SECRETS OF ISIS, THE

AKA: ISIS

Isis was in reality Andrea Thomas, a science teacher at Larkspur High School, whose double life was secret from everyone else. One day, while on a scientific expedition, she uncovered an ancient Egyptian amulet. This amulet has originally been made by the Egyptian Royal Sorcerer for the Queen and endowed her with the power to soar as a Vulcan soars, run with the speed of a gazelle and command the elements. These powers were passed onto Andrea who turned into Isis when she spoke an incantation.

Also on hand was Rick Manson, another school teacher and romantic interest for Andrea. At episodes end Rick would often fill in Andrea on the heroic exploits of Isis, which she always seemed to miss. During the early episodes Cindy Lee was Andrea's favourite student, a position taken over by Renne Carroll in the second season. Dr. Barnes was the head of Larkspur High School and would be seen sporadically.

The Secrets of Isis chronicled the exploits of Isis, a super heroine endowed with the powers of the Egyptian goddess. Originally scheduled as one half of the SHAZAM/ Isis Hour, the series was shown as a separate entry during its last season on the air. On a couple of occasions Captain Marvel made appearances on Isis.

Stories on The Secrets of Isis, like many 1970's Saturday morning shows, tended to have a heavy handed pro social lesson. This was reiterated after all the action was over, just in case somebody in the audience hadn't picked it up. Isis tended not to battle criminals all that often, usually the focus of the episode was a misguided or troubled student who would not be seen again after his or her problem was solved.

In 1978 an animated version of Isis appeared in Isis and the Fantastic, this was broadcast as a segment of Tarzan and the Super 7. CBS continued to rerun earlier episodes of The Secrets of Isis through the end of 1977-78 TV season.

The Secrets of Isis was a live action television series produced by Filmation in the 1970s that appeared during the Saturday morning cartoon lineup. It was also aired in various countries around the world. The series was initially aired in tandem with another live-action series, Shazam!. It is also known by the shorter title, Isis.

It aired on CBS from September 6, 1975 to September 3, 1977 (although only 22 original episodes were produced) and starred Joanna Cameron as Andrea Thomas, a high school science teacher. She was on an archeological dig when she found an amulet. This was a mystical amulet, originally given to an ancient Egyptian Queen.

When one wore the amulet, she was given great strength, the ability to move inanimate objects, and the power to fly and run at super speed. Thomas adopts these powers and the name Isis. Whenever Isis was needed, Andrea would hold the amulet up in the air and shout an incantation ("Oh, mighty Isis!"). She then intoned rhythmic, rhyming chants to activate her powers; a representative chant was Oh zephyr winds which blow on high, lift me now, so I can fly, which, obviously, enabled her to fly. Isis used her powers for good by capturing criminals, righting wrongs, and helping anyone who was in danger. Unlike other superheroes who responded when people called their name, the beauty of Isis' assistance was that she often came to the rescue of people who didn't call for her, arriving in the nick of time and encouraging the wrongdoer to see the error of their ways through self-reflection.

The series spun-off a comic book produced by DC Comics. Although Isis is often cited as a DC creation, in fact she was created specifically for the television series and was only later adapted for comics. The TV character later appeared in animated form on other series. A considerably reworked version of the character (though still connected with Captain Marvel) was introduced in the 2006 comic series 52.

In 2006, BCI, an American distributor of DVDs, announced it had acquired the rights to release the series on DVD in North America, with a release scheduled for the summer of 2007.[1] Grammmnet, the production company owned by Kelsey Grammer, has reportedly obtained the rights to produce a movie based on the character, the movie to be called "The Legend of Isis".

SENGOKU JIEITAI: SEKIGAHARA NO TAKAKAI

AKA: Warring States JSDF Battle of Sekigahara

After war games were completed in the Fuji Training Ground, a mysterious storm sends First Lieutenant Akiyoshi Iba and his subordinates to the Warring States Period, 400 years from the present time. Stranded, Iba wants to return back to the present with the rest of his units. However another officer by the name of First Lieutenant Takuya Shimamura had wanted to alter the past in order to change the modern times when they head back. But as the days go on, the platoons find themselves under constant threats from the Samurai, with most of the soldiers being killed individually in ambushes and surprise attacks by the former and later, by Ninjas. The rest were wiped out in a surprise attack against Iba's camp, after Shimamura had been executed by decapitation, by a combination of Archers and Arquebusers.

The lone survivor, Sergeant Fukami Moe, had been able to return back to the present after the same storm had brought her back from the Sengoku period. Unfortunately, she had lost most of her memory due to the traumatic experience that she had seen since most of her fellow soldiers and First Lieutenants Shimamura and Iba were killed in the Sengoku period, as well as being the only survivor when police had found her. Sergeant Moe, in the end, was seen to be a mute, wondering about the streets of Tokyo with Iba's wife mourning his death after his daughter had discovered Iba's JGSDF Dog tags in a temple.

Sengoku Jieitai Sekigahara No Tatakai (Warring States JSDF Battle of Sekigahara) was a 2006 television series mainly based on the Sengoku Jieitai movie in 1979 and the 2005 movie Sengoku Jieitai 1549. Its director, Mitsumasa Saito, had been involved in the creation of the Sengoku Jieitai 1979 movie.

SENTINEL, THE

The Sentinel is a crime drama centring on a Detective James Ellison, a police detective who has an edge over other officers due to his heightened senses. Ellison had been in the military and was the sole survivor of a reconnaissance mission into the Peruvian rain forest. He survived in the jungle for 18 months with the natives in the jungle before encountering civilisation again. After being rescued he returns home to Cascade, Washington (which is somewhere in the Seattle area), where he joins the police force.

After some time on the job, Ellison has several instances where his senses go into overload. He has himself checked out at the hospital where they are unable to find anything wrong with him. His condition does however raise the curiosity of Blair Sandburg, a graduate student in anthropology who offers Ellison an explanation for his condition. A condition which Sandburg hopes to study and help Ellison deal with. Sandburg's explanation is that during Ellison's seclusion in the jungle he became a sentinel, with all of his senses becoming extremely acute. The sentinel had first been observed by the 19th century explorer Sir Richard Burton, who noticed that tribal look outs had highly developed senses. Ellison reluctantly agrees to accept Sandburg's help and gets him permission to accompany him on his cases, but only as an observer. Sandburg also become Ellison's room mate after the bad guys destroy his home. Although this arrangement was only supposed to be temporary, it soon looks as if it is permanent.

With his sentinel senses, Ellison is able to see, hear, taste, smell and feel things that other people cannot. This helps him in solving crimes when he is able to detect things at a crime scene which would otherwise go unnoticed. His Sentinel senses do however have one drawback. While he is utilising one of his senses to its maximum potential he can become oblivious to other dangers around him, which would normally be detected by his other senses.

Other regulars in the cast of The Sentinel are: Captain Simon Banks. Ellison's superior on the police force who is let in on the fact of Ellison's hyper senses. Carolyn Plummer, who is the police force's forensic expert and is also Ellison's ex-wife. She and Ellison remain friends and get along better after their divorce than they did while they were married.

Paul De Meo and Danny Bilson was also responsible for creating the SF show HUMAN TARGET, and both versions of the SF show VIPER.

After spending years in the Peruvian jungle during his tour in Army Special Forces, Cascade PD Detective James Ellison developed hyperactive senses, which came back to him five years after his return to the US. He can see people in darkened windows at night from two hundred yards, hear the music playing on the radio of the car he's chasing after he's lost sight of it, and can distinguish between wood and plastic after both have been in a three thousand degree fire.

Blair Sandburg, a local anthropology student, tells Ellison that he is a "Sentinel," who in ancient tribes would protect the village and seek out game using such hyperactive senses. Sandburg becomes Ellison's back-watcher and teacher of how to use his new powers as Ellison brings a whole new edge to the war on crime in Cascade, Washington. STAR TREK :VOYAGER'S Jeri Ryan also became part of the show starting from the episode Sentinel Too. The sentinel had always had a rough time in the schedules, since the show had been cancelled several times by UPN.

The intention of the second season of The Sentinel was to highlight the huge differences between Ellison (Richard Burgi) the army veteran with heightened sensory abilities and Sanburg (Garett Maggart), the intelligent graduate student.

Character History

Jim Ellison

Jim Ellison was born with hyperactive senses. During his childhood, he had a friend, Bud who helped him with said senses. Unfortunately, Bud was murdered at some point, one of many cases of trauma in his childhood. His mother also left, leaving him to live with his extremely wealthy father, William Ellison, and his brother, Steven Ellison. Jim's relationship with both characters is notably strained, and leads to both the repression of his senses and his joining the army.

While in the army, Jim becomes a captain in the US Army Rangers and joins Covert Ops. His last mission takes him and his team of seven to Peru to stop a drug-smuggling campaign. Unfortunately, his ranking officer was corrupt and set him and his men up for failure. His helicopter crashes, killing his seven men and leaving him wounded. He is taken in by the Chopec, an elusive and secretive tribe in Peru, and learns to control his senses for the tribe's betterment under the tutelage of Incacha, the tribe's shaman. Incacha calls Jim Enqueri, 'Sentinel'. When a satellite photo finds seven tombstones at the helicopter's crash site, instead of just a pile of scrap metal, the US army sends in a team to bring their man home.

When Jim returns to his city, Cascade, his repression skills come to the fore and leave him without any memories of his time in Peru. Nevertheless, his instincts as a Sentinel are still there as he decides to 'serve and protect' his tribe, his city, Cascade. He joins the police force, and is first assigned to Vice, of which we know little. He might also have spent some time in Narcotics. His temper is legendary, until Jack Pendergast takes him under his wing and transfers him to Major Crimes. Jim then marries Carolyn Plummer, another detective on the force. Jack then dies, and Carolyn and Jim divorce.

Shortly afterwards, Jim is sent on a solitary stakeout for a week. When he returns, his senses reemerge, leaving him feeling a bit on the crazy side. He can see, hear, and smell things that no other person could, he can only handle the blandest of foods, and any barely-coarse materials leave him wishing to claw his skin off. He checks himself into a hospital, where he meets Blair under the guise of Doctor McCoy- or Doctor McKay, as he pronounced it.

During the series Jim falls in love with only a handful women but most of them ends up dying in his arms. Several of Jim's old friends from the army and police force also end up dead during the course of the show.

As a Sentinel Jim has several powers:

- all 5 senses are strongly enhanced
- able to communicate with ghosts
- has a spirit animal, a black panther
- receives visions which guide him in the choices he makes and sometimes predict the future (Jim had a vision that showed Blair's death before Alex killed him [see below])
- used the power of his animal spirit to bring Blair back from the dead

Blair Sandburg

Blair Sandburg is the genius son of Naomi Sandburg, an absolute flower child. In her youth, she was all about free love and the hippie spirit, and has yet to stop. Blair had little to no stability in his youth, always moving from home to home and never settling, but that was also what spawned his love of anthropology, the study of mankind.

When Blair was sixteen, he moved to Cascade, Washington to begin his studies. An anthropology major, his advisor was Eli Stoddard, a major expert in the field. As he quickly moved through his education, he took many trips on grants to various parts of the globe. When he finally decided to get his doctorate, he became a teaching fellow. The topic of his dissertation was the Sentinel. This was brought about by a monograph by Sir Richard Burton (the explorer, not the actor) that described both the sentinels and their roles in their respective tribes, and their partners, acutely named by one villain: guides.

At twenty-six, Blair has an 'office' in the basement at Rainier, an $850 a month, 10,000 sq. Ft. Warehouse apartment, and an ex-girlfriend that works at Cascade General, where a man who complains about all five of his senses has recently been admitted.

During the course of the show Blair has several girlfriends, sometimes dating more than one woman at a time.

In Jim's visions Blair's spirit animal is a grey wolf.

Series Summary

Jim doesn't believe Blair's explanation about his senses at first. In fact, at their second meeting, Jim throws Blair up against a wall and calls him a 'neo-hippie, witch-doctor punk.' Nevertheless, Jim's senses are a huge problem, as demonstrated when Blair has to shove Jim and himself under an oncoming garbage truck to save Jim from a zone-out. Jim later introduces Blair to Simon Banks, the chief of Major Crimes, and gets Blair a ninety-day observer's pass so that Blair can help with his senses. The excuse to the higher-ups? Blair is (supposedly) Jim's kid cousin, whom he is helping get his doctorate by allowing him to study the police force so he can write a dissertation on the 'thin blue line' and the closed society of the police force.

Soon after, Blair's warehouse apartment is blown up by the drug lab next door, and Jim invites Blair to stay with him at his loft apartment at 852 Prospect Ave., apartment 307. Blair temporarily brings with him Larry the Ape, the remnant of a past experimental study. Although the arrangement is only meant to last a week, Blair stays for years.

On the job, Jim constantly reminds his wayward 'partner' to stay in the truck, although Blair rarely listens. Also, Blair is often the victim of kidnapping and torture by various criminals. Blair also steadily serves to fill out Jim's paperwork and soothe Jim's temper. The other detectives at Major Crimes think of him fondly, and Blair has many nicknames- 'Chief' from Jim, 'Hairboy' from Rafe and Henri, and 'Sandy' from Megan Connor.

At the end of season three, Blair meets a new sentinel, Ms. Alex Barnes, and agrees to help her with her senses. Jim has visions of Alex killing Blair and is haunted by visions of Barnes' spirit animal, a spotted panther. However, at this point Blair has not told Jim there's a new Sentinel in town and Jim is confused over the Sentinel instincts he's receiving. Unsure of what is going on Jim throws Blair out of the loft. Jim and Blair part without having told each other of their reasons for doing what they did. Alex attacks Blair and kills him. After Blair has been proclaimed dead Jim uses the power of his animal spirit to bring Blair back from the dead. However, he's still haunted by spirit visions of Alex and is unable to control a strange attraction to her, leading to a kiss between them in front of Blair. Jim manages to regain control over his Sentinel urges and Alex is eventually sent to live out her life in a mental institution, and Blair returns to the loft.

The last episode of the series, The Sentinel by Blair Sandburg, shows Blair finishing his dissertation, finally. He has promised Jim to allow him to read it first before he turns it in. Unfortunately, his mother shows up at the loft and sends the document away to Sid Graham, a bigshot agent for publishing in New York. Sid releases snippets of The Sentinel to the press and the general public, who then hound Jim and Blair. In order to repair his relationship with his friend and fix his wrongdoing, Blair gives up the three million dollar contract in a press conference where he makes himself out to be a fraud, thus destroying his academic career. At the end of this last episode, Jim and Simon offer Blair a place in Major Crimes should he choose to accept it.

Cancellation

The Sentinel was canceled after 3 seasons by UPN, with the last episode being a big cliffhanger with Blair's life in the balance. An intense fan campaign convinced UPN to give the series a further half a season to end the series properly.

DVD Release

On April 18, 2006, Paramount Home Entertainment released The Complete First Season of The Sentinel on DVD in Region 1 for the very first time. It is unknown if the remaining 3 seasons will be released at some point.

SEVEN DAYS

AKA: 7 Days

Frank Parker is a patient in a CIA psychiatric hospital. His condition is the result of a mission he was on two years ago, where he was captured and tortured. Although he had made a remarkable recovery, Parker is somewhat unstable. When disaster hits the United States government, Parker is the ideal candidate to operate a high-tech spherical device, code named Back-Step, which will take him back in time and allow him to prevent the catastrophe. The ride is anything but smooth. Frank can only travel in the past for up to seven days

Those responsible for selecting Parker to carry out these covert missions are Donovan, Back-Step's chief military advisor whose life Parker once saved. Doctor Issac Mentor, and the attractive and brilliant scientist, Olga Vukavitch. The only member of the team opposed to Parker is Nate Ramsey, who believes he is unsuitable.

Don Franklin also starred in the underwater science fiction action show SEAQUEST DSV (aka Sequest 2032). Think of UPN's new sci-fi action show SEVEN DAYS as TIMECOP on a short leash, or Ipress File meets Groundhog Day. The CIA's top secret "Operation Back Step" is a time machine that can send someone only seven days into the past. When a crisis occurs, we can actually send an agent back in time to prevent it from ever happening. Jonathan LaPaglia stars as an ex-CIA agent with a photographic memory, sprung from a top secret mental institution for spies-who-know-too-much for the high-risk assignment of being bounced back in time a week.

The show has a built in ticking clock: After a crisis occurs, they must balance the amount of time spent gathering information after the fact against the amount of time before the event needed to prevent it from happening. In the first episode, terrorists have killed the President, Vice President, etc. In order to give LaPaglia enough information to prevent the assassination, they must find out as much about the assassins as possible... but this requires a time consuming investigation. Each week they must find the balance between enough information and enough time.

Dealing with these crises that must be prevented are LaPaglia and the team of Back Step scientists, which include the paternal Dr. Mentnor, the gruff Talmadge, the wheel chair bound Ballard, and sexy Russian scientist babe Olga Vukavitch... Plus antagonistic CIA agent Ramsey and La Paglia's old army buddy Donovan.

High concept plots mix big screen style action and a solid emotional core to provide one of the fall's few genre shows that lives up to its premise. It's created by Christopher Crowe, who produced the New Alfred Hitchcock Presents fifteen years ago, and co-starring Norman Lloyd who produced the original Alfred Hitchcock Presents... this may explain why there are a number of plot twists per episode.

Executive Producer Christopher Crowe has had a good week. His fledgling Science Fiction series Seven Days has made its debut on UPN, attracting excellent re-views and the highest Wednesday night rating, for the channel since March. The show, which TV Guide tipped as one of the hottest new arrivals of the season, is a certain hit, and given its excellent timeslot (shown in tandem with STAR TREK: VOYAGER), Seven Days looks set to run for a long, long time. A year ago, it seemed that Time travel shows had their day ABC pulled TIME COP off the screens after just a few weeks, as the tired series failed to find an audience. Crowe, it seems, has found a fresh spin on a standard SF premise; Seven Days isn't just about travelling through Time, it's about temporary disasters - and a feverish race to change events, preserving our modern society. But why, one wonders, did he choose the limitations of Seven Days? "I guess we incrementalize our lives into weeks," Crowe tells Starburst. "I think a normal human fantasy is, 'God I wish I could do that week over again'. Bad things can happen within the course of a week.

"We also took a look at the scale of the events we wanted to cover in this show, and if there are big human events it takes a little while to stage and execute them. It just felt like seven days was a proper time. The point was that they don't have the technology that allows them to go to different eras, which has been what most Time travel shows have been about. We wanted short term, and that just seemed a good time." Every episode, CIA agent Frank Parker (Jonathan LaPaglia) will have a bad week. Recruited by a covert military intelligence unit, Parker is charged with turning back the clock when things go wrong. His means of travel is Back-Step, the codename for a huge spherical device that was built from technology recovered from Roswell. Before one can cry, 'Aha, another alien invasion story', Crowe asserts that there are currently no plans to bring the Greys into the series.

"It's only really that it makes [Time travel] logical to some degree," he insists. "[It allows] the audience to suspend belief that Time travel is possible. In almost any other Time machine driven idea there's never been any addressing of the technology. Getting into cutting edge physics, the truth is that Time is elastic, and one day we may be able to screw around with it a little bit." A successful writer, producer and director with 15 years in the business, Crowe's credits include screenplays for the movies Last of the Mohicans, Fear and The Bone Collector, while his TV credits include Miami Vice, Alfred Hitchcock Presents, The Untouchables and The Watcher. The idea for Seven Days emerged after a brain-storming session, and while NBC passed on the show, UPN saw the potential and commissioned a pilot. When the finished product was shown to a test audience, the mix of action, thrills, drama and Science Fiction won unanimous approval.

"It tested as highly as any two hour we've done here; it was really well accepted," Crowe grins. "That's gratifying, because sometimes you do reasonably good projects and that's not the response. I've been in it long enough to know how rare and exceptional that is." The pilot, which takes the brave step of introducing its hero as an unstable war hero who has been institutionalised in a CIA mental hospital, presents a momentous storyline. The White House has been bombed by terrorists, and both the President and Vice President are dead. It's up to the newly enlisted Frank to go back and save them - and his own son, another casualty of the blast. High octane action sequences, massive sets and location shooting in Washington all combine to give the impression that this is a big budget venture.

"As TV goes it was a good amount of money," admits the executive producer, "but it was very efficiently done and there's not a nickel that doesn't show on the screen. It's a combination of things. It was not as expensive as it may look - the level of execution is almost movie-like, but it didn't cost anything near a movie." The pilot is also memorable for Jonathan LaPaglia's distinctive portrayal of Frank, whose photographic memory, high pain threshold and bravery contrast with mental instability, leaving some members of the selection committee convinced that he is the wrong man for the job. Crowe reveals that he had wanted to work with the actor after meeting his elder brother, Anthony.

"I had worked with Anthony on a picture I did for Paramount a few years ago called Whispers in the Dark," he offers. "I really enjoyed working with Anthony and so when Jonathan's name came up, I was just naturally curious. When I met him I just felt there was something there, then I looked at him on film and I said, 'Yeah this is the guy'. It's just one of those fortunate events, it didn't require a great deal of thought - he just seemed real right away." Another distinctive element of the show is its production design: the set for the Back-Step device is vast, and the scale is conveyed on screen.

The enormous sphere, plus the surrounding equipment, fill the entire space of a Hollywood soundstage. There's little doubt that the sphere will become one of the show's trademarks, and Crowe reveals that the design for the Back-Step was arrived at during the course of the production process. "When you write you don't envision everything," he says. "You make a picture three times - one is the writing, one is the production, and that means the preparation, and the third time is when the film is in, editorial and music and all that. "I think that set reflects that middle stage, where you go, 'OK if they were going to do this, how would it look?' There was a natural inclination to make it hyper-modern and futuristic, It would be like Lost in Space or something like that.

"I took a look at actual aerospace photographs of a jet propulsion lab in Pasadena and various NASA facilities in different locations, and what I found was that environments are very conventional, and there's sort of a busy, crazy quality to the device. That's the feel you get from NASA- there's umbilical everywhere. Everything is fd up, apart from the and thing that is the centre of attention, and that's the device - be it a rocket or whatever. I said, 'That's the kind of feel we're going to have, It's got to have an impromptu quality, and a realistic and industrial feel, not a futuristic one, because that is not the way things look and feel on that level. They're sort of jerry-rigged in a massively sophisticated way."

Black light The design is complemented by 'black light, which, when shone onto reflective paint, gives the sphere an unearthly glow.

"It's pretty," Crowe concurs. "The blue that it renders in television screens is very easy on the eyes." Having wiped out the White House in the pilot, one almost wonders how Seven Days can better itself during the course of a season. Crowe insists that's not a problem, and he has a team of advisers who have suggested a

The U.S. government adapts technology from an alien spacecraft at Roswell and creates a device that can travel back in time seven days. When Washington is devastated by a terrorist attack, the need to find a capable pilot becomes essential and with time running out, only mental patient and ex-military man Frank Parker proves suitable.

SHADOW CHASERS

Dr. Jonathan MacKensie, an erudite, charming and sophisticated professor, teaches Anthropology at the Georgetown Institute of Science & Technology in Washington, D.C. His father was the late Dr. Leonard MacKensie, Nobel Laureate, who was closely identified with Georgetown Institute. Upon being introduced, some people mistake Jonathan for 'the' MacKensie of Georgetown, and he, always uneasily and with a touch of disappointment, hastens to correct the misunderstanding.

Happily engrossed in his classes as well as his research paper on 'the possibility of a bicameral brain existing in Ramapithecus and quasi- contemporary hominids', he is waylaid one day by his department chairperson, Dr. Juliana Moorhouse. Influenced by her insinuations as to what would happen to his anticipated research grant if he didn't see things her way, he is 'persuaded' to take over the directorship of her newly established Paranormal Research Unit that would investigate unexplainable phenomena, starting with reports of poltergeist activity in a little town in northern California.

Series-comic adventure series following the exploits of two paranormal investigators. The series exploits the vast differences between the main protagonists for most of its humour. Running jokes include Jonathan's lack of athletic ability (he's forever taking falls and incurring minor injuries to his foot or hand); Benny's preferred attire (mid 1980's haute couture with requisite Nikes) and his mild disdain for Jonathan's conservative suit jackets and ties; Jonathan's borderline hysterics whenever he realises that whatever Benny has just done is either illegal or bound to cost the Institute a pretty penny; Benny's bizarre tastes in food (for example, pouring sugar on a baked potato and setting it alight, to Jonathan's bemusement); and last but not least, Benny's vast array of friends.

As a general rule, Benny digs up at least one friend per episode who possesses some bizarre paranormal talent but also who, more likely than not, actually does manage to provide the key clue they need to crack the case. A semi-funny comedy/fantasy knockoff of "Ghostbusters." Professor Jonathon McKensie was an Anthropologist at the Georgetown Institute of Science, and his sidekick Edgar "Benny" Benedek was a tabloid reporter for The National Register. The no-nonsense Dr. Juliana Moorhouse dispatched the pair on missions to stop havoc caused by curses, ghosts, graverobbers, and other parapsychological riffraff.

Dennis Dugan was best known for his role of Richie Brockelman both in the short lived series of that name and as a recurring guest star on The Rockford Files. Trevor Eve was the star of the BBC crime drama series Shoestring.

Shadow Chasers was a series about the adventures of the unlikely duo of a college professor and a tabloid reporter who teamed up to investigate unusual phenomena such as ghosts and U.F.O.s, Edgar 'Benny' Benedek was the tabloid reporter who worked for the national Redister- a paper that printed such stories as 'Elvis Was a Space Alien'. Benny also wrote books about the supernatural. Jonathan MacKenzie was the professor of anthropology at Georgetown Technical Institute. In order to obtain funding for his own research. Jonathan must first work on his superior's (Dr. Moorhouse) pet project investigating the paranormal.

It was while on the first of these assignments that Jonathan met Bonny and reluctantly teamed up with him. Benny was quite gung ho about the idea, since his association with Georgetown would do wonders for his credibility. Dr Moorhouse feared that the reverse would also occur. Besides coming from different backgrounds Benny and Jonathan also had contrasting personalities. Benny was very outgoing, loved to try new things and thrived on publicity, Jonathan, the son of a Nobel Prize winner, on the other hand was much more conservative and preferred to keep a low profile. The series was obviously meant to cash in on the popularity of the hit film Ghostbusters, however it was nowhere near as funny or flashy.

In the wake of Ghostbusters craze came this short-lived 1985 series about a pair of supernatural investigators - one a sleazy reporter, the other a series researcher - and the various supernatural forces they came up against. . Ranging from the usual haunted-house type ghosts to Egyptian spirits possessing teenage gang members.

Shadows was a late afternoon children's anthology series run on ITV during the mid 1970s. The episodes of Shadows were well made dramas usually with young protagonists that could be enjoyed by all, unlike many American children's programmes that write down to their audience. Of particular interest to fans of Ace of Wands (which had been off the air for several years) was Shadows sixth episode "Dutch Schlitz's Shows". This episode featured one of Ace of Wands' most popular villains. Mr. Stabs in a solo adventure.

SHADOWSTAR

AKA: KAGESTAR, THE

AKA: KAGE STAR

AKA: ZA KAGE SUTAA

Reiko Kazemura, daughter of the President of the Kazemura Conglomerate is abducted in an extortion plan by a gang of criminals. Sugata Kageoh, a Kazemura Company Employee attempts to rescue Reiko from the criminals. During their escape they inadvertently get caught in some high voltage wires. The electric shock is so great that they literally are 'merged' with their shadows. Surviving this ordeal they discover that they now have the ability to manipulate their shadows in a variety of ways.

Using their new found powers they vow to fight crime as KageStar and Belle Star.

Shown on NET TV (aka Nippon TV).

Characters

Kagestar

Alter Ego: Sugata Kageoh

Occupation: President Kazemura's Assistant

Powers: Able to utilize, manipulate and control his personal shadow. KageStar initiates his shadow powers by calling out Kage Yo Ike! (Go Forth My Shadow) His shadow calling itself Kagarobe can grow in size, and use its huge shadow hands to grab and hold KageStar's enemies. Kagarobe affectionately calls KageStar his Oyabin.

Other hissatsu waza (special attacks) include his Kage Hammer (Shadow Hammer), and Kage Shibari Jitsu (Shadow Binding Skill).

KageStar's most power fighting attack is his yusei kick (meteor kick).

KageStar's most unique weapon by far is his star-spangled cape, which can use to whip and slash his enemies in a move which he calls his Kage Sharin (Shadow Wheel).

KageStar's personal transportation vehicle is his KageroCar which seems to materialize from KageStar's cape.

Belle Star

Alter Ego: Kazemura Reiko

Occupation: Manager of one of Kazemura Corporation owned businesses, a fishing store.

Belle Star has pretty much the same shadow powers as her partner KageStar. Wears a bracelet with a bell that rings anytime there is danger near.

Belle Star and KageStar can combine their Kage Sharin attacks in a move called the Double Sharin (Double Wheel).

Used the BelleCar as her principle means of transportation.

Satan Empire

The Satan Empire is a global criminal enterprise that is determined to rule the world by any means necessary. They are lead by the evil Doctor Satan, a former Nazi scientist who specialized in genetic manipulation. Using his skills, he creates an army of human monsters who he controls and manipulates. In addition Doctor Satan has his own army of henchmen and thugs who he coordinates and sends out to do his dirty work.

Weapons/Powers

KageroCar

KageStar's personal transportation vehicle is his KageroCar which seems to materialize from KageStar's cape.

Bellecar

Belle Star's principle means of transportation.

Kagebooshi

KageStar and Belle Star's gigantic flying fortress. Used to house their KageroCar and BelleCar vehicles.

Trivia/Factoids Originally planned as an Anime Project, until Oba Talent Agency changed gears and decided to pursue the program as a Tokusatsu live action project.

Producer Hirayama Go was busy overseeing at the time six Toei Tokusatsu Projects.

While the KageStar is an original Toei concept, the Manga Adaptation was fictitiously credited to a Hatte Saburo. The pilot is also said to have been fictitiously credited to a Azuma Takeshi.

KageStar has a decidedly 'American Comics' feel to it and was done so by design. In the beginning it was somewhat of a unique series in that there was no real single 'evil organization' that KageStar and Belle Star battled. Instead, they tended to battle costumed criminals and thugs who were out for their own best interests. Later on, Toei reversed themselves and introduced Doctor Satan and his Satan Empire as the main opponents to KageStar and Belle Star.

Noguchi Ryu who designed the eye-catching looks of KageStar and Belle Star also contributed designs to such Tokusatsu Shows as 'Super Robot - Red Baro', Denshi Senshi Denjiman and 'Space Sheriff Sharivan'.

Noguchi Ryu designed the 'Manga Eye' masks because he felt that not seeing the eyes of a character often led to the viewers distrust of the character.

This is one of the first times in which large mecha (the Kageboshi) appear in a Tokusatsu Series.

The pairing of a male and female hero team would repeat itself in other later projects most notably Kamen Rider Stronger.

Tachibana Naoki also played the lead in 'Jumborg Ace'.

Kobayashi Shoji is a familiar face in Tokusatsu TV having starred in such series as 'Ultraman' (Capt. Muramatsu) and 'Kamen Rider' (Tachibana Kyohei).

Belle Star's Hayakawa Emi is a JAC (Japan Action Club) Member who also appeared alongside fellow female fighter Shiomi Etsuko in the Toei Movie cult movie 'Onna Hissatsu Ken'.

SHAIDER

AKA: UCHUU KEIJI SHAIDAA

AKA: SHIDER

AKA: UCHU DEKA SHIDER

In college, Sawamura Dai deciphered the figures on the Nazca Plain. Impressed, the Galactic Union Police recruited the archaeologist and trained him to be Earth's third Space Sheriff in recent years. Named after Shaider, the ancient hero who destroyed the Mu Empire and defeated Fuuma 12,000 years ago, he teamed with Annie to stop Fuuma today. He did so single-handedly; the expected crossover with Gavan and Sharivan never occurred until a special that aired 85.3.8.

After the early space detective series of GAVAN and SHALIBAN, Shider was the last of the metal series to concentrate on sci-fi police. While the earlier shows in the series has older viewers, Shider specifically targeted younger children. In order to retain the older viewers, producers introduced Annie (Morinaga), the leader of a group of female fighters, whose influence would be felt later on in KakuRanger. The series was produced by Susumu Yoshikawa, Itaru Orita and Jun Higasa.

Characters and Mecha

Galactic Union Police

Annie

Shaider's cowgirlish partner, whose homeworld of Mount was annihilated by Fuuma. Played by a JAC stuntwoman, she engaged in much more action than her non-stuntwoman predecessors, who largely stayed aboard mecha and away from the monsters of the week. Some view Morinaga Naomi as the Shiomi Etsuko ('Sue Shiomi' in 'Sonny Chiba' movies) of the eighties. She gained quite a following when Shaider was on Japanese TV, with the tokusatsu fan magazine Uchusen running 'side stories' spotlighting Annie. Previous Metal Hero series had stuntMAN main characters; this series was usual in that it had a stunt woman main character, but no stuntman (see below).

Shaider/Sawamura Dai

Archaeologist-turned-Space Sheriff. Named after the ancient hero Shaider, he was fated to repeat his predecessor's destiny by saving Earth from Fuuma. His arsenal:

Combat Suit

A blue and silver suit of Granium Alpha armour. When Dai shouts, 'Shouketsu!' (lit. 'fry-bind'), beams of Plasma Blue Energy shower from the Babylos to form the Suit around his body in 1 millisecond. The Suit comes with the Video Beam Gun and the standard issue Laser Blade, with which he performs the Shaider Blue Flash technique.

Blue Hawk (VRT: VR Nitricycle)

Shaider's blue and white motorcycle with wings in the rear that fold open. Capable of flight and entry into the Strange World dimension.

Shaian (VRT: VR Combat Module)

Shaider's tank, which splits into the flying Skyshaian fighter plane and the Battle Shaian tank, with retractable drill (guess the Scooper and Moguriran toys didn't sell, so Bandai saw no point in designing another separate drill vehicle).

Babylos (Vavilos?; Babirosu; VRT: ?)

Shaider's blue and white flying fortress. Has three modes: Super Dimensional Battle Mothership (self-explanatory), Battle Formation (humanoid), and Shooting Formation (gun, 'held' by a gigantic hologram of Shaider; VRT: Shoulder Cannon).

Strange World Fuuma (lit. 'wind demon')

A religion based in the Strange Palace (Grimlord's base) in the Strange World dimension revering Kubilai as its god which intends to conquer the universe through psychological attacks. Attempted to take over Earth 12,000 years ago, only to be stopped by the Shaider of legend; destroyed today by the modern Shaider.

Great Emperor Kubilai (a pun on kubi 'head' and Kublai Khan; VRT:

Oraclon)

Ruler of Fuuma. A giant golden head with three red eyes embedded in the wall of the Fuuma Palace. Later revealed to have two bodies: a natural one (Hydrabot in VR Troopers' 'Grimlord's Dark Secret Part Two'; Shaider 47) with snakelike limbs that fought the Shaider of legend 12,000 years ago and a mechanical one with which he fought the Shaider of today (Oraclon in VRT 'Into Oraclon's Web'; Shaider 48).

God Officer Poe (VRT: Despera)

Kubilai's transvestite grandson in white who presides over the Strange Beast birth and Strange Dimension Generation ceremonies. (Cf. Sailor Moon for another case of male-as-female in the US version.) Drinking a elixir made somehow from young girls every 500 years, he lived 15,000 years. Unwilling to have anyone be more beautiful than he, his true face is mummified.

Commander Hessler (VRT: Doommaster)

Black-garbed field commander covered with red vines. Older brother of Himley (Arachnobot? in VR Troopers), who tried to take over his position.

Girls' Army (VRT: Vixens)

Five kunoichi (female ninja) spies.

Strange Beasts (Fushigijuu)

Psychedelic, deceptively comical-looking creatures.

Name formula: two syllables, then those two syllable repeated (see below for all the names)

SHAKTIMAN

Shaktimaan was, as a child, adopted by seven "gurus" who trained and blessed him with "yogic shakti". This granted him superhuman powers when he grew up, which he used to become a defender of truth and justice. His first case involved stopping bank robbers.

Powers/Abilities: Shaktimaan is superstrong, can fly, and is invulnerable. Other powers unknown.
 Enemies: Kilvish and his followers

Producer: Mukesh Khanna

Created by Mukesh Khanna, who also plays the character on television. The series was extremely popular in India, virtually from the moment it first aired on September 13th, 1997, so much so that the media reported children injuring themselves trying to imitate the lead character. This led to a court case which gave the show a clean bill of health (and actually praised it for its message of good moral values), but there remains no question of the show's impact in India.

He doesn't mind being called the poor man's superhero. No one would if your serial has completed 700 episodes, has been running for over five years and its popularity still shows no signs of abating especially in the rural areas where, in the absence of cable TV, Doordarshan's enjoys a captive viewership.

Indeed, the exploits of Shaktimaan are now a part of the modern folklore among kids.

One of the reasons for the enduring popularity of the serial is that producer Mukesh Khanna gives a message in every episode.

Says he, "The other day I met Abhishek, a child with impaired hearing, and realised that I must do something for children like him." Khanna has now got an expert who interprets Shaktimaan's message in sign language.

Says an exited Abhishek, "He's India's very own Superman, Batman, Spiderman and Tarzan rolled into one. "Indeed he is, considering that no other mythical TV hero has had such a cult following among young people, especially in small towns and village.

Shaktiman, or Shaktimaan, is a fictional character, an Indian television superhero created by Mukesh Khanna and shown on Doordarshan, India's national television network, beginning September 13, 1997. Now, also shown on Pogo TV. Khanna plays the role of Shaktiman and his alter-ego Pandit Gangadhar Vidyadhar Mayadhar Omkarnathnath Shastri, a photographer for the Aaj Ki Awaaz newspaper. Like Superman, Shaktiman is superhumanly strong, has the ability to fly, and is invulnerable to injury. He received his powers from seven gurus who trained and blessed him with "yogic shakti". He is a defender of truth and justice as well as a role model for his television audience, even going so far as to lecture viewers on hygiene, patriotism, education.

When the serial was first aired on Doordarshan, there was a lot of controversy created as children set themselves on fire or jumped off buildings, hoping that Shaktiman would save them (as in the serial) and this caused an uproar in India. In an effort to promote responsible behaviour among children and to spread useful messages among them, Khanna spent a substantial part of his allocated airtime in explaining to children that the stunts shown on television are not real and should not be emulated. Shaktiman was one of the most popular and longest running television series for children on Doordarshan. Now, it is being repeated on Pogo TV.

Later a series of comic books appeared featuring Shaktiman and published in many Indian languages as well as English explains, Kilvish can only be defeated after evil is destroyed. Shaktiman's adventures show him pursuing justice and saving his friends while Kilvish and his minions plot to defeat him.

After Shaktimaan was created he set out to destroy his arch-enemy Kilvish. But, as the guru Mahaguru

Shaktiman has unlimited powers which lies in his five kundliniyams attained through meditation. Shaktiman worships God through the symbol OM.

According to the fiction, God and Shaktiman's seven gurus have blessed him with powers, even to rearrange the galaxies and merge the whole universe into one Galaxy.

In the wake of the 2001 Gujarat Earthquake, Khanna toured the affected areas in character as Shaktiman, boosting morale and distributing relief supplies.

SHARIVAN

AKA: UCHUU KEIJI SHARIBAN

AKA: SHALIBAN

AKA: UCHU DEKA SHALIBAN

The Igas, whose homeworld was destroyed by the space crime organisation Madou, escaped to Inner Iga Island on Earth. (Yes, 'Iga' as in Iga ninjas.) Iga Den, a descendant of the Iga refugees, was a forest patroller. One day, he was fatally injured by the Makuu Double Monster Buffalo Doubler (Gavan episode 42), the guardian of Makuu's base. Saved by Space Sheriff Gavan, Den was sent to Bird, where he underwent surgery, recovered, and trained to become Earth's next Space Sheriff, taking the place of the promoted Gavan. Over the course of his duties, he learned of his true Iga heritage and defended the Iga Crystal (see below) from Madou, teaming up with Gavan in the series finale.

Earth is threatened by Psycho the Devil King (Iizuka) and his assistant Miss Akuma. Each week he sends at least one transforming "beast" to wreak havoc, and yet each week he is thwarted by Shaliban (Watari), the latest space cop to be charged with defending our planet. Shaliban's real identity is Igaden, a man who was saved by Gavan in the previous series. The second in the metal series that attempted to establish a rival brand to the same studio's Super Sentai shows such as GoRanger, Shaliban was followed by Shaider.

Andou Mitsuo also starred as Professor Gill in KIKAIDER and Professor Monter in Toei's SPIDER-MAN.

Characters and mecha

Galactic Union Patrol

CaptainGavan

A frequent guest star. Teamed with Sharivan for the series finale against Psycho. (This reminded me of the Double Riders vs. Gelshocker leader episode, some 11 years earlier.)

Lily

Sharivan's assistant.

Sharivan/Iga Den

Earth's second Space Sheriff in recent years. Originally from Inner Iga Island. Served as forest patroller until fatally wounded by Makuu's Buffalo Doubler and saved by Gavan. His arsenal:

Combat Suit

A red suit of 'Solar Metal' armour. When Den shouts, 'Sekisha!' (lit. 'red discharge'), the Grand Birth (see below) absorbs solar energy, converts it into Solar Metal particles, and fires said particles at Den, around whom they fuse to form the Combat Suit in .001 seconds. The Suit comes with the Crimebuster handgun and the standard-issue Laser Blade, which he performs the spectacular Sharivan Crash--one of my all-time favourite tokusatsu SFX sequences, next to the jouchaku and sekisha scenes, with the black silhouette of Sharivan swinging a sword in front of the huge golden disk of the sun.

Motosharian

Sharivan's motorcycle, capable of entry into the Phantom Dream World.

Sharinger Tank

Sharivan's tank, which splits into a flying upper half and treaded lower half.

Moguriran (mogura = mole)
Sharivan's drill-headed vehicle.

Grand Birth
Sharivan's flying fortress, which has two modes, the self-explanatory Battle Mothership and the vaguely humanoid Battle Birth Formation (with the biggest lap or stomach I've ever seen).

The Organisers (27, 50)
The anti-Madou resistance, represented by Moore, Keith, and Rita. Aided Sharivan.

The Descendants of Iga
These include:

The Holy One (34, 47, 51)
The guardian god of the Igas.

Jii/Masked Monster (19)
The aged chief of Inner Iga Island. Has the map to the whereabouts of the Iga Crystal, which he defends in the armoured guise of the Masked Monster.

The Girls of Inner Iga Island (19, 20, 31, 49-51)
Sailor-suited schoolgirl defenders of the Iga Crystal, a 2,000-year-old artificial sun hidden on the island. Led by Miyuki.

Bell Billy (36) and Bell Helen (36, 38, 39, 42)
A pair of Iga youths--a older sister and younger brother--whose parents were slain by Madou while they travelled through space. General Gyrer of Madou slew Billy.

Iga Warriors (51)
Jack, Henry, Maria, and Kirk. Four descendants of Iga who came to Earth to help Sharivan at Organiser Rita's request.

(Isn't it funny how the Organisers and the peoples of Iga, all from outer space, all have Western names?)

The Space Criminal Society Madou (lit. 'Demon Way')
A organisation of psychic criminals with its headquarters, the Phantom Dream Castle, in the Phantom Dream World dimension, a 'white hole' where all the matter sucked up by black holes ends up. Intends to conquer the universe through chaos created by its members' psionic abilities.

Demon King Psycho
The immobile (until the finale) ruler of Madou. Fought Gavan and Sharivan in the series finale in a second body, that of the cyborg Psychorror, fully mobile and armed with twin swords.

General Gyrer (1-49)
Field commander.

Doctor Polter
Female strategist and Demonster creator.

Reider (rei = spirit; 34-50)
Mystic from the Death Spirit World who intended to take over Madou for himself.

SHAZAM!

Billy Batson, a teenager had been chosen by the immortal elders to become their champion on Earth. The immortal elders were: Solomon Hercules, Atlas, Zeus, Achilles and Mercury. The word Shazam! derived from the first initial of each elder when spoken by Batson would cause him to be hit by magical lightning that transformed him into the adult Captain Marvel, changing his street clothes into red tights with a lightning bolt on the chest and a white cape in the process. When Captain Marvel said Shazam the transformation would reverse itself.

Unlike the comic book version of Captain Marvel, the TV version did not get to battle super villains. The comic book version Billy Batson worked for a TV station but in the TV programme he appeared to be on permanent holiday and only occasionally mentioned his job. Billy Batson and his mentor known simply as Mentor, travelled throughout the country in their RV to right wrongs develop understandings and seek justice for all. Towards the beginning of each episode the elders would appear to Billy and give him some advice that he did not fully understand, but by episode's end he would learn what they meant. Most often he would realise it by helping people solve everyday problems- which also required the assistance of Captain Marvel to solve. Each episode had the obligatory lesson in such areas as, honesty and good citizenship. Just in case someone in the audience was too slow to pick up on the lesson, Captain Marvel would come on after the adventure and explain it.

The Episodes Finders Keepers, The Odd Couple and Out of Focus also starred Isis from THE SECRET OF ISIS. Shazam! was a series based on the adventures of the original comic book character Captain Marvel. Not to be confused with the current hero of the same name, the original Captain Marvel first appeared in comics published by Fawcett beginning in 1940. Captain Marvel was a super hero with powers and abilities similar to Superman- a similarity that produced a lawsuit by DC Comics (which published Superman) and brought an end to Captain Marvel comics in 1953. In 1973 DC bought the rights to Captain Marvel and began publishing new comic adventures of Captain Marvel. Between the end of the Fawcett run and the beginning of the DC comics version, a new Captain Marvel had been created at Marvel Comics. The name Captain Marvel could not be used either on the new DC comic or the TV series based on it. The title Shazam! from the magic word that young Billy Batson spoke in order to be transformed into Captain Marvel.

During Shazam!'s first season the series was aired on its own. During its second and third seasons Shazam! appeared as one half of the Shazam! / Isis Hour. During this time cross overs between the two programme's occurred. The Shazam! episodes which were broadcast during 1980 were reruns of previous episodes.

Shazam! was a half-hour live-action television program produced by Filmation, based upon DC Comics' superhero Captain Marvel. The show ran from 1974 to 1977 on CBS; from 1975 to 1977 it was known as The Shazam!/Isis Hour, and included The Secret of Isis, about an Ancient Egyptian superheroine resurrected in the body of a schoolteacher, as the second half of the hour. Actor Michael Gray starred as young Billy Batson, while Captain Marvel was played first by Jackson Bostwick, and later by John Davey. (Actress Joanna Cameron appeared as Isis, and her alter-ego Andrea Thomas.) Today it is considered to be one of the prime examples of camp.

The television version of Shazam! was notably different from its source material. The wizard Shazam did not appear in the series; teenage Billy spoke directly to the elders that empowered him: Solomon, Hercules, Atlas, Zeus, Achilles, and Mercury. Instead of remaining in his hometown, Billy and his guardian "Mentor" (a doppelganger of sorts for the comics' Uncle Marvel, and played by Les Tremayne) were nomads, traveling around the country in a recreational vehicle. (Media promotion of the time explained that Batson had taken a leave of absence from his radio announcer's job.)

The most fundamental element of the Shazam! mythos remained the same: when he spoke the magic word "Shazam!", Billy would be struck by a magic lightning bolt and transformed into the World's Mightiest Mortal, Captain Marvel.

important to be responsible for what we say and what we do. It's easy to get dragged into doing what is wrong, but it's even harder to get out again.

1 - 6 THE GANG'S ALL HERE

Vinnie is out on bail and ready to get even with that rat-fink Jackie. Billy tries to talk to Vinnie, but ends up being bound and gagged. Vinnie and Jackie's confrontation at the oil refinery almost takes one of their lives... ALMOST, thanks to Captain Marvel. Moral: In the end, fighting doesn't prove anything. Work together and iron out differences in a constructive way, rather than a destructive way.

1 - 7 THE DOOM BUGGY

Don has dropped out of school to be a mechanic. But when he and Billy get lost in the desert, he sees that he doesn't know as much as he thought he did. Moral: If you close your mind to learning, sooner or later you're going to have it opened and be surprised at just how much you've shortchanged yourself. So if you ever think about dropping out of school, you're only hurting yourself.

1 - 8 THE BRAIN

Jim "The Brain" Carter is a new kid in town and is having a tough time finding friends. He's been playing tricks on them in order to get them to like him. They also are put off by his incessant bookreading. Billy and Mentor suggest that Jim try to do things that the rest of the guys are interested in. Tough guy Greg decides to make Jimmy try something dangerous in order to prove that he's good enough to hang around them. When Greg is in danger, Jim uses Morse Code (learned from books!) to call for help, and thankfully, that help is Captain Marvel! Moral: We all want to be liked, but daredevil stunts aren't the way to prove it. If a person can't like you for who you are, then maybe they aren't worth having as friends.

1 - 9 THE BOY WHO SAID "NO"

Mentor is hit over the head and robbed. Young Larry Burns knows that it was Ron Craig who robbed Mentor, but is threatened that he'd better keep quiet, or else... Billy and Mentor know that Larry knows who the robber was, and when Ron is seen looking for Larry, it becomes obvious that Ron is the guilty person. Knowing he's been found out, Ron forces Larry's father to take him out of town on his helicopter. Moral: Some day you may see somebody do something wrong. If you don't know what to do about it, just remember that when a problem has you stumped, it's a good idea to talk with a grown-up you can trust. It could save you a lot of trouble in the long run!

1 - 11 THE ATHLETE

Kellie has her mind set on being a part of the all-boys Varsity Team. But there are two boys who will do anything in order to get her off the team...Perhaps even by planting test answers in her locker. Moral: Everyone should be given a chance to prove his or her abilities. Don't put someone down just because they're different from you. Don't put a girl down just because she's a girl. When a person's talents are wasted, it's a loss to everyone.

1 - 12 THE TREASURE

Two men have been digging up Indian artifacts in the desert and selling them. An Indian chief and his grandson, Johnny, try to get them to stop, but are unsuccessful. Billy and Mentor offer their help to keep these priceless treasures where they belong. Moral: The desert and traditions of other people have much to teach us and must be preserved for future generations to see and to know.

1 - 13 LITTLE BOY LOST

Howard is a boy who hasn't spoken since his friend was almost killed. His father won't let him have a puppy, so he runs away. Billy finds Howard stuck on some rocks in high tide, and is able to call his father using a note found in the boy's pocket. On their way home, Howard and his father stop at an old ghost town, where a puppy has fallen down into a mine shaft. His father is soon stuck too while trying to save the pup. Howard is able to go find Billy and Mentor, and when his dad is saved, Howard is suddenly able to speak! Moral: If you don't communicate, you'll never solve your problems. There are times when EVERYONE needs help.

1 - 14 THE DELIQUENT

Norm is a loner attending an outdoor summer camp. Although he can't swim, he decides to take a canoe ride. His canoe capsizes and begins to call for help. Billy and Mentor are camping nearby and hear the cries for help. Billy transforms into Captain Marvel and saves Norm. 2 - 1 ON WINNING

Corky feels that he's no match for his big brother, whether it be motorcycling, fishing... you name it. He also feels that his dad doesn't care for him as much as his older brother. But when Corky runs away and his dad almost gets killed trying to find him, Corky realizes how much his dad loves him. Moral: A parent's love shows no rivalry. Winning isn't the important thing...it's that you do the best you can.

2 - 2 DEBBIE

Debbie's parents have warned her not to ride with Tom on his motorcycle, because he is wreckless. It's Billy's job to help Debbie to realize that when her parents don't let her do certain things, it's because they love her. Debbie realizes this when Tom and his buddy swipe a six-pack of beer from a gas station, and almost get mangled by a large truck. Moral: When a parent sets rules and regulations, it really is a form of expression of their love and concern. Sometimes the hardest thing for them to say is "no". But we can be sure that most of the time there's a good reason for it.

2 - 3 FOOLS GOLD

A group of boys have been harrassing an old prospector, whom they see as a mean old man. But things change when one of the boys is hurt and the man lends a helping hand. Because they've been playing around in his mine, it caves in on the old prospector. Captain Marvel punches right through the rock to save him! And in the end, the boys and prospector become friends. Moral: There are things more precious than gold. Things like respect and understanding. Respect means more than being polite. It means knowing we've learned from each other. There's a lot we can learn, if we only listen.

2 - 4 DOUBLE TROUBLE

Captain Marvel robs a gas station! Or is it an imposter in an incredibly realistic mask? Now there's a warrant for Captain Marvel's arrest, and so the real Captain Marvel turns himself in. With Marvel in jail, the crooks decide to rob the Iverson Mine's payroll. Meanwhile, Mentor finds the crooks' mask, costume and cape, which proves Marvel's innocence. Can Marvel stop those bad guys before they get away with all that loot? Moral: Respecting the law is just another way of saying that we respect each other. Laws have been made for the good of everyone, and when someone breaks the law, they're saying "I don't care about you." When you respect the law, you respect yourself.

2 - 5 GOODBYE, PACKY

Kathy's pet wolf, Packy, is getting too old to be held in captivity any longer. He's becoming wild and hard to control. When it comes time to turn him loose, Kathy takes Packy and runs away. Trouble ensues when they hide in a conveniently placed hot-air balloon. Moral: Having a pet carries responsibilities. Some animals are born to be free. To deprive them of that right is selfish, so we all must understand and respect the laws of nature... for our sake, as well as for our animal friends.

2 - 6 SPEAK NO EVIL

Three boys break into their school and accidentally start a fire. They get away before they are seen, but one of the boys' dogs is seen at the school. When the boy confesses, the two other boys find out and chase him into a dangerous electrical plant. Moral: Don't ever be afraid of being called a name. As long as you're sure what you're doing is right, there's no word... no name...that can harm you.

Dan is too proud to accept help from Captain Marvel when his airplane runs out of gas in the middle of nowhere. Dan learns that everybody needs help once in a while when a fierce forest fire breaks out, and Captain Marvel needs help from Isis in order to put it out. Moral: There are a lot of things we can do by

3 - 1 THE CONTEST

Glen steals the answer to a contest in which the winner gets a new motorcycle. Now the person who convinced him to cheat needs a big favor - the keys to a van which contains an experimental solar-powered gyroscope. Moral: Just about anything worthwhile has to be worked for, and earned. If it's worth having, it's worth waiting for.

3 - 1 BITTER HERBS

Yale is a teenage boy who wants to join a club called "The Overlanders". The leader of the club does not want Yale to join because he's Jewish, but soon the racist gets what he deserves when a mountain lion attacks him! Moral: It's not a person's race, religion or looks that is important. What is important is the person's character.

3 - 3 RIPCORD

Young Bill is a little too anxious to grow up. He wants to be a skydiver, just like his big brother Larry. Bill decides to pack Larry's parachute himself, without any help. We can all guess what happens next... Moral: Sometimes there are things that a kid wants to do but he's too young for. Be patient. We grow up a lot sooner than we think.

Moral: Treat others the same way you'd like others to treat you. If you give respect, you'll get it back.

3 - 6 OUT OF FOCUS

When two thieves think a young filmmaker (Jim) may have caught their theft on film, they attempt to take his film from him. SHE WOLF OF LONDON

AKA: LOVE AND CURSES (US TITLE)

An American graduate student, Randi Wallace (Kate Hodge), working on her Masters Thesis (something on the order of "Folk Legends and Myths: Fulfillment of Freudian Psychological Needs"), decides to spend a night on the English moors to experience first-hand the atmosphere under which myths and legends were conceived.

Unfortunately, she is attacked and bitten by a wild animal. On the next full moon, she finds to her dismay that there may be some truth to such legends and myths after all: she has become a werewolf! With help from her professor, Dr. Ian Matheson (Neil Dickson), with whom she falls in love, she attempts to find a cure for her unusual condition, and in the process meets up with the likes of vampires, zombies, witches, and crazed science fiction fans.

SHE WOLF OF LONDON was produced by HTV (one of Britain's ITV companies). HTV, however, found that the series had too much violence to be successful with British censors, and pulled out of the deal after 14 episodes. In order to fulfil the initial commitment of 20 episodes, the American backers of the co-production deal moved the series to Los Angeles and revamped it into LOVE AND CURSES. Six new episodes were made in which Ian gets a job as the host of a local TV show called "How Strange", with Randi as his producer

She Wolf of London was one of three genre series (the other two being Shades of LA and THEY CAME FROM OUTER SPACE) syndicated as part of the Hollywood Premiere Network. The Hollywood Premiere network was not a real network but rather a banner under which Universal Studios placed several of their first run made for syndication series. Not many people have seen them since the Hollywood Premiere Network was only been run on two TV stations WWOR the independent station owned by Universal in New York City and KCOP. Los Angeles' VERY independent TV station. People who received WWOR on cable have had all three series blacked out and replaced with other programmes Since the failure of Hollywood Premiere network, She Wolf of London has been rerun on the Sci-Fi Channel.

She Wolf of London is more similar in concept to the theatrical film An American Werewolf in London than it is to its 1946 theatrical namesake. The series deals with the exploits of Randi Wallace, an American college student who travels to England to consult with Professor Ian Matheson. Ian is a professor at a university and an expert on the supernatural who does not believe in the stuff. No sooner does Randi arrive in England than she gets attacked by a werewolf in the moors and thus is transformed into one herself. Unlike the werewolf in Werewolf, Randi only becomes a werewolf on the night of the full moon, which does not occur in every episode. Ian and Randi set out to investigate supernatural occurrences hoping that something they find in these investigations may lead to a cure for Randi's condition A romance soon begins to develop between Ian and Randi, who has moved in with Ian and his family. She Wolf of London comes across as a mix between Remington Steele and Kolchak: the Night Stalker that does not quite work.

She Wolf of London was co-produced by HTV (one of Britain's ITV companies). HTV felt that the series was too violent for British tastes and pulled out of the deal after 14 episodes. In order for Universal to fulfil the initial commitment of 20 episodes, the series was revamped as Love and Curses Love and Curses relocated Ian and Randi to Los Angeles In Los Angeles. Ian gets a job as the host of a local TV show called How Strange with Randi as his producer The TV station is owned by Skip Seville.

Filmed in London under the name of She-Wolf of London (pilot through "Beyond the Beyond") and in Los Angeles under the name Love and Curses ("Curiosity Killed the Cravitz" through "Mystical Pizza"), the series never developed much of a following and only lasted one season.

Executive producers for the series were Sheldon Dromgoole, Paul Sarony and David Roessell, the producer for the series were Chuck Murray, supervising producer was Lee Goldberg, William Rabkin and Tom Mcloughlin, the executive producer was Mick Garris. The series was run in syndication only in the US, and has been seen on Sky One in the UK. The series was seen first in the US on KCOP in Los Angeles.

The demise of She-Wolf of London was both premature and lamentable as the programme in its original form showed no signs of running out of steam. Strong writing combined with unique sense of style to create a show that was as strong in its own identity as any other you could wish to mention, and showed just what can be achieved under a co-production banner given the right combination of talents.

If there's ever been a series that was more than the sum of its parts that it is She Wolf of London. After all, you'd be hard pushed to name many programmes that managed to be funny, dramatic, light-hearted and weird all at the same time. . . Especially ones that owed their success to being so quintessentially British.

SIERRA NINE

Sierra Nine was a children's series that took its name from the government agency of scientific trouble-shooters. Sierra Nine consisted of a three person team. Their mission consisted of poking their noses into scientific hornets' nests by sorting out plans that have misfired or fallen into the wrong hands.

Sierra Nine was formed by Sir Willoughby Dodd, an eccentric middle aged scientist. Operating from an office near London's Trafalgar Square. Sir Dodd directed Sierra Nine's two younger field operatives : Anna Parsons and Dr. Peter Chance. The series had a recurring villain in the form of The Baron, a renegade scientist who twice went up against the Sierra Nine team.

Children's adventure series about a trio of scientific trouble shooters who were a sort of junior league cross between THE AVENGERS and the professionals. The 1963 series was devised when John Rhodes, then ITV's head of children's television asked Hayes and director Mark Miller to come up with a new slant on Science Fiction. The result was 4 assorted stories, spread over 13 weeks. The settings were created by Bernard Goodwin, Duncan Cameron, Andrew Drummond and Ken Jones.

SIGMUND AND THE SEA MONSTERS

Because of he refused to scare humans, Sigmund the Sea Monster's family harassed him to the point where he was forced to leave his home and wander the beaches alone. He was found and befriended by two brothers, Johnny and Scott who took him back home to live in their clubhouse. The series then follows the misadventures of the two boys and their pet sea monster eluding everyone while Sigmund's family, the Oozes, who each look like a huge lump of sea weed with a face, seek to retrieve him when emergencies arise that require his presence back home at their cave.

The story behind the inspiration of Sigmund and the Sea Monsters is interesting. What would be a normal every day event to the rest of us became a highly successful television show through the eyes of a visionary: Once while at the beach in La Jolla, California, Sid Krofft saw an incredible piece of seaweed that floated up from a sea cave. He said it looked almost alive. He went for his car so he could take the seaweed creature back home but by the time he got back with his car it had floated back into the water and back to the caves. As Paul Harvey might say... "Now you know the rest of the story. Good day." The show also served as a showcase for Johnny Whitaker and his singing career which gave us one full length record and featured the show's theme song sung by Johnny himself.

Sigmund and the Sea Monsters was a children's television series that ran from 1973 to 1975. The show was a Sid and Marty Krofft production and was shown on Saturday mornings. There were 29 episodes spanning two seasons.

Its basic premise was that Sigmund (Billy Barty), a friendly (if somewhat cowardly) sea monster who runs away from his comically dysfunctional undersea family, is discovered and befriended by brothers Johnny (Johnny Whitaker) and Scott Stuart (Scott Kolden), who let Sigmund stay in their hideout.

Plotlines were very simple and straightforward, usually some variation on the idea of Sigmund doing something silly to arouse attention and the boys working to prevent him from being found by Sigmund's brothers, Blurp (Bill Germaine, Larry Larsen) and Slurp (Fred Spencer, Paul Gale). The brothers also worked feverishly to hide Sigmund from their overbearing housekeeper Zelda (Mary Wickes) and Sheriff Chuck Bevans (Joe Higgins).

In Season Two, Rip Taylor joined the cast as a magical 'Sea Genie' named Sheldon.

Sigmund and the Sea Monsters was the first Krofft Saturday morning production that was renewed for a second season. Previous entries H.R. Pufnstuf (1969), The Bugaloos (1970), and Lidsville (1971) had all been axed after the first season.

Trivia

In 2004, on the cartoon website Homestar Runner, The Cheat dressed as Sigmund in costume.

In a 2006 episode of My Name is Earl, Earl and Randy can be seen watching Sigmund and the Sea Monsters.

In the song Fazers on the 2003 album Take Me to Your Leader, MF Doom (as King Geedorah) references the show in a line saying "He been rhymin' longer than sigmund and sea creature been on Saturday feature".

SILVERSUN

The show features the adventures of the adolescent members of the crew of the Star Runner, an interstellar spaceship carrying a cargo of 550 cryonically suspended colonists to their new home, Silversun. In the year 2050, the Star Runner and its crew are two years into their 90-year journey to a livable planet 45 light years from Earth. The crew's goal is to get the "New Settlers" safely to the Silver Sun and begin a colony there. Because of the 90 year length of the journey, the crew are mostly teenagers who will take over command of the Star Runner as the adults get older.

The ABC began showing Silversun on October 11, 2004 at 5:00pm daily as part of its "ABC Kids" lineup. The final episode of the first season was broadcast on December 3. So far there has been one season of forty episodes, each at twenty-two minutes. The program was originally aired on the Seven Network in two groups of twenty episodes, and then shown again without a mid-way break on the ABC.

Spoiler warning: Plot and/or ending details follow.

Although some episodes in the first season were self-contained, a majority dealt with problems occurring on board the Star Runner based in plots that spanned a number of episodes. These included the illegal re-animation of the character Zandie by the rogue crewmember Degenhardt in the earlier episodes, the crew's encounter with a wormhole, the infection of Commander Cyriax by an alien parasite, his subsequent cure through the use of a harvest clone of him discovered in suspension among the settler pods, and the clone's accidental awakening to full consciousness. The final episode was the culmination of a number of episodes comprising one of the most intricate and suspenseful plots so far encountered in the series, ending in a cliffhanger presumably to be resolved in the next season.

Much of the programme revolves around the relationships and issues experienced by the young crew as part of the normal process of growing up.

There are, however, some occasional interesting ideas of an ethical and/or science fictional nature presented in the show - such as the question of whether the commander's clone should be treated as human or not, the unique human problems encountered by a crew on a lifelong voyage to the stars, and an encounter with a pulsar whose pulse cycle is in phase with the brainwaves of the crewmember Pancha, to her detriment.

SIMULACRON-3

This West German mini-series dealt with a country which is run by corporations, about rich people who try to gain power in order to become richer and richer.

The series based on German author Daniel Galouye's novel was made for German television. The novel had the feel of a typical sixties set-up of a post-war America coming to doubt those things in society it has held important. So you had this kind of scepticism about what science can do for mankind.

SIX MILLION DOLLAR MAN, THE

The bionic man, played by former Big Valley star Lee Majors, was introduced in a 1974 TV movie which told how astronaut and NASA test pilot Col. Steve Austin - 'a man barely alive' - was literally rebuilt after a catastrophic plane crash which robbed him of both legs, an arm and an eye. At a cost of six million dollars, medical scientists, led by Dr Rudy Wells, equipped him with nuclear-powered limbs and a bionic eye (vividly depicted in the series' opening graphics), enabling him to run and swim at 60 mph, bend metal, smash down walls, leap fences (and small buildings) at a single bound, and see vast distances.

Initially, Austin finds it hard to reconcile himself with being a 'freak' and tries to commit suicide - a touching display of human emotion that went down well with critics and public. Once he came to terms with his lot, however, there was no stopping him. The man, like the series, ran and ran. Austin starts work for a CIA-like government agency, the Office of Strategic Investigations (OSI), headed by the intransigent Oscar Goldman who assigns his high-priced agent all the risky missions. These ran the gamut of story possibilities, from political, crime or scientific to personal dramas, to a few more overtly SF adventures involving space and aliens.

Based on the novel "Cyborg" by aerospace wizard Martin Caidin, whose novel "Marooned" became the film which inspired the actual US-USSR Apollo-Soyuz mission, the first time the Americans and Russians co-operated in manned spaceflight before today's Shuttle/Mir peacemaking.

In Burning Bright, William Shatner guest-starred as an astronaut friend of Austin who is affected in space by an electrical field that gives him the power to communicate with dolphins and control people's minds. In Straight on 'Til Morning Austin befriends a radioactive

The Pioneers featured M A S H star Mike Farrell as one half of a cryogenically frozen pair of astronauts who gains superhuman strength; and Just Married had Steve Austin returning from an orbital flight to learn six years had elapsed. Lee Majors' wife Farrah Fawcett-Majors guest-starred in three stories - twice as Major Kelly Wood, stranded in space in The Rescue of Athena One and accused of espionage in Nightmare in the Sky, and once as a gambler, Trish Hollander, in The Golden Pharaoh.

Then, of course, there was THE BIONIC WOMAN, Jaime Sommers (Lindsay Wagner) - see separate entry - whose successful introduction in a couple of SMDM stories earned her a series of her own, and The Bionic Boy (Vince Van Patten). One episode, The Seven Million Dollar Man, featured a new 'state of the art' bionic man, but he cracked up under the strain.

Another of the series' more memorable characters was Bigfoot, (played first by Andre the Giant, and, later by Addams Family star Ted Cassidy). Sasquatch was first revealed in The Secret of Bigfoot as a creature created by aliens in their underground laboratory.

The Six Million Dollar Man premiered in Britain in September 1974 and, with The Bionic Woman, became one of the most successful American imports of the mid-1970s before the law of diminishing re-runs finally caught up with the 60 mph man in the early 1980s. Most areas have seen most of the 102 episodes (plus pilot) but one tale, Outrage in Balinderry about an Irish terrorist group called the IBA (!), was only seen on Southern before being banned.

The UK premiere run for The Six Million Dollar Man began on the 5th September 1974. The series' executive producers were Glen A. Larson, Harve Bennett and Allan Balter. The series producers were Michael Gleason, Lee Sigel, Joe L. Cramer and Fred Frierberger. The music was by Oliver Nelson.

The Six Million Dollar Man was one of the few successful attempts in the 1970s to produce a series about a super powered individual. The series first appeared in March 1973 as a 90 minute made for TV movie which was broadcast under the banner ABC Suspense Theatre. The movie proved popular enough to have a pair of additional movies produced for broadcast that fall. Their success in the ratings prompted the regular weekly series which premiered in January of 1974.

Another thing which changed as the series progressed was the type of adversaries which Steve faced. During the first season most of the bad guys were of the 'normal' variety, many of whom could have appeared in a 'normal' crime/ action drama. However Steve's bionic powers gave him an edge over these villains and in order to give him more of a challenge, his adversaries gradually became more powerful and soon Steve found himself facing off against Aliens and a scientist who had the power to alter the moon's orbit.

One of the most significant events in The Six Million Dollar Man was the introduction of Steve's girlfriend Jamie Sommers in March 1975. James was given her own series, THE BIONIC WOMAN and there were frequent crossovers between the two series when a threat was presented that required two bionic agents to handle.

The TV reunion movies did not pass up Steve and Jamie. In 1987 they were called back to duty for the first of three movies. The first two reunion movies appeared on NBC and both introduced a new bionic character in the hopes that the new character would prove popular enough to be given their own series. Neither attempt was successful. The third reunion movie was broadcast on CBS in 1994 and in it the pair were finally married.

During the fifth season when the shows were on different networks there were no crossover episodes. During this season Richard Anderson and Martin E. Brooks held the distinction of being the only actors to portray the same characters on different programmes, on different networks at the same time.

Lee Majors played Colonel Steve Austin, with the only other central character of any note being Oscar Goldman, the honcho of the program to rebuild the former astronaut, and then use him as a super spy. Rudy was the name of the doctor who kept Austin tuned up and ready for assignment.

The show had its flaws...like how could the remaining human flesh support the incredible physical loads put upon it when Austin yanked open a lead lined vault (physics and logic would suggest that he'd tear the flesh of the arm used to brace himself, as is true anywhere on his torso. And with one eye as a special camera, didn't this give him problems with depth perception, etc. The show degraded quickly into a pseudo-spy drama each week and there was damn little sci-fi content once you got past the 60 mph leaps across the field of view. A made-for-TV movie was made for a special reunion, bring Lee Majors, Lindsay Wagner and a few other together on a very special mission.

"We can rebuild him. We have the technology. We can make him better than he was. Better, stronger, faster." That was Oscar Goldman's vow as surgeons put Steve Austin back together again with artificial limbs after a plane crash. The 1974 pop rock single "The Six Million DolJar Man," sung by Dusty Springfield, proclaims Steve Austin as "one of a kind." This modern-day superman did what few TV heroes have done: cheated the noose of cancellation twice within one year. When it was reprieved the second time, The Six Million Dollar Man found its footing and blasted off as one of America's favorite shows.

The series first appeared as a successful 90minute TV movie. Two TV movies followed, and the Six Million Dollar Man nearly died in the process. The show was then revamped as a 60minute show and rocketed into the top 15. In its second year, the series sank in the ratings and was given up for dead until miraculous creative surgery (and a new time slot) propelled it into a major hit.

Author Martin Caidin, whose novel Marooned was turned into a 1969 feature film, had a lively background that included being a war correspondent and working with the Air Force on its early bionics program. Universal studios was interested in turning his novel Cyborg into a TV film after Warner Brothers didn't pick up its option. "Richard Irving, who was vice-president of Universal, flipped over it," recalls Caidin. "A screenwriter wrote it as a TV movie, and I served as technical advisor. No one was expecting to make a series out of it."

Lee Majors was cast as Steve Austin, who is torn apart in the crash of an experimental plane. (Footage of an actual crash of an X-15 was used for the scene. The real pilot of that 1967 crash suffered severe injuries which ended his test pilot career. The TV movie followed Steve Austin's difficulty in adjusting to being a bionic man. He reluctantly becomes an agent for the government's Office of Strategic Intelligence (O.S.I.). Darren McGavin played Steve's boss, Oscar Goldman, in the film. "Oscar Goldman was based on a real person, who shall go unnamed," says Caidin. "Dr. Rudy Wells [who spearheads the bionic surgery] was also a real person. He was my flight surgeon in the Air Force. We did the bionic research together. Rudy loved being portrayed in the series."

Caidin recalls, "The director, Dick Irving, wanted as much reality as possible, and he was a very tough taskmaster. That was marvelous because I'm a pretty nasty S.O.B. myself when it comes to work! I don't believe in putting up with somebody who can't do a job."The TV movie, in Caidin's eye, got the job done as speculative science and good entertainment. Steve Austin's bionic arm was based on an experimental prosthetic arm being tested at the UCLA Medical Center. Caidin's first candidate to play the bionic man was actor Monte Markham. "I knew Monte's brother quite well. He was a top navy pilot. Monte is one of the finest actors in the world. But he was doing a lawyer show at the time [The New Perry Mason]. They picked Lee because he was an ex-football player and was good for action. He's pretty dull as an actor, but he fit the part perfectly. He appealed to that 12- to 14-year-old audience."

The Six Million Dollar Man TV movie was a success. "There was an incredible reaction to the show," says Caidin. "Mail, calls, telegrams, and an avalanche of favorable reviews." The result was two more 90-minute Six Million Dollar Man movies for ABC in the fall of 1973, produced by Glen Larson. This time, Richard Anderson was recruited to play Oscar Goldman. "I cast Richard," says Larson, "because when you're doing what I call a bullshit premise, you need to surround it with as much honesty and reality as you can. Richard brought us that credibility. It was less likely that the series was going to end up as a cartoon. Frank Price asked me to redevelop [the premise] and make a new pilot. I wrote the first 90-minute episode, 'Wine, Women and War.'"

Larson's TV movies gave a James Bondian twist to the series. Steve Austin was a suave, sophisticated bionic man surrounded by beautiful women. "I don't know if I would side it with James Bond," says Larson, "but Frank Price did write a two-page treatment delineating where the 90-minute movies would go. I believe his treatment did point out the success of other heroes, including James Bond. The chief adversary in 'Wine, Women and War' was sort of a Bondian bad guy."

The ratings of the two TV films were disappointing. "The 90-minute episodes almost killed the whole thing," says Caidin. "They were the worst pieces of shit I had seen in years. Austin was a James Bondian guy, and that's crappo! Larson is a very successful producer, but we didn't get along. When he turned it into James Bond, I raised holy hell with Dick Irving. I said, 'Dick, you're gonna kill the damn thing. We've got a great thing going here and you're gonna blow it completely with this bullshit.' I was so displeased that I had my name removed from the credits of those shows."

With the future of Six Million Dollar Man in limbo, Universal called in producer Harve Bennett. "I've kinda been the doctor who comes in and saves the dead patient," muses Bennett, who resuscitated the Star Trek movie series with The Wrath of Khan [1982] after the disappointing first film. Initially, Bennett wasn't excited over saving The Six Million Dollar Man. "I was exhausted from having done The Mod Squad for five years," he says. "Universal said, 'Look, only you can make a series out of this.'" Bennett agreed to revitalize the project. He, too, saw the James Bond style as a mistake. "It may have been right for Sean Connery, but Lee Majors is Lee Majors. So the ratings dropped, and ABC wasn't interested in continuing it as a series."

ABC finally agreed to consider one more shot. "Frank Price asked me to watch the pilot and see what I could do," says Bennett. "The pilot had presented Lee as a kind of old-fashioned western hero. There's a marvelous scene where he's walking off into the desert, just before his near-fatal flight, chewing a match. He reminded me of Gary Cooper. I told Frank, 'Let's go back in that direction. Let me make this character a salt-of-the-earth Gary Cooper.' They said, 'Fine.' They also said, 'Do it in six weeks!' That part they hadn't told me about! I accepted the series commitment in November 1973, and we were on the air in mid-January. We returned Lee to that monosyllabic, shy-with-ladies, aw-shucks kind of hero. That, to me, is what made it work. He was a modest, kind of western man amidst all of this technology, which he used well. I've worked with the military on films, and I admire military people who keep cool when worlds collide around them. Lee portrayed that wonderfully."

Series producer Lionel Siegel agrees. "The casting of Lee Majors eventually determined the personality and character of The Six Million Dollar Man. Majors is a reactor, and his responses are often cryptic and sometimes clever. He was perfect for the part. Lee had a preference for a minimum of dialogue, and that fit his southern background. Lee is a country boy, smart as a fox for business, a tough competitor and a loyal friend. He postures sometimes as a country bumpkin, but inside he's slick." Ralph Sariego, who worked in production on The Six Million Dollar Man, recalls, "Lee, during the first season, was a very affable, warm and open fellow. By the second year, he became kinda distant and kept to himself. He developed a small circle of friends. That's a very common thing to happen to a leading actor when his show becomes a hit."

The Six Million Dollar Man premiered in January 1974 as a Friday night action show for ABC and immediately zoomed into the top ten. The oft-repeated action sequences included Steve running 60 miles an hour, bending steel beams and leaping to great heights. "We could have gone into a more science fiction direction and thereby produced some very theatrical pieces," says Siegel, "but the cost was prohibitive. The cost and time necessary to build a robot, for instance, made that impractical." Siegel viewed the series as "in its own way, a morality play. It was also the forerunner of using disabled people in contemporary drama. Steve Austin had various prosthetics attached to his body which enabled him to be normal. The fact that this gave him super strength was a bonus. For me, if the action didn't keep you tuned, if the humor didn't work, if you didn't get a lump in your throat, and if you couldn't follow the plot, we failed. If most of the above did work, we succeeded."

With the series on track as an hourly show, Martin Caidin had his name put back on the credits. "I'd say the weekly series got within 90 percent of what I felt was the perfect kind of show," he says. "Obviously, a man cannot run 60 miles an hour without leaning into his own path of run because of the center of gravity. A man cannot pick up a 4,000-pound car without counter-bracing himself for leverage. We all understood that. This was made to entertain. They kept it as technically accurate as possible, but they didn't want to be too inhibited."

The series began its 1974-75 season as a ratings disaster. ABC's entire Friday night line-up, which included Clint Walker's Kodiak and The Night Stalker, collapsed. Six Million Dollar Man, stuck in the middle of the line-up, crashed to the bottom of the ratings. For the first time in TV history, ABC suspended its Friday night programming and ran old movies until the schedule could be reworked. "We were close to being canceled," confirms Siegel. "ABC was the more 'nervous' of the networks at the time. The power of Universal and ABC's lack of enthusiasm for their new pilots resulted in a renewal. New story editors were hired, more promotion in the markets was scheduled and bigger budgets were allotted for guest stars."

Two changes saved the series: a move to Sunday nights-where the battered show slowly came out of its ratings stupor-and a decision to do a love story that would ignite into a TV phenomenon.

Writer Kenneth Johnson picks up the story. "A close friend of mine in college, writer Steven Bochco, introduced me to Harve Bennett. The Six Million Dollar Man was sort of flagging. They were desperate for new scripts. Harve and I hit it off, and one of our ideas was The Bride of Frankenstein. I said, 'Doesn't it make sense to give Steve Austin a mate?' Harve smiled and said, 'You know, Frank Price and I have been talking about the same thing. You wanna write it?' "I wrote a script in a week, called 'Mrs. Steve Austin.' We later called it 'The Bionic Woman.' While everyone liked it, Fred Silverman [in charge of programming] thought it was too dense for an hour script. I said to Harve, 'What does that mean?' He said, 'It means you've got too much in there. Let's make it a two-hour script.'"

Cast as the love interest was Lindsay Wagner, a Universal contract player. As Steve Austin's high school sweetheart, Jaime Sommers, she's critically injured in a parachuting accident and restored with bionic limbs. "My original script ended with the bionic woman, Jaime Sommers, being put in a cryogenic deep freeze because I didn't want to kill her," says Johnson. "Frank Price and Fred Silverman said, 'No, no! We want her dead. We don't want a lot of bionic people running around. We're doing Love Story. She's got to die.' I told them it was a big mistake. They wanted her dead, so I killed her with a cerebral hemorrhage. The episode turned out to be the highest-rated Six Million Dollar Man ever. The letters started coming in. People were upset that we had killed the bionic woman. We even had a letter from the head of the Psychology Department at Boston University: 'How dare you create such a splendid archetype for women to admire and pattern themselves after and then so brutally kill her!'"

"Frank Price and Fred Silverman were going, 'Yeah, Ken! Why did you have to kill her off? Bring her back to life!'" It took Johnson less than two weeks to devise a way to return the bionic woman to life. Johnson used his original cryogenics theory as the solution. After suffering the hemorrhage, Jaime is put in cold storage until she can be cured. "Bringing her back to life actually worked to my advantage," he says. "In the process of being revived, she had lost her memory of her love for Steve. You felt sympathy for Steve ever after because of his unrequited love for her. It also gave the characters an opportunity to strike sparks and start over again."

The Six Million Dollar Man was renewed for a third season, and Johnson wrote the season opener, "The Return of the Bionic Woman." "The ratings were phenomenal," says Johnson. "It took The Six Million Dollar Man into the top ten, where it stayed for a long time. Everybody loved it. Fred Silverman looked at the ratings and said, 'Gee, we gotta spin-off "The Bionic Woman" and make it a separate show!'" Johnson wrote a spin-off pilot for The Bionic Woman, which debuted in January 1976. It immediately joined The Six Million Dollar Man in the top ten.

Meanwhile, as The Six Million Dollar Man began its third year, there was an important cast change. Martin Brooks replaced Alan Oppenheimer as Dr. Rudy Wells. "ABC wanted a younger, more vigorous guy," says Lionel Siegel. "It was the early wave of the network's apathy for older actors in TV series." The third year took itself less seriously. Johnson feels this helped pave the way for the show's popularity. "When I joined the show it was very stiff and straight. I brought a sense of humor. In one of my early scripts, Steve's pulling tree stumps out by hand. He pulls one stump out so hard he goes flying across the lawn and falls flat on his ass. He also mows the lawn bionically. Somebody said, 'No, you can't do that.' I said, 'Bullshit! If you were bionic, wouldn't you mow the lawn that way?' I showed that the bionic people could laugh at their abilities and use them in ways that were funny, not just saving people from Arab terrorists and knocking walls down."

We started doing what I referred to as 'pocket bionics' where Jaime would open a can of tuna with her bionic thumbnail. George Burns told me a long time ago that if you're gonna tell a lie, put as much truth as you can into it. I tried to do that here. What would I do if I were bionic? I think the humor is why The Six Million Dollar Man became a lot more successful."

The series also had fun with its casting. While its plots were often out of Cold War storage, its guest stars represented mainstream Americana: Gymnast Cathy Rigby, pro football player Larry Csonka, Hamburger chomper Rodney Allen Rippey, announcer Frank Gifford, and comedians Flip Wilson and Sonny Bono. One of the most popular guest characters for the series was Bigfoot. Steve encounters the legendary creature while investigating reports of alien activity. "Bigfoot had fascinated me for a long time," says Johnson. "I thought, 'Suppose Bigfoot isn't what we think he is? What if he's a robotic entity created by extra-terrestrials?' Six Million Dollar Man had already done an episode with Meg Foster as an alien ["Straight On Till Morning"]. So an alien Bigfoot wasn't out of line."

Johnson made sure the far-out plots didn't tax the show's budget. "In my script, Bigfoot beats up Steve and carries him through an ice tunnel. Production manager Ted Schills called me, saying, 'Ken, are you outta your mind? We can't build anything like that.' I said, 'Ted, have you been on the Universal tours lately? The train drives through an ice tunnel.' In all the time I was at Universal, I used every damn thing on tour! My production designer, Chuck Davis, and I would look for sets to steal. We literally wrote those sets into scripts so we wouldn't have to spend money making them. Today, there's hardly any of the backlot left. The place where Steve and Bigfoot had their battle is now all restaurants and parking lots!"

Johnson enjoyed working with Lee Majors, recalling, "He was a terrific guy. When I first started doing the show, he was holding out for more money. He was very whimsical about it. He said to me, 'Kenny, don't think I don't know how lucky I am. If I hadn't lucked into this show, I'd be coaching high school football somewhere.' He was a solid pro and very easy to work with. He always knew his lines. We only had a couple of tiffs, which he later apologized over. He also knew his limitations. He knew he wasn't an Al Pacino. Then again, neither was Steve McQueen or Gary Cooper. Lee could play that strong, silent type very well. He also had a whimsy about him, and he was pleased when I'd inject some humor into the series. We did one episode where he's down south and there are guys smuggling moonshine. It wasn't saving the world, but it was a funny show."

Johnson eventually had to make a decision regarding his bionic future. "For awhile, I was writing and producing both The Six Million Dollar Man and Bionic Woman. Six Million Dollar Man was number one in the ratings, The Bionic Woman was number three." To ease the work load, Johnson had to choose between the two series. "I elected to leave Six Million Dollar Man, and went to work full time on Bionic Woman. Lindsay's acting gave me a little more latitude to work with. It turned out to be the right way to go. With The Bionic Woman's success, Universal began to ponder the possibility of other bionic spin-offs. Majors was already unhappy about The Bionic Woman series, feeling it might affect his show's popularity. Individual episodes featured bionic dogs, a bionic boy and a seven million dollar man, played by Monte Markham. "Monte did two appearances as the seven million dollar man," says Martin Caidin. "I thought it was a stupid idea. Monte did a good job, but the show was pretty hackneyed. The bionic boy was purely puke time."

Writer Richard Landau came in to produce, with Fred Freiberger, the last season of The Six Million Dollar Man. Going into the 1977-78 season, the series was now beginning its descent in the ratings. "We knew this might be its last year," says Landau. "We tried to goose the show up with more two-parters and some location filming in Hawaii. We had one story set on the dark side of the moon and brought back the Death Probe [wayward land rover from space]. We also tried to get Steve romantically involved."

Landau enjoyed his first meeting with Lee Majors and recalls his sly sense of humor. "I went up to his trailer outside the studio," recalls Landau. "I'm post-polio, and I use a cane for walking. Getting into the trailer was like climbing Mt. Everest. A couple of Lee's bodyguard characters offered to help me up and I said no, I can do it myself. After a lot of struggling, I hoisted myself up into the trailer and half-collapsed on the couch. There was Lee. I introduced myself as the new producer. He looked at me with a straight face and said, 'Tell me something. If I invited you to play tennis, would you do it?' I knew he was putting me on. I said, 'Well, shit, Lee-only if I can hop back and forth over the net to warm up first.' That broke the ice. He was a friendly, down-to-earth guy. He was great with the crew."

There was some question, going into the fifth and final year, whether Majors would sign with the show again. "Lee's contract hadn't been renegotiated," says Landau. "He wanted more money, so the studio asked us to come up with other actors as possible replacements. Harrison Ford's name came up. This was just before Star Wars. Believe it or not, Universal said, 'No, no. He's not right for an action show.' Of course, Ford went on to do the Indiana Jones movies."

"Lee was a holdout," continues Harve Bennett. "Universal felt it was terribly important to hold the line. There was a protracted period of holdout negotiations. We were asked by the studio to test five actors for the part."

Since I wasn't head of the studio, I did what I was asked to do. Gil Gerard [the future Buck Rogers] was one of the actors. He got the most attention because he was a contract player at Universal and he was the most physical. We also tested Bruce Jenner. It was all for naught, because Lee eventually signed back on." By 1978, the bionic saga was over. The Six Million Dollar Man (as well as The Bionic Woman) was retired. Martin Caidin feels there were two major factors that contributed to the show's cancellation. "Harve Bennett was a damn good producer," says Caidin, "but both Bennett and Universal studios refused to update the science on the series.

There had been great advances made in bionics, but for some reason, they didn't want to reflect that. I said, 'Unless you change the basic bionic stuff, you're gonna be old hat before much longer.' The other problem was that Lee Majors was saying to the press, 'I'm gonna get out of this show. To hell with it!' and he began to lose his faithful fans. That helped to kill the show. Majors wanted to do motion pictures. He went on to do a Viking movie afterward. It was set 2,000 years ago. When a Viking comes ashore, you see a Coca-Cola can on the beach. Right! Terrific! Great technical work!" says Caidin wryly. The Six Million Dollar Man was still in the top 40. "There was talk of continuing the series without Majors," says Caidin. Actor Gil Gerard was again brought up as a possible replacement, but the plan was abandoned.

"We hoped that the series would have a lastminute reprieve," says Richard Landau, "but the series had run its course. There wasn't much more you could do with it. It had a good life." Harve Bennett agrees. "There are very few hour-long shows that go five years." The dwindling demand for hour shows in America hurt The Six Million Dollar Man's syndicated sales domestically, but there was enough interest for the making of two Six Million Dollar Man Bionic Woman TV films in the 1980s. Lee Majors and Lindsay Wagner reprised their roles. In 1990, Richard Anderson discussed a new Six Million Dollar Man project with Martin Caidin. "He was interested in reviving the series on a weekly basis," recalls Caidin. Those plans didn't materialize. Majors and Wagner did reunite for a third TV film, Bionic Ever After (1994).

The series was a big smash in the international market. "A few years ago, my wife and I went to Caracas, Venezuela," says Caidin. "We were front page news. I was known as the creator of The Six Million Dollar Man. At the airport were these big mobs of kids. I felt like the Pied Piper of Hamelin. The series is now showing in 72 countries." Caidin also is gratified by how the series popularized the concept of bionics. "When I wrote the novel Cyborg, nobody really believed in bionics. Now bionics has become a byword throughout the world. It's changed the way people think in terms of their own health, and the ability [science has] to repair their bodies. When I wrote the book, it was a dream. Now there's a whole generation growing up in a world where bionics is a reality."

SKY

It told the story of a young time-travelling deity from another dimension who gets knocked off course by a black hole and becomes stranded on Earth. Though immature, Sky has power to compel humans to do what he wants. Enter a trio of West Country teenagers, Arby and Jane Vennor and Roy Briggs, who become caught up in helping the blond, blue-eyed Sky to return to his own dimension, via the 'Juganet'.

Neither outright hero nor villain, Sky is opposed on Earth by Goodchild, a sinister character who can materialise and dematerialise at will, representing 'the natural opposition of Earth to anything out of place'. Sky's presence has evoked a disturbing reaction from nature - one scene has tree roots trying to throttle him when he shelters below ground. Sky must find the 'Juganet' before the opposing forces grow too strong.

Back in the 1970s, when nearly every science fiction series ITV mounted was touted as a rival to DOCTOR WHO, all the best ideas emerged in the children's slots (TIMESLIP, ACE OF WANDS, THE TOMORROW PEOPLE). Sky was another such contender. Written by one-time Doctor Who writers Bob Baker and Dave Martin. Much of the series was filmed around Stonehenge, Glastonbury and Avebury, giving it an added mystical twist. Of the cast, Richard Speight, who played Roy, had done his own travelling through space and time as the young Time Guardian, Peter, in The Tomorrow People. Sky, which appeared in 1976, was one of several strong fantasy and adventure series produced by HTV, whose output also included CHILDREN OF THE STONES (1977) and KING OF THE CASTLE (1978), the latter also scripted by Baker and Martin.

The series' director was Derek Clark, the producer for the series was Leonard White, executive producer was Patrick Dromgoole and the designer John Biggs.

SKY RANGER,THE

Initially called The Man Who Stole the Earth, this serial pits two inventors against each other. Santro (Semels), a Mabuse--type mad scientist with hypnotic skills develops a noiseless plane that can climb at a vertiginous rate and circle the Earth in a matter of hours; Professor Elliot (Redman) discovers a laser-type beam that can send signals to Mars and pick out objects no matter how high they fly. Santro seeks to destroy the ray since it constitutes the only thing on Earth that could threaten his plane, but his daughter (Shanor) helps the other inventor's daughter (Caprice) and her boyfriend (Seitz) to overcome the megalomaniac plans of her father whose plane ends up destroyed in the last instalment.

The star of the show, in all senses of the term, is Seitz, known as the Serial King because he produced, directed and often starred in a number of .serials which were quite successful. He started as a writer-director in 1916, collaborated on The Perils of Pauline (1914) and on Pearl White's next smash hit, THE EXPLOITS OF ELAINE (1914) under the supervision of Louis Gasnier. He took a co-directing credit on THE ROMANCE OF ELAINE (1915). Later on, he became one of the most prolific professional directors in Hollywood, making nearly 40 movies between 1927 and 1933 before moving to Hollywood, where he worked at an even more rapid pace, taking responsibility for the popular Andy Hardy series' most anodyne episodes. Few directors equalled Seitz's professionalism. Many made better pictures. The serial was produced by George B. Seitz.

SKY TRACKERS

Mike, Nikki, Maggie and their families live in a remarkable place beneath the massive gleaming white dishes of a space tracking station, located in the heart of the Australian outback. The kids are scientists' children. Yet they're ordinary kids facing the ordinary problems of growing up, but under very extraordinary circumstances. Home is a window on the universe. Students come to the tracking station from all around the world to conduct space-related experiments under the sponsorship of the Wright Foundation, an organisation dedicated to the promotion of science education. Nikki is 13 and into science. Her dream is to be the first person on Mars. Mike is 14 and he thinks science sucks. Jimi Hendrix is his hero. With his horse and guitar, Mike knows all there is to know about the meaning of life. Who cares about the stars? Tony, Mike's dad, and Marie, Nikki's mum, tentatively fall in love. Nikki and Mike do the same. And nine year old Maggie gets in everybody's way.

This Australian TV series was mainly a teen drama of sorts based around a radio telescope, however they did on some occasions venture into the realms of science fiction with Episode 14 - Aliens in which "Nikki, Mike and Maggie see lights in the sky one night. They wonder if it's a UFO. Giles seems to be acting strangely and Maggie thinks Giles might be an alien. Mike and Nikki discover that Giles is interested in UFO's: a friend of Giles disappeared while investigating a UFO sighting. Mike, Nikki and Maggie hide in the back of Giles' vehicle as he goes out one night to investigate the cause of the weird lights. The lights appear and everyone is stunned. Whilst not admitting that there could be visitors from another planet, Giles does concede that "there are more things in heaven and earth than we could ever dream of".

SLEEPWALKERS

"Ever wonder what your dreams mean? This journey into the dream world combines the action and suspense of never knowing when reality ends and begins, and provides viewers a thrilling assault on all senses. A unique hour, directed by David Nutter (THE X FILES, MILLENNIUM), "Sleepwalkers" travels to the worlds that exist only in your wildest, sometimes deadliest, dreams.

The last hope for those plagued by their nocturnal world is a place called The Morpheus Institute. Founded by top neurophysiologist Nathan Bradford, the Institute allows members of its elite staff to enter other people's dream worlds - and help combat their demons. More often than not, the lines between reality and dream are dangerously blurred.

The head dream interpreter/psychologist, Kate Russel, tries to find the significant link between the conscious and the subconscious. Steve Turner, cofounder of the Institute, specialises in pushing the envelope, staying in the dream world longer and longer each time. The newest recruit is Ben Costigan - a former patient, and former fighter pilot, who's not afraid of risk. Which is fortunate because, in the dream world, if Steve, Ben or Kate get hurt, the injury translates into the real world. Offering technical support is Vincent Konefke - an emotional computer expert. Together, the team confronts the problems of strangers - in a place where nothing is as it seems, and anything imaginable is possible."

This show is described as a cross between THE X FILES and ER. Directed by David Nutter (The X-Files, Millennium) and starring NOWHERE MAN'S Bruce Greenwood, which follows the exploits of researchers who can tap into and take part in people's dreams and nightmares. The series was cancelled after only two episodes, but all of the episodes have been aired in the UK on The Sci-Fi Channel.

From the NBC press release: "Sleepwalkers travels to the worlds that exist only in your wildest, sometimes deadliest, dreams. The last hope for those plagued by their nocturnal world is place called The Morpheus Institute. Founded by top neurophysiologist Nathan Bradford the institute allows members of its elite staff to enter other people's dream worlds - and help combat their demons. More often than not, the lines between reality and dream are dangerously blurred."

Cancelled after only two episodes; one cannot help but wonder why NBC bothered to even put it on the air; clearly they had no interest in giving it a chance to find viewers. On the other hand, the first three episodes weren't terribly good, either. But buy that measure, BABYLON 5 never should have made it beyond its first movie, and it evolved into one of the best science fiction series ever aired.

The series co-producers for the series were Stephen Gaghan and Sara B. Charno, consulting producer was David Nutter, supervising producer was Tim Iacofano, the executive producers for the series were Stephen Kronisk and David S. Goyer, who were also the writers for the series.

SLIDERS

'What if you could travel to parallel worlds. The same year, the same Earth, only different dimensions. A world where the Russians rule America, or where your dreams of being a superstar come true. Or where San Francisco was a maximum security prison. My friends and I found the gateway. Now the problem is finding a way back home.'

(Quinn Mallory. Sliders' opening narration)

A young scientist Quinn Mallory, discovers a way in which to enter other dimensions which are alternative versions of Earth. Together with his girlfriend Wade Wells, a singer Rembrandt 'Crying Man' Brown and a professor, Maximillian Arturo, they get lost in the other dimensions with no way of getting home.

Slip-sliding through these parallel dimensions are Quinn Mallory (former child actor Jerry O'Connell), a young physics genius who creates the wormhole in the basement of his San Francisco home; the arrogant Professor Maximillian Arturo (played by Welsh actor John Rhys--Davies) who is forced to acknowledge his student's brilliance; Mallory's computer technician friend and, initially at least, unrequited love Wade Wells (Sabrina Lloyd); and Rembrandt 'Crying Man' Brown (Cleavant Derricks), a washed-up Sixties soul singer from the Spinning Tops group, accidentally swept along for the ride when his car is engulfed by the portal while he's driving by Quinn's house.

A tragic accident happened during the filming of a 3rd season episode when one of the stunt men died on the set. Actor John Rhys-Davies left the show in the middle of the third season to be replaced by a new slider. Sabrina Lloyd who played Wade Wells also decided to leave the show at the end of its third season. In the fourth season Jerry O'Connell's real life brother Charlie joins the sliders as Colin Mallory.

This weekly show, recently renewed for a third season (due to a deluge of letters from fans to Fox), features the physics grad student Quinn who invented the device, his mentor Professor Arturo, his friend and semi-romantic interest Wade Wells, and ex-Rhythm & Blues star Rembrandt "Crying Man" Brown. In each episode, they "slide" to a different alternative history Earth where, for example, America became Communist, or Dinosaurs are still alive, or women hold all political power.

They struggle for survival, do good deeds, and try to find their way back home (as every wandering hero since Odysseus has done). There are some parallels to the TV series "Quantum Leap", and many variations on an idea well-known in science fiction literature: ALTERNATE WORLDS or "Allohistory."

All you'll ever need to know!

The Pilot

The series' premiere perfectly established Tracy Torme's vision for the show. Many fans consider that the series went downhill thereafter.

This Slide of Paradise

Finishing Season Three with a great cliff-hanger which sees Wade and Rembrandt return home to Earth, but without Quinn or Maggie.

Post Traumatic Slide Syndrome

The Sliders believe they are home and Arturo becomes famous for inventing Sliding. This episode explores the way the Sliders view each other and how they would adjust to society if they actually did get home:

Invasion

Aliens discover Sliding technology and use it to invade. This episode adds a new dimension to the series which was unfortunately forgotten about until Season Four.

Exodus, Part II

This instalment explored the wider impact of Sliding on society and also features the Professor's emotional exit from the series.

Bubbling Under: Other episodes that are well-worth looking out for include: Gillian of the Spirits, The Guardian, Fever and Love Gods, Electric Twister Acid Test.

An unfortunate trend during Season Three for cheap movie rip-offs such as the atrocious Dinosllde and vampires episode Stoker. Other riotably poor episodes include , Rules of the Game a video gams world and Seasons Greedings (a slushy Christmas episode).

A teenage physics whizz accidentally creates a gateway which transports him and three others to a series of parallel Earths. The four heroes slide around the worlds, getting caught up in events on each week's Earth, in the hope that the next slide will take them home. Series Created by Tracy Torme, Sliders explored both the possible (eg America ruled by Russia in the pilot) and what is impossible on our world (eg Dragon Slide in which magic has replaced science). The intended appeal of Sliders was that because it could be set anywhere, the series could constantly be kept fresh and original.

Sliders first aired in the US 22nd March 1995 and the series began the UK on Sky 1 the following September The Good Guys: Genius Quinn Mallory (Jerry O' Connell), his friend Wade Wells (Sabrina Lloyd), singer Rembrandt 'Cry Man' Brown (Cleavant Derricks) and Professor Maximillian Arturo (John Rhys Davies). Arturo was killed in the Season Three and replaced by Maggie Beck (Kari Wuhrer). Wade has conveniently disappeared by the Season Four opener and Quinn's brother Colin (played by Charlie O' Connell) joins in her place several episodes later in Oh Brother, Where Art Thou.

Bad Guys: Season Two introduced evil Sliding aliens the Kromaggs. Season Three featured the bloodthirsty Colo Rickman, who possessed a timer device capable of getting the Sliders home. Rickman was originally played by musician Roger Daltrey. X-Files' William B Davis (Cigarette Smoking Man) appeared as a professor in Eggheads and Nicolas Lea (Krychek turned up as Wade's lover Ryan in Luck of the Draw. Babylon 5's Ed Wase (Morden) played a guard in Dead Man Sliding and Freddy Krueger Robert Englund appeared as a cybernetic scientist in State of the ART.

The vortex opens up just as the Sliders are about to be shot; one of them falls in love an tempted to stay on this week's Earth, an extra character jumps into the vortex with them, never to be seen again.

Conveniently saving on laundry bills, the Sliders often find that when emerging from the vortex their tire differs from when they entered. The end of Gillian o f the Spirits, the Sliders arrive on a world where there are no clothes at all.

'What if . . .' is the provocative premise of this US action adventure series that follows four characters who slide through a man-made wormhole into parallel dimensions of Earth, experiencing alternate versions of our world, or at least the bit of it we call San Francisco!

Sliders was created by award-winning Star Trek: The Next Generation writer Tracy Torme, after he read a biography of George Washington and realised that if one British soldier had aimed a little better there wouldn't have been a United States. Torme peppered the series with intriguing scenarios such as a world where Einstein withheld the secret of nuclear energy and now there are no weapons capable of destroying an asteroid hurtling towards the planet; a world where antibiotics are unknown and an incurable epidemic is raging; a world where America lost the Cold War, or where women hold the upper hand (no change there, then). Even a world where Elvis is still alive.

Sliders is a fun, watchable show that certainly works in a few thought-provoking ideas about what might happen if you introduce ideas from one reality into another - e.g. a nuclear bomb, penicillin or even the American constitution - or even meet your other selves. But too many storylines fail to live up to their teasing premise, as the plot too often falls back on the same formula - the Sliders arrive in a parallel world, get in trouble, get chased and escape in the nick of time. There's an echo, too, of Quantum Leap as, like Sam Beckett, the quartet can't return to their own reality at will and each time they leap into the vortex it's with the hope that the next slide will be 'the slide home'. They actually make it back once, but an 'oiled' squeaky gate at Quinn's house fools them into believing it's not their reality.

One consequence of exploring different versions of the same place (aside from helping the series' budget!) is that the Sliders keep on bumping into some of the same people, which makes it enjoyable to watch out for recurring characters such as motel and Dominion hotel manager Gomez Calhoun, taxi driver Pavel Kurlienko and student Conrad Bennish. Sliders premiered in the US in March 1995 but though it never set the ratings alight, it did well enough to be renewed - even to a full third season of 22 episodes, for 1996-97. Sky One aired first and second season episodes in one complete run from January 1996, and it came to BBC2 from September 1996.

For the fourth season the show was about to get cancelled when the US Sci-Fi Channel stepped in with the money for a fourth season. Know an shorted Fifth season was also produced but with half of the cast leaving and only one original cast member the series was greatly changed from what Tracy Torme had originally envisaged for the series.

Executive producers for the series were Robert K. Weiss, Jacob Epstein, Tracy Torme, Alan Barnette, Leslie Belzberg and John Landis. Producers for the series were Steve Ecclesine, Jon Povill, Tony Blake and Paul Jackson. The music was created by Dennis McCarthy, Stephen Grazioano and Mark Mothersbaugh. Sliders first run in the UK was on the 20th January 1996 on Sky One. The special visual effects were created by Stargate Films, Inc. Script editor for season five was Keith Damron.

SMALL WONDER

Small Wonder was about a family where one of the children was not a child but a sophisticated robot. The Lawson's were that family and Vicki the robot. Ted Lawson was the family patriarch, who at his job as a computer engineer, managed to create a sophisticated robot that was indistinguishable from a ten-year-old girl. All the more remarkable was they he was able to do this without his boss and neighbour Brandon Brindle knowing about it.

Ted brought Vicki home where he attempted to pass her off as a human girl. Most of the time Vicki was a normal precocious ten-year-old girl, however often her not yet perfected programming caused her to behave a bit peculiarly. Ted's family were the only ones aware of Vicki's true nature and many episodes were about them trying to keep everyone else, especially Brandon and his nosy family, in the dark. Another frequent plot line involved Ted's son Jamie coming up with some scheme to take advantage of his 'sister's' special abilities. These abilities included great strength and a mind like, well, like a computer.

Small Wonder was one of the first in the mid eighties revival made for syndication sitcoms. The series was picked up by ITV in 1985, but only 18 episodes were shown, no record exists of any of the other episodes having been seen in the UK. In the US the series was shown on WFLD all in Syndication. This was a routine comedy with a dutiful moral tagged onto the end of each episode. The series was shown in UK first on the 5th October in the Anglia regions and was never fully networked. The executive producer for the series was Howard Leeds.

Small Wonder (1985 - 1989) was a low-budget half-hour American sitcom, created by Howard Leeds. The storylines revolved around V.I.C.I. (pronounced Vicky), an android in the form of a 10-year-old girl, built by Ted Lawson, an engineer/inventor for United Robotronics, in an effort to assist handicapped children. The robot is taken home by Lawson so that it can mature within a family environment. V.I.C.I.'s features include superhuman strength and speed, an AC outlet under her right arm, a parallel port under her left arm, and an access panel in her back. Despite this, the Lawson family tries to pass the robot off as their adopted daughter.

The Lawson family tries to keep the robot's existence a secret, but their disagreeable neighbours, the Brindles, keep on popping up at the most unexpected moments, especially nosy red-headed girl next door Harriet and her parents, Bonnie and Brandon; the latter just happens to be Ted Lawson's boss. The show's humor frequently derived from V.I.C.I.'s attempts to learn human behaviour, V.I.C.I.'s literal interpretation of speech and the family's efforts to disguise the robot's true nature.

The show was produced for first-run syndication by Metromedia Producers (taken over by 20th Century Fox Television in 1986) and the joint-venture consortium New Program Group (NPG). The show ran from September 7, 1985, to February 9, 1989. While the show initially got high ratings, they sagged over time, and the show was canceled after its fourth season.

In the United Kingdom, the show was screened regionally on the ITV Network. A typical timeslot, as followed by Yorkshire Television, was a weekly Monday 6.30pm screening.

In 2002, Robert Blanco, TV critic for USA Today, listed it as a contender for one of the worst TV shows of all time.

In Pakistan, India, China and other Asian countries, Small Wonder was syndicated on the STAR TV Network in the mid-1990s, where the series was an instant hit.

Characters

Ted Lawson (Dick Christie), father, robotics engineer

Joan Lawson (Marla Pennington), mother.

Jamie Lawson (Jerry Supiran), son.

V.I.C.I. (Voice Input Child Identificant) Lawson (Tiffany Brissette), robotic daughter.
 Harriet Brindle (Emily Schulman), nosy neighbor with a crush on Jamie.
 Brandon Brindle (William Bogert), Harriet's father and Ted's boss from stealing Ted's ideas.
 Bonnie Brindle (Edie McClurg), Harriet's mother.

Trivia

V.I.C.I. stood for "Voice Input Child Identity"

The writers needed to explain child actress Brissette's aging during the show. In season 3, Ted gave V.I.C.I. an upgrade. He aged her face, dressed her in modern clothes and allowed her to eat and drink. The food passed through her naturally and the drink cooled her internal system.

SMALLVILLE

AKA: SMALLVILLE : SUPERMAN THE EARLY YEARS (UK)

In 1989, a huge meteor shower destroyed most of the town of Smallville, Kansas, killed a lot of people, and brought Jonathan (John Schneider) and Martha Kent (Annette O'Toole) what they have always wanted: a son. In 2001, their son, Clark (Tom Welling), is a growing man, has two best friends, Pete (Sam Jones III) and Chloe (Allison Mack), and has a crush on the hottest girl in school, Lana Lang (Kristin Kreuk). But his parents have been hiding a secret from him: that they found him inside a spaceship when the meteor shower came. As he begins to develop his powers that will soon transform him into Superman, Clark begins to develop a friendship between his future arch-enemy, the bald Lex Luthor (Michael Rosenbaum), and fights the people that are transformed by the kryptonite that was hidden in the meteors, including a shape-shifting girl, a boy that is becoming more insect than man, and an old killer who can become young again.

Well here we go again, it seems that superman can never really stay off the air for very long, the American public always having a thirst for their most famous superhero. However Smallville has the same premise as SUPERBOY did, basically set in the days of a young Clark Kent. So many of the ideas of that show are bound to be used in this as well. However there are a few major factor, the crew assembled for this production is off a higher standard, and thus the show has much higher production values.

Smallville is an American television series set in Smallville, Kansas, but produced in Vancouver, Canada. Created by writer/producers Alfred Gough and Miles Millar, the series was initially broadcast by The WB. After its fifth season, the WB and UPN merged to form The CW, which is the current broadcaster for the show in the United States. Smallville premiered on October 16, 2001, and concluded its sixth season on May 17, 2007.

The plot follows the adventures of a young Clark Kent as a teenager living in Smallville, Kansas, during the years before he becomes Superman. The first four seasons focused on Clark and his friends' high school years. Since season 5, the show has ventured into more adult settings, with some characters attending college. Recent seasons have also seen an increase in the introductions of other comic book superheroes and villains.

The series has inspired a spin-off pilot episode that was never aired, and promotional tie-ins with Verizon and Sprint. In other media, the show has spawned a series of young-adult novels, a DC Comics comic book and soundtrack releases. The show broke Charmed's record for highest rated debut for The WB, with 8.4 million viewers tuning in for its pilot episode. Viewers will often observe lines of dialogue, guest stars, character wardrobe, musical scores, and scenic design used as allusions to the Superman comic books and films The show however seems more akin to show such as ROSWELL, in that this is very much a teen drama, in the way Superboy was not. Some of the more famous sci-fi names of not are Mark Snow who wrote the music (THE X FILES) and David Carson as director (STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION). The show began airing in the UK on the 31st December 2001.

I just got finished watching SMALLVILLE and I have to say that I'm impressed. Sure, people are going to dismiss it as a Dawson's Creek/ Roswell clone but... oh.... SO WHAT?

The acting is good. The cast are mostly well-chosen (although an Amerindian Lana and a black Pete Ross took a little getting used to). AND, unlike the big budget film versions of Superman and Batman, this series' creators seem to have actually looked at the source material AND USED IT!

Watching the original Chris Reeve flick, I was always interested in seeing more of the Smallville briefly shown in that film's first half hour. Now, Nielsen willing, we'll have five years' worth of a look!

Which makes me want to make a prediction here-- if the series goes the full five or seven years, the final year ends with Clark finally taking his place as Superman.

Okay, that's a "well, DUH" prediction but somebody had to make it!

Cynthia Ettinger was originally cast as Martha Kent in the pilot episode. Before the pilot was broadcast, the role was re-cast with Annette O'Toole and her scenes were edited into the existing footage.

A sequence showing Lex Luthor as President of the United States was filmed on the set of "West Wing, The" (1999).

Annette O'Toole, who plays Mrs. Kent, also appeared in Superman III (1983) as Lana Lang.

The pilot episode shows Chloe handing Pete Ross a wad of cash. Most likely an in-joke from the Canadian production crew, if you look carefully, you can see a Canadian $5 bill sticking out of it.

The WB has made it hard to figure out who played who since all the other cast members were listed in a group instead of the normal-(blank) as (blank).

This episode and 'Metamorphosis' are sometimes shown as a feature-length Pilot. When the series was first shown in the UK (on 31/12/2001), the two episodes were shown in such format.

Annette O'Toole, who plays Martha Kent in this version of events, previously played (adult) Lana Lang in 'Superman III' (1983).

Production

Originally, Tollin/Robbins Productions wanted to do a show about a young Bruce Wayne. The feature film division of Warner Bros. had decided to develop an origin movie for Batman, and, because they didn't want to compete with a television series, had the television series idea nixed.[2] In 2000, Tollin/Robbins approached Peter Roth, the President of Warner Bros. Television, about developing a series based on a young Superman. That same year, Alfred Gough and Miles Millar developed a pilot based on the film Eraser. After watching the pilot, Roth approached the two men about developing a second pilot, based on the young Superman concept that was brought to him. After meeting with Roth, Gough and Millar decided that they didn't want to do a series where there was lots of flying, and a cape. It was here that they developed a "No Tights, No Flights" rule, vowing Clark would not, at any point, fly or don the suit during the run of the show. Gough and Millar wanted to strip Superman down to his "bare essence", and see the reasons behind why Clark became Superman. Gough and Millar also felt that the fact that they were not comic book fans played into their favor. Not being familiar with the universe would allow them an unbiased approach to the series. This didn't keep them from learning about the characters; they both did research on the comics and picked and rearranged what they liked.

Roth, Gough, and Millar knew the show was going to be action oriented, but they wanted to be able to reach that "middle America iconography" that 7th Heaven had reached. To help create this atmosphere, the team decided the meteor shower that brings Clark to Earth would be the foundation for the franchise of the show. Not only does it act as the primary source behind the creation of the super powered beings that Clark must fight, but it acts as a sense of irony in Clark's life. The meteor shower would give him a life on Earth, but it would also take away the parents of the girl he loves, and start Lex Luthor down a dark path, thanks to the loss of his hair during the shower. Roth loved the conflict that was created for Clark, in forcing him to deal with the fact that his arrival is what caused all of this pain. Another problem the creators had to address was why Lex Luthor would be hanging out with a bunch of teenagers. They decided to create a sense of loneliness in the character of Lex Luthor, which they felt would require him to reach out to the teens. Gough and Millar wanted to provide a parallel to the Kents, so they created Lionel Luthor, Lex's father, which they saw as the "experiment in extreme parenting". Chloe Sullivan, another character not originally from the comics, was created to be the "outsider" that the show needed. Gough and Millar felt the character was necessary so someone would notice the weird happenings in Smallville.

Michael Rosenbaum was cast as Lex Luthor, Kristin Kreuk as Lana, and a young construction-worker-turned-model-turned-actor named Tom Welling as Clark. Also cast were Allison Mack as Chloe Sullivan, Sam Jones III as Pete Ross, Eric Johnson as Whitney Fordman, John Glover as Lionel Luthor, Cynthia Ettinger as Martha Kent and John Schneider as Jonathan Kent. After the pilot for the series had already been finished, for unknown reasons, Cynthia Ettinger was replaced with Annette O'Toole (who played Lana Lang in 1983's Superman III), and Cynthia's parts were reshot with Annette O'Toole.

The concept of Smallville has been described by Warner Brothers as being a reinterpretation of the Superman mythology from its roots. Recently, since the November 2004 reacquisition of Superboy by the Siegels, there has arisen contention regarding a possible copyright infringement. The dispute is over ownership of the fictional Smallville, title setting of the show, and a claimed similarity between Superboy's title character and Smallville's Clark Kent. The heirs of Jerry Siegel claim "Smallville is part of the Superboy copyright" of which the Siegels own the rights.

Filming and location

Smallville is filmed at various locales in the Lower Mainland of British Columbia, Canada. The show is produced at BB Studios in Burnaby, a suburb of Vancouver.

However, "main street" Smallville is Cloverdale, British Columbia. Cloverdale is particularly proud of being a filming site for the show; at its entrance is a huge sign which reads "Home of Smallville." When filming started, the high school exteriors were shot at the Vancouver Technical School, interiors at Templeton Secondary School. The Kent farm is a real farm located in Aldergrove.

A movie house, the Clova Cinema in Cloverdale, is used for exteriors of The Talon[9], (the show's coffee house), which is co-owned by Lex Luthor and Lana Lang, who also manages it. In the show, before being turned into a coffee house, The Talon was formerly Smallville's movie theater.

Music

Most episodes feature a song or songs by an alternative rock act. Two soundtrack albums were released, with the second following two years after the first. As yet, none of Mark Snow's Americana-flavored original scores (which at times incorporates John Williams' iconic themes from Richard Donner's 1978 film Superman: The Movie) has been released. On February 25, 2003, Smallville: The Talon Mix was released. The Talon Mix featured a selected group of artists that supplied music for the show. Following that release, on November 8, 2005, Smallville: The Metropolis Mix was released. It followed the same format, featuring selected artists from the show's music.

Cast and characters

The opening season featured eight major roles. Tom Welling was selected to portray a young Clark Kent. Annette O'Toole and John Schneider portrayed Clark's adoptive parents Jonathan and Martha Kent. Michael Rosenbaum became the billionaire heir Lex Luthor. Kristin Kreuk portrayed Lana Lang, and Sam Jones III played Pete Ross. These cast members represented characters that were taken directly from the Superman mythologies, while the rest of the cast would be comprised of characters that were created directly for the show. Allison Mack portrayed the investigative school journalist, and one of Clark's best friends, Chloe Sullivan. Eric Johnson played the part of Lana's boyfriend, Whitney Fordman.

Since the end of the first season, several main cast members have left the series, with a few earning spots as regular cast members. Also, the series has brought in several new recurring guests to help expand certain story arcs. By the end of the first season, the character of Whitney Fordman had been written out of the show, having left for the Marines at the end of the season. When season two began, John Glover, who had been a recurring guest on the show in season one as Lionel Luthor, Lex's father, became a part of the regular cast. Season two saw the character of Jor-El, Clark's biological father, brought in as a main story arc that has expanded for the entire series. Jor-El is portrayed by Terence Stamp, who once portrayed General Zod in the 1978 film Superman and its sequel Superman II. Emmanuelle Vaugier was brought in as Dr. Helen Bryce, a love interest for Lex and for a short point his wife. Lana Lang, whose parents died in the meteor shower that brought Clark, was given a long lost biological father, Henry Small, who was portrayed by Patrick Cassidy. Christopher Reeve was introduced as a special guest for seasons two and three, as the Dr. Virgil Swann, the man that would provide Clark with the knowledge of where he actually came from.

