

International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers- 1

FILMS

FOURTH EDITION

EDITORS

TOM PENDERGAST
SARA PENDERGAST

ST. JAMES PRESS

AN IMPRINT OF THE GALE GROUP

DETROIT • NEW YORK • SAN FRANCISCO
LONDON • BOSTON • WOODBRIDGE, CT

International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers-1

FILMS

International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers

Volume 1

FILMS

Volume 2

DIRECTORS

Volume 3

ACTORS and ACTRESSES

Volume 4

WRITERS and PRODUCTION ARTISTS

Tom Pendergast, Sara Pendergast, Editors

Michael J. Tyrkus, Project Coordinator

Michelle Banks, Erin Bealmear, Laura Standley Berger, Joann Cerrito, Jim Craddock, Steve Cusack, Nicolet V. Elert, Miranda H. Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Laura S. Kryhoski, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, and Christine Tomassini,
St. James Press Staff

Peter M. Gareffa, Managing Editor

Maria Franklin, Permissions Manager

Debra J. Freitas, Permissions Assistant

Mary Grimes, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Image Catalogers

Mary Beth Trimper, Composition Manager

Dorothy Maki, Manufacturing Manager

Rhonda Williams, Senior Buyer

Cynthia Baldwin, Product Design Manager

Michael Logusz, Graphic Artist

Randy Bassett, Image Database Supervisor

Robert Duncan, Imaging Specialists

Pamela A. Reed, Imaging Coordinator

Dean Dauphinais, Senior Editor, Imaging and Multimedia Content

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, St. James Press does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. St. James Press accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher.

Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

This publication is a creative work fully protected by all applicable copyright laws, as well as by misappropriation, trade secret, unfair competition, and other applicable laws. The authors and editors of this work have added value to the underlying factual material herein through one or more of the following: unique and original selection, coordination, expression, arrangement, and classification of the information.

All rights to this publication will be vigorously defended.

Copyright © 2000

St. James Press

27500 Drake Rd.

Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535

All rights reserved including the right of reproduction in whole or in part in any form.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

International dictionary of films and filmmakers / editors, Tom Pendergast, Sara Pendergast.—4th ed.

p. cm.

Contents: 1. Films — 2. Directors — 3. Actors and actresses — 4. Writers and production artists.

ISBN 1-55862-449-X (set) — ISBN 1-55862-450-3 (v. 1) — ISBN 1-55862-451-1 (v. 2)

— ISBN 1-55862-452-X (v. 3) — ISBN 1-55862-453-8 (v. 4)

1. Motion pictures—Plots, themes, etc. 2. Motion picture producers and directors—Biography—Dictionaries. 3. Motion picture actors and actresses—Biography—Dictionaries. 4. Screenwriters—Biography—Dictionaries. I. Pendergast, Tom. II. Pendergast, Sara.

PN1997.8.I58 2000

791.43'03—dc2100-064024

CIP

Cover photograph—Louise Brooks in Die Büchse der Pandora, courtesy the Kobal Collection

Printed in the United States of America

St. James Press is an imprint of Gale Group

Gale Group and Design is a trademark used herein under license

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

CONTENTS

---

EDITORS' NOTE	vii
BOARD OF ADVISERS	ix
CONTRIBUTORS	xi
LIST OF FILMS	xiii
FILMS	1
PICTURE ACKNOWLEDGMENTS	1365
NOTES ON ADVISERS AND CONTRIBUTORS	1369
LIST OF FILMS BY DIRECTOR	1383
GEOGRAPHIC INDEX	1393
NAME INDEX	1401

EDITORS' NOTE

---

This is a revised edition of the 1st volume of the International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, which also includes Volume 2, Directors, Volume 3, Actors and Actresses, and Volume 4, Writers and Production Artists. The book contains 683 entries, including 72 entries new to this edition. Each entry contains production information, lists of crew and cast, a selected bibliography of works about the film, and a critical essay written by a specialist in the field. Most of the entries from the previous edition have been retained here, and all have been thoroughly updated. Since film is primarily a visual medium, the majority of entries are illustrated with a still.

The selection of entries is once again based on the recommendations of the advisory board. It was not thought necessary to propose strict criteria for selection: the book is intended to represent the wide range of interests within North American, British, and West European film scholarship and criticism. The variety in both the entries and the critical stances of the writers emphasizes the diversity within the field of cinematic studies.

Thanks are due to the following: Nicolet V. Elert and Michael J. Tyrkus at St. James Press, for their efforts in preparing this collection for publication; Michael Najjar, for his tireless efforts in researching the entries; our advisers, for their wisdom and broad knowledge of international cinema; and our contributors, for their gracious participation. We have necessarily built upon the work of the editors who have preceded us, and we thank them for the strong foundation they created.

A Note on the Entries

Non-English language film titles are given in the original language or a transliteration of it, unless they are better known internationally by their English title. The country or countries where the film originated is provided along with the year it was registered and the director.

The section on production information can include such details as production company, film stock, format, running time, sound type, length, date and location of release, dates and location of filming, and cost. The list of crew members identifies the major participants in the making of the film, but is not exhaustive. Similarly, the list of cast members indicates the major players in the film, but may not account for all minor roles. Finally, the awards section lists major awards garnered by the film, its creators, and its leading actors.

BOARD OF ADVISERS

---

Dudley Andrew
Erik Barnouw
Jeanine Basinger
Ronald Bergan
John Campbell
Lewis Cole
Gary Crowder
Robert von Dassanowsky
Mike Downey
John Durie
Jack C. Ellis
Susan Felleman
Ben Gibson
Beat Glur
Rajko Grlic
John Hopewell
Andrew Horton
Srdjan Karanović

Robyn Karney
Philip Kemp
Satti Khanna
Susan K. Larsen
Audrey T. McCluskey
Ib Monty
Gary Morris
Dan Nissen
Julian Petley
Christopher Pickard
Dana B. Polan
Don Ranvaud
Tony Rayns
Paul Shields
Nicholas Thomas
Frank P. Tomasulo
Leonardo Garcia Tsao
Aruna Vasudevan

CONTRIBUTORS

---

Charles Affron
Mirella Jona Affron
Anthony Ambrogio
Dudley Andrew
Roy Armes
Dimitar Bardarsky
Erik Barnouw
Jeanine Basinger
John Baxter
Sandra L. Beck
Audie Bock
DeWitt Bodeen
Ronald Bowers
Stephen E. Bowles
Michael Brashinsky
Stephen Brophy
Julianne Burton
Fred Camper
Scarlet Cheng
Julie Christensen
Michel Ciment
Tom Conley
David A. Cook
Samantha Cook
R. F. Cousins
Thomas Cripps
Robert von Dassanowsky
Gertraud Steiner Daviau
Pamala S. Deane
Sara Corben De Romeo
Charles Derry
Wheeler Winston Dixon
Rashmi Doraiswamy
Mike Downey
Clyde Kelly Dunagan
Robert Dunbar
Raymond Durnat
Rob Edelman
Jane Ehrlich
Jack C. Ellis
Gretchen Elsner-Sommer
Patricia Erens
Thomas L. Erskine
Mark W. Estrin
Tamara L. Falicov
Greg S. Faller
Rodney Farnsworth
Howard Feinstein
Susan Felleman
Annette Fern
Warren French
Barry A. Fulks
Dan Georgakas
Tina Gianoulis
Jill Gillespie
Verina Glaessner
H. M. Glancy
Val Golovskoy
Douglas Gomery
Joseph A. Gomez
Viveca Gretton
Josef Gugler
Patricia King Hanson
Stephen L. Hanson
Ann Harris
Louise Heck-Rabi
Patrick Heenan
Catherine Henry
Andrew Higson
John Hill
Kyoko Hirano
Deborah H. Holdstein
Andrew Horton
Peter Hutchings
Dina Iordanova
Nick James
Timothy Johnson
Stuart M. Kaminsky
Joel E. Kanoff
Dave Kehr
Philip Kemp
Satti Khanna
Tammy Kinsey
Katherine Singer Kovács
Audrey E. Kupferberg
Monique Lamontagne
Joseph Lanza
Daniel Leab
Sharon Lee
James L. Limbacher
Richard Lippe
Kimball Lockhart
Janet E. Lorenz
Glenn Lovell
Ed Lowry
Richard Dyer MacCann
Andrew and Gina Macdonald
G. C. Macnab
Elaine Mancini
Roger Manvell
Gina Marchetti
Gerald Mast
Donald W. McCaffrey
John McCarty
Joseph McElhaney
Vacláv Merhaut
Russell Merritt
Lloyd Michaels
Joseph Milicia
Norman Miller
Ib Monty
Donald R. Mott
John Mraz
Robert Murphy
William T. Murphy
Ray Narducy
Dennis Nastav
Kim Newman
Dan Nissen
Linda J. Obalil
Liam O'Leary
Tom Orman
Kelly Otter
R. Barton Palmer
Sylvia Paskin
Hannah Patterson
Richard Peña
Kris Percival
Julian Petley
Duncan Petrie
Gene D. Phillips
A. Pillai
Marion Pilowsky
Leland Poague
Dana B. Polan
Richard Porton
Lauren Rabinovitz
Maria Racheva
Ashish Rajadhyaksha
Herbert Reynolds
Arthur G. Robson
Sara Corben de Romero
Jonathan Romney
Chris Routledge
Elliot Rubenstein
Marie Saeli
Barbara Salvage
Stephanie Savage
Curtis Schade
Susana Schild
Steven Schneider
H. Wayne Schuth
Michael Selig
Lee Sellars
Ella Shochat
Robert Sickels
Ulrike Sieglöhr
Charles L. P. Silet
Scott Simmon
P. Adams Sitney
Josef Škvorecký
Anthony Slide
Edward S. Small
Eric Smoodin
Thomas Snyder
Cecile Starr
Philip Strick
Bob Sullivan
Susan Tavernetti
Stephen Teo
Doug Tomlinson
Lee Tsiantis
Andrew Tudor
Michael J. Tyrkus
B. Urgošková
Ralph Anthony Valdez
Ravi Vasudevan
Ginette Vincendeau
Iris Wakulenko
William C. Wees

Paul Wells
James Michael Welsh
Dennis West
M. B. White
Daniel Williams
Robert Winning
Robin Wood
Denise J. Youngblood

LIST OF FILMS

---

A bout de souffle
A nous la liberté
A propos de Nice
Accattone
Adam's Rib
The Adventures of Robin Hood
The African Queen
L'Age d'or
Aguirre, der Zorn Gottes
Ahfei zheng zhuan
Ai no corrida
Akaler sandhane
Akasen chitai
L'Albero degli zoccoli
Alexander Nevsky
All about Eve
All Quiet on the Western Front
All That Heaven Allows
All the King's Men
Alphaville
Alsino y el Condor
L'America
American Beauty
American Graffiti
An American in Paris
Der Amerikanische freund
Amor de perdic&atilda;o
And Life Goes On
Andrei Rublev
Angi Vera
Angst essen Seele auf
L'Année dernière à Marienbad
Annie Hall
Anticipation of the Night
Antônio das Mortes
The Apartment
Apocalypse Now
The Apu Trilogy
Aranyer din Ratri
L'Argent
L'Arroseur arrosé
Arsenal
The Asphalt Jungle
L'Atalante
L'Avventura
Awara

Ba wang bie ji
Bab el hadid
Babettes Gaestebud
Badlands
Balada o soldate
Le Ballet mécanique
The Band Wagon
Banshun
Baron Prasil
La Bataille du rail
La Batalla de Chile: la lucha de un pueblo sin armas
La Battaglia di Algeri
Becky Sharp
Belle de jour

La Belle et la bête
Berlin: Die Sinfonie der Grosstadt
The Best Years of Our Lives
La Bête humaine
Bharat Mata
Bhumika
The Big Heat
The Big Parade
The Big Sleep
The Birds
The Birth of a Nation
Biruma no tategoto
Black Narcissus
Black Sunday
Blackmail
Blade Runner
The Blair Witch Project
Der Blaue Engel
Die Blechtrommel
Die Bleierne Zeit
Blow-Up
The Blue Lamp
Blue Velvet
Bonnie and Clyde
Das Boot
Le Boucher
Boudu sauvé des eaux
Brazil
Breakfast at Tiffany's
Breaking the Waves
The Bride of Frankenstein
Brief Encounter
Bringing Up Baby
Broken Blossoms
Bronenosets Potemkin
Die Büchse der Pandora
Budjenje pacova
Il Buono, il brutto, il cattivo
Bye Bye Brasil

Cabaret
Cabiria
La Caduta degli dei
Camille
O Cangaceiro
Le Carrosse d'or
Casablanca
Casino Royale
Casque d'or
Cat People (1942)
Celine et Julie vont en bateau: Phantom Ladies Over Paris
Central do Brasil
C'era una volta il west
C'est arrivé près de chez vous
El Chacal de Nahueltoro
Le Chagrin et la pitié
Chapayev
Un Chapeau de paille d'Italie
Le Charme discret de la bourgeoisie
Charulata
Chelovek s kinoapparatom

- Chelsea Girls
 Un Chien andalou
 Chimes at Midnight
 Chinatown
 Chronik der Anna Magdalena Bach
 Chronique des années de braise
 Chronique d'un été
 Citizen Kane
 City Lights
 City of Sadness
 Cléo de cinq à sept
 A Clockwork Orange
 Close Encounters of the Third Kind
 Un Coeur en hiver
 Un Condamné à mort s'est échappé
 Il Conformista
 The Conversation
 La Coquille et le clergyman
 Cria Cuervos . . .
 Le Crime de Monsieur Lange
 Cristo si e fermato a Eboli
 Crossfire
 The Crowd
 Csillagosok, katonák
 Cyrano de Bergerac
 Czlowiek z marmuru
- Dahong denglong gaogao gua
 Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne
 Dance, Girl, Dance
 Daoma zei
 Dawandeh
 Days of Heaven
 De cierta manera
 The Dead
 Dead of Night
 Dead Ringers
 The Deer Hunter
 Dekalog
 Deliverance
 La Dentellière
 Der var engang en krig
 Detour
 Deus e o diabo na terra do sol
 Deutschland im Herbst
 The Devil Is a Woman
 Le Diable au corps
 Les Diaboliques
 Dirty Harry
 Distant Voices, Still Lives
 Diva
 Do bigha zamin
 Do the Right Thing
 Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1932)
 Dr. Strangelove; or, How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb
 Dog Star Man
 Doktor Mabuse der Spieler; Das Testament des Dr. Mabuse
 La dolce vita
 Dom za vesanje
 Dona Flor e seus dois maridos
 Double Indemnity
 The Douglas Trilogy
 Dracula (1931)
 Dracula (1958)
 The Draughtsman's Contract
- Die Dreigroschenoper
 Drifters
 Du Rififi chez les hommes
 Duck Soup
 Duvidha
- East of Eden
 Easy Rider
 L'eclisse
 Die Ehe der Maria Braun
 Elippathayam
 Les Enfants du paradis
 Der Engel mit der Posaune
 Entotsu no mieru basho
 Entr'acte
 Eraserhead
 Eroica
 Erotikon
 Espiritu de la colmena
 Et . . . Dieu créa la femme
 E.T.—The Extraterrestrial
 Der Ewige Jude
 Exotica
- Faces
 Fanny och Alexander
 Fantasia
 Fargo
 Farrebique
 La Femme du boulanger
 La Femme infidèle
 Festen
 Feu Mathias Pascal
 Fièvre
 Film d'amore e d'anarchia
 Il Fiore delle mille e una notte
 Fires Were Started
 Five Easy Pieces
 Flaming Creatures
 Foolish Wives
 42nd Street
 The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse
 Frankenstein (1931)
 Freaks
 Fresa y Chocolate
 Fröken Julie
 From Here to Eternity
 Fukushu suru wa ware ni ari
 Funny Games
 Fury
 Os Fuzis
- Garam Hawa
 Il Gattopardo
 The General
 Gertie the Dinosaur
 Gertrud
 Giant
 Gilda
 The Godfather Trilogy
 Gojira
 The Gold Rush
 Gone With the Wind
 GoodFellas
 Gösta Berlings Saga
 The Graduate

La Grande illusion
 The Grapes of Wrath
 The Great Dictator
 Great Expectations
 Greed
 Gregory's Girl
 Guling jie shaonian sha ren shijian
 Gun Crazy
 Gycklarnas afton

 Hadaka no shima
 La Haine
 Haizi wang
 Hallelujah
 Hana-Bi
 A Hard Day's Night
 Heavenly Creatures
 Heimat; Die Zweite Heimat
 He Liu
 Henry V
 Herr Arnes Pengar
 Higanbana
 High Noon
 High Sierra
 Der Himmel Über Berlin
 Hiroshima mon amour
 His Girl Friday
 Hitler: Ein Film aus Deutschland
 Hoop Dreams
 La Hora de los hornos
 Howards End
 Huang tudi
 The Hustler

 I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang
 Idi i smotri
 Idioterne
 If . . .
 Iгла
 Ikiru
 Im Lauf der Zeit
 In a Lonely Place
 India Song
 The Informer
 Intolerance
 Invasion of the Body Snatchers
 Istorija Asi Kliachinoi kotoraiia lubila da nie vyshla zamuzh
 It Happened One Night
 It's a Wonderful Life
 Ivan Grozny

 J'accuse
 Jana Aranya
 Jaws
 The Jazz Singer
 Jeanne Dielman, 23 Quai du Commerce, 1080 Bruxelles
 Jeder für sich und Gott gegen alle
 Les Jeux interdits
 JFK
 Jigokumon
 Johnny Guitar
 Le Joli Mai
 Jonah qui aura 25 ans en l'an 2000
 Le Jour se lève
 Journal d'un curé de campagne
 Journey of Hope

 Ju Dou
 Jud Süß
 Judex
 Jujiro
 Jules et Jim

 Kaagaz ke phool
 Das Kabinett des Dr. Caligari
 Kameradschaft
 Kanal
 Kaos
 La Kermesse héroïque
 The Kid
 The Killers (1946)
 Kind Hearts and Coronets
 King Kong
 Kino-Pravda
 Kiss Me Deadly
 Klute
 Kommissar
 Kongi's Harvest
 Konyets Sankt-Peterburga
 Korkalen
 Korol Lir
 Koshikei
 Koziyat rog
 Kwaidan

 L.A. Confidential
 Ladri di biciclette
 The Lady Eve
 The Lady from Shanghai
 The Lady Vanishes
 Lan fengzheng
 The Land
 Lásky jedné plavovlásky
 The Last Picture Show
 Last Tango in Paris
 The Last Wave
 Laura
 The Lavender Hill Mob
 Lawrence of Arabia
 Letter from an Unknown Woman
 Letyat zhuravli
 Der Letzte Mann
 The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp
 Life Is Sweet
 Limite
 Little Caesar
 The Little Foxes
 Lola
 Lola Montès
 Lolita
 Lone Star
 The Lost Weekend
 Louisiana Story
 Lucia

 M
 Madame de . . .
 Mädchen in Uniform
 The Magnificent Ambersons
 Malcolm X
 Malenkaya Vera
 The Maltese Falcon
 Man of Aran

- The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance
 Manhattan
 Marat/Sade
 The March of Time
 Märchen vom Glück
 The Marius Trilogy
 M*A*S*H
 The Masque of the Red Death
 Mat
 Matka Joanna od aniolow
 The Matrix
 A Matter of Life and Death
 The Maxim Trilogy
 Mean Streets
 Meet Me in St. Louis
 Meg ker a nep
 Meghe dhaka tara
 Memorias del subdesarrollo
 Menilmontant
 Mephisto
 Le Mépris
 Meshes of the Afternoon
 Metropolis
 Midnight Cowboy
 Midnight Express Mildred Pierce
 Le Million
 Miracolo a Milano
 The Misfits
 Mr. Smith Goes to Washington
 Mrs. Miniver
 Modern Times
 Mona Lisa
 Die Mörder sind unter uns
 Morte a Venezia
 Moskva slezam ne verit
 Muerte de un Ciclista
 Mujeres al borde de un ataque de nervios
 The Music Box
 My Beautiful Laundrette
 My Brilliant Career
 My Darling Clementine
 My Name Is Joe
- The Naked City
 Naniwa ereji
 Nanook of the North
 Napoléon
 Narayama bushi-ko
 Nashville
 Neobychanye priklyucheniya Mistera Vesta v strane bolshevikov
 Nesto izmedju
 Die Nibelungen
 Nieuwe Gronden
 A Night at the Opera
 The Night of the Hunter
 Ningen no joken
 Ninotchka
 La Noire de . . .
 North by Northwest
 Nosferatu (1922)
 Notorious La notte
 1900 (Novecento)
 Novyi Vavilon
 Now Voyager
- Noz w wodzie
 Nuit et brouillard
 Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve
 Les Nuits fauves
- O slavnosti a hostech
 Obchod na korze
 Odd Man Out
 L'Odeur de la papaye verte
 Offret
 Oktiabr
 Los Olvidados
 Olympia
 On the Town
 On the Waterfront
 Once Upon a Time in America
 Once Upon a Time in the West
 One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest
 Ordet
 Orfeu Negro
 Orphée
 Ossessione
 Ostre sledované vlaky
 Otac na sluzbenom putu
 El Otro Francisco
 8½
 Out of the Past
 Outomlionnye solntsem
- Paisà
 Paris, Texas
 Une Partie de campagne
 La Passion de Jeanne d'Arc
 Passport to Pimlico Paths of Glory
 Peeping Tom
 Pépé le Moko
 Persona
 The Phantom of the Opera
 Philadelphia
 The Philadelphia Story
 The Piano
 Pickpocket
 Picnic at Hanging Rock
 The Picture of Dorian Gray
 Pirosmeni
 Pixote a lei do mais fraco
 A Place in the Sun
 The Player
 Playtime
 Pokaianie
 Popiol i diament
 Potomok Chingis-Khan
 La Primera carga al machete
 The Private Life of Henry VIII
 Le Procès
 Professione: Reporter
 Proshchanie
 Psycho
 The Public Enemy
 I Pugni in tasca
 Pulp Fiction
 Putyovka v zhizn
- Qiu Ju da Guansi
 Le Quai des brumes

Les Quatre cents coups
 Raging Bull
 Raiders of the Lost Ark
 Ran
 Rashomon
 Rear Window
 Rebel Without a Cause
 Red River
 The Red Shoes
 Red Sorghum
 Los Redes
 Règle du jeu
 Repulsion
 Reservoir Dogs
 Retrato de Teresa
 Ride the High Country
 Rien que les heures
 Rio Bravo
 The River
 Rocco e i suoi fratelli
 The Rocky Horror Picture Show
 Roma, città aperta
 La Ronde
 Room at the Top
 A Room with a View
 Rosemary's Baby

 Saikaku ichidai onna
 Salaam Bombay!
 Le Salaire de la peur
 Salt of the Earth
 Salvatore Giuliano
 Samma no aji
 Samo jednom se ljubi
 Le Samourai
 Le Sang des bêtes
 Le Sang d'un poete
 Sans Soleil
 Sansho dayu
 Saturday Night and Sunday Morning
 Scarface: The Shame of a Nation
 The Scarlet Empress
 Schatten
 Schindler's List
 Sciuscia
 Scorpio Rising
 The Searchers
 Secrets and Lies Seppuku
 The Servant
 Shaft
 Shakespeare in Love
 Shane
 She Done Him Wrong
 Sherlock, Jr.
 Shichinin no samurai
 Shoah
 Shonen
 Siberiade
 The Silence of the Lambs
 Singin' in the Rain
 Det Sjunde inseglet
 Skuplijaci perja
 Smoke

 Smultronstället
 Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs
 Sodom und Gomorrha
 Some Like It Hot
 Sommarnattens leende
 Song of Ceylon
 Souffle au coeur
 The Southerner
 Soy Cuba
 The Spanish Earth
 Spoorloos
 Stachka
 A Star Is Born
 The Star Wars Saga
 Staré povesti české
 Steamboat Willie
 Sterne
 La Strada
 Strangers on a Train
 A Streetcar Named Desire
 Stromboli
 Der Student von Prag
 Sullivan's Travels
 Sult
 Suna no onna
 Sunrise
 Sunset Boulevard
 The Sweet Smell of Success
 Sweet Sweetback's Baadasssss Song

 Das Tagebuch einer Verlorenen
 Ta'm E Guilass
 Tampopo
 Taxi Driver
 Teni zabytykh predkov
 La terra trema
 The Texas Chainsaw Massacre
 Thelma and Louise
 Thérèse Desqueyroux
 They Live by Night
 O Thiasos
 The Thin Man
 Things to Come
 The Third Man
 38 - Auch das war Wien
 The 39 Steps
 Tiefland
 Tire dié
 Tirez sur le pianiste Titanic
 Todo Sobre Mi Madre
 Tokyo monogatari
 Tom Jones
 Top Hat
 Touch of Evil
 Trainspotting
 The Treasure of the Sierra Madre
 Tretia Meshchanskaia
 Triumph des Willens
 Trois Couleurs
 Trouble in Paradise
 Turksib
 Twelve Angry Men
 2001: A Space Odyssey
 Tystnaden

Udju Azul di Yonta
Ugetsu monogatari
Umberto D
Underground
Unforgiven
Unsere Afrikareise
Les Vacances de Monsieur Hulot
Valahol Europaban

Les Vampires
Vampyr
Il Vangelo secondo Matteo
Variété
El Verdugo
Vertigo
Viaggio in Italia Victim
Vidas secas
Viridiana
Viskningar och rop
I Vitelloni
Vivre sa vie
Vlak bez voznog reda
To Vlemma Tou Odyssea
Voina i mir
Le Voyage dans la lune
Vredens dag

Walkabout
Wandafuru Raifu

Wavelength
Le Weekend
West Side Story
White Heat
Why We Fight
The Wild Bunch
The Wind
The Wizard of Oz
The Women
W.R.: Mysterije Organizma
Written on the Wind
Wutai jiemai

Xala
Xiao cheng zhi chun

Yaaba
Yanzhi kou
Yawar Mallku
Yeelen
Les Yeux sans visage
Yojimbo
Young Mr. Lincoln

Z
Zangiku monogatari
Zaseda
Zemlya
Zerkalo
Zéro de conduite

A

A BOUT DE SOUFFLE

---

(Breathless)

France, 1959

Director: Jean-Luc Godard

Production: Impéria Films, Société Nouvelle de Cinéma; black and white, 35mm; running time: 89 minutes. Released 16 March 1960, Paris. Filmed 17 August through 15 September 1959 in Paris and Marseilles; cost: 400,000 N.F. (about $120,000).

Producer: Georges de Beauregard; screenplay: Jean-Luc Godard, from an original treatment by François Truffaut; photography: Raoul Coutard; editors: Cécile Decugis with Lila Herman; sound: Jacques Maumont; music: Martial Solal from Mozart's Clarinet Concerto, K.622; artistic and technical advisor: Claude Chabrol.

Cast: Jean Seberg (Patricia Franchini); Jean-Paul Belmondo (Michel Poiccard, alias Laszlo Kovacs); Daniel Boulanger (Police Inspector Vital); Henri-Jacques Huet (Antonio Berrutti); Roger Hanin (Carl Zombach); Van Doude (Journalist Van Doude); Liliane Robin (Liliane); Michel Favre (Plainclothes inspector); Jean-Pierre Melville (Parvulesco); Claude Mansard (Used car dealer, Claudius); Jean Domarchi (Drunk); Jean-Luc Godard (Informer); André-S. Labarthe, Jean-Louis Richard, and François Mareuil (Journalists); Richard Balducci (Tolmatchoff); Philippe de Broca; Michael Mourlet; Jean Douchet; Louiguy; Virginie Ullman; Emile Villon; José Bénazéraf; Madame Paul; Raymond Ravanbaz.

Awards: Prix Jean Vigo, 1960; Best Direction, Berlin Film Festival, 1960.

Publications

Scripts:

A bout de souffle (screenplay plus Truffaut's original scenario and quotations from reviews) in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), March 1968; also published separately, Paris, 1974.

Books:

Taylor, John Russell, "The New Wave: Jean-Luc Godard," in Cinema Eye, Cinema Ear, New York, 1964.

Egly, Max, Regards neufs sur le cinéma, Paris, 1965.

Goldmann, Annie, Cinéma et société moderne: Le Cinéma de 1958 à 1968, Paris, 1971.

Vaugeois, Gerard, and others, A bout de souffle, Paris, 1974.

Monaco, James, The New Wave, New York, 1976.

MacCabe, Colin, Godard: Images, Sounds, Politics, London, 1980.

Walsh, Martin, The Brechtian Aspect of Radical Cinema, London, 1981.

Lefèvre, Raymond, Jean-Luc Godard, Paris, 1983.

Douin, Jean-Luc, La Nouvelle Vague 25 ans après, Paris, 1984.

Bordwell, David, Narration in the Fiction Film, London, 1985.

Weis, Elisabeth, and John Belton, Film Sound: Theory and Practice, New York, 1985.

Godard, Jean-Luc, Godard on Godard: Critical Writings, edited by Jean Narboni and Tom Milne, New York, 1986.

Loshitzky, Yosefa, The Radical Faces of Godard & Bertolucci, Detroit, 1995.

Dixon, Wheeler W., The Films of Jean-Luc Godard, Albany, 1997.

Sterritt, David, Jean-Luc Godard; Interviews, Jackson, 1998.

Sterritt, David, The Films of Jean-Luc Godard; Seeing the Invisible, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Truffaut, François, in Radio-Cinéma-Télévision (Paris), 1 October 1959.

Variety (New York), 4 February 1960.

Le Monde (Paris), 18 March 1960.

Sadoul, Georges, in Les Lettres Françaises (Paris), March-April 1960.

Billard, Pierre, and others, "Petit lexique de la nouvelle vague," in Cinéma (Paris), April 1960.

Chevallier, J., in Image et Son (Paris), April 1960.

Mopuller, Luc, "Jean-Luc Godard," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1960.

Marcorelles, Louis, "Views of the New Wave," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1960.

Seguin, Louis, in Positif (Paris), no. 33, 1960.

Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 8 February 1961.

Kauffmann, Stanley, "Adventures of an Anti-Hero," in New Republic (New York), 13 February 1961.

Croce, Arlene, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1961.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), August 1961.

Steen, T. M. F., "The Sound Track," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1961.

Pearson, Gabriel, and Eric Rhode, "Cinema of Appearance," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1961.

Collet, Jean, and others, "Entretien avec Jean-Luc Godard," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1962.

Feinstein, Herbert, "An Interview with Jean-Luc Godard," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1964.

Lefèvre, Raymond, and Jean-Paul Warren, in Image et son: Revue du Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1964.

Solokov, Raymond, "The Truth 24 Times a Second," in Newsweek (New York), 12 February 1968.

A bout de souffle

Barr, Charles, "A bout de souffle," in The Films of Jean-Luc Godard, edited by Ian Cameron, London, 1969.

Houston, Beverle, and Marsha Kinder, "Jean-Luc Godard: Breathless," in Close-Up, New York, 1972.

Ropars, Marie-Claire, "The Graphic in Filmic Writing: A bout de souffle, or the Erratic . . .," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Fall 1981-Spring 1982.

Falkenburg, Pamela, "'Hollywood' and the 'Art Cinema' as a Bipolar Modeling System: A bout de souffle and Breathless," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 7, no. 3, 1985.

"Godard Issue" of Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), Summer 1986.

Durgnat, Raymond, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1988.

Pulleine, Tim, in Films and Filming (London), August 1988.

Jensen, G. H., "Filmvurdering," in Z Filmtidsskrift (Oslo), no. 2, 1990.

Kulset, S., "Teoretiker til siste andedrag?" in Z Filmtidsskrift (Oslo), no. 1, 1991.

de Graaff, T., "Jongleren met ideeën," in Skrien (Amsterdam), December-January 1992-93.

"Parigi, a bout de souffle," in Castoro Cinema, March/April 1996.

* * *

A bout de souffle was the first feature directed by Jean-Luc Godard and one of the films introducing the French New Wave in the late 1950s. Godard had made several short films before A bout de souffle, but this feature established the international reputation of the director who is regarded as one of the most important filmmakers of the 1960s.

The film's story is fairly simple. Michel Poiccard (Jean-Paul Belmondo), a small time hood, casually kills a policeman. He goes to Paris to collect some money in order to leave the country, and tries to convince his American girlfriend Patricia Franchini (Jean Seberg) to go with him. She is less interested in accompanying him than she is in playing the role of an American intellectual in Paris. (She hawks the New York Herald Tribune on the Champs-Élysées while trying to establish herself as a journalist.) When Michel finally secures the money he needs and is ready to leave the city, Patricia betrays him to the police, and he is shot as he half-heartedly attempts to escape.

This basic sequence of events is the minimal thread of continuity that holds the filmic narrative together. However, causal development and character motivation in the traditional sense are relatively loose. While the film does not reject narrative conventions as a whole, it goes a long way towards weakening the tight-knit structure and explanatory mechanisms affiliated with dominant narrative. The film's visual construction works even more aggressively against conventional film style. It systematically departs from the aesthetic guidelines and rules defined by continuity editing, relying variously on long-take sequences (often shot with hand-held camera) and jump cutting. The free-wheeling, almost casual, use of the camera is typical of the New Wave style. Within individual scenes the systematic use of jump cuts and depiction of rambling, repetitious conversations are a way of testing the limits of narrative film style. It often seems that scenes are conceived to show what can be done with cinema rather than to develop the story in a coherent fashion.

While the film seems willfully to disregard the norms of commercial, studio filmmaking, it consistently refers to and plays with aspects of the American cinema. The main character, Michel, styles himself in the image of Humphrey Bogart. Early in the film he is seen standing by a movie poster admiring his hero's picture; in comparison his own status as a modern "tough guy" is only a weak imitation. The police on Michel's trail are similarly pale shadows of their predecessors in American films; they are bumbling, somewhat comical figures. The character of Patricia, and her portrayal by Seberg, refers to the role Seberg played in Otto Preminger's Bonjour Tristesse. There are also scenes constructed to "quote" sequences from American films. In Patricia's bedroom, Michel looks at her through a rolled-up poster. The camera zooms through the poster tube, followed by a cut to a close-up of Michel and Patricia kissing. These shots mimic a scene from Samuel Fuller's Forty Guns (with a rifle barrel instead of a poster) described by Godard in a review of the film as a moment of pure cinema.

The film's playfulness extends beyond the inside jokes that refer to other films. The sometimes abrupt shifts in tone, style, and plot development within and between scenes are an investigation of (and challenge to) the medium, based on familiarity with and affection for its history. The opening of the film is instructive in this regard. Michel delivers a rambling monologue as he drives through the French countryside. He is speeding, and a policeman starts to follow him. Michel drives off the road, and when he is followed, shoots the policeman. The murder is casual in manner and lacking in clear motive. It becomes almost a comic version of more serious crime dramas in which murders are fraught with tension and often defined as the act of ruthless or psychotic individuals. Because of his manner, the character of Michel is sometimes seen to exemplify the existentially alienated hero figure often found in New Wave films. Harsher critics condemn him as a character for his amoral, nihilistic behavior. However, this moralising attitude ignores the way in which the character derives from and parodies previous film hoodlums, and the appeal of the character as portrayed by Belmondo.

In various ways the film exemplifies the conjunction of a number of factors contributing to the French New Wave cinema. This includes the use of relatively new cameras (a lightweight Eclair, easily handheld); working with low budgets, which promoted location shooting and stories with contemporary settings; and the use of new personnel, including the star Belmondo and cameraman Raoul Coutard. In addition Godard brought a set of attitudes to filmmaking shared by his fellow New Wave directors, derived from his experience as a film critic in the 1950s. Among these was the belief that the director was the responsible creative individual behind a film, that film should be approached as a mode of personal expression, and a deep admiration for the visual style of many Hollywood films.

Beyond its status as a "New Wave film," A bout de souffle begins to define attitudes and concerns which are more fully developed in Godard's subsequent work. A broad range of cultural imagery is an integral part of the film's signifying material. Movie posters, art reproductions, and inserts of magazines and books not only function as elements of mise-en-scène, but also construct an image of contemporary life in terms of cultural collage. In addition the strategy of narrative digression is important, incorporating lengthy scenes to explore issues which do not serve to develop the story per se. In A bout de souffle Patricia's taking part in an interview with an author (played by French director Jean-Pierre Melville) functions in this way. Both of these practices testify to an interest in cinema as something more than a narrative medium in the conventional sense. As attention is directed to the ways in which filmic images and sounds create meaning, the very nature of cinematic signification becomes the central question for the director and his audience.

—M. B. White

A NOUS LA LIBERTÉ

France, 1931

Director: René Clair

Production: Tobis (Paris) and Filmsonor; black and white, 35mm, musical soundtrack with sound effects; running time: 97 minutes. Released 31 December 1931. Filmed 1931 in Tobis studios and around Paris.

Producer: Frank Clifford; screenplay: René Clair; photography: Georges Périnal; editor: René le Hénaff; sound: Hermann Storr; art director: Lazare Meerson; music: Georges Auric; musical director: Armand Bernard; costume designer: René Hubert; assistant director: Albert Valentin.

Cast: Henri Marchand (Emile); Raymond Cordy (Louis); Rolla France (Jeanne); Paul Ollivier (Paul Imaque, Jeanne's uncle); Jacques Shelly (Paul); André Michaud (Foreman); Germaine Aussey (Maud, Louis's mistress); Alexandre d'Arcy (Gigolo); William Burke (Leader of the gangsters); Vincent Hyspa (Speaker); Léon Lorin (Fussy official).

Publications

Scripts:

Clair, René, A nous la liberté in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), November 1968.

A Nous La Liberté and Entr'Acte: Films by René Clair, New York, 1970.

Books:

Viazzzi, G., René Clair, Milan, 1946.

Bourgeois, J., René Clair, Geneva, 1949.

A nous la liberté

Charensol, Georges, and Roger Régent, Un Maître du cinéma: René Clair, Paris, 1952.

Solmi, A., Tre maestri del cinema, Milan, 1956.

De La Roche, Catherine, René Clair: An Index, London, 1958.

Amengual, Barthélemy, René Clair, Paris, 1963; revised edition, 1969.

Mitry, Jean, René Clair, Paris, 1969.

Samuels, Charles, Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.

McGerr, Celia, René Clair, Boston, 1980.

Barrot, Olivier, René Clair; ou, Le Temps mesuré, Renens, Switzerland, 1985.

Greene, Naomi, René Clair: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1985.

Dale, R. C., The Films of René Clair, Metuchen, New Jersey, 2 vols., 1986.

Articles:

Potamkin, Harry, "René Clair and Film Humor," in Hound and Horn (New York), October-December 1932.

Causton, Bernard, "A Conversation with René Clair," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1932-33.

Jacobs, Lewis, "The Films of René Clair," in New Theatre (New York), February 1936.

"Clair Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), August-September 1951.

Connor, Edward, and Edward Jablonski, in Films in Review (New York), November 1954.

Tallmer, Jerry, in Village Voice (New York), 16 November 1955.

Ford, Charles, "Cinema's First Immortal," in Films in Review (New York), November 1960.

Berti, V., "L'arte del comico in René Clair," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), March-April 1968.

Baxter, John, "A Conversation with René Clair," in Focus on Film (London), Winter 1972.

Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1977.

Kramer, S. P., "René Clair: Situation and Sensibility in A nous la liberté," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 12, no. 2, 1984.

* * *

The fear of a static theatrical cinema resulting from the invention of the sound film was very soon dissipated by liberators such as Ernst Lubitsch and René Clair. With a concentration on music and movement while maintaining strict control over dialogue the cinema began to move again. Clair, with his first two films, had already established a style, and the cycle of development from which this style emerged is curious in itself. The French comedian Max Linder was a direct influence on Chaplin and the whole slapstick school which in turn inspired the young René Clair. And, as if the process of interchange of ideas seemed determined to go on, Chaplin in Modern Times drew inspiration from the assembly line sequence in Clair's A nous la liberté. In this film Clair satirizes the industrial malaise which reduces man to the level of a machine. That satire may seem to weaken the human element but fun and joy take over as Clair falls so much in love with his characters that he passes that affection to the audience. One cannot even harbor a grudge against the villains because they too are ridiculously human. It is not difficult to see how the film failed to measure up to the demands of socially committed critics like Georges Sadoul.

Two companions of a jail-break are the protagonists of this musical comedy. One, played with eccentric sympathy by Raymond Cordy, is clever and successful and quickly rises in the world of industry. The other, played by Henri Marchand, wanders innocently throughout the film, willing to accept the unexpected. Even the joy of his escape from prison arises from a potentially tragic situation. His courtship is as artless as everything else he does.

Employing the talents of the brilliant art director Lazare Meerson, Clair uses the vast industrial complex to its fullest until it becomes a fun palace with plenty of room for chases and horseplay. Even the building is deflated. The joyful and carefree music of Georges Auric carries the film along, while Georges Périnal's camera exploits the large white surfaces of the super-factory and the brightness of the walls.

But it is not the technical excellence of the film which remains in one's mind. It is the puncturing of pomposity, the rejection of dehumanizing technical processes, the statement of essential human values and an appreciation of the incongruities of human existence. It is a far cry from the world of Le Chapeau de paille d'Italie, but the child-like delight in the demolition of the pretentious in Clair is common to both films. Not for him the sighs of high romance or the exaggerations of grand opera. His heart is always with ordinary people and their simple predicaments. He sees the world through the eyes of the characters Louis and Emile. Maybe his idea of Utopia is naive and impractical but it is an ideal which has been thought of by many people. In an age of mass regimentation and super-states it remains a recurring vision.

—Liam O'Leary

A PROPOS DE NICE

(On the Subject of Nice)

France, 1930

Director: Jean Vigo

Production: Black and white, 35mm; running time: about 25 minutes. Premiered June 1930, Paris. Filmed winter 1929 through March 1930 in Nice.

Scenario: Mr. and Mrs. Jean Vigo and Mr. and Mrs. Boris Kaufman; photography: Boris Kaufman; editor: Jean Vigo.

Publications

Script:

Vigo, Jean, Oeuvre de cinéma: Films, scénarios, projets de films, texts sur le cinéma, edited by Pierre Lherminier, Paris, 1985.

Books:

Feldman, Harry, and Joseph Feldman, Jean Vigo, London, 1951.

Smith, Jean, Jean Vigo, New York, 1971.

Salles-Gomes, P. E., Jean Vigo, Paris 1957; revised edition, Los Angeles, 1971.

Smith, John M., Jean Vigo, New York, 1962.

Lherminier, Pierre, Jean Vigo, Paris, 1967.

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.

Simon, William G., The Films of Jean Vigo, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

Salles-Gomes, P.E., Jean Vigo, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Calvalcanti, Alberto, "Jean Vigo," in Cinema Quarterly (Edinburgh), Winter 1935.

Agee, James, "Life and Work of Jean Vigo," in Nation (New York), 12 July 1947.

Weinberg, H. G., "The Films of Jean Vigo," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), July 1947.

Barbarow, George, "The Work of Jean Vigo," in Politics 5, Winter 1948.

Amengual, Barthélemy, in Positif (Paris), May 1953.

Chardère, Bernard, "Jean Vigo et ses films," in Cinéma (Paris), March 1955.

Mekas, Jonas, "An Interview with Boris Kaufman," in Film Culture (New York), Summer, 1955.

Ashton, Dudley Shaw, "Portrait of Vigo," in Film (London), December 1955.

"Vigo Issue" of Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), nos. 51–52, 1966.

Beylie, Claude, in Ecran (Paris), July-August 1975.

Liebman, S., in Millennium (New York), Winter 1977–78.

Vigo, Jean, "Towards a Social Cinema," in Millennium (New York), Winter 1977–78.

Travelling (Lausanne), Summer 1979.

Vinnichenko, E., "Po povodu Nitstsy, Frantsiia," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 3, 1989.

Sidler, V., "Traumer des Kinos, Rimbaud des Films," in Filmbulletin (Winterthur, Switzerland), no. 4, 1992.

* * *

Jean Vigo's reputation as a prodigy of the cinema rests on less than 200 minutes of film. His first venture, a silent documentary 25 minutes long, was A propos de Nice, and in it one can see immediately the energy and aptitude of this great talent. But A propos de Nice is far more than a biographical curio; it is one of the last films to come out of the fertile era of the French avant-garde and it remains one of the best examples to illustrate the blending of formal and social impulses in that epoch.

A propos de Nice

Confined to Nice on account of the tuberculosis both he and his wife were to die of, Vigo worked for a small company as assistant cameraman. When his father-in-law presented the young couple with a gift of $250, Jean promptly bought his own Debie camera. In Paris in the summer of 1929 he haunted the ciné-club showings at the Vieux Colombier and at the Studio des Ursulines. There he met Boris Kaufman, a Russian émigré, brother of Dziga Vertov. Kaufman, already an established cameraman in the kino-eye tradition, was enthusiastic about Vigo's plan to make a film on the city of Nice. During the autumn of 1929 Kaufman and his wife labored over a script with the Vigos. From his work Jean began to save ends of film with which to load the Debie and by year's end the filming was underway.

Originally planned as a variant of the city symphony, broken into its three movements (sea, land, and sky) A propos de Nice was destined to vibrate with more political energy than did Berlin, Rien que les heures, Manhattan, or any of the other examples of this type. From the first, Vigo insisted that the travelogue approach be avoided. He wanted to pit the boredom of the upper classes at the shore and in the casinos against the struggle for life and death in the city's poorer backstreets.

The clarity of the script was soon abandoned. Unable to shoot "live" in the casinos and happy to follow the lead of their rushes, Vigo and Kaufman concentrated on the strength of particular images rather than on the continuity of a larger design. They were certain that design must emerge in the charged images themselves, which they could juxtapose in editing.

The power of the images derives from two sources, their clearcut iconographic significance as social documents, and the high quality they enjoy as photographs, carefully (though not artfully) composed. Opposition is the ruling logic behind both these sources as they appear in the finished film, so that pictures of hotels, lounging women, wealthy tourists, and fancy roulette tables are cut against images of tenements, decrepit children, garbage, and local forms of back-street gambling. In the carnival sequence which ends the film, the power bursting within the city's belly spills out onto the streets of the wealthy and dramatizes a conflict which geography can't hide.

Formally the film opposes a two-dimensional optical schema, used primarily for the wealthy parts of town, to a tactile, nearly 3-D approach. Aerial shots and the voyeurism of the "Promenade des Anglais" define the wealthy as indolent observers of sports, while deep in the town itself everyone, including the camera, participates in the carnal dance of life, a dance whose eroticism is made explicit toward the film's end.

Entranced by Surrealism (at the premiere of this film Vigo paid homage to Luis Buñuel), the filmmakers used shock cuts, juxtaposing symbolic images like smokestacks and Baroque cemeteries. A woman is stripped by a stop-action cut and a man becomes a lobster. Swift tilts topple a grand hotel. As he proclaimed in his address, this was to be a film with a documentary point of view. To him that meant hiding the camera to capture the look of things (Kaufman was pushed in a wheelchair along the Promenade cranking away under his blanket), and then editing what they collected to their own designs.

A propos de Nice is a messy film. Full of experimental techniques and frequently clumsy camerawork, it nevertheless exudes the energy of its creators and blares forth a message about social life. The city is built on indolence and gambling and ultimately on death, as its crazy cemetery announces. But underneath this is an erotic force that comes from the lower class, the force of seething life that one can smell in garbage and that Vigo uses to drive his film. A propos de Nice advanced the cinema not because it gave Vigo his start and not because it is a thoughtfully made art film. It remains one of those few examples where several powers of the medium (as recorder, organizer, clarifier of issues, and proselytizer) come together with a strength and ingenuity that are irreplaceable. The critics at its premiere in June 1930 were impressed and Vigo's talent was generally recognized. But the film got little distribution; the age of silent films, even experimental ones like this, was coming to an end. This is too bad. Every director should begin his or her career as Vigo did, with commitment, independence, and a sense of enthusiastic exploration.

—Dudley Andrew

ACCATTONE

Italy, 1961

Director: Pier Paolo Pasolini

Production: Cine de Duca-Arco Film; 35mm; running time: 120 minutes. Released 1961. Filmed 1960–61 in the slums of Rome.

Producer: Alfredo Bini; screenplay: Pier Paolo Pasolini with dialogue collaboration by Sergio Citti, from the novel Una vita violenta by Pasolini; photography: Tonino Delli Colli; editor: Nino Baragli; sound: Luigi Puri and Manlio Magara; art director: Flavio Mogherini; music director: Carlo Rustichelli; assistant directors: Bernardo Bertolucci and Leopoldo Savona.

Cast: Franco Citti (Accattone/Vittorio); Franca Pasut (Stella); Silvana Corsini (Maddalena); Paola Guidi (Ascenza); Adriana Asti (Amore); Renato Capogna (Renato); Mario Cipriani (Balilla); Roberto Scaringella (Cartagine); Piero Morgia (Pio); Umberto Bevilacqua (The Neapolitan); Elsa Morante (Prisoner); Adele Cambria (Nannina); Polidor (Beechino); Danilo Alleva (Iaio); Luciano Conti (Il Moicano); Luciano Gonino (Piede d'Oro); Gabriele Baldini (Intellectual); Adrianno Mazelli and Mario Castiglione (Amore's clients); Dino Frondi and Tommaso Nuevo (Cartagine's friends); Romolo Orazi (Accattone's father-in-law); Silvio Citti (Sabino); Adriana Moneta (Margheritona).

Publications

Script:

Pasolini, Pier Paolo, Accattone, Rome, 1961.

Books:

- Pasolini, Pier Paolo, Pasolini on Pasolini: Interviews with Oswald Stack, Bloomington, Indiana, 1969.
- Gervais, Marc, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Paris, 1973.
- Siciliano, Enzo, Vita di Pasolini, Milan, 1978; as Pasolini: A Biography, New York, 1982.
- Bertini, Antonio, Teoria e tecnica del film in Pasolini, Rome, 1979.
- Groppali, Enrico, L'ossessione e il fantasma: Il teatro di Pasolini e Moravia, Venice, 1979.
- Snyder, Stephen, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Boston, 1980.
- Bellezza, Dario, Morte di Pasolini, Milan, 1981.
- Bergala, Alain, and Jean Narboni, editors, Pasolini cinéaste, Paris, 1981.
- Gerard, Fabien S., Pasolini; ou, Le Mythe de la barbarie, Brussels, 1981.
- Boarini, Vittorio, and others, Da Accattone a Salò: 120 scritti sul cinema di Pier Paolo Pasolini, Bologna, 1982.
- Pasolini, Pier Paolo, Poems, New York, 1982.
- De Guisti, Luciano, I film di Pier Paolo Pasolini, Rome, 1983.
- Carotenuto, Aldo, L'autunno della coscienza: Ricerche psicologiche su Pier Paolo Pasolini, Turin, 1985.
- Michalczyk, John J., The Italian Political Film-makers, Cranbury, New Jersey, 1986.
- Pasolini, Pier Paolo, Lettere 1940–1954: Con una cronologia della vita e delle opere, edited by Nico Naldini, Turin, 1986.
- Schweitzer, Otto, Pier Paolo Pasolini: Mit Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten, Hamburg, 1986.
- Klimke, Christoph, Kraft der Vergangenheit: Zu Motiven der Filme von Pier Paolo Pasolini, Frankfurt, 1988.
- Van Watson, William, Pier Paolo Pasolini & the Theatre of the Word, Lewiston, 1989.
- Rumble, Patrick, Pier Paolo Pasolini: Contemporary Perspectives, Toronto, 1993.
- Baranski, Zymunt G., Pasolini Old & New; Surveys & Studies, Dublin, 1999.

Articles:

- Murray, William, "Letter from Rome," in New Yorker, 21 April 1962.
- Cameron, Ian, in Movie (London), September 1962.
- Bean, Robin, in Films and Filming (London), 12 September 1962.
- Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1962.
- Bragin, John, "Interview with Pasolini," in Film Culture (New York), Fall 1966.
- Conrad, Randall, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1966–67.
- Kauffmann, Stanley, "Poet and the Pimp," in New Republic (New York), 6 April 1968.
- Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 6 June 1968.
- MacDonald, Susan, "Pasolini: Rebellion, Art, and a New Society," in Screen (London), May-June 1969.
- Bragin, John, "Pier Paolo Pasolini: Poetry as a Compensation," in Film Society Review (New York), nos. 5–7, 1969.
- Purdon, Noel, "Pasolini: The Film of Alienation," in Cinema (London), August 1970.
- Armes, Roy, "Pasolini," in Films and Filming (London), June 1971.
- Séquences* (Montreal), July 1973.
- "Pasolini Issues" of Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), nos. 109–111, 1976, and nos. 112–114, 1976.
- "Pasolini Issue" of Cinéma (Zurich), no. 2, 1976.
- Gervais, M., in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 4, 1977.

Accattone

Télez, T. L., in Contracampo (Madrid), December 1980.

La Greca, A., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), January-February 1986.

Pezzotta, A., "Io sono una forza del passato," in Filmcritica (Rome), October-November 1988.

Thirard, P. L., "Se suicider, c'est l'idée la plus simple," in Positif (Paris), September 1989.

Beylot, Pierre, "Pasolini, du réalisme au mythe," in CinémaAction (Courbevoie), January 1994.

Castoro Cinema, July/August 1994.

Orr, Christopher, "Pasolini's Accattone, or Naturalism and Its Discontents," in Film Criticism (Meadville), Spring 1995.

Campani, E.M., "Death and Narrative: an Itinerary," in Blimp (Graz), no. 34, Summer 1996.

Kino (Warsaw), July-August 1998.

* * *

Himself an alien in Rome, isolated by his regional Friulian upbringing, his homosexuality, and his poverty, the young Pier Paolo Pasolini had felt an instant affinity with the young street kids of the crowded, war-ruined city when he arrived there in the winter of 1949. He quickly developed his taste for sexual rough trade among the ragazzi of the city, the sarcastic kids dispossessed and wised-up by post-war greed and the opportunism encouraged by the Marshall

Plan. In 1955 Pasolini published his first novel, Ragazzi di vita, a picture of life in the shantytowns and among the pimping, petty-thieving boys he now knew well. Una vita violenta, four years later, explored the same ground through the brief, violent life of Tommaso, smart enough to sense fitfully the ruin of his future. Una vita violenta became the basis of Pasolini's first film, and Tommaso the model for Vittorio, the delinquent his pals call Accattone.

Fellini was to have backed the film but pulled out after Pasolini submitted some test footage in which he had overreached himself in trying to shoot in the style of Dreyer's Trial of Joan of Arc. With Italian film heading away from neorealism towards a high style and elaborate production values mirroring the new wealth of the cities, Fellini was also dubious about Pasolini's chosen location, a run-down street in the heart of the Roman slums. Nor had he any reason to believe that Franco Citti could carry the leading role; inexperienced, uncommunicative, Citti was the younger brother of the man who had been Pasolini's adviser on Roman dialect for the script editing work he did on films by Fellini and Mauro Bolognini.

It was Bolognini who, seeing stills from the test footage on Pasolini's desk, understood what he was trying to do and interested producer Alfredo Bini in the project. The result was a film more characteristic of Pasolini's temperament than of Italian cinema. To the music of Bach's St. Matthew Passion, Citti moves around a Rome of decadent religious imagery, crumbling buildings, a city pervaded by a sun-dazed, numbed sense of mortality. Dreams show the ragazzi buried half-naked in rubble, an evocative image of the ruin Pasolini saw reflected in both the morality and the architecture of his adopted city. Aiming for “an absolute simplicity of expression,” Pasolini in fact achieved a studied stylization that was to become typical of his films. Citti became a star, and Accattone established Pasolini as a star himself in yet another field, matching his eminence in poetry, fiction, and criticism. Today, with Pasolini dead at the hands of just such a boy as Vittorio, it is difficult to see the film as anything but an ironic signpost to the fate of this mercurial polymath.

—John Baxter

ADAM'S RIB

USA, 1949

Director: George Cukor

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 101 minutes. Released 1949. Filmed at MGM studios.

Producer: Lawrence Weingarten; screenplay: Ruth Gordon and Garson Kanin; photography: George J. Folsey; editor: George Boemler; art directors: Cedric Gibbons and William Ferrari; music: Miklos Rozsa.

Cast: Spencer Tracy (Adam Bonner); Katharine Hepburn (Amanda Bonner); Judy Holliday (Doris Attinger); Tom Ewell (Warren Attinger); David Wayne (Kip Lurie); Jean Hagen (Beryl Caighn); Hope Emerson (Olympia La Pere); Eve March (Grace); Clarence Kolb (Judge Reiser); Emerson Treacy (Jules Frikke); Polly Moran (Mrs. McGrath); Will Wright (Judge Marcasson); Elizabeth Flounoy (Dr. Margaret Brodeigh).

Publications

Script:

Gordon, Ruth, and Garson Kanin, Adam's Rib, New York, 1971.

Books:

Langlois, Henri, and others, Hommage à George Cukor, Paris, 1963.

Domarchi, Jean, George Cukor, Paris, 1965.

Deschner, Donald, The Films of Spencer Tracy, New York, 1968.

Carey, Gary, Cukor and Company: The Films of George Cukor and His Collaborators, New York, 1971.

Kanin, Garson, Tracy and Hepburn, New York, 1971.

Dickens, Homer, The Films of Katharine Hepburn, New York, 1971.

Lambert, Gavin, On Cukor, New York, 1972.

Adam's Rib

Tozzi, Romano, Spencer Tracy, New York, 1973.

Marill, Alvin H., Katharine Hepburn, New York, 1973.

Cavell, Stanley, Pursuits of Happiness: The Hollywood Comedy of Remarriage, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1981.

Phillips, Gene D., George Cukor, Boston, 1982.

Carey, Gary, Katharine Hepburn: A Biography, London, 1983.

Britton, Andrew, Katharine Hepburn: The Thirties and After, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1984.

Freedland, Michael, Katharine Hepburn, London, 1984.

Morley, Sheridan, Katharine Hepburn: A Celebration, London, 1984.

Bernadoni, James, George Cukor: A Critical Study and Filmography, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1985.

Edwards, Anne, Katharine Hepburn: A Biography, London, 1986.

Davidson, Bill, Spencer Tracy: Tragic Idol, London, 1987.

Levy, Emanuel, George Cukor, Master of Elegance; Hollywood's Legendary Director and His Stars, New York, 1994.

McGilligan, George Cukor: The Book, New York, 1997.

Articles:

Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 24 December 1949.

Houston, Penelope, “Cukor and the Kanins,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1955.

Tozzi, Romano, “Katharine Hepburn,” in Films in Review (New York), December 1957.

“Cukor Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1964.

Tozzi, Romano, “Spencer Tracy,” in Films in Review (New York), December 1966.

- Gilliatt, Penelope, "The Most Amicable Combatants," in New Yorker, 23 September 1972.
- Lynch, Anne Louise, in Magill's Survey of Cinema I, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Tobin, Yann, in Positif (Paris), May 1985.
- Aarts, A., in Skrien (Amsterdam), September-October 1985.
- Detassis, P., "La costola di Adamo di George Cukor," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), October 1989.
- Shumway, D. R., "Screwball Comedies: Constructing Romance Mystifying Marriage," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), no. 4, 1991.
- Nacache, Jacqueline, "'Madame porte la culotte': maris et femmes," in Mensuel du Cinéma, October 1993.

* * *

Adam's Rib represents a climax in the evolution of the classic Hollywood screwball comedy. In the 1930s, screwball comedies united antagonistic couples whose clashes revolved around egos, class conflicts, and attitudes about money and values. In the 1940s, screwball comedies replaced these conflicts with ones that revolved around egos and career-marriage decisions. In such films as His Girl Friday, Woman of the Year, Take a Letter, Darling, and They All Kissed the Bride, the comic crises hinged on the heroines' decisions regarding their professional careers and domestic roles. In 1949, George Cukor's Adam's Rib took the familiar marriage-career crisis formula of the screwball comedy to its logical conclusion—a comic study of sex role stereotyping and the invalidity of narrowly defined sex roles.

The film reunited Katharine Hepburn and Spencer Tracy, who had previously teamed on Woman of the Year, Keeper of the Flame, Without Love, and State of the Union, and whose successful on-screen romances seemed to radiate some of the genuine love and affection of their off-screen relationship. The film also features a brilliant screenplay by the husband-wife team Garson Kanin and Ruth Gordon. All the principals—director, stars, and writers—had proven track records, and in a financially bad year for Hollywood, their combined box-office appeal led to the three-way teaming on a film project that otherwise might not have been possible.

The movie is about Adam and Amanda Bonner, husband and wife lawyers who find themselves on opposite sides of a courtroom case. The legal case in question concerns a woman (Judy Holliday) who has shot her adulterous husband (Tom Ewell). Defense attorney Amanda Bonner views her case as a woman's rights issue, and she bases her defense on the premise that the husband would have been exempt from prosecution if the roles were reversed. In front of her district attorney husband, she turns the courtroom and the trial into a hilarious forum for a public debate on the "double standard" and the narrowness of sexual stereotypes. In the meantime, the courtroom competition begins to threaten the Bonner's marriage.

Much of the film's humor arises from the many sex-role reversals. Through such reversals, the movie simultaneously comments on how traditional social roles are defined by stereotypes of masculinity and femininity. The film literally takes this notion to its extreme when it depicts what the unwitting husband, wife, and lover (Jean Hagen), who are the subjects of the trial, would be like if their sexes were reversed. Meanwhile, the Bonner's crumbling marriage, one based on mutual respect and liberation from sexual stereotypes, requires a series of further role reversals to be put back together again. Adam wins his wife's sympathies by crying; Amanda apologizes by sending her husband a new hat.

Amanda ultimately wins her case and husband without giving up her principles. Adam learns about humility without losing his masculinity. But when the reconciled Bonners finally fall into bed together behind a curtain, the on-screen veil and their final unresolved argument about sex roles, competition, and sex differences cinematically deny their absolute integration as a unified couple. Like many screwball comedies that preceded it, Adam's Rib ends with a marital reconciliation that establishes the couple's unity without resolving the individuals' ongoing differences.

The writing, acting, and directing team that made Adam's Rib a success reunited in 1952 for a screwball comedy about a manager and his professional female athlete in Pat and Mike. The successful story formula from Adam's Rib further inspired a 1973 television series with the same name.

—Lauren Rabinovitz

THE ADVENTURE

See L'AVVENTURA

THE ADVENTURES OF ROBIN HOOD

USA, 1938

Directors: Michael Curtiz and William Keighley

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures Inc.; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 102 minutes. Released 1938. Filmed at Warner Bros. studios.

Producer: Hal Wallis; screenplay: Norman Reilly Raine and Seton I. Miller from the Robin Hood legends; photography: Tony Gaudio, Sol Polito, and W. Howard Green; editor: Ralph Dawson; art director: Carl Weyl; music: Eric Wolfgang Korngold, with orchestrations by Hugo Friedhofer and Milan Roder; costume designer: Milo Anderson.

Cast: Errol Flynn (Robin Hood, or Sir Robin of Locksley); Olivia de Havilland (Lady Marian Fitzwalter); Basil Rathbone (Sir Guy of Gisbourne); Claude Rains (Prince John); Alan Hale (Little John); Eugene Pallette (Friar Tuck); Ian Hunter (King Richard the Lion-Hearted); Melville Cooper (High Sheriff of Nottingham); Patric Knowles (Will Scarlett); Herbert Mundin (Much the Miller's son); Una O'Connor (Bess); Montagu Love (Bishop of Black Canon).

Awards: Oscars for Interior Decoration, Best Original Score, and Best Editing, 1938.

The Adventures of Robin Hood

Publications

Script:

Raine, Norman Reilly, and Seton I. Miller, The Adventures of Robin Hood, edited by Rudy Behlmer, Madison, Wisconsin, 1979.

Books:

- Martin, Pete, Hollywood Without Makeup, New York, 1948.
 Flynn, Errol, My Wicked, Wicked Ways, New York, 1959.
 Parish, James Robert, editor, Errol Flynn, New York, 1969.
 Thomas, Tony, Rudy Behlmer, and Clifford McCarty, The Films of Errol Flynn, New York, 1969.
 Canham, Kingsley, Michael Curtiz, Raoul Walsh, Henry Hathway, London, 1973.
 Thomas, Tony, Cads and Cavaliers: The Film Adventurers, New York, 1973.
 Rosenzweig, Sidney, Casablanca and Other Major Films of Michael Curtiz, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.
 Valenti, Peter, Errol Flynn: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, Connecticut, 1984.
 Kinnard, Roy, and R. J. Vitone, The American Films of Michael Curtiz, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1986.
 Behlmer, Rudy, Inside Warner Brothers; Nineteen Thirty-Five to Nineteen Fifty-One, New York, 1987.
 Robertson, James, The Casablanca Man; The Career of Michael Curtiz, New York, 1993.

Articles:

- Thomas, Anthony, "Errol Flynn," in Films in Review (New York), January 1960.
 Callenbach, Ernest, "Comparative Anatomy of Folk-Myth Films: Robin Hood and Antônio das Mortes," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1969–70.
 Nolan, Jack Edmund, "Michael Curtiz," in Films in Review (New York), November 1970.
 Gow, Gordon, "Swashbuckling," in Films and Filming (London), January 1972.
 Carcedo, J., in Image et Son (Paris), September 1978.
 Chevasu, F., in Image et Son (Paris), February 1978.
 Eyquem, O., "Sherwood, USA (A propos des Avantures de Robin des Bois)," in Positif (Paris), April 1978.
 Renaud, T., in Cinéma (Paris), February 1978.
 Morsberger, Robert, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Raynes, D., in Soundtrack (Hollywood), March 1984.
 Sayre, Nora, "Curtiz: A Man for All Genres. . .," in New York Times, 29 November 1992.
 Holt, Wesley G., "The Adventures of Robin Hood," in Filmfax (Evanston), April-May 1993.
Télérama (Paris), 13 September 1995.

* * *

The Adventures of Robin Hood, a Warner Brothers studio production, reveals many facets and details of the studio system. The film was originally planned as a vehicle for James Cagney following the success of Midsummer Night's Dream, but contract problems with Cagney and the success of Captain Blood prompted the studio to cast Errol Flynn as the rogue outlaw. Once production on the film began, a directorial change occurred after the original director, William Keighley, led the production over budget and behind schedule. He was replaced by Michael Curtiz, though both men share the director's credit.

The film reflects the studio's plan to produce a more prestigious product than the musicals and gangster films of the early 1930s. Even so, the film does show the studio's frequent thematic concern with common folk banding together to achieve a goal of correcting an injustice, economic or otherwise.

The film's cast members have generally been acclaimed for matching the literary image of their characters. Even the supporting characters such as Alan Hale's Little John and Eugene Pallette's Friar Tuck seem to be perfectly suited for their roles. Under the direction of Curtiz and Keighley, the principal actors play off each other and promptly reveal much of their characters in this straight-forward narrative. Claude Rains portrays Prince John as a schemer, a man with a thirst for power; while Basil Rathbone's Sir Guy, with his good looks and his sinister bearing, makes an equal adversary for Flynn's Robin. Olivia de Havilland as Marian seems to be a pure aristocrat whether in the court or in the forest, or when facing death or confessing her love for Robin.

Errol Flynn's Robin is a man of action but also of wit. Following Douglas Fairbanks's silent film portrayal of Robin, Flynn's Robin engages in daring deeds but not on such a large scale (in part due to Warner's tight budget). The film also follows Fairbanks's lead in giving Robin a sense of humor as Robin throws verbal arrows at any villains in sight. Even in the love scenes, Robin can joke with and tease Marian.

The Adventures of Robin Hood, a very successful film when first released, has become something more than an accomplished film from the 1930s. For many, the influence of this film is immense. There is, for example, a great deal of similarity between the action of Robin's men in the forest capturing a gold shipment and the attack of the Ewoks against the Stormtroopers in Return of the Jedi. Not only does it remain one of the quintessential films of the swashbuckling genre but it is also the definitive Robin Hood legend for scores of film-goers and television viewers. Much like that of The Wizard of Oz, Robin Hood's audience has grown through repeated and successful television screenings. TV Guide once listed it as one of the top five films on television as selected by station programmers.

—Ray Narducy

THE AFRICAN QUEEN

USA, 1951

Director: John Huston

Production: Horizon Romulus Productions; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 103 minutes. Released 1951. Filmed at various film studios in London; exteriors shot along the Ruiki River in the Belgian Congo and what was then the British protectorate of Uganda.

Producer: Sam Spiegel; screenplay: James Agee and John Huston with Peter Viertel, from the novel by C. S. Forester; photography: Jack Cardiff; editor: Ralph Kempen; sound engineer: John Mitchell; art director: John Hoesli; music: Allan Gray, executed by the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of Norman del Mar; special effects: Cliff Richardson; costume designer: Doris Langley Moore.

Cast: Katharine Hepburn (Rose Sayer); Humphrey Bogart (Charlie Allnut); Robert Morley (Rev. Samuel Sayer); Peter Bull (Captain of the Luisa); Theodore Bikel (1st Officer of the Luisa); Walter Cotell (2nd Officer of the Luisa); Gerald Ohn (Officer of the Luisa); Peter Swanwick (1st Officer of the Shoona); Richard Marner (2nd Officer of the Shoond).

Awards: Oscar, Best Actor (Bogart), 1951; American Film Institute's "100 Years, 100 Movies," 1998.

Publications

Scripts:

Agee, James, Agee on Film 2: Five Film Scripts, foreword by John Huston, New York, 1960.

Books:

- Davay, Paul, John Huston, Paris, 1957.
 Allais, Jean-Claude, John Huston, Paris, 1960.
 Nolan, William F., John Huston: King Rebel, Los Angeles, 1965.
 Gehman, Richard, Bogart, Greenwich, Connecticut, 1965.
 Michael, Paul, Humphrey Bogart: The Man and His Films, Indianapolis, 1965.
 McCarty, Clifford, Bogey: The Films of Humphrey Bogart, New York, 1965.
 Benayoun, Robert, John Huston, Paris, 1966; revised edition, 1985.
 Dickens, Homer, The Films of Katharine Hepburn, New York, 1971.
 Barbour, Alan, Humphrey Bogart, New York, 1973.
 Marill, Alvin H., Katharine Hepburn, New York, 1973.
 Benchley, Nathaniel, Humphrey Bogart, Boston, 1975.
 Kaminsky, Stuart M., John Huston, Maker of Magic, Boston, 1978.
 Madsen, Axel, John Huston, New York, 1978.
 Huston, John, An Open Book, New York, 1980.
 Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
 Pettigrew, Terence, Bogart: A Definitive Study of His Film Career, London, 1981.
 Carey, Gary, Katharine Hepburn: A Biography, London, 1983.
 Britton, Andrew, Katharine Hepburn: The Thirties and After, New-castle-upon-Tyne, 1984.
 Freedland, Michael, Katharine Hepburn, London, 1984.
 Morley, Sheridan, Katharine Hepburn: A Celebration, London, 1984.
 Hammen, Scott, John Huston, Boston, 1985.
 Winkler, Willi, Humphrey Bogart und Hollywoods Schwarze Serie, Munich, 1985.
 Edwards, Anne, Katharine Hepburn: A Biography, London, 1986.
 McCarty, John, The Films of John Huston, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1987.
 Hepburn, Katharine, The Making of "The African Queen"; or, How I Went to Africa with Bogart, Bacall, and Huston and Almost Lost My Life, New York and London, 1987.
 Brill, Lesley, John Huston's Filmmaking, New York, 1997.
 Cunningham, Ernest W., Ultimate Bogie, Los Angeles, 1999.

Articles:

- "Life Goes on Location in Africa," in Life (New York), 7 September 1951.
 Reisz, Karel, "Interview with Huston," in Sight and Sound (London), January-March 1952.
 "Huston Issue" of Positif (Paris), January 1952.
 Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), February 1952.
 Bowen, Clarissa, in Sight and Sound (London), April-June 1952.
 Sadoul, Georges, in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 10 April 1952.
 Demeure, Jacques, and Michel Subiela, "The African Queen, John Huston, and Humphrey Bogart," in Positif (Paris), August 1952.
 "Huston Issue" of Positif (Paris), January 1957.
 "Special Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), April 1957.
 Archer, Eugene, "A Monograph on John Huston," in Films and Filming (London), September and October 1959.
 Jones, DuPre, "Beating the Devil: 30 Years of John Huston," in Films and Filming (London), January 1973.

The African Queen

- de Selva, L., in Image et Son (Paris), 331 bis, 1978.
- Snyder, Ellen J., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Fultz, J. R., "A Classic Case of Collaboration . . . The African Queen," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 19, no. 1, 1982.
- Eyquem, O., "Entretien avec Peter Viertel, scénariste," in Positif (Paris), May 1990.
- Rasmussen, S., "Tykhuder," in Levende Billeder (Copenhagen), June 1990.
- Brill, Lesley, "The African Queen and John Huston's Filmmaking," in Cinema Journal (Austin), Winter 1995.

* * *

From the beginning, director John Huston insisted that The African Queen be shot on location. To find a river identical to the one in C. S. Forester's novel, he logged 25,000 flying miles criss-crossing Africa until he settled on the Ruiki in the then Belgian Congo. At a time (1951) when on-location shooting was nowhere near as common as today, traveling 1,100 miles up the Congo to make what is essentially a filmed dialogue must have seemed fanatical. And subsequent encounters with blood flukes, crocodiles, soldier ants, wild boars, stampeding elephants, malaria, and dysentery were hardly reassuring.

Yet The African Queen is more than a simple encounter between a man and a woman. It is a story of two very different people growing to love and respect one another after sharing and surviving severe hardships. Huston maintained that on-location shooting was the only way to make that suffering and subsequent romance believable and authentic. At Huston's insistence even the scenes shot off location were filmed under realistic conditions. For example, although Humphrey Bogart actually emerged from London rather than Ugandan waters (after pulling the African Queen), the leeches that covered him were the genuine article. Bogart's revulsion and shivering during that particular scene are convincing arguments for Huston's point-of-view.

Indeed, The African Queen's main strength is the acting of the two principal players—Humphrey Bogart as the seedy Canadian boat captain, Charlie Allnut, and Katharine Hepburn as the "Psalm-singing skinny old maid," British missionary Rose Sayer. According to Huston, although Bogart initially resisted and didn't like his character, after mimicking the director's gestures and expressions, “all at once he got under the skin of that wretched, sleazy, absurd, brave little man.” Hepburn, too, had trouble at the beginning; her portrayal was brittle, cold, and humorless. However, once Huston suggested that she play her part as if she were that Grand Lady Eleanor Roosevelt, she became both funny and refined, and a humor inherent in neither the novel nor the screenplay emerged between the two characters.

The humor is essential to the success of the film not because it makes the film more entertaining, but because it arises out of the equality and individuality of two eccentric and strong-willed adversaries. They may end up falling in love, but not without an often hysterical struggle. Bogart's character begins as a self-indulgent drunk who mimics the missionary's prim ways; she, on the other hand, frowns upon his drinking and cowardice, disagreeing with his lax views on human nature: “Nature is what we were put on earth to rise above.” But in courageously facing and solving problems together, the two head towards a middle ground. Allnut stops drinking (Rose has thrown his gin overboard) and shaves, while Rose changes her mind about human nature. After encountering her first rapids, for example, she ecstatically exclaims, “I never dreamed any mere physical experience could be so stimulating! . . . I don't wonder you love boating, Mr. Allnut.” Finally, after escaping both the Germans and the allegedly uncrossable rapids, the two impulsively embrace and fall in love. The humor does not stop here, however. After their first tender night together, Rose shyly asks Allnut, “Dear, what is your first name?” Their mutual delight in his response is completely captivating.

Our captivation with the two characters allows us to accept many of the film's more improbable moments—the quick dispatch of Brother Samuel Sayer, the sun shining in the eyes of a German sharpshooter as naively predicted by Rose, heavy rains freeing the mired African Queen after Rose prays to God, and the deus ex machina ending. In fact, the ending had been changed several times. Writer James Agee hadn't written it yet when he suffered a heart attack, so Huston tried to write one with Peter Viertel; before the fourth and final ending was conceived, three others were apparently considered: (1) a British warship rescues Rose and Charlie after a heroic battle with the Louisa, (2) Rose proposes marriage before the first available British consul, (3) Charlie remembers the wife he had left behind in England and hadn't thought of for 20 years. The first and second endings combined were similar to what occurred in the original novel (that is, Forester's second ending—even he had problems resolving the plot).

Huston's fourth and happy ending—which miraculously saves Rosie and Charlie from their postnuptial death by hanging—is atypical, as are other elements in the script. Many of Huston's previous films had a bleaker view of humanity and ended unhappily (e.g. The Maltese Falcon, The Treasure of the Sierra Madre). Both Charlie and Rose exhibit an honesty and integrity at odds with such Hustonian liars and tricksters as Sam Spade, Brigid O'Shaughnessy, Rick Leland, and Dobbs. The two survive because of an internal nobility that Huston's seedier characters outwardly lack.

Huston's new optimism/idealism struck the right note with the public. The African Queen became one of 1952's top moneymakers, having been nominated for Best Actor (Bogart won), Best Actress, Best Direction, and Best Screenplay. British readers of Picturegoer voted Bogart the year's best actor, and Hepburn experienced the greatest box office hit of her career. A film that began as a vehicle for Charles Laughton and Elsa Lanchester, and later Bette Davis and David Niven, had found the perfect couple for its improbable romance.

—Catherine Henry

AFTER LIFE

See WANDAFURU RAIFU

L'AGE D'OR

(The Golden Age)

France, 1930

Director: Luis Buñuel

Production: Black and white, 35mm; running time: 60 minutes (some French sources list 80 minutes). Released 28 November 1930, Paris. Filmed in Studios Billancourt-Epinay, France.

Producer: Charles Vicomte de Noailles; screenplay: Luis Buñuel and Salvador Dalí; photography: Albert Duverger; editor: Luis Buñuel; production designer: Pierre Schilzneck; original music: Van Parys, montage of extracts from Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Debussy, and Wagner.

Cast: Lya Lys (The Woman); Gaston Modot (The Man); Max Ernst (Bandit Chief); Pierre Prévert (Péman, a Bandit); Caridad de Labaerdesque; Madame Noizet; Liorens Artigas; Duchange Ibanez; Lionel Salem; Pancho Cossio; Valentine Hugo; Marie Berthe Ernst; Jacques B. Brunius; Simone Cottance; Paul Eluard; Manuel Angeles Ortiz; Juan Esplandio; Pedro Flores; Juan Castañe; Joaquin Roa; Pruna; Xaume de Maravilles.

Publications

Scripts:

Buñuel, Luis, and Salvador Dalí, L'Age d'or, and Un Chien andalou, New York, 1968.

Buñuel, Luis, and Salvador Dalí, L'Age d'or, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), November 1983.

Books:

Brunius, Jacques B., En marge du cinéma français, Paris, 1947.

Kyrou, Ado, Le Surréalisme au cinéma, Paris, 1953; revised edition, 1963.

Moulet, Luc, Luis Buñuel, Brussels, 1957.

L'age d'or

- Kyrou, Ado, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1962.
- Grange, Frédéric, and Charles Rebolledo, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1964.
- Aranda, Francisco, Luis Buñuel: Biografía crítica, Madrid, 1969.
- Durgnat, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Berkeley, 1968; revised edition, 1977.
- Breton, André, Manifestoes of Surrealism, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1969.
- Buache, Freddy, Luis Buñuel, Lyons, 1970; as The Cinema of Luis Buñuel, New York and London, 1973.
- Matthews, J. H., Surrealism and the Film, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1971.
- Harcourt, Peter, "Luis Buñuel: Spaniard and Surrealist," in Six European Directors, London, 1974.
- Aranda, José Francisco, Luis Buñuel: A Critical Biography, London and New York, 1975.
- Cesarman, Fernando, El ojo de Buñuel, Barcelona, 1976.
- Hammond, Paul, editor, The Shadow and Its Shadow: Surrealist Writings on Cinema, London, 1978.
- Mellen, Joan, editor, The World of Luis Buñuel: Essays in Criticism, New York, 1978.
- Higginbotham, Virginia, Luis Buñuel, Boston, 1979.
- Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.
- Edwards, Gwynne, The Discreet Art of Luis Buñuel: A Reading of His Films, London, 1982.
- Buñuel, Luis, My Last Breath, London and New York, 1983.
- Rees, Margaret A., editor, Luis Buñuel: A Symposium, Leeds, 1983.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1984.
- Vidal, Agustín Sánchez, Luis Buñuel: Obra Cinematográfica, Madrid, 1984.
- Aub, Max, Conversaciones con Buñuel: Seguidas de 45 entrevistas con familiares, amigos y colaboradores del cineasta aragones, Madrid, 1985.
- Bertelli, Pino, Buñuel: L'arma dello scandalo: L'anarchia nel cinema di Luis Buñuel, Turin, 1985.
- Oms, Marcel, Don Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1985.
- De la Colina, Jose, and Tomás Pérez Turrent, Luis Buñuel: Prohibido asomarse al interior, Mexico, 1986.
- Sandro, Paul, Diversions of Pleasure: Luis Buñuel and the Crises of Desire, Columbus, Ohio, 1987.
- Williams, Linda, Figures of Desire: A Theory and Analysis of Surrealist Film, Berkeley, 1992.
- De La Colina, Jose, Objects of Desire: Conversations with Luis Buñuel, New York, 1993.

- Evans, Peter W., The Films of Luis Buñuel; Subjectivity & Desire, New York, 1995.
 Hammond, Paul, L'Age D'Or, London, 1998.
 Baxter, John, Buñuel, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- Chavance, Louis, "Les Influences de L'Age d'or," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), 1 January 1931.
 Miller, Henry, in New Review (Paris), 1931; reprinted in Spanish in Contracampo (Madrid), October-November 1980.
 Aranda, Francesco, "Surrealist and Spanish Giant," in Films and Filming (London), October 1961.
 "Buñuel Issue" of La Méthode (Paris), January 1962.
 Durgnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), April 1962.
 "Manifeste des surréalistes à propos de L'Age d'or," in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 July 1963.
 Lyon, E. H., "The Process of Dissociation in Three Films," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1973.
 Tena, Jean, "L'Age d'or à l'ombre du Teide," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Summer-Autumn 1980.
 Logette, L., "Surréalisme et cinéma," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), April-May 1981.
 Magny, Joel, "L'Age d'or: Un Manifeste de la subversion devenu pièce de musée," in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1981.
 Bonnet, Jean-Claude, in Cinématographe (Paris), July 1981.
 Bonitzer, P., "Un documentaire anamorphique," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1981.
 Kral, P., "L'Age d'or aujourd'hui," in Positif (Paris), October 1981.
 Logette, L., "Un Film irrécupérable: L'Age d'or," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), October 1981.
 Logette, L., "Sur un film de Buñuel peu connu," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), January-February 1991.
 Fieschi, J.-A., "L'oeil tranche," in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), no. 33-34-35, 1993.
 Perry, J. W., "L'Age d'or and Un Chien andalou," in Filmfax (Evanston, Illinois), August-September 1993.
 Rabourdin, D., "Souvenirs de L'Age d'or," in Positif (Paris), October 1993.
 Douin, Jean-Luc, "Mécènes du désordre," in Télérama (Paris), 20 October 1993.
 Logette, Lucien, and Luis Buñuel, "Un cachet de philosophie souriante," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), January 1994.
Cinémathèque, Autumn 1994.

* * *

L'Age d'or represents a key moment in surrealist filmmaking, indeed in the history of the experimental cinema. It is also important because it formally initiated the long and distinguished career of its director, Luis Buñuel. Both these strands are inexorably intertwined in any history of European filmmaking.

Buñuel met the artist Salvador Dalí at the University of Madrid in the early 1920s, and after working with Fritz Lang and Jean Epstein, made his first film (with Dalí), the noted surrealist short Un Chien andalou (1928). After this, Buñuel threw himself completely into the surrealist movement and its guerrilla campaign against the conventional and repressive.

But he needed funds for filmmaking activities. It was thus crucial when he met a wealthy patron, the Vicomte de Noailles, who had taken to commission a film every year for his wife's birthday. (In 1930 it would be Jean Cocteau's Blood of a Poet.) In short order Buñuel had a million francs to make any film he wanted. Dalí and Buñuel tried to work together, but failed. (Dalí's credit as co-screenwriter for what would become L'Age d'or amounted to but a few suggestions.) L'Age d'or truly stands as Buñuel's first film.

The plot of L'Age d'or is remarkably simple; two lovers (Gaston Modot and Lya Lys) declare war on a bourgeois French society intent on thwarting the fulfillment of their desires. And the film did not lack for name talent. For example, the lead, Gaston Modot, was a longtime French film star, who started with Gaumont in 1909 and worked for all the great directors of the French cinema: Louis Delluc in Fièvre (1921), René Clair in Sous les toits de Paris (1930), Marcel Carné in Les Enfants du paradis (1945), and Jean Renoir in La Règle du jeu (1939) and La Grande Illusion (1937).

L'Age d'or features moment after moment of surrealist juxtapositions. A poor beggar is savagely beaten, a proud dowager is slapped, a father shoots his son. The themes of the film follow the concerns of Un Chien andalou: frustrated love, society's repression of sexuality, the constancy of physical violence, attacks on the clergy.

But L'Age d'or, a longer work, is far more complex. Although the actions of the frustrated lovers are central, the film goes off in all sorts of directions. Indeed it opens with documentary footage of scorpions. This leads into incidents on a rocky seashore where a gang of bandits (led by surrealist painter Max Ernst) are invaded by first a group of chanting bishops and then dignitaries who "have come to found the Roman Empire." The film ends with a sequence of a cross in the snow, covered tresses blowing in the wind to the tune of a paso doble. Ironically for Buñuel, when L'Age d'or was first shown it attracted the interest of a European agent for the Hollywood studio MGM. He signed Buñuel to a six-month contract at $250 a week for what was then Hollywood's most powerful studio. Buñuel left for the United States in December 1930, just as the furore around L'Age d'or was about to begin.

Late in 1930 L'Age d'or opened to the public at Studio 28 in Paris. (Studio 28 had been founded two years earlier and was exclusively devoted to the screening of avant garde films.) At the premiere two right-wing vigilante groups, the Patriots' League and the Anti-Jewish League, stormed Studio 28, hurling ink and rotten eggs at the screen, setting off tear gas and stink bombs, and clubbing members of the audience with cries of "Death to the Jews."

Later the police instructed the theatre's director to cut two scenes and the conservative press initiated a campaign to have this "pornographic" film banned completely. Le Figaro decried L'Age d'or as "an exercise in Bolshevism." By mid-December the film had been banned and all copies confiscated.

For the next 50 years the film was a tantalizing memory for only a few. Celebrations such as that by the noted film historian Georges Sadoul, present at the premier, declared that L'Age d'or was a "masterpiece in its violence, its purity, its lyric frenzy, its absolute sincerity." Only in 1980 (in New York, a year later in Paris) was the film again re-released. By then its shock value had worn off, and the film was seen more as a precedent for Buñuel's later work than a work attacking the core values of western civilization.

—Douglas Gomery

AGUIRRE, DER ZORN GOTTES

(Aguirre, The Wrath of God)

West Germany, 1973

Director: Werner Herzog

Production: Werner Herzog Filmproduktion; Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 93 minutes. Released 1973. Filmed in the jungles of Peru, along the Amazon.

Producer: Werner Herzog; screenplay: Werner Herzog, from the journal of Gaspar De Carvajal; photography: Thomas Mauch; editor: Beate Mainka-Jellinghaus; sound: Herbert Prasch; music: Popol Vuh; special effects: Juvenal Herrera and Miguel Vasquez.

Cast: Klaus Kinski (Don Lope de Aguirre); Helena Rojo (Inez de Atienza); Ruy Guerra (Pedro de Ursua); Del Negro (Caspar de Carvajal); Don Fernando de Guzman (Peter Berling); Cecilia Rivera (Flores de Aguirre); Dany Ades (Perucho); Armando Polanah (Armando); Edward Roland (Okello); Daniel Farafan, Alejandro Chavez, Antonio Marquez, Julio Martinez, and Alejandro Repulles (The Indians); and 270 Indians from the Cooperative of Lauramarca.

Publications

Script:

Herzog, Werner, "Aguirre, The Wrath of God," in 3 Screenplays, New York, 1980.

Books:

Schutte, Wolfram, and others, Herzog/Kluge/Straub, Vienna, 1976.

Greenberg, Alan, Heart of Glass, Munich, 1976.

Sandford, John, The New German Cinema, Totowa, New Jersey, 1980.

Franklin, James, New German Cinema: From Oberhausen to Hamburg, Boston, 1983.

Phillips, Klaus, editor, New German Filmmakers: From Oberhausen Through the 1970s, New York, 1984.

Corrigan, Timothy, The Films of Werner Herzog: Between Mirage and History, New York, 1986.

Gabrea, Radu, Werner Herzog et la mystique rhénane, Lausanne, 1986.

Articles:

Baxter, Brian, "Werner Herzog," in Film (London), Spring 1969.

Ghali, Noureddine, "Werner Herzog: 'Comme un rêve puissant. . .,'" in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1974.

Ghali, Noureddine, "Werner Herzog: Le Réel saisi par le rêve," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), November 1974.

Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1975.

Elley, Derek, in Films and Filming (London), February 1975.

Zimmer, J., in Image et Son (Paris), March 1975.

Gauthier, G., and Derek Elley, in Films and Filming (London), April 1975.

Simsolo, Noël, in Ecran (Paris), April 1975.

Rayns, Tony, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1974–75.

Oudart, J. P., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1975.

Schlepelern, P., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), no. 132, 1976.

Garel, A., in Image et Son (Paris), September, 1976.

Clarembeaux, M., in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), June 1977.

McCreadie, M., in Films in Review (New York), June-July 1977.

Dorr, J. H., "The Enigma of Werner Herzog," in Millimeter (New York), October 1977.

"Aguirre Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 June 1978.

Coursen, D., "Two Films by Werner Herzog," in Cinemonkey (Portland, Oregon), no. 1, 1979.

Fritze, R., "Werner Herzog's Adaptation of History in Aguirre, The Wrath of God," in Film and History (Newark, New Jersey), December 1985.

Stiles, V. M., "Fact and Fiction: Nature's Endgame in Werner Herzog's Aguirre, The Wrath of God," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1989.

Génin, Bernard, "L'enfer vert," in Télérama (Paris), 5 April 1995.

* * *

Aguirre der Zorn Gottes is Werner Herzog's hypnotic epic of megalomania and delusional myths. The story concerns the search of Spanish conquistadors for El Dorado in the jungles of South America. The journey is made with the assistance of native slaves over mountains and down an uncharted river. Initiated under the aegis of the Spanish crown, the expedition experiences progressive disintegration. Aguirre, originally named second-in-command, usurps control in pursuit of a golden territory to rule on his own. At the same time, the very instruments and characters sustaining the journey are gradually eliminated. Food, rafts, supplies, and crew members are lost; the landscape changes until there is no land properly speaking to conquer, only river and swamps. In the face of desolation, Aguirre maintains obsessive faith in the reality of his dreams, weaving tales of his future glory.

This journey, with its imaginary goal, is presented in the guise of an historical account. An opening title explains that the events come from a journal kept by a monk during the course of the expedition. The diary provides the text of a voice-over narration which intermittently comments on events. But El Dorado—the goal of the journey, purpose of the expedition, and subject of the diary—is a known fiction, an external dream destined to failure. Moreover, the journal is described as the remaining record of an expedition which disappeared in the depths of the Amazonian jungle; it cannot, in fact, exist. Thus from the outset the film defines its subject as a doomed journey and spurious history. Indeed, history is immediately construed in terms of myth.

As the film posits this mythical history and a goal-less journey, Aguirre transforms its world into a realm of hallucination. Crew members are attacked by arrows and darts from invisible sources. When the monk is struck by an arrow near the end of the film he denies its very being, "This is no arrow." The monk and Okello, one of the native slaves, also deny the existence of a boat hull (“There is no boat”) which is shown suspended in a tree. In the face of an uncontrollable phenomenal world what counts above all else is the faith one sustains in fictions of one’s own making. And it is this quality that defines Aguirre as a hero. The greatest and only believer in the myths of his own creation, he stands as the quintessential heroic figure of history.

Aguirre, der Zorn Gottes

With its striking images the film successfully constructs an impression of having entered an unworldly territory. The opening is particularly effective, as the expedition is seen in extreme long shots weaving its way down the mountains through the fog to the banks of the river. The audience is positioned with the expedition throughout the journey. What lies beyond the river on its overgrown banks—a source of beauty, monotony, and danger—remains a mystery throughout the film. The final shot of the film reinforces the tenacity of the journey’s confining vision, as the camera circles rapidly around the raft. Littered with dead bodies, overrun with monkeys, the raft is locked into an aimless drift as the hero and self-proclaimed “great traitor” asserts his power for the last time: “I am the wrath of God.”

—M. B. White

AHFEI ZHENG ZHUAN

---

(Days of Being Wild)

Hong Kong, 1991

Director: Wong Kai-Wai

Production: In-Gear Film; Colour, 35mm; running time: 94 minutes.

Producer: Rover Tang; executive producer: Alan Tang; screenplay: Wong Kai-Wai; photography: Christopher Doyle; editor: Kai Kit-wai; assistant directors: Rosanna Ng, Johnny Kong, Tung Wan-Wai, Tsui Pui-Wing, Poon Kin-Kwan; production design: William Chang Suk-ping; sound: Steve Chan Wai-hung; music: Chan Do-ming.

Cast: Leslie Cheung (Yuddy); Maggie Cheung (Su Li-zhen); Tony Leung Chiu-wei (Smirk); Karina Lau (Leong Fung-yung); Andy Lau (Tide); Jacky Cheung (Sab); Rebecca Pan Dihua (Rebecca); Carina Lau (Mimi).

Awards: Hong Kong Film Awards for Best Film, Best Director, Best Actor (Leslie Cheung), Best Cinematographer, and Best Art Director.

Publications

Articles:

James, Caryn, "Days of Being Wild," The New York Times, 23 March 1991.

Variety (New York), 1 April 1991.

Ho, Sam, "The Withering Away of the Family," The 15th Hong Kong International Film Festival (catalogue), May 1991.

Shu, Kei, "Notes on Hong Kong Cinema 1990," The 15th Hong Kong International Film Festival (catalogue), May 1991.

Rayns, T., Sight and Sound (London), December 1994.

Lehtinen, L., "Katoamatonta aikaa tekemassa," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 5, 1996.

Stephens, C. "Wong Kar-Wai and the Persistence of Memory," in Film Comment (New York), January/February 1996.

Jousse, T., "Boy Meets Girl," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1996.

Niogret, H., "Nos années sauvages," in Positif (Paris), March 1996.

Morsiani, A., "I capolavori di Hong Kong," in Segnocinema (Vicenza), July/August 1996.

* * *

A young man strolls down a corridor, stops at a refreshment stand, and takes a bottle of Coke from an ice chest. He leans over the counter and catches the attention of the sales clerk, telling her, quite casually, "From this moment on, we can become one-minute friends."

They turn their faces to the wall clock and watch the second hand scroll over the markers. One, two, three, four, five seconds . . . sixty seconds pass.

Soon they become lovers. They meet for an hour each day in his apartment, sharing aimless conversation, and cigarettes.

Wong Kar-wai's desultory tale of 1960s Hong Kong has a nostalgic and bittersweet lyricism. Its antihero is a callow young man, Yuddy (Leslie Cheung), around whom hapless friends and lovers spin. The Chinese title is “The Story of an Ah Fei”—“ah fei” being a Chinese version of a teddy boy.

Ahfei zheng zhuan

Cocky and narcissistic, Yuddy is the pretty boy that all the young women fall for, but he never falls for them. As he says, “In this life I will like many, many women, but to the end I won’t know whom I love most.”

Failing to get any commitment from him, Su Li-zhen (Maggie Cheung), the sales clerk, threatens to leave. When she walks out, he continues slicking back his hair, gazing placidly into the medicine chest mirror. However, Li-zhen keeps coming back, lurking in corridors and outside the apartment, even after he begins an affair with a pretty dancehall girl, Mimi (Carina Lau). The young policeman who walks the beat (Andy Lau) has noticed the odd goings-on in the second-room flat. Late one night he takes pity on Li-zhen, chatting with her and loaning her cab fare to get home. Before they part he points to a nearby phone booth and remarks, “Every night I’m here at this time.”

He waits there night after night, but he never hears from her. One day she leaves town, and eventually, so does he.

Some vague reason for Yuddy’s misogyny is provided: Long ago, his real mother gave him over to a friend (played by old time chanteuse Pan Dihua) to raise. And the stepmother, an aging dowager with a penchant for young gigolos, has steadfastly refused to reveal his real mother’s identity to Yuddy.

They torment each other with this game constantly. He wants to know; she refuses to tell him. He hates her. And she replies, tartly, “I just want you to hate me, then at least you won’t forget me.” But one day she tires of the game. She’s planning to emigrate, and she finally reveals what he has long wanted to know.

With the information, Yuddy takes off to find his real mother in the Philippines. He goes to her mansion but is refused entrance. He walks quickly away, not giving her the satisfaction (somehow he knows she is watching him from behind) of looking back. In town, he gets drunk and is about to be robbed in the street but a stranger, a man from Hong Kong, comes to his rescue. Unbeknown to Yuddy, this fellow is the policeman who used to walk his street, who has now fulfilled his lifelong dream to become a sailor, and is waiting to join his ship.

The outstanding cinematography is by Christopher Doyle, a frequent collaborator with the Wong Kar-wai, and one the most famous scenes in contemporary Chinese cinema is the long tracking shot towards the end of the film. We travel down a street, go through the doorway of a colonial-style building, and up a stairway into the waiting room of a train station. There we find an inebriated Yuddy posed over a jukebox. He turns away and does a jig. He finds his newfound friend slumped at a table.

Cutting away to the backroom, Yuddy is pulling a scam on a local. When caught, guns are pulled out and people are shot. Yuddy and the sailor make a run for it, over the roofs, jumping into a train headed they know not where.

At this point the sailor says in disgust, “Not everyone’s like you—nothing better to do in life!”

The dreamy, tall jungles of Philippines pass by, pass by. “I’ve heard of bird, a bird without legs, that flies and flies and never lands,” says the wounded Yuddy. “It only lands once in his life—and that’s when he dies.”

The movie ends with a non sequitur in a small, low-ceiled flat, a dapper fellow (Tony Leung Chiu-wei) finishes filing his nails, gets dressed, and tucks cigarettes and a huge wad of bills into his pockets.

He turns off the lights and exits. We have never seen this character before. This is the gambler—who was supposed to feature in part two of Days of Being Wild, but since part one went overtime and overbudget, part two was never made.

Though Days of Being Wild is a pleasure to watch and carries one along its melancholic, fragmented rhythm, one feels a certain emptiness after it’s over. The film is more style than substance, favouring mood and mannerisms over plot and characterization.

The work announced Wong as one of the outstanding film stylist to emerge from Hong Kong in this decade. Commercially, it proved a flop, but it won five awards at the Hong Kong Film Awards, including Best Film, Best Director, Best Actor for Leslie Cheung, Best Cinematographer for Christopher Doyle, and Best Art Direction for William Cheung. On the international film festival circuits, it has become a cult favourite.

—Scarlet Cheng

AI NO CORRIDA

(In the Realm of the Senses)

France-Japan, 1976

Director: Nagisa Oshima

Production: Argos Films (Paris), Oshima Productions (Tokyo), and Océanique Productions (some sources list Shibatu Organization as one of the production companies involved); Eastmancolor, 35mm, Vistavision; running time: 110 minutes, some versions 115 minutes. Released 1976. Filmed in Japan.

Producer: Anatole Dauman; screenplay: Nagisa Oshima; photography: Hideo Itoh; editor: Keiichi Uraoka; art director: Shigemasa Toda; music: Minoru Miki; lighting: Ken’ichi Okamoto.

Cast: Tatsuya Fuji (Kichizo); Eiko Matsuda (Sada Abe); Aoi Nakajima; Taiji Tonoyama (Tramp); Kanae Kobayashi; Akiko Koyama; Naomi Shiraiishi; Machiko Aoki; Kyoko Okada; Yasuko Matsui; Katsue Tomiyama.

Awards: Best Director, Cannes Film Festival, 1978.

Publications

Books:

Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, New York, 1978; revised edition, Tokyo, 1985.

Oshima, Nagisa, Ecrits (1956–1978): Dissolution et jaillissement, Paris, 1980.

Tessier, Max, editor, Le cinéma Japonais au présent 1959–1979, Paris, 1980.

Ai no corrida

Sato, Tadao, Currents in Japanese Cinema (in English), Tokyo, 1982.
 Magrelli, Enrico, and Emanuela Martini, Il rito, il rivolta: Il cinema di Nagisa Oshima, Rome, 1984.
 Polan, Dana B., The Political Language of Film and the Avant-Garde, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1985.
 Danvers, Louis, and Charles Tatum, Nagisa Oshima, Paris, 1986.
 Turim, Maureen, The Films of Nagisa Oshima; Images of a Japanese Iconoclast, Berkeley, 1998.

Articles:

- Bonitzer, P., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March-April 1976. Positif (Paris), May 1976.
 Bernheim, N. L., "Entretien avec Nagisa Oshima," in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1976.
 Monty, Ib, in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), no. 132, 1976.
 Zimmer, J., in Image et Son (Paris), September 1976.
 "Special Issue" of Filmcritica (Rome), September 1976.
Cinema Papers (Melbourne), September-October 1976.
 Bonitzer, P., "L'Essence du pire," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1976.
 Rayns, Tony, in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1976.
 Eder, Richard, in New York Times, 1 October 1976.
 Interview with Nagisa Oshima in New York Times, 3 October 1976.
 Bonnet, J. C., in Cinématographe (Paris), October-November 1976.
 Passek, J. L., in Cinéma (Paris), November 1976.
 McCormick, R., in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1976-77.
 Silverman, M., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1976-77.
 Bouras, J., "In the Realm of the Censors," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1977.
 Berman, B., in Take One (Montreal), March 1977.
 Heath, Stephen, "The Question Oshima," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 1, 1978.
 High, P. B., "Oshima: A Vita Sexualis on Film," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 4, 1978.
 Dawson, Jan, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1978.
 Oshima, Nagisa, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1978.
 Grossini, G., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), June 1979.
 Oshima, Nagisa, "Le Drapeau de l'eros flotte dans les cieux," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1980.
 Garroni, E., and A. Balzola, "Le funzioni della critica e la critica dell'erotismo," in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), April 1980.

- Oshima, Nagisa, and others, in Contracampo (Madrid), July—August 1980.
- Frias, I. Leon, “El ascetismo erotico de El imperio de los sentidos,” in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), May 1982.
- Polan, Dana, “Politics as Process in Three Films by Nagisa Oshima,” in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Fall 1983.
- Tesson, C., “L’Image et son écho,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1984.
- Lehman, P., “Oshima,” in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 5. 1989.
- Novielli, R., “L’impero dei dissensi nei film di Nagisa Oshima,” in Quaderni di Cinema (Florence), May–August 1989.
- Turim, Maureen, “Wie es ist, nicht mehr jung zu sein: Sex, Tod und Leben,” in Frauen und Film (Frankfurt am Main), June 1991.
- Iskusstvo Kino* (Moscow), July 1992.
- Breillat, Catherine, “L’empire des sens: Nagisa Oshima,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), 1993.
- Piazza, Philippe, “Le scandaleux de Tokyo,” in Télérama (Paris), 2 October 1996.
- Marran, Christine, “Cinematic Sexualities: The Two Faces of Abe Sada in Japanese ‘poruno’ films,” in Asian Cinema (Drexel Hill), vol. 8, no. 2, Winter 1996–1997.

* * *

The first film to break down the barriers between the commercial art film and hard-core pornography, the all-explicit Ai no corrída was for Japanese director Nagisa Oshima both a political and a psycho-cultural exploration. In keeping with his consistent treatment of sensitive issues in the guise of dramatic films, Oshima conceived this project at the suggestion of French producer Anatole Dauman to do a hard-core film. Immediately subsequent to the abolition of anti-obscenity laws in France, Corrida was the sensation of the 1976 Cannes International Film Festival, where an unprecedented thirteen screenings were mounted to meet the demand. Shot entirely in Japan, where police ordinarily seize in the developing laboratory films revealing so much as a pubic hair, the exposed footage was sent to France for processing. When re-imported to Japan as a French production, with every explicit scene air-brushed into white haze by the censors, it was nevertheless hailed as the first porno film for women. Oshima was therefore arrested and prosecuted for obscenity in the screenplay, which had been published in book form in Japan. After four years in court, he was found innocent by the supreme court, but he did not succeed in overturning the legal concept of obscenity.

Like all of Oshima’s films, Corrida is based on a true story, the apprehension of Sada Abe, who strangled her lover with his consent and then cut off his genitals in 1936, months before Japan’s full-scale aggression against China would open World War II. The appearance of Japanese flags and marching soldiers elucidate a background theme of sexuality as escape from political and social oppression, one of Oshima’s persistent concerns.

Corrida is an exploration of the limits of sexuality. Sada (Eiko Matsuda) and Kichizo (Tatsuya Fuji) gradually reject the outside world in order to pursue the ultimate in sexual pleasure. Couched in a linear narrative with few but important stylistic deviations from a conventional exposition, the sexual exploits quickly lose any prurient quality. These lovers are too analytical; they comment too much; they allow and seek out too much intrusion upon their acts. Finally, they develop too much need for violence to stimulate themselves as over-indulgence dulls the pleasure. The desire to possess another person ends in Kichizo’s death.

The major reversal of the conventions of the porno film lie in Kichizo’s aim of giving pleasure to Sada. She gradually changes from addressing him as “master” (of the inn where she has worked as a maid) to adopting male speech and giving him orders. Some psychiatrists have seen this as a calculated role reversal, in which Kichizo takes on first a passive quality, then a maternal aspect for Sada. Indeed Sada becomes the aggressor, initiator and possessor in every sense. But Oshima characteristically ends the film without any comment but the historical facts: Sada was arrested with Kichizo’s genitalia on her person, tried and jailed for murder. But she became celebrated as a folk heroine.

Aside from the universal interest of the possession urge in sexuality, Oshima layers his film with cultural references. He uses the formula of the Kabuki theater, the lovers’ journey (michiyuki, as they go to the inn that will be their refuge and site of the murder) to presage a doomed alliance. He taps the rich pornographic history of feudal Japan in the voyeurism, exploitation, and sado-masochistic play of the geisha and maids at the inns, and he mocks the elaborate ritual of the Japanese wedding ceremony. Use of traditional Japanese musical instruments on the sound track, lush color photography even in the confinement of the small inn room, and superb acting from non-stars and amateurs add to the disturbing appeal of this psychological landmark of the cinema.

—Audie Bock

AKALER SANDHANE

(In Search of Famine)

India, 1981

Director: Mrinal Sen

Production: D.K Films Enterprise; colour; running time: 131 minutes (also 124 minute and 115 minute version); language: Bengali. First public screening 12 February 1982. Filmed on location in Hatui and neighboring villages, Bengal.

Producer: Dhires Kumar Chakraborty; screenplay: Mrinal Sen, from a novel by Amalendu Chakraborty; photography: K.K. Mahajan; editor: Gangadhar Naskar; art direction: Suresh Chandra; music: Salil Chowdhury.

Cast: Dhritiman Chatterjee (Director); Smita Patil (Actress); Sreela Majumdar (Woman); Gita Sen (Widow); Dipankar Dey (Star).

Awards: Silver Bear, Berlin 1981.

Publications

Script:

Sen, Mrinal, In Search of Famine: a film by Mrinal Sen, script reconstructed and translated by Bandyopadhyay, Samik: Calcutta, 1983.

Akaler Sandhane

Books:

- Bandyopadhyay, Samik, editor, In Search of Famine, Calcutta, 1983.
 Cunha, Uma da, The New Generation: 1960–1980, New Delhi, 1981.
 Hood, John W., Chasing the Truth, Calcutta, 1993.
 Mukhopadhyay, Deepankar, Maverick Maestro Mrinal Sen, Indus Publishing Company, 1995.

Articles:

- Guha, Jagannath, “Films and Famine: On Mrinal Sen’s Search for Famine” in Maadhyam (New Delhi), March/April 1981.
 Hoberman, Jim, “New Delhi’s Film Bazaar” in American Film (New York), Vol. 6 no. 7, May 1981.
 Chakravarty, Sumita S., “An Interview with Mrinal Sen” in Cine-Tracts (Quebec), Summer/Autumn 1981.
 Malcolm, Derek, “Guerilla Fighter: Mrinal Sen” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1981.
 Ciment, Michel, “Entretien avec Mrinal Sen” in Positif (Paris), January 1982.
 Sen, Mrinal, “Towards Another Moment of Truth” interview with Swapan Mullick in Cinema in India, Vol. 1 no. 4, October–December 1987.

* * *

Mrinal Sen’s self-critical film, and one of his best known 1980s productions, shows the experiences of a contemporary film unit going into a Bengali village to fictionally reconstruct the 1943 man-made Bengal famine. The director describes that tragedy: “. . . in our country, in Bengal, still undivided, not a shot was fired, not a bomb burst. And yet in a year five million people starved to death. They just starved and dropped dead.”

The 1943 Bengal famine—one of pre-independent India’s most horrifying human disasters—has been the subject of considerable literature and several plays and films. One of the reasons for so much literature is that, in a real sense, the event remains impossible to assimilate or even understand. An estimated five million people died through starvation (official figures in 1945 put the figure at 1.5 million). It was as a consequence of war profiteering, a complacent state administration that refused to acknowledge a crisis until the famine was a reality, and a quiescent peasantry that refused to rise up in revolt.

In 1943 the Indian Peoples’ Theatre Association made its debut with the epochal production of Bijon Bhattacharya’s Nabanna, addressing the famine. This play, staged by Sombhu Mitra, remains one of the landmarks for the modern Indian theatre. In 1960 Mrinal Sen himself made a film set in the famine, Baishey Shravana (The Wedding Day), and in 1973 Satyajit Ray adapted a Bibhutibhusan Bandyopadhyay story to make Ashani Sanket (Distant Thunder). This was not the only famine to hit the region, as Akaler Sandhaney’s film unit shows when they play the game of guessing from photographs which year the corpses could have come from. But the extent of the literature, theatre and cinema that address the 1943 event is an important sub-text for the film, which critiques that body of work as much as it critiques itself and its maker.

There are three sets of histories that weave into the plot: the film unit arrives in Hatui on 7 September (presumably the day Sen’s own unit began filming) and quickly has problems. The unit’s own professional unconcern for the issues their production seeks to address culminate in the actress Devika plucking her eyebrows and cutting her hair short, and being summarily expelled from the cast. The second history features the village itself, invaded by mass culture including a Communist Jatra (Bengal has had a Communist government in power since 1967) which has taken to “Hitler, Lenin and Stalin” in the words of Haren, loudspeakers advertising The Guns of Navarone, and the film unit which promptly buys up all the food from the village and is accused of starting a new famine. Some villagers, led by Haren (played by noted filmmaker Rajen Tarafdar), try to cooperate with the crew, but divisions erupt when Haren tries to get Chatterjee’s daughter to replace the expelled Devika as an actress (because the role is that of a woman reduced to prostitution during the famine). The schoolmaster has to remind Chatterjee, and other local notables, that they were themselves descendants of 1943 war profiteers. The third, and the most poignant, is that of the dying Zamindar and his wife, in whose abandoned mansion the crew lives: this story is juxtaposed with that of Durga, who forms the only living memory of the tragedy of 1943, and whose intimations of the future—the “flash-forward” death of her son—making up the end of the film (as the crew returns to Calcutta, their film unfinished).

Mrinal Sen is of course best known for his late 1960s and 1970s style, of a freewheeling, politically involved and didactic cinema using numerous alienation-effects that he once described as “playing around with tools as often as I could, as a child plays with building blocks. Partly out of sheer playfulness, partly out of necessity, also partly to shock a section of our audiences [to violate the] outrageously conformist . . . mainstream of our cinema.” (“Towards Another Moment of Truth,” 1987). The style changed dramatically with Ek Din Pratidin (1979), a relatively straightforward tale with a minimal plot—in which a middle-class woman “disappears” for a night—into a realist idiom usually set in Calcutta’s middle-class, where a large number of characters would respond in various tell-tale ways to an event that disrupts their lives and values for the brief period (Chaalchitra, 1981; Kharij, 1982) before normalcy returns.

Akaler Sandhaney is the most ambitious of this genre. The story here too is straightforward, but the numerous disruptions on the soundtrack, the playful effects of several Bengali and Hindi (Smita Patil) actors and Sen regulars playing themselves, and the freeze-frame ending on Durga, is more reminiscent of his late 1970s Calcutta trilogy, more inclined to break out of linear dramatic idioms.

—Ashish Rajadhyaksha

AKASEN CHITAI

(Street of Shame)

Japan, 1956

Director: Kenji Mizoguchi

Production: Daiei Kyoto; black & white; running time: 94 minutes. Released 18 March 1956, Japan. Filmed at Daiei Studios in Tokyo.

Producer: Masaichi Nagata; screenplay: Masashige Narusawa, from the short story “Susaki No Onna” by Yoshiko Shibaki; photography: Kazuo Miyagawa; sound: Mitsuo Hasagawa; art director: Hiroshi Mizutani; music: Toshiro Mayuzumi.

Akasen Chitai

Cast: Machiko Kyo (Mickey); Aiko Mimasu (Yumeko); Ayako Wakao (Yasumi); Michiyo Kogure (Hanae); Yasuko Kawakami (Shizuko); Eitoro Shindo (Kurazo Taya); Kenji Sugawara (Eikoh); Bontaro Miake (Patrolman); Toranosuke Ogawa (Mickey's father); Kumeko Urabe (Otane); Sadako Sawamura (Tatsuko Taya); Hiroko Machida (Yorie).

Publications

Books:

Mesnil, Michel, Mizoguchi Kenji, Paris, 1965.
 Douchet, Jean, Connaissance de Kenji Mizoguchi, Paris, 1978.
 McDonald, Keiko, Kenji Mizoguchi, Boston, 1984.
 Serceau, Daniel, Mizoguchi: de la revolte aux songes, Paris, 1983.
 Andrew, Dudley, in Magill's Survey of Cinema - Foreign Language Films, volume 6, edited by Magill, Frank, New Jersey, 1985.

Articles:

Yamauchi, Matsuo, "Street of Shame and Objective Depiction" in Eiga Hyoron (Tokyo), June 1956.
Variety (New York), 25 July 1956.
 Takizawa, Osamu, "Watered-down Sake: Kenji Mizoguchi's Street of Shame" in Eiga Geijutsu (Tokyo), September 1956.
 Izawa, Jun, in Shinario (Tokyo), October 1956.
 Lane, John Francis, in Films and Filming (London), November 1956.

Rhomer, Eric, "Rue de la Honte" in Arts (Paris), no. 642, 1957.
 Demonsablou, Philippe, "Plus de Lumiere" in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1957.
 Gillett, John, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1958.
 Gortori, Carlos, in Film Ideal (Madrid), January 1965.
 Tessier, Max, "La Rue de la Honte" in Image et Son (Paris), September 1980.
 Magny, Joel, "Le Testament de Mizoguchi?" in Cinéma (Paris), October 1980.
 Masson, Alain, "L'ordre du bordel" in Positif (Paris), November 1980.
 Burdeau, Emmanuel & others, "Mizoguchi encore," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1996.

* * *

Everyone interested in Japanese film must be deeply indebted to Noel Burch's To the Distant Observer: Form and Meaning in Japanese Cinema—but indebted more for the questions his strictly formalist analyses raise than for the tendentious and problematic answers. At their root is Burch's antagonism to Hollywood and American cultural imperialism: films are valued or not according to their deviation from the shooting/editing codes of classical Hollywood cinema. As far as Mizoguchi is concerned, Burch's interest is restricted to certain films of the 30s and 40s; everything subsequent is dismissed.

Street of Shame, Mizoguchi's last film, raises interesting questions about the relation between form and meaning: it reverts to the thematics of the 30s and 40s, realized in the stylistics of the 50s. Clearly well outside Burch's range of interest, it contains not a single shot that would be out of place in a classical Hollywood movie (while retaining the dominant characteristics of Mizoguchi's late period: fairly long takes, with much use of camera movement, depth of field, and much use of foreground/background simultaneous action).

My own position is that a film should be evaluated not according to its formal devices (deviant or otherwise) but according to its totality: the richness and complexity of meaning that has been realized in the interaction of all its elements, thematic, stylistic, political. Street of Shame is the last in the series of impassioned feminist protests that (in forms varying sharply from period to period) traverses Mizoguchi's entire career as far as we can know it (many early films are lost). One may compare it, then, with two earlier films: Sisters of the Gion (1936, admired by Burch) and My Love Has been Burning (1949, ignored, hence presumably dismissed). The former is built upon a system of extremely long takes, mainly in long shot, mainly static, employing only one or two brief camera movements whose function is to hold us back from, rather than draw us toward, the characters. The latter also employs very long takes, often sequence-shots, but their function is entirely different: there is a great deal of camera movement, much less camera distance, and most of the scenes end with the camera leading us in toward the heroine, the scene embodying a lesson she has learned and that we share with her. The earlier film is built upon distanciation (there is no character with whom we can identify, we are to see all of them, male and female, trapped within and corrupted by a specific social system); the latter is built upon a subtle and beautifully realized form of identification, the heroine being an exemplary feminist figure whose progress toward a full awareness of the oppression of women within patriarchal culture we are invited to share.

Street of Shame, rather than restrict itself to an imposed formal system, adopts the relative freedom and flexibility (within certain limitations, certain agreed or defined rules, without which communicative art is not possible) of classical Hollywood: the camera is free to move from character to character, position to position (so long as the basic rules are not shattered), in the interests of maximum expressivity. The result (common in classical Hollywood) is the achievement of a balance between distance and identification. We follow, over a period of a few months, the lives of five women working as prostitutes in a brothel in Tokyo's Yoshiwara district. All are presented with varying degrees of sympathy, but the constant movement among the various characters and plot-threads forbids full identification, leaving us a degree of freedom of judgment. That sympathy is not (or is only barely) extended to the male characters is a logical consequence of the rigorous and unrelenting way in which every manifestation of women's oppression is exposed.

Hanae works to support her tubercular husband and their infant son; the husband (the least unsympathetic of the male characters) rewards her efforts to hold the family together by attempting suicide. Yumeko has resorted to prostitution to see her son through college; her reward is his shame and rage, and his total rejection of her when (entering middle age) she suggests they live together. Yorie leaves the brothel to marry, only to discover that her husband treats her as an unpaid servant; Mickey, outwardly tough, gum-chewing, westernized, is rebelling against a father who sees women merely as the adjuncts of "respectability" to aid his rise in the business world. When he visits the brothel to bring her home (he has married one of his numerous mistresses within months of his wife's death, and needs Mickey to reconstruct a family), her facade collapses and she expresses her vulnerability and rage, finally offering herself to him for money as the ultimate expression of contempt. Only Yasumi escapes the brothel, through a process of cultivating total ruthlessness, exploiting not only men but the women she works with in order to build up the capital she needs.

The last minutes of the film introduce a new character, a teenage country girl whose father has become paralyzed after a mining accident. She is at first naively delighted by the food she is given, unlike any she has eaten before. The film ends with her night of initiation (replacing Yasumi, who has bought up a bankrupt clothing business). We watch her being dressed, groomed, made up, her innocent young face vanishing behind a mask of paint and powder. The film's devastating last image, and its only single-character close-up, has her hovering, terrified, behind a pillar, trying to find the courage to signal to her first prospective customer.

—Robin Wood

L'ALBERO DEGLI ZOCCOLI

(The Tree of the Wooden Clogs)

Italy, 1978

Director: Ermanno Olmi

Production: RAI (Rete I)-Italnoleggio Cinematografico; Gevacolor, 35mm; running time: 175 minutes. Released 1978, Cannes Film Festival. Filmed on location in Lombardy, Italy; cost: lire 320,000,000.

Producer: Attilio Torricelli; screenplay: Ermanno Olmi; photography: Ermanno Olmi; editor: Ermanno Olmi; sound: Amedeo Casati; art director: Enrico Tovaglieri; music: J. S. Bach, executed on the organ by Fernando Germani; costume designer: Francesca Zucchelli.

Cast: Luigi Ornagli (Batisti); Francesca Moriggi (Baptisti's wife); Omar Brignoli (Minek, the son); Antonio Ferrari (Toni); Teresa Brecianini (Widow Runc); Giuseppe Brignoli (Grandpa Anselmo); Carlo Rota (Peppino); Pasqualina Brolis (Teresina); Massimo Fratus (Pierino); Francesca Villa (Annetta); Maria Grazia Caroli (Bettina); Battista Trevaina (Finard); Giuseppina Sangaletti (Mrs. Finard); Lorenzo Pedroni (Grandpa Finard); Felice Cervi (Usti); Pierangelo Bertoli (Secondo); Brunella Migliaccio (Olga); Franco Pilenga (Stefano, Maddalena's husband); Guglielmo Badoni and Laura Locatelli (Stefano's parents); Carmelo Silva (Don Carlo); Mario Brignoli (Landowner); Emilio Pedroni (Farm Bailiff); Vittorio Cappelli (Frichi); Francesca Bassurini (Suor Maria); Lina Ricci (Woman of the "Segno").

Awards: Palme d'Or, Cannes Film Festival, 1978; David of Donatello special plaque award to Olmi, Italy, 1978; New York Film Critics Award, Best Foreign Film, 1979.

Publications

Script:

"A facida faja: rezletch a forzatokonyvbol" (script extract), in Filmkultura (Budapest), January-February 1979.

Books:

Olmi, Ermanno, L'albero degli zoccoli, Bergamo, 1979.

Dell'Acqua, Gian Piero, L'albero degli zoccoli nell'Italia 1978, Milan, 1979.

Dillon, Jeanne, Ermanno Olmi, Florence, 1986.

Articles:

Ahlander, L., "Traskor och diktatorer Rapport fran Cannes 78," in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 157, 1978.

Devillers, M., and others, "Ermanno Olmi," in Cinématographe (Paris), no. 40, 1978.

Prono, F., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), July-August 1978.

Masson, A., and others, in Positif (Paris), September 1978.

Zambetti, S., "La realta contadina del Bergamasco nel film di Olmi e nei dati storici," in Cineforum (Bergamo), November 1978.

Borseno, C., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), series 23, 1979.

McCormick, R., in Cineaste (New York), no. 4, 1979.

Bonneville, L., in Séquences (Montreal), April 1979.

Salje, G., in Film und Ton (Munich), May 1979.

Coleman, John, in New Statesman (London), 11 May 1979.

Castell, D., in Films Illustrated (London), June 1979.

D'Elia, G., "Angeli e peccatori nell' Albero degli zoccoli," in Cineforum (Bergamo), June 1979.

Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1979.

Seesslen, G., "Das Land verliert, die Stadt gewinnt, der Bauer wird vertrieben," in Film und Ton (Munich), June 1979.

Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 1 June 1979.

L'Albero degli zoccoli

Kauffmann, Stanley, "Curious Career," in New Republic (New York), 2 June 1979.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 4 June 1979.
 Kroll, Jack, "An Italian Classic," in Newsweek (New York), 4 June 1979.
 Gill, Brendan, in New Yorker, 18 June 1979.
 Martin R., in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1979.
 Simon, John, "The Soil and the Soiled," in National Revue (New York), 3 August 1979.
 Gladych, Michael B., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1980–81.
 Hirshfield, C., in Film and History (Newark, New Jersey), February 1981.
 Leigh, Mike, "L'arbre aux sabots," in Positif (Paris), June 1994.

* * *

At the same time, Italy produced two films about peasant life at the turn of the century: Bertolucci's 1900 and Olmi's Tree of the Wooden Clogs, yet Olmi's work received more unqualified praise and caused more fierce debate than did the opus of his younger colleague. After Tree won the Golden Palm at Cannes, there were those who declared it a masterpiece, a supreme vision of beauty and poetry, a profoundly humanist testament. The film didn't deal directly with history; it was history. Other critics viewed it as an egocentric and myopic vision, dealing with personal nostalgia, negating historical and social issues, and taking refuge in a strict Catholicism. Everyone, no matter what their ideological bias, did agree that it was an exceedingly beautiful work of formal perfection. With this, his ninth feature, Olmi shared the limelight that had not been his since the time of Il posto and I fidanzati. Tree of the Wooden Clogs belongs to the finest works of the tradition of cinematic realism. Olmi has stated that the masters who had greatly influenced him were Robert Flaherty (especially Louisiana Story and Man of Aran) and Roberto Rossellini. One could add Georges Rouquier's study of French Catholic farmers in Farrebique and Luchino Visconti's epic-length film on Sicilian fishermen, La terra trema. In regard to this tradition, Olmi's film has both similarities and differences. Like all the above, Olmi feels a deep dedication to his work and often spends years carefully choosing his subject matter and planning each film project. Olmi had conceived the idea 20 years before he realized this film; he had based his subject on stories told to him by his grandfather. For the film, like Visconti, Olmi spent months living in villages and interviewing thousands of peasants, a score of which became the principal actors of the film. Olmi began without a definite script; the actions and dialogue came from the actors themselves. Rare to Italian cinema, Olmi insisted upon shooting with direct sound and utilizing only the Bergamesque dialect, although, like Visconti in 1948, marketing difficulties demanded that Olmi produce a version in Italian as well. In this case, however, the Italian version was dubbed by the actors themselves. Olmi obtained a completely natural performance from his characters who are all framed in centrally based compositions in the film. Although there are many close-ups, the eyes of the characters are rarely aimed directly at the camera and thus do not confront the spectator. The richly saturated colors—russets, deep greens, browns, and tans—are earth tones natural to the countryside and peasant life.

Except in a few isolated cases, the Italian cinema has rarely dealt directly with the peasantry, but Olmi has added nothing extra to what would normally occur in the pre-industrial countryside. As in the best of the realist tradition, all shooting was done on location and natural lighting prevails. Contrary to Rossellini and Visconti, and much closer to Rouquier, for example, is the fact that almost nothing happens in the film. Given its episodic nature that follows seasonal changes in the lives of five families in Lombardy, the highlights are the birth of a baby, the slaughtering of a pig, the discovery of a gold coin in the dirt, a couple's honeymoon trip on a barge to Milan, and a father who cuts down a tree in order to make a sandal for his son, from whence comes the film's title. One particular scene caused much of the divided critical opinion—the miracle of the cow. A woman's cow is ill; she prays for it and it miraculously regains its health. Olmi here stressed the primacy of religious faith; a Catholicism which offered a world of culture and learning to the peasantry as well as providing a source of magic and myth, symbols and stories.

—Elaine Mancini

ALEXANDER NEVSKY

USSR, 1938

Director: Sergei Eisenstein

Production: Mosfilm; black and white, 35mm; length: 3044 meters. Released 23 November 1938. Filmed June through November 1938 in Moscow.

Scenario: Sergei Eisenstein and Pyotr Pavlenko; collaborating director: D. J. Vasiliev; photography: Edward Tisse; editor: Sergei Eisenstein; sound: B. Volsky and V. Popov; production design: Isaac Shpinel, Nikolai Soloviov, and K. Yeliseyev from Eisenstein's sketches; music: Sergei Prokofiev; costume designers: Isaac Shpinel, Nikolai Soloviov, and K. Yeliseyev from Eisenstein's sketches; consultant on work with actors: Elena Telesheva.

Cast: Nikolai Cherkasov (Prince Alexander Yaroslavich Nevsky); Nikolai Okhlopkov (Vasili Busali); Alexander Abrikosov (Gavrilo Oleksich); Dmitri Orlov (Ignat, Master Armorer); Vasili Novikov (Pavsha, Governor of Pskov); Nikolai Arsky (Domash Tverdislavich); Vera Ivashcheva (Olga, a Novogorod girl); Varvarra Massalitinova (Amelfa Timofeyevna); Anna Danilova (Vasilisa, a girl of Pskov); Vladimir Yershov (Von Blak, Grand Master of the Livonian Order); Sergei Blinnikov (Tverdilo, traitorous Mayor of Pskov); Ivan Lagutin (Ananias); Lev Fenin (Bishop); Naum Rogozhin (Black-robed Monk).

Awards: Order of Lenin award, Soviet Union, 1939.

Publications

Script:

Eisenstein: 3 Films, edited by Jay Leyda, New York, 1974.

Books:

Rotha, Paul, and others, Eisenstein 1898–1948, London, 1948.

Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Form, New York, 1949.

Eisenstein, Sergei, Notes of a Film Director, London, 1959.

Leyda, Jay, Kino, London, 1960.

Alexander Nevsky

- Mitry, Jean, S. M. Eisenstein, Paris, 1961.
- Konlecher and Kubelka, editors, Sergei Michailowitsch Eisenstein, Vienna, 1964.
- Moussinac, Léon, Sergei Eisenstein, New York, 1970.
- Martin, Marcel, and others, The Complete Works of Sergei Eisenstein, New York, 1971.
- Barna, Yon, Eisenstein, Bloomington, Indiana, 1974.
- Fernandez, Dominique, Eisenstein, Paris, 1975.
- Sudendorf, W., and others, Sergei M. Eisenstein: Materialien zu Leben und Werk, Munich, 1975.
- Weise, E., editor, Sergei M. Eisenstein in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten, Reinbek, 1975.
- Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Sense, New York, 1975.
- Swallow, Norman, Eisenstein: A Documentary Portrait, New York, 1977.
- Seton, Marie, Sergei Eisenstein, London, 1978.
- Leyda, Jay, and Zina Vovnow, Eisenstein at Work, New York, 1982.
- Eisenstein, Sergei, Immortal Memories: An Autobiography, Boston, 1983.
- Marshall, Herbert, Masters of the Soviet Cinema: Crippled Creative Biographies, London, 1983.
- Polan, Dana B., The Political Language of Film and the Avant-Garde, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1985.
- Aumont, Jacques, Montage Eisenstein, London, 1987.
- Eisenstein, Sergei, Selected Works I: Writings 1922–1934, edited by Richard Taylor, London, 1988.
- Jassenjawsky, Igor, Von Eisenstein bis Tarkovskij; Die Malerei der Filmregisseure Russlands, Munchen, 1990.
- Goodwin, James, Eisenstein, Cinema, & History, Champaign, 1993.
- Taylor, Richard, S.M. Eisenstein: Writings, 1934–47, London, 1996.
- Bergan, Ronald, Sergei Eisenstein: A Life in Conflict, New York, 1999.
- Articles:
- Nugent, Frank S., in New York Times, 23 March 1939.
- Kunitz, J., “Eisenstein’s Resurgence,” in New Republic (New York), 29 March 1939.
- Weinberg, Herman, in Sight and Sound, (London), Spring 1939.
- Hoellering, F., “Eisenstein Has Been Subordinated to the Orders of the Monolithic State,” in Nation (New York), 8 April 1939.
- Maddow, Ben, “Eisenstein and the Historical Films,” in Hollywood Quarterly, October 1945.
- Soliski, Waclaw, “The End of Sergei Eisenstein: Case History of an Artist under Dictatorship,” in Commentary (New York), March 1949.
- Kawicki, Dennis, in Cineaste (New York), Fall 1968.
- Jurenev, R., “Cuvstvo Rodiny,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), November 1973.

- Levaco, R., "The Eisenstein-Prokofiev Correspondence," in Cinema Journal (Iowa City), Fall 1973.
- Kjorup, S., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), no. 136, 1977.
- Roberts, P. D., "Prokofiev's Score and Cantata for Eisenstein's Alexander Nevsky," in Semiotica (New York), nos. 1–2, 1977.
- Gallez, Douglas W., "The Prokofiev-Eisenstein Collaboration: Nevsky and Ivan Revisited," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), no. 2, 1978.
- Balter, L., Film Culture (New York), nos. 70–71, 1983.
- Guilbert, Pierre, "Ou vitrail à la scène," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), 1986.
- Turner, George, "Alexander Nevsky Comes Back in Style," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), November 1987.
- Firstenberg, Jean Picker, "Alexander Nevsky: A Classic Collaboration," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), November 1987.
- Guneratne, A. R., "History as Propaganda: The Portrait of Stalin as Medieval Hero and its Epic Frame," in Cinefocus (Bloomington, Indiana), no. 2, 1990.
- Furie, K., "Nevsky Alive and Well," in New York Times, 20 October 1991.
- Merritt, Russell, "Recharging Alexander Nevsky: Tracking the Eisenstein-Prokofiev War Horse," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1994.
- Saada, N., "Serguei Prokofiev: Alexandre Nevski," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), nos. 127–128, 1995.
- Vallerand, F., "Musiques pour Eisenstein," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 183, March/April 1996.

* * *

The cinematic works of Sergei Eisenstein demonstrate a continuous effort to explore and develop the elements of his theory of montage. Two marked phases of style and technique are evident in this development. The first phase consists of Eisenstein's silent films of the 1920s, the second is associated with his 1930s and 1940s sound films. In the first phase of his cinematic career Eisenstein introduces the formal concepts of intellectual montage, mise-en-scène, and a revolutionary new narrative concept: the portrayal of the mass as hero. With Alexander Nevsky Eisenstein enters a second phase in which the individual within the collective dominates the narrative, while vertical montage and pictorial composition replace intellectual montage as the primary formal devices in his films. These new techniques are not totally divorced from Eisenstein's early film methods, but have evolved from them.

The emphasis upon the individual within the collective in Alexander Nevsky can be seen as the maturing of the earlier concept in which the mass is portrayed as hero. Reflecting upon Soviet silent cinema, Eisenstein writes that the films are flawed in that they fail to fully represent the concept of collectivity: "collectivism means the maximum development of the individual within the collective . . . Our first mass films missed this deeper meaning." In the depiction of "the general-revolutionary slogan" of the 1920s, the mass as hero functioned well, but to convey the more specific Communist message of the 1930s, images of leading individuals were needed.

In Alexander Nevsky the theme of the Russian people's patriotism is emphasized through such exemplary characters as Prince Alexander, Busali, and Gavriilo Oleksich. Even though this narrative approach resembles that of more traditional cinema, Eisenstein's characters embody patriotic ideals in such an extreme way that they become symbols rather than simple heroic personalities. The story of Alexander Nevsky lends itself to this larger-than-life treatment of its characters. It presents historical figures and events of such mythic proportions that, while the viewer may sympathize with the characters, he does not easily identify with them, and so the viewer is not distracted from the general theme of the film. It is intended that the ideas the characters represent will be remembered rather than their individual personalities. The characters must support, even succumb to, the dominant theme of the strength and patriotism of the Russian people.

Structuring a film so that all its individual elements are controlled by the theme is a formal concern common to both silent and sound film in Eisenstein's work. In the early silent films this formal method was referred to as overtone montage, and dictated that all the visual images of a film, which have been developed through the use of intellectual, metric, rhythmic, and tonal montage, serve to reveal and illustrate the dominant theme. The controlling formal method in Alexander Nevsky, vertical montage, is much the same as overtone, but with the additional element of sound. Vertical montage, according to Eisenstein, links different spheres of feeling—particularly the visual image with the sound image—to create a single, unified effect. The audio and visual elements are not only governed by the dominant theme of the film, but work together to convey that theme in a strongly emotional manner.

The attack of the German wedge on the Russian army in "The Battle on the Ice" sequence in Alexander Nevsky demonstrates this appeal to the emotions. The musical score contributes greatly to the pacing and emotional tone of the sequence. Changes in the pace of pictorial movement are accompanied by a corresponding rhythmic or melodic change. In addition, Eisenstein uses the combination of sound and image to suggest to the viewer things that cannot actually be seen on screen. Although this approach resembles that of intellectual montage, it functions on a more poetic or metaphorical level. For example, Eisenstein causes us to experience the leaping and pounding of horses' hooves as equivalent to the beating of an agitated heart, a heart experiencing the increasing terror of the battle on the ice.

The most obvious use of vertical montage in Alexander Nevsky is in the relationship throughout the film between the musical score and the pictorial composition. This relationship was developed through several different methods. For some sequences the music was written with a general theme or idea in mind. In other sequences the music was written for an already assembled visual episode. In yet other sequences, the visual images were edited to music already on the sound track. The final result of these editing methods is a connection between the visuals and the musical score that goes beyond the enhancement of the mood of a sequence. Throughout Alexander Nevsky Eisenstein strives for a complete correspondence between the movement of the music and the movement of the eye over the lines of the plastic composition. The same motion found within the image composition of a shot sequence can be found in the complementary musical score for that sequence. That is, the ascending or descending shape of the notes of the written musical score correspond directly to the movement of the eye over the planes of the composition within each shot of a film sequence. Although the details of this complex sound-image relationship may not be apparent while viewing Alexander Nevsky, what is apparent is the solidity this relationship lends to the film. The sound and visual elements combine to create a unified whole. Eisenstein states that, in comparison to the films of the 1920s, the new Soviet sound cinema appeared more traditional "and much closer to the foreign cinema than those films that once declared war to the death against its (the foreign cinema's) very principles and methods." Two elements that contribute to the traditional appearance of Alexander Nevsky are its story and pictorial composition which are based in conventional techniques drawn from literature and painting. In the 1930s Eisenstein had become interested in the application of other art forms to film. Literature, he felt, offered "the dramatics of subject." Cinema should again be concerned with story and plot—concepts Eisenstein had condemned in the 1920s—but this was not a call for a return to conventional content. Eisenstein felt that conventional forms could be utilized to present fresh content. The new story would not be centered around a traditional bourgeois hero, but would instead feature modern protagonists who represent the individual within the collective. These individuals, as we see in Alexander Nevsky, would embody the ideology of the proletariat.

In contrast to the photographic quality of Eisenstein's earlier films, the individual frames of Alexander Nevsky are reminiscent of painted battle scenes and landscapes. This is why the battle scenes may appear unrealistic: they are highly stylized, like paintings. An example of this approach is the creation of "The Battle on the Ice." Not only was the composition of individual shots stylized, but the landscape itself was totally simulated. The winter battle scene was actually shot in the heat of July; the ice and snow were created with melted glass, alabaster, chalk, and salt. The appearance of the summer sky was altered with the use of a filter on the camera lens. The scene was almost literally painted on a blank canvas.

Although some critics were disappointed with Eisenstein's variations on, or departure from, his earlier methods, Alexander Nevsky was a success upon its release in 1938. Probably Eisenstein's most commercially popular film in his own country, it also survived the scrutiny of Joseph Stalin, earning the symbol of official government approval, the Order of Lenin, in February of 1939. Soviet and foreign critics alike applauded the film as the work which, after more than six years of unproductivity, not all of it voluntary, returned Eisenstein to his former status as one of the foremost creative talents of the Soviet cinema.

Alexander Nevsky is viewed in much the same manner today as it was upon its original release. It is not considered Eisenstein's best film but its epic qualities and cinematic achievement, and particularly the "Battle on the Ice" sequence, are appreciated. The concept of vertical montage, however, has come under closer scrutiny than in past years. Although critics may disagree on the extent to which the sound-image unity of vertical montage is at work in this particular film, they do seem to agree on the importance of Eisenstein's theoretical effort: he was one of the first to attempt an articulation of the relationship between sound and image in cinema.

—Marie Saeli

ALI: FEAR EATS THE SOUL

See ANGST ESSEN SEELE AUF

ALL ABOUT MY MOTHER

See TODO SOBRE MI MADRE

ALL QUIET ON THE WESTERN FRONT

USA, 1930

Director: Lewis Milestone

Production: Universal Pictures Corp.; Moviestone sound, black and white, 35mm (also silent version with synchronized music); running time: 140 minutes; length: 14 reels, 12,423 feet (with synchronized music 15 reels). Released April 1930, Los Angeles. Re-released 1939 but reduced to 10 reels; re-released 1950 in the United States; re-released 1963 in France. Filmed 1930 in Universal Studio backlots; battle scenes shot at Irvine Ranch, California.

Producer: Carl Laemmle, Jr.; screenplay: Dell Andrews, Maxwell Anderson, and George Abbott; titles: Walter Anthony, from the novel by Erich Maria Remarque; photography: Arthur Edeson, Karl Freund, and Tony Gaudio; editors: Edgar Adams and Milton Carruth; sound technician: William W. Hedgecock; art directors: Charles D. Hall and William Schmidt; music and synchronization: David Broekman; recording engineer: C. Roy Hunter; special effects: Frank Booth; dialogue director: George Cukor.

Cast: Louis Wolheim (Katczincky); Lew Ayres (Paul Baumer); John Wray (Himmelstoss); George (Slim) Summerville (Tiaden); Russell Gleason (Muller); Raymond Griffith (Gerard Duval); Ben Alexander (Kenmerich); Owen Davis, Jr. (Peter); Beryl Mercer (Mrs. Baumer); in silent version ZaSu Pitts is Mrs. Baumer; Joan Marsh (Poster girl); Yola d'Avril (Suzanne); Arnold Lucy (Kantorek); Scott Kolk (Leer); Walter Browne Rogers (Behm); Richard Alexander (Westhus); Renee Dameron and Poupee Andriot (French girls); Edwin Maxwell (Mr. Baumer); Harold Goodwin (Detering); Marion Clayton (Miss Baumer); G. Pat Collins (Lieutenant Berlenck); Bill Irving (Ginger); Edmund Breese (Herr Mayer); Heinie Conklin (Hammacher); Bertha Mann (Sister Libertine); William Bakewell (Albert); Bodil Rosing (Watcher); Tom London (Orderly); Vince Barnett (Cook); Fred Zinnemann (Man).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture and Best Direction, 1929/30; American Film Institute's "100 Years, 100 Movies," 1998.

Publications

Script:

Andrews, Dell, Maxwell Anderson, and George Abbott, All Quiet on the Western Front, in Best American Screenplays I, edited by Sam Thomas, New York, 1982.

Books:

Rotha, Paul, Celluloid: The Film Today, London, 1931.
Higham, Charles, and Joel Greenberg, The Celluloid Muse: Hollywood Directors Speak, Chicago, 1969.

All Quiet on the Western Front

Tuska, John, editor, "Lewis Milestone," in Close Up: The Contract Director, New Jersey, 1976.

Millichap, Joseph R., Lewis Milestone, Boston, 1981.

Articles:

Dean, Loretta K., in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), March 1930.

Close Up (London), March 1930.

Variety (Hollywood), 7 May 1930.

Beaton, Welford, "Should Old Acquaintance Be Forgotten?" in Hollywood Spectator, 25 September 1937.

Reisz, Karel, "Milestone and War," in Sequence (London), 1950.

Jones, Dorothy, "War Without Glory," in Quarterly of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Spring 1954.

Cutts, John, in Films and Filming (London), April 1963.

Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 November 1963.

Spears, Jack, "Louis Wolheim," in Films in Review (New York), March 1972.

Diehl, Digby, "An Interview with Lewis Milestone," in Action (Los Angeles), July-August 1972.

Canham, Kingsley, "Lewis Milestone," in Henry King, Lewis Milestone, Sam Wood, by Canham and others, London, 1974.

Schlech, Eugene P. A., "All Quiet on the Western Front: A History Teacher's Reappraisal," in Film and History, December 1978.

Fox, J., in Films and Filming (London), April 1980.

Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1980.

Weemaes, G., in Filme en Televisie (Brussels), May-June 1981.

Mitchell, G. J., "Making All Quiet on the Western Front," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), September 1985.

Kelly, Andrew, "All Quiet on the Western Front: 'Brutal cutting, stupid censors and bigoted politicians,'" in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon), vol. 9, no. 2, June 1989.

Whiteclay Chambers, John, III, "All Quiet on the Western Front (1930): The Anti-war Film and the Image of the First World War," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon), vol. 14, no. 4, October 1994.

* * *

All Quiet on the Western Front made Lew Ayres a star and was responsible for the start of George Cukor's screen career and the establishment of Lewis Milestone as a director of international repute. Milestone directed four further films concerned with war, notably A Walk in the Sun, but none measured up to All Quiet, and, indeed, the director never achieved the same success as this film brought. The film also boded well for the production career of Carl Laemmle, Jr., a much derided executive, who turned out a surprising number of major artistic features at his father's studio in the early through mid-1930s.

A passionate portrayal of the horror of war, the film was the first to depict the "Hun" as simply a scared boy. All Quiet can be divided into four distinct parts. The first details the enlistment of the young recruits; the second their arrival at the front; the third the various incidents of war; and, finally, the hero Paul Baumer's homecoming, his hastened return to the front, and his death. The film remains faithful to the Erich Maria Remarque novel. It was the most successful of a trio of features released at this time which take a pacifist approach to World War I, the other two being the British Journey's End and the German Westfront 1918. All Quiet on the Western Front was the first sound film to use a giant mobile crane, particularly for filming the realistically-staged battle sequences, and one of the first talkies to boast a mobility of camerawork in general. Credit for this must, of course, go to Lewis Milestone, but George Cukor's contribution to the film should not be—as it is so often—overlooked. It was Cukor who rehearsed the actors and established a neutrality to their accents which is of inestimable value in putting across the production's emotional message.

There are no real stars in All Quiet, with each actor giving a passionate cameo performance, be it Louis Wolheim as the brusque yet sympathetic Katzinsky, Raymond Griffith as the French soldier killed by Baumer, William Bakewell as Baumer's pal, Albert, or Beryl Mercer as Baumer's mother (a role played in the silent version by ZaSu Pitts).

Released initially in a 140-minute version. All Quiet on the Western Front has been successively cut through the years, until most prints today run as short as 90 or 110 minutes. These truncated versions fail to capture the film's momentum as the recruits become more and more involved in the war and its horrors. The most extraordinary edited version of the feature, however, was a 1939 reissue which included an anti-Nazi narration.

—Anthony Slide

ALL THAT HEAVEN ALLOWS

USA, 1955

Director: Douglas Sirk

Production: Universal-International; Technicolor; running time: 89 minutes; released October 1955.

Producer: Ross Hunter; screenplay: Peg Fenwick, from a story by Edna L. Lee and Harry Lee; photography: Russell Metty; editors: Frank Gross, Fred Baratta; sound: Leslie I. Carey, Joe Lapis; art director: Alexander Goltizen, Eric Orbom; music supervisor: Joseph Gershenson.

All That Heaven Allows

Cast: Jane Wyman (Cary Scott); Rock Hudson (Ron Kirby); Agnes Moorehead (Sara Warren); Conrad Nagel (Harvey); Virginia Grey (Alida Anderson); Gloria Talbott (Kay Scott); William Reynolds (Ned Scott); Jacqueline de Wit (Mona Plash); Charles Drake (Mick Anderson)

Publications

Books:

Halliday, Jon, Sirk on Sirk, London, 1971; New York, 1972.

Bourget, Jean-Loup, Douglas Sirk, Paris, 1984.

Althen, Michael, Rock Hudson: Seine Filme, sein Leben, Munich, 1986.

Hudson, Rock, and Sara Davidson, Rock Hudson: His Story, London, 1986.

Quirk, Lawrence J., Jane Wyman, the Actress and the Woman: An Illustrated Biography, New York, 1986.

Gledhill, Christine, editor, Home is Where the Heart Is: Studies in Melodrama and the Woman's Film, London, 1987.

