pronounced by a judge who was disqualified on account of his having been of counsel in the case, is void and not conclusive on the parties.[17] It does not appear that this would have been so at common law, for the doctrine seems rather to have been that the acts of a disqualified judge were not merely nullities, but were liable to be avoided or reversed on a proper application, although the parties might admit their binding force by acquiescence.[18] In the next place, the relationship of the judge to any of the parties in the cause is made a ground of his disqualification, by statute in many of the states; and there are cases holding that a judgment attempted to be rendered by one who was disqualified by reason of his consanguinity with a litigant, is utterly void and incapable of being made good by any waiver or consent.[19] But the rule obtaining in a majority of the states is that such a judgment is voidable and liable to be set aside on proper proceedings for that purpose, but is not absolutely void; it is a sufficient protection to persons lawfully acting under it while it stands, and it cannot be attacked collaterally.[20] Some of these decisions were rendered under statutes providing that the parties interested might waive the disqualification by consenting to the action of the judge. And when this is the case, it is entirely reasonable to hold that, if no express objection appears, the judgment will be voidable at most, not void. "These disqualifications may be unknown, or so obscure as to require a judicial decision to determine their existence. It is a serious thing to annul the judgments of the courts, and it ought not to be done where the consent of the parties alone is requisite to their validity, and its entry on the record is the only admissible evidence that it was given." [21] The disqualification may also arise from omission of statutory requirements on the part of the person assuming to act as judge. Thus, a judgment rendered by an attorney orally appointed judge and acting by consent of parties, but without having taken the prescribed oath, is void for want of jurisdiction.[22]

§ 175. Acts of Judge de Facto.

This brings us to the consideration of acts done by a judge de facto. A person may be entitled to this designation who, although he is not a true and rightful incumbent of the office, yet is no mere usurper, but holds it under color of lawful authority. And there can be no question that judgments rendered and other acts performed by such a person are valid and binding. If a contested election, for example, should result in the ouster of the person who, being entitled on the face of the returns, was commissioned and qualified as judge, this would not retrospectively invalidate the judgments he may have rendered while in actual possession of the office. So judges elected and duly qualified, and who exercise the functions of their office, are de facto officers, although the act under which they were elected was unconstitutional.[23] And a person who is ineligible to a judgeship, but who has nevertheless been duly appointed, and who exercises the powers and duties of the office, is a de facto judge, and his acts are valid until he is properly removed.[24] Again, one duly elected to a judgeship, and commissioned a judge by the governor, and discharging the functions of the office, is a judge de facto, although the supreme court afterwards decides that the term of his predecessor had not expired.[25] So also the acts of a de facto judge cannot be attacked collaterally, by showing that he has taken no oath of office, or that he has taken an oath to support a power in insurrectionary hostility to the federal government.[26] These rules are founded upon sound principles of public policy and justice, and are generally wholesome in their practical operation.

§ 176. Judge out of Office.

It is generally held that a judgment or decree rendered, or order made, by a judge whose term of office has expired, but who continues in possession and exercise of the functions of the office, is valid and binding as the act of a de facto officer.[27] Thus, in a recent case, the action was tried on November 30th and a decree rendered December 6th, the term of court having begun on November 8th and continued till December 6th, on which day the decree was dated and filed. It transpired that the term of office of the judge who signed the decree expired on December 2d. But it was held that the judge was an officer de facto and his decree valid as a decree of the court.[28] So in another case, a judge whose office was vacated by his taking a seat in the legislature, but who continued to exercise the functions of a judge, was considered to be a de facto officer and his acts consequently valid.[29] If a judgment or decree was actually rendered before the judge's term expired, it is of course immaterial that it was not docketed or filed until afterwards. Thus, where a cause was submitted to a judge to be determined in vacation, and he made his decision and deposited it, with the papers, in the express office the day before his term of office expired, directed to the clerk of the proper county, it was held that the decision was then complete and it was not invalidated because it was not filed in the clerk's office before the expiration of the judge's term.[30]

§ 177. Time and Place of holding Court.

It is held in several of the cases, that it is indispensable to the validity of a judgment that it be rendered at the time and place prescribed by law.[31] And the holding of a court at a time or place other than that ordained or authorized by law, and all proceedings thereunder, are coram non judice and void.[32] Perhaps the rule is too broadly stated in these decisions. But it may be admitted that the fact that a term of court was not held at the time prescribed by law will constitute a ground for the reversal of a judgment rendered in such term.[33] But if there was reasonable mistake in regard to the time fixed by law, and color of authority for the time actually selected, there is authority for the view that a judgment so rendered is perfectly valid. Thus, in a case in Tennessee, it appeared that an act of the legislature had changed the times for the sitting of the circuit court for a certain county. This change was not known to the officers of the court, the act having been passed but a short time before a term was to be held. The court was held by the presiding judge at the time before fixed by law, but at a different time from that required by the law then in force. A judgment was rendered by the court thus sitting, the justice of which was not controverted. And it was held that the judgment was valid; that the acts of a judge regularly in office are valid, if he hold his court under color of law, although the law may be repealed or invalid.[34] On similar principles, and by an even stronger reason, a judgment is valid when rendered at a term which was commenced at the day fixed by law, although, in the middle of the term and before the judgment, a new statute changes the time for holding the court, because the later act will not affect a term already lawfully commenced.[35] And where, in the absence of the judge, the sheriff adjourned the court without authority, the adjournment was held to be a nullity, and a judgment entered by the court two days afterwards was held valid.[36] In regard to the place of holding a court, compliance with the law is of course important, and perhaps essential to the perfect validity of the judgments rendered. But it does not appear, from the authorities, to be so indispensable that deviation from the law in this respect will of itself be sufficient to render such judgments absolutely void.[37] If it appears by the record of a judgment that the court which pronounced it had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant and of the subject-matter of the suit, such judgment will not, in a collateral proceeding, be held void upon proof being made that it was rendered at a place other than the established seat of justice of the county, when it is shown that all the houses at the latter place had, before the rendition of the judgment, been destroyed by fire, and that the county court had accepted, as a temporary seat of justice, the place at which the judgment was rendered.[38]

§ 178. Place of Trial.

That a judgment was rendered in a county other than that in which the venue was laid is a mere irregularity, and does not avoid the judgment.[39] And the same is true of the fact that the judge made and signed a decree in a county other than that where the trial was had.[40] So also, the jurisdiction of the court is not affected by the fact that the action was tried in a county which was not the one declared by statute to be the proper county for its trial.[41] Thus, in California it is held that where a cause is transferred, because of the disqualification of the judge, to an adjoining judicial district, under authority of statute, the judgment therein is not void or subject to collateral attack because the county to which the cause was transferred was not the nearest one, as required by the statute. "We cannot see," said the court, "how it can be law that a judgment can be impeached collaterally and held void, because a judge has made an inconsiderable mistake in computing distances, or had selected a county-seat more readily accessible than the other in coming from L., and holding it to be really the nearer on that account. The judge had jurisdiction to make this order under the statute then in force. He must determine what is the nearest court in administering the law. This determination was undoubtedly within his power, and if he sent it to a county some distance further than another, by error of a miscalculation of distances, it would be nothing more than an error, and should not render the judgment void. Conceding that this judgment might have been reversed on appeal, still it would not be void on collateral attack." [42] This decision illustrates the difference between void judgments and such as are merely erroneous. In gen-

When the law provides for the holding of regular terms of a court, it is only during term-time that the judges are invested with their full judicial character. Necessary rules and orders, ministerial acts, and some matters which go as of course, may fall within the powers of the court in vacation. But in general all judicial functions are suspended during that interval. Hence, unless under statutory authority, a judgment cannot be pronounced in vacation. The rendition of judgment, in a court of record, is essentially a judicial act, and if performed when the court is not in session, that is, out of term, it is open to a fatal jurisdictional objection; the judgment is absolutely void, creates or affects no rights, and will even be disregarded on appeal.[43] "The judge of the court below had no power to render any judgment or decree in vacation. The statute provides for regular terms of the court to be held for the trial of causes, and it does not provide for the rendering of judgments or decrees at any time except during the term."[44] And again: "With a few exceptions, all matters of a judicial character must be heard and determined by the court at a term fixed by and held in accordance with law. The motion under consideration [to discharge a garnishee] does not constitute one of the exceptions."[45] While this is the case, it is also held in several of the states that the parties may consent to the rendition of a judgment during the vacation of the court, which judgment is then to be entered as of the preceding term,[46] or the ensuing term,[47] and will be perfectly valid as between the parties,[48] and even against third persons in the absence of fraud or collusion.[49] Nor is the main rule of quite universal application. In some states, either in accordance with the established practice of the courts,[50] or by express statutory authority,[51] the courts are empowered to make decrees or orders or render judgments in vacation. And when this power is given, it of course includes the jurisdiction necessary to make a decision in vacation upon a cause proved and submitted in term-time. In this connection we must notice a certain class of statutes authorizing cases to be "taken under advisement" by the court. In Mississippi it is considered that a statute of this character does not authorize the rendition of a judgment in vacation, but the judgment must be given by the court upon the delivery of the judge's opinion in writing at the next term after the submission of the case.[52] In Illinois, however, under a similar statute, it is held that a decree may be rendered in vacation, but that it will remain in fieri and subject to modification, and not become final, until after the expiration of the succeeding term, and then only as approved at that term.[53]

The rendition of a judgment, it will be remembered, is an entirely distinct thing from the entry of it. The former is the act of the law through the mouth of the judge; the latter the act of the clerk. The former gives force and efficacy to the judgment; the latter preserves a memorial of it. The former is a judicial act; the latter a ministerial act. A judgment is none the less a sentence of the law because it is erroneously entered or not entered at all. Hence it follows that if a judgment is duly rendered during term-time, it is then complete, and its validity is in no wise affected by the fact that the clerk does not enter it until the vacation.[54] It is also to be here noted that the meaning of the word "vacation," as used, for example, in a statute which authorizes the confession of judgments during vacation, may not be the same as that known to the common law, viz., "all the time between the end of one term and the beginning of another," [55] but it may cover a recess caused by the adjournment over of the court for a number of days.[56]

§ 180. After Expiration of Term.

As a corollary of the rule stated in the preceding section, it is held that a judgment of a court holding regular terms, if rendered after the time fixed by law for its adjournment, is invalid and will be reversed on appeal.[57] But where the trial of a cause is commenced in a term with the bona fide expectation and belief that it will be concluded before the day shall arrive when the judge is directed, but not imperatively required, to hold court in another county, he may remain, conclude the trial of that case, receive the verdict, and pass judgment, even though this may happen to be done on a day, or at a time, when regularly he would be holding court in another county.[58] And if a judgment be ordered and its terms prescribed by the court during a term, it is a judgment rendered in term-time although the entry thereof be not in fact prepared and transcribed on the journal until after the close of the term.[59] On principles analogous to those obtaining in the case of courts of record, it is held that if a justice of the peace adjourns a cause without specifying the hour of the day or the place to which it is adjourned, he loses jurisdiction and his subsequent judgment is void.[60] But in several of the states it is held that while judgments should be signed and entered during the term, yet if the parties consent that the cause be taken under consideration by the judge, and a judgment rendered and signed after the term shall have expired, and entered as of the term, it will not be irregular.[61] And a party to the action who fails to interpose an objection to this procedure, at the proper time, waives his right, which amounts to an implied consent and concludes him.[62] The decision of a cause may be carried over the vacation by a proper entry; but if a judgment be continued by "curia advisari vult," and be not given until the term succeeding that at which the verdict was rendered, the judgment must be entered and signed as of such succeeding term, not of the former term.[63]

§ 181. Premature Entry of Judgment.

The rendition of judgment at a term before that fixed by statute is considered not as a mere formal defect which may be remedied by an amendment in the court below, but as a radical error.[64] Thus, the entry of final judgment at the same term with a default, when the statute provides that the former shall be entered at the next term after the default, is an irregularity, although, in this instance, it appears that the error may be corrected on motion at a subsequent term.[65] So also an order of court which bears date as of a day not yet arrived is absolutely without effect, at least until that day shall arrive.[66] In this connection also must be mentioned the rule that final judgment cannot properly be rendered in any case while there are issues of law or fact remaining undisposed of or undetermined,[67] or while an order staying all proceedings in the case remains still in force.[68]

§ 182. Sundays and Holidays.

It is a maxim of the common law that "dies dominicus non est juridicus." Accordingly no valid judgment can be rendered upon Sunday. "That courts have no right to pronounce a judgment or do any other act strictly judicial on Sunday, unless expressly authorized by statute, seems to be too well settled to admit of a doubt by the decisions in England and in this country. The cases all show that a judgment entered of record on Sunday is not only erroneous, but is absolutely void." mediately upon the reception of a verdict, it is held that if a verdict is returned on Sunday, a judgment entered upon it the same day will be valid.[70] Since the entry of a judgment, as distinguished from its rendition, is a merely ministerial act, there can be no doubt that it will not be invalidated by the fact that it was put upon the record or the docket by the clerk on a Sunday. But in that case it should not appear to have been rendered on Sunday.[71] However, the court is not bound to accept as true a docket-entry that a judgment was rendered on that day when there is extraneous evidence that in fact it was not.[72]

In regard to other legal holidays, the general rule is that unless the statutes recognizing or creating them expressly prohibit the exercise of judicial functions upon them, the courts may validly render judgments and transact their other usual business.[73] And even if they are declared non-juridical days, this will not hinder the performance of ministerial acts. Thus the statute in Georgia, declaring the fourth of July a holiday, does not inhibit the courts from sitting on that day, or make a judgment rendered on that day void, except when the day falls on Sunday.[74] So it is held that a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace on Thanksgiving Day is not void.[75] And in another case it was considered that in the absence of an express statute, the ministerial act of a clerk in filing a transcript of a judgment is not void because done on Christmas Day, but is a valid docketing of the judgment and will confer a valid lien upon the real estate of the debtor in the county where it is filed.[76]

§ 183. Judgment must be supported by the Pleadings.

A judgment must accord with and be warranted by the pleadings of the party in whose favor it is rendered. A judgment not supported by the pleadings is as fatally defective as one not sustained by the verdict or finding.[77] Hence the code, although it abolishes the forms of actions as they existed at common law, does not authorize a recovery, where the complaint alleges facts showing a cause of action in tort, by proving upon the trial a cause of action in contract.[78] Again, under the common count for goods sold and delivered, no recovery can be had for money advanced, or personal services rendered for defendant.[79] In an action for money obtained from plaintiff by fraud, it is error, on finding no fraud shown, to give judgment as for money loaned.[80] Where the complaint alleges that the fall of plaintiff's wall, for which he claims damages, was caused by defendant's negligent excavation of land "adjacent" to plaintiff's land, but the evidence shows that the excavation was "beneath" the plaintiff's building, the latter cannot recover.[81] So also, where the petition alleges that two defendants are jointly indebted to plaintiff as a banking firm, he is not entitled to recover a judgment against one of them as a city treasurer.[82] Where an action is brought to foreclose a mechanic's lien, and the lien is shown to have been discharged by the giving of a bond, the court has no power to render a personal judgment against the defendant.[83] On the same principle, where the theory of the complaint and of the trial, as well as of the entire evidence, was that a deed was not intended as a mortgage, but as a conveyance, a judgment based on the theory that the deed was a mortgage cannot be upheld.[84] And although, under modern systems, courts of law may enforce equitable rights, the proof must agree with the pleadings, and the relief granted must be within the prayer for relief and the grounds relied on.[85] So where the declaration is defective in substance to the extent of failing to show a cause of action, no judgment can be entered upon it.[86] This would be good ground for a motion in arrest, but if a judgment were nevertheless entered, it would be reversed for error. And if the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, a finding "that the allegations of the complaint are true," is not sufficient to support a judgment for the plaintiff.[87] But where a verdict is returned for the plaintiff on two counts in a declaration, one of which contains no cause of action, the court will render judgment upon the other, if legally sufficient.[88] But the fact that the defendant, at the trial, makes no objection to the form of action (as that one joint action is improperly brought instead of two several suits), cannot enable the court to enter a judgment which the law does not warrant.[89] In any action, process and pleadings are generally necessary, but where the parties are voluntarily before the court, and by agreement, consent, or confession (which are the same in substance) a judgment is rendered, such judgment is valid, although not granted according to the regular course of procedure.[90] So a judgment rendered without any complaint having been filed, is valid if entered by agreement or if ratified by subsequent consent.[91] A judgment or decree based upon incompetent evidence is never, for that reason alone, void.[92] And in general, mere error in a judgment, though it may be ground for its reversal, will not have the effect to make it absolutely void, or lay it open to collateral impeachment, or impair its efficacy while it stands.

§ 184. Judgment in Action not at Issue.

It has been held, in several cases in Mississippi, that judgments rendered without issues to be determined by them are nullities.[93] And in some other states there are expressions to the effect that, before a cause is at issue, either expressly or tacitly, no final judgment can be validly rendered.[94] Undoubtedly a judgment so pronounced would be irregular and erroneous, as being contrary to the course of law and the usual practice of the courts, and would therefore be liable to reversal. But whether it should be regarded as entirely void, a mere nullity, is a question involved in more difficulty. That no such result could properly follow is contended by Mr. Freeman, on the general principle that "when jurisdiction over both the parties and subject-matter is once obtained, no error committed in the exercise of that jurisdiction can make the proceedings or judgment of the court void." [95] This may readily be conceded. And yet, in no proper sense can a court of law be said to have jurisdiction if there is no specific question or controversy submitted for its determination. It is not enough that the parties are properly in court. That does not give the tribunal power to adjudicate any and all matters of difference between them. When we speak of "jurisdiction of the subject-matter," we do not mean merely cognizance of the general class of actions to which the action in question belongs, but we also mean legal power to pass upon and decide the particular contention which the judgment assumes to settle. And how can a court acquire jurisdiction of the particular contention, except it be clearly marked out and precisely defined by the pleadings of the parties? And how can that be done, in any mode known to the law, save by the formation of a regular issue? There is therefore plausible ground for holding that if the record fails to show an issue to be determined, the judgment will be void on its face.

§ 185. Findings necessary to support the Judgment.

In some of the states there are statutes requiring a finding of facts and conclusions of law to be filed in the action, to serve as a basis for the judgment. But the disposition is to regard this requirement as not vitally necessary to the validity of the judgment. As to parties before the court, and respecting a matter within its jurisdiction, the cases hold that a judgment without a finding of facts to support it is not void, but at most merely erroneous and subject to reversal by a suitable proceeding in a tribunal having authority to review it.[96] So where a court of record, having jurisdiction, renders a judgment upon a petition filed before it against a defendant upon default of answer, and the statute requires the court in the particular proceeding to take evidence and make special findings, and the court fails to comply with the statutory requirement, the judgment may be erroneous but is not void.[97] And where a court, at the conclusion of a trial, has ordered judgment, but omits to make and file findings of fact and conclusions of law, as prescribed by statute, such findings and conclusions may be made and filed by the court after judgment nunc pro tunc.[98] But in Michigan it is held that a judgment entered up before the findings are finally completed and filed is premature, and is to be regarded as provisional action merely, which only becomes perfected when the findings are completed and filed.[99] If the findings are required to be specific, a general finding for the plaintiff will not support a judgment in his favor.[100]

§ 186. Judgment must follow Verdict.

If the defendant in an action has recovered a verdict upon a plea which confesses the plaintiff's cause of action and does not sufficiently avoid it, judgment should be entered for the plaintiff notwithstanding the verdict.[101] Again, if the verdict is clearly wrong, this may furnish ground for arresting the judgment or granting a new trial.[102] But if no such reasons exist for disregarding or setting aside the verdict, the judgment, to be valid, must follow it and accord with it. We have already seen that this is an established rule in respect to the amount of the judgment.[103] And it may also be stated as a general principle that the judgment must conform to the verdict, not only as to the amount, but also as to the measure of relief and as to the parties against whom the finding is made.[104] Moreover the judgment cannot go beyond the verdict in settling the rights of the parties, or admeasuring the recovery, or declaring or foreclosing liens.[105] In cases where the statutes provide for the returning of special verdicts, and enact that "if a general and a special verdict are inconsistent, judgment shall be rendered pursuant to the latter," it is held that a judgment should be rendered pursuant to the general verdict in all cases where the facts constituting the special finding are not inconsistent with the general verdict.[106] Where the court has permitted the jury to amend its verdict, it is error to enter judgment on the original verdict, rejecting the amendment.[107] It is also error to render a judgment upon a verdict which finds upon a part only of the issues.[108] Finally, where the verdict is for the plaintiff, subject to a question of law reserved, a subsequent judgment for him should be entered, not on the point reserved, but on the verdict.[109]

§ 187. Against what Parties Judgments may be Rendered.

Normally, all persons, natural or artificial, may be made defendants in a judgment. In theory of law, all persons who live under the protection of a particular sovereignty are subject to its laws and are within the power and authority of its courts, so far as their actions come within the jural sphere. But the theory is modified to a certain extent by the technical rules relating to abnormal conditions of status. Persons who are under the various legal disabilities, though not exempt from the jurisdiction of the courts, are protected by special provisions as to the cases and the manner in which proceedings may be had against them. Their full and free personality, and therefore their accountability, is thus abridged by the peculiarity of their condition. The same is true, in even greater degree, of those whose personality is suspended, for juristic purposes, by natural or civil death. In respect to the latter, it no longer occupies a prominent place in the law, though there are still circumstances in which a man may be considered, strictly or by analogy, as civiliter mortuus. And where this doctrine still survives, it will always incapacitate the man from suing or being sued, and of course from being a debtor by judgment. Thus a judgment obtained against a man after the filing of his petition in bankruptcy could not create a lien upon his estate. "The court will inquire whether in fact the judgment was not entered after the petition was filed, and if so, will treat the judgment as of no more validity than if entered against a deceased person. So far as regards the disposition of his property, or the control of suits pending against him, the bankrupt, from the time his petition is filed, may be considered as civiliter mortuus." [1] In some of the states, the same suspension of personality, or civil death, is predicated of a felon confined in the penitentiary. Being dead in law, he cannot be sued, and if his conviction takes place and his sentence begins while an action is pending against him, a judgment afterwards rendered therein is null.[2] And during the existence of slavery, the law denied any juristic personality to the beings so held in bondage. Consequently, a judgment entered against a slave was considered as entirely destitute of any legal efficacy or validity.[3]

§ 188. Judgments against Married Women at Common Law.

At common law, on account of the merger of the wife's personality in that of the husband, she was incapacitated for almost every species of juristic action; and therefore, being unable to bind herself by engagements, the breach of which would give rise to a cause of action, she could not, at law, be prosecuted to judgment. It is true that husband and wife might be sued jointly for the wife's tort. But this does not in reality change the rule, because the addition of the wife was (at common law) a matter of form only, the husband being the party who would be looked to for satisfaction of the judgment. Accordingly it is held, on common law principles, that a personal judgment against a married woman is void and a mere nullity.[4] A promissory note, for example, signed by a feme covert cannot be enforced against her by any proceeding at law, and a judgment by default against her on such note is a nullity, and equity will enjoin the enforcement of it against her separate estate.[5] The doctrine is stated, in its most strict and uncompromising form, in a West Virginia decision, as follows: A judgment rendered by a court of common law against a married woman, either in her own name or in the name of a company, under which she does business, upon a contract made during her coverture, is absolutely void, and an execution or suggestion sued out upon such judgment is invalid and ineffectual for any purpose, and the judgment may be attacked in any collateral proceeding.[6] It was otherwise in equity. For there the wife was considered to have a separate personality for some purposes, and consequently she might be sued in chancery in respect to her separate estate. But even in those courts she could not walk with perfectly free foot, and safeguards were provided for her analogous to those obtaining at common law.[7]

§ 189. For Debt contracted Dum Sola.

If a suit is begun against a woman while she is sole, she cannot deprive the plaintiff of his remedy or abate the action, even at common law, by marrying; but the suit will proceed without any regard to her coverture, and a personal judgment may be rendered against her.[8] The same is true if the suit, though not instituted until after marriage, is upon her debt contracted while single. That is, if the declaration shows that the contract was made while the defendant was a widow or sole, her coverture at the time of the suit is no obstacle to the recovery of such a judgment against her as might be rendered against any other defendant.[9] This case is also specifically covered, in several of the states, by statutes which provide for and authorize a personal judgment against a married woman upon her contract made before marriage, to be enforced, however, only against her separate property.[10] And in some others, the law provides that an action upon the wife's debt, contracted before the marriage, must be brought against the husband and wife jointly.[11] Dissolution of the marriage of course restores both parties to their former status. A judgment against a divorced wife for her debt, and also against the husband as to any property received by the marriage, if void as to him, cannot prejudice her and is not void as to her.[12]

The most difficult question which has arisen in connection with this subject, and the one which has chiefly engaged the attention of the courts, is this: What effect is to be given to a personal judgment rendered against a married woman, by default, in an action to which her coverture, if pleaded, would have been a complete defense? Is it a mere nullity, or is it voidable on motion, or is it merely erroneous? In some of the states, the doctrine is firmly held that such a judgment is absolutely void and may be so treated whenever it is brought in question.[13] These decisions proceed upon the ground of the total disability of a feme covert to contract the species of debt assumed by the hypothesis, her incapacity to retain an attorney to appear and plead for her, and the consequent want of jurisdiction in the court for lack of a juristic person to act upon. Some of the decisions cited are ably considered and well reasoned.

On the other hand, it is held by a long line of authorities (including some English cases) that such a judgment against a married woman is not void, and even though erroneous or voidable, by reason of the absence of enabling statutes, is still valid and binding upon her in any collateral proceeding and until set aside or reversed in some proper manner.[14] The practical importance of the question, it will be observed, comes to light when we inquire whether such a judgment may be impeached collaterally, and what is its effect upon third persons. For this will depend entirely upon whether it is void or voidable. And the decisions which hold it to be merely voidable generally support their conclusion by a species of argument ab inconvenienti, namely, the harm that might accrue to innocent strangers if such judgments were to be treated as mere nullities. Thus the supreme court of California says: "There would be no safety in purchasing at judicial sales, under judgments rendered after due service of process on female defendants, if the title of the purchaser could be defeated by proof, in a collateral action, that the defendant in the judgment was a married woman at the time of the institution of the suit, or that she was incapable in law of contracting the debt for which the judgment was rendered." [15] In order to reach this result it is necessary to agree that, no matter what the status of the woman may have been, if she was duly served with process, she was fully within the jurisdiction of the court, so that the judgment, though upon a contract which she had no power to make, would be at most erroneous as a matter of law. And this is the ground of the decision in the recent important case of McCurdy v. Baughman,[16] where the court, after a critical and exhaustive review of the authorities, announced the doctrine stated at the beginning of this paragraph, and added: "Indeed, this is but to reassert the doctrine constantly maintained in this court, that 'the judgment or final order of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and parties, however erroneous, irregular, or informal such judgment or order may be, is valid until reversed or set aside.'" In Alabama it is held that in the absence of fraud in its procurement, or other special cause shown, a consent decree is as binding on a married woman as on a person who is sui juris.[17] In another state it is considered that as a judgment against a married woman may be valid (for it may be for her tort or for a debt contracted before marriage), in a proceeding to enforce such a judgment it should not be held conclusively to be void, but neither should the defendant be estopped from showing that it is void.[18] And in Pennsylvania the court has lately held—though without departing from its earlier rulings—that a judgment by default against a married woman, in an action to which she might have pleaded coverture, is impervious to collateral attack, and voidable at most, when the proceeding was in rem, as, for the enforcement of a mechanic's lien.[19]

The solution of this vexed question must depend upon the view which we are to take of the common law status of a married woman. If it is merely a protection,—a barrier which she may raise in the path of one who pursues her at law, and which the courts are bound to erect in her behalf,—then it may readily be conceded that she may be brought within the jurisdiction by a proper service of process, so that the subsequent proceedings will at any rate not be void, although the court, to save itself from error, should not give a personal judgment against her on a debt she could defend against by coverture. This theory, however, is far from satisfactory as an account of the common law notion. The doctrine seems rather to have been that marriage, except for certain special purposes, put the personality of the wife entirely in abeyance. And therefore, in the generality of cases, her contracts and business transactions could have no validity whatever; for it is only a juristic person whose acts can have the effect of creating or transferring rights. For the same reason she would be beyond the authority of the courts,—as much so as the sovereign himself,—and no court could acquire jurisdiction of her (in the cases falling within our hypothesis), because process cannot issue except against a person known to the law as an individual. If, then, a suit was instituted against her, and she suffered a default, still no valid judgment could be given. The whole proceeding would be void ab initio and could result in nothing effectual. It seems to us that the vital point is clearly indicated in the following remark of the court of appeals of Kentucky: "If, as is unquestionably true, a judgment is void if the court rendering it had no jurisdiction for want of service of process, then it seems to us that it should be equally so if the one served with process is incapacitated by law from retaining an attorney, or has no such legal existence as authorizes a personal liability. In the one case the court has no jurisdiction, and in the other there is nothing within its jurisdiction which has a legal existence." [20]

§ 191. Under Partially enabling Statutes.

Thus far we have considered the validity of judgments against married women at common law. It is now necessary to consider the enabling statutes which, both in England and in most of the states, have introduced the most important changes in their legal powers and relations. These statutes may be broadly divided into two

[20] Parsons v. Spencer, 83 Ky. 305. On another appeal in the same case (Spencer v. Parsons, 89 Ky. 577, 13 S. W. 72, 25 Am. St. Rep. 555), the court sustained its ruling by the following convincing line of argument: "Generally, a feme covert has no personality in law. She is not recognized by it save in a few excepted cases, so that a personal judgment can be taken against her. The contracts of an infant are in general voidable only, while those of a married woman are void. True, she may, under certain circumstances, bind her separate estate, but not herself personally; the reason being that she has no personal identity in law. It does not follow because, as an exceptional case, a personal judgment may go against her for tort, or upon a contract made by her when single, the reason being that her status at the making of it is regarded as following it to its completion, that therefore all personal judgments against her are merely erroneous, and not void. If she has no legal status in court, certainly it should have no jurisdiction to render a judgment binding her personally. Her existence is merged in that of the husband, and she can make no contract binding herself personally, or subjecting her to a judgment in personam. Her contract is void in law. In equity, it may be enforced against her separate estate, if she so intended; but she incurs no personal liability by it, because she has, legally speaking, no personal existence, and it must be satisfied out of her estate by in rem proceedings. She is by law incapacitated from retaining an attorney, and no personal liability arises, because she has no legal existence. There is, therefore, so far as she is concerned, no person within the court's jurisdiction. If a personal judgment be rendered upon a claim, the alleged liability is merely placed upon an advanced footing, and if originally it was void as to her, then the unauthorized judgment should not estop her from resisting it, from the fact that she was not sui juris, and had no such legal existence as authorized a personal judgment. We are aware there is a conflict of authority in this country upon this question; but the views above advanced seem to us not only supported by reason, but we know they are sustained by such high authority as the supreme courts of Pennsylvania, Missouri, and other states."

classes, those which fully emancipate the wife, and those which release her only partially from the common law disabilities. Statutes of the latter class usually give the married woman power to make contracts with respect to her separate estate, to incur debts for its repair and improvement, to make herself liable for supplies for the maintenance of the family, and to sue and be sued in respect to such contracts and debts. It is generally held, under an enabling statute allowing a married woman to charge her separate estate by certain kinds of contracts beneficial to herself or the estate, that a judgment against her, founded on such a contract, will be erroneous (or void, according to the doctrine prevailing in the particular state), unless the record itself shows that the debt is one for which her separate estate is liable.[21] Thus, under a law in Pennsylvania, that a judgment against a wife in a joint action, so as to bind her separate estate, shall not be rendered unless it shall be proved that the debt sued for was contracted by the wife for necessaries for the family, a default judgment which does not show that any testimony was taken is void.[22] And in any case no general judgment can be given; it must be limited to the separate property of the wife in reference to which the contract was made.[23] In Alabama, the judgment must specify the property to be bound. "A general judgment, or a judgment which pretermits the ascertainment of the estate of the wife condemned to its satisfaction cannot be rendered. * * * There can be no personal judgment against the wife; the only judgment that can be rendered is a judgment in rem, a judgment of condemnation of the statutory estate described in the complaint."[24] So where an enabling statute allows her to bind her separate real estate, a judgment against the land is valid, but not a personal judgment against the woman.[25] And in an action against a married woman to dispossess her of lands, no personal judgment, either for damages or costs, can be rendered against her.[26] But her coverture does not prevent the rendition of a decree against lands descended to her, for contribution to the other heirs on account of a debt of the ancestor which they have paid.[27] Where a married woman is allowed to mortgage her separate estate, but there is no statute allowing her to sue and be sued as a feme sole, the remedy is by charging the property in equity; but a personal judgment against her on the mortgage note is erroneous.[28] According to the law in Louisiana, a judgment against a married woman is void and of no effect when her husband has not been cited with her, and she is not authorized by him or by the judge to defend the suit.[29] As to confessions of judgment by married women, under these enabling statutes, the reader is referred to section 55 of this volume.

that a personal judgment against a married woman, if otherwise regular, is as valid and binding as any other.[31] Thus, where the property of a married woman is levied upon by her husband's creditors as his property, and she interposes a claim, she is bound, just as any other suitor would be, by the judgment in the claim case.[32] So where she prefers a suit against her trustee to enforce the trust, or to charge the trustee with maladministration, she is concluded by a judgment against her.[33]

In respect to their legal disabilities, infants occupy a position analogous to that of married women. But the courts have shown a much stronger disposition to sustain judgments given against the former than those rendered against the latter. Assuming that an infant defendant has been brought before the court by a proper service of process, it is regular and orderly to appoint a guardian ad litem for him, who then assumes the defense of the action and protects the interests of the minor. But if a judgment is rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and subject, it is held, by the great preponderance of authorities, that it will not be void because the defendant was an infant and no guardian ad litem was appointed, although it will be irregular and liable to reversal, or voidable on a proper proceeding for that purpose.[84] The theory is, that the appointment of a guardian is not a prerequisite to the jurisdiction of the court; it attaches upon due service of the process being made. Consequently, the omission to appoint a guardian does not impair the authority of the court to proceed in the case, but is at most an irregularity in the exercise of its lawful jurisdiction, which, on settled principles of law, may impregnate its judgment with error, but cannot render it absolutely null. Very important results follow from the placing of such sentences in the category of voidable judgments, as distinguished from those which are entirely void. For, first, the judgment will stand as a valid adjudication, against the infant and all others who may be interested, until it is set aside or reversed.[85] Again, the omission to appoint a guardian ad litem will not vitiate the judgment on a collateral attack; it is only voidable by a direct proceeding.[86] And if it is set aside, the interest of a bona fide purchaser under the judgment without notice will not be affected.[87]

And further, the avoidance of the judgment is at the election of the defendant; upon attaining his majority, he may execute a written release of errors, which will have the effect to confirm the judgment.[38] And while the courts will always be careful of the rights of infants, they will not in all cases set aside irregular judgments against them as of course; they will refuse to do so where it appears from the record or otherwise that the infant suffered no substantial injustice.[39] As respects proceedings to probate a will, no appointment of a guardian ad litem for any minor interested in the testator's estate is necessary, and the probate is valid, notwithstanding the omission of such appointment.[40]

§ 194. Service of Process on Infants.

It is indispensable to the validity of a judgment against an infant that the record should show that he was made a party in some legal and effectual mode.[41] Ordinarily the statute requires that personal service be made upon the infant, if over the age of fourteen years (and sometimes upon the guardian also), and upon a parent, guardian, or person having charge of the minor, if under that age. This requirement is jurisdictional; the law must be strictly followed; and neither the infant nor his guardian can accept service, or waive the due service of process.[42] The service, as stated, should be personal.

But it is held in Kentucky, that a judgment against an infant constructively served, without the appointment of a guardian ad litem, is not void, but will stand good until set aside or reversed.[43] And where the statute provides for service on non-resident defendants by publication, service may be made in that manner upon non-resident infants.[44] It is clearly irregular to appoint a guardian ad litem until after the defendant has been duly brought before the court. Yet numerous cases hold that, although the infant was never personally served, or although the service was not in compliance with the statute, or was otherwise defective, still, if a guardian ad litem was appointed and an answer filed and the action defended, the judgment will not be void, though the defendant may have it reversed or set aside.[45] But some other authorities maintain the rule that where infant defendants are not served with process and do not appear, the court has no authority whatever to appoint a guardian ad litem for them, and no jurisdiction as to them, and a judgment against them is utterly void.[46] There is something to be said in favor of this position, but both the preponderance of the cases and the drift of judicial thinking appear to be against it. In Illinois, it is held that if service is made upon the infant personally, instead of upon his guardian, as required by the statute, and no guardian ad litem appointed, the court is without jurisdiction.[47] Similarly, when the infant is under the age of fourteen years, and the summons is not served on his father, mother, guardian, or other person having charge of him, as the statute prescribes, it has been held that a judgment against him is void, and a sale of his land thereunder should be set aside.[48]

Summarizing the conclusions reached in this and the preceding sections as sustained by the majority of the decisions, we may say that, in order that a judgment against an infant may be entirely regular and valid, both due service of process and the appointment of a guardian for the suit are necessary. But if (1) no service is had upon the defendant, but a guardian is appointed and defends, or if (2) the infant is within the jurisdiction of the court by personal citation, but no guardian is appointed for him,—in either of these cases, the judgment will be irregular and voidable, but not a mere nullity. If neither of these requisites is complied with, the judgment will ordinarily be utterly void. To the last statement, however, there may be exceptions in peculiar circumstances. In a case in North Carolina, where it appeared that there was no service of process upon infant defendants, and no guardian appointed to protect their rights, but they were brought in by an order directing them to be made parties with leave to answer, it was held that a judgment taken against them was irregular and might be set aside at any time, but it was not treated as a nullity.[49] But here we approach the great principle, applicable to all persons alike, that jurisdiction over them is only acquired by service of process in some regular and recognized mode.

§ 195. Appearance by Attorney or Guardian.

attains majority, or may be reversed on error.[50] In a case in California, where, in a suit against infants, there was no personal service upon them, but their general guardian appeared and defended for them, it was held that such appearance gave the court jurisdiction of their persons.[51] And in many of the states a general guardian, already appointed, may appear for the minor,[52] though in others a guardian ad litem must in all cases be appointed.[53]

§ 196. Effect of Failure to plead Infancy.

The general disposition of the authorities is to regard the plea of infancy as a personal privilege, which may be waived, and if it is not pleaded, a judgment against the infant is binding upon him.[54] Still there are some cases which hold,—on analogy to the rule obtaining in equity,—that a judgment by default cannot properly be rendered in any case against an infant.[55] But the better doctrine is that a judgment rendered upon default against an infant, after due and proper service of a summons upon him, though without the appointment of a guardian ad litem, is erroneous and voidable, but not void. And it is incumbent upon the infant, within a reasonable time after he attains his majority, having knowledge of the judgment, to take steps to avoid it, or he will be bound by his own acquiescence.[56]

§ 197. Decrees in Equity against Infants.

In the courts of equity the rights and privileges of an infant are generally governed by the same rules as at law, except that chancery possesses, and will employ, larger and more diversified means of ascertaining and protecting his interests. In order to make a decree against a minor, the court must acquire jurisdiction of his person in some legal and regular manner. Thus where a decree was rendered against an infant whose guardian was an individual party to the bill, but not in his capacity as guardian, it was considered that the infant was not bound by the decree.[57] So also, a guardian ad litem should be appointed, just as at law. But though infant defendants may not have a guardian to protect their interests, yet a decree made against them is not for that reason void, but it will stand as valid until reversed.[58] However, if the decree, under such circumstances, is in favor of the infants, it is valid and cannot be attacked collaterally.[59] An important and invariable rule, which must be here noticed, is that equity will require an investigation of the merits in every case where infants are concerned; it will not rest satisfied with the fact that no defense is set up; neither will it suffer a guardian to admit away the rights of the ward. Hence a decree cannot pass pro confesso against an infant.[60] A similar rule governs the case of consent decrees. "Where infants are concerned, the court will not make a decree by consent, without first referring it to the master to ascertain whether it is for their benefit. But when once a decree has been pronounced without that previous step, it is considered as of the same authority as if it had been referred to the master, and he had made a report thereupon that it would be for their benefit."[61] According to the practice followed in many jurisdictions, a decree against an infant is first entered nisi; and a day is given him, after he shall attain full age, to come in and show cause against making the decree absolute. If he omits to do so, the decree becomes final and he is conclusively bound by it.[62] But whether the omission of the court to secure this privilege to the infant will invalidate the decree, wholly or in part, is not so clear upon the authorities. The cases seem to agree that a decree made absolute in the first instance would not be void, although it might be voidable.[63] And there are decisions to the effect that such a decree would be set aside on the application of the infant, after his majority, as by bill of review; on the ground that the infant defendant has an absolute and indefeasible right to show cause against the decree.[64] But the weight of the authorities is against this contention. The general disposition is to regard such a decree as valid and conclusive. "An infant defendant is as much bound by a decree in equity against her as a person of full age; and therefore if there be an absolute decree against a defendant who is under age, she will not be permitted to dispute it, unless upon such grounds as an adult might have disputed it, as fraud, collusion, or error." But they are not so bound in a proceeding by an official plaintiff, though they are styled relators, without the intervention of a prochein ami.[67]

§ 199. Judgments against Deceased Parties.

At the common law an action was abated by the death of a sole plaintiff or defendant. And in some of the states the doctrine appears to be irrevocably settled that a judgment against a person who was dead at the time of its rendition is absolutely null and void.[68] It is said in a recent case in Illinois: "A careful examination of the authorities clearly shows that a judgment by the common law, in the absence of any statutory provisions on the subject, against a dead person, either natural or artificial, is absolutely void, and the fact that service may have been obtained, or the suit commenced, before the death of the party, makes no difference in this respect."[69] So in the practice of the appellate courts; an order or judgment rescinding an order of appeal previously obtained by a party to a suit will be annulled and set aside, as void, if it appears that the rescinding order was rendered after the death of the party who had obtained the appeal.[70] Nor is the judgment saved by the fact that the defendant's sole executor was also a defendant in the same action, if he was joined in his individual capacity.[71] In Pennsylvania the courts have not committed themselves to this extreme view. Still they hold that a judgment against a defendant who was dead at the time of its entry,—this fact appearing of record,—will be stricken off.[72] And so a judgment entered on a warrant of attorney after the death of the defendant should be stricken off.[73] The consequences of holding the doctrine of the absolute nullity of the judgment, in these circumstances, are most important. For in the first place, no one would be imperilled by entirely disregarding it. It would be unnecessary for the representatives of the decedent, or his creditors, or any other persons interested, to take any measures to have the judgment vacated or reversed. Whenever it came in question, directly or collaterally, for whatever purpose presented, it might be attacked and overturned by proof of the defendant's death before its rendition. Neither could it operate as a source or support of any title or right, nor as the means of divesting any interest. Neither would it be binding as an adjudication of rights. No person could be estopped or concluded by its findings. And this is logically the state of the law in those jurisdictions where this view is adopted. But, as will appear from the following section, it is by no means universal.

The great preponderance of authority is to the effect that, where the court has acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the persons, during the lifetime of a party, a judgment rendered against him after his death is, although erroneous and liable to be set aside, not void nor open to collateral attack.[74] A late important case declares that "the decided weight of authority seems to be to the effect that if a court of general jurisdiction, or a court which has acquired full jurisdiction over the cause and over the parties, renders a judgment for or against a party after the death of such party, the judgment is not for that reason void. It may be erroneous, but until reversed by some appropriate proceeding, it is valid." [75] So in Minnesota: "While the court ought to cease to exercise its jurisdiction over a party at his death, the neglect to do so is an error to be corrected by some proceeding in the action in which the error occurs, and the judgment rendered after the party's death, though erroneous, is not on that account to be attacked in a collateral action. In other words the judgment is voidable when properly assailed, but not void." [76] For illustration, where the accounts of an administrator are settled and filed in the proper court in his lifetime, showing a balance due the estate, the court thereby acquires personal jurisdiction, and a judgment rendered after his death, confirming the report and directing payment of the sum in his hands, is not void when attacked collaterally in a suit against the surety on his bond, though the judgment might have been reversed on appeal.[77] So a judgment rendered when both the plaintiff and defendant are dead is erroneous; but relief can only be had by petition in the nature of a bill of review, or for a new trial, or by motion to set aside the judgment.[78] A judgment may be entered up, after the defendant's death, on an agreement for judgment made by him in his lifetime, but execution cannot issue without a scire facias to his executors.[79] On similar principles, a judgment rendered against a corporation after its dissolution by an act of the legislature is erroneous but not void.[80] The English statute provides that judgment may be entered up on a verdict within two terms after the death of the party against whom the verdict was given. But it is held that a judgment is valid, although not entered within that time, if the verdict was returned during the life of the party, and the delay was occasioned by a motion touching an award.[81]

The object of setting aside a judgment rendered against a party who died before the verdict, is to give his representatives an opportunity to resist a recovery. For otherwise the plaintiff might profit by the accidental circumstance, and the consequent cessation of opposition, to secure a judgment to which he was not entitled.[82] The method of avoiding the effect of the judgment will depend somewhat upon the state of the record, and will also vary in the different jurisdictions. The rule established by the supreme court of Nebraska, however, commends itself as both reasonable and practical. There a judgment rendered against a person (and equally so of one rendered in his favor) after his death, is reversible if the fact and time of death appear on the record, or in error coram nobis; if the fact must be shown aliunde, it is voidable and not void and cannot be impeached collaterally.[83] The writ of error coram nobis has fallen into desuetude in most of the states. But probably a motion in the court where the record remains, with due notice, and supported by affidavits, would be everywhere recognized as a proper proceeding to procure the vacating of a judgment objectionable on this ground but not disclosing the fact of death.

It is also to be observed that the validity of judgments, in these circumstances, will sometimes be helped by the fiction of relation. In an English case, where a judgment was signed at the opening of the office at its usual hour, 11 A. M., and the defendant died at 9:30 on the same morning, the judgment was held regular, on the principle that judicial proceedings are to be considered as taking place at the earliest period of the day on which they are done.[84] And in an early Massachusetts decision it was said: "By the common law, all proceedings in a suit at law are stopped by the death of one of the parties. If either of them die before judgment, no judgment can be entered; if after judgment, no execution can issue. But to avoid the inconvenience of this principle, the doctrine of relation has been resorted to; so that if judgment be not actually entered in court, or signed in vacation, as is the practice in England, and either party die, the judgment shall be considered as entered on the first day of the term, and an execution may issue bearing teste of that day, so as to save the fruits of a judgment to the party entitled to it. But this practice proves the general principle as first stated, and that it was necessary to resort to fiction in order to avoid the effect of that principle." [85] It must be added that if the personal representatives of a deceased defendant were duly made parties to the proceeding previous to the judgment, it is not enough to vitiate the judgment that it is entered against the dead man by name, instead of against the representatives, for the error is merely clerical.[86]

§ 201. Death of One of Several Defendants.

By an extension of the principles stated in the preceding section, it is held that where, in a joint action, one defendant dies before judgment, and his death is not suggested on the record, and judgment is rendered against all the defendants, the judgment is voidable only, not void, and is not open to collateral attack, although it may be vacated on motion.[87] However, in some of the states, where the strict rule prevails in the case of a sole defendant, it is also held that a judgment against several, one of whom was dead at its rendition, is void and a nullity.[88] Whether the judgment is void or merely voidable in respect to the deceased defendant, an important and difficult question arises as to its effect upon the surviving defendants. If void as to one, is it void as to all? If voidable as to one, must it be vacated as to all? Some of the cases hold that although a judgment or decree taken against a person by name, then dead, jointly with others, may be void as to the decedent, it would prima facie be good as to the other defendants.[89] But there are also decisions to the effect that such a judgment cannot be permitted to stand even against the survivors.[90] The solution of this question must ultimately depend upon whether a joint judgment is to be considered an entirety or not,—a point which will be discussed in a subsequent section.[91] For obviously, if the judgment is an entire thing and not susceptible of division, the fact that one of the defendants is dead is error which must cause it to be entirely set aside.

There is one case in which a judgment against a dead man is of unquestionable validity, namely, where it is entered nunc pro tunc as of a time when he was alive. The power to make such entries is within the common law authority of the courts, and it may be exercised in cases where the defendant dies in the interval between the finding of a verdict and the entry of judgment upon it, provided that the delay was not caused by the laches of the other party, but was attributable to the act of the court, in advising or deliberating upon the case after its submission, or to its being tied up by a motion for a new trial or similar proceeding. Under these circumstances, in furtherance of justice, and to prevent the successful party from being deprived of the fruits of the judgment to which he is entitled, the court will order it to be entered as of the time when the verdict was returned or the cause submitted.[92] So where a garnishee has answered, and the cause is continued, and he dies before the entry of judgment, judgment may be rendered against him as of the term when he made his disclosure.[93] This subject has already been considered in detail.[94]

§ 203. Jurisdiction must be acquired before Party's Death.

If the court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, and the defendant, after having appeared and pleaded, dies, the judgment subsequently entered against him will at most be voidable, and may in some cases be made entirely valid by retroactive entry. But it is essential that jurisdiction should have attached during the defendant's life; and if the action is commenced against one already dead, the judgment will be absolutely void for want of jurisdiction.[95]

§ 204. Judgment for Deceased Plaintiff.