Season three saw the start of introductions for other major comic characters from Superman's mythology. Michael McKean guest starred as Perry White, although this Perry White had not yet become the editor of the Daily Planet. Ian Somerhalder was cast as the mysterious Adam Knight. The character of Adam Knight would serve as a small story arc involving both Lana and Clark. Sam Jones III's Pete Ross was written out of the series at the end of season three. Season four saw the introduction of Erica Durance as Chloe's cousin Lois Lane. Durance's Lois Lane would serve as recurring guest for season four. Jensen Ackles portrayed Jason Teague, who was a new serious love interest for Lana. Jensen received top billing for season four, but he was written out of the show in the season's finale. Season four also began introducing other supernatural characters from the comics. Kyle Gallner was selected to portray Bart Allen; Bart Allen eventually becomes The Flash in the comics. Also, Trent Ford had the duty of playing one of Superman's comic book nemesis, Mikail Mxyzptlk

Erica Durance was given top billing at the start of season five, while John Schneider was written out of the show on the series' 100th episode. In a season long story arc, James Marsters was brought in to play Milton Fine, the alias of comic book villain Brainiac. Season five also introduced 3 additional superheroes from the comic books: Alan Ritchson was cast as Arthur Curry, Denise Quiñones portrayed Andrea Rojas, and Lee Thompson Young was selected to play Victor Stone. Season six introduced 2 recurring characters, Jimmy Olsen and Oliver Queen. Jimmy Olsen was portrayed by Aaron Ashmore, while Justin Hartley played Oliver Queen. Another comic superhero was given recurring guest status, but in a lesser form. Later in season six, Phil Morris was selected to play Martian Manhunter. Although his name is never given, in the episode "Crimson", Chloe uses the name "Martian Manhunter" in reference to the character.

Series overview

Smallville promotional poster for the premiere of its pilot on October 16, 2001 Season 1 saw the introduction of the cast and storylines, including the introduction of a villain (or outcast classmate) deriving a power from kryptonite exposure and appearing in only one episode, in a plot device that becomes known as the "freak of the week". The first season dealt a lot with Clark trying to come to terms with his alien origins, and the revelation that he caused the death of Lana's parents.

Season 2 has fewer "freaks of the week" episodes, focusing more on character development and relationship building. Several key plot points include Lex becoming more entangled in conflict with his father, Chloe digging into Clark's past while dealing with Lionel, Martha and Jonathan Kent's financial troubles, and Lana and Clark's vacillating relationship though they end the season apart. The main story arc, however, focuses on Clark's discovery of his Kryptonian origins. The disembodied voice of Clark's biological father Jor-El is introduced, communicating to Clark via his space ship, setting the stage for plots involving the fulfillment of Clark's earthly destiny. Christopher Reeve, who portrayed Superman in the 1970s and 1980s film series, appears as Dr. Virgil Swann to provide Welling's Clark with information regarding his heritage.

Season 3 focuses on further character development, loyalty, betrayal, and new revelations involving Jor-El. Early in the season, Michael McKean, Annette O'Toole's real-life husband, portrays Clark's future Daily Planet editor Perry White; from this point on, other characters present in the Superman mythos and the DC Universe are introduced to Smallville. Pete Ross' inability to deal with keeping Clark's secret causes him to move to Wichita, Kansas with his mother after his parents' divorce. As of early 2007, Sam Jones has not made any return appearances as Pete Ross.

Season 4 ventures further into the Superman mythos by creating a story arc that runs the length of the season; it involved Clark seeking out three Kryptonian stones (at the instruction of Jor-El) apparently containing the knowledge of the universe.[21] The majority of this season revolves around Lex trying to rekindle a strained friendship with Clark, Lana dating Jason Teague (Jensen Ackles), a young man she meets in France, Clark and numerous other characters vying with one another in attempts to obtain the stones, and Lionel's ambiguous transformation into a good father and person. This season also introduced Lois Lane (Erica Durance) as Chloe Sullivan's (Allison Mack) cousin and the Flash.

Season 5 introduces several elements of the Superman mythos, including Jonathan Kent's death, the Fortress of Solitude, the Phantom Zone, and Zod. The villain Brainiac, in the guise of Professor Milton Fine (James Marsters), becomes a recurring antagonist. The season's central plot revolves around Clark using the knowledge contained in the Fortress of Solitude to train for an impending doom that will befall Earth: the release of Zod from the Phantom Zone due to Fine's machinations. Clark and Lana finally begin a relationship with one another. As with Season 4, season 5 featured a gradually unveiling storyline in conjunction with multiple minor story arcs running in parallel, mid-season and season finale cliffhangers, and cameos from two other notable DC characters, Aquaman and Cyborg.

Season 6 took Clark inside the Phantom Zone, inhabited by a society of exiled criminals from the "28 known galaxies". The destinies of Lionel and Lex play out in the aftermath of Lex's possession by Zod and Lionel's adoption as the "oracle" of Jor-El. Several prisoners escape the Phantom Zone with Clark. DC Comics characters Jimmy Olsen, Oliver Queen (and his superhero alias Green Arrow) and Martian Manhunter are introduced this season, and many of them unite in Smallville to fight a common threat. Clark appears more prepared to accept the greater responsibility and destiny in store for him, by promising to continue his training, at the Fortress of Solitude, once all the escaped Phantom Zone criminals are either returned or destroyed. Other key storylines involve Lana and Lex's marriage, Lex's secret "33.1" experiments,, and the introduction of a Clark clone.

Established powers of Clark Kent

See also: Powers and abilities of Superman

Smallville has established a number of Superman's powers throughout its history. The Pilot introduced Clark as being familiar with his super strength, super speed and becoming aware of his invulnerability, after being hit by a car. Over time, Clark learns new abilities and powers that Superman will possess in the future. A new ability is generally introduced in one episode that centers around Clark discovering, learning to understand and then ultimately controlling the new found power. As the series progresses, Clark exhibits, and learns to control, super vision in the episode "X-Ray", heat vision in the episode "Heat", super hearing in "Whisper", and super breath in "Sneeze". His super hearing developed as a consequence of an injury rendering Clark temporarily blind. Clark's abilities, namely his strength, invulnerability and speed, have continually grown in intensity throughout the series. Many early episodes chronicled his body's reaction to being shot, at first becoming bruised, and later showing few if any marks.

Kryptonite

The element of kryptonite is used as a recurring plot device throughout the series. Kryptonite is shown to have bizarre and lingering effects on human physiology and the young superhero often encounters mutated villains who have developed bizarre powers, such as psychic abilities, shapeshifting, and other paranormal abilities. For this reason, the show is often criticized as being predominantly a "villain of the week" series.

Kryptonite has very different effects on Kryptonians like Clark. The general premise is that Clark is virtually invincible except when around it. Different colors affect Clark differently: Green kryptonite physically weakens him and could possibly kill him if he is exposed to it for too long. Red kryptonite causes him to set aside moral compunctions and act out on his impulses and dark desires. Black kryptonite splits Clark into (and merges him back together from) two separate beings exhibiting two personalities.

Other media

Allison Mack's character Chloe Sullivan has starred in two promotional tie-in series, Smallville: Chloe Chronicles, and Vengeance Chronicles. Both were available online, and were included in the DVD releases of Smallville. There were two "Chloe Chronicles" editions. The first featured Chloe investigating further into the events of the first season episode Jitters. The second edition, Chloe Chronicles, Vol II, was a continuation of the first. In total, the first two series included seven mini-episodes. The third series was a spin-off of the fifth season episode "Vengeance". Titled Vengeance Chronicles, Chloe joins forces with a costumed vigilante whom she dubs the "Angel of Vengeance." In a promotional tie-in with Sprint, Smallville Legends: The Oliver Queen Chronicles was released dictating the early life of Oliver Queen in a six-episode CGI series. On April 19, 2007, a tie-in with Toyota, promoting their new Yaris, featured an online comic strip as interstitial programs, during new episodes, titled Smallville Legends: Justice & Doom. The interactive comic was based on the episode "Justice", which follows the adventures of Oliver Queen, Bart Allen, Victor Stone, and Arthur Curry as they seek to destroy all of LuthorCorp's secret experimental labs. The online series allowed viewers to investigate alongside the fictional team, in an effort to win prizes. The plots of Smallville and the Smallville Legends: Justice & Doom are integral and complimentary to each other.

Smallville creators Al Gough and Miles Millar also developed an Aquaman pilot for The WB Television Network, with Justin Hartley as Arthur Curry. The series was planned to follow the adventures of Arthur, in the same fashion that was being done with Clark. Following the merger of the WB and UPN, the resulting CW network opted not to produce the show. The pilot can be found through the iTunes Store, and the Xbox 360 video marketplace

The scripts are good and the acting skills are good, if you like shows such as EERIE INDIANA, then this would suit you as well. The series was broadcast on The Disney Channel.

So Weird was a television series shot in Vancouver, British Columbia that aired on the Disney Channel from 1999 to 2001. The series at first centered around teenage girl Fiona Phillips (Cara DeLizia) who toured with her rock star mom (Mackenzie Phillips), encountering paranormal activity along the way. Acting as an X-Files for the younger crowd, the series took a darker tone than other Disney Channel Originals. The third and final season saw the replacement of Cara DeLizia with actress Alexz Johnson playing Annie Thelen in a revamped, lighter version of the show. After 65 episodes, Disney Channel halted production on the series.

Season one

The season began with Fiona on tour with her famous rocker mother Molly, brother Jack (Scully to her Mulder), bus driver Ned, his wife Irene, and their son Clu. Stringing all of Fi's paranormal encounters was her search to communicate with her father who died when she was three years old. Fi first "encountered" her father in the second episode titled "Website" where an unknown force sent her internet articles warning her of the future. From alien invasions, time warps, and ghosts, Fi faced 13 episodes worth of paranormal activity. Also encountered: one powerful tulpa, a Bigfoot, angels, and more significantly, the Will o' the Wisp. The season finale featured Jack becoming possessed by a Scottish Will o' the Wisp, aka Spunkie. Fi found the spirit's true name - Bricriu - and saved her brother by speaking it. Bricriu had offered to protect Fi, and while it is understandable that Fi initially believed he was lying, subsequent events in the show proved that Bricriu may have been telling the truth. However, this is questionable at best.

Season two

The second season was even darker than the first, playing out over twenty-six episodes. The premiere picked up with Molly taking time off the tour to record an album. Fi and friend Candy meet a medium who is proven to be a fraud. However, the one who uncovers the fake is actually a medium himself who aids Fi in contacting her father through music on his old guitar. The episode ends in an emotional scene between Fi and Molly revealing how Molly really feels about Fi's search for her father. The character of Clu was reduced during the season as he went off to college. His brother Carey was introduced to fill in the gap. Many classic beasts surfaced within the season, including vampires, werewolves, banshees, trolls, sirens, and merfolk. In a pivotal episode, Fi learned that her father investigated the same kinds of supernatural events that Fi did. In fact, it was exactly what killed him. Fi was angered by her mother's deceit in covering up the truth about her father. Molly was eventually possessed by the same Will o' the Wisp as Jack was in season one, and Fi discovered that Will o' the Wisps or other dark powers, though not necessarily Bricriu himself, may have killed her father, resulting in the car crash that police assumed took his life. In this episode Bricriu used Molly to try and kill a firefighter who had been present at Rick's car crash and was aware that Fi's dad had been dead, with no apparent cause, before the car crashed. Following this episode, Fi had further contact with her father, as the answer to a troll's question - Faith - was revealed at the last moment. The season ended with Fi discovering her father's twin sister received messages from him in her sleep. The messages led Fi to a rooftop where she was attacked by a demon and saved by the ghost of her father. He left her with a message that the spirit world was angry with what she does and would try to stop her. At last, Fi got the proper farewell to her father that she had been searching for. Many DeLizia fans consider this a proper, if not entirely fulfilling, conclusion to the spirit of the series.

Season three

After skewing extremely dark and intricate in its second season, the show was forced into a lighter tone for its final batch of episodes. Cara DeLizia left after the first episode, which introduced family friend Annie Thelen. Fi had yet another encounter with Bricriu that ended with him convincing her to give up her innate attraction to the paranormal in order to protect her family. Fi, unable for whatever reason to see that Bricriu was acting in her best interests, trapped him in a floppy disk. The attraction, manifested in the ring her father gave her, was passed on to Annie as Fi went to live with her aunt. Molly moved the family to a new, brightly colored house.

Annie's story arc was the mystery behind a spirit guide that followed her in the form of a panther. Her character was also musically talented, and episodes featured more of her singing than that of the older Mackenzie Phillips. The season's stories were a far cry from previous episodes, playing such unimaginative plots as being sucked into a painting (which directly followed an episode of people being sucked into photographs) and a detention class that never ended. Fi never reappeared in the season, not even the final episode, which was a clip show of mostly the third season.

Cancellation

After 65 installments, Disney canceled the show as was standard practice at the time no matter how popular a series it was. After the show ended, the series' reruns were pushed further back on the schedule. Before it was taken off completely, the show was airing at 3:00 AM.

Unaired plots

Executive producers Jon Cooksey and Ali Marie Matheson had plotted out a very different and dark third season. Season two would have ended with Rick being thrown off the roof rather than having a tearful farewell with his daughter. Season three would then pick up with stories including Bricriu making a reappearance, possessing Fi who would later be saved by Molly's priest brother. Fi would have continued to investigate the paranormal but the encounter on the rooftop would have made her more cautious; the Phillips witch ancestry would be delved into; the alien thread from the past two seasons would have come full circle; Jack would have been revealed to have lived a past life as a knight (subtly alluded to in past episodes); Molly's past alcoholism (the subject of "In the Darkness") would have been addressed; and Rick's story would have continued through to the series finale of Fi going into Hell to rescue her father.

However, Disney would not allow the dark themes to be included in the show. They instead opted for a lighter tone to dominate the final season. This led to executive producers Cooksey and Matheson leaving the show. However, most of the planned plots would not have been possible because Cara DeLizia had already made the decision to leave and pursue other projects.

The other known incidence of Disney rejecting proposed stories was the unproduced episode "Chrysalis." The episode would have featured Carrie helping a friend who was a victim of addiction. The episode would have also introduced the backstory of Molly's alcoholism. The episode "Avatar" was aired instead.

Fan reaction

So Weird was popular amongst older audiences, more so than most other Disney Channel Original Series. Most fans had latched on to the first two seasons with its dark mythology, especially when led by central character Fiona Phillips.

When the lighter tone of season three came around, it seemed to alienate most fans (many of which still continued to watch). In fact, many fans separate the eras as two different series. However, as Disney strived for, younger audiences became attracted to the show in its final season from its lighter stories to marketable new music talent Alexz Johnson filling in for DeLizia. However, fans were also angered by the fact that Disney seemed to completely ignore the show's past in the final year, dropping all previous threads and not including clips from seasons one and two in its finale clip show.

Despite being pulled from the air in 2003 and no video/ DVD releases on the series, So Weird retains a large fanbase. There are several popular sites in which users can download video and sound clips, as well as So Weird fonts, wallpaper, and more.

SOMETHING IS OUT THERE

With Ta'Ra now stranded on Earth, Jack decided to pass her off as his cousin, effectively killing the budding romance that was strongly hinted at in the mini-series. The series became a somewhat routine crime drama with Ta'Ra becoming Jack's unofficial partner, using her alien powers and knowledge to help him solve cases. The cases that Jack was assigned although a bit on the weird variety concerned human criminals performing everyday crimes. It was not until the last episode made, which was not broadcast in America until 1993 on the Sci-Fi Channel, that Jack and Ta'Ra confront another alien presence.

Due to the success of the mini-series, Something is Out There returned in the fall of 1988 as a regular hour long series. The series however had almost everything that made the mini-series good stripped away. This follow up series saw the duo tackle an assortment of earthbound crooks, killers and oddballs plus a new extra-terrestrial threat. Poor ratings for the first three episodes prompted the producers to announce the impending return of the Xenomorph, but the series didn't even last that long. The series was first seen in the UK on Sky One on the 2nd October 1991. Executive producers for the series were Frank Lupu and John Ashley. The special effects for the series were created by John Dykstra.

In the middle of his everyday routine, Los Angeles cop Jack Breslin arrives at a juncture that changes his life forever. He runs into T'Ara, an extraterrestrial female, who has come to Earth to hunt an evil, shape-changing monster called the Xenomorph. This monster escaped from its prison aboard T'Ara's ship, stole a shuttle and fled to Earth. Now the Xenomorph is on a gleeful killing spree in the City of Angels. Jack and T'Ara join forces against the monster. When they succeed in destroying the Xenomorph, T'Ara, stranded on Earth, helps Jack deal with L.A.'s strangest police cases.

Cast: Jack Breslin (Joe Cortese); T'Ara (Maryam d'Abo); Lt. Victor Maldonado (Gregory Sierra).
Created by: Frank Lupu; Executive Producer: Frank Lupu, John Ashley; Associate Producer: Bernadette Joyce; NBC/Columbia TV; 60 minutes. It's very difficult for a TV series to live up to the promise of an exciting four-hour mini-series debut, especially when that debut introduces something the viewers want to see again-and don't. Something Is Out There fell into that trap. As it developed into episodic format, it abandoned the shape-changing evil creature from space that viewers had hoped would be a staple of the show.

The expensive mini-series boasted the talents of two Oscar-winning wizards: makeup designer Rick Baker to create the shape-changing Xenomorph alien, and special effects artist John Dykstra to add visual panache to the alien spaceships. Even after the failures of Jurassic Park, Manimal, and Misfits of Science, NBC still wanted science fiction to work, so they developed this show.

For budget purposes, the mini-series was filmed partly in Sydney, Australia. Twenty-one days were devoted to exterior filming in and around Los Angeles, and 20 days were interiors in Australian studios. Critics characterized Something Is Out There as a cross between The Hidden, Starman and Aliens, with a dash of Moonlighting. Reviews were mixed. However, ratings for the mini-series, which aired in May 1988, were stellar, lending support for the notion of continuing the concept as a full-fledged series.

Now the producers faced the challenge of somehow designing a show that wasn't too hardcore for the fans and could attract a broad audience. There was also the problem of how to follow through with the exciting promises the mini-series offered. Costs were prohibitive; Rick Baker's bills for creating the Xenomorph ran as high as $700,000. Perhaps for this reason, the network, according to story editor Paul Bernbaum, "didn't want the series to revolve around the Xenomorph, nor did it want us to do the 'monster of the week.' They wanted to focus on the relationship between Jack and T'Ara and get them involved in paranormal cases." So the pulpish hunting-the-alien theme was sidelined in favor of a Moonlighting-style relationship between Jack and T'Ara-much to viewers' dismay.

"Looking back," says Bernbaum, "I think if we'd stuck with the Xenomorph-vs.-the-World stories, we may have had a better shot at staying on the air. After the mini-series, it was what people expected and we didn't deliver it for them." The series debuted in October of 1988, and while eight episodes were filmed, only six made the air. "Our first show, 'Gladiator,' did very well. But after that, we just died. There was no interest in the show we were doing. Our ratings were so low at that point, NBC just decided to pull us off the schedule," says Bernbaum. Joe Cortese and Maryam d'Abo played the leading roles. Bernbaum says, "I thought both Joe and Maryam were fine in the pilot. When we got to series, however, it just didn't seem to work out. What I remember most is they both tended to mumble so much. I could never understand what they were saying. [But] Joe and Maryam had some nice moments together."

Gregory Sierra played Police Lieutenant Maldonado, the only character on the show who recognized that T'Ara was from space and that Jack was helping her hunt for the killing machine that had been released from the mothership. "Any time Gregory was on screen as Jack's lieutenant was a plus," says Bernbaum. "He's just a terrific actor." Bernbaum's memories of the show seem laden with disappointment and discontent. "I remember going to the set to tell one of our directors that dailies were weak, he was missing the point," he sighs. "He blew up and quit on the spot. Came back, though."

A running gag on the show was that every now and then, T'Ara did not understand Earthly customs and mores, despite Jack's exasperated attempts at explaining them. These moments added humor and social commentary to their relationship and hinted at the influence of the prime-time hit Moonlighting. However, Bernbaum says that in Something Is Out There, "any attempt at humor fell completely flat. I remember laughing out loud at the opening scene of Lupo's 'Gladiator,' where Jack tries to explain to T'Ara what a joke was. But on screen, it just died. We also used traditional, dramatic episodic directors who maybe didn't have the feel for this kind of show we could have used. We ... probably told the wrong type of stories that we needed to draw an audience."

Towards the end of the show, Bernbaum says, they "tried to make the show harder-edged, more science fiction. On a script level, I think 'The Keeper' was our best. Lupo, as usual, came up with a great story. I always enjoyed working with Frank Lupo, who is a certifiable genius in this business, as well as being a great guy, and very, very funny." In an effort to return the show to its intended direction, Bernbaum reveals, production began on a two-parter that brought back the Xenomorph. "We knew we had to do something different at this point, and were several days into prep with our director when NBC pulled the plug." The episode, written by Bernbaum and Burt Pearl, was never filmed.

Joe Cortese, as the L.A. cop Jack Breslin, recalls the mini-series as "terrific" because it blended the gritty Los Angeles police life with the science fiction aspects of hunting and finding a shape-changing monster, plus a relationship with a female extraterrestrial. Playing Jack Breslin gave Cortese an opportunity to portray a hard-nosed, gritty cop with an edge of humor that came up in moments of high tension, complicated by an increasing attraction to T'Ara. Cortese once described his character as "a regular guy. A stumblebum cop. He's confused by the set-up. He's all hung up on why the Dodgers lost last night, things like that." Today, Cortese remembers the show as a fun time because he was among friends. Maryam d'Abo was "very nice to work with," he says, and he particularly appreciated the opportunity to experience the makeup artistry of Rick Baker. "I also enjoyed working with Kim Delaney [in the mini-series]." As for actor George Dzundza, who played his partner, Frank Deleo, Cortese says, "I've known him for a long time from New York. It made [the project] doubly enjoyable."

As much as he enjoyed the work, however, Cortese has a confession to make: "I don't even like science fiction. I don't relate to it at all. I'm more into humans. Do I think there's an evil power out there? I look on the Xenomorph as the devil." The network's desire to concentrate on the relationships instead of a monster-of-the-week format was a good idea, acknowledges Cortese, but "it didn't work! I wish the show worked, but it didn't. I guess they needed a combination of other things than the monster." Cortese suggests that "it should have been like The Fugitive," with the pair continuing to play cat-and-mouse with their prey. Cortese points out that there was a threat of the Xenomorph returning at the end of the mini-series when the mothership crashlanded in the Earth's ocean. He feels that might have boosted continued interest in the show. In summary, Cortese says he's happy with the work. "I thought it was a good character for me, and I felt pretty good about it. It's too bad it didn't continue."

SOMETHING IS OUT THERE (MINI)

The series started off with homicide detective Jack Breslin investigating a series of very unusual murders. He eventually runs into a beautiful mystery woman named Ta'Ra whom he suspects has something to do with the crimes. It turns out that Ta'Ra knows what is responsible for the crimes and is attempting to stop them. The culprit it turns out is a creature known as a Xenomorph, an alien capable of adapting human form. Ta'Ra it turns out was a medical officer on board a prison spaceship that was transporting the creature when it escaped and killed everyone else on the ship, before making its way to Earth. Ta'Ra helps Jack defeat the xenomorph, while he helps her learn about Earth customs.

This ends up as knowledge that she needs when her spaceship is destroyed, stranding her on Earth. Ta'Ra has limited telepathic powers, advanced scientific knowledge and above average physical abilities.

Something Is Out There premiered in the Spring of 1988 as a big budget four hour mini-series. Due to the success of the mini-series. Something is Out There returned in the fall of 1988 as a regular hour long series. The mini-series has also been reedited and rerun as a three hour TV movie. The mini-series came to the UK on Sky One and was broadcast as two two hour shows, which were then followed by the entire run of the series. This film was shown on NBC.

SPACE

Space expensively chronicles the years from the end of World War Two, when the American government secretly sought to round up Nazi Germany's top rocket scientists, through the first stirrings of the space programme and man's exploration of the Moon in the early 1970s, to the decline of NASA in the early 1980s.

As well as the headline-making public events of space walks, test pilot flights, lunar landings and horrific crashes, the series focuses on the private battles of its central characters. Top of the tree is Norman Grant, a naval hero who finds himself a natural for the Senate where he latches on to the fledgling space effort as his route to the top.

Other main characters are Grant's emotionally fragile wife, Elinor, 'good ol' boy' astronaut Randy Claggett, dedicated engineer Stanley Mott, Navy flier turned top test pilot and astronaut John Pope, his wife Penny, rocket genius Dieter Kolff, muck-raking journalist Cindy Rhee and TV evangelist Leopold Strabismus.

Exhausting £35 million, 14 ½ -hour marathon 'mini-series' for America, based on James Michener's epic account of the US space effort through the lives of a group of fictional characters whose lives become entwined in the country's space programme. James Garner headed the proverbial all-star cast, which featured Bruce Dern, Michael York, Beau Bridges and Harry Hamlin. Space was stripped across seven nights in the space of a month by ITV but never took off in the ratings. The producer for the mini-series was Martin Manulis and the executive producer was Dick Berg. The UK airdates for the show were 13th July - 17 August 1987, which was on ITV.

SPACE : ABOVE AND BEYOND

The only echo of The X Files is a streak of paranoia about whether the world government has prior knowledge of the aliens, known as Chigs. The series comes with an impressively complex history which is gradually sketched in as it progresses. But two key events that have shaped this future are the Artificial Intelligence (AI) Wars and the creation of a race of In Vitro humans to fight the AIs.

The AIs, also known as Silicates, are human replicas, built as soldiers and servants. Physically perfect, but with eerie white eyes and red crosshairs for pupils, they were restricted from original thought until a disgruntled programmer infected them with a virus that gave them a risk-taking perspective, and sparked a revolt.

High human casualties led to the creation of a race of humans called Tanks, conceived by in vitro fertilisation in artificial gestation chambers, and held in suspended animation until the age of 18, before being awakened and sent into battle. Unfortunately, the In Vitros - distinguished by a `navel' on their neck - proved poor soldiers. Born of unknown parents and denied a home life or a childhood, they had no feelings of patriotism. The In Vitro platoons were dissolved and the Tanks became a disenfranchised underclass.

SAAB opens in the year 2063. After many years of deep space exploration have found no answering voice, mankind believes it is alone in the galaxy. Fledgling colonies are being established some 16 light years from home, when an unknown and unprovoked alien force suddenly wipes them out, and Earth finds itself in a war in which it's seriously outgunned.

Our heroes, played by a largely unknown ensemble cast, are the wet-behind-the-ears recruits of the 58th Squadron of the US Marine Corps Space Aviator Cavalry. The group is led by Shane Vansen, a beautiful but serious young woman with a tragic past. Her Marine parents were brutally slain by AIs while Shane and her sisters hid in an attic. Nathan West is a would-be space colonist who joined the Corps just before the war broke out, to try to find his lost love, Kylen.

They were both due to be part of the Tellus colony mission until, just hours before launch, Nathan had to give up his place to an In Vitro. Kylen was with the colony when it was destroyed, but Nathan clings to the hope that she may be alive . . . somewhere. Cooper Hawkes is a Tank, a rebellious In Vitro who was sentenced by a judge to join the Marines. Defiant and with a huge chip on both shoulders, Cooper is thrust into combat before he has had a chance to learn friendship and loyalty.

Vanessa Damphousse, nicknamed `Damn Fool' by her friends, enlisted to find `direction'. She's the most objective of the group. Completing the regular quintet is sports fan Paul Wang, a curious but unsure young man, and keeping a watchful eye over the recruits is their intense veteran squadron commander Tyrus Cassius MeQueen, a Tank for whom the Marine Corps is the only family he has known.

"We thought we were alone. We believed the universe was ours, until one night in 2063 on an Earth colony 16 light years away they struck . . . And now we are at war. My name is Lieutenant Colonel TC MeQueen, I'm an In Vitro a race of artificially gestated humans. I command a marine corp squadron, the 58th. They call us the "Wild Cards". We fight when called - in Space, on land. . . And at sea. To lose this war means more than defeat. To surrender is to never go home. All of use must rise to the call above and beyond"

In one episode star of the X FILES David Duchovny turned up, and Kristen Cloke returned the favour by turning up in an episode of the X FILES. James Morrison also guest starred in the SF show MILLENIEUM.

This futuristic action adventure series has the pedigree of being created by X FILES producers Glen Morgan and James Wong - but the two shows are worlds apart. Space: Above and Beyond focuses on five young Marine Corps space cadets, collectively known as the Wildcards, who suddenly find themselves thrust into the front line of battle against a mysterious alien enemy. While still trying to deal with the emotions that drove them to enlist, they must learn faith in each other and find an answer to the question, 'What would you be willing to die for?'

It's been unfairly called 'Melrose Space' and even 'Top Gun in space', but the look and feel is closer to a World War Two movie, with Morgan and Wong drawing on such classic war films as the Civil War drama Red Badge of Courage, Guadalcanal Diary, Twelve O'clock High and The Naked and the Dead, to create an intense, pressure cooker atmosphere. There's a lot of action, but it's punctuated by long, introspective periods of character-rooted drama.

SAAB is a series you warm to. At times too melodramatic, there are enough neat touches to keep you coming back, such as a blues-playing space carrier commander and a load of pancakes ejected into space as a tribute to a fallen comrade. And though it's a character-driven show, the special effects - nearly all computer-generated - are impressive, from the Marine 'Hammerhead' space fighters to the darkly mysterious alien ships, especially the marauding super-fighter, nicknamed Chiggy Von Richthofen.

Launched into a difficult Sunday night slot in the US in Autumn 1995, the series never really caught fire the way Morgan & Wong's previous show had done, and despite a ratings-boosting late guest appearance from David Duchovny as a silicate pool shark, the 58th didn't live up to fight a second year.

Executive producers for the series were Glen Morgan and James Wong, co-executive producer is Stephen Zito and Herb Adelman, producers for the series were Howard Grigsby, Tim McHugh and Michael Lake. The music was created by Shirley Walker. The pilot episode was filmed in Queensland, Australia. The series was first shown in the UK on the 13th March 1996 on Sky One. The associate producer was Ken Dennis, supervising producer was Tom Towler, co-ordinating producer was Dan Dugan, casting was by Lisa Miller, original casting was by Randy Stone, CSA. The director of photography was Anthony R. Palmieri, production designer was Bernard Hides, executive story editor was Marilyn Osborn, the visual effects supervisor was Glenn Campbell, the visual effects were created by Area 51 & Free Range Digital, the art director was Tom Wilkins, set designer was Joseph Hodges and the costume designer was Giovanna Ottobre-Melton.

Rodney Roland is from California and was born on February 20th 1964. He starred alongside James Brolin in the syndicated entertainment show Pensacola: Wings of Gold. Other television he has appeared in include the fourth season episode of THE X FILES, Never Again, Block Party, If Someone Had Known, and the movie of the week, Hearts Adrift. He also has one film to his credit, Tres Cruces, an independent picture directed by Jeffrey Barish and has appeared in the theatre in New York and Los Angeles.

All the computer-generated effects for Space: Above and Beyond were created by a company called Area 51, whose past credits include VR5 and Clive Barker's Lord of Illusion. In addition to acting, Kristen is the Associate Artistic Director of the Alliance Repertory Company in Burbank, California where, in here spare time, she enjoys writing, directing and producing. The motto of the United States Marine Corp is "Semper Fidelis", a Latin phrase that means "Always Faithful". The little book that Lieutenant Colonel McQueen (James Morrison) reads from is the Te-Tao Ching (Way of Life) and is written by Lao-Tzu, a Chinese philosopher.

SPACE ACADEMY

Space Academy had been built on a artificial planetoid in the Star Year of 3732. The academy was run by Commander Gampu (Jonathan Harris of LOST IN SPACE fame), a stern but fair supervisor. Although there were many cadets at the academy, the series focused on the exploits of the cadets in the Nova Blue Team. Unlike Tom Corbett, the cadets in the Space Academy of both young men and woman of differing national backgrounds. The Nova Blue team consisted of two young officers who had completed their training: Captain Chris Gentry and Lt. Paul Jerome and four cadets: Laura Gentry, (Chris' sister), Adrian, Tee Gar and Loki.

Loki was the youngest of the cadets and was an alien rescued by the rest of the Blue Nova team in the first episode. Loki knew nothing of his origins and was constantly getting into trouble. He has the power of invisibility and X-Ray vision. The cadets were also aided on their missions by Peppo, a robot. Each adventure contained a moral lesson common for Saturday morning programmes of the 1970s.

Jonathon Harris is more famous for playing the man everybody loved to hate Dr. Smith in LOST IN SPACE. The series was first shown on LWT with a seven episode run. Space Academy was in many ways an updated version of the popular 1950's series TOM CORBETT, SPACE CADET. Both series were about the adventures of a group of young people training to become the space explorers of tomorrow. Peppo the robot and many of the sets from Space Academy would appear the following season in JASON OF STAR COMMAND. Star Command was located on another portion of the planetoid containing the Space Academy. The second season of Space Academy consisted entirely of reruns of the 1st season episodes. The series was first run on CBS in 1977.

Space Academy was a live-action sci-fi children's television program, produced by Filmation and airing on CBS television on Saturday mornings from 1977 to 1979. A total of fifteen half-hour episodes were made over two seasons.

The program starred veteran actor Jonathan Harris (best remembered as Dr. Smith from Lost in Space) as Commander Isaac Gampu, the head of the academy. Among his costars (and academy students) were Pamelyn Ferdin, Eric Greene, and Brian Tochi. The program also featured a pint-sized robot called Peepo (actually a radio-controlled machine, which spoke through a voice actor using a vocoder). A frequent element in stories was the use and display of telekinesis.

Much like the premise of Star Trek's Starfleet Academy, the Space Academy (located on an asteroid, and occasionally shown on camera) brought together the best young minds, and those with special skills and abilities, to learn and prepare to experience the unknown, as Earth people continued to branch out into space during the 33rd Century A.D.. Gampu's earlier space explorations had exposed him to conditions that immensely slowed his aging process; though appearing in his sixties or seventies, his true age was well over 300 years old, giving him a unique perspective on history, and some ideal qualifications as a teacher.

Each of the students had their own unique aspects: Ferdin's character Laura (and her TV brother Chris, played by Ric Carrott) had highly-developed telekinetic and psychic powers. Greene's character Loki (an orphaned alien, discovered in the first episode) was a playful young prankster (hence his adopted name) who could become invisible. Tochi's Tee Gar continued the martial arts traditions of his Asian ancestors, augmenting them with newer disciplines, some originating in space.

As with much 1970s children's television fare, lessons and morals were taught in each episode, including the ideas that even super powers, as possessed by some academy students, weren't a cure-all for problems or a substitute for logic, reasoning and compassion, and that even the old and wise could still make occasional mistakes. As the students encountered members of extraterrestrial races, and even mutated descendants of Earth colonists in space, they developed their own wisdom and understanding.

The common spaceships in the series were called Seekers, and were used much like a spacebound van or

SPACE CASES

Space Cases follows the adventures of five Star Academy cadets who board an alien spaceship, the Christa, and then get swept through a spatial rip which sends them seven years from home. In the first episodes of the second series some cast changes occurred, the episode starts out with the introduction of Suzee. but no time for pleasantries now we got three Spung Kill Cruisers Coming. The Spung cruisers fire at the Christa and totally trash her navigation systems. A blind Hyper jump is the crew's only chance for survival. They survive only to crash land on a planet where anything can happen.

It's not surprising this children's drama has been compared to Lost in Space - its co-creator is Bill Mummy, former child star of the Sixties series. Fans of the show THE MIGHTY MORPHIN' POWER RANGERS might spot actor Walter E. Jones who played Zack in this show he stars as Harlan Band, indeed in one episode he gets to try out some stunts he did on the Power Rangers. There are a lot of in-jokes referring to many different kinds of shows such as BABYLON 5 and DOCTOR WHO. The show is also notable for its guest stars who include Bill Mummy himself more familiar to people as LENIAR in BABYLON 5 and Will Robinson in LOST IN SPACE. Also Mark Hamill who played Luke Skywalker in the Star Wars films.

It's fairly juvenile stuff on the whole but one neat in-joke in the first episode has the Andromedan, Radu, rescuing a teddy bear found floating in space. The bear was originally a gift from Peter David to BABYLON 5 creator Joe Michael Straczynski. JMS, it turned out, didn't care for it, and had it ejected into space in a BABYLON 5 episode! The opening credits were read by Harlan Ellison. The closing theme was written by Bill Mummy and Paul Gordon; the song was sung by Lisa La Shawn and Walter Emmanuel Jones.

History

Space Cases was created by Peter David and Bill Mummy. The show premiered on March 1, 1996. Almost exactly one year later, the show was cancelled. The show aired for a time on Nickelodeon's Saturday night block of shows known as Snick. Although the show is no longer aired on Nickelodeon, it was sometimes seen on the Family Channel in Canada. It has yet to be released on DVD.

The characters

T.J. Davenport was the children's vice-principal, but serves as their teacher aboard the Christa. Davenport takes herself and the rest of the Universe a little too seriously. She has a habit of fainting at the first sign of danger.

Commander Seth Goddard is a former Stardog, and fought in the Spung War. Busted in rank from Captain and forced to teach the "Space Cases," Goddard is tough enough to whip the kids into shape, but laid back enough to realize that they are indeed kids, and need to run loose every once in a while.

Harlan Band is from Earth, and is attending the academy to become a Stardog like his father. Harlan's father was killed during the conflict between humans and the Spung, and because of this he is often antagonistic and prejudiced against Radu, at least in the beginning. The Spung enslaved the Andromedans as warriors and slaves due to their super-strength, and so Harlan's father was most assuredly killed by an Andromedan in the wars. Harlan is headstrong and the natural leader of the students, acting as pilot/commander on the bridge. However, he is extremely overconfident, which sometimes leads to his endangering the crew.

Catalina is from Titan, a moon of Saturn. Rainbow-haired and with the power to shriek at sonic levels, she is the engineer on the Christa, and quite the technical genius. She claims this is due in large part to her invisible friend, Suzee, who supposedly lives in another dimension on a planet called Yensid. The other crew members think that she is merely imaginary when Catalina speaks to or refers to her. However, Suzee becomes a regular in the second season of the show, when she and Catalina are pulled into one another's dimensions. Suzee can temporarily inhabit other people's minds, and also has gills, so she can breathe in any atmosphere, though not the vacuum of space.

Radu is from the galaxy Andromeda. He has no real family since he was hatched from an egg. Radu has super-sensitive hearing and superhuman strength, but suffers from an inferiority complex. The Andromedan culture is based on uniformity of mind and purpose, making Radu's desire to have a family and be his own person an anomaly of character. His super-ears give him incredible balance, and as an Andromedan he possesses some low-level psionic powers, making him an ideal navigator for the Christa, as he has a near-perfect innate sense of direction. He also has a significantly greater molecular density than most humanoids, which accounts for his superior strength, stability and long hair (which is nearly impossible to cut).

Bova is from Uranus, and can create electricity at will from his forehead antennae. He has an incredible metabolism, which also gives him an incredible appetite. He will eat nearly anything, and is always hungry. Being from Uranus, and thereby the butt of nearly every joke, he is consistently pessimistic in every situation, a Uranian cultural trait. Bova was responsible for operating and monitoring the shields.

Rosie Ianni is from Mercury, and has the ability to produce vast amounts of heat at will. At the beginning of the series, she wore a helmet to help her control this ability, but it was removed in subsequent episodes, revealing her inherent bald head, which is a trait of all Mercurians. Rosie is the mothering influence within the crew, always trying to make sure that her fellow cadets are happy and getting along. She serves as doctor/scientist and has a tendency to adopt seemingly cute things that turn out to be troublesome for the crew. Thelma (Techno Human EmuLating Machine), the mysterious ship's only native inhabitant, is an android who often malfunctions, owing in no small part to the fact that when Harlan first found her, he accidentally broke her memory chip, a small gem. She has a habit of taking things too literally and often does not realize moderately obvious things.

Warlord Shank is a villain in the Space Cases series, portrayed by actor George Takei. Warlord Shank is a Spung commander who is a deadly space pirate and adversary for the crew of the Christa, having elite Spung officers under his command. He first appears in his Killcruiser when he intercepts and threatens to destroy the Christa after discovering that Elmira, a Spung princess and love interest of Radu, could be onboard. He develops into a major villain throughout the series run.

Memorable Quotes

Rosie: I keep warning her not to overdo her sonic practicing. She'll blow a vocal cord or something.

Harlan Band: Yeah, well that's one of the dangers when you're hooked on sonics.

Thelma: As I understand it, family is not just those of whom you are born, but those to whom you belong.

SPACE COMMAND

SPACE COMMAND

Set in the not too distant future, Space Command was a world-wide organisation which directed, maintained and carried out Earth's conquest of space. The series itself followed the education of one young man, Frank Anderson, as he gained experience in each of the many divisions of space command, including transport, satellite, scientific investigation and exploration. Each episode had Frank working in one of these areas, with him and the audience learning something new about the conditions in space as best as 1953 scientists could predict. The series avoided stories of space spies, space romances, space monster and space pirates, since the series' chief writer Alf Harris only wanted to tell pure science fiction stories which could only happen in space.

Space Command was the only live space adventure series produced in Canada. Unlike many of the live American space shows, many of which cranked out 3 to 6 episodes a week, Space Command was broadcast once a week. However, like its contemporaries produced south of the border, Space Command was a low budget affair featuring a limited amount of action on cramped sets. Crude special effects, which were advanced for the time, were shot on film and inserted when needed.

The most notable thing about Space Command was the fact that it starred James Doohan. In the 1960s Doohan would gain fame as Scotty in Star Trek. Although almost no information on specific episodes is available, the following performers were guest stars on Space Command, William Shatner (who would later star with James Doohan in Star Trek!), Barry Morse, Cec Linder, Stephen Ker Appleby, Bonar Stuart, Billie Bailey, Robert McLeod, Richard Gilbert, Alfie Scoop and Allan Bertram. Space Command was seen on CBC in Canada.

The first season of Space Command consisted of 19 untitled episodes. The series debuted on 13th March 1953 and was broadcast weekly. Neither the episodes themselves nor information on them exists. The second season of Space Command consisted of 14 untitled episodes. The second series debuted on 17th Oct 1953 and was broadcast weekly. Episode 26 is the sole surviving episode of the series and the only one for which information is available.

SPACE G-MEN

AKA: SPACE GOVERNMENT MAN

AKA: UCHU G-GEN

As the nations of the Earth prepare to explore the vastness of space, Japan's Andromeda Institute is years ahead of the rest of the world, thanks to the genius of its supervisor Professor Kawanaka (Minamoto). However, the maiden flight of the Andromeda Institute's experimental vessel Radar One meets with disaster, and the elder brother of plucky all-Japanese boy Sakaze (Hirai) is lost in space, presumed dead. In fact, Radar One was just one several Earth missions fated to accidentally cross the path of dastardly schemes from the Demon Empire, a secret society devoted to ruling the world.

However, Demon Empire's schemes are foiled at every turn by the people of the Andromeda Institute and by the occasional intervention of the "Space Government Man," a masked astronaut whose inspirational messages to young Sakaze sound suspiciously like speeches once deleted by his long-lost brother.

Ludicrous now, but a landmark in its time, Space Government Man sets the tone for much of children's TV that was to follow in Japan, including the entire ULTRAMAN series. Originally 13 episodes were made, but only 8 episodes were broadcast. With a sepia color scheme that acutally makes it look even older than it is and special effects to rival those of Buster Crabbe's FLASH GORDON, it is a charmingly camp approach to the sci-fi ideals of yesteryear.

It's stories encapsulate the feelings of the Japanese in the early 1960s, as they recovered from World War II, tried to deal with the Korean War, and prepared for the Olympics. Consequently, Japan is great, the Japanese are great; there are people out their who want to hurt them, but there is a higher power that sees Japan's potential for peace.

Bonus entertainment value is supplied by the Demon Empire's agent in episode one, a beanpole gaijin who has to visibly struggle to allow himself to be bested in hand-to-hand comabt by the show's diminutive hero. Meanwhile back at the base, the Professor muses about inventions, his pretty assistant swoons at the handsome hero, and an irritating child wander around for no apprent reason - in other words, the very bedrock of Japanses science fiction.

The strange mix of plural and singular in the titles is explained by their origins - obviously we only see a single "Space Government Man", but the Japanses title implies a plural, presumably to draw non-existent links between the series and the American serials Cowboy G-Men (KRT, 1956) and Dangerous Assignment (release in Japan as plain G-Men on NTV in 1958).

SPACE ISLAND ONE

We follow the saga of seven men and women who live on a permanent space station, fraught with disasters and danger. The space station known as Unity is always having to battle the executives of the company who own her, the companies motives are not always clear.

ALTHOUGH THE UNITED Kingdom has a long and proud history in prestigious science fiction programming, domestic producers have lately appeared increasingly unable to compete with the mammoth budgets and greater commercial opportunities enjoyed by their American counterparts. Filmed on the financially favourable Isle of Man, with funding supplied by a conglomerate of continental companies, Space Island One represents a valiant united effort by European programme makers to pool their resources, place their faith in British know-how, and test the US' dominance of the science fiction market.

Created by Andrew Maclear, Space Island One tells the story of the orbiting space station Unity, and its diverse, multinational crew of astronauts and scientists. While British science fiction is synonymous with unsteady sets and less than convincing special effects, Space Island One is an exception to the rule. While unlikely to challenge the likes of BABYLON 5 or DEEP SPACE NINE in terms of creativity, its special effects are always credible, with the station itself based on current scientific proposals, and zero gravity simulated seamlessly.

Avoiding the pitfalls of previous British science fiction productions, Space Island One rejects the improbable scenario of a single nation crew, shrewdly representing an increasing global co-operation in space exploration by means of a talented, international cast that includes Germans, a Canadian and an Iranian.

Rejecting populist science fiction staples such as strange, gaseous anomalies, time travel, deep space dog-fights or any overt alien presence, with the station's two, cute maintenance robots the sole concession to commercialism, Space Island One British based writing team has attempted to produce storylines within the realms of possibility, shying away from the easy, alluring descent into outlandish fantasy. Although this limits the series' ability to compete against the impressive, epic theatrics of its American competitors, it forces the show to focus on building engaging, credible, character-based drama. This is especially important, given that, outside of extra-vehicular activities and dream sequences, Space Island One takes place entirely within the confines of the station.

However, as DEEP SPACE NINE discovered to its cost in early seasons, a stationary setting places a debilitating restriction on the number of possible storylines. Space Island One suffers from this problem to an even greater extent, focusing, as it does, on a much smaller station which receives very little traffic. As a result, the series has struggled to avoid repetition. The storyline of a visiting protagonist, unearthing the hidden pasts of the station's crew, has proved the series' most successful, if frequently used, formula. Restricted in its ability to create strong, independent episodes, Space Island One has opted to develop ongoing story arcs, many of which are centred upon relationships between the series' characters.

American science fiction shows evolved from TV Westerns, with STAR TREK's Gene Roddenberry selling his creation as "Wagon Train to the stars." With its ongoing, character-based storylines, Space Island One originates from the traditionally British soap opera and, as such, is a continuation of a union previously explored in MOONBASE 3, STAR COPS and JUPITER MOON.

One of the definitions of science fiction is that it portrays future events which are rooted in the technology of today, extrapolated to a conceptualised conclusion - and so there is a strong argument that Space Island One has made a significant contribution to television SF. Rather than attempt to imitate its action packed rivals, the series has developed and advanced the concept of a science fiction show based on a soap opera format, demonstrating that with a decent budget, accomplished actors and skilful writers, such productions may wrest back British sovereignty of the genre. This UK SF series was premiered on Sky One in the UK.

Made on a modest budget on the Isle of Man, this show could never compete with the production values of other top genre shows. The ace in its hand was allegedly a series of top-notch scripts that dared to present science fact rather than reality. Quite what happened to these mythical scripts before they reached the screen is anyone's guess because the resultant shows were dull, derivative and slow. Pity poor Judy Loe who tried to imbue Commander Kathryn McTiernan with some dignity, but was let down every time by some banal non-sequitur.

Space Island One was developed by executive producer and writer Andrew McLear, the man behind Capital City. The producers and writers had been in touch with NASA to get expert help in researching the realities of life in Space. They provided the production team with video footage of astronauts that had never been released to the public, and the expertise of the science consultant Richard Taylor. The real Space Station Unity will not initially have a spinning section to create gravity, as in Space Island One. The series added the module that spins to create Earth-type gravity to make it possible to film on the ground. The series was enticed to film in the Isle of Man because business and the government on the island offered to invest.

Judy Loe, who plays Commander Kathryn McTiernan is a familiar television face who was seen as Morse's love interest in Inspector Morse. Angus A. MacInnes is better known to Star Wars fans as Gold Leader. The advantage of making a series for such a long concentrated time is that it allows it to grow in terms of story, character and style. The production team generally agrees that these elements have improved as the series had progressed and there has been an opportunity for the actors to discuss the development of their characters with the writers.

After the first season has been seen in the US and then in the UK, only the second series was shown a year later in the US, because Sky One, the first broadcaster of the series in the UK did not show it. The air date of the last episode is the US airdate.

SPACE PATROL (1950)

AKA: SATELLITE POLICE

Set in the 30th Century. Space Patrol was a branch of the United Planets responsible for its defence and well being. The Space Patrol itself was based on the artificial planet Terra and was headed by Commander Corry. The first Commander Corry was Kit Corry, he however was replaced before the Saturday episodes by his brother Buzz Corry. Corry's chief aid was Cadet Happy - Happy was often used as either comic relief or to ask Buzz a question that the audience needed answered. Also on hand were: Major Robertson, one of Buzz's chief aides.

Carol Karlyle daughter of the secretary general of the United Planets and Buzz's very low key romantic interest (this was 1950s TV for kids). Tonga, who was first introduced in the daily episodes as a villain spying on the secretary general in the guise of his secretary. Tonga reformed to become one of the good guys. Corry's archenemy was Prince Baccarratti, a power hungry foe who also called himself The Black Falcon. He had a malevolent sidekick called Malengro. Also in the villains' ranks was Mr. Proteus, a master of disguise.

Classic juvenile, launched in California as a daytime local, picked up by ABC as a Saturday/Sunday daytime series, but briefly slotted into 6:00-6:30 p.m. "prime time", this cheesy space-travel time-travel 30th Century series featured genuine World War II Army Air Corps ace Ed Kemmer as Space Patrol Commander Buzz Corey who kicked villainous butt for the glory of the United Planets of the Universe, along with his audience-identification sidekick Cadet Happy, the sexy daughter of the United Planets Secretary General, and various gadgets for sale to viewers, such as the Paralyzer Ray Gun, the Brainograph, and a 30-foot model spacecraft "Terra" that toured America and was given away to a sweepstakes-winning fan, who was nearly destroyed by the concentrated jealousy beams of a million disappointed kids. Like "CAPTAIN VIDEO", "BUCK ROGERS", and "TOM CORBETT, SPACE CADET" this was transmitted live, but unlike the three predecessors, it had a relatively gigantic budget -- $2,500 per week!

Space Patrol was one of the longest running of the early 1950s live space adventure series. It was the only one originating from Los Angeles. The series first premiered on 13 March 1950 as a daily (Monday to Friday) 15 minute programme on KECA, the ABC station in Los Angeles. Kinescopes of these episodes were shown on other ABC stations until half hour weekend (mostly done on Saturday, however for 7 months on Sunday evenings) episodes began in December 1950.

The weekend episodes were shown in the rest of the country both on Kinescope and later live after the network cables reaches Los Angeles. The daily episodes of Space Patrol continued for some time on KECA and some 900 of them were produced - no information on these are available. In addition to the daily and weekend episodes of Space Patrol, a weekly radio series was also on the air, close to 200 radio episodes were produced. Producing seven live programmes a week must have kept the cast and crew quite busy.

Space Patrol episodes had slightly higher budgets than their contemporaries such as Captain Video and Tom Corbett, thus producing a more realistic series. Such things as jungles and rivers were often reproduced on in door sets. Actors in guest roles would often reappear in a totally different role from one episode to another. Among the actors to play more than one role were : Bela Kovacs, although he played many characters he is best known for his recurring role as the Space Patrols chief adversary Prince Baccarrati, I. Stanford Jolley whose roles included villains, old prospectors and scientists. Marvin Miller, most often played a villain and Normal Jolley. Space Patrol's chief writer had several guest roles in early episodes.

When the space age started for real with the launch of Sputnik in 1957. Space Patrol had been out of production for over 2 years. To cash in on the sudden interest of space, episodes of Space Patrol were put into syndication under the new title Satellite Police. Although the episodes were the old ones, the title and opening credits were changed. The new credits featured scenes of real rockets taking off.

One of the earliest U.S. space operas, Space Patrol was one of the revered trio of 'Golden Age' sci-fi pioneers that fired the imaginations of the post-war baby boom, America's first TV generation. Some seven or more years before Russia sent the first man-made satellite into orbit, in 1957, Commander Buzz Corry and the crew of the Terra V, along with TOM CORBETT, SPACE CADET and CAPTAIN VIDEO, were exploring the depths of the universe and planting the concept of space travel in millions of impressionable young minds.

Space Patrol began as a West Coast local show in early 1950 and was quickly picked up by the ABC network where it ran until 1955. The UK never got to see Space Patrol back in its heyday (though satellite channel Sky did show some episodes during the 1980s). The British "golden age" of TV sci-fi was still to come.

There are probably over 1000 episodes of the series made, but most of the information no longer exists about these episodes, details are shown for only 210 of the episodes. Writer details are sketchy for the series but they do include Mike Moser, Norman Jolley who had wrote the entire fourth and fifth season. The only director that we know directed for the series was Dick Darley, who directed many of the 210 episodes of the series.

Space Patrol combined with Captain Video and Tom Corbett, Space Cadet to exert a remarkable and enduring influence on television audiences in the early to mid 1950s. The young found the appeal almost irresistible, although evidence showed a healthy number of adults were peeking at some of the same programs as their children. Space Patrol seemed to be a particular favourite of adults, even though many grownups claimed to look in only for the "high camp" value of the series.

Space Patrol was set in the 30th century, much later in time than Captain Video and Tom Corbett, products of the 22nd century and 24th centuries, respectively. Space Patrol had almost an "anything goes" attitude closer in execution to Captain Video than Tom Corbett. Whereas Tom Corbett operated within the scientific guidelines laid down by its technical consultant Willy Ley, Space Patrol was less bound by the science of 20th century Earth. A millennium into the future, who was to seriously argue with the new science of Space Patrol?

If any one science fiction series had to be pulled out of the 1950s ether and offered as representative of the outer space phenomenon that overtook early television, it would probably be Space Patrol. Space Patrol successfully built upon so many cultural, political and social impulses of its day that it is a difficult series to ignore.

Space Patrol, if its own publicity is to be believed, was conceived in the cockpit of a navy plane somewhere above the South Pacific during World War II. In this case, the publicity has a ring of authenticity, considering that the creative force behind Space Patrol, William "Mike" Moser, once studied philosophy at Gonzaga University and was likely to ponder subjects like time and space and future worlds. "It started me wondering and thinking about the universe," Moser claimed in 1952, speaking of those long hours of contemplation when he apparently recalled his own childhood influences in those lonely hours above the Pacific.

Today it has become axiomatic to think of much of our science fiction literature as having been derived from cowboy culture; it is said that science fiction tales are merely updated versions of a Ken Maynard, Tom Mix or Roy Rogers morality play. Perhaps, but TV science fiction, in the 1950s particularly, was at least as much influenced by the police procedural. Popular series such as Dragnet and The Line-up provided fully as much inspiration, if not more.

When Mike Moser persuaded Los Angeles station KECA to try his Space Patrol idea as a local 15-minute-a-day serial, the station was buying a police procedural set a thousand years in the future. Buzz Corry would become Joe Friday, bringing criminals to justice on behalf of the law he was sworn to uphold. Space Patrol epitomises science fiction television in the 1950s through a trend toward galactic law and order. One thing none of the TV science fiction series foresaw changing was human nature. Law and order, effected through duly sworn governmental agencies, arises time and again as a theme in Space Patrol as well as in Tom Corbett, Atom Squad, Rod Brown of the Rocket Rangers and Rocky Jones, Space Ranger. Like its Western series counter-parts, Space Patrol was something of a disguised morality play. But unlike the typical Western, wherein justice was often dispensed by private parties, Space Patrol and the other science fiction shows insisted on justice being carried out by legally deputised officers of the law.

The format of Space Patrol was typical of the TV genre. The United Planets (like Tom Corbett's Solar Alliance and Captain Kirk's Federation), peaceful in nature, understood that individuals and rogue states would from time to time challenge the social and political order. The United Planets authorised its Space Patrol to police the galaxy. The Space Patrol force operated out of Terra, described as a manmade planet placed in orbit between Earth and Mars. The flagship of the Space Patrol fleet was the Terra. Over the years, new and improved models of the Terra were unveiled on the program. The final version was the Terra V.

Space Patrol took up its duties, according to most sources, on March 13, 1950, over KECA, Los Angeles. Initially, the commander-in-chief of the Space Patrol was actor Glenn Denning, who played the role of Kit

Corry. Denning survived in the role for only a short time, perhaps 25 or 30 episodes. The reasons for Denning's departure are obscure. Some sources suggest the actor left the role as the result of a dispute with program officials. Other sources maintain Denning was ousted from his commander-in-chief assignment because he simply could not withstand the pressures of live television. These accounts suggest Denning too often appeared on the set unfamiliar with his lines. Nina Bara, who played Tonga, also recalled that Denning sometimes actually fell asleep in the middle of a live broadcast. Denning's replacement was a young actor just out of the Pasadena Play-house, Ed Kemmer. Assigned to play Kit's Brother Buzz, Kemmer remained at the helm of Space Patrol for the duration of the series.

Other key cast members included Lyn Osborn as Cadet Happy, Virginia Hewitt as Carol Carlisle, Ken Mayer as Major "Robbie" Robertson and Norman Jolley as Secretary General Carlisle. Cadet Happy was Corry's eager young apprentice; naive in an amiable sort of way, afflicted with an irrepressible sense of humour and a willingness to follow his commander into any situation, Happy was critical to the success of Space Patrol. Tonga began as a villainess but was eventually reformed by means of the "brainograph," a device with the capability of erasing antisocial behaviour right out of a person's brain. Carol was Corry's love interest and the only one permitted to refer to the commander by his first name. Robbie was Corry's dependable, stalwart right-hand man and chief of security. Secretary General Carlisle was head of the United Planets and Carol's father.

Live television in the 1950s, particularly live local television, was not a particularly high-paying endeavour. Reportedly, Kemmer, Osborn and the other key performers on the show earned eight dollars per appearance in the first months of the series. Live television burned the energies of everyone involved. Space Patrol, which was so uniquely representative of the live process, was no exception.

When Space Patrol premiered on KECA in March 1950, it was as a 15-minute daily serial broadcast live five days a week. By the end of 1950, Space Patrol was picked up by ABC for national distribution. Starting on December 30, 1950, Space Patrol, in addition to continuing on with its local daily run, appeared as a half-hour series aired on Saturdays. ABC also elected to run Space Patrol as a radio series, utilizing the same cast. Not only was such a schedule taxing for the players but for the production staff as well. As Space Patrol expanded, Mike Moser found himself required to turn out 82,000 words a week in order to keep the series afloat. Eventually, Moser began delegating most of the scripting to other writers- most notably Norman Jolley Space Patrol was an unrelenting series. Most of the time there were no seasonal breaks; the series simply remained on the air. Any performer needing time off was simply written out of the scripts for a time. As the series took off, finding a receptive audience (estimated at seven million in 1952) and eager sponsors, the salaries of the cast began to reflect the show's growing success. From eight dollars an episode in 1950, Lyn Osborn was reporting an annual Space Patrol salary of $45,000 just four years later.

The growing success of Space Patrol meant more money to channel back into production. In 1952, Life (September 1, 1952) placed the weekly production costs for Space Patrol at $25,000, a significant sum by early TV standards. Life counted among the beefed-up production crew seven prop men, five electricians, nine carpenters, one video- and three audiomen, three graphic artists, two directors and four technicians. Live television had a great deal in common with radio in terms of program content, competition for talent and subservience to sponsor demands. When Space Patrol was picked up by ABC and suddenly acquired a sponsor (Ralston-Purina), the program underwent something of a metamorphosis. Sponsors wanted their products to be endorsed live on camera-by the stars of the program. Therefore, every Space Patrol performance had to include Buzz or Happy, or both, consuming a bowl of Rice Chex or Wheat Chex and smiling into the camera while assuring seven million viewers of the product's wholesomeness. Ed Kemmer once recalled the problems involved with doing live commercials on Space Patrol.

Hap and I would finish a fight scene way up on the catwalks, out of breath, dirty. You could be a little bloody-real blood, a scratch here and there, and sweaty as hell. You're wiping yourself with a towel, trying to look at the script.

Selling cereal under such circumstances required considerable acting skills. Guest players on Space Patrol occasionally would succumb to the intense pressure associated with facing a live camera; it was one of the hazards of live television. Kemmer explained to one interviewer.

You could see that curtain-it's actually like a curtain-come down in front of them. I'd look at their faces and know they couldn't tell me their own names. I mean, they didn't know what to say next if their lives depended on it. The whole scene had to be finished by Hap and me because they were "gone," totally gone. One actor playing a villain went blank for an entire broadcast. The other actors, thinking on their feet, transformed the villain into a telepath and interpreted his lines for the audience. Such panic would set in even though cue cards were reportedly affixed to the walls to help actors deal with just such exigencies. Integral to the telling of Space Patrol and the other science fiction programs, then and now, are the special effects. In the 1950s the special effects were intended to assist in moving the story forward, unlike today when special effects are often out of control and actually become the story. Special effects on Space Patrol were often the result of simple camera tricks and the use of clever miniatures. They were admittedly a far cry from today's deified special effects which are frequently dazzling but are nonetheless merely soulless computer-ised contrivances.

The annoying habit of contemporary critics to disparage live television for its "cheap cardboard" sets and "laughable" special effects underscores an essentially unimaginative personality. In 1953, Arthur Rankin, Jr., writing in Theatre Arts (January, 1953), addressed the difference between Hollywood special effects and the live television variety:

Illusion in television is created more by the amateur magician than the professional technician. Hollywood has film, endless retakes and stop motion. TV must create its illusions on the spot, before your eyes. It takes Hollywood a year and a large fortune to make King Kong a monster worthy of the name. TV has only dimes and days... Space Patrol, nonetheless, employed three of the best special effects experts in the business: Franz, Oscar and Paul Dallons. The Dallons brothers had lent their special expertise to such films as The Devil Commands (1941) and Donovan's Brain (1953). The trio was also brought in by the producers of TV's Captain Midnight to help set up the impressive Secret Squadron laboratory.

Required to perform their special effects wizardry live on Space Patrol, the Dallons dangled realistic miniatures on invisible wires, providing the illusion of flight through space. Thanks to the Dallons, most of the special effects worked on Space Patrol though not always. Kemmer recalls the time he was captured by a tribe of Amazons and the action called for an arrow to be fired at him by one of the female warriors. The Dallons assured Kemmer that the arrow was safely secured to a rubber band which would prevent the arrow from doing any damage. Unfortunately, something went wrong and the arrow struck, as Kemmer vividly recalls, "about three feet below" the Commander's head.

Mike Moser insisted that Space Patrol reinforce and not undermine the basic tenets of a strong family value system. Space Patrol dealt with simple lessons of good and evil; evil was always defeated in the end. Villains such as Prince Baccarratti, Mr. Proteus and Agent X were never rewarded for their efforts. Moser told an interviewer in 1952, "If we cause a single nightmare we've failed in our purpose." Young viewers were never to fear; their heroes would always prevail on Space Patrol.

Bela Kovacs had proven incredibly popular as the villainous Prince Baccarratti. His marvellously played villain was constantly after power or revenge against Buzz Corry and the Space Patrol for spoiling his plans. Moser reprised Baccarratti in episode after episode to the delight of youngsters addicted to the show.

Finally, however, Moser reluctantly came to the conclusion that he was going to have to remove Baccarratti as a continuing threat. "I can't keep you in. Corry looks like a fool," Moser reportedly told Kovacs. Moser understood that the upright Corry had to prevail or the lesson to young viewers would be a negative one, no matter how much prosperity Baccarratti was bringing to the series. In fact, after a time, whenever Baccarratti was featured, Ed Kemmer reportedly received numerous letters from concerned youngsters warning Commander Corry of Baccarratti's plans and offering helpful suggestions as to how Corry could defeat the prince.

Moser handed Kovacs production assignments when it was time to temporarily put Prince Baccarratti out of action. However, Baccarratti continued to emerge from time to time as a threat to the galaxy. The sudden death of Mike Moser in an automobile accident in 1954 did not mean an immediate end to Space Patrol, though it did mean a shifting in personnel. Helen Moser, Mike Moser's wife, assumed the title of executive producer and Bela Kovacs moved into the spot of associate producer. Moser's premature death, however, may explain the failure of another Moser idea to reach television. Life (September 1, 1952) parenthetically mentioned Moser's resolve to produce a program to be called Report to Earth, geared toward an adult audience.

No further record of the proposed series seems to exist. However, we are left to speculate that if Moser had been able to bring Report to Earth to fruition, he might conceivably have bridged the coming transition from a juvenile to an adult-oriented approach to science and fiction. Television historian Alan Morton writes that after Sputnik recaptured the public's interest in space exploration, Space Patrol was hurriedly put on the syndication market under the title Satellite Police. New titles and credits were spliced onto the old kinescopes. By then, however, time had passed Space Patrol by, even if the series was set in the 30th century.

Technical Information

FORMAT: Live 15- and 30-minute adventure series, frequently in serialised form, detailing the heroic adventures of Buzz Corry, Commander-in-Chief of the Space Patrol.

BROADCAST HISTORY: Network: ABC. Original airdates: December 30, 1950 to February 26, 1955. (These are the network air-dates. However, Space Patrol actually began as a local show out of KECA TV, Los Angeles, on March 13, 1950.) Sponsors: Ralston/Purina and Nestles. Seasons: 5. Total Episodes: 210 black-and-white. (This total reflects the half-hour network version. In addition, an estimated 900 local 15-minute episodes were aired.)

Signature

The signature of Space Patrol was so distinctive that it remained untouched over the course of the series, except for some minor tinkering required after the first Commander Corry was written out of the series. During his tenure as announcer, Jack Narz would excitedly provide the voice-over narration as a montage of massive winged spaceships climbed toward the sky. This was followed by the appearance of Space Patrol Headquarters with its overpowering presence composed of utilitarian angles and a gleaming but faintly antiseptic facade. The words Space Patrol would suddenly appear, dominating the screen. After a commercial break, the episode title would appear against a background of shifting clouds.

SPACE PATROL (1963)

Like FIREBALL XL5, Space Patrol charted the interplanetary adventures of one crew and one craft among a fleet of many. Set in the year 2100, its heroes were Earthman , Captain Larry Dart, Slim the Venusian and Husky the Martian who patrolled the solar system in their melodious Galosphere 347, as part of the United Galactic Organisation - a peace keeping force set up by Earth, Mars and Venus.

Other main characters were the base commander, Colonel Raeburn, his blonde Venusian secretary Marla, a wacky genius inventor Professor Aloysius O'Rourke O'Brien Haggerty and his daughter Cassiopea, and a loquacious Martian parrot called the Gabblerdictum (a tour de force vocal performance from comedienne Libby Morris).

Space Patrol is one of the 'lost brigade' of television science fiction, overshadows by the federation of puppet shows created by Gerry Anderson. It debuted in 1963, a few months after Anderson's FIREBALL XL5 and in some ITV regions the two overlapped. Invariably linked with and often confused with its more illustrious contemporary, Space Patrol did succeed, however in its own right. In America it became the top-rated children's show within one month of its launch.

Its creator was Roberta Leigh, a former romantic novelist who had previously written the stories for Gerry Anderson's earliest series, The Adventures of Twizzle and Torchy, the Battery Boy (who himself took off for the stars in a rocket fired by sparklers). As with many shows of the time, Space Patrol steered an erratic course around the country, with running order and transmission dates throughout. For example, ABC was first off the mark, in April 1963, but took three takes to show the 26 first season episodes (ending in February 1964). Associated-Rediffusion in London began in July 1963 and finished the first season in January 1964. London then moved onto season 2 six weeks later, while ABC viewers had to wait two years for the first season two episodes and more than four year for their last.

Producers for the series included Roberta Leigh and Arthur Provis, models for the series was created by Derek Freeborn, special effects and animation were created by Bill Palmer, Brian Stevens and Bert Walker. The dates which are listed here are for the Associated Rediffusion, London area. The cameraman was Arthur Provis, the editors were Roy Hyde, Len Walter, John Beaton (Season One), John Beaton, Len Walter for season two. The art director was Roland Whiteside, the electronic music soundtrack was by F. C. Judd, the recordist was Cyril Brown, the sound editor was John Beaton, the second unit cameraman was Jimmy Hopewell and the shows space consultant was Colin Ronan.

Raeburn learns that Miga, a wealthy Venusian, has taken possession of the asteroid and will sell it. Raeburn has to agree to the asking price and sends Dart to complete the transaction. Exploring the Silver Forest of Venus, Husky becomes trapped in the web of a Spirigum Spider. Haggerty manages to free him, and discovers that the fragments of the web act as a truth drug. Raeburn, meanwhile, is offered the formula for Kinotine, which has the ability to store heat indefinitely. Kinotine's investor, Dr Mason, will donate the formula, but when a call is received from Kolig, head of Mars's largest chemical plant, offering the Kinotine formula for sale. Raeburn suspects foul play. Dart is sent to deal with Kolig, and learns of the 'accidental' death of Dr Mason

2 - 4 THE TELEPATHIC ROBOT

Haggerty presents Raeburn with 'Busy Lizzie', a robot who responds to thoughts, Dart wants to test the range of the robot's telepathic power, and takes it in the Galasphere, proving that in Space it can still receive Raeburn's thoughts. Dart is sent to investigate a new planet near the sun; but it is the 'holiday home' of the Neptunians, and the Galasphere crew succumb to their hypnotic influence. Only Busy Lizzie is unaffected, but Raeburn has a virus and cannot send any orders ...

2 - 5 THE DEADLY WHIRLWIND

To halt a virus destroying Martian vegetation, Dart is sent with a spray which is deadly to all life forms except those native to Mars. When the spray comes into contact with a whirlwind, the chemical is rushed up into Space. Meanwhile, Tyro is using an artificial planet to engineer a collision between Earth, Mars and Venus. Unless his demand for slaves is met, the three worlds will collide in six months, but Earth will be dead even sooner, for the deadly chemical spray is on a collision course ..

2 - 6 THE JITTER WAVES

Raeburn thinks Haggerty is joking when he tells him about the strange juttering that's shaken his house, but the Colonel soon learns that the jittering is affecting the entire city, and that other locations on Earth are also suffering. Searching for the source, the Galasphere travels underwater to Jim Barrett's Atlantic Farm, where the robot workers are affected. A chance remark leads Haggerty to the conclusion that the jittering is caused by radio waves, which he traces back to Uranus, where the Duos are once again planning an invasion ...

2 - 7 SANDS OF DEATH

The President of Mars informed Raeburn of a plot by opposition leader Tyrig, who is planning to seize power using a nerve gas. When word reaches Raeburn that Tyrig and his men are establishing a base on the martian moon Phobos, Dart is sent to investigate. Tyrig releases a small quantity of gas over the Martian capital and Raeburn tries to warn Dart not to land, but is too late. Dart and his men are captured by Tyrig, who wants to use the Galasphere to spread the gas. Dart refuses to co-operate, and the crew are placed in a dungeon, which slowly fills with sand....

2 - 8 THE HAIRY MEN OF MARS

The Galasphere's Meson unit malfunctions and lands in the unexplored Martian Tuhera jungle. Dart and Husky leave to fix the trouble. When Husky fails to return, Dart follows and is captured by a giant primitive man. Husky speaks with the giant in ancient Martian, and the two spacemen are set free, taking some fruit which the giants eat to make their hair grow. Dart gives the fruit to Haggerty, who is still trying to grow a full head of hair. The team are soon faced with a bizarre dilemma, how to stop Haggerty's fast-growing hair from getting any longer

2 - 9 THE GRASS OF SATURN

A new leader has assumed power on Saturn, Riga has succeeded his brother Simba, following his death. Under cover of a diplomatic mission Dart tries to find out what happened. While Dart is en route, Riga sends rockets to Earth with seeds of Saurnian grass, which absorbs oxygen and emits carbon oxide. On Earth the seeds are mistaken for a dust storm. As the grass grows, the staff at Space Headquarters begin to feel its effects; everyone is drowsy. When Haggerty realizes that Venusians are suffering more than Earth people, he discovers that the planet is rapidly losing its oxygen

2 - 10 FORCE FIELD X

With the Earth in the grip of a heatwave, Galasphere 347 searches for an answer. Slim collects some unusual particles, and remains in orbit to carry out further investigations. The particles have strong electromagnetic properties; if a belt of such particles were thrown around the Earth it would draw away the atmosphere, letting in more energy from the Sun. Only Neptunians can create such a force field. The field begins to disrupt the electricity supply, causing a complete blackout. Without power, the Galasphere cannot be launched, and Slim is still in orbit. Dart is forced to make a rescue flight in an antiquated solid fuel rocket .

2 - 11 THE WATER BOMB

The Galasphere is sent on a rain-making mission to Mars with a cargo of oxygen and hydrogen. Unfortunately, hydrogen is exactly what escaped criminal Marog requires to complete the bomb he is constructing in his hideout on Phobos. Dart responds to a distress call, apparently from a scientific base on Phobos. As soon as the galasphere touches down the crew are taken prisoner by Marog's men. With his bomb completed and aimed at the Martian capital, Marog demands a pardon. The President threatens to destroy Phobos, and informs Raeburn of his intentions. Raeburn asks him to wait, but Marog's deadline is drawing near and the attack is launched.

2 - 12 DESTRUCTION BY SOUND

Haggerty's daughter, Cassie, tests Professor Zeffe's matter transmitter, and emerges talking backwards. On the Moon, Dart encounters a geologist using a powerful ultrasonic gun to detect minerals. With no cure in sight for Cassie, Dart wonders if the ultrasonic gun might help. Meanwhile, Raeburn is contacted by Yria from Alpha Centauri, who is seeking help from Space Patrol in destroying an evil computer super brain, which is attempting to take over the planet Delta. No one can get close enough to attack, but Dart realizes that the ultrasonic gun could immobilize it. Converted for faster than light travel, the Galasphere sets out for Alpha Centauri ...

2 - 13 THE SHRINKING GAS OF JUPITER

On a mission to Jupiter, Slim disappears in the swamps. Raeburn orders Dart and Husky to leave, but there is trouble with the Galasphere's primary drive, giving Dart an excuse to land and resume the search for Slim. Setting out on foot, Dart falls into a cave, alongside Slim, who has shrunk to dwarf-like proportions. Slim guesses that a patch of mist at the cave entrance is responsible for his condition, and is proved right when Dart also starts to shrink. Back on Earth, Raeburn is astonished when a diminutive Dart appears ...

SPACE PIRATES

Set aboard the good ship Guisto, Space Pirates is a musical feast for the ears as children are treated to thirty minutes of music from a variety of genres and influences. Guisto orbits planet Earth under the command of Captain DJ (Perrier Award nominee Luke Toulson) who surfs the sound waves looking for music to broadcast on his pirate radio station Guisto FM. Captain DJ's motley crew includes space-wise kids Honk and Tonk, Lippy the talking microphone, and alien barnacle Zorst (voiced by Dominic Byrne from the Chris Moyles show) who reads the travel news and weather report. Also part of the merry gang is Jolly Roger the grumpy flag and raucous house band "The Jingles", made of three puppet rats with rhythm - Windy, Brassy and Stringy.

Every week the Space Pirates are called into action by an Earth-based "Pirate Posse", who set a musical challenge that sends the crew on a search for the perfect song for their needs. One week the Pirate Posse might ask for a song to dance to, another week a song to sing-along or drum to. Captain DJ and his crew then select three songs for the Pirate Posse to choose one that will play out the show.

Space Pirates is a live action music series that kick starts the weekend as part of the 'Big Fun Time' zone.

Space Pirates features musical guests and genres from all over the world - performances have been filmed in Papua New Guinea, Beijing, Australia and South Africa, as well as the UK. Viewers can look forward to guest appearances from artists who might be beamed aboard or performing on location including McFly, Jamelia, Riverdance, The Blue Man Group, Julie Felix and String Fever. Pop videos classics such as YMCA, James Brown, Christina Aguilera and Scissor Sisters are highlights of the show, and The Jingles bring their own unique twist to proceedings with their weekly performances of cover versions including tracks by The Beatles, Madonna, The Monkees, The Beach Boys and U2.

Primarily aimed at children from 4-6 years old, Space Pirates reaches all ages and brings the whole family together to explore a diverse range of musical performances.

The interactive elements also enable viewers to really get involved with the show. For six weeks from 9 November 2007, viewers can press the red button on their TV remote controls and choose which of the three songs they want to listen to at the end of the show.

Space Pirates has its own website, which hosts music clips from the show along with video of Jingles and Zorst Report best bits. As well as rocking out to the theme tune, children will be able to play with interactive musical experiences that are as eclectic and diverse as the show itself.

Cbeebies Radio on BBC7 also plays host to the show during the daily 2-5pm slot.

SPACE PRECINCT

Set in the mid-21st century, Space Precinct is the story of veteran New York police Lieutenant Patrick Brogan who gets a transfer to Demeter City, the crime capital of the galaxy. Nothing not even 20 years on the streets of New York, could prepare Brogan for fighting aliens crooks millions of light years from Earth.

Demeter City is a parable for all our large urban jungles. Space Precinct rejects the 'Trek' philosophy that space travel has been the answer to all man's problems. The Demeter system - located along a spiral arm of the Milky Way - has all Earth's problems, but with an added twist - the bulk of the population is alien. Demeter City, on the planet Altor, is home to two species who have migrated here from their home worlds, the Creons and the Tarns. The larger Creons are big on ritual and ceremony and are highly superstitious, while the Tarns have telepathic and telekinetic powers.

Helping Brogan deal with the riffraff is his sidekick, Officer Haldane, and the beautiful Officer Jane Castle. They are based in an orbiting Precinct House (Precinct 88) and get about in flying police cruisers: a kind of Hill Street Blues in space. Brogan's family - wife Sally, 10- year-old Liz and teenage son Matthew - are also trying to adjust to their new life in an orbiting Space Suburb.

Gerry Anderson is more famous for producing the puppet SF shows of the 60s including THUNDERBIRDS, JOE 90 and CAPTAIN SCARLET AND THE MYSTERONS. Who also produced live action shows such as SPACE: 1999 and UFO. Gerry Anderson returned to television with his most spectacular series ever - a $36 million space cop show featuring live-action and movie-style alien effects. This is the series Anderson spent 10 years trying to make, an obsession which saw an abortive pilot in 1987, called Space Police, and which was hauled back from the brink of extinction by an Anglo-American partnership between New York-based Grove Television and London production company Mentorn Films.

Space Precinct is, inevitably light years from the Supermarionated puppet series with which Anderson made his name. The early pilot (which starred Anderson voice veteran Shane Rimmer) featured a mix of puppets and robotics, dubbed 'Galactronics' by Anderson. Space Precinct, filmed at Pinewood and Shepperton Studios, at a cost of $1.5 million per episode, utilises computer-generated animatronics, robotics, prosthetics and stop-motion, and stars Ted Shackelford (Dallas' Gary Ewing) and Rob Youngblood.

In Britain, the series aired first on Sky, from March 1995, going out on BBC, an autumn 1995. It sold well, picked up in Europe and America- but cruel scheduling in the States, and generally low ratings, meant further series were unlikely.

Space Precinct was not treated very well by the stations that aired it. Despite the fact that the series was produced with a budget equal to or exceeding most prime time network TV series, the series was often broadcast in grave yard slots in the middle of the night or early Saturday morning. Such treatment had a lot to do with the poor ratings it received. The pilot episode created in the 1980s has never been broadcast.

Space Precinct was the first live action TV series to come from Gerry Anderson (of UFO, Thunderbirds and Space: 1999 fame) since Space: 1999 stopped production in the mid seventies. Like Space: 1999 had 20 years earlier, Space Precinct set a record for production costs on a British TV series with the first season costing $36 million to produce. Like all of Anderson's previous series, the production values were very high with lots of model work and spectacular explosions.

The series evolved from an idea Anderson had in the mid 1980's which was called Space Police, about a human policeman working with an alien partner in outer space. A pilot episode for Space Police was made, but the pilot was not picked up as a series and to this date it remains unbroadcast. That 1987 Pilot was made by Anderson Burr Pictures, and was written by Gerry Anderson and Tony Barwick. The director was Tony Bell, and the music was created by Gerry Anderson and Christopher Burr. The two principle actors involved in the pilot was Shane Rimmer who played Lt. Brogan and Catherine Chevalier who played Cathy Costello.

This pilot episode is also sometimes known as Star Laws, the individual episode title had the series been made.

Set in the middle of the 21st century, Space Precinct is located on the planet Altor, which is located in a distant solar system. Demeter City is the largest city on Altor which has recently become a major interstellar trading centre. Most of the citizens of Demeter City are members of one of two alien races: the Creons from the planet Danae and the Tarns from the planet Simter. Mass immigration has occurred from both worlds due to widespread poverty on both and the promise of opportunity in Demeter City. This opportunity however has attracted both the good elements and the bad.

A well-trained police force is necessary to keep the bad elements in check. The police force operates from an orbiting space station and is comprised of officers from many different worlds. Patrick Brogan and his young partner Jack Haldane are both from Earth. Brogan had been a lieutenant with the New York City police department, with 25 years of experience. Believing that a change of scenery would do both himself and his family some good, Brogan decided to take part in a law enforcement exchange programme that allowed him to be transferred to Altor, along with his partner Haldane. Brogan and his family, wife Sally, daughter Liz and son Matt, live in a space suburb. The suburban space community is in orbit around Altor. It is a middle class community which has not been plagued by all of the crime which has become somewhat rampant in Demeter City.

Brogan soon finds that 25 years on the New York police department was not quite enough to prepare him for being a cop in space. Most of the bad guys and fellow officers are aliens, although as the series progresses a Greater percentage of the people seem to be human. One of the first humans on the police force is Jane Castle, who is somewhat more familiar with Oemeter City, Haldane has the hots for her and although at first she will barely give him the time of day. a relationship eventually develops between them. Other Officers in the precinct include Took. Castle's partner, who is a Tarn and has telekinetic ability and Beezle, Romek and Orin who are around to provide comic relief. The 88th precinct was run by Captain Podly.

Space Precinct was not treated very well by the stations that aired it. Despite the fact that the series was produced with a budget equal to or exceeding most prime time network TV series, the series was often broadcast in grave yard slots in the middle of the night or early Saturday morning. Such treatment had a lot to do with the poor ratings it received. NOTE: Many actors, including some of the series regulars, play different alien characters in different episodes.

Executive producer for the series was Tom Gutteridge, co-executive producers were John Needham and Roger Lefkon, producers for the show were J. Larry Carroll and David Bennett Carven, story editor was Sam Graham. Director of photography was Alan Hume, music was by Crispin Merrell, live action design was by Tony Curtis, the creature effects designer was Neill Gorton and the animatronic makeup effects designer was Richard Gregory. SPACE RANGERS

Space Rangers was a series set in the year 2104 on Fort Hope, a remote outpost on the frontier planet Avalon. Like their predecessors in the old west, the Rangers were lawmen whose mission was to keep the peace on the frontier. John Boon was a respected Captain of the Rangers, who was in charge of a small group of Rangers who would embark from Fort Hope in a small slingship to undertake their assignments. Commander Chennault was his immediate superior who authorised the Rangers' special missions.

Chennault's superior was Colonel Weiss, a representative of Earth Central Command. Weiss was a stickler for regulations and often found himself becoming the brunt of the Rangers' jokes. Under Boon's command, his crew consisted of: JoJo, the ship's beautiful pilot Zylyn, an alien from the planet Graaka. Like others from Graaka, Zylyn possesses great strength and ESP. Zylyn was required to wear a restraining collar to prevent him from becoming overtly violent. Doc, a hustler who was the ship's engineer. Doc was a cyborg who was constantly needing to fix himself, Daniel Kincaid, a cadet fresh from the academy. Kincaid was a bit on the reckless side since he felt that he had to prove himself to his important father back home. Mimmer did not accompany the Rangers on their missions, he remained on Fort Hope where he was the resident scientific genius. The Space Rangers were rather low tech. Instead of having some type of ray guns, like the heroes of most science fiction series set in the future, the Rangers had regular guns.

Only 4 of the 6 episodes which were made were shown in the US before the show was cancelled, although all six episodes have been aired on the Sci-Fi Channel in the UK.

The series as a whole had the feel of a western transplanted into outer space, but with some reworking. The majority of the episodes could easily be remade as episodes of a western, with the alien society of the Graaka being substituted with American Indians. This was obviously what was intended, however the concept failed to interest an audience. CBS pulled the plug on Space Rangers after 4 weeks, with two episodes remaining unbroadcast.

1993 saw the launch of three new US science fiction series: STAR TREK: DEEP SPACE NINE, BABYLON 5 (with its first movie, Babylon 5: The Gathering), and Space Rangers. Also many of the episodes were shown out of order which clearly did not help Space Rangers' case, since clearly "Fort Hope" was supposed to be the first episode, since it introduced the characters, but the episode got shifted around the schedules in the US, leaving the series disjointed. The episode was shown as fourth on its run.

Cast of Characters

Captain John Boone (Jeff Kaake) - Boone is leader of Ranger Slingship #377. He's a hard-boiled cop whose chief concern is getting the job done and returning his Rangers home safe and sound. His personal life is a different story as he's estranged from his wife, Sarah and young daughter, Roxanne. They have relocated back to Earth leaving Boone alone at his Fort Hope station. He keeps an old U.S. silver dollar in his pocket during missions for good luck.

Doc Kreuger (Jack McGee) - Slingship #377's grizzled flight engineer. Doc has been injured in the line of duty so many times that more of his body is cybernetic than of flesh and blood. He would have been discharged from the Rangers ages ago except that he's bribed people to stay. As a child, Doc grew up in space with his father going from one deep-space freighter to another. He would feel lost if he were stuck on a planet never to go into space again. He's loud, rude, filthy, smokes too much, and subjects his teammates to constant, loud, Motown Sound music. It's Doc who nicknamed their slingship the "Tin Lizzie".

Jojo Thorsen (Marjorie Monaghan) - Slingship #377's pilot. Jojo is a tall, blonde, Amazonian-like woman. She comes from the colony of New Venus. She is a loose canon, but she's also very loyal to her team and the best pilot in the Rangers Corps. She has a particular distaste for Banshees and has a temper that has gotten her in trouble more than once. She also drinks far too much black coffee.

Zylyn (Cary-Hiroyuki Tagawa) - A warrior-monk from the planet Graaka. He is one of only four Graaka serving in the Rangers Corps. Zylyn's people were once considered the fiercest warriors in the galaxy until they decided to embrace the ways of peace. Graakas also have the ability to be semi-telepathic as they can read intense thoughts. Zylyn wears a cybernetic pacifier collar to help control his aggressive tendencies. He takes it off only when the situation calls for him to fight. Doc nicknames him "Zee-Man", much to his annoyance. When not on duty he can be found in his temple just outside of Fort Hope.

Daniel Kincaid (Danny Quinn) - Kincaid is the rookie on Boone's team. He is the son of a general in Earth's Central Command. He is often referred to as the team's "backman". That is to say he's the team's back-up if they are caught in a firefight. He's still a little too trigger-happy at times and he's not happy about guard duty on the ship while the rest of the team is away on a mission.

Dr. Mimmer (Clint Howard) - Mimmer is chief medic and forensics scientist at Fort Hope. He's a bit of a chatterbox and for the most part nobody can stand being around him. But he does know his stuff and he's helped the Rangers as much as he's irritated them.

Commander Chenault (Linda Hunt) - Chenault is commanding officer and head magistrate on Fort Hope. Despite her rank she thinks of herself as a leader of a colony before her military position. Contrary to her small physical stature there's no doubt who's in charge. She expresses an almost "mother hen" approach to keeping her people safe.

Colonel Erich Weiss (Gottfried John) - Weiss is second-in-command at Fort Hope. He apparently angered someone at Central Command as he lost his comfortable office on Earth and was transferred against his will to Avalon's Fort Hope. He constantly is trying to "improve" the Rangers so he can get transferred back to Earth. The results have left him butting heads with both Boone and Chenault on more than one occasion. His personal interests include chess, brandy, and playing his violin.

Ringer (Keith Berger) -a temperamental combat android originally designed to replace human personnel in the Space Rangers Corps. Ringer was the prototype model introduced by Col. Weiss to Capt. Boone's team. Jojo nicknames the android Ringer, "as in dead" as an insult because she feels threatened by the idea of being replaced. The rest of the crew continue to call him that. Although Ringer contributed some impressive skills to the crew, he was unable to adjust to unpredictable situations that he wasn't already preprogrammed to deal with. This inability to adapt causes him to malfunction at critical moments. With a fatal design flaw, Ringer is removed from active duty, the android program is mothballed, and Weiss tries to ship Ringer back to Central Command. In later episodes, Ringer can be seen working for Weiss as his personal assistant performing non-threatening office work -badly.

Other Terminology

Banshees -a space-faring predator. These aliens teleport aboard spaceships as they travel through hyperspace. They are violent, impervious to regular weapons, and teleport away as suddenly as they arrive. They also emit a high pitched sonic "scream" that can disorient a person in close quarters, which is where they get their name from. If they manage to kill everyone aboard the ship they will envelope it in an organic cocoon and teleport it with them back to their hyperspace hive.

Bellysnappers -a one person escape pod used to travel to a planet's surface. They are called "bellysnappers" because they tend to give their passengers rough rides and make them sick to their stomachs.

Runabouts -a small but swift & highly maneuverable interplanetary craft often stolen by smugglers to be used for their runs.

Lightspeed Rings -a large, orbiting, ringed structure designed to "slingshot" spaceships into hyperspace from one planet to another.

Slingships -The interceptor spaceship of choice for the Space Rangers. Unlike other ships, it doesn't need a lightspeed ring to achieve hyperspace as it can use a planet's orbital gravity to sling itself. It can still use lightspeed rings to conserve fuel. Captain John Boone's team are assigned Ranger Slingship #377. It has been nicknamed "Tin Lizzie" by its flight engineer Doc Kreuger and they paint shark teeth on the nose of the ship like pilots did to their fighter planes back in Earth's World War II-era. It has seen better days as Doc has had to jury rig many of the ships parts and systems to keep it online, as budget cuts have prevented them from always getting the proper parts and repairs.

Hazard Pay -Whenever the situation is above and beyond the level of danger that a sane person might elect to encounter, the Corps has been known to entice volunteers for missions with a bonus in Rangers' paychecks. Boone's team was offered "triple" hazard pay if they could capture a Banshee for scientists to study. Doc has mentioned to the others that he's still waiting for hazard paychecks from two other missions and doesn't expect

The format was simple enough: in the opening episode the Moon is devastated by a massive atomic explosion - the result of a 20-year build-up of nuclear waste from Earth. With the 300-strong colony of Moonbase Alpha aboard, it is hurled out of Earth orbit and off on an endless journey through space. Thereafter, as the Alphans search in vain for a new home, they have a string of bizarre encounters with invariably hostile aliens, cosmic phenomena and strange worlds.

American husband-and-wife stars Martin Landau and Barbara Bain teamed up for the first time since Mission: Impossible, as Moonbase commander John Koenig and chief medical officer Dr Helena Russell. And Fugitive-chasing Barry Morse played the intellectual scientist father-figure of Victor Bergman.

Billed as the ultimate adventure series. Space: 1999 arrived on our screens in 1975 as the most expensive TV series up to that time. The Apollo space programme had just been completed with the first international space mission and it looked as if man's exploration of space would continue in earnest. As the name suggests, Space: 1999 was set in the year 1999. The nations of Earth had set up Alpha Moonbase on the moon. Alpha was an advanced scientific outpost which served a dual purpose of monitoring nuclear waste storage on the moon 'and serving as headquarters for Earth's deep space exploration programme. Space: 1999 was the second live action science fiction series from producer Gerry Anderson. Originally planned as a second season of UFO the series evolved into Space: 1999 when Anderson was asked to make it about exploring other worlds while keeping it set near enough in the future so that the audience can still identify with the characters.

To accomplish this dual goal, the nuclear waste dumps on the moon were blown up (accidentally) This explosion sent the moon on an uncharted course into deep space and through a series of space warps where they had no hope of being rescued by a mission from Earth. The 311 men and women living on Alpha were faced with the dual task of finding a new home and of surviving in deep space. In command of Alpha was John Koenig. Koenig had been a former commander of Alpha. As the series opened Koenig has been reassigned to his position at Alpha in order to deal with the problems that wound up sending the moon into deep space. Koenig had previously had a relationship with Dr. Helena Russell. Alpha's chief medical officer. The characters were played by real life husband and wife acting team Martin Landau and Barbara Bain. Head of Alpha's science departments was Professor Victor Bergman, an elderly distinguished scientist.

Supporting characters in the first series consisted of Alan Carter, chief pilot of the fleet of Alpha's Eagle spacecraft which were used to transport the Alphans from place to place. Sandra Benes communications officer, Paul Morrow, controller of Alpha's Main Mission control centre, David Kano. chief operator of Alpha's all powerful main computer.

Space: 1999 had the highest production values of any science fiction television programme produced up until that time, and in many areas its production values have yet to be exceeded. The series borrowed much of its look from 2001: A Space Odyssey. 2001 was the first film to feature non-aerodynamically designed spaceships while Space: 1999 was the first TV series to do so. This was not entirely surprising since Brian Johnson, who was in charge of the special effects team on Space: 1999 was a member of the effects team on 2001: A Space Odyssey.

High production values were not the only thing that Space: 1999 had in a similar vein to 2001: A Space Odyssey. During Space: 1999's first series episodes often featured a mysterious unknown force to advance the plot. Using a mysterious unknown force as a plot device may have worked in a movie, which is meant to be viewed once. In a weekly TV series it causes a viewer to think too much. something the average TV viewer is often not apt to do.

The fact that many stories were hard to understand and other criticisms against the series did not fall on deaf ears. When Space: 1999 returned for a second series, efforts were made to correct them. Fred Freiberger, the American producer in charge of Star Trek's third season, was brought in as Space: 1999's producer. He made many changes to the programme, some of them of a dubious nature.

Space: 1999 series two was described in promotional literature as 'the best just got better'. Stories featuring the mysterious unknown force were absent, they were replaced with ones of a much more action adventure and character oriented episodes. The series even looked different. There were new costumes and new sets. The huge Main Mission set was replaced by a much more cramped Command Centre as the nerve centre of all of Alpha's operations. (The Main Mission set had a reputation for being very hard to light.) Several characters from the first series vanished from the second with no explanation as to where they went. Professor Bergman being the most notable example, his presence was sorely missed.

The missing characters were replaced by new ones Maya, an alien woman who had the ability to alter her shape. Maya was the sole survivor of the planet Psycon. Her father was a mad scientist who had attempted to destroy the Alphans in an effort to revive their dying world. In the process of defeating him the planet was destroyed and Maya was forced to adopt Alpha as her new home. Her powers often came in handy in getting her new friends out of jams. Tony Verdeschi, head of Alpha's security and a love interest for Maya was also added as a main character.

The changes were however too many and too late. Many people who liked the first series despised the second. Many people who did not like the first series never gave the second a chance. Space: 1999 was continually being compared to Star Trek often unfavourably. Space: 1999 came out when Star Trek fandom was at its peak and rumours of a revival were rampant. Many Trek fans felt that if Space: 1999 succeeded then Trek would never come back. The converse however was more likely true: if Space: 1999 did well that would prove science fiction could succeed and that would increase the chances of Trek's return. This is evidenced by the current 'glut' we have of science fiction shows now that a few have become popular.

No one seemed to notice that Star Trek and Space: 1999 were totally different in concept. Unlike the Enterprise crew, the Alphans were unwilling travellers in space from a culture not yet ready for interstellar travel. Their primary objectives were to survive and to find a new home not explore space. Alien civilisations they encountered would feel justified in the snobbish attitude they often had in not allowing contact with a culture in such infancy that its nations still waged war amongst themselves.

Space: 1999 was from its very inception made for the American television market. After the first series had already been completed, ITC (the show's US distributor) set out to sell the series to one of the three commercial TV networks. A big point was made that it had American stars. No network took the show, mainly because they would have no input into its content. ITC proceeded to take Space: 1999 and put it into first run syndication.

This gave the few independent stations on the air at the time (most of the current FOX, UPN and WB affiliates were not yet on the air!) get a new big budget dramatic series, something most had never had before. In many cities however Space: 1999 found itself on network affiliates which often pre-empted new network series to broadcast Space: 1999, something the networks did not like. By the time the second series came around, many of these stations were forced to move Space: 1999 to less desirable, non prime time slots where it became less profitable than the less expensive programmes usually found in such times. Fewer stations decided to pick up the show for a third season than were needed to pay for it and it was cancelled.

In Britain the ITV network broadcast the first series nationally during prime time. However the second series fared much worse, often getting run on Saturday mornings and at different times in different regions of the country. Being viewed as a series being made for the Americans, little was done to insure its continued success.

Had Space: 1999 premiered in the late 1980's or today Space: 1999 would most likely have lasted several years longer due to the growth of both the first run syndication market and in the number of stations on the air, looking for well done series.

Space: 1999 was the series which began with a bang and went out with a whimper. Stylishly and extravagantly filmed, it devoured a fortune in special effects, took two years to plan, 15 months to make and should have been one of TV's most exhilarating adult space odysseys. But though it spent two more years and 48 episodes roaming the outer reaches of the universe, Space: 1999 never found the audience it was looking for. Its creator, Gerry Anderson, was the proverbial prince without honour in his own land. While the series was a world-wide success, with particularly big followings in America, Japan, France and Italy, Britain dithered, dallied and, by the end, virtually ignored it.

Visually, Space: 1999 was a treat - its spectacular sets and effects masterminded by Brian Johnson who brought much of the grace of his work on 2001: A Space Odyssey to the aerial sequences with the insect-like spacecraft, the Eagles. But the show was marred by po-faced acting, wildly implausible plots, one-dimensional characters and an almost total lack of warmth or humour. For the second season, American producer Fred Freiberger (of STAR TREK fame) was brought in to try to 'Americanise' the series, beefing up the romantic bond between Koenig and Dr Russell and adding a few new regulars, notably Maya, an exotic alien with the power to transform herself into any living thing. But the stories became increasingly silly and the Alphans reached the end of the road without ever getting anywhere.

Space: 1999 premiered here in September 1975, but ITV's network committee denied the show a network run, leaving the Alphans to fight a fragmented battle for ratings around the regions - a battle they largely lost. The second series fared even worse, with even the 'home team' ATV, dragging it out over two years. In London Season Two was eventually consigned to the Saturday morning children's schedules, but some areas gave it a miss altogether.

Catherine Schell who's full name is Catherine Von Schell starred in the science fiction film Moon Zero Two in 1969. Despite the highest budget for TV sci-fi ever (about 1/3 of a million bucks per episode) and Martin Landau plus Barbara Bain (both of Mission Impossible) plus some cool sets and effects, talking computers, Star-Wars lasers, "Queller Drive" spaceships, "Camelot Locator" beams, and Rudi Gernreich unisex costumes, nothing could rescue a scientifically lame premise (nuclear waste explosion knocks moon out of orbit) and poorly-conceived aliens with no motivation (giants squids, people-eating contraceptive foam, prostitute robots of Planet Piri).

To begin with, a "radioactive waste explosion" could not knock the moon (with its inhabited lunar base) out of Earth orbit. But even if we grit our teeth and accept this preposterous concept, how does the Moon thereafter encounter one solar system after another is it travelling faster than the speed of light, or what? This is exactly what goes wrong when non-science fiction writers try to create science fiction.

The series was first shown in the US in September 1975. Executive producer for the series was Gerry Anderson, producers for the series were Sylvia Anderson (Season One) and Fred Freiberger (Season Two), special effects were created by Brain Johnson. The music was created by Barry Gray (Season One) and Derek Wadsworth (Season Two). Costumes for the series were made by Rudi Gernreich (Season One) and Keith Wilson (Season Two). The script editors was Edward Di Lorenzo (1.1) and Johnny Byrne (1.2 +). The story consultant was Christopher Penfold, the make-up was by Basil Newell and the Moon City Costumes were by Rudi Gernreich. The technical director was David Lane, lighting cameraman was Frank Watts BSC.

The early seventies was a pretty bleak period for science fiction on television. With the exception of the occasional TV movie done by Gene Roddenberry in an effort to prove that he had a creative life after Star Trek, not a lot was happening. It wasn't until Star Wars was released in 1977 that television producers practically tripped over each other trying to duplicate that success on television-and none of them ever did. The reason none of them ever succeeded was readily apparent in Space: 1999. While the only thing television producers tend to learn from other people's mistakes is how to repeat them, they almost never learn from anyone's success, except how to imitate the most superficial elements. When BATTLESTAR GALACTICA came along a few years later, this was all too readily demonstrated. They just didn't get it.

Prior to Space: 1999, producers Gerry and Sylvia Anderson (a husband and wife team) had made a successful career of producing children's action adventure shows in which the characters were all played by marionettes and extensive use was made of special effects miniatures. These shows included SUPERCAR, THUNDERBIRDS, CAPTAIN SCARLET, STINGRAY, and FIREBALL XL5. All of these were produced in the six-ties on small budgets but were modest successes. THUNDERBIRDS was successful enough to spawn two motion pictures, although none of the other series matched the Thunderbirds in popularity.

But the Andersons grew increasingly tired of producing puppet shows for children and wanted to graduate into live action. They did this first with the syndicated series UFO, a show about a secret British government project to track and combat flying saucers which are landing on Earth and kidnapping human beings for nefarious purposes. Although uneven, the series had its moments and its twenty-six-episode first season seemed destined to move into a second. But instead, the producers decided to develop a new series called Space Journey 1999. Previous titles considered for the series include Journey into Space, Space Intruders, and Space Probe. As of 1973 it still had the form of a spin-off from UFO, using the moon base common to both shows as the starting point.

Originally Moon City existed as part of an early warning system against alien attack, just as the moon base did in UFO. Moon City, according to an early premise, was twenty miles square and included for defence two different types of vehicles. One was the Interceptor (as seen on UFO), and the others were Lunarmobiles, which were equipped with ground-to-ground missiles to deal with UFOs that landed on the surface of the moon. On the non--defence side was a Moonship shuttle (forerunner of the Eagle spacecraft ultimately used on Space: 1999). There were even Moonbuggies for exploring the surface.

Whereas UFO had starred all British actors, the Andersons decided to go for the gold and produce a series that they could sell directly to American net-work television. The sixties British series The Avengers had managed to graduate to success in American prime time, along with The Prisoner, and the Andersons hoped to use that interest in British adventure television to gain themselves admittance to American prime time. They cast the show with actors familiar to American audiences. Initially the parts of John Koenig and Helena Russell were conceived for Robert Culp and Katherine Ross, who were both fairly well known from film and television in the early seventies. But ultimately Martin Landau and Barbara Bain (who had appeared on the first two years of Mission: Impossible) were cast as the leads. Barry Morse, well known from his recurring role on the highly popular sixties series The Fugitive, played Professor Victor Bergman.

In a supporting role as Alan Carter, Moonbase Alpha's chief Eagle pilot, was Nick Tate. An Australian actor, Tate had appeared in many TV shows down under before deciding to relocate to England in the early seventies. Initially he was cast as Alan Carter's co-pilot and was signed for only the pilot, but then was asked to do five more. The character worked out so well that Tate was signed for the rest of the season, and was retained for year two as well. During the time season two was in production, Tate was asked his opinion of the first season, and the actor stated, "I think I agree with the general public that there wasn't enough emotion and humour in the first season. This year that's been rectified. I always wanted to see development of the secondary characters, which has happened. I think we were all very much aware of the series' faults, but we weren't aware of them when the show started. It was some-thing that became apparent as the series wore on. But then, there wasn't very much we could do about it because the format and style were set. The only way we could do anything was to start a second season."

The Andersons wanted to go all out on Space: 1999 and ATV (Associated Television), under Sir Lew Grade, approved a suitable budget, which according to some reports may have been as high as $300,000 per episode. Subsequent information revealed that the budgets were considerably less. When you're trying to sell a major series to a net-work, you don't brag about how cheap it is. But in spite of the producers' track record, the three major networks at that time (ABC, NBC, and CBS) turned the show down. In that time, before the advent of cable television, the only alternative left was syndication. Abe Mandell, the president of ITC (a sub-sidiary of ATC), sold the show directly to American television stations, city by city, until they managed to sell to 155 stations. Out of that number, eighty-eight actually pre-empted regular network programming with the series. The series premiered in September 1975 to initial enthusiasm which was quickly met with disappointment. Unlike UFO, which had occasional scenes in outer space involving a moon base, Space: 1999 (shortened from the earlier, much longer title) was set entirely in outer space with the moon being the base of operations.

The first episode, "Breakaway," opens in September 1999, when John Koenig is named the new commander of Moonbase Alpha, just as signals are picked up from a previously unknown planet named Meta. There is pressure to launch a deep space probe shortly after Koenig's arrival. But Koenig argues against this until he can determine the source of mysterious ailments striking various members of the moon base colony, which he believes deserves more immediate attention. The moon base is part of a project to oversee a dumping ground for nuclear waste on the dark side of the moon. Many nations from earth contribute nuclear waste to the dump and so there is political pressure to ensure that this extraterrestrial disposal area for hazardous waste remain viable as no nation on earth will tolerate the radioactive waste being stored in its borders.

Moonbase Alpha is meant to be self-sustaining as it engages in various research projects, including keeping a watchful eye on the nuclear dump. The problems are soon traced to the dump, which creates political problems because Earth needs that dump to dispose of its nuclear waste. Koenig is pressured to launch the probe by his superior, Commissioner Simmonds, in spite of reports on problems at the dump. But while they're arguing over what to do, a chain reaction occurs in the dump, causing a massive discharge of magnetic radiation. The explosion is of such magnitude that the moon is hurled out of orbit into space. The vehicles they have on Moonbase Alpha, called Eagles, are built for short runs only and at any rate would not be able to evacuate all of the Moonbase Alpha personnel back to Earth. The last transmission that Moonbase Alpha receives from Earth indicates that Earth has been rocked by disasters and cannot render any aid.

The premise was shaky from the start since an explosion so powerful that it would have actually ripped the moon out of orbit would have shattered the moon and done only slightly less damage to Earth as the moon's own gravity affects Earth as well. Had the moon broken up and Moonbase Alpha been hurled away on a fragment, that would have been much more believable. But even a thin, unbelievable premise can be accepted if the series produces stories worth telling and that are well told. Sadly, Space: 1999 could never have been accused of that.

The problem with Space: 1999, and with many other television shows born in the seventies, is that it was decided by someone, somewhere that a story line should be simple enough so that even if some-one tunes in halfway through, there'll be no trouble following what's going on. The other side of this is that people who tuned in at the beginning of the episode will become bored by the lack of story movement. Even within those narrow confines the stories were overly simplistic, and as Isaac Asimov put it at the time, the show was "scientifically pre-posterous." In an article he wrote for the New York Times, Asimov maintained that the errors were made not for dramatic effect, which could be forgiven, but out of sheer ignorance.

An example of the storytelling deficiencies is the episode "Force of Life." We never find out what the "Force of Life" of the title is or what its purpose is in invading Moonbase Alpha and wreaking havoc as it steals energy before moving off back into space at the end of the episode. Oddly enough, back in the mid-seventies Martin Landau appeared on a talk show while Space: 1999 was still in its original run, and another guest on the talk show, actor Buster Crabbe (who played Flash Gordon and Buck Rogers in the 1930s), asked Landau about this particular episode of Space: 1999. Crabbe wanted to know what it was all about and why the alien entity was there and what it had wanted. Landau had no idea what the story had meant, and readily admitted it.

Space: 1999 met with its harshest criticism from two fronts—hard-core science fiction fans and Star Trek fans. The hard-core SF fans recognised the scientific implausibility's and became incensed over the continuous violations of science and physics in the first episode alone. Star Trek fans turned away from the show because they'd been spoiled by Star Trek. After seeing each episode over and over again, they were certain that any new science fiction series with an outer space setting would have to follow some of the precepts established so well by Star Trek. But Space: 1999 ignored them. Star Trek's strengths lay in its scripts and in its well-defined characters, of which Space: 1999 offered neither. In 1975 the chances of Star Trek ever being revived seemed remote at best. So fans were looking for the "next" Star Trek. They were willing to give any new SF series a chance. All it had to do was meet them halfway. By the end of the first year, Space: 1999 was in ratings trouble. So what did they do? They hired one of the producers who worked on Star Trek. This was also done because Gerry and Sylvia Anderson's marriage was breaking up and so she stepped down from her role as producer.

Fred Freiberger, who replaced Gene Roddenberry as the line producer on the third year of Star Trek in 1968-69, was hired to revamp the show and try to make it more appealing to American audiences. The fact that Freiberger was universally regarded as making Star Trek less appealing in its final season was a fact that Gerry Anderson was apparently unaware of. But Freiberger had other credits, including producing or otherwise contributing to such series as The Wild Wild West, Petrocelli, and Starsky and Hutch. The revamping of the third year included an emphasis on action/adventure story lines and the addition of Catherine Schell to the cast as Maya, a shape-shifting alien. In order to address some of the criticism the series had received, the second-season premiere, "Metamorph," included a Moonbase Alpha log entry that explained that shortly after the moon had been hurled out of Earth's orbit, it entered a time warp that spit the moon out light-years away in uncharted space. Thus the mysterious alien worlds they kept encountering were explained.

The budget for the first year of Space: 1999 was reported as being $6,500,000. Although ITC sent out a publicity release reporting that the overall budget for the second season swelled to $7,200,000 (or $300,000 per episode), Fred Freiberger dismissed that as being just a lot of hype. The producer maintained that the true per-episode budget was $185,000, which still enabled the company to obtain superior production values. This had to do with the fact that at the time the British pound was worth $1.80 American, and below-the-line production costs are much less in England. A scene in which Maya leaps into the air and transforms into a black panther in mid-leap took all day to film and cost $5,000 compared to a cost of $50,000 to spend an entire day shooting in the United States on a major studio production.

In the November 1980 issue of Starlog, Fred Freiberger was interviewed and related what he viewed as the problems of Space: 1999 when he was hired to revamp it. "They were doing the show as an English show where there was no story, with the people standing around and talking. They had good concepts, they have wonderful characters, but they kept talking about the same thing and there was no plot development. 1999 opened extremely well in the United States and then went right down the tubes. There was nobody you cared about in the show. Nobody at all. The people themselves didn't care about each other. I did a whole thing where I at least had a scene where somebody said, 'My God! He's gonna be hurt! Is he dead? Is he alive?' They just didn't do that."

Freiberger felt that the British producers regarded action as meaning that they had to blow up another Eagle, which he curtailed in the second season. After the second series wound to a close, ITC still held out hope for bringing it back as a possible mid-season re-entry, assuming they could get enough American television stations to sign up for more episodes. Had they been able to accomplish this, they would have quickly reunited the cast and filmed as additional thirteen episodes. But this never happened. Space: 1999 ended its two-year run with a total package of forty-eight episodes. While the second season was certainly different from the first, the writing was only marginally better. Characterisation at least existed, but the stories were on the level of Saturday-morning kids shows and not the kind of science fiction stories people had found they could respect on THE TWILIGHT ZONE and THE OUTER LIMITS.

The mark of a good series is how well it stands up to the test of time. For a few years after the show's cancellation, an annual Space: 1999 convention was held in the United States. While at first attendance was strong, interest began to peter out. While the initial Space: 1999 conventions drew a couple of thousand people, attendance at "Space Con 10" in Los Angeles in July 1992 was estimated to be about three hundred. Fans of Space: 1999 can contact Space Con at P.O. Box 2948, Beverly Hills, CA 90213.

In 1979 when Star Trek-The Motion Picture debuted, some of us had a running joke regarding it being Space: 1999-The Motion Picture, because of how dull Star Trek : The Motion Picture was and in too many ways it reminded one of Space: 1999. But today, with virtually any television series with any sort of following being plundered for motion picture treatment (including Car 54, Gilligan's Island, The Beverly Hillbillies, and The Brady Bunch), I wouldn't be at all surprised if eventually they got around to Space: 1999.

In the early 1970s, when Gerry Anderson was hard at work on UFO and another series, The Protectors, he was called into the offices of ATV for a meeting with owner Lord Lew Grade. Grade asked Anderson for a television series. He didn't want a continuation of UFO; he wanted something new. It could not be just any other series. It had to be big. Grade offered seven million dollars for a show aimed at the American market. And here was the kicker: The story had to take place anywhere but on Earth! Space was the ticket to success. When an excited Anderson left the office, it speedily dawned on him that such a series had to be done totally from scratch, meaning costumes, sets, models-everything. It was Abe Mandell, president of ITC, who had pitched the idea of a spectacular, blockbuster British series to the American market, and who worked with the Andersons on creating that show. Legend has it that while he and Gerry Anderson were discussing what the concept was going to be, Anderson had quipped, "We'll blow up the Earth," but Mandell found that to be "too insecure" for Americans. In reply, Anderson said, "Okay, we'll blow up the moon." That rang the bells in Mandell's brain, and off they went.

Not well known is that Space: 1999's working title, for several months, was Menace in Space. Gerry Anderson refined his suggestion to Abe Mandell: "What happens if the moon breaks orbit around Earth, and if a moonbase full of people on it have to survive every week while they're flung into the dark ravages of space?"

Anderson and his wife, Sylvia, were no strangers to science fiction. They had created and produced a string of successful puppet (or Super Marionation) shows such as Captain Scarlet, Stingray, and Thunderbirds prior to UFO. Sylvia Anderson enjoyed the new challenge of Space: 1999. As co-creator and producer of the first season, she "had a big hand in the futuristic look of the wardrobe and general design," she says, adding proudly, "I felt that the look of the show was above-average for a TV production."

Americans Martin Landau and Barbara Bain, the husband-and-wife team made famous in Mission: Impossible, signed on as Commander John Koenig and Dr. Helena Russell. Together, they would lead the men and women of Moonbase Alpha through space. A stable of British actors provided the supporting cast. Amazingly, other casting permutations were considered. "During our trip to Hollywood in the setting up of the show, we did indeed, see, among many others, Robert Culp, who I personally felt would be a more interesting lead than Martin Landau," says Sylvia Anderson. "Katharine Ross was one of the names put forward, but it was a decision by the financiers to cast the Landaus as a more commercial piece of casting." Space: 1999 is often regarded as England's answer to Star Trek. In both shows, the main characters comprised a highly advanced group engaging in adventures from one central base, fighting hostile aliens and discovering new planets every week.

Also, both shows can be referred to as "space operas," enhanced by state-of-the-art special effects. However, Sylvia Anderson continues to believe that Star Trek did not play any part in the creation or planning of Space: 1999. "The media hype in the States for Star Trek may have got in the way of our program's identity, but that did not apply in the U.K.," she says. The mid-seventies was a daring age to be doing big-budgeted science fiction. At that time, the genre was considered bad business and did not have the respect it enjoys today. Yet, "we felt in late 1973, when we picked up and left for England to do Space: 1999, that it was a perfect time for a science fiction show," says star Martin Landau. "I felt it in my bones, that this type of entertainment format was about to be popular in the near future. Mind you, Star Wars was not on the horizon yet ... and Star Trek had not been at all successful during its network run."

Landau remembers the Andersons as very creative people who complemented each other well. "Sylvia was a charming and gregarious person, always ready for a good laugh, but very bright and serious when necessary. Gerry was more introspective, excepting when he had a couple of drinks, after work, when he'd open up a bit. He, too, was very bright, often very studious, and was much quicker to rise to anger than his wife." Unbeknownst to the stars, the Andersons' collaboration was about to end. Landau says, "Although things must have been getting somewhat strained at home, they never gave us an indication during that entire first year of filming at Pinewood that their marriage was about to break apart. Considering the amount of time we spent at the studio with them, it was quite amazing, to say the least!

"When it came time to do production on the second season," says Landau, "Sylvia's absence was very strongly felt by me, as I liked dealing with her openness and her sensibilities. I found it much harder getting through to our new American producer, Freddie Freiberger, who now had settled into her office. He had much less respect for actors and their input and contribution. I'd say, 'Koenig wouldn't do that!' referring to a script in which the Alphans, on Koenig's orders, execute a preemptive strike at a possible foe. 'It's not within his character, nor his style.' Fred would just shrug and say, 'It doesn't matter, it's a good script and the audience won't notice if it's inconsistent with his character.' 'Of course they will!' I'd argue, for hours and hours ... usually losing the battle."

Landau goes on to say that often there wasn't time to fix script problems that were held up in writing stages, so they would receive pages or changes very late into shooting. Modifications were sometimes possible on the stage, but, "It was never easy," he sighs. Fred Freiberger says he got involved with producing Space: 1999 in the second season because of an earlier discussion with the Andersons about working on UFO. When Sylvia decided to bow from her duties for the second season, Gerry Anderson called him again. Freiberger's first challenge was deciding what to wear for the interview. "I have lousy taste in clothes," he admits. "My wife dresses me in a sense-she inspects me. So, she dressed me for this interview with Gerry. I got a callback and he said, 'Would you be able to go to England for four weeks? We'd love you to come over. You've got the job.' So I said to my wife, 'Let's take a chance.' I asked Gerry, 'How did I get it? I'm the same guy you interviewed for UFO.' And he said that his secretary was impressed by how well color-coordinated my clothes were. So, I didn't get the Space: 1999 job because of my experience or my charm or anything-I got the job because I was color-coordinated!"

Freiberger says he had a good time with Gerry Anderson and has a lot of respect for him. Anderson directed Freiberger to "Americanize" the show to bolster its appeal in the United States. And Freiberger was given the reins to do whatever he wanted. "That was very refreshing," says Freiberger. "There were no studios, no networks; Gerry gave me carte blanche on the whole thing. So we started putting things together. Lord Lew Grade said, 'You do it your way.' So we had three weeks to do it. And we screened the first-year episodes and made suggestions." Freiberger contends the show needed resuscitation and was near collapsing at that stage. "Before I was offered the series, it was offered to (American producer) Allan Balter. According to Allan, Abe Mandell asked for suggestions on how to improve the show. Allan said, 'Fire Marty Landau and Barbara Bain.' When I arrived in England, Mandell suggested that I keep Marty and Barbara in the background and go heavy with the other characters. I said, 'Either fire them or let me handle them as stars.' He let me handle them as stars."

This decision still didn't ensure that Space: 1999 would see a second year. "After three weeks, it was very shaky, and they were still undecided about the show's future. I wanted to leave and return to the U.S. My wife said, 'Let's stay another week and see.' I looked at the show again and said to Gerry, 'Let me try to do something.' I wrote an analysis of what was wrong with the show, and I also introduced the new character, Maya-an alien who could transform into different life forms. That sold it. We got the go-ahead to do 24 episodes." When Gerry Anderson asked him to analyze the first year, Freiberger charged that "there was no emotion in the show. Also, the [Moonbase Command Center] looked like a used living room." He observed that stories were nonexistent and characters were just standing around talking. He wanted emotion, action and humor.