Läufer, Elisabeth, Skeptiker des Lichts: Douglas Sirk und seine Filme, Frankfurt, 1987.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 26 October 1955.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1955.

Comolli, Jean-Louis, "L'Aveugle et le miroir; ou, L'Impossible Cinéma de Douglas Sirk," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1967.

- Willemsen, Paul, "Distanciation and Douglas Sirk," in Screen (London), Summer 1971.
- Elsaesser, Thomas, "Tales of Sound and Fury: Observations on the Family Melodrama," in Monogram (London), no. 4, 1972.
- Willemsen, Paul, "Towards an Analysis of the Sirkian System," in Screen (London), Winter 1972-73.
- McCourt, J., "Douglas Sirk: Melo Maestro," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1975.
- Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, "Fassbinder on Sirk," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1975.
- Thousand Eyes Magazine* (New York), January 1976.
- Creed, Barbara, "The Position of Women in Hollywood Melodramas," in Australian Journal of Screen Theory (Kensington, New South Wales), no. 3, 1977.
- Mulvey, Laura, "Notes on Sirk and Melodrama," in Movie (London), Winter, 1977-78.
- Kleinmans, Chuck, "Notes on Melodrama and the Family under Capitalism," in Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), no. 3, 1978.
- Film Psychology Review* (New York), Summer-Fall 1980.
- McNiven, R. D., "The Middle-Class American Home of the Fifties," in Cinema Journal (Chicago), Summer 1983.
- Kuiper, E., "Douglas Sirk: Analyse op de montagetafel," in Skoop (Amsterdam), June-July 1985.
- Hunter, Ross, in American Film (Washington, D.C.), April 1988.
- Poppe, E., "Reflexions sur le role thematique: la veuve dans All That Heaven Allows, de D. Sirk," in Iris (Iowa City), no. 2, 1988.
- Klasen, B., "Het voordeel van de twijfel," in Versus (Am Nijmegen), 1, 1989.
- Babington, Bruce and Evans, P., "All That Heaven Allowed," in Movie, 34-35, Winter 1990.
- Metz, W.C., "Pomp(ous) Sirk-umstance: Intertextuality, Adaptation, and All That Heaven Allows," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 45, no. 4, Winter 1993.
- Reimer, Robert C., "Comparison of Douglas Sirk's All That Heaven Allows and R. W. Fassbinder's Ali: Fear Eats the Soul; or, How Hollywood's New England Dropouts Became Germany's Marginalized Other," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 24, no. 3, 1996.

* * *

With the politicizing of film criticism in the early 1970s, Douglas Sirk and his films took on a major importance. Already a distinguished theatre and film director before fleeing Nazi Germany for America, Sirk, who held leftist sympathies, had been influenced by Brechtian aesthetic theory. Of his Hollywood films, Sirk's 1950s melodramas were of particular interest: on the one hand, he was under an obligation to the studio to fulfil the viewer's expectations regarding the genre's dictates; on the other, Sirk, through formal strategies (lighting, decor, colour, etc., and the foregrounding of conventions) introduced disruptive and distancing elements into his films. As he readily acknowledged in interviews, his "excessive" presentation of the material was intended to make the ideological assumptions and values underpinning the films' concerns more fully apparent and, therefore, open to a critical scrutiny.

Under contract to Universal-International throughout the 1950s, Sirk most often worked with the producer Ross Hunter who gravitated towards the "woman's film" in order to provide vehicles for more mature female stars. All That Heaven Allows was made in response to the highly popular Magnificent Obsession which teamed Jane Wyman and Rock Hudson who, because of the film, became a major star. In addition to All That Heaven Allows, There's Always Tomorrow, and Imitation of Life are particularly notable Hunter-produced Sirk films. There's Always Tomorrow, which is one of Sirk's finest works, has not received the amount of critical attention it deserves. This may have occurred because the film is not Sirk at his most audacious—there is, for instance, nothing in the film that approaches the famous scene in All That Heaven Allows in which Wyman's children, after being instrumental in breaking up her relationship with Hudson, present her with a television on Christmas Eve so that she can "experience" life at her finger tips. This extraordinary sequence ends with a shot of Wyman's reflection on the television's blank screen.

Sirk faced a major constraint with the All That Heaven Allows project in that the film had to have a happy ending in which Wyman and Hudson are reunited as they were at the conclusion of their previous film. Conceivably, the demand contributes to the awkwardness of the film's resolution. On the other hand, the film's subject matter gave Sirk a particularly strong opportunity to mount a scathing critique, which is astonishingly direct, of middle-class American society in which class and gender oppression are the structuring principles. Wyman, a 40-ish widow of prominent social position living in a small New England town, is rejected by her peers when she becomes romantically involved with Hudson who, in addition to being considerably younger, practises gardening, i.e., labouring, to help finance his plan to own a nursery. Preceding Wyman's relationship with Hudson, the film indicates what is expected of her: the devoting of her remaining years to her husband's memory and the taking care of their children who are already young adults; alternatively, if she should remarry, it would be solely for the purpose of companionship. Yet, in the first country club sequence, Wyman experiences an attempted physical seduction and is offered a clandestine affair; and, in the second sequence, in which she tries formally to introduce Hudson into her social circle, she is subjected to verbal derision. (In the latter sequence, the occasion being celebrated is a middle-aged man's engagement to a much younger woman.) Sirk uses both of these sequences to present the bourgeoisie as hypocritical, emotionally bankrupt, and vicious when it comes to maintaining their social elitism. In addition to the external pressures, Wyman is also rebuked by her children who are totally committed to their middle-class identities and fear, as she does, social ostracism.

Although Sirk takes full advantage of these aspects of the material, he has difficulty in providing an alternative to the dominant ideology, given the genre's dictates and Hollywood's ideological imperatives. Hudson, who is associated with nature, self-definition, and the rejection of social status, offers Wyman a retreat, visually represented by the abandoned mill which he converts into their "new" home, into a mythic vision of what America represents. Interestingly, Hudson's position prefigures the counter-culture movements of the 1960s but, like those, it doesn't have a coherent political platform and, as such, is an inadequate solution. Most likely Sirk was obliged to find an alternative within American culture which accounts for the Thoreau references; presumably, to signal the failure of such an endeavour, Sirk repeatedly defines the Wyman/Hudson relationship in relation to the fragile: for example, Wyman accidentally smashes the Wedgwood tea pot which Hudson has reconstructed but, more tellingly, the film concludes with Hudson being incapacitated. In the film's ambiguous final shot, the fawn, which has been previously associated with Hudson, is seen through a window which separates the couple from nature. (The Christmas Eve sequence is introduced with a shot of Wyman peering out from a window watching carol singers and children. Again, the image suggests confinement and isolation.) As a result, although Sirk clearly intends the film's happy-ending convention to be less than satisfying, the specific reason for his undercutting of the film's resolution remains inarticulated.

Wyman's screen persona is well used. Throughout the film's initial sequences, she conveys both the character's passive identity and her unformulated resistance (given expression through the red dress she wears to the country club) to the life she is supposed to be content with. And, with this film, Hudson fully established his screen persona—while exerting a masculine image of inner strength, he also convincingly suggests, in the intimate sequences with Wyman in the abandoned mill, a strong emotional vulnerability which challenges traditional gender-role expectations.

Although the formal aspects of Sirk's work led to the initial critical attention, his films, as melodramas, have been equally of interest to the concerns of feminist film criticism. As an analysis of a middle-class woman's oppression, All That Heaven Allows is an extremely powerful statement.

—Richard Lippe

ALL THE KING'S MEN

USA, 1949

Director: Robert Rossen

Production: Columbia Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 109 minutes. Released 1949. Filmed in Columbia studios.

Producer: Robert Rossen; screenplay: Robert Rossen from the novel by Robert Penn Warren; photography: Burnett Guffey; editors: Al Clark and Robert Parrish; production designers: Sturges Carne and Louis Diage; music: Louis Gruenberg and Morris Stoloff; costume designer; Jean Louis; consultant: Robert Parrish.

Cast: Broderick Crawford (Willie Stark); Joanne Dru (Anne Stanton); John Ireland (Jack Burden); John Derek (Tom Stark); Mercedes McCambridge (Sadie Burke); Sheppard Strudwick (Adam Stanton); Anne Seymour (Lucy Stark); Raymond Greenleaf (Judge Stanton); Ralph Dumke (Tiny Duffy); Katherine Warren (Mrs. Burden); Walter Burke (Sugar Boy); Will Wright (Dolph Pillsbury); Grandon Rhodes (Floyd McEvoy); H. C. Miller (Pa Stark); Richard Hale (Hale); William Bruce (Commissioner).

Awards: Oscars for Best Film, Best Actor (Crawford), and Best Supporting Actress (McCambridge), 1949; New York Film Critics' Awards for Best Film and Best Actor (Crawford), 1949.

Publications

Script:

Rossen, Robert, All the King's Men, edited by Steven Rossen, in Three Screenplays, New York, 1972.

Books:

Callenbach, Ernest, Our Modern Art: The Movies, Chicago, 1955.
Casty, Alan, The Films of Robert Rossen, New York, 1969.
Ireland, John A., Living in Hollywood & Other Crimes of Passion; An Intimate Biography of Actor John Ireland, Fresno, 1997.

Articles:

Hitchcock, Peggy, in Films in Review (New York), February 1950.
Winnington, Richard, in Sight and Sound (London), June 1950.
Rossen, Robert, "The Face of Independence," in Films and Filming (London), August 1962.
"Rossen Issue" of Films in Review (New York), June-July 1962.
Noames, Jean-Louis, "Lessons Learned in Combat: Interview with Robert Rossen," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), January 1967.
Dark, C., "Reflections of Robert Rossen," in Cinema (London), August 1970.
Mellen, Joan, "Fascism in the Contemporary Film," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1971.
Wald, M., "Robert Rossen," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1972.
Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1986.
Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 7 July 1988.

* * *

All the King's Men is one of the best political films of all time. It is based on Robert Penn Warren's Pulitzer Prize-winning novel of the same name which became a major best-seller, and has retained its reputation as one of the great works of American fiction. The film is a riveting account of the career of Willie Stark, a character loosely based on Louisiana's notorious governor Huey Long, the "kingfish" of Southern politics in the 1920s and 1930s. Although Warren's novel also concerns the career of Stark, who rises from small-town lawyer to governor, Stark himself is a secondary character. The protagonist as well as narrator of the novel is newspaper reporter Jack Burden whose life, thoughts, and reactions to the political goings-on are related with frequent jumps back and forth in time.

In Rossen's film version, Willie Stark becomes the main character and Burden, although still the narrator, is much less important. The film also tells the story in chronological sequence, thus relying on a more traditional type of plot. Although in recent years many films have successfully used devices such as flashbacks and flashforwards without regard to traditional chronological story progression, in 1949 this would have been startling and probably unsuccessful. By shifting the emphasis to the central character and restructuring the narrative, Rossen was able to retain the spirit of the Warren novel while still making a highly dramatic and entertaining film. Unlike many adaptations, of the novels of Ernest Hemingway or F. Scott Fitzgerald, for example, which have often been unsuccessful because they were either too close to or too removed from the original, All the King's Men as a film is different from, but equally as effective as the novel.

Another major reason for the success of the film is the quality of the acting. As Stark, Broderick Crawford gives a dynamic performance in the only major starring role of his career. His Academy Award for Best Actor of the year was well deserved; he is equally convincing as the meek, naive country lawyer trying to help the members of his small community and as the spellbinding, power-hungry governor. The shift in his character's personality could have been a major problem with the film yet Crawford's acting makes both sides of the man believable. Mercedes McCambridge also won an Academy Award for her performance as the hard-shelled Sadie Burke. Others, including John Ireland as Jack Burden, are also very good, though they lack the opportunity afforded Crawford and McCambridge for a great performance.

All the King's Men

While many films which make political or sociological statements tend to date badly in a few years. All the King's Men still seems fresh and powerful. The contradictory character of Stark, a man who wants to do good, but who succumbs to the temptation of power and the demands of his own ambition, becoming the embodiment of corrupt politics, is as relevant today as in 1949. The character of the demagogue has been known in literature for centuries, but few works have examined that figure as thoroughly and successfully as All the King's Men.

—Patricia King Hanson

ALPHAVILLE

France-Italy, 1965

Director: Jean-Luc Godard

Production: Chaumiane (Paris) and Filmstudio (Rome); black and white, 35mm; running time: 98 minutes (some sources list 100 minutes). Released 1965. Filmed January through February 1965 in Paris.

Producer: Andre Michelin; screenplay: Jean-Luc Godard, based on a character created by Peter Cheyney; assistant directors: Charles Bitsch, Jean-Paul Savignac, and Helene Kalouguine; photography: Raoul Coutard; editor: Agnes Guillemot; sound: Rene Levret; music: Paul Misraki.

Cast: Eddie Constantine (Lemmy Caution); Anna Karina (Natasha von Braun); Howard Vernon (Professor von Braun); Akim Tamiroff (Henri Dickson); Laszlo Szabo (Chief Engineer); Michel Delahaye (von Braun's Assistant); Jean-André Fieschi (Professor Heckell); Jean-Louis Comolli (Professor Jeckell); Alpha 60 (Itself).

Awards: Best Film, Berlin Film Festival, 1965.

Publications

Script:

Godard, Jean-Luc, Alphaville, London, 1966; New York, 1968.

Books:

Roud, Richard, Jean-Luc Godard, New York, 1967.

Mussman, Tony, editor, Jean-Luc Godard: A Critical Anthology, New York, 1968.

Cameron, Ian, editor, The Films of Jean-Luc Godard, London, 1969.

Collet, Jean, editor, Jean-Luc Godard, New York, 1970.

Brown, Royal, editor, Focus on Godard, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.

Godard, Jean-Luc, Godard on Godard, edited by Tom Milne, London, 1972; revised edition, New York, 1986.

Farassino, Alberto, Jean-Luc Godard, Florence, 1974.

Parrish, James Robert, The Great Spy Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1974.

Monaco, James, The New Wave, New York, 1976.

MacCabe, Colin, Godard: Images, Sounds, Politics, London, 1980.

Walsh, Martin, The Brechtian Aspect of Radical Cinema, London, 1981.

Lefèvre, Raymond, Jean-Luc Godard, Paris, 1983.

Bordwell, David, Narration in the Fiction Film, London, 1985.

Weis, Elisabeth, and John Belton, Film Sound: Theory and Practice, New York, 1985.

Loshitzky, Yosefa, The Radical Faces of Godard and Bertolucci, Detroit, 1995.

Dixon, Wheeler W., The Films of Jean-Luc Godard, Albany, New York, 1997.

Sterritt, David, Jean-Luc Godard; Interviews, Jackson, Mississippi, 1998.

Sterritt, David, The Films of Jean-Luc Godard; Seeing the Invisible, New York, 1999.

Alphaville

Articles:

New Yorker, 21 August 1965.

Roud, Richard, "Anguish: Alphaville," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1965.

Jacob, Gilles, and Claire Clouzot, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1965.

Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), 16 September 1965.

Coutard, Raoul, "Light of Day," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1965–66.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 3 November 1965.

Bond, Kirk, in Film Society Review (New York), March 1966.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), May 1966.

Thomas, John in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1966.

Federman, Raymond, "Jean-Luc Godard and Americanism," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1968.

Nolan, Jack Edmund, "Eddie Constantine," in Films in Review (New York), August–September 1968.

Crofts, Stephen, "The Films of Jean-Luc Godard," in Cinema (London), June 1969.

Kozloff, Max, in Film Culture (New York), Winter/Spring 1970.

Ropars-Wuilleumier, Marie-Claire, "Loss of Language," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 3, 1976.

Maclean, R., "Wittgenstein and Godard's Alphaville," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1977–78.

Blanchet, C., in Cinéma (Paris), May 1983.

Pinciroli, G., "La completezza del gesto in Alphaville," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), December 1989.

Darke, Chris, "It All Happened In Paris," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 4, no. 7, July 1994.

Castoro Cinema, no. 176, March–April 1996.

Brown, R.S., "Alphaville," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 22, no. 1, 1996.

Marek, Petr, in Film a Doba (Prague), vol. 42, no. 4, Winter 1996.

* * *

Since the early 1950s a tendency has begun to manifest itself in the genre of the science-fiction film as an increasing number of important directors use the sci-fi form to express their views on society, mankind, the present and the future. One of these is Jean-Luc Godard, whose 1965 Alphaville takes place in a utopian world of the future. Godard's world is not one of joy and happiness; Alphaville is governed by a totalitarian system in which the individual counts for almost nothing, and its alienated people have no use for art, love, or even thought. People are reduced essentially to the level of robots, identified only by numbers, without a will of their own, with no ideas or feelings.

Even though it belongs in the category of science fiction, Godard's film does not closely follow the conventional patterns of the genre. As a member of the French New Wave, Godard has held, since his debut, an individual and well-defined view of the cinema. One of the most important features of his work is his emphasis on the contemporary world. All of his films deal with modern man; we do not find a return to the past in his entire work. The stamp of the present can also be seen in his sole excursion into the future. Alphaville, which is less about what the world will be like tomorrow than what it is like today, and what it is gradually becoming before our very eyes without our realizing it. In the present and the past Godard sees the potential seeds of a future world, and therefore the story has an admonitory subtext.

From this thematic interpretation flows the film's realization, its formal execution and visual aspect. The viewer encounters on the screen nothing that appears to be unusual or extraordinary, and Godard even forgoes any futuristic mise-en-scène. His Alphaville of the future is the Paris of 1965, in which a dehumanizing atmosphere is expressed through the camera work of Raoul Coutard, who shoots buildings of concrete and glass in high contrast, alternates positive and negative images in very short takes, and makes particularly effective use of Paris by night. The most unusual aspect of the film is the sound, particularly the monotonous voice of the central brain governing Alphaville, a voice in contrast to the somewhat ingratiating music of Paul Misraki.

A characteristic feature of the entire French New Wave was a certain admiration for the American cinema—its perfect craftsmanship and its ability to entertain, move, or thrill with suspense. In Alphaville, Godard's affinity for popular film can be seen, for example, in the choice of Eddie Constantine for the starring role—viewers know him chiefly from gangster films—and in the dramatic structure influenced by both film serials of the 1930s and by comic strips. Another striking feature of Godard's direction is his free use of ideas and resources borrowed from other films and other art forms; Godard summons these according to his own needs. In Alphaville we find links with the work of Jean Cocteau in the sequence in which Lemmy converses with Alpha 60; the labyrinthine passages recall the phantasmic world of the novels of Franz Kafka; and we find a reference to the ancient myth of Eurydice and the Biblical story of Lot's wife. There are also references to the unforgotten Fascist past, as in the tattooed numbers worn by the city's inhabitants, the name of the designer of the central brain, Professor von Braun, or the use of actual rooms of the Parisian Hotel Continental, where the Gestapo was quartered during the Occupation. These references in the film are not incidental; they are utilized intentionally to broaden and deepen the picture and shift the story to another, more relevant level. However, they do not destroy the integrity and unity of the film even when the viewer is aware of them.

Godard's films of the 1960s were often received by a portion of the public and by some critics with an enthusiasm that was almost excessive. In the course of time, some of these films have lost their appeal. This has not happened in the case of Alphaville, which remains part of a valuable current of science fiction while holding its place in the history of cinema.

—B. Urgosíková

ALSINO Y EL CONDOR

(Alsino and the Condor)

Nicaragua, 1982

Director: Miguel Littin

Production: Nicaraguan Film Institute, Cuban Institute of Cinematographic Art and Industry, Latin American Production of Mexico, Costa Rican Cinematographic Co-Operative; colour, 35mm; running time: 89 minutes. Filmed on location in Nicaragua.

Producers: Lilia Alfaro, Jose Ramon Perez; executive producer: Herman Littin; screenplay: Miguel Littin, Isadora Aguirre, Tomas Turrent; photography: Jorge Herrera, Pablo Martinez; editor: Miriam Talavera; sound: Germinal Hernandez; art director: Elly Menz; music: Leo Brower.

Cast: Alan Esquivel (Alsino); Dean Stockwell (Frank); Carmen Bunster (Mama Buena); Alejandro Parodi (Garin); Delia Casanova (Rosario); Marta Lorena Perez (Lucia); Reinaldo Miravalles (Don Nazario); Marcelo Gaete (Lucia's Grandfather).

Awards: 1st Nicaraguan Fiction Feature.

Publications

Script:

Littin, Miguel, and others, Alsino y el Condor, Nicaragua, 1982.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 9 February 1983.

Valdes, Zoe, "Alsino: Las Alas del Sueno" in Cine Cubano (Havana), number 106, 1983.

Canby, Vincent, New York Times, 1 May 1983.

Fernandez, Enrique, Village Voice (New York), 10 May 1983.

Denby, David, New Yorker, 16 May 1983.

Perez, Marta, Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), December 1983.

Positif (Paris), April 1984.

Bassan, Raphael, "Alsino et le Condor—Une Allegorie pour un Pays Neuf" in Image et Son (Paris), May 1984.

Jaros, J., Film A Doba (Prague), May 1984.

Dunnage, G., "Nicaragua: L'enfant qui voulait voler" in Jeune Cinema (Paris), June 1984.

* * *

Miguel Littin, Chilean director in exile and former head of Chile Films, flirted with magic Realism, a style increasingly popular in fiction and following on from this, cinema, in the 1970s, with El Recurso del Metodo, and then returned to the Chileans-in-exile theme of direct criticism and allegories of the political events in Chile with Alsino y el Condor. Nearly all those involved in Chile Films during Allende's brief tenure in office in the country were thrown out of Chile after Pinochet's takeover of power in 1973 (some after a period of imprisonment), and despite money difficulties, some managed to keep up a form of film production. Those who did so were mostly in Socialist regimes—the Soviet Union or Cuba—but because of his contacts in the Mexican film business, Miguel Littin was able to continue his career there. This mass exodus of filmmakers from Chile who actually managed to continue filmmaking, and provide an alternative point of view to the very small number of films produced under Pinochet at this time, lead to the peculiar situation of almost an entire country's film output being made in exile.

Alsino y el Condor made at the time of the Sandanista overthrow of the Somoza regime in Nicaragua, is an allegory of the Nicaraguan people rising up to meet their oppressor. The film is a Mexican-Cuban-Nicaraguan co-production, yet despite this, it has the distinctive Littin touch. Littin's shortest film to this point was criticized by some for its too blatant use of political allegory.

The hero of the film is 10-year-old Alsino, a dreamer. He lives with his mamabuena, an old lady shrouded in the mystery of her past, who bewitches Alsino with travel tales of her dead sailor-husband and shows him old postcards from Amsterdam.

There is a contrast between Alsino's dreams and the realities of his country as it heads towards revolution. Alsino likes to climb trees and to imagine himself flying. His dreams are ignited by the US Army helicopter that begins to hover over his head. Alsino wants to fly. The fact that the helicopter is fighting the very people who want to liberate his own people is lost on him. Alsino's dreams are the dreams of his people, although as he is a child he cannot realize this and it is only after he falls from the tree and becomes hunchbacked that he becomes conscious of reality. After meeting the guerilla he returns home to find his town abandoned and his mamabuena dead, the Dutch postcards burnt and scattered to the wind, like his dreams. Alsino becomes one of the guerillas himself. Finally understanding the war and foreign aggression he can fly on the wings of his dreams of freedom.

The very obvious allegories here are the illusion of liberty through flying, and real dictatorial oppression and North American aggression expressed by the helicopter. Cultural domination is expressed by Alsino's wanting to possess the foreign object, the helicopter—even though it represents aggression. The film is full of symbols—in fact it could be said that there is not one real character in the film, merely symbols and emblems. There are birds unable to fly because their wings have been clipped, and Alsino becomes hunchbacked because he falls from a tree and only then begins to see things in a different light.

This film was respected in the West and even nominated for an Academy Award for best foreign film, although its obvious and heavy-handed political allegory was too much for the North American critics. Cine Cubano, however, loved it, and praised it for the beauty of using the innocent eyes of childhood awakening to political consciousness as the medium for the message. One could say, however, that Littin's vision has never been so schematized before and presents a very simplified vision of a country's problems.

—Sara Corben de Romero

THE AMBUSH

See ZASEDA

L'AMERICA

Italy, 1994

Director: Gianni Amelio

Production: Alia Film/Cecchi Gori Group Tiger. Color, 35mm, Cinemascope; running time: 120 mins. Released 1994. Filmed between August and December 1993, and in June 1994, in Albania.

Producer: Mario Cecchi Gori and Vittorio Cecchi Gori; screenplay: Gianni Amelio, Andrea Porporati, Alessandro Sermoneta; photography: Luca Bigazzi; editor: Simona Paggi; sound: Alessandro Zanon; music: Franco Piersanti; set designer: Giuseppe M. Gaudino; costumes: Liliana Sotira, Claudia Tenaglia.

Cast: Enrico Lo Verso (Gino); Michele Placido (Fiore); Carmelo di Mazzarelli (Spiro); Piro Milkani (Selimi); Elida Janushi (Selimi's Cousin); Sefer Pema (Prison Warden); Nikolin Elezi (Boy Who Dies); Artan Marina (Ismail); Besim Kurti (Policeman); Esmeralda Ara (Little Girl).

Awards: Best Director, Venice Film Festival; Felix Award, Best European Film; Nastri D'Argento, Best Picture and Director.

Publications

Articles:

- Young, Deborah, in Variety (New York), 12 September, 1994.
 Menashe, Louis, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 21, no. 4, 1995.
 Maslin, Janet, in New York Times, 4 October 1995.
 Carr, Jay, in Boston Globe, 20 December 1995.
 Wilmington, Michael, in Chicago Tribune, 24 December 1995.
 Crowds, Gary and Richard Porton, "Beyond Neorealism: Preserving a Cinema of Social Conscience," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 21, no. 4, 1995.
 Agovino, Michael J., "His Mind Fixed on the Moment, Eyes on the Past," in New York Times, 17 December 1995.
 James, Caryn, "The Little Things Mean a Lot," in New York Times, 17 December 1995.

* * *

Gianni Amelio's L'America is a biting, profoundly moving drama that illustrates how the downtrodden of society, beneath the hoopla of political change and the redistribution of power, are fated to do little more than shift from one kind of exploitation to another.

The specifics of the scenario relate to the downfall of communism in Europe. The year is 1991, and Albania has been liberated from the iron hand of the hammer and sickle. The Albanian people are hungry and desperate; thousands of them are determined to make their way to Italy, where they hope to find employment. In the decades leading up to the events in the film, political dissidents in Albania were incarcerated in labor camps. One of them is seventy-year-old Spiro Milkami (Carmelo di Mazzarelli), a bedraggled, feeble-minded man who is ironically not Albanian but an Italian farmer who had deserted the army in the 1940s. Spiro becomes the pawn in a scheme concocted by two Italian businessmen, Gino (Enrico Lo Verso) and Fiore (Michele Placido), who plan to purchase a shoe factory, with the assistance of an unscrupulous government official, and set up a fraudulent corporation that will allow them to squeeze a fortune out of Albania's economic chaos. In order to observe the rules of privatization, an Albanian must be involved in the venture. Fiore has discovered Spiro, who seems the perfect tool and fool: a passive, mindless old man who can be fitted into a suit and paraded about whenever necessary. Confused and senile, Spiro is caught in a time warp: he thinks he is still twenty years old and is obsessed with returning to Italy, and to his wife, because it is time to harvest his olives. If she is not already dead, Spiro's wife is now an elderly woman—but in his mind she remains as young as when he last saw her.

The crux of L'America centers on the relationship between Spiro and Gino, the younger of the businessmen. Spiro escapes from the orphanage where he had been left by Gino and Fiore, and Gino sets out after him across the barren Albanian countryside. Along the way, this insolent young capitalist is stripped of his jeep and belongings—and even his clothing. He comes to know the feeling of poverty and statelessness and develops an affinity for the plight of the Albanian people, as well as sympathy for Spiro's hopeless quest. Gino eventually is arrested and jailed because of his alliance with the corrupt official. He has been deserted by Fiore, who has left the country. Gino's passport is impounded, and he finds himself one of the nameless, faceless masses of refugees desperate to reach Italy. At the finale, he and the ever-hopeful Spiro are reunited on a refugee ship. Gino comes to recognize the force of Spiro's confidence, and the potency of his dreams.

L'America is a film in the neorealist tradition in that Amelio's concerns are profoundly political and humanist. The scenario condemns the abuse of power by the avaricious businessmen; back in the 1940s, Gino and Fiore would have been fascists rather than capitalists. Similar to the neorealist classics of Rossellini and De Sica, in L'America Amelio spotlights the individual's thirst for the barest necessities amid a landscape of political, economic, and moral disorder. While he has not made a documentary, his film reflects a heightened sense of reality derived from the experience of life. The film was shot on location and mixes professional actors (Lo Verso and Placido) with non-professionals (di Massarelli, an eighty-year-old retired fisherman-laborer-janitor making his screen debut).

What distances L'America from the earlier neorealist films lies in the questions the film poses. Some are practical to the individual: What will the Albanian refugee who does make it to Italy find there? Is Italy truly a promised land? Or is the quality of life more reflective of the inane programs constantly broadcast on Italian television? These queries are answered by the declaration that it is better to wash dishes in Italy than to starve in Albania. In Italy, the film flatly states, young men only die in car accidents. But L'America poses other questions that are more elusive, and more universal: Have Albanians (or, for that matter, Romanians, East Germans, or Poles) found freedom, after decades under communist rule? Or, has a new kind of tyranny, that of capitalism and greed, replaced the old?

Finally, in L'America Amelio touchingly captures the feeling of what it must be like to be a refugee. His is a story of the dreams and aspirations of people who, in reality, are so downtrodden that they have no logical reason to latch onto hope. It is Amelio's contention that, in the end, all the powerless have to cling to are their dreams. Even if they are irreversibly unrealistic, as is the case with Spiro, dreams still must be grasped onto because they are all that will help sustain life.

—Rob Edelman

AMERICAN BEAUTY

USA, 1999

Director: Sam Mendes

Production: DreamWorks SKG; 35 mm, color (DeLuxe); running time: 121 minutes; DTS/Dolby Digital/SDDS. Released September 1999 USA. Filmed in 1998 and 1999 in Los Angeles and Sacramento, California, and at Warner Brothers Studios in Burbank, California; additional scenes shot at South High School, Torrance, California; cost: $15,000,000 (US).

Producers: Alan Ball, Bruce Cohen, Dan Jinks, and Stan Wlodkowski; screenplay: Alan Ball; photography: Conrad L. Hall; assistant directors: Tony Adler, Rosemary Cremona, Carey Dietrich, and Chris Edmonds; editors: Tariq Anwar and Chris Greenbury; supervising sound editor: Scott Martin Gershin; art director: David S. Lazan; production designer: Naomi Shohan; costume designer: Julie Weiss; set designer: Jan K. Bergstrom; music: Original score by Thomas Newman; additional songs by Pete Townshend; special effects: CFC/MVFX, Los Angeles.

Cast: Kevin Spacey (Lester Burnham); Annette Bening (Carolyn Burnham); Thora Birch (Jane Burnham); Wes Bentley (Ricky Fitts); Mena Suvari (Angela Hayes); Peter Gallagher (Buddy Kane); Chris Cooper (Colonel Frank Fitts); Allison Janney (Barbara Fitts); Scott Bakula (Jim Olmeyer); Sam Robards (Jim Berkley); Barry Del Sherman (Brad Dupree).

Awards: Oscars for Best Actor (Kevin Spacey), Best Director (Sam Mendes), Best Picture (Bruce Cohen and Dan Jinks), Best Original Screenplay (Alan Ball), and Best Cinematography (Conrad L. Hall), 2000; British Academy Awards for Best Film, Best Actress, Best Actor, Achievement in Film Music (Thomas Newman), Cinematography, and Editing (Tariq Anwar and Christopher Greenbury), 2000; Broadcast Film Critics Association Awards for Best Director, Best Picture, and Best Original Screenplay, 2000; Chicago Film Critics Association Awards for Best Actor, Best Director, Best Picture, and Most Promising Actor (Wes Bentley), 2000; Directors Guild of America Award for Outstanding Directorial Achievement in Motion Pictures (Sam Mendes, et al.), 2000; Golden Globes for Best Director—Motion Picture, Best Motion Picture—Drama, and Best Screenplay—Motion Picture, 2000; London Critics Circle Awards for Actor of the Year (Kevin Spacey), Actress of the Year (Annette Bening), Director of the Year, Film of the Year, and Screenwriter of the Year, 2000; Screen Actors Guild Awards for Outstanding Performance by a Cast in a Theatrical Motion Picture, Outstanding Performance by a Female Actor in a Leading Role (Annette Bening) and Outstanding Performance by a Male Actor in a Leading Role (Kevin Spacey), 2000; Los Angeles Film Critics Association Awards for Best Director, 1999; National Board of Review Award (USA) for Breakthrough Performance by an Actor (Wes Bentley), 1999; National Society of Film Critics Awards (USA) for Best Cinematography, 1999.

Publications:

Script:

Ball, Alan, American Beauty: The Shooting Script (introduction by director Sam Mendes), New York, 1999.

Articles:

Weinraub, Bernard, "A Wunderkind Discovers the Wonders of Film," in New York Times, 12 September 1999.

McCarthy, Todd, "'American' Dream, Worked Over," in Variety (Los Angeles) 13 September 1999.

Maslin, Janet, "Dad's Dead, and He's Still a Funny Guy," in New York Times, 15 September 1999.

Denby, David, "Transcending the Suburbs: American Beauty Goes from Satire to a Vision of the Sublime," in New Yorker, 20 September 1999.

Marshall, Alexandra, "What's Wrong with this Picture?," in American Prospect (Princeton, NJ), 6 December 1999.

Kemp, Philip, "Sam Mendes' American Beauty: The Nice Man Cometh," in Sight and Sound (London), January 2000.

Jackson, Kevin, "American Beauty," in Sight and Sound (London), February 2000.

* * *

Not since Mike Nichols' Who's Afraid of Virginia Wolfe (1966) has a theatre director made as auspicious a leap to the silver screen as Sam Mendes. Mendes came to Hollywood by way of the London stage, where he directed such hits as The Rise and Fall of Little Voice and The Blue Room. Mendes was hand picked to direct American Beauty by Steven Spielberg, whose DreamWorks SKG (controlled by Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg, and David Geffen) owned the rights to Alan Ball's original screenplay. Although seemingly an odd choice, Mendes' beautifully crafted, superbly acted, and critically acclaimed film proves Spielberg an astute judge of directorial potential.

American Beauty tells the story of Lester Burnham, a mid-level ad man going through a mid-life melt down. Lester lives in the suburbs in a two story house surrounded by a white picket fence. But despite the exterior sheen, all is not well in the Burnham household. Lester is burned out, tired of conforming to the expectations of the American middle class. His wife Carolyn is an emasculating shrew, apparently more concerned about appearing "normal" than being happy. Their daughter Jane is a confused and embittered teen who is saving up for breast enhancement surgery despite already being well endowed. The neighbors on one side are the Fitts family, consisting of the Colonel, a homophobic ex-marine, his wife Barbara, a shattered person, and their son Ricky, a drug dealing video voyeur. On the other side live Jim Olmeyer and Jim Berkley, a gay couple who, ironically, are by far the most "normal" people in the neighborhood. Early in the film Lester meets Jane's friend Angela, on whom he develops a crush that becomes the catalyst for the remainder of the action.

The film's scathing portrayal of American suburbia is neither groundbreaking nor innovative as the suburbs have been the subject of artistic contempt dating back to at least John Cheever's short fiction of the early 1950s. In cinema the suburbs has been skewered for years in exemplary films such as The Graduate (Nichols, 1967), Blue Velvet (Lynch, 1986), and The Ice Storm (Lee, 1997). Furthermore, many of the narrative lines in American Beauty recall earlier films; for example, Lester's voice over from beyond the grave is reminiscent of Joe Gillis' (William Holden) in Sunset Boulevard (Wilder, 1950); his infatuation with Angela has echoes of Lolita (Kubrick, 1962); and Ricky Fitts' video voyeurism is a contemporary version of L.B. "Jeff" Jefferies' (Jimmy Stewart) window watching in Rear Window (Hitchcock, 1954). Despite its stereotypical treatment of suburban malaise and at times derivative narrative, American Beauty is a riveting film; what makes it so is Conrad L. Hall's poetic cinematography, which alternates between Lester's reality and his surreal visions of life as he would like it to be, and its across-the-board phenomenal acting.

American Beauty

While all involved turn in stellar work, two performances in particular stand out: Annette Bening as Carolyn and Kevin Spacey as Lester. Carolyn Burnham is a problematic character for a variety of reasons, not the least of which is the script's inherent misogyny towards her. Carolyn is all shrew, an impossible-to-like screaming control freak. And yet she is in the same position as Lester; life has not at all turned out as she had hoped and the costs extracted have left her hollow on the inside. Just as Lester does, so too does Carolyn deviate from expectations in search of something that will fulfill her. She ends up in an affair with Buddy Kane, a fabulously smarmy real estate

"king," and takes up pistol shooting as a hobby. As written, we're set up to hate her for her transgressions, whereas when Lester deviates we can't help but root for him. Bening nevertheless manages to find in Carolyn something redeeming; her humane portrayal of this uniformly unsympathetic character is a tour de force.

Conversely, the script's sympathy is heavily weighted towards Lester. After meeting Angela, Lester says, "I feel like I've been in a coma for the past twenty years. And I'm just now waking up." His "waking up" involves trading in his Lexus for a 1970 Pontiac Firebird, quitting his ad agency job in favor of counter work at a fast food restaurant, beginning a physical training program that will enable him to "look good naked," which he hopes will make him more attractive to Angela, drinking beer at all hours of the day, a resumption of the pot smoking he loved as a teen, and, most importantly, his reasserting himself as the unquestioned authority figure in the Burnham household. Lester's reversion to a young-girl-loving, beer-swilling jerk is a rehabilitation of the American male as defined by Larry Flynt. But when at one point in the film he defiantly shoves his fist in the air and says, "I rule," audience members, both male and female, cheer; this reaction is a testament to Spacey's interpretation of Lester. He goes beyond what was written and finds in Lester a heart; Spacey's sensitive delivery of Lester's lines, accompanied by telling facial expressions and body language, renders what could have been an irredeemable character a lovable everyman. In accepting the Academy Award for Best Actor, Spacey himself summed up why the award was so richly deserved when he said, "And that's why I loved playing Lester, because we got to see all of his worst qualities and we still grew to love him."

In the end Lester is redeemed, and so too is the film, which because of the craftsmanship of the actors and crew manages to rise well above its stereotypical subject matter. In addition, American Beauty will likely be remembered for three reasons. First, in winning the Academy Award for Best Picture the film legitimized DreamWorks SKG as a studio to be reckoned with. Next, it marked Sam Mendes as filmmaker to watch in coming years. And finally, Kevin Spacey's performance in American Beauty cemented his position as one of the finest actors of his generation.

—Robert Sickels

THE AMERICAN FRIEND

See DER AMERIKANISCHE FREUND

AMERICAN GRAFFITI

USA, 1972

Director: George Lucas

Production: A Universal-Lucasfilm Ltd.-Coppola Production; color, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes. Released 1973. Filmed 1972 in Petaluma and San Rafael, California; cost: about $700,000.

Producers: Francis Ford Coppola and Gary Kurtz; screenplay: George Lucas, Gloria Katz, and Willard Huyck, from an idea by George Lucas; photography: Ron Eveslage and Jan D'Alquen; editors: Verna Fields and Marcia Lucas; sound: Walter Murch; musical score comprised of original versions of several rock-and-roll "classics" from early 1960s.

Cast: Richard Dreyfuss (Curt Henderson); Ron Howard (Steve Bolander); Paul Le Mat (John Milner); Charles Martin Smith (Terry Fields); Cindy Williams (Laurie Henderson); Candy Clark (Debbie); Mackenzie Phillips (Carol); Suzanne Sommers (Girl in T-Bird); Wolfman Jack (Disc jockey); Harrison Ford (Drag racer).

Awards: New York Film Critics Award, Best Screenwriting, 1973; American Film Institute's "100 Years, 100 Movies," 1998.

Publications

Script:

Lucas, George, and others, American Graffiti: A Screenplay, New York, 1973.

Books:

Pollock, Dale, Skywalking: The Life and Films of George Lucas, New York, 1983.

Mabery, D.L., George Lucas, Minneapolis, 1987.

Champlin, Charles, George Lucas; The Creative Impulse: Lucasfilm's First Twenty Years, New York, 1997.

Kline, Sally, George Lucas; Interviews, Jackson, 1999.

White, Dana, George Lucas, Minneapolis, 1999.

Articles:

Dempsey, M., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1973.

Ney, J., in Interview (New York), September 1973.

New York Times, 7 October 1973.

Houston, Beverle, and Marsha Kinder, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1973–74.

Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1974.

Sturhahn, Larry, "The Filming of American Graffiti," in Filmmakers' Newsletter (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), March 1974.

Dawson, Jan, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1974.

Farber, Steven, "George Lucas: The Stinky Kid Hits the Big Time," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1974.

Rosenthal, S., in Focus on Film (London), Spring 1974.

Warner, A., in Films and Filming (London), May 1974.

Segond, J., "Lettre de Londres," in Positif (Paris), September 1974.

Sodowsky, A., and others, "The Epic World of American Graffiti," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), vol. 4, no. 1, 1975.

MacCabe, Colin, "Theory of Film: Principles of Realism and Pleasure," in Screen (London), no. 3, 1976.

"George Lucas," in Current Biography Yearbook, New York, 1978.

Fairchild, Jr., B. H., "Songs of Innocence and Experience: The Blakean Vision of George Lucas," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1979.

Pye, M., and L. Myles, "The Man Who Made Star Wars," in Atlantic Monthly (Boston), March 1979.

Prouty, Howard H., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Harmetz, Aljean, "George Lucas—Burden of Dreams," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), June 1983.

Douin, Jean-Luc, "À toute berzingue," in Télérama (Paris), 26 May 1993.

Speed, Lesley, "Tuesday's Gone: The Nostalgic Teen Film," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 26, no. 1, Spring 1998.

* * *

If Star Wars is George Lucas's idealized dream of the future, American Graffiti is his idealized dream of the past, a past in which optimism and naiveté were cherished sentiments before cynicism became a national past time. What joins these two films, however, is a devotion to entertainment, to the depiction of glorious worlds in which adventure is triumphant.

American Graffiti

With the assistance of Francis Ford Coppola, Lucas's remembrance of teenage life in his home town of Modesto, California was brought to the screen, ushering in a wave of nostalgia for the music and lifestyle of an era ten years past, an era which subsequently became a staple of television situation comedies such as Happy Days and Laverne and Shirley, Ron Howard and Cindy Williams moving easily from this film to their television roles.

The central organizing device of this film is the musical score, permissions for which totalled $80,000 of the $700,000 budget. Music, which functions as the narrator of teen dreams and frustrations, as omnipresent companion, and as motivator of lifestyle, joins the various narrative threads and the three central locales: the hop where you danced to a band, the diner where you played the jukebox, and the strip where you listened to Spiritual Father Wolfman Jack on the car radio. To accentuate the overriding function of the music, Lucas strove for a visual quality which resembled the aura of a 1962 "Hot-Rods-to-Hell" jukebox. For many growing up is a musical experience and, along with Barry Levinson's Diner, American Graffiti is the best evocation of that idea.

The narrative of American Graffiti is that of a day in the life of four central male characters coming of age after indulging in a series of misadventures. Lucas located a mood of optimism and naiveté by setting the film in 1962, the period immediately prior to the Kennedy assassination and the resultant politicization of American youth and music. Naive optimism was so firmly entrenched that individuals refused to admit the necessity for personal development. Curt, whose avowed dream is to shake the hand of JFK, almost succumbs to the complacent notion of "why leave home to find a new home?" At the end of the film, after much indecisiveness, he does leave in pursuit of a future beyond the confines of family and home town. As such he is representative of those students of the sixties who overcame their innocence and ventured forth.

In Lucas's sentimental view of growing up, he lovingly portrayed the innocence and freedom of life-before-twenty and perhaps unwittingly, the seductive mythology of the teen dream. Audiences bought the dream overwhelmingly. American Graffiti grossed over $50 million in its first year, making it, to that point, the most successful film made for under $1 million. Its release in Japan helped foster a booming business there in American musical and fashion nostalgia.

—Doug Tomlinson

AN AMERICAN IN PARIS

USA, 1950

Director: Vincente Minnelli

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Picture Corp.; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 113 minutes. Released 1950. Filmed 1 August 1950 through fall 1950 at MGM studios, Culver City, California; also on location in Paris.

Producer: Arthur Freed; screenplay: Alan Jay Lerner; photography: Al Gilks and John Alton (final ballet); editor: Adrienne Fazan; art directors: Preston Ames and Cedric Gibbons; set decorators: Keogh Gleason and Edwin B. Willis; music: George Gershwin and Ira Gershwin; music directors: Johnny Green and Saul Chaplin; costume designers: Orry-Kelly, Walter Plunkett (Beaux-Arts Ball costumes), Irene Sharaff (final ballet costumes); choreography: Gene Kelly.

Cast: Gene Kelly (Jerry Mulligan); Leslie Caron (Lise Borvier); Oscar Levant (Adam Cook); Georges Guetary (Henri Baurel); Nina Foch (Milo Roberts); Eugene Borden (Georges Mattieu); Martha Bamattre (Mathilde Mattieu); Mary Young (Old woman dancer); Ann Codee (Therese); George Davis (Francola); Hayden Rourke (Tommy Baldwin); Paul Maxey (John McDowd); Dick Wessel (Ben Macrow).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Story and Screenplay, Cinematography—Color, Art Direction—Color, Scoring, Costume Design—Color, 1951; American Film Institute's "100 Years, 100 Movies," 1998.

Publications

Books:

- de la Roche, Catherine, Vincente Minnelli, Wellington, New Zealand, 1959; reprinted in Film Culture (New York), June 1959.
- Griffith, Richard, The Cinema of Gene Kelly, New York, 1962.
- Truchaud, François, Vincente Minnelli, Paris, 1966.
- Springer, John, All Talking, All Singing, All Dancing, New York, 1966.
- Kobal, John, Gotta Sing, Gotta Dance, New York, 1970.
- Burrows, Michael, Gene Kelly: Versatility Personified, St. Austell, Cornwall, 1971.
- Thomas, Lawrence B., The MGM Years, New Rochelle, New York, 1972.
- Knox, Donald, The Magic Factory: How MGM Made "An American in Paris." New York, 1973.
- Hirschhorn, Clive, Gene Kelly: A Biography, London, 1974; revised edition 1984.
- Stern, Lee Edward, The Movie Musical, New York, 1974.
- Delameter, James, Dance in the Hollywood Musical, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.
- Guerif, François, Vincente Minnelli, Paris, 1984.
- Brion, Patrick, and others, Vincente Minnelli, Paris, 1985.
- Minnelli, Vincente, I Remember it Well, Hollywood, 1990.
- Harvey, Stephen, Directed by Vincente Minnelli, New York, 1990.

Naremore, James, The Films of Vincent Minnelli, New York, 1993.

Yudkoff, Alvin, Gene Kelly: A Life of Dance and Dreams, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- Jablonski, Edward, in Films in Review (New York), October 1951.
- Harcourt-Smith, Simon, in Sight and Sound (London), January-March 1952.
- Johnson, A., "The Films of Vincente Minnelli," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1958 and Spring 1959.
- Minnelli, Vincente, "The Rise and Fall of the Film Musical," in Films and Filming (London), January 1962.
- Behlmer, Rudy, "Gene Kelly," in Films in Review (New York), January 1964.
- Cutts, John, "Dancer, Actor, Director," in Films and Filming (London), August-September 1964.
- Truchaud, François, in Télérama (Paris), 13 December 1964.
- Steinhauer, W., "Ruekblende," in Film und Ton (Munich), March 1973.
- Classic Film Collector* (Indiana, Pennsylvania), Fall 1976.
- Johnson, Julia, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Verstraten, P., in Skrien (Amsterdam), February-March 1984.
- Medhurst, Andy, "The Musical," in The Cinema Book, edited by Pam Cook, London, 1985.
- Dalle Vacche, A., "A Painter in Hollywood: Vincente Minnelli's An American in Paris," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), no. 1, 1992.
- Blaney, Dorothy Gulbenkian, "Gene Kelly and the Melting Pot," in USA Today (Arlington, Virginia), 3 August 1992.
- Sharaff, Irene, "Un Américain à Paris," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1996.
- Zetterberg, Anna, in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 38, no. 2, 1996.
- Cohen, Clélia, "Un Américain à Paris," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1997.

* * *

An American in Paris, one of the most successful and popular musicals in the history of film, is also one of the few Technicolor musicals to be taken seriously by critics during the Golden Age of Hollywood when many such films were made. Its grand finale, a 17-minute ballet, focused attention on the fact that films did not have to contain a serious message to be worthy examples of the art form. An American in Paris won the Academy Award for Best Picture of 1951, captured five other Academy Awards, and was placed on most lists of best films for that year. It stands as a prime example of a type of musical collaboration made during the studio system.

Difficult critical questions arise regarding the complicated assigning of credit involved in evaluating such movies. First of all, An American in Paris is an example of "producer cinema," being one of a list of musicals made by the famous Arthur Freed unit at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Freed unit was also responsible for The Bandwagon, Singin' in the Rain, The Pirate, Meet Me in St. Louis, and many others. Secondly, the creative input of star Gene Kelly, who did the choreography of the ballet, is undeniable, as are the myriad contributions made by MGM's outstanding roster of technicians—costume designer Irene Sharaff, cinematographer John Alton, art director Preston Ames, musicians Johnny Green and Saul Chaplin, and many more. Finally, it is most certainly a film by director

An American in Paris

Vincente Minnelli as it contains his recurring theme of characters in pursuit of their dreams, as well as his typical use of color, costume, and decor. Minnelli's musicals are among the most elegant and polished of the MGM musicals and his flair for camera movement, elaborately constructed long takes, and richly styled backgrounds contribute much to the film.

The opening scenes of An American in Paris, in which its characters wake up in "this star called Paris" and go about their daily routines, constitute an homage to Rouben Mamoulian's 1932 film Love Me Tonight. In addition to the famous ballet, the innovative musical numbers contain a subjective characterization of Leslie Caron, presented through music, dance, and color. As she is described, images of her appear on screen, each with a different Gershwin tune, different color, costume, setting and color-coordinated background. She is portrayed as sexy, studious, demure, athletic, etc., while the style of dance interprets her inner quality. Other musical numbers include the pas de deux "Our Love Is Here to Stay," which is a beautiful blend of music, setting, costume, and dance, photographed simply with a tight frame around the two dancers as the camera follows their movements. The old-fashioned "I'll Build a Staircase to Paradise" is a tribute to an earlier tradition, the Ziegfeld Follies musical number. The musical highlight of the film is the ballet itself, which is based visually on a series of famous paintings by Dufy, Utrillo, Toulouse-Lautrec, and others. The ballet's story parallels the film's narrative in an oblique manner. An ex-G.I., who has stayed on in Paris after the war, meets a young French girl, falls in love with her, and loses her. Following the ballet, a brief scene depicts a reconciliation, allowing for the inevitable happy ending.

An American In Paris has undergone something of a critical devaluation in the past decade. Other Minnelli musicals (Meet Me in St. Louis, The Pirate, The Bandwagon) are considered superior works, and the Kelly/Stanley Donen Singin' in the Rain is more popular with general audiences. An American in Paris is frequently criticized as being too sentimental, too romantic and, because of the ballet, too pretentious. Nevertheless, the film undoubtedly contributed to the maturing process of the musical genre. By challenging the idea that audiences would not understand or accept a long ballet deeply linked to the narrative of the film it helped to free the dance visually and to expand the horizons of viewers as well as the creative possibilities for the artists making musical films.

—Jeanine Basinger

DER AMERIKANISCHE FREUND

(The American Friend)

West Germany-France, 1977

Director: Wim Wenders

Production: Road Movies Filmproduktion GmbH (Berlin), Les Films du Losange (Paris), Wim Wenders Produktion (Munich), and Westdeutschen Rundfunk (Cologne); Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 123 minutes (some sources list 127 minutes). Released 1977. Filmed in Paris.

Producer: Wim Wenders; screenplay: Wim Wenders, from the novel Ripley's Game by Patricia Highsmith; photography: Robby Müller; editor: Peter Przygodda; art director: Sickerts; music: Jürgen Knieper.

Cast: Bruno Ganz (Jonathan Zimmerman); Dennis Hopper (Tom Ripley); Lisa Kreuzer (Marianne Zimmerman); Gérard Blain (Raoul Minot); Nicholas Ray (Derwatt); Samuel Fuller (The American); Peter Lilienthal (Marcangelo); Daniel Schmid (Ingraham); Jean Eustache (Man in restaurant); Sandy Whitelaw (Man in Paris); Wim Wenders (Mafia member); Lou Castel (Rodolphe); Andreas Dedecke (Daniel).

Publications

Books:

- Dawson, Jan, Wim Wenders, Toronto, 1976.
 Sandford, John, The New German Cinema, Totowa, New Jersey, 1980.
 Geist, Kathe, The Cinema of Wim Wenders 1967–1977, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.
 Johnston, Sheila, Wim Wenders, London, 1981.
 Boujut, Michel, Wim Wenders, Paris, 1982; 3rd edition, 1986.
 Buchka, Peter, Augen kann man nicht Kaufen: Wim Wenders und seine Filme, Munich, 1983.
 Franklin, James, New German Cinema: From Oberhausen to Hamburg, Boston, 1983.
 Grob, Norbert, Die Formen des filmische Blicks: Wenders: Die frühen Filme, Munich, 1984.
 Phillips, Klaus, editor, New German Filmmakers: From Oberhausen Through the 1970s, New York, 1984.
 Devillers, Jean-Pierre, Berlin, L.A., Berlin: Wim Wenders, Paris, 1985.
 Geist, Kathe, The Cinema of Wim Wenders: From Paris, France, to Paris, Texas, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1988.
 Wenders, Wim, The Logic of Images: Essays and Conversations, translated by Michael Hofmann, London, 1991.
 Kolker, Robert Phillip, The Films of Wim Wenders: Cinema as Vision and Desire, New York, 1993.
 Wenders, Wim, Written in the West, London, 1996.
 Cook, Roger F., and Gerd Gemünden, editors, The Cinema of Wim Wenders: Image, Narrative, and the Postmodern Condition, Detroit, 1997.

Articles:

- Dahan, L., "Wim Wenders," in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1977.
 Moskowitz, G., in Variety (New York), 8 June 1977.
 Niogret, H., in Positif (Paris), July-August 1977.
 Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 23 September 1977.
 Clarens, C., "King of the Road: Wim Wenders Interviewed," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1977.
 Masson, A., "Le Romanesque et le spectaculaire," in Positif (Paris), October 1977.
 Masson, A., and H. Niogret, "Entretien avec Wim Wenders," in Positif (Paris), October 1977.
 Dawson, Jan, "Filming Highsmith," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1977–78.
 Sauvaget, D., in Image et Son (Paris), November 1977.
 Narboni, Jean, "Traquenards," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1977.
 McCreddie, M., in Films in Review (New York), December 1977.
 Jaehne, K., in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1978.
 Winter, L. D., "De emotionele reizen van Wim Wenders," in Skrien (Amsterdam), April 1978.
 Schlunk, J. D., "The Image of America in German Literature and in the New German Film: Wim Wenders Der amerikanische Freund," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1979.
 Kinder, Marsha, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), no. 2, 1979.
 "Im Laden des Bilderrahmers," in Film und Ton (Munich), December 1979.
 Niogret, H., in Positif (Paris), May 1982.
 Torres, A. R., in Cinema Novo (Porto), July-August 1982.
 Linville, S., and K. Casper, "Imitations, Dreams and Origins in Wim Wenders' The American Friend," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), October 1985.
 Snyder, Stephen, "Wim Wenders: The Hunger Artist in America," in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Winter 1987.
 Benoit, C., "L'Ami Américain," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), December 1989.
 Rush, J. S., "Who's In On the Joke: Parody as Hybridized Narrative Discourse," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (New York), nos. 1–2, 1990.
 Schreckenber, E., "Wenn Filme Texte sind," in Filmbulletin (Winterthur), no. 5, 1994.
 Barral, M.A., in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), October 1994.
 Medina de la Serna, R., in Dicine, November/December 1995.
 Saada, N., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Hors serie no. 126, 1995.

* * *

While marketing forged paintings in Hamburg, American expatriate Tom Ripley is introduced to picture-framer Jonathan Zimmermann. Suspecting something of Ripley's shady background, Jonathan snubs him. Ripley is hurt, and when he discovers that Jonathan is suffering from leukaemia, he gives his name to Raoul Minot, a gangster who is looking to pay someone with a clean record to wipe out his rivals. Anxious that his wife Marianne and small son Daniel will have enough to live on after his death, Jonathan accepts Monot's offer. But by this time Ripley, who really wants to be friends with Jonathan, regrets what he has done. However, it is too late, and both become caught up in an increasingly nightmarish scenario involving gangsters, murder, and pornography.

Der Amerikanische Freund

The American Friend continues the twin themes of Kings of the Road: male friendship and the relationship between Germany and America, especially in the area of cinema. This is a film absolutely drenched in cinematic resonances: the animosity-turned-friendship between Ripley and Jonathan is reminiscent of a whole host of romantic Hollywood comedies; the film is based (very loosely) on a novel by Patricia Highsmith, who wrote Strangers on a Train, the plot of which is echoed in the Jonathan/Minot deal; not only is Ripley played by Dennis Hopper, but there are also cameo roles from Sam Fuller and Nicholas Ray, thus evoking the kind of Hollywood cinema loved by European cineastes and cinephiles (Godard's Made in USA was dedicated to Ray and Fuller, and the latter also appeared in it). The Nouvelle Vague connection is further strengthened by Minot being played by Gerard Blain from Truffaut's Les Mistons and Chabrol's Les Cousins, and by a curious similarity with Pierrot le Fou in that both films end with explosions on deserted beaches and a surviving character named Marianne. Jonathan's home contains a model of a Maltese cross (one of the inventions that made cinema possible), a zoetrope, and a lampshade which animates a picture of the locomotive made famous by Buster Keaton's The General. Modern cinema, meanwhile, is represented by the pornographic films (co-productions, naturally) in which the gangsters are involved. And so on.

The American Friend is perhaps best described as a contemporary Franco-German film noir in colour. Like most of its earlier American counterparts it's firmly set in the city, but here the cityscape is European (Hamburg, Paris, Munich) and only briefly American (New York), though one can't but help being reminded of the States when the Sam Fuller character is pushed downstairs in an echo of the famous murder by Richard Widmark in Henry Hathaway's Kiss of Death. And then again, all the cities look alike—that is, American—anyway, inhabited, or rather, passed through, by dislocated, rootless characters with an increasingly shaky sense of personal identity. Wenders himself has explained that he chose a combination of film stock and lenses to “obtain a certain strange, artificial atmosphere” and “an image close to hyperrealism,” and in this he and his cameraman Robby Müller were quite strikingly successful. One is reminded both of Edward Hopper and Hitchcock, and again Wenders has said that he used Hitchcockian framing in order to achieve “archetypes of images that are at the same time realist and artificial.” Indeed, part of the undoubted fascination of The American Friend lies in its extraordinary combination of elements that one associates with the Hollywood cinema and the European art cinema. Wenders has described it as “really dialectical in its attitude to the American cinema: it’s full of love and hatred,” and Timothy Corrigan has elaborated on this point, noting that, on the one hand, there is a “rigorous decomposition of shots throughout the film, a kind of dissecting and emptying . . . whereby the visual excess of so many deep-focus, Hollywood films becomes a flat Wendersian exactitude” whilst, on the other, many shots “recreate the textual brilliance that intentionally echoes and reproduces the texture of so many American films.” Similarly, although the film is superficially a thriller and part of the crime genre, it is visually devoid of conventional psychological explanations, the characters are for the most part extremely ambiguous and hard to read, and the gangster plot lines convoluted to the point of absurdity.

Clearly, then, The American Friend is not just about the uneasy relationship between a particular German and a particular American. It also concerns the relationship between Germany and America. Fears of Americanisation in Germany go back into the nineteenth century (as indeed they do in Britain), and of course the American colonization of the German subconscious has always been a consistent Wenders theme. But this, like his other films, is no simple anti-American parable like Herzog’s Stroszek. Jonathan, like many a Wenders hero, and indeed like the director himself, clearly likes a good deal about American culture and, as Kathe Geist has observed, “far from being a man with no culture, Ripley possesses a rich and vibrant culture which Wenders enthusiastically shows us in Ripley’s dress (blue jeans, cowboy boots, and cowboy hat) and furnishings (a jukebox, Coca-Cola machine, pool table, and neon Canada Dry sign).” If there is American exploitation here it is, to a large extent, accepted and even welcomed. As Corrigan has put it, the relationship between Ripley and Jonathan in the film, like the relationship between the American and German film industries, is less a matter of exploitation and “more accurately described as a series of shared twists, contradictions, and compromises in which one’s responses encourage the other’s actions.” In both the film and the industry, the friendship develops around mutual need, admiration and resentment; in both the film and the industry, the friendship is inherently, to borrow Jean Varboni’s phrase, “a malady of love.” This analogy works extremely well, especially when one considers the problems Wenders faced with Hammert, where he played Jonathan to Coppola’s Ripley.

—Julian Petley

AMOR DE PERDIÇÃO

(Doomed Love)

Portugal, 1978

Director: Manoel de Oliveira

Production: Instituto Portugues de Cinema; color, originally shot in 16mm; running time: 260 minutes. Released 1978. Filmed in Portugal.

Producer: Anabela Goncaldes; screenplay: Manoel de Oliveira, from the novel by Camilo Castelo Branco; photography: Manuel Costa e Silva; editor: Soldeig Nordlund; art director: Antonio Casmiro; music: João Paes and Handel.

Cast: Antonio Sequeira Lopes (Simão Botelho); Cristina Hauser (Tereza); Elsa Wallencamp (Mariana da Cruz); Antonio Costa (Juao de Cruz); Pedro Dinheiro and Manuela de Melo (Narrators).

Publications

Books:

Manoel de Oliveira, Lisbon, 1981.

Franca, J. A., and others, Introdução à de M. de Oliveira, Lisbon, 1982.

Articles:

Desclimont, B., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), series 23, 1979.

Daney, S., “Manoel de Oliveira and Amour de perdition,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1979.

Bassan, R., in Ecran (Paris), 15 June 1979.

Bonnet, J. C., in Cinématographe (Paris), July 1979.

Frenais, J., in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1979.

Bachelier, E., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1979.

Lopes, João, “O voto de Simão e Teresa,” in Diário de Notícias (Lisbon), November 1979.

Ramasse, F., “M. de Oliveira: Le Passé et le present,” in Positif (Paris), March 1980.

Holloway, D., in Variety (New York), 15 October 1980.

Alnaee, K., “Det stillstående kamera,” in Film & Kino (Oslo), no. 4, 1981.

Zunsunegui, S., “Artificio, enunciación, emoción: La obra de M. de Oliveira,” in Contracampo (Madrid), January 1981.

Clarens, C., “Manoel de Oliveira and Doomed Love,” in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1981.

Gillett, John, “Manoel de Oliveira,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1981.

Tesson, C., and J. C. Biette, interview with Oliveira, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1981.

Fonseca, M. S., “M. de Oliveira, o cinema e a crueldade,” in Expresso (Lisbon), October 1981.

Bonnet, J. C., and E. Decaux, interview with Oliveira, in Cinématographe (Paris), November 1981.

Coelho, E. P., “Amor de perdicao,” in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), no. 26, 1989.

Scarpetta, Guy & Rollet, Sylvie, “Manoel de Oliveira,” in Positif (Paris), September 1998.

Avant-Scène Cinéma, January-February 1999.

* * *

At the age of 70 Manoel de Oliveira completed Amor de perdition, a 260-minute version of Camilo Castelo Branco’s 19th-century, hyper-romantic novel of the same name. It was the twelfth film in the career of Portugal's most famous filmmaker, a career which began in 1931.

Amor de perdição

As meticulously as the novel, the film renders events in a procession of extremely long sequence-shots, often between five and ten minutes each. Amor de perdição consciously occupies a precarious historical position: in a style wholly characteristic of the advanced cinema of the 1970s, with a startling original use of the zoom lens, it depicts events of the late 18th and early 19th centuries, mediated by the deliberately anachronistic language of the 1861 novel. The film resonates with allusions to the Iberian pictorial tradition (Velázquez and Goya are the most obvious references), yet it calls attention to the modalities of camera position, shot duration, illusionary movement created by the zoom, and the artificiality of its museum-like sets and occasional painted backdrops. Oliveira is indebted to the major historical films of the previous decade, especially La Prise du pouvoir de Louis XIV, Il gattopardo, and Barry Lyndon in his use of the zoom and his historical distanciation, but he is far more systematic and abstract than his major predecessors. More obviously, he follows Robert Bresson in his cool resistance to imitating the histrionics of the text he adapts; but he avoids the truly radical deflation of drama typical of the later films of Straub and Huillet. Yet, perhaps he has learned something from their early work; for the breathtaking pace with which the Botelho family history is recounted, in elliptical jumps, in the first half hour of the film, recalls the most disorienting moments of Nicht versont. The novel and the film recount the miseries of the star-crossed lovers, Simão Botelho and his neighbor Tereza, whose father forbids their marriage because of a family feud. In an intricate plot, which would be long in summary, Simão goes to jail for killing the man Tereza's father wants her to marry. In jail he is attended by the peasant girl, Mariana da Cruz, whose devotion to him takes the form of obsessive love. Eventually Simão dies en route to the Indies, as a penal worker; Tereza, already withdrawn into a convent, dies as his boat passes; and Mariana jumps overboard to her death. Only Oliveira's genius transmutes this morbid excess into a cinema of sustained beauty and restraint.

Though he shot the film in 16mm because he couldn't afford 35mm for the first time in his career, he exploited the loss of definition and the grain brilliantly. His compositions are consistently artificial, evoking enlarged indoor spaces by posing the characters far from the camera or, following the examples of Velázquez's Las Meninas, using a mirror to reflect offscreen depths. The continual interlacing of the voice-overs of narrators Simão and Tereza bring a stylistic device already abstracted by Bresson and Hanoun to a new level of intensity and abstraction.

The very duration of the film, its plethora of information spread over so many nearly static compositions, the extended meditation on confinement, and the beauty of its deliberate rhythms and compositions make Amor de perdicao one of the most impressive films of the 1970s, and one of the very greatest historical fiction films.

—P. Adams Sitney

AND ... GOD CREATED WOMAN

See ET ... DIEU CREA LA FEMME

AND LIFE GOES ON

(Zendegi Edame Darad; Life and Nothing More)

Iran, 1992

Director: Abbas Kiarostami

Production: Institute for the Intellectual Development of Children and Young Adults; color, 35 mm; running time: 91 minutes (95 in Iran; 108 in Canada); sound: mono. Filmed in Koker and Poshteh, Iran.

Producer: Ali Reza Zarrin; screenplay: Abbas Kiarostami; cinematographer: Hodayun Payvar; editor: Abbas Kiarostami; assistant director: Hassen Afakrimi, Alirfa Akbari, Behram Kadhemi; production supervisor: Nemet Allah Yahifi, Khada Dad Ahmed, Mahrem Fifi; production manager: Sadika Sarfrazian; costume design: Hassan Zahidi; artistic supervisor: Ferched Bachirzada, Djalil Chaabani, Saad Saidi; sound: Abbas Kiarostami, Djenkis Sayed.

Cast: Farhad Kheradmand (Film Director); Buba Bayour (Puya); Hocine Rifahi; Ferhender Feydi; Marhem Feydi; Bahrovz Aydini; Mohamed Hocinerouhi; Hocine Khadem; Maassouma Berouana; Mohamed Reda Berouana; Chahrbanov Chefahi; Youssef Branki; Chahine Ayzen; Mohamed Bezdani; and others.

Publications

Articles:

Libiot, Eric, review in Première (Paris), November 1992.

Ångström, Anna, "Livet efter katastrofen," in Svenska Dagbladet (Sweden), 3 June 1994.

James, Nick, review in Sight and Sound (London), October 1996.

* * *

And Life Goes On is the middle film of a trilogy, preceded by Where Is the Friend's Home? and followed by Through the Olive Trees. The three films (rightly regarded as among the great achievements of contemporary world cinema) are intricately interconnected; only the first might be considered self-sufficient. Briefly, Where Is the Friend's Home? is a straightforward neo-realist film about the predicament of two small boys in an adult world too preoccupied with its own problems to listen to children. And Life Goes On is set in the same district of Iran a year or so later: the great earthquake has intervened, and the director of the first film (played by an actor, and never named within the film) journeys by car with his young son to find out whether the two children who acted the main roles in the previous film have survived. Through the Olive Trees carries the self-reflexiveness even further, at times into quite dizzying convolutions: Kiarostami (played this time by a different actor, though now named) returns again to the area to make a film about the filming of And Life Goes On, partly involving the reconstruction of scenes from that film; at one point, then, we have Kiarostami himself (off screen) directing an actor playing Kiarostami directing the actor who played him in And Life Goes On. With this in mind, it may seem paradoxical to add that the most obvious characteristic of Kiarostami's films is their simplicity. The complications are in the material, never in its filmic realization. If one also wishes to describe his filmmaking as virtuosic, that is again not really a contradiction: the music of Mozart (with which Kiarostami's work, in its emotional delicacy and complexity, might be felt to have an affinity) might also be described as at once simple and virtuosic. Consider, for example, the now famous last shots of both And Life Goes On and Through the Olive Trees, the moments often referred to as "epiphanies": what could be simpler than simply placing the camera in the necessary viewing position and refusing to move it or cut throughout a lengthy action shown in extreme long-shot? And the action itself is as simple as possible: a car trying to climb a steep hill, a young man running to catch up with the woman he loves to propose one last time. Yet the suspense is edge-of-your-seat, the end a whole new beginning, such is the emotional investment asked of the spectator.

Kiarostami's aesthetic roots are in Italian neo-realism (one notes a particular affinity with the greatest of the neo-realists, making it especially appropriate that he was given the Rossellini prize at an Italian film festival). The self-reflexivity comes perhaps from the French New Wave, especially Godard, though it seems so natural to Kiarostami, to arise so logically from his work, that one wonders whether he invented it independently. Where Is the Friend's Home? never calls its (fictional) reality into question. And Life Goes On remains faithful to the basic neo-realist principles, with everything shot on location using non-professional actors ("real people"), yet it is also the interrogation of neo-realism: the figure of the filmmaker now appears in the film, the previous film is revealed as a film, a fiction, and the "real people" were in fact acting: one of them, encountered en route, complains that Kiarostami made him dress and behave quite differently from his everyday self. We are of course free to ask whether Kiarostami told him to say this, especially in retrospect from Through the Olive Trees, in which we see the director insist (against all odds) that the recalcitrant actors speak the lines they have been given.

Yet the levels never cancel each other out. If we are aware of a dislocation between fiction and reality, we are also constantly aware of their close relationship. As the director drives through devastated landscapes, we know that the rubble is real, that the earthquake was a fact, that the two boys could have died, even while we know that we are watching a carefully constructed film and are at liberty to reflect that Kiarostami must already have known whether they were alive or not. We care about finding the boys because we know they are “real” boys from that area, but also because they were the characters from the previous film (which is, after all, how we know them), still bearing their (fictional) emotional weight. Kiarostami demonstrates that it is possible to be completely honest about the fabricated nature of filmmaking (all filmmaking, even documentary) without jeopardizing the possibility of the emotional involvement we look for in fiction. The self-reflexivity functions more as counterpoint than as contradiction.

And Life Goes On

—Robin Wood

ANDALUSIAN DOG

See UN CHIEN ANDALOU

ANDREI RUBLEV

USSR, 1969

Director: Andrei Tarkovsky

Production: Mosfilm Studio (Moscow); black and white with a color sequence, 35mm, Cinemascope; running time: 185 minutes; length: 5180 meters. Released 1969 in France; not released in USSR until 1972 though the film had been screened in Moscow in 1965. The film was censored and re-edited (not by Tarkovsky) several times between production and release in 1969. Filmed 1965.

Screenplay: Andrei Mikhalkov-Konchalovsky and Andrei Tarkovsky; photography: Vadim Youssov; editors: N. Beliaeva and L. Lararev; sound: E. Zelentsova; production designer: Eugueni Tcheriaiev; music: Viatcheslac Ovtchinnikov.

Cast: Anatoli Solonitzine (Rubliov); Ivan Lapikov (Dirill); Nikolai Grinko (Daniel the Black); Nikolai Sergueiev (Theophanes the Greek); Irma Raouch Tarkovskaya (Deaf-mute); Nikolai Bourliaiev (Boriska); Youri Nasarov (Grand Duke); Rolan Bykov (Buffoon); Youri Nikulin (Patrikey); Mikhail Kononov (Fomka); S. Krylov; Sos Sarkissyan; Bolot Eichelanev; N. Grabbe; B. Beijenalie; B. Matisik; A. Oboukhov; Volodia Titov.

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, International Critics Award, 1969.

Publications

Script:

Tarkovsky, Andrei, Andrei Rublev, Paris, 1970.

Books:

Vronskaya, Jeanne, Young Soviet Film Makers, London, 1972.
 Cohen, Louis H., The Cultural-Political Traditions and Development of the Soviet Cinema: 1917–1972, New York, 1974.
 Stoil, Michael Jon, Cinema Beyond the Danube: The Camera and Politics, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1974.
 Liehm, Mira and Antonin, The Most Important Art: East European Film after 1945, Berkeley, 1977.
 Tarkovsky, Andrei, Sculpting in Time: Reflections on the Cinema, London, 1986.
 Borin, Fabrizio, Andrej Tarkovskij, Venice, 1987.
 Jacobsen, Wolfgang, and others, Andrej Tarkovskij, Munich, 1987.
 Le Fanu, Mark, The Cinema of Andrei Tarkovsky, New York, 1987.
 Johnson, Vida T., and Graham Petrie, The Films of Andrei Tarkovsky: A Visual Fugue, Bloomington, Indiana, 1994.
 Goldenberg, Mikhail, V Glubinakh Sudeb Lyudskikh—In the Depths of Destinies, Baltimore, 1999.
Andrei Tarkovsky: Collected Screenplays, London, 1999.

Articles:

Gregor, U., “Schwierigkeiten beim Filmen de Geschichte,” Kinemathek (Germany), no. 41, July 1969.
 Lebedewa, J.A., “Andrej Rubljow und seine Zeit,” Kinemathek (Germany), no. 41, July 1969.
 Tarkovsky, A. “Die bewahrte Zeit,” Kinemathek (Germany), no. 41, July 1969.
 Vronskaya, Jeanne, in Monogram (London), Summer 1971.
 Wiersewski, W., “Artysta na gościńcu epoki: Andrej Rublow,” in Kino (Warsaw), November 1972.
 “Andre Rubliov Issue” of Filmrutan (Sweden), no. 2, 1973.
 Povše, J., “Andrej Rublov—film projekcije po projekciji,” in Ekran (Ljubljana, Yugoslavia), no. 108–110, 1973.
 Cetinjski, M., in Ekran (Ljubljana, Yugoslavia), no. 194–195, 1973.
 Amengual, B., “Allégories et Stalinisme dans quelques films de l’est,” in Positif (Paris), January 1973.
 Gerasimov, Sergei, and others, in Filmkultura (Budapest), March–April 1973.
 Montagu, Ivor, “Man and Experience: Tarkovsky’s World,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1973.
 Tarrat, M., in Films and Filming (London), November 1973.
 O’Hara, J., in Cinema Papers (Australia), 1975.

Grande, M., in Filmcritica (Rome), January–February 1976.
 Rineldi, G., in Cineforum (Bergamo), January–February 1976.
 Prono, F., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), March–April 1976.
 Chapier, Henry, in Cambat (Paris), 20 November 1979, excerpt reprinted in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris) 15 December 1979.
 Ciment, Michel, “Richesse et diversité du nouveau cinéma soviétique,” in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 December 1979.
 Ward, M., “The Idea that Torments and Exhausts,” in Stills (London), Spring 1981.
 Torp Pedersen, B., in Filmrutan (Stockholm), 1984.
 van der Kaap, H., and G. Zuilhof, in Skrien (Amsterdam), Summer 1985.
 Anninskii, L., “Popytka ochishcheniia?” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 1, 1989.
 Illg, E., and L. Noiger, “Vstat’ na lut’,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 2, 1989.
 “Tarkovskijs rad till blivande kolleger,” in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 4, 1989.
 Vinokurova, T., “Khozhdenie po mukam Andreiia Rubleva,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 10, 1989.
 Pistoia, M., “Elogio del piano-sequenza,” in Filmcritica (Rome), January–February 1991.
 Strick, P., “Releasing the Balloon, Raising the Bell,” in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1991.
 Giavarini, L., “Andrei Rublev, un film de Russie,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1991.
 Bleeckere, Sylvain De, “De religiositeit van de beeldcultuur: Tarkovsky and Andrei Roeblev,” Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), February 1992.
 Kovacs, A. B., “Tarkovszkij szellimi utja,” in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 12, 1992.
 Leutrat, J.-L., “Considerations intempestives autour d’Andrei Rublev,” in Positif (Paris), April 1992.
 Meeus, M. “De passie van Andrei,” Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), September 1994.
 Elrick, Ted, “The Prince, the Kid, and the Painter,” DGA Magazine (Los Angeles), vol. 20, no. 2, April/May 1995.
 Schillaci, F., “Lo spazio il tempo nell’opera di Andrej Tarkovskij,” Spettacolo, vol. 46, no. 1, 1996.
 Wiese, I. “Andrej Tarkovskij,” Z (Oslo), no. 1, 1996.
 “Nel giusto mezzo: Andrej Rublev,” Castoro Cinema (Milan), no. 181, January/February 1997.

* * *

Andrei Tarkovsky’s second feature film did not have an easy passage. Conceived and written in the early 1960s and completed in 1966, it finally arrived at Cannes, where it was awarded the International Critics Prize, in 1969. It did not surface in Soviet cinemas until 1972, after the authorities there had attacked it as unhistorical and narratively obscure, and had raised objections to its level of violence. To Western eyes, this attempt to muzzle and belittle what was so obviously a monumental work reeked of pre-perestroika censorship, and epitomized the typical muddle-headedness of the cultural dogma of socialist realism. However, as Ivor Montagu, erstwhile collaborator with Eisenstein, observed in the British Magazine, Sight and Sound, not many European or American directors are given the opportunity to make “colour, widescreen, 3+ hour superproductions” about the intimate life of medieval monks. Although Tarkovsky did remove 14 minutes from his original version, he professed himself happy with the amendments. The oft-stated notion of Tarkovsky as the prophet without honour in his own country, who had to look westward to find confirmation of his merits, must be tempered by the knowledge that he was able to make historical epics like this, science-fiction films (Solaris and Stalker), a war film (Ivan's Childhood), and a highly idiosyncratic personal memoir of childhood (Mirror): these films do not offer much evidence of artistic compromise or of kowtowing to the authorities.

Andrei Rublev

Andrei Rublev was co-scripted by Tarkovsky's fellow Moscow film school graduate, Konchalovsky, and photographed by Vadim Youssov, Tarkovsky's trusted cameraman until he refused to work on Mirror (1974), claiming that the director's script was self-indulgent and unintelligible. Andrei Rublev charts seven episodes in the life of its eponymous hero, an artist and monk who, from the cocooned seclusion of a monastery, is exposed to the horrors of the 15th-century world. In a magical mystery tour, Rublev is confronted with brutality, torture, drunkenness, tartar despoliation, rape, pillage, and famine, but manages to maintain his faith in humanity. Inspired by a young waif, Boriska (played by Nikolai Bourliaiev, the protagonist in Ivan's Childhood, Tarkovsky's first feature, made in 1962), who assumes responsibility for the making of a huge bell, finding and moulding the clay, requisitioning the silver, supervising a veritable army of older and more experienced assistants, all the time aware that if the bell fails to chime he will be put to death by the arch-duke, Rublev learns that, in the midst of social upheaval and wholesale destruction, creativity is still possible.

Perhaps the aspect of Andrei Rublev that most irritated Soviet authorities was its religious iconography. Rublev, being a monk, is necessarily Christian. For Tarkovsky, who as a film director seems to have identified closely with the icon painter, Rublev's creativity and his faith are inextricable: the former is merely the embodiment of the latter. Creativity is not about character or milieu or means of production. In the film it is presented as a mystical transcendent force that must, nonetheless, take into account the exterior world. Throughout the film, counterpointing Rublev and acting as his foil, is a fellow artist, Theophanes the Greek. Theophanes witnesses the same medieval maelstrom as Rublev, but reacts to it in a very different way. Whereas Rublev overcomes his revulsion, and is able to forgive and even to love humanity, Theophanes feels nothing but disgust. He sees human kind as base and fallen, and tries to immure himself. In his isolation, he is the inferior artist.

The film is not an historical record. There are few details extant of Andrei Rublev's life. Tarkovsky and Konchalovsky offer him materiality, a psychology, and an ability to bear witness to his own epoch. And from the virtuoso opening crane-shots, showing a medieval hot-air balloonist, to the tartars' razing of the cathedral, to frenzied pagan ritual, to all the palaver of the building of an enormous bell, Andrei Rublev is on an epic scale. Tarkovsky shows an unerring instinct for filming landscape, for filming the elements. His vision of the middle ages does not seem to allow for the possibility of sunshine; on his grim backcloth, wind and rain are pretty well constant. There is plenty of mud and water in which characters can get stuck, and blood is forever being spilled. There is nothing coy or cosmetic about Tarkovsky's imagined world, nothing too rarefied: this is visceral and violent terrain. Horses—Tarkovsky, like Kurosawa, is an expert at photographing the beasts—gallop up and down the landscape to great effect. Anatoli Solonitzine, Tarkovsky's favourite actor, plays Rublev with quiet and stoical dignity. But Rublev is so impassive and austere a figure, and so taciturn, that it is hard to have much sympathy for him. Though Tarkovsky always claimed that Dovzhenko was the Soviet director he felt most affinity with, Andrei Rublev echoes Eisenstein's Ivan the Terrible and Alexander Nevsky, both in its grandiose reconstruction of a period in Russian history, and in its facility in depicting battle scenes and dealing with crowds.

The jerky jumps between episodes, often shooting us forward a matter of years in an instant, are somewhat bewildering. Tarkovsky's disdain for linear narrative, which he likens to the proof of a geometrical theorem, is well charted. He defended Andrei Rublev from the charge of obscurity by citing Engels, who claimed that the more sophisticated the work, the more intricate was its use of formal device. However, Andrei Rublev does not have the multi-layered narrative of, for example, Mirror, which shifts easily from generation to generation, and from place to place. Three hours of saturnine medieval gloom, even if relieved by a gallery of wonderfully grotesque Breughelian physiognomies, is hard to take. Nonetheless, as a rigorous meditation on faith, art, and creation in a time of fratricide and civil strife, as a moral fable, and as a bravura piece of filmmaking, Andrei Rublev is magnificent.

The film, which has been in black and white, ends with a tremendous explosion of colour as we finally see images of Rublev's celebrated icons, in particular his Trinity, which is to be found at the Trinity-St. Sergius monastery in Zagorsk. These paintings, beautiful and abstracted from the world in which they were created, are the film's justification. Out of degradation, murder, carnage, out of the turbulent landscape of 15th-century Russia, ungodly, riven by civil war, Rublev is able to create sublime and timeless works of art.

—G. C. Macnab

ANGEL WITH THE TRUMPET

See DER ENGEL MIT DER POSAUNE

ANGI VERA

Hungary, 1978

Director: Pál Gábor

Production: MAFILM Objektív Stúdió; color, 35 mm; running time: 92 minutes; language: Hungarian; distributed by Hungarofilm. Released 1978.

Screenplay: Pál Gábor and Endre Vészi; photography: Lajos Koltai; editor: Éva Kármentő; production designer: András Gyürki; costumes: Éva Z. Varga; original music: György Selmeczi; sound: György Fék; assistant director: Dezső Koza.

Cast: Veronika Papp (Vera Angi); Erzsi Pásztor (Anna Traján); Éva Szabó (Mária Muskát); Tamás Dunai (István André); László Horváth (József Neubauer); László Halász (Sas); and others.

Awards: Silver Seashell/Best Director (Pál Gábor), San Sebastián (Spain) International Film Festival, 1979; Audience Award for Best Feature, São Paulo (Brazil) International Film Festival, 1979.

Angi Vera

Publications

Books:

Burns, Bryan, World Cinema: Hungary, Trowbridge, 1996.

Burns, Bryan, Angi Vera, Trowbridge, 1996.

Articles:

Gallagher, Michael, "Angi Vera: A Conversation with Pál Gábor," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 10, no. 2, Spring 1980.

Quart, Leonard, "Angi Vera," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 34, no. 1, Autumn 1980.

* * *

At a compulsory political propaganda session at a hospital in communist Hungary in the fall of 1948 Vera Angi, a shy 18-year-old nursemaid, raises and courageously criticizes the hospital's corruption and its neglect of the patients. Her criticism impresses the comrades, particularly as it legitimates their plans to get rid of some politically untrustworthy doctors. The fact that Vera is an orphan of working-class background is particularly useful—she fits the template for new cadres that the Communist Party is looking to promote. The Party needs people like Vera, and soon she is sent to a six-month long political education course for party functionaries.

Vera is aware of her political ignorance, but she is willing to learn; her "tabula rasa" attitude is particularly welcome by the Party well-wishers. The course also enrolls other upwardly mobile workers. Amidst all of them, however, Vera is the best. She is a natural, a genius of the new political correctness. Rather than making friends with younger women, she is attracted to an older aparatshik—Anna Trajan, a sour old maid—who is preparing to enter the nomenklatura as a newspaper editor-in-chief. Anna's tutelage is crucial—she teaches Vera how to recognize and denounce political untrustworthiness, and how to report on the politically deviant.

One of Vera's classmates, a miner, develops an attraction to her, but she rebuffs him. She is interested in another man instead, the group seminar leader István Andre, a family man. During a party they come close to each other as they dance, holding a small ball between their foreheads, an erotically loaded scene that sharply contrasts with the austere surroundings. Soon thereafter Vera confesses her love to István; he admits he is also attracted to her. That same night she visits him secretly and they have sex. The following day, however, she begins persistently to avoid him. At a criticism and self-criticism party meeting which follows, Vera publicly denounces her affair with István. She claims to be ashamed and blames it all on herself. István is driven to admit his love in public, only to be rebuffed by Vera, who says she does not really love him. István is removed from the course, and a new study group leader takes over.

The others in the group ostracize Vera. During the graduation ceremony, she collapses on the stage. When she comes back to her senses, after the course is over, everyone else have left for their places of origin. She, however, does not have anywhere to go and does not want to return to the hospital. Anna Trajan informs her the Party has decided to make her a journalist as she has proven to be suitable for this responsible profession. She takes Vera away in a car. On the road they pass by one of the women, a fellow student, who does not even want to look at Vera. The concluding shot of the movie shows Vera in a close up, introvertedly looking in front of her. She is alone. She has begun her ascent to her future career.

Angi Vera is the story of an individual's doomed attempt to break free in a society which has banned individuality in principle. Rather than challenging and confronting the system, Vera Angi becomes its voluntary victim. Her crippled personality fits well the psychological profile drafted by the communists. She has rejected human warmth, friendship, and love, and she does not care very much about being alone. She is a monster, subtly indicted by the filmmakers.

The early Stalinist years—the period after the so-called “amalgamation,” the coercive co-optation of all liberal parties under the Communist one—provide the social context for the film. The film, however, treats party politics as an extension of personal politics. The individuals who are the center of attention are concerned about their own survival and are prepared to adjust by swiftly changing political colors. The narrative is structured around collective events, culminating in the depressing party meetings which most people seem to detest but in which Vera learns to thrive. The meetings, at which everybody undergoes harsh scrutiny and self-criticism, are regularly attended by high-placed party comrades. The meetings are designed so that the attendees maintain a constant feeling of unspecified guilt; they cultivate uncritical conformism.

With its exploration of suppressed sexuality and its numerous references to Vera's deprived childhood, Angi Vera is a finely crafted psychological study of an individual in a constraining social context. The exquisite cinematography of Lajos Koltai, István Szabó's regular director of photography, subtly problematizes the relationship between public and private by juxtaposing extreme close ups and scenes of mass gatherings. The gray, dull light of winter afternoons amidst a cold landscape justifies the choice of subdued colors that work greatly to enhance the message of alienation and constraint.

Pál Gábor's next film, the acclaimed but lesser known Wasted Lives (Kettévált mennyezet), (1981), was also set in the 1950s and continued the director's interest in the issues of individual fate in the context of Stalinist confines. This topic has been a defining interest for other leading Hungarian directors as well—for Károly Makk's subtle Love (1979) and Another Way (1982), for Marta Mészáros's utterly personal Diary Trilogy (1982–1990), for Péter Bacsó's satire The Witness (1969) and Oh, Bloody Life!, (1983), and for István Szabó's psychological study, Father (1966). Like Angi Vera, many of these films treat the period from a coming-of-age point of view and offer fine studies of personality formation in a society that demands conformism.

—Dina Iordanova

ANGST ESSEN SEELE AUF

(Ali: Fear Eats the Soul)

West Germany, 1973

Director: Rainer Werner Fassbinder

Production: Tango-Film Productions; color, 35mm; running time: 90 minutes. Released 1973. Filmed in Germany.

Producer: Rainer Werner Fassbinder; screenplay: Rainer Werner Fassbinder; photography: Jürgen Jüges; editor: Thea Eymes; sound: Fritz Müller-Scherz; art director: Rainer Werner Fassbinder; costume designer: Helga Kempke.

Cast: Brigitte Mira (Emmi); El Hedi ben Salem (Ali/El Hedi ben Salem M'Barak Mohammed Mustapha); Barbara Valantin (Barbara); Irm Hermann (Krista); Peter Gauhe (Bruno); Karl Scheydt (Albert); Rainer Werner Fassbinder (Eugen); Marquand Bohm (Herr Gruber); Walter Sedlmayer (Herr Angermeyer); Doris Mattes (Frau Angermeyer); Liselotte Eder (Frau Munchmeyer); Gusti Kreissel (Paula); Elma Karlowa; Anita Bucher; Margit Symo; Katharina Herberg; Lilo Pompeit; Hannes Gromball; Hark Bohm; Rudolf Waldemar; Peter Moland.

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, International Critics' Award (shared with Bresson's Lancelot du Lac), 1974.

Publications

Books:

Limmer, Wolfgang, Fassbinder, Munich, 1973.

Thomsen, Christian, I Fassbinders Spejl, Copenhagen, 1975.

Pflaum, Hans, Das bisschen Realität, das ich brauche: Wir Filme entstehen, Munich, 1976.

Rayns, Tony, Fassbinder, London, 1976.

Peter, Jansen, and Wolfram Schütte, editors, Reihe Film 2: Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Munich, 1979.

Angst essen Seele auf

Sandford, John, The New German Cinema, Totowa, New Jersey, 1980.
 Baer, Harry, Schlafen kann ich, wenn ich tot bin: Das atemlose Leben des Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Cologne, 1982.
 Eckhardt, Bernd, Rainer Werner Fassbinder: Im 17. Jahren 42 Filme—Stationen eines Lebens für den Deutschen Film, Munich, 1982.
 Iden, Peter, and others, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Munich, 1982.
 Raab, Kurt, and Karsten Peters, Die Sehnsucht des Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Munich, 1982.
 Foss, Paul, editor, Fassbinder in Review, Sydney, 1983.
 Franklin, James, New German Cinema: From Oberhausen to Hamburg, Boston, 1983.
 Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, Film Befreien den Kopf: Essays und Arbeitsnotizen, edited by Michael Töteburg, Frankfurt, 1984.
 Hayman, Ronald, Fassbinder: Film-maker, London, 1984.
 Phillips, Klaus, New German Filmmakers: From Oberhausen Through the 1970s, New York, 1984.
 Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, Die Anarchie der Phantasie: Gespräche und Interviews, edited by Michael Töteburg, Frankfurt, 1986.
 Katz, Robert, and Peter Berling, Love Is Colder Than Death: The Life and Times of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, London 1987.

Shattuc, Jane, Television, Tabloids, and Tears: Fassbinder and Popular Culture, Minneapolis, 1995.

Elsaesser, Thomas, Fassbinder's Germany: History, Identity, Subject, Amsterdam, 1996.

Kardish, Laurence, editor, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, New York, 1997.

Articles:

Thomas, Christian Braad, "Fassbinder's Holy Whores," in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1973.

Sander, Helke, "Die Darstellung alter Frauen in Film," in Frauen und Film (Berlin), no. 3, 1974.

Grant, J., in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1974.

Rayns, Tony, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1974.

Amengual, Barthélemy, in Positif (Paris), September 1974.

Hepnerova, E., in Film a Doba (Prague), September 1974.

Sauvaget, D., in Image et Son (Paris), September 1974.

Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 7 October 1974.

Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1974.

- Farber, Manny, and Patricia Patterson, "Rainer Werner Fassbinder," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1975.
- Hughes, John, and Brooks Riley, "A New Realism: Fassbinder Interviewed," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1975.
- Thomas, Paul, "Fassbinder—The Poetry of the Inarticulate," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1976–1977.
- Franklin, James, "Method and Message: Forms of Communication in Fassbinder's Angst essen Seele auf," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1979.
- Santamaria, J. V. G., in Contracampo (Madrid), 1980.
- Stefanoni, L., in Cineforum (Bergamo), January-February 1982.
- Woodward, K. S., "European Anti-Melodrama: Godard, Truffaut, and Fassbinder," in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Winter 1984.
- Hartsough, D., "Cine-feminism Renegotiated: Fassbinder's Ali as Interventionist Cinema," in Wide Angle (Baltimore, Maryland), no. 1, 1990.
- LaValley, A., "The Gay Liberation of Rainer Werner Fassbinder: Male Subjectivity, Male Bodies, Male Lovers," in New German Critique, no. 63, Fall 1994.
- Sharma, S., "Fassbinder's Ali and the Politics of Subject Formation," in Post Script (Commerce, Texas), vol. 14, no. 1–2, 1994–95.
- Reimer, R.C., "Comparison of Douglas Sirk's All That Heaven Allows and Rainer Werner Fassbinder's Ali: Fear Eats the Soul; or, how Hollywood's New England Dropouts Became Germany's Marginalized Other," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 24, no. 3, 1996.
- Medhurst, Andy, "The Long Take," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 6, no. 2, February 1996.

* * *

Rainer Werner Fassbinder's fifteenth film, Angst essen Seele auf, represents perhaps the peak of his renowned domestic melodrama period, bracketed approximately by The Merchant of Four Seasons and Angst von Angst. The story of an improbable romance between Ali, a young black Gastarbeiter in Munich, and Emmi, an elderly, widowed German cleaning woman, Angst essen Seele auf is patterned rather explicitly on the Hollywood "women's pictures" of Douglas Sirk; in this case, All That Heaven Allows, where bourgeois widow Jane Wyman falls in love with her younger gardener, Rock Hudson, and finds herself ostracized by her children as well as the country club set. Admiring Sirk for his ability to deal with interpersonal politics in the context of melodrama (a genre animated by personal crisis in a social/familial context), Fassbinder was equally impressed by the visual stylization of Sirk's mise-en-scène.

Employing a Sirkian stylization in camera angle, framing, color, and lighting, Fassbinder takes on the conventions of melodrama in Angst essen Seele auf, yet exaggerates them in the direction of Bertolt Brecht, emphasizing the social typage of the characters, arranging characters in frozen tableaux at key moments, and distancing the viewer by constantly framing through doorways and in long shot. The effect is to force the contradictions of the story to reveal themselves on an intellectual level, to remove the viewer from the level of pure empathy to that of understanding the ways in which the characters' lives are determined by age, social status, and economic class. Like Sirk's characters, Ali and Emmi face social ostracism for their love—the harassment of neighbors, co-workers, and merchants, and the horror of family and friends. After returning from a trip to get away from it all, they finally find themselves accepted; but only to the extent that returning them to their "proper" social roles allows them to be exploited once again by those around them.

It is a very cold world which Fassbinder depicts, a world in which emotion and love are exploited. Writing on Sirk, Fassbinder (whose first film is appropriately titled Love is Colder Than Death) asserted his conviction that "love is the best, most insidious, most effective instrument of social repression"; and Angst essen Seele auf is an unblinking illustration of his point. Once relieved of the social pressure which brought the lonely Ali and Emmi together, they find their personal relationship determined by many of the the same prejudices and assumptions, playing out their "types" and becoming more like those who despised them.

What emerges is a scathing critique of social repression seen from the lowest rungs of society's ladder. The ungrammatical title, translated literally "fear eat up soul," is a phrase used by Ali to describe the pain he is suffering in his relationship with Emmi, a pain which eventually manifests itself as an ulcerated stomach—a malady, a doctor tells Emmi, suffered by many foreign workers. The irony that this strange, almost grotesque couple must suffer a fate which is normal, typical, and utterly anti-romantic adds a chilling sense of truth to the film's epigraph, "Happiness is not always fun."

It would be incorrect to assert that the analytic aspects of the film preclude an emotional response; for if Fassbinder makes it almost impossible to empathize with Ali and Emmi in the conventional sense, it is only to provoke more deeply disturbing feelings. Fassbinder has been quoted to the effect that "films that say the feelings you believe you have don't really exist, that they are only the sentiments which you think you ought to have as a well-functioning member of society—such films have to be cold." Yet the coldness of Angst essen Seele auf is not emotionless; far from dulling the viewer, it produces a profound shiver, marking the success of Fassbinder in constructing a film which will make audiences both think and feel.

—Ed Lowry

L'ANNÉE DERNIÈRE À MARIENBAD

(Last Year at Marienbad)

France-Italy, 1961

Director: Alain Resnais

Production: Terra Films, Société Nouvelle des Films Cormoran, Argos Films, Précitel, Como Films, Les Films Tamara, Cinetel, Silver Films (Paris), and Cineriz (Rome); black and white, 35mm, Dyaloscope; running time: 100 minutes; English version: 93 minutes. Released September 1961, Paris. Filmed September through November 1960 in Photosonar Studios, Paris, and on location in Munich at various chateaux including Nymphenburg and Schleissheim.

Producer: Pierre Courau and Raymond Froment; screenplay: Alain Robbe-Grillet; main titles: Jean Fouchet; English subtitles: Noele Gillmor; photography: Sacha Vierny; editors: Henri Colpi and Jasmine Chasney; sound: Guy Villette; art director: Jacques Saulnier; music: Francis Seyrig; musical director: André Girard; costume designers: Bernard Evein and Chanel; 2nd assistant director: Volker Schlöndorff.

Cast: Delphine Seyrig (A); Giorgio Albertazzi (X); Sacha Pitoëff (M); Françoise Bertin; Luce Garcia-Ville; Hélène Kornel; Françoise Spira; Karin Toech-Mittler; Pierre Barbaud; Wilhelm Von Deek; Jean Lanier; Gérard Lorin; Davide Montemuri; Gilles Quéant; Gabriel Werner.

Awards: Lion of St. Mark, Venice Film Festival, 1961.

Publications

Scripts:

Robbe-Grillet, Alain, L'Année dernière à Marienbad, Paris 1961; as Last Year at Marienbad, London and New York, 1962.

Books:

Cordier, Stephane, Alain Resnais; ou, La Création au cinéma, Paris, 1961.

Pingaud, Bernard, Alain Resnais, Lyons, 1961.

Bounourre, Gaston, Alain Resnais, Paris, 1962.

Cowie, Peter, Antonioni, Bergman, Resnais, London, 1963.

Miesch, Jean, Robbe-Grillet, Paris, 1965.

Alter, J. V., La Vision du monde d'Alain Robbe-Grillet, Geneva, 1966.

Durgnat, Raymond, Nouvelle Vague: The First Decade, Loughton, Essex, 1966.

Geduld, Harry M., editor, Film Makers on Filmmaking, Bloomington, Indiana, 1967.

Armes, Roy, The Cinema of Alain Resnais, London, 1968.

Graham, Peter, The New Wave, New York, 1968.

Prédal, René, Alain Resnais, Paris, 1968.

Ward, John, Alain Resnais; or, The Theme of Time, New York, 1968.

Bertetto, Paolo, Resnais, Alain Resnais, Italy, 1976.

Kreidl, John Francis, Alain Resnais, Boston, 1977.

Monaco, James, The Role of Imagination, New York, 1978.

Van Wert, William F., In the Theory and Practice of the Ciné-Roman, New York, 1978.

Thiher, Allen, The Cinematic Muse: Critical Studies in the History of French Cinema, London, 1979.

Houston, Beverle, and Marsha Kinder, Self and Cinema: A Transformalist Perspective, New York, 1980.

Sweet, Freddy, The Film Narratives of Alain Resnais, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

Benayoun, Robert, Alain Resnais: Arpenteur de l'imaginaire, Paris, 1980; revised edition, 1986.

Vergerio, Flavio, I film di Alain Resnais, Rome, 1984.

Roob, Jean-Daniel, Alain Resnais: Qui êtes-vous? Lyons, 1986.

Riambau, Esteve, La ciencia y la ficción: El cine de Alain Resnais, Barcelona, 1988.

Thomas, François, L'atelier d'Alain Resnais, Paris, 1989.

Alain Resnais, with Beiträgen von Wolfgang Jacobsen et al., München, 1990.

Instituto Franco-Portuguesa de Lisboa, Alain Resnais, Lisbon, 1992.

Callev, Haim, The Stream of Consciousness in the Films of Alain Resnais, New York, 1997.

Núria Bou, et al, Alain Resnais: viaje al centro de un demiurgo, Barcelona, 1998.

Fleischer, Alain, L'art d'Alain Resnais, Paris, 1998.

Articles:

“Introduction à la méthode d'Alain Resnais et d'Alain Robbe-Grillet,” in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 10 August 1961.

Robbe-Grillet, Alain, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1961.

Interview with Resnais, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1961, reprinted in Films and Filming (London), March 1962.

Labarthe, Andre, “Marienbad Année Zero,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1961.

Brunius, Jacques, and Penelope Houston in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1961–62.

Houston, Penelope, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1961–62.

Colpi, Henri, in New York Film Bulletin, no. 2, 1962.

Labarthe, André, and Jacques Rivette, “A Conversation with Alain Resnais and Alain Robbe-Grillet,” in New York Film Bulletin, no. 2, 1962.

Resnais, Alain, “Trying to Understand My Own Film,” in Films and Filming (London), February 1962.

Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 8 March 1962.

Brunius, Jacques, “Every Year at Marienbad; or, The Discipline of Uncertainty,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1962.

Oxenhandler, Neal, “Marienbad Revisited,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1963.

Taylor, John Russell, “Alain Resnais,” in Cinema Eye, Cinema Ear (New York), 1964.

Stanbrook, Alan, “The Time and Space of Alain Resnais,” in Films and Filming (London), January 1964.

Ollier, Jean, “Film et roman: Problèmes du récit,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1966.

Pingaud, Bernard, “Nouveau roman et nouveau cinéma,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1966.

Roud, Richard, “Memories of Resnais,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1969.

Noguera, Rui, “Interview with Delphine Seyrig,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1969.

Goldmann, Annie, “Muriel” and “L'Année dernière à Marienbad,” in Cinéma et Société (Paris), 1971.

Blumenberg, Richard, “10 Years after Marienbad,” in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1971.

Skoller, D., “Aspects of Cinematic Consciousness,” in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1972.

Harcourt, Peter, “Memory Is Kept Alive with Dreams,” in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1973.

Rocher, D., “Le Symbolisme du noir et blanc dans L'Année dernière à Marienbad,” in Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), nos. 100–103, 1974.

Dupont, G., “Lieux du cinéma: De Versailles à Marienbad,” in Cinématographe (Paris), February 1979.

Armes, Roy, “Ricardou and Last Year at Marienbad,” in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (New York), Winter 1980.

Blaetz, R., “L'impiego della retorica in due film di Resnais,” in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), August-October 1982.

Jones, Elizabeth, “Locating Truth in Film 1940–80,” in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Fall 1986.

Pisters, Patricia, “Passie onder steen,” Skrien (Amsterdam), no. 193, December/January 1993–94.

- Alemaný-Galway, M. "Vid postmodernismens brytpunkt," Filmhaftet (Sverige, Sweden), vol. 23, no. 4, 1995.
- Istomina, E. "Granitsy Marienbada," Istusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 11, 1996.
- Kirsch, Walter, Jr., "Marienbad Revisited: A Feast for the Senses," Creative Screenwriting (Washington D.C.), vol. 3, no. 1, Summer 1996.
- Mason, M., "Dodici armadi per arredare una residenza estiva," Forum, vol. 37, 1997.

* * *

Alain Resnais's Last Year at Marienbad shares, with a handful of other films (notably Truffaut's The 400 Blows and Jules and Jim, Godard's Breathless, and Resnais's own Hiroshima mon amour), the distinction of being a landmark of the French New Wave, and as such, a major influence upon later film styles. Unlike those other films, it remains controversial: it is often dismissed or despised as pretentious nonsense by some while admired as a masterpiece by others. In any case, it remains, far more than the other films, distinctly avant-garde in its conception of narrative.

Co-authorship of the film must be assigned to screenwriter Alain Robbe-Grillet, whose earlier novels (notably Jealousy, 1959) share themes and narrative techniques with Marienbad. Robbe-Grillet's later works—films he directed as well as novels—have an even stronger resemblance to this first screenplay. This is not to deny major credit to Resnais, whose fascination with themes of time and memory runs through virtually all his films, and who had already displayed in an earlier feature and in a series of short subjects a mastery of montage and gliding camera movements characteristic of Marienbad. Marienbad's initial fame was based on certain surface qualities: the baroque palace setting with its eerie formal gardens (Poe's Haunted Palace brought to life), the frozen postures of the guests, the "Marienbad" game the guests play (a brief fad after the film's release), and the puzzling plot of a man ("X") who attempts to convince a languid woman ("A") to leave her sinister husband or lover as—X claims—she had already agreed to do last year at Marienbad. A, however, claims not to know X. A radical feature of the film is the frequent number of flashbacks, and possible flashforwards, which may in fact be fantasy scenes; the subjective visions of X or A or both. The film is also radical in its use of narrative voice. At times descriptions by the voice do not correspond to the actions on the screen; or the narrator's sentence is finished by the dialogue of an actor in an amateur play; or minor characters repeat earlier speeches of the narrator verbatim.

Faced with the impossibility of working out a linear, coherent narrative from this material, some have rejected the entire work as deliberately incoherent, while others have reveled in its intoxicated images and rhythms: the splendid black-and-white cinemascope compositions; the sweeping, occasionally dizzying tracking shots; the abrupt yet controlled contrasts of light and shadow. The film need not, however, be taken as an abstract or "contentless" work. It simply demands to be considered in terms of its significant images and rhythms, and the matters discussed by the characters and the narrator, rather than in terms of a traditional narrative and psychological analysis of the characters.

The film is clearly epistemological in its interests. It is about how one constructs "reality" for oneself, as X evidently so convinces A that they did meet at Marienbad that his possible fantasy becomes her reality. In his valuable preface to his film script, Robbe-Grillet suggests that whatever a film shows is "present tense," unlike the novel's past and conditional tenses; hence what may be X's or A's fantasies become reality not only for them but for the viewer as well. The film can also be said to be about how people attach meanings to existence. Characters in the film discuss the possible symbolism of a mysterious, hauntingly expressive statue. This artwork surely corresponds to the film itself. The viewer must interpret the characters and their motives, must decide what among the scenes witnessed is fantasy or lies, and what, if anything, is fact. Indeed, in the first 15 minutes of the film, the viewer must figure out which of the large number of "guests" investigated by the roaming camera are to be the main characters: the camera teasingly eavesdrops and gives misleading hints.

The film is also about the relation of life to art and artifice. As we make an effort to remember the past, we "freeze" an image of it which is not reality, but a picture, an artwork, or perhaps a fantasy. This epistemological theme is developed by the film not only in its basic drama but in its constant attention to works of art and to the artificiality of the characters: statuary and people who pose like statues; a theatrical production even more stylized than the actual performances in the film; engravings and photographs; and the palace-hotel itself with its formal gardens. The baroque setting is perfect. Its curvilinear forms suggest frozen and symmetrical plant life, while the geometrical gardens are an exceedingly artificial arrangement of real plants. Ultimately the film suggests that perception itself is the creation of artifice.

Marienbad may be read on other, but necessarily incompatible, levels as well. Freudians may see it as a fantasia on an Oedipal triangle, with both veiled and explicit images of sexual violence. Or it may be taken as a drama of entrapment or self-entrapment, like Jean-Paul Sartre's No Exit: a spectacle of people who cannot escape the prison of their own egos or the dominance of others.

It is difficult to trace the precise influence of Marienbad on later films, except for some specific cases such as the films of Robbe-Grillet, beginning with L'Immortelle (1963). Also included are the structures and rhythms in the films of Nicholas Roeg from Performance (1970) to Bad Timing/A Sensual Obsession (1981); and Edward Dmytryk's Mirage (1965), a spy/murder-mystery in which an amnesia victim's memories, actual and false, are periodically flashed forth in Marienbad style. Thanks largely to Marienbad and other films by Resnais, the instant flashback (as opposed to the traditional slow ones signaled by dreamy music and blurred frames) and the interweaving of past and present events in a continuous flow have become a basic part of the vocabulary of contemporary filmmaking.

—Joseph Milicia

ANNIE HALL

USA, 1977

Director: Woody Allen

Production: Jack Rollins-Charles H. Joffe Productions; Deluxe color, 35mm, Panavision; running time: 93 minutes. Released 1977 by United Artists. Filmed 1976 in New York City and Los Angeles.

Annie Hall

Producers: Charles H. Joffe and Jack Rollins with Robert Greenhut and Fred T. Gallo; screenplay: Woody Allen and Marshall Brickman; photography: Gordon Willis; editor: Ralph Rosenblum; sound engineer: James Sabat; production designers: Robert Drumheller and Justin Scoppa Jr.; art director: Mel Bourne; costume designer: Ruth Morley.

Cast: Woody Allen (Alvy Singer); Diane Keaton (Annie Hall); Tony Roberts (Rob); Paul Simon (Tony Lacey); Carol Kane (Allison); Janet Margolin (Robin); Shelley Duvall (Pam); Christopher Walken (Duane Hall); Collen Dewhurst (Annie's mother); Donald Symington (Annie's father); Helen Ludlam (Grammy Hall); Joan Newman (Alvy's mother); Mordecai Lawner (Alvy's father); Jonathan Munk (Alvy as a child); Ruth Volner (Alvy's aunt); Martin Rosenblatt (Alvy's uncle); Hy Ansel (Joey Nichols); Rashel Novikoff (Aunt Tessie); Russell Horton (Man in line at movies); Marshall McLuhan (Himself); Dick Cavett (Himself); Christine Jones (Dorrie); Mary Boland (Miss Reed); Wendy Gerard (Janet); John Doumanian (Man with drugs); Bob Maroff (1st Man in front of the movie theater); Rick Petrucelli (2nd Man in front of the movie theater); Lee Callahan (Cashier); Chris Gampel (Doctor); Mark Lenard (Marine officer); Dan Ruskin (Comic at the "Rallye"); John Glover (Actor friend of Annie's); Bernie Styles (Comic's business manager); Johnny Haymer (Comic); Ved Bandhu (Maharishi); John Dennis Johnston (L.A. policeman); Lauri Bird (Tony Lacey's girl); Jim McKrell, Jeff Goldblum, William Callaway, Roger Newman, Alan Landers, and Dean Sarah Frost (Partygoers); Vince O'Brien (Hotel doctor); Humphrey Davis (Alvy's psychiatrist); Veronica Radburn (Annie's psychiatrist); Robin Mary

Paris (Girl in Alvy's play); Charles Levin (Man in Alvy's play); Wayne Carson (Stage manager of Alvy's play); Michael Karm (Director of Alvy's play); Beverly D'Angelo (Actress in Rob's TV show); Tracy Walter (Actor in Rob's TV show); Sigourney Weaver (Alvy's friend at the movies); Walter Bernstein (Annie's friend at the movies).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Director, Best Actress (Keaton), and Best Original Screenplay, 1977; New York Film Critics' Awards for Best Film, Best Director, Best Actress (Keaton), and Best Screenplay, 1977.

Publications

Script:

Allen, Woody, and Marshall Brickman, Annie Hall, in Four Films of Woody Allen, New York, 1983.

Books:

Jacobs, Diane, But We Need the Eggs: The Magic of Woody Allen, New York, 1982.

Lahr, John, Automatic Vaudeville: Essays on Star Turns, New York, 1984.

Brode, Douglas, Woody Allen: His Films and Career, London, 1985.

Benayoun, Robert, Woody Allen: Beyond Words, London 1987.

Bendazzi, G., The Films of Woody Allen, Florence, 1987.

Jarvie, Ian, Philosophy of the Film: Epistemology, Ontology, Aesthetics, London, 1987.

Navacelle, Thierry de, Woody Allen on Location, London, 1987.

Poger, Nancy, Woody Allen, Boston, 1987.

Cowie, Peter, Annie Hall, London, 1996.

Articles:

McBride, J., in Variety (New York), 30 March 1977.

Drew, B., "Woody Allen Is Feeling Better," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), May 1977.

Trow, G. W. S., "A Film about a Very Funny Man," in Film Comment (New York) May-June 1977.

Malmiaer, P., "Mig og moneterne," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Autumn 1977.

Brown, Geoff, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1977.

Dawson, Jan, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1977.

Karman, M., "Comedy Directors: Interviews with Woody Allen," in Millimeter (New York), October 1977.

Benayoun, Robert, "Le Rire et la culture: Le Citoyen Allen et Spinoza (Annie Hall)," in Positif (Paris), November 1977.

Carrere, E., "Portrait de l'artiste en masochiste serein," in Positif (Paris), November 1977.

Daney, Serge, "Le Cinéphile à la voix forte," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1977.

Garel, A., in Image et Son (Paris), November 1977.

Stuart, A., in Films and Filming (London), November 1977.

Ledgard, R., in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), 1977-78.

- Baker, D., in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), August-September 1978.
- Halberstadt, I., "Scenes from a Mind," in Take One (Montreal), November 1978.
- Yacowar, Maurice, "Forms of Coherence in the Woody Allen Comedies," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 2, 1979.
- Funck, J., "L'Un Dit gestion de ça, voir (sur Annie Hall de Woody Allen)," in Positif (Paris), February 1979.
- Johnson, Timothy, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Median de la Serna, R., "El cine de Woody Allen," in Cine (Mexico City), March 1980.
- Schatz, Thomas, "Annie Hall and the Issue of Modernism," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), July 1982.
- Gallanfer, E., "Moonshine: Love and Enchantment in Annie Hall and Manhattan," in Cineaction (Toronto), Summer 1989.
- Girlanda, E., and A. Tella, "Allen, Manhattan transfert," in Castoro Cinema (Florence), July-August 1990.
- Deleyto, C., "The Narrator and the Narrative: The Evolution of Woody Allen's Film Comedies," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), vol. 19, no. 2, 1994-95.
- Boon, Kevin A., "Scripting Gender. Writing Difference," in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), vol. 4, no. 1, Spring 1997.

* * *

In Annie Hall Woody Allen finally delivered a unified work, one that relied on more than his episodic one-liner format. In the film he brought together many of his past obsessions, among them his love of New York, his lack of affection for L.A., the inability to handle success; but this time, he merged them with an in-depth examination of his feelings about family and relationships. It was as if, after 21 years of Freudian analysis, he finally decided to deal with his neuroses on the screen. Occasionally speaking with a confessional directness that destroys the film's illusion of reality and separates him momentarily from the episodic ramblings of his stream-of-consciousness narrative, he situates the spectator as analyst. Throughout the film the customary Allen episodes are cleverly linked together through memory, with dialogue precipitating flashbacks.

The film opens with a monologue which pays homage to three key individuals: Groucho Marx, Sigmund Freud, and Annie Hall. He pays respects to Groucho, from whom he learned comedy; to Freud, from whom he learned how to deal with his childhood; and to Annie, from whom he learned of both love and despair. At the end of the monologue, he moves from comedy to melancholy as he states: "... Annie and I broke up . . . I keep sifting the pieces of the relationship through my mind . . ." Searching for the answer to the breakup, he begins by sifting through the wreckage of his childhood—a Freudian analysis laced with (Groucho) Marxian wit.

With Annie Hall, Allen the director is absorbed with his past, as is Alvy Singer, the character Allen portrays in this film. He uses many strategies to comment on the past, from interjecting himself as Alvy into a scene aurally, to interjecting himself visually. Early on both strategies are situated. Alvy's first childhood memories concern depression and his recurring difficulty of distinguishing between fantasy and reality. These scenes use a voice-over narration by Alvy as if to dispel any notion that he is unable to distinguish between the two as an adult. Immediately, however, he begins a strategy of interjecting himself physically into the past, proving that the inability does indeed exist. In a classroom scene he moves from observing himself as a child to participating in the scene as an adult attempting to clarify his childhood actions to his classmates.

Another key aspect of the film is Allen's ability to remove himself from the on-screen reality. This he achieves in a number of ways, from voice-over commentary and/or subtitles which contradict the on-screen dialogue, to physically stepping out of the scene either to comment on the narrative action or to correct the flow of events. After Annie and Alvy meet for the first time their dialogue is heard on the soundtrack but their real thoughts are shown in subtitles at the bottom of the screen: while Alvy says "The medium enters in as a condition of the art form itself," a subtitle reads "I don't know what I'm saying—she senses I'm shallow." At other points in the film Alvy simply uses voice-over to comment on the ridiculousness of an on-screen event: when the comic who wants Alvy to write his material minces around the office, Alvy, in voice-over comments, "Look at him mincing around, like he thinks he's real cute . . ." In other scenes he is much more assertive. Unable to bear another moment of academic pretension from a man standing behind him in a theater lobby, he directly addresses the audience: "What do you do when you get stuck in a movie line with a guy like this behind you?" After embarrassing the academic by having Marshall McLuhan step out from behind a marquee to say: "How you got to teach a course in anything is totally amazing," Alvy turns to the camera once again and states: "Boy if life were only like this!"

At the film's end Alvy is writing a play about his breakup with Annie. Where in Manhattan the book he is writing becomes the film we are seeing, here the play he is writing becomes, in retrospect, the film we've just seen. In this film Allen stretched the limits of his narrative technique by developing strategies for showing how the past and present interact in life and art as well as analysis. The film succeeded beyond any of Allen's earlier work, brought new life to the romantic comedy genre, gave American audiences a new leading lady, Diane Keaton, and fashion designers a new look to market.

—Doug Tomlinson

ANTICIPATION OF THE NIGHT

US, 1958

Director: Stan Brakhage

Production: Color, silent, 16mm: running time: 48 minutes.

Producer: Stan Brakhage.

Publications

Books:

- Brakhage, Stan, Metaphors on Vision, Film Culture Inc., 1963.
- Renan, Sheldon, An Introduction to the American Underground Film, New York, 1967.

Brakhage, Stan, A Moving Picture Giving and Taking Book, Frontier Press, 1971.

Sitney, P. Adams, Visionary Film, Oxford and New York, 1979.

James, David E., Allegories of Cinema, Princeton, 1989.

Peterson, James, Dreams of Chaos, Visions of Order, Detroit, 1994.

* * *

Arguably the central film in the Brakhage canon, Anticipation of the Night (1958) inaugurated a radical change in experimental filmmaking techniques and aesthetics. Prior to this film, American experimental cinema employed either a “Trance” (or “Psychodrama”) model, as established by Maya Deren (Meshes of the Afternoon), Kenneth Anger (Fireworks), and Sidney Peterson and James Broughton (The Potted Psalm), or a “Graphic” model, as established (in different forms) by Mary Ellen Bute (Tarantella), Harry Smith (Early Abstractions), and Len Lye (Colour Box). The Trance/Psychodrama approach emphasized surreal, dream narratives of psychological revelation in which the filmmaker typically performed as an on-screen protagonist. This protagonist experienced a literal and metaphorical journey of self-exploration built upon representational imagery that alternated between objective and subjective perspectives. The Graphic approach featured animated, abstract images often hand-applied directly onto the film. The film itself functioned as a scroll which could be “unwound” at different projector speeds or by hand.

In Anticipation of the Night, Stan Brakhage abandoned both models (or perhaps more accurately combined both models) and rejected aesthetic norms for an intensely personal and extremely subjective expression of self that emphasized the various “visions” of the filmmaker. This “Lyrical” approach teasingly appeared in earlier Brakhage films (such as Reflections on Black, The Way to Shadow Garden, and Wonder Ring) and would reach full expression in his 1960s films (such as Thigh Line Lyre Triangular, Window Water Baby Moving, and Dog Star Man), but Anticipation of the Night stands as the first fully realized Lyrical film and a paradigm of the model. Working as a “diary” in which Brakhage recorded the events of his life and his feelings about them, Anticipation of the Night ushered in a new experimental model which synthesized a Romantic mythopoeisis and the reflexive Modernism of Abstract Expressionism.

P. Adams Sitney, one of the central figures of experimental film criticism and author of the seminal text Visionary Film, explains that Lyrical cinema:

... postulates the film-maker behind the camera as the first-person protagonist of the film. The images of the film are what he sees, filmed in such a way that we never forget his presence and we know how he is reacting to his vision. In the lyrical form there is no longer a hero; instead the screen is filled with movement, and that movement, both of the camera and the editing, reverberates with the idea of a man looking. As viewers we see this man’s intense experience of seeing.

This boldly original technique of expressing the impression of sight via an abstracted, first-person point of view resulted in a very poor reception when Anticipation of the Night was first shown (reportedly causing a riot at the 1959 Brussels World Fair). Yet according to Sitney, the great achievement of Anticipation of the Night is exactly this emphasis; its distillation of “an intense and complex interior crisis into an orchestration of sights and associations which cohere in a new formal rhetoric of camera movement and montage.”

In Anticipation of the Night, Brakhage created a film of self-exploration and psychological revelation that did not depend on a journey metaphor, a linear narrative structure, or an on-screen protagonist (although vestiges of these Trance conventions are noticeable). Brakhage strove to communicate a “totality of vision” (what he saw, perceived, felt, imagined, and dreamt) through a complete identification between himself and a “liberated camera.” Using a constantly moving hand-held camera, unfocused images, under- and over-exposure, random compositions, distorting lenses and filters, flash frames, varying camera speeds, fragmented time and space, “plastic cutting,” and in later films, the scratching, bleaching, and painting of the film stock, Brakhage equated the process of filmmaking and the abstraction of reality with the expression of his emotions and imagination (much like the “action painting” of Abstract Expressionism). James Peterson refers to these techniques as a type of “personification strategy” where the film’s manipulation represents the filmmaker’s consciousness. Anticipation of the Night “personifies” Brakhage’s mental state in terms of a purely visual, subjective cinema.

A “difficult” and ambiguous film, Anticipation of the Night does not readily lend itself to an adequate description that can do justice to its poetry; its abstractions and ideas need to be experienced and pondered. Notwithstanding, Brakhage offers an excellent summary that manages to capture the emotions and themes of the film. Writing in Filmwise (1961) he says:

The daylight shadow of a man in movement evokes lights in the night. A rose bowl, held in hand, reflects both sun and moon-like illumination. The opening of a doorway onto trees anticipates the twilight into the night. A child is born on the lawn, born of water, with promissory rainbow, and the wild rose. It becomes the moon and the source of all night light. Lights of the night become young children playing a circular game. The moon moves over a pillared temple to which all lights return. There is seen the sleep of innocents and their animal dreams, becoming their amusement, their circular game, becoming the morning. The trees change color and lose their leaves for the morn, becomes the complexity of branches on which the shadow man hangs himself.

Yet even Brakhage’s description fails to convey the play of textures and light, the excitement of motion, the endearing innocence of children and nature, the giddiness of a carnival, and the non-narrative simultaneity caused by his fragmented “hyper-editing.”

In Metaphors on Vision (which Brakhage began writing while developing the Lyrical mode), Brakhage discusses the psychological and artistic context of Anticipation of the Night. He explains how the film was to be his last about “fulfilling the myth of myself;” that it would function as a way out from the style and themes of the Psychodrama. The journey and suicide of the filmmaker/protagonist marks an end of Brakhage’s early cinema and the start of a new artistic approach (much like Godard’s “end of film/end of cinema” at the close of Weekend). More personally, Brakhage admits to a type of depression which colored the film (and provided its title): “pit seemed as if there was nothing but night out there, and I then thought of all my life as being in anticipation of that night. That night could only cast one shadow for me, could only form itself into one black shape, and that was the hanged man.” Brakhage tells the story of how he accidentally hung himself while shooting the final sequence and what this revealed to him. “I was sure that I had intended for months to finish the editing of Anticipation of the Night up to that point, go out in the yard, climb up on a chair camera in hand, jump off the chair, and while hanging run out as much film as I could, leaving a note saying ‘Attach this to the end of Anticipation of the Night.’”

Sitney’s acclamation that Anticipation of the Night was the “first American film about and structured by the nature of the seeing experience; how one encounters a sight, how it is recalled, how it affects later vision, and where it leads the visionary” may deny the influence of Mary Ellen Bute, Jim Davis, and Marie Menken, but it does stress the importance of light and “untutored” or “innocent” vision in Brakhage’s subsequent work. Brakhage explains this importance in the often quoted opening to Metaphors on Vision:

Imagine an eye unruléd by man-made laws of perspective, an eye unprejudiced by compositional logic, an eye which does not respond to the name of everything but which must know each objected encountered in life through an adventure of perception. . . . Imagine a world alive with incomprehensible objects and shimmering with an endless variety of movement and innumerable gradations of color.

Anticipation of the Night began the examination of this world of intense personal visions and subjective filmic expression.

—Greg S. Faller

ANTÔNIO DAS MORTES

(O dragão da maldade contra o santo guerreiro)

Brazil, 1969

Director: Glauber Rocha

Production: Produções Cinematográficas Mapa; Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 100 minutes. Released June 1969, Rio de Janeiro. Filmed on location in Milagres in the Brazilian Northwest.

Producers: Zelito Viana (executive producer), Claude-Antoine Mapa, and Glauber Rocha; screenplay: Glauber Rocha, from the legends about the bounty hunter who killed the famous bandit Corisco in 1939; photography: Alfonso Beato; editor: Eduardo Escorel; sound: Walter Goulart; art director: Glauber Rocha; music: Marlos Nobre, Walter Queiroz, and Sérgio Ricardo.

Cast: Maurício do Valle (Antônio das Mortes); Odete Lara (Laura); Hugo Carvana (Police Chief Mattos); Othon Bastos (The Professor); Jofre Soares (Colonel Horacio); Lorival Pariz (Coirana); Rosa Maria Penna (Sanata Bárbara); Mário Gusmão (Antão); Vinivius Salvatori (“Mata Vaca”); Emanuel Cavalcanit (Priest); Sante Scaldaferrri (Batista); the people of Milagres.

Awards: Best Director (tied with Vojtech Jasný), Cannes Film Festival, 1969.

Publications

Script:

Rocha, Glauber, Antônio das Mortes, in Roteiros do terceyro mundo, Rio de Janeiro, 1985.

Books:

Second Wave, New York, 1970.

Martinez, Augusto, and Manuel Pere Estremera, Nuevo cine latinoamericano, Barcelona, 1973.

Gerber, Raquel, editor, Glauber Rocha, Rio de Janeiro, 1977.

Rocha, Glauber, Revolução do cinema novo, Rio de Janeiro, 1981.

Johnson, Randall, and Robert Stam, Brazilian Cinema, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1982.

Rocher, Glauber, O seculo do cinema, Rio de Janeiro, 1983.

Bandeira, Roberto, Pequeno dictionario critico do cinema brasileiro, Rio de Janeiro, 1983.

Burton, Julianne, The New Latin American Cinema: An Annotated Bibliography of Sources in English, Spanish, and Portuguese, New York, 1983.

Sarno, Geraldo, Glauber Rocha e o cinema latino-americano, Rio de Janeiro, 1994.

Articles:

Callenbach, Ernest, “Comparative Anatomy of Folk-Myth Films: Robin Hood and Antônio das Mortes,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1969–70.

Interview with Rocha, in Afterimage (New York), April 1970.

Rocha, Glauber, “The Aesthetics of Violence,” in Afterimage (New York), April 1970.

McGuinness, Richard, in Village Voice (New York), 21 May 1970.

Interview with Rocha, in Cineaste (New York), Summer 1970.

Hitchens, Gordon, interview with Rocha, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1970.

Wallington, Mike, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1970.

Fisher, Jack, “Politics by Magic: Antônio das Mortes,” in Film Journal (New York), Spring 1971.

Haakman, A., “Antônio Das Mortes, de mooie revolutie,” in Skoop (The Hague), vol. 8, no. 5, 1972.

Simsolo, Noël, “Antônio das Mortes,” in Image et Son (Paris), March 1972.

Proppe, Hans, and Susan Tarr, “Cinema Novo: Pitfalls of Cultural Nationalism,” in Jump Cut (Chicago), June 1976.

Antônio das Morte

Graham, Bruce, "Music in Glauber Rocha's Films: Brazilian Renaissance, Part 2," in Jump Cut (Chicago), May 1980.

Rocha, Glauber, "The History of Cinema Novo," in Framework (Norwich), Summer 1980.

Mistrion, Deborah, "The Role of Myth in Antônio das Morte," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Fall 1981 and Spring 1982.

Vega, J., "Glauber Rocha: el santo guerrero del cinema novo," in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 134, 1992.

* * *

In his lyric-mythic epic, Antônio das Morte, Glauber Rocha creatively integrates elements of Brazilian popular religious culture, politics, folklore, social history, music, literature, and dance. Because of this thoroughly Brazilian context, the film is difficult for foreign viewers. Furthermore, the emblematic characters are not simple allegories but rather complex, synthetic creations representing real or fictional persons, social types, mystical or mythic motifs, social movements, or ideas.

The complexity of these unusual characterizations is exemplified by the protagonist, Antônio das Morte. This figure had appeared in Rocha's earlier film Deus e o Diabo na Terra do Sol. According to Rocha, Antônio das Morte is based on a historical figure, the bounty-hunter who in 1939 succeeded in killing Corisco, a famous cangaceiro (bandit) of the Northeastern backlands. In the film Antônio first appears as a jagunco (hired gunman) contracted to kill cangaceiros and protect a powerful landowner. After mortally wounding the cangaceiro Coirana, Antônio undergoes a political conversion and becomes a revolutionary who uses his rifle against the forces of oppression represented by the landowner and his hired gunslingers. The ending of the film is ambiguous in terms of the possible future role of the lone revolutionary. Antônio is last seen as a solitary figure walking—rifle in hand—down a backlands highway past a Shell Oil sign; the suggestion may be that a lone gunman can provoke a revolutionary situation in an underdeveloped regional setting, but he will be unable to halt massive exploitation in the new era of the multinationals.

In Antônio das Morte, Rocha reworks the Christian myth of St. George versus the dragon in terms of Brazil's mythical consciousness. The St. George and the dragon myth is announced in the film's opening triptych and alluded to in a closing sequence: in three rapid montage shots. Antônio lances the landowner from horseback. Antônio das Mortes is not the only warrior saint, or St. George figure, in the film. Antão, whose name is similar to Antônio's, is a black associated with Afro-Brazilian religions. Antão's conversion from passive religious follower to armed warrior continues the tradition of black revolt in Brazil.

In order to ritually reenact the St. George and the dragon myth, Rocha theatricalizes the continuity of his film and its mise-en-scène. Many of the scenes take place in stage-like settings such as the cavern-amphitheater or the village square. The costuming, choreography, and the use of color, poetry, and music recall theater and opera. Rocha's method of shooting imitates theatrical time and space. He prefers either lengthy sequences with a few cuts or long sequence shots. Conventional shot-reverse shot or cross-cutting are generally rejected in favor of capturing the scene's significant elements within the shot and the frame.

Rocha has argued that Brazilian filmmakers should not use European and American cinematic strategies and techniques to depict Latin America's unique social problems. In Antônio das Mortes, Rocha seeks to contribute to the decolonization of Brazilian cinema by meshing new cinematic strategies with Brazilian reality. One such strategy is Rocha's use of a Brazilian color code: the bright colors of buildings and costumes are natural and authentic colors that convey cultural significance for Brazilian audiences. During the location filming, Rocha drew directly on the knowledge and experience of the backlanders. The music and the dancing of the Antônio-Coirana duel scene are largely a creation of the local people.

Antônio das Mortes was well received by the Brazilian film-going public. In Europe and the United States, the film was widely acclaimed by critics, and a debate erupted concerning the film's revolutionary qualities (or lack thereof). Today most critics regard the film as one of the greatest achievements—both aesthetically and culturally—of the Brazilian Cinema Novo.

—Dennis West

APARAJITO

See THE APU TRILOGY

THE APARTMENT

USA, 1960

Director: Billy Wilder

Production: Mirisch Company; black and white, Panavision; running time: 125 minutes. Released May 1960.

Producer: Billy Wilder; associate producers: Doane Harrison, I. A. L. Diamond; screenplay: Billy Wilder, I. A. L. Diamond; photography: Joseph LaShelle; editor: Daniel Mandell; sound: Fred Lau; art director: Alexander Trauner; music: Adolph Deutsch.

Cast: Jack Lemmon (C. C. Baxter); Shirley MacLaine (Fran Kubelik); Fred MacMurray (J. D. Sheldrake); Ray Walston (Dobisch); David Lewis (Kirkeby); Jack Kruschen (Dr. Dreyfuss); Joan Shawlee (Sylvia); Edie Adams (Miss Olsen); Hope Holiday (Margie MacDougall);

The Apartment

Johnny Seven (Karl Matuschka); Naomi Stevens (Mrs. Drefuss); Frances Weintraub Lax (Mrs. Lieberman); Joyce Jameson (Blonde); Willard Waterman (Vanderhof); David White (Eichelberger).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Direction, Best Original Story and Screenplay, and Best Editing, 1960. British Film Academy Awards for Best Film and Best Foreign Actor (Lemmon).

Publications

Script:

Wilder, Billy, and I. A. L. Diamond, The Apartment and The Fortune Cookie: Two Screenplays, New York, 1970.

Books:

Madsen, Axel, Billy Wilder, Bloomington, Indiana, 1969.

Baltake, Joe, The Films of Jack Lemmon, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1977; revised edition, 1987.

Seidman, Steve, The Film Career of Billy Wilder, Boston, 1977.

Erens, Patricia, The Films of Shirley MacLaine, South Brunswick, New Jersey, 1978.

Dick, Bernard F., Billy Wilder, Boston, 1980.

Ciment, Michel, Les Conquêteurs d'un nouveau monde: Essais sur le cinéma américain, Paris, 1981.

Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
 Freedland, Michael, Jack Lemmon, London, 1985.
 Jacob, Jerome, Billy Wilder, Paris, 1988.
 Seidl, Claudius, Billy Wilder: Seine Filme, sein Leben, Munich, 1988.
 Armstrong, Richard, Billy Wilder, American Film Realist, Jefferson, North Carolina, 2000.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 18 July 1960.
 P. J. D., in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1960.
 Cutts, John, in Films and Filming (London), September 1960.
 Dyer, Peter John, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1960.
 Douchet, Jean in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1960.
 Domarchi, Jean, and Jean Douchet, "Entretien avec Billy Wilder," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August 1962.
 Onosko, Tom, "Billy Wilder," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Winter 1971.
 Sarris, Andrew, "Billy Wilder, Closet Romanticist," in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1976.
 Tobin, Yann, in Positif (Paris), September 1983.
 Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 29 August 1985.
 Bertoni, Aline, "Billy Wilder on 'la vulgarité congénitale,'" in Revue du Cinéma, no. 422, December 1986.
 Koch, Gertrud, "Alle Sinnlichkeit der Macht. Zu Billy Wilder's The Apartment (1960)," in Frauen und Film (Frankfurt am Main), no. 43, December 1987.
 Denby, D., "Always Making Wisecrackers," in Premiere (New York), November 1990.
 Onaindia, M., "For a method of analysis of the classical cinema script," in Archivos de la Filmoteca, no. 14, June 1993.

* * *

Billy Wilder entered the late period of his career, arguably the richest, with the hugely successful Some Like It Hot; in addition to confirming Jack Lemmon's reputation as a gifted comedian, the film initiated what developed into a long-term professional association between the two. To a degree, The Apartment, a project purportedly conceived as a vehicle for Lemmon, finds Wilder returning to his early 1950s period. Like Sunset Boulevard and Ace in the Hole (The Big Carnival), The Apartment presents a very bleak vision of contemporary American society: fully under the sway of capitalist and patriarchal ideologies, it is a society that pays lip-service to the work ethic and moral integrity but, in actuality, reduces the terms of success to the prostitution of oneself and the exploitation of others. It is a society in which prostitution and exploitation exist in both the professional and personal spheres and what passes for an intimate relationship is often nothing more than a deal or arrangement that benefits the person who holds social and/or economic power.

The Apartment differs from the above-mentioned 1950s dramas in two important ways: 1) the film undercuts the abrasiveness of the earlier works by employing actors who are essentially identified as comedians and mixes the comic and the dramatic mode, although, with the introduction of the Shirley MacLaine/Fred MacMurray relationship, The Apartment becomes predominantly dramatic in tone; 2) Wilder displays a generous and sympathetic attitude towards those characters who are in a powerless position. (This attitude is also found in the highly underrated Kiss Me, Stupid, a particularly pungent piece of satirical social criticism that is, in the main, very broadly drawn. Nevertheless, the Ray Walston and Kim Novak characters, roughly in equivalent positions to those held by Lemmon and MacLaine in The Apartment, are humanized because of Novak's innate integrity and vulnerability and the emotional response it solicits from Walston.) In The Apartment both Lemmon and MacLaine, who are meant to be representative of the "average" young American male and female, are involved in a form of prostitution. In regard to Lemmon, he is advancing up the ladder of the corporate business world by letting higher ranking male employees use, in return for a promotion, his apartment to conduct extra-marital affairs; unlike Lemmon, MacLaine, who is genuinely in love with the married MacMurray, isn't literally practising prostitution although she's led to perceive herself as doing such—in addition to her discovering that she's merely the latest of MacMurray's mistresses, he, in taking leave of her on Christmas Eve to join his wife and family, gives her a hundred dollar bill as a present. (As in Max Ophüls's The Reckless Moment, a film which is also highly critical of American bourgeois society, Wilder undermines the viewer's sentimental notions about the holiday season; MacLaine's suicide attempt, which is provoked by both despair and her sense of degradation, takes place on Christmas Eve.)

While Lemmon is shown to be exploited to the extent that he's willing to be complicit, MacLaine is simply a victim of emotional and sexual exploitation. In contrast, MacMurray, an emblem of the successful male, holds and, at the film's conclusion, retains a position of power and control. The film's devastating critique of the business world is never countered—MacMurray even maintains his image as a faithful husband. (In the film, traditional marriage is shown to be corrupted through the male's practice of the "double standard"; in contrast, the film offers the Jewish couple who are Lemmon's neighbours but these characters are primarily used as stock comic figures.) Although Lemmon regains his moral integrity by refusing MacMurray further access to his apartment when he comprehends how totally indifferent MacMurray is to MacLaine's well-being and happiness, the film doesn't offer any route he may take from there. On the other hand, Lemmon's act, in addition to extricating him from the cycle of prostitution and exploitation, restores to MacLaine the self-respect she has forfeited through her affair with MacMurray. The act also makes her understand the degree to which she values what Lemmon offers her—a relationship in which both partners are on an equal basis. The couple Wilder presents here differs considerably from the conventional heterosexual couple used to give a film its happy ending in the emphasis on companionship rather than romantic love.

Wilder's admiration for Ernst Lubitsch is well known and The Apartment can be seen as his homage to Lubitsch's Shop Around the Corner. Like the Lubitsch film, The Apartment is centred on two characters who are trying to survive in a competitive environment that breeds self-depreciation, loneliness, and alienation. With The Apartment, Wilder matches the delicacy Lubitsch displays in the handling of characterization while retaining his extremely rigorous and uncompromising vision of human existence in the contemporary world.

—Richard Lippe

APOCALYPSE NOW

USA, 1979

Director: Francis Ford Coppola

Production: United Artists; initial release in color, 70mm, Dolby sound; later releases in color, 35mm, Dolby sound with added footage of large-scale air attack which serves as backdrop for credit sequence; running time: 153 minutes, also 139 minutes. Released 1979. Filmed 1976–77, though pre-production work began mid-1975 and post-production lasted until 1979; shot on location in the Philippines; cost: about $30,000,000.

Producer: Francis Ford Coppola; screenplay: John Milius and Francis Ford Coppola suggested by the novella Heart of Darkness by Joseph Conrad; narration: Richard Marks; photography: Vittorio Storaro; editor: Richard Marks; sound: Walter Murch, Mark Berger, Richard Beggs, and Nat Boxer; production designer: Dean Tavoularis; art director: Angelo Graham; original music: Carmine Coppola and Francis Ford Coppola; song: “This Is the End” by the Doors; special effects: A. D. Flowers.

Cast: Marlon Brando (Colonel Walter E. Kurtz); Robert Duvall (Lieutenant Colonel Kilgore); Martin Sheen (Captain Benjamin L. Willard); Frederic Forrest (Chef); Albert Hall (Chief); Sam Bottoms (Lance); Larry Fishburne (Clean); Dennis Hooper (Freelance photographer); G. D. Spradlin (General); Harrison Ford (Colonel).

Awards: Oscars for Best Cinematography and Best Sound, 1979; Palme d’Or (Shared with The Tin Drum), Cannes Film Festival, 1979.

Publications

Script:

Milius, John, and Francis Ford Coppola, L’apocalisse e poi, from the collection Cinema e Cinema, vol. 24, Venice, 1980.

Books:

Coppola, Eleanor, Notes, New York, 1979.

Pye, Michael, and Lynda Myles, The Movie Brats: How the Film Generation Took Over Hollywood, London, 1979.

Kolker, Robert Phillip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.

Adair, Gilbert, Vietnam on Film: From “The Green Berets” to “Apocalypse Now,” New York 1981; revised edition, as Hollywood’s Vietnam, London, 1989.

Thomson, David, Overexposures: The Crisis in American Filmmaking, New York, 1981.

Chaillet, Jean-Paul, and Elizabeth Vincent, Francis Ford Coppola, Paris, 1984.

Zuker, Joel S., Francis Ford Coppola: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.

Frundt, Bodo, and others, Francis Ford Coppola, Munich, 1985.

Belton, John, and Elizabeth Weiss, editors, Film Sound; Theory and Practice, New York, 1985.

Weiss, Ulli, Das neue Hollywood: Francis Ford Coppola, Steven Spielberg, Martin Scorsese, Munich, 1986.

Wood, Robin, Hollywood from Vietnam to Reagan, New York, 1986.

Chown, Jeffrey, Hollywood Auteur; Francis Coppola, New York, 1987.

Palmer, William J., The Films of the 1970s: A Social History, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1987.

Cowie, Peter, Coppola, London, 1989.

Von Gunden, Kenneth, Postmodern Auteurs: Coppola, Lucas, De Palma, Spielberg & Scorsese, Jefferson, 1991.

Lourdeaux, Lee, Italian & Irish Filmmakers in America: Ford, Capra, Coppola & Scorsese, Springfield, 1993.

Lewis, Jon, Whom God Wishes to Destroy: Francis Coppola & The New Hollywood, Durham, 1997.

Bergan, Ronald, Francis Ford Coppola-Close Up: The Making of His Movies, New York, 1998.

French, Karl, Apocalypse Now: The Ultimate A-Z, New York, 1999.

Horsley, Jake, Millennial Blues, from “Apocalypse Now” to “The Matrix”: Vol II, Lanham, 1999.

Articles:

Carcassone, P., “Dossier: 1979: Francis Ford Coppola,” in Cinématographe (Paris), March 1979.

“Testimonianza: La storia di Apocalypse Now,” in Filmcritica (Rome), May 1979.

Anderson, S. H., “Apocalypse Now Film Stuns Cannes,” in New York Times, 21 May 1979.

Haskell, Molly, in Village Voice (New York), 21 May 1979.

Pollack, D., “An Archival Detailing of UA’s Apocalypse Now since 1967 Start,” in Variety (New York), 23 May 1979.

“Entretien avec Francis Ford Coppola,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1979.

Toubiana, Serge, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1979.

McCormick, R., in Cineaste (New York), no. 4, 1979.

Honickel, T., in Film und Ton (Munich), August 1979.

Variety (New York), 15 August 1979.

Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 15 August 1979.

“CinemaScore’s 781 Interviews on Apocalypse Now,” in Variety (New York), 22 August 1979.

Bock, Audie, “Zoetrope and Apocalypse Now,” in American Film (Washington, D.C.), September 1979.

Geng, V., in New Yorker, 3 September 1979.

Kauffmann, Stanley, in New Republic (New York), 15 September 1979.

Thompson, R., “Francis Ford Coppola: Courte histoire d’un scénario: Entretien avec John Milius,” in Ecran (Paris), 15 September 1979.

Riley, B., “Heart Transplant,” in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1979.

Anderson, P. and J. Wells, in Films in Review (New York), October 1979.

Bonitzer, P. and S. Daney, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1979.

Levin, G. R., “Francis Ford Coppola Discusses Apocalypse Now,” in Millimeter (New York), October 1979.

Zimmer, J., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), October 1979.

Wood, Michael, in New York Review of Books, October 1979.

Tessitore, J., “The Literary Roots of Apocalypse Now,” in New York Times, 21 October 1979.