In regard to the validity of a judgment rendered in favor of a plaintiff, after his death, the books contain contradictory expressions. Some cases hold that such a judgment is not void, but voidable at most, cannot be collaterally impeached, and is valid until reversed or vacated.[96] Other decisions regard it as a mere nullity, invalid for every purpose, and liable to be overturned whenever and wherever brought in question.[97] In order to arrive at just conclusions on this point, it is necessary to take into account the time or stage of the cause at which the decease of the plaintiff occurs. And first, if an action is commenced in the name of a person already dead (as where the decedent is the nominal plaintiff, and the one for whose benefit the suit is prosecuted is the real party in interest), or if one of several joint claimants is dead before action brought, it is held that the defendant must take advantage of the fact by plea in abatement, at the peril of being estopped by his silence, and the judgment for plaintiff will not be disturbed.[98] But it may also happen that the plaintiff dies during the pendency of the suit and before verdict. In this case, supposing the cause of action to be one which survives, the regular practice is to revive the action in favor of his personal representatives. But if this is omitted, and the suit proceeds to judgment in the name of the decedent, it is more reasonable to hold it voidable only than to consider it entirely null. For the case cannot be distinguished in principle from that of a defendant dying while the action is pending, where, as already shown (section 200), the great preponderance of authority sustains the rule that the judgment is at least impervious to collateral attack and must be vacated or reversed by proper proceedings. Both cases are equally governed by the principle that when once the jurisdiction of the court has attached, no subsequent error or irregularity in the exercise of that jurisdiction can make its judgment void. Yet it would be too much to predicate entire validity of the judgment in the case supposed. Undoubtedly it would be irregular, and the court would vacate it on a proper application.[99] If the plaintiff dies after a verdict, or after trial and submission to the court, it is proper to enter judgment nunc pro tunc as of the date of the verdict or submission. But if the judgment is entered as of the actual date when rendered, it is not void, and suit may be brought upon it by the personal representative of the deceased plaintiff.[100] "As to rendering judgment on a verdict found before the death of the plaintiff," says the court in Missouri, "our statute expressly authorizes it, notwithstanding his subsequent death, and the statute is merely a codification of the common law, which never allows a delay occasioned by the court to change the condition of a suit."[101] Still, the better practice clearly is to enter the judgment as of the term in which the verdict was returned.[102] It is also to be remarked that a judgment may be amended so as to show that, instead of being rendered in favor of the deceased plaintiff, it was really rendered in favor of his personal representatives, and this may be done without notice to the defendant, or after his death.[103] Finally, if the court renders judgment during the lifetime of the plaintiff, the clerk may perform the ministerial act of entering and recording it after his death.[104]

This on the theory that "the whole time of the circuit relates to the first day, so that if the party die on any day during the circuit, though before the trial, this is regarded as a death after verdict."

After a verdict was found for the plaintiff in an action, certain questions of law were reserved, but upon a hearing judgment was rendered on the verdict. In the meantime the plaintiff had died, but this fact being unknown to his counsel, the execution was issued in his favor. The court, upon the execution being returned unexecuted and cancelled, vacated the judgment and permitted the administrator to come in and prosecute the action, it appearing that the rights of third persons would not be affected thereby. The motion was overruled, and the clerk entered up judgment as of the then current term. Afterwards the husband took out administration on the plaintiff's estate, and moved the court to bring forward the action "that the proper judgment may be made up." The court then made an entry reciting the death of the plaintiff, withdrawal and discontinuance as to the husband, his appearance as administrator, and judgment on the verdict. The defendant objected that there was already one judgment standing against him, and he might be doubly liable. But it was held that the first judgment was absolutely invalid, and at any rate the old record was effectually vacated by the allowance of the motion to bring forward.

An insane person may be sued and jurisdiction over him acquired by the like process as if he were of sound mind. But when it is made to appear to the court that a party to the suit is insane, it is the duty of the court to appoint a guardian ad litem for him, or to have his committee or conservator made a party. "And no doubt it is the duty of a plaintiff who sues an insane person, if he has knowledge of the insanity, to inform the court thereof. But the failure to perform any of these duties does not affect the jurisdiction of the court, but only the regularity of the proceedings. Therefore it is, that the judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, and of the person of such a party, notwithstanding such irregularity, is not absolutely void." [105] On this principle, it is held by all the courts that a judgment against a person who was non compos mentis at the time of its rendition, though without joining his legal guardian, is binding and conclusive upon him, is not to be impeached in any collateral action, and stands as a valid adjudication until annulled or reversed in some direct proceeding for that purpose.[106] "The only question presented in this case is, whether a judgment by default against a lunatic, upon service of process on him alone, be void because his committee was not a party; and it is our opinion that, though evidently erroneous, the judgment is not void."[107] So in New Hampshire: "The fact that a person against whom a suit is commenced is, at the service of the process upon him, a person of insane mind, and that he so continued until judgment rendered, and that he appeared in person or by attorney, or not at all, is good cause to reverse the judgment upon a writ of error; though for reasons which we think inapplicable and without force here, and perhaps little creditable to the jurisprudence of an enlightened country, it seems not to have been so held in England. But in such case the defect in the proceedings renders them only voidable and not void."[108] That a person of unsound mind should be irrevocably bound by proceedings of which he could have no intelligent consciousness seems a legal anomaly. It is true a court may acquire jurisdiction of his person, but only in the sense that it obtains jurisdiction of a chattel, for example, by its attachment. And the unfortunate defendant lacks those means of defending himself and of challenging the claims asserted against him which justice dictates as the inviolable right of every person. We should therefore expect that a judgment against him would be regarded at least as voidable by the court which pronounced it. And this is undoubtedly the better doctrine, and the one prevailing in most of the states,[109] although there are some cases which hold that such a judgment is not even voidable, and that no relief can be had against it except by an application to chancery for an injunction against its enforcement.[110] And it will be remembered that a court of equity would in such a case inquire into the merits of the judgment, and would not enjoin it on account of the defendant's lunacy, but only because its execution should appear to be against conscience and inequitable. If the fact of lunacy appeared anywhere in the record, we are much inclined to think that it would be within the province of an appellate court to reverse the judgment on error.

§ 206. Joint Parties at Common Law.

At common law, if several defendants were joined in an action ex contractu, and all were brought before the court by service or appearance, it was absolutely essential to the plaintiff's recovery that he should establish a joint liability; in other words, he must recover against all or none; it was not competent to enter a judgment in favor of one defendant and against another.[111] And this rule still obtains in many of the states which have not departed widely from the common law practice. The rule, however, is subject to one important exception. Though the obligation in suit is joint, or joint and several, yet if one defendant pleads matter which goes to his personal discharge, such as bankruptcy, or to his personal disability to contract, such as infancy, or any other matter which does not go to the nature of the writ, or pleads or gives in evidence matter which is a bar to the action as against himself only, and of which the others could not take advantage, judgment may be rendered for such defendant against the rest.[112] "That rule was always adopted," says the court in Massachusetts, "with this exception,—that when one defendant pleaded in his discharge some matter personal to himself, as a discharge under a bankrupt act or insolvent law, and upon such plea had a verdict, the other defendants were still liable. The reason of the distinction is obvious, and it is this; that such a special personal defense does not falsify the averment of an original joint promise, but, admitting it, avoids it by the averment of matter subsequent." [113] But, supposing the exception not to arise in the particular case, so strictly was the rule enforced that not even the most conclusive proof or unqualified admission of the liability of one defendant would entitle the plaintiff to a verdict against him alone.[114] It has been held, however, that the rule has no proper application to an action against administrators as such.[115] And it should be observed that the rule applies only where all the defendants are brought before the court or named as parties in the writ. A judgment against one of several makers of a note, without process against the others, releases those who are not sued.[116] And in some of the states, in derogation of the common law rule, a distinction is taken between joint contracts and such as are joint and several, the courts holding that in an action upon the latter species of obligation the plaintiff may enter a nol. pros. against one of the defendants and proceed to judgment against the others.[117] But where the plaintiff insists that he is entitled to judgment against all the defendants or none, and it proves that he is not entitled to judgment against some of them, he waives his right to the determination of the question as to whether he is entitled to judgment against any.[118] A judgment otherwise joint in form is not rendered several by a finding as to which of the defendants is the principal debtor, and which are the sureties.[119] And though one of two defendants sued as individuals on a note to which their names were signed as such did not in fact sign the note, judgment should go against both on proof of their liability as partners.[120] Under the main rule here considered it is plainly erroneous to render a final judgment against a part of several defendants while the cause remains undisposed of as to the others.[121] Hence if one of the defendants suffers a default, and an interlocutory judgment is entered up against him, it cannot be made final until the case is finally concluded as to the other defendants; and even then, if they should succeed in maintaining a defense which went to the whole right of action, the verdict in their favor will enure to the benefit of the defaulted party, and judgment must be given for him, equally with the rest, notwithstanding the default.[122] And in a case in Texas, where the court declined to enter judgment against one defendant, and continued the case as to him, this was held to make the judgment entered against the other defendant void.[123]

At common law, there is also a rule (converse to that above stated) that, in a joint action by several plaintiffs, there can be no recovery by any of them unless all are entitled to a judgment.[124] But this is applicable only where the cause of action is joint, and does not apply to an action in which a number of creditors unite to set aside a fraudulent conveyance or attachment of their debtor's property.[125] And this rule also has been changed or modified by statute in some of the states. Thus, in Indiana, under a law authorizing the court to determine the ultimate rights of the parties on each side, or between themselves, where justice requires it, the court may order judgment in favor of the one plaintiff who shows himself entitled to recover, though the cause of action is joint and breaks down as to the other plaintiffs.[126]

§ 207. In Actions of Tort.

The rule stated in the preceding section must be restricted in its application to actions ex contractu; it does not govern in the case of actions ex delicto. In a suit founded upon tort, against several defendants, the plaintiff may recover against as many and only such defendants as he proves to be guilty, and any defendant, as against whom the proof fails, is entitled to a verdict.[127] In Maryland, in an action of this kind, if, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, there is no evidence against one of the defendants, he is considered entitled to be acquitted; and this practice is necessary, as the court observes, for otherwise the plaintiff could deprive the defendant of material and competent witnesses by joining them as parties to the action.[128] So if a verdict is returned against all the defendants sued jointly in tort, but in respect to one of the defendants it is not sustained by the evidence, it will be set aside, as against that defendant, upon his proper application, and the judgment be permitted to stand as against the party proven guilty of the injury complained of.[129] If the jury find a verdict against one of the joint defendants, without mentioning the other, this will justify the entry of a judgment against the former and in favor of the latter.[130] In Tennessee, it is said that joint tort feasors sued jointly are not entitled to have the damages assessed against them severally.[131] But in other states, it appears to be no ground of complaint that judgments are rendered separately against the defendants for separate and different amounts.[132] And if one of the defendants obtains a new trial, a judgment for a less amount may be rendered against him, while the original judgment remains in force against the other.[133]

§ 208. Joint Debtor Acts.

In many of the states, the common law rule in respect to the recovery in actions against several defendants has been changed by statutes. These statutes—commonly called "joint debtor acts"—provide that judgment may be given "for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants," and usually contain a further provision that "in an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper." [134] Under these statutes, if a plaintiff commences an action against two or more defendants upon a joint obligation, he is no longer compelled to establish a joint cause of action against all, but a judgment may be taken against the party or parties shown to be liable, when the others are not liable.[135] Thus, when two defendants are sued jointly on a contract which, on its face, is the joint contract of both, but which in legal effect was at all times the contract of one only, a judgment may be rendered against the party liable and in favor of the other.[136] So where several persons are sued as partners on a note signed by one, and the evidence shows that there was no partnership, judgment may be rendered against the one who signed, and a nonsuit may be ordered as to the others.[137] Or a plaintiff, suing several as partners for a breach of a contract, may recover against such as he can prove to be parties to the contract, without proof of the partnership.[138] And where an action is brought against two or more upon a joint contract, an equitable defense peculiar to one defendant being set up by him, the court may give judgment for the plaintiff against the other defendants, and for the one defendant against the plaintiff.[139] And a recovery may be had against one defendant alone, in a proper case, notwithstanding another of the debtors has been released by the plaintiff upon a compromise.[140] And it is held that a statute of the character above described is a provision as applicable to suits by attachment as to suits in any other form; and hence, where an attachment is sued out against two persons jointly, it may be sustained as against the separate property of one alone.[141] It is a further consequence of acts of this nature, that where the verdict is in favor of a part of the defendants and against the others, the judgment thereon, if entered against "the defendants" generally, will not be erroneous; for the judgment will be construed with reference to the verdict, and will be held to be against only those defendants against whom the verdict was given.[142] But if the verdict, or the finding of the court, is against all the defendants jointly, it would be error to render a judgment thereon against a part only, dismissing the action as to the others.[143] Under that clause of the joint debtor acts which provides that the court may render judgment against one of the defendants, leaving the action to proceed as to the others, whenever a several judgment would be proper, the cases hold that the true test, as to whether a separate judgment may be had, is whether a separate action could have been maintained.[144] As these statutes are framed in some of the states they permit a plaintiff, suing upon a joint cause of action against two defendants, to recover a separate judgment against each for one-half of the claim.[145] And where the statute also permits the court to grant affirmative relief to defendant, it may give judgment for one of the defendants as against another, if that can be done without injury to the plaintiff.[146] But a judgment against a garnishee, when there has been no judgment against the defendant in the suit to which the garnishment is ancillary, is void.[147] And the fact that persons have been improperly joined as parties defendant does not warrant the entry of a judgment in their favor, but the action should be dismissed as to them.[148]

In an action of contract against several defendants, if one of them suffers default, and another, under the general issue, sets up and maintains a defense which negatives the plaintiff's right to recover against either of the defendants and shows that he had no cause of action, the plaintiff will not be entitled to judgment against the one who was defaulted, but on the contrary the successful defense will enure to the latter's benefit, and judgment must be rendered for both the defendants.[149] So if one defendant interposes an objection by way of demurrer, going to the plaintiff's right to recover, and not merely a personal matter of discharge, which is sustained, and judgment rendered on it in his favor, it will enure to the benefit of his co-defendant.[150] But this rule also is modified by the joint debtor acts. Thus, under a provision that judgment may be given for or against one or more of several defendants, it is held that, where three persons are sued as partners, and two of them suffer default, but the other answers, denying that he was a member of the firm, judgment may be entered against those in default, though it is rendered in favor of the answering defendant.[151] So an action on a joint and several obligation against two defendants, only one of whom appeared and answered, can be tried, and verdict and judgment rendered for or against the party answering, without regard to the proceedings against his co-defendant.[152]

On the other hand, if one of the defendants makes default and the other goes to trial, the effect is to suspend the judgment against the defaulting defendant until the result of the trial is ascertained, and if the plaintiff obtains a verdict, he is then entitled to a joint judgment against all the defendants.[153] Nor is there any necessity, in such a case, of having previously taken an interlocutory judgment by default against the party failing to answer.[154] Where, in a joint action ex contractu against two defendants, one of them is defaulted, and the other appears, and separate judgments are rendered against both of them, if the defendant who appeared enters a review, the effect is to vacate the judgment as to both defendants and to carry the whole case to the next succeeding term, notwithstanding a separate judgment may have been entered on the record against the defendant who was defaulted.[155]

§ 210. Judgment, when Several, when Joint.

In general, where an action is brought upon a joint contract or obligation against several defendants who plead and defend jointly, the judgment must be joint, and it is error to render several judgments against them for several damages.[156] But where, for example in an action against partners on a partnership obligation, separate judgments are entered against each of the defendants, instead of a joint judgment against all, this is considered merely an irregularity, which may be corrected on motion within the statutory time.[157] But where there are several defendants, and the items of damages are distinct, a joint judgment cannot be entered unless each defendant is liable to the full extent of the verdict.[158] And where the action is upon a joint and several contract, a several judgment would be proper, as the defendants might have been sued alone in such case; hence a judgment may be rendered against one or more without waiting the final trial.[159] So where, of two defendants, one is liable individually, and the other in his representative character, the judgment against them should be several.[160] And in an action to subject assets descended to several heirs to a debt of their ancestor, the judgment, if for the plaintiff, should be several against each of the heirs for the amount received by him from the ancestor, not to exceed, however, the amount to which the plaintiff is entitled.[161] But although a judgment be rendered against two parties jointly, yet it must be remarked that the judgment itself is a joint and several obligation, and consequently an action can be maintained upon it against either of the judgment-debtors separately, and it can in like manner be used as a set-off against either.[162]

§ 211. Joint Judgment as an Entirety.

There are numerous expressions in the books to the effect that a judgment is an entirety, and that if it is rendered against several defendants jointly, it is not susceptible of division or apportionment, so as to be purged of the error or irregularity it may contain as to one of them, while standing good against the rest. Accordingly it is held in a number of the states, that if the judgment is void as against one defendant, for want of jurisdiction over him, it must be considered as void as to all the defendants, and therefore a mere nullity.[163] This question might arise, for example, in a case where two persons were named as defendants, but only one was served with process, the other being a non-resident or not found, and where after a contest by the defendant served, judgment should be rendered against both. According, then, to the foregoing rule, the judgment could have no more effect against the defendant who was served than against the other. Hence, to carry the supposition a step further, if the judgment were made the basis of an action, whether in a domestic or foreign tribunal, against the defendant served, he might show the irregularity of the proceedings in respect of his co-defendant, and that would be sufficient to defeat a recovery against himself. The result seems scarcely consonant to reason and justice. Yet some of the decisions, arguing from the entirety of the judgment, have felt obliged to hold precisely that position.[164] But there are many other authorities which hold that although a judgment may be void as against one of the defendants, for lack of jurisdiction, still it may be valid and binding upon the others, or at most voidable, but not void in toto.[165] And if this view is adopted, it is evident that the judgment will be attended by its usual incidents, as against the defendant over whom jurisdiction attached, until it is regularly reversed or vacated. Until that time an action will lie upon the judgment against him, and he will not be permitted to attack it collaterally. There are other grounds on which the judgment may be void as to one of several defendants, such as legal disability or his previous decease. But the same principle is understood to govern these cases also, and there exists the same diversity of opinion in regard to them. Some of the cases hold that if a joint judgment is void as to one defendant, because that defendant was a slave, an infant, a married woman, or was dead before its rendition, it is void as to all; or, if an incapacity of that kind is conceived as rendering the judgment voidable only as against the person affected, these cases hold it to be equally voidable as against the co-defendants.[166] But other decisions take the ground that a judgment rendered jointly against a married woman (for instance) and others who are sui juris is not, as to the latter, void and collaterally assailable, although as to the married woman it is a nullity, and although, also, it is an entirety for the purposes of review on appeal or error, and would be reversed as to all the defendants if thus directly assailed.[167] When we inquire as to the proper disposition to be made of a joint judgment against several defendants, which is void as to one of them, when it is brought before a court of review by writ of error or appeal, we find the authorities more nearly harmonious. In general, they agree that it cannot be affirmed as to one defendant and reversed as to another, but must be reversed as an entirety.[168] And conversely, if in favor of the defendants, invalidity as to one will vitiate it as to all. "The judgment, being joint in favor of all the defendants and erroneous as to one, will have to be reversed as to all. A judgment jointly entered in favor of several defendants, whether in an action upon contract or for tort, cannot be affirmed as to one and reversed as to another. Such a judgment is an entirety, and must stand or fall together." [169] The acceptance of this rule, however, is not quite universal. It is said to have no application under the statutes and system of practice in Nevada.[170] And in California, if one of several defendants appeals from a judgment which is erroneous as to him, on account of insufficient service, the court will not reverse the judgment as to the other defendants, but will only reverse it as against the appellant.[171] In Virginia it is held that although at common law a joint judgment which is erroneous as to one defendant must be reversed as to all, yet if the alleged judgment against one is not merely erroneous but absolutely void and a mere nullity, this rule does not apply.[172] Before leaving the subject, it is necessary to remark that if the judgment is several as to the parties, there may well be cases in which it will be good as to one though invalid as against another, and in which an appellate court would reverse it in part and affirm it in part.[173] Further, the rule that a judgment void as to one defendant is void as to all is considered to apply only to judgments at law and not to decrees in equity.[174]

It will be obvious from the foregoing review of the authorities that the cases on this topic cannot be reconciled. But it will also appear that some of the courts holding the entire invalidity of a joint judgment, which is void as to one defendant, have been forced to an extreme length in the matter by the highly technical conception of such a judgment as an ideal entirety. Sound legal reason appears to suggest that while such a judgment is undoubtedly erroneous and liable to be reversed on appeal, yet, while unreversed, it ought not to be open to impeachment, by the debtor as to whom no irregularity exists, in any collateral proceeding. It also seems consonant to justice that judgments of this character should not be vacated or set aside on the application of the party legally bound, because, presumably, it is the other only who has been deprived of his rights or injured by an irregular or erroneous practice. As to the former, the judgment should not be shorn of its usual consequences, and there seems to be no adequate reason why it should not constitute a good cause of action against him. Finally, it is too much to say that the judgment supposed would be absolutely void as to both or all the defendants. For a void judgment is a mere nullity and binds no one, and no one can acquire any rights under it; whereas many of the cases (even those which use the expression "void" in application to such judgments) hold that a purchaser under such a judgment will be protected, that the record may be amended, that such a judgment merges the cause of action, that execution may be directed against one defendant and restrained as to the other, and so on, none of which consequences could follow if the judgment were merely null and void.

§ 212. Confession of Judgment by Joint Defendants.

A judgment cannot be confessed by one of several joint debtors so as to bind those not joining in the confession.[175] But a more difficult question arises in regard to the validity of a judgment by confession entered upon a warrant or statement signed by a part only of those who are named in the judgment. Clearly it is nugatory as to any defendant not signing. But will it stand, notwithstanding this, as a good and valid judgment against those who did sign or execute the authority? Some of the decisions answer this question in the affirmative.[176] And their position seems to be supported by sound reason and justice. In California, however, on the principle of the entirety of a judgment, it is held that if the warrant authorizes the entry of judgment against a certain number, no judgment can be entered against a less number, and it will be void as to all.[177]

It is a well established rule that if process in an action is served upon the person really intended to be sued, although a wrong name is given him in the writ and return, and he suffers a default, or, after appearing, omits to plead the misnomer in abatement, and judgment is taken against him, he is concluded thereby, and in all future litigation he may be connected with the suit or judgment by proper averments.[178] "The point of the objection to the judgment of the lower court is, that the defendant having been sued and served with process by a wrong name, the court acquired no jurisdiction of him, and could render no valid judgment against him. The objection gives the name quite too much importance. A name is a means of identity, but the change of the name or the application of a wrong name does not change the thing identified. It is not the name that is sued but the person to whom it is applied. Process served on a man by a wrong name is as really served on him as if it had been served on him by his right name, and if in such case he fails to appear, or, appearing, fails to object that he is sued by the wrong name, and the judgment be rendered against him by such name, he is as much bound by the judgment as if it had been rendered against him by his right name."[179] Exactly the same rule applies in the case of a corporation; though sued by a wrong name, it is bound, if duly served.[180] But in California, and probably in other states having similar statutory provisions, a judgment against a defendant served by a fictitious name, who appears and answers in his real name, cannot be supported unless the complaint is amended by inserting the true

name, as required by the code.[181] Moreover, it is essential to the plaintiff's recovery that it should be proved, not only that the real person was sued, but that he was duly served with process though under a mistaken name.[182] In a case where the complaint was against "—— Doyle" and others, and a summons was issued but there was no evidence that it was served, and John Doyle answered, and judgment was rendered against James Doyle, it was held to be void, because the party against whom it was given did not appear to be a party to the suit.[183]

Similar principles apply to the case of a misnomer in the judgment itself, where the defendant was correctly named in the writ or the pleadings. The judgment will not be avoided by such misnomer, if the record contains data by which the judgment can be amended, or if the record and the judgment together point out the persons to be bound by the judgment, with unmistakable certainty.[184] Further, a misnomer in a judgment may be cured, in a proper case, by the principle of "idem sonans." Thus, where a bill is filed to set aside a decree on the ground that the complainants were sued by a wrong name and therefore were not before the court, if the names given are idem sonantes, the bill will be dismissed.[185] So where a judgment is rendered and execution issued against "Rosina Coons," it is not sufficient reason for setting aside a sale of real estate made on such execution that the right name of the defendant is shown to be "Rosina Kuhn."[186] It may also happen that the process will contain a misnomer of the plaintiff. And some of the cases, having a regard to the defendant's right to be fully informed as to the person whose demand he is required to answer, have held that if the process misnames the plaintiff it does not give sufficient notice of the suit to the defendant, the court acquires no jurisdiction, and a judgment against the defendant by default is null and void. It was so ruled in a case where one Cunningham, plaintiff in the action, was described as "Cunnington."[187] But the better reason is with the cases which hold that service of process in favor of the right party by a wrong name is good, and a judgment in favor of the right party by his proper name will after trial cure a misnomer in the complaint, the summons, or the other proceedings.[188] So a judgment and execution in the name of the treasurer of a township, instead of the trustees as directed by law, cannot be held void, but voidable only.[189] A judgment for or against a partnership is not rendered invalid by the fact that it incorrectly names the partnership, if it also gives correctly the names of the individuals composing the firm.[190] The omission of the initial letter of the middle name of a defendant, in the entry and docketing of a judgment recovered against him, does not render it invalid or prevent its becoming a lien upon his real estate as against subsequent purchasers from him in good faith. As observed by Daniels, J.: "It was enough that one Christian name was properly added to the surname of the defendant, for in legal proceedings the law recognizes but one Christian name, and where a party is sued by that alone, the proceedings taken may regularly be continued to judgment in that name, and the fact that he may have one or more other names between his first Christian name and his surname will in no way affect their validity. § 214. Descriptio Personæ.

The fact that a descriptive word or phrase is added to a party's name in a judgment neither affects the validity of the judgment nor changes the legal rights and relations which it engenders. Thus the addition of the word "executor" to a defendant's name in a decree, without more, does not prevent the decree from binding his own property; the addition is mere surplusage.[193] So a judgment against "D., treasurer," is a personal judgment, the word "treasurer" being merely descriptio personæ.[194]

§ 215. Jurisdiction defined.

Etymologically the word "jurisdiction" signifies the power or duty of "declaring right," that is, of declaring, in the official character of a judge, what is the law applicable to a given state of facts, or what are the respective rights of parties, as determined by the application of law to the facts before the tribunal. Technically, it may be defined as the power and authority constitutionally conferred upon (or constitutionally recognized as existing in) a court or judge to pronounce the sentence of the law, or to award the remedies provided by law, upon a state of facts, proved or admitted, referred to the tribunal for decision, and authorized by law to be the subject of investigation or action by that tribunal, and in favor of or against persons (or a res) who present themselves, or who are brought, before the court in some manner sanctioned by law as proper and sufficient.[1] If this definition appears complicated, it is because of the necessity of grouping three very different elements. For jurisdiction naturally divides itself into three heads. In order to the validity of a judgment, the court must have jurisdiction of the persons, of the subject-matter, and of the particular question which it assumes to decide. It cannot act upon persons who are not legally before it, upon one who is not a party to the suit, upon a plaintiff who has not invoked its arbitrament, or upon a defendant who has never been notified of the proceeding. It cannot adjudicate upon a subject which does not fall within its province as defined or limited by law. Neither can it go beyond the issues and pass upon a matter which the parties neither submitted nor intended to submit for its determination. These several elements of jurisdiction will be taken up and considered in their order.

Since the administration of justice is a part of the business of government, and since judicial tribunals are the agencies devised for effecting this purpose, their jurisdiction must ultimately depend upon their institution by the sovereignty of the particular state or country. Hence the validity of their judgments may sometimes require to be tested on public or political grounds. We have elsewhere seen that the courts of a de facto government, or the de facto courts of a lawful government, are generally recognized as having jurisdiction.[2] But jurisdiction cannot be predicated of any voluntary or self-constituted tribunal, lacking the color of governmental authority. Its proceedings must at least appear to be had under the authority and sanction of the sovereign.[3] But supposing a legally constituted court, we are told that "by jurisdiction over the 'subject-matter' is meant the nature of the cause of action or relief sought; and this is conferred by the sovereign authority which organizes the court, and is to be sought for in the general nature of its powers or in the authority specially conferred. Jurisdiction of the 'person' is obtained by the service of process, or by the voluntary appearance of the party in the progress of the cause. Jurisdiction of the 'res' is obtained by seizure under the process of the court, whereby it is held to abide such order as the court may make concerning it." [4] By way of supplement to the above description we may add that the jurisdiction of a particular court, in respect to the matters of which it may take cognizance, may be defined in the constitutional or statutory enactment which creates it, or may be left to be inferred from the general nature of the court or the absence of specific limitations upon its powers, or may be enlarged or abridged by subsequent legislation. But where the constitution establishes a particular court and fixes its jurisdiction, it is not competent for the legislature to pass any statute abolishing the court, or either enlarging or abridging its jurisdiction.[5] And conversely if the constitution organizes a court and confers powers upon it, it does not require the aid of legislation to enable it to exercise those powers.[6] But if the alleged jurisdiction of a court to take any particular action is derived from a statute, and that statute is shown to be unconstitutional, the proceedings of the court must be considered void; for as the stream cannot rise higher than its source, no jurisdiction can be derived from a void act.[7] The question of the validity of a judgment, if depending on jurisdiction, must be determined by the jurisdiction of the court as existing at the time when the judgment was rendered.[8]

As jurisdiction is given by the law, the consent of the parties cannot confer the right to adjudicate upon any cause which the law has withheld from the cognizance of the particular court.[9] This rule may apply to cases where the territorial jurisdiction of the court is limited. Thus, under a constitutional provision that all civil suits shall be tried in the county wherein the defendant resides, a judgment obtained in a county other than that of the defendant's residence, by an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant, the latter agreeing to acknowledge the jurisdiction, is considered to be void as against the rights of subsequent judgment-creditors who obtain their judgments in the manner and place prescribed by law.[10] But a more familiar application of the rule is in the case of an attempt to bring within the cognizance of the court a subject-matter of which by law it has no jurisdiction. Indeed we are told that it is only when a judge or court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the proceeding or action in which an order is made or a judgment rendered, that such order or judgment is wholly void, and that the maxim applies that consent cannot give jurisdiction. In all other cases the objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction may be waived, and is waived when not taken at the time the exercise of the jurisdiction is first claimed.[11] And there is certainly good ground for doubting the applicability of the rule to the matter of jurisdiction of the person. For a defendant may cure a defective service of process, or waive the want of it, by appearing without exception. And this he appears also to do in confessing a judgment without action.[12] So there are many cases holding that a person under legal disabilities may consent to the jurisdiction of the court, or waive an objection to it, by suffering a default, at least so far that the judgment will not be entirely void, though it may be erroneous or voidable.[13] And it has even been held that a judgment in a state court against a consul of a foreign nation, taken upon default, is valid; on the ground that his not appearing and pleading to the jurisdiction of the court is a waiver of the want of jurisdiction over him.[14]

§ 218. Judgment without Jurisdiction is Void.

It is a familiar and universal rule that a judgment rendered by a court having no jurisdiction, of either the parties or the subject-matter, is void and a mere nullity, and will be so held and treated whenever and wherever and for whatever purpose it is sought to be used or relied on as a valid judgment.[15] The effect of a want of jurisdiction is clearly stated in an early decision of the United States supreme court in the following language: "Where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause, and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, is regarded as binding in every other court. But if it act without authority, its judgments and orders are regarded as nullities. They are not voidable but simply void, and form no bar to a recovery sought, even prior to a reversal, in opposition to them. They constitute no justification; and all persons concerned in executing such judgments or sentences are considered in law as trespassers."[16] Hence, for example, if a judgment is merely erroneous, the title acquired by a sale under it is valid and cannot be impeached collaterally; but if it is void for want of jurisdiction, the vendee takes no title whatever, and the sheriff's deed does not even create a cloud on the title which a court of equity can remove.[17] So, although a judgment upon a note rendered by a court having no jurisdiction of the case is void, the note is still a valid security; it is not merged in the judgment.[18] But in connection with this rule it is necessary to remember the legal presumptions in favor of the judgments and proceedings of courts of general jurisdiction and the rule against collateral attacks upon such judgments. The result deducible from a majority of the cases seems to be that it is only when the judgment appears upon its face to have been rendered without jurisdiction that it can be considered a mere nullity for all purposes. This will be shown more fully in the succeeding chapters.

It has been held that a void judgment may be accepted as valid by the consent of the parties, so the rights of third persons be not prejudiced. "All the parties interested may lawfully agree to confirm an invalid transcript, or nugatory judgment, provided the confirmation is to be efficacious, and give a lien, only from the time of the agreement properly appearing." [19] But other authorities maintain that proceedings void for want of jurisdiction cannot be cured by ratification or waiver.[20] And it is clear that a void judgment cannot be validated by citing the party against whom it was entered to show cause why it should not be declared valid,[21] nor by the court's approval of a sale on execution under it,[22] nor by the subsequent taking and dismissing of an appeal from such judgment.[23] And a void judgment does not fall within the class of subjects upon which a legislature may operate retroactively by a curative or confirmatory statute. An act of the legislature undertaking to validate a judgment of a court which was void for want of jurisdiction, would be an attempted exercise of judicial power by the legislature, since, the proceedings in court having been void, it would be the statute alone which should constitute an adjudication upon the rights of the parties; and it would also be objectionable as contravening the constitutional provision which secures to every man the enjoyment of his property except as the same may be taken from him by "due process of law," for this last phrase includes the attaching of jurisdiction, due notice, and an opportunity to be heard.[24] So when property has been attempted to be taken by a judicial proceeding which is void for want of jurisdiction, the legislature, for similar reasons, cannot validate it.[25] But if the judgment is merely defective, erroneous, or irregular, in consequence of the non-observance of some formality which the legislature might have dispensed with in advance, but is not objectionable on jurisdictional grounds, then it may be confirmed or validated by a retroactive statute.[26]

A judgment rendered against one who was not made a party to the suit, or who does not appear from the record to have been proceeded against in the action or to have had his day in court, cannot be regarded as in any sense a valid judgment.[27] So a judgment against a defendant named in the writ, but not made a party, is merely void.[28] A judgment cannot pass against a person who is not mentioned in the proceedings and who has not joined issue or made himself a party; and a mere citation served on such person does not compel his appearance or justify a judgment by default.[29] Thus, in a suit on the bond given by the defendant in an attachment, to obtain a return of the property attached, it appeared that the judgment in the original action was rendered against the sureties in the bond, who were not parties, as well as against the attachment-defendant; and it was held that the judgment was a mere nullity as to the sureties, although it was not void as to the defendant.[30]

§ 220. Notice to Defendant.

It is an unquestioned principle of natural justice that a man should have notice of any legal proceeding that may be taken against him, and a full and fair opportunity to make his defense. The law never acts by stealth; it condemns no one unheard. It is true that in proceedings in rem the notice may be constructive only, but here the action is directed against the thing itself, and there is no attempt to fasten a personal liability upon the parties concerned.[31] It is true also that constructive service of process is authorized in some other cases, but not for the purpose of a personal judgment. A personal judgment rendered against a defendant without notice to him, or an appearance by him, is without jurisdiction and is utterly and entirely void.[32] "We think it may be regarded as settled, that a judgment of any court, in a suit requiring ordinary adversary proceedings, that appears upon its face or may be shown by evidence (in a case where it may be shown) to have been rendered without jurisdiction having been acquired, by notice, of the person of the defendant, or without jurisdiction of the subject-matter, is void, and may be treated as being so when it comes in question collaterally." [33] Nor is this rule confined to judgments at law. A decree in chancery against a defendant who was never served with process and did not appear, is void and may be set aside although not appealed from.[34] And if the court has not acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, as in the case that no sufficient process has been served upon him, no judgment, even of abatement, can be rendered against the plaintiff; for the defendant must become a party before the court before he can have a judgment.[35]

It may be made a question whether the legislature of a state can entirely dispense with notice or citation to the defendant in an action. That this would be within its competence, is strongly intimated in an early decision of the supreme court of Georgia. "It is contended," said Lumpkin, J., "that the defendant must have notice, actual or constructive, otherwise no valid judgment could be rendered against him. We are not inclined to controvert this general rule. On the contrary we believe it to be well established by the authorities. There are several suggestions to make, however, as regards this principle. First, that it only obtains in the absence of positive law. The legislature may unquestionably authorize a judgment to be ren-or judgment that it should be served upon any party to the cause after it is filed. Western Security Co. v. Lafleur, 17 Wash. 406, 49 Pac. 1061.

dered against a party without notice. If the expression used in the statute will admit of a doubt, it will not then be presumed that a construction dispensing with notice can be agreeable to the intention of the legislature, the consequences of which are so unreasonable. But where the signification is manifest, there is no power of dispensation in the courts." [36] It may be strongly doubted, however, whether this is not ascribing an excessive power to the legislature. All our constitutions guarantee the rights and property of the individual against invasion except by "due process of law," which, according to an eminent writer, means, "in each particular case, such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs." [37] We are unable to discover any possibility of bringing a judgment, rendered without any species of notice to the defendant, within the terms of this definition. The question is different in regard to the constructive service of process. For this, as will appear hereafter, can in general only be used in a proceeding in rem, or one analogous to a proceeding in rem, and is not usually recognized as giving jurisdiction for a personal judgment, against the defendant, but only for an adjudication upon the res or status involved or for a decree which avails only against the property attached or found within the territorial jurisdiction.

§ 222. Statutes regulating Mode of Citation.

"It is competent for each state to prescribe the mode of bringing parties before its courts. Although its regulations in this respect can have no extra-territorial operation, they are, nevertheless, binding on its own citizens. For in respect to its own resident citizens, it is undoubtedly competent for the legislature to prescribe such modes of judicial proceeding as it may deem proper, to direct the manner of serving process, the notice which shall be given to defendants, and to declare the effect of a judgment rendered in pursuance of such notice." [38] Hence a judgment rendered in accordance with the requirements of the statute, though without actual notice to the defendant of the pendency of the suit, but upon such citation as the law authorizes (e. g., leaving a copy of the summons at his last usual place of abode, though he is then out of the state), is conclusive upon the parties until set aside by some direct proceeding for that purpose.[39] But statutes allowing other than personal service of process must be strictly complied with to give the court jurisdiction, and it is held that this compliance must appear affirmatively in the proceedings.[40]

§ 223. Defects in the Process.

If the defendant is to be notified of the pendency of an action against him, it is obvious that the notice must be in itself sufficient to bring him properly before the court. Jurisdiction is dependent on the form and nature of the process to the extent that it can only arise from a proper service of a notice substantially sufficient to apprise the party of everything which he is then entitled to know. If this requirement is met, although there may be a defect in the notice such as to render the subsequent judgment irregular, there will not be such a want of jurisdiction as to make it void. Mere cognizance of the existence of the action is not a notice in the legal sense, upon which a valid judgment can be rendered. To be available, the notice must inform the party whose rights are to be affected of what is required of him and the consequences which may follow if he neglects to defend the action.[41] Hence a judgment rendered upon service of a notice which does not state the time or place at which the defendant is required to appear and defend, is void.[42] But where it appears that there was notice, though defective, and service, though imperfect, a decision of the court to which the process was returnable that such notice and service were sufficient, will not be held void in a collateral proceeding.[43] Thus if a judgment is obtained on unsealed process, and is afterwards revived without objection, the want of the seal does not impair the validity of the judgment.[44] So where the officer's return upon mesne process is not signed.[45] And a judgment is not invalidated by the fact of an unnecessary indorsement of the amount upon the summons.[46] Again, a judgment in an action in which the required number of days' notice was not given to the defendant is erroneous, but not void, and cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding.[47] So a long summons issued by a justice's court against a non-resident of the county is not a nullity, though the statute declares that in such case the justice shall have no jurisdiction; the defendant waives the irregularity, and gives jurisdiction as to his person, if he appears and pleads to the complaint without objection to the process.[48]

§ 224. Defects in the Service.

Although the service of process in an action may have been characterized by some defect or irregularity, it does not necessarily follow that the ensuing judgment will be void. For if the party would take advantage of such a matter, he must do so in the action itself by some proper motion or proceeding. It is only when the attempted service is so irregular as to amount to no service at all, that there can be said to be a want of jurisdiction. In any other case, there may be error in the subsequent proceedings, but they will be sustained against a collateral attack.[49] But a judgment recovered by default, upon service of the summons by delivery of a copy to a third person who is not a resident at the "house of defendant's usual abode," is void for want of jurisdiction.[50] And so a citation addressed to and served upon a stranger, although he is the authorized agent of the defendant, is not binding upon the latter and will not authorize a judgment against him.[51] So a judgment by default is void, when the service had upon the defendant consisted only of the handing to him by plaintiff's attorney of a copy of the declaration on the day before the original declaration was filed.[52] And the same consequences were held to result in a case where the return to the summons was made in the name of a deputy-sheriff instead of in the name of the sheriff himself.[53] And it is said that where the sheriff who serves the writ is himself the plaintiff, the judgment in the suit so begun is a nullity, and the defendant may restrain it by injunction.[54]

§ 225. Appearance as a Waiver of Citation.

A defendant who voluntarily enters a general appearance in an action thereby cures a want of citation, or waives any objections which he may have to defects or irregularities in the notice, process, or service, so that the court acquires full jurisdiction over his person.[55]

"While it is true that a judgment without personal service has no extra-territorial force, it is equally true that an appearance, either in person or by attorney, has the same force and effect as personal service, and a judgment rendered against a party who appears by attorney would have the same validity in any state of the Union as where it was rendered." [56] And it is held that a defendant who voluntarily appears and answers, although the answer in terms reserves the right to object to the jurisdiction of the court, is precluded thereby from objecting that the court has not acquired jurisdiction of his person; for a voluntary appearance is equivalent to personal service of the summons.[57] But it is necessary that he should actually enter an appearance to the action or do some act equivalent thereto. A recital in the record, by the clerk, at the time of rendering judgment, that the defendant had appeared at a previous term, is not sufficient evidence of an appearance to warrant a judgment as by default.[58] And a general entry that the parties appeared means only that those who were served appeared.[59] It is also to be remarked that, in order to have this effect, the appearance must be general. In the nature of things, a special appearance, entered for the sole purpose of taking advantage of defects or irregularities in the process or service, cannot be construed as a waiver of those objections.[60] So an appearance by motion to set aside a default, entered against several defendants served, is not such an appearance as will cure a want of service upon others, and it is error to render a final judgment pending such a motion.[61] But where a defendant, after appearing specially and obtaining an order setting aside the service of an original process, submits the cause for decision on a demurrer to the bill, such submission constitutes a voluntary appearance and gives the court jurisdiction of the person.[62] The defendant may also appear by his authorized attorney, and this is equally efficacious, in waiving irregularities and conferring jurisdiction, as an appearance in person. Questions may sometimes arise as to the right of an attorney to appear for the defendant, but usually such an appearance will be presumed to have been entered with authority.[63] And the record showing that complainants appeared by attorneys, it will be presumed that the attorneys had authority to appear for all the complainants.[64] There are also cases holding that a judgment recovered against a defendant who was not served with process and had no knowledge of the suit, but for whom an attorney appeared without authority, cannot be attacked for want of jurisdiction in any collateral proceeding and is binding upon the defendant.[65] We shall consider this point in a later section, in connection with the rule against the collateral impeachment of judgments.[66] But however it may be in regard to domestic judgments, it is very well settled that when the record comes from another state, a recital in it that the defendant appeared by attorney is conclusive of the fact of such appearance, but not that the attorney was authorized to appear, and the latter allegation may be controverted by the defendant.[67] It is scarcely necessary to add that if the court has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter, that objection is not waived by appearing to the action. For here the rule applies that "consent cannot confer jurisdiction."

§ 226. Defendant's Right to be heard.

It has been declared by the supreme court of the United States that "a sentence of a court pronounced against a party without hearing him or giving him an opportunity to be heard, is not a judicial determination of his rights, and is not entitled to respect in any other tribunal." In the case at bar, the trial court had caused the appearance of the defendant to be stricken out, but had nevertheless proceeded with the case and passed a judgment affecting his rights. This, in the opinion of a majority of the court, was equivalent to denying him the benefit of the citation. For jurisdiction, it was said, was the right to hear and determine, not to determine without hearing. And where, as in that case, no appearance was allowed, there could be no hearing or opportunity of being heard, and therefore there could be no exercise of jurisdiction. By the action of the court the defendant was excluded from its jurisdiction.[68] And this doctrine derives some support from the cases holding that opportunity to be heard is absolutely essential to the guarantee of "due process of law."[69] Nevertheless, for the reasons stated in the beginning of this chapter, in defining jurisdiction, we are not convinced that irregularities in the action of the court, even so gross as those mentioned, can properly be said to deprive it of all jurisdiction and make its decision a mere nullity.

§ 227. Judgments against Non-Residents.

It is a principle of law, too well settled to require the citation of authorities in its support, that the sovereignty of a state or country, for judicial as well as other purposes, extends only to its own citizens, or resident aliens, or persons temporarily within its borders, and to property within its territory, but not to absent non-residents. In many of our states, however, there are statutes authorizing the commencement of certain classes of actions by a merely constructive service of process, and these acts apply almost exclusively to proceedings against non-residents. The validity of judgments rendered under them has been much in question before the courts, and principally in cases where a judgment so given in one state has been sought to be enforced in another. This aspect of the subject will be fully considered in the chapter on judgments of a sister state, to which the reader is referred. But there are certain divisions of the topic which must be treated in this connection. And first, a distinction must be carefully noted between the jurisdiction over the state's own citizens and that over aliens. Every sovereignty has plenary control over its own subjects, and it may authorize a judgment to be rendered against one of its citizens, upon a constructive notice only, and although he is temporarily absent from its dominions, and such a judgment must be everywhere recognized as valid and of binding force and effect.[70] This much being premised, the contrary rule may be stated, viz.: that a personal judgment (as distinguished from an adjudication upon status or an adjudication which is substantially in rem) rendered against a non-resident upon a species of constructive service only, in an action to which he did not appear, is limited in its effects to the state or country where rendered, and elsewhere is a mere nullity.[71] For example, while tax assessments may be enforced against the property liable, without regard to the residence of the owner, yet a statute attempting to make a nonresident property owner personally liable for assessments for local improvements is an attempt to take property without due process of law, and a personal judgment against such owner would be void.[72] Again, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage or vendor's lien, where the defendant is a nonresident and is cited by publication only and does not enter an appearance, the court has no jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against him.[73] And where, in an action for the specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of lands, defendant is served only by publication, the plaintiff cannot recover damages for breach of the contract.[74] Nor can a personal judgment for costs be rendered in an action for partition, as against non-residents who were not served with process, except constructively, and who did not voluntarily appear.[75]

But if a non-resident defendant, being within the state, is there personally served with process,[76] or if he appears in the action by a duly authorized attorney,[77] in either case the court has jurisdiction over him and the subsequent judgment is universally to be regarded as valid. tion, is not available on behalf of a co-defendant who appeared.[78] In some of the states there are also statutory provisions that an action can be commenced and judgment rendered only in the county in which the defendant resides. And it has been held that this requisite is so jurisdictional in its character that a judgment rendered in another county is void and incapable of ratification.[79] But the better view appears to be that the defendant may waive this objection.[80]

§ 228. Extra-Territorial Service of Process.

It is a recognized rule of international law that "no sovereignty can extend its process beyond its own territorial limits to subject either persons or property to its judicial decisions. Every exertion of authority of this sort beyond this limit is a mere nullity, and incapable of binding such persons or property in any other tribunals." [81] And this principle is fully adopted by the American cases. "Process from the tribunals of one state cannot run into another state and summon parties there domiciled to leave its territory and respond to proceedings against them. Publication of process or notice within the state where the tribunal sits cannot create any greater obligation upon the non-resident to appear. Process sent to him out of the state, and process published within it, are equally unavailing in proceedings to establish his personal liability." [82] Therefore if a summons is sent by mail to a non-resident defendant and comes to his hands, or is served upon him at his own domicile by an officer of the law, although it does actually apprise him of the suit against him, yet it has no greater or other effect than a purely constructive or fictitious service. It fails for lack of authority in the sovereignty whence it emanated. It does not bind him to appear, and no judgment can be rendered on it which will be recognized as valid beyond the limits of the state which rendered it.[83] In some of the states, however, an attempt is made to discriminate between the two species of service, and to attach a slightly higher value to actual service, though extra-territorial, than to service by published advertisement, probably in view of the fact that, by the former method, it is certain that the defendant will at least be informed of the proceedings against him. Thus in Iowa, under a statute providing that "when a judgment has been rendered against a defendant or defendants, served by publication only, and who do not appear," such defendant may appear within two years and move the court for a retrial, it is held that this provision does not apply to the case of a defendant who was personally served outside the state and did not appear in the action.[84]

§ 229. Jurisdiction by Attachment of Non-Resident's Property.

Although a person may not reside in a particular state, it frequently happens that he may have property there, either real or personal. And this, it is said, will give the courts of that state jurisdiction of actions against him. Accordingly, there are statutes in most of the states providing for the institution of suits against non-residents by the attachment of their property within the territory. But it must be carefully noted that the jurisdiction is in realty over the property, not the person. The existence of property within a state gives its courts power and authority to adjudicate upon that

The rule applies also as between one of the United States and any foreign country. The judgment of a Canadian or any foreign court, upon service of its process made in Michigan, is not binding on a defendant who refused to recognize its jurisdiction, and it will not support an action in the courts of Michigan. McEwan v. Zimmer, 38 Mich. 765, 31 Am. Rep. 332. But jurisdiction over one outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court is conferred by his acceptance of "due personal service" of the writ. property and to cause it to be applied in satisfaction of the debts of its owner, whoever and wherever he may be. But if they assume to investigate the owner's duties and determine his obligations, their authority to do so is merely incidental to their jurisdiction over his property, and because such an inquiry is a necessary preliminary to a right disposition of the property, but not because they have any control over his person. Consequently, "when the person is not within the jurisdiction of the court, and his property is within its jurisdiction, a judgment against him will be effectual only as a judgment in rem acting upon that property." [85] Hence, also, if the defendant was beyond the jurisdiction and was only constructively notified of the action, though his property was attached within the state, there is no warrant for a personal judgment against him; and if the judgment is expressed in general language, it cannot be considered or treated as a judgment in personam, but only as a judgment in rem.[86] Further, a judgment founded upon this species of jurisdiction will have no force or effect, beyond the state where it was rendered, further than to bind the property attached and disposed of.[87] For the further elucidation of this subject we quote the following from an opinion of the supreme court of Minnesota. "Such a judgment, though in form a judgment in personam, is in effect only a judgment in rem. It is a judgment for no other purpose than to reach the property which a non-resident may have in the state, but who is not personally served with process therein. It is confined exclusively to such property, and is of no further force when that is exhausted. Beyond this it is evidence of nothing; nor does it bind or conclude the defendant in anything. An action could not be maintained on it in any other court here or elsewhere; nor, in my opinion, would the party in whose favor it was rendered be precluded thereby from still bringing another action on the original consideration, for any balance that might be due to him after exhausting the property which was in the state at the time jurisdiction attached. To hold that a judgment thus rendered has any vitality after exhausting the only thing over which the court rendering it had jurisdiction, is violative of a principle inherent in all free governments and which constitutes an inflexible rule at common law, viz., that no one can be condemned unheard." [88] Very important consequences follow from considering a judgment of this character as one in rem only. Thus it cannot be made the basis of an action of debt.[89] Nor can proceedings be taken against the defendant to compel him to submit to an examination concerning his property; nor can the plaintiff have a warrant for his arrest, as prescribed by the code, on account of his refusal to apply property in satisfaction of such judgment.[90] So again, the power of a court to render a personal judgment against the mortgagor for a deficiency, in an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage, does not extend to a case where the mortgagor is a non-resident and has neither appeared in the action nor been served with process within the state. The remedy of the plaintiff in such case is limited to the foreclosure and sale of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises.[91] In a case, where, after attachment of property and publication of a citation, the plaintiff filed an amended petition, setting up an entirely new cause of action, on which judgment by default was rendered without any further citation being published or service had, it was held that the court acquired no jurisdiction and the judgment was entirely void.[92] But after an appearance and plea by the defendant in a suit commenced by attachment, in which there has been only constructive service by publication, the suit becomes one in personam, and a personal judgment may properly be rendered against him.[93] So where the non-resident defendant acknowledges service of the writ and waives the benefit of the statutes respecting absent defendants.[94]

There are numerous intimations in the books (though perhaps no direct decision) to the effect that a judgment against a non-resident, founded upon constructive service and attachment of property, will be valid and enforceable, not only against the property actually seized, but also against any other property of his within the state. In other words, that any property of the defendant found within the territorial jurisdiction may be subjected to execution under the judgment, although it is not a personal obligation against him. And a case in New York holds that such a judgment is effectual against any property within the jurisdiction during the pendency of the action and which was or might have been seized under attachment therein.[95] That these views are entirely untenable will be at once apparent if we consider the real nature of such a proceeding. It was shown in the preceding section to be substantially a proceeding in rem. But in a proceeding in rem jurisdiction is acquired only by seizure of the res, and the judgment is enforceable only against the res. It is therefore contrary to fundamental principles to attempt to extend its operation against property which was not seized, although, being within the territorial limits of the state, it might have been attached. And many well considered cases are explicit in declaring that such a judgment has no other force or validity whatever than to justify the disposition made of the property which was actually attached upon mesne process in the action.[96]

§ 231. Service by Publication without Attachment.