When it came to characters, Freiberger wanted specific changes. "I said, 'If you're going to have a professor, then have a young kid with a beard in there, as the professor,'" says Freiberger. "[Anderson and Lord Grade] were very nervous about this change, and they brought in a goodlooking kid, Tony Anholt, to bring in some romantic situations." Originally, Teresa (Get Christie Love) Graves was sought for the role of Maya, but she was not available. Someone brought Catherine Schell to Freiberger's attention. Schell was not unknown to the production of the show. She had earlier guested in the episode 'Guardian of Piri.' "Catherine Schell was a lovely, lovely girl. I wanted her to transform into a leopard. But they were afraid something like a panther would rip everybody apart, so they used a lion, which I thought was the wrong kind of animal."

In Barbara Bain, Freiberger thought he had found the light comedy relief he was looking for. "I had never met her, but I was familiar with her work. I realized she had a fine sense of humor, so I tried to do some comedy stuff for them and put some more humor into the series. And more action. They kept saying, 'Sell the American market!' That's what we tried to do. We streamlined the Moonbase, cut it way down." Freiberger's dedication to aiming at the North American market went so far as to make sure all signs on the base were spelled in the American, not the British, style.

In a drastic cast change, Barry Morse went out as the older Professor Bergman and Tony Anholt came in as the younger first officer, Tony Verdeschi. Despite Freiberger's suggestion regarding a young actor, the reason for this change wasn't as much a creative decision as a business one: Morse's agent asked for more money, during a time when producers were trying to keep tight reins on the show's budget. "Gerry was really reluctant to fire anybody," says Freiberger. "We called Martin and Barbara in California, and they were anxious to return. But, of course, everybody wanted raises. We said, 'Look, we can't raise anybody-we're lucky if we can get this show on!' We really wanted a young person in place of the professor, but Gerry felt terrible about letting anyone go."

When the show's renewal was announced, all participating performers assumed they would return to work. "Barry's agent called and said, 'We want so much more.' I said to Gerry, 'This agent isn't saying that he has to go back and check with Barry. He's laying it on the line,'" recounts Freiberger. "'Now, if it's not us making the decision, and we can't afford it, let's just say no, and then we're out of this.' So we just said no to the agent, that it wasn't in our budget. And we hired Tony." But Morse's agent called back and said, "We'll take the money that was there." But it was too late-Anholt had already been hired.

"You feel terrible about not using an actor again, but that's a case where an agent made a dumb mistake," says Freiberger. "I consider myself a writer, and a writer will say to his agent, 'Get me 20 million dollars for the deal, but don't screw it up. If it comes back to 10 million, I'll take it if I have to.' So, that was unfortunate. I have great respect for his acting ability. Gerry would have gone with Barry except for this mistake." Nick Tate, who played Eagle pilot Alan Carter, almost got the ax, too. ITC wanted him out, but Freiberger refused.

As the show progressed through its second season, its popularity grew. In fact, says Freiberger, so well known did the show get during the heyday of its run that the public got to know him by name. He would walk through English Customs and an agent would recognize him. "The fans were amazing. They knew more about it than I did." It was a whole life for a lot of people, he says. Sylvia Anderson says she is "surprised about the media criticism that stories in the first [season] were hard to follow. I would like to think that they were reasonably intelligent stories and therefore required a little more depth to the subject." However, Anderson notes that "some of the interesting support cast were not given sufficient opportunities to develop their characters" and that the show "worked better when subsidiary characters were given a little more action than merely walking several paces behind the lead."

Martin Landau actually prefers the first season episodes, citing more interesting, intriguing scripts and plot conventions. ("The Black Sun" and "War Games" remain favorites.) The second season, he charges, was more of a comic strip show. "I felt if we had stayed on the direction of the first season, we might've stayed on for several more years. But changes that came in with Freiberger changed the entire essence of the series." Among his co-stars on the show, both first and second season, Landau points to Nick Tate as one "who became a very good friend of mine. He now lives in Hollywood with his wife and family." They speak on the phone occasionally and get together for lunch every few years. Catherine Schell, whom a television critic once called "the only woman who looked sexy in sideburns," often visits the U.S. and usually gives Landau a call when she's in Los Angeles.

For Barry Morse, so regrettably deposed after the first season, Landau has nothing but the highest praise. "Barry is a wonderful man. Kind, gentle, intelligent. He was born in the East End of London, which means he spoke like a Cockney when he was growing up. He worked like hell to get rid of that heavy dialect. He has since become a Canadian citizen. The English think he's English, Canadians think he's Canadian and, yes, Americans who know him from The Fugitive think he's one of us. Amazing, considering his handicap in having a thick, guttural Cockney accent as a kid. Barry's brother, a London law enforcement officer, visited the set one day. I chatted with him and could barely understand him, as his accent was so thick. It allowed me to understand what Barry had overcome. Mind you, he can still do a great Cockney character should he have reason to. Barry Morse is one of the sweetest, gentlest souls in the world ... and one hell of an actor!" Landau adds that he was quite close to Tony Anholt during filming but has not seen him for 15 years. "I liked Tony a lot. Same with Prentis Hancock. I haven't seen him in years. Barry Morse was here in Hollywood a few years ago at a Space: 1999 convention. We saw each other, hugged, laughed, and chatted for a few hours."

Landau says that the United States is the only country in the world where Space: 1999 did not go network. The show has proven to be more popular overseas than in the United States. Director Ray Austin recalls his days with Space: 1999 quite fondly: "I was very proud of my work on Space: 1999. It was a fun show to do at a fun studio. It's my favorite studio in the world," says Austin of Pinewood Studios, where the show was filmed. Austin (who has most recently spent his time with Family Channel's Zorro and the syndicated series Highlander-The Series) felt that the show's innovation was the attempt to attract a prime-time American audience. Although The Avengers, another British show on which Austin worked extensively, at one point reached a worldwide audience of about 100 countries, the episodes were always aired late at night. Space: 1999 was specifically for prime-time audiences.

Austin found Gerry Anderson to be a very professional and experienced producer. "He worked very hard to get Space: 1999 made in England, because when he first showed it, they wanted to make it in America. They knew more about science fiction and wanted to go for it over there like they had with Star Trek. [Anderson] was very knowledgeable on the subject, and he's a very good storyteller. Then, we had an American scripter, Fred Freiberger-he was a genius with scripts."

Austin says he thinks he was the first to develop an innovative technique for filming spacesuited astronauts walking on the sands of the moon. "We would shoot that in high speed, at 72 frames per second, and we did it two, three or four times to get it right," says Austin. Shooting at high speed gave the actors' movements a slow-motion, floating quality when the film was shown at normal speed. The purpose was to simulate the lower gravity on the moon. No wire work was ever involved. Even with actors jumping up and down in those bulky, plastic suits, the high speed was successful in getting the illusion across.

"It really looked very good," says Austin, "although they looked ridiculous running across the soundstage bouncing up in the air. It was very peculiar until you realized how it would work." Austin remembers that the spacesuits were very hot and uncomfortable for the actors, with no ventilation. "Everybody suffered from the heat, every day, even in the winter, in those things," he chuckles. "They had to take the helmet off or turn the flap up whenever they had the chance. A take on film would be about two or three minutes; then they'd lift it up and they could breathe again. They could still breathe, but it was just very uncomfortable."

For Austin, the most memorable shoot on Space: 1999 was the episode "Collision Course," with guest star Margaret Leighton. "Margaret's a friend of mine. She knew she was dying. I shot, I think, 15 pages in two days with her, which was unheard of. 'You'd better get [this shot], because I'm not going to last long...,' she said near the end of shooting. Sure enough, we did, and she died a few days later. She was very good. She sat on the throne all the time. She couldn't move, so we had to put her on a wheelchair."

Martin Landau echoes Austin's fondness for Leighton. "Margaret was an exceptionally talented actress, having been one of Laurence Olivier's leading ladies when quite young in several Shakespearean productions," he recalls. However, Landau disagrees with Ray Austin's memory, saying that Leighton did not die "a few days later" but eight or nine months after working with him. "Her husband, Michael Wilding, who at one time had been married to Elizabeth Taylor, died a year or so after Maggie did. I visited them in the countryside outside of London one time after she'd guested on the show. Michael was very grateful that I'd looked after her on the set and run the lines with her, as she found all the science fiction jargon a bit difficult to learn, insisting that it was just a lot of gobblede-gook and ... that she hadn't a clue as to what it was she was saying. I liked her a lot. She was a real trouper, especially in her condition." Asked to distinguish between the two seasons of the show, since he directed seven of the first season and two of the second, Austin says, "I liked the first season better. I thought the stories were more identifiable, and you could do more things with them."

Aside from state-of-the-art British special effects, to add futuristic flavor and interesting visuals, costumes were specially created by a top-ranking designer, Rudi Gernreich (now deceased), with a unisex concept. "The sleeve allowed one to recognize in what department any Moonbase Alpha inhabitant worked," says Landau. "Barbara's sleeve was white (medical); Main Mission workers, red; pilots, yellow; and so on. Mine was a charcoal grey, with a grey raised collar, as commander and chief officer, the only one of its kind on the base. The costumes were changed the second year, and modified slightly, for economic reasons and expediency."

During the second year, says Landau, more colorful outerwear was introduced to give the show a greater variety of color. Someone at ITC's New York office, Landau remembers, thought the show looked too drab in its overall beige color scheme in the first season. Landau regretted the changes. "I loved the original look from an artistic and production design point of view. I felt it unique and original, and unlike anything else on the air, in the best artistic sense, but that was another battle I lost."

Austin notes that the show's budget was allocated very liberally on art and set decoration. "Everything was built on platforms so all the parts could be movable," he says. "And the ship was movable, so you could dismantle the ship entirely to new clampings and new sections." The wild walls and pieces came in very handy when the story asked for multiple Eagle ships. Mixing and matching different pieces of the same set gave an illusion of many space vehicles. "It was ... quite a revolution for the stage," says Austin, who, as a director, probably appreciated the flexibility for camera angles. The only drawback was that the angles on the Eagles were usually from one side only. "A lot of visitors in the industry used to come to see those sets."

The cancellation of Space: 1999 was not a result of the usual ratings game, as the show was syndicated in the U.S. "Lord Lew Grade, producer and head of ITC Entertainment, had ventured into feature films," explains Martin Landau. Having produced some highly budgeted features like Raise the Titanic! (1980), "he found himself with cash flow problems. He needed to advertise and market these big theatrical ventures, and his ad budget, it seems, was about the same amount that was needed to produce another season of Space: 1999, and even though all parties involved [agreed that] another season would enhance the value of the show in syndication and other areas as a 72-hour package ... the plug was pulled on our show so he could effectively merchandise the features." And Landau sighs that after the show was out of production, "all the features were disastrous. All failed dismally at the box office. That period in ITC's history was a blemish. As a result of all this, Grade was deposed as head of the company (ATV and ITC) and new people took charge." Space: 1999, says Landau, "might have gone for at least another season," had ITC's money held out and had "these shenanigans not gone on."

Preparations are well advanced for the most important space journey in the history of man: a probe into deep space to explore the rogue planet Meta which has broken away from a distant galaxy and is now closer to Earth's solar system. Already, identifiable signals have come from the planet, indicating a high form of life.

John Koenig is commander of the mission to be launched from Earth's Space Research Centre at Moonbase Alpha. He has just returned to the moon to oversee the momentous adventure, but the probe is already in jeopardy. Two of the deep space astronauts have been stricken with a mystery illness that has already claimed nine lives. All but the astronauts have been working at the Nuclear Disposal Area Two on the dark side of the moon to which nuclear waste from Earth has been consigned.

Dr. Helena Russell is convinced that radiation has caused the terrible brain damage to the victims but there is no evidence to support her theories. There is no trace of a leakage either from the deeply buried old containers at Disposal Area One or at the new area. Koenig is sure Helena is misdiagnosing and scientist Professor Bergman confirms that there is no radiation. Koenig checks for himself and sees that everything appears to be normal - except for intense heat in Koenig's inspection craft. The two ill astronauts die though why is unclear. New facts emerge when their flight recorder tapes are examined and show that everything went black for two minutes while flying over the Disposal Areas, which leads to the discovery that the disused Disposal Area waste had been subject to a magnetic subsurface firestorm. It seems that the same thing may be happening to Disposal Area Two. It is the increased magnetic output that has caused the deaths, and there is immediate disaster when efforts are made to check on Area Two. A blinding nuclear explosion rocks the moon. Gravity control is affected. The moon - with Moonbase Alpha - is pulled out of orbit, moving inexorably away from Earth. Koenig has to decide whether or not to abandon and makes his grim decision. Their only hope is to remain where they are. To abort would be certain suicide. By now, the moon is speeding even more rapidly away from Earth. And on Earth, the gravity disruption is causing devastation. At Moonbase Alpha, the unmistakable sound of Meta signals comes in, now quite loud and clear.

SPADLA Z OBLAKOVAKA: SHE CAME OUT OF THE BLUE SKY

A group of children on the holidays encounter the alien. The extraterrestrial explorer flies, talks funny and is visibly not from this planet. But, actually, she looks like a little girl.

Original music by Harry Macourek, Cinematography by Karel Kopecky, Art Direction by Zdenek Rozkopal. The series was first shown in Norway on the 3rd May 1981. The story is about a group of children in the town Cabovce who found a cute alien girl from the planet Gurun. Her name is Maika (Majka). She can fly, walk on water, duplicate anything. Her main source of power is from a cell in her belt. They shared many adventures together and became the best of friends. The series contain 13 episodes. I believe it is based on a book Spadla Z Nebe (1967), but cannot confirm this. The series was so popular in Viet Nam during the 80's that it sparked a hair style craze similar to Maika. This series is impossible to find nowadays, but if you are looking for it like I am, here are some translations of the title: "Spadla z oblakov", "Maika - Co Be Tu Tren Troi Roi Xuong", "Prilyucheniya v kanikuly", "She Came Out of the Blue Sky", "Majka - jenta fre verdsrommet".

SPECIAL UNIT 2

A series of kidnappings plague the Windy City and it's unsettling and frustrating to the police force, especially to a one Kate Benson. An officer who sees below the surface for what they are, something her fellow officers do not understand. It has been a quality she has had her whole life. Acting on a hunch, she stakes out a building where she expects the next kidnapping will happen. Her hunch pays off, but she gets more than she bargains for when she realizes the people behind the kidnappings are not really people at all, but Gargoyles. Kate Benson tries to save the little girl but is unsuccessful as the Gargoyles take her. The she has to face her superiors and tell them what happened.

Someone else was there and that mysterious man saved her life, yet, they still lost the girl to the gargoyles. After speaking to her superiors who think she has lost her mind, Kate Benson the mysterious man approaches her once again. This man takes her to Special Unit 2, a secret undercover division of the Chicago Police Department. Special Unit 2's mission is to take out monsters and protect the world from the truth. Immediately assigned to the case of the kidnappings, Kate and Nick O'Malley must team up and find out where the Gargoyles are hiding the kidnap victims before it is too late. The Gargoyles have their eggs that are about to hatch as they are near the end of their 17-year incubation period and will be very hungry.

Special Unit 2 at first seems like it might be a plain old rip-off show with just smart-ass characters and big ass guns and cheesy monsters. That is a huge misconception on what this show is all about and is. Special Unit 2 is actually a refreshing and unique show that UPN should be proud of. The monsters are designed by the mad genius in Patrick Tatopoulos. They are simply beautiful yet wicked looking at the same time. The show has the uncanny ability to show off clever dialogue and strong writing with strong characters. Nick O'Malley may seem like the typical badass good guy, when he is that but so much more. In the first episode he makes it pretty clear he doesn't care about anyone other than himself. He dispels that formulaic theme in no time when he shows he is supporting the family of his deceased partner from 2 years prior. He does care, he just keeps it inside to protect himself from the everyday pain he endures to kill the monsters that killed his partner.

So we care about him as much as we cheer on his wicked skills as a monster killer and wicked one-liners. Kate Benson is another character we care about as well, who has the ability to see past things normal don't do. She grew up being looked down upon for her ability to look past the obvious and what lurks beneath the surface and that's how she finds herself in Special Unit 2. She is a true good cop but quickly learns being by the book won't solve cases all the time. She still has her convictions and morals whose driving force is not loss but for what she wants to discover and learn. The cast of this show clearly has the best chemistry I've seen on a show in recent memory.

They all play off of each other with such ease it's a sight to behold. The special effects are brilliant and so are the production values and art direction. Special Unit 2 works on many different levels from the acting to the creature effects. There is more to Special Unit 2 than just an elite monster fighting team concept. It has a heart and special magic that makes it work that I haven't seen on many shows in recent memory. Stargate SG-1 and First Wave have that, not many others do. Special Unit 2 is worth a chance to see Alexandra Lee, Michael Landes, Richard Gant, and Danny Woodburn show their talents. This is a kick ass show with a heart that is also very beautiful and haunting at the same time. There are strong artistic values to this show that make it that much better than other shows in this genre. Special Unit 2 is worth a look and some of your videotape!

SPECTREMAN

AKA: UCHU ENJIN GOLLY

AKA: GOLLY THE SPACE MONKEY

AKA: SPACE MONKEY GOLLY VS SPECTREMAN

AKA: SUPEKUTORUMAN

Genious scientist monkey Golly (Toya, voiced by Kobayashi and Nishiyama) escapes from Planet E after a failed coup. As he and his subordinate Rah (Uenishi) wander the cosmos, they discover the beautiful planet Earth and are incensed to see the environmental damage caused by its stupid inhabitants. Consequently, Golly punishes humanity by creating a number of ULTRAMAN-themed monsters out of pollution itself. However, Golly's plot is discovered by the inhabitants of Planet Nevilla 71, who have sworn to protect unsophisticated worlds from abuse at the hands of advanced civilizations.

They send Spectreman to defend the planet. . . Leading to a somewhat embarrassing change in emphases in the series title.

Thought the series began with the title Space Monkey Golly, viewer response and plain common sense dictated that the title really ought to include the name of the giant cyborg who was fighting to save the Earth every week. From episode 21, it became known as Space Monkey Golly Vs Spectreman, and from episode 40 onward, just plain Spectreman.

However, by this point, the serials original pollution-inspired plotting was replaced by standard monsters of the week, and it never attained the heights of its early to middle period. Based on an idea by LIONMARU creator Soji Ushio, and featuring a number of well known anime scriptwriters on the staff, the series was also spun off into a manga by Daiji Ichimine and was released in Boken O and Shonen Champion magazine. The mind boggles at what might have happened if all superheroes began their adventures in such a strange way - would we all still be reading Lex Luthor comics?

The show made it to the US in video form across 12 tapes, in a dubbed format that retained much of the original plotting. Some characters and situations first appeared in a failed pilot under the title Elementman, in which the lead was played by Koji Uenishi. The series was produced by Tomio Washizu and Takahuru Bessho.

P-Productions is known for their novel concepts and good special fx (!), and this is their unique television movie that started the 2nd monster boom. It is based on an original concept of an invasion of Earth created by Sagisu Tomio , who was a creator of Japanese comics as well as the president of P-Productions. The stars were the "Villainous Space Apemen", which imitated the styles of the 1960's American social judgmental/critic(?) Sci-Fi as well as classic Japanese Monster Sci-Fi. The environmental monster route was later changed, and it is felt that the show became more like a generic superhero show.

SPEILBAN

AKA: DIMENSIONAL WARRIOR SPIELBAN

AKA: JIKUU SENSHI SUPIRUBAN

AKA: JUKU SENSHI SPIELBAN

The Wahrer Empire, always in search of water to sustain the life of its deity Wahrer, destroyed the planet Clin. Two Clin children, Spielban and Diana, escaped to Earth aboard the Super Dimensional Battle Mothership Gran Nazca. Having grown up during the long journey, the two don High Tech Crystal Suits as Spielban and Diana Lady to defeat the Wahrers, who have come to Earth in search of more water. Spielban must avenge his dead mother Anna and homeworld and find his missing father Ben and older sister Helen, captives of Wahrer.

The Wahrer Empire transformed Ben and Helen into Doctor Bio and Hellvira. Later in the series, Hellvira switched sides to become Helen once again, donning a High Tech Crystal Suit to become Helen Lady. In the end, the deity Wahrer turned out to be a sham; 'he' had been 'his' shaman Queen Pandora all along. Ben reverted to normal, but was killed by Pandora. Spielban slew Pandora. The explosion of the Wahrer castle Gamedeath caused a timeslip.

Spielban, Helen, and Diana awoke on the surface planet Clin, which existed once again. Having defeated the Wahrer Empire in the past (our present), planet Clin existed once again in the future. Clin was actually Earth 10,000 years in the future. Now that the Wahrer Empire no longer existed, Spielban, Helen, and Diana were able to reunite with their parents, alive again on the restored world of Clin. (No, this ending didn't make sense to me or the Japanese fans either. I find it hard to believe that live-action master scribe Uehara Shouzou, whose work consists of the best Tsuburaya and Toei episodes of the 60s through 80s, wrote this.)

Alternative Plot:

In desperate need of water, the Warler Empire decides to invade Earth, kidnapping Helen (Morinaga), the sister of the heroic Yosuke (Wateri). Yosuke resists, in the company of his group combat-trousered female associates (the supporting cast having mothballed miniskirts of pervious Hero series outings). Space queen Pandora (Soga. Compare to her later role as Bandora in MIGHTY MORPHIN POWER RANGERS) sends a variety of bizarre monsters to defeat Earth's defenders, including the Megafreezer, the Doorbeller, the Blender, and the car mirror (miira being Japanese for mummy). With sci-fi siblings in vogue after Return of the Jedi (1983), Yosuke must rescue his sister from Warler's clutches, then join forces with her to save the world.

Coming after JUSPION in the metal series Chronology, Speilban reunited several cast members and stunt players from earlier shows, including Waterai from SHALIBAN, Morinaga fom SHIDER, and Soga from DENZIMAN. It also unexpectedly made it to the west during the 1990s boom in Japanese action shows - as with fellow series such as BETTLEBORGS and SUPER HUMAN SAMURAI SYBER SQUAD, Speilban was drastically rewritten. Theme: Ichiro Mizugi - "Jiku Senshi Speilban", with music by the series composer Michiaki Watanabe.

This show is the basis for J.B. and Kaitlin's footage in the American SF show VR TROOPERS.

Characters and mecha

Spielban/Jou Yousuke

Took the name Jou Yousuke on Earth. Rides in a Mitsubishi 4x4, patrolling for Wahrer activity.

Communicates with Diana via the Super Crystal Ceiver headset. His arsenal:

High Tech Crystal Suit (worn by JB in VR Troopers) □ When Spielban shouts, 'Kesshou!' (Crystalize!), the Gra Nazca showers Clin Metal Super Corpuscles upon him, which crystallize to form the silver and red Suit around his body in 10 microseconds. The Suit comes with the self-explanatory Twin Blade, with which he performs the Arc Impulse technique, either on or off the Hovarian. He also has the Laser Sniper handgun, the Search Analyzer built into his visor, and the Hyperslip ability, which teleports him and any opponents in the vicinity to locations where less property and fewer people will be endangered ('Vortex Command' in VR Troopers). He can recharge by touching Diana Lady's hand.

Hovarian

Spielban's red and white motorcycle, a 'Super Dimensional Machine' that in real life used to be a Suzuki 'future motorcycle' for show. Has wings with rotors which bend outwards for hovering.

Gaios

Spielban's white and black tank. Its top left side breaks off to form the X-winged Jet Gaios, while the remainder, the Drill Gaios, splits open to reveal a drill. Often in combat against the Skulldon, General Deathzero's (General Ivar's in VR Troopers) tank.

Gran Nazca (VR Skybase)

Spielban and Diana's flying fortress and home for most of their lives. Transforms into the humanoid Command Formation (VR Troopertron) or the Cannon Formation (a gigantic gun 'fired' by an enormous hologram of Spielban).

Diana

Spielban's partner. The first female Metal Hero, in her High Tech Crystal Suit guise as Diana Lady (VR Troopers' Kaitlin I). Like Spielban, must shout 'Kesshou!' to don the Suit. Armed with the Lady Sniper. Communicates with Spielban via the Super Crystal Phone.

Helen

Spielban's older sister. Captured by the Wahrer Empire, she lost her memory and served it as Hellvira in red armor (Red Python in VR Troopers). Later, she broke free of the Wahrer Empire and gained the ability to 'kesshou' into Helen Lady (VR Troopers' Kaitlin II) after receiving training from Teacher. (Although VR Troopers has Kaitlin splitting into two, Diana and Helen are entirely separate characters in Spielban who just happen to wear the same model of High Tech Crystal Suit. I wish that they wore slightly different suits--a minor difference in paint job might have been enough--but oh well...) Armed with the Helen Cutter double scythe, which is all that differentiates her from the gun-toting Diana Lady.

Doctor Ben

Spielban and Helen's father. Because of his great skills in biology, was captured with Helen 14 years ago by the Wahrer Empire. Served Wahrer as Doctor Bio before reverting to normal and dying, only to live again in the alternate future timeline in which the Wahrer Empire never existed.

Anna (a brunette gaijin)

Spielban and Helen's mother. Chose Spielban and Diana to survive by escaping in the Gran Nazca shortly before the destruction of the Clin mothership. Died, but was restored to life in the alternate future timeline in which the Wahrer Empire never existed.

Marin (a blonde gaijin)

Diana's mother. Died when the Clin detonated their own mothership, but restored to life in the alternate future timeline in which the Wahrer Empire never existed.

Space Swordsman Teacher (14, 33)

A hologram generated by the Gran Nazca's computers to train Spielban in swordsmanship.

Koyama Daigorou

Owner of the invention shop 'Edison.' Claims to be a genius. Comes up with various gadgets that don't quite work out.

Koyama Miwa

Daigorou's younger sister. Helps out at Edison, but is sick of his inventions that don't sell.

The Wahrer Empire

An empire that searches for water throughout the universe to sustain the life of its (nonexistent) deity, Wahrer.

Queen Pandora

Supposedly receiving orders from the deity Wahrer, she in turn orders the heads of her three armies. Actually, she and Wahrer are one and the same. Has not yet appeared on VR Troopers, probably to avoid confusion with Rita. In the finale (43, 44) transformed into the Pandora Battle Machine (Wo)man, the starfish-like Pandora Lifeform, and the Pandora Life Machine (Wo)man, a composite of the previous two incarnations. With so many incarnations, Spielban didn't find her easy to defeat. Never appeared in VR Troopers; if she did, she'd be mixed up with Rita.

Emperor Guillotine (24-)

Descendant of Wahrer (and logically Pandora). Summoned from the 23th century to help Pandora in the present. Resembles a refugee from Hokuto no Ken or Mad Max with his studded black leather outfit. Thinks of his subordinates as disposable, but is loyal to his Queen. Fell into a dimensional rift and returned as a ghost, only to be defeated again by Spielban. Has never appeared on VR Troopers.

General Deathzero (VR Troopers' General Ivar)

Leader of Wahrer's Mechanical Army. Wears black armor. An android programmed with a knowledge of all tactics. Can transform into the Deathzero Torpedo, a black-headed missile that launched from a catapult (24, 42).

Skulldon

General Deathzero's black tank. Splits into the Skulldon Jet (top half) and the Skulldon Cutter (bottom half), a tank armed with a buzzsaw. Accompanied by numerous lesser black tanks (without names?).

Battle Machine Men

40. Kumason
41. Moveman
42. Blizzer
43. Pandora Battle Machine (Wo)man (not Deathzero's either)

Doctor Bio (VR Troopers' General Icebot)

Formerly Spielban's father Doctor Ben. Wears white armor. Leader of Wahrer's Bio Army. Creates Biohumans and Battle Lifeforms with Lifeform Modification Surgery. At one point ended up as a monster, Bioroid Bio.

Hellvira (VR Troopers' Red Python)

Formerly Spielban's sister Helen. Obeys Wahrer's commands. Wears red armor. Can break her body down into atoms to pass through walls. Armed with a dagger that fires light waves. Later cured, becoming Helen Lady.

Bio Lifeforms

Doctor Bio's monsters of the every-once-in-a-long-while.

6. Guja (appears in Quest for Power Part 1)

13. Wataja

15. Umija (VRT: Octobot)

Ricki (1-36)

Leader of Wahrer's all-female Spy Army. Assisted by Shadow and Gasher (both 1-25). Never appeared in VR Troopers.

Youki (35-39; VRT: ?)

A new Wahrer officer, created from evil hearts of men. Pale, long haired, and horned. Gathered key members of society and brainwashed them into joining his secret society, 'Mumumu.' Can appear and disappear at will. The latest in that line of gender-bending villains represented by Berg Katze and Poe of Shaider. Rebelled against Wahrer by reating the Youki Battle Machine Man out of scrap aboard Gamedeath. Sucked up along with his creation by the New Battle Machine Man Vacuumer. Has appeared in VR Troopers as a woman (!).

Kinclons (pun on kin 'gold' and 'clone'; VR Troopers' original Skugs) □ Wahrer's mass-produced Battle Machir Soldiers, garbed in black tights with gold stripes, smiling gold masks with red eye slits, and black and gold capes. (Skugs with thick gold stripes are from American-made footage; those with thin stripes are from Spielban.)

Gamedeath (a pun on kame 'tortoise' and 'death')

The Wahrer Empire's mobile fortress. Resembles a giant winged tortoise of silver metal. Carries Skulljaws battleships, silver craft that resemble giant sharks. Has never appeared on VR Troopers.

Trivia

Hiroshi Watari also played Den Iga (Sharivan) in Space Sherrif Sharivan.

Naomi Morinaga, prior to Spielban, starred in Space Sheriff Shaider as Annie. Coincidentally, both Spielban and Shaider would be adapted in the series, VR Troopers.

In Brazil this series was named Jaspion 2, after the success of Juspion (Jaspion in the dub). However, the main hero was always called Spielvan in the dub.

Spielban's name is a tribute to director Steven Spielberg.

SPELLBINDER

A boy discovers another dimension which is controlled by the Spellbinder, who keep the rest of the population in abject poverty. Paul Reynolds, a smart 14 year old city boy who finds himself transported into the parallel worlds of the spellbinders. He was transported via an accident which occurred while he was at a school camp. Everyone thinks that he has run off. Except for his best friend Alex and Katrina, a girl from his school who he and Alex were often at odds with. The spellbinders world is unlike our own the people living their lives in condition like we had in the middle ages. They are ruled over by the spellbinders, an upper class of wizards.

Paul quickly realises that the spellbinder do not use magic, but rather technology which they themselves do not totally understand. In the Spellbinder world Paul is befriended by Riana, a teenage girl who has never questioned the status quo and at first thinks that Paul is either an evil marauder or else just a bit nutty. Paul realises what has happened to him and with Riana's aid sets out to find some way to return home. Along the way he makes a few enemies in the form of Ashka, a spellbinder who learns that Paul is from another world, and that his knowledge of such things as gunpowder could help her in her quest for power.

Ashka's apprentice is Gryvon, a youth from Riana's village who hopes to become a spellbinder someday and it only to happy to do Ashka's bidding. Paul does eventually make friend with one of the senior spellbinders. Correon, a middle aged man who is eventually thrown from power by Ashka. Back home, Alex and Katrina also figure out what has happened to Paul and in the process become friends themselves. Unable to convince anybody else that Paul has been hurtled into an alternative reality, they find themselves getting into trouble in their efforts to bring Paul home. Paul does eventually manage to return home, however Riana is brought back with him. Riana soon manages to get separated from Paul and finds herself lost in a world which she does not understand. Paul meanwhile is unable to convince anyone what really happened to him while he was away. When he and Riana do manage to be reunited he sets out to return her home and get proof of his story, and in the process manages to allow Ashka to enter our world.

Spellbinder was an Australian/Poland co-production. There series was shown on the Disney channel in the US and The Children's Channel and Channel 4 in the UK. The show started airing in the US on the 4th February 1996.

Spellbinder is a fantasy adventure series about a suburban teenager, Paul Reynolds, who finds himself accidentally marooned in a world parallel to his own. It's a world where the industrial revolution never happened and people live in rustic villages. They are ruled by the Spellbinders, men and women with seemingly magical powers who control the populace by manipulating their fear and ignorance.

For Paul, the dangers are immediate. He is recognised as an outsider and accused of being an enemy of the Spellbinders. Paul is saved by a courageous girl, Riana, who gives him refuge in her village.

When Paul discovers that the Spellbinders use science and not magic, he realises that they are his only hope of getting home. But Ashka, a ruthless Spellbinder, wants to use his knowledge to gain control of her world.

Paul befriends Correon, an old Spellbinder, who understands the threat that Paul's knowledge presents. Using Riana's physical skill and Paul's modern know-how, the three outwit Ashka and Paul finds his way home. In order to save Riana's life, Paul has to drag her into his world. Now Riana, who grew up in a closed rustic community, must contend with the chaos and complexity of our modern world. Her confrontations with technology are both amusing and frightening.

To make matters worse, the Spellbinder Ashka finds a way into our world. She tricks Paul's father into helping her combine Spellbinder technology with our science to make her invincible. The challenge of defeating Ashka requires all of Paul and Riana's courage and ingenuity.

Spellbinder is a thrilling mix of adventure, fantasy and fun. While the narrative is action driven, the focus is on Riana sets Paul up in her village and explains that things must be done according to the Spellbinders' instructions. Paul is skeptical about their powers and soon realises they are using science to appear powerful. He tries to explain to the local Spellbinder, Gryvon; he is from another world and shows him his talent for making fireworks, which saves the village from ravaging marauders. Still Gryvon takes him away to be judged.

1 - 5 SECRETS

Paul is brought before the Spellbinder's Council of Regents, found guilty of stealing an Eyestone, and banished to the wastelands. One Spellbinder, Ashka, is sympathetic to Paul's story and tries to convince the Council of his innocence. As a result, Paul is put into a cell. Riana is making her way to the Spellbinder castle with Paul's videotape, hoping this will convince them that he is from another world. While he is off exploring, a teenage girl called Kathy discovers the boat and starts it up. Luckily, Mec jumps in to the boat just in time and they land safely in another world. At first Kathy thinks Mec is crazy and runs away from him, but after she gives him a chance to explain himself she believes him. In this new world Kathy and Mec meet Ashka, the villain from the last series of Spellbinder who is in a prison camp. She acts friendly to the two and convinces them to take her with them when they leave the world. They do as she asks, since they are also prisoners, and she takes a power suit with her. This suit works with electro-magnetism, and can be used as a weapon to electrocute people.

In a rush to escape the a Spellbinder flying ship, Mec takes Kathy and Ashka back to his own world. This world is ruled by a spoilt ten-year-old named Sun. With the help of a super-computer called the Oracle, he controls the land as the Dragonlord. Ashka continues to act friendly towards Kathy and Mec, but ends up leaving Sun stranded in our world. This makes his older sister Aya as the Dragon Lord. While Aya is grieving the so-called loss of her brother, Ashka creates a plan that works and she ends up stealing a very valuable part of the Oracle that makes it work that is made out of a precious stone.

Plot #2

Imagine a world where people are immortal or where machines have waged war against humans or where the computer was invented 400 years ago. These are called parallel worlds and are the backdrop for The Land of the Dragon Lord, a 26 episode fantasy/adventure series for children, filmed in the contrasting landscapes of Australia, Poland and China.

Kathy Morgan, a headstrong and imaginative 14 year old girl, is on a camping trip with her parents and 16 year old brother Josh. Bored with her holiday, Kathy gets more excitement than she could have hoped for when she finds a strange bamboo boat. The boat belongs to Mek, a scientist from the land of the Dragon Lord, who has discovered a way of travelling between parallel worlds.

Kathy meddles with the controls of the strange craft, transporting herself and Mek to the world of the Spellbinders. Here they meet Ashka, the ruthless and power-hungry villain from Spellbinder I, who tricks them into helping her escape from prison.

Mek takes Kathy and Ashka to the Land of the Dragon Lord - a world of culture, romance and illusion. They are summoned to appear before the Dragon Lord and Kathy is surprised to find that this mystical being is a petulant 12 year old boy, Sun, whose magical powers are generated by a vast and ancient computer. Sun takes a liking to Kathy and refuses to let her go home.

Unbeknown to Kathy, her family must find their way into the Land of the Dragon Lord. They must use their wits and courage to survive in this strange world while they search for their missing daughter.

Ashka attempts to take control of the land but Kathy thwarts her plan. Ashka steals the interface which controls the computer and the land of the Dragon Lord, at peace for 400 years, is plunged into chaos. Kathy and Josh are forced to pursue Ashka through a series of dangerous and frightening parallel worlds in a race against time to rescue her family and save the Land of the Dragon Lord.

As Kathy and Josh struggle to survive, they learn to confront their difficulties with courage, imagination and responsibility. They discover that everyone can achieve remarkable things when circumstances demand it.

Following the successful and internationally acclaimed Spellbinder TV series, winner of the 1996 Australian Film Institute Award for best children's drama comes Spellbinder II: The Land of the Dragon Lord. The 26 episode children's fantasy adventure series, a Film Australia co-production with Polish Television, Shanghai Film Studios and the Nine Network Australia with assistance from the Australian Film Finance Corporation premiered on Australia's Nine Network on September 1, 1997.

Filming commenced in June 1996 with a seven week shoot in Poland, followed by 13 weeks in China and seven in Australia. The series has been presold to Australia's Nine Network, Polish Television, CCTV China and the United Kingdom.

Spellbinder II The Land of the Dragon Lord tells the story of a brother and sister lost within parallel worlds. The first, which resembles ancient China, is a world of illusion, romance and danger ruled by a Dragon Lord with extraordinary powers bestowed by an ancient computer. When a villainous Spellbinder from another parallel world arrives, a thrilling adventure ensues which crosses the boundaries of many worlds as the children race against time to rescue their family and save The Land of the Dragon Lord.

Children's drama has been an ideal starting point for Film Australia's first co-production with China. The partnership between Film Australia and the Shanghai Film Studios has given this Australian production a very broad international appeal. The Land of the Dragon Lord will be screened to a potential audience of almost 200 million Chinese Children, along with other youngsters all around the world. With its European component, The Land of the Dragon Lord is an international production of outstanding creativity with a unique place in Australian film and television history.

This SF show is the sequel to SPELLBINDER, and is also produced by a Chinese and Polish TV company.

Similarities between the two series

It is a teenager who discovers the existence of a parallel world (Paul in series 1, Kathy in series 2).

The existence of parallel worlds is discovered by accident (Paul pulls a prank at camp, Kathy heads down to the lake upset).

Someone else witnesses that person step into another world (Alex/Katrina Series 1, Josh series 2) and usually parents/teachers don't believe them.

The protagonist is usually mistaken for a barbarian of some sort based on their looks (Paul as a Marauder in the Spellbinder world, Kathy as a friend of the barbarian in the Dragon Lord world).

Ashka is present in both series and tries to cause chaos and overthrow the land. A sidekick is present in both series (Gryvon series 1 and for Episode 2 of Series 2, and Sharak in Series 2) and Ashka makes frequent use of a power suit.

The protagonist befriends someone from the world who believes that they are innocent and are from another world, who also helps them in some way. (Riana in Series 1, Mek/Aya in Series 2) Both the protagonists are from Sydney.

As with the first Spellbinder series, a technologically sophisticated elite exploit a group of ignorant peasants, and the protagonist tries to show people why this is wrong.

There are trips back and forth between Australia and the parallel world (or worlds). This may be to get supplies or on a rescue mission. (Paul/Riana Series 1, Kathy/Sun/Josh Series 2)

Technology is brought from Australia into the parallel world and seems somewhat frightening at first to the people until the protagonist explains it (Airhorn, video camera and walkman Series 1, ghettblaster, laptop, camera and jeep Series 2.)

A strange food is involved, either brought from Australia to the other world, or is eaten in the other world (Dried roots and eels? Series 1 seems strange to Paul, while chocolate seems strange to Sun)

The protagonist will also befriend someone in a place of power, who will often help and protect them. (Paul befriends Correon in Series 1, while Kathy befriends Sun and Aya in Series 2)

There is a romantic interest, or implied interest, between usually the protagonist and a supporting character (Paul and Katrina series 1, Kathy and Tony series 2)

Ashka winds up in the protagonist's world by force and is unfamiliar with the strange world. She often gets into trouble in some shape or form and often the protagonist ends up sending her back. (Ashka makes a new power suit, which is wrecked by a crane in Series 1, she is drugged and has the interface and jewels stolen in Series 2-both times, Paul/Kathy have brought her back.)

The power balance ends up weakening slightly and people end up making their own decisions/sharing knowledge.

Kathy Morgan

15 years old, Kathy is slightly spoilt and vain and is reluctant to go camping. Swooning over Tony Lazzi, their neighbour and star on a soap, Kathy accidentally ends up in the Land of The Dragon Lord after playing around with Mek's boat. A little bit upset at first, Kathy soon adjusts to her new life, but begins to resent Sun after he tells her to stay forever. She helps Ashka escape from the Spellbinder land, but after that will swing loyalty with her, sometimes helping her, sometimes not helping her. Beyond that, Kathy is almost like a female version of Paul, but she does not have the scientific knowledge or military skills that Paul does. Most of her planning is often co-worked with her family or with Mek. She is the only person besides Mek to see six worlds, including her own: Australia, Australia 2 (Kathy-2), Land Of The Dragon Lord, the Immortal World, the Spellbinder world and the Land Of The Moloch.

Josh Morgan

16 years old, he is Kathy's jock brother. While he and Kathy treat each other like brother and sisters normally do, they fight. He cares very much for his sister and is the only person to actually see Kathy disappear. When he and his family end up in the Land Of The Dragon Lord, Josh gets separated from them early and befriends Jasmine, an entertainer. He falls for her and the two share a brief kiss in the series. Beyond that, Josh is more like Paul in that he plays a sport and has some military skills. He can also create a good lie on the spot.

Carl Morgan

The Kathy and Josh's father, Carl is an ex-pro footballer who injured his knee and now owns a shop called Crazy Carls Sporting and Army Surplus Store. He doesn't believe Josh at first and when he drives into the Land Of The Dragon Lord, tries to get help from Sharak, without realising his true intent. He is eventually reunited with his kids and wife and becomes like a surrogate father to Sun, Aya and Jasmine. Mostly driving, he teaches Sharak how to drive, drives the "monster" (when they're trying to bluff their way out of a situation with Sharak) and handles the driving in and out of the Dragon Lord world. He cares very much for his wife and kids and has some basic military skills, like tactics and being able to use a convincing disguise.

Vicky Morgan

The Kathy and Josh's mother, Vicky is arachnophobic and is a computer consultant. She appears a little more frail compared to Carl, who can survive without food or water a little bit longer. In the Land OF the Dragon Lord, her role is mostly that of supplies and providing diversions for Sun and Aya, but beyond that her role is somewhat minor.

Sun, The Dragon Lord

A spoilt brat at first, Sun is the first Dragon Lord. He is easily bored and relies heavily on the Oracle and his guards to take care of matters. When Ashka meets him, Sun takes an instant dislike to her, while befriendng Kathy, until he makes her his eternal companion. When he is marooned in Kathy's world however, he is lost and confused, not knowing what to do. He soon adjusts, helping Kathy recover the boat and get back, but everyone believes he's dead. This is played throughout the first half of the series and works to Sun's advantage, as he is able to move around successfully without being captured.

Princess Aya

Sun's older sister, Aya was meant to be the Dragon Lord, but she was injured in an accident which killed their parents. Sun was made the Dragon Lord while she recovered. She is very gentle and kind to others, regardless of their status and usually manages to keep Sun under control. She takes a great liking to Kathy when she arrives, then the Morgan family. When Jasmine was made a hide-tanner, Aya was the one who made Jasmine's dream come true. She becomes the Dragon Lord after she believes that Sun is dead. She remains the Dragon Lord from this point onwards.

Scholar Mek

The first person from the Land Of The Dragon Lord that Kathy meets. He is the inventor of the trans-dimensional bamboo boat, which is how Kathy and family end up in the parallel world. His original invention was meant to be musical jewels, but they failed. Working at the scholastery, Mek is a bit like a father figure in a way towards Kathy, helping her adjust to life in the Land Of The Dragon Lord. It is also implied that he has a crush on Aya.

Jasmine

A 15-year-old girl from the village of Fin, Jasmine is somewhat superstitious, believing in Water Spirits and such, even mistaking Josh for a Water Spirit when she first sees him. Her goal in life is to be an entertainer and she uses one of the Water Spirit's three wishes to try and achieve this goal. When the wish fails at first, Jasmine is angry at Josh, but is soon rescued by his family and eventually the wish does manifest, but not in the way that Jasmine or Josh figured out. She has a romantic interest in Josh and kisses him towards the middle of the series. She plays the flute and can sing and dance, this often makes a good distraction.

Sharak

The leader of a group of barbarians, Sharak's people are hungry and want food. Sun refuses and sends out his warrior to defeat them. It works all right, but Sharak doesn't give up. Recruiting Ashka and at one point, Josh, Sharak's army manage to invade the Land Of The Dragon Lord and dismantle the Oracle. Being very superstitious, Sharak enlists in the help of a diviner to make sure that everything is all right according to the stars and to banish ghosts and cleanse items. Sharak makes himself self-appointed Lord and forces Aya to marry him. At the last minute, however, Ashka takes Aya's place and becomes Sharak's bride. Eventually, they end up in the Land Of The Moloch, where they are needed the most.

USA Showings

Spellbinder was first shown in the USA in 1996 on the Disney Channel, along with another Australian science fiction series called "Ocean Girl". However, after 1997 the Disney Channel decided not to get the 2nd season, as well as renewing "Ocean Girl" (which Disney helped finance OG seasons 2 and 3). However, "Spellbinder 2: Land Of The Dragon Lord" was picked up by the FOX Family Channel and the series the shown in late Autumn of 1997. Unfortunately, FOX TV stopped short of showing the entire 2nd season in January, 1998, leaving many USA fans wanting to know what happened next. Although FOX Family Channel had said that they would show all the episodes later on, they never did. A few years later the FOX Family Channel ownership was bought by ABC Capital TV Network, which is owned by Disney Corporation, and is now called ABC Family Channel, and it seems unlikely that USA viewers will ever see the entire "Spellbinder 2".

SPIDER-MAN

AKA: SUPAIDA-MAN

Yamashiro Takuya was a Japanese teenager whose father was a space researcher. His father found a strange object heading toward Earth one day. At the same time, Takuya began hearing strange voices. Takuya's father, sister, and girlfriend went to investigate the object. Takuya eventually went after them...and found that his father had been killed by a strange monster. Takuya was then attacked by a mysterious woman and grey soldiers, and fell into a pit. The woman, seeing him seemingly dead, left him. In the pit, Takuya found Garia, the last survivor of Planet Spider, who had brought the crashed object, a space combat ship known as the Marveller, to Earth to defend the planet from the Iron Cross Group. Takuya eventually fell unconscious, and Garia clipped an odd bracelet onto his wrist. From the bracelet, a needle penetrated Takuya's skin, injecting "Spider Extract" into his body.

Takuya eventually woke, and saw Garia fall and disintegrate...leaving a spider in his place. The spider later taught him of the bracelet's powers, and from then on Takuya defended the world from the Iron Cross Group as Spider-Man. Takuya is played by Toudou Shinji, who also portrayed General Hedrer, one of the two Vader field commanders, in the sentai show Denshi Sentai Denziman. Interestingly enough, he also played Godneros, the main villain, in a Metal Hero semi-adaptation of the show Kikaider. (Note that the main villain of Kikaider, Professor Gill, was played by Andou Mitsuo, who plays Prof. Monster).

By activating his Spider Bracelet, Takuya causes his costume to fly onto him automatically. The Spider Bracelet is Spider-Man's main weapon. From it, he can fire Spider String (generally a rope fired from the bracelet, although in the first episode it was also used for the name of webbing that blocked a doorway) and Spider Nets (nets to trap the enemy in). He can also use it to see through Iron Cross disguises, and call his GP-7 and Marveller. Of course Spider Man can climb walls. He IS Spider Man, ain't he? Spider Man also has a "Spider Kankaku" (Spider Sense), as he does in Marvel's version. The GP-7 is Spider Man's "supercar", launched from the Marveller. The GP-7 is capable of flight, and can fire missiles from its front end. The GP-7 is used by Spider Man to board his mecha, the Marveller. (However, the GP-7 does NOT become the cockpit; the GP-7 merely serves as a boarding mechanism).

Garia was the last survivor of Planet Spider, a world that had been destroyed by the Iron Cross group. He gave the Marveller ship and Spider Bracelet to Takuya. Garia was in human form for a short time, and then his human form "died" and a spider was left. Garia couldn't survive on Earth long, however, and died. Dr. Yamashiro is Takuya's father, a space researcher who went to investigate the Marveller spacecraft. He was killed by the Iron Cross field commander Amazoness and the monster Bokun. Yamashiro Niiko (left) is a sister of Takuya. Hitome Sakuma (right) is Takuya's girlfriend, a photographer. She works for the magazine Weekly Woman (the editor of which is...a bad person. But a cool bad person...) Yamashiro Takuji is a brother of Spider Man. The usual useless "kid" character in the show. He doesn't do all that much (at least in the episodes I've seen), so I won't bother trying to snap him.

Unlike it's Marvel comic origins, the Toei Spider-Man series featured a formula typical to many other Japanese shows. The hero came equipped with supervehicles - the GP-7 car and the Marveller flying fortress, as well as a giant robot that allowed him to take on each monster of the week on equal terms. His true enemies were the evil Professor Monster (Ando) and his assistant Amazoness (Kagawa), a beautiful woman who dons glasses and a business suit so she can become a magazine editor and fight Spider-Man with the power of the poisoned pen.

When such subtle means inevitably failed, the evil duo would fall back on their cannon fodder army of disposable minions. Spider-Man, in the meantime, can fight back with the aid of the Marveller, which can transform into the giant robot Leopardon. A feature-length movie version was also made.

Spider-Man was not the first Japanese adaptation of the Marvel character. In 1970, manga artist Ryoichi

Ikegami had drawn a short lived manga version of the story for Shonen Magazine, but the story was defeated by "cultural differences" between Stan Lee's archaic lone ranger and traditionally group-oriented Japanese children's super-heroes. This later TV version learned from the previous mistakes, dumping much of the original's vigilante plot to create a story more like ULTRAMAN. The "original idea" for the series was credited to both Marvel Comics and "Saburo Yade" - a name which previously occurs on the anime Combattler V.

Considering his incredibly prolific later career, the authors suspect that Yade "Eight Hands", like his Sunrise Studio counterpart Hajime Yodate, is a Toei house pseudonym designed to keep series copyrights under corporate ownership. The same period also saw animated remakes of Marvel's Frankenstein and Dracula comics. Toei planned a follow-up live action adaptation of Marvel's CAPTAIN AMERICA, but the concept was eventually retooled to make BATTLEFEVER J. Music was by Michiaki Watanabe.

The series was produced by Susumu Yoshikawa and Hiroshi Isikawa.

This show was the Japanese version of Spider-Man, a character invented by Marvel Comics. Toei's version was nothing like the Marvel Comic character. The main character (of course) was Japanese, a motocross racer given the powers of Spider-Man through a device that injected Spider Extract into him. He drove a supercar, the GP-7, and also had a flying fortress, the Marveller. He was the first hero to fight a kaijin (the hero using a giant robot) at both giant and human scale every episode. The series was very popular in Japan and had 41 episodes and 1 movie produced.

The success of this show inspired Toei to adapt another Marvel creation, Captain America. The show didn't quite turn out to be a full adaptation, and the final product was the first Super Sentai, Battle Fever J, which was a revival of Toei's "Sentai" series.

Miyauchi, Hiroshi guest stars in episodes 31 and 40, as a Hayakawa, Ken like private detective (he does NOT become Kaiketsu Zubat or Kamen Rider V3 despite the publicity photo shown above). The opening and ending themes to Spider-Man were recorded by Hide Yuuki, probably best known for his recording of "Go Go Kikaida" the opening theme to Jinzo Ningen Kikaida. Ando, Mitsuo (Professor Monster) had previously played Professor Gill in Jinzo Ningen Kikaida (1972), Fuehrer Geisel in Inazuman Flash (1974) and Black Cross Fuehrer in Himitsu Sentai Gorenjaa (1975). Toudou, Shinji (Yamashiro, Takuya) would go on to play the chief villain in Chôjinki Metalder (1987).

Spider-Man was one of the few series produced by Hirayama, Tôru which featured characters that were not created by Ishinomori, Shotaro.

Mecha

The most famous aspect of Toei's Spider Man is the "giant robot".

This transport form of the mecha is the space combat ship Marveller. The ship is activated when Spider Man calls out to his Spider Bracelet "MARVELLER!" (Really innovative). Marveller fires missiles from two cannons on the front of the ship. The back of the ship is a holding garage for the GP-7. When not being used, the Marveller rests on the ground. When giant Machine BEM monsters attack, the command "Change Leopardon" causes the Marveller to transform into. . The Leopardon! This giant robot has 3 special attacks (that I know of; there may be more).

Arc Return

This consists of the Leopardon firing its head crest at the enemy (see Ultraseven's King Slugger).

Arm Rockets

This attack causes the fists of the Leopardon to be fired at the enemy monsters (much like the SuperGalaxyMega's flying fist attack).

Sword Vicker

This is the Leopardon's finishing move, or "Hissuto-waza", which finishes off the Machine BEMs at the end of the battle. The Sword is contained in a holster on the right leg of the Leopardon, (and, oddly, is rarely used in battle, especially compared to the other "sword" weapons used by sentai mecha).

The Leopardon pulls the Sword out of its holster, holds it up to charge it, and hurls it at the enemy fully charged. When it hits the enemy...BOOM. Machine BEM dead now.

The villains of Spider Man are the Iron Cross Group (Tetsu Juuji Dan). They destroyed Planet Spider previously, and, as usual, now want to destroy Earth. (Sorry, Spider fans, there are no villains from the Marvel comic here. Yeah, yeah, I wouldn't have minded seeing Doc Ock either). They are "space plunderers" who want Earth's resources, but go about getting it in a very weird way (handling illegal gambling, loan sharking, etc). Maybe their methods were an attempt by Toei to make their villains more like the Marvel supervillains, the goals of which aren't usually "conquering the world", but more geared toward profit (such as The Kingpin), revenge (Venom), or just plain bestiality (The Lizard)?

The Iron Cross Group's main members are...

Professor Monster (Monster Kyojou)

Professor Monster is the leader of the Iron Cross Group (natch). He created the Machine BEMs (which had been developed for 400 years...well, he's certainly persistent) and sent them against Spider Man and Earth. (No, he didn't do much that I could say). Professor Monster is played by Andou Mitsuo, who also played Professor Gill, the chief villain of KIKAIDER. He also did villainous roles in INAUZUMAN FLASH and SHARIVAN, as well as voicing many other villains (including the Black Cross Fuhrer, the first sentai villain ever).

Amazones

Amazones is the field commander of the Iron Cross Group. She often disguises herself to spy on Spider Man. Her secret identity is Saeko Yoshida, the editor of the magazine Weekly Woman...where Hitome Sakuma works. (She uses the Clark Kent method of secret identities, which is "If you wear glasses, no one will recognise you". Doesn't look like anyone ever did, at any rate.

Amazones is played by Yukie Kagawa, who also played Amazon Killer in the 1981 Super Sentai SUN VULCAN. She played a Vader Clan member who left on a space mission, so was absent from the Denjiman goings-on. (Maybe she left because she was driving Hedrer up the wall? Hey, put down those tomatoes!)

Ninders

Ninders are the soldiers of the Iron Cross Group. They serve to distract Spider-Man and soften him up for the Machine BEM of the week, as well as carry out menial tasks for the Iron Cross Group (such as capturing people, etc). (Ninders=Ninjas)

Some Monsters

Bokun (Episode 1)

Bokun was the first monster of the Iron Cross Group to be used. He was a lizard-like creature whose helmet could come down over his head to serve as a visor for his face (to either protect it from harm or head-butt enemies). He had a cannon in his left hand. Bokun was the monster who killed Dr. Yamashiro (Takuya's father).

Mosquito Machine BEM (don't know real name) (Episode 3)

This Machine BEM was used to hypnotise an acrobat (which the Iron Cross Group captured) into performing acts of robbery in the name of Spider-Man in order to destroy Spider Man's reputation. (Not the newest plan ever). Spider Man eventually managed to stop the acrobat. This Machine BEM could fire a hypnotic beam from its eyes, and shoot its proboscis out with a string attached to it to capture enemies.

Saigou (Episode 17)

(Note the resemblance to The Thing of the Fantastic Four)

Saigou was originally a failing ex-champion wrestler who wished to restore his fame by duelling Spider Man. Amazones (in disguise) offered to set up a bout. Spider Man came to the man's brother/trainer to warn him about Amazones, but it was too late; Amazones had already turned Saigou into this rock-monster. Saigou was eventually destroyed by Spider Man's Sword Vicker move. He fought with wrestling moves and a large spiked ball and chain.

FlyTrap Machine BEM (Episode 18)

This episode featured a fatherless boy who found some money. His mother wished to return it to its owners, but on the way to return it, it was stolen by the Iron Cross Group. Later, Amazones brought the family lots of things to make neighbours think that the family had kept and used the money. Spider Man observed Amazones's delivery van, and followed it out to some woods. Amazones eventually battled Spider Man, and then send the FlyTrap Machine BEM after him (giant sized). The FlyTrap Machine BEM could fire a powerful spray of wind from its maw (Amazones was the first to feel the wind, as she walked in just while Professor Monster was testing the thing). And no, smartass, he does NOT usually have a sword buried in his chest. That is there because that picture was one of the few that I could snap because most of the time Mr. Flytrap is in the woods. I CANNOT SNAP DECENT PICTURES IN WOODS. Not that the pics here are all that decent.

The name of the magazine Women is taken from Mrs. Marvel's place of employment whilst the idea of a chief editor being an enemy was inherited from the original Spider-Man. (Also the idea of a motorbike Rider hero with a photographer girlfriend puts in into the same school as show like KAMEN RIDER AMAZON and KAMEN RIDER BLACK RX). Marvel is a homage to Marvel, of course. It's interesting to note that while the Battleship Marvel has the leopard head on it, the robot is called Leoparden. One could look at this program as a sum of elements from past Toei shows, sort of like "KAMEN RIDER (or INZUMAN) + Daisetitujin 17 = Spider-Man". And has anyone here noticed that the super sentai series, from BATTLEFEVER J onto the present, were developed from here? And that the hero + machine route the show took is what diverged into the Space Sheriff genre and others, and continues to do so even now? If Marvel hadn't approached Toei, we may think of these products are purely Japanese, if you take away the shows inspiration of Spider-Man.

SPIRAL

AKA: RASEN

Three months after the events of Ring (see program notes about this program), surviving character Mai (Yada) is trying to readjust when she receives a warning. The vengeful Sadako (Kimura) could have somehow escaped from the abandoned well that has been her prison for many years. Mai forms an alliance with Mitsuo (Kishitani), a school teacher investigating an urban myth about a "cursed" videotape and Mitsuo's former student Natsumi (Yoshimoto). It transpires that there is a scientific explanation to the supposed "magical" curse of Sadako - the Ring Virus is a coded message stored in digital form that mutates human DNA to recreate Sadako anew.

Terrifyingly for Mai and her associates, the Ring Virus has made its way onto a compact disc, the contents of which have already been broadcast to the surrounding area by an opportunistic TV station. Moreover, Mai has become impregnated with the new strain and is fated shortly to give birth to the new incarnation of Sadako (Yada, again). Growing fast to adult size, this new horror, inexplicably attempts to strangle its victims, whereas the original was able to quite literally scare them to death.

However, after setting up this exciting continuation of Koji Suzuki's Ring novels, Spiral degrades into a series of loosely connected paranormal investigations in apparent imitation of THE X-FILES. Made at the height of Ring fever after the release of the Ring Movie and its 1998 Spiral follow up, it deviates far from the author's intent, remodelling the original Mitsuo (a pathologist who performs the autopsy on Ryuji, protagonist of Ring) as a teacher who merely dabbles in sleuthing. The story also exists in a well-regarded 1999 manga version, drawn by Mizuki Sakura. Theme: Rough Laugh "Taga Time ni Kane wa Naru" (For whom the bell tolls).

The series was produced by Masatoshi Kato.

Cinematography by Makoto Watanabe

Film Editing by Hirohide Abe

Production Design by Iwao Saito

Visual Effects by Hajime Matsumoto visual effects

Note: This series is the sequel to the very successful Ring, made in the same year, it was decided to include this show because of its concept of DNA and Mutation which clearly makes it fall into the remit of this book. But Ring was more a traditional paranormal show, without any clear scientific explanations for the events that occur in the series. Therefore it was decided to omit that series from this book.

SPORT RANGER

Starhunter is an alien tribe that steals all life energy on other planets, gathering the energy in the sixth dimension using "King Medal" and bringing it under their control. Soon they created "Knight Medal" when "King Medal" was not able to absorb all the energy. Hoping to conquer the Earth in one fell swoop, since they believed it would not offer much resistance, they brought along both medals. Fortunately, the ship carrying both medals got hit by crossfire in a war that was going on down on Earth. The medals were lost as the ship exploded in Siberia. Starhunter was forced to retreat and create new medals.

One of the medals was broken into 5 pieces. The broken medal was taken by researchers headed by Dr. Earth, and the complete medal was taken by Dr. Heart. One day, Heart's research lab exploded and the medal was nowhere to be found. Later Dr. Earth realized that monsters that had begun to appear were humans that had absorbed the energy from the missing medal when the lab exploded.

Upon further research, Dr. Earth created "SportDetector" to control the 5 broken pieces and special suits to utilize each piece's unique power. He gave five youngsters the suits to stop these monsters.

Meanwhile, Starhunter is preparing their new invasion of Earth.

At the end of the first act, the 3 Sport Rangers have sacrificed themselves to destroy the evil's palace.

SPY GAMES

Former espionage agent Lorne Cash has been out of the spy game for some time now, finally settling down as the owner of a bar. When Lorne is approached by E.C.H.O. agent Maxine London, he learns that his best friend, former partner and mentor Adam Quill has been killed by assassins while golfing with other former agents. He soon teams up with London to hunt down the clues and find out what really happened to Quill. After a brief encounter at Cash's bar with a couple of hit-men sent to kill him, the two learn that Quill is in fact not dead, and has set up the elaborate hoax in order to pursue the construction of the ERADICATOR PROTOTYPE, a fully automated killing device which vaporizes only its organic targets.

Quill intends to use this on the President unless he is paid the absurd sum of $10 Billion. Being absurd himself, the President does not take the threat seriously, but Cash knows Quill better than that, and him and London have already seen a demonstration of the ERADICATOR and barely lived to tell about it! Now, the two of them must single handedly stop Quill before he kills the President, and continues on a path of destruction.

Charectors are:

MAX LONDON Currently assigned to E.C.H.O.; The Emergency Counter Hostilities Organization desiganted to the task of finding rogue spies and other intelligence agents who have turned terrorist or otherwise against the United States after being laid off at the end of the cold war.

LORNE CASH Former agent for the CIA who has been somewhat involintarily reinstated to work for E.C.H.O.

MICAH SIMMS Director of E.C.H.O. and all of it's operations. Simms reports directly to the President of the United States. His specialties lie in the fields of computer Intelligence and Administration.

Pity the poor producers who dabble in spying after the Cold War. "Spy Game," a new short-run and amusing comedy-fantasy-action series from ABC, has that much belabored plot - featuring down-sized intelligence folks run amok. The president starts another up-tech secret agency (aren't there a lot of those around lately?), this one is called E.C.H.O., for Emergency Counter Hostilities Organization, to save us from danger. The questionis - what dangers? Not the Russians or the Iranians. The Republican Congress? The Medfly? Series creators John McNamara, Sam Raimi and Ivan Raimi likely set out to have some fun, including high kicks and spectacular stunts.

Their superfolk, Lorne Cash (Linden Ashby) and Max for Maxine London (Allison Smith), can fight fiercely with hands, feet and elbows. And though bashed in the face a few times, they never bleed. Lorne's former partner and buddy, Adam Quill (Cotter Smith), has turned disgruntled and diabolical. So Lorne and Max must stop him from killing the president. (Rest easy, they stop him. A lot of people are killed, but no blood is spilled.) Sam Raimi has claimed perposterous as his own genre (consider "HERCULES: THE LEGENDARY JOURNEYS" and "XENA: WARRIOR PRINCESS"). This This is wacky for sure, but the execution is terribly wanting. And while attitude is supposed to be the charm here, McNamara's script is mostly witless.

Executive producers for the series were Sam Raimi, Robert Tabert and John McNamara. Only the first 9 episodes were shown before the series was cancelled, theirfore the last airdate is given for episode 1.9. Produced by Tamara Dow (executive), David Eick (supervising), Joe Lazarov (co-producer), Edward Ledding, Kathy McCormick (co-executive), John McNamara (executive), Gene O'Neill (co-producer) Sam Raimi (executive), David Simkins (supervising), Robert G. Yes, it's cheesy! Yes, it's unbelievable! But it gets the humour and the action just right, and getting Patrick MacNee in for cameos makes it perfect. Try and catch all the references to THE PRISONER, THE AVENGERS, and so on. And it's so good to see a series where the girl does more than just sprain her ankle during the fight.

"Spy Game", by Tony Scott

With cameos by retired TV spy series reps, "Spy Game" establishes a Crayola-bright series opening with reminders of "The Avengers," "Mission: Impossible" and "I Spy," but comparisons screech to a halt there. Loud, unoriginal and unimaginative pilot isn't sophisticated enough for preteens; it should have been animated. Concept crowds around ECHO (Emergency Counter Hostilities Org), which has drawn in most of the world's out-of-work agents, who apparently aren't eligible for unemployment insurance.

Led by dour bureau chief Micah Simms (Bruce McCarty), the take off never does take off. Adam Quill (Cotter Smith), who thinks the president was wrong in scrapping spy orgs, has his own agenda. Veteran Lorne Cash (Linden Ashby), originally trained by master op Quill, joins ECHO and is assigned, to his chagrin, to work second banana to new agent Max London (Allison Smith), whose qualifications are deliberately vague. ECHO's aim is to kayo the enemies within, and the company boasts hardware to unnerve any opponent. London, whose talents behind a driving wheel verge on maniacal, and Cash are after a small demonic device that, floating, can deliver a cylinder with all the devilishness of a minor hydrogen bomb.

Quill opens the proceedings when he grabs a live bomb and runs into a shack that explodes around him. But instead of going up in pieces, he goes on to run an outfit of disgruntled ex-spies who want to deliver the powerful mechanism to the president for putting them on the dole. The tricks, the gadgets, the unsurprising surprises (a tired plastic skin mask elicits a "Not this again!" from Cash) can't carry the pilot, and acting by Ashby and Smith is bland. These spies are into coreographed fights with other agents, including that Russian operator Shank (Keith Szarabjka), who's now on the ECHO team.

Elodie Keene's direction is, to say the least, derivative, and Christopher Beck's blatant score, a banging failed reminder of the "Mission: Impossible" theme, shows how Lalo Schifrin's work so individualistically punctuated that earlier series. As for the disarming insouciance of the Robert Culp-Bill Cosby "I Spy" high adventures, there's no echo.

John McNamara's contrived script (he co-created the series with Sam Raimi and Ivan Raimi) and Vincent J. Crescimano's production design, which sticks mostly to backlot explorations, proclaim how shrewdly and professionally the three aforementioned series were devised. Opening credits sequence, a hokey takeoff on "The Avengers," involves Ashby and Max armed and striking poses before show's title spelled out in oversize letters. That's as close as the opening sesh gets to the stylish and persuasive "Avengers." Patrick MacNee's opening line, referring to previous TV spy adventures, says it all: "No doubt about it, Quill, we were the best!" Will it go? There's a considerable difference between charming tongue-in-cheek and foot in mouth.

"'Spy Game' Struggles to Carry Out Its Mission" by: Howard Rosenberg

Rarely has there been a more derived series than ABC's new "Spy Game" The opening credits recall "The Avengers," that grand escapist and inventive British series that ran on ABC in the 1960s. The premise - the United States needing protection from former Cold War agents resentful about being downsized - echoes the 1996 movie remake of TV's "Mission: Impossible." And the friendly bickering between male protagonist Lorne Cash (Linden Ashby) and female protagonist Max London (Allison Smith) is classic "Remington Steele," an NBC series from the 1980s that itself sought to reinvent "The Thin Man."

Enough of the name dropping, though, for no one will be imitating "Spy Game," which doesn't even approach any of the above series. Instead it is really bad television on just about every level. That is surprising if for no other reason than one of the show's creators, along with Sam Raimi and Ivan Raimi, is John McNamara, who was also co-creator of the highly original "Profit," which had a fleeting run on Fox last season.

The brain center of "Spy Game" is E.C.H.O., a government agency created to protect the United States from these dangerous renegades from within. Its success or failure rests on London and former CIA agent Lorne Cash (who carries no weapon because he is a weapon) and their boss, Micah Simms (Bruce McCarty). Unfortunately for the series, its own success or failure rests largely on the work of Ashby, a wooden Ken doll, and Smith, who also has memorable looks but simply can not act a whit.

The threat in the premier comes not only from London's bridges falling down but also from Cash's demented former mentor and colleague Adam Quill (Cotter Smith), who controls a super weapon known as the eradicator that he hopes to use on the president. Never mind that none of the principals here looks like he or she has ever come into contact with anything more technologically advanced than a blow dryer.

"Spy Game" is rather violent and lacks the talent to execute the occasional witty lines that surface in the initial episodes. These stories include appearances by "Profit" alumnus Keith Szarabajka, as a former Soviet agent, and a brief early cameo tonight by Patrick MacNee. The latter evokes memories of MacNee with Diana Rigg, with superior skills and scripts, carrying off this brand of cheeky adventure so stylishly on "The Avengers." While watching "Spy Game" plod, meanwhile, you can think of good use for the eradicator.

"Rating the Midseason Shows" by: Susan Stewart

SPY GAME (Mon., ABC) TV-PG Ever wonder what happened to spies when the Cold War ended? They went into comedy. This series, from the producers of Hercules and Xena, stars Linden Ashby and Allison Smith as a couple of cute ex-espionage agents charged with keeping the world safe from their cranky, downsized counterparts. Game's a spoof, reminiscent of The Man From U.N.C.L.E. This is low maintenance entertainment, rife with campy jokes and cleverly choreographed battles. My score (0-10): 6

T.V. Guide: Saturday, March 15, 1997.

"The Couch Critic" By: Jeff Jarvis

Spy Game

ABC, Mondays, 8 P.M./ET

Amazing how a good idea can turn bad so quickly. I'd love to see a new spy show now, even as the espionage trade is being downsized in the new world economy. Nowadays, spies are about as necessary as keypunch operators. Yet spies do know - literally - where the bodies are buried. They're still dangerous and devious. Take these ferrety characters, arm them with techy weapons, give them great plots or punch lines, and sic them on a genetic enemy, like The Man From U.N.C.L.E.'s THRUSH, and you should have a blast. Should.

In the first minute of Spy Game, I hoped this would be such a show: a Get Smart for the millennium. In a brilliant job of guest-star casting, Patrick Macnee, the legendary spy-star of The Avengers, appears as a retired spook playing golf. Suddenly, a mis-swung club flies into a tree and uncovers a camouflaged sniper. Macnee and his playmates attack him with their putters and win the round. The scene is outrageous and funny. It's also, apparently, an impossible act to follow; from the next minute on, Spy Game becomes an intense bore.

The series stars Linden Ashby as ex-CIA agent Lorne Cash and Allison Smith as Max London, his beautiful, daring partner: his agent 99. She has concrete nerves. One way into the headquarters of their secret new spy agency, E.C.H.O. (Emergency Counter Hostilities Organization), is to drive down a blind alley at over 100 mph, strait for a brick wall that opens at the last minute. She's driving; she's cool. He's not. She's the real spy geek, the one who gets sweaty playing with new guns that shoot bullets, gas pellets, even mini-missiles. They're a good team, well armed with neat toys. But they're sent on missions with no backup from the lousy writers and directors at HQ. They get bad lines and worse plots, set to a dorky mockery of '60s spy-flick music (like the "In Like Flint" theme reinterpreted for elevators).

After our spies lament how unwanted they are - "No more East, no more West, no more big rooms full of cool stuff" - they're sent to nab a bitter ex-agent trying to kill the president or to rescue a Russian ex-spy's mom who's being held hostage to get her son to perform some dastardly act. This should be cause for campy humor, clever repartee about the state of the world, or at least nail-biting chases. Instead, we get lines that fill air: As they try to jump onto a moving jet, one spy screams to the other to close the hatch; he asks where the handle is; she says, "That would be the thing that says 'handle.'" See: The writers aren't even trying.

That's because all of this is just a thin excuse for gratuitous violence - way too many karate chops for one show, especially one in the family hour. It's stupid to produce such senseless violence at a time when TV is being attacked (unfairly, I usually say) as a violent medium. It's not only dumb, it's dull. Oh well, I guess they just don't make spies like they used to.

After a brief encounter at Cash's bar with a couple of hit-men sent to kill him, the two learn that Quill is in fact not dead, and has set up the elaborate hoax in order to pursue the construction of the ERADICATOR PROTOTYPE, a fully automated killing device which vaporizes only its organic targets. Quill intends to use this on the President unless he is paid the absurd sum of $10 Billion. Being absurd himself, the President does not take the threat seriously, but Cash knows Quill better than that, and him and London have already seen a demonstration of the ERADICATOR and barely lived to tell about it! STAR COPS

The International Space Police Force (nicknamed the Star Cops) were initially a handful of part-timers, volunteers who got the badge and had to keep law and order while holding down other jobs. Nathan Spring is a dedicated, irascible, professional detective appointed to whip them into shape. An outsider, he is immensely suspicious of the computerised world in which he lives, believing that it discourages people from thinking for themselves. He starts to build an international team around himself, beginning with Theroux, a young black American flight engineer, Australian Pal Kenzy an chauvinistic womaniser, chubby Colin Devis, and later to include young Japanese scientist Anna Shoun.

The Star Cops investigate everything from murder, sabotage, theft and hijacking, with Spring frequently clashing - somewhat half heatedly - with Krivenko, the Russian co-ordinator of moonbase where they establish their headquarters.

Star Cops was a British series which as the name implies was about police work in outer space Set in the near future of 2027, when mankind has finally begun colonisation of outer space. With more and more people living in space, crime had also followed To battle crime in outer space the various governments on Earth had set up the International Space Police Force, an organisation deridingly referred to as the Star Cops.

In charge of the Star Cops was Nathan Spring. Spring was a middle aged British police officer who was manipulated into taking charge of the Star Cops against his wishes. The Star Cops started out as a group of part time officers operating on various space stations, however under Spring's control the group enlisted several full time operators and a permanent headquarters on moon base. Most of the series regulars were given their own episode as an introductory episode. Both Nathan Spring and his second in command American David Theroux were prominently featured in the first episode. British detective Colin Devis volunteered for service after working on the murder case of Nathan's girlfriend in the second episode. Rebellious Australian Pal Kenzy was prominently featured in the third episode, after a brief appearance in the first. Russian Moonbase Commander Alexander Krivenko was introduced in the fourth episode and the last regular Anna Shoun, a young Japanese scientist, first appeared in the sixth episode

The cases assigned to the Star Cops were typical criminal ones. There was no saving the world from alien invaders. Instead the Star Cops got to solve such things as murder, industrial espionage and missing persons- however these crimes were often given a new twist by the fact that they were committed in outer space.

Star Cops never fully received the recognition it deserved. Only lasting for one series of 9 episodes on BBC2 (where programmes which are not supposed to be popular are broadcast), the series got off to something of a slow start since all of the series regulars were not introduced until the sixth episode. The cases the Star Cops investigated were all well thought out mysteries and the characters well developed.

When Nathan Spring and his posse of space deputies rode into the BBC schedules in 1987, they evoked echoes of the lawmen of the Old West. Star Cops never fully received the recognition it deserved. Only lasting for one series of nine episodes on BBC 2., the series got off to something of a slow start, since all the series regulars were not introduced until the sixth episode. The cases that Star Cops investigated were all well thought out mysterious and the characters were all well developed. The series was devised by Chris Boucher, a veteran of DOCTOR WHO and BLAKE'S 7, who was keen to get away from the space opera and back to what he considered to be the nuts and bolts of an intelligent, realistic detective series set in space.

A contributor to such Earth bound series such as Bergerac, Juliet Bravo and Shoestring, Boucher intended the drama to come, not from the realms of the fantastic, but from the developing characters and strength of the plots. Only a modest success in its BBC2 Monday evening slot, the series has never been given the ' Seal of Approval' of a repeat run of BBC1.

The producer for the series was Evgeny Gridneff, script editor was Joanna Willett, video effects were by Robin Lobb and the theme was composed by Justing Haywood. The series was shown on BBC2 in 1987. The designers for the show were Dick Coles and Malcolm Thornton. Geoffrey Bayldon star of the 1970s SF show CATWEAZLE turned up as a guest star in the episode "Other People's Secrets" Tthe incidental music was created by Justin Hayward and Tony Visconti, the costume designer was by Linda Woodfield and the make up designer was Jill Hagger. The visual effects designers were Mike Kelt and Malcolm James.

Touted as a tongue-in-cheek fantasy, this 13-part Anglo-German production depicted a role-reversed planet Medusa, where women rule and men are the domestic drudges. Two male servants, Adam and Shem, escape to Earth in a stolen spacecraft in search of a better life. But they are pursued by Supreme Councillor Fulvia who wants to rechain them to the kitchen sink. When they are unable to recapture the runaways, Fulvia and her crew return with two Earth hostages. Thus the scene is set for a two-centre culture clash.

Question: in what TV series did Gareth Thomas play a rebel on the run, pursued by a powerful, dominant female? Yes, yes, BLAKE'S 7, of course. But two years earlier he was fleeing a regiment of women in a quite different science fiction series, Star Maidens. Touted as a tongue-in-cheek fantasy, this 13-part Anglo-German production depicted a role-reversed planet Medusa, where women rule and men are the domestic drudges.

The series, based on an original idea by a pair of German film-makers, Graf and Graefin Von Hardenberg, was made by a British independent company, Portman Productions, at Bray Studios. Its quartet of writers included three renowned exponents of British telefantasy - Eric Paice, Ian Stuart Black and John Lucarotti - and it boasted a starry international cast, including Judy Geeson, Dawn Addams and Lisa Harrow. Ronald Hines appeared as a dour police inspector bewildered by his encounter with the liberated ladies of Medusa, and Alfie Bass chipped in a cameo role as a castle gatekeeper captured by the Medusan runaways. The foreign stars included Christiane Kruger (daughter of Hardy) and Christian Quadflieg, from Germany, plus French-born Pierre Brice.

Produced at a cost of around £50,000 per episode, Star Maidens was sold to more than 40 countries as diverse - given the 'liberated' theme - as America, Hungary, South Africa and the Arab states of the Middle East. Over here, it premiered on Scottish Television in September 1976, with most ITV regions following in 1977.

But the maidens won few admirers, something Portman executive Ian Warren attributed to the difficulty of doing comedy with the Germans. 'It was meant to be fantasy but the Germans kept trying to make it more realistic.' Plans were laid to make a second series in Canada but they proved too expensive and were quietly shelved.

This was just one of actor Gareth Thomas' SF roles, others included BLAKE'S 7 and CHILDREN OF THE STONES. A three hour TV Movies which consisted of episodes from the series was also made, entitled simply Star Maidens it comprised of episodes 1, 2, 3, 4, 9, 11 & 13. The TV movie is sometimes shown as two 90 minute films.

Star Maidens was a British-German co-production which was the first series in which Gareth Thomas- best known as the Blake in Blakes 7- played a rebel against the forces of an oppressive government. Thomas played Shem, a man from the planet Medusa. Medusa was a world in which women ruled and men were used as servants and sex objects. Medusa was also a rogue planet which wandered into Earth's solar system.

Shem and his friend Adam learned that Earth was a far better place to live and stole a spacecraft belonging to Fulvia to journey to Earth. Fulvia and Octavia proceeded to journey to Earth and demand that Shem and Adam be returned to her. When the pair were given sanctuary on Earth. Octavia kidnaped Rudi Schmidt and Liz Becker and took the pair to Medusa demanding Adam and Shem's return for the pair's release. Fulvia meanwhile decided to stay on Earth with Adam. The stage was thus set for massive culture shock on both sides until the conflict was ultimately resolved in the final episode.

The producer for the series was James Gatward, and the series was first broadcast on STV (Scottish Television).

STAR TREK

Star Trek was created by Gene Roddenberry, a former World War Two aviator and Los Angeles cop, who conceived it as an adult science fiction series. Its premise: in the 23rd century, Earth is part of the United Federation of Planets, a peaceful alliance of democratic worlds which runs a 'Starfleet' of space vessels to patrol the 'final frontier' of space. These, then, were the voyages of the Starship Enterprise. Its mission, restated at the start of each episode; 'to explore strange new worlds, to seek out life and new civilisations, to boldly go where no man has gone before'.

Its heroes: Captain James T. Kirk (the 'T' stood for Tiberius), a courageous and unflinchingly noble commander; his first officer Mr Spock, a half-human, half-Vulcan with pointed ears and arched eyebrows who lived by logic; Chief Medical Officer Leonard 'Bones' McCoy, an intemperate Southerner who insisted he was 'just a simple country doctor at heart'; and Chief Engineer Montgomery 'Scotty' Scott, an old-fashioned nuts 'n' bolts man devoted to his engines. The characters may have been corny (with the exception of Spock), but the chemistry was special, creating a unique sense of family - especially between Kirk, Spock and McCoy. You just knew that beneath that grumpy exterior, McCoy really cared for Spock. And the Vulcan's own inner turmoil as he strove to reconcile his logical self with the human side of his nature made him the most interesting character.

Star Trek's history has been analyzed from all angles-by historians, writers, fans, sociologists and critics. They've poked and prodded the phenomenon, unfastening Trek's dramatic hinges to see what made it run. Was it a magical chemistry of the cast? Imaginative plots? Or the optimistic portrayal of mankind as it reached out to other worlds? Star Trek's legendary origins have been well documented. Gene Roddenberry, former airline pilot and policeman, wanted to make social and political statements on television without being crucified by the censors. Science fiction offered him the chance to comment on his world by setting his stories in other worlds. Although similar to the 1956 film Forbidden Planet (which also featured a United Star Cruiser in the far future), Star Trek was unique for television.

CBS rejected Roddenberry's proposal in favor of Lost in Space, but NBC expressed interest. The 1964 pilot, titled "The Cage," cast Jeffrey Hunter as Enterprise captain Christopher Pike and Leonard Nimoy as the half-human, half-Vulcan science officer, Mr. Spock. Majel Barrett played the female first officer, Number One. The story told of the Enterprise's encounter with an alien, telepathic race which snatches Pike for breeding purposes.'

"After NBC watched it, they said, 'We like it, we believe it, we don't understand it. Do it again,'" remembers director Robert Butler. The brass felt the pilot was "too cerebral" for audiences and wanted another pilot to demonstrate the format's action-adventure potential. Even while filming "The Cage," Butler had had his own reservations. "It was a complicated story," he admits, "and I wondered if audiences would respond to it. While rehearsing the pilot, Howard Hawks' film The Thing was very much on my mind. That film was very dry and underplayed, naturalistic and quiet. I tried that with the Star Trek cast for a couple of days, but it didn't work. It turned out flat, so I said, 'I was wrong. Let's go back to our traditional style,' which is slightly melodramatic, slightly alarmed and aroused. It worked better."

While generally satisfied with "The Cage," Butler says that his vision of the future, on both a visual and a dramatic level, was different from Roddenberry's. "Star Trek supposedly conveys interesting ideas and philosophies. I found it more preachy and spoken than dramatic. The technical effects were great, but the drama was stand-around. Occasionally, a few guns went off, but at its best and worst, there was a lot of thinking, postulating and reasoning. It was walking radio-thoughts, ideas, words-theatrical space opera. I wanted to get into something more vivid."

He also preferred a visual style that was more realistic. "I respected the way the movie Star Wars took the future and wore it down. I wanted to do that with 'The Cage.' I wanted to wear down the ship's hardware and bring in some wear and tear and naturalism. I was told, wrongly I think, that the brand spanking new ship was the wave of the future. For me, that cleanliness robbed Star Trek of realism. There's more realism in unrest and disorder. When I directed Hill Street Blues, I got into that seamy side of reality." NBC asked for several character changes after screening the pilot. Test audiences had not been receptive to seeing a woman in a position of command. Roddenberry reluctantly agreed to drop the Number One character. The network was also uneasy about the Satanic appearance of Mr. Spock. They asked for the character to be removed. Roddenberry fought to keep the pointeared alien, feeling that the Vulcan's constant struggle with his suppressed human emotions would provide the series with a major dramatic thrust. Roddenberry won the battle, and Spock became one of the show's biggest draws.

As for the starship captain, Jeffrey Hunter decided not to go ahead with the series. "Jeff was a decent, professional guy," recalls Butler. "He liked the overall integrity that went into Star Trek, but as I vaguely recall, his wife wasn't all that happy with him doing a science fiction series. I think there was also a commercial sense of getting a clean start with the second pilot. They changed as much as possible within reason. That included re-casting." Some of the actors considered for the role of Enterprise captain included James Coburn, Roy Thinnes, Jack Lord and Lloyd Bridges.

The second pilot, "Where No Man Has Gone Before," was directed by James Goldstone in 1965. William Shatner was cast as the new starship captain, James T. Kirk. This pilot sold the series to NBC. "The Cage" would later be used in the two-hour Star Trek episode "The Menagerie" as flashback footage. "Gene asked me to come back and direct the new footage for 'The Menagerie,' but I was busy, which was OK," recalls Butler. "I'd already been there and wasn't interested in coming back. But I enjoyed working with Gene. He was a very unpretentious, basic guy. He was a man's man, with a lot of enthusiasm, leadership and strength."

As Star Trek neared its first air date for the 1966-67 season, it was publicized as the first adult space series. However, the first episode aired was about a salt-sucking creature loose on the Enterprise. It didn't get the show's image off to a good start. "NBC chose 'The Man Trap' to open the season because it had a monster," says coproducer Robert Justman. "I stood up in the projection room when the network people were trying to decide which episode to open the season with. I strongly objected to showing 'The Man Trap' as the premiere. Not only did it lack the quality of some of the other shows we had done, but it would give the audience a mistaken idea of what we were attempting to do. However, I lost. I felt the network, aside from a few people, never understood what we were trying to do with the series." Many critics certainly didn't. After "The Man Trap" aired, Daily Variety sniffed that "Star Trek won't work," while the L. A. Times groaned, "The stars take a trek into a real mess." It didn't take long, however, for subsequent episodes of the series to win over a modest but loyal following. This included real-life space scientists, astronauts and even writer Isaac Asimov, who proclaimed it "the first good science fiction series."

Writer Margaret Armen was a faithful viewer who recalls that she instructed her agent to "keep hounding Gene Roddenberry until he asked to see me. At that time, women writers were subject to suspicion as to their ability to write hard stories. Gene was open-minded, especially after his one-time secretary, Dorothy Fontana, exhibited such writing ability as a Star Trek writer. Gene agreed to a story conference with me, and liked my 'Gamemasters of Triskelion' story. The first day I walked into the Star Trek office, I was greeted by this huge, life-sized cutout of one of the show's monsters. It was a shock ... but a nice touch!" Armen recalls, "There was sort of a competition between William Shatner and Leonard Nimoy. Actors' egos are very fragile. They're always on guard against somebody taking over from them. They were both wonderful however, and played their characters beautifully. Nimoy could be a little temperamental, but he was also very charming and very sexy. He had a very magnetic personality."

One of the ribbings Star Trek has endured over the years has been its treatment of the unknown crewmen. When a landing party consisted of Captain Kirk, Mr. Spock, Dr. McCoy and a guard named Smith, it was a sure bet Smith would get blasted by Act 1. Jay Jones was one of the main stuntmen on the show, and he made his living dying on Star Trek. "In the first episode I did, 'Catspaw,' I was dead the minute you saw me," he laughs. "They needed an actor who could do his own falls. In 'Catspaw,' I beam up as a zombie, fall flat on my face and as Kirk holds me, evil voices come out of my mouth. That was my introduction to Star Trek." Jones, whose father was also a stuntman, had gained his own reputation by doing stunts for Robert Vaughn on The Man from U.N.C.L.E. He left that series for Star Trek.

"Gene Roddenberry took a liking to me and the word came down I was to get as much work as I could handle," explains Jones. "I started by doubling for James Doohan, and later for Leonard Nimoy." But it was his hazardous security duty that got him the most attention. "The big joke on the set was how hard it was for a guard to live past the first half-hour." At the time, Jones regarded the show as just a job. "My father thought the series was great, but I didn't like science fiction. It wasn't until the reruns that I realized what a terrific show it was. When I got my 'Catspaw' script, my only line was, 'One to beam up.' I had no idea what that meant. The next day, a neighborhood kid went by on a bicycle. I asked him, 'Do you watch Star Trek?' He said, 'Yeah!' I asked, 'Do you know what beam up means?' This kid explained it all to me."

Getting beamed up was a breeze compared to the stunts Jones did for several episodes. In "Who Mourns for Adonais," the Greek god Apollo expells his wrath on Scotty several times. The stuntman was Jones. "Apollo backflips me over a table, but I hit the corner, so they chained it down and I did it again. This time I caught the table's edge in the kidneys. By the end of the day, I was pretty sore. Then they wanted to do the wire gag known as a neckbreaker. You wear a vest under your clothes, and it's attached to a pulley. Three 200-pound guys jump off a six-foot ladder and it takes up the slack. It jerked me across the stage. We thought it would take me 10 to 12 feet and it took me 18. I flew right over Shatner's head. My head snapped against the floor, and I went through a wall, although that was cut from the print. I was out cold. They rushed me to the hospital with a concussion. I was banged up, but nothing major."

In the episode "The Apple," Jones played crewman Mallory, one of the landing party who finds a planet ruled by the computer god Vaal. Although he was supposed to sneak silently up to a village, Mallory inexplicably blows his cover by trying to alert Captain Kirk. "The director wanted me to run over a hill and scream, 'Captain! The village is over there!'" laughs Jones. "Looking back on it now, it sounds pretty silly!" When Mallory stepped on an exploding rock, it was stunt time. "I had to lobby director Joe Pevney for that scene," recalls Jones. "He was a dear man and refused to let me do it. He felt it was too dangerous. I held out. I said, 'I don't want to do this stunt the Mickey Mouse way.' He finally said okay. Well, I was wrong. I got hurt

"There was a jumper trampoline buried in the ground. When I hit the trampoline, the explosive was supposed to go off. Well, the timing had to be perfect, and it wasn't. The special effects guy was a hundredth of a second too late. I was directly over it when the blast hit me. In the episode, you can see me literally blown toward the camera. The force hit me in the stomach, burned my side, blew the skin off my rib cage and impacted all of this dirt into my sinuses. I couldn't open my eyes or breathe. They rushed me to the hospital emergency room." Still, Jones says cheerfully, "It was nothing major. It could have been a lot worse."

Jones's father was less stoic. "Dad had been a stuntman all of his life. When he saw that stunt on TV, he knew I really ate it. He literally got sick to his stomach. They had filmed the explosion from another angle as well, and it was incredible. I looked like a human fireball. It wasn't used because NBG felt it was too violent. I was really the stunt coordinator for the show," he continues. "I'd dream up stunts and work with the directors and cameramen on how we could use them in scenes. I've been on some shows where the directors are trying to get you killed. I've done other shows where the directors really care about your safety. On Star Trek, the same stunt guys were called back regularly. It was a great group of people."

In his appraisal of the cast, Jones notes, "Leonard Nimoy was very quiet and shy. He was a nice guy, but he seldom said anything. Dee Kelley and Jimmy Doohan were the greatest guys in the world. The toughest guy was Shatner. He loved to relate to the stunt guys because he thought he was a jock. The first fight I had with him he got caught up in the adrenalin. He busted me in the mouth a couple of times. We weren't the best of friends during the show, although we grew closer towards the end. The cast was very interested in learning how we did stunts. They were our biggest fans because they knew the stunts made them look good. The actors always wanted to do stunts. The stuntmen always wanted to act!"

Jones figures that he maneuvered himself out of a recurring role on the series. "I was asked if I could do accents. They were trying to write in some new characters, but they hadn't decided on a dialect. I had just done a play where I had a French accent, and I butchered it. So when they asked me if I'd do a test scene in 'Catspaw' with an accent, I said, 'No way. I won't embarrass myself again.' I found out later they were considering me for the role of Chekov. Walter Koenig has been riding the crest ever since."

Jones notes that the morale during Star Trek's third year was low. "There seemed to be a problem between Gene and the actors. Gene was marketing everything related to the series-buttons and stuff. He was just being a businessman, but some of the cast didn't feel that was correct. They were in it for the art." After Star Trek, Jones went on to do stunts in Bonanza and The High Chaparral. He later became a professional racquetball player. Today, he's an actor and a private investigator.

Canadian actor John Colicos had the privilege of introducing the hostile Klingons to Star Trek audiences. In "Errand of Mercy," Commander Kor (Colicos) and his men invade what seems to be a primitive, push-over planet. "My first thought was, 'What the hell should a Klingon look like?'" says Colicos. "Then I thought of a futuristic Ghengis Khan, and the makeup suggested a Mongolian warrior, hell-bent on the destruction of the planet. But we should have had spines growing out of the top of their heads to make them look like mutants!"

The episode brings the Klingons and the Earth Federation to the edge of all-out war. Their battle is abruptly halted by the peace-loving villagers, who are actually highly advanced life forms. They force the two sides to arrange a longstanding truce known as the Organian Peace Treaty. "When the aliens told Kirk and Kor, 'Get the hell off our planet. We don't want your war', it was the beginning of a new generation," says Colicos. "The show's message was to let there be peace and harmony in the world for a change."

Colicos, an avid viewer of the 1987-94 Star Trek: The Next Generation, was surprised by the changes made in the Klingon Empire. "Now they're the good guys," he says. "The Klingon makeup is entirely different from what we did in the series. It would be very interesting to bring back Kor, who's been living on top of a mountain for the last 100 years, and have him cursing and screaming, 'Why the hell has everyone become so nice!'"

Actor Lawrence Montaigne had been a top stuntman in Europe before embarking on a successful acting career in America. It was his role as Stonn, the Vulcan in love with Spock's fiancée in "Amok Time," that brings back a memory. "Gene Roddenberry was a phenomenon. I can also say, of all the people I've worked for in show business, he was the most vicious. I hated the man. The role of Stonn had only three lines, and I wasn't interested. To pacify me, they offered to give me guest star billing and to pay my price. I still didn't want to do it.

"Roddenberry called me direct and told me if I didn't do the part, I would never work at Paramount again. What could I do? Acting was how I made my living. Gene was a very imposing man. What he wanted, he got. He had been a cop and behaved like one." Reluctantly, Montaigne did the role, but then there was another controversy. "They wanted me to be bare-chested as Stonn. I didn't think that was something you ask somebody to do unless it's pre-arranged. You don't wait until a guy is in his costume and say, 'Oh, by the way, shave your chest.' I called my agent and said 'They want me to shave my chest. Are they out of their minds? Do they expect me to stand around for the next two months and itch? I'm not gonna do it.' I went to my dressing room, and suddenly Gene knocks on the door. 'What is this shit?' he says. 'You're holding up production.' We already had this wonderful rapport going because of our earlier clash. I told him I wasn't going to shave and I didn't care what he did. Well, my agent came down, Gene was there, and guess who was the heavy? They finally came up with the idea of a black turtleneck sweater. The outcome was that I never worked for Gene or for Paramount again."

All the same, the actor says, "Gene was a genius in his own right. He created a unique show. I didn't have to agree with or like the man. Hell, personality conflicts happen in every bloody business in the world. It's only because it's in show business that it becomes high profile." Montaigne's experiences with the cast were on the lighter note. "Leonard Nimoy didn't have a sense of humor. During lunch we were in the commissary and a bus pulled up. A bunch of tourists came out and rushed over to Leonard, 'Mr. Nimoy! Mr. Nimoy!' So after lunch, we were on the set and I said to Leonard, 'You know, Leonard, a funny thing happened in the commissary after you left. Another busload of people arrived and they mistook me for you. They came up and began yelling, "Mr. Nimoy, can you sign our autographs?" I told them to go fuck themselves.' Well, if you wanna give somebody shock therapy, that would have done it. Leonard blanched, and his jaw fell to his chest. It was so typical of Leonard. He would never have thought for a minute that maybe I was kidding. I feel that when we take ourselves too seriously, it's time for a little introspection. On Star Trek, you had to work your ass off, trying to make it believable, but after awhile, you've got to laugh. That was the good thing about Shatner. He enjoyed it and played it tongue-in-cheek. Leonard took the whole thing very seriously."

Montaigne says (and co-producer Robert Justman confirms) that he was under serious consideration to replace Leonard Nimoy after Star Trek's first year. "Leonard's agent was negotiating for a new contract, and it looked like Leonard wouldn't be back," says Montaigne. "My agent called and negotiated a deal for me to take over the role. Leonard changed his mind and went back for a second season."

Actor Booker Bradshaw, who played Enterprise doctor M'Benga in two episodes, recalls that occasionally the space-age dialogue gave everyone the giggles. "There's a scene in A Private Little War where Dr. McCoy says, 'Thank God his heart is where his liver is or he'd be dead now.' That scene took us SO takes. We couldn't get through that line without laughing. When we finally got it together and stopped laughing, the cameraman laughed and jiggled the camera on the SOth take. So we had to do it again."

Bradshaw notes that the laughs between Shatner and Nimoy became more subdued as the series went on. "When Star Trek began, William Shatner was supposed to be the next Laurence Olivier of America," says Bradshaw. "Most of the salary went to Bill, and Leonard was an afterthought. Then, the show took a strange turn. Leonard started pulling in 10,000 fan letters a week. So a certain envy began to develop with Shatner, but it never took the form of a healthy discussion. It was subliminal."

It was when Nimoy had to appear at the Texas State Fair during the filming of "A Private Little War" that Bradshaw got into his own trouble. "We had to film a scene in sickbay, where Spock is comatose and I'm supposed to revive him by slapping him. Leonard wanted to get the scene done so he could fly to the Texas State Fair. Leonard said, 'Booker, I only want to do this scene once. When you hit me, make it realistic. I don't want a stage slap. I want you to slap the shit out of me.' I said, 'I gotcha!'"

"We began filming and I walked over to Leonard and I slapped him. I've never slapped anyone as hard as I slapped him-and his ears flew off! There was mass hysteria on the set. The cameraman was in convulsions, and people were rolling on the floor. Leonard was totally pissed off. He chased me around the set, yelling, 'I'm gonna kill this guy!' I'm yelling, 'Please! I did what you told me to do.' The director's yelling, 'What the hell's going on here? Don't you understand what a stage slap is, Bradshaw? Now we have to cover up the bruise marks on Leonard's face and he wants to beat you up because you slapped the piss out of him.' I said, 'Look, all I ever wanted to be was a classical actor. I don't need this shit. I'm going home!' Well, Leonard grabbed me and said, 'In a pig's ass you are. We're going to do it again-this time, use a stage slap.' So we did, and the scene was fine, and Leonard hugged me and said, 'I'm not gonna beat you up, Booker,' and off he went to the Texas State Fair."

Star Trek developed a small, loyal audience, but the ratings were a constant concern. The first season of Star Trek finished number 52 out of nearly 100 shows. It finished just behind Mission Impossible, and ahead of The Wild, Wild West and Run for Your Life. At the end of the 1966-67 season, NBC reported Star Trek's chances for renewal were iffy. Several thousand TV viewers wrote in, helping to secure the series for a second season. However, the show was moved from its Thursday night slot to Friday nights. According to Robert Justman, that hurt Star Trek. "By the time we had built up an audience during the summer of 1967 in that Thursday slot, NBC moved us to Fridays at 8:30. That was tough because part of our audience was young people and that was their night to go out."

"There was never any strong general audience support for Star Trek after the first year ", says Herbert Solow, who was vice-president of Desilu studios at the time. When the series completed its second season with weaker ratings, cancellation was definitely in the offing, and NBC confirmed the show was borderline. This time, fan reaction was intense. For the first time in TV history, viewers actively campaigned to save a TV series. Fans picketed NBC headquarters. Petitions and letters flooded the network. Newspapers and magazines publicized the reaction.

Although Roddenberry claimed that he had little to do with the letter campaigns, Solow contends, "It was a manufactured campaign that Roddenberry waged, using students at several engineering universities, including Cal Tech and MIT." NBC made an unprecedented on-air announcement in March 1968, following the broadcast of the episode "The Omega Glory," that the series would continue for a third year. When Roddenberry didn't get the 7:30 p.m. Monday slot that NBC had originally promised for 1968-69, he reversed his decision to personally produce the series' third season. He felt the 10 p.m. Friday time slot was certain death for the series. Producer Fred Freiberger was brought in.

"The ratings were falling, and NBC wasn't happy with the show or Roddenberry," recalls Freiberger. "If it hadn't been for the loyalty of the fans, Star Trek would have definitely ended after the second season." The new producer was given the daunting task of turning Star Trek into a ratings success. "Usually when a new producer comes in, he wants to scrap everything. I wanted to keep doing what they had been doing. A network researcher told me that one reason the ratings were poor was that women were afraid of something as infinite as space. Although we had female fans, the network hoped to boost ratings by getting more women to watch. I tried to get more romance into the series. I also wanted to give the subsidiary actors more meaningful things to say than just 'warp 3.' We made it more of an ensemble show.

"Because of budget, we had to set every fourth show aboard the Enterprise. However, that didn't necessarily mean we couldn't do good shipboard stories. It gave us the opportunity to do some morality plays and make some nice statements."

As the third season struggled in the ratings, Freiberger found the budget tightening. "The studio was watching every nickel. At one point, a production guy said to me, 'Look at William Shatner's breakfast charge. He's charging 15 dollars every morning for meals.' At that time, that was a lot of money. They asked me to talk to him about it. I said, 'Bill, what do you eat for breakfast?' He said, 'Ham, bacon, eggs, coffee and juice.' I said, 'That comes out to only seven bucks!' He replied, 'It's my dog-he eats the same thing for breakfast.' I said, 'Bill, if you don't tell anyone about this, I'll forget we had this conversation.'" As the series reached its end, relations between the network and Roddenberry didn't flourish. "It's true that NBC didn't like Star Trek "

, notes Freiberger. "When Roddenberry first introduced me to the network staff, I was shocked by the contempt with which Roddenberry treated them. That's when I realized they didn't like Roddenberry or the show and he didn't like them." "NBC resented Roddenberry for the way he painted them as losers and as the enemy," agrees Herbert Solow.

Nevertheless, there were those at NBC who regularly defended Star Trek. Throughout its run, the late Mort Werner (NBC's vice-president of programming) and NBC programming research executive Paul Klein publicly praised the show. As Klein told TV Guide, "It's the only science fiction show with a scientific base." "Mort Werner was very supportive of the show, and I know Gene Roddenberry thought very highly of him," says Robert Justman. "But he was in New York. Mort wasn't one of the people we dealt with on the West Coast. Paul Klein, who was a very bright man, was also supportive, but his position at NBC was such that all he did was deliver research to the people at programming."

"Mort Werner and Grant Tinker were staunch supporters of Star Trek," adds Herbert Solow. In the end, however, it was the ratings that ditched the series after three years on NBC. "I don't think Star Trek ever got into the top 40," says Freiburger. "Today, if you have a 22 or 25 share, you're a smash hit. In those days, we ran a 25 to 29 share. After the first year, the ratings kept going down, and historically, that slide continues." "That third season was a rough year," says DeForest Kelley. "We lost Roddenberry's touch because he was at war with NBC. We knew this would be our last year."

"We knew darn well we wouldn't continue in that 10 p.m. time slot," adds Robert Justman. However, only two years earlier, the infamous 10 p.m. time slot had turned another slow starter, The Man from U.N.C.L.E., into a top ten smash. Moreover, Star Trek's competition in its last year was the buckling Judd for the Defense on ABC and an unusually weak package of CBS movies. In addition, Star Trek had a good lead-in, the pseudo-intellectual Name of the Game. Furthermore, Star Trek had received months of free publicity created by the historic letter-writing campaign. Yet Star Trek still lagged with a 25 share.

Margaret Armen offers perhaps the most practical explanation. "Many people didn't watch Star Trek because they were firmly anchored in the Earth," she says. "My husband, a high school teacher, never watched Star Trek, not even my episodes. He'd say, 'I can't relate to something about a spaceship warping out of the solar system. It's like a fairy tale.' I think many other intelligent people felt the same way. Engineers I knew always watched it, perhaps because an engineer's mind is always thinking of the mechanics of the future. I always felt the series was rooted in a future reality and that it was certainly within the realm of possibility. The network executives, as well as some people at Paramount, thought the show was a fluke. I felt they were crazy not to recognize Star Trek's virtues."

Star Trek left NBC in the fall of 1969, but many people felt there was more to come. "That's true," says Al Francis, Star Trek's director of photography. "When we had a wrap party in 1969, Gene said, 'One thing we're not gonna do is take anything apart. We're going to keep the sets standing because I think we're going to be back.' The sets remained for sometime." Mort Werner actually tried to launch a 90-minute TV movie version of Star Trek, with the original cast, for the fall of 1970. 'Although Gene called me, Jim Rugg (special effects) and Matt Jeffries (art director) in later, saying Paramount was going to do a film, we never heard anything else. I know Gene wanted to do a Star Trek feature as early as 1968. He was a terrific writer and a real brain."

In syndication, Star Trek gained momentum like a rolling snowball. In January 1972, organizers of the first Star Trek convention in New York anticipated 300 fans. Over 3,000 showed up. TV Guide's feature article on the convention in March 1972 made millions of other fans aware of the show's popularity. From this point on, there was more talk of reviving Star Trek as a TV movie. Talks constantly stalled, although NBC did air a 1973-75 Saturday morning animated version of Star Trek. The show, featuring the voices of the original cast, won an Emmy in 1975 as best children's show.

"Kids were Star Trek's audience," says Freiburger. "On the network it had been a failure. In syndication, kids got it at 5 and 6 p.m. and made it a smash." As conventions, reruns and fan clubs continued to thrive, Paramount announced a new Star Trek series for 1978, with most of the original cast. "Paramount called in various writers, and they wrote about 30 scripts," recalls Margaret Armen, who co-wrote one script with partner Alf Harris. "We were signed up for the TV pilot when suddenly Paramount decided to go with Star Trek-The Motion Picture," recalls DeForest Kelley. The 1979 film was followed by five sequels: The Wrath of Khan (1982); The Search for Spock (1984); The Voyage Home (1986, the most successful of the film series to date); The Final Frontier (1989); and The Undiscovered Country (1991).

Meanwhile, the 79 TV episodes continued to break syndication records. Although some critics, infuriated by the series' cult status, have directed super-critical slaps at the shows' plots and 1960s sexism, the fact remains that most of Star Trek's stories have withstood the test of time. The torch was passed to a new TV Enterprise in 1987. The new cast set off in the series Star Trek: The Next Generation, which proved a ratings smash in first-run syndication. Roddenberry died in 1991, but his legacy continued with a Next Generation spinoff titled Deep Space 9. This saga debuted in 1993 to good ratings. Another spinoff, Voyager, premiered in 1995. Even after twenty years, the original Star Trek reruns continue to be popular in syndication. Although it has typecast some of the actors, they're still popular speakers at conventions around the world. Asked about the convention circuit, DeForest Kelley replies, "The question I'm asked most is what was my favorite episode. That would be 'City on the Edge of Forever.' And I've been asked, 'If I had to do it over again, would I choose to do Star Trek?' The answer is YES."

CAST NOTES

William Shatner (Captain Kirk): Born 1931. Canadian-born actor who became one of TV's busiest actors after Star Trek. In the 1980s he starred in T.J. Hooker (1982-86) and in the 1990s hosted the series Rescue 911. He's also an author (The Tek INar series and Star Trek Memories). Leonard Nimoy (Mr. Spock): Born 1931.

One of his earliest roles was as a Martian in the film Zombies of the Stratosphere (1953). Nimoy spent two years as agent Paris on Mission: Impossible (1969-71). An acclaimed stage actor (Sherlock Holmes, Vincent Van Gogh), Nimoy also found success as a motion picture director in the 1980s (Three Men and a Baby, The Good Mother and two of the Star Trek films, The Search for Spock and The Voyage Home).

DeForest Kelley (Dr. McCoy): Born 1920. Had it not been for acting, Kelley claims, he probably would have become a doctor. (He has, however, contributed much to the world of medicine: "I am constantly receiving letters from physicians who went into medicine as a result of watching Star Trek.") Kelley was usually cast as a villain in numerous films and TV shows in the 1950s and 1960s. His post-Star Trek TV appearances in the 1970s included The FBI, The Virginian, Room 222 and Ironside.

Nichelle Nichols (Lt. Uhura): Born 1936. As Star Trek's first season came to a close in 1967, Nichols was poised to leave the show. It was Martin Luther King who convinced her to stay on the series and provide a role model for young black women. Nichelle worked closely with NASA in the 1970s and 1980s on their recruiting program. James Doohan (Scotty): Born 1920. This Vancouver-born actor admits his career slowed down considerably after being typecast as the starship's engineer. Since Star Trek, he's done guest shots on Magnum P.I., Fantasy Island and MacGyver. He's a frequent guest speaker at Star Trek conventions.

George Takei (Sulu): Born 1939. One of Takei's earliest jobs was to dub English dialogue over Japanese science fiction films. He also branched off into L.A. city politics. His many TV appearances include Miami Vice, MacGyver, Hawaii 5-0, Baa Baa Black Sheep and Magnum P.I.

Walter Koenig (Chekov): Born 1935. Frustrated by his stalled acting career following Star Trek, Koenig turned to writing TV scripts and novels. In 1990, he received acclaim (along with co-star Mark Lenard) for the play The Boys in Autumn. Majel Barrett (Nurse Chapel): Born 1935. She married Star Trek creator Gene Roddenberry in 1969. She held a recurring role as Lwaxana Troi (Deanna's mother) in Star Trek: The Next Generation.

William Shatner would later go on to create his own sf show TEKWAR. Walter Koenig had a recurring role in the SF show BABYLON 5. 'I realised that by creating a separate world, a new world with new rules, I could make statements about sex, religion, Vietnam, unions, politics and intercontinental missiles. Indeed, we did make them on Star Trek; we were sending me messages, and fortunately they all got by the network.' (Gene Roddenberry, creator/producer).

Britain came late to Star Trek. By the time we joined the Starship Enterprise for its five-year mission to boldly go where no man had gone before, that mission was practically over. Back in America, the series had been axed by NBC after a three-year run. The battles - to keep a pointy-eared alien in the crew, to keep a negro on the bridge, even just to keep the show alive - had been fought and won . . . and finally lost.

Or so it seemed. In the end this is one show that has run and rerun, its stamina virtually unsurpassed. Today, boosted by a cartoon series and the fleet of feature films, and kept alive by the devotion of its fans, Star Trek remains a multi-million dollar industry. And the series, with its unforgettable characters and catchphrases, has become an indelible part of Western culture. They even named a space shuttle Enterprise in its honour.

Yet Roddenberry had had to fight to keep Spock in the show in the face of a network initially unwilling to welcome him aboard, in the belief that nobody would relate to him. Leonard Nimoy, too, was reluctant about the part. He believed the ears would wipe him out as an actor. Roddenberry promised him an 'ear job' after the 13th episode if he was still unhappy. He wasn't. Star Trek's special effects weren't elaborate, but they were memorable. The Enterprise itself consisted of several different models, ranging in size from three inches to 14 feet.

The warp drive, phasers, photon torpedoes and communicators became an integral part of the show but the most famous trick was the transporter, the device used to 'beam' the crew down to nearby planets. Aluminium dust was thrown into a beam of light to enhance the dematerialisation effect. But every assessment of Star Trek's enduring appeal has always come down to two things - its humanity and its optimism. The crew's lineup reflected a united mankind, a society free of racial and sexual discrimination. Aside from the half-caste science officer, it had a black woman, Lt Uhura, as head of communications, and the navigators were Japanese (Mr Sulu) and Russian (Chekov was reputedly added to the crew when a Pravda critic acidly noted that the first nation into space was unrepresented on the Enterprise). Each episode was a morality tale and the series constantly maintained an indomitable faith in man as an essentially noble animal. Flawed maybe, a little impulsive at times, but with his heart in the right place.

And so it was with Star Trek. For all its faults-and critics have always loved to pick holes - its heart was in the right place. As Roddenberry remarked: 'We were probably the only show on American television that said there is a tomorrow, that all the excitement and adventures and discoveries were not behind us.'

Out of all the science fiction television shows ever produced, Star Trek is without a doubt the most popular. Since its debut over 30 years ago, Star Trek and its characters have gained the status of cultural icons. Although its original network run only lasted three years (1966-1969), the series returned for two more years of animated adventures in 1973 and then in 1979 Star Trek returned for what would be the first of six big budget theatrical movies. In 1987 the first of three (to date) spin offs, Star Trek the Next Generation appeared. This series was followed by Star Trek Deep Space 9 in 1993 and Star Trek Voyager in 1995. The latest Star Trek series used the Star Trek name to launch a whole new network!

Star Trek, as first envisioned by its creator Gene Roddenberry, was to be a 'Wagon Train to the Stars'. The series told of the adventures of the starship Enterprise commanded by Captain James T. Kirk. The ship was sent on a five year mission 'to seek out new life forms and new civilizations and to boldly go where no man has gone before'. The Enterprise was the flagship of the United Federation of Planets- a group of planets devoted to peaceful coexistence. Set in the 23rd century, the ship was sent on a variety of missions including: peace-keeping, exploration and diplomacy. Serving under Captain Kirk was a multi-racial crew something that was ground-breaking in the 1960's. Mr. Spock was the ship's unemotional half-Vulcan first officer and science officer, originally envisioned as a minor character. He quickly became one of, if not the, most popular characters on the series. Dr. McCoy was the Enterprise's overly emotional chief medical officer who fancied himself something of an old fashioned southern gentleman. Scotty a Scotsman, was the ship's chief engineer. Uhura, a black, was the ship's communications officer. Sulu was the ship's oriental helmsman. Chekov was the ship's Russian navigator who was added to the cast in the second season.

Unlike most other science fiction series of the time, Star Trek was not a monster of the week programme, nor did it concentrate on gadgets or techno-babble (something which cannot be said of its namesakes!). The series did win one Emmy award for its special effects. Most of these effects appeared dated today, the one that still holds up is the transporter. The transporter was developed as a money-saving device. It would allow people and objects to be beamed out of the Enterprise in a display of sparkles and onto a planet's surface or another ship. This avoided having to have the Enterprise land on a planet each week!

Star Trek concentrated on strong character development. Its three main characters Kirk, Spock and McCoy all became good friends who genuinely cared for one another. Yet at most times, Spock's continued efforts to repress the human side of his personality were met with nothing but barbs from Dr. McCoy. Star Trek also tended to offer social commentary. Roddenberry likened it to Gulliver's Travels. NBC would not allow a TV series to make a social commentary on the Vietnam conflict, but another war set in outer space could be shown and commented upon. The series offered a statement saying that we would survive into the 23rd century despite the problems we as a society were forced to face and overcome.

During Star Trek's initial run, the series was not a ratings success. It did however have many devoted fans who caused NBC to renew Star Trek through a huge letter writing campaign after NBC cancelled the show at the end of the second season. The third season was to be the last. The series suffered in quality during the third season due to a smaller budget and the fact that Roddenberry no longer had direct control of the programme. Star Trek's final new episode was broadcast on 3 June 1969. The 79 episodes were sold into reruns where they found the audience they never had on NBC. This success did not go unnoticed at NBC, which decided to bring Star Trek back, not in its original form, but in the form of an animated show.

The animated Star Trek episodes were a half hour long and debuted in 1973. Twenty-two new adventures were produced featuring the voices of all the original cast except for Walter (Chekov) Koenig. Many of the animated adventures were sequels to episodes from the live action series. The animated episodes had many factors in their favour: the primary one being unlimited storytelling potential. In the live action version of the show, budget had always been a problem. A new planet had to be built entirely from scratch and exotic looking aliens had to be created with expensive make up. However, in animation where everything is drawn, it costs the same to have a fleet of alien spacecraft in battle as it would to have two people talking. Therefore, the animated episodes took us places and showed us aliens that the live action ones could not such as the underwater setting of Ambergris Element and the giant intergalactic zoo of In the Eye of the Beholder.

NBC handled the show as poorly as the original. It was given an early Saturday morning time slot, and thus geared down the technical aspects somewhat for the time's juvenile audience. Many fans of the show tend to overlook or ignore the animated episodes. Animated Star Trek however did manage to stay above the level of most other Saturday morning series with many stories on a par with that of the live action series. Animated Star Trek was too cerebral for its target audience. Instead of moving the show to a slot in prime time as many critics suggested NBC cancelled it.

Throughout the 1970's the reruns of the original episodes continued to become more and more popular. Plans that Star Trek was coming back either as a theatrical feature or as a TV series, were constantly being made then changed. At one point the Star Trek was to come back as a new TV series which was to help launch a new Paramount TV network. Sets were built, scripts were written, several new roles were cast and then the project was canned. Over in the theatres Star Wars was becoming the most profitable movie of all time. Someone at Paramount took notice and figured that a big budget science fiction theatrical film based on a proven property could also produce huge profits. Star Trek the Motion Picture was put into production and arrived in theatres on 7 Dec 1979, over a decade after the last new live action episode was broadcast.

The first movie was somewhat a disappointment. Its huge budget seemed to be used almost entirely on special effects. The story was somewhat lacking. The film's plot dealt with an alien ship of great destructive potential heading towards Earth. Kirk reunited his original crew, many of whom had gone their separate ways, on a refitted Enterprise to stop the menace. It turned out that the alien device was a Voyager space probe which had been sent from Earth in the 20th century, it was modified by aliens to vastly increase its capabilities and was now heading home to find its creator. If this story seemed familiar it should, it is the same scenario used in the second season Star Trek episode The Changeling.

Changes in approach were made for the second film. Star Trek II: The Wrath of Kahn (the best of the Trek movies). Featuring the return of Kahn from the episode Space Seed, this film also introduced Kirk to the son he did not know he had and killed off Spock. The third movie picks up where the second left off. Kirk managed to destroy the Enterprise in the process of bringing Spock back to life. (No one really expected him to stay dead.) The fourth film completed a trilogy, with the former crew of the Enterprise traveling back in time to the 20th century to find a whale and save the world.

The often maligned fifth Star Trek movie, The Final Frontier, does not deserve its poor reputation. It is much more like a typical episode of the TV series than any of the other films.

The final Star Trek film. Star Trek VI: The Undiscovered Country, is the last planned film to star the original crew. Events in this movie set the way for peace between the Federation and its long time Klingon adversaries. Michael Dorn, who plays Worf on STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION and STAR TREK : DEEP SPACE NINE appeared in the film as an ancestor of Worf.

Star Trek Generations, originally planned to feature bit roles for all of the original crew only featured appearances by Kirk, Scotty and Chekov. In this film Kirk got his big death scene as he helps Captain Picard defeat a madman inside the fantasy world of the Nexus. Since the two part episode The Menagerie is counted as one and The Cage is included in this count, both numbering systems have 79 episodes.

Today, boosted by a cartoon series and the fleet of feature films, and kept alive by the devotion of its fans, Star Trek remains a multimillion-dollar industry. And the series - now known simply as "Classic Trek" - with its unforgettable characters and catchphrases, has become an indelible part of western culture. Watching it has become the TV equivalent of comfort eating; you know there are better things to do but you just can't help yourself. . .