Apocalypse Now

- Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), November 1979.
- Heijs, J., in Skrien (Amsterdam), November 1979.
- Marcus, Greil, "Journey up the River," in Rolling Stone (New York), 1 November 1979.
- Vallely, J., "Martin Sheen: Heart of Darkness, Heart of Gold," in Rolling Stone (New York), 1 November 1979.
- Bitomsky, H., in Filmkritik (Munich), December 1979.
- Jensen, N., "Coppolas dommedag," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Winter 1979.
- Kinder, Marsha, "The Power of Adaptation in Apocalypse Now," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1979–80.
- Yurick, S., "Apocalypse Now/Capital Flow," in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1979–80.
- Broeske, Pat H., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Zablotny, Elaine, "American Insanity—Apocalypse Now," in Film Psychology Review (New York), Winter-Spring 1980.
- Sharrett, C., "Operation Mind Control: Apocalypse Now and the Search for Clarity," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Spring 1980.
- Interview with Coppola, in Cine (Mexico City), March 1980.
- Alutto, Massimo, in Cinema e Cinema (Venice), July-September 1980.
- Boehringer, Kathe, "Banality Now," in Australian Journal of Screen Theory (Kensington, New South Wales), no. 8, 1980.
- Franz, R. C., "Apocalypse Now and The Deer Hunter: The Lies Aren't Over," in Jump Cut (Chicago), October 1980.
- Klein, M., "Apocalypse Now: The Absence of History," in Jump Cut (Chicago), October 1980.
- Rich, B. Ruby, "Apocalypse Now: Coppola's American Way," in Jump Cut (Chicago), October 1980.
- "Apocalypse Now Issue" of Cinema e Cinema (Venice), October-December 1980.
- Vien, N. K., "Apocalypse Now Viewed by a Vietnamese," in Framework (Norwich), Spring 1981.
- Przylipiak, M., "Apokalipsa przed prgiem wielkosci," in Kino (Warsaw), March 1981.
- Jacobs, Diane, "Coppola Films Conrad in Vietnam," in The English Novel and the Movies, edited by Michael Klein and Gillian Parker, New York, 1981.
- Bourget, Jean-Loup, "D'un opéra à l'autre," in Positif (Paris), December 1982.
- De Antonio, Emile, "Interview with Martin Sheen," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), December 1982.
- Wander, P., "The Aesthetics of Fascism," in Journal of Communication (Philadelphia), Spring 1983.
- "Vietnam Issue" of Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 7, no. 4, 1985.
- Viviani, Christian, "Quelques réflexions sur Coppola, histoire de faire le point," in Positif (Paris), January 1987.

- Schneider, Tassilo, "From Cynicism to Self-Pity: Apocalypse Now and Platoon," in Cinefocus (Bloomington, Indiana), no. 2, 1990.
- Guneratne, A. R., "Coppola's Apocalyptic Vision: Something Like an Answer to Tassilo Schneider," in Cinefocus (Bloomington, Indiana), no. 2, 1990.
- Dibble, T., "Another Response to Schneider's 'From Cynicism to Self-Pity . . .,'" in Cinefocus (Bloomington, Indiana), no. 2, 1990.
- Hirshy, Gerri, "The Artist as Big Fat Baby," in GQ—Gentlemen's Quarterly (New York), October 1991.
- Karren, H., "Bungle in the Jungle," in Premiere (New York), Winter 1991.
- Worthy, K., "Hearts of Darkness: Making Art, Making History, Making Money, Making Vietnam," in Cineaste (New York), no. 2-3, 1992.
- Cahir, L. C., "Narratological Parallels in Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness and Francis Ford Coppola's Apocalypse Now," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1992.
- Greiff, L. K., "Soldier, Sailor, Surfer, Chef: Conrad's Ethics and the Margins of Apocalypse Now," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1992.
- Whaley, D. M., "The Hero-Adventurer in the Land of Nam," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1992.
- Uszynski, J., "Poza granicami oikoumene," in Kino (Warsaw), April 1992.
- van Tongeren, P., "The Horror, the Horror. . .," in Skoop (Amsterdam), July-August 1992.
- Kuchta, T.M., "Framing 'The Horror': Voice and Voice-over in Heart of Darkness and Apocalypse Now," in Studies in the Humanities, no. 1, 1994.
- Petri, Elio, "Apocalypse Now," in Positif (Paris), no. 415, September 1995.
- Worthy, K., "Emissaries of Difference: Conrad, Coppola, and Hearts of Darkness," in Women's Studies, no. 2, 1996.
- Film Threat* (Beverly Hills), April 1996.
- Trussler, M., "Apocalypse 'Now': Does Conrad Really Sound Like Jim Morrison?" in Arachne, no. 1, 1997.

Film:

Coppola, Eleanor, Hearts of Darkness: A Filmmaker's Apocalypse, 1991.

* * *

As he set out to plan Apocalypse Now filmmaker Francis Ford Coppola ranked as one of the most important young talents then working in Hollywood. His two Godfather films (1972, 1974) had landed on the list of the most profitable in Hollywood history, while The Conversation (1974) had been hailed as a masterful "art film." In Apocalypse Now Coppola attempted to create both a personal look at America's recent tragic war in Vietnam, and a film which could compete at the box-office with Jaws and The Towering Inferno. As Apocalypse Now moved from the story boards into actual production, however, Coppola's attempt to become a complete popular culture mogul had begun to sour. His considerable investments (in a magazine, movies, and even a legitimate theatre) simply were draining him of his then considerable wealth. Apocalypse Now would have to be a true blockbuster simply to enable Coppola to recover financially and pay off mounting debts.

But Coppola has always been a risk-taker, and his diminishing portfolio hardly lessened his enthusiasm or his ambition. When first conceived the film had been planned as purely an action-adventure war film; quickly it transformed Vietnam into a metaphor for the downfall and corruption of an entire generation of Americans. The budget and screenplay pushed this $12 million potential blockbuster into a $31 million extravaganza. Coppola fully intended Apocalypse Now to be his magnum opus. What actually took place stands as one of the great epic journeys in movie-making history.

Much has been made of how the production of the film seemed to mirror America's involvement in the war itself. Apocalypse Now required four grueling months on location; the film's star Martin Sheen suffered a heart attack; vast arrays of military equipment never seemed to work just right. Coppola's movie company pumped $100,000 per week into production while on location in the Philippines. (In paying the Marcos government for the use of military equipment, however, Coppola was supporting a government as corrupt as the Vietnam regime of Diem.) To meet constant cost overruns (Brando demanded a million dollars for his minor part) Coppola mortgaged his dwindling assets, so if the film failed at the box-office it would be ruin for him. In the end, Apocalypse Now went on to earn about $200 million worldwide, but, in a way, the making of the movie offered a more gripping narrative than the actual movie itself.

The structure of Apocalypse Now was borrowed from Joseph Conrad's novella Heart of Darkness: a journey up a primitive river as a metaphor serving for an excursion into the darkest parts of the human mind. However, Coppola's formulation of this narrative never was able to grip audience interest. The greatest successes of Apocalypse Now can be found in moments of extraordinary visual texture, capturing the look and feel of a war of madness. Whether it is in a jungle where the vegetation dwarfs all human activity, or a PT boat racing up a river filled with black soldiers fighting for the rights of the oppressed when they know what they will find back home, or an armada of helicopters steaming in and destroying a village so primitive it could have been built 2,000 years earlier, we feel, at times, we are actually there.

For example, the scene in which Robert Duvall, as crazed Lieutenant Colonel Kilgore, leads his troops in a helicopter assault on a defenseless village brilliantly portrays the horror and passion of war. As the rockets jump from the war ships, to Wagner's operatic overtones, for a moment we are "in the battle." Yet this particular violence serves no purpose. Duvall's men are mercilessly murdering the very people they are meant to "help."

Apocalypse Now is a film of moments, with a fuzzy monologue by Colonel Kurtz (Brando) at the close never fully wrapping things up. Coppola wanted his film to mean something, and as such raced around the world interpreting for anyone who would listen. (His boldest claim: "This isn't a film about Vietnam. This film is Vietnam.") In the end, as with his best films, Apocalypse Now remains structurally disjointed and thematically inconsistent, yet it will always be watched and studied for its moments of cinematic grandeur.

—Douglas Gomery

THE APU TRILOGY

---

Director: Satyajit Ray

PATHER PANCHALI

(Father Panchali)

India, 1956

Production: Government of West Bengal; black and white, 35mm; running time: 112 minutes. Released 1956. Begun in 1950, though principal filming done in 1952 in a small village in southern India.

Screenplay: Satyajit Ray, from the novel by Bibhuti Bannerji; photography: Subrata Mitra; editor: Dulal Dutta; art director: Bansi Chandragupta; music: Ravi Shankar.

Cast: Kanu Banerji (The Father); Karuna Banerji (The Mother); Subir Banerji (Apu); Uma Das Gupta (The Daughter); Chunibali Devi (Old woman).

Awards: Best Human Document, Cannes Festival, 1956; Selznick Golden, Berlin Festival, 1957; Kinema Jumbo Award as Best Foreign Film, Tokyo Film Festival, 1966; Bodil Award as Best Non-European Film, Denmark, 1966.

Publications

Scripts:

Ray, Satyajit, Pather Panchali, in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 February 1980.

Ray, Satyajit, The Apu Trilogy (in English), Calcutta, 1985.

Books:

Barnouw, Erik, and S. Krishnaswamy, Indian Film, New York 1963; revised edition, 1980.

Seton, Marie, Portrait of a Director—Satyajit Ray, Bloomington, Indiana, 1971.

Wood, Robin, The Apu Trilogy, New York, 1971.

Satyajit Ray, New Delhi, 1976.

Satyajit Ray: Study Guide, Washington, D.C., 1979.

Rangoonwalla, Firoze, Satyajit Ray's Art, New Delhi, 1980.

Micciollo, Henri, Satyajit Ray, Lausanne, 1980.

Das Gupta, Chidananda, editor, Satyajit Ray: An Anthology, New Delhi, 1981.

Gandhy, Behroze, and Paul Willemsen, Indian Cinema, London, 1982.

Ramachandran, T. M., 70 Years of Indian Cinema (1913–1983), Bombay, 1985.

Nyce, Ben, Satyajit Ray: A Study of His Films, New York, 1988.

Robinson, Andrew, Satyajit Ray: The Inner Eye, Berkeley, 1989.

Tesson, Charles, Satyajit Ray, Paris, 1992.

Cooper, Darius, The Cinema of Satyajit Ray: Between Tradition and Modernity, New York, 1999.

Ganguly, Suranjan, Satyajit Ray: In Search of the Modern, Lanham, Maryland, 2000.

Articles:

Ray, Satyajit, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1957.

Seton, Marie, "Journey Through India," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1957.

"Personality of the Month," in Films and Filming (London), December 1957.

Dyer, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), February 1958.

Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), February 1958.

Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), 12 November 1958.

Croce, Arlene, in Film Culture (New York), no. 19, 1959.

McVay, Douglas, "The Ray Trilogy," in Film (London), March-April 1960.

"Talk with the Director," in Newsweek (New York), 26 September 1960.

Rhode, Eric, "Satyajit Ray: A Study," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1961.

Kael, Pauline, in I Lost It at the Movies, New York, 1966.

Ray, Satyajit, "From Film to Film," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), February 1966.

Ray, Satyajit, "A Long Time on the Little Road," in Film Makers on Film Making, edited by Harry Geduld, Bloomington, Indiana, 1967.

Blue, James, "Satyajit Ray," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1968.

Dutta, K., "An Interview with Satyajit Ray's Cinematographers," in Filmmakers' Newsletter (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), January 1975.

Gillett, John, "Satyajit Ray," in Film (London), October-November 1975.

Williams, A., in Movietone News (Seattle), April 1976.

Hughes, John, "A Voyage in India: Satyajit Ray Interviewed," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1976.

Ray, Satyajit, "Dialogue on Film," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), July-August 1978.

"Pather Panchali Issue" of L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 February 1980.

Palekar, S., "So Close to Children," in Cinema in India (Bombay), no. 4, 1992.

APARAJITO

(The Unvanquished)

India, 1957

Production: Epic Films; black and white, 35mm; running time: 108 minutes. Released 1957. Filmed 1956.

Screenplay: Satyajit Ray, from a novel by Bibhuti Bannerji; photography: Subrata Mitra; editor: Dulal Dutta; art director: Bansi Chandragupta; music: Ravi Shankar.

The Apu Trilogy: Apur Sansar

Cast: Kanu Banerji (The Father); Karuna Banerji (The Mother); Pinaki Sen Gupta (Apu, as a boy); Smaran Ghosal (Apu, as an adolescent); Ramani Sen Gupta (1st Uncle); Subodh Ganguly (Headmaster); Ramani Sen Gupta (2nd Uncle).

Awards: Best Film: Lion of St. Mark, Venice Festival, 1957; Bodil Award as Best Non-European Film, Denmark, 1967.

Publications

Articles:

- Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), February 1959.
 Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), 13 May 1959.
 Johnson, Albert, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1959.
 Sarka, Kobita, "Indian Family," in Films and Filming (London), April 1960.
 Sarka, Kobita, "The Great 3-in-1," in Films and Filming (London), December 1964.

Also see list of publications following Pather Panchali credits.

APUR SANSAR

(The World of Apu)

India, 1960

Production: Satyajit Ray Productions; black and white, 35mm; running time: 103 minutes. Released 1959. Filmed 1959.

Screenplay: Satyajit Ray, from a story by Satyajit Ray, based on the novel by Bibhuti Bannerji; photography: Subrata Mitra; editor: Dulal Dutta; art director: Bansi Chandragupta; music: Ravi Shankar.

Cast: Soumitra Chatterjee (Apu); Sharmila Tagore (Wife of Apu); Alok Chakravarty (Kajol); Dhires Mazumaer (Grandfather).

Awards: Sutherland Award Trophy, London Film Festival, 1960.

Publications

Articles:

- Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), March 1960.
 Harker, Jonathan, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1960.
 Croce, Arlene, in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1960.
 Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), 6 October 1960.
 Gillett, John, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1960–61.
 Durgnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), May 1961.
 Hanan, D., ‘‘Patriarchal Discourse in Some Early Films of Satyajit Ray,’’ Deep Focus (Bangalore, India), vol. 3, no. 1, 1990.
 Or, Victor, ‘‘A Study of Asian Tradition in Satyajit Ray’s The World of Apu,’’ Asian Cinema (Drexel Hill, Pennsylvania), vol. 8, no. 2, Winter 1996/97.

Also see list of publications following Pather Panchali credits.

* * *

Satyajit Ray’s Apu Trilogy, made over a period of eight years and not originally conceived of as a trilogy, had a profound effect on filmmaking within India and an important effect on the attention paid to Indian films outside India. Within India, the unobtrusive style of lighting, dialogue, and action employed in the Trilogy challenged the prevailing operatic style and led to new conventions of realism. Abroad, the Trilogy stirred interest in other Indian cinema, and led to a wider market for Indian films as well as to significant contact between Indian and non-Indian filmmakers.

After returning to India from a business trip to London for Keymer’s advertising agency, Ray set about finding a crew and finances for a film based on the famous Bengali novel, Pather Panchali. In his work as a graphic artist, Ray had already illustrated a Bengali abridgement of the novel and he was able to obtain rights for a modest sum (about $1300) on the basis of his active interest. Finances proved more difficult to procure for the film itself: Ray pawned his wife’s jewelry and was finally advanced money to complete the film by the government of West Bengal. For its first two weeks in Calcutta, the film played to small audiences. Then the theater filled and the film recovered its costs in Ray’s native city within the first thirteen weeks. In Bombay, in 1956, the film was reviewed by Adib in the following terms: ‘‘It is banal to compare it with any other Indian picture—for even the best of the pictures produced so far have been cluttered with clichés. Pather Panchali is pure cinema. There is no trace of the theater in it. It does away with plot, with grease and paint, with the slinky charmer and the sultry beauty, with the slapdash hero breaking into song on the slightest provocation or no provocation at all.’’ For many critics, Ray’s completion of Aparajito, in 1956, confirmed the novelty of his approach and the strength of his talent. Stanley Kauffmann reported that Ray was forging in the Apu films the uncreated conscience of his race.

All three films of the trilogy are organized by an open form: the progression of events is episodic and interest in the narrative derives from character and location rather than from the dynamics of plot. In Pather Panchali, the poor Brahmin priest and his wife have a son born to them, the father must leave home to make a living, their daughter dies, the son watches the world change around him, the family is forced to leave the village. The viewer’s attention is engaged less by what is going to happen than by the way in which things do happen. The editing allows the viewer to soak in the atmosphere of a landscape or an evening. As son and daughter (Apu and Durga) run to the edge of the village to watch a steam train, the camera registers soft white tufts of flax waving in the air. When the train appears, it hurtles not only past the village, but across the viewer’s inner rhythms which had been slowed by the waving flax. The episode of the train in Pather Panchali also indicates Ray’s classicism, his practice of creating a strong response in the viewer and subsequently disciplining that response. During the course of the Trilogy, the viewer’s empathetic experience of an event is frequently punctuated by a distancing perspective. In Pather Panchali, when the father breaks down in grief over his dead daughter, Ray cuts to the young Apu standing apart, watching his sorrowing father. In Apur Sansar, Ray cuts from the climactic reconciliation of Apu and his son Kajal to the dour father-in-law, who will add this episode to the many other curious episodes he has witnessed in his life.

The open form also allows Ray to annotate the feelings of his characters by referring to the natural world. At their simplest, these references function as analogies. When Apu’s mother is happy, the water skates and dragonflies dance an insect version of happiness. But at their best, images of the natural world become surcharged with meaning: the monsoon clouds in Pather Panchali gather to themselves the pent-up emotions of the mother and the children; the fireflies in Aparajito signify the beauty and the remoteness of nature; and the river gleaming behind Apu, in Apur Sansar, while Apu debates whether to marry his friend’s cousin, signifies both the burden of the moment and the flow of time into which individual moments run indistinguishably.

Although Ray and his cameraman, Subrata Mitra, made remarkable experiments towards recreating the effect of daylight on sets (by bouncing studio lights off of cotton sheeting stretched above the set), the Apu Trilogy did not constitute innovation in cinematic technique. The excellence of the Trilogy derived from its tact. Using long takes, reaction shots and unhurried action, Ray was able to place in suspension before the viewer multiple points of view: that of the aged aunt who must cadge food to survive and that of the young mother Sarbojaya, who will not extend herself indefinitely and who refuses to help the aged aunt pour water from a pitcher. The multiple points of view are validated by an evenness of regard: the camera attends as calmly to the ailing aunt as to the determined mother, to the grief-stricken father as fully as to the observing Apu.

Ray’s cinema has developed considerably in complexity and scope since the Apu Trilogy. Nonetheless, his first films retain their capacity to move the viewer. Their power derives from the internal consistency of Ray’s style and from the cultural importance of Ray’s story. The Apu Trilogy epitomizes the migration of many poor, Third World families from the village to the city. In the Apu Trilogy, Ray leaves the outcome of the migration open: Apu has not yet made his peace with the brisk anonymous ways of the city as, later, the protagonist of Seemabaddha is to embrace the city’s modernity. When Ray turns, in his mid-career films, to examine the opportunities the city offers to idealistic young men, the optimism of the early films is lost.

In Bengal the effect of Ray’s realism (his scaling of dialogue, action and lighting closer to everyday reality) was felt immediately in the work of Mrinal Sen and Tapan Sinha, but his example took 15 years to reach the principal film production center of Bombay. Only in the late 1960s and early 1970s did new directors begin making Hindi films without melodrama, trusting the subtlety of action, atmosphere and editing to transmit their intentions. The new movement, known as “parallel cinema,” did not defeat the operatic style—most Hindi films are still extravaganzas—but they enabled Hindi cinema to begin inquiry into the conditions of ordinary life in India. The way towards this inquiry was first explored by Ray in the Apu Trilogy.

—Satti Khanna

APUR SANSAR

See THE APU TRILOGY

ARABIAN NIGHTS

See FIORE DELLE MILLE E UNA NOTTE

ARANYER DIN RATRI

(Days and Nights in the Forest)

India, 1969

Director: Satyajit Ray

Production: Priya Films; black and white; running time: 115 minutes. Language: Bengali.

Producer: Nepal Dutta, Ashim Dutta; cinematographer: Soumendu Roy, Purnendu Bose; screenplay: Satyajit Ray, based on a novel by Sunil Ganguly; editor: Dulal Dutta; music: Satyajit Ray; production design: Bansi Chandragupta; art direction: Ashoke Bose; sound: Sujit Sarkar.

Cast: Soumitra Chatterjee (Ashim); Subhendu Chatterjee (Sanjoy); Samit Bhanja (Hari); Robi Ghosh (Sekhar); Pahadi Sanyal (Sadashiv Tripathi); Sharmila Tagore (Aparna); Kaberi Bose (Jaya); Simi Garewal (Duli); Aparna Sen (Hari's former lover).

Publications:

Books:

Seton, Marie, Portrait of a Director: Satyajit Ray, Bloomington, 1971.
 Robinson, Andrew, Satyajit Ray: The Inner Eye, Berkeley, 1992.
 Sarkar, Bidyut, World of Satyajit Ray, Columbia, 1992.
 Banerjee, Tarapada, and Satyajit Ray, Satyajit Ray: A Portrait in Black and White, New York, 1993.
 Banerjee, Surabhi, Satyajit Ray: Beyond the Frame, Flushing, 1996.
 Das, Santi, editor, Satyajit Ray: An Intimate Master, Flushing, 1998.
 Cooper, Darius, The Cinema of Satyajit Ray: Between Tradition and Modernity, Cambridge, 2000.

Articles:

- Milne, Tom, in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 41, no. 1, Winter 1971–1972.
 Interview with Satyajit Ray, in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 42, no. 1, Winter 1972–1973.
 Paul, W., “Dim Day of a Recent Past,” in Village Voice (New York), vol. 18, 12 April 1973.
 Kauffmann, S., “Films,” in The New Republic (Marion), vol. 168, 21 April 1973.
 Schickel, Richard, “Days and Nights in the Art House,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 28, no. 3, May–June 1992.
 Ramnarayan, Gowri, “To Western Audiences, the Filmmaker Satyajit Ray is Synonymous with Indian Cinema,” in Interview, vol. 22, no. 6, June 1992.
 Sengoopta, Chandak, “Satyajit Ray: The Plight of a Third-World Artist,” in American Scholar, vol. 62, no. 2, Spring 1993.
 Ciment, Michel, and Hubert Niogret, “Satyajit Ray,” in Positif (Paris), no. 399, May 1994.
 Sragow, Michael, “An Art Wedded to Truth,” in The Atlantic Monthly, vol. 274, no. 4, October 1994.
 Ganguly, S., “No Moksha: Arcadia Lost in Satyajit Ray’s Days and Nights in the Forest,” in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 19, no. 2, Winter 1994–1995.
 Robinson, Andrew, “Works of a Master Made Whole Again,” in The New York Times, 2 April 1995.
 Sen, Amartya, “Our Culture, Their Culture: Satyajit Ray and the Art of Universalism,” in The New Republic, vol. 214, no. 14, 1 April 1996.
 Corliss, Richard, “From Asia’s Film Factories: 10 Golden Greats,” in Time International, vol. 154, no. 7/8, 23 August 1999.

* * *

Satyajit Ray always insisted that his films were made first and foremost for his own fellow-Bengalis, adding that foreign viewers, unless exceptionally well up on Bengali language and culture, would inevitably miss a lot of what was going on. Despite such claims, several of Ray’s films found more appreciative (and, it could be argued, more perceptive) audiences outside India. One such was Days and Nights in the Forest, widely hailed by Western critics as one of the director’s finest films, but received by his compatriots with puzzlement and indifference.

Indian viewers, by all accounts, were put off by the loose-limbed, seemingly random flow of the narrative. “People in India kept saying: What is it about, where is the story, the theme?” Ray observed regretfully in a Sight & Sound interview. “And the film is about so many things, that’s the trouble. People want just one theme, which they can hold in their hands.” He likened the structure of the film to a fugue, in which different elements appear and reappear developed, interwoven, transformed, and subtly balanced against each other.

The musical analogy is apt. Ray often acknowledged the influence of composers, above all Mozart, along with that of writers and other film-makers, and Days and Nights is his most Mozartian work: like

Aranyer din Ratri

Così Fan Tutte or La Nozze di Figaro it treats serious matters in a seemingly light-hearted way. On the surface the mode is comedy of manners. Four middle-class young men from Calcutta take a few days vacation in the forests of Bihar, to the west of Bengal, where they meet another group of city people—elderly father, daughter, and widowed daughter-in-law—as well as beautiful young woman of the local Santhal tribe. There ensues a complex pattern of social cross-currents and tentative relationships. Ashim (played by Soumitra Chatterjee), the most affluent and assured of the young men, is attracted to the poised and intelligent Aparna (Sharmila Tagore). Jaya, the young widow, tries to seduce the shy Sanjoy but humiliatingly fails. Hari, the none-too-bright sportsman, seduces the Santhali woman, Duli, and is badly beaten by one of her fellow-villagers. Sekhar (another of Ray's favourite actors, the roly-poly Robi Ghosh) gambles compulsively and plays the fool.

The heart of the film is the picnic sequence, where the six young Calcuttans sit round and play a memory game in which each player has to choose the name of a famous person and also remember, in sequence, all the previous choices. Subtle, elegantly structured, and delectably funny, the scene discloses a wealth of emotional and psychological detail: like the various members of a sextet, each character reveals him- or herself in the way he or she plays, from Aparna's graceful flute to Sekhar's galumphing bassoon. The scene shows us a process of insight getting under way. By the end of the film each of the young men—with the exception of Sekhar—has experienced a moment of epiphany, brought up short by self-realization. None of them, we can guess, will ever be quite the same again.

But there's also a political dimension to the film. Days and Nights can be seen as a prelude to the three films often grouped together as Ray's "City Trilogy": The Adversary, Company Limited, and The Middleman. In these films Ray engaged, for the first time in his career, the social and political upheavals that were then shaking Bengal, and in Days and Nights he hints at the kind of class- and caste-based attitudes that underlay this unrest. The four young men from the city are not unlikable, but their treatment of the local "tribal" people reveals an unthinking arrogance that at times verges on brutality. Hari, having mislaid his wallet, at once accuses the villager co-opted as their servant of stealing it, and hits him—an injustice which later rebounds on him. Even Ashim, the most intelligent and politically aware of the four, browbeats the caretaker of their bungalow into accepting a bribe, then mockingly comments (in English, significantly), "Thank God for corruption."

As so often in Ray's films, the women come off rather better than the men, being far more adult, sensitive, and attuned to what's going on around them. In particular, Ray uses Sharmila Tagore's cool, intelligent screen persona as the film's moral touchstone (as he would again in Company Limited); it is Aparna who brings home to Ashim the full extent of his thoughtlessness. Having brushed aside as excuses the caretaker's concern about his sick wife, he's taken aback when Aparna suggests he should look for himself—and appalled when he sees that the woman is close to death. It's a moment that anticipates the similar shock felt by the complacent young Brahmin (also played by Soumitra Chatterjee) in Distant Thunder when he registers the ravages of famine on his fellow villagers.

Days and Nights in the Forest marks a transition in Ray's filmmaking career, turning his talents for social comedy, emotional nuance, and quiet, understated irony towards more contemporary concerns. At the same time it demonstrates the subtlety of his narrative control, concealing a carefully devised dramatic shape beneath the seemingly casual flow of everyday life. Far from being shapeless or lacking a theme, as its first audiences imagined, the film is subtly orchestrated throughout: there isn't a scene or incident, barely even a gesture, that doesn't contribute to the overall purpose.

—Philip Kemp

L'ARGENT

France, 1929

Director: Marcel L'Herbier

Production: Cinemondial and Cineromans; black and white, 35mm, silent; length: 5344 meters, running time: 195 minutes. Released 10 January 1929. Filmed in Francouer studios at Joinville; exteriors shot at La Bourse, Place de l'Opera, the Paris Stock Exchange, and Le Bourget; cost: more than 3 million francs.

Producer: Simon Schiffrin; screenplay: Marcel L'Herbier, from the novel by Emile Zola; photography: Jules Kruger; production designers: Lazare Meerson and André Barsacq; art director: Jacques Manuel; costume designer: Jacques Manuel.

Cast: Mary Glory (Line Hamelin); Brigitte Helm (Baron Sandorf); Yvette Guilbert (Le Méchain); Marcelle Pradot (Countess Alice de Beauvilliers); Esther Kiss, Elaine Tayar, and Josette Racon (Switchboard operators); Mona Goya, Yvonne Dumas, Maries Costes (Extras); Pierre Alcover (Nicolas Saccard); Alfred Abel (Alphonse Gunderman, the banker); Henry Victor (Jacques Hamelin); Pierre Juvenet (Baron Defrance); Antonin Artaud (Mazaud); Jules Berry (Huret, the reporter); Alexandre Mihalesco (Salomon Massias); Raymond Rouleau (Jantrou); Jean Godard (Dejoie); Armand Bour (Daigremont); Roger Karl (Banker); Jimmy Gaillard (The groom); plus Les Rocky Twins, Raymond Dubreuil, Garaudet, and Tardif.

Publications

Script:

L'Herbier, Marcel, L'Argent (includes list of scenes, some dialogue), in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 June 1978.

Books:

Jaque-Catelain présente Marcel L'Herbier, Paris, 1950.

Sadoul, Georges, French Film, London, 1953.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema, New York, 1970.

Burch, Noël, Marcel L'Herbier, Paris, 1973.

Brossard, Jean-Pierre, editor, Marcel L'Herbier et son temps, La-Chaux-de-Fonds, Switzerland, 1980.

Canosa, Michele, Marcel L'Herbier, Parma, 1985.

Articles:

New York Times, 23 September 1968.

Blumer, R. H., "The Camera as Snowball: France 1918–1927," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1970.

Jouvet, P., in Cinématographe (Paris), May 1977.

"L'Argent Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 June 1978.

Trosa, S., "Archéologie du cinéma," in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1978.

Petat, J., "La Gratuité de L'Argent," in Cinéma (Paris), March 1979.

Fieschi, J., "Marcel L'Herbier," in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1979.

Cousins, R. F., "Adapting Zola for the Silent Cinema: The Example of Marcel L'Herbier," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1984.

Ciment, Michel, "Je ne cherche pas une description mais une vision des choses," in Positif (Paris), no. 430, December 1996.

Le Clezian, J-M. G., "A penz," in Filmvilag (Hungary), vol. 40, no. 10, 1997.

Marcel L'Herbier is a key figure of 1920s French cinema and his modernization of Emile Zola's novel, L'Argent, released in 1929 on the eve of the sound revolution, is his most ambitious work. The scope of the film is inspired by Abel Gance's Napoléon, but rather than talk of heroes, L'Herbier has chosen to attack what he hated most, the power of money. Though he took Zola's novel as his starting point, he retained little beyond the title and the outline of the plot. The film's action is transferred to the 1920s and unfolds within opulent, oversized sets built by Lazare Meerson and André Barsacq. The film's largest set, however, is an actual location, the Paris Stock Exchange borrowed for three days over Easter and filmed with a complex multi-camera technique by a team led by Jules Kruger, who had earlier worked on Napoléon. The visual style, echoing the major spectacles of 1920s German cinema, is enhanced by the presence of Brigitte Helm and Alfred Abel, as the villains in L'Herbier's cast. Despite the enormous resources deployed—the film cost over three million francs—L'Argent's plot line is remarkably straightforward: a young aviator and his wife become involved in a dubious financial scheme set up by the lecherous and unscrupulous Saccard. The latter in turn is destroyed by an even more sinister figure, the banker Gunderman, abetted by the Baroness Sandorf. Though thwarted in his attempt to seduce the wife and destroy the aviator when he is ruined, Saccard is left in prison plotting his next financial coup, while Gunderman rules untroubled.

L'Argent

The 1920s was a period in which directors like Gance and L'Herbier seized the opportunities for individual expression offered by the disorganization of the French film industry. This was a cinema in which the key contributions of noted set designers were set against a continuing interest in location filming. As L'Argent shows, a preoccupation with visual effects—decor and movement, masking and superimpositions, slow motion photography, symbolic lighting and so on—did not imply any disregard for the real social world or for nature. L'Argent was not particularly highly esteemed by traditional film historians, but recent critical work, especially that of Noël Burch, has pointed to the great richness of the film even if the “modernity” claimed for it remains a problematic concept.

L'Herbier, like other 1920s filmmakers, refused to subordinate the visual style of his filmmaking to the demands of narrative continuity, which was already dominant in the United States and elsewhere. The type of cinema of which L'Argent is a key example can only be understood if the claims to primacy of narrative are disregarded and film is accepted as a mode of expression which may legitimately captivate its audience by other means. In this sense a work like L'Argent forces upon us a widening of the conception of cinema to take in forms fundamentally alien to the Hollywood tradition. The question of what value is to be attached to this alternative approach is, however, more complex. Noël Burch and others have prized L'Argent very highly as an example of a vitally important modernist cinema. But in a sense this distorts history, since the conventions L'Herbier was disregarding were not as fully established in France, and the Hollywood-style production practices which would have supported them were totally lacking. Moreover the weight of 19th-century traditions of art and literature weighs heavily on L'Herbier, and a true evaluation of L'Argent would need to take into account also the conventional content, subject matter and ideological assumptions, as well as the visual and rhythmical audacities. But Burch's claims do make a refreshing alternative to the customary denigration of 1920s French cinema and open fascinating perspectives for future research.

—Roy Armes

L'ARROSEUR ARROSE

(The Sprayer Sprayed)

France, 1895

Director: Louis Lumière

Production: Produced by Louis Lumière to demonstrate his cinématographe; black and white; running time: approximately one minute. Released June 1895 in Lyons.

Cast: François Clerc (The gardener); Daniel Duval (The boy).

Publications

Books:

- Kubnick, Henry, Les Frères Lumière, Paris, 1938.
 Leroy, Paul, Au seuil de paradis des images avec Louis Lumière, Paris, 1948.
 Bessy, Maurice, and Lo Duca, Louis Lumière, inventeur, Paris, 1948.
 Pernot, Victor, A Paris, il y a soixante ans, naissant le cinéma, Paris, 1955.
 Sadoul, Georges, Louis Lumière, Paris, 1964.
 Mitry, Jean, Filmographie Universelle 2, Paris, 1964.
 Chardère, Bernard, and others, Les Lumière, Lausanne, 1985.
 Sauvage, Leo, L'Affaire Lumière: Du mythe à l'histoire: Enquête sur les origines du cinéma, Paris, 1985.
 Redi, Riccardo, Lumière, Rome, 1986.
 André, Jacques, and Maria André, Une Saison Lumière à Montpelier, Perpignan, 1987.

Articles:

- “Lumière Jubilee” in Time (New York), 18 November 1935.
 Sadoul, Georges, “Lumière—The Last Interview,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1948.
 Deutelbaum, Marshall, “Structural Patterning in the Lumière Films,” in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 1, 1979.

Vaughan, Dai, “Let There Be Lumière,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1981.

Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Summer-Fall 1981.

“Les Pionniers du Cinéma Français Issue” of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), November 1984.

Positif (Paris), January 1986.

* * *

At the Annual Meeting of the French Photographic Society held in Lyons 10–12 June 1895, Louis Lumière presented a series of short, one-minute films to demonstrate the technical qualities of his recently patented cinématographe, which was uniquely both a camera and a projector. In a varied programme he not only showed the potential of his invention to record everyday scenes both public (La Sortie des Usines Lumière) and private (Le Goûter du Bébé), but also, and ultimately of more momentous importance, established that no obvious distinction could be made between these observed and unrecorded events, and an event stage-managed for the camera. With Le Jardinier et le petit espiègle, subsequently to become better known as L'Arroseur arrosé, Lumière created the first comic sequence to be recorded on film, and in so doing heralded a generation of silent slapstick movies.

The film depicts a gardener innocently watering a vegetable patch, when a mischievous boy surreptitiously cuts off the water supply by treading on the hose. The bemused gardener looks down the nozzle of the hose to determine the cause of the interruption, at which point the young prankster releases the water. It then gushes up to soak the gardener and to knock off his hat. After a short chase the boy is caught and duly spanked, and the gardener resumes his task.

The origins of the film have been disputed. According to Lumière the sequence is simply a re-enactment of an actual prank played by his younger brother Edouard on the family gardener François Clerc. However according to Georges Sadoul, the filmed sequence, if not the event itself, may have been inspired by a well-known comic strip cartoon frequently reproduced in late 19th-century children's books. He cites as an example the cartoon strip composed by the artist Herman Vogel and published in 1887 by Quantin. Here the narrative, illustrated in nine images, is titled L'Arroseur, and relates precisely those events depicted in the film, so that the cartoon sequence could easily be mistaken for the story-board for Lumière's production. In this respect L'Arroseur arrosé may be considered the first example of screen adaptation.

The sequence was filmed at the family home in Lyons in the spring of 1895. François Clerc duly played out his role as the gardener, but the part of the boy was acted not by Edouard who was considered to be too young, but by Daniel Duval, a juvenile apprentice carpenter at the Lumière factory. A single fixed camera records the carefully staged events.

In contrast to the other demonstration films which were no more than a recorded fragment of a larger event, L'Arroseur arrosé is complete and self-contained. The simple cause and effect narrative, presented from a single omniscient viewpoint, takes the audience through a variety of emotions, in an expressive use of space. The opening frames establish the gardener in his normal routine occupying the left-hand side of the screen. This normality is subverted by the arrival from the right of the mischievous boy who invades the gardener's space to interrupt the water supply. The audience is now privileged with information denied the gardener and can anticipate the comic outcome of the unsuspecting victim looking down the hose.

However the audience is momentarily deprived of its omniscient viewpoint when the gardener, clearly intent on retribution, chases the prankster out of camera-shot. The two characters return now closer to the fixed camera position so that the punishment of the naughty boy can be clearly seen. With the closing images showing the gardener once more watering his vegetable patch, and the guilty boy banished from the screen, normality has been restored and traditional morality upheld.

Although Lumière made other comic sequences such as Chez la photographe and Charcuterie mécanique, it was L'Arroseur arrosé which captured the imagination of the early cinema audiences. The sequence was quickly imitated by Georges Méliès with L'Arroseur in 1896, and in 1958 François Truffaut paid homage to Lumière's pioneering achievements with an affectionate pastiche of the gag in his film Les Mistons.

—R. F. Cousins

ARSENAL

USSR, 1928

Director: Alexander Dovzhenko

Production: VUFKO-Odessa; black and white, 35mm, silent; length: 7 reels, 1820 meters. Released 25 February 1929, Kiev. Filmed during the second half of 1928 in and around Kiev.

Scenario and editing: Alexander Dovzhenko; photography: Danylo Demutsky; production designers: Isaac Shpinel and Vladimir Mueller; music score for performance: Ihor Belza; assistant directors: Alexei Kapler, Lazar Bodyk.

Cast: Semen Svashenko (Tymish); Amvroziy Buchma (German soldier); Mykola Nademsky (Official); M. Kuchynsky (Petyura); D. Erdman (German officer); O. Merlatti (Sadovsky); A. Yevdakov (Nicholas II); S. Petrov (German soldier); Mykhaylovsky (Ukrainian nationalist); H. Kharkov (Red Army soldier).

Publications

Script:

Dovzhenko, Alexander, Arsenal, in Alexander Dovzhenko: Izbrannoe, edited by N. S. Tikhonova, Moscow, 1957.

Arsenal, edited by Y. I. Solntseva and L. I. Pazhitnova, Moscow, 1977.

Books:

Yourenev, R., Alexander Dovzhenko, Moscow, 1958 (author's name transliterated as R. Jurenev in German translation, 1964).

Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.

Rachuk, Igor, Poetika Dovzhenko, Moscow, 1964.

Schnitzer, Luda and Jean, Dovzhenko, Paris, 1966.

Mariamov, Alexandr, Dovzhenko, Moscow, 1968.

Oms, Marcel, Alexandre Dovjenko, Lyons, 1968.

Amengual, Bathélemy, Alexandr Dovjenko, Paris, 1970.

Carynck, Marco, editor, The Poet as Filmmaker, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1973.

Kepley, Vance, Jr., In the Service of the State: The Cinema of Alexander Dovzhenko, Madison, Wisconsin, 1986.

Articles:

Borisov, O., "Film in Work," in Kino (Moscow), no. 10, 1928.

Hamilton, James Shelley, in National Board of Review Magazine (New York), November 1929.

Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 11 November 1929.

Moore, John C., "Pabst, Dovzhenko: A Comparison," in Close Up (London), September 1932.

Leyda, Jay, "Index to the Creative Work of Alexander Dovzhenko," in Sight and Sound (London), supplement, index series November 1947.

Montagu, Ivor, "Dovzhenko—Poet of Life Eternal," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1957.

"Dovzhenko Issue" of Film (Venice), August 1957.

Shibuk, Charles, "The Films of Alexander Dovzhenko," in New York Film Bulletin, nos. 11–14, 1961.

Carynnyk, Marco, "The Dovzhenko Papers," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1971.

Frejlih, S., "Fin unserer Epoch" and "Ein Poet des Films," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), August–September 1974.

"Dovzhenko Issue" of Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), September 1974.

Krautz, A., "Zu Problemen des stilistischen Einflusses der bildenden Kunst auf die Stummfilme Alexander Dowshenko," in Information (Berlin), no. 2, 1977.

Christie, Ian, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1977.

Pliouchtch, L., "Dovjenko et Arsenal," in Revue de la Cinémathèque (Montreal), October–November 1989.

Kepley, V., Jr., "Dovzhenko and Montage: Issues of Style and Narration in the Silent Films"; M. Smith, "The Influence of Socialist Realism on Soviet Montage: The End of St. Petersburg, Fragment of an Empire, and Arsenal"; and W.M. Osadnik and E. Wilk, "Toward a Formal Semiotic Analysis of Dovzhenko's Arsenal," all in Journal of Ukrainian Studies, vol. 19, no. 1, 1994.

* * *

In Arsenal, Alexander Dovzhenko, perhaps the most radical of the Soviet directors of the silent period, altered the already extended conventions of cinematic structure to a degree greater than had even the innovative Sergei Eisenstein in his bold October. The effect of this tinkering with the more or less accepted proprieties of motion picture construction produced a work that is actually less a film than it is a highly symbolic visual poem. For example, in a more linearly structured piece like October, the metaphors, allusions, and analogies that arise through the construction of the various montages replace rather than comment on essential actions within the film. In Arsenal, however, the symbolism is so purposely esoteric, with seemingly deliberate barriers established to block the viewer's perception, that the relationship of individual symbols or sequences to the various actions of the film is not immediately clear.

Arsenal

The film's central theme obviously revolves around the idea of the sheer horror of war and is most fundamentally incarnate in the physical symbol of an arsenal in the midst of Russia's civil war. Yet, this theme is fragmented throughout the film within three distinct visual contexts. First, Dovzhenko exploits the inherent metaphorical potential of the individual shot as it is brilliantly exemplified in an opening image of a barbed wire trench barrier suddenly and unexpectedly exploding after a prolonged period of stasis. The contrast thus established between the transfixed image and the force of the off-camera shell explosion sets the stage for an interaction of fixed and moving images that runs the course of the film and establishes a semblance of poetic meter.

Second, the area between shots which is normally used in silent films for dialogue, location, or explanation is used here by Dovzhenko for thematic purposes. In an early scene, a series of three titles reading: "There was a mother who had three sons," "There was a war," ". . . and the mother had no sons," are interspersed between shots of a solitary woman and two camera angles of men on a moving train. This combination effected in sets of three (a recurrent image pattern throughout the film) not only establishes the concept of men going off to face the horrors of war but also ingrains in the audience a particular sentiment toward the idea.

A final thematic employment of symbolic images and one that runs through the entire course of the film in one form or another is the director's juxtaposition of stasis and movement within individual shots and between shots as well. Images of a train, of a platoon of soldiers moving almost relentlessly forward, a religious procession, and a number of other dynamic elements, are interjected around and between relatively static shots (usually grim), and effectively frame each immobile image as an individual symbolic and poetic unit with a meaningful parallel somewhere else in the film. In one sequence, a catatonic soldier is shot by an officer for not moving. The static shots of his execution are broken up by shots of a faceless platoon of soldiers moving forward. We never see the execution, only still images of each stage. The isolated shots, however, prefigures a parallel execution, again done in a sequence of three images, and that in turn foreshadows the fall of the arsenal itself. The middle shot in the execution sequence is nothing more than a symbolic pile of empty cartridges, but, as it turns out, the strikers who have taken over the arsenal are doomed by a lack of ammunition. Their plight is subsequently dramatized by three titles interjected between shots of the men. The titles read: "The 24th hour," "The 48th hour," and "The 72nd hour," to show that not only ammunition but time is running out.

Arsenal is a difficult film that makes many demands upon the viewer and is stubbornly resistant to easy interpretation. Consequently it rewards a number of viewings and repeated analysis. Under intense scrutiny its thematic patterns emerge and the real genius of its creator becomes apparent. Although many of its images now appear dated as, in fact, do Eisenstein's, ample power remains to substantiate the relatively untutored Dovzhenko's reputation as one of the early giants of Soviet cinema, on a level with both Eisenstein and Pudovkin.

—Stephen L. Hanson

ASHES AND DIAMONDS

See POPIOL I DIAMENT

THE ASPHALT JUNGLE

USA, 1950

Director: John Huston

Production: M.G.M.; black and white; running time: 105 minutes; released August 1950.

Producer: Arthur Hornblow Jr.; screenplay: Ben Maddow and John Huston, from the novel by W. R. Burnett; photography: Harold Rosson; editor: George Boemler; sound: Douglas Shearer; art directors: Cedric Gibbons and Randall Duell; music: Miklos Rosza.

Cast: Sterling Hayden (Dix Handley); Louis Calhern (Alonzo D. Emmerich); Jean Hagen (Doll Donovan); James Whitmore (Gus Minissi); Sam Jaffe (Doc Riedenschneider); John McIntire (Police Commissioner Hardy); Marc Lawrence (Cobby); Barry Kelley (Lt. Dietrich); Anthony Caruso (Louis Ciavelli); Teresa Celli (Maria Ciavelli); Marilyn Monroe (Angela Phinlay).

Publications

Script:

Maddow, Ben, and John Huston, The Asphalt Jungle, Carbondale, Illinois, 1980.

Books:

Benayoun, Robert, John Huston: La Grande Ombre de l'aventure, Paris 1966; revised edition, 1985.

Kaminsky, Stuart M., John Huston, Maker of Magic, Boston, 1978.

Madsen, Axel, John Huston, New York, 1978.

Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Hammen, Scott, John Huston, Boston, 1985.

McCarty, John, The Films of John Huston, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1987.

Articles:

Variety (New York), August 1950.

Lightman, Herb A., "Realism with a Master's Touch," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), August 1950.

Houston, Penelope, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1950.

Lambert, Gavin, in Sight and Sound (London), November 1950.

"Huston Issue" of Positif (Paris), August 1952.

Cinéma (Paris), June 1972.

Bitomsky, H., in Filmkritik (Munich), January 1980.

Audibert, Louis, in Cinématographe (Paris), May 1981.

Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 14 August 1986.

The Asphalt Jungle

Reid's Film Index (New South Wales, Australia), no. 10, 1993.
 Telotte, J.P., "Fatal Capers: Strategy and Enigma in Film Noir,"
Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol.
 23, no. 4, Winter 1996.

* * *

With The Asphalt Jungle, John Huston laid down the definitive pattern of the heist movie. A gang of criminals, each with a particular skill, is gathered together; the job (typically a robbery) is pulled with measured professionalism; but ill-chance, or internal dissension, undermines the gang's success, bringing them to disaster and death. The formula was to be taken up, and creatively reworked any number of ways, by directors as varied as Kubrick (The Killing), Mackendrick (The Ladykillers), Becker (Touchez pas au grisbi), Dassin (Rififi) and Monicelli (I soliti ignoti); but Huston's film still sustains comparison with any of its successors.

The Asphalt Jungle also broke new ground in presenting crime as an occupation like any other, carried out not by the preening megalomaniacs of 1930s gangster movies, nor by the disillusioned antiheroes of the 1940s, but by ordinary people motivated by everyday preoccupations and small private ambitions. The expert cracksmen (Anthony Caruso) has "mouths to feed, rent to pay"; the tough hood, Dix Handley (Sterling Hayden), dreams of buying back the Kentucky farm of his childhood. Crime, muses Louis Calhern's crooked lawyer in the script's most famous line, "is only a left-handed form of human endeavor."

Resisting the studio's desire for big-name stars, Huston cast his film with character actors and relative unknowns, a policy which paid off handsomely. Hayden and Calhern gave the performances of their careers, as did Sam Jaffe in the role of Doc Riedenschneider, the mastermind with a fatal weakness for nymphets, and Jean Hagen as Handley's sad-eyed moll. Around them Huston deployed a fine roster of supporting players: Caruso's safe-cracker, James Whitmore's cat-loving hunchback, and Marc Lawrence as a cringing bookie ("Money makes me sweat. That's the way I am"). And, touchingly eager and tentative in her first worthwhile screen role, Marilyn Monroe as Calhern's childlike mistress—a relationship treated with unexpected tenderness and a total lack of prurience.

The absence of stars accentuates the movie's fatalistic mood. There's no controlling boss-figure, pulling strings and calling the shots; neither Reidenschneider with his brains, nor Emmerich (Calhern) with his social status, is any less at the mercy of events than his accomplices. Rarely do we see anyone alone; Harold Rosson's camera frames tautly, holding the characters in tight complicit groupings—a closed community severally trapped by their obsessions, each one's needs involving and ensnaring the rest. "One way or another," Riedenschneider observes, "we all work for a vice." Huston's spare, uncluttered style conveys tension and urgency, but no sense of spurious excitement. Violence is staged without ceremony; shots are fired at close quarters in sudden, edgy confusion, and death strikes more by accident than by design.

As always, what interests Huston is relationships under pressure, how people react when the chips are down. Betrayal, recurrent theme of all his early movies, features strongly; but it's less endemic here than in the slick, cynical world of The Maltese Falcon. Loyalty, in The Asphalt Jungle, can still survive, despite greed and the fear of failure. And even the betrayers deserve sympathy: Emmerich, scrawling a hopeless, unfinished note to his wife before shooting himself, or Cobby, the bookie, abjectly weeping as he cracks under police pressure. Huston's hostility is reserved for the cops. Posing before the flashbulbs, the Commissioner makes play with a bank of police radios, and spins yellow-press clichés around the fugitive Dix Handley, "a hardened killer . . . a man without human feeling or human mercy."

From these melodramatic words, obsequiously noted down by the reporters, we fade to Handley, his lifeblood seeping away, sustained only by his obsession as he heads doggedly back towards his lost childhood dream. In the film's final shot he lies dead on the grass of a wide Kentucky meadow, while three horses graze around him, nuzzling his body. It's an image at once comforting and desolate; of all the downbeat, elegiac endings in Huston's films, none is more moving than this.

Unhampered by its lack of star names, The Asphalt Jungle scored a hit with the public; apart from The African Queen, it provided Huston with his only box-office hit of the decade. Most directors, having pioneered such a popular genre, would have felt tempted to return to it; but Huston, who always hated to repeat himself, never made another heist movie. Which may be cause for regret since, on the evidence of The Asphalt Jungle, few filmmakers were better qualified to do so.

—Philip Kemp

ASYA'S HAPPINESS

See ISTORIA ASI KLIACHINOI KOTORAIA LUBILA DA NIE VYSHLA ZAMUZH

L'ATALANTE

France, 1934

Director: Jean Vigo

Production: Black and white, 35mm; running time: 89 minutes (originally 82 minutes); length: 7343 feet. Released 1934 as Le

Chaland qui passe with 7 minutes cut out. Re-released 1945 restored to its original form. Filmed in Paris.

Producer: J. L. Nounez; screenplay: Jean Vigo and Blaise Cendrars (some sources list Albert Riéra as a collaborator), from a scenario by Jean Guinée; photography: Boris Kaufman; editor: Louis Chavance; production designer: Francis Jourdain; music: Maurice Jaubert.

Cast: Jean Dasté (Jean); Dita Parlo (Juliette); Michel Simon (Père Jules); Gilles Margaritis (Peddler); Louis Lefèvre (Boy); Raya Dili-gent (Bargeman); Maurice Gilles (Barge owner).

Publications

Script:

Vigo, Jean, Oeuvre de cinema: Films, scénarios, projets de films, texts sur le cinema, edited by Pierre Lherminier, Paris, 1985.

Books:

Kyrou, Ado, Le Surréalisme au cinéma, Paris, 1953; revised edition, 1963.

Kyrou, Ado, Amour, erotisme, et cinéma, Paris, 1957.

Salles-Gomes, P. E., Jean Vigo, Paris, 1957; revised edition, Los Angeles, 1971.

Buache, Freddy, and others, editors, Hommage à Jean Vigo, Lausanne, 1962.

Lherminier, Pierre, Jean Vigo, Paris, 1967.

Lovell, Alan, Anarchist Cinema, London, 1967.

Smith, John M., Jean Vigo, London, 1972.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, editors, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey One: The Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Simon, William G., The Films of Jean Vigo, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

Dudley, Andrew, Film in the Aura of Art, Princeton, New Jersey, 1984.

Warner, Marina, L'Atalante, London, 1993.

Salles-Gomes, P.E., Jean Vigo, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Les Nouvelles Littéraires (Paris), 29 September 1934.

Cavalcanti, Alberto, "Jean Vigo," in Cinema Quarterly (Edinburgh), Winter 1935.

Kracauer, Siegfried, "Jean Vigo," in Hollywood Quarterly, April 1947.

Weinberg, H. G., "The Films of Jean Vigo," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), July 1947.

Agee, James, "Life and Work of Jean Vigo," in Nation (New York), 12 July 1947.

"Vigo Issue" of Ciné-Club (Paris), February 1949.

Manvell, Roger, "Revaluations: L'Atalante, 1934," in Sight and Sound (London), February 1951.

Positif (Paris), May 1953.

Mekas, Jonas, "An Interview with Boris Kaufman," in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1955.

Chardère, Bernard, "Jean Vigo et ses films," in Cinéma (Paris), March 1955.

- Premier Plan* (Lyon), no. 19, 1961.
- Ellerby, John, "The Anarchism of Jean Vigo," in Anarchy (London), August 1961.
- Teush, B., "The Playground of Jean Vigo," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1973.
- Baldwin, D., "L'Atalante and the Maturing of Jean Vigo," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1985.
- Ganteur, Claude, on André Antoine, in Cinéma (Paris), 8 January 1986.
- Amengual, B., "Restitution des rimes," in Positif (Paris), September 1990.
- Insdorf, A., "L'Atalante, a Slow Boat Bound for Lasting Fame," in New York Times, 14 October 1990.
- Hoberman, J., "Jean Vigo in Toto," in Première (Paris), January 1991.
- Pellizzari, L., "Quel barcone che passa. . .," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), October 1991.
- Sidler, V., "Traeumer des Kinos, Rimbaud des Films," in Filmbulletin (Winterthur, Switzerland), no. 4, 1992.
- Conomos, John, "Voyaging with Vigo on L'Atalante," in Filmnews, vol. 21, no. 4, May 1991.
- Faulkner, C., "Affective Identities: French National Cinema and the 1930s," in Canadian Journal of Film Studies (Montreal), vol. 3, no. 2, 1994.

* * *

The subject of L'Atalante—Vigo's only feature-length film, completed just before his death—was not of his own choosing. The interest of the film lies in his engagement with material that was partly congenial in its unconventionality (life on a barge, with its freedom from the restrictions of established society, its alternative community of unsocialized eccentrics), and partly highly conventional (problems of the heterosexual couple, mutual adjustment to marriage, break-up and reunion). The subject enabled him to develop the affectionate examination of anarchic behaviour already expressed in Zéro de conduite, but within the confines of an archetypal classical narrative of order (equated with marriage)/disruption of order/restoration of order.

Crucial to Vigo's personal background was his allegiance to his anarchist father, who died in prison under mysterious circumstances, and about whom Vigo wanted to make a film; crucial to his aesthetic background was the Surrealist movement. He wrote an adulatory review of Un Chien anadalou and, while not Surrealist in the strict sense, his films are faithful to the spirit of Surrealism, with its commitment to Freudian theories of dream and the unconscious and to the overthrow of repressive bourgeois social and moral codes. L'Atalante opens with a wedding procession, which Vigo presents as if it were a funeral: everyone is in black, everyone looks glum, almost everyone is coupled. The only brief outburst of spontaneous energy comes from the one single man, who tries to pinch the behind of the woman in front of him and is sternly reprimanded. This is Vigo's succinct depiction of established society. Against it, in the same sequence, he sets the characters from the barge: "le père Jules," whose relationship to mainstream culture and its rituals is summed up in his quick dash back into the church to splash himself with holy water and pronounce the couple man and wife; and the (nameless) boy who, having knocked the wedding bouquet into the canal, runs off to find a substitute and returns bearing great festoons of wild creeper, looking like a juvenile pagan nature god.

The barge departs, the social order is left behind, and the film swiftly establishes the bride, Juliette, as its central character and central problem. The film's great distinction lies partly in the honesty with which that problem is confronted, its ultimate failure lies in the way it withdraws from its implications. The Surrealist movement, while dedicated to sexual liberation, failed to develop any viable feminist theory and never successfully conceptualized the position of women: its commitment to l'amour fou was never disengaged from an emphasis on machismo. What is especially remarkable about L'Atalante is not only the intense erotic charge it conveys between its central couple (it could be described as an attempt to reconcile l'amour fou with domesticity), but also the way it foregrounds the position of the woman, raising the question of what this liberation means for her. For Juliette really has no place on the barge. Its little community appears to have functioned perfectly well before her appearance, the traditionally "feminine" reforms she effects (such as washing Jules's underwear) seem superfluous, and she never finds a role within the male work-world.

The culmination of the first half of the film is the marvellous scene in which Jules shows Juliette the treasures of his cabin (a veritable Surrealist world of unexpected juxtapositions). It ends with the brutal intervention of Jean, his smashing of Jules's collection of mementoes, and his striking of Juliette. He is re-establishing conjugal possession, and we register his behaviour as thoroughly negative. The nature of the threat Jean feels is extremely complex, not at all the simple one of erotic rivalry; and to understand it, we must consider the character of Jules and what he represents. Presented without ambiguity as an admirably robust and healthy figure, Jules transgresses, directly or by implication, every major bourgeois rule. (1) Money-value: his souvenirs are treasured solely for the associations they evoke, not for monetary worth. (2) Cleanliness: his physical robustness is unaffected by his living among cats which produce litters in the beds, and by his total lack of interest in bourgeois standards of hygiene. (3) Physical squeamishness: to demonstrate the efficiency of a native knife, he casually slices open his own hand. (4) Patriarchal dominance: he relates to Juliette as an equal, reducing the notion of male authority to a game (the tattered puppet of an orchestral conductor). (5) Death: he keeps the fore-arms of his best friend pickled in a jar, treating the souvenir without the least morbidity, but simply as a memento to live with. (6) Monogamy: he shows Juliette a photograph of himself with two women, telling her, "There's a story to that." We never get to hear it, but it is clear that Jules is unattached yet strongly sexual. (Neither does he exploit women: witness the later scene with the fortune-teller, where the seduction is delightfully mutual). (7) Sexual identity: the dead friend was the person he was closest to, and although bisexuality is not necessarily implied, it is perfectly in keeping with the freedom from bourgeois conditioning Jules represents. (8) Property: Jules shows great affection for his souvenirs, but is not in the least bound to them. After Jean wrecks his cabin he casually picks up an unbroken piece of bric-à-brac, remarks, "there's one he missed," and smashes it. What Juliette is attracted to, and what her husband experiences as a threat, is precisely Jules's freedom—a freedom that can easily encompass loyalty, affection and loving relationship, but that quite precludes the exclusivity of marriage. Further, through Jean's behavior, the film clearly establishes marriage as characterized by the man's possession of, and assumption of absolute right over, the woman.

It is scarcely surprising that a film made within the capitalist production/distribution system for a bourgeois audience could not pursue further the implications of its own liberating perceptions. In fact, its second half is largely devoted to a retraction of those implications. Two related strategies are involved: the substitution of the peddler for “le père Jules,” and the partial transformation of Jules’s function. The bistro sequence with the peddler is clearly a repetition of/variation on the cabin scene. Juliette is attracted to the promise of freedom, the display of wonders, and Jean intervenes to reclaim her. But the peddler is not Jules: he is a slight figure, explicitly described as the “peddler of dreams,” and the freedom and glamour with which he tempts Juliette are quite illusory. Jean is proved right in rejecting him. If Jules poses a substantial and formidable threat to the institution of marriage, the peddler only seems to, and the film can deal with him easily. Finally, Jules becomes indeed “le père” Jules: the father-figure who retrieves the fugitive Juliette, slings her over his shoulder, restores her to her husband, and pulls shut the hatch over them. The film is quite explicit about Juliette’s imprisonment, but the narrative resolution demands that she be shown to accept it gladly. The famous last shot—the phallic symbol of the barge pushing on through the sunlit canal—represents a celebration of sexuality about which we cannot help, today, feeling deeply uneasy.

—Robin Wood

AN AUTUMN AFTERNOON

See SAMMA NO AJI

L'AVVENTURA

(The Adventure)

Italy, 1959

Director: Michelangelo Antonioni

Production: Produzioni Cinematografiche Europee, Cino del Duca, (Rome), and Société Cinématographique (Paris); black and white, 35mm; running time: 139 minutes, also 130 minutes. Released 25 September 1960, Bologna and Paris. Filmed September 1959 through January 1960 in Rome and Sicily (the isles of Lipari, Milazzo, Catania, and Taormina).

Producer: Amato Pennasilico; screenplay: Michelangelo Antonioni, Elio Bartolini, and Tonino Guerra, from an original story by Michelangelo Antonioni; photography: Aldo Scavarda; editor: Eraldo da Roma; sound: Claudio Maielli; scene designer: Piero Polletto; music: Giovanni Fusco; costume designer: Adriana Berselli.

Cast: Monica Vitti (Claudia); Gabriele Ferzetti (Sandro); Lea Massari (Anna); Dominique Blanchar (Giulia); Renzo Ricci (Anna's Father); James Addams (Corrado); Dorothy De Poliolo (Gloria Perkins); Lelio Luttazzi (Raimondo); Giovanni Petrucci (Young Painter); Esmeralda Ruspoli (Patrizia); with Enrico Bologna; Franco Cimino; Giovanni Danesi; Rita Molé; Renato Pincicoli; Angela Tommasi di Lampedusa; Vincenzo Tranchina; Joe Fisherman from Panarea (Old man on the island); Prof. Cucco (Ettore).

Awards: Special Jury Prize, Cannes Festival, 1960.

Publications

Scripts:

Screenplays of Michelangelo Antonioni, New York, 1963.
Antonioni, Michelangelo, Sei Film, Turin, 1964.

Books:

Cowie, Peter, Antonioni, Bergman, Resnais, New York, 1963.
Lephrohon, Pierre, Michelangelo Antonioni: An Introduction, New York, 1963.
Taylor, John Russell, Cinema Eye, Cinema Ear, New York, 1964.
Strick, Philip, Antonioni, London, 1965.
Sarris, Andrew, Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.
Cameron, Ian, and Robin Wood, Antonioni, New York, 1969.
Samuels, Charles Thomas, Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.
Rifkin, Ned, Antonioni's Visual Language, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.
Barthes, Roland, and others, Michelangelo Antonioni, Munich, 1984.
Biarese, Cesare, and Aldo Tassone, I film di Michelangelo Antonioni, Rome, 1985.
Dervin, Daniel, Through a Freudian Lens Deeply: A psychoanalysis of Cinema, Hillsdale, New Jersey, 1985.
Fonseca, M.S., Michelangelo Antonioni, Lisbon, 1985.
Antonioni, Michelangelo, That Bowling Alley on the Tiber: Tales of a Director, Oxford, 1986.
Perry, Ted, and Rene Prieto, Michelangelo Antonioni: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1986.
Tinazzi, Giorgio di, Michelangelo Antonioni, Firenze, 1989.
Cuccu, Lorenzo, Antonioni: il discorso dello sguardo: da Blow up a Identificazione di una donna, Pisa, 1990.
Giaume, Joëlle Mayet, Michelangelo Antonioni: le fil intérieur, Crisnée, Belgium, 1990.
Ranieri, Nicola, Amor vacui: il cinema di Michelangelo Antonioni, Chieti, 1990.
Rohdie, Sam, Antonioni, London, 1990.
Prédal, René, Michelangelo Antonioni, ou, La vigilance du désir, Paris, 1991.
Kock, Bernhard, Michelangelo Antonionis Bilderwelt: eine phänomenologische Studie, München, 1994.
Arrowsmith, William, Antonioni: The Poet of Images, New York, 1995.
Cuccu, Lorenzo, Antonioni: il discorso dello sguardo e altri saggi, Pisa, 1997.
Brunette, Peter, The Films of Michelangelo Antonioni, Cambridge, 1998.
Scemama-Heard, Céline, Antonioni: le désert figuré, Paris, 1998.

Articles:

Houston, Penelope, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1960–61.
Manceaux, Michele, “An Interview with Antonioni,” in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1960–61.
“Antonioni Issue” of Films and Filming (London), January 1961.
Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 23 March 1961.
Fitzpatrick, Ellen, in Films in Review (New York), May 1961.
Sandall, Robert, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1961.

L'avventura

- Durgnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), March 1962.
- Antonioni, Michelangelo, "Making a Film Is My Way of Life," in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.
- Aristarco, Guido, in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.
- Schleifer, Marc, in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.
- "Antonioni Issue" of Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1962.
- Lane, John Francis, "Oh, Oh Antonioni," in Films and Filming (London), December 1962.
- Lesser, Simon O., "L'avventura: A Closer Look," in Yale Review (New Haven, Connecticut), Fall 1964.
- Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, "The Event and the Image: Michelangelo Antonioni," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1964–65.
- Doniol-Valcroze, Jacques, "The R-H Factor and the New Cinema," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), January 1966.
- Hernacki, Thomas, "Michelangelo Antonioni and the Imagery of Disintegration," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1970.
- Kauffmann, Stanley, in Horizon (Los Angeles), Autumn 1972.
- Lockhart, Kimball, "Empêchement visuel et point de fruité dans L'avventura and Professione: Reporter," in Camera/Stylo (Paris), November 1982.
- Audibert, L., in Cinématographe (Paris), March 1983.
- Blanchet, C., in Cinéma (Paris), April 1983.
- Domecq, J. P., in Positif (Paris), April 1983.
- Antonioni, Michelangelo, "Vi parlo di me per raccontani un film," in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), August-October 1983.
- Bohne, L., "The Discourse of Narcissism in L'avventura," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Fall 1984.
- De Santis, Giuseppe, "L'ovvio e l'ottuso: indirezioni del senso in Antonioni," Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), vol. 27, November 1987.
- Tomasulo, F. P., "The Architectonics of Alienation: Antonioni's Edifice Complex," in Wide Angle (Baltimore, Maryland), no. 3, 1993.
- Predal, R., "L'eclipse, l'ellipse," in Avant Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1993.
- Schenk, I., "Natur und Anti-Natur in den Filmen von Michelangelo Antonioni," Cinema (Switzerland) (Zurich), vol. 40, 1994.
- Di Marino, B., "La citta che sente," Filmcritica (Rome), May/July 1995.
- Nowell-Smith, G., "Antonioni," Sight and Sound (London), vol. 5, December 1995.
- Prédal, René, "Le longue nuit d'une mort attendue," Avant-Scène Cinéma (Paris), November 1995.

Lubelski, T. "(Sto) 100 lat kina: 1960," Kino (Warsaw), vol. 30, May 1996.

Nasta, D., "De la critique de cinema a la critique de film: la modernite antonionienne, effet de critique ou demarche d'auteur?," Cinemas (Quebec), vol. 6, no. 2/3, 1996.

* * *

When L'avventura was screened at the 1960 Cannes Film Festival its audience whistled, stamped, and shouted. They were not expressing enthusiasm. Antonioni's film had proved incomprehensible to them, as it was to prove to many an audience all over Europe. Significantly, however, this did not prevent the film from finding admirers and achieving remarkably large audience figures in several countries. This was the beginning of the age of the art-movie, and L'avventura was perfectly suited to the growing number of art-houses. After the debacle at Cannes, 35 critics and filmmakers issued a statement of support for L'avventura and its director, a view which was echoed in film criticism around the world. Within a year L'avventura had secured its place in film history.

What was it about the film that encouraged such extremes of disgust and admiration? The most common charge of the dissenters was that L'avventura was quite meaningless and, consequently, utterly boring. Foolishly, some defenders sought to turn that argument by making a virtue out of meaninglessness itself. To them L'avventura was the perfect aesthetic object: beautiful to observe but devoid of any cognitive or moral import. Apart from the fact that it is patently not devoid of such features, this view (not uncommon in art-house circles) makes the peculiar assumption that the look of a film is somehow independent of meaning, that beauty and meaning are separate elements in art. Others argued more cogently that L'avventura worked with and developed a new language of cinema, and that to understand it was to master an alien form. Hence the anger at Cannes among those not prepared to make that effort.

This claim does have some truth to it, though it overstates the film's innovative qualities. L'avventura shares much with its two immediate predecessors, Le amiche and Il grido, both in theme and style. It hardly emerged from nowhere, though it is perhaps more unremittingly austere than anything its director had previously made. But it clearly does play down conventional narrative to the point of extinction. The "plot" of L'avventura (and the term is barely applicable) can be described in a couple of sentences. A young woman, Anna, disappears while cruising near Sicily in the company of a group of rich Italians. Her lover, Sandro, and her friend, Claudia, search unsuccessfully for her, developing a tenuous relationship in the process. There is no resolution of the conventional type. Anna's disappearance is never explained, and ceases to be of any interest. At the end of the film Claudia and Sandro achieve a bleak sympathy, but hardly a consummation. Nor are we permitted any semblance of orthodox narrative involvement. The film is paced very slowly, much of its action seen in real time. Its characters communicate little in dialogue, and more often than not, are to be found looking away from each other out into the bleak and arid Sicilian landscape. We are invited to contemplate them, but not to identify. Point-of-view shots are rare, and shot-reverse shot sequences, where they exist, usually include both parties fully in the shot. In these and other ways L'avventura excludes us from emotional involvement in any but the most cerebral sense.

Perhaps, then, the Cannes reception is unsurprising. In the two decades since L'avventura's first appearance, narrative conventions have changed, but they have still nowhere near approached Antonioni's limit. In respect of its form L'avventura is as striking today as it was then, its invitation to contemplate its agonized characters as demanding as ever. Its meanings, however, are less elusive than they appeared to many in 1960. Hindsight and the cultural changes of the intervening years have rendered the film more transparent, its ideas more clearly part of their period. Antonioni himself, in a statement accompanying the film at Cannes, said that L'avventura charted a world in which "we make use of an aging morality, of outworn myths, of ancient conventions." The world had changed, yet human beings were trapped by the old standards. His characters, accordingly, can find no meaningful way to relate to each other, finally arriving, as he describes it, "at a sort of reciprocal pity."

Embedded in this diffuse account of modern social ills is a more specific lament at the degradation of creativity and sexuality. The love-making in L'avventura (except, briefly, for Claudia, the only fleetingly optimistic figure in a deeply depressing film) is without meaning or joy. Creative aspirations are stultified. As Sandro observes in a rare moment of self-perception, "I saw myself as a genius working in a garret. Now I've got two flats and I've neglected to become a genius." Materialism, alienation, and neurosis are the watchwords of this world. These were not new ideas, of course, and by 1960 there was a well established tradition of such despair in European art. What was new, and remains hugely impressive, was Antonioni's facility at expressing such ideas in a cinema shorn of conventional narrative aids. A sense of the alienation of people from their environment and from each other is conveyed in every stark composition, in every studied camera movement. The meaning of the film is there in its very fabric. L'avventura is never meaningless; if anything it is overloaded with meaning.

In an interview with Georges Sadoul, Antonioni made this observation, "when I finished L'avventura I was forced to reflect on what it meant." The lasting impact of the film has been to force the rest of us to take seriously the idea of a genuinely reflective cinema.

—Andrew Tudor

THE AWAKENING OF THE RATS

See BUDJENJE PACOVA

---

AWARA

(The Vagabond)

India, 1951

Director: Raj Kapoor

Production: R. K. Films; running time: 100 minutes. Released 1951.

Producer in charge: Mamaji; producer: Raj Kapoor; screenplay: Ahmad Abbas; story: Ahmad Abbas, V. P. Sathé; photography: Radhu Karmakar; editor: G. G. Mayekar; sound: Allauddin; art director: M. R. Achrekar; music: Shankar, Jaikishen; lyrics: Hasrat Jaipuri, Shailendra; Dream Dance: Madame Simkie.

Cast: Prithviraj Kapoor (Judge Raghunath); Nargis (Rita); Raj Kapoor (Raj); K. N. Singh (Jagga Daku); Leela Chitnis (Bharati); Shashi Kapoor (Raj as a boy); with: Cuckoo, B. M. Vyas, Baby Zubeida, Leela Misra, Om Parkash Rajoo, Mansaram, Rajan, Manek, Paryag, Ravi, Vinni, Bali, Royal India Ballet and Opera.

Publications

Books:

- Barnouw, Erik, and S. Krishnaswamy, Indian Film, New York, 1965.
 Sarkar, Kobita, The Indian Cinema Today, New Delhi, 1975.
 Abbas, Ahmad, I Am Not An Island: An Experiment in Autobiography, New Delhi, 1977.
 Burra, Rani, editor, Looking Back 1896–1960, New Delhi, 1981.
 Ramchandran, T. M., 70 Years of Indian Cinema (1913–83), Bombay, 1985.
 Dissanayake, W. and M. Sahay, Raj Kapoor's Films: Harmony of Discourses, New Delhi, 1987.

Articles:

- “Special Issue” of Film Français (Paris), Spring 1953.
Film India (Bombay), February 1952.
Kine Weekly (London), 24 June 1954.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1954.
Variety (New York), 11 April 1956.
Jeune cinéma (Paris), September 1965.
 Hoberman, J., in Voice (Los Angeles), 5 August 1981.
 Pym, John, in Financial Times (London) 17 August 1984.
 Thomas, R., “Indian Cinema: Pleasures and Popularity,” in Screen (London), May-August 1985.
 Ghosh, S., “K. A. Abbas: A Man in Tune with History,” in Screen (Bombay), 19 June 1987.
 Slingo, Carol J., “K. A. Abbas (1914–87),” in Jump Cut (Berkeley), February 1988.

* * *

Awara is very much the first major instance of the Hindi cinema’s international influence, and as such provides an important index of the peculiar fascination of the Hindi film. Raj Kapoor’s work has been hugely popular not only in the traditional markets in the Middle East and Africa, but in Eastern Europe and, according to recent accounts, in China. His films implicate us in a universe both parallel to and incestuously coupled with that other world cinema, Hollywood. The popular Hindi cinema occupies a colonial and post-colonial territory of conflicting identities and philosophical irreconcilables. The East presents itself as “other” than the West: Hollywood is flagrantly mimicked, but in a knowing, distorting, and finally disavowing way.

Awara is a sprawling work on identity: it revolves around the loss and recovery of a respectable, upper-class social position by the protagonist, Raj (Raj Kapoor). The script-writer, Ahmad Abbas, a left-wing novelist, journalist, and filmmaker, intended Awara as a criticism of the inflexible notions of a social hierarchy incompatible, so he believed, with the new India. However, the expression of these ideas within the framework of a popular Hindi movie opened them to ambivalence. Abbas accepted that Kapoor did not tamper with the story but only added the song and dance conventionally used in the popular cinema. But it is precisely in this way that the popular cinema presents the spectator with the possibility of a parallel realm of pleasure which may controvert (though in a kind of co-existing, unironic way) the work done in the narrative. Thus Raj, denied his proper place in society, and struggling to feed his starving mother, is compelled to take to crime. The role is glamorized by Kapoor’s star performance and by songs which indicate, even amid the concluding pathos of the story—when the hero is jailed and separated from his sweetheart—that the life of the vagabond is an attractive one.

This kind of ambivalence is not restricted to scenes of spectacle, but is embedded in the narration. Popular Hindi cinema uses a melodramatic audio-visual register, where music, sound effects, and codings of dress and facial expression serve to emphasise the moral meanings of the fiction for the audience. But this moral sign-system is invariably manipulated to introduce narrative disorders, which indicate that the moral terms of the fiction are in fact not so stable.

For example, in Awara the villain, Jagga (K. N. Singh), often appears to be the shadow of Raj’s father (Prithviraj Kapoor), insofar as both exclude Raj from legitimacy. Rita (Nargis), the character who will ultimately come to Raj’s aid, is also an ambiguous figure. She is contaminated with the same attributes of wealth and class which bar the hero from social position. In this manifestation she is regressive and therefore coded as “Western.” By presenting “good” figures (the father and the sweetheart) in this way, the narrative actually registers certain truths: the fear of the father, especially in his representation of the oppressive law of the social order, and the sexual fascination with that “Westernness” (actually very much part of contemporary Indian culture) reflected in the Rita figure. But in the course of the narrative, these truths are submerged in the cause of recovering and stabilizing a “pure” Indian identity: the father has to be established as unambiguously “good,” while Rita has to be divested of the pejorative “Western” image.

Though it represents all these general and contradictory features of the Hindi film, Awara is still very much an epochal work of the post-independence era. In its delineation of disinherited social types in a pathetic yet glamorous way, in its underlying scepticism about the legal-rational order, it maps out the territory which would be traversed by the rural sagas of the 1950s and 1960s (for example, Mehboob Khan’s Mother India and Nitin Bose’s Jamuna) and which would be built into the highly successful revenge-saga films of the 1970s featuring Amithab Bachchan.

—Ravi Vasudevan

B

BA WANG BIE JI

---

(Farewell My Concubine)

Hong Kong-China, 1993

Director: Chen Kaige

Production: Tomson (HK) Films in association with China Film Co-production Corp/Beijing Film Studio; colour, 35mm; running time: 170 minutes, original version; 157 minutes, US version. Released 2 September 1993, Beijing. Filmed in 1992 in Beijing.

Producer: Hsu Feng; executive producers: Hsu Bin, Jade Hsu; screenplay: Lilian Lee, Lu Wei, from the novel by Lilian Lee; assistant directors: Zhang Jinzhan, Bai Yu, Jin Ping, Zhang Jinting; photography: Gu Changwei; editor: Pei Xiaonan; art directors: Yang Yuhe, Yang Zhanjia; sound: Yang Zhanshan, Han Lin; music: Zhao Jiping; music performed by: Central Orchestra of China, Orchestra of the Peking Opera Academy; costume design: Chen Changmin; subtitles: Linda Jaivin.

Cast: Leslie Cheung (Cheng Dieyi); Zhang Fengyi (Duan Xiaolou); Gong Li (Juxian); Lu Qi (Guan Jifa); Ying Da (Na Kun); Ge You (Master Yuan); Li Chun (Xiao Si as a teenager); Lei Han (Xiao Si as an adult); Tong Di (Old Man Zhang); Ma Mingwei (Douzi as a child); Yin Zhi (Douzi as a teenager); Fei Yang (Shitou as a child); Zhao Hailong (Shitou [teenage]); Li Dan (Laizi); Jiang Wenli (Douzi's mother).

Awards: Palme d'Or, International Critics' Prize, Cannes 1993.

Publications

Articles:

Rayns, Tony, "Nights at the Opera" in Sight and Sound (London), December 1992.

Variety (New York), 24 May 1993.

Tessier, Max, and others, "Art over Politics" in Cinemaya (New Delhi), Summer 1993.

Cineforum (Italy), vol. 33, no. 328, October 1993.

Bertin-Maghit, J.-P., and Guy Gauthier, "Adieu ma concubine," in Mensuel du Cinéma, no. 11, November 1993.

Alleva, Richard, Commonweal, 3 December 1993.

Sight and Sound (London), January 1994.

Films in Review (New York), January/February 1994.

Zha, Jianying, "Chen Kaige and the Shadows of the Revolution" in Sight and Sound (London), February 1994.

Chen, Pauline, "History Lessons" in Film Comment (New York), March 1994.

Rayns, Tony, "The Narrow Path" in Projections 3, London, 1994.

Lau, Jenny Kwok Wah, "Farewell My Concubine: History, Melodrama, and Ideology in Contemporary Pan-Chinese Cinema," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1995.

Xu, B., "Farewell My Concubine and Its Nativist Critics," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (Reading), vol. 16, no. 2, 1997.

* * *

In 1984 Chen Kaige's The Yellow Earth (with cinematography by fellow Beijing Film Academy graduate Zhang Yimou) signalled the exciting emergence of the Fifth Generation of Chinese filmmakers. A decade later, in 1993, his film Farewell My Concubine signalled that generation's arrival on the international scene.

Although based on a novella by Hong Kong writer Lilian Li, director Chen Kaige himself reworked the story of Farewell My Concubine to its current, more complex form about the friendship of two Peking opera stars over 50 years of turbulent Chinese history.

The film begins in 1924 in Beijing as a young boy, Douzi (Ma Mingwei), is brought to the All Luck and Happiness Peking Opera School by his prostitute mother (Jiang Wenli). Desperate to give him a future she herself does not have, she pleads pitifully with the headmaster to admit her son. Though prettily turned, he does have one defect—an extra finger on his left hand. In order to gain admission, the mother tearfully chops off the offending digit.

At this time Peking opera was at its height of popularity. "If you belong to the human race, you go to the opera," lectures one opera master. "If you don't go to the opera, you're not a human being. . . . You are lucky to be part of it."

Soon Douzi is brought under the protection of gruff but kindly classmate Shitou (Fei Yang), who becomes his dearest friend. The sequences of opera training—holding agonizing positions for hours, singing at the crack of dawn, withstanding the schoolmaster's cane—are intensely powerful and moving ones.

In one scene, the boys line a river bank in the falling snow and sing out the lines of the fallen king in the classic play, The King Parts from His Concubine (which is also the Chinese title of the film, "Ba Wang Bie Ji"): "I am so strong/I can uproot the mountains./My courage is renowned,/I have fallen on hard times."

As they grow up, the effeminate Douzi (played as a teenager by Yin Zhi) is cast in female roles, specializing in the role of the self-sacrificing concubine who kills herself for loyalty to her king in this drama. Shitou (played by Zhao Hailong) is cast in masculine, heroic parts, such as the King in the same work. As adults, they rise to become stars of the Peking opera world. Dreamy Douzi, adopting the stage name of Cheng Dieyi (Leslie Cheung), remains half in love with his stage brother Shitou, now called Duan Xiaolou (Zhang Fengyi).

Ba wang bie ji

But Xiaolou has another life he wants to lead—off stage—and marries Juxian (Gong Li), a courtesan he has been seeing. Douzi, of course, gets deeply jealous.

Meanwhile, their theater troupe is subjected to the caprice of successive waves of conquerors—Japanese, Kuomintang, Communist, then the Red Guards of the Cultural Revolution—that wash over the city. It is under the Cultural Revolution that they suffer the most. Not only is the practice of their art interrupted, they are forced to denounce one another in public, betraying friends and lovers alike.

In the film, the story of the politics of modern China is told alongside Dieyi's confusion between theater and reality. While the politics is kept deliberately vague, we are made well aware of the gap between theater and reality. In the end, human beings fail to achieve the sterling archetypes in such dramas like The King Parts from His Concubine, being much weaker creatures in the face of adversity.

However, some of the most marvelous scenes in Farewell remain at the beginning, with the boys in their early days of Peking opera training. It reflects Chen's own fascination with the art form. "Peking opera is amazing. You have to spend your whole life training," the director has said. "There is something about Chinese opera that is fundamentally Chinese."

These early scenes have the crisp vision of early Chen Kaige films, while the story of the adults becomes muddled and at times unconvincing. For example, the character of the third person in the triangle, Juxian, is never fleshed out.

Produced by a Hong Kong film company run by former Taiwan film star Hsu Feng, Farewell was a Chinese film that spared no expenses. The period costuming and sets were meticulously reconstructed, and the color-saturated cinematography by Gu Changwei captures their sumptuousness.

This ambitious epic managed to turn the heads of the Cannes International Film Festival jury in May 1993, and the top prize of the Palme d'Or was awarded to two extraordinary films that year — Chen Kaige's Farewell My Concubine and Jane Campion's The Piano. The film went on to win other awards, as well, including best foreign film from both the New York Film Critics Circle and the Golden Globe, as well as a place in the New York Film Festival that fall and a nomination for the Oscar.

In Hong Kong, where the audience was jaded and impatient with a nearly three-hour piece of cultural history, the film came and went, but in the two other Chinas, in Taiwan and on the mainland, it churned up its share of controversy before finding huge audiences. In Taiwan, following current regulations, it was banned for having too many mainland actors; in China, it was banned for unspecified, though certainly political, reasons. A quick change in the regulations allowed it to be shown in Taiwan, where it made box office records. Minor edits allowed it to be shown in China.

For Chen, whose who had never had a popular success in his own country and whose previous film Life on a String was banned there, the showing of Farewell in China was especially gratifying.

Chen Kaige (b. 1952) is one of the two best known of Fifth Generation directors, along with Zhang Yimou. He is the son of veteran Chinese director Chen Huaikai, who made film versions of Chinese opera in his heyday.

—Scarlet Cheng

BAB EL HADID

(Cairo Station; Cairo: Central Station; Iron Gate)

Egypt, 1957

Director: Youssef Chahine

Production: Gabriel Talhami Productions; black and white; running time: 90 minutes.

Producer: Gibrail Abdel Hay Adib; screenplay: Gibrail Hay Adib; dialogue: Mohamed Abou Youssef; photography: Alwise; editor: Kamal Abou el-Ela; music: Fouad al-Zahiry.

Cast: Farid Chawky (Abou Serih); Hind Roustom (Hannoumat); Youssef Chahine (Kenawi); Hassan Al-Baroudi; Abdel Najdi.

Publications

Books:

Khan, M., An Introduction to the Egyptian Cinema, London, 1969.
Malkmus, Lizbeth, and Armes, Roy, Arab and African Film Making, London, 1991.

Articles:

Markus, Bert, "Tatort . . . Hauptbahnhof Kairo" in Filmwoche (Denmark), 1982.
Cine-Revue (Brussels), 17 June 1982.
Hollywood Reporter (Los Angeles), 7 August 1990.

* * *

Cairo Station—as Bab el Hadid is most widely known in English—is perhaps especially memorable for its rich visual content. It includes frequent long shots which place the main characters against the complex and busy background of the real railroad station of the title. It has occasional and highly effective sequences of complete silence, which contrast with the usual noise and bustle and place the weight of the story on visual explication alone. It also includes such powerful single images as the sight of living human beings dwarfed by a gigantic statue of the ancient ruler Rameses II. The fact that Youssef Chahine, who both directed the film and stars in it, was initially trained as a painter before turning to filmmaking comes as no surprise.

Yet films are far more than just the moving pictures they were initially labelled and dismissed as; and a film may be memorable for its visual content because the other elements that make it up are inadequate or unsatisfying. It must be stressed that Cairo Station is by no means a bad film—whether that means simply boring, or implies technical shortcomings, implausible plotting, wooden acting, or other defects. It is entertaining, thought-provoking, and on the whole worth spending time watching and absorbing. Yet it does fall short of the real greatness in other departments that its sheer visual brilliance deserves. The main problem is that it attempts to do too many things at once and thus ends up doing none of them as well as it might have.

If the film is taken, for example, as being mainly a portrayal of life among those who work in and pass through the "iron gate," the main railroad station in the Egyptian capital, it stands comparison with other films about great meeting places—such as Grand Hotel or even the Airport series. Just as they preserve forever the manners and interactions, down to clothes and haircuts, of particular types of people in a great public space at a particular time, so Cairo Station succeeds in creating, in a manner which looks effortless but must have been time-consuming and difficult, a convincing version of the sights and sounds of meeting and parting, buying and selling, eating and drinking. Even so, by 1958, for both Egyptian and non-Egyptian audiences, tugging at the heart-strings with meetings and partings between unnamed and briefly shown mothers and sons, conscripted soldiers and their families and other such clichéd figures was surely all too familiar a method for both evoking the audience's feelings and frustrating them. Thus what was presumably meant to underline the point that life goes on as usual, even as the central tragedy unfolds, continues to be valuable as a documentary record but, as a mainstay of the story, comes across as unfocused and uninvolved.

While such use of stereotypes in composing the background to the narrative is understandable—after all, an attempt at anything more complex or unpredictable might have ended up fussy and distracting—the dependence of the main story on similar stereotypes is a definite weakness. Kenawi, the disabled newspaper vendor whose unrequited love leads him to a violent mental collapse, is that stock character of both Arab and European literature, a man of peasant stock adrift in the big, frightening city. The lemonade seller, Hannoumat, who leads him on, only to repel him in the end, is the wearisomely familiar figure of the woman defined by her physique and her supposed instincts, apparently incapable of thought or initiative. The man she really loves, Abou Serih the porter, is handsome, popular, and—in a subplot which promises to deepen the complexities of the film but merely confuses them—nobly but mystifyingly committed to forming a union among his fellow-workers. But what are the motivations for their respective actions, beyond the obvious ones? A more daring, more critical, and—not an irrelevant consideration—more truly entertaining film might have depicted all three as real people, allowing Kenawi at least to try to overcome his constantly emphasized isolation, Hannoumat to have relatives and friends and a life of her own and Abou Serih to have doubts and anxieties about his personal and union affairs alike. But Cairo Station, for all its depth of field and breadth of vision, lacks psychological depth or social breadth. The final scene, when Kenawi is taken away in a straitjacket through the crowds, having been persuaded that he is dressing up for a wedding that will never take place, is indeed as moving and as ironic as it was no doubt meant to be, but would have been even more effective if the audience had been given more to sympathize with, to react against and to think about.

In its combination of technical brilliance with rhetorical hollowness Cairo Station is indeed no worse than most of the films produced by the dream factories of Hollywood or elsewhere. It may even be somewhat unfair and inappropriate to be disappointed by a film which was produced under similar conditions to the melodramas of the Hollywood golden age; which, at least for Egyptian audiences, can be compared and contrasted with others of Chahine's numerous films; and which was probably intended more as entertainment than as any kind of social commentary. But as with other melodramas of unrequited love and social fatalism, it is surely just as legitimate to regret the opportunities which were missed or frustrated as to give due praise to the ways in which other opportunities were taken and fully realized.

—Patrick Heenan

BABETTES GAESTEBUD

(Babette's Feast)

Denmark, 1987

Director: Gabriel Axel

Production: Panorama Film International; color; 35mm; running time: 102 minutes. Released in Denmark 28 August 1987; distributed in USA by Orion Classics. Filmed on location in Jutland, Denmark.

Producers: Just Betzer and Bo Christensen; screenplay: Gabriel Axel, from the story by Isak Dinesen (Karen Blixen); photography: Henning Kristiansen; editor: Finn Hendriksen; sound: Hans-Eric Ahn; production design: Sven Wichmann; costume designer: Annelise Hauberg; music: Per Norgaard, with additional music by Mozart and Brahms; gastronomic consultant: Jan Petersen.

Cast: Stéphane Audran (Babette); Bodil Kjer (Filippa); Birgitte Federspiel (Martine); Jarl Kulle (Lorenz Lowenhielm); Jean-Philippe Lafont (Achille Papin); Bibi Andersson (Swedish court lady); Ghita Norby (narrator); Hanna Stensgaard (Young Filippa); Vibeki Hastrup (Young Martine); Gudmar Wivesson (Young Lorens); Else Petersen (Solveig); Pouel Kern (the minister/father); Erik Petersen (Erik).

Awards: Oscar for Best Foreign Film, 1988; Rouen Nordic Film Festival Grand Jury Prize and Audience Award, 1988; British Academy Award for Best Film Not in the English Language, 1989.

Publications

Articles:

Chevassu, F., and D. Parra, "La festin de Babette/Entretien avec Gariel Axel/Entretien avec Stéphane Audran," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), no. 437, April 1988.

"Babette's Feast," in EPD Film (Berlin), vol. 5, no. 12, December 1988.

Daems, P., "De discrete charme van Stéphane Audran," in Film + Televisie (Brussels), no. 381, February 1989.

* * *

Few could have predicted that an unheralded Danish film would become one of the more esteemed European films of the late 1980s. Babette's Feast unexpectedly won the Oscar for Best Foreign Film as well as a number of other international awards; became one of the most popular—indeed, beloved—films on the American art-house circuit; inspired ambitious restaurants to offer a menu duplicating the titular feast (at a princely cost); and set a pathway for more recent "great food" movies like Ang Lee's Eat Drink Man Woman and Stanley Tucci's Big Night. Its director, whose first film appeared in 1955 and who was 68 when the film was released, was relatively unknown outside Scandinavia before the success of Babette and has remained so. Thus, the film's non-Danish admirers have been left to conclude, rightly or wrongly, that its success, even perfection of a sort, was due to a felicitous coming together of a classic novella faithfully adapted, an excellent cast with particularly memorable faces, and splendid photography capturing not only those faces but the somber landscapes, the spartan dwellings, and of course the sumptuous food.

Axel changed Isak Dinesen's original setting amid Norwegian fjords and mountains to a flatter Danish Jutland—possibly for budgetary reasons, but certainly with dramatic appropriateness, considering the greater austerity of the land to match the sober lives of the villagers (no competition here for the spectacle of the dinner). He also offered a village of uniform gray houses rather than the "toy-town. . . painted gray, yellow, pink and many other colors" of the story. Changes in the narrative are slight, but telling. For example, soon after Babette, the mysterious Parisian political refugee, is taken in as a servant by a unmarried pair of kindly but puritanical Danish sisters, she is taught how to make their dreary daily food of cod and ale-bread, a kind of porridge. In the story, "during the demonstration the Frenchwoman's face became absolutely expressionless," but she soon learns the task, and eventually the food. The food, which the sisters distribute in daily charity rounds, "acquired a new, mysterious power to stimulate and strengthen their poor and sick." But in Axel's film, we see Babette buy onions from the grocer and pick wild herbs for her dish, and watch the pleased faces of the indigent sampling her version (as well as their chagrin when Babette is briefly out of town and the sisters' sludgy recipe is revived).

The overall arc of the story remains the same. We are immediately introduced to the elderly sisters and the other villagers, disciples of the ascetic sect founded by the women's father, then learn of each sister's missed opportunity for a youthful love affair—Martine with a young officer army officer and Filippa with an opera singer who spots her vocal talent—and of the arrival of Babette, before we return to the present time (about 1887) for the main event of the tale. In his lengthy flashback Axel dwells more than Dinesen on smart details of the officers' barracks, and he inserts a cameo for Bibi Andersson in the parallel story of the opera singer (appropriately a Don Giovanni who fails to win over his Danish Zerlina). In both episodes the color and dash of the more elegant settings bring out the plainness of the sisters' lives all the more.

Babettes Gaestebud

In the second half Axel adheres scrupulously to Dinesen's tale, while using Stéphane Audran's elegant bearing and air of "having lived"—not to mention auburn hair—as a foil to the sweet simplicity of the sisters. (The actresses playing the latter with great poignancy, both veterans of Danish film, look like an elderly Loretta Young and Olivia de Havilland.) In story and film Babette wins a lottery, asks the sisters for permission to serve them and the other disciples a celebration dinner on the evening of their late father's centenary (though "a very plain supper with a cup of coffee was the most sumptuous meal to which they had ever asked any guest to sit down"), terrifies them with her imported ingredients (a huge live turtle is only part of what they now fear will be some kind of witch's sabbath), and ultimately serves a feast that only a great artist, once chef of one of Paris' greatest restaurants, could conceive and execute. The heart of the drama—and Axel and his crew rise to the occasion—is the breakdown of the disciples' resistance to the splendid meal, and their attainment of a joyful, life-changing state of grace that seems to go beyond the aesthetic and sensuous into the spiritual—both touching and comical to watch.

Axel's succession of images builds steadily toward the dinner itself: the procession of the foodstuffs past the houses of astonished villagers, the ironing of the white tablecloth, the close-ups of quail carcasses being plucked and carved up, as matter-of-factly as in a Dutch still life. As in the story, the surprise extra guest—the officer, now a retired general, who has lived in Paris—provides an entry to the scene for us, as the one person perfectly cognizant of how truly extraordinary the meal is. (The other guests watch him for clues on how to eat the odder fare.) Otherwise there is no one center of attention: we take in the glow of glasses of sherry and champagne and red wine against the black clothing and white hair of the diners; the General's comical astonishment over each course and beverage; the sounds of cutlery and conversation and champagne fizzing (gentle soundtrack music is intermittent and discreet); the neighbor called Solveig taking wonderful delight in her wine; the carriage man—a bit player straight out of a John Ford film (as is the diner who can't hold back an occasional "Hallelujah!")—hanging out in the kitchen and sampling the food and drink; Erik, the teenage server, soberly carrying out Babette's instructions; and Babette herself taking an occasional moment to savor the fabulous wine she has ordered. Many of these details are inventions of the filmmaker that broaden Dinesen's love feast to include all the characters, not just those at the table.

In the novella it snows the night of the feast but the sky clears momentarily when the guests leave the sisters' house, slipping in the drifts and playing like children as they hold hands. In the film there is only a misty rain before the feast, but Axel's diners too hold hands under a starry sky—here, forming a circle around the well as they sing a hymn. The snow, a cozy white blanket in Dinesen, here begins to fall only in the final moments, and is seen only through the cottage windows, as a hint of death or transience to accompany the dialogue and a guttering candle. But the overwhelming sense of joy as well as evanescence remains, and the film itself, like the dinner it dramatizes, becomes an example of great art springing from what the sophisticated world may call an obscure setting.

—Joseph Milicia

BADLANDS

USA, 1973

Director: Terrence Malick

Production: Pressman-Williams Enterprises; CFIC colour, 35mm; running time: 94 minutes.

Badlands

Producer: Terrence Malick; executive producer: Edward R. Pressman; screenplay: Terrence Malick; assistant directors: John Broderick, Carl Olsen; photography: Tak Fujimoto, Brian Probyn, Stevan Lerner; editor: Robert Estrin; associate editor: William Weber; art directors: Jack Fisk, Ed Richardson; sound editor: James Nelson; music: George A. Tipton; costumes: Rosanna Norton.

Cast: Martin Sheen (Kit Carruthers); Sissy Spacek (Holly); Warren Oates (Holly's Father); Ramon Bieri (Cato); Alan Vint (Deputy); Gary Littlejohn (Sheriff); John Carter (Rich Man); Bryan Montgomery (Boy); Gail Threlkeld (Girl).

Publications

Books:

Thompson, D.K, in Magill's Survey of Cinema, Second Series, vol. I edited by Frank Magill, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
Peary, Danny, Cult Movies, New York, 1981.
Williams, Mark, Road Movies, New York, 1982.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 10 October 1973.
Monaco, J., Take One (Montreal), January 1974.
Buckley, M., Films in Review (New York), April 1974.
Johnson, William, Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1974.
Kinder, Marsha, "The Return of the Outlaw Couple," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1974.
King, M., "Badlands; shoot first. . ." in Jump Cut (Chicago), May-June 1974.
Rosenbaum, J., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1974.
Gow, G., Films and Filming (London), December 1974.
Combs, R., Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1974-75.
Walker, B., "Malick on Badlands" in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1975.
Ciment, Michel, "Entretien avec Terrence Malick" in Positif (Paris), June 1975.
Sineux, M., "Un cauchemar de douceur" in Positif (Paris), June 1975.
Martin, M., Ecran 75 (Paris), July-August 1975.
Rabourdin, D., Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1975.
Béhar, H., "La ballade sauvage" in Image et Son (Paris), September 1975.
Henderson, B., "Exploring Badlands" in Wide Angle (Baltimore), 1983.
Mooney, J. "Martin Sheen in Badlands," Movieline (Escondido, California), vol. 6, December 1994.
Stein, Michael Eric, "The New Violence or Twenty Years of Violence in Films: An Appreciation," Films in Review (New York), vol. 46, January/February 1995.

* * *

Twenty-eight year old Terrence Malick's sublime debut as writer/producer/director of Badlands, has endured through time to foster admiration from, and satisfaction for, the spectator, as it did upon its release in 1973. Perhaps Malick's career as a philosophy teacher before entering filmmaking provided a foundation to the clarity of his vision in this work.

Kit Carruthers (Martin Sheen), a garbage collector, meets Holly Sargis (Sissy Spacek) as he walks past her front lawn. She is practicing baton twirling and is charmed by his apparent worldliness. The banal cynicism of the midwest setting and the sleepy pace are disrupted as Kit murders Holly's father because he disapproves of their relationship.

This is the beginning of Kit's killing spree from South Dakota to finally, the badlands of Montana. Kit ultimately surrenders to the authorities, basking in their admiration of him and his legendary wild man status. Holly has realized that she no longer wants to be around the "hell bent type anymore," and has abandoned Kit just prior to his arrest.

Both repellent and magnetic, Malick draws us into the world of Kit, whose subsequent violent journey is intoned through the sporadic ethereal narration of Holly.

Through the brilliantly droll script we become disassociated from Kit's violence and rather, feel sympathy for the dysfunctional protagonist. This reflects Holly's own journey with Kit and her observation at one point, "The world seemed like a faraway planet." From Holly's father's attempts to keep her away from Kit—"He said if the piano didn't keep me off the streets maybe the clarinet would"—to Holly's reaction to sex—"Gosh, what was everyone talkin' about?"—Malick's writing shines throughout. On second or third viewing of this film the dialogue seems to increase in its hilarity and enunciates Kits and Holly's childlike naivety and stupidity.

Although Malick used three photographers, all with diverse filmic backgrounds, there remains visual fluidity and continuity throughout Badlands. The visual style achieves harmony with the emotional framework, objective, yet intensely intimate. George Tipton's score, with its fairground music quality, reinforces the innocence of the piece whilst underpinning the malevolence of Kit.

Badlands is a masterful work and fully deserves the many accolades that have been awarded to it.

—Marion Pilowsky

THE BAKER'S WIFE

See LA FEMME DU BOULANGER

BALADA O SOLDATE

(Ballad of a Soldier)

USSR, 1959

Director: Grigori Chukhrai

Production: Mosfilm; black and white, 35mm; running time: 89 minutes; length: 8045 feet. Released 1959. Filmed 1958.

Screenplay: Grigori Chukhrai and Valentin Yoshov; photography: V. Nikolaev and Era Savelieva; editor: M. Timofeieva; art direction: B. Nemechek; music: Mikhail Siv.

Cast: Vladimir Ivashov (Alyosha Skvortsov); Shanna Prokhorenko (Shura); Antonina Maximova (Mother); Nikolai Kruchkov (General); Evgeni Urbanski (Crippled soldier).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Special Jury Prize, 1960; honored at All-Union Film Festival of Russia and at the Czechoslovak Film Festival for Working People, 1960; Lenin Prize to Grigori Chukhrai, 1961.

Publications

Script:

Chukhrai, Grigori, and Valentin Yoshov, Balada o soldate, Moscow, 1967; extract in Films and Filming (London), July 1961.

Books:

Chang, Kuang-nien, An Example of Modern Revisionist Art: A Critique of the Films and Statements of Grigori Chukhrai (in English), Peking, 1965.

Shneiderman, Isaak, Grigorii Chukhrai, Leningrad, 1965.

Liehm, Mira, and Antonin J. Liehm, The Most Important Art: East European Art after 1945, Berkeley, 1977.

Veress, József, Grigorij Cshuraj, Budapest, Hungary, 1978.

Garbicz, Adam, and Jacek Kalinowski, editors, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey Two: The Cinema of the Fifties, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1979.

Articles:

Johnson, Albert, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1960.

Film a Doba (Prague), no. 11, 1960.

Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 26 December 1960.

Clark, Arthur, in Films in Review (New York), January 1961.

Gerasimov, Sergei, "Views of Life Compared: Chukhrai and Fellini," in Films and Filming (London), March 1961.

Whitehall, Richard, in Films and Filming (London), July, 1961.

Herlinghaus, Hermann, "A Talk with Grigori Chukhrai," in Film Culture (New York), no. 26, 1962.

"Discussion in Villepre," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 5, 1962.

Chukhrai, Grigori, "Keeping the Old on Their Toes," in Films and Filming (London), October 1962.

Badder, D. J., "Grigori Chukhrai," in Film Dope (London), April 1975.

De Libero, L., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), January-February 1977.

Donets, L., in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 1, 1989.

Iensen, T., "Četyre dnja bez vojny," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 5, May 1995.

* * *

Superficially, Grigori Chukhrai's Ballad of a Soldier has the naivety of a recruitment poster. At the height of the Nazi invasion, a young signalman, Vladimir Ivashov (Alyosha Skvortsov), cripples three tanks, and is given a week's leave to visit his mother. Struggling towards his home village by car and train, he sacrifices his time, little by little, to those who need it more. He helps an amputee frightened of returning to his young wife, delivers a precious gift of soap to the family of a soldier he meets on the road, saves victims of an air raid and befriends a girl, Shura, with whom he falls in love. Alyosha reaches the village on the last day, spends only a few minutes with his mother, then leaves, never to return. We know from the outset that he'll be killed in battle and buried by strangers, far from home, known to them only as "a Russian soldier."

Accustomed to think of Soviet film in terms of Eisenstein's historical epics or collectivist propaganda of The Brave Tractor Driver variety, Western audiences of the late 1950s welcomed Gerasimov's And Quiet Flows the Don, Kalatozov's The Cranes Are Flying, and especially Chukhrai's The Forty First and Ballad of a Soldier as assurances that the 19th-century humanism of Tolstoy and Turgenev survived under "social realism."

Critics who looked deeper recognised the films as covertly symptomatic of repression. All were set during World War II, one of the few "safe" historical periods under Stalin, and on their plots the dogmas of collectivism, national unity, suspicion of foreign entanglements, and the immersion of cultural minorities rested a heavy hand. From the first sequence of Ballad, where Alyosha's bereaved mother (clearly a metaphoric Mother Russia, just as Alyosha is a symbol of selfless anonymous service to the state) stands amid collectivised wheat and remembers the son of whom, until he left for war, she had known "everything there was to know," one is aware of a society where a shared accountability, not only for one's work but for one's thoughts, is ingrained from birth.

Ballad of a Soldier is not without its tentatively subversive elements. Authority figures may be revered, but Chukhrai does show a venal sentry extorting a bribe of canned beef to let Alyosha on the train (though he's later exposed and punished by a kindly officer). Free enterprise raises its head in a market at a railroad terminus, but the tone of this scene, where Alyosha buys a scarf as a gift for his mother, is absurdly furtive. The bartering peasants circling one another in cautious silence might be selling heroin rather than the family samovar.

Politically, the most significant encounter of the boy's journey is with a group of dispossessed Ukrainians, en route to factory work in the Urals. Since Ukrainian separatists sided with the Nazis early in the war and nationalism remained rampant, not only in the Ukraine but in other republics, the appearance of these refugees in national dress, advertising their despair at losing their home ("We're like birds in the autumn. We don't know where we're flying") is unexpected.

Both Chukhrai films won Cannes Festival prizes and were circulated more widely than any Soviet productions of the time. In the popular imagination, they represented Russian cinema, much as La dolce vita was seen to typify Italian film or French Cancan, the French. But Ballad, with its academic visual style, reminiscent of David Lean, who cast a long shadow over post-war film in Europe and Asia, and its tone of moral rectitude directed against the unpatriotic and the unfaithful, hardly bears comparison with the best European work of the time.

Nevertheless, the film carries conviction. Chukhrai shows skill with actors, extracting in particular a moving performance from Evgeni Urbanski as the one-legged soldier who considers losing himself in Russia's vastness in preference to returning home a cripple. In a scene at a railway telegraph office that, in visual style and performance, might have been extracted from Brief Encounter, Urbanski tries to send a telegram explaining his defection, but is talked out of it by Alyosha and an irate clerk, who speaks for all the women waiting at home. Urbanski's later bitterness as he waits on a platform which gradually empties of passengers, and the moving reunion with the wife are handled with an agreeable lack of sentiment and rhetoric.

Such scenes lie at the heart of the film, and excuse the coy romance (in a railway car conveniently filled with hay) of Alyosha and the chaste Shura (Shanna Prokhorenko). In general, however, Ballad of a Soldier and other World War II dramas belong outside the stream of Soviet film. They were made as if Dziga Vertov, Dovzhenko, even Eisenstein had never existed. In retrospect, we can see that the most important film produced by this fad for wartime propaganda was Tarkovsky's Ivan's Childhood. Nevertheless, Ballad of a Soldier and Grigori Chukhrai himself deserve a niche in Soviet film history as, if nothing else, symptoms of an early opening to the West.

—John Baxter

THE BALLAD OF NARAYAMA

See NARAYAMA BUSHI-KO

LE BALLET MÉCANIQUE

France, 1924

Director: Fernand Léger

Production: Black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 14 minutes; length: 1260 meters. Released 1924. When shown in Berlin in 1925, part or all of Ballet mécanique was exhibited under the title Images Mobile. Filming probably began with the "Charlot Cubiste" (Cubist Charlie Chaplin) sequence in 1923; filming completed in November 1924, most likely in Paris; cost: about 5000 francs.

Producer: Fernand Léger; photography: Dudley Murphy (some sources credit Man Ray as well); sources indicate the editing was probably handled by Dudley Murphy; music: George Antheil; assistant director: Dudley Murphy.

Cast: Kiki; Dudley Murphy.

Publications

Books:

Antheil, Georges, Bad Boys of Music, New York, 1945.

Manvell, Roger, editor, Experiment in the Film, New York, 1948; revised edition, 1970.

Tyler, Parker, Underground Cinema, New York, 1969.

Curtis, David, Experimental Cinema, New York, 1971.

Lawder, Standish, The Cubist Cinema, New York, 1975.

Le Grice, Malcolm, Abstract Film and Beyond, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1977.

- Sitney, P. Adams, Visionary Film: The American Avant-Garde 1943–1978, New York, 1979.
- Fabre, Gladys C., Barbara Rose, and Marie-Odile Odile, Léger and the Modern Spirit: An Avant-Garde Alternative to Non-Objective Art, Seattle, 1983.
- De Francia, Peter, Fernand Léger, New Haven, Connecticut, 1983.
- Kosinski, Dorothy M., editor, Fernand Léger, 1911–1924: The Rhythm of Modern Life, Munich, 1994.
- Buck, Robert T., Fernand Léger, New York, 1995.
- Faerna, Jose M., Léger, New York, 1996.
- Lanchner, Carolyn, Fernand Léger, New York, 1998.

Articles:

- Bond, Kirk, “Léger, Dreyer, and Montage,” in Creative Art (New York), October 1932.
- Richter, Hans, “The Avant-Garde Film Seen from Within,” in Hollywood Quarterly, Fall 1949.
- Jackiewicz, A., “Epizod filmowy w dziele Fernanda Léger,” in Kino (Warsaw), March 1974.
- Brown, Geoff, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1977.
- Brenden, Richard, “Functions of Film: Léger’s Cinema on Paper and on Cellulose,” in Cinema Journal (Champaign, Illinois), Fall 1984.
- Serenellini, M., “I contrastie delle forme in Ballet mécanique,” in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), December 1984.
- Fuchs, H., “Een geschiedenis van kleur en zwart-wit,” in Skrien (Amsterdam), December-January 1990–91.

* * *

Contemporary film scholarship recognizes at least three major types of production. Most familiar and most popular is the fictive narrative, with roots back beyond Griffith’s 1915 feature, The Birth of a Nation. Comparably familiar, though less popular, is the actuality film, with its documentary tradition at least as old as the 1920s work of artists like Flaherty and Grierson. Least familiar and least understood by popular audiences is the experimental film, which had its beginnings in the European avant-garde of the 1920s.

The European avant-garde was based largely upon the efforts of painters and other artists in Germany and France. Thus certain stylistics which mark the strategies of European painting during the 1920s often mark European avant-garde films: the stylistics of Futurism, Cubism, Dadaism, and Surrealism.

One of the best books on this period of experimental film is Standish Lawder’s The Cubist Cinema. In part, Lawder’s purpose was to relate classic European avant-garde films by Richter, Eggeling, Ruttman, and Léger to classic paintings of the period by Picasso, Kandinsky, Duchamp, and Léger. Indeed, it is especially interesting to find Léger’s name common to both lists in light of the fact that his film Ballet mécanique constitutes one of the most famous and most successful examples surviving this brief-lived but highly innovative, highly influential period of experimental production.

Typically, experimental films are brief, independently-financed productions which tend toward innovative techniques and non-narrative structures. Often they are a collaborative, being the sole product of but one or two artists. Ballet mécanique is no exception to these characteristics. While the camerawork is attributed to the American Dudley Murphy, the 1924 French production is otherwise the work of one man, Fernand Léger.

Before he was 20, Léger had become a Cubist painter whose subject matter eventually centered on mechanical devices and urban imagery. Ballet mécanique is his sole film (although he did some work with Hans Richter on Dreams that Money Can Buy two decades later). He recalls that the film cost him some 5,000 francs, independent financing allowing him control comparable to that which he enjoyed with his paintings. Ballet mécanique is a difficult film to describe, though countless film scholars have embraced that very task. It is a brief, non-narrative exploration of cubist form, black and white tonalities, and various vectors through its constant, rapidly cut movements and compositions. As Lawder details in his study, many of the film’s forms and compositions are reflected in—or themselves reflect—forms and compositions in Léger’s famous cubist paintings from this period. Clearly the film allowed Léger cinematic extension of the formal problems he continued to explore in his single canvases.

The film flashes through over 300 shots in less than 15 silent minutes. The subjects of these fleeting images are diverse and difficult to quickly catalog: bottles, hats, triangles, a woman’s smile, reflections of the camera in a swinging sphere, prismatically crafted abstractions of light and line, gears, numbers, chrome machine (or kitchen) hardware, carnival rides, shop mannequin parts, hats and shoes, etc. All interweave a complex cinematic metaphor which bonds man and machine. Further, Ballet mécanique’s whimsical, witty, dadaist portrait seems to center on the looped repetition of a large woman repeatedly and mechanically ascending a stair (one of the first known examples of loop-printing, a technique later to become a mainstay of international experimental film after the 1960s).

Throughout its history, Ballet mécanique has always been a film more for other film artists or film scholars than for a general public. Still, it continues to enjoy critical attention and acclaim, and continues to influence the ongoing expression of experimental filmmakers throughout the industrialized free world.

—Edward S. Small

THE BAND WAGON

USA, 1953

Director: Vincente Minnelli

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Picture Corp; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 112 minutes. Released 1953. Filmed in the MGM studios.

Producer: Arthur Freed; screenplay: Betty Comden and Adolph Green; photography: Harry Jackson; editor: Albert Akst; production designers: Edwin Willis and Keogh Gleason; set designs for musical numbers: Oliver Smith; art directors: Cedric Gibbons and Preston Ames; music: Howard Dietz and Arthur Schwartz; music director: Adolph Deutsch; costume designer: Mary Ann Nyberg; dance direction: Michael Kidd.

The Band Wagon

Cast: Fred Astaire (Tony Hunter); Cyd Charisse (Gabrielle Gerard); Nanette Fabray (Lily Marton); Oscar Levant (Lester Marton); Jack Buchanan (Jeffrey Cordova); James Mitchell (Paul Byrd).

Publications

Books:

Astaire, Fred, Steps in Time, New York, 1959.
 de la Roche, Catherine, Vincente Minnelli, New Zealand, 1959; reprinted in Film Culture (New York), June 1959.
 Springer, John, All Singing, All Dancing, New York, 1966.
 Truchaud, Francois, Vincente Minnelli, Paris, 1966.
 Kobal, John, Gotta Sing, Gotta Dance, New York, 1970.
 Thomas, Lawrence, B., The MGM Years, New Rochelle, New York, 1972.
 Minnelli, Vincente, and Hector Arce, I Remember It Well, New York, 1974.
 Delameter, James, Dance in the Hollywood Musical, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.
 Mueller, John, Astaire Dancing: The Musical Films, New York, 1985.
 Thomas, Bob, Astaire: The Man, the Dancer, London, 1985.
 Drouin, Frédérique, Fred Astaire, Paris, 1986.
 Brion, Patrick, and others, Vincente Minnelli, Paris, 1985.
 Adler, Bill, Fred Astaire: A Wonderful Life, New York, 1987.
 Satchell, Tim, Astaire: The Biography, London, 1987.
 Harvey, Stephen, Directed by Vincente Minnelli, New York, 1990.
 Naremore, James, The Films of Vincente Minnelli, Cambridge, 1993.

Articles:

Jablonski, Edward, in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1953.
 Lambert, Gavin, Sight and Sound (London), January-March 1954.
 Chaumont, Etienne, "L'Oeuvre de Vincente Minnelli," in Positif (Paris), November-December 1954.
 Pratley, Gerald, "Fred Astaire's Film Career," in Films in Review (New York), January 1957.
 Bitsch, Charles, and Jean Domarchi, "Entretien avec Vincente Minnelli," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August-September 1957.
 Tranchant, François, "Invitation à la danse," in Image et Son (Paris), January 1958.
 Johnson, Albert, "The Films of Vincente Minnelli," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1958 and Spring 1959.
 Conrad, Derek, "2 Feet in the Air," in Films and Filming (London), no. 3, 1959.
 Minnelli, Vincente, "The Rise and Fall of the Musical," in Films and Filming (London), January 1962.
 Domarchi, Jean, and Jean Douchet, "Rencontre avec Vincente Minnelli," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1962.
 Torok, Paul, and Jacques Quincey, "Vincente Minnelli; ou, Le Peintre de la vie revêue," in Positif (Paris), March 1963.
 "Minnelli Issue" of Movie (London), June 1963.
 de la Roche, Catherine, "Vincente Minnelli," in Premier Plan (Paris), March 1966.

Giles, D., "Show-Making," in Movie (London), Spring 1977.
 Mueller, J., in Dance Magazine (New York), May 1979.
 Johnson, Julia, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Polan, Dana B., "It Could Be Oedipus Rex: Denial and Difference in The Band Wagon," in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Summer-Fall 1981.
 de Kuyper, Eric, "Reflexions on the 'Dancing in the Dark' Sequence from Vincente Minnelli's The Band Wagon," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 5, no. 3, 1983.
 Damisch, Hubert, "Un trouble de mémoire au cinéma," in Cinémathèque, no. 7, Spring 1995.
 Saada, N., "Howard Dietz et Arthur Schwartz: The Bandwagon," in Cahiers du Cinéma, Hors serie, 1995.
 Mueller, J., and G. Aachen, "The Band Wagon," in Reid's Film Index (New South Wales, Australia), no. 32, 1997.

* * *

The Band Wagon represents one of the most important of the MGM musicals of the 1950s, indeed in the history of this Hollywood genre. In particular, The Band Wagon stands as one of the masterworks to emerge from the very productive musicals unit that producer Arthur Freed controlled at MGM during the late 1940s and early 1950s.

The Band Wagon gestated in producer Freed's mind late in 1951. With recent successes of An American in Paris and Singin' in the Rain, Freed had the idea to acquire a song catalogue as the basis for this musical, in particular the songs of Howard Dietz, and his longtime partner Arthur Schwartz. Freed appreciated the creators of songs, having joined MGM as a song writer himself twenty five years earlier. By the time of The Band Wagon he had turned full-time to producing, winning every possible award offered in the Hollywood. Of the films he would produce in his long, distinguished career, none would be greater than The Band Wagon. Freed took "I Love Louisa," one of Schwartz and Dietz's hit songs, as the original title of his new musical and set the vast talents of MGM in motion. This meant first screen writers Betty Comden and Adolph Green who had penned Take Me Out to the Ball Game (1949), and Singin' in the Rain (1952), among other creations, at MGM. This also meant director Vincente Minnelli, who had long been an MGM stalwart since the successes of Meet Me in St. Louis (1944), The Pirate (1948), and An American in Paris (1952).

Freed had hundreds of stars from which to choose. He selected the great Fred Astaire, who although more famous for his RKO films with Ginger Rogers, had been at MGM since the early 1940s. Astaire's dance partner for The Band Wagon would be Cyd Charisse, who had been featured in Singin' in the Rain the year before.

During the first week of February 1952, Comden and Green commenced writing their original story and screenplay. (Eventually their script would include "themselves" in the form of Oscar Levant and Nanette Fabray couple, the principle difference being that Comden and Green were never married.) The story idea centered around "making a show," a classic narrative formula for the Hollywood musical.

The Band Wagon made use of the audience's particular knowledge of the career of Astaire. For example, the film's credits are superimposed on a top hat, white gloves, and a cane, probably the most famous icons of the American musical, indeed representing to all the genius of Astaire. But when the film opens we learn that the top hat is for sale and no one will buy it. Is Astaire washed up? This enigma sets “Astaire,” the man, the star, the legend, squarely in the middle of the story: can he (Fred Astaire/Tony Hunter) make a successful comeback?

The Band Wagon script resolves this dilemma by having Astaire/Hunter failing to make art (“this show is a modern version of Faust”), but instead again creating wonderful entertainment for the masses.

More than a dozen of the Schwartz and Dietz songs were used including “Something to Remember You By,” “I Guess I Have to Change My Plans,” “The Beggar’s Waltz,” “High and Low,” and most recognizable of all, “Dancing in the Dark.” The only original song, composed by Schwartz and Dietz in 1952, was “That’s Entertainment,” which later became the anthem for MGM’s Golden Age of the musical.

The rehearsal period for this complex dance musical began in August, 1952; and lasted six weeks. In the process the aforementioned talent created a series of wonderful individual numbers on which the film’s fame rests. For “Shine on Your Shoes,” Astaire was assisted by LeRoy Daniels, a non-actor, and an $8,000 “fun machine” which sounded like a calliope, shot out flags, rockets, and a kaleidoscope of colors. “The Girl Hunt” ballet, the film’s climax, presented a satire on the detective film with Astaire as the flat foot narrator, in slouch hat, dark shirt, and double breasted suit, the very antithesis of his classic top hat and tails.

The Band Wagon ended shooting late in January 1953, nearly a year from the day Comden and Green sat down to create the story. The final cost of the film came to more than two million dollars. (Indeed the “The Girl Hunt” ballet cost more than three hundred thousand dollars alone.) The premiere, in late July, came to glowing reviews, and upon its initial release The Band Wagon more than made up for its considerable investment, and thereafter has generated considerable profits for MGM.

—Douglas Gomery

THE BANDIT

See O CANGACEIRO

BANSHUN

(Late Spring)

Japan, 1949

Director: Yasujiro Ozu

Production: Shochiku (Ofuna); black and white; running time: 107 minutes. Released in Japan in 1949, and in USA in 1972.

Screenplay: Yasujiro Ozu and Koga Noda, from an original story by Kazuo Hirotsu; photography: Yuhara Attuita; music: Senji Ito.

Banshun

Cast: Chishu Ryu (The Father); Setsuko Hara (Noriko, the Daughter); Haruko Sugimura (The Aunt); Yumeji Tsukioka (Aya, the Daughter’s friend); Jun Usami (The Young man).

Awards: Kinema Jumbo Prize for Best Film of the Year, Japan, 1949.

Publications

Books:

Richie, Donald, 5 Pictures of Yasujiro Ozu, Tokyo, 1962.

Sato, Tadao, Ozu Yasujiro no Geijutsu (The Art of Yasujiro Ozu), Tokyo, 1971.

Richie, Donald, Japanese Cinema: Film Style and National Character, New York, 1971.

Satomi, Jun, and others, editors, Ozu Yasujiro—Hito to Shigoto (Yasujiro Ozu—The Man and His Work), Tokyo, 1972.

Schrader, Paul, Transcendental Style in Film: Ozu, Bresson, Dreyer, Berkeley, 1972.

Burch, Noël, Theory of Film Practice, New York, 1973.

Tessier, Max, “Yasujiro Ozu,” in Anthologie du cinéma 7, Paris, 1973.

Richie, Donald, Ozu, Berkeley, 1974.

Mellen, Joan, The Waves at Genji’s Door: Japan Through Its Cinema, New York, 1976.

Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, New York, 1978; revised edition, Tokyo, 1985.

Burch, Noël, To the Distant Observer, Berkeley, 1979.
 Sato, Tadao, Currents in Japanese Cinema (in English), Tokyo, 1982.
 Bordwell, David, Ozu and the Poetics of Cinema, Princeton, 1988.
 Hideki, Maeda, Ozu Yasujiro no ie: jizoku to shinto, Tokyo, 1993.
 Sho, Kida, Ozu Yasujiro no manazashi, Tokyo, 1999.

Articles:

Milne, Tom, "Flavour of Green Tea over Rice," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1973.
 Ryu, Chishu, "Yasujiro Ozu," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1964.
 Rosenbaum, Jonathan, "Ozu," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1972.
Variety (New York), 12 July 1972.
 Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 22 July 1972.
 Winsten, Archer, in New York Post, 22 July 1972.
 Byron, Stuart, in Village Voice (New York), 17 August 1972.
 Kauffmann, Stanley, in New Republic (New York), 19 August 1972.
 Zeaman, Marvin, "The Zen Artistry of Yasujiro Ozu: The Serene Poet of the Japanese Cinema," in Film Journal (New York), Fall-Winter 1972.
 Thompson, Kristin, and David Bordwell, "Space and Narrative in the Films of Ozu," in Screen (London), Summer 1976.
 "Ozu Section" of Cinéma (Paris), February 1981.
 Geist, K., "The Role of Marriage in the Films of Yasujiro Ozu," in East-West Film Journal (Honolulu), no. 1, 1989.
 "Ozu, la vita e la geometria dei film," in Castoro Cinema (Florence), no. 151, 1991.
 Wood, Robin, "The Noriko Trilogy," in Cineaction (Toronto), Winter 1992.
 Losilla, C. "En el abismo de lo nunca dicho," Nosferatu (Donostia-San Sebastian, Spain), no. 25, December 1997.
 Zunzunegui, S., "El fin de la primavera," Nosferatu (Donostia-San Sebastian, Spain), no. 25, December 1997.
 Zunzunegui, S. "Voces distantes," Nosferatu (Donostia-San Sebastian, Spain), no. 25, December 1997.

* * *

Late Spring is the first of six films Ozu made with Setsuko Hara, the titles of which are often motivated by the age and situation of Hara's character; in Late Spring she is of the age when a young woman was expected to be married, in Early Summer she is getting past it, and in Late Autumn she is a middle-aged widow. The first three films, symmetrically separated by two-year gaps and alternating with films without Hara—Late Spring (1949), Early Summer (1951), Tokyo Story (1953)—can be argued to form a loose trilogy. In all three (and only these three) Hara's character is named Noriko, and in each a major narrative concern is the pressure exerted upon her to marry or (in the case of Tokyo Story) remarry.

Late Spring, along with many other Ozu films, has suffered from the unfortunate polarization in the West of two influential but inadequate critical approaches: the kind of content analysis practised by Joan Mellen in The Waves at Genji's Door (plot synopsis followed by the judgement that Ozu was a conservative locked into a nostalgia for the values of a threatened or collapsed traditional Japanese patriarchy) and the formalist analysis of Noël Burch (To the Distant Observer) which produces Ozu as a "modernist" filmmaker because his method resists the dominance of the Hollywood codes, an approach that renders the subject-matter of the films irrelevant. (David Bordwell's recent Ozu and the Poetics of Cinema represents a surprising move toward rectifying this polarization, Bordwell having been previously associated with Burch's strict formalism.) The treatment of spatial relations in Ozu's work certainly differs significantly from the Hollywood norms, and this affects our relationship to the characters and the narrative, but the narrative remains clearly dominant: Ozu's meticulous concern with the minutiae of script construction on the one hand and acting on the other cannot be simply swept aside in order to fetishize his formal devices ("pillow shots," eyeline mismatches, use of 360 degree space, etc.). As for the charge of conservatism, Ozu's critical sensitivity to all aspects of social change, its gains and losses, the erosion of old values and the emergence of new, is such that the films offer themselves at least as readily to a radical as to a conservative reading. They are in fact so complex as to resist any simple political classification, every position dramatized in them being qualified by others. It is often difficult to define with the necessary clarity and precision exactly what the films are about.

It is easy, however, to state what Late Spring is not about: it is not about a young woman trying nobly to sacrifice herself and her own happiness in order dutifully to serve her widowed father in his lonely old age. If Noriko resists the social pressures that compel her into marriage (Ozu's comprehensive analysis of those pressures shows them convincingly to be irresistible), it is because she is thoroughly aware that she will never be as happy as she is within her present situation. The film precisely defines the choice that contemporary society (post-war Japan, with its conflicts between traditional values and Americanization) offers her: subordination to a husband in marriage, or entrance into the "emancipated" world of alienated labour (i.e., subordination, as secretary, to a male boss). The latter option is embodied in Noriko's best friend Aya, a young woman so completely "modernized" that her legs get stiff if she has to sit on a tatami mat. Far from denouncing the breach with traditional values, Ozu presents Aya with immense sympathy and good humour, the emphasis being on the constraints of her situation. On the other hand, traditional marriage is never presented in Ozu's films as in itself fulfilling, and especially not for the woman (Noriko's father informs her that her mother wept through most of the first years of their marriage).

With her father, Noriko has a freedom that she will never regain: she can go bicycling by the sea with handsome young men, visit sake bars with casual associates, enjoy relatively unrestricted movement. And movement (and its suppression) is the film's key motif and structuring principle. The first half contains (for Ozu) an unusual amount of camera movement accompanying or paralleling Noriko's sense of enjoyment and exhilaration (the train journey, the bicycle ride). The last camera movement in the film occurs in the scene in the park where her father and aunt finalize plans for her marriage. The film then moves inexorably to Noriko's entrapment in an irreversible process, her immobilization (beneath the heavy traditional wedding costume) and final obliteration (the empty mirror that replaces any depiction of the wedding ceremony). The film's final shot of the sea is commonly interpreted in terms of Zen-ian resignation and acceptance (Ozu once remarked that western critics don't understand his films, so "they always talk about Zen or something"); it can equally be read as a reminder of the bicycle ride and the lost freedom.

—Robin Wood

BARON PRASIL

(Baron Munchausen)

Czechoslovakia, 1961

Director: Karel Zeman

Production: Ceskoslovensky Statni Film; AGFA colour, 35mm; running time: 81 minutes.

Screenplay: Karel Zeman and Josef Kainar, from the original novel by Gottfried Burger; assistant directors: Zdenek Rozkopal and Jan Mimra; photography: Jiri Tarantik; art director: Karel Zeman; set design: Zdenek Rozkopal; music: Zdenek Liska.

Cast: Milos Kopecky (Baron Munchausen); Jana Brejchova (Bianca); Rudolf Jelinek (Tonik); Jan Werich (Captain of Dutch ship); Rudolf Hrusinsky (Sultan); Eduard Kohout (Commander of the fortress); Karel Hoger (Cyrano de Bergerac); Karel Effa (Officer of the guard); Bohus Zahorsky (Captain of the pirate ship); Nadezda Blazickova (Harem dancer); Bohus Zahorsky (The Admiral).

Publications

Books:

Stephenson, Ralph, Animation in the Cinema (London), 1967.
Halas, John, Masters of Animation (London), 1987.

Articles:

Konradva, Libuse, "Putting on a Style," in Films and Filming (London), June 1961.
Benesova, Marie, "A New Approach to Baron Munchausen," in Czechoslovak Film (Prague), no. 1, 1962.
Benesova, Marie, "Munchausens heitere wiedergeburt," in Deutsche Film Kunst (Berlin), no. 5, 1962.
Phillipe, Pierre, "Le Baron de Crac," in Cinéma (Paris) and Variety (New York), 18 July 1962.
Cinema Nuovo (Milano), July/August 1964.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1967.
Thonen, John, "The Fabulous Adventures of Baron Munchausen," in Filmfax (Evanston, Illinois), no. 26, April-May 1991.

* * *

Once named National Artist of Czechoslovakia, director, designer, artist, and animator, Karel Zeman, co-founded the Gottwaldov Studio in 1943, allying the traditional puppet entertainment long enjoyed in Czechoslovakia since the seventeenth century, and new experimental approaches to film. Zeman established his reputation with films like Inspiration (1944), in which he animated solid and blown glass, an apparently unyielding, if plentiful material in Czechoslovakia. The Mr. Prokoup cartoon series (1947) followed, and established a character who became a national hero in illustrating the shortfalls of a bureaucratic system. Zeman extended his interest in combining the material world with the conditions of the animated form in longer films like Journey into Prehistory (1955) and The Invention of Destruction (1958) which foregrounded apocalyptic warnings amidst the humour and anarchy of fantastic fiction.

Zeman's Baron Munchhausen (1961) is a tour de force exercise in how film form can properly illustrate the conceit of its subject. Combining live action, animation, and numerous theatrical devices and special effects, Zeman simultaneously creates modes of "illusion" while directly illustrating the romantic "delusion" of his eponymous hero. Deliberately referencing the "magical" aspects of Melies' films and the thematic concerns of his great literary hero, Jules Verne, Zeman deconstructs the notion of a romantic flight of fancy, literally using "flight" as the central motivating force in his quasi-picaresque narrative. "Flight" here, is simultaneously the soaring ambition of freedom, the desperate need to escape, and a mode of scientific achievement.

Emerging from the credit sequence pages of an illustrated children's book, the story commences with a storm, and the creation of an uncertain and strange world where footprints in the sand lead nowhere and a frog perches on a jug in a pool of water. The next sequence anticipates the celebrated jump-cut in 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) where a bone is tossed in the air by prehistoric man and becomes a spacecraft thousands of years in the future. Zeman, like Kubrick, also makes comment on the passing of time and the notion of progress by treating the sky as if it were a scroll. As each part of "the scroll" is pulled down into the frame it reveals an element in the history of aviation, from a bird to a flying man to an early aircraft through to a jet and finally, a rocket. In the rocket is the astronaut, Tonik, who lands on the moon, and is surprisingly greeted by his romantic forbears of science fiction, Cyrano de Bergerac, Barbican, and Captain Nichol from Verne's novels, and eventually, Baron Munchhausen himself. The film immediately foregrounds its interest in the tension between scientific achievement and heroic aspiration, and sustains this theme by pairing Tonik and the Baron in the adventures that follow. Tonik has been mistaken by the Baron as a "moondweller," and therefore, as an alien. This serves as a convenient metaphor for the Baron's distanciation from the astronaut, and a clear indication that for him, "the moon" may only be colonised by dreamers and romantics, and not by literally travelling there. Throughout the course of the film though, it is the Baron who must come to terms with the fact that it is the astronaut who represents a contemporary romantic hero.

Tonik and the Baron, like the other characters in the film, are live action figures but they inhabit a world which becomes a mixture of highly textured artificial sets, camera tricks distorting size and scale, colour saturated film-stocks ranging from icy-blue to warm gold, and animated sequences with all manner of flying creatures, sea monsters, and visual jokes. Zeman essentially intervenes in the Baron's telling of the tale, exposing him not merely as a romantic fraud but as a man out of touch with “modern” reality.

Both Tonik and the Baron fall in love with Bianca, a princess sold to a Turkish sultan by pirates, but it is ultimately Tonik who wins her hand despite of the Baron’s apparently heroic exploits on her behalf. Zemen is careful to use an array of effects to illustrate these exploits, but simultaneously, such spectacle and exaggeration only casts considerable doubt upon the claims of the Baron as a hero.

While apparently creating a tale composed of heroic adventures, Zemen undermines the authenticity of the heroic gesture.

Incredible set pieces, for example, where the Baron defeats 10,000 Turks amidst a montage of sparking blades, roaring lions, collapsing silhouettes of soldiers, and swirling red clouds, are undermined by the following scene of Tonik merely knocking out the palace guard and winning Bianca’s favour by playing several sonorous notes on a gong. This motif re-occurs later as the couple are re-united by notes played on a spider’s web and a whistle. Zemen counterpoints the comic failings of the Baron with Tonik’s guile and efficiency. Consequently, Zemen can also use the “fantastic” environment as a vehicle for humour. One particular example involves two-dimensional collage animation, where a ship’s figurehead removes a pipe and releases the smoke from all the crew smoking within the ship. This is very reminiscent of the style later adopted by Monty Python’s animator, Terry Gilliam, who acknowledged the ongoing influence of Zemen’s work by re-making The Adventures of Baron Munchhausen in 1988. This joke is extended in Zemen’s film by using the crew’s smoke to camouflage a ship that the Baron is escaping on. The Turkish fleet, lined up on either side of the ship, inevitably fire over the Baron’s ship and destroy each other. This would be amusing enough but Zemen uses bathos to further highlight the eccentricity of the Baron, who says, undaunted, “A few stray balls sank our ship, but that’s only to be expected!”

Though the Baron is given the opportunity to impress the princess when they are left alone together travelling the world inside the body of a whale (and Zemen can show us literal versions of the Red, Yellow, and Black Seas), it is Tonik that the Princess ultimately wants. While Tonik imagines how he might escape the conflicts in Europe, the Baron seeks out the enemy, flying on a cannonball and crashing through a window, which in true cartoon fashion, exactly replicates his splayed outline. The more foolish the Baron seems, the more truly heroic Tonik becomes, as he escapes imprisonment, accused of hiding all the army’s gunpowder, re-unites with Princess Bianca, and leaves with her, initially hiding in two suits of armour.

The Baron then accidentally throws his match down a well where Tonik has indeed hidden the fortress’ gunpowder—the explosive “launches” the fortress, which looks like a rocket, and the two lovers, whose suits of armour conveniently turn into rocket-powered astronaut suits are projected back to the moon. “Success” it seems, is in the hands of intelligent men employing science and technology, and not with heroic daydreamers like the Baron.

This is particularly relevant because in 1959 the Soviet Union had launched the Lunik spaceprobes which had both landed on the moon and provided the first pictures from its far side, while in 1961, the year Baron Munchhausen was released, Soviet cosmonaut, Yuri Gagarin, became the first human being to orbit the earth in Vostok 1. Scientific fact was rapidly catching up with, and over-taking, fantastic fiction. Zemen’s film is both a lament for period-style swashbuckling romance and a recognition that “History changes its clock,” and as

Cyrano de Bergerac says while spinning his hat into space as if it were a flying saucer in the film’s elegiac yet hopeful coda, “We are journeying towards the mighty embrace called the universe.”

—Paul Wells

BARREN LIVES

See VIDAS SECAS

LA BATAILLE DU RAIL

(Battle of the Rails)

France, 1945

Director: René Clément

Production: Coopérative Générale du Cinéma Français; black and white, 35mm; running time: 87 minutes; length: 7800 feet. Released 1945. Filmed, for the most part, in 1945 on location in France.

Screenplay: René Clément and Colette Audry, with Jean Daurand, based on stories told to Colette Audry by members of the Resistance; photography: Henri Alekan; editor: Jacques Desagneaux; music: Yves Baudrier. The film contains documentary footage shot by an unknown amateur filmmaker.

Cast: Antoine Laurent (Camargue); Jacques Desagneux (Maquis Chief); Leroy (Station master); Redon (Mechanic); Pauléon (Station master at St. André); Rauzena (Shunter); Jean Clarieux (Lampin); Barnault and Kronegger (Germans) and the French Railwaymen. Some sources list a narration by Charles Boyer.

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, voted among the Best Films, 1946.

Publications

Script:

Clement, René, La Bataille du rail, Paris, 1949.

Books:

Siclier, Jacques, René Clément, Brussels, 1956.

Farwagi, Andre, René Clément, Paris, 1967.

Gabricz, Adam, and Jack Klinowski, editors, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey One: The Cinema through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: Volume One: The Great Tradition, New York, 1976.

La bataille du rail

Articles:

- Queval, Jean, in Ecran Français (Paris), 16 October 1946.
 Regent, Roger, in Ecran Français (Paris), 14 October 1947.
New York Times, 27 December 1949.
 Koval, Francis, "Interview with Clément," in Sight and Sound (London), June 1950.
 Eisner, Lotte, "Style of René Clément," in Film Culture (New York), no. 12–13, 1957.
 "Clément Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 February 1981.
 Dossier, in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1982.
La Bataille du rail (special issue, includes screenplay excerpts), Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), no. 442, May 1995.

* * *

La Bataille du rail stands out as the only seriously realist film which the French made at the Liberation in 1945. At the first Cannes Festival in 1946 it took the grand prize. For a time its director, René Clément, was called a French neorealist, and it is true that he was much interested in and influenced by the Italian school. But Clément and his associates (Colette Audry as scriptwriter and Henri Alekan as cameraman) had thought about making this film when they had organized a discussion club in Nice well before 1945. This club later became IDHEC, the French film school.

La Bataille du rail was shot out of doors with non-actors. Its script is episodic, involving separate sets of characters for each incident. The incidents include: 1) a meeting of the Resistance in the railyards and their narrow escape thanks to a timely air raid, 2) the planting of a bomb on a train despite discovery by German guards, and 3) the taking of hostages by Germans and their pitiful death by firing squad.

Midway through the film an overall dramatic direction is given when we learn that the Allies have landed and that the Germans must get their trains to Normandy. Despite heavy losses in skirmishes with armored trains and troops, the maquis, a military branch of the French underground, destroy four of the seven trains. The film concludes with the most elaborate incident, the derailing of a huge rail convoy, shot from three different angles. This spectacular destruction concludes with a closeup of an accordion slowly falling on itself, providing a musical sigh, as in Dovzhenko's Arsenal. Other comparisons come to mind, especially Malraux's Exploir which, while shot in 1935, came out only in 1945. La Bataille du rail remains fresh in comparison with dramatic resistance films like Henri Calef's Jericho because of its immediacy, speed, and detail. Despite its spectacular violence, the derailment is less memorable than the heroic close-ups of the hostages lined up to be shot. At the instant before his death, we are given an extreme close-up from the vantage point of one of these anonymous patriots. He (and we) watch the indifferent but marvellous motions of a spider on the wall inches away. As the shots ring out, every engine in the railyard lets out a jolt of steam signalling, by its smoke and whistle, the spirit of resistance within the trains themselves.

This 85 minute film was fabled; nevertheless it didn't produce any imitations. Doubtless it had an effect on its director and cameraman who in turn were to rise to the top of the industry in France.

—Dudley Andrew

LA BATALLA DE CHILE: LA LUCHA DE UN PUEBLO SIN ARMAS

(The Battle of Chile: Struggle of People Without Arms)

Chile-Cuba, 1975, 1976, 1979

Director: Patricio Guzmán

Part 1. La insurrección de la burguesía (The Insurrection of the Bourgeoisie)

Part 2. El golpe de estado (A Blow Against the State)

Part 3. El poder popular (The Power of the People)

Production: Equipo "Tercer Año," in collaboration with Chris Marker and the Instituto Cubano del Arte e Industria Cinematográficos (ICAIC); Kodak black and white; 16mm (subsequently blown up to 35mm). Part 1 released 1975, Cannes Film Festival; Part 2 released 1976, Cannes Film Festival; Part 3 released 1979. Filmed 1973 in Santiago, Chile.

Producer: Federico Elton; screenplay: Patricio Guzmán; photography: Jorge Müller Silva; editor: Pedro Chaskel; sound: Bernardo Menz; mixing: Carlos Fernández; sound transfer: Jacinto Falcón and Ramón Torrado; special effects: Jorge Pucheux, Delia Quesada, and Alberto Valdés; consultants: Julio García Espinosa, Marta Harnecker, and José Pino; other collaborators: Saul Yellin, Beatriz Allende, Harald Edelstam, Lilian Indseth, Juan José Mendy, Roberto Matta, Chris Marker, Rodrigo Rojas, Estudio Haynowsky, and Scheumann.

Cast: Readers—Matías Rodríguez, Pedro Fernández Vila, Jacques Bonaldi, and Bruno Colombo.

Publications

Script:

Pick, Zuzana, "The Battle of Chile: A Schematic Shooting Script," in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Winter 1980.

Books:

Racinante, editor, La insurrección de la burguesía, Caracas, 1975.
La batalla de Chile: La lucha de un pueblo sin armas, Madrid, 1977.
 Guzmán, Patricio, and P. Sempere, Chile: El cine contra el fascismo, edited by Fernando Torres, Valencia, 1977.

Articles:

Salinas, S., and H. Soto, "Más vale una sólida formación política que la destreza artesanal," in Primer Plano (Valparaíso), vol. 2, no. 5, 1973.
 Gauthier, Guy, "Chile: La Première Année," in Image et Son (Paris), March 1973.
 "Stadion Chile," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), February 1974.
 Ehrman, H., and others "Chile: Le Cinéma de l'unité populaire," in Ecran (Paris), February 1974.
 "Le Cinéma dans la politique de l'Unité Populaire," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), November 1974.
 Delmas, Ginette, in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1975.
 Cardenac, M., in Ecran (Paris), December 1975.
 Gauthier, Guy, in Image et Son (Paris), January 1976.
 Biskind, Peter, "In Latin America They Shoot Filmmakers," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1976.
 Niogret, Hubert, in Positif (Paris), July-August 1976.
 Martin, Marcel, in Ecran (Paris), January 1977.
Jeune Cinéma (Paris), February 1977.
 Thirard, P. L., "De l'histoire déjà (La Bataille du Chile)," in Positif (Paris), February 1977.
 Hönig, J., "Patricio Guzmán—ein Filmschöpfer der Unidad Popular," in Information (Berlin), no. 1, 1977.
Image et Son (Paris), April 1977.
 Burton, Julianne, "Politics and the Documentary in People's Chile," in Socialist Review, October 1977.
 Chaskel, Pedro, "América Latina: Vigencia del documental político Chile: Analista de una batalla," in Cine al Día (Caracas), November 1977.
 Galiano, Carlos, in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 91–92, 1978.
 Gupta, Udayan, and FLQ Staff, "An Interview with Patricio Guzmán, Director of The Battle of Chile," in Film Library Quarterly (New York), no. 4, 1978.
 West, Dennis, "Documenting the End of the Chilean Road to Socialism: La batalla de Chile," in American Hispanist, February 1978.
 "Special Section" of Cine Cubano (Havana), March 1978.
 Anderson, P., in Films in Review (New York), June-July 1978.
 Ranvaud, Don, "Introduction to Latin America I: Chile," in Framework (Norwich), Spring 1979.
 Schumann, Peter, "Chilean Cinema in Exile," in Framework (Norwich), Spring 1979.
 Guzmán, Patricio, "Chile 3: Guzmán," in Framework (Norwich), Spring 1979.

- Angry Arts group, “Battle of Chile in Context,” in Jump Cut (Chicago), November 1979.
- Wallis, V., “Battle of Chile: Struggle of People Without Arms,” in Jump Cut (Chicago), November 1979.
- Guzmán, Patricio, “The Battle of Chile: The Origins of the Project,” in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Winter 1980.
- Pick, Zuzana, “Chile: The Cinema of Resistance, 1973–1979,” in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Winter 1980.
- Pick, Zuzana, “Letter from Guzmán to Chris Marker” and “Reflections Previous to the Filming of The Battle of Chile,” in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Winter 1980.
- MacCarthy, T., in Variety (New York), 7 May 1980.
- Galiano, C., “Wirklichkeit und Dokument,” in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), November 1980.
- West, Dennis, in Cineaste (New York), no. 2, 1981.

* * *

The Battle of Chile, which consists of three feature-length parts, uses actuality footage to record the socio-economic and political turmoil preceding the fall of Chile’s Marxist-socialist president, Salvador Allende, in 1973. While the film is an outstanding example of the documentary as a record of history-in-the-making, it is also a carefully conceived and clearly organized analysis of these events. Guzmán structured the first two parts of his film around selected “battlegrounds” (e.g., a strike of copper miners) where class interests clashed. The major issues and strategies in these clashes are generally presented in a dialectical fashion: for instance, the film may first show the tactics of the rightist forces and then the counter-measures with which the left responds. The filmmakers infiltrated the entire political spectrum and succeeded in showing events from multiple political perspectives as they unfolded. Part three of the film is structured differently in that it focuses on a single phenomenon—a people’s power movement which first arose as a response to a bosses’ strike.