Some of the decisions hold that constructive service by publication, without attachment of property, will give the court such jurisdiction over a non-resident that its judgment, though not enforceable beyond the state, may be satisfied out of any property of the defendant found within the borders of the state;[97] or any property which was within the state at the time the order for publication was made, and which is not removed or sold to a bona fide purchaser before the judgment.[98] But this position was successfully controverted in the important and leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff,[99] and the rule established that such a judgment (except in an action for divorce, which is governed by special rules, to be considered hereafter [100]) is simply and entirely void for all purposes. The correct view is so clearly and ably stated in this decision that we quote at some length from the opinion. "The want of authority," said Field,

J., "of the tribunals of a state to adjudicate upon the obligations of non-residents, where they have no property within its limits, is not denied by the court below; but the position is assumed that, where they have property within the state, it is immaterial whether the property is in the first instance brought under the control of the court by attachment or some other equivalent act, and afterwards applied by its judgment to the satisfaction of demands against its owner; or such demands be first established in a personal action, and the property of the non-resident be afterwards seized and sold on execution. But the answer to this position has already been given in the statement that the jurisdiction of the court to inquire into and determine his obligations at all is only incidental to its jurisdiction over the property. Its jurisdiction in that respect cannot be made to depend upon facts to be ascertained after it has tried the cause and rendered the judgment. If the judgment be previously void, it will not become valid by the subsequent discovery of property of the defendant, or by his subsequent acquisition of it. The judgment, if void when rendered, will always remain void; it cannot occupy the doubtful position of being valid if property be found and void if there be none. Even if the position assumed were confined to cases where the non-resident defendant possessed property in the state at the commencement of the action, it would still make the validity of the proceedings and judgment depend upon the question whether, before the levy of the execution, the defendant had or had not disposed of the property. If before the levy the property should be sold, then according to this position, the judgment would not be binding. This doctrine would introduce a new element of uncertainty in judicial proceedings. The contrary is the law; the validity of every judgment depends upon the jurisdiction of the court before it is rendered, not upon what will occur subsequently." [101]

§ 232. Statutes authorizing Constructive Service to be strictly construed.

All exceptional methods of obtaining jurisdiction over persons, natural or artificial, not found within the state, must be confined to the cases and exercised in the way precisely indicated by the statute.[102] Hence the statutory provisions for acquiring jurisdiction of a defendant by publication of the summons, in the stead of a personal service, must be strictly and exactly pursued.[103] As it has been well said, "no principle is more vital to the administration of justice than that no man should be condemned in his person or property without notice and an opportunity to make his defense. And every departure from this fundamental rule, by a proceeding in rem, in which a publication of notice is substituted for a service on the party, should be subjected to a strict legal scrutiny. Jurisdiction is not to be assumed and exercised in such cases upon the general ground that the subject-matter of the suit is within the power of the court. This would dispense with the forms of law, prescribed by the legislature for the security of absent parties. The inquiry should be, have the requisites of the statute been complied with, so as to subject the property in controversy to the judgment of the court, and is such judgment limited to the property named in the bill? If this cannot be answered in the affirmative, the proceedings of the court beyond their jurisdiction are void." [104] Thus, defendants cannot be summoned by publication unless shown to be non-residents.[105] And where, under the statute, a summons and return are necessary to give the court jurisdiction, an indorsement on the writ acknowledging service is not sufficient.[106] So a judgment following a service of summons purporting to be by publication, but which was made without affidavit and order, is void.[107] And so if the affidavit upon which the order for publication issued was substantially defective, there is no jurisdiction of the defendant.[108] Again, a judgment which is invalid because, service being made by publication, it was not shown that a copy of the petition and notice was mailed to the defendant, or that his residence was unknown (that being required by the usual wording of the statute), cannot be cured by giving such proof afterwards.[109] In case of notice by publication, the court acquires no jurisdiction until proper proof of a compliance with the statute requisitions is made to appear of record.[110] And an order of the court directing non-resident defendants to be notified by publication, will not authorize a judgment against resident defendants who have not been duly served with process.[111]

Before leaving the subject of constructive service of process, it must be remarked that a non-resident may be brought within the jurisdiction of an appellate court by mere publication of the notice, when it appears that he was personally cited or duly appeared in the action in the trial court. This is not a real exception to the rule of jurisdiction, but is based upon the consideration that the whole controversy, from its inception in the court below to its final determination by the court above, is but one suit. "Actual notice ought to be given in all cases where it is practicable, even in appellate tribunals; but whenever personal service has been rendered impossible by the removal of the appellee or defendant in error from the juris-

By the common law, where process issued against two, on a joint cause of action, and only one appeared, the other must be outlawed before there could be any further proceedings.[113] And in this country,—independently of statutes,—where a suit is instituted against several defendants jointly, and one is not served with process, and the court assumes jurisdiction and proceeds to render judgment against them all, such judgment is absolutely void, so far, at least, as concerns the defendant not served.[114] Thus, where suit is brought against three and process issued to all, but it appears to have been served upon two only, there being no return as to the third, and none of the three answer, judgment should not be entered by default generally, without amendment, discontinuance, or some other action taken in regard to the defendant not served.[115] So where there are several defendants, and part are served in time and others are not, judgment cannot be entered against any at the return term, but the case must be continued.[116]

§ 234. Joint Judgment as an Entirety.

Supposing a judgment to be entered in violation of the common law rule just stated—that is, a joint judgment where some of the defendants were not served—it becomes important to determine whether it must be regarded as void for all purposes and in respect to all parties, or merely voidable as against those who were not notified. This question has been considered in a preceding section; and it was there shown that, notwithstanding a great conflict of authorities, the better opinion was that such a judgment is at most voidable as to the defendant not served, while it ought to stand as a perfectly valid adjudication against the other until reversed, but that, if carried up by appeal or writ of error, it must be reversed as to both the defendants.[117] In case of a purely joint liability there may be justice in adhering to the stricter view; but otherwise the conception of a judgment as an entirety appears to be highly technical and ill adapted to the purposes of justice.

§ 235. Joint Judgment authorized by Statute.

In order to escape the rigor of the common law rule above stated, several of the states have passed statutes which provide that where an action is instituted against two or more defendants upon an alleged joint liability, and some of them are served with process, but jurisdiction is not obtained over the others, the plaintiff may still proceed to trial against those who are before the court, and if he recovers, may have judgment against all the defendants whom he shows to be jointly liable, but it must be so entered as to be enforceable only against the joint property of all and the separate property of those served.[118] But this statute must be strictly followed; the judgment must be in form against both; and a judgment against the one served alone is erroneous in substance.[119] Nor can the clerk, upon the application of the plaintiff, enter judgment upon default against the party served only; a judgment so entered is void.[120] And if it should appear upon the trial that the contract in suit was not joint, but was made with one of the defendants only, then of course the statute does not apply, and the plaintiff should be nonsuited.[121] Further, if the defendant who was not served was a non-resident of the state, and did not appear in the action, the judgment, so far as concerns him, can have no extra-territorial validity nor be enforced against him in the state of his domicile. And it is held that even in the courts of the state which rendered the judgment he would be allowed to show, in avoidance of the judgment, that he was not a joint contractor, as it is that fact alone that makes such judgment binding upon him.[122]

§ 236. Statutory Several Judgment.

In a number of the states, according to the statute law, or the practice prevailing in the courts, and in derogation of the common law, if two or more persons are sued in a joint action, the plaintiff may proceed against any one or more of them upon service of process on them, notwithstanding there may be others not served, and if his contention is successful, he may have judgment against those served, excluding the others.[123] In Vermont, in a case where process was sued against two persons, who were declared against as joint promisors, and service was made upon one only, the other not becoming a party in court, and evidence was given showing that the person served alone made the promise declared on, it was held, under the law of that state relating to such cases, that a judgment might be recovered against the person so making the promise.[124]

§ 237. Judgment against Partners.

At the common law, where a partnership is sued, each member of the firm must be brought within the jurisdiction of the court by due citation. Hence where an action is instituted against several persons constituting a partnership, either before or after its dissolution, and one partner is not served with process, and judgment is rendered against them all, such judgment will be voidable so far as concerns the partner who was not served.[125] On similar principles, and since one partner cannot bind his co-partner by a forthcoming bond to which he has signed the latter's name without authority, a statutory judgment on such bond is void as to the partner not signing, for want of jurisdiction.[126] In those states, however, where the "joint debtor acts" are in force, if not all the partners are served with process, still a judgment may be rendered against the firm, to be enforced against the partnership property and the individual property of the partners served.[127] But such a judgment will have no extra-territorial validity against any partner who was not served and did not appear,[128] the case being governed by the same rules which apply in any other action against joint defendants. And in California it is held that, where, in an action against a partnership on a joint liability, the complaint and summons designate the defendants individually, with a description that they are partners doing business under a firm name, the judgment can only be against the parties served, and not against a defendant not served with summons or who does not appear, though he be a member of the partnership.[129]

§ 238. Appearance for Defendant not Served.

In an action upon contract against several defendants, where only a part are served with process, but others voluntarily appear, a judgment for the plaintiff must be against all the defendants appearing.[130] But where an attorney appears specially for one defendant in an action against two, and afterwards, as attorney for "the defendant," acknowledges judgment in favor of the plaintiff, it is a good judgment only as to the defendant for whom such attorney appeared, and a joint execution is erroneous.[131]

Where process is served only on a part of the defendants named in the writ, and judgment is taken against "the defendants," without naming them, and without any appearance of those not served, the judgment will be understood to be only against those who were duly served.[182] In some of the states, the rendition of a judgment against a defendant who was not served and who did not appear is considered to be a mere clerical mistake which may be amended on motion in the trial court.[183]

§ 240. Jurisdiction of the Subject-Matter.

Thus far we have been considering the questions connected with the acquisition of jurisdiction over the defendant's person. We turn now to the equally important subject of the validity of judgments as dependent upon jurisdiction of the subject-matter. And first, it is an inflexible rule that any judgment rendered by a court upon a matter not within its jurisdiction is null and void, incapable of ratification, and subject to collateral impeachment.[184] The principles which govern this point have been well stated in the following language: "1. Where the judicial tribunal has general jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the controversy or investigation, and the special facts which give it the right to act in a particular case are averred and not controverted, upon notice to all proper parties, jurisdiction is acquired and cannot be assailed in any collateral proceeding. 2. Where the judicial tribunal has not general jurisdiction of the subject-matter under any circumstances, no averment can supply the defect, no amount of proof can alter the case, no consent can confer jurisdiction. 3. Where the judicial tribunal has not general jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but may exercise it under a particular state of facts, those facts must be specially averred and established, and when so established on a hearing of all proper parties, cannot be impeached in any collateral proceeding."[135] If we inquire more particularly into the meaning of the terms here employed, the answer is, that "by jurisdiction over the subject-matter is meant the nature of the cause of action or of the relief sought; and this is conferred by the sovereign authority which organizes the court, and is to be sought for in the general nature of its powers, or in authority specially conferred."[136] Now the powers to be exercised by a court may be prescribed and defined in several different ways, though always emanating from the sovereign authority of the state. First, the constitution or statute which creates the court may specifically enumerate the classes of actions or subjects of controversy to which its jurisdiction shall extend. This is usually the case in respect to the original jurisdiction of the supreme courts, and in respect to probate and similar courts. Or else the power may be conferred in general language; as where a court of record is invested with "general original jurisdiction in all cases, civil or criminal, at law or in equity," or where a separate chancery court is given general equity powers. And here no subject will be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of the court, unless clearly shown to be so by law. Or the power to hear and determine a particular class of actions or proceedings may be granted to a tribunal specially organized for that purpose or to one of the usual courts in addition to its common law powers. Or finally, the limitations of the jurisdiction may be introduced by way of exception or reservation from the general powers granted. And this may be either by withdrawing certain classes of actions from the cognizance of the court, as where a justice of the peace is forbidden to try any suit involving the title to real estate; or by fixing a money limit below which the jurisdiction shall not attach, as is the case in respect to most controversies before the circuit courts of the United States; or by designating the amount above which the jurisdiction shall terminate, as is usual in regard to justices' and other inferior courts.[137] But in every case, where jurisdiction of the subject-matter is challenged, recourse must be had to the sources of jurisdiction, whether constitution or statute, and if they show a want of authority in the court to adjudicate upon the particular controversy, its judgment must be considered incurably void. And an unconstitutional statute, it will be remembered, can have no avail as a source of jurisdiction; a judgment rendered under it is entirely without validity.[138]

In one of the early cases before the supreme court of the United States it was said, "if the petitioner states such a case in his petition that on a demurrer the court would render a judgment in his favor, it is an undoubted case of jurisdiction." [139] But probably this was not meant as equivalent to saying that if the petition were demurrable there would be no jurisdiction. Indeed it would be impossible, on any rational theory, to make the jurisdiction depend upon the validity of the case stated by the plaintiff. For the court [137] Where the plaintiff's demand exceeds the jurisdiction of the inferior court in which his suit is brought, it should dismiss the cause and transfer it to a court of competent jurisdiction; no other judgment or order can validly be made. Dazey v. Pennington, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 326, 31 S. W. 312. But the fact that a justice of the peace erroneously allows interest, which makes the total amount exceed his jurisdiction, does not deprive him of original jurisdiction, so as to render the judgment void. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Marchant, 11 Utah, 68, 39 Pac. 483. In Jones v. Jones, 14 N. C. 360, it was held that a judgment of a magistrate for a sum above his jurisdiction being void, no action could be maintained on it. But some other cases hold that a judgment of a court of record, founded upon a judgment of a justice of the peace which is in excess of his jurisdiction and consequently void, is erroneous but not void, and will stand good against collateral attacks. Moore v. Martin, 38 Cal. 428; Hinds v. Wallis, 13 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 213. But it is difficult to see how a nullity can be made the basis of an action.

must pass upon the sufficiency of the declaration, and jurisdiction to proceed at least so far must be acquired by the mere filing of the pleading and service of process. But it is equally certain that a court cannot, in ordinary cases, initiate a proceeding sua sponte. Its jurisdiction and power remain at rest until called into activity by the application of a suitor. Jurisdiction of the subject-matter, therefore, dynamically considered, depends upon the act of the parties in invoking the aid of the law, in some regular manner, for the determination of their controversy. A court has no more power, until its action is called into exercise by some sort of pleading, to render a judgment in favor of a party, than it has to enter a judgment against him until he has been brought within its jurisdiction by some method known to the law.[140]

§ 242. Jurisdiction of Question decided.

Besides jurisdiction of the person of the defendant and of the general subject-matter of the action, it is necessary to the validity of a judgment that the court should have had jurisdiction of the precise question which its judgment assumes to decide, or of the particular remedy or relief which it assumes to grant. In other words a judgment which passes upon matters entirely outside the issue raised in the record is so far invalid. "Jurisdiction may be defined to be the right to adjudicate concerning the subject-matter in the given case. To constitute this there are three essentials. First, the court must have cognizance of the class of cases to which the one to be adjudged belongs. Second, the proper parties must be present. And third, the point decided must be, in substance and effect, within the issue. That a court cannot go out of its appointed sphere, and that its action is void with respect to persons who are strangers to its proceedings, are propositions established by a multitude of authorities. A defect in a judgment arising from the fact that the matter decided was not embraced within the issue has not, it would seem, received much judicial consideration. And yet I cannot doubt that, upon general principles, such a defect must avoid a judgment. It is impossible to concede that because A. and B. are parties to a suit, a court can decide any matter in which they are interested, whether such matter be involved in the pending litigation or not. Persons by becoming suitors do not place themselves for all purposes under the control of the court, and it is only over those particular interests which they choose to draw in question that a power of judicial decision arises. If, in an ordinary foreclosure case, a man and his wife being parties, the court of chancery should decree a divorce between them, it would require no argument to convince everyone that such decree, so far as it attempted to affect the matrimonial relation, was void; and yet the only infirmity in such a decree would be found, upon analysis, to arise from the circumstance that the point decided was not within the substance of the pending litigation. In such a case the court would have acted within the field of its authority, and the proper parties would have been present; the single but fatal flaw having been the absence from the record of any issue on the point determined. The invalidity of such a decree does not proceed from any mere arbitrary rule, but it rests entirely on the ground of common justice. A judgment upon a matter outside of the issue must of necessity be altogether arbitrary and unjust, as it concludes a point upon which the parties have not been heard. And it is upon this very ground, that the parties have been heard, or have had the opportunity of a hearing, that the law gives so conclusive an effect to matters adjudicated. And this is the principal reason why judgments become estoppels." [141]

On this principle, where a widow brought suit for the sole purpose of having dower assigned her in her deceased husband's lands, the heirs at law, who were infants, being made defendants, and the court not only directed an assignment of dower, but of its own accord decreed a sale of the residue of the land belonging to the heirs, it was held that, the court having exceeded its jurisdiction, the decree of sale was void and open to collateral impeachment.[142] Again, where the issues in a suit in chancery are so framed as to present a controversy between the complainant on the one side and the defendants on the other, the court should not go beyond the pleadings and decree relief as between the co-defendants; and though the language of the decree may be broad enough to embrace the decision of questions disputed by the defendants inter sese, yet it will be construed in the light of the pleadings, and restricted to the issues raised thereby.[143] So again, in an action to foreclose a mortgage on premises described in the complaint, a decree directing the sale of lands not mentioned in the pleadings is void, though the owner of such other lands was made a party.[144] And in an action between a mortgagor and certain mortgagees of chattels, the court has no power to declare void a mortgage not attacked by the pleadings, and of which the holder was not a party to the action.[145] A judgment foreclosing a trust deed on church property cannot be entered in a suit between different factions of the church for the possession of the property, where neither party sought a foreclosure or sale of the property.[146] Again, upon a motion to discharge an attachment, the court has no power, besides allowing such discharge, to order the undertaking to be cancelled, that question not being submitted.[147] And where a ground of liability not suggested by the pleadings is submitted to the jury, and they render a general verdict for the plaintiff, the judgment thereon cannot be sustained unless the other ground of liability is so clearly established that a verdict might have been directed.[148]

In these cases the court lacked jurisdiction of the subject or question which it assumed to pass upon because such matter was not submitted to it by the parties. But the same result will follow if, being invested with jurisdiction for a single purpose in a special statutory proceeding, it transcends the limit and attempts to exercise its powers for other purposes also. Thus where a statute provides for an action to foreclose a mortgage against a non-resident defendant, upon publication of summons, and authorizes a decree to be made for the sale of the mortgaged premises to satisfy the debt secured thereby, the court exhausts its jurisdiction in making the decree contemplated, and if, in addition thereto, it proceeds to award a personal judgment for a sum of money against the defendant, such judgment, being beyond its power, is void.[149]

§ 243. Loss of Jurisdiction.

In general, when jurisdiction has once fully attached in a cause, it will continue until the final disposition of the controversy. But this is not invariably the case, and a court may lose the jurisdiction which it has once rightfully acquired, after which it can make no further order or judgment. Such is the case when the cause has been taken up on appeal or error, and especially after the court of review has pronounced its judgment.[150] So where a pending litigation is removed from the state court to a federal court under the act of Congress in that behalf. Upon the filing of a proper petition, in a removable cause, the rightful jurisdiction of the state court ceases instantly, and every subsequent exercise of jurisdiction by it, including its judgment if one is rendered, is erroneous, if not absolutely void.[151] The same result would follow, we apprehend, if a statute should deprive a court in which an action was pending of jurisdiction over that class of suits and transfer it to another tribunal, provided the law were explicitly made applicable to pending cases. And sometimes it may happen that jurisdiction is lost by the expiration of the term, without judgment rendered and without a proper continuance.[152]

§ 244. Jurisdiction attaching, Error does not Vitiate.

In any case where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and the parties are before it by due service of proper process, the jurisdiction is never ousted by the erroneous exercise of the power which it confers, and the judgment in the case, though it may be marked by error which will cause its reversal by a higher court, is not for that reason void.[153]

§ 245. Judgments not to be Attacked Collaterally.

Where the court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter in the particular case, its judgment, unless reversed or annulled in some proper proceeding, is not open to attack or impeachment, by parties or privies, in any collateral action or proceeding whatever.[1] "The doctrine of this court, and of all the courts of this country, is firmly established, that if the court in which the proceedings took place had jurisdiction to render the judgment which it did, no error in its proceedings which did not affect the jurisdiction will render the proceedings void, nor can such errors be considered when the judgment is brought collaterally into question." [2] This principle is not merely an arbitrary rule of law established by the courts, but it is a doctrine which is founded upon reason and the soundest principles of public policy. "It is one," says the court in Virginia, "which has been adopted in the interest of the peace of society and the permanent security of titles. If, after the rendition of a judgment by a court of competent jurisdiction, and after the period has elapsed when it becomes irreversible for error, another court may in another suit inquire into the irregularities or errors in such judgment, there would be no end to litigation and no fixed established rights. A judgment, though unreversed and irreversible, would no longer be a final adjudication of the rights of litigants, but the starting point from which a new litigation would spring up; acts of limitation would become useless and nugatory; purchasers on the faith of judicial process would find no protection; every right established by a judgment would be insecure and uncertain; and a cloud would rest upon every title." [3] If the sentence last quoted seems somewhat extravagant, at least it will serve to show the substantial reasons upon which the rule rests and the inflexibility with which it is held by the courts. According to the supreme court of Massachusetts, the rule obtains "not because of an apparent authority in the court to render the judgment, but because the remedy by review or writ of error is held to be more appropriate." [4] This may be sufficient as a technical reason, but it cannot be doubted that the motives which have led to the establishment of the rule rather spring from the considerations of public policy, and the necessary finality of judicial decisions, indicated in the opinions previously quoted.

§ 246. To what Judgments the Rule applies.

The rule against collateral impeachment applies to every judgment, order, decree, or judicial proceeding, of whatever species, that is not absolutely void. If the judgment is void on its face it is of course a mere nullity and of no avail for any purpose, and this may be urged against it whenever it is brought in question.[5] But otherwise, whether it be regular or irregular, correct or erroneous, valid or voidable, it is not subject to collateral attack. This rule has been held applicable to a judgment in rem, where the court had jurisdiction of the res; [6] to a judgment condemning property in confiscation proceedings; [7] to decrees of divorce rendered by courts of competent jurisdiction; [8] to an order of naturalization; [9] to decrees rendered by a court of equity, when sought to be assailed in the same or another court; [10] to a judgment in attachment; [11] to orders and judgments.[26] Also it is said that if an execution sale is merely voidable, none but parties to the proceeding can question it, and then only in the same action or by appeal or writ of error.[27]

The entry of a judgment in the judgment-book, it is said, including the date of the judgment and the date of the docketing in the judgment-docket, while standing as a part of the court's record, cannot be impeached collaterally.[28] And while affidavits may be read or proof heard, to show that words have been improperly stricken from a judgment, they cannot be received to falsify a record by showing that an alteration, correcting it, was improperly made.[29]

§ 247. Tax Judgments.

The principle that a record cannot be impeached collaterally for mere errors or irregularities is equally applicable to a statutory judgment against land for taxes as to any other decree. "It is no objection," said the supreme court of Alabama in a recent case, "to the application of this principle that the present proceeding is to enforce the collection of delinquent taxes. While great accuracy is exacted in all such proceedings, and strict rules are applied for the protection of the tax payer, this principle forbidding the collateral assailment of judgments has often been invoked successfully in actions of this nature. It has accordingly been decided that there is no sound reason why judicial proceedings for the enforcement of taxes should be exempted from its influence." [30] And it is no reason for departing from this rule that the property owner was a non-resident, if the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the usual constructive notice to the owner was given.[31] Nor can the judgment be impeached because it embraces also a personal judgment against the owner of the land beside the proper judgment against the land itself; for that part of the judgment which is directed against the owner will be regarded as mere surplusage.[32] The cases even go to the length of holding that it cannot be shown against such a judgment, collaterally, that the taxes on the particular land had been in fact paid before the suit,[33] or that no assessment was made for the year in question,[34] although delinquency is the very fact upon which the jurisdiction of the court must be based. And it is not even permitted to show, in any collateral proceeding, that the assessment on which the taxes were based was illegal and void, or that the statute or ordinance authorizing the assessment was unconstitutional or invalid.[35] In Illinois, it was at one time the settled rule that a judgment by default, in a proceeding under the statutes of that state for the condemnation and sale of land for taxes, was not conclusive upon the tax payer, and might be collaterally impeached.[36] But this rule has been very much narrowed by an amendment to the revenue law providing that the tax judgment shall estop all parties from raising objections which existed at or before the rendition of the judgment and could have been presented in defense thereto, and making the judgment conclusive evidence of its own regularity and validity in all collateral proceedings, except where the tax had been paid or the land was not liable for it.[37]

§ 248. Adjudications in Bankruptcy.

An adjudication of bankruptcy, made by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person of the defendant, is conclusive of the fact decreed, and cannot be attacked collaterally, for any error or irregularity, in controversies between the trustee in bankruptcy and persons claiming an adverse interest in the property of the bankrupt, or otherwise.[38] On the same principle, a discharge in bankruptcy remains valid and binding until set aside or annulled in a suit brought for that purpose in the court where it was granted; it cannot be impeached collaterally for fraud, irregularity, or want of notice in the proceedings in which it was obtained.[39] A state court, for example, can neither annul nor disregard a dis-

As to questioning the jurisdiction of the court, the foregoing cases show that this cannot be done, if the objection to the jurisdiction concerns the character or number of creditors joining in the petition, the sufficient allegation of an act of bankruptcy, or the amount of debts owed by the bankrupt. But there are authorities to the effect that a total want of jurisdiction over the person of the bankrupt may be shown, even collaterally. In re Goodfellow, 1 Low. 510, Fed. Cas. No. 5,536; Fellows v. Hall, 3 McLean, 487, Fed. Cas. No. 4723; Stuart v. Aumiller, 37 Iowa, 102, 8 N. B. R. 541.

charge duly granted by a court of bankruptcy having jurisdiction, nor allow it to be impeached in any collateral proceeding for any cause which would authorize the bankruptcy court to revoke or set it aside; it can be impeached only in a direct proceeding for that purpose in the bankruptcy court itself.[40]

An award of arbitrators, like a judgment at law, concludes the parties, and cannot be impeached in a collateral proceeding, even although erroneous, if it was fairly made.[41] If it appears to be good on its face, none of the various grounds which might be urged against its justice or legality in a direct proceeding to set it aside will avail collaterally. Thus, it was said in an early case: "An award good upon the face of it cannot be impeached but upon objections which go to the misbehavior of arbitrators. If the reception of illegal evidence appear upon the award, it may be set aside, or if a mistake of fact appear upon the face, or by confession of the referees, it should be recommitted; but the court cannot inquire by extrinsic testimony into the justice of the award, for that would be to try the matters in dispute de novo." § 250. Judgments of Inferior Courts.

We shall have occasion, in a later part of this chapter, to discuss the important distinction between superior and inferior courts, in respect to the presumptions by which the judgments of the former are sustained against collateral attacks upon their jurisdiction, and the requirement that judgments of the latter must show jurisdiction on their face. But it belongs to the present connection to advert to the well recognized rule that the judgments and decisions of an inferior court can in no case be assailed indirectly on account of errors or irregularities not affecting the jurisdiction.[43] Thus the regularity or legality of a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace, in a case falling within his competence and in which he had jurisdiction of the parties, so long as it is not reversed or annulled in some proper proceeding, is not open to collateral attack or impeachment.[44] On similar principles, an order or decree of a surrogate, or probate or orphans' court, jurisdiction having attached, is not examinable in any collateral proceeding.[45] In fact, the orders and judgments of probate courts concerning matters over which they have jurisdiction are no more open to collateral attack than are the orders and judgment of other courts of general jurisdiction; they must have accorded to them the same intendments and favorable presumptions which attend the judgments of courts of general common-law jurisdiction.[46] This rule applies to an order admitting a will to probate;[47] to orders appointing or removing executors, administrators, or guardians;[48] to orders allowing claims against the estate of a decedent;[49] to orders authorizing the sale of land to pay debts of the estate, or confirming sales made by the executor;[50] and to decrees of partition made by a probate court having jurisdiction.[51]

The rule is by no means confined to the two species of inferior courts already mentioned. It extends equally to many varieties of judicial bodies and special tribunals, all being protected, as to their judgments, in collateral inquiries, except as to jurisdiction, and, in some cases, fraud. For example, where a court-martial has cognizance of the charges made, and has jurisdiction of the person of the accused, its sentence is valid and not impeachable collaterally, although irregularities or errors are alleged to have occurred in its proceedings.[52] So, where a board of land commissioners has once acquired jurisdiction of a matter, its subsequent proceedings therein cannot be collaterally questioned.[53] The same rule applies to the proceedings of a board of county officers exercising their statutory authority in proceedings for the laying out of a public highway or the location of a private way.[54] Again, as a state board of equalization acts judicially in determining what property is to be assessed for taxation, and in fixing the amount of the assessment, its judgment therein cannot be collaterally impeached.[55]

§ 251. Co-Ordinate Courts.

A judgment at law cannot be impeached collaterally in equity.[56] And conversely, the validity of a decree rendered by a court of equity cannot be impeached in a collateral action at law.[57] A judgment of a state court, no question as to its jurisdiction being involved, cannot be overhauled or corrected in a collateral proceeding in a federal court.[58] The courts of the United States cannot lawfully treat as nullities the judgments of the courts of the several states, rendered in suits where the latter have jurisdiction of the cause and the parties, even if they are founded upon an erroneous construction of the bankrupt act or any other statute of the United States; the remedy for the correction of the error is by a writ of error in the supreme court of the United States.[59] And it is equally clear that the reverse of this rule must hold good. That is, that the judgments and decrees of the federal courts, in cases where their jurisdiction is not disputed, must be impervious to collateral assailment in the courts of the states, although, for example, they may proceed upon an erroneous construction of a state constitution or statute.[60]

§ 252. What constitutes a Collateral Attack.

We are next to inquire what constitutes a collateral attempt to impeach a judgment within the meaning of the rule prohibiting such endeavors. And here we shall find that the word "collateral" is always used as the antithesis of "direct," and it is therefore wide enough to embrace any independent proceeding. To constitute a direct attack upon a judgment, it is said, it is necessary that a proceeding be instituted for that very purpose.[61] If an appeal is taken from a judgment, or a writ of error,[62] or if a motion is made to va-ties or the subject-matter. But the fact that such decree is void on its face, because uncertain and incomplete, does not render it subject to collateral attack; the remedy must be sought in the court which rendered it, by proceedings for its vacation, or by appeal. cate or set it aside on account of some alleged irregularity,[63] the attack is obviously direct, the sole object of the proceeding being to deny and disprove the apparent validity of the judgment. But if the action or proceeding has an independent purpose and contemplates some other relief or result, although the overturning of the judgment may be important or even necessary to its success, then the attack upon the judgment is collateral and falls within the rule. Thus, whether a judgment is irregular or erroneous is not a legitimate inquiry in a suit brought for its enforcement.[64] So in the distribution of a fund, the court cannot inquire into the validity of a judgment regular on its face, or into the consideration on which it was founded.[65] Again, in an action of trespass to try title, any attack upon a judgment which forms the basis of the title of one of the parties, or enters into his title, will be considered a collateral impeachment of such judgment.[66] And in a suit on an appeal bond, the validity of the judgment appealed from and affirmed cannot be drawn in question.[67] The same is true of a suit on a recognizance entered in an attachment suit; no allegations can be heard against the regularity of the judgment in attachment.[68] Nor can a judgment be attacked in a proceeding to punish defendant for contempt in disobeying it,[69] nor when it is offered in evidence collaterally in another suit,[70] nor when an action is brought to recover land sold under an execution on the judgment.[71] Similarly, where a receiver of an insolvent sues to recover assets of his estate, defendant cannot assail the validity of the judgment under which the receiver was appointed.[72] And in an action by a guardian on the bond of a former guardian who had been removed, an objection by defendants that the court had no jurisdiction to remove such former guardian, and appoint the plaintiff, cannot be sustained, being a collateral attack on the judgment.[73] So where a sheriff is sued for failure to return an execution, he cannot impeach the judgment on which the writ issued.[74]

On the other hand, a complaint alleging that a judgment is absolutely void on its face, and yet is apparently a lien on plaintiff's land, and asking a decree annulling and avoiding such judgment, is not a collateral attack upon it.[75] And it has been held that no improper impeaching of a judgment collaterally is involved in a creditor intervening, in a suit brought by heirs against their mother to enforce payment for their interest in the deceased father's estate, which she has purchased, for the purpose of opposing the claims of the heirs, although their claims are founded on a probate decree confirming the sale, agreed on by the parties.[76] And an action by heirs to quiet the title of property of the decedent, fraudulently sold to pay his debts, is not a collateral attack on the decree confirming the sale.[77] In Texas, under a statute allowing persons interested in the estate of a decedent to have the proceedings in the county court corrected on certiorari from the district court, where the cause shall be tried de novo, the proceeding is direct, and not collateral.[78]

§ 253. Proceedings to prevent Execution of the Judgment.

A bill in equity seeking to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment at law, by execution or otherwise, constitutes a collateral attack upon the judgment, and cannot be maintained on account of any mere errors or irregularities, but only upon a showing that the judgment is void.[79] There are cases, however, holding that a suit to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment on the ground of a total want of jurisdiction over the person of the defendant,—as, where no process was ever served on him,—is a direct attack on the judgment, and not collateral.[80] And the same is said to be true where the ground set up for enjoining the judgment is that it has been satisfied and released.[81] The validity of a judgment cannot be impeached on a motion to quash an execution issued on it. Such a motion cannot be based on the ground of mere error or irregularity in the judgment. The jurisdiction not being questioned, and the judgment not having been reversed, vacated, or set aside, such a motion would constitute a collateral attack upon it.[82]

§ 253a. Proceeding to Enforce Judgment by Mandamus.

When a judgment has been recovered against a municipal corporation, and application is made for a writ of mandamus to compel the proper municipal officers to provide funds for its payment by the levy and collection of a tax, it is not permissible for the respondents, in opposition to the motion for mandamus, or in answer to the alternative writ, to set up any matters impeaching the correctness of the judgment; as against any such collateral attack, the judgment is impregnable, and it is conclusive of all defenses which were, or might have been, urged in the original action.[83] For example, if the suit was upon bonds of the municipality, it is no defense to the proceeding for mandamus that such bonds were illegally issued, or were invalid for any other reason.[84] Nor can the municipality contend that the indebtedness on which the judgment was based was in excess of the amount fixed by the constitution as the limit of the debt which it might lawfully incur.[85] Neither can it be alleged in the proceedings for mandamus that the judgment was entered by consent of the officers of the city, notwithstanding there was a valid defense to the action, the judgment not being void on its face.[86] But it has been declared by the supreme court of the United States that when application is made to collect judgments by process not contained in themselves,—as, by mandamus,—and requiring, in order to be sustained, reference to the alleged cause of action on which they are founded, the aid of the court should not be granted when upon the face of the record it appears, not that mere error supervened in the rendition of such judgments, but that they rest upon no cause of action whatever.[87] And it is competent for the respondents to the writ of mandamus to show that the original judgment was entirely void for want of jurisdiction.[88] The same principles apply in an action to enjoin the collection of a tax levied to pay a judgment against a municipal corporation. The validity of the claim on which the judgment rests cannot be questioned; the judgment being conclusive against collateral attack by the municipality or by any individual taxpayer.[89]

tence of a court, and in a great many instances the attempt has been made to impeach such judgment on grounds going to its legality or regularity, or even upon objections to the anterior proceedings. But the courts have resolutely set their faces against this practice, refusing to look beyond the judgment itself, except in the single case where a want of jurisdiction is alleged. A proceeding of this nature is undoubtedly a collateral attack upon the judgment; and exceptional as the remedy is, and beneficent as is the purpose it subserves, there is no good reason for permitting it to be made the vehicle for objections to the judgment or sentence which could not be urged against it in any other collateral proceeding.[90] Accordingly the authorities declare that the writ will not be issued when it appears on the face of the petition that the petitioner is detained by virtue of the final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction;[91] and that such a judgment, valid on its face, is an unanswerable return to a writ of habeas corpus.[92] But while errors or irregularities will not be thus inquired into, the subject of jurisdiction is legitimately open to investigation, including both jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter and of the particular order or sentence assumed to be passed, as well as the sources of jurisdiction when founded on statute or ordinance. The several points will be discussed in detail in the next following sections.

§ 255. Errors and Irregularities not Reviewable.

If the question is upon the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, the petitioner in habeas corpus cannot impeach it on the ground of any error or irregularity in the proceedings or sentence of the court which does not go to the extent of impairing or taking away its power or jurisdiction to act in the case.[93] The reason is this. If any such erroneous or irregular action has occurred, he has his remedy by appeal, error, or certiorari. And although, on a review by an appellate court, the objections presented might be amply sufficient to procure a reversal of the judgment, yet he cannot make the proceeding by habeas corpus a short cut to the same result, because that would be twisting the extraordinary remedy away from its proper object to make it subserve an entirely different purpose.[94] The importance of this rule justifies its illustration by a number of examples. Thus the investigation on habeas corpus will not be allowed so wide a range as to include the nature, shows affirmatively that there was no interval of time between the plea of guilty and the sentence, although the statute requires an interval of at least two days.[104]

§ 256. Jurisdiction may be examined.

In order that a judgment may be valid, it is necessary that the court should have had jurisdiction both of the person and the subject-matter; the want of such jurisdiction may be shown on habeas corpus; and if either element is proved to be wanting, the judgment is void and an imprisonment under it is illegal.[105] But it is to be observed that in criminal cases the question of jurisdiction of the subject-matter may frequently become a fact in issue, and in that event its determination by the verdict will preclude a fresh investigation of the subject on proceedings by habeas corpus. This is the case where the jurisdiction of the court over the place where the alleged offense was committed is traversed by the defendant, and the jury find that the locus in quo is within the limits of the court's territorial jurisdiction. After such a finding, the petitioner cannot impeach the judgment by showing that the place was without such limits.[106] It must also be remarked in this connection that there is

As regards the nature and effect of a judgment void for want of jurisdiction, and the right of every court to treat such judgment as a nullity, when drawn collaterally in question, there is no substantial difference between the case of an imprisonment under such a judgment, and one of any other illegal imprisonment under pretense of authority from the United States, in respect to the right of a state court to inquire in the first instance by habeas corpus into its legality. a material difference in the authorities, as to the circumstances in which a judgment may be impeached for want of jurisdiction, when it is not void on its face. This topic will be treated in the third part of the present chapter. In the meantime, we call the reader's notice to the fact that the collateral investigation of a judgment on habeas corpus is only a special application of the general rule. And if a majority of the states refuse to allow parties or privies to attack a judgment, in general, for want of jurisdiction, unless the record itself shows where the jurisdiction failed, there is nothing in the nature of this special case to take it out of the rule. A word must be added in regard to a particular class of courts whose sentences have sometimes been thought to be open to revision on habeas corpus, viz., courts-martial. It is now well settled that while the jurisdiction of such a court may be challenged and examined in such a proceeding, its judgment cannot be disregarded or annulled, or the prisoner discharged, unless it is absolutely void. "The question of the jurisdiction of a general court-martial may always be inquired into upon the application of any party aggrieved by its proceedings, and so may that of every other judicial tribunal; but the range and scope of the inquiry is controlled by the same rules and limitations in both cases. There must be jurisdiction to hear and to determine, and to render the particular judgment or sentence imposed. If this exists, however erroneous the proceedings may be, they cannot be reviewed collaterally upon habeas corpus. It would be as indecorous and as wanton a stretch of judicial power to assume in advance that a general court-martial will erroneously convict an accused person of a military offense, as it would be to indulge such a presumption concerning a common-law court." [107] Finally, the writ of habeas corpus cannot be used as substitute for quo warranto. "One convicted by a jury and sentenced in court by a judge de facto, acting colore officii, though not de jure, and detained in custody in pursuance of his sentence, cannot properly be discharged on habeas corpus. The validity of the appointment or election of an officer de facto, before whom a prisoner has been convicted of crime, will not be inquired into on habeas corpus." [108]

§ 257. Constitutionality of Statutes.

Applications for release on habeas corpus are not infrequently made on the ground that the law under which the prosecution and conviction were had was unconstitutional, and there is much conflict of authority upon the question whether an inquiry into the validity of such law is proper in a proceeding of this nature. In several of the states it is apparently the accepted rule that the constitutionality of a statute or ordinance cannot be examined on habeas corpus, and if no other ground is presented for the petitioner's discharge, the court will refuse to interfere.[109] It may be urged in support of this view that the trial court has always the right to pass upon the question of its own jurisdiction, and that if it assumes to act in the matter and to proceed to judgment, it necessarily affirms the validity of the statute under which its action is taken, which finding should be respected in every other court. This argument is not without weight. But on the other hand, it cannot be too strongly insisted that an unconstitutional law is no law at all. It cannot make that a crime which was not so before. It cannot confer jurisdiction. A proceeding taken under it is void, not merely erroneous. A person convicted under it is innocent, and is held in custody illegally. Hence if the validity of the law could not be tested on habeas corpus, we should have, supposing it to be in fact unconstitutional, a most anomalous case, viz., a person unlawfully restrained of his liberty, and that too in the most unwarrantable circumstances, whose relief is the sole object of this writ, and yet to whom relief must be denied. We are decidedly inclined to agree with the numerous cases which hold that the alleged unconstitutionality of the act or ordinance under which the petitioner is held is always a proper subject of inquiry on habeas corpus, and that if the court finds it to be invalid, it is justified in releasing the prisoner.[110] The federal courts uniformly hold that the imprisonment of a person under an invalid ordinance of a municipal corporation is such a case of unlawful restraint as will justify their releasing him on habeas corpus, because, being without "due process of law," it is in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States.[111] But the circuit court will not overrule the solemn judgment of the supreme court of the state upon the question of the validity of such ordinance, where there is reasonable ground for doubt; in such cases the ultimate decision should be referred to the supreme court of the United States.[112] And there is authority to the point that the federal courts have no jurisdiction to discharge a prisoner held under a state statute, on the ground that such statute is in violation of the constitution of the state, or in excess of the powers which the people of the state have conferred on their legislature; if it does not violate the federal constitution, the question is for the state courts.[113]

§ 258. Jurisdiction to render the Particular Sentence.

In the case of Ex parte Shaw,[114] the supreme court of Ohio expressed the following views. "The question presented in this case is, whether, conceding that the sentence is for horse-stealing, and that, by statute, the sentence must be for a period not less than three years, the commitment is lawful. The courts are required by statute, upon conviction, to sentence for a period not less than three years. The sentence in this case is for one year. Does this render the sentence void and the commitment of the relator unlawful? The question is one simply of jurisdiction. The court had jurisdiction over the offense and its punishment. It had authority to pronounce sentence; and while in the legitimate exercise of its power, committed a manifest error and mistake in the award of the number of years of the punishment. The sentence was not void, but erroneous." And accordingly the court refused to release the prisoner on habeas corpus. And a number of other cases agree with this doctrine.[115] But the argument is far from satisfactory. It involves the error of overlooking the fact that jurisdiction to render the particular sentence imposed is equally as essential to its validity as jurisdiction of the person or the subject-matter. If either of these three elements is wanting, the judgment is a nullity. Now in respect to the sentence, the court has precisely the jurisdiction which the statute gives it, no more and no less. And if the statute prescribes that the sentence shall be for not less than three years, the court is utterly without power to sentence for one year. This seems too plain for argument. And indeed the great preponderance of authority sustains the proposition that if the court had not jurisdiction to render the particular sentence,—if the sentence is different from that prescribed by the law, or is below the minimum or above the maximum, —that is good ground for releasing the prisoner on habeas corpus.[116]

§ 259. Sufficiency of Process or Pleadings.

A person tried and convicted on a criminal charge, and sentenced to imprisonment, without any indictment or presentment by a grand jury, is entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus.[117] But upon proceedings by habeas corpus, the court from which the writ issues has no power to inquire into the sufficiency of the indictment or information on which the trial was had that resulted in the judgment under which the prisoner is detained; nor can it undertake to decide whether such pleadings state an indictable offense. And although the indictment be defective or irregular, or fail to disclose any

The point is illustrated in the following clear and forcible manner, in Ex parte Lange, supra: "If a justice of the peace, having jurisdiction to fine for a misdemeanor, and with the party charged properly before him, should render a judgment that he be hung, it would simply be void. Why void? Because he had no power to render such a judgment. So if a court of general jurisdiction should, on an indictment for libel, render a judgment of death, or confiscation of property, it would for the same reason be void. Or if, on an indictment for treason, the court should render a judgment of attaint, whereby the heirs of the criminal could not inherit his property, which should, by the judgment of the court, be confiscated to the state, it would be void as to the attainder, because in excess of the authority of the court, and by the constitution." But a sentence for an offense punishable by imprisonment cannot be held void on habeas corpus because it imposes hard labor during the imprisonment. United States v. Pridgeon, 153 U. S. 48, 14 Sup. crime known to the law, yet that is no reason for discharging the petitioner, and he must be remanded.[118] The rule rests upon the fact that such a defect is not jurisdictional. If the court has general jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the party is properly before it, its judgment is conclusive and binding and cannot be attacked collaterally, and if error or irregularity supervenes, such as in the case supposed, it is error or irregularity in the exercise of the court's jurisdiction, and does not make its sentence a nullity. Further, if there is any power which a court possesses beyond question or cavil, it is the power to judge of the sufficiency of the indictment or complaint and to determine whether or not the offense charged is legally punishable. If it should come to a mistaken conclusion in regard to these matters, there would undoubtedly be error in the technical sense. But it must be remembered that habeas corpus cannot be made to discharge the functions of a writ of error or of an appeal. A view contrary to that here expressed is held by the supreme court of California.[119]

gers.[121] For instance, a stockholder in a corporation against which a judgment has been recovered, who may be made liable for its payment, is so far a privy in law that he may bring error to reverse the judgment; but for that very reason he cannot attack the judgment collaterally.[122] So, persons claiming land under an assignee for creditors cannot collaterally assail a judgment rendered against the assignee subjecting the land to the payment of a creditor's claim.[123] A judgment against an executor is prima facie evidence of the debt, as against the heirs of the decedent, and cannot be attacked by them collaterally save on the ground of fraud.[124] Even in the case of strangers to the litigation, it is not every one who may impeach the judgment in a collateral proceeding. The law does not permit wanton or unnecessary attacks upon its judgments, and they will stand as valid against any third person who fails to show that he has a real and substantial interest in avoiding the judgment, and one which the law is bound to protect. As the cases express it, the rule against collateral attacks upon judgments does not apply to such third persons or strangers to the record as would be prejudiced in regard to some pre-existing right if the judgment were given full effect.[125] In regard to garnishees, the rule approved by the best authorities is that a garnishee may impeach the validity of the judgment against the principal debtor on the ground of a want of jurisdiction over such debtor, but will not be permitted to assail it on the ground of any mere errors or irregularities.[126] Again, admitting that the particular individual has the right to allege cause against the judgment in a collateral proceeding, it must not be supposed that every possible objection is open to him for this purpose. It is stated, in Maine, that a stranger whose rights are affected may impeach a judgment collaterally on three grounds only, viz., that the court rendering it had no jurisdiction of the case; that the judgment was obtained by fraud or collusion; or that the judgment was irregularly or unlawfully rendered, to his prejudice.[127] But this rule,—in respect to the third ground stated,—is probably too liberal to be everywhere accepted as sound. The Pennsylvania courts hold that a stranger has no right to interfere with a judgment, however irregular, except where it is founded in collusion.[128] And it is said that only a defendant can avoid a judgment for irregularity (that is, by writ of error or motion to vacate), and as long as he is content to waive the irregularity, strangers cannot avail themselves of it collaterally.[129]

PART II. FOR ERRORS AND IRREGULARITIES.

§ 261. Erroneous and Irregular Judgments.