Star Trek received its UK premiere on the 12th July 1969, on BBC1 and shown in colour from the 15th November 1969. While many of the Star Trek episodes enjoyed regular showings on British television, three episodes - "Plato's Stepchildren", "The Empath" and "Whom Gods Destroy" - only received their UK premieres on 22nd December 1993, 5th January and 19th January 1994 respectively.

The executive producer for the series was Gene Roddenberry, producers were Gene Roddenberry, Gene L. Coon (late season one, early season two), John Meredyth Lucas (late season two) and Fred Freiberger (Season Three). Story consultants were Steven Carabatsos, D.C. Fontana and Arthur H. Singer. The theme was composed by Alexander Courage. The associate producers were Robert H. Justman and John D.F. Black, the costume designer was William Ware Theiss.

Actors of note to have starred in Star Trek include Ricardo Montalban (who would recreate his character for Star Trek II: The Wrath of Khan), Joan Collins, Vic Perrin, Mark Lenard (later to play Sarek, in many of the films and STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION), Julia Newmar (Catwoman from BATMAN), Diana Muldaur (who would later be a regular cast member on STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION), and Lee Meriwether (who starred in THE TIME TUNNEL).

While science fiction on television certainly didn't begin with Star Trek, every-thing that has come along since has been measured by it, including several of the other series covered in this book. In the 1991 celebrations surrounding the twenty-fifth anniversary of Star Trek, little note was made of the fact that the international debut of the show occurred two days earlier than the official date. On September 6, 1966, Star Trek premiered on Canadian television. It was a full two days later that the American premiere took place on NBC. The episode aired was not the pilot (that was shown two weeks later) but the sixth episode filmed, "Man Trap." The choice of this tale to kick things off was a wise one. "Man Trap" included the three leading characters who would come to mean Star Trek for generations to follow. First in order of creation was the character of Spock, Gene Roddenberry's logical alien, who had been part of the original series concept back when the captain of the Enterprise had been, in Gene's mind, one Robert April. Spock served under one other captain before the helm was passed to the third, most famous one, James T. Kirk.

The third character, Dr. Leonard "Bones" McCoy, would not have been in on things from the start if the episodes had been aired in the order in which they were filmed. It was fitting that this seemingly cynical but strongly compassionate humanitarian, who would provide a constant counterpoint to the cold logic of Spock, should be on hand for the first broadcast of Star Trek. With him on board, Star Trek was launched. "Man Trap" featured Dr. McCoy's apparent reunion with his old flame Nancy, now married to archaeologist Robert Crater. Unfortunately, Nancy is actually dead and is being impersonated by a shape-shifting creature that lives off the body salt of other living creatures. Although on the surface a "monster" story, the salt vampire is actually an intelligent being capable of conversing with humans.

The third episode broadcast, "Where No Man Has Gone Before," was in fact the pilot that had sold NBC on the series. This episode had been filmed beginning on July 21, 1965, and had taken six months to finish, at a cost of $330,000. (The standard per-episode budget would be set at about $180,000.) The Star Trek of this pilot was different from the form that it would soon assume. Uhura had not yet joined the roster, nor had Yeoman Janice Rand. The ship's doctor, Dr. Piper, was portrayed by Paul Fix; and Sulu was a physicist, not the helmsman. Several characters in key roles appeared only in the pilot and, as noted, Dr. McCoy was nowhere to be seen. To further feed the mania of future trivia enthusiasts, Kirk's middle initial was given as "R" in this episode!

The show really began to hit its stride with "The Naked Time," which gave the Star Trek cast a chance to show off their range when an alien microbe opened up the ship's crew to their inner-most personal conflicts. Kirk's love of the Enterprise warred with his knowledge that his command kept him from having a normal life. Spock's dual heritage led to even more divided behaviour, and he was seen to actually weep. This solo Spock scene was actually written by Nimoy and they were barely able to fit filming of it into the schedule.

Star Trek can be credited with many things—who would have believed, in 1966, that so many terms and phrases from the series would work their way into common parlance? Star Trek also was the first show to use the by-now-dreaded cliché of the evil twin—a device used countless times since to give a series star more time on screen. In the case of Star Trek's pioneering use of this plot trick, "The Enemy Within" escaped when a transporter malfunction divided Kirk into two diametrically opposed selves. William Shatner, allegedly hungry for time on-camera, made the most of this concept. He was duplicated again in the episode "What Are Little Girls Made Of?" Shatner would again get to play a duplicate of himself in the third-season episode "Whom Gods Destroy" when Kirk faced off with a shape-shifting madman—and, twenty-five years later, in Star Trek VI, he'd still be at it! In another first, the Enterprise wound up in dire need of fresh dilithium crystals in "Mudd's Women", one of the three scripts proposed for the second pilot submission, which also introduced Roger C. Carmel as the rascally space swindler Harry Mudd.

The Vulcan mind meld, which conveniently served as a means of avoiding a lengthy expository conversation with a mentally deranged character, was introduced in "Dagger of the Mind." "The Corbomite Maneuver", is a story with a famous twist at the end, as an alien turns out to be young Clint Howard (most recently seen playing a scientist on the SF series Space Rangers). But the next two broadcasts consisted of "The Menagerie," which incorporated much of the footage from the first Star Trek pilot, "The Cage."

"The Cage" had been filmed with a cast drawn from the original format, although the captain's name had been changed from Robert April to Christopher Pike. Pike was portrayed by Jeffrey Hunter, who had the rare distinction of having once played Jesus Christ, in King of Kings. Leonard Nimoy appeared as Spock, but the character was a bit different from its later developments, as the logical aspect of his future personality belonged to the character Number One, portrayed by Majel Barrett.

"The Menagerie," as recounted in flashbacks by Spock, revealed a nascent version of the Enterprise crew as it is headed toward a Starbase after a disastrous first contact with an alien culture. In the story, Pike and crew were tired and in need of rest, but were distracted by a distress signal from a nearby planet.

When they investigated, they discovered a colony of scientists who had survived a crash, nearly twenty years earlier . . . and a beautiful young girl, Vina (Susan Oliver), who the survivors claimed was born just as their ship crashed. Something seemed odd, and when she lured Captain Pike away from the encampment, he was abducted by dome-skulled aliens and taken below the surface. The scientists and their camp, merely an illusion designed to lure humans, disappeared. This, told in flashbacks, ends ultimately with Pike's escape—but now he wishes to return to live out his life in a happy illusion, a quest that forms the framing device of Spock's explaining his reasons for taking over the Enterprise.

"Balance of Terror" introduced the Romulans and marked the first appearance of Mark Lenard in the series. It also featured a bigoted crewman, an aspect Roddenberry would violently object to years later in Star Trek VI as being out of sync with his view of the future of humanity in the twenty-third century.

"Shore Leave," written by Theodore Sturgeon, marked the first time a leading Star Trek character dies, only to return intact. (This time around it was McCoy.) It also has one of the longest fight scenes (between Kirk and Finnegan) in the history of series television.

"Tomorrow is Yesterday" was the first solid time travel story for Star Trek, in which the Enterprise was hurled back to the twentieth century by the gravitational field of a black hole. "Space Seed" introduced Ricardo Montalban as Khan, a late-twentieth century fanatic who, with his followers, has been adrift in a "sleeper ship" for hundreds of years. Star Trek is the most popular science fiction concept to ever appear on television, fathering two more series and a series of movies. "This Side of Paradise" took the Enterprise to a colony that should have died of radiation poisoning years earlier, but survived because of spores that also provided a constant sense of euphoria. The crew all fell prey to this, rendering them unfit for (and uninterested in) their duties. Spock once again had his emotions liberated and fell in love, briefly, with a young botanist, played by the lovely Jill Ireland. Spock is called a Vulcanian in this story, a bit of a glitch in retrospect!

A notable Trek creature, "The Devil in the Dark", was the Horta, a silicon-based creature that has been killing miners in the underground colony of Janus VI. "Errand of Mercy" sent Kirk to the peaceful pastoral world of Organia, which was in danger of Klingon attack; Klingon/Federation relations had become increasingly strained, and war seemed imminent. The Organians were in fact completely evolved beings whose human forms were a disguise, and, after defusing the conflict, they promised to keep a watchful eye on the enemy factions. "The Alternative Factor" involved the battle between Lazarus and his antimatter double Lazarus; the fate of the universe hangs in the balance, and once again hinges on the need for dilithium crystals.

"The City on the Edge of Forever" is regarded as one of the best Star Trek episodes. Harlan Ellison's original script was rewritten by Gene Roddenberry, which has become a long-standing source of annoyance for Ellison. Ellison's original version won the Writers Guild of America award for screenwriting excellence. "Operation: Annihilate" featured William Shatner in a second role: that of the dead body of Kirk's older brother George, complete with a mustache and grey hair. This personal tragedy was discovered on the planet Deneva, where alien parasites were attacking humans and driving them to their deaths with excruciating pain. This episode's effectiveness was somewhat diluted by the fact that the creatures look like enormous airborne fried eggs. Held to a wall with electromagnets, these creatures fell to the ground when hit by phaser fire.

The second season of Star Trek began with "Amok Time," which also marked the first time DeForest Kelley received billing in the opening credits of the show. The story involves Spock acting decidedly strange and sulky. McCoy determines that the Vulcan officer will die if something is not done about the physical changes he's undergoing. Spock tells Kirk that he is undergoing pon farr, the Vulcan mating cycle, which will be fatal if he doesn't get to Vulcan and undergo the proper rituals posthaste.

Kirk bucks orders and reroutes the Enterprise to Vulcan, only to die, which had to come as a bit of a surprise for viewers. When the series was being rerun in the seventies, I heard of a case where a new fan watching this episode for the first time panicked when Kirk was declared dead.

The cast of Star Trek was altered to include a new character in the second season as well. The network was pressing for a character to rope in the "youth" market, something along the lines of Davy Jones of The Monkees. A press release (later revealed to have fabricated the incident) claimed that the show was criticized by the Russian Communist newspaper Pravda for, among other things, its lack of a Russian character in the Enterprise's otherwise multinational crew. To kill two birds with one stone, Roddenberry supposedly created the character of Ensign Pavel Chekov, a young officer with a heavy accent, to satisfy Soviet angst. Signing on as Chekov was actor Walter Koenig. Initially Koenig wore a wig until his hair grew long enough to match the look Roddenberry wanted him to have.

"The Changeling" was Nomad, an ancient Earth probe that had merged with an alien device and was convinced that its mission was to destroy imperfect life-forms. Unfortunately, humans fit its criteria perfectly. Fortunately, it thought that Captain Kirk was the scientist Roykirk, the scientist who created it. Thus, it repaired Scotty after killing him (second Trek resurrection) out of deference to Kirk. It was still a threat, but Kirk managed to trick it into destroying itself. (In retrospect, this seems to have been one of his specialties.) "Mirror, Mirror" cast Kirk, McCoy, Scotty, and Uhura into an alternative universe where the Federation developed along bloodthirsty, Klingonesque lines. Written by Jerome Bixby, this remains one of the ten best episodes of Trek Classics.

"The Apple" was the gift Kirk brought to the peaceful, Eloi-like inhabitants of a dangerous world where their existence was protected by an ancient computer, which also had retarded their social development. The Prime Directive notwithstanding, Kirk completely destroyed their social order and saved the Enterprise as well. In "The Doomsday Machine," Commodore Matthew Decker, the sole survivor of the crew of the U.S.S. Constitution, took over the Enterprise in order to avenge himself against the device that wiped out his ship.

(The basic idea would be reworked in "The Immunity Syndrome," but with a giant space amoeba!) This episode featured extensive use of special effects, including an AMT model Enterprise with the decal numbers switched around to stand in as a different starship. "Catspaw" involved the efforts of two shape-changing aliens to frighten the Enterprise crew with all the accoutrements of human superstition: magic, skeletons, witches, and the like. Written by Robert Bloch, it was the Halloween episode of the second season.

"Journey to Babel" finally introduced Spock's par-ents, the Vulcan Sarek (Mark Lenard) and his human wife Amanda (Jane Wyatt). While Mark Lenard plays the stoic Vulcan, this does establish his character in the series. Although not seen on the TV series again, Lenard has appeared in three of the Star Trek motion pictures and two episodes of Next Generation as Sarek. "The Deadly Years" afflicted Kirk and his main officers with a deadly disease causing accelerated aging. Shatner showed the least physical changes in the episode because of the actor's dislike of wearing a lot of special makeup. "The Trouble with Tribbles" was a comical episode in which Klingons and furry little creatures that reproduce at an alarming rate threatened the peace on the Enterprise and an important grain ship-ment. Fortunately, the tribbles that ate the grain revealed that it was poisoned by a Klingon spy, and all ends well, with the Klingons getting stuck with the remaining tribbles.

"A Piece of the Action" was another humorous episode in which Kirk discovers a civilization that has modeled itself on the society described in a book left by a Federation mission one hundred years before. David Gerrold pitched an idea during the first season of The Next Gerleration that would have been a sequel to this episode in which Picard and company visit this planet to discover that now the culture is patterned after Captain Kirk, Spock, and everything involving the original starship Enterprise, but Roddenberry didn't go for the idea. "A Private Little War" took place on the planet Neural, where Klingons were providing arms to escalate a tribal conflict preparatory to their own invasion. Kirk sought someone he knew on his last visit to this world, the leader Tyree, but was attacked by a vicious Mugatu, a horned yeti like being, and became deathly ill from its poison.

"Return to Tomorrow" found Kirk, Spock, and Dr. Anne Mulhall lending their bodies to the disembod-ied minds of Sargon, Henoeh, and Thalassa, respec-tively, who were the sole survivors of their advanced civilization. "Patterns of Force" featured another civilization tampered with by a Federation emissary. In this case it was historian John Gill, who had tried to create an ordered society by using the structure of Nazi Germany.

This scheme had unfortunately backfired, and Gill was drugged and used as a figurehead by Melakon, a very unpleasant fellow. Gill's former history student, James Kirk, and Spock investigated, were captured, escaped, and saved yet another addle-brained culture from itself. This was one of several Star Trek episodes wherein the Enterprise visits a planet whose culture is patterned after a period of Earth's history. "By Any Other Name" ultimately concerned alien spies who assumed human form only to be con-founded by their own newfound human nature. James Doohan has an amusing scene in which he gets an alien drunk.

"Omega Glory" featured yet another parallel his-tory: the warring Kohms and Yangs paralleled the Communists and Yankees of the Vietnam War era. A starship captain had set himself as warlord with the Kohms; Kirk and Spock finally rallied the Yangs when Kirk realized that their sacred words were actually a distortion of the preamble to the U.S. Constitution! All in all, one of the more heavy-handed episodes of Star Trek, and it was written by Gene Roddenberry to boot! Roddenberry submitted this script to NBC to consider as a possible Star Trek pilot script. "The Ultimate Computer" was installed on the Enterprise, took command, and decimated the crew of another starship when it mistakenly interpreted some Federation war games as an actual attack. This features Captain Kirk once again displaying his uncanny ability to talk a computer to death.

"Bread and Circuses" took Kirk and crew to a world with a history parallel to that of Earth, with one exception: this world's equivalent of the Roman Empire had lasted well into the twentieth century. (This was undoubtedly very convenient as far as the wardrobe department was concerned.) The story also has a subplot involving a Christianity parallel which is used to provide a twist ending. It's still a weak episode in spite of that.

"Assignment Earth" incorporated the script of a pilot proposed by Roddenberry into the Star Trek continuity. Once again, the Enterprise crew travelled back into the past, this time to 1968. Here they met Gary Seven (Robert Lansing), a human (suppos-edly) trained by aliens to defend Earth. Kirk and Spock followed him to New York. Seven's mission was to prevent the launching of a Star-Wars-type orbiting defence system that will actually prove dis-astrous to humanity. With the help of Roberta Lincoln (Teri Garr) he managed to evade Kirk, but the captain eventu-ally catches up with him; Seven then manages to convince the captain of the importance of his mis-sion, and the space bomb is destroyed. The story ended with a hint that Seven and Roberta would have more adventures, but a spin-off series never materialized.

The third season of Star Trek began with a tale rightfully regarded as one of the worst Treks ever. In "Spock's Brain," the object in question is stolen. Don't worry, they get it back. In a bit of logic never explained, when Spock's brain is installed inside a computer, the voice of the computer is Nimoy's even though Spock's body was left behind on the Enterprise when his brain was stolen.

"The Enterprise Incident" sends the Enterprise on what is essentially an espionage mission: Kirk feigns a mental breakdown and takes the ship into the Neutral Zone. Outgunned by Romulans, he is captured, and Spock denounces his actions. McCoy beams to the Romulan ship just as Kirk attacks Spock; Spock kills Kirk with the Vulcan death grip and the body is beamed back to the Enterprise.

Of course, there is no Vulcan death grip, and Kirk is revived, surgically altered to look like a Romulan, and beamed back to steal the Romulan cloaking device, the real object of this mission, while Spock diverts the attention of the Romulan commander, an attractive woman with a keen inter-est in the Vulcan. The Enterprise makes good its escape once Scotty gets the stolen cloaking device installed and working.

This cloaking device never made another appearance in the series, apparently because no one was interested in maintaining the continuity. We never do quite learn how Scotty can take a piece of Romulan technology and adapt it to working order in the Enterprise. Ever try making two completely incompatible computer systems work together when one of them is completely unknown to you?

"Is There in Truth No Beauty?" is the question posed when a Medusan comes on board; this race cannot be looked upon by humanoid eyes. Kollos, who stays in a protective case, is accompanied by the telepathic Dr. Miranda Jones. Marvick, an engi-neer on board, has been in love with Jones for years, and is driven by jealousy to try to kill Kollos. The sight of the alien drives him mad, and he goes, crazed, to engineering and casts the ship into strange, uncharted regions of space.

The Medusan's amazing navigational powers are the only hope; Spock performs a mind meld wearing protective eyeglasses, but inadvertently looks at Kollos without them and is driven mad, too, after the ship is saved. Jones, who is revealed to be blind, must overcome her own jealous attachment to Kollos in order to help Spock. This episode features a spectacular special effects scene of the Enterprise at the edge of the galaxy.

In "The Tholian Web", Kirk is stranded on a ship that is drifting between dimensions. His air supply is limited, and rescue efforts are hindered by the fact that this area of space causes humans to act aggressively toward each other. The Tholians, an unknown race, show up, accuse the Federation of trespassing, and begin to spin the web of the title. Spock eludes them, and Kirk is rescued just in the nick of time. Since Shatner is missing for acts two and three, one wonders how he tolerated Nimoy's having more lines than him in this episode, as Shatner was a notorious line-counter in scripts.

"Wink of an Eye" describes the condition of the Scalosians, whose radioactive water has sped up their life rate so fast that they can only be perceived as a buzzing noise. When Kirk drinks some of this water, he can perceive them, but his crew cannot sense him. The Scalosians plan to use him to repop-ulate their world. McCoy devises an antidote but Spock must first drink some water and be sped up himself in order to find and save the captain. This episode has the scene in which we see Kirk with a lovely girl and he's pulling his boot on in his bed-room.

"The Empath" is Gem, a beautiful mute woman. Kirk and McCoy are kidnapped and tortured by aliens; Gem is an empath who can absorb their pain and injuries, healing the terrible agonies inflicted on them. McCoy's injuries threaten to kill him, but she prevents this, risking her own life. This cruel test turns out to have a humane motivation, of sorts: two planets are threatened by an imminent disaster, but the aliens can only save the inhabitants of one, and have been trying to determine which race is more worthy of survival. Patterned in style after The Outer Limits episode "Nightmare," the story is largely filmed on simple sets unlit in the background so that the actors are constantly surrounded by blackness. It is effective for the mood of the story.

"Elaan of Troyius" is on the Enterprise heading to a diplomatically advantageous marriage, but she's more interested in Kirk; when she cries, the touch of her tears chemically induces Kirk to fall in love with her. Klingons confound matters, but all works out when Elaan's jewels turn out to be dilithium crystals. Kirk ultimately breaks free of her spell and she proceeds with her important mission. A simple-minded riff on Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew, the show uses Kirk's obsession with the Enterprise as the reason he's able to break the psychochemical spell the Dohlman is able to inflict with her tears.

"Let That Be Your Last Battlefield" tackles prejudice by reducing it to absurdity. Lokai, late of the planet Cheron, is half-black and half-white, being neatly bisected, pigmentwise, right down the middle. When he shows up on the Enterprise, he is pursued by Bele, who looks exactly the same, except that his coloration makes him a mirror image of Lokai. When the Enterprise finally reaches Cheron, after nearly being demolished by the battles between the two passengers, the planet is revealed to be completely dead. Lokai and Cheron beam down to their world to continue their ancient, pointless conflict to their deaths. Late in the episode it ran short so we're treated to seeing Bele and Lokai running down corridor after corridor until they finally reach the transporter room.

"Requiem for Methuselah" takes Kirk and crew to Holberg 917G in search of the antidote to a deadly disease.

There they encounter a Mr. Flint and Reena, a beautiful young lady, and Kirk falls for her right off the bat. Eventually it is discovered that Flint is actually an immortal who lived on Earth for centuries; among his aliases were Da Vinci and Brahms. Without Earth's atmosphere to preserve him, his immortality is nearing its end. Reena is the last of a series of androids he has constructed to keep him company. This bothers Kirk more than a bit, so Spock obligingly clears Kirk's mind of the unhappy memory. That last scene where Spock says "Forget" is particularly touching as this was the last episode rerun on NBC in August 1969, when the show was cancelled.

"The Way to Eden" is sought by the charismatic but crazed Dr. Sevrin and his youthful disciples, who could only be described as space hippies. Walter Koenig, who played the youth-oriented Chekov, was forced to act like a pro-establishment stiff when he met the hippies. In "The Savage Curtain" the Enterprise is hailed by Abraham Lincoln, who just happens to be float-ing in space nearby. It could happen!

"All Our Yesterdays" involves another time portal through which Kirk, Spock, and McCoy pass. This one is located on the planet Sarpeidon, whose people have fled an impending nova by relocating to various different periods in their past history. Kirk goes through first and winds up in an era similar to Reformation England, where he is in danger of being killed as a witch. Spock and the doctor find themselves in a prehistoric ice age, where the Vulcan reverts to his ancestors' lustful ways and becomes involved with a woman, Zarabeth.

They believe that they cannot return to their temporal starting point without dying, but this is not actually true as they did not undergo the necessary treatments. Meanwhile, Kirk resolves his troubles with the help of another time traveller, and manages to reclaim his friends and get back to the ship just before the nova destroys the planet. The episode ends with a nice special effect shot of the Enterprise leaving a solar system while a star goes nova in the background.

"Turnabout Intruder," the final Star Trek episode to be filmed, was dubbed "Captain Kirk, Space Queen" by the crew. Here, a woman once spurned by Kirk in favour of his Starfleet career gets her revenge by switching bodies with him and taking over his ship! Spock determines the truth of this by using a Vulcan mind meld on Dr. Janice Lester's body, where he finds the mind of Kirk, but has a hard time convincing anyone that Kirk's body is occupied by a woman. Eventually, McCoy is brought in on this, only to be accused of mutiny along with Spock, and sentenced to death. By this point, everyone realises that something is drastically amiss, and Kirk shakes off the effects of the mind transfer. This is a strange episode, as Janice Lester is portrayed as a woman who hates being female and is jealous of Kirk largely because he's a man.

With this, the series ended its initial network run (summer reruns notwithstanding) and seemed fated for oblivion. It had already been the focus of two letter campaigns: the first, organized by Harlan Ellison, had been signed by noted science fiction authors in an attempt to get good science fiction writing on the air; despite Ellison's contribution and the presence of such writers as Robert Bloch and Theodore Sturgeon on the show, Ellison, for one, felt that the show failed to live up to its potential. The second letter campaign was organized by fan Bjo Trimble and is generally given credit for saving the series during its second season; it could also thus be deemed responsible for the third season and such clunkers as "Spock's Brain." But nothing would save Star Trek now-except syndication. And, of course, that is history. After Star Trek came the many sequels which were STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION, STAR TREK : DEEP SPACE NINE and STAR TREK : VOYAGER.

STAR TREK: DEEP SPACE NINE

Set in the 24th century concurrent with Star Trek the Next Generation Star Trek Deep Space Nine is the first Star Trek spin off which was not created by Star Trek creator Gene Roddenberry. Star Trek Deep Space Nine is also the first Star Trek series not set on a ship named Enterprise. Star Trek Deep Space Nine is set on a space station built by the Cardassians as an ore processing plant which is located near the planet Bajor. The station has been taken over by Star Fleet and renamed Deep Space 9, its original Cardassian name being Terok Nor.

Both the Cardassians and the Bajorans are alien races which had been introduced in Star Trek the Next Generation. The Cardassians are a warrior race who had previously been at war with the Federation. an uneasy peace currently exists between them. The Cardassians had also conquered and occupied Bajor for the past 50 years. The Bajorans are an ancient society which is strongly influenced by its religion. At the centre of this religion are mysterious orbs that have arrived on the planet Bajor at the rate of about one a century. The orbs are believed to have been sent from the prophets, due to the fact that they can induce visions in people who come near them. During the occupation, Bajoran terrorism became a significant problem for the Cardassians. Just before Star Trek Deep Space 9 begins the Cardassians have unilaterally withdrawn from Bajor. Both because of the problem with terrorists and due to the fact that most of Bajor's resources have been stripped away by Cardassian mining operations.

After the Cardassian withdrawal, the political situation on Bajor has become very unstable. Once the goal of getting the Cardassians to leave was accomplished, the many individual factions on Bajor have resumed ages old conflicts. Fearful that the Cardassians may return, the Bajoran people have asked for membership in the Federation, they have been granted preliminary acceptance. As part of the process. the Federation has sent a team of Star Fleet officers to take command of Deep Space 9: not an easy task since the Cardassian station was not extremely well built to begin with and they managed to trash the place before evacuating it. The Star Fleet team is commanded by Commander Benjamin Sisko and its main mission is to spearhead the arduous diplomatic and scientific efforts that accompany Bajor's lengthy entry procedure into the Federation. A Star Fleet presence on Deep Space 9 also sends a message to the Cardassians that they are not welcome to return. Something they are not all that inclined to do since Bajor has little strategic importance. This situation changes by the discovery of the Bajoran worm hole.

A worm hole is a short cut in space. A spaceship can enter it through one end and seconds later come out thousands of light years away. All other known wormholes are unstable, the location of their entrances can move around, and they exist for brief periods of time before collapsing. The Bajoran wormhole however is unique. It is stable, with one end near Deep Space 9 and the other in the Gamma Quadrant, which is located too far away to travel to by conventional means. The wormhole is discovered in the pilot episode of Star Trek Deep Space Nine. Its existence becomes an economic boom to Bajor since it opens up thousands of new worlds for commerce and scientific exploration and all ships wishing to journey to the Gamma Quadrant will have to first come to Bajor. In the pilot it is also revealed that the wormhole has been artificially created by a species of aliens that do not live in the same space-time continuum as we do. They live inside the wormhole itself and have sent the orbs out in the hopes of contacting intelligent life. After Commander Benjamin Sisko is the first to encounter these aliens. he is given the title of Emissary of the Prophets by the Bajoran religion. A title he does not readily accept.

Like Star Trek the Next Generation, Star Trek Deep Space Nine features an ensemble cast, with no single character or characters dominating all of the episodes. Not all of the characters come from a Star Fleet background, which gives them different agendas. Thus at times they are at odds with one another which creates an inter-personal conflict which was sorely missing in Next Generation. The cast of Star Trek Deep Space Nine consists of:

Commander Benjamin Sisko, human Star Fleet officer in charge of the station. He is a widower who has a teenage son Jake. His wife was killed several years earlier by the Borg under the command of Captain Picard, and he still resents Picard because of this.

Sisko's second in command is Major Kira Nerys, a former major in the Bajoran underground. Kira is now an outspoken critic of the new Bajoran government. She has had a life of hardship having spent most of it fighting the Cardassians whom she still loathes. As a freedom fighter she did things to the Cardassians, some of which now plague her conscience. Now she is an official representative of the Bajoran government, ultimately answerable to them, not Star Fleet.

One recurring character from Star Trek the Next Generation became a regular on Star Trek Deep Space Nine, Chief Miles O'Brien. He became promoted to Chief of Operations on Deep Space 9, causing him lots of headaches trying to keep the mixture of Cardassian and Federation technology working. O'Brien does not like the Cardassians since he lost a good friend to them during their war with the Federation and they forced him to kill. O'Brien's wife Keiko and their young daughter Molly make irregular appearances on the show.

The science officer on Deep Space Nine is Lt. Jadzia Dax, who at first appears to be an attractive woman in her late 20s. Dax however is a Trill, a member of a weird joint species first introduced in an episode of Star Trek the Next Generation. A Trill is a being which is comprised of two separate but interdependent entities: a humanoid host and a wormlike symbiont living inside him or her. The symbiont's life span is far longer than the hosts and, as a result, one symbiont will be combined with several hosts during its lifetime. When one host dies, doctors surgically remove the symbiont and place it inside another. The symbiont part of Jadzia Dax is named Dax while the humanoid portion's name is Jadzia, not everyone from her world gets to have a symbiont placed inside of them and it is considered an honour to be joined. Dax is 300 years old, a brilliant scientist with an innate wisdom who can draw upon a library of knowledge built of six lifetimes of experience. Dax and Sisko had been close friends while Dax was in his previous host Curzon. Curzon was an elderly man who was a mentor and friend to Sisko. Sisko at first has trouble adjusting to Dax's new form, which creates a certain amount of tension between the old friends.

Deep Space 9's chief medical officer is Dr. Julian Bashir, a young human whose first assignment after graduating from Star Fleet Academy is Deep Space 9. He is a brilliant Doctor who graduated second in his class, specialising in multi-species medicine. He arrives at Deep Space 9 a bit naive and very eager to prove himself, something which can become a bit annoying. Bashir also develops a crush on Jadzia Dax, who repeatedly is forced to turn him down.

Quark is a Ferengi bartender who owns the bar located on the promenade area of Deep Space 9. The promenade is an area of Deep Space 9 which is a lot like a present day shopping mall, featuring a variety of independently run businesses. Like all Ferengi, Quark is interested solely in the accumulation of wealth. He is not above breaking the law to do so and Odo, the head of Deep Space 9's security, places him at the top of the list of suspects whenever some type of scam occurs on Deep Space 9. Quark is assisted in running the bar by his dim-witted brother Rom and his nephew Nog, who wants to become the first Ferengi in Star Fleet.

The security chief on Deep Space 9 is Odo, Odo is an alien who appears to be a middle-aged curmudgeon. Appearances can be deceiving since Odo is a shape shifter whose natural state is as a liquid which he must revert to at regular intervals. He was the chief of security while the Cardassians ran Deep Space 9 a role that the Federation allows him to continue since he is extremely savvy about the goings on the station. When the series began, Odo had no idea of his origins. He had been found 50 years earlier drifting in space with no memory. He lived among the Bajorans as a freak. He eventually decided to assume a humanoid form in order to fit in with society. He has however been unable to imitate the humanoid form perfectly, which prevents him from assuming the identity of another character. This however is a talent that other members of his species do possess.

Odo's people turn out to be one of the new villains that the Federation has to face. His people are from the other side of the wormhole and are known as the Founders of the Dominion, a group who are feared. The first contact they have with them is with their troopers the Jem'hadar. When they are actually encountered for the first time it is revealed that they are all shape shifters who hate non shape shifters or solids as they refer to them and have set out to control them instead of being used by them on both sides of the wormhole. To battle the threat imposed by the Dominion, Sisko is given command of the Defiant, the prototype of a ship designed to battle the Borg.

The Defiant is built for fighting and speed not for luxury. It is used in situations demanding more firepower than DS9's small, lightly armed runabouts. The Dominion is also responsible for the break up of peaceful relations between the Federation and the Klingon Empire. Due to differing beliefs in how to deal with the threat of the Dominion, a war almost erupts between the two forces at Deep Space 9. Worf, from Star Trek the Next Generation, the only Klingon officer in Star Fleet is transferred to Deep Space 9 in the hopes that he will be able to deal with his people better. He remains stationed on Deep Space 9 after the initial confrontation was resolved.

Michael Dorn who played Worf in both STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION and Star Trek : Deep Space Nine joined the crew in an attempt to make next generation fans tune in. It failed mainly due to the power of shows such as HERCULES and XENA: WARRIOR PRINCESS.

In an unusual departure for the STAR TREK franchise (the first live-action tv spin-off was STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION and this was the second) ST:DSN is set on a space station (newly occupied by the Federation) orbiting a planet, not a starship. The effect of this more enclosed and stationary world is slightly to emphasise characterisation and personal conflict among the occupants of the station, many of whom do not belong to Starfleet, and to reduce the number of episodes featuring exploration and the discovery of strange alien races and artefacts.

However, the station is dramatically situated: it is close to a stable WORMHOLE leading to an unexplored area at the other side of the galaxy, the Gamma Quadrant; the planet below is inhabited by the spiritual-natured Bajorans first encountered in a fifth season episode of Star Trek: The Next Generation: "Ensign Ro"; the station itself has just been vacated by the militaristic Cardassians, persecutors of the Bajorans who are still in the vicinity, and as an alien construct lacks the comforts of Federation starbases. The series is set towards the end of the time period covered by Star Trek: The Next Generation.

The regular cast are the station commander, Benjamin Sisko, played by black actor Avery Brooks; his non-Starfleet second in command, a Bajoran, Major Kira Nerys, played by Nana Visitor; science officer Jadzia Dax, a Trill (humanoid and internal slug acting in symbiosis, currently female but the previous humanoid partner in the symbiosis was an old man), played by Terry Farrell; the young medical officer Julian Bashir, sometimes aggressive, sometimes naive, usually a womaniser, played by Siddig El Fadil; the non-Starfleet Security Chief, Odo, a shape-shifting alien of unknown origin, played by Rene Auberjonois; Chief of Operations Miles O'Brien, a human, played by Colm Meaney; Quark, the opportunistic and greedy Ferengi proprietor of the station's bar and gambling casino, one of an alien race of merchants and entrepreneurs introduced in ST:TNG, played by Armin Shimerman; Jake Sisko, the 14-yr-old son of the commander, played by Cirroc Lofton.

As an ensemble the cast is efficient, with Odo and Dax both being very interesting characters, and some good "morphing" effects when Odo changes shape. The "Q" character from ST:TNG makes several appearances. Various sinister beings appear through the wormhole from the Gamma Quadrant, and the last episode of the second season introduced a new alien race, the Jem'Hadar, who live in the quadrant. But the response from ST fans to the series has been a little luke warm, and it has not come close to rivalling the high ratings of its immediate predecessor, in part perhaps because of competition from the other new space-station program, the harder-edged BABYLON-5 (1993-).

Spin-off novels had reached, by early 1995, Star Trek: Deep Space Nine#11: Devil in the Sky (1995) by Greg Cox and John BETANCOURT. There are also young adult book spin-offs.

A cast change occurred at the end of the sixth season with the likeable Lt. Jadzia Dax being killed off, played by Terry Farrell, she didn't leave the show in the best of terms with many contradictory rumours as to why she had left the show were flying around Hollywood. The Dax Symbiot which had resided in Jadzia was passed onto a new host in the form of Ezri Dax played by Nicole DeBoer, who had starred in the SF children's show DEEP WATER BLACK. Also in the seventh season Bill Mummy, who had starred in BABYLON 5 and LOST IN SPACE, also guest starred as a Starfleet officer confronting the Jem'Hadar. Patricia Tallman who also starred in BABYLON 5 also provided much of the stunt work for the seventh season.

Star Trek's enduring appeal has been its sense of wonder and adventure, with two generations of enterprising explorers boldly going in search of whatever lay 'out there'. As a mission statement, 'to boldly go' struck an immediate and lasting chord. But when Star Trek: Deep Space Nine dumped a new bunch of Starfleet officers on a remote, ramshackle space station that was going nowhere, the crew found themselves facing their deadliest enemy yet -bored Trekkies.

'To boldly sit' didn't have quite the same ring to it - and no amount of grit or personal conflict could make up for that sense of something being missing. It was hardly surprising then, that by the third season the DS9ers had been given a ship of their own, the Defiant, to go off exploring in, while the Trek dynasty had expanded still further with a fourth series, STAR TREK: VOYAGER, that promised to take fans into new, uncharted territory.

Sisko - played by Avery Brooks who had been Robert Ulrich's shadowy friend Hawk in Spenser: For Hire - should have been a chip off the heroic block. But, at the series' outset, he's a man eaten up with bitterness against Enterprise captain Jean-Luc Picard whom he blames for the death of his wife three years earlier when, as Locutus, Picard had led a Borg attack on the starship they were serving on.

Their personal conflict is played out in the pilot story, Emissary. Sisko's First Officer is a Bajoran woman, Major Kira Nerys, a prickly ex-freedom fighter who suffers the Federation presence as a means of keeping the Cardassians at bay. The outpost's Security Officer is Odo, a grumpy, shape-shifting alien whose natural form is a pool of gelatinous liquid.

Science Officer is Lt Jadzia Dax. One of the 'joined species' known as the Trill, she's a 300-year-old parasitic lifeform (symbiont) in the body of a beautiful woman (the host). DS9's Medical Officer is Dr Julian Bashir, a wet-behind-the-ears medic fresh out of Starfleet Academy with lofty ideas about heroic adventures in the wilderness.

Bashir regularly gets on the nerves of Chief Operations Officer Miles O'Brien, the down-to-earth ex-Transporter Chief from the Enterprise, and the only really familiar face in the new series. That is, unless you count the jug-eared visage of Quark, the typically lascivious and greedy Ferengi owner of DS9's sleazy bar and casino, which comes complete with the ultimate in safe sex, a computer-simulated brothel known as the holosuites. Quark rubs along with Sisko, but is a thorn in the side of Odo.

Sisko also has to contend with his 14-year-old son Jake, a troubled adolescent still wounded by his mother's death. O'Brien, too, has family troubles as his wife Keiko and their daughter Molly have, of course, transferred to DS9 with him. But Keiko would rather be back on the Enterprise.

Regular Next Generation guests, Q, Vash and Lwaxana Troi all made cross-over appearances in the new show.

For Armin Shimerman, who stars as Quark, this was not his first time in Ferengi make-up. He had played one of the first Ferengis encountered in the Next Generation series. Rene Auberjonois who plays Odo was best known previously as the snooty Clayton Endicott III in the sitcom Benson.

By the end of the Season Two, Deep Space Nine was looking in better shape to carry the Trek torch towards the millennium.

Teasing hints of a powerful alien force beyond the wormhole had climaxed in the introduction of an evil enemy known as the Jem'Hadar, soldiers of the Dominion who rule the Gamma Quadrant. With the arrival of the Defiant - a powerful, fully-weaponed ship three times the size of a DS9 runabout, Season Three begins with a two-part story, The Search, in which Sisko and Co set off to search out the Founders of the Dominion and confront the Jem'Hadar in a fierce battle. Part two of the story is directed by Jonathan Frakes, thus further cementing the ties between Deep Space Nine and Next Generation.

Season Three played out that story with the Founders of the Dominion revealed as Odo's race of shape-shifters - though Odo himself resisted their repeated attempts to lure him back to the fold. Jonathan Frakes also made a guest appearance in the third season, as his maverick 'twin', as DS9 showed marked signs of improvement. But in the US ratings were still declining, and it took the return of another Next Generation regular to bring the series back up to warp speed.

Michael Dorn was persuaded to pull on the prosthetics once again as everyone's favourite Klingon, Worf, who was pressed back into service as Sisko's new diplomatic liaison when executive producer Rick Berman decided to unravel the shaky peace treaty between the Federation and the Klingon Empire. However, Dorn's name wasn't the only new one added to DS9's credits for Season Four. The Sudanese-born artist formerly known as Siddig El Fadil sent merchandisers into a spin by changing his oft-mispronounced name to Alexander Siddig.

Season Five opened with the DS9 crew infiltrating the Klingon Empire to expose Gowron as an imposter Changeling and, to celebrate Trek's 30th birthday, there was a Forrest Gump-like fusion of the DS9 cast with Kirk and Spock as they were in classic Trek's The Trouble With Tribbles. Plus: Kira gives birth to the child she's carrying for Keiko. Also returning: Quark's mum and his Klingon 'wife' Grilka. However you won't see so much of Sisko's precious Defiant - it was all but destroyed in the eighth Trek movie, First Contact.

Executive producers for the series were Rick Berman, Michael Piller and Ira Steven Behr (from season four). Story editor was Peter Allan Fields, the producers for the series Ronald D. Moore, Peter Allan Fields (Season Two), Peter Lauritson (from Season Two), Rene Echevarria (from Season Three), Hans Beimler, Steve Oster (both from Season Four). The creative consultant for the series was Michael Piller (from season Three).

The various guest stars who have appeared in the show include Patrick Stewart (STAR TREK : THE NEXT GENERATION), Felecia Bell (NIGHTMAN), John de Lancie, Caitlin Brown (BABYLON 5), John Glover, Megan Gallagher (MILLENNIUM), Tim Russ (STAR TREK : VOYAGER), Daphne Ashbrook, K. Callan (LOIS AND CLARK), Michael Ansara, Jonathan Frakes (STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION), Tracy Scoggins (LOIS AND CLARK), Patricia Tallman (BABYLON 5) and Mark Kay Adams (BABYLON 5). Star Trek : Deep Space Nine, began in the UK on the 15th August 1993 on Sky One.

Just as rumours begin to emerge that The Next Generation will only run through a seventh season, another new television version of Star Trek is aimed at the small screen. January 1993 marks the deep space launch of Star Trek: Deep Space Nine. Ironically this was announced shortly after the death of Gene Roddenberry. The timing led to speculation that had Roddenberry lived, this series wouldn't have. Suspicions along these lines were raised, particularly after descriptions of the new series filtered out. "It's going to be darker and grittier than The Next Generation," executive producer Rick Berman stated in the March 6, 1992, Entertainment Weekly. "The characters won't be squeaky-clean."

And yet to the fans, Star Trek has always meant just that-squeaky-clean heroes. What would Gene Roddenberry have thought of this? After all, people close to him have stated that Gene hated Star Trek VI merely because it postulated Enterprise crew members who were anti-Klingon bigots. Rick Berman insists that Deep Space Nine is not going to be his and executive producer Michael Piller's own personal take on Star Trek. He states that this will be just another way of expressing Gene Roddenberry's vision, which will be fitting and consistent with everything that has been done with Star Trek before. In fact, Deep Space Nine was developed under Gene's guidance and with his input.

Regarding Roddenberry's influence on Deep Space Nine, Piller explained, "Every writer knows that we have a responsibility to maintain his vision. We take it very seriously. I got a letter from twenty-five grade-school children, and the teacher, who said, 'Please, we use Star Trek as an example of life in the future and the optimistic view and the hope that Gene gave us. We've heard that this is going to be dark and dreary.' And the truth is that it is not."

"The truth is that there is more conflict," Piller said trying to put the show and its various elements into perspective, "that we're in a part of the universe that is giving us more conflict. And the fact that we are on an alien space station instead of the Enterprise will allow us to do that. But it is the same Gene Roddenberry optimism for the future of mankind that drives the vision of this show. There is not going to be any more shooting, more weapons or battles or anything like that. Certainly we're going to have action. It's going to be an adventure show and it's an entertainment show. We wanted to find the camaraderie that existed in the original Star Trek, like that relationship between McCoy and Spock, and in order to do that you have to have differences, and differences between the characters on The Next Generation are not so clearly defined."

Michael Piller never had any doubt that there was room for a third Star Trek series. He feels that Gene Roddenberry created a huge universe of characters and concepts. "Gene used to say, somewhat in kid-ding, but in a way to communicate what he wanted to do with Star Trek, that space was like the old West, and that Star Trek was like Wagon Train. In that whole genre of the West there were dozens of television shows. In the universe that Gene has created there is room, not only for a Wagon Train, but also for a Gunsmoke. In essence what I think we're doing is the counterpart to the kind of shows you saw on the old West where you have a Fort Sheridan on the edge of the frontier, and a frontier town in a very active area with a lot of people coming through it."

It started back in October of 1991, when Piller and Berman began developing the show and decided to set the series in the same time frame as The Next Generation. "That was a decision made consciously to take advantage of all of the alien races; the universe that has been developed over the last five years of The Next Generation. Because we have characters we want to bring onto Deep Space Nine that we've seen on The Next Generation and we love. We've got political situations. We've got relationships with the Romulans, Klingons, and Cardassians."

The Cardassians form the continuing threat in the series as the space station is right on the edge of Cardassian space. The Bajoran home world, which is the planet around which Deep Space Nine is in orbit, was ravaged by the Cardassians before they left it as they were overthrown by the Bajorans in a civil war. This left the Bajorans in a sorry state as the planet had been so severely damaged in the war that the Bajorans were left with nothing with which to rebuild. This is why the Bajorans have turned to the Federation and requested admission. The brutality and ruthlessness of the Cardassians are made particularly evident in the episode "Chain of Command."

The presence of warring cultures was also key to the basis of the series. "Our whole goal was to create more conflict everywhere you turn in this series. So what you have as a result are people who have different agendas. You've got Major Kira, who is a Bajoran, who really doesn't want the Federation to be there, and as a result she and Sisko are in conflict. You've got Odo and Quark who are in conflict. You've got Sisko and Quark who are in conflict. Everywhere you turn you've got conflict in the show. But what we found as a result of that is not only good drama, but a lot more humour than we expected to have."

"The idea for Deep Space Nine grew out of the political situation that we created for a show called 'Ensign Ro' last season on Next Generation. We did not create Ensign Ro as a potential spin-off, but for all intents and purposes, that's where the tableau was set for this." Berman and Piller wrote several different versions of the series bible while it was being developed. When they finally showed a later version to Paramount, the studio had its own input into the project. In fact, Brandon Tartikoff (before he left Paramount) suggested that the show might be something like The Rifleman in outer space. The studio's suggestions were weighted and incorporated into the series concept to produce the final result used now. The father-and-son element that Tartikoff was talking about did appeal to Berman and Piller and that element is very much a part of the series. The series bible is called that because it serves as the basis of development for the entire series. All of the characters and their relationships are outlined in it as well as the background of everything used in the series.

Rick Berman and Michael Piller are both veterans of The Next Generation and Piller came on board following experiences writing on staff for Simon and Simon and Miami Vice. Piller got involved in television first as a journalist. He began in CBS Hollywood checking the accuracy of docudramas. His ambition was to become a producer to protect what he wrote because of all the rewriting done to television scripts. Piller had also previously worked on the short-lived science fiction series Hard Time on Planet Earth. He became acquainted with producer Maurice Hurley, who invited him to meet with Gene Roddenberry, which led to an episode assignment.

Shortly after this, Maurice Hurley left The Next Generation and Piller was invited to join the production staff as Maurice Hurley's successor. "For the next year or so," said Piller, "Gene was really on my case and certainly Rick was on my case; day after day, we went through the creative process as I began to learn to see life through Gene Roddenberry's eyes. Even as he became sick and trusted Rick and I more and more to execute this vision, to this day, even in death, he is an extraordinary influence on both of us." Michael Piller's job as executive producer of Deep Space Nine primarily involves overseeing the writing and development of ideas for the series. In this capacity he oversees the staff writers and works with the writer of each and every script. Rick Berman participates in that somewhat while Piller also contributes to Berman's speciality, which is overseeing the production, editing, post-production, music and other aspects of producing the series.

Deep Space Nine is set aboard a space station in orbit around the planet Bajor. The space station is being used by the Cardassians to exploit the mining resources of the Bajoran home world. When the Bajorans finally overthrow the despotic rule of the Cardassians, the Federation places personnel aboard Deep Space Nine to oversee its operation and make sure everything stays cordial and co-operative. While the Federation personnel will not be acting as police, their presence is consciously there to discourage the Cardassians from trying to bother the newly liberated Bajorans. Since the Bajorans have applied for membership in the Federation, their presence there is by the invitation of Bajor.

The Bajorans have been seen previously as they are the race to which Ensign Ro belongs. Ensign Ro was introduced in season four and became a semi-regular on The Next Generation in season five. She was most prominently featured in the fifth season in the episode "The Next Phase." While Ensign Ro is an ex-terrorist who was more or less drafted into Starfleet because of her expertise in certain matters, Deep Space Nine will deal with a different aspect of the Bajorans. Ensign Ro was initially announced as appearing in this new series, but the actress, Michelle Forbes, chose to bow out to pursue other projects.

"We had intended to bring that character with us to Deep Space Nine," Michael Piller explained on the QVC cable channel on December 5, 1992, "but the actress, who we love, Michelle Forbes, simply wasn't interested in doing a series. So after we had actually written a bible and created a script, we had to write that character out of it." A different actor Nana Visitor, has been cast in the role of the Bajoran regular on the series. She plays Major Kira Nerys, Sisko's first officer and the station's Bajoran attache. She stated, "The thing that is the most exciting is the script, and the fact that the women in the show are very strong, very powerful, and that it's a lot to do with what's going on in the world right now." Kira Nerys will be portrayed as a strong action hero of the kind who would even lead a rescue mission. '

The space station was established by the Cardassians and the Bajorans in conjunction with other alien races. As a result it reflects cultural needs and biases often unfamiliar to some Starfleet personnel. The station was considered of remote interest until the first fixed wormhole was discovered near the star system where Bajor is located. This wormhole, because of its nonfluctuating nature, can be explored and plotted and is the first stable wormhole known to exist. It's also discovered that it can be used as a gateway to a distant, unexplored quadrant of the galaxy. A new starship class, called the runabout, makes its first appearance in this series. The wormhole will form a key element of the series, and Piller states that, "Some very strange things have already come out of it in the first ten shows."

Set in the year 2360, the new series is contemporary with The Next Generation.

While the extent of crossovers between the two series has yet to be fully determined, Star Trek: Deep Space Nine will be launched with a two-hour premiere which, at the very least, will include a stopover from the Enterprise and Jean-Luc Picard. Starfleet personnel accustomed to the clean, modern conveniences of starship life will find very different things to contend with aboard the space station. These will reportedly include a casino and a holographic brothel as the space station also serves as a port of call for merchant ships.

The direction of the stories hasn't yet been revealed, but the proximity to a wormhole that leads to an unexplored region of the galaxy seems to indicate that expeditions in that direction will form as much of the story line as explorations into the greasy underside of a run-down space station.

Deep Space Nine is slated to feature seven or eight regular characters. The commander of the space station is Benjamin Sisko (played by Avery Brooks?), a Starfleet captain who was serving with his wife on board one of the vessels attacked by Picard when he had been transformed into Locutus of Borg. The man's wife was killed in the attack and he had been rotated back to Earth in semiretirement to recover from the ordeal. His command of the space station is his first active-duty post since his wife was killed about three years before. Needless to say, he harbours some ill will toward Picard and finds it difficult to accept that Picard was completely helpless to stop the attack. Along with him on Deep Space Nine is Sisko's son, Jake, played by Cirroc Lofton.

Deep Space Nine continues the tradition of Star Trek, set in the same time as The Next Generation. "We felt that a father and son relationship would be a different relationship than any other Star Trek kind of hero that we've seen before," Piller explained. When Sisko first arrives at the space station, he doesn't consider it a very good assignment. The station is not operating very well and it seems to be an assignment on the edge of nowhere.

As Piller described the character, "He has found himself at a place in his life that he can't quite get beyond and he's sent to this space station. He doesn't like this assignment because the space station was built by the Cardassians who have just abandoned it. The Bajorans are struggling with the potential of civil war. It's in the middle of nowhere, when we start the show, and he's given this job and basically Picard is there to greet him when he gets to Deep Space Nine."

Sisko is not happy with his assignment, but all this changes when the stable wormhole is discovered and the importance of station Deep Space Nine becomes elevated immeasurably in the eyes of the Federation. In further describing this character, Piller said, "He is sent on a quest and in this whole pilot episode it is a personal quest for this man who has lost his way and must conquer the dragon (in another genre). In this case he must conquer his personal dragons in order to move on with his life and to grow as a man and to be a good father and to be a good officer. What we will find in this show is a man who is coming to Deep Space Nine, but is coming to find himself."

Another character is a shapeshifter, Odo, who is also a security officer. This alien came from a world on the other side of the wormhole, but he does not remember his past, having been found as an infant aboard a drifting spacecraft. In order to fit in among the people who found him, he has chosen to adopt a humanoid form, but his efforts at maintaining this form are imperfect. The producers have stated that this character will be used to explore the nature of humanity and what truly defines one as being human. In this way he will occupy the position of Spock and Data as those characters have been used to act as a mirror of humanity in the other two Star Trek series.

Being neither part-human nor an android, the tack will be completely different from that taken with either Spock or Data. Odo is being played by Rene Auberjonois and is already being touted as one of the main characters to emerge from the series. "He is the curmudgeon of all curmudgeons," Piller stated. "So instead of Data, who worships humanity and wants to be that, and Spock who would deny it, Odo has been forced to pass as a humanoid all of his life, to look like us and act like us because it's a lot more socially acceptable than being a chair all your life if you're a shape-shifting life-form. He sort of resents it. So he has now found a way to use it as a defence mechanism and keep a distance from it and find ways to be critical of the human condition."

The alien's actual appearance is a formless blob. "He is only one of a kind," Piller revealed. "He was found near where this wormhole shows up, as an infant in a spacecraft, which we are going to assume probably came out of the Gamma Quadrant. He has no idea where he came from and he's always searching for his identity." Regarding the makeup that disguises the actor somewhat, he explained, "It's a mask but it feeds what I feel is in the script for the character and I find it very evocative." One plot thread which has been revealed regarding Odo is that Majel Barrett will appear at some point as Lwaxana Troi and will become a romantic interest for the alien shapeshifter. When he reveals to her that he has to turn into a bucket of liquid every night, she unhesitatingly replies, "That's okay. I can swim."

The alien, Odo, had come out of the wormhole in a spacecraft fifty years before and had served the Cardassians on the space station long before Starfleet determined that Deep Space Nine had strategic importance. Odo adopted human form in an effort to better acclimate to this galaxy and the people he encounters. The alien is just as willing to assist Starfleet as he has aided the Cardassians for the past half century. With Starfleet planning to explore the galaxy through the wormhole, he believes that he may at last uncover the clues he needs to unlock the secrets to his past. Colm Meaney, whose role as Miles O'Brien, the transporter chief, has been growing on The Next Generation, is transferred from the Enterprise in the premiere episode of Deep Space Nine, where he will become master of operations. His character changes are explored as the viewers compare his Enterprise duties with his duties on Deep Space Nine.

"We've always thought he was a terrific performer," Piller stated, "and now we're giving him something much more interesting to do as a leading character on the new show. He is pulling his hair out from one minute to the next because everything is breaking down. He can't get the replicators to make a good cup of coffee; his wife Keiko is terribly unhappy about having been taken off the Enterprise and come over to this dreadful space station. So he finds himself in an uncomfortable position."

The science officer aboard the space station is played by Terry Farrell, who appeared in Hellraiser III. Farrell plays Lt. Jadzia Dax, an alien known as a Trill. The Trill were introduced in the Next Generation episode "The Host," where we were shown that the Trill are a dual species that join to become a single entity. Since the sex of the host body is unimportant to the Trill, the three-hundred-year-old Dax now inhabits the body of a young woman. Previously Dax inhabited the body of an older man who was a mentor of Captain Benjamin Sisko's. But Sisko finds that he's physically attracted to Dax in its new body.

Originally they had conceived Dax as being a very serene and focused character, but according to Piller, "The more we've written her, the more we're finding that she is not what she appears to be. That underneath this placid exterior, there's all these various personalities that she's gone through that are in turmoil and there's a lot of inner conflict. You know all the voices we hear inside of ourselves are all made up of different subpersonalities; well she's got them all screaming at her in a variety of different ways." On the human side again, Siddig El Fadil plays Dr. Julian Bashir, a Starfleet medical officer in his mid-twenties. His youth and inexperience will be emphasised since he has just graduated from Starfleet Medical and this is his first post outside of the Sol system. Bashir thinks he knows it all and has a knack for rubbing people the wrong way.

Armin Shimerman plays a Ferengi bartender named Quark in the new series-one of the shifty, untrustworthy aliens introduced in year one of The Next Generation. He has his hands into all sorts of illegal and improper activities going on behind the scenes aboard Deep Space Nine. His ongoing presence will be one of the constant conflicts aboard Deep Space Nine, but as a series regular, he'll be in a position to have a more fully developed character than any Ferengi presented to date. In fact, he will forge a friendship of sorts with Benjamin Sisko, and will be liked (but not entirely trusted) by his compatriots.

The actor explains that, like The Next Generation, in Deep Space Nine the staff has created "fascinating aliens that have three sides." One of the more interesting relationships on the show is that between Quark and Odo, the shape-shifting security officer, as they're sworn enemies who have an ongoing verbal conflict. Even before the series aired those involved with the show were predicting that Quark would emerge as the most popular character. Executive producer and series co-creator Michael Piller has stated that it wouldn't be out of the question to see such characters as Q or Lwaxana Troi turn up on the series. This could also mean appearances by Klingons, Romulans, and perhaps even the Borg. While the producers have revealed that the Enterprise and Captain Picard are definitely slated to appear in the premiere episode, how full the crew roster of the Enterprise will be in that story is still being negotiated.

The reason that Paramount wanted a new Star Trek television series to run concurrent with The Next Generation is that Paramount presently envisions ST-TNG lasting seven seasons, which will give the studio a healthy syndication package of about 170 episodes. Deep Space Nine will run concurrent with the last year and a half of the first-run episodes of Next Generation. This will serve to help establish Deep Space Nine so that when The Next Generation goes into reruns, a new and different Star Trek series will already have been established and in place in the syndication market. Star Trek: Deep Space Nine is being syndicated with another new Paramount series, a revival of the fifties series The Untouchables.

By establishing Deep Space Nine as being contemporary with The Next Generation, even after TNG goes off the air, characters from that series could still turn up on the new series. With the highly rated appearance of James Doohan on The Next Generation in the fall of 1992, Doohan has been urging Paramount to add him to the cast of Deep Space Nine. Less certain are rumours about Shatner expressing interest in participating in Deep Space Nine. It's hard to believe that back in the seventies, many people were saying that Star Trek was just old news and that nothing would ever be done with the premise again.

Commander Ben Sisko takes command of the Bajoran space station Deep Space Nine, formerly Terok Nor, recently abandoned by the Cardassian Empire. The discovery of the first stable wormhole, controlled by time-independent aliens, worshipped by the Bajorans as gods (called Prophets), gives Sisko religious significance as the aliens Emissary. This is part one of the two hour pilot, which was later cut into two episodes, and introduction to the characters.

STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION

Next Generation is set some 78 years after the original mission. The new Enterprise, NCC 1701-D, is eight times the size of the old one, with a complement of 1012 crew and their families.

And with the new ship came a new cast and a new captain, the somewhat aloof Frenchman Jean-Luc Picard. Played by English Shakespearean actor Patrick Stewart, Picard is an older, balder man than Kirk, and less impulsive, less headstrong. Stewart, a Yorkshireman, was virtually unknown in America. In Britain he had played Sejanus in the BBC's I, Claudius and had starred as psychiatrist Eddie Roebuck in a 1981 series, Maybury, Star Trek has turned him into a TV icon.

Heading up a strong supporting cast is Jonathan Frakes as Picard's First Officer, Riker, the Kirk-style man of action. The Chief Medical Officer is a woman, Dr Beverly Crusher (played by acting coach and choreographer Gates McFadden) and there's a healer of minds aboard, too - the telepathic, half-human, half-Betazoid ship's counsellor Deanna Troi (played by Londoner Marina Sirtis who once actually auditioned for the part of Dayna in Blake's).

Denise Crosby lasted one season as security chief Tasha Yar (though she subsequently guested both as Tasha and her Romulan daughter Sela). Will Wheaton literally grew into his role as Dr Crusher's teenage prodigy of a son, Wesley, LeVar Burton pulled on a special VISOR (Visual, Instrument and Sight Organ Replacement) to play the blind navigator (later chief engineer) Geordi La Forge and Michael Dorn learned to love prosthetics as the ship's Klingon officer Lt Worf, a character forever trying to reconcile his warrior heritage with Star fleet -imposed discipline.

And with no Spock aboard, the logical voice was an android Science Officer, Data, played by Broadway actor Brent Spiner. A pasty-faced 24th century Pinnochio, Data is an android who dreams of becoming human and his efforts to grasp the nuances of human behaviour provide some of the series' lightest and most poignant moments.

Also along for the ride were Diana Muldaur as Dr Crusher's second season replacement, the slightly abrasive Dr Kate Pulaski, and a couple of semi-regulars, Irish actor Colm Meaney as Transporter Chief Miles O'Brien who later jumped ship to join Deep Space Nine, and Whoopi Goldberg who dispensed cocktails and wisdom as the enigmatic Ten Forward barmaid Guinan. There was also a short-lived role for Michelle Forbes as a feisty Bajoran officer, Ensign Ro Laren.

It's very much an ensemble affair and this series was not troubled by the well-documented friction that existed among the original Trek cast. With the Klingons and the Federation now allies, The Next Generation needed to find new villains. It immediately introduced us to Q, an omnipotent prankster who regularly returned to plague the crew in general and Picard in particular. Then there were the lascivious, avaricious Ferengi, the lizard-necked militaristic regime of the Cardassians and the Borg - a seemingly unstoppable cybernetic super-race who subjugated, then assimilated all other races into their insect-like hive culture. And, of course, those shoulder-padded galactic power-dressers, the Romulans, also returned.

During the 1970s and 1980s, whenever asked if Star Trek would be returning to television as a series, Gene Roddenberry would answer that if it ever did, he did not want to be a part of it. The three-year stint of the original series was exhausting for him. He hardly saw his family, network battles created scars, and creative problems with the show were difficult. Roddenberry just didn't want to repeat the experience. While making a string of TV movies in the 1970s that included Spectre, The Questor Tapes, Genesis 11 and its sequel, Planet Earth, Roddenberry made a living touring colleges and universities lecturing about space and Star Trek.

In 1977, when Star Wars hit the movie screens across America, Paramount realized they had a golden egg waiting to hatch on their own lot. A second series, dubbed Star Trek II, was developed, but this ultimately mutated into Star Trek-The Motion Picture. This was after a long period of flip-flopping by Paramount, who couldn't make up their minds in what form they wanted the show to be revived. But in 1986, prompted by the success of Star Trek IV-The Voyage Home, Paramount fast tracked the notion of a another kind of Star Trek, a Star Trek with a totalJy different cast placed approximately 78 years into the future. Realizing they could not do this show without Roddenberry, the company asked if he would be interested in developing another Trek series. He grabbed at the chance. Although it might have seemed an unusual move, the reasons behind the quick decision were simple. Paramount presented several conditions that lured him in.

For starters, Roddenberry admitted that whenever someone said, "Star Trek can't be done again!" it served as an irresistible challenge. The additional incentives were the absence of a network censor and the promise that the show would be syndicated. There was also the excitement of developing new characters and a new starship using the advanced technology of the 1980s to pull off a show with higher production values.

Reassembling many of his original production crew, plus a collection of the finest contemporary production players Hollywood had to offer, Roddenberry rolled up his sleeves and went to work in the twenty-fourth century.

Writers David Gerrold and Dorothy Fontana; producers Eddie Milkis and Robert Justman; costumer William Ware Theiss; assistant director Charles Washburn and set decorator John Dwyer were some of the original guard that came back to create the next generation. Talented newcomers who joined the team included executive producer Rick Berman, production designer Herman Zimmerman, and design staffers Rick Sternbach, Andrew Probert and Michael Okuda. With a staff assembled, Roddenberry's tough task was to assemble an Enterprise crew who would have the same appeal and longevity as the original cast. After Bob Justman discovered Patrick Stewart at a UCLA Shakespeare reading, and after arduous casting calls, other team members were assembled. The new crew of the starship Enterprise was born.

"Everybody was aware we were following a famous forefather. ... The fact [is] that there's nothing you can do to try to match to it," says Next Generation director Rob Bowman, who was responsible for 13 episodes over five seasons of the show. "Everybody was really intent that we're not going to be like those guys. We're going to make our own. They're too big. So basically, you slay the giant by throwing one rock at a time. Everybody was very open-all the actors, Genet starting fresh. I don't think anyone had any idea the show would be as successful as it did. We were all hoping that we would even be picked up again for a second season."

Another director, Paul Lynch, echoes Bowman's memory of the first season's atmosphere. "Nobody quite knew what was going to happen to the series when I directed my first episode," he remembers. "Jonathan [Frakes] and Patrick [Stewart] and I were standing around talking, and they were saying how they figured they'd be there for 13 [episodes] and maybe be there for a year but that'd be it. And I said, 'Five years.' I guessed it would run for five years, maybe six. So, I'm close to being correct."

As director of the two-hour pilot, "Encounter at Farpoint"-the first original Star Trek product to hit the airwaves since 1969-Corey Allen says that he didn't have any pretensions or misgivings about being the first director to take on a property that had classic status. "I really didn't feel that. It was a very easy, very fun project from the get-go. I was thrilled to do it. I had a definite vision, which I think coincided with Gene Roddenberry's." Allen is generally pleased with his work on the pilot. "I liked it very much. There was one sequence that didn't pay off very well, and I was frustrated with that. It was the tentacles coming out of the wall, when the other spaceship first comes alive. I don't think that effect worked very well, and so I was frustrated."

Of the newly assembled crew for the starship, Allen says that the acting was excellent. "Patrick Stewart is one of my favorite actors. He's the epitome of what a professional actor is-he cares about what he's doing, he's invested in what he is doing-and John DeLancie, who plays Q, both of them were a delight to work with.

"Brent Spiner was a find. We cast far and wide to find that character and found Brent. Thank gosh. He was one of the final two [actors auditioning for the role-the other was Eric Menyuk, who would come aboard later as the Traveler in 'Where No One Has Gone Before']. The rest is history."

Rob Bowman says that the mantra chanted throughout the first season was, "'Let's just be ourselves. Let's make our own Star Trek.' When I was directing it, I tried to bring my own visual style to it and do as much storytelling with the camera as I could. [The show] was very straightforward in terms of camera work and lighting. We tried to be a bit more creative on the cinematic side. We also had incredible sets ... that the original did not have. It's amazing. Automatically, from the beginning, it was going to be visually more dynamic and believable. We had a vessel that was really inside the Enterprise."

Robert Justman, a member of the original production crew of the classic Trek, was a supervising producer in the first season of The Next Generation. "I thought it was the same show!" he says. "I loved it. I'm sure Gene Roddenberry felt the same way, too. It just had different faces in it. I think Rick Berman and [later producer] Michael Piller did an outstanding job. It's a marvelous show."

Justman lasted only one season on the new show before resigning, for a simple reason. "I left because I was tired," says Justman. "I didn't want to have to work that hard any longer. I figured I paid my dues. One season was good enough for me." Others who were to resign over creative or professional reasons were Dorothy Fontana, David Gerrold and Maurice Hurley. Allegedly, the first season had a balky start-up because a revolving door in the writing staff accounted for uneven first season scripts.

The show's start-up problems also resulted in two casualties in the cast. Denise Crosby, as security chief Lt. Tasha Yar, decided she was more interested in a film career and felt her character was not used well enough. At her request, she was written out, in the notorious "Skin of Evil" segment. (A slag of oil stranded on a planet zapped Yar, and she died.) Another cast member, Gates McFadden as Dr. Beverly Crusher, was asked not to return in the second season. Producers did not like the direction the character was going and wanted someone else. During the second season, veteran actress Diana Muldaur appeared as Dr. Kate Pulaski. Oddly, she was dubbed only a "special guest star" and was not listed in the main titles along with the rest of the regulars.

The second season also allowed a longtime fan of the Star Trek saga to climb aboard as, of all things, a bartender. When comedienne Whoopi Goldberg heard of Denise Crosby's departure from the show, she told friend LeVar Burton that she would love to beam aboard. But the producers didn't believe Burton and laughed it off. It took a bold phone call from Goldberg to convince them that her desire was sincere. At the time, a new set was under consideration, so the producers merged the two. Goldberg signed on as Guinan, the bartender at the bar, Ten-Forward.

By the second season, Rob Bowman says, "we all had a great deal more confidence on the show ... and we were all very proud of the amount of work we'd done. We'd take more risks in terms of storytelling, and, I think, very successfully so. I think everybody had settled into their characters, and I was more confident, and we had kind of jelled at that point."

For the actors, says Bowman, discovering their characters was an important journey, sometimes fraught with difficulty. "Sometimes the writers are pressed, or the actors are pressed, and there's not a marriage between the writing and the actors, and they say, 'Well, I would never do this.' It's not a negative thing, it's, 'Listen, there's a certain realm of believability for this character,' and the actor believes that this is something not part of it. There's usually a discussion between the writer and the actor: 'I've never done this before. I feel uncomfortable about doing this now. Explain it to me, or maybe we can rewrite it.' You always know that's going to happen. I would say any of those people, from my experience on Star Trek, are total professionals. They don't reduce the value of the characters by saying, 'I would never do this,' just to be negative."

As an example of how the actors never let personal opinions get in the way of a performance, Bowman recalls a story during the production of second season's "Elementary, Dear Data." In this episode, Geordi and Data enter the holodeck as Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Watson, and they pit their wits against Professor Moriarty.

"The first time they entered [the foggy London streets inside the holodeck], Brent was having difficulty with the dialogue as written," recalls Bowman. "He was in his usual pre-creative mode of making comments about the script. We're sitting there, we roll cameras, he's disgruntled with the script, but when I said, Action!" he immediately, at the flick of a switch, turned into Data. He starts talking to Geordi, who's playing Watson. And then, flicks into Sherlock Holmes and then flicks back into Data vernacular and then I say, 'Cut! Print!' and then he's back complaining again, and it's one of the most brilliant things I've seen this guy do: go from complaining about the scene, to playing Data, playing Sherlock Holmes, 'Cut! Print!' and back to me. It was one of the moments I realized how brilliant he was. That's just the way he is; when the camera goes, he is just out there."

Bowman goes on to praise other members of the cast. "I had a highly creative experience with every single actor on that show. To me, when I direct, I go to have a good time and try to take some risks. Jonathan is the one who keeps the set smiling and laughing. Patrick is a polished Shakespearan actor. And Michael Dorn is an absolute rock. He's very steady. He's very creative about what we should be doing and really understands that Worf character. That was a lucky piece of casting. I was very fortunate to direct 'Heart of Glory,' the first Klingon/Worf episode. I know he was eager, but boy, he came through in shining colors in that show."

By the third season, Gates McFadden had returned as Dr. Crusher, and Dr. Pulaski was out. Diana Muldaur moved over to L.A. Law. Bowman's fourth-season episode "Brothers," was significant for several reasons. It marked the return of Lore, not seen since first season's "Datalore," and introduced Data's creator, Dr. Noonian Soong. It was also executive producer Rick Berman's first script. "Brothers" also provided Brent Spiner quite probably one of his most challenging moments as an actor: he was required to play three roles (Data, Lore and Dr. Soong).

"Brent has to play scenes and act and react scenes against himself," says Bowman. "And he's not there to act against himself. So he has to do this scene as Data, and he's looking at a stand-in. The next day he has to come back and play the other side of the conversation as his father. And he has to work out the timing to make it sound like a natural conversation. It's a very difficult thing to do."

Early in the production, it was suggested that veteran actor Keye Luke should play Dr. Soong. But that idea got killed quickly, and Spinner got the part. Bowman says he would not have liked anyone other than Brent to play him because it provided such an acting challenge.

"When I came back for 'Brothers,' everybody was very streamlined in their characters," says Bowman. "The actors had really become those people. They were very at ease and very polished, and it was a really wonderful experience to go back and see everybody just working so smoothly! 'Brothers' was a show very technically difficult to do; a lot of motion control, split screens, the pressures for Brent Spinner to memorize lines that had scenes with nobody on the other side. He was brilliant. I thought the camera work, the lighting, the screenplay, the whole thing was just a great experience."

Bowman stopped directing Next Generation episodes after "Brothers." He pleads a simple case of burnout, with a desire to work on other shows to help in his creative growth. "I love everybody there very much," he adds. "I miss them all very much." He has stellar reviews for the shows that followed his departure, calling them "incredible work" and "beautiful episodes." Don't underestimate the difficulty of creating a good show, says Bowman. If a show is good, it is because the people behind it genuinely care about it.

"You have to thank Gene Roddenberry, Rick Berman, and the actors who [really kept] the enthusiasm in that show," insists Bowman. "People on Star Trek really love what they're doing. You watch those shows, and I don't care if you're not a Trekkie or if you've never seen it, you catch a great episode and you're blown away and people talk about it. When you get down to it, why [did we do] this show? Why do people like Star Trek? Because there's something about it that gives us a sense of hope and makes us feel good about who we are and what we're going to become. Even if we're down on ourselves right now, Star Trek gives you a sense of optimism, and I believe that's its core for each person working on the show. It was for me. That will never go away. That will never die in people. Hope and optimism is something we have to have in our lives. And I think that's what Star Trek is founded upon. 'I've done a lot of TV shows, but the ones people ask me about are Star Treks. ... People on the street won't come up to me and say, 'Tell me about this show for this other network.' They'll just say, 'Did you enjoy Star Trek?' That makes me feel good."

There was a time, in the heat of filming various episodes, that Bowman was unhappy with his working relationship with those on the show. In published interviews for science fiction media publications, Bowman cited problems such as having a day chopped from his schedule for "Q Who" and "Elementary Dear Data," having episodes switched around, losing an opportunity to direct "The Big Goodbye" and receiving "an unshootable script" in "Datalore." And he declared that if he were ever to return to the show, it would be only under a supervising producer/ director title.

But having been away from the Enterprise sets for some time, Bowman finds that his feelings have changed. "Let me follow this up by saying that any director-I still do the same thing-asks for more time. I think when I was asked some of those questions, I was probably an angrier person. I complained about that, and I shouldn't have complained. Anyone is going to want more time. The studio [executives] do what they have to do. I am wholly and singularly grateful to have ever worked on that show. ... Any complaints I had before were just ventilation and were not from me at all. I take back every complaint I ever had about that show. I was grateful for the opportunity. I think my biggest beef was on the Borg show, we were doing something brand new. It was a quite ambitious show. What I failed to point out, if I complained about that, was they had given me a very challenging script.

They knew we could pull it off. The positive of that is to say, 'Thanks for trusting in me and giving me this script,' instead of saying, 'You took a day away from me!' Who doesn't want more time to make it better? And that's part of the creative process. I think the problem with 'Q Who' was I was not included in the scheduling and was held responsible for it. And I thought there may have been another way of working that out. Nevertheless, I'm glad I had a chance to direct that show." Like Rob Bowman, Paul Lynch is a director who was on the show at the very beginning, then tuned out after a period of activity. But unlike Bowman, who started out as a young man new to the business, Lynch has credits going back to the 1970s, when he directed various feature films and a variety of episodic television, many of which were science fiction or fantasy related.

Lynch says that directing "11011001" was a challenge because for the show to be successful, both casting and post-production sound had to be perfect. "The Binaris were actually small women," he reveals. "They were women of about 25, all who happened to be about four foot nine." Most of the difficulties in assembling the show came from "just to get them to all speak in synch all the time. They all had to speak together. Even though it came out of their mouths, they had to do it [again later] in post-production [dubbing]." Later episodes that proved memorable for Lynch included "Unnatural Selection," because of the special effects, and "A Matter of Time" (guest-starring Matt Frewer) because "it was a very clever episode. Quite different. It was comedic." But a stronger highlight came from fifth season's "The First Duty," the episode that would finally give us a look at Ensign Wesley Crusher's tenure at Starfleet Academy. "Wil Wheaton was terrific in it," says Lynch. "He really proved himself. I thought he was a good actor already, but I thought he did a great job in it. It was basically him."

By coincidence, Robert Duncan MacNeil, with whom Lynch had worked on The Twilight Zone's "A Message from Charity," got cast as the antagonist Cadet Nick Locarno. Ray Walston, most famous for My Favorite Martian series in the 1960s played the gardener, Boothby. Lynch comments that Walston is "really like a gardener. He has an extraordinary amount of energy for a man his age." Looking for favorite moments from his stint on the show, Lynch points to scenes in "11011001" and "The Naked Now." In the former, Lynch likes the holodeck sequence between Minuet and Commander Riker, and in the latter, the scene where Tasha Yar seduces Data.

As for why the show was so successful some say even more than its progenitor-Lynch points to improvements in production quality. "Originally, when Gene was running [TNG], I don't think it was as strong I think he was too close to the original. He was, rightly or wrongly stuck in a time-warp that didn't quite measure up to today's world. I remember having a big discussion with Denise Crosby on 'Naked Now' because one of the things that Gene wanted was to see the girls' bodies. Gene seemed to have a very '50s attitude to women characters." According to Lynch, it was in the later seasons that the show "changed dramatically. And I think it was Rick Berman who brought the series up to date. I think the success of the show belongs to him. It was through him the show has become what it is.

"Gene's problem was that he would hold back. He would not progress nearly as fast as should have happened. But the guy responsible for that progress and the series is Rick Berman. It's probably the best television in recent memory. There's nothing in comparison. It's well acted, well written, and very compelling. It's also a family series and an entertaining fantasy series. I think that's why it's so popular."

Someone else who is happy to have been given the reins to direct the show, one of several Next Generation actors to become a director, is Jonathan Frakes. Frakes turned into a prodigious director, debuting with third season's "The Offspring." He followed with a pivotal Klingon story in fourth season's "Reunion," as well as Jean Simmons' guest appearance in "The Drumhead." After a season break as a director, Frakes returned with fifth season's intriguing "time causation loop" in "Cause and Effect." The sixth season gave him not one, but two episodes: "The Quality of Life" and "The Chase."

"In the first one I got to do, I felt really lucky to have Brent Spiner as the featured artist," says Frakes. "The Offspring" was Data's turn at being a parent, by constructing his child. "I think he is incredibly talented, probably the actor with the biggest range of anyone on the show. I was a nervous wreck, and he couldn't have been more helpful." Directing "Reunion" was a considerable challenge. "I'm a huge Klingon fan, and a close friend of Michael Dorn's, so I got to do a totally different type of show, which was kind of exciting-to go from the sensitive quiet Lal, ['The Offspring'], a Data story to a rather large Klingon story. I was sad to have to kill the lovely K'Ehleyr (Worf's half human-half Klingon girlfriend), Suzie Plakson." In "The Drumhead," Frakes says, "I had the privilege of having Jean Simmons, who is a twotime Oscar nominee and one of the great ladies of cinema and who also happens to be a big Star Trek fan. She watches the show every Wednesday in Los Angeles, then calls her friends on the phone and they discuss the episodes. So, we were blessed to get her."

Still another director, Winrich Kolbe, who directed at least two or three episodes of the show every season since the second, heralds the Enterprise's casting. In an interview before the show's final season, Kolbe called the actors "one of the finest ensemble casts in television. Considering, we have quite a lot of people. We have long scenes on the observation deck, and other scenes on the bridge and other locations. It's a very easy experience. Now, it's like doing a repertory theater. They're quite relaxed. They know their characters. It's very easy for a director who's in tune with the cast because you don't have to tell them what you want. They know it. They know better than you as a director. It's up to the director to get the staging going and get the movement coordinated and make sure everyone is on camera properly, etc. As far as acting is concerned, sometimes someone comes on a little slow because of the night before or whatever, and you have to spruce them up. But that's very easy. With one word, one movement with the finger pointing up...

Kolbe attributed the show's success, as Lynch does, to executive producer Rick Berman, who held the seams of the show together. "I like Rick. He sometimes drives me up the wall because he's so deeply loyal. I became aware he was under tremendous pressure in a way, to be specific. Because the audience isn't just an audience that just watches the show-they live it. He has to make sure the continuity in various stories is very detailed and under close control. He keeps it all together." Kolbe said his memories of working on the Next Generation stages would always be fun and full of music. That's right. Music.

"On pretty much most of the shows, we have an ongoing musical affair on the bridge " ,grinned Kolbe. "When most of the cast is on the bridge, and we're shooting the whole day on the same set, there's tension. So, after our tenth take, usually something turns on our music machine. Don't ask me how this got around. I think it started when Brent Spiner was coming into the bridge and suddenly Jonathan Frakes throws in something that looks like a microphone and the bridge now turns into a Las Vegas stage.

Brent Spiner makes this elaborate show biz stage introduction of himself and suddenly, I don't know how this grew, but we're all singing 'Volare.' And I'm the only one who doesn't know the next lines to 'Volare!' I got suckered into that one. The moment that Jonathan Frakes plugs into 'Volare,' the whole crew and cast starts screaming 'Volare.' I ran down with a breaking voice. By that time, I'm pretty tired, too. I don't know it now but it comes to me when I'm singing it. By that time, we're swinging into our twentieth wind. We go through that pretty much on every show. Things need a little juicing up."

Being on Star Trek was often a spotlight for guest stars. Anyone familiar with the classic Trek series will recall memorable guests as villains or protagonists. The Next Generation was no exception. One of the few guest stars who had the privilege of being directed by Jonathan Frakes was Spiderman's Ellen Bry. Beamed aboard for the sixth season's "The Quality of Life" as a scientist, Bry says, "My real happiness was working with these people because it was one of the most pleasurable work experiences I've ever had. I've been on other long-running shows and shows that have never aired, where there's a lot of tension, people are sick of it and where people don't show up at work. But this show, you go on the set and you just feel good. Everyone is as nice as they can be to you, welcoming you, friendly, and because they've been together for six years, they really meshed. There's a lot of joking, a lot of fun. People are good-humored and there's a lot of fooling around and stuff."

"The Quality of Life" is a story about a dedicated scientist (Bry) working at a space station. She has invented a sophisticated tool, called the exocomps, to help in mining development. But after a malfunction, Data discovers the exocomps has the ability to repair itself, and he declares it a life form. The story was a rare opportunity, says Bry, because seldom did an episode center so strongly on a single female guest star. "Even as a lead guest star, you rarely get the size of the role that I got on this show," remarks Bry. "And Jonathan Frakes said in his recollection this was the largest guest star role they'd ever had. I was almost in every scene."

Although a veteran of many episodic television shows including the long-running St. Elsewhere, Bry found that this episode provided many challenges. "Memorizing the dialogue was like trying to learn a foreign language! I had a whole wealth of technobabble to memorize and a large role on top of it. I tried to make her strong and determined. But a lot of that is in the writing. I feel I was able to pull off that technobabble with real sincerity. I think I was able to get familiar with it enough to get beyond the dialogue and start focusing on the acting. The dialogue was so lengthy and so tricky that I feel very proud about getting beyond the memorization to present a character. Believe me, you can easily get hung up with the words!"

Thanks to a physician friend who watched the episode, says Bry, she developed new insights into the script and the character. "He said, 'You know, for all intents and purposes, this is an animal rights show.' In terms of the exocomps and life, it's almost about animal rights. I thought that was interesting. I thought, in thinking about the analogy, he's right! Brent Spiner's character goes on the line for these machines. What I thought was great about the script was it brought out a lot of philosophical issues about life and what is life and the definition of life."

Although Bry found the whole experience challenging and enjoyable, what really knocked her socks off was "being beamed! The idea of being able to beam. Not that it was a favorite in terms of content, but I must admit that I enjoyed beaming!" she laughs. When veteran actor John Anderson appeared in third season's "The Survivors," it proved to be a difficult experience for him. For Anderson, the role of Kevin Uxbridge, a survivor of an alien massacre, was in fact a painful acting chore. In the story, Uxbridge is an alien who has blinked out the existence of the alien marauders because they have killed his human wife, and he has used his powers to recreate her for companionship. In real life, Anderson's own wife had died only a few months before the production of this episode. Emotions remained strong for Anderson, and he admits he almost rejected the role for that reason.

"This was the first job I had taken after [my wife's] death; and they knew about it," says Anderson solemnly. "The terrible part of it was that ... they originally scheduled a highly emotional sequence, talking about my great love and this wonderful woman (guest star Anne Haney playing Uxbridge's wife, Rishon), for either the last day or towards the end of the shooting schedule. Well, something happened and they had to do it the first day. My agent told them that this was my first job after my wife's death, so I was still in a state of grieving. When they told me that we had to switch scenes and shoot this on the first day, I just fell apart. "I told the director, 'I don't know how I'm going to do this because it comes awfully close to my recent experience of marriage of 43 years to a very special woman who's now gone,' but we went into it, and it was very difficult for me, personally. But it worked, and they were wonderful about taking the time I needed and saying, "If you need to get away for a minute, we'll understand."

Regardless of any difficulties, Anderson was intrigued by the story. "It was a wonderful character and a wonderful story of these two people who were co-dependent and had this idyllic marriage," he says- "It was a people's story. The Star Trek crew couldn't figure out how these two people had survived the total obliteration of their planet, and they have to figure out how we survived this total holocaust. At the end of the story, when they pin me down and I reveal to them [that Kevin Uxbridge was an immortal superalien], it was a very touching, emotional scene." Of working with the Next Generation cast, Anderson says that "Jonathan Frakes was an old friend. He played my son in North and South, a mini-series, and it was a pleasure to see him doing well. He's a terrific guy."

So successful has this show been in syndication that Paramount, always in search of money; entered into discussions with executive producer Rick Berman in 1992 and encouraged him to develop another show. Paramount head Brandon Tartikoff, who has been known to appreciate science fiction shows, said it did not necessarily have to be a Star Trek show. Berman and Piller's research found that yet another Star Trek spinoff would be exciting and viable. Together, they dreamed and assembled Star Trek: Deep Space Nine, which premiered in the fall of 1992, to an audience of 30 million viewers and respectable critical reviews.

Star Trek: The Next Generation ended its television run at the close of its seventh season in May 1994 and immediately graduated to a feature films debut with Star Trek: Generations in November 1994. With the The Next Generation on the big screen, Paramount decided they wanted a third ongoing series to replace the show on television to be concurrent with Deep Space Nine. Star Trek-Voyager premiered as the flagship show for the United Paramount Network (UPN) in January 1995. Never before in the history of television has one dramatic television series (Star Trek) spawned three spinoff television shows (Next Generation, Deep Space Nine and Voyager)!

CAST NOTES

Patrick Stewart (Capt. Picard): Born July 13, 1940. Prior to beaming on the Enterprise, Stewart appeared in BBC productions such as I, Claudius; Smiley's People and Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy. He's also had roles in Dune (1984), Lifeforce (1985), Excalibur (1981), and L.A. Story (1990). Stewart made his directorial debut in Next Generation's "In Theory" and refined his talent with "Hero Worship" and "A Fistful of Datas." He performed in the acclaimed one-man play of Charles Dickens' A Christmas Carol and has recorded it for Simon and Schuster audio. Further use of his vocal talents beckoned for the PBS series Shape of the World and a home video describing The Planets. Stewart grew up in the English town of Mirfield and for 25 years has been an associate artist of the Royal Shakespeare Company.

Jonathan Frakes (Cmdr. Riker): "Riker's job is to provide Capt. Picard with the most efficiently run ship and the best-prepared crew he can. As a result, he maintains a more military bearing than the other characters, despite the fact that salutes and other military protocols no longer exist in the twenty-fourth- entury;" says Jonathan Frakes. Born August 19, 1952, and raised in Pennsylvania, Frakes has also appeared in Falcon Crest, Paper Dolls, Twilight Zone's "But Can She Type? ", and Bare Essence. He held roles in the miniseries North and South, its sequel Heaven and Hell and Dream West. Frakes is married to actress Genie Francis.

Brent Spiner (Lt. Cmdr. Data): Born February 2, 1949, and raised in Houston, Texas, after college Spiner moved to New York, where he did numerous off-Broadway plays. He says, "The play that finally pushed me over into the serious actor category was a public theater production of The Seagull." After moving to Los Angeles in 1984, Spiner appeared in a theater production of Gittle Shop of Horrors and in Woody Allen's Stardust Memories. Television appearances include Twilight Zone, Night Court, and Hill Street Blues.

LeVar Burton (Lt. Cmdr. Geordi LaForge): Born February 16, 1957, Burton is best known for his role as Kunta Kinte in the smash miniseries Roots. The character Geordi LaForge is named after a disabled Star Trek fan who passed away, says Burton. Burton also served as host to the Emmywinning PBS series ReadingRainbow, and he lent his voice to the environmentally conscious animated series Captain Planet. Some of his many television and film credits indude Dummy (1979), The Guyana Tragedy: The Story of Jim Jones (1980), Battered (1978), Billy: A Portrait of a Street Kid (1977) and The Hunter (1980).

Michael Dorn (Lt. Worf): "I really enjoy playing a Klingon because the character is so totally dif ferent from the nice-guy roles I've done in the past," says Dorn. So successful was Dorn as a Klingon that the producers of Star Trek VI-The Undiscovered Country (1991) tapped Dorn to play Lt. Worf's grandfather, a defending lawyer for Capt. Kirk and Dr. McCoy. Born in Texas on December 9, 1952, and raised in Pasadena, Dorn made his first appearance on TV in W.E.B. and later landed a threeyear role on CHIPS.

Gates McFadden (Dr. Beverly Crusher): Born August 28, 1949. Prior to joining Next Generation, McFadden had a good career on the New York stage, both acting and directing. Film appearances include The Muppets Take Manhattan (1984) and a cameo in The Hunt for Red October (1989). She also has contributed choreographic work in Labyrinth (1986).

Diana Muldaur (Dr. Kate Pulaski): Born 1943. Best known to science fiction fans for her two appearances in the original Star Trek ("Is There in Truth No Beauty" and "Return to Tomorrow"), Muldaur has a long and rich history as a television actress, including a regular role in McCloud (1970-77). Subsequent to her second-season stint in The Next Generation, she appeared in L.A. Law. Marina Sirtis (Counselor Deanna Troi): Star Trek: The Next Generation came to Sirtis just minutes before she was getting ready to fly back to England, believing she could not find work in Los Angeles. "Deanna is a very wise person with extensive knowledge of philosophy, psychology and different religions and is called on to advise the captain in a variety of situations," says Sirtis. Born in East London to Greek parents and brought up in North London, Sirtis performed in Hamlet, among other classical works. Film appearances include The Wicked Lady (1983) and Waxwork II: Adventures in Time.

Wil Wheaton (Wesley Crusher): Born March 29, 1972, Wheaton first came to screen with a critically acclaimed role in the feature Stand By Me (1985). After leaving The Next Generation during the fourth season to pursue other acting assignments, Wheaton starred in Toy Soldiers (1992) with Sean Astin.

'Let's see what's out there . . .'

However boldly you go about it, going where others have gone before does have its problems. The history of film and TV is littered with failed re-makes, revivals and sequels that probably seemed like good ideas at the time. Star Trek: The Next Generation had to do more than just live up to the memory of its ancestor, it also had to confront the prejudices of entrenched Trekkies who brought some 20 years' faithful devotion with them. This new SF show had to deal with the laws of physics and the lore of STAR TREK - and it could never change either of them!

If the die-hards had their way, the new series might never have got off the ground. But Gene Roddenberry's Next Generation not only flew - it breathed new life into the Star Trek dynasty and, more significantly, revitalised the whole TV science fiction genre which had become commercially tainted. Consistently among the top ten hour-long syndicated series on US television, and The number one show among men aged 18-49, it was an ad executive's demographic dream. And when the profits started to stack up alongside the plaudits, Hollywood took note.

Star Trek: The Next Generation achieved all of this by remaining true to Roddenberry's optimistic vision of the future. But while the philosophy endured, the style was vastly improved. With budgets of around 1.5 million dollars an episode, this is TV with a feature film look. Its Emmy Award-winning effects are astonishingly good and the permanent sets that spanned two huge soundstages at Paramount were packed with intricate detail.

Five star veterans of the original Trek have also left their imprint on the Next Generation. DeForest Kelley hobbled down a corridor in a pair of appalling bell-bottoms to give the new Enterprise the blessing of the venerable Dr McCoy; Majel Barrett has been a recurring guest as Troi's amorous mother Lwaxana, Mark Lenard twice reprised his role as Spock's father, Sarek, Leonard Nimoy returned as Spock in the two-part Season Five story Unification, and James Doohan (Scotty) was found hidden in a transporter circuit in the sixth season's Relics.

As the series has progressed, Jonathan Frakes, Patrick Stewart, LeVar Burton and Gates McFadden have all slipped behind the cameras to direct episodes, as has Leonard Nimoy's son Adam. With the death of Gene Roddenberry in October 1991, custody of the Star Trek flame passed fully into the hands of the series' executive producers Rick Berman and Michael Piller. Besides taking Next Generation to seven seasons before hitting the movie trail in November 1994 with Star Trek: Generations (linking classic Trek cast with the new crew, and killing off Captain Kirk!), they also expanded the Trek universe into Star Trek: Deep Space Nine and the new baby, Star Trek: Voyager.

In the tradition of its predecessor, Next Generation continued to be a vehicle for issues, from AIDS to terrorism, from single-parent families to the treatment of political prisoners.

Over the course of seven years, the series has shifted between comedy, drama, action and adventure, between epic conflict and character-driven instalments. There have been a few stinkers, but in its finest hours, the series has produced some stunning television. My recommended viewing are 11001001 (Season One), The Measure of a Man and Q Who (Season Two), Yesterday's Enterprise, Sins of the Fathers and Best of Both Worlds (Season Three), First Contact (Season Four) - just for Bebe Neuwirth!, Darmok (Season Five), Relics, Chain of Command and Tapestry (Season Six), also Schisms (Season Six) -just for Data's Ode to Spot - and the epic finale All Good Things.

Although the final episode neatly bookends the series, it's not the end of the story. Star Trek: Generations, the 7th Trek movie, but the first to feature the TNG crew, launched Picard's team into a continuing mission on the big screen. That one killed off Captain Kirk and wrote off Picard's Enterprise in a spectacular crash landing.

The excellent eighth movie, 1996's Star Trek: First Contact, directed by Jonathan Frakes, introduced another new Enterprise and brought back the Borg, in a time-travel tale that elegantly played on the themes of the Best of Both Worlds episodes and tossed in a touch of Moby Dick. Here's to the next one.

Michael Dorn would later go on to play Worf in STAR TREK : DEEP SPACE NINE. The writers are numerous but some of note are, D C Fontana, Tracy TORMÈ (SLIDERS), Melinda M. Snodgrass, Maurice Hurley, Ronald D. Moore and Ira Steven Behr. Directors who contributed included Cliff Bole (who directed the Best of Both Worlds), Jonathon Frakes (who starred in the show), Les Landau, Winroch Kolbe and Gaberille Beaumont. STTNG was a big gamble back in 1987 when SF TV was not in a healthy position.

STTNG represented high quality television for which an audience could grab when STTNG reached its third season. The show was responsible for revitalising the SF TV industry in America, making SF TV fashionable and profitable once again. The show introduced brand new enemies such as the Borg, Cardassians and Q, who would later go on to play significant parts in the ever expanding STAR TREK universe. The success of STTNG was never really achieved by its successors, because STTNG managed to appeal not just to TREKERS but also to the general public.

The number of good episodes far out way the bad episodes among the best are 'The Big Goodbye' in which the Enterprise crew get trapped in the holodeck, with fictional characters from the twenties. 'Q-Who' were the mischievous Q flings the Enterprise into unknown space where the deadly Borg, decide to assimilate the Enterprise into their collective. 'The Best of Both Worlds' saw the return of the Borg, who this time attempted to assimilate the Earth. The Hugo AWARD winning 'The Inner Light' in which Picard lives out a life time as a scientist.

There was also 'All Good Things' the final episode which saw the return of Q, who says the Picard is responsible for destroying the Earth. Several of the cast from the original STAR TREK series also made appearances, in 'Encounter at Farpoint' their was Dr. McCoy, in 'Unification' Spock made a return and Scotty appeared in 'Relics' which was one of the best episodes to feature on original cast member.

In the years following the cancellation of Star Trek in 1969, the series had become a big money maker for Paramount. The original 79 episodes had been rerun constantly all over the world. a series of big budget theatrical films all came out as winners at the box office and licensed merchandise from the series was always in demand. Despite all this money being made there were no new episodes of the series being made for television, although an attempt had been made in 1977. Thus when it was announced that Gene Roddenberry, creator of the original series, would be bringing back his concept with an all new cast, many people wondered whether the success could be duplicated. The new series would be entitled Star Trek the Next Generation. This new series had a bigger budget than the original and was not being made for one of the big three TV networks. Instead it was produced for first run syndication and offered to the TV stations which had been successful in rerunning the original series.

Although in many ways Star Trek the Next Generation was an updated version of the original series. steps were taken to insure that the two series would remain separate. Star Trek the Next Generation was set in the late 24th century, some 80 years after the original series. The new adventures were set on board the USS Enterprise NCC 1701-D. the fifth Federation starship with that name. Some things had changed in the Star Trek universe since the original series. The Federation's old enemies the Klingons were now allies and there was a Klingon officer on the new Enterprise. The Romulins were still around to cause trouble, as were new adversaries which had net been encountered during the original series.

The new Enterprise was a lot bigger than the original. The original had a crew of 430, the new Enterprise held over 2000 people. Some of the people on board were family members of the crew, who lived on the ship but did not participate in its operation.

The new ship was under the command of Jean Luc Picard. Picard was a bit older than Captain Kirk and less prone to get into fights, preferring to talk his way out of dangerous situations. Unlike Captain Kirk in the original series, Picard often stayed on the ship and out of danger when they arrived at strange new worlds. These activities were assigned to his senior officers. Leading most of the away team missions from the ship was his first officer, Commander Will Riker. Riker was quite a bit younger than Picard and was intended to take on some of the characteristics of Kirk, such as getting the girl when there was one to be had.

The supporting characters on Star Trek the Next Generation were featured much more prominently than their counterparts in the original series, almost all of them got a couple episodes where they were in he spotlight each season. While this helped define the characters, it did tend to make it seem as though less than a dozen people were all that were needed to run the ship!

The rest of the regular crew members were: Lt. Geordi LaForge. the ship's blind helmsman who became the ship's chief engineer in the second season. Although he was blind. Geordi could see by using a special visor which sent images directly to his brain. this visor allowed him to see things such as radiation which others could not. Lt. Tasha Yar was the ship's chief security officer, Tasha was killed in the line of duty late in the first season. Her duties were taken over by Lt. Worf. the only Klingon officer in Star Fleet. Worf had been orphaned during a Romulan attack on a Klingon outpost and was raised by human foster parents. He did however still have the short temper Klingons were famous for and was prone to start fights. Dr. Beverly Crusher was the ship's chief medical officer. Dr. Crusher was a widow whose teenage son, Wesley, lived on the ship with her. Dr. Crusher had known Captain Picard for some time and it was often hinted at that they may have had some type of serious relationship at some time- one which always seemed to be on the verge of redeveloping. Her son Wesley was a boy genius who had the annoying ability to come up with the solution to save the day at the last moment, despite the fact that regularly trained officers were unable to do so.

This ability prompted Captain Picard to give Wesley the rank of acting Ensign. Just when Wesley began to get a bit less annoying, he was written out of the show by having him attend Star Fleet Academy. He would however return to the ship on several occasions. During series' second season Dr. Crusher took a leave of absence from the ship and was replaced by Dr. Katherine Pulaski. Deanna Troi was the ship's counsellor, a new position, her job was to analyse people in times of trouble and to give advice to Captain Picard. Troi was half Betazoid and had empathic powers which allowed her to sense people's emotions thus when an alien ship appeared and began to attack the Enterprise she could tell Captain Picard that she sensed hostility! Troi was also an old girlfriend of Riker's, the couple however showed no real signs of renewing their old relationship preferring to remain just friends. Lt. Cmdr. Data became one of the series' most popular characters. In many ways he was patterned after Mr. Spock in the original series.

Data was an android who had no emotions, a vast store of knowledge, he was also stronger than anyone else on board and could survive in situations which others could not. Data wanted to be more like the others and was constantly striving to become human. Although he knew little of his origins when the series started, episodes centring on him revealed his origin and set his evil twin brother loose upon the universe. Guinan was the ship's bartender who appeared sporadically. She was from an alien race with a long life expectancy who had some weird abilities to know things which would help save the day. Chief Miles Edward O'Brien had a small role as the Enterprise's transporter chief. O'Brien found himself transferred to a bigger role on Star Trek Deep Space Nine when the second Star Trek spin off premiered in 1993.

Several new adversaries for the Federation were introduced in Star Trek the Next Generation. The first of these was Q. Q was an omnipotent being who had the power to do whatever he pleased. He was first encountered in the series' pilot where he told Captain Picard that he and his crew were being tested and they would be destroyed if they failed the test. He returned about once a year to plague Captain Picard whom he thought of as a friend. The Ferengi were an alien race introduced in the first season as a serious threat to the Federation. They were a greedy race concerned with making a profit in business stealing above all else. Someone eventually realised that they did not pose much of a threat and they eventually began to be used in much lighter almost comic relief roles. The biggest threat to the Federation came from the Borg. The Borg were a race of half-humanoid / half-machine cyborgs who were intent on assimilating everyone else in the universe into their culture. In the best episode of the series. Best of Both Worlds (part 1), the Borg manage to capture Captain Picard and turn him into one of them using his knowledge to help destroy the Federation. Unfortunately this episode's resolution was one of the series' weakest episodes and the Borg were defeated. When they returned they were but a shadow of the threat they once were.

The series was not without its faults. Although the characters were well defined they never seemed to develop or change. The relationships and positions of the regulars on the Enterprise tended to retain pretty much the same throughout the seven seasons the series was on the air. So much time was spent in defining the characters that most episodes had two plots going on at once. One featuring some serious crisis in one of the regular character's life with another dealing with some threat to the ship (or universe). This threat was often treated as a 'B' story which would often be resolved in the last minute by the clever use of some techno-babble. This often made episodes seem to just stop instead of end!

The Enterprise tended not to visit all that many worlds during its voyages. The original series was often criticised for having many of the new worlds looking surprisingly like 20th century Earth. The producers needed to do this in order to produce episodes with existing locations. Star Trek the Next Generation avoided this problem by infrequently visiting strange new worlds. Instead the audience was treated to numerous ship-bound gabfests in which one or two aliens with weird bumps on their heads would pay a visit to the Enterprise.

From the beginning effort was made on Star Trek the Next Generation to tie it to the original series, while keeping it a separate and distinct entity. The Star Trek name most certainly get people to watch the series The very first episode of the series had a cameo appearance of a very aged Dr. McCoy from the original series on hand to bridge the gap between the two generations, it would be several years before other characters from the original series would appear on Star Trek the Next Generation, by this time the series had the opportunity to establish its own identity and would not simply be riding on the laurels of its predecessor.

Mr. Spock's father, Sarek, who only appeared in one episode of the original series made two appearances in the Star Trek the Next Generation. Mr. Spock himself appeared in Star Trek the Next Generation in a highly promoted two part episode, designed to coincide with the original series' 25th anniversary. Sadly Spock had nothing more than a cameo role in the first part, but departed prominently in the second part. Scotty was the final character from the original series to appear in Star Trek the Next Generation. Scotty was able to appear as the same age he was in the movies because he was rescued by the crew of the Enterprise C after spending 80 years stuck in a transporter beam.

Star Trek the Next Generation was a ratings success. It was one of the top rated series among first run syndicated dramas. It managed to exceed the number of live action episodes of the original series mid way through its 4th season. Merchandising on the series proved to be a cash cow with toys, books and games appearing on the market.

After 7 seasons Star Trek the Next Generation was cancelled while it was still doing well in the ratings This was to allow the series to continue as a series of theatrical films, like the original series did (however this time it was planned!). The first of these films, Star Trek Generations premiered in the theatres in November 1994, six months after the final episode of the TV series was broadcast. This film set out to bridge the gap between the real Star Trek series and its first spin off, by featuring the meeting of Captain Picard and Kirk. The film starts off in the 23rd century where Captain Kirk, Scotty and Chekov are present as the maiden voyage of the Enterprise-E begins. The Enterprise-E is forced to respond to a distress call from a ship stuck inside a mysterious energy ribbon known as the vortex. During the rescue Kirk is sucked inside the nexus and presumed dead.

78 years later a madman named Soran who has rescued from inside the vortex by the Enterprise-E will stop at nothing so that he can re-enter the Nexus, a place where one can live out one's fantasies. In the process of re-entering the Nexus, Soran manages to destroy the Enterprise-D, killing the entire crew except for Picard who becomes trapped inside the Nexus. Kirk is still alive inside the Nexus, and he meets Picard. As a part of the fantasy life Picard wants to live, the two Enterprise Captains manage to go back in time and prevent Soran from destroying Enterprise-D. Kirk however sacrifices his life in the process. Thus leaving Picard alone inside the Nexus living out a fantasy life where he is back with his ship and his crew.

In the UK the series first episode was shown on the 26th September 1990 on BBC, and the very last episodes was shown on the 25th January 1995 on Sky One. From the fourth season onwards all first run episodes were shown on Sky One. The total count of episodes is 178, assuming we count the first episode (Encounter at Farpoint) and the last episode (All Good Things) as two parts.

Executive producers for the series were Gene Roddenberry, Rick Berman, Michael Piller and Jeri Taylor, the various producers for the series included Robert Justman, Maurice Hurley, Hans Beimier, Richard Manning, Ira Steven Behr, Herbert J. Wright, Peter Lauritson, Davin Livingstone, Ronald D. Moore, Brannon Braga and Joe Menosky. Production designer was Herman Zimmerman and Richard James from season two. The music was created by Jerry Goldsmith, the main title theme by Alexander Courage, Dennis McCarthy, Ron Jones and Jay Chattaway from Season three also for the music.

Famous actors who starred in the series included John De Lancie (LEGEND), DeForest Kelly (STAR TREK), Armin Shimerman (STAR TREK : DEEP SPACE NINE), Marc Alaimo (STAR TREK : DEEP SPACE NINE), W. Morgan Sheppard (EARTH 2), Caraolyn Seymour (SURVIVORS), Mick Fleetwood, Andreas Katsulas (BABYLON 5), Max Grodenchik (STAR TREK: DEEP SPACE NINE), Dwight Schultz, Mark Lenard, Ethan Phillips (STAR TREK: VOYAGER), Jeremy Kemp, Jean Simmons, Michele Scarabelli, Leonard Nimoy (STAR TREK), Matt Frewer (PSI FACTOR :CHRONICLES OF THE PARANORMAL, MAX HEADROOM), Kelsey Grammer, Robert Duncan McNeill (STAR TREK: VOYAGER), Famke Janson, Tim O'Conner (BUCK ROGERS IN THE 25TH CENTURY), Daniel Stewart (Patrick Stewart's son), Jerry Hardin (THE X FILES), James Doohan (STAR TREK), Olivia d'Abo (SOMETHING IS OUT THERE), Stephanie Beacham, Siding El Fadil (STAR TREK: DEEP SPACE NINE), Tim Russ (STAR TREK :VOYAGER), Patricia Tallman (BABYLON 5), Linda Thorson (THE AVENGERS), ALAN OPPENHIEMER (THE SIX MILLION DOLLAR MAN), Professor Stephen Hawking, Eric Pierpoint (ALIEN NATION) and Caitlin Brown (BABYLON 5).

They said it wouldn't work. Even dyed in the wool Star Trek fans especially they foresaw a quick and ignominious death. But Gene Roddenberry was determined to do it again, and he succeeded, as The Next Generation has hardly survived its creator and is well into the middle of its sixth season. It was a rough start for The Next Generation. Would people come to accept a bald headed Frenchman with a British accent as captain, a woman doctor, a logical android (too much like Spock, said some), and a Klingon as key members of the Enterprise crew? Time has shown that the answer to this question was a resounding yes. Despite the halting quality of the early episodes of the series, Star Trek: The Next Generation persevered, despite such weight as an extremely plodding pilot episode. As the pilot, "Encounter at Farpoint," begins, Captain Picard (Patrick Stewart) has just been posted to the new Enterprise (NCC 1701D). He doesn't even have a first officer yet, but is taking the ship to Farpoint Station to pick him up. The second-in-command, Riker (Jonathan Frakes), is a key character in Roddenberry's re-visioning of things.

Whereas Kirk would beam down to any hostile planet despite the risk, Starfleet protocol (and centuries of historical precedent) dictates that the commanding officer of a vessel not place himself at risk. Rumour also has it that Roddenberry opted for this approach because of his experience with the classic Trek, where his dream of a true ensemble was some-what unbalanced by a certain actor's constant efforts to keep the focus of the show on his character. Now the function of that character is divided into two: the older, wiser man in charge and the more rakish, daring first officer. The second episode, "The Naked Now," was a virtual remake of "The Naked Time". It reveals a few things about the characters, but not much, beyond demonstrating just how annoying Wesley Crusher could be. "Code of Honor" continued this distressing string of similarities to the old show. "The Last Outpost" introduced the Ferengi, the new villains, who don't make much of an impression in their initial foray. They were actually too clownish to pose much of a threat, and their offhand remark about how disgusting it is that the Federation makes its women wear clothing makes it impossible to find them anything but amusing.

"Where No One Has Gone Before," reflecting the new show's lack of gender bias, used Wesley fairly well and introduced the Traveller, an alien who, after a fashion, becomes one with his own mathematical equations and casts the ship into distant unexplored regions of space. This episode demonstrated that the special effects of The Next Generation were prepared to go where no one had gone before even if the scripts weren't quite ready to make the trip. "Justice" condemned Wesley to death for violating a seemingly trivial taboo on a planet of blond fitness fiends. It demonstrated that Picard could give speeches which were more long-winded and dramatic than even Captain Kirk at his best when he was talking a computer to death. "The Battle" provided information on how Picard lost his old ship the Stargazer in a battle with the Ferengi; the old nemesis he defeated then shows up with revenge on his mind. For a show with everywhere to go, the episode reveals a lot less about Picard than one would expect.

"The Big Goodbye" introduced Captain Picard's passion for hard-boiled detective fiction, as well as the holodeck concept. While Picard is off playing Dixon Hill, private eye in a simulated 1940s San Francisco, a malfunction causes the characters in the program to develop real personalities . . . and real bullets in their guns. This episode won the coveted Peabody Award for television excellence thanks to its unusual ideas on the nature of life and reality. The series hasn't come close to winning the award since, even though much better scripts have come down the pike. "Datalore" is an evil-twin story enlivened by Brent Spiner's dual role of nice and not-so-nice androids. It clears up some of the mystery of Data's origin, but not much else. It does demonstrate that Spiner is an actor to watch, even when forced to play a one-dimensional villain. Things picked up with "Heart of Glory," the first episode to focus on Worf as more than just a grouchy guy who's handy with a phaser. Renegade Klingons fleeing from the Empire try to involve Worf in their rebellion, provoking a serious conflict of interest for him.

The show suddenly gets relevant in "Symbiosis," in which the medicine one planet provides to keep another from dying of an ancient plague is revealed actually to be a highly addictive drug. A typical Roddenberry classic, in that the issue-of-the-week kills the story and leads to some windy dialogue. "Skin of Evil" kills off Tasha Yar rather offhandedly, then gives her a nice funeral. The episode was written by Joseph Stefano, the writer/producer who contributed much to the first year of The Outer Limits. This episode features a being who's been exiled to a planet for his evil deeds but we learn precious little about what made him that way. Again, just another one-dimensional TV villain. "Conspiracy" reveals that the Federation has been infiltrated by evil bugs from a distant galaxy, but Picard gets to the bottom of it and finally gets to use a phaser on someone in the series. This remains the only Next Generation episode to bear a viewer advisory for violence because of the state-of-the-art exploding head special effects, the first of their kind to appear in a made-for-television project. Some fans were more than merely surprised by the gruesome finale.

The first season wound up with "The Neutral Zone," an oddly un compelling episode involving twentieth-century Terrans who experience future shock after being revived from cryonic suspension. The Romulans reappear, probably since the Ferengi were a washout as heavies, but the show's ending is weak and inconclusive, and the season just sort of fizzled out. It would be quite some time before we figure out that this episode is a subtle harbinger of the introduction of the Borg. The second season of The Next Generation showed a marked improvement over the first. In the season opener, "The Child" is conceived upon Deanna Troi by an alien entity that wants to learn about humans by becoming one. The resultant offspring grows at a rapid rate, but must abandon its physical body when it realises that it is the source of the deadly radiation affecting the safety of its new found family. A touching if manipulative story, this one gave Marina Sirtis plenty of emotion to work with.

Rewritten from a script originally intended for the once-planned Star Trek II TV series, this episode also introduced two new characters: Guinan, the wise and ancient bartender of Ten Forward (played by Whoopi Goldberg), and Dr. Pulaski (portrayed by Diana Muldaur) as a replacement for Gates McFadden as Dr. Crusher. Guinan would become a long-standing part of the series; Pulaski, an ill-conceived attempt at a Bones-like character, would, although ably acted by Muldaur, fail to last more than one season, when Gene Roddenberry reversed his arbitrary decision to fire Gates McFadden.

In "Elementary, Dear Data," Geordi programs in a holodeck adversary worthy of-in a crucial slip of the tongue-Data, which makes Moriarty a match for the android, who is playing Sherlock Holmes. The professor, now "real," begins to learn about the Enterprise, and eventually kidnaps Dr. Pulaski in a ploy to be granted life outside the holodeck.

"The Outrageous Okona" veered into idiocy as Data tried to learn about humour from a twentieth-century stand-up comic created by the holodeck. Joe Piscopo guest-starred, leading us to believe that this is how the future would view stand-up comedy of the 1980s. One shudders at the concept.

"The Schizoid Man" was in fact Data, his personality impinged upon by a brilliant but dying scientist who sees the android as his ticket to immortality. The arrogant scientist cannot carry off the masquerade in silence and is soon revealed; getting him to relinquish his second chance at life is another matter entirely, but when he realises the harm he's done he returns control to Data and gives up the ghost, as it were. "Unnatural Selection" not only subjects Dr. Pulaski, to an ageing disease like the one in "The Deadly Years," it solves the problem using the transporter matrix-the same solution used in a similar episode of the animated Star Trek series. The only real suspense comes from the difficulty in finding a transporter trace for Pulaski, as she avoids using the device at all costs. Diana Muldaur does a fine job in the only episode that does her character any justice at all.

Now that the Federation and the Klingon Empire are friends, it seems inevitable that an officer exchange program should be initiated; in "A Matter of Honor," Riker gets first shot at it and jumps at the chance. Here he must learn to eat Klingon food, fend off the advances of Klingon women, and betray his captain . . . this last as a matter of duty, of course. A fascinating look at the Klingons, embedded in a genuinely suspenseful plot. This remains the only Klingon episode not to revolve around Worf. It also shows that Riker isn't quite so bland and easygoing when placed under pressure. "The Measure of a Man" is essentially a court-room drama in which an ambitious science officer, intent on disassembling Data to see how he works, questions the android's rights as a sentient being provoking Picard to mount an eloquent defence (with a little help from Guinan).

"The Emissary" is K'Ehleyr, a half-human Klingon woman, who embarks on a tumultuous romance with Worf while trying to help the Enterprise rendezvous with a shipload of Klingons about to revive from cryonic suspension. Arriving too late, Picard is faced with a group of Klingons who still think there's a war on. Worf and K'Ehleyr pull off a masterful ruse: the Klingons could never accept that the Federation won the war, so they trick them into believing that the Empire was triumphant. Worf assumes command of the Enterprise for this brief but crucial period; deception is an accepted and honoured Klingon method of facing a challenge.

The season fizzled out with a bargain basement episode, "Shades of Gray." Riker, infected with a deadly virus, dreams scenes from past episodes. How convenient for the budget. Pulaski saves him, of course, in her last stand as attending physician on the Enterprise. This is a weak, if not downright pathetic, conclusion to a season that improved immeasurably over the first season. Almost any other episode-"The Emissary" or "A Matter of Honor"-would have seen the season out with a bang rather than a whimper. Still, the show had more than overcome the foundering of its first season, and had proved that it could stand on its own. The next season would be even better.

The third season got off to an adequate start, and would prove to be The Next Generation's best season yet. Repenting of his dismissal of Gates McFadden, Roddenberry brought back Beverly Crusher as the Enterprise's chief medical officer. No mention was made of her tenure as head of Starfleet Medical and Pulaski was not even referred to; her whereabouts were left unknown. There was one good scene, though, as Wesley and his mother deal with the fact that she'd been gone for a year. With these changes in place, the third season revved up with "Evolution," involving one of Wesley's science projects gone awry, as microscopic nanites begin to eat the computer core of the Enterprise. A scientist preparing to observe a rare stellar event is perturbed by this interference and tries to kill the by now sentient creatures, provoking their displeasure. But with Data as an interface, communications are established and things are ironed out to the benefit of all involved. This episode, written by Michael Piller, marked his introduction to the series. He soon became executive producer and eventually went on to co-create Deep Space Nine with Rick Berman.

In "Ensigns of Command," Data is assigned to get a human colony off a planet before the aliens with legal rights to that world arrive and destroy them. We actually get to see Data get down and dirty when he displays his willingness to lay waste to the colony in order to prove his point. "The Survivors," a human man and his wife occupy a small patch of green on a planet otherwise utterly destroyed by an alien attack, and have no desire to be rescued. This is a touching story dealing with love and grief and introduces an alien race unknown before and not seen since, in spite of their omnipotence. John Anderson, who died in 1992, demonstrated what a truly fine actor he was. "Who's Watching the Watchers" casts Picard as an unwilling god when a Federation observation post on a developing world is discovered by the inhabitants. Picard finally beams down to explain that he's only human, but his would-be disciple refuses to take even this at face value. This story deals with the impact of religion on a culture and whether it's important or not.

"The Bonding" is another key Worf episode. When a member of an Away Team commanded by the surly Klingon is killed, the guilt-ridden Worf feels responsibility for the woman's orphaned son. So does an alien entity on the planet involved, which tries to assuage the boy's loss by re-creating his dead mother. The story actually explores the bound-aries of grief and the way it affects even those not directly involved. "The Enemy" finds Geordi stranded on a hostile planet where he must overcome a wounded Romulan's suspicions and gain his trust in order for them both to survive. It's an old idea recycled here to good effect.

"The Price" details negotiations for a potentially valuable wormhole; Riker's poker-playing skills lead Picard to make him the replacement negotiator, but the real danger at the table is a secret Betazoid misusing his powers to gain an edge as well as to romance Deanna Troi. Although this attempts to broaden the character of Troi, all it does is demon-strate how basically uninteresting she is as we find it difficult to care that she's having such a good time with this guy. Star Trek: The Next Generation admirably continues the concepts of the original series while adding its own unique touches. "The Defector" is a Romulan admiral determined to prevent a sneak attack by his empire. Naturally, Picard doubts his story, and it turns out to be a Romulan ploy to capture a Federation ship, but the admiral was sincere, having been used by his own government. It does a lot to establish some person-ality for the Romulans and elevates interest in them considerably.

"The High Ground" involves Picard and Beverly Crusher in a terrorist/hostage situation; the terrorists have legitimate grievances but go too far, as does the oppressive government in combating resistance. An intriguing story that loses force by trying to straddle both sides of a difficult and emotionally charged issue. This was the episode Roddenberry hinted at early in the series when he spoke of wanting to cover the issue of terrorism from the terrorist's point of view. It makes a small attempt at that but ultimately has Dr. Crusher lecturing the terrorist leader on the futility of what he's doing. The fact that he dies at the end tends only to punctuate her speech.