This monumental documentary is Guzmán’s most important film. It was made by a politically committed five-person team who faced overwhelming obstacles. Available to this film collective were one Nagra tape recorder, one 16mm Eclair camera, and film stock which had been sent from abroad by a colleague. In spite of the strict semi-landestine measures they followed, the filmmakers at times risked their lives. After the right-wing military coup toppled Allende, all the sound tape and film footage were smuggled out of Chile. The film was edited at the Cuban Institute of Cinematographic Art and Industry in Havana.

The extensive use of the sequence-shot, The Battle of Chile’s predominant stylistic feature, is unusual in documentary films. Pedro Chaskel’s low-key editing preserves the unity of these sequence-shots and maximizes their effect.

The Battle of Chile is one of the greatest Marxist documentaries. The influence of Marx’s The Civil War in France and Lenin’s State and Revolution is evident in the type of political analysis applied in the first two parts of the film. These two segments illustrate the Marxist-Leninist revolutionary lesson that there can be no peaceful transition to socialism before the repressive machinery of the bourgeois state (e.g., a standing army) is broken up and replaced. In accordance with this view, the filmmakers closely follow the military’s drift to the right as well as the anti-Allende activities of the opposition-dominated legislature. Marx and Engels in the Manifesto of the Communist Party viewed classes as the protagonists of history, and conflict as an inherent dimension of class societies. Guzmán follows this Marxist conception in that classes are the protagonists of his film and events are framed in terms of class conflict.

This film has reportedly never been seen in Chile. In countries where the documentary has been shown, both Marxist and non-Marxist critics have hailed it as a landmark in the history of the political documentary. Because of its vast scope, The Battle of Chile is surely the single most valuable historical document on the final months of the Via Chilena, Chile’s unique experiment in building socialism peacefully and democratically. Marxist critics have praised the film for its attack on the bourgeois ideology of cinema, an ideology which represents the capitalist mode of production and the bourgeois social order as “givens” and discourages viewers from challenging or questioning analytically the socio-economic status quo. In The Battle of Chile, the individual star of bourgeois cinema has been replaced by workers who are depicted as a class struggling to alter the capitalist mode of production and to change the world the bourgeoisie created.

—Dennis West

LA BATTAGLIA DI ALGERI

(The Battle of Algiers)

Italy-Algiers, 1966

Director: Gillo Pontecorvo

Production: Igor Films (Rome) and Casbah Film Company (Algiers); black and white, 35mm; running time: 123 minutes. Released 1966. Filmed 1965 in Algiers; cost: $800,000.

Producer: Antonio Musu and Yacef Saadi; screenplay: Franco Solinas and Gillo Pontecorvo; photography: Marcello Gatti; editors: Mario Serandrei and Mario Morra; art direction: Sergio Canevari; music: Gillo Pontecorvo and Ennio Morricone; special effects: Tarcisio Diamanti and Aldo Gasparri; Algerian assistants: Ali Yahia, Moussa Haddad, Azzedine Ferhi, Mohamet Zinet; Algerian “opérateurs”: Youssef Bouchouchi, Ali Maroc, Belkacem Bazi, Ali Bouksani.

Cast: Yacef Saadi (Djafar); Brahim Haggiag (Ali La Pointe); Jean Martin (Colonel Mathieu); Tommaso Neri (Captain Dubois); Mohamed Ben Kassen (Le Petit Omar); Fawzia El Kader (Hassiba); Michele Kerbash (Fathia).

Awards: Venice Film Festival, Lion of St. Mark, 1966.

Publications

Script:

Solinas, Franco, Gillo Pontecorvo’s “The Battle of Algiers”: A Film Written by Franco Solinas, New York, 1973.

La Battaglia di Algeri

Books:

- Saadi, Yacef, Souvenirs de la bataille d'Alger: December 1956-September 1957, Paris, 1962.
- Mellen, Joan, Filmguide to "The Battle of Algiers", Bloomington, Indiana, 1973.
- Bignardi, Irene, Memorie estorte a uno smemorato: vita di Gillo Pontecorvo, Milan, 1999.

Articles:

- Hennebelle, Guy, "Une Si Jeune Paix," in Cinéma (Paris), December 1965.
- Porin, Pierre, "Le Cinéma algérien et La Bataille d'Alger," in Positif (Paris), October 1966.
- Pontecorvo, Gillo, "The Battle of Algiers: An Adventure in Filmmaking," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), April 1967.
- Castelli, Luisa, in Occhio Critico (Rome), May-June 1967.
- Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 23 September 1967.
- Gill, Brendan, "Truth-telling," in New Yorker, 23 September 1967.
- Morgenstern, Joseph, "The Terror," in Newsweek (New York), 23 October 1967.
- Kozloff, Max, "Shooting at Wars," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1967-68.
- Mussman, Toby, "Gillo Pontecorvo," in Medium (New York), Winter 1967-68.
- Kauffmann, Stanley, "Recent Wars," in New Republic (New York), 16 December 1967.
- Covington, Francee, "Are the Revolutionary Techniques Employed in The Battle of Algiers Applicable to Harlem?" in Black Woman (New York), 1970.
- Wilson, David, "Politics and Pontecorvo," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1970.
- Sainsbury, Peter, in Afterimage: Third World Cinema (London), Summer 1971.
- Mellen, Joan, "An Interview with Gillo Pontecorvo," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1972.
- Miklay, E., "Valóság és modell: Pontecorvo: Az algiri csata és a Queimada," in Filmkultura (Budapest), September-October 1972.
- Bosséno, C., in Image et Son (Paris), February 1981.

Downing, John, and Nyisha Mbalia Shakur, "Selected Third World Classic Films," in Film Library Quarterly (New York), vol. 16, no. 4, 1983.

Marshall, B., "Birth of a Nation," in Stills (London), May-June 1983.

O'Sullivan, Thaddeus, "Images of Liberation," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 7, no. 3, March 1997.

* * *

In 1966 the revolutionary filmmaker Gillo Pontecorvo released his stunning chronicle of one of the major clashes of the Algerian struggle for independence: The Battle of Algiers. The film's fictionalized account of this crucial three-year period in Algeria's history draws on actual people and events as the basis for its story, and adopts an impressively convincing documentary style in its presentation.

The film's opening credits contain a message stating that "not one foot" of actual newsreel footage was used in the making of the picture, yet Pontecorvo achieves a naturalistic, cinema-verité quality through his direction, conveying the events with the immediacy of a television news broadcast. Marcello Gatti's grainy, black and white photography captures the look and texture of a newsreel, as does the jarring realism of the hand-held camerawork in many of the film's explosive crowd scenes. The use of non-professional actors (with the exception of Jean Martin as the French Colonel Mathieu) also contributes to the film's overall impression of events being recorded as they occur.

This documentary-like effect has evoked both praise and condemnation for Pontecorvo, with some critics expressing admiration for the film's achievement and others questioning the ethics of filming a partly fictional scenario in such strikingly realistic terms. For Pontecorvo and his screenwriting partner, Franco Solinas, however, the question of the "truth" of The Battle of Algiers is answered by the film's political impact as an anti-imperialist statement. If isolated moments in the film, such as its central character's harassment by a group of arrogant young Frenchmen, are the products of the authors' imaginations, they are nevertheless representative of events which occurred countless times during France's 130-year occupation of Algeria. Indeed, the film's most harrowing scenes—those of captured rebels undergoing torture at the hands of the military—demand to be shown, to demonstrate the full measure of the inhuman brutality they represent.

Yet Pontecorvo's political stance regarding the Algerian struggle does not lead him to resort to the caricatures of heroism and villainy which so often mar the impact of otherwise fine political films. Even as he reviles the policies of the French government, he forces us to confront the painful fact that these are human lives that are being lost and not mere pawns in a revolutionary uprising. His camera lingers on the faces of those who will die moments later from a planted rebel bomb, bringing home with wrenching clarity the bitter price of violent conflict. This rare approach, in a genre which frequently averts its eyes from these hard truths, places The Battle of Algiers at the forefront of political filmmaking by allowing each viewer to re-examine his or her own position on political violence in the harsh light of the images on the screen.

In the years since its release, The Battle of Algiers has become a staple of film classes and revival house theatres. Its political merits have been widely discussed and debated, with the individual outlook of each critic coming very much into play in any evaluation of the film. The film's cinematic achievements, however, remain as powerful as they first appeared in 1966, and subsequent armed revolts in other Third World countries have only served to reinforce the universality of Pontecorvo's remarkable work.

—Janet E. Lorenz

THE BATTLE OF ALGIERS

See LA BATTAGLIA DI ALGERI

THE BATTLE OF CHILE

See LA BATALLA DE CHILE

BATTLE OF THE RAILS

See LA BATAILLE DU RAIL

BATTLESHIP POTEMKIN

See BRONENOSETS POTEMKIN

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST

See LA BELLE ET LA BÊTE

BECKY SHARP

USA, 1935

Director: Rouben Mamoulian

Production: Pioneer Films (RKO); Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 83 minutes (1943 reissue, 67 minutes). Released 13 June 1935; reissued in 1943 as Lady of Fortune; restored at UCLA film archive and reissued in 1985. Cost: $400,000 (estimated).

Producers: Kenneth MacGowan and Robert Edmond Jones; screenplay: Francis Edwards Faragoh, from the play by Landon Mitchell and the novel Vanity Fair (1847–48) by William Makepeace Thackeray; photography: Ray Rennahan; editor: Archie Marshek; production designer: Robert Edmond Jones; musical score: Roy Webb; choreographer: Russell Lewis.

Cast: Miriam Hopkins (Becky Sharp); Frances Dee (Amelia Sedley); Cedric Hardwicke (Marquis of Steyne); Billy Burke (Lady Bareacres); Alison Skipworth (Julia Crawley); Nigel Bruce (Joseph Sedley); Alan Mowbray (Rawdon Crawley); G.P. Huntley, Jr. (George Osborne); May Beatty (Briggs); William Stack (Pitt Crawley); George Hassell (Sir Pitt Crawley); William Faversham (Duke of Wellington); Charles

Becky Sharp

Richman (General Tufts); Doris Lloyd (Duchess of Richmond); Colin Tapley (William Dobbin).

Awards: Best Picture (Rouben Mamoulian) and Best Color Film (Rouben Mamoulian and Ray Rennahan), Venice Film Festival, 1935.

Publications

Books:

Cook, David A., A History of Narrative Film, New York, 1996.
 Spergel, Mark J., Reinventing Reality: The Art and Life of Rouben Mamoulian, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1993.

Articles:

Greene, Graham, "Review of Becky Sharp; Barcarole; and Public Hero No. 1," in The Spectator (London), 19 July 1935.
 Mamoulian, Rouben, "Some Problems in the Direction of Color Pictures," in The International Photographer, 1935; reprinted in Richard Koszarski, editor, Hollywood Directors 1914–1940, New York, 1976.

Mamoulian, Rouben, "Controlling Color for Dramatic Effect," in The American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), June 1941; reprinted in Richard Koszarski, editor, Hollywood Directors 1914–1940, New York, 1976.

Gitt, Robert, and Richard Dayton, "Restoring Becky Sharp," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), vol. 65, November 1984.

* * *

The novel Vanity Fair had been filmed twice before, in 1923 and 1932, when director Lowell Sherman began this adaptation for Pioneer Films. When Sherman died not long after filming began in late 1934, Rouben Mamoulian took over and all of Sherman's footage was rejected. In most respects the result is an uninteresting adaptation of Thackeray's novel based around a plodding screenplay and a cast of minor-league stars. Yet the film's place in movie history is assured despite its artistic weaknesses for it was the first feature-length film to be made in full (three-color) Technicolor.

Before Becky Sharp, three-color Technicolor had been used only for short films, notably by Disney in the animated Flowers and Trees (1932), and The Three Little Pigs (1933). Disney tried to tie Technicolor in to a three-year exclusive contract when it became clear that the process was commercially viable for animation, but the deal collapsed after only one year. As a result, Pioneer Films could use the process to make La Cucaracha (1934), the first full Technicolor live-action short, that was essentially an extended production test for the new process. The success of that project, which won an Oscar for Best Comedy Short Subject, led directly to the making of Becky Sharp. Despite the extra cost—which is estimated to have added thirty percent to the production costs of films in the 1930s—Technicolor's three-strip system and its later refinements dominated the movie industry until the 1950s.

Although the film is dramatically flawed, Mamoulian and cinematographer Ray Rennahan make good use of the three-color process, particularly in set pieces such as the stunning ball sequence. Mamoulian began his career working in theatre, and was aware of the possibilities for using colored lighting to signify changes in mood. For this reason he was uncertain about the suitability of Vanity Fair as a vehicle for color adaptation since the red uniforms of the British soldiers who play a large part in the story tended to appear too aggressive on the relatively crude new color system.

Yet despite Mamoulian's doubts, the housebound story of Becky Sharp's self-centred rise through elegant society is well chosen, since the new process needed more light than two-color systems, and was all but unusable outdoors in its early form. Reviewing the film for The Spectator magazine, Graham Greene thought the color in Becky Sharp ideal for the period setting, but wondered unkindly whether Technicolor would be able to pick out the subtleties of "the battered Buick . . . the suit worn too long, the oily hat." It is worth noting that in the late 1940s makers of low-budget film noirs returned to the cheaper black-and-white film stock to explore such grubby realities.

Although Becky Sharp was not a huge commercial success, it made enough money to convince others that the new system was viable despite its extra cost. Mamoulian's "wondrous adventure" of directing Becky Sharp in color was, he thought, as significant a step as the advent of synchronized sound. With other studios using the three-color system the technology improved rapidly. Four years later, Ray Rennahan became a Technicolor pioneer for the second time when he worked on Gone With the Wind with Ernest Haller and the pair won an Oscar for their cinematography. The 1939 film was the first to use Technicolor's new, faster film stock, which halved the required lighting levels. A comparison of the lighting and color definition in Becky Sharp and Gone With the Wind bears this out, making the technical achievement of the earlier film seem even more remarkable.

Because of its historical significance, Becky Sharp was restored by the UCLA film archives in 1984, and re-issued in three-color form in 1985. None of the original prints survives, and, as film historian David Cook points out, it is ironic that until the 1985 reissue this landmark of color cinema was available only as a two-color Cinecolor version and a heavily edited black-and-white print.

—Chris Routledge

BED AND SOFA

See TRETIA MESHCHANSKAIA

BEIQING CHENGSHI

See City of Sadness

BELLE DE JOUR

France-Italy, 1967

Director: Luis Buñuel

Production: Paris Film, Five Films (Rome); Eastmancolor; running time: 100 minutes. Released 1967.

Producers: Robert Hakim, Raymond Hakim; production manager: Henri Baum; screenplay: Luis Buñuel, Jean-Claude Carrière, based on the novel by Joseph Kessel; assistant directors: Pierre Lary, Jacques Fraenkel; photography: Sacha Vierny; editor: Walter Spohr; sound: René Longuet; art director: Robert Clavel.

Cast: Catherine Deneuve (Séverine); Jean Sorel (Pierre); Michel Piccoli (Henri Husson); Geneviève Page (Mme. Anaïs); Francisco Rabal (Hyppolite); Pierre Clémenti (Marcel); Georges Marchal (The Duke); Françoise Fabian (Charlotte); Maria Latour (Mathilde); Francis Blanche (Monsieur Adolphe); Macha Méril (Renée); Muni (Pallas); François Maistre (The Professor); Bernard Fresson (Le Grêle); Dominique Dandrieux (Catherine); Brigitte Parmentier (Séverine as a Child); Michel Charrel (Footman); D. de Roseville (Coachman); Iska Khan (Asian Client); Marcel Charvey (Professor Henri); Pierre Marcay (Intern); Adélaïde Blasquez (Maid); Marc Eyraud (Barman); Bernard Musson (Majordomo).

Publications

Script:

Buñuel, Luis, and Jean-Claude Carrière, Belle de jour, London, 1971; also published in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), April 1978.

Books:

Durgnat, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Berkeley, 1968; revised edition, 1977. Buache, Freddy, Luis Buñuel, Lyons, 1970; as The Cinema of Luis Buñuel, New York and London, 1973.

Aranda, José Francisco, Luis Buñuel: A Critical Biography, London and New York, 1975.

Cesarman, Fernando, El ojo de Buñuel, Barcelona, 1976.

Mellen, Joan, editor, The World of Luis Buñuel: Essays in Criticism, New York, 1978.

Bazin, Andre, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.

Belle de jour

Edwards, Gwynne, The Discreet Art of Luis Buñuel: A Reading of His Films, London, 1982.

Buñuel, Luis, My Last Breath, London and New York, 1983.

Rees, Margaret A., editor, Luis Buñuel: A Symposium, Leeds 1983.

Eberwein, Robert T., Film and the Dream Screen: A Sleep and a Forgetting, Princeton, New Jersey, 1984.

Lefèvre, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1984.

Vidal, Agustin Sanchez, Luis Buñuel: Obra Cinematografica, Madrid, 1984.

Aub, Max, Conversaciones con Buñuel: Seguidas de 45 entrevistas con familiares, amigos y colaboradores del cineasta aragones, Madrid 1985.

Bertelli, Pino, Buñuel: L'arma dello scandalo: L'anarchia nel cinema di Luis Buñuel, Turin 1985.

Oms, Marcel, Don Luis Buñuel, Paris 1985.

De la Colina, Jose, and Tomás Pérez Turrent, Luis Buñuel: Prohibido asomarse al interior, Mexico 1986.

Sandro, Paul, Diversions of Pleasure: Luis Buñuel and the Crises of Desire, Columbus, Ohio, 1987.

Williams, Linda, Figures of Desire: A Theory and Analysis of Surrealist Film, Berkeley, 1992.

Evans, Peter W., The Films of Luis Buñuel: Subjectivity and Desire, New York and Oxford, 1995.

Baxter, John, Buñuel, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 19 April 1967.

Film Français (Paris), 9 June 1967.

Fieschi, Jean-André, "La Fin ouverte," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1967.

Narboni, Jean, in Cahiers du cinéma (Paris), July 1967.

Seguin, Luis, in Positif (Paris), September 1967.

Stein, Elliot, "Buñuel's Golden Bowl," in Sight and Sound (London), December 1967.

J.A.D. in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1967.

Durnat, Raymond, and Robin Wood, in Movie (London), no. 15, 1968.

D'Lugo, Marvin, "Glances of Desire in Belle de jour," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Winter-Spring 1978.

Buñuel, Luis, "Dnevnaia Krasavitsa," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 6, 1992.

Jousse, T., “Buñuel face a ce qui se derobe,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1993.
 Girard, Martin, “Belle de Jour,” in Séquences (Quebec), no. 180, September-October 1995.
 Morris, Gary, “Belle de Jour,” in Bright Lights (San Francisco), no. 15, 1995.
 “Belle de Jour,” in Castoro Cinema (Firenze), no. 59, 1996.

* * *

In many ways Belle de jour is the perfect illustration of André Breton’s famous dictum that “everything leads us to believe that there exists a certain point of the spirit at which life and death, the real and the imaginary . . . cease to be perceived as opposites. It is vain to see in the Surrealists’ activity any motive other than the location of that point.”

At first sight the film, based on a novel by Joseph Kessel, seems to be a relatively straightforward story about a young woman who indulges in masochistic day dreams and works, clandestinely, in a brothel. But, as the film progresses, the line between “fantasy” and “reality” becomes increasingly blurred. The young woman in question is Séverine, the beautiful but frigid wife of a young doctor Pierre. One of her regular fantasies involves Pierre punishing her by having her dragged from his carriage by his coachmen, who then bind, gag, whip, and rape her. Husson, one of their friends, mentions the name of a brothel run by Madame Anaïs, and Séverine, under the name Belle de Jour, goes to work there secretly every day. One of her clients, a young thug named Marcel, falls in love with her and tries to persuade her to leave the brothel. When she holds back he shoots her husband, and is himself killed by the police. Pierre is now paralysed and is looked after devotedly by Séverine. One day Husson tells him about his wife having worked in a brothel. The shock appears to kill him, then, all of a sudden, he rises from his chair, seemingly miraculously cured.

Thus at the very end of the film, just as the audience are congratulating themselves on having neatly sorted out “fantasy” from “reality” throughout the course of the narrative, Buñuel throws the whole distinction into sudden confusion by presenting what seems like a wish-fulfilment in the most straightforwardly naturalistic manner. The director’s method here looks back to The Exterminating Angel (where extraordinary, absurd events are depicted as if they were the most normal things imaginable) and forward to The Milky Way, The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, The Phantom of Liberty, and That Obscure Object of Desire, whose less conventional, more episodic narrative structures enable Buñuel to explore his surrealist vision to the full. Indeed, Buñel’s remark that these last films all evoke “the essential mystery in all things” and “the search for truth, as well as the necessity of abandoning it as soon as you’ve found it” serves as a suitable warning to all those who would seek to produce any kind of definitive reading of Belle de jour. Indeed, the whole film exists in the image of the little box that an Oriental client brings with him to the brothel. When opened, this emits a strange, high-pitched buzzing sound and greatly disturbs all of the girls—except Séverine, who is fascinated by it. The camera never reveals what “it” is, and, according to his autobiography, Buñuel was constantly asked by people what was in the box: his answer was always “whatever you want there to be.” It’s worth noting, incidentally, that the original novel, which Buñuel describes as “very melodramatic, but well constructed,” does observe the usual literary distinctions between “outer” and “inner” events, and that the English subtitled version of the film (un)helpfully italicises the dialogue in the scenes which someone has decreed are to be read as dreams or fantasies!

Belle de jour was Buñuel’s most sustained treatment of another favourite theme—that of fetishism. This had already raised its head in El and The Diary of a Chambermaid, but Séverine’s clients represent a veritable cornucopia of fetishism, including a gynaecologist who plays at being a valet, and a Count who enjoys masturbating under a coffin in which Séverine (whom he calls his daughter) is lying. Apparently Buñuel wanted this scene to take place after a celebration of Mass, but censorship problems intervened—not for the first time in Buñuel’s anarchic oeuvre.

—Julian Petley

LA BELLE ET LA BÊTE

(Beauty and the Beast)

France, 1946

Director: Jean Cocteau

Production: Black and white, 35mm; running time: 96 minutes (90 minutes according to some sources). Released 29 October 1946, Paris. Filmed in Saint-Maurice studios; exteriors shot at Rochecorbon in Touraine.

La Belle et la bête

Producer: André Paulvé; screenplay: Jean Cocteau, from the fairy tale of Jean Marie Leprince de Beaumont; photography: Henri Alekan; editor: Claude Iberia; sound engineer: Jean Lebreton; sound effects: Rouzenat; production designers: René Moulaert and Lucien Carré; art director: Roger Desormière; costume designer: Christian Bérard, executed by Escoffier and Castillo from the House of Paquin; technical assistant to Cocteau: René Clément.

Cast: Jean Marais (The Beast and The Prince); Josette Day (Beauty); Marcel André (The Father); Mila Parély (Félicie); Nane Germon (Adélaïde); Michel Auclair (Ludovic); Raoul Marco (The Usurer); Gilles Watteaux and Noel Blin.

Publications

Script:

Jean Cocteau: 3 Screenplays (The Eternal Return, Beauty and the Beast and Orpheus), New York, 1972.

Cocteau, Jean, "La Belle et la bete," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris) July-September 1973.

Books:

Cocteau, Jean, La Belle et la bête: Journal d'un film, Paris, 1946; as Diary of a Film, New York, 1950.

Crosland, Margaret, Jean Cocteau, London, 1956.

Kihm, Jean-Jacques, Cocteau, Paris, 1956.

Pillaudin, Roger, Jean Cocteau tourne son dernier film, Paris, 1960.

Fraigneau, André, Cocteau, New York, 1961.

Fowlie, Wallace, Jean Cocteau: The History of a Poet's Age, Bloomington, Indiana, 1968.

Sprigge, Elizabeth, and Jean-Jacques Kihm, Jean Cocteau: The Man and the Mirror, New York, 1968.

Lannes, Roger, Jean Cocteau, Paris, 1968.

Gilson, René, Cocteau, New York, 1969.

Cocteau, Jean, Professional Secrets: An Autobiography, edited by Robert Phelps, New York, 1970.

Stegmuller, Francis, Cocteau, Boston, 1970.

Knapp, Bettina, Cocteau, New York, 1970.

Anderson, Alexandra and Carol Saltus, editors, Jean Cocteau and the French Scene, New York, 1984.

de Miomandre, Philippe, Moi, Jean Cocteau, Paris, 1985.

Keller, Marjorie, The Untutored Eye: Childhood in the Films of Cocteau, Cornell, and Brakhage, Cranbury, New Jersey, 1986.

Peters, Arthur King, Jean Cocteau and his World: An Illustrated Biography, London, 1987.

Articles:

Bazin, André, in Le Parisien Libéré, 11 January, 1946.

Variety (New York), 24 December 1947.

Image et Son (Paris), June-July 1972.

"La Belle et la bête: La critique," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1973.

American Image (Detroit), no. 2, 1976.

Bonnet, J. C., in Cinématographe (Paris), April-May 1976.

Wilson Jr., R. A., in Audience (Hollywood), November 1976.

Gow, Gordon, "Astonishment: Magic Films from Jean Cocteau," in Films and Filming (London), January, 1978.

Popkin, M., "Cocteau's Beauty and the Beast: The Poet as Monster," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 10, no. 2, 1982.

Galef, D., "A Sense of Magic: Reality and Illusion in Cocteau's Beauty and the Beast," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), April 1984.

Smith, Malcolm, in Starburst (London), November 1985.

Garofalo, M., "Once Upon a Time. . .," in Segnocinema (Vincenza, Italy), May-June 1992.

Mousselard, Oliver-Pascal, "Le bête et sa belle changent d'air," in Télérama, no. 2353, 15 February 1995.

Erb, C., "Another World or the World of an Other?: The Space of Romance in Recent Versions of Beauty and the Beast," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), vol. 34, no. 4, 1995.

Lansing Smith, Evans, "Framing the Underworld: Threshold Imagery in Murnau, Cocteau, and Bergman," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 24, no. 3, 1996.

Turner, George, "Once Upon a Time There Was Beauty and the Beast," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 78, no. 9, September 1997.

Greene, N., "Jean Cocteau: A Cinema of Baroque Unease," and A.S. Levitt, "The Cinematic Magic of Jean Cocteau," in Bucknell Review, vol. 41, no. 1, 1997.

* * *

La Belle et la bête, the film which marked Jean Cocteau's return to directing after an interval of 15 years, is a work which continues the vein of fantasy which had characterised his scriptwriting during the wartime years. To this extent the film is typical of its period, for the early postwar years in France saw a basic continuity with approaches established during the Vichy period (there was no resurgence of realism in France to compare with the emergence of neorealism in Italy). But in all other ways the appropriation of a fairy tale to the filmmaker's own personal mythology is a totally individual work.

The film is based on the tale as told by Madame Leprince de Beaumont, but there is little evidence in Cocteau's approach of the childlike innocence which the director demands of his audience in his brief introduction to the film. Visually, the film is one of Cocteau's most sophisticated works. The costumes designed by Christian Bérard and the lighting and framing devised by Henri Alekan are decorative rather than functional and take their inspiration from classic Dutch painting, particularly the work of Vermeer. Despite the presence of René Clément as technical supervisor, the film shows none of the reliance on complexity of scripting and use of heavy irony so characteristic of French cinema in the late 1940s. The legend is handled in a dazzlingly eclectic style. The home life of Belle's family is parodied and often broadly farcical in tone, as, for instance, in the use of cackling ducks to comment on the attitudes of her sisters. By contrast, the departure of Belle for the Beast's castle and her entry there are totally stylised, with Cocteau employing slow motion photography to obtain a dreamlike effect.

La Belle et la bête is an excellent example of Cocteau's continual concern in his film work to provide a "realism of the unreal." The fairytale world of Beast's castle is given great solidity, and indeed it is arguable that the setting has been given too much weight, with the result that there is a degree of ponderousness about the film which Georges Auric's music serves only to emphasise. In evoking the magical qualities of the castle, Cocteau has made surprisingly little use of the film's trick shot potentialities which form so crucial a part of so many of his other works. Here the living faces of the statuary and the disembodied human arms that act as Beast's servants are essentially theatrical devices.

One of the great difficulties facing Cocteau was that of sustaining interest for 90 minutes in the oversimplified and largely unpersonalised characters of his source material. The solution found for the minor characters is caricature and humour. For the Beast, Cocteau and Bérard use the make-up of Jean Marais to emphasise his bestial nature, a strategy which is particularly effective in such scenes as those in which he drinks or scents game. Belle is by comparison a fairly dull figure, despite Josette Day's beauty, but the ambiguities of her attitude toward the Beast do add interest and complexity to the character. The double use of Jean Marais as both the Beast and Belle's dissolute lover avoids the danger of too easy an explanation of the film's symbolism, and the transformation into a princely figure at the end shows a characteristically lyrical approach to death on the filmmaker's part. Particularly when seen in conjunction with the intimate diary of the shooting which Cocteau published in 1946 to coincide with the release of the film, La Belle et la bête provides an excellent introduction to the work of one of the screen's subtlest and most evocative poets.

—Roy Armes

BERLIN: DIE SINFONIE DER GROSSSTADT

(Berlin: Symphony of a City)

Germany, 1927

Director: Walter Ruttmann

Production: Fox-Europa-Film; black and white, 35mm; running time: 53 minutes; length: 1440 meters. Released September 1927. Filmed in Berlin.

Producer: Karl Freund; screenplay: Karl Freund and Walter Ruttmann, from an idea by Carl Meyer; photography: Reimar Kuntze, Robert Babereske, and Laszlo Schaffer; editor: Walter Ruttmann; sets: Erich Kettelhut; music: Edmund Meisel.

Publications

Books:

Rotha, Paul, The Film Till Now, London, 1930.
 Balázs, Béla, Der Geist des Films, Halle, 1930.
 Rotha, Paul, Documentary Film, London, 1936.
 Arnheim, Rudolph, Film as Art, Berkeley, 1957.
 Barsam, Richard, Non-fiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.
 Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.
 Kracauer, Siegfried, A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1974.

Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of the British Documentary, Berkeley, 1975.

Le Grice, Malcolm, Abstract Film and Beyond, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1977.

Film as Film: Formal Experiment in Film 1910–1975, London, 1979.

Walter Ruttmann: Cinema, pittura, ars acustica, Trento, Italy, 1994.

Articles:

Ruttmann, Walter, "Wie ich meinen Berlin—Film drehte," in Lichtbild-Bühne, no. 241, 1927.

Ruttmann, Walter, in Illustrierter Film-Kurier, no. 658, 1927.

Hirsch, Leo, in Berliner Tageblatt, 24 September 1927.

Friedlander, Paul, "Berlin—die Symphonie der Grossstadt," in Die Rote Fahne, 25 September 1927.

Kahn, Henry, in Die Weltbühne, 4 October 1927.

Pinthus, Kurt, in Tagebuch, 8 October 1927.

Blakeston, Oswald, "Interview with Carl (Karl) Freund," in Close-Up (London), January 1929.

Potamkin, Harry Alan, "The Rise and Fall of the German Film," in Cinema (New York), April 1930.

Rotha, Paul, "It's in the Script," in World Film News (London), September 1938.

Evans, Wick, "Karl Freund, Candid Cinematographer," in Popular Photography (Chicago), February 1939.

Falkenberg, Paul, "Sound Montage: A Propos de Ruttmann," in Film Culture (New York), no. 22–23, 1961.

Cowie, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), August 1961.

Kolaja, J., and A. W. Foster, "Berlin: The Symphony of a City as a Theme of Visual Rhythm," in Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism (Cleveland), Spring 1965.

Kracauer, Siegfried, "Film 1928," in Das Ornament der Masse, Frankfurt, 1974.

Chapman, Jay, "Two Aspects of the City: Cavalcanti and Ruttmann," in The Documentary Tradition, edited by Lewis Jacobs, 2nd edition, New York, 1979.

Pulleine, Tim, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1979.

"Walter Ruttmann," in Travelling (Lausanne), Summer 1979.

Nieuwstadt, M. V., "Filmliga herdrukt 1927–1931," in Skrien (Amsterdam), Winter 1982–83.

Bernstein, Matthew, "Visual Style and Spatial Articulation in Berlin: Symphony of a City," in Journal of Film and Video (River Forest, Illinois), Autumn 1984.

Brandt, H.J., "Walter Ruttmann: Von Expressionismus zum Faschismus," in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), October–November 1985.

Kvist, P., "Berlin, En storbyesyfoni: et forsok pa a fange det moderne," in Z Filmtidsskrift (Oslo), no. 2, 1991.

* * *

Underlying the totality of Walter Ruttmann's work in Berlin: Die Sinfonie der Grossstadt was the aesthetic predicated on the wish to kineticize abstract forms as well as a concern for movement, rhythm, and alluring surface appearances. Originally embodied in a series of innovative animated abstract films Opus I-IV, Ruttmann's eminently permutable aesthetic enabled him to emerge as one of the exemplars of the so-called New Objectivity in film during the middle years of the Weimar Republic. In Berlin, a rhapsodic, quasi-documentary record of a day in the life of Germany's capital, Ruttmann's fetishization of the rhythmic and visual as ends in themselves, fused with the cult of technology and urban modernity that characterized the New Objectivity, took on the aspects of an omnivorous cinematic hubris seeking gratification by the manipulation of what Ruttmann termed the “living material” of a metropolis and the “absolute, purely filmic visual motifs” it yielded.

Berlin, then, is the film’s true protagonist, a vibrant, pulsating, yet organic totality whose every component—animate or inanimate—is mediated and defined by the periodicity of the whole. The film portrays a day in the life of the city, beginning with panoramic shots of the sleeping metropolis as dawn breaks and concluding with a late-night fireworks display. Compressed between these diurnal poles is a brilliantly edited optical phantasmagoria of life in Berlin. The virtuosity with which cinematic tools are employed to stress certain leitmotifs—for example, the abstract beauty of modern technology—masterfully complements the film’s structure, which replicates that of a symphony inasmuch as the alleged rhythms and oscillations of urban activity are organized into a series of movements. Yet consonant with Ruttmann’s aesthetic, within this rhythmic whole certain icons of modernity are isolated, abstracted, and transformed into purely ornamental images devoid of content and context. The recurring shots of machines, industrial facilities, and the facades of buildings, ripped out of any discernible context and deprived of any function save that of ornamentation, are typical leitmotifs in the film. Now luminous, now in shadow, now static, now in energetic but purposeless motion, they have been ruthlessly pressed into the service of Ruttmann’s unrestrained formalism and thus stripped of all independent integrity and meaning.

This fetishism is accompanied by a contempt for human autonomy and subjectivity. Berlin’s human inhabitants are placed on the same existential plane as its industrial and technological icons and the traffic that repeatedly criss-crosses the screen. Soulless ornaments, the people are but another source of optical titillation. Such a dehumanizing approach accounts for the gratuitous juxtaposition of shots of chattering monkeys and people conversing on the telephone, of department store mannequins or bobbing mechanical dolls with the anonymous inhabitants of the city, of the legs of workers with those of cattle being herded into a courtyard. Far from representing any rational critique of the contradictions that inhere in and have produced this particular manifestation of urban modernity, such juxtapositions are integrated into a visual rhapsody that, though brilliant in a narrow technical sense, emanates from an obsessive interest in the richness of forms and rhythm yielded by the city. Ruttmann’s view of modern life is as a purely aesthetic phenomenon, constituting abstract raw material for the filmmaker and entertaining optical cuisine for the public. This view represents not a denunciation of reification and dehumanization but their apotheosis.

Hailed upon its release as a revolutionary work of art, one that “flays our retinas, our nerves, our consciousness,” Berlin is still venerated by film historians for its brilliant editing and imaginative structure. However, in the 1920s some perceptive critics, including Siegfried Kracauer and Paul Friedländer, lambasted its failure to establish any meaningful connections among the phenomena it portrayed. Such censure was well-founded, for Berlin reduced urban modernity to the spurious common denominators of dynamism, rhythm, and an aestheticized, reified technology, all of which were enveloped in a vacuous display of optical pyrotechnics. Indeed, these ideas and attitudes came to full fruition within the embrace of National Socialism. Ruttmann’s world of abstract forms and stylized technology was fully integrated into the National Socialist public sphere and thereby into the latter’s consummation: the mythologization and heroicization of imperialism and barbarism. Thus Berlin, far from being simply another “great film,” must also be regarded as a precursor of a genre in which Ruttmann himself later specialized—the Nazi documentary film.

—Barry Fulks

THE BEST YEARS OF OUR LIVES

USA, 1946

Director: William Wyler

Production: Goldwyn Productions; black and white, 35mm; running time: 172 minutes. Released 1946. Filmed in RKO studios.

Producer: Samuel Goldwyn; screenplay: Robert Sherwood, from the novel Glory for Me by MacKinley Kantor; photography: Gregg Toland; editor: Daniel Mandell; sound recordist: Gordon Sawyer; art direction: George Jenkins with Perry Ferguson; music: Hugo Friedhofer.

Cast: Myrna Loy (Milly Stephenson); Fredric March (Al Stephenson); Dana Andrews (Fred Derry); Teresa Wright (Peggy Stephenson); Virginia Mayo (Marie Derry); Cathy O’Donnel (Wilma Cameron); Harold Russell (Homer Parrish); Hoagy Carmichael (Butch Engle).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Direction, Best Actor (March), Best Supporting Actor (Russell), Best Screenplay, Best Editing, Best Music, and a Special Award to Harold Russell for “bringing hope and courage to his fellow veterans,” 1946; New York Film Critics Awards for Best Motion Picture and Best Direction, 1946.

Publications

Books:

- Reisz, Karel, editor, William Wyler: An Index, London, 1958.
 Warshow, Robert, The Immediate Experience: Movies, Comics, Theater, and Other Aspects of Popular Culture, New York, 1962.
 Kantor, Bernar, and Irwin Blacker, editors, Director at Work, New York, 1970.
 Quirk, Lawrence, J., The Films of Fredric March, New York, 1971.
 Marsden, Axel, William Wyler, New York, 1973.
 Marill, Alvin, H., Samuel Goldwyn Presents, South Brunswick, New Jersey, 1976.
 Koszarski, Richard, Hollywood Directors 1941–1976, New York, 1977.
 Tuska, John, editor, Close-up: The Hollywood Director, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1978.
 Anderegg, Michael, A., William Wyler, Boston, 1979.
 O’Connor, John E., and Martin A. Jackson, editors, American History/American Film: Interpreting the Hollywood Image, New York, 1979.
 Epstein, Lawrence, J., Samuel Goldwyn, Boston, 1981.
 Kern, Sharon, William Wyler: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.

The Best Years of Our Lives

Bowman, Barbara, Master Space: Film Images of Capra, Lubitsch, Sternberg, and Wyler, Wesport, Connecticut, 1992.

Herman, Jan, A Talent for Trouble: The Life of Hollywood's Most Acclaimed Director, New York, 1996.

Articles:

New York Times, 17 November 1946.

Rich Isaacs, Hermine, "William Wyler: Director with a Passion and a Craft," in Theater Arts (New York), February 1947.

Polonsky, Abraham, in Hollywood Quarterly, April 1947.

Warshow, Robert, "The Anatomy of a Falsehood," in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), May-June 1947.

Koenig, Lester, "Gregg Toland, Film-Maker," in Screen Writer (London), December 1947.

Lyon, Peter, "The Hollywood Picture," in Hollywood Quarterly, Summer 1948-Summer 1949.

Griffith, Richard, "Wyler, Wellman, and Huston," in Films in Review (New York), February 1950.

Reisz, Karel, "The Later Films of William Wyler," in Sequence (London), no. 13, 1951.

Tozzi, Romano, "Fredric March," in Films in Review (New York), December 1958.

Reid, John Howard, "A Little Larger Than Life," in Films and Filming (London), February 1960.

"A Comparison of Size," in Films and Filming (London), March 1960.

Ringgold, Gene, "Myrna Loy," in Films in Review (New York), February 1963.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 15 July 1965.

Doeckel, Ken, "William Wyler," in Films in Review (New York), October 1971.

Higham, Charles, interview with Wyler in Action (Los Angeles), September-October 1973.

"Dialogue on Film," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), April 1976.

Swindell, Larry, "A Life in Film," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), April 1976.

Cook, P., "The Sound Track," in Films in Review (New York), May 1979.

Cohen, Joan, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Chell, S. L., "Music and Emotion in the Classic Hollywood Film," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Winter 1984.

Reid's Film Index (New South Wales, Australia), no. 4, 1990, and no. 19, 1996.

Gerber, D.A., "Heroes and Misfits: The Troubled Social Reintegration of Disabled Veterans in The Best Years of Our Lives," in American Quarterly (Baltimore, Maryland), vol. 45, no. 4, 1994.

Toles, George, "This May Hurt a Little: The Art of Humiliation in Film," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1995.

* * *

Acclaimed by critics and audiences at its release and awarded eight Academy Awards, The Best Years of Our Lives is imbued with the personal commitment that director William Wyler brought to his first project after his experience of shooting two documentaries for the U.S. Army Air Corps during World War II. Wyler was as much of a returning serviceman as are the heroes of this film. His problems in reintegrating himself into the community were perhaps not the same as those of Homer, the amputee, Fred, the captain who can only find work as a soda jerk and Al, the banker who confuses idealism and collateral, but the director's identification with their predicaments cannot be doubted. It is expressed in the film's unconventional structure and tone.

The film is, of course, about homecoming, and emphatically so when we realize that nearly one-third of its considerable length is exclusively devoted to that subject. The unfolding of the narrative, a slim narrative, is deferred until the film has thoroughly spatialized the notion of the return. In his pre-war films, Wyler's meticulous mise-en-scène served psychological portraiture in the context of melodrama. In Best Years, what we conventionally identify as theatrical tension is replaced by the nearly plotless placement of characters in locale and in relationship to each other. Wyler's stagings make dramatic events of the performers' positions in the frame. The three male protagonists, distinct from each other in class, backgrounds, age, and profession, are emblemized as an entity in the way their faces fit together in a bombardier's bay, during their journey back to Boone City. A taxi, with its windows and rear view mirror, provides a series of variations on their unity and singularity as it deposits them at their respective homes. Homer is caught in significant isolation, standing before his front porch, between the clear eyes of his buddies and the pitying ones of his family and sweetheart. When he waves goodbye with his prosthetic hook he places everyone in this less than triumphant homecoming. Al's reception, in one of the film's most famous shots (in a film full of famous shots), is a happier one. He embraces his wife Milly in a hallway whose length is a function of narrative time and camera placement rather than physical dimension.

One of the elements for which the film is distinguished is the use of quite limited spatial contexts—the bedrooms, living rooms, and kitchens of the middle class. Wyler's blockings and the deep-focus photography of Gregg Toland, then, transcend the modest areas of middle-American domesticity, without betraying or distorting their shape, finding in them the coordinates that express this drama of placement. The emotional peak of the embrace of Al and Milly is followed by Al's nervousness at being a civilian and a husband. Milly sits comfortably in a wing chair, at place in the frame; Al shifts nervously from one side of the frame to the other. His homecoming, as well as that of Fred and Homer, is incomplete. It will require the duration of the whole film to achieve something like a narrative homecoming. And even that is ambiguous in this film that so disrupts the conventions of Hollywood storytelling.

The story that is told is charted in the distances our eyes traverse in the frame. Here, as in other examples of screen narrative that exploit staging in deep fields, we are required to make sense out of what is apparently a fully constituted frame, without the distraction of frequent inter-cutting. This access to the wholeness of the cinematic image is what prompted André Bazin to consider Best Years a model of his realist aesthetic. Bazin pays particular attention to the scene where the foreground is occupied by Homer, playing the piano with his hooks, while in the background Fred is phoning Al's daughter to break off their relationship. The mediating figure in the frame is Al, presumably looking at Homer, yet just as much aware of what is going on behind his back. We see and understand all the elements simultaneously, just as we do at the film's end, at the wedding of Homer and Wilma in one side of the frame, and the reconciliation of Fred and Peggy in the other.

The Best Years of Our Lives represents the kind of production for which Samuel Goldwyn was renowned. No expense or effort was spared; the lighting of the cramped playing spaces required enormously complicated procedures to create the deep-focus effects. Hugo Friedhofer's score is one of the most admired in the history of film music. A star actress, Myrna Loy, played Milly, essentially a supporting role. The embodiment of one kind of American wife in the "Thin Man" series, she is just as well remembered for the variation she brings to the type in Best Years. Fredric March won his second Academy Award (the first 15 years previously in Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde) for his portrayal of Al. Harold Russell, the non-professional chosen to play Homer, gives a performance that is as much a function of the director's ability to place him in the frame and preserve his simplicity as it is a creation of the "actor."

While it is impossible to ignore the non-professional status of Harold Russell or to ignore the way the fiction addresses an important social problem in 1946 America, it is equally impossible to ignore the film's formal and perceptual challenges. With almost mannerist insistence, Wyler reminds us that the screen is an image of depth, not the real thing. He tests that quality of the image in the long and short of the fiction's expressive physical contexts—an ex-flier (Fred) wandering through a graveyard of planes slated for demolition, an amputee finally embracing his sweetheart with the stumps of his arms, a gigantic drug store that seems to sum up the crassness of postwar America, a neighborhood bar that collects the feelings of a film unsure about our "best years."

—Charles Affron

LA BÊTE HUMAINE

(Judas Was a Woman; The Human Beast)

France, 1938

Director: Jean Renoir

Production: Paris Film Productions; black and white; RCA High Fidelity; running time: 88 minutes; length: 7937 feet. Released 23 December 1938. Filmed at Pathé Cinema Studios (Joinville) and on location at Le Havre. Theme song: "Valse Ninon."

La Bête humaine

Producers: Robert Hakim and Raymond Hakim; screenplay: Jean Renoir, from the novel by Emile Zola; assistant directors: Claude Renoir, Suzanne de Troyes; photography: Curt Courant; editor: Margeurite Renoir; sound: Teyssiere; art director: Eugene Lourie; music: Joseph Kosma.

Cast: Jean Gabin (Jacques Lantier); Simone Simon (Séverine); Fernand Ledoux (Roubaud); Julien Carette (Pecqueux); Blanchette Brunoy (Flore); Gerard Landry (Lauvergne); Berlioz (Grand Morin); Jean Renoir (Cabuche).

Publications

Books:

Davay, Paul, Jean Renoir, Brussels, 1957.
 Cauliez, Armand-Jean, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1962.
 Chardère, Bernard, editor, Jean Renoir, in Premier Plan (Lyon), no. 22–24, May 1962.

Institut des Hautes Etudes Cinematographiques, Analyses des films de Jean Renoir, Paris, 1964.

Bennett, Susan, Jean Renoir, London, 1967.

Pouille, François, Renoir 1938; ou, Jean Renoir pour rien: Enquête sur un cinéaste, Paris, 1969.

Leprohon, Pierre, Jean Renoir, New York, 1971.

Braudy, Leo, Jean Renoir: The World of His Films, New York, 1972.

Bazin, André, Jean Renoir, edited by François Truffaut, Paris, 1973.

Durgnat, Raymond, Jean Renoir, Berkeley, 1974.

Beylie, Claude, Jean Renoir: Le Spectacle, la vie, Paris, 1975.

Renoir, Jean, Essays, Conversations, Reviews, edited by Penelope Gilliatt, New York, 1975.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: Volume 1: The Great Tradition, New York, 1976.

Faulkner, Christopher, Jean Renoir: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Sesonske, Alexander, Jean Renoir: The French Films 1924–1939, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1980.

Gauteur, Claude, Jean Renoir: Oeuvres de cinéma inédites, Paris, 1981.

McBride, Joseph, editor, Filmmakers on Filmmaking 2, Los Angeles, 1983.

- Serceau, Daniel, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1985.
 Bertin, Celia, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1986.
 Faulkner, Christopher, The Social Cinema of Jean Renoir, Princeton, 1986.
 Vincendeau, Ginette, and Keith Reader, La Vie est à Nous: French Cinema of the Popular Front, London, 1986.
 Viry-Babel, Roger, Jean Renoir: Le Jeu et la règle, Paris, 1986.
 Bessy, Maurice, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1989.
 Braudy, Leo, Jean Renoir: The World of His Films, New York, 1989.
 Bergan, Ronald, Jean Renoir: Projections of Paradise, Woodstock, 1994.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 15 February 1939.
New York Times, 26 February 1939.
Kine Weekly (London), 20 April 1939.
 Galway, Peter, in New Statesman (London), 29 April 1939.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1939.
 Greene, Graham, in Spectator (London), 5 May 1939.
Time and Tide (London), 13 April 1946.
 "Renoir Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1952.
 "Renoir Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Christmas 1957.
 Whitehall, Richard, "Painting Life with Movement," in Films and Filming (London), July 1960.
 Whitehall, Richard, "The Screen Is His Canvas," in Films and Filming (London), July 1960.
 Harcourt, Peter, "Jean Renoir," in London Magazine, December 1962.
Films and Filming (London), February 1964.
 Colet, Jean, in Télérama (Paris), 28 May 1968.
Image et Son (Paris), no. 223, 1968.
 Fofi, Goffredo, "The Cinema of the Popular Front in France," in Screen (London), Winter 1972–73.
 Interview with Renoir, in Positif (Paris), September 1975.
 Renoir, Jean, in Image et Son (Paris), March 1977.
 Strebel, Elizabeth Grottle, "Jean Renoir and the Popular Front," in Feature Films as History, edited by K. R. M. Short, London, 1981.
 Leahy, J., in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), vol. 58, April 1991.
 Vincendeau, G., "The Beauty of the Beast," in Sight and Sound (London), July 1991.
 Tesson, Charles, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 482, July–August 1994.
 Aldarondo, R., in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 17/18, March 1995.
 Short review, in Télérama (Paris), no. 2364, 3 May 1995.
 Faulkner, Christopher, "Renoir, Technology and the Affect in La bête humaine," in Persistence of Vision (Maspeth), no. 12–13, 1996.

* * *

After the commercial failure of his politically committed film La Marseillaise (1937), Renoir accepted Robert Hakim's invitation to "make a film about trains" for Jean Gabin. Disappointed at the collapse of Grémillon's film project Train d'enfer, Gabin looked to Renoir who had so successfully directed him in the role of Maréchal in La Grande Illusion (1937). For Renoir a screen version of Zola's La Bête humaine represented another opportunity to adapt a greatly admired author whose fiction had previously inspired his silent film Nana (1926).

Reflecting the bleak tone of Zola's portrayal of a man driven by homicidal impulses, Renoir's film is untypically dark and fatalistic for his 1930s period, and with Gabin as the doomed hero, his version has considerable affinity with the deeply pessimistic contemporary Carné-Prévert films such as Quai des Brumes (1938) or Le Jour se lève (1939). The uncharacteristic mood is largely determined by low-key lighting, and, equally untypically for Renoir, music which is external to the action. His camera too, is noticeably more mobile as it constantly relates individuals to their working environment. Bright daytime locations progressively give way to dark, nocturnal interiors or shadowy industrial landscapes, as the freedom of the fated protagonists gradually diminishes.

Although fidelity to Zola is implied by a quotation from the novel and a signed portrait of the author after the credit sequence, there are several omissions or shifts of emphasis in Renoir's screen adaptation. Whereas Zola's richly textured epic novel is partly a study of atavism, partly a portrait of the railway community, it is also a satire of the judiciary and an indictment of the corrupt Second Empire. The author's multi-layered poetic narrative explores the murderous instinct thematically through a number of minor characters and situations, but Renoir concerns himself only with the protagonists, discarding several narrative elements, such as the train crash, the train trapped by snow, and the sustained satire of the judiciary with its overt political dimension. For a director intimately associated with the Popular Front, Renoir surprisingly resists the political potential, and plays down Zola's social contrasts. If in La Marseillaise he had explored ideas, in La Bête humaine, Renoir is more concerned with mood and action. For André Bazin, Renoir's adaptation provided a tighter plot and was more successful in integrating the triangular relationship between Séverine, Lantier, and Roubaud into an account of railway life.

Casting against type Renoir insisted on Simone Simon for the role of the flirtatious but frigid Séverine to play against Gabin's Lantier. Excellent performances come from Julien Carette as the stoker Pecqueux and from Fernand Ledoux as the once jealous, now broken, Roubaud. In only his second screen role, a rather melodramatic Renoir plays the poacher Cabuche wrongly accused of murder.

The sense of compulsion which permeates the film is established in the opening train sequence. The journey from Paris to Le Havre, as Alexander Sesonske has shown, is brilliantly distilled in four and a quarter minutes. Speed is conveyed not so much by cutting between shots as by the rhythm of movement within the shots. From the close-up of the train's roaring fire-box, suggesting the passionate forces at work, the camera records the train hurtling through the countryside, set on a track from which it must not deviate, with Lantier and Pecqueux working in complete harmony to harness the machine's formidable power, and to ensure punctuality. The closing sequence of the film, a return run of the journey with the men now fighting, expresses the idea of men unable to break free of predetermined patterns.

The images of the men working, the informative shots of the station yards, the ubiquitous sound of trains keep the presence of the railway to the fore, thus respecting Zola's documentary intentions. Character is intimately studied in terms of a working environment, whether on the train, in the yards, in the canteen, in the showers or at the lodgings. It is in these sequences with railway men functioning as a team and taking pride in their work that Renoir remains faithful to the values of the Popular Front. Throughout he enjoyed the invaluable technical cooperation of the French railways, and with the exception of Gabin's final suicidal leap from the locomotive, all the railway sequences were shot on location with direct sound recording.

Renoir represents Lantier's inner turmoil symbolically with the wind raging through his hair, while his psychopathic self is darkly reflected in a puddle as he reaches for a murder weapon, or, after he has stabbed Séverine, in a mirror where low-key lighting gives him a particularly monstrous appearance. Perhaps the most powerful sequence comes with Séverine's murder when a demented Lantier suddenly turns on his mistress in an uncontrollable frenzy. The music of the railway ball floods the screen with its ironic song about flirtatious love and possession, linking and contrasting scenes of public enjoyment with a scene of private horror.

Acknowledging his debt to Renoir, Fritz Lang remade La Bête humaine as Human Desire in 1954. The most detailed study of La Bête humaine is found in Jean Renoir by Alexander Sesonske.

—R. F. Cousins

BHARAT MATA

(Mother India)

India, 1957

Director: Mehboob Khan

Production: A Mehboob Production; Technicolor; running time: 120 minutes; original running time: 160 minutes, running time of 1961 version: 95 minutes. Released 1957.

Executive producer: V. J. Shah; producer: Mehboob Khan; screenplay: Vajahat Mirza, S. Ali Raza; photography: Faradoon A. Irani; editor: Shamsudin Kadri; sound: Kaushik; art director: V. H. Palnitkar; dance director: Chiman Seth; costumes: Fazaldin; music: Naushad; lyrics: Shakeel Badayuni.

Cast: Nargis (Radha); Sunil Dutt (Birjoo); Rajendra Kumar (Ramoo); Raaj Kumar (Shamoo); Kumkum (Champa); Chanchal (Roop); Kanhaiyalal (Sukhi Lala); Jiloo Maa (Sunder Chachi); Azra (Chandre); Master Saiid (Birjoo, the boy); Muqri (Shambu); Sheela Nayak (Kamla); Siddiqui (Dalita Prasad); Geeta (Village girl); Master Surendra (Ramoo, the boy).

Publications

Books:

Barnouw, Erik, and S. Krishnaswamy, Indian Film, New York, 1965.
Jha, B., editor, Indian Motion Picture Almanac, 10th edition, Calcutta, 1975.

Rangoonwala, F., Pictorial History of Indian Cinema, Calcutta, 1979.
Willemen, Paul, and Behroze Ghandy, Indian Cinema, London, 1982.

Bharat Mata

Pfleiderer, Beatrix, and Lothar Lutze, The Hindi Film: Agent and Re-Agent of Cultural Change, New Delhi, 1985.

Ramachandran, T. M., 70 Years of Indian Cinema (1913–1983), Bombay, 1985.

Armes, Roy, Third World Filmmaking and the West, Berkeley, 1987.

Articles:

FilmIndia, December 1957.

Variety (New York), 27 August 1957.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1958.

Kine Weekly (London), 16 February 1961.

City Limits (London), 18 June 1982.

Ray, Satyajit, "Under Western Eyes," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1982.

Haffner, P., "Le Cinéma indien en Afrique noire," in Filméchange (Paris), Winter 1983.

Tesson, Charles, "Le rêve indien," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1985.

Thomas, R., "Indian Cinema: Pleasures and Popularity," in Screen (London), May–August 1985.

Thomas, R., "Sanctity and Scandal," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (New York), no. 3, 1989.

* * *

Mother India, one of the all-time hits of the Hindi commercial cinema, has also been a noted success in the Hindi film's traditional export markets in the Middle East and Africa. It is one of the few such films to have received exposure in Western cinemas, and even won an Oscar nomination for Best Foreign Film.

The film is very much a legendary enterprise, and one conceived perhaps on such terms. It was the last major success of the director, Mehboob Khan; it is one of the best remembered works of the music director, Naushad; it represented the last major appearance of the female lead, Nargis; and it was a remake of an earlier Mehboob film, and one of the most acclaimed of the 1940s, Aurat (Woman, 1940). In this sense, it encapsulates a number of filmic and non-filmic narratives into its own, and weaves these together into a mythical shape.

Mehboob's own story is perhaps the central one underlying Mother India: born in a poor rural family, he rose through menial jobs and minor acting roles in the studios of the 1930s to become a director in 1934. In Hindi movie parlance he was associated with the genre of the "social" film—melodramatic narratives oriented to exposing social malaise. His better-known films emphasized a kind of populism about the "people's" travails. The "people" are presented as the true, the genuine India, remaining faithful to their traditions even as they accept a modernizing, reformist context.

Mehboob's personal history was publicized to lend authenticity to Mother India's tale of rural folk punished by the elements and struggling under the burden of debt. However, the film is very much an essay in exoticising the "simple" life. Colour—a relatively recent and still uncharacteristic phenomenon at the time of the film's making—is used to make a spectacle of nature, with the narrative and song sequences splashed in dawns and sunsets. As with later sagas of the rural life (such as Ganga Jamuna, Nitin Bose, 1961), communal activities, whether of tilling and reaping or in a celebration at festivals such as Holi (the spring festival), are staged in a highly choreographed style. The music director, Naushad, made a conscious attempt to bring folk rhythms into the repertoire of Hindi film music. But the stylized evocation, with its ornamentalization through spectacle, places the music too in a mythicizing distance from the "folk." The real object of the myth is not the folk but the modern nation.

The original 1940 narrative dealt with the sufferings of a peasant woman, Radha, abandoned by her husband and left to fend for her sons. Drought and debt beat down on her. The focus is on the value she places on her chastity even in the face of starvation, and on the great love with which she sustains her children. These qualities carry her family, and by extension, the village community, through the crisis. However, the nurturing mother has her negative side. An excess of love causes her to turn a blind eye to her undisciplined, hedonist son, Birjoo. This indulgence leads him into bad ways; he becomes a bandit and a threat to the community. Ultimately, the mother has to kill him, and dies, broken-hearted.

In the later film, there are a number of important changes. The issue of exploitation, which was present but marginalized in Aurat, is now quite central. There is an induction of nationalist discourses about whether violence or faith in God (a complete distortion of Gandhi's much more active notion of passive resistance) are to be embraced in the face of injustice. These oppositions are quite deviously solved. Birjoo, the bandit son, is now clearly a social bandit, directing his activities against the oppressive money-lending classes. But his actions are tainted; he not only kills the exploiting money-lender, he also abducts his daughter. A woman's honour—the mechanism whereby the patriarchal authority of the community at large is maintained—is threatened, and so Radhu kills her son. Thus while exploitation, presented as the impediment to the progress of the rural community, is ended, the significance of Birjoo's actions is denied.

Faith and honour triumph; development, in keeping with contemporary governmental designs for the rural community, is achieved in the construction of a dam. The mother, still grief-stricken over Birjoo's death, inaugurates it as mother of the community. But the film's work of ideological denial is unbalanced when, in Radha's perception, it seems to be Birjoo's blood which flows out when the dam is opened.

Mother India is then not only the re-working of an earlier film. It is a narrativization of a certain legacy (that of the national movement) with the object of presenting certain contemporary problems of inequality, justice, and development, in an ideological way. Seeking to represent the rural people, the film actually makes of them elements in a design of colour, song, and dance, an ornate spectacle conceived to reflect the populist myths of the modern state.

—Ravi Vasudevan

BHUMIKA

(The Role)

India, 1977

Director: Shyam Benegal

Production: Blaze Film Enterprises; colour, 35mm; running time: 144 minutes.

Bhumika

Producers: Lalit M. Bijlani and Freni M. Variava; executive producers: Silloo Fali Variava and Bisham M. Bijlani; screenplay: Girish Karnad, Pandit Satyadev Dubey, and Shyam Benegal, from the book Sangtye Aika by Hansa Wadkar; assistant directors: Dayal Nihalani, Manohar Ghanekar, Swadesh Pal, and Prahlad Kakar; photography: Govind Nihalini; editor: Bhanudas; art director: Shama Zaidi; sound: Hitendra Ghosh, Robin Chatterjee, Raj Trehan; costumes: Kalpana Lajmi; music: Vanraj Bahtia; songs: Vanraj Bahtia, Majrooh Sultanpuri, and Vasanth Dev.

Cast: Smita Patil (Usha); Anant Nag (Rajan); Amrith Puri (Vinayak Kale); Naseeruddin Shah (Sunil Sharma); Sulabha Deshpande (Usha's Mother); Baby Ruksana (Usha as a child); Amol Palekar (Keshar Dalvi); Kulbhushan Kharbanda (Producer).

Publications

Books:

Da Cunha, Uma, The New Generation: 1960–1980, New Delhi, 1981.
The Directorate of Film Festivals, New Delhi, 1981.
 Vasudev, Aruna, The New Indian Cinema, Macmillan India (New Delhi), 1986.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 15 November 1978.
 Milne, Tom, Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1980.
 Vasudev, Aruna, and Philippe Leglet, interview with Shyam Benegal in Indian Cinema Superbazaar, Vikas Publishing (New Delhi), 1983.

* * *

Shyam Benegal's fourth film marks a substantial departure from his first three works. Bhumika is inspired by the autobiography of the 1940s Marathi and Hindi movie star Hansa Wadkar. The book, as told to journalist Arun Sadhu, used the title of her most famous film, the mega hit musical Sangtye Aika (1959), translating loosely as "Listen, and I'll Tell." It caused a sensation and became an instant best-seller, being an extraordinarily candid tale of a young woman who came from a tradition of kalavantins—courtesans from the Goa coastline renowned for their musical accomplishments but considered to be of lowly status. She joined the film industry as a child actress mainly to support her mother and grandmother, acting in stage-derived musicals. She moved to Karachi to do adventure B-movies (Modern Youth, 1936) before receiving her major break in the Bombay Talkies studio. Wadkar went on to become the foremost Marathi star in two extremely popular but seemingly contradictory genres, the devotional Saint-film and the bawdy folk-derived Tamasha musical: playing the title role in the Prabhat studios' Sant Sakhu (1941) and the role of Baya in V. Shantaram's Lokshahir Ramjoshi (1947). Ramjoshi and Sangtye Aika are among the biggest hits in the history of the Marathi cinema.

Benegal's movie adapts this story into a human interest saga of a traditional courtesan coming to terms with contemporary mass-culture, and her struggle to find her own individuality in the process. The framing narrative shows Usha, the movie star, leave her husband and seek shelter first with her male co-star Rajan, and eventually in the oppressive confines of the feudal landlord of Kale's estate. Her husband arrives with the police to rescue her from Kale. Free once more, she rejects the offers of support from her husband, her now grown-up and married daughter—whose modernity marks a break with the matrilineal tradition—and her former lover Rajan, presumably in favour of the independence for which she craved.

Female protagonists seeking independence through various kinds of social engagements, failing and then "going away," were a common and familiar stereotype in much of the New Indian Cinema of the time. Feminist critic Susie Tharu's remarks about Usha's counterpart Sulabha (also played by Smita Patil) in Jabbar Patel's Umbartha (The Threshold, 1981) clearly apply to the stereotype in Bhumika as well: "The filmic focus . . . establishes her as the central character as well as the problem (the disruption, the enigma) the film will explore and resolve . . . it is clear that to search herself is, for a woman, a tragic enterprise. An enterprise in which she is doomed to fail, but can fail bravely and heroically" ("Third World Women's Cinema," Economic and Political Weekly, Bombay, 17 May 1986).

The film develops its enigmatic protagonist with a dense overlay of nostalgia, through a series of sepia flashbacks showing Usha's childhood in the Konkan. Undoubtedly Bhumika's most attractive aspect, these flashbacks show her meetings with her future husband, Dalvi, who claims her in return for helping her impoverished family. The scene showing her entry into the Surya Movietone reconstructs Wadkar's test at the Shalini Cinetone conducted by the framed composer Govindrao Tembe, tabla maestro Tirakhwan, and director Baburao Painter. Showing Usha's early roles in the movies, Benegal lovingly recreates various pre-war genres like the stunt movie, the Mahabharata mythological, and the social reform melodrama. Other flashbacks show her husband as a manipulative opportunist who starts managing her career, and her one major extra-marital relationship, with the poetry-spewing existentialist filmmaker Sunil, who involves her in a romantic suicide pact only to abandon her.

This mode of reconstructing the past to create an idiom of tragic fiction is all the more remarkable because of its startling contrast to Benegal's previous work: political features addressing a rural peasantry in the context of the Communist Party of India (Marxist-Leninist) "Naxalite" movements in the late 1960s and through the 1970s. Ankur (The Seedling, 1974) and Nishant (Night's End, 1975) were set in rural Andhra Pradesh, Manthan (The Churning, 1976) addressed the struggle of Gujarati peasants to set up a milk cooperative. All three films worked with several young actors and made them major stars, including Smita Patil and Anant Nag who feature in Bhumika. These films' success—especially that of his debut, Ankur—created a commercially viable 1970s trend of a ruralist realism, using accented Hindi to simulate the language of Telugu and Gujarati-speaking villagers, and a naturalist, stage-derived acting style that for many years came to be equated in several Indian cinemas, and later in its television, with a political and cultural authenticity.

Clearly Benegal shifts ground with Bhumika. The film, for one, locates the whole authenticity question into melodrama proper. It was the first Hindi film from the short-lived New Indian Cinema movement designed to reach a large audience and to receive a substantial commercial release. It went a long way in creating for its maker a reputation for providing culturally refined entertainment, in contrast to that churned out by the mainstream Hindi film industry. Until Benegal, it was only his mentor, Satyajit Ray, who was committed to the aesthetic of a cinema of taste, to define an indigenous cultural elite that otherwise sought its referents mainly through seeing American and European films. Unlike the often colonial overtones of Indian upper-class nostalgia movies of the time (e.g., Aparna Sen's 36 Chowringhee Lane, 1981), Bengal's protagonist allows him to explore the enigmas of a specifically indigenous popular culture.

It is arguable that in making the film he saw the two genres, of a frontier ruralist realism on the one side, and of creating the fictions of a collective "past" on the other, as being compatible modes effectively addressing the same problem: of constructing an indigenous authenticity for an audience that would not wish to be a part of the dominant mass-entertainment modes of India's film industry. Certainly this is where Bhumika has proved the most influential, in the way it expanded the thematic repertoire of the New Indian Cinema, and eventually allowed a more sustained engagement with the mass-cultural idiom itself.

—Ashish Rajadhyaksha

THE BICYCLE THIEF

See LADRI DI BICICLETTA

THE BIG HEAT

USA, 1953

Director: Fritz Lang

Production: Columbia Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 89 or 90 minutes. Released 14 October 1953. Filmed from about 21 March to 18 April 1953 in Columbia studios.

Producer: Robert Arthur; screenplay: Sidney Boehm, from a novel by William P. MacGivern; photography: Charles Lang, Jr.; editor: Charles Nelson; sound: George Cooper; art direction: Robert Peterson; set decoration: William Kiernan; music: Daniele Amfitheatrof, Mischa Bakaleinikoff; costumes: Jean Louis.

Cast: Glenn Ford (David Bannion); Gloria Grahame (Debby Marsh); Jocelyn Brando (Katie Bannion); Alexander Scourby (Mike Laguna); Lee Marvin (Vince Stone); Jeanette Nolan (Bertha Duncan); Peter Whitney (Tierney); Willis Buchey (Lieutenant Wilkes); Robert Burton (Gus Burke); Adam Williams (Larry Gordon); Howard Wendall (Higgins); Cris Alcaide (George Rose); Carolyn Jones (Doris); Michael Granger (Hugo); Dorothy Green (Lucy Chapman); Ric Roman (Baldy); Dan Seymour (Atkins); Edith Evanson (Selma Parker).

Publications

Books:

Courtade, Francis, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.
Moulet, Luc, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.
Eibel, Alfred, editor, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1964.
Johnston, Claire, Fritz Lang, London, 1969.
Jensen, Paul J., The Cinema of Fritz Lang, New York, 1969.

Bogdanovich, Peter, Fritz Lang in America, London, 1969.
Alloway, Lawrence, Violent America: The Movies Between 1946–1964, New York, 1971.
Bazin, André, La Politique des auteurs: Entretiens avec Jean Renoir, etc., Paris, 1972; revised edition, 1984.
McArthur, Colin, Underground U.S.A., London, 1972.
Mast, Gerald, The Comic Mind, Chicago, 1974; revised edition, 1979.
Trufaut, François, Les Films de ma vie, Paris, 1975; as The Films in My Life, New York, 1978.
Gräfe, Frieda, and others, Fritz Lang, Munich, 1976.
Eisner, Lotte, Fritz Lang, London, 1977.
Armour, Robert, Fritz Lang, Boston, 1978.
Jenkins, Stephen, editor, Fritz Lang, London, 1979.
Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Wark, Film Noir, Woodstock, New York, 1979.
Giannetti, Louis, Master of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
Jenkins, Stephen, editor, Fritz Lang: The Image and the Look, London, 1981.
Kaplan, E. Ann, Fritz Lang: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1981.
Maibohm, Ludwig, Fritz Lang: Seine Film—sein Leben, Munich, 1981.
Dürrenmatt, Dieter, Fritz Lang: Leben und Werk, Basle, 1982.
Humphries, Reynold, Fritz Lang: Genre and Representation in His American Films, Baltimore, 1988.
Leblanc, Gérard, and Brigitte Devismes, Le double scénario chez Fritz Lang, Paris, 1991.
McArthur, Colin, The Big Heat, London, 1992.

Articles:

Crowther, Bosley in New York Times, 15 October 1953.
Truffaut, François, "Aimer Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1954.
Anderson, Lindsay, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1954.
Lambert, Gavin, "Fritz Lang's America," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1955.
Mourlet, Michel, "Trajectoire de Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1959.
Legrand, Gérard, "Notes pour un éloge de Fritz Lang," in Positif (Paris), March 1963.
Patalas, Enno, "Fritz Lang, der Unbekannte: Jahrestreffen der deutschen Filmclubs," in Frankfurter Allegemein Zeitung, 7 May 1964.
Hartman, Rainer, "Wirklichkeit statt Menschheitsfragen," in Frankfurter Neue Presse, 26 May 1964.
Beylie, Claude, "L'Oeuvre américain de Fritz Lang (1936–1956)," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1968.
Joannides, Paul, "Aspects of Fritz Lang," in Cinema (London), August 1970.
Flinn, Tom, "The Big Heat and The Big Combo: Rogue Cops and Mink-Coated Girls," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), no. 11, 1974.
Hennelly, Mark, Jr., "American Nightmare: The Underworld in Film," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), no. 3, 1978.
Willis, Don, "Fritz Lang: Only Melodrama," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1979–80.

The Big Heat

MacGivern, William P., in American Film (Washington, D.C.), October 1983.

Pulleine, Tim, in Films and Filming (London), February 1988.

Wood, Robin, "Creativity and Evaluation," in Cineaction (Toronto), Summer-Fall 1990.

Wager, Jans B., "The Big Heat," Bright Lights, no. 14, 1995.

Aldarondo, R., "Los sobornados," Nosferatu (Donostia-San Sebastian, Spain), no. 20, January 1996.

Metz, Walter, "Keep the Coffee Hot, Hugo: Nuclear Trauma in Lang's The Big Heat," Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 21, no. 3, Spring 1997.

* * *

Like Fritz Lang's western Rancho Notorious (1951), The Big Heat is a ballad of hate, murder, and revenge. In both films, the hero is driven outside the law when his love interest is killed by sadistic minions of a crime boss (who personally disapproves of such extremes) and compelled to pull down the whole corrupt system that has perverted his world. Both feature facial scars as a recurring motif, crooked politicians, iconic close-ups of guns, and a clear-eyed criminal woman who sacrifices herself for the hero. The noir-ish The Big Heat is oddly easier on its hard-boiled protagonist, cop Dave Bannion (Glenn Ford), than Rancho Notorious is on cowboy Vern (Arthur Kennedy). The earlier film combines the figure of Mabuse-style mastermind and redeemed bad girl in Altar Keane (Marlene Dietrich), with whom Vern falls in love, while The Big Heat sets up decorative-but-sharp moll Debby (Gloria Grahame) as an outsider within the gang of smooth crime czar Lagana (Alexander Scourby), with a degree of license to criticize her dangerous boyfriend Vince Stone (Lee Marvin), making her almost the equivalent of "good badman" Frenchy (Mel Ferrer). The possibility of a romance between Bannion and Debby is implicit but never raised—these people are too trapped in their roles of cop/family man and crook/moll to get together—while Vern's love for Altar makes his destruction of her gang yet another tragic loss of home.

Though it tackles themes Lang dealt with as early as the Dr. Mabuse movies, The Big Heat is one of many exposé gangster films produced in Hollywood in the 1950s: The Enforcer (1951), The Captive City (1952), Chicago Syndicate (1955), The Big Combo (1955), The Phoenix City Story (1955), and Underworld USA (1961).

Inspired by the Kefauver Commission on organized crime, the cycle adapts the psychological approach of 1940s noirs to analyze not a sick mind but a sick society, depicting American towns and cities under the control of “the Syndicate.” The flamboyant psychopaths who would have been the lead menaces of movies like Little Caesar (1930) or The Public Enemy (1931) are demoted to the supporting role taken by Vince Stone. The real hate figures are the faceless higher-ups rarely glimpsed in the earlier movies (the “Big Boy” of Little Caesar): Lagana, an immigrant made good who hypocritically regrets the need for violence but is determined not “to end up in the same ditch with the Lucky Lucianos,” as a 1950s gang boss, half chairman of the board and half fascist duce. He speaks with the reasonable, soulless tone of the Body Snatchers, while Bannion (whom he accuses of “tracking dirt into his house” by mentioning the murder of a bar-girl he has ordered killed) and Stone (a neanderthal whose only come-back to Debby’s sniping witticisms is to throw hot coffee in her face) are monsters from the Id.

The Big Heat is a film of violence, opening with a close-up of a gun about to be used in the suicide of corrupt cop Tom Duncan, and proceeding rapidly through its plot with jolting horrors that malfom the characters. Bannion turns from family man to obsessive rogue cop when his wife (Jocelyn Brando) is blown up by a car bomb meant for him. Debby is embittered by the ruining of her beauty and takes up Bannion’s quest for revenge, precipitating the big heat by confronting and murdering her “sister under the mink,” grasping widow Bertha Duncan (Jeanette Nolan). With Bertha’s death, the evidence Tom Duncan left behind, which is enough to bring down Lagana’s empire, is released. In a crucial development, prefigured in both Fury (1936) and Rancho Notorious, the embittered hero is still unable to commit cold-blood murder to achieve his purpose—Bannion stops short of assaulting Bertha—and a doppelganger has to step in to pull the last thread that allows justice to be done. The point is underlined in the climax, which finds Debby returning Vince’s favour by dashing boiling coffee in his face and being gun-shot by the villain, prompting Bannion to trounce his ugly mirror image (a witness tags Stone as about Bannion’s height but flashily dressed) in a brutal fight but not to gun him down even though Stone implores him to “shoot!”

Grounded far more in political reality than most of Lang’s noirs, thanks to the hard-hitting detail of William P. McGivern’s novel and Sydney Boehm’s script, The Big Heat is still indebted to expressionism, with sets that reflect the characters’ overriding personality traits: the cold luxury of the Duncan house, bought with dirty money; the tasteless wealth of Lagana’s mansion, with its hideous portrait of the mobster’s sainted mother and jiving teenage party; the penthouse moderne of Vince and Debby, where the police commissioner plays cards with killers; the cramped, poor-but-honest apartment of the Bannion family, underlined by too-insistent heart-warming music; and the hotel room where Bannion ends up, his life pared down to the need for vengeance (“early nothing” Debby comments). The tabloid sensibility of Lang’s late American films (While the City Sleeps, 1955, Beyond a Reasonable Doubt, 1956) informs the depiction of squadroom and barroom, and there is a transgressive charge to the various minor cruelties (an obscene phone call taken by Mrs. Bannion, Stone stubbing a cigarette on the arm of a dice-playing girl in a bar, the famous coffee-throwing attacks) that imbues the film with an unpredictable, uneasy sense of danger. Even the finale is hardly comforting: after the fall of the crime syndicate, the widowed hero is not seen embracing his daughter and picking up his home life but returning to his desk in the Homicide Department. The welcome of workmates—expressed, of course, by an offer of coffee—is curtailed and the end title appears over Bannion putting on his hat and coat to go out and deal with “a hit and run over on South Street.”

—Kim Newman

THE BIG PARADE

USA, 1925

Director: King Vidor

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Corp.; originally black and white with tinted sequences, 35mm, silent with music score; running time: about 125 minutes; length: originally 13 reels at 12,550 feet, later 12 reels at 11,519 feet. Released selectively November 1925, released generally 1927. Re-released 1931 with synchronized music and sound effects.

Producer: Irving G. Thalberg; scenario: Harry Behn; story: Laurence Stallings; titles: Joseph W. Farnham, from the play by Farnham, and the novel Plumes by Stallings; photography: John Arnold; editor: Hugh Wynn; art directors: Cedric Gibbons, James Basevi; music: William Axt, David Mendoza.

Cast: John Gilbert (James Apperson); Renée Adorée (Mélanide); Hobart Bosworth (Mr. Apperson); Claire McDowell (Mrs. Apperson); Claire Adams (Justyn Reed); Robert Ober (Harry); Tom O’Brien (Bull); Karl Dane (Slim); Rosita Marstini (French Mother).

Publications

Books:

- Vidor, King, A Tree Is a Tree, New York, 1953; reprinted 1977.
 Brownlow, Kevin, The Parade’s Gone By . . ., London and New York, 1969.
 Baxter, John, King Vidor, New York, 1976.
 Everson, William K., American Silent Film, New York, 1978.
 O’Connor, John E., and Martin A. Jackson, editors, American History/American Film: Interpreting the Hollywood Image, New York, 1979.
 Comuzio, Ermanno, King Vidor, Florence, 1986.
 Vidor, King, with contributions by Nancy Dowd and David Shepard, King Vidor (Directors Guild of America Oral History Series), Lanham, Maryland, 1988.
 Durnat, Raymond, and Scott Simmon, King Vidor—American, Berkeley, 1989.

The Big Parade

Articles:

Smith, F. J., "Tells How The Big Parade Was Made," in Motion Picture Classic (New York), May 1926.

Tully, Jim, "Interview," in Vanity Fair (New York), June 1926.

Quirk, Lawrence J., "John Gilbert," in Films in Review (New York), March 1956.

Davis, Henry, "A John Gilbert Index," in Films in Review (New York), October 1962.

Brownlow, Kevin, "King Vidor," in Film (London), Winter 1962.

Higham, Charles, "King Vidor," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Summer 1966.

"King Vidor at NYU," in Cineaste (New York), Spring 1968.

Useton, Roi A., "Renée Adorée," in Films in Review (New York), June-July 1968.

Greenberg, Joel, "War, Wheat, and Steel," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1968.

Barr, Charles, "King Vidor," in Brighton (London), March 1970.

Luft, Herbert G., "King Vidor: A Career That Spans Half a Century," in Film Journal (Dayton, Ohio), Summer 1971.

Durnat, Raymond, in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1973.

"Vidor Issue" of Positif (Paris), September 1974.

Amengual, Barthélemy, "Entre l'horizon d'un seul et l'horizon de tous," in Positif (Paris), September 1974.

Edwards, R., "The Big Parade," in Films of the Golden Age (Muscatine, Iowa), no. 5, Summer 1996.

* * *

The Big Parade propelled director King Vidor to the top as MGM's wunderkind, the Steven Spielberg of his day, who could do no wrong when it came to sensing what the public would or would not embrace in film entertainment.

The end of World War I was not even a decade in the past when the Texas-born filmmaker, who had established himself as a skillful purveyor of comedies and sentimental slices of rural American life, persuaded production chief Irving Thalberg to let him make an epic film about the war—a subject conventional wisdom said audiences would prefer to forget. Vidor countered that the huge success of the Laurence Stallings-Maxwell Anderson WWI play What Price Glory? on Broadway the previous year suggested otherwise. MGM gave him the green light to make The Big Parade.

The script by Harry Behn was based upon an outline Vidor had solicited from Stallings himself. It deals with three men from an unnamed American town who are swept up in the wave of patriotic fervor following America's entrance into the war and enlist. One, Tom O'Brien, is a salty bartender; another, Karl Dane, is a gawky, tobacco chewing blue collar type; the third, played by matinee idol John Gilbert, is the lay-about son of a wealthy mill owner. Despite their disparate backgrounds, the three become fast chums when they meet at boot camp and sustain their comradeship through the ferocious battle of Belleau Wood where they undergo their baptism of fire.

Along the way, Gilbert meets and falls in love with a French farm girl, delightfully and movingly played by Renée Adorée. The scene where he introduces her to American chewing gum is one of the most famous in silent films. It is both funny and touching, and wonderfully pantomimed by the two actors under the scrutiny of Vidor's camera, which captures the moment in an uninterrupted single take. A follow-up scene where the lovers are separated is equally memorable. As Gilbert is spirited to the front in one of a long line of battle trucks, he vows to return, tossing her mementos until she is left alone in a trail of dust.

Gilbert's buddies are killed during a nighttime assault on the German trenches, and Gilbert himself suffers a severely wounded leg that subsequently must be amputated; he returns home a cripple. The glamour studio balked at the downbeat fate visited upon the film's leading man—an incident drawn from the experience of author Stallings, who had lost a leg in the war. In his quest for realism, Vidor held his ground, however, and got his way. The scene where Gilbert's mutilation is revealed to his mother and the viewer for the first time at his homecoming is arguably the most powerful in the movie.

Despite, or perhaps because of, his affliction and hellish wartime experience, the Gilbert character has now grown and matured—in contrast to his brother (Robert Oder), previously viewed as the more serious and responsible sibling, but now as the real nothing in the family. Having stayed behind to attend to the family business, he's even stolen Gilbert's hometown sweetheart (Claire Adams)! No matter. At his mother's urging, Gilbert returns to France to find the love of his life Adorée as he'd promised.

The Big Parade is really two films. The first hour and twenty minutes are standard (though at the time prototypical) service comedy stuff dealing with Gilbert's, O'Brien's, and Dane's escapades in France prior to going into action. Part two, which runs approximately the same length, is all war—and the battle scenes remain frighteningly realistic and impressive to this day. The march through Belleau Wood, timed by Vidor to the inexorable beat of a metronome, as the troops are mowed down by snipers and machine gun fire is still a stunner. The trench warfare scenes are equally vivid. Many critics have noted the influence Vidor's staging of these scenes had on Lewis Milestone's All Quiet on the Western Front (1930). There is even a small moment when Gilbert plucks a lone flower from atop his trench that mirrors the finale of All Quiet when Lew Ayres is killed reaching for a butterfly, and which may have served as the latter's inspiration.

Where The Big Parade departs significantly from All Quiet is the clarity of its anti-war theme. All Quiet is uncompromisingly focused in this regard. The Big Parade, despite the stark believability of its warfare scenes, is, in overall aim, more of an escapist entertainment. In his later years, Vidor all but disowned the film for that reason. "At the time, I really believed it was an anti-war movie," he said. "Today, I don't encourage people to see it."

Vidor's reassessment is too harsh. The Big Parade is one of the great silent films—and the model for just about every war movie that has come our way since. It should be seen for those reasons alone. While the escapist boy-meets-girl, boy-loses-girl, boy-gets-girl subplot may stray the focus away from Vidor's anti-war message at times, it eloquently engages the emotions. And the theme that war is hell, while perhaps not what the film is entirely about, is nevertheless both present and potent.

—John McCarty

THE BIG SLEEP

USA, 1946

Director: Howard Hawks

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 114 minutes. Released 31 August 1946. Filmed in Warner Bros. studios.

Producer: Howard Hawks; screenplay: William Faulkner, Leigh Brackett and Jules Furthman, from the novel by Raymond Chandler; photography: Sidney Hickox; editor: Christian Nyby; sound: Robert B. Lee; production design: Fred M. MacLean; art direction: Carl Jules Weyl; music: Max Steiner; special effects: Roy Davidson and Warren E. Lynch.

Cast: Humphrey Bogart (Philip Marlowe); Lauren Bacall (Vivian); John Ridgely (Eddie Mars); Martha Vickers (Carmen); Dorothy Malone (Bookshop Girl); Peggy Knusden (Mona Mars); Regis Toomey (Bernie Ohls); Charles Waldren (General Sternwood); Charles D. Brown (Norris); Bob Steele (Canino); Elisha Cook, Jr. (Jones); Louis Jean Heydt (Joe Brody); Sonia Darrin (Agnes); Theodore von Eltz (Geiger); Tom Rafferty (Carol Lundgren); James Flavin (Captain Cronjager); Thomas Jackson (Wilde); Don Wallace (Owen Taylor); Joy Barlowe (Chauffeur); Tom Fadden (Sidney); Ben Weldon (Pete); Trevor Bardette (Art Huck); Marc Lawrence.

Publications

Scripts:

Faulkner, William, Leigh Brackett, and Jules Furthman, The Big Sleep, New York, 1971.

Books:

Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Howard Hawks, New York, 1962.
Gehman, Richard, Bogart, Greenwich, Connecticut, 1965.

- McCarty, Clifford, The Films of Humphrey Bogart, New York, 1965.
- Michael, Paul, Humphrey Bogart: The Man and His Films, Indianapolis, 1965.
- Missiaen, Jean-Claude, Howard Hawks, Paris, 1966.
- Wood, Robin, Howard Hawks, London, 1968; revised edition, 1981.
- Gili, Jean A., Howard Hawks, Paris, 1971.
- McBride, Joseph, editor, Focus on Howard Hawks, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.
- Willis, Donald, The Films of Howard Hawks, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1972.
- Bazin, André, La Politique des auteurs: Entretiens avec Jean Renoir, etc., Paris, 1972; revised edition, 1984.
- Barbour, Alan G., Humphrey Bogart, New York, 1973.
- Hyams, Joe, Bogart and Bacall, New York, 1975.
- Murphy, Kathleen A., Howard Hawks: An American Auteur in the Hemingway Tradition, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1978.
- Ciment, Michel, Les Conquérants d'un nouveau monde: Essais sur le cinéma Américain, Paris, 1981.
- Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
- Pettigrew, Terence, Bogart: A Definitive Study of his Film Career, London, 1981.
- Wood, Robin, Howard Hawks, London, 1981.
- McBride, Joseph, editor, Hawks on Hawks, Berkeley, 1982.
- Mast, Gerald, Howard Hawks, Storyteller, Oxford, 1982.
- Poague, Leland, Howard Hawks, Boston, 1982.
- Belton, John, Cinema Stylists, Boston, 1982.
- Simsolo, Noël, Howard Hawks, Paris, 1984.
- Kuhn, Annette, The Power of the Image: Essays on Representation and Sexuality, London, 1985.
- Winkler, Willi, Humphrey Bogart und Hollywood Schwarze Serie, Munich, 1985.
- Branson, Clark, Howard Hawks: A Jungian Study, Los Angeles, 1987.
- Fuchs, Wolfgang J., Humphrey Bogart: Cult-Star: A Documentation, Berlin, 1987.
- Bellour, Raymond, "The Obvious and the Code," in Screen (London), Winter 1974–75.
- Monaco, James, "Notes on The Big Sleep: 30 Years After," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1974–75.
- Jensen, P., "Film Noir: The Writer: The World You Live In," in Film Comment (New York), November–December 1974.
- Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1978.
- Davies, G., "Teaching about Narrative," in Screen Education (London), Winter 1978–79.
- Carcassonne, P., "En écoutant Le Grand Sommeil," in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1978.
- Sauvaget, D., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), January 1979.
- Kuhn, Annette, "The Big Sleep: A Disturbance in the Sphere of Sexuality," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 4, no. 3, 1980.
- Place, Janey, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Thomson, David, "At the Acme Bookshop," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring, 1981.
- Orr, Christopher, "The Trouble with Harry: On the Hawks Version of The Big Sleep," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 5, no. 2, 1982.
- Librach, R. S., "Adaptation and Ontology: The Impulse Towards Closure in Howard Hawks's version of The Big Sleep," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1991.
- McCullough, J., "Pedagogy in the Perverse Text," in Cineaction (Toronto), Winter-Spring 1990.
- Cantaloube, Thomas, "Le grand retour du Sommeil," Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 518, November 1995.
- Stein, E., "The Big Sleep," Village Voice (New York), vol. 42, January 14, 1997.

* * *

An unidentified finger presses the doorbell of the Sternwood mansion. A butler answers. The guest intones: "My name is Marlowe. General Sternwood sent for me."

This introduction thrusts us into immediate alliance with private detective Philip Marlowe, and throughout the film we traverse the world of crime as he does. As the central character, he is in every scene: we know what he knows, nothing more, nothing less. We share his experience as if on a detective training course: we see the way he works, the way he choreographs his moves and orchestrates his space to provoke a desired reaction from his opponent; we share his cognitive processes by identification with his visual point of view; we adopt his attitude by osmosis.

This is the world of film noir in which the existential hero (here played by noir favourite Humphrey Bogart) moves through oppressive atmospheres and dangerous locales, encounters wicked men and women and strives to earn his salary by solving a minor-league murder while wading through a complex and confusing series of clues. Despite a blackmail premise which exposes a whodunnit plot, this Howard Hawks film concerns itself less with why or who, than with how, more with process than result. The story line is extremely complicated (even the author of the novel, Raymond Chandler, was reputedly unable to answer a certain key question about the plot) and unfolds at breakneck speed forcing the spectator to assimilate facts and assess situations quickly or succumb to confusion. Does it really matter who is blackmailing General Sternwood, or what happened to Sean Regan, or who shot Arthur Gwynne Geiger?

In adapting the Chandler novel for the screen, many details were altered and the directly political material erased, but an essential pessimism and cynicism remained. An atmosphere of corruption was pervasive and more than an investigation of a crime, this is an investigation into modern treachery. Marlowe is deceived, beat up, and threatened with extermination as he searches for the truth of a criminal situation. We are concerned not so much with what happened to others as what is happening to Marlowe.

What does happen to him is true in spirit to the novel except in the realm of romance. Marlowe's misogynistic streak replaced by a cynicism which erodes as the developing romance with Vivian consolidates. In a typical film noir, male/female relationships are doomed, severed by the conclusion of the film—typified by Fred MacMurray's condition at the end of Double Indemnity or Bogart's loss of Gloria Grahame at the end of In a Lonely Place. In The Big Sleep Hollywood romance prevailed in Hawksian style; Bogart and Bacall lived out their celebrated off-screen romance on screen.

The Big Sleep was a Warner Brother's big budgeted film, not an RKO low budget "B"; box office stars, a top notch crew, and three major writers was not the usual treatment accorded to films of this genre. This studio treatment elevated the film to "A" status, but ultimately the box office was fuelled by a movie-going public anxious to witness romantic reality amidst Hollywood fiction.

—Doug Tomlinson

THE BIRDS

USA, 1963

Director: Alfred Hitchcock

Production: Alfred J. Hitchcock Productions; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 120 minutes. Released 28 March 1963, New York, through Universal Pictures. Filmed mostly on location in Bodega Bay, California.

Producer: Alfred Hitchcock; screenplay: Evan Hunter, from "The Birds" by Daphne Du Maurier; photography: Robert Burks; editor: George Tomasini; sound: Remi Gassman and Oskar Sala; sound recordists: Waldon O. Watson and William Russell; sound supervisor: Bernard Herrmann; production design: Robert Boyle; set decoration: George Milo; music: Bernard Herrmann; special effects: Lawrence A. Hampton; costumes: Edith Head; special photography advisor: Ub Iwerks; bird trainer: Ray Berwick.

Cast: Rod Taylor (Mitch Brenner); Tippi Hedren (Melanie Daniels); Jessica Tandy (Mrs. Brenner); Suzanne Pleshette (Annie Hayworth); Veronica Cartwright (Cathy Brenner); Ethel Griffies (Mrs. Bundy); Charles McGraw (Sebastian Sholes); Ruth McDevitt

(Mrs. MacGruder); Joe Mantell (Travelling Salesman); Doreen Lang (Hysterical woman); Malcolm Atterbury (Deputy Al Malone); Karl Swenson (Drunk); Elizabeth Wilson (Helen Carter); Lonny Chapman (Deke Carter); Doodles Weaver (Fisherman); John McGovern (Postal clerk); Richard Deacon (Man in elevator); William Quinn.

Publications

Books:

- Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1962.
 Perry, George, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1965.
 Wood, Robin, Hitchcock's Films, London, 1965.
 Truffaut, François, Le Cinéma selon Hitchcock, Paris, 1966; as Hitchcock, New York, 1985.
 Simsolo, Noël, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1969.
 Cameron, Ian, editor, Movie Reader, New York, 1978.
 Taylor, John Russell, Hitch, London and New York, 1978.
 Bellour, Raymond, L'Analyse du film, Paris, 1979.
 Nichols, Bill, Ideology and the Image: Social Representation in the Cinema and Other Media, Bloomington, Indiana, 1981.
 Hemmeter, Thomas M., Hitchcock the Stylist, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.
 Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.
 Narboni, Jean, editor, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.
 Rothman, William, Hitchcock—The Murderous Gaze, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1982.
 Villien, Bruno, Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.
 Weis, Elisabeth, The Silent Scream: Alfred Hitchcock's Sound Track, Rutherford, New Jersey, 1982.
 Belton, John, Cinema Stylists, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1983.
 Spoto, Donald, The Life of Alfred Hitchcock: The Dark Side of Genius, New York, 1982; London, 1983.
 Phillips, Gene D., Alfred Hitchcock, Boston, 1984.
 Barbier, Philippe, and Jacques Moreau, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.
 Bruce, Graham, Bernard Herrmann: Film Music and Narrative, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1985.
 Douchet, Jean, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.
 Dentelbaum, Marshall, and Leland Poague, A Hitchcock Reader, Ames, Iowa, 1986.
 Hogan, David J., Dark Romance: Sexuality in the Horror Film, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1986.
 Humphries, Patrick, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, Greenwich, Connecticut, 1986.
 Kloppenburg, Josef, Die dramaturgische Funktion der Musik in Filmen Alfred Hitchcocks, Munich, 1986.
 Sinyard, Neil, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1986.
 Modleski, Tania, The Women Who Knew Too Much: Hitchcock and Feminist Theory, New York, 1988.
 Leitch, Thomas M., Find the Director and Other Hitchcock Games, Athens, Georgia, 1991.
 Raubichek, Walter, and Walter Srebnick, eds., Hitchcock's Rereleased Films: From Rope to Vertigo, Detroit, 1991.

The Birds

Sharff, Stefan, Alfred Hitchcock's High Vernacular: Theory and Practice, New York, 1991.

Finler, Joel W., Hitchcock in Hollywood, New York, 1992.

Kapsis, Robert E., Hitchcock: The Making of a Reputation, Chicago, 1992.

Spoto, Donald, The Art of Alfred Hitchcock: Fifty Years of His Motion Pictures, New York, 1992.

Corber, Robert J., In the Name of National Security: Hitchcock, Homophobia, and the Political Construction of Gender in Post-war America, Durham, North Carolina, 1993.

Hurley, Neil P., Soul in Suspense: Hitchcock's Fright and Delight, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1993.

Sloan, Jane, Alfred Hitchcock: A Guide to References and Sources, New York, 1993.

Arginteanu, Judy, The Movies of Alfred Hitchcock, Minneapolis, 1994.

Sloan, Jane E., Alfred Hitchcock: A Filmography and Bibliography, Berkeley, 1995.

Boyd, David, editor, Perspectives on Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1995.

Rebello, Stephen, Alfred Hitchcock and the Making of Psycho, New York, 1998.

Freedman, Jonathan, and Richard Millington, editors, Hitchcock's America, New York, 1999.

Auiler, Dan, Hitchcock's Notebooks: An Authorized and Illustrated Look Inside the Creative Mind of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Cameron Ian, and V. F. Perkins, interview with Hitchcock in Movie (London), January 1963.

Bogdanovich, Peter, in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.

Johnson, Albert, "Echoes from The Birds," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1963.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 4 April 1963.

Foote, Sterling, in Films in Review (New York), May 1963.

"Hitchcock on Style: Interview," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), August 1963.

Baker, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), September 1963.

Belz, Carl, in Film Culture (New York), Winter 1963–64.

Thomas, John, in Film Society Review (New York), September 1966.

Hitchcock, Alfred, in Take One (Montreal), no.10, 1968.

- Cumbow, R. C., "Caliban and Bodega Bay," in Movietone News (Seattle), May 1975.
- Simper, D., "Poe, Hitchcock, and the Well-Wrought Effect," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1975.
- Rose, J., "Paranoia and the Film System," in Screen (London), Winter 1976–77.
- Weis, Elisabeth, "The Sound of One Wing Flapping," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1978.
- Nichols, Bill, "The Birds: At the Window," in Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), no. 4, 1979.
- Bergstrom, J., "Enunciation and Sexual Difference," in Cinema Obscura (Berkeley), Summer 1979.
- Bikacsy, G., "Alfred Hitchcock," in Filmkultura (Budapest), September-October 1979.
- Counts, Kyle B., "The Making of Alfred Hitchcock's The Birds," in Cinefantastique (Oak Park, Illinois), Fall 1980.
- Krohn, B., and others, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1982.
- Horwitz, Margaret M., "A Mother's Love," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 5, no. 1, 1982.
- Kapsis, Robert E., "Hollywood Filmmaking and Reputation Building: Hitchcock's The Birds," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Spring 1987.
- Girard, M., "The Birds," in Séquences (Quebec), no. 169, February 1994.
- Silet, Charles L.P., "Writing for Hitch: An Interview with Evan Hunter," and Christopher Sharrett, "The Myth of Apocalypse and the Horror Film: The Primacy of Psycho and The Birds," in Hitchcock Annual (New London, New Hampshire), Fall 1995–96.
- Allen, R., "Avian Metaphors in The Birds," in Hitchcock Annual (New London, New Hampshire), Fall 1997–98.
- Vest, James M., "Echoes of Alfred Hitchcock's Vertigo, The Birds, and Frenzy in Francois Truffaut's Story of Adèle H.," in Hitchcock Annual (New London, New Hampshire), Fall 1997–98.

* * *

Of The Birds, Peter Bogdanovich has written, "If (Alfred Hitchcock) had never made another motion picture in his life, The Birds would place him securely among the giants of the cinema." Released in 1963, The Birds is one in a series of Hitchcock collaborations with composer Bernard Herrmann, cinematographer Robert Burks, and editor George Tomasini. It was also the director's first film featuring actress Tippi Hedren, who would later star in Marnie, perhaps the most critically controversial film of Hitchcock's career.

The Birds seems to be a film which functions as a Rorschach test, in which every critic sees something different, and of which virtually anything can be said. It has been discussed as a generic work of horror which inaugurated a whole series of apocalyptic films; as a film of special effects and state-of-the-art matte work representing the ingenuity of Hollywood; as the most sophisticated example of Hitchcock's ability to manipulate his audiences and to play upon the spectators' fears; as a profound and personal work concerning human frailty and the importance of commitment in human relationships; as a philosophical treatise—influenced by Kafka and Poe—on the existential human condition; as a structural work examining the point-of-view shot and its relationship to the gaze of the spectator; as a repository of psychoanalytic ideology and meanings; and as the American film most influenced by and celebrative of the montage theories promulgated by the Russian cinema theorists. That this film has been interpreted in so many ways, that the memory of it remains so strong for so many filmmakers and critics, and that the film continues to excite and provoke new generations of filmgoers, are the surest signs that The Birds is indeed a great and lasting film.

Those who see the film for the first time may be surprised by the strength of their visceral response, but those who view the film an additional time are inevitably surprised by how much of the film has actually little to do with bird attacks and takes, instead, the relationships between human beings as its subject. Certainly The Birds contains some of the most disturbing and almost surrealist beautiful images Hitchcock has ever put on film; the children's party disrupted by a bird attack; the camera's treatment of Tippi Hedren as a fetish object; the surprising aerial view of Bodega Bay which shows the city from the birds' point of view; the three virtually still shots—each catching a discreet moment of time—of Tippi Hedren watching helplessly through the window of a cafe; and, especially, the final exterior scene, poetic and mysterious, aided by the extraordinary matte paintings of Al Whitlock, as the protagonists drive off into an unearthly bird-populated landscape and an uncertain future.

—Charles Derry

THE BIRTH OF A NATION

USA, 1915

Director: D. W. Griffith

Production: Epoch Producing Corporation; black and white, 35mm, silent; length: 13,058 feet, later cut to 12,000 feet. Released 8 February 1915, Los Angeles. Re-released 1930 with musical soundtrack. Filmed 4 July through 24 September 1914 in Reliance-Majestic Studios, Los Angeles, and various outdoor locations around Los Angeles; cost: $110,000.

Producer: D. W. Griffith; scenario: D. W. Griffith, Thomas Dixon, and Frank Woods, from the play The Clansman by the Rev. Thomas Dixon; assistants to the director include: Eric von Stroheim, Raoul Walsh, Jack Conway, and George Siegman; photography: G. W. (Billy) Bitzer and Karl Brown; editor: James Smith; compiler of music for the sound version: Joseph Carl Breil, assisted by D. W. Griffith; costume supplier: Robert Goldstein.

Cast: Henry B. Walthall (Ben Cameron, the "Little Colonel"); Mae Marsh (Flora); Miriam Cooper (Margaret, the older sister); Violet Wilkey (Flora as a child); Josephine Crowell (Mrs. Cameron); Spottiswoode Aitken (Dr. Cameron); Andre Beranger (Wade Cameron); Maxfield Stanley (Duke Cameron); Jennie Lee (Mammy); William De Vaull (Jake); Lillian Gish (Elsie Stoneman); Ralph Lewis

The Birth of a Nation

(The Hon. Austin Stoneman); Elmer Clifton (Phil Stoneman); Robert Harron (Ted Stoneman); Mary Alden (Lydia Brown, Stoneman's housekeeper); Tom Wilson (Stoneman's Negro servant); Sam De Grasse (Senator Sumner); George Siegman (Silas Lynch); Walter Long (Gus); Elmo Lincoln (White Arm Joe); Wallace Reid (Jeff, the blacksmith); Joseph Henaberry (Abraham Lincoln); Alberta Lee (Mrs. Lincoln); Donald Crisp (Gen. Ulysses S. Grant); Howard Gaye (Gen. Robert E. Lee); William Freeman (Sentry); Olga Grey (Laura Keene); Raoul Walsh (John Wilkes Booth); Eugene Palette (Union Soldier); Bessie Love (Piedmont Girl); Charles Stevens (Volunteer); Erich von Stroheim (Man who falls off roof).

Publications

Scripts:

Huff, Theodore, A Shot Analysis of D. W. Griffith's Birth of a Nation, New York, 1961.
 Cunibert, John, The Birth of a Nation, a shot by shot analysis, Woodbridge, Connecticut, 1979.

Books:

Lindsay, Vachel, The Art of the Moving Picture, New York, 1915; revised edition, 1922.
 Paine, Albert Bigelow, Life and Lillian Gish, New York, 1932.
 Jacobs, Lewis, The Rise of the American Film, New York, 1939.
 Agee, James, Agee on Film I, New York, 1948.
 Noble, Peter, The Negro in Films, London, 1948.
 Wagenknecht, Edward, The Movies in the Age of Innocence, Norman, Oklahoma, 1962.
 Aitken, Roy, The Birth of a Nation Story, as told to Al P. Nelson, Middleburg, Virginia, 1965.
 Barry, Iris, D. W. Griffith: American Film Master, New York, 1965.
 Pratt, George C., Spellbound in Darkness, Connecticut, 1966.
 Brownlow, Kevin, The Parade's Gone By . . ., London and New York, 1969.
 Cook, Raymond Allen, Fire from the Flint, Winston-Salem, North Carolina, 1968.
 Gish, Lillian, with Ann Pinchot, Lillian Gish: The Movies, Mr. Griffith, and Me, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1969.
 Silva, Fred, editor, Focus on Birth of a Nation, New York, 1971.

- Henderson, Robert M., D. W. Griffith: His Life and Work, New York, 1972.
- Brown, Karl, Adventures with D. W. Griffith, edited by Kevin Brownlow, New York and London, 1973; revised edition, 1988.
- Cripps, Thomas J., Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film, 1900–1942, New York, 1977.
- Campbell, Edward D. C., Jr., The Celluloid South, Knoxville, 1981.
- Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
- Brion, Patrick, editor, D. W. Griffith, Paris, 1982.
- Mottet, Jean, editor, D. W. Griffith, Paris, 1984.
- Schickel, Richard, D. W. Griffith and the Birth of Film, London, 1984.
- Graham, Cooper C., and others, D.W. Griffith and the Biograph Company, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1985.
- Jesionowski, Joyce E., Thinking in Pictures: Dramatic Structures in D. W. Griffith's Biograph Films, Berkeley, 1987.
- Lang, Robert, editor, The Birth of a Nation: D. W. Griffith, Director, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1994.
- Articles:
- New York Times*, 4 March 1915.
- New York Tribune*, 4 March 1915.
- Variety* (New York), 12 March 1915.
- “The Civil War in Film,” in Literary Digest (New York), 20 March 1915.
- New Republic* (New York), 4 December 1915.
- Griffith, D. W., “The Rise and Fall of Free Speech in America,” (a pamphlet written in answer to the reaction against The Birth of a Nation), Los Angeles, 1916.
- Gordon, Henry Stephen, “D. W. Griffith Recalls the Making of The Birth of a Nation,” in The Photoplay Magazine (Hollywood), October 1916.
- Platt, David D., “The Negro in Hollywood,” in Daily Worker (New York), 19–28 February 1940.
- Carter, Everett, “Cultural History Written with Lightning: The Significance of The Birth of a Nation,” in American Quarterly (University of Pennsylvania), Fall 1960.
- Fulton, A. R., “Editing in The Birth of a Nation,” in Motion Pictures: The Development of an Art from Silent Pictures to the Age of Television, Norman, Oklahoma, 1960.
- Cripps, Thomas R., “The Reaction of the Negro to the Motion Picture, The Birth of a Nation,” in The Historian, May 1963.
- “Griffith Issue” of Film Culture (New York), Spring-Summer 1965.
- Sarris, Andrew, “Birth of a Nation of White Power Back When,” in Village Voice (New York), 17 and 24 July 1969.
- Beylie, Claude, “Naissance d'une Nation: La Piste du Geant,” in Cinéma (Paris), March 1971.
- Casty, Alan, “The Films of D. W. Griffith: A Style for the Times,” in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Spring 1972.
- Merritt, Russell, “Dixon, Griffith, and the Southern Legend,” in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), Fall 1972.
- Simcovitch, Maxim, “The Impact of Griffith's Birth of a Nation on Modern Ku Klux Klan,” in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Winter 1972.
- Yacowar, Maurice, “In Defense of Minority Group Stereotyping in the Popular Film,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1974.
- “Birth of a Nation Issue” of Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Summer 1975.
- Turconi, D., “G. P. and D. W. G . . . in dare e l'avere,” in Bianco e nero (Rome), Summer 1975.
- Oms, Marcel, “Naissance d'une nation: Opera maconnique,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Christmas 1975.
- “Griffithiana: Material della e per la storia del cinema . . . ,” in Filmcritica (Rome), January-February 1976.
- “Birth of a Nation Case,” in Classic Film Collection (Indiana, Pennsylvania), Fall 1976.
- “Birth of a Nation Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), 15 October 1977.
- Petric, Vlada, “Two Lincoln Assassinations by D. W. Griffith,” in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (Pleasantville, New York), Summer 1978.
- “In Defence of the KKK,” reprinted in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1979.
- Combs, R., in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1979.
- Fleener, N., “Answering Film with Film . . . ,” in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), no. 4, 1980.
- Stern, Seymour, in American Classic Screen (Shawnee Mission, Kansas), November-December 1980.
- Merritt, Russell, “Dixon, Griffith and the Southern Legend: A Cultural Analysis of The Birth of a Nation,” in Cinema Examined, New York, 1982.
- Pinsky, Mark, “Racism, History, and Mass Media,” in Jump Cut (Berkeley) no. 28, 1983.
- Martin, J. B., “Film Out of Theatre: D. W. Griffith, Birth of a Nation and the Melodrama The Clansmen,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1990.
- Leblanc, G., “L'art de raconter et de persuader: La naissance d'une nation,” in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), January 1990.
- Taylor, C., “The Re-birth of the Aesthetic in Cinema,” in Wide Angle (Baltimore), no. 3–4, 1991.
- Vanoye, Francis, “Rhétorique de la douleur,” in Vertigo (Paris), no. 6–7, 1991.
- Heine, Isabelle, “L'analyse videographique: conceptualisation et formalisation,” in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), September 1992.
- Hoberman, J., “Our Troubling Birth Rite,” in Village Voice (New York), 30 November 1993.
- Couvares, F.G., “The Good Censor: Race, Sex, and Censorship in the Early Cinema,” in Yale Journal of Criticism (New Haven), vol. 7, no. 2, 1994.
- Cripps, Thomas, “The Absent Presence in America Civil War Films,” in Historical Journal of Film, Radio, and Television (Hants, United Kingdom), vol. 14, no. 4, October 1994.
- Grimes, William, “An Effort to Classify a Racist Classic,” in New York Times, 27 April 1994.
- Moore, D.C., “Regarding ‘Racism’ of D. W. Griffith,” in Films of the Golden Age (Muscatine, Iowa), no. 5, Summer 1996.
- Rogin, M. “The Two Declarations of American Independence,” Representations (Berkeley), no. 55, Summer 1996.
- Green, J.R., “Micheaux v. Griffith,” in Griffithiana (Tempe, Arizona), no. 60, October 1997.
- Gill, D., “The Birth of a Nation Orphan or Pariah?” in Griffithiana (Tempe, Arizona), no. 60, October 1997.

* * *

“More than any picture before it, it made moviegoing a middle class activity,” writes Joan L. Silverman of The Birth of a Nation (French, ed., The South in Film). “Soon movie palaces were built in fashionable neighborhoods all over the United States.” More than that, the film remains one of the most controversial of the medium’s first century. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) branded it racist; riots followed in cities such as Boston; widespread picketing and lawsuits continued for years in many cities and states. Although Griffith found it difficult to raise the $110,000 that the film cost, and production was halted at times for fund-raising drives, by the end of the silent film period, it had made $18,000,000.

Griffith’s much-hailed narrative techniques are relatively simple but enormously influential adaptations and expansions of the “villain still pursued her” formulaic storytelling of 19th-century theatrical melodramas. Griffith was an unknown actor when he was hired by Biograph Studios of New York to make the one-reel, 12-minute fictional films that were changed weekly at storefront nickelodeons. By the end of 1910 he had made 250, but was losing patience with the length limitation. An experimental two-reeler, however, was split by producers into two weeks’ shows. Not until the summer of 1913, after he had completed another 175 or so films, was he allowed finally to expand to four reels with Judith of Bethulia. Dissatisfied, he left Biograph to join Harry E. Aitken’s new company to make five five-to-seven reel films during the first six months of 1914. Meanwhile he was plotting—in a double sense—to match the competition from abroad, especially Italy, where since 1911, the flamboyant poet Gabrielle D’Annunzio, had developed a series of spectacular but static films based on classical motifs into the ten-reel Cabiria. Critics predicted this would “convince many doubtful people that high art and the motion picture are not incompatible” (Pratt, ed., Spellbound in Darkness, 1966).

Griffith was determined, after moving his operations from overcrowded New York City to Los Angeles, to push American films to the forefront just at the time that European production was curtailed by World War I. He opted, however, for action over art. In 1908 he had worked briefly for the self-proclaimed bigot Thomas Dixon, Jr., who had cobbled together two of his rabble-rousing novels about the South during Reconstruction into a play called The Clansman. The Reverend Dixon was willing to sell the rights for the then huge sum of $10,000 (£2,000).

The opening portion of the film was apparently created on the spot by Griffith, as no script exists. The scene opens in pre-Civil War Piedmont, the gracious pastoral capital of a deep Southern state, in which the Cameron family and those “faithful souls,” their household slaves, are entertaining affectionately the sons of northern Congressman Austin Stoneman (based somewhat fancifully on Pennsylvania’s radical Republican Senator Thaddeus Stevens). The outbreak of war disrupts this relationship—and when the boys face each other on the battlefield, the younger son of each family is killed. Griffith proclaimed in an opening subtitle that this message was that “war must be held in abhorrence.”

Ben Cameron is falsely accused of spying and sentenced to death; his mother makes a precarious trip to Washington to plead for him, and the Great Heart, President Lincoln, grants a pardon. Mrs. Cameron’s cause is abetted by Elsie Stoneman, who had not visited Piedmont with her brothers, but who has come to know and love Ben while nursing him back to health. Through this episodic section of the film, Griffith interrupts the heart-rending saga of the families with what he insisted were authentic reconstructions of some of the great moments of the war and its aftermath, including the assassination of President Lincoln, whom Griffith believed could have ameliorated the situation after the war.

With the assassination, Dixon takes over; and public history gives way to private myth. Congressman Stoneman becomes the fiery apostle of Reconstruction, determined to replace traitorous Southern leaders with freed slaves whom his cabal can manipulate. He appoints Silas Lynch, his mulatto cohort, the new lieutenant-governor in Piedmont to organize this. When a renegade black soldier, inflamed by Lynch’s proddings and free liquor, threatens to rape Ben Cameron’s “pet sister,” she jumps from a cliff to her death rather than suffer dishonour. Outraged, Ben, after watching children donning sheets and playing ghosts, is portrayed by Griffith as founding the Ku Klux Klan (KKK) to restore proper law and order to the South and keep the blacks in their place. Enraged, Silas Lynch sets out to destroy the Klan and the Camerons, and also to marry Elsie Stoneman, by force if necessary. When the Congressman learns of his henchman’s audacity, he sees the error of his ways. In the most famous sequence of the film, Griffith uses the stunning effect of alternating closeups and long-shots, enhanced by printing the black images on stock tinted in a variety of colours that it was theorized influenced viewers’ reactions (red for battle scenes, green for pastoral romance, etc.).

Elsie is rescued from Lynch’s townhouse to join the frenzied dash to the lonely cabin where the Camerons are preparing to join their dead daughter. The Klan comes to the rescue at the last moment, paving the way for a double wedding between the Camerons and the Stonemans which restores peace to the community. However, it leaves open the question of whether the “nation” whose “birth” Griffith had in mind was that of the “Invisible Empire” of the KKK or of the disunited states, at last peacefully amalgamated by this symbolic marriage.

The first audiences saw the long runs of the big city “road shows”; a live orchestra accompanied the film, playing a rousing score by Joseph Carl Breil. Griffith travelled around the country constantly editing the film; the censors insisted upon other cuts. The results of this editing toned down the racist elements that Lillian Gish had feared might make people object to the film; however, protests to the film continued.

Griffith tried to remedy the situation by making his first talking picture Abraham Lincoln and by releasing a cut version of The Birth of a Nation, which was almost an hour shorter than the original; all references to the KKK were eliminated.

The film remains a landmark in the development of motion pictures. Its length (rarely equalled since), its exploitation of technical devices (producing startlingly new effects), and its establishment of the pattern of the horse opera that dominated American film melodrama, accord it a unique place in the evolution of American and international filmmaking.

It retains its sentimental and provocative power, but its circulation is restricted to groups studying both Griffith’s reasons for making the film and the damage inflicted on a new medium by a great innovator’s propagandistic vision. Perhaps the most perceptive judgement was written by a reviewer for the New York Times in 1921: “Sometimes it is almost epic in quality. But in many scenes it is falsely romantic and as blindly partisan as the most violent sectional tradition. It may be said that, as a rule, it comes closest to historical truth when it is furthest from Thomas Dixon.”

—Warren French

BIRUMA NO TATEGOTO

(Harp of Burma)

Japan, 1956

Director: Kon Ichikawa

Production: Nikkatsu (Japan); black and white, 35mm; running time: 116 minutes. Released 1956.

Screenplay: Natto Wada, from an original story by Michio Takeyama; photography: Minoru Yokoyama; editor: Masonori Truju; production design: Takashi Matsuyama; music: Akira Ifukube.

Cast: Shoji Yasui (Private Mizushima); Rentaro Mikuni (Captain Inouye); Taniye Kita Bayashi (Old woman); Tatsuya Mihashi (Defensive commander); Yunosuke Ito (Village head).

Awards: San Giorgio Prize, Venice Film Festival, 1956.

Biruma no Tategoto

Publications

Books:

- Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, The Japanese Film: Art and Industry, Rutland, Vermont, 1959.
 Svensson, Arne, Japan, New York, 1971.
 Mellen, Joan, Voices from the Japanese Cinema, New York, 1975.
 Soumi, Angelo, Kon Ichikawa, Florence, 1975.
 Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, New York, 1978.
 Allyn, John, Kon Ichikawa: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1985.

Articles:

- Baker, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), April 1960.
 Richie, Donald, “The Several Sides of Kon Ichikawa,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1966.
 Milne, Tom, “The Skull Beneath the Skin,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1966.
 Ichikawa, Kon, and others, “The Uniqueness of Kon Ichikawa,” in Cinema (Beverly Hills), Fall 1970.
 Johnson, W., “Ichikawa and the Wanderers,” in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1975.
Variety (New York), 12 June 1985.
 Dipont, M., in Kino (Warsaw), June 1986.
 Dissanayake, Wimal, “Self, Agency, and Cultural Knowledge: Reflections on Three Japanese Films,” in Wimal Dissanayake, editor, Narratives of Agency: Self-Making in China, India, and Japan, Minneapolis, 1996.

* * *

Biruma no tategoto, directed by Kon Ichikawa, won the San Giorgio Prize at the 1956 Venice Film Festival. Although Ichikawa had been directing since 1945, this was the first film to bring him international recognition.

The film, starring Shoji Yasui as Private Mizushima and Rentaro Mikuni as Captain Inouye, concerns the last days of World War II in Burma. Mizushima’s unit is captured and they are made prisoners of war. He is reported missing, but actually he has been commissioned to convince a garrison of Japanese soldiers to surrender rather than incur further bloodshed. He is unsuccessful in his mission, and the garrison is attacked, Mizushima becoming the sole survivor. He is nursed back to health by a Buddhist priest whose robes he steals in an effort to return to his unit. Crossing the island he comes upon several abandoned corpses and feels compelled to bury them. For the Japanese, to die on foreign soil and remain unburied is the most ignoble of deaths. By the time he meets his former companions, he is committed to his new mission of burying the dead and refuses to be repatriated.

In concept the film reflects the post-World War II pacifism prevalent in Japan as well as a spirit of international humanism. Both Japanese and British are portrayed as caring individuals caught up in an inhuman war. War and death are the enemies. Mizushima’s decision to remain in Burma is an act of contrition, which emerges in part from a sense of Japanese postwar shame and guilt. Throughout his wanderings, Mizushima carries a Burmese harp. This serves as a source of inspiration, a signal, and a means of communication which unites British and Japanese. The tune, “There’s No Place Like Home,” an American melody, is sung alternatively by both groups, signifying the peaceful commitment to home and family which Mizushima will be sacrificing by remaining in Burma. Ultimately the harp becomes Mizushima's voice.

In addition to the interplay of light and shadow, evocative close-ups, and point-of-view shots, Biruma no tategoto is noteworthy for its fragmented narrative structure. The story unfolds through a series of flashbacks and parallel action depicting Mizushima's plight in contrast to the experiences of his unit.

Like Ichikawa's next film, Nobi, the film documents the human suffering, brutality, and carnage which are inevitable results of war. However, whereas Nobi ends on a pessimistic note with the death of the hero, Biruma no tategoto closes on an inspirational note, signalling the goodness of man and universal brotherhood. Ideologically the film speaks of the value of life and survival in opposition to the pre-World War II official position of allegiance to the Emperor and dishonor in surrender.

The film plays upon the traditional conflict between giri and ninjo (desire and duty). Mizushima longs to rejoin his friends and to return to Japan. But he is equally pulled by a higher duty which calls for the burial of the dead. As in all Japanese narratives, ninjo wins out after an emotional struggle. Mizushima's choice is especially difficult because his voluntary isolation deprives him of group support and comradeship, a crucial aspect of Japanese society. Ichikawa's emphasis upon the warmth of group solidarity makes Mizushima's loss all the more heartrending. Further, Ichikawa, in an exception to the ironic attitude which pervades the majority of his works, expresses an emotionalism, especially in the scenes where the men beg Mizushima to return with them and in Mizushima's silent determination to remain.

The film ends as the ship taking the soldiers home pulls away from shore. It is a subjective shot from Mizushima's point of view. On board the men talk of the Ginza and movies. They have already turned to the future. Only Mizushima remains to remember the past. His solitary sadness reflects a traditional view of the acceptance of life's tragedies. Yet equally, Biruma no tategoto marks Japan's postwar conversion from one value system to another. The film's implicit critique of feudal values reflects Japan's decision to become a full member of the international democratic community.

—Patricia Erens

BLACK GOD, WHITE DEVIL

See DEUS E O DIABO NA TERRA DO SOL

BLACK NARCISSUS

UK, 1947

Directors: Michael Powell, Emeric Pressburger

Production: The Archers, for Independent Productions; Technicolor; running time: 100 minutes. Released April 1947.

Producers: Michael Powell, Emeric Pressburger; assistant producer: George R. Busby; screenplay: Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger, from the novel by Rumer Godden; assistant director:

Black Narcissus

Sydney S. Streeter; photographer: Jack Cardiff; associate photographer: Joan Bridge; camera operators: Ted Scaife, Stan Sayers; process shots: W. Percy Day; color control: Natalie Kalmus; editor: Reginald Mills; sound recordist: Stanley Lambourne; sound recordist: Gordon K. McCallum; production designer: Alfred Junge; assistant art director: Arthur Lawson; costume designer: Hein Heckroth; music: Brian Easdale; music performed by: London Symphony Orchestra.

Cast: Deborah Kerr (Sister Clodagh); Sabu (The Young general); David Farrar (Mr. Dean); Flora Robson (Sister Philippa); Esmond Knight (The Old general); Jean Simmons (Kanchi); Kathleen Byron (Sister Ruth); Jenny Laird (Blanche, "Sister Honey"); Judith Furse (Sister Briony); May Hallatt (Angu Ayah); Eddie Whaley, Jr. (Joseph Anthony); Shaun Noble (Con); Nancy Roberts (Mother Dorothea); Ley On (Phuba).

Publications

Books:

Durgnat, Raymond, A Mirror for England: British Movies from Austerity to Affluence, London, 1970.

Cosandey, Roland, editor, Retrospective: Powell and Pressburger, Locarno, 1982.

Gottler, Fritz, and others, Living Cinema: Powell and Pressburger, Munich, 1982.

Christie, Ian, Arrows of Desire: The Films of Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger, London, 1985.
 Martini, Emanuela, editor, Powell and Pressburger, Bergamo, 1986.
 Powell, Michael, A Life in Movies: An Autobiography, London, 1986.

Articles:

Kine Weekly (London), 24 April 1947.
Variety (New York), 5 May 1947.
 Christie, Ian, and R. Collins, "Michael Powell: The Expense of Naturalism," in Monogram (London), no. 3, 1972.
 Walker, Michael, in Framework (Warwick), Winter 1978–79.
 Lacourbe, R., "Redécouvrir Michael Powell," in Ecran (Paris), 15 February 1979.
 Andrews, N., and H. Kennedy, "Peerless Powell," in Film Comment (New York), May–June 1979.
 Thompson, D., "The Films of Michael Powell: A Romantic Sensibility," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), November 1980.
 Everson, William K., in Films in Review (New York), August–September 1980.
 McVay, Douglas, in Films and Filming (London), January 1982.
 Durnat, Raymond, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1984.
 Interview with Powell in City Limits (London), 3 January 1986.
 Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 9 January 1986.
 Sheehan, H., in Film Comment (New York), May–June 1990.
 Pernod, P., "Les fantomes de soeur Clodagh," Positif (Paris), November 1991.

* * *

When Powell and Pressburger decided to film an adaptation of Rumer Godden's tale of a failed attempt by Anglican Nuns to establish a convent in the Himalayas, the prospect of shooting in Katmandu filled some of their regular collaborators with great excitement. Such hopes were quickly dashed when it was announced that the entire film would be made in Britain. However, this inspired decision resulted in the creation of one of the most visually imaginative and expressive contributions to a cinema heralded more for its naturalism than such exercises in studio-bound artifice. The palace of Mopu, the former harem turned convent where most of the action takes place, was designed by Alfred Junge and was built at Pinewood. The Himalayan backdrop was painted on sheets of glass and the mountain breeze supplied by a gigantic wind machine. Junge was rewarded with an Oscar, as was Jack Cardiff whose Technicolor cinematography gives the film visual depth and a subtlety rare in colour productions of the time. The studio setting also allowed for total control over atmosphere and mood which, in conjunction with the technical virtuosity, explains why Black Narcissus continues to work its magic on new generations of cineastes.

Godden's interest in the confrontation of East and West and the struggle of the nuns who, rather than living in solitude, are forced to confront the world and remain true to their vows is transcended by Powell and Pressburger's concerns with sexuality and, more specifically, the dangers of sexual repression. Indeed Michael Walker perceptively argues that Black Narcissus dramatises a key Freudian syndrome: the return of the repressed. This is the sense of something terrible or uncontrollable returning to haunt the helpless protagonists. Therefore Walker suggests that the failure of the nuns to establish their convent has less to do with the "otherness" of the locale or the people but rather that they "carry within them the seeds of their own defeat."

The film is undoubtedly tinged with Orientalist cliché: the local natives are depicted as simple and childlike; Eastern mysticism represented by the mute Holy man who sits under his tree in perpetual meditation; the unbridled exoticism represented by the young general (Sabu) and Kanchi (Jean Simmons). Kanchi like the Holy man never speaks, her silence underlining her cool, seductive "otherness" which contrasts starkly with the increasingly hysterical voices of the sisters. Moreover, the strangeness of the environment, where "the wind never stops blowing and the air is so clear you can see too far," is blamed for the rising unease amongst the Europeans. Yet Black Narcissus also mocks exoticism and otherness, particularly at the moment when Sabu announces that his perfume—the "Black Narcissus" of the title—was purchased at the Army and Navy stores. We must also remember the studio setting which renders the Oriental backdrop as literally a construct, an artificial stage which functions to frame the action and define the characters. The palace is first introduced as a watercolour representation and is last seen disappearing into the mists like Brigadoon.

But as the strain begins to tell on the nuns, as repressions return to haunt them, it becomes clear that the chief catalyst, certainly in the case of both Sister Clodagh (Deborah Kerr) and Sister Ruth (Kathleen Byron) is Mr. Dean (David Farrar), the British agent working for the local ruler who has invited the nuns. Like the natives, Dean is also sexualized in terms of appearance with his brightly coloured shirts and bare arms and legs, contrasting with the ascetic off-white habits of the nuns. At one moment of crisis he arrives on the scene stripped to the waist, giving us a wonderfully potent image of raw male sexuality.

Dean's initially prickly encounters with Clodagh mask something else altogether. Clodagh's real feelings towards him are first signalled in a brief look of longing which in turn triggers her first memory of her past in Ireland—her love for childhood sweetheart Con whose departure for America led to her becoming a nun.

Ruth's desire is more overtly portrayed as pathological. Unseen, she watches Dean and Clodagh, her eyes blazing with a mixture of lust and jealousy. Indeed Ruth functions as an embodiment of the danger of Clodagh's sexual repression. While being chastised for paying too much attention to Mr. Dean, she confronts Clodagh with the unspeakable—"you seem quite pleased to see him yourself." This tension leads to the memorable stand-off between the two when a shocked Clodagh encounters a transformed Ruth, her habit exchanged for a crimson dress. She taunts Clodagh by lasciviously applying rouge to her lips while Clodagh sits opposite, clutching a bible.

But Dean is no more able to fully accept his own feelings for Clodagh. He is consistently rude to her and when taunted by the spurned Ruth about his love for Clodagh he flies into an uncontrolled rage screaming, "I don't love anybody." Ruth's failure to seduce Dean leaves her with only one choice of action left—the destruction of her rival—and so the film builds to its devastating climax. In the golden light of dawn Ruth stalks Clodagh to the chapel before erupting out of the Palace doors like an apparition from hell and attempting to push Clodagh over the precipice as she rings the morning bell. In the struggle it is Ruth who falls to her death. This sequence was an early experiment by Powell in what he termed “composed film,” scored first by Brian Easdale then shot according to the rhythms of the soundtrack.

The departure of the nuns underlines the ultimate victory of repression. Clodagh and Dean exchange pleasantries, she offers him her hand which he holds momentarily. Then the rains break, interpreted by at least one critic as a symbol of sexual release, but we are left with an image of Dean, fated to remain with the “ghosts” which Clodagh is able to leave behind. The release of Black Narcissus in 1947 coincided with the end of the Raj. The retreat of the nuns not only echoes the British withdrawal from India. It is the image of Dean, the English colonialist suffering the burden of his own repressed emotions, which provides an unintentional reflection on the undoing of imperial power.

—Duncan Petrie

BLACK ORPHEUS

See ORFEU NEGRO

BLACK SUNDAY

US, 1977

Director: John Frankenheimer

Production: Paramount Pictures; color, 35mm, Panavision; sound: mono; running time: 143 minutes. Filmed in Beirut, Lebanon, Miami, Florida, and Oregon.

Producers: Robert Evans, Alan Levine (associate), Robert L. Rosen (executive); music: John Williams; cinematographer: John A. Alonzo; editor: Tom Rolfe; casting: Lynn Stalmaster; sound: Howard Beals, Gene S. Cantamessa, John Wilkinson; special effects: Logan Frazee, Gene Warren, Jr.; stunts: Everett Creach, Howard Curtis; art direction: Walter H. Tyler; set decoration: Jerry Wunderlich; costume design: Ray Summers; makeup: Sugar Blymer, Bob Dawn, Brad Wilder; production manager: Jerry Ziesmer.

Cast: Robert Shaw (Kabakov); Bruce Dern (Lander); Marthe Keller (Dahlia); Fritz Weaver (Corley); Steven Keats (Moshevsky); Bekim Fehmiu (Fasil); Michael V. Gazzo (Muzi); William Daniels (Pugh); Walter Gotell (Colonel Riaf); Victor Campos (Nageeb); Joseph Robbie (Himself); Robert Wussler (Himself); Pat Summerall (Himself); Tom Brookshier (Himself); Walter Brooke (Fowler); James Jeter (Wachman); Clyde Kusatsu (Freighter); Captain Tom McFadden (Farley); Robert Patten (Vickers); Than Wyenn (Israeli Ambassador); Jack Rader (Pearson); Nick Nickolary (Simmons); Hunter von Leer (T.V. Cameraman); Sarah Fankboner (V.A. Receptionist); Kathy Thornton (Head Nurse); Frank Logan (Lansing); Frank Man (Desk Clerk); Kenneth I. Harms (S.W.A.T. Captain); Kim Nicholas (Girl Hostage); Bert Madrid (Bellhop); Ian Bulloch (Secret Service Agent [uncredited]); Michael J. Reynolds (Jackson).

Publications

Books:

Pratley, Gerald, The Cinema of John Frankenheimer, New York, 1969.
Pratley, Gerald, The Films of Frankenheimer: Forty Years in Film, Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, 1998.

Articles:

Drew, B., “John Frankenheimer: His Fall and Rise,” in American Film (Washington, D.C.), vol. 2, no. 5, March 1977.
Hansard, B., “Creating Front Projection Effects for Black Sunday,” in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 58, no. 8, August 1977.

* * *

Black Sunday was produced in the wake of the Arab-Israeli conflicts of 1967 and 1973. Within the conventional limits of Hollywood storytelling, the film treats intelligently the relationship between political turmoil in the Middle East and the advent of international terrorism on a broad scale, one of the most significant developments of the era. Black Sunday thus connects more meaningfully to contemporary historical events than the ordinary American commercial film. Director John Frankenheimer offers a nightmare version of what might result from the despair of radical Palestinians at the increasingly bleak prospect of any conventional military or political settlement of their claims for repatriation and statehood. Deciding to launch a campaign of terror against the American people so that the rich and politically settled can, in the words of their leader, “share the pain of the Palestinian people,” members of a Black September cell plan to kill everyone present at the Super Bowl football game.

In this plot they are nearly successful. Aided by a Japanese fellow traveler, who supplies the necessary explosives, and a disaffected, perhaps insane former American soldier, who acts as their pilot, the group arrange to hijack the Goodyear blimp, normally used to help broadcast the game, load it with a bomb composed of plastique and a quarter million steel darts, and explode it directly over the stadium in the expectation that the vast majority of the eighty thousand spectators will be cut to ribbons. Opposing them are agents of an Israeli anti-terrorist unit and the CIA. In a spectacular conclusion, the blimp is intercepted by police helicopters just before its arrival over the stadium. After the terrorists are killed, the blimp, with the fuse of the bomb burning down, is barely towed out to sea before it explodes, harmlessly.

This closing sequence features the spectacular rescue of the Israeli agent by helicopter after he was trapped on the blimp attaching the tow rope. To an important degree, Black Sunday in fact is structured around action of this kind, which emphasizes its similarity to the disaster film genre so popular in the early 1970s. For what could be more disastrous than the sudden advent of a death-dealing blimp, the well-known symbol of the capitalist bond between industry and entertainment, in the midst of America's most sacred secular event? And what could be more typical of the mainstream thriller than for this well-calculated plot, artfully sustained by a series of reversals, to end, mano a mano, with the courageous protagonist defeating his enemies by guile and strength in order to save a faceless multitude?

Black Sunday

Though ably supervised by Frankenheimer, these requisite action sequences were not of the greatest importance to a director, who, in the manner of a social realist, was obviously more interested in examining the cultural and political forces that have shaped the main characters in the drama. In this way, Black Sunday is typical of Frankenheimer's films. Only when the industry changed did he abandon his work in television, a distinguished career, in fact, directing prestigious live drama (including adaptations of Hemingway's The Fifth Column, The Snows of Kilimanjaro, and For Whom the Bell Tolls). Frankenheimer quickly made a name for himself in Hollywood with finely detailed studies of unusual or complex characters: the would-be gigolo and his admiring brother in All Fall Down; the violent convict who becomes an ornithological expert in The Birdman of Alcatraz; the aging businessman who seizes the opportunity to abandon the identity which now wears him and begin life anew in Seconds. Unlike the big budget spectacles of the period, these "adult" films (normally in black and white), and those of others from the so-called "New York School," depended on literate scripts, nuanced performances, careful editing, and restrained yet effective cinematography.

Frankenheimer also specialized in political thrillers. His The Manchurian Candidate, The Train, and Seven Days in May, the best of a consistently distinguished body of work in the genre, are acknowledged masterpieces. Political thrillers of the Hollywood variety commonly suffer from an overemphasis on action, one-dimensional characters, and a melodramatic opposition of absolute good to absolute evil that simplifies the political conflict. Frankenheimer's thrillers, in contrast, are structured around a protagonist of divided loyalties who, though he finally chooses the "right" side, does so only with difficulty. The Train's resistance leader, a railroad man of no culture, must come to share, in order to defeat him, the views of an educated Nazi officer, a cold-blooded aesthete who thinks that the French art treasures he is stealing are worth the sacrifice of many lives. In Seven Days in May, an army officer who discovers a coup planned by high-ranking generals must betray them in order to remain loyal to his oath to the president and country.

Black Sunday offers similar moral complexities. The film opens with a sequence devoted to the Black Septembrist leader, a woman (Marthe Keller) whose family, we later learn, has been destroyed in the region's wars. She meets with others of her cell in Beirut to plan the attack on the United States, and the group that night is attacked and nearly wiped out by a group of armed men who are later revealed to be Israeli agents. The attack finds the woman in the shower, and the commando leader (Robert Shaw), though he sees her there, cannot bring himself to shoot. This act of reflexive humanity allows the plot to go forward. The Israeli leader, tracking the terrorists to the United States, confesses to his younger colleague that he is no longer able to kill in the hopes of changing a situation that, during his professional life, has never changed in the least. But then his young colleague is killed by the very woman that he had allowed to live. When the two antagonists again come face to face, she, ready to go up with the blast, is in the stadium-bound blimp, while he is in the pursuing helicopter. As they recognize each other, he does not hesitate this time, killing her with a burst from his submachine gun. His act, however, cannot be seen simply an act of revenge, for the woman's death does not end the threat. Only by having himself lowered to the blimp can the commando leader affix the tow rope so it may be pulled out to sea. In the end, he is motivated as much by the urge to preserve as he is by his habit of destroying.

With its richly detailed evocation of place and political context, Black Sunday makes convincing and affecting what might otherwise be a somewhat cartoonish central gimmick, somewhat reminiscent of similar elements in James Bond films of the 1960s and 1970s. There is, after all, little difference between the Black Septembrist plot to use a dart-loaded blimp to turn the Super Bowl into a massacre and, say, Goldfinger's attempt to vaporize the gold in Fort Knox and create a world financial crisis. Finely coached performances by Shaw and Keller dominate the film, while Bruce Dern is also effective as a disgruntled Vietnam vet eager to get his own back. The film does not endorse either Palestinian grievance or Israeli attempts, often brutal, at pre-emptive self-defense; instead, it invokes the sad inevitability of Middle Eastern conflict, now played out in the open spaces and society of a self-satisfied, smugly fun-seeking America. The terrorists' plot, once discovered, might easily be foiled by a decision to cancel the game, but this proposed course of action is quickly dismissed by the officials in charge, though the president does change his plans to attend. The spectators in the stadium are thus saved through the working out of an international drama high above them of which they are completely unaware, the final irony in Frankenheimer's masterful thriller.

—R. Barton Palmer

BLACKMAIL

UK, 1929

Director: Alfred Hitchcock

Production: British International Pictures, black and white, 35mm; running time: 96 minutes. Released 1929. Filmed in studios in London and on location in the British Museum.

Producer: John Maxwell; screenplay: Alfred Hitchcock, Charles Bennett, Benn W. Levy, and Garnett Weston; from the play by Charles Bennett; photography: Jack Cox; editor: Emile Ruello; production design: Wilfred C. Arnold and Norman Arnold; music: Campbell and Connely, finished and arranged by Hubert Bath and Henry Stafford, performed by the British Symphony Orchestra under the direction of John Reynders.

Cast: Anny Ondra (Alice White); Sara Allgood (Mrs. White); John Longden (Frank Webber); Charles Paton (Mr. White); Donald Calthrop (Tracy); Cyril Ritchard (The artist).

Publications

Books:

Noble, Peter, An Index to the Creative Work of Alfred Hitchcock, supplement to Sight and Sound, index series, London, 1949.

Amengual, Barthélemy, and Raymond Borde, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1957.

Rohmer, Eric, and Claude Chabrol, Hitchcock, Paris, 1957.

Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1962.

Perry, George, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1965.

Wood, Robin, Hitchcock's Films, London, 1965.

Truffaut, François, Le Cinéma selon Hitchcock, Paris, 1966; as Hitchcock, New York, 1985.

La Valley, Albert J., editor, Focus on Hitchcock, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.

Durgnat, Raymond, The Strange Case of Alfred Hitchcock; or, The Plain Man's Hitchcock, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1974.

Yacowar, Hamden, Hitchcock's British Films, Hamden, Connecticut, 1977.

Taylor, John Russell, Hitch, London and New York, 1978.

Bellour, Raymond, L'Analyse du film, Paris, 1979.

Hemmeter, Thomas M., Hitchcock the Stylist, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.

Narboni, Jean, editor, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.

Rothman, William, Hitchcock—The Murderous Gaze, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1982.

Villien, Bruno, Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.

Weis, Elisabeth, The Silent Scream: Alfred Hitchcock's Sound Track, Rutherford, New Jersey, 1982.

Spoto, Donald, The Life of Alfred Hitchcock: The Dark Side of Genius, New York, 1982; London, 1983.

Phillips, Gene D., Alfred Hitchcock, Boston, 1984.

Barbier, Philippe, and Jacques Moreau, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.

Douchet, Jean, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.

Dentelbaum, Marshall, and Leland Poague, A Hitchcock Reader, Ames, Iowa, 1986.

Hogan, David J., Dark Romance: Sexuality in the Horror Film, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1986.

Humphries, Patrick, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, Greenwich, Connecticut, 1986.

Kloppenburger, Josef, Die dramaturgische Funktion der Musik in Filmen Alfred Hitchcock, Munich, 1986.

Ryall, Tom, Alfred Hitchcock and the British Cinema, London, 1986.

Sinyard, Neil, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1986.
 Modleski, Tania, The Women Who Knew Too Much: Hitchcock and Feminist Theory, New York, 1988.

Articles:

- Variety*, 10 July 1929.
 Marshall, Ernest, in New York Times, 14 July 1929.
 MacPherson, Kenneth, in Close Up (London), October 1929.
Variety, 9 October 1929.
 “My Own Methods,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1937.
 Maloney, Russell, “Alfred Joseph Hitchcock,” in New Yorker, 10 September 1938.
 Anderson, Lindsay, “Alfred Hitchcock,” in Sequence (London), Autumn 1949.
 “Hitchcock Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1953.
 “Hitchcock Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August–September 1956.
 Higham, Charles, “Hitchcock’s World,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1962–63.
 Vernilye, Jerry, “An Alfred Hitchcock Index,” in Films in Review (New York), April 1966.
 Bond, Kirk, “The Other Alfred Hitchcock,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1966.
 Beylie, Claude, “4 Inédits d’Alfred Hitchcock,” in Ecran (Paris), November 1976.
 Lefèvre, Raymond, “Les Premiers films parlants d’Alfred Hitchcock,” in Cinema 76 (Paris), November 1976.
 Dagneau, G., “Sur 4 Films d’Hitchcock,” in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), December 1976.
 Dahan, L., “4 films anglais d’Hitchcock,” in Cinématographe (Paris), January 1977.
 Linderman, Deborah, “The Screen in Hitchcock’s Blackmail,” in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 4, no. 1, 1980.
Magill’s Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Barr, Charles, “Blackmail: Silent and Sound,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1983.
 Poague, Leland, “Criticism and/as History: Rereading Blackmail,” in A Hitchcock Reader, edited by Marshall Deutelbaum and Leland Poague, Ames, Iowa, 1986.
 Wood, Robin, “Symmetry, Closure, Disruption,” in Cineaction (Toronto), Winter 1988–89.
 Eyuboglu, S., “The Authorial Text and Postmodernism: Hitchcock’s Blackmail,” in Screen (Oxford), no. 1, 1991.
 Reincke, N., “Antidote to Dominance: Women’s Laughter as Counteraction,” in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), no. 4, 1991.
 Eyüböglü, S., “The Authorial Text and Postmodernism: Hitchcock’s Blackmail,” in Screen (Oxford), vol. 32, no. 1, Spring 1991.
 Boschi, A., “Like Raisins in a Bun: le due versioni di Blackmail,” in Cinema & Cinema (Bologna), January–April 1992.

* * *

Hitchcock’s last silent film, Blackmail was also his first sound effort—and one of the first British “talkies” as well. A resounding popular and critical success, Blackmail prefigures some of the director’s most famous themes and demonstrates techniques for which he would be noted.

As critic Eric Rohmer points out, the entire film “focuses on the relationships among characters.” Victims and victimizers alternate from scene to scene (a technique Hitchcock would later perfect in his 1951 film Strangers on a Train). Sometimes within a single shot, for example, the moral positions of the characters shift, while the placement of the characters illustrates visually the relationship that we also know from context. As many other critics have detailed, this type of shift is “pure Hitchcock”: scenes such as those between the blackmailer and the detective parallel scenes from the director’s future work, most notably the relationship between a tennis pro and his psychotic “fan” in Strangers on a Train. This visual affirmation of moral ambiguity and transfer of guilt combines with other elements—such as the use of cinematic means to direct point of view, often at the expense of a linear storyline—that would later be considered typical of Hitchcock’s films. The thematic concerns of Blackmail also appear in Hitchcock’s Hollywood period, for example, the depiction of a woman’s torments, as in Suspicion. Blackmail demonstrates an intriguing use of sound, especially since it was originally conceived and produced as a silent film. One notable example occurs in the use of sound for scene-to-scene continuity: the protagonist’s shriek becomes the basis for transition to the next scene in which a charwoman finds a dead body. (This technique, too, was incorporated into another film, The Thirty-Nine Steps.) Even in this very early sound venture, Hitchcock’s awareness of the possibilities of sound represents a major experimental advance in his ability to “make the inexpressible tangible.”

Hitchcock said that he used a good many trick shots in the picture. During a sequence in the British Museum, he told Francois Truffaut, “we used the Shufftan process because there wasn’t enough light in the museum to shoot there. You set a mirror at an angle of 45 degrees and you reflect a full picture of the British Museum in it.” Hitchcock had nine of the pictures made, showing various rooms. But the producers knew nothing of the Shufftan process, and since they might have objected, Hitchcock performed his magic without their knowledge.

Blackmail has an important place in cinematic and Hitchcockian film history. Not only is it one of the first British talking pictures, but it is also a prototype for Hitchcock films to follow in terms of theme, the use of sound and cinematic style. Blackmail initiated the suspense sub-genre many call the “Hitchcock film,” while innovatively transforming use of the then new sound medium within an established visual style and in the service of unique thematic purposes.

—Deborah H. Holdstein

BLADE RUNNER

USA, 1982

Director: Ridley ScottProduction: Ladd Company in association with Sir Run Run Shaw; Technicolor, 35mm, Panavision, Dolby Stereo; running time: about

Blade Runner

2 hours. Released June, 1982; re-released in 1991. Filmed 1981 in Pinewood and Twickenham Studios, England, and on location in Los Angeles.

Producer: Michael Deeley; screenplay: Hampton Fancher and David Peoples, from the novel Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep by Philip K. Dick; photography: Jordan Cronenweth; editor: Terry Rawlings; sound mixer: Bud Alper; sound editor: Peter Pennell; dialogue editor: Michael Hopkins; production designer: Lawrence G. Paull; art director: David Snyder; music: Vangelis; special effects: Douglas Trumbull, Richard Yuricich, and David Dryer; costume designers: Charles Knode and Michael Kaplan; visual futurist: Syd Mead.