No principle of law is more firmly settled than that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, so long as it stands in full force and unreversed, cannot be impeached in any collateral proceeding on account of mere errors or irregularities, not going to the jurisdiction.[130] Thus defective findings, or the absence of any findings of fact in a trial by consent by the court, do not render the judgment a nullity, and it cannot be attacked collaterally therefor.[131] So obvious clerical errors in the judgment-roll which could not deceive a person accustomed to such documents are no ground for impeaching the judgment collaterally.[132] And generally, a judgment cannot be attacked collaterally for any defect which, in a direct proceeding, might be cured by amendment.[133] Nor will a judgment be open to this kind of impeachment merely because it was prematurely rendered,—as, before the expiration of the defendant's time to plead, or pending a stay of proceedings, or before the hearing on a demurrer,—such an irregularity not making the judgment absolutely void.[134] It may also be stated that the judgment of a court having jurisdiction is not rendered void, or open to a collateral attack, because it is wrong in law, being based upon an erroneous application of legal principles or upon insufficient evidence,[135] nor because the form of action or remedy selected was one not properly admitting of the specific relief which the judgment grants,[136] nor because of the failure to file a bond in an injunction suit,[137] or an affidavit in a proceeding by attachment,[138] nor because the relief granted by the judgment was not wholly within the authority of the court, if the judgment may stand as valid for so much as was within the competence of the court,[139] nor because it gives costs in a replevin suit where costs are not granted by the statute.[140] A sale under order of the orphans' court is not subject to collateral attack because made on application of the administrator on behalf of creditors, instead of being made on the application of the creditors themselves,[141] nor because not made at the time required by law, if it is afterwards confirmed by the court.[142] Again, it is no ground for collateral impeachment of a judgment that the claim in suit was directly passed on by the court, instead of being referred to a master in chancery, or that a receiver appointed by a court in another state was allowed to intervene.[143] Nor can a person affected by a judgment dispute its validity collaterally on the ground of a want of authority in the attorney on the other side to prosecute the action,[144] or of his own attorney to consent to the entry of a judgment.[145] Again, in a case admitting of doubt as to whether there should be a verdict, or whether judgment should be entered without a verdict, a judgment rendered upon a verdict is not, after the expiration of the term, open to collateral attack.[146] So, an order requiring a garnishee to pay money into court cannot be attacked by the judgment-debtor in a collateral proceeding, although the property in controversy may be exempt.[147] And where a decree in chancery erroneously authorizes execution to issue on the foot of the decree, the error may be corrected by an appeal or other direct proceeding, but the decree cannot be impeached collaterally.[148]

Closely allied to the principle just discussed is the rule that a mistake in the rendition or entry of a judgment can be taken advantage of only in a direct proceeding. A final judgment cannot be collaterally impeached because the opinion of the court shows that a different judgment should have been entered.[149] So a judgment ordering the delivery of all the property of an intestate to his widow, instead of to her in trust for his minor children, as provided by the statute, though palpably erroneous, is proof against collateral attack.[150] So again, in an action to recover from a purchaser part of certain lands sold under a decree of court, the plaintiff, if a party to the suit in which the decree of sale was made, cannot, in answer to the defense of res judicata, attack the decree of sale collaterally by showing that that part of the lands was included in the decree by inadvertence and mistake.[151] Nor is a judgment subject to collateral attack because, though it purports to be by default, the defendant had in fact duly answered and tendered material issues.[152] Nor can a vendee collaterally assail a decree foreclosing the vendor's lien as containing an irregular description.[153]

§ 263. Irregular or Defective Service.

We have already seen that defects or irregularities in the process, or in the manner of its service, are not sufficient to render the judgment void, unless the flaw or omission is so serious as to make the process equivalent to no process at all, or the service entirely nugatory, in which case the judgment fails for want of jurisdiction.[154] It follows that the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction cannot be attacked collaterally when there has been some service of notice, although such service of notice may be materially defective.[155] The rule as stated by the court in Nebraska is that where there is an attempt at service reaching the defendant, a defect in the manner of the service or form of the return is a mere irregularity, and is not ground for collateral attack on the judgment; but where the attempted service does not reach the defendant at all, a judgment founded thereon is absolutely void.[156] Thus, a judgment cannot be impeached in a collateral proceeding on the ground that the return of service of process was not made in a formal manner,[157] nor because the service of the writ did not conform to the requirements of the statute,[158] nor because service of the summons was made upon the return day,[159] nor because service was made by reading the summons to the defendant, instead of serving him with a copy,[160] nor because the writ was not served the requisite number of days before the hearing or judgment,[161] nor because service was made on the defendant as an adult while he was an infant, if the records do not show the latter fact,[162] nor because the summons was issued to and served by the coroner, when the statutes authorize him to act in certain cases in the place of the sheriff,[163] nor because the citation lacked a seal.[164] So a judgment against a corporation, where process was served on individuals who are not called officers, is erroneous, and would probably be reversed on error; nevertheless it cannot be impeached by a stranger, in a suit in equity to which the corporation, the stockholders, and the persons so served are parties, when they make no objection, and no fraud or collusion is charged.[165] It is held that a recital in a judgment that the defendant was legally served with process cuts off all inquiry in a collateral proceeding as to the legality of the service.[166] But on the other hand, where the affidavits of service in an action were wholly insufficient to authorize the court to enter judgment, and such defect appeared upon the face of the judgment-roll, it was held that the judgment might be impeached collaterally.[167] Where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and no fraud is shown, if judgment is confessed before the time for answering expires, this will not overthrow the judgment on a collateral attack, but all necessary presumptions will be entertained to support it.[168]

§ 264. Objections as to Parties.

As a general rule, any irregularity in regard to the number, character, or joinder of the parties to an action must be objected to at a proper time and manner in the progress of the suit, and will not justify a collateral impeachment of the judgment. For instance, where jurisdiction is not disputed, a misjoinder of parties is a mere error of practice, and cannot be taken advantage of, in an action of ejectment, to defeat the title of a purchaser at a sheriff's sale under the judgment.[169] So, "multifariousness as to subjects or parties, within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, cannot be taken advantage of by a defendant except by demurrer, plea, or answer to the bill, although the court in its discretion may take the objection at the hearing, or on appeal, and order the bill to be amended or dismissed. A fortiori it does not render a decree void, so that it can be treated as a nullity in a collateral action." [170] A judgment entered in favor of a plaintiff, against himself and others, and revived to the use of one to whom it has been assigned, is valid as against a creditor of the plaintiff whose judgment is rendered after the revival.[171] On similar principles, a judgment in an action for delinquent taxes, being apparently regular, cannot be attacked collaterally on the ground that the suit should have been brought in the name of a different official plaintiff.[172] Nor is it any ground for the collateral impeachment of a judgment that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest,[173]

or was a foreign administrator who had not filed copies of his letters in the clerk's office before bringing suit,[174] or that the plaintiff, being a corporation, had failed to allege the fact of its incorporation.[175] So again, it is no ground for collateral attack upon a judgment rendered in an action against a partnership that the judgment was entered against one partner only,[176] or was rendered on the confession of only one of the partners.[177]

In an earlier chapter, we discussed at some length the validity of judgments against married women, infants, lunatics, and deceased persons. In regard to the former class of persons, it appeared to be the settled doctrine in many of the states that, in the absence of enabling statutes, a judgment against a feme covert is absolutely void.[178] If this position is taken, it inevitably follows that such a judgment may be, on that ground, impeached and avoided in any collateral proceeding. But it was shown in the same connection that numerous courts prefer to consider such judgments as voidable only, especially where the defense of coverture is not set up, but the defendant suffers a default.[179] It is unnecessary to repeat the discussion in this place. But the reader, in considering the sections cited, should keep in mind the rule that it is only when a judgment is absolutely void that it can be impeached collaterally, not when it is merely voidable.[180] And a further suggestion may be added,—that the real question is one of jurisdiction; for if the court may take jurisdiction of a married woman, a judgment rendered against her may be erroneous on account of her abnormal status, but will not be null. What is here said of married women will apply, with some modifications, to the case of infants.[181] But, by the general consensus of authority, a judgment against a lunatic is not to be considered as entirely void, and therefore it will be protected from collateral attacks.[182] It is a different question in regard to the validity of judgments against joint defendants, a part of whom were persons under legal disabilities or were not served with process. Whatever may be thought of the effect of such judgment upon the defendant who was incapacitated or not within the jurisdiction, it seems but reasonable to hold it binding upon the other, supposing no similar objection to exist in his case. It might, as to him, be erroneous or voidable, but it should not be open to him, or to any other person in respect to him, to impeach it collaterally. This view was shown, in a preceding section, to be consonant to sound legal reason and supported by many weighty decisions.[183]

§ 266. Disqualification of Judge.

Notwithstanding some difference of opinion, it seems to be the more generally accepted doctrine that a decision rendered by a judge who was disqualified by reason of his interest in the subject-matter of the controversy is null and void, and that this may be shown against it in a collateral proceeding;[184] but that if the objection goes to the competence of the judge, on account of his relationship to one of the parties litigant, it will have no greater effect than to make the judgment erroneous or voidable, not laying it open to indirect impeachment.[185] Especially is this the case where the statutes authorize the parties to waive an objection of this character. The judgments and orders of a de facto judge, as we have already seen, are everywhere recognized as valid and binding, and of course they cannot be attacked collaterally on any allegation against the title of the person acting as judge.[186]

§ 267. Judgment for Excessive Amount.

If judgment is rendered for a sum exceeding the amount laid in the ad damnum clause of the writ, or claimed in the declaration or complaint, or notified to the defendant by the indorsement on the summons, it is irregular and erroneous and is liable to reversal, but it is not void, and it cannot be impeached collaterally.[187]

§ 268. Insufficiency of Evidence.

When a judgment is rendered in a cause by a court whose jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the person of the defendant is not questioned, it cannot be attacked in any collateral proceeding by a showing that the evidence on which it was based was illegal, improperly received, or insufficient to sustain the judgment.[188] This very clear and sensible rule rests on several principles. In the first place, an objection of that sort does not go to the jurisdiction, and consequently the judgment cannot be void, although it may be erroneous. Again, the legality and sufficiency of the evidence is a question for the court to determine, and its decision should be accepted as final and conclusive, unless in an appellate court. Finally, if such re-opening of the cause were allowed, the doctrine of res judicata would be despoiled of its very salutary effect.

§ 269. Illegal or Insufficient Cause of Action.

A judgment cannot be impeached collaterally on account of any illegality or insufficiency in the cause of action on which the suit is brought; these are matters which must be set up in defense to the action, and which are concluded by the judgment.[189] Thus, where a judgment-creditor seeks to enforce his judgment against equities, the judgment-debtor cannot show that the contract upon which the judgment was rendered was infected with usury or other illegality.[190] Nor will a judgment be considered open to collateral impeachment because the petition or complaint, in the action in which it was rendered, did not state a cause of action,[191] nor because the remedy was at law, while the suit was in equity, or vice versa,[192] nor because the action, when commenced, appears to have been barred by some statute of limitations,[193] nor because the claim in suit had been satisfied

prior to the rendition of the judgment,[194] nor because the note on which the judgment was recovered was without consideration,[195] nor because the claim on which the judgment was rendered was based on a wager or a gambling transaction.[196] A judgment rendered in a suit founded on an obligation before its maturity, is not subject to collateral attack.[197] And a judgment in an attachment suit cannot be impeached indirectly by showing that the creditor had no such demand against the defendant in attachment as would sustain that species of process.[198] Again, where a judgment is entered on a mortgage, the judgment will conclusively establish the due execution of the mortgage, although the latter may have been in fact void; the mortgage is merged in the judgment, which cannot be collaterally impeached except for fraud.[199]

PART III. FOR WANT OF JURISDICTION.

§ 270. Jurisdiction of Superior Courts presumed.

Before proceeding to consider in detail the permissibility of collaterally attacking judgments and decrees on an allegation of want of jurisdiction, it is necessary to advert to the presumption of law by which the acts and proceedings of courts of record are supported. It is a maxim, "omnia præsumuntur rite et solemniter esse acta."[200]

And this maxim, while often applied to transactions between private persons, has a special and peculiar applicability to the proceedings of public officers, and, more than in any other case, to the acts of the courts.[201] It is presumed that the doings of a court of record are regular and proper, that its jurisdiction was properly acquired, that its proceedings are legal and valid, and that its decisions are well-founded and free from error. "There is no principle of law better settled than that every act of a court of competent jurisdiction shall be presumed to have been rightly done, until the contrary appears; this rule applies as well to every judgment or decree rendered in the various stages of their proceedings, from the initiation to their completion, as to their adjudication that the plaintiff has a right of action. Every matter adjudicated becomes a part of their record, which thenceforth proves itself, without referring to the evidence on which it has been adjudged." [202] Hence, jurisdiction having been once acquired over the parties and the subject-matter, every presumption is in favor of the legality of the judgment.[203]

Coming now to the matter in more immediate contemplation, it is a part of this principle that the jurisdiction of the court cannot be collaterally denied. And the rule in this connection rests partly upon the maxim already quoted, and partly upon the peculiar doctrine which attaches the utmost conclusiveness to judicial records, and partly upon considerations of public policy which will be adverted to hereafter. But the rule must be taken with certain very important modifications. For first, it applies in its fullness only to the acts and judgments of courts of general jurisdiction or courts of record.

We are told that nothing is intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but what specially appears to be so, and nothing is intended to be within the jurisdiction of an inferior court but what is specially alleged.[204] This point will be discussed in a later section. Again, in the case of foreign judgments, the presumption, though recognized, is not of great weight, and is always liable to be rebutted by evidence to the contrary. Finally, the presumption is not absolutely conclusive. For it may be contradicted by the face of the record. Whether it may be rebutted by extraneous evidence is a moot question, which we reserve for discussion in a subsequent connection. But there is no question that want of jurisdiction, if shown by the record itself, may be urged against the judgment at any time and in any proceeding. Thus guarded against undue breadth of statement, we are prepared to formulate the rule which is recognized and accepted by all the authorities, viz., the judgment of a domestic court, having general and superior jurisdiction, is always to be presumed regular and valid and founded upon jurisdiction properly and duly acquired, until the contrary is definitely made to appear in some permissible manner.[205] Hence, when a court of general jurisdiction pronounces judgment, the presumption is in favor of its jurisdiction, and it is not incumbent upon one who bases a right upon such judgment to aver facts essential to the existence of jurisdiction.[206] And whatever is upon the records of such a court is presumed to be rightfully there.[207] It is therefore important to consider the various conditions which the record may present in a given case,—as, whether it be complete or deficient, and whether it contain recitals as to jurisdiction or not,—and ascertain how the presumption will apply in the various circumstances. And this will now engage our attention.

§ 271. Silence or Incompleteness of the Record.

The presumption in favor of the jurisdiction of superior courts is most frequently invoked in aid of their judgments in cases where the record is silent on the subject of jurisdiction. It may be defective or incomplete in consequence of the loss or absence of parts of the record or from the omission of proper recitals. Or the record, though apparently complete and regular, may say nothing on the subject of jurisdiction. Or its deliverances may be obscure and ambiguous. For any of these reasons the record may fail to show affirmatively that the court had jurisdiction of the subject and persons, while yet it does not distinctly show a want of jurisdiction. In any of these cases the weight of authority sustains the rule that the judgment, if rendered by a superior domestic court, will sustain itself against any collateral attack by parties or privies on account of any alleged want of jurisdiction.[208] The rule is equally applicable in cases where there are numerous parties; the fact that the record is silent upon some matter touching the jurisdiction over some of the defendants does not affect the presumption in its favor.[209] So where two defendants are sued ex contractu and one confesses judgment for both, the authority to do so need not appear in the record, nor can the judgment of the court be collaterally impeached for this supposed defect.[210] Where the record does not show that a default was not properly entered, the presumption arises that the required notice was given.[211] And in general, a judgment is not open to collateral impeachment merely because the record fails to show the service of the process by which the court acquired jurisdiction of the defendant; if the record is silent on this point, it will be presumed that lawful and sufficient process was duly served.[212] Similarly, when the judgment is against a non-resident, and jurisdiction was acquired by publication of notice, the judgment is not impeachable collaterally because the record does not show compliance with all the requirements of the statute authorizing that manner of citation, or directing the mode of its execution; a full compliance will be presumed.[213] Therefore when a party seeks, in any collateral action, to impeach the judgment or decree of a court of superior jurisdiction, on the ground that he had no legal notice of the pendency of the action, it is necessary that his pleading should set forth what, if anything, is shown by the record in relation to the issue and service of process, because, unless the record itself shows that the court never acquired jurisdiction of him, it will be conclusively presumed that the jurisdiction did attach.[214] Nor is it enough to overcome this presumption that the judgment-roll is defective, or that some of the papers which should properly constitute a part of it are wanting.[215] Thus, where the papers in a case are all lost, and the record states that the judgment was taken by default without a jury, the court will presume that it was a case where such would have been the proper proceeding.[216] So where only part of the record is given in evidence, that part of it which relates to process and appearance being by agreement of parties withheld, it will be presumed that all parties who are named as such in the pleadings and judgment were properly before the court.[217] Again, where the docket showed a summons "returned on oath," but not that it had been served, it was held that the judgment was merely irregular and could not be impeached collaterally.[218] Where the record fails to state that the judgment was rendered at a regular term of the court, but states that it was entered on May 6, 1885, it will be presumed, in the absence of contrary evidence in the record, that the judgment was rendered at a regular term duly fixed by law.[219] "Where nothing whatever is shown, if evidence were necessary to have authorized the particular decision complained of, it will be presumed that the evidence was before the court and that it fully justified the conclusion reached. If a party rely upon the fact that there was no evidence in a case, where evidence was necessary, he must establish it by a proper bill of exceptions, or he will fail." [220] So also, if the record in a case does not show the situation of land affected by the decree, it will be presumed, in a collateral attack upon the judgment, that the land was within the territorial jurisdiction of the court.[221]

The same rule governs the case of an ambiguity or obscurity in the record. Thus, where two demurrers to a declaration were on file, and the judgment of the court refers to the "said demurrer," without specifying which of them, it will be presumed that the court passed upon both.[222] So where, by reason of the loss of the record or any part of it, there is difficulty in discovering the ground upon which jurisdiction was taken in the particular case, if there be any ground upon which the court could rightfully have taken cognizance of the case, it will be presumed that it assumed jurisdiction on that ground, unless it be made to appear affirmatively by the record that it was taken on some other ground.[223] It is also a rule that the fact that the record of a cause in a federal court fails to show affirmatively a ground of federal jurisdiction will not make its judgment a nullity, or render it subject to collateral attack; and this is true when the court assumes jurisdiction because it holds that the suit involves a federal question, such as the construction of an act of congress, even if it is mistaken in so holding.[224]

§ 272. Appearance by Attorney.

It has been made a question whether the presumption in favor of jurisdiction should be extended to the case where the record shows an appearance by attorney, which is apparently regular but was in fact unauthorized. Many of the cases lay down the rule, in the most uncompromising terms, that a judgment recovered against a defendant who was not served with process and had no knowledge of the suit, but for whom an attorney appeared, although without authority, can by no means be attacked for want of jurisdiction in any collateral proceeding, and is binding upon the defendant.[225] But on the other hand, there is not wanting authority for the view that the authority of the attorney may always be controverted.[226] The best and safest rule, in our judgment, is that formulated in a recent case in Kansas, where it is said that while a judgment resting upon the unauthorized appearance of an attorney is void, yet an attorney's appearance, for a defendant whom he professes to represent, is presumed to be authorized until the contrary is shown; and it devolves upon the defendant impeaching this authority to show by positive proof that such appearance is invalid; and all the presumptions are in favor of a finding of the trial court that the appearance of the attorney is binding upon the defendant.[227] If the case is that of a judgment rendered in another state, a recital in the record that the defendant appeared by attorney is conclusive of the fact that the attorney did appear, but not that he had authority to appear.[228]

§ 273. Jurisdictional Recitals.

It commonly happens that the record itself will furnish evidence on the question of the jurisdiction of the court. And notwithstanding some vigorous dissent, the great majority of the decisions hold (in the case of a domestic as distinguished from a foreign judgment) that if the record shows the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction, or recites that jurisdiction did in fact attach, its averments are final and conclusive in every collateral proceeding, and cannot be contradicted by any extraneous evidence.[229] This is in consequence of the great sanctity attached to judicial records by the common law and their "uncontrollable verity." It is said: "If upon inspection of the record it appears that no notice has been given, the judgment or decree is void. On the other hand, if it be a judgment or decree of a domestic court of general jurisdiction, and the record declares that notice has been given, such declaration cannot be contradicted by extrinsic proof. In such cases the judgment or decree is sustained, not because a judgment rendered without notice is good, but because the law does not permit the introduction of evidence to overthrow that which for reasons of public policy it treats as absolute verity. The record is conclusively presumed to speak the truth, and can be tried only by inspection. This results from the power of the court to pass upon every question which arises in the cause, including the facts necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction, and as to which, therefore, its judgment, unless obtained by fraud or collusion, is binding, until reversed, on every other court." [230] Hence a recital in a judgment that the original process was served on the defendant, or that publication (when allowed in lieu of service of process) was made, or that the party appeared by attorney or by answer, is conclusive when the record is collaterally put in issue, unless the recital is positively contradicted by the record itself.[231] We proceed to illustrate the rule here stated by an account of certain typical cases. In Reily v. Lancaster,[232] the validity of a tax judgment was collaterally involved. It contained a recital that "all the owners and claimants of the property above described have been duly summoned to answer the complaint herein and have made default in that behalf." It appeared, however, that the name of one of the owners was omitted from the printed summons, which was served by publication. Yet the judgment was sustained, the court indulging the presumption that there was adequate proof of service on that defendant although it did not appear in the record. In an important Ohio decision the record of a judgment declared that "the defendants, by C., their attorney, came into court, and by virtue of his power of attorney filed in this case, confessed judgment," etc. It was sought in a collateral proceeding to show that the only power of attorney among the papers in the case, and which was marked with the proper number of the case, did not appear to be signed by some of the defendants, and that such defendants were at the time married women, and thereby to show that the judgment was rendered without jurisdiction and was void. But it was held that evidence of such facts could not be received to impeach the validity and effect of the judgment.[233]

But while it is inadmissible to contradict the record by extrinsic evidence, it is always open to the party to show that one part of the record contradicts another part. Thus the recital of service in a judgment may be contradicted by producing the original summons and return.[234] But the contradiction must be explicit and irreconcilable. It is not enough that the recital seems to be contradicted by inferences drawn from other parts of the record. For example, where the service of a summons to the September term of court was defective, and the cause was continued without any steps being taken, and at the ensuing term a decree was rendered which recited that the defendants "were duly served ten days before the first day of the October term," and the record contained only the summons to the September term, it was held that there was nothing appearing in the record to rebut the presumption in favor of the jurisdiction of the court as indicated by its finding in the decree.[235] So in an action against two defendants jointly, on a promissory note, personal service was had on one of them and the other was served by publication; the record did not show that the latter had filed any pleadings in the case, but the judgment of the court recited that "both parties waived a jury, and submitted the cause to the court upon the law and facts;"

So, where the return set out in a docket shows that the citation was served before its issuance, and the original citation and return have been destroyed, the date shown in the record being an impossible one, it will be presumed, on collateral attack, that service was had on a date which would render the judgment valid. and it was held that the record disclosed a personal appearance of both defendants, and the recitals of the judgment were conclusive.[236] A very strong application of this rule of ascribing absolute verity to the record was made in a recent case in Texas. It was a collateral attack upon the judgment of a domestic court of general jurisdiction, and the nullity of the judgment for want of jurisdiction over the person of the defendant was insisted on, because the return upon the writ of citation showed that the alleged publication, as therein recited, could not have been made. The judgment, however, recited that the defendant failed to appear and answer "but wholly made default, although duly cited with process." It was held that, to determine whether the record shows affirmatively that there was proper service, the whole of it must be considered together, and that the recital in the judgment, which was the last act of the court in the case, that the defendant was "duly cited," imported absolute verity.[237]

§ 274. Decision of the Court upon its own Jurisdiction.

The fact of its own jurisdiction may become a matter in issue before the court, or a question which it must determine before proceeding with the case, and then its decision that it has jurisdiction is generally considered final and conclusive in all collateral inquiries. When the jurisdiction of a court depends upon a fact which it is required to ascertain in its decision, such decision is binding until reversed in a direct proceeding.[238] Where a statute confers general jurisdiction over a class of cases upon a particular tribunal, its decision upon the facts essential to the existence of jurisdiction in a particular case belonging to the class will be conclusive as against collateral attack.[239] So when a notice which is defective, or the service of which is informal, has been adjudged sufficient, the judgment rendered thereunder will not be held void in a collateral proceeding.[240] And in case of an insufficient service of notice, if the court decides the question of jurisdiction erroneously, the judgment will be voidable but binding until reversed on appeal.[241] The determination of the question of the sufficiency of the affidavits presented to the court as proof of the service of a summons and the failure of the defendant to answer, is a judicial determination of the question of jurisdiction, and therefore binding until set aside or reversed.[242] But in California, the decision of the probate court upon jurisdictional facts in a particular case is not conclusive upon parties not actually before the court, and can be questioned in a direct suit in the same court.[243] And it is said that when the record discloses the evidence of jurisdiction on which the court acted, its finding that it had jurisdiction is not conclusive unless the facts shown support it.[244]

§ 275. Cases denying Conclusiveness of Record.

The preceding sections show the immense preponderance of authority to be in favor of the rule that a judgment of a superior court can never be impeached collaterally for want of jurisdiction not appearing on its face. This rule, as we stated, is limited to domestic judgments. For in the case of a judgment coming from a sister state or a foreign country, it is agreed on all hands that want of jurisdiction may always be shown against it. But this is a special and peculiar question, and must be carefully separated from the point now under consideration. That being done, we still find a certain number of cases squarely denying the generally accepted rule. It is held in Texas that the doctrine of the absolute verity of a record does not apply when the want of jurisdiction is made a question. "This may always be set up when a judgment is sought to be enforced or any benefit is claimed under it; and this is not inconsistent with the principle which ordinarily forbids the impeachment or contradiction of a record." [245] So in New York. "The want of jurisdiction in a court rendering a judgment may be shown collaterally whenever any benefit or protection is sought under the judgment." [246] And the same rule is approved in several other states.[247] In a recent Massachusetts decision it was held that a domestic judgment may be impeached, in an action thereon, by evidence that, at the time the suit garded without very clear and satisfactory proof to the contrary. But see the later cases of Swift v. Yanaway, 153 Ill. 197, 38 N. E. 589, and Lancaster v. Snow, 184 Ill. 534, 56 N. E. 813.

Supp. 80. But a judgment cannot be collaterally attacked by showing that there is a doubt about the jurisdiction; the want of jurisdiction must be made to appear clearly by a fair preponderance of the evidence. was brought, the defendant therein was a non-resident of the state and had no notice of its commencement or pendency.[248] So in Kansas it is held permissible to attack a judgment collaterally by proof that the sheriff's return of personal service is false and that defendant in reality never had notice of the action.[249] In another state, a recital in an order that a party appeared does not prevent him from showing at all times that he neither was served nor appeared.[250]

But the most important decision on this side of the question is that of Ferguson v. Crawford.[251] In this case the well-considered and well-reasoned opinion, by Judge Rapallo, contains such a discriminating review of the authorities, and such pertinent observations on the merits of the issue, that we find it necessary to quote from it at some length. "After considerable research," says the learned judge, "I have been unable to find a single authoritative adjudication, in this or any other state, deciding that in the case of a domestic judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, want of jurisdiction over the person may be shown by extrinsic evidence, while there are a great number of adjudications in neighboring states holding that, in the case of such judgments, parties and privies are estopped in collateral actions to deny the jurisdiction of the court over the person as well as the subject-matter, unless it appear on the face of the record that the court had not acquired jurisdiction; and that in such cases there is a conclusive presumption of law that jurisdiction was acquired by service of process or the appearance of the party. The cases are very numerous, but the citation of a few of them will suffice." He then proceeds to review and comment upon the principal cases holding this rule, and continues: "It is quite remarkable, however, that notwithstanding the formidable array of authority in its favor, the courts of this state have never sustained this doctrine by any adjudication, but on the contrary the great weight of judicial opinion, and the views of some of our most distinguished jurists, are directly opposed to it. As has been already stated, our courts have settled by adjudication in regard to judgments of sister states, that the question of jurisdiction may be inquired into, and a want of jurisdiction over the person shown by evidence, and have further decided (in opposition to the holding of courts of some of the other states) that this may be done even if it involves the contradiction of a recital in the judgment-record. In stating the reasons for this conclusion, our courts have founded it on general principles, quite as applicable to domestic judgments as to others, and save in one case,[252] have in their opinions made no discrimination between them.[253] When we come to consider the effect of these authorities, it is difficult to find any solid ground upon which to rest a distinction between domestic judgments and judgments of sister states in regard to this question, for under the provisions of the constitution of the United States, which requires that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state, it is now well settled that when a judgment of a court of a sister state is duly proved in a court of this state, it is entitled here to all the effect to which it is entitled in the courts of the state where rendered. If conclusive there, it is equally conclusive in all the states of the Union; and whatever pleas would be good to a suit thereon in the state where rendered, and none others, can be pleaded in any court in the United States.[254] In holding, therefore, that a defense that the party was not served and did not appear, although the record stated that he did, was good, our courts must have held that such was the law of this state and the common law, and consequently that in the absence of proof of any special law to the contrary in the state where the judgment was rendered, it must be presumed to be also the law of that state. The judgments of our courts can stand on no other logical basis. The distinction which is made in almost all the other states of the Union between the effect of domestic judgments and judgments of sister states, in regard to the conclusiveness of the presumption of jurisdiction over the person, is sought to be explained by saying that in regard to domestic judgments the party aggrieved can obtain relief by application to the court in which the judgment was rendered, or by writ of error, whereas in the case of a judgment rendered against him in another state he would be obliged to go into a foreign jurisdiction for redress, which would be a manifestly inadequate protection; and therefore the constitution may be construed so as to apply only where the persons affected by the judgment were within the operation of the proceeding. This explanation, however, does not remove the difficulty in making the distinction; for if there is a conclusive presumption that there was jurisdiction, that presumption must exist as well in one case as in the other. The question whether or not the party is estopped cannot be made to depend upon the greater inconvenience of getting rid of the estoppel in one case than in another. But aside from this observation as to the effect of the authorities, an examination of them shows that our courts did in fact proceed upon a ground common to both classes of judgments." The learned judge here proceeds to examine the New York authorities at some length, citing and quoting from those mentioned in the margin.[255] The pith of the argument extracted from them (and which is truly as applicable to one class of judgments as to the other) is that, to say that the paper relied on is a record because it recites the defendant's appearance, and that he cannot deny the jurisdiction over him because the paper is a record, is reasoning in a vicious circle; and that unless a court has jurisdiction, it can never make a record, such as to import absolute verity, and the party ought not to be estopped, by any allegation in a supposed record, from proving any fact which goes to establish the truth of a plea alleging want of jurisdiction. The conclusion of the learned judge's investigation is as follows: "In Bolton v. Jacks, 6 Rob. (N. Y.) 198, Jones, J., says that it is now conceded, at least in this state, that want of jurisdiction will render void the judgment of any court, whether it be of superior or inferior, of general, limited, or local jurisdiction, or of record or not, and that the bare recital of jurisdictional facts in the record of a judgment of any court, whether superior or inferior, of general or limited jurisdiction, is not conclusive, but only prima facie evidence of the truth of the fact recited, and a party against whom a judgment is offered is not by the bare fact of such recitals estopped from showing by affirmative proof that they were untrue and thus rendering the judgment void for want of jurisdiction. It thus appears that the current of judicial opinion in this state is very strong and uniform in favor of the proposition stated by Jones, J., in 6 Rob. (N. Y.) 198, and if adopted here is decisive of the present case. It has not as yet, however, been directly adjudicated, and if sustained it must rest upon the local law of this state, as it finds no support in adjudications elsewhere. There are reasons, however, founded upon our system of practice, which would warrant us in so holding. The powers of a court of equity being vested in our courts of law, and equitable defenses being allowable, there is no reason why, to an action upon a judgment, the defendant should not be permitted to set up, by way of defense, any matter which would be ground of relief in equity against the judgment; and it is conceded in those states where the record is held conclusive, that when the judgment has been obtained by fraud, or without bringing the defendant into court, and the want of jurisdiction does not appear upon the face of the record. relief may be obtained in equity. The technical difficulty arising from the conclusiveness of the record is thus obviated." A recent case in California, without going so far as to admit that it is regular or proper practice to permit the collateral impeachment of a judgment for want of jurisdiction, yet holds that if the party does in fact so assail the judgment, and the result of the investigation is the discovery that it was not actually founded upon proper jurisdiction, then the nullity of the judgment must be declared, and its conclusive effects done away with, just as if it were void upon its face.[256]

§ 276. Arguments on the Conclusiveness of Records.

From an examination of the authorities cited in the preceding sections, it will be discovered that many of them have been chiefly influenced, in refusing to hear extraneous evidence on a plea of want of jurisdiction, by the traditional regard which has always been shown to judicial records. From the earliest times, the written memorials of courts have been held to import the most absolute and "uncontrollable verity." That records "always speak the truth," and cannot be contradicted, that they can be tried only by inspection, and are evidence of the highest nature, are legal commonplaces of almost legendary antiquity. Yet if we consider the present methods of perpetuating the accounts of legal proceedings,—the loose, careless, and irregular manner in which records are but too often made up,—it is difficult to find satisfactory reasons, in the thing itself, for attributing such sanctity to a judgment-roll. In so far then as this rule rests only upon the inviolable character of the record, it seems to evince a too superstitious reverence for the notions of the early English law. But there is a broad and very serious consideration of public policy underlying the rule, upon which the best considered cases ultimately base their position. The stability of judicial records is requisite for the peace and comfort of society, and for the protection of all persons who may deal with rights or property in reliance upon their conclusiveness. As it has been said by a certain high court, if judgments were always open to collateral attacks, they would "no longer be a final adjudication of the rights of litigants, but the starting point from which a new litigation would spring up; acts of limitation would become useless and nugatory; purchasers on the faith of judicial process would find no protection; every right established by a judgment would be insecure and uncertain; and a cloud would rest upon every title." [257] Now while it may be conceded that the considerations here adduced are amply sufficient to sustain the rule against impeaching judgments collaterally for errors or irregularities, it is still a question whether they apply with equal force where the objection goes to the very jurisdiction of the court. But it must be admitted that the necessity of protecting innocent third persons, who may acquire rights or alter their legal relations on the faith of judicial records, is of grave importance.

On the other hand, the arguments for permitting want of jurisdiction to be shown collaterally, may be divided into two heads. First, there is the question of natural justice to the individual. To suffer a man to be condemned unheard, to permit him to be deprived of his property or his rights by proceedings of which he had no notice or in which he had no opportunity to be heard, is repugnant to every sentiment of fairness and right dealing, as well as wholly alien to the spirit of our jurisprudence. To sacrifice the individual to the welfare of the community is no doubt a very high principle of political ethics, but it is scarcely at home in the body of our law, except in matters of police. On the contrary, it is the guarantee which the law gives of the inviolability of every man's rights and estate that constitutes its best title to the respect and confidence of the people. True, it is said that a defendant who is injured by the rendition of a judgment against him without jurisdiction of his person, may procure its reversal in an appellate court, or move to vacate it in the court which rendered it, or go to equity with an application for an injunction. But this is no adequate safeguard. These remedies are often illusory. For it is very possible that he may remain entirely ignorant of the adjudication against him until long after his rights are irrevocably lost. In the second place, if the court had no jurisdiction, its proceedings are void; and if the action of the court was void, its memorial of that action is no record. This argument is put in a very clear light in an early New York case, where the learned judge, speaking of an alleged record, used the following language: "It imports perfect verity, it is said, and the parties to it cannot be heard to impeach it. It appears to me that this proposition assumes the very fact to be established, which is the only question in issue. For what purpose does the defendant question the jurisdiction of the court? Solely to show that its proceedings and judgments are void, and therefore the supposed record is not in truth a record. If the defendant had not proper notice of, and did not appear to, the original action, all the state courts, with one exception, agree in opinion that the paper introduced as to him is no record; but if he cannot show, even against the pretended record, that fact, on the alleged ground of the uncontrollable verity of the record, he is deprived of his defense by a process of reasoning that is to my mind little less than sophistry. The plaintiffs in effect declare to the defendant: The paper declared on is a record, because it says you appeared, and you appeared because the paper is a record. This is reasoning in a circle. The appearance makes the record uncontrollable verity, and the record makes the appearance an unimpeachable fact. The fact which the defendant puts in issue is the validity of the record, and yet it is contended that he is estopped by the unimpeachable credit of that very record from disproving any one allegation contained in it. Unless a court has jurisdiction, it can never make a record which imports uncontrollable verity to the party over whom it has usurped jurisdiction, and he ought not therefore to be estopped, by any allegation in that record, from proving any fact that goes to establish the truth of a plea alleging want of jurisdiction." [258]

On the whole, therefore, we must conclude that, as a matter of strict law and logic, the authorities which permit the collateral impeachment of judgments for want of jurisdiction have the better of the argument; but that the considerations of public policy which demand the conclusiveness of the record are of such importance and gravity that they will be likely always to overbalance the claims of strict legal consistency.

The general rule, as stated, is that every presumption will be indulged in favor of the records of superior courts. An important corollary to this rule is that there can be no presumption against the record. For if the record imports absolute verity, its recitals must be equally as conclusive when they make against the jurisdiction as when for it. If the record is silent as to jurisdictional facts, it will be aided by presumptions. But if it recites such facts, and the facts recited are not sufficient to confer jurisdiction, there can be no presumption that the recital is incorrect or incomplete.[259] "Where the existence of any jurisdictional fact is not affirmed upon the record in a court of superior jurisdiction, it will be presumed upon a collateral attack that the court acted correctly and with due authority, and its judgment will be as valid as though every fact necessary to jurisdiction affirmatively appeared. But no presumptions in support of a judgment are allowed in opposition to any statement made in the record. · If it appear that process was served in a particular mode, no other and different service can be presumed, for such presumption would contradict the record, which imports verity."[260] But the record must be taken as a whole. And if separate recitals of jurisdictional facts are found in different parts of it, which may reasonably stand together, they must all be considered together. And if the aggregate of information thus obtained shows jurisdiction rightly attaching, the judgment will not be void, though any one of the recitals, taken alone, would not be sufficient.[261] One other possible case remains; viz., where recitals in different parts of the record flatly contradict each other, and one would show jurisdiction and the other not. Here, since one recital must be false, it seems reasonable to assume the truth of that one which would support the jurisdiction. Thus in a case in Iowa, the record stated in one place that the answer was filed April 8th, and in another place that it was filed April 16th; and it was presumed, in favor of the validity of the judgment, that the former statement was the true one.[262]

§ 278. Judgment Void on its Face may be Attacked collaterally.

When the record itself discloses the fact that the court had no jurisdiction of the controversy, or that jurisdiction of the person of the defendant did not attach in the particular case, the judgment is a mere nullity, and may be collaterally impeached, by any person interested, whenever and wherever it is brought in question.[263] Thus when the defendant against whom a judgment was entered had no notice, and that appears from the proceedings, the judgment is void on its face.[264] It is equally true of want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Orders and judgments which the court has not the power under any circumstances to make or render are null and void, and their nullity can be asserted in any collateral proceeding where they are relied on in support of a claim of right.[265] But it must be remarked that a want of jurisdiction seldom, if ever, appears on the face of a judgment except in the insufficiency of the jurisdictional recitals. "What do the cases mean," asks the supreme court of California, "when they speak of a want of jurisdiction appearing upon the face of the record? Do they mean a positive and direct statement to the effect that something which must have been done, in order to give the court jurisdiction, was not done? Or do they mean that a want of jurisdiction appears whenever what was done is stated, and which, having been done, was not sufficient in law to give the court jurisdiction? If the former, they are a delusion. For we venture to say that no case can be found, or will arise hereafter, where the conditions contemplated by such a rule will be found to exist. No court has ever yet so far stultified itself as to render a judgment against a defendant, and at the same time deliberately state that it had not acquired jurisdiction over his person."[266] In the generality of cases, therefore, a judgment will be void on its face only where the record recites the jurisdictional facts (for if it is silent jurisdiction will be presumed), and the facts as so recited are plainly insufficient to have conferred jurisdiction.

It is also to be remarked that there is a clear distinction between those facts which involve the jurisdiction of the court over the parties and the subject-matter, and those quasi jurisdictional facts, without allegation of which the court cannot be set in motion, and without proof of which a decree should not be pronounced. In the absence of the former, the judgment of the court is void and may be attacked in collateral proceedings, while, in respect to the latter, it is conclusive, and cannot be questioned except on a direct proceeding.[267]

§ 279. Superior Courts exercising Special Statutory Powers.

So far we have confined our attention to the presumptions of jurisdiction in the case of a superior court exercising its ordinary common law powers. It remains to speak of the exercise of peculiar statutory powers, and then of the judgments of inferior tribunals. And first, it is an established rule that when a court of general jurisdiction has special and statutory powers conferred upon it, which are wholly derived from statute, and not exercised according to the course of the common law, or are not part of its general jurisdiction, it is to be regarded as quoad hoc an inferior or limited court, and its judgments to be treated accordingly, that is, its jurisdiction must appear on the record and cannot be presumed.[268] It is said, in a New Hampshire decision, that whenever a tribunal possesses qualified and limited powers, authorizing them to act in certain specified cases only, and by special modes of proceeding, and the law has provided no mode by which these proceedings can be revised, then the proceedings may be impeached collaterally by showing that the court or magistrates have acted in a case where they have no jurisdiction, or by modes of procedure which they are not authorized to adopt.[269] The same principle, under a slightly different aspect, is stated in a Connecticut case as follows: Where a statute confers upon a tribunal of limited and statutory jurisdiction a special power, to be exercised under particular circumstances and in a particular manner, it is indispensable to the valid exercise of the power that such circumstances exist at the time and that the court proceed in the exact manner prescribed; and where the record of such court finds the existence of those circumstances, and that such manner of proceeding was adopted, the finding is only prima facie proof of those facts and they may be disproved by parol evidence.[270] But the most satisfactory and reasonable statement of the rule that we have encountered in the books is expressed by the court of appeals of Virginia, in the following language: "When a court of general jurisdiction has conferred upon it special powers by special statute, and such special powers are exercised judicially, that is, according to the course of the common law and proceedings in chancery, such judgment cannot be impeached collaterally. But where a court of general jurisdiction has conferred upon it special and summary powers, wholly derived from statutes, and which do not belong to it as a court of general jurisdiction, and when such powers are not exercised according to the course of the common law, its action being ministerial only and not judicial, in such case its decision must be regarded and treated like those of courts of limited and special jurisdiction, and no such presumption of jurisdiction will attend the judgment of the court. But in such cases the facts essential to the exercise of the special jurisdiction must appear upon the face of the record."[271] But we must guard against the supposition that everything beside an ordinary adversary proceeding is of this special and statutory character. For example, a warrant of attorney to confess judgment is a familiar common-law security, and the fact that the mode of procedure, in entering judgment thereon, is regulated by a statute does not convert the proceeding into one of such a special character that the same presumptions do not obtain as in the case of any ordinary judgment.[272] So the proceeding by writ of ad quod damnum to assess damages for land taken under its charter by a turnpike company is not in derogation of the common law.[273] Where the action is one for the collection of delinquent taxes, there is much difference of opinion as to whether or not the court exercises its jurisdiction in a special or summary manner, the majority of the cases inclining to the opinion that judgments in tax cases are not entitled to the same presumptions which attend ordinary judgments at law, but that all the facts essential to the jurisdiction must appear on the face of the record.[274]

§ 280. Summary Proceedings.

It is well settled that a judgment in a summary proceeding must show upon its face everything that is necessary to sustain the jurisdiction of the court rendering it.[275] Thus, in a judgment on motion against a tax-collector and his sureties, rendered by nil dicit, the judgment entry must show the liability of the defendants for the debt or penalty sought to be recovered, and that the facts were proved necessary to give the court jurisdiction.[276]

§ 281. Constructive Service of Process.

Whether a proceeding in which service of process is made upon a non-resident defendant by publication of the summons, or attachment of his property, without an appearance by him, is entitled to be supported by the ordinary presumptions of the rightful acquisition of jurisdiction by superior courts, is a question of much importance, but upon which the authorities are by no means agreed. majority of the earlier cases hold that such proceedings are contrary to the course of the common law, are wholly dependent for their validity upon an exact compliance with the statutes authorizing them, are to be strictly scrutinized, and therefore, within the rule just stated, are not favored with any presumption unless the record does affirmatively show that everything necessary to the jurisdiction was actually and rightly done.[277] A very eminent judge has said that whenever "it appears from an inspection of the record of a court of general jurisdiction that the defendant, against whom a personal decree or judgment is rendered, was, at the time of the alleged seizure, without the territorial limits of the court, and thus beyond the reach of its process, and that he never appeared in the action, the presumption of jurisdiction over his person ceases, and the burden of establishing the jurisdiction is cast upon the party who invokes the benefit or protection of the judgment or decree."[278] But on the other hand, most of the later decisions contend,—and with much show of reason,—that such a rule is arbitrary and illogical. For, say they, the court is none the less a court of general jurisdiction because in this instance the legislature prescribes a special mode for the exercise of its powers. The process is special and statutory, but the jurisdiction of the court depends upon the constitution or general laws. And the presumption in favor of the validity of judgments rests upon considerations of public policy, and upon the high character of the courts of record, and the fact that the judges are men learned and skilled in the law,—reasons which are not affected by the circumstance that in the cases supposed a peculiar method of executing their process is adopted. According to this view, in cases of constructive service, the record, if silent or incomplete, should be aided by the same presumptions which obtain in the case of ordinary judgments founded upon personal service.[279] Thus, it is not necessary, in order to support a judgment on service by publication, to show that an affidavit for publication was made, since the law will presume that much in aid of the judgment.[280] Nor will the judgment be open to collateral impeachment although the affidavit was defective, insufficient, or false.[281]

§ 282. Judgments of Inferior Courts not aided by Presumptions.

In respect to the subject now under discussion, there is a fundamental distinction between superior and inferior courts. In the case of judgments rendered by the latter, the rules already stated as applying to the former are directly reversed.[282] Courts of inferior or limited powers must not only act within the scope of their jurisdiction, but it must appear on the face of their proceedings that they so acted; the record or minutes or papers in the case must affirmatively show the existence of every fact necessary to give jurisdiction in the particular cause; otherwise the judgment may be impeached collaterally, no presumptions are indulged in its support, and want of jurisdiction may be shown by evidence aliunde.[283] "Where one seeks to enforce the judgment of a court of limited and special jurisdiction, its organization is open to inquiry, and its jurisdiction must be established." [284] There are general expressions in the books which seem to indicate that, unless the jurisdiction of an inferior court appears fully and affirmatively on the record of its proceedings, the judgment will be absolutely void. And in that case there could be no question of introducing extraneous evidence either to support or contradict it. It has been held, in fact, that evidence extrinsic to the record cannot supply facts requisite to the jurisdiction.[285] But while it is undoubtedly the rule that, the record of such a court being silent on the subject or defective in its showings, there is no presumption to aid it,—while we may even concede that under such circumstances it would be presumptively invalid,—there seems to be no good reason for refusing to hear proper evidence tending to show actual jurisdiction. And in some of the states the decisions are positive to the effect that jurisdictional requisites may be shown by outside evidence, except in the case of those facts which the law expressly directs the court to spread upon its records.[286] It is further to be remarked that although a court may be an inferior or limited tribunal, yet if it has general jurisdiction of any one subject, its proceedings and judgments in respect to that subject will be sustained by the same liberal presumptions as to jurisdiction which obtain in the case of the superior courts.[287]

§ 283. Superior and Inferior Courts distinguished.

To draw a clear line of demarcation between superior and inferior courts is rendered almost impossible by the great differences in the judicial systems of the several states, as also by the fact that courts possessing similar powers are very differently regarded in different states. Practically, the question, in regard to any specific court, must be determined by the laws and decisions of the jurisdiction where it exists. But it has several times been attempted to formulate a distinction in general terms, and such expressions, though necessarily vague, may be of some assistance in prosecuting the inquiry. The United States supreme court, at an early day, observed that "the true line of distinction between courts whose decisions are conclusive if not removed to an appellate court, and those whose proceedings are nullities if their jurisdiction does not appear on their face, is this,—a court which is competent by its constitution to decide on its own jurisdiction, and to exercise it to a final judgment, without setting forth in their proceedings the facts and evidence on which it is rendered, whose record is absolute verity, not to be impugned by averment or proof to the contrary, is of the first description; there can be no judicial inspection behind the judgment save by appellate power. A court which is so constituted that its judgment can be looked through for the facts and evidence which are necessary to sustain it, whose decision is not evidence of itself to show jurisdiction and its lawful exercise, is of the latter description; every requisite for either must appear on the face of their proceedings, or they are nullities." [288] But this, it will be perceived, does not so much answer the question as

[288] Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. 319, 341, 11 L. Ed. 283, per Baldwin, J. See, also, Kempe v. Kennedy, 5 Cranch, 185, 3 L. Ed. 70; Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 94 Am. Dec. 742. "What tests are to be applied in determining the question of inferiority? It may be solved by showing that the court is either placed under the supervisory or appellate control of those named, or that the jurisdiction conferred upon it is limited and confined. Conceding that the act in question does not place the court which it creates under the supervisory control of the circuit court, and only allows appeals and writs of error to be prosecuted directly to the supreme court, yet it will still be an inferior tribunal if its jurisdiction is limited and inferior. General jurisdiction is that which extends to a great variety of matters. Limited jurisdiction, also state it in new terms. We must conclude that the difference between superior and inferior courts is one of relative rank and authority and not of intrinsic quality. Nor will the common distinction between "courts of record" and "courts not of record" aid us in framing a general rule, because a particular tribunal may be regarded in one state as a record court while an exactly similar court in another state will not possess that character. In all the states there are courts having original jurisdiction of every (or nearly every) species of action or proceeding known to the common law, unlimited in respect to the amount or the character of the controversy. And these are unquestionably "superior" courts within the meaning of the rule. And the same is true of courts possessing general equity powers. In most of the states there are certain tribunals whose authority is wholly derived from statute, who are authorized to take cognizance only of a particular class of actions or proceedings, or to act only in certain specified circumstances, whose course of procedure is precisely marked out, and whose minutes or memorials are not dignified with the character of a record. And these are undoubtedly "inferior" courts within the meaning of the rule. But between these two classes lie a considerable number of courts, whose jurisdiction has a maximum money-limit, or which have general jurisdiction of a special class of cases, or are otherwise differentiated from both the foregoing types. And as to these it is useless to attempt a universal classification. We called specific and inferior, is that which extends only to certain specified causes." State v. Daniels, 66 Mo. 200.