Q shows up, stripped of his powers by his peers, in "Deja Q." Picard takes some convincing that Q is not responsible for his current crisis, which involves a moon with a decaying orbit. Q learns humility of sorts when an old nemesis of his shows up and threatens the Enterprise; he leads it away in a shut-tlecraft, and is awarded the restoration of his pow-ers for this selfless act. Needless to say, his humility dries up pretty quick, but he does save the planet threatened by its moon, forces Picard to listen to mariachi music, and enables Data to enjoy a good laugh, an attribute that has never been repeated since.

"Yesterday's Enterprise" introduces a temporal distortion that casts the Enterprise-D into an alterna-tive history where the Federation is losing a long--running war with the Klingons. Tasha Yar plays a key role in this drama, and sacrifices her life to restore the proper time line. Many fans regard this as not only the best episode in the entire six-year history of The Next Generation, but the best Star Trek episode in the entire twenty-five year history of the series. "The Offspring" is Lal, an android "daughter" created by Data. This is a very touching episode, but suspense is introduced by having the Federation attempt to take her away for study, as in "The Measure of a Man," as if the legal precedent set there had no weight. Picard is willing to risk his career to protect the androids' rights, but the issue becomes moot when Lal malfunctions and dies, after having developed the emotions her "father" lacks. This marks the directorial debut of Jonathan Frakes, who handled the sensitive emotions of this tale with great aplomb.

In "The Sins of the Father," the Enterprise crew is in for a rough ride when a Klingon exchange officer temporarily assumes Riker's duties. Worf learns that the Klingon is actually his younger brother, who reveals a secret: when Worf and his parents went to the outpost later destroyed by the Romulans, the younger brother was left behind, presumed dead by the empire but actually raised by another family. He has sought out Worf after all these years because their late father has now been accused of helping the Romulans' notorious attack, and only the eldest son can challenge charges of treachery in the High Council. Otherwise, the stigma of a traitor will be borne by their family for seven generations. One further catch: if Worf's chal-enge fails he will be executed. Plot elements in this episode will lead to the season-four finale.

"Captain's Holiday" leads Picard into trouble and romance, thanks to Riker's mischievous suggestion intended to make the vacation a bit more interest-ing. Time travelers, Ferengi, and the beautiful if unethical archaeologist Vash provide the staid cap-tain with a week he won't forget, although he doesn't get much reading done as per his original plan. "Tin Man" is the name given an alien artifact, apparently a sentient spacecraft. Tam, a Betazoid born with full powers, is assigned to make contact. His telepathy, untempered by slow development, makes it hard for him to avoid the constant mental chatter of most beings, but he becomes friends of sorts with Data, whose mind is closed to him. This script has an interesting history as it was submitted by two freelancers who saw it sell and go into production within thirty days, an almost unheard-of series of events. "Hollow Pursuits" introduces the potentially sticky subject of holodeck abuse, as Barclay, one of Geordi's engineering team, uses the deck to vent his frustrations and explore his fantasies, using his superior officers as characters in his creations. It demonstrates that not everyone aboard the Enterprise is quite as ordinary as we'd been led to believe. Thankfully this character has appeared as a central figure in at least two episodes since then, both dependent on his personality quirks.

In "The Most Toys" Data is kidnapped (and his destruction faked) by an avaricious collector. Although intrigued at being filed alongside a Roger Maris baseball card (complete with re-created bubble gum odor), Data will not comply with his captor's wishes until a woman is threatened. The villain in this episode was originally played by David Rappaport, but when the actor attempted suicide, he was replaced and all his scenes re-filmed with the new actor. Rappaport's performance was reportedly one of his finest as he played the villain as being even more menacing than the version we saw. Spock's father Sarek appears in the episode that bears his name, but his vital diplomatic mission is threatened by an encroaching form of senility, rare among Vulcans but overwhelming when it strikes.

This story demonstrates just how good an actor Mark Lenard is and how neglected he has been by Hollywood in recent years. It remains the best script he has been given to work with in the actor's entire twenty-five-year experience with Star Trek.

After the dismal and cheating conclusion to season two, The Next Generation's producers wisely chose to end the third season with a bang-up finale. "The Best of Both Worlds" brings back the Borg, intent upon absorbing the Federation and all other life-forms into their machine-hive mind. The story ends with Picard captured and turned into a Borg-forc-ing Riker to give the order to fire on the Borg ship, Picard and all! While the ending is extremely contrived to be just what it is—a season finale—the episode overall is quite good and holds up well in repeated viewings. The cliffhanger ending left audiences clamoring for more, which was a shrewd move after the two lame-duck season finales that preceded it. It was a long summer after "The Best of Both Worlds" brought the season to its end; there was little else for captivated viewers to do but to watch reruns of The Next Generation until fall.

"The Best of Both Worlds, Part Two" opened the fourth season and successfully matched the quality of the first part, kicking off another consistently good season. In a rare example of a television science fiction series dealing realistically with the probable fallout from a dramatic situation, the very next episode, titled "Family," written by Ronald D. Moore and directed by Les Landau, deals with the less spectacular side effects of the battle with the Borg. In it Jean-Luc Picard chooses to take a well-earned shore leave on Earth, which they had come close to in their battle with the menace from beyond our galaxy. The Enterprise, still docked for repairs, remains in orbit over Earth.

For the first time in twenty years, Picard returns to his home in France. While Picard is physically recovered from his ordeal, he still has psychological scars to contend with and has chosen to wrestle with these problems by returning home and seeing his brother again. Unresolved conflicts with his brother still remain, but Jean-Luc is prepared to confront these if necessary. His older brother, Robert, is a farmer bent on keeping the family traditions alive. Robert has always regarded Jean-Luc as arrogant and ambitious. This comes out when Jean-Luc arrives at the family estate and meets his young nephew, Rene. The boy remarks that Jean-Luc doesn't look arrogant. So even before meeting Robert we know he has a grudge against Jean-Luc. When Jean-Luc meets his brother for the first time in nearly twenty years, Robert barely says hello and acts distant and preoccupied.

Robert is Jean-Luc's older brother and appears to be in his sixties, but he still works in his vineyard. Over dinner, a small argument develops in which Robert complains that "Life is already too convenient" when the talk of getting a food synthesizer comes up. When Rene mentions that he won a ribbon for his paper on starships, Robert is clearly annoyed. The boy has already told his uncle that some day he's going to be a starship captain, too. Jean-Luc gets along well with Robert's young wife, though, as well as with their son, Rene. But Robert himself remains distant and critical.

The portrayal of Robert Picard is strange because it's the twenty-fourth century and yet he acts like a twentieth-century man railing against "progress." The thing is, life would be so different in the twenty-fourth century from what it's like today that no one in living memory would remember what it had been like in "simpler" times. The more simple times would have been hundreds of years ago. This one aspect of Robert Picard's character does not ring true, but it can be overlooked in light of the more important issues the episode deals with. In an effort to give some perspective to Robert Picard, Jean-Luc's old friend Louis remarks at one point that Jean-Luc was always reaching for the future while Robert was reaching for the past.

In the vineyard they finally get to the bottom of their resentments as Jean-Luc tells Robert that he was a bully and challenges the older man to try and bully him now. Robert lashes out at his brother and a fight erupts. They roll around in the vineyard until they're covered in mud, at which point they break out laughing. Jean-Luc's laughter soon gives way to tears, for he has been unable until now to face the self-doubt raised by the Borg's use of him: "They took everything I was. They used me to kill and to destroy and I couldn't stop them. I should have been able to stop them! I tried so hard, but I wasn't strong enough. I wasn't good enough. I should've been able to stop them!" Now that his emotions have broken through, he can begin to deal with them. Robert points out that Jean-Luc will have to live with this for a very long time, whether below the sea with Louis or in space on the Enterprise. Jean-Luc makes his decision and decides to return to command the Enterprise.

As Jean-Luc prepares to return to the Enterprise, young Rene once more expresses his desire to be a starship captain. In Rene, Jean-Luc sees himself when he was a boy; a child whose eyes were always on the stars. Robert has realised this as well and has had to come to terms with the fact that his son will undoubtedly follow in his uncle's footsteps, not his father's. Even after Jean-Luc has left, Rene sits out-side staring up at the stars. His mother remarks, "It's getting late." But Robert replies, "Let him dream." Both brothers have come to terms with what the future holds.

"Family" is one of the best episodes The Next Generation has produced, and the fact that it has the Q to deal with human issues on a human level rather than on a galactic one makes it all the more compelling. We understand these people and how each has affected the other, for better or for worse. And each of them has to come to terms with the emotional fallout from that. The episode also has two subplots, one involving Worf's human foster parents visiting the Enterprise and the other with Wesley watching for the first time a hologram of his father that was made at the time of the boy's birth. But try as they might, these subplots just seem like distractions from the infinitely more interesting story of Jean-Luc's coming to grips with his personal demons and reconciling with his brother.

Sadly, this is supposedly one of the lowest-rated episodes The Next Generation produced, and yet it is far and away one of their top ten entries. At the very least it should have been nominated for the Humanitas Award, the annual prize given for tele-vision writing that promotes strong human values. Perhaps, had it dealt entirely with Picard and dispensed with the padding of the minor subplots, it would have received more serious consideration. "Brothers" opens with Data suddenly shifting into a mysterious mode and taking over the Enterprise, diverting it to a mysterious planet, and beaming down, leaving a bewildered crew striving to figure out the complex code he entered into the computer-using Picard's voice! On the planet's surface, Data encounters an aged human who turns out to be Dr. Noonian Soong, Data's creator, who has long been presumed dead but who actually fled the events described in the first season's "Datalore" and escaped to this distant hideout.

"Reunion" brings back Worf's gal K'Ehleyr and continues the Klingon saga. A Klingon cruiser hails the Enterprise. Worf's old flame K'Ehleyr beams over with a message for Picard: the leader of the Klingon High Council is dying, and wants Picard to discover which of the contenders for his position has been poisoning him. K'Ehleyr also has a surprise for Worf: their original encounter years before produced a son. In the course of this action-packed tale, K'Ehleyr is killed by Duras, and Worf dispatches Duras in good old-fashioned Klingon revenge-but his discommendation still stands. "Future Imperfect" finds Riker awakening after sixteen years to find himself the captain of the Enterprise, with a son. He has forgotten the sixteen years in question; his last memory is of a visit to a planet, where he was infected by a virus that lay dormant for years until wiping out all memories accrued since its inception. In the Philip K. Dick tradition, apparent reality takes several sharp turns before the truth is revealed.

Another episode, "The Wounded," was also an intriguing story. While surveying a sector near the space of Federation enemies-turned-allies, the Cardassians, the Enterprise is fired on by a Cardassian ship. After a brief exchange of fire, Picard discovers that the peace has been broken by the Federation ship Phoenix, commanded by Ben Maxwell. Maxwell has been out of communication for some time, and is apparently acting on his own initiative: the Phoenix has destroyed a Cardassian science station without provocation. The Federation orders Picard to investigate, and to take a Cardassian team aboard as observers. This episode introduced the Cardassians, an alien race that plays a larger part in the story line of "Ensign Ro" in season five and particularly in the backstory of DEEP SPACE NINE.

"First Contact" breaks with the series format to provide a startling look at the questions raised by the Federation's techniques of determining a planet's worthiness to join. Here, we see the Enterprise crew as aliens, from the Malkorians' point of view. It is one of the finest episodes in the six years of The Next Generation as it introduces a truly original approach never before taken in Star Trek. In "The Host" Beverly Crusher finds romance with a handsome alien ambassador only to find that the fellow's mind and personality reside in a slug-like being that uses a humanoid host body as a vehicle when the host body dies. A good sport, Crusher transplants the being into Riker, temporarily, so that important treaties can be negotiated. Complications ensue when the love-struck ambassador pursues Beverly with Riker's body! She eventually gives in to him, but draws the line when his new host body arrives and turns out to be female. Crusher is, after all, just an old-fashioned girl. The obvious question—how does Riker feel about all this?—remains unanswered. "Redemption" is finally made available to Worf in this fourth-season finale, but under rather trying circumstances. The story, a rather convoluted but intriguing account of Klingon power politics, ends with the restoration of Worf's family name—but he also leaves Starfleet to aid his brother. And Denise Crosby turns up as a Romulan!

The fifth season, sorry to say, would see a considerable variability in the quality of The Next Generation episodes. The fifth-season starter, "Redemption, Part Two," continued the established tradition of season-opening sequels, wrapping up Worf's Klingon sojourn as Picard strives to end Romulan interference in Klingon politics. Denise Crosby's character is revealed to be the daughter of Tasha Yar, by way of the time-slip factor of "Yesterday's Enterprise," but Picard overcomes his surprise at this and the day is carried, with Worf returning to Starfleet. "Ensign Ro" introduced Michelle Forbes as Ensign Ro Laren, a troubled character whose initial abrasiveness would be toned down to a wry sarcasm in subsequent appearances. Avoiding the squeaky-clean characters who populate the Enterprise, she's drafted out of a prison cell, where she'd languished after a Federation court-martial. Her character quickly emerged as one of the most interesting to appear in any version of Star Trek.

With "Disaster" it became painfully apparent that The Next Generation's fifth season might not be as good as the two preceding it; a space disaster disables the Enterprise, with such clichéd results as: Picard is trapped in a turbolift with a group of children! Keiko goes into labour and Worf must help with the delivery! On the positive side, it was well played, with good comic moments, and it at least managed to keep the childbirth and elevator plots separate.

But the big selling point of the fifth season was to be the two-part "Unification," in which Leonard Nimoy would appear as Spock! The first half had an intriguing setup, with Spock appearing at the end after Picard and Data have trailed him to the Romulan home world. But the second half fell flat, standing perhaps as little more than a commercial for the forthcoming feature Star Trek VI. Part One of "Unification," in which Spock only appears at the end, actually remains the better of the two-part story, showing that while the presence of Leonard Nimoy may deliver ratings, it doesn't mean that he can save a hastily written script. The script was conceived in August 1991 and aired in November, leaving precious little time for rewrites and reconsiderations.

Close on the heels of "The New Ground" (Worf having trouble with his new role as a dad), the kids--in-space theme of season five kicked into high gear with "Hero Worship," in which a traumatized boy attempts to subdue his troubled emotions by emulating Data's android behaviour. This Data episode is remarkably well written and shows the good drama that The Next Generation is capable of at its best.

"The First Duty" brought Wesley back or, rather, Picard visits Starfleet Academy, where Wesley has messed up seriously. An interesting episode, and one which shows us Picard's Academy mentor, the crusty old gardener Boothby—portrayed, in an intriguing science fiction television crossover, by My Favorite Martian star Ray Walston! After five years, The Next Generation finally granted that Wesley Crusher is a human being capable of making mistakes. Some mistakenly felt that Wesley was disliked by many fans just because he was a teenager, when actually it was because Wesley was consistently portrayed as being cute and perfect.

In "Imaginary Friend" this season's focus on children rears its ugly head again with yet another kid story, this one involving an alien entity that brings a little girl's imaginary friend into actual existence. The friend perceives the adults on board the Enterprise, especially Picard, as the girl's enemy, and wreaks a bit of havoc before Picard explains things and order is restored. Even the Borg get exposed to the recurring youth angle in "I, Borg," when a damaged adolescent Borg is rescued and learns something about humanity and individuality, another annoying "underneath, we're all the same" episode even though the Borg has been raised in an alien environment and was never exposed to humans until found by the Enterprise.

The fifth season reached its dubious conclusion with "Time's Arrow," which appeared, from the coming attractions, to flirt with being the "Data's Brain" of The Next Generation. Data's head, centuries old and quite dead, is discovered in a mysterious cavern excavated under San Francisco, and the Enterprise investigates the mystery, eventually sending a team, including Picard, back to nineteenth-century California. However, it was actually an interesting episode, creating and sustaining a strange mystery involving twenty-fourth-century aliens plundering nineteenth-century Earth.

The sixth season opened with the dismally point-less conclusion to "Time's Arrow." The writers on hand seemed utterly incapable of doing anything with the intriguing mysteries presented in the first half; the plot fizzles, giving the cast little more to do than wear period costumes. To pad out the tale, an inordinate amount of screen time was given to having Mark Twain wander around the Enterprise and spout off various spurious Twainisms. In the end, Data's body (brought back through time) is reattached to his head (now five hundred years older than the rest of him) The padding in this, and any story, is apparent in that all of the scenes with Mark Twain can be excised without affecting the plot one way or the other. He just takes up space.

The next episode, "Realm of Fear," found Barclay back in the focus, having anxiety attacks about using the transporter and finding strange creatures in the matter stream when he finally takes the plunge. Not an amazing episode, but perhaps the best written of the sixth season to date as the mystery is unguessed by viewers until the moment it's solved, and the cleverness involved works quite well. But for the most part, this season has maintained a remarkably high level of mediocrity.

The next episode, "Relics," featured the return of James Doohan as Scotty. Seems a ship with Scotty on board crashed in a remote region of space, and he rigged a feedback cycle in the transporter which keeps his pattern intact for seventy years or more. Some amusing moments as Scotty's earnest attempts to help out start to get on Geordi's nerves, but there's no surprise when the two engineers team up to find the solution to the latest threat to the Enterprise.

Best moment: Scotty's incredulity upon discovering that when the captain asks how long a repair will take, Geordi tells him exactly how long it really will take, instead of inflating the time required. Most glaring omission: Scotty is taken aback to discover how much time has elapsed, but he doesn't even ask what has happened to any of his former crew mates. Some of them must be dead-or can we anticipate eventually finding everyone who ever appeared on Star Trek trapped in some sort of time suspension? Let's hope not! This episode pulled high ratings, promising that Scotty, and possibly other old Enterprise crew members, will not remain out of sight for long.

In "Rascals," Picard, Guinan, Ensign Ro, and Keiko (Mrs. Miles O'Brien) are caught in a transporter accident (this season's favorite plot device, the transporter) and return as children-obviously a fifth-season story held over a year. Mentally, they're still adults, but Picard soon relieves himself of duty and hands command over to Riker because of the peculiar nature of his affliction. No sooner is this done than the Enterprise is taken over by Ferengi pirates in stolen Klingon vessels. Among other things, they herd all the children together as hostages-including the victims of the transporter snafu. No need to explain any further-that Picard uses his adult wits and his stature to outwit the Ferengi, recruiting Alexander (a.k.a. Worf Junior) into the plot.

Round this out with "The Quality of Life," a lame Data episode (Data discovers that cute robots of the Silent Running variety are actually sentient) and a Wild West holodeck episode (Worf, Alexander, and Deanna are trapped in the holodeck when Data's attempt to interface with the ship's computer goes awry and turns all the holodeck characters into him-yep, it was called "A Fistful of Datas") and there's little concern that the show is now on its holiday hiatus. If only there were a Star Trek feature to distract us at this point, as there was during the fifth season (where, admittedly, The Next Generation had an extra long hiatus while Star Trek VI was in release).

It should be pointed out that the cast of The Next Generation is not at fault here. They are as good as ever, as are the production values. But the writing- well, where is the writing? Have all the good story ideas been diverted to Rick Berman and Michael Piller's forthcoming spin-off Deep Space Nine? Or has the talent simply been diffused too much by the preparations for that series? The series now seems incapable of rising above a certain level of mediocrity. Perhaps The Next Generation is winding down. Perhaps (some hope) it will revive itself when new episodes begin airing once more in early 1993. But whatever the case, Star Trek: The Next Generation has certainly had its share of truly superb stories to tell, and it is these stories like the ongoing Klingon drama of Worf's family history, and individual episodes like "The Drumhead," "A Matter of Honor," "Who's Watching the Watchers," "Family," and "First Contact," among other classics which will stand as the legacy of The Next Generation.

STAR TREK: VOYAGER

In the pilot episode, Janeway's ship, the Voyager, is dispatched to search for a Maquis vessel which has disappeared in 'the Badlands', a stretch of space along the demilitarised zone between Federation territory and the Cardassian Empire. The Maquis, introduced in an eponymous Deep Space Nine two-parter, are a group of outlaw Federation resistance fighters opposed to the Cardassian/Federation treaty.

The Voyager finds the Maquis ship, but both vessels are swept up in a strange phenomenon which sends them into the far reaches of the galaxy - so far that, even at warp speeds, it would take nearly 70 years to return. The two diverse crews band together aboard the Voyager to explore this distant part of space and try to find a short-cut home.

Janeway's First Officer is Chakotay formerly captain of the Maquis ship. A Native American who attended Starfleet Academy and became a Lt Commander, Chakotay resigned his position to join the Maquis. Lieutenant Tom Paris comes from a proud family steeped in Starfleet traditions. When the pressures of living up to the family name resulted in tragedy, Paris was given a second chance by Janeway and is determined to prove his worth.

Tuvok, a Vulcan male, is the Starfleet Tactical Officer. A skilful fighter, but with a calm manner, he's the Voyager's peace-keeper. Harry Kim, a youthful Academy graduate, is the Ops/Communication Officer nervous about living up to his own expectations but looking forward to the challenge, while Chief Engineer is B'Elanna Torres, a half-Klingon, half-human woman who quit the Academy to join the Maquis.

There are a couple of new aliens aboard - Neelix, the guide and all-round handyman, who comes from an unexplored galaxy, and his young lover Kes, a member of the Ocampa species, another new race to add to Star Trek's alien almanac. Although she appears as a 20-year-old in human years, in the Ocampa's time-scale she's just one year old!

Completing the cast of regulars is Doc Zimmerman, a hologram programmed with up-to-date medical knowledge and capable of treating any disease or injury. The series quickly introduced a new enemy alien, too - the Kazon, a volatile race split into warring tribes, each of which wants to capture the Federation's superior technology so it can obliterate the others.

Jeri Ryan is also famous for starring in the SF show DARK SKIES. The universe was looking a crowded place as the Star Trek franchise prepared its fourth TV model for launch in 1995. With more than 250 hours of classic Trek and Next Generation already on the road, Deep Space Nine in its third season and Star Trek: Generations to add to the six previous Trek feature films, Voyager needed to make a quick impact. It did so.

The highly publicised departure of actress Genevieve Bujold, who jumped ship after just three days in the captain's chair, nearly left the newest starship stalled in the interstellar driveway, and gave the 'woman driver' wags a field day. But it got the show noticed.

Bujold reportedly found the rigours of the infamous 18-hour Trek days too much of a captain's slog, but with cast and crew locked into a tight schedule, executive producer Rick Berman continued filming on the two-hour, 23-million-dollar pilot while scrambling to find a new captain. Kate Mulgrew - who once starred as Mrs Columbo in the mystery series about the shabby sleuth's wife Kate Loves a Mystery - was cast as Star Trek's newest captain, Kathryn Janeway. While not the first woman to command a Starfleet ship (Next Generation featured several, including Geordi's mother!), Janeway has certainly raised the female profile from the Enterprise's doctor and counsellor.

With DS9 locked in its orbit around Bajor and its wormhole, Star Trek: Voyager is seen as filling the void left by the departing Enterprise for a series that can continue the Trek mission in the outgoing style to which we have become accustomed.

Its main problem however, is that it's just too boring ever to fill that void. Given that the primary aim is for the ship to get home, there's so little progress. Voyager just trundles around its corner of the universe (Kazon space seems pretty big) with neither the plots nor the charismatic characters to convince us that it's better to travel hopefully than to arrive.

The series' third season included the first appearance of classic Trek stars in Voyager, with guest roles for George Takei as Sulu and Grace Lee Whitney as Janice Rand in an episode called Flashback which also has references back to the sixth Trek movie, The Undiscovered Country.

The two-hour (less advertising space) pilot was aired in Jan 1995, and written by the executive producers. The series is to follow. The 24th-century Federation starship Voyager commanded by Captain Kathryn Janeway (played by Kate Mulgrew)--the first female captain to be a regular cast member in the various ST series--is swept away 75,000 light years from home by a godlike being known as The Caretaker, while searching for a group of resistance fighters, the Maquis, which has also been kidnapped.

The pilot episode (replaying one of the oldest and tiredest STAR TREK themes) deals with attempts to convince the flawed godlike being that humans have autonomy and can cope very well by themselves, some of the action taking place in a cornball virtual reality resembling a Midwest farmhouse. The remaining series is to deal with attempts to shorten the trip back to Federation space, reckoned to take around 70 years at "warp speed", with Federation crew and outlaws working in uneasy harmony.

The pilot episode suggests that despite cosmetic changes (the tactical/security officer, otherwise resembling Spock, is an Afro-American Vulcan, or looks like one; the captain is female) the ST universe is much the same as ever, and the routine nature of the script, along with the perfunctory special effects, raise serious questions about how much artistic life there may still be in the ST concept despite its continuing popularity. Other continuing characters are to include Robert Beltran as First Officer Chakota (of native American descent), Roxann Biggs-Dawson as B'Ellana Torres (a half-Klingon), Robert Duncan McNeill--one of the better actors--as Lt. Tom Paris, Jennifer Lien as Kes, Ethan Phillips as Neelix (comic relief), Robert Picardo as Doc Zimmerman, Tim Russ as Tuvok (the black Vulcan Tactical/Security Officer) and Garrett Wang as Ops/Comm Officer Harry Kim.

The series is syndicated. This is the third live-action SF tv spin-off, its two predecessors being STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION and STAR TREK: DEEP SPACE NINE. At the beginning of the fourth season the series was joined by Jeri Ryan who played borg 7 of 9, the character managed to bring back life and interest in the show. The fourth season however also saw the departure of Jennifer Lien's, Kes.

During the mid 1970's, a time when all that existed of Star Trek was the original live action series and its animated spin off. Gene Roddenberry was attempting to find some means to bring his creation back to life. Although at the time Paramount studios had no real idea what a profitable franchise Star Trek was. the studio did think the idea of bringing Star Trek back might make some money. In 1977 it was announced that Star Trek would return as a new TV series with almost, all of the original cast returning to their roles. This new Star Trek series would not be on any of the three existing TV networks, but instead would be used as the flagship programme of a new fourth network which Paramount hoped to form. To start things off this new network would have one night of programming a week, which would consist of an episode of Star Trek and the television debut of a Paramount theatrical film. Sets were built for the series and a dozen or so scripts were written. However when Star Wars came out in the theatres and began setting all types of box office records, plans for a Star Trek TV series were abandoned and the project was turned into a more profitable theatrical film, which was released in 1979.

The idea of a Paramount TV network was not abandoned. In 1994, Star Trek had proven itself as a money making machine. Six theatrical films had been made featuring the original cast. The first Star Trek spin off series, Star Trek the Next Generation was in its seventh and final season in syndication. with plans for a theatrical film to be made with the series cast when the series wrapped up. The second spin off series.

Star Trek Deep Space Nine, also had proven itself a success in syndication. Plans were in the making for a third Star Trek spin off. Star Trek Voyager. Unlike Star Trek: The Next Generation and Star Trek Deep Space Nine. Star Trek Voyager would not be released into syndication, instead it would be the flagship programme for the new United Paramount Network (UPN), which would be launched in January 1995 with two nights of programming. (This new network is either the 5th or 6th depending on how you count since Warner Brothers at about the same time announced their new WB network. Both of these new networks faced the problem that there were not enough stations in the country for there to be a UPN or a WB station in every city. FDX reaches 90% of the country and the best a fifth network could hope for would be 50%, To appease the many Star Trek fans who lived in areas without UPN stations. Paramount syndicated the series in those cities.) Like both STAR TREK : THE NEXT GENERATION and STAR TREK : DEEP SPACE NINE.

Star Trek Voyager was set in the 24th century. Situations and events set up in both these earlier series helped form the basics for Star Trek Voyager. Previously a group of Federation citizens known as the Maquis had been established. The Maquis were Federation colonists who found themselves in the unfortunate position of suddenly living in Cardassian space. As part of a treaty made between the Federation and the Cardassians which set up a new border, several worlds which contained Federation colonies were now in Cardassian space as well as several worlds with Cardassian colonies now in Federation space. The Federation colonists did not like their new-found lot in life and decided to fight the Cardassians in order to prevent being ruled by them. The Federation branded them all criminals and set out to stop them before the Cardassians killed them.

The starship Voyager, under the command of Captain Kathryn Janeway, was sent out from Deep Space 9 to track down a particular group of Maquis that had been infiltrated by Tuvok, Voyager's head of security. The Maquis ship had vanished without a trace. While tracing the Maquis' ship's final known course, the Voyager encountered an unknown phenomena, which catapulted the ship 70,000 light years away into the uncharted Gamma Quadrant. Arriving in the Gamma quadrant the Voyager discovers that the Maquis ship is also there and has been brought there by the mysterious Caretaker who has brought them (and others before them) there in the hope of finding someone to take over his payment of the debt the can never be repaid.

The repayment involves protecting a race of beings known as the Ocampa. During the course of the crew's first adventure in the Gamma quadrant, several crew members are killed, the Marquis ship is destroyed, enemies are made of an alien race known as the Kazon and the Caretaker dies shortly before all of his equipment is destroyed. This strands the Voyager crew and the Maquis crew 70,000 light years away from Federation space with only one ship, the Voyager. The two crews which started out as adversaries are forced to learn to cooperate in order to survive.

To help smooth relations between the two crews, Captain Janeway wisely appoints the Maquis leader Chakotay as a replacement for her dead first officer Chakotay is an American Indian and a graduate of Star Fleet Academy and has knowledge as to the workings of a Federation Starship. One other member of the Marquis crew is also appointed to replace a dead department head on Voyager. B'Elanna Torres becomes Voyager's new chief engineer. Torres had been enrolled in StarFleet Academy, however she did not graduate. Being half Klingon and half human, the bad temper of her Klingon side tends to get out of control.

Other regular crew members consist of: Tuvok, the ship's Vulcan head of security who has been a long time friend of Captain Janeway's. Lt Paris, the hotshot bad boy helmsman who had been serving time in a penal colony until Captain Janeway got him out for the mission. Paris had previous dealings with Chakotay, which left a feeling of animosity between them.

Ensign Harry Kim, an enthusiastic officer who is on his first assignment, since graduating from Star Fleet Academy. Voyager's doctor along with the rest of the ship's medical staff had all been killed. Medical duties are thrust upon the ship's emergency medical hologram, who becomes known simply as the Doctor. The Doctor was programmed with all the medical knowledge of the best experts from Star Fleet. This knowledge however appears to be lacking in bedside manner, causing the Doctor to behave rudely towards his patients. He also does not like his current predicament. He had been designed to assist with the ship's regular medical staff in times of emergency but is now the sole medical provider on the ship.

Two aliens from the Gamma Quadrant became the members of the Voyager crew during the first episode, Neelix is a Talaxian who became the ship's morale officer and chef. He fancies himself quite an adventurer. a claim which is mostly boasting. His girlfriend Kes came with him. Kes is an Ocampa, a member of the race the Caretaker was protecting. Members of her race live an average of only 9 years, she was 2 years old when she arrived on Voyager. Soon after arriving on Voyager, Kes began studying medicine under the Doctor, so that someone on Voyager can be able to render medical assistance in areas where the Doctor can not go. The Doctor can not leave the ship and is limited to the sickbay and the holodeck on the ship.

Since Voyager is in an unexplored quadrant of the galaxy, none of the traditional Star Trek villains such as the Romulans or Cardassians are present. The ongoing adversary for the Voyager and her crew are the Kazon. The Kazon are a warrior race consisting of many factions who are at odds with one another The Kazon are technologically behind the Federation. They lack such equipment as the transporter which they hope to get from Voyager. Although their ships are inferior to Voyager, they have the strength of numbers. One of the Kazon sects also has the aid of Seska, a former lover of Chakotay's who turned on her crew and joined the Kazon.

Executive producers for the series were Rick Berman, Michael Piller and Jeri Taylor. Producers for the series Merri Howard, Peter Lauritson and Brannon Braga and Joe Meonsky from season four, the theme was created by Jerry Goldsmith. The series premiered in the UK on the 22nd October 1995 on Sky One. The supervising producer was David Livingstone and co-producer was J. P. Farrell. Michael Piller also became the shows creative consultant from season four onwards.

Guest stars in the series include Armin Shimmerman (STAR TREK : DEEP SPACE NINE, BUFFY : THE VAMPIRE SLAYER), Jerry Hardin (THE X FILES), Carolyn Seymour (SURVIVORS), Aron Eisenberg (STAR TREK : DEEP SPACE NINE), Dwight Schultz, Alan Scarfe (MYSTERIOUS ISLAND, SEVEN DAYS), Jonathan Frakes (STAR TREK : THE NEXT GENERATION), Anthony De Longis, George Takei (STAR TREK), Grace Lee Whitney (STAR TREK) and Ed Begley Jr. (MEEGO).

The line producer was Brad Yacobian, the editor was Darly Baskin, the director of photography was Marvin V. Rush, ASC and the production designer was Richard D. James, make up designer and supervisor was Michael Westmore. The music was by Dennis McCarthy, David Bell and Jay Chattaway.

Boldly going where Star Trek didn't go before (i.e. a fourth season), Star Trek: Voyager's fifth season outing has proven against all odds that there's still life in the old franchise yet. Of course, Season Three's finale ensured that things would get off to a flying start with Scorpion, Part 2, but no one would have guessed that this level of interest would be maintained across all 26 episodes. Further-more, nobody would have believed that a member of the Borg Collective would actually prove to be the best reason to tune in each week. Yes, Jeri Ryan's recruitment as the sexy Seven of Nine certainly spiced things up on the show, providing the writers with plenty of opportunity for antagonism between the crewmembers. Of course, Jeri's ascension has been at the expense of others, with Neelix and Harry Kim getting very little to do this year (something that will be remedied in Season Five). Nevertheless, everyone got their opportunity to shine in the epic two-parters Year of Hell and The Killing Game, the latter providing a satisfactory conclusion to the innovative Hirogen story arc.

Season Six: Discounting B'Elanna, the Klingons make their first Voyager appearance in Barge of the Dead, which features the most expensive Trek set to date. Executive producer Brannon Braga admits that nearly lost Kate Mulgrew, "There was a scary moment when I didn't know whether we would get her back. Kate feels it's time to take her character to another level." So Braga is to give her a love interest, "It'll probably be with an alien or a hologram. After six years alone, she needs this." Other plots include a trio of Borg breaking away from the Collective causing problems for Seven of Nine, a new twist on a Time paradox idea, a comedy in which an alien race taps into the fantasies of the Doctor and guest appearances from Troi (Marina Sirtis) and Barclay (Dwight Schultz) in December 1999 and other from the World Wrestling Federation.

"Obviously we'll revisit the Borg and the Klingons, but there's a point when too much of that gets kind of silly. That said, I guess the reason that I'm still here is a combination of being able to get along with the producers and the other writers in an environment that can be very tense and being able to think on my feet, work in the Voyager realm, generate ideas and, in some ways as a muse for other writers. Even though an episode may say 'Written by so-and-so', we're all involved in the process during the story-breaking sessions."

Fuller's own trek to Star Trek is not an unfamiliar story to those who follow the show closely. After trying his hand at a few speculative scripts, Fuller attended a writer's workshop at a Creation convention in Pasadena, California. Now clued into the ins and outs of penning teleplays for Trek, Fuller gave it a shot and ultimately sold two ideas to the producers of Deep Space Nine. The episodes Between the Darkness and the Light and Empok Nor emerged from his pitches. Later, when the Voyager staff realized that it needed writers, Fuller's efforts paid dividends. He was called in to help write out Kes (Jennifer Lien), but time constraints meant that Joe Menosky handled the task of offing the Ocampa. Fuller's foot was in the Voyager door, however, and he soon blasted it wide open, earning his first solo teleplay credit for The Raven (with Fuller and Harry Doc Kloor receiving 'Story by' status).

"I'd always really liked Star Trek," Fuller notes, speaking from his office on the Paramount Pictures lot. "I don't have a Klingon uniform in my closet, but I liked Star Trek a lot. I got into Trek around the fourth or fifth season of The Next Generation. I thought, 'Oh, this is really cool'. Then, I really got into Deep Space Nine. I thought Deep Space Nine was wonderful. And then Voyager came along, and I thought they were doing a fine job with that, too. The first two seasons of Voyager I wasn't that into it because it seemed that it was just Next Generationesque. I didn't think that was necessarily "By the third season they were doing more interesting stories and working more with the premise of the ship and the crew being out there and isolated. Janeway [Kate Mulgrew] started to become more of an interesting character, sort of a wild card who's a Starfleet captain, but one who realizes that the Prime Directive doesn't necessarily hold rigid in the Delta Quadrant. Anyway it's very bizarre for me. I've gotten used to being a professional writer out every day, several times a day, it still occurs to me that, 'Oh, my God, I'm writing for Star Trek'. How cool is that?"

On the wings of The Raven, Fuller jumped on board as a Voyager staffer and subsequent episodes he either penned or co-penned (often in collaboration with Nick Sagan or Michael Taylor) include Mortal Coil, Retrospect, Living Witness, Drone, Gravity, Bride of Chaotica!, Course: Oblivion, Juggernaut, Relativity, Barge of the Dead, Alice, One Small Step and Spirit Folk.

Looking back over his Voyager oeuvre to date, Fuller has his favourites. "I thought that The Raven worked on several different levels," he says, quietly adding that Alice and Retrospect are his least preferred outings. "It was more a Seven of Nine [Jeri Ryan] backstory episode. You see this imperious woman who walks down the hall thinking that she's better than everyone else and then you realize that there was a tragic beginning to that character. So that was a neat story to tell, to show that this ice woman has some weight, that who she was intended to be and her identity were completely taken away from her.

"I loved Mortal Coil. I think that was my most successful episode, from beginning to end. It worked. It delivered the premise. It had a concept, facing death, that I think a lot of people could relate to. Religion is something that will forever fascinate me. Consequently Mortal Coil and Barge of the Dead have been my favourite episodes that I've done.

"I think Barge of the Dead worked up to act five, where I don't think we quite delivered the concept of Torres (Roxann Dawson) creating her own hell every day of her life by being such a bitch. I don't think it was quite delivered. It was kind of muddled and confusing. The original version was slam-bang and it ended with Torres really embracing her Klingon heritage, whereas the ending as it stands now is a little more ambiguous. I still think it's effective, but it's a different episode and wasn't sold as well as we could have sold it because [the fifth act] was sort of a last minute change."

Last minute changes, of course, are nothing new for Voyager or, for that matter, any other TV show. Still, several of the writers who've beamed off Voyager have griped that the limitations imposed on them were too extreme. Despite the fact that Star Trek creator Gene Roddenberry died nearly a decade ago, franchise guardian Rick Berman had considered it his ongoing mission to expand the franchise while remaining as true as possible to the foundation that Roddenberry built. Thus, for better and for worse, audiences have been treated to Trek shows with humanoid aliens (all of which must have eyes) and a relative lack of sex, religion and violence, especially as compared to other current Sci-Fi series.

Nipped in the bud "You know it's not horrifyingly limiting," argues Fuller, who has toiled on several episodes that were ultimately shot down, including one in which he killed off Ensign Wildman (Nancy Hower). "And it's usually limiting for good reason. I'll use the Wildman episode as an example. Even when we were breaking that and I was writing the first incarnation of it, I was like, 'Oh, my God, I can't believe they're letting me do this. I'm going to be killing this young mother. She's going to come back from the dead and try to kill her daughter [Scarlett Pomers and Naomi Wildman]. Wow! This is some dark-dark, morbid stuff.' I knew on some level that it was a matter of time before it was nipped. It just went through so many versions before we got nipped.

"There is some stuff I'd like to do that's a little more dark, a little more broad. My senses are very much skewed toward a melding of Sci-Fi and Horror. I love it when Sci-Fi and Horror can meet. The Alien series, at least the first and second Alien films, would be the ultimate examples of what Sci-Fi and Horror [together] can do, and I'd love to do more of the spooky, freaky, eerie stuff. But Voyager is a family show, it's not a show I created.

It's not a show for which I chose the demographics. So I, as a professional writer, have to work within those boundaries. And I do that very happily. It's part of the learning experience. It's not a bad thing to try to push the envelope, but you have to realize when you've gone beyond the boundaries of Voyager and pull it back " Anyone who ever speaks with writers discovers that each one most enjoys a different phase of the process. Some relish the instant an idea pops into their head, while others love story-breaking sessions. Some like to stand on the stage and watch actors breathe life into their words and others most prefer to watch dailies, the assembled rough cut of a given episode (called an on-line) or the sweetened version that reaches the living rooms of viewers. Fuller prefers watching the on-line version.

"That's when it's all cut together, but there are no sound effects and no special effects," he says. "When you watch dailies, you can tell if the performances are on the money, which they almost always are with our cast. You can tell if the directing is as good as it can be, if that angle will cut together with the single shot, if that two-shot will go with that master. When you watch the finished product, you don't have to worry about any of that. You can sort of sit back and enjoy it for what it is. And without the sound effects and special effects, you can see if the writing, acting and directing delivered the concept. I also like to watch the version people see at home because the Star Trek fan in me likes to see that."

Fuller's phone has buzzed several times during this conversation and it does so again now. This time, Fuller groans audibly. He's got to head into a meeting. And so the discussion ends with a few quick thoughts about the end of Voyager, about whether or not the ship should be brought home. Fuller points out that if the ship got home, Janeway would probably not be disciplined, as she managed to bring two crews together and keep them together for seven years. As for those crewman who were Maquis rebels, including Chakotay (Robert Beltran), Paris (Robert Duncan McNeill), Fuller figures that they'll get off with reprimands. After all, they were ultimately right about the Cardassian threat and they helped Janeway and the others survive their adventures in the Delta Quadrant. "It would be nice to bring them all back with enough time to develop the effects of getting home," Fuller concludes "And then I'd like to send them all out of another wonderful journey Academy of Science Fiction, Fantasy and Horror Films.

STAR WOLF

AKA: UCHU NO YUSHA STAR WOLF

AKA: COSMIC HERO STAR WOLF

In the 21st Century, Earth is attacked by raiders from Valnastar. One of the number, Ken (Azuma), realizes that one of the Earth people he is about to shoot is a boy with the same name as his and refuses to kill the boy or his mother. When his partner attempts to execute them himself, Ken kills him in the ensuing scuffle. Ken is forced to steal a ship to evade capture but is set upon by fighters that leave his vessel crippled. After drifting for a while in space, he is picked up by the crew of the Terran ship Bakkus III: Captain Joe (Shishido), pilot Ryu / Rocky (Takahashi), computer expert Hime/Tami (Tanigawa), and cadet Billy (Tachikawa).

Ken helps them escape another Valnastar attack. The crew take him to seek medical attention but he runs away, afraid that their kindness will evaporate when they discover that he was once one of the invaders who are attacking their home world.

Finally accepted into the crew after demonstrating that he has the strength of ten men, Ken accompanies them on their new mission to Karau, a world with a Middle Eastern theme, where the pugnacious Ken soon lands himself in prison after killing a brawler in a local bar. Meanwhile, Ken is pursued by Reeja/Rita (Shimazaki), his former lover, now on a vendetta because she is also the sister of the partner he killed in the first episode! She is shot by prison guards but not before revealing to Ken that his "treachery" was only to be expected, as he is not a true Valnastarian at all but the child of missionaries from Earth.

Escaping back to the Bakkus III, Ken foils an attempted mutiny by crewman Yorolin (Muramatsu) and steers the ship through a black hole to escape. After almost getting caught in a supernova, the crew reach Yorolin's homeworld of Sasser (Sisser in the English version), where they are ordered to destroy a doomsday device. Crash landing in the "Devil's Desert", Ken helps them infiltrate the enemy base by bodily throwing his fellows over the fence. They destroy the doomsday device with a bomb, although the turn coat Yorolin dies trying to deactivate it.

For the second half of the series renamed Cosmic Hero Star Wolf from episode 14 onward, Ken and his colleagues must defend the universe from a succession of monsters-of-the-week, including Nipopo the Space Dinosaur, an "android" that looks suspiciously like a man in a fireman's outfit painted gold, and a "space bounty hunter".

The success of Star Wars (1977) created a new wave of interest in science fiction, met in Japan by such productions as the Star Blazers movie and the animated adaptations of E.E. Doc Smith's Lensman and Edmond Hamilton's Captain Future. Not to be outdone, the Tsuburaya studio tried this live-action adaptation of Hamilton's Star Wolf books - Weapon from Beyond (1967), The Closed Worlds (1968), and World of the Star Wolves (1969). As with Star Wars fellow Tsuburaya series Time of the Apes and MIGHTY JACK, the first 14 episodes of Star Wolf were re-edited into two features, dubbed into English, and broadcast in the United States, under the titles Fugitive Alien (1978) and Star Force: Fugitive Alien II (1978). In this format, both movies appeared on MYSTERY SCIENCE THEATRE 3000. For another adaptation of famous American Science Fiction, see FLOWERS FOR ALGERNON.

The series was produced by Hiromi Kato, Masunosuke Ohashi, Noboru Tsuburaya and Akira Tsuburaya.

STARFLEET

AKA: X-BOMBER

AKA: EKKUSU BONDA

Animated puppet series from Japan, set in the year 2999. Space War Three has ended and the solar system is being rebuilt, led by planet Earth. But hostile planets and aliens are out to sabotage their efforts. At the heart of the story is Lamia, a young princess like character whose destiny is bound up with the advent of the new millennium when she will emerge as the mysterious F-01, a benign force with the power to bring peace and order to the whole of the solar system.

The top bad guy, the Imperial Master, wants her dead before the year 3000, otherwise his evil power cannot rule the galaxy. He sends his forces, led by Commander Makara, a bizarre male/female Fu-Manchu type character on a seek and destroy mission. Standing in their way are Earth's Star Fleet, under General Kyle. The fleet's principle craft is the X-Bomber, designed by Professor Hagen and crewed his son Shiro, Barry Hercules, John Lee, Doctor Been and Lamia.

Lurking protectively in the background is another mystery man, Captain Halley, commander of a space galleon called The Skull. The tide of battle ebbs and flows until Lamia and the Star Fleet win a final victory.

The series was first shown on LWT in the UK in 1983. The producer and director was Louis Elman, executive producer was Kevin Morrison and the music was created by Paul Bliss. This Japanese puppet show was very reminiscent of the Japanese SF on TV at the time in Japan, taking its cue from superheroes such as ULTRAMAN or KAMEN RIDER, only in puppet version. It never enjoyed the massive success that Anime had in Japan, and never developed the cult following of such shows as ULTRAMAN or KAMEN RIDER.

Oriental space-weirdness, this time in the shape of intergalactic puppetry. Who could forget the jiving might of Barry Hercules? The heroic innocence of Shiro? The mighty X-Bomber? That wobbling, furry thing? We all watched in wonder as they battled across the galaxy trying to protect the F-01 (other wise known as Princess Lamia) throughout 2999, as without her there'd be no fourth millennium. And let's not forget the talking eye patches, lobster cyber-implants, giant robots and ancient prophecies. . . Plus the Imperial Master, his strange hermaphroditic minion Commander Makara, the Die-X giant robot and the Professor Hagen puppet, which actually smoked! It lasted forever and it was bloody fantastic.

The puppet show X-Bomber was conceived as a deliberate attempt to outdo NHK's AERIAL CITY 008 and its ultimate inspiration THUNDERBIRDS, utilizing the design talents of Go Nagai, creator of Devilman and Getter Robo. With only a fraction of the THUNDERBIRDS budget available, X-Bomber was deemed a failure on its original Japanese broadcast and was taken off air after just 12 episodes. However, it gained a new lease of life in the UK, when it was dubbed into English and broadcast as Star Fleet. Under this title, it introduced the cliches and traditions of Japanese children's Sci-Fi to an entire generation - from the attack craft that combine to form the Dai X giant robot to the shocking deaths of major characters adding genuine pathos. Though common knowledge today in the wake of MIGHTY MORPHIN' POWER RANGERS the attitude and style of Japanese sci-fi made Star Fleet an impressive and much-loved example of the genre.

There was also some renaming - Ben Robinson, became Doctor Benn, Shiro Ginga become Shiro Hagen, Bongo Herakles become Barry Hercules and Bigman (presumably a reference to a similar character in Isaac Asimov's Space Ranger) became John Lee. Among the supporting cast Bloody Mary was transformed into Commander Makara, her lieutenant Kozslo become Orion, and Captain Custer become Captain Carter.

The new voices included long-time Gerry Anderson collaborator Denise Bryer and actors such as Garrick Hagon, Liza Ross, and Peter Marinker, who would also star in Water Margin and a succession of Manga Entertainment anime dubs. The 24 episode British series (which lost one from the grand total by combining episodes 18 and 19) was later brought to the US, where it dies a second ignominious death, hacked into an eight-part series of straight-to-video features. In 2002, X-Bomber was re-released in Japan on DVD, with one of the English Language movie edits included as an extra. The Japanese characters also appeared in a 1980 manga spin-off, drawn by Eiichi Saito, while the U.K. incarnation was adapted into a separate six-month comic strip in the British children's weekly Look-In, by Angus Allan and Alan Noble. Theme: Vow Wow - "Solider in the Space."

Notes: It is common misconception that the music for the series was by Queen guitarist Brian May. Although May did release his own version of the English theme song, the original U.K. version was by Paul Bliss, a former keyboardist with the Moody Blues.

The series was produced by Kimio Ikeda. Original Music by Paul Bliss (English soundtrack), Toshihiro Niimi, Mitsuhiro Saitô, Kyôji Yamamoto.
Special Effects by Kiyotaka Matsumoto (special effects director).

STARGATE SG1

The SG-1 team is brought together for the exploration of newly discovered stargates and the destruction of the serpent god who has abducted a human and two abbydons. Stargate SG1 began well, with the discovery of other stargates in the galaxy and the organisation of a team of explorers to boldly go where no heavily armed technologically advanced humans have gone before. Various people - Vikings, Greeks, Arabs - kidnapped from Earth by alien races over the last few thousand years occupy many of the worlds. Of course, they all speak contemporary English. . . And there is the heart of the problem with the series.

This series is based on the successful SF film Stargate by Roland Emmerich and Dean Devlin who went on to make Independence Day and Godzilla. Based on the film hit Stargate, the original-to-cable series Stargate SG1 is shown on pay network Showtime, then a year later episodes enter the syndication market, following the same marketing formula as the original-to-Showtime programs THE OUTER LIMITS, and Poltergeist: The Legacy. Executive producers for the series were Jonathan Glassner and Brad Wright, co-executive producer was Michael Greenburg. The key roles from the film were recast when the movie was transformed into a series. Unlike other shows adapted from movies Stargate SG1 is a direct sequel to the film, picking up the action one year later. The series was first seen in the US on The Showtime channel.

Alexis Cruz was the only actor who starred in the film who also starred in the TV series. Various famous guest stars included Armin Shimerman (STAR TREK : DEEP SPACE NINE), Dwight Schultz (STAR TREK: THE NEXT GENERATION, The A-Team) and James Earl Jones who was the voice for Darth Vader in the Star Wars films. Critics, especially in the US hated the show when it first started, and fans of the original Stargate film queued up to say how poor the series was as compared to the film, but it was soon after that the rating began to pick up and the show became a hit. Whilst shows such as MERCY POINT on UPN (United Paramount Network) were cancelled after a mere two episodes, a show like Stargate SG1 moved along quite nicely.

The show has gained success in the UK during its run on Sky One, getting better ratings than STAR TREK: VOYAGER. The special effects for the show were done by Gadjeci Visual Effects (GVFX) based in Toronto, they were also responsible for the effects on shows such as THE OUTER LIMITS, THE VISITOR, ROBOCOP: THE SERIES and TOTAL RECALL 2070.

The source movie seemed to have difficulties in stretching its flimsy premise over the course of two hours, so what chance did a weekly series have? Movie creators Dean Devlin and Roland Emmerich lam-basted the series, decrying that it was an insult to their masterpiece, but was it really that bad? Well, the answer is 'yes and no', because the series does spin erratically between OK and appalling. To be fair, the weaker episodes were in the early part of the first season, and thus can be attributed to the actors (and writers) getting a firm handle on the characters. Season Two is showing some uninspired promise, but let's just wait and see how much mileage can be derived from the limited premise.

Richard Dean Anderson was also in General Hospital, playing Dr Jeff Webber from 1976 to 1981. It was this role, in one of America's best known daytime Soaps, that helped launch his career. He went on to star in the 1982 series Seven Brides for Seven Brothers and Emerald Point NAS in 1983, both of which only lasted a season. However, he is best known for MacGyver in which he starred as a former Special Forces agent fighting against the bad guys for the Phoenix Foundation. The series ran for seven seasons and was followed by two tv movie specials which Anderson executive produced, along with Michael Greenburg, both of whom now executive produce Stargate SG-1. Anderson's next series remains his favourite, LEGEND, a western in which he starred as Ernest Pratt/Nicodemus Legend.

Richard Dean Anderson was born on 23rd January 1950 in Minneapolis and originally wanted to be a professional hockey player. His dreams were dashed when he broke both arms in separate accidents on the ice and he turned his ambitions to acting, studying drama at both St Cloud State College and Ohio University. He subsequently moved to Los Angeles where he earned money as a street mime artist, a jester/singer/mime/juggler in cabaret and a writer/director/performer at Marineland, before landing the job on General Hospital. He has appeared in many television movies including Ordinary Heroes, Past the Bleachers, Eyes of a Stranger, Beyond Betrayal and Through the Eyes of a Killer. He also made a mini-series in 1996, PANDORA'S CLOCK. His big screen films include Firehouse and Odd Jobs. He still plays hockey, and helped create the Celebrity All-Star Hockey team which raises funds for charity. His other pet charity is the Challengers Club, a children's recreational centre in LA. He lists his other hobbies and interests as racing cars, skiing and dogs. Don S. Davis who played General Hammond, starred in MacGyver with Richard Dean Anderson, he also starred in David Lynch's Twin Peaks.

Season Three: After the settling in of Season Two, Season Three promises the action-packed extravaganza you have come to expect. The show will also start using the continuity of previous season's episodes as the basis for stories, possibly a bad move if they wish to entice new viewers into their fanbase. Although this is great news if you like continuing plot threads. Character definition is already high, but fan pressure exists to bring Carter and O'Neill together. Will the writers bow to it? The sticky subject does get address more so then ever in the sticky episode "Point of View", although star and executive producer Richard Dean Anderson thinks it would be a mistake to lead into a full blown romance at this point. He says, "Obviously, we'll have to face it eventually for now it's just a matter of laying breadcrumbs along the trail for the audience to find. . . We'll just have to be patient and see what happens."

Being one of the executive producers of a hit television series such as Stargate SG-1 is like being a quick-change artist. On any given day, Jonathan Glassner must wear several different hats and juggle a number of tasks in order to send the SG-1 team through the Stargate and off on another mission.

"It's a pretty big job and it starts with the stories," he says. "Brad Wright [fellow executive producer] and I have story meetings just about every day with our staff writers. We also get written and verbal pitches from writers here in Vancouver [British Columbia, where the series is filmed] and Toronto as well as Los Angeles. After we choose a story we have to pitch it to the executives at the [MGMJ studio and get their approval. Then either me, Brad or another writer will go off and write an outline and then the actual episode.

"While one episode is being shot we're prepping for another. I should mention that Michael Greenberg and Richard Dean Anderson [Colonel Jack O'Neill], our two other executive producers, are on the set overseeing the actual filming while Brad and I are doing the prep work.

We'll have a production meeting where we sit around with the heads of every department and go through the script line-by-line and figure out how we're going to pull it all off. We decide which scenes need to be cut due to scheduling or budgetary constraints and, conversely, people may suggest some cool things we can add that aren't in the script.

"Our longest and most `painful' discussion is usually a five-hour visual effects meeting. We have to go through every effect and say, `This has never been done before. Is this possible? How are we going to do this?'" Usually we have at least one effect in every story that nobody's ever attempted and we have to figure out the mechanics of how to do it. There's sometimes talk of chickening out," laughs Greenberg, "but usually we try it and, although it may cost us lots of money, it's fun to see the final product.

"All this is interwoven with post-production," he adds. "I might be running over to the editing room and making changes to a cut of one of the stories or I'm working with the composer and seeing where the music cues go. Ultimately, we watch a mix of the episode after the music and effects have been added and give our notes for any adjustments that have to be made. I'm also usually writing a script or rewriting somebody else's. Brad, Robert Cooper [series co-producer] or I will run every script through our computer. One of us has written or rewritten every script and that's what gives the show its consistency."

Glassner had plenty of training for this marathon schedule. Prior to Stargate SG-1 he served as an executive producer, writer and director for MGM's and Showtime's The Outer Limits. It is also where Glassner struck up his friendship and professional association with Brad Wright. "Brad was originally brought in to work on the show for Canadian content reasons and some of my bosses didn't have a whole lot of faith in him because of this. They had it in their minds that this was the only reason he was hired and they couldn't see beyond that.

"When I read his first script I said, `This guy is really talented. Let's put him on staff.' So that's what we did and he became what I used to call our lean, mean writing machine. Along with writing his own stuff, whenever a script came in from a free-lancer that was bad we would give it to Brad and he'd do a whole rewrite on it. He probably wrote six or seven scripts a season. It's great to have a writer to work with that you have that much faith in and that remains true to this day. He's also turned out to be a very talented producer." Having executive produced The Outer Limits for a number of seasons, Glassner wanted a change and considered leaving the show and moving back to Los Angeles to pursue work there. However, the studio was reluctant to lose his services and offered Glassner other assignments.

He suggested to its president John Symes that the 1994 MGM feature film Stargate would make a great television series and asked to write the pilot. Unknown to him, Wright had mentioned the same thing to Symes on a separate occasion. "MGM was in negotiations at the time with Dean Devlin and Roland Emmerich, who made the film, to do the television show," he explains. "I guess that fell through and at that point John came to Brad and I and said, 'How about if you do it together?' We both said, 'Yes,' because we had got along so well on The Outer Limits.

"We were very lucky with Stargate because of the brilliant business arrangement that the Showtime cable network and MGM made and the faith that Showtime had in the series. We got a 44 episode order right off the bat and that makes it much easier to mount a programme this laden with special effects and, frankly, expensive to produce. Because of this we can showcase some of the more costly effects over 44 episodes rather than over half-a-dozen stories like you would on a regular series on a conventional network."

Symes was able to secure the services of actor Richard Dean Anderson to star in the series and act as one of its executive producers. The actor's long-time friend and business partner in Gekko Productions, Michael Greenberg, was also brought onboard to help with the show's executive producer duties. Casting the rest of the characters was left to Glassner and Wright, who auditioned actors from all over North America to fill the combat boots of the SG-1 team.

"We watched videotapes of all those auditions and after a while our eyes started glossing over," chuckles Glassner. "For Teal'c we wanted someone who didn't look like your average Joe. He's supposed to be alien and we wanted him to look somewhat unique and have a strong, intimidating presence. Whoever we chose also had to be able to act and, believe it or not, that combination is quite difficult to find in a actor. Fortunately for us, Christopher walked in and everyone agreed.

"We might as well not see anybody else because he's Teal'c. "With Michael Shanks we were looking for somebody to play Doctor Daniel Jackson who had an intelligence to him as well as a leading man-type charisma. Again, that's hard to find because you usually end up with someone who has the intelligence but who acts like a geek or a stereotype. Instead we found, I think, a guy with brains and who a lot of young ladies around the world are madly in love with. Michael's an amazing actor. We keep throwing these weird things at him to do and he manages to pull every one of them off. We're thrilled with him.

"Amanda Tapping [Major Samantha Carter] was a similar scenario. We wanted the best of both worlds and our casting people said we were crazy. We were looking for a woman whom the audience could believe was a tough soldier and a Desert Storm veteran. At the same time she had to be attractive and have the smarts to be an astrophysicist. Amanda came in and nailed the part. No matter how much technojargon we write for her she says it as if she understands it, mostly because she does. Amanda does her homework and finds out what it all means. Sometimes she even comes into work and says, 'I looked this up and it doesn't make sense.' So we certainly lucked out because we've got a great cast."

Glassner expresses similar kudos for Stargate SG-1's production designer Richard Hudolin, who has been with the series since its pilot episode Children of the Gods. "Brad and I really didn't know Richard at the time," Glassner recalls. "We were kind of rolling the dice based on his credentials but when he first came in with a little model of the set as he envisioned it we both said, 'Wow, this is neat. It looks so real.' The sets were initially built in a Vancouver soundstage that's the largest in North America, and we filled that entire space, which is unheard of for a tv series. I remember walking on the sets for the first time when they were finished and thinking, 'My God, we're actually doing this.'"

The executive producer co-wrote Children of the Gods with Wright and has penned a number of the show's episodes on his own. His favourite so far is the third season story Forever in a Day in which Daniel Jackson is reunited with his wife Sha're (Vaitare Bandera). "I'm proud of this one because a lot of people are teary-eyed in it," he says. "It's a very emotional episode and not one of what we call our run-and-jump episodes. Although it's got the largest action sequence we've ever done in its opening teaser it's not so much an action story as it is a good human drama.

"Stargate is a tough show to write for," continues Glassner. "One of the reasons for this is that we want to give something to all of our leads to do in every episode and occasionally that's a challenge if the plot centres on just one of them. We also have to try to keep things plausible. It's very easy to wander off into fantasy land on a show like ours. Some of the pitches we get can be pretty outlandish and it sometimes becomes a balancing act trying to maintain the show as Science Fiction and not Fantasy."

Although Stargate SG-1 employs a team of regular directors, Glassner is occasionally called upon to work behind the cameras. He has directed two episodes of the series, The Torment of Tantalus and the second-season opener The Serpent's Lair. "One of the biggest challenges for me when I'm directing is wearing so many hats, you know? I'm still involved in the script development for future episode, and usually post-production for past episodes. I'll be on the set lining up a shot and somebody might come up to me and say,

'We need your notes on this cut.' So that part of it can be a little distracting.

"Serpent's Lair was a very ambitious episode for a television series and we had to figure out ways to do things on our schedule. We shot that episode in eight days and it has some scenes in it that for a feature film would have taken a week to shoot. For example, all the stuff in the def-gliders. We built a def-glider cockpit and put it up on a five-foot gimbal. A bunch of grips rocked it and moved it about and a camera on a big crane swooped around to simulate flight. It took us a whole day to film that stuff. We also shot a lot of footage in what we call a virtual set, which is made up entirely of matte paintings and computer-generated images. This meant that the actors had to run around a big, blue room against blue screens and pretend things were there," he laughs. "It was hard work but we also had fun.

"Torment of Tantalus was much more of a conventional episode in that it only had one real sort of action sequence but it was a bit scary for me. We built a giant set of the inside of this ancient structure which our special effects people then rigged to collapse. However, it was built to collapse in a controlled way and we knew exactly where every piece of it would land. We were literally dropping 20-foot girders from the ceiling and having them land at an angle barely a foot from the stuntmen. That was a little nerve-wracking for me because I'd never done anything like that before as a director. I thought for sure something would go wrong but I had to trust the crew and, as usual, they pulled it off and did a great job."

Being one of the behind-the-scenes people responsible for the making of a hit television series is a far cry from Glassner's original ambition to become an actor. He had appeared in summer stock and several local theatre productions prior to enrolling as a theatre major at Northwestern University. Unfortunately, it was not long before Glassner decided to reassess his career plans. "Northwestern is one of the top theatre schools in the country and it attracts talented kids from all over the world," he notes. "I thought I was a big-shot actor but when I got there I discovered I was the worst actor in the class. I thought, 'If it's like this here what's it like in New York City or Los Angeles? I'll never make it.' I talked with a television/film professor who convinced me that I should switch majors, so I did and began studying to be a director."

"One day a director named Bob Thompson came to speak at our school. He said something that really stuck in my mind which was, 'The quickest way to become a director in Hollywood is to first become a writer.' That day I changed my schedule and began to take writing courses. He was right. I wrote my way into [television] producing and started giving myself directing jobs." With Stargate SG-1 guaranteed at least an 88-episode run, Glassner and the rest of the show's production team will return to Vancouver in February to begin work on its fourth season. In the meantime, he is busy writing a Science Fiction pilot for the Fox Network. "I'm fortunate to work in a field where I can use my imagination," says Glassner. "I couldn't ask for a better sand box in which to play."

Needless to say we were a bit taken aback by all of this. After that - maybe it was good karma or maybe we had used up all our bad luck it began to get warmer, the rain stopped, everyone pulled together and we started to make the series. That first day was the toughest, and if it had been a harbinger of what was to come I think we all would have shot ourselves," jokes Wright.

"Another problem we had was that stages five and six at Bridge Studios, where our standing sets for Stargate are housed, weren't ready in time to shoot the pilot. We ended up building these gigantic sets in the effects stage at Bridge Studios, which is a huge stage but it doesn't really have very good acoustics. The plan was to film the pilot and one episode there and then go on location for three episodes to allow the crew to move everything to its permanent home by the end of February [1997]. I couldn't believe it, but we did it, and that's a testament to the design of the sets and to Thom Wells [construction coordinator] and Richard Hudolin [production designer], who made it all happen."

One of the initial challenges facing the show's production team was having to create new extraterrestrial locales for Colonel Jack O'Neill (Richard Dean Anderson) and the SG-1 team to visit every week. The city of Vancouver, its suburbs and surrounding countryside provide a cornucopia of contemporary settings for such television programmes as Seven Days and Secret Agent Man. However, when it comes to alien landscapes, the choice is limited.

"The difficult thing about Stargate is that as a television series it's fairly massive in scope," explains the executive producer. "It's a big concept. I mean, the Stargate itself is 20 feet high. When we 'visit' another planet and want to put a Stargate there, which makes sense considering our heroes arrive through one, that means that the walls of our set have to be at least 30 feet high. "Suddenly you're building this huge set just to accommodate the Stargate. The solution to that is to go outdoors on location. Well, we can do that but there are only so many areas in and around Vancouver that don't have trees. In some of our early episodes it was, 'OK, here we are on this planet with trees and the following week it was, 'Here's another planet and, oh, look, it has trees.' We had a hard time mixing the stories up enough to make it appear as if, yes, some planets do have trees, but there are other worlds that have a totally different look and feel.

"So what we've done over the past three seasons to help alleviate this problem is use matte paintings to indicate that the-outdoors are, in fact, entirely of our own making. For example, in the third-season two-part episode The Devil You Know and Jolinar's Memories, we used CGI technology to 'place' our actors into these matte paintings that will blow viewers' minds. One look and they're sure to think, 'There's no way this was shot in Vancouver.' "We also found an area just outside town with these massive piles of yellow sulfur ", he adds.

"Unfortunately, it's near the airport and it has a million other production problems but it's as close to desert as you can get here. This was a little ace I had up my sleeve for the first-season episode Cold Lazarus in which SG-1 walks through what looks like a desert of yellow sand. It was quite impressive, even if I do say so myself. There were a couple of vista shots that were helped by matte paintings and the brilliant blue sky we were lucky enough to have that day only added to the illusion. Filming on this type of surface can be tricky, though, so I don't know if the crew will ever let me go there again"

Although visual stimulus is important when it comes to entertainment, the key to keeping an audiences' attention is a solid story. Wright's primary job as an executive producer on Stargate is to make sure he, Glassner and the show's writing staff deliver - an engaging season of stories every year. He and Glassner co-wrote the show's pilot, Children of the Gods, and a handful of other episodes. One he is most proud of is Point of View, a compelling third-season episode 'that revisits the mirror universe originally seen in the first-season story There But for the Grace of God.

"There's a scene between Sam Carter (Amanda Tapping) and O'Neill, except it's not our Major Carter but Doctor Carter from the alternate universe. I wanted to write this episode just for that scene, which is a love scene between Carter and our O'Neill. In his reality they weren't lovers and they never married, but in hers they had and he'd just died. I really love that scene, although as a former actor I know it was a real bitch to do. Not only was it dramatic but there was a string Science Fiction theme running through it. Sometimes it's hard for actors to fully grasp such way-out concepts, but God bless Rick and Amanda for being able to do just that and for making that scene work so completely.

"We're fortunate in that our cast is very smart. We have a read-through for almost every story, if possible, and in that time they just don't ask questions like, 'Why do I say this,' or, 'What's going on here?' They're so in tune with this show and their characters that in some cases they'll point out a discrepancy or a little hole in a script. If they find something they want to change it's usually for a good reason, so they'll ask us and we'll say, 'Absolutely, you're right. Change it.' They certainly keep us on our toes."

The executive producer has also written several of his own stories for the show including the second-season episode A Matter of Time in which the effects from a black hole threaten to destroy the Earth. "I wasn't quite sure how this one would turn out. I imagined our characters having to climb sideways into the gate room because of the strong g-forces emanating from the gravity well on the other side of the Stargate. How do you film that? The visual effects required for that episode were demanding to say the least, but our FX guys worked wonders and we ended up with some neat shots.

"Just to jump around the seasons, one of the episodes I wrote for our first year, Solitudes, called for us to build a giant glacier and crevice. I really wanted to make sure it felt cold in there and I said to the visual effects people, '[James] Cameron made mist come out of the actors' mouths in Titanic, can we do that?' They said, 'Well, we can afford to do a few shots,' Our producer John Smith said, 'Wait a minute. Why don't we just bring in some big refrigeration units and freeze the whole damn stage?' I said, 'Come on, we can't do that, can we?' He said, 'Sure! That way when the actors exhale it'll be real breath.'

"Believe me, Rick and Amanda weren't acting when they were shivering and holding each others hands trying to stay warm," says Wright. "It was 35 degrees in there and those guys were really cold! Just like the desert scene in Cold Lazarus, we were able to suspend belief for a moment and make audiences ask themselves, 'Did they go to a glacier to do this?' No, but we made it appear as if we did.

"You know, had Jonathan and I not done Outer Limits I don't think we would have been prepared to tackle Stargate. To have to do multiple types of visual effects that an anthology series such as Outer Limits demands was an incredible learning experience. Of course, because it was an anthology I got to destroy Earth at least a half-dozen times," laughs the executive producer, "but, occasionally, I also saved it.

Creatively, I miss the show. As a matter of fact, I keep getting story ideas for it. I'll go see Sam Egan, who's the current executive producer and a friend of mine and say, 'Hey, Sam, you can do this if you want.' He'll say, 'OK, write it for us,' and I'll tell him, 'Sure, if you write one of mine.' Sadly, I don't have the time because Stargate is so demanding."

Colonel O'Neill and the SG-1 team never know what to expect when they step through the Stargate each week. Occasionally, however, the Stargate cast and crew can be taken by surprise even when the cameras are not rolling. Work on the third-season's penultimate story Crystal Skull had almost been completed when Wright got some disturbing news. "I received a phone call around 6:30 on a Monday morning," he recalls. "It was John Smith, who said, 'Michael Shanks [Doctor Daniel Jackson] had an emergency appendectomy last night.' My first concern, naturally, was Michael's health because an operation like that can put you out of commission for a while. Our president at MGM, Hank Cohen, told me that as a kid he went through the same thing and it laid him up for a long time.

"Once I found out that Michael was going to be OK I immediately had to come up with a plan to get him out of the season finale. It's fairly well set up at the start of the story that our characters are taking vacations and all going their separate ways, but then O'Neill gets zapped up into Thor's ship and the action begins. I thought, 'Well, we could say that Daniel was on a plane and couldn't get back. Or perhaps he's suffering with illness from a previous mission. Yes, that's it!'

"I got to work the next morning and told Robert Cooper, who wrote the episode, my brilliant idea. He suggested, 'Why not just give him appendicitis?' I said, 'Oh, never thought of that.' It seemed so obvious, especially when you consider that out of all the Stargate characters Daniel Jackson has been hurt the most. So an appendix attack is kind of ironic in his case. I have to say that Michael was a real trouper during all of this. He came in within five or six days after having surgery and did his close-ups for the story [Crystal Skull] he hadn't completed and then shot scenes for the season finale. Don't worry all you Michael Shanks fans out there, Daniel's not absent from the last episode of the season," assures Wright.

Filming of Stargate's third season finished last October but Wright and the rest of the production team were already hard at work planning Season Four, which begins shooting in February. Upcoming episodes include a journey to the original Goa'uld homeworld and the return of SG-1's arch enemy Apophis (Peter Williams). One major change for the fourth season is the departure of Jonathan Glassner, who is moving on to develop other projects, but will still be a creative consultant for the series.

"Jonathan and I have been remarkably good at spinning yarns out of thin air while under duress," jokes Wright. "Whenever it seemed as if everything was falling apart, we could calmly sit down together and dream up an idea that ended up becoming a pretty good or, sometimes, great story. He's a terrific guy and I'm going to miss having such a powerful writing machine across the hall."

Wright is thrilled with Stargate's continued success in first-run cable and worldwide syndication but does not intend to rest on his laurels when it comes to its future. "We can't get stale," he says. "I don't want to get to a point where the viewers are saying, 'Isn't this a variation on one they've already done?' We have to make sure that we continue to come up with solid, entertaining stories. After all, that's what us Science Fiction fans want."

Eryl Rothery shrieks with delight when asked to list any obvious similarities between herself and the cool unflappable medic she portrays on MGM/Showtime's cult success Stargate SG-1, announcing, "I'm not the least bit like Janet Fraiser! It's so funny," she insists, "because Janet is so serious - well most of the time she's dealing with serious issues - but I am the total opposite. I mean, Janet handles things, but I'm the type who - if there is somebody else around in an emergency situation - I leave them to it. We are completely opposite in that respect." Certainly it's hard to see where the calm, capable Dr Fraiser and her irrepressible counterpart Rothery cross over. Bubbly, bouncy and bursting full of the joys of the season, the actress's effervescent personality seems to be the complete antithesis of her screen persona. "I'm always laughing and goofing around," she admits. "I'm a total kook!"

What is apparent is that Ms Rothery's skill and dedication to her profession brought its own rewards when the executive producers of the series came to choose the right woman for the job. Having chalked up appearances in no less than 16 television movies, umpteen television guest appearances and several movie credits, including the award-winning Warriors of Virtue, the actress was much in demand, but modestly puts her good fortune in obtaining the Stargate SG-1 role down to fate. "I just thank my lucky stars that I became involved because actually I was living in LA but had auditioned for a TV movie which was shooting in Vancouver. Whilst I was in Canada, my agent got a call and said they wanted to offer me a part on Stargate SG-1 and I thought 'Terrific'.

I had worked with Jonathan Glassner and Brad Wright (co-executive producers and writers) on a couple of episodes of The Outer Limits so they knew my work and when Mike Greenburg [the third man] saw me it all worked out. I can't tell you how pleased I am to be here." Although she originally auditioned alongside Amanda Tapping for the part of Captain Samantha Carter, Rothery was more than happy to accept the role as the top-flight doctor assigned to the highly classified Stargate Command. "My agent said the character 'may recur'," she laughs. Three years down the line, Dr Fraiser's position is such that she consistently finds herself in major life and death situations from investigating virus cures to plagues that could kill the entire human race to finding ways of dealing with recalcitrant SG-1 team members. Rothery's portrayal of the character is so convincing that it's hard to go along with her assertion that, "it's all down to how it was written."

According to the actress, Fraiser's whole psyche is based on an initial episode called The Broca Divide. "That episode showed not only Fraiser's strength of character but it also showed she had tremendous compassion... One of my favourite scenes is still the one with O'Neill (Richard Dean Anderson) where he asks her to experiment on him to find a cure for an horrific disease. The character has evolved as the show has, because all of a sudden you'll get flashes of Fraiser's sense of humour or her dryness or a bit about her background and it's just been this on-going development. I really like Janet." She smiles. "She is the most wonderful person to play."

Rothery also has great affection for the other lead female in the fight to save the world against marauding invaders. "Amanda [Tapping] and I have formed a tremendous bond of friendship as people and within the context of our characters." Expressing her gratitude to the writers that they haven't followed the usual formula, which dictates that with two women in the show one has to be seriously over-the-top strong and everyone else is peripheral, Rothery maintains that Dr Fraiser and Major Carter are allowed to show equal strength and femininity in their respective ways. "On occasion when we've been trying to stress a point we stand up for each other too. For example, we had one scene where Janet needs to go and get penicillin for a patient who is going to die, but O'Neill is opposed to the idea and Samantha steps in to help sell the point. Both of us knew it just wasn't going to happen but it's at times like that where I find there is not only a really good friendship developing between the women, but also the fact that they are scientists and see things the same way means they very much support each other."

Asked if she can foresee a time when there is likely to be any major bone of contention between the two characters, Rothery is decidedly sceptical. "Well, you never know what the writers are going to come up with but if you were to ask me, I can't see that happening. I really can't. Sam and Janet have a very sound relationship. They are not only colleagues in work and really good friends but they are essentially raising a child together." Speaking of a young girl rescued from certain death by the SG-1 team, Rothery explains that, "Cassandra has an amazing bond with Sam but because she is always going off-planet it made more sense for Janet to take the youngster in. But it's a very communal type of raising. We're joint surrogate mums."

All this child rearing has come in very handy in recent months as a couple of new babies have appeared on the Stargate SG-1 scene, one belonging to Ms Rothery herself. "Yes, I have a wee one," beams the proud 'parent', "And I swear to you she'd melt your little heart." Mind you - we're not talking about the nappy wetting two-legged kind. The newest arrival at Stargate Command has four legs, a waggly tail and a pair of very long ears. Launching into an hilarious Thelma and Louise-type accent, the actress drawls, "Her name is Bodie - actually it's Beauden - and how it starts is Amanda and I are always doing funny things each time we come together and we've got a little thing going where we have these alter egos. Her name is Minnie, my name is Pearleen and Pearleen is going to Beauty School and right about now I'm learning to put curls in. Anyway, Minnie got herself a dawg not long ago and I thought, well if Minnie can have a dawg, I can have a dawg. So I went out and got me one and she said, 'Pearleen, this is so cute.

What are you gonna call your dawg?' and I said I'd call her Beauden and so her name is Beauden and..." If she wasn't stopped she could ramble on for hours, just ask anybody who tried to get a word in edgeways when they met with her during a recent fan convention in London, Rothery admits that she can "blab for Canada" especially when she is in new and exciting situations. Fellow actor Bruce Boxleitner was driven to stand up and jokingly yell along the autograph queue - "Who's that holding up the line?" As if he didn't know As well as chattering non-stop, Ms Rothery had confounded all attempts at restraint by the 'liaison lady' and was up taking photos with the fans. "I loved my time in the UK this summer. I had no idea what to expect when I was invited to attend the convention but it was such a good experience for me. I knew the show had a huge Internet following but the fans just... embraced me. I don't even know how to put how wonderful that felt into words. By the end of the weekend I kept trying to tell everyone how grateful and touched I was by their support. I feel quite sad when I hear of some people treating fans of a particular show or genre with disrespect because when you get right down to it, there would be no show without them. It's a mutual relationship."

Her own relaxed attitude towards fan attention may well come from Rothery's notso-secret passion for Sci-Fi shows in general and one Sci-Fi classic in particular. "My thing was the original Star Trek," she confesses. "When I was a very wee one I liked Lost in Space, but really I used to make up wonderful stories about being in Star Trek and, of course, I always ended up marrying Jim Kirk." On a more recent track the actress has a special fondness for the revamped Outer Limits series having appeared in two "very scary" episodes (Regeneration and Trial by Fire) and for The X-Files. Rothery guest-starred as Nurse Michelle Charters in the episode entitled Excelsius Dei and claims, "What was most interesting for me was when the character was being attacked. She was being raped by this invisible entity, so I had nothing to work with. I had no one to throw me around and just had to raise the momentum by myself. In some respects that was even more terrifying because our own imaginations are so magnificent. It got to the point where when we finished the scene, I was scared and shaking like a leaf but all the other women in the cast were shaking too. Some of them had tears in their eyes."

Rothery's escapades with the infamous FBI agents wasn't traumatic all the time. There were one or two light-hearted moments to dispel the gloom. "David Duchovny and I had some scenes where we were almost underwater so they built a huge tank and filled it with very warm water. When the time came for breaks in between shots, the assistant director would ask 'Do you guys want to come out?' and we would be like, 'No!' because it was too cold to come out and we would just hang out fully clothed inside this pool."

Ms Rothery is looking forward to a more usual form of rest and recreation in the coming months. Stargate SG-1 has just finished filming Season Three and the actress plans to "Take a break, chill out and enjoy playing with my dog!" There's a bit of a medical emergency for Dr Fraiser to deal with at the beginning of Season Four, but we'll just have to wait until next year for the details.

The original "Stargate" concept was devised by Dean Devlin and Rolland Emmerich. Devlin executive produced the "Stargate" film, Emmerich directed, and both wrote the storyline. In the fall of 1996, MGM announced its plans to take the "Stargate" property and turn it into a television series, "Stargate SG-1."

For the series, MGM brought in the creative talents of Jonathan Glassner and Brad Wright, who previously worked on "The Outer Limits" for MGM, to create storylines and produce the show.

The Stargate is a round portal that can instantaneously transport an object from one point in space to another by generating an artificial wormhole. A wormhole is created between any two Stargates when one Stargate dials the address of another Stargate. A Stargate uses 6 of 38 symbols, representing star constellations, to locate another Stargate and then uses a final 7th symbol, unique to each Stargate, as its point of origin.

All together, the Stargate contains 39 symbols, one of which represents a point of origin unique to that Stargate, and has 7 chevrons that are used to lock on to Stargate symbols and dial another Stargate.

From the Writer's Bible:

a. Gate Activation & Composition : The Stargate is made of a quartzite metal not found on earth (Naquada). Naquada is found on the planet in the movie (Abydos) as well as several others that the gate leads to. The metal is the only known element that absorbs (and energizes with) neutrinos. Somehow, when energized with neutrinos, the gate forms a stable artificial worm-hole with another gate. It will not react with any other substance -- radiation, particle bombardment, fire, pressure, etc.

The inner dial of the gate turns like the bevel of a watch. There are 39 symbols on the dial. When the dial is turned to seven of the symbols in a certain order (like a combination lock) it activates the gate between Earth and the planet to which that combination correlates. The combinations, as set up by the creators of the gate, correspond to the points needed to vector a location in three dimensional space where the planet resides. The last symbol is always the point of origin.

b. The Iris : The Air Force learns by Daniel Jackson's example on Abydos, and by the actions of the ancient Egyptians, that if the Gate is buried under a strong, substantial substance, it blocks the path of anyone or anything attempting to pass through it. Therefore, the Air Force built a giant iris which closes very quickly over the gate. The iris is so close to the event horizon (less than 10 micrometers) that it won't allow anything to rematerialize on our side. Therefore it will block anything from coming through the gate uninvited. If someone tries to come through the gate with the iris closed, their molecules would not have a chance to rematerialize (they cease to exist).

The SG teams carry a small transmitter capable of sending a coded signal through the gate, notifying the SGC which team would like the gate opened. This device is called a G.D.O. Once the signal is sent (from the G.D.O.) it is safe to pass through the Stargate. The iris is then closed behind the travelers immediately upon their arrival on Earth.

c. Auto-Destruct : As a second line of defense, if an unknown traveler is inbound, a base auto-destruct countdown begins. If not terminated by a ranking officer, a nuclear blast will detonate inside the mountain.

d. Gate Travel : Gate travel is one way. A person cannot go through the gate, leave it open, and then step back through it. The gate has to be stopped and then restarted from the opposite planet in order to travel back to the other end. The only thing that can travel two ways through the gate are radio waves (which the M.A.L.P. transmits back to Earth).

Who made the Stargate?

No one knows. It was originally believed that the Goa'uld had constructed the Stargate network. Daniel Jackson theorizes that a race of aliens impersonating the Norse gods constructed the Stargates. The true origins of the Stargate are still unknown.

How many chevrons are on the Stargate?

The Stargate contains nine chevrons. Although the gate has nine chevrons, typically only seven of these are used when dialing from a gate. In the episode The Fifth Race, an eighth chevron was activated (thanks to the Asgard) and Carter noted, "The extra chevron must add a new distance calculation to the existing points, like a different area code." So far, the eighth chevron has been used only once (on the Earth Stargate), and the purpose or function of the ninth chevron is still unknown.

Why is the team called SG-1?

The "SG" designation denotes that the team is a part of the Stargate program, while the number following the Stargate designation is to distinguish between separate Stargate teams. Certain teams have special duties within the Stargate program. Listed below are all special designation teams noted thus far in the series:

Special Team Designations:

SG-3 - Marine combat unit, lead by Colonel Makepeace.

SG-5 - Marine combat unit.

SG-7 - Scientific Corp.

SG-8 - Medical team. This team typically will travel accompanied by SG-3 during medical emergencies.

SG-9 - Diplomatic Corp., led by attorney Major Stan Kovachek.

SG-11 - Engineering Corp.

What does this abbreviation stand for?

- a. M.A.L.P. Mobile Analytic Laboratory Probe, which travels through the Stargate to unexplored offworld locations, determining whether or not it is safe for human teams to proceed through the Stargate.
- B. D.H.D. Dial Home Device: activates the Stargate.
- C. G.D.O. Garage Door Opener: transmits a signal to open the iris placed over the over the Stargate on Earth.
- D. F.R.E.D. Field Remote Expeditionary Device: carries supplies for field units on the other side of the Stargate. With six wheels, FRED can navigate almost any terrain.
- E. T.E.R. Transphase Eradication Rod: detects objects operating in the light spectrum 180 degrees out of phase of human vision, like the alien race the Reetouh.

Why does every culture SG-1 encounters speak English?

They do not. As many cultures encountered by the SG teams are derived from ancient Earth cultures, as a linguist, Daniel Jackson is able to communicate with most of these cultures. SG-1 also has Teal'c along, a 90 year old Jaffa, who can communicate with all other Goa'ulds. Occasionally, SG-1 even encounters a race, like the Asgard, who are technologically superior to humans and decipher english in order to communicate with the team.

After 10 seasons the show was finally cancelled, not being able to finish their final story arc. However instead of just ending they made two new made for television films with budget of about 7 millions US dollars each. The first film "The Ark of Truth" finished the story arc that was started in the ninth season.

1 - 1 CHILDREN OF THE GODS

Colonel Jack O'Neill retired from the military a year ago. Prior to retirement, he led an expedition through the Stargate, an ancient portal which allows instantaneous travel to other galaxies. He is called back to duty by General Hammond when a group of aliens emerge from the Stargate, kill the soldiers guarding it and kidnap a female guard. After seeing the aftermath of the alien attack and the strange bodies they left behind, O'Neill confesses that he defied the order to destroy Abydos, the world he visited via the Stargate. He reveals that Daniel Jackson, the scientist who was thought to have died on that mission, is alive and living on Abydos. It is also clear that these aliens are not from Abydos.

O'Neill is reunited with his old comrades Kawalsky and Ferretti and joined by Capt. Samantha Carter, an astrophysicist. SG-1 returns through the Stargate to Abydos. They discover that Jackson has taken an Abydan wife, the beautiful Sha're, and that Skaara, the young Abydan boy O'Neill cherishes as a son, has grown into a fine young man. They also see Jackson's latest discovery: a giant cartouche covered in hieroglyphics that seems to be a map of many Stargates throughout the galaxy.

As they marvel, however, the aliens led by the handsome but evil Apophis, are making use of a similar map. They emerge from the Stargate on Abydos, and after a brief battle, kidnap Sha're and Skaara.

Ferretti, who was wounded in the fire fight with the aliens, has seen the hieroglyphic code that indicates the alien's destination. O'Neill and Jackson are determined to follow the aliens and to save their loved ones.

With a troop of soldiers from earth in tow, they track the aliens to the planet Chulak. There they discover that Sha're is now Apophis' queen; her body has been taken over by the hideous snake creatures, known as Goa'ulds, who rule this planet and collect life forms from around the galaxy to use as hosts. They know they can't save her, but can they save themselves and Skaara before they're killed by the Goa'uld guards and before General Hammond sends a nuclear weapon through the Stargate to destroy the planet?

1 - 2 THE ENEMY WITHIN

As the Goa'ulds splatter against the protective iris installed inside the Stargate, the SG-1 team faces several problems close to home. Colonel Jack O'Neill wants to add a new member to the team: Teal'c, an alien who risked his own skin to save O'Neill and his team on the other side of the Stargate. But, General Hammond won't approve the appointment and O'Neill must watch as military intelligence treats Teal'c like a guinea pig. To make matters worse, Kawalsky, O'Neill's right-hand man, has been having terrible headaches caused by an alien larvae that has attached itself to his brain. What they don't realize is that this larvae is trying to take over Kawalsky's body in an attempt to go back through the Stargate. With guidance from Teal'c, the doctors operate to remove the alien, but did they get it in time? Or is Kawalsky still under alien control, ready to kill when the order comes?

1 - 3 EMANCIPATION

On the planet Simarka, the SG-1 team meets the Shavadai; a race of people similar to the ancient Mongols of Earth. These skilled horsemen and fierce warriors operate by a strict code, which includes second-class status for women. Dr. Samantha Carter, who takes a back seat to no man, is threatened by death on her first encounter with the Shavadai chief, Mughal, and is only spared because she saved the life of his son, Abu. Carter faces peril again when she is kidnapped by Abu, who hopes to trade her for the hand of Nya, the daughter of Mughal's powerful enemy, Turghan. The deal goes bad and Carter ends up the unwilling property of the warrior chief. She is determined to escape but torn by pity for the lovelorn Nya and Abu. Carter arranges Nya's escape from Turghan's tyranny and is rescued from his clutches by O'Neill and the SG-1 team. But, Carter's ordeal is not over yet; Turghan caught his daughter trying to elope and will stone her to death for her disloyalty unless Carter can defeat him in combat. In the circle of battle, Carter must prove she is the equal of any man -- or die trying.

1 - 4 THE BROCA DIVIDE

O'Neill and the SG-1 team head through the Stargate to a planet known as P3X797 and discover a world divided between a dark and light side, with a population similarly split between the Touched and the Untouched. The Untouched, who live on the bright side, are humans, a Bronze Age people who seem almost like the Minoan civilization of Earth. The Touched, who live on the dark side, are heavy-browed primitives with limited skills and the brutal instincts of animals. The findings would only be of academic interest, but when the SG-1 team return, all but Teal'c and Jackson begin a startling transformation: they develop the heavy brows and act with the animal brutality of the Touched. Worse, so do many others at Stargate's mountain headquarters, including General Hammond. As order breaks down and the project is jeopardized, Jackson and Teal'c head back through the Stargate in an attempt to discover the reason for this mysterious transformation. Is this a disease that can be cured or are O'Neill, the General and the others all doomed to live out the rest of their lives in the Stone Age?

1 - 5 FIRST COMMANDMENT

Colonel Jack O'Neill and the SG-1 team are sent through the Stargate after SG-9 is declared missing in action. When SG-1 arrives on the planet, they learn that the primitive cave-dwelling inhabitants greeted SG-9 as gods because they carried guns and used powerful sunscreen which allowed them to survive the deadly UV rays. The problem is that SG-9 leader Capt. Jonas Hanson has taken advantage of this opportunity for power. Hanson now rules the planet without mercy, forcing the inhabitants to rebuild the giant Goa'uld temples and condemning disbelievers to death by radiation exposure. It's clear that Hanson must be stopped, but how do you stop a god? Dr. Samantha Carter, who was once romantically involved with Hanson, thinks she can reach him. O'Neill is prepared to fight his way into Hanson's compound to save Conner, one of the surviving SG-9 team members. But, Daniel Jackson and Teal'c may have the best solution; with the help of Jamala, one of the planet's inhabitants, they set out to show the people of the planet that Hanson's power comes from technology - - not divinity.

1 - 6 COLD LAZARUS

On Planet P3X562, the SG-1 team discovers a valley full of broken crystals. Alone, O'Neill finds a whole crystal with blue light emanating from it. Upon touching it, he is struck down and a duplicate O'Neill appears. The double returns home through the Stargate, with the unsuspecting team. Once back, the double seeks out O'Neill's estranged wife, Sara, and tries to find the couple's son, Charlie, who was killed years earlier. Meanwhile, a revived O'Neill returns through the gate, only to realize he's been replicated. Carter and Jackson have discovered that the crystals contain energy beings that can read minds, mimic people and communicate. The beings tell of their tragic encounter with the Goa'ulds and explain that they cannot survive in the Earth's intense electromagnetic field, which means that the O'Neill double is now highly unstable, putting Sara and others in great danger. The real O'Neill and the SG-1 team find Sara and the double in a hospital emergency room. The double explains that he never meant to hurt O'Neill. He was trying to heal him when he realized that the greatest pain O'Neill had was not physical, but emotional; grief from the loss of his son. In a final gesture, the double does just that, taking the form of Charlie and giving Sara and Jack something they never had: a chance to say good-bye to their son.

1 - 7 THE NOX

Under government pressure to discover superior technologies, O'Neill and the team head to a planet Teal'c remembers, which has creatures called Fenri that possess the power of invisibility. They arrive to discover a Goa'uld hunting party, led by Apophis, is already there tracking the Fenri. O'Neill's attempt at an ambush goes horribly wrong and the members of the SG-1 team are killed. They are revived, along with Shak'l, a Jaffa who was also killed in the battle by the Nox. The Nox are a small, peaceful, fairy-like people who occupy the planet previously thought to be uninhabited. The Nox can make things invisible - it is they who shield the A'kasha (a flying insect-like creature) from the sight of the hunters - and bring back the dead. But, can they stand up to the deadly technology of the Goa'uld once Shak'l reveals their secret and location to Apophis? O'Neill and the team offer to defend the Nox against Apophis, but the peaceful little people have their own solution, far beyond the understanding of either Goa'ulds or the people of Earth.

1 - 8 BRIEF CANDLE

O'Neill and the SG-1 team travel through the Stargate to Argos, where they come across a young woman giving birth. After Daniel delivers the child, the team is invited to a festival, where they find a civilization of beautiful, happy people who celebrate while the sun shines and mysteriously drop to sleep the minute that it sets. More mysteriously, they seem to age very rapidly - a lifetime is 100 days - an effect that O'Neill unwittingly inherits when he is seduced by Kynthia, a stunning Argosian woman. As O'Neill's hair turns grey and life races past, the rest of the team return to base to try to discover a cure for whatever is making O'Neill and the Argosians grow old so fast. Dr. Samantha Carter discovers the culprit: nanocytes or microscopic robots that circulate in the blood stream, apparently placed there as part of a cruel experiment by Pelops, a Goa'uld whom the Argosians worship as a god. But, the team can't figure out how to turn them off, and unless they can, O'Neill will soon be dead.

The labyrinth is home to Unas, a vicious creature that is the original Goa'uld host, but it is also Thor's Hammer, which is designed to kill Goa'ulds. 1 - 10 THE TORMENT OF TANTALUS

Daniel Jackson makes a remarkable discovery while going through film footage of Stargate experiments conducted in 1945. It seems that the post-war team, led by Professor Langford, succeeded in getting the Stargate to work and a young professor, Ernest Littlefield, actually traveled through the wormhole, never to return. Daniel shares this information with the professor's daughter, Catherine Langford, who oversaw the Stargate project for years and who was supposed to marry Littlefield before he disappeared. Using computer-enhanced pictures as a guide, the SG-1 team, joined by Langford, go in search of Littlefield. They find the professor, now grown old, as well as a remarkable room that seems to have been the meeting place of four alien civilizations. After much debate and a promise to return with a Gou'ald larva for study, the team, disguised as monks, heads through the Stargate to Chulak, only to discover that Teal'c's family has been declared outcasts. With help from Teal'c's mentor, Bra-Tac, they battle Jaffa warriors and priests before finding Rya'c and his mother, Drey-Auc. There is even talk of an alliance, but the trust is fragile and the outcome of the negotiations are uncertain. The Tok'ra have turned down O'Neill and SG-1's request for an alliance against the Goa'uld because, as Garshaw explains, the earthlings don't offer enough rewards to justify the security breach. And, the fact that none of the humans will act as host for Selmak, a Tok'ra whose host is dying does little to build trust. Dr. Samantha Carter has an idea. Her father, Gen. No one except Jolinar, and she never told anyone else.

SG-1 and Martouf travel to Netu on a space ship. En route, Martouf uses Tok'ra technology to access any of Jolinar's memories that might still be in Carter's mind. However, what Carter recalls are painful remembrances from her own past, and dark secrets that Jolinar never wished for Martouf to know.

Once they reach Netu, Teal'c stays on board the ship while the rest of SG-1 and Martouf search for Jacob/Selmak through the underground caverns of Hell, but the unexpected appearance of an old foe foils SG-1's plan.

En route to the infirmary after an extended mission, SG-1 learns that part of the SGC has been sealed off due to a chemical leak. Soon after, during their routine examinations, Dr. Fraiser injects each member of the team with a sedative, rendering them unconscious.

Teal'c is the first to awaken, and secretly observes Dr. Fraiser and General Hammond talking with two aliens. The General orders Teal'c and Carter placed in holding cells. Feigning unconsciousness, he waits until he and his escorts are away from the infirmary before overpowering the guards and waking Major Carter.

The Tollan Narim pays an unexpected visit to the SGC, inviting the members of SG-1 to participate in "Triad." Only when SG-1 shows up on the new Tollan home world do they learn that the Triad is an ancient ceremony of justice, and the person on trial is their old friend Skaara.

The Goa'uld Klore's death glider crash-landed on the Tollan planet. Klore was injured, which allowed the host personality, Skaara, to emerge and request amnesty. This Triad will determine which of the personalities will forever have control over the host body: the Goa'uld Klore, or Skaara. Daniel and O'Neill will argue for Skaara's position, while another Goa'uld named ZIPACNA will argue for Klore's.

As Daniel and O'Neill work on their arguments, Carter and Teal'c grow suspicious that Zipacna's appearance may indicate an ulterior motive. But when SG-1 brings its concerns to the Tollan leaders, it puts Skaara in further danger of losing his identity forever.

SG-1 steps through the Stargate on their way to a paradise planet and end up at the SGC. Adding to their confusion is Hammond's assertion that the team was gone for fifteen hours, not the mere moment that the SG-1 perceived.

Dr. Fraiser's examinations of the team members are inconclusive, but an analysis of the MALP data reveals a brief initial image of an alien lab just before the paradise view. They theorize the paradise image is a means to lure people to the planet. But for what reason? As they try to figure this out, each member of the team begins to experience intense cravings.

Fraiser soon figures out why: A microscopic implant in each of SG-1's brains. The team is relieved of duty and isolated until Fraiser can find a way to remove the implant. Soon SG-1 is hearing and seeing the image of a man who identifies himself as "Urgo" - actually, the manifestation of the implants in their heads. Only SG-1 can see and hear him. Though Urgo claims his only purpose is to record new experiences, SG-1 begins to suspect he may have another, more nefarious purpose.

Colonel O'Neill and the rest of the SG-1 team have established ties with a small village on the planet Edora, and their leader LAIRA - with whom O'Neill shares a mutual and quiet attraction. Everyone gathers to watch the annual meteor shower referred to by the natives as "fire rain." At first, it's a pleasant light show, but an extra-large shooting star prompts Carter and Daniel to conduct further research.

Their results indicate that Edora travels through an asteroid belt every year, but every century and a half the orbit hits a particularly dense section of debris. Those meteors hit the surface of the planet to cataclysmic effect, and apparently this is one of those years.

SG-1's evacuation of the villagers is all but complete when Laira discovers her son missing. O'Neill rushes off to assist her, ordering the rest of SG-1 to return to base. His culture, the Bedrosians, believe that human life evolved without a gateway and was created by their God, Nefertum.

The team's arrival is soon detected by a group of Bedrosian soldiers and their leader, Rigar. O'Neill, Carter and Daniel are captured, while Teal'c and Nyan narrowly escape. During his escape, Teal'c is blinded. Rigar cages his three prisoners and interrogates them as to how they arrived on his planet. 7 - 4 ORPHEUS

SG-1 returns to Stargate Command under heavy fire with Jaffa so close behind one makes it into the Gate Room. Weapons fire is exchanged through the wormhole. To everyone's horror, Teal'c is shot in the abdomen by a staff weapon blast. He no longer carries a symbiote, but has spinal damage. He will have to recover normally and complete physical therapy with the help of the new drug, tretonin.

Though Daniel returned from his time as an ascended being with a memory wipe, he is able to get glimpses into that period. During Teal'c's convalescence, Daniel is plagued with thoughts of Rya'c, Teal'c's son. Disturbed, he begins to get visions and hears Ry'ac's voice calling out.

Daniel asks Carter to review the logs of incoming wormholes, looking for any kind of anomaly. His own self-doubts mirror Teal'c's, wondering why he came back from being ascended. He begins to think he needed to do something, but he can't remember what it was.

After a period of recovery, Dr. Fraiser feels Teal'c is fit for duty. Mentally, he does not believe he is ready, thinking he is not as good a fighter as he was. For him, weakness is death -- 'kek.' Although the tretonin works fine for Teal'c, he obsesses that a real symbiote is what should sustain him. O'Neill realizes that, mentally, Teal'c is not prepared for duty.

While meditating with Teal'c, Daniel has another vision of Ry'ac in a Jaffa version of a concentration camp. In the dream, Bra'tac takes a lashing to protect Ry'ac. Daniel reveals the vision to Teal'c who admits having 'seen' Daniel while dying in an ambush last year. Because of this incident, Teal'c is more willing to believe Daniel's vision. They take the matter to Hammond, who orders a rescue attempt (if the location can be determined).

Ry'ac and Bra'tac have indeed been captured. They are being worked to death in a toxic naquadah purification facility. Bra'tac has run out of tretonin and is dying. He hides the truth from Rya'c, but the young Jaffa knows. Back on Earth, Daniel's visions continue. Rak'nor is called in for consultation and determines the planet is Erebus, a place for condemned souls. But there will be a problem reaching it: the Erebus Stargate has a forcefield.

Daniel flashes back to witnessing Bra'tac sending a coded signal through an outgoing wormhole. Sam realizes what that means and finds the log entry and the code in the Alpha Site records. Having the deactivation code to the shield on Erebus, Hammond approves the rescue mission, putting O'Neill in charge.

The rescue is none too soon. SG-1 and SG-3 make it through the Stargate with Rak'nor. O'Neill assesses the situation. It is a harsh and dreadful encampment. Cruelty rules and executions are commonplace. O'Neill agrees to allow Teal'c and Rak'nor to infiltrate the encampment after dark to make the extraction.

In a tent, Teal'c finds Bra'tac near death and administers additional tretonin. Bra'tac is so far gone he can't move immediately.

The two Jaffa are discovered.

Helplessly, O'Neill watches the guards whip Teal'c through the night. Against his team's objections, O'Neill lets it happen, unwilling to reveal the presence of backup. They need a new plan -- a distraction. O'Neill looks to a partially constructed Ha'tak ship floating above the encampment. The new plan is to blow it up as a diversion.

Sam and Daniel ring up to the ship to plant C-4 explosives. Down below, in light of his apprentice's recent injury, Bra'tac gives Teal'c a needed pep talk. Trying to spread the news of a rescue, Ry'ac is discovered and sent to be executed. O'Neill radios Carter, instructing her to hurry. Teal'c approaches the guard and asks to take Ry'ac's place for execution.

Carter detonates the ship, which gradually falls from the sky. The Jaffa guards run to try to deal with the situation and get mowed down by S.G.C. forces. Teal'c and his would-be executioner fight one-on-one. Though Ry'ac wants to intervene, Bra'tac prevents him, knowing Teal'c must prevail himself or continue to live with doubt. Eventually, Teal'c prevails by himself. It is not long before the camp is liberated.

Back at the S.G.C., Daniel joins Teal'c for a period of meditation. Both men have been restored in their own ways by the Erebus mission. Daniel confesses that he now knows where he belongs. And why.

It seems to check out. His DNA is a nearly identical match for Colonel O'Neill's, except for a small abnormality. Jack wants to know why he woke up 30 years younger, and who has done this to him. SG-1 visits Jack's house to retrace his steps, asking him what he did the previous night. They come up empty -- but Jack does have a memory flash, and sees a group of swirling green lights ... and an Asgard.

O'Neill is scheduled to conduct a briefing with the new F-302 pilots -- but Hammond has removed him from active duty, and Carter conducts the meeting. Despite the decision, Jack interrupts the briefing. At first, the pilots won't take him seriously -- but when he obviously knows what he's talking about, they listen up and begin to take his instructions.

Fraiser soon reports with additional test results: young Jack's genetic structure is inexplicably breaking down, and he is dying. Jacob Carter arrives from the Tok'ra to present him with the only option they have. They offer to put Jack into stasis to save his life, until they better understand what is happening to his body. After his previous experience putting his life in the hands of the Tok'ra ("Frozen," "Abyss"), he asks for a few minutes to think about it -- then escapes the base and flees into the nearby town.

Jack is unable even to buy a simple bottle of beer, even when he runs into an old Air Force friend and pretends to be O'Neill's nephew. The rest of SG-1 finally tracks him down sitting by a creek, fishing. They tell him what Jacob determined after looking at his test results: he is a clone of the real colonel, who is probably still being held by the Asgard. Jack refuses to hand himself over to the Tok'ra again. But his friends have been doing some digging, and have a new plan.

Daniel and Teal'c have discovered that the details of Jack's abduction memory are striking similar to several other UFO abduction stories. They visit several alleged abductees, who tell very similar stories -- being taken in their sleep, held motionless in mid-air, four swirling, green lights ... and an alien resembling an Asgard. The last such abduction was 19 years ago; and with each abduction, the person was taken again seven days later.

Armed with a zat gun, young Jack waits in his bedroom on the seventh day, while the rest of the team monitors him from outside the house. There is a flash of light, and an Asgard transporter brings him onto a ship in orbit, returning the real colonel to his bed. The unknown Asgard approaches young Jack, suspended in mid-air, and tells him not to be afraid. Jack zats him, escapes his restraints, and transports SG-1 aboard.

They signal Thor for assistance. When the Asgard wakes up, they confront him. His name is Loki, and he is a scientist who has been studying human evolution to try and solve the Asgard's own fatal cloning problem -- which will eventually result in their extinction. He says that their bodies were once much like humans are now, and that Jack O'Neill is legendary among the Asgard as representing the next stage in human evolution (as his brain was capable of receiving the library of the Ancients ["The Fifth Race"]).

Thor arrives, and tells SG-1 that Loki is a renegade who was convicted of performing unsanctioned experiments on humans 19 years ago. Loki replaces his abductees with a clone for one week, so that he may study the person he has taken -- but the clones are unstable, and never survive. Jack's clone failed to properly reach the correct maturity because the Asgard have tagged his DNA to prevent tampering -- thus the anomaly that Dr. Fraiser found.

Thor agrees to try and correct the flaw in young Jack's DNA, and the procedure is a success. Young Jack decides to live his life over again, and returns to high school. He and the colonel agree not to stay in touch -- it would be too weird.

7 - 5 REVISIONS

A M.A.L.P. returns information about an intriguing dome complex on a planet destroyed by toxic waste. As the robot explores the terrain its robotic arm disappears through some sort of energy barrier. Now, the M.A.L.P. shows a beautiful garden. Proceeding forward, transmission is suddenly cut. General Hammond orders SG-1 to retrieve it.

The team gates to the planet and passes through the barrier into the garden, immediately finding the M.A.L.P. A young boy, calling himself Nevin, appears to SG-1. After a trade he agrees to lead the team to his town, where all the inhabitants appear to be wearing U-shaped devices on their left temple.

A meeting of the four council members is convened. The team describes the Stargate and how they arrived. The meeting stops while the council retrieves information about the Stargate from the Link, a computer which provides each individual with a library of knowledge. Carter is impressed with the sophistication and ease of the technology

SG-1 is invited to stay the night so Carter can have a look at the technology in the morning. She and Daniel stay with the town computer expert, Pallan and his wife Evalla. They learn the few survivors have never been outside the dome in 400 years. Pallan explains how the computer maintains the town and the illusion of a normal world. Meanwhile, O'Neill and Teal'c stay with Kendrick and Nevin. At dinner, Nevin grills O'Neill about his travels.

The following day Evalla takes Daniel to an old library which has actual books. While there Evalla blanks out for a moment, and soon Daniel becomes concerned with this repeating trend. While Sam is with Pallan in computer control, the same thing happens to him. At that moment, she notices that the screens on the computers have altered -- and they soon change back. She tells Carter the readouts changed, but Pallan does not believe her. He assures her that the readouts always remain the same.

Carter suggests to O'Neill that the townspeople be offered relocation. They meet with the Council but only three of the four members are there. They refuse to accept relocation, convinced that the dome will protect them. O'Neill wants to know what the fourth member thinks, but the council denies there ever was one. Now things are getting weird. No one -- not even Pallan -- remembers a fourth council member. The team suspects foul play.

More unusual information surfaces. With Daniel, Evalla explains the population control policy, which is why she and her husband have no children. She tells him no one in the society has ever broken the rule. Back in the control room, Carter notices another drop in the power. The forcefield is in danger of failing. Again, Pallan disagrees with her.

On his way to check-in with the S.G.C., O'Neill is intercepted by Kendrick. The gardener wants a better future for his son than that the dome can provide. O'Neill agrees to take the pair back to Earth when they leave. But the M.A.L.P. is no where to be seen. Teal'c suspects a conspiracy to keep them from communicating with the S.G.C. Carter calls in to say the dome is losing power badly enough to fail in the near term. Now it is no longer an option, but a priority to move the people out.

The next computer update causes Evalla to leave Daniel's company. He follows her only to lose sight of her at an archway Daniel knows wasn't bricked up moments before.

SG-1 soon comes to the conclusion that the computer is brainwashing the dome's residents. They also understand that no one will believe them without solid proof. Daniel goes to look for old records in the library in the hopes of finding proof that there used to be at least one additional council member.

More weird inconsistencies confirm that the computer is messing with the people's memories. Nevin takes Teal'c and O'Neill home to a different house from the night before. Kendrick's father then denies he ever wanted to leave. Carter arrives back at the central computer to find that Pallan doesn't remember ever having a wife named Evalla.

O'Neill demands that the people remove the devices which link them to the computer. Aghast, they refuse, now believing removal will kill them. This belief is in direct contradiction to demonstrations the day before, when Evalla removed her node for Carter to examine.

Daniel discovers proof that things used to be wildly different. Over 100,000 people used to live in the dome. He brings the paper proof to Sam and Pallan in the control room. She has enough information to draw a few conclusions. As the power level drops, the computer shrinks the dome and kills excess people by making them leave the protected area (Jack and Teal'c have confirmed human skeletons lie just outside the dome). To keep the people level-headed during this process, all memories of the people who departed are removed from their minds.

In desperation, Carter forcibly removes Pallan's link node. He is surprised that it isn't fatal. The computer, now desperate, reacts with another update when Pallan and Carter try to reprogram it. The rest of the townspeople receive new instructions: they are to put the devices on SG-1, whether they want them or not.

The townspeople corner O'Neill and Teal'c to force them to wear the nodes. SG-1 does not wish to harm anyone, but they refuse to allow themselves to be assimilated by the computer. He raises his weapon to ward off the advancing mob. In the nick of time, Carter and Pallan manage to initiate another update themselves.

The townspeople have no memory of SG-1, or what is happening to them.

As the team helps evacuate the citizens, Carter explains that the geo-thermal energy began to cool down 200 years earlier, causing the dome to shrink. Now Pallan has to make a new life without a wife he knows he had. He is in a particularly sad position, because he can't remember her to mourn.

7 - 6 LIFEBOAT

SG-1 investigates a crashed alien ship containing hundreds of people in stasis. While investigating various decks, an energy field overwhelms them, knocking them unconscious. Teal'c finds Daniel at the base of one of the open stasis chambers. When Daniel awakens, he begins to scream.

SG-4 brings back the unconscious O'Neill and Carter, along with a fearful, panicky Daniel. But soon the archaeologist collapses on the ramp as the fear dissolves, replaced with anger. In the medical lab, Daniel is restrained with his hands attached to a belt at his waist.

Dr. Fraiser tries to gain information that would explain his condition, but all she gets is a tirade about how this should not have happened. Daniel doesn't know her. Worse, he says his image in the mirror is not his. Dr. Fraiser explains to General Hammond that Daniel's EEG indicates multiple brainwave patterns -- suggesting multiple minds.

Daniel claims to be a Sovereign of Talthus. He has a terrible headache and he makes strident demands in an aggressive manner. Dr. Fraiser gives him painkillers, but these fail to help. For no apparent reason, the personality changes to a crewmember of the crashed vessel. Tryan is an engineer who is more logical and even tempered. Dr. Fraiser questions him more easily, as the personality is surprised at the situation but not afraid.

Tryan explains that their world, Talthus, was dying. Several great ships were built to take as many people as possible to a new world, Ardena. However, there weren't enough stasis units for everyone, so a lottery was held. Each crewmember was allowed to choose one family member to accompany them on the journey. But the trip would be so long that everyone would have to go in stasis. The machines were limited and could not keep a consciousness stored in its own body, so each person's mind was uploaded to an independent memory module. The ship had been on the planet so long, and damaged so severely, that many people died in stasis.

One crewmember, Pharrin, was revived. He tried to save as many minds as he could by taking them into his own body. But there is a limit. When SG-1 arrived, the crewman saw his opportunity and took it. He stored 12 personalities in Dr. Jackson before Teal'c awoke and had the others removed unaltered.

Now, Dr. Jackson is somewhere in the jumble of personalities -- unable to separate himself for more than a moment. Tryan explains it would be impossible to separate the personalities just as it is impossible to return water droplets in the exact same configuration after switching glasses.

Knowing there is a crewmember at large in the vessel, SG-4 retrieves Pharrin and brings him to the S.G.C. He says there is a way to undo the deed, but it would kill those inhabiting Daniel. Carter explains that Earth has a power source that could stabilize the stasis units long enough to revive everyone so they could be sent to another world of their choosing. But no one will help unless Dr. Jackson is restored.

The sovereign personality emerges to command Pharrin not to take any action against the body of Daniel. In terror, Pharrin kneels before the sovereign personality, agreeing not to cooperate with Earth. O'Neill intervenes, telling Pharrin to realize that the sovereign is dead -- as are all the others trapped within Daniel. Unless Pharrin removes their personalities, hundreds of passengers will die.

Despite the Sovereign, Pharrin is resistant -- his own son is trapped in Daniel. He is allowed a last, touching meeting with the boy, and then takes Daniel back to the ship to undo the damage. In the process, Pharrin absorbs the personalities, leaving Daniel. The strain of new personalities is enormous. But they will remain intact inside the officer.

To the relief of his team mates, Daniel awakens as himself.

7 - 7 ENEMY MINE

The S.G.C. is desperately searching for ample quantities naquadah sufficient to build ships to defend Earth. A team of engineers and miners on P3X-403 think they've found a large deposit deep underground. Unfortunately, the region is inhabited by the simple and primitive Unas.

When one of the engineers is abducted, SG-1 comes to lend a hand. Dr. Jackson notices artifacts carelessly piled on the ground, and is incensed with the fact that movement of the objects could spell trouble. From among the artifacts, Daniel spies a yoke designed to fit a large creature. He tells O'Neill there may be Unas in the area.

Using Teal'c's finely honed tracking skills over rough terrain; they set off to find the missing airman. He is dead, stuck on a pole -- like a scarecrow -- to warn off intruders. Among the warnings are old Jaffa armor, manacles, pain sticks, and staff weapons arranged to make it plain what will happen to intruders.

The two units join forces to drive off the Unas. In the ambush that follows, O'Neill is injured so badly he must return to base. The troops withdraw en masse to the S.G.C. While they are gone, the Unas trash the encampment.

At Stargate Command, Daniel must convince the military that the mining activities somehow provoked the attack and that the best option is negotiations. Colonel Edwards is irritated at the suggestion. He thinks Unas are only animals. Daniel makes his case to General Hammond and General Vidrine. He is told he can try negotiating with the creatures, but bottom line, the need for the naquadah outweighs the needs of the Unas. Daniel is on the clock, so he sends for his old Unas friend, Chaka.

Chaka agrees to help and goes with Daniel to mediate. In ritualistic greetings, Daniel tries to make the Unas leader, "Iron Shirt" (because he wears a chain mail shirt) understand that the humans just want the naquadah -- not the land, per se. He explains it will be used to defeat a common enemy. From the exchange, the Unas explain their anger over the fact that the mine is on sacred ground. Back at the camp to report, Daniel is told the miners confirmed a massive vein of naquadah in the area. Now there is no option but to mine it. Generals Hammond and Vidrine give Daniel 24 hours to make a deal. Otherwise, the Air Force will go in with tranquilizers to forcibly relocate the Unas.

Daniel and Chaka return to the campfire to meet again with Iron Shirt. The Unas refuse to give the right to mine the naquadah. Daniel warns him that the humans will kill the Unas and prevail, but Iron Shirt tells him his Unas are so numerous the humans will lose. Daniel realizes there are many thousands, organized in a tribal community.

Meanwhile, the SG troops are patrolling the perimeter when a lone Unas returns to the scene of the first battle to retrieve his necklace. Caught by surprise, an airman opens fire, killing the creature. The other Unas become enraged and march on the S.G.C. encampment. Edwards thinks that superior firepower will scare them off. Daniel and Teal'c try to reason with him that the Unas are there in the tens of thousands. The only reason they weren't detected before is because they live in underground caves where a U.A.V. would not detect them.

Suddenly, the ridge above the camp is filled with hundreds of angry Unas, roaring their battle cry at the humans. Iron Shirt displays his authority with a wail that quiets the others. Then he alone walks confidently into the human camp to accept the S.G. teams' surrender. Edwards is vehemently against the notion that he would surrender to a throng of primitive animals, but Chaka leads the way by kneeling to show submission. Daniel urges the Colonel to get everyone down on the ground to show the humans are not a threat and wish for peace. The alternative is being mowed down by all the Unas gathered above.

Edwards relents. After a moment of gloating, Iron Shirt accepts. To restart the negotiations, Daniel pulls out his lighter and shows how it can set fire to a twig. Iron Shirt is intrigued and settles down to negotiate once more by offering his bone necklace.

Eventually, a peaceful solution is reached. To honor their ancestors, the Unas themselves will mine the naquadah and turn the material over to Stargate Command.

7 - 8 SPACE RACE

Major Samantha Carter arrives at the S.G.C. and is notified that an alien visitor has arrived: Warrick, captain of the transport vessel Seberus. SG-1 helped him retake his ship from a band of criminals and return to his home planet of Hebridan last year ("Forsaken"). Warrick has an offer to make: in exchange for a chance to study his advanced ion propulsion engine, he would like one of Earth's naquadah generators to power his ship in a race.

Carter -- a bit of a thrill seeker in her spare time -- is intrigued. With permission from General Hammond she agrees to loan a naquadah reactor to help the ship win the race -- but only if she can come along as his co-pilot. Warrick agrees, and the two register for the Loop of Kon Garat. It is an annual competition whose winner is awarded a lucrative contract with Tech Con Group, Hebridan's leading corporation.

SG-1 visits Hebridan to prepare for the race. Two species live in an integrated society on this world: the native humans, brought to the planet thousands of years ago by the Goa'uld; and the Serrakin, a humanoid race (of which Warrick is a member) that saved the humans from Goa'uld enslavement generations ago. They live together, work together, and have had several generations to cross-breed.

Carter hooks up the naquadah generator to power the Seberus, which should give them a significant advantage over the other competitors. Teal'c stays with her to help, while Colonel O'Neill and Dr. Jackson go to speak with the local government. They soon negotiate free access to Hebridan's ion propulsion technology, leaving Sam free to enjoy herself in the race. Teal'c becomes acquainted with Eamon, Warrick's quirky engineer brother, who is responsible for the Seberus's systems.