Cast: Harrison Ford (Deckard); Rutger Hauer (Batty); Sean Young (Rachael); Edward James Olmos (Gaff); M. Emmet Walsh (Bryant); Darryl Hannah (Pris); William Sanderson (Sebastian); Brion James (Leon); Joe Turkel (Tyrell); Joanna Cassidy (Zhora); James Hong (Chew); Morgan Paull (Holden); Kevin Thompson (Bear); John Edward Allen (Kaiser); Hy Pyke (Taffey Lewis); Kimiro Hiroshige (Cambodian Lady); Robert Okazaki (Sushi Master); Carolyn De Mirjian (Saleslady); Charles Knapp (Bartender No. 1); Leo Gorcey, Jr. (Bartender No. 2); Thomas Hutchinson (Bartender No. 3); Kelly Hine (Show Girl); Sharon Hesky (Barfly No. 1); Rose Mascari (Barfly No. 2); Susan Rhee (Geisha No. 1); Hiroko Kimuri (Geisha No. 2); Kai Wong (Chinese Man No. 1); Kit Wong (Chinese Man No. 2); Hiro Okazaki (Policeman No. 1); Steve Pope (Policeman No. 2); Robert Reiter (Policeman No. 3).

Publications

Script:

Fancher, Hampton, and David Webb Peoples, The Illustrated Blade Runner, San Diego 1982.

Books:

Scroggy, David, editor, Blade Runner Sketchbook, San Diego, 1982.
Peary, Danny, Cult Movies 3, New York, 1988.

McDonald, James, Fantasy and the Cinema, London, 1989.
 Kerman, Judith B., editor, Retrofitting Blade Runner, Bowling Green, Ohio, 1991.
 Sammon, Paul, Future Noir: The Making of Blade Runner, New York, 1996.
 Kerman, Judith B., editor, Retrofitting Blade Runner: Issues in Ridley Scott's Blade Runner and Philip K. Dick's Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep?, Bowling Green, Ohio, 1997.
 Bukatman, Scott, Blade Runner, London, 1998.

Articles:

- Mills, Bart, "The Brave New World of Production Design," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), January-February 1982.
Variety (New York), 16 June 1982.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 8 July 1982.
 Corliss, Richard, in Time (New York), 12 July 1982.
 Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, 12 July 1982.
 "Blade Runner Issue" of Cinefex (Riverside, California), July 1982.
 Lightman, Herb A., and Richard Patterson, "Blade Runner: Production Design and Photography," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), July 1982.
 Kennedy, Harlan, in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1982.
 Strick, Philip, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1982.
 Colpart, G., in Image et Son (Paris), September 1982.
 Goldschmidt, D., in Cinématographe (Paris), September 1982.
 Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1982.
 "Blade Runner Issues" of Starburst (London), September-November 1982.
 Girard, M., in Séquences (Montreal), October 1982.
 Roddick, Nick, in Films and Filming (London), October 1982.
 Skytte, A., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), October 1982.
 Dumont, P., in Cinéma (Paris), November 1982.
 Garsault, A., in Positif (Paris), November 1982.
 Assayas, O., and S. Le Peron, interview with Ridley Scott, in Casablanca (Madrid), March 1983.
 Piccardi, A., in Cineforum (Bergamo), December 1982.
 Dempsey, Michael, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1982-83.
 Cardenas, F., in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), February 1983.
 Caron, A., "Les Archetypes chez Ridley Scott," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), March 1983.
 Pacileo, V., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), April 1983.
 Durnat, Raymond, "Art for Film's Sake," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), May 1983.
 Martin, R., "La Photographie mérité bien note méfiance," in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), Summer 1983.
 Kellner, D., and others, "Blade Runner: A Diagnostic Critique," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), February 1984.
 Dresser, D., "Blade Runner: Science Fiction and Transcendence," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), July 1985.
 Doll, Susan and Greg Faller, "Blade Runner and Genre: Film Noir and Science Fiction," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), April 1986.
 Olive, J. Louis, "Les Structures de l'enfermement urbain," in Cahiers de la Cinéma (Perpignan), no. 44, 1986.
Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Autumn 1986.
 Ruppert, P., "Blade Runner: The Utopian Dialectics of Science Fiction Films," in Cineaste (New York), no. 2, 1989.
 Berg, C. R., "Immigrants, Aliens, and Extraterrestrials: Science Fiction's Alien 'Other' as (Among Other Things) New Hispanic Imagery," in Cineaction (Toronto), Fall 1989.
 Morrison, R., "Casablanca Meets Stars Wars: The Blakean Dialectics of Blade Runner," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 1, 1990.
 Slade, J. W., "Romanticizing Cybernetics in Ridley Scott's Blade Runner," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 1, 1990.
 Shumaker, C., "More Human than Humans: Society, Salvation, and the Outsider in Some Popular Films of the 1980s," in Journal of American Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), no. 4, 1990.
 Wilhelmsson, P., "Design tai vallankumous," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 6, 1990.
 Attolini, G., "Dagli spazi aperti all'universo urbano," in Quaderni di Cinema (Florence), July-September 1990.
 Telotte, J. P., "The Tremulous Public Body," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), no. 1, 1991.
 Levy, S., "Ridley Scissorhands," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), August 1991.
 Marder, E., "Blade Runner's Moving Still," in Camera Obscura (Bloomington, Indiana), September 1991.
 Silverman, K., "Back to the Future," in Camera Obscura (Bloomington, Indiana), September 1991.
 Instrell, Rick, "Blade Runner: The Economic Shaping of a Film," in Cinema & Fiction, edited by John Orr and Colin Nicholson, Edinburgh, 1992.
 Wilmington, M., "The Rain People," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1992.
 Rynell, T., "Den morknande framtid ar var," in Filmhaftet (Uppsala, Sweden), May 1992.
 Albrecht, D., "Blade Runner Cuts Deep into American Culture," in New York Times, 20 September 1992.
 Strick, P., "Blade Runner: Telling the Difference," in Sight and Sound (London), December 1992.
 Instrell, Rick, "Blade Runner: The Economic Shaping of the Film," in John Orr and Colin Nicholson, editors, Cinema and Fiction: New Modes of Adapting, 1950-1990, Edinburgh, 1992.
 Bruno, Giuliano, "Ramble City: Postmodernism and Blade Runner," in Crisis Cinema, edited by Christopher Sharrett, Washington, D.C., 1993.
 Alliez, E., and M. Feher, "Dick City," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 1, 1993.
 Bruno, M. W., "One More Kiss My Dear," in Segnocinema (Vincenza, Italy), January-February 1993.
 McNamara, Kevin R., "Blade Runner's Post-Individual Worldspace," in Contemporary Literature (Madison, Wisconsin), vol. 38, no. 3, Fall 1997.
 Gravett, Sharon L., "The Sacred and the Profane: Examining the Religious Subtext of Ridley Scott's Blade Runner," and P. Lev, "Whose Future? Star Wars, Alien, and Blade Runner," in Literature Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 26, no. 1, 1998.

* * *

This futuristic hard-boiled detective yarn stars Harrison Ford as a world-weary film noir hero whose job is to smoke out and retire (i.e., destroy) “replicants”—androids with a human instinct for survival—in an overcrowded Los Angeles circa 2019.

Complications arise when Ford falls for an android, a gorgeous experimental model played by Sean Young, dressed up as a 1940s film noir femme fatale, and comes to the conclusion that his task of mercilessly hunting and striking down these creatures whose only crime is a belief in their humanity has dulled his own humanity—although it is subsequently revealed, somewhat obscurely, that Ford comes to identify with them because he’s a replicant with deep-rooted memory chips himself.

Director Ridley Scott used his clout following the success of Alien (1979) to create this visually striking science-fiction piece, drawn from Philip K. Dick’s novella Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep? Partisans consider the novella (somewhat altered in the film version) and the film modern masterpieces of the genre. Certainly the film’s milestone special effects (orchestrated by 2001’s Douglas Trumbull and an army of technicians) are stunning. As is Scott’s evocation of a teeming, twenty-first century Los Angeles perpetually drenched in rain or steam. Apart from the occasional spacecraft circling the Capitol Records building, it looks remarkably like Scott’s garish evocation of present day Tokyo in his subsequent neo-noir (minus the sci-fi element) Black Rain (1989).

The film’s dramatic structure is much less satisfying, however, although it has been significantly improved with the studio’s release of the never-before-seen “director’s cut.”

Scott suffered a great deal of studio interference in the course of making the film. The script underwent numerous rewrites before and during filming. His woes (he called the experience “a war”) continued through post-production and several previews until the film was released in 1982, becoming a cult favorite but a box-office flop.

Audiences were knocked out by the film’s images but frustrated by the ambiguities of many major plot points (Ford’s being an android among them), and bored by the constant narration inserted over and obscuring the otherwise imaginatively detailed soundtrack to help clarify them. That the narration spoken by Ford in his customary expressionless monotone slowed the film’s pace to almost a crawl didn’t help. There is some debate as to whether Ford’s narration was planned from the start or cobbled together in a panic move during post-production. Evidence suggests the former. But the unwelcome decision not to drop it for the film’s initial release hints at the latter.

In any case, when the studio re-released the film in 1991 in a newly struck 70mm “director’s cut”—the print now in circulation on video—the narration was jettisoned. It’s deletion improves the film’s pace considerably. (Even Harrison Ford has gone on record as saying so.) Many plot ambiguities remain, but the significant revelation that Ford himself is a replicant—and all the more human because of it, who finally realizes his brotherhood with the android combatant (Hauer) he has destroyed, is much clearer now.

Ironically, although many so-called “director’s cuts” tend to reinsert footage—typically explicitly sexual or violent scenes—trimmed from the first-round general release, Blade Runner—The Director’s Cut actually takes the opposite route by toning this footage down a bit. For example, Darryl Hannah’s gymnastic android doesn’t take quite as many bullet hits as before—nor do you see Ford gouge Hauer’s eyes. Enough remains to sustain the film’s R rating, however.

—John McCarty

THE BLAIR WITCH PROJECT

USA, 1999

Directors: Daniel Myrick and Eduardo Sánchez

Production: Haxan Films; distributed by Artisan Entertainment (U.S.A.), Shochiku Films (Japan), Budapest Film (Hungary), Mars Films (France), Eurocine (Argentina), Arthaus Filmverleih (Germany); 16 mm black-and-white and High 8 color video; running time: 80 minutes (U.S.A.), 81 minutes (Japan), 83 minutes (Argentina); sound mix: Dolby Digital. Released July 1999 (limited). Filmed in Seneca Creek State Park, Wheaton, and Rockville, Maryland; shot in 8 days; cost: $22,000.

Producers: Robin Cowie, Bob Eick (executive), Kevin Foxe (executive), Gregg Hale, Michael Monello (co-producer); writing credits: Daniel Myrick, Eduardo Sánchez; cinematography: Neal Fredericks; editors: Daniel Myrick, Eduardo Sánchez; sound: Dana Meeks; art director: Ricardo Moreno; production designer: Ben Rock; original music: Tony Cora; sound effects editor: Elisabeth Flaum; foley mixer: Shawn Kennelly.

Cast: Heather Donahue (Heather Donahue); Michael C. Williams (Michael Williams); Joshua Leonard (Josh Leonard); Bob Griffin (Interviewee); Jim King (Interviewee); Sandra Sánchez (Woman with Baby—Interviewee); Ed Swanson (Interviewee); Patricia Decou (Interviewee); Mark Mason (Interviewee in yellow hat).

Awards: Csapnivalo Golden Slate Awards for Best Horror Movie and Best Movie, 2000; Florida Film Critics Circle Golden Orange Award “for furthering the cause of Florida filmmakers and independent filmmaking” (Robin Cowie, Gregg Hale, Michael Monello, Daniel Myrick, Eduardo Sánchez), 2000.

Publications

Books:

Stern, David A., The Blair Witch Project: A Dossier, New York, 1999.
Pelucir, Talis, The Unofficial Blair Witch Project Internet Guide, Port Orchard, Washington, 2000.

Articles:

Nashawaty, Chris, “Independents’ Day,” in Entertainment Weekly, vol. 1, no. 476, 12 March 1999.
Kenny, Glenn, “Love, Death, and One Mean Butcher,” in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 12, no. 8, April 1999
Ebert, Roger, “The Blair Witch Project,” in The Chicago Sun-Times, http://www.suntimes.com/ebert/ebert\_reviews/1999/07/071603.html.
Morris, Wesley, “Pitching Tent in Audience Psyche,” in The San Francisco Examiner, 16 July 1999.

The Blair Witch Project

Ascher-Walsh, Rebecca, "Rhymes with Rich," in Entertainment Weekly (New York), vol. 1, no. 496, 30 July 1999.

Travers, Peter, "The Blair Witch Project," in Rolling Stone (New York), no. 818, 5 August 1999.

Corliss, Richard, "Blair Witch Craft," in Time (New York), 16 August 1999.

Farber, Stephen, "Mock Inspiration," in Movieline (Escondido, California), vol. 10, no. 11, August 1999.

Guthman, Edward, "Terror Comes Alive in 'Witch': Pseudo-documentary Has Visceral Power," in The San Francisco Chronicle, 22 October 1999.

Burr, Ty, "Video: Forest Dangers (B+)," in Entertainment Weekly, vol. 1, no. 509, 29 October 1999.

Schwarzbaum, Lisa, "Terrorvision," in Entertainment Weekly, vol. 1, no. 495, 23 July 1999.

* * *

"In October of 1994, three student filmmakers disappeared in the woods near Burkittsville, Maryland, while shooting a documentary. . . . A year later their footage was found." Thus begins The Blair

Witch Project, Daniel Myrick and Eduardo Sánchez's shoestring-budgeted horror "mockumentary," which parlayed an innovative marketing campaign and incredible word-of-mouth into more than $140 million in the United States alone—making it one of the most profitable independent films of all time.

Led by aspiring director Heather Donahue (the characters have the same names as the actors who play them), the three "student filmmakers" mentioned above make their way to Burkittsville (formerly Blair), Maryland, in order to shoot footage for a documentary they are making about a local legend, the so-called "Blair Witch." Word has it that this mysterious figure has been haunting the nearby Black Hills Forest since the late 18th century, and is responsible for a number of heinous murders. After conducting interviews with some of the locals, the trio hike into the forest so as to gather additional footage. While Michael handles the sound recording, and Josh shoots in 16 mm black-and-white, Heather captures much of the action on High 8 color video. None of them experienced campers, they soon get lost, and their once-cheery demeanor deteriorates into an increasingly volatile mixture of fear, blame, frustration, and panic. To make matters worse, ominous signs begin appearing with disturbing regularity: carefully arranged piles of stones positioned outside their tent in the morning; strange and disturbing sounds at night, of whispered voices and babies crying; wooden effigies hanging in the trees. Then Josh disappears, the only clue a piece of his shirt with what looks like a piece of flesh wrapped inside it, discovered by Heather the next day. In the film's harrowing finale, Michael and Heather stumble across an apparently abandoned house. Hoping to find Jeff, they enter; what they discover is a nightmare. Through the lens of her camcorder, we see what Heather sees. And what we see is nothing much, just darkness and ruins and children's handprints on the walls, and finally, after someone or something knocks her out (Michael has already been attacked), a blank ceiling, which lasts until the tape—and the film itself—reaches an end.

The Blair Witch Project is a unique and important production insofar as it looks forward, to the future of film promotion, at the same time as it looks backward, to a time when horror movies did not rely on special effects or the concoction of gory spectacles to instill a sense of terror in audiences. Instead of the usual trailers and print ads, Myrick and Sánchez (first-time directors who met while attending the University of Central Florida) concocted an elaborate backstory—what they dubbed a “mythology”—for Blair Witch, which they posted on the film's official website (<http://www.blairwitch.com>). The website presents the events of the film as real occurrences, and includes character bios, news clips about the disappearances, interviews with relatives, information about the police investigation (supposedly declared “inactive and unsolved” in 1997), excerpts from Heather's journal, and a detailed history of the Blair Witch legend. In addition, and just prior to its screening at the Cannes Film Festival in May 1999, “MISSING” flyers with descriptions of Heather, Michael, and Josh were put up all around town. What all of this amounts to is a symbiotic relationship between film and extra-textual discourse, one in which the documentary pretensions of the former are strongly enhanced by the non-fictional cues of the latter. Of course there were various ways for people to discern that the entire story was a hoax, but a great many were simply not interested in seeing through (or all the way through) the deception. The film generated so much hype after its premiere at Sundance in January 1999 that an additional screening had to be scheduled in the 1300-seat Eccles theatre, which was filled to capacity. Soon afterwards, Artisan Entertainment picked up The Blair Witch Project for distribution in the United States.

Despite criticisms directed towards the film's sometimes slow pacing and non-stop, nausea-inducing handheld camerawork, it is hard to deny that The Blair Witch Project succeeds in its employment of cinema verité as a means of instilling terror in viewers. Myrick and Sánchez's unique production method has itself become the stuff of legend: not only were the actors responsible for shooting the entire film themselves (over the course of eight consecutive days and nights); they had to carry their own equipment, and improvised almost all of their lines. Three or four times a day, the directors would write notes to each cast member, sealing them in tubes for their eyes only. Explained Myrick, “We were trying to create an environment for these actors and have this improv come to life and be as realistic as possible. That's what we think really contributed to the unseen fear that's been so very effective.” By achieving such a high degree of realism, the directors took their product a step beyond earlier horror films with mockumentary aspirations, films such as Wes Craven's The Last House on the Left (1972), Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chainsaw Massacre (1974), and Michael and Roberta Finlay's notorious Snuff (1976).

By exploiting some of our most basic, inescapable fears—of the dark, of the unknown, of sounds whose source cannot be detected—Myrick and Sánchez and the film's three leads manage to elicit intense emotional responses from viewers. Some of the most terrifying moments occur when neither of the cameras are functioning, and all we are able to see is a black/blank screen (this is reminiscent of a famous scene in Robert Wise's 1963 classic, The Haunting). Which proves once again that what our imagination conjures up when effectively prompted is far worse than anything even the most sophisticated special effects or makeup can produce. It is to their credit that those involved in the making of The Blair Witch Project were well aware of this oft-forgotten fact.

—Steven Schneider

DER BLAUE ENGEL

(The Blue Angel)

Germany, 1930

Director: Josef von Sternberg

Production: Universum-Film-Aktiengesellschaft Studios (UFA), Berlin; black and white, 35mm; running time: 90 minutes; length: 2920 meters. Released 31 March 1930, Germany; American version released 3 January 1931 by Paramount. Filmed (concurrently in English and German) in late winter of 1929, UFA studios, Berlin.

Producer: Erich Pommer; scenario: Josef von Sternberg, Robert Liebmann, and Karl Vollmoeller; dialogue: Carl Zuckmayer, from the novel Professor Unrath by Heinrich Mann; photography: Günther Rittau and Hans Schneeberger; editor: Sam Winston; sound effects: Fritz Theiry; production design: Otto Hunte and Emil Hasler; music: Friedrich Holländer; lyrics: Robert Liebmann; music played by: The Weintraub Syncopators.

Cast: Emil Jannings (Immanuel Rath); Marlene Dietrich (Lola Frolich); Rosa Valetti (Guste); Hans Albers (Mazepa); Kurt Gerron (Kiepert); Karl Huzar Puffy (Proprietor); Reinhold Bernt (Clown); Rolf Mueller (Angst); Roland Verno (Lohmann); Karl Bolhaus (Ertzum); Hans Roth (Caretaker); Gerhard Bienart (Policeman); Robert-Klein Loerk (Goldstaub); Wilhelm Diegelmann (Captain); Ilse Fuerstenberg (Rath's Maid); Edward V. Winterstein (Headmaster).

Publications

Scripts:

Von Sternberg, Joseph and others, “L'Ange bleu,” in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), March 1966.

Von Sternberg, Joseph, and others, The Blue Angel (continuity script), New York, 1968.

Der Blaue Engel

Books:

- Talky, Jean, Marlène Dietrich, femme énigme, Paris, 1932.
 Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler, New York, 1947.
 Harrington, Curtis, An Index to the Films of Josef von Sternberg, London, 1949.
 Griffith, Richard, Marlene Dietrich—Image and Legend, New York, 1959.
 Kyrrou, Ado, "Sternberg et Marlène," in Le Surréalisme au cinéma, Paris, 1963.
 von Sternberg, Josef, Fun in a Chinese Laundry, New York, 1965.
 Sarris, Andrew, The Films of Josef von Sternberg, New York, 1966.
 Weinberg, Herman G., Josef von Sternberg: A Critical Study, New York, 1967.
 Brownlow, Kevin, The Parade's Gone By . . ., London and New York, 1969.
 Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, California, 1969.
Anthologie du cinéma 6, Paris, 1971.
 Baxter, John, The Cinema of Josef von Sternberg, New York, 1971.
 Mériageu, Pascal, Josef von Sternberg, Paris, 1983.
 Navacelle, Thierry de, Sublime Marlene, London, 1984.

Seydel, Renate, Marlene Dietrich: Eine Chronik ihres Lebens in Bildern und Dokumenten, East Berlin, 1984.

Spoto, Donald, Falling in Love Again: Marlene Dietrich, Boston, 1985.

Dietrich, Marlene, Ich bin, Gott sei dank, Berliner, Frankfurt, 1987.

Spoto, Donald, Blue Angel: The Life of Marlene Dietrich, New York, 1992.

Wehnert, Stefanie, and Nathalie Bielfeldt, editors, Mien Kopf und die Beine von Marlene Dietrich: Heinrich Manns, Professor Unrat, and Der Blaue Engel, Lubeck, Germany, 1996.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 30 April 1930.

Lenauer, Jean, "10 Days à Berlin," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), June 1930.

Revue du Cinéma (Paris), October 1930.

Mann, Heinrich, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), December 1930.

Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 6 December 1930.

"Les Grands Rôles de Marlène Dietrich," in Cinéma (Paris), February 1932.

- Harrington, Curtis, "Arrogant Gesture," in Theatre Arts (New York), November 1950.
- Wagner, Geoffrey, in Quarterly Review of Film, Radio and Television (Berkeley), Fall 1951.
- Wagner, Geoffrey, "Revaluation: The Blue Angel," in Sight and Sound (London), August-September 1951.
- Harrington, Curtis, "Josef von Sternberg," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October-November 1951.
- George, Manfred, "Marlene Dietrich's Beginning," in Films in Review (New York), February 1952.
- Audibert, Jacques, "L'Amour dans le cinéma," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1954.
- Whitehall, Richard, in Films and Filming (London), October 1962.
- "A Taste for Celluloid," in Films and Filming (London), July 1963.
- Green, O. O., "Six Films of Josef von Sternberg," in Movie (London), no. 13, 1965.
- Filmkritik* (Frankfurt, Germany), April 1965.
- Weinberg, Herman G., "Josef von Sternberg," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1965-66.
- "L'Oeuvre de Josef von Sternberg," in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), March 1966.
- Positif* (Paris), May 1966.
- Cornaud, André, in Image et Son (Paris), no. 214, 1968.
- Truscott, Harold, "Emil Jannings—A Personal View," in Silent Picture (London), Autumn 1970.
- Martineau, Barbara, "Thoughts about the Objectification of Women," in Take One (Montreal), November-December 1970.
- Rhuban, Joyce, "Josef von Sternberg: The Scientist and the Vamp," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1972-73.
- Weisstein, Ulrich, "Translations and Adaptations of Heinrich Mann's Novel in 2 Media," in Film Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall-Winter 1972.
- Baxter, P., "On the Naked Thighs of Miss Dietrich," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 2, 1978.
- Firda, R. A., "Literary Origins: Sternberg's Film The Blue Angel," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1979.
- Audibert, L., "L'Ombre du son," in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1979.
- "Filmprotokoll: Der Blaue Engel," in Film and Fernsehen (Berlin), December 1980.
- Marinero, M., in Casablanca (Madrid), June 1981.
- Laurens, C., "L'Armature sonore de L'Ange Bleu de Sternberg," in Image et Son (Paris), December 1981.
- Weemaes, G., in Film en Televisie (Brussels), September 1982.
- Reijnhoudt, B., "Der blaue Engel: De blote dijen van miss Dietrich," in Skoop (The Hague), November 1985.
- Koch, Gertrude, "Zwischen der Welten," in Frauen und Film (Berlin), December 1986.
- Musatti, C., "Il Professore e l'angelo azzurro," in Cinema Nuovo (Rome), May-June 1990.
- Grimes, William, "Dietrich Had a Fit (in Fact 3 Fits) in Screen Test," in New York Times, 15 October 1992.

* * *

When Josef von Sternberg arrived in Berlin in the autumn of 1929, his career was tottering. The two years since his 1927 success with Underworld had been spent making box-office failures in imitation of his pioneering gangster film, now out-dated by the coming of sound.

A brief high-spot, the production of The Last Command with Emil Jannings, had led to his providential invitation from Erich Pommer of UFA to visit Germany and direct Jannings in his first sound picture.

A drama about Rasputin was suggested, partly to placate UFA backer Alfred Hugenberg's right-wing sensibilities, but von Sternberg finally chose a novel by Heinrich Mann written in 1905 as an attack on the period's reactionary politics. An upright professor is seduced by a nightclub singer, becomes a pawn of her political friends, but finally fights off their influence and re-establishes himself in the community. Professor Unrath was essentially a protest against the false morality and corrupt values of the German middle class, but in it von Sternberg saw the possibility of a film far closer to his personal obsessions, his sensuality, his love of decoration and photographic style.

Mann wrote a script, which von Sternberg rejected. The popular comic playwright Carl Zuckmayer wrote another, whose dialogue von Sternberg liked. UFA's resident dramaturge, Robert Liebmann, incorporated the dialogue into a story which cut the novel in half, showing only the professor's surrender to the beautiful cabaret singer and his destruction at her hands. Jannings, famous for his love of lavish emotionalism, raised no objection to the many scenes of hysteria and public humiliation—material for which he had become famous in films like The Last Laugh. Von Sternberg proved difficult in his choice of star to play Lola. Mann's friend Trude Hesterberg was considered. So was stage actress Greta Massine, singer Lucie Mannheim, even Brigitte Helm. Finally, with time running out, Pommer signed Kathe Haack. Then, through Karl Vollmoeller, von Sternberg met Marlene Dietrich, a minor actress in films and on stage but better known as the companion of the star Willy Forst. The meeting with the 25-year-old married woman was the beginning of a life-long sexual obsession for von Sternberg, as well as the end of his marriage and the foundation of his true career.

Der blaue Engel became, like most of von Sternberg's films, an autobiographical excursion. In the material on Rath's autocratic teaching methods, von Sternberg paid back his own early torment at the hands of his father, who had forced him to learn Hebrew with frequent physical punishment to drive home the lessons. By choosing a turn of the century setting, von Sternberg placed the story in his own childhood, and decorated it with images of adolescent eroticism. On the walls of The Blue Angel Cabaret, designed by Otto Hunte, he plastered scores of posters, and hung the cafe with nets, dangling cardboard angels, stuffed birds—a familiar von Sternberg archetype—and, everywhere, low-hung lamps that give the film an air of scented, smoky claustrophobia.

Von Sternberg poured all his energy and imagination into the role of Lola, creating a star vehicle for the young Dietrich. Borrowing from the drawings of the erotic artist Felicien Rops, he created a figure out of a teenager's sexual fantasy, a vision in black stockings and heavy make-up, wearing an arrogantly tilted top hat. Her poses and movements on stage were mapped out with choreographic care, her songs crafted for her uninspiring voice by Friedrich Holländer, who found tunes needing only two or three notes. Her feline stroll on stage, her pointed, mocking stares, her casual use of her own sexual allure to beguile the giggling, simpering Jannings became elements in a screen persona Dietrich was to exploit for the rest of her career.

By contrast Jannings is feeble and monochromatically comic. The shadings he might have hoped to receive from von Sternberg's direction did not materialize. Instead, he found himself little more than a character player to this unknown young woman. Throughout the shooting, he threw tantrums, threatening to walk off the film and doing everything he could to break down the rapport between director and star. After the film, he was to demand successfully of UFA that he have total control over the material in all his subsequent films, a decision which destroyed him as a screen star.

Shot concurrently in English and German, Der blaue Engel confronted von Sternberg with a technical challenge of awesome complexity. Never a skilful editor or director of action, he was committed to a style where lighting and atmosphere conveyed the story, and where each performer's "dramatic encounter with light" spelled out their thought. To achieve this, he added to the script a number of minor but important characters, notably the clown who morosely observes life in the cafe, and who is revealed later (when Rath is forced into the same costume) to be another of Lola's discarded lovers. When the film was remade in 1959 with Mai Britt and Curt Jurgens, von Sternberg successfully sued 20th Century-Fox for plagiarism of his interpolated scenes, not found in the original screenplay.

Even before Der blaue Engel was finished, its success was obvious. Von Sternberg had shown tests of Dietrich to Paramount head B.P. Schulberg when he visited Berlin, and the studio immediately signed her to a two-picture contract. The premiere, on 31 March 1930, was a sensation: that night, she and von Sternberg sailed for America, to be met at the dock at New York by von Sternberg's wife, and a process server with writs against Dietrich for libel and alienation of affections. Neither director nor star were unduly concerned. Dietrich had found a vehicle to achieve international stardom. Von Sternberg, a subject on which he could focus his contradictory but prodigious talent. Der blaue Engel became the foundation of perhaps the most remarkable collaboration between actress and filmmaker that the cinema has ever seen.

—John Baxter

DIE BLECHTROMMEL

(The Tin Drum)

Germany/France, 1979

Director: Volker Schlöndorff

Production: Franz Seitz Filmproduktion, Bioskop Film, GGB 14 KG, Artemis Filmgesellschaft, Argos Films, Jadran Film, Film Polski; Eastmancolour, 35mm; running time: 142 minutes. Filmed in Zagreb, München, and Paris, 1978.

Producer: Franz Seitz; executive producer: Anatole Dauman; screenplay: Jean-Claude Carrière, Franz Seitz, and Volker Schlöndorff, with the collaboration of Günter Grass, from his original novel; photography: Igor Luther; editor: Suzanne Baron; assistant directors: Branko Lustig, Alexander von Richtofen, Wolfgang Kroke, Andrzej Reiter, and Richard Malbequi; lighting: Karl Dillitzer; production design: Nikos Perakis; art director: Bernd Lepel; sets: Paul Weber, Edouard Pezzoli, Marijan, and Marcius; music: Maurice Jarre; costumes: Dagmar Niefind, Inge Heer, and Vashy Yabara; sound recording: Walter Grundauer, Walter Kellerhaus, and Peter Beil.

Cast: David Bennent (Oskar Matzerath); Mario Adorf (Alfred Matzerath); Angela Winkler (Agnes Matzerath); Daniel Olbrychski (Jan Bronski); Katharina Thalbach (Maria Matzerath); Heinz Bennent (Greff); Andrea Ferreol (Lina Greff); Fritz Hakl (Bebra); Mariella Oliveri (Roswitha Raguna); Tina Engel (Anna Koljaiczek); Berta Drews (Anna Koljaiczek, as an old woman); Roland Teubner (Joseph Koljaiczek); Tadeusz Kunikowski (Uncle Vinzenz); Ernst Jacobi (Gauletier Lobsack); Werner Rehm (Scheffler); Ilse Page (Gretchen Scheffler); Kate Jaenicke (Mother Truczinski); Helmuth Brasch (Old Heilandt); Wigand Witting (Herbert Truczinski); Marek Walczewski (Schugger-Leo); Charles Aznavour (Sigismund Markus).

Awards: Palme D'Or, Cannes Film Festival, 1979; Oscar for Best Foreign Language Film, 1980.

Publications

Script:

Schlöndorff, Volker, and Günter Grass, Die Blechtrommel als Film, Frankfurt, 1979.

Books:

Lewandowski, Reiner, Die Filme von Volker Schlöndorff, Hildesheim, 1981.

Franklin, James, New German Cinema: From Oberhausen to Hamburg, Boston, 1983.

Phillips, Klaus, editor, New German Filmmakers: From Oberhausen through the 1970s, New York, 1984.

Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema: A History, London 1989.

Ginsberg, Terri, Perspectives on German Cinema, New York, 1996.

Elsaesser, Thomas, The BFI Companion to German Cinema, Bloomington, 1999.

Articles:

Bonneville, L., Séquences (Montreal), January 1979.

Variety (New York), 16 May 1979.

Bassan, R., Ecran (Courbevoie), July 1979.

Logette, L., Jeune Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1979.

Ramasse, F., Positif (Paris), July-August 1979.

Courant, G., Cinéma (Paris), September 1979.

Lajeunesse, J., Image et Son (Paris), September 1979.

Schlöndorff, Volker, "Confrence de presse," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1979.

Bonnet, J.-C., and F. Cuel, Cinématographe (Paris), October 1979.

Lardeau, Y., Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1979.

Jeancolas, J.-P., "Trois Notes (Brèves)," in Positif (Paris), November 1979.

Kauffmann, Stanley, "Living through Wars," in The New Republic, 5 April 1980.

Boyum, Joy Gould, "Günter Grass on Screen: An Allegory of Nazism," in The Wall Street Journal, 11 April 1980.

Hatch, Robert, "The Tin Drum," in The Nation, 19 April 1980.

Die Blechtrommel

Kroll, Jack, "Bang the Drum Loudly," in Newsweek, 21 April 1980.
 Schickel, Richard, "Dream Work," in Time, 28 April 1980.
 Harvey, Stephen, "The Beat of a Difficult Drummer," in Saturday Review, May 1980.
 Blake, Richard A., "Danzig in the Dark," in America, 3 May 1980.
 O'Toole, Lawrence, "One Oskar Tailor—Made to Win Another," Maclean's, 5 May 1980.
 Simon, John, "Interior Exiles," in National Review, 30 May 1980.
 Dawson, J., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1980.
 Reed, Rex, "The Tin Drum," in Vogue, June 1980.
 Kephart, E., Films in Review (New York), June-July 1980.
 "The Tin Drum," in USA Today, July 1980.
 Beaulieu, J., Séquences (Montreal), July 1980.
 Pachter, H., Cineaste (New York), autumn 1980.
 Hughes, J., "Volker Schlöndorff's Dream of Childhood," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), spring 1981.
 Kaes, Anton, Hitler to Heimat: The Return of History as Film, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, 1989.
 Hall, Conrad, "A Different Drummer: The Tin Drum, Film and Novel," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), October 1990.
 Krzeminski, A., in Kino (Warsaw), November 1992.

Silberman, Marc, German Cinema: Texts in Context, Wayne State University Press, Detroit, 1995.

Feingold, M., "A Different Drummer," in Village Voice (New York), 12 August 1997.

* * *

Volker Schlöndorff's The Tin Drum is representative of the New German cinema, a period in the 1970s and 1980s dominated by a generation of directors who were children during and following the Third Reich. These directors have taken a retrospective look at their childhoods and their nation's history to examine the emotional wounds and sensitivities of the present. Marc Silberman in German Cinema states that the films of this period "critically refigure seductive images and sounds from Germany's fascist past in order to challenge the heritage of the Nazi cinema, and for the first time since the international successes of the early Weimar cinema, German films enjoyed once again critical acclaim beyond their domestic audience."

The movie based on Günter Grass' powerful novel about Oskar, a boy growing up in Danzig between the wars, who is so horrified by the world that he wills himself to remain little.

Like the novel, The Tin Drum traces the warped history of Oskar's family, beginning with his grandparents, peasants of the Polish countryside. In the first scene, a man chased by the police begs a woman to hide him. She lifts her skirts and he crawls to safe seclusion. When the police have gone he emerges, hurriedly closing the front of his pants, and in the next scene, the couple has a small child, Oskar's mother. The image of hiding under a woman's skirts for safety is repeated throughout the film, and is both a suggestion of safety and sexuality, as Oskar climbs under the skirts of his grandmother, into bed with a neighbor woman for warmth, and into bed with his housekeeper where he presumably fathers her child. The macabre notion of sexuality becomes a precarious site for comfort and safety, providing immediacy and accessibility, but is eventually spoiled by the excessive need with which it is sought. It may be a continuous reference to Oskar's wish at birth to return to the womb, but decides to stay in the world when his mother promises him a tin drum on his third birthday.

Oskar Matzerath is played by 12-year-old David Bennent, who throws himself down a flight of stairs on his third birthday, celebrated by raucous adults with drink and debauchery, to prevent himself from growing up to participate in the obscenity of adult middle-class existence. He opts for perpetual childhood before the Nazis come to power and take over Danzig, his home town. The child, a symbol of protest, recognizes that Nazism is merely an extension of the world he has already rejected. His life centers on his tin drum, and everywhere he wanders throughout the film he accompanies his steps with the stoic beat that could be the suppressed, frantic beat of his heart, his voice audible, yet untranslatable. Oskar is a perfect parody of militarism. He wanders into a Nazi rally, and the assembly soon collapses into chaos when his drumbeat sets the entire pageant off course. His other talent, piercing screams, which he discovers can shatter glass, are his willful destruction of that which inhibits or frustrates him. This voice is his defense, his weapon, screams an extradiegetic foreshadowing of Kristallnacht. When the war comes to Danzig, Oskar is there among the dead and wounded, wandering and observing. He is fifteen, but also three, and takes from the world what would please him, as though he has become that which he rejected when he decided to throw himself down the stairs to protect himself in the masquerade of childhood.

The images in The Tin Drum are exceedingly unpalatable on screen though they were included in Grass' novel. Oskar, whose weakness is sensed by the other children, is forced to eat soup made of boiled frogs and urine. The decomposing head of a horse is pulled from the sea and a mass of eels tumbles out of it. Later, the eeler (Oskar's father) tries to force his wife, who was sickened by the sight, to eat his catch. She flees to her bedroom where she is consoled sexually by her lover, her husband's closest friend. Later in the film she becomes obsessed with a craving for fish until her gluttony destroys her. The image of the child banging on the door behind which his mother is dying, foundering on raw fish, will be repeated in another New German film, Deutschland, Bleiche Mutter (Germany, Pale Mother) by Helma Sanders-Brahms, though Oskar's mother never opens the door to return a sense of safety or reassurance to him or to the film, as the mother in Sanders-Brahms' film eventually does. Joy Gould Boyum writes in "Günter Grass on Screen: An Allegory of Nazism," in The Wall Street Journal, that these images, "enlarged, intensified and made overwhelmingly graphic by the movie screen ... disturb too much instead of calling attention to whatever point they would further, they end up calling attention only to themselves and their own jarring freakishness."

Robert Hatch is less disturbed by the images, as his review in The Nation praises the film for its reconstruction of Grass' picaresque novel: "There were more than enough scenes from which to choose: the Christ child as drummer, the ghastly harvest of eels, the storm troopers waltzing to Oskar's beat, the dwarfs' picnic atop the Normandy bunker, the siege of the Danzig post office, the seduction of Maria with fizz powder. The film is a splendid spectacle, but only a sampling of the novel's three books. It is like watching a slide show of some well-remembered land, the snapshots bringing to mind more than they can show." The story structure seems to be carried away as the technique of the adult Oskar's voice-over narration from an insane asylum (though this is not clear in the film), recalling the events of his childhood, is abandoned. Though this awkwardness is merely a problem of the adaptation process it does little to diminish the effectiveness of the screen presentation, which has a style rooted in Expressionism, and is powerful and original.

—Lee Sellars

DIE BLEIERNE ZEIT

(The German Sisters)

Germany, 1981

Director: Margarethe von Trotta

Production: Bioskop Film; Fujicolour, 35mm; running time: 107 minutes.

Producer: Eberhard Junkersdorf; screenplay: Margarethe von Trotta; assistant director: Helenka Hummel; photography: Franz Rath; editor: Dagmar Hirtz; sound: Vladimir Vizner and Hans Dieter Schwartz; art directors: George von Kieseritzky and Barbara Kloth; music: Nicolas Economou; costumes: Monica Hasse and Jorge Jara.

Cast: Jutta Lampe (Juliane); Barbara Sukowa (Marianne); Rudiger Volger (Wolfgang); Doris Schade (Mother); Verena Rudolph (Sabine); Luc Bondy (Werner); Franz Rudnick (Father); Julia Biedermann (Marianne, age 16); Ina Robinski (Juliane, age 17); Patrick Estrada-Pox (Jan).

Awards: Golden Lion, Venice 1981.

Publications

Script:

von Trotta, Margarethe, Die Bleierne Zeit, Frankfurt, 1981.

Die Bleierne Zeit

Books:

Kaplan, Ann E., Women and Film: Both Sides of the Camera, Methuen, 1983.

Todd, Janet, Women and Film, New York, 1988.

Frieden, Sandra, Gender and German Cinema: Feminist Interventions—Volume II: German Film History/German History on Film, Oxford, 1993.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 16 September 1981.

Nave, B., "Les années de plomb: Margarethe von Trotta ou le refus de l'oubli," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), November 1981.

Pellizzari, L., and others, "Speciale anni di piombo," in Cineforum (Bergamo), March 1892.

Celemenski, M., and others, "Margarethe von Trotta," in Cinématographe (Paris), April 1982.

Amiel, M., Cinéma (Paris), May 1982.

Sauvaget, D., Image et Son (Paris), May 1982.

Milne, Tom, Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1982.

Johnston, S., Films and Filming (London), July 1982.

Rabinowicz, L., "Dark Times," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), August 1982.

Sklar, R., and Harris, A., Cineaste (New York), Vol. XII, no. 3, 1983.

Alemanno, R., "La prassi delle conoscenza in 'Anni di piombo,'" in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), August-October 1983.

DiCaprio, L., "Baader-Meinhof Fictionalized," in Jump Cut (Chicago), February 1984.

Delorme, C., "On the Film 'Marianne and Juliane' by Margarethe von Trotta," in Journal of Film & Video (Boston), Spring 1985.

Seiter, E., "The Political Is Personal: Margarethe von Trotta's Marianne and Juliane," in Journal of Film & Video (Boston), Spring 1985.

Kaplan, E. A., "Discourses in Terrorism, Feminism, and the Family in von Trotta's Marianne and Juliane," in Persistence of Vision (Maspeth, New York), Fall 1985.

Donougho, M., "Margarethe von Trotta: Gynemagogy and the Dilemmas of a Filmmaker," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Maryland), July 1989.

Toiviainen, S., in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 5, 1995.

Martin, Michel, and Maurice Elia, "Margarethe von Trotta toujours présente," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), November-December 1996.

* * *

The German Sisters is based in part on the life of Gudrun Ensslin, one of the best known members of the Baader-Meinhof Group or Rote Armee Fraktion which carried out a campaign of terrorism in Germany in the late sixties and into the seventies. She was arrested in 1972 and sentenced to life imprisonment. In 1977 she and two other group members were found dead in their cells at Stammheim prison. The authorities claimed they had committed suicide, but this explanation has never been accepted by many, including Gudrun's sister Christiane, to whom this film is dedicated.

In The German Sisters Gudrun becomes Marianne and Christiane becomes Juliane, the daughters of a pastor in the German Lutheran Church. As we see through a number of flashbacks, both grow up in an atmosphere which is at one and the same time patriarchal but socially liberal and concerned. It is also strongly anti-fascist. In childhood, Marianne is dutiful and well-behaved, and Juliane is the rebel. But in the film's present, Marianne has become a terrorist, whilst Juliane has decided to try to change society peacefully by embarking on what was known at the time as "the long march through the institutions" and becoming a journalist on a liberal women's magazine.

As the flashback structure suggests, The German Sisters concerns the weight of the past on the present. Its original German title translates as "Leaden Times," which could be taken as referring either to the Nazi past (which has shaped, in quite different ways, Marianne's and Juliane's oppositional attitudes to the German present), or to the dreariness of the fifties in which they had their childhood and in which they were shaped by rather more personal forces, such as sibling rivalry and patriarchal authority. The film shows us two ways of relating to these pasts—violent rejection, or reformist feminism—and is, as Ellen Seiter has claimed, "an effective dramatisation of the feminist slogan 'the personal is political,' locating as it does the characters in their experience in the nuclear family within a specific historical, national and cultural instance."

However, this is where the problems begin, since the film, dedicated to the real-life Christiane, and told very much from the fictional Juliane's point of view, does undoubtedly privilege reformism over terrorism. (Of course, had it done the opposite it wouldn't have got made in the first place.) Especially problematic is the fact that, since all but one of the flashbacks concern the sisters' childhoods, we have no idea why Marianne joined Baader-Meinhof in the first place, nor do we learn anything about the group's ideology and its reasons for choosing the terrorist strategy. Given this lacuna one is almost bound to look for the explanation for Marianne's actions in the carefully delineated family circumstances in which she grew up, and to fall back on the psychoanalytic suggestion that "Marianne's blind devotion to her father, as against Juliane's resistance and identification with her mother, has made her susceptible to a new form of fanaticism." But, taken in association with Juliane's accusation that "a generation ago and you would have become a member of the Bund Deutscher Mädchen" (a sort of Nazi version of the Girl Guides), this simply suggests that certain family structures produce members who are attracted to terrorist organisations and that there is thus no real fundamental difference between Left and Right wing terrorist groups (see for example Gillian Becker's Hitler's Children, and Helm Stierlin's Family Terrorism and Public Terrorism). Radical politics, Left or Right, are reduced to rebellion against the authoritarian father, Juliane is a model of responsible, social-democratic oppositional politics, and Marianne epitomises fanatical, pathological rejectionism.

Whilst there is some truth in these charges, they don't entirely do the film justice. It's true that, whilst she is alive, Marianne frequently comes across as pretty unpleasant. But this impression is mitigated by the flashback scenes, especially those in which she watches film of the concentration camps or of American atrocities in Vietnam, in which we begin to understand what might lead a socially-conscious young woman down the path from protest to terrorism. Furthermore, there is a sense in which, as Ann Kaplan has suggested, "it is tempting to read Marianne as some kind of 'double' for Juliane—the repressed self that Juliane wanted to be." This is most evident in the Persona—like scene in prison in which, thanks to the glass screen between them and the way the scene is filmed, Juliane and Marianne seem to fuse together. But it's also there throughout the latter part of the film in which, suspecting murder, Juliane absorbs herself totally in re-enacting Marianne's death. She also thereby comes up against the real brutality of the German state, and gets an inkling of what confirmed Marianne in her hatred of and total opposition to it.

At the end of the film, Juliane takes in Marianne's son Jan, who had been fostered when she was on the run and then in prison. The fact that he has been badly burned by children who found out that he was a terrorist's son suggests a cyclical pattern, with parents' deeds being endlessly revisited on their children. On the other hand the fact that he asks to be told everything about his mother, having earlier ripped up her photograph, suggests that Jan will not reject his parents like Marianne rejected hers. However, as Kaplan notes: "The act locates what is important firmly in the realm of the interpersonal. The vision is bleak in terms of bringing about change in the public realm." In this she is echoing von Trotta herself: "Hope arises from the realisation that you have to find the way back to yourself. This is less of a rallying call than a pessimistic statement. Personally I see very few chances of exploding the power complex established by the alliance between economics and science and, above all, I see no movement on the present political horizon capable of achieving this."

—Julian Petley

THE BLOOD OF A POET

See LE SANG D'UN POÈTE

BLOOD OF THE BEASTS

See LE SANG DES BÊTES

BLOOD OF THE CONDOR

See YAWAR MALLKU

BLOW-UP

---

USA, 1966

Director: Michelangelo Antonioni

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Corp.; Metrocolor, 35mm; running time: 111 minutes; length: 9974 feet. Released December 1966, New York. Filmed during 1966 on location in London, and at MGM Studios, Boreham Wood.

Producer: Carlo Ponti; screenplay: Michelangelo Antonioni and Tonino Guerra, from a short story by Julio Cortazar; photography: Carlo di Palma; editor: Frank Clarke; sound: Robin Gregory; art director: Asheton Gorton; music: Herbie Hancock; costumes: Jocelyn Rickards; photographic murals: John Cowan.

Cast: David Hemmings (Thomas, the photographer); Vanessa Redgrave (Jane); Sarah Miles (Patricia); John Castle (Bill); Peter Bowles (Ron); Jane Birkin (Blonde); Gillian Hills (Brunette); Harry Hutchinson (Old Man); Verushka, Jill Kennington, Peggy Moffitt, Rosaleen Murray, Ann Norman, and Melanie Hampshire (Models); Julian Chagrin and Claude Chagrin (The Tennis Players).

Awards: Palme d'Or, Cannes Film Festival, 1967.

Publications

Script:

Antonioni, Michelangelo and Tonino Guerra, Blow-Up, Turin, 1968; New York, 1971.

Books:

Bernardini, Aldo, Michelangelo Antonioni de Gente del Po a "Blow-Up", Milan, 1967.

Sarris, Andrew, Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.

Cameron, Ian, and Robin Wood, Antonioni, New York, 1969.

Boyum, Joy, and Adrienne Scott, Film as Film: Critical Responses to Film Art, Boston, 1971.

Huss, Roy, editor, Focus on "Blow-Up", Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1971.

Bazin André, La Politique des auteurs: Entretiens avec Jean Renoir, etc., Paris, 1972; revised edition, 1984.

Samuels, Charles Thomas, Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.

Goldman, Annie, Cinéma et société moderne, Paris, 1974.

Prats, A. J., The Autonomous Image: Cinematic Narration and Humanism, Lexington, Kentucky, 1981.

Rifkin, Ned, Antonioni's Visual Language, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.

Barthes, Roland, and others, Michelangelo Antonioni, Munich, 1984.

Biarese, Cesare, and Aldo Tassone, I film di Michelangelo Antonioni, Rome, 1985.

Dervin, Daniel, Through a Freudian Lens Deeply: A Psychoanalysis of Cinema, Hillsdale, New Jersey, 1985.

Antonioni, Michelangelo, That Bowling Alley on the Tiber: Tales of a Director, Oxford, 1986.

Perry, Ted, and Rene Prieto, Michelangelo Antonioni: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1986.

Articles:

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 29 December 1966.

Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1967.

Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), January 1967.

Knight, Arthur, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1967.

Harrison, Carey, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1967.

Kozloff, Max, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1967.

Cocks, Jay, in Take One (Montreal), April 1967.

Bean, Robin, in Films and Filming (London), May 1967.

Clouzot, Claire, in Cinéma (Paris), May 1967.

Kinder, Marsha, "Antonioni in Transit," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1967.

Samuels, Charles, "Blow-Up: Sorting Things Out," in American Scholar (Washington, D.C.), Winter 1967–68.

Lefèvre, Raymond, in Image et Son (Paris), November 1967.

Slover, George, "Blow-Up: Medium, Message and Make-Believe," in Massachusetts Review, Autumn 1968.

Fernandez, Henry, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1968–69.

Corliss, Richard, "Still Legion, Still Decent?" in Commonweal (New York), 23 May 1969.

Gow, Gordon, "Antonioni Men," in Films and Filming (London), June 1970.

Hampton, Charles, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1970.

Hernacki, T., "Michelangelo Antonioni and the Imagery of Disintegration," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Autumn 1970.

Cohen, Hubert, "Re-Sorting Things Out," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1971.

D'Lugo, Marvin, "Signs and Meanings in Blow-Up: From Cortázar to Antonioni," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Winter 1975.

Palmer, W. J., "Blow-Up: The Game with No Balls," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1979.

Antonioni, Michelangelo, "Una intensa emozione che la troupe interrompe," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), June 1982.

Mátyás, G., "Az sltünt valóság nyomában," in Filmkultura (Budapest), March-April 1983.

Martin, R., "Quand le visible n'est plus seul visible," in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), Summer 1983.

Lee Francis, R., "Transcending Metaphor: Antonioni's 'Blow-Up,'" in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 13, no. 1, 1985.

Pressler, M., "Antonioni's Blow-Up: Myth, Order, and the Photographic Image," in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Fall 1985.

Harris, Thomas, "Rear Window and Blow-Up: Hitchcock's Straight Forwardness vs. Antonioni's Ambiguity," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 15, no. 1, 1987.

Hoberman, J., "After the Orgy," in Village Voice (New York), 3 December 1991.

Wagstaff, C., "Sexual Noise," in Sight and Sound (London), May 1992.

Tomasulo, F. P., "The Architectonics of Alienation: Antonioni's Edifice Complex," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), no. 3, 1993.

Savage, J., "Snapshots of the Sixties," in Sight and Sound (London), May 1993.

Bailey, E., and K. Hennessey, "Picture Perfect," in Movieline (Escondido, California), July 1993.

* * *

The plot of Michelangelo Antonioni's Blow-Up is easily summarized. A photographer, Thomas (David Hemmings), chances upon a couple in a secluded park. From concealment, he photographs their apparently romantic playfulness. When the girl (Vanessa Redgrave) seeks him out and demands the negatives, he refuses. Provoked by her insistence, he later scrutinizes the photographs. As he successively enlarges selected areas of the shots (the blow-ups of the title), he discovers evidence that she has been complicit in the murder of the man with whom she was seen. Before Thomas can decide what to do with the documentation, his studio is vandalized and the photographs are taken.

A superficial mystery story, the plot is not what interests Antonioni in Blow-Up. His concern is directed toward the interplay among philosophical concepts of reality, illusion, and appearance that manifest themselves through metaphors of photography, painting, and pantomime. For Antonioni in Blow-Up, as in many of his other films (most notably L'avventura and The Passenger), the narrative is a vehicle for the director's investigation of perception and interpretation.

London in the mid-1960s was the self-proclaimed capital of pop art; it boasted trends set by the Beatles, Twiggy, and Carnaby Street. It was chic, hip, and mod, filled with clashing colors and swinging youths. A technological advance in photographic equipment complemented this environment. Equipped with compact cameras that used faster film stock, photographers could snap their subjects rapidly and spontaneously. This liberation offered the photographer the potential of capturing life in its more candid and offhand aspects. The radical new concepts of photography that prevailed in the 1960s were thus characterized by an informal and unposed factual look at odds with the more obviously artificial photographic styles that had gone before.

Although the life-styles represented in Blow-Up may now seem dated, they did not, of course, account for Antonioni's attraction to the situation. In fashionable London, as recorded by the candid photography of the mid-1960s Antonioni found one of his most memorable metaphors. Blow-Up is a film about both a society decaying from within and a photograph's ability to record an instant of truth. Both of these factors affect the young and successful photographer who is at the center of both the film and his fashionable milieu.

The photographer, only rarely identified by name in the film, is uncommitted, hostile, indifferent. He is professionally successful and an expert photographer. He is in control of himself and situations only when he is armed with his camera; without it, he is at his weakest and most vulnerable. His uncertain sexuality is especially evident in the contemptuous manner in which he treats women, dominating and humiliating them while avoiding personal involvement. (The single exception to this is his non-sexual relationship with his neighbor's lover.) He is a model of duplicity: a voyeur, a deceiver, a performer. He is, for Antonioni, the Everyman of the disaffected generation: obsessed with surfaces, but blind to the inner value of people and deeper meaning of the events he so skillfully and energetically records with his camera.

The character of the photographer is of central interest to Antonioni in Blow-Up because it is Thomas's transformation that provides the essential meaning of the film. The ambiguities of reality, illusion, and appearance are ever-present but ignored by the photographer and his generation, and the photographer—against his will—is forced to confront this mystery, a mystery more perplexing and shattering than the murder he believes he has documented. The process by which the insulated self-confident, self-seeking, self-indulgent, self-absorbed photographer (so typical of his time) is changed by a set of circumstances he neither comprehends nor controls is examined by Antonioni with the skill and care of a surgeon. The photographer's casual assumptions are discredited and his values are toppled. He is a different person at the end of the film than he was at the beginning.

The photographer's transformation, in this ambiguous world where it is so difficult to distinguish reality from illusion, is realized through the act of seeing. In Blow-Up, seeing is explored on three levels; camera sight, revealed in photographs; imaginary sight, represented by paintings and the mime troupe; and ocular sight, which moves freely but uneasily between them. The concept of seeing is emphasized through a deemphasis of verbal expression. Blow-Up communicates on an almost completely visual level; nothing more than implied significance is verbalized. For such an obviously searching film, it is indeed unusual that there are no metaphysical discussions, no intimate exchanges, no analytical speculations. The dialogue track, divorced from the image track, exposes the extraneous or frivolous words that are used between the interacting participants.

This attention to the visual dimensions of perception underscores the subtext represented by the mime troupe. If words are indeed superficial to the photographer, they are totally superfluous to (and consequently discarded by) the mimes. The mimes are presented to us as a framing device—they open and close the film. At the beginning, they are seen gadding about the bustling streets panhandling; at the end, the same troupe engages in a mock tennis match. At the beginning, the photographer simply finds them a momentary amusement; by the ending, however, he actually shares their experience. It is, in fact, the mime troupe that serves as the spiritual barometer by which we measure the photographer's transformation. The act of miming is crucial for Antonioni and Blow-Up because it is the mime who brings our attention to objects by their absence. For the mime, the imaginary tennis ball is every bit as "real" as the evidential photograph is "illusory."

It is of course, significant that the tennis match takes place at the end. It is less a conclusion than a speculation. The photographer, an outer-directed man in the beginning, would never have retrieved the tennis ball and thrown it back at the outset of the film. He is only able to perform this act of assistance to the players because of what has happened to him in the interim. However, Antonioni does not have him abandon his camera as he fetches the ball; rather, he carries it with him. What the photographer has learned is that the camera and the tennis ball can (and do) exist in the same plane of perception—reality, illusion and appearance do not fall into neat and convenient categories.

The rejection of categories is given the final placement in Blow-Up. The blow-ups of the murder incident are visually related by Antonioni to the abstract design of his neighbor's paintings—the grain of the photographic enlargements bear an uncanny resemblance to the color dots on the painter's canvas. Antonioni underscores this motif when, in the film's final shot, the photographer is left as isolated and indistinct as the microcosmic emulsion grains he has enlarged. Antonioni masterfully frames him in the composition of this shot to resemble a visual element in one of his own blow-ups.

As a consequence of his spiritual awakening, the photographer is a different person. His slumbering world of possessions and exploitations have been dislodged. By the film's final shot, he is awake to the dualities and complexities of life, and, ironically, that wakefulness isolates him. He can no longer return to the blind-sighted comfort of his complacent and gluttonous life; he can no longer use his camera or look at photographs in quite the same way as before.

—Stephen E. Bowles

THE BLUE ANGEL

See DER BLAUE ENGEL

THE BLUE EYES OF YONTA

See Udju Azul di Yonta

THE BLUE KITE

See LAN FENGZHENG

THE BLUE LAMP

UK, 1949

Director: Basil Dearden

Production: Ealing Studios, a Michael Balcon Production; black and white; running time: 84 minutes. Released January 1950.

Associate Producer: Michael Relph; script: T. E. B. Clarke; additional dialogue: Alexander Mackendrick; original treatment: Jan Read and Ted Willis; photography: Gordon Dines; 2nd unit photography: Lionel Banes; editor: Peter Tanner; art director: Jim Morahan; musical director: Ernest Irving.

Cast: Jack Warner (P.C. Dixon); Jimmy Hanley (P.C. Mitchell); Meredith Edwards (P.C. Hughes); Robert Flemyng (Sergeant Roberts); Bernard Lee (Divisional Detective Inspector Cherry); Dirk Bogarde (Tom Riley); Patric Doonan (Spud); Peggy Evans (Diana Lewis); Gladys Henson (Mrs. Dixon); Dora Bryan (Maisie); Betty Ann Davies (Mrs. Lewis).

Awards: British Academy Award for Best Film, 1950.

Publications

Books:

Balcon, Michael, Michael Balcon Presents: A Lifetime of Films, London, 1969.

Clarke, T. E. B., This Is Where I Came In, London, 1974.

Warner, Jack, Jack of All Trades: An Autobiography, London, 1975.

Barr, Charles, Ealing Studios, London, 1977.

Perry, George, Forever Ealing, London, 1981.

Articles:

Kine Weekly (London), 12 January 1950.

“G.L.,” in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January–February 1950.

Sight and Sound (London), April 1950.

Motion Picture Herald (New York), 3 April 1950.

Dickinson, Thorold, “The Work of Sir Michael Balcon at Ealing Studios,” in The Year’s Work in the Film 1950, edited by Roger Manvell, London, 1951.

Ellis, John, “Made in Ealing,” in Screen (London), Spring 1975.

Medhurst, Andy, “Dirk Bogarde,” in All Our Yesterdays, edited by Charles Barr, London, 1986.

Aachen, G., “The Blue Lamp,” in Reid’s Film Index (New South Wales, Australia), no. 30, 1997.

* * *

Charles Barr, in his definitive Ealing Studios, locates The Blue Lamp at the centre of the studio’s post-war work, noting the collaboration of the writer T. E. B. Clarke, who had such an enormous impact on the comedy cycle, with the director Basil Dearden, who specialised in social dramas. Like many of the most interesting Ealing films, The Blue Lamp revolves around the confrontation of two worlds, two models of society: the stable and steady community of ordinary people, the stuff of the nation, and the hysterical and anti-social outsiders, who threaten to destroy the community, and whose threat must therefore be contained.

In this particular case, the nation is embodied in the community of a local police station and its wider social network, which itself finds its most sublime expression in the domestic family life of one of the policemen, P.C. Dixon. Stability is established through the mundane routines of police work, and their communal social activities when off duty, the individual thoroughly subsumed into the collective. The threat comes from Riley (played by a young and gaunt Dirk Bogarde), his girlfriend, and his partner in crime, the three of them identified in a documentary-like voice-over as typical of a new post-war phenomenon, immature, improperly socialised juvenile delinquents, extreme cases, shunned by the rest of society, even by “professional criminals!”

Barr’s excellent analysis of the film sees it as a profound celebration of the values of the community: sobriety, emotional understatement, social responsibility, patrician authority, etc. But it is possible to see it also as a rather desperate attempt to restore faith in a crumbling national ideology which had found its most secure expression during the war. The film thus works to contain the emergent relatively autonomous youth culture, struggling to escape from the oppressive certainties and stifling over-protection of community life and to express the desires which it represses. Thus, where Mitchell, the young recruit to the police, comes to respect and take advice from his elders, and so becomes “one of the family,” Riley refuses any advice. He is situated outside the community—and unable to establish his own community, unable to work as a group with his partners, continually arguing with them in an aggressively masculine way (at one stage, as he taunts his girlfriend, he fondles his gun; by contrast, the police seem almost maternal). This particular image of youth is eventually positively valued and narratively centralised a decade later, in films like Saturday Night and Sunday Morning, by which time television had taken over the function of articulating the principles of the national community in soap operas like Coronation Street and cop series like the equally long-running Dixon of Dock Green, featuring the same P.C. Dixon, still played by Jack Warner (even though he had been murdered half-way through The Blue Lamp!).

The Blue Lamp

The Blue Lamp also makes an interesting comparison with Hitchcock's crime thriller Blackmail, made some 20 years earlier, which also represents police work as routine, and the police force as a tight-knit community. But Hitchcock establishes this mundane picture of everyday life in order to subvert and unbalance it, and so to involve the spectator emotionally. As in The Blue Lamp, unconscious, repressed forces are released into the world of the everyday. But in Blackmail, the effect is to challenge the very premises of the everyday and its apparent securities and certainties. The Blue Lamp, on the other hand, establishes the ordinary in order to strengthen its moral and ideological force and the safety of routine, not to challenge it. The film thus struggles to contain disruption and reassert the ordinary: its final images neither testify to a fantastic wish-fulfilment (on the contrary, they return full-circle to the beginning, showing how the community effortlessly reproduces itself, and takes all traumas in its stride), nor leave us with Blackmail's lingering, disturbing sense of guilt, and of the proximity of an underlying chaos, a turbulent world where anything can happen.

But The Blue Lamp cannot quite so easily contain the threats, since they are visually and narratively so much more exciting for the spectator. In effect, the film interweaves two different modes of representation. On the one hand, there is the mode of social drama, heavily influenced by the documentary-realist tradition, with a characteristically loose, relatively non-dynamic, and episodic narrative, its multiplication of dramas held in check by the limits of the community. On the other hand, embedded within and foreclosed by the former, there is the much more narratively dynamic, tightly causal, uni-linear thriller, with a very different style of lighting, framing, performance, and action reminiscent of film noir: a style which eroticises the body, and vicariously engages the spectator in the pleasures of suspense and uncertainty.

—Andrew Higson

BLUE VELVET

USA, 1986

Director: David Lynch

Production: De Laurentiis Entertainment Group; color; Dolby sound; running time: 120 minutes. Released September 1986.

Executive producer: Richard Roth; screenplay: David Lynch; assistant directors: Ellen Rauch, Ian Woolf; photography: Frederick Elmes; assistant photographer: Lex Dupont; editor: Duwayne Dunham; sound design: Alan Splet; sound recordist: Ann Kroeber; production designer: Patricia Norris; music director: Angelo Badalamenti; special effects: Greg Hull, George Hill; stunt coordinator: Richard Langdon.

Cast: Kyle MacLachlan (Jeffrey Beaumont); Isabella Rossellini (Dorothy Vallens); Dennis Hopper (Frank Booth); Laura Dern (Sandy Williams); Hope Lange (Mrs. Williams); Dean Stockwell (Ben); George Dickerson (Detective Williams); Priscilla Pointer (Mrs. Beaumont); Frances Bay (Aunt Barbara); Jack Harvey (Tom Beaumont); Ken Stovitz (Mike); Brad Dourif (Raymond); Jack Nance (Paul); J. Michael Hunter (Hunter); Dick Green (Don Vallens); Fred Pickler (Yellow Man); Philip Markert (Dr. Gynde); Leonard Watkins and Moses Gibson (Double Ed); Selden Smith (Nurse Cindy); Peter Carew (Coroner); Jon Jon Snipes (Little Donny).

Blue Velvet

Awards: National Society of Film Critics Award for Best Film, Best Director, Best Supporting Actor (Hopper), Best Cinematography.

Publications

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 3 September 1986.
- Chute, D., "Out to Lynch," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1986.
- Magid, Ron, "Blue Velvet—Small Town Horror Tale," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), November 1986.
- Corliss, Richard, in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1986.
- Sight and Sound* (London), Winter 1986–87.
- Interview with Lynch, in Ecran Fantastique (Paris), January 1987.
- Chion, Michel, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1987.
- Routt, Bill, and Diane Routt, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne, Australia), March 1987.
- Sutton, Martin, in Films and Filming (London), March 1987.
- Ledel, Michael, in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), March-April 1987.
- Jenkins, Steve, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1987.
- Borden, Lizzie, and Angela Carter, in City Limits (London), 9 April 1987.
- Film Quarterly* (Beverly Hills), Fall 1987.
- Jaehne, Karen, and Laurent Bouzereau, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 15, no. 3, 1987.
- Literature/Film Quarterly* (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 16, no. 2, 1988.
- Maxfield, J. F., "'Now It's Dark': The Child's Dream in Blue Velvet," in Post Script (Commerce, Texas), no. 3, 1989.
- Lindroth, J., "Down the Yellow Brick Road: Two Dorothys and the Journey of Initiation in Dream and Nightmare," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 18, no. 3, 1990.
- Pellow, C. K., "Blue Velvet Once More," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 18, no. 3, 1990.
- Preston, J. L., "Dantean Imagery in Blue Velvet," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 18, no. 3, 1990.
- Woodward, R. B., "A Dark Lens on America," in New York Times, 14 January 1990.
- Spillman, Susan, "A Director Both Sublime and Surreal," in USA Today (Arlington, Virginia), 17 August 1990.
- Breskin, David, interview with Lynch, in Rolling Stone (New York), 6 September 1990.
- Aydemir, M., "Nogmaals David Lynch," in Skrien (Amsterdam), April-May 1991.
- Jorholt, E., "I erotikkens vold," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Spring 1991.
- Gyorgy, P., "Szenvedely es eroszak," in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 5, 1991.
- Hampton, H., "David Lynch's Secret History of the United States," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1993.
- Layton, Lynne, "Blue Velvet: A Parable of Male Development," Screen (Oxford), vol. 35, no. 4, Winter 1994.
- Younger, R., "Song in Contemporary Film Noir," Films in Review (Denville, New Jersey), vol. 45, no. 7–8, July-August, 1994.

* * *

With Blue Velvet, David Lynch's career at last picked up where his stunning, unique debut feature Eraserhead seemed to leave off. In his Victorian gothic docu-drama The Elephant Man and sci-fi spectacular Dune—respectively a surprising critical and commercial success, and an expensive fiasco—Lynch was incorporating elements from the highly distinctive style he had established in only one feature. In Blue Velvet, he returns, albeit in gloriously saturated colour rather than expressionist monochrome, to the fractured vision of small-town normality of Eraserhead. The film's opening sequence is incredibly lush, suggestive and unsettling: As Bobby Vinton's subtly fetishist title song plays, the camera tracks from a striking red, white and blue shot of blood-roses against a pristine white picket fence against an unnaturally clear sky to a deliriously idyllic, slow-motion vision of an idyllic small town that would have done Andy Hardy or Judy Garland proud. A fire engine rolls by, the firemen waving cheerfully, a lollipop man safeguards innocent schoolchildren, an adorable dog scampers, and a proud homeowner waters his garden. But the gardener is struck with a seizure and collapses, entangled in his hose and snapped at by the dog, and Lynch takes in his camera in for a closer view and penetrates the thick grass of the garden to find a teeming, ravenous, carnivorous, cannibalistic and physically revolting horde of insects chewing away at the underside of Norman Rockwell's America.

Essentially, the rest of the film follows up this opening sequence as Jeffrey Beaumont (Kyle MacLachlan, held over from and making up for his performance in Dune), a college student home because of his father's heart attack, gets involved in a local mystery and is exposed to the horrors that lurk underneath the Eisenhower-style perfection—it is impossible to tell whether the film is set in the 1950s, the 1960s or the 1980s—of Lumberton, U.S.A. Jeffrey first suspects something is amiss when walking to the house where he grew up after visiting his trussed-up father in hospital, he discovers a severed human ear in a vacant lot. The ear, naturally, is crawling with ants and Lynch later, in an awe-inspiring effect, has Frederick Elmes's camera explore its interior as Alan Splet's unsettling sound effects track suggests a universe inside the head as twisted and bizarre as those of Eraserhead or Dune. With the aid of Laura Dern's Sandy Williams, the daughter of the kindly local cop, Jeffrey plumbs into the mystery which revolves around Dorothy Vallens (Isabella Rossellini), a melancholy nightclub singer known as "The Blue Lady," and Frank Booth (Dennis Hopper), a frighteningly fiend-like and primal gangster who snorts gas through an insect-like mask, speaks only in the most basic terms ("baby wants to fuck!") and forces Dorothy to have animalistic sex with him (Splet turns his orgasmic cries into the roar of a wild beast) by threatening to further torture her kidnapped husband, the owner of the ear.

"I don't know whether you're a detective or a pervert," Sandy tells Jeffrey when he proposes to trespass in Dorothy's apartment in search of clues, and when he finds himself in her closet as she undresses or is sexually humiliated by Frank the distinction vanishes completely. The most disturbing aspect of Blue Velvet is that it refuses to let its Nancy Drew and the Hardy Boys-style hero and heroine off the hook as Jeffrey becomes less an observer and more a participant in the sordid, insectile nightlife of Lumberton, overcoming his resistance to hitting Dorothy as she begs him to when they have sex, being dragged out on a wild ride with Frank, and standing around while Frank's associate Ben (Dean Stockwell), who resembles a kabuki homosexual and is referred to as "one suave fuck," mimes to Roy Orbison's "In Dreams," the song that Frank later plays as he brutally beats Jeffrey up. One of the surprises of the film is that the thriller-whodunnit plot does eventually add up, although not before the nightmarish has thoroughly invaded Jeffrey's world with the appearance of a bruised and naked Dorothy on Sandy's front lawn and a final confrontation with Frank in an apartment that contains a still-standing, still-twitching corpse. By the time of the coda, which replicates the opening sequence, in which all the proprieties are restored—Frank is dead, a mechanical robin is eating the insects, the ear probed by the camera is Jeffrey's and still attached to his head, families are united—the all-pervasive horrors have been so effectively summoned that we know they can never really be vanquished. As a character remarks early on, "It's a strange world, isn't it?"

—Kim Newman

THE BOAT

See DAS BOOT

BONDS THAT CHAFE

See EROTIKON

BONNIE AND CLYDE

USA, 1967

Director: Arthur Penn

Production: Tatira-Hiller; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 111 minutes. Released August 1967. Filmed during 1967 on location in Texas.

Producer: Warren Beatty; screenplay: David Newman and Robert Benton; photography: Burnett Guffey; editor: Dede Allen; sound: Francis E. Stahl; art director: Dean Tavoularis; set decoration: Raymond Paul; music: Charles Strouse, theme "Foggy Mountain Breakdown" by Lester Flatt and Earl Scruggs; special effects: Danny Lee; costumes: Theodora Van Runkle; consultant: Robert Towne.

Cast: Warren Beatty (Clyde Barrow); Faye Dunaway (Bonnie Parker); Gene Hackman (Buck Barrow); Estelle Parsons (Blanche); Michael J. Pollard (C. W. Moss); Dub Taylor (Ivan Moss); Denver Pyle (Frank Hamer); Evans Evans (Velma Davis); Gene Wilder (Eugene Grizzard).

Awards: Oscars for Best Supporting Actress (Parsons) and Best Cinematography, 1967; New York Film Critics Award, Best Screenwriting, 1967.

Publications

Script:

Newman, David, and Robert Benton, Bonnie and Clyde, in The Bonnie and Clyde Book, edited by Sandra Wake and Nicola Hayden, New York, 1972.

Penn, Arthur, Bonnie and Clyde, New York, 1988.

Books:

- Gelman, B., and R. Lackman, The Bonnie and Clyde Scrapbook, New York, 1967.
- Wood, Robin, Arthur Penn, New York, 1969.
- Rubin, Martin, and Eric Sherman, The Director's Event, New York, 1970.
- Pechter, William S., 24 Times a Second, New York, 1971.
- Cawelti, John G., editor, Focus on "Bonnie and Clyde," Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1973.
- Shadoin, Jack, Dreams and Dead Ends: The American Gangster/ Crime Film, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1977.
- Murray, Edward, 10 Film Classics, New York, 1978.
- Kolker, Robert Phillip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.
- Zuker, Joel A., Arthur Penn: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1980.
- Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
- Cagin, Seth, and Philip Dray, Hollywood Films of the 1970s: Sex, Drugs, Violence, Rock 'n' Roll, and Politics, New York, 1984.
- Haustrate, Gaston, Arthur Penn, Paris, 1986.
- Thomson, David, Warren Beatty: A Life and a Story, London, 1987.
- Friedman, Lester D., Bonnie and Clyde, London, 1999.
- Friedman, Lester D., editor, Arthur Penn's Bonnie and Clyde, Cambridge, 1999.

Articles:

- Lightman, Herb, "Raw Cinematic Realism in the Photography of Bonnie and Clyde," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), April 1967.
- Gulshanok, Paul, in Cineaste (New York), Fall 1967.
- Alpert, Hollis, in Saturday Review (New York), 5 August 1967.
- Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 14 August 1967.
- Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 24 August 1967.
- Rhode, Eric, "A Middle Western," in Listener (London), 14 September 1967.
- Kael, Pauline, in Saturday Review (New York), 21 October 1967.
- Ciment, Michel, "Montréal 1967, le règne de l'image," in Positif (Paris), November 1967.
- Penn, Arthur, in Positif (Paris), November 1967.
- Geduld, Carolyn, "Bonnie and Clyde: Society vs. the Clan," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1967–68.
- Johnson, Albert, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1967–68.
- Macklin, Anthony, "Bonnie and Clyde: Beyond Violence to Tragedy," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1967–68.
- Kauffman, Stanley, in New American Review (Cranford, New Jersey), January 1968.
- Benayoun, Robert, in Positif (Paris), March 1968.
- Laura, Ernesto G., in Bianco e Nero (Rome), March-April 1968.
- Chevalier, Jacques, in Image et Son (Paris), April 1968.
- Samuels, Charles T., in Hudson Review (Nutley, New Jersey), Spring 1968.
- Comolli, Jean-Louis, and André S. Labarthe, "Bonnie and Clyde: An Interview with Arthur Penn," in Evergreen Review (New York), June 1968.
- Brode, Douglas, "Reflections on the Tradition of the Western," in Cineaste (New York), Fall 1968.
- Farber, Stephen, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1968.

- Comuzio, Ermanno, "Gangster Story," in Cineforum (Bergamo), September 1968.
- Penn, Arthur, in Cineforum (Bergamo), September 1968.
- Free, William J., "Aesthetic and Moral Value in Bonnie and Clyde," in Quarterly Journal of Speech (Fall's Church, Virginia), October 1968.
- Lawson, John Howard, "Our Film and Theirs: Grapes of Wrath and Bonnie and Clyde," in American Dialogue (New York), Winter 1968–69.
- Cook, Jim, in Screen (London), July-August 1969.
- Gould Boyum, Joy, and Adrienne Scott, in Films as Film: Critical Responses to Film Art, Boston, 1971.
- Kinder, Marsha, and Beverle Houston, in Close-up: A Critical Perspective on Film, New York, 1972.
- Cawelti, John, "Bonnie and Clyde Revisited," in Focus! (Chicago), Spring 1972 and Autumn 1972.
- Childs, James "Closet Outlaws," in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1973.
- Corliss, Richard, in Talking Pictures: Screenwriters in the American Cinema, New York, 1975.
- Yacowar, Maurice, "Dick, Jane, Rocky and T. S. Eliot," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Bowling Green, Ohio), Winter 1977.
- Corliss, Richard, "The Hollywood Screenwriter, Take 2," in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1978.
- Eorsi, I., "Veszelyes egyensuly: Penn: Bonnie and Clyde," in Filmkultura (Budapest), March-April 1979.
- Leroux, A., interview with Arthur Penn, in 24 Images (Montreal), June 1983.
- Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 18 July 1985.
- Pym, J., "Black Hat Yellow Hat," in Sight and Sound (London), no. 4, 1990.
- Wilmington, Michael, "Road Warriors: Outlaw Lovers on the Run," in Chicago Tribune, 28 August 1994.
- Miller, Joyce, "From Bonnie and Clyde to Thelma and Louise: The Struggle for Justice in the Cinematic South," in Studies in Popular Culture (Murfreesboro, Tennessee), vol. 19, no. 2, October 1996.

* * *

To speak of Arthur Penn is to address the question of what might be termed, somewhat paradoxically, the "post-classical" American cinema. On the one hand Penn belongs with that group of post-World War II directors which came to cinema from the stage and from the early days of television—people like Nicholas Ray, Sam Peckinpah, Franklin Schaffner, Martin Ritt, and Joseph Losey. In that respect Penn is indeed an inheritor of the traditions and forms of the classical Hollywood cinema, the Western (The Left Handed Gun), the biography picture (The Miracle Worker), the gangster/detective film (Night Moves), etc. Perhaps Penn's loyalty to Hollywood tradition is most clearly seen in his frequent reliance upon the star system to infuse his films with certain qualities of intensity and resonance—Dustin Hoffman's performance in Little Big Man and Marlon Brando's and Jack Nicholson's in The Missouri Breaks stand out in this regard. Yet on the other hand Penn is also frequently associated with the more overtly intellectual traditions of the European art film, especially those of the French New Wave films of the early 1960s. Penn's Mickey One, for example, is frequently discussed in such "art film" terms. But arguably it was with Bonnie and Clyde that Penn's special status as a post-classical director was most forcefully asserted and confirmed.

In her classic essay on the film, Pauline Kael situates Bonnie and Clyde's place in American film history by reference primarily to Fritz Lang's You Only Live Once, itself a version of the Bonnie and Clyde story, and to Frank Capra's It Happened One Night. Kael's essay was written in reply to those who saw Bonnie and Clyde as a glorification of violence as personified in the actions of Warren Beatty's Clyde Barrow and Faye Dunaway's Bonnie Parker, and Kael quite rightly points out that "Bonnie and Clyde are presented not as mean and sadistic, [but] as having killed only when cornered." Indeed, most of the film's explicitly graphic violence is directed not at society but rather at the members of the Barrow gang. This is especially clear in the film's last two ambush scenes, the first of which concludes with Buck Barrow's death throes and Blanche Barrow's agonized screams, the last of which sees Bonnie and Clyde riddled with machine gun fire. Kael's larger point, however, involves the particularly American theme of innocence at hazard and on the run, which makes Lang's melodrama and Capra's screwball comedy spiritual ancestors of Penn's alternately comic and tragic parable of the outlaw couple. The central characters in all three films long mightily, often awkwardly, to realize aspirations of spiritual and social stature. But in Lang and Penn society provides no real outlet or model for the realization of such dreams. And even in Capra it takes an act of theft (like Bonnie and Clyde, Gable and Colbert literally steal a car at one point; Ellie's father has a "getaway" car standing by during the wedding ceremony) to ensure the dream's survival.

In terms of its story, then, Bonnie and Clyde is quite properly considered a classical Hollywood film. But this story of Bonnie and Clyde is mediated by or through a very self-conscious form of visual discourse; hence the critical commonplace of Penn's indebtedness to the generically-derived film of Truffaut and Godard. Partly this self-consciousness is seen within the film's depicted world: Bonnie writes her own legend in doggerel verse throughout the film, and she and Clyde both willingly pose for Buck Barrow's Kodak. Or consider the moment after the first killing, after the scene in the movie theatre, when Bonnie dances in front of her motel room mirror while singing "We're In The Money," as if she were herself a character in a film, La Cava's Golddiggers of 1933 perhaps. The limited self-consciousness of Penn's characters is set in thematic context by the more inclusive self-consciousness of the film's discourse. For both the characters and the director, it's a matter of images—of living up to them, of taking responsibility for them.

Perhaps the greatest irony in Bonnie and Clyde is the degree to which the characters drift into big-time crime, without real premeditation. Clyde's first hold-up is undertaken in response to Bonnie's sexually loaded dare. And the first bank job—from which all else follows inexorably—evolves from a similarly innocent responsiveness on Clyde's part. He and Bonnie are taking target practice when a farmer and his family pull up in their truck to take a final look at their repossessed farm. Out of sympathy Clyde puts a slug into the Midlothian State Bank's "No Trespassing" sign. Clyde offers the gun to the farmer and to his black field hand. As the farmer turns to leave, Clyde says, almost hesitantly though somewhat boastfully, as if to cement the bond between them, "we rob banks." He hasn't robbed one yet—but now he is committed to trying; though the first bank he tries is empty both of money and customers. More significantly, in wanting to live up to his "bank robber" image, Clyde unknowingly begins the progress of his own entrapment, an entrapment made chillingly clear in Penn's images. As Clyde steps through the door, gun drawn, Penn frames him through the teller's cage. Perhaps Clyde thinks of the holdup as an expression of his own freedom from restraint; but Penn's framing of him within the constriction of the teller's cage and through its bars shows how wrong Clyde is. This motif of freedom delimited and constrained is elaborately developed through the course of the film via a whole range of internal frames—windows, mirrors, doors, car windows, etc.

Implicit in Penn's framing is the question of responsibility—of Clyde's for stepping into the frame, of Penn's (and ours) for standing on the other side and choosing to see him framed. The film's self-awareness is most clearly evident in the way it critiques the camera, as if our need to see Bonnie and Clyde as images of a freedom we both envy and fear were very directly responsible for their deaths. "Shooting" with a gun and "shooting" with a camera are explicitly equated in the sequence with Texas Ranger Hamer, where Bonnie proposes to humiliate Hamer by taking his picture ("He'll wish he were dead," as Buck puts it). In the credit sequence, moreover, Penn's name is immediately preceded by a snapshot of three riflemen kneeling, as if he (the camera) were a gunman. And in the final ambush sequence we see Bonnie and Clyde's agonized death from a vantage point almost identical to that of Hamer and his deputies, from across the road, as if we, like Penn, were "shooting" the scene. No wonder the film was condemned; who wants to take that kind of responsibility? Arthur Penn, for one.

—Leland Poague

DAS BOOT

(The Boat)

Germany, 1981

Director: Wolfgang Petersen

Production: Bavaria Atelier, Radiant Film; Fuji colour, 35mm; running time: 149 minutes. Originally a television miniseries shown in 5 parts; shortened version released theatrically.

Producer: Günter Rohrbach; co-producer: Michael Bittins; screenplay: Wolfgang Petersen, from the novel by Lothar-Günther Buchheim; photography: Jost Vacano; editor: Hannes Nikel; assistant directors: George Borgel, Maria-Antoinette Petersen; production design: Rolf Zehetbauer; art director: Gøtz Weidner; music: Klaus Doldinger; sound editing: Mike Le Mare, Eva Claudius, Illo Endrulat; sound recording: Milan Bor, Trevor Pyke, Werner Bohm, Heinz Schurer, Karsten Ullrich, Stanislav Litera, Albrecht von Bethmann; costumes: Monika Bauert.

Cast: Jürgen Prochnow (The Captain); Herbert Gronemeyer (Lieutenant Werner); Klaus Wennemann (Chief Engineer); Hubertus Bengsch (1st Lieutenant); Martin Semmelrogge (2nd Lieutenant); Bernd Tauber (Chief Quartermaster); Erwin Leder (Johann); Martin May (Ullman); Heinz Honig (Heinrich); U. A. Ochsen (Chief Bosun);

Das Boot

Claude-Olivier Rudolph (Ario); Jan Fedder (Pilgrim); Ralph Richter (Frenssen); Joachim Bernhard (Preacher); Oliver Stritzel (Schwalle).

Publications

Books:

Buccheim, Lothar-Günther, Der Film—Das Boot—Ein Journal, Munich, 1981.

Articles:

New York, 15 February 1982.

Ciampi, Valeria, "El último submarino," in Casablanca, no. 13, January 1982.

Grelier, R., Image et Son (Paris), March 1982.

Lardeau, Y., "La Qualité allemande," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1982.

Gartenberg, J., Films in Review (New York), April 1982.

Combs, R., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1982.

Spratt, M., Films and Filming (London), May 1982.

Girard, M., Séquences (Montreal), July 1982.

American Cinematographer (New York), December 1982.

Grab, Norbert, "In the Line of Light: Der Fernseh-un Filmregisseur Wolfgang Petersen," in EPD Film (Frankfurt-am-Main), vol. 13, no. 6, June 1996.

Oppenheimer, J., "Salvaging Das Boot," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 78, May 1997.

* * *

Das Boot is a landmark in German cinema: it is the most expensive (at $2 million) and the most popular (at home and abroad) German film ever made; it was nominated for five Academy Awards; it has proven the most successful foreign-language film release in the United States; and it has managed to capture a certain heroism for a most unheroic period in German history.

The film closely follows a novel of the same title by Lothar-Günther Buchheim, a submariner on a U-Boat in World War II who wrote the novel more than 30 years later (1973), metamorphosing grim and unsung war time experience into much-praised artistic prose and heroic action sequences. A shift in perspective changes our view of the sailors themselves, from sneak-attack killers in the despised service of a beaten dictatorship to a heroic brotherhood itself victimized by Nazis. The film begins with the stark announcement that 30,000 of the 40,000 German submariners in World War II failed to return home. Rather than the shadowy wolf-pack preying on unarmed civilian freighters, the sailors become victims themselves, cogs in a war machine, who retain an admirable humanity in spite of hopeless circumstances.

The film thus announces that it is time to see an important element of the German wartime experience through new eyes. This revisionism is accomplished, ironically, by revitalizing and humanizing the clichéd post-war Nuremberg defence, “I was just following orders.” The crew of Unterseeboot-96 are doing just that, facing near certain death with a stalwart humanity that refutes their Allied reputation as killers and attempts to repudiate their connection with Nazism.

The creation of sympathy begins early, with an extended opening sequence in a brothel. One of the few scenes set on shore, the pre-mission officers’ celebration begins with some decorum but quickly descends into revolting decadence, including officers passed out in vomit in a filthy men’s room and taking drunken pistol shots into the ceiling. Jürgen Prochnow (the 30-year-old captain, “Die Alte” or “Old Man” to his men) looks on with war-wise sympathy, noting his men’s fear and innocence as the British learn to sink U-boats. Prochnow’s fellow captain and friend, Thomsen, mocks Hitler’s leadership in a speech that temporarily quiets the room, drawing glares from the few Nazi sympathizers in attendance. The message is clear: the private selves of these submariners are racked by despair over their hopeless prospects, prospects created by an incompetent, increasingly intrusive, and completely uncaring leadership. These are truly good Germans, unlike the self-convinced, righteous robots of the new generation of Nazis.

Once set up, this message is continually repeated. Prochnow’s “speech” to his men before shipping out is vintage Gary Cooper: “Well men—all set? Harbour stations!” The taciturn captain has no patience with the grandiloquent rhetoric of Nazi romanticizers of war, and runs a ship that is egalitarian and almost completely lacking in military ceremony. Though uncompromising about the need for competence and procedure in reports and duties, the captain is contemptuous of his spit-and-polish Nazi First Officer, who persists in wearing a uniform rather than the worn sweaters favoured by the other officers. Prochnow is filmed unshaven and then in dishevelled beard, asleep, slumped over controls. The ship itself is similarly domesticated, made gemütlich by strings of sausages hanging from the overhead pipes, loaves of bread cluttering the controls, and crates of lettuce in the torpedo room. A comic scene shows Prochnow’s flexibility in the face of mortal danger and Nazi humourlessness: he leads a full-crew sing-along of “It’s a Long Way to Tipperary,” the British marching song, in English—an ironic challenge to his enemies, foreign and domestic.

Throughout, the film, the wolf-pack image of the U-boat crew is tamed through sympathetic touches. Some of the sailors are pathetically young; one has a pregnant French girlfriend who will suffer retribution alone since his daily letters are impossible to mail. The ultimate leaders of the enterprise are systematically undercut: as when a fly crawls over a shipboard photograph of a German admiral. After weeks at sea, the U-96 finally sinks some ships in a convoy, only to surface and see drowning British sailors, a close encounter with a suffering enemy which fills the conning tower crew with horror. When given an absurd order to pass through the enemy-held Straits of Gibraltar, the captain tries to put the First Officer and the journalist ashore, only to encounter arrogant and smug Nazi sympathizers—men totally insensitive to the frightening experiences of the submariners. The captain shares the terrors of depth charge attacks and a likely prolonged death by suffocation that outsiders don’t understand and don’t care to. The grimness of shipboard conditions, the nearness of death, the existential pushing on under hopeless prospects are universals that bridge nationalistic differences.

The sympathetic power of Das Boot and the exhilaration of its chase scenes are so great that it is easy to forget that such submariners systematically sent scores of unarmed freighters to the bottom of the sea, condemning helpless civilians to death by drowning, hypothermia, or worse: the aptly-named wolf-packs pulled down the slow, the crippled, the unwary, in acts that had more in common with execution than with warfare. Das Boot shows us a later period when the war was going badly for the service and Allied technology made what had previously been easy slaughter a fair fight. We see the U-boats made vulnerable, and the “cruelty and magnificence” that had initially intoxicated the journalist observer, Lt. Werner (author Buchheim), replaced by the grim reality of defeat.

The film is a splendid revision of the record to highlight an undeniable historical fact: the submariners were also victims in this period, and deserve respect for clinging to what decencies and humanity were left to them. The film is honest on this point, and though it loses the aesthetic brilliance of the novel’s prose—it would take cinematography of unparalleled virtuosity to capture it, a task impossible with model submarines in a studio tank—it effectively captures the texture of life in extremis, the true brotherhood sustained by a common front against despair and terror, and the unutterable sadness of war.

—Andrew and Gina Macdonald

LE BOUCHER

(The Butcher)

France-Italy, 1969

Director: Claude Chabrol

Production: Films La Boétie (Paris), Euro-International (Rome); Eastmancolor; running time: 94 minutes. Released April 1970. Filmed at Le Trémolat, Périgord, France.

Producer: André Génovès; production manager: Fred Surin; assistant director: Pierre Gaucher; screenplay: Claude Chabrol; photography: Jean Rabier; editor: Jacques Gaillard; sound: Guy Chichignoud; sound re-recorder: Alex Prout; art director: Guy Littaye; music: Pierre Jansen; song: “Capri, Petite Ile” by Dominique Zardi.

Cast: Stéphane Audran (Hélène Marcoux); Jean Yanne (Popaul Thomas); Antonio Passalia (Angelo); Mario Beccaria (Léon Hamel);

Le Boucher

Pasquale Ferone (Father Charpy); Roger Rudel (Police Inspector);
William Guérault (Charles).

Publications

Books:

Wood, Robin, and Michael Walker, Claude Chabrol, London, 1970.
Bracourt, Guy, Claude Chabrol, Paris, 1971.
Reihe 5: Claude Chabrol, Munich, 1975.
Chabrol, Claude, Et pourtant, je tourne . . ., Paris, 1976.
Monaco, James, The New Wave, New York, 1976.
Magny, Joel, Claude Chabrol, Paris, 1987.
Austin, Guy, Claude Chabrol, Autoportrait, Manchester, 1999.

Articles:

Comand, André, in Image et Son (Paris), March-April 1970.
Bracourt, Guy, in Cinéma (Paris), April 1970.

Legrand, Gérard, in Positif (Paris), April 1970.
Haskell, Molly, "The Films of Chabrol: A Priest among Clowns," in Village Voice (New York), 12 November 1970.
Millar, Gavin, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1970–71.
Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), July 1972.
Dawson, Jan, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1972.
Warshow, Paul, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley, California), Fall 1972.
Belton, John, "Le Boucher: The Limited Universe," in Cinema
(Beverly Hills), Spring 1972.
"Chabrol Issue" of Image et Son (Paris), December 1973.
Marty, Alain, in Image et Son (Paris), January 1974.
Film Psychology Review (New York), Summer-Fall 1980.
Kemp, Philip, "Hitching Posts," in Macguffin (Victoria, Australia),
no. 18, February-May 1996.
Magny, J., "Questions de mise en scene," in Cahiers du Cinéma
(Paris), Hors serie, 1997.

* * *

Set in the Périgord village of Le Trémolat, Chabrol's delicately textured film is an unconventionally chaste, and tragic, love story about two emotionally damaged characters, the village schoolmistress, Mlle. Héléne (Stéphane Audran), and the local butcher, Popaul (Jean Yanne). Both the location and the protagonists' professions are central to Chabrol's purpose.

The credit sequence, with Pierre Jansen's disquieting music distancing the viewer, rolls against images of primitive cave drawings, the work of prehistoric man attempting to relate to his world. This explicit reference to man's antecedents establishes an important theme in the film: the residual atavistic impulses in 20th-century man. Popaul incarnates the continued presence of these untamed primitive instincts and his self-knowledge renders this situation tragic. He appears gentle, considerate, rather conventional, even puritanical, and possesses an almost childlike respect for the village schoolmistress. A desperately unhappy and emotionally deprived family background, however, and 15 brutalising years in the army have left their scars: he has yet to come to terms with this past. Mlle. Héléne, liberated, self-possessed, and sophisticated, represents culture and moral authority, the epitome of the evolved, civilised human being. Yet she too has to come to terms with her own nature, and a failed relationship, which have made her wary of sentimental involvement. Her emotional needs may be satisfied with her surrogate family of pupils, and her sexual drive sublimated through Yoga, but her situation, like that of Popaul, is ultimately fragile. Each character is incomplete.

Developed from Chabrol's original conception, the two protagonists illustrate his stated commitment to films of psychological enquiry: "I am for simple plots with complicated characters." The story of their fraught relationship is evolved against positive images of a normality they cannot share. The film opens with Raoul Coutard's beautiful sweeping pan of the peaceful Dordogne countryside captured with the muted colours of early morning. These images of tranquility give way to an affectionate portrait of the sunny village busying itself for a wedding and the ensuing celebrations. The enjoyment is spontaneous, the sense of community strong in the shared happiness of the occasion. Among these genuine inhabitants the camera identifies the two protagonists, the Parisian schoolmistress now part of the village, and the butcher recently returned from war service: they are potentially another happy couple. A slow, unwinding tracking shot of their walk through the village establishes their burgeoning intimacy. Gifts are exchanged as a manageable expression of feeling: a leg of lamb from Popaul, a lighter from Héléne. Popaul reflects ominously: "If you never make love, you go crazy."

The main issues of the film are played out in two juxtaposed sequences. Mlle. Héléne rehearses her pupils for the village fete: they are dressed in Louis XIV costumes and dance elegantly, if somewhat artificially, to the music of Lully. An image of stylised sophistication is conveyed, counterpointing the spontaneity of the accordion-led dancing at the wedding reception. The zooming camera reveals, in a subjective close-up, Popaul's desire for Héléne. A dissolve switches the action to the local caves, the home of Cro-Magnon man, where Mlle. Héléne explains that were prehistoric man to re-appear in the 20th century he would have to adapt to survive. On the outcrop above the caves the thwarted sexual drive of a psychopath has expressed itself in a brutal murder. The horror is conveyed in a zoom shot, of shocking emotional force, to the victim's hand dripping blood. Héléne finds by the body a lighter which she conceals.

The viewer sharing this information becomes complicitous in Héléne's spontaneous response to protect Popaul. Tension and ambiguity are installed in the narrative framework as Héléne longs to be proved wrong even though she may be in danger herself. The mood darkens with the rain-drenched funeral contrasting the so recently sunny wedding. Chabrol leads the viewer to identify with Héléne's perceptions, to suspect the worse, to experience fear as she does when Popaul stalks her in the pitch-dark school. Her failure to respond to his obvious need for help, like Charlie's failure to respond to his wife's confession in Tirez sur le pianiste, leads to a self-inflicted punishment and an enduring sense of guilt in the partner found wanting at the crucial moment. The closing image of the film with Héléne at the riverside conveys emptiness and the loneliness of a personal, inadmissible sense of guilt.

Le Boucher is a subtle network of shifting emotions, of changing moods, and of psychological insights, expressed to a rare degree of perfection. The remarkable integration of form and meaning in the film is an eloquent testimony to the value of Chabrol's policy of working closely with a regular production team. His moving portrayal of the psychopath is based in a compassionate desire to understand, and must rank alongside such studies as Lang's M in its penetration and humanity. Although the psychologically disturbed character is the subject of later films Chabrol has yet to emulate the perfection achieved in Le Boucher.

—R.F. Cousins

BOUDU SAUVÉ DES EAUX

(Bodu Saved from Drowning)

France, 1932

Director: Jean Renoir

Production: Société Sirius; running time: 83 minutes. Released November 1932, Paris. Filmed summer 1932 in Epinay studios; exteriors filmed at Chennevières and in Paris.

Screenplay: Jean Renoir with Robert Valentin, from a work by René Fauchois; assistants to the director: Jacques Becker and Georges Darnoux; photography: Marcel Lucien; editors: Marguerite Renoir and Suzanne de Troye; sound: Igor B. Kalinowski; production design: Jean Castanier and Hugues Laurent; music: Raphael Strauss and Johann Strauss; song: "Sur les bords de la Riviera" by Leo Danierff.

Cast: Michel Simon (Bodu); Charles Granval (Edouard Lestingois); Marcelle Hainia (Emma Lestingois); Séverine Lerczinska (Anne-Marie); Jean Dasté (The Student); Max Dalban (Godin); Jean Gehret (Vigour); Jacques Becker (Poet on the river bank); Jane Pierson (Rose); Régine Lutèce (Woman walking the dog); Georges Darnoux (Guest at the wedding).

Publications

Books:

Davay, Paul, Jean Renoir, Brussels, 1957.

Cauliez, Armand-Jean, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1962.

Chardère, Bernard, editor, Jean Renoir, in Premier Plan (Lyon), no. 22–24, May 1962.

- Institut des Hautes Etudes Cinématographiques, Analyses des films de Jean Renoir, Paris, 1964.
- Bennett, Susan, Jean Renoir, London, 1967.
- Leprohon, Pierre, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1967; New York, 1971.
- Pouille, François, Renoir 1938; ou, Jean Renoir pour rien: Enquête sur un cinéaste, Paris, 1969.
- Braudy, Leo, Jean Renoir: The World of His Films, New York, 1972.
- Bazin, André, Jean Renoir, edited by François Truffaut, Paris, 1973.
- Durgnat, Raymond, Jean Renoir, Berkeley, 1974.
- Beylie, Claude, Jean Renoir: Le Spectacle, la vie, Paris, 1975.
- Renoir, Jean, Essays, Conversations, Reviews, edited by Penelope Gilliatt, New York, 1975.
- Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: Volume 1: The Great Tradition, New York, 1976.
- Faulkner, Christopher, Jean Renoir: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
- Sesonske, Alexander, Jean Renoir: The French Films 1924–1939, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1980.
- Gauteur, Claude, editor, Jean Renoir: Oeuvres de cinéma inédites, Paris, 1981.
- McBride, Joseph, editor, Filmmakers on Filmmaking 2, Los Angeles, 1983.
- Serceau, Daniel, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1985.
- Bertin, Celia, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1986.
- Faulkner, Christopher, The Social Cinema of Jean Renoir, Princeton, New Jersey, 1986.
- Vincendeau, Ginette, and Keith Reader, La Vie est à Nous: French Cinema of the Popular Front, London, 1986.
- Viry-Babel, Roger, Jean Renoir: Le Jeu et la règle, Paris, 1986.
- Cavagnac, Guy, Jean Renoir: Le désir du monde, Paris, 1994.
- Leutrat, Jean-Louis, Le chien de Jean Renoir, Crisnée, 1994.
- Boston, Richard, Boudu Saved From Drowning, London, 1994.
- O'Shaughnessy, Martin, Jean Renoir, New York, 2000.
- Strebel, Elizabeth Grottle, "Jean Renoir and the Popular Front," in Feature Films as History, edited by K. R. M. Short, London, 1981.
- O'Kane, J., "Style, Space Ideology in Boudu Saved from Drowning," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Fall 1981-Spring 1982.
- Morgan, J., "From Clochards to Cappuccinos: Boudu Is Down and Out in Beverly Hills," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), no. 2, 1990.
- Holmlund, C. A., "New Cold War Sequels and Remakes," in Jump Cut (Berkeley, California), April 1990.
- Andersson, L. "Boudu vesien snojatti," Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 6, 1995.
- Monterde, J. E., "Jean Renoir: anos treinta," Nosferatu (Donostia-San Sebastian), no. 17, March 1995.
- Renoir, A., "Jean Renoir conteur d'histoires," Trafic, no. 24, Winter 1997.
- * * *
- Boudu sauvé des eaux* makes abundantly clear why Jean Renoir's work was so admired by André Bazin, and why the filmmakers of the New Wave regarded him as their supreme antecedent and father-figure. Bazin's theory of realism—especially in so far as it is concerned with the preservation of the physical realities of time and space—is repeatedly exemplified by the use in Boudu of long takes, camera movement, and depth-of-field, relating action to action, character to character, foreground to background and continuously suggesting the existence of a world beyond the frame. The subversive implications of the material, the use of real locations instead of studio sets, the sense of a moral freedom combining inevitably with technical freedom, the evident love of actors and performance, and the resulting effect of spontaneity—all could add up to a model for the ambitions of the New Wave.
- Leo Braudy has interpreted Renoir's work in terms of a dialectic of nature and "theatre" (the latter to be understood both literally and metaphorically), the two concepts achieving a complex interplay. Boudu works very well in this light. Indeed the film opens with a theatrical representation of nature rites (Lestingois as satyr, Anne-Marie as nymph). If Renoir shows great affection for the world of nature surrounding, and epitomized by, Boudu—the freedom of the tramp without restrictions, the play of sunlight on water, the lush fertility of the imagery of the film's final scene—he is equally charmed by the bourgeois household of the Lestingois—by the artificial birds that Anne-Marie must dust, by Lestingois's reverence for Balzac (on whose works Boudu casually spits, not with the slightest animus but simply because it is natural to spit when you feel the need). One might add that he finds the Lestingois household charming because of the lingering traces of a subjugated, sublimated nature that continue to animate it. At the same time, he sees that it is the subjugation that makes culture possible. Windows—the barrier between nature and culture but also the means of access—are a recurrent motif throughout Renoir's work. In the films of Ophüls (with whom Renoir has many points of contact while remaining so different) windows are always being closed; in those of Renoir they are always being opened. He is centrally concerned with the possibility of free access and interchange between the two worlds, the uncertainty of being crucial.
- The desire to negotiate between nature and culture encounters problems which the film can't resolve, and partially evades. On the one hand, the comic mode enables Renoir to avoid confronting the psychic misery produced by bourgeois repressiveness: Madame Letting go, in particular can only be a comic character for the film to continue to function. If her position were allowed to be explored seriously, the laughter would die immediately. The scene in which she is “liberated” by being raped by Boudu is saved from distastefulness solely by being played as farce. On the other hand, Renoir’s equivocation in evaluating the bourgeois world results in some confusion over Boudu himself: does he or does he not represent a serious threat to it? The point gains force when one compares Michel Simon’s characterization hero with his père Jules in Vigo’s L’Atalante. Jules is at once more formidable and more consistent, and Vigo’s radicalism more sharply defined. Boudu, in contrast, seems little more than a pre-socialized (and pre-sexual) child, essentially harmless. The sudden ascription to him of great sexual potency jars, considering that we are told earlier that he has never kissed anyone except his dog.

The film is typical of Renoir’s work in its warmth, humanity, generosity; it also suggests the close relation between that generosity and impotence. If every way of life can be defended, then nothing need be changed.

—Robin Wood

BOY

See SHONEN

BRAZIL

UK, 1985

Director: Terry Gilliam

Production: Brazil Productions for 20th Century Fox; Eastmancolor; Dolby stereo; running time: 142 minutes. Released March 1985.

Producer: Arnon Milchan; co-producer: Patrick Cassavetti; production coordinator: Margaret Adams; screenplay: Terry Gilliam, Tom Stoppard, Charles McKeown; 2nd unit director: Julian Doyle; assistant directors: Guy Travers, Chris Thompson, Richard Coleman, Christopher Newman, Terence Fitch, Kevin Westley; photography: Roger Pratt; model/effects photography: Roger Pratt, Julian Doyle, Tim Spence; camera operator: David Garfath; video consultant: Ira Curtis Coleman; editor: Julian Doyle; sound editors: Rodney Glenn, Barry McCormick; sound recordists: Bob Doyle, Eric Tomlinson, Andy Jackson; sound re-recordist: Paul Carr; art directors: John Beard, Keith Pain; graphic artists: David Scutt, Bernard Allum; draughtsmen: Tony Rimmington, Stephen Bream; matte artist: Ray Caple; production designer: Norman Garwood; set dressing designer: Maggie Gray; costume designers: Jams Acheson, Ray Scott, Martin Adams, Vin Burnham, Jamie Courtier, Martin Adams, Annie Hadley; make-up: Maggie Weston, Aaron Sherman, Elaine Carew, Sallie Evans, Sandra Shepherd, Meinir Brock; music: Michael Kamen; music performed by: National Philharmonic Orchestra; music coordinator: Ray Cooper; choreographer: Heather Seymour; stunt arranger: Bill Weston; special effects supervisor: George Gibbs; model effects supervisor: Richard Conway; titles/optical effects: Nick Dunlop, Neil Sharp, Kent Houston, Tim Ollive, Richard Morrison.

Brazil

Cast: Jonathan Pryce (Sam Lowry); Robert De Niro (Archibald “Harry” Tuttle); Katherine Helmond (Mrs. Ida Lowry); Ian Holm (Mr. Kurtzmann); Bob Hoskins (Spoor); Michael Palin (Jack Lint); Ian Richardson (Mr. Warren); Peter Vaughan (Mr. Eugene Helpmann); Kim Greist (Jill Layton); Jim Broadbent (Dr. Jaffe); Barbara Hicks (Mrs. Terrain); Charles McKeown (Lime); Derrick O’Connor (Dowser); Kathryn Pogson (Shirley); Bryan Pringle (Spiro); Sheila Reid (Mrs. Buttle); John Flanagan (TV interviewer/salesman); Ray Cooper (Technician); Brian Miller (Mr. Buttle); Simon Nash (Boy Buttle); Prudence Oliver (Girl Buttle); Simon Jones (Arrest official); Derek Deadman (Bill, Department of Works); Nigel Planer (Charlie, Department of Works); Terence Bayley (TV commercial presenter); Gordon Kaye (MOI lobby porter); Tony Portacio (Neighbour in clerk’s pool); Bill Wallis (Bespectacled lurker); Winston Dennis (Samurai warrior); Toby Clark (Small Sam double); Diana Martin (Telegram girl); Jack Purvis (Dr. Chapman); Elizabeth Spender (Alison/“Barbara” Lint); Antony Brown (Porter, Information Retrieval); Myrtle Devenish (Typist, Jack’s office); Holly Gilliam (Holly); John Pierce Jones (Basement guard); Ann Way (Old lady with dog); Don Henderson (1st Black Maria guard); Howard Lew Lewis (2nd Black Maria guard); Oscar Quitak, Harold Innocent, John Grillo, Ralph Nossek, David Grant, James Coyle (Interview officials); Patrick Connor (Cell guard); Roger Ashton-Griffiths (Priest); Russell Keith Grant (Young gallant at funeral).

Publications

Script:

Gilliam, Terry, Tom Stoppard, and Charles McKeown, Brazil, in The Battle of Brazil, edited by Jack Mathews, New York, 1987.

Books:

Danvers, Louis, Brazil de Terry Gilliam, Brussels, 1988.
 Gilliam, Terry, Gilliam on Gilliam, New York, 1999.
 McCabe, Bob, Dark Knights and Holy Fools: The Art and Films of Terry Gilliam, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Rabourdin, D., "Terry Gilliam parle de Brazil," in Cinema (Paris), February 1985.
 Roddick, Nick, "Just Crazy about Brazil," in Stills (London), February 1985.
 "Brazil Issue" of Positif (Paris), March 1985.
 Chaillet, J.-P., and M. Chion, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1985.
 D'Yvoire, J., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), March 1985.
 Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1985.
Starburst (London), April 1985.
 Van de Kaap, H., in Skrien (Amsterdam), April-May 1985.
 Rushdie, Salman, "The Location of Brazil," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), September 1985.
 Rubenstein, Lenny, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 14, no. 4, 1986.
Stills (London), February 1986.
 Glass, Fred, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1986.
 Fohlin, J., in Filmhaftet (Uppsala, Sweden), December 1988.
 Boyd, K. G., "Pastiche and Postmodernism in Brazil," in Cinefocus (Bloomington, Indiana), no. 1, 1990.
 Kremski, P., in Filmbulletin (Winterthur, Switzerland), no. 5–6, 1991.
 Fister, Barbara, "Mugging for the Camera: Narrative Strategies in Brazil," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 24, no. 3, 1996.
 Robley, L.P., and P. Wardle, "Terry Gilliam," in Cinefantastique (Forrest Park, Illinois), vol. 27, no. 6, 1996.

* * *

"When I started imagining things," says Terry Gilliam, "I get a chemical high from it. My imagination is a cheap drug, one of my ways of dealing with reality because reality is so complex and uncontrollable." More than most, his career as a filmmaker seems, with its much-publicised crises of finance, production, and distribution, to have been a series of self-imposed demands for the impossible, the direct translation of a private quest into an exotic public entertainment hovering on the edge of disaster. And not surprisingly, the quartet of Gilliam adventures that began with Jabberwocky has one central theme: the triumph of fantasy.

In each of his films, the action revolves around a humble figure of unlikely significance—the medieval apprentice (Jabberwocky), the schoolboy (Time Bandits), the lowly clerk (Brazil), the derided outcast (The Adventures of Baron Munchausen)—who more by luck than good judgement becomes something of a hero after tackling some monstrous opponents. In each film, the "real" world is a cruelly chaotic environment where frantic inspiration and sheer bravado offer the only defence. And in each film, the moment of victory is precariously achieved at the cost of apparent defeat: Dennis must overwhelm the Jabberwock to win the Princess, Kevin loses home and family in the (temporary) defeat of Evil, Sam escapes from torture into placid insanity, the Baron is shot dead before riding off into the sunset where he dissolves like a ghost. It is as if the price of the whole display has been too high, an unavoidable but near-suicidal performance. "I like the Icarus quality," Gilliam confirms, "of flying too close to the sun."

Flying high is certainly the escape route in Brazil, the darkest and most coherent of Gilliam's labyrinthine stories. Set "somewhere in the 20th Century (at 8.49 p.m.)," it parodies Orwell's 1984 to convey a less restrained but equally persuasive picture of a not-too-alternate society where nothing works as it should and nobody really cares. Gilliam's version of Winston Smith, the wild-eyed Sam Lowry, is employed in the warrens of the monolithic Ministry of Information Retrieval—where, naturally, they never tell you anything—his main function to solve the problems of his immediate superior (played by Ian Holm in a memorable portrait of vacillating bureaucracy). At night, Lowry dreams that he's devastatingly handsome in shining armour, equipped with a glorious set of white wings, and goes swooping among the clouds where a blonde goddess awaits him.

When he meets a real girl who looks just like his imaginary partner-in-flight he has little choice but to team up with her even though the "goddess" charges about in a huge hell-raising truck with the bright glitter of anarchy in her eyes and is marked for arrest as a trouble-maker. Sam's attempts to extract her to safe "non-existence" from the central computer records are in vain, and they are both doomed. But in his imagination their faraway paradise (its idyllic nature suggested by the words of the popular song "Brazil," which otherwise has nothing to do with the plot) remains intact and their embrace in the sky—anticipating Gilliam's subsequent vision of ecstasy, the aerial dance between Venus and Munchausen—will last forever.

The images in Brazil are as outrageous as any of Gilliam's Monty Python cartoons which, with their truncated cut-outs, coils of tubes and pipes, and berserk mechanisation, the film often evokes. What gives it a special force, quite distinct from the more whimsical, fairy-tale absurdities of his other comedies, is the disturbing familiarity of the elaborately awful settings. The ugly decor of the macabre city, its walls plastered with sinister proclamations ("Don't suspect a friend—report him!"; "Happiness—we're all in it together"), provides an enclosure of disheartening malfunction whose inhabitants are either too numb or too self-absorbed to notice. "I'm dealing with what I think exists now," Gilliam says. "There is a feeling things are out of control . . ."

A car left briefly parked is instantly vandalised and set alight by playful kids. A guest arrives late to a party and has to be rescued by his hostess from brutish security guards who have attacked him. A terrorist bomb explodes in a restaurant but lunch continues among those diners unaffected by the blast and flames, politely screened from the writhing wounded. Such moments of ruthless humour give Gilliam's retro-future an acute satirical accuracy. Equally startling, though, are the images from nightmare, sometimes Sam's, sometimes Gilliam's, always ours. A vivid portrayal of the city-dweller's predicament comes when the pavement itself sprouts arms that hold the would-be knight back from his mission. And when another gallant rescuer, the resourceful repairman who operates stealthily outside the law, is suddenly caught up in a shroud of waste paper, a breeze blows the paper away and the human figure beneath has disintegrated and gone, a metaphor for lost hopes of reprieve.

The city under siege is a constant Gilliam battleground, vividly restaged in each of his films with ferocious bombardments and impressive crowds of scurrying extras. In Brazil, the war bursts in through ceilings and front doors; it even offers the opportunity for a sly reference to Battleship Potemkin, with a vacuum-cleaner instead of a pram on the fatal steps. The underlying contest can also be interpreted as a race against time, partly to save a crumbling world, partly—at a more personal level—to counteract physical mortality. Like the process of filmmaking itself, Gilliam's comedies are beset with giant antagonists (Sam's envisioned opponent in Brazil, a towering samurai, turns out to have Sam's own features), but they also bubble with resilience and humour. "I hope people will catch themselves laughing and suddenly realise, 'I shouldn't be laughing at that, that's horrendous.' That's a nice thing to do to people. It helps us to see we're all in it together."

—Philip Strick

BREAKFAST AT TIFFANY'S

USA, 1961

Director: Blake Edwards

Production: Jurow-Sheperd Productions and Paramount Pictures; colour, 35mm; running time: 115 minutes.

Producers: Martin Jurow and Richard Sheperd; screenplay: George Axelrod, from the novel by Truman Capote; photography: Franz Planer; editor: Howard Smith; art director: Roland Anderson; music: Henry Mancini; song: Johnny Mercer; sound: John Wilkinson; assistant director: Bill McGarry; costumes: Edith Head, Givenchy.

Cast: Audrey Hepburn (Holly Golightly); George Peppard (Paul Varjak); Patricia Neal (2-E); Mickey Rooney (Mr. Yunioshi); Buddy Ebsen (Doc Golightly); Jose Luis de Vilallonga (Jose da Silva Perriera); Martin Balsam (O.J. Berman); Dorothy Whitney (Mag Wildwood); Alan Reed (Sally Tomato).

Publications

Books:

Gilliatt, Penelope, "A Fairytale of New York," in Unholy Fools, London 1973.

Clark, Leslie, "Brunch on Moon River," in The Modern American Novel and the Movies, edited by Gerald Peary and Roger Schatzkin, New York 1978.

Vaccino, Roberto, Edwards, Florence 1979.

Brode, Douglas, The Films of the Sixties, New Jersey 1978.

Merbaum, Mark, Magill's Survey of Cinema, Volume 1, First Series, edited by Frank Magill, New Jersey 1980.

Lehman, Peter, and William Luhr, Blake Edwards, Ohio 1981.

Bruno, Edoardo, Blake Edwards: l'occhio composto, Genoa, 1997.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 11 October 1961.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), November 1961.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1961.

Breen, James, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1961/62.

Mardore, Michel, "Le sexe d'Holly" in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1962.

Feinstein, Herbert, "My Gorgeous Darling Sweetheart Angels: Brigitte Bardot and Audrey Hepburn" in Film Quarterly (Berkeley) Spring 1962.

Bruno, Eduardo, "I miti infranti" in Filmcritica (Rome), May 1964.

Legrand, Gérard, "Diamants sur canapé—Le rendez-vous aveugle de Blake Edwards" in Positif (Paris), November 1987.

McGilligan, P., "Irony," Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, November-December, 1995.

* * *

Although Truman Capote's popular novel served as its basis, the film version of Breakfast at Tiffany's is very much in debt to George Axelrod's contribution. In turn, Axelrod's screenplay owes a considerable amount to Billy Wilder's work. Axelrod and Wilder collaborated on The Seven Year Itch, an Axelrod play which the two adapted for the screen with Wilder directing. And, as in The Seven Year Itch, Breakfast at Tiffany's features an average man and a desirable, eccentric young woman who meet and become involved because they live in the same apartment building.

More significant, particularly in regard to the male protagonist, is the film's relationship to Sunset Boulevard. Paul Varjak (George Peppard), like William Holden's character in Wilder's film, is an unfulfilled writer who has taken to a form of prostitution by becoming the kept lover of a rich, older woman. Unlike Gloria Swanson, however, 2-E (Patricia Neal) isn't an actress but she displays a strong theatrical flair: on bursting into Paul's apartment and announcing that she thinks her husband may suspect the affair and has a detective trailing her, 2-E wears a vampire-like costume consisting of a black cape coat and a red turban.

But the Wilder film Breakfast at Tiffany's most closely resembles in tone and thematic concern is The Apartment, a comedy-drama in which both the male and female protagonist are involved in a sense in prostituting themselves. While Holly Golightly may not consider herself a prostitute, the film suggests the clients she has expect some sort of sexual favor in return for the "gratuities" they give her. And, as with the Lemmon and MacLaine characters in The Apartment, Paul and Holly are aligned to feelings of alienation, loneliness, and despair.

Breakfast at Tiffany's deals with characters who exploit others but the film is more concerned with how these characters are damaging themselves. For instance, Paul uses 2-E but he is also used by her; and Holly, who calls her clients "rats," is cynically "ratting" on them. As Paul understands through observing Holly, his relationship with 2-E exists because he fears confronting himself and his future as a writer. In contrast, Holly's insecurity and identity crisis is much more severe. Holly repeatedly exhibits an inability to be fully honest with herself and others: 1) she lives as a transient yet she keeps Cat whom she refers to as "poor slob"; 2) she claims she wants to give her brother Fred a home but she seems to be incapable of saving the necessary money to buy the ranch in Mexico; 3) she associates Paul with her brother which is a means of keeping the relationship platonic and non-threatening; 4) she attempts to reconstruct herself in a domestic image when she thinks a rich South American wants to marry her. Ultimately, the film's dramatic conflict resides in Holly's refusal to admit that Paul understands her and wants to make a commitment to her and the relationship.

Breakfast at Tiffany's

In one of the film's most engaging sequences, Holly and Paul spend a day together doing things the other hasn't done: in their final escapade, Holly takes Paul to a five and dime store with the intention that they steal something. In addition to alluding to Holly's child-like sensibility, the action is also telling in that what they wind up stealing are Halloween masks—Holly leaves the store wearing a cat-face mask. During the course of the film, Holly is forced into shedding the various masks she uses to protect herself; the process culminates in a painful confrontation in which she attempts to dismiss Paul and disown her feelings by abandoning Cat. Although Holly's desperate gesture jars her into admitting to her need for affection, the scene carries an emotional intensity that almost undercuts the film's upbeat resolution.

Axelrod provides the film with nuanced characterizations and a skillfully constructed screenplay; he creates characters who are intelligent, witty and emotionally complex. Axelrod's contribution is matched by Blake Edwards. Breakfast at Tiffany's is the film that established him as a major directorial presence. Edwards is extremely assured in his handling of a wide range of modes and mood changes. The film encompasses broad farce (arguably, Mickey Rooney's characterization and performance are too silly to warrant racist objections), social satire (the New York City high society fringe element), the playful humour that Holly and Paul exhibit; it also captures the edgy mood swings that Holly displays and the emotional pain she experiences. Edwards is ably assisted by Henry Mancini, who in addition to co-writing the melancholy "Moon River," provides the film with a highly evocative score.

As Paul Varjak, George Peppard gives a disciplined and highly appealing performance. In what could have easily become a secondary role, Peppard is assertive and compelling but is so in a gentle manner. As did Home From the Hill, Breakfast at Tiffany's indicates that Peppard had the potential to become a great leading man. He had a strong sexual presence and a masculine persona which wasn't dependent on swagger; instead, it is his good looks and low-keyed charm that make him seductive. While Peppard is a great asset, Breakfast at Tiffany's is Audrey Hepburn's film and Holly Golightly is perhaps her most endearing "waif" characterization. On the other hand, the film marks a turning point in her career with Hepburn moving from the child-woman to a more adult, worldly image. In Breakfast at Tiffany's Hepburn is less of an innocent but she manages to maintain her vulnerability and emotional expressiveness.

Given that the role has become so significant to Hepburn's career, it is interesting to note that Marilyn Monroe had been the initial choice for the project; instead, Monroe did The Misfits, the film which was intended to reveal her as a mature personality and actor. Ironically, Breakfast at Tiffany's might have better served Monroe's needs than the project which had been conceived specially to spotlight her development.

Breakfast at Tiffany's has a fairy tale quality about it but, like Wilder's The Apartment, the film is bittersweet and explores modern day existence with insight and compassion.

—Richard Lippe

BREAKING THE WAVES

Denmark, 1996

Director: Lars von Trier

Production: Zentropa Entertainments in collaboration with Trust Film Svenska AB, Liberator Productions S.a.r.l., Argus Film Productie, Northern Lights; color, 35mm CinemaScope; running time: 158 minutes. Released 5 July 1996, Copenhagen. Cost: DKK 52 million.

Producers: Vibeke Windeløv, Peter Aalbæk Jensen; screenplay: Lars von Trier in collaboration with Peter Asmussen and David Pirie; photography: Robby Müller; editor: Anders Refn; scenography: Karl Juliusson; sound: Per Streit; chapter photos: Per Kirkeby; digital manipulations by Søren Buus, Steen Lyders Hansen, Niels Valentin Dal.

Cast: Emily Watson (Bess); Stellan Skarsgård (Jan); Katrin Cartlidge (Dodo); Adrian Rawlins (Dr. Richardson); Jonathan Hackett (Priest); Sandra Voe (Mother); Jean-Marc Barr (Terry); Udo Kier (Sadistic sailor).

Awards: (selected) European Film of the Year, Berlin European Film Academy Award; Grand Prix, Cannes Film Festival; Best Film, Best Script, Best Leading Actress, Best Supporting Actress, Best Editor, Best Photography, Best Sound, Best Production Design, Best Make Up, and Best Light Engineer, Danish Film Academy Awards (Robert); Best Film, Best Actress, and Best Supporting Actress, Danish Film Critics Awards (Bodil); César Award for Best Foreign Film; Best Director, Best Actress, and Best Cinematographer, New York Film Critics Circle Awards; Guldbagge Award for Best Foreign Film, Swedish Film Institute; Best Film, Best Actress, Best Cinematography, and Best Director, National Society of Film Critics (U.S.A.).

Publications

Scripts:

Trier, Lars von, Breaking the Waves, København, 1996.

Breaking the Waves

Articles:

- Björkman, Stig, "De glasklara bildernas magi," in Chaplin, no. 263, 1996
- Kindblom, Mikaela, "Kvinnliga offerritualer," in Chaplin, no. 265, 1996.
- Björkman, Stig, "Les nouvelles expériences de Lars von Trier," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1996.
- Guérin, Marie-Anne, interview with Lars von Trier, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1996.
- Audé, Françoise, and Christian Braad Thomsen, interview with Lars von Trier, in Positif (Paris), October 1996.
- Guérin, Marie-Anne, and Frédéric Strauss, "Dossier," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1996.
- Dannowski, Hans Werner, "Theologische Motive," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), November 1996.
- Oppenheimer, Jean, and David E. Williams, "Von Triers and Müller's Ascetic Aesthetic on Breaking the Waves," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), December 1996.
- Sedakova, and others, "Breaking the Waves and Ordet Are Compared by Panel of Philosophers and Sociologists Discussing Sin, Love, Faith, Evil," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), June 1997.

* * *

Breaking the Waves indicates a major new direction in Lars von Trier's output. Following the Europa trilogy—with its depiction of a world in moral and political dissolution, its perverse sex, and its doom-laden atmosphere that almost makes death a relief—in Breaking the Waves the director shuffles the deck to create a film set in a community fighting tooth and nail against the moral dissolution represented in its eyes by anything novel or from the outside, a film which pays tribute to pure, all-consuming love, and for the first time features a female lead. It may end in death, but also in a kind of resurrection.

Emily Watson's Bess is the all-important lead, a simple woman brought up in a strictly religious Scottish small-town community. She marries Jan, a roustabout from the oil rigs, and sacrifices herself for him, so to speak, when he is paralysed in an accident on the rig and asks her to pick up other men, have sex with them, and then describe it to him. It is the only way he can have faith in his own recovery, he tells her. Her world is populated by God, Jan, and then everyone else. She has one-to-one conversations with her God, taking it upon herself to give Him a language by altering her voice and playing his part as he communicates directly with her. God is, quite literally, her counsellor, and as she has asked him to give her Jan back, she thinks she is to blame when Jan returns as a quadriplegic; for this reason, too, she is prepared to sacrifice herself in order to liberate him from the trammels of his paralysis.

One of the scoops of the film is its depiction of her love as unstinted, devouringly carnal, as pure sexual abandon that she experiences for the first time and refuses to relinquish. Her pain at Jan's departure is heartrending, and her physical reaction—hammering away at the machinery the roustabouts use every day—strikes home psychologically. When he asks her to abandon herself to other men there is no doubt that he does so in order to help a woman who seems doomed to lose her sensuality just as she discovers it, but his request develops into an obsession, revealing a demonic side to Jan, who also achieves some kind of perverted satisfaction through it.

Bess may be regarded as a simple fool, a forerunner to the people who act the idiots in Trier's next film, The Idiots, in their attempts to arrive at some kind of authenticity, a notion with its base in romanticism. Or she may be regarded as a parallel to the Greek chorus of Down's Syndrome dishwashers in Riget, or a successor to Mrs. Drusse, with her second sight the antithesis of the studied rationality of the medical world. Almost everywhere in Trier's films rationality and irrationality are contrasted, revealing areas where the common sense of civilization fails, such as in the face of the hypnosis used in the Europa trilogy to break down barriers and arrive at memory's traumatic spots, where (self) control is switched off. At the same time Bess may be regarded as a saviour, a redeemer, whose self-sacrifice redeems Jan from a hopeless life chained to the bed and oxygen mask. Not only does she submit quite literally to people (men) and their sexual desires; she also embarks on a voyage across the Styx to the dangerous vessel where her fateful death awaits her. When she returns against all expectations, and is excommunicated by her church, she is stoned by a group of children who pursue her relentlessly on her Via Dolorosa—the path to the church that has rejected her and knows not the mercy that is otherwise part of the Kingdom of Heaven.

With provocation typical of Trier, female sexual submission is thus merged with the cruel rejection by the church of she who is pure of heart. The results were only to be expected. In Denmark the film aroused opposition and argument like no other film in recent times. Priests and women in particular felt it incumbent on them to refute its perception of religion and its image of women. In this post-feminist age Bess may be seen as an anachronism, but Emily Watson defends her, acting with a vulnerability moving and convincing in every detail as regards the pain of her loss, the sincerity of her love, the pureness of her heart. Trier has created a female figure worthy of his great compatriot Carl Theodor Dreyer, a mixture of Dreyer's Joan of Arc, who goes to the stake for her faith; Gertrud, who desires utter devotion and not the adoration of luke-warm men; and Anna from Day of Wrath, who would rather die as a witch than live with a man who renounces love to save his life.

Trier emphasizes the stylization of this romantic melodrama by the use of chapter divisions in which pictures of landscapes are visually manipulated to convey the way the romantics perceived nature. The chapter titles range from the specific "Bess gets married" and "Life with Jan" to abstracts such as "Doubt," "Faith," and "Bess' Sacrifice," thus underlining the increasingly religious, allegorical character of the tale. At the same time the melodrama is acted out in the style he invented for what he called his pot-boiler, the genre-ironic television series, The Kingdom. The irony may be absent from Breaking the Waves, but Trier still uses the hand-held camera and monochrome sepia tints that in the cinema in CinemaScope made people sea-sick. The mobile camera gives us shots of the town and landscape that are clear-cut and real in almost documentary fashion, going ultra-close-up to the characters, pursuing them into the most painful nooks and crannies of the mind, and rendering them visible. Just as Bess transgresses the conventions of her community, the director transgresses those of film narrative by tossing continuity in the normal sense to the winds, along with the classical rules for angles and edits. Instead of continuity he goes for an emotional intensity that sucks the viewer into this small-minded world of pig-headed men who only understand love and ultimate sacrifice in terms of the Bible, not of real life. And when the bells finally ring out in the sky we feel the breath of Tarkovsky and his sense of visualized metaphysics, just as the miracle from Ordet by Carl Theodor Dreyer is an obvious source of inspiration.

—Dan Nissen

BREATHLESS

See A BOUT DE SOUFFLE

THE BRIDE OF FRANKENSTEIN

USA, 1935

Director: James Whale

Production: Universal; black and white, running time: 76 minutes. Released May 1935.

Producer: Carl Laemmle Jr.; screenplay: John L. Balderston, William Hurlbut, from the novel by Mary Shelley; photography: John D. Mescall; editor: Ted Kent; art director: Charles D. Hall; music: Franz Waxman; special effects: John P. Fulton; make-up: Jack Pierce.

Cast: Boris Karloff (The Monster); Colin Clive (Henry Frankenstein); Valerie Hobson (Elizabeth); Elsa Lanchester (The Bride/Mary Shelley); Ernest Thesiger (Dr. Pretorius); O. P. Heggie (Blind Hermit); Dwight Frye (Karl); E. E. Clive (Burgomaster); Una O'Connor (Minnie); Ann Darling (Shepherdess); Douglas Walton (Shelley);

The Bride of Frankenstein

Gavin Gordon (Lord Byron); Ted Billings (Ludwig); Lucien Prival (Butler); John Carradine (Woodsman); Walter Brennan (Neighbour); Billy Barty (Baby).

Publications

Script:

Riley, Philip J., editor, Bride of Frankenstein: The Original Shooting Script, Absecon, New Jersey, 1989.

Books:

Butler, Ivan, Horror in the Cinema, revised edition, New York, 1970.
 Goldblatt, Burt, and Chris Steinbrunner, Cinema of the Fantastic, New York, 1972.
 Bojarski, Richard, and Kenneth Beale, The Films of Boris Karloff, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.
 Everson, William K., Classics of the Horror Film, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.

Derry, Charles, Dark Dreams: A Psychological History of the Modern Horror Film, New York, 1977.

Ellis, Reed, Journey into Darkness: The Art of James Whale's Horror Films, New York 1980.

Curtis, James, James Whale, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1982.

Manguel, Alberto, Bride of Frankenstein, Champaign, Illinois, 1997.

Articles:

Time (New York), 29 April 1935.

New York Times, 11 May 1935.

Variety (New York), 15 May 1935.

Film Weekly (London), 28 June 1935.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1935.

Durnat, Raymond, "The Subconscious: From Pleasure Castle to Libido Motel," in Films and Filming (London), January 1962.

Jensen, Paul, "James Whale," in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1971.

Huss, Roy, "The Creation Scene in The Bride of Frankenstein," in Focus on the Horror Film, edited by Huss and T. J. Ross, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.

- Evans, Walter, "Monster Movies: A Sexual Theory," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Fall 1973.
- Milne, Tom, "One Man Crazy: James Whale," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1973.
- Evans, Walter, "Monster Movies and Rites of Initiation," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Spring 1975.
- Magill's Survey of Cinema 1*, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980. Starburst (London), no. 33, 1981.
- Viviani, C., "Fausses pistes," in Positif (Paris), June 1983.
- Senn, Bryan, "The Monster, Bride, and Son. . .," in Monsterscene (Lombard, Illinois), no. 4, March 1995.
- Senn, Bryan, "Elsa 'The Bride' Lanchester: A Candid Look at the Fairest Monster of Them All!" in Filmfax (Evanston, Illinois), no. 58, October-January 1996-97.
- Henderson, J.A., and G. Turner, "A Gothic Masterpiece," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 79, January 1998.

* * *

By 1935, James Whale knew the days were numbered for Universal's monster machine and offered The Bride of Frankenstein as the panacea to out-do any encroaching horror parodies. While the most technically proficient, lavish, and spectacular horror movie of its time, Bride remains the brainchild of a director grown jaded and even a bit masochistic about Frankenstein's unsurpassable success. Whale was so effective in making Bride a swansong to his genre that all subsequent scare comedies from Abbot and Costello Meet Frankenstein to Mel Brooks's Young Frankenstein are redundant.

Bride's anti-horror tone is evident from the very first scene with a literary badinage between the author Mary Shelley (Elsa Lanchester) and her cohorts Lord Byron (Gavin Gordon) and husband Percy (Douglas Walton). Despite the missing additional dialogue (excised before the film's release), this interlude is still among the most memorable and funny historical reconstructions in screen history. As Gordon's Byron commends Mary for conceiving her story, he rolls his r's like the worst of hams. Elsa (as Shelley and later as the "bride") jerks her head, contorts her eyes, and titters like a hyper-neurotic version of Brigitte Helm's robot in Fritz Lang's Metropolis. It is no wonder that these moments alone would inspire Ken Russell's funhouse romp in Gothic a half-century later.

However, once the film picks up from where the first left off, we notice how much has radically changed. Comical E. E. Clive replaces the more leaden Lionel Belmore as the town burgomaster in charge of keeping bogus order. Amidst the screaming throng, Una O'Connor (as the chambermaid Minnie) and her cacklings provide a blithe foil for Karloff's Monster. Here the Monster is reduced to a straight man when he emerges from the windmill's ruins and stands beside O'Connor—a shot that is as embarrassing as it is hilarious.

Along with the constant punch-lines and jocular atmosphere, Bride of Frankenstein is best distinguished by Franz Waxman's heavy-handed musical score which punctuates every gesture and leaves little room for subtlety or grace. Whale neutralizes the chills with bathos when the Monster talks (an addition to which Karloff objected). There is studied anachronism when Lucien Prival plays a butler who actually resembles a 1930s-style gangster. The film even satirizes Tod Browning's Devil Doll when the mad Dr. Pretorius (Ernest Thesiger) shows off his miniature life forms to induce Henry Frankenstein (Colin Clive again) to return to his electrodes and cadavers. Even the stately laboratory sequences (so creepy in the first film) are played for laughs with overly lit and distorted close-ups on the grimaces of Thesiger and Clive. Of course, there is the bride's long-awaited unveiling accompanied by wedding bells, a ceremony ruined by her shrewish hisses when the Monster arrives to claim his mate. So well does Whale slip the micky into any potential fright that he spawns a Bride of Frankenstein Syndrome which, to this day, afflicts such other morbidity moguls as George Romero and Tobe Hooper who camp up their sequels to avoid living up to their previous standards.

While demystifying the horror, Whale does, however, manage to weave more subversion into this Hays-era production than in any of his other films. The slant on sacrilege (already present in Frankenstein) is here augmented ad absurdum. Kitsch Catholicism looms over almost every scene. A maudlin church organ accompanies the prayers of thanks of the blind hermit (O. P. Heggie) when the Monster pays him a friendly visit; then the scene fades out on a glowing crucifix. The Monster is even captured by townspeople and pilloried Christ-style; later he desecrates a graveyard effigy of a bishop.

Among Bride's assortment of twisted characters, Thesiger's Pretorius (a part intended for Claude Rains) is the consummate scene-stealer who, after all, sets the story's plot in motion. Beneath his Satanic surface, he is the only character rooted in his own ethics, as compared to Frankenstein (who is now even more flaky and hypocritical about Christian notions of "good" and "evil"). He is also most likely closest to Whale's own predilections. While inveigling Frankenstein to participate in the second creation, Pretorius looks coyly upon his former pupil and utters the darkly romantic line: "Alone you have created a man. Now, together we will make his mate." Like Charles Laughton's Dr. Moreau in Island of Lost Souls, Pretorius's sexual ambiguity suggests a counter-Eden where homosexuals give birth to heterosexuals. Whale's unabashed gayness, visible in most of his other films, is most evident in Bride, which, behind the cheap laughs, provides an inventive and audacious fantasy that stands the Genesis tale on its head and outwits all future imitators.

—Joseph Lanza

BRIEF ENCOUNTER

UK, 1945

Director: David Lean

Production: Cineguild; black and white, 35mm; running time: 85 minutes; length 7750 feet. Released 1945 by General Film Distributors, London, and in 1946 by Prestige Pictures. Re-released 1948 by ABFD, London. Filmed in England.

Producer: Noël Coward; screenplay: Noël Coward, David Lean, and Anthony Havelock-Allan, from the one-act play Still Life by Noël Coward; photography: Robert Krasker; editor: Jack Harris; sound: Stanley Lambourne and Desmond Dew; sound editor: Harry Miller; production design: L. F. Williams; music: from the 2nd Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff.

Cast: Celia Johnson (Laura Jesson); Trevor Howard (Dr. Alec Harvey); Cyril Raymond (Fred Jesson); Joyce Carey (Myrtle Bagot); Stanley Holloway (Albert Godby); Everly Gregg (Dolly Messiter).

Brief Encounter

Awards: New York Film Critics' Award, Best Actress (Johnson), 1946.

Publications

Script:

Coward, Noël, David Lean, and Anthony Havelock-Allan, Brief Encounter, in Three British Screenplays, edited by Roger Manvell, London, 1950; also included in Masterworks of the British Cinema, London, 1974.

Books:

Gaupp, Charles John, Jr., A Comparative Study of the Changes of 15 Stage Plays, Doctoral Study, University of Iowa, 1950.
 Levin, Milton, Noël Coward, New York, 1968.
 Morley, Sheridan, A Talent to Amuse: A Biography of Noël Coward, New York, 1969.
 Pratley, Gerald, The Cinema of David Lean, New York, 1974.

Silver, Alain, and James Ursini, David Lean and His Films, London, 1974.

Castelli, Louis P., and Caryn Lynn Cleeland, David Lean: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1980.

Lahr, John, Coward the Playwright, London, 1982.

Anderegg, Michael A., David Lean, Boston, 1984.

Knight, Vivienne, Trevor Howard: A Gentleman and a Player, London, 1986.

Dyer, Richard, Brief Encounter, London, 1993.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 28 November 1945.

Lean, David, Penguin Film Review (London), no. 4, 1947.

Lejeune, C. A., "The Up and Coming Team of Lean and Neame," in New York Times, 15 June 1947.

"David Lean," in Current Biography Yearbook, New York, 1953.

Holden, J., "A Study of David Lean," in Film Journal (New York), April 1956.

Conrad, Derek, "Living Down a Classic," in Films and Filming (London), May 1958.

- Watts, Stephen, "David Lean," in Films in Review (New York), April 1959.
- Whitehall, Richard, "Gallery of Great Artists: Trevor Howard," in Films and Filming (London), February 1961.
- Burles, Kenneth T., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Aspinall, Sue, "Women, Realism, and Reality in British Films 1943–53," in British Cinema History, edited by James Curran and Vincent Porter, London, 1983.
- Medhurst, A., "That Special Thrill: Brief Encounter, Homosexuality and Authorship," in Screen (Oxford), no. 2, Summer, 1991.
- Howard, T., "Brief Encounter," Reid's Film Index (New South Wales), no. 16, 1995.

* * *

In 1929 Leon Moussinac could, in his Panoramique du cinéma, declare "L'Angleterre n'a jamais produit un vrai film anglais." The remarkable renaissance of the British film at the end of World War II requires a very different judgement. In 1944, David Lean made Brief Encounter, the most characteristic and perfect British film of all time. Its debt to Noël Coward must not be underestimated, but it is Lean's film. Lean, having worked as an editor on films by Michael Powell and Anthony Asquith, began his career as a director in association with Coward on In Which We Serve, This Happy Breed, and Blithe Spirit. He then directed Brief Encounter, about the infatuation between a housewife and a married man, with such uncanny human awareness and real creative skill that it stands out against his later more ambitious and elaborate films.

Brief Encounter is on a small scale, intimate, and probing. Everything is obvious and yet nothing is. Laura Jesson, its suburban heroine, may not reach the dramatic solution of an Anna Karenina but what she does experience is no less poignant. We share her joys and sorrows of the moment until they carry her to the edge of tragedy. It cannot be seen entirely, however, as tragedy for there is an element of values and choice. Life is not simple and the greatness of the film lies in its awareness of this complexity. An insensitive critic once described the film as, "Two characters in search of a bed." French critics failed to see that there was a problem. But for characters like Laura and Alex, there were values that they honoured, even at the expense of pain. It is, in a way, a triumph for their common humanity. Very simply the end did not justify the means.

The happy unification of this tale of star-crossed lovers, the intense reality of their attraction and the universal nature of the experience is played against a background that is deeply and truly British. If being British is the spirit of the "stiff upper lip," then it is belied by the passionate note that runs through the film. The small joys of love, the impetus towards realization and fulfillment, the sense of threatened pleasures haunts the viewer from beginning to end. The perfect performances of that most subtle of all actresses, Celia Johnson, and of Trevor Howard contribute greatly to the success of the film. It is, though, the happy fusion of all the elements that give it a perspective and unity rare in the cinema.

The setting of the suburban railway station and its vicinity sees a great human drama take place. Everything about it is authentic down to the familiars who haunt it, the funny little people with their airs and graces and their trivial jokes and quarrels. Other dramatic incidents which occur in the film include the visit to the restaurant and the cinema; the humiliation and shame when reality shatters the dream; and the unexpected friend who turns up to interrupt their one possible night together. The film thus opens with the climax which is not fully understood until the gentle pain-filled voice of Laura relieves the happy but poignant days of a moment of life she will never forget.

There is one element that enhances the film in a most felicitous way. When Rachmaninoff wrote his 2nd Piano Concerto he could little have guessed that he was providing the theme music for a very beautiful and inspiring British film. Though it was not a commercial success in America, it was successful for the British cinema in terms of prestige.

—Liam O'Leary

A BRIGHTER SUMMER DAY

See GULING JIE SHAONIAN SHA REN SHIJIAN

BRINGING UP BABY

USA, 1938

Director: Howard Hawks

Production: RKO Radio Pictures Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 102 minutes (some sources state 100 minutes). Released 1938. Filmed in RKO studios and backlots.

Producer: Cliff Reid; screenplay: Dudley Nichols and Hagar Wilde, from a story by Hagar Wilde; photography: Russell Metty; editor: George Hively; music score: Roy Webb.

Cast: Cary Grant (David Huxley); Katharine Hepburn (Susan Vance); May Robson (Mrs. Carlton Random); Charles Ruggles (Major Applegate); George Irving (Alexander Peabody); Virginia Walker (Alice Swallow); Barry Fitzgerald; Walter Catlett.

Publications

Books:

- Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Howard Hawks, New York, 1962.
- Missiaen, Jean-Claude, Howard Hawks, Paris, 1966.
- Wood, Robin, Howard Hawks, London, 1968; revised edition, 1981.
- Dickens, Homer, The Films of Katharine Hepburn, New York, 1971.
- Eyles, Allen, compiler, Cary Grant Album, Shepperton, Surrey, 1971.
- Gigli, Jean A., Howard Hawks, Paris, 1971.
- Bazin, André, La Politique des auteurs: Entretiens avec Jean Renoir, etc., Paris, 1972; revised edition, 1984.
- Marill, Alvin H., Katharine Hepburn, New York, 1973.
- Vermilye, Jerry, Cary Grant, New York, 1973.
- Parish, James Robert, The RKO Gals, New Rochelle, New York, 1974.
- Deschner, Donald, The Films of Cary Grant, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1978.
- Murphy, Kathleen Q., Howard Hawks: An American Auteur in the Hemingway Tradition, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1978.
- Ciment, Michel, Les Conquêteurs d'un nouveau monde: Essais sur le cinéma américain, Paris, 1981.

Bringing Up Baby

Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

McBride, Joseph, Hawks on Hawks, Berkeley, 1982.

Mast, Gerald, Howard Hawks, Storyteller, Oxford, 1982.

Poague, Leland, Howard Hawks, Boston, 1982.

Belton, John, Cinema Stylists, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1983.

Britton, Andrew, Cary Grant: Comedy and Male Desire, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1983.

Carey, Gary, Katharine Hepburn: A Biography, London, 1983.

McIntosh, William Currie, and William Weaver, The Private Cary Grant, London, 1983; revised edition, 1987.

Schickel, Richard, Cary Grant: A Celebration, London, 1983.

Wansell, Geoffrey, Cary Grant: Haunted Idol, London, 1983.

Britton, Andrew, Katharine Hepburn: The Thirties and After, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1984.

Dupuis, Jean-Jacques, Cary Grant, Paris, 1984.

Freedland, Michael, Katharine Hepburn, London, 1984.

Morley, Sheridan, Katharine Hepburn: A Celebration, London, 1984.

Simsolo, Noel, Howard Hawks, Paris, 1984.

Ashman, Chuck, and Pamela Trescott, Cary Grant, London, 1986.

Edwards, Anne, Katharine Hepburn: A Biography, London, 1986.

Branson, Clark, Howard Hawks: A Jungian Study, Los Angeles, 1987.

Mast, Gerald, editor, Bringing Up Baby, New Brunswick, 1988.

Higham, Charles, and Ray Moseley, Cary Grant: The Lonely Heart, New York, 1989.