A court of record which has, by statute, all the power that any court could have over a certain subject of jurisdiction, especially if it be a subject of jurisdiction under the general rules of law or equity, is to be regarded (as to cases within that class) as a court of superior jurisdiction, within the rule which presumes the jurisdiction of such courts to render a particular judgment. Stahl v. Mitchell, 41 Minn. 325, 43 N. W. 385. And see Gridley v. College of St. Francis Xavier, 137 N. Y. 327, 33 N. E. 321.

"A tribunal which is not a common law court, which does not proceed according to the course of the common law, a newly created, limited, and special jurisdiction from which no appeal is allowed by statute, nor writ of error by the common law, yet determining in a summary way the most important rights and franchises, both as respects the people and private persons, is and cannot be otherwise than an inferior tribunal in the strictest sense of the word." Cunningham v. Squires, 2 W. Va. 422, 98 Am. Dec. 770.

§ 284. Probate Courts.

In Pennsylvania, the orphans' court is a court of record of equal dignity with the common law tribunals, and its decrees, as to matters within its jurisdiction, are conclusive on parties and privies against all collateral attack and impeachment except for fraud.[289] In Ohio, the probate courts are in the fullest sense courts of record; they belong to the class whose records import absolute verity, that are competent to decide on their own jurisdiction, and to exercise it to final judgment, without setting forth the facts and evidence on which it is rendered.[290] In Missouri also, the judgments and orders of probate courts, in matters within their jurisdiction, have the same import of verity as those of courts of general jurisdiction, and, like them, are not to be impeached in collateral proceedings.[291] And the same rule obtains in Illinois,[292] in Louisiana,[293] in South Dakota,[294] in Vermont,[295] in Alabama,[296] in Arkansas,[297] in Minnesota,[298] and in California.[299] In Texas, it seems to have been held at one time that the proceedings of a probate court must show every fact necessary to give jurisdiction, and could not be sustained by any presumption of validity.[300] But the latest decisions are to the effect that if the record of such a court shows that the steps necessary to clothe it with power to act in the given case were taken, or if the record be silent upon this subject, its judgment must be held conclusive in any other court of the same sovereignty when called in question collaterally.[301] On the other hand, in Mississippi, it is held that a decree of a probate court for the sale of real estate by an executor or administrator is invalid unless the record shows affirmatively a compliance with all the requirements of the statute under which the land was decreed to be sold.[302] And in Massachusetts, if a probate court exceeds its jurisdiction and makes a decree in a matter over which it has no power, the want of jurisdiction may be shown against such decree in any collateral proceeding, and it will then be treated as utterly void.[303] In New York, if a surrogate's decree shows jurisdiction on its face, its recitals are presumptive evidence of its validity when the question arises in a collateral proceeding.[304]

§ 285. Federal Courts.

The circuit, district, and territorial courts of the United States, though of limited jurisdiction, are not inferior courts in the technical sense of the term; their judgments and decrees stand on the same footing as those rendered by state courts of general jurisdiction, and their authority and jurisdiction are always to be presumed.[305] It is said: "The courts of the United States, though possessing a limited jurisdiction, yet, in the intendment of law, stand upon the same footing as courts of record of general jurisdiction. All the presumptions which are indulged in favor of superior tribunals of general jurisdiction are equally extended to the courts of the United States. In pleading a judgment or decree of one of those courts, there is no more necessity for showing the facts which confer jurisdiction than in a plea of a judgment of the highest tribunal known to the law. Their judgments cannot be impeached for irregularity or error in a collateral proceeding; they can only be vacated on motion, in the courts in which they are rendered, or reversed for error in an appellate jurisdiction." [306] Thus, a judgment obtained in a federal circuit court cannot be treated as a nullity or as being open to collateral impeachment, although the record fails to show a ground of federal jurisdiction, such as diverse citizenship of the parties.[307] So, a judgment rendered in a federal court, in an action removed thereto from a state court, cannot be collaterally attacked for want of proper jurisdictional allegations in the petition for removal.[308]

§ 286. Justices of the Peace.

It is not universally true that the courts of justices of the peace are inferior tribunals, within the rule in regard to presuming jurisdiction. In Texas, for example, such courts are created by the constitution, and exercise, within the limits therein defined, general exclusive jurisdiction; and accordingly their judgments, though not showing all the facts necessary to give jurisdiction, cannot be attacked collaterally as void therefor.[309] And in several other states, the judgments of such magistrates are considered as entitled to all the presumptions of validity. This is the case in Connecticut,[310] Vermont,[311] Pennsylvania,[312] Mississippi,[313] Tennessee,[314] and Alabama.[315] And in Massachusetts it is said that "the rule which makes the judgment of a court of record binding upon the parties, until reversed by proper proceedings therefor, although jurisdiction of the person was not properly obtained, is applicable as well to a justice of the peace as to one of a court of general jurisdiction."[316] But on the other hand, in Maryland and some other states, judgments rendered by justices will not be allowed to stand where the record fails to show affirmatively that a summons had been issued and served upon the defendant; such defect in the proceedings is fatal to the validity of the judgment and may be called in question in a collateral action.[317] And in Michigan a judgment entered by a justice by virtue of a statutory authority must show that the requirements of the statute have been complied with, and if it fails in this it is void.[318]

It is important to be observed, in considering the effect of judgments rendered by inferior courts, that if the record does affirmatively show the facts necessary to confer jurisdiction, then the same presumptions are indulged in favor of the regularity and validity of its proceedings as are extended to the superior courts, and they cannot be collaterally impeached for errors or irregularities.[319] "Once it appears that it had jurisdiction to proceed, and did proceed, the same presumptions prevail in favor of the action and record of the inferior as of the superior court, and the verity of its record, and the presumptions which support it, are alike indisputable in any collateral way."[320] Whether evidence would be heard in contradiction of the record of an inferior court on the subject of jurisdiction, where that record shows fully and affirmatively all that is necessary on the point, is a different question. Some of the authorities indicate that the jurisdiction could not be inquired into, in direct opposition to the face of the record, at least in the courts of the same state where the judgment was rendered.[321] But in New York such recitals are considered to be only prima facie evidence and subject to be contradicted, though sufficient to uphold the proceeding if not disproved.[322] In that state, however, it will be remembered, want of jurisdiction may be shown collaterally against the judgment of any court.[323] But it appears to be undisputed that if the jurisdiction of an inferior court, in any case, depends upon the existence of a certain fact or state of facts, and it is shown by the record that there was evidence tending to prove such facts, and that such evidence was adjudged sufficient, and the court judicially determined that such facts existed, then the judgment cannot be collaterally impeached or contradicted.[324]

§ 288. No Presumption of Validity on Direct Attack.

"The rule that a record is conclusive evidence of its own verity is not applicable in a direct proceeding instituted for the purpose of showing its falsity as to a matter which, if false, shows that the court pronouncing it as a judgment had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, and consequently, that what purports to be a record is in fact no record at all."[325] Thus, although a judgment recites that the defendant was "duly and legally served with notice," yet, in a direct proceeding in the same court to set the judgment aside, the contrary may be shown.[326] So an officer's return of service of process may be impeached in a direct proceeding after judgment, where the return states facts which do not come within the personal knowledge of the officer.[327] But while jurisdiction is not presumed on a direct attack, and there is likewise no conclusive presumption that the record is free from irregularities or errors, yet, on appeal, error, or bill of review, it is incumbent on the party to overcome the prima facie correctness of the judgment. The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, it is said, is always presumed to be right, and a party in the appellate court alleging error in the court below must show it in the regular way in the record, or the presumption in favor of the correctness of the judgment will prevail.[328] Thus the findings and judgment of a court of record will always be presumed to rest upon sufficient evidence unless the contrary be clearly shown from the record.[329] In regard to the rule that the record imports absolute verity, an important observation is made by the New Hampshire court, to the following effect: "It is to be borne in mind that the record may be true, while the matters recorded are false, and may even be shown to be so by the record itself. Thus the record may recite that a particular plea was filed; it is conclusive evidence of that fact, but the record furnishes no evidence that the facts stated in the plea are true, for they may even in the same record be found to be false by the verdict of a jury. The allegations of parties derive no credit from their forming part of the record of a court. So far as this point is concerned, the record imports the truth of what occurred in the court and was there recorded." [330]

§ 289. Foreign Judgments.

In respect to the collateral impeachment of judgments for want of jurisdiction, there is, as we have already intimated, a radical difference between foreign judgments and such as are rendered by the courts of the state where the collateral inquiry is prosecuted. The discussion of the effect of foreign judgments belongs to another part of this work. But it may be here briefly stated that if a judgment or decree, coming from a foreign country, is regular on its face, its jurisdiction will be taken for granted unless denied, but it may always be shown by evidence that in fact the foreign court had no jurisdiction.[331] A similar rule obtains in the case of judgments of one of the American states when called in question in the courts of another. If the judgment proceeds from a court of general powers, the jurisdiction will be presumed (so far as that the party relying on the adjudication need not plead the jurisdiction or set out the facts), but the party against whom it is offered may always deny and disprove the jurisdiction of the court rendering the judgment.[332]

Part IV. For Fraud.

§ 290. Whether Parties can Impeach Judgment for Fraud.

It is an unsettled question whether a judgment may be collaterally impeached for fraud by parties or privies. There are numerous expressions in the books which have more or less relation to this point, but we shall not, in this discussion, attempt to cite all the dicta bearing upon the subject or attach particular weight to any but direct adjudications of the question. In a majority of the states the rule is well settled that it is not permissible for a party or privy to attack a judgment in a collateral proceeding on account of fraud.[333] The decisions are based upon the ground of the general conclusiveness of records, and the policy of the law which forbids their indirect contradiction or impeachment, and on the consideration that it is the business of a litigant to be on his guard against fraud and trickery, and that if his rights are nevertheless infringed, he has his proper remedy by action or motion to procure the annulment of the judgment or by application to equity for relief. In Pennsylvania and South Carolina, however, it is allowed to a party to show fraud against a judgment collaterally,[334] and the same doctrine is apparently held in New Hampshire.[335] This is also true in New York, although the rule in the latter state is founded rather upon the peculiarities of the code system of pleading and practice than upon general principles of law.[336] There are also decisions to the effect that where one party is allowed to offer a judgment in evidence without having pleaded it, the other ought to be allowed to impeach it by evidence of fraud, without being put to a direct suit to annul it, and notwithstanding it is regular upon its face.[337]

In the preceding section we considered fraud in general as a ground for impeaching judgments. It is convenient, for the purposes of our further inquiry, to distinguish between fraud practised in the procuring of the judgment and fraud as affecting the original cause of action. The former topic is illustrated by several important cases, to be now considered, as well as by many of those already cited. "The parties to an action," it is said, "cannot impeach the judgment rendered therein, in any collateral proceeding, on the ground that it was obtained through their fraud or collusion. It is their business to see that it is not so obtained. Even if, without any fault or neglect of one party, his adversary succeeded by fraud in obtaining an unjust or unauthorized judgment, he must through some prescribed mode reverse or annul the judgment before he can claim to treat it as invalid."[338] But it is necessary to distinguish between judgments entered by the collusion or fraud of both parties and such as are obtained by the fraud of the plaintiff. The former are void as to creditors only, not against the defendant, and may be attacked in any collateral proceeding by them, whilst the latter can be attacked by the defendant alone, directly, and in the proper court.[339] Thus, where a party by some act or declaration out of the record lulls his opponent into a false security, or by any other means deceives him, and thereby obtains a judgment or decree to his prejudice, it is fraudulent and may be impeached upon that ground.[340] A person against whom judgments have been obtained cannot maintain an action for damages against the parties who obtained them, the attorney who prosecuted and the officer who served the writ, for fraudulently conspiring together to injure and defraud him in those proceedings, while the judgments remain unreversed, for such action would constitute a collateral attack upon them.[341] But on the other hand an action to recover damages for the breach of a special contract, to discontinue an action by the defendant against the plaintiff, in consequence of which the defendant had judgment in his favor and the plaintiff was compelled to satisfy an execution issued thereon, is not liable to the objection that it seeks to impeach the judgment collaterally.[342] A composition in bankruptcy, under the federal statutes on the subject, cannot be impeached collaterally in an action at law in a state court, by a creditor who was a party to the proceedings, by showing that the composition was obtained by the fraudulent acts of the bankrupt.[343] On principles analogous to the foregoing, it is held that, after judgment in an election contest, rendered by agreement between the claimants and giving possession to the relator, the defendant, in his answer to the relator's alternative writ of mandate demanding possession, cannot assail the judgment on the ground that, being rendered by agreement and in consideration of a sum paid to defendant, it was corrupt and fraudulent and therefore void.[344]

§ 292. Fraud in the Cause of Action.

As a general rule, fraud in the contract recovered on should be set up as a defense in the action, and therefore is no ground for subsequently impeaching the judgment.[345] And a judgment is not generally open to collateral attack because based on a fraudulent instrument or on perjured testimony.[346] But in a Pennsylvania decision it was held that where actual fraud has been practised by a party in obtaining a deed, and the deed is used as a means of obtaining a judgment, the judgment will be void to the extent of the fraud, as to the party defrauded, although it may be valid as to other interests not involved in the fraud; and hence a collateral attack upon it, as to such fraud, is perfectly permissible; because the question

§ 293. Creditor may show Fraud in a Judgment.

However the rule may be in regard to parties and privies, it is very well settled that any third person, a stranger to the judgment, whose rights would be injuriously affected if it were allowed to stand as against him, may show, in a collateral proceeding, that it was procured through the fraudulent contrivance of the debtor or the collusion of both parties, with a design to hinder or defraud him, and so have it considered and treated as void as to him.[348] "A collusive judgment is open to attack whenever and wherever it may come in conflict with the rights or the interest of third persons. Fraud is not a thing that can stand, even when robed in a judgment."[349] Or, as the rule is sometimes more broadly stated, a judgment which is not founded on an actual debt or other legal liability, due or enforceable at the time of its entry, will not be upheld against the creditors of the judgment-debtor.[350] Hence a judgment confessed without any consideration and with fraudulent intent, may be questioned by other judgment and execution-creditors of the defendant, and, as to them, the judgment and execution thereon will be vacated and set aside.[351] But a confession of judgment for the express purpose of enabling the creditor to redeem from a sale under a prior judgment is not fraudulent as against the purchaser; for the policy of the law is to encourage redemptions, in order that the property of the debtor may discharge as many of his liabilities as possible.[352] For another example, in an action by a creditor to set aside a deed as fraudulent, the grantee therein may show, although his deed is fraudulent as to creditors, that the complainant's judgment was obtained by fraud and artifice practised by him upon the grantor.[353] But inasmuch as the law always favors the stability and finality of judgments, it is held that a stranger who thus seeks to impeach a judgment as a fraud upon his rights must show the fraud by clear and satisfactory proof.[354]

A very important element in the rule just stated is that the fraud alleged must be such as directly affects the party seeking to impeach the judgment. It is no ground for the intervention of third persons that fraud has been practised upon the debtor; it must be fraud practised by the debtor, either alone, or, as is more commonly the case, in collusion with the plaintiff in the judgment. For instance, upon the distribution of the proceeds of a sheriff's sale, a subsisting judgment can be attacked by other creditors collaterally only on the ground of collusion, not because it is a fraud on the debtor.[355] "The fraud which will authorize a creditor to impeach a judgment obtained by another against his debtor must be a fraud against the creditor, not a mere overreaching of the debtor in his litigation. There must be collusion." [356] Nor can creditors thus set up any matter of defense original or subsequent.[357] Fraudulent judgments, it is said, like fraudulent deeds, are good against all but the interests intended to be defrauded. Hence those parties whose interests are affected cannot require the court to vacate the judgment on the record, for that would have the effect to annul it as against the whole world.[358]

§ 295. What Creditors allowed to allege Fraud.

The privilege of impeaching a judgment collaterally for fraud is extended only to those third persons whose rights would be impaired or prejudiced if it were allowed full force and effect as against them.[359] In New York it was formerly held that none but a judgment-creditor could impeach the bona fides of a judgment confessed by the debtor to a third person; an attaching creditor, whose attachment was levied after such confession, could not do so.[360] But later rulings in the same state have modified this doctrine so far that now, if the attaching creditor's process has been levied upon tangible property (i. e., property capable of manual delivery), he is permitted to assail the good faith of a prior confessed judgment which stands in his way.[361] At any rate, it seems clear that the party's claim must have been in existence at the date of the judgment, otherwise it could not properly be called a fraud upon his rights. against her husband, cannot be inquired into or attacked collaterally by a creditor of the husband whose claim had not yet arisen when the judgment was rendered.[362] Privies, as well as parties to the judgment, are precluded, according to the majority of the decisions, from the collateral impeachment of it for fraud. But it is held that a judgment against a sheriff for his default is not so far conclusive on the sureties on his official bond but that they may attack it for fraud and collusion when it is made the basis of a suit against them.[363]

§ 296. False Testimony.

It is the unquestioned doctrine of the cases that a party to a judgment cannot impeach it collaterally on the ground that false testimony was given at the trial, on which testimony the judgment was rendered.[364] Neither will any action lie against a witness for committing perjury, whereby the plaintiff lost a former action, because its trial would necessarily involve a re-examination of the matters controverted and determined in the former action, and would constitute an attack upon the correctness of the former adjudication.[365] Thus, where, in a process of foreign attachment, judgment has been rendered discharging the trustee on his disclosure, the plaintiff in that process cannot maintain an action on the case against the trustee for obtaining his discharge by falsehood and fraud in his disclosure and by fraudulent collusion with the principal defendant.[366] In an early New York case it was held that an action would not lie against a person in that state for suborning a witness to swear falsely in a cause then pending in the courts of another state, in consequence whereof a judgment was given against the defendant in such cause, contrary to the truth and justice of the case; the decision being rested by Chancellor Kent on the ground that the merits of the original cause could not be thus overhauled in a collateral proceeding.[367] It is also held that an award, like a judgment, cannot be collaterally impeached by evidence that one party introduced false testimony.[368] Where judgments are recovered in a court of competent jurisdiction, and the defendant appeared and had an opportunity to defend, which judgments are still in full force and unreversed, he cannot maintain an action against a defendant for fraud and conspiracy in procuring such judgments against him.[369]

PART I. THE POWER TO VACATE JUDGMENTS.

§ 297. What Courts possess the Power.

The power to vacate judgments is an entirely different matter from the power to reverse judgments. It is a power inherent in and to be exercised by the court which rendered the judgment, and to that court and no other the application to set aside the judgment should be made.[1] As between courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, such as two county courts or circuit courts of the same state, the rule is that neither has power to vacate or set aside a judgment rendered by the other which is not void upon its face; relief must be sought in the court where the judgment was entered.[2] The power to vacate or open a judgment, or to set it aside, is a common law power possessed by the court as a part of its necessary machinery for the administration of justice, and hence might be exercised without the grant of special statutory authority. In many of the states, however, this power is regulated by law, either in respect to the grounds upon which it may be put in operation, the time within which it may be invoked, the manner of calling it into play, or the practice upon an occasion for its exercise. And such regulations may either enlarge or abridge its common law scope, or otherwise transform it. But

In New York, it is said that a court exercising jurisdiction concurrent with that of another, by which an order has been made, is not without power to modify it or set it aside on new papers, or relieve from an order which has proved oppressive, where leave has been given to renew. The question is not one of power, but of practice and orderly procedure. Cruikshank v. Cruikshank, 30 App. Div. 381, 51 N. Y. Supp. 926. A change in the constitution of a court does not preclude a consideration of the question whether a judgment entered by the court before the change should be vacated. State v. Superior Court, 18 Wash. 277, 51 Pac. 365. And where a court has two or more judges, an application to vacate a judgment may be heard by whichever judge is sitting at the time the application is made. Dolen v. Buchanan, 43 Neb. 854, 62 N. W. 233. But a judge at chambers has no jurisdiction to vacate or modify orders or judgments of the district court. Kime v. Fenner, 54 Neb. 476, 74 N. W. 869.

still the power remains essentially inherent in the nature and constitution of the court, not derivative. The power to vacate judgments is said to be incident to all courts of record, and to be usually exercised under restraints imposed by their own rules.[3] It is not commonly possessed by the inferior tribunals—courts not of record—such as the courts of magistrates or justices of the peace, though in some of the states it may be.[4] But it is generally considered that probate courts have the power, upon a proper showing, to vacate an order or decree irregularly or improvidently entered.[5] An auditor, appointed to make distribution of a fund, has no power to go behind the record and declare a particular judgment to be void and no lien, on account of any irregularity; for that would be assuming the power of the court to review its own judgments.[6]

In Pennsylvania, the court of common pleas has no power to open a judgment entered on a transcript of a judgment by a justice of the peace, filed in the court for purposes of lien, and let the defendant in to a defense. For all purposes except lien, the judgment still remains before the justice, and there only can it be attacked. Boyd v. Miller, 52 Pa. 431; Lacock v. White, 19 Pa. 495; Littster v. Littster, 151 Pa. 474, 25 Atl. 117. As to the power of the court to strike the judgment from the record if void upon its face, see Weldy v. Young, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 15; Ward v. Fannon, 7 Kulp, 488. § 297a. As Between Federal and State Courts.

The federal courts have no jurisdiction of an action or proceeding to vacate or set aside a judgment rendered by a state court, on the ground that the same is void for want of jurisdiction, or is erroneous or irregular; for, in such case, the proper and sufficient remedy is by motion, appeal, or bill of review in the courts of the state.[7] But a federal court (where the jurisdictional requirements as to diverse citizenship and the amount involved are met) has power to entertain a suit and enter a decree which, as between the parties, shall set aside and vacate a judgment of a state court, and any proceedings taken or rights acquired thereunder, when the ground of objection is that the judgment was procured by fraud.[8] But the federal court should not act in such cases where the party injured has, or had, an opportunity to apply for relief to the state courts.[9] Similar rules govern an application to a state court for relief against a judgment of a federal court; it may be attacked as fraudulent, but cannot be reviewed as to any alleged errors or irregularities, or annulled for an alleged want of jurisdiction.[10]

The power to open or vacate judgments is essentially judicial. Therefore, on the great constitutional principle of the separation of the powers and functions of the three departments of government, it cannot be exercised by the legislature. While a statute may indeed declare what judgments shall in future be subject to be vacated, or when or how or for what causes, it cannot apply retrospectively to a judgment already rendered and which had become final and unalterable by the court before its passage. Such an act would be unconstitutional and void on two grounds; first, because it would unlawfully impair the fixed and vested rights of the successful litigant; and second, because it would be an unwarranted invasion of the province of the judicial department. It is therefore held by a majority of the decisions that a statute vacating, or directing the courts to vacate, a particular judgment or class of judgments, already rendered and become final before the enactment of the statute, and granting new trials in such actions, is unconstitutional and invalid.[11] A contrary rule obtains, however, in the state of Alabama.[12] And in Georgia, it is said that the power of the legislature to pass acts allowing the opening of existing judgments, and new trials thereunder, should be confined to allowing cross-actions, equitable defenses, and rights which have accrued since the judgment, to be set up; and that it does not extend to matters which were or by law should have been heard before the court by which the judgment was rendered.[13] At an early period, the supreme court of Pennsylvania ruled that a statute directing a particular judgment to be opened, and the defendant let in to a defense upon the plea of payment, was remedial in its character, and though the power thus exercised was partly judicial, it was not in violation of the constitution.[14] But this doctrine, so inconsistent with the rights and independence of the judiciary, and so subversive of the fundamentals of constitutional law, was afterwards vigorously repudiated by the same court, when it felt itself better able to withstand the encroachments of the legislative body.[15] As remarked by Chief Justice Gibson: "It is not more intolerable in principle to pronounce an arbitrary judgment against a suitor, than it is injurious in practice to deprive him of a judgment, which is essentially his property, and to subject him to the vexation, risk, and expense of another contest."[16]

PART II. THE METHOD OF SEEKING RELIEF.

§ 299. By Audita Querela.

"Audita querela" is the name of a writ constituting the initial process in an action brought by a judgment-defendant to obtain relief against the consequences of the judgment, on account of some matter of defense or discharge arising since its rendition, and which could not be taken advantage of otherwise.[17] It is a regular suit with its usual incidents, pleadings, issues of law and fact, trial, judgment, and error.[18] The writ must be directed to the court which rendered the judgment and retains the record,[19] and all the parties to the judgment against which relief is sought must join in the writ or be duly and regularly served.[20] Upon the inquiry under the writ of audita querela, the record of the judgment is not conclusive by way of estoppel (the attack upon it being direct and not collateral), and hence the truth and justice of the whole matter is open to examination.[21] The judgment in this action cannot properly include affirmative relief to the defendant.[22] An appeal or writ of error will lie from it.[23] In regard to the grounds on which audita querela may be brought, it must be observed that this is a remedial process which bears solely upon the wrongful acts of the opposite party, and not upon the erroneous judgments or acts of the court; it is a writ in which the plaint sounds in tort.[24] Hence injury, actual or apprehended, is essential to the right to bring this writ. If the matter complained of is simply nugatory and void, the party can have no need of this process.[25] It will lie to vacate a judgment rendered against a non-resident defendant on constructive service of process, where the statutory prerequisites were omitted.[26] But not where an attorney, although without authority, has entered an appearance for such defendant.[27] It will also lie to procure the setting aside of a judgment which was irregularly entered after a discontinuance, or taken in violation of an agreement for a continuance;[28] or which was given against an infant who was not represented by his guardian;[29] or against a lunatic under similar circumstances.[30] So when a foreign judgment against the defendant has been reversed by the foreign appellate tribunal, but in the meantime he has been sued here on that judgment, he may have relief by audita querela.[31] This writ may also be brought when the debtor has been discharged in bankruptcy subsequent to the judgment;[32] or to set aside a judgment from which an appeal was wrongfully denied by the inferior court.[33] So where two suits are brought at the same time for the same cause of action, and proceed pari passu to judgment and execution, a satisfaction of either judgment may be shown, upon audita querela, in discharge of the other.[34] But on the other hand, the writ of audita querela will not lie in any case where the defendant had a legal opportunity to avail himself, before judgment, of the same matters which he now sets up, or where his own negligence has brought about the injury complained of.[35] Nor can it be brought where the matter alleged would be a proper subject for a writ of error;[36] nor in respect to matters which constitute an equitable defense, not cognizable at law;[37] nor for irregularities which do not affect the substantial validity of the process in the action or the merits of the controversy;[38] nor on account of an erroneous taxation of costs or allowance of excessive interest.[39] In a majority of the states, the proceeding by audita querela has fallen into complete disuse, being superseded by the more summary method of applying for relief by motion, upon notice.[40] For, as a general rule, wherever this writ would lie at common law, the courts may now relieve on motion.[41] In two states, however,—Vermont and Massachusetts,—the writ of audita querela is still in use, and is applied to a great variety of purposes, as will appear from the cases cited in this section.

§ 300. By Error Coram Nobis.

Another common law method of obtaining relief against a judgment in the court which rendered it was by writ of error coram nobis. This writ was so called from the technical words, which recited that error was alleged to exist in a certain record remaining "before us," that is, before the court which had pronounced the judgment. It lay for the correction of an error of fact (not an error of law) in respect to a matter affecting the validity and regularity of the proceedings, such as the death of one of the parties at the beginning of the suit, or the infancy, insanity, or coverture of the defendant, and which was not brought into the issue.[42] But if the court was fully informed of and rightly apprehended the facts in the case, its error in applying the law to such facts is not such an error as could be rectified in this proceeding. Nor will this writ lie to contradict or put in issue any fact that has been already adjudicated in the action.[43] Thus, if the record states that the defendant appeared and confessed judgment, he cannot controvert that fact after the expiration of the term for the purpose of setting aside the judgment.[44] The writ of error coram nobis, like the proceeding by audita querela, has now fallen into practical desuetude, being almost entirely superseded by the more speedy and efficacious remedy by motion in the same court.[45] In any case, the writ will not lie after affirmance of the judgment in the appellate court.[46]

§ 301. By Bill of Review.

In those jurisdictions where the ancient forms of chancery pleading and practice remain in force, unmodified by statutes, the only proper method of obtaining the vacation or annulment of a decree in equity, after the term, is by bill of review. And this species of bill lies in cases of error apparent on the face of the record, for fraud, and on account of matters subsequent to the decree and which could not have been urged in defense.[47] But the rule that a decree once enrolled cannot be opened except by a bill of review, or by an original bill for fraud, "is subject to well founded exceptions, arising in cases not heard upon the merits, and in which it is alleged that the decree was entered by mistake or surprise, or under such circumstances as shall satisfy the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, that the decree ought to be set aside."[48] To a bill to vacate a decree the plaintiff in such decree is a necessary party defendant. The omission of him as a party is a fatal defect.[49]

§ 302. By Direct Action.

In some of the states, instead of the somewhat summary method of vacating judgments on notice and motion, a practice prevails by which it is necessary to bring a direct action for this purpose, in the form of a regular suit, with plenary proceedings, in which the relief demanded is the annulment of the judgment complained of.[50] And in some, after the expiration of the statutory time for moving to vacate a judgment, the defendant may still proceed by an independent action, the ground of objection to the judgment being want of jurisdiction or fraud in obtaining it.[51] In other respects, the law and practice in these states, on the topic under consideration, does not differ materially from the rest. It must be remarked that all the parties to the former suit must be made parties to an action to annul the judgment.[52]

§ 303. By Motion.

The method of procuring the vacation of judgments which is by far the most commonly used, at the present day, is the proceeding by application to the court which rendered the judgment, in the form of a motion, with notice to the adverse party.[53] This practice, being simple, speedy, and effective, is well calculated to promote the interests of justice with the least cost and trouble to suitors. The time within which such applications must be made, the parties who may apply, the grounds upon which an application may be based, and the practice in proceedings of this character, are the subjects which will engage our attention in the remaining part of this chapter.

§ 304. Indirect Vacation of Judgment.

It has been held that the entry of a second judgment, in the same action, is not a vacation of the first judgment, if there is nothing further to show that such former judgment was regularly cancelled or set aside. "When a judgment is once entered of record, it must stand as the judgment, until it is vacated, modified, or disposed of by some means provided by law; entering additional judgment entries is not one of them." although after a judgment has been entered up on a verdict, such judgment, strictly, should be set aside before a new trial is had, yet if, on motion, the verdict is set aside and a new trial granted and had, the judgment will be deemed to have been set aside.[55]

§ 304a. Other Remedies Available.

A motion to vacate or set aside a judgment will not be entertained by the court when the proper remedy of the party aggrieved is by an appeal,[56] or by a motion for a new trial in the court rendering the judgment,[57] or by mandamus requiring the court to take some action which would give the party what he seeks,[58] or by an independent action for damages.[59] Sometimes also, the case is such that chancery is the only forum competent to afford adequate relief; and then the party must seek his redress there, and not by motion to set aside the judgment.[60] And pending a suit in equity to restrain proceedings on a judgment, and have it declared void, the court in which it was rendered has no jurisdiction of a rule to set it aside.[61] Again, a defendant cannot move to set aside a judgment at the same time an action by him for the same purpose is pending in another court.[62]

PART III. THE TIME OF APPLYING.

§ 305. During the Term.

It is universally held that judgments are under the plenary control of the court which pronounces them during the entire term at which they are rendered or entered of record, and they may, during such term, be set aside, vacated, modified, or annulled by that court for cause shown.[63] It is commonly said that judgments and decrees remain in the breast of the court during the term of their rendition; and, for the purpose of modifying or vacating them, the whole term may be considered as one day.[64] This power may be exercised during the term on the court's own proper motion, as well as on application by a party, when there is a manifest error or inadvertence to be corrected, and even, in proper cases, without notice to the parties.[65] Its exercise is not prevented by the fact that a bill of exceptions has been taken or an appeal bond filed.[66] It is a power inherent in all courts of general jurisdiction, and is not dependent upon, or

It was the rule of the common law,—and it is still adhered to with more or less consistency in most of the states,—that after the expiration of the term the court loses control of its judgments rendered during that term; they become final, and the court has no longer the power to vacate or modify them or to set them aside.[69] The supreme court of the United States has stated the rule concisely in the following language: "It is a general rule of the law that all the judgments, decrees, or other orders of the courts, however conclusive in their character, are under the control of the court which pronounces them during the term at which they are rendered or entered of record, and they may then be set aside, vacated, modified, or annulled by that court. But it is a rule equally well established, that after the term has ended all final judgments and decrees of the court pass beyond its control, unless steps be taken during that term, by motion or otherwise, to set aside, modify, or correct them; and if errors exist, they can only be corrected by such proceeding by a writ of error or appeal as may be allowed in a court which by law can review the decision." [70] And the federal circuit courts agree that they have no power to vacate or reverse their judgments or decrees, after the term, except in the cases specified in the decision of the supreme court just quoted.[71] In California, after the adjournment of the term, the court loses all control over its decisions, unless its jurisdiction is saved by some motion or proceeding at the time, except when the summons has not been served, in which case a party may, within six months, move to set aside the judgment.[72] In Massachusetts, a court which by statute holds weekly terms, has no authority, on motion at one of such terms, to vacate a final judgment duly entered at a previous term.[73] In Alabama and some other states, while the general rule is followed, it is considered that if, by agreement of the parties, the court sets aside a judgment after the term and again tries the cause, the judgment afterwards entered is not void for want of jurisdiction, though the court is not bound to retry a cause even if the parties consent.[74] But in some other states it is held that, notwithstanding the agreement of parties, all the proceedings subsequent to the first judgment are coram non judice and void.[75] And this indeed seems the more logical position. In Wisconsin, where a judgment entered is not void but simply irregular, the court has no power to vacate it after the term at which it was entered, or if entered by the clerk in vacation, after the term next succeeding its entry.[76] The rule stated applies to decrees in equity as well as judgments at law. In general, chancery cannot open a final decree after the end of the term at which it was made, unless upon a bill of review, or bill in that nature, or bill or petition impeaching the decree for fraud.[77] But here, as we have already said,[78] an exception must be made in the case of equity causes not heard upon the merits and in which the decree was entered by fraud, mistake, surprise, or other exceptional circumstances. If the rule applies to any courts it applies to all. The court of last resort in a state cannot set aside a judgment or decree rendered by it, after the expiration of the term at which it was rendered, unless the same is void on its face.[79]

Thus it will be seen that in many of the states there is a strong disposition not to depart widely from the common law rule on this point. The reasons of the rule are obvious and weighty. The interests of the individual as well as of the community demand that there should be a definitive end of every litigation; and nothing could be more impolitic than to leave it in the discretion of every court to revise and review and reconsider its judgments without limit. Yet it is very necessary to observe that this rule does not by any means obtain in all its rigor in every state and jurisdiction. The practice varies so much from state to state that it is most difficult to formulate general principles. But we shall find, in the first place, that the rule is almost everywhere subject to certain well-recognized exceptions; as where the judgment in question is entirely void, or was entered without the authority of the court, or is vitiated by some substantial irregularity. These instances will be discussed in succeeding sections under their appropriate titles. In the second place, it will be discovered that in some few states the rule is not observed at all, the courts exercising the power to vacate or open judgments in proper cases, without any limitation as to time.[80] Finally, in a considerable number of states, the statutes both prescribe the grounds on which judgments may be vacated and fix an arbitrary limit, usually six months or a year, within which the application may be made.

§ 307. Void Judgments.

It was intimated in the last section that a judgment which is entirely void may always be set aside at a subsequent term. And this is the general doctrine of the cases. Every court possesses inherent power to vacate entries in its record of judgments, decrees, or orders rendered or made without jurisdiction, either during the term at which the entries are made or after its expiration.[81] This rule applies not only where there is a want of jurisdiction over the parties, but also where jurisdiction of the subject-matter is lacking. A judgment which is outside of the issues, and on a matter not submitted for determination, is a nullity, and may be set aside at any time.[82] It is also said that the trial court has inherent power to vacate, after the term, a judgment obtained by fraud, or which is not in accord with that intended to be entered,[83] or one entered by the clerk without authority and in violation of law,[84] or one which has been rendered contrary to the course of law and practice.[85] But in some states it is held that, to authorize the setting aside of a void judgment after the expiration of the term, the invalidity of the judgment must appear on the face of the record, and not from matter outside of it, except in cases of fraud, and where the judgment was rendered after the death of a party.[86]

An interlocutory judgment or decree, made in the progress of a cause, is always under the control of the court until the final decision of the suit, and it may be modified or rescinded, upon sufficient grounds shown, at any time before final judgment, though it be after the term in which the interlocutory sentence was given.[87] And in some states it is held that mere office judgments (such as are entered of course) are under the control of the court in succeeding terms and can be modified or set aside on cause shown, even after judgment has been perfected; but it is within the discretion of the courts and their decision cannot be appealed from.[88] And it seems that a mere naked default, on which no judgment or decree has ever been entered, may be set aside at any time on proper grounds; in this case the discretion of the court is not limited as to time.[89] In California, a motion to vacate a default entered by the clerk may be made at any time before final judgment is entered, although the court may have adjourned for the term at which the default was entered before the motion is made.[90]

In the state of Pennsylvania the practice in regard to opening judgments has been developed by a long line of cases, and has settled in a form different from that found in most other jurisdictions. In the language of Judge Sharswood: "Every court has power to open a judgment in order to give the parties a hearing or trial. In the case of judgments by confession or default, there is no limit of time to the exercise of this power, but in the case of judgments entered adversely after a hearing or trial, it is settled that it must be done before the end of the term at which they are entered." a judgment may be opened, for proper cause, notwithstanding it may have been several times revived by scire facias. "If the original judgment was obtained by fraud and misrepresentation, and the subsequent revivals were but a continuation of such fraud and misrepresentation, it is difficult to see how such revivals could add anything to the validity of the original judgment." § 310. Judgment carried over the Term by Motion.

Whatever abridges or suspends the final character of a judgment will save it from the operation of the rule under consideration. A motion to vacate a judgment, made at the same term at which the judgment was rendered and continued to a subsequent term, may be allowed at such subsequent term.[93] But it is held that leave granted at the term in which the judgment is entered, to move in the next term to set it aside, is irregular and void.[94] Where a motion for a new trial is continued over the term, the proceedings are still in the breast of the judge, and he has jurisdiction to set aside the judgment for informality, and let the verdict stand.[95] So where a judgment is entered by default against two joint defendants, and at the same time that the practice of opening a judgment to let the defendant in to a defense is not peculiar to Pennsylvania, although it is unknown to the common law. It is an appeal to the equitable powers of the court to allow a hearing on the merits from which the defendant, by adherence to the strict forms of law, would otherwise be precluded. McAnulty v. National Life Ass'n, 6 Lack. Leg. N. 128. A somewhat similar practice obtains in Illinois, in regard to judgments entered by confession. See Hall v. Jones, 32 Ill. 38. A judgment by default, regular and valid in fact, cannot be stricken from the record; the remedy is by motion to open the judgment and let the defendant in to a defense. North v. the cause is removed to the federal court on motion of a third defendant, after it is determined that the removal was erroneous and the cause is sent back to the state court, the latter court has the power at the first term thereafter, on plaintiff's motion, to strike off the judgment, although a term had intervened after it was entered; the rule (in Illinois) that a judgment may be set aside or amended only at the same or the next term after its entry not applying while the cause is pending in the federal court.[96]

§ 311. Under Statutes.

In many of the states, statutes have been enacted which provide that the court may, in its discretion, relieve a party from a judgment taken against him, on certain enumerated grounds, within a prescribed time from the rendition of the judgment, usually six months or a year, or in some jurisdictions two years, or within a similar period from notice of the judgment.[97] Our chief interest in these statutes is in connection with the causes which they specify as sufficient to warrant the vacation of the judgment, and in this regard they will be fully considered hereafter. But there are certain observations to be made on the time limit which they establish. In the first place, it is generally considered that the control of the court over the judgment absolutely ceases upon the expiration of the time limited. Thereafter it is no longer within the discretion, or even the jurisdiction, of the court to vacate or modify the judgment; the right to apply for such relief is lost, and any order of the court setting the judgment aside or rendering a new judgment will be null and void.[98] In the next place, the common-law power of a court of record to set aside its judgments at the same term at which they were rendered is not abrogated by these statutes. During the term, the court may vacate a judgment for any cause which would be sufficient at common law, without regard to the grounds specified in the statute;[99] but after the close of the term, the remedy of a party aggrieved by the judgment must be sought under the statute, and is confined to the grounds therein enumerated.[100] In some states, however, the courts exercise authority to set aside judgments for causes (such as fraud) not specified in the statutes, and without regard to the lapse of the term in which the judgment was rendered. Where this practice obtains, it may be remarked that the two elements of the statute, the specified causes and the time limit, are mutually dependent; that is, if the application is based upon a ground not enumerated in the statute, but otherwise recognized as sufficient, it is not necessary that it be made within the statutory time.[101] Again, while unexcused delay will generally tell against an application of this sort, it is considered that laches cannot be imputed to a party who takes all the time which the statute allows him to bring his motion or application.[102] Where the statutory time begins to run from "notice" of the judgment, this is construed to mean knowledge of the rendition of such judgment, and the notice thereof need not be in writing.[103] And where the time is limited to one year, it is held that it is not enough that a motion for relief against the judgment be made within the year, but it must be brought to a hearing within that time.[104]

§ 312. Judgments against Non-Residents.

The statutes in some of the states provide that a non-resident defendant who has been constructively served by publication of summons, and against whom a judgment is given, may appear and have the judgment vacated and be admitted to defend the action, at any time within a limited period after the rendition of the judgment, which period varies, in the different states, from six months to five years.[105] And the right thus given entitles the defendant, if he comes in within the prescribed time, to assert his rights as fully in every respect as he could have done if personally served before judgment, saving the intervening rights of third persons.[106] And the right of a defendant, under these statutes, to be let in to a defense is an absolute right if he brings himself within the statute; the court has no discretion in the matter, but must grant his application.[107]

§ 313. Laches of Party.

Aside from cases in which the time of applying for relief from the judgment is regulated by statute, and aside from cases in which the motion can only be made at the same term, we are now to inquire how the party's application will be affected by his delay or want of diligence. And first, delay in moving to have a judgment vacated, so long as the party has no notice of the judgment or of the action, will not bar his right, even though innocent strangers may have taken titles in reliance on the judgment.[108] Again, lapse of time will not affect the right to vacate a judgment on the ground that the court never had jurisdiction to enter it.[109] But if the party actually knows that a judgment has been rendered against him, and the judgment is not simply and merely void, it is the undoubted rule that he must exercise reasonable diligence in procuring its vacation, and that his unexcused laches or delay, unduly protracted, will preclude him from obtaining the relief sought.[110] "In deciding

But later cases in Minnesota hold that, while it is presumed that the defendant has been diligent after receiving actual notice of the pendency of the action, still this presumption may be rebutted; and that an unexplained delay of several months in making the application for leave to defend the action after judgment will justify the court in refusing the same, though the application is made within the year. Mueller v. McCulloch, 59 Minn. 409, 61 N. W. 455; Cutler v. Button, 51 Minn. 550, 53 N. W. 872. upon an application to strike out a judgment after the term is past, for fraud, irregularity, deceit, or surprise, the court acts in the exercise of its quasi-equitable powers, and in every such case requires the party making the application to act in good faith and with ordinary diligence. Relief will not be granted if he has knowingly acquiesced in the judgment complained of, or has been guilty of laches or unreasonable delay in seeking his remedy." [111] So far the law is clear. But the moment we endeavor to ascertain what laches or delay will bar this right, we are involved in a sea of difficulties which invariably overflows the attempt to define "diligence" or "reasonable time." It is impossible to lay down general rules. Every case must be governed by its own facts and the decisions in the particular state. It may be profitable, however, to mention some of the principal cases in which the question has actually been decided. And to begin with the clearest,—"after the lapse of twenty years no judicial proceeding whatever ought to be set aside for irregularity." [112] In another case in the same state, where fourteen years had elapsed since the entry of judgment, and no satisfactory excuse or reason for the delay was shown, the motion was held properly denied on the ground of laches.[113] It is also held that an unexplained delay of seven years,[114] or five years,[115] or two years,[116] or seventeen months,[117] or one year,[118] or eleven months,[119] will be sufficient to justify the court in refusing the relief asked. Where an application to have a decree of divorce set aside was not made until the lapse of more than four years after the plaintiff had been fully informed of the alleged fraudulent decree, and no excuse was shown for the delay other than that proceedings to review the decree had been instituted, and an action brought to set it aside in another court, it was held that the plaintiff's right was barred.[120] On the other hand, it is held in Pennsylvania that a nonsuit may properly be taken off even three years after its entry, where cause for its removal appears; such action lies within the sound discretion of the court, and is not reviewable by writ of error.[121] The case is slightly different where a judgment has been irregularly entered against an infant. lowed to him, after he comes of age, in which to take proceedings against the judgment. It has been held that six years is an undue delay.[122] And in a New York case it was said that there must be a limitation to the time when such a motion could be made, and the old limitation of two years, after attaining his majority, was sufficiently liberal and would prevail.[123] In California, it is considered that ten days after a judgment is entered in the superior court, which has no terms, is a reasonable time within which to move to set aside such judgment.[124]

PART IV. THE PARTIES WHO MAY APPLY.

§ 314. Successful Party may Apply.

The courts have power, in a proper case, to set aside a judgment at the instance of the party in whose favor it is rendered.[125] The propriety and necessity of this rule are obvious. For the plaintiff's rights may be compromised, or not adequately recognized or protected, by the judgment as it stands, and without his own fault. If there are such irregularities in the judgment that he would be prevented from reaping its fruits, or if an excusable mistake has put him upon a wrong course of proceedings, or if the fraud or trickery of the defendant has prevented him from getting the full measure of relief to which he is entitled, it is but right to vacate the judgment on his motion, and afford him the opportunity to proceed anew with a more just and satisfactory result.

§ 315. Joint Defendants.

Where a judgment is rendered against several defendants jointly, but is irregular or void as to one of them,—as for want of authority or want of jurisdiction over him,—it will be vacated on the application of that defendant.[126] So where an attorney confesses judgment against several partners, under an authority derived from only one, it is the duty of the others to make prompt application to the court to open the judgment.[127] Whether, in such a case, it would be deemed necessary to vacate the judgment as to all the defendants, or only as to the moving defendant, would depend somewhat upon the nature of the cause of action, but principally upon whether or not, in the particular jurisdiction, a joint judgment is considered as an entirety,—a question which will be found fully treated in another connection.[128]

§ 316. Legal Representatives of Party.

Some of the statutes on this subject provide that when a judgment by default is taken on constructive service by publication, the defendant "or any person legally representing him" (or "his legal representatives"), may apply, within a limited time, to have it opened and the case retried; and others give the courts power to relieve a party, or his "legal representatives" from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Under this clause it is held that one who was not a party to the proceeding in which the judgment was rendered, and who appears in his own right, is not entitled to have the judgment set aside.[129] But parties who have acquired the entire interest of a defendant in the subject-matter of an action are his "legal representatives" within the meaning of such clause, and the court may, upon such terms as may be just, relieve them from a default taken against him through their mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.[130] And if a motion is made by persons other than the plaintiff, claiming to be his legal representatives, to set aside a judgment and to be substituted as plaintiffs, the parties making such motion must show a state of facts which would have supported such an application by the plaintiff in the judgment.[131] Without doubt the phrase above used is broad enough to include the executor or administrator of a deceased party if a proper case for his intervention should arise.[132] be remembered that such persons have the right to impeach a judgment collaterally, whenever and wherever it comes in conflict with their rights, if it was founded in fraud and collusion.[134] And this will generally be an adequate protection to them. But there may be cases in which right and equity require that other persons should have the privilege of proceeding directly for the annulment of a judgment which fraudulently abridges their own rights or remedies. Accordingly the rule is stated that persons who were strangers to the record will have a standing to apply for the vacation of the judgment when the same was obtained by fraud or collusion, and they bear such a relation thereto, or to the subject-matter of the case, that their rights may be affected.[135] An invalid judgment by confession may be set aside at the instance of a junior judgment-creditor after notice to the plaintiff.[136] And if the purpose of a creditor in obtaining a judgment is not to collect his debt, but to help the debtor cover up his property, his judgment will be set aside, though it be shown that this debt was genuine.[137] So where a husband gives a mortgage, and suffers judgment on it, purposely, to defeat the wife of her dower, and the mortgagee has constructive notice of her rights, she may intervene and have a rule to open the judgment and let her in to defend to the extent of her dower.[138] It is also proper to vacate a judgment against an administrator, at the instance of the heirs, when the former's conduct has been so negligent as to leave the latter no other remedy and there is a good defense not presented by the defendant.[139] And the proper financial officer of a municipal corporation may move to vacate a judgment against it procured by the fraud or collusion of the other officers.[140] In New York, when a judgment-creditor seeks by motion to set aside a prior judgment on the ground of fraud, it is within the discretion of the trial-court whether to determine the matter on motion, or to require the creditor to bring an action, and its determination is not appealable.[141]

PART V. WHAT JUDGMENTS MAY BE VACATED.

§ 318. General Rule.

In general, the equitable power of the courts now under consideration is unlimited in respect to the judgments, rules, orders, and decrees upon which it may be exercised. At first sight, it might appear inconsistent to speak of setting aside a judgment which is a mere nullity. Yet the courts hold that even though the judgment be entirely void, the party against whom it exists has the right to have it vacated, and thus clear away any cloud that it may cast upon his right to alienate his property so long as it remains of record against him.[142] The power is most commonly exercised in cases of judgments entered by default,[143] but it is equally applicable, proper grounds being shown, to such as are rendered upon trial and verdict.[144] Relief may be granted in this manner against judgments by confession,[145] and against probate orders and decrees,[146] and final settlements of administrators and trustees.[147] Under the code practice, on a motion to vacate a judgment in an equitable action, the same rules should be applied as in case of other judgments.[148] A rule absolute against a sheriff is not final and conclusive like a judgment between parties litigant; it may be vacated on motion at the same or a subsequent term.[149]

§ 319. Consent Judgments.