Before the race begins, Warrick and Carter visit a parts shop to negotiate for a vital component. Warrick's credit debt is high, but he convinces the merchant to sell him a refurbished part. He needs it to win the race, Warrick explains, after which he will get the Tech Con contract and be able to repay his debts. Eamon, meanwhile, explains to Teal'c that his transport business is all that Warrick has left. When he returned from being stranded on another planet, Warrick found that his wife had remarried and his family was gone.

Carter and Warrick have a brief tussle with Jarlath, another pilot entering the race. He's a brash weapons specialist. Of the 10 or so competitors, Warrick is concerned primarily with Jarlath, Muirios (an expert human pilot), and La'el Montrose (a female pilot).

The no-rules race begins, and the ships speed into the first of four stages. A group of automated weapons drones begin chasing and firing at the racing vessels, testing their defense capabilities. A few ships don't make it through. At the second stage, the ships fly through the corona of Hebridan's sun, testing their shield strength. It is here that they learn that their ship has been sabotaged; the Seberus is crippled.

Carter and Warrick work feverishly to bypass the sabotaged component, rerouting power from the generator directly into the engines. As they get the ship underway and re-enter the race (in last place), Eamon and Teal'c investigate the sabotage. Eamon traces it to his supervisor at Tech Con Group, a human by the name of Del Tynan.

With Teal'c disguised in a Tech Con employee's uniform, the two enter the office building and break into Tynan's computer. They learn that he has sabotaged all the ships in the race except for Muirios', in order to help the pure-blooded human win the race and the lucrative contract. He is a member of a racist group who believe that the Serrakin have polluted the human race and virtually enslaved them all over again, and are no better than the Goa'uld.

Tynan holds Teal'c and Eamon at gunpoint, and signals Warrick on the Seberus. The ship is quickly gaining on the leaders. He tells Warrick and Carter to drop out of the race if they want to see Eamon and Teal'c again. They reluctantly comply. But when O'Neill and Jackson come looking for their friends, they are shown to Tynan's office by the head of Tech Con Group -- who is half-Serrakin himself. Tynan is apprehended, and the Seberus enters the race once more.

As the ship pulls into third place (behind Muirios and Montrose), they receive an automated distress signal from Jarlath. He has been unable to fix the sabotage done to his own ship, and reluctantly comes aboard the Seberus. As the finish line looms near, they know that they will never catch the cheating Muirios. But with Jarlath's expertise, they can disable Muirios' ship. As the two ships pass at a curve in the race course, Jarlath fires a pulse that disables Muirios' power systems. La'el Montrose takes the prize.

SG-1 returns home, happy to learn that Montrose has asked Warrick to be her co-pilot in working with Tech Con. Sam tells Daniel that in next year's race ... she's going to kick some butt.

8 - 3 LOCKDOWN

The climactic battle over Antarctica several months ago is making things difficult for the Russians on the International Space Station, forced to adjust their flight path in order to avoid collision with debris from the destroyed Goa'uld ships. One sizeable chunk narrowly misses the station -- but without anyone's knowledge, something has managed to sneak aboard.

One month later, Russian Colonel Alexi Vaselov is assigned to Stargate Command and pays a visit to General O'Neill. Jack is still settling into his new duties, and Vaselov shows his outstanding honors in the Russian military as proof that he is the right man to fill the gap on SG-1. O'Neill believes that the unit can continue as three and insists that, until Vaselov goes through proper training, he won't even be allowed anywhere near the Stargate.

O'Neill discusses the conversation with Vaselov with his former team, who all agree that there is no regulation that specifically states an SG unit must be made of at least four members. Daniel visits with Colonel Vaselov to encourage him to not take Jack's decision personally, but midway through their discussion the Russian collapses. He is sent to Dr. Brightman's care in the infirmary. The Colonel eventually awakens and informs her that he doesn't recall anything since being in Russia. But he has lesions on over 40 percent of his body, and an elevated white blood count. Brightman suggests that anyone who has been in recent contact with Vaselov be examined immediately.

Daniel, about to proceed off-world with SG-11, is surprised when O'Neill orders the gate shut down. After an order to report to the infirmary, Daniel snatches a weapon and holds its owner hostage, demanding that the gate be reactivated. He injures two SF's before Teal'c takes him down with a zat, but even that is not enough until O'Neill shoots him in the arm.

Following the incident, Brightman concludes that there is a high probability a contagion is sweeping the base. General O'Neill orders the S.G.C. under lockdown: no gate travel, and no one allowed in or out of the base.

Daniel's white blood count is dropping, and Vaselov's condition is not improving. In his dreams he has begun to see flashes of the past few days, but feels like a helpless observer within his own body. He blames himself for the lockdown of the base and for Daniel's condition, but Teal'c assures him that this would've happened wherever Vaselov would have been. But the manner in which Vaselov describes being trapped within his own body concerns Teal'c.

Brightman and Carter learn that one of the Russian cosmonauts aboard the International Space Station died a week after returning to Russia, and that he exhibited the same symptoms as Vaselov. Vaselov was at his deathbed before traveling to the United States. Considering that no one else who was in contact with the cosmonaut became infected, it becomes less and less likely that this is a contagion at all.

Daniel soon awakens and remembers nothing after reaching out to Vaselov when he collapsed. The possibility that an alien entity is jumping from person to person becomes highly plausible. Daniel has a memory flash of taking out one of the SF's in the gate room, and almost immediately comes to his own conclusion: the entity is Anubis.

The base still in lockdown, Jack, Sam, and Teal'c deduce that the energy shield Anubis once used to contain his partially-ascended essence was destroyed along with his ship, but his essence itself survived along with debris from his ship until the proper time came to "hitch a ride" on the International Space Station. From the cosmonaut he entered Vaselov, then came to Stargate Command with the intent of escaping through the Stargate. He cannot use his powers as an ascended being to escape by less conventional means, as doing so would call down the judgment of the Ancients.

Since anyone carrying Anubis's essence experiences physical symptoms similar to fighting off an infection, O'Neill orders compulsory physicals for all base personnel. Vaselov held Anubis' essence for more than a week, and Brightman says he is not responding to treatment. Unless circumstances change, he has at most two weeks to live. With this knowledge, Vaselov asks Daniel to deliver a personal letter to his sister.

Daniel soon sees another memory flash, and realizes that Anubis left him for a nurse, Lieutenant Evans. She is questioned by Carter and declares she recalls nothing of the past Tuesday afternoon. Now Airman Malcolm McAfree is unaccounted for. McAfree takes out several airmen en route to the control room, and orders the Stargate to be dialed. O'Neill arrives and zats him, but almost immediately Anubis' essence disappears through the control room wall.

Dr. Jackson visits O'Neill's office and proposes that, since they are unable to kill Anubis, they must find a way to goad him into using his Ancient abilities, thereby forcing the Ancient hierarchy to deal with him for violating their rules. To that end, he and Carter devise a means to divide the base into three separate sections, isolating personnel in each and dividing up food, medical resources, and control of power to the Stargate, making it impossible for Anubis to reach it via any one person and keeping him on the move through regular personnel examinations. Hopefully, once he realizes he can't escape through the gate, Anubis will have no choice but to risk revealing himself to the Ancients.

After six days without further incident, President Hayes orders O'Neill to recommence Stargate operations in 24 hours. With this in mind, O'Neill makes a last-ditch bluff with a base-wide announcement: the lockdown will continue indefinitely. Anubis, now more desperate, enters Lt. Colonel Carter and disables the division between quarantine zones with a sequence of timed commands. With base security compromised, O'Neill commences the self-destruct; but Carter, now free of Anubis, manages to abort it in time.

Anubis manages to activate the Stargate -- and he's in O'Neill. Vaselov rushes into the gate room and tackles him, commandeering his weapon. He threatens Anubis that he will kill them both if he does not leave the General and take him instead. Anubis possesses Vaselov, and travels through the Stargate.

Carter and Teal'c come to O'Neill's aid, where Sam informs him that she couldn't abort Anubis' programmed dial-out -- but she did manage to change the address. Anubis, in Vaselov's body, is now frozen solid on an ice world.

8 - 4 ZERO HOUR

Brigadier General Jack O'Neill is having difficulty adjusting to his new role as the commander of the most secure military installation on the face of the planet. Even before he can step off the elevator he is handed a coffee by Sergeant Walter Harriman, who serves as his interim assistant. As he informs O'Neill of his numerous morning appointments, every corner of the base is filled with gentle pleas for instruction, from upgrading security to approving buffet menu items. On top of this, the President himself is scheduled to arrive at the base in a matter of days.

Mark Gilmor, O'Neill's new administrative aide, explains to the General that he is very excited to be aboard. Harriman shows Gilmor to his office and tells him how thankful the S.G.C. is that he's there to help. Once Gilmor is alone, he makes a telephone call notifying someone on the other end that he is now in position -- and that O'Neill suspects nothing.

Once O'Neill gets off a telephone call from General Hammond, Gilmor and SG-1 have a brief meeting with him. The rebel Jaffa have discovered one of Anubis's planets that Baal has yet to discover in the months since the former's defeat. SG-1 wants to infiltrate the base on that world to see what technology awaits pillaging.

With 14 teams currently off-world, O'Neill wants to wait until the next day, when SG-3 can cover their backs. Below in the gate room, SG-5 returns with delegates from the planet Amra to discuss a possible treaty with Earth. Major Paul Davis escorts them to the conference room. Finally, an alien seed brought back from P6J-908 has grown into a small plant -- in just 20 minutes.

But this is the least of O'Neill's problems. An hour has passed and the Amran delegates are unable to agree with one another, let alone negotiate with the S.G.C. O'Neill decides that until they are ready to get past childish arguments, the two delegates will remain under lock and key. O'Neill returns to his office and begins to write Hammond a letter.

Four days to zero hour.

The Amran delegates are furious about the manner in which they have been treated and swear that a trade agreement will never be negotiated with our world -- but O'Neill suggests another day under locked guard might persuade them to get along. SG-1 and SG-3 travel to P2X-887, the world formerly occupied by Anubis. Meanwhile, the rapidly-growing plant has now occupied large portions of the S.G.C., forcing Siler and his men to take machetes to the growth.

Back on the planet, as Teal'c notices signs of recent Jaffa activity. The transport rings remote they are carrying sweeps the three away. SG-3, poised by the gate, lose contact with the team just as an Al'kesh makes their position. O'Neill authorizes SG-10 and SG-12 to move in as backup.

Meanwhile, Dr. Lee reports to O'Neill that the plant is proving extremely difficult to eradicate, and its growing still.

The S.G. units return without SG-1 and cannot report on the team's whereabouts. Soon Baal contacts Earth and uses an Asgard holographic projection to appear in the gate room. He offers a trade: the former System Lord Camulus for SG-1, whom he says he is holding captive. Baal transmits the address to where he wants Camulus sent, and gives O'Neill one day to make a decision.

Three days to zero hour.

Camulus is transferred to the S.G.C. for questioning. He complains that he has been treated like a prisoner rather than one granted asylum ("New Order, Part 2"), and swears to O'Neill that nothing he does will bring back SG-1. With Baal's coordinates dialed, Jack takes him to the event horizon of the gate, threatening to send him through to certain death at the hands of his enemy, Baal. Camulus relents, finally offering the General something of value: He offers to give him coordinates to a world where a device of Ancient origin can be found. SG-3 return from this world and discover the reason Camulus could never activate the device: Its Z.P.M. was unplugged.

The team returns the Z.P.M. to Earth, and discover its power is near 50 percent capacity, where the previous one they possessed is practically depleted. The base's power shuts down, thanks to the still growing plant, and Lee recommends that the base be put on minimal emergency lighting until the situation is under control. The Stargate is also unable to dial out.

Two days to zero hour.

With the deadline passed, Baal returns to inquire about the delay in sending him Camulus. Jack assures him that the S.G.C. power failure is not a stall tactic. The Goa'uld offers O'Neill one more day, and disappears.

Major Davis reports that Area 51 has been steadily manufacturing a modified version of the Goa'uld poison constructed by the Tok'ra ("Summit"), and believes that they now have enough to wipe out tens of thousands of symbiotes of three Goa'uld-occupied planets. Unfortunately, Jaffa would be killed as well, and there is still no evidence as to which world SG-1 is currently being held captive on. And because he handed Earth Ancient technology, Camulus now demands to be released from his chains.

O'Neill continues his letter to Hammond, in which he resigns as base commander. Power is restored, gamma radiation has reduced the size of the plant, and the Stargate is again operational. But the same radiation has revealed a problem: the Z.P.M. is glowing blue. When Lee exposes a micro fragment of the device to active electrical energy, it explodes. If this 50 percent powered Z.P.M. had been connected to the Atlantis outpost in Antarctica or to the Stargate, the explosion could have decimated all of Earth -- which explains why Camulus was so eager to leave after handing it over, even if it meant being delivered to Baal.

O'Neill approaches Camulus with this information, and makes an arrangement to give him the opportunity to destroy Baal with the same booby-trapped Z.P.M. Camulus agrees, and takes the device through the Stargate with SG-3 to await the return of SG-1. Still, the team is not handed over, and Camulus is gone.

One day to zero hour.

As O'Neill enters the elevator to go home for the night, Stargate Command receives SG-1's I.D.C. O'Neill is extremely reluctant to open the iris to let the team through, because they have been in enemy hands and could have been compromised. Daniel radios back, stating that they were never captured by Baal and have been on P2X-887 the entire time. O'Neill orders Sergeant O'Brien to open the iris, and the team comes through followed by a blaze of staff weapon fire.

SG-1 had been able to access Anubis' base secret base on the planet, but weren't able to get back out. Baal's Al'kesh had intercepted radio chatter, which told him where SG-1 was and gave Baal the opportunity to bluff O'Neill. When they finally found a way out of the base, Baal's Jaffa ambushed them. Even more unfortunate, Anubis left behind no valuable technology.

Carter later reports that Dr. Lee's estimates about the Z.P.M. were way off: It could have destroyed all of Earth's solar system. If Camulus had been unsuccessful at destroying Baal, they might have given the System Lord a powerful weapon to use against them. Fortunately, O'Neill tells Carter, he gave Camulus the dead one. Camulus, now in Baal's hands, is probably getting what he deserves right about now.

Zero hour.

Gilmor reports that the President's motorcade has arrived on the surface, and explains that he will be departing the next day. He has been on a temporary assignment for President Hayes as a "civilian audit" of General O'Neill, before the President would officially endorse him as the new commander of the S.G.C. But O'Neill has known all along, thanks to General Hammond. Gilmor tells him that Hayes' arrival makes it evident that he has a great deal of respect for O'Neill, through watching how he has dealt with so many problems over the past few days.

Gilmor also reports the Amran delegates are finally ready to negotiate with Earth. As O'Neill and Gilmor depart the General's office, a piece of paper lays on the center of Jack's desk -- the letter of resignation to General Hammond, with the last words stated quite clearly: "Never mind."

Daniel's face is un-bandaged to reveal the eyes of a beautiful girl. His face is blotted with burns. She tells him that her home is far from the city, but all Daniel can remember is that something terrible happened there — and he, or his team, was responsible.

Three months ago ...

Shortly after a startled tourist group witnesses the relic of their Stargate open for the first time in the middle of a museum, Colonel Carter, Dr. Jackson and Teal'c step through to be greeted by delegates from the world. Many here had dismissed the possibility that the Stargate is a mystical power source for ancient gods. The team is warned that there are even those who might consider this new reality a threat.

One month later, Daniel reports that his negotiations between the Rand Protectorate (the government in possession of the Stargate) and the Caledonian Federation (a rival nation) have only been moderately successful. Both governments have enough firepower to wipe out the other -- but the real problem is Soren, the leader of a radical group who still believe in the ancient gods. They believe SG-1's arrival has verified their beliefs, and thus made a touchy situation worse. Daniel insists he must return to help, and eventually persuades General O'Neill to allow him to go back to the planet.

Two weeks later, Daniel has been unsuccessful in brokering a truce. The religious zealot, Soren, has gathered his forces from across the country and is now a major threat. The Rand have been forced to heighten their alert status to match that of the rival nation. Minister Treydan of the Caledonians swears to Commander Gareth that if the Rand are unable to secure Soren and his forces, the Caledonians will be forced to strike to prevent the radicals from taking over.

Rebel forces have detonated devices very near to one of the Rands missile facilities. Shortly afterward they use it to strike at Caledonia. Gareth's second, Jarrod Kane, reports that the facility is now compromised. Soren's forces attack the Rand's command bunker, and Kane attempts to get Daniel to the Stargate before government falls -- but is shot in the leg by the insurgents. Daniel and Kane escape together to the surface, and Gareth is executed soon after.

Both sides are left in ruins, with Soren now in control of the Rand Protectorate -- and the Stargate.

Weeks later, the wounded Daniel attempts to raise Stargate Command on a primitive radio, but believes that either the Stargate is buried in rubble, or his signal is being jammed. He is still in the care of Leda, the woman who has been tending to his wounds. Daniel blames himself for the volatile situation on the planet, believing that SG-1's arrival sparked this conflict. But Leda insists that she is thankful it is SG-1 who came through the gate than the Goa'uld, and that the unrest between her nation and Caledonia would have been worsened to this level eventually.

The S.G.C. is still trying to raise Daniel on the radio, while SG-9 attempts to negotiate with Soren, who states that any search for the lost man will cause more civil unrest. Meanwhile, Kane has returned home to Leda's side with his remaining forces, and gives Jackson the latest news: Anyone who is suspected of being part of the original Rand government is shot on sight by Soren's forces.

O'Neill arranges for Soren to visit Earth. In exchange for helping locate Dr. Jackson, he offers food and medical supplies, plus people to help get the nation back on its feet. Soren is only interested in weapons, stating the revolution is not complete. As Soren departs, Daniel manages to send a transmission through and uses Goa'uld words (as the transmission could be picked up by the insurgents) to propose a coordinated attack against Soren.

Jackson discusses his plans with Kane, who is beginning to see his side of things. Rebel troops under Soren's banner force their way into the home, but not before Leda hides Daniel, Kane, and his men in the cellar. After an interrogation Leda is able to dissuade them from finding anything, and they depart.

Shortly afterward, Kane and Daniel gather their troops and head for the city to retake the command bunker. At the same time, Carter leads S.G. units 3, 6, and 12 through to aid the attack from within. The first round of assaults is successful. As the bunker is surrounded, the teams call for Soren's surrender, but he only insists that his people engage them again. One of his aides attempts to dissuade him from further fighting, but he shoots her and orders the others to continue to fight.

When they do not, Soren goes out alone to face the assembled squad. Carter orders him to drop his weapon. Soren puts it aside just as Kane fires, killing him. As they stand over his body, Daniel warns Kane that he may have made Soren a martyr -- but either way, Earth will keep its promise to help their civilization rebuild.

8 - 6 AVATAR

Sergeant Walter Harriman calls out a threat level as Teal'c and several soldiers pile towards the Gate Room. Once inside it is clear that a single Kull warrior has invaded Stargate Command. General O'Neill is shot down, and Teal'c snatches a Kull disruptor-armed weapon from a fallen comrade and fires at the drone, disabling it.

He awakens, attached to a virtual reality chair obtained from P7J-989 ("The Gamekeeper"), Dr. Bill Lee beaming with excitement. Teal'c reports that he found the simulation unrealistic, but agrees to work with the team to modify the device further in the hopes of making it more realistic. Lee's team has engineered software to use the V.R. chairs for training purposes, and the technology is capable of learning from the player and continually adapting.

Teal'c soon goes back into the game, but almost immediately is taken out by the super-soldier in the gate room, who has anticipated his entrance and kills him immediately upon opening the door. The game resets and he tries a new tactic, this time going around to the other side of the missile silo. But when he enters all he finds is O'Neill, dead at the bottom of the ramp. The drone kills Teal'c again, this time from the opposite entrance.

In the real world, Teal'c is being jolted by a small electrical charge each time a plasma blast hits him. Dr. Lee did not anticipate this, and is relieved they did not apply anything to the game that could be lethal. Still, Colonel Carter is concerned.

Teal'c is no longer taking risks. He goes straight for the armory, puts on a vest and obtains a disruptor-armed weapon. Down the hall two warriors flank him from both ends, and he is shot down again.

The game continues to reset to the beginning each time Teal'c is killed. He has been told that there are two ways to end the game: beat the scenario and save the base, or head to the elevator and take it to the surface to give up. When he seemingly wins by defeating the warrior, he learns (fatally) that the objective has changed -- there are more warriors, for example.

In the eleventh round Teal'c gains aid from the game's simulated versions of Colonel Carter and several airmen. They corner the two drones in a corridor, but this time they are unexpectedly invulnerable to the Kull disruptors. As Carter is killed, Teal'c orders the men to fall back -- but he is shot as well.

In the real world, the S.G.C.'s Dr. Carmichael notices that Teal'c's adrenaline levels are slowly rising, as well as his heart rate and blood pressure. The V.R. chair itself cannot kill him, but the danger now is that if the game does not quit, each time Teal'c is killed will accumulate to his eventual death by an unavoidable heart attack.

The game resets, and Teal'c and Carter proceed to her lab to obtain a frequency modulator chip to counteract the Kull's new adaptive armor. Teal'c succeeds in destroying both warriors just as the base self-destruct activates, but after Carter shuts it down, the game does not automatically shut off. They haven't won.

Teal'c tries to figure out why the scenario has not ended as he is treated for an arm injury in the virtual reality infirmary. Without warning the self-destruct begins again. This time Carter can't shut it off, and Stargate Command is destroyed. The game resets. Realizing that the game's objective is changing every time, Teal'c finally gives in and hurries to the surface via the elevator shafts.

The real Carter, Jackson, and Lee watch the game display monitor, relieved that Teal'c is willing to give up and exit the V.R. simulation. But when he reaches level one, the game resets again; Teal'c is unable to escape.

Outside his teammates are clearly worried that the game is not going to let him win, as it continually provides new twists, essentially moving back the "finish line." Dr. Carmichael provides Teal'c with an injection of adrenaline to keep him going, but it will not sustain him indefinitely. Teal'c is literally playing for his life.

Not only has the game added a third Kull warrior, but this drone possesses an invisibility device. Teal'c and Carter manage to take them all out, but as that is done Sergeant Siler reports a naquadah generator is overloading. When Carter and Teal'c attempt to activate the Stargate and throw it through, Dr. Jackson zaps Sergeant Harriman before the dialing sequence is complete, revealing himself to be a Goa'uld! The naquadah generator explodes and the program resets once more.

Teal'c, suffering from exhaustion and realizing that he cannot win, slouches down against the concrete wall of the corridor and lets the game reset again and again. He cannot play any longer.

Meanwhile, Carter conducts experiments on an identical chair using an imprint of Teal'c's memory taken six years ago on P7J-989, but the results are virtually the same. She fears that the game will not let him win the game until the Goa'uld themselves have been totally defeated -- and that, six years ago at least, Teal'c might have truly believed the Goa'uld could never be defeated. If his views have not changed, and the game he's trapped in is serving as a microcosm for the battle against the Goa'uld as a whole, it might never let him win.

O'Neill suggests hooking up a joystick to another chair to help Teal'c, giving Carter and Lee an idea. They devise a means to add an additional player into the game, but with a two-second advantage to help Teal'c win. Jack, Daniel, and Sam all volunteer, even knowing that if they can't beat the game they will be trapped with Teal'c. Daniel is chosen and joins in the simulation, with the ability to see events two seconds before they happen (thanks to the interface's time lag from the game's processor) -- and is immediately killed by Teal'c, who still believes that Daniel is a Goa'uld.

The game resets and this time Daniel tries to reason with him, but Teal'c shoots Daniel again. In the next round, Jackson takes up his own strategy and zats Teal'c to the ground to force him to listen. Soon Teal'c understands the truth -- this is the real Daniel -- and the two join forces to defeat the game.

Their first attempt is a failure, and Teal'c's heart stops. Carmichael is able to get him moving, but that the agent he just injected will not work again.

This time Teal'c and Daniel successfully take down all three drones, but find Carter and O'Neill in a storage locker trying to deactivate the overloading naquadah generator. Sam swears that Siler (unconscious in the corner) was the Goa'uld, but the two players don't know who they can trust. Teal'c and Daniel raise their weapons and end off in a tense stand-off with the virtual Jack and Sam. With the generator counting down to overload, Teal'c and Daniel decide to lower their weapons.

Carter manages to deactivate the device -- but Siler leaps to his feet, revealing that he is indeed a Goa'uld. Teal'c takes him out, and the game finally ends.

Teal'c has become quite the local hero in Colorado Springs. Having recently acquired an apartment, he has felt obligated to intervene in minor local disputes as a law-abiding citizen, giving him far more popularity among the locals than perhaps needs to be drawn to him. Colonel Kendrick and the entire National Security Administration is more than concerned.

O'Neill sends Daniel to discuss the matter with the Jaffa. Now that he no longer carries a symbiote, Teal'c is able to more easily blend in, but helping others in need is not really permitting him to keep a low profile. In the midst of their discussion, Teal'c's next-door neighbor Krista invades with a pack of cookies as a bribe to help with some pipes in her apartment. She is introduced to Daniel, who says as he departs, that plumbing is an exception to the rules of noninterference.

Sam and Pete ("Chimera") have lunch in a park in the city, where he informs her that he's put in a transfer to the Colorado Springs Police Department. Assuring her that, in his love for her, he's never been more certain of anything, he pulls out a small box and reveals its contents. Inside is an engagement ring.

As Teal'c and Krista bring home groceries and discuss plans for lasagna, a young man snatches a woman's purse. Teal'c's friend Eric encourages the Jaffa to intervene, and in the last second he tosses a grapefruit hundreds of feet through the air, hitting the thief squarely in the head. As Teal'c receives congratulations for another crime diverted, someone snaps images of him from a nearby building ...

In the night Teal'c overhears a man beating on Krista's door. He discovers it to be Doug, her boyfriend, who is clearly intoxicated. After an exchange of threats, Doug departs, promising to call her tomorrow. Later, after another fight, she decides to break off her relationship, and asks Teal'c to teach her lok'nel, an ancient form of martial arts training that she has found him practicing. After a period of tremendous progress on her part, she suddenly stops the sessions. Teal'c finds bruises on her arm, and soon learns she is seeing Doug again. Teal'c promises Doug that if he ever harms Krista again he will die at Teal'c's hands

After two weeks Carter still has not said "Yes" to Pete's proposal. She discusses the situation with Jack, who assures her that plenty on-base personnel have families. When she asks him if things had turned out differently, he gives her a definitive answer. "I wouldn't be here."

Later, Carter joins Daniel in his lab. O'Neill has just got off the phone with Colonel Kendrick, who reports that Krista's boyfriend has been found dead in her apartment, and evidence is pointing to Teal'c as the murderer. To make matters worse, both he and Krista are missing. Teal'c is currently wanted for kidnapping and murder.

Krista and Teal'c are indeed on the run, but Teal'c only believes she wishes to be free of the city for a few days, not knowing Doug is dead. When he realizes they are being followed, he loses them with some bad driving, taking Krista to a motel for the night. When he wakes up, she is not to be found, and multiple guards at his door return him to Stargate Command. Colonel Kendrick says they received an anonymous tip on his location. Meanwhile, Dr. Jackson gets a phone call and a message in the Ancient language. The individual on the other end has footage that proves Teal'c did not kill Doug, but Jackson must translate the Ancient into Goa'uld before receiving the tape.

Pete and Sam upturn Krista's department and discover evidence that Teal'c was framed -- the body appears to have been deliberately moved to support this. Across the street they discover evidence that there was a stakeout monitoring the two apartments. A local pizza place reports a Caucasian male ordered out over half a dozen times. Pete begins to run a check on the license plate from the restaurants surveillance footage. He learns the social security number and credit cards used to obtain the car were from a man who died six months ago, and now intends to check and see if the rental company has satellite tracking for the automobile.

Meanwhile, Daniel has gone missing. He is taken to a warehouse where an entire former-N.I.D. cell is operating. They have also captured Krista. Daniel learns Krista killed Doug, but in self defense, and nothing would have happened if she hadn't learned the Jaffa technique for crushing a wind pipe. The operatives saw an opportunity and took advantage of it.

Threatening to kill Krista, Daniel is forced to translate the Ancient into Goa'uld. The operatives transmit the data, wipe the hard drives and zat the two unconscious. Just before Sam, Pete and military units enter, the rogue group escapes using Asgard beaming technology.

After the cleanup team finds little of value, Sam says Yes to Pete's engagement proposal, and the two embrace.

Teal'c has decided to move out of his apartment, despite the fact that most of the incident was Krista's fault. With National Security pressuring him and his easy-to-spot oddities, he feels it will be for the best. He says goodbye to Krista and Eric and drives off.

Alec Colson, President and C.E.O. of Colson Industries, calls a press conference to dispute the meteor shower incident that cost the lives of thousands five months ago. "We are being lied to, and the truth is being covered up," he tells a room of reporters. He then gives the world governments who are concealing the truth 24 hours to reveal the real story to the public -- or he will do it for them.

General O'Neill orders Colonel Carter and Dr. Jackson to Colson Industries to meet Alec in person and attempt to dissuade him from going public with whatever information he has. While there Colson shows them images his satellites have taken, including Anubis's fleet and the battle over Antarctica. He assures them that he has far more information, and has no intention of backing out.

Twenty-four hours to the minute, Colson reappears in his press room. The governments have only responded with silence, forcing him to go to the next level. As the crowd turns around to the back door of the room, an Asgard enters. Blinded by the camera flashes, he covers his eyes. O'Neill and SG-1, watching the live broadcast, wonder what their next move will be.

Stargate Command gets a message back from Thor. He knows no Asgard currently operating on, or in orbit of, Earth, and surely no Asgard would allow himself to be used in such a manner.

Back at Colson industries, Alec and his team monitor as the media crazily lines up for interviews with the creature (which has the capability of speaking, but not the brainpower). It was a genetic experiment, and the DNA was acquired from the department of defense. Essentially, it is an empty shell until an Asgard consciousness is transferred inside.

The Pentagon orders Stargate Command to deal with the problem, and immediately Thor is summoned. He uses his beaming technology to transport the clone and all of Colson's research aboard his ship, away from their hands. Shortly afterward Carter appears on Julia Donovan's program, Inside Access, and explains how Colson's alien was a holographic trick. Thor appears as a hologram and plays along to solidify her position to the viewers.

Shortly afterward Colson's airplane is forced into an emergency landing after takeoff. The plane had depressurized in mid air. Colson calls Sam. He is safe, but he questions if Washington had something to do with the incident. She says she would have never went on-air to discredit him if she knew he was going to die.

Before O'Neill and Thor meet with the President, Carter proposes they let Colson in on everything; show him why it's so important not to go public. Meanwhile, Colson is not stopped. He intends to go forward with the images and pieces of the downed Goa'uld craft from Antarctica. Brian Vogler, his closest assistant, urges him not to go forward. "They tried to kill us," he says. In the midst of their argument Alec is swept away to the S.G.C. by Thor. He is soon introduced to the "real" Asgard and the Stargate.

Carter provides him with a uniform and takes him to the Alpha Site, where he meets some of the officers and is introduced to the F-302, a ship his company helped build with multi-engine controls. Sam takes him up for a little fun, and in mid-flight he gets a chance to take the stick, but when he gets control he plummets the craft back to the surface in a crash-dive. Carter switches back over in the nick of time and pulls up, gliding the 302 back to base.

After they land, Colson states that the lecture and the joyride he got in the air will not dissuade him from telling people what they have a right to know. Colson clearly believes knowledge of the Stargate and aliens would unite humanity, but Carter proves that global disaster has happened on other planets who received the exact same knowledge ("Icon").

When Carter and Colson return to Earth Daniel reports a story broke out showing that Colson's businesses are now being investigated for financial fraud. Back at Colson Industries, Brian admits to doctoring the financial statements to pull the company down. The Trust got to him six months ago. Somehow, they knew the evidence Alec had. Vogler's word alone will not be enough to bail the company out of debt, or them out of jail.

After Brian's family is put into protective custody. O'Neill receives a phone call saying that Vogler hanged himself in his bathroom.

Carter visits Colson, who is obviously distraught, toying with a pistol. He feels directly responsible for his best friend's death. Sam says congress is ready to provide relief to the company's work force so that they will be able to survive, and informs him that her superiors have given her authorization to make a proposal. Since there is nowhere on Earth that he will be able to hide, they have offered him life on another world.

Teal'c and Bra'tac return from a visit with the Hak'tyl resistance, the former in a foul mood. He has just discovered that Rya'c is in love and has pledged to marry a young Hak'tyl woman in three days time. Teal'c not only believes that he is far too young, but that Rya'c did not consult his father makes him angrier.

Ishta arrives through the Stargate with urgent news: Hak'tyl may be compromised. She requests that haste be made to locate a new world for her people before Moloc finds out about the resistance. In the interim, General O'Neill agrees for their entire population to take up temporary residence at the S.G.C.

Rya'c and Kar'yn, his bride-to-be, arrive with the scores of Hak'tyl, announcing to Colonel Carter and Dr. Jackson that relocation will not change their wedding plans: they intend to marry among friends at the base.

Teal'c believes Ishta has been avoiding her, but she says that he must have no respect for her because Rya'c is marrying a warrior that is not worthy of his father's respect. Teal'c makes it clear that he simply believes he has too much life ahead to make such a rash decision so early, but Ishta argues that as Teal'c had no choice but to break away from his family to serve, he should not have authority for Rya'c not to do the same. Their opinions also differ on how to proceed in the war against the Goa'uld.

Carter reports that they have scouted a planet Ishta may be comfortable with, but that it will take about a week to set up a livable camp, meaning the wedding will still proceed on-base. Therefore, Bra'tac begins preparations, including a practice session of the ceremony. It is then that Rya'c and Kar'yn's beliefs are revealed to differ considerably. Kar'yn refuses to kneel before her would-be husband, and Rya'c is unable to put up with her aversions from the old ways.

Ishta receives a communication from Jaffa resistant to Moloc to convene in a summit on the new home world, as it will be the most secure location from the Goa'uld. In preparation for this meeting, she speaks to Kar'yn about the importance of the Jaffa men to make the war their priority above all other things. Bra'tac does the same with Rya'c.

At the summit the Jaffa soldiers report that the numbers of loyalists to their cause are growing too large to conceal. In order to prevent the risk of exposure prior to the fact, Moloc must be defeated soon. As Teal'c attempts to dissuade them from acting prematurely, their tent is swarmed with dozens of plasma blasts. Moloc's Imperial Guard have been alerted. Only Teal'c, Ishta and a Jaffa named Aron manage to escape in time.

As night falls, the three warriors spy Moloc's encampment. It is not yet known if he has joined his troops, but it is clear that survivors are being tortured for information, their cries piercing the darkness. They move off to a safe distance to rest. While alone, Teal'c and Ishta discuss the possibility that Aron might be the infiltrator who told Moloc of the meeting. Teal'c encourages her to rest and takes first watch.

When daylight comes Aron wakes Teal'c and asks where Ishta has gone. But it is too late. She has been captured and now faces Moloc. Aron believes Teal'c is weak for carrying feelings for Ishta and wants to take Moloc immediately. To insure that he cannot betray him, Teal'c zats him and takes his staff weapon.

While Ishta is tortured by Moloc's hand device, S.G.C. makes plans to send a U.A.V. to the planet to drop tretonin for Teal'c and target the Jaffa back at the Stargate. However, it is shot from the sky, five hundred meters from his location. When he arrives he gathers the tretonin, but it is soon obvious that he has been tracked by the Imperial Guard. After a failed attempt to prove to them their freedom, Aron arrives as a distraction, enabling Teal'c to free himself. Teal'c thanks him, and they continue toward the Stargate.

Ishta is now too weak to stand. Moloc learns that 2,000 Jaffa have gathered against his temple on Gor'mek. When he prepares to depart, Earth makes contact with the planet, sending missiles through. Aron, possessing a targeting device for the missiles, aims the weapons straight at Moloc, killing him and his battalion. Meanwhile, Teal'c saves Ishta from Moloc's First Prime, Cha'ra.

At their ceremony, Rya'c and Kar'yn give their vows and Bra'tac completes the joining. Later, Teal'c tells Rya'c that he could not have made a better decision for a companion, and that Drey'auc would have been equally proud. He wishes both of them well as they depart to another planet that the S.G.C. has managed to locate. Unfortunately, Moloc's defeat has opened his dominion to Baal. Eager to meet again, Teal'c and Ishta embrace before she and the rest of her people depart.

8 - 10 ENDGAME

It's three in the morning. While two sergeants monitor gate activity at the S.G.C., the Stargate is stolen by what looks to be an Asgard beam ...

The next morning, Daniel questions the officers, but they reveal no information of value. Carter plays back the video feed where it is unanimously decided that the technology used to take the gate was Asgard. In a foul mood, O'Neill calls the President and informs him of the bad news.

Teal'c, receiving a "Do Not Proceed" response to his I.D.C., travels to the Alpha Site to consult with the officers there. They reveal that Earth may be compromised. Teal'c plans to return to P4S-161 to get a cargo ship to take back to Earth.

For two days prior to the loss of the gate a small signal was detected, but no one thought anything of it until the Stargate disappeared. Reviewing video logs, it becomes clear that Dr. Kevin Hartkins, who has been with the base for seven months, placed something on the Stargate at the exact same time the anomaly was detected. Carter believes it was a "tag" so that Asgard transporters could detect the gate and beam it away. She requests N.S.A. satellite time to detect the signal.

Teal'c arrives on P4S-161 and discovers the entire population of rogue Jaffa dead, save for M'zel, who only recently arrived. He takes Teal'c to the lair of the main camp, revealing hundreds of fallen warriors.

Sam, Daniel and a small battalion of troops probe the location of the Trust's signal, but find an empty warehouse, save for V.X. rockets and several cases of what appears to be nerve gas. When an elusive member of the Trust emerges and shoots at the team, he hits several canisters before Carter zats him down. Believing it to be too late, they await their death, but it never comes.

Back at the S.G.C., Carter believes the Trust intends to launch a full-scale chemical attack against the Goa'uld, using rockets to convey symbiote poison, with no regard for the lives of the Jaffa. The gentleman they uncovered carried only an Area 51 badge.

Carter and Daniel go to the Nevada base and meet with Dr. Bricksdale, requesting to see Osiris' hand device, capable of activating Asgard technology. They scan the device and it proves to be the genuine article, but is useless for getting aboard her cloaked ship.

Meanwhile, M'zel has traveled back with Teal'c to the Alpha Site. He receives word that three more planets have been attacked. Millions are now dead. M'zel agrees to travel with Teal'c to P3S-114 (where a Tok'ra is concealed as a Goa'uld under Baal's authority) to inquire if her people are responsible for the demise of the countless Jaffa.

Dr. Bricksdale meets with Trust agent Hoskins, hoping to neutralize their partnership, but Hoskins soon realizes that Bricksdale has been followed. After a brief skirmish he initiates his locator beacon, but Carter zats him before he can activate it. Instead, she takes it and uses it to get up to Osiris' Al'kesh, where she is rendered unconscious by more of the Trust.

Teal'c and M'zel allow themselves to be captured by Zaren's Jaffa. When Zaren is informed, she immediately orders that they be brought to her. She is furious that they have risked blowing her cover, and tells them that she is obligated to torture them until Baal can arrive to watch them be executed.

Meanwhile, Jackson interrogates Dr. Bricksdale, telling him that they can come to an agreement to keep the two million the Trust paid him for cooperation if he helps the S.G.C. regain Carter and Osiris' ship. Bricksdale explains that he did manage to get onboard Osiris' vessel, but the hand device never left Area 51 (at least while it was on Earth). He used locator beacons to get the Trust aboard. Daniel pieces the puzzles together: the code Daniel translated for them was the very same one that gave the Trust access to the Al'kesh. Bricksdale promises he can make the wrist device work once more.

Carter awakens to find herself surrounded by the Trust. Soon she confirms they are launching a chemical war against the Goa'uld. Their next target is P3S-114. As Zaren is interrogating Teal'c and M'zel, the rocket impacts, and all symbiotes, including Zaren and M'zel's, quickly die, taking them along with it. Teal'c is the only one on the planet left standing.

Daniel uses Osiris' hand device to sneak aboard the Al'kesh and disable the cloak. Prometheus detects the ship, but he is soon captured. Aboard Prometheus, Colonel Pendergast requests that they take the vessel out before it has time to escape, but O'Neill does not give the order.

Teal'c contacts the Stargate aboard the Al'kesh once again, and Daniel and Sam use that moment to take down two members of the Trust. Teal'c comes through and kills one of them with a staff blast. Before the Al'kesh exits into hyperspace, Carter uses a locator beacon to beam SG-1 and the Stargate into Prometheus's cargo hold.

S.G.C. installs jamming beacons around the gate so that it can no longer be taken. Unfortunately, the Trust have a hyperdrive-capable Al'kesh and enough poison to wipe out half a dozen more planets. It might have been better if O'Neill destroyed the vessel when he had the chance.

Daniel Jackson ensures that Vala Mal Doran is thoroughly searched before departing Earth, and lo and behold, she tries to make off with a priceless artifact -- twice. But about an hour after she has left, Daniel collapses again. He regains consciousness only to find she has returned, and that there is a more permanent link than they believed.

Once the kor mak were removed everything should have returned to normal, but Dr. Lam believes that since they used the bracelets in conjunction with an Ancient long-range communications device, they may have warped the after-effects into forming a more permanent bond. As Dr. Lee runs tests Daniel finally gets Vala to admit that she knows someone who might know of a way to sever the connection: the very person she stole the bracelets from.

Mitchell and Daniel meet Arlos, a former lover of Vala from whom she stole the bracelets. They explain the situation to them, and he says he might be able to sever the connection -- but only if Vala is brought to him. Fearful that he might be planning to kill her he assures them that this is not the case.

Vala is brought to Arlos where he demands the return of his mother's necklace (another item she stole), or he will not attempt to sever the connection. SG-1 agrees to track it down. This brings them to another world to meet another of Vala's associates, a Jaffa named Inago. He insists he will only return the necklace if Vala returns a Tel'tak's power coil.

This leads them to another planet where the team travels to a shrine where monks still worship the god Grannus. Another of Vala's associates, Caius, is hiding out as a monk, but he wants to leave. For the power coil, Vala must return his cargo ship -- the very one he had -- not a replacement. Unfortunately, the ship is now being used by the Lucian Alliance, particularly another of Vala's former associates, Tenat. Getting away with it scot-free would be impossible.

Three days later General Landry, Vala, Daniel and Teal'c (who has returned from Dakara for testimony) travel to Washington D.C. in the hopes of convincing the chairman of the appropriations committee to not slash the S.G.C.'s budget. He believes in the possibility that Daniel and Vala were under a hallucination when they went to "another galaxy" inside their own minds. After Vala points a finger at the inadequacy of Senator Fisher's "manhood," the group returns to Stargate Command and Landry informs Mitchell that he now has no choice: Vala must be gone, so he'll have to find a way to deal with the alliance. Their warnings have also gone unheeded, and the program's budget has been cut by 70 percent.

Teal'c joins the unit to a remote planet where they have agreed to meet Tenat. In exchange for Vala and Daniel (who was responsible for a loss of weapons-grade naquadah ["Prometheus Unbound"], bounty hunter "Cam Mitchell" and his Jaffa associate will earn a new case. As Tenat holds Mitchell and Teal'c at gunpoint, Jup takes the handcuffed Vala and Daniel to the cargo ship. As they suspected, there is no box of naquadah in the hold, and Jup locks them in the back. Vala uncuffs them and Daniel begins work on the door.

The cargo ship arrives and hovers over Tenat, Mitchell and Teal'c. The "bounty hunters" lower their zat'ni'katels, realizing they have been double-crossed by the alien. But it is Tenat who has been double-crossed. The transport rings beam Teal'c and Mitchell aboard the cargo ship, ringing down an unconscious Jup simultaneously.

But the Lucian alliance has arrived. Vala activates the modifications to the Tel'tak to generate four uncloaking Al'kesh and a pulse wave, enough to get them into hyperspace and away from the threat.

The cargo ship is returned to Caius, the power coil to Inago, and the necklace to Arlos, who reveals that he has no way to counteract the effects of the bonding. But his guess is that it will eventually wear off itself. General Landry is understandably upset, but at least he has some good news. The current budget will be cut, but they now have the support of the international committee -- as long as they will be able to assign a civilian to the S.G.C. to monitor all expenditures and have a say in decisions.

SG-1 gathers in the Gate Room to see Teal'c back to Dakara, but Mitchell is certain that they'll be seeing him again soon.

9 - 5 THE POWERS THAT BE

Priors of the Ori have been busy in our galaxy. They have appeared on 43 different planets, and these are only worlds that have been explored and reported. Vala Mal Doran, (still on Earth while waiting out the evaporation of the invisible energy field between she and Dr. Jackson) inundates Colonel Mitchell with this point and informs him that she has a good relationship with the people of P8X-412. Hearing this worrying news, Mitchell heads for General Landry's office to bump it up on SG-1's mission list.

With Teal'c's temporary return SG-1, including Vala, make for the pyramidal temple on 412. While Vala excuses herself to change her outfit a young man enters the chamber, and upon the sight of SG-1 runs scared. Moments later a throng of his friends have returned, all wielding staff weapons of their god Qetesh. But before SG-1 can state their intentions Qetesh herself appears -- and it's Vala.

For their goddess's pleasure, the inhabitants play out a small sketch detailing Qetesh winning 412 from Baal. Daniel is understandably upset, but Vala intends to continue to play as Qetesh to renounce the Ori as gods. In public, a man continues to spread the word of the Ori after the Prior cured him of his physical disability. Asdak, the local who led the play, continues to believe in Qetesh, saying she will slay the Prior when he returns -- and he is scheduled to return -- the following day.

Vala's prime intention for returning was to pillage her boxes of treasures, probably the only valuables on the planet. Teal'c insists if she does not tell the truth about herself they will, but Daniel presses her, telling her of how good it will feel to be honest with the culture. She consents. Vala will tell the inhabitants of 412 that she is not a god.

Vala is sentenced to death, furious with Daniel for ever suggesting that she be truthful. Asdak is the most outraged. He had devoted his entire life of faith in the service of a false god. But Mitchell and Teal'c manage to sway him to a fair trial for Vala. A Mal Doran (a trial set up by Qetesh and named after her host) will be held to determine her punishment.

When Asdak reads the charges, including Mass Executions and Mass Torture, Vala and Daniel raise a red flag reminding him that it was the parasite within, Qetesh itself, that had done such horrific things. Asdak is lenient and narrows down the charges to the past four years since Vala has been disposed of the symbiote. At the top of the list is planetary-wide forced labor. The outcome does not look good. But when Daniel's time comes he insists that the reason the people know about the truth of Vala is not because she was found out, but because she openly told them, in the hopes that they would not make the same mistake with the Ori.

But the Prior has returned, intending to argue the people's devotion to his gods. Daniel maintains his ground in the ensuing verbal match, arguing that superior knowledge does not mean that lesser beings should worship them. But the Prior insists that those who do not bow to the Ori will fall to dust. Asdak declares the Mal Doran closed and instructs SG-1 to return Vala to her cell and wait there until the people arrive at an answer.

Asdak returns to Vala, informing her that she will not be killed, but will be imprisoned for life. A villager soon arrives and reports that Vashna, the first man cured by the Ori, has fallen ill. Daniel convinces Asdak to allow Vala to see him, and she takes advantage of the residual naquadah in her body to operate a Goa'uld healing device. Vashna immediately feels better, and Daniel explains that it was merely knowledge and advanced technology that helped him.

Soon more of the villagers become sick. While Vala uses the hand device on the inflicted Colonel Mitchell asks for backup. Landry sends his daughter Dr. Lam and a small medical contingent, all in hazard suits, through to 412. Eventually the hand device stops working, and Asdak, after repeated treatments, dies. Lam says he is only the first, and that there is nothing she can do. Soon Mitchell falls ill as well.

Interestingly, Vala, Daniel and Teal'c are unaffected by the virus, and Dr. Lam intends to review their blood work. But this is not enough to stop the population from falling like flies. Eventually the Prior reappears, but since not all of the villagers have converted he is unwilling to do anything to help them. Vala, enraged over the loss of Asdak and the continual dominance of the Ori, arms a P-90 and fires a round at the Prior, but the bullets stop inches from his chest.

The villagers have had enough, too, and all of them bow down before the Prior, pledging their allegiance and devotion to the Ori. The Prior pelts the foot of his staff into the ground, igniting the orb, which eliminates the virus from the planet. Mitchell and the others are instantly cured, and even Asdak rises from the grave.

The population is sold on the Ori. The Prior comes face-to-face with Daniel. "Tell others what you have seen today," he says, and departs through a parting trickle of submissive acolytes.

9 - 6 BEACH HEAD

A Prior returns to planet Kallana, eager to hear the decision of the Jaffa settlement. But their representative, Latal, speaks for the people. He has read from the Book of Origin and declares that they do not wish to serve the Ori. When the Prior does not leave the Jaffa fire staff weapon blasts in his direction, but he whisks them into the sky with his own staff. A large blue field begins to form around the vicinity of the Prior and Stargate.

Stargate Command receives a text message from Nerus, a minor Goa'uld who served Baal for many centuries. He wishes to work for the S.G.C. to develop new technology to defend against the Ori threat.

After a thorough search Nerus is permitted to travel to Earth. He reveals a small holographic device (Much like the device once used on Vorash) that has detected the activity on Kallana. His readings are two days old, and the bubble is expanding. He urgently suggests that General Landry dispatch a team to throw every conceivable weapon at the bubble while Nerus attempts to find a way to bring it down. Landry agrees to send a naquadria-enriched warhead with its inventor, Colonel Samantha Carter, and Vala Mal Doran (still present because of the bond between she and Dr. Jackson) in tow.

With the Stargate permanently active on Kallana (likely powered by a black hole in the Ori galaxy), SG-1 travels to P4C-452 to hitch a ride with Prometheus. Once aboard, Colonel Pendergast orders a course to Kallana. Colonel Carter's experimental warhead will be the device used in the unlikely event the Prior is swayed.

When Prometheus arrives in orbit SG-1 beams down to Kallana with the warhead. As expected, the Prior is unwilling to listen, but after the deployment of the nuke weapons fire begins to impact the bubble. Three of Gerak's Ha'tak have arrived and have begun to pelt the energy field with plasma fire. He agrees to hold off after he learns that SG-1 is on the planet, but resumes after the team returns to Prometheus, the nuke armed.

Before the detonation the Prior places his hand on the gate, likely extending his personal shield to help protect it from the blast wave of the nuke (before sacrificing his own life in the process). Almost immediately the explosion increases the radius of the field. Only then Carter realizes that the Ori were unable to calculate the required power output from the other galaxy, so they developed a forcefield that would be strengthened by enemy weaponry. The nuke provided 70 percent of the energy they needed to expand the field.

Gerak's Ha'taks continue to fire. As soon as the field is completed dozens upon dozens of craft, relatively ten meters in length, emerge through the molten Stargate on the planet's surface and exit through the field. Extremely sturdy and intent on reaching a certain point in space, two of Gerak's motherships are destroyed by collisions, and his is critically damaged. Prometheus nicks one of the devices as well. Unwilling to risk further damage to his own craft, Gerak flees the scene, warning that a cloaked scout will remain to monitor Prometheus.

With sensors back online, Carter finds the small components that traveled through the gate are coming together to form an enormous "Supergate," a Stargate orbiting the planet and large enough to bring through an entire invasion fleet from the Ori's galaxy. The forcefield that has now completely engulfed the planet is quickly shrinking it to create a singularity. With a black hole on the ends of both Stargates, the wormhole could be maintained indefinitely, allowing armadas of warships to pass through and conquer the Milky Way for the Ori.

Vala, not getting attention for her ideas, goes to the Prometheus's ring room and uses the rings to seek out the cloaked cargo ship's. She zats the Jaffa and rings him back to Prometheus, taking the Tel'tak into the spot where the last missing supergate component would be placed. Pouring on the throttle, the cargo ship becomes jammed into the slot. As the singularity occurs, she tries to beam away, but does not make it back to the ship.

Back on Earth, General Landry interrogates Nerus (and an empty table where a feast once sat), who sided with the Ori in order to get Earth to provide their most potent weapons for the energy bubble. He tells the General that when he is put to death he will ascend to be with the Ori, but Landry insists that will not happen. Instead, he's going to be locked away deep inside of Area 51, intent on developing countermeasures against the Ori -- the only way he will be able to satiate his hunger.

Fortunately for Dr. Jackson, the bracelet's effect had begun to wear off to a point where Vala's absence would not do him harm. Carter notes that the last few moments of telemetry revealed that a matter stream did leave the cargo ship. Its possible Vala was pulled through the singularity into the Ori home galaxy instead.

If the team wanted to send the Ori a message, they certainly did.

9 - 7 EX DEUS MACHINA

A Jaffa marked under the service of Lord Yu has been discovered dead (the victim of a hit and run) on a remote road in Virginia. Teal'c is aware that many of Yu's Jaffa are now under Gerak's banner. He and Colonel Mitchell leave for Dakara to investigate.

Meanwhile, Dr. Jackson and Colonel Carter investigate the region around where the Jaffa was found. A plant belonging to Farrow-Marshall, which closed down six months before, was within two miles of where the Jaffa was found, and during the same day the company's chief financial officer, Alex Jameson, went missing.

Teal'c addresses the Jaffa council, and afterward shows a picture of the Jaffa to Gerak, who claims he never knew him. But both Teal'c and Mitchell are convinced he is lying through his teeth.

Daniel meets with Alex Jameson's wife, Sheila, who tells him she noticed an unusual change in her husband's behavior six months before. Fearing an affair, she had a private investigator follow him, but only two days into his duties he gave her her money back and strongly suggested she drop the matter entirely. Scared, he requested the few photos he took back. She refused. Daniel requests to borrow them and she consents.

Gerak visits a prison chamber on Dakara where Yat'Yir has been exercising his handiwork. A battered and beaten Alex Jameson has withstood physical torture. As Gerak promises him that the Jaffa will soon possess the information he seeks, Jameson's eyes glow.

Colonel Carter visits Farrow-Marshall headquarters and speaks with Charlotte Mayfield, VP of the company. When Carter tells her evidence of trucks moving in and out of their closed Virginia plant and a press to uncover the missing Jameson and his whereabouts, she is eventually shown the door. Down the hall, Mayfield returns to a surveillance center, where Baal has been watching the cameras.

Teal'c consults other council members but none are willing to divulge information, save one, Ka'lel, who tells both he and Mitchell that Baal took refuge on Earth following the battle for Dakara -- and Gerak is busily attempting to reacquire him.

The Goa'uld in Jameson reveals Baal's new location and a cargo ship loaded with Jaffa troops lands atop the Farrow-Marshall complex in the middle of the night. Defended by a task force of personnel, Baal narrowly evades capture.

Stargate Command receives a message from Baal himself, declaring his intentions to live out his existence peacefully on Earth, obeying Earth laws. In exchange, he wishes to be left alone. To insure that this happens, he says that he has placed a naquadah bomb somewhere in the United States.

Jackson and Carter team up with Agent Barrett to move in and capture Baal, who has been reported spotted in a hotel. Meanwhile, Mitchell and Teal'c board the Prometheus to search for a Jaffa presence in Earth's star system. On the surface, Barrett orders the mission aborted, despite the fact that Daniel and an agent have someone who looks like Baal in their sights, but across town the former System Lord is giving a televised speech in regards to his recent acquisition of another firm.

Prometheus finds a mothership hidden behind Earth's moon, commanded by Yat'Yir, who does not wish to engage in battle but refuses to withdraw. But Teal'c intends to shame Gerak into removing his forces from Earth in front of the council. In shock, he learns the council has been aware of the operation. He presses that, after all the Tau'ri have done for the new Jaffa nation, they at least owe Earth the respect of remaining up front with the truth.

General Landry decides to continue with their own operation despite the Jaffa's own attempts. The modified Tok'ra symbiote poison is loaded into a missile and poised to attack a compound where Baal has been spotted. Baal receives intelligence that this threat is coming and promises that a naquadah bomb will now detonate the Helcyon Tower in downtown Seattle.

As the symbiote poison missile hits its target Gerak's forces attempt to capture Baal. Prometheus beams Carter to the tower where she soon deduces that the building's infrastructure is laced with naquadah. Before it detonates, Prometheus beams the entire building into space, where it explodes. Fortunately, a five-block radius was evacuated, so no one saw the beam-out.

Teal'c returns to Dakara and learns of Baal's capture. Before his very eyes the former System Lord is executed. He reports this to Stargate Command who reveals evidence that Baal has been cloning himself. It's possible the Baal that was killed on Dakara was not the real Baal at all. When Mitchell suggests that he report this to the council, Teal'c declines. Gerak has fought hard for a victory, and to tell them now would not be the right thing to do.

Baal sits and watches Julia Donovan's news report about the unusual gas explosion at the Helcyon Tower. Nearby, another Baal enjoys a box of Chinese take-out. Baal's secretary sits patiently as yet another Baal pours her a drink, and a drink for indeed another Baal who is reading a newspaper. Baal himself, marked by his symbol on his shirt, tells the three clones that he will head to bed early. Tomorrow is a big day.

9 - 8 BABYLON

SG-1 and SG-22 investigate a planet Teal'c learns may be a home of the ancient Sodan, a race of Jaffa who have managed to avoid falling under the allegiance of a Goa'uld for five millenia. But SG-1 becomes a target for staff weapon fire. While Colonel Carter, Dr. Jackson and Teal'c escape, Colonel Mitchell confronts an uncloaking Sodan. After suffering a staff hit to the stomach area, Mitchell gains control of the weapon and shoots the Jaffa twice in the pouch. Other Sodan carry Mitchell away but abandon their comrade as SG-22 attacks. The Stargate units take the fallen Sodan warrior back with them.

At the S.G.C. Dr. Carolyn Lam works diligently with her staff to preserve the symbiote of the warrior. Mitchell's recovery has been ordered as well. The Sodan leader, Haikon, has instructed Jolan to administer jomo se telek (a training ritual) to Mitchell to prepare him for his death against the fallen warrior's next of kin in kel shak lo, a ritual fight to the death.

Lam reports the warrior, Volnek, will survive, but the symbiote was unrecoverable. He is now surviving on tretonin. Back on P9G-844, Mitchell engages in jomo se telek with Jolan, but discovers he is a poor match for the Jaffa who engages him in many tests to prepare him for the coming battle against Volnek's next of kin.

Mitchell is eventually granted an audience with Lord Haikon, who explains how the Sodan managed to rid themselves of Goa'uld enslavement and establish their own society 5,000 years ago. Haikon is not swayed by Mitchell's prodding that the Sodan never helped their bretheren defeat the Goa'uld, and hopes that the Colonel plans to die well.

Volnek has regained consciousness and, at first, refuses to believe that he is being sustained by the tretonin drug. Teal'c and Daniel try to get their true intentions across but Volnek has closed his mind to their words.

After a training session, Mitchell finds a Prior being escorted through the Sodan village. He soon learns from Jolan that the Ori have been sending an envoy to their village for some time. At the request of another meeting with Haikon, the lord tells Mitchell that he and his people intend to worship the Ori, knowing good and well that they are not the Ancients they have worshipped. The Ori, however, show themselves to truly exist. For Haikon, this is the next best thing.

Mitchell, beginning to gain strength in the one-on-one combat with Jolan, confronts his sparring partner about the Ori and their religion. It is clear that Jolan does not fully support Lord Haikon's decision in accepting Origin, but he is not ready to face the full effect of their presence.

In two weeks Volnek has given no information of worth to Teal'c, though they are now aware of an Ori Prior presence among the Sodan. Scans of the planet with Prometheus and U.A.V.'s have turned up negative and the international committee is counting the pennies used in the search and rescue of Cameron. Landry insists that better methods to locate him be found soon before he is forced to declare Mitchell M.I.A.

Lord Haikon hammers his gong and asks that Volnek's closest kin step forward to engage in battle against Mitchell. To Cameron's surprise it is Jolan.

Volnek meets Tass'an, the leader of a group of free Jaffa who settled on Sartorus. Tass'an explains the impact of the presence of the Ori Prior, how hundreds of his people were killed when the Prior decided to level their cities. Only now does Volnek's interest hold.

Mitchell fights against Jolan in kel shak lo. Not a minute into the death match Jolan gains the upper hand and suffocates Mitchell to death. His heart stopped, Lord Haikon declares the Colonel dead. Jolan asks that he be permitted to give Mitchell a proper passing ritual.

Seven hours later Cameron awakes. The elixir Jolan prepared may have been a bit stronger than he had intended. Mitchell is to return to Earth, while Jolan and a few warriors loyal to the ways of the Sodan prepare to face the Prior again.

Returned to Earth, Mitchell confronts Volnek about what has happened on his world, and the fact that Jolan spared the Colonel's life. With these words, Volnek is free to return to Sodan. But before he departs, he assures Mitchell that they will meet again.

9 - 9 PROTOTYPE

The Tok'ra have delivered Earth evidence that the Ori may be constructing another Supergate in the vicinity of P3X-584. With General Landry's permission, Colonel Carter and SG-5 investigate. But almost immediately the team returns. Carter, dismayed, reports that they were sent to another planet, twelve thousand light years away from 584.

Sam and Sergeant Harriman find multiple "bumps" in the Stargate logs, and it is soon determined that these anomalies were the receiving gate sending out a request for a seven-code combination. Unlike the initial M.A.L.P., organic matter that has not delivered the correct combination before arrival is "call-forwarded" to a random Stargate address.

Carter devises a program to crack the combination, and during the next try a bacterial culture has been placed in the M.A.L.P.'s cargo compartment. The cipher works and the probe arrives on 584. SG-1 and SG-5 follow.

Major Altman initiates the gravity sensors to detect any anomalies in the vicinity of the planet. Meanwhile, Colonel Mitchell, Teal'c and Dr. Jackson investigate a hidden laboratory beneath the surface. Appearing decidedly Ancient in technology, they find a genetic manipulation device and a young man sustained in an Ancient stasis unit. Witnessing Daniel tamper with the gene manipulator, Mitchell presses a button on the chamber, which thaws and releases the man. Almost immediately he begins to convulse.

The team returns him to Earth. Fortunately the gravity anomaly was simply an uncharted black hole and not a new Ori threat. Dr. Lam compares the man's physiology to that of the Ancients mentioned in their database, and determines that he is far along the evolutionary path. The man becomes conscious, and is informed that he is on Earth. Saying his name is Khalek, he claims that he was kidnapped by a "man" who manipulated his D.N.A. All he would like is to return home. Carter suspects that Nirrti was not the only Goa'uld who was interested in exploring the possibility of an advanced host, but Mitchell cannot help but comment that the lab looked far more Ancient than Goa'uld.

Meanwhile, Daniel and Teal'c return to Earth with a startling discovery. The lab belonged to Anubis, who created a Goa'uld-human hybrid ("Resurrection") and infused him with his own D.N.A. from material of a time before he was ascended. He then used the manipulation device to enhance him. For all intents and purposes Khalek is the son of Anubis.

The staff is assembled to determine what will ultimately be done with Khalek. After repeated options to return him to one of the known stasis chambers, Daniel dares to reveal the potential risk of leaving him alive at all. For now, Landry opts to take every available precaution.

Khalek awakes, restrained in an isolation ward. Daniel sits on the other side of a wall of bullet-proof glass. At first he acts bewildered and afraid, but when Jackson informs him that they know about Anubis's genetic tampering, Khalek drops the performance. He admits that he has the memories of his "father," including a confrontation with Daniel. He attempts to bait the archaeologist, and promises him that before their encounter is over one of them will experience the taste of a kill.

Agent Woolsey arrives on behalf of the international committee to suggest that Khalek be left intact for study, lest repercussions fall upon the entire Stargate Command. Back on P3X-584, Major Altman has made a discovery: an Ancient brain scanner that can monitor Khalek's mental advancement. It is sent back to the S.G.C. Daniel theorizes that it must reach 80 to 90 percent in order for Khalek to shed his physical body and willfully ascend. Once wired in and activated the scanner reveals that the hok'taur is at 68 percent, and he is evolving right before their eyes.

Khalek's heart rate accelerates. He regains consciousness and blows out a monitor, taking Major Altman to the ground. Mitchell tries to discharge a zat'ni'katel but Khalek uses his powers to break his bounds and snatch it, missing Cameron but neutralizing Carter and Dr. Lam. Mitchell fires two bullets in his chest. Soon, though, he wishes he emptied the clip, because Khalek is regenerating at an astonishing rate ... And the assault has hiked the ascendometer by 5 percent.

Khalek has been placed back in his chair. There are now 50 thousand volts running underneath him with a one-way Tok'ra forcefield barring the door. Dr. Lam believes that his abilities can be controlled with a dopamine inhibitor. A shunt has been inserted into the base of his skull and a massive dose will be injected if he gets creative again. But while Woolsey is distracted with Landry, Khalek melts the dopamine injection tube.

Landry informs Woolsey that Khalek will be transferred back to his stasis pod immediately, regardless of the international committee's opinion or pocketbook. Just as Mitchell and two airmen begin to move the prisoner the rest of SG-1 returns to Earth with more bad news. Khalek has reached a plateau in his mental development and he requires more treatments in the gene manipulator to get past the 80 percent wall. He wants to return to 584.

Khalek, now placed securely in his chair, uses his advanced hearing to learn that they are aware of his plans. He pulls the airmen through the Tok'ra shield, where they are electrocuted on the platform. He cuts primary power to the base and makes his way from Level 21 down to 28. Inside the Gate room he uses his powers to dial 584. "You should have killed me when you had the chance," he says, and departs.

But soon the Stargate is activated again. The iris not closed, he emerges. Mitchell fires his gun at him, but Khalek focuses his energy in Cameron's direction and blocks the bullets. His concentration focused, he did not anticipate Daniel entering through the other door; his bullet successfully penetrated. Mitchell and Jackson dump their clips in Khalek, who falls off the back of the ramp.

Carter did not have time to inform Landry that she had successfully installed the call-forwarding device in the Earth Stargate. In retrospect, she was glad she didn't.

The data recorded may prove useful to constructing a defense against the Priors. Woolsey ensures Daniel that he will make certain the families of the officers who died will be well taken care of. Both men admit that they wish they were wrong about Khalek and his danger.

9 - 10 THE FOURTH HORSEMAN (PART 1 OF 2)

SG-6 has returned from a long-term undercover mission to P2X-885. The world is the third planet to convert to Origin in a month.

On Dakara, Yat'Yir informs Gerak that his visitor has arrived. It is a Prior, originally the administrator of the Ver Egen village on Celestis. Gerak says he has read from the book of origin and has found it is everything his people need. In time, all Jaffa will see Origin as their true faith.

Colonel Carter briefs General Landry on a project she and Dr. Lee have been working on with the information taken from the encounter with Khalek, Anubis's engineered clone. They believe the knowledge they have collected may be enough to create a weapon that will disable a Prior of his abilities. Later Carter returns to the lab to continue her work, unaware that she is being watched by a powerful presence.

Gerak goes before the council to share his opinion on Origin and his wishes to legislate the beliefs into law. Under his plan, all Jaffa children will be raised in worship of the Ori. Teal'c has heard the news and meets with Bra'tac, who admits that many of the council are old. Because the Ancients have done nothing, many will see Origin as the only way of truly achieving enlightenment.

Colonel Barnes of SG-6 has come down with high fever, chest pain and respiratory distress. He has been infected by a Prior plague.

Lieutenant Fischer listens to Lieutenant General George Hammond's speech at an air base, and before he can get near to meet him officers in hazard suits cram him into the back of a van and return him to Stargate Command. Soon twelve officers are infected, and only half have come in contact with SG-6.

Fischer, now in isolation, explains that he attended morning Prostration with Airman Ryan. A Prior was there and walked among them, blessing them. Apparently he was aware of the presence of humans from Earth, and made Fischer the carrier of the plague. This is why he himself is not sick.

Fischer stopped at a restaurant and gas station where he used a self-service pump. Not knowing how bad the damage is, Colonel Mitchell is sent into the public to help quarantine. IWN and other news sources are soon having a field day, as symptoms begin to sprout in Utah, Kansas and New Mexico.

Teal'c uses a M.A.L.P. to inform Landry of the updates on Dakara. According to his sources the council is swaying toward legislating Origin.

Carter and Dr. Lee are getting closer to an answer, but sleep deprivation is weighing heavily on them. When Lee goes to get coffee, Sam is alone. She hears a voice behind her and turns. A young boy stands where no one was before. "Who are you," she asks.

"I had no choice but to take this form. It's me. Orlin."

Lam confirms that he is human, and says the reasons he fell in the form of a child his plausible. A child's human mind can contain far more information for a longer period. He became a boy to preserve as much of the Ancient knowledge as possible.

In a briefing, Orlin reveals the truth about the Ori. Their offer of ascension and enlightenment is entirely false, because if they were to ascend their believers, then they would have to share the very energy they consume from them. Every believer who has given up his or her will to the Ori transfers their life force to the ascended beings. Only large multitudes of followers generate a detectable energy transfer. Orlin informs them that the Milky Way galaxy succumbing to the Ori would tip the balance dangerously in their favor.

Gerak meets with the Prior, who instructs him to travel to Chulak, where Teal'c and other dissidents are convening. He is to offer Origin to them one last time, and if they refuse, Chulak will be annihilated. Despite the pleas from Yat'Yir, who last a cousin on Kallana, Gerak intends to carry out his mission.

Orlin intends to use what is left of the Ancient memory of his mind to construct a viable cure for the Ori plague using Earth computers. Unfortunately a toaster will not do the trick. His task will be far more complicated than constructing a miniaturized Stargate.

Carter and Orlin go to the commissary for lunch, where the fallen Ancient explains that despite his appearance, he still has his feelings for her (though human social conventions will prevent them from sharing those feelings). Soon Orlin begins to repeat his conversation topics, and Carter realizes he is not making jokes. Something appears to be wrong with his mind.

There are now five thousand confirmed cases of infection, with the bulk being in the Colorado Springs and Denver areas. Eight have died, five being S.G.C. personnel. The number of fatalities will rise quickly.

There is a speck of good news, however. Dr. Lee has completed the anti-Prior weapon. With intelligence from the Sodan, Mitchell and Dr. Jackson will lead a team to P9G-844 to capture the original Prior who spread the illness on 885. Orlin believes the root D.N.A. code will help him finish building the cure. Now with the anti-Prior weapon, they may just have a chance.

Gerak warns Teal'c and Bra'tac that he will not hesitate to destroy the countless innocents who continue to remain free and independent, but at the last moment he is unable to use his ship to destroy them. Back on Dakara, the Prior is enraged at him. Still sensing Gerak's doubt, the Ori bring his mind to the city of Celestis, where he is given an audience with the Doci.

Lam shows digital readouts of Orlin's brain. His attempt to hang on to as much Ancient knowledge as possible is beginning to result in permanent brain damage.

Jackson, Mitchell and several military officers have arrived on the Sodan homeworld. Several minutes into their patrol they are captured by the Sodan.

Landry reads a report from the President's desk. Since the morning 8,000 people have become infected in 13 states. The President has ordered the country entirely under quarantine.

Ka'lel insists that no decision about the ratification of Origin into law be made while members of the council are missing. But a Prior arrives to ensure that all Jaffa will indeed bow down to the Ori.

The Prior is Gerak.

9 - 11 THE FOURTH HORSEMAN (PART 2 OF 2)

Gerak, now a Prior, tells the Jaffa High Council of the Ori's benevolence. Teal'c reveals that the Ancient Orlin has descended and explained the true intentions of the Ori. But Gerak shuts him out by using his powers and placing copies of the Book of Origin before each member of the council. Fearing the body was swayed, Bra'tac suggests that the few who still resist run and hide. But Teal'c has something else in mind. Amass their forces and make a stand at Chulak.

The Prior plague continues to spread across the face of Earth. Cases have now been reported in Mexico and Canada. It is only a matter of time before it becomes a world-wide epidemic.

Jolan takes Colonel Mitchell to see Lord Haikon, and in a surprise move the Sodan leader reveals that Mitchell can save the sermon -- he has been turned from the ways of Origin. A mission (given to them by their local Prior) to destroy a group of nonbelievers turned sour when the Sodan discovered they were simple, innocent farmers. The honorable Haikon refused to slaughter them. Mitchell tells him that there may be a way to capture the Prior and stop him from inflicting his wrath on the Sodan.

Key information is continuing to seep through Orlin's mind. Sam presses him to teach her what she needs to know to complete the vaccine, as she can retain the information, but Orlin fears that the knowledge will be far too complicated for her. But eventually he realizes that he will likely be incapacitated before he can complete the work himself. He begins to develop notes for Sam to complete the formula on her own, if she must.

The news has worsened. China, Great Britain and Russia are no longer allowing any entrance or exit into their countries. Fearing that the cover story will soon be mute, key government officials convene at Stargate Command, but the group accomplishes little. Back on Dakara, the converted Cha'ra meets with Teal'c and Bra'tac and pledges to serve at their side.

The Prior that originally infected SG-6 returns to the Sodan homeworld to determine why they did not destroy the nonbelievers as the Ori had willed, and quickly he realizes that they are not alone. The Prior ejects Haikon and Jolan from his sight and flips Mitchell on his back, then uses his power to suspend him in the air. While his powers are focused Dr. Jackson switches through the frequencies of the inhibiting device they have designed to counteract his powers. A frequency is found, and Mitchell falls back to Earth. While the Prior is unconscious a sample of his blood is taken and returned to Earth for help in developing the antidote.

When he awakens, Daniel explains the truth of the Ori as Orlin told them, but the Prior is unwilling to listen. Despite being separated from his powers he is confident in the good will of his gods. In orbit of Chulak, Teal'c and Bra'tac's forces have made a stand against Gerak, who arrives with a dozen Ha'taks to confront them.

Orlin is continuing to make a mess of things at S.G.C., accidentally breaking several vials of Prior blood. He excuses himself from the project. As more reports of the virus pour in from new countries General Landry pays him a visit, hoping to get his help in something else.

Landry brings Orlin to the Prior on the Sodan homeworld, where the boy reveals his true name, Damaris. As soon as he had entered the Milky Way Orlin became aware of his entire identity, his wife and children that he had left behind. But the Prior is resistant, quoting scripture and parables to himself to block Orlin's words. In a weakened moment, he focuses his power to break the control of the inhibitor, pulling General Landry to him and choking him. Mitchell shoots and kills the Prior, but not before the Prior has revealed the true plans of the Ori. The ascended beings are coming to the Milky Way -- to destroy the Ancients.

Teal'c hopes to peacefully resolve the conflict with Gerak, leading him to Gerak's father's grave on the surface of Chulak. There, Gerak reveals that all he wished was to preserve the lives of all Jaffa and to ensure their salvation in ascension, but Teal'c swears to him that he will either live as a free Jaffa or die by Gerak's hand.

Landry escorts all of Earth's personnel back from the Sodan homeworld, but soon discovers he has now become infected with the Prior plague. But Teal'c has managed to convince Gerak to return to Earth with him. Gerak raises his staff and cleanses the entire base of the plague. But the moment he is done his body is cast aflame. In a moment, he is incinerated. The Ori have destroyed him for his disobedience, likely setting off a built-in kill switch in any Prior who turns from them.

The death toll worldwide was nearly three thousand, but thanks to Gerak cleansing the S.G.C., an antibody was isolated and -- combined with Orlin's formula -- dispersed to all infected populations. Thanks to Orlin it is unlikely the Prior will be able to attack Earth the same way again. But the damage has been done to Orlin, who recalls nothing of his life as an Ancient, or as a human. The Ancients themselves will probably take measures to defend themselves from the Ori, but not before the rest of the galaxy is put at risk.

While off duty, Sam pays a visit to a young, institutionalized boy who has no recollection of her.

9 - 12 COLLATERAL DAMAGE

Colonel Cameron Mitchell awakens in a confused state. Images of him bludgeoning a woman flash through his mind. He examines blood on his hands. Security personnel seize him and haul him into an adjoining room where the woman lies in a pool of blood. Mitchell is arrested for murder. Twenty-four hours earlier, Mitchell was the test subject as the Galarans, led by chief scientist Dr. Reya Varrick (the murdered woman), demonstrate their memory technology -- developed from a Goa'uld memory device they have been studying for one hundred years. Capable of inserting one person's memories into the mind of another, the machine gave Mitchell the memories of the Emissary as he congratulated Varrick on being named to lead the memory device project. It is an effective first demonstration of the technology, which the Galarans hope will help them to advance more quickly by easily passing on knowledge.

Back at Stargate Command, General Landry and SG-1 discuss the trip to Galar. As they debate the merits and dangers of the memory technology, Carter reveals that the Galarans want help with hyperdrive technology. A trade relationship seem immanent, as Landry says that the Joint Chiefs are salivating over the prospect of training jet pilots in mere days.

At a subsequent reception to honor the scientists, Mitchell chats up Reya while the rest of SG-1 debates the merits and dangers of the memory device with the Emissary. Dr. Marell, Reya's colleague, speaks privately with her. Reya then loudly confronts the Emissary about the military taking over her project. Observing the discussion, Mitchell approaches Reya. He ends up, at her invitation, agreeing to walk her home.

In her apartment, Mitchell recalls having been there before -- courtesy of his implanted memories. He ascertains that Reya was married, but lives alone. They have a drink, and are soon kissing.

Daylight dawns and Carter, Jackson, and Teal'c visit the Emissary's office for help in locating Mitchell. The Emissary reveals that Mitchell has been arrested for Dr. Varrick's murder, citing various items of evidence ... and Mitchell's own confession.

Visiting Mitchell in his cell, Jackson, Carter, and Teal'c quickly realize that Mitchell's mind has been tampered with; the murderer has framed the Colonel and used their technology to implant the memory in his mind. The Emissary offers to release Mitchell and send him back to Earth, in order to preserve the negotiations. Despite his lack of knowledge about the Galaran judicial system, Mitchell refuses to leave without clearing his name. He also wants to learn the truth and have the horrific memory of the murder removed from his mind, but he refuses a memory replacement.

While Mitchell remains on Galar, the rest of the team briefs Landry. They quickly return with Carter agreeing to remain with Mitchell while the project scientists attempt to ascertain if his murder memories are false. Meanwhile, Jackson and Teal'c will conduct their own investigation.

Back in the memory project lab, Carter arranges for a sample of Mitchell's blood that was taken when he was arrested to be sent to the S.G.C. for corroborative tests. She grills the scientists, Drs. Marell and Amuro, about who they think killed Reya. They suspect the planet's military leaders, since Varrick was going to do everything she could to prevent the military take-over of their work.

Colonel Mitchell is hooked up to the machine as they search his memory for key moments in his early life. He recalls childhood memories of the first time he saw his father, a test pilot, after crash injuries forced the amputation of the man's legs at mid-thigh. Mitchell also relives a subsequent memory during which his father resolves to walk again.

Comparing these memories with the murder memories three times, no evidence of an implant can be detected -- and the scientists start to suspect that Mitchell may have committed the murder after all. Dr. Marell, who it turns out was married to, but separated from, Reya, refuses to continue. When the blood sample tested by Stargate Command reveals that Mitchell was stunned before the blood was drawn, the scientists are persuaded to continue.

In order to continue, Mitchell must summon a memory with emotional resonance akin to that of the murder. He recalls the horrible day he was ordered to bomb a truck convoy, only to learn later that it was a convoy of innocent refugees. Comparison establishes, finally, that the murder memories are false. Determined to find out who did kill Reya, Mitchell relives the murder a number of times again. Eventually, he finds the murderer's face in a mirror and realizes that one of the scientists, Dr. Marell, killed his ex-wife.

Confronted, Marell is bewildered and puzzled. Dr. Amuro establishes that Marell killed Reya and gave the memory to Mitchell, then replaced the memory in his own mind -- thereby removing his own link to the crime, and freeing himself from the guilt of murdering the woman he once loved.

In a final meeting, SG-1 learns that the memory technology has been used to remove any knowledge of SG-1 and the murder from Dr. Marell's mind, in order that he may continue his work with the device.

Home on Earth, Mitchell is preparing to go off duty when Landry comes to the locker room to check on him. Mitchell reveals that he almost resigned because of the bombing, but it was his father's courage that helped him move forward. Looking at a photo of his father, Mitchell flashes back to that moment -- one memory he can happily hold on to.

9 - 13 RIPPLE EFFECT

An unscheduled offworld activation has summoned General Landry and Dr. Lam to the control room. As the Stargate prepares to open, there is a brief, blinding flash of light and an odd noise. SG-1, dressed in their black uniforms, comes through the gate. Landry notes that they are early.

A briefing follows, during which a number of discrepancies come to light. Before they can be resolved, there is an offworld activation. SG-1 (in green uniforms) arrives right on schedule. Landry orders Lam to investigate. They conclude that both teams are really SG-1, but that the facts indicate that the green SG-1 is ours. (The black team, for example, believes that the Tok'ra Selmak is still alive.) Back in the conference room, Landry and the green team discuss the situation.

In need of more information, a series of interviews takes place. Black team Jackson is interviewed by green team Mitchell; Landry speaks with the black team Mitchell; green team Jackson takes notes in his discussion with the black team Teal'c. Meanwhile, green team Carter and black team Carter talk science as they try to sort out what caused this problem.

As the green team Carter briefs Landry and the rest of the green team SG-1 -- she suggests the beachhead black hole the Ori tried to create ("Beachhead") is involved in bringing another SG-1 here from a parallel universe -- there is another unscheduled offworld activation. Assembled in the control room, the green team and Landry watch as another SG-1 team, taking fire and dressed in blue tiger camo, rush through the gate. Landry orders all gate travel restricted.

While Dr. Lee discusses the situation with the green team Carter, the black team Carter joins them. As they work, more SG-1 teams arrive. Eventually, Landry takes the green team Jackson and Teal'c to a room where Dr. Janet Fraiser awaits them. They are stunned, as our universe's Fraiser was killed two years ago ("Heroes, Part 2"). She reveals that her Earth is suffering from the Ori plague. Also on this team is Martouf, who Landry takes to see the green team Carter, now working on the problem with at least 16 other Carters. As green team Carter sits talking to Martouf -- who she was forced to kill several years ago ("Divide and Conquer"), black team Carter approaches and delineates the problem and a potential solution.

The green SG-1 and Landry confer with Kvasir, who comes in Thor's place, about a risky plan that involves using Prometheus to close the breach in space that has diverted so many SG-1 teams. Unfortunately, all of the teams will then be stranded permanently.

Fraiser visits Landry to ask for more time to find a better solution. Sympathetic, Landry feels, however, that he must act first and foremost to protect his own reality.

Staffed only by the green and black SG-1s, the Prometheus heads off. But the black team soon launches a plot to take command of the ship by breaking into the armory. Armed with zats, they capture the green team Mitchell and take him to the bridge just as the Prometheus is in position to launch its Asgard-primed weapon to close the breach.

The green team is taken to a brig while the black team re-routes the Prometheus to Atlantis in the Pegasus Galaxy. Their intent is to steal the Atlantean Z.P.M. and drop off the green team on a habitable planet. As soon as Teal'c destroys the camera in the cell, the green team hatches a counterplot.

Green team Mitchell asks to speak with the black team Mitchell. The black team feels that the Atlantis Z.P.M. is only used to power the Stargate for one-way travel to the Pegasus Galaxy. They need the Z.P.M. to power the Ancients' Antarctic weapon, suggesting they do not fully understand the situation on Atlantis and the need for the Z.P.M. to cloak the city from the Wraith. Green team Mitchell realizes that the black team created the entire situation to come to our universe deliberately -- and that they already have a way home.

Once the green team Mitchell is back in the cell with the green team, Carter hotwires the door and she and Jackson set off for the engine room, while Mitchell and Teal'c head for an armory. As they try to open the armory door, the black team Jackson and black team Teal'c show up and prepare to take green team Teal'c captive once more. It's a trap: the green team Mitchell is really the black team Mitchell.

But before they can touch Teal'c, green team Carter and green team Jackson arrive and zat black team Jackson and Teal'c. Our SG-1 anticipated the trap from their other selves, and set one of their own. The black team is taken to a holding cell where the door cannot be hotwired; black team Mitchell is dressed only in T-shirt, underwear and boots. Green team Mitchell, similarly clad, locks the door on them.

Green team Carter works out a plan for returning the many SG-1s to their respective universes, and upon the return of the Prometheus to Earth orbit she requests the use of an Asgard weapon. They fire it into the open Stargate, recreating the conditions the black team used to cause the breach.

Starting with the black team, the teams are sent back to their realities. On the ramp, the black team Mitchell stops and enigmatically tells the green team Mitchell that, when the time comes, "Cut the green one."

Finally, the last team assembles. After Carter, Jackson, and Teal'c share an emotional goodbye with Martouf and Janet, Landry provides them with the cure to the Ori plaque and the team heads home to save its Earth.

Teal'c and Bra'tac sit at the Jaffa High Council table on Dakara, attempting to push through a referendum calling for the free Jaffa to vote on democratic representation rather than maintain governance by council, where representatives are granted seats based on military might. Maz'rai, an elder friend of Bra'tac's, supports their position.

When Ka'lel surprisingly voices opposition to the motion, the council is thrown into turmoil. Maz'rai offers to speak with Ka'lel, who, when she is alone with him, zats him. At the follow-up session Maz'rai mysteriously tables the referendum, stunning Teal'c and Bra'tac. All of their political allies are falling away. Their haste in bringing about this vote was based on the fear that Gerak's remaining supporters might gain control of the council and continue Gerak's plan to force the Jaffa to submit to the worship of the Ori.

Puzzled and angry, Teal'c tells Bra'tac he will go to Chulak to confer with their allies, and also speak with U'kin, another member of the council.

Colonel Mitchell, on personal leave, has pulled a number of strings to get an old friend, Major Bryce Ferguson, admitted to the USAF Academy hospital for follow-up testing. Ferguson, diagnosed with a fatal brain aneurysm caused by shrapnel, was wounded four years prior, saving Mitchell's life. Because of Ferguson's actions, Mitchell made it into the top-secret F-302 program and, eventually, into his current position with SG-1.

As they play video games and talk, Ferguson presses for details of the job that Mitchell cannot share. Upfront about his impending death, Ferguson tells Mitchell he must let go of his guilt over the way events unfolded. He is dying, and Cam has to forgive himself for surviving.

Teal'c fails to return to Dakara, prompting Bra'tac to seek help from General Landry and SG-1. Jackson goes with Bra'tac on the search for Teal'c. They soon discover that someone is brainwashing influential Jaffa, and they have kidnapped Teal'c. Held prisoner on P2M-903 aboard a Goa'uld Ha'tak as the young Jaffa warrior Til'Vak attempts to brainwash him, Teal'c's superior resistance forces Baal to reveal himself. Afraid of Ori power, Baal wants to unite the Jaffa into an army under his leadership, with which he will combat their new common foe.

Meanwhile, Bra'tac and Jackson confront Maz'rai. Later, Maz'rai removes his symbiote as he attempts the dangerous Rite of M'al Sharran. Shamed by his failure to prevent the brainwashing, Maz'rai dies in the attempt to free himself from Goa'uld control -- but not without first leading them to Ka'lel.

On Earth, Ferguson reveals what he has pieced together -- namely, that Mitchell was shot down in Antarctica in a fight with aliens ("Avalon, Part 1"). Knowing Mitchell must have more important things to attend to, he tries to push him away, telling him to get back to work. Still determined to help, Mitchell reacts with anger and impatience when Dr. Kelly informs him that there is nothing anyone can do for Ferguson.

Mitchell updates Landry and asks him for a favor, and learns of an impending operation led by Carter and Jackson to free Teal'c. Cameron is torn between his loyalty to one friend and his desire to help rescue another.

As Baal watches Teal'c's condition deteriorate, he holds out the promise of tretonin should Teal'c cooperate. He leaves the drug just out of reach. Fighting to survive, Teal'c finally crawls to the tretonin and injects himself; the brainwashing process resumes.

Before the mission to rescue Teal'c begins, Carter takes a slimmed down, revamped version of the Galaran mind device to Mitchell at the hospital. Wheeling the device into Ferguson's room, Mitchell connects his friend to the machine. Mitchell's own memories of events he's experienced since becoming involved with the S.G.C. unfold in Ferguson's mind. Having granted the dying man's wish, Mitchell heads back to the S.G.C. He enters the gate room as Carter concludes her briefing of the enhanced team that will try to free Teal'c. Jackson points out that Teal'c may be brainwashed, and may not go willingly.

In the opening salvo Bra'tac, in an Al'kesh ship, attacks the Jaffa guarding the gate. Carter's team heads through the gate and begins fighting their way toward the mothership. Mitchell, playing an army of one, fights his way to the high ground where he takes out the Jaffa cannon position. Bra'tac's ship is shot down. Carter orders Mitchell to wait for backup, but he proceeds in a dangerous run toward the transport rings as the ship's engines start.

Baal, concerned that Teal'c isn't really brainwashed, has arranged a test. Bra'tac is hauled in, and Teal'c is ordered to kill him.

Mitchell has trouble activating the rings to gain access to the ship, and is quickly cornered by two Jaffa. Carter and Jackson zat them, and Sam activates the rings to send Mitchell to the ship alone. He searches for Teal'c, arriving just as Teal'c is poised to kill Bra'tac. Zating several Jaffa, Cam provides the distraction Teal'c needs to free Bra'tac and take out Baal.

Back on Dakara, Carter and Jackson wait for the High Council to finally vote on the democracy motion. Teal'c and Bra'tac emerge with the news that in two months time, the Jaffa will hold their first election.

Later, Teal'c seeks out Mitchell in the S.G.C. locker room. Teal'c shares the good news and thanks Mitchell for saving him and putting the Jaffa on this path. Mitchell rebuts Teal'c's gesture by suggesting it's all just part of the job. He then asks Teal'c his secret to resisting brainwashing. Teal'c points out what Cam himself is trying to learn: "To resist the influence of others, knowledge of oneself is most important."

9 - 15 STRONGHOLD

In the S.G.C. control room, Dr. Jackson, Colonel Mitchell, and Chief Harriman listen to a message from Jarrod Kane, an ally from the planet Tegalus ("Icon"). He has gained unauthorized access to his planet's Stargate. Alone and unarmed, he seeks permission to come to Earth.

Kane reveals that Earth has heard nothing from his government for the last five months because of the Ori. As the Rand Protectorate struggled to rebuild last year's coup d'etat and missile attack from rival nation Caledonia, a Prior came to them with the promise of a satellite weapon that would give them power over their enemy. This weapon is now operational and 24 hours ago, it vaporized a Caledonian outpost. The Caledonians have been given five days to submit to Rand and embrace the Ori ... or be exterminated.

Mitchell, Jackson, Carter, and Teal'c discuss the situation with Kane, who brought early schematics of the satellite for them to examine. He hopes Earth will use its more advanced technology to destroy the Ori weapon before something horrible happens. Jackson suggests they have a moral imperative to find a solution, since it was SG-1's travel through the Stargate that originally escalated the Rand-Caledonian war.

With General Landry in Washington, D.C., the team decides to attempt to explain the dangers of the Ori to the Rand Protectorate -- and use the Prometheus to destroy the satellite, not only to save Kane's people, but to prevent the spread of Ori technology in the galaxy. Carter discerns from the design schematics that the satellite has no defensive capability, at least not in this early draft of the plans.

Meanwhile, Kane tells Jackson of the Ori plague that swept their world five months ago. The Rand people were forced to choose between their faith and their survival, and many -- including his wife Leda, who cared for Daniel when he was trapped there -- died because of their refusal to embrace the Ori.

The Rand Protectorate appears to accept Jackson's offer for parlay, but upon their arrival, Kane and Jackson are immediately jailed. President Nadal calls Senator Kane a Caledonia spy and Jackson an abettor, so both will stand trial.

By the time the Prometheus exits hyperspace within striking distance of the Ori satellite, they have heard nothing from Daniel. An attempt to retrieve him via a locator beacon returns only the beacon. President Nadal orders the satellite powered up. Jackson and Kane are brought to the Rand command bunker. Aware of this shift in the satellite's status, Prometheus fires -- only to find it shielded. The satellite's energy beam strikes Prometheus and causes considerable damage, cutting right through the ship's advanced, Asgard-designed shields.

The Prometheus's one advantage is that the satellite's energy systems require several minutes to recharge the weapon before it can fire again, giving them time to make another move. Colonel Lionel Pendergast, commander of Prometheus, orders the F-302 fighters, led by Mitchell and Teal'c, into space. As the satellite continues to target Prometheus, the 302s launch missiles, which are ineffective against the device's energy shield. The weapon fires again, and the Earth ship is devastated.

His ship heavily damaged, with no hyperspace capability and even the sublight engines offline, Pendergast radios the planet's surface and sues for terms of surrender, initially as a way to allow Carter time to restore the sublight engines. When she cannot restore power within the tight time frame, he orders the evacuation of the Prometheus, setting a rendezvous point in Caledonian territory. Nadal ignores the entreaties and orders the Prometheus destroyed. As the crew rushes to escape transport sites the satellite fires a third and final time, cutting the ship in two and destroying it. Pendergast dies manning the evacuation.

Back in their cells, Kane and Jackson are visited by Commander Goran Pernaux, an acquaintance of Jarrod's but also Nadal's second in command. Jackson tries to explain that the Ori are not gods, but Pernaux himself saw their power with the satellite. Jackson suggests Earth could help Rand build an iris system for their Stargate, or they could bury it, which would prevent further Ori interference. Kane points out that killing the Caledonians in the name of the Ori is not self-defense, but murder.

In the Caledonian capital, Mitchell and Teal'c are reunited with Carter and learn of Pendergast's death. There they meet Caledonian Minister Chaska, who is facing the impending deadline for President Nadal's ultimatum. After study of more recent satellite schematics, Carter learns that its shields are only active when a threat is detected. She devises a plan to use a Caledonian missile and the inertial dampeners of a 302 to emit an electromagnetic pulse over the Rand Protectorate command bunker, which will knock out satellite control long enough for Mitchell and Teal'c in a 302 to destroy the satellite.

President Nadal calls Minister Chaska when they detect the missile launch. She stalls for time by saying it was an accidental firing. He asks her to surrender now, and she refuses.

The EM pulse temporarily wipes out power in the Rand command bunker. Jackson and Kane are brought in to explain, but Jackson tells them he has a way out of this moment. Meanwhile, Mitchell and Teal'c are within striking distance of the satellite. Unexpectedly vulnerable to the Earthers, Nadal agrees to listen to Jackson's suggestion.

Jackson proposes giving the Stargate in Rand territory to the Caledonians. Those who do not wish to embrace the Ori can move to another planet, leaving the Ori no reason to target the Rand Protectorate. When the President and Minister agree, Jackson and Carter order Mitchell and Teal'c not to destroy the satellite. Mitchell reluctantly veers off. But once the satellite is safe, the President orders it be fired at the Caledonian capital. He says that they're Caledonians and they deserve to die for that reason alone.

Unwilling to allow his leader to commit genocide, Pernaux shoots Nadal and he, in turn, is shot by Nadal's guards. Kane manages to defuse the moment after the President dies, and the satellite is shut down. Pernaux declares that the deal remains in effect.

Back in Daniel's office at Stargate Command, Mitchell comes in with beer. He has taken Landry's letter of condolences to Pendergast's family. When Mitchell congratulates Jackson on his skillful solution to the Rand-Caledonian crisis, Daniel reveals that both sides reneged on their agreement when the Caledonian people refused to leave their world. The Stargate has apparently been buried in the resulting rubble of a civilization torn apart.

9 - 16 OFF THE GRID

Mitchell, Carter, Jackson, and Teal'c are under fire as they run toward the Stargate, their plan on another planet having gone awry. As Jackson dials home, the Stargate suddenly disappears in an Asgard-like transporter beam. The D.H.D. is likewise dematerialized, stranding SG-1 at the mercy of their enemy. Eight hours earlier, General Hank Landry and SG-1 are briefed regarding the appearance of a highly addictive crop, kassa, that resembles an ear of corn. Colonel Reynolds reports that Lt. Mooney had to be restrained and forcibly returned to Earth when he sampled this food. Teal'c reveals that there have been problems with erratic behavior on several Jaffa worlds, though no one suspected tampering with the food supply. Jackson suggests the Ori could be involved, though this not their usual approach.

With orders to keep a low profile, SG-1 sets off to P6G-452 to investigate. After a lively discussion in a cornfield -- during which Mitchell suggests Jackson and Teal'c don't look like drug dealers and Mitchell refers to Carter as "Mary Poppins" -- Mitchell introduces himself to a local peasant as "Mr. Shaft." He asks to be taken to the man's boss, kassa-seller Worrel, a local thug connected to the Lucian Alliance.

Mitchell says that he is looking to buy a significant quantity of the kassa and would like to meet Worrel's superior. Suspicious, Worrel takes Mitchell prisoner. With guns aimed at Mitchell and their own position about to be compromised, Carter, Jackson, and Teal'c move into action, which brings them back to running through the woods in a hail of bullets, seeking escape through the Stargate. When it is whisked away by the transporter beam, Worrel's men capture the team.

On Earth, at the S.G.C., Chief Harriman tells Landry that Mitchell has missed the check-in time ... and now the gate cannot connect to P6G-452. Reynolds reports that Dr. Lee has found the kassa to be a highly addictive psycho-stimulant, one that had to be deliberately engineered. Landry contacts the Odyssey, Earth's newest interstellar ship, under the command of Colonel Paul Emerson. With 90 percent of the systems fully operational, Emerson accepts extraction of the overdue SG-1 as their first mission. SG-1 has the new locator chip implants, which will allow the Odyssey to beam them directly aboard.

Bound to a bench, Mitchell, Carter, Jackson, and Teal'c are beaten and interrogated by Worrel, who thinks they stole his Stargate. He doesn't seem to grasp the improbability of SG-1 stealing the gate before they can escape through it.

Harriman informs Landry of a new Tok'ra dispatch detailing the theft of Stargates from at least four other planets. Suspecting the failure of SG-1 to report could be due to gate theft, Landry orders the intel on the involvement of a mothership with Asgard beaming technology forwarded to the Odyssey. Landry decides to confer with Nerus, a captured Goa'uld scientist ("Beachhead") being held in Area 51.

Having determined that his captives are the famous SG-1, Worrell orders them shot. As guns are aimed, SG-1 is beamed to the bridge of the Odyssey. After introductions, Emerson briefs the team on the theft of the Stargates.

Over a bountiful first few courses, Nerus confirms Landry's hunch that Baal is stealing Stargates. By the time dessert arrives, Nerus suggests Baal wants to rebuild, using the gates on non-gate worlds to set up his own empire and regain power. When the question comes up of where Baal is now, Nerus -- now quite full -- will exchange that information only for his freedom.

On board a commandeered Goa'uld mothership now belonging to the Lucian Alliance, an Alliance leader named Netan castigates Worrel for his stupidity regarding SG-1 and the potential loss of two-thirds of their kassa crop, hinting at the Alliance's deep involvement in the addictive food.

Apparently accepting his terms, Landry allows Nerus to leave -- with a going-away present of two cases filled with of cupcakes for the gluttonous villain. Nerus immediately locates Baal and his mothership, where he begs to be reinstated as Baal's resident genius servant. Unbeknownst to Nerus, a locator chip has been hidden along with his desert. The technological devices Nerus had with him have also been implanted with a computer virus, in the hopes of disabling the systems on board Baal's ship as soon as Nerus interfaces one.

The hidden beacon gives Stargate Command Baal's location, which they forward to the Odyssey. There SG-1 detail their plans to beam onto Baal's ship when the virus disables the shields, place locator beacons on the stolen Stargates in the cargo hold, and beam themselves and the gates back using the Odyssey's own Asgard transporter beam.

Odyssey comes out of hyperspace to find Baal's ship disabled -- right according to plan. As SG-1 beams in, Baal goes to Nerus's room and confronts him. Nerus plays down the problem as a little computer virus, easily eliminated. Meanwhile, led by two-handed gunfire from Teal'c, Carter, Jackson, and Mitchell locate the Stargates -- and find far more of them than intel had suggested.

As they tag the gates, three ships of the Lucian Alliance arrive, demanding the return of their own missing gates. The Odyssey stands by, intent on their mission, a mission endangered when Baal's shields come back online. Trapped, Mitchell asks if Carter can find another way off Baal's ship.

The Lucian Alliance attacks, costing Baal his shields, which allow the extraction of the gates by Odyssey.

They cannot locate SG-1, however, by the time Baal's ship is destroyed. Though her shields have held thus far, Odyssey jumps to hyperspace rather than face the Alliance fleet.

SG-1 comes through the gate on Earth, Carter having rigged a D.H.D. and gate to send them home before Baal's ship was destroyed. Pleased with their teamwork and success, Mitchell happily declares theirs the best jobs in the world and the day a good one.

9 - 17 THE SCOURGE

Discussing the fact that Earth has beaten back the Ori plague by delivering the cure to other worlds, Mitchell, Carter, Jackson, and Teal'c walk through the corridor into the gate room where they arm and start up the Stargate ramp. But General Landry scrubs their mission at the last moment, telling them that the Pentagon has assigned SG-1 the task of accompanying representatives from member nations of the International Oversight Advisory (I.O.A.) -- Shen Xiaoyi, Mr. LaPierre, Mr. Chapman, and Richard Woolsey -- to the Gamma Site. Though the support of the I.O.A. has become vital to the Stargate program, it's a babysitting job.

As they begin their tour, Carter explains that this planet was chosen for the base in part because of its radioactive ionosphere, which protects them from being detected from space. Pearson, the base commander, introduces them to Dr. Myers, head entomologist, studying an asexual, fast reproducing, voracious insect called R75. The bugs have devastated crops on several worlds visited by Ori Priors, and may or may not be the next salvo in the Ori arsenal. The bugs avoid predators and find prey via echolocation.

Myers has discovered that the bugs live longer when they are deprived of food. Later, he is surprised when they ignore a leaf he offers -- so he gives them a piece of meatloaf, which they devour. They have become carnivorous.

Also eating meatloaf are the I.O.A. delegates and SG-1. Jackson talks to Shen Xiaoyi, who notes that since China signed the Gate Alliance Treaty three years ago ("Disclosure"), they have received none of the technological benefits the U.S. military has had. Daniel is quick to acknowledge that the complaint is legitimate, and that with the U.S. military in charge she shouldn't expect things to change. But Shen suggests that the U.S. may soon have no choice.

Back in the bug lab, Myers and another scientist return to find that the bugs have reproduced enough to fill their containment unit. As the two watch, the bugs burst forth and swarm toward them. Myers quickly seals the door and activates the emergency biohazard disposal protocol. But one bug has escaped and bites Myers, who quickly kills it.

As the delegates prepare to leave, Myers collapses. Pearson locks down the base until they understand the source of Myers's illness. He is readied for transport back to Earth via the Stargate, while the increasingly agitated delegates are forced wait. But the soldiers drop his containment tube when bugs erupt from his mouth. The creatures swarm across the floor and the gate room is evacuated.

Carter, Teal'c, and Jackson decide the bugs are indeed Ori related, especially since they adapt to a new food type once they have devoured an initial source. Pearson pronounces the gate room lost, and orders the I.O.A. group taken to the surface. Woolsey insists SG-1s escort them.

On the surface, they head for an unmanned research station 10 miles away. Suddenly, Teal'c hears what Carter identifies as the bugs' echolocating. They are travelling underground, and the team is their prey. As the bugs consume one soldier, everyone runs. The other soldier guides them to a cave. Carter indicates that gunfire directed toward the ground will create a concussive sound that should drive the bugs back.

On Earth, Chief Harriman tells Landry that they can only detect motion sensor telemetry when attempting to communicate with the Gamma Site, which Dr. Lee says emanates from R75. He tells Landry that the bugs were being studied for use against the Lucian Alliance's kassa crops. Fearing all human life has been lost, Landry orders Lee to create a neurotoxin to be delivered by the Odyssey, per the extreme measures protocol CR-91. The bugs must be contained no matter the cost.

In the cave, Jackson and Shen Xiaoyi again discuss the Chinese government's position on the Stargate program. She confesses that her report will ultimately be meaningless, hinting that her leaders have already made up their minds.

Mitchell unsuccessfully attempts to communicate with the Gamma base. Walker, guarding the cave entrance, feels a bug crawling under his skin. When Carter says they cannot outrun the bugs on foot, Teal'c suggests F-302s. But Jackson soon announces that Walker is missing. Daniel, Cameron, and Teal'c find Walker some distance away, dead and full of bugs. Jackson returns to the cave, while Mitchell and Teal'c go for the 302s. But before they make it back to the base, they witness its destruction from the self-destruct mechanism.

Carter informs the delegates that the Odyssey may indeed be coming -- but CR-91, which presumes the planet is devoid of human life, will be in effect. Jackson suggests they'll be located because of their new transmitter implants, but Carter reminds him of the ionosphere interference. Given their location within the cave and the huge number of bugs around them, their life signs will be undetectable.

Jackson suggests relocating to the research station, five miles away, as it has a transmitter which Carter says she can modify to reach the Odyssey as soon as they enter orbit. They near the facility when LaPierre, obstreperous throughout, refuses to continue. Mitchell hands him a pistol so he can cover them. The bugs he will hear, says Mitchell, but not the silent, decapitating "tree ferrets." Carter smiles to herself as LaPierre reconsiders and hurries to join the others.

When they reach the station, Teal'c and Mitchell hold off the pursuing bugs with gunfire. As Carter boosts the transmitters power to penetrate the ionosphere, vibrations from the communications array attract the bugs. Mitchell, Jackson, and Teal'c rig an early warning perimeter of explosives and defend the station with the last of their ammo. As the team fires the last of their ammo at the ground to keep the carnivorous bugs at bay, Odyssey beams them all up as the bugs swarm over the station.

Back on Earth, Mr. Woolsey briefs Landry and SG-1 ... and reveals them that despite the formal reprimand they will probably receive over the incident, the I.O.A. is quite impressed with them. Landry informs the team that two more planets have been hit with the Prior bugs, and a way to fight them is being researched.

When Landry departs, Jackson asks if everyone is up for movie night. Mitchell he has the perfect movie picked out: "Starship Troopers."

9 - 18 ARTHUR'S MANTLE

Lt. Colonel Samantha Carter is studying an Ancient device recovered from the Glastonbury cave ("Avalon, Part 2"). Cameron Mitchell suggests she needs a break and hashbrowns as its breakfast time. He also points out that as she and Dr. Bill Lee have been examining the device, with no breakthroughs, for six months, it's time to send it on to Area 51 and move on.

Carter suddenly finds a fluctuating EM output, indicating that the device is interactive. As she attempts to stabilize it, a flash of white light dissolves her and Mitchell. They can now see the device projecting a display -- in Ancient.

Dr. Lee enters the lab and they attempt to show him the discovery. When he walks through Carter, she realizes they are out of phase, sent by the device into a parallel dimension within our universe. They need to find Daniel, who experienced a similar problem several years ago ("Crystal Skull"). His grandfather could see him because the older man had also visited the alternate dimension, indicating that Daniel may be the only one on the base who can see and hear them.

General Landry approaches Teal'c (who is fresh from a workout) looking for Mitchell and the rest of SG-1. SG-12 has returned from P8T-474, where the natives indicated the doomsday plan that the Ori Priors have been preaching about may be only days from implementation.

Carter and Mitchell find Daniel, who promptly walks through Mitchell indicating that they are not in the dimension he shifted to. He can't see or hear them at all.

An unauthorized offworld activation draws Landry and SG-1 to the gate control room. A garbled radio message, eventually cleaned up and understood to be a request from the Sodan for immediate assistance, is received. As Mitchell hasn't been located, Landry orders Teal'c to take SG-12 and investigate.

Jackson informs Landry that both Carter and Mitchell are apparently missing. A review of security camera tapes reveals that somehow Carter and Mitchell vanished from the lab, but the cameras in the corridor outside prove that they didn't leave through the door.

Teal'c and SG-12 find the Sodan village burning and bodies lying everywhere. Only their leader, Haikon, is barely alive. His symbiote dead, they administer tretonin to try and save his life. Haikon tells Teal'c that the murderer is Volnek, one of his own people. Elsewhere, Volnek attacks members of SG-12. Teal'c soon discovers that one of the control crystals has been removed from the "Eye of the Gods," making it impossible to return to the Stargate via the Ancient-designed transportation system. They are trapped on the planet, far away from the gate and any help.

Dr. Lee suggests the missing Colonels have been miniaturized. When they aren't found, he mentions traces of lepton radiation to Jackson. He recognizes it from his own experience with the crystal skull. Delving into various texts, Jackson concludes that Merlin built the device in question for use in another dimension. The lepton radiation means Carter and Mitchell are probably trapped in another dimension and invisible to anyone in the S.G.C. The invisible Mitchell cheers on Jackson for figuring it out.

Teal'c decides to hunt down Volnek while awaiting rescue. He takes one of the Sodan personal cloaking devices and sets off into the forest. As they missed their check in time, Landry orders Colonel Reynolds to prep an extraction team (SG-3 and SG-22).

Jackson surmises that the Ancient device Carter has been studying is actually a keyboard, its display visible only in the other dimension. Mitchell can interact with the device, and he pushes a button to get their attention, thereby establishing rudimentary communication. Only Sam and Cameron can see the display, written in Ancient, but only Daniel has the knowledge to translate it. Since no one knows what random activation of keys will do, Jackson decides they must describe the display one letter at a time using only "Yes" and "No."

Mitchell tells Carter he is going to accompany the extraction team, even though he is out of phase. He feels he may still be able to help. She protests, but he points out that Jackson was able to go off-world when he was out of phase. Mitchell is going to observe, and is effectively invincible, and he promises to come back when the team checks in.

Teal'c, using the Sodan cloak, locates the invisible Volnek, who attacks him. Volnek is growling and zombified in appearance, obviously transformed from a man into some hyper-violent beast. Teal'c riddles him with bullets from his P-90, but it only temporarily stops Volnek.

Wounded, Teal'c retreats to the Sodan village. Haikon, now somewhat recovered, reveals that Volnek encountered a Prior while on another planet, who told him that the Sodan must be punished for their unforgivable treason against the Ori ("The Fourth Horseman, Part 2"). He exposed Volnek to a blast from his staff. A few days later, Volnek fell ill and soon became irrational and violent. He escaped slaughtered everyone -- including his own brother, Jolan.

Reynolds, the extraction team, and out of phase Mitchell arrive on the Sodan homeworld. Teal'c advises that the only sure way to kill Volnek will be to destroy his body. They decide to use a claymore blast with Teal'c as bait.

Dr. Lee continues to work on the Ancient device, and inadvertently sends Jackson out of phase. But Daniel can now read the display in the parallel dimension. He discovers that Merlin created this device to hide the weapon he was working on -- a device to kill ascended beings. Merlin felt the Ori were a threat, so he completed the weapon and moved it off-world. The Stargate address to the planet is recorded on the display.

Lee accidentally drains most of the power from the device. But Jackson determines the key combination that will return them to their own dimension.

Pursuing Volnek, Teal'c activates the Sodan cloaking device and can suddenly see and hear the out of phase Colonel Mitchell. Because he can't be hurt, they decide that Mitchell will be the one to lure Volnek into the claymore trap. Volnek pursues his old enemy relentlessly, and is surprised when he shoots Mitchell dead-on with no effect.

But when Jackson keys the device on Earth, Mitchell is also affected. He is no longer out of phase, and can no longer see or hear Volnek -- who attacks him. Teal'c steps in and saves Mitchell as Volnek rushes into the claymore trip wire, where he is blown up.

Mitchell produces the transporter system's missing control crystal as he and Teal'c head back to the village and, hopefully, home in time for dinner.

9 - 19 CRUSADE

A very pregnant Vala Mal Doran, wearing green fatigues, strides purposefully down the corridor of the S.G.C. People greet her and she asks where Colonel Mitchell is. Informed that he's in the men's locker room, she goes in, admiring the many men in various states of undress. She barks at one and whistles at Mitchell. Wearing only a towel around his waist, he is shaving. Clearing the mirror, Mitchell sees Daniel Jackson, not Vala, staring at him with a seductive smile.

When Carter sees Jackson, exhibiting Vala mannerisms, she is pleased. They have been studying the effects of the Alteran communication stones and base terminal (Ancient long-range communication device) Mitchell and Teal'c disintegrated in the Stargate's kawoosh -- the device that Daniel and Vala used to inhabit the bodies of two people in the Ori's distant home galaxy ("Avalon, Part 2," "Origin"). Now Vala is able to use Daniel's body to communicate from the Ori galaxy, where she has been living these past several months. She is, in effect, finally in his pants.

Mitchell, Carter, Teal'c, and General Landry listen as Vala, seated at a table where she is video taped, tells her story from the moment her transporter matter stream was drawn into the black hole ("Beachhead"). Landry notes that he and Daniel are to meet with the Russian and Chinese I.O.A. (International Oversight Advisory) representatives in just a few minutes.

Vala reveals that she woke up in a bed in the village of Ver Isca, a place like Ver Eger, where Harrid and Sallis (the people she and Daniel inhabited) lived in the Ori galaxy. A man named Tomin found her unconscious and thought her a gift from the gods. A lame, gentle, sweet, and lonely man, he was smitten with her.

Searching for a way back or a method of communication, Vala encountered Seevis, who served as both barkeep and village administrator. He is their most vehement defender of the religion of the Ori.

When Vala finds herself pregnant, to keep from being burned again, she quickly marries Tomin and convinces him he is the father of the child. In truth she does not know who the father of the baby is. Much to the team's surprise, she tells them that she didn't have relations with anyone and knows of no possible way she could be pregnant by natural means. Mitchell notes that Earth mythology does include such things, including some accounts of King Arthur himself.

Vala continues her story. A Prior has cured Tomin as the Ori conscript their followers in the tens of thousands and have them build ships in preparation for the coming crusade against our own galaxy. Raised from birth to revere the Ori, Tomin states that enemies of the Ori are evil and must be destroyed. Vala concludes that this will be an all-out war and that the warriors will not be swayed nor satisfied with anything less than total victory.

Landry is summoned to the conference room, where Russian officer Chekov and Chinese representative Shen Xiaoyi await. Chekov informs Landry of the Russian intention to take back their Stargate, on loan to the S.G.C. ("Redemption, Part 2"), when the treaty comes up for renegotiation in two weeks.

Vala, in her search for the anti-Ori underground she and Daniel found at Ver Eger, speaks with Denya, a barmaid and harlot at Seevis's bar. She concludes that Denya is a member of the underground -- but the woman may not be trustworthy, as Seevis soon accuses Vala of being an unbeliever. He chains her outside in the center of town, where she remains for three days with no food or water. Finally Tomin, after much consideration, defies Seevis and rescues her.

On one of those nights, she has a vision of herself lying in bed, looking up at a fiery, skull-like image manifesting itself on the canopy above her. She later hears a Prior tell Tomin that the baby is not his -- but is the will of the Ori.

Needing more information, Vala follows Tomin. Near the shipyard and staging site for the new Ori fleet, Denya and Seevis approach Vala. They reveal that Seevis himself is the head of the anti-Ori underground, and that they chained her up to test her.

Aggravated by Chekov's posturing, Landry cuts to the chase and discovers the new 304, a Daedalus-class ship nearing completion, will buy Russian support of the status quo in treaty renegotiations. In fact, he believes that the Russians have no intention of restarting a gate program; backed by the Chinese, they used the threat to secure their own ship.

Seevis is plotting to destroy the ships when they are activated by the ten Priors from Celestis at an upcoming celebration. Tens of thousands of Ori followers will die (including Tomin), depriving the Ori of those who would fight the crusade. But Seevis's plan fails.

Tomin mentions that the "Day of Reckoning" is at hand -- reminiscent of the recent message being preached by Priors in our galaxy. The Priors were only the first wave; the real crusade is about to begin. Vala reports that the Ori fleet is about to launch (from Ver Isca and many other planets) -- meaning the Ori have a working Supergate.

Suddenly, Daniel -- not Vala -- asks what's going on. Communication has been lost on Vala's end. At Seevis's bar, where Vala had been using an Alteran communication device, Tomin has shot and destroyed the device, and kills Seevis and Denya. But Vala convinces him that they forced her to use the device for them, and promises that she hasn't betrayed him. As she must have help with their miracle baby, she will accompany him when he leaves for war.

Carter has the Asgard and Tok'ra search for Supergate activity. The Jaffa have their ships out looking as well. With most resources focused on locating the Supergate and preparing for battle, SG-1 asks for permission to search the address left by Merlin ("Arthur's Mantle") for the weapon designed to kill the ascended Ori themselves. With a nod, Landry sends them off into certain danger.

9 - 20 CAMELOT

Out looking for Merlin's anti-Ori weapon ("Arthur's Mantle"), Colonels Mitchell and Carter, Teal'c, and Dr. Jackson come upon an Arthurian-style village. Passing through its gate, Jackson spies a sword in a stone, a sword identical to the one Mitchell removed from a stone under Glastonbury ("Avalon, Part 2"). Meurik, the governor of the village, welcomes them to Camelot.

Antonius, the village historian, explains that Merlin -- regarded by their people as a wizard of darkness -- is rarely mentioned. His library has remained sealed since his departure, about the time Arthur left in pursuit of the Sangraal -- the Holy Grail. The library is protected by a powerful curse -- a Black Knight. Mitchell, having defeated one of Merlin's knights before ("Avalon, Part 2"), is not impressed, although Teal'c and the others suggest this challenge left by the once ascended Ancient scientist may be different.

Searching for the library, Mitchell and Jackson spot a teenage girl and a young boy engaged in sword-play. Mitchell offers the girl, Valencia, a few pointers and asks if they know where Merlin's library is located. The pair take Jackson and Mitchell to the library. The door is protected by magic, but Valencia tells them that the key is in the archive. Antonius initially refuses to help ... but his own curiosity and Jackson's explanation prompt him to help SG-1 secretly enter the library.

Daniel immediately starts scanning the many texts and dusty scrolls stashed everywhere. He suggests that any kind of technology could be hidden in the room. Dubious, Mitchell pulls a book from a shelf, inadvertently opening a secret door.

Clutching a book, Antonius takes his leave and returns home as SG-1 heads into the hidden chamber. As in the Avalon cave under Glastonbury in England, fires in the fireplace and wall sconces ignite. SG-1 examines a large stone structure in the middle of the room -- an Ancient control panel, similar to those the team has previously encountered ("Window of Opportunity," "Reckoning, Part 2"). It activates as Daniel steps onto the platform at its base.

Back at the old historian's home, the Black Knight appears and slays Antonius.

Mitchell wanders out to the sword in the stone. Valencia reveals that only he who is pure of heart and true of spirit can pull the sword from the stone. Arthur will not return from his quest until someone in the village can remove the sword.

When Antonius's murder is discovered, Meurik orders SG-1 out of town even as Jackson tries to explain that there is no magic involved. As he utters the words, SG-1 is beamed aboard the Odyssey. The Jaffa have located the Supergate near P3Y-229 -- a gate that will allow the worshippers of the Ori to bring their assault fleet into our galaxy. An assault is being planned.