Articles:

New York Times, 4 March 1938.

Tozzi, Romana T., "Katharine Hepburn," in Films in Review (New York), December 1957.

Agel, Henri, "Howard Hawks," in New York Film Bulletin, no. 4, 1962.

Sarris, Andrew, "The World of Howard Hawks," in Films and Filming (London), July 1962.

Perkins, V. F., in Movie (London), December 1962.

"Hawks Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1963.

"Man's Favourite Director, Howard Hawks" (interview), in Cinema (Beverly Hills), November-December 1963.

Wise, Naomi, "The Hawksian Woman," in Take One (Montreal), January-February 1971.

Brackett, Leigh, "A Comment on the Hawksian Woman," in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1971.

- Murphy, K., "Of Bones, and Butterflies," in Movietone News (Seattle), June 1977.
- Johnson, Julia, in Magill's Survey of Cinema I, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Trueba, F., in Casablanca (Madrid), July-August 1981.
- Jewell, R. B., "How Howard Hawks Brought Baby Up: An Apologia for the Studio System," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Winter 1984.
- Keane, Marian, in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Autumn 1985.
- Lake, J. M., "What Are Girls Made Of?" Michigan Academician (Ann Arbor), vol. 26, no. 2, 1994.
- "Bringing Up Baby," Sequences (Montreal), no. 178, May-June 1995.

* * *

Bringing Up Baby employs the successful formula of such classic films as It Happened One Night and My Man Godfrey in which madcap heiresses pit their senses of fun, irreverence, and total irresponsibility against the seriousness, logic, and dignity of working class heroes. In such screwball comedies of the 1930s the leading couple's courtships of verbal battles provide a series of humorous sexual conflicts that are overcome but unresolved in the reconciliation during the "happy endings." Bringing Up Baby takes the antagonisms and extremes embodied in the screwball comedy a little further than any of the other films of the genre.

Starring Katharine Hepburn as the completely dotty heiress and Cary Grant as an overly stuffy, self-important paleontologist Bringing Up Baby exaggerates the lover-antagonist formula of the screwball comedy for a humorous battle between the sexes in which the stereotypes of sex roles are reversed. Hepburn's character is the aggressor, and her relentless pursuit of Grant engages him in a series of comic misadventures which become increasingly foolish as the movie progresses. Grant's character, who by nature is docile, submissive, and dutiful, has his dignity stripped away layer by layer in the course of Hepburn's bizarre schemes. But director Howard Hawks uses the division of his characters into masculine and feminine stereotypes in order to allow each to have a liberating effect on the other. When the two are united as a couple at the film's end, the effect is an uneasy integration of sex-role principles.

The Hawksian formula of sex-role reversals contained in comic opposites provided the underpinnings for Hawk's screwball comedies from the 1930s through the 1950s. In such movies as Twentieth Century, Bringing Up Baby, His Girl Friday, Ball of Fire, I Was a Male War Bride, and Monkey Business, Hawks relied on assertive heroines to peel away the dignity and mock seriousness of bumbling feminized heroes. As each hero's sense of identity and self-image crumbles, the ensuing confusion provides the comedy and the key to his liberation from a narrow restrictive code of behaviour. In such films as Bringing Up Baby and I Was a Male War Bride, Hawks pushes his male characters' sexual confusion to such extremes that they are forced to parade around in women's clothing.

Bringing Up Baby enjoys frequently revived popularity today due to its breakneck pace, superb comic timing, humorous swipes at sex roles, and partnering of Hepburn and Grant. But when the film was initially released in 1938, it met harsh criticism and indifferent audiences. Hepburn, who headed the Independent Theatre Owners Association list of "box-office poison" movie stars, grated on the critics' nerves. In addition to Hepburn's seeming unpopularity, a critical disdain for what the New York Times reviewer called a "zany-ridden product of the goofy farce school" may have contributed to the film's lack of success. However, in 1962, Sight and Sound critic Peter Dyer attested to the reversal in status and popularity of Bringing Up Baby: "The durability of Hawks's films lies in the way that they have a mysterious life of their own going on under the familiar, facile surfaces. It is the constant cross-graining of cliché and inventive detail which produces the shock of pleasure his best work provides."

—Lauren Rabinovitz

BROKEN BLOSSOMS

USA, 1919

Director: D. W. Griffith

Production: D. W. Griffith Inc.; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 95 minutes; length: 6 reels. Released 1919 through United Artists. Filmed December 1918 and January 1919; cost: $88,000.

Producer: D. W. Griffith; scenario: D. W. Griffith, from the story "The Chink and the Child" by Thomas Burke; photography: G. W.

Broken Blossoms

Bitzer; editor: James Smith; music: Louis F. Gottschalk; special effects: Hendrick Sartov.

Cast: Lillian Gish (Lucy, the Girl); Richard Barthelmess (Cheng Huan); Donald Crisp (Battling Burrows); Arthur Howard (Burrows's Manager); Edward Peil (Evil Eye); George Beranger (The Spying One); Norman Selby or "Kid McCoy" (A Prize Fighter); George Nicholls (London Policeman); Moon Kwan (Buddhist monk).

Publications

Books:

- Paine, Albert Bigelow, Life and Lillian Gish, New York, 1932.
 Wagenknecht, Edward, The Movies in the Age of Innocence, Norman, Oklahoma, 1962.
 Barry, Iris, D. W. Griffith: American Film Master, New York, 1965.
 Mitry, Jean, "Griffith," in Anthologie de cinéma, Paris, 1966.
 Gish, Lillian, with Ann Pinchot, The Movies, Mr. Griffith, and Me, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1969.
 O'Dell, Paul, Griffith and the Rise of Hollywood, New York, 1970.
 Hart, James, editor, The Man Who Invented Cinema: The Autobiography of D. W. Griffith, Louisville, Kentucky, 1972.
 Henderson, Robert, D. W. Griffith: His Life and Work, New York, 1972.
 Bitzer, G. W., Billy Bitzer: His Story, New York, 1973.
 Brown, Karl, Adventures with D. W. Griffith, edited by Kevin Brownlow, New York and London 1973; revised edition, 1988.
 Gish, Lillian, Dorothy and Lillian Gish, New York, 1973.
 Pratt, George C., Spellbound in Darkness, Connecticut, 1973.
 Wagenknecht, Edward, and Anthony Slide, The Films of D. W. Griffith, New York, 1975.
 Affron, Charles, Star Acting: Gish, Garbo, Davis, New York, 1977.
 Williams, Martin, Griffith: First Artist of the Movies, New York, 1980.
 Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
 Brion, Patrick, editor, D. W. Griffith, Paris, 1982.
 Andrew, Dudley, Film in the Aura of Art, Princeton, New Jersey, 1984.
 Mottet, Jean, editor, D. W. Griffith, Paris, 1984.
 Schickel, Richard, D. W. Griffith and the Birth of Film, London, 1984.
 Graham, Cooper C., and others, D.W. Griffith and the Biograph Company, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1985.
 Jesionowski, Joyce E., Thinking in Pictures: Dramatic Structures in D. W. Griffith's Biograph Films, Berkeley, 1987.
 Lang, Robert, American Film Melodrama: Griffith, Vidor, Minnelli, New Jersey, 1989.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, and Adam Barker, editors, Early Cinema: Space-Frame-Narrative, London, 1990.
 Gunning, Tom, D.W. Griffith and the Origins of American Narrative Film: The Early Years at Biograph, Urbana, Illinois, 1991.
 Pearson, Roberta E., Eloquent Gestures: The Transformation of Performance Style in the Griffith Biograph Films, Berkeley, 1992.
 Simmon, Scott, The Films of D.W. Griffith, Cambridge and New York, 1993.

Articles:

- New York Times*, 14 May 1919.
Variety (New York), 18 May 1919.

- Mayer, A. L., "The Origins of United Artists," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1959.
 Tozzi, Romano, "Lillian Gish," in Films in Review (New York), December 1962.
 Mitchell, George J., "Billy Bitzer—Pioneer and Innovator," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), December 1964 and January 1965.
 Griffith issue, in Film Culture (New York), Spring-Summer 1965.
 Meyer, Richard, "The Films of David Wark Griffith: The Development of Themes and Techniques in 42 of His Films," in Film Comment (New York), Fall-Winter 1967.
 Bowser, Eileen, and Iris Barry, in Film Notes, New York, 1969.
 Amengual, Barthélémy, "Quelques remarques sur Le Lys brisé," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Spring, 1972.
 Casty, Alan, "The Films of D. W. Griffith," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), Spring 1972.
 Lenning, Arthur, "D. W. Griffith and the Making of an Unconventional Masterpiece," in Film Journal (New York), Fall-Winter 1972.
 Bracourt, G., in Ecran (Paris), February 1973.
 "Griffith Issue" of Films in Review (New York), October 1975.
 Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1975.
 Kepley, Jr., Vance, Jr., "Griffith's Broken Blossoms and the Problem of Historical Specificity," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (Pleasantville, New York), Winter 1978.
 Lesage, Julia, "Broken Blossoms: Artful Racism, Artful Rape," in Jump Cut (Chicago), 1981.
 Andrew, Dudley, "Broken Blossoms: The Art and Eros of a Perverse Text," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (Pleasantville, New York), Winter 1981.
 Browne, Nick, "Griffith's Family Discourse: Griffith and Freud," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (Pleasantville, New York), Winter 1981.
 Lynn, K. S., "The Torment of D. W. Griffith," in American Scholar (Washington, D.C.), no. 2, 1990.
 Vanoye, Francis, "Rhétorique de la douleur," in Vertigo, no. 6–7, 1991.
 Merritt, R., "In and Around Broken Blossoms," in Griffithiana (Gemona, Italy), October 1993.
 Flitterman-Lewis, S., "The Blossom and the Bole: Narrative and Visual Spectacle in Early Film Melodrama," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), vol. 33, no. 3, 1994.
 DeCroix, R., and J. L. Limbacher, "In Memory of Lillian Gish (1893–1993): First Lady of American Cinema," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 22, no. 2, Summer 1994.

* * *

Broken Blossoms is Griffith's most intricate film, a delicate mood piece that is set within a sharply confined space and delimited amount of time. The film opened to critical acclaim in this country with reviewers responding particularly to Lillian Gish's bravura performance and Henrick Sartov's soft-focus photography. Its most profound effect, however, was felt by European filmmakers. In France, where the film premiered in 1921, it became something of a cult object. French impressionist directors like Louis Delluc, Marcel L'Herbier, and Germaine Dulac tried consciously to emulate its stylized lighting and atmospheric effects. As Vance Kepley stated, "Broken Blossoms may have been to the early French experimenters what Intolerance was to the Soviets.” Louis Moussinac summed up the admiration French filmmakers felt for Griffith’s film: “C’est le chef-d’oeuvre du cinema dramatique.”

Broken Blossoms came as something of a surprise to critics who knew Griffith only through The Birth of a Nation, Intolerance, or his World War I extravaganza, Hearts of the World. In fact, this modest film shot in 18 days on a shoe-string budget, was at first considered box office poison. When Griffith approached Paramount to distribute the film as a special, Adolph Zukor unhesitatingly turned him down. “Everybody in it dies,” he wrote. Mindful of the recent failure of Nazimova’s The Red Lantern and Sessue Hayakawa’s waning popularity, Zukor concluded that the brief vogue for film chinoiserie had passed and was eager to let Griffith distribute it himself. Griffith paid Zukor $250,000 for it, and eventually released it through the newly formed United Artists; dressed up with an elaborate live prologue, three separate orchestras and choirs, and a specially tinted screen, the film garnered a small fortune.

Today, the film’s critical stock is soaring: Broken Blossoms is widely regarded as Griffith’s masterpiece, eclipsing even his better known epics. Lillian Gish’s masterful performance aside, critics have been especially impressed by the formal sophistication and narrative complexity of Griffith’s film. It is, above all, a film marked by terrific compression. The concentration of time and space gives characters, objects, and decor sustained metaphorical power that is never dissipated. Just as skillful is the dramatic structure which gives the impression of simple straightforwardness while camouflaging an intricate intertwining of expository and narrative sequences.

Thematically, the film is perhaps Griffith’s most adventurous work. Susan Sontag has called Griffith “an intellect of supreme vulgarity and even inanity,” whose work ordinarily reeks of fervid moralizing about sexuality and violence. But in Broken Blossoms he lowers his guard, nearly breaching his cherished Victorian convictions. Activities obviously taboo in The Birth of a Nation and Intolerance—a racially mixed love affair, auto-eroticism, opium eating, sado-masochism, revenge killing—are transformed here into sensually satisfying pastimes that resonate in dangerously non-conformist ways. For once in Griffith’s work, racial bigotry is a target for reproach. The few citations to post-war 1919 American culture, far from catering to the rampant xenophobia and mood of self-congratulation, hint at the dark side of American provincialism. The glancing references to munition workers, American sailors, and First World War battles illustrate the west’s penchant for self-destructiveness and violence.

—Russell Merritt

BRONENOSETS POTEMKIN

(Battleship Potemkin)

USSR, 1925

Director: Sergei Eisenstein

Production: First Goskino; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: 86 minutes at silent speed; length 1850 meters, or 6070 feet.

Released 18 January 1926. Re-released 1956 with a second musical score by Nikolai Kryukov. Filmed from July through November 1925, in Leningrad, Odessa, and aboard the 12 Apostles (the sister ship of the Prince Potemkin of Taurida).

Producer: Jacob Bliokh; scenario and screenplay: Sergei Eisenstein, from an outline by Nina Agadzhanova-Shutko in collaboration with Sergei Eisenstein; titles: Nikolai Aseyev; photography: Edward Tisse; editor: Sergei Eisenstein; art director: Vasili Rakhals; music (original background score): Edmund Meisel.

Cast: Sailors of the Red Navy; Citizens of Odessa; Members of the Proletkut Theatre, Moscow; Alexander Antonov (Vakulinchuk); Grigori Alexandrov (Chief Officer Gilerocsky); Vladimir Barsky (Captain Golikov); Alexander Lyovshin (Petty Officer); Beatrice Vitoldi (Mother with baby carriage); I. Bobrov (Humiliated soldier); Andrei Fait (Officer on piano); Konstantin Feldman (Student Fel’dman); Protopopov (Old man); Korobei (Legless veteran); Yulia Eisenstein (Lady bringing food to mutineers); Prokopenko (Mother of wounded Aba); A. Glauberman (Aba); N. Poltautseva (School teacher); Brodsky (Intellectual); Zerenin (Student); Mikhail Gomarov (Militant sailor).

Publications

Scripts:

Eisenstein, Sergei, The Battleship Potemkin, London, 1968; as Potemkin, New York, 1968; also included in Three Films, edited by Jay Leyda, New York, 1974.

Books:

Ginzburg, S. S., “Artistic Imagery in the Film The Battleship Potemkin,” in The History of Film, Moscow, 1960.

Leyda, Jay, “On Potemkin,” in Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.

Seton, Marie, S. M. Eisenstein, New York, 1960.

Kleinman, N. I., and K. B. Levina, Bronenosets Potemkin—Shedevry Sovetskogo Kino (The Battleship Potemkin, Masterpieces of Soviet Cinema), Moscow, 1969.

Mayer, David, Eisenstein’s “Potemkin,” New York, 1972.

Eisenstein, S. M., Autobiography, translated by H. Marshall and Toby Wright, London, 1978.

Marshall, Herbert, editor, The Battleship Potemkin, New York, 1978.

Murray, Edward, “Potemkin,” in 10 Film Classics, New York, 1978.

Leyda, Jay, and Zina Vignow, Eisenstein at Work, New York, 1982.

Eisenstein, Sergei M., Immoral Memories: An Autobiography, translated by Herbert Marshall, Boston, 1983.

Marshall, Herbert, Masters of the Soviet Cinema: Crippled Creative Biographies, London, 1983.

Polan, Dana B., The Political Language of Film and the Avant-Garde, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1985.

Aumont, Jacques, Montage Eisenstein, London, 1987.

Eisenstein, Sergei M., Selected Works, Volume 1: Writings 1922–1934, edited by Richard Taylor, London, 1988.

Bronenosets Potemkin

Bordwell, David, Cinema of Eisenstein, Cambridge, 1993.
 Goodwin, James, Eisenstein, Cinema, and History, Urbana, Illinois, 1993.
 Lövgren, Håkan, Eisenstein's Labyrinth: Aspects of a Cinematic Synthesis of the Arts, Stockholm, 1996.
 Termine, Liborio, La drammaturgia del film, Torino, 1998.

Articles:

Mendel, George Victor, in Kinemathek (Berlin), 5 January 1926.
 Barrett, Wilton A., in National Board of Review Magazine (New York), November 1926.
 Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, December 1926.
 Grierson, John, in New York Herald Tribune, 5 December 1926.
Variety (New York), 8 December 1926.
 Solski, "The End of Eisenstein," in Commentary (New York), March 1949.
 Evsevitsky, Vladislav, "Soviet Films in Pre-September Poland," in Kwartalnik Filmowy (Warsaw), nos. 3–4, 1951.
 Freilich, Semyon, "A Comparison of Potemkin and Ivan the Terrible: Eisenstein Today," in Soviet Literature Monthly, 1965.
 Montagu, Ivove, "Potemkin in Print," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1970.
 Kuleshov, Lev, "Kuleshov, Eisenstein, and the others: Part II: Kuleshov on Eisenstein," in Film Journal (New York), Fall-Winter 1972.
 Kauffmann, Stanley, "Eisenstein's Potemkin," in Horizon (London), Spring 1973.
 "El Acorazado Potemkin," in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 89–90, 1974.
 "Epos Revolucii," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), December 1975.
 Kieiman, N., "Tol'ko piatnadstat 'Kadrov,'" in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 3, 1976.
 "A for a es a tartalom egysegenek iskoklapeldaja," in Filmkultura (Budapest), May-June 1976.
 Chanjutin, J., in Film and Fernsehen (Berlin), November 1977.
 Van Wert, W. F., in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1980.
 Sklovski, V., "Kriznik pluje desetiletimi," in Film a Doba (Prague), November 1981.
 Wenden, D. J., "Film and Reality," in Feature Films as History, edited by K.R.M. Short, London 1981.
 Felden, D. L., "Vision and Violence: The Rhetoric of Potemkin," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (New York), Fall 1982.

- Roth-Lindberg, O., in Chaplin (Stockholm), 1983.
- Almendros, N., "Fortune and Men's Eyes," in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1991.
- "Yo postskriptum till unikt livsode," in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 3, 1992.
- Biorsmark, C. "Odessa tror inte på trooper," Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 36, no. 6, 1994/95.
- De Marinis, G. "I [love] Sergej," Cineforum (Bergamo), vol. 35, April 1995.
- Eisenstein, S.M., "Meggymag a lepcson," Filmvilag (Budapest), vol. 38, no. 8, 1995.
- Seesslen, G., "Die anderen Moeglichkeiten des Kinos," EPD Film (Frankfurt/Main), vol. 14, December 1995.
- Sorensen, B., "Drama i sortehavet da Panserkrysseren Potemkin kom til Oslo," Z Filmtidsskrift (Oslo), no. 4, 1995.
- Musina, M., and others, "Boitsy vspominaiut minuvshie dni," Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 5, 1996.
- Vallerand, F., "Musiques pour Eisenstein," Sequences (Quebec), no. 183, March/April 1996.

* * *

Sergei M. Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin is one of the most influential films ever made as well as one of the finest examples of film art. On its release, the film brought immediate worldwide fame to Eisenstein and the new Soviet cinema and made an important contribution to the language of the cinema—the concept of montage editing.

After the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917 the new Soviet government assumed control of the film industry, denounced the capitalist cinema of pre-Revolution Tsarist Russia, and decreed that the Soviet cinema was to be used for education and propaganda—to indoctrinate the Russian masses and to promote class consciousness throughout the world. Battleship Potemkin was made in order to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the unsuccessful 1905 Revolution against the Tsar. Although the film was originally supposed to chronicle the entire rebellion, Eisenstein decided to limit the story to just one representative episode—the mutiny on the Potemkin and the subsequent civilian massacre on the steps leading down to Odessa harbour.

Battleship Potemkin, like Eisenstein's earlier film, Strike, has several documentary-like qualities. For example, Eisenstein cast most of the characters in the film according to the notion of typeage—the selection of a non-actor to play a role because he/she is the correct physical type for the part. Eisenstein preferred to use non-actors since, as he explained, "A 30 year old actor may be called upon to play an old man of 60. He may have a few days' or a few hours' rehearsal. But an old man will have had 60 years' rehearsal." Eisenstein shot the film on location—on the Odessa steps and aboard the Potemkin's sister ship, The Twelve Apostles (the Potemkin had already been dismantled). The film has a collective hero; the Russian masses—the mutineers on the Potemkin, the people of Odessa, the sailors who mutiny on the other ships—who rebel against Tsarist oppression.

Despite the film's documentary look, it was very carefully constructed on every level, from the distribution of line, mass, and light in individual shots to the perfectly balanced five-act structure of the overall film. The most remarkable feature of the film's construction, however, is the montage editing.

Eisenstein's theory of montage—based on the Marxist dialectic, which involves the collision of thesis and antithesis to produce a synthesis incorporating features of both—deals with the juxtaposition of shots, and attractions (e.g. lighting, camera angle, or subject movement) within shots, to create meaning. Rather than the smooth linkage of shots favored by many of his contemporaries (e.g. V. I. Pudovkin and D. W. Griffith). Eisenstein was interested in the collision and dialectical synthesis of contradictory shots as a way to shock and agitate the audience.

Eisenstein identified five methods of montage: metric, rhythmic, tonal, overtone, and intellectual. Metric montage concerns conflict caused by the lengths of shots. Rhythmic montage concerns conflict generated by the rhythm of movement within shots. In tonal montage, shots are arranged according to the "tone" or "emotional sound" of the dominant attraction in the shots. In overtone montage, the basis for joining shots is not merely the dominant attraction, but the totality of stimulation provided by that dominant attraction and all of its "overtones" and "undertones": overtone montage is, then, a synthesis of metric, rhythmic, and tonal montage, appearing not at the level of the individual frame, but only at the level of the projected film. Finally, intellectual montage involves the juxtaposition of images to create a visual metaphor.

All five types of montage may be found in Potemkin's Odessa Steps sequence in which Tsarist soldiers massacre Odessa citizens who are sympathetic to the Potemkin mutineers. An example of metric montage is the increase in editing tempo to intensify audience excitement during the massacre. Rhythmic montage occurs in the conflict between the steady marching of the soldiers and the editing rhythm, which is out of synchronization with the marching, as well as the chaotic scrambling of the fleeing crowd, and the rolling movement of a runaway baby carriage. Tonal montage occurs in the many conflicts of planes, masses, light and shadow, and intersecting lines, as in the shot depicting a row of soldiers pointing their rifles down at a mother and her son, the soldiers' shadows cutting transversely across the steps and the helpless pair. Although Eisenstein claimed to have discovered overtone montage while editing Old and New four years after Battleship Potemkin, overtone montage can be detected in the Odessa Steps sequence in the development of the editing along simultaneous metric, rhythmic, and tonal lines—the increase in editing tempo, the conflict between editing and movement within the frame, and the juxtapositions of light and shadow, intersecting lines, etc. Finally, there is an example of intellectual montage at the end of the sequence, after the Potemkin has responded to the massacre by firing on the Tsarist headquarters in Odessa. Three shots of marble lions—the first is sleeping, the second waking, and the third rising—seen in rapid succession give the impression of a single lion rising to its feet, a metaphor for the rebellion of the Russian masses against Tsarist oppression.

When Battleship Potemkin was first released, it drew mixed reactions in the Soviet Union: many people praised the film, while others denounced it, charging Eisenstein with "formalism"—a preference for aesthetic form over ideological content. However, once they realized that foreign audiences loved the film, Soviet officials began to support it, and it soon became a popular and critical success, both inside and outside the Soviet Union. Today Battleship Potemkin ranks with The Birth of a Nation and Citizen Kane as one of the most influential films in cinema history.

—Clyde Kelly Dunagan

DIE BÜCHSE DER PANDORA

(Pandora's Box; Lulu)

Germany, 1928

Director: George Wilhelm Pabst

Production: Nero Film A. G. (Berlin); black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: 140 minutes originally, other versions are 131 minutes and 120 minutes; length: 3254 meters originally. Released 30 January 1929. Filmed 1928 in Berlin.

Producer: George C. Horsetzky; scenario: Ladislaus Vajda and Joseph R. Fliesner, from 2 plays, Erdgeist and Die Büchse der Pandora, by Frank Wedekind; photography: Günther Krampf; editor: Joseph R. Fliesler; art direction: Andrei Andreiev and Gottlieb Hesch; music: Curtis Ivan Salke; costumes: Gottlieb Hesch.

Cast: Louise Brooks (Lulu); Fritz Kortner (Dr. Peter Schön); Franz Lederer (Alwa Schön, the Son); Carl Götz (Schigolch, Papa Brommer); Alice Roberts (Countess Anna Geschwitz); Daisy d'Ora (Marie de Zarnika); Krafft Raschig (Rodrigo Quast); Michael von Newlinsky (Marquis Casti-Piani); Siegfried Arno (Stage manager); Gustav Diessl (Jack the Ripper).

Publications

Scripts:

Vajda, Ladislaus, and Joseph R. Fliesner, Pandora's Box (Lulu): A Film by G.W. Pabst, New York, 1971.

Books:

Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, New Jersey, 1947.

Weinberg, H., and L. Boehm, Index to the Creative Work of Pabst, New York, 1955.

Bauche, Freddy, G.W. Pabst, Lyons, 1965.

Amengual, Barthélémy, Georg Wilhelm Pabst, Paris, 1966.

Aubry, Yves, and Jacques Pédat, "G. W. Pabst," in Anthologie du cinéma 4, Paris, 1968.

Manvell, Roger, and Heinrich Fraenkel, The German Cinema, New York, 1971.

Wollenberg, H. H., 50 Years of German Film, London, 1972.

Atwell, Lee, G. W. Pabst, Boston, 1977.

Brooks, Louise, Lulu in Hollywood, New York, 1982.

Articles:

Close Up (London), October 1928, April 1929, and May 1930. Variety (New York), 11 December 1929.

Bouissounousse, J., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), 1 May 1930.

Chiaramonte, N., in Scenario (Rome), no. 8, 1932.

Potamkin, Harry Alan, "Pabst and the Social Film," in Hound and Horn (New York), January-March 1933.

Viazzi, G., in Cinema (Rome), no. 170, 1943.

Pandolfi, V., in Cinema (Rome), no. 26, 1949.

Bachmann, Gideon, editor, "G.W. Pabst," in Cinemages (New York), May 1955.

Card, James, "Out of Pandora's Box," in Image (Rochester, New York), September 1956.

Brooks, Louise, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1965.

Luft, Herbert, "G. W. Pabst," in Films and Filming (London), April 1967.

Rayns, Tony, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1974.

Serceau, D., in Image et Son (Paris), March 1980.

Veillon, O. R., in Cinématographe (Paris), March 1980.

Petat, J., in Cinéma (Paris), 1 April 1980.

"Loulou Issue" of L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 December 1980.

Ramasse, F., "Le sexe de Pandore," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1981.

Elsaesser, Thomas, "Lulu and the Meter Man," in Screen (London), July-October 1983.

"Pabst Issue" of Skrien (Amsterdam), September 1983.

Paris, B., "Our Wild Miss Brooks," in American Film, November 1989.

"Pabst es Lulu," in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 4, 1991.

"Loulou," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), May-June 1995.

Kermabon, Jacques, "Sous les L de L'ange bleu," in Vertigo (Paris), January 1996.

Hastie, Amelie, "Louise Brooks: Star Witness," in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 36, no. 3, Spring 1997.

* * *

Pandora's Box brings to mind familiar questions about film-as-art—whether the art arises from the director's work, from the performances, from the editor's decisions, or from a combination of all these elements. Pandora's Box might well be an unremarkable film without the magnificent presence of Louise Brooks, but then again, this presence was never evoked by any director other than G. W. Pabst. The source of the magic is elusive.

Nothing about the film is obvious, least of all Pabst's technique. Pabst is known for having promoted the practice of cutting on movement as a means of minimizing the jarring effect of editing. Rather than carry the practice to a lyrical extreme, Pabst exercised restraint and made only subtle use of the technique. Yet, in his hands, cutting on even the slightest movement can communicate significantly and almost subliminally. For example, after Schigolch gives Alwa cards to put up his sleeve during the gambling ship sequence, Schigolch begins to creep away screen-right. As the scene changes, his movement is continued by Rodrigo as he creeps in the same direction towards Lulu in another part of the ship. Above and behind Rodrigo is a sculpture of a crocodile mounted high on the wall. With great economy Pabst has identified to Schigolch and Rodrigo as slimy beasts of prey. At no time do the camera work and the editing call attention to themselves. Even when watching with the express purpose of detecting technical patterns, one must constantly pull back from the hypnotic fluidity of the film. Pabst weaves the perfect storyteller's spell with his technique.

The film's style is as elusive as its technique. Pandora's Box seems to be composed of several segments, each with its own distinct style. Lulu's relationship with Dr. Schön is psychologically realistic. Expressionistic elements darken and distort the London coda with Jack the Ripper. A Hollywood-style show-business revue is accompanied by a backstage sequence with a delightful play of high spirits and frantic energies crossing and colliding. It is a self-consciously comical scene, especially in the antics of the beleaguered stage manager.

Die Büchse der Pandora

This same sequence illustrates another notable quality of the film—a closeness or an inwardness which confines without being oppressive. During the revue we see the action on stage from the wings and once from the front of the stage itself, but never from the audience's perspective. Space is claustrophobic in this film. The rare outdoor scenes are hemmed in by night and/or fog, as in the London Salvation Army scenes and the escape in a rowboat from the smoke-filled gambling ship. This sense of closeness is heightened by Pabst's avoidance of any but the most sparing and economical use of camera movement.

The camera is restricted in terms of mobility, but its perspective of Lulu is privileged. Rarely is she observed from another character's point of view. The camera is a separate party in the action, a witness to all aspects of Lulu's behavior. She is watched both as a participant and as an observer, giving the viewer a rich sense of personal knowledge of the character, a familiarity which far surpasses the surface acquaintanceships secured with the other characters.

The film was not received with any enthusiasm in its debut. Perhaps its proximity to the two Frank Wedekind plays on which it was based, Erdgeist and Die Büchse der Pandora, prevented viewers from approaching the film on its own terms. The character of Lulu in the plays was characterized through her speech, while Pabst's and Brook's Lulu was presented in a manner appropriate to the film medium, in a performance which today is recognized as one of the finest, most provocative in all of film.

—Barbara Salvage

BUDJENJE PACOVA

(The Awakening of the Rats; The Rats Wake Up)

Yugoslavia, 1967

Director: Zivojin Pavlovic

Production: Filmska Radna Zajednica; running time: 86 minutes.

Screenplay: Gordan Mihic and Ljubisa Kozomara; photography: Milorad Jaksic-Fandjo; editor: Olga Skrigin; music: Natko Devcica.

Cast: Slobodan Perovic; Dusica Zegarac; Severin Bijelic; Nikola Milic; Snezana Lukic; Pavle Vujisic.

Publications

Articles:

Variety (New York), 12 July 1967.

Combs, Richard, Films and Filming (London), September 1969.

* * *

That the 1960s were a time for re-evaluation in Yugoslavia was apparent on a national level as an even more decentralized constitution was put into effect in 1963. This coincided in the cinema with a spirit of exploration, evaluation and more liberal expression that became known as New Film and later the Black Film movement.

Born in 1933, Zivojin (Zika) Pavlovic, a graduate of the Academy of Applied Arts in Belgrade, was perhaps the bleakest proponent of the Black Film wave. The bleakness of Pavlovic's vision is, however, tempered with his non-sentimental sympathy for his protagonists, who remain humane in spite of adversity. His use of ironic black humour and his carefree construction of scenes allows the viewer to perceive a complicated inner reality beyond the surface realism. He has championed manipulation of the film medium as part of his message. Yet Pavlovic tells a straightforward story in the simplest of styles.

Pavlovic is equally respected as an author, filmmaker, and professor of film direction. In his fiction writing and ten feature films to date, he has unswervingly held to an austere and brutal naturalism captured in a lean prose style and an equally non-obtrusive camera and editing style. His territory is the margin of society and his protagonists are basically simple people, good people who are overcome and betrayed by their environments. In The Awakening of the Rats the lover of the film's luckless male protagonist, Bamberg, tells him 'I've always wanted a decent life, but one slip and it all goes to hell,' just before she takes all of his borrowed money and skips town. With a script by two of Yugoslavia's best-known screenwriters and journalists, Gordan Mihic and Ljubisa Kozomara, the film is shot as many of his early films are in darkly shadowed black and white, appropriately matching Pavlovic's dim view of human relations. The set in The Awakening of the Rats examines the bleak slums of the city. An equivocal and realistic record of poverty in former Yugoslavia, the film is a classic.

—Mike Downey

BUILD MY GALLOWS HIGH

See OUT OF THE PAST

IL BUONO, IL BRUTTO, IL CATTIVO

(The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly)

Italy, 1966

Director: Sergio Leone

Production: P.E.A.; Technicolor, 35mm, Techniscope; running time: 180 minutes, English version is 162 minutes. Released 1966 in Italy; released 1968 in US. Filmed 1965–66 in Spain.

Producer: Alberto Grimaldi; screenplay: Luciano Vincenzoni and Sergio Leone, from a story by Age Scarpelli, Sergio Leone, and Luciano Vincenzoni; titles designer: Ardani; photography: Tonino

Il Buono, Il Brutto, Il Cattivo

Delli Colli; editors: Nino Baragli and Eugenio Alabiso; art director: Carlo Simi; music: Ennio Morricone; special effects: Eros Bacciucci; costume designer: Carlo Simi.

Cast: Clint Eastwood (Joe); Eli Wallach (Tuco); Lee Van Cleef (Setenza); Aldo Giuffrè; Chelo Alonso; Mario Brega; Luigi Pistilli; Rada Rassimov; Enzo Petito; Claudio Scarchilli; Al Mulock; Livio Lorenzon; Antonio Casas; Sandro Scarchilli; Angelo Novi; Benito Stefanelli; Silvana Bach; Antonio Casas; Aldo Sambrell.

Publications

Books:

Staig, Laurence, and Tony Williams, Italian Westerns, London, 1975.
 Parish, James Robert, and Michael R. Pitts, editors, The Great Western Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1976.
 Fornari, Oreste de, Sergio Leone, Milan, 1977.
 Frayling, Christopher, Spaghetti Westerns: Cowboys and Europeans: from Karl May to Sergio Leone, London, 1981.
 Johnstone, Iain, The Man with No Name, London, 1981.
 Zwijewsky, Boris, and Lee Pfeiffer, The Films of Clint Eastwood, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1982.
 Cole, Gerald, and Peter Williams, Clint Eastwood, London, 1983.
 Cebe, Gilles, Sergio Leone, Paris, 1984.
 Fornari, Oreste de, Tutti i Film di Sergio Leone, Milan, 1984.
 Guerif, François, Clint Eastwood, Paris, 1984; New York, 1986.

Cumbow, Robert C., Once Upon a Time: The Films of Sergio Leone, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1987.

Simsolo, Noël, Conversations avec Sergio Leone, Paris, 1987.

Claudio, Gianni di, Directed by Sergio Leone, Chieti, 1990.

Ortoli, Philippe, Une Amérique de légendes, Paris, 1994.

Articles:

Baldelli, Pio, in Image et Son (Paris), May 1967.

Time (New York), 4 August 1967.

Pierre, Sylvie, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April-May 1968.

Durgnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), November 1968.

Badekerl, Klaus, in Filmkritik (Munich), October 1969.

Frayling, Christopher, "Sergio Leone," in Cinema (London), August 1970.

Wallington, Mike, "Italian Westerns—A Concordance," in Cinema (London), August 1970.

Graziani, Sandro, in Bianco e Nero (Rome), September-October 1970.

Ferrini, Franco, "L'anti-Western e il caso Leone," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), September-October 1971.

Baudry, Pierre, "Idéologie du western italien," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1971.

Kaminsky, Stuart M., in Take One (Montreal), January-February 1972.

Bodeen, DeWitt, "Clint Eastwood," in Focus on Film (London), Spring 1972.

Jameson, Richard, "Something To Do With Death," in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1973.

Simsolo, Noël, "Notes sur les Westerns de Sergio Leone," in Image et Son (Paris), September 1973.

Chevassu, François, "Ennio Morricone," in Image et Son (Paris), Spring-Summer 1974.

Beale, Lewis, "From Spaghetti Cowboys to the Jewish Gangsters of New York," in Los Angeles Times Calendar, 7 November 1982.

Mininni, F., in Castoro Cinema (Florence), November-December 1988.

Ovrebø, O. A., "Makkverket, mesterverket og kulten," in Z Filmtidsskrift (Oslo), no. 4, 1992.

* * *

The western for Sergio Leone is a genre in which he can explore his own sad, comic, grotesque, and surreal vision of life. Leone is no more interested in what could or did happen in the West than he is in any conception of surface reality in his films. The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly is a comic nightmare more in the tradition of Kafka than that of John Ford or Howard Hawks.

Although Clint Eastwood had, with Leone, established the anti-hero in A Fistful of Dollars and For a Few Dollars More, it was here, in their third and final film together, that they set out to destroy the more simplistic image so successfully that they contributed to the decline of the western in cinema. In the film, the Eastwood character ("the Good" of the title), called "Blondie" quite ironically by Tuco ("the Ugly"), is both amused by and aloof from the grotesque world. The massive destruction of the film as exemplified by the Civil War (against which the quest for buried gold is played) demonstrates an evil beyond "the Good" man's capacity to control it. With this totally corrupt world around him, he is more interested in living according to a certain style, showing others that he knows how to face danger with amusement and without fear. In this sense, the Eastwood/Leone hero becomes an almost mystic survivor, a new ironic Christ offering a way to face life.

“The Bad” in the film (Lee Van Cleef’s “Angel Eyes,” itself an ironic appellation) is in many ways similar to “the Good.” Neither is defined in his goodness or badness by the traditional morality. Between the two non-extremes stands, or rather scurries, Tuco, “the Ugly”—physically coarse, bearded, a bit dirty, but vibrant and alive in contrast to the other two cold characters. Tuco is hyper-human, and can show great affection as well as great hatred and violence. He has no cunning, is open and direct with an earthy simplicity and sense of humor. Good and Bad are false moral extremes. The ugly represents the human who acts out of animal immediacy without recourse to postures or guilt. Whenever Tuco resorts to poses (as a soldier, a friend) he suffers.

In the film, Leone’s use of the extreme close-up is a major device for getting to character; plot is of minimal interest. What is important is the examination of these characters. The close-up is used as ironic balance and the pan for thematic emphasis. For example, the dizzying pan which follows Tuco around the graves near the end of the film indicates the frenzy of Tuco in the midst of death as he seeks the hidden gold.

In an interview Leone said that in “The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly, I demystified the adjectives. What do Good, Bad or Ugly mean? What does it mean when these characters are three killers thrown into the midst of a civil war? In that film, I was pursuing the theme that Chaplin so masterfully exposed in Monsieur Verdoux.”

The film is filled with a number of vivid and powerful visual moments: the opening sequence ending with Tuco in freeze-frame, chicken leg in hand, flying through a window; Angel Eyes’ calm murder of the man (and his family) who hired him for the job; Tuco’s confrontation with his priest brother; Tuco and Blondie’s trek through the desert; the battle at the river; the graveyard search for gold; and Tuco’s theft of a gun from a frightened gunsmith.

The feeling of unreality is central to the film and Leone’s work in general. The film is a world of bizarre coincidence and horror. The apparent joy and even comedy in the destruction and battle scenes are often followed by some personal touch that underlies the real meaning of the horror which only moments before had been amusing. The dynamiting of the bridge between the Union and Confederate troops is presented as a touch of low comedy with Blondie pushing down Tuco’s rear end before the moment of explosion. Yet this scene is preceded by the death of the sympathetic Union officer and followed immediately by an encounter with the dying young man to whom Blondie gives his poncho and his cigar, the two central marks of his minimal identity. The comedy and horror of meaninglessness are thus important in the film.

The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly is a series of contradictions. It is serious and comic, moral and amoral, concerned with the meaning of history while indifferent to the facts of history, unconcerned with reality while filled with moments of tangible character and objects. Like the triumvirate it establishes in the title, the film is not about right or wrong, good or bad, just or unjust. It is a comic vision not far removed from the literature of Kafka or Celine in which we walk on the visual boundary line of comic ugliness.

That the popular press found the film amusing but meaningless upon its release is but an expected footnote in the history of works of popular culture which were unrecognized by critics who thought that a violent, comic, and highly popular work could not possibly be worthy of serious attention.

—Stuart M. Kaminsky

BURNT BY THE SUN

See OUTOMLIONNYE SOLNTSEM

THE BUTCHER

See LE BOUCHER

BYE BYE BRASIL

(Bye Bye Brazil)

Brazil, 1979

Director: Carlos Diegues

Production: Produções Cinematográficas L.C. Barreto; Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes. Released 18 February 1980 in Rio de Janeiro/São Paulo. Filmed in north, northeast, and central Brazil in 1978–79.

Producer: L. C. Barreto; associate producers: Walter Clark, Carlos Braga, Luciola Villela; screenplay: Carlos Diegues and Leopoldo Serran; photography: Lauro Escorel; editor: Mair Tavares; art direction: Anísio Medeiros; sound: Victor Raposeiro, Jean-Claude Laurex; music: Chico Buarque, Roberto Menescal, and Dominginhos.

Cast: Betty Faria (Salomé); José Wilker (Lorde Cigano); Fábio Júnior (Ciço); Zaira Zambelli (Dasdô); Príncipe Nabor (Andorinha); Emanuel Cavalcanti (The Mayor); Carlos Kroeber (The Truck Driver); Jofre Soares (The Old Projectionist); Marieta Severo (The Social Worker).

Publications

Books:

Oroz, Silvia, Carlos Diegues—Os Filmes Que Não Filmei, Rio de Janeiro, 1984.

Johnson, Randal, Cinema Novo X 5—Masters of Contemporary Brazilian Film, Texas, 1984.

Mitchell, Robert, in Magill’s Survey of Cinema—Foreign Language Films—Volume 1, edited by Frank Magill, New Jersey, 1985.

Burton, Julianne, Cinema and Social Change in Latin America—Conversations with Filmmakers, Texas, 1986.

Articles:

Alencar, Miriam, Jornal do Brasil (Rio de Janeiro), 11 January 1979.

Lima, Antônio, Jornal da Tarde (São Paulo), 15 September 1979.

Variety (New York), 19 December 1979.

Portinari, Maribel, O Globo (Rio de Janeiro), 27 December 1979.

Falcone, Maria Carolina, Tribuna da Imprensa (Rio de Janeiro), 7 January 1980.

Fassoni, Orlando, Folha de São Paulo (São Paulo), 15 February 1980.

Pereira, Edmar, Jornal da Tarde (São Paulo), 16 February 1980.

Perdigão, Paulo, Veja (São Paulo), 20 February 1980.

Bye Bye Brasil

Fassoni, Orlando, Folha de São Paulo (São Paulo), 22 February 1980.
 Ferreira, Jairo, Folha de São Paulo (São Paulo), 22 February 1980.
 Filho, Rubens Ewald, A tribuna (Santos, São Paulo), 23 February 1980.
 Diegues, Carlos, Agora (São José dos Campos, São Paulo), 8 March 1980.
 Ferreira, Fernando, O Globo (Rio de Janeiro), 28 March 1980.
 Leite, Ricardo Gomes, Estado de Minas (Mines Gerais), 10 June 1980.
 Grelier, R., Image et Son (Paris), July-August 1980.
 Neves, David, Filme Cultura, number 35/36, July/August/September, 1980.
 Schiller, Beatriz, Jornal do Brasil (Rio de Janeiro), 30 September 1980.
 Tournes, A., "Exploration d'un continent," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1980.
 Schiller, Beatriz, Jornal do Brasil (Rio de Janeiro), 14 October 1980.
 Edelman, R., "Carlos Diegues and Cinema Novo," in Films in Review (New York), December 1980.
 Cluny, C. M., Cinéma (Paris), December 1980.
O Globo (Rio de Janeiro), 20 December 1980.
 Stam, R., Cineaste (New York), Winter 1980/81.

Pierre, Sylvie, "Des douleurs des uns et du bonheur des autres," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1981.
 Pierre, Sylvie, "A Propos de Bye Bye Brasil," Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1981.
 Maia, Reinaldo da Costa, Filme Cultura, number 37, January/February/March, 1981.
 Pouillade, J.-L., "Terres en tranes," in Positif (Paris), May 1981.
 Rollins, P. C., "Bye Bye Brasil: An Ambivalent Allegory about Third World Development," in Film and History (New Jersey), December 1982.

* * *

"Bye Bye Brasil is about a country which is just finishing and making way for another one which is just beginning. I can't say exactly what is finishing, nor what is beginning. I am merely recording this unique moment, this dividing line in the story of four people, who, like any of us, seek their place in the new order, and in life." Carlos Diegues, one of the founders of the Cinema Novo movement, used these words to define his eighth film, in which he remained true to one of his favourite themes: "The search for freedom and the desire for greater happiness.” This theme had already been exploited in his fine trilogy on historical Negro figures—Ganga Zumba, Rei dos Palmares (his first feature, made in 1963); Xica da Silva (1975), and Quilombo (1983).

In the case of Bye Bye Brazil, the principal character is Brazil itself, experiencing in 1980, an incipient democracy. The country is viewed through the eyes of a troupe of circus artists whose talent for survival is greater than their ability to attract audiences to their performances, held under a patched big top in small towns in the Brazilian hinterland. In a country where so much has disappeared, the people’s anxious longings for bread and circuses remain intact, although audiences of the new Brazil now favour the circus provided by the electronic media.

Fifteen thousand kilometers of the North, Northeast, and Central Brazil were covered in the filming of Bye Bye Brazil, following the tracks of the Caravana Rolidei (a play on the word “holiday”). The troupe is led by Lorde Cigano (Lord Gypsy), a loquacious and charismatic wise guy, played by José Wilker. His partner in bed and on stage is the sensuous Salomé, the Queen of the Rumba (Betty Faria), while Andorinha (little sparrow) is the Muscle King (Príncipe Nabor). The grandiose noms de guerre of the artists are in sharp contrast to the troupe’s meagre accessories—a single truck—and with the poverty stamped on the faces of whatever spectators they attract to their performances.

The Rolidei Roadshow starts its progress in a tiny town in the Northeast, on the banks of the São Francisco river. The roguish Lorde Cigano promises the audience that he will fulfill the dream of every Brazilian: he will make it “snow” in the dry lands of the interior. And sure enough, “snow” flakes start to fall on the humble and ignorant audience, to the accompaniment of “White Christmas,” sung by Bing Crosby—a magical moment of filmmaking. A struggling musician, Çiço (Fábio Júnior) is enchanted by the magic of the troupe; he is sick of the river and longs to see the sea. Together with his pregnant wife Dasdô, he joins the Roadshow. Their destination is rich Altamira, deep in the Amazon rainforest, symbol of the easy money obtained from illegal logging and goldmining, sustained by near-slave labour.

In a path which never runs smooth, the troupe stops to see the sea—but the waters are polluted. They come across entire towns mesmerized by a single television set, proudly occupying the town’s main square. “In the old days, politicians used to promise bridges; now they promise a television set,” grumbles Lorde Cigano, unable to muster an audience for his show. Dominated by the fish’s skeletons—as the magician refers to the television antennas—Bye Bye Brazil reveals a country whose regional characteristics run the risk of disappearing as a result of the massification of conduct and expectation produced by television.

In Amazônia, amongst the survivors of a “civilized” Indian tribe, they meet an old Indian woman who listens to her transistor radio, which seems to be glued to her ear, adores Coca Cola, and dreams of flying in an aeroplane. In Brasília, a social worker extols the wonders of the city—a city whose planners forgot to build low-income housing, relegating the workers to the outskirts of the city. Rejected and left to fend for themselves in their hereditary misery, the people co-exist with portents of progress, symbolized by televisions and the jets which take labourers to work for foreign exploiters in the Amazon. To seek redemption and happiness becomes a lottery, with few winning tickets; nor is the straight and narrow necessarily the path to success. In this confrontation between the past and the present, old traditions are nostalgically laid to rest. No audiences queue for tickets to The Rolidei Roadshow, a remnant from the time when entertainment was live and itinerant. Likewise, an old man who made his living showing classic Brazilian films on a portable screen in the town squares no longer bothers to set up his equipment.

As the members of the troupe discover a Brazil in constant transformation, they also discover each other. The art of survival requires certain concessions; thus Lorde Cigano has no qualms about abetting the prostitution of Salomé when the money runs short. Çiço falls in love with Salomé, while Lorde Cigano is taken with Dasdô, and the context of sexual liberty combined with the idea of a country which was also in search of more freedom. The couples split up in Belém, to meet years later. Each lives their own version of fulfillment. Çiço and Dasdô perform in a dance hall on the outskirts of Brasília, in a more “modern” way. Lorde Cigano has made money through the illegal gold market and now sports a modern truck with neon lights with Frank Sinatra singing Aquarela do Brasil on the sound system and a team of chorus girls. As Lorde Cigano says at the beginning of the film, “dreams are only offensive to those who don’t dream.”

With one eye on the paradoxes which permeate Brazilian society and the other on reverie, Carlos Diegues produces a bittersweet X-ray of a country undergoing change. The fluent narrative, impregnated with farce, humour, sensuality, and music broaches the varied aspects of the human, social, and geographic condition of the country. The principal characters retain their own identities, despite the highly dissimilar contexts in which they find themselves; they interact spontaneously with the host of motley secondary characters they meet along the way. Regional differences are well illustrated by the varied sound track, and the beautiful photography of Lauro Escorel’s photography captures the lushness of the vegetation as well as the barren inlands, and rich regional detail, gleaned from market, river, and roadside scenes.

The key to the success, in Brazil and overseas, of Bye Bye Brazil lies in the solidarity of the viewer with the picaresque characters and their quest for a better life. It is dedicated to the people of the 21st Century, and does not flinch from the reality of the present nor does it discard the dream: in the final scene, Lorde Cigano and Salomé take to the road again, and drive off into the sun.

—Susana Schild

C

CABARET

---

USA, 1972

Director: Bob Fosse

Production: Allied Artists Pictures, ABC Pictures; Technicolour; 35mm; running time: 123 minutes. Filmed on location in West Berlin and at Bavaria Atelier Gesellschaft, Munchen, West Germany.

Producer: Cy Feuer; screenplay: Jay Allen, based on the musical play by Joe Mastertoff, from the play by John van Druten, based on the original book by Christopher Isherwood; photography: Geoffrey Unsworth; editor: David Bretherton; choreography: Bob Fosse; assistant directors: Douglas Green, Wolfgang Glattes; production design: Rolf Zehetbauer; art direction: Hans-Jurgen Kiebach; music: John Kander; lyrics: Fred Ebb; music supervisor: Ralph Burns; sound: Robert Knudson, David Hildyard; costumes: Charlotte Fleming.

Cast: Liza Minnelli (Sally Bowles); Michael York (Brian Roberts); Joel Grey (Master of Ceremonies); Helmut Griem (Maximilian von Heune); Fritz Wepper (Fritz Wendel); Marisa Berenson (Natalia Landauer); Elizabeth Neumann-Viertel (Fraulein Schneider); Helen Vita (Fraulein Kost); Sigrid von Richtofen (Fraulein Mayr).

Awards: Oscars for Best Director, Best Actress (Minnelli), Best Supporting Actor (Grey), Best Cinematography, Best Song Score, Best Editing, Best Art/Set Decoration, and Best Sound, 1972.

Publications

Books:

Altman, Rick, The American Film Musical, Bloomington, Indiana, 1989.

Grubb, Kevin B., Razzle Dazzle: The Life and Work of Bob Fosse, New York, 1989.

Gottfried, Martin, All His Jazz: The Life and Death of Bob Fosse, New York, 1990.

Mizejewski, Linda, Divine Decadence: Fascism, Female Spectacle, and the Makings of Sally Bowles, Princeton, New Jersey, 1992.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 16 February 1972.

Marill, A. H., Films in Review (New York), March 1972.

Filmfacts (London), number 2, 1972.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1972.

Milne, T., Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1972.

Vallance, T., Focus on Film (London), Summer 1972.

Buckley, P., Films and Filming (London), August 1972.

Blades, Joe, "The Evolution of Cabaret," Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 1, 1973.

Chion, M., "La comédie musicale rêve au réalisme," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1982.

Vecchiali, P., Image et Son (Paris), November 1972.

Serceau, M., "L'archetype Lola: réalisme et métaphore" in CinémaAction (Courbevoie), April 1984.

Mizejewski, L., Journal of Film and Video (Boston), Fall 1987.

Clark, R., "Bending the Genre: The Stage and the Screen," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1991.

Rodda, Arlene, "Cabaret: Utilizing the Film Medium to Create a Unique Adaptation," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 22, no. 1, 1994.

Campbell, V., "Michael York in Cabaret," in Movieline (Escondido, California), vol. 7, July 1996.

"Cabaret de Bob Fosse: Découpage plan à plan après montage et dialogues in-extenso," in Avant-Scène Cinéma (Paris), no. 464, July 1997.

* * *

Based on the Berlin short stories by Christopher Isherwood, the play I Am a Camera, and the Broadway production of the same name, Cabaret was shot in West Germany in the early 1970s. Centered primarily around the seedy Kit Kat Klub, the film ruthlessly depicts Berlin in the last days of the decadent Weimar Republic, and the terrifying rise of Nazism in 1930s Germany.

Fosse cleverly interweaves the action taking place on the stage of the club with the political and social action occurring in the streets. The musical numbers performed for the most part impeccably by Liza Minnelli as Sally Bowles, and her entourage, a group of sleazy female musicians and dancers, mirror real life, and are directed beautifully by the manipulative Master of Ceremonies (brilliantly performed by Joel Grey).

Brian Roberts (Michael York), an aspiring author and repressed homosexual, comes to Berlin to write and to teach English. He finds himself living in the bohemian boarding house inhabited by Bowles, and is introduced to the sexually liberating atmosphere of the Kit Kat Klub. While the Master of Ceremonies reflects that: "... life is disappointing? Forget it! In here [the club] life is beautiful," the seediness and obvious vulgarity of the audience and performers reinforce that this is far from the truth. In another scene, a Nazi officer is booted out of the club by the manager; later we see the same man being brutally beaten by a group of young Nazi thugs.

Although Brian makes it clear to Sally that he is not at all interested in women sexually, the pair embark on an affair. The couple find their seemingly unreal existence complicated by the rich, mercurial Baron Maximilian von Heune (Helmut Griem) who tantalizes and tempts both of them. Sally is seduced by champagne, wonderful clothes, and the opulence and decadence of the baron's life—Brian, who is at first sceptical, and also a little jealous of the baron's uninhibited behaviour, is literally seduced by the man, who disappears as quickly as he enters their life. Sally discovers she is pregnant and briefly deludes herself that she and Brian have a future together. Finally she realizes that what they have experienced is completely removed from her reality, and she has an abortion. Brian leaves Germany, and Sally continues her life as a cabaret singer in Berlin.

Cabaret

Against this storyline, two of Brian's language students fall in love. Feckless Fritz (Fritz Wepper), a fortune hunter, seizes his chance when he meets beautiful and rich Jewish heiress, Natalia (Marisa Berenson), only to fall genuinely in love with her. Natalia believes Fritz is a Christian and recognizing the political instability of Germany, and the brutality of the Nazis she refuses to have anything to do with him. Only when Fritz confesses that he is a Jew pretending to be a Christian, does Natalia agree to marry him.

The changing political atmosphere and growth of anti-semitism in Germany is illustrated by the victimization of Natalia in her family home by a group of young boys, who eventually slaughter her dog and leave it on her doorstep. Brian also witnesses the frightening strength of the Fascists when he visits a beer garden with the baron. Arriving in the baron's limousine, the two men leave Sally sleeping in the car. While the two men are drinking, a lone very pure voice begins to sing "Tomorrow Belongs to Me," slowly and with great feeling. The camera focuses on the young man's almost perfect Aryan features, tracking the increasing fervour with which he sings. Gradually, other members of the beer garden begin to stand up and join in, the camera closing in on the glazed expressions on their faces. Finally, when almost everyone is on their feet, the camera pans down and reveals the Nazi armband of the young man who instigated the singing. This technique was used in Nazi propaganda films. Brian and the baron leave to the sound of the group's harmony, climbing into their luxurious car and driving away—indicating that because the baron is rich and Sally and Brian are foreigners they will always have the option to leave this horrendous reality behind.

Cabaret is an incredibly innovative film. Now regarded as a classic, the film's use of colour, the garishness of the costumes, the smokiness of the club, the brightness and exaggeration of the make-up emphasize the decadence of the time. The musical score and choreography are well crafted and performed, and are deliberately kept to the stage of the Kit Kat Klub ("Tomorrow Belongs to Me" is the only exception to this). Minnelli performs her songs emotively and convincingly, if anything she is too good for the small, decadent atmosphere of the Klub.

On its release in 1972, Cabaret was received to great acclaim—winning eight Academy Awards, and three Golden Globe Awards.

—A. Pillai

THE CABINET OF DR. CALIGARI

See DAS KABINETT DES DR. CALIGARI

CABIRIA

Italy, 1914

Director: Giovanni Pastrone (under the name of Piero Fosco)

Production: Itala Film (Turin); black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: originally 210 minutes; length: originally 14,746 feet, later versions cut to 8345 feet. Released 18 April 1914, Turin. Filmed 1913 in Turin on specially constructed sets; exteriors shot in Tunisia, Sicily, and the Alps; cost: 1 million lire ($100,000).

Screenplay: Giovanni Pastrone and Gabriele D'Annunzio (though D'Annunzio's contributions to the script were reportedly minimal if not non-existent); titles: Gabriele D'Annunzio; photography: Segundo de Chomon, Giovanni Tomatis, Augusto Batagliotti, and Natale Chiusano; musical score originally accompanying film: Ildebrando Pizzetti; literary and dramatic advisor: Gabriele D'Annunzio.

Cast: Italia Almirante Manzini (Sophonisba); Vitale de Stefano (Massinissa); Bartolomeo Pagano (Maciste); Lidia Quaranta (Cabiria); Umberto Mozzato (Fulvio Axilla); Enrico Gemelli (Archimedes); Alex Bernard (Siface); Raffaele di Napoli (Bodastoret); Luigi Chellini (Scipione); Ignazio Lupi (Arbace).

Publications

Books:

- Jarratt, Vernon, The Italian Cinema, London, 1951.
 O'Leary, Liam, The Silent Cinema, London, 1965.
 Museo Nazionale del Cinema Torino, Cabiria, Turin, 1977.
 Cook, David, A History of the Narrative Film, New York, 1981.
 Finocchiaro-Chimirri, Giovanna, D'Annunzio e il cinema "Cabiria," Catania, 1986.
 Gethmann, Daniel, Daten und Fahrten: Die Geschichte der Kamerafahrt, "Cabiria" und Gabriele d'Annunzios Bilderstrategie, Munich, 1996.

Articles:

- Bioscope* (London), 30 April 1914.
Kine Monthly Film Record (London), June 1914.

Cabiria

- Bianco e Nero* (Rome), July-August 1952.
 "Cabiria Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), Summer 1975.
 Cugier, A., "Discours de l'idéologie, idéologie du discours," in Cahiers de la Cinématheque (Perpignan), no. 26-27, 1979.
Classic Images (Indiana, Pennsylvania), July 1982.
 Lane, J. F., "Cabiria: And Now Pizzetti's Fire Symphony," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1983.
 De Vincenti, G. "Il kolossal storico-romano nell'immaginario del primo Novecento," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), vol. 44, no. 1, January-March, 1988.
 Cherchi Usai, Paolo, "Imitation? Paraphrase? Plagiat?" in Cinémathèque (Paris), no. 1, May 1992.
Sequences (Montreal), no. 177, March-April 1995.
 Alovio, Silvio, "El poder de la puesta en escena: Cabiria entre la atracción y el relato," translated by Isabel Monzo-Gandia, in Archivos de la Filmoteca, (Valencia), vol. 20, June 1995.
 Celli, Carlo J., "Cabiria as a D'Annunzian Document," in Romance Languages Annual (West Lafayette), vol. 9, 1997.

* * *

Standing out from all the stumbling efforts toward a new expression of cinema, Giovanni Pastrone's story of the Second Punic War, Cabiria, demands special attention. Compared to the other colossal Italian spectacles of its time, it had an integrity and sense of purpose. From the beginning it was regarded as something special, and its premiere at the Teatro Vittorio Emmanuele, Turin, on 18 April 1914 was a great occasion. The film's accompanying score by Ildebrando Pizzetti, performed by an orchestra of 80 and a choir of 70, added to the excitement. Viewed today, the film has lost little of its epic poetry to the zeitgeist, though the acting performances may seem dated.

This story of a young girl lost amidst the clashes of two great nations retains its human interest as well as its power to amaze and astonish. The association of Gabriele d'Annunzio's name with the film reminds us of his dictum, "The Cinema should give spectators fantastic visions, lyric catastrophes and marvels born of the most audacious imagination," though, in fact, d'Annunzio's actual contribution to this film was very small. He was paid a large sum for the use of his name in promotion. What does bear his mark are the highly poeticized inter-titles which are a part of the film's continuity, as they harmonize in style and feeling with the images. The film is consistently and stylishly in the grand manner. When the servant describes Massinissa to her mistress Sophonisba she says, "He is like a wind from the desert bringing the scent of dust and lions and the message of Astarte." Few film heroes have had such a build-up.

Apart from the magnificence of the sets and the pulsating action of the story, the film is important for the patient research that produced such striking results and gave conviction to the historical setting. The great Temple of Moloch must have been one of the largest structures for a film up to that time. It and the Carthaginian palaces certainly influenced Griffith's Babylon in Intolerance. Infinite pains were taken with details which fitted effectively into the vast canvas.

Technically the film is also remarkable for its photography by the Spaniard Segundo de Chomon. The use of the moving camera has never been so effective in its almost imperceptible transitions. Every device of camera craft is used to produce a smoothly flowing narrative.

There is so much richness in this film: the great scenes of Hannibal crossing the Alps with his army and elephants; the eruption of Etna, and the destruction of the Roman fleet at Syracuse by means of the sun-reflectors of Archimedes. Most of these effects were achieved by multiple exposure. The acting is fairly theatrical, but the performances of Italia Almirante Manzini as Sophonisba and Vitale de Stefano as Massinissa are moving and impressive, while Bartolomeo Pagano, as Maciste the strong man, adds a new figure to the mythology of the movies. Cabiria therefore stands as a major filmic achievement at a time when the cinema was fighting for its place among the other arts.

—Liam O'Leary

LA CADUTA DEGLI DEI

(The Damned)

Italy-Germany, 1969

Director: Luchino Visconti

Production: Pegaso Film-Italnolggio (Italy), Eichberg Film-Praesidens (West Germany); Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 164 minutes, English version: 155 minutes. Released December 1969.

Producers: Alfredo Levy and Ever Haggiag; executive producer: Pietro Notarianni; screenplay: Nicola Badalucco, Enrico Medioli and Luchino Visconti; photography: Armando Nannuzzi and Pasquale De Santis; editor: Ruggero Mastroianni; sound mixer: Renato Cadueri; recording director: Vittorio Trentino; art director: Pasquale Romano; set designer: Enzo Del Prato; music: Maurice Jarre; special effects: Aldo Gasparri; costume designers: Piero Tosi and Vera Marzot.

Cast: Dirk Bogarde (Friedrich Bruckmann); Ingrid Thulin (Baroness Sophie von Essenbeck); Helmut Griem (Aschenbach); Helmut Berger (Martin von Essenbeck); Charlotte Rampling (Elisabeth Thallman); Florinda Bolkan (Olga); Reinhard Kolldehoff (Baron Konstantin von Essenbeck); Umberto Orsini (Herbert Thallman); Albrecht Schönhals (Baron Joachim von Essenbeck); Renaud Verley (Guenther von Essenbeck); Nora Ricci (Governess); Irina Wanka (Lisa Keller); Valentina Ricci (Thilde Thallman); Karin Mittendorf (Erika Thallman); Peter Dane (Steelworks employee); Wolfgang Hillinger (Yanek); Bill Vanders (Commissar); Howard Nelson Rubien (Rector); Werner Hasselmann (Gestapo official); Mark Salvage (Police inspector); Karl Otto Alberty, John Frederick, Richard Beach (Army officers); Claus Höhne, Ernst Kühn (SA officers); Wolfgang Ehrlich (SA soldier); Esterina Carloni and Antonietta Fiorita (Chambermaids); Jessica Dublin (Nurse).

Publications

Script:

Badalucco, Nicola, Enrico Medioli, and Luchino Visconti, Caduta degli dei, Capelli, 1969.

Books:

Ferrara, Guisepppe, Visconti, Paris, 2nd edition, 1970.

Dickinson, Thorold, A Discovery of Cinema, Toronto, 1971.

Baldelli, Pio, Luchino Visconti, Milan, 1973.

Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, Visconti, London, 1973.

Bianchi, Pietro, Maestri del cinema, Milan, 1977.

Ferrero, Adelio, editor, Visconti: il cinema, Modena, 1977.

Tornabuoni, Lietta, editor, Album Visconti, Milan, 1978.

Stirling, Monica, A Screen of Time: A Study of Luchino Visconti, New York, 1979.

Servadio, Gaia, Luchino Visconti, Milan, 1980; translated as Luchino Visconti: A Biography, London, 1981, New York, 1983.

Rondolini, Gianni, Luchino Visconti, Turin, 1981.

Bencivenni, Alessandro, Luchino Visconti, Florence, 1982.

Tonetti, Claretta, Luchino Visconti, Boston, 1983.

Ishaghpour, Youssef, Luchino Visconti: Le sens et l'image, Paris, 1984.

Sanzio, Alain, and Paul-Louis Thirard, Luchino Visconti: Cinéaste, Paris, 1984.

De Guisti, Luciano, I film di Luchino Visconti, Rome, 1985.

Geitel, Klaus, and others, Luchino Visconti, 4th edition, Munich, 1985.

La caduta degli dei

Mancini, Elaine, Luchino Visconti: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1986.

Villien, Bruno, Visconti, Paris, 1986.

Schifano, Laurence, Luchino Visconti: Les Feux de la passion, Paris, 1987.

Miccichè, Lino, Luchino Visconti: un profilo critico, Venice, 1996.

Bacon, Henry, Visconti: Explorations of Beauty and Decay, Cambridge and New York, 1998.

Articles:

Hofsess, John, in Take One (Montreal), May-June 1969.

Wilson, David, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1969-70.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 18 December 1969.

Film Society Review (New York), February 1970.

Cecil, Norman, in Films in Review (New York), February 1970.

Crowds, Gary, in Film Society Review (New York), February 1970.

“Visconti Issue” of Cinema (Rome), April 1970.

Davies, Brenda, in Films and Filming (London), May 1970.

Delmar, Rosalind, “La Caduta degli Dei: The Damned,” in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1970.

Tarratt, Margaret, “The Damned: Visconti, Wagner, and the Reinvention of Reality,” in Screen (London), Summer 1970.

Mellen, Joan, “Fascism in the Contemporary Film,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1971.

Korte, Walter F., “Marxism and Formalism in the Films of Luchino Visconti,” in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1971.

“Ingrid Thulin Comments on Visconti,” in Dialogue on Film (Washington, D.C.), no. 3, 1972.

Marx, J., “A tragedia alkonya,” in Filmkultura (Budapest), November-December 1973.

Lyons, D., “Visconti’s Magnificent Obsessions,” in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1979.

Badalucco, N., “Film architettura in tre atti,” in Cinema Nuovo (Rome), July-October 1989.

Badalucco, N., “Come si scrive una sceneggiatura,” in Cinema & Cinema (Bologna), September-December 1989.

Camera/Stylo (Paris), December 1989.

Ward, E., “The Great Films: Three Views of the Holocaust,” in Classic Images (Muscatine, Iowa), September 1991.

* * *

The Damned is the story of a bitter power struggle within a family of powerful German industrialists, the von Essenbecks, set against the early years of the Third Reich. When the film opens, on the day of the burning of the Reichstag, the head of the firm, Baron Joachim von Essenbeck, is due to retire. His eventual heir is his grandson, Martin, but he has two possible immediate inheritors: his brother, Baron Konstantin, vice-president of the firm and a member of the SA, and Herbert Thallman, a liberal anti-fascist and former vice-president. Behind the scenes, however, Baroness Sophie, Martin's mother and widow of Joachim's oldest son, and her lover, Friedrich Bruckmann, the company manager, form an alliance with Joachim's nephew Aschenbach, an SS member, to gain control of the firm. They shoot Joachim, but make it look as if Herbert was the culprit, and he is forced to flee. With the aid of Martin, Friedrich becomes president, but Konstantin discovers that Martin is a paedophile and blackmails him in an attempt to gain control himself. He, however, is eliminated by the SS during the Night of the Long Knives. Sophie and Friedrich are now in complete control, but refuse to accept that they are dependent for support on SS man Aschenbach. He therefore sets out to destroy them.

Like so many of Visconti's films, The Damned is the story of the decline and decomposition of a family, and as in Senso and The Leopard in particular, the fortunes of individuals are linked to wider developments at a climactic moment of history. There are also, as various critics have pointed out, significant parallels with Mann's Buddenbrooks, which showed the decline of a German business family through the increasing paralysis of will of its various members, amounting to a kind of death wish which seemed to echo the exhaustion of the whole Imperial regime. Both film and novel open with preparations for a family dinner party, and the title of the opening chapter of the latter, "The Decadence of a Family," could easily serve as the sub-title for The Damned as a whole. And if Mann's family mirrors the decline of the Imperial regime, Visconti's is a microcosm of Germany's industrial elite faced with the Nazi "Machtergreifung." The film has been called "the Krupp family history as Verdi might have envisaged it," but one could just as aptly substitute the names of Kirdorf, Thyssen, Schnitzler or any of the other industrialists who supported Hitler. More specifically, the murder of Joachim could be seen as representing the liquidation of the old, conservative ruling class by the new National Socialist order; the framing of Herbert for the murder parallels the framing of the Left for the Reichstag fire (especially as his surname, Thallman, irresistibly recalls the name of Thalmann, one of the Communist leaders arrested after the fire); and the killing of Konstantin by the SS (of which Aschenbach is a member) entwines the family history in the early power struggles amongst the Nazis, which culminated in the liquidation of the more populist, "radical" elements in the famous Night of the Long Knives. It is then only a matter of time before Martin and Aschenbach are in total control, representing the fusion of party, capital, and military under a leadership which is both supreme and also pathologically unstable.

However, there are problems with relying too heavily on such a reading, which does not do justice to the film as a whole. If we go too far down this road we soon encounter a criticism made by Rosalind Delmar, among others, namely that "fascism itself remains unexplored, becoming a backdrop to the action rather than an intrinsic part of it; its relation to the family struggle remains intellectual rather than expressive." Or as Claretta Tonetti has written: "The passions of the members of the family have a separate existence from the political shaping of the country. . . . Politics remain in the background of the shocking internal struggle among the Essenbecks. The Nazi takeover has little to do with the impact of the scene in which Martin rapes his own mother." Unless, that is, one subscribes to an ultra-Reichian view of Nazism, or wants to ally The Damned with that curious tendency in Italian cinema, from Germany Year Zero to The Conformist, which seems worryingly keen to link support for extreme Right-wing politics with deviation from the heterosexual norm. Nor can the victory of National Socialism in Germany be explained wholly in terms of internal feuds amongst its old and new ruling interests—that way leads us straight to the by now rather stale criticism that Visconti, the one time Marxist, became increasingly over-interested in the affairs of the aristocracy and the haute bourgeoisie.

Better, then, to regard The Damned as one of Visconti's family melodramas, replete with his usual operatic and mythic inflections. Much of the action takes place within the sumptuous "set" of the Essenbeck mansion, and scenes between the individual characters alternate with those involving a larger "chorus." The Night of the Long Knives sequence forms a massive and spectacular central set-piece. Again like Mann, Visconti makes use of various Wagnerian leitmotifs, such as fire and play-acting, which become a key underpinning of the symbolic structure of the film. The fact that the film also carries such strong echoes of Macbeth, Dante's Inferno, Wagner's Gotterdammerung (the original title of the film, in fact), and the aforementioned Buddenbrooks, suggests strongly that Visconti sees The Damned not simply as a representation of history, nor simply as the working out of an intense family conflict, but also as having mythological significance (in the same way that Vaghe Stelle Dell'Orsa is a working out of the Oresteia myth). According to Geoffrey Nowell-Smith, "over and above what is directly stated in the film itself, myths imply a whole set of further statements about the permanence of certain driving forces in history and the trans-historical ineluctability of the tragic mechanism." The problem here, however, according to Nowell-Smith, is that "unlike in Vaghe Stelle, the myth element is neither unitary nor fully integrated into the structure of the narrative." As a consequence, the mythical overtones not only add nothing to the story but actually rather work against the historical and personal-dramatic elements. As Nowell-Smith concludes, "in the last analysis the Essenbecks are only the Essenbecks, more interesting to the world, perhaps, than the average family, because of the power of their capital; but their fall (only to rise again, without a doubt, in 1945) is neither the end of civilization nor its restoration."

In short, The Damned, without being one of Visconti's finest films, is still a remarkable work, but it is one which, for its own sake, needs to be rescued from some of the more inflated claims—political, psycho-sexual, and mythological—which have sometimes been made for it, albeit with the best of intentions.

—Julian Petley

CAIRO STATION

See BAB EL HADID

CAMILLE

USA, 1936

Director: George Cukor

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 115 minutes, some sources state 108 minutes. Released 1936. Filmed in the MGM studios.

Producer: Irving G. Thalberg, some sources list David Lewis; screenplay: Zoe Akins, Frances Marion, and James Hilton, from the novel and play La Dame aux camélias by Alexandre Dumas (fils); photography: William Daniels and Karl Freund; editor: Margaret Booth; music: Herbert Stothart; costume designer: Adrian.

Cast: Greta Garbo (Marguerite Gautier/Camille); Robert Taylor (Armand Duval); Lionel Barrymore (Monsieur Duval); Henry Daniell (Baron de Varville); Lenore Ulric (Olympe); Jessie Ralph (Nanine); Laura Hope Crews (Prudence Duvernoy); Elizabeth Allan (Nichette); Russell Hardie (Gustave).

Awards: New York Film Critics' Award, Best Actress (Garbo), 1937.

Camille

Publications

Books:

- Bainbridge, John, Garbo, New York, 1955.
 Conway, Michael, and others, The Films of Greta Garbo, New York, 1963.
 Langlois, Henri, and others, Hommage à George Cukor, Paris, 1963.
 Durnat, Raymond, and John Kobal, Greta Garbo, New York, 1965.
 Carey, Gary, Cukor and Company: The Films of George Cukor and His Collaborators, New York, 1971.
 Corliss, Richard, Greta Garbo, London, 1976.
 Phillips, Gene D., George Cukor, Boston, 1982.
 Bernadoni, James, George Cukor: A Critical Study and Filmography, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1985.
 McGilligan, Patrick, George Cukor, a Double Life: A Biography of the Gentleman Director, New York, 1991.
 Levy, Emanuel, George Cukor, Master of Elegance: Hollywood's Legendary Director and His Stars, New York, 1994.

Articles:

- New York Times*, 23 January 1937.
Variety, (New York), 27 January 1937.
 "How Cukor Directs Garbo," in Lion's Roar (Hollywood), November 1941.
 Huff, Theodore, "The Career of Greta Garbo," in Films in Review (New York), December 1951.
 Tynan, Kenneth, "Garbo," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1954.
 Prouse, Derek, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1955.
 Tozzi, Romano, "George Cukor," in Films in Review (New York), February 1958.
 Brooks, Louise, "Gish and Garbo—the Executive War on Stars," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1958–59.
 Reid, John, "So He Became a Lady's Man," in Films and Filming (London), August 1960.
 Reid, John, "Women and Still More Women," in Films and Filming (London), September 1960.
 Guez, Gilbert, "George Cukor: de Garbo a Marilyn il a instaure le Star-System," in Cinéma (Paris), 1 January 1963.
 Bowers, Ronald, "Robert Taylor," in Films in Review (New York), January 1963.
 "Cukor Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1964.
 Gillett, John, and David Robinson, "Conversation with George Cukor," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1965.
 Nordberg, Carl Eric, "Greta Garbo's Secret," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1970.
 Phillips, Gene D., "George Cukor: An Interview," in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1972.
 Grisolia, M., "George Cukor ou comment le desir vient aux femmes," in Cinéma (Paris), February 1974.
 Powers, James, editor, "Dialogue on Film: George Cukor," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), February 1978.
 Bodeen, DeWitt, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Bodeen, DeWitt, "George Cukor," in Films in Review (New York), November 1981.
 Palni, D., "Le Roman de Marguerite Gautier," in Cinéma (Paris), May 1981.

Radio Times (London), 7 September 1985.

Lippe, Richard, "Cukor and Garbo," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 35, 1994.

* * *

Garbo's Camille not only contains her best screen performance, but hers remains the definitive Camille. No actress in her right mind would dare do a re-make, because she would be inviting comparisons with the Garbo performance, which would not be to her advantage. In fact, some years ago, when Tallulah Bankhead was asked, along with other stars of the stage, to name what she considered the greatest of all theatrical performances, she led off instantly with "Garbo in Camille," and no one argued her choice.

The role of Camille has always been thought of as the supreme test for the dramatic actress, just as Hamlet has become "a consummation devoutly wished" for the actor. As a character, she not only runs the gamut of emotion, she explores every facet of all emotion. Cukor saw Camille again after a long period of time, and remarked of Garbo's performance: "I was staggered [by] her lightness of touch the wantonness, the perversity of the way she played Camille, she played it as if she was the author of her own misery." Even Irving Thalberg, seeing her performance, remarked that she had never been so good. It was the scene where she sits in a box in the theatre, and Cukor demurred, "Irving, how can you tell? She's just sitting there," to which Thalberg remarked, "I know, but she's unguarded." The key to her entire performance of Marguerite Gautier, the Parisian cocotte known among her coterie as "Camille," can be summed up in that one word—"unguarded," held safe against all time. It was in the finest tradition of thoughtful restraint in acting for the camera.

In the theatre, the story of Marguerite Gautier has been acted by all the greats, including Eleonora Duse and Sarah Bernhardt. On the screen, its various versions starred such actresses as Clara Kimball Young, Theda Bara, Nazimova, and Norma Talmadge. American actresses resisted it as a talking role. Garbo alone, with Cukor's faith in her, wanted to do the part, knowing that it could be her greatest, and it was. Henry James wrote of the story that it had been written by Alexandre Dumas  fils when he was only 25, and added: "The play has been blown about the world at a fearful rate, but has never lost its happy juvenility, a charm that nothing can vulgarize. It is all champagne and tears, fresh perversity, fresh credulity, fresh passion, fresh pain. It carries with it an April air!"

In 1855, an American actress, Matilda Heron, was in Paris, and saw La Dame aux camélias played there. She made her own acting version, called it Camille, or The Fate of a Coquette, and played it all over the English-speaking world. She married, and gave birth to a daughter known as Bijou Heron, who married Henry Miller. Their son, Gilbert Miller, was one of the best producers Broadway and London ever knew. The stories surrounding Camille onstage and in films are endless, and involve nearly every important player's name. Either as Camille or as The Lady of the Camellias, it has been played by all the best actresses from Tallulah Bankhead to Ethel Barrymore, from Eva Le Gallienne to Lillian Gish, so that what they created onstage was revealed in the performance Garbo brought to the screen.

With her the part became not just about a heroine who lives well but unwisely; she became a beautiful worldly creature fated to find real love with a young man, whom she deserts because she knows that in staying with him, she is ruining his life. The lovers are reunited at her deathbed, and the audience always dissolves in tears. Seeing Garbo's death scene, an admirer remarked, "What a pity that Garbo had to die! We shan't see her again." After that last fadeout, it was not easy to believe that at least two of Garbo's best roles were still ahead, with her performances as Marie Waleska, Napoleon's love, in Conquest, and in the title role of Lubitsch's Ninotchka. Camille, however, remained her triumph for all time. It was her finest hour.

—DeWitt Bodeen

CAMPANADAS A MEDIONACHE

See CHIMES AT MIDNIGHT

CANAL

See KANAL

O CANGACEIRO

(The Bandit)

Brazil, 1953

Director: Victor Lima Barreto

Production: Cia. Cinematográfica Vera Cruz; black and white; running time: 105 minutes. Released in 1953. Filmed in São Paulo.

Producer: Cid Leite da Silva; screenplay: Victor Lima Barreto; dialogues: Rachel de Queiróz, based on original by Lima Barreto; photography: H. E. Fowle; editor: Oswald Hafenrichter; art director, production design, and costume designer: Caribé; sound: Erik Rasmussen and Ernst Hack; music: Gabriel Migliori; songs: Zé do Norte, and others of public domain.

Cast: Milton Ribeiro (Captain Galdino Ferreira); Alberto Ruschel (Teodoro); Marisa Prado (Olívia); Vanja Orico (Maria Clodia); Adoniran Barbosa; Ricardo Campos; Neuza Veras; Zé do Norte; Lima Barreto; Galileu Garcia; Nieta Junqueira; Pedro Visgo; João Batista Gioto; Manoel Pinto.

Awards: Named Best Adventure Film and special mention for sound track, Cannes Film Festival, 1953.

Publications

Books:

Viany, Alex, Introdução ao Cinema Brasileiro, Rio de Janeiro, 1959.
Rocha, Glauber, Revisão Crítica do Cinema Brasileiro, Rio de Janeiro, 1963.

Galvão, Maria Rita, Burguesia e Cinema: O Caso Vera Cruz, Rio de Janeiro, 1981.

O Cangaceiro

Gomes, Paulo Emílio Salles, Crítica de Cinema no Suplemento Literário, São Paulo, 1982.

Xavier, Ismail, Sertão Mar—Glauber Rocha e a Estética da Fome, São Paulo, 1983.

Ramos, Fernão, História do Cinema Brasileiro, São Paulo, 1987.

Salem, Helena, 90 Anos de Cinema—Uma Aventura Brasileira, Rio de Janeiro, 1988.

Articles:

Diário de Notícias (Rio de Janeiro), 19 April 1953.

Variety (New York), 29 April 1954.

Films in Review (New York), January 1954.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1954.

Viotti, S., Films and Filming (London), October 1954.

Vianna, Antônio Moniz, Cineclube Macunaima Edition (Rio de Janeiro), number 48, 1974.

Nardo, Silvio Di, O Globo (Rio de Janeiro), 8 March 1976.

Matiussi, Paulo, Jornal do Brasil (Rio de Janeiro), 18 March 1977.

Soares, Dirceu, Folha de São Paulo (São Paulo), 20 April 1977.

O Globo (Rio de Janeiro), 25 January 1978.

Nascimento, Helio, Jornal do Comércio (Porto Alegre), 9 May 1978.

O Globo (Rio de Janeiro), 25 November 1982.

* * *

Exhibited at Cannes in 1953, Victor Lima Barreto's O Cangaceiro has a place of honour on the Brazilian film scene for a number of reasons. At Cannes, it received two accolades: the prize for best adventure film and a special mention for the sound track; this recognition turned O Cangaceiro into the first Brazilian film to be successful overseas. (André Brazin said of the film at Cannes, "from its earliest scenes, the film sets an explosive tone of violence and strength.") O Cangaceiro became a box-office record breaker at the time of its launch, its director became a national hero, and its theme tune, Mulher Rendeira, became the unofficial Brazilian anthem of the 1950s.

Apart from its repercussion both at home and abroad, O Cangaceiro has also the merit of giving rise to the Cangaço genre of film. Cangaceiro is the name given to a particular type of bandit who used to roam the Northeast of the country in the early 20th Century, spreading terror and sacking small villages. Common to most Cangaço films are the scenario of the rustic backlands of northeastern Brazil, the disadvantaged as characters and a confrontation with police forces as the principal story line. O Cangaceiro was also the first in a series of “nordestern” or “northeastern” films, which ran a parallel line with the North American Western films; it was followed in this vein by a number of noteworthy films, the best known of which was Deus e O Diabo na Terra do Sol (Black God, White Devil), by Glauber Rocha.

O Cangaceiro was Victor Lima Barreto’s first feature, produced after his innumerable documentaries of the 1940s. (In 1951, his documentary Santuário, won a prize at Venice in the “art film” category.) As the author of the story and the screenplay, Lima Barreto dared, at a time when Brazilian films dealt largely with urban themes, to turn the public’s eyes to the poorest region of the country. Here he created images that were incontestably Brazilian, either through the exploitation of regional physiognomies or through the typically barren northeastern scenery (albeit O Cangaceiro was filmed in the countryside of the state of São Paulo). Notwithstanding the social concerns inherent in the plot—the right to land and the misery of the population—Lima Barreto does not address these political matters, as would later the Cinema Novo movement, which also used the Northeast of the Brazil for many of its locations.

The principal characters in the film are Captain Galdino Ferreira (Milton Ribeiro), a cruel and boorish leader of a band of cangaceiros, and Teodoro (Alberto Ruschel), his right hand man, who is from a good background, but has joined the gang of outlaws after killing a man. Teodoro’s convictions are challenged when Galdino kidnaps a comely teacher, Olívia (Marisa Prado), provoking the jealousy of Maria (Vanja Orico)—every band of “cangaceiro” outlaws was, by tradition, accompanied by a woman. Teodoro falls in love with the teacher, and decides to break away with her, living a sort of “redeemed by love” syndrome. At the same time, the police stalk Galdino’s gang whose leader is now blind with rage at the betrayal by his henchman.

During the chase, the former outlaw becomes the protector of the pretty teacher, with whom he enjoys a series of romantic love scenes. In a violent contest, Galdino’s men thwart the efforts of the police to catch them. The next battle is between Galdino and Teodoro. Teodoro resists heroically, but eventually surrenders. True to his personal code of honour, Galdino allows Teodoro one last chance to survive: the band of outlaws will all shoot at Teodoro from a distance of 500 meters at the same time. If Teodoro is not hit, he is free to go. Teodoro accepts the deal, but he is shot and dies clutching a handful of “his” earth. Having said “a woman and land are the same thing—you need both to be happy,” he dies not for an ideal, but for love. (Lima Barreto had been informed by Columbia Pictures that the authorities responsible for law and order in Europe and the United States demanded that the bad guy die at the end. Thus, a scene in which Galdino dies was also included, though not shown in Brazil.)

At the time of O Cangaceiro’s launch, Lima Barreto stated: “When, years ago, I dreamed of making films in Brazil, I resolved to make films that were totally national, wholeheartedly Brazilian. The title, the story, the location, the characters and their personalities—the photography, the music, the editing—all should breathe Brazil.” The dramatic and narrative tints of the Western and the influence of the epic Mexican school at its most grandiloquent in no way compromise the Brazilianness of O Cangaceiro, whose studied nationalism is emphasized by the exceptional sound track, peppered with regional songs. While Captain Galdino is almost a caricature of cruelty, Teodoro and Olívia’s portrayals are altogether more reasonable and civilized. Notwithstanding the social questions inherent in the cangaço genre, Lima Barreto’s plot is centred on a love story, complete with impassioned dialogues, supported by scenes of great visual impact—such as the torture of one of the men, who is dragged behind a galloping horse—and chase scenes through the countryside.

The film opens with the band of outlaws marching to the right and finishes with the same band marching off, to the sound of Mulher Rendeira, in the opposite direction, in a composition which is clearly reminiscent of John Ford. O Cangaceiro also represents one of the great disillusionments of the Brazilian film industry. It was one of the final productions of the Vera Cruz Studios, an enterprise put together by a group of São Paulo businessmen to create a sort of Brazilian Hollywood, producing world class films for the first time in Brazil. To this end, foreign technicians were hired from abroad, such as H. E. Fowle, the English director of photography, the German editor, Oswald Hafenrichter or the Italian musician, Gabriel Magliori, who were all involved in O Cangaceiro. The artistic direction was by the famous painter Caribé, while the dialogues were written by the distinguished Rachel de Queiróz.

The Brazilian and world distribution rights were sold to Columbia Pictures; thus, Vera Cruz did not benefit from the success of O Cangaceiro, which was sold to 23 countries. In fact, the shutters went up on Vera Cruz not long after O Cangaceiro’s production. For Lima Barreto—who appears in the film as the commander of a police force—the film represented not only the pinnacle but the beginning of the end of his career. After his second fictional feature, A Primeira Missa (1960), he went into a long and painful decline, only to die alone and in poverty in 1982 at the age of 76. His legacy was several untouched screenplays and O Cangaceiro, testimony to his defense of what he considered to be the unequivocally Brazilian cinema.

—Susana Schild

CARNIVAL IN FLANDERS

See LA KERMESSE HEROIQUE

LE CARROSSE D'OR

---

(The Golden Coach)

France-Italy, 1953

Director: Jean Renoir

Production: Panaria Films and Roche Productions; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 100 minutes, some sources list 98 minutes; length: 2800 meters. Released 27 February 1953, Paris. Filming began 4 February 1952 in Cinecittà studios.

Le carrosse d'or

Producers: Francesco Alliata and Ray Ventura; screenplay: Jean Renoir, Renzo Avenzo, Giulio Macchi, Jack Kirkland, and Ginette Doynel, from the work Le Carrosse du Saint-Sacrement by Prosper Mérimée; photography: Claude Renoir and Ronald Hill; editors: Mario Serandrei and David Hawkins; sound: Joseph de Bretagne and Ovidio del Grande; recorded by: Mario Ronchetti; production design: Mario Chiari with De Gianni and Polidori; music: Vivaldi, Archangelo Corelli, and Olivier Metra; arranged by: Gino Marinuzzi; costumes: Mario de Matteis.

Cast: Anna Magnani (Camilla/Colombine); Duncan Lamont (Ferdinand, the Viceroy); Odoardo Spadaro (Don Antonio, the head of the troupe); Riccardo Rioli (Ramon); Paul Campbell (Felipe Aquirre); Nada Fiorelli (Isabelle); Georges Higgins (Martinez); Dante (Arlequin); Rino (Doctor Balanzon); Gisela Mathews (Irène Altamirano); Lina Marengo (Comedienne); Ralph Truman (Duke of Castro); Elena Altieri (Duchess of Castro); Renato Chiantoni (Captain Fracasse); Giulio Tedeschi (Balthazar, the barber); Alfredo Kolner (Florindo); Alfredo Medini (Pulcinella); John Pasetti (Captain of the Guard); William Tubbs (Innkeeper); Cecil Matthews (Baron); Fredo Keeling (Viscount); Jean Debucourt (Bishop of Carmol); Raf de la Torre (Procurer); Medini Brothers (4 children); Juan Perez.

Publications

Books:

- Davay, Paul, Jean Renoir, Brussels, 1957.
 Cauliez, Armand-Jean, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1962.
 Institut des Hautes Etudes Cinématographiques, Analyses des films de Jean Renoir, Paris, 1966.
 Bennett, Susan, Jean Renoir, London, 1967.
 Leprohon, Pierre, Jean Renoir, Paris 1967, New York, 1971.
 Gregor, Ulrich, editor, Film: Eine Dokumentation de Jean Renoir, Frankfurt, 1970.
 Cuenca, Carlos, Humanidad de Jean Renoir, Vallodolid, 1971.
 Brady, Leo, Jean Renoir: The World of His Films, New York, 1972.
 Bazin, André, Jean Renoir, edited by François Truffaut, Paris, 1973.

- Durgnat, Raymond, Jean Renoir, Berkeley, 1974.
- Beylie, Claude, Jean Renoir: Le Spectacle, la Vie, Paris, 1975.
- Renoir, Jean, Essays, Conversations, Reviews, edited by Penelope Gilliatt, New York, 1975.
- Faulkner, Christopher, Jean Renoir: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
- Sesonske, Alexander, Jean Renoir: The French Films 1924–1939, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1980.
- Gauteur, Claude, editor, Jean Renoir: Oeuvres de cinéma inédites, Paris, 1981.
- McBride, Joseph, editor, Filmmakers on Filmmaking 2, Los Angeles, 1983.
- Renoir, Jean, Lettres d'Amérique, edited by Dido Renoir and Alexander Sesonske, Paris, 1984.
- Serceau, Daniel, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1985.
- Bertin, Celia, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1986.
- Faulkner, Christopher, The Social Cinema of Jean Renoir, Princeton, New Jersey, 1986.
- Vincendeau, Ginette, and Keith Reader, La Vie est à Nous: French Cinema of the Popular Front, London, 1986.
- Viry-Babel, Roger, Jean Renoir: Le Jeu et la règle, Paris, 1986.
- Braudy, Leo, Jean Renoir: The World of His Films, New York, 1989.
- Renoir, Jean, Renoir on Renoir, New York, 1990.
- Renoir, Jean, My Life & My Films, New York, 1991.
- Bergan, Ronald, Jean Renoir: Projections of Paradise, New York, 1995.
- Renoir, Jean, Letters: Jean Renoir, New York, 1995.
- Renoir, Jean, An Interview: Jean Renoir, with Nicholas Frangakis, Los Angeles, 1998.

Articles:

- “Renoir Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1952.
- Baroncelli, Jean de, “Commedia all'improvviso,” in Le Monde (Paris), 4 March 1953.
- Renoir, Jean, “Je n'ai pas tourné mon film au Pérou,” in Radio-Cinéma (Paris), 15 March 1953.
- Sadoul, Georges, in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 5 March 1953.
- “Renoir Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Christmas 1957.
- Sadoul, Georges, “The Renaissance of French Cinema—Feyder, Renoir, Duvivier, Carné,” in Film: An Anthology, edited by Daniel Talbot, New York, 1959.
- Belanger, Jean, “Why Renoir Favors Multiple Camera, Long Sustained Take Technique,” in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), March 1960.
- Dyer, Peter John, “Renoir and Realism,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1960.
- Whitehall, Richard, in Films and Filming (London), June-July 1960.
- Whitehall, Richard, “Gallery of Great Artists: Anna Magnani,” in Films and Filming (London), July 1961.
- Petrie, G., in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1974.
- Lindberg, I., “Smukke Marie,” in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), October 1980.
- Strebel, Elizabeth Grottle, “Jean Renoir and the Popular Front,” in Feature Films as History, edited by K. R. M. Short, London, 1981.
- Carbonnier, A., in Cinéma (Paris), January 1985.
- Pellizzari, L., in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), September 1992.
- Chase, D., “Anna Magnani: Miracle Worker,” in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1993.

- Téchiné, André, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 482, July-August 1994.
- Bagh, Peter von, in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 6, 1994.

* * *

Jean Renoir regarded Le Carrosse d'or as a mere jeu d'esprit, but in fact the film, while one of Renoir's lighter efforts, has been greatly underrated. Its commedia dell'arte-inspired picturesqueness encompasses one of Renoir's lifelong themes—the disaffinity between illusion and reality, life and theatre, what people really are versus the roles they play. Most important to the creative sensibility of Renoir the artist, the film concerns the artist's duty to give, not take; by doing so he experiences his greatest power and true humanity.

The film is based on Prosper Mérimée's one-act play, Le Carrosse du Saint-Sacrement which derived from a real-life Peruvian incident. Mérimée's play was also the inspiration for an episode in Thornton Wilder's The Bridge of San Luis Rey. On the surface, Le Carrosse d'or is a simple story of love, but Renoir gives it a Pirandellian twist with its confusion of identities while giving new meaning to Shakespeare's phrase, “All the world's a stage.” The plot centers around Camilla (Anna Magnani), the Columbine of a troupe of travelling theatre players in 18th century Peru, and her three loves: the Peruvian viceroy, a matador, and a young Spanish nobleman/soldier. The viceroy has just incurred the wrath and envy of his court and the church council by importing a golden coach from Europe. As Renoir stated, “In Mérimée's play, La Périchole is an actress, and in my movie, Camilla is an actress. In the play and in the film the coach stands for worldly vanity, and in both works the conclusion is precipitated by the bishop.” As was his practice, Renoir used his scripts as a starting point, then wove the plot around his own special view of life and human nature.

Here Renoir's point was to present a serio-comic masque, referring to the game of appearances, as a true reflection of human behavior. In a play within a play within a film, Camilla plays at love. She becomes the center of attention when the viceroy presents the coach to her as a gift, an act he hopes will dissipate the jealousies of his court. Camilla wears a variety of faces as she wavers among her three romantic choices: she can opt for the life of luxury with the viceroy; she can choose a simpler life among the Peruvian Indians with the faithful soldier; or she can elect a volatile relationship with the adored and fiery matador. But the theatre is her real life, her real love, and she astonishes all three lovers by presenting the coach to the Bishop of Lima so it can be used to carry the last sacraments to the dying. Renouncing desire, she stands alone at center stage as the curtain falls. When asked if she misses her three lovers, she replies, wryly, “Just a little.”

Le Carrosse d'or is the first of Renoir's three theatre films of the 1950s—the others being French Cancan and Elena et les hommes. In each he fills the stage/screen with a spectacle of action, sets, and costumes, with a childlike glee at his powers of manipulation. In keeping with the commedia dell'arte flavor, he chose Vivaldi's music for its lightness of spirit, making the music an integral part of the film.

Renoir drew forth the finest performance of Anna Magnani's career with this picture and called her “the greatest actress I have ever worked with.” Her Camilla is a brilliant tour de force. Le Carrosse d'or is a charming film, and while minor Renoir, it is a testament to his warmth, good humor, and sense of whimsy.

—Ronald Bowers

CASABLANCA

USA, 1942

Director: Michael Curtiz

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 102 minutes. Released November 1942. Filmed at Warner Bros. studios.

Producer: Hal B. Wallis; screenplay: Julius J. and Philip G. Epstein and Howard Koch, contributions by Aeneas Mackenzie and Hal Wallis among others, from an unpublished play Everybody Comes to Rick's by Murray Burnett and Joan Alison; photography: Arthur Edeson; editor: Owen Marks; sound: Francis J. Scheid; production design: Carl Jules Weyl; set decoration: George James Hopkins; music: Max Steiner; songs: Herman Hupfeld and M. K. Jerome; special effects: Laurence Butler and Willard Van Enger; costumes: Orry-Kelly (gowns); technical advisor: Robert Alsner; opening montage: Don Siegel.

Cast: Humphrey Bogart (Rick); Ingrid Bergman (Ilsa Lund); Paul Henreid (Victor Laszlo); Claude Rains (Captain Louis Renault); Conrad Veidt (Major Strasser); Sydney Greenstreet (Senor Ferrari); Peter Lorre (Ugarte); S. Z. Sakall (Carl, a Waiter); Madeleine LeBeau (Yvonne); Dooley Wilson (Sam); Joy Page (Annina Brandel); John Qualen (Berger); Leonid Kinsky (Sascha, a Bartender); Helmut Dantine (Jan); Curt Bois (Pickpocket); Marcel Dalio (Croupier); Corinna Mura (Singer); Ludwig Stössel (Mr. Leuchtag); Ilka Gruning (Mrs. Leuchtag); Charles La Torre (Tonelli, the Italian officer); Frank Puglia (Arab vendor); Dan Seymour (Abdul); Lou Marcelle (Narrator); Martin Garralaga (Headwaiter); Olaf Hytten (Prosperous man); Monte Blue (American); Paul Pracasi (Native); Albert Morin (French officer); Creighton Hale (Customer); Henry Rowland (German officer); Richard Ryen (Heinz); Norma Varden (Englishwoman); Torben Meyer (Banker); Oliver Blake (Blue Parrot waiter); Gregory Gay (German banker); William Edmunds (Contact); George Meeker (Friend); George Dee (Casselle); Leo Mostovoy (Fydor); Leon Belasco (Dealer).

Awards: Oscars for Best Film, Best Director, and Best Screenplay, 1943.

Publications

Scripts:

Epstein, Julius J., Philip G. Epstein, and Howard Koch, Casablanca: Script and Legend, edited by Koch, New York, 1973; also in Michael Curtiz's "Casablanca," edited by Richard Anobile, New York 1975.

Books:

McCarty, Clifford, Bogey: The Films of Humphrey Bogart, New York, 1965.
Michael, Paul, Humphrey Bogart: The Man and His Films, Indianapolis, 1965.

Warner, Jack, My First 100 Years in Hollywood, New York, 1965.
McBride, Joseph, editor, A Collection of Film Criticism, Madison, Wisconsin, 1968.
Quirk, Lawrence J., The Films of Ingrid Bergman, New York, 1970.
Barbour, Alan G., Humphrey Bogart, New York, 1973.
Brown, Curtis F., Ingrid Bergman, New York, 1973.
Canham, Kingsley, Michael Curtiz, Raoul Walsh, Henry Hathaway, London, 1973.
Parish, James Robert, and Michael R. Pitts, editors, The Great Spy Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1974.
Baker, M. Joyce, Images of Women in Film: The War Years 1941–45, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1980.
Francisco, Charles, You Must Remember This: The Filming of "Casablanca," Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
Pettigrew, Terence, Bogart: A Definitive Study of His Film Career, London, 1981.
Rosenzweig, Sidney, Casablanca and Other Major Films of Michael Curtiz, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.
Taylor, John Russell, Ingrid Bergman, London, 1983.
Ray, Robert B., A Certain Tendency of the Hollywood Cinema 1930–1980, Princeton, New Jersey, 1985.
Winkler, Willi, Humphrey Bogart und Hollywoods Schwarze Serie, Munich, 1985.
Eco, Umberto, Faith in Fakes, London, 1986.
Kinnard, Roy, and R.J. Vitone, The American Films of Michael Curtiz, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1986.
Leamer, Laurence, As Time Goes By: The Life of Ingrid Bergman, New York, 1986.
Fuchs, Wolfgang J., Humphrey Bogart: Cult-Star: A Documentation, Berlin, 1987.
Jarvie, Ian, Philosophy of the Film: Epistemology, Ontology, Aesthetics, New York, London, 1987.
Harmetz, Aljean, Round Up the Usual Suspects: The Making of Casablanca—Bogart, Bergman, and World War Two, New York, 1992.
Lebo, Harlan, Casablanca: Behind the Scenes, New York, 1992.
McArthur, Colin, The Casablanca File, London, 1992.
Miller, Frank, Casablanca: As Time Goes By, 50th Anniversary Commemorative, Atlanta, 1992.
Siegel, Jeff, The Casablanca Companion: The Movie and More, Dallas, 1992.
Robertson, James C., The Casablanca Man: The Cinema of Michael Curtiz, London, 1993.
Osborne, Richard E., The Casablanca Companion: The Movie Classic and Its Place in History, Indianapolis, 1997.

Articles:

New York Times, 27 November 1942.
Variety (New York), 2 December 1942.
The Times (London), 13 January 1943.
Cooke, Alistair, "Epitaph for a Tough Guy," in Atlantic Monthly (Boston), May 1957.
Luft, Herbert, "Peter Lorre," in Films in Review (New York), May 1960.
Sarris, Andrew, "Likable But Elusive," in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.
Stein, Jeanne, "Claude Rains," in Films in Review (New York), November 1963.
Dienstfrey, Harris, in Film Culture (New York), Fall 1964.

Casablanca

Nolan, Jack Edmund, "Michael Curtiz," in Films in Review (New York), September 1970.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 8 January 1970.

Kinskey, Leonid, "It Lingers Deliciously in Memory as Time Goes By," in Movie Digest, September 1972.

Vernhes, M., in Cinéma (Paris), March 1973.

Day, B., "The Cult Movies: Casablanca," in Films and Filming (London), August 1974.

"Casablanca Revisited: 3 Comments," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), October 1976.

Rubinstein, L., in Cineaste (New York), Summer 1977.

McVay, D., in Focus on Film (London), 30, 1978.

Greenberg, J., "Writing for the Movies: Casey Robinson," in Focus on Film (London), April 1979.

Hanson, Stephen L., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Ross, C., "The Great Script Tease," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1982.

Sigal, Clancy, in Listener (London), 12 July 1984.

Eco, Umberto, "Casablanca: Cult Movie and Intertextual Collage," in Substance (Madison, Wisconsin), vol. 14, no. 2, 1985.

Altman, R., "Dickens, Griffith, and Film Theory Today," in South Atlantic Quarterly (Durham, North Carolina), no. 2, 1989.

Parshall, P. F., "East Meets West: Casablanca vs. The Seven Samurai," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1989.

Jorholt, E., "Spil den igen og igen og igen, Sam!" in Kosmorama (Denmark), Fall 1989.

Wilson, Robert F., Jr., "Romantic Propaganda: A Note on Casablanca's Prefigured Ending," in Film and History, vol. 19, no. 4, December 1989.

Gabbard, K., and G. O. Gabbard, "Play it Again," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), no. 1, 1990.

Davis, J. H., "Still the Same Old Story: The Refusal of Time to Go By in Casablanca," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1990.

Deutelbaum, M., "The Visual Design Program of Casablanca," in Post Script (Commerce, Texas), no. 3, 1990.

Helman, A., "Dekonstruuje Casablanke," in Kino (Warsaw), March 1990.

Case, Brian, "As Time Goes By," in Time Out (London), 1 July 1992.

Corliss, R., "Still Talking," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1992.

Norman, Barry, in Radio Times (London), 12 August 1995.

Stackpole, J., "A Converted Classic," in Audience (Simi Valley, California), no. 188, April/May 1996.

Télérama (Paris), 6 November 1996.

Boon, Kevin A., "Scripting Gender: Writing Difference," in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), Spring 1997.

Larson, R.D., in Soundtrack! (Mechelen), December 1997.

* * *

"I have discovered the secret of successful filmmaking," says Claude Chabrol sarcastically, "Timing!" Casablanca belongs in the vanguard of films created by the era they so flawlessly reflect. Assured and expert, it is not in either substance or style superior to its director Michael Curtiz's Mildred Pierce or Young Man With a Horn. Bogart, Bergman, Rains, and Henreid all gave better performances; of those by Greenstreet, Lorre, Kinsky, and Sakall, one can only remark that they seldom gave any others. Producer Robert Lord categorized the story on the first reading as "a very obvious imitation of Grand Hotel;" Jerry Wald saw parallels with Algiers. Both were right.

Hal Wallis wanted George Raft to star and William Wyler to direct. Both declined. (There is some evidence he also planned it as a vehicle for the Kings Row team of Ronald Reagan and Ann Sheridan, with Dennis Morgan in the Henreid role. And both Lena Horne and Ella Fitzgerald had a chance at the singing part taken eventually by Dooley Wilson.) Vincent Sherman and William Keighley likewise refused the project before it went to Curtiz.

Casablanca might have joined Sahara and Istanbul on the shelf of back-lot travelogues had an Allied landing and summit conference in the north African city not coincided with the film's November 1942 release. Topicality fed its fame. Curtiz, accepting an unexpected Academy Award in March 1944, betrayed his surprise. "So many times I have a speech ready, but no dice. Always a bridesmaid, never a mother. Now I win, I have no speech." The broken English was entirely appropriate to a film where only Bogart and Dooley Wilson were of American origin.

Beyond its timing, Casablanca does show the Warners' machine and Curtiz's talent at their tabloid best. The whirling globe of Don Siegel's opening montage and the portentous March of Time narration quickly define the city as a vision of the wartime world in microcosm. The collaborative screenplay, signed by Julius and Philip Epstein, and Howard Koch, but contributed to by, among others, Aeneas Mackenzie and Wallis himself (who came up with Bogart's final line), draws the characters in broad terms, each a compendium of national characteristics.

Bogart, chain-smoking, hard-drinking, arrogant, is the classic turned-off Hemingway American. Henreid, white-suited and courteous, is a dissident more akin to a society physician, untainted by either Communism or bad tailoring. The Scandinavian virgin, untouchable in pale linen and communicating mainly through a range of schoolgirl grins, Bergman's Ilsa succumbs to passion only when she pulls a gun on the unconcerned Rick, triggering not the weapon but a revival of their old affection.

The remaining regulars of Rick's Cafe Americain, mostly accented foreigners, dissipate their energies in Balkan bickering, petty crime, and, in the case of Claude Rains's self-satisfied Vichy policeman, some improbable lechery dictated by his role as the token, naughty Frenchman, all moues and raised eyebrows. Cliché characterization leads to a range of dubious acts, notably the fawning Peter Lorre, an arch intriguer and murderer, entrusting his treasured "letters of transit" to Bogart's moralizing ex-gunrunner, a gesture exceeded in improbability only by Bogart's acceptance of them.

As with most formula films, technique redeems Casablanca. Arthur Edeson's camera cranes sinuously through Carl Jules Weyl's Omar Khayyam fantasy of a set. Typical of Curtiz's work is the razor-sharp "cutting on action" by Owen Marks, a legacy of the former's Hungarian and Austrian training. He forces the pace relentlessly, even to dissolving the back projection plate in mid-scene during the Parisian flash-back, an audacious piece of visual shorthand.

Narrative economy distinguishes the film. As its original material (an unproduced play by Murray Burnett and Joan Alison) suggests, Casablanca in structure is a one-set play; many events take place off-stage, from the murder of the couriers to the resistance meeting attended by Henreid and Sakall that is broken up by the police. Everybody Comes to Rick's is an apt title, since it's the ebb and flow of people through the cafe's doors that gives the story its sole semblance of vitality. As an entity, Casablanca lives on the artificial respiration of ceaseless greetings, introductions, and farewells. Even the Parisian flashback does little to elucidate the characters of Rick and Ilsa. They remain at the end of the film little more than disagreeable maitre d' and troublesome patron.

In 1982, the journalist Chuck Ross circulated Casablanca's script as a new work to 217 American literary agents. Of those who acknowledged reading it (most returned it unread) 32 recognized the original, while 38 did not. Clearly this betrays the profound ignorance of the agenting community. But also implicit in their ignorance is Casablanca's unsure standing as a work of art. Unremarkable in 1942, it rose to fame through an accident of timing. No better written or constructed today, it exists primarily as a cultural artifact, a monument of popular culture. Woody Allen was right in his Play It Again, Sam to show the film as one whose morality, characters, and dialogue can be adapted to social use; icons now, they transcend their original source. It is as folklore rather than as a cinematic masterwork that Casablanca is likely to survive.

—John Baxter

CASINO ROYALE

(Charles K. Feldman's Casino Royale)

United Kingdom, 1967

Directors: John Huston, Ken Hughes, Val Guest, Robert Parrish, Joseph McGrath

Production: Famous Artists, Charles K. Feldman, Columbia Pictures; Panavision, Technicolor; running time: 131 minutes. Released March 1967. Location scenes filmed in England, Ireland, and France; interiors at Shepperton Studios and Pinewood/MGM Studios England; cost: $12,000,000 (approximate).

Casino Royale

Producers: Charles K. Feldman, Jerry Bresler; screenplay: Wolf Mankowitz, John Law, Michael Sayers; suggested by the Ian Fleming novel; assistant directors: second unit, Richard Talmadge, Anthony Squire; assistants, Roy Baird, John Stoneman, Carl Mann; photography: Jack Hildyard; additional photography by John Wilcox and Nicholas Roeg; editor: Bill Lenny; sound: John W. Mitchell, Sash Fisher, Bob Jones, Dick Langford, Chris Greenham; production designer: Michael Stringer; art directors: John Howell, Ivor Beddoes, Lionel Couch; costume designers: Julie Harris; additional by Guy Laroche, Paco Rabanne, Chombert; music: Burt Bacharach; main title performed by Herb Alpert and The Tijuana Brass; titles and montage effects: Richard Williams; special effects: Cliff Richardson, Roy Whybrow, Les Bowie; choreography: Tutte Lemkow.

Cast: Peter Sellers (Evelyn Tremble/James Bond 007); Ursula Andress (Vesper Lynd, 007); David Niven (Sir James Bond); Orson Welles (Le Chiffre); Joanna Pettet (Mata Bond); Daliah Lavi (The Detainer, 007); Woody Allen (Jimmy Bond/Dr. Noah); Deborah Kerr (Agent Mimi alias Lady Fiona); William Holden (Ransome); Charles Boyer (Le Grand); John Huston (M); Kurt Kaszner (Smernov); George Raft (Himself); Jean-Paul Belmondo (French Legionnaire); Terence Cooper (Cooper, 007); Barbara Bouchet (Money Penny); Angela Scoular (Buttercup); Gabriella Licudi (Eliza); Tracey Crisp (Heather); Elaine Taylor (Peg); Jackie Bisset (Miss Goodthighs); Alexandra Bastedo (Meg); Anna Quayle (Frau Hoffner); Stirling Moss (Driver); Derek Nimmo (Hadley); Ronnie Corbett (Polo); Colin Gordon (Casino Director); Bernard Cribbins (Taxi Driver/Carlton Towers, F.O.); Tracy Reed (Fang Leader); John Bluthal (Casino Doorman/M.I.5); Geoffrey Bayldon (Q); John Wells (Q's Assistant); Duncan Macrae (Inspector Mathis); Graham Stark (Cashier); Chic Murray (Chic); Jonathan Routh (John); Richard Wattis (British Army Officer); Vladek Sheybal (Le Chiffre's Representative); Percy Herbert (First Piper); Penny Riley (Control Girl); Jeanne Roland (Captain of the Guard); Peter O'Toole (Scottish Piper); Bert Kwouk (Chinese General); John Le Mesurier (M's Driver); Valentine Dyall (Voice of Dr. Noah).

Awards: Academy Award nomination for Best Music and Best Song, 1968; BAFTA nomination for Best Costume (color), 1968.

Publications

Books:

- McCarty, John, The Films of John Huston, New York 1987.
 Parrish, Robert, Hollywood Doesn't Live Here Anymore, New York, 1988.
 Benson, Raymond, The James Bond Bedside Companion: The Complete Guide to the World of 007, London 1990.
 Lax, Eric, Woody Allen: A Biography, New York, 1992.
 Lewis, Roger, The Life and Death of Peter Sellers, New York, 1996.
 Baxter, John, Woody Allen, A Biography, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 19 April 1967.
 Crowther, Bosley, in The New York Times, 29 April 1967.
 Crist, Judith, in New York World Journal Tribune, 29 April 1967.
Time, 12 May 1967.
 Knight, Arthur, in Saturday Review, 20 May 1967.
 Dassanowsky, Robert, "Casino Royale Revisited," in Films in Review, June/July 1988.

* * *

Casino Royale was a coup that Columbia Pictures had banked on: the one 007 property that got away from Broccoli and Saltzman's cash cow series. Producer Charles K. Feldman had hoped to equal or better the popularity of his Woody Allen scripted "mod" bedroom farce of two years earlier, What's New Pussycat? and trotted in a dozen stars and their star friends for the occasion. David Niven had already suggested cinematic mayhem in Life's 1966 multi-page color spread by admitting that it is "impossible to find out what we are doing," and the magazine claimed the film was a runaway mini-Cleopatra at a then outrageous twelve-million-dollar budget. Despite all the rumors and delays, the film seemed to have its finger on the pulse of psychedelia and the "swinging London" myth. It would beat a real James Bond entry, You Only Live Twice, to the box office in an early 1967 release.

In his provocative expose, The Life and Death of Peter Sellers, author Roger Lewis insists that the actor's career decline was first signaled by his self-indulgence in Casino Royale. His lack of discipline and his demands caused several more rewrites in an already plot-du-jour concept that had employed Wolf Mankowitz, John Law, and Michael Sayers as credited writers (with uncredited fragments by Woody Allen, Ben Hecht, Joseph Heller, John Huston, and Billy Wilder, among others) and five directors to helm the various segments of the film. The multitudinous talent here did more than mimic the Bondian shifts in plot and locale. What emerged was a kaleidoscope that utilized the original "serious" Ian Fleming novel, already given television treatment in 1954, as the core of a fabricated frame of plots and subplots which reduce the showdown between Bond (Sellers) and Le Chiffre (Orson Welles) at Casino Royale into the single dramatic moment of the opus.

Bond purists have always loathed the film, while others have preconceived notions of a spy parody and miss the point. The mistake has been to buy into the publicity propaganda and the original sell of the film as a new "trippy" Bond, a funny Bond. This was bound to cause dissension, since a parody can not be parodied, and the series was already there. The film is also an ill fit among Bond imitators like the Flint series or Matt Helm, or even Saltzman's own Harry Palmer. Casino Royale's relationship to Bond is only emblematic; it is a prismatic translation of Fleming's milieu, not a linear adaptation. And it remains, even today, a wry and provocative sociopolitical satire. The often criticized inconsistencies of the film's multiple James Bonds, including the banal 007 of Terence Cooper, brought in to cover Sellers' unfinished characterization, intentionally work to confuse the issue of Bond, to overwork the paradigm until it has no value. Like Andy Warhol's canvas of multiple Marilyns, the original is mythic and its copies are but a poor stand-in fantasy.

The subversion of the modern Übermensch is already apparent before the credits, when Bond films customarily feature a spine tingling mini-adventure on skis or in the sky. Sellers' Bond, however, is simply picked up by a French official in a pissoir. Casino Royale enshrines the icon of David Niven as the retired, legendary Sir James Bond. "Joke shop spies" is how Sir James reacts to the technology of Cold War agents. Indeed, Vesper Lynd's (Ursula Andress) billions and Dr. Noah's (Woody Allen) confused kitchen-sink attempt to gain global control are no match for Sir James' stiff upper lip. Like a demonstration of the failed theories of limited nuclear war, the power-hungry are annihilated in attempting to make the world safe for themselves. Woody Allen's sex-hungry schlemiel persona may have already been a stock figure in 1967, but here, garbed in a Mao suit, he suggests the infantile psychosexual complexes behind the vengeful modern warlord.

To understand Casino Royale as a courtly adventure with Niven's Sir James as a poet-knight who is fated to lead the world to a new golden age, is to see the chivalric genealogy of the James Bond phenomenon. Sir James is resurrected to save a blundering world with its collective fingers on the nuclear button, but extinguishes himself in the final battle. The film has a heavy medieval, even biblical feel: the brilliance of Richard Williams' illuminated-manuscript titles; the testing of Sir James' purity at the debauched castle of M's impersonated widow (Deborah Kerr); the Faustian redemption of Vesper because she has "loved"; the representatives from the world's Superpowers (here it is the four Kings) who beg for the grace and wisdom of a knight of the (black) rose. The film, with all its ideas, directions, and visions, seems to relish its own sprawling, about-to-fly-apart structure, folding over and under itself as medieval epics do and reflecting the serpentines of the art nouveau so present in several of the film's sets.

The mythical French casino itself provides a semiotic mapping of the film's subversion of the modern establishment. Besides the bourgeois finery of the palatial building and an art collection spanning the century, a female army garbed in Paco Rabanne's gladiator uniforms relates the modern power structure to the barbarism of ancient Rome. With their leader, Dr. Noah, acting on behalf of a vaguely Soviet SMERSH, but interested only in his own gratification, the static Cold War ideologies become reflections that turn on themselves. The film also features the music of Burt Bacharach and Debussy as well as Michael Stringer's wide catalogue of sets ranging from a Palladian estate to an East Asian temple, all linked by heraldic tones of orange/pink and blue/green, to house the goings-on. So much art, so much architecture, so many sideswipe references to high-culture. Too rich for a simple spy saga, this stylistic puzzle instead implies what is at stake in the battle between the "immaculate priesthood" of the individualistic and genteel Sir James and the false promise of social Darwinist technocrats.

There is a definite trajectory in the development of the sociopolitical satire of the 1960s from Billy Wilder's One, Two, Three (1961) to the indulgence of Candy (1968) to the burn-out of The Magic Christian (1970), which locates Casino Royale as the mainstream cinematic apex of the era's anarchic impulses. It is never claimed as an inspiration or influence, yet Monty Python, the subversive parodies of Mel Brooks, the manic visuals of 1960s inspired music videos and the Generation X and Y films they inspire ranging from The Fifth Element to The Avengers, are all heirs to Casino Royale. Their creators would have had to invent the film if it had not existed. Austin Powers: International Man of Mystery is case in point. Like Casablanca, Casino Royale is a film of momentary vision, collaboration, adaptation, pastiche, and accident. It is the anti-auteur work of all time, a film shaped by the very Zeitgeist it took on. As a compendium of what almost went too wrong in the twentieth century done up as a burlesque of the knightly epic, it may still frighten the modernists, but those who follow should consider it to be quite sagacious.

—Robert von Dassanowsky

CASQUE D'OR

France, 1951

Director: Jacques Becker

Production: Spéva Films and Paris-Film-Production; black and white, 35mm; running time: 96 minutes. Released 16 April 1952, Paris. Filmed fall 1951 in Paris-Studio-Cinema studios at Billancourt, and at Annet-Sur-Marne, France.

Producer: Henri Baum; screenplay: Jacques Becker and Jacques Companeez; photography: Robert Le Fèbvre; editor: Marguerite Renoir; sound engineer: Antoine Petitjean; art direction: Jean d'Eaubonne; music: Georges Van Parys; costumes: Mayo.

Cast: Simone Signoret (Marie); Serge Reggiani (Manda); Claude Dauphin (Félix Leca); William Sabatier (Roland); Gaston Modot (Danard); Loleh Bellon (Léonie Danard); Paul Azais (Ponsard); Jean Clarieux (Paul); Roland Lesaffre (Anatole); Emile Genevois (Billy); Claude Castaing (Fredo); Daniel Mendaille (Patron Guinguette); Dominique Davray (Julie); Pierre Goutas (Guillaume); Fernand Trignol (Patron of l'Ange Gabriel); Paul Barge (Inspector Juliani); Leon Pauleon (Conductor); Tony Corteggiani (Commissioner); Roger Vincent (Doctor); Marcel Melrac (Policeman); Marcel Rouze (Police-man); Odette Barencey (Adèle); Yvonne Yma (Patron of l'Ange Gabriel); Paquerette (Grandmother); Pomme (Concierge).

Publications

Script:

Becker, Jacques, and Jacques Companeez, "Casque d'or" in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), December 1964.

Books:

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946, Volume 1: The Great Tradition, New York, 1970.

Beylie, Claude, and Freddy Buache, Jacques Becker: Études, textes, et scénarios inédits, entretiens, témoignages, florilège critique, filmographie, Locarno, 1991.

Vey, Jean-Louis, Jacques Becker, ou, La fausse évidence, Lyon, 1995.

Articles:

Roche, Catherine de la, "The Stylist," in Films and Filming (London), March 1955.

Lisbona, Joseph, "Microscope Director," in Films and Filming (London), December 1956.

"Becker," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1960.

Truffaut, François, "De vraies moustaches," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), December 1964.

Perez Guillermo, Gilberto, "Jacques Becker: 2 Films," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1969.

Amengual, Barthélemy, in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Spring 1976.

Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), October 1985.

Andrew, D., "L'identité a jamais perdue du cinéma français," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), no. 1, 1993.

Howard, T., "Casque d'Or," in Reid's Film Index (New South Wales, Australia), no. 15, 1995.

* * *

The benign influence of Jean Renoir, with whom Jacques Becker worked for eight years as assistant director, can be clearly felt in the warm humanity that suffuses Casque d'or. Not that the film is in the least derivative; it is unmistakably a Becker film in its central concern with love and friendship (shown here as entirely complementary affections, not as opposed loyalties), and in its richly detailed evocation of period and milieu. The world of petty criminals and prostitutes in fin-de-siècle Paris is presented simply and directly—not romanticized, nor rendered gratuitously squalid, but seen as a complex, living community in its own right. And although the plot (based on a true story, which Becker found in court reports of the period) recounts a tragic sequence of treachery, murder, and death by guillotine, Casque d'or is far from depressing; on the contrary, its lasting impression is of optimism and affirmation.

This effect derives from the strength and veracity with which Becker delineates the film's central relationship. As Marie, from whose golden hair the film takes its title, Simone Signoret gives a performance of ripe sensuality, well matched by Serge Reggiani's Manda, convincingly revealing both tenderness and tenacity beneath an appearance of taciturn frailty. Their brief, sunlit idyll together in the countryside is shot through with an erotic intensity that eschews the least trace of prurience. That the power of such love can outlast even death is suggested by the film's final image, in which, after Marie has watched Manda die on the guillotine, we see the lovers dancing slowly, endlessly down the now empty terrace of the riverside café at which they first met, to the ghostly strains of their first waltz.

"My characters obsess me much more than the story itself. I want them to be true." Casque d'or is notably free of caricatures or stock types; around his two protagonists, Becker assembles a vivid gallery of subsidiary characters, each one individually depicted, no matter how briefly. There is no weakness in the story, either: the narrative moves with steady, unforced momentum from the opening sunlit scene on the river (irresistibly recalling Une Partie de campagne), through the gathering darkness of the fatal confrontation in a drab backyard when Manda stabs Marie's former lover, to end with Marie's bleak nocturnal vigil in a room overlooking the place of execution—before the brief coda returns us to the sunshine and the riverbank. "In my work," Becker wrote, "I do not want to prove anything except that life is stronger than everything else."

Casque d'or

Surprisingly, Casque d'or was coldly received by the French critics on its initial release. In Britain, however, the film was enthusiastically acclaimed for its visual beauty, evocative period atmosphere, and fine performances. It is now generally agreed to be the outstanding masterpiece of Becker's regrettably short filmmaking career, offering the most completely realized statement of his abiding concern with, and insight into, the rich complexity of human relationships.

—Philip Kemp

CAT PEOPLE

USA, 1942

Director: Jacques Tourneur

Production: RKO Radio Pictures Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 73 minutes. Released December 1942. Filmed 1942 in RKO/Radio studio in Hollywood; RKO-Pathe studio in Culver City; swimming pool scene shot at a hotel in the Alvarado district of Los Angeles; and zoo scenes shot at Central Park Zoo; cost: $134,000.

Producer: Val Lewton; screenplay: DeWitt Bodeen; photography: Nicholas Musuraca; editor: Mark Robson; music: Roy Webb.

Cast: Simone Simon (Irena Dubrovna); Kent Smith (Oliver Reed); Tom Conway (Dr. Louis Judd); Jane Randolph (Alice Moore); Jack Holt (Commodore); Elizabeth Russell (Cat Woman); Alan Napier; Elizabeth Dunne.

Cat People

Publications

Books:

- Clarens, Charles, editor, An Illustrated History of the Horror Film, New York, 1967.
- Higham, Charles, and Joel Greenberg, The Celluloid Muse: Hollywood Directors Speak, London, 1969.
- Siegel, Joel E., The Reality of Terror, New York, 1973.
- Everson, William K., Classics of the Horror Film, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.
- Willemsen, Paul, and Claire Johnston, Jacques Tourneur, Edinburgh, 1975.
- Annan, David, Movie Fantastic: Beyond the Dream Machine, New York, 1975.
- Telotte, J. P., Dreams of Darkness: Fantasy and the Films of Val Lewton, Chicago, 1985.
- Fujiwara, Chris, Jacques Tourneur, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1998.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 18 November 1942.
- Myers, Henry, "Weird and Wonderful," in Screen Writer (London), July 1945.
- Tourneur, Jacques, "Taste Without Clichés," in Films and Filming (London), November 1956.
- Sarris, Andrew, "Esoterica," in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.

- Ellison, Harlan, "Three Faces of Fear," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), March 1966.
- Wood, Robin, "The Shadow Worlds of Jacques Tourneur," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1972.
- Vianni, C., in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Summer 1976.
- Bodeen, DeWitt, in Magill's Survey of Cinema I, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1981.
- Bertolussi, S., "Il bacio della pantera," in Cineforum (Bergamo), April 1982.
- Turner, George, "Val Lewton's Cat People," in Cinefantastique (Oak Park, Illinois), May-June 1982.
- Telotte, J. P., "Dark Patches: Structures of Absence in Lewton's Cat People," in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Autumn 1982.
- Lucas, William D., "The Two Cat People," in Classic Images (Muscatine, Iowa), November 1982.
- Romney, Jonathan, "New Ways to Skin a Cat," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Spring-Fall 1984.
- Barrot, O., in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1985.
- Hollinger, K., "The Monster as Woman: Two Generations of Cat People," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 2, 1989.
- Bansak, E., "Fearing the Dark: The Val Lewton Legacy, the Jacques Tourneur Films," in Midnight Marquee (Baltimore), Spring 1990.
- Larson, R. D., "The Quiet Horror Music of Roy Webb: Scoring Val Lewton," in Midnight Marquee (Baltimore), Spring 1990.
- Berks, J., "What Alice Does: Looking Otherwise at The Cat People," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), vol. 32, no. 1, 1992.
- Hollinger, Karen, "Karen Hollinger on John Berk's 'What Alice Does: Looking Otherwise at The Cat People,'" in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), vol. 33, no. 1, Fall 1993.
- Télérama* (Paris), 24 May 1997.
- Rohrer Paige, Linda, "The Transformation of Woman: The 'Curse' of the Cat Woman in Val Lewton/Jacques Tourneur's Cat People, its Sequel, and Remake," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Vol. 23, no. 4, October 1997.
- Loban, L., "Wise Child," in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock, New Jersey), no. 27, 1998.

* * *

While analysts of horror have long examined its psychological roots in a displacement of sexual drives and desires, few films made the link between horror and sexuality as explicit as Cat People (at least until the 1970s where the link becomes a central theme, as in Carrie, for example). The film's central conceit—that the arousal of emotion could turn a woman into a panther—is a dramatic literalization of a metaphor of sexual energy as a living force.

Yet Cat People represents no simple endorsement of a sexist stereotype in which feminine sexuality is connected to a notion of unbridled devouring animality (as is the case in film noir's figuration of the independent woman as a kind of spider). Quite the contrary, through a reversal of horror's usual convention where an ostensibly normal world is threatened by a monstrosity, Cat People puts the cat woman, Irena, in the position of a victim whose "monstrous" reaction to the encroachments of the world upon her is viewed by the film with a degree of pathos-filled empathy and even perhaps a positive envy.

Irena becomes a mark of difference, an exotic other, that bourgeois society cannot understand and so ignores, represses, or controls through a force of domination. As in Hitchcock's films where the villain is often more attractive than the boring good guys, so too in Cat People the middle-class world appears as a dull, dulling banality whose own self-confidence only partially masks an inability to recognize either its own problems or those of outsiders to its circumscribed value system. This process is most explicit in a painful scene where Oliver Reed and Alice Moore literally exile Irena from their company during a supposedly pleasant visit to a museum.

Moreover, the very force that promotes itself as a cure in such a world—that is, the force of medicine (here the psychiatrist, Dr. Judd)—reveals itself to be more of a danger than the supposed illness that it sets out to cure. Not only does Judd fail to recognize Irena's problem, but he provokes its continuation, betraying his ostensibly professional objectivity by an aggressive sexual desire. If we traditionally associate the monster with the freak, it is significant that it is Judd, not Irena, who comes off as the monstrous figure, his crippled gait a mark of deformity, an abnormality within the field of an imputed normality. Indeed, one can even suggest that the film portrays male sexuality as more dangerous than female sexuality, Irena at least tries to control rationally her own condition while the men around her advance heedlessly (for example, Oliver refuses her arguments against marriage; Judd refuses her protestations against a kiss). Thus, while Cat People has many of the conventional trappings of the horror film such as shadowy photography, a subtle creation of suspense (the panther's presence is often more felt than seen), and a concatenation of mysterious events, the film is finally most significant less as an efficient source of scary jolts than as a meditation on the very forces that menace us, that call into question the limits of the lives we construct for ourselves. It is also a dissection of the ways a supposedly normal world sustains itself by defining some other world as abnormal. Cat People is a tragedy about a world's inability to accept, or even to attempt to understand, whatever falls outside its defining frames.

—Dana B. Polan

THE CELEBRATION

See Festen

CELINE ET JULIE VONT EN BATEAU: PHANTOM LADIES OVER PARIS

(Celine and Julie Go Boating)

France, 1974

Director: Jacques Rivette

Production: Films du Losange, Action Films, Films Christian Fechner, Films 7, Renn Productions, Saga, Simar Films, VM Productions; colour, 35mm; running time: 192 minutes.

Producer: Barbet Schroeder; screenplay: Eduardo de Gregorio, Juliet Berto, Dominique Labourier, Bulle Ogier, Marie-France Pisier, Jacques Rivette, with sections based on original stories by Henry James; assistant directors: Luc Beraud, Pascal Lemaitre; photography: Jacques Renard, Michael Cenet; editor: Nicole Lubtchansky, Cris Tullio Altan; sound recording: Elvire Lerner; sound editor: Paul Laine, Gilbert Pereira; music: Jean-Marie Senia.

Cast: Juliet Berto (Céline); Dominique Labourier (Julie); Bulle Ogier (Camille); Marie-France Pisier (Sophie); Barbet Schroeder (Olivier); Philippe Clévenot (Guilou); Nathalie Asnar (Madlyn); Marie-Thérèse Saussure (Poupie); Jean Douchet (M. Dédé); Adèle Taffetas (Alice); Anne Zamire (Lil); Monique Clément (Myrtille); Jérôme Richard (Julien); Michael Graham (Boris); Jean-Marie Sénia (Cyrille).

Publications

Books:

Monaco, James, The New Wave, New York, 1976.

Carney, Raymond, Magill's Survey of Cinema: Foreign Language Films edited by Frank Magill, New Jersey, 1985.

Rodowick, David Norman, The Difficulty of Difference: Psychoanalysis, Sexual Difference, and Film Theory, New York, 1991.

Jacques Rivette: la règle du jeu, Turin, 1991.

Articles:

Delmas, J., Jeune Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1974.

Variety (New York), 21 August 1974.

Cornand, A., Image et Son (Paris), September 1974.

Frot-Coutaz, G., Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1974.

Tournes, A., "Un dans trois, Rivette," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1974.

Rosenbaum, J., "Work and play in the house of fiction," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1974.

Jordan, I., "Entretien avec Céline et Julie," in Positif (Paris), October 1974.

Lénne, G., "Céline, Jacques et Julie," in Ecran (Paris), October 1974.

Legrand, J., "Un film est un complot," Positif (Paris), October 1974.

Ashton, J., "Reflecting consciousness: three approaches to Henry James," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1976.

Milne, T., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1976.

Gow, G., Films and Filming (London), November 1976.

Lesage, J., "Subversive Fantasy," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), March 1981.

Wood, R., "Narrative Pleasure: Two films by Jacques Rivette," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1981.

Levinson, J., "Celine and Julie Go Story Telling," in French Review, vol. 65, no. 2, 1991.

* * *

Umberto Eco has suggested that a key factor in a work's status as a cult object is its disjointedness, which allows viewers or readers space into which they can project their own fiction-making skills. This partly explains why Rivette's loose, baggy fantasy is arguably the only genuine cult film of the nouvelle vague. But Céline et Julie further has in its favour a celebratory image of its heroines as subversive fabulists in their own right, and a uniquely serious frivolity that makes the film an enormously pleasurable fictional do-it-yourself kit.

Celine et Julie vont en bateau: Phantom Ladies Over Paris

From the title onwards, the film appears to celebrate child-like leisure and gratuitousness. The heroines do, at the end, literally go boating, but “aller en bateau” also means to be taken for a ride, to be told a shaggy dog story; this tale is a winding river on which we, like Julie, are led into uncharted territory. The film begins with her sighting the elusive Céline, who, in one of many allusions to Alice in Wonderland, is the White Rabbit leading her into a narrative labyrinth. Becoming friends, counterparts and arguably lovers, they make a series of visits to a mysterious house in which a family of ‘ghosts’ continuously reenact a melodrama, as if trapped in their own dislocated matinee performance. This uncompleted story concerns an endangered little girl, and its heroine, an empty role to be filled by Céline and Julie, is her nurse and rescuer Miss Angèle Terre (mystère, but also mise en gel—frozen).

There are two (by no means incompatible) dominant critical views of the film. One sees it as a self-reflexive commentary on the pleasures of cinema and the spectator’s active role. For the other it is an exemplary feminist narrative in which two women control the fiction-making process and challenge male orders of various kinds—including that centred around the myth of the omnipotent director. The film’s authorship belongs as much to the two leads as it does to Rivette, whose role, according to Juliet Berto, was akin to “surgery,” cutting the material they provided into a coherent, if wilfully ragged pattern.

The main writing was undertaken by Berto and Labourier, who planned their characters and the overall narrative shape with Rivette; Eduardo de Gregorio provided the structure for the interpolated narrative, drawing on Henry James’s stories “The Other House” and “A Romance of Certain Old Clothes.” With the exception of one improvised scene (Céline lets her mythomania run riot on her incredulous friends), what appears to be improvisation was in fact thoroughly scripted before shooting. In the narrative as much as in the process of making the film, “improvisation”—an effect rather than a fact of performance—can be seen as an inventive engagement with a predetermined form, a sort of manoeuvring around a written score that constantly demands to be remade, just as the fragmentary story in the house is constantly reshaped, jigsaw-fashion.

The film provides various analogies for such inventiveness: magic (Céline’s conjuring act), song-and-dance (Julie’s audition as a singer) and tarot reading (inventing meanings from a limited set of cards—a traditional figure of the art of combination). Filmmaking and film watching are presented as similar and complementary processes of participation, continuous acts of mental editing: both living and watching the story of the house, Céline and Julie try to make sense of the disjointed footage that passes before their eyes.

Despite the apparently ad hoc nature of its conception (Rivette and Berto got the project going from scratch when another film fell through), Céline et Julie has a central place in Rivette's oeuvre. It is one of many films (from Paris nous appartient to his 1995 musical Haut bas fragile) in which young women contest patriarchal orders by throwing themselves into intrigues as fiction-makers. It is one of many in which the performers contribute to the writing, and in which the characters appear to evolve from their personalities. And, although the film could be read as being exclusively about cinema, it also concerns the relation between the real world and theatrical performance within an enclosed space. Where L'Amour fou and others are built around specific plays, the exorcism of the house is theatre in broader terms (as the two women play Angèle, we hear audience applause).

The film opposes two types of performance—the traditional style, in which the ghosts act out a stultifying, stylised melodrama about a nuclear family; and an anarchic improvisational style akin to the 1960s/70s notions of free theatre. Céline and Julie not only reconstruct the shattered text they perform in, but also deconstruct it, disrupting the family's stately dance by launching into a screwball tango. They are Marx Sisters, if not Marxist sisters, shattering the sexually and socially oppressive order of the house and of a certain school of classical fiction.

One other aspect of the film that has come into its own, in the two decades since it was made, is its Proustian quality, its function of preserving the past. Madlyn is a madeleine retrieved from lost time, and the house is obscurely linked to Julie's own childhood. The circular ending suggests a present transformed by the retrieval of memory; Céline and Julie swap places and begin the story again.

But the Proustian aspect also lies in the film's power of evoking the time and place of its making (not least through Berto's hippie-chic wardrobe). It conveys a very tangible sense of a dead Parisian summer in the early 1970s, of empty spaces and malleable time in which to indulge creative leisure (Julie abandons her librarian's post to make her own lived fiction). Characteristically charging banal locations with a sense of privileged "otherness," Rivette recreates Paris as a fictional space that paradoxically derives its magic quality from a heightened realism (the documentary style of Jacques Renard's photography). This is especially evident in the use of peripheral incident (notably, a cat's movements in a garden) in the opening chase sequence. The film is about space, both literal and imaginative—over three hours, the space for the viewer to take a holiday from adulthood, as Céline and Julie do, and rediscover the infantile but empowering pleasures of "irresponsible" fiction-making.

—Jonathan Romney

CENTRAL DO BRASIL

(Central Station)

Brazil/France, 1998

Director: Walter Salles

Production: Arthur Cohn Productions in association with Martine and Antoine de Clermont-Tonnerre (MACT Prods, France), Videofilms (Brazil), Riofilme (Brazil), and Canal Plus (France); color, 35 mm; running time: 106 minutes. Released 16 January 1998 in Switzerland; U.S. release at Sundance Film Festival, 19 January 1998, by Sony Pictures Classics. Cost: $2.9 million dollars.

Producers: Arthur Cohn and Martine Clermonte-Tonnerre; executive producers: Elisa Tolomelli, Lillian Birnbaum, Donald Ranvaud, Thomas Garvin; associate producer: Paulo Brito; screenplay: Joao Emanuel Carneiro and Marcos Bernstein, based on the original idea by Salles; photography: Walter Carvalho; editors: Isabelle Rathery, Felipe Lacerda; production design: Cassio Amarante and Carla Caffè; set designer: Mônica Costa; costumes: Cristina Camargo; music arrangers: Antonio Pinto and Jacques Morelembaum; sound: Mark A. Van Der Willigen, Jean-Claude Brisson, François Groult; assistant director: Kátia Lund; casting: Sergio Machado.

Cast: Fernanda Montenegro (Dora); Vinícius de Oliveira (Josué); Marília Pêra (Irene); Soia Lira (Ana); Othon Bastos (Cesar); Otávio Augusto (Pedra); Stela Frietas (Yolanda); Matheus Nachtergaele (Isaías); Caio Junqueira (Moises).

Awards: Berlin Film Festival Golden Bear Award for Best Film and Silver Bear Award for Best Actress (Montenegro), 1998; Golden Globe Award for Best Foreign Film, 1998; U.S. National Board of Review Award for Best Foreign Film, 1998; Sundance Film Festival Cinema 100 Script Award, 1998; Academy Award nominations for Best Foreign Film and Best Actress, 1998.

Publications

Articles:

Kaufman, Anthony, "Sentimental Journey as National Allegory: An Interview with Walter Salles," in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1998.

Newsweek (Latin American edition), 25 January 1998.

McCarthy, Todd, "Central Station," in Variety (New York), 9 February 1998.

Paxman, Andrew, "Full Salles Ahead for 'Central' Helmer," in Variety, 23 November 1998.

Aufderheide, Pat, "Central Station," in Film Comment (New York), November 1998.

Klawans, Stuart, "Central Station," in The Nation (New York), 7 December 1998.

"Interview: A Hot Film from Brazil," in The New York Times, 21 March 1999.

* * *

The film Central Station begins in Rio de Janeiro's crowded train station, through which an estimated 300,000 people pass each day. The film focuses on Dora (Fernanda Montenegro), an older, cynical woman who earns a living there by writing letters for illiterate Brazilians. From its opening, the film depicts the faces and stories of everyday Brazilians and incorporates them into the script. A documentary style is achieved using a hidden camera to capture snapshots of real people dictating letters to Dora.

Central do Brasil

Dora befriends a young boy, Josué (Vincinus de Olivera), who is left alone after his mother is killed outside the station. Josué and his mother had previously hired Dora to write letters to Josué's father in the northeast of Brazil. Josué, now motherless, embarks on an odyssey by traversing the country in search of his father, a man he has never met. Dora, a woman without a family, and with a desire to reconcile her past troubled relationship with her own father, acts as a chaperone to Josué on this journey.

A true road movie, the film showcases Brazil's colorful landscapes, picturesque views of the rural hinterlands, and its people's rich cultural traditions. Walter Carvalho, the director of photography, captures beautifully composed panoramic scenes of the country. The director Walter Salles, whose most recent film was Terra Estrangeira (Foreign Land, 1995), teamed up with producer Arthur Cohn, who had previously worked with famed Italian neo-realist director Vittorio De Sica. The result is a film that carries on the neo-realist tradition by depicting poor and marginalized people in a way that shows their dignity despite their daily trials and tribulations of life. In addition, the majority of actors in this film are non-actors, including the boy playing the lead role of young Josué. The lead actor, Vinícius de Oliveira, was a nine-and-a-half year-old shoe shine boy at the Rio airport when Salles met him. Beating out 1,500 other applicants for the part, Oliveira in his debut performance demonstrates an extraordinary sincerity and charisma.

While Dora and Josué have a troubled relationship from the outset (due principally to Dora's moral lapses such as lying and stealing), the film shows a gradual moral transformation in Dora's character. The superb acting by the "Grand Dame" of the Brazilian theatre earned Montenegro numerous accolades, including a Silver Bear for Best Actress at the Berlin Film Festival, and an Oscar nomination for Best Actress.

Salles also pays homage to a 1960s Brazilian film movement called Cinema Novo. This group of politically motivated filmmakers tried to show a side of Brazil that was always ignored or made invisible by the elite. Films by these directors depicted the poor, the dispossessed, the rural peasants, and others living in the interior of Brazil, called the sertao (hinterlands). By shooting in the state of Bahia (the birthplace and location of many films by Cinema Novo pioneer Glauber Rocha), Salles shows that he has not forgotten the national legacy of socially conscious filmmaking in Brazil. The truck driver, Cesar, who gives a lift to Dora and Josué, is in fact the well-respected Cinema Novo actor Otton Bastos.

In contrast to Cinema Novo's mission to depict the "aesthetics of hunger," however, Salles' film has been described by film critic Fabiano Canosa as an "aesthetics of affection" or an "aesthetics of solidarity." The crux of the film lies not so much in whether Josué is able to find his father, but rather, how the unlikely pairing of a dour, initially unfriendly woman with a lost, confused young boy can blossom into a strong bond of mutual caring and interdependence. Both are alone in the world, and both are struggling to survive under difficult circumstances. Walter Salles has stated that his film is about Brazilian identity, and that it is an allegory for how the nation is developing and surviving, despite its financial difficulties.

Central Station, with its sweeping landscapes of an arid Brazil replete with religious scenes (a pilgrimage scene where over 800 real pilgrims performed a ritual ceremony), colorful restaurants, and vibrantly painted dwellings, focuses on people who are often ignored by mainstream film and television. At the same time however, Dora, Josué, and others are bathed in a light that makes the story and images palatable for an international film viewership. Filmed in an area covering over 8,000 miles in a period of ten weeks, Salles' Central Station captures Brazil's resilient spirit in the face of adversity.

—Tamara L. Falicov

CENTRAL STATION

See CENTRAL DO BRASIL

C'ERA UNA VOLTA IL WEST

(Once Upon a Time in the West)

USA/Italy, 1969

Director: Sergio Leone

Production: Paramount Pictures/Rafran/San Marco; color (Techniscope), 35mm; running time: 168 minutes, some American prints are 144 minutes and various other prints of different timings are available. Released 28 May 1969, New York. Filmed on location in Almeria, Spain, at Calahorra's Station, Calahorra, Logrono, Spain, and in Arizona and Utah, USA.

Producers: Bino Cicogna (executive), Fulvio Morsella; screenplay: Sergio Leone, Sergio Donati, Dario Argento, Bernardo Bertolucci, Mickey Knox (dialogue); photography: Tonino Delli Colli; editor: Nino Baragli; production design: Carlo Simi; music: original score composed by Ennio Morricone.

Cast: Claudia Cardinale (Jill McBain); Henry Fonda (Frank); Jason Robards (Cheyenne); Charles Bronson (The Man, aka Harmonica); Gabrielle Ferzetti (Morton); Paolo Stoppa (Sam); Woody Strode (Stony); Jack Elam (Knuckles); Keenan Wynn (Sherriff); Frank Wolff (Brett McBain); Lionel Stander (Barman).