A court has power to vacate and set aside a consent judgment on the ground of fraud, mutual mistake, or surprise, but it cannot alter or correct it, except with the consent of all the parties affected by it.[150] And where, in compromise of a claim, judgment has been [143] It is said that the laws relating to the opening of judgments by default should be liberally construed, in order that cases may be disposed of on their merits. Turner v. Coughran, 8 S. D. 419, 66 N. W. 810. In Pennsylvania, there is no authority for a rule to open a judgment of nonsuit, such a judgment not being within the meaning of the statutes; but the proper and only practice is to apply to the court to take off the nonsuit. Harvey v. Pollock, 148 Pa. 534, 23 Atl. 1127.

[144] But in North Carolina, it is said that the statute authorizing the courts to relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, surprise, inadvertence, or excusable neglect, has no application where the judgment is entered on a verdict, as the verdict would stand even if the judgment were set aside, and the relief would therefore be worthless if granted. rendered against the defendant with his consent, he cannot, in the absence of proof of fraud, have it vacated on the ground that he acted on the erroneous advice of counsel.[151] So, a judgment regularly entered pursuant to an agreement of the attorneys, filed in the case, cannot be opened, after final adjournment of the term, on the ground that the agreement was not authorized.[152]

§ 320. Judgments in Divorce.

It was the dotrine and rule of the ecclesiastical courts in England that "sententia contra matrimonium nunquam transit in rem judicatam."[153] That is to say that a sentence or judgment against the validity of a marriage,—either annulling a merely voidable marriage, or declaring that a pretended marriage was absolutely void,—was never final, but was forever open to revision and reversal.[154] Nevertheless this maxim was not universally assented to, for we find occasional expressions of a contrary opinion on the part of eminent ecclesiastical judges.[155] Now in this country, there are several cases holding that the statutes which authorize courts to open judgments or decrees within a certain time after their rendition, on proper application, where there was no other service than that by publication, or on other specified grounds, do not include decrees of divorce; proceeding generally on the theory that policy requires judgments of this character to be regarded as more stable and unassailable than any other species.[156] There are undoubtedly excellent reasons for this distinction.[157] And it has at times seemed so important to legislative bodies as to cause the enactment of clauses explicitly excepting adjudications in divorce from the operation of such statutes, as will appear from the cases just cited. But unless such decrees are thus specifically withdrawn from the general class, it is difficult to see how they can be considered as an exception to the terms of a statute plainly extending to all judgments, on any right principles of interpretation.[158] And aside from legislation, the courts will generally hear motions to vacate divorce judgments on the same grounds and conditions as any other judgments, except, perhaps, that they proceed with greater caution and with more anxious care for the intervening rights of strangers. Thus, where a decree of divorce has been obtained by fraud or deceit,—as where the complainant has practised fraud or trickery to prevent the defendant from having notice of the suit, or from appearing in the action, or from answering and defending the same,—the innocent party, thus deceived, may undoubtedly obtain the opening or vacating of the decree, by mak-

[157] "There are excellent reasons why judgments in matrimonial causes, whether of nullity or divorce, should be even more stable, certainly not less, than in others. The matrimonial status of the parties draws with and after it so many collateral rights and interests of third persons, that uncertainty and fluctuation in it must be greatly detrimental to the public interests. And especially to an innocent person who has contracted a marriage on faith of the decree of the court, the calamity of having the decree reversed and the marriage made void is past estimation." 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 750. "The statutory provision is nothing more than a legislative recognition of the principle of public policy, which had been repeatedly affirmed by the courts, that a judgment or decree which affects directly the status of married persons by sundering the matrimonial tie, and thereby enabling them to contract new matrimonial relations with other and innocent persons, should never be reopened. Such a course would endanger the peace and good order of society, and the happiness and well-being of those who, innocently relying upon the stability of a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, have formed a connection with the person who, wrongfully perhaps, procured its promulgation." ing a timely and proper application and showing good cause.[159] And this is especially the case where both parties to be affected by the vacation of the judgment have been parties to the fraud.[160] So also it is well settled that a decree of divorce may be vacated which is void for want of jurisdiction in the court which rendered it.[161] But a decree will not be vacated because, since the decree, the petitioner has been made, by a change in the law, an admissible witness to testify to his own innocence.[162]

§ 320a. Adjudications in Bankruptcy.

An adjudication in bankruptcy, like other judgments, may be vacated or set aside by the court which rendered it, upon a motion made in due season by a competent party and based upon adequate cause. As to the parties who may move in this behalf, it is of course the right of an involuntary bankrupt to ask for the vacation of an adjudication against him. But where the adjudication passed by default, it will not be opened to allow the bankrupt to file an answer and contest the petition, where the answer proposed does not deny the act of bankruptcy charged, but merely denies that the petitioners are creditors, or denies that they are sufficient in number or amount.[163] Again, any creditor, whether he has proved his debt in bankruptcy or not, may move to set aside an adjudication of his debtor as a bankrupt, whenever such adjudication injuriously affects his interests.[164] Such a motion, for example, may be made by an attaching creditor whose lien will be dissolved by the adjudication,[165] or by the receiver of a bankrupt corporation, appointed under the laws of the state.[166]

Any person seeking to have an adjudication in bankruptcy vacated or set aside must make his application therefor with due diligence and promptness upon being informed of the facts; if he delays for so long a time as to be chargeable with laches, his motion will not prevail, more especially where the rights of others have meanwhile become fixed.[167] Notice must be given to the bankrupt of an application to annul the adjudication in an involuntary proceeding, as the bankrupt has an interest in the continuance of the proceeding which may result in his discharge.[168] As to the grounds which will justify the court in revoking the order of adjudication, it may be stated that such a course is warranted by proof of fraud and collusion between the bankrupt and the petitioning creditors,[169] or where the adjudication was made upon a waiver by the attorney of the alleged bankrupt of important rights of his client,[170] or even upon proof of the assent of all known creditors that the adjudication may be vacated and publication of the notice of the application for the annulment.[171] It is also held that the court of bankruptcy may open its order of adjudication and grant a re-hearing in case of newly discovered evidence.[172] But, generally speaking, an adjudication in bankruptcy made upon due service of process, is final and will not be set aside on motion of the bankrupt, or of creditors, or of both, disputing the allegations of the petition, when no fraud or collusion is shown and they merely desire to retry the case.[173] The earlier cases held that the question of jurisdiction could not be raised on a motion to vacate the adjudication, creditors having an opportunity to dispute the jurisdiction when an application for discharge should be made.[174] But the later authorities favor the rule that an alleged want of jurisdiction is a question which the court should consider whenever and however it is raised.[175]

A discharge in bankruptcy may be revoked or vacated when it is made to appear that it was procured by the fraud of the bankrupt.[176] This action can be taken only by the court which granted the discharge; the authority conferred by the bankruptcy law upon the federal courts, in that behalf, is incompatible with the exercise of a like power by any state court.[177]

PART VI. GROUNDS FOR VACATING JUDGMENTS.

§ 321. Fraud and Collusion.

The power to set aside judgments for fraud or collusion, though expressly granted by statute in many of the states, is not dependent upon legislative recognition. It is a common law power, inherent in all courts of record, and may be exercised after the expiration of the term at which the judgment was rendered, on the application of the party injured.[178] It is specifically regulated in some of the states, by laws which give the courts power to vacate judgments on the ground of "fraud practised by the successful party."[179] In some jurisdictions, it is thought that, when a judgment is attacked and sought to be set aside on the ground of fraud, it must appear that the fraud was practised in the very act of obtaining the judgment; for any fraud anterior to that is a defense available at law and therefore concluded by the judgment.[180] But this rule should not be taken without qualifications. For there may well be cases of fraud in the cause of action, or in the manner of procuring the instrument in suit, where the courts would not withhold relief on motion; as, where the complainant was kept in ignorance of the fraud until it was too late for him to plead it in defense and could not have discovered it by due diligence, or where he was fraudulently prevented from setting it up at the proper time.[181] One of the strongest grounds on which to base an application for the vacation of a judgment is fraud practised upon the court in its procurement; as, where the court is deceived or misled as to material circumstances, or its process is abused, resulting in the rendition of a judgment which would not have been given if the whole conduct of the case had been fair.[182] But fraud, sufficient to taint the judgment, may also be practised by one of the parties upon the other. Thus, a judgment should be annulled or vacated if it is shown that the instrument or the claim on which it is founded had been paid or satisfied before the institution of the suit and the fact of payment concealed.[183] So also, where the defendant was tricked into signing a judgment note, supposing it to be a simple promissory note, or was secretly made to assume obligations towards third persons which he had no intention of incurring, and thereupon judgment was entered up against him.[184] Again, where judgment is recovered upon an instrument to which the defendant's name was forged, it will be vacated on his motion, provided he is not chargeable with lack of diligence in failing to allege the forgery in defense to the action.[185] Again, fraud practised by one of the parties upon the other, and sufficient to warrant the vacation of the judgment, may consist in deceit as to the cause of action sued on, or as to the nature of the relief sought, or as to defendant's rights in the subject-matter of the litigation, whereby he is lulled into a fancied security and wronged by the judgment which is obtained against him.[186] And the same principle applies where the successful party has taken means to prevent proper service being made upon the other, or has procured the service of false or misleading papers, or a false return of service, or has made false representations as to the status of the case or the time of its trial.[187]

Collusion between some of the parties, working injury to the just rights of the others, will also be ground for setting aside the judgment. Thus, where suit is brought against a corporation, and the director or officer upon whom process is served covinously agrees with the plaintiff for the rendition of a judgment, it is a fraud upon the corporation which will warrant the vacation of the judgment, if it is shown that there was a good defense, or otherwise that injustice has been done.[188] So, where attorneys for one of the parties are induced to withdraw their appearance and suffer a judgment, without authorization from their client,[189] or where there was collusion between the counsel on the two sides of the case, and a wrongful judgment is consequently entered.[190] But there is no fraud in a judgment authorizing its annulment merely because the defendant favored other creditors, whereby it proved worthless.[191] A judgment by default, entered by fraud and collusion, may be opened after the death of the judgment-debtor, so as to allow his administrator to defend.[192]

But a judgment or decree will not be declared void for fraud because there may be suspicious circumstances connected with its rendition. Fraud will not be presumed; it must be satisfactorily shown.[193] It has been said that it would require a strong case to authorize the setting aside of a judgment taken by default on the ground that the same was procured through false representations.[194] And the fact that there was usury in the original mortgage debt, on which a judgment is founded, is not alone sufficient to establish fraud which will give another creditor the right to have the judgment set aside.[195]

In this connection it must be remarked that, in an action to set aside a judgment on the ground of fraud, neither the judgment thus sought to be vacated, nor an order refusing to set aside a default and permit an answer in that case, can be set up as a bar to the action.[196] The right to have a judgment set aside on the ground of fraud is one that admits of being waived, and the defendant, by his subsequent conduct, may be estopped to avail himself of it.[197] In a case where one of several defendants had a good defense, and by the fraudulent device of the plaintiff was prevented from making it, and was also prevented from making his motion within the time limited by law to set aside the judgment, it was held that, as against such defendant, the plaintiff was estopped to enforce the judgment.[198]

§ 322. Judgment taken contrary to Agreement.

Where a plaintiff or his counsel prevents an appearance and defense in an action by representations and promises, he is guilty of a species of fraud if, in violation of such promises or representations, he takes a default in a case where he knows there is a defense.[199] Consequently, where it is shown that there was an honest agreement between the parties that the case should be continued, or that defendant's time to answer should be extended, or that the action should be dismissed, as the result of a compromise, and yet the plaintiff, without notice to the defendant and in violation of the agreement, enters up a default, or proceeds to trial and procures a judgment against the defendant in his absence, this is good ground for setting aside the judgment.[200] So where the plaintiff has previously filed a bill in equity concerning the same matter in litigation at law, and has obtained the defendant's consent for the case at law to stand continued until the bill has been heard, but afterwards takes judgment by default while the bill is still pending.[201] But the court will not on this ground set aside a judgment unless the alleged agreement was definite and specific, or unless the promises or representations of the plaintiff were such that the defendant could rely upon them and remain inactive, without being chargeable with any lack of diligence or vigilance in guarding his own interests.[202] And in some of the states it is the rule that a mere oral agreement between the parties to postpone the trial of a cause beyond the day set for trial, or to dismiss the action, which is not reduced to writing and filed, or not communicated to the court whose action it is to govern, will not be sufficient to justify the vacation of the judgment.[203]

Another species of fraud which the plaintiff may practise in procuring a judgment, and which will be sufficient to cause its vacation, is his own wilful perjury. "A defendant failing to defend cannot have the judgment vacated on account of any innocent mistake or want of recollection on the part of the plaintiff or other witness, nor even on account of the perjury of the other witnesses, provided the plaintiff himself is wholly guiltless.[204] Nor can he have the judgment vacated on account of any mistake or error on the part of the court or jury, unless the record affirmatively shows such mistake or error. All such mistakes or errors each party is bound to anticipate, and to prepare for by extraordinary diligence. But no party is bound to anticipate or to suppose that the other party will commit wilful and corrupt perjury, and no party is bound to exercise extraordinary diligence in preparing to meet such perjury." the return of the sheriff showed a service of the summons on Monday, but the proofs on a motion to set aside a default showed that the service was in fact made on Sunday, it was held that, although the return could not be impeached for the purpose of showing that the default was irregular, yet the fact might be proved for the purpose of excusing the default as a condition to obtaining relief.[209] So a judgment may be set aside at the instance of a defendant who shows that, although the summons was left at his residence, he was, at the time, absent or sick, and had no actual knowledge of the suit, or that it was forwarded to him by mail but never reached his hands.[210] A joint verdict and judgment against several defendants, some of whom were never served and have not waived service by appearance, may be set aside on motion.[211] So, in the case of a corporation, it will be good ground for vacating a judgment against it that the person upon whom service was made was not an officer of the corporation, or not authorized to accept service, or that he failed, through negligence or forgetfulness, or with a sinister motive, to give notice of the action to those charged with the duty of defending the action in behalf of the corporation.[212] It should be observed that the rule as to the presumptions in favor of the validity and regularity of proceedings had before judgment is applicable only in cases of collateral attack, and cannot be invoked to cure defects in the service of process, upon an application to set aside a default and permit a defense on the merits.[213] But it has been held that the appearance of a party against whom a judgment has been rendered, to move that it be opened and for leave to answer, is a general appearance to the merits and waives all defects in the service of process and other proceedings preliminary to the judgment.[214] A judgment based on a false return of service may be attacked by motion in the same proceeding.[215] And where the return of process is defective in not showing a due and legal service, this will also be ground for setting aside the judgment, though the court may, in a proper case, allow the return to be amended and dismiss the motion to vacate.[216]

But want of notice, as a ground for vacating a judgment, means want of notice of the institution of the action,—want of that notice which is essential to give the court jurisdiction over the person of the defendant. When a defendant has been legally served with proper process, he is in court for every purpose connected with the action. It is then his duty to follow up his case, and take notice of the filing of subsequent papers in the action, such as demurrers, cross-petitions, and motions of various sorts; and he must ascertain for himself when the case is put on the calendar or docket for trial, or set down for hearing, and when it is likely to be reached. If he fails, through his own carelessness or lack of vigilant attention, to obtain notice of the various steps in the action, or of the time of trial, and consequently suffers a judgment, it will not be vacated merely on that ground.[217]

§ 325. Unauthorized Appearance by Attorney.

By the English rule, where a defendant has been served with process, and an attorney without authority appears for him, the court will not interfere to set aside the proceedings, if the attorney be solvent, but will leave the defendant to his remedy by summary application against the attorney. If the attorney be insolvent, the court will relieve the defendant on equitable terms if he has a defense on the merits. But where a plaintiff, without serving a defendant, accepts the appearance of an unauthorized attorney for the defendant, the court will set aside the judgment as irregular, with costs, and leave the plaintiff to recover those costs and the expense to which he has been put from the delinquent attorney by summary proceedings.[218] It is the prevailing doctrine of the American cases that a judgment obtained against a party upon whom no process was served, and for whom an attorney has entered an appearance without authority, may be set aside, even at a subsequent term.[219] In

In Pennsylvania, where judgment is entered against a defendant in an action of which he had no notice, service of the writ having been accepted for him by an attorney who had no authority to act for him, it is proper for the court, on defendant's motion, to strike off the judgment. Bryn Mawr Nat. Bank v. James, 152 Pa. 364, 25 Atl. 823. But if it is not admitted that the attorney's appearance for defendant was unauthorized, then the judgment cannot be stricken off, but can only be opened, and the disputed facts sent to a jury. Swartz v. D. S. Morgan & Co., 163 Pa. 195, 29 Atl. 975, 43 Am. St. Rep. 786. Defendant must act promptly; if he was aware that an attorney, though unauthorized, had appeared for him, a default judgment will not be vacated after the lapse of 10 years. Lytle v. Forest, 16 Pa. In New York, it appears to be settled that relief against a judgment rendered against one not served with process, on the unauthorized appearance of an attorney in his name, may be sought and obtained by motion in the case in which such appearance was entered; that if, at the time of such motion, the attorney who entered such appearance is insolvent, it is no reason

some of the states, however, there is still a disposition to base a distinction on the question of the attorney's solvency, and to hold that the judgment should not be vacated, if he is able to respond in damages, though he was entirely without authority to appear.[220] At any rate, the claim of a party for whom an appearance has been entered, to deny the authority of the attorney and ask relief, is viewed with great disfavor by the courts wherever innocent third persons have acquired rights under the judgment or decree sought to be annulled.[221] And relief will be denied where the fact of the attorney's authority is not fully negatived, but left in doubt under the testimony, and there is no allegation of a meritorious defense to the action.[222] Applications for relief against a judgment on this ground are more commonly made by bill in equity for an injunction against the enforcement of the judgment than by motion to vacate it, and the point will receive further consideration in connection with the former species of remedies.[223]

for denying the motion that, at the time the judgment was given, the attorney was able to respond in damages; that it rests in the discretion of the court, according to the circumstances of the particular case, either to vacate the judgment entirely or to allow it to stand as security, with leave to the defendant to come in and defend; but that if the defendant was a non-resident, and was not served, he is entitled to have the judgment set aside absolutely. § 326. Irregularities.

It is a general rule that the court in which a judgment was rendered may vacate it, on motion, at the same or a subsequent term, on proof that it was entered irregularly and not according to the course of the court.[224] Thus a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, before the time for answering has expired, may properly be set aside;[225] and so may a judgment entered while there was an answer or demurrer on file and not yet disposed of.[226] So a judgment in a suit in equity, entered through inadvertence by the clerk on a special advisory verdict, while other issues of fact remain to be determined by the court, may be set aside, and a new judgment entered, after the adoption of the special verdict by the court and its findings on other issues.[227] On similar principles a judgment will be vacated which was rendered on issue joined without bond and warrant of attorney to confess judgment, but without any appearance for the defendant or formal confession of judgment, will be set aside as irregular;[237] and so will a judgment taken by default when it appears that the real party in interest was not made a party to the action.[238] But a defendant cannot have a judgment against him opened because the suit was brought in the name of a wrong person, if that person is authorized to receive satisfaction of the judgment and to give a valid discharge.[239] It is also proper to vacate a judgment entered where no findings of fact or law were made or filed by the court, as required by law, and findings were not waived,[240] and inconsistency between the findings of fact and conclusions of law in the judgment of a referee, confirmed by the court, is sufficient ground for setting the judgment aside.[241]

But on the other hand, it is not every trivial or inconsiderable irregularity that will support an application to vacate the judgment. The principles which should govern the exercise of this remedial power of the courts have been well stated by the supreme court of North Carolina in the following language: "A motion in the action to set aside the judgment for irregularity will be entertained by the court, if it should be made within a reasonable period after it was granted [rendered]. This, however, does not imply that every judgment affected in any degree, directly or indirectly, by some or any irregularity in the course of the action leading to it, will be set aside. Some irregularities are unimportant and do not affect the substance of the action or the proceedings in it; there are others of more or less importance that may be waived or cured by what may take place or be done in the action after they happen; and there are yet others so serious in their nature as to destroy the efficacy of the action and render the judgment in it inoperative and void. will or will not grant such a motion in any case must depend upon a variety of circumstances, and largely upon their peculiar application to the case in which the motion shall be made. Generally a judgment will be set aside only when the irregularity has not been waived or cured, and has been or may be such as has worked, or may yet work, serious injury or prejudice to the party complaining interested in it, or when the judgment is void. The court will always, upon motion, strike from its record a judgment void for irregularity." [242] Although the irregularity might have defeated the proceeding, if objection had been timely and properly made, yet if it is such as must be deemed waived by the failure to object, it will not be ground for vacating the judgment.[243] A failure to give security for costs, under the general rule of the court, is no cause for setting aside the judgment.[244] It is also held that if any portion of a judgment is regular and valid, it will not be set aside as irregular and invalid upon motion.[245] An affidavit is not required to support a rule to strike off a judgment which, on the face of the record, appears to have been unlawfully and improvidently entered.[246]

§ 326a. Objections to Jury.

A motion to vacate or set aside a judgment will not generally be granted on the ground that one or more of the jury, upon whose verdict the judgment was rendered, was incompetent or disqualified, or on account of his alleged bias or hostility against the unsuccessful party, or by reason of any alleged misconduct on the part of the jury, the proper remedy, in such a case, being by challenge duly interposed at the trial, or by motion in arrest of judgment, or by a motion for a new trial, according to the circumstances.[247] But it has been ruled that a verdict not rendered by the persons designated and selected according to law, but participated in by others, who, by fraudulent practices, obtained seats in the jury box, heard the evidence, and returned a verdict, having no right or authority to do so, and a judgment entered in pursuance of such verdict, should be set aside upon the motion of the injured party, if he was innocent of the fraud, without inquiry as to whether or not it was just as between the parties.[248]

§ 327. Judgments against Persons under Disabilities.

We have already seen that a judgment against a married woman, rendered in an action to which her coverture, if pleaded, would have been a good defense, is certainly voidable, if not absolutely void;[249] and that the same is true of a judgment against an infant for whom no guardian was appointed or appeared.[250] It follows, of course, that such judgments may be set aside, upon a proper and timely application by motion, by the court which rendered them. Where a statute provides that judgments shall not be set aside on motion, for irregularities, after the lapse of a certain time, this does not apply to cases where the motion is based on errors of fact; and it is held that the entry of a judgment against an infant or a person under other disabilities, or a dead man, is not an irregularity but an error of fact; and the statute does not affect the power of the court to vacate it on motion.[251]

§ 328. Unauthorized Entries.

A judgment which was inadvertently or irregularly entered by the judge or the clerk of the court without any authority, may be vacated at any time.[252] In a case in Iowa, after an appeal had been perfected and a supersedeas bond filed, it was agreed between the parties to the action, without the consent of the sureties, that a judgment should be entered in the supreme court against the appellants and sureties, and a judgment of affirmance was accordingly entered. It was held that upon a motion made at the following term, at the instance of the sureties, the court had jurisdiction to set aside the judgment.[253]

§ 329. Judgment not Vacated because Erroneous.

The power to vacate judgments, on motion, is confined to cases in which the ground alleged is something extraneous to the action of the court or goes only to the question of the regularity of its proceedings. It is not intended to be used as a means for the court to review or revise its own final judgments, or to correct any errors of law into which it may have fallen. That a judgment is erroneous as a matter of law is ground for an appeal, writ of error, or certiorari, according to the case, but it is no ground for setting aside the judgment on motion.[254] Thus, the reception of secondary or illegal evidence in proof of a fact is no ground to annul the judgment rendered in the case.[255] The statutes enacted in many of the states, granting power to vacate judgments rendered against a party through his "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," do not authorize the court at a subsequent term to set aside a judgment duly rendered for mere errors of law committed by the court.[256] So the decree of a court of equity cannot be set aside, on motion, for defective allegations in the bill or for defective pleadings; the proper remedy is by bill of review.[257]

A motion or proceeding to vacate or set aside a judgment cannot be sustained on any grounds which might have been pleaded in defense to the action, and could have been so pleaded with proper care and diligence.[258] So where, in an action regularly commenced and prosecuted, without any fraud or fraudulent representations, judgment is rendered by consent against the defendants, they cannot thereafter have the judgment set aside and a new trial granted, on the ground of the existence of a complete legal defense to the action, the nature and extent of which they were aware of at the time of the entry of judgment.[259] A judgment will not be stricken off because the warrant of attorney on which it was entered appears to be dated on Sunday; courts will not, on such grounds, interfere with an executed contract.[260] Where a judgment was obtained in a court of law, and an injunction was afterwards issued to restrain the collection of it, which injunction was dissolved and judgment entered on the injunction bond, it was held that a motion to vacate the latter judgment, upon an allegation that the original judgment had been satisfied by payment to the sheriff, could not be entertained; the proper course would have been to plead such payment or have satisfaction entered on the record.[261] But in Pennsylvania, a judgment by confession on a warrant of attorney may be opened and the defendant let in to a defense, where it appears that the defendant was entitled to certain credits which should have been deducted from the amount of the judgment, or set off against it.[262]

§ 331. Illegality of Cause of Action.

An apparent exception to the rule stated in the preceding section is that in some jurisdictions the courts exercise the power to open or vacate judgments in cases where the consideration on which they are founded is tainted with illegality. Usury has been considered a good ground for calling this power into operation.[263] But the general rule is wise and salutary, and exceptions of this kind should not be received with any degree of favor where the party objecting (as will usually happen) was not prevented from setting up the illegality as a defense to the action. In Georgia, it was held that a constitutional provision that the courts should not render or enforce any judgment for a demand founded on slave property as the consideration, did not authorize them to vacate a judgment already rendered on such a demand.[264] And in general, in accordance with the rule that, where both parties have equally participated in an immoral or illegal transaction the courts will refuse to aid either of them, but will leave them where they stand, it is held that a judgment taken by confession or default will not be opened or vacated to allow the defendant to escape from liability on an unlawful or immoral transaction in which he knowingly participated.[265]

§ 332. Newly-discovered Evidence.

Where facts occur after judgment (or before judgment but after the time when the party can avail himself of them in the action) showing that the judgment ought not to be enforced, in whole or in part, relief may be given on account thereof, on motion to vacate the judgment, to order it satisfied, or to stay proceedings on it, according to the circumstances of the particular case.[266] But the party must be prompt and diligent. A judgment will not be vacated on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, when it appears that the defendant, knowing that the claim sued for was paid, and that there were receipts for its payment, yet neglected to appear and make efforts to procure evidence of the same.[267] And where a motion for a new trial has been overruled, on the ground that the newly-discovered evidence on which the application is based is not of sufficient importance for that purpose, the same evidence cannot be made the basis of a direct action to set aside the judgment.[268]

§ 333. Judgment on Reversed Judgment.

Where suit is brought in one state, say Colorado, on a judgment rendered by a trial court in another state, say Illinois, and judgment recovered thereon, and subsequently the Illinois judgment, the case being removed by writ of error to the appellate court of that state, is reversed, these facts, being properly brought before the court, constitute good ground for vacating the judgment in Colorado.[269] Similarly, where a judgment is entered on a warrant of attorney, and a transcript of it taken to another county, and afterwards the original judgment is stricken off for cause, the judgment in the other county falls with it.[270] On analogous principles, when the defendant in a criminal case is tried, and a fine imposed on him, and judgment entered thereon for the amount of the fine and costs, and afterwards the governor remits the fine, the court should, on motion, vacate the judgment as to the fine, leaving it subsisting as to the costs.[271]

§ 334. Statutory Grounds for Vacating Judgments.

Hitherto we have been considering what may be called the common law grounds for vacating judgments,—those causes which, independent of statute, are recognized as sufficient to call into play the inherent power of courts of record to grant relief of this nature. In many of the states, however, the matter is regulated by statutes, which empower the courts to set aside judgments for certain enumerated causes within a limited time. Thus in several states, the laws authorize the court, in its discretion and upon such terms as may be just, to relieve a party from a judgment or order taken against him through fraud or through his "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," provided the application be made within a certain time after the rendition or entry of judgment (or "after notice thereof") usually six months or a year.[272] In several others the purport of the statute is substantially the same, though expressed in somewhat different language, the causes specified being "unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing the party from prosecuting or defending," "fraud practised by the successful party in obtaining the judgment," mistake of the clerk, death of a party, etc.[273] In Connecticut, the statute authorizes the vacation of a judgment for mistake, accident, or other reasonable cause.[274] In Georgia, a judgment by default may be opened where the defendant was prevented by "providential cause" or "excusable neglect" from filing his defense at the proper time.[275] In Vermont, similar action may be taken when the defendant was unjustly deprived of a hearing by fraud, accident, or mistake.[276] In Minnesota, a judgment may be set aside which was obtained by means of perjury, subornation of perjury, or any fraudulent act, practice, or representation of the prevailing party.[277] In Ohio, a judgment may be vacated for "irregularity in obtaining it."[278] The construction of these terms will mainly occupy our attention through the succeeding sections. But before passing on, it is necessary to observe that these statutes are exclusive with respect to the causes which they enumerate but not as to other possible causes. That is, if a party seeks relief on the ground of one of the causes specified in the statute, he must bring himself well within its terms and his application must be made within the time limited. But the fact that such and such causes are provided by statute does not prevent the courts from acting on other causes, just and reasonable in themselves and good at common law, and where an application is based on such a ground, outside the statute, it is not governed by the statute, in respect to the time of moving or otherwise.[279]

When statutes authorize the vacation of a judgment entered against a party through his "mistake," it is to be understood that they mean a mistake of fact. Mistake of law—that is, the party's ignorance of the law, or mistake as to his legal rights or duties in the premises—will not warrant the setting aside of the judgment.[280] And even when the mistake is one of fact, there must be some reasonable and valid excuse for its having occurred, so that it cannot be said to be due merely to the party's heedlessness or indifference, and he must show a defense to the action and due diligence in seeking to vacate the judgment after discovering his mistake. These conditions being met, the judgment may be set aside on the ground of a mistake as to the identity of the suit, as where the party honestly became confused between different suits brought against him, or between a civil and a criminal action touching the same subject-matter and pending at the same time;[281] or a mistake as to the capacity in which he is sued, as, if he supposes the action to be against him in an official capacity when it was really the intention to sue him as an individual;[282] or a mistake as to the time when he is required to plead or answer, or as to the time of the trial.[283] But on the other hand, it is said that an affidavit that the party defaulted mistook the court in which his case was pending does not show sufficient ground for setting aside the judgment.[284] And courts are not much disposed to vacate judgments on the ground of misunderstandings between parties and their counsel. Thus, it is held that a party's mistaken belief that he had retained an attorney to take charge of the case does not entitle him to have a default judgment vacated, where the facts did not justify that belief.[285] But a mistake or misunderstanding as to the terms or effect of an agreement between the two parties to the suit may justify the opening of a default, or the modification of the judgment.[286] In an action to set aside a judgment on the ground of mistake, if the complaint fails to make explanation of the mistake or the causes which produced it, it fails to set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.[287]

The "mistake" which will justify the vacation of a judgment may also be the mistake of the court or the judge. For instance, a mistake in the transmission of a telegram by the judge of the court, for which the party is in no way responsible, whereby he is deprived of a hearing on the trial, is ground for vacating the judgment.[288] But "wherever it may be found that inadvertence or mistake is held to be a ground for setting aside a judgment, it will be noticed that it is not a mistake of the law, or an inadvertent conclusion by the court as to what the law is, but a mistake or inadvertence in doing something not intended to be done." [289] And where the judgment entered on the journal is different from what was intended by the court, but is shown to be such as ought to have been rendered, it will not be vacated or modified as entered by mistake.[290]

§ 336. Surprise.

Under a statute which empowers the court, within a year after notice of a judgment, to relieve a party therefrom on the ground of "surprise," the fact that the party was surprised by a ruling of the court, refusing to continue the cause on his motion, is not sufficient.[291] Nor is it enough that he was surprised by a decision holding a complaint bad on other grounds than those urged,[292] nor that he was surprised by evidence produced at the trial, unless he asked for a continuance to procure testimony to meet it,[293] nor because he was absent from the trial in consequence of his belief that the case could not possibly be reached for trial that day, although it was reached only through the unexpected continuance of some of the preceding cases.[294] Nor can a party claim that he was legally "surprised" by the transfer of his case to a different court, though he was actually ignorant of it, if he might have discovered the fact by due diligence.[295] On the other hand, in a case in West Virginia, it appeared that an action was brought in a county court, and two years later was transferred to the circuit court, no order except continuances being made in it after such transfer. The judge of the circuit court could not preside at the trial, and twelve years later the plaintiff, in the absence of the defendant and his counsel, caused a special judge to be elected, and, without the knowledge of the defendant, the case was tried, and a verdict and judgment rendered for the plaintiff. The defendant, being notified of such judgment, moved the court to set the same aside because of the facts above stated, and upon his affidavit alleging surprise and the full payment of the debt sued on the circuit court set aside the judgment and awarded the defendant a new trial. In this, it was held, there was no error.[296] So, again, where the respondent to a petition for a writ of prohibition files a demurrer and answer, and the demurrer is overruled, and judgment absolute given against him on the insufficiency of his answer, where, in the absence of a motion for judgment on the pleadings, he expected that only the demurrer would be passed on, a motion to vacate the judgment for surprise will be granted.[297] But it is probable that the species of "surprise" primarily contemplated by the statutes is that which results from the taking of a judgment contrary to an agreement or understanding that the case should be continued or not pressed, or not brought to trial,[298] though that is also a kind of fraud. It seems that there may also be legal "surprise" in the unexpected withdrawal from the case of a party's attorney,[299] though not where the judgment was given by consent of the party's attorney, and the contention merely is that he exceeded his authority.[300]

§ 337. Casualty or Misfortune.

In several of the states, as we have already stated, the statutes specify "unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing the party from defending or prosecuting" as a ground for vacating judgments. Decisions under this clause are of general importance; for it cannot be doubted that failure to appear in consequence of an unavoidable casualty or misfortune would be a case of "excusable neglect" within the statutes in other states. That the defendant was prevented from reaching the place of trial by a railroad accident, or by the impassable condition of the roads, or by storms or other insuperable obstacles, is a sufficient ground for vacating a default judgment against him, if he shows a good defense.[301] So also, the judgment should be vacated where it appears that the summons was served at his residence while he, with all the members of his family, was absent on a vacation, and that he had no knowledge of the action until he was requested to pay the judgment,[302] or where the civil docket was disarranged by the trial of the criminal docket, and defendant's case was disposed of while his attorney was temporarily absent from the court room,[303] or where, shortly before the trial, defendant's attorney absconded, without the knowledge of his client.[304] But the mere fact that the party wrote to an attorney to appear for him, though without disclosing his defense, and had no knowledge that his letter was not delivered to the attorney until after the judgment was rendered and the court had adjourned, is not a sufficient excuse.[305] Nor is it sufficient that the party failed to appear at the time his case was called in consequence of misunderstanding his attorney's statement as to when the court met,[306] nor that his absence from home on a business trip prevented him from receiving notices sent to him by his counsel, as to the progress of the case and the time of its trial.[307] On the other hand, mental unsoundness is such a "misfortune," within the meaning of the statutes, as will authorize the court to vacate or modify a judgment.[308] And if a party is deprived of the opportunity to interpose a meritorious defense by being detained as a convict in the penitentiary, the court may, on a proper application after his release, open the default and vacate the judgment.[309] But mere ignorance of the English language is not a sufficient ground for such relief, if the defendant knew that a suit had been commenced against him.[310]

§ 338. Sickness of Defendant.

In some of the states, it is held that the illness of a party, occurring on or continuing through the day of trial, and so severe as to confine him to his house and prevent him from attending the court and trying his suit, is such an "unavoidable casualty or misfortune" as entitles him to have the judgment against him set aside.[311] And in other states, this is considered a case of "excusable neglect." to admit sickness as a sufficient excuse. In Georgia, a motion to set aside a judgment by default, on the ground that the defendant was sick when it was rendered and could not put in his plea, was overruled, no reason being shown why the plea was not filed before the trial term.[313] And in Indiana, the latest rulings decide that a judgment should not be vacated because the defendant was too sick to be present at the trial, as he might have appeared by attorney.[314] This seems to be the doctrine also in Illinois.[315] In one case the defendant showed that he was confined to his house, during the pendency of the action, by a wound in the foot, but the court refused to open the judgment.[316] The sickness of a member of the defendant's family may be a ground upon which the judge may grant a continuance, but it is not a reason for setting aside a default.[317]

It is held by several very respectable authorities that the illness of defendant's counsel, so severe as to prevent him from appearing and trying the case, is a good ground for vacating the judgment.[318] This, however, has been fairly denied.[319] It seems reasonable to hold that such an excuse would not be sufficient if the party had any opportunity to retain other counsel, or otherwise to escape the default or verdict. But if the attorney's illness was so sudden that there was no time to employ other counsel, or if it was unknown to the defendant, or he was unable to act in the matter, or no one was present to ask for a continuance, it would be manifestly unjust to visit the misfortune upon the defendant who was guilty of no carelessness or lack of diligence. And indeed the cases hold that if both the attorney and the defendant were sick, whereby the former was prevented from attending to the case and the latter was prevented from retaining other counsel, the judgment should be vacated.[320] Whether the illness or death of a member of the attorney's family occurring at such a juncture as to draw him away from the case, is a sufficient ground for relief, is an unsettled question.[321] But without doubt it should be decided on the lines above laid down with respect to the counsel himself. In a case where the defendant employed a prominent attorney, who died three weeks before the return term, and whose death was conspicuously noticed in the newspapers, and the defendant then neglected to employ other counsel, and suffered a default, it was held that he was not entitled to have the judgment vacated.[322]

§ 340. Excusable Neglect.

The "excusable neglect" of the defendant is specifically mentioned, in the statutes of several states, as one of the grounds upon which judgments may be set aside.[323] And under this designation may be classed the unavoidable absence of the party, when he is kept away from the trial of his case by the performance of duties which he cannot legally postpone or escape.[324] Thus, it is a good excuse for failure to attend if he was compelled, at that time, to appear before a grand jury,[325] or before another court,[326] or if he was necessarily absent in the actual military service of the United States.[327] Again, it is a case of "excusable neglect" if the party's failure to plead, or to follow up his case, or to be present at its trial, was due solely to his reliance upon assurances given him by those upon whom he had a right to depend (as, the adverse party, or counsel retained in the case, or a competent business adviser) that it would not be necessary for him to take an active part in the case, or that the suit would not be prosecuted.[328] But the fact that the defendant supposed a summons which was served on him to be a paper in another cause pending between himself and the plaintiff, and for that reason took no measures to answer it, is not excusable neglect.[329] But where the officer did not read or give a copy of the summons to the defendant, but told him it was a subpœna for him as a witness in a case pending in another court, and the defendant did not learn the truth until too late, this was held a sufficient excuse.[330]

An application to open or vacate a judgment on this ground must show the cause of the party's neglect of the case, and that it was excusable.[331] If the papers disclose mere carelessness, lack of attention, or indifference to his rights, on the part of the applicant or his counsel, he cannot expect an opportunity to redeem the past. The law exacts diligent attention from all suitors. If the party's negligence is without excuse or justification, he must abide the consequences.[332] And as indicating the kind and amount of diligence required of him, it may be stated, first, that unless he means to try his own case, it is his duty to retain an attorney, more especially where the party himself is a non-resident.[333] He must see to it that the attorney understands and accepts the retainer. It will not be sufficient excuse for a default that a letter sent to an attorney, asking him to appear in the case, was not delivered until after the trial, if there was time to secure counsel by telegraphing.[334] If an attorney employed to represent the defendant dies or withdraws from the case, an effort to supply his place in due season must be shown.[335]

Having retained counsel, it is the client's duty to inform him fully of the nature and grounds of his defense, to assist him in the preparation of the case, and to attend at the trial, unless advised by his counsel that his presence is not necessary. If he fails in these particulars, his negligence cannot be held to be excusable.[336] Undoubtedly a party has a right to depend on his attorney's keeping him informed of the progress of the case; and a judgment may be vacated for excusable neglect or surprise, although the defendant was represented by counsel.[337] But it is not sufficient excuse for a default that defendant's counsel did not notify him of the time of the trial, if the defendant himself had actual notice that the case would probably be tried at a given term, at which it actually was tried.[338]

But in all these cases, the party's failure to take the steps required of him was due to his own want of diligence or attention. The situation is entirely different where, in the exercise of all due vigilance and activity, he was prevented from filing a pleading or attending the trial by an accident or chain of accidents which he could not have controlled,[339] or by a genuine and excusable mistake or miscalculation.[340] It is not, however, a case of excusable neglect when the only reason for not filing an answer in time was that the peculiar nature of the case required more than the usual time in the preparation of an answer, and the attorney could not give it his undivided attention.[341] And a judgment will not be set aside on the ground that the defendant was prevented from being represented at the trial and making his defense, when the defense set up in the affidavit in support of his motion is entirely new and not disclosed by the original pleadings.[342]

§ 340a. Mistake, Ignorance, or Erroneous Advice of Counsel.

Certain of the cases lay down a broad general rule that the mistake or ignorance of a party's counsel will not relieve him from a judgment rendered against him.[343] But a majority of the decisions favor the principle that a mistake of the party's attorney may warrant the vacation of the judgment, as well as a mistake made by the party himself, provided it was a mistake of fact, and not of law, and provided it was such as might reasonably and genuinely have occurred. Thus, we find authorities justifying the grant of such relief where the judgment was entered in consequence of the attorney's mistake or misapprehension as to the real facts of the case, or the circumstances of the transaction out of which the suit arose,[344] or his mistake or miscalculation as to the time for pleading or for the trial, or as to the case being set for trial or placed on the calendar.[345]

But no sufficient excuse is shown by an affidavit of counsel that he had forgotten on what day the term began, when he admits receiving the summons before the term, and the summons itself showed when the term began. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Flinn, 2 Ind. App. 55, 28 N. E. 201. Nor is it sufficient ground for opening a judgment that a clerk in the office of defendant's attorneys inadvertently placed the cause on the office diary for the January term instead of the December term, when the attorneys knew, when the suit was begun, that the answer would have to be filed at the December term. Barrett v. Queen City Cycle Co., 179 Ill. 68, 53 N. E. 550. A custom in one section of the state for circuit courts not to try cases on the first day of the term is no excuse for the absence of an attorney whose case is set for trial on that day, where it is not shown that the custom is invariable. Wilson v. Scott, 50 Mo. App. 329. And see, as denying that the attorney's mistake or miscalculation of time is ground for vacating a judgment, Smith v. Watson, 28 Iowa, 218; People v. So, a showing that defendant, after receiving service, engaged an attorney to conduct his defense, and that the latter failed to find the case because it was docketed in a wrong name, and for that reason omitted to make any defense, is sufficient to warrant the setting aside of a default.[346] And the same rule applies where the attorney mistakenly advised his client that the action had been discontinued.[347]

But if the mistake made by the attorney was a mistake of law, such relief cannot be granted. This principle is applied not only where he was in error, legally speaking, as to the rights or duties of his client, or as to the legal effect of substantive facts in the case, but also where the attorney takes a wrong course or fails to take the right course in consequence of his ignorance or misunderstanding of the rules of procedure.[348] Where a defendant who really has a good defense to the action is dissuaded from setting it up and contesting the suit, and suffers a default, by reason of erroneous advice from his attorney, it is thought, in several of the states, that this will constitute a sufficient ground for vacating the judgment rendered against him.[349] But elsewhere, on the ground that such a mistake is one of law, it is ruled that an application to open or vacate the judgment cannot be based on such grounds.[350]

§ 341. Negligence of Attorney.

In a majority of the states, the courts have steadily refused to set aside a judgment on the sole ground of the neglect or carelessness of the attorney for the party against whom it was rendered. The act or omission of the attorney is the act or omission of the client, and no negligence will be excusable in the former which would not be excusable in the latter.[351] This view has recently found expression in a case in Kansas, of which the circumstances were so unusually severe as to deserve somewhat detailed mention. It appeared that the plaintiff resided in Kansas and the defendants in another state; that the defendants employed an attorney in Kansas to file an answer and attend to the case; that the attorney never filed such answer, but, before the time for filing it had expired, he left the state, and never returned, and no answer was ever filed in the case; that after more than four months had elapsed since the defendants made default by not filing an answer, a judgment was rendered against them in accordance with the prayer of the plaintiff's petition; that the defendants had no knowledge of the negligence of their attorney, or of the rendition of such judgment, until a long time after both had occurred; that the attorney was insolvent; and that the defendants had a good defense to the action. It was held that neither of these circumstances, nor all combined, could be considered such an "unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing the party from defending" the action, that the defendants could have the judgment vacated and be let in to defend.[352] It is generally held that the attorney's neglect to file a plea or answer in the action will not justify the setting aside of a judgment by default.[353] But a case in New York holds that where the defendant's counsel omitted to enter a plea, and the neglect of the client to examine the records to see whether his plea was on file was excusable, there was good ground to open the judgment.[354] Where a party had time to give his personal attention to the defense of the action before a default was entered, and he failed to do so, it was held that the fact that counsel, whom he supposed he had engaged to make his defense, omitted to do so, did not make it imperative on the court to set aside the default.[355] Moreover, it is the duty of an attorney to follow up with diligence the cases in which he is retained, to watch the progress of each cause with vigilance, to note carefully the various steps taken by his adversary or by the court, and to secure due notice of every successive development in the action which requires movement on his part. His carelessness or inattention in these respects is not excusable. If the client suffers a default, or otherwise loses his case, because of the failure of his attorney to pursue and follow up the action with due care and watchfulness, it will not be ground for vacating the judgment.[356]

On the other hand, it is held in a few states (and notably in New York) that the negligence of the attorney is a sufficient ground for setting aside the judgment, provided the client himself was not directly in fault.[357] A party may be relieved from a judgment obtained against him by reason of the negligence, ignorance, or fraud of his attorney, without compelling him to resort to an action against the attorney or show the latter to be insolvent.[358] And even in the states which generally adhere to the stricter rule, there is a disposition to relax it somewhat under exceptional circumstances. Thus, where an attorney overlooked the case on the trial-calendar, by reason of its being placed thereon under a title calculated to mislead, and the case was called and defaulted, and there was a meritorious defense, it was held that the default and judgment rendered thereon might be set aside, application being made at the same term.[359] So where it was made to appear by affidavit of defendant's attorneys that the reason why they did not appear and file an answer was on account of an accidental misplacement of the petition and notice handed to them by the plaintiff, whereby the case was overlooked by them in examining their papers at the commencement of the term, in order to ascertain what cases they had to attend, it was considered that setting aside the default was no abuse of discretion.[360] So it is proper to vacate an order of dismissal, on motion of the plaintiff's attorney, supported by his statement that he had consented to the dismissal improvidently, and accompanied by his offer to refund the costs paid by the defendant

after notice of the motion.[361] The negligence of any person who is delegated or employed by the attorney to attend to the case or take his place is of course imputable to the attorney himself, and will not be excusable in the one unless it would have been in the other.[362] And where an attorney is engaged simply to employ counsel to appear at another place, he is a mere agent, and his negligence in failing to employ counsel is the negligence of his principal.[363] The burden is on a party seeking to be excused by the neglect of counsel to show that he employed counsel practising habitually in the particular court or who specially agreed to attend to the case.[364]

A misunderstanding between the defendant in an action and an attorney, as to whether the latter had been retained or not, in consequence of which the judgment goes by default, will be good ground, provided the mistake was genuine, for setting aside the judgment.[365] So where, in consequence of a misunderstanding between a defendant and his attorney, attributable to the negligence of a third person, the real defense is not interposed, and he does not discover the fact until after judgment has been recovered against him, it is no abuse of discretion to vacate the judgment.[366] So in a case where the defendant in a judgment by default applied to the court to open the same, and showed in his affidavit that he believed the case was being defended in his behalf by the attorneys who represented his co-defendants, and the record entries in the early stages of the cause

But see section 340, supra, as to the duty of the defendant to see to it that his attorney understands and accepts the retainer. It is said that the fact that defendant's counsel, through a misunderstanding, failed to appear at the trial, is no ground for setting aside a default, where defendant's only complaint is that the judgment is for more than he thinks it ought to be. showed that those attorneys appeared for "the defendants" generally, and there was shown to be a good defense on the merits, it was held that good cause appeared for opening the judgment.[367]

Where, in the unavoidable absence of the defendant's attorney (as, when he is engaged in trying a case in another court, which was begun before the plaintiff's case was called, and is unexpectedly protracted) a judgment is entered for the plaintiff, if all appears to have been done in good faith, and the defendant could not proceed without his counsel, and there is a meritorious defense, the cases generally hold that this will be good ground for vacating the judgment.[368] Similar rulings have been made in cases where the attorney's absence was caused by the sudden and dangerous illness of a near relative,[369] or by his necessary attention to the duties of a public office which he holds.[370] On the other hand, there are decisions to the effect that it is not a sufficient excuse for the attorney's absence that he was "detained by important legal business elsewhere," or that he was in attendance upon the legislature as a member of that body.[371] But the rule which appears to rest upon the surest foundation of sound legal reason is that which requires proof that the attorney's absence was truly unavoidable, in the sense that he could not have prevented judgment going against his client, in his absence, by any vigilance, or precaution on his part. According to the decisions favoring this rule, if counsel has cases coming on in two different courts at the same time, he must obtain leave of absence from one or other of the courts and arrange that his case shall not be proceeded with there in his absence.[372] If he is likely to be detained elsewhere by business of importance, legal or otherwise, he must apply to the opposing counsel for a continuance or an extension of time.[373] If, starting from a distant point, he finds that he cannot reach the place of trial in due season, he should telegraph to the judge and ask to have the case held until his arrival.[374] And it is quite clear that a judgment should not be set aside on this ground when no explanation or excuse for the attorney's absence is offered, or when it appears that he was guilty of carelessness or lack of attention, or that he withdrew from the court room in the mistaken belief that his case would not be reached before his return.[375]

§ 344. Fraud of Attorney.