Jackson and Mitchell decide to stay behind to search for the anti-Ori weapon, and beam back into the library. They will be picked up by the Russians in their new space vessel, the Korolev ("Crusade"), on its way to the Supergate. While Earth marshals a fleet of its allies -- the Asgard, the Tok'ra, and the Free Jaffa -- to meet the invaders at the Supergate, Teal'c takes an unmarked cargo ship and heads off in pursuit of other potential allies.

When Jackson locates the code for (hopefully) deactivating the Black Knight, the pair proceed to the control panel and activate it. Screams alert them to the appearance of the knight outside in the village. Convinced he can handle the holographic warrior, Mitchell dashes off. But shots from his P-90 has right through the knight.

Valencia sees Mitchell unsuccessfully battling the knight. She rushes to the sword in the stone, pulls it out, and tosses it to Mitchell. Caked in mud, he fights while Daniel manipulates the device, which activates the Merlin hologram and reveals a room full of hidden treasure. But the knight persists. He is about to kill Mitchell when Daniel finds the control crystals, and decides to destroy them with his handgun.

Meanwhile, Teal'c allows himself to be captured in order to bring the Lucian Alliance into the fray. He confronts their leader, Netan, and convinces him to bring the Alliance fleet to the Supergate.

As the Odyssey arrives at the Supergate, the Asgard scientist Kvasir transports aboard. The Asgard have analyzed the data from the phase-shifting device ("Arthur's Mantle"). They believe that Merlin's anti-Ori weapon is a device that can shift energy to the dimension occupied by ascended beings -- killing the noncorporeal entities essentially like one wave cancelling out another. Hopefully the followers of the Ori will cease their invasion of our galaxy if their gods are dead -- but first they must find a way to get the weapon to the Ori galaxy, assuming Daniel and Cameron manage to find it.

Carter and Kvasir conclude that the Supergate can dial out and send the weapon to the Ori galaxy, if they can activate it before the Ori followers do. Since the gate draws its power from a singularity and doesn't have the 38-minute time limit of a normal Stargate, just dialing out could prevent the Ori from dialing into the Milky Way indefinitely. Carter puts on an E.V.A. suit and beams over to the gate to exchange control crystals.

Back in Camelot, Meurik and the villagers enter Merlin's secret room. Jackson asks if they recognize the pendant Merlin wears. Merlin's holographic recording has led Daniel to suspect that the anti-Ori weapon may be the pendant itself -- but it is not to be found among the treasure in the room. Meurik tells them that it is the Holy Grail, and that Arthur went seeking it. And now that the sword has been pulled from the stone, Arthur will soon be returning.

As Jackson again tries to explain there is no magic involved in the Black Knight, he and Mitchell are beamed aboard the Korolev.

Carter begins initialization of the new control crystal. But suddenly the massive gate activates, preventing Odyssey from beaming Carter back aboard. The Korolev drops out of hyperspace just as four Ori warships come through the gate. The Ori transmit a passage from the Book of Origin regarding the coming decimation. Daniel, familiar with the holy book ("Origin"), sends a counter passage, suggesting they are wrong to do this.

Odyssey fires as the Ori ships power up their weapons. A full, pitched battle ensues. The Odyssey loses sub-light engines while the Korolev loses its hyperdrive. The massive Milky Way fleet -- comprised of Earth's two battlecruisers, Goa'uld Ha'tak vessels, Al'kesh bombers, and an Asgard mothership -- fire volley after volley at the invading ships, but cannot penetrate their mighty shields. The Ori followers return fire with powerful beam weapons, cutting the ships to shreds.

And they believe that these four ships are only the first wave, or perhaps even a scouting party. Mitchell receives permission to scramble the F-302s aboard Korolev. Jackson takes a navigation console chair just as Teal'c and the ships of the Lucian Alliance arrive. The Ori ships withstand the combined assault. From her vantage point in space by the gate, Colonel Carter watches as one of Earth's Daedalus-class ships is destroyed.

On board one of the Ori ships, Vala Mal Doran watches with the same horror welling within. Her child, "the will of the Ori," will soon be born.

10 - 1 FLESH AND BLOOD

After decimating the hastily assembled fleet, the four Ori warships continue their incursion into the Milky Way. Aboard one, Vala Mal Doran gives birth to a girl who is immediately taken away. A one-eyed Prior proclaims the baby Orici -- she who belongs to all who follow the path; the one from whom all will learn. This child of Vala's will be a beacon of light in the darkness to the warriors of the Ori and to all who follow the true path to salvation. She will lead them to glorious victory over any and all unbelievers.

At the Supergate, Colonel Carter floats in space, calling out to any survivors. She finally rouses Colonel Mitchell, drifting semi-conscious in the cockpit of the F-302 he escaped in from the Korolev. He tells Sam that Jackson may still have been aboard.

Colonel Emerson hails Mitchell as the Odyssey returns into communications range. As Mitchell docks, Emerson reports that they followed the Ori ships until they jumped to hyperspace. Kvasir is aboard the Odyssey, working on repairing the Asgard beaming technology.

Teal'c, still aboard a Lucian Alliance vessel, calls Emerson, who hopes the Jaffa can take on survivors. When Teal'c must use a zat'ni'katel on an attacker, Emerson concludes that as a negative.

As Emerson briefs Mitchell on the miracle of their survival, Cam explains that the goal of the Ori is to ultimately convert -- not kill. Jackson is not among the six who beamed from Korolev. There has been no contact with Earth. Only a day of life support remains. The hyperdrive is still off line and the shields are at 20 percent.

Netan, leader of the Lucian Alliance, takes Teal'c prisoner. Claiming they were intentionally dragged into battle to deplete their forces, Netan demands Odyssey's unconditional surrender. But Carter notes that the Lucian Alliance Ha'tak is badly damaged and probably not weapons capable.

Aboard the Ori vessel, still suffering the after-effects of giving birth, Vala meets her daughter, already a young girl of 3 or 4 years old in appearance. As the child heals Vala, she adds that her mother shouldn't worry -- she will show Vala the true path.

Bra'tac gates to Stargate Command to brief General Landry. Agreeing that they need a ship on the scene of the Supergate, Bra'tac departs.

When Kvasir's test beaming reduces a sandwich to a blob, Mitchell takes the helm of the Odyssey, drawing Carter into the 302 bay. In sickbay, Mitchell tells her he has no news of Teal'c -- who is being tortured by Netan. But, he shows her information on a weakness in the Ori shields -- a fluctuation when they would fire their primary weapon.

Mitchell also points out that someone (Jackson, they hope) ringed off Korolev. Indeed, Jackson was helping Korolev's crew ring a nuke onto an Ori ship, when Korolev was hit. He flings himself into the rings and ends up on Vala's Ori ship.

At the S.G.C., Robert Woolsey tells Landry the I.O.A. is considering commandeering Atlantis' Z.P.M. for the Antarctica Earth Defense System. But Landry points out the three weeks necessary to get the Z.P.M., and even then, the Ancient Weapons Platform might not be effective.

Vala goes to see her daughter, now age 8 or 9 in appearance. Interested in her mother's approval, she allows Vala to name her Adria. The child reveals that the Ori wove their knowledge into her genetic makeup. The Ancients, Adria explains, lied to them, and that it was the Ancients who tried to destroy the Ori for their beliefs. Only the Ori share all they have learned. The Ancients have hoarded their knowledge and been dishonest. The Ori do ascend their followers. And it is the Ancients who derive energy from humans to empower themselves to destroy the Ori. Hence, all who can't see the truth path of the Ori must be destroyed.

Jackson locates Vala, who explains how the Ori used her to "sneak one of their own over the border." Meanwhile, Bra'tac arrives at the Supergate just as the Lucian Alliance again demands Odyssey's surrender. Kvasir beams Teal'c aboard as the Alliance destroys their damaged mothership and jumps away.

The Ori ships emerge over Chulak and immediately attack the settlement. The ship carrying the Orici lands.

Bra'tac agrees to leave a cloaked scout at the Supergate to watch for more Ori. When he and Teal'c leave for Chulak, Mitchell and Carter accompany them to search for Jackson and any other potential survivors of the Korolev.

En route, Carter attempts the Korolev's original "power fluctuation/ring in the bomb" plan, but with no success. Fortunately, Daniel is located in the mothership on Chulak's surface. Bra'tac commits to ramming the Ori ship. Deciding that it is better to live to fight another day, Mitchell has everyone beamed aboard Odyssey when she drops out of hyperspace, seconds before Bra'tac's mothership crashes harmlessly into an Ori vessel's shielding.

Vala dresses Jackson in armor with the idea of capturing Adria and escaping from the Ori ship. As they confront Adria -- 12 or 13 years in appearance now -- Tomin enters with a captured Daniel. Adria orders him to kill Jackson, but Vala steps into the line of fire. As Adria starts to heal her, Jackson stuns Adria and Tomin.

The one-eyed Prior enters to block their escape, and Daniel tries to shoot him as well, but when he fails, he pulls his sidearm and points it at Adria. As the Prior raises his staff, intent on killing the duo when Jackson realizes someone has locked on to his locator beacon. Before an Asgard beam sucks him up, he grabs Vala.

On board the Odyssey, SG-1 and Vala regroup. Jackson wishes he had shot Adria when he had the chance. Mitchell concludes with the obvious -- they need a new plan.

10 - 2 MORPHEUS

Colonel Mitchell, Colonel Carter and Vala Mal Doran are waiting as Teal'c gates back from off-world. In eight days, six more worlds have gone Ori. Two Jaffa planets resisted, but were overwhelmed in hours. According to reports, a young woman with extraordinary powers led the invasion.

As they head from the Gate Room discussing the possibility that the Ancient super-weapon in Antarctica is deterring the Ori from attacking Earth, Dr. Jackson runs to them. He announces that he's found the gate address for one of the planets where Arthur searched for the Sangraal.

Briefing General Landry, Vala and the others, Jackson explains how connecting Welsh and Ancient led him to search Merlin's library for Sir Gawain information. There he discovered a depiction of his sword with a gate address engraved on it. Carter reports that attempts to dial out to the Ori galaxy from the Supergate have failed. Teal'c adds that there is a mothership watching for more Ori vessels. Landry orders SG-1 to head out, but he tells Vala she must remain at the S.G.C..

Later, Jackson compares Vala to Teal'c when he asks Landry to take a chance and allow Vala to accompany SG-1. Landry agrees, with the proviso that Jackson keep Vala in line and that she undergo a psych evaluation.

SG-1 finds Vagonbrei deserted, minus many skeletons. Most of the villagers seem to have died in their beds. S.G.C. personnel members Reimer, Ackerman and Grimsby join as medical support.

In the town hall records, Jackson finds mention of a cave overlooking the village that was home to Morgan le Fay -- in Earth legend, a sorceress, half sister of Arthur, and adversary of Merlin. Teal'c suggests that this Morgan may have been ascended like Merlin. Recognizing the danger his weapon posed to any ascended being, she may have stolen it.

SG-1 and Ackerman search for the cave. Teal'c points out there are no birds, in fact no animals anywhere.

Landry visits Vala, diligently studying. He encourages her to be herself. When she does meet with Dr. Hutchison, she tells him she's a candidate for acculturation difficulties, but that she has adopted an abstract attitude, allowing for cathartic actualization.

Ackerman naps while SG-1 searches the cave. Finding nothing, they return to the village.

Dr. Hutchison attempts an inkblot test, but abandons the effort in irritation because of Vala's studied responses.

Ackerman can't be found when the teams decide to call it a day. Mitchell locates him in a chair, seemingly asleep. They cannot wake him. Dr. Reimer reveals that their white cell count is elevated, as are their serotonin levels. They have all been infected with something; they must stay awake or they may never wake up again.

Lam sends stimulants and medical equipment. Landry offers a hazmat team, which Mitchell declines until they know more.

Carter realizes that they have a strong urge to sleep. Reimer reports that Ackerman is producing excess melatonin, which is keeping him asleep. Jackson finds mention of a sleeping sickness that hit the town -- the result of a curse by Morgan le Fay, angered because they revealed her whereabouts to Arthur. He suggests rechecking the cave.

As they search the cave again, Carter has Mitchell take soil samples in case this is where Ackerman picked up the infection. An energy spike reveals the entryway to a larger cave/tunnel complex. Mitchell and Teal'c head in while Carter takes the samples back.

Vala is preparing for her next round with Hutchison when Robert Woolsey pays her a visit. He suggests he and his organization can ensure her success if she becomes a spy for the I.O.A.

Reimer finds a dormant parasite which live tissue stimulates -- the microbiological explanation of Morgan's curse. Grimsby goes missing.

Deep in the cave, Mitchell and Teal'c pause. They hear an animal. Surmising it's immune, they set out to trap it.

Grimsby has fallen asleep and Ackerman has died. Carter and Reimer perform an autopsy, which reveals an enlarged version of the parasite.

Vala has a disastrous encounter with a lie detector. Woolsey is waiting in her quarters for her answer. In her last encounter with Hutchison, she admits she has recently been risking her life for something other than herself -- due to someone finally believing in her.

As Carter tells Jackson how the parasite provokes a lethal aneurysm, Reimer, loaded up on stimulants, has a heart attack. They try unsuccessfully to revive him. Jackson and Carter fight to keep each other awake even as Teal'c captures the creature, a large lizard. Mitchell, exhausted tells Teal'c to get the animal back to Carter for the cure.

Carter and Jackson are about to sleep when Landry's hazmat team arrives. Teal'c reaches the surface as the new group finds the cave.

Back at the S.G.C., Jackson admits to finding a reference in the Vagonbrei archive: Atlantis. Their quest should next take them there.

Vala demands to leave, shouting insults at the Stargate control room officers, until she learns she been approved. She is stunned. As her first official act, she tells them about Woolsey. When the I.O.A. official confirms his role in her testing, Vala confronts him with claims of sexual advances. Woolsey, dismayed, follows Landry out of the room. She asks for her SG-1 patch, but Mitchell tells her she's probationary S.G.C., not SG-1. To celebrate, she wants to take them to lunch, suggesting Jackson can front her money until she gets her share of the loot.

10 - 3 THE PEGASUS PROJECT

The Odyssey drops out of hyperspace inside the Pegasus Galaxy. In the mess hall, Colonel Mitchell and Vala Mal Doran sit opposite a sleeping Dr. Jackson. Mitchell tickles Jackson's ear, rousing him, just as Colonel Emerson announces their approach to Atlantis. They race to the bridge. Carter is already there.

Mitchell suggests they take a moment to enjoy the view. When it's over, Carter, Vala and Mitchell head off as Jackson takes in Atlantis a bit longer.

In the city, Carter conducts a mission briefing with Dr. Weir, Mitchell, Jackson, Vala, Dr. McKay and Colonel Sheppard. The Ori Supergate has been inactive since the first ships came through. Priors are promising reinforcements. Carter plans to use a gate Teal'c is positioning near the Supergate to dial in with one powered by a Pegasus Galaxy black hole. A directed nuclear blast will force a jump to the Supergate, preventing the Ori from using it.

Jackson and Vala are staying behind in order to search the Ancient database for clues to Merlin's weapon, the Sangraal. Sheppard tells Mitchell that McKay is mortally allergic to citrus as he tosses him a lemon.

Vala, contemplating the "souvenirs" the city must harbor, wants to sightsee, but Jackson steers her back to their part of the mission. She lifts an electronic device from Dr. Zelenka's desk, which he hurries after her to retrieve.

Carter and McKay secure the warheads on Odyssey. Rodney takes a moment to tell Carter how she saved him when he was in a tight situation ("Grace Under Pressure"). She isn't flattered, especially when he reveals she was half-naked.

With the V.R. room's holographic interface -- an image of a Lantian woman -- Jackson begins his research. Bored, Vala goads him into simply asking where Castiana and Sahal are, even though Weir has said her search of the database revealed nothing. The hologram immediately discloses their Milky Way locations and gate addresses.

Near a black hole accretion disk, Odyssey releases a Milky Way Stargate. Inside the Milky Way, Teal'c has positioned a regular Stargate near the Supergate. Carter releases a directed nuclear charge near the Stargate, which translates much of the explosion through the other side, but Teal'c reports it is inadequate. No jump has been made.

Question answered, Vala is ready to leave, but Jackson is suspicious. He asks to see a visual record of Atlanteans who fled to Earth after the first siege. They spot Moros, whom they recognize as Merlin. Faced with Vala's impatience, Jackson finally confronts the hologram. The hologram turns and looks him in the eye. "You have your answer, Daniel Jackson," she says. "I suggest you act on it." She disappears.

McKay and Carter argue about calculations for the next try. Mitchell prods McKay, forcing him to work harder by threatening him with the lemon. Eventually, McKay explains that they need a different sort of blast -- two bombs, exploding in succession. Emerson is concerned about Odyssey and the Stargate, but Carter feels it's worth the risk.

Zelenka informs Weir that because of the blasts a Wraith hive ship has been drawn to Odyssey's location. Because of the black hole, communications and sensors will not function. Weir calls the S.G.C. Sergeant Harriman agrees to have Teal'c pass the warning through his Stargate.

Jackson tells Vala and Weir that the hologram was Morgan le Fay, an ascended Ancient. Coaxed back, Morgan explains that she and Merlin ascended, but several thousand years later, Merlin retook human form when he saw the threat of the Ori. He kept his work secret, but Morgan was sent to observe. By retaining all of his ascended knowledge and powers, Merlin created a weapon that could wipe out all ascended beings. He also formed an enclave of man -- Arthur and Camelot -- to whom he entrusted with his secret. Long ago his opponent, Morgan now understands.

Carter beams in the warheads. Teal'c reports they were unsuccessful, although energy did pass between the gates this time. Before a final attempt can be prepared, an Ori ship arrives at the Supergate. Teal'c conceals their Stargate by extending the cargo ship's cloaking field.

Morgan claims to have no reason to deceive them. She used her teaching hologram as a means of communicating the answers they sought, without overstepping the rules. Jackson rails against hidden clues and cryptic messages. The Ori are a threat to all humans as well as the ascended. When the war is over and all humans feed Ori the power they seek, they will come for the Ancients. Everyone's survival is on the line.

As the Ori ship patrols the Supergate, SG-11 relays Weir's warning. In Pegasus, the Wraith vessel emerges from hyperspace. Teal'c passes along the message.

Jackson surmises that Morgan is afraid of doing the right thing and being punished. He encourages her to be a leader and cross the line the Ancients have established. Vala asks her which planet to search. As Morgan begins her reply, she is pulled away by the others of her kind.

The Wraith fire, knocking out Odyssey's hyperdrive. As the hive ship slingshots around the black hole their jamming technology fails. Carter beams the warheads into the ship. Odyssey slingshots around the anomaly as well, using the gravity well to accelerate out. Just as the hive ship comes into range of the Stargate, Carter detonates the warheads.

Teal'c powers his systems, luring the Ori ship over the Supergate. The energy boost from the Wraith ship's destruction makes the gate jump work. The energy vortex of the activating Supergate destroys the Ori ship -- a great and unexpected victory.

While looking out over Atlantis, Vala consoles Jackson. They now have the addresses to the worlds they needed to find. But one sad truth has been revealed. The Ancients are not going to help.

10 - 4 INSIDERS

An Al'kesh approaches Earth's atmosphere.

General Landry, Colonels Mitchell and Carter, Teal'c and Vala Mal Doran discuss the results of the Pegasus expedition. Castiana has a toxic atmosphere that is slowing the search there for Merlin's weapon. They found evidence of stone structures on Sahal, but they were abandoned over 40,000 years ago. Thinking they have missed important information, Dr. Jackson is in the library on Camelot, hunting through Merlin's books.

When N.O.R.A.D. scrambles two F-16s to intercept the Al'kesh headed straight for Cheyenne Mountain, everyone meets in Control Room. The ship does not respond to hails. Landry gives the F-16s permission to engage. The planes disable the vessel, which crashes in an uninhabited area. SG-1 and Vala pick up the pilot -- who turns out to be Baal.

Puzzled that Baal, who has previously come to Earth undetected, would fly right to the S.G.C., Carter scans him and notes the presence of an implanted locator beacon. The mystery deepens as to why, because a jamming screen prevents anyone from locking onto a signal from within the base. Landry explains that Baal will only talk to SG-1.

Vala, drawing upon her time as the Goa'uld Qetesh, suggests Baal's attempt to steal Stargates ("Off the Grid") and to gain control of the Jaffa High Council ("Stronghold") was part of a plan to seize the Ancient device on Dakara -- the one used to defeat the Replicators ("Reckoning, Part 2"), and the one supposedly destroyed by the Jaffa ("Threads"). With modification, it could be used to eliminate organic life in most of the Milky Way, making this galaxy useless to the Ori. His clones, fearing they would die, want the real Baal dead. Or so he says. In return for elimination of the clones, he will offer information relevant to the search for Merlin's weapon.

Agent Barrett comes for Baal, under orders to collect the Goa'uld and take him away for questioning. But Landry refuses to turn him over to the N.I.D., citing that Stargate Command has bigger fish to fry than just the threat of the Trust -- who supposedly report directly to Baal.

Anubis told Baal of Merlin's weapon and his search for it among the thousands of worlds (addresses of which were obtained by O'Neill after using the Ancient Repository of Knowledge). Despite his greatest efforts, the half-ascended being was never able to find it. Baal's information will allow SG-1 to narrow down the selection. He tells them they can find the clones by searching for their locator beacons and the tracking device on his Al'kesh. The clones know about Merlin's weapon and if captured by the Ori, they could reveal the fact that the S.G.C. database contains its location -- a threat the Ori would be inclined to eliminate more quickly.

Dr. Leecombines Baal's information with that possessed by S.G.C. Vala mentions her familiarity with a planet that used to be under Camulus's control. SG-1 decides to investigate as a test of Baal's intent and information. Before departure, Landry questions whether Vala should go off-world. Mitchell points out that she could be useful, and that he realized long ago that he controls no one on SG-1. Carter shares his rank, Teal'c is an alien and Jackson is a civilian.

As they prep for the mission, Vala models her new, official uniform. She is allowed only a zat'ni'katel for defense, however. On the planet, she locates a ring platform and devises a plan to get them onto Baal's landed Ha'tak. SG-1 soon captures Baal and returns to the S.G.C. DNA tests suggest both Baals are clones. Teams are dispatched to retrieve the Baals.

Soon 20 clones are in custody. Mitchell, Carter and Vala attempt interrogations again. One Baal reveals that Vala, as Qetesh, attacked his fleet at Selenis, crippling his flagship and killing 10,000 of his best Jaffa. After another unsuccessful attempt to get Landry to turn over even one Baal, Barrett speaks with Carter. Her refusal to help him evokes a surprising tantrum of rage. Citing unresolved issues between them, Barrett dismisses orders and visits a Baal on his own initiative.

In the monitors of the briefing room Mitchell notices a Baal overcoming Barrett and escaping. Landry orders a lock down of levels 15-17. The video feed from the cells is cut. Baal captures Carter.

To regain control, Lee suggests symbiote poison in gas form, but cautions that the ventilation system is not designed to spread gas. Mitchell, Teal'c and Vala take teams to provide distractions until the gas can be released.

Baal threatens Carter with Barrett's life if she does not give him the access code to download the list of planets from the database. She surmises he wants Merlin's weapon to kill not only the Ori, but ascended Ancients. Assuming it's only a matter of time until they regain control of the level, Carter complies.

Siler works to prep the symbiote gas for release. Baal has his plan, however. Locking Carter in a supply room, he gathers his Baals. Landry orders the gas released.

Mitchell frees Carter, who races to where the Baals are assembled. Collectively, they beam out to a waiting Al'kesh. Together their locator beacons allowed their signal to penetrate the S.G.C. jamming screen.

Deciding Baal's plan worked only because of Barrett, they question the agent, thinking (and soon confirming) he has been brainwashed. He is taken into custody.

Carter apologizes for giving Baal the list of addresses, but Landry says that, under the circumstances, she did the right thing.

10 - 5 UNINVITED

General Landry has ordered SG-1 and Vala Mal Doran to join him at General O'Neill's cabin so they get to know one another better -- and to take a break from the constant pressure of the Ori. Driving his vintage black Mustang, Colonel Mitchell is the first to arrive despite getting lost.

The others have been delayed. Teal'c is off-world assisting SG-3. Colonel Carter, in command of the S.G.C., can't join them until Teal'c and Colonel Reynolds return. Vala will travel with them. Dr. Jackson, in England, has found a private book collection concerning Merlin and Morgan. Mitchell makes his first stuck-alone-with-your-boss faux pas -- When he remarks that Jackson is like a fat kid in a candy store, Landry reveals he was a big boy in his youth.

They are not alone, however. An unseen observer is watching, using a cloaking field SG-1 has encountered before ...

On P9J-333, Teal'c observes the brutality of whatever has ripped villagers apart. Back at the S.G.C., the two men, Carter and Vala discuss the possibility that this creature is Ori-related. Vala volunteers her extensive experience hunting rare, deadly creatures. If her help isn't wanted, she'll devise activities for quality time at the cabin.

Carter sends Teal'c, Vala, Reynolds and SG-3 and 25 back to P9J-333. Vala is thrilled; Teal'c is not, especially when Vala tries to negotiate splitting the money if they sell the captured creature. On the planet, there is another attack. Vala runs to the D.H.D. to summon help. The creature and Teal'c follow. Teal'c uses a grenade to kill it.

During a raging storm, Mitchell loses his third chess game to Landry before admitting that he hates it. Landry has been pondering Mitchell's comments about not being in charge ("Insiders"). After Mitchell says he's used to a clearer chain of command, Landry points out that Mitchell made it his personal mission to bring SG-1 back together. Mitchell admits he wouldn't change anything, that he has learned he needs the rest of SG-1. Landry expresses his assurance in Mitchell, but adds that winning will require them to work together. Mitchell's job is to see that that happens.

As Cam prepares for bed, the power fails. Hearing a noise, he grabs a pistol. In the process of investigating he nearly shoots Landry, armed with a shotgun, as they round the same corner from opposite directions. They agree to try not to shoot one another before morning before finally turning in.

Next morning, with the power and phones still out, Mitchell prepares to leave, but the road is washed out. The colonel is horrified by the prospect of another day alone with Landry. Back at Stargate Command, Carter is wide-eyed when Vala, who has used the Goa'uld healing device on the wounded of SG-25, actually sits in Landry's chair. But she draws the line when Vala attempts to put her feet on his desk.

Dr. Redon performs an autopsy on the P9J-333 creature. A black worm-like animal emerges. Teal'c zats it before it can attack the doctor.

Encountering a wild-eyed hunter, Mitchell helps locate the man's friend, now dismembered like the people on P9J-333. Fearing an alien creature is loose, Mitchell and Landry set out to track it down. While they search, Landry reveals he was shot down and hunted by Viet Cong. Mitchell says he finds work relaxing -- that he's twisted that way.

Soon another mutilated hunter is discovered.

When another team returns with injuries, Carter concludes that the worms aren't an Ori creation, as they only appear on worlds where SG teams have disguised themselves using the Sodan cloaking devices ("Babylon"). In addition, one device is missing from Area 51. Agent Barrett, who has recently recovered from his brainwashing ("Insiders"), is investigating.

Carter and Teal'c test the Sodan devices, hoping to attract the creatures. Emitting radiation, a worm transforms a docile host into a vicious mutant. When Teal'c has been cloaked for a short while, a worm appears. The device's own radiation has provided an inter-dimensional bridge.

Mitchell follows a trail of blood to an invisible something. He orders that the cloaking device be turned off. The man using the device, a Trust agent who has been observing the cabin, has been shot. Carter surmises something worse than a bear is in the woods.

Landry commandeers the hunt in the name of national security. A skeptical Sheriff Stokes, who is assured by Landry that everything is fine, is mauled by a massive four-legged monster and dragged off.

Carter hands out devices to SG personnel to track the creature. After nightfall the team locates the area of the woods it has been detected, but can't see it. It materializes several times before they kill it. To everyone's shock (minus Vala), a second creature appears and is quickly dispatched.

The next day Teal'c, Vala, Carter, and Mitchell play poker in O'Neill's cabin. Carter admits that she is not a gambler, but Teal'c agrees, evoking her competitiveness. The others drop out. Teal'c eventually folds, much to Carter's delight. Mitchell commits his final faux pas by laughing about Landry thinking the second creature's attack was a joke. Pleased to see them relaxing, Landry joins the game.

10 - 7 COUNTERSTRIKE

Undercover on a world converting to Origin, Colonel Carter, Colonel Mitchell, Dr. Jackson, Teal'c, and Vala Mal Doran listen as the now fully-grown Adria ("Flesh and Blood") invites the new believers to join her army. In orbit, Odyssey detects powerful radiation emanating from the Stargate. Colonel Emerson, the ship's commander, beams out the team as the wave strikes, killing everyone on the planet.

Vala confesses to Daniel that she is relieved Adria is dead. She felt guilty that she hadn't stopped her before.

Bra'tac arrives on Earth and informs General Landry that the new Jaffa leader, Se'tak, intends to use the Ancient weapon on Dakara against the Ori forces. Landry reveals SG-1's narrow escape and calls the deaths of the planet's inhabitants mass murder. He insists on meeting Se'tak face-to-face.

Carter and Teal'c realize that the radiation wave had to come from the weapon on Dakara. Teal'c is shamed by the actions of his people. Mitchell and Carter refocus on the opportunity to examine an unguarded Ori ship. The team beams aboard and splits up.

Jackson tells Vala that he understands her feelings because of what happened to Sha're, his wife who died seven years ago ("Forever In a Day"). Meanwhile, Teal'c and Mitchell find the engine room and plant a C4 bomb as a back-up plan, in case the ship cannot be salvaged before the Ori return to this planet. Carter discovers the bridge with a command chair interface similar to the one in Antarctic.

Laying claim to the Ori ship, Jaffa warriors led by Bo'rel confront and capture Mitchell and Teal'c. Carter asks for immediate extraction. When Odyssey can't comply, Carter suspects she accidentally activated the shields. Odyssey advises that three Ha'tak vessels have entered the system. Carter suggests that Odyssey leave.

On Dakara, Landry confronts Se'tak. He tells Landry that he no longer feels bound by the agreement made by his predecessors not to use the Ancient weapon. He believes that desperate times call for desperate measures, and the change to seize the Ori ship will allow them to turn the tide against the Ori.

Threatening Teal'c and Mitchell, Bo'rel commands the rest of SG-1 to surrender. Sam is about to call Bo'rel when Jackson, hiding with Vala, beats her to it. As he tries to reason with Bo'rel, he and Vala are discovered.

But Adria, who survived the radiation wave thanks to a pendant bearing a piece of the holy city Celestis, rescues them by killing several Jaffa with her powerful telekinetic abilities.

Jackson tries to zat Adria. She telekinetically points a staff weapon at him even as she strangles him. Vala intervenes. Clearly glad to see her mother, Adria vows they will never be separated again. She didn't believe when the others told her that Vala had abandoned her.

Elsewhere, Carter deactivates the ship's power before locating Mitchell and Teal'c. The three overcome Bo'rel and his Jaffa.

Vala wants Adria to come with her, but Adria refuses. Searching for information about the weapon, Adria probes Daniel's mind. Unable to extract an answer, she reanimates a Jaffa and learns about the weapon on Dakara. It is the only thing capable of stopping the Ori, and thus becomes her sole target. The ship takes off under her power, ripping through the orbiting Jaffa ships with its beam weapon before entering hyperspace ... on a course for Dakara.

On Dakara, Landry tries to reason with Se'tak, who believes the old alliance is of no use, especially since it is the Jaffa who are dying. This is why Se'tak tested the weapon against converted humans, not Jaffa. Furious when he hears about the destruction of his ships, Se'tak orders Bra'tac and Landry held. He suspects that SG-1 is in control of the Ori warship.

Unable to locate SG-1 and Vala, Emerson orders Odyssey to Dakara.

While Carter tries to gain control of the vessel from the bridge, Mitchell and Teal'c search for Jackson and Vala -- only to encounter Bo'rel and his Jaffa again. Teal'c convinces his distrustful brothers that someone else is controlling the ship, and that they once again share a common enemy.

Adria believes that the galaxy will be converted within the year. In a rare moment of self-doubt, she wonders how she can persuade a galaxy to follow Origin if she can't sway her own mother. Jackson tries to reason with Adria: he says people should be given a choice. Countering, Adria says she is trying to bring a galaxy from darkness into light. All doubt must be removed lest it spread like cancer.

The Ori ship arrives at Dakara. Se'tak believes SG-1 is in command and seeks vengeance. He vows to Landry that he will recapture it and lay siege to Earth. Landry and Bra'tac are taken to the weapon control room as it fires on the Ori ship.

Agreeing that the ship cannot be allowed to fire on Dakara, Mitchell and Teal'c try to detonate the C4, but Adria prevents the explosion.

Odyssey arrives to beam out SG-1, but the shields are still active. Jackson tells Adria the Ancients will act, but she knows the Ori have free rein in this galaxy. She adds that "they" have plans for Jackson himself.

Carter manages to disrupt the shields as the radiation wave moves from the planet's surface toward the ships in orbit. SG-1 and Vala are beamed out as the wave hits. All Jaffa aboard die, but Adria and the ship are unharmed. The Odyssey escapes into hyperspace as Adria turns the ship's weapons on Dakara, destroying the Ancient weapon and rendering the seat of the Free Jaffa government desolate. Bra'tac and Landry escape via the Stargate.

At the S.G.C., Teal'c delivers the news of Dakara's demise. Five more planets, including Hebridan (Warrick's home) and Langara (Jonas Quinn's planet) have now fallen to the Ori.

10 - 8 MEMENTO MORI

A confused Vala wanders the streets of a city alone and, hungry, enters a deli. When she tries to skip out on the bill, the owner, Sol, stops her. She confesses that she has no way to pay her bill ... and, in fact, she doesn't even remember who she is. She has no memory of her life before she walked into his fine establishment.

Stricken with amnesia, Vala agrees to take a job as a waitress to pay back her debt while she tries to piece together her memory. She refuses to go to a hospital, and the very suggestion of it causes her intense anxiety.

Back at the S.G.C., Colonel Mitchell and Teal'c interrogate a man named Weaver -- one of those responsible for Vala's disappearance -- in the isolation room, while Daniel and Carter watch. Weaver isn't very forthcoming with information, and is clearly concerned about what will happen to him if he helps them.

When Vala takes down a pair of would-be robbers, the police take her in for questioning about the incident. But the cop (and deli patron), Ryan, has a hard time comprehending the disoriented and mysterious Vala.

As she begins to remember more and more of what happened to her, Vala discovers that she had been taken prisoner by Athena, an evil being (probably a Goa'uld) who used a memory device to probe for information hidden deep within Vala's memory.

10 - 9 COMPANY OF THIEVES

There are political machinations at work in the upper echelons of the Lucian Alliance, and Netan, their leader, fears that one of his "seconds" may be planning to overthrow him. His decision to commit ships to the battle against the Ori invasion proved to be disastrous. What is more, the Alliance is losing much territory as the Ori sweep across our galaxy.

Netan sends the man, Anateo, on a dangerous assignment to capture the Earth ship Odyssey, hoping that he will either die in the attempt or be disgraced. Instead, the menacing and ambitious Avateo succeeds in taking the ship -- with Samantha Carter on board. He threatens the life of Odyssey commander Colonel Emerson to force Sam to follow his instructions. Anateo believes that his victory will enable him to overthrow Netan, who he believes has failed the Alliance.

The capture of the ship is a great victory, but Avateo wants more: he uses it as bait to try and capture SG-1. He is partially successful, capturing Daniel and Vala.

Later, Colonel Mitchell reports back to Landry. Clearly the Lucian Alliance is behind this, prompting Cameron to hatch a plan to get his team back: he will go undercover as one of Netan's own seconds, and infiltrate the Lucian Alliance.

Mitchell visits Netan under the guise of Kefflin, one of Netan's close friends who runs a kassa operation on the outskirts of the galaxy. Kefflin is known to be extremely reclusive, and few of the other Alliance leaders know what he looks like. When he is beaten and brought before Netan, he pricks him with the Reole chemical (the same one Daniel used to impersonate Yu's personal servant in Season Five's "Summit") to convince him that Mitchell is Kefflin, a dear friend. The plan works.

Mitchell covertly transmits their conversations to Teal'c, who listens from a cloaked cargo ship nearby. But when Teal'c is captured and brutally interrogated by Netan's men, Cameron must think quickly.

10 - 10 QUEST (PART 1 OF 2)

The quest for the Holy Grail continues, as SG-1 hunts for the mythical "Sangraal" -- believed to actually be an Ancient device invented by Merlin, which can kill the ascended Ori ("Camelot"). The Ori have launched a bloody crusade to convert our galaxy to forcible worship, and SG-1 hopes that if their "gods" are destroyed the followers will cease their campaign.

The team visits a medieval-style village on another world, where they meet Osric, a frail old librarian who keeps watch over all the village's material related to the Sangraal. But they aren't the only ones looking for it: Baal is also searching for the device, and has already been here.

Osric warns them that many have come to him looking for the Sangraal, and have died in their quest. The way is perilous (the woods in which it is said to be located was cursed by Morgan Le Fay), and the legendary prize is guarded by a great dragon. Daniel doubts that it's an actual dragon ...

The team finally has a solid lead on where the Merlin's anti-Ori weapon is ... but Osric refuses to show them the map that Morgan left behind, as the last group of travellers -- Baal and his minions -- tried to steal it.

Convincing Osric to show them the map is just the first of many challenges SG-1 faces. They must decipher ancient clues, overcome the "curse," and even join forces with their enemy.

STARGATE: ATLANTIS

The Lost City of Atlantis Has Been Found!

A secret group of scientists have discovered the location of the famous lost city of Atlantis, but it's not on Earth. It's located in another galaxy altogether, the Pegasus galaxy. Stargate Atlantis, a spin-off from the highly successful Stargate SG-1 series, follows a multinational scientific and military group, lead by Diplomat Dr. Elizabeth Weir (played by actress Torri Higginson), headed on a one way trip to Atlantis. Their mission: to investigate the secrets of Atlantis, a city now known to have been built by ancient powerful beings, and bring whatever they discover back to Earth. They will be all on their own, with no means to return, with no means of rescue or support, unless they can find the technology they need in Atlantis to return them to Earth.

Once in Atlantis, the group finds the city abandoned; asleep for tens of thousands of years, and no power source left for a return home. They must find a power source within Atlantis' own Pegasus galaxy using the same stargate system that got them there or they will be stranded forever. On the first planet they visit, they accidentally waken a new, powerful, and more evil enemy than human kind has ever faced, the Wraith. And the Wraith are hungry for humans!

Follow the extraordinary adventures of an SGA team lead by Major John Sheppard (played by actor Joe Flanigan), and his team made up by his second in command Lt. Aiden Ford (played by actor Rainbow Sun Francks), and the Astrophysicist/Scientist Dr. Rodney McKay (played by actor David Hewlett, reprising the role he played in Stargate SG-1). Joining the team will be Teyla Emmagan (played by actress Rachel Luttrell), a beautiful, exotic, and strong-willed woman from the Pegasus galaxy.

Stargate Atlantis is an American science fiction television series part of the Stargate franchise. It is a spin-off from the television series Stargate SG-1, which was based on the film Stargate (1994). Produced by MGM, Stargate Atlantis premiered on the US Sci Fi Channel on July 16 (Sky One in Europe), 2004 with "Rising", a movie-style two-part episode, that guest starred Richard Dean Anderson and Michael Shanks from Stargate SG-1.

Developed by longtime SG-1 producers Brad Wright and Robert C. Cooper, Stargate Atlantis regulars include Joe Flanigan, Torri Higginson, David Hewlett, and Rachel Luttrell. Other actors listed included Rainbow Sun Francks in the first season and Paul McGillion in season two. Actors playing major recurring characters include Robert Davi, Colm Meaney, David Nykl, Mitch Pileggi and Kavan Smith.

The series is currently broadcast in several countries around the world; in some places, like Europe, Canada, Japan, Australia, and the United States, the series is broadcast in HD.

Conception

When the Stargate SG-1 producers Brad Wright and Robert C. Cooper thought the series was going to end after season five (when Showtime dropped it), they came up with the idea of making a new feature film. But when the ratings on its new home Sci-Fi channel skyrocketed, the idea got pushed after season six and later after season seven. But then there was talk of a spin-off series and the producers were left with a serious dilemma, since the whole seventh season had been planned to lead up to the great discovery of the lost city of the Ancients. "Lost City" was supposed to be a bridge between SG-1 and a new show or a movie, which wasn't supposed to run at the same time as SG-1. Wright and Cooper rewrote the script as the two-parter season seven finale, and moved the setting of the story. The city, originally planned to be on Earth under Antarctica in place of the SGC, moved to the Pegasus Galaxy. By doing so, they wanted to avoid the fans wondering why SG-1 wasn't coming to help them, and also gave them the chance to wipe the slate clean.

The series got the green light on November 17, 2003 and started shooting in February 2004. It premiered on July 16 of the same year.

Casting

Stargate Atlantis main characters in Season 1. From left to right: Lt. Aiden Ford, Teyla Emmagan, Lt. Col. John Sheppard, Dr. Elizabeth Weir and Dr. Rodney McKay. From the start, Wright and Cooper ruled out casting "star names", on the basis of the financial pressures they were already experiencing with "star names" on Stargate SG-1. The casting was made more complicated because Atlantis got the go-ahead in November, and had to compete with other networks during pilot season.

The character most difficult to cast was the then-called Dr. Ingram, an unexcitable scientist expert in the Stargate. As the first day of shooting drew nearer and they were unable to find the right actor, they came to realize they had brought in the wrong character. Longtime Stargate director Martin Wood and Brad Wright thought it should be Dr. Rodney McKay, who had already appeared in a guest role in three episodes of Stargate SG-1. Actor David Hewlett was contacted and arrived to the set the day after filming had started.

Season 2 brought casting changes. The creators found themselves with a problem with the character of Lt. Aiden Ford (Rainbow Sun Francks), a first season regular that the producers, and the actor himself, felt had not worked like intended and was highly underused as a result. Unwilling to write him out, the writers came with an idea to make the character more important, but that downgraded him to recurring. To replace him, they created Ronon Dex as a sidekick for Lt. Col. John Sheppard, but finding an actor with the physical presence and the acting ability necessary was not easy until they saw Jason Momoa's tape. X-files veteran Mitch Pileggi was added to the cast in the recurring role of Col. Stephen Caldwell. Paul McGillion's character, Dr. Carson Beckett, became a regular in season two.

Spoiler warning: Plot and/or ending details follow.

Season 3 shacked the lineup again. Paul McGillion's Dr. Carson Beckett was killed in the episode 17, "Sunday". It was only the beginning, since new changes were announced for season 4 about the same time. Amanda Tapping will cross from Stargate SG-1 for 14 episodes in Season 4, while Torri Higginson will become a recurring character.

Spoilers end here.

Format

Each season of Stargate: Atlantis features 20 episodes broadcasted in two series of 10 episodes each. The first 10 episodes air from mid-July to September in the United States, ending in the cliffhanger of a two-parter episode. The second half airs first in Canada, from November to January, ending also with a cliffhanger. In the United States, the second half aired from January to March during seasons 1 and 2, but season 3 will air from April to June 2007.

Stargate: Atlantis episodes feature a self-contained story that also contributes to the larger storyline of the war against the Wraith and their search for the means to destroy their enemy. Each season has also featured a two-parter episode, and a few episodes that, while not technically two-parters, had continued directly the story of the previous episode (for example, season 3 "Progeny" and "The Real World").

Each show begins with a cold open, sometimes preceded with a recap of events relevant to the upcoming narrative. The opening credits feature an original theme by Joel Goldsmith. Though they were drastically cut at the start of season 2, the full credits were recovered after the mid-season parter.

The show blends different types of approaches to science-fiction, from action to comedy.

Filming locations

Stargate Atlantis is filmed at Bridge studios in Vancouver and on location in several places in British Columbia. The Pemberton Glacier doubled for Antarctica during the opening flying sequence in series premiere "Rising". Lynn Valley Canyon was, for example, where the episode "Instinct" was filmed.

Stargate Atlantis inherited Blade Trinity's effects stage. The Blade Trinity production gave the set to Stargate Atlantis to save the high cost of dismantling the massive construct. The set has appeared several times. For example, the walkway Sheppard walks in "The Storm" is the topmost part of the Blade Trinity set.

Stargate Atlantis features a symphonic orchestra soundtrack composed by Joel Goldsmith. Goldsmith's first task for the series was to compose the main title song, which was nominated for the Outstanding Main Title Theme Music Emmy award in 2005. When composing the music, Goldsmith went for a more pastoral, European and Americana approach, while keeping the adventurous, symphonic approach the producers wanted. [9] Goldsmith's score for season 2 episode "Grace Under Pressure" was nominated for an Emmy Award for Outstanding Music Composition For A Series (Dramatic Underscore) in 2006.

In November 22, 2005, Varèse Sarabande Records released the Stargate Atlantis Original Television Soundtrack CD. It contains 16 tracks, all from the series pilot "Rising", with a total running time of 42:18.

I've read comments about how bad this spin off is. Are they watching the same series as I? This is not a carbon copy of SG1, or should it be! The story lines are completely different and the characters are fantastic! I love the Wraith! I look forward every week for this show. I just hope and pray that the Sci-Fi channel doesn't cancel it like they've canceled great sci-fi shows in the past! The super line-up on Firdays with Andromeda, Stargate SG1, Stargate Atlantis and Battle Star gallactica, what more could a sci-fi Junker ask for? If Stargate SG1 ends it's run, this spin-off will take it's place without sacrificing it's quality!

The team is lead by military commander Colonel Marshall Sumner, who is the first to step through to Atlantis. The facility is cleared and secured, and remarkably the systems begin to activate and light up as the humans begin exploring the massive city. Two scientists find a bay filled with Ancient ships capable of travelling through the Stargate; Dr. McKay finds the control room with Stargate dialing controls; and it's not long before the team discovers that the entire city, protected by a massive energy shield, is underwater.

As they continue to explore, Beckett finds a holographic recording left by one of the Ancients. She explains how the Ancients left Earth and came to the Pegasus Galaxy, seeding the human form of life on a thousand worlds. But then they set foot on a dark world where a terrible enemy slept: the Wraith. The enemy awoke and began feeding on the human-populated worlds like a great scourge, until only Atlantis remained. The shield withstood the assault of the enemy's weapons for many years, but finally the Ancients decided that the only way to preserve the last of their kind was to submerge the city. The remaining Ancients went through the Stargate and returned to Earth thousands of years ago to live out the remainder of their lives.

Soon, however, the team realizes that the great city of the Ancients may be nearing destruction -- and because of their arrival. Two of the three Z.P.M.s that power the city are dead, and the third is almost there. By exploring the city and turning things on, they risk the complete failure of the shield that is holding back the ocean.

The naquadah generators brought from Earth cannot generate nearly enough power to sustain the failing shield, and, as expected, there's not nearly enough power to gate back to Earth. But they can dial to other planets in the Pegasus Galaxy. A planet from the Ancient's local database is chosen, and Colonel Sumner leads a team to either find a new Z.P.M. or safe harbor for the expedition. Major Sheppard goes along, as does the young and enthusiastic Lieutenant Ford.

They arrive in the dark on the planet Athos, where two young children are playing in the woods. They meet a man named Halling, who believes they are traders. Halling leads them back to the Athosian encampment and introduces the team to Teyla Emmagan, one of their leaders. She is a strong and beautiful woman, who is cautious about helping the strangers. Sheppard tries to get to know her. When the sun comes up it reveals the ruins of an old city nearby, which the Athosians do not visit for fear that it will bring the Wraith down upon them. Sumner leads a team to check it out, while Teyla shows Sheppard a series of cave drawings that tell of the last great Wraith attack on their world.

The Wraith keep human-colonized worlds like Athos as feeding grounds, returning every so often to "cull their human herds" -- though sometimes not for hundreds of years at a time. Still, they return more frequently in smaller numbers to keep the Athosians living in fear. Though they possess advanced technology, the Athosians live as a simple people and move their camps around to try and avoid the great enemy. Teyla is surprised to hear that the visitors have never heard of the Wraith; they have visited many worlds through the Stargate, and have never met anyone who did not know about them.

Back at the Stargate, Ford watches as the gate activates and three Wraith "dart" ships come soaring through. Teyla and Sheppard return from the cave while Sumner's team rushes back to the encampment.

1 - 2 RISING (PART 2 OF 2)

The Wraith have begun an assault on Athos. Dartspour out from the Stargate and begin systematically culling portions of the Athosian-occupied landscape. Colonel Sumner, Sergeant Bates and the small battalion of Earth men are ill equipped to handle the bombardment. It is only when Major Sheppard contacts Sumner and informs him that the Wraith are able to make humans see things that aren't there does he point his guns to the sky.

Sergeant Bates manages to disable a single Dart before he and Sumner are swept away in a culling beam, along with Halling and a number of other Athosians. Teyla is lost in this manner as well. Sheppard radios Ford, still on guard at the gate, to memorize the coordinates to where the Wraith are returning.

Back in the city, power readings are going critical. Dr. McKay has lost all patience for the drain. It is time to leave -- before the city is destroyed by the ocean. But just as Dr. Weir orders the dialing sequence to commence, an incoming wormhole blocks their escape. Ford's I.D.C. ushers in Sheppard, the remainder of his team, and the entire Athosian colony.

The shield cannot remain active any more.

The clamp mechanism holding Atlantis to the ocean floor releases, and the city is allowed to rise -- bursting through the surface of the water to a glistening morning sun. This unanticipated safeguard has preserved the city for the future.

Now that Atlantis is above water, Weir is hopeful that the shield will be useful if the city fell under attack. Unfortunately, there is only enough remaining energy in the Z.P.M. to power the most basic systems.

Sheppard turns over the coordinates the Wraith escaped to, ordering McKay to come up with the right combination. But Weir is not willing to let him attempt a rescue. She takes this matter up with him in private, explaining that the Wraith, once aware of the city's resurrection, would be impossible to stop. But Sheppard assures her that now that humans have been taken prisoner Atlantis will likely be revealed anyway. Reluctantly, Weir grants the mission.

Unfortunately the coordinates to the Wraith escape route end in space. But McKay introduces Sheppard to the ships found earlier. His Ancient gene activates the craft once he steps inside. Later, Sheppard is joined by Ford, Stackhouse and several military team members for the rescue mission. The ship, nicknamed a Puddle Jumper, remotely activates the Stargate and flies through.

One Athosian has already been taken by the Wraith. Now Teyla, Bates, Halling and several others are forced to watch as an intimidating Wraith commander and two guards take Colonel Sumner away from the cell.

Sheppard lands the Puddle Jumper several clicks from the Wraith compound. He teams himself up with Ford and enters. Soon they locate the prison cell, and give Bates the equipment necessary to escape from within, while Sheppard goes in search of Sumner. Meanwhile, the Wraith Keeper's powerful mind tricks have forced the colonel to reveal that there are more than millions of humans from his home planet, but the woman isn't able to learn Earth's location. All she knows is it is not in her galaxy. But in any case, the amount of food available "out there" is enough to satiate her people for some time to come.

When Sumner refuses to relinquish more information the Keeper begins to feed on him -- placing the feeding tubule of her hand onto his chest -- draining his life force. Sheppard, who has concealed himself a floor above, shoots at her and her minions, but soon it is too late. Sumner is little more than a corpse. He nods at Sheppard, giving approval to end his torment. Sheppard fires his P-90 at the colonel, killing him.

But Sheppard himself has now become a captured by the Wraith. The Keeper questions him as to where he obtained the Ancient technology he possesses, but to no avail. Before she can now feed on the major, Lieutenant Ford comes to the rescue. Sheppard orders the C-4 they planted to detonate, making several big holes in the compound. Sheppard takes the long, thin end of the Wraith rifle and drives it through the Keeper. She falls to the floor. "You don't know what you have done," she tells him, assuring him that she, the safeguard for her entire race, will ensure that all Wraith in the galaxy will now awaken.

Sheppard and his party hurry with the captives back to the Jumper. The ship enters orbit of the planet, only to find their way blocked by a squadron of 13 darts. Sheppard is forced to de-cloak the Jumper to drive them away, releasing powerful drone weapons he had no idea the ship possessed into the Darts of the enemy. As the Stargate opens to Atlantis Ford inputs his I.D.C., but on final approach several Dart blasts penetrate the Atlantis gate room. Sheppard retracts the drive pods just in time before the ship goes through, activating the shield behind them when they emerge on the other side.

A celebration for the rescue has commenced on a lower terrace of Atlantis's central spire, where Weir congratulates Sheppard and Ford with cups of General O'Neill's wine -- and a push to Sheppard that he must now compose a team. It is Weir's opinion that the new occupants of Atlantis must do their part. With the Wraith stirred, missions must commence to get help to the rest of the Pegasus Galaxy. And do what they came to do.

1 - 3 HIDE AND SEEK

Dr. Beckett's gene therapy has progressed, and he is finally ready for his first human test subject. Dr. McKayeagerly agrees, so that he can use Ancient technology like Major Sheppard. It's not long before the therapy is proven to be effective. McKay has found an Ancient personal shield generator, and soon tests it with Sheppard by shooting him in the leg, and even throwing him over a balcony -- neither of which hurt McKay at all. But when he wants to take it off he finds himself unable to reach it ...

After unsuccessfully attempting to drink a cup of coffee, McKay is beginning to fret. But Beckett is celebrating. His first test subject was a success. Meanwhile, allocating living quarters is proceeding in a timely manner. Teyla wishes her people to contribute, but Sheppard and Weir caution that it will take time to train them in Earth's weapons and tactics. In the command center, the Atlantis staff is each issued a command code in the event the city is compromised.

Sheppard tries to scare the Athosian children to sleep by telling them a bedtime story, but they get hung up in the unknown human terms. Afterward he plays an historic football game for his team, introducing Teyla to the concepts. Meanwhile, Jinto and Wex leave their quarters and play a game of hide and seek in the dark corridors. After an odd delay, Wex calls out for Jinto, but he is gone.

Sheppard awakes his men to locate Jinto. Weir makes a city-wide communiqué for him, but the only response is a loss in power and a random gate dialing. McKay suggests that there might be ghosts in Atlantis. During the search one of the Athosians reports to have seen a shadow. Sensing a possible danger, Sheppard orders all teams to be recalled to the gate room. There, Jinto's father, Halling, sends out a message to his son, telling him that he is not angry, encouraging him to make some noise. Power loss occurs again and McKay passes out.

Out on patrol, Sheppard encounters a creature which appears to be a shadow of darkness. It retreats into a naquadah generator bay and leaves after he and Grodin power it down.

Jinto manages to use the communication devices and explains where he has been taken, though he doesn't specifically know where he is. As it turns out he discovered an Ancient transport chamber that was being used as a closet. Sheppard and McKay go to his location and retrieve him. Meanwhile, Grodin has managed to recalibrate Atlantis sensors to detect the entity, which they have currently running in circles by deactivating naquadah generators as it approaches them. Still, any form of energy is enough for it to feed on. It corners Ford and Stackhouse into a corridor. As Stackhouse manages to avoid it, the creature temporarily devours the Lieutenant.

Back in the med bay, Ford is making a hasty recovery. McKay has analyzed one of the devices Jinto touched -- an Ancient containment unit. Apparently he accidentally released the creature into the city. From what he reads, the Ancients were researching an evolutionary development to ascension itself, using this creature as a test subject. It has been trapped in the device since they abandoned the city. One thing is clear: once the naquadah generators run dry, it will consume everyone's life force.

Jinto apologizes to Ford for indirectly getting him injured and is taken by his father to bed. Back in the pier lab, McKay determines the containment device has two primary buttons: a setting to attract the creature and one to trap it. When Weir suggests that Rodney is sufficiently protected and should be the one to stay, the Ancient shield emitter deactivates and falls off. Sheppard suggests he go get a drink. He'll spring the trap himself. McKay eagerly departs.

Power to the city is cut off and the creature eagerly makes its way to Sheppard's location. Discovering the containment device is what it was attracted to, it takes one look at Sheppard and departs. It is obvious now that its more intelligent than anyone suspected. Teyla offers a thought that it might wish to leave the city, so a new plan is soon devised.

A naquadah generator is brought to the gate room with the intent of using it and an automated M.A.L.P. to lure the entity through the Stargate to the barren wasteland of M4X-337. When the generator activates the creature arrives, larger than ever before. It now spans the entire gate room. Power to the M.A.L.P. depletes before it can get through the Stargate. Out of options, McKay has a change of heart. He replaces the Ancient shield on his chest and walks into the blackness.

Inside large blue crystals, appearing in subatomic proportions, encircle him. He reaches the naquadah generator and tosses it through the gate, forcing the entity to follow, and is almost immediately rendered unconscious after the shield fails. After his team requests medical aid, they wake him and tell him that he succeeded.

1 - 4 THIRTY-EIGHT MINUTES

Jumper One returns to the Stargate on final approach, after having suffered an attack from several remaining Wraith on their homeworld. Major Sheppard is in critical condition, having been bitten in the neck by a paralyzing insect that refuses to let go. After opening the gate to Atlantis, Jumper One begins to make its way through the event horizon, but becomes lodged mid-way via a damaged starboard drive pod that did not retract. Power is cut inside the ship, and it is imminently clear that the team has 38 minutes to live before the gate automatically shuts down.

Once minimal power is restored people begin to move about within the jumper. Ford, who is retrieved from the front compartment via his un-dematerialized arm, reports back to base and gives Weir information concerning their new problem (including the fact that two officers, Malcolm and Stackhouse, are now dematerialized within the gate itself). He then gives a run-down of recent events:

Jumper One returned to the Wraith homeworld to gain reconnaissance on the species, but when they reached the surface they found the colony to be gone. In its place was an enormous crater, which was not created by an explosion. It is soon surmised that the colony was actually a hive ship that had existed there for so long trees and forest literally grew on top of it. The ship is supposedly now off culling planets and restoring their species to power.

Apparently not all Wraith abandoned the planet, as several warriors chased the unit back to the Jumper. Sheppard, however, became lodged in an enormous web where the giant insect bit him and began to disable his immune system. Even a single Wraith warrior was dissuaded from killing him after seeing what had already begun to sap away his life.

It was not long before everyone was back aboard the Jumper, and in a hasty retreat the craft's starboard drive pod was damaged by the Wraith.

Sheppard eventually regains consciousness and realizes that the team has not returned to Atlantis. McKay is busy taking readings of the ship. Back on Earth, an Apollo-13-style team has been assembled to try and analyze the problem from their end. Soon their best recommendation is clear: close the jumper's partition hatch and hope that atmosphere is maintained long enough to send a second jumper and tow them back when the gate finally disconnects, splitting the ship in two. McKay finally manages to close the partition, leaving everyone in the dark. Sheppard is beginning to lose feeling in his arms and legs, as well as patience with Rodney's mouth. Teyla tries to make John comfortable with a makeshift pillow as his condition worsens. Back at Atlantis, Dr. Zelenka and his team continue to work with a Jumper's computer pathways in the hopes of triggering (by accident) the appropriate command to close the drive pods.

Dr. Kavanaugh of the research team is only able to come up with more disturbing problems. If McKay continues to mess with the command pathways it is possible the drive pods could explode and send the end trails flaming back to Atlantis base. Weir is forced to point out, on more than one occasion, that she will not tolerate his attitude of self focus and preservation. Meanwhile, Dr. Zelenka has managed to isolate the drive pod control pathways, the data of which is transmitted to McKay, improving their odds of finding the correct switch from one in a million to one in a thousand.

Ford tries several backpack items on the creature attached to Sheppard, hoping it will loosen its grip, but nothing works. Saltwater particularly disturbs it and makes matters worse. For a moment Sheppard is unable to control himself and he violently buffets Ford into the wall of the craft. In shock, McKay accidentally hits the control board, forcing the jumper to slide in further -- and thus eliminate the hopes of using the second half of the ship as a lifeboat. Realizing more than ever that they will probably not survive, Sheppard tries to say something personal to Weir, but is interrupted by McKay's escalating concerns.

John begins to devise his own plan to remove the creature from his neck. If it is truly related to the Wraith, once he is dead it will stop feeding. If they cannot resuscitate him then he can go through the event horizon and essentially be preserved in a "deep freeze." After a short-lived debate, Ford uses the defibrillator and stops Sheppard's heart. Almost half a minute later the creature detaches. Ford takes it out with his nine millimeter. The defibrillator does not get John's heart going again, so Teyla takes him through the event horizon.

McKay manages to successfully close the drive pods, but with no forward momentum they will not go through the gate. Ford throws his weight into the forward bulkhead, to no avail. With moments before the gate powers down, Kavanaugh suggests opening the rear hatch and using the depressurization to push the ship through. Ford forces McKay to go through the gate as well. He depressurizes the ship himself and hangs on to the ceiling as the vessel finally completes its travel through the gate, winding up in Atlantis' gate room.

Ford is administered oxygen and Beckett begins work on the Major. Eventually Sheppard is resurrected. Back in the infirmary, Weir asks him what he was going to say to her -- she didn't want to hear it at the time, but is now curious. He refuses to give her an honest answer, and she concedes to his preference before wishing him a good night.

1 - 5 SUSPICION

The Atlantis base receives an intense radio transmission from Major Sheppard's team: they are fleeing from the Wraith back through the gate. Dr. Elizabeth Weir orders the shield protecting the Stargate to be lowered to allow the team safely through, and the gate room is riddled with energy blasts from Wraith weapons. The team comes through, but Dr. McKay is struck by one of the blasts before the shield can be raised again.

In the infirmary, Dr. Beckett tells McKay that he's going to be alright. The Wraith energy weapons are designed to immobilize their pray, not to kill targets. McKay will suffer some paralyses and is unable to talk, but the effects will wear off. Meanwhile, Weir confronts Sheppard with a suggestion that is now inescapable: His team has met the Wraith on five of their last nine missions. It's clear that they have a spy in their midst.

Sergeant Bates, once Colonel Sumner's right-hand man who has now been placed in charge of base security, joins the team in discussing the situation. Sheppard is put off by the fact that Teyla, his team's new Athosian member, was not invited to the briefing -- as is she, when she finds out about it. But Bates and Weir insist that no Athosian, even Teyla, is above suspicion. Sheppard is frustrated as Weir and Bates begin to conduct interviews with the Athosians.

Halling and the rest of the displaced tribe are offended by the accusatory nature of the questioning. They have lived in fear of the Wraith for generations, and there is no one among them who has not lost a loved one to the evil enemy. Halling himself has only tried to help their new allies from Earth, joining Sergeant Stackhouse's team and introducing them to some of the Athosians' trading partners. Despite Weir's attempts to diffuse the situation, the Athosians come to the conclusion that they are no longer welcome in Atlantis.

In the puddle jumper bay, Drs. McKay and Zelenka continue to study the Ancient ships. They accidentally trigger a command they haven't seen before in the ship's systems, and marvel as the ceiling of the massive bay retracts. Excited by the prospect of exploring the planet they now call home, Sheppard and Lieutenant Ford take a puddle jumper up. They make a quick discovery: There is a massive continent only 25 minutes away.

At Bates' suggestion, and over Sheppard's objection, Weir must consider the possibility of relocating the Athosians out of the city and to the land mass. She is somewhat surprised when Halling approaches her with the same idea, eager for his people to till the soil and make a life for themselves once again. Weir suggests that if they relocate the Athosians and the Wraith attacks stop, it will only prove that they have a spy in their midst. Halling suggests in turn that when the attacks continue, it will only prove their innocence. Weir agrees that it is the best solution for all parties, and the Athosians prepare to leave.

Teyla, however, comes to the difficult decisions to remain a part of the Atlantis team. She has never before been separated from her people, but Halling reassures her that it is the right decision. Visits will still be common, and Dr. Weir has arranged for communication with the new village.

With the Athosians safely relocated, Major Sheppard takes his team to explore a new planet. There they find ancient ruins marked with a language that is difficult to translate; the job would go much more quickly if they had help from the locals. Teyla warns John that they are a very shy people, who most likely went into hiding as soon as they came through the gate. He tells her to go and find them, sending Ford with her. But a little way off, Teyla tells Ford that his presence is likely keeping the natives from coming out of hiding. He agrees to let her carry on alone.

Shots ring out, and the team takes cover in the ruins as a group of Wraith emerge from the forest! Their position has been given away again. They retreat toward the gate, barely escaping the attack and asking for immediate permission to return to rescue Teyla and Ford. Weir refuses, and Sergeant Bates speculates that Teyla is certainly the traitor. When she radios that she is coming through with an unconscious Ford, Weir is uncertain about whether to continue trusting her. If she lowers the Stargate shield, a squad of Wraith could come through.

Weir lowers the shield, and Teyla drags Ford through. She is immediately surrounded and taken into custody by Bates, despite Sheppard's insistence that she has nothing to do with the constant Wraith attacks. Bates orders her possessions searched and examined by Dr. McKay -- who makes the discovery that explains their recent run of bad luck. Teyla's necklace, which Sheppard himself found in a cave on Athos and gave to her, contains a Wraith transmitter. His advanced genes had activated it when he touched it; Teyla had been giving them away, but without knowing it. McKay speculates that the Wraith must have devised technology that detected the Ancients when the two species were at war long ago, and Sheppard's Ancient-like DNA activated it.

Teyla is free from suspicion, and the necklace gives Sheppard an idea: They will use it to draw the Wraith and set a trap for them, in an attempt to capture one. Two teams set the trap on another planet, armed with tasers to shock a Wraith into submission. When a team of four Wraith are drawn there, they find their target -- but the soldier activates a self-destruct mechanism on his armor and explodes. Meanwhile, Teyla has chased down their leader and engaged him in combat, only to be defeated and pinned to the ground. Sheppard arrives before the creature can begin feeding upon her, shooting the Wraith with one of their own stunner weapons.

Back at Atlantis, the Wraith is put into a cell protected by an Ancient-created shield. Major Sheppard speaks with him briefly, and is unimpressed with the Wraith's threats: by capturing him and holding him there, the humans have only hastened their impending doom.

1 - 6 CHILDHOOD'S END

While on a survey mission to an unexplored world Major John Sheppard and his team detect a large power source emanating from the surface. When they move their Puddle Jumper in to investigate the entire ship loses power, forcing them to crash.

When Dr. McKay gets hold of Lieutenant Ford's compass he soon deduces the disturbance that forced them to land is electromagnetic. It would explain why all of the technology is inoperable, not just the Jumper. If they can localize it, they can shut off the power source and take off, preventing a long trek back to the Stargate.

The team enters an open area filled with ancient ruins, but before they can explore they are ambushed by a pack of children armed with bows and arrows. Once the team puts their weapons down the leader tells them that they must see the elders immediately. Sheppard and the group are led to a village in the treetops. On the ground is a Wraith warrior and the remains of his Dart. Several technological components still appear to be intact.

They are instructed to climb into the huts high in the trees to meet the elders. Their leader, Keras, is only 24. He explains that his people's ancestors secured protection from the Wraith by taking their own lives just before they reach the age of 25, ensuring safe passage into the "eternal rest." The Wraith have not returned since. The reason they don't land beyond the shield and take the village by foot is because even their rifles don't work. Besides, there are plenty more worlds far easier to pick on.

Keras designates two of his tribe to travel back with Ford and McKay to the ancient city. In the meantime, Sheppard can't help but ask himself if there is another way other than suicide. It is then that Keras tells him that tomorrow he will be 25. Tonight he will die.

Ares, Keras' second, begins discussing plans with other villages that he will kill the team if the "full-grown" have not departed by nightfall. He believes the safety of their people may depend on it. Back at the ancient city, McKay has discovered the source of the field generator: a Zero Point Module. He disables it and is instantly able to communicate with Sheppard, asking to return the device to Atlantis for further analysis. But Teyla believes it is the only thing truly protecting the tribes from the Wraith. Unbeknownst to the team, not only have the Earth devices returned to normal, but the Wraith artifacts as well ...

Back at Atlantis, Dr. Weir cannot believe that McKay has returned with the Z.P.M. He is now suggesting that they uproot all of the tribes and bring them back to Atlantis to settle on the mainland -- all so that Atlantis can have the device. Weir says there is a good possibility that when the Z.P.M. went on-line the sacrifices may have started around the same time, suggesting that the two defenses may not be so disconnected as everyone currently believes.

Soon McKay learns M7G-677's electromagnetic field gives the Z.P.M. strength to power the field -- it will be of little use to Atlantis. It can only protect a certain radius, which explains the reason behind the suicides: population control to keep all persons blanketed by the field. Weir orders the Z.P.M. returned to the planet. Back at the village, Keras requests that Sheppard stand and be witness to his cleansing ceremony in preparation for his coming sacrifice.

In the midst of the proceedings, Sheppard notices that a Wraith bracelet is glowing with an active transmitter. He breaks from the crowd and rips the bony arm from the warrior, shooting the device until it stops blinking. Meanwhile, when McKay hurries to get the Z.P.M. online again, he puts it in its slot. It does not activate. Ares demands that the full-grown depart immediately, as they've had plenty of time to repair their vessel. Keras offers to take them back to the Stargate and then return to complete the ceremony.

Sheppard, Teyla and Keras meet up at McKay and Ford's coordinates and explain the situation to him, who first does not believe that this "shield" has been saving his people from the Wraith. They do not have much time to fix the shield, as Ares' hunting parties will soon be approaching to ensure they make it to the gate. When they catch up, Sheppard insists that they were saying goodbye to Keras, and that McKay is waiting back at the Jumper. In fact, he's in the brush trying to fix the Z.P.M.

The entire hunting party, including Keras and Ares, escort Sheppard, Teyla and Ford back to the Jumper. Just then, a Wraith probe appears in the air and scans the Ancient craft, departing before they can shoot it down with their P-90s. McKay is obviously nowhere to be found. Ares is assured, now more than ever, that the full-grown have brought this down upon their people. He orders Neleus to take two tribesmen and retrieve McKay.

Neleus returns to the ancient city and finds McKay tweaking the Z.P.M. Just as he works, the Wraith probe appears overhead, distracting them. McKay completes his adjustments and activates the device, forcing the probe to fall from the sky. Neleus and his men are now convinced that the device works and hurries off to inform Ares.

Ares, now impatient, has ordered the archers to raise their bows. Keras defends Sheppard by blocking him but is hit in the chest by an arrow. Just as the other archers ready to kill the full-grown, Neleus and his hunting party arrives and tells Ares that the device is real; it took the "Wraith bird" out of the sky. Sheppard has the med kit from the Jumper be retrieved so that they can fix Keras' wound.

McKay has managed to extend the range of the shield by 50 percent, giving the population plenty of room to grow. It's safe to say that Keras will be a grandfather by the time the Z.P.M. finally gives out, but Sheppard promises his team will check in on them from time to time just to be sure. They give Keras an M.R.E. as a birthday present, which he shares with his villagers as the jumper departs.

1 - 7 POISONING THE WELL

Major Sheppard's team have been visiting the planet Hoff for a day and a half, and have seen technology reminiscent of Earth's 1920's. Once Chancellor Druhin and his people begin to trust the off-worlders, they reveal their most prized discovery -- a chemical defense that they believe will prevent the Wraith from absorbing the life energy of any human who takes it.

Dr. Weir is informed of the Hoffan chemical, and thinks that if the entire civilization is committed to succeeding in developing a viable antidote against Wraith cullings, Atlantis should help in whatever way possible. Sheppard enlists Dr. Beckett's aid and returns to Hoff. After looking over their work, the team meets Perna, one of the lead scientists responsible for developing the drug. Beckett is immediately captivated by her. She explains the origins of the original anti-Wraith prototype drug. Apparently they've been working for more than 150 years, surviving over three cullings, storing archives of their knowledge (floors and floors of books) deep inside their planet. If one is destroyed, the other archives survive to carry on the works of past generations.

Beckett is more surprised than anyone, but he believes that it's time Atlantis helps the Hoffans carry the drug to the next level. He tells Dr. Weir, saying he has already informed the Hoffans of the "guest" in the brig. Meanwhile, Sheppard talks to the Wraith captive, nicknamed "Steve," inquiring as to how many Wraith hive ships are floating about the galaxy. Steve says that the information they are looking for is only one human away -- if he gets fed ...

Beckett admits he has only experimented on the Wraith arm the team brought back from Athos. But because those cells have already decayed he will require completely active cells. Steve's prison cell is opened, and a Wraith rifle is used to take him down, so that Beckett can get the material he needs. He then returns to Hoff to continue his work with Perna. After five results they arrive at 100 percent cell penetration. All outcomes are nothing short of perfect. There is now a definite hope for a defense against the Wraith.

Beckett is alarmed when he learns Druhin and Perna are eager to take the next step -- they want to use the drug on Steve.

Dr. Weir talks the matter over with Sheppard. They are talking putting a human in the same room as a starving Wraith. The Geneva Convention would never have allowed this, but Sheppard reminds her that if the Wraith had attended the convention, they would have tried to feed on everyone. The Hoffan test subject who has volunteered for the experiment is terminally ill. Eventually, Weir consents. Sheppard approaches Steve and tells him that if he gives him information of value, he'll allow him to eat. Steve agrees. He is soon bound and taken by Jumper to Hoff.

Meril, the terminally-ill test subject, has long been at peace with his fate, and is ready to face the Wraith. Injected with the drug, he enters Steve's new chamber and faces him. When the creature places his palm on his chest he quickly removes it. Meril survives, and Steve's condition begins to worsen almost immediately. Meanwhile, Druhin congratulates Perna and Beckett. He is eager to administer the drug to the entire population, but Carson cautions that several tests must still be run before that can happen.

Steve soon dies. Beckett determines that the Hoffman serum not only shields the victim from culling, but it is now clear that the antidote is transferred into the Wraith. Essentially, Steve was poisoned. All of his vital organs shut down simultaneously. If the serum was indeed the cause, not only is it a defense -- but a weapon. Teyla and Sheppard approach Druhin with this information. When the Wraith discover the danger, they will wipe the Hoffans from existence, as well as anyone they have been in contact with, just to prevent fruition of the drug. But it's too late. The Chancellor has already made his recommendations to the Hoffman council: the serum is being inoculated into the population.

Perna tells Beckett that Meril has been found dead. The cause is still unknown. Beckett urges her to cease the inoculations, but she admits that she cannot be a part of it -- she herself was among the first to be given the drug.

Soon the hospitals are overwhelmed with patients. Fifty percent of those inoculated are dying. To Sheppard's dismay, Druhin believes these are perfectly good odds, and says the entire population is going to take a vote on whether or not to administer the drug to everyone. Sheppard cannot believe what he's hearing, but is assured the word of the Chancellor that everyone will have a say, and the majority will win victory in the decision. Meanwhile Teyla informs Carson of bad news: Perna has become one of the sick. Beckett goes to her deathbed. Perna assures him she will die with peace -- they have accomplished the unthinkable, and she has no regrets. Beckett stays at her side until she passes away.

The results of the vote are in. 96 percent of the Hoffans are in favor of disseminating the drug among their people, no matter what the cost. Druhin says that when next Sheppard's team returns, they'd like to discuss plans for passing the drug to all the worlds in the Pegasus galaxy, but John believes that no one will be around when they come back.

1 - 8 UNDERGROUND

Food shortages are becoming an issue on Atlantis. TeylaA> offers a viable trading partner: the Genii, a people of farmers and fair traders. Dr. Weir gives the trade mission a go. Teyla introduces her team to Tyrus and his daughter Sora, who offer to take the team to their leader, Cowen, to commence negotiations for trade. When Major Sheppard and the others travel far enough ahead, Tyrus activates a piece of technology concealed beneath his arm. "I'm bringing them in," he says. "All operations to silent." Sheppard and the team are introduced to Cowen, who says that they can supply medicine, but food will be an issue. If they give too much, the Genii themselves will not survive the winter. Tilling land is complicated. Therefore, Sheppard offers C-4, plus a demonstration, showing how the weapon can take out tree stumps and the like. Cowen is immediately convinced and asks for trade to commence immediately: explosives for as much food and medicine as Atlantis requires. Sheppard takes this news back to headquarters. Dr. Weir is hesitant to become arms dealers, and is also concerned that Sheppard agreed to terms she hadn't yet approved, but eventually she gives the trade a go.

Back on the planet, the harvest celebration has commenced. As Sheppard and Dr. McKay return, they find themselves lost without a guide. Rodney detects a radioactive signal, and admits that on an Amish world, this is unusual. They move to investigate and soon uncover a massive underground facility. Three guards quickly capture and detain them. McKay theorizes that the Genii exist as two separate cultures, but that is quickly thrown aside as Cowen appears in full military uniform. Meanwhile, Teyla and Ford sense something is afoot. When they try to step outside Soren says there is a Wraith ship in the area, and everyone must remain indoors.

Cowen is convinced that, for Teyla Emmagan to join them, Sheppard's people must have far more sophisticated defenses besides C-4. Sheppard goes out on a limb and says they're looking for allies against the Wraith -- offering a stronger trade. Cowen soon agrees and orders Teyla (who is as surprised as the others) and Ford brought to the bunker. Cowen explains that the "farmer" appearance on the surface is a front to prevent more attraction by the Wraith. In secrecy they have been attempting to develop weaponry that they, one day, hope will help defeat them.

McKay is allowed to examine the Genii atomic technology. He determines that Earth is roughly sixty years ahead of them, but their uranium purification is insufficient. To change this, Cowen soon agrees to an alliance with Atlantis. He says they are preparing to launch their first atomic weapon in five years, but soon discovers that because the Atlanteans woke the Wraith, they will not have that much time. Enraged, Cowen declares Sheppard's team will be put on the surface to die by the Wraith -- after all useful information has been extracted from them. But Sheppard assures him that Atlantis has space ships fully capable of combating them, and that their alliance should not be so quickly tossed aside.

Cowen introduces Sheppard's unit to a Wraith data device that was uncovered from a dart they once shot down. The device contains coordinates to a sleeping hive ship. If the Wraith are indeed in no hurry to conquer the galaxy (as "Steve" once said) the vessel might still be there. If they access the database with the device the two peoples can learn the location of all the hive ships, not to mention their numbers.

Back at Atlantis, Weir immediately refuses the mission. After all, the Genii were just about ready to put the team under lock and key. Sheppard assures her he wouldn't be putting his team at risk if he didn't believe they could work with the Genii to obtain the valuable data. Sheppard returns to the planet with a Puddle Jumper, and soon preparations begin for an assault. The mission is to gain access to the ship's data core -- not to destroy the craft itself -- and extract as much information as possible.

Sheppard pilots the Jumper to the Wraith ship, telling Cowen that this craft is the only one Atlantis is equipped with. Once inside, Teyla and Tyrus break off from the group while the others infiltrate the core. Teyla finds a living person among the harvested bodies, but Tyrus refuses to allow her to help the man for fear that the Wraith will be alerted. Instead Tyrus kills the captive to keep him silent, attracting Wraith warriors to the scene. As Teyla escapes, they fire their rifles at Tyrus, paralyzing him. Meanwhile, Sheppard, Cowen and the others are successful at penetrating the data core, and they return to the Jumper, minus Tyrus, to depart.

When they return to the Genii planet, Cowen turns their weapons on Sheppard's team, snatching away the Wraith data device. Sora is beside herself, believing Teyla was responsible for her father's death. Just as the Genii think they have the advantage, two additional Jumpers disengage their cloaking shields in mid air, weapons at the ready. Sheppard takes back the data device and peacefully departs with his crew.

Back on Atlantis, Grodin determines there are at least 21 hive ships in Atlantis' quadrant of space alone, with as few as 60 ships in the entire galaxy. There is more data, but it will take time to decrypt. Aside from making a new enemy, this valuable intelligence was obtained. Sheppard only hopes the hive ships don't all come at once.

1 - 9 HOME

Dr. McKay convinced Major Sheppard to send the team to M5S-224, believing energy readings showed evidence of civilization -- but the only thing present is atmosphere that resembles fog (though it is not water vapor). As they dial the Stargate back to Atlantis, McKay takes readings and discovers the gate is actually drawing its power from the mist. With this much potential power, it'd be enough to dial back to Earth.

Dr. Weir listens to the team's incredible findings. McKay offers to return to 224 with the control crystal that will make the Dial-Home Device there compatible to return to Earth. He and Lieutenant Ford go back to the planet to install the modification, and soon report back with success. Dr. Weir, Sheppard, McKay, Ford and Teyla are present when they raise Stargate Command. Sergeant Harriman reports that the Asgard are in the process of installing Prometheus with engines capable of crossing galactic distances -- if they come home now, they could be back inside a month.

Weir and McKay are soon debriefing General Hammond. When he is informed of the threat of the Wraith he is eager to tell the pentagon that it is important to withdraw from the Pegasus Galaxy. Weir is insistent on returning, however, stating that the technological advancements alone that Pegasus could offer, not to mention the responsibility Atlantis has because of reawakening the Wraith, are reasons enough to return and remain. Meanwhile, Sheppard takes Teyla on a shopping spree and Dr. McKay returns to his apartment to pig out.

After the debriefing, Dr. Weir returns to Simon's home, more than eager to be back with him and her dog Sedge for a short time. He gives her a necklace as a welcome-home present, but is soon summoned away by General Hammond. At McKay's house she reports that there has been an accident on Prometheus. They won't be able to return to Atlantis. McKay has not given up, though. He reports to Hammond with a plan to gate back to M5S-224, believing that after 3.5 microseconds of use from the depleted Z.P.M. the energy source on 224 will take over and maintain the wormhole (akin to making a long distance call and having the recipient accept the charges).

Weir asks Hammond for permission to contact the Asgard and ask for one of their ships, but Hammond assures her that when such a thing is possible they will contact Earth. She returns to Simon's side, who asks her if it would really be so bad to stay home, but Weir feels guilty for not having Sheppard take her place and return instead ...

Later, Weir learns from Hammond that McKay is succeeding in his experiments to reopen the gate from their end. After that is done, a reinforced military team, and a new commander, will travel to Atlantis. Weir is not to go back to the city. Sheppard, who successfully dialed in from his end about an hour ago, agrees. Weir does not believe it is possible that Sheppard would make such a decision without at least consulting her first. Meanwhile, Ford receives new marching orders from Sergeant Harriman: he's to report back to Antarctica for his new assignment and give up on any chance to return to Atlantis.

Sheppard takes Teyla to his house in the Green Moss Park area, introducing her to beer. Soon he wants to leave and show her more of his world. Teyla suggests he might enjoy spending time at home and visiting with friends. As soon as John thinks it's a good idea, his buddies, Mitch and Dex, show up at his door. Soon more people arrive and a party begins to brew. Ford eventually shows up with a dozen pizzas.

Weir visits McKay, still distraught that she has been suspended from her duties. He tries to help her see the up side of the situation. She can now get on with her life with Simon, whom she does not remember ever telling him about.

McKay is visited by Dr. Weir, hoping to determine why he is so upset. He tries to explain to her that the laws of physics seem to no longer apply. He even shatters the Z.P.M. and finds nothing at the core but shards of colored glass.

Sheppard is sharing memories with his old friends to the rest of the crowd regarding their missions in Afghanistan, until out of nowhere, he declares that they were killed just outside of Kabul. He grabs a gun and shoots Dex in the chest, then holds the gun against the entire room.

Just before Weir is about to crack, she and McKay are visited by General Hammond. McKay disappears and Hammond insists there is no need to further delude her mind with fantasies. He temporarily changes shape into a gaseous form, not unlike that of M5S-224. He then tells her that the others are in their own illusory worlds on 224, having never made it back to Earth.

The entity posing as Hammond unites the fantasies together, allowing the team to share the reality of the S.G.C. Gate Room as he explains. The mist is alive, and his kind occupies it in a non-corporeal form. To gate back to the Milky Way galaxy would have required such a power drain that millions of its kind would have been destroyed. Weir and the others will have to live out their lives in a fantasy of their choosing. McKay soon speaks up, saying that their human forms require food and water, but the Hammond entity says they had better enjoy themselves with the little time they have left.

The team insists that others will come to discover what has become of them. Millions more within the mist will die. Weir gives the creature her word that they will return to Atlantis and never come back. With access to their minds, the being knows they are being truthful.

The entity allows the team to reawaken. McKay begins to work on disconnecting the eighth-chevron crystal so the team may return home. To Atlantis.

1 - 10 THE STORM

Sheppard and Teyla have taken a Puddle Jumper on a course for the mainland. Cruising at a relatively high altitude, they encounter a storm front that stretches across the entire horizon. Sheppard takes the Jumper into space to better analyze the storm. Not only does it take up twenty percent of the planet's surface, but its heading for both the Athosian mainland and Atlantis.

Back at the city, Drs. McKay and Zelenka discuss the problem. The weather pattern is actually two storms converging and combining power. Without the shield off, Atlantis is incredibly brittle. Winds will cause massive structural damage and flooding could sink the city. There is simply not enough power to activate it. In twelve hours the storm front will hit.

Weir instructs Sheppard to take Ford and find a world that will be willing to put up with a hundred squatters for two days. They travel to Manara and grudgingly reach a tentative arrangement with Smeadon, insuring that their generosity will not be forgotten. After they depart, Smeadon takes a Genii communicator from a drawer and prepares to transmit a message to Cowen ("Underground").

McKay and Zelenka believe they have arrived at a plan, which they present to Weir. Atlantis has many lightning rods channeled into four grounding stations. Typically when lightning strikes the city it is channeled back into the ocean via the stations. If the rods are disabled the energy from the lightning could be channeled to generate the shield bubble. Several corridors are lined with a super-conductive material, indicating this to be the reason. Still, everyone would need to evacuate, as only the control room would be safe, but Atlantis would survive. Weir encourages them to double their efforts.

A man faces off, defenseless, against three Genii armed with staffs. One of them is Sora. Just as he finishes disabling her, the last to stand, he is stopped by a young soldier who identifies the remaining combatant as Commander Colya. Cowen wishes to see him immediately. It is obvious that Cowen has been informed that Atlantis will soon be evacuated, and asks Colya to ready his strike force to place the Genii flag in the city after it is emptied.

Back in the mainland, Teyla, Ford and Beckett are awaiting the arrival of an Athosian hunting party. To go after them would be impossible. The storm will soon be upon them, but Ford decides to keep waiting.

With Atlantis evacuated (save for two soldiers and the command team), the Athosians have joined the humans on Maniaria. Smeadon dines with one of the Athosians, getting him so drunk that Sora and Colya enter and capture his I.D.C., eventually forcing him to agree to get them through the shield that protects Atlantis.

McKay delegates grounding stations to the three who remain. He will deactivate station one; Weir, station two; Sheppard, stations three and four. McKay and Weir are done before John reaches his first station. Rodney instructs him on how to disconnect the halves of the grounding rods. Sheppard is soon successful. Just then, the soldiers guarding the gate report to Weir that an incoming party from Manaria contains injured Athosians. With an Athosian I.D.C., they lower the shield. Soon Colya and his men enter through the gate and kill both guards. Colya orders the gate room secured. Soon he is introducing himself to Weir and McKay and tells them that he is now in control of Atlantis.

Sheppard, overhearing the entire conversation via active comm channels, hurries to the Jumper bay to communicate with Ford's team. He is surprised to learn that they are still in the mainland, but also frustrated that he's not going to receive backup. Still, he encourages them to stay put until the storm has passed.

Colya's demands are simple. He wants all of the C-4, medical supplies, a Puddle Jumper and the Wraith data device and his team will leave without incident -- or so he says. Sheppard, who has overheard this, immediately goes and hides the explosives. Meanwhile, McKay is left alone with Colya, whose men holds the squeamish scientist captive with a knife.

Weir returns and finds McKay's arm bleeding heavily. He says he caved, but it is not clear what information he has given out. Meanwhile, the soldiers return with no C-4; only a walkie-talkie with Sheppard on the other end, saying Colya will never locate the explosives. But Colya is aware of the plan to save Atlantis. He tells Sheppard to uncouple the final grounding rod and make it so the shield will work, and Colya will allow them to leave peacefully. "Atlantis will be ours or the oceans," he says.

Weir attempts to dissuade Colya from what he is doing, ensuring that the descendants of the Ancients are the ones who are meant to use Atlantis to destroy the Wraith, but Colya is amazed by her arrogance, believing his people may be equally -- or more -- close to the ancestry of the Ancestors. He intends to use Atlantis himself to destroy the Wraith.

Sheppard arrives at the fourth grounding rod and uses an Ancient scanner to locate the two Genii soldiers in hiding, killing them and evening the score. But in the firefight one of the soldiers has destroyed the grounding controls. There is now no way to separate the rod, and Atlantis is doomed. Colya is not finished, though. He tells Sheppard that he's going to shoot Dr. Weir. Sheppard warns that he will destroy the city if that happens, but Colya knows that two command codes are required. As Sheppard begins to bargain, Colya raises his weapon against her.

Lt. Aiden Ford and his team open fire on the group of Wraith that have surrounded them on a city balcony. Both sides effectively neutralize each other until only Ford and a Wraith warrior are left standing. It takes him into its clutches and begins to feed on his life force, but a downed soldier releases a grenade at the Wraith, forcing both it and Ford to plummet over the balcony and into the ocean. Meanwhile, Sheppard steers his Puddle Jumper into the launch bay of one of the attacking hive ships, and moments later it is destroyed. Atlantis detects the presence of another ship, and soon they receive a communiqué from Sheppard -- who has survived the blast. The Earth ship Daedalus has arrived and used its Asgard transporter to beam Sheppard to their ship. Its commander, Colonel Steven Caldwell, orders their energized Z.P.M. to be transported to Atlantis so McKay can re-engage the city's powerful shields. The Daedalus enters battle with the Wraith.

McKay is assigned two soldiers to ensure that he reaches the Z.P.M. chamber, but en route they are attacked by two Wraith warriors. McKay is left alone, face-to-face with a Wraith -- but Teyla eliminates them and offers to protect him the rest of the way.

Aboard the Daedalus, conventional weapons are unable to reach the hive ships before they are intercepted. Colonel Caldwell orders Dr. Novak and the Daedalus's resident Asgard engineer, Hermiod, to use Asgard technology to beam warheads into the hive ships. The Asgard expressly prohibited the use of their technology in this manner, but since Hermiod is at the controls, he consents to bypass the restriction and transport the weapon anyway.

The third Wraith hive ship is destroyed and the Wraith cruisers flee into hyperspace. The remaining Darts regroup to make a kamikaze run down to Atlantis at ballistic speeds, but McKay applies the Z.P.M. to the Atlantis generators in time to raise the shield, protecting the city from the collisions.

Major Sheppard returns to Atlantis with reinforcements to clean up the remaining Wraith on the ground. Colonel Everett requests to speak with him in the medical bay. It is clear that a Wraith had begun to feed on him, as he has aged some 20 years in appearance. He now admits that Sheppard made the right decision in killing Colonel Sumner, who had been in the hungry clutches of the Wraith Keeper. Everett wishes that Sheppard had been there for him, too.

With Ford still missing, Sheppard orders Dr. Zelenka to extend the sensors to search beyond the city's perimeter. Ford's signal is located, and the Daedalus transports him to the infirmary -- with the Wraith still attached to him. Dr. Beckett reports that he was lying face-down in the freezing water for over an hour. The sudden death of the Wraith pumped the complete supply of its life-sustaining enzyme (which Wraith inject into their prey to boost the person's strength, in order to keep him alive longer and get more out of him) into Ford's body, allowing him to survive. Now Ford has become dependent on the enzyme, but Beckett believes he can gradually wean him off of it.

With Atlantis's long-range sensors back online, 12 more hive ships are detected on the way. They will be in range in 36 hours. Weir orders Sheppard and the Daedalus to intercept them at their next hyperspace stop. With the element of surprise and an armory of nuclear warheads, they are able to destroy two of the ships before the Wraith find a way to block the Asgard beams. Ten capital ships remain. Outgunned, the Daedalus makes a run for Atlantis.

Ford returns to Atlantis's command center hoping to resume his duties, but Dr. Beckett insists that he be taken back to the infirmary. In a fit of rage, Ford grabs Beckett by the neck and pins him to the wall. He soon realizes that he needs to be under medical supervision. Teyla escorts him back. They soon determine the enzyme has begun to alter his brain chemistry; but Ford hears every word as they make plans to wean him from the drug and reinforce security.

The Daedalus lands on Atlantis's east pier to undergo repairs under the protection of the city's shields, just as the hive ships emerge from hyperspace and begin bombarding the city with weapons fire. Meanwhile, Ford escapes from the infirmary with the supply of Wraith enzyme Beckett has harvested from Wraith corpses to help wean the Lieutenant off his addiction. The enzyme acts like a steroid, making Ford stronger and more aggressive.

The group is assembled to ascertain the situation, and they realize that the Wraith won't stop coming even if this fleet could be destroyed. But if the Wraith believed Atlantis had been destroyed, they would leave the planet alone. McKay proposes the Daedalus detonate a nuclear warhead right above the city's shields. Then a Puddle Jumper's cloaking shield will replace the shield of Atlantis; while the Wraith's sensors are blinded from the explosion, the cloak will engage. The Wraith will believe the city has been annihilated. Teyla will further reinforce this ploy by linking to the Wraith telepathically, sharing their intentions to destroy the city.

The plan is put in motion, and Teyla is successful in communicating their fake plans. The ships cease fire. The Daedalus launches the weapon; it detonates, and Atlantis cloaks.

Meanwhile, Sheppard learns of Ford's situation and tracks him down. The Lieutenant doesn't believe that the others are trying to help him, and thinks that they are afraid of him and only want to change him back. Ford doesn't even slow down when Sheppard shoots him with a Wraith stunner, and escapes in a transport chamber. He punches out Zelenka and commandeers a Puddle Jumper using it to activate the Stargate and depart Atlantis.

The Wraith fleet breaks orbit, convinced that Atlantis has been destroyed. The plan was successful and, for the time being, the city is safe.

2 - 2 THE INTRUDER

Atlantis's senior staff and several other members of the expedition return to Earth through their Z.P.M.-powered Stargate. While there, new personnel is assigned to the distant base, and some unresolved matters are resolved. Simon reveals to Elizabeth Weir that he has met someone else. John Sheppard meets with Ford's family and explains the situation as best he can with the information blackout, and soon he is promoted to Lieutenant Colonel to lead Atlantis's military contingent -- despite the objections of a very irritated Colonel Caldwell, commander of the Daedalus.

Sixteen days into their return trip to Pegasus aboard the Daedalus, Sheppard and Weir find themselves keeping each other company in the morning hours. But their peace is interrupted by a report that Dr. Monroe has been killed. With burn marks on his fingertips, it's logical to believe he received a fatal jolt from his station. He had been running a routine diagnostic, but just before he was killed it's possible all power was rerouted in the section (killing cameras and doors) to give him the jolt that did it. Still the circumstances look suspicious.

After a public confrontation regarding procedure, Colonel Caldwell pulls Weir aside to remind her of the chain of command. But she knows exactly what he's frustrated about: he did not want to command the Daedalus, but to preside over the military contingent on Atlantis.

McKay analyzes the section Monroe had been working in and discovers that the doctor was busily trying to initialize certain security protocols that would shut down corrupted programs. Apparently there is a problem with the ship, and it could be that someone killed Monroe to cover it up. Caldwell orders an immediate drop from hyperspace.

When McKay and crewman Lindstrom attempt to trace the power spike, a coolant leak erupts in the room, forcing both men to evacuate. With Lindstrom trapped in a decompression chamber, the doors mysteriously open and he is sucked into space. McKay argues that no one could have determined where the men had been and what they were doing at that exact moment -- indicating that none of the crew is a saboteur.

Asgard crewmember Hermiod has done some searching through the systems himself, and has uncovered the problem: An artificial intelligence virus has infected the ship's systems. There is evidence of it in Navigation, Communications, and Propulsion -- and the virus is spreading, rewriting itself as it grows. McKay soon makes an even more disturbing discover: the virus is Wraith.

He explains to the others that it was most likely transmitted in a compressed format and took some time to unfold and spread (since it has been some two months since the ship's last encounter with a Wraith ship). Plus the fact that the Daedalus has now returned to Wraith feeding grounds has likely activated it. It is programmed to take control of the ship and fly the Daedalus into Wraith territory, giving them access to its intergalactic hyperdrive technology ... and the coordinates to Earth.

The Daedalus begins broadcasting an unauthorized distress call. Without enough control to guide the ship to them, the virus is calling the Wraith. A complete systems shut down could take up to two hours, giving the Wraith plenty of time to learn the ship's position. Caldwell agrees to send Sheppard out in an F-302, where he physically destroys the communications array. The signal can no longer be broadcast.

His mission successful, Sheppard tries to return the craft to the hangar bay, but the ship has its own plans. The virus has uploaded itself into the F-302 and is flying him away from the ship. McKay extends the Asgard transporter beam to lock on to his radio signal and transports Sheppard back to the bridge, leaving the fighter out in space.

The crew now has time to perform a complete systems restart. But when the systems come back online, the virus copies itself from an unknown source back into the systems. What's worse, it sets a course for the nearest star's chromosphere, which will keep the ship intact for the Wraith but kill everyone on board.

McKay recalls a mission report of an incident where Stargate Command was overrun by an alien computer virus ("Entity"). It uploaded itself into a M.A.L.P. to stay alive during a system restore. Except, in this case, the virus has copied itself into potentially all of the Daedalus's F-302s. McKay proposes they manually disconnect all of the ships' memory boards to prevent the virus from using them as lifeboats.

After the virus tries to shut them out of the hangar bay, Hermod beams Sheppard and McKay directly there. The virus opens the bay doors, but Hermod manages to raise the forcefield. It will only be a matter of time before the shield is taken over by the virus and the bay loses atmosphere. Sheppard and McKay manage to remove all the memory drives and get into the last F-302 before the bay decompresses.

With minutes until lethal radiation exposure, the crew initiates another shut down. Once again, it does not work. Sheppard realizes they missed a computer -- the one belonging to the F-302 left in space. The virus is still in control of that fighter, and it has been tracking them all along. He and McKay take their ship out to confront it, and it pursues. Dipping deeper into the coronosphere, Sheppard destroys the opposing craft. After one more shut down, the crew regains control of the ship.

The team makes their return to Atlantis, where Teyla reports that there has been no sign of the Wraith in the weeks they have been away. Apparently they still believe Atlantis was destroyed. Weir and the staff are eager to get back to work.

2 - 3 RUNNER

Atlantis officers patrolling P3M-736 report finding a dead Wraith. The enzyme sack in the right arm has been removed. Sheppard immediately suspects Ford and orders a mission to investigate. Before departure Colonel Caldwell reminds Sheppard that Ford is a security threat. If the opportunity arises the Colonel should deal with him.

It is nightfall when the Jumper arrives. The lifesigns detector is not functional. Sheppard separates the team in a search pattern. Soon he and Teyla find the location where the Wraith was slain. She locates where the brush has recently been disturbed and they follow the path in that direction.

Major Lorne and McKay begin to pursue a suspect at about the same time Sheppard and Teyla are in pursuit of one of their own. Teyla is stunned to the ground, and Sheppard is soon taken down as well.

When they wake, they are bound together at the mouth of a cave. A large, powerful man has captured them. Sheppard's weapon pointed in their faces, he shares his name and rank. "Specialist Ronon Dex," replies the man.

In the morning Lorne and McKay continue their search for Ford. Fifteen minutes into the patrol Lorne is stunned by a Wraith pistol wielded by Ford, who takes Rodney with him so they can "catch up" while on their way to save Sheppard and Teyla from Ronon.

Ford had been scouting a planet where a Wraith hive ship had landed. Seeing a Wraith commander detach from the main group, he chose to follow the creature through the Stargate. This led him to 736. The commander was hunting Ronon, but Ford killed him for his enzyme.

Still holding the pistol at his captives, Ronon explains that the Wraith hunt him for game. He can't stay in one place for too long because they have installed a tracking transmitter in his back. Sheppard insists that Dr. Beckett would have a good chance of removing the transmitter. Eventually Ronon agrees to trade the surgery for recapturing Ford himself.

Sheppard returns from Atlantis with Dr. Beckett who locates the transmitter in his back. He insists Ronon lie down and take a sedative to sleep, since he will be cutting very close to his spinal chord, but Ronon insists to do the procedure sitting and awake. He manages to remove it, and shortly afterward Ronon falls unconscious.

Ford passes McKay a gun and goes hunting for Lorne and another SF who has come in pursuit. When the men find McKay, Ford stuns them from behind. Rodney insists he has had enough and is going to take Aiden back to the Jumper, but Ford doesn't believe he'll hurt him. McKay shoots him in his left shoulder. Seeing the look on Ford's face, he runs in the opposite direction.

Beckett has deactivated the transmitter just as they hear McKay firing his weapon, screaming for help. The Stargate is activated and three Wraith Darts emerge. McKay is caught in one of Ronon's traps and hoisted into a tree. When Ford catches up he is fully prepared to execute the doctor, but Ronon arrives and turns the tide. A knife fight ensues, but Sheppard arrives to stop it. Ford turns and flees.

Sheppard chases him to the culling beam. Realizing there is no other way off the planet, Ford swears that he'll show them all that he's OK -- better than OK -- and runs headlong into the beam.

Sheppard takes Dex back to Atlantis, and when he has news brings him to the control room. They have sent a M.A.L.P. to his homeworld, Sateda, but it does not appear that anyone survived the last attack. Ronon no longer has a home to which he can return.

A large team from Atlantis is exploring a recently culled world when a Wraith Dart makes its presence known, humming overhead in the distance. Lieutenant Laura Cadman, a security officer patrolling with Dr. McKay and Dr. Beckett, radios an alert to Colonel Sheppard's team. In the sprint back to the Stargate McKay and Cadman are swept up in the Dart's culling beam.

Sheppard's team makes it back to the Stargate. Major Lorne fires an anti-tank missile at the Dart, but the shot hits a tree. Sheppard takes his turn and neutralizes the threat, plowing the ship into the landscape. When Beckett reaches it the cockpit bubble deactivates, and as the Wraith inside attempts to reach for the self-destruct Sheppard kills him.

Sheppard orders Dr. Zelenka to the site in the hopes of extracting the officers from their state in the Dart's data storage. When he arrives, Zelenka realizes there is only enough power to reinstate one of them, but there is no way to tell which because they are merely life-sign blips. Sheppard picks one, and out emerges McKay, who immediately falls unconscious.

McKay and the Dart are brought back to Atlantis. Rodney remains unconscious while Zelenka and his team work to reverse-engineer a stable power transformer for the ship. Eventually he wakes up on his own, and it isn't long before he and Beckett realize a serious problem. Cadman's body may still be trapped inside the Dart, but her consciousness is sharing McKay's body. Rodney isn't aware of her thoughts, but her voice is loud and clear in his head.

When McKay goes to check up on Zelenka and his work Cadman pounds questions between his ears, forcing him to lash out ... apparently at no one in the room. Concerned about his mental health, Dr. Weir orders him to visit base psychologist Dr. Kate Heightmeyer. En route, he runs into Katie Brown and tells her that despite his trip to the infirmary they are still on for dinner the following evening. Katie remains unaware of Cadman's personality inside his mind.

Sheppard checks in on Ronon Dex and asks his plans following his departure from Atlantis. Dex does not believe he fits in with Humans, but he promises to give things a try. Sheppard pits him against some of his best men in hand-to-hand combat as well as tests his marksmanship skills with Earth weapons.

Dr. Heightmeyer suggests that McKay should try and release a little control for once, but in this case, in the form of his body, and for a moment Lieutenant Cadman gains control of his speech and motor functions. But after a few moments he has had enough. Cadman, knowing she can now take over, begins hatching plans.

Back at the Dart, Zelenka forces McKay off the project, saying he is making too many mistakes and will do more harm than good. He returns to his quarters, and while unconscious Cadman takes over, inviting Dr. Beckett to join McKay and Dr. Brown for dinner, and taking a jog before bed. McKay and Cadman wake up at two o'clock the following day -- in her quarters. When he finds out what she's done he insists it's time to set boundaries.

McKay shows up in Katie's quarters and is surprised to find Beckett there. It doesn't take him long to realize Cadman invited him for herself. After an awkward toast and a series of stammers she takes over his body again, telling Katie extravagant, loving phrases he could never deliver himself, tipping her backwards and giving her a generous smooch before getting an eye-full of Beckett and departing.

Struggling for control, McKay insists they go back, but Dr. Zelenka uses the intercom to call him to the hangar.

Zelenka has found a way to trick the Dart's energy matrix into only taking the power that it needs to initiate the materialization process on a pair of mice. When they re-emerge they have been cooked well-done, and McKay fears he'll be stuck this way forever.

At Sheppard's request Dr. Weir pays a visit to Ronon, telling him she is aware of John's wish to add him to his forces. Dex has been training the troops in various knife techniques he has been using, and tells her he is thinking about staying.

McKay returns to Dr. Heightmeyer, demanding an apology from Cadman, but in the midst of the session he has a seizure. In the infirmary, Beckett reveals that this will continue to happen until one of them decides to "let go." Cadman says it's getting harder and to exist inside his body, and offers to be the one to eventually fade away if Zelenka's tests continue to bring back dead mice.

While awaiting the next attack McKay realizes that the Stargate's purpose is to dematerialize and rematerialize a person. If they plug a gate power crystal into the Darts materialization device it should stabilize the process. He sets up the device in the hangar bay and asks to have a moment with Cadman, but she takes over his body and plants an enormous kiss on Dr. Beckett's mouth. McKay returns in disgust and asks that the procedure commence. Zelenka activates the device and Cadman's body reappears.

Rodney wakes up in the infirmary and finds himself to be alone in his own mind. The process worked, and Cadman is lying beside him. Both are eager to find some time to themselves.

Colonel Sheppard, Dr. McKay, Teyla and Ronon Dex take a Puddle Jumper to a new planet where none believe they have previously visited. When they find smoke from a fire John lands the ship. The camp site is desolate with poorly-constructed shacks that barely stand. Without warning several arrows rain down on the team, one striking Ronon through the leg. Several inhabitants are eager to protect their land. When they are pinned down a ship appears in the sky, using its retro-thrusters to literally blow the prisoners away. Back inside the Jumper the ship gives Sheppard instructions to follow it back to the mainland.

There, Sheppard's unit is officially welcomed to Olesia by Marin, an official who dispatched the ship. They meet with the Magistrate and learn that the Stargate is located on an island penal colony, similar to Alcatraz. There, the Wraith are free to feed on the most violent of Olesia's inhabitants, leaving the society itself untouched. Sheppard obtains a private radio frequency and reports this to Dr. Weir, who is skeptical about this form of capital punishment. She orders Sheppard to return to Atlantis before negotiations for an Olesian mineral commence.

Over the island the Jumper is assaulted by anti-aircraft weaponry, technology McKay couldn't imagine they could have crafted. But it is too late to cloak the craft, and the ship falls from the sky a few dozen yards from the Stargate.

The unit is captured and tied up inside a shack at the camp. There they meet Torrell, the appointed leader of the prisoners, who orders McKay to begin repairing the Jumper so it can be used to "pay a visit to the mainland." Meanwhile the Olesian prisoners have familiarized themselves with the Jumper's cache of weaponry and equipment, including radios.

Back at the Jumper, McKay meets Eldon, a prisoner who put his skills to use in developing much of the weaponry by finding natural ores around the island. McKay removes a chip from one of the control boards and reports that it will be impossible to get the drive pods, the cockpit, or the Jumper's on-board D.H.D. working again. And with no D.H.D. on this Stargate, there is now no way off the island. But Eldon ensures Rodney that if he doesn't find a way, Torrell will make certain the Wraith find him first at the next culling.

McKay is sent back to the camp, where Torrell forces him to choose which one will die first for not cooperating in repairing the ship. While he gives him time to choose, Eldon tells of how the success of Olesia's disobedience policy has dropped the numbers of prisoners significantly. In response, they have lowered the bar to keep the feeding population adequately high.

Dr. Weir meets with the Olesian Magistrate, who orders a search of the island. Weir assures him that finding the team is in everyone's best interests.

With the guards on a break, Eldon returns with a knife, promising to set them free if it is assured that he will return with the team to their home. McKay re-emphasizes that there is nothing he can do to reactivate the D.H.D., but Sheppard sees through his lie, forcing him to reveal one small, almost hopeless possibility. Eldon cuts Dex's bounds, who then threatens to kill him, until Sheppard forces him into obedience. They are freed, not seeing the active radio in the corner of the shed.

Before reaching the Jumper Sheppard realizes the situation is too easy. A Wraith Dart soon emerges through the Stargate, sending ambushers out of hiding and into a fray for fear of their lives. With this break the team makes it back to the Jumper where Rodney commences repairs.

Meanwhile, the Olesian Magistrate apologizes for his tardiness, and sits down to a polite dinner with a Wraith commander. The Wraith insists the recent awakening has called upon the need for more food, and the current prison population of the island is now inadequate. The Magestrate promises to begin tightening his grip on their policies.

The Dart departs the planet. Marin comes to inform Weir of the real situation. The Magistrate does not intend to send rescue teams back to the island, and many people in the city are being apprehended for unspecified violations to increase the population on the island. The Magistrate and several soldiers appear to escort her away to trial, ensuring the matter about no second search is false, but Weir is not buying it, and her team arms themselves as they depart the building alone

Sheppard, Dex, and Teyla leave the Jumper to counterattack Torrell's ambush team, but even as they are successful at taking down a number of them Torrell has control of the Jumper, right when McKay manages to siphon power to the D.H.D. While he is negotiating terms for escape a Wraith cruiser enters the area, barreling down on the wrecked Jumper. McKay returns to the console and finds that it is dead again, but he manages to redirect power to the drone weapons instead. The drone disables the cruiser and it begins to pull away, but another is at its heels.

Weir makes her presence known through Torrell's radio, and John, receiving it, instructs her to dial one of the planets considered for the new Alpha Site. Torrell and scores of the prisoners escape. Jumper Two then dials Atlantis, and the team, plus Eldon, runs back to the Stargate under Wraith cruiser fire. All members make it through. Weir is relieved, ready to follow.

The mainland is not experiencing relief, however. The Magistrate looks out his window, in undisguised horror, as a Wraith cruiser enters the airspace of the city.

2 - 6 TRINITY

The Atlantis team visits a planet mentioned in the Ancient database: Doranda, fabled to be a world friendly to the Ancients, is now a worlds that appears to have suffered a post-nuclear holocaust. A wrecked Wraith armada orbits the planet. On the surface, an Ancient outpost sits, untouched. Dr. McKay is not yet able to determine the exact purpose of the base, but it is obvious that it is the only structure that survived. Colonel Sheppard believes it to be a ground equivalent to the Ancient satellite they once found ("The Defiant One"). However, dead bodies litter the corridors of the installation.

Back on Atlantis, McKay convinces Dr. Weir to allow him to return with a team to the base. He and Dr. Zelenka begin to deduce a theory, but they do not wish to spread it to the others yet. Meanwhile, Ronon and Teyla travel to Belka to trade for a special disease-resistant strain of flaxi which would double the output of crops on the mainland. She is prepared to trade Athosian workers for the strain.

Hendon's offer is unreasonable and would only turn the Athosian people into slaves. When he gets up to leave, Ronon threatens him with a knife to force his hand. Later, Teyla confronts him about the delicacies of negotiation. When Ronon departs, the Belkan Mattas returns to Teyla and learns that Dex is of Sateda, a world destroyed by the Wraith. "He is not the only survivor," says Mattas, indicating that there is another Satedan refugee in the village.

Ronon reunites with Solen Sincha, a Satedan who served in his regiment. Sincha tells him that more than three hundred civilians were saved following the Wraith's culling on Sateda. Ronon isn't alone. Not only that, but Kell, Ronon's Task Master, has survived as well -- and he occasionally trades weapons with the Belkans.

McKay and Zelenka explain Project Arcturus, the failed experiment, to Weir and Colonel Caldwell. Arcturus would have brought together a power source the equivalent of 25 zero-point modules when fully powered. Instead of obtaining zero-point energy from a small universe, Arcturus would draw energy from our universe. But for some reason it failed, and the Ancient scientists sacrificed their lives in order to deactivate it. McKay believes because they were rushed to complete the weapon and end the hundred-year Wraith war they hurried themselves to their deaths.

Rodney and Radek are confident they can complete the Ancients' work on the Dorandan homeworld. But during the next test, the radiation begins to spin out of control. Collins is ordered into the command access tube to manually boost more power to the field, but once he is inside the radiation spikes and kills him.

Despite the fact that one of McKay's officers lies in the morgue, he is intent on succeeding. Rodney believes the problem is in the automatic containment protocols. If the field strength is manually adjusted, he believes it will solve the problem. Asking Sheppard to trust him, the Colonel takes this information to Weir, and with Caldwell's help she is swayed.

But Zelenka believes he knows why the Ancients abandoned the technology. Attempting to extract energy from our own space-time is impossible. Eventually the matrix within the field of the weapon becomes inherently unpredictable, and an overload is the end result at no matter what power level. McKay refuses to listen, and as predicted the energy field spikes.

Back on Belka, Ronon has used Teyla's connections with the Belkans to arrange a meeting with Kell, who has arrived to trade. When Dex reveals himself, Kell gets one word out before Ronon kills him with his gun. When Kell's guards pull their weapons on Ronon, Dex reminds them of what Kell stood for. Teyla, enraged, learns the truth. Kell sent thousands of Satedans to their deaths just to save himself and his own family. He was a coward and traitor. Teyla says she may have done the same, but tells Ronon next time she will not be so forgiving if her friendship is misused again.

Sheppard convinces McKay to abandon the station before they are killed in the impending overload. The weapon continues to discharge fire in order to bleed off the overload, but eventually it will be overcome. As the Jumper flies toward the Stargate in deep space the Daedalus arrives to provide cover so they are not shot down. Then the Daedalus enters hyperspace, just as most of the solar system is destroyed in the detonation.

McKay occupies his time with apologies to his colleagues for his pompous arrogance, but saves Sheppard for last for fear that the Colonel will never trust in him again. However, John promises he will eventually earn it back.

2 - 7 INSTINCT

Colonel Sheppard's unit enters a village on an uncharted world. The scene is not unlike an old werewolf film, with a cold fog encroaching on the buildings. Entering a bar, they meet several locals, including Goran, who encourages them to move on. Soon the team learns why everyone is indoors. The Daimos is feeding.

The villagers describe the Daimos to be a Wraith, and the unit puts two and two together. Ten years before a ship crashed from the sky. The villagers killed many of the surviving Wraith, but apparently one got away, and it feeds off the village every two or three months.

Almost immediately Ronon gets up to leave. With a single Wraith, he'd be done before breakfast. But Sheppard insists they will all go in the daylight and hunt the creature. The particular forest it lives within stretches one hundred square miles. Teyla soon senses a presence, but cannot help but label it "different" than any she has before encountered.

Ronon sees the creature and they chase it into a nearby cave. Inside the Wraith, a female, cowers behind a old human man, who claims to be her father. Zaddik claims he was with the villagers who killed the Wraith from the downed craft, but when he found an infant Wraith girl he could not kill her. He raised her in an abandoned mine. For some time normal food sufficed, but eventually a hunger arrived that could not be quenched.

Utilizing his extensive knowledge of the natural resources of the woods, he concocted a fluid that would replace the Wraith hunger. Ellia, the Wraith girl, is not a threat. Instead, there is another Wraith that survived and is killing.

Back on Atlantis, Sheppard reports this to Dr. Weir, and Dr. Beckett is very pleased. He intends to travel back to Zaddik's planet to confirm whether or not the drug works and to further his team's research in a Wraith retrovirus, on that would strip the elements of the iratus bug from the human D.N.A.

Beckett returns with Sheppard to the planet. Sheppard speaks with the villagers and ensures them that the hunt is proceeding, and that they should not get involved. But another life has been taken in the light of day. It has occurred within the past two hours (while Ellia has been in the cave), so Zaddik must be telling the truth.

Teyla enlists Ellia's help in searching for the other Wraith. Ellia, resistant, succumbs to the Wraith telepathic link and sees a river. Zaddik tells of a river to the East, and Sheppard, Ronon and Teyla go out to find it.

While they believe Ellia is in her room, Zaddik shares his concerns for Ellia's future with Dr. Beckett. When he is gone, she will be totally alone. Beckett, not wishing to get his hopes up before, finally tells him about the Wraith retrovirus he and his team have been developing. Still in the early experimental stage, it may eventually help Ellia. Dr. McKay calls them outside to see a mob moving through the forest while Ellia, who was hiding around the corner, finds a sample of the retrovirus and takes it.

When Beckett and McKay go off in the hopes of intercepting the Wraith first, Ellia tells her father what she has been keeping from him. His Ferassin root serum has never worked. Even two years ago when there was an "accident" while he perfected the serum she was still hungry. She eventually learned to sense when the Wraith was feeding and would go out at the same time. She is as equally a killer as any other Wraith. Before his very eyes the retrovirus has the opposite intended effect and mutates her into even more of the iratus bug. Shrieking, she runs out of the caves.

Beckett and McKay encounter the male Wraith, but Ellia intercepts and snaps his neck. She tries to turn on McKay, but Beckett shoots her in the shoulder and scares her away. Meanwhile, Zaddik has entered the forest in his own search for her, and when he does encounter her the two barely recognize each other, she grabs him and throws him across the forest floor.

Eventually Sheppard's unit, including Beckett and McKay, locate him. The village mob that has come to slay the creature heard the shrieks as well. Goran realizes that the man knocked to the earth is Zaddik, his son. Goran says that Zaddik would be only 34, and this is when Zaddik admits that while he was perfecting the serum he allowed Ellia to take what he needed from him. Sheppard asks if she has fed on anyone else, but Zaddik lies for Ellia's sake, saying she has not. Beckett admits there is nothing he can do for him but ease the pain. Soon he is dead.

The team goes out in search of Ellia once more. Teyla fights her in hand-to-hand combat but is disabled. Sheppard orders Ronon to stay with her while he goes off on his own, but when Teyla regains consciousness she tells him to dismiss this order and go help him. Meanwhile Ellia has found Sheppard, and when she gets close enough, taking several gun shot wounds, she begins to feed on his arm. When Ronon arrives the two manage to take her down for good.

Sheppard, whose arm is now bloody, declares that he is fine. Ronon reassures him that they would never have been able to convince her to return with them.

2 - 8 CONVERSION

Colonel Sheppard and his unit return from Zaddik's planet ("Instinct"). John is rolled into the medical bay where Dr. Beckett examines Ellia's feeding wound. In the midst of his examination the entire gash disappears.

Beckett believes that Ellia transferred a quantity of the iratus bug retrovirus through Sheppard's arm and into his bloodstream. His physical abilities have accelerated. He can easily outdistance Dex in a jog and quickly disables Teyla of her fighting rods, unexpectedly leaping out of character and kissing her square on the mouth.

Dr. Weir invites Colonel Caldwell to assume Sheppard's duties while he is off active duty, but makes it clear that this will hopefully be only a temporary situation and that the Colonel will soon recover. Meanwhile, Sheppard finds an insect-like growth protruding from his arm where Ellia "bit" into him and ups the schedule on his next checkup with Beckett.

The retrovirus was never designed for a human, but a Wraith. Beckett had hoped that the human body would absorb and eventually destroy the serum, but that is not happening. Sheppard is assigned a guard.