Publications

Books:

- Cawelti, John G., The Six-Gun Mystique, Bowling Green, Ohio, 1971.
 Staig, Laurence, and Tony Williams, Italian Western—The Opera of Violence, London, 1975.
 Frayling, Christopher, Spaghetti Westerns: Cowboys and Europeans from Karl May to Sergio Leone, London, 1981.
 Cèbe, Gilles, Sergio Leone, Paris, 1984.
 De Fornari, Oreste, Tutti i Film di Sergio Leone, Milan, 1984.
 Tuska, John, The American West in Film, Westport, Connecticut, 1985.
 Cumbow, Robert C., Once Upon a Time: The Films of Sergio Leone, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1987.
 Buscombe, Ed, editor, BFI Companion to the Western, London, 1988.
 Cressard, Gilles, Sergio Leone, Paris, 1989.
 Mininni, Francesco, Sergio Leone, Paris, 1989.
 Belton, John, Widescreen Cinema, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1992.
 De Cornare, Oreste, Sergio Leone: The Great American Dream of Legendary America, Rome, 1997.
 Frayling, Christopher, Sergio Leone: Something to Do with Death, New York, 2000.

Articles:

- Austen, David, review in Films and Filming (London), October 1969.
 Gillett, John, review in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1969.
 Gili, Gean, "Sergio Leone," in Cinema 69 (Paris), November 1969.
 Bazin, Andre, "The Evolution of the Western," in What is Cinema?, translated by Hugh Grey, Berkeley, California, 1971.

* * *

Widely considered to be director Sergio Leone's masterpiece, Once Upon a Time in the West is his fourth Western and marks the beginning of his career in Hollywood. The preceding "Dollars" trilogy had been an unexpected success at the box office and with the critics. In attracting Leone, Paramount clearly hoped to cash in on the successful formula, using Charles Bronson in the role played by Clint Eastwood in the earlier films, and Henry Fonda as the ruthless hired gun, Frank. Fonda in particular was an inspired choice by the director, who had wanted to work with the actor for some time. Before teaming up with Leone, Fonda was best known for playing wholesome leading men, yet as Frank, we see him shoot a child in cold blood because the boy has learnt his name. Fonda had to be persuaded to go against type, but the cold-hearted killer is one of his most impressive performances. Yet despite the quality of its leading cast, Once Upon a Time in the West was not a success in the United States.

Once Upon a Time in the West is a long, difficult movie, the most elaborate and grotesque of Leone's "horse operas." The fact that the opening credits take over nine minutes will give an idea of its slow pace. Obscurity alone is not to blame for the failure of the film in the United States, however. In an attempt to squeeze in as many theatre performances as possible, Paramount slashed over twenty minutes from prints released in America, and one British critic claims to have seen a print shortened by as much as thirty minutes in London. Such thoughtless cutting inevitably removed important scenes, changed character motivations, and created lapses in continuity. Critics had difficulty understanding the film, and reviews were poor. Yet where the full-length film was shown, it was a huge success, breaking box office records in France. A new full-length print became available in 1984, and readers should take care to avoid any version much shorter than 165 minutes. The shorter prints have curiosity value only, although they do provide a lesson in what can happen when financial objectives are allowed to intrude too far into the way a film is presented.

C'era una volta il west

The film is generally praised for the performances of its leading actors, and for Leone's masterful control over pace, action, and narrative tension. As with opera, music is linked to images in a direct way. Each of the four main characters has his or her own theme, from the menacing harmonica riff of Bronson's "man with no name," to the romantic strings that accompany Cardinale's Jill McBain. Unusually, Ennio Morricone composed the musical score before shooting began, using the script to work out his ideas. In a reversal of the normal process, Leone fitted the action around the existing music, often playing it on set to help the actors understand particular scenes.

The basic plot of the film is standard Western fare. A wealthy railroad owner and his hired gunmen seek to evict a young woman from her land, hoping to use it as a stopping point for trains on their way to California. It is Leone's treatment of this plot, which has echoes of Johnny Guitar and Shane (both 1953), that has made it so influential. As with the "Dollars" trilogy, Once Upon a Time in the West is a brutal film, in which killing is a means to an end, and revenge is the central motivating force. Yet the society it portrays is changing. Jill McBain, a former prostitute trying to better herself, represents the need to abandon old ways of doing things and embrace the new. In this respect the film is resonant of its own time: in the late 1960s, student protests and civil unrest in Europe and the United States challenged the beliefs of an older establishment.

Once Upon a Time in the West is also a landmark in the history of the Western. Unlike Shane, whose selfless heroism saves the homesteaders from a greedy rancher, in Leone's film the man with no name (nicknamed "Harmonica") is driven by a desire to torture and kill his brother's murderer. Only incidentally does he protect Jill McBain and defend her land. At a deeper level, while classic Western heroes protect a society based on honesty and hard work, Once Upon a Time in the West reveals that such societies have their beginnings in jealousy, revenge, and murder. This is the new West, and gunfighters like Harmonica and Frank have had their day, but the optimistic town that grows up around Jill McBain's railroad station at the film's end is built on their brutality. Once Upon a Time in the West replaces the established Western mythology of honest struggle, endeavour, and sacrifice with a venal, perhaps more realistic, vision of how the West was won.

—Chris Routledge

CESAR

See MARIUS TRILOGY

C'EST ARRIVÉ PRÈS DE CHEZ VOUS

(Man Bites Dog)

Belgium, 1992

Directors: Rémy Belvaux, André Bonzel, Benoît Poelvoorde

Production: Les Artistes Anonymes; black and white, 16mm; running time: 96 minutes.

Producers: Rémy Belvaux, André Bonzel, Benoît Poelvoorde; screenplay: Rémy Belvaux, André Bonzel, Benoît Poelvoorde, Vincent Tavier; assistant director: Vincent Tavier; photography: André Bonzel; editors: Rémy Belvaux, Eric Dardill; sound: Alain Oppezzi, Vincent Tavier, Clotilde François, Franco Piscopo; music: Jean-Marc Chenut.

Cast: Benoît Poelvoorde (Ben Patard); Rémy Belvaux (Reporter); André Bonzel (Cameraman); Jean-Marc Chenut (Patrick); Alain Oppezzi (Franco); Vincent Tavier (Vincent); Jacqueline Poelvoorde-Pappaert (Ben's grandmother); Nelly Pappaert (Ben's grandfather); Jenny Drye (Jenny); Malou Madou (Malou); Willy Vandembroeck (Boby); Valérie Parent (Valérie).

Awards: International Critic's Prize, Cannes 1992.

Publications

Book:

Kerekes, David, and David Slater, Killing for Culture: An Illustrated History of Death Film from Mondo to Snuff, 1993.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 25 May 1992.

Strauss, F., Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1992.

Andrew, G., "Shoot to Kill" in Time Out (London), 30 December 1992.

Strick, Philip, Sight and Sound (London), January 1993.

Variety (New York), 8 February 1993.

Mark Salisbury, "The Man Bites Dog Men," in Empire, February 1993.

McNeil, Shane, "Mocu(Docu)mentary" in Cinema Papers (Victoria), October 1993.

Urbán, M., in Filmkultura (Budapest), March 1994.

Beylot, P., "C'est arrivé près de chez vous: L'imposture d'un faux cinema-verité," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), vol. 76, no. 3, 1995.

Roy, S., "Dans le cadre des rendez-vous," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), March/June 1997.

* * *

Man Bites Dog was made by three film students from the INAS film school in Brussels over a period of two-and-a-half years for a mere $100,000, and yet, on its release it rapidly became the most successful Belgian film of all time, eclipsing Toto the Hero and beating even Alien 3 and Lethal Weapon 3 to the number one box office spot. Much of the financing for the film came from the Belgian province of Namur, and from the filmmakers' families and friends, many of whom appear in the film, though some were unaware of the controversial nature of its content.

Man Bites Dog is an extraordinary and daring amalgam of the serial killer film and the mock-documentary a la Spinal Tap. Its story of a film crew making a documentary about a serial killer and gradually becoming increasingly complicit in his crimes also has distinct links with the kind of "Reality TV" that now characterises so many non-fictional slots not only on American but also European (and especially Italian) television. As André Bonzel put it in an interview in Empire: "in New York there's a TV programme called Cops and it has a camera crew following cops and going to fights. Shoplifters are arrested in front of the camera and it's really a horror film. It's the reverse of our film—you're with the good guy rather than the bad guy—but now people want it to get stronger. The camera crew are wearing bulletproof jackets and going on more criminal things with more killing because the public wants more."

Critiques of media voyeurism and audience complicity are, of course, hardly rare in the cinema (Ace in the Hole and Circle of Deceit spring to mind at once), but what is so remarkable about Man Bites Dog is the way in which it uses humour to make its point. Hard though it may be to believe, the film starts out as a kind of blackly absurd Monty Pythonesque comedy and only after a particularly horrendous murder and rape, in which the film crew participate, is the spectator brought up sharply and forced to realise how complicit he or she has become with what has been portrayed up to this point. As Bonzel himself pointed out in Killing for Culture, the whole intention was to "make the audience laugh, then have them think about what they've just laughed at. The whole point is to say to the viewer—look, how can you accept this?" This is a difficult and dangerous strategy, one fraught with aesthetic and ethical pitfalls, and the fact that it is so triumphantly successful here is due in no small measure to the performance of Benoît Poelvoorde (co-director of Man Bites Dog) as the psychopathic Ben Patard, aptly described by Philip Strick in Sight and Sound as displaying “the ingratiating brutality of Richard III as played by Robert de Niro.” Ben may be a monster, but he is certainly no cardboard cipher or stereotype, and we actually get to know his apparently decent, “normal,” lower-middle-class, shop-owning background rather well.

Taking on board Robin Wood’s celebrated thesis about horror film monsters representing the “return of the repressed,” Shane McNeil, in a particularly interesting article on the film in Cinema Papers, has suggested that Ben, like other movie serial killers, is “the natural expression of the surplus sexual and political tension that bourgeois society strives so desperately to conceal. Ben, the serial killer, is simultaneously fiils loyal and passionate son of the bourgeoisie, the logical product of a social system in crisis and the manifestation of excess in a society brimming with contradictory tensions. He is at once the quintessence of the European renaissance man and the embodiment of the Visigoth and Vandal. Little by little, parenthesised only by the shockingly explicit murders, the brilliantly structured (yet apparently random) dialogue reveals the multitudinous contradictions of his personality. Namely, how can an intellectual aesthete with a strong religious morality and a yearning for poetry, music, and ornithology be simultaneously a racist and homophobic cold-blooded assassin?”

At least one of the answers is that Ben is a fully paid-up member of what Guy Debord has called “the society of the spectacle” (as is one of Ben’s postal carrier victims, who eagerly asks if he’s on television before being murdered). That Ben appears to be acting as if starring in a movie based on his life is entirely apposite, since that is exactly what he is doing. Indeed, when the crew runs out of money, Ben subsidises the production. What we have here, then, is not simply a vicious satire on the conventional notion of documentary truth, nor merely an attack on the more lurid and sensational kinds of “reality TV,” but something more profound and wide-ranging, as McNeil has suggested:

Man Bites Dog almost approaches a meta-analysis of the cinematic apparatus itself. The very act of filmmaking becomes a microcosmic metaphor of the entire cannibalistic enterprise, a form which feeds off and on itself. Hannibal Lecter now runs the projector. This comparison is made explicit in Man Bites Dog by the fact that the crew profits quite clearly and directly from Ben’s criminal acts, both in terms of spectacle and capital. Film financing, and documentary filmmaking in particular, are directly linked here to the misfortunes of others. Both sides of the camera are working towards the same end: capital profit off other people’s misfortunes—misfortunes the crew have, if not deliberately caused, as in the case of Ben, then certainly exacerbated by their complicity and false sense of objectivity. Literally acting as both cast and crew, Belvaux, Bonzel and Poelvoorde ruthlessly expose the mendacity of the media and its persistent tendency to obliterate, then manipulate, “truth” in order to make it conform respectively to the ideological and economic agendas of bias and sensationalism.

—Julian Petley

EL CHACAL DE NAHUELTORO

(The Jackal of Nahueltoro)

Chile, 1969

Director: Miguel Littin

Production: Cine Experimental de la Universidad de Chile, Cinematografía Tercer Mundo; black and white, 16mm and 35mm; running time: 88 minutes.

Screenplay: Miguel Littin; photography: Hector Rios; editor: Pedro Chaskel; music: Sergio Ortega.

Cast: Nelson Villagra (José); Shenda Roman (Rosa); Luis Melo (Mayor); Ruben Sotoconil (Corporal Campos); Armando Fenoglio (Priest); Marcelo Romo (Reporter); Luis Alarcon (Judge); Hector Noguera (Chaplain); Pedro Villagra (Firing squad captain); Roberto Navarrete (Prison Director).

Publications

Books:

Littin, Miguel, El Chacal de Nahueltoro—La Tierra Prometida, Mexico, 1977.

West, Dennis, in Magill’s Survey of Cinema—Foreign language Films edited by Frank Magill, New Jersey, 1985.

Articles:

Callenbach, E., Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1971–72.

Martinez, F., and others, Hablemos de Ciné (Lima), January–March 1972.

Weiner, B., “Films of the Revolution” in Take One (New York), April 1972.

Welsh, H., Jeune Cinéma (Paris), May–June 1975.

Lafond, J.D., Image et Son (Paris), May 1975.

Palma, E., “El Chacal de Nahueltoro: tiempo de encuentro con su destinatario” in Cine Cubano (Havana), 1981.

Lopez, A., “Parody, Underdevelopment, and the New Latin American Cinema” in Quarterly Review of Film & Video (Reading), May 1990.

Thomson, F., “Metaphors of Space: Polarization, Dualism and Third World Cinema,” in Screen (Oxford), no. 1, 1993.

Vega, E. de la, “Fichero de cineastas nacionales,” in Dicine, March 1993.

Pratt, Mary Louise, “Overwriting Pinochet: Undoing the Culture of Fear in Chile (The Places of History: Regionalism Revisited in Latin America),” in Modern Language Quarterly, vol. 57, no. 2, June 1996.

* * *

Miguel Littin, born in 1942, trained in the theatre as an actor, but had a greater interest in television. He worked as a producer and director, becoming increasingly interested in film. In 1969 he was one of the founding members of the Committee of Popular Unity filmmakers along with Patricio Guzman.

El Chacal de Nahueltoro

By 1969, when El Chacal de Nahueltoro was made, Chile was already several years into a land reform program which aimed to redistribute land holdings across the country. In 1970 the Marxist government of Salvador Allende took power after the first democratic elections in the country, and Littin was made director of the state production company, Chile Films, working on weekly documentary newsreels. So the background against which Littin's first full-length feature film was made was one of political upheaval and turmoil in his country, but also a more liberal one in which indirect criticism of the government had become possible.

The film El Chacal de Nahueltoro, made in black and white, is based on the true story of a crime that scandalized Chile in 1960. An illiterate peasant, Jose del Carmen Valenzuela, played by Nelson Villagra, murdered his wife Rosa and her five children. Jose was imprisoned, taught to read and write, and also given religious instruction whilst in jail, and then executed by firing squad. Littin's film stands as a powerful accusation of the crimes of the prevailing Chilean dictatorial regime.

The power of the film as a criticism of the government and social system in Chile comes not only from its content but also from its style. The two distinct styles—the first half a documentary-style dealing with events leading up to Jose's multiple crime, and the second half a more conventional narrative-fiction style that narrates the events after Jose's imprisonment, together form a powerful juxtaposition that unleashed Littin's criticism of the Chilean judicial system, according to A. Lopez in Quarterly Review of Film and Video. Instead of the usual cinematic disclaimer that no character portrayed is real by design or accident, the boundaries between fiction and fact are deliberately confused by news-style footage of actors portraying real-life events. In the first half of the film we follow the investigations of an unidentified mustached reporter who tracks down the story. We hear Rosa's voice intoning the findings of the court in Jose's case, a news announcer sensationalizing the horrors of the case and Jose himself telling us of his experience in distant tones. The soundtrack of the first half is used as the record, rather than the images. The camera work of this section is uneven, jumpy, full of short cuts and hand-held camera work—documentary-style in fact. Jose's arrest is portrayed in a manner that is direct and physical. After Jose's imprisonment the style of the film changes and becomes more conventional—as Jose's character grows and develops so does the style of filming, becoming less intrusive. By the end of Jose's time in prison he can tell a story and compose a poem, and can write enough to sign his own death certificate. We see him become a part of civilized society before he is executed.

The contrast of style serves to emphasize the message. As the film slips into conventional cinematic story-telling mode, we become less aware of our role as observer and more involved in the story-as-fiction. We are then brutally reminded that what we are seeing actually happened—and shocked as we are once again confronted with violence, when Jose is executed.

Littin's point here is the ultimate irony that Jose was educated, taught the benefits of human civilization only in order to die. As he said, Chilean society humanizes in order to destroy.

The film was well received in Chile and was awarded the Chilean Critic's Prize of 1970. It also made Miguel Littin a star in the Latin American film world. Latin American critics said that it was not a great film, (Hablemos de Cine, Peru, March 1984) because the meshing of the two styles of narrative did not entirely work, but it is still considered one of Littin's better pieces of cinema, and stands as a powerful critique of a brutal and inhumane regime, and a valuable historical document of a rare period of liberalization in Latin American politics of this era.

—Sara Corben de Romero

LE CHAGRIN ET LA PITIE

(The Sorrow and the Pity)

France-Germany-Switzerland, 1971

Director: Marcel Ophuls

Production: Television Rencontre (Lausanne), Nordeutscher Rundfunk (Hamburg), and Société Suisse de Radiodiffusion (Lausanne); black and white, 16mm; running time: original version—270 minutes, commercial release—256 minutes, other versions—245 minutes. Released 5 April 1971, Paris. Interview material filmed in the late 1960s in Clermont-Ferrand; film also includes newsreel footage from the 1940s.

Producers: André Harris and Alain de Sedouy; screenplay: Marcel Ophuls and André Harris; photography: André Gazut and Jurgen Thieme; editor: Claude Vajda; sound: Bernard Migy; songs sung by: Maurice Chevalier; documentarists: Eliane Filippi (France), Christoph Derschau (Germany), and Suzy Benghiat (Great Britain).

Interviews: (French witnesses) Emmanuel d'Astier de la Vigerie; Georges Bidault; Charles Braun; Pierre le Calvez; Comte Rene de Chambrun; Emile Coulaudon; MM. Danton and Dionnet; Jacques Duclos; Marcel Fouché-Degliame; Raphael Geminiani; Alexis and Louis Grave; R. du Jonchay; Marius Klein; Georges Lamirand; M. Leiris; Dr. Claude Lévy; Christian de la Mazière; Pierre Mendès-France; Commandant Menut; Monsieur Mioche; Maitre Henri Rochat; Madame Solange; Roger Tounze; Marcel Verdier; (English witnesses) The Earl of Avon (Sir Anthony Eden); General Sir Edward Spears; Maurice Buckmaster; Flight Sergeant Evans; Denis Rake; (German witnesses) Matheus Bleibinger; Dr. Elmar Michel; Dr. Paul Schmidt; Helmuth Tausend; General A. D. Walter Warlimont.

Awards: New York Film Critics' Special Citation as best documentary, 1971.

Publications

Script:

Ophuls, Marcel, and André Harris, "Le Chagrin et la pitié," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1972; also published separately, Paris, 1980; translated as The Sorrow and the Pity, New York, 1972.

Books:

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.

Macbean, James Roy, Film and Revolution, Bloomington, Indiana, 1975.

Payán, Miguel Juan, Max Ophuls, Madrid, 1987.

García Riera, Emilio, Max Ophüls, Guadalajara, 1988.

Tassone, Aldo, Max Ophuls: l'enchanteur, Torino, 1994.

White, Susan M., Cinema of Max Ophuls: Magisterial Vision and the Figure of a Woman, New York, 1995.

Articles:

"Jean-Pierre Melville Talks to Rui Nogueira about Le Chagrin et la pitié," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1971–72.

Rubenstein, L., in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1971–72.

Reilly, C. P., in Films in Review (New York), April 1972.

Silverman, M., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1972.

"Le Chagrin et la pitié: La Critique," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1972.

Ophuls, Marcel, "Regardez donc dans vos greniers," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1972.

Gres, E., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), October 1972.

Demby, B. J., "The Sorrow and the Pity, A Sense of Loss, A Discussion with Marcel Ophuls," in Filmmakers' Newsletter (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), December 1972.

Busi, Frederick, "Marcel Ophuls and The Sorrow and the Pity," in Massachusetts Review (Amherst), Winter 1973.

Gans, H. J., in Film Critic (New York), November-December 1973.

"Why Should I Give You Political Solutions. Marcel Ophuls: An Interview," in Film Critic (New York), November-December 1973.

Jutkevich, S., "Razrusenie mifov," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), June 1974.

Pehlke, Michael, "Warte tun so leicht als wissen, was gut zu turist," in Filmkritik (Munich), October 1983.

Pehlke, Michael, in CICIM: Revue Pour le Cinéma Français (Munich), March 1990.

* * *

French postwar cinema is not remarkable for its social or political analysis, and the number of films offering a critical re-examination of the Occupation during the first 25 years after the Liberation is minimal. But as part of the aftermath of the confrontations setting the authorities against students and workers in May, 1968, a move towards a more realistic approach occurs on a variety of levels. Le Chagrin et la pitié is a key example of this new mood, and its particular value is that it offers perhaps the first comprehensive filmic analysis of 1940–44, probing the too easily accepted myths of heroic French resistance.

The film is the work of three men who had worked together in 1967 for the current affairs programming of the French television service (ORTF): the director Marcel Ophüls (the son of the great director Max Ophüls), and the producers André Harris and Alain de Sedouy. When their programme was discontinued, the trio continued to work independently, shooting on 16mm and designing their work for television. ORTF refused Le Chagrin et la pitié, however, acting in a quite ingenious manner to avoid charges of censorship. Since the film had been produced independently, it would have to be viewed before it could be bought for French showing, and ORTF simply refused to set up a viewing session, even after the film had received widespread praise. Le Chagrin et la pitié, a work designed for an audience of millions, received its first showing in a tiny art cinema on the Left Bank, but its power and originality made it one of the most controversial films of the year.

Le Chagrin et la pitié takes as its focal point the town of Clermont-Ferrand, chosen because it was both located close to Vichy and to the center of French resistance in the Auvergne. Ophüls's method was to base his investigation on a combination of interview material shot in the late 1960s with newsreel material from the 1940s. The particular situation of Clermont-Ferrand, initially part of the "free zone" and not occupied by the Wehrmacht until 1942, allows the twin themes of French response to Henri Pétain's policies and reaction to German occupation to be separated out. While the central focus is Clermont-Ferrand, Ophüls has also included statements by leading political figures of the period, such as Pierre Mendès-France and Anthony Eden, who put the local developments into a wider context.

The strength of the film however, lies in its human detail, in the interviews which relate directly to the situation in Clermont-Ferrand. Those interviewed cover the whole spectrum from aristocrats to peasants, from active collaborators and German occupying troops to resistance members and ordinary people who claim to be without politics. To set against the newsreels and the proven statistics are some startling testimonies, such as the champion cyclist who does not remember ever seeing any Germans in the town, the German ex-commanding officer, wearing his wartime service medals at his daughter's wedding, who denies any army involvement in the imprisonment and deportation of Jews, and a peasant who still has as his neighbor the man who denounced him for his resistance activities. All the easy half-truths are demolished: the crowds cheering De Gaulle's entry into the town in 1944 are indistinguishable from those who had earlier saluted Marshal Pétain.

Throughout the four hours of Le Chagrin et la pitié Ophüls's skilful selection from some 60 hours of interview material and apposite juxtapositions make a fascinating presentation of the facts beneath the legend, the still current evasions of self-evident truth, of the sorrow and the pity of the Occupation.

—Roy Armes

CHAPAYEV

USSR, 1934

Directors: Sergei Vasiliev and Georgi Vasiliev

Production: Lenfilm (USSR); black and white, 35mm; running time: 97 minutes; length: 2600 meters or 8760 feet. Released 1934.

Screenplay: Sergei Vasiliev and Georgi Vasiliev, from a published diary by Dmitri Furmanov detailing his experiences of the Russian Civil War of 1919; photography: A. Sigayev and A. Xenofontov; sound: A. Bekker; production designer: I. Makhlis; music: Gavrill Popov.

Cast: Boris Babochkin (Chapayev); Boris Blinov (Furmanov); Varvara Myasnikova (Anna); Leomind Kmit (Petka); I. Pevtsov (Colonel Borozdin); Stepon Shkurat (Potapov, a Cossack); Nikolai Simonov (Zhikhariev); Boris Chirkov (Peasant); G. Vasiliev (Lieutenant); V. Volkov (Yelan).

Publications

Scripts:

Vasiliev Brothers, Chapayev, Moscow, 1936.

Vasiliev Brothers, Tchapaiev in Scénarios choisis du cinéma soviétique, Paris, 1951.

Books:

Shumyatsky, Boris, A Cinema for the Millions, Moscow, 1935.

Chapayev, Moscow, 1936.

Dolinski, I., Chapayev, USSR, 1945.

Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.

Dickinson, Thorold, and Catherine de la Roche, Soviet Cinema, London, 1948, New York, 1972.

Taylor, Richard, and Ian Christie, editors, The Film Factory: Russian and Soviet Cinema in Documents 1896–1939, Cambridge, 1988.

Articles:

"The Whole Country is Watching Chapaev," in Pravda (Moscow), 21 November 1934.

Variety (New York), 22 January 1935.

New Statesman and Nation (London), 2 February 1935.

Seton, Marie, "New Trends in Soviet Cinema," in Cinema Quarterly (London), Spring 1935 and Summer 1935.

MacDonald, Dwight, "Soviet Cinema 1930–1940," in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), Summer 1938 and Winter 1939.

Montagu, Ivor, "The Soviet Film Industry," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1941.

Vas, Robert, "Sunflowers and Commissars," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1962.

Chapayev

Helman, A., "Bracia Wasiliew albo ideologiczna interpretacja rzeczywistosci," in Kino (Warsaw), June 1973.

Stábla, Z., in Film a Doba (Prague), January 1975.

"Chapayev Issue" of Kino (Moscow), July 1975.

Ferro, Marc, "L'Idéologie du régime stalinien au travers d'un film Tchapaiev," in La Sociologie de l'Art, (Paris), 1976.

Schmulevitch, Eric, "Les Frères Vassiliev," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 and 15 January 1977.

Uhse, B., "Tschapajew—Wir erlebten ihn wie unser eigenes Leben," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), July 1977.

Sklovsky, Viktor, and others, "Chapayev—50," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), November 1984.

Dobrotvorskii, S., "Fil'm Chapayev: opyt strukturirovaniia total'nogo realizma," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 11, 1992.

Dufour, D., "'Revolutie?'" in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 448, January 1995.

"Etapy bol'shogo puti," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 5, 1996.

Navailh, F., "Le drapeau rouge et les gant blancs," in Cahiers de la Cinématheque (Perpignan, France), no. 67, December 1997.

* * *

Chapayev was one of the most popular propaganda films of the Socialist Realist era, and is said to have been Joseph Stalin's favorite. As Stalin said in an address to the cinema industry in a letter in Soviet Cinema, "Soviet power expects from you new successes, new films glorifying, as did the Chapayev film, the greatness of the historical struggles for power by the workers and peasants of the Soviet Union, mobilising for the carrying out of new tasks, and calling to mind the achievements as well as the difficulties of socialist construction."

The Brothers Vasiliev was the name chosen by the unrelated filmmakers Georgi Vasiliev (1899–1946) and Sergei Vasiliev (1900–1959), contemporaries of the great creators of the Soviet silent cinema. They met and became friends in Moscow in a Sovkino laboratory where foreign films were recut and re-edited. Later they trained together at the studio of Sergei Eisenstein, the most renowned of the Russian Formalist filmmakers and theorists.

Chapayev is based upon a novel by the same name published in 1923 about communist writer and Red Army commissar Dimitry Furmanov who fought under the heroic divisional commander Chapayev against White Troops at the Eastern Front during the 1919 battles in Turkistan. The story revolves around the relationship which develops between the two when Furmanov is "sent from the center" to Chapayev's troops, who have preserved guerrilla tactics and follow their commander with unequivocal allegiance. Their initial confrontations grow into genuine attachment as Chapayev's attitude toward the new leader of his division changes. Furmanov, though younger than Chapayev, has a refined nature and wisdom which complements his fearless elder, who, despite the fact he only learned to read and write two years earlier, is a natural leader and strategist. At the heart of Chapayev is the idea of the role of the Communist Party in directing the establishment of the Red Army. As Naya Zorkaya argues in The Illustrated History of Soviet Cinema, "It found expression in the Chapayev-Furmanov confrontation, in other words, a clash between spontaneous revolutionary fervor and the purposeful, organizing, and guiding will of the Party."

A Pravda editorial, "The Whole Country Is Watching Chapayev," which appeared at the time of the release of the film, celebrates its propagandistic features: "We are indebted to the mastery of the Vasiliev brothers and the whole collective of artists employed in the film Chapayev for a magical return to those days when the Revolution had only just won a chance to build a new life on earth." The political powers in this era tolerated nothing antithetical to the goals of the Communist Party so that artists and critics alike were bound to the tenets of communism, hence the sycophantic tone of many of the reviews of Chapayev, which were mindful of Stalin's watchful eye. Chapayev is an example of a piece of art which represents the Socialist Realist style endorsed by the communist government to orient the masses and encourage compliance with the goals of the new political regime. The code of Socialist Realism included "the ability to view the past from the height of the lofty objectives of the future," so the aims of the films were to enhance the Communists' prestige and to affirm the party's leading role in all spheres of Soviet life. The film was seen by the masses and Chapayev became the common person's hero.

Despite its function as propaganda, Chapayev is a work of quality. The artistry is evident in the honest representation of human failings, even in the Bolshevik camp, and in the performances and the oneiric beauty of the images. The pace of Chapayev may seem to stall due to the relatively slow cutting, few suggestive details and routinely mechanical camera angles, but these features contribute to the type of realism the Vasilievs chose to represent. The national hero, rugged and flawed, is the focus and the story which is told through dialogue and a linear narrative, a style in contrast to Formalism which collided images through montage and fast-paced editing. Eisenstein wrote that kino pravda (film truth) is achieved by allowing the camera to capture pure images of the world and that dialectical montage, the collision of images through editing, communicated ideas with the viewer as active participants rather than as passive receivers of the cinematic narrative. But the story of Chapayev is told with simplicity. Boris Shumyatsky in an extract, A Cinema for the Millions (1935), stated that "This simplicity, which is a characteristic only of high art, is so organic to Chapayev, it constitutes such a striking contrast to every Formalist device that in the first period after the film's release a number of "critics" were unable to explain the reasons for its success to their own satisfaction. . . . The strength of Chapayev lies in the profound vital truth of the film."

Chapayev is truthful because it captures the spirit of the time and the struggle of the Soviet populace toward an ideal they needed to believe was worth the destruction of war. Its truthfulness is only called into question in retrospect as time revealed the transience of communist ideals.

—Kelly Otter

UN CHAPEAU DE PAILLE D'ITALIE

(An Italian Straw Hat)

France, 1927

Director: René Clair

Production: Albatros; black and white, silent, seven reels; running time: 114 minutes. Released 1927; re-released 1984.

Screenplay: René Clair, from the play by Eugene Labiche and Marc Michel; photography: Nicholas Roudakoff, Maurice Desfassiaux; editor: Henry Dobb; design: Lazare Meerson; music: (1984 version) Benedict Mason; costume designer: Souplet; artistic adviser: Alexandre Kamenka.

Cast: Albert Prejean (Fadinard, the Bridegroom); Marise Maia (The Bride); Vital Geymond (The Officer); Olga Tschekowa (Anais de Beaupertuis); Paul Olivier (Uncle Vesinet); Jim Gerald (M. de Beaupertuis); Yvonneck (The Bride's father); Alice Tissot (The Aunt); Bondi (The Man with the necktie); Pré fils (The Man with the glove); Alexandrov (The Valet); Valentine Tessier (The Customer); Volbert (The Mayor).

Publications

Script:

Clair, René, Un Chapeau de paille d'italie, in Masterworks of the French Cinema, New York, 1974.

Books:

Schwob, René, Une Melodie silencieuse, Paris, 1929.

Bardeche, Maurice, and Robert Brasillach, Histoire du cinéma, Paris, 1935; revised edition, 1954.

Viazzi, G., René Clair, Milan, 1946.

Bourgeois, J., René Clair, Geneva, 1949.

Charenso, Georges, and Roger Regent, Un Maître du cinéma: René Clair, Paris, 1952.

Manvell, Roger, The Film and the Public, London, 1955.

Solmi, A., Tre maestri del cinema, Milan, 1956.

Un Chapeau de Paille d'Italie

De La Roche, Catherine, René Clair: An Index, London, 1958.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, René Clair, Paris, 1963; revised edition, 1969.
 Mity, Jean, René Clair, Paris, 1969.
 Samuels, Charles Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.
 McGerr, Celia, René Clair, Boston, 1980.
 Barrot, Olivier, René Clair; ou, Le Temps mesuré, Renens, Switzerland, 1985.
 Greene, Naomi, René Clair: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1985.
 Dale, R.C., The Films of René Clair, Metuchen, New Jersey, 2 vols., 1986.
 Billard, Pierre, Le mystère René Clair, Paris, 1998.

Articles:

Close Up (London), November 1928, June 1929.
Variety (New York), 8 September 1931.
 Potamkin, Harry, "René Clair and Film Humour," in Hound and Horn (New York), October-December 1932.
 Causton, Bernard, "A Conversation with René Clair," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1932-33.

Jacobs, Lewis, "The Films of René Clair," in New Theatre (New York), February 1936.
 Whitebait, William, in New Statesman (London), 25 November 1944.
 Schwab, Paul, in Ciné-Club (Paris), October 1947.
Sight and Sound (London), July 1950.
 "Clair Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), August-September 1951.
Image et Son (Paris), January 1956.
 Berti, V., "L'arte del comico in René Clair," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), March-April 1968.
 Baxter, John, "A Conversation with René Clair," in Focus on Film (London), Winter 1972.
 Brown, Geoff, in The Times (London), 28 April 1984.
 Cole, Hugo, in Guardian (London), 30 April 1984.
Positif (Paris), February 1987.
 "The Italian Straw Hat," in The New York Times, vol. 141, B4 and C18, 14 May 1992.
Télérama (Paris), no. 2353, 15 February 1995.
 Brown, G., "Tricks of the Trade," in Village Voice (New York), vol. 40, 4 July 1995.

* * *

If movement is the life of cinema then René Clair's delightful comedy qualifies. Taking an old boulevard farce from the end of the nineteenth century he has imbued it with life and vitality and given it a treatment that would have gladdened the heart of his acknowledged master, Mack Sennett. Apart from the early French and Italian comics, and of course Max Linder, comedy has not been a characteristically European contribution to the cinema. In this film of Clair's however there is comedy, farce and a shrewdly observed satire on bourgeois mores of the previous two centuries.

It is a drama of objects which Clair keeps up in the air with the skill of a Chinese conjurer. The hat itself, boots, bow ties, clocks all play their part in this funniest of films.

Suspense, parallel action, and mistaken identity are all used in the best of traditions. The satire is kind and gentle, and the characters are delightfully created with a disarming innocence about their follies and pretensions.

The story set in 1889 concerns a bridegroom on his way to his wedding who has the misfortune to have his horse eat a lady's straw hat which he has to replace. The lady in question is a married woman out flirting with a handsome young officer in the Bois de Vincennes. She has a jealous husband and can not arrive home without the hat. The wedding takes second place in the desperate effort of Fadinard, the groom, to get a replacement. The wedding guests grow impatient. The clandestine pair settle down in Fadinard's flat and threaten to wreck it. There is much to-ing and fro-ing before the dilemma is resolved and the wife can be found sleeping peacefully at home by her husband with the hat lying intact beside her.

In between all this Clair's inventiveness and his observation of people makes for a highly entertaining film. The mime sequence of the wedding by the pompous and wordy mayor is surely one of the great moments of cinema when the signal of the disarrangement of a man's bow tie is taken up mistakenly until the unease spreads to every man in the congregation.

Clair is well served by his actors, many of whom were to remain with him as part of the repertory in his future comedies. Albert Prejean as the distraught Fadinard, the tongue-in-cheek voluptuousness of Olga Tschekowa, poor deaf old Uncle Vesinet with his ear-trumpet getting everything wrong and being buffeted about in situations he does not understand, is beautifully played by Paul Olivier. The bossy woman with the hen-pecked husband is another dominant character in the film. Jim Gerald as the jealous husband creates another unforgettable Clair character.

The mise-en-scène is served by many talents. Lazare Meerson's feeling for the period is captured in the decors while the costumes by Souplet contribute in no small degree to the total creation.

There is another important aspect of the film. It is an Albatros Production, the head of which, Alexandre Kamenka, was artistic adviser on the film. Albatros was the production Company of the Russian Émigrés in Paris who not only produced striking films with their own units but also promoted young French directors like Clair, Jacques Feyder and Jean Epstein.

The style set in Un Chapeau de paille d'Italie was to be developed further with the coming of sound which Clair used with great originality but still retaining his childish delight in human foibles and eccentricities of character.

—Liam O'Leary

LE CHARME DISCRET DE LA BOURGEOISIE

(The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie)

France-Italy-Spain, 1972

Director: Luis Buñuel

Production: Greenwich Film (Paris), Jet Film (Barcelona), and Dean Film (Rome); Eastmancolor, 35mm, Panavision; running time: 105 minutes. Released 15 September 1972, Paris. Filming began 23 May 1972 in France.

Producer: Serge Silberman; screenplay: Luis Buñuel and Jean-Claude Carrière; photography: Edmond Richard; editor: Helen Plemiannikov; sound engineer: Guy Villette; sound effects: Luis Buñuel; production designer: Pierre Guffroy; music editor: Galaxie Musique; costume designer: Jacqueline Guyot.

Cast: Fernando Rey (Ambassador); Paul Frankeur (M. Thévenot); Delphine Seyrig (Mme. Thévenot); Bulle Ogier (Florence); Stéphane Audran (Mme. Sénéchal); Jean-Pierre Cassel (M. Sénéchal); Julien Bertheau (Bishop); Claude Pieplu (Colonel); Michel Piccoli (Minister); Muni (Peasant); Georges Douking (The moribund gardener); Pierre Maguelon (Police sergeant); François Maistre (Commissioner); Milena Vukotic (Inès); Maria Gabriella Maione (Guerilla); Bernard Musson (Waiter in the tea room); Robert Le Beal (Tailor).

Awards: Oscar for Best Foreign Language Film, 1972.

Publications

Script:

Buñuel, Luis, and Jean-Claude Carrière, "Le Charme discret de la bourgeoisie," in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), April 1973.

Books:

Durnat, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Berkeley, 1968; revised edition, 1977. Buache, Freddy, Luis Buñuel, Lyons, 1970; as The Cinema of Luis Buñuel, New York and London, 1973.

Alcalá, Manuel, Buñuel (Cine e ideologica), Madrid, 1973.

Aranda, Francisco, Luis Buñuel: A Critical Biography, London and New York, 1975.

Cesarman, Fernando, El ojo de Buñuel, Barcelona, 1976.

Drouzy, M., Luis Buñuel, architecte du rêve, Paris, 1978.

Mellen, Joan, editor, The World of Luis Buñuel: Essays in Criticism, New York, 1978.

Cameron, Ian, Luis Buñuel, Berkeley, 1979.

Higginbotham, Virginia, Luis Buñuel, Boston, 1979.

Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.

Edwards, Gwynne, The Discreet Art of Luis Buñuel: A Reading of His Films, London, 1982.

Buñuel, Luis, My Last Breath, London and New York, 1983.

Rees, Margaret A., editor, Luis Buñuel: A Symposium, Leeds, 1983.

- Eberwein, Robert T., Film and the Dream Screen: A Sleep and a Forgetting, Princeton, New Jersey, 1984.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1984.
- Vidal, Austin Sanchez, Luis Buñuel: Obra Cinematografica, Madrid, 1984.
- Aub, Max, Conversaciones con Bunuel: Seguidas de 45 entrevistas con familiares, amigos, y colaboradores del cineasta aragones, Madrid, 1985.
- Bertelli, Pino, Buñuel: L'arma dello scandalo: L'anarchia nel cinema di Luis Buñuel, Turin, 1985.
- Oms, Marcel, Don Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1985.
- De la Colina, Jose, and Tomás Pérez Turrent, Luis Buñuel: Prohibido asomarse al interior, Mexico, 1986.
- Sandro, Paul, Diversions of Pleasure: Luis Buñuel and the Crises of Desire, Columbus, Ohio, 1987.
- De La Colina, Jose, Objects of Desire: Conversations with Luis Buñuel, New York, 1993.
- Evans, Peter W., The Films of Luis Buñuel: Subjectivity & Desire, New York, 1995.
- Baxter, John, Buñuel, New York, 1999.
- Kinder, Marsha, editor, Luis Buñuel's "The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie", New York, 1999.

Articles:

- Kovacs, S., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1972–73.
- Rosenbaum, Jonathan, "Interruption as Style: Bunuel's Le Charme discret de la bourgeoisie," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1972–73.
- Fiesole, "Luis Buñuel anticapitalista romantico," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), September–October 1972.
- Buffa, M., "La discreta sovversione di Bunuel," in Filmcritica (Rome), October 1972.
- Chevassu, F., in Image et Son (Paris), November 1972.
- Oлива, L., in Film a Doba (Prague), December 1972.
- Rice, S., in Take One (Montreal), December 1972.
- Benayoun, Robert, in Positif (Paris), January 1973.
- "Buñuel Issue" of Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 78–80, 1973.
- Reilly, C. P., in Films in Review (New York), January 1973.
- Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), March 1973.
- Minish, G., in Take One (Montreal), March 1973.
- Filmcritica* (Rome), April 1973.
- Bonneville, L., in Séquences (Montreal), April 1973.
- Bruno, E., "Fascino discreto della borghesia: L'impenetrabilità di Buñuel," in Filmcritica (Rome), April 1973.
- Delain, Michel, "Le Charme discret de Luis Buñuel," in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), April 1973.
- Turrone, G., in Filmcritica (Rome), April 1973.
- Murray, S., "Erotic Moments in the Films of Luis Buñuel," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), July 1974.
- Ciarletta, N., "Interpretabilità (A proposito del Fascino discreto della borghesia)," in Filmcritica (Rome), August–September 1974.
- George, G. L., "The Discreet Charm of Luis Buñuel," in Action (Los Angeles), November–December 1974.
- Durgnat, Raymond, in Film Comment (New York), May–June 1975.
- Conrad, Randall, "A Magnificent and Dangerous Weapon: The Politics of Luis Buñuel's Later Films," in Cineaste (New York), no. 8, 1976.
- Wertenstein, W., "Pkt z diabłem albo wdziek zwat pienia," in Kino (Warsaw), November 1976.

- "Buñuel Issue" of Contracampo (Madrid), October–November 1980.
- Comuzio, E., "Il fascino discreto del cinema," in Cineforum (Bergamo), December 1981.
- Listener* (London), 10 December 1987.
- Jousse, T., "Buñuel face a ce qui se derobe," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1993.
- Peck, A., in Positif (Paris), October 1993.
- Paulhan, J., "A Revolution Is Not a Dinner Party: The Discreet Charm of Buñuel's Bourgeoisie," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 22, no. 4, October 1994.
- Schmidt, N., "Montage et scénario," in Cinéaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), no. 72, 1994.
- Irwin, G., "Luis Buñuel's Postmodern Explicador: Film, Story, and Narrative Space," in Canadian Journal of Film Studies (Ottawa), vol. 4, no. 1, 1995.
- Chaspoul, C., in Positif (Paris), May 1997.
- Debroux, Stefan, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 491, April 1999.

* * *

Recent critical attacks on realism have tended, at their most extreme, to collapse it with narrative itself, as if to tell a story were an act of oppression. During the 1960s and 1970s there appeared a number of important and diverse European films (Bergman's Persona, Pasolini's Teorema, Herzog's Even Dwarfs Started Small, Godard's Tout va bien, Rivette's Céline et Julie vont en bateau are prominent examples) whose project involved retaining narrative while calling into question its realist/illusionist tyranny. Attention was drawn to the process, and the pleasure, of narration, detaching it from the traditional support of a coherent diegetic world. The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie belongs in this group, of which it is a particularly fascinating and delightful member.

Four levels of narrative can be distinguished within the film. (1) "Reality"—for want of a better word. Like any traditional fiction Discreet Charm begins by establishing characters and plausible action (a car-load of guests driving to a dinner party). This "reality-level" is never entirely undermined; the action, however, becomes increasingly implausible and absurd, a principle built mainly on the motif of meals frustrated or interrupted. (2) Dream. At four points in the film male characters wake up, and the spectator is jolted into realizing that what has preceded that moment has been a dream. The boundary between this and the "reality" of (1) is ingeniously blurred: the dreams are scarcely more fantastic than reality; their beginnings are never signalled. Retrospectively, we can work out by the use of "common sense" where each dream started; but there remains the lingering doubt as to whether common sense can validly be applied to the film at all. One of the dreams is definitely established as being contained within the dream of another character. It is not impossible to read the entire film (until the last couple of minutes) as Fernando Rey's dream. (3) Inserted narratives. During the film three stories are told (always by peripheral male characters) and rendered visually by Buñuel. Offered as truth, they are just as fantastic as the dreams or the reality; they are also the three most intense and disturbing episodes of the film. (4) The country road. Barely a "narrative," (the "story" would amount to no more than "These people went for a walk in the country"), this remains the most enigmatic aspect of the film, unrelated to reality, dreams or narrations. It seems to express the ambivalence of Buñuel's attitude to his bourgeois characters, as to whether they are redeemable or not. On the one hand, they appear to be wandering aimlessly, lost, going nowhere; on the other, they are shown outside their artificial and constricted environment, amid images of natural fertility (perhaps, after all, they could be going somewhere?).

The dreams and the narratives work in a dialectical relationship. The three narratives all have strong Oedipal connotations. Two are literally about parent/child relationships, the third about a symbolic father, the "bloody sergeant" and a rebellious son, the young revolutionary. As fantasies, they represent the reality underlying the patriarchal order, the strain and horror upon which that order is constructed. The four dreams (all dreamt by middle-aged patriarchal authority figures) are singlemindedly concerned with anxieties about the collapse of authority. This explains why no dreams are dreamt, or stories told, by the women, who have no authority to lose.

Finally, the food motif. Buñuel uses the dinner party to epitomize bourgeois rituals: its purpose is not to eat but to assert one's status. The frustration of every meal—until the last moments of the film—represents the bourgeoisie's collapse of confidence depicted in other ways in the dreams and narratives. Why can Fernando Rey eat at last, at the end of the film? He is alone; he eats because he is hungry not as part of a bourgeois ritual. He is not waited on—he serves himself out of the refrigerator—hence is acting outside the class oppression that is an essential factor in bourgeois ritual. Finally, he has just dreamed the annihilation of his entire circle, including himself. There has always been a close relationship between Buñuel and the characters Rey plays in his films: something less than identification but more than compassion.

—Robin Wood

CHARULATA

(The Lonely Wife)

India, 1964

Director: Satyajit Ray

Production: R. D. Bansal (company); black and white, 35mm; running time: 115 minutes. Released 1964. Filmed late 1963 to early 1964 in India.

Producer: R. D. Bansal; screenplay: Satyajit Ray, from the novel by Rabindranath Tagore; photography: Subrata Mitra; editor: Dulal Dutta; art director: Bansi Chandragupta; musical score: Satyajit Ray.

Cast: Soumitra Chatterjee (Amal); Madhabi Mukherjee (Charulata); Sailen Mukherjee (Bhupati Dutta); Shyamal Ghosal (Umapeda); Geetali Roy (Mandakini).

Awards: Berlin Film Festival, Best Direction, 1965.

Publications

Books:

- Gelguld, Harry M., Film Makers on Filmmaking, Bloomington, Indiana, 1967.
- Sarris, Andrew, editor, Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.
- Seton, Marie, Portrait of a Director: Satyajit Ray, Bloomington, Indiana, 1971.
- Satyajit Ray*, New Delhi, 1976.
- American Film Institute, Satyajit Ray: Study Guide, Washington, D.C., 1979.
- Micciollo, Henri, Satyajit Ray, Lausanne, 1980.
- Rangoonwalla, Firoze, Satyajit Ray's Art, Shahdara, Delhi, 1980.
- Ray, Satyajit, An Anthology, edited by Chidananda Das Gupta, New Delhi, 1981.
- Willemsen, Paul, and Behroze Gandhi, Indian Cinema, London, 1982.
- Ramchandran, T. M. 70 Years of Indian Cinema (1913–1983), Bombay, 1985.
- Nyce, Ben, Satyajit Ray: A Study of His Films, New York, 1988.
- Robinson, Andrew, Satyajit Ray: The Inner Eye, Berkeley, California, 1989.
- Tesson, Charles, Satyajit Ray, Paris, 1992.
- Cooper, Darius, The Cinema of Satyajit Ray: Between Tradition and Modernity, New York, 1999.
- Ganguly, Suranjan, Satyajit Ray: In Search of the Modern, Lanham, Maryland, 2000.

Articles:

- "Satyajit Ray on Himself," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), July-August 1965.
- Houston, Penelope, "Ray's Charulata," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1965–66.
- Stanbrook, Alan, "The World of Ray," in Films and Filming (London), November 1965.
- Gillett, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1965.
- "From Film to Film," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), no. 3, 1966.
- "Satyajit Ray Issue" of Montage, July 1966.
- Hrusa, B., "Satyajit Ray: Genius Behind the Man," in Film (London), Winter 1966.
- Pechter, William S., "India's Chekhov," in Commonweal (New York), 16 October 1970.
- Goldschmidt, Didier, in Cinématographe (Paris), July 1981.
- Gauthier, G., in Image et Son (Paris), July-August 1981.
- Haham, C., "Cinema Bengali de Ray, Cinema Hindi de Bombay," in Image et Son (Paris), July-August 1981.
- Magny, Joel, "Keerlata: De la géométrie des sentiments dans l'espace et dans le temps," in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1981.
- Jordan, Isabelle, "Le Bruit du vent contre la jalousie," in Positif (Paris), September 1981.
- Hanan, D., "Patriarchal Discourse in Some Early Films of Satyajit Ray," in Deep Focus (India), vol. 3, no. 1, 1990.
- Ganguly, S., "One Single Blend: A Conversation with Satyajit Ray," in East-West Film Journal (Honolulu), vol. 3, no. 2, June 1995.
- Ganguly, Keya, "Carnal Knowledge: Visuality and the Modern in Charulata," in Camera Obscura (Bloomington, Indiana), no. 37, January 1996.

Charulata

Giavarini, Laurence, “L’écriture de Charulata,” in Vertigo (Paris), #14, 1996.

Cooper, D., “The Indian Woman in the Bengali/Hindu Dollhouse: Satyajit Ray’s Charulata,” in Women’s Studies, vol. 25, no. 2, 1996.

* * *

Charulata is the most successful film of a group Satyajit Ray made in the mid-1960s with the actress Madhabi Mukherjee. Whereas the director’s first films—especially the Apu trilogy—trace the education and growth to maturity of young male heroes, these mid-1960s films treat, in a variety of periods and social contexts, the problems of women in Indian society. As in the early films, Ray’s method is to use a mass of brilliantly observed and often very funny details to build a single strand of plot. Charulata, one of Ray’s undoubted masterpieces, is adapted from a story by Rabindranath Tagore and set in a period of particular significance to the director: the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Charulata, the sensitive but bored wife of a westernized newspaper publisher finds herself drawn sexually to her husband’s young cousin who comes to stay and shares her taste for literature. The film moves with beautiful precision from flirtation and almost childish competitiveness to near tragedy amid a lovingly reconstructed period setting. While Tagore’s story ends in disaster, Ray is less conclusive, choosing to freeze the film’s last frame as husband and wife are about to come together again. This refusal of tragedy points to the characteristic form of Ray’s films. One of the creative tensions in his work is that between the often rambling narratives he adapts and the tight shaping impulse of his imagination, which produces story patterns to match the most finely wrought classical Hollywood movies. But just as villains are absent from his work, so too is narrative closure and Charulata is typical in its rejection of finality where the characters are concerned.

In considering Ray as a filmmaker it is important to remember that his work has no roots in the traditions of Indian cinema. His early films are resolutely independent of the devices and conventions of the Hindi movie, of which he had little if any direct knowledge at this time. Ray’s is a personal synthesis of an Indian sensibility and the formal lessons of western cinema. Though he is often seen as the heir to Italian neorealism and works like Vittorio De Sica’s Bicycle Thieves have made a profound impression on him, there are fundamental differences. In particular Ray refuses actuality—the living presence of contemporary society—which was so crucial to filmmakers like De Sica and Rossellini. Ray habitually turns to the past, and the particular significance of Charulata, beyond its incredibly sensitive study of personal interaction, is the period to which Ray turns. Both Ray's ancestors and the Tagore family belonged to the educated elite of the Bengali middle classes who formed the "middle-men" between the colonizers and the colonized. Their knowledge of English gave them key posts in education and administration under the British, and also made them a channel through which the new intellectual ideas from Europe (democracy, liberalism, nationalism, the liberation of women and social equality) flowed into Indian society. Charulata celebrates this moment of interaction: the husband Bhupati devotes his wealth and energy to his English-language newspaper which will disseminate the new ideas. A key moment is the party that he throws to celebrate the Liberal election victory in London. But the nineteenth-century Bengali Cultural Renaissance was not merely an assimilation of western ideas. Its participants combined this with a re-examination of traditional arts at his college—now a university—in Santineketan. Here too, Ray is faithful to his family traditions, for all his finest films are explorations of Indian society. Finally Charulata's power comes from the sense of Ray's personal discovery of a key moment of fusion between India and the West.

—Roy Armes

CHELOVEK S KINOAPPARATOM

(Man with a Movie Camera)

USSR, 1929

Director: Dziga Vertov

Production: Vufku (Ukraine); black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: 67 minutes. Released 1929. Filmed 1929, mostly in Moscow.

Screenplay: Dziga Vertov; photography: Mikhail Kaufman; editor: Dziga Vertov; assistant editor: Yelizaveta Svilova; special effects: Dziga Vertov, Mikhail Kaufman.

Publications

Scripts:

Vertov, Dziga, "The Man with the Movie Camera," in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1972.

Marie, Michel, "Dziga Vertov: L'homme à la caméra" (photographic continuity) in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 December 1978.

Books:

Dickinson, Thorold, and Catherine De La Roche, Soviet Cinema, London, 1948.

Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.

Abramov, Nikolai, Dziga Vertov, edited by Barthélemy Amengual, Lyons, 1965.

Sadoul, Georges, Dziga Vertov, Paris, 1971.

Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.

Feldman, Seth, Evolution of Style in the Early Works of Dziga Vertov, New York, 1977.

Feldman, Seth, Dziga Vertov: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Marshall, Herbert, Masters of the Soviet Cinema: Crippled Creative Biographies, London, 1983.

Vertov, Dziga, Kino-Eye: The Writings of Dziga Vertov, edited by Annette Michelson, Berkeley, 1984.

Waugh, Thomas, editor, "Show us Life": Toward a History and Aesthetics of the Committed Documentary, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.

Petric, Vlada, Constructivism in Film: The Man with the Movie Camera: A Cinematic Analysis, Cambridge, 1987.

Articles:

Vaughn, Dai, in Films and Filming (London), November 1960.

Sadoul, Georges, "Bio-Filmographie de Vertov," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August 1963.

Weinberg, Herman G., in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1966.

Gierke, Christopher, "Dziga Vertov," in Afterimage (New York), April 1970.

Michelson, Annette, "The Man with the Movie Camera: From Magician to Epistemologist," in Art Forum (New York), March 1972.

Bordwell, David, in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1972.

Helman, A., "Dziga Wiertow albo wszechobecność kamery. Nasz kamery," in Kino (Warsaw), May 1973.

Vronskaya, Jean, "The Man Without a Movie Camera," in Film (London), May 1973.

Tuch, R., "Vertov and the Picaresque Spirit: Man with the Movie Camera," in Film Library Quarterly (New York), no. 1, 1975.

Cornand, J., in Image et Son (Paris), June-July 1975.

Crofts, S., and O. Rose, "An Essay Towards Man with a Movie Camera," in Screen (London), Spring 1977.

Mayne, Judith, "Kino-truth and Kino-praxis: Vertov's Man with a Movie Camera," in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Summer 1977.

Brejč, T., "Slikovno polje in podoba v filmu," in Ekran (Ljubljana, Yugoslavia), no. 9–10, 1979.

Interview with Mikhail Kaufman in October (Cambridge, Massachusetts), Winter 1979.

Williams, A., "The Camera Eye and the Film: Notes on Vertov's Formalism," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 3, 1980.

Carroll, Noel, "Causation, the Amplification of Movement and Avant-Garde Film," in Millennium Film Journal (New York), Fall-Winter 1981–82.

Beller, J. L., "The Circulating Eye," in Communication Review (Thousand Oaks, California), no. 2, 1993.

Crofts, S., "Constructivism in Film: the Man with the Movie Camera: A Cinematic Analysis," in Metro Magazine (St. Kilda West), Winter 1994.

Séquences (Haute-Ville), May-June 1995.

Tsivian, Yuri, "Dziga Vertov's Frozen Music," in Griffithiana, October 1995.

Chelovek s kinoapparatom

Segnocinema (Vicenza), November/December 1995.
 Leiser, Erwin, "Revolutionär und Poet," in Film und Fernsehen
 (Berlin), vol. 23, no. 5, 1995.

* * *

The product of post-revolutionary Russia, Man with a Movie Camera reflects that era's excitement with film and anticipates modern techniques and concern for capturing actuality. Its creator, Dziga Vertov, in the film's treatment, called Man with a Movie Camera an "experiment in conveying visual phenomena without the aid of titles, scenario, or theatre (a film without actors or sets)." The result of Vertov's experiment is a film about filmmaking and the illusions it can create.

Without the usual props of plot, titles, or sound, Vertov gives the film its structure by using the format of the city symphony films of the mid 1920s, but he brackets the scenes with references to the cinematic process. The film's protagonist is the cameraman, a picaro travelling through the city, involving himself in its daily dawn-to-dusk activities, and observing all walks of life through the eye of his camera. The camera eye takes on a persona of its own by turning frequently to the audience as though addressing it. The camera is the same apparatus Vertov personified in his early manifestos on film: "I am a mechanical eye. I, a machine, am showing you a world, the likes of which only I can see." In an almost virtuoso performance of camera and editing techniques, the audience is treated to superimpositions, animation, split screens, fast motion, varying camera angles, trolleying and dollying, quick cutting, montage, and prismatic lenses, all in a rapid succession which gives the film an inherent vitality.

The scenes themselves are actualities—people working, playing, resting—but always with the constant reminder that these are filmed actualities. The film opens on an empty theatre; the audience arrives; the projectionist readies his film; the orchestra begins to play; and we see a film come on the screen, the film we will in fact watch. Throughout the film, we are always aware of the camera's presence; we see the camera reflected in windows and in shadows. We see the cameraman with his machine climbing a smokestack, climbing out of a beer mug, being hoisted by a crane, walking into the sea, running across roof tops, and going down a mine shaft. The self-reflexive aspects of the film become more complex as we see shots of a motorcyclist, then of the cameraman filming the motorcyclist, then the same scene being projected in the theatre. Later in the midst of an active sequence, the frame freezes; there follows a series of stills which lead us to a strip of film in an editor's hands. Now in the editing room, we see the editor hang the strip of film on a rack with other strips, some of which are shots we have already seen. At the end, we return to the theatre, the camera and tripod assemble on the screen, take a bow, and walk off. In the finale, we see a jumbling of shots from previous scenes intercut with shots of the audience watching these scenes, and finally the camera lens turned toward us with a human eye superimposed over the iris. Vertov's point is firmly established—he has shown us reality, he has expanded our vision of life, but it is a reality that only exists on film.

Greeted in 1929 as an exciting view into film's future, Man with a Movie Camera is still exciting to audiences because of its sophisticated approach to the art of filmmaking. The camera and editing pyrotechnics, in fact, seem quite contemporary. It is also strikingly modern in its basic concerns about the relationship between film and reality and the role the camera and cameraman play. These are also the concerns of the cinema vérité filmmakers today.

—Sharon Lee

CHELSEA GIRLS

USA, 1966

Director: Andy Warhol

Production: Andy Warhol Films; black and white and Eastmancolor, 16mm; running time: 195 minutes, other versions are 210 and 205 minutes. Released 15 September 1966; uncut reels were projected side by side; in the general release version, the 1st reel appeared screen right, and a few minutes later, the second appeared screen left. Filmed 1966 in the Chelsea Hotel, New York City; other parts of New York City; and Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Producer: Andy Warhol; photographer: Andy Warhol; screenplay: Andy Warhol and Ronald Tavel; music: The Velvet Underground; production assistant: Paul Morrissey.

Cast: “The Pope Ondine Story”—Ondine (Pope); Angelina Davis (Pepper); Ingrid Superstar; Albert René Ricard; Mary Might; International Velvet; Ronna. “The Duchess”—Brigid Polk. “The John”—Ed Hood (Ed); Patrick Flemming (Patrick); Mario Montez (Transvestite); Angelina “Pepper” Davis; International Velvet; Mary Might; Gerard Malanga; Albert René Ricard; Ingrid Superstar. “Hanoi Hanna (Queen of China)”—Mary Might (Hanoi Hanna); International Velvet; Ingrid Superstar; Angelina “Pepper” Davis. “The Gerard Malanga Story”—Marie Menken (Mother); Gerard Malanga (Son); Mary Might (Girlfriend). “The Trip” and “Their Town (Toby Short)”—Eric Emerson. “Afternoon”—Edie Sedgwick (Edie); Ondine; Arthur Loeb; Donald Lyons; Dorothy Dean. “The Closet”—Nico; Randy Borscheidt. “Reel 1”—Eric Emerson; Ari.

Publications

Books:

- Tyler, Parker, Underground Film: A Critical History, New York, 1969.
 Coplans, John, Andy Warhol, New York, 1970.
 Crone, Rainer, Andy Warhol, New York, 1970.
 Gidal, Peter, Andy Warhol's Films and Paintings, London, 1971, 1991.
 Wilcock, John, The Autobiography and Sex Life of Andy Warhol, New York, 1971.
 Koch, Stephen, Andy Warhol's World and His Friends, New York, 1973.
 Koch, Stephen, Stargazer: Andy Warhol's World and His Films, New York, 1973; revised edition, 1985.
 Smith, Patrick S., Andy Warhol's Art and Films, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1986.
 O'Pray, Michael, editor, Andy Warhol: The Film Factory, London, 1989.
 Tillman, Lynne; photographs by Stephen Shore, The Velvet Years: Warhol's Factory, 1965–67, New York, 1995.
 Suárez, Juan Antonio, Bike Boys, Drag Queens, and Superstars: Avant-Garde, Mass Culture, and Gay Identities in the 1960s Underground Cinema, Bloomington, Indiana, 1996.
 Pratt, Alan R., editor, The Critical Response to Andy Warhol, Westport, Connecticut, 1997.

Articles:

- Ehrenstein, David, in Film Culture (New York), Fall 1966.
 Steller, J., “Beyond Cinema: Notes on Some Films by Andy Warhol,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1966.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 15 December 1966.
 Warhol, Andy, “My Favourite Superstar, Notes on My Epic, Chelsea Girls” in Arts Magazine (New York), February 1967.
 Burnett, Ron, in Take One (Montreal), April 1967.
 Tyler, Parker, “Dragtime or Drugtime: or Film a la Warhol,” in Evergreen Revue (New York), April 1967.
 “Chelsea Girls Issue,” of Film Culture (New York), Summer 1967.
 Callenbach, Ernest, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1967–68.
 Lugg, Andrew, “On Andy Warhol,” in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1967–68.
 Price, James, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1968.
 Durnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), August 1969.
 Cipnic, D. J., “Andy Warhol: Iconographer,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1972.
 Bourdon, David, “Warhol as Filmmaker,” in Art in America (New York), May–June 1971.
 Cowan, Bob, “My Life and Times with the Chelsea Girls,” in Take One (Montreal), September–October 1971.
 Larson, R., “A Retrospective Look at the Films of D.W. Griffith and Andy Warhol,” in Film Journal (New York), Fall–Winter 1972.

* * *

A bona fide milestone of the American underground film, Chelsea Girls marks the apogee of the film career of pop artist Andy Warhol. Consisting of twelve 35-minute reels, each representing the activities in one room of New York's Chelsea Hotel, the film is projected two reels at a time, side by side, bringing its seven hours of footage to a running time of three hours—as fans have noted, the same length as

Gone with the Wind. The comparison is facetious, but apt, for Chelsea Girls not only represents one of the most significant cultural/aesthetic touchstones for the 1960s underground, but also its first “blockbuster,” drawing audiences large enough for Variety to begin listing its grosses.

Each of the film’s 12 reels consists of a single, unedited shot in which various personalities from the Warhol factory (junkies, rock singers, camp homosexuals, professional poseurs) talk and/or act out sketchy vignettes. The cinema-verité aimlessness of the recorded performances is set in contrast to the strict, though seemingly arbitrary, structure of the film. While the length and continuity of each scene are identical (with actors instructed only to remain within the frame and to occupy the allotted time), the framing and camera movement vary between them, from the perfectly static to the eternally zooming. In a similar spirit of randomness, eight of the reels are in black-and-white, while four are in colour. The dual projection, suggesting the simultaneity of action in two rooms at once, represents Warhol’s final renunciation of the cinema of montage, by making cross-cutting superfluous.

Apparently, the decision to show Chelsea Girls two reels at a time was made only after the footage was shot; and Warhol provided no clue as to their order or as to which of the competing soundtracks should receive precedence. Thus, the projectionist took an active part in the creative process; as does the audience, which never fails to detect correspondence and contrasts between the randomly juxtaposed images. More recently, the film’s projection has become conventionalized, based on the instructions of its sole distributor Ondine, star of one of the film’s “climactic” scenes. The beginning of the first two reels is staggered by about five minutes, with the reel change on the first projector taking place while the second image continues, and vice versa. As currently presented, the order of the reels is structured along a line of increasingly dramatic (though basically non-narrative) scenes, and from black-and-white toward colour. The first of the film’s six coupled reels features Velvet Underground cohort Nico meticulously cutting her hair on the left screen, and superstar Ondine on the right. The last two reels mirror the first, with Nico on the right (in colour) and Ondine on the left playing out the film’s most emotional scene, wherein the fiction of Ondine as “Pope,” taking confessions from various Factory types, flares into a genuine confrontation with one woman, followed first by a refusal to complete the scene and then by a sequence in which Ondine makes use of the camera as confessor. The episodes in between include scenes of Factory regulars Ed Hood, Mario Montez, Ingrid Superstar, and International Velvet lolling on a bed; of Brigid Polk shooting up speed through her jeans; of later exploitation queen Mary Woronov playing Hanoi Hannah, haranguing several women from a revolutionary tract; of avant-garde filmmaker Marie Mencken verbally abusing factory pretty-boy Gerard Malanga; and of young Eric Emerson doing a sort of slow striptease under psychedelic lights as he delivers an LSD-induced rap to the camera.

Seen outside the context of New York 1960s underground chic, Chelsea Girls still seems more than deserving of its reputation, not only as a document of a period, or even as the apotheosis of a certain influential part of the counterculture, but moreso as the epitome of Warhol’s democratic notion of stardom for everyone placed in brashly contradictory juxtaposition to a passively mechanical aesthetic structured to the specifications of the culture of mass production and consumption.

—Ed Lowry

UN CHIEN ANDALOU

(Andalusian Dog)

France, 1928

Director: Luis Buñuel

Production: Black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: 17 minutes, some sources state 24 minutes; length: 430 meters. Released April 1929, Paris; re-released 1960 with musical soundtrack. Filmed March 1928 in Le Havre and Paris.

Producer and editor: Luis Buñuel; screenplay: Luis Buñuel and Salvador Dalí; photography: Albert Dubergon; production designer: Pierre Schilzneck; music: Wagner with some Argentine tangos (for 1960 version).

Cast: Pierre Batcheff (Young Man); Simone Mareuil (Girl); Jaime Miravilles; Salvador Dalí (Marist priest); Luis Buñuel (Man with razor).

Publications

Scripts:

Buñuel, Luis, and Salvador Dalí, Un Chien andalou, in L'Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July 1963.

Buñuel, Luis, and Salvador Dalí, “L’Age d’or” and “Un Chien andalou,” New York, 1968.

Books:

Kyrou, Ado, Le Surréalisme au cinéma, Paris, 1953; revised edition, 1963.

Moulet, Luc, Luis Buñuel, Brussels, 1957.

Kyrou, Ado, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1962.

Durnat, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Berkeley, 1968; revised edition, 1977.

Breton, André, Manifestoes of Surrealism, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1969.

Buache, Freddy, Luis Buñuel, Lyons, 1970; as The Cinema of Luis Buñuel, New York and London, 1973.

Matthews, J. H., Surrealism and the Film, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1971.

Alcalá, Manuel, Buñuel (Cine e ideologia), Madrid, 1973.

Aranda, Francisco, Luis Buñuel: A Critical Biography, London and New York, 1975.

Cesarman, Fernando, El ojo de Buñuel, Barcelona, 1976.

Hammond, Paul, editor, The Shadow and Its Shadow: Surrealist Writings on Cinema, London, 1978.

Mellen, Joan, editor, The World of Luis Buñuel: Essays in Criticism, New York, 1978.

Higginbotham, Virginia, Luis Buñuel, Boston, 1979.

Un Chien Andalou

- Thiher, Allen, The Cinematic Muse: Critical Studies in the History of French Cinema, Columbia, Missouri, 1979.
- Williams, Linda, Figures of Desire: A Theory and Analysis of Surrealist Film, Urbana, Illinois, 1981.
- Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.
- Edwards, Gwynne, The Discreet Art of Luis Buñuel: A Reading of His Films, London, 1982.
- Buñuel, Luis, My Last Breath, London and New York, 1983.
- Rees, Margaret A., editor, Luis Buñuel: A Symposium, Leeds, 1983.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1984.
- Vidal, Agustin Sanchez, Luis Buñuel: Obra Cinematografica, Madrid, 1984.
- Aub, Max, Conversaciones con Buñuel: Seguidas de 45 entrevistas con familiares, amigos, y colaboradores del cineasta aragones, Madrid, 1985.
- Bertelli, Pino, Buñuel: L'arma dello scandalo: L'anarchia nel cinema di Luis Buñuel, Turin, 1985.
- Oms, Marcel, Don Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1985.
- Talens, Jenaro, El ojo fuchado: Lectura de "Un Chien andalou" de Luis Buñuel, Madrid, 1986.
- Sandro, Paul, Diversions of Pleasure: Luis Buñuel and the Crises of Desire, Columbus, Ohio, 1987.
- Buñuel, Luis, L' Age d'Or & Un Chien Andalou, New York, 1989.
- Buñuel, Luis, Un Chien Andalou, New York, 1994.
- Evans, Peter W., The Films of Luis Buñuel: Subjectivity & Desire, New York, 1995.
- Baxter, John, Buñuel, New York, 1999.
- Kinder, Marsha, editor, Luis Buñuel's "The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie," New York, 1999.
- Articles:
- Richardson, Tony, "The Films of Luis Buñuel," in Sight and Sound (London), March 1954.
- Prouse, Derek, "Interviewing Buñuel," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1960.
- Riera, Emilio, "The Eternal Rebellion of Luis Buñuel," in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1960.
- Aranda, Francesco, "Surrealist and Spanish Giant," in Films and Filming (London), October 1961.

- Kast, Pierre, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1961.
 “Buñuel Issue” of La Méthode (Paris), January 1962.
 Durgnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London) April 1962.
 Robinson, David, “The Old Surrealist,” in London Magazine, November 1962.
 Vigo, Jean, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July 1963.
 Hammond, Robert, “Luis Alcoriza and the Films of Luis Buñuel,” in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1965.
 Harcourt, Peter, “Luis Buñuel: Spanish and Surrealist,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1967.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), January 1969.
 MacLochlainn, Alf, “Pointed Horror: The Films of Luis Buñuel and Georges Franju,” in Film Journal (New York), Summer 1971.
 Lyon, E. H., “Luis Buñuel: The Process of Dissociation in 3 Films,” in Cinema Journal (Iowa City), Fall 1973.
 Drummond, P., “Textual Space in Un Chien andalou,” in Screen (London), Autumn 1977.
 Thiher, Allen, “Surrealism’s Enduring Bite: Un Chien andalou,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Winter 1977.
 Williams, Linda, “The Prologue to Un Chien andalou: A Surrealist Film Metaphor,” in Screen (London), Winter 1976–77.
 Walker, I., “Buñuel’s Half Century, Once upon a Time,” in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1977–78.
 Logette, L., “Surréalisme et cinéma,” in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), April–May 1981.
 Wood, Michael, “The Discreet Charm of Luis Buñuel,” in American Film (Washington, D.C.), September 1982.
 Bachelis, T., “Slovo o Sal’vadore Dali,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 6, 1989.
 Durgnat, R., “Theory of Theory and Buñuel the Joker,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), no. 1, 1990.
 Jay, M., “The Disenchantment of the Eye: Surrealism and the Crisis of Ocularcentrism,” in Visual Anthropology Review, vol. 7, no. 1, 1991.
Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), no. 33–34–35, 1993.
 Perry, J. W., “L’Age d’or and Un Chien andalou,” in Filmfax (Evanston, Illinois), August–September 1993.
 Goudet, Stéphane, in Cinémathèque (Paris), no. 6, Autumn 1994.
 “L’esordio e il destino del testo ‘insegretito,’” in Castoro Cinema (Milan), January 1996.

* * *

Un Chien andalou is probably the most renowned surrealist film. A collaborative work by Luis Buñuel and Salvador Dalí, the film, intended as “a desperate and passionate appeal to murder,” was immediately acclaimed for its poetry and beauty. Its enduring canonical status in film history is due not only to the reputation of its directors but also to its complex structure as a text. The film’s disturbing imagery and transformation of narrative and continuity conventions help account for its appeal as a subject for critical scrutiny.

The film does present something on the order of narrative, if elusively; continuity is sustained primarily through the recurrence of the same actor-characters. However the connection between events is decidedly ambiguous. Title cards running through the film undermine any sense of coherent organization by randomly changing the temporal order and standard of reference throughout the course of the film—“Once upon a time,” “Eight years later,” “Towards 3 a.m.,” etc. This level of narrative disorientation is supported by the film’s visual construction, with its frequent use of point-of-view and continuity cutting to link ambiguously related spaces. Near the end of the film, the female character leaves an apartment which is presumably located on an upper floor of an urban building; a slight breeze blows through her hair; she smiles and waves at someone off-screen, and the next shot places her on a beach.

This kind of illogical transition and unexpected conjunction is commonly associated with Surrealism. It is also in line with Buñuel’s attitudes about the potential of cinema: “It is the best instrument to express the world of dreams, of emotions, of instinct.” Indeed, most analyses of the film follow cues offered by dream interpretation to explain the film. In some cases this has led to reading the film as a symbolic conglomeration in which each bizarre image or event stands for something else. The deciphering process leads to an understanding of the film’s “hidden” meanings—usually construed as an attack on bourgeois modes of behaviour, an anti-religious diatribe, and/or a study of repressed sexual impulses. One of the key images here is that of the man, after he has been rebuffed by the woman, dragging the “baggage” of modern society with him, including two priests and two pianos surmounted by dead donkeys.

More recently, critical attention has shifted to the film’s processes of development and transformation, emphasizing the ways in which the film opens up possibilities of meaning (rather than containing it through a series of symbolic equivalents). These approaches draw on unconscious thought processes, instead of symbolization, to organize critical understanding. In this context the driving forces of the text are described in terms of condensation and displacement. In this same vein, greater consideration is devoted to the relationship between the film and its audience. By disrupting familiar patterns of spatial and narrative development, Un Chien andalou focuses attention on filmic processes of constructing and dismantling meaning. In fact the film opens with a brutal assault on vision, with the image of a razor blade cutting an eye. This not only throws into question the whole notion of sight as the locus of meaning, but more crucially shocks and disturbs an audience which is looking at the screen.

—M. B. White

THE CHILDREN OF PARADISE

See LES ENFANTS DU PARADIS

CHIMES AT MIDNIGHT

(Campanadas a medianoche)

Spain, 1966

Director: Orson Welles

Production: Internacional Films Española and Alpine Productions, presented by Harry Saltzman; black and white, 35mm; running time:

Chimes at Midnight

119 minutes, English version 115 minutes. Released May 1966. Filmed in Barcelona, Madrid, and other Spanish locations.

Producers: Emiliano Piedra and Angel Escolano; executive producer: Alessandro Tasca; screenplay: Orson Welles, from Henry IV, Parts I and II, Henry V, Richard III, The Merry Wives of Windsor by William Shakespeare and the Chronicles of England by Raphael Holinshed; photography: Edmond Richard; editor: Fritz Muller; sound recordist: Peter Parasheles; art directors: José Antonio de la Guerra and Mariano Erdorza; music: Angelo Francesco Lavagnino; conductor: Pierluigi Urbini; music director: Carlo Franci; costume designer: Orson Welles.

Cast: Orson Welles (Sir John Falstaff); Jeanne Moreau (Doll Tearsheet); Margaret Rutherford (Hostess Quickly); John Gielgud (King Henry IV); Keith Baxter (Prince Hal, later King Henry V); Marina Vlady (Kate Percy); Norman Rodway (Henry Percy, called Hotspur); Alan Webb (Justice Shallow); Walter Chiari (Mr. Silence); Michael Aldridge (Pistol); Tony Beckley (Poins); Fernando Rey (Worcester); Beatrice Welles (Falstaff's Page); Andrew Faulds (Westmoreland); José Nieto (Northumberland); Jeremy Rowe (Prince John); Paddy Bedford (Bardolph); Ralph Richardson (Narrator); Julio Peña; Fernando Hilbeck; Andrés Meguto; Keith Pyott; Charles Farrell.

Publications

Books:

Bessy, Maurice, Orson Welles, Paris, 1970.
 Higham, Charles, The Films of Orson Welles, Berkeley, 1971.
 Manvell, Roger, Shakespeare and the Film, New York, 1971.
 McBride, Joseph, Orson Welles, London, 1972; New York, 1977.
 Cowie, Peter, A Ribbon of Dreams: The Cinema of Orson Welles, New York, 1973.
 Gottesman, Ronald, editor, Focus on Orson Welles, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1976.
 Jorgens, Jack, Shakespeare on Film, Bloomington, Indiana, 1977.
 Naremore, James, The Magic World of Orson Welles, New York, 1978.
 Valentineti, Claudio M., Orson Welles, Florence, 1981.

Bergala, Alain, and Jean Narboni, editors, Orson Welles, Paris, 1982.
 Andrew, Dudley, Film in the Aura of Art, Princeton, 1984.
 Higham, Charles, Orson Welles: The Rise and Fall of an American Genius, New York, 1985.
 Leaming, Barbara, Orson Welles: A Biography, New York, 1985.
 Parra, Daniele, and Jacques Zimmer, Orson Welles, Paris, 1985.
 Weis, Elizabeth, and John Belton, editors, Film Sound: Theory and Practice, New York, 1985.
 Taylor, John Russell, Orson Welles: A Celebration, London, 1986.
 Lyons, Bridget G., Chimes at Midnight, Piscataway, 1988.
 Bazin, Andre, Orson Welles: A Critical View, Venice, 1991.
 Welles, Orson, This Is Orson Welles, New York, 1993.
 Beja, Morris, Perspective on Orson Welles, New York, 1995.

Articles:

Billard, Pierre, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1965.
 Cobos, Juan, and Miguel Rubio, "A Trip to Don Quixoteland," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), no. 5, 1966.
 Cobos, Juan, and Miguel Rubio, "Welles and Falstaff," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1966.
 Morgenstern, J., and R. Sokolov, "Falstaff as Orson Welles," in Newsweek (New York), 27 March 1967.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 30 March 1967.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), May 1967.
 Price, James, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1967.
 Cobos, Juan, and Miguel Rubio, "Welles on Falstaff," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), September 1967.
 McBride, Joseph, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1969.
 Henderson, Brian, "The Long Take," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
 Bordwell, David, in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
 Rubin, Stanley, S., "Welles/Falstaff/Shakespeare/Welles: The Narrative Structure of Chimes at Midnight," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Winter-Spring 1978.
 Poague, Leland, "Reading the Prince: Shakespeare, Welles, and Some Aspects of Chimes at Midnight," in Iowa State Journal of Research, August 1981.
 McLean, A. M., "Orson Welles and Shakespeare: History and Consciousness in Chimes at Midnight," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), July 1983.
 Chevrie, M., interview with Edmond Richard, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1985.
 Anderegg, Michael, "Every Third Word a Lie: Rhetoric and History in Orson Welles' Chimes at Midnight," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1987.
 Baxter, K., "Filming Falstaff," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1992.
 Berthome, J.-P., and F. Thomas, "Sept années en noir et blanc," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1992.
 Saada, Nicolas, and Joël Magny, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1995.
 "Falstaff," in Télérama (Paris), 27 September 1995.

* * *

Among film scholars Citizen Kane is often regarded as the greatest film of all time; among Welles scholars, by contrast, Chimes at Midnight is often accorded pride of place as "the fullest, most completely realized expression of everything [Welles] had been working toward since Citizen Kane." Partly such praise can be understood as admiration for the fact that Welles managed to make the film at all, coming, as it did, late in a career long plagued by financial and commercial difficulties. And certainly auteurist film critics are prone to praise films generally discounted by journalistic reviewers and contemporary audiences, as Chimes at Midnight was discounted if not derided at the time of its initial (somewhat haphazard, if not half-hearted) release. The evaluative paradox cannot be readily settled, nor need it be; but the comparison to Citizen Kane can be helpful in highlighting those aspects of Chimes at Midnight which urge attention.

The central paradox of the Wellesian cinema involves a conflict between energy and dissipation or constraint; Charles Foster Kane, for instance, is shown as a youth of boundless imagination, but that imaginative energy is evidenced in a narrative which begins with Kane's own death and which portrays his overall inability to put that energy to real use. In Chimes at Midnight there is a similar contrast of youth and age—though the contrast involves two different characters drawn from Shakespeare's Lancaster plays, Falstaff, played by Welles himself, and Prince Hal, played by Keith Baxter. Furthermore, the terms of the contrast are reversed; all in all it is Falstaff who labors to be (or seem) young, while it is Hal who most clearly appreciates the fact that his aging father (John Gielgud) will soon die, and, thus, Hal himself will soon be England's king.

In both films the energy expended in the doomed effort to outwit the facts of time finds its presentational equivalent in the remarkable wit and energy of Welles's film style. It is generally accepted that film style is more muted in Chimes at Midnight than in Citizen Kane; style does not carry the burden of mystery in the later film that it does in the earlier one. But the energy and intelligence remain evident in Chimes at Midnight nevertheless—not only in the justly famous Shrewsbury battle sequence (often likened, in Welles's favor, to that in Eisenstein's Alexander Nevsky), but also in the use Welles makes of moving camera (in the Gadshill robbery scene), of interior space (the Windsor castle sequences, as well as those at the Boar's Head tavern), and of camera angle (especially in the tavern scene where Hal plays King Henry to Falstaff's Prince). Especially moving and appropriate in this regard is the film's last shot, the intelligence of which (the camera craning slowly up to frame Falstaff's coffin against the castle in the deep background of the frame) serves to memorialize the energy lost at Falstaff's passing. Welles has long been noted for his use of such "deep focus" sequence shots—but the "depth" connoted by this shot, as by the whole of Chimes at Midnight, is equally as much emotional as technical.

—Leland Poague

CHINATOWN

USA, 1974

Director: Roman Polanski

Production: Paramount Pictures, Penthouse, and The Long Road Productions; Technicolor, 35mm, Panavision; running time: 131 minutes. Released 21 June 1974. Filmed on location in Los Angeles.

Chinatown

Producer: Robert Evans; screenplay: Robert Towne; titles: Wayne Fitzgerald; assistant director: Howard Koch, Jr.; photography: John A. Alonzo; editor: Sam O'Steen; sound: Larry Jost and Bud Grenzbach; sound editor: Robert Cornett; production designer: Richard Sylbert; set designer: Gabe and Robert Resh; art director: W. Stewart Campbell; music score: Jerry Goldsmith; special effects: Logan Frazee; costume designer: Anthea Sylbert.

Cast: Jack Nicholson (J. J. Gittes); Faye Dunaway (Evelyn Mulwray); John Huston (Noah Cross); John Hillerman (Yelburton); Perry Lopez (Lieutenant Escobar); Burt Young (Curly); Darrell Zwerling (Hollis Mulwray); Diane Ladd (Ida Sessions); Roy Jensen (Mulvihill); Roman Polanski (Man with knife); Dick Bakalyan (Loach); Joe Mantell (Walsh); Bruce Glover (Duffy); Nandu Hinds (Sophie); James Hong (Evelyn's butler); Belinda Palmer (Katherine); Fritzie Burr (Mulwray's secretary); Elizabeth Harding (Curly's wife).

Awards: Oscar, Best Original Screenplay, 1974; New York Film Critics' Award, Best Actor (Nicholson; award also in conjunction with his role in The Last Detail), 1974.

Publications

Script:

Towne, Robert, Chinatown, The Last Detail, Shampoo: Screenplays, New York, 1994.

Books:

Crane, Robert David, and Christopher Fryer, Jack Nicholson—Face to Face, New York, 1975.

Bullis, Roger Alan, An Analysis of the Interpersonal Communication of Private Detective Characters in Selected "Mean Street" Motion Pictures, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1978.

Bisplinghoff, Gretchen, and Virginia Wexman, Roman Polanski: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Ward, editors, Film Noir, New York, 1979.

Kiernan, Thomas, The Roman Polanski Story, New York, 1980.

Leaming, Barbara, Polanski: A Biography, New York, 1981.

Tuska, Jon, editor, Close-up: The Contemporary Director, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1981.

Leaming, Barbara, Polanski: The Filmmaker as Voyeur: A Biography, New York, 1981; as Polanski: His Life and Films, London, 1982.

Downing, David, Jack Nicholson: A Biography, London, 1983.

Polanski, Roman, Roman, London, 1984.

Wexman, Virginia Wright, Roman Polanski, Boston, 1985.

Jacobsen, Wolfgang, and others, Roman Polanski, Munich, 1986.

Avron, Dominique, Roman Polanski, Paris, 1987.

Parker, John, Polanski, London, 1995.

Eaton, Michael, Chinatown, London, 1997.

Articles:

Farber, Stephen, "Violence and the Bitch Goddess," in Film Comment (New York) vol. 10, 1974.

Cohen, M. S., in Take One (Montreal), July 1974.

Burke, Tom, "The Restoration of Roman Polanski," in Rolling Stone (New York), 18 July, 1974.

"Dialogue on Film: Roman Polanski," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), August 1974.

Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August, 1974.

Milne, Tom, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn, 1974.

Kavanagh, J., "Chinatown: Other Places, Other Times," in Jump Cut (Chicago), September-October 1974.

Sperber, M., "Chinatown: Do As Little as Possible: Polanski's Message and Manipulation," in Jump Cut (Chicago), September-October 1974.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), October 1974.

Stewart, Garrett, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1974.

Cook, P., "The Sound Track," in Films in Review (New York), November 1974.

Cohen, Mitchell, "Villains and Victims," in Film Comment (New York) November-December 1974.

Jameson, R. T., "Film Noir: Today, Son of Noir," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1974.

Rosenbaum, Jonathan, in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1974.

Andersson, W., and K. Josef, "Amerika," in Filmrutan (Liding, Sweden) vol. 18, no. 1, 1975.

Cappabianca, A., "L'occhio e il ragno. Note su Chinatown e Il fantasma della liberta," in Filmcritica (Rome), January-February 1975.

Mancini, M., "Vuoto e fiction (Wyler, Polanski, Peckinpah)," in Filmcritica (Rome), January-February 1975.

Kane, P., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February-March 1975.

Alonzo, John, "Behind the Scenes of Chinatown," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), May 1975.

McGinnis, W. D., in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1975.

Oliver, B., "The Long Goodbye and Chinatown: Debunking the Private Eye Tradition," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland) Summer 1975.

Palmer, R. Barton, "Chinatown and the Detective Story," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1977.

Beneli, D., "Contemporary Film Noir: Questing in Chinatown's Maze," in Cinemonkey (Portland, Oregon), no. 4, 1978.

Albright, Charles, Jr., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Linderman, D., "Oedipus in Chinatown," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Fall 1981-Spring 1982.

Laguna, P., in Kino (Warsaw), July 1983.

Levy, S., "Forget It? Never—It's Chinatown," in Boxoffice (Chicago), February 1990.

Horowitz, Mark, "Fault Lines," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1990.

Lyons, D., "Laws in the Iris: The Private Eye in the Seventies," in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1993.

Biskind, Peter, "The Low Road to Chinatown," in Premiere (New York), June 1994.

Feeney, F., "Water and Power," in Written By (Los Angeles), vol. 1, December-January 1996-97.

* * *

The title of Polanski's film refers to the state of mind of Jack Nicholson's character, a former cop in L.A.'s Chinatown who left the force and turned private eye after getting in over his head on a case he never fully understood, bringing tragedy to a woman he'd sought to help.

History begins to repeat itself in characteristically bleak Polanscian terms when Nicholson becomes enmeshed in a case involving seeming femme fatale Faye Dunaway, playing the abused daughter of a local power broker (John Huston), the conniving, murderous villain behind a lucrative water rights and land grabbing scheme. Events come full circle when Nicholson again finds himself in Chinatown, this time to help Dunaway escape the clutches of her incestuous father once and for all—only to wind up getting her killed instead.

Unlike the similarly shady but virtuous white knight detectives in the fiction of Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler, men who managed to restore at least some semblance of moral order to their chaotic noir universes at the end of each case, Nicholson's variation on Sam Spade and Phillip Marlowe succeeds only in maintaining the status quo, and, on some levels, making things worse. As his cop pal Lt. Escobar tells him at one point: "You never learn, do you, Jake?"—no, he doesn't, because his state of mind fates him not to. "Come on, Jake, it's Chinatown," Nicholson's colleague says, leading him away from this latest scene of inscrutable—and unpreventable—tragedy in the devastated detective's life. It is one of the most haunting, and memorable, closing lines in the history of noir cinema.

Robert Towne's Oscar-winning screenplay for this seminal Watergate-era detective thriller was written expressly for his pal Nicholson, a lifelong clothes horse who had longed to do a part where he could be a dapper dan. California native Towne had been writing a tale about a real-life incident of corruption and environmental scandal drawn from L.A.'s early history when he got the idea of turning the piece into a period detective yarn in homage to his idols Hammett and Chandler.

Nicholson quickly signed on to play the gumshoe, Jake Gittes, and suggested Polanski, another friend, as director. Paramount greenlighted the project when Polanski agreed to direct—provided Towne would subject his 180-page script to an overhaul. Towne initially resisted, then agreed to undertake the task, working closely with Polanski.

The project marked Polanski's return to mainstream Hollywood filmmaking after two back-to-back box-office failures, Macbeth (1971) and What? (1973), both made in Europe. It also marked his return to Hollywood itself, scene of the 1969 Manson murders that claimed the lives of his wife, actress Sharon Tate, and several friends. He quickly began molding Towne's period mystery into a typically dark Polanski essay on sex and violence set in the "landscape of the mind."

In addition to trimming and tightening Towne's screenplay in an effort to make it less convoluted and more focused, Polanski insisted on enhancing the romantic relationship between Nicholson and Dunaway, which helps to further illustrate the concept that Nicholson's character is inadvertently repeating his past. To the same end, he altered Towne's conclusion. Towne's original script not only did not conclude in Chinatown, but it ended on a very different, upbeat note with Dunaway's character (Evelyn Mulwray) surviving and her loathsome monster of a father dead; justice triumphs and Evelyn and Jake go off into the pre-smog L.A. sunset together. Towne to this day disdains Polanski's downbeat finale, which is set in Chinatown, as a too-literal and ghoulish example of "bleak chic." But it is Polanski's ending that transforms the film from a polished, superbly acted evocation of the vanished pre-World War II milieu of Hammett and Chandler into a detective story of considerable and disturbing power—a seminal film of the 1970s. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive of Chinatown ending any other way than it does. Polanski's alteration gives the film its meaning (troubling though it may be); it's what the story is all about.

An ill-conceived and ill-fated 1990 sequel, The Two Jakes, also written by Towne and starring Nicholson, who directed as well, makes this even clearer. The sequel, set in L.A. of the 1940s and involving an oil rather than water and land scheme this time, had plot—plenty of it—but lacked a story; Polanski had already told it, superbly and definitively, 16 years earlier.

—John McCarty

CHRIST STOPPED AT EBOLI

See CRISTO SI E FERMATO A EBOLI

CHRONICLE OF A SUMMER

See CHRONIQUE D'UN ÉTÉ

CHRONICLE OF ANNA MAGDALENA BACH

See CHRONIK DER ANNA MAGDALENA BACH

CHRONICLE OF THE YEARS OF EMBERS

See CHRONIQUE DES ANNÉES DE BRAISE

CHRONIK DER ANNA MAGDALENA BACH

(Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach)

Germany-Italy, 1968

Director: Jean-Marie Straub

Production: (West Germany) Franz Seitz, Filmproduktion-Kuratorium Junger Deutscher Film, Hessisches Rundfunk, Radio-Televisionbessoise, Filmfonds, and Telepool; (Rome) IDI Cinematografica, PAI; black and white, 35mm; running time: 94 minutes. Released 1968, West Germany.

Producers: Gian Vittorio Baldi, with Jean-Marie Straub; screenplay: Jean-Marie Straub and Danièle Huillet; photography: Ugo Piccone, Saverio Diamanti, and Giovanni Canfarelli; editors: Jean-Marie Straub and Danièle Huillet; sound: Louis Houchet and Lucien Moreau; music conductor: Nikolaus Harnoncourt, Schola Cantorum Basilienses; concert group conductor: August Wenziner, Hanover Boys Choir; music director: Heinz Hennig; costume designers: Casa d'Arte Firenze, Vera Poggioni and Renata Morroni.

Cast: Gustav Leonhardt (Johann Sebastian Bach); Christiane Lang (Anna Magdalena Bach); Paolo Carlini (Hölzel); Hans-Peter Boye (Born); Joachim Wolf (Rector); Rainer Kirchner (Superintendent); Eckart Brüntjen (Prefect Kittler); Walter Peters (Prefect Krause); Kathrin Leonhardt (Catherina Dorothea Bach); Anja Fährmann (Regine Susanna Bach); Katja Drewanz (Christine Sophie Henrietta Bach); Bob van Aspern (Johann Elias Bach); Andrea Pangritz (Wilhelm Friedemann Bach); Bernd Weikl (Singer in Cantata No. 205); Wolfgang Schöne (Singer in Cantata No. 82); Karl-Heinz Lampe (Singer in Cantata No. 42); Nikolaus Harnoncourt (Prince of Anhalt-Cöthen).

Publications

Script:

Straub, Jean-Marie, and Danièle Huillet, Chronik der Anna Magdalena Bach, Frankfurt, 1969.

Books:

Roud, Richard, Jean-Marie Straub, New York, 1972.

Rossetti, Riccardo, Straub-Huillet Film, Rome, 1984.

Byg, Barton, Landscapes of Resistance: The German Films of Danièle Huillet and Jean-Marie Straub, Berkeley, 1995.

Articles:

"Frustration of Violence," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), January 1967.

Roud, Richard, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1968.

Polt, Harriet, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1968–69.

Baxter, B., "Jean-Marie Straub," in Film (London), Spring 1969.

Engel, Andi, "Jean-Marie Straub," in Second Wave, New York, 1970.

Chronik der Anna Magdalena Bach

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1970.

Armes, Roy, "Jean-Marie Straub," in London Magazine, September 1970.

Roth, W., and G. Pflaum, "Gesprach mit Danièle Huillet und Jean-Marie Straub," in Filmkritik (Munich), February 1973.

"Die Filmographie—Jean-Marie Straub," in Information (Wiesbaden), January 1974.

Walsh, M., "Political Formations in the Cinema of Jean-Marie Straub," in Jump Cut (Chicago), November-December 1974.

Seguin, L., "La Famille, l'histoire, le roman," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October-November 1975.

Greene, N., "Report from Vienna: Cinema and Ideology," in Praxis (Berkeley), no. 2, 1976.

"Danièle Huillet/Jean-Marie Straub's Fortini/Cani," in Filmkritik (Munich), January 1977.

Dermody, S., "Straub/Huillet: The Politics of Film Practice," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), September-October 1976.

Simsolo, Noël, "Jean-Marie Straub et Danièle Huillet," in Cinéma (Paris), March 1977.

Grant, J., "Le Combat contre l'impression," in Cinéma (Paris), January 1978.

Nau, P., "Die Kunst des Filmsehens," in Filmkritik (Munich), January 1979.

Listener (London), 27 June 1985.

Vatrican, V., "Tout est musique," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 492, June 1995.

* * *

The Chronicle of Anna Magdalena Bach is Jean-Marie Straub and Danièle Huillet's version of film biography. The film presents biography as the rewriting and juxtaposition of prior documents; in this instance music and a chronicle are most prominent. Defined in this way, through a range of documents, Bach does not emerge as a conventional dramatic character. The importance of music in the film, which was performed and recorded during the filming rather than dubbed, stresses its centrality to the contemporary knowledge and appreciation of the historical figure Bach. In fact, Straub has said that the music was considered the basic raw material of the film, and not simply background accompaniment.

Personal aspects of the composer's life are presented, along with the musical performance, through the agency of a diary. A voice-over narration, purportedly reciting the text of Anna Magdalena's journal, provides information about financial and familial affairs in a matter-of-fact monotone. No such chronicle really exists, and the narration was constructed from various sources including letters written by and to Bach. However the actual status of the spoken text is less important than its effect in the film as a document.

Through the use of these prior texts as its basic structuring principle, the film constructs a biographical portrait while asserting its distance from its subject. In line with this approach, the film refuses to engage the viewer emotionally in its characters as psychologized individuals. To undermine any sense of realistic depiction, the actors are dressed in period costumes but do not visibly age in the course of the film. The film as a whole is visually austere and verbally reticent, and the music stands as the major mechanism of viewer involvement. The actors rarely speak and the narration is void of emotional sentiment. This "silence" is expressed in several visual pauses punctuating the film; two shots of the sea, one of the sky, and one of a tree intervene in the course of the film. These images serve as moments of meditation. Removed from the musical, familial, and financial concerns developed in the narrative, they offer the possibility to speculate on, among other things, the relation of these images to the filmic depiction of Bach's life; the relationship of nature to social and cultural life; and the nature of cinema. With regard to the latter, Straub is known for quoting D. W. Griffith: "What the modern movies lack is the wind in the trees."

The framing and lighting convey an almost academic sense of beauty, a calculatingly striking surface that denies the depth of space or character. While many of the images involve composition-in-depth, they are often so extreme and self-conscious that their status as artificial constructions—through the conjunction of set construction, lens choice, and character placement—is obvious. In addition, various camera and lens movements frequently manipulate and shift apparent depth within the course of such shots. The formal contrast and counterpoint guiding the editing are often seen as the visual counterpart of the structure of Bach's music. However, this approach to editing, insisting on the process of spatial construction, is characteristic of Straub and Huillet's films. It is a way of underscoring the artificiality of the film's visual world.

—M. B. White

CHRONIQUE DES ANNÉES DE BRAISE

(Chronicle of the Years of Embers)

Algeria, 1975

Director: Mohammed Lakhdar Hamina

Production: O.N.C.I.C. (Algeria); Eastmancolor, 70mm, Panavision; running time: 170 minutes. Filmed in Algeria.

Production manager: Mohammed (sometimes Mohamed) Lakhdar Hamina; screenplay: Mohammed Lakhdar Hamina and Tewfik Fares; photography: Marcello Gatti; editor: Youcef Tobni; music: Philippe Arthuys.

Cast: Mohammed Lakhdar Hamina (Miloud); Jorgo Voyagis (Ahmed); Leila Shenna (Wife); Cheik Nourredine (Friend); Larbi Sekkai (Larbi); Hassan Hassani; M. Kouiret; Francois Maistre.

Awards: Grand Prix, Cannes Film Festival, 1975.

Publications

Books:

Salmane, Hala, editor, Algerian Cinema, London, 1976.

Brossard, Jean-Pierre, L'Algérie vue par son cinéma, La Chaux-de-Fonds, Switzerland, 1981.

Articles:

Dupont, C., "Entretien avec Lakhdar Hamina," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Spring 1975.

Moskowitz, G., in Variety (New York), 21 May 1975.

"Lakhdar Hamina issue" of Cahiers de la Cinéma (Perpignan), Summer 1975.

Cineforum (Bergamo), June-July 1975.

Interview with Lakhdar Hamina in Ecran (Paris), July-August 1975.

Cinématographe (Paris), August-September 1975.

Ecran (Paris), October 1975.

Hollywood Reporter, 29 October 1975.

Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1976.

Horvath, Z., "Filmepszé hat tetelben," in Filmkultura (Budapest), May-June 1977.

Manoiu, A., "De la prima incercare o lovitura de maestru," in Cinema (Bucharest), June 1977.

Manoiu, A., and V. Sava, in Cinema (Bucharest), August 1977.

Prochnow, C., "Leiden und Empörung dann Alltag," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), April 1978.

Nassar, I., "The Chronicle of the Years of Embers," in American Historical Review, vol. 99, no. 4, 1994.

Serceau, M., in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), March/June 1997.

* * *

Mohammed Lakhdar Hamina is a key figure in the development of Algerian cinema, and one of the most talented and ambitious of Arab directors. Trained in Czechoslovakia, he began his career as a documentary filmmaker. His first feature, released in 1966, was one of the very first Algerian national productions. Chronique des années de braise, his fourth feature, made almost ten years later and designed to celebrate the outbreak of the Algerian Revolution on November 1, 1954, is without question one of the most striking of all third world films. Winning a Grand Prix at Cannes in 1975, it created a new international awareness for Algerian cinema, but for Arab critics, and for some of Lakhdar Hamina's fellow directors it has remained a controversial work. Particular attention was focused in the 1970s on its enormous cost, with critics claiming that a dozen modest features could have been made with the funds squandered on this extravagant epic.

Certainly Chronique des années de braise is an impressive work, with production values to match its cost. A monumental three-hour study of recent Algerian history, it gives a clear illustration of the high technical capability of the young Algerian film industry while confronting international cinema on its own terms. It is beautifully shot, with all the gloss of a Hollywood epic, but in achieving this result the director has had to sacrifice much of the specific national quality. In particular critics were hostile to the lushly orchestrated musical score by the French composer Philippe Arthuys, which owes nothing to Algerian musical traditions. It is fair to say that Lakhdar Hamina achieves something of the epic quality of the later David Lean. This is a remarkable feat in a country with a filmmaking history of barely a dozen years; but at the same time, this approach is questionable in terms of the priorities of a third world country like Algeria which in the 1970s began to take on an increasingly important international role.

In retrospect, the principal questions concerning this film derive less from its cost than from its narrative stance. Lakhdar Hamina defines his work as a personal vision and brushes aside questions of historical accuracy as mere quibbles. The film, he claims, is a poetic statement which grows directly out of his own childhood experiences (he was 20 in 1954). But the film's half-dozen or so intertitles drawing attention to the key dates in the historical development of Algeria between 1939 and 1954 deny the validity of a purely personal reading: Chronique des années de braise demands interpretation as an epic of the national consciousness. In this sense the film's inadequacies become clear. It offers less political insight than a purely lyrical protest; and the poverty and sufferings of the colonized are presented in lushly beautiful images which negate or, at least, defuse, the film's anger. The narrative intertwines two stories. One is that of a key Arab literary figure—the knowing madman (played with enormous gusto by Lakhdar Hamina himself)—who dies on the eve of revolution. The other concerns Ahmed, a totally mythologised figure, who is successively an uneducated peasant driven from his land, a skilled urban worker and—in a transformation all too reminiscent of western romantic melodrama—an unbelievably skilful horseman and swordsman defending his people against the savagery of the colonizers. Despite all Lakhdar Hamina's eloquence and directorial self-assurance, nothing could be more mystificatory than such a depiction of the 15-year origin of the national revolution.

—Roy Armes

CHRONIQUE D'UN ÉTÉ

(Chronicle of a Summer)

France, 1960

Directors: Jean Rouch and Edgar Morin

Production: Agros Films; black and white, 35mm; running time: 85 minutes, English version is 90 minutes. Released October 1961, Paris. Filmed summer 1960 in Paris and Saint-Tropez.

Producers: Anatole Dauman and Philippe Lifschitz; screenplay: Jean Rouch and Edgar Morin; photography: Roger Morillère, Raoul Coutard, Jean-Jacques Tarbès, and Michel Brault; editors: Jean Ravel, Nèna Baratier, and Françoise Colin; sound: Guy Rophe, Michel Fano, and Barthèlèmy.

Cast: Jean Rouch; Edgar Morin; Marceline; Angelo; Marilou; Jean-Pierre; Jean (Factory worker); Jacques (Factory worker); Régis (Student); Céline (Student); Jean-Marc (Student); Nadine (Student); Landry (Student); Raymond (Student); Jacques (Office worker); Simone (Office worker); Henri (Artist); Madi (Artist); Catherine (Artist); Sophie (Model).

Awards: International Critics Prize, Cannes Film Festival, 1961.

Publications

Script:

Rouch, Jean, and Edgar Morin, Chronique d'un été, Paris, 1962.

Books:

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946, Volume 2: The Personal Style, New York, 1966.

Ali Issari, M., Cinema Verité, East Lansing, Michigan, 1971.

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.

Courchay, Claude, Chronique d'un été, Paris, 1990.

Articles:

Sandell, Roger, "Films by Jean Rouch," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley). Winter 1961–62.

Milne, Tom, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1962.

Gerard, David, in Films and Filming (London), August 1962.

Shivas, Mark, in Movie (London), September 1962.

Graham, Peter, "Cinema Verité in France," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1964.

"Jean Rouch in Conversation with Jacqueline Veuve," in Film Comment (New York), Fall-Winter 1967.

Blue, James, "The Films of Jean Rouch," in Film Comment (New York), Fall-Winter 1967.

Freyer, Ellen, in The Documentary Tradition, edited by Lewis Jacobs, New York, 1971.

Levin, G. Roy, in Documentary Explorations: 15 Interviews with Filmmakers, New York, 1971.

Marcorelles, L., "Je suis mon premier spectateur," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), March 1972.

Studies in Visual Communication, no. 1, 1985.

Ben Salama, M., M. Serceau and L. Goldmann, "Special Section," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), no. 81, 1996.

* * *

Substantially distinguished as an ethnographic filmmaker, a studious if somewhat unscientific observer of rituals among the hunter-gatherers of post-Colonial Africa, Jean Rouch returned to his native

Chronique d'un été

Paris at age 40 in 1959 to encounter a new and stimulating intellectual climate. His friend, the critic and filmmaker Edgar Morin, challenged him to make a film about “his own tribe.” Rouch responded with Chronique d'un été, one of the most evocative films from the makers of that ragbag of student excess and self-aggrandizement which Françoise Giroud christened the nouvelle vague. Trained in the hard school of location shooting, Rouch knew the challenge of making an urban ethnographic film was largely technical. He persuaded André Coutant at Eclair to lend him the prototype of a lightweight camera under development for the military. After use by day, it was returned to the Eclair factory at night for modification and repairs. Raoul Coutard, who worked only one day on the film, disparages Rouch’s search for “cinema vérité”. The effort to duplicate Alexandre Astruc’s ideal of the “caméra stylo,” a camera as flexible as a pen, required as much hardware as any feature film.

Chronique betrays the constraints of technique and the causation of its makers. Set-ups are studied, montage formal, photography often imitative of the cinema of performance, while a side trip to St. Tropez for an alleged holiday to observe the beautiful at play exposes the deficiencies of Rouch’s philosophy of enquiry. The film is open to the same criticism of formalism as the now-historic Drew-Leacock-Pennebaker exercises in spontaneous cinema. A delight in the exercise of technique turns the aleatory by-products of low-light wild-sound filming into elements of a new style. Grain, rambling vox pop, interviews, walking tracks are chosen rather than merely being tolerated in the pursuit of truth.

But Chronique is a brilliant pre-vision of a style and approach to actuality filming that would sweep away the standard formal Grierson documentary. To begin by asking people at random “Are you happy?” was a stroke of genius. Their reactions, puzzled, truculent, thoughtful, sing with spontaneity. Nor is Rouch afraid to follow a plainly disturbed girl down into the wallow of self-pity and hysteria, leaving the watcher to make a personal determination of her sincerity. The refusal to take sides is Chronique’s strength, and the conclusion, as Rouch and Morin pace around a museum, wondering if the experiment proved anything, aptly conveys their genuine doubts. By then, however, their work had made the question largely irrelevant. The technique they created was to be the New Wave’s most powerful and durable legacy.

—John Baxter

CITIZEN KANE

USA, 1941

Director: Orson Welles

Production: RKO Radio Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm, running time: 120 minutes. Released 1 May 1941, New York. Filmed 30 July through 23 October 1940 in RKO studios; cost: $686,033.

Producer: Orson Welles; original screenplay: Herman J. Mankiewicz and Orson Welles; photography: Gregg Toland; editors: Robert Wise and Mark Robson; sound recordists: Bailey Fesler and James G. Stewart; art director: Van Nest Polglase; music: Bernard Herrmann; special effects: Vernon L. Walker; costume designer: Edward Stevenson.

Cast: Orson Welles (Charles Foster Kane); Buddy Swan (Kane, Aged 8); Sonny Bupp (Kane 3rd); Harry Shannon (Kane's Father); Joseph Cotten (Jedediah Leland); Dorothy Comingore (Susan Alexander); Everett Sloane (Mr. Bernstein); Ray Collins (James W. Gettys); George Coulouris (Walter Parks Thatcher); Agnes Moorehead (Kane's Mother); Paul Stewart (Raymond); Ruth Warrick (Emily Norton); Erskine Sanford (Herbert Carter); William Alland (Thompson); Georgia Backus (Miss Anderson); Philip van Zandt (Mr. Rawlston); Gus Schilling (Head Waiter); Fortunio Bonanova (Signor Matiste).

Citizen Kane

Awards: Oscar for Best Original Screenplay, 1941; New York Film Critics Award, Best Picture, 1941.

Publications

Script:

Mankiewicz, Herman J., and Orson Welles, "The Shooting Script," in The Citizen Kane Book, by Pauline Kael, Boston, 1971.
Citizen Kane Script Book, New York, 1991.

Books:

Bazin, André, Orson Welles, Paris, 1950.
Noble, Peter, The Fabulous Orson Welles, London, 1956.
Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Orson Welles, New York, 1961.
Bessy, Maurice, Orson Welles, Paris, 1963.
Cowie, Peter, The Citizen Kane Book, Boston, 1971.
Higham, Charles, The Films of Orson Welles, Berkeley, 1971.
Bogdanovich, Peter, and Orson Welles, This Is Orson Welles, New York, 1972.
McBride, Joseph, Orson Welles, London, 1972; New York, 1977.
Cowie, Peter, A Ribbon of Dreams: The Cinema of Orson Welles, New York, 1973.
Gottesman, Ronald, editor, Focus on Orson Welles, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1976.
Naremore, James, The Magic World of Orson Welles, New York, 1978.
Kawin, Bruce, Mindscreen: Bergman, Godard, and First-Person Film, Princeton, New Jersey, 1978.
Valentinetti, Claudio M., Orson Welles, Florence, 1981.
Bergala, Alain, and Jean Narboni, editors, Orson Welles, Paris, 1982.
Wollen, Peter, Readings and Writings: Semiotic Counter-Strategies, London, 1982.
Andrew, Dudley, Film in the Aura of Art, Princeton, 1984.
Carringer, Robert L., The Making of Citizen Kane, Berkeley, 1985; revised, 1996.
Higham, Charles, Orson Welles: The Rise and Fall of an American Genius, New York, 1985.
Leaming, Barbara, Orson Welles: A Biography, New York, 1985.
Parra, Daniele, and Jacques Zimmer, Orson Welles, Paris, 1985.
Weis, Elisabeth, and John Belton, editors, Film Sound: Theory and Practice, New York, 1985.
Taylor, John Russell, Orson Welles: A Celebration, London, 1986.
Jarvie, Ian, Philosophy of the Film: Epistemology, Ontology, Aesthetics, London, 1987.
Joxe, Sandra, Citizen Kane, Orson Welles, Paris, 1990.
Lebo, Harlan, Citizen Kane: The Fiftieth-Anniversary Album, New York, 1990.
Berthome, Jean-Pierre, Citizen Kane, Paris, 1992.
Mulvey, Laura, Citizen Kane, London, 1992.
Cahill, Marie, Citizen Kane, New York, 1993.
Gottesman, Ronald, editor, Perspectives on Citizen Kane, New York, 1996.

Articles:

Pritt, Emile, in New Masses (New York), 4 February 1941.
Sage, M., in New Republic (New York), 24 February 1941.

- Tolan, Gregg, "Realism for Citizen Kane," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), February 1941.
- Life* (New York), 17 March 1941.
- O'Hara, John, in Newsweek (New York), 17 March 1941.
- Time* (New York), 17 March 1941.
- Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 2 May 1941.
- Herrmann, Bernard, in New York Times, 25 May 1941.
- Toland, Gregg, "How I Broke the Rules in Citizen Kane," in Popular Photoplay Magazine (New York), June 1941.
- The Times* (London), 13 October 1941.
- Leenhardt, Roger, in Ecran Francais (Paris), 3 July 1946.
- Doniol-Valcroze, Jacques, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), December 1946.
- Manuel, Jacques, "Essai sur le style d'Orson Welles," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), December 1946.
- Toland, Gregg, "L'Operateur de prises de vues," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), January 1947.
- Chartier, Jean-Pierre, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), January 1947.
- Viazzi, Glauco, in Bianco e Nero (Rome), July 1948.
- Bazin, André, and Jean-Charles Tacchella, interview with Welles, in Bianco e Nero (Rome), 21 September 1948.
- Sarris, Andrew, "Citizen Kane: American Baroque," in Film Culture (New York), no. 2, 1956.
- Pariante, Roberto, "Orson Welles from Citizen Kane to Othello," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), March 1956.
- "L'Oeuvre d'Orson Welles," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1958.
- Domarchi, Jean, "America," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July 1959.
- Coursodon, Jean-Pierre, in Cinéma (Paris), no. 43, 1960.
- Stanbrook, Alan, "The Heroes of Orson Welles," in Film (London), no. 28, 1961.
- "Welles Issue" of Image et Son (Paris), no. 139, 1961.
- "Citizen Kane Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), January 1962.
- "Welles Issue" of Cineforum (Venice), no. 19, 1962.
- Capdena, Michel, "Citizen K," in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 27 December 1962.
- Cutts, John, in Films and Filming (London), December 1963.
- McBride, Joseph, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1968.
- Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 15 April 1971, 27 May 1971, and 3 June 1971.
- Bordwell, David, in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
- Henderson, Brian, "The Long Take," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
- Goldfarb, Phyllis, "Orson Welles' Use of Sound," in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1971.
- Comolli, Jean-Louis, "Technique et Idéologie: Caméra, perspective, profondeur de champ," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January-February 1972.
- Cohen, H., "The Heart of Darkness in Citizen Kane," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1972.
- "Citizen Kane Issue" of Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 15, no. 2, 1973.
- Burch, Noël, "Propositions," in Afterimage (London), Spring 1974.
- Mass, R., "A Linking of Legends: The Great Gatsby and Citizen Kane," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1974.
- Smith, J., "Orson Welles and the Great American Dummy," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1974.
- Ciment, Michel, "Ouragans autour de Kane," in Positif (Paris), March 1975.
- Champlin, Charles, "More about Citizen Kane," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), April 1975.
- "Semiotics and Citizen Kane," in Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), no. 1, 1975.
- Carringer, Robert, "Citizen Kane, The Great Gatsby, and Some Conventions of American Narrative," in Critical Inquiry (Chicago), Winter 1975.
- Pitiot, P., and H. Behar, in Image et Son (Paris), September 1976.
- Firestone, B. M., "A Rose Is a Rose Is a Columbine: Citizen Kane and William Styron's Nat Turner," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1977.
- Gambill, N., "Making Up Kane," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1978.
- Jaffe, I. S., "Film as Narration of Space: Citizen Kane," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1979.
- Toeplitz, J., "Von einem, der Karriere macht: Orson Welles in Hollywood der dreissiger Jahre," in Film und Fernsehen (East Berlin), no. 2, 1979.
- Westerbeck Jr., C. L., in Commonweal (New York), 22 June 1979.
- Clipper, L. J., "Art and nature in Welles' Xanadu," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Spring 1981.
- Haustrate, G., in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1981.
- Houston, Beverle, "Power and Dis-Integration in the Films of Orson Welles," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1985.
- Left, L. J., "Reading Kane," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1985.
- Beja, M., "Orson Welles and the Attempt to Escape from Father," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 13, no. 1, 1985.
- Maxfield, J.F., "A Man Like Ourselves: Citizen Kane is Aristotelean Tragedy," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 14, no. 3, 1986.
- Jones, Elizabeth, "Locating Truth in Film, 1940-80," in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Autumn, 1986.
- Tomasulo, Frank P., "Point-of-View and Narrative Voice in Citizen Kane's Thatcher Sequence," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 8, nos. 3-4, 1986.
- Tarnowski, J.-F., "Le Prologue," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), May 1987.
- Rathgeb, Douglas L., "Fates in the Crowd: Illuminating Citizen Kane Through Woody Allen's Zelig," in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Spring-Summer 1987.
- Rosenbaum, Jonathan, and others, "Dialogue: On Viewer Response to Citizen Kane," in Cinema Journal (Champaign, Illinois), Summer 1987.
- Bates, Robin, "Fiery Speech in a World of Shadows: Rosebud's Impact on Early Audiences," in Cinema Journal (Champaign, Illinois), Winter 1987.
- Morrison, J., "From Citizen Kane to Mr. Arkadin: The Evolution of Orson Welles's Aesthetics of Space," in New Orleans Review, no. 3, 1989.
- Nielsen, N. A., "Et allerhovedes perspektiv," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Fall 1989.
- Ropars-Wuilleumier, M.-C., "Narration and Signification: A Filmic Example," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (New York), no. 4, 1990.
- Rosterman, R., "Citizen Kane: 50 Years of Controversy," in Hollywood: Then and Now (Studio City, California), no. 7, 1991.
- Vergne, F., "Citizen Kane e Confidential Report di Orson Welles: la retorica dei ricordo," in La Cosa Vista (Trieste), no. 16-17, 1991.

- Kyff, Robert S., "Even After 50 Years, Citizen Kane Resonates with a Clarity Both Technical and Allegorical," in Chicago Tribune, 1 May 1991.
- van der Burg, J., "Toevalstreffer van de eeuw," in Skoop (Amsterdam), July-August 1991.
- Toland, G., "Realism for Citizen Kane," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), August 1991.
- Sarris, A., "For and Against Kane," in Sight and Sound (London), October 1991.
- Hogue, P., "The Friends of Kane," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1991.
- Maland, C., "Memories and Things Past: History and Two Biographical Flashback Films," in East-West Film Journal (Honolulu), no. 1, 1992.
- La Polla, F., "Welles e la frequentazione delle tenebre," in Quaderni di Cinema (Florence), July-September 1992.
- Kovacs, A. B., "Minden idok. . .," in Filmvilág (Budapest), no. 6, 1993.
- Pipolo, T., "Screen Memories in Citizen Kane," in P.O.V. (Brussels), no. 10, 1993.
- Altman, Rick, "Deep-Focus Sound: Citizen Kane and the Radio Aesthetic," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (Reading), vol. 15, no. 3, December 1994.
- Welles, Orson, "Orson Welles par Orson Welles," in Positif (Paris), no. 418, December 1995.
- Kan, E., "Great Beginnings . . . and Endings," in P.O.V. (Brussels), no. 2, December 1996.
- Thomson, D., "Ten Films that Showed Hollywood How to Live," in Movieline (Escondido, California) vol. 8, July 1997.

* * *

"Everything that matters in cinema since 1940," François Truffaut has suggested, "has been influenced by Citizen Kane." It is not surprising, then, that Citizen Kane should be one of the most written about films in cinema history; nearly every major critic since André Bazin has felt compelled to discuss it, among them Andrew Sarris, Peter Cowie, David Bordwell, Joseph McBride, and Bruce Kavin.

Of the various critical approaches taken to the film, the most trivial, though in some respects the most common, is to understand Citizen Kane as an only slightly disguised biography of William Randolph Hearst. Hearst certainly took it that way, and was largely responsible, through the influence of his newspaper syndicate (which refused to review RKO films for a time), for the film's box-office failure, despite the generally enthusiastic response of the critics. Pauline Kael did much to revive this line of thinking in her 1971 "Raising Kane" essay. Kael's point is essentially negative. Movies in general "are basically kitsch," though on occasion kitsch "redeemed." Citizen Kane is a case in point, especially given its reputation, and that of Orson Welles. Indeed, much of Kael's essay is devoted to showing that aspects of Kane normally attributed to Welles really represented or were indebted to the work of others—to Gregg Toland's cinematography, to the conventions of Hollywood newspaper comedy, and especially to Herman J. Mankiewicz, to whom Kael attributes the entire script. Her point even here, however, is that Mankiewicz largely retold the story of William Randolph Hearst ("What happened in Hearst's life was far more interesting" Kael argues at one point)—so that the process of making Citizen Kane is pictured largely as a process of disguise and oversimplification, begun by Mankiewicz and only finished by Welles. What Kael clearly fails to see is the irrelevance of her whole approach (not to mention its basic inaccuracy in regard to historical fact). As François Truffaut puts it: "It isn't San Simeon that interests me but Xanadu, not the reality but the work of art on film." To see the film as a denatured version of some past reality is simply not to see the film.

In sharp contrast to Kael's variety of historicism is the approach taken by André Bazin in his work on Welles. Rather than read the "story" of Citizen Kane against the background provided by the life of Hearst, Bazin focuses on film style in Citizen Kane especially on the degree to which style "places the very nature of the story in question." And rather than describe film style in Citizen Kane as being consistent with that of Hollywood generally (as Kael does in part), Bazin suggests that Welles' reliance on the sequence shot (or long take) and deep focus represents an important break with classical cinematic practice and with the viewing habits derived from it. Classical editing, according to Bazin, "substituted mental and abstract time" for the "ambiguity of expression" implicit in reality; whereas "depth of focus reintroduced ambiguity into the structure of the image" by transferring "to the screen the continuum of reality," in regards both to time and space. "Obligated to exercise his liberty and his intelligence, the spectator perceives the ontological ambivalence of reality directly, in the structure of its appearances."

There are problems with such an ontological approach to cinema (it focuses on sequences rather than on whole films, for instance); but Bazin's emphasis on the ambiguity of appearances in Welles is consistent with a third approach to Citizen Kane which sees the film as an early instance of the fragmented modernist narrative. In the words of Robert Carringer, the fact that Kane's story in the film is told from several perspectives, by several different characters, "reflects the Modernist period's general preoccupation with the relativism of points of view." Indeed, the film's "main symbolic event" is not the burning of Kane's "Rosebud" sled but rather the shattering of the little glass globe, which thus stands "for the loss of 'Kane-ness,' the unifying force behind the phenomenon of Kane." Accordingly, the effort undertaken by Thompson, the newsreel reporter, to uncover the secret of Kane's life by tracking down the meaning of "Rosebud" through interviewing Kane's friends and associates can be seen as a paradigm of the human desire to simplify the complex, though Thompson himself becomes increasingly cynical about the prospect of making sense of Charles Foster Kane.

It is arguable, however, that Thompson's cynicism—summed up when he says "I don't think any word can sum up a man's life"—is itself suspect for assuming that complexity is antithetical in intelligibility. Central to such a view of Kane is the premise that multiple narratives serve to cast doubt. And in a film such as Kurosawa's Rashomon (to which Kane is often compared) such is certainly the case. But the narrative of Citizen Kane may well work differently, at different "levels" of narration. The reporter himself comprises the first "level" of narration—in the newsreel he watches, and in the interviews he conducts. The interviews, then, constitute a second level of narration, in that they are embedded in the first. It is arguable, however, that a third level of narration exists. It can be seen in the "framing" sequences, which take us up to and then away from the gates of Xanadu; it can also be seen in the fact that the narratives of all those interviewed contain material that the person telling the tale could not have known, even at second hand (as if each such narrative were being "re-narrated"). But the third level of narration is most clearly evident in a series of visual metaphors (the recurrent visual figure of the window or door frame, for example, which repeatedly serves to cut one character off from others) which remain constant throughout the film, both in the flashbacks and in the reporter's narrative, regardless of who is ostensibly narrating the sequence. Accordingly, we can say that the entire film constitutes a single narrative with other narratives embedded; that the narratives work at different levels disallows easy assumptions that they cancel each other out, no matter how partial or biased any one narrative might be.

In terms of style and narrative, then, Citizen Kane is a film of remarkable complexity and depth; yet in thematic terms, Citizen Kane is also a hymn to failure. Kane's failure to put his remarkable energy to real use, Thompson's failure to find real meaning in Kane's life story. The shame, in Kane's case, is that his tremendous capacities and resources are wasted, used up; the closing shot of Xanadu, the smoke of Kane's burning possessions pouring from a chimney, recalls the factory smokestacks of the film's newsreel sequence, as the chainlink fence recalls the factory fences. The shame in Thompson's case is that he contributes to this waste by refusing to get to the point, refusing to see how thoroughly Kane was a product of his circumstances, as much victim as victimizer. But we need not follow Thompson's lead in this, however cinematically marvellous Citizen Kane might be. The sense is ours to make.

—Leland Poague

CITY LIGHTS

USA, 1931

Director: Charles Chaplin

Production: Charles Chaplin Studio; black and white, 35mm, synchronized music and sound effects; running time: 86 minutes; length: 2380 meters. Released 6 January 1931 in New York City by United Artists Corp.; re-released 8 April 1950. Filmed 1930 in Hollywood.

Producer, editor: Charles Chaplin; screenplay: Charles Chaplin; assistant directors: Harry Crocker, Henry Bergman and Albert Austin; photography: Rollie Totheroh, Gordon Pollack and Mark Markatt; art director: Charles D. Hall; music composer: Charles Chaplin; arranger: Arthur Johnston; conductor: Alfred Newman.

Cast: Charles Chaplin (Little Tramp); Virginia Cherrill (Flower Girl); Florence Lee (Grandmother); Harry Myers (Eccentric Millionaire); Allan Garcia (Valet); Hank Mann (Boxer); Eddie Baker (Referee); Henry Bergman (Doorman); Albert Austin (Swindler); Stanhope Wheatcroft (Distinguished man at café); John Rand (Another tramp); James Donnelly (Foreman); Robert Parrish (Newspaper boy); Jean Harlow (Nightclub girl); Stanley Sandford (Elevator boy).

Publications

Books:

Dodgson, William, Charlie Chaplin: His Life and Art, New York, 1931.
von Ulm, Gerith, Charlie Chaplin: King of Tragedy, Idaho, 1940.
Hardy, Forsyth, editor, Grierson on Documentary, New York, 1947.
Tyler, Parker, Chaplin, Last of the Clowns, New York, 1947.
Cotes, Peter, and Thelma Niklaus, Charlot, Paris, 1951.

City Lights

Huff, Theodore, Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1951.
Bessy, Maurice, and Robert Florey, Chaplin; ou, Le Rire dans La nuit, Paris, 1952.
Sadoul, Georges, Vie de Charlot, Paris, 1952.
Franca, Jose Augusta, Charles Chaplin: Le Self-Made Mythe, Lisbon, 1954.
Leprohon, Pierre, Charlot, Paris, 1957.
Mitry, Jean, Charlot et la fabulation chaplinesque, Paris, 1957.
Amengual, Barthélemy, Charles Chaplin, Paris, 1963.
Chaplin, Charles, My Autobiography, London and New York, 1964.
Cotes, Peter, and Thelma Niklaus, The Life and Work of Charles Spencer Chaplin, New York, 1965.
McDonald, Gerald D., and others, The Films of Charlie Chaplin, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1965.
Martin, Marcel, Charles Chaplin, Paris, 1966; revised edition, 1983.
Sarris, Andrew, Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.
Tyler, Parker, Magic, Myth, and the Movies, New York, 1970.
McCaffrey, Donald W., editor, Focus on Chaplin, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1971.
Asplund, Uno, Chaplin's Films, Newton Abbot, Devon, 1971.
Manvell, Roger, Chaplin, London and Boston, 1974.
Chaplin, Charlie, My Life in Pictures, London, 1974; New York, 1975.
Moss, Robert F., Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1975.
Lyons, Timothy J., Charles Chaplin: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Essays and a Lecture, edited by Jay Leyda, Princeton, New Jersey, 1982.
Haining, Peter, editor, The Legend of Charlie Chaplin, London, 1982.

- Gehring, Wes D., Charlie Chaplin: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, Connecticut, 1983.
- Molyneaux, Gerard, Charlie Chaplin's "City Lights": Its Production and Dialectic Structure, New York, 1983.
- Robinson, David, Chaplin: The Mirror of Opinion, London, 1983.
- Kamin, Dan, Charlie Chaplin's One-Man Show, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.
- Smith, Julian, Chaplin, Boston, 1984.
- Geduld, Harry M., Charlie Chaplin's Own Story, Bloomington, Indiana, 1985.
- Robinson, David, Chaplin: His Life and Art, New York and London, 1985.
- Geduld, Harry M., Chapliniana 1: The Keystone Films, Bloomington, Indiana, 1987.
- Mitry, Jean, Tout Chaplin: L'Oeuvre complète présentée par le texte et par l'image, Paris, 1987.
- Saint-Martin, Catherine, Charlot/Chaplin: Ou, La conscience du mythe, Paris, 1987.
- Wagenknecht, Edward, Stars of the Silents, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1987.
- Lynn, Kenneth S., Charlie Chaplin and His Times, New York, 1997.
- Milton, Joyce, Tramp: The Life of Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1998.
- Turk, Ruth, Charlie Chaplin: From Tears to Laughter, Minneapolis, 1999.

Articles:

- "Charlie Chaplin and Talking Pictures," in Theatre Arts (New York), November 1930.
- Hall, Mordaunt, "Chaplin Hilarious in his City Lights," in New York Times, 7 February 1931.
- Seldes, G., in New Republic (New York), 25 February 1931.
- "Charlie Chaplin Defies the Talkies," in Literary Digest (New York), 28 February 1931.
- Bakshy, Alexander, "Charlie Chaplin Falters," in Nation (New York), 4 March 1931.
- Woolcott, Alexander, in Collier's (New York), 28 March 1931.
- Knight, Arthur, and Theodore Huff, Films in Review (New York), September 1950.
- Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 5 December 1963.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, in Cinéma (Paris), March 1972.
- Kauffmann, Stanley, in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1972.
- Lyons, T. M., in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1972.
- Benayoun, Robert, "L'Assassin de Charlot," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1973.
- Quenin, F., in Téléciné (Paris), December 1976.
- Gorsaro, D. J., "Chaplin as satyr," in University Film Association Journal (Houston, Texas), no. 1, 1979.
- Woods, Lynn, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Gerard, Molyneaux, "City Lights: Chaplin's Indictment of the 1920s," in Mise-en-Scène (New York), Spring 1980.
- Robinson, David, "A Chaplin Mystery Solved," in Films and Filming (London), no. 345, June 1983.
- Jespersen, A., "Chaplins tva varldar: En analys av Stadens Ljus," in Filmrutan (Stockholm), 1985.
- Gross, K., "Moving Statues, Talking Statues," in Raritan (New Brunswick, New Jersey), no. 2, 1989.
- Parrish, Robert, "Partners in Mime," in London Evening Standard, 30 March 1989.
- McVay, Douglas, in What's On (London), 12 April 1989.
- Robinson, David, in The Times (London), 12 April 1989.
- Papson, S., "The IBM Tramp," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), April 1990.
- Woal, M., and L.K. Woal, "Chaplin and the Comedy of Melodrama," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 46, no. 3, 1994.
- Séquences* (Haute-Ville), May-June 1995.
- Elias, J., "Sounds of the 'City'," in Village Voice (New York), 27 February 1996.
- Hirsch, David, "Carl Davis' City Lights," in Soundtrack! (Mechelen), Vol. 15, no. 58, June 1996.
- Télérama* (Paris), 9 October 1996.

* * *

Early in 1931 an extraordinary event took place in New York City at the George M. Cohan Theatre. Though the talking picture had been firmly established, a new silent film premiered at the Cohan that became the talk of the town—Charles Chaplin's City Lights, in which he starred as the beloved Little Tramp. He was also the producer, the director, the author and scenarist, the editor, and had written the music which accompanied it. Chaplin was the solitary hold-out against the talking film, and City Lights was successful because it was a nine-reel comedy which revelled in its silence.

Though it had a sound track and musical accompaniment, it was, first and foremost, a tribute to the pantomimic art. Audiences loved it, and critics named it Chaplin's finest accomplishment, the perfect combination of hilarious comedy and pure pathos. One critic, Rose Pelwick, of the New York Evening Journal, remarked: "City Lights has no dialogue. And it's just as well, because if the picture had words, the laughs and applause of last evening's audience would have drowned them out."

In the first year of the Academy Awards, 1927–28, Chaplin had been nominated as Best Actor for The Circus; he was also nominated for Comedy Direction (a category which was discontinued after the first year of the Academy's existence); and a special statuette was awarded him "for versatility and genius in writing, acting, directing, and producing The Circus." Now two years later, the Academy ignored City Lights, although critics everywhere acknowledged that it might very well be the best of all Chaplin's films.

City Lights had an uncomfortable genesis. Chaplin had started shooting it in 1928 as a silent film; when it became obvious that talking pictures were neither a fad nor a fancy, he closed down production temporarily. When he decided to continue with it as a silent, everybody cautioned him that he was fighting a losing battle. He told Sam Goldwyn: "I've spent every penny I possess on City Lights. If it's a failure, I believe it will strike a deeper blow than anything else that has ever happened to me in this life."

During its production the stock market crashed, and Chaplin's situation became even more precarious, but he persisted in his distaste for talking pictures, confiding in an interview with Gladys Hall in Motion Picture Magazine (May, 1929): "They are spoiling the oldest art in the world—the art of pantomime. They are ruining the great beauty of silence. They are defeating the meaning of the screen, the appeal that has created the star system, the fan system, the vast popularity of the whole—the appeal of beauty. It's beauty that matters in pictures—nothing else."

In 1931, when City Lights was internationally premiered, Chaplin's world was younger, more innocent, ready to laugh, willing to weep, and they did both, totally succumbing to this romance of the devotion of the Little Tramp to a beautiful blind girl, charmingly played by a young divorcée, Virginia Cherrill.

The plot line is very simple. The picture opens with an introductory gag, showing a group of pompous dignitaries who have assembled for the dedication of an ugly civic statue. When it is unveiled, the Little Tramp is discovered sleeping blissfully in the lap of the central figure. He is chased away, but is attracted by the beauty of a young girl selling flowers from her sidewalk stand. He spends his last coin for a flower for his buttonhole, and only then realizes that the girl is blind.

That night he saves the life of a millionaire (Harry Myers), who is drunk and determined to throw himself in the river. The Tramp persuades him to live, and they spend the rest of the night celebrating in a night club. The millionaire invites the Tramp home, and their limousine passes the blind girl, who is setting up her flower stand on the sidewalk. The Tramp gets money from the millionaire, and buys all the flowers in the girl's basket. The limousine and driver are also lent to the Tramp, so he can take the girl home after the millionaire has been dropped off at his mansion. She thinks the Tramp must be a very rich man, and he is content to let her believe that. But when the Tramp returns to his benefactor's residence, the now sober eccentric doesn't recognize him. This is a gag which is used several times effectively. Sober, the millionaire never knows the Tramp, but when he is drunk, he always greets him like an old buddy.

The Tramp now has a purpose in life: making enough money so the girl can have an operation and regain her sight. He gets a job as a street cleaner, and even enters the ring as a prizefighter, believing that the fight is fixed in his favor; but he is in error and ends up unconscious.

He meets the millionaire again, who is happily drunk and willing to give the Tramp money for the girl's eye surgery. They go to the mansion, and as the Tramp is given the money, two thugs enter the room and try to steal it, but are vanquished when the police arrive. The millionaire, knocked unconscious briefly, is revived, but, sobered, does not recognize the Tramp, who thereupon grabs the cash, and runs away at once to the blind girl's flower stand. He puts the money in her hands, and runs away, but soon afterwards is arrested and jailed for robbery.

When he has served his term and is released, he discovers the girl working in a flower shop. She sees the Little Tramp outside, and overcome with pity, she gets some money from her cash register and goes outside to give it to him. As she puts the money in his hands, she recognizes the touch of his fingers, and realizes the truth at once. He has made everything possible for her. There follows an exchange of dialogue on inter-titles that provides for one of the most moving finales in all of Chaplin's films. "You?" she asks. He nods, and smiles shyly, and asks, "You can see now?" She nods as her smile widens, "Yes, I can see now." The scene fades out with the Little Tramp smiling radiantly.

Thornton Delehanty, reviewing City Lights for the New York Evening Post, remarked: "City Lights confirms the indestructibility of Chaplin's art, not only as an actor but as a director. And he has done it without making any concessions to dialogue: he remains the supreme pantomimist."

—DeWitt Bodeen

CITY OF SADNESS

(Beiqing chengshi)

Taiwan, 1989

Director: Hou Hsiao-Hsien

Production: 3-H Films; An Era International Presentation; color; running time: 155 minutes (some copies 160 minutes); length: 14,464 feet. Filmed in Hokkien, China; dialogue in Mandarin, Hokkien, Shanghaiese, Cantonese, and Japanese.

Producer: Qiu Fusheng executive producers: H. T. Jan, Michael Yang; associate producer: Huakun; cinematographer: Chen Hua'en; screenplay: Wu Nianzhen, Zhu Tianwen; editor: Liao Qingsong; production designer: Liu Zhihua, Lin Chongwen; music: Tachikawa Naoki, Zhang Hongzyi; sound: Du Duzhi, Yang Jing'an.

Cast: Li Tianlu (Lin Ah-Lu); Chen Songyong (Lin Wen-Hsung); Gao Jie (Lin Wen-Liang); Tony Leung (Lin Wen-Ching); Wu Yifang (Wu Hinoe); Xin Shufen (Wu Hinomi); Chen Shufang (Mio, First Brother's Wife); Ke Suyun (Second Brother's Wife); and others.

Awards: Golden Lion, Venice Film Festival, 1989; Special Award, Political Film Society, 1990.

Publications

Articles:

- Egger, M., "Tournage," in Positif (Paris), no. 338, April 1989.
- Young, Deborah, "City of Sadness Captures Hearts, Prizes at Venice," in Variety (New York), vol. 336, no. 10, 20 September 1989.
- James, C., "Film Festival: Postwar Sadness in Taiwan," in The New York Times, 6 October 1989.
- Wood, Robin, "New Films by MacGillivray and Hou," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 18, Fall 1989.
- Sterritt, David, "Taiwan's Hou Hsiao-hsien Brilliantly Taps Film Medium's Affinity for Nostalgia," in The Christian Science Monitor, 16 November 1989.
- Noh, D., "Taiwanese Director's Sadness Recalls Island's Turbulent Past," in Film Journal (New York), vol. 93, February 1990.
- Film* (London), no. 33, 9 March 1990.
- Rayns, Tony, "Beiqing chengshi (A City of Sadness): Not the Best Possible Face," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), vol. 57, no. 677, June 1990.
- Kauffmann, S., "Elsewhere," in New Republic, vol. 202, 11 June 1990.
- Greenland, Hall, "Complex Pleasures," in Filmnews, vol. 20, no. 6, July 1990.
- Niogret, Hubert, and others, "Hou Hsiao-Hsien: Retrouver la mémoire," in Positif (Paris), no. 358, December 1990.
- Reynaud, B., "Three Asian Films: For a New Cinematic Language," in Cinematograph (San Francisco), vol. 4, 1991.
- Cooke, D., "A Review of Hou Hsiao-Hsien's A City of Sadness," in Public Culture, vol. 5, no. 2, 1993.
- Liao, P.-h., "Rewriting Taiwanese National History: The February 28 Incident as Spectacle," in Public Culture, vol. 5, no. 2, 1993.

City of Sadness

Cheshire, Godfrey, "Time Span," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 29, no. 6, November-December 1993.

Tobin, Yann, Michel Ciment, and Pierre Eisenreich, "Hou Hsiao-hsien," in Positif (Paris), no. 453, November 1998.

Jones, Kent, "Cinema with a Roof Over Its Head," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 35, no. 5, September 1999.

Lopate, Phillip, "A Master Everywhere Else is Ready to Try America," in The New York Times, 10 October 1999.

* * *

Daughter of the Nile (1987) marked a watershed in Hou's career, as his first film set entirely in the city, the ultimate stage in his transition from the "rural" films on which his reputation was initially built. Its successor two years later, City of Sadness, marks another watershed, as the first film explicitly concerned with Taiwanese history, from which viewpoint it can be seen as the first of a loose trilogy, followed by The Puppetmaster (1993), and completed with Good Men, Good Women (1995).

The film opens in 1945 on the day of the end of World War II, with the surrender of the Japanese and the release of Taiwan from Japanese occupation; it closes with a caption telling us that in 1949 the Nationalist government moved to Taiwan and made Taipei the provisional capital. The film starts, therefore, with celebration, a celebration that proves shortlived and misplaced, for "liberation" by mainland China proves scarcely less oppressive than Japanese rule. The five years chronicled become a history of relentlessly escalating tragedy from which the film never releases us. It can be read as a structure of concentric but overlapping circles: at its core, the love story of a Taiwanese deaf-mute (Tony Leung, one of the major stars of both Hong Kong and Taiwanese cinema) and Hinomi, the young Japanese woman who has settled in Taiwan along with her slightly older brother Hinoe; beyond that, the story of a family consisting of four brothers (of whom the deaf-mute, Wen-ching, is the youngest) and their ageing father; beyond that again, the steadily increasing persecution of dissidents by the forces of government, culminating in the death of Hinoe and the "disappearance" of Wen-ching, leaving Hinomi (now his wife) along with their young child within a depleted family circle. But the film also traces its disasters backward, to the war, in which one brother has vanished never to return, while the brother who does return (Wen-leung) comes home temporarily insane, subsequently unstable, engaging in criminal activities and given to outbreaks of uncontrollable violence. Ironically, by the film's end, he is the one apparent survivor.

Structurally and stylistically, City of Sadness is Hou's most audacious and uncompromising film up to that date, the first complete elaboration of the stylistics that dominant his subsequent work. One can define his style partly by reference to two great Japanese masters who may or may not be direct influences. Like Ozu, he prefers a static camera, but, like Mizoguchi, long takes. Many scenes are sequence-shots, without a cut, or sequences of at most two camera setups. As with Mizoguchi and very unlike Ozu, many scenes involve complex simultaneous foreground and background actions, using depth of field, and with actors entering and exiting the frame, giving a constant sense of lives continuing beyond the image. On the other hand, like Ozu, he is fond of using frames-within-the-frame for intimate interior scenes, replacing Ozu's shoji screens with dark walls or pillars. There are no closeups and no point-of-view shots.

Hou's treatment of violence is particularly rigorous, at the furthest possible remove from what the modern Hollywood or Hong Kong "action film" has accustomed us to. Violence in Hou is always in long-shot. City of Sadness offers a particularly striking example, in Ah-Ga's characteristically wild assault (with an accomplice) on a wagon. The sequence consists of two long takes: 1. Ah-Ga in foreground, standing in profile, medium long-shot; the wagon approaches along the track in extreme long-shot; only as Ah-Ga throws away his cigarette and turns his back to the camera, walking away toward the wagon (which has stopped), do we see the sword he is holding at his side; he begins to run, shouting (no cut, no track-in), leaving the spectator far behind, attacking the wagon and its occupants as his associate (like Ah-Ga wearing a white shirt) runs up behind it. 2. Hou cuts only when the ensuing battle splits into two, some running screen left into a field of tall grasses, others moving even further away from the camera down the track; even then, the cut is not a cut-in but a cut to an even more distant long-shot that can encompass the entire action and that reduces the participants to little more than specks on the screen.

Structurally, Hou makes considerable demands on the spectator, always constructed by his films as intelligent and alert. There are major ellipses in the narrative, left unexplained, where we have to "fill in" what has happened by a process of deduction (the various stages of Wen-leung's mental condition are a good example: when he is introduced he appears incurably and dangerously insane, then subsequently turns up amid the family with no intermediary account of his progress). There are also intercut sequences not initially signified as such, so that we begin by reading them as chronological then are forced to readjust when they prove to be simultaneous. Apparently disconnected scenes form a pattern which we only gradually figure out. This cannot be accounted for in terms of the duration of the film's time period: Hou omits any dramatization of major events, preferring to show us small, almost irrelevant scenes of intimacy and character-interaction that prove to have only an indirect relation to the determining historical developments offscreen. The ending carries the withholding of information to its logical extreme: we learn that Wen-ching has disappeared, certainly arrested, probably but not certainly executed for his work in printing pamphlets for the dissidents, his disability having prevented him from full engagement. The film then simply stops, and we are left in precisely the same state of uncertainty as Hinomi and the surviving relatives.

At the present time, City of Sadness is marginally available only on an unofficial laserdisc, in the wrong format (so that Hou's meticulous 1: 1.85 compositions are seriously mutilated, giving the impression that he doesn't know how to frame), and with subtitles that fail to translate a number of crucial explanatory intertitles (the written "dialogues" between Wen-ching and Hinomi, depriving the former of his only "voice" and undermining the film's most beautiful and touching scenes, played with great delicacy). All of Hou's films, within a healthy film culture, would by now be available on DVD.

—Robin Wood

CLEO DE CINQ A SEPT

(Cleo from 5 to 7)

France-Italy, 1962

Director: Agnès Varda

Production: Rome-Paris Films; black and white and Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 90 minutes. Released April 1962, Paris. Filmed in Paris.

Producers: Georges de Beauregard and Carlo Ponti; associate producer: Bruno Drigo; screenplay: Agnès Varda; photography: Jean Rabier; editor: Janine Verneau; sound engineers: Jean Labussière and Julien Coutellier; sound editor: Jacques Maumont; art director: Bernard Evein; music: Michel Legrand; lyrics: Agnès Varda; costume designer: Bernard Evein.