If an attorney corruptly sells out his client's interest to the other side, a judgment thus obtained may be set aside on the charge of fraud. So also, if a plaintiff is guilty of so influencing the attorney of the defendant by the payment of money without the knowledge or consent of his client, as to make it the interest of such attorney that the plaintiff should obtain a judgment against his client, and such attorney, in the absence of his client, does not make any opposition to the rendition of the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, a new action may be maintained by the defendant to set aside such judgment and open the case for a new and fair hearing.[376] It has even been held that, where an attorney withdraws from the case, and judgment goes against his client, the mere fact that the latter did not consent to the withdrawal or know of it, will enable him to have the judgment opened.[377] A stronger case for such relief is of course made out where it is shown that the attorney's withdrawal was caused by hostility to his client for alleged nonpayment of his fees.[378] If the client consents to the withdrawal of his attorney's appearance, he precludes himself from moving for the vacation of the judgment.[379]

§ 345. Misinformation as to Time of Trial.

Where a party who seeks the vacation of a judgment rendered against him in the absence of his counsel and himself explains their failure to attend the trial by showing that they relied on a statement made by the judge of the court that the case would not be tried at the current term, or that it could not be reached before a distant date, or that nothing further would be done without notifying counsel, notwithstanding which a default was taken, it is generally held to be a case of "excusable neglect," such as will warrant the opening of the judgment.[380] And a similar rule is applied where counsel was misled by information or assurances given him by the clerk of the court, as to the time when the case would be reached in its order, or as to the time when the court would proceed with the business before it.[381] But some of the authorities maintain the rule that even such official assurances will not relieve litigants (or their counsel) from the duty of exercising the utmost vigilance in watching the progress of their causes.[382]

§ 345a. Estoppel to Apply for Vacation of Judgment.

A party, against whom a judgment has been taken under circumstances which would ordinarily entitle him to apply for its vacation, may be estopped by his conduct to ask for such relief. This is held to be the case where he has been guilty of fraud in attempting to elude execution on the judgment by setting up a claim under a fictitious name to the goods sought to be levied on,[383] or where he has made a "declaration of no defense" to the note on which the judgment was entered and offered to pay it to the present holder before maturity,[384] or where a judgment by default, barring redemption, has been rendered against a junior incumbrancer through his excusable neglect, and he learns of the judgment while the period of redemption is running, but fails to redeem.[385] On the other hand, it is said, in New York, that a defendant is not estopped to apply to have a default opened and for leave to set up a meritorious defense, unless the plaintiff has been prejudiced by the loss of some substantial advantage which he would have had if the defense had been interposed at the proper time.[386] And it seems that the fact that a default judgment has been satisfied by a sale of the defendant's property does not deprive him of relief, unless it is shown that some one was misled by his failure to prevent the sale.[387]

PART VII. PRACTICE ON VACATING JUDGMENTS.

§ 346. Notice of Application.

Where the power to vacate judgments depends upon such statutory provisions as we have been considering, it is generally requisite that notice of the application be given to the other party. But at common law this is not always necessary. It is not irregular for a court to set aside during the term a judgment rendered by it, without notice to the defendant. It cannot be assumed that the want of notice was prejudicial to him, the court having authority to set aside such judgment despite any objections he could make.[388] And in one case this was done, without notice, although the docket had been closed, the plaintiff's counsel had left the court, and a similar motion had been previously refused.[389] But after the term the case is different. Then the parties are no longer before the court, actually or constructively, and a judgment cannot be set aside on motion without notice to the adverse party or his representatives.[390] The notice should in general be addressed to and served upon the party himself. But it is held that the authority of an attorney so far continues after final judgment that service on him of notice of a motion to vacate the judgment for fraud in obtaining it or for want of jurisdiction will bind his client.[391] And no notice to the adverse party of such a motion is necessary when he is present by his counsel at the time the motion is made,[392] or when he appears by his counsel and takes part in the hearing on the motion.[393] If the party is dead, his personal representative should receive the notice. The proper practice is to take an order reciting the judgment, the grounds relied on, the death of the party, and the qualification of the representative, and calling upon him to show cause why the judgment complained of should not be set aside, and this order should be served as others are.[394] Generally speaking, all the parties to a judgment should be made parties to a proceeding, either in equity or at law, under the statute, to annul it.[395] But a defendant mortgagor need not be served with notice of a motion by his co-defendant, a prior mortgagee, to set aside a default judgment in the foreclosure proceedings, under which the property was sold to the plaintiff.[396] And where a judgment which had been standing for several terms, and upon which an execution had issued, resulting in the sale of defendant's land, had been set aside on motion of the defendant, it was held that no notice of a motion on the part of the plaintiff to revoke the order setting the judgment aside, and to reinstate the same and the execution on the docket, was necessary.[397]

§ 346a. Requisites of Petition or Moving Papers.

Where the statute authorizes the vacation of judgments for certain causes "on complaint or motion filed within two years," a written complaint or motion must be filed, in order to obtain the relief desired.[398] The papers must show the existence of one of the statutory causes for setting aside the judgment, or must aver such facts as will be sufficient to warrant the court, in the exercise of its general jurisdiction, in taking such action.[399] It is not sufficient to allege, in the words of the statute, that the applicant was prevented from defending the suit by "unavoidable casualty or misfortune," or that the judgment was taken against him through his "inadvertence" or "excusable neglect;" but the facts constituting the casualty or misfortune, or relied on as excusing the inadvertence or neglect, must be fully set forth.[400] Furthermore, the applicant must show that he has a valid and meritorious defense to the action; and this must be made to appear, not by a mere averment that he has such a defense, but by setting forth fully the facts which constitute the proposed defense.[401] And in some of the states, it is provided by statute that a judgment shall not be vacated until it is adjudged that there is a valid defense to the action, or, if the plaintiff seeks its vacation, that there is a valid cause of action.[402] Where this provision is in force, it is error for the court to render a judgment of vacation before it has adjudged that there is a valid defense.[403] Again, in some states, it is required that the applicant for the vacation of a judgment shall file with his moving papers a copy of the answer which he proposes to put in, in case the judgment is opened; and it is held that this provision is mandatory, and that such an application should by no means be granted unless the statute is complied with in this particular.[404] In New York, however, it has been said that where the moving papers show the nature of the defense and the good faith of the applicant, it is not absolutely necessary to serve the proposed answer with the motion.[405]

are not strictly in conformity with the statute,—will not defeat the order vacating the judgment.[406] The motion should not be denied upon the particular grounds assigned thereby, and the mover left to make another motion for the same purpose, simply assigning in its support a ground not before specified, but which plainly appears in the record.[407] If the judgment has been affirmed on appeal, it will not be vacated on the application of the losing party, based on the same grounds which he urged in a motion for a new trial in the original suit.[408] If the motion is denied, the court should find the facts on which it bases its conclusion that no just and reasonable cause has been shown for the setting aside of the judgment.[409]

§ 347. Affidavit of Merits.

In order to justify the opening or vacation of a judgment, it is not sufficient to show that the applicant did not have an opportunity to be heard in the case; but there must also be a prima facie showing that, if he had presented his defense, it would have prevailed, so that the judgment, as it stands, works injustice. In addition, therefore, to setting forth some one of the statutory grounds for setting aside a judgment, and the nature of the cause which prevented a defense being made, or the party's excuse for not defending, as stated in the preceding section, the application must be supported by an affidavit alleging a good and meritorious defense to the action on the merits, called an "affidavit of merits." This is imperatively required under the statutes authorizing the vacation of judgments for specified causes.[410] And independently of statutes, it has always been the practice of our courts, from the very earliest times, on an application to open or set aside a judgment, to require some sort of showing, by affidavit or otherwise, that the judgment is unjust as it stands and prejudicial to the party complaining, and that he has a meritorious defense.[411] It may therefore be regarded as a universal requirement. But the rule is subject to a few well-defined exceptions in peculiar cases.[412] Thus a judgment by default, entered before the court has acquired jurisdiction in the case, may be set aside without an affidavit of merits.[413] So the rule does not apply where it was grossly irregular for the default to have been entered;[414] or where the defendant complains of irregularity amounting to denial of his substantial rights;[415] or where the judgment is alleged to have been procured by fraud.[416] But in all cases where the application is not based upon want of jurisdiction or irregularity, but upon something presented as an excuse by the defendant, he must make an affidavit of merits. And nothing else can take its place and serve its purpose. An answer to the complaint, already on file or which the defendant proposes to file, is not equivalent to an affidavit of merits, although it discloses a defense apparently complete and meritorious, and although it is verified.[417] In several of the states the authorities hold that this affidavit is not sufficient if it merely states that the defendant has a meritorious defense to the action; but it must contain a full statement of the facts constituting the proposed defense, in order that the court may judge whether it is a good and meritorious defense or not.[418] And the facts must be stated positively and affirmatively; allegations merely on "information and belief" are not sufficient.[419] But in some other states, it is a rule established by statute, or by the settled practice of the courts, that the affidavit of merits is sufficient if it sets forth that the defendant has fully and fairly stated the case to his counsel and that he is advised by him, and believes, that he has a full, perfect, and meritorious defense to the action.[420] But an affidavit framed under this rule must be very full and explicit, and must not omit any of the particulars just mentioned.[421] And it seems that this manner of averring merits will not answer at all in chancery. Such an affidavit is not sufficient to authorize a court of equity to set aside a regular default or decree, but the affidavit should state the substance of the defense, or it should be stated under oath in some form, so that the court may judge whether it is meritorious.[422] The affidavit should be made by the applicant himself, unless good reasons exist for having it made by another person.[423] It may be made by an attorney if he has personal knowledge of the facts to be sworn to in it.[424] But the affidavit of an attorney, that from his client's statement of the case to him he believes that the client has a good and substantial defense upon the merits, is not sufficient.[425] Nor is an affidavit which states that from an examination of the defendant's case, so far as he has made such examination, he verily believes that it is better than the plaintiff's.[426] It is also considered necessary, when the affidavit is made by the defendant's attorney, to set forth some good and sufficient reason why the party himself does not make it.[427] An affidavit of an attorney, upon information and belief, as to a defense on the merits, but containing no statement of the facts on which the same is based, and alleging as an excuse an unsuccessful search for the papers by a third person, who makes no affidavit to that effect, is insufficient.[428]

plication to open a judgment is in effect a demand for equitable relief, and the applicant must make out a case which would justify a chancellor in entering a decree.[430] Where the complaint, in an action to set aside a judgment, does not attempt to show that the plaintiff had or has any valid defense to the original action, a demurrer to the answer, whether good or bad, is properly overruled. "A bad answer is sufficient for a bad complaint."[431] In another case, where it was proposed to set aside a default and reinstate the case that the defendant might plead to the merits, and it appeared that substantially the same matters proposed to be pleaded had been determined against the defendant in a former litigation, it was held that the motion was properly denied.[432] But where a default has been taken against a person upon whom there was no service of process, and over whom the court acquired no jurisdiction, he is entitled to have the judgment annulled without showing a meritorious defense to the action.[433] A defendant who seeks to open a judgment which he has suffered voluntarily and under the advice of counsel, must show the court specifically in what his defense consists; general allegations will not suffice.[434] But on a motion to open a default the court will not determine absolutely whether the defense interposed will be sufficient at the trial, but merely see that it is not frivolous. If set up in good faith, and with a sufficient excuse for the party's negligence in not having presented it at the proper time, he will be let in to answer as of course.[435]

§ 349. Technical or Unconscionable Defense not Sufficient.

The privilege of vacating judgments is to be used only in the furtherance of justice, and a judgment should not be set aside unless it is unjust as it stands. Hence, if it is regular on its face, it will never be opened up merely for the purpose of letting in an unconscionable, dishonest, or purely technical defense.[436] That usury is to be regarded as a defense of this character is settled beyond question. The court will not open a judgment merely to allow the plea of usury to be set up, or, if it opens the judgment on other grounds, may forbid the defendant to interpose that defense.[437] In regard to a plea of the statute of limitations, there is room for more doubt. Some of the cases hold that such defense is not sufficient to justify the court in opening the judgment, at least if there is nothing to show that the debt is not still morally and honestly due.[438] Indulgence, it is said, should not be granted for the defendant's laches merely to enable him to deny the like indulgence to the laches of his adversary. In Ohio the decisions are that this plea is one not to be favored, and where an issue has been made up, or the defendant is in default, he will not be allowed to put in the plea of the statute, unless under peculiar circumstances.[439] But on the other hand, in some states it is held that the statute of limitations is a good and meritorious plea, that it is sufficient ground for opening the judgment, and that if the trial court refuses to set aside the judgment unless the defendant will agree to waive this defense, it is a manifest abuse of discretion.[440] A set-off may perhaps be considered, in some instances, as a meritorious defense within this rule, but a judgment should not be opened to the prejudice of the plaintiff merely to enable the defendant to interpose a counter-claim which he may enforce by action, where there is no doubt as to the plaintiff's responsibility.[441] So again, the court will not open up a default to permit a defense of the statute of frauds to be made either by demurrer or plea, unless under special and peculiar circumstances.[442] In equity, a decree fairly and regularly obtained by default, for want of an answer, will not be set aside to let in a defense founded on a fraudulent speculation undeserving of the favor of the court.[443] A judgment should not be opened where the only defense set up is a technical objection to the plaintiff's capacity to sue, such objection not appearing on the face of the complaint.[444] So where the judgment was entered on a mechanic's lien, and the defense offered is that the lien was defective as being for a lump sum, instead of setting out the articles furnished.[445] Where municipal officers are sued on a warrant drawn by them, a judgment by confession will not be struck off at the suit of a tax payer on the mere ground that the action should have been on the original debt, instead of on the warrant, where it is not denied that the debt was just.[446] Again, a judgment by default on a policy of insurance should not be set aside where the defense is a forfeiture of the policy, unless it is shown that the alleged forfeiture has not in any way been waived, and that, on a trial, the result would probably be different.[447] But on the other hand, a plea of a discharge in bankruptcy or insolvency is not technical, but goes to the merits as a plea in bar.[448] And the same is true of a plea of res judicata. To prohibit the defendant from pleading a former judgment in bar of the present action, as a condition to lifting a default against him, is error.[449] And so, where the action is on a note, the defense that it was given for money lost in gaming is a defense to the merits, and should be allowed.[450] In California, it is said that the statement that the defense appears on the face of the complaint shows it to be of a technical character merely and therefore insufficient.[451]

§ 350. Opening Judgment to admit Defense.

In Pennsylvania, the usual and favorite practice, upon a proper and timely application for relief against a judgment by confession or default, is to open the judgment, but without vacating it and without impairing its lien, and let the defendant in to a defense on the merits.[452] It is in the light of this statement that we are to understand the remark that to open a judgment is not to set it aside, and that when it is closed by the action of the court it takes its place as if it had never been disturbed.[453] Thus, for example, a judgment entered on a warrant of attorney should be opened to let the defendant plead his discharge in bankruptcy, when he acts immediately upon notice.[454] On opening a judgment, in accordance with this practice, the judgment itself may be regarded as standing in the place of a declaration, and the entry of a non pros. for want of a declaration is irregular.[455] But the opening of the judgment leaves the burden and the mode of proof exactly the same as if the judgment had never been entered. Hence ii the defendant pleads non est factum as to the instrument on which it was founded, the record of the judgment is not even prima facie evidence for the plaintiff.[456] When a judgment is thus opened, the defenses which may be set up are limited. For instance, it does not become subject to set-off generally. If the defendant has a valid claim against the plaintiff exceeding the amount of the judgment, he cannot recover a verdict for the excess. He may be permitted to attack the validity of the claim on which the judgment is founded, or the good faith of the transaction connected with the consideration, or to show subsequent payment of the debt or equitable discharge therefrom. But in some manner, either in law or equity, the subject-matter of defense must have attached to the judgment or the consideration on which it rests.[457] The defendant can urge defenses existing at the time of the rendition of the judgment, but not those accruing subsequently.[458] If a judgment be opened upon an affidavit of defense, and the defendant let in to a defense upon the merits, he will not, upon the trial, be permitted to take advantage of a technical exception to the form of action.[459] And, generally, the rules stated in the preceding section will apply to this manner of practice. So where a judgment on a note is opened, with leave to the defendant to defend on matters stated in his petition, he cannot set up a breach of contract not alleged in the petition.[460]

The party who seeks the opening or vacation of a judgment must sustain the burden of proof, and must establish his right to the relief asked by clear and satisfactory evidence.[461] Where the ground alleged is irregularity or want of jurisdiction, there are some authorities showing a reluctance to permit contradiction of the record.[462] But the rule obtaining in the majority of the states is that the recitals of the record (as, for instance, a recital that the defendant was duly served with process) are presumed to be correct and will prevail in the absence of sufficient countervailing evidence; but that the defendant may contradict and overthow such recitals, the only question being upon the strength and clearness of his evidence.[463] Of course it is equally open to the adverse party to present affidavits sustaining the record and showing jurisdiction, and the issue will then be determined upon the preponderance of the evidence.[464] Where it is sought to have a judgment or decree set aside on the ground of fraud in procuring it, the evidence must be clear and cogent, so as to convince the court that the facts alleged to constitute the fraud existed, and were operative in procuring the decree.[465] If the evidence presented by the applicant is not contradicted, it will justify the court in vacating the judgment, provided it is plain, positive, and specific.[466] But if his allegations are traversed by affidavits or testimony presented on behalf of the adverse party, then the applicant must establish his contention by a fair preponderance of evidence.[467] So, where the ground offered for the vacation of the judgment is the disability of the defendant (as, that he was insane when the action was commenced), he must assume the burden of proving the fact, by superior weight of testimony.[468]

Where a party moves for the vacation of a judgment taken against him by reason of "unavoidable casualty or misfortune," or through his "mistake, surprise, or excusable neglect," as provided by the statutes, he must furnish clear and satisfactory proof of the facts constituting the cause which prevented him from defending, or excusing his default;[469] affidavits may be filed contradicting the matters which he alleges:[470] and the motion will not be granted, where the evidence is conflicting, unless the applicant makes out his case by a fair preponderance of the testimony.[471]

An application for the vacation of a judgment, as has been already stated, must be accompanied by a showing that the defendant has a good defense on the merits. But while the court may inquire whether the proposed defense is meritorious, and whether it would be sufficient, if established, to defeat the plaintiff's claims,[472] the inquiry does not include the truth of the defense. If the proposed plea or answer is investigated at all, on the motion to vacate or open the judgment, it is only to the extent of ascertaining whether the facts set up, assuming their truth, constitute a good and meritorious defense. Those facts must of course be proved on the subsequent trial, but they are not in issue on the motion to open or set aside the judgment. Hence, generally speaking, counter affidavits cannot be filed, nor counter evidence heard in any form as to the matters alleged as constituting a defense to the original action.[473] But in Pennsylvania, on a rule to open a judgment, evidence may be heard both for and against the proposed defense; and the judgment will not be disturbed if the defendant's assertion of the facts on which he relies is not corroborated and is traversed by an equally positive and comprehensive denial on the part of the plaintiff. If further testimony is introduced, the court will decide the motion according to the preponderance of evidence, or it may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, open the judgment and let the issue be decided by the verdict of a jury.[474] And a similar practice is observed in Illinois.[475]

§ 352. Imposition of Terms.

Since the opening or vacating of a judgment, in any case where an imputation of laches or inattention rests upon the party applying, is an act of grace and favor and is discretionary with the trial court, it has power to impose such terms as may be just and reasonable, as a condition to the granting of such relief, and its action in this respect will not be interfered with, unless for a gross and manifest abuse of discretion.[476] But the converse of this rule is equally true. The imposition of terms is by no means a necessary condition to the opening of a judgment (unless made so by statute), and the judgment-creditor cannot complain that terms were not imposed, unless he can also show that the action of the court was arbitrary and unjust,[477] more especially where a judgment by default is opened at the same term at which it was entered.[478] The most usual application of this power of imposing terms is the requirement that the party pay all previous costs in the action as a condition precedent to the opening of the judgment. It is clearly within the power of the court to make the payment of costs a condition to granting the relief asked,[479] includ-

Ekis, 155 Pa. 41, 25 Atl. 785, is that a petition to open a judgment should not be granted unless there is more than oath against oath; but when there is more than this, and it comes to the question of weight of the evidence, it is for the court below, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to decide to which side the scales incline, and if it is in doubt on this question, or as to the credibility of the witnesses, a prudent course would be to open the judgment, and thus obtain the aid of a jury at the trial.

ing, in a proper case and where justice appears to require it, the disbursements of the opposite party,[480] a proper fee to his attorneys,[481] and his reasonable personal expenses incurred in connection with the suit,[482] and also the costs of the motion itself.[483] But the imposition of costs is not a legal necessity. It is equally in the discretion of the court, if it considers such action just and proper in the particular case, to omit this requirement. Thus, an order vacating a judgment on account of surprise or excusable neglect, need not require the payment of all costs as a condition precedent.[484] And indeed, where the ground of the application is a want of jurisdiction in the court, no process having been served on the defendant, it would not be at all proper to require him to pay the costs, since, in that case, he is not chargeable with any kind or degree of fault or carelessness.[485] Another very common requirement, on the opening of a judgment, is that the party shall plead to the merits, or shall forbear to set up some particular defense which is considered unconscionable or purely technical. It cannot be doubted that this rests in the discretion of the court.[486] But it seems that the order requiring defendant to "answer" should not be so framed as to exclude his right to demur.[487] And requiring him to consent that the verdict on the trial shall be final and that no appeal shall be taken for any reason, is in excess of the court's authority.[488] Other conditions may be imposed where it is necessary to save to the judgment-creditor the fruits of the judgment he has already recovered. Thus, it is not an abuse of discretion, where the circumstances of the particular case warrant it, to require the defendant to consent to the appointment of a receiver of the property in question.[489] So also, the court may order that the judgment shall stand as security for the amount ultimately recovered by the plaintiff, or may require the defendant to give a bond with sureties conditioned for the payment of any judgment the plaintiff may recover,[490] or order him to give an undertaking not to sell or incumber any of his property to hinder the plaintiff in the collection of his claim.[491] It has even been held to be a fair exercise of the court's discretion, as a condition on opening a judgment by default, to require the defendant to deposit with the clerk of the court a sum of money sufficient to secure the plaintiff's claim, together with the costs and disbursements.[492] But in regard to all such conditions as these, it must be remembered that the question is not one of the court's power in the matter, but of the exercise of a sound judicial discretion; and therefore the conditions to be imposed in each individual case must rest upon the distinctive facts of that case. Onerous terms should not be imposed upon a defendant who is not greatly in fault. On the other hand, if the judgment is now good and collectible, it should not be set aside without adequate security furnished, where there is a prospect that a subsequent recovery on the same claim could not be enforced. Justice to both parties should guide the court, and all the pertinent facts of the particular case should be considered.

It is to be noted that a judgment ordered to be set aside "on payment of all costs" remains in full force until such payment is made.[493] And so, if an order is made setting aside a judgment on condition that the moving party pay to the other a sum of money and file an answer within a certain time, the conditions must be complied with within the time fixed, or the judgment will remain in force as if the order had never been made.[494]

Where a judgment is rendered on a petition which contains two distinct causes of action, though not separately stated and numbered, but united in a single count, and a motion is made to vacate and set aside the judgment and grant a new trial for defects apparent in the record, and the record discloses that judgment was properly entered on one cause of action and improperly entered on the other, the court may sustain the motion in part and vacate the judgment as to the one cause of action, while at the same time it overrules the motion in part and refuses to disturb the judgment in respect to the other cause of action.[495] But it is thought that a defendant cannot take advantage of so much of a decree as is favorable to him, and have it set aside as to the residue.[496] A judgment may also be opened as to some of the defendants, and not as to the others, where their interests are severable and the judgment is not an entirety.[497] But in Texas, under a statute providing that only one final judgment shall be entered in any cause, a judgment in a suit by a seller to recover goods procured from him through fraud, entered against the vendee, his trustee in insolvency, a receiver of his property, and his sureties, is an entirety, and cannot be set aside as to a part of the judgment-debtors.[498] So an order setting aside a judgment enforcing a lien for street improvements against the lots of various owners goes to the entire judgment, and not merely to the judgment as against the persons who moved to set it aside.[499]

A motion to vacate or set aside a judgment is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court on the particular facts of the case, and its action in the matter, whether of allowance or refusal, will not generally be disturbed by the appellate court, unless there has been a manifest abuse of such discretion.[500] The nature of this discretion has been described, in a well-considered opinion of the supreme court of California, in terms which would probably be accepted as accurate and reasonable in all jurisdictions. "The discretion intended," says the court, "is not a capricious or arbitrary discretion, but an impartial discretion, guided and controlled in its exercise by fixed legal principles. It is not a mental discretion, to be exercised ex gratia, but a legal discretion, to be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law and in a manner to subserve and not to impede or defeat the ends of substantial justice. In a plain case this discretion has no office to perform, and its exercise is limited to doubtful cases, where an impartial mind hesitates. If it be doubted whether the excuse offered is sufficient or not, or whether the defense set up is with or without merits in foro legis, when examined under those rules of law by which judges are guided to a conclusion, the judgment of the court below will not be disturbed. If, on the contrary, we are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the court below has come to an erroneous conclusion, the party complaining of the error is as much entitled to a reversal in a case like the present as in any other." [501] It is also said, however, that as a general rule, in a doubtful case, the court should incline to relieve. The exercise of the court's discretion ought to tend in a reasonable degree to bring about a judgment on the merits of the case, and when the circumstances are such as to lead the court to hesitate upon the motion to open the default, it is better, as a rule, that the doubt should be resolved in favor of the application, proper terms and conditions being imposed.[502] A doubt as to the propriety of allowing the motion may arise from the nature of the evidence or the fact of its being evenly balanced. Thus, where the oath of the petitioner is opposed by the oath of the plaintiff in the judgment, it is no abuse of discretion to refuse to open the judgment.[503] But if the relief is accorded, it will be presumed, in the court above, that there was sufficient evidence to justify the order.[504] Where the situation of the judgment-creditor has undergone a material change, as by the incurring of expense in issuing and levying execution, and by the fact that a material witness has, by the death of the judgment-debtor, become disqualified, there is no abuse of discretion in refusing to open the judgment.[505]

But it is only in cases of doubt as to the facts of the case, or as to the propriety of allowing the motion, that the discretion of the court comes into play. Where the case is plain and free from all uncertainty, it is not a question of discretion but of legal right. For instance, if absolutely no excuse is offered for the default of the moving party, an order vacating the judgment is not within the discretion of the court.[506] On the other hand, if adequate cause for setting aside the judgment is shown by the uncontradicted evidence or affidavits of the petitioner, the court must grant relief; it has no discretion to refuse;[507] and the petitioner may even have mandamus to compel the court to act, if the judgment or decree cannot be taken up on appeal.[508] In Missouri it is said that "while this court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial court in refusing to vacate and set aside a judgment where there is a conflict of evidence, it will do so when the evidence is all on one side and it is clear that the discretion has been abused."[509] In Wisconsin, the area of the court's discretion appears to be more contracted. It is said that "unless the default of the party is excused and a verified answer tendered showing a defense on the merits," the appellate court will not interfere with a refusal to open the judgment.[510] A court having jurisdiction to set aside a judgment has the right to give any less relief by which justice may be obtained and by which the rights of a party in excusable default may be protected, and the mode of effecting this object is under the control and subject to the discretion of the court.[511] In California the trial court has no power to review its own order setting aside a judgment for want of service of summons, where the order was regularly made after hearing and consideration.[512] According to the practice in some of the states, the refusal of the court below to open a judgment is ground for an appeal, but cannot be brought up on writ of error.[513]

Where the relief sought by a judgment-debtor is not that the judgment should be stricken off or absolutely set aside as being void, but that a default should be opened, so that he may contest the case on the merits, and the application is granted, the proper practice is for the court to include in its order a direction that the party have leave to plead, or that a new trial be granted, or that the case be set down for trial or hearing, according to the situation of the particular case.[514] It is not proper to enjoin the enforcement of the judgment.[515] But where matters arise, in an application to vacate a confessed judgment, which are proper to be submitted to a jury, further proceedings under the judgment may be stayed, and the matters accordingly submitted.[516] Where, after a judgment by default, leave is granted to the defendant to plead, "the judgment to stand," and, on trial of the general issue filed accordingly, plaintiff has a verdict for less than the amount of the original judgment, it is proper to let the judgment stand as of its original date for such reduced amount, rather than to enter it as of the date of the verdict.[517]

If a judgment is absolutely void and a mere nullity, of course it is no protection or justification to any person, and it is immaterial whether it be set aside or not. But if it is voidable only, and not void, it seems clear, as a matter of legal reason, that acts done under it by the plaintiff or others ought not to be invalidated by its subsequent vacation, provided that the reason for setting it aside be not attributable to the plaintiff, but the relief be granted as a matter of grace and favor to the defendant and on account of his mistake or excusable neglect. On the other hand, if the judgment is to be vacated by reason of the fraud or misconduct of the plaintiff, or for any irregularity for which he is actually or constructively to blame, it is equally clear that he should not be permitted to justify under it. And herein there is an important difference between the setting aside of an irregular judgment and the reversal of an erroneous judgment. "Although a void judgment, or one that is voidable for irregularity, will not, after being set aside, justify the acts of the party done under it before it was set aside, this principle has never been applied to a judgment merely erroneous and reversed for error by a court of review. An irregular judgment is called voidable, and when set aside is treated as though void from the beginning; for the party himself is held chargeable with the irregularity; while a judgment pronounced by the court, although upon an erroneous view of the law, and subject therefore to be reversed by an appellate tribunal, is never treated as void, but valid for all purposes of protection to the party acting under it before reversal. The fact that in the one case the party is responsible for the irregularity, and in the other whatever of error there is in the judgment is the error of the court, seems to be the ground of distinction between the two, and it is manifestly a just and proper distinction. While it may well be held that a party is not justified by a judgment which is subsequently set aside for an irregularity in entering it up, it would seem unjust to hold that a judgment duly rendered by the court shall fail to protect a party acting under it before reversal, because reversed for error committed by the court." [518] Under the Pennsylvania practice, as already explained,[519] an order opening a judgment and letting the defendant in to a defense, does not destroy the lien from the date of its original entry.[520] But in some other jurisdictions, the vacation of a judgment, especially at the same term at which it was rendered, leaves the case as if there had been no entry of judgment.[521] A more difficult question concerns the intervening rights of third persons. Some of the cases hold that a judgment by default may be opened on showing of an adequate cause, where the case has not been enrolled, though third parties have purchased in reliance on the judgment.[522] But the prevailing opinion appears to be that the setting aside of a judgment will not affect the title to property which was the subject of the judgment, or is affected by it,

PART I. JURISDICTION OF EQUITY TO ENJOIN THE ENFORCEMENT OF JUDGMENTS.

§ 356. Origin of the Power.

The power and jurisdiction of the courts of equity to enjoin a party from enforcing a judgment which he has obtained, when it would be against conscience to permit him to do so, is at the present day so firmly established, so salutary in its operation, and so thoroughly in accord with the promptings of justice, that it is difficult to realize the stubbornness and bitter jealousy with which the beginnings of its exercise were resisted. That such was the fact, however, is fully certified by the historians. This species of jurisdiction "was one of the first subjects that engaged the attention of the English chancellors, and though violently resisted by common-law lawyers and judges, the power was largely exercised by Cardinal Wolsey in the reign of Henry VIII, and, according to Mr. Reeves, with great ability and justice. It is related of Sir Thomas More, who succeeded Cardinal Wolsey, that having invited the judges to dine with him, he showed them the number and nature of the causes in which he had granted injunctions to judgments of the courts of common law, and the judges, upon full debate of the matter, confessed that they could have done no otherwise themselves. Still, however, clamors against the equity jurisdiction continued until they culminated in the famous controversy in the reign of James I, which was conducted principally by Lord Coke against, and by Lord Ellesmere in favor of, the chancery jurisdiction. The very point of this controversy, according to Judge Story (1 Story's Eq. § 51), was whether a court of equity could give relief from or against a judgment at common law, and it was finally decided in favor of the equity jurisdiction.[1] From that time down to this day the jurisdiction has been exercised in England, and decrees of ecclesiastical courts have often been relieved against on the ground of fraud;[2] and so in like manner have awards,[3] and verdicts,[4] and judgments at law.[5] And even decrees in chancery may be avoided for the same cause."[6] Nor have the improvements of the law or the changes in judicial organization superseded this power of equity or obviated the necessity of its occasional exercise.[7] A recent decision of the supreme court of the United States declares that the appropriate remedy to set aside or enjoin the execution of judgments at law wrongfully obtained is by bill in equity.[8] But this jurisdiction, though unquestioned, is one which, from the pressure of hardship, always an element in these cases, is liable to abuse; and the abuse of it, say the courts, is extremely mischievous, tending as it does to conflict between jurisdictions and to the promotion of needless litigation.[9] Hence "bills seeking relief from final judgments, solemnly rendered in the due and ordinary course of administration of justice by courts of competent jurisdiction, are always watched by courts of equity with extreme jealousy, and the grounds upon which interference will be allowed are, confessedly, narrow and restricted."[10]

§ 357. Nature of Relief granted.

The action of a court of equity in giving relief against a judgment at law is almost always indirect. Courts of chancery, it must be remembered, do not claim to exercise any supervisory power over the courts of law, or their proceedings. Judgments are not reversed or vacated in equity. Adjudications at law are not overhauled or re-examined. It is to the party himself that the energies of the court of equity are directed, and its remedial power is exercised by putting restraint upon his usual liberty of following up his judgment by the appropriate process for its collection. Equity therefore acts on the person, not the proceeding; and while it will enjoin the enforcement of a judgment, in proper cases, it will not interfere with the judgment itself.[11] Some of the cases hold that a court of equity cannot set aside the judgment of a law court and award a new trial. And indeed this is rarely done, if ever, in express terms; but the same end is effected by decreeing that unless the party consents to have the judgment set aside and a new trial had, he shall be perpetually enjoined from collecting his judgment.[12] But cases sometimes arise where the right to move for a new trial at law was lost, or an application was refused, in consequence of some of the circumstances which equity always regards as sufficient warrant for its interference. In such instances, the complainant being in no fault, it is generally considered to be within the power of equity to grant a new trial.[13] Thus relief of this character may be granted where the judgment is against conscience, and the applicant had no opportunity to make defense, or was prevented from defending by accident, or the fraud or improper management of the adverse party, and without fault on his own part.[14] There is much learning in the books on this point, but it is merely collateral to our present subject and belongs more properly to a treatise on equity. A few words must be added as to the measure of the relief granted. It should always be adjusted to the exigencies of the particular case. If it is claimed that the judgment at law is excessive,—either because of the fraud or unfair dealing of the other party, or in consequence of a mistake or miscalculation,—that is no ground for enjoining the whole judgment. The creditor should merely be prohibited from proceeding to collect the excess.[15] So where the execution of a judgment has been enjoined, and the defendant, upon being interrogated, admits a partial payment of such judgment, the injunction should be perpetuated for the amount admitted to have been paid, and dissolved as to the remainder still due.[16]

§ 358. What Adjudications subject to the Power.

Generally speaking, all judgments rendered or purporting to be rendered by courts of law are subject to the equitable power here considered. As to the particular case of a judgment that is absolutely void, however, the authorities do not agree. Some of the decisions hold that the defendant in a judgment cannot have equitable relief against it because it is either erroneous or void, since, if void, it may be disregarded or may be set aside on motion, and if erroneous it may be revised on appeal.[17] There is much to be said in favor of this view, especially in contemplation of the known reluctance of equity to interfere if any adequate remedy offers itself at law. If the judgment is merely void, a sale under it would be a nullity. The purchaser would take no title, and the officer would be liable as a trespasser. Still, in some of the states, a bill for an injunction is considered the appropriate method for obtaining relief even against a void judgment, and this practice has become fully established by the rulings of the courts.[18] An injunction will lie to prevent the collection of a judgment which has been vacated or set aside by the court which rendered it.[19] And an execution issued on a judgment the record of which has been destroyed, there being no renewal by substitution, will be enjoined.[20] But in the case of a judgment on a promissory note which was given solely for the purpose of testing, by a collusive action, whether the maker had any title in property held in trust for his wife, the chancery court refused to interfere, because the whole proceeding was "an abuse of legal process and a fraud on the law."[21] A judgment by scire facias is of the same force as any other, and while it may be enjoined in a proper case, the defendant is not entitled to any greater indulgence, in respect to his own neglect or omission, than in any other case.[22] It is also held that a court has power to enjoin the collection of a judgment which it had power to render, although, by reason of the accrued interest and costs, the amount exceeds the limit of original jurisdiction.[23] As a general rule, equity will not re-examine and readjust settlements which have been made by compromise judgments in courts of law having jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Yet a compromise judgment, if obtained by fraud, accident, or mistake, may be relieved against by injunction.[24] There is also undoubted jurisdiction in equity to set aside an award, if good and equitable reasons are presented for such action.[25] But a bill will not lie to vacate an award on the ground of mistake on the part of the arbitrators or failure to determine all the matters submitted; for these matters may be pleaded in defense to an action at law on the award.[26] Where, under a code practice, decrees are to be enforced by execution in the same manner as judgments at law, an injunction may be granted, if otherwise proper, to restrain the execution of a decree.[27] The fact that a judgment has been affirmed on appeal does not exempt it from liability to attack by an original bill in equity for fraud, perjury, or mistake.[28] But equity will not interfere to set aside an interlocutory decree in a cause then pending in another court.[29]

§ 359. What Parties may Apply.

As a rule, relief in equity against a judgment at law is given only to the parties to the action,[30] or their privies,[31] or those whose rights are directly affected by the judgment. Thus, one who has purchased land subject to the lien of a judgment cannot go into equity to enjoin the judgment, his grantor making no objection to it, unless he can show that it was founded in fraud and expressly designed to injure him in his rights as a purchaser.[32] So an execution in ejectment will not be restrained at the instance of a stranger holding a paramount title, for if his title is good the judgment does not affect him.[33] Nor will an injunction be granted to restrain execution-creditors from proceeding to sell the property of their debtor, on the ground that certain claims to the property have been interposed, casting a cloud upon the title, and rendering it probable that the property will bring less than its value, to the injury of other creditors of the same debtor, the debtor being insolvent.[34] A stranger to an execution, whose goods have been levied on under it, cannot have an injunction on the ground that the judgment was erroneous; for he has a good remedy at law.[35] But on the other hand, it has been held that where a judgment-creditor may collect from property that his debtor has not conveyed, but refuses or fails to do so, he may be enjoined from proceeding against the debtor's grantee.[36] It is certainly clear that a third person may maintain an action to enjoin perpetually the enforcement of a judgment which was procured through fraud and for the purpose of defrauding him.[37] And in some states it has been held that where a judgment is entered by confession without action, unless the statute authorizing such entry has been substantially complied with, the enforcement of the judgment may be enjoined, upon principles of equity, at the suit of a third party prejudiced thereby.[38] If the applicant is in privity of interest or estate with the defendant, he is of course not regarded as a stranger to the action, and his right to interfere is more easily established. Thus, where a suit was brought in Massachusetts against a corporation on a judgment rendered in New York, and no defense had been made by the company in the latter state, a temporary injunction was granted restraining the suit on a bill filed by an individual stockholder.[39] So the receiver of a national bank, though not a party to a suit against the bank in a state court, may appear in that court and contest the validity of the judgment.[40] The same rule applies to a holder of bonds of a corporation, the value of which is impaired by a collusive decree, to which he was not a party, establishing other claims against the corporation as liens upon its property superior to the lien of its bonds.[41] So also, the beneficiaries of a trust estate may maintain a bill to enjoin a fraudulent judgment against their trustee, to which they were not parties.[42] And the same principle applies as between a principal and guarantor, or principal and surety.[43] A judgment at law against two defendants may be annulled by a decree of a court of chancery as to one and remain binding as to the other.[44] But if the bill is filed by one defendant alone, the other should be made a party to the action, unless sufficient reasons for the omission be stated.[45] And where a separate judgment is rendered against each of two joint wrong-doers, neither judgment can be perpetually enjoined while both remain in force and unsatisfied, although one of such judgments has been assigned by the holder to a third person.[46] Since the sovereign is beyond the reach of any prohibitory process, it follows that an injunction cannot be issued to restrain the United States from collecting a judgment in its favor.[47]

§ 360. What Courts Exercise the Power.

The enjoining of a judgment at law is a purely equitable remedy. But it is not necessary for its exercise that the tribunal should be distinctively and individually organized as a chancery court. This power is habitually brought into play in those states where, for want of separate equity courts, the law courts apply equitable remedies.

And even under the codes, where law and equity are fused, equitable jurisdiction, equitable proceedings, and equitable remedies are not abolished, although metamorphosed as to their external appearance. Questions as to the power to enjoin judgments most commonly arise between co-ordinate courts. In several of the states it is held that one court has no jurisdiction of an action to enjoin or annul the judgment of another court of concurrent jurisdiction, or of a court of co-ordinate rank in another district or division of the same state.[48] And in some, this rule is established by statute.[49] But in others, it is thought that any court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter may issue its injunction to restrain the enforcement of a judgment, in a proper case, as where the judgment has been paid or satisfied, or was procured by fraud and conspiracy, though it was rendered by a court of concurrent or equal jurisdiction.[50] Thus, in Tennessee, it is held that one chancery court may enjoin the execution of a judgment wrongfully taken in another chancery court.[51] In the exercise of its jurisdiction over the parties, a court may enjoin the enforcement of a judgment rendered in another state,[52] and an execution issued upon a judgment of the supreme court of a state may be enjoined by the district court of the county in which it is sought to be enforced.[53] Also, chancery has jurisdiction to cancel, and enjoin the enforcement of, a void judgment rendered by a justice of the peace.[54]

The federal courts are prohibited by statute from granting writs of injunction to stay proceedings in any of the state courts, and this prevents them from enjoining the enforcement of a judgment recovered in a state court.[55] But a federal circuit court, where the requisite diversity of citizenship exists, and the amount in controversy is sufficient, has jurisdiction to entertain a suit and enter a decree which, as between the parties, shall set aside, annul, and vacate a judgment of a state court, and the proceedings taken and rights acquired thereunder, on the ground that such judgment was procured by fraud or was void for want of jurisdiction.[56] A state court has no power or jurisdiction to restrain an action in any of the federal courts, nor to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment rendered by a court of the United States, though its injunction may be directed in personam against the parties entitled to the benefit of the decree or judgment.[57]

§ 361. Concurrent Remedies.

Embarrassing questions sometimes arise as to the right and power of equity to interfere by injunction against a judgment while the party has a concurrent and equally efficacious remedy by application to the court which rendered the judgment, or by appeal to a higher court. The general rule, however, as established by the best authorities, is that the party seeking relief must have exhausted all his resources at law, for equity will not grant an injunction where there is an adequate remedy at law.[58] Nor will the court grant an injunction to stay proceedings in another court having the same power to grant relief.[59] But the remedy at law, though adequate to the case, may have been lost through circumstances not attributable to the neglect or fault of the party seeking relief. In such instances, all question as to the right of equity to lend its aid is at once removed. Thus, where there are statutes authorizing the law courts to grant relief from their judgments in certain cases, this will not preclude a party, in a proper case, from obtaining relief in equity after the time limited for applying for relief under those statutes has elapsed, provided sufficient reasons are shown for not having made such application in time.[60] If, for example, the judgment was fraudulently and secretly entered up, and the defendant had no notice or knowledge of its existence until after the expiration of the time within which he might have moved the law court to vacate it, it is a case for equitable interference, merits being shown.[61]

§ 362. Same; Relief on Motion.

The liberal practice of the courts in granting new trials and entertaining motions to vacate or open their own judgments, and the enactment of statutes in many of the states authorizing the setting aside of judgments taken against a defendant "through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," have considerably abridged the province of equity in giving relief by injunction. And the rule is generally adhered to, as the more safe and conservative principle, that equity will not grant relief against an execution if the party can equally well be relieved, on motion to open, vacate, or modify the judgment, or to stay or quash the execution, in the court which issued the execution or has control of it.[62] It is true that some cases maintain a different view, holding that although the judgment might be vacated or set aside on motion, and although the time for so moving has not yet expired, still equity may enjoin the enforcement of the judgment.[63] But in so holding they depart from the fundamental principles of equity and are not to be commended. If the time limited by law for seeking relief in the law court has already expired, without the neglect or fault of the party, that, as stated in the preceding section, is a different matter, and the right of equity to interfere is unquestioned.[64] It has been held that the summary refusal of a motion for a new trial or for the vacation of the judgment will not prevent the party from coming into equity with a bill for an injunction, based on the same grounds.[65] But the weight of authority is against this proposition. The best cases hold that equity will refuse to act by injunction when the grounds alleged have already been considered and held insufficient on a motion at law; in such case the whole matter is res judicata and equity will not re-open it.[66] To show the disposition of the chancery courts in this regard, we cite the case of Dalhoff v. Keenan,[67] where it appeared that the party had filed his petition for a new trial in the law court within the time prescribed by the code, alleging that the judgment was fraudulent, but this petition was dismissed because a necessary witness was absent and because the other party promised that he would make "a fair offer of compromise," and afterwards the complainant brought an action in equity to set aside the judgment and for a new trial of the issues. But it was held that the action in equity was properly dismissed, because the complainant had an adequate and speedy remedy at law, which he had begun to pursue but had improvidently abandoned.

§ 363. Same; Appeal, Error, or Certiorari.

In pursuance of the same general principle, the party must have exhausted his possible remedies by appeal, writ of error, or certiorari, before equity will hear him. If, by failing to appeal, or by prosecuting an appeal in a defective or insufficient mode, he loses his remedy at law, he cannot proceed in equity by injunction, unless new and sufficient equities be alleged.[68] Nor will a judgment be enjoined

when the complainant has neglected to except to it as he might have done.[69] So a judgment which is not appealed from, and which directs a forced sale of articles for its satisfaction which are by law exempt from forced sale, is not a nullity, however erroneous; and when no means have been used to correct the error by appeal, the conclusive force of the judgment cannot be evaded by a resort to injunction.[70] Nor is the death of a party before judgment sufficient ground for an injunction; the proper remedy is by error coram nobis.[71] If the right of appeal has been lost by lapse of time, the party seeking the aid of equity must be able to show that such loss was not the result of his own negligence, default, or indifference.[72] If he has been deprived of his opportunity to appeal by the fraud or deceit of the adverse party, or by a trick played upon him, this will furnish a stronger ground for equity to interfere, but it must also appear that the complainant has no adequate remedy at law.[73] Where the right of appeal has been cut off by the death or resignation of the trial judge before signing the bill of exceptions, equity

The fact that petitioner relied on a promise of the trial judge to inform him of his decision in time to enable petitioner to file a bill of exceptions for the purpose of appeal, and that the judge forgot to do so, is not sufficient ground for equity to set aside the judgment, for it shows that the petitioner was not free from default and neglect. Donaldson v. Roberts, 109 Ga. 832, 35 S. E. 277.

[73] In case of a default judgment, the mere fact that plaintiff did not notify defendant of the entry of judgment, and did not sue out execution until after the lapse of a year, in order that defendant might not petition for a writ of review, is not such fraud as will entitle defendant to restrain the enforcement of the judgment. Trustees of Amherst College v. Allen, 165 Mass. 178, 42 N. E. 570. So, where the successful party wrongfully obtained possession of a case made for appeal by the defeated party, and withheld it until the time for appeal had passed, it was held to be no ground to enjoin the judgment. may enjoin the enforcement of the judgment, if it is shown to be unjust and oppressive, and if the applicant for relief has not been guilty of any want of due diligence.[74] And if a meritorious bill of exceptions is dismissed because of a mistake made by the certifying judge, without the fault of counsel, an injunction may be granted against the judgment until the matters set up in the dismissed bill of exceptions can be heard.[75] But it is held that enforcement of a judgment should not be enjoined merely because the trial judge wrongfully refused to allow an appeal, or to sign the bill of exceptions, or to approve the bond offered for appeal; for in such cases there is an adequate remedy by mandamus.[76] On the other hand, equity may relieve against a judgment from which no appeal could be taken because the amount in controversy was too small, and will do so where a meritorious case for its interference is made out.[77] And so where the attempt to appeal was frustrated by the destruction of the records by fire, provided the complainant has been in no fault.[78]

In Illinois, it was at one time held that relief might be obtained against a judgment on the ground of fraud, though the party might have a remedy at law; and that, even if he had notice of the judgment in time to appeal, and made an abortive attempt to do so, this would not prevent him from applying to equity for an injunction.[79] But later decisions hold that, if a judgment is not the result of the negligence of the person against whom it is rendered, it is unjust; and if he cannot appeal from it, he may sue out a writ of certiorari, and have a new trial; and therefore he cannot sue to enjoin its collection.[80]

§ 364. Same; Cross-Actions and Actions over.

In a number of instances courts of equity have refused to enjoin the collection of a judgment (unjust and inequitable though it might be), where the party had an adequate and available remedy at law by a cross-action, as for breach of warranty of the property for the price of which the suit was brought.[81] So where the defendant was prevented by unavoidable accident from setting up offsets to the plaintiff's demand, which were not connected with the claim sued on and may be enforced at law, he is not entitled to enjoin the judgment and interpose his counterclaims against it, but must pursue his remedy at law.[82] The availability of the legal remedy being the test, it would seem that the existence of a counterclaim, capable of being used as an independent cause of action, should be no bar to equitable relief, if it could not be enforced against the plaintiff in consequence of his being a non-resident and keeping beyond the jurisdiction. But the courts hold otherwise. On this state of facts an injunction has been refused.[83] On the same principle, equity will not interfere to give relief where the judgment debtor is in such a position that he may make himself whole, immediately upon paying the judgment, by a suit at law against a person who is responsible over to him for the loss or damage he may suffer.[84] Thus, injunction will not issue to restrain the execution of a void judgment, when replevin against the officer would furnish a full and adequate remedy.[85] But in some states it is held that a cause of action by a judgment defendant against the officer who falsely returned a service on defendant is not an adequate remedy at law, such as to prevent equity from enjoining the enforcement of the judgment as obtained by the fraud of the officer.[86]

PART II. GROUNDS FOR ENJOINING JUDGMENTS.

§ 365. General Grounds for Equitable Relief.