Beckett gathers the Atlantis scientists together to come up with a plan to reverse the retrovirus's effects. Everyone agrees that administering re-sequenced cells of a full iratus bug, designed to seek out and destroy the alien elements in Sheppard's body, would do the trick. Unfortunately the only sample is a dead bug that has been on ice for over a year ("Thirty Eight Minutes"). Beckett decides to send a team to a planet identified in the Ancient database as a world of the iratus bugs (but not the Wraith homeworld) to capture several eggs to harvest.

Sheppard learns of the plan and wishes to go with the team to the planet. If his team is going to put their lives on the line to save him, he feels the least he can do is offer backup. Weir fervently disagrees. Enraged, Sheppard smashes one of her office windows overlooking the gate room. Weir considers the decision closed and Sheppard willingly returns to the infirmary.

Weir confronts Colonel Caldwell about his sweeping changes in the security protocols of the city and the off-world duty roster. Caldwell, who has wanted the position from day one, tells Weir that he has only made changes to bad decisions Sheppard has made in the past, but Elizabeth is furious that he did not even wait a day to make the changes. He has only sent one signal to the Atlantis expedition: Sheppard is not going to survive.

Lorne, Beckett, McKay, Teyla, Dex, Stevens and Walker travel to the iratus bug planet and locate a cave tucked against a mountain range. Inside a lair of possibly thousands of iratus bugs cluster, protecting their eggs (suspended in sacks on the ceiling). Beckett attempts an approach using salt water to make a path, but when one dangles by him with intent to feed Ronon uses his gun to disable it, sending the countless others in a frenzy. Walker and Stevens are killed in the evacuation.

Weir reports the bad news to Sheppard whose transformation has continued. Now at his wits end, he takes matters into his own hands, disables the two SF's at the door and escapes into the city. A team is sent to capture him, but he disables all members of the party save for Teyla -- and Dex, who neutralizes him with his gun.

Now back in the infirmary, Beckett has placed the colonel into a medical-induced coma. In 24 hours, John Sheppard will be gone forever. But Carson believes he has a plan. The iratus bugs release a very discernable pheromone -- likely one of the ways used to recognize other members of its species. Synthesizing the pheromones would take days, but Sheppard already possesses them.

With a final dose of the inhibitor, Sheppard, his team and Beckett return to the iratus planet. With minutes remaining before the drug wears off for the final time, the colonel enters the cave and leaps to one of the egg sacks on the ceiling, extracting a cup full of iratus eggs. While inside the clock runs out, and he emerges from the cave a monster. Ronon disables him. Beckett gathers the eggs and determines they will be enough.

Sheppard will recover after all, though Caldwell hopes that he will consider several of the changes the Daedalus commander has made in Sheppard's absence.

Weeks later, John has fully recovered, and pays Teyla a visit in the fitness room. Only a light scar of where Ellia attacked him remains, and this will disappear eventually. Sheppard indirectly apologizes for his force with Emmagan, but she instructs him to think no more of it.

2 - 9 AURORA

With the Z.P.M. powering Atlantis, minor systems have gradually been reactivated. Among these is a homing beacon designed to guide stray ships back to Atlantis. The Ancient warship Aurora has been targeted on deep space sensors as being located on the edge of the Pegasus Galaxy. Weir enlists the Daedalus to transport Colonel Sheppard and his team to the warship.

Once aboard his team finds the entire crew in stasis pods. After Dr. McKay reactivates internal ship life support he realizes that the crew is now so old that removing them from the pods would kill them. But their minds are active. Apparently the crew is sharing conscious thoughts despite the fact that they are in stasis.

With Teyla and Ronon's help, McKay places Sheppard into a stasis pod to communicate with the others, with instructions on how to remove himself at any time.

Once inside the colonel, in an Ancient uniform, encounters a member of the Aurora crew who says he has entered a restricted area. An escort team takes him to the bridge where Sheppard is introduced to the captain. It is soon clear that none of the crew realize they are in stasis.

Suspicious of his presence and motives, the captain orders Sheppard confined to a brig. There, the colonel pleads his case, making reference of the fact that the Aurora departed Lantean space following the sinking of the city during the Siege. The captain informs Sheppard that the Aurora crew has a vital piece of information on how to damage Wraith technology. With this in mind the first officer, Trebal, insists that work on the hyperdrive continue so that they can return to the city. Sheppard is left alone.

Eventually he summons the guard and manages to get Trebal's attention. Sheppard insists that they are on the same side, and he wishes to learn the Wraith secret so that he can inform Atlantis himself. Trebal believes he is sincere and promises to speak to the captain about the matter.

The Daedalus detects the approach of two Wraith cruisers. Fearing that the hive will learn that Atlantis was not destroyed, Colonel Caldwell gives Dr. McKay a half hour before he must pull Sheppard from the system.

Not satisfied with the time he has spent in confinement, Sheppard calls for the guard again and learns that Trebal has given strict orders to ignore the prisoner. Sheppard uses that moment to vanish from the artificial reality. He gives the guard long enough to enter the cell and investigate before Sheppard returns, snatching his weapon and communicator and leaving the guard in the cell.

Teyla and Ronon have bad news. A Wraith has forcibly removed a female Ancient and entered her stasis pod in her stead. A piece of Wraith hardware has also been attached to the system.

Sheppard approaches the captain in his quarters, hoping to explain things more clearly this time. But Trebal and a security detachment shoot him unconscious. She orders Sheppard returned to his cell and reasserts the importance of their mission to the captain.

McKay realizes Sheppard may be prevented from leaving because of the Wraith and decides to go in after him, but soon the Aurora security guards seal him in the cell along with Sheppard. McKay exits the system again and uses an interface to unlock the cell and render the guards unconscious. He returns to Sheppard's side and the men escape the brig again.

It does not take long to discover that the Wraith has taken the appearance of first officer Trebal. McKay accesses the virtual Aurora's systems and discovers that the Wraith has deleted the information pertaining to the weakness in their technology. But it becomes clear why it is interested in the hyperdrive modifications. The Wraith hyperdrives are nowhere near as advanced as Ancient hyperdrives. If it learns how the modifications are made to make hyperdrives from interplanetary to intergalactic, (with the correct coordinates) the Wraith could reach Earth in days.

McKay leaves the system to unplug the Wraith. Just as Sheppard enters the bridge the doctor succeeds, and only then does the captain realize he has been assisting the enemy. Sheppard informs him of the approach of Wraith craft, and the captain informs him of what to do next.

Sheppard's team, including the colonel, is transported back to the Deadalus. John was given the captain's self destruct code before departing. In the virtual environment, he has gathered his crew together to assure them that their sacrifice will not be forgotten. They are now too old to leave their pods, but they will do some good before the end.

The Aurora is destroyed, taking the cruisers with her.

Back on Atlantis, Sheppard shares a toast to the crew of the Aurora, assured in the fact that the Wraith weakness will be rediscovered.

2 - 10 THE LOST BOYS (PART 1 OF 2)

While scrounging a forest floor in search of one of a contact who has reported the whereabouts of a Z.P.M., Colonel Sheppard's unit is ambushed and shot with a new advanced series of Wraith rifle. They awaken at a dinner table in a cave surrounded by young men. After Sheppard quips, he hears a familiar laugh, and Lieutenant Ford makes his presence known. Ford encourages eating the food he has placed for them and tells his story. He was not killed after he was taken by the culling beam on P3M-736. Instead, he neutralized and stole several enzyme pouches from the Wraith cruiser he was sent to and swiftly departed the craft.

Ford had dialed an address to a friendly planet where he met men willing to try the enzyme for themselves. Now he has gathered a small ragtag team of boys intent on delivering serious blows to the Wraith. Their numbers continually growing, they capture Wraith soldiers and imprison them for their enzyme.

One of Ford's associates, Jace, has managed to maximize the drug, and even lace it in food -- Sheppard's team's food. Too much already eaten, Dr. McKay, Teyla and Ronon Dex will soon experience the side effects. Sheppard's plate was intentionally left untouched so that he can be an unaltered witness to later tell Dr. Weir the wonders that it has done for his team. Ford makes it clear that they are not prisoners, and are free to roam the planet.

But they are not free to leave. McKay soon discovers that certain control crystals have been removed from the D.H.D. -- a trick he taught Ford -- which explains why they are not under surveillance. Already McKay is beginning to feel the effects of the enzyme with hot and cold flashes and a tendency to pace. Teyla and Ronon are not far behind.

Ford intends for Sheppard to see the effectiveness of his team, and instructs Kanayo to send Sheppard and Teyla with him on his next mission. While on the planet, Kanayo reveals he was a former Genii spy, which explains how he knows the location of an off-world Genii safe house. One man lost, his team successfully steals back an entire crate of Earth's C4.

McKay spends time with Jace and learns what he has discovered. The Wraith are not a united force, and are fracturing more than originally thought. Because of Teyla's ability to access their telepathic network, each ship is becoming compartmentalized in terms of sharing information. This way, if she or someone with her abilities were to access a ship's telepathic link, only that vessel would be compromised.

When Kanayo and his team returns, Ford and Jace brief Sheppard's unit on their plan. They wish to destroy a Wraith hive ship. One is passing through an area of space, feeding heavily as it does. A hyperspace pause will take it very near to a planet with a Stargate. If they manage to plant the C4 in the Dart bay, utilizing secondary explosions, the hive ship will be decimated with possibly hundreds of thousands of lives (who would've been culled otherwise) spared.

The trick will be getting up to the ship. Ford reveals a Dart they managed to capture, intact, and Sheppard is encouraged to learn how to fly the craft. McKay is floored that he is considering the possibility of going along with the boys' insane plan, but Sheppard privately reveals he'll use the Dart to scoop everyone up and fly back to Atlantis. Only after this does McKay agree to modify the Dart so that Sheppard can fly it.

Meanwhile, Teyla and Ronon's enzyme dosage is increased, and soon their personalities are radically altered. But Sheppard maintains his plan. He'll force Ford to include all of his team in the strike force. Once they are culled, Sheppard will fly everyone home.

Ford has seen through his plan, and as insurance that he will not return to Atlantis with the Dart, McKay will remain behind. Also, the onboard D.H.D. will only dial the hive ship's planet and back.

Sheppard scoops up the group in a culling beam and travels through the Stargate, but as he approaches the hive ship the Dart initiates an autopilot. Inside he is barely able to release the cargo, but when he does the Dart deposits the group on the edge of a precipice within the ship. Three of Ford's men, including Jace, fall to their deaths.

The Dart parks itself in a landing bay. The canopy dissipates and Sheppard is greeted by two Wraith warriors. He disables them with his P-90, setting off an alarm in the ship. After a violent struggle everyone is confined into a single Wraith holding cell. Ford believes Sheppard deliberately set out to screw the mission, but the Colonel puts him in his place.

A Wraith commander arrives to escort the pilot of the Dart to another part of the vessel. Sheppard is taken away and placed on a pedestal in a vast room. When he turns around, he finds a female Wraith -- the hive queen -- staring him in the face. She wraps her mind around Sheppard's, forcing him to buckle to the floor into submission, and probes his thoughts.

2 - 11 THE HIVE (PART 2 OF 2)

The Wraith Hive Queen begins to interrogate Colonel Sheppard, but before she can get answers to her first question she becomes agitated for reasons unknown and orders him returned to his cell. Teyla senses that a second Wraith hive ship has arrived on the scene.

Back at Ford's outpost, Dr. McKay pleads with his enzyme-enhanced guards to allow him access missing crystals to open the Stargate. The mission to the hive ship is long-overdue, so something has obviously gone wrong. But they refuse. While they play a board game McKay sneaks away to Jace's laboratory and gouges himself with an entire bottle of the Wraith enhancement. He easily bulldozes through the guards and returns to Atlantis, where he soon collapses in the gate room.

An attempt to free themselves goes horribly wrong as Sheppard's group, including Ford and Kanayo, make their way to a Dart bay. En route, they come across three cocooned captives who are still alive. While pulling them free Wraith arrive, stun the entire party, and return them to separate cells. Sheppard awakens a short time later to an irritated Ford and a young woman he attempted to rescue, Neera. Ford admits the enzyme is quickly wearing off. Without an additional supply he will suffer possibly fatal side effects.

Colonel Caldwell has pushed the Daedalus's hyperdrive engines and managed to arrive a few days ahead of schedule to aid in the team's recovery. McKay is now in the infirmary. Since Ford left with the city's only supply of the enzyme, Rodney will have no choice but to quit cold turkey. The massive dose of the drug in his system will not leave without him kicking and screaming.

Ronon, Teyla, Ford and Kanayo are facing identical withdrawals. Because Ronon and Teyla have only been taking the drug for a short time the absence from their system will be unpleasant, but not life threatening. While sprawling on the floor in pain, the absence of the enzyme in Kanayo's body kills him. Ford, too, is near death, but Sheppard is pushing him to stay alive. Wraith arrive to collect Kanayo's corpse and to put Ford into a cocoon to preserve him for when they are ready to feed.

After a lengthy struggle McKay returns to his normal self. Now coherent, he updates Dr. Weir about Ford, his coalition, and the Wraith's planned target: Edwin. McKay knows the coordinates, so with luck the Daedalus will be able to head them off and give the expedition time to warn the population.

Meanwhile, Sheppard is getting cozy with Neera, who has now told him about how her culture fell at the hands of the Wraith. She snuggles up to him for warmth and inquires about his world, but Sheppard stops himself when she asks for the name of the planet. Later, Sheppard is taken to the Hive Queen once more, but he starts off the conversation by assuring her that the woman she had planted for them to find, Neera, would not acquire any information for her.

When Neera appears at her side the Queen reveals that there are thousands of humans like her who revere, and even willingly worship, the Wraith. In exchange they keep their lives. Sheppard takes a chance and says he is the same, only he is working for the Queen on the other hive ship. The Queen promises to speak with her, but not before Ford enters the room and neutralizes the entire group of Wraith with Ronon's gun. Despite Sheppard's objections Ford, who has found more enzyme, promises to watch his team's back so they can escape.

The Daedalus arrives in the Edwin system, deploying Lorne and Dr. McKay in a cloaked Puddle Jumper to contact Sheppard, but they are taken aback when they discover two hive ships have joined together for the culling. After trying to reach Sheppard via radio they return to the Daedalus.

Sheppard acquires a Dart and scoops Dex and Teyla into its culling beam. He pilots the craft outside of the hive ship, now deploying throngs of Darts for the culling. Instead of heading for the Daedalus Sheppard begins to lay down fire on the opposite hive ship. His plan works. Both squadrons of Darts, and the two massive vessels, destroy one another.

The Daedalus returns to Atlantis, landing in the water beside the city. McKay is shocked when he sees his three teammates alive and well. Sheppard escaped via Edwin's space Stargate, trusting that Ford made it out before the ship was destroyed. Valuable intelligence has been gathered on the Wraith, who possesses a more brittle relationship with one another than has ever been realized. This could develop into a very effective strategy in their defeat.

2 - 12 EPIPHANY

On an alien planet Lt. Colonel John Sheppard, Dr. Rodney McKay, Teyla Emmagan, and Ronon Dex fly the Puddle Jumper toward a crater giving off spiked energy readings. McKay is curious. Sheppard lands the Jumper to proceed on foot to explore. The team finds a partially concealed cave with a doorway that has Ancient writings on it; Teyla recognizes the words "welcome" and "ascension."

Curious to learn more, the team inserts a camera taped on a stick through the portal. The "M.A.L.P. on a stick" records another side to the cave. Sheppard decides to be the hero and go through the portal himself. Just as he begins to pass through, he experiences pain and tries to pull out. Despite the team's efforts, Sheppard gets swallowed by the portal and spit out the other side ... and can't get back through from the other side.

Only then does McKay make an astonishing discovery. The camera's memory is full and the batteries are dead after using it for only a few minutes. Hours have been recorded. McKay realizes that time passes much more quickly on the other side. And that means that Sheppard has already spent days there without supplies. Quickly the team takes whatever they have and heave it through the portal, and McKay leaves to get help.

On the other side, Sheppard has spent days camped out by the portal. He's on his last energy bar when the cavern shakes with an earthquake and out of the portal pops the supplies the team just threw to him. He's already growing a beard. Again, more days pass on his side before he is forced to leave the cave and look for food.

Sheppard discovers a green valley with an open field, where a man runs up to him in sheer terror. He tries to tell Sheppard there's a beast gaining on him. A beast about seven feet tall appears as a partially visible monster with claws, scales, and head ridge. It wastes no time attacking them both, and in the fight Sheppard is knocked unconscious, getting claw wounds for his trouble.

John wakes up in the usual primitive human surroundings found on so many human-inhabited planets in the Pegasus Galaxy. The man who found him, Avrid, and his sister, Teer, explain that the Ancients created this whole area to protect people while they are trying to ascend. John is shocked to learn that there is one and only one way out: ascension. He must lose his physical body and reach a higher plane of existence.

Stranded with the villagers, the weeks turn into months. John tries to blend in by meditating with them and learning from them. But no one is ascending. One day the beast attacks the village itself, and Sheppard must defend Hedda, the little girl who healed him with the Ancient's powers. He is appalled when the other villagers run inside to hide, as if that would help against the non-corporeal beast. Sheppard faces the beast alone, feeling abandoned and hung out to dry by the passive inhabitants. But soon Teer bravely emerges to stand with him. But the beast nearly kills the Colonel again.

Sheppard tells the villagers they have to face their fears and fight it. If they don't and the creature kills them, there will be no ascension. As more time passes, Sheppard feels abandoned by his team and becomes depressed. What he doesn't know is that outside the Cloister only a few hours have passed, and McKay has made it back to Atlantis to get help.

Dr. Weir, Dr. Beckett, McKay, and a pilot bring supplies and return to the planet to join up with Teyla and Ronon. To determine more about the temporal field, McKay fires a probe into the barrier. Before being torn apart by the temporal forces of the barrier, the probe sends back readings indicating where to find the field's power source. McKay is confident he can turn it off. Reaching the cave, he analyzes Teyla's experiment with the camera, calculating that time inside the crater is advancing roughly 250 times normal.

In the hope of rescuing Sheppard -- and possibly landing a Z.P.M. as well -- the group goes through, knowing it may be a one-way trip.

In the village, Sheppard tries to explain that never experiencing life as a human means missing out on great things. Teer reveals her precognitive abilities. She tells Sheppard that he will be the one to help them all ascend -- she has foreseen it for many years. Then she reveals that his team is close by, trying to rescue him -- but they are about to be attacked by the beast. Alone, John races to help them.

The villagers come to help, realizing now that the beast is a manifestation of their own fears. Having released this last burden and vanquishing the creature, the villagers all start to ascend. As Teer ascends, she offers John to come with her. But ascension is not something for which he is ready. Teer tells them that the portal will now let them leave, but that it must remain in place for future followers of the path.

2 - 13 CRITICAL MASS

On Earth, N.I.D. Agent Malcolm Barrett arrives at the S.G.C. to give General Hank Landry a warning: The Trust, an illegal intelligence group on Earth that is now under the control of the Goa'uld (SG-1: "Full Alert"), has planted a bomb on Atlantis.

The Goa'uld have discovered a threat that may come from the Pegasus Galaxy: the Wraith. Fearful for their own survival, an unknown Trust operative has planted a bomb at the one and only Stargate in the Pegasus Galaxy that can connect to Earth. If the Stargate dials either out to or in from Atlantis, the explosion will be triggered. Atlantis will be destroyed along with the city's Stargate.

In an eleventh hour dilemma, Atlantis is scheduled to dial in to give the weekly status report in a couple of hours. But Atlantis is too far away to simply send a subspace warning.

Landry tells Dr. Lee to figure something out, and Lee organizes a relay of sorts. An SG team gates to a planet on the edge of our galaxy, where they relay a message to the Daedalus, which is in between the two galaxies travelling back to Atlantis. Hermiod's quick adjustments to the engines put them in communication range of Atlantis. On Atlantis, McKay gets the message and aborts the dialing sequence at the last second, averting disaster.

Dr. Weir orders McKay to work with explosives expert Lt. Laura Cadman. It's an awkward moment because McKay is still creeped out by the fact that he shared his body with her when her consciousness was trapped in his mind ("Duet"). Dr. Weir suspends all gate operations until the bomb is found, stranding Dr. Zelenka on the Peter Pan-like planet with all the kids ("Childhood's End"). Then Weir sends a message to the Daedalus to return to Atlantis. She wants to be able to interrogate anyone on board who could be a suspect. McKay objects, saying it will cut off their communication with the S.G.C. One last message from Earth reveals that the detonator for the bomb is located on Atlantis, not on Earth.

To insure the Atlantis Stargate cannot connect to Earth's, McKay disconnects the Z.P.M. from the power grid. Lt. Colonel John Sheppard and his teams search the city for the sabotage, with no luck. Inexplicably, the gate dials Earth on its own. Since the Z.P.M. has been removed, there is insufficient power to make the connection. Now the Atlantis team is worried that the Trust operative is in the city because a distress beacon goes off immediately; the gate dialing was only a diversion.

For Teyla, the bomb problem is overshadowed by the human problem of a dying Athosian woman named Charin. Teyla considers her like a grandmother, and seeks Dr. Carson Beckett's help. Beckett tells Teyla that Charin's heart doesn't pump enough blood to sustain her. Teyla is glad to learn there's a treatment, which can help. But Charin thinks she should be allowed to die naturally and have the funeral Ring Ceremony. Because of the Wraith cullings a funeral is a rare event, since few Athosians live long enough to die of natural causes.

Dr. Beckett explains to Teyla that a pacemaker and other Earth technology can prolong Charin's life for years to come. Charin refuses, and Teyla makes it clear that Dr. Beckett may only make Charin comfortable until she dies. He respects the decision. When Charin dies, the ceremony commences with Teyla singing the haunting melody of the Athosian funeral dirge.

Long-range sensors have recently detected two Wraith cruisers nearby, fighting with each other. With the beacon set off by the Trust operative, they now turn to investigate the planet where Atlantis hides. Months ago, the Wraith fell for the ruse that a nuclear bomb had destroyed the city. To maintain the deception, the Z.P.M. must be reconnect to raise the city's cloak. McKay shuts down as much power around the city as possible to avoid an overload to the Z.P.M.

Someone is to blame, and Dr. Weir continues to interrogate Daedalus crewmembers and her own people on the Atlantis expedition. Hated Dr. Kavanagh's name makes the top of the list of suspects. Weir interrogates him but he defies her, calling her an incompetent. The senior staff meets and decides Ronon should use any means necessary to force Kavanagh to reveal the code to deactivate the overload sequence. Believing Kavanagh is the traitor, Weir orders Ronon to do it.

But the bomber activates the pre-launch systems for the city's stardrive. Since the city is a giant space ship, the power required to launch will also overload the carefully guarded Z.P.M. By now, the Wraith ships have entered orbit and are scanning the surface. The Z.P.M. must stay plugged in to keep the cloak up.

Lt. Cadman discovers that Daedalus commander Colonel Caldwell accessed the necessary systems to create the overload. Once informed, Hermiod beams the Colonel down from the ship without warning. When Sheppard and Weir confront him Colonel Caldwell speaks in the distinctive voice of a Goa'uld and his eyes glow -- he is the infiltrator sent by the Trust, or at least the parasitic symbiote that has taken his body is.

Caldwell attacks Ronon and Sheppard. But Sheppard uses a taser to shock him until Colonel Caldwell himself can overcome the symbiote and speak. He gives the code to stop the detonation and disarm the sabotage. The Wraith ships find nothing and leave the area.

Later, Hermiod uses the Daedalus transporter system to remove the Goa'uld from Caldwell. But Weir is afraid that more people could be infested. And she worries that she has crossed a line with Kavanagh.

2 - 14 GRACE UNDER PRESSURE

Dr. Rodney McKay is out on a test flight of a repaired Puddle Jumper with Griffin, a pilot from the Daedalus. They are returning from the mainland over water to Atlantis. The inertial dampeners are damaged in an explosion and one of the two propulsion pods goes out. They can't compensate in time and crash into the ocean.

The ship is damaged and the two men are knocked unconscious. The Jumper sinks into the sea.

Back in the city's control tower, Dr. Radek Zelenka monitors the flight. For a whole hour he cannot contact the Jumper. McKay and Griffin wake up with head wounds and finally answer the radio. They have sunk to 1,200 feet below sea-level and are falling steadily.

The front window cracks, and their only hope is to seal themselves inside the rear compartment. Griffin sacrifices himself by rushing to the front controls, shouting, "Good luck, Rodney." He closes the bulkhead door just as the water rushes in. McKay is stunned at the heroics, and terrified that he is stuck in the back of a sinking Jumper all alone.

Desperate to save himself and disoriented from his head injury, McKay starts talking to himself to try and focus. He gets his laptop interfaced to the ship's computer, and discovers that the transmitter isn't working so far under water. Without the signal, Atlantis won't know where to look for him in such a vast expanse of ocean. But he also realizes that there is a significant power drain from the inertial dampeners. He can't shut them off, and now he has only three hours of life support.

Worse, as the ship descends the increasing pressure of the water threatens to break up the ship. Add the problem of needing to heat the compartment under so much frigid water, and McKay has additional power needs. He tries to shut down as many systems as possible to conserve energy, almost killing himself from a build up of too much carbon monoxide. Punch drunk, he realizes his mistake and manages to scrub the CO₂ from the air.

Based on the flight path and the ocean currents underneath, Zelenka's team narrows down the search area. The Ancient database in the Atlantis computers describes the ridges on the ocean floor and the depth the disabled Jumper can go. Zelenka knows it is somewhere between 2,000 and 6,000 feet of water. He thinks nothing can reach it.

But Lt. Colonel John Sheppard tells Dr. Weir that there is a way. Now that they know a Jumper can be used as a submarine to a depth of 1,000 feet, he can fly it down there. Sheppard figures that if Atlantis's cloak could be made from it's shields, then a Puddle Jumper could turn its cloak into a shield to hold back the water (and the increasing water pressure below the normally safe depth).

Using a thousand-foot cable brought by an oceanographic team and a magnetic grapple used to lower F-302s into the Jumper bay, Sheppard thinks that he can take another Puddle Jumper deep enough to grab McKay's ship and drag it closer to the surface. There, deep-sea rescue divers can cut the crew out.

Dr. Weir approves the plan. Zelenka is ordered to accompany Sheppard, and agrees only reluctantly. Radek isn't comfortable in Puddle Jumpers even under ideal flying conditions -- in fact, it was his reluctance to go on the test flight that forced Rodney to take his place, putting him in this life-threatening situation.

Meanwhile, McKay is suffering from a concussion. He hallucinates help in the form of Lt. Colonel Samantha Carter, from Stargate Command back on Earth. She shows up pretty in pink, and promptly begins arguing with him.

McKay realizes he's hallucinating her while she teases him to distract him from trying to rescue himself by making the Jumper swim. Sam -- or, rather, the part of his subconscious that she represents -- doubts his new plan, and believes that his best bet is to stay put, conserving power and life support and giving his team a chance to find him. He continues to argue with her, while she reminds him all the while that he is really arguing with himself. She wouldn't be there if this wasn't something part of him wanted to hear.

As he works on his next plan, Sam pulls out all the stops to distract him: She shows up in a bathing suit and kisses him. But he recognizes her attempts to distract him from his brilliant idea and -- after a few kisses -- pushes her away and gets back to work.

McKay hears whale sounds echo through the walls of the ship, and realizes that there's a sea creature out there attracted by the ship's emergency transmitter, and can only hope that it will go away rather than hang around waiting to eat him.

Sheppard and Zelenka dive into the ocean in a second Puddle Jumper, and reach the maximum safe depth. Zelenka succeeds in jury rigging a shield, allowing them to go deeper. The search begins.

Unable to trust others to get the rescue job done, McKay wastes half his remaining power trying to raise the ship. It crashes back onto the ocean ridge, causing micro-fractures to appear on the hull. The ship starts to flood with icy sea water. McKay now has to heat the water to stay alive, consuming even more of the remaining power. He is truly helpless.

Sheppard and Zelenka are not able to locate McKay's Jumper deep below them -- but they detect the sea creature circling, and follow it to find the ship. Zelenka tells Sheppard the grapple won't work because McKay's ship weighs too much from being flooded with all that water. So Sheppard lands the ship on the ocean floor next to McKay's Jumper and extends the new shield around both ships.

All McKay has to do is open the door and walk over to Sheppard's ship. But Rodney is afraid he is hallucinating Sheppard's voice. Sam convinces him to trust his team and open the rear hatch. His friends wait on the other side to take him home. From the safety of the rescue Jumper, McKay looks back and sees Sam waving goodbye.

2 - 15 THE TOWER

Once again, Lt. Colonel John Sheppard's team is on another apparently primitive, agrarian planet. Rodney McKay thinks it's a waste of time to hope these folks have anything worthwhile to trade. The village leader, Eldred, approaches to apologize for the delay since they have to prepare their tribute to the Tower. The team takes a look at the Tower and realizes that it is a duplicate of the central spire of Atlantis. Now they know this place has something interesting to investigate.

Eldred explains that the Lord Protector can send bright lights against the Wraith ... or the villagers. These bright lights can attack and destroy anything. The team realizes he is describing Ancient drones, of which Atlantis is currently out of stock following the attack on Atlantis. If the drones work, then it is a sure bet there is a working Z.P.M. Sheppard asks to meet the people in the Tower, and is told that only members of the royal court are allowed inside. McKay goes off to take readings of the Tower with a villager.

Soon, guards from the Tower arrive in the village wearing clothes from a more advanced civilization. The Constable of the guards backhands Eldred and pulls out a bullwhip to flog him. Sheppard tries to protect Eldred but another official arrives from the Tower. Otho, the chamberlain, stops the whipping and proceeds to scan the team. The device beeps when it scans Sheppard. Otho orders Sheppard taken to the Tower.

When the team objects, a drone lands and explodes in the village as a demonstration of the Lord Protector's power. Otho explains that the Lord Protector can see what's going on everywhere. Otho threatens another strike if the team doesn't disarm; it's off to the Tower for Sheppard.

From McKay's scans, he decides that the Tower is actually just the visible portion of a buried Atlantean city. Over the radio, John confirms that the inside is exactly like Atlantis's control room, but dressed up like an eighteenth century palace. McKay tells him that there is a Z.P.M. -- but it's nearly depleted. The city is the same size as Atlantis, just buried.

The Colonel is treated as a guest of honor, and over the radio orders his team to keep a low profile for the night. That evening at dinner, John meets the royal court and the Lord Protector, an aging and ailing man who possesses the Ancient gene and is able to operate the chair, allowing him to activate drone weapons and monitor the nearby villages. His heirs are supercilious fops. Mara, his daughter, is an incorrigible flirt. Tavius, the son, is arrogant and mean. The only thing worse is their table manners.

John inquires about the source of the drones, but no one can answer since no one will go underground to investigate what they call "the catacombs."

Meanwhile, McKay finds a way down into the subterranean part of the city. Baldrick, the village guide, tells him the area is prone to earthquakes, which is why people haven't gone down there. Once they enter, a cave-in traps them. McKay looks for another way out and discovers a treasure trove of unused Puddle Jumpers and drones that could resupply Atlantis. He managed to program one of the drones to blast a hole through the roof for a way out.

In the Tower, plotting and scheming are rampant. That night Mara tries to seduce John, telling him that if they are married, succession will fall to her when her father dies. Elsewhere, Tavius plots with Otho. Otho tries to enlist John in his schemes, presumably to save the people and ensure the gene in the succession. But it's a losing battle. The gene is fading more with each generation, despite the chamberlain's best efforts to find the optimum genetic matches for coupling.

Soon, no one will be able to operate the chair and defend their way of life. When he scanned Sheppard in the village he learned that he has the Ancient gene -- stronger than it has been recorded in a member of the royal family in over 300 years. If Sheppard marries Mara and fathers children, it will bring the royal court an invaluable new infusion of Ancient genetics.

Dr. Beckett comes to treat the Lord Protector. But he discovers the man has been slowly poisoned over many months. To avert the political crisis, Sheppard tells Otho about Beckett's Ancient gene therapy, which can give at least half the peasants on the planet the ability to operate the chair and defend the planet from the Wraith. Otho himself takes the therapy.

Soon the Lord Protector dies, starting a power struggle for the throne. Emerging to claim the throne himself, the cunning Otho arrests Sheppard, Dr. Beckett, and Tavius. To demonstrate his genetic claim is valid, Otho sits down on the chair throne and launches drones to destroy the village.

Back in the village, Ronon stops the Constable from assaulting a woman. He defeats three of the soldiers single-handedly, cutting the Constable's throat. Though afraid, the villagers decide to defend themselves from the punishment sure to come from the Tower.

Meanwhile, Mara goes to John and brings him his radio. Sheppard and Teyla contact McKay and tell him to stop the attack by draining the last of the Z.P.M.'s power. McKay initiates the biggest drain of power, the city ship's star drive, which allows an Ancient city to fly. In the nick of time, power runs out and the drones fall to the ground, powerless.

But it also causes a severe earthquake. In the confusion, John escapes and confronts Otho. He attacks the Colonel with a knife, but John wrestles it from him and cuts his hand. Defeated, Otho falls dead from the poison he put on the blade -- revealing himself to be the one who poisoned the Lord Protector from the start.

The team returns home, and Atlantis is resupplied with drones and Puddle Jumpers in exchange for medicines and the promise to help the villagers get started on the road to a free society.

2 - 16 MICHAEL

During a voyage in a Puddle Jumper, Lt. Colonel John Sheppard and Dr. Rodney McKay try to explain television to Teyla Emmagan and Ronon Dex. A proximity alarm alerts the team to two small pods, drifting among the wreckage of a much larger ship. McKay decides they are just big enough for one person each, but they are not coffins. Sheppard brings the nearest one back to Atlantis and sends another team back for the other pod.

McKay and Dr. Carson Beckett discover that a female is preserved alive inside the life pod. Dr. Elizabeth Weir and Colonel Steven Caldwell give the OK to open it. Both scientists are a little uncomfortable with Colonel Caldwell, who has just returned to duty after being freed from the control of a Goa'uld parasite ("Critical Mass"). Inside the pod is an elderly woman, who is dying. When Dr. Weir leans in to take a look, a bright white beam shoots out and encompasses her. She faints and wakes up in the infirmary, where she begins speaking about Weir in the third person when she wakes up. Obviously, the alien is talking, not Elizabeth. She tells them her name is Phebus and that her vessel was attacked by the Wraith on its way home.

The team is suspicious, so they ask Phebus to let them speak with Dr. Weir. In a move resembling a Tok'ra giving over control to the host, presumably Elizabeth Weir speaks. She asks Sheppard to host Phebus's husband in the other pod now recovered and waiting. She wants to say one last goodbye to her husband. For the sake of love, the group agrees. Knowing that the imprinting will only last a day, Sheppard accepts the mind transfer.

McKay theorizes that the technology's purpose was to act like a "black box" flight recorder on an airplane, giving information about the disaster. Even when a ship is destroyed and the crewmember's body does not survive, his or her consciousness is preserved briefly in order to report back on what happened.

Sheppard awakes as Thalen. Phebus informs him it is she, his wife, in Weir's body. After a long kiss, Phebus/Weir asks for some privacy. Colonel Caldwell refuses. Phebus manages to surreptitiously tell Thalen that there are two guards outside the doors. They make a break for it, grabbing the Wraith stunner pistols from the guards and shooting everyone in sight. McKay tries to shoot Thalen/Sheppard and misses, only to realize he is shooting at Sheppard's body.

Thalen/Sheppard runs off, but Phebus/Weir enters and tells McKay that the man in Sheppard is actually an enemy. Then she shoots McKay and Beckett. Taking McKay's headset, she pretends to be Weir and orders Atlantis security to apprehend Colonel Sheppard. A race begins to find the two aliens and subdue them before they can kill each other, and thereby kill their hosts.

Colonel Caldwell directs the operation, over McKay's objections. Security searches for the aliens while the team works to find a way to reach them using the life signs detector and other Atlantis technology. Teyla and Ronon also join the search.

Thalen/Sheppard and Phebus/Weir taunt each other over the communications system. The chatter is played to the command staff, who realizes that everyone was duped. These two are not husband and wife, but two warriors from opposite sides of an ancient war still trying to kill each other. They don't know their war is over -- or they don't care.

Now the aliens are using Sheppard and Weir's knowledge about Atlantis's workings and layout. Thalen/Sheppard destroys the power control console with a submachine gun. Phebus uses her knowledge to destroy the backup system, and Atlantis is paralyzed. Caldwell orders McKay and Beckett to get down to the power room and fix whatever they can for the primary systems. Luckily, the Z.P.M. is not damaged.

Thalen/Sheppard realizes that Ronon is lying in wait for him. He convinces Ronon that he is not the alien, but Caldwell is. Since Caldwell was recently a Goa'uld, everyone is suspicious of him. Gaining Ronon's help, Thalen/Sheppard gets night goggles and a stunner. She eludes patrols but manages to shoot Ronon in the stomach. Thalen/Sheppard finds Ronon and sends for a medical team. With only flashlights, Beckett must perform surgery on Ronon to save his life.

Eventually the two aliens have another shoot-out, but miss each other. Phebus/Weir finds a control center locks down the city. She tells Caldwell to find Thalen/Sheppard and turn him over to her or she will mess with life support, maybe send a signal to the Wraith, or even kill Weir as a last resort. She figures out how to turn on the halon gas fire suppressant system and creates a shunt into the life support system, threatening to flood the living quarters with the deadly toxin and kill three-quarters of the city.

In the control room, McKay races to override the lockdown while Teyla stands guard over an unconscious Thalen/Sheppard, who she just stunned. Phebus/Weir watches on the security monitor and waits for him to wake up, then orders Teyla to kill Thalen or she will release the gas. Colonel Caldwell tells Teyla to make her own decision knowing what's at stake. Teyla delays as much as she can, and in the nick of time McKay overrides Phebus's controls.

Phebus/Weir hurries to Thalen/Sheppard's location to kill him herself. But as she arrives Teyla passes the stunner pistol to him, and he catches Phebus off guard with a blast.

Later, in the infirmary, Colonel Caldwell visits the recuperating Weir and Sheppard. Phebus and Thalen's consciousnesses have gone. Caldwell teases her about calling him hopeless and declares the paperwork on this one will be a nightmare, especially because of the kiss. Embarrassed, Weir slinks down under the covers. But it's obvious: After Weir and Sheppard have experienced alien possession first-hand, Caldwell has finally been accepted as a good guy.

2 - 17 THE LONG GOODBYE

During the weekly visit to a friendly planet, Major Lorne's team is attacked. The building where they were having tea was destroyed following an attack from unknown assailants with what sounded like Wraith blasts. Dr. Lindsay reaches the Stargate to call for help, and leads Colonel John Sheppard's team to find charred bodies inside the building. Their dog tags identifying them as Major Lorne and his team.

Through the Stargate, a Genii soldier, Ladon Radim, contacts Weir with a video transmission. He reveals that the Genii know Atlantis was not destroyed because they've seen various teams travelling to and from other planets. Weir recognizes Ladon as a member of Commander Kolya's previous strike force, which attempted to seize Atlantis last year ("The Storm," "The Eye"). Ladon tells her he has defected from the Genii -- and he has a Zero Point Module (Z.P.M.) to trade.

Rodney makes the case that getting a Z.P.M. outweighs upsetting the Genii government, with whom Dr. Weir has negotiated an uneasy peace ("The Siege, Part 2"). They send through a M.A.L.P. to Ladon's planet, and he invites them to search him. Soldiers return to Atlantis with Ladon in tow, and he informs Weir that he is leading a coup d'etat against Cowen and the Genii government. In exchange for the Z.P.M. he wants machine guns, grenades, and C4 to overthrow Cowen and to stop the Genii from using their nuclear weapons to attack other worlds.

At the village on the planet where Lorne's team was killed, Ronon and Teyla go to a bar to follow up the investigation. There are spies watching who will kill anyone who talks. Having no luck, they leave. But the barmaid catches up to them with a satchel they apparently left behind; it is a ruse to pass information, which turns out to be reward posters for the capture of key Atlantis team members, including Lorne and his team, Sheppard, and McKay. Examining the photographs, Ronon realizes these have been distributed on numerous worlds.

Ladon tells Weir that Cowen has dreams of conquest to unite the galaxy under one leader in the fight against the Wraith -- himself. Kolya is missing and Ladon suspects Cowen had him murdered. Ladon says he obtained the Z.P.M. from the Brotherhood of the Fifteen, where Sheppard and Kolya tried to kill each other to get it ("The Brotherhood"). Ladon pretends to be idealistic but everyone is suspicious. As an act of good faith to a tentative ally, Weir decides to send Sheppard and McKay to contact Cowen.

On the Genii homeworld, Cowen genially meets them in the tunnels under the surface. He says they were heavily culled by the Wraith and are rebuilding, and have no ambitions to conquer the galaxy. Sheppard tells Cowen about Ladon's accusations. Cowen isn't worried, since Ladon doesn't have enough resources. And he promises to keep the secret of Atlantis surviving the Wraith attack as his act of good faith. Sheppard offers supplies to help rebuild since the Genii supplied the nuke used in the ruse to make the Wraith think Atlantis was destroyed.

In a cloaked Puddle Jumper, special ops teams followed Ladon to a base on another planet. Sheppard proposes a raid to get the Z.P.M. By luring some of the Genii rebels to Atlantis to trade for the Z.P.M., Sheppard figures he can then reduce the manpower at the base and successfully recover the Z.P.M.

Dr. Beckett determines that the bodies are not Major Lorne's team. The people were already dead from radiation poisoning -- Genii.

The Genii rebels arrive without the Z.P.M., so Weir detains them. But it doesn't matter: they are terminally ill with radiation poisoning and did not plan to ever return home. Dahlia Radim, Ladon's own sister, is one of them.

Weir realizes that Sheppard is walking into a trap. Ladon knew there would be a raid and double-crossed Sheppard. Ladon, waiting with a dead Z.P.M. (which the Genii found in their archives, and did not steal from the Brotherhood), captures Sheppard's assault team using knockout gas.

When Sheppard wakes up Cowen is there. He explains that Ladon still works for the Genii -- there is no coup. He is also holding Lorne and his team captive, and very much alive. Cowen radios Atlantis and demands ten Puddle Jumpers in trade for the Atlantis teams. She has one hour to deliver the ships until they start killing the hostages, starting with Sheppard.

The Genii, however, can't fly the Jumpers because they don't have the Ancient gene. They captured Lorne's team in order to experiment with their own Ancient gene therapy. The circulated wanted posters were for Atlantis personnel with the Ancient gene, to aid their experiments. Major Lorne's team was probably turned in for the reward offered. Sheppard is locked up with Lorne and the others.

Dr. Weir tries to negotiate with Cowen, telling him they can cure many of the Genii hostages -- including Ladon's sister. Cowen tells her he doesn't care, and sends Ladon to kill Sheppard. But Ladon has other plans, especially now that he knows his sister can be cured. He intends to detonate a nuke hidden under the building. But first he rescues Sheppard and his men, escaping with them to Atlantis. Over the radio, Cowen is stunned to learn that he himself has been double-crossed; there really is a coup in the works after all. The nuke detonates, killing Cowen and his elite guard.

Ladon is reunited with his sister, and Dr. Beckett successfully operates on Dahlia for a malignant lung tumor. Dr. Weir offers to cure as many Genii as they can, as long as the coup doesn't cost any more lives. Ladon promises a more friendly relationship Atlantis and thanks Dr. Weir for helping his sister.

But Weir is afraid that the new leaders of the Genii will be as bad as the old. Sheppard reminds her that Ladon did rescue him and return their people. So maybe there is hope.

2 - 18 COUP D'ETAT

A man in the infirmary wakes with a severe case of amnesia. Atlantis's Dr. Elizabeth Weir and Lt. Colonel John Sheppard, along with Dr. Carson Beckett, tell him that he was captured by the Wraith, and is recovering from injuries. His name is Lt. Michael Kenmore, and he serves under Sheppard's command. Holding an injection needle, Dr. Beckett tells the man he is diabetic and must take insulin to stay alive.

Michael is disoriented and understandably frustrated, but trusts the people who are there to help him.

Meanwhile, Weir and Sheppard's team agree that Michael must be kept under close supervision. Dr. Kate Heightmeyer, the base's psychologist, recommends reintegrating the young officer into society to speed up his psychological recovery. But Dr. Weir orders bodyguards to attend him wherever he goes.

Michael is a nice young man who just can't remember who he is. But he is sure he's not being told everything. He attends a counselling session with Dr. Heightmeyer, but she can't give him a satisfactory answer. In several incidents, it becomes obvious that many Atlantis personnel are uncomfortable with Michael and definitely lying to him about something. Michael has a conversation with McKay and realizes he himself knows about Wraith technology -- but he can't remember how he knows.

Teyla visits Michael in his quarters and reveals he is from Texas, showing him a picture of his parents to help him get reacclimated and to try and spark his memory. But Michael can't remember anything about it, except to say that Teyla herself seems familiar to him. She smiles and tells him that they are friends.

Since Michael needs physical therapy, Teyla works out with him and instructs him in a sparing match. Michael obviously knows how to fight. He throws Teyla to the ground hard, slamming his hand on her chest to hold her down. Teyla is caught off guard, but Michael feels a rush of exhilaration. With pure hatred, Ronon suddenly appears to protect Teyla, throwing Michael against the wall and choking him. The guards and Teyla have to intervene, explaining it was just a training session. He leaves in a huff.

At night, Michael has terrifying dreams. He sees himself walking down corridors inside a Wraith ship. He dreams that he looks into a mirror and a Wraith looks back. Waking up terrified, he is completely confused.

At the gym, he confides in Teyla, who reassures him that many people have had such dreams -- including herself ("The Gift"). She tells him the constant fear of the Wraith is the cause, and not to worry. Later, she reports the conversation. Something is clearly wrong, and Weir suggests that Dr. Beckett up the dose of what he is giving Michael -- but he hesitates for safety reasons.

Unable to sleep, Michael decides to get some sedatives from Dr. Beckett. In the corridor, he meets up with Sheppard and Ronon. Michael apologizes to Ronon for whatever may have offended Ronon in the past and offers his hand. Ronon fixes a deadly stare at Michael and refuses to shake his hand. Michael is confused and steps in the way of Ronon to try and sort out the problem. But Ronon punches Michael in the face and a fight breaks out. Clearly both men are extremely aggressive fighters, and have to be pulled off one another.

When the pills don't help, Michael goes back to the infirmary with his guards in tow. There, he finds Dr. Beckett asleep at his desk. Michael notices data disks with his name on them and, with no one looking, purloins the set, hoping to find out more about what has happened to him and why no one is telling him the whole story. Back in his quarters, Michael proceeds to put the disks into his laptop. He orients his position so the security cameras can't see what he is reviewing on his computer. He watches video of his treatments day by day, each day more disturbing than the next, all the way back to the beginning.

Beckett arrives and a horrified Michael turns the laptop screen so the doctor can see what Michael has discovered: Michael was a Wraith and these folks did something to him as an experiment, transforming him into a human over the course of many painful days.

Michael learns that Wraith have evolved with a combination of human and iratus bug DNA. Using a retrovirus carefully engineered by Carson Beckett, the bug DNA can be suppressed allowing the human DNA to take over and remake the individual into a human. Michael is in anguish over the lies and the nature of the experiment, and over the discovery that he is his people's own worst enemy -- he's not even one of his people at all. He is quick to question the ethics and motivations of the humans. Who gave them the right to do this to him? How do they know that being human is better than being a Wraith?

He also tells Dr. Heightmeyer that the things he has been feeling for days now make sense: it's the hunger, the aggressiveness, the suppressed instincts of a Wraith. And now that he knows what they are, he feels them more intensely.

Weir's justification is that the Wraith will do anything to humans so they can feed. Naturally, humans have a right to defend themselves. But the retrovirus is not a permanent solution yet. Daily injections are necessary to keep the bug DNA at bay. She debates continuing the experiment with the senior staff;

Ronon urges them to kill Michael and be done with it, arguing that no matter how human he looks and acts, he's still a Wraith inside. Over ethical objections, Weir orders the experiment to continue. Beckett will increase the dose of the retrovirus in the hopes of still finding long-term success.

But on the way to get the injection, Michael overpowers his guards and tries to escape. He is recaptured -- but not before killing Sgt. Cole, though he is anguished over having to do it.

For everyone's safety, Weir sends Michael to the Alpha Site to continue the experiment. There he uses Wraith mind control to make Teyla release him. Before Michael takes her through the Stargate, Teyla manages to leave the new address scratched on a stone by the D.H.D. Michael was drawn to a world with a hive ship, and without the drug he quickly begins to regress back to being a Wraith. Struggling with the last of his humanity, Michael gives in to his urge to feed on Teyla.

In the nick of time, Sheppard arrives to shoot Michael. The Wraith from the nearby hive ship recover Michael, who is still alive and no doubt able to reveal that Atlantis was not destroyed in the siege after all ("The Siege, Part 3"). The Atlantis team realizes the Wraith know Atlantis survived. Now, they must prepare for a new Wraith attack.

2 - 19 INFERNO

Lt. Colonel John Sheppard's team visits a civilization using Ancient technology and buildings. They are surprised to learn that the locals are using the equipment and live in the complex. Taranis is not the usual primitive Pegasus Galaxy world. Taranians have used an Ancient shield to protect themselves from being culled by the Wraith. And so, they have progressed farther than most human societies in the Pegasus Galaxy. The team finds buildings left by the Ancients and a control room similar to the one in Atlantis.

The only problem is that the entire compound is built inside the caldera of a dormant super-volcano. The Ancients used the geothermal energy there to power their city, gambling that the volcano would lie dormant for perhaps hundreds of thousands of years. However, the Taranians have tapped into that energy to run the shield continually at full strength (after discovering increased Wraith activity more than a year ago). McKay tells the beautiful Taranian scientist, Norina Pero, that the shields were never designed to run continuously. The excess power consumption has caused the caldera to grow; it's now 40 miles across.

Earthquakes rock the facility continually. As much as McKay wants to preen before the lovely blonde scientist, he is disturbed by the quakes. Sheppard comforts Norina; McKay is upstaged and jealous.

Deep underground, Taranian Chancellor Lycus shows Sheppard a damaged Ancient warship that looks like the Aurora ("Aurora"). Sheppard hurries back to Atlantis to tell Dr. Elizabeth Weir. It's a good bet that McKay can fix the ship using the schematics brought back from the Aurora -- but first he has to fix the Taranians' shield generator.

With so much Ancient technology and a ship at stake, Dr. Weir decides to visit Taranis on a diplomatic mission. A tremendous earthquake rocks the facility during her meeting with the Chancellor. McKay explains that a rift has opened below and now the magma is flowing into it, building up enough pressure to eventually blow up the entire continent. No one seems to understand that Taranis faces an extinction level event. The planet must be evacuated immediately.

Understandably, the Chancellor is suspicious. Taranis has only recently met the Atlantis people and have no way to judge their intent. It appears to be too coincidental that at the time Sheppard's team learned about the Ancient warship, Weir tells the Chancellor to evacuate his world. Dramatically, the ground opens up spewing smoke, collapsing underneath the complex. Dr. Weir invites the Taranians to come to Atlantis for refuge.

The more trusting Norina pleads with the Chancellor to believe the analysis, and he relents. Sheppard's team stays behind to handle the evacuation through the Stargate, while Weir escorts the Chancellor back to Atlantis.

As the Taranians move through the Stargate, another earthquake topples the gate into the lava flow while it is connected to Atlantis. McKay frantically sends a last message through the gate to get the shield raised over the event horizon. Otherwise, the red-hot lava would flow into the Atlantis control room. But the Chancellor is now convinced he has been lured into a trap and is a hostage to be exchanged for the warship. Weir reminds him that her people are trapped back on the planet, too.

McKay begins his usual hysterics in the face of certain doom before he can control himself and deal with the situation. Sheppard tries to calm him by saying Weir will send the Daedalus, which is en route to Atlantis. Sheppard orders McKay to try to fix the warship, naming it "Orion." Norina is amazed that McKay is knowledgeable enough to fix it, and he arrogantly assures her he is.

Soon enough, the Daedalus arrives. Colonel Steven Caldwell tells Sheppard that the Ancient shield is working too well over the complex. He can't beam out the survivors. And they can't turn it off, as the facility would be immediately overcome. Caldwell's life sign scans indicate too many people to be rescued all at one time; his resources are limited on board. The ship will have to make four trips to save everyone -- requiring 12 hours round-trip each. Dr. Carson Beckett does triage on the wounded Taranians to get out the most acute cases first.

Ronon and Teyla work to round up the outlying settlers. Many are too afraid to leave. They think that all they have to do is get far enough away from the volcano. Ronon, Teyla, and Beckett try to explain that the explosion will take out the entire continent. A few remain too stubborn and leave. With everyone else successfully brought into the underground hangar where the Orion is located, the three wait for the return of the Daedalus to evacuate a single family still trapped on the surface. The latest quake has made the route to the Ancient ship impassable.

The ship's shields cannot survive the lava flow under which it is trapped. McKay's new plan is to use the impending explosion itself as their ticket out. The volcano's cataclysm will launch the Orion. By using the shields, McKay can then engage the hyperdrive for a split second to get them into orbit, where they can be saved. The plan is a success, with the Orion leaping into planetary orbit.

The Daedalus arrives in the nick of time to beam out the dying survivors in the barn and rescue the passengers on the Orion.

Although the evacuation was a success, Dr. Zelenka informs Weir that Atlantis's long-range sensors have detected a lone Wraith ship on the way to Atlantis. It is only three weeks away. Even with the new warship and the re-supplied drones ("The Tower"), the city cannot hope to fend off the inevitable Wraith assault, now that they know Atlantis still exists.

2 - 20 ALLIES

A Wraith hive ship detected on approach to Atlantis a few weeks ago ("Inferno") arrives and radios a message. The Wraith address Dr. Elizabeth Weir by name. She concludes that Michael is on board and has informed these Wraith that Atlantis is still intact on the planet ("Michael"), as the Wraith have believed for months that the city was destroyed ("The Siege, Part 3"). Michael is a Wraith that Weir's people recently captured as a test subject, using Dr. Carson Beckett's retrovirus to transform him into a human.

Weir's response is routed through the Daedalus to disguise exactly where the city is located. Michael, transformed more back to his Wraith appearance, appears on the monitor. He informs her that because the Wraith woke up too soon, there are too few humans to feed upon. And since they can't find Earth, the perfect new feeding ground they hoped for, the Wraith now have a civil war on their hands. Michael proposes an alliance to turn enemy Wraith into humans using the retrovirus; then they will feed on their Wraith enemies, and not on humans. And they will also share the secrets of Wraith ships and technology in exchange.

Dr. Weir decides that with the Daedalus and the Orion (a recently discovered Ancient warship) on hand, plus a new supply of Ancient drone weapons, the city can repel one lone hive ship. But she is suspicious.

As a sign of good faith, Michael sends a data burst detailing the Wraith jamming codes established before the war -- information that will allow the Daedalus to defeat enemy counter-measures and beam nukes onto target ships ("The Siege, Part 3"). He warns them not to try to destroy his ship or he will alert all the other Wraith to Atlantis's continued existence. After conferring with Sheppard's team and Colonel Caldwell, Weir decides to work with these Wraith. Teyla is very apprehensive, believing the Wraith are treacherous.

The Wraith Queen and her lieutenants come down to the city to begin tests on the retrovirus. Working with a Wraith scientist, Drs. Beckett and Radek Zelenka discuss the problems of disseminating the retrovirus using aerosol gas or explosive pheromone delivery systems. Currently, the scientists do not know how long it will take to work once it reaches the necessary systems. If it isn't done quickly, the affected ship will open fire on Michael's ship when they use it.

The Wraith Queen explains that, if they are successful, a balance will be established for many generations between the humans and the Wraith of the Pegasus Galaxy. By feeding on other Wraith, they will diminish their own numbers. Hence, the humans of the galaxy will know peace for a long time. But, she wants a demonstration. The retrovirus is tested on one of her own men, and he transforms into a human. The Queen mercilessly feeds on him and declares the test a success. Beckett is wracked with guilt and the others are appalled. Certainly their plan does not come without its ethical dilemmas.

The Queen wants to next test the weapon on an enemy ship, under the pretense of negotiating her own surrender. McKay must devise a system for synchronized release of multiple canisters, which will be planted throughout the ship. Weir demands that her own people observe the attack to make sure the Queen sticks with the plan. But Sheppard and Caldwell worry that the whole attack is premature.

As they feared, the mission is a failure and the hive ships open fire on each other. The so-called friendly Wraith ship takes serious damage, so the Daedalus enters the battle to defend it. Michael's ship makes a hyperspace jump to safety. Back in the city, the Queen angrily demands a better delivery system since her delegation was searched and destroyed before they could place the canisters.

In Atlantis, the McKay and the Asgard Hermiod break the Wraith jamming codes by trial and error. Thinking that he is calling the Queen's bluff, McKay demands all the specifications of a hive ship in order to make an effective delivery system. Much to his surprise the Queen quickly complies, sending all specifications for virtually all Wraith technology. McKay examines the data and discovers that the ships are of organic construction and can heal themselves, for the most part. Repair crews known as Keepers are no longer available, having made their own alliances during the civil war. So, McKay and Ronon go to the hive ship to take readings.

Rodney determines that the CO2 scrubbers are the most effective spot to release the gas; one big canister should do it. So McKay and Sheppard propose flying the Daedalus in the shadow of the larger hive ship to fool the enemy sensors. If they can get close enough to another enemy hive, they can now beam in the gas canister. McKay volunteers to observe in order to continue hacking into the Wraith systems. He has programmed a remote transport device, which he can use to beam out at the first sign of trouble.

When the Daedalus exits hyperspace at the given coordinates, two Wraith ships are lying in wait and begin to attack. In the battle, Caldwell can't get close enough to get McKay and Ronon off the Wraith ship -- and McKay's devices don't work as promised. He and Ronon are taken prisoner. Sheppard tries to disable the Wraith ship using an F-302 fighter craft, while Hermiod discovers the jamming codes have not been broken after all -- so he cannot beam over a nuke. The hive ships jump to hyperspace. Sheppard's fighter is nowhere to be found.

Back in Atlantis, Dr. Zelenka discovers that a computer virus has deleted all the data provided by the Wraith. Worse, it data-mined Atlantis computers and transmitted two things to the enemy: the "Aurora" mission reports and the coordinates of every world in their database. As a result, McKay and Ronon are on the hive ship now on a course for Earth.

3 - 1 NO MANS LAND

On board a Wraith hive ship, Dr. McKay and Ronon Dex have been captured and cocooned. During the battle, Colonel Sheppard flew his F-302 toward one of the hive ships just as it entered hyperspace. He has managed to jump along with it by attaching his ship to the outer hull. With limited air and resources, Sheppard must decide how to disable both hive ships before they can reach the Milky Way.

Luckily, the hive ships are largely organic in their structure. They suffered heavy damage in the battle with the Daedalus and the Ancient warship Orion. Complicating matters for the Wraith, interstellar radiation from hyperspace forces them to stop, make repairs, and let the ships regenerate for many hours in the void between Pegasus and the Milky Way. Dr. Zelenka calculates that there is at least 15 hours of time necessary for those repairs.

Dr. Elizabeth Weir asks a reluctant Colonel Steven Caldwell to launch his ship and the Orion as soon as possible in an attempt to rendezvous with the hive ships. Major Lorne is put in command of the Orion, which is still in no condition to fight. Repairs will have to be continued on the way to the battle. Caldwell realizes that he may have to make the sacrifice of himself and his crews to stop the Wraith from ever making it to Earth. Moreover, these particular Wraith are the only ones who know where Earth is. That knowledge has to be erased from the species by destroying the hive ships.

Dr. Weir's mismanagement of the situation demands answers from her civilian superiors. The Major General Landry asks her to step through to Earth during a routine check-in with Stargate Command.

Reluctantly, Weir leaves Atlantis during the crisis and meets with Richard Woolsey and other representatives of the committee. While there, finger pointing is the name of the game. They don't really want to fire her, but they have to appear to take action. If they relieve her, it is they who will ultimately take responsibility for calling off the desperate bid by the Daedalus and the Orion to reach the two hive ships in time. Realizing the quandary and political ramifications, Weir accepts full responsibility and commands Caldwell to proceed.

On board the hive ships, Ronon and McKay manage to free themselves from their cocoons. Since McKay knows the ship's schematics, the two set off to do as much damage to vital systems as possible before they can be caught again.

Sheppard tries to contact them via radios, but their devices are in a lab where the half-human Wraith, Michael, is cooling his heels. Michael did not completely regress back into being a wraith after ceasing treatments with Dr. Beckett's retrovirus, and now he is an outcast among his original species. Realizing his days are numbered, he answers Sheppard with the communicator. Michael needs an escape and the humans are his only hope, so he offers to help. He directs Sheppard where to launch his missiles to do the most damage. When Darts pursue and disable Sheppard's ship, he is taken into custody aboard the hive.

Michael, pretending to be on assignment by the Hive Queen, manages to take Sheppard away from his captors. He returns the human's weapons and equipment before they go to find McKay and Ronon. When the Daedalus and Orion enter battle with the hive ships, the four manage to beam off their escape craft to the Daedalus.

During the battle, Major Lorne's command of Orion is short-lived as the craft is destroyed. All of the crew manage to beam on to the Daedalus in time. However, there isn't enough air for everyone, and more is venting into space. The only hope for everyone's survival is the air on the one remaining damaged hive ship. But it is filled with Wraith.

Thanks to Michael, the team realizes that canisters of Dr. Beckett's retrovirus are still on board. Because of the damage to the Wraith vessel, they can beam the canisters over and release it as gas. The plan works, and the gas turns the Wraith into humans whose memories are completely wiped. The Queen is the only one unaffected. Sheppard takes a boarding party over to check and secure the ship for the Daedalus, neutralizing the Queen.

Earth forces are now in possession of an adequate oxygen supply, as well as a functioning hive ship.

3 - 2 MISBEGOTTEN

When a Wraith hive ship is detected on approach to Atlantis, Dr. Carson Beckett is deployed to the Ancient's drone weapon chair, prepared to fire on it. On Earth, Dr. Elizabeth Weir receives the report and authorizes the cloak to be engaged from her position at Stargate Command. She has been recalled to answer questions on her failure to contain information about Earth from the Wraith. Fortunately it is Colonel Sheppard and his team who is aboard the hive. Back on Earth, Richard Woolsey of the I.O.A. informs Weir that she is temporarily approved for command while he makes an investigation on site in Atlantis.

As a result of using Dr. Beckett's iratus bug retro-virus on the Wraith hive ship defeated in the void between the galaxies, Atlantis has prisoners of war: Wraith turned into human beings with erased memories. Because keeping them in stasis on board the hive ship consumes so much power, a POW camp is established on a planet with no Stargate. The problem with making Wraith into humans is that they must receive regular injections of Beckett's treatments or they will revert into Wraith. Therefore the doctor is compelled to remain with them for the time being.

Among the POWs is Michael., recently reconverted by Beckett into a human. He had been on the hive ship when Ronon Dex and Dr. McKay were captured. Knowing that his own people didn't trust him anymore (they felt he was not entirely a Wraith), Michael decided to help the Atlantis humans in return for sanctuary. Initially, they gave it to him. But he was frustrated by his limited freedom. Ronon was ordered to stun and subdue him while Dr. Beckett injected the retrovirus -- and Michael Kenmore was resurrected anew.

However, Latham, one of the human-Wraith, is beginning to remember bits of his past. He is sure that the truth is being kept from his group. Michael tries to reason and console him, but the man slips out of camp, wishing to avoid the next scheduled medical treatment for the "plague" for which the Dr. Beckett is ostensibly treating them. Out in the woods, he begins to revert.

Once the man is discovered missing, a search party of human-Wraith confront him. He tries to tell them that they are being deceived. Instead, the others kill him and leave the body at the base of the ridge in a posture meant to resemble suicide.

Woolsey's investigation asks pointed questions concerning the many decisions made concerning the Wraith. He interviews Sheppard over the decision to create the 200 Wraith-human community on the POW planet. He objects to Weir, who tells him that Woolsey is more likely to help them than anyone else at the I.O.A..

Dr. Beckett follows the Wraith to a gathering in the woods. They have also begun to revert. Michael discovers him. His Wraith features are returning, and most of his memory is back -- enough to know he's been betrayed twice. They waited until Sheppard left with the soldiers so that only the medical staff was present to make their move. These reverted Wraith have focused their communicative energies to contact a hive ship, which is now on the way.

Woolsey points out the problem of leaving the Wraith-humans to be found by other Wraith. Knowing what was done, they would know Atlantis still exists, and Michael knows how to find Atlantis -- and Earth. This secret must be protected.

Sheppard is forced to return and deal with the Wraith with nukes. The Daedalus is not operational enough to make the strike on the camp, so he chooses to use the captured hive ship. The only individual remotely capable of controlling it is Teyla because she possesses some of the Wraith gene. Having the gene means she can activate controls others can not. When the craft reaches orbit, secondary systems come online because other Wraith life signs are detected. McKay realizes some of the prisoners have reverted. By acting together, they have managed to call their brethren.

Michael interrogates Dr. Beckett in the hopes of discovering any backup plan left behind by Sheppard in case something goes wrong while he's away. He learns that all Sheppard has to do is send a signal to activate a nuke in the camp. Hoping to save Beckett and the guards, Sheppard takes a Puddle Jumper to the planet to deposit the nuke himself.

The team arrives to find only Dr. Beckett alive. They make it to the Jumper and tell McKay to detonate the nuke. Nothing happens. Michael has deactivated it. Sheppard orders a strike from the captured hive ship. At that moment, another Wraith hive arrives and fires on Sheppard's hive. They cannot be certain they've eliminated everyone in the encampment on the surface.

Later, the Daedalus arrives to see only debris from the captured hive ship. No life signs are on the planet. Sheppard and his team managed to escape their destroyed hive ship cloaked in the Puddle Jumper. They dock with the Daedalus and depart.

Woolsey returns to Earth to report on his findings to the I.O.A.. He will recommend that Weir remain in command. In fact, he intends to doctor his reports in her favor.

3 - 3 IRRESISTABLE

Colonel Sheppard and his team are searching the Pegasus Galaxy for Stargates they can harvest. Since some planets are unoccupied, their gates serve no purpose. Dr. McKay and Colonel Samantha Carter devised a way to organize a Stargate string which would cross the void between Pegasus and Milky Way galaxies, which would reduce travel time on a Deep Space Carrier from three weeks to thirty minutes. McKay is ecstatic.

However, at one planet they detect lifesigns and decide to investigate. There, they find a happy community in thrall to a beatific smiling schmo, Lucius Lavin. With the demeanor of a snake oil salesman, the gregarious Lucius, with six wives, is overbearing and friendly. He frantically offers to trade with the team. They beat a hasty retreat, with Sheppard in the throes of a nasty head cold. After a promise to return, Dr. Carson Beckett arrives later to discover what Lucius and his people might have to trade.

Dr. Beckett soon becomes enthralled with Lucius and his silly stories, so much so that Beckett returns to Atlantis with Lucius in tow. The man brings a prized gift of a candle stuck in a gourd, presenting it to Dr. Elizabeth Weir

The team has not discovered that Lucius is ingesting a mysterious, clear elixir in private. With this mixture his body emits pheromones which cause both men and women to take an interest in him to the point, ignoring their own self-interests. The Atlantis base is soon overcome to the excitement of giddy children in Lucius's presence. The man needs a re-supply of the herb he uses to make the elixir, and manipulates everyone into wanting to risk their lives with the Wraith to retrieve some. The only planet where it is grown naturally is currently occupied by a Wraith garrison.

Dr. Beckett, Teyla, and Ronon Dex make the raid on the planet retrieving several large bags filled with the herb. To Sheppard's horror, they seem to be laughingly oblivious to the terrible risk they just took. And so is everyone else. When Sheppard objects, Lucius merely has to comment that something is 'wrong' with Sheppard for the others to collectively stand against him. Even the impenetrable Ronon turns his gun on his commander.

Realizing he has to play along, Sheppard apologizes, admitting that he is tired. He picks his moment to return to Lucius' planet to uncover his secret. He discovers the villagers are sick and pining for the man's return -- like drug addicts in withdrawal. Sheppard locates a small quantity of the potion and returns to the base.

Sheppard abducts Dr. Beckett in a Puddle Jumper, forcing him to quit Lucius cold turkey while instructing him to formulate an antidote. Soon he and Sheppard camp out on Lantea's mainland, awaiting capture. Soon enough, Teyla and Ronon arrive by Jumper to take everyone back to the city.

Believing that Dr. Beckett is going to give the A.T.A. therapy by inoculation to Lucius, he accepts the injection. Actually, he is given a dose of Beckett's antidote. Sheppard, who has mysteriously escaped, now sneaks Lucius in the Puddle Jumper and back to his planet so the rest of the base can begin their recovery.

Sheppard offers to return the hapless Lucius to his own planet, but not before everyone there gets the antidote. One thing is certain: When all is said and done, not many in the village will be happy with him.

After gating to another world, Colonel Sheppard, Teyla, Dr. McKay discover that Ronon has previously visited this planet. The villagers recognize him as the man responsible for bringing the Wraith to cull them. At the time, Ronon had a Wraith tracking device implanted in his back so the creatures could hunt him, and when they arrived they wiped out most of the village in the process. (That device has long since been removed)

Nevertheless, Keturah and his people are not happy to see Ronon again. In a firefight, the team is shot with tranquilizer darts and McKay is hit in his buttocks with an arrow. Rodney manages to dial Atlantis for help. But the villagers imprison the rest of Sheppard's team. After Ronon's last visit, the Wraith left a communicator to call them should Ronon ever return. They do not hesitate to take the opportunity now. Keturah explains that in return the Wraith have promised to never cull his people again Teyla is incredulous that anyone would believe a Wraith promise.

Ronon pleads with the villagers to release his friends. When he makes no headway, he threatens to commit suicide with a knife before the Wraith arrive, thus angering them further and making a culling a certainty. The rest of the team is released and returned to the Stargate. Once back at Atlantis, Sheppard re-arms to take another military team to get Ronon. In the space of half an hour, the Wraith have come to collect Ronon -- and completely massacre the village.

The Wraith implant a new transmitter in Ronon. They release him back on Sateda, his own homeworld, to be hunted while a sadistic Wraith Commander watches from the ship.

Although Ronon knows the territory, the Wraith aren't looking for an even match. They deploy tracking drones and multiple hunters. Ronon lays various traps, eliminating the hunters, only to have even more replaced each round.

Using the long-range sensors on Atlantis, Dr. McKay uses the device originally removed from Ronon to determine how to find him. Though there are seven such devices in operation in the Pegasus Galaxy at this time (possibly all of them runners), he finds a signal on the star map which points to Sateda. This must be Ronon.

Knowing a Wraith hive ship is likely to be in orbit over Sateda, Colonel Caldwell agrees only to load a Puddle Jumper on the Daedalus so Sheppard's team can finish the last leg cloaked to rescue Ronon themselves.

Sheppard leaves McKay and Beckett inside the Jumper while he and Teyla search for Ronon, using a device that can track him. They find the wounded Ronon in the hospital where he last saw his wife -- and watched her die -- during the Wraith attack. While being hunted by his previous oppressors, he has flashbacks to the final moments before the Wraith obliterated his society. Sheppard finds him and orders him to return to the Jumper, but Ronon refuses. He will not leave until he has his revenge on the Wraith commander.

Aboard the hive ship, the commander witness Sheppard's arrival on his view screen, and sends an entire squadron of Wraith hunters after the team. Fueled by Ronon's rage, Sheppard's group eliminates all the hunters in a vicious firefight. Ronon finds a relay device on a warrior's corpse and baits the commander to come down and fight him personally. Then he threatens Sheppard not to interfere, threatening to kill his ally afterwards for intervening.

A dart transports the commander to the surface to fight Dex in hand-to-hand combat himself. He soon proves to be a match for Ronon, brutally pounding the Satedan.

Sheppard and Teyla monitor the fight from a nearby roof. Despite the obvious fact that Ronon is losing, she cautions him against acting, as the hive ship is monitoring. Not knowing about this threat, McKay and Beckett steer the Puddle Jumper into the fight pit and decloak a meter from the Wraith commander. Beckett fires a drone, plowing into the Wraith and careening him across the alley into a wall, destroying him. Immediately, the hive ship fires on the Jumper, but Ronon is pulled into the ship before the ship is struck.

Apprehensive of Ronon's wrath at not being the one to kill the Wraith, McKay tells Ronon that it was all Beckett's idea to shoot. But Ronon grabs Beckett in a bear hug, thanking him. Beckett instructs that he must remove the tracking device as soon as possible, hoping that Ronon will now allow him to use a Sedative. But as before, Ronon collapses, unconscious.

3 - 5 PROGENY

In the Atlantis control room, Dr. Weir and Colonel Sheppard observe a M.A.L.P transmission through an open wormhole. The probe has been sent to a world recently discovered in an off-world database. Someone speaks into the camera warning them to stay away if they are up to no good -- or to come as friends.

Eager to trade with a seemingly advanced civilization, Dr. Weir decides that it is appropriate for her to join the away mission and gears up. Once through, the team find themselves in an exact duplicate of the Atlantis Gate room. Turning, they look through the Stargate to see, not a stained glass wall, but a lengthy corridor connecting to an endless city. Intrigued, they wait until approached by a man, Niam. He invites them to come and meet the leader.

Oberoth is unimpressed and haughty. An offer of trade and a possible alliance is met with immediate rejection. He thinks the Asurans are enough advanced that they don't need anything from Atlantis. Dr. Weir has already witnessed a giant city that far exceeds Atlantis in size and design. It is obvious that these are extremely advanced people. Weir soon learns from Niam that the Asurans can easily manufacture Z.P.M.s which are necessary to power Atlantis and its shield.

Oberoth admits to powering their city with the Z.P.M. technology since they split from the Lanteans. In the hopes of obtaining a Z.P.M., Weir explains their struggle against the Wraith. Oberoth imperiously informs her that the Asurans will deal with the Wraith at a time of their choosing, without regard to the plight of Atlantis or any other Pegasus inhabitants.

Angered, Dr. Weir decides to terminate negotiations. But the group is detained as they near the Stargate. They are imprisoned and interrogated. Oberoth wants information about the whereabouts and operations of Atlantis. These people are human-form Replicators who stick their hands in the heads of each team member to extract information. Like the human-form Replicators SG-1 have met ("Unnatural Selection") the process is painful and involves realistic hallucinations to elicit information. Each team member has a different encounter. McKay realizes who and what the creatures are and informs the group.

Oberoth has decided to terminate the Atlantians, but Niam insists there is still much they can learn from them. Assuring his subordinate that their actions are not only Niam's responsibility, Oberoth allows them to be freed.

With no way to escape, the team is surprised when Niam arrives to offer a deal. The Asurans mimic their creators, the Ancients, so exactly that some want to achieve ascension. Since they were created to fight the Wraith, they have aggressive programming which Niam believes is the stumbling block to achieving true enlightenment. Worse, the Asurans cannot reprogram their basic code, an Ancient fail-safe.

With several powered Z.P.M.s Atlantis can fly and power its shield and engines. The Asuran city's replica of the city separates from the umbilical arm and launches into space. Oberoth intends to destroy Atlantis as a final revenge against the Ancients. Meanwhile, Niam takes Dr. Weir into an hallucination, explaining his people's history. She learns that the Ancients created the machines to be a weapon against the Wraith. But eventually, the time came when they decided to erase that mistake by raining fire upon the civilization via Ancient warships.

Niam asks Dr. McKay to reprogram him to be less aggressive in return for his actions to save the team and the real Atlantis. McKay agrees and manages to find the way to reprogram Niam, who will then update the other's programming via the Asurans' wireless network (much like the way modern Replicators communicate). However, the deception is discovered. But McKay has also found the means to temporarily "freeze" the Replicators who have not been updated.

Dr. Weir orders McKay to destroy the city. Unfortunately the only way to do it quickly is to overload every Z.P.M., making it impossible to take any back to Atlantis. They steal a Puddle Jumper, just as the city explodes in Lantian orbit.

Atlantis now faces an even greater threat than the Wraith: sophisticated human-form Replicators.

3 - 6 THE REAL WORLD

Sitting in a psychiatric hospital outside Washington, D.C., Dr. Elizabeth Weir is shocked to be told that Atlantis is a figment of her profoundly stressed imagination. In fact, the last two years of her life as she remembers them never happened. Her psychiatrist, Dr. Adam Fletcher, informs her that a car accident which killed her fiancé, Simon Wallace, caused post traumatic stress which recently surfaced. She has been suffering delusional psychosis triggered by the stress of negotiating a nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Weir refuses to believe him. She demands to meet with Major General Jack O'Neill. He comes to the mental institution professing to have no idea what she is talking about. He assures her that there is no Stargate program, let alone him ever running it. As far as he understands it, there is no lost City of Atlantis (just a rock song he never liked). When Weir imagines his head flipping around on his shoulders, she is sufficiently upset to tell him to leave. She even gets violent trying to exit the sanitorium. The doctor medicates her into submission.

Fletcher wants Elizabeth to accept what has happened to her, but nightmares convince her that something more is afoot.

After several days in his care, group therapy, and a visit from Weir's own mother, she begins to believe that she has simply imagined running the Atlantis expedition. Though she previously flushed her medication down the toilet, she begins taking them, and in Fletcher's eyes doing much better. He allows her to return to her apartment in Washington, D.C., where she is met by her dog. In familiar surroundings, she meets again with O'Neill. She is ready to start teaching her old poly-sci class, but the General asks her to return to the negotiations which she left hanging.

But back in the real world, in Atlantis, Elizabeth lays in the infirmary in a coma, under the care of Dr. Carson Beckett and the concerned watch of her friends. She has been infected by Replicator nanites in her encounter with the Asuran defector Niam ("Progeny"), and the microscopic, artificial creatures are replicating rapidly, using her body as raw materials. Soon she will die -- or, worse, be transformed into a Replicator one cell at a time.

Colonel John Sheppard talks to Elizabeth from outside the isolation curtain, encouraging her to fight them. In her dream world, she begins to get the message and, convinced again that they are doing her more harm than good, stops taking her medications.

Soon her nightmares resurface, and she sees a shadowy, featureless figure through glass, in her sleep, and at the oddest moments. These images terrify her. She even hears a voice telling her to get back to Atlantis. Once again, she is returned to the mental hospital for treatments.

Dr. Beckett and Dr. Rodney McKay race to find a cure to the highly advanced, artificial infection. The problem is that, because the nanites have bonded with her own cells, eliminating the Replicators inside Weir with an electromagnetic pulse (as the team used effectively against nanites before ["Hot Zone"]) could leave her brain dead. Since the Ancients designed the Replicators to fight the Wraith, Beckett injects Wraith tissue into Weir's leg to draw as many nanites as possible away from her brain. McKay's EM pulse eliminates most -- but not all -- of the nanites. They only begin replicating again.

With that short reprieve, Weir hears John more clearly through her coma, telling her to fight. In her mind, the Replicators pull out the stops trying to intimidate her and frighten her. When she cooperated with the fantasy world they were showing her, they were able to spread more rapidly and voraciously.

Fleeing her captors, Weir finds herself running through the corridors of Stargate Command, inside Cheyenne Mountain. Sheppard appears, urging her to follow him -- as in the real world John breaks the quarantine to enter the isolation area and connect physically with Elizabeth. Even General O'Neill appears to "save" her from Sheppard. But she braves even firing assault rifles to run after Sheppard. At the Stargate's event horizon, her psychiatrist appears to block her path, morphing into Liam himself. He tries one last time to impede her entry into the gate.

Bravely, Weir steps right through him and into the Stargate, saving herself and finding her way back to the real world. She wakes up to find her friends at her side, back in Atlantis.

STARHUNTER (INC STARHUNTER 2300)

It is the year 2300. Bounty hunter Travis Montana and his female cousin Percy patrol the galaxy hunting criminals. Travis, who was kidnapped as a baby by Raiders, searches for his lost father Dante while investigating the secrets of the mysterious Dvinity Cluster.

Described as the new "anti-Star Trek," Starhunter, a $22-million sci-fi series shot in the remote locale of Minto, n.b. makes its world premiere on TMN-The Movie Network on Nov. 1. The 22-episode series has been a long time coming, and cocreators/producers Daniel D'or and Philip Jackson of Danforth Studios in Toronto are thrilled with how their ideas are translating onto film.

When Playback caught up with D'or and Jackson, the crew was getting ready to shoot the series' 15th installment, an episode known as "Dark and Stormy Night," while prepping to shoot the 16th episode the next day. Starhunter is an international coproduction with France's La Sabre (a subsidiary of Canal +), Grosvenor Park Productions uk and Danforth. The series is being shot almost entirely in New Brunswick, making it the largest production to ever hit the province.

Starhunter is set 300 years in the future, after the Earth's authority has collapsed. A lot of the worlds in the universe have been colonized and Dante Montana, a bounty hunter in command of a renegade group known as the Raiders, is on a mission to find his missing son somewhere in the universe. The creators have called their series the "anti-Star Trek" and D'or is confident the series will appeal to all sci-fi fans because it dares to be different.

"We've gone off in a very different direction [with Starhunter]," says D'or. "Science fiction has always been very difficult from my perspective. I think traditional audiences are looking for something that is unique and different. That has always been Philip's philosophy: different is better." While at natpe in '96, D'or says he could sense a real demand for a sci-fi product that was more than just another Star Trek spin-off or wanna-be. Despite an initial reluctance to head back into the science fiction world, the pair agreed to give it a go at natpe. The result of their decision has completely turned around the production scene in New Brunswick.

Aside from some shooting being done in the u.k. (all of which is directed by D'or) and some location work in New Brunswick, the bulk of Starhunter is being shot in a 150,000-square-foot converted warehouse in Minto, n.b., where roughly 20 interior and exterior sets have been erected and maintained for the series. Jackson says he is astonished by how authentic the sets look - as "authentic" as something set centuries into the future can look, anyway. One of the main sets Jackson is most pleased with is "The Tulip," Montana's bounty hunting ship - one time used as a luxury liner back in the days when the Earth was still more than a wasteland. It was used on tourist missions to the colonized moons and other worlds.

"This was a luxury liner originally done in the Victorian style with cupids and valour wallpaper, and when transport and the trade ended, The Tulip was left to rot in orbit and cannibalized for over a hundred years," says Jackson. "It was retro-fit to become a bounty hunter ship, so you have this luxurious Victorian liner, falling apart, with military technology sticking out very inappropriately here and there."

The exterior, he says, is just as complex. It is generated by a computer but still manages to match its innards. He says there are a number of sets which will be used continuously as different locations within The Tulip. "We also have sets for the surfaces of other worlds and the interior of other spaceships," says Jackson. "We've been able to create a great visual variety, notwithstanding the fact that this is not the biggest budget in the world."

The decision to shoot the lion's share of the series in New Brunswick was not an easy one, says Jackson, but one the Starhunter team is not regretting. "New Brunswick has very good tax credits and we saw a business opportunity there and they worked very hard to get us down here," says Jackson. "We've been looking to establish opportunities to put down a long-term infrastructure and expand where the most viably economic conditions are. It's less about Starhunter and more about Danforth's long-term view of where the company is going." D'or elaborates, explaining Danforth's plans to entrench itself on the East Coast.

"The idea is to stay and develop an industry on the East Coast. New Brunswick is a very good place to do that," says D'or, grateful for the support of Film nb in doing this. D'or says Danforth is in talks to acquire a sizable studio in Toronto as well, which will give the production company "a firm infrastructure in both places." Much of the crew of Starhunter has been plucked from the New Brunswick production community. Jackson estimates 40% of the crew hail from the province., while many others are based somewhere on the East Coast. "There are a lot of experienced people here and a lot of people who are climbing up the ladder and learning the trade," says Jackson. "We've had some wonderful experiences from the people we've met. I really like the long-term relationship potential.

"The real key is to have a self-sufficient infrastructure there because you need equipment and people right away," adds D'or. "The last thing you want to do is start importing, so our future plan is to establish an infrastructure in New Brunswick, get people trained, get an equipment facility there and set it up as a major player in the industry." After its tmn premiere, Starhunter will air on Canal +, Superchannel and Super Ecran. Space: the Imagination Station (ChumCity was the first buyer in) has the first non-pay-tv window in Canada. With the first 22 episodes not even completely in the can, D'or foretells of another sci-fi series in the Danforth development file called Earthspell. "[Earthspell] has a whole different look, but hopefully we'll have two sci-fi series' running back-to-back next year."

I've seen the first two of the three episodes that have aired so far, and it's not too bad. It has a gritty feel to it, but I agree with Mark that the acting is occasionally a little over the top. But I think the show is intentionally dark. I admit that may be to hide the lower budget - Lexx suffers from the same problem, but I think it fits the show.

Besides Michael Pare, the show features Claudette Roche, and Tanya Allen, who Canadians may recognize from "The Newsroom". The show is co-produced by Space: The Imagination Station here in Canada, so it will definately turn up there after it's run on the The Movie Network. Count on them editing out the nudity, though. The show is also co-produced by companies in the UK and France, so it will probably be airing there soon, as well. Part of the show was filmed at Silver Road Studios in England. many of the guest stars also appear to be British.

It's also on Superchannel in western Canada as well as a movie cabler in the US (the name escapes me for now). The only writeup I saw was earlier this year (I believe it was in the early summer) in the Vancouver Sun. The article was about a labour dispute which occurred over alleged safety issues on "Starhunter"'s set, halting production. Beyond that, nothing exists as to premise, who's producing it, how many eps, if there's syndication plans etc.

Living not too far away from where it was filmed, and knowing some of the people involved (many of the on-set computer panels were designed by a friend of mine), I was eager to see this series. I was very surprised to find almost no information about it yet, but I suspect that they are giving it a "limited trial" before pushing it out to the grand public. Sadly, the one episode I've seen so far (the second episode) was pretty bad: poor lighting, unimpressive to unforgivable filming, somewhat silly acting (but not bad enough to be good)...

Granted, the outer space stuff all looked good, and the show's premise (about an interplanetary bounty hunter cruising within the solar system) has promise... It's really hard to judge from the first episode. I should get a chance to see the first and third episodes in the coming week, and might comment more after I've seen them.

STARK

Set mainly in Australia, it tells of a dastardly plot being hatched by a powerful group of international financiers and power brokers. The plan - known as the Stark Conspiracy - is simple: to destroy the already ravaged world but save themselves, by building a space ark to carry them off to a bright new future.

The only ones standing in their way are a very motley crew of eco-activist hippies, roused by the rebellious Rachel. Tagging along, and providing the comic sub-plot, is Elton himself, as would-be writer Colin `CD' Dobson, who's more concerned about bedding the lovely Rachel than saving the planet. Veteran actor John Neville heads the supporting cast as the chief conspirator De Quincey, and Derrick O'Connor, well-known for his `menacing heavy' roles, played a wacked-out eco-crusader.

A cautionary tale about pollution based on comedian Ben Elton's best-selling 1989 satirical novel. Elton not only wrote the book, he adapted it for TV and starred in it as well, so if it had turned out a disaster we'd know who to blame. Veteran actor John Neville heads the supporting cast as the chief conspirator De Quincey, and Derrick O'Conner, well-known for his "menacing heavy" roles, played a wacked-out eco-crusader. The producers for the series were Michael Wearing, David Parker and Timothy White, the director was Nadia Tass and the music was by Colin Towns. The series was shown on BBC1 in 1993.

Nothing makes television more watchable than a decent disaster, and Stark's disaster is an ecological apocalypse -the world choking under the poisons of modern society. Ben Elton has adapted his own best selling book for this BBC/Australian co-production, and also plays the lead role, in a departure from his fast talking comic im-age that could potentially have been quite damaging.

Would-be Brit writer CD (that's Colin Dobson, played by Elton) is living in Australia and desperate to bed the ravishing Rachel (Jacqueline McKenzie) - but she doesn't 'do sex'. Meanwhile, in Los Angeles, a gathering of financial giants from across the globe make a proposal to Australian magnate Sylvester Morgan (Colin Prieis). They want him to procure a territory in Western Australia, which they declare is rich in Uranium deposits. The presence of so many moguls in one place stimulates the curiosity of Wall Street journalist Chrissie (Deborah-Lee Pruness), who de-duces that they have stimulated the world-wide financial crash, and she subsequently becomes a target for liquidation.

Morgan buys the Aborigines off the land, but not before discredited tycoon Ocker Tyron has applied some brute force to the community. This intimidation alerts Rachel, and with CD in tow, she sets about uncovering Morgan's scheme. Then Morgan learns the truth from the spokesman of the Stark Conspiracy, De Quincey (John Neville). Their strategy is a re-sponse to the fact that the world is dying from Total Toxic Overload... This is television at its most watchable; tightly plotted, with sharp dialogue and a plot which changes direction on numerous occasion without ever losing credibility. There are some remarkable larger-than-life characters, from the heroine pumping British aristocrat De Quincey, to Sixties' throwbacks Karen (Fiona Press), Zimmerman (Derrick O'Connor) and Walter (Bill Wallis).

The imagery is startling and sobering, with the ramifications of TTO epitomized by the unbreathable fumes of Los Ange-les, the litter-ridden beaches of Australia and the chemically polluted seas. And should the more upbeat climax leave the viewer with a feeling of confidence, the epilogue, voiced by De Quincey, immediately kindles a response of insecurity. There's no denying that Stark is Elton's show, and he certainly gives a qualified performance as CD. True, at times he's a little too large for the small screen, but nevertheless he has cleared the hurdle into dramatic television. As a proven comic, author, scriptwriter and actor, his continued rise provokes admiration - and just a small twinge of nausea. Stark was a ray of Aussie sunshine during the long winter nights - with a dis-tinct lack of ozone layer, of course.

STARLOST,THE

In the year 2790 A.D., a giant Earthship, Ark, drifts through deep space, out of control, its crew having been killed five hundred years earlier. When the accident that killed the crew occurred, the airlocks connecting the ship's domes that housed the last survivors of the dead planet, Earth, were sealed. Cut off from the outside world, many communities simply forgot that they were on a spacecraft. They accepted that their world was fifty miles in diameter and the sky was metal. Content with their lot, no one knew that their world was in grave danger. Without a crew at the helm, the Ark was on a collision course with a sun.

The Starlost premiered on television loosely based on a concept created by Harlan Ellison. Meticulously and lovingly devised by Ellison and brought to perfection by Scientific Advisor Ben Bova, the series promised to be a monumental step for SF television. Ellison had contracted great SF writers such as A.E. Van Vogt, Frank Herbert, Joanna Russ, Thomas M. Disch, Alexei Panshin, Phillip K. Dick, and Ursula K. Le Guin to write storylines that would be scripted by the best Canadian writers available. Douglas Trumbull would be Executive Producer and create the special effects via the Magicam system. Looked good, it sounded good, it fell apart.

The Starlost regressed into a low-budget, syndicated show with all the SFX being accomplished ineffectively through chroma-key, the method used in TV newscasts to put pictures behind the commentators. Trumbull left before production began as did Ellison, who used his pen name as series creator and writer of episode one. Only Ursula K. Le Guin's storyline made it into production. The end product was a dismal reflection of the glories promised. After about 16 episodes, The Starlost vanished into the void. Harlan Ellison created this series, which botched his production so completely that he had his name taken off the credits. A giant spaceship has several cultures of people on board who have forgotten that they are on a spaceship. Robert Heinlein created this plot in the excellent novel "Universe" and Brian Aldiss gave it a new twist in "non-stop."

When the series did appear in 1973, as a syndicated series, it met with almost universal derision, for its dull plots, cardboard characters, static dialogue, and distractingly cheap visual tricks. STAR TREK's Walter Koenig appeared in a couple of episodes as an alien called Oro. Only 16 of the planned 24 episodes were shown. The series was shown on CTV in Canada.

Although it had one of the most ambitious concepts in TV history, the producers of The Starlost were forced to bring it to life with restricted technology and limited production values. Twentieth Century-Fox executive Robert Kline asked writer Harlan Ellison to come up with an idea for a science fiction series. Kline liked Ellison's idea of a space-age Noah's Ark and tried to sell the idea to England's BBC network. When the BBC rejected the idea, Kline sold it to Canada's CTV network. The show would also air over 40 of NBC's affiliate stations in America. However, The Starlost was dogged by problems. Ellison, who left the show early on because of creative differences, was so unhappy with the final product that he put his pen name, Cordwainer Bird, on the screen.

One summary of the birth and death of The Starlost is offered by the show's producer, William Davidson. A graduate of Canada's Lorne Greene Academy of Radio Arts in 1948, he was immediately hired by the National Film Board of Canada, and with writer friend Norman Klenman, he later produced documentaries, drama series and features. "Arthur Weinthal of CTV and Ted Delaney of CFTO-Glen Warren called me in to discuss producing The Starlost," recalls Davidson. "I thought it was a terrific concept and offered strong dramatic possibilities and popular appeal. I knew Harlan, by reputation, as a kind of science fiction guru. When I met him, I was equally impressed by his ideas and his incredible energy.

I brought about 34 Canadian writers in to meet him, and he chose some of them to begin working with him. Meanwhile, his U.S. contacts began to show an interest in the series." Ellison, initially excited over the project, contacted such science fiction novelists as Philip Dick, A.E. Van Vogt, Joanna Russ and Frank Herbert to write for the show. The technical advantage for The Starlost was using Doug Trumbull's new technology, Magicam, to film the series. Trumbull's special effects credits included 2001: A Space Odyssey ( 1968) and Silent Running (1972). Trumbull's revolutionary new process would allow the actors to be transposed into miniature models and lavish landscapes to convey their travels through the domes (each of which was supposed to be 50 miles in diameter). It would give the series incredible visual leeway at an economical cost.

"I appreciated the opportunity to work with Doug Trumbull and to introduce his Magicam process to television production," says Davidson. "Doug is a genius and one of the nicest people you could work with. He was full of enthusiasm and energy. He brought his family up with him and rented a cottage north of Toronto. Then there was CFTO-Glen Warren. As a videotape production facility, they were as good as any facility in the world. Managing to get their senior production staff man, Ed Richardson, as associate producer and director was icing on the cake. The potential for something great was there." The promise of great things soon fizzled. "As we went into production, a couple of unexpected things happened," recalls Davidson. "Harlan quit on us. The full story of his 'deserting the ship' is very complex. He's written, in very harsh terms, about his involvement with the project." (Ellison's description of his Starlost experience appears as a supplement to his book Phoenix 4 Without Ashes, a novelization of his original Starlost pilot script.)

"I'm sure Harlan's rage and indignation are genuine and deep. Whatever the complete story, he made no attempt whatsoever to understand our budget and production problems. He wrote scripts and story ideas that called for Spielberglike production budgets. Then he had his lawyers give us the 'bird' with his nom-de-plume, Cordwainer Bird. "The other major event was that Doug Trumbull's Magicam system didn't work in time. We went into production with an overnight switch back to the standard technique of electronically joining images of static background settings, and having the performers working in front of blue curtains. "We all felt very sorry for Doug. He had problems in delivering his system on time, and it was very unfortunate for everyone. I lost a valuable associate."

Associate producer Ed Richardson says, "Initially, we had Keir Dullea, Harlan Ellison and Doug Trumbull, and that gave it a science fiction marquee of three people who knew about science fiction. I directed a promotional piece for the show with Trumbull, and we tried a number of effects with Keir in the studio. We were trying to create a video technology as we went along. The special effects device that should have worked, didn't. If it had, it would have enabled us to take miniature models and put our actors into them. We could have created all kinds of hills and valleys and monsters and blended our live actors into that. The process, however, only worked sparingly and quickly fell down. We had to film the series static, and it turned out flat."

Davidson retains a modest nostalgia and some regret about The Starlost. As the seams began to unravel, he says, "there were a few handicaps, but we thought we could handle everything." When Kline's efforts to sell to the BBC were unsuccessful, the production venue was changed to Toronto. "CFTO-Glen Warren studios agreed to mount the production at a fraction of the budget estimates," says Davidson. "We had a budget of $100,000-125,000, less than many one-minute commercials. We went right into program one, 'Voyage of Discovery,' cold. We ended up with a budget overage of 50 percent or more. Immediately, we had to tighten up costs.

"There were no scripts at all; Doug's Magicam process wasn't working yet; studio space was very tight for such an ambitious project and the completion schedule was frightening. There was no time for rehearsal for the performers. We had a four-day shoot, seven days for complex video tape editing, laying music and effects, and turning out a two-inch master completed program for the U.S. three days later. We knew we would be working 24 hours a day, seven days a week. The lights never went out in the Starlost offices." For casting, NBC wanted a recognizable star for the series. Actor Keir Dullea was living in London and agreed to move to Toronto for the series' duration. Canadian newcomers Gay Rowan and Robin Ward were recruited as co-stars.

"Keir Dullea had been contracted before I signed on," recalls Davidson. "I had a high regard for his acting skills. He was a nice, enthusiastic person. He was very intense, and intrigued by the character of Devon. He found the pressure of television series production, and videotape in particular, to be very stressful, but he gave it everything he had. Robin Ward was perfect in the role, and the complete professional. Gay Rowan was intelligent, charming and although lacking a little in experience, I felt she could become a big star. A second season would have given more attention to Gay's role. She was full of creative ideas on how to develop her character."

Norman Klenman, a Canadian writer who had worked extensively in American episodic TV, recalls, "Arthur Weinthal told me the Americans wouldn't do a show in Canada unless it had an American star and American head writer. I had done a lot of work at Fox, so they zeroed in on me. There had never been any major Canadian series done from here [Canada] to there [U.S.]." Klenman's dealings with Ellison were rocky at best. "When I read his bible for The Starlost and his first draft of the opening episode, I nearly gave birth to a cow. Bad is one thing. Boring is another. I regretted having to give Harlan a call and introduce myself to him. I knew him to be an egotistical son of a bitch. I said to him, 'Harlan, I'm on my way to Toronto to work on the show. I haven't had any experience in science fiction. I gather you wrote the pilot?' He was snarky on the phone. I said, 'Well, then, to hell with you!'

"When I got to Toronto, they gave me his pilot to read, and it was dreadful biblical nonsense. The idea of people stranded on a sphere on a spaceship wasn't bad, but everything else was boring. I rewrote it and tried to lighten it up and make the characters more three-dimensional. Ellison later went moaning and groaning around the country, advertising his disappointment with the Starlost series. The strange thing was, Harlan later won a Writer's Guild of America award for his [original] script." Associate producer Ed Richardson says, "Harlan Ellison is an incredible writer. Most of my dealings with him were on the phone when he was in a Toronto hotel room, writing. I have a great deal of respect for Ellison. He stuck to his guns and knows damn well what he wants. He's a feisty guy-the Muhammad Ali of science fiction."

Right after Ellison left, it became clear The Starlost was imbued in technical problems. "[Doug Trumbull's] new process would have made the shooting of the spaceship model much more realistic," says Klenman. "But they didn't have the technology ready. All the technical work was eventually done by CFTO in Toronto, and they did a fairly good job. CFTO was a huge production facility and was one of the early videotape producers in North America."

It remained a disappointing compromise. Instead of a vibrant and innovative-looking show, The Starlost emerged as a static series, with its actors confined to peculiar-looking sets and claustrophobic direction. For audiences expecting the technical equivalent of a Star Trek, The Starlost fell a planet short.

"There's a Paula Abdul commercial where she's dancing with the late Fred Astaire," says Klenman. "You can do that with today's film technology. All we could do in 1973 was to film a spaceship model in a black studio, with pinpoints of light in the background as stars. We moved the camera to give the illusion of the ship traveling through space. Because of the lack of special effects, the scripts had to be more character-oriented."

"We had a great bunch of people. Bill Davidson was a superb producer, and Ed Richardson was an excellent director. They put together a good team. But I was the only one in the writing department. There were no writers or scripts prepared. Of the 16, I wrote four, did four massive rewrites of others, and on four more I did minor rewrites. There were four others that came in pretty good shape. There were a lot of good Canadian writers, but almost nobody had been trained in writing American kind of drama. Unless you stood over them, or did it yourself, it didn't work." With Harlan Ellison and Doug Trumbull gone, that left Ben Bova as science consultant. "Harlan had asked me to be science advisor for the series," says Bova. "I was living in New York, and I shuttled back and forth to Toronto."

"My job was to read scripts and find if there were any scientific goofs and find a way around them without totally destroying the scripts. There were plenty of goofs, and I did figure ways around them. I was paid rather handsomely as a consultant, and praised by everybody ... and my advice was totally ignored. They shot the scripts as originally written."

"It was very embarrassing because at the end of these idiotic shows there's a full screen credit: 'Ben Bova, Science Consultant.' I was shocked and dismayed to see all the work I did was absolutely for nothing. It was very disappointing to me, personally. The show was just bad. I was not involved in writing the scripts nor the creative aspects of the show. They were so hard-pressed to get the show done they paid lip service to have a science advisor. I don't just blame the people working on The Starlost. The general TV audience neither knows or cares about scientific accuracy. [However] science fiction fans are very knowledgeable and very critical of scientific inaccuracy. The inept acting, the poor plots, the very poor production values made the show ridiculous, but the scientific goofs just added to the poor quality of the series."

Writer Norman Klenman defends the Starlost team's decisions. "Ben Bova was a nice guy and a big name in science fiction," he says. "But what has science fiction got to do with drama? Stories are stories. Characters are characters. As head writer, I never found anything Mr. Bova had to say germane to our task. It was all sort of intellectual mumbo jumbo. He couldn't reduce it to clear, precise instructions. "TV viewers are interested in the characters, not scientific theory or accuracy. We used very little of the latter two, and no one missed them. Bova was a talented man with a sure reputation. He was too courteous to cause a problem. He was just misplaced on this series."

"Ben tried to be helpful and continued working with us even after his buddy Harlan had jumped ship," observes William Davidson. "I am not suggesting that Ben was happy with the outcome, but I was satisfied with the contributions he made. As it was, we had to use the phone and the mail service. He was a novice about television production, and he never really got to know us and understand our production problems." Nevertheless, Bova found the show's original format inspiring. "The basic idea was of a generational starship that had gone wrong. The people inside believe their ship is their universe. The ship had broken down and was falling into the gravity well of a star. Unless something was done, the ship and everybody aboard were going to perish. That premise is capable of all kinds of themes and stories. It had tremendous flexibility and had the possibilities of very good drama.

"One of the things Harlan wanted to do was to write the show like a novel where each episode was another chapter, so each episode had to be shown in sequence. The pilot of Starlost was very good. Harlan's [original] script was also very good. He's an excellent writer. Whether you love him or hate him, he's one of the best writers in the United States, but by the time they started shooting the scripts, Harlan had left."

Bova found a creative way to vent his spleen over the experience. "The show got so ridiculous that I wrote a satirical novel about it called The Starcrossed. It's based on what really happened during production of The Starlost. Only the names have been changed to protect the guilty.

"The people involved were trying to do their best, but that wasn't good enough. What came out was undoubtedly the worst television series ever. A lot of time was spent staring into the camera." Bova felt the budget problems could have been circumvented. "The less money you have, the more creative you have to be. The budget of The Starlost did not make it a lousy show. It was that the people didn't know what they were doing. The people in the script department were tearing their hair out, trying to get decent scripts. The production people were trying to get the show videotaped and in the can. The problem was that these people didn't understand that what they were doing was bad. They were just concerned with shooting a number of script pages per day and getting the tape done."

Among those laboring under this demanding schedule was Canadian film and stage actor Robin Ward, who nabbed the role of Garth. In the pilot, the elders have promised Rachel in marriage to Garth. When Rachel falls for Devon, Garth becomes her protector and an uneasy ally of Devon as they set out on their journey. "Just about every actor in Canada had been auditioned for the role of Garth," says Ward. "In desperation, they came around to me. I did a screen test, and suddenly I was Garth. "As an actor who was doing theater in Canada, I would have accepted a series called Pharmacists in Space. Even so, I loved the concept and my character, whom I saw as a 'Mennonite in space' with an attitude."

However, that early attitude was too sharp for Ward's taste. "Garth was too negative as originally conceived. I felt he needed to build sympathy with the audience by a gradual relationship with the others. I attempted to do this, but I disliked his lack of humor. "As actors we had some input in improving some dreadful scripts, and lots of input into character, but it really depended on who was directing. Keir, Gay and I became great friends, held together by incredibly long days, sometimes working 20 to 22 hours in a day. "We developed a group sense of humor, and in a sly way-and sometimes not so subtle-we sent up the whole thing when we felt it was becoming a bit silly."

For Ward personally, the silliest moment was a stunt gone awry. "We were all wired up to fly in space. After the others took off, it was my turn. Unfortunately, I'm top heavy. I turned over and flew upside down. They ended up leaving that in the show." Looking back on the series, Ward notes, "The first episode was the best, from a special effects point of view. In general, the series was severely restricted by budget as far as production goodies, but it was a good experience for a young actor. Over the years, it has clearly established a cult following. It was a great concept by Ellison and had a quirky and unusual atmosphere that was partly intended and partly accidental, with some eccentric acting. The weaknesses were bad scripts and a great lack of imaginative and convincing special effects."

During its brief run, The Starlost managed to attract many recognizable actors for its guest stars. "We had some very good guest actors," says Norman Klenman. "Lloyd Bochner was a real charmer and kept us in stitches. He collects jokes, and he was a wonderfully witty man. Walter Koenig was a funny guy. He wanted to work on the show each week. If we had been picked up, I would have fought for him as a regular because he was a terrific, very bright fellow." Had the series continued, several other well-known stars were set for guest appearances, including Richard Basehart, Leslie Nielsen, Patrick MacNee, William Shatner and Gordon Pinsent.

Klenman did have some reservations about the regular cast. "The star, Keir Dullea, was a nice man, but he was the most wooden actor I've ever met, although he was wonderful in 2001. Gay Rowan was pure wood. Robin Ward was fine." Robin Ward stands out in Ed Richardson's mind as well. "He was heaven to work with. He was one of the nicest and most cooperative actors I've worked with. He was a talented fellow." When the series debuted, the atmosphere looked promising. It was the most ambitious project ever attempted by a Canadian network. In its first four weeks on the air, it was number one in its time slots in both New York and L.A. The Starlost was also the recipient of many favorable reviews. "It's carried science fiction television a galactic step forward," Toronto Star columnist Jack Miller wrote about the pilot. "In depth of plot and sincerity of acting and staging, it was a world ahead of Star Trek.... This is the best science fiction series ever to come to television."

Joan Irwin of The Montreal Star noted, "The Starlost shows every sign of inheriting the mantle of the phenomenally successful Star Trek." In Canada, where the highest rated series on CTV was the American series Ironside (with 250,000 viewers a week), The Starlost followed with a healthy 200,000 viewers. When a Tom Jones special preempted an episode of The Starlost, CFTO studios received 147 phone calls from angry viewers who protested the bumping of the show. Only one lone viewer called in to rave about the Tom Jones special.

However, the production headaches continued. "There were a lot of problems," says Klenman. "While the stories were sound, the special effects technology wasn't advanced enough. In that regard, there was a little lack of imagination. They did very well with what they had. Occasionally, I would wince over how the episodes were produced."

He admits he campaigned for changes during the production. "I used to object to scenes where Keir and Robin would pull Gay along by her elbows whenever they were chased. My argument was, 'Women are some of the best athletes in the world. It's not like she's in high heels.' And that was kind of accepted."

Klenman also pushed for finding the Ark's control center. "I wanted them to find a remote part of the ship where the central computers were, where you could steer the ship. I wanted a three-floor set, 50 feet high, and to have a steering wheel on top that would be from an old sailing ship. I thought it would be a wonderfully out-of-time thing, but nobody got the joke."

The Starlost was a success in Canada and attracted a sizable audience in America, but Davidson recalls that NBC felt the show's sluggish pace needed improving. "The only major criticisms (actually, suggestions) made by NBC, were: 'The program's slow, pick up the pace, more action, more cuts, faster cuts, fuller music and effects ... and Keir seems to lack energy.' We did the creative alternative. We concentrated on the story, on the characters, on the performances and on the up-front drama. Keir's kind of internal, intense, low-key acting style carried a kind of conviction and honesty that no amount of running around would convey."

During the last few weeks of production, the producers were unsure if the series would be picked up for an additional eight segments by NBC.

"Many great television programs have taken several weeks, months, even an entire first season to shake down and develop their true potential," says Davidson. "The initial reaction in Los Angeles, New York and other U.S. cities was excellent. Then [in following weeks] it was a matter of the ratings up one week, down the next. They were never downhill all the way. We were down to the wire. Will we get a pick up from NBC? Twentieth Century-Fox still wanted to go ahead. CTV also wanted to continue since the show was doing well in ratings and with sponsors in Canada.

"But the ultimate decision came down to one man: Wes Harris at NBC. He wavered back and forth, then pulled the plug. It was devastating. To the key people who worked on The Starlost it was never a failure. We delivered it on time and on budget. In the final programs, we were trying to get control over what we hoped to do in the future, so my executives moved into the front line: Ed Richardson directing, Norman Klenman writing scripts. Had we been asked back for a second season, we would have made serious overtures to established science fiction writers to create story ideas, if not complete scripts."

"NBC was looking for immediate results and an instant hit," says Klenman. "Sixteen episodes was very little to judge it on. They probably killed it because of its technical quality. But it was well shot, beautifully edited and had good music. These series take years to catch on, just as Mr. Spock's ears took years to catch on. But their attitude is they have to make their money tomorrow or they're dead. If they had stayed with it, The Starlost might have been one of the greatest success stories that they ever had.

"The ratings in Canada were never a problem. If it had only been Canadian audiences, The Starlost could have run indefinitely. But while Fox was keen to keep the show going to a point, they weren't going to finance the whole thing. They had to have a [financial] commitment from NBC. NBC looked at the ratings and didn't think it was gonna make it, so they let it go. On the fifteenth episode, we got the cancellation notice. An embarrassed executive at CFTO said to me, 'Do you mind if we fire you today instead of next week?' so they could save money on the sixteenth show. I said, 'No, let me out.' I had a lot of other work piling up in L.A. Personally, the cancellation was not a big disappointment. I just felt NBC was depriving itself of the show."

"In Canada, you only needed an audience of 200,000 people to be a success," notes Richardson. "We did OK because there was a science fiction audience out there. We were very close to being renewed. We thought we would do okay in America because we were delivering a show for a lot less the cost than Americans could deliver a show. But simply, if the ratings had been higher, we would have been renewed."

In retrospect, Richardson says, "Harlan Ellison's concept was an incredibly good one. It had unlimited story potential. But when you watch the show, it falls short of your expectations. One problem was that it was on videotape and nobody was used to looking at a prime-time drama on videotape unless it was something from the BBC, where it was expected to look a little strange. The reason it was on video was to limit the cost of the special effects. On film, you'd have to create them in post-production and it would be a lot more expensive.

"When you watch the effects today, you ask, 'Why weren't they better?' It's difficult to put yourself back into that stone-age technology. It was a tough schedule, and there were budgetary constraints. We made those shows in five days. You can see by the effects how crazy they were. But there were a lot of people trying to make the show better. If you look at an editing facility today, you can animate the hell out of everything. Back then, we were on two-inch tape. It was the stone-age version of videotape. Had we had advanced technology, we could have concentrated more on the script and acting and not the effects, which were always short of the mark. But nobody should apologize for what they did. It was a damn good try."

Davidson thinks the lack of technology contributed significantly to The Starlost's woes. "The videotape methods were the show's biggest restrictions. If we had known Magicam wasn't going to work, we would have used different techniques from the beginning. The few visual effects we were able to put together were makeshift, costly and time-consuming, and did little for the visual impact. At times, we had up to a dozen small sets crammed into one studio, with barely enough room to turn around, let alone stage major action scenes. Those were the conditions we worked under. These aren't excuses. We thought we could handle the situation. I in particular have no excuses because I made all of the major decisions on a day-to-day basis with the full support of [executives] Arthur Weinthal of CTV and Ted Delaney of CFTO-Glen Warren. Robert Kline had provided an experienced and dedicated associate in Preston Fischer from New York, and we worked closely together. You only have my word for it, but a second season of programs would have been very good indeed. We never got the chance."

According to Klenman, The Starlost hasn't been left adrift in syndication. "Talk about cult shows," he says. "The series has been shown around the world. I've been dragged to speak in San Francisco to Starlost fans. My daughter was in New Orleans and called to say she had met a bunch of nuts who watched Starlost and remembered it. I was in England once and somebody came up and shook my hand, saying, 'You're Norman Klenman from The Starlost. That was the greatest TV series ever made!' The Starlost could be revived today, using modern technology but with the same scripts. I still consider it a successful show in that it took off in syndication."

"To put The Starlost in perspective, it is useful to know that science fiction was a hard sell in those years," concludes Davidson. "The genre was considered death on network TV. Leave it to the 'syndicators,' they said. The rebirth of science fiction in features and TV came later. Maybe all of our expectations were too high for the times."

STARMAN

In this sequel to Starman (1984), Robert Hayes star of the Airplane films, takes on the role of an alien, Starman, who, having fathered a child by an Earth woman 14 years earlier, returns to find his lost love and help raise his son. Assuming the body of a freelance photographer killed in a wilderness plane crash, he finds his son, Scott, living in an orphanage. Scott is sceptical about his alien origins until convinced by the Starman's strange powers and his own emerging paranormal abilities, including telekinesis, which are triggered by his dad's 'magic marbles', a set of small glowing spheres.

Together they embark on a quest to find Scott's mother, Jenny, pursued by a government agent, Fox, who has learned of Starman's secret and is determined to bring him in for experimentation. The series had an almost happy ending, with the family reunited before they are again forced back on the run.

This is a TV spin-off from the 1984 movie which starred Jeff Bridges as an alien stranded on Earth. Erin Gray, more famous for starring in the SF show BUCK ROGERS IN THE 25TH CENTURY also starred in this show as Jenny, Paul Forrester's lost love. The series was shown in America from 1986-87, the series has aired in the UK on Sky and The Sci-Fi Channel. The series was shown on ABC in the US. The executive producers for the series were James Henerson, James Hirsch and Michael Douglas.

The Starman pilot and subsequent series of 22 episodes were produced for the ABC network during the 1986-7 US tv season, and are based on the successful John Carpenter movie of the same name, starring Jeff Bridges as the title character. The Starman tv series - which picks up fourteen years after events in the film -lasted the year, but was not renewed, de-spite the by now almost obligatory save-the-show campaign by devoted fans (who almost secured a tv movie revival). The se-ries had put up a bold fight, but was cri-p-pled by network incompetence, studio in- difference, and two appalling time-slots -one, late on Friday nights in the same slot that killed Star Trek (and playing against established hits LA Law and Falcon Crest!), the second early on Saturday night when the teen audience was not watching tv. Starman was cancelled, even as similarly-rated shows like Max Headroom, Sledge Hammer and The Charmings were being given a second chance.

Cast in the lead was Robert Hays, who - despite having recently starred in the memorable spoofs Airplane and Airplane II - managed to avoid typecasting to take the lead in this SF drama. He previously appeared in the short-run sit-com Angie and has most recently been seen in a sec-ond short-lived comedy, the MTM series FM on The Family Channel. His other Fantasy roles include Cat's Eye, The Girl, The Gold Watch, And Everything, Run-ning Against Time, and an episode of Wonder Woman. Co-starring as the young fourteen year-old Scott Hayden, was CB (Christopher) Barnes, who also later found a new home in the sitcom Day By Day, starring Linda Kelsey of Lou Grant, Julia Louis-Dreyfus of Seinfeld, and Courtney Thorne-Smith of Melrose Place. Not bad company to keep for an adolescentteen!

Playing government agent George Fox was Michael Cavanaugh, who joined a long list of tv pursuers. Frequently to be found in the supporting casts of films and TV movies, Cavanaugh has appeared frequently in Clint Eastwood films, and Stephen J Cannell, Aaron Spelling, and Donald Bellisario tv series. Assisting Fox in his pursuit was Agent Wiley, played by Patrick Culliton. Culliton spent most of the 1960s working for Irwin Allen, primarily on VOYAGE TO THE BOTTOM OF THE SEA in various crewman or monster roles, and on one memorable oc-casion playing bit parts in three different shows - episodes of Voyage and TIME TUNNEL - in three consecutive days! Mimi Kuryk, who appeared only in the pilot as Liz Baynes (despite the implication of future appearances, she was only occasionally referred to), is best known for her roles in Hill Street Blues and the short-lived Wolf.

The highlights of the pilot are the amus-ing sequences in which the alien Paul at-tempts to bluff his way through everyday human life, and Hays's comedic talents do not go to waste - nor do they intrude on the drama. In the final episode of Starman, Paul and Scott did indeed locate Jenny Hayden, who was portrayed by Erin Gray, the former model who played Colonel Deering in Glen Larson's Buck Rogers. Executive producer on the series was Michael Douglas - yes, that Michael Douglas! Working with him were James Henerson and James Hirsch, a tv movie scriptwriting partnership. Before joining up together, Henerson had written for sitcoms in the '60s, including Bewitched and I Dream of Jeannie, while Hirsch had produced another successful man-on-the-run show, The Incredible Hulk for Kenneth Johnson. After Starman, an en-joyable experience, they split again.

The credits of supervising producer Leon Tokatyan read like a role call of quality television-The Defenders, The Name of the Game, The Bold Ones, The Virginian, Kojak, Lou Grant, and Hooperman. Story editor Tom Lazarus went on to War of the Worlds. Writer/ producers Mike Gray and John Mason were just beginning in tv, although they had dabbled in various aspects of the industry. One joint credit was the Chuck Norris film Code of Silence! Between them, this group with such diverse and variable credits managed to produce the first and only season of Starman. Despite the success of the feature film, and high ratings for the Starman feature film in prime-time on BBC 1, the series was not picked up by any British broadcaster - a quite extraordinary development, given its suitability for any of the four terrestrial channels and any mainstream general entertainment satellite service.

While the former BBC 1 controller's disdain for Science Fiction is well known, SF has been enormously popular on BBC2, C4, and Sky One, as well as ITV's late-night service. Indeed, the premise even makes it suitable for The Family Channel, while the feature's cult status makes it a candidate for Bravo. Instead, the series finally found a nest when it was picked up in a package of purchases from distributor Columbia/Tri-Star by the cable-only service Wire TV, which is only available in certain parts of the country. Still, the eventual resting place for the series, and the fact that it is at least out there somewhere instead of sitting on the shelf, is another tick in the plus column for the new multi-channel environment we now find ourselves in.

Interestingly, the turning for the UK debut of Starman has probably never been better. The series is another of tv's man-on-the-run shows in the tradition of The Fugitive (and subsequent SF/Fantasy variations, such as THE INVADERS, THE IMMORTAL, THE INCREDIBLE HULK, Lucan, LOGAN'S RUN, OTHERWORLD, Werewolf, and so on), and the resurrection of Starman in Paul Forrester's body is strongly reminiscent of CAPTAIN SCARLET AND THE MYSTERONS. Also, with The X-Files and Intruders running on Sky -not to mention Unsolved Mysteries! -Close encounters are hot stuff again!

In the feature film Starman (1984) starring Jeff Bridges, Karen Allen and Richard Jaeckel, an alien crash-landed on Earth and took on the guise of Jenny Hayden's dead husband, Scott. He kidnapped her, and from Wisconsin they headed for Arizona where the spacecraft would retrieve him. They were pursued by a desperate government agent, Fox. Along the way Starman discovered love for the first time, and before he left, he gave Jenny the gift of a son.