There are two reasons why equity is slow to interfere with the operation of judgments recovered in a court of law. In the first place, it is sensitive to the imputation of seeking to usurp a species of appellate jurisdiction and so to extend its power over all other courts. And secondly, a judgment on the merits ought to be forever conclusive between the parties, no re-examination should be allowed, and it is neither the function nor the ambition of equity to overhaul judgments at law. Hence, in applying to equity for relief, it is necessary that something more than a merely erroneous or irregular judgment should be shown.[87] Some of the elements which universally afford an attaching-point for the equitable jurisdiction must be present, making it unconscientious for the successful party to enforce his judgment as it stands. Thus, if the defense was one which could not be interposed at law, equity will relieve, because the party has not had a fair trial. So if he was ignorant of his defense, and guilty of no laches in failing to discover it; or was prevented from setting it up by fraud or accident, or the act of his adversary, without any negligence or fault on his own part. The object of an injunction to stay proceedings at law is to prevent the party against whom it issues from availing himself of an unfair advantage, resulting from fraud, accident, mistake, or otherwise, and which would therefore be against conscience.[88] Hence equity cannot relieve against the operation of a judgment at law simply on account of its hardship.[89] It must first of all appear that it would be unjust and against conscience to enforce the judgment.[90] Then it must be shown that if a new and fair examination of the merits be had, the result will be other than that already reached.[91] There must be a meritorious defense. No matter what circumstances of fraud or irregularity may have attended the entry of the judgment, if it appears that no defense was made because no valid defense existed, and that the instrument in suit was given for a valid and valuable consideration, an injunction will be refused.[92] Nor will equity interfere unless it shall also be shown that the party has used due diligence and exhausted every means of defending the case or obtaining redress at law.[93] But on the other hand, where a proper case for relief by injunction is made out, the fact that the judgment-creditor is of undoubted solvency and able to refund the money which may be collected on the execution, will not prevent such equitable intervention.[94]

§ 366. General Rule stated.

The leading case in America upon the subject of equitable relief against judgments at law, is that of Marine Insurance Co. v. Hodgson.[95] In that case Chief Justice Marshall specified the grounds for the interference of equity in the following terms: "Without attempting to draw any precise line to which courts of equity will advance, and which they cannot pass, in restraining parties from availing themselves of judgments obtained at law, it may safely be said that any fact which clearly proves it to be against conscience to execute a judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself in a court of law, or of which he might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or his agents, will justify an application to a court of chancery." And the principles here set forth, though perhaps somewhat extended by more recent decisions, have been adopted without question, as a general statement of the rule, in all our courts.[96] "When a party goes into chancery after a trial at law," says a learned judge in New York, "he must be able to impeach the justice and equity of the verdict, and it must be upon grounds which either could not be made available to him at law, or which he was prevented from setting up by fraud, accident, or the wrongful act of the other party, without any negligence or other fault on his part."[97] "A court of equity does not interfere with judgments at law unless the complainant has an equitable defense, of which he could not avail himself at law because it did not amount to a legal defense, or had a good defense at law, which he was prevented from availing himself of by fraud or accident, unmixed with negligence of himself or his agents."[98] So speak all the authorities.

§ 367. Errors and Irregularities.

The doctrine is fully established that a court of equity will not, on the application of the defendant in a judgment at law, who has had a fair opportunity to be heard upon a defense over which the court pronouncing the judgment had full jurisdiction, set aside the judgment or enjoin its enforcement simply on the ground that it was unjust, irregular, or erroneous, or because the equity court would, in deciding the same case, have come to a different conclusion.[99] A good illustration of this rule is furnished by the decision in a case where the defendant at law, after losing his case by reason of a suggestion of the court that his remedy was in chancery and not at law, applied for relief in equity. It was said: "If the party chose to believe in the opinion of the court, it must be at his own hazard, and it now seems to me to be no good ground for relief in equity that the court or his counsel gave him bad advice; he should have excepted to the opinion of the court in refusing to continue, and if on examination this should be found to be error, then he would have had relief; but having failed to do so furnishes no more ground for relief than he would have been entitled to if the court had committed any other error, and he had submitted to it till it was too late to redress it." [100] To take another illustration,—where a judgment was rendered according to a particular construction of a statute, and, after a writ of error thereon was barred by the statute of limitations, the supreme court gave a different construction to the statute in another case, it was held that equity would not interfere to open the judgment.[101] Again, that a debt was divided and suits brought on each portion in a justice's court which would have no jurisdiction over one suit for the whole amount, is no reason for enjoining the judgment in one suit, unless it also appears that by means of the division the defendant was deprived of some right or remedy, and that he had not consented to the division.[102] It is well settled that no injunction can be had against a judgment merely on account of a defect or insufficiency of the evidence, or because the rules of evidence were violated on the trial.[103] Nor can a court of equity set aside a judgment, rendered by a court which had jurisdiction, on the ground that it was not warranted by the pleadings,[104] nor because there was no finding of fact to support the judgment,[105] nor for any irregularities as to the service of the summons, the judgment not being shown to be unjust.[106] So, an illegal allowance in a judgment, or an error in the calculation of interest, is no ground for an injunction.[107] But where, through fraud, accident, or mistake, a judgment has been entered for an amount, or in terms, not as intended, equity will give relief, on clear and satisfying proof.[108] Or, as differently stated, equity will relieve in cases of mistakes in judgments, decrees, or other matters of record, when the mistake is not judicial and there are no other means of obtaining redress.[109] Thus, where the defendant agreed that the justice before whom the case was pending should enter a conditional judgment against him, and the justice entered an absolute judgment by confession, it was considered that equity might relieve.[110] So where a judgment was entered against a sheriff, under a mistake of the clerk in supposing a bail-piece to be insufficient, when the counsel had agreed that it might be filed, relief was granted against the judgment.[111]

Fraud has always been reckoned among the special abhorrences of equity, and fraud is one of the grounds upon which application is most frequently made to equity for relief or redress. It is well settled that equity will enjoin a party from enforcing a judgment which he has obtained by means of fraud.[112] "Fraud will vitiate a judgment, and a court of equity may declare it a nullity. Equity has so great an abhorrence of fraud that it will set aside its own decrees if founded thereupon." [113] The rule is concisely stated by the chancery court in New Jersey in the following language: "The court will grant relief against a judgment which is against conscience, which was obtained by fraud or in any other way by which injustice has been done, and where the injured party has had no opportunity for defense, or could not make it through any defect of the law, and where adequate relief cannot be afforded by the court where such judgment is obtained, and timely application for relief is made to this court." [114] A bill will lie to vacate a judgment for fraud, even although it has already been made the foundation in another state of a suit in which the defendant's property in that state has been attached.[115] So, the fact that one is solvent is no ground for refusing to enjoin proceedings on a judgment which he has obtained by fraud.[116] On the other hand, a judgment cannot be impeached in equity on the ground of fraud practised by the successful party, where it appears that the fraud, if attempted, was unsuccessful.[117] And equity will not interfere on the ground of fraud unless the fraud is clearly stated and proved.[118] And allegations that the judgment was obtained "through fraud and other ill practices" are too vague and general.[119]

And further, in order to obtain equitable relief against a judgment on the ground of fraud, it is necessary to be alleged and shown that there is a good defense on the merits.[120] Or, as otherwise stated, it must be made clearly to appear that the judgment has no other foundation than the fraud charged, and that if there had been no fraud there would have been no judgment.[121] Thus equity will not relieve against a judgment alleged to have been obtained by fraud, where the relief asked for is merely a reduction of the damages.[122] It has been adjudged a good ground for the intervention of equity that the judgment, fairly and regularly rendered, has afterwards been fraudulently altered so as to increase the amount for which it stands,[123] or so as to include a person not originally named in it nor made a party to the action.[124] Aside from the cases just instanced, it is evident that the fraud on which the application to equity is based may be of three different characters, or arise in three several ways. First, there may have been fraud in the instrument or transaction on which the judgment at law is founded. This, since it constitutes a good defense to the suit at law, must be set up then and there. If the defendant was ignorant of it, or had no opportunity to plead it, or was prevented from setting it up by the artifice or fraud of his adversary, it may be available on a subsequent application to chancery. But otherwise it furnishes no ground for equitable interference.[125] Secondly, whatever was the character of the defense, supposing it to be good and meritorious, the successful party may have practised fraud or trickery in such wise as to prevent the other from bringing it before the court. Here equity will relieve, if the applicant himself was guilty of no negligence or fault. And thirdly, the fraud charged may have been practised in the act of procuring the judgment to be entered, or in taking judgment in violation of an agreement to the contrary. This also is sufficient ground for the interference of equity. These propositions will be elaborated in the next succeeding sections.

Where a party, having a good defense to an action commenced against him at law, is prevented, by the fraud or fraudulent representations of the plaintiff or his attorney, from setting up that defense, and a judgment is obtained against him, without any negligence or fault on his part, it is a proper case in equity for relief against the judgment.[126] As remarked by a learned judge, "a decree or judgment receives its force from the fact that it is the decision of a competent tribunal, before which both the parties have had an opportunity of appearing and prosecuting their claims and having them fairly adjudicated. When this is prevented by the fraud or circumvention of one of the parties, without the fault or negligence of the other, the decree or judgment of the court ceases to have its binding effect, and it is competent for the party injured to resort to a court of chancery to obtain relief." [127] Thus, in one case, a perpetual injunction was granted, in order to stay proceedings on a judgment at law obtained in a suit instituted in the name of a person not interested, whose name was used only for the purpose of preventing a defense which the defendant had against the real plaintiff in interest.[128] So, equity will relieve where, in ex parte proceedings in foreign attachment, advantage, after being waited for, has been deliberately taken of a complainant's absence to obtain, without his knowledge, a judgment upon a claim to which he has a sufficient defense either at law or in equity, and to sell his land for an inadequate price to the plaintiff in the attachment suit.[129] It is to be observed that the rule that a judgment silences all defenses which might have been urged against its rendition cannot be invoked in an action to enjoin its execution for fraud, when the fraud alleged consists in acts of the party which prevented his adversary from setting up his defenses.[130] At the same time, a party to an action at law must not be too credulous, nor rely too easily upon mere suggestions or representations made to him by his adversary. Though the conduct of his opponent may have been tricky or evasive, it is his own duty to be careful and vigilant, and he cannot obtain relief in equity, on this ground, unless he shows that he is free from the charge of negligence or lack of due attention to his case.[131]

While it is true that equity will not generally listen to an impeachment of a judgment on the ground of fraud, when the fraud alleged was antecedent to the judgment and was or might have been litigated in the action at law, yet fraud practised in the very matter of obtaining the judgment is regarded as perpetrated upon the court as well as upon the injured party, and a judgment so procured may be enjoined.[132] The rule has been thus stated: "The question of fraud which is open to examination in such case is as to something which intervened in the proceedings by which the judgment was obtained, and it must have occurred in the very concoction or procuring of the judgment, and not have been known to the opposite party at the time, and for not knowing which he is not chargeable with neglect or inattention. The fraud must consist in something of which the complaining party could not have availed himself in the court giving the judgment, or of which he was prevented from availing himself there by fraud." [133] Or, as otherwise stated, the fraud alleged must be extrinsic or collateral to the matters involved in the issues or the trial at law.[134] Where, as in some of the states, the statutes authorize the courts to vacate their own judgments for "fraud" practised by the successful party in obtaining them, it is held that the word "fraud" is used in its common and direct sense; it means fraud in fact, not fraud in law, and embraces only intentional wrong.[135] The fraud which will justify a court of equity in thus interfering may assume various shapes. It may consist in deceit and imposition practised upon the court, as a means of obtaining a judgment which

A default judgment recovered by means of false statements in respect to a fact essential to the right of recovery, which deceived both the defendant and the court, cannot be set aside by a suit in equity, as this is not a collateral or extrinsic fraud. Ritchie v. McMullen, 25 C. C. A. 50, 79 Fed. 522. Equity cannot set aside an adjudication at law determining and locating the quantity of lands required for a public use merely because the parties who brought about the adjudication had a fraudulent or illegal intent; but it must appear that the court itself proceeded fraudulently, or in excess of its powers, or that it committed a gross mistake, or was imposed upon by fraudulent methods. Coe v. Aiken (C. C.) 61 Fed. 24. But it has been said that the rule that fraud for which equity will vacate a judgment must be fraud in procuring the judgment, is not to be applied in all its strictness to a judgment based on service by publication against one who had no actual notice; but relief will be given in such case on proof that the judgment was entered on a cause of action known to be without foundation. never ought to have been rendered,[136] or in the act of the successful party in illegally tampering with the jury,[137] or in his wrongful conduct in obtaining a judgment and a sale of defendant's property by a surreptitious use of legal process and proceedings,[138] or in collusion. Thus, collusion between the plaintiff and the judge or justice who rendered the judgment will be ground for enjoining its execution.[139] So a judgment against an estate may be enjoined when it is shown to have been obtained by means of collusion between the executor or administrator and the alleged creditor or claimant.[140] And the same is true of a judgment against a corporation recovered by collusion between its president and the plaintiff.[141] Again, one not a party to an account, who causes an action to be begun thereon for his own benefit, but ostensibly for the plaintiff, by whom all interest in the action and in the judgment is disclaimed, should be enjoined from enforcing the judgment.[142] Where a claim on which an action had been brought was settled before the term of the court began, and the plaintiff wrongfully entered the action and took judgment, the

But a court of equity will not set aside a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, on the ground of fraud, because of false statements made by the defendants to the court as to their financial condition, by which the court was induced to render, and the plaintiff to accept, a judgment for less than the amount actually due. United States v. Beebe, 34 C. C. A. 321, 92 Fed. 244. So, an independent suit cannot be maintained in equity to set aside a decree allotting a homestead to the widow of a decedent, on the ground that, in procuring such decree, she misrepresented to the court the facts as to the property. Hanley v. Hanley, 114 Cal. 690, 46 Pac. 736. Again, proof that evidence which would go to prevent the recovery of a judgment was collusively withheld from the court is not alone sufficient to establish fraud or imposition; it must also appear that the judgment was in fact unjust. court in equity granted an injunction against the execution.[143] So where a written agreement was made, on the understanding that payment might be made in money, or in property at a valuation by two honest men, and that this understanding should be indorsed upon the agreement, which the party afterwards refused to do, but took judgment on the contract, it was held that chancery would consider the indorsement as made and would enjoin the judgment.[144] But in order to obtain this relief it is essential that the complainant himself should be entirely free from any fraud or improper conduct. Thus a party against whom a judgment has been entered on a bond cannot obtain relief in equity, against such judgment, on the ground that he was acting as the agent of the judgment plaintiff in the sale of territory in which to sell a patented article, and that such bond was only a sham, by which to induce others to purchase patent rights, and was never to be enforced against him.[145]

§ 371. Deceit and Concealment.

Where a judgment at law has been procured by artifice or concealment on the part of the plaintiff, and the court where the fraud has been perpetrated is not able to afford adequate relief, a court of equity will take hold of the party who has committed the fraud and will prevent his using the judgment to the injury of his adversary.[146]

Long v. Gilbert (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 414. A compromise judgment will not be set aside on the ground of fraud, because of representations by the defendants that they were without property, and that nothing could be realized by execution against them, when no representations are made with respect to the merits of the cause of action, and especially where the complaint itself is based upon the fact of their insolvency. Thus a vendee of land may come into equity to enjoin a judgment at law on the notes given for purchase-money, upon alleging the vendor's fraudulent representations of title in himself, a breach of his warranty of title, and the insolvency of his estate.[147] So on account of a deficiency in the quantity of the land sold, which would entitle the vendee to a diminution of the price.[148] So on account of a representation that the property was free from charges, when in fact it was incumbered by liens for more than its value.[149] In a case where the sureties on a replevin-bond alleged that they had been induced, while in a state of intoxication, to sign a blank paper, upon which the bond was afterwards written in, it was held that equity would not relieve them unless it were shown that an unfair advantage had been taken of their condition to their detriment.[150] But equity will relieve against a judgment entered on an agreement to which one defendant's name was forged, although the co-defendant who forged it was the only culpable party, the judgment being entered under a mistake of fact.[151]

Whether relief will be granted in equity on the ground that the judgment was procured by the perjury of the plaintiff or a witness, is disputed. There are some English and American cases holding that such action is proper, where adequate redress cannot be had at law, and where the proof to convict the perjured witness could not be obtained in time to be used on the trial.[152] And in at least one state

(Minnesota) the statutes authorize a suit to be brought to set aside a judgment obtained by the fraud or perjury of the prevailing party.[153] In some other jurisdictions, it is thought that if a party to a suit intentionally procures and produces false testimony, suborning his witnesses to perjury and conspiring with them to secure a judgment, this amounts to such fraud as will enable the adverse party, if defeated in the suit, to secure an injunction against the judgment.[154] But this doctrine is denied in other states,[155] and indeed the general current of authority is now in favor of the rule that perjury committed by the successful party or his witnesses at the trial is no sufficient ground for vacating the judgment or enjoining its enforcement.[156]

§ 373. Taking Judgment contrary to Agreement.

If the plaintiff or his attorney makes promises or representations to the defendant, to the effect that the suit will not be pressed, or brought to trial, or will be dismissed, or that credits will be allowed, or that no recovery will be sought against him, or any other similar matter, to induce him to refrain from defending the case, and if the latter, honestly relying upon the understanding thus established, omits to present his defense, notwithstanding which the plaintiff fraudulently and in violation of the agreement proceeds to take a judgment, equity will grant relief by injunction.[157] So where a judgment is fraudulently taken by default in violation of an agreement for a compromise, the interposition of a defense being thus prevented, its enforcement will be restrained, and titles acquired under it (with notice) will be voidable in equity.[158] So equity will relieve against a judgment obtained by inducing the defendant to withdraw an equitable plea filed in the case, by a promise of the plaintiff, that if such plea were withdrawn he would do the equity set up in the plea, which he failed to do.[159] In another case, where the maker of a promissory note held a receipt, acknowledging payment thereof, from the indorsee, who sued upon the note, representing to the maker that he did not intend to enforce its collection against him, but against the payee, and judgment was accordingly rendered by default, it was held that an injunction should be granted perpetually restraining the collection of the judgment from the maker.[160] Where a defendant suffers judgment to be taken against him in consideration of an agreement on the plaintiff's part that no money need be paid on it except upon the happening of a certain event, the plaintiff will not be permitted to exact payment in violation of the agreement.[161] So where the liability of the principal had been fixed and discharged, and the surety had been lulled into security by the delusive promises of his creditor and had been the victim of artifice and circumvention, and the judgment against him was obtained in contempt of an injunction, and the assertion of any right under it would be fraudulent, it was considered a proper case for the intervention of equity.[162] In order to induce a court of equity to declare a judgment confessed for a certain amount to be merely collateral security for whatever sum might be found due from defendant to plaintiff, the court must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that such was the agreement of the parties, but upon being so satisfied it will enjoin the enforcement of the judgment, on the ground that to enforce it would be a fraud on the defendant.[163] A judgment recovered before a justice for an unjust amount, after an executed agreement of settlement, relied on by the defendant, but invalid because made on Sunday, will be enjoined in equity.[164]

§ 374. Unauthorized Appearance of Attorney.

It was the rule of the early English law that where a regular attorney of the court appeared and answered for the defendant in a suit at law, a judgment recovered by the plaintiff would not be vacated, nor execution enjoined by a court of equity, though the attorney appeared without authority from the defendant, unless it were shown that the attorney was not of sufficient ability to answer for the damages caused by his unauthorized act, or there had been collusion between him and the plaintiff. And this view was at one time generally favored by the American courts, and even now it still retains its force in some few jurisdictions.[165] But in the progressive development of the law, this harsh and inequitable rule has fallen into desuetude. It has been abandoned by the English courts.[166] And in this country, almost universally, it is now held that equity may enjoin the collection of a judgment, unjust in itself, which was procured upon the appearance of an attorney without authority, without any regard to the question of the latter's solvency and ability to respond in damages.[167] But the complainant must make it appear that the judgment is inequitable in itself, by reason of some fraud or trick or collusion, or that the result would or might have been different if there had been a full and fair trial upon the merits.[168] If an attorney, assuming without authority to act for a plaintiff, brings a suit and loses it, the defendant recovering a judgment for costs, equity will restrain the enforcement of such judgment in the same circumstances which would induce it to relieve the defendant in the converse case.[169]

§ 375. Negligence or Mistake of Counsel.

It is well settled that equity will not relieve against a judgment at law on account of any ignorance, unskilfullness, or mistake of the party's attorney (unless caused by the opposite party), nor for counsel's negligence or inattention.[170] The fault is in such cases attributed to the party himself. Thus the neglect of an attorney to plead a valid and proper defense, or to attend the trial, either intentionally or through forgetfulness, and his failure for like reasons to notify his client of the time of trial, whereby a judgment is wrongfully obtained against the client, furnishes no ground for relief against the judgment.[171] So a party cannot obtain a new trial in equity, on the ground that his counsel mistook the facts of his defense, if he was present at the trial.[172] Nor is it an adequate ground for relief that the counsel neglected to assign errors on an appeal in the case.[173] In a case in California it appeared that the defendant's attorney on the trial objected to the introduction of certain testimony, and the court erroneously overruled the objection. An exception was taken to the ruling, and by reason of such erroneous ruling the plaintiff recovered judgment. The testimony was taken down by the official reporter, who failed to note the objection and exception. The defendant moved for a new trial, and adopted as his statement the report of the official reporter, without observing the error in the report, and for that reason failed to obtain a new trial. It was held that the mistake had been accompanied by such negligence on the part of the attorney that a court of equity would not relieve against the judgment.[174] A few exceptions to this rule are to be discovered in the books. Thus, in an early case in Tennessee, where a defendant at law had instructed his counsel in his defense, but the plea was so framed that the evidence did not support it and the defense therefore failed, it was considered that equity would be justified in giving relief.[175] In New York—where, to be sure, the practice is excessively liberal in this respect—the courts will entertain a motion for the vacation of a judgment on the ground of the neglect or mistake of counsel. With a fine spirit of humanity, but with little regard for the settled principles of law, they declare that they will not suffer a client to be ruined because he has employed an incompetent or unworthy attorney.[176]

§ 376. Want of Jurisdiction.

It is generally held that where a judgment at law is void for want of jurisdiction, no summons or notice having been served on the defendant, nor opportunity given him for defense, nor any appearance entered by or for him, equity will relieve against the judgment, if it be shown that there is a meritorious defense to the action.[177] And the fact that the law-court, in rendering judgment, passed on the sufficiency of an alleged service of the notice is not a bar to a read-judication of the question in an action to restrain execution of the judgment.[178] It is also held that where a judgment passes against a party before actual notice to him, although a copy of the writ was left at his residence, he being then absent from the state, equity will relieve if there is a substantial defense.[179] But it is no ground for relief that the defendant forgot that the writ was served upon him, whereby he was prevented from appearing and defending,[180] or that he erroneously supposed the suit was intended to be against another person.[181] Nor will equity relieve on account of the want of notice, where it appears that the rendition of the judgment was suspended, by consent, until the opinion of the supreme court in another case between the same parties could be had, and that the judgment was not given until after such opinion had been obtained.[182] Chancery has also refused to interfere in a case where the defendant, not denying that he had been duly served, alleged that he was not a citizen or resident of the state and had been fraudulently decoyed within the jurisdiction in order to procure service on him; for, said the court, the objection should have been taken by appearing in the original suit and moving to set aside the service.[183] Applications of this character are most commonly made in cases where, out of several defendants, only a part have been notified of the suit. Thus a judgment rendered against a joint maker of a note, without service upon him of any summons or process, is void, and where it appears that the right of action on the note has expired, so that there exists a good defense, a perpetual injunction will be granted, restraining the execution of such judgment.[184] So a judgment confessed by one partner against the firm, without the consent of the others, will be enjoined.[185] But on the other hand, where a judgment has been obtained against a principal and surety, it is no ground for an injunction in favor of the surety that the principal was not served with process and had no opportunity to defend.[186] Equity also has jurisdiction to vacate a judgment which has been fraudulently altered so as to include a defendant who was not served and not originally included in the judgment.[187] So, where a suit between citizens of the same state has been brought in a federal court, by collusion or otherwise, on the ground of defendant's alienage, and a default decree entered, such proceedings are wholly without jurisdiction and void, and the execution of the decree may be enjoined.[188] The same remedy may also be sought where the failure of jurisdiction was in respect to the subject-matter of the controversy or the amount involved.[189] But in any case the complainant has the burden of proving affirmatively the facts constituting want of jurisdiction.[190] And he must show that he has not been negligent in failing to avail himself of such remedies as the law would afford him.[191] Although the general consensus of judicial opinion is as stated in the beginning of this section, the decisions in some of the states hold that equity ought not to restrain a judgment on the mere ground that it was void for want of jurisdiction, since the complainant has an adequate remedy at law, by motion or otherwise, in the original cause.[192] Probably the true note of distinction is struck in the cases which rule that equity will not enjoin the judgment unless it is shown to be inequitable and unjust; if the party merely relies upon a defect of jurisdiction, without attempting to show that the merits are with him also, he must seek his remedy at law.[193]

§ 377. Judgment founded on False Return of Service.

Equity may vacate or enjoin the judgment of a court of law, when it is shown to be unjust and that the court rendering it never had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, although assuming it, in consequence of a false return of service by the sheriff or other officer.[194] In a case in California, where the action was to enforce a tax-lien on land, and there was no service of summons and no appearance by the defendants, and the court commissioner drafted the decree, and either fraudulently or by neglect inserted a clause in the decree that the summons had been served and the judge, deceived by the false recitals in the decree, signed it and ordered it to be entered as the judgment of the court, and at the sheriff's sale under the decree the commissioner became the purchaser and obtained a sheriff's deed, it was held that a court of equity would grant relief to the owner, by restraining the purchaser from setting up the judgment as an estoppel or from using it to perpetuate the advantage he had gained.[195] It should be remarked that there is a line of decisions wherein the application of the rule above stated is materially restricted. These cases hold that equity should not grant relief unless the false return of service was procured or induced by the plaintiff, or unless the latter can be in some way connected with the deception, thus linking the case supposed with the category of those wherein the defendant was prevented from setting up his defense by the trickery or fraud of his adversary.[196] The analogy here presented is plausible, but deceptive. For in case the plaintiff is in no fault, and the officer is alone to blame for the false return, these decisions can suggest no remedy except that the defendant should pay the judgment and then bring his action against the officer.[197] Practically, however, this remedy must often be illusory. And at its best, it involves a circuity and remoteness of obtaining redress which is foreign to the spirit of equity. But although the main rule for cases of this sort may be regarded as generally well settled, there is a material difference of opinion as to whether the relief will be granted when there still exists a complete and adequate remedy in the original suit. Numerous respectable authorities hold that it should be granted;[198] others that it should be refused.[199] But at all events, before equity will interpose by injunction in a case of this description, it must be averred and proved that the defendant has a meritorious defense, or at least something more than the mere barren right of being permitted to defend.[200]

§ 378. Legal Defense not Interposed.

The rule is well settled and perfectly inflexible, that if the defendant in an action at law had a good defense, purely legal in its nature, of the existence of which he was aware, and which he had an opportunity to set up, but neglected to defend himself, he cannot come into equity seeking relief against the judgment in that action, on the same grounds which constituted that defense, unless his failure to make the defense was due to circumstances of fraud, accident, or surprise, entirely unmixed with negligence or fault on his own part.[201] In other words, "a court of chancery will not entertain a party seeking relief against a judgment at law in consequence of his default upon grounds which might have been successfully taken in the said [law] court, unless some reason founded in fraud, accident, surprise, or some adventitious circumstances beyond the control of the party be shown why the defense at law was not made." [202] Thus relief in equity was refused in a case where the defendant had a good defense of a discharge under the bankrupt act, but neglected to answer or plead it because the plaintiff had commenced the suit before his discharge in bankruptcy, and continued it, unknown to him, from term to term, until after his discharge, before taking judgment; for he knew of the institution of the suit and was bound to notice everything else that was done.[203] Nor will equity relieve because the party did not prove on the trial payments which he alleges he had made, unless he shows some fraud or circumvention practised to prevent his making the proof.[204] Nor because the promissory note upon which judgment was rendered was without consideration.[205] That the legal defense was not presented or considered through the oversight of counsel or the error of the judge, or the failure on the part of the defendant to collect the evidence in due season and present it in a way to be available, is no sufficient excuse.[206] And if the defendant is precluded from setting up in equity defenses which he might have made available at law, much less can he urge, as a ground for relief in equity, any defenses which actually were tried and determined at law. Equity will invariably decline to re-examine a question which was fully and fairly examined at law. The decision, however inequitable it may appear, is final, and the matter is res judicata.[207] Hence a judgment obtained without fraud or mistake, upon issue joined and after litigation, will be interfered with by a court of equity only when it appears, first, that to allow its execution would be against equity and good conscience, and second, that the facts rendering it thus inequitable were not available as a defense in the action in which the judgment was recovered.[208]

§ 379. Illegality of Consideration.

In regard to judgments rendered upon a contract which was inherently illegal or immoral, there has been some difference of opinion as to whether equity ought not to relax the strictness of the rule stated above, and enjoin such judgments, irrespective of the fact that such illegality of the consideration might and should have been set up as a defense at law. Some cases are to be found in which relief has been thus granted where the judgment was founded upon usury.[209] But the more favored opinion is that where the defense of usury was open to the defendant at law and he had an opportunity to set it up, but neglected to do so, equity will not relieve.[210] There are also precedents for the intervention of equity to annul gaming contracts, though the defense could have been interposed at law.[211] In Illinois, a statute provides that all judgments, mortgages, bonds, notes, etc., given or executed for any money won by gaming, may be set aside by any court of equity upon bill filed for that purpose by the person giving, entering into, or executing the same, or by any other person interested therein. This, it is held, applies as well to judgments rendered in contested actions as to judgments on confession. And, such a suit being authorized by statute, the fact that the illegality of the contract sued on would have constituted a good defense to the action in which the judgment was recovered, does not oust the court of chancery of jurisdiction.[212] In a recent case it was held that a bill would lie to enjoin the plaintiff from collecting a judgment confessed five years previously, under a warrant of attorney in a bond, the defendant having had no day in court, upon the ground that the consideration of the bond was an agreement to suppress a prosecution for a felony.[213] But the supreme federal court holds, and with undoubted justice, that equity should not relieve against a judgment at law on the ground that it was founded on a consideration illegal and expressly forbidden by the laws of the state, when the party applying for relief was in pari delicto with the other; "a position," says the court, "which, however it might shield him against attempts from associates in wrong, so far as these should be urged through the instrumentality of courts of justice, can invest him with no rights, either at law or in equity, as against advantages acquired by his confederates." § 380. Excuses for not defending at Law.

Among the excuses for not making one's defense at law which are generally considered as sufficient to justify the interference of equity are the following:—fraud, circumvention, or any other improper act of the other party whereby a defense was prevented; mistake, surprise, or accident; and justifiable ignorance of the facts constituting a defense.[215] Some of these have already been considered, and the others will be considered in their order. But first it is necessary to advert to certain kinds of excuses which have been adjudged inadequate, and to the manner of satisfying the court of the existence of a valid excuse. That the debtor had a valid defense, but was advised by his counsel that it was not necessary to bring it forward before the court, is unanimously condemned as insufficient to warrant the intervention of a court of chancery.[216] Nor can equity enjoin a judgment where the only reason alleged for the failure of the defendant to avail himself of a legal defense is an erroneous ruling of the law court excluding such defense.[217] So when the grounds relied on in equity are equally available at law, it is no ground for relief that parties, who were not at the time of the trial examinable as witnesses, have since been made so by statute.[218] If a party, having a good defense at law, by his own voluntary act deprives himself of the means of making it, a court of equity will not interpose in his behalf; as where a party, having a good defense to a note, voluntarily exe-

[215] A good statement of the rule is that, to entitle a party to relief in equity against a judgment on account of the loss of his defense, it must be shown that it was occasioned by the fraud or fault of the adverse party, or by his own mistake, unmixed with any negligence or fault of himself, his counsel, or agents. cutes a deed of trust to secure its payment, equity will not enjoin the execution of the trust on account of such defense to the original note.[219] In regard to the evidence to prove the state of facts alleged as an excuse for the party's failure to make his defense at law, it is said that "the same certainty of proof is not required to establish an excuse for not making the defense at law that would be demanded to establish the existence of that defense."[220] Yet as it is the excuse, and not the defense, which must be established at this stage of the proceedings, it is of no avail to prove the defense if the excuse remains without evidence to support it. For example, where A. pays a debt for which he and B. are liable, and afterwards recovers a judgment at law against B. for half the amount, and on a bill by B. for relief against the judgment, on the ground that he was surety for A. in the debt, he fails to prove his alleged reason for not making the defense at law, but proves that he was surety for A., there can be no relief afforded to him in equity.[221]

§ 381. Same; Mistake.

A mistake of fact, provided it be honest and genuine, and such as a man might reasonably make, will be a sufficient excuse for not defending an action at law, and will warrant a court of equity, if the judgment be against conscience, in interposing by injunction to restrain its enforcement.[222] For instance, where A., a creditor of B., called upon the latter to execute a bond with surety for the debt, and supposing himself authorized by the conversation, applied to C. to execute the bond as surety, who did so accordingly, and A. subsequently recovered judgment on the bond, it was held, upon a bill by C. showing that A.'s representation of his authority from B. was made under a mistake, that the judgment should be enjoined as against C.[223] But it is no ground for relief in equity that the party was prevented from making his defense at law by a mistake of law, although it was a mutual mistake of both parties to the suit.[224] Nor that the defendant mistook his rights and so failed to make a defense which it was competent for him to present at law.[225] Nor will equity interfere because of his ignorance of the nature of the proceeding against him and a misapprehension of what was necessary to charge him.[226] Nor because he misunderstood the nature of the action and because those interested in the matter were out of the county.[227] Nor will relief be granted where the defendant, misnamed in the process, was in court when the judgment was rendered against him by default, and failed to defend by advice of his counsel.[228] Where an application for relief is made upon this ground, due diligence must be shown and the facts set forth showing how the omission occurred.[229]

§ 382. Same; Surprise.

In the cases where surprise has been accepted as a sufficient excuse for not defending at law, it has generally transpired that the surprise was one intentionally prepared by the plaintiff and sprung upon the defendant at the trial, whereby the case is assimilated to that of a fraud or trick on the former's part. Thus, in an early case, the payee of an usurious note pretended to have sold and transferred the same to a third person, in whose name a suit at law was brought upon the note, whereby the makers of the note were induced to suppose that the payee of the note could be examined by them as a witness in that suit to prove the usury, but such payee, when called as a witness at the trial, testified that he was one of the real plaintiffs in interest in the suit, and declined to testify as to the alleged usury, and from the state of the pleadings he could not be examined as a plaintiff under the statute for the prevention of usury. It was held that the defendants in that suit could maintain a bill in chancery against the real plaintiffs in the suit at law for discovery and relief, upon the ground that they had been deceived and defrauded out of their defense at law.[230] But an injunction will not be allowed on the ground of surprise, where there was no surprise but such as the party might have reasonably anticipated.[231] And a party seeking relief in equity on this ground must show that the surprise was not in consequence of his own negligence.[232] Thus it is no excuse that the witness on whom the defendant relied, but whom he had never questioned, failed to prove the defense set up.[233] So the fact that the party's counsel was surprised by the production of a certain piece of evidence is no ground for relief in equity, if he was previously cognizant of the evidence.[234] On the same principle, surprise of a party or his counsel, at the fact that the supreme court refused to review the judgment of the circuit judge, under a stipulation of the parties which had, in effect, made the decision of such judge final, is no ground for equitable interference with the judgment.[235]

§ 383. Same; Accident or Misfortune.

Unavoidable accident or misfortune, preventing the party from making his defense at law, is a sufficient ground for the interference of equity in an otherwise meritorious case.[236] This, it will be remembered, is one of the grounds specified in the statutes of some of the states as authorizing the vacation of a judgment on motion in the court where rendered.[237] It may be stated that equity is guided by practically the same rules which have been applied by the courts of law in construing these statutes, except, perhaps, that the lines are rather more closely drawn in equity, and less indulgence is shown in respect to the kinds of accident which are accepted as sufficient excuses, and in respect to the possibility of the party's surmounting the obstacle and making his defense. A few illustrative cases may follow here. It has been broadly held that the sickness of a party, or of his near relative, or the pendency of another suit against him requiring his attendance, will not authorize the interference of equity.[238] And this is undoubtedly true, if it would have been possible for him to be represented by counsel. Floods, which prevented him from reaching the place of trial, will furnish a sufficient excuse, but only in case the bill is very explicit as to the time of the prevalence of high water and of the meeting and adjournment of court, and as to the efforts that were made to reach it, and as to the impossibility of a successful defense in the absence of the defendant.[239] In another case, equity refused to enjoin a judgment on the ground that the defendant was precluded by intense excitement prevailing in the country from attending court, that it was dangerous to travel from home, that it was generally understood there would be no court, and that the judge of the court said that he should hold no session for the trial of cases.[240] It should be remarked, in this connection, that a good excuse for not being present at the term at which judgment was rendered, is not sufficient where no counsel was employed, nor witnesses summoned, nor any other steps taken to defend the action.[241] The inability of the party's attorney to attend the court, or his sickness, may, under some circumstances, entitle the party to relief in equity;[242] but it is no ground for an injunction that defendant's counsel was absent, when it appears that the defendant, if present at the trial, might have employed other counsel equally competent.[243] So the death of defendant's original counsel, and want of familiarity, on the part of the counsel who succeeds him, with the grounds of the defense, do not furnish a sufficient reason for equity to enjoin the enforcement of the judgment.[244] On the other hand, equity has thought it proper to give relief on account of the loss of a written contract without which the defense at law could not be made;[245] but has refused its aid where it was not satisfied that the loss of the particular document would endanger the complainant's defense in the court of law.[246] In a case where parties were prevented from making their defense at law by the acts of the plaintiff, until the only witness by whom the defense could be proved was dead, and a resort to a court of chancery in consequence thereof became indispensable, it was held that they were entitled to relief in that court.[247] But the fact that a witness omitted, in giving his testimony, to state a material fact, and that the complainant, by reason of his deafness, did not know of such omission until after the trial, is no ground for relief.[248]

§ 384. Ignorance of Legal Defense.

It may be regarded as well settled, upon the authorities, that equity will grant relief against a judgment at law where it is shown that there is a good and valid defense to the action on the merits, of which the defendant was ignorant at the time of the trial, and which he could not have discovered, by the exercise of reasonable and proper diligence, in time to set it up at law.[249] For example, where an administrator has recovered judgment for the purchase money of property of his intestate sold by him, it is a sufficient excuse to the vendee for not defending at law, that he did not know until after the judgment was rendered that the administrator had no authority to sell.[250] So where the creditor obtains a judgment at law against the sureties before they have notice of an agreement to forbear suit, equity will enjoin its collection.[251] But it is an important corollary to the above rule—or, indeed, an integral part of the rule—that mere ignorance of his defense is not sufficient; it must be shown that the party is guilty of no negligence, and that he could not possibly have ascertained it by the exercise of careful and reasonable diligence.[252] It must appear that the defendant's ignorance was not due to any lack of diligence on his part, or that it was caused by the act of the opposite party.[253] "A party who seeks the aid of a court of chancery, after a judgment at law against him, on the ground that he was ignorant of the defense, must show the exercise of ordinary diligence to discover it; or that he was prevented from employing such diligence by fraud, accident, or the act of the opposite party, unmixed with fault or negligence on his part." [254] Thus an alteration in an instrument sued on at law may be taken advantage of there, and the failure of the defendant to discover the alteration until after judgment is no ground for relief in equity.[255] So the allegation that there was a mistake in an account, upon which a judgment at law was recovered, which was not discovered until after the trial and verdict, is not sufficient to authorize an injunction against the judgment.[256] Nor is it any ground for relief in equity that defendant did not know, at the time of the trial at law, what the legal criterion of damages was.[257]

It is no excuse for failure to set up a legal defense in the action at law that the defendant could not make it available without invoking the aid of chancery to get a discovery; he should have obtained such discovery before going to trial at law.[258] This principle was once stated by Chancellor Walworth in the following terms: "As a general rule, if a party against whom an action is brought has a legal defense, he must avail himself of it in the suit at law. It will be too late, after he has suffered a judgment to be recovered against him there, to apply to this court for relief. And even where the facts constituting the legal defense can only be established by a discovery from the plaintiff, if they are fully known to the defendant, and he can avail himself of them upon the trial by the aid of a bill of discovery, he should resort to that mode of defense when the necessity of it is apparent, or he may be precluded by the judgment in that suit. In cases of this kind, however, this court will accept of a satisfactory excuse for not resorting to a bill in the first instance, and may grant relief after judgment has been obtained in the suit at law." Dec. 243, where Holman, J., said: "But a bill of discovery is the dernier resort in obtaining testimony, inasmuch as when it is resorted to, it shuts the door against every other method. Therefore it is purely discretionary with every suitor whether he will file such a bill or not, and he can never be considered in laches for not seeking a discovery from the opposite party."

On principles analogous to those just considered, it is held that where the defendant knew of his defense at the time of the trial at law, but had no evidence to support it, was ignorant that any such evidence existed, and could not have discovered it by the exercise of due diligence, equity will grant him relief upon the ascertainment and production of such evidence.[260] But here, it is obvious, any court would be slow to pardon any negligence or sloth on the part of the defendant in seeking for the evidence which he needs. Being aware that he has a good legal defense, it is his duty, as well as his interest, to make the most careful and exhaustive efforts to arm himself with the testimony which will support it. If he has not done this,—if he has been negligent in the search for evidence,—equity will not relieve him.[261] And the substance of the newly-discovered evidence must be set forth in the bill, in order that the chancery court may judge whether it is of the requisite character and weight.[262] In regard to the last point, the circumstances under which equity will grant a new trial because of newly-discovered evidence have been summed up as follows: (1) The evidence must have been discovered since the trial. (2) It must be evidence that could not have been discovered before the trial by the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, by the exercise of reasonable diligence. (3) It must be material in its object, and such as ought, on another trial, to produce an opposite result on the merits. (4) It must not be merely cumulative, corroborative, or collateral.[263] It remains to be stated that the statutory provisions, in many of the states, authorizing the law courts to grant new trials on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, do not divest the courts of equity of the power to grant a new trial in cases where the facts will justify it.[264]

§ 387. Negligence of Party precludes Relief.

A litigant is required to exercise the greatest degree of watchfulness over the progress of his case in court; and if he fails to attend the trial and assert his rights, merely in consequence of his own opinion of the state of the docket, or through forgetfulness, or negligence of any other kind, he will have no standing in equity after a judgment.[265] That he omitted to defend the suit in consequence of being misled by the clerk of the court as to its character, is considered as inexcusable negligence.[266] So, where a garnishment suit is pending, but is not prosecuted to judgment for two terms after that to which it was made returnable, the garnishee has no right to think that the suit is abandoned as to him and settle his debt, and if he does so, equity will not grant him relief from a judgment subsequently obtained against him in the garnishment suit.[267] So where a defendant at law, having a good legal defense, merely writes to counsel to defend him, without instructing him in his defense, he is guilty of such neglect as to preclude relief in equity against a judgment.[268] But a distinction must be taken between such neglect as is attributable solely to the party himself and such as is brought about by the improper or deceitful conduct of the other side. The former is not excusable, the latter sometimes is.[269]

It is not only in making his defense at law that a party is required to exercise diligence. Though he may have a good excuse for failing to set up such defense at the proper time, still equity will refuse to give him an injunction against the judgment if he negligently omitted, having full knowledge of the facts, to apply in due season for such remedies as were open to him by appeal, motion for a new trial, or motion to vacate the judgment.[270] And aside from this, chancery will be slow to extend assistance to one who has been so dilatory or slothful in seeking its aid as to be chargeable with laches.[271]

§ 388. Defense not available at Law.

Thus far we have been speaking only of defenses purely legal in their character and which could have been interposed in the action at law. But where the case varies from this type, entirely different rules apply. If the matter relied on by the complainant could not have been received as a defense in the trial at law, because it fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of chancery, or by reason of the forms of legal procedure, equity will relieve notwithstanding there may have been an ineffectual attempt to defend at law.[272] And where the defendant has both a legal defense and an equitable defense, the latter not cognizable at law, a failure to use diligence in making his legal defense will not, it seems, prevent a court of equity from granting an injunction upon proof of the equitable defense, in case a judgment is rendered against him.[273] The most difficult question under this head arises in connection with the codes of practice, enacted in several of the states, which confer large equitable powers upon the courts of law. One decision holds that such a statute merely permits, but does not require, an equitable defense to be made to an action on a legal demand; and therefore, if the defendant fails to avail himself of this privilege, and permits a judgment to go against him, he may still bring an equitable action to obtain relief against the judgment.[274] Notwithstanding the plausibility of this reasoning, it is opposed by the weight of the authorities, which rule that the fact that a defense is equitable is no excuse for not setting it up at law, if available under the code.[275]

§ 389. Defense available either at Law or Equity.

There is a third possibility in regard to the character of the defense to the action; it may be one that is equally available either at law or in equity. In this event, where the defense is a matter of which courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction, it is generally held that the party may choose the forum in which to make his defense, and if he omits to do so at law, he may then have recourse to equity for relief against the judgment.[276] Thus, in some of the states, equity will relieve against a judgment at law, by default, for money won at gaming, because here the jurisdiction of law and equity is concurrent, and the party may have his election where he will set up his defense; and if he so chooses he may let judgment go by default at law, and then resort to equity; although it would of course be otherwise if he had presented his defense at law and failed.[277] For if, in any case where the jurisdiction of law and equity is concurrent, the party makes his defense in the trial at law, he will be regarded as having made his election; and if he fails he will have no ground for a bill in equity for relief against the judgment, unless his defeat occurred through fraud or accident.[278] And this election is manifested, it is said, "by offering any defense whatever, it matters not whether by demurrer to the declaration, or by plea in abatement or in bar." [279] But it is also held that if there is a doubt whether a defense is available at law, and there is an undoubted jurisdiction in equity, and at law the defendant omits to make his defense, or if he makes it and it is overruled on the ground that it cannot be considered at law, a court of equity may afford relief, notwithstanding a trial at law.[280]

§ 390. Satisfaction or Release of Judgment.

Payment, release, or discharge of the claim on which a suit is founded must generally be set up as a defense before judgment. It forms no exception to the rule that matters cannot be heard on a bill in equity which might have been pleaded in the action at law, unless the party was prevented from bringing them before the court by fraud or accident, without his own fault or negligence.[281] But payment made after the institution of suit, where it cannot be brought to the notice of the court before judgment, under the local practice, is good ground for enjoining the judgment.[282] Whether a bill in equity for an injunction is the proper remedy to prevent a judgment-plaintiff from proceeding to collect anew a judgment which has been in fact satisfied, has been disputed. Some of the cases hold that such an application is meritorious and should be allowed.[283] But others, and we think with better reason, consider that equity ought not to interfere in such a case, inasmuch as the party has a prompt and adequate remedy at law.[284] But it is held that a court of equity will relieve against the suing out or levy of any process of execution upon a judgment enjoined which has been discharged by proceedings in bankruptcy.[285]

§ 391. Injunction as a Means of securing Set-Off.

As equity may order one judgment to be set off against another, so also it has power to restrain the execution of a judgment when it is made to appear that the judgment-defendant has a debt against the plaintiff exceeding the judgment in amount and that the latter is insolvent.[286] But a bill for this purpose cannot be sustained on the mere ground that the defendant has claims against the plaintiff which might be the subject of set-off, if there is no averment to show that the former for any reason could not have availed himself of his right of set-off in the action in which the judgment against him was recovered.[287] Nor will proceedings on a judgment at law be enjoined in equity in order to give the defendant an opportunity to set off or recoup a counterclaim, where such claim is unliquidated and arose out of an entirely distinct transaction.[288] An injunction granted to restrain the collection of a judgment on the ground that the debtor therein is entitled to a credit for a sum less than the whole amount of the judgment, should provide that the judgment-creditor may proceed by execution to collect the undisputed balance of the judgment.[289]

Courts of equity are sometimes called upon to restrain the enforcement of a judgment on the ground that it was taken against a person who, at the time, was incapacitated for legal action by some personal disability, such as infancy, coverture, or lunacy. The degree of validity to be attributed to such judgments is chiefly disputed, as we have already seen, in cases where a judgment by default has been rendered upon a cause of action to which the infancy or coverture, if pleaded, would have been a complete defense.[290] If, on the one hand, such disability of the defendant is not regarded as a jurisdictional defect, a judgment of this character will at most be voidable and not void. This is the position taken by many of the courts, as will appear from the sections just cited. But in such case, the remedy is obviously by motion or other appropriate proceeding in the court rendering the judgment. And any application to equity for relief would be met by the familiar rule that an injunction cannot be granted on account of matters which might and should have been pleaded in defense to the action at law.[291] But if, on the other hand, as many decisions hold, such a status as coverture amounts to a negation of that juristic personality which is essential to the formation of any and all legal relations, then it is equally evident that the courts of law can acquire no jurisdiction over a defendant so circumstanced, and that a judgment such as that supposed would be simply null. That equity would have power to restrain its collection seems clear beyond doubt. And it will become still more clear if we reflect that, since, on the premises, the defendant would have no power to employ an attorney or interpose a defense, the case is brought well within the confines of the rule which has formed the connecting thread of this whole chapter, viz.: that chancery will relieve against an inequitable judgment on grounds which could not have been pleaded at law.[292] The reader will be further advised of the doctrines on this topic by referring to the discussion of the general subject in a previous chapter. It is held that service of process on a privileged person (as a member of the legislative body) is not void, and his remedy is by motion or plea, and not by injunction to restrain an execution on a judgment by default against him on such service.[293]

PART III. PRACTICE ON APPLICATION TO ENJOIN JUDGMENT.

§ 393. Nature and Requisites of Bill.

A bill in equity for the vacation of a judgment, or to enjoin its enforcement, should always show that the merits of the controversy are with the complainant. If it fails to allege a good and meritorious defense to the claim on which the judgment was rendered, so that it would be inequitable and unjust to allow the enforcement of the judgment as it stands, the bill states no cause of action and must be dismissed.[294] Nor is it enough to aver that complainant has stat-