Cast: Corinne Marchand (Cléo); Antoine Bourseiller (Antoine); Dorothee Black (Dorothee); Michel Legrand (Bob, the Pianist); Dominique Davray (Angèle); José-Luis de Villalonga (Cléo's Lover); with: Jean-Luc Godard; Anna Karina; Eddie Constantine; Sami Frey; Danièle Delorme; Jean-Claude Brialy; Yves Robert; Alan Scott; Robert Postec; Lucienne Marchand.

Publications

Script:

Varda, Agnès, "Cleo de cinq à sept," Paris, 1962; extract as "Cleo from 5 to 7" in Films and Filming (London), December 1962.

Books:

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946. Volume 2: The Personal Style, New York, 1966.

Betancourt, Jeanne, Women in Focus, Dayton, Ohio, 1974.

Barasq, Leon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions; A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.

Smith, Alison, Agnes Varda, New York, 1998.

Articles:

Tailleur, Roger, "Cléo d'ici à l'éternité," in Positif (Paris), March 1962. Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 May 1962.

Roud, Richard, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1962.

- Roud, Richard, "The Left Bank," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1962–63.
- Shivas, M., "Cléo de cinq à sept and Agnès Varda," in Movie (London), October 1962.
- Manvell, Roger, in Films and Filming (London), December 1962.
- "Pasolini-Varda-Allio-Sarris-Michelson," in Film Culture (New York), Fall 1966.
- "Agnès Varda," in Current Biography (New York), 1970.
- Gow, Gordon, interview with Varda, in Films and Filming (London), March 1970.
- Confino, Barbara, interview with Varda, in Saturday Review (New York), 12 August 1972.
- Levitin, J., "Mother of the New Wave," in Women and Film (Santa Monica), volume 1, nos. 5–6, 1974.
- Mulvey, Laura, "Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema," in Women and Film: A Critical Anthology, edited by Karyn Kay and Gerald Peary, New York, 1977.
- Flitterman, S., "From 'déesse' to 'idée': Agnès Varda's Cleo from Five to Seven," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Fall 1983.
- Revault d'Allonnes, Fabrice, Cinéma (Paris), 8 January 1986.
- Forbes, Jill, "Agnès Varda: The Gaze of the Medusa?" in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1989.
- Biro, Y., "Caryatids of Time: Temporality in the Cinema of Agnès Varda," in Performing Arts Journal, vol. 19, no. 3, 1997.
- Anthony, Elizabeth M., "From Fauna to Flora in Agnès Varda's Cléo de 5 à 7," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), April 1998.
- Brown, Royal S., "Cleo from 5 to 7: Vagabond," in Cineaste (New York), July 1998.

* * *

Agnès Varda's second feature is amongst the most rigorous and delicate films of the French New Wave. While awaiting the results of a cancer test, a pop singer, stage-name Cléo Victoire, a beautiful, dreamy, artificial creature, comes to terms with her new-found fear of death.

First, Cléo's fortune-teller predicts "a transformation"; then her confidante, Angèle, is dismissive; the purchase of a hat only trivially lifts her morale. She daren't share her troubles with her suave lover, José (Villalonga). She is briefly reassured by rehearsals with her pianist, Bob (Michel Legrand, who also wrote the background music), until he misreads her nerviness as mere caprice. Shop-windows reflect her beauty, but also display grotesque masks and sculptures. On the jukebox of a fashionable café, her latest record serves as mere background to chatter. She is warmed by the earthy, natural nudity of her friend Dorothée, a sculptor's model, and responds to a burlesque film (featuring Godard, Karina, Eddie Constantine), with fast-motion funerals and dark-tinted spectacles. She removes her elaborate wig, and begins to notice the poignant and grotesque details of a certain street-life. In a quiet park, she meets Antoine, a gentle conscript destined for the Algerian war; he accompanies her to the hospital; and she agrees to see him off that evening. The doctor confirms her anxieties, but not her worst fears, and she feels part of life, of "others," at last.

The film's running-time matches the real (or rather, possible, albeit pat) space-and-duration of Cléo's journey round Paris, between 1700–1830 hrs on 21 June 1961, and using the radio news for that day (described as a Tuesday, though actually a Wednesday). Cléo's journey can be exactly mapped, and the camera leaves her twice only, and very briefly. Thus the film adapts the classical theatre's unities

(time, space, action) to a properly fluid film-equivalent. Though approximating Cléo's perceptions, Varda avoids restricting herself to 1st-person point-of-view shots, which would overly eliminate Cléo's presence, and therefore her reactions and feelings, from the screen. This near-subjectivism culminates in actual "stream-of-consciousness," a volley of memory-images of earlier moments (not flash-backs; they include changes due to mental processes).

This "subjectivism" is countered by a formalism inducing, not "alienation" exactly, but a film-form "concretism." On-screen titles announce a prologue (the fortune-teller sequence), and then 13 sections, with their exact time, and the name of a character whose personality at that moment keys the section's style. Only the prologue is in colour. Thereafter Cléo's name "christens" sections I (solo on a staircase), III (from hatshop to taxi), V (José), and VII (discovering the street). Angèle's name christens II (the first café) and IV (from taxi into Cléo's apartment). Bob keys VI (the rehearsal); "Some others" VIII (La Dôme to sculpture studio); Dorothée's IX (journey to Raoul, the projectionist); Raoul's X (the cinema). The park sequence is divided between Cléo (XI), Antoine (XII) and "Cléo et Antoine" (XIII). Bob's extrovert cheerfulness inspires "swinging" camera-movements; Angèle's style is factual and strict; Cléo progresses from an ornamental, self-centred, style (sinuous camera-calligraphy, narrow-lens close-ups of herself) to a simpler style (direct point-of-view/reaction cuts); the last section, bearing two names, suggests a meeting of minds, both at one with the landscape, not just "in" them. The cinematic styles evoke now de Sica, now Ophuls (and, of course, Démy, Varda's husband); the settings range from raw reality to a beautifully mannered rococo.

Varda describes Cléo as a converse to her second, uncompleted, feature, La Mélangite, planned as a maze of stream-of-consciousness shots. It also echoes her short Opéra-Mouffe, which depicted the world through the mind of a pregnant woman, though usually off-screen. Like that film, Cléo involves much direct cinema, and in that sense, "objectivity." If details resonant to Cléo's moods abound, it's as appropriate to mental selectivity generally. The film's reconciliation of objective-casual appearances with "expressionism" (Varda's term; one might prefer "impressionism") is virtuoso work; she perfects a certain French tradition, a blending of "camera-eye" objectivity and Bergsonian subjectivity, which runs from Vigo to Franju, and becomes fully self-interrogating amongst the "Left Bank" documentarists of the New Wave (Varda acknowledges affinities with Resnais and Chris Marker). Some critics felt that Cléo's sensitive surface somehow lacked soul, but Varda's highly articulate interviews confirm the lucidity behind a film whose intricate symbolism, or rather, poetic suggestion (angels/Angèle/flesh/wigs) repays endless analysis, the most sensitive being Roger Tailleur's in Positif.

—Raymond Durgnat

A CLOCKWORK ORANGE

UK, 1971

Director: Stanley Kubrick

Production: Hawk Films; Warnercolor, 35mm; running time: 135 minutes, some sources list 137 minutes. Released 20 December 1971 in New York by Warner Bros. Filmed September 1970 to March 1971 in MGM British Studios, Borehamwood, England.

A Clockwork Orange

Producers: Stanley Kubrick with Max L. Raab and Si Litvinoff serving as executive producers; screenplay: Stanley Kubrick, from the novel by Anthony Burgess; photography: John Alcott; editor: Bill Butler; sound: John Jordan; production designer: John Barry; art directors: Russell Hagg and Peter Shields; music: Ludwig van Beethoven, Edward Elgar, Gioacchino Rossini, Terry Tucker, and Erika Eigen; original electronic music: Walter Carlos; costume designer: Milena Canonero; make-up: Fred Williamson, George Partleton, and Barbara Daly; paintings and sculptures: Herman Makking, Cornelius Makking, Liz Moore and Christiane Kubrick; stunt arranger: Roy Scammer.

Cast: Malcolm McDowell (Alex); Patrick Magee (Mr. Alexander); Michael Bates (Chief Guard); Warren Clark (Dim); John Clive (Stage actor); Adrienne Corri (Mrs. Alexander); Carl Duering (Dr. Brodsky); Paul Farrell (Tramp); Clive Francis (Lodger); Michael Gover (Prison governor); Miriam Karlin (Cat lady); James Marcus (George); Aubrey

Morris (Deltroid); Godfrey Quigley (Prison chaplain); Sheila Raynor (Mum); Madge Ryan (Dr. Barnom); John Savident (Conspirator); Anthony Sharp (Minister of the Interior); Philip Stone (Dad); Pauline Taylor (Psychiatrist); Margaret Tyzack (Conspirator); with Steven Berkoff, Lindsay Campbell, Michael Tarn, David Prowse, Barrie Cookson, Jan Adair, Gaye Brown, Peter Burton, John J. Carney, Vivienne Chandler, Richard Connaught, Prudence Drage, Carol Drinkwater, Lee Fox, Cheryl Grunwald, Gilliam Hills, Craig Hunter, Shirley Jaffe, Virginia Wetherell, Neil Wilson, and Katya Wyeth.

Awards: New York Film Critics Awards for Best Film and Best Direction, 1971.

Publications

Script:

Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange, Based on the Novel by Anthony Burgess (shot by shot script), New York, 1972.

Books:

- Kagan, Norman, The Cinema of Stanley Kubrick, New York, 1972.
 Walker, Alexander, Stanley Kubrick Directs, New York, 1972.
 Phillips, Gene D., The Movie Makers: Artists in Industry, Chicago, 1973.
 Devries, Daniel, The Films of Stanley Kubrick, Grand Rapids, Michigan, 1973.
 Bobker, Lee R., Elements of Film, New York, 1974.
 Haskell, Molly, From Reverence to Rape, New York, 1974.
 Phillips, Gene D., Stanley Kubrick: A Film Odyssey, New York, 1975.
 Taylor, John Russell, Directors and Directions: Cinema for the '70s, New York, 1975.
 Wagner, Geoffrey, The Novel and the Cinema, Madison, New Jersey, 1975.
 Parish, James Robert, editor, The Science Fiction Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1977.
 Ciment, Michel, Kubrick, Paris, 1980, revised edition, 1987; translated as Kubrick, London, 1983.
 Kolker, Robert Phillip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.
 Hummel, Christoph, editor, Stanley Kubrick, Munich, 1984.
 Brunetta, Gian Piero, Stanley Kubrick: Tempo, spazio, storia, e mondi possibili, Parma, 1985.
 Falsetto, Mario, Stanley Kubrick: A Narrative and Stylistic Analysis, Westport, Connecticut, 1994.
 Corliss, Richard, Lolita, London, 1994.
 Falsetto, Mario, editor, Perspectives on Stanley Kubrick, New York, 1996.
 Baxter, John, Stanley Kubrick: A Biography, New York, 1997.
 LoBrutto, Vincent, Stanley Kubrick: A Biography, New York, 1997.
 Walker, Alexander, Stanley Kubrick: Director, New York, 1999.
 Raphael, Frederic, Eyes Wide Open: A Memoir of Stanley Kubrick, New York, 1999.
 Phillips, Gene, editor, Stanley Kubrick: Interviews, Jackson, Mississippi, 2000.

Articles:

- Hofsess, John, "Mind's Eye," in Take One (Montreal), May-June 1971.
 Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 20 December 1971.
 Cocks, Jay, in Time (New York), 20 December 1971.
 Alpert, Hollis, "Milk-Plus and Ultra-Violence," in Saturday Review (New York), 25 December 1971.
 Houston, Penelope, "Kubrick Country," in Saturday Review (New York), 25 December 1971.
 Hughes, Robert, "The Decor of Tomorrow's Hell," in Time (New York), 27 December 1971.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 30 December 1971.
 Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, 1 January 1972.
 Canby, Vincent, "Orange, Disorienting, but Human Comedy," in New York Times, 9 January 1972.
 Millar, Gavin, "Treatment and Ill Treatment," in Listener (London), 20 January 1972.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), Winter 1972.
 Burgess, Anthony, "Clockwork Marmalade," in Listener (London), 17 February 1972.

- Zimmerman, Paul, "Kubrick's Brilliant Vision," in Newsweek (New York), 3 January 1972.
 Bourget, Jean-Loup, in Positif (Paris), March 1972.
 Burgess, Jackson, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1972.
 Houston, Penelope, and Philip Strick, "Interview with Stanley Kubrick," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1972.
 Krassner, P., and others, in Take One (Montreal), April 1972.
 Barr, Charles, "Straw Dogs, A Clockwork Orange, and the Critics," in Screen (London), Summer 1972.
 Boyers, Robert, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Summer 1972.
 Gumenik, Arthur, "A Clockwork Orange: Novel into Film," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Summer 1972.
 Kolker, Robert Phillip, "Oranges, Dogs, and Ultraviolence," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), Summer 1972.
 Benayoun, Robert, "Stanley Kubrick le libertin," Positif (Paris), June 1972.
 Burgess, Anthony, in Positif (Paris), June 1972.
 Ciment, Michel, "Entretien avec Stanley Kubrick," in Positif (Paris), June 1972.
 Costello, Donald, "From Counter-Culture to Anti-Culture," in Commonweal (New York), 14 July 1972.
 Strick, Philip, "Kubrick's Horrorshow," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1972.
 McCracken, Samuel, "Novel into Film: Novelist Into Critic: A Clockwork Orange Again," in Antioch Review (Yellow Springs, Ohio), no. 3, 1973.
 Isaac, Neil D., "Unstuck in Time: Clockwork Orange and Slaughterhouse 5," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1973.
 Mamber, Stephen, in Cinema (Los Angeles), Winter 1973.
 Evans, W., "Violence and Film: The Thesis of Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Fall 1974.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), October 1975.
 Feldmann, H., "Kubrick and His Discontents," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), no. 1, 1976.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, "Screen Violence: Emotional Structure and Ideological Function in A Clockwork Orange," in Approaches to Popular Culture, edited by C. W. E. Bigsby, London, 1976.
 Moskowitz, Ken, "A Clockwork Orange," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Fall 1976.
 Moskowitz, Ken, "Clockwork Violence," Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1977.
 Sobcharck, V. C., "Decor as Theme: A Clockwork Orange," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1981.
 Collins, F., "Implied Metaphor in the Films of Stanley Kubrick," in New Orleans Review, no. 3, 1989.
 French, P., in Sight and Sound (London), no. 2, 1990.
 Bourguignon, T., in Positif (Paris), September 1992.
 Stein, M.E., "The New Violence, or Twenty Years of Violence in Films: An Appreciation," in Films in Review (Denville, New Jersey), vol. 46, January/February 1995.
 Ng, Y., "A Clockwork Orange: The First 25 Years," in Kinema (Waterloo, Ontario), no. 5, Spring 1996.
 Rouchy, Marie-Élisabeth and François Gorin, "Kubrick a des pépins," in Télérama, no. 2443, 6 November 1996.

* * *

Still circulating in Europe and America but withdrawn from British distribution by Kubrick in 1973, within a year of its first release, A Clockwork Orange currently remains a paradoxical testament to the manipulative obsessions of its director. On the one hand, Kubrick has taken to extremes his habitual attention to every detail of the shaping and presentation of his work by, in this instance, deciding not to let it be shown at all. On the other, the “suppressed” film has validated its own theme by refusing to be manipulated out of existence; instead, its notoriety has served only to enhance its creator’s reputation despite his change of heart, thanks to the seductive skill and extraordinary impact with which his tale is told. That it is his tale, although phrased in the appealingly hybrid language devised by Anthony Burgess (who in 1962 based his brutally comical novel on a real-life incident of 20 years earlier), is obvious from the parallels in structure, emphasis and technique with all Kubrick’s other dramas, from Day of the Fight in which arenas and split personalities find an uncanny preface, to Full Metal Jacket in which, once again, conditioned killers pursue the excesses of a fiercely private war.

The setting for A Clockwork Orange is Britain in the near future—“just as soon as you could imagine it, but not too far ahead—it’s just not today, that’s all”—when teenage thug Alex DeLarge (Malcolm McDowell) enjoys a daily routine of crime, sex, and Beethoven. Caught and imprisoned for murder, he volunteers for experimental shock therapy available as a government scheme to reduce prison overcrowding, which brainwashes him so effectively that he becomes in his turn a helpless victim incapable of defending himself and nauseated by all his former passions. Trapped by the deranged writer Mr. Alexander, once attacked by Alex and now intent on revenge (and author, we learn, of a book called A Clockwork Orange), he is driven to attempt suicide after an overdose of Beethoven’s Ninth Symphony. The popular press rushes to his support, and the government hastily agrees to reverse the “rehabilitation” treatment. Like the astronaut of 2001, Alex is reborn (“I came back to life after black, black night for what might have been a million years”) and, restored to rude health, prepares to make up for lost time.

Boisterous, intimate, explicit and gaudy, Kubrick’s forecast owes nothing to the high-tech elegance of 2001, his other speculative trendsetter, except for the same scrupulous perfectionism. The costumes by Milena Canonero and the set designs by John Barry are a spectacularly lurid blend of transient fashion, stockbroker-belt kitsch, clownish irony and plundered grandeur, as if the palatial vaults of the Overlook Hotel in The Shining had been taken over for an acid-house boutique. The effect is more pantomime than prophecy, but it defines with hilarious clarity a society of fevered excess where the older generation clings listlessly to a dismal past while the present is ruthlessly pillaged by the young. Art has been reduced to tepid pornography, with sculpted nudes as furniture in the “milk-bars” (where drinks are automatically spiced with drugs) and erotic images as commonplace domestic wallpaper, while music has become mechanical and formulaic, even the classics (beautifully rearranged by Walter Carlos) converted to a remorseless clockwork rhythm.

In this weary, decaying environment, physicality offers the only reliable truth. With joyful energy, Clockwork Orange presents a torrential, dancing flow of movement, celebrating the simplicity of brute strength. A superb fight sequence quickly establishes the mood: in a derelict opera house lit by huge shafts of light across its rubbish-strewn floor, two gangs confront each other gleefully and plunge into a ballet of dazzling violence, hurling each other through furniture and windows with slapstick enthusiasm. Urged on by, and often synchronised with, Rossini’s thunderous “Thieving Magpie,” their exhilaration then bursts out into a headlong chase aboard the stolen Durango-95, scattering other traffic in wild panic and yelling with the sheer ecstasy of speed. Alex’s night-ride recalls the toppling “Star Gate” sequence of 2001, the rush through the hotel corridors in The Shining, or more subtly the long journeys of Lolita and Barry Lyndon and the flight of the nuclear bomber in Dr. Strangelove. These anguished, self-defeating but inescapable odysseys, shaped from Kubrick’s perpetually prowling camera, continue into the final image of Full Metal Jacket—a defiant advance into darkness by spirits who know the worst and no longer fear it.

Repeatedly, Kubrick opens his scenes with immense tracking shots, like the low-angle spin around the record-shop just ahead of Alex on the hunt, or the triumphant sweep through the wards with the psychiatrist and her trolley of equipment. Scenes of urgency and impending disaster are filmed with a hand-held camera (held by the director himself): Alex’s fight with the cat-lady, a struggle in torrential rain, a march towards retribution in muddy woodland. And more than anywhere else in his work, Kubrick uses subjective shots, identifying us with Alex so that we too are crushed to the floor, lie powerless in hospital, or, most unsettling of all, fall in despair from a window to be smashed on the pavement below. This emphasis ensures that Alex has our sympathy despite the extremes of his behaviour, that he remains the misunderstood sufferer from social injustice ready to accumulate a further load of misunderstanding as soon as the opportunity arises.

“The story can be taken on two levels,” said Kubrick before the film opened: “as a sociological treatment of whether behavioural psychology will lead to evils on the part of a totalitarian government (which I think is the less important level), or as a kind of psychological fairy-tale. And I don’t frankly believe that audiences in general will see Clockwork Orange other than as a fairy-tale, which it also resembles in its symmetry, with each character encountered again at the end. There’s a lot of hypocrisy about what the human personality really is: the Id may be largely suppressed by the super-Ego but it’s with us just the same—and it identifies with Alex all the time. This darker side of our subconscious finds release in Alex: he makes nothing out to be better than it is, he’s completely honest. How can we not sympathise with him?” Soon on the defensive, his film accused of inspiring new waves of delinquency (with about as much logic as if Full Metal Jacket were interpreted as an army recruitment exercise), the director with characteristic discretion has temporarily retired Alex as best he can from public gaze. But he compiled a portrait too potent to be forgotten: Alex’s tortured face, enfolded in straps and wires, his eyelids held open by pitiless clamps, is one of the most haunting and vital apparitions the cinema will ever have to offer.

—Philip Strick

CLOSE ENCOUNTERS OF THE THIRD KIND

USA, 1977

Director: Steven Spielberg

Production: Steven Spielberg Film Productions for Columbia Pictures; Metrocolor, 70mm, Dolby; running time: 134 minutes. Released

Close Encounters of the Third Kind

9 November 1977; re-released 1980 with additional footage under the title Close Encounters of the Third Kind, Special Edition. Filmed in the United States and foreign locations; cost: about $19 million.

Producers: Julia Phillips and Michael Phillips; screenplay: Steven Spielberg; photography: Vilmos Zsigmond, and Douglas Trumball, William A. Fraker, Douglas Slocombe, John Alonzo, Laszlo Kovacs, Richard Yuricich, Dave Stewart, Robert Hall, Don Jarel, and Dennis Muren; editor: Michael Kahn; sound: Buzz Knudson, Don MacDougall, Robert Glass, Gene Cantamessa, and Steve Katz; sound editor: Frank Warner; production designer: Joe Alves; art director: Dan Lomino; music: John Williams; special effects: Douglas Trumball; costume designer: Jim Linn; consultant: Dr. J. Allen Hynek; stunt coordinator: Buddy Joe Hooker; “Extraterrestrials” realized by: Carlo Rambaldi.

Cast: Richard Dreyfuss (Roy Neary); Melinda Dillon (Jillian Guiler); François Truffaut (Claude Lacombe); Cary Guffey (Barry Guiler); Teri Garr (Ronnie Neary); Bob Balaban (David Laughlin).

Awards: Oscar for Cinematography (Zsigmond), 1977; Special Achievement Award from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences to Frank Warner for Sound Effects Editing, 1977.

Publications

Script:

Spielberg, Steven, Close Encounters of the Third Kind, London and New York, 1977.

Books:

McConnell, Storytelling and Mythmaking: Images from Film Literature, New York, 1979.

Monaco, James, American Film Now: The People, the Power, the Money, the Movies, Oxford, 1979.

Pye, Michael, and Lynda Myles, The Movie Brats: How the Film Generation Took Over Hollywood, London, 1979.

Kolker, Robert Phillip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Scorsese, Spielberg, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.

Crawley, Tony, The Steven Spielberg Story, London, 1983.

Short, Robert, The Gospel from Outer Space, San Francisco, 1983.

Goldau, Antje, and Hans Helmut Prinzler, Spielberg: Filme als Spielzeug, Berlin, 1985.

Mott, Donald R., and Cheryl McAllister Saunders, Steven Spielberg, Boston, 1986.

Smith, Thomas G., Industrial Light and Magic: The Art of Special Effects, London, 1986.

Weiss, Ulli, Das neue Hollywood: Francis Ford Coppola, Steven Spielberg, Martin Scorsese, Munich, 1986.

Godard, Jean-Pierre, Spielberg, Paris, 1987.

Sinyard, Neil, The Films of Steven Spielberg, London, 1987.

McAllister, Marica, Steven Spielberg, Vero Beach, 1989.

Taylor, Philip M., Steven Spielberg: The Man, His Movies & Their Meaning, New York, 1994.

Balaban, Bob, Close Encounters of the Third Kind Diary, New York, 1997.

Hovanec, Erin M., Learning About Creativity from the Life of Steven Spielberg, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Murray, D., in Millimeter (New York), September 1977.

Cieslar, J., in Film a Doba (Prague), October 1977.

Cook, B., "Close Encounters with Steven Spielberg," in American Film (Washington D.C.), November 1977.

Kroll, Jack, in Newsweek (New York), November 1977.

Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, 28 November 1977.

Close Encounters section, in Filmmakers Newsletter (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), December 1977.

Reilly, C. P., in Films in Review (New York), December 1977.

Kauffmann, Stanley, in New Republic (New York), 10 December 1977.

Fairchild, B. H., "An Event Sociologique: Close Encounters," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), no. 4, 1978.

"Encounter Espionage," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1978.

Tuchman, Mitch, interview with Spielberg, in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1978.

"Close Encounters Issue" of American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), January 1978.

Simon, John, in Take One (Montreal), January 1978.

Behar, H., "Rencontre express avec Steven Spielberg," in Image et Son (Paris), April 1978.

Biette, J. C., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1978.

Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1978.

Lehman, Ernest, "Close Encounters of a Quibbling Kind," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), April 1978.

Gerrold, David, "Close Encounters and Star Wars," in Science Fantasy Film Classics, Spring 1978.

Pym, John, "The Middle American Sky," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1978.

Heathwood, G., "Steven Spielberg," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), April-June 1978.

Eyman, S., "Trumbull the Magician," in Take One (Montreal), May 1978.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), May 1978.

Stewart, G., "Close Encounters of the 4th Kind," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1978.

Seymour, F., and R. Entman, "Close Encounters of the Third Kind: Close Encounters of the Third Reich," in Jump Cut (Chicago), August 1978.

Skwara, J., "Basn dwudziestego wieku," in Kino (Warsaw), February 1979.

Cardenaz, F., in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), April 1979.

Carlo, S., "Montare, smontare, ircollare," in Filmcritica (Rome), April 1979.

Ursini, James, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Gordon, A., "Close Encounters: The Gospel According to Steven Spielberg," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1980.

Jameson, R. T., "Style vs. Style," in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1980.

Munson, B., "Greg Jein—Miniature Giant," in Cinefex (Riverside, California), August 1980.

Williams, Tony, "Close Encounters of the Authoritarian Kind," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), volume 5, no. 4, 1983.

Shay, D., "Special Visual Effects—Robert Swarthe," in Cinefex (Riverside, California), January 1983.

Phillips, J., "A Close Encounter of the Worst Kind," in Premiere (New York), December 1990.

Torry, R., "Politics and Parousia in Close Encounters of the Third Kind," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1991.

Sheehan, H., "The Panning of Steven Spielberg," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1992.

Shay, D., "A Close Encounter with Steven Spielberg," in Cinefex (Riverside, California), February 1993.

Solman, G., "Uncertain Glory," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1993.

Engel, Charlene, "Language and the Music of the Spheres: Steven Spielberg's Close Encounters of the Third Kind," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 24, no. 4, October 1996.

* * *

Following the financial success of Jaws, director Steven Spielberg was able to obtain funding for Close Encounters of the Third Kind, a large personal project about the UFO experience. Spielberg had explored this topic in a 2-hour 8mm film he had made as a youth, called Firelight. Close Encounters tells the story of Roy Neary, a middle-class American who becomes alienated from his family and his suburban lifestyle when he sees actual flying saucers, apparently controlled by intelligent beings from outer space. The aliens have implanted a mysterious vision in Neary's mind, the meaning of which puzzles and frustrates him. Accompanied by Jillian Guiler, a woman whose son has been kidnapped by the aliens, Neary pursues his vision to Devil's Tower, an incredible mountain formation in Wyoming. There, they witness the first physical contact between a team of UFO investigators, led by a French scientist, Claude Lacombe, and the alien visitors. With a dazzling display of special effects, the film presents a host of small space-ships led by a gigantic mother ship. According to Spielberg, the inspiration for the mother ship's design was an oil refinery in India and the city lights of the San Fernando Valley in California. At the end of the film, Jillian is reunited with her son and Neary attains his dream by flying away with the mother ship.

The "Special Edition" of the film added scenes of Neary inside the mother ship, but cut the sequence where Neary throws dirt into his family's home in order to re-create his vision of Devil's Tower. Both versions of the film were combined in a special presentation for network television.

Critical reaction to the film was largely favorable, although there were some strong complaints about gaps in the narrative. Critics especially noted the religious overtones in the film.

But Close Encounters is more than just a quasi-religious celebration of childlike innocence—it is also a celebration of communication, expressed in the film through the interplay of light and music. The film opens with a splash of light and music and closes with an intensified version of these images and sounds, as the aliens and their human counterparts use flashing lights and a specific combination of musical tones to communicate with one another. Reportedly, the composer, John Williams, actually started work for the film two years before it was finalized, and in many instances he wrote his music first while Spielberg constructed the scenes to it later.

Close Encounters combines light and music to show how communication can transcend the boundaries between the known and the unknown, the human and the alien, the real and the imagined. As Frank McConnell suggests in his Storytelling and Mythmaking, the film “is not so much about aliens as about our imagination of aliens, or, rather, about the myths of film culture itself and their power to energize and ennoble our lives beyond the point of irony and dissatisfaction.”

—Tom Snyder

CLOSELY WATCHED TRAINS

See OSTRE SLEDOVANE VLAKY

UN COEUR EN HIVER

(A Heart in Winter)

France, 1991

Director: Claude Sautet

Production: Film Par Film, Cinea, Orly Film, Sedif, Paravision, D.A. Films, FR3 Films, with the participation of Les Soficas Sofinergie, Investimage, Creations, Canal Plus and the Centre National de la Cinematographie; colour, 35mm; running time: 104 minutes.

Cast: Daniel Auteuil (Stéphane); Emmanuelle Béart (Camille); André Dussolier (Maxime); Elizabeth Bourguine (Hélène); Brigitte Catillon (Régine); Maurice Garrel (Lachaume); Myriam Boyer (Madame Amet); Stanislas Carre de Malberg (Brice); Jean-Luc Bideau (Ostende).

Awards: Silver Lion and International Critics' Prize, Venice 1992.

Publications

Articles:

Variety (New York), 7 September 1992.

Legrand, G., and others, Positif (Paris), September 1992.

Nacache, J., “Un Coeur en hiver: attendre et vieillir” in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), September 1992.

Andrew, G., “Musical Trio” in Time Out (London), 21 April 1993.

Monk, C., Sight and Sound (London), May 1993.

Kissin, E.H., Films in Review (New York), October 1993.

Lis, Renata, “Serce Daniela Auteuil,” in Kino (Warsaw), January 1995.

Zizek, S., “There Is No Sexual Relationship,” in Spectator (Los Angeles), vol. 16, no. 2, 1996.

“Special issue,” Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), June 1996.

* * *

Claude Sautet’s subtly haunting Un coeur en hiver is a film about the deepest human feelings and fears, especially fear of intimacy and fear of rejection. The film is the story of three people. Maxime (André Dussolier) and Stéphane (Daniel Auteuil) are long-time professional associates who operate a small company which constructs and restores violins. The former runs the business end of the operation, and the latter is an expert craftsman who handles the repairs. One day, Maxime informs Stéphane that he has met somebody: Camille (Emmanuelle Béart), a beautiful and talented violinist. Maxim explains that he and Camille have fallen in love, and are planning to live together.

Stéphane is a loner, who is immersed in his craft. His sole confidante is Hélène, the proprietress of a bookstore, with whom he shares a platonic relationship. As Stéphane and Camille begin spending time together in their professional capacities, it becomes clear that they are attracted to each other. Stéphane admits as much to Hélène, while Camille—despite her involvement with Maxim—asks him the $64 dollar question: “Have you ever been in love?”

Sautet communicates his characters’ thoughts as much visually as verbally. Just after Camille poses this question, she is seen kissing Maxime and then turning away; next, she is shown to look forlorn. A further reason for her discomfort is that she senses a reticence on the part of Stéphane. To her, this is an enigma. Eventually, she asks him, “Why are you hiding from me?” Stéphane, meanwhile, can only further distance himself from her. Eventually, an elated Camille reveals to Stéphane that she wants him, and can accept the fact that he lives in an “enclosed world.” Stéphane replies that she misunderstands him. He cruelly tells her that he has wanted to seduce her, without loving her, and that he listens to her play her violin only because it is his “job.” Stéphane, of course, is covering his true feelings. At first, this seems self-destructive, as he is thwarting any chance for the involvement he desires with Camille. His remarks deeply hurt Camille, and, ultimately, she ends up settling for Maxime. At the finale, Stéphane, Camille and Maxime meet in a cafe. As the latter two depart, there is a look of sadness on Camille’s face. As Stéphane is left alone, he too shares that look, but he remains unable to express his emotions and share his life with another. To his mind, his rejection of Camille is an act of self-preservation.

At the opening of Un coeur en hiver, it is observed that violins are the “most precious possessions” of violinists. This declaration has profound meaning as the scenario evolves. If the instruments are such, they are so because they are safe. They have no free will. They will never abandon their owners. If they fall apart from usage, they always can be repaired. They are dependable and reliable—unlike human beings. When Maxime initially tells Stéphane of his relationship with Camille, it is noted that Maxime already is married and is planning to leave his wife. Even though the latter character is never seen, one can envision the heartache she will feel when informed by Maxime that he is in love with Camille. At another point, it is casually observed that one of Camille's fellow musicians is in love with her. While he may be a minor character, his emotions are real, and one also can imagine how he must feel as he watches Camille and Maxime.

Un coeur en hiver

Furthermore, even when two people connect, relations between them are inevitably less than harmonious. Caring becomes interspersed with friction; this is exactly what Stéphane observes while watching Louis, an aged music teacher, relate to his wife. And even if that relationship is one without discord, it is destined to end with the demise of one of the lovers, and the inevitable despair and loneliness of the remaining partner.

Emotions are complex, inexact, ever-changing; in human relationships, feelings are dependent upon the responses of others. Stéphane is keenly aware of all this, and it is for this reason that, despite his feelings, he distances himself from Camille. He is afraid of allowing himself to love her, because of the pain he may be forced to endure. As a result, he presents himself as passionless, which even plays itself out during an intellectual discussion in which he professes to have no opinion on the subject at hand.

The relationships in Un coeur en hiver are not only between lovers. Camille has for many years roomed with Régine, her manager. As Camille prepares to move in with Maxime, Régine must adjust to a new and more solitary lifestyle, a fact which she acts out by becoming angry at Camille. Later on, Stéphane tells Camille that he considers Maxime a business partner, and not a friend. Camille retorts that Stéphane's attitude is "just a pose." "It's strange how you enjoy giving yourself a bad image," she adds. Of course, Stéphane is not cold-hearted. He and Maxime are in fact friends, and he truly values their relationship. What Camille does not understand is that Stéphane simply is fearful of facing his emotions.

In the end, Stéphane is a lonely figure, one who is "unconnected with life." His solitude shelters him, keeping him protected from the hurt feelings that are the offshoots of human connection. Is he better or worse off? To answer this question, Sautet points out that, while we all are solitary souls, if we do not choose to be brave and risk connecting emotionally with others, our lives can never be complete.

—Rob Edelman

COME AND SEE

See IDI I SMOTRI

THE COMMISAR

See KOMISSAR

COMRADESHIP

See KAMERADSCHAFT

UN CONDAMNÉ À MORT S'EST ÉCHAPPÉ

---

(Le Vent souffle où il veut; A Man Escaped; The Spirit Breathes Where It Will)

France, 1956

Director: Robert Bresson

Production: SNE Gaumont/NEF (Paris); black and white, 35mm; running time: 102 minutes. Released 1956, France. Filmed in France.

Producers: Jean Thuillier and Alain Poiré; screenplay: Robert Bresson, from the account by André Devigny as published in Le Figaro Littéraire, 20 November 1954; photography: Léonce-Henry Burel; editor: Raymond Lamy; sound: Pierre-André Bertrand; art director: Pierre Charbonnier; music: Mozart; conductor: I. Disenhaus.

Cast: François Leterrier (Fontaine); Roland Monod (Le Pasteur); Charles Le Clainche (Jost); Maurice Beerblock (Blanchet); Jacques Ertaud (Orsini).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Best Director, 1957.

Publications

Books:

The Films of Robert Bresson, New York, 1969.

Cameron, Ian, The Films of Robert Bresson, London, 1970.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946, Volume 1: The Great Tradition, New York, 1970.

Schrader, Paul, Transcendental Style on Film: Ozu, Bresson, Dreyer, Los Angeles, 1972.

Bresson, Robert, Notes sur le cinématographe, Paris, 1975; as Notes on Cinema, New York, 1977.

Pontes Leca, C. de, Robert Bresson o cinematografo e o sinal, Lisbon, 1978.

Sloan, Jane, Robert Bresson: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1983.

De Gaetano, Roberto, Robert Bresson: Il Paradosso del Cinema, Rome, 1998.

Amiel, Vincent, Le Corps au Cinéma: Keaton, Bresson, Cassavetes, Paris, 1998.

Reader, Keith, Robert Bresson, New York, 2000.

Articles:

Monod, Roland, "Working with Bresson," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1957.

Gow, Gordon, "The Quest for Realism," in Films and Filming (London), December 1957.

Baxter, Brian, "Robert Bresson," in Film (London), September-October 1958.

Ford, Charles, "Robert Bresson," in Films in Review (New York), February 1959.

Green, Marjorie, "Robert Bresson," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1960.

Cameron, Ian, "An Interview with Robert Bresson," in Movie (London), February 1963.

Sarris, Andrew, "Robert Bresson," in Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.

Sontag, Susan, "Spiritual Style in the Films of Robert Bresson," in Against Interpretation, New York, 1969.

Skoller, Donald S., "Praxis as a Cinematic Principle in the Films of Robert Bresson," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1969.

Armes, Roy, "The Art of Robert Bresson," in London Magazine, October 1970.

"Robert Bresson," in Current Biography Yearbook, New York, 1971.

Prokosch, M., "Bresson's Stylistics Revisited," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), volume 15, no. 1, 1972.

Polhemus, H. M., "Matter and Spirit in the Films of Robert Bresson," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1974.

Sitney, P. Adams, "The Rhetoric of Robert Bresson," in The Essential Cinema, New York, 1975.

Petric, Vlad, "For a Close Cinematic Analysis," in Quarterly Review of Cinema Studies (Pleasantville, New York), no. 4, 1976.

"Robert Bresson Issue" of Caméra/Stylo (Paris), January 1985.

Predal, R., in Avant Scène du Cinéma (Paris), January-February 1992.

Elia, M., "Un Condamné à mort s'est échappé," in Séquences (Haute-Ville, Quebec), no. 189, 1997.

* * *

In the words of Jesus to Nicodemus in the third chapter of St. John, "the spirit breathes where it will." This alternate title for the film speaks the director's intentions with greater clarity, for here Bresson illustrates the dictum that heaven helps the man who helps himself.

Basing his screenplay on a true incident involving the successful 1943 escape of André Devigny from Fort Monluc prison in Lyons just hours before he was to have been executed, Bresson fashioned an escape film which has none of the embellishments of other films on that subject. Disavowing grand scale action sequences and focusing on the intimate details of the process of escape, Bresson elucidates the how rather than the why, the details of the physical process rather than the psychological motivations. Beginning with fact and striving for authenticity, Bresson employed Devigny as an advisor, secured permission to film in the actual prison, and gained access to the ropes and hooks used by Devigny in his escape.

Un Condamné à mort s'est échappé

Having made two films in which performance and dialogue were central, Bresson began to develop an alternate narrative strategy with Diary of a Country Priest. In this and later films he disavowed all notions of theatricality, refusing to employ professional performers and insisting upon writing his screenplays in a stripped down, elliptical form. In Un Condamné, a voice-over monologue almost entirely replaced diegetic dialogue.

The protagonist, here named Fontaine, is the focus of the film, and yet the performance of the man who portrays him is only partially responsible for the central impact of the main character. Using first person voice-over narration and shifting the dramatic emphasis to a close examination of manual dexterity, Bresson was able to eliminate any dependence on the standard conventions of vocal and facial expression to impart dramatic emphasis. In so doing, and by avoiding a persistent use of point-of-view shots, Bresson was able to impart a spiritual dimension, making the spectator aware of the workings of fate as well as those of the individual. Fontaine's actions during the process of escape are thus transformed from a manual enterprise to a collaboration between the physical and the spiritual.

Bresson creates an "escape" from traditional narrative form as well by the transformation of subjects and objects, creating meaning for those performers or objects which did not previously exist; certain items are transformed into the tools of escape, prisoners are transformed into free men, non-actors are turned into credible screen characters.

Visually alternating between scenes of solitary incarceration and minimal communication, Bresson used sound to allude to the possibility of freedom. In line with his belief that the ear is more creative than the eye, sound is used sparingly, generally to conjure up, for both Fontaine and the spectator, images that refer to ideas associated with escape: the guns of execution, the rattling of the prison guards keys, and the sound of a distant train. In the final moments of the film, as indicated by the title, Fontaine does realize his quest.

Less a film about the French Resistance, Un Condamné is an evocation of Bresson's belief in man's existence as being governed by a combination of predestination and human will. Elucidated without embellishment, this unusually suspenseful film celebrates the mystery of fate and the power of individual will.

—Doug Tomlinson

IL CONFORMISTA

(The Conformist)

Italy-France-West Germany, 1970

Director: Bernardo Bertolucci

Production: Mars Film SPA (Rome), Marianne Productions (Paris), and Maran Film GMBH (Munich); Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 112 minutes. Released 1970. Filmed in Italy and Paris.

Producers: Maurizio Lodife with Giovanni Bertolucci as executive producer; screenplay: Bernardo Bertolucci, from the novel by Alberto Moravia; photography: Vittorio Storaro; editor: Franco Arcalli; production designer: Ferdinando Scarfiotti; music: Georges Delerue; costume designer: Gitt Margrini.

Cast: Jean-Louis Trintignant (Marcello); Stefania Sandrelli (Giulia); Dominique Sanda (Anna Quadri); Pierrel Clementi (Nino Seminara); Gastone Moschin (Mangiello); Enzo Tarascio (Professor Quadri); Jose Quaglio (Halo); Milly (Marcello's mother); Giuseppe Addobbati (Marcello's father); Yvonne Sanson (Giulia's mother); Fosco Giachetti (The Colonel); Benedetto Benedetti (Minister); Gio Vagni Luca (Secretary); Christian Alegny (Raoul); Antonio Maestri (Priest); Christian Belegue (Gypsy); Pasquale Fortunato (Marcello as child); Marta Lado (Marcello's daughter); Pierangelo Givera (Male nurse); Carlo Gaddi, Franco Pellerani, Claudio Cappeli, and Umberto Silvestri (Hired killers).

Publications

Books:

- Mellen, Joan, Women and Sexuality in the New Film, New York, 1973.
 Casetti, F., Bertolucci, Florence, 1975.
 Horton, Andrew, and Joan Magretta, editors, Modern European Filmmakers and the Art of Adaptation, New York, 1981.
 Kuhlbrodt, Dietrich, and others, Bernardo Bertolucci, Munich, 1982.
 Ungari, Enzo, Bertolucci, Milan, 1982.
 Kolker, Robert Philip, Bernardo Bertolucci, London, 1985.
 Kline, T. Jefferson, Bertolucci's Dream Loom: A Psychoanalytic Study of the Cinema, Amherst, Massachusetts, 1987.
 Tonetti, Claretta, Bernardo Bertolucci, New York, 1995.
 Gerard, Fabien S., editor, Bernardo Bertolucci: Interviews, Jackson, Mississippi, 2000.

Articles:

- Haskell, Molly, "Jean-Louis Trintignant," in Show (Hollywood), 20 August 1970.
New York Times, 19 September 1970.
 Purdon, N., "Bernardo Bertolucci," in Cinema (London), no. 8, 1971.
 Kreitzman, R., "Bernardo Bertolucci, an Italian Young Master," in Film (London), Spring 1971.
 Goldin, Marilyn, "Bertolucci on The Conformist," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1971.
 Roud, Richard, "Fathers and Sons," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1971.
 Vogel, Amos, "Bernardo Bertolucci: An Interview," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1971.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), January 1972.
 Hjort, O., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), February 1972.
 Apon, A., "Methoden & technieken van Brechts epies theater," in Skrien (Amsterdam), November-December 1973.
 "Bernardo Bertolucci Seminar," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), April 1974.
 Paenhuijsen, F., "Le Conformiste de Bernardo Bertolucci," in APEC-Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), no. 3, 1974-75.
 Lopez, D., "The Father Figure in The Conformist and Last Tango in Paris," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Summer 1976.
 Lopez, D., "Novel into Film: Bertolucci's The Conformist," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Fall 1976.
 "Bertolucci Issue" of Cinema (Zurich), December 1976.
 Aitken, W., "Bertolucci's Gay Images," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), November 1977.
 Orr, C., "Ideology and Narrative Strategy in Bertolucci's The Conformist," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Spring 1980.
Italianist (Reading, Berkshire), nos. 2-3, 1982-83.
 Storaro, Vittorio, "La memoria dell'immagine," in Griffithiana, December 1989.
 Elia, Maurice, "Le conformiste de Bernardo Bertolucci," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), January-February 1996.
 Pinel, Vincent, Jean-Pierre Berthomé, and Bernard Bastide, "La restauration de films," in Positif (Paris), March 1996.
 Walker, M., "Style and Narrative in Bertolucci's The Conformist," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 41, 1996.
 Streitfeld, Susan, "The Fear of Being Normal," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 7, no. 5, May 1997.

* * *

Bernardo Bertolucci's films are often centered on the "split" protagonist. Sometimes (Before the Revolution, The Conformist and—if we take Maria Schneider as the central figure—Last Tango in Paris) the split is dramatized within a single individual torn between two lovers/ways of life/political allegiances; sometimes (Partner, 1900) it is dramatized by simultaneously paralleling and opposing two protagonists, inverted "doubles."

The Conformist repeats the essential structure of Before the Revolution. The protagonist is torn between alternatives on two levels: political—Marxism vs. conservative Fascism; and sexual—bourgeois marriage vs. a form of sexual deviancy (incest in the earlier film and homosexuality in the later, though this is touched on in the first section of the earlier film also). There are also important differences. In The Conformist the choice has already been made, and Marcello is presented with the quandary of whether to re-confirm or reverse it; also, because the protagonist is a (precariously) committed Fascist, Bertolucci is able to distance himself from him more successfully, achieving a degree of irony that eluded him in Before the Revolution. What gives the films both richness and confusion is the failure of the political and sexual levels to become coherently aligned. One expects the straightforward opposition of Marxism/sexual liberation vs. conservatism/sexual conformity, but this never quite materializes. In Before the Revolution the protagonist's aunt/lover (and before her, his young male friend/potential lover) is presented as apolitical and neurotic. In The Conformist the "liberated" woman with left-wing commitments and explicit lesbian tendencies is associated (via the lesbianism) with decadence and irresponsibility. The homosexual chauffeur who seduced an already sexually ambiguous Marcello in childhood is also presented as decadent and exploitive. Yet the film is quite clear in connecting Marcello's repression of his homosexuality with his espousal of Fascism. The tension is never resolved in the film, or elsewhere, in Bertolucci's work so far.

Fundamental to the "Bertoluccian split" is a tension within his cinematic allegiances. Avowedly a disciple of Godard, his stylistic affinities are with a tradition of luxuriance and excess that might be represented by Welles, Ophüls and von Sternberg—a tradition totally alien to Godard's filmic practice. When Bertolucci obtained financing from Paramount for The Conformist, Godard (then at his most intransigent, in the period immediately following the upheavals of May 1968) denounced him. Bertolucci took his revenge by giving Marcello's left-wing mentor, Professor Quadri, Godard's telephone number, then having the character violently assassinated. It is not surprising that the same film sees the full flowering of Bertolucci's stylistic flamboyance—elaborate camera movements, strange baroque angles, luxuriant color effects, a profusion of ornate decor, the intricate play of light and shadow. This abandonment, however, never ceases to be troubled and uneasy: baroque excess collides with Godardian distanciation. The film at once intellectually disavows "decadence" yet acknowledges an irresistible fascination for it. The split is not merely thematic (hence under the artist's control): it manifests itself at every level of his filmmaking.

—Robin Wood

CONTEMPT

See LE MÉPRIS

THE CONVERSATION

US, 1974

Director: Francis Ford Coppola

Production: American Zoetrope, Paramount Pictures, The Coppola Company, and The Directors Company; color, 35mm, Spherical; running time: 113 minutes. Filmed in Union Square, San Francisco, California.

Producers: Francis Ford Coppola, Fred Roos (co-producer), Mona Skager (associate producer); screenplay: Francis Ford Coppola; cinematographer: Bill Butler; editors: Walter Murch, Richard Chew; music: David Shire; casting: Jennifer Shull; production design: Dean Tavoularis; set decoration: Doug von Koss; costume design: Aggie Guerard Rodgers; production manager: Clark L. Paylow; sound: Walter Murch, Nathan Boxer, Art Rochester.

Cast: Gene Hackman (Harry Caul); John Cazale (Stan); Allen Garfield (William P. "Bernie" Moran); Cindy Williams (Ann); Frederic Forrest (Mark); Robert Duvall (The Director [uncredited]); Michael Higgins (Paul); Elizabeth MacRae (Meredith); Teri Garr (Amy); Harrison Ford (Martin Stett); Mark Wheeler (Receptionist); Robert Shields (The Mime); Phoebe Alexander (Lurleen); Timothy Carey (uncredited).

Awards: British Academy Awards (BAFTA) for Best Editing (Murch, Chew) and Best Soundtrack (Rochester, Boxer, Evoe, Murch), 1974; Cannes Film Festival Best Film, 1974; National Board of Review Awards for Best English-Language Film, Best Director, and Best Actor (Hackman), 1974; National Society of Film Critics Award for Best Director, 1974.

Publications:

Script:

Coppola, Francis Ford, "The Conversation: Original Screenplay by Francis Ford Coppola Final Draft November 22, 1972," in Film Scheduling, Film Budgeting Workbook by Ralph S. Singleton, Beverly Hills, California, 1984; republished in Scenario, vol. 5, no. 1, 1999.

Books:

- Johnson, Robert K., Francis Ford Coppola, Boston, 1977.
- Pye, Michael, and Lynda Myles, The Movie Brats: How the Film Generation Took Over Hollywood, London, 1979.
- Kolker, Robert Philip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.
- Chaillet, Jean-Paul, and Elizabeth Vincent, Francis Ford Coppola, Paris, 1984.
- Zuker, Joel S., Francis Ford Coppola: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.
- Frundt, Bodo, and others, Francis Ford Coppola, Munich, 1985.
- Ray, Robert B., A Certain Tendency of the Hollywood Cinema 1930–80, Princeton, 1985.
- Chown, Jeffrey, Hollywood Auteur: Francis Coppola, New York, 1987.
- Cowie, Peter, Coppola, London, 1989.
- Bergan, Ronald, Francis Ford Coppola-Close Up: The Making of His Movies, New York, 1998.

Articles:

- De Palma, Brian, "The Making of The Conversation: An Interview with Francis Ford Coppola," in Filmmakers Monthly/Newsletter, vol. 7, no. 7, May 1974.
- Denby, David, "Stolen Privacy: Coppola's The Conversation," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 43, no. 3, Summer 1974.
- Palmer, J.W., "The Conversation: Coppola's Biography of an Unborn Man," in Film Heritage, vol. 12, no. 1, Fall 1976.

The Conversation

“America’s Culture Is Controlled by Cynical Middlemen,” an interview with Francis Ford Coppola, in U.S. News and World Report, 5 April 1982.

Turner, D., “The Subject of the Conversation,” in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 24, no. 4, Summer 1985.

Anderson, C., “The Conversation as Exemplar and Critique of Sound Technology,” in Post Script (Commerce, Texas), vol. 6, no. 3, Spring-Summer 1987.

Cockburn, A., and Adam Barker, “John and Oliver’s Bogus Adventure: Cries and Whispers,” in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 1, no. 10, February 1992.

Atkinson, M., “Role Models,” in Movieline (Escondido), vol. 4, July 1993.

“Classic Scene,” in Premiere (Boulder, Colorado), vol. 13, no. 7, March 2000.

* * *

The early 1970s were Hollywood’s era of the Cinema of Paranoia. In those edgy post-Watergate years, with the shots that killed the Kennedy brothers, Martin Luther King, and Malcolm X still echoing from the previous decade, the idea of a vast malign conspiracy behind the scenes, manipulating events and eliminating awkward witnesses, seemed all too plausible. Films such as Alan Pakula’s The Parallax View and All the President’s Men, Arthur Penn’s Night Moves and Sydney Pollack’s Three Days of the Condor fed off these anxieties—and also latched on to a growing disquiet about the threat to individual liberty from increasingly sophisticated surveillance techniques. No one and nowhere, it seemed, was safe from intrusion, and personal privacy might soon be obsolete.

Most of these paranoia films adopt the outsider viewpoint, inviting us to identify with the individual conspired against and spied on. The Conversation goes one better. Coppola’s film takes as its protagonist one of the perpetrators of this sinister activity, and explores its corrosive effect on him as well as on the society he preys on. And in the end the machine devours its own: the bugger, punished for a momentary deviation into human feeling, becomes the bugged.

Having chosen such an unsavory figure as his hero, Coppola perversely seems to go out of his way to alienate us yet further. Harry Caul (a performance of clenched introspection by Gene Hackman) has no friends, rejects all attempts at intimacy, denies feeling any kind of personal emotion. Even his name—the result, apparently, of a typist's inspired misspelling of "Cal"—suggests something hooded, veiled against the world; he wears a cheap grey see-through raincoat, and Coppola often shoots him through semitransparent screens. Achingly secretive, Harry can barely even bring himself to confess to a priest, even though he's a devout Catholic; as he kneels in the confessional, the words appear to be dragged in pain from his mouth. "I don't know anything about human nature," he snaps at his assistant, as if the very suggestion were an insult. Regarded in his sleazy profession as "the best bugger on the West Coast," his sole concern—or so he claims—is to get "a nice fat recording" that he can hand over to his client.

It's this recording that we see Harry securing in the film's opening sequence, a conversation between a man and woman in a busy public place (Union Square in San Francisco). This scene, a virtuoso piece of film-making in itself, will be endlessly played and replayed throughout the film, in full or in brief snatches, sometimes with pictures, sometimes just on tape or re-echoing in Harry's mind, as its various levels of meaning are gradually teased out. (This examining and re-examining, the compulsive search for hidden significance, carries resonances of two key pieces of footage from the 1960s: the Zapruder film of JFK's killing, and the park photographs from Antonioni's Blow-Up.) Finally, the crucial element that eludes Harry's ear until it's too late proves to be a tiny shift in emphasis: not "He'd kill us if he got the chance," but "He'd kill us. . . ."

The Conversation is a fiercely moral work. According to Coppola, what he had thought would be a film about privacy became instead one about responsibility. Once before, we learn from predatory rival snoop Bernie Moran, one of Harry's operations led to the killing of an innocent woman and child. Since then Harry has retreated into perfecting his own technical virtuosity, repeating like a mantra that he's "not responsible" for what his clients do with the recordings he gives them. Disused, his moral power has atrophied, and even when he finally decides to get involved he can do nothing to prevent another killing. In a dream sequence, Harry finds himself telling the supposed victim how he was paralyzed as a child (a memory drawn from Coppola's own childhood) as if to excuse his present moral paralysis. Skulking in a clinically impersonal hotel room, hands over his ears to block out the screams coming through the wall, Harry is locked into his own cold, impotent nightmare. The bathroom sequence that follows may be his dream too, but it's no less horrific for that.

In the film's final shot Harry sits amid the ruins of his devastated apartment, ripped apart in his vain search for the bug planted there. Not even a statue of the Virgin Mary has escaped destruction, and he sits playing his sole remaining intact possession, a tenor sax. In his book on Coppola, Peter Cowie finds in this shot "a mood of tolerance and devotion. Harry is absolved . . . free." But the image seems equally to express utter, irretrievable desolation. With the technology he lived by turned against him, Harry's life is over; spiritually and morally he's dead already, alone in a grey featureless hell of his own making.

Coppola made The Conversation between The Godfather Parts I and II, and its sombre, melancholy tone and subdued visual palette comes as a striking contrast to the narrative and pictorial gusto of the Mafia saga. Having finished shooting, the director went straight into pre-production on Godfather II, leaving Walter Murch to spend nearly a year working largely unsupervised on the visual and sound editing of The Conversation. For the subtlety of his achievement, especially on the all-important sound mix, Murch can justifiably be credited (as Cowie suggests) as the film's co-creator.

—Philip Kemp

LA COQUILLE ET LE CLERGYMAN

(The Seashell and the Clergyman)

France, 1928

Director: Germaine Dulac

Production: Delia Film (Dulac's company) may have produced it, but there is no concrete evidence to that fact; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: 42 minutes, some sources list 38 minutes. Released 9 February 1928. Filmed at Studio de Ursulines in Paris.

Scenario: Antonin Artaud, revised by Germaine Dulac; photography: Paul Guichard; editor: Paul Parguel; assistant editor: Louis Ronjat.

Cast: Alex Allin (Priest); Bataille (Officer); Gerica Athanasiou (Woman).

Publications

Script:

Artaud, Antonin, La Coquille et le clergyman, in Nouvelle Revue Française (Paris), November 1927.

Books:

Curtis, David, Experimental Cinema, London, 1971.
 Matthews, J. H., Surrealism and Film, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1971.
 Lawder, Standish D., The Cubist Cinema, New York, 1975.
 Le Grice, Malcolm, Abstract Film and Beyond, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1977.
 Heck-Rabi, Louise, Women Filmmakers: A Critical Reception, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.

Articles:

Dulac, Germaine, "Sur le cinéma visuel," in Le Rouge et le noir (Paris), July 1928.
 Dulac, Germaine, "Jouer avec les bruits," in Cinéma—Ciné pour tous (Paris), 15 August 1929.
 Ford, Charles, "Germaine Dulac," in Anthologie du Cinéma 31 (Paris), January 1968.
 Cornwell, Regina, "Maya Deren and Germaine Dulac: Activists of the Avant-Garde," in Film Library Quarterly (New York), Winter 1971–72.
 Van Wert, W., "Germaine Dulac: First Feminist Filmmaker," in Women and Film (Santa Monica, California), vol. 1, nos. 5–6, 1974.
 Dozoretz, Wendy, "Dulac vs. Artaud," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 1, 1979.

Travelling (Lausanne), Summer 1979.

Greene, N., "Artaud and Film: A Reconsideration," in Cinema Journal (Champaign, Illinois), Summer 1984.

Flitterman, Sandy, "Theorizing the Feminine: Women as the Figure of Desire in The Seashell and the Clergyman," in Wide Angle, (Athens, Ohio), vol. 6, no. 3, 1984.

Kolisnyk, M. H., "Surrealism, Surreptition: Artaud's Doubles," in October (Cambridge, Massachusetts), Spring 1993.

Reck, H.U., "Dunkle Erkundungen einer verstummenden Echos," in Cinema (Switzerland), vol. 39, 1993.

Fotiade, R., "The Untamed Eye: Surrealism and Film Theory," in Screen (Oxford), vol. 36, no. 4, 1995.

* * *

La Coquille et le clergyman may now be regarded as the first Surrealist film, released a year before Buñuel and Dalí's Un Chien andalou, which contains the image of an eye sliced by a razor. In Coquille, Germaine Dulac used trick photography to create the effect of an officer's head being split in half. The films share other Surrealist devices as well.

Antonin Artaud wrote the scenario, and wanted to act the role of the priest, though he did not initially want to direct the film. He subsequently seems to have changed his mind, writing to Dulac of his annoyance that the shooting and editing of La Coquille were done without him. Dulac had revised his scenario, casting Alex Allin in the priest's role. The film represents the subconscious sexual cravings of the priest, and is set in dreamlike environments. In one notorious scene the priest is shown masturbating. In another, the priest encounters the frightening ghost of a woman in a ballroom. He runs away, pulling up the skirts of his cassock, which lengthens and stretches away like a tail behind him. The clergyman and the woman run through darkness, their progress marked by visions of the woman in varying forms, once with her tongue sticking out, another time with her cheek ballooning outward.

It is believed that Artaud was particularly infuriated by a scene in which the priest, wearing a frock coat, is in a wine cellar. He empties an array of glasses of red wine, then shatters all of them. With no transition, he is next seen crawling on his hands and knees in a Paris street.

Artaud criticized Dulac for softening the lean strength of his script. When Dulac premiered La Coquille as "a dream of Antonin Artaud," he denounced the film. According to Wendy Dozoretz, in her article in Wide Angle, it was André Breton who yelled out, as the film's credits appeared on the screen, "Mme. Dulac is a cow." Led by Artaud, critic Georges Sadoul, novelist Louis Aragon and others stopped the film projector, threw objects at the screen and walked out in protest, leaving a bewildered audience behind. In Dozoretz's words, La Coquille was "the unique product of two incongruous minds."

Certain contemporary critics contend that Artaud's scenario was superior to Dulac's interpretation. David Curtis in Experimental Cinema faults Dulac's pictorial conceptions as oversimplified, and her editing as too well measured, subtracting from Artaud's visions. J. H. Matthews in Surrealism and Film affirms that Dulac did not comprehend Artaud's artistic intentions, and did distort his script. "She did not succeed altogether in emptying Artaud's scenario of Surrealist content. For this reason alone, her Coquille deserves mention among the first Surrealist films"

Dozoretz admits that the feminist Dulac's direction of the film could have resulted in misinterpretation of Artaud's misogynistic scenario. However, the optical tricks that Dulac used were those specified. As for Artaud's charge that Dulac "feminized" his script, Dozoretz agrees that Dulac probably did weaken the brutality of Artaud's vision.

The fact that La Coquille is presently well-known and often shown is owed to Henri Langlois, former head of the Cinémathèque française, who rediscovered it after decades of oblivion. La Coquille has aged gracefully, its potency intact, secure in its deserved niche as a classic of Surrealist cinema.

—Louise Heck-Rabi

THE CRANES ARE FLYING

See LETYAT ZHURAVLI

CRIA CUERVOS . . .

Spain, 1976

Director: Carlos Saura

Production: Elías Querejeta Production Company (Madrid); Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 112 minutes; length: 2740 meters. Released Cannes Film Festival, 1976. Filmed in Madrid.

Producer: Elías Querejeta; screenplay: Carlos Saura; photography: Teodoro Escamilla; editor: Pablo del Amo; sound engineer: Bernardo Menz; production designer: Rafael Palmero; music: Federico Mompou and Valverde Leon Y Quiroga; costume designer: Maiki-Marin.

Cast: Ana Torrent (Ana); Conchita Pérez (Irene); Mayte Sánchez (Juana); Geraldine Chaplin (Ana, Madre-Mujer); Mónica Randall (Paulina); Florinda Chico (Rosa); Héctor Alterio (Anselmo); Germán Cobos (Nicolás); Mirta Miller (Amelia); Josefina Díaz (Abuela).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Special Jury Prize, 1976.

Publications

Script:

Saura, Carlos, Cría cuervos, Madrid, 1976.

Books:

Brasó, Enrique, Carlos Saura, Madrid, 1974.

Galan, Diego, Venturas y desventuras de la prima Angélica, Valencia, 1974.

- Gubern, Roman, Homenaje a Carlos Saura, Huelva, 1979.
 Hopewell, John, Out of the Past: Spanish Cinema after Franco, London, 1987.
 Borin, Fabrizio, Carlos Saura, Firenze, 1990.
 D'Lugo, Marvin, The Films of Carlos Saura: The Practice of Seeing, Princeton, New Jersey, 1991.

Articles:

- Maraval, P., in Cinématographe (Paris), Summer 1976.
 Bracourt, G., and others, in Ecran (Paris), July 1976.
 Cluny, C. M., in Cinéma (Paris), July 1976.
 Duval, R., "Pleurons, pleurons, c'est le plaisir des dieux," in Ecran (Paris), September 1976.
 Berube, R.C., in Séquences (Montreal), April 1977.
 Brasó, Enrique, "Entretien avec Carlos Saura," in Positif (Paris), June 1977.
 Alemanno, R., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), July-August 1977.
 Aitken, W., in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1977.
 Maillet, D., "Carlos Saura," in Cinématographe (Paris), July-August 1977.
 Bodeen, DeWitt, in Films in Review (New York), October 1977.
 Pauks, I., in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), October 1977.
 Foll, J., in Film a Doba (Prague), July 1978.
 Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1978.
 Puelleine, Tim, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1978.
 "Saura Section" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 October 1978.
 Interview with Carlos Saura, in Film und Fernsehen (East Berlin), no. 3, 1979.
 Kinder, Marsha, "Carlos Saura: The Political Development of Individual Consciousness," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), no. 3, 1979.
 Schnelle, J., in Medien und Erziehung (Munich), no. 2, 1979.
 Frias, I.L., in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), no. 70, 1979.
 D'Lugo, Martin, "Carlos Saura: Constructive Imagination in Post-Franco Cinema," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (New York), Spring 1983.
 Insdorf, A., "Sonar con tus ojos: Carlos Saura's Melodic Cinema," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (New York), Spring 1983.
 Schwartz, Ronald, "Carlos Saura," in Spanish Film Directors (1950-1985): 21 Profiles, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1986.
 "Un regista fra divieto e sogno," in Castoro Cinema (Florence), July-August 1989.
Télérama (Paris), no. 2352, 8 February 1995.

* * *

Like Victor Erice's The Spirit of the Beehive, Cria Cuervos stars the remarkable Ana Torrent and can be read, on one level at least, as a none-too-veiled parable about the stifling and oppressive climate of Franco's Spain. Although it is by no means immediately apparent, the film is really one long flashback, which itself contains flashbacks and fantasy sequences, from 1995 when Ana, a young Spanish woman, looks back to her childhood, and especially to the summer of 1975 in Madrid. In particular she remembers the death of her mother, Maria, from cancer; the death of her father, Anselmo, as he is making love to Amelia, the wife of his friend and fellow army officer Nicolás, although at the time Ana believed that she had poisoned him for ill treating her mother; the arrival of Anselmo's sister-in-law Paulina at the house after his death in order to look after Ana and her two sisters; the way in which she imagined that her mother and father re-appeared to her; her crippled and mute grandmother Abuela (to whom Ana offers her "poison" as a means out of her predicament); and Paulina's affair with Nicolás. Ana's discovery of this results in a contretemps with Paulina, as a result of which Ana tries (unsuccessfully of course) to poison her.

The film's title refers to the Spanish saying "raise ravens and they'll peck out your eyes." On the most obvious level this refers to Ana's rebellion against her upbringing, which takes its most potent form in her "poisoning" of her father and substitute mother. Significantly her father was a member of the División Azul, a Spanish volunteer force which fought for the Nazis in World War II, who, in the scenes with his long-suffering wife, comes across as the typical Francoist patriarch ("I am what I am" and so on) while the household in general typifies the traditional middle classes who were the bulwark of Francoism and who were distinguished, as one commentator has put it, by their "Catholicism, an abundance of children, sexual hypocrisies, a rigid ethic, ritualised, conventional boredom." At the end of the film Ana and her sisters leave the claustrophobic, somewhat febrile domestic interiors in which the bulk of the action takes place and set off for school down the noisy street; the effect is decidedly refreshing and liberating, an impression only heightened by Saura's use of a long tracking shot, and puts one in mind of the director's remark when making Cria Cuervos that "Francoism was dead before Franco died."

This being a Saura film, however, the political elements exist side by side with distinctly Freudian ones, and the parallels with Buñuel (one of the director's great heroes) are readily apparent. It is not simply the fact that the film clearly links sexual repression and political oppression, or the way in which fantasy and memory are granted the same representational status as scenes from everyday "reality." But, more specifically, it is the manner in which Cria Cuervos relates to Freud's ideas about the "family romance." In particular it works a whole series of variations on the "substitute parents" syndrome in which, according to Freud, "the child's imagination becomes engaged in the task of getting free from parents of whom he now has a low opinion and of replacing them by others, who, as a rule, are of higher social standing." Beginning with as striking a staging of the "primal scene" as one could wish for (with Ana listening to Amelia and her father making love) the film then continues via Ana's relationships with various substitute mothers (Paulina obviously, but also Abuela and even Rosa the maid, from whom Ana learns something about sexuality), the sisters' games in which they act out their previous family situation (with Ana playing her mother but significantly calling herself, and being called by her sister Irene, Amelia), and climaxing in Paulina reworking the opening adultery scene by being discovered by Ana passionately kissing Nicolás, Amelia's husband. This process of displacement, by which one character comes to represent or stand in for another, also finds its expression in the fact that both Maria and the adult Ana are played by the same actress, Geraldine Chaplin. As Marsha Kinder has pointed out, this doubling (which has its parallel in Peppermint Frappé, incidentally) leaves one "uncertain as to whether the cherished image of the mother has shaped the development of the daughter, or whether Ana's own image has been superimposed over that of the absentee." Seen in this light Ana's attempts at "poisoning" are not actual deeds directed at real people but, rather, imaginary elements in her family romance, akin to her ability to conjure up her dead parents, or to the symbolic “death” which awaits those who are caught in the hide-and-seek game which the sisters play.

Cria Cuervos has been much admired for its portrayal of the world of childhood, and nowhere is it more successful in this respect than in its evocation of the fluidity of the child’s sense of the real and the imaginary, thanks to which death is largely devoid of the terrors which it inspires in adults.

—Sylvia Paskin

CRIES AND WHISPERS

See VISKNINGAR OCH ROP

LE CRIME DE MONSIEUR LANGE

(The Crime of Monsieur Lange)

France, 1936

Director: Jean Renoir

Production: Obéron; black and white, 35mm; running time: about 2 hours. Released 24 January 1936, Paris. Filmed October–November 1935 in Billancourt studios, exteriors shot in and around Paris.

Le Crime de Monsieur Lange

Screenplay: Jacques Prévert and Jean Renoir, from an idea by Jean Castanier; photography: Jean Bachelet; editor: Marguerite Renoir; sound: Guy Moreau, Louis Bogé, Roger Loisel, and Robert Tesseire; production designers: Jean Castanier and Robert Gys assisted by Roger Blin; art director: Marcel Blondeau; music: Jean Wiener; still photography: Dora Maar.

Cast: Jules Berry (Paul Batala); René Lefèvre (Amédée Lange); Florelle (Valentine Cardès); Nadia Sibirskaia (Estelle); Sylvia Bataille (Edith); Henri Guisol (Meunier’s son); Marcel Leveseque (Landlord); Odette Talazac (Landlady); Maurice Baquet (Landlord’s son); Jacques Brunius (Baigneur); Marcel Duhamel (Foreman); Jean Dasté (Dick); Paul Grimault (Louis); Guy Decombe, Henri Saint-Isles, and Fabien Loris (Workers at the publishing house); Claire Gérard (Prostitute); Edmond Beauchamp (Priest on the train); Sylvain Itkine (Inspector Julian); René Génin (Client); Janine Loris (Worker); with Jean Brémand, Pierre Huchet, Charbonnier and Marcel Lupovici, Michel Duran, and Dora Maar.

Publications

Books:

- Davay, Paul, Jean Renoir, Brussels, 1957.
 Cauliez, Armand-Jean, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1962.
 Chardère, Bernard, editor, Jean Renoir, in Premier Plan (Lyons), nos. 22–24, May 1962.
Analyses des films de Jean Renoir, Paris, 1966.
 Bennett, Susan, Jean Renoir, London, 1967.
 Poulle, François, Renoir 1938; ou, Jean Renoir pour rein: Enquête sur un cinéaste, Paris, 1969.
 Leprohon, Pierre, Jean Renoir, New York, 1971.
 Cuenca, Carlos, Humanidad de Jean Renoir, Valladolid, 1971.
 Braudy, Leo, Jean Renoir: The World of His Films, New York, 1972.
 Bazin, André, Jean Renoir, edited by François Truffaut, Paris, 1973.
 Durnat, Raymond, Jean Renoir, Berkeley, 1974.
 Beylie, Claude, Jean Renoir: Le Spectacle, la vie, Paris, 1975.
 Renoir, Jean, Essays, Conversations, Reviews, edited by Penelope Gilliatt, New York, 1975.
 Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946, Volume 1: The Great Tradition, New York, 1976.
 Faulkner, Christopher, Jean Renoir: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
 Sesonke, Alexander, Jean Renoir: The French Films 1924–1939, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1980.
 Gautier, Claude, Jean Renoir: Oeuvres de cinéma inédites, Paris, 1981.
 McBride, Joseph, editor, Filmmakers on Filmmaking 2, Los Angeles, 1983.
 Serceau, Daniel, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1985.
 Bertin, Celia, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1986.
 Faulkner, Christopher, The Social Cinema of Jean Renoir, Princeton, New Jersey, 1986.
 Vincendeau, Ginette, and Keith Reader, La Vie est à nous: French Cinema of the Popular Front 1935–1938, London, 1986.
 Viry-Babel, Roger, Jean Renoir: Le Jeu et la règle, Paris, 1986.

- Bessy, Maurice, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1989.
 Renoir, Jean, My Life & My Films, New York, 1991.
 Bergan, Ronald, Jean Renoir: Projections of Paradise, New York, 1994.
 Renoir, Jean, Letters: Jean Renoir, New York, 1995.
 Renoir, Jean, An Interview: Jean Renoir, Los Angeles, 1998.

Articles:

- “Renoir Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1952.
 “Renoir Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Christmas 1957.
 Sadoul, Georges, “The Renaissance of the French Cinema—Feyder, Renoir, Duvivier, Carné,” in Film: An Anthology, edited by Daniel Talbot, New York, 1959.
 Belanger, Jean, “Why Renoir Favors Multiple Camera, Long Sustained Take Technique,” in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), March 1960.
 Dyer, Peter, “Renoir and Realism” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1960.
 Whitehall, Richard, in Films and Filming (London), June and July 1960.
 Fofi, Goffredo, “The Cinema of the Popular Front in France,” in Screen (London), Winter 1972–73.
 Klinger, B., “Renoir’s Crime de Monsieur Lange: Visual Environments,” in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 2, 1979.
 Strebel, Elizabeth Grottle, “A Reconsideration of Renoir’s Film,” in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1979–80.
 Horton, A., “Alain Tanner’s Jonah: Echoes of Renoir’s M. Lange,” in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Spring 1980.
 Pappas, P., in Cineaste (New York), Summer 1980.
 Strebel, Elizabeth Grottle, “Jean Renoir and the Popular Front,” in Feature Films as History, edited by K. R. M. Short, London, 1981.
 Beylie, Claude, “Le Cinéma face au front populaire,” in Cinéma (Paris), 4 June 1986.
 Bush, L., “Feminine Narrative and the Law in Renoir’s Le Crime de M. Lange,” in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), no. 1, 1989.
 Poague, L., “Figures of Narration in Le Crime de Monsieur Lange,” in New Orleans Review, no. 2, 1990.
 Simon, C., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 482, July–August 1994.
 Faulkner, C., “Affective Identities: French National Cinema and the 1930s,” in Canadian Journal of Film Studies (Ottawa), no. 2, 1994.
Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 17, March 1995.
 Tift, Stephen, “The Cinematic Space of the French Popular Front,” in Persistence of Vision (Maspeth), no. 12–13, 1996.

* * *

For nearly three decades Jean Renoir’s Le Crime de Monsieur Lange was a film which failed to garner the recognition it so richly deserved. At the time of its release, it was received indifferently and suffered the vicissitudes of political censorship. It was not until 1964 that the film enjoyed a U.S. release, and belatedly earned its reputation as a pivotal work in Renoir’s career.

Le Crime de Monsieur Lange is the film which solidified Renoir’s political reputation as the film director of the left. In sympathy with France’s Popular Front, this film was Renoir’s statement that the ordinary working man, through united action, can overcome the tyranny of fascism. Renoir’s films were always imbued with a humanism and love for all mankind. With this film he uses a small group of Parisian workers, their families and neighbors, as a microcosm for the French common man.

Lange, played by René Lefèvre, is the author of a western pulp fiction series entitled Arizona Jim. When Batala (played magnificently by the great Jules Berry), the head of the nearly bankrupt publishing company, absconds with the company funds, Lange organizes a “cooperative” with the help of the other employees. Their venture is so successful it prompts the scoundrel publisher to return in the guise of a priest and reap the monetary rewards of the cooperative. In a brave and mandatory move, the naive and humble Lange kills the publisher to prevent the destruction of their venture. Lange and his girlfriend flee the country, are caught by border guards, but allowed to go free when the girl explains the details of Lange’s crime.

The script of Monsieur Lange was written by Jacques Prévert from an idea by Renoir and Jean Castanier. As with all Renoir films, the script was simply a starting point around which Renoir composed his films. To emphasize the sense of community, Renoir centers all the action on the courtyard which surrounds the publishing firm as well as the homes of the workers. Thus the courtyard becomes an integral part of Renoir’s mise-en-scene, as much a character in the film as any of the actors, representing a united world which in turn evokes Renoir’s philosophical aspirations for all mankind. Renoir is thus able to demonstrate the importance of the interaction of his characters for the benefit of all. The beginning of the film is devoted mostly to scenes of characters one-on-one, emphasizing the lack of any central goal. When Lange begins his efforts to form the cooperative, Renoir shifts his scenes to those of group relationships. Throughout, he uses his extraordinarily fluid and cyclical camera movements to create a unity of both time and purpose.

While Monsieur Lange is both an intriguing story of crime and an exercise in black humor, the film encompasses much more. It is an attack on class superiority and prejudice, an attack on the church, and although Lange does commit murder, it is a crime of poetic justice exonerated by the victim’s avarice and the altruism of Lange’s goal. Despite its indifferent reception at its release, Le Crime de Monsieur Lange is today regarded as one of Renoir’s best films and one which significantly captures the social consciousness of the day.

—Ronald Bowers

CRISTO SI E FERMATO A EBOLI

(Christ Stopped at Eboli)

Italy-France-Denmark, 1979

Director: Francesco Rosi

Production: Vides Cinematografica, Radiotelevisione Italiana, Action Films, Société Nouvelle des Etablissements; colour, Technoscope; running time: 155 minutes. Filmed in Matera, Craco, Rome, 1978.

Producers: Franco Cristaldi, Nicola Carraro; associate producers: Yves Gasser, Yves Peyrot; screenplay: Francesco Rosi, Tonino

Cristo si è fermato a Eboli

Guerra, Raffaele LaCapria, based on the original book by Carlo Levi; assistant director: Gianni Arduini; photography: Pasqualino DeSantis; editor: Ruggero Mastroianni; art director: Andrea Crisanti; music: Piero Piccioni; sound: Mario Bramonti, Mario Maldesi, Gianni D'Amico, Renato Marinelli.

Cast: Gian Maria Volonté (Carlo Levi); Paolo Bonaccelli (Don Luigino); Alain Cuny (Baron Rotunno); Lea Massari (Luisa Levi); Irene Papas (Giulia Venere); Francois Simon (Don Trajella); Luigi Infantino (Chauffeur); Accursio DeLeo (Carpenter); Francesco Callari (Dr. Gibilisco); Vincenzo Vitale (Dr. Milillo); Antonio Alocca (Don Cosimino).

Publications

Script:

Levi, Carlo, Christ Stopped at Eboli, translated by Frances Frenaye, Middlesex, 1982.

Books:

- Tassone, Aldo, Le cinéma italien parle, Paris, 1982.
 Michalczyk, J.J., The Italian Political Film-makers, London/Toronto, 1986.
 Marcus, Millicent, Italian Film in the Light of Neorealism, Princeton, New Jersey, 1986.
 Ciment, Michel, Le dossier Rosi, Paris 1987.

Articles:

- Mitchell, T., Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1978.
 Ciment, M., Positif (Paris), February 1979.
Variety (New York), 21 March 1979.
 Tournes, A., Jeune Cinéma (Paris), June 1979.
 Peruzzi, G., Cinema Nuovo (Bari), June 1979.
 Gili, J.A., "Levi, Rosi, Eboli" in Ecran (Paris), September 1979.
 Fox, J., Films and Filming (London), January 1980.
 Grelier, R., Image et Son (Paris), May 1980.
 Legrand, G., and M. Sineux, "Là-bas et maintenant autrefois et non loin" in Positif (Paris), May 1980.

Magny, J., Cinéma (Paris), June 1980.
 Berube, R.C., Séquences (Montreal), January 1981.
 Hibbin, S., Films and Filming (London), June 1982.
 Ranvaud, D., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1982.
 Rashish, P., Stills (London), Winter 1982.
 Crowdus, G., "Francesco Rosi: Italy's Postmodern Neorealist," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 4, 1994.
 Cieutat, M., "Des Christ par centaines," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), no. 80, 1996.
Castoro Cinema (Milan), March 1998.

* * *

One of Francesco Rosi's finest films, Christ Stopped at Eboli is based on the book by Carlo Levi in which the author recalls the time when, in 1935, because of his opposition to Fascism in general and the Abyssinian War in particular, he was sent into internal exile in the village of Gagliano in Lucania, an extremely remote province of southern Italy. It's extremely easy, especially for a non-Italian audience, to misunderstand the title, whose import is that Christ stopped short of Gagliano. To quote Levi himself: "Christ never came this far, nor did time, nor the individual soul, nor hope, nor the relation of cause to effect, nor reason, nor history. None of the pioneers of Western civilization brought here his sense of the passage of time, his deification of the State or that ceaseless activity which feeds upon itself. No one has come to this land except as an enemy, a conqueror, or a visitor devoid of understanding."

Rosi had been interested in filming Levi's book since the early 1960s, and it's easy to see why, given the centrality of the "Southern [Italy] problem" to the entirety of his oeuvre, and to Italy's on-going crises. Rosi himself is from the South, and had also worked as Visconti's assistant on his Southern drama La terra trema. But whereas in the early days, he has explained, he would have filmed it "from a perspective much closer to neo-realism, impressed by the misery, the illnesses, the backwardness of the peasants in an underdeveloped region abandoned by all, even by Christ, I think today my point of view is different. It's no longer a question of only these problems, but especially of marginalisation." Furthermore, he became more interested in the mutual encounter of a Northern intellectual and the Southern peasantry, and especially in the way in which Carlo's plunge into a totally alien existence enables him to "journey into his own consciousness."

Rosi establishes the marginalisation of Gagliano right from the start by the train, bus and car journeys which Carlo has to make in order to get there in the first place. After that, Rosi combines frequent panning shots of the bleak Lucanian landscape with much tighter shots of Gagliano's town square and of the interiors of its dwellings. The sensation is of a stifling, suffocating community lost in the vastness of an alien landscape, a feeling at once agoraphobic and claustrophobic. Rosi's alternating perspectives recall the early scene in the book in which Carlo meditates on the town's petty bourgeoisie: "their passions, it was plain to see, were not rooted in history; they did not extend beyond the village, encircled by malaria-ridden clay; they were multiplied within the enclosure of half a dozen houses . . . . Pinned up in petty souls and desolate surroundings, they seethed like the steam pressing against the lid of the widow's saucepan where a thin broth was whistling and grumbling over a low wood fire. I looked into the fire, thinking of the endless chain of days that lay ahead of me when my horizon, too, would be bounded by these dark emotions."

Gagliano may be physically isolated and remote, but thanks to an astute use of radio broadcasts, the exploits of the fascist regime are never far from mind. On Carlo's first day he is walking through the streets when he hears a speech by the Italian aviator De Pinedo about the onward march of Italian civilization under fascism, blaring from a radio. Not only does the radio belong to a former emigrant to America who has returned home (thereby underlining peasant culture's imperviousness to ideas about progress) but Rosi makes sure that we are aware of the almost timeless nature of the primitive streets over which De Pinedo's hectorings are drifting. Another example of Gagliano's utter isolation from the rest of Mussolini's Italy is provided by the film's most famous and virtuoso sequence: the three-minute pan over the peasants tilling the fields whilst the speakers in the square blare out the dictator boasting of the conquest of Addis Ababa and the end of the war. As Don Ranvaud has put it, this scene is a "powerful statement of the total remoteness of the villagers from any notion of the State and the identification of one savaged people with another. Rome is a meaningless voice expressing meaningless concepts; the only reality in Lucania is the landscape or the promise of New York's Little Italy." Or, in other words, things are no worse (or better) under Fascism than under any other sort of regime, all are remote, alien agents of oppression.

Rosi is careful, however, not to make his film an exercise in miserabilism and pauperism. What interests him most, here, is the meeting of two cultures, that of Carlo and that of the peasants. Indeed, Carlo's encounter with the peasantry is not unlike Rosi's own, for although he, unlike Carlo, is himself a Southerner, both are urban intellectuals and hence almost equally far removed from the life of the peasantry. As Rosi put it: "travelling through the places where Levi discovered a new world, confirms a Gramsci-like optimism, a belief in a better future for men and women who are endowed with an exceptional humanity. But one aspect I want to bring out in the film is that even the best of bourgeois intellectuals and artists, like Levi, who are quite happy to live amongst these people, with whom they feel a real brotherhood, end up leaving them to it. I had the same experience with La terra trema. . . . Which means that Levi in the film is a bit like me. The film is an encounter between a bourgeois intellectual representing a refined Northern culture and a completely different, distant world, the world of the peasant in one of the most neglected regions of the South. It's not only a journey into humanity, but also into nature, objects, lights, shadows, sounds, animals, inside people's houses a journey into the minds and eyes and consciousness of the people." Carlo's horizons, then, turn out not to be bounded, as he feared, but considerably broadened, and his inner life becomes as freed as his physical life is geographically restricted.

What we don't have here, fortunately, is a mythologisation of the peasantry in the Pasolini mode. As Millicent Marcus has put it in a particularly perceptive analysis of the film: "It would be easy for Rosi to sensationalise the strangeness and savagery of peasant existence under the pretext of educating his protected middle-class public. But to do so would be to burst uninvited into that closed world, to profane the mystery, and to violate that otherness which Rosi, following Levi's lead, so deeply respects. When he finally does coax us into the realm of peasant thought, it is through a slow and gentle motion of understanding, and not through a shocking leap into anthropological difference."

This process begins, strikingly, on the long journey to Gagliano, and continues with the film's gradual accommodation to the natural rhythms of the peasants' routines and of village life in general. As

Marcus notes: "As Carlo abandons his modern, urban perspective and enters into a very different mentality, so we too are urged to abandon our conventional cinematic expectations of pacing and density of action, to embrace this slow, meditative technique that simulates, on the level of style, the very world it represents." By the end of this process we, like Carlo, may come to realise that, although Christ may have stopped at Eboli, Gagliano is not a godforsaken hole but simply somewhere very different from what we are accustomed to. This process involves "a recognition of the contingency and arbitrariness of our own perceptual modes and the acceptance of equally valid alternative world views."

Rosi's film, like Levi's book, is set in the 1930s, but its subject matter is as relevant today as ever. Gagliano's troglodytes may have been rehoused, but the South remains as poor as ever, and is increasingly the object of northern hostility, and even separatist threats. As Rosi himself has put it, the peasants now have been "dispossessed of their culture by the arrival of a new one, via the mass media and TV which has superimposed itself on their own ancient culture. The peasants, surrounded by motorways and TV, see the evidence in the pollution and despoliation of their own culture without being able to reap any of the benefits. This land is no longer isolated physically, but there is perhaps an even more cruel marginalisation in the extent to which the South of Italy has undergone in a traumatic fashion the arrival of the consumer society without this being accompanied by a parallel evolution of other aspects of life. The South has been emptied of its workforce. In Levi's time men went to work in America, but in less great numbers than they go today to the North of Italy, to Switzerland and to Germany. Villages which numbered 3000 inhabitants ten years ago now have 1200. Young people no longer want to work the land, because they've got qualifications and they'd feel it degrading to bring in the harvest." And now, European recessions and cut-backs in heavy industries have made it much more difficult to find work outside the South. The problem of the two Italies is even more acute today than when the film was made.

In conclusion, it should be pointed out that Christ Stopped at Eboli exists in two versions, as a feature film and as a four-part series made for television lasting around four hours. Both carry Rosi's imprimatur, but the longer one is preferable, particularly given Rosi's above-mentioned attention to matters of pacing.

—Julian Petley

CROSSFIRE

USA, 1947

Director: Edward Dmytryk

Production: RKO Radio Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 86 minutes. Released 22 July 1947. Filming completed 28 March 1947 in RKO studios.

Crossfire

Producer: Adrian Scott; executive producer: Dore Schary; screenplay: John Paxton, from the novel The Brick Foxhole by Richard Brooks; photography: Roy Hunt; editor: Harry Gerstad; sound: John E. Tribby and Clem Portman; art directors: Albert D'Agostino and Alfred Herbert; music: Roy Webb; music direction: Constantin Bakaleinikoff; special effects: Russell A. Cully.

Cast: Robert Young (Finlay); Robert Mitchum (Keeley); Robert Ryan (Montgomery); Gloria Grahame (Ginny); Paul Kelly (The Man); Sam Levene (Samuels); Jacqueline White (Mary Mitchell); Steve Brodie (Floyd); George Cooper (Mitchell); Richard Benedict (Bill); Richard Powers (Detective); William Phipps (Leroy); Lex Barker (Harry); Marlo Dwyer (Miss Lewis).

Awards: Best Social Film, Cannes Film Festival, 1947.

Publications

Books:

McCarthy, Todd, and Charles Flynn, Kings of the B's: Working Within the Hollywood System, New York, 1975.
 Thomas, Tony, The Films of the Forties, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1975.
 Dmytryk, Edward, It's a Hell of a Life But Not a Bad Living, New York, 1978.

Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Ward, editors, Film Noir, Woodstock, New York, 1979.
 Dmytryk, Edward, On Screen Directing, London, 1984.
 Dmytryk, Edward, On Filmmaking, Boston, 1986.
 Dmytryk, Edward, Cinema: Concept and Practice, Stoneham, 1988.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 25 June 1947.
 Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 23 July 1947.
 Scott, Adrian, "You Can't Do That," in Screen Writer (London), August 1947.
 Elliott, E. Cohen, in Commentary (New York), August 1947 (and reply by Dore Schary, in no. 4, 1947).
 Agee, James, in Nation (New York), 2 August 1947.
 Houseman, John, in Hollywood Quarterly, Fall 1947.
 Scott, Adrian, "Some of My Worst Friends," in Screen Writer (London), October 1947.
 Brooks, Richard, in Films in Review (New York), February 1952.
 Ringgold, Gene, "Robert Mitchum," in Films in Review (New York), May 1964.
 Stein, Jeanne, "Robert Ryan," in Films in Review (New York), January 1968.
 Bowser, in Film Notes, New York, 1969.
 "The Cinema of Edward Dmytryk," in Films Illustrated (London), October 1971.
 Magrelli, E., in Filmercritica (Rome), May-June 1976.
 McArthur, Colin, "Crossfire and the Anglo-American Tradition," in Film Form (Newcastle-upon-Tyne), Autumn 1977.
 Kelly, K., and C. Steinman, "Crossfire: A Dialectical Attack," in Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), no. 3, 1978.
 Black, Louis, in Cinema Texas Notes (Austin), 20 February 1978.
 Simmons, J. L., "Film into Story: The Narrative Scheme of Crossfire," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 12, no. 3, 1984.
 Fox, D., "Crossfire and HUAC: Surviving the Slings and Arrows of the Committee," in Film History, vol. 3, no. 1, 1989.
Télérama (Paris), 10 May 1995.
 Mayer, G., "When the Film Recognizes 'You'," in Metro Magazine (Victoria, Australia), no. 103, 1995.
 Elia, M., in Séquences (Haute-Ville), March/June 1997.

* * *

A fascinating and biting film noir, Crossfire is a good example of the message film disguised as entertainment. It is one of a series of films produced in the later 1940s when the American motion picture industry discovered that adult themes and social problems could produce good box office. The first of two films released in 1947 dealing with anti-Semitism, Crossfire was both a commercial smash and a critical success. It was RKO's most lucrative production, earning over $1,000,000 in profits. It also garnered outstanding reviews: film critic James Agee called it "the best Hollywood movie in a long time" and Newsweek magazine judged it "one of the year's best films."

The film opens on a soldier, shrouded in shadows, viciously beating a man to death. The victim was Jewish, and his killer is a pathological sadist and rabid Jew-hater (stunningly portrayed by Robert Ryan). Crossfire is actually concerned with why the man is beaten to death, rather than who did the killing, as less than halfway through the film the killer's identity becomes known. The setting has been described as "that peculiar midnight-to-dawn atmosphere that ordinary surroundings acquire in those mute subdued hours," and includes still, almost deserted city streets, all-night movie theatres, seedy bars, and cheap apartments—as well as the disparate and somewhat shady types who inhabit this world. Before the killer is brought to justice by an avuncular but hardnosed police captain (played by Robert Young in a role against type), he also brutally strangles a fellow soldier who might have given him away. Assisting the police captain is an army sergeant (Robert Mitchum) who serves in part as a sounding board for the captain in his comments on racial prejudice.

The movie is based on The Brick Foxhole by Richard Brooks, who later gained a certain well-deserved fame as a screenwriter and director. The novel focused on the brutal murder of a homosexual, but as that subject was just too controversial for a Hollywood still under the domination of the Motion Picture Production Code, the filmmakers changed the victim to a Jew. The "message" of the film is presented by the police captain. In perhaps a too didactic sermon, he preaches the need for tolerance and an end to prejudice, and summarizes the role of bigotry in American history. The film's message and its good intentions deserve respect but, over time, have lost their forcefulness. What remains striking and powerful is the framework in which the message of the film was set. Crossfire is a well-crafted, carefully organized, beautifully presented melodrama which still retains its audience's interest in the story's unfolding.

—Daniel Leab

CROSSROADS

See JUJURO

THE CROWD

USA, 1928

Director: King Vidor

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm, silent with music score; running time: about 93 minutes; length: 9 reels, 8538–8548 feet. Released 3 March 1928.

Producer: King Vidor; scenario: King Vidor, John V.A. Weaver and Harry Behn; titles: Joseph Farnham; photography: Henry Sharp;

The Crowd

editor: Hugh Wynn; production designers: Cedric Gibbons and Arnold Gillespie.

Cast: Eleanor Boardman (Mary); James Murray (John); Bert Roach (Bert); Estelle Clark (Jane); Daniel G. Tomlinson (Jim); Dell Henderson (Dick); Lucy Beaumont (Mother); Freddie Burke Frederick (Junior); Alice Mildred Puter (Daughter).

Publications

Books:

Vidor, King, A Tree Is a Tree, New York, 1953; revised edition, 1977.
 Brownlow, Kevin, The Parade's Gone By, New York, 1968.
 Baxter, John, King Vidor, New York, 1976.
 Comuzio, Ermanno, King Vidor, Florence, 1986.
 Durnat, Raymond, and Scott Simmon, King Vidor—American, Berkeley, 1988.
 Vidor, King, King Vidor, Lanham, Maryland, 1988.

Articles:

New York Times, 20 February 1928.
Variety (New York), 22 February 1928.
 Cheatham, M., interview with Vidor, in Motion Picture Classic (New York), June 1928.
 Mulligan, W. E., "Work of King Vidor," in National Review (New York), July 1928.
 Troy, W., "Collectivism More or Less," in Nation (New York), 24 October 1934.
 Brownlow, Kevin, "King Vidor," in Film (London), Winter 1962.
 Thomas, John, in AFFS Newsletter (New York), November 1964.
 Higham, Charles, "King Vidor," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Summer 1966.
 "King Vidor at NYU: Discussion," in Cineaste (New York), Spring 1968.
 Schonert, Vernon, "James Murray," in Films in Review (New York), December 1968.
 Luft, Herbert G., "A Career That Spans Half a Century," in Film Journal (New York), Summer 1971.
 Durnat, Raymond, in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1973.

- “Vidor Issue” of Positif (Paris), September 1974.
 Vidor, King, “L’Acteur,” in Positif (Paris), December-January 1978.
 Ellis, M., “Crowd Music,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1981.
 Allen, W., “King Vidor and The Crowd,” in Stills (London), Winter 1982.
Cinema e Cinema (Venice), January-April 1985.
 Bush, G. W., “Like ‘A Drop of Water in the Stream of Life’: Moving Images of Mass Man from Griffith to Vidor,” in Journal of American Studies (New York), no. 2, 1991.
 Rhodes, C., “Filling the Void: Work and the Modern Subject in King Vidor’s The Crowd,” in Studies in the Humanities, vol. 20, no. 2, 1993.
 Klopčič, M., “Mnozica,” in Ekran (Ljubljana) no. 3/4, 1993.

* * *

King Vidor’s career wavered between the lure of romantic, erotic melodrama and the stricter morality of his Christian Science background. After three John Gilbert vehicles, including the popular The Big Parade, Vidor was able to sell MGM on a bleak, expressionist urban tragedy of the sort made fashionable by the novels of Sinclair Lewis, Theodore Dreiser, and John Dos Passos. Other studios, notably Fox, already enjoyed considerable success in this area due to their importation of German and Austrian directors like Murnau and Dupont. MGM, committed to a policy of mainly Scandinavian recruitment, lacked such experts in relentless art of the “city film.” Vidor persuaded Irving Thalberg to permit this single excursion into the field by offering to produce “The Big Parade of peace”—clearly a strategem, since The Crowd is as cynical and relentless as his World War I romantic drama was soft-centered and sentimental.

The Crowd is a remarkable aberration to come from the optimistic, cheerful MGM machine, mocking as it does American fictions of self-advancement and ambition. John Sims’s birth on July 4th, 1900, is greeted with elation by his father. “He’s a little man the world’s going to hear from,” he crows. But social circumstances, Vidor points out, guide our life from childhood. John’s schoolboy friends already have their careers mapped out for them, especially the black boy who boasts in comic minstrel patter of the time “I detend to be a preacher man. Hallelujah!”

No less a social stereotype, John is forced by his father’s early death to join the crowd who fill the streets of New York. “You’ve got to be good in that town if you want to beat the crowd,” remarks a gaunt stranger as John watches the skyline from a ferry. As a huge office building swallows up the young Sims, we realize he has become another victim of the city, subject to its whims, threatened by its pressures.

John’s early enthusiasm for city life, fuelled by visits to Coney Island, an early marriage and the unexpected windfall of a $500 slogan-writing contest prize, is crushed by the random death of his child, then unemployment and a slide to the humiliation of selling vacuum cleaners door to door, until he becomes a juggling sandwich-board man—a character seen before and mocked by Sims, but who returns like the clown in The Blue Angel as a memento mori. Interfering relatives nearly destroy Sims’s marriage, but the love of his son saves him from a suicide attempt and he’s finally reunited with his wife. “The crowd laughs with you always,” warns a title, “but it will cry with you for only a day.”

Vidor tried seven endings before shooting one incorporating this bleak moral. Sims and his family visit a vaudeville show, and are last seen howling at the antics of two clowns, swallowed in a mindless laughing crowd.

Always attracted by expressionism and stylisation, Vidor exercised his penchant for both in The Crowd. Characters seem swallowed by their environment; the office building where John works (actually a model) is one of thousands in the city, and the camera zooms in through a window, apparently at random, to choose him, just another wage slave in an office of identical desks reaching in forced perspective to infinity. Earlier in the film, when John hears of his father’s death, Vidor creates a vision of his threatened status by placing the boy on a staircase constructed against a distorted impression of a corridor actually painted on the back wall of the set. John, sustained by a relative, seems to hover between the inquisitive crowd huddled around the doorway and a threatening, unknown future.

James Murray, a minor featured performer (and not, as Vidor claimed, an extra) superbly conveys the feckless, ukelele-plucking John Sims mindlessly letting the world carry him along. (He was never to be offered work of this standard again, and drowned in the Hudson River in 1936; used to his gagging, watchers thought he was joking and failed to attempt a rescue.) Eleanor Boardman, later Vidor’s wife, is an effective support.

But, as in all “city films,” the individuals are dwarfed by an unfeeling capitalist society. Vidor emphasises this isolation in the film’s most striking images; trying to quiet the crowd to soothe his dying child, Sims sets himself against the hurrying mob, hands thrust out, eyes blind; clocks dictate the coming and going of the city people with a relentless Langian power; even the couple’s honeymoon is dwarfed by the torrent of Niagara plunging past the ledge on which they sit. A mis-step and it will carry them away.

Thalberg was alarmed at the bleak vision Vidor presented to him. The film was delayed for a year, and released to respectful reviews but little profit. Vidor went straight on to two Marion Davies comedies for William Randolph Hearst’s Cosmopolitan Pictures, then based on the MGM lot. It was not until An American Romance that he had a chance to deal with the larger quasi-political issues he addressed in The Crowd, and by then the moment had passed.

—John Baxter

CSILLAGOSOK, KATONAK

(The Red and the White)

Hungary-USSR, 1967

Director: Miklós Jancsó

Production: Mafilm Studios (Hungary) and Mosfilm (USSR); black and white, 35mm, Agascope; running time: 92 minutes, Russian version about 70 minutes; length: 2545 meters. Released November 1967, Hungary. Filmed 1967 in the Kostroma Region of central Soviet Russia.

Production managers: Jenő Götz, Yuri Rogozovskiy, Andras Nemeth, M. Shadur, Kirill Siruauev, and Istvan Daubner; screenplay: Georgiy Mdivani, Gyula Herádi, and Miklós Jancsó; assistant directors: Zsolt Kezdi Kovacs, Ferenc Grunwalski, Vladimir Glazkov, and Liliya Kelshteyn; photography: Tamás Somló; editor: Zoltán Farkas; sound: Zoltán Toldy; art director: Boris Chebotaryov; costume designers: Mayya Abar-Baranovskaya and Gyula Várdai.

Csillagosok, Katonák

Cast: József Madaras (Hungarian Commander); Tibor Molnár (András); András Kozák (László); Jácint Juhász (István); Anatolij Yabbarov (Captain Chelpanov); Sergey Nikonenko (Cossack officer); Mikhail Kozakov (Nestor); Bolot Beyshenaliyev (Chingiz); Tatyana Konyukhova (Yelizaveta, the matron); Krystyna Mikolajewska (Olga); Viktor Avdyushko (Sailor); Gleb Strizhenov (Colonel); Nikita Mikhalkov (White officer).

Publications

Books:

- Issekutz, Bela, Id. Jancsó Miklós és Ifi, a Két Orvostudós, Budapest, 1968.
 Estève, Michel, editor, Le Nouveau Cinema hongrois, Paris, 1969.
 Whyte, Alistair, New Cinema in Eastern Europe, London, 1971.
 Audras, Szeffku, Fényes Szelek Fújjátok!, Budapest, 1974.
 Buttava, Giovanna, Jancsó: Miklós Jancsó, Florence, 1974.
 Taylor, John Russell, Directors and Directing: Cinema for the Seventies, New York, 1975.
 Armes, Roy, The Ambiguous Image: Narrative Style in Modern European Cinema, London, 1976.
 Castaldini, Ennio, Il Vertice Della Parabola: Cinema Bianconevo de Miklós Jancsó, Bologna, 1976.

- Liehm, Antonin, and Mira Liehm, The Most Important Art: Eastern European Film after 1945, Berkeley, 1977.
 Bird, Yvette, Miklós Jancsó, Paris, 1977.
 Petrie, Graham, History Must Answer to Man: The Contemporary Hungarian Cinema, London, 1978.
 Józsa, Péter, editor, Adalékok az Ideológia és a Jelentés Elméletéhez, Budapest, 1979.
 Marlia, Giulio, Lo schermo liberato: il cinema di Miklós Jancsó, Firenze, 1982.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 22 November 1967.
 Green, Calvin, in Film Society Review (New York), 2 October 1968.
 Gilliat, Penelope, in New Yorker, 29 March 1969.
 Strick, Philip, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1969.
 Hatch, R., in Nation (New York), 9 June 1969.
 Houston, Penelope, "The Horizontal Man," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1969.
 Price, James, "Polarities: The Films of Miklós Jancsó," in London Magazine, August-September 1969.
 Cowie, Peter, in International Film Guide, London, 1969.
 Robinson, David, "Quite Apart from Miklós Jancsó," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1970.
 Czigany, Lorant, "Jancsó Country: Miklós Jancsó and the Hungarian New Cinema," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1972.
 Martin, Marcel, in Ecran (Paris), December 1972.
 Mercier, M. C., in Image et Son (Paris), no. 269, 1973.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, and Michel Estève, in Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), nos. 104–08, 1975.
 Alemmano, R., "Ripensando All Violenza dei Rossi e dei Bianchi," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), January-February 1975.
 Losada, C., "Miklós Jancsó," in Cinema 2002 (Madrid), December 1979.
 Gillett, John, "Miklós Jancsó," in Film Dope (London), July 1983.

* * *

Miklós Jancsó's third feature was filmed in the Soviet Union as a co-production to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Revolution and, fittingly, features a group of Hungarians fighting alongside the Red forces. What Hungarians made of this only 11 years after the events of 1956 one can only guess; similarly, one wonders what the Soviet authorities made of Jancsó's refusal of any Manichean perspective here, since neither side is shown as morally superior to the other. The overall impression is of watching some vast, spectacular game of chess played to mysterious rules by remote, unseen forces utterly indifferent to human suffering. As Philip Strick has evocatively described it: "against rolling and impassive meadowland, the meaningless choreography of the huntsmen and their victims, interchangeable from one minute to the next, takes its cold and casual course. Punctuating the placid murmur of a country summer, horsemen gallop furiously with erratic purpose, men order each other repeatedly from one position to another, and snarling biplanes loom masterfully overhead. In an endless transition from idyll to nightmare, there are captures, interrogations and executions, while the obsessive, arbitrary selection of men to be shot is mercilessly pursued by both sides, indistinguishable as they are in uniform, in attitude or in action." What we have here is a chilling study in arbitrary authority and absolute power, in which hunter and hunted, executioner and prisoner display an equal degree of impassivity and indifference, each knowing that the tables will soon turn once more. As Penelope Houston has put it: "All the killings are completely casual, bloodless and emotionless: the man with the gun has the power, and his victim accepts that he has it, and there is no more than that to be said. There will be no lingering shots of corpses, no mashed limbs, no emphasis on death as a violent fact rather than another move in an endlessly repeated game." As a meditation on the waste and senselessness of warfare, The Red and the White takes some beating, not least because the film makes its points implicitly, apart from the moment when one of the Hungarians refuses to massacre a group of prisoners, saying that "it is possible to fight and still be human," and the scene in which a nurse at a field hospital states that "there are no Reds and Whites here, only patients." The terrifying arbitrariness of war is brilliantly communicated by the narrative's extraordinarily elliptical nature, whereby little is explained and events follow one another with bewildering rapidity but seemingly little causal connection. The feeling of watching men trapped inside some mighty and complex game played out by disinterested gods is strikingly conveyed by Jancsó's famous and characteristic geometric mise-en-scène. As Graham Petrie has noted, Jancsó's films make remarkable use of the Cinemascope screen, especially The Red and the White, in which "whenever groups of characters appear, they are systematically drawn into horizontal, vertical, or diagonal lines, or into patterns of circles, squares and triangles. . . . Lines of men are constantly shown extending across the width of the Cinemascope screen, or forming diagonals that intersect with the boundaries of the frame to create complex visual effects. Though many of these compositions are quite breathtaking in their own right, the effect is rarely purely gratuitous: normally, by their very formality, they accentuate the elements of coldness and inhumanity inherent in the actions taking place." Particularly striking here is the use of the long-shot, frequently in combination with the sequence-shot and a highly mobile camera, so that, as Petrie puts it, "the constant uncertainty, the to-and-fro pattern of the film as a whole, is crystallised within one single camera movement." Furthermore, the use of long-shot denies the audience any involvement in the action and forces it to watch it more as some kind of preordained, hermetic ritual. In this respect Michel Estève has made an interesting contrast with Jancsó's earlier The Round-Up: "the 'geometry of terror' of The Round-Up finds here its equivalent in the evocation of a dilated space. The choice of the wide screen, the immense and bare landscapes of the Volga, the importance accorded to long-shots, to depth of field and to aerial views suggest not the fate of the prisoner suffocated by a tight, hellish circle from which he does not know how to escape, but rather the combatant lost in the immensity of space, constantly pursued by death, crushed by his destiny."

If The Red and the White presents us with an almost overwhelmingly bleak picture of the world, it does so with a remarkable sense of style, as Penelope Houston has pointed out: "the saving graces of this arid world include, as always, visual beauty: the play of light, compositions of black figures against white walls, the strong verticals of Jancsó's almost abstract patterns. Aesthetically, the paring down of content is inevitably satisfying: it has the lure of the cloister, the white habit, discipline and rigour, the Bressonian impression of spiritual geometry." On the other hand, however, some critics accused Jancsó of aestheticising the horrors of war—one called him "the master of artistic atrocity," for example. One might also complain that The Red and the White offers precious little explanation of the situation which it so strikingly lays out before us. Maybe that's why, with his next film, The Confrontation, Jancsó began what Petrie has termed a "systematic exploration of the morality of violence and whether good ends can ever justify the use of inhuman means to achieve them."

—Julian Petley

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

France, 1990

Director: Jean-Paul Rappeneau

Production: Hachette Premiere et Cie/Camera One/U.G.C/D.D Productions/Films A2; colour, 35mm; running time: 138 minutes.

Producers: Michel Seydoux, Rene Cleitman; screenplay: Jean-Paul Rappeneau, Jean-Claude Carrière, from the play by Edmond Rostand; subtitles: Anthony Burgess; photography: Pierre Lhomme; editor: Noelle Boisson; assistant directors: Thierry Chabert, Francine Meunier, Nathalie Bezon, Attila Monost; art directors: Jacques Rouxel, Tamas Banovich; production design: Ezio Frigerio; music: Jean-Claude Petit; costumes: Franca Squarciapino; sound: Jean Goudier, Pierre Gamet, Dominique Hennequin.

Cast: Gérard Dépardieu (Cyrano de Bergerac); Anne Brochet (Roxane); Vincent Perez (Christian de Neuvillette); Jacques Weber (Comte de Guiche); Roland Bertin (Ragueneau); Philippe Morier-Genoud (LeBret); Philippe Volter (Vicomte de Valvert); Josiane Stoleru (Duenna).

Awards: Best Actor, Cannes 1990.

Publications

Script:

Rappeneau, Jean-Paul, and Jean-Claude Carrière, Cyrano de Bergerac, d'après l'oeuvre d'Edmond Rostand, Paris, 1990.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 4 April 1990.

Strauss, F., Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1990.

Merrick, H., "Le Marivadange Héroïque" in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), April 1990.

Amiel, V., "L'esprit du theatre et la beauté du cinéma" in Positif (Paris), May 1990.

Manceau, J.L., Cinéma (Paris), May 1990.

Logett, L., "Autour de Cyrano" in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), June-July 1990.

Buruina, M., and others, Séquences (Montreal), September 1990.

Horguelin, T., "Le film de Roxane" in 24 Images (Montreal), Autumn 1990.

"Cyrano de Bergerac," in Reid's Film Index, no. 6, 1991.

Strick, P., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1991.

West, J.M., Cineaste (New York), February 1991.

Kermol, E., in Le Costa Vista (Trieste), no. 18, 1992.

Cyrano de Bergerac

Abdullaeva, Z., in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 11. 1992.
 Douin, Jean-Luc, in Télérama (Paris), 23 March 1994.

* * *

The makers of this most recent telling of the Edmond Rostand classic have accomplished a most praiseworthy feat. They have taken a century-old romance of nobility and love's sacrifice and maintained a healthy measure of the flavor of the original, while at the same time bringing it to life for audiences of the 1990s.

In 1897, Rostand first presented this self-proclaimed "heroic comedy" about a proud Gascoyne swordsman, poet and lover with an enormous nose. Through the first half of the 20th-century, Cyrano was produced on many occasions with great success. Coquelin and Walter Hampden were but two of the actors who interpreted Cyrano. In recent years, however, the lacy prose and honeyed poetry of Rostand (known to most American audiences through the traditional English translation by Brian Hooker, written in 1923) has appealed mainly to more literary audiences. The 1950 Stanley Kramer production featuring Jose Ferrer as Cyrano had been considered the definitive film adaptation, but it has been overshadowed by this more contemporary, action-packed and in some ways more relevant production.

Director Jean-Paul Rappeneau and star Gérard Dépardieu have cut through the fine embroidery of Cyrano to the play's solid core, and emphasize Cyrano as an individualist. He is shown as a man of principle who would rather suffer the fate of an outsider than relinquish his own brand of panache. Dépardieu offers a naturalistic performance, playing Cyrano with an earthiness and virility that permeates much of the actor's film work. With an unabashed pride and stubbornness, Cyrano scoffs at two-faced politicians and attacks mannered fops who kowtow with insincere grace in exchange for courtly favors. Dépardieu's swordsmanship is no more skillful than Jose Ferrer's was, but this production is created with a greater excitement towards the sword fight sequences. Whereas Ferrer's Cyrano parries and thrusts half-hidden amid the black and grey shadows of the back streets of Paris, Dépardieu's Cyrano duels with a greater relish in more colorful surroundings and in stronger light, to the accompaniment of a more fluid camera.

A ruggedness of atmosphere properly places Cyrano in a rough-and-tumble man's world. At the cadets' headquarters, one sees soldiers in various stages of undress. There, one can smell the musk of the leather protective gear. At the battle stations, unwashed and hungry soldiers hunt down a rat and skin it for supper. As the men suffer for lack of meat, Cyrano calls upon an elderly shepherd to sing a folk song to remind them of their proud Gascoyne heritage. These moments of unaffected custom give emphasis to the difference between Cyrano's world and the refined, phony spheres in which Cyrano's enemies, the actor Montfleury and the Compte de Guiche, travel.

The film's English subtitles, written by Anthony Burgess, present a tasteful and lively text. As one might hope, the prose pays homage to the old-fashioned, flowery recitations in the Rostand play, maintaining the original flavor of the piece. Burgess uses good judgement in occasional decisions to keep to the French language. Roxane, for example, who is cousin to Cyrano and the love of his life, is referred to as "precieuse." The strength of this word and the way the lips move when it is pronounced make this the authoritative description of Cyrano's secret sweetheart. In the finale, as he dies, Cyrano's last words refer to the one laurel he will take with him to the grave: "my panache." Burgess could have translated that term as Hooker did, as "my white plume." But, for today's audiences, such a term seems insignificant. The French word "panache" holds weight.

The trio of Dépardieu, Rappeneau and Burgess have assembled a Cyrano de Bergerac that is naturalistic in style. It is at once a respectful interpretation of its original source material and an action-packed, full-bodied production designed to appeal to contemporary audiences.

—Audrey E. Kupferberg

CZLOWIEK Z MARMURU

(Man of Marble)

Poland, 1977

Director: Andrzej Wajda

Production: Enterprise de Realization de Films: Ensembles Cinematographiques and Ensemble X; Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 160 minutes. Released February 1977, Warsaw. Filmed in Poland; documentary sequences were provided by the Archives des Actualites, Cinematographiques Polonaises.

Producer: Andrzej Wajda; screenplay: Aleksander Scibor-Rylski; photography: Edward Klosinski; editors: Halina Pugarowa and Maria Kalinciska; sound operator: Piotr Zawadzki; production designers: Allan Starski; Wojciech Majda, and Maria Osiecka-Kuminek; music: Andrzej Korzyński, songs performed by the group Ali Babki and the Groupe Instrumental; costume designers: Lidia Rzeszewska and Wieslawa Konopelska.

Cast: Jerzy Radziwilowicz (Mateusz Birkut and his son Maciek Tomczyk); Michal Tarkowski (Wincenty Witek); Krystyna Zachwatowicz (Hanka Tomczyk); Piotr Cieślak (Michalak); Wieslaw Wojcik (Jodia); Krystyna Janda (Agnieszka); Tadeusz Lomnicki (Jerzy Burski); Jacek Lomnicki (Young Burski); Leonard Zajaczkowski (Leonard Frybos); Jacek Domanski (Sound Man); Grzegorz Skurski (Chauffeur/Lighting man); Magda Teresa Wojcik (Editor); Boguslaw Sobczyk (TV Writer); Zdzislaw Kozien (Agnieszka's father); Irena Laskowska (Museum employee); Jerzy Moniak (Moniak); Wieslaw Drzewicz (Manager of the restaurant); Kazmierz Kaczor (Security man); Eva Zietek (Secretary); B. Fronczkowiak (Official from the Ministry of the Interior).

Awards: Prix de la Critique International, Cannes Film Festival, 1978.

Publications

Script:

Scibor-Rylski, Alexander, Czlowiek z marmuru, Czlowiek z zelaza (in Polish), London, 1982; also published in French (L'Homme de marbre) in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 January 1980.

Books:

Douin, Jean-Luc, Wajda, Paris, 1981.

Paul, David W., editor, Politics, Art, and Commitment in the Eastern European Cinema, New York, 1983.

Wajda, Andrzej, Un Cinéma nommé désir, Paris, 1986.

Wajda, Andrzej, Double Vision: My Life in Film, New York, 1989.

Falkowska, Janina, The Political Films of Andrzej Wajda: Dialogism in "Man of Marble," "Man of Iron," and "Danton," New York, 1996.

Articles:

Bajer, L., in Kino (Warsaw), May 1977.

Holloway, D., in Variety (New York), 1 June 1977.

Keller, R., in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), no. 7, 1978.

Demeure, J., and H. Niogret, interview with Wajda, in Positif (Paris), October 1978.

Thirard, Paul-Louis, in Positif (Paris), November 1978.

Fargier, Jean-Paul, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1978.

Dawson, Jan, in Sight and Sound (London), no. 4, 1979.

Interview with Wajda, in Ecran (Paris), no. 1, 1979.

Quart, Leonard, in Cineaste (New York), no. 4, 1979.

Konicek, Ryszard, in International Film Guide 1979, edited by Peter Cowie, London, 1979.

Linehart, R., "L'Homme de marbre et de celluloid," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1979.

Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 17 March 1979.

Amengual, Barthélemy, "L'Homme (de marbre) est le capital le plus précieux, pensait planov," in Positif (Paris), June 1979.

De Benedictus, in Bianco e Nero (Rome), September-December 1979.

Ruf, R., in Medium (Frankfurt), October 1979.

Pap, P., in Filmkultura (Budapest), November-December 1979.

Vrdlovec, Z., in Ekran (Ljubljana), no. 4, 1980.

"Wajda Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 January 1980.

Torres, Fernandez, A., in Contracampo (Madrid), February 1980.

Nissen, D., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), October 1980.

Dossier on Wajda, in Image et Son (Paris), December 1980.

Człowiek z marmuru

Bickley, D., and L. Rubinstein, "Between the Permissible and the Impermissible: An Interview with Andrzej Wajda," in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1980–81.

Abrahamson, K. A., in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 5, 1981. New York Times, 23 January 1981.

Newsweek (New York), 9 February 1981.

Fox, G., "Men of Wajda," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Fall 1981.

Cohen, Joan, in Magill's Cinema Annual, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1982.

DiCaprio, L., "Polish Films and Politics," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), July 1982.

Lewis, Cliff, and Carroll Britch, "Light Out of Poland: Wajda's Man of Marble and Man of Iron," in Film and History (Newark, New Jersey), December 1982.

Janicka, Bożena, in Film (Poland), 18 November 1984.

Sobolewski, T., "Cierpiący posag," in Kino (Warsaw), August 1989.

Jankun, M., and B. Dopart, "Barwy ochronne albo kazdemu, co mu sie nalezy," in Kino (Warsaw), December 1989.

Della Casa, S., "Amnesia land: il cinema del dimenticare," in Ikon (Milan), October 1990.

Koltai, A., "A versailles-i fattyu," in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 2, 1990. Maland, C., "Memories and Things Past: History and Two Biographical Flashback Films," in East-West Film Journal (Honolulu), vol. 6, no. 1, 1992.

Janicka, B., in Kino (Warsaw), July/August 1995.

Cade, M., "Wajda historien du present," in Les Cahiers de la Cinematheque (Perpignan), no. 67, December 1997.

* * *

After many successful and mature historical films, describing different crucial moments of the fate of the Polish, and many screen versions of famous literary pieces, Andrzej Wajda, in Man of Marble, succeeded in creating nearly as great and important a work as his Ashes and Diamonds. Man of Marble is a success rooted in the spirit of the actual moment when it appeared, a critical film for understanding Poland's difficult situation in the 1980s.

The film is the story of a student, Agnieszka, who wants to make her graduation film about a former "exemplary worker" of the late Stalin years. Being a modern, bright and courageous girl, she is astonished at the many obstacles and difficulties she has to overcome in order to learn the whole truth about the forgotten idol. Many who had previously worked with him are currently successful, but not eager to recall the past. The television managers even intervene in order to stop her. At the end, Agnieszka does manage to present the complete biography of the man.

The forgotten hero, Mateusz Birkut, was a peasant boy who went to the city, like millions of youngsters during the 1950s, in order to earn his bread. Birkut was lucky enough to catch the eye of an ambitious filmmaker, who decided to make Birkut a legend and a star. During the Stalinistic epoch, a star could only be a perfect worker; and Birkut became such through the invisible help of his fellow workers who remained anonymous. His problems occurred when he himself began to believe in his own importance. He interfered in various political activities in a way that his bosses never anticipated. He disappeared from view, and his image and memory were brutally degraded. He eventually died, though no one knew when and how.

Wajda manages in this story, masterfully written by Aleksander Scibor-Rylski, to paint a very detailed, ambivalent and strongly emotional picture of the development of his country during the last 30 years, and to portray two generations—fathers and sons—who formed the socialist system in Poland.

The structure of the film is rather sophisticated. Wajda here renounces the use of visual symbols, so typical of his usual style. He replaces the symbols with documentation—chronicles and news items—from the period; his narrative structure consists of three parallel stories, each of them taking place in a different historical time.

In spite of this complicated form, the film enjoyed an enormous audience success. One of the aims of the socialist culture is to educate people to understand an art which participates in the life and the problems of society. The artists themselves, in this case Wajda, feel themselves obliged to function as the consciousness of their compatriots, while at the same time presenting to them refined, aesthetic works.

For all the negative events shown in the film Wajda declares himself to be among the responsible. The character of Burski, the filmmaker in Man of Marble who gained prominence with his film on Birkut and later became a world renowned Polish artist, is a conscious allusion to Wajda himself. Wajda continues today to ask the question: Is the cinema something more than just a creator of myths?

—Maria Racheva

D

DAHONG DENGLONG GAOGAO GUA

---

(Raise the Red Lantern)

Hong Kong-China, 1991

Director: Zhang Yimou

Production: Era International, Hong Kong, in association with China Film Co-production Corporation; colour, 35mm; running time: 125 minutes.

Producers: Chiu Fu-Sheng, Hou Xiaoxian, Zhang Wenzhe; screenplay: Ni Zhen, based on a short story by Su Tong; photography: Zhao Fei; editor: Du Yuan; assistant directors: Zhang Haniie, Gao Jingwen; art directors: Cao Jiuping, Dong Huamiao; music: Zhao Jiping, Naoki Tachikawa; sound: Li Lanhua; make-up: Sun Wei; costumes: Huang Lihua.

Cast: Gong Li (Songlian); Ma Jingwu (Chen Zuqian); He Caifei (Meishan); Cao Cuifeng (Zhuoyun); Jin Shuyuan (Yuru); Kong Lin (Yan'er); Ding Weimin (Mother Song); Cui Zhigang (Doctor Gao); Zhou Qi (head servant).

Publications

Articles:

- Chute, David, "Golden Hours" in Film Comment (Denville, New Jersey), March/April 1991.
- Reynaud, Berenice, "China—On the Set with Zhang Yimou" in Sight and Sound (London), July 1991.
- Variety* (New York), 7 October 1991.
- Reynaud, Berenice, "Ghosts of the Future," in Sight and Sound, (London), November 1991.
- Niogret, H., "Rouge, noir et blanc" in Positif (Paris), January 1992.
- Bassan, R., Revue du Cinéma (Paris), January 1992.
- Glaessner, V., Sight and Sound (London), February 1992.
- Garcia, M., Films in Review (London), May-June 1992.
- Fortin, P., Séquences (Montreal), September 1992.
- Younis, R., Cinema Papers (Victoria), October 1992.
- Sutton, D.S., "Ritual, History and the Films of Zhang Yimou," in East-West (Honolulu), July 1994.
- Klawans, S., "Zhang Yimou," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, September-October 1995.
- Young-Sau Fong, Suzie, "The Voice of Feminine Madness in Zhang Yimou's Dahong Denglong Gaogao Gua," in Asian Cinema (Drexel Hill), Spring 1995.

Lee, Joann, "Zhang Yimou's Raise the Red Lantern: Contextual Analysis of Film through a Confucian/Feminist Matrix," in Asian Cinema (Drexel Hill), Spring 1996.

Kong, Haili, "Symbolism through Zhang Yimou's Subversive Lens in His Early Films," in Asian Cinema (Drexel Hill), Winter 1996–1997.

Wei, Y., "Music and Femininity in Zhang Yimou's Family Melodrama," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 42, 1997.

* * *

Raise the Red Lantern was one of the rare Chinese films successfully marketed in America and its success has been ascribed to its exotic formula of a man with five wives and the radiant beauty of the star Gong Li. The film has certainly capped the international reputation of its director Zhang Yimou and made him the most successful director among the "Fifth Generation" filmmakers (including Chen Kaige, Tian Zhuangzhuang, Wu Ziniu) who first made their mark in Chinese cinema in the mid-1980s.

Superficially at least, Raise the Red Lantern has all the hallmarks of a sizzling soap-opera melodrama featuring the beautiful Gong Li as the fourth wife of Master Chen, a wealthy, traditionalist husband of the Chinese gentry class. Master Chen's mansion is divided into four quarters or courtyards—each occupied by one of his wives, who are all enjoined to live harmoniously under one roof. It is a manor dominated by the observance of arcane rituals, family rules and regulations—a central ritual being the hanging of red lanterns in the quarters of the master's choice of sleeping partner for the night. The plot ingredients of a melodrama come into play as three of the wives—Zhuoyun (the second wife), Meishan (the third wife, an opera singer), and Songlian (the fourth and most recent wife, played by Gong Li)—become rivals for the master's affections (the first wife being too old to be a serious rival).

Zhuoyun is deceptively friendly, showing her true colours in the course of the film, as the most treacherous of the master's wives. Meishan hides her tragic vulnerability beneath a bitchy, cunning veneer, while Songlian is equally vulnerable but much less equipped to handle the politics of rivalry and jealousy. The object is not only to win the master's affections but to exert authority over the wider household of other concubines and servants. As a servant says, "authority is where the lantern is hung." To complicate matters, Songlian's servant, Yan, has ambitions of her own to become one of the master's mistresses. Yan taunts Songlian by being mildly rebellious and insolent (going against regulations, she hangs up torn and patched red lanterns in her own room), and informs on her mistress' activities in Zhuoyun.

The story works as a kind of gothic melodrama when Songlian discovers a locked room on the roof of the mansion and is told that it was the place where two women had died tragically by hanging themselves. It is this room that rounds off the film's climax (as third mistress Meishan, discovered for her infidelity, is dragged and locked up there) and precipitates Songlian's tragedy. The chronology of the narrative takes place over the seasons of the year; the events are confined to the settings of a single household, done in the elaborate style of a Chinese manor-house complete with multiple courtyards, rooms, antechambers, and servants' quarters, separated by walls and lanes. This architectural marvel is as much a part of the story as are the characters, who often seem minuscule against the grand setting of the building (alone in a courtyard, or standing behind a towering facade).

Dahong denglong gaogao gua

Indeed, the film is distinguished by Zhang Yimou's penchant for long shots which take full advantage of his marvellous location and interior sets. There are almost no close-ups in the film—the camera getting no closer to the characters than the medium shot. When closer shots are employed, Zhang almost always favours his female characters—the one overtly conscious sign of the director's story-telling sensibility motivating his series of films, beginning with Red Sorghum, that are all centred around women (all played by Gong Li). The master of the household is, in fact, always in long shots, with the camera deliberately avoiding showing this character in full face. The device accentuates the distance of the one significant male character, both from the perspectives of the audience as well as those of the key female characters.

The long shot is a trait shared by Zhang's Fifth Generation colleagues (Chen Kaige, in particular, for whom Zhang served as director of photography on his first two films) and is a manifestation of the objective eye. In Fifth Generation work, the objective eye functions primarily as a visual endowment of film narratives. It points up the stunning visual qualities of the director's compositions, and "fills in" the narrative space that is not covered by dialogue. On the other hand, the long shot tends to reinforce the structural look of a film and gains a semiotic, symbolic function as well.

In Raise the Red Lantern, the structural compositions and their symbolic derivatives shore up the sense of distance in time and space and the psychology of the female characters as they engage in what modern feminists would consider absurd rivalry and power-play. The strength of the Fifth Generation directors lies in the ability to exploit historical objectivity and a highly personal approach to narrative filmmaking, thus breaking with the tradition of didacticism and literary approaches in Chinese cinema. That Zhang's success in the West is attributed to exoticism is a price he must pay as his films assume more formalized and realist, down-to-earth properties (as may be seen in The Story of Qiu Ju and his latest, To Live).

—Stephen Teo

LES DAMES DU BOIS DE BOULOGNE

(Ladies of the Bois de Boulogne)

France, 1945

Director: Robert Bresson

Production: Films Raoul Ploquin; black and white, 35mm; running time: originally 96 minutes, but edited down to 84 minutes for initial release, current versions are usually 90 minutes. Released 21 September 1945. Filmed summer 1944 in France.

Producer: Robert Lavellée; screenplay: Robert Bresson; dialogue: Jean Cocteau, from a passage in “Jacques le fataliste et son maître” by Denis Diderot; photography: Philippe Agostini; editor: Jean Feyte; sound: René Louge, Robert Ivonnet, and Lucien Legrand; production designer: Max Douy; music: Jean-Jacques Grunenwald.

Cast: Paul Bernard (Jean); Maria Casares (Hélène); Elina Labourdette (Agnès J); Lucienne Bogaert (Madame D); Jean Marchat (Jacques); Yvette Etievant (Chamber maid); with Bernard Lajarrige, Nicole Regnault, Marcel Rouzé, Emma Lyonnell, Lucy Lancy, Marguerite de Morlaye, and the dog Katsou.

Awards: Louis Delluc Award, France, 1945.

Publications

Script:

Bresson, Robert, and Jean Cocteau, Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 November 1977.

Books:

The Films of Robert Bresson, New York, 1969.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946, Volume 1: The Great Tradition, New York, 1970.

Cameron, Ian, The Films of Robert Bresson, London, 1970.

Schrader, Paul, Transcendental Style on Film: Ozu, Bresson, Dreyer, Los Angeles, 1972.

Bresson, Robert, Notes sur le cinématographe, Paris, 1975; as Notes on the Cinema, New York, 1977.

de Pontes Leca, C., Robert Bresson o cinematografo e o sinal, Lisbon, 1978.

Sloan, Jane, Robert Bresson: A Film Guide, New York, 1983.

Hanlon, Lindley, Fragments: Bresson's Film Style, Cranbury, 1986.

Quandt, James, editor, Robert Bresson, Toronto, 1998.

Reader, Keith, Robert Bresson, Manchester, 2000.

Articles:

Sadoul, Georges, in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 29 September 1945.

Becker, Jacques, “Hommage à Robert Bresson,” in Ecran Français (Paris), 17 October 1946.

Lambert, Gavin, “Notes on Robert Bresson,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1953.

Truffaut, François, in Arts (Paris), 22 September 1954.

Gow, Gordon, “The Quest for Realism,” in Films and Filming (London), December 1957.

Baxter, Brian, “Robert Bresson,” in Film (London), September-October 1958.

Roud, Richard, “The Early Work of Robert Bresson,” in Film Culture (New York), no. 20, 1959.

Roud, Richard, “French Outsider with an Insider Look,” in Films and Filming (London), April 1960.

New York Times, 4 April 1964.

Sarris, Andrew, “Robert Bresson,” in Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.

Sontag, Susan, “Spiritual Style in the Films of Robert Bresson,” in Against Interpretation, New York, 1969.

Skoller, Donald S., “Praxis as a Cinematic Principle in the Films of Robert Bresson,” in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1969.

“Robert Bresson,” in Current Biography Yearbook, New York, 1971.

Samuels, Charles Thomas, “Robert Bresson,” in Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.

Polhemus, H. M., “Matter and Spirit in the Films of Robert Bresson,” in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1974.

“Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne Issue” of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 November 1977.

“Robert Bresson Issue” of Caméra/Stylo (Paris), January 1985.

Signorelli, A., “Les dames du Bois de Boulogne di Robert Bresson,” in Cineforum, vol. 27, no. 9, 1987.

Predal, R., in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), January-February 1992.

Michalczyk, J.J., and Paul Guth, in French Review, no. 4, 1992.

Botermans, Jan, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), October 1996.

* * *

Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne, Robert Bresson's second film, premiered just at the moment of the Liberation of France. Considered a difficult and extraordinary work, it was the first recipient of the Louis Delluc Award for the year's most important French film. What was it that made this film so difficult, and how could Bresson's severe style have attracted the attention it did?

First of all, the stifling studio look, by which Bresson was able to control every shadow, was perfectly suited to the hermetic era of the Occupation in which the film was made and to the strict moral drama of the film's literary source. The story was culled from Diderot's 18th-century classic Jacques le fataliste. Seemingly updated to include automobiles, electric lights, etc., Bazin once claimed that

Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne

Bresson's adaptation is in fact back-dated, that it is the aesthetic equivalent of Racine. Bresson has indeed essentialized a picaresque, ironic drama into a tragic struggle of absolutes. More accurately, he has pitted the absolute and tragic world view of H el ene, the injured, icy heroine played elegantly by Maria Casares, against the more modern and temperate world views held by the lover who has left her, and by the two women she vengefully introduces him to in the Bois du Boulogne.

Here is the crux of the film's difficulty, for 20th-century spectators are required to identify with the hardened H el ene as she spins the web of her trap, using modern, attractive characters as bait. Yet the film succeeds because Bresson has supported her with his style, if not his moral sympathy. We experience her anguish and determination within the decisive clarity of each shot and within the fatal mechanism made up by the precise concatenation of shots. No accident or spontaneous gesture is permitted to enter either H el ene's world or Bresson's mise-en-sc ene.

Jean Cocteau's dialogue, compressed like some dense radioactive element, continually points up the absolute stakes at play; furthermore, the lines he has written play antiphonally with the images to produce a reflective space in which every perception has already been oralized. A good example of this process is found when Jean enters Agn es's room. He takes in this closed space and then transforms it in words: "This is her lamp, her flowers, her frame, her cushion. This is where she sits to read, this, her piano." And yet throughout this recitation we see only his face. The dialogue sums up and closes off sentiments, cooling passions, abstracting emotions. We observe H el ene lying wrathful on her bed for some time before she leans forward to speak her incredibly cold, "Je me vengerai."

Although this style insists on the overpowering strength of H el ene's response to life (in which a single errant word warrants death and damnation), the plot supports the more ordinary characters whom she has manipulated to the end. For after her plans have run their course, after she has announced to Jean at the church that he has married a loose woman, her power is spent. The grace of love, of the love born between these two humble and minor mortals, points to a life or a purpose beyond H el ene. Bresson's Jansenism mixes severity (style) and the disclosure of grace (plot).

Only the dead-time of the Occupation could have permitted such a refined and distant love story. Its timeless values, though, reflect on that period, particularly its concern with weakness, forgiveness, and the future in a world controlled by absolute political powers. More important is the full expression of a style that demands to be taken morally. Even if Bresson has since rejected this effort as too theatrical (with its music, acting, and studio lighting), the fact is that Les Dames du Bois du Boulogne showed the world the value of his search, a search that is at once stylistic and metaphysical, and one his later work has justified. It is a tribute to the French film community that they recognized the presence and importance of something truly different.

—Dudley Andrew

THE DAMNED

See LA CADUTA DEGLI DEI

DANCE, GIRL, DANCE

USA, 1940

Director: Dorothy Arzner

Production: RKO-Radio Pictures; black and white; running time: 90 minutes. Released September 1940.

Producers: Erich Pommer and Harry Edington; screenplay: Tess Slesinger, Frank Davis, from the novel by Vicki Baum; assistant director: James H. Anderson; photography: Russell Metty; editor: Robert Wise; sound: Hugh McDowell, Jr.; art director: Van Nest Polglase; associate art director: Al Herman; gowns: Edward Stevenson; music director: Edward Ward; dances: Ernst Matray.

Cast: Maureen O'Hara (Judy); Louis Hayward (Jimmy Harris); Lucille Ball (Bubbles); Ralph Bellamy (Steve Adams); Virginia Field (Elinor Harris); Maria Ouspenskaya (Madame Basilova); Mary Carlisle (Sally); Katherine Alexander (Miss Olmstead); Edward Brophie (Dwarfie); Walter Abel (Judge); Harold Huber (Hoboken Gent); Ernest Truex (Bailey 1); Chester Clute (Bailey 2); Vivian Fay (Ballerina); Lorraine Krueger (Dolly); Lola Jensen (Daisy); Emma Dunn (Ms. Simpson); Sidney Blackmer (Puss in Boots); Ludwig Stossel (Caesar); Erno Verebes (Fitch).

Publications

Books:

Johnston, Claire, Notes on Women's Cinema, London 1973.
 Rosen, Marjorie, Popcorn Venus: Women, Movies and the American Dream, New York, 1973.
 Haskell, Molly, From Reverence to Rape: The Treatment of Women in the Movies, New York, 1974.
 Smith, Sharon, Women Who Make Movies, New York, 1975.

Johnston, Claire, editor, The Work of Dorothy Arzner: Towards a Feminist Cinema, London, 1975.

Kay, Karyn, and Gerald Peary, editors, Women and the Cinema: A Critical Anthology, New York, 1977.

Slide, Anthony, Early Women Directors, South Brunswick, New Jersey, 1977.

Heck-Rabi, Louise, Women Filmmakers: A Critical Reception, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.

Penley, Constance, editor, Feminism and Film Theory, London, 1988.
 Mayne, Judith, Directed by Dorothy Arzner, Bloomington, 1995.

Articles:

Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 11 September 1940.

Kine Weekly (London), 12 September 1940.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), vol. 7, no. 81, 1940.

Feldman, J., and H. Feldman, "Women Directors," in Films in Review (New York), November 1950.

Pyros, J., "Notes on Women Directors," in Take One (Montreal), November-December 1970.

Henshaw, Richard, "Women Directors," in Film Comment (New York), November 1972.

Parker, F., "Approaching the Art of Arzner," in Action (Los Angeles), July-August 1973.

Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Fall 1973.

Castle, W., "Tribute to Dorothy Arzner," in Action (Los Angeles), March-April 1975.

Kaplan, E. Ann, "Aspects of British Feminist Film Theory," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), nos. 12-13, 1976.

Glaessner, Verina, in Focus on Film (London), Summer-Autumn 1976.

Laemmle, Ann, in Cinema Texas Program Notes, 28 February 1978.

Bergstrom, J., "Rereading the Work of Claire Johnston," in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Summer 1979.

Forster, A., in Skrien (Amsterdam), September-October 1984.

Chell, S. L., "Dorothy Arzner's Dance, Girl, Dance," in CineAction (Toronto), Summer-Fall 1991.

* * *

Dance, Girl, Dance is one of the few films directed by a woman in what is known as the "classical Hollywood" era, when, it has been argued, the conventional narrative codes of cinema were fixed. This unique position has inevitably informed the ways in which the film has been studied. Although Dorothy Arzner herself was not a feminist, it is due to feminism that she has been reassessed. In the mid-1970s feminist critics argued that while Dance, Girl, Dance may appear to be just one example of the popular musical comedies and women's pictures produced by RKO in the 1930s and 1940s, Arzner's ironic point of view questions the very conventions she uses.

The film was made in the relative flexibility of RKO's production system, whereby independent directors were contracted to work under minimal supervision. It was in this context that Arzner was reputedly able to rework a confusing and scrappy script to focus on the ambivalent relationship between the two strong, but very different, main female characters, Judy, an aspiring ballerina, and Bubbles, a gold-digging showgirl. Bubbles, after finding work in burlesque, brings Judy's "classy act" into her show, where Judy is humiliated as her stooge. One night, Bubbles announces that she has married Jimmy Harris, a weak heavy-drinking millionaire divorcé with whom Judy has fallen in love. Consequently, in a scene that has been much discussed, Judy, overwhelmed with frustration, furiously confronts her heckling audience. The standing ovation she receives infuriates Bubbles, and they fall into a vicious fight. Judy, unrepentant, is sent to jail, but the next day, Steve Adams, a ballet director who has been pursuing her, pays her bail and summons her to his office. He intends to train her to be a professional ballerina and, it is implied, his wife.

Arzner's portrayal of the complex relationship between the two women is one of the ways in which the apparent opposition set up between art (offering "self-expression") and entertainment (imposing exploitation) is undermined. The ways in which each woman's dance numbers are presented subvert the stereotypes of a sexual Bubbles and an artistic Judy. For example, when Judy dances at the night-club, Fitch, Steve's associate, comments in surprise at her impressive (i.e., artistic) footwork. Steve, however, leers that "her eyes aren't bad either." Arzner pinpoints with terrible clarity the tension between a woman's struggle for integrity and a male gaze that by its very nature undermines that struggle. Where, then, does this leave Bubbles? When she dances at the burlesque, the ironies of her performances are a real delight for the cinema audience. When she calls and points to her audience she is challenging them, from within the licensed confines of burlesque conventions, in a way that parallels Judy's later outburst. Both women challenge, from the stage, the men who watch them, and thereby resist their passive status. So while we are invited to gaze upon Bubbles as a non-artistic spectacle, she is also knowing, controlling, with a voice of her own. It is the sheer power of this "voice," Bubbles's potent screen presence, that subverts her implied position as less worthy than Judy.

Much of the critical attention paid to Judy's furious speech has suggested that the artistic and moral criticism of the lecherous gaze of the burlesque audience also functions as a not-so-veiled attack on the cinema audience. However, the film has much invested in drawing in its audience to enjoy the display of women's bodies, and this impulse arguably triumphs over the conflicting impulse to alienate the audience, or to chastise it for its voyeurism. Judy's gesture is thus defused by being applauded, and leading into the titillating catfight. But the irony is that she has found a voice and can defiantly assert, "I'm not ashamed," not within the structures of the ballet, but in those of the burlesque.

As in Arzner's earlier work, and within the conventions of the women's film, it is the scenes featuring women that are the most striking and subtle, and in contrast, the heterosexual romance appears hollow. Although a weak love-story element runs through the film, the women's desires are channelled less towards coupledness than independence. After a date with Jimmy, Judy wishes on a star that she might become a dancer too. She wants it all, romance and artistic integrity, and the latter is never submerged in the former. Bubbles, on the other hand, desires economic rather than artistic independence. Both her dancing and her sexual desires are grounded in a cynicism about heterosexual relationships that affords her one of the film's finest throwaway lines, describing the burlesque owner as "a great big capitalist in the artificial limbs business."

However, the position of strong female protagonists in a Hollywood text is a precarious one, and it is in the final scene that this is tragically realised. Steve, in a humiliating tirade, asserts that Judy has been a silly, stubborn "girl." The incongruously huge hat that she wears in this scene hides her face until, as Steve embraces her and tells her to "go ahead and laugh," it is revealed that she is, in fact, weeping. Arzner's final irony offers the potential for a critique of the traditional boy-gets-girl resolution, and, implicitly, of the classical Hollywood text itself.

—Samantha Cook

DAOMA ZEI

(Horse Thief)

China, 1986

Director: Tian Zhuangzhuang

Production: Xi'an Film Studio; Eastmancolour, Scope, 35mm; running time: 96 minutes. Filmed in Tibet. Distributed in the United States by China Film Import and Export.

Executive producer: Wu Tianming; screenplay: Zhang Rui; photography: Hou Yong, Zhao Fei; assistant director: Pan Peicheng; production manager: Li Changqing; editor: Li Jingzhong; art director: Huo Jianqi; lighting: Yao Zhuoxi; music: Qu Xiaosong.

Cast: Tsheshang Rigzin (Norbu); Dan Jiji (Dolma); Jayang Jamco (Tashi); Gaoba (Nowre); Daiba (Granny); Drashi (Grandfather).

Publications

Book:

Berry, Chris, Perspectives on Chinese Cinema, London, 1991.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 2 September 1987.

Combs, R., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1987.

Stanbrook, A., "Sky-burial," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1987.

Bourgignon, T., "Documentaire magique," in Positif (Paris), December 1991.

Cheng, Scarlet, "Directors: A Rebel's Cause," Asiaweek, February 16, 1994.

Sklar, Robert, "People and Politics, Simple and Direct," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 4, 1994.

Gladney, D.C., "Tian Zhuangzhuang, the 5th Generation, and Minorities in Film in China," in Public Culture, vol. 8, no. 1, 1995.

Buchet, J.-M., "Le voleur de chevaux," in Les Cine-Fiches de Grand Angle, May 1997.

* * *

It is 1923, on the remote Tibetan plains. Two horsemen dressed in sheepskin gallop over a ridge on their way to rustle a coral of horses. Half drama and half reconstructed documentary on a life long past, Horse Thief is director Tian Zhuangzhuang's romantic peacen to China's Noble Savage.

Norbu is the Savage in question. With his long mass of tangled hair, his well-tanned and sinuous torso, and his dark flashing eyes, he rides a horse with as much dignity and naturalness as he strides the arid plains. He may steal horses and waylay Muslim travelers in the desert, but he is, nevertheless, a devoted husband to his wife, Dolma, and doting father to his young son, Tashi. In this film we become witness to the rites and passages of traditional Tibetan life—the ritualistic offerings to the gods; a funeral wake that ends with the corpse being laid out to be pecked apart by vultures; a visit by Norbu, his wife, and son to a temple to spin a row of vertical prayer wheels mounted on columns.

In one especially stunning scene, a crowd of men gather in the valley to worship the Mountain God. They set up an endless wailing as they push the sacred sheep ahead of them. They toss wads of votive paper into air. Caught by gusts of wind, the papers swirl forward, like giant snowflakes, blanketing the valley amidst a spooky chorus of voices. In another hypnotic scene Norbu and Dolma stand, pray, and prostrate themselves across the plain against a series of superimposed religious objects and temple architecture. The sound of bells, the drone of chanting, the rhythm of a single drum—all help transport us into the primeval world of legend.

Horse thievery is one thing—but desecration is another. One day Norbu and his outlaw partner come upon a sacred ground, where offerings have been left strewn about. They begin to pick through the jewelry and ornaments. “The big pile is for the temple, the small ones we’ll split between us,” says Norbu. Then something catches his eye. From a pile he picks out a golden medallion, which he exchanges for something of his own. Returning home, he gives it to his chortling boy: but here in the pristine, primeval world, everything is linked, and there is no crime without punishment. As the village elder says, “Norbu has offended God. He stole the official’s temple gifts.” He continues, “The officials demand a serious punishment, but no matter what, he’s a member of my clan. According to our rules, he is to be driven out forever.”

As Noble Savage, Norbu manfully accepts his fate and leaves at once. Exile, however, is not the worst punishment. His young son soon falls ill. Norbu brings back Holy Water from the temple to dab his son’s forehead; he rocks the sick child in his arms, singing, “Go to sleep and I will give you a horse/ There’s a saddle ready for you, and I have a bridle, too/ I will catch a star just for you. . . .”

But for all of Norbu’s tenderness, the boy dies. Even the land itself is sick. As stock animals die off in droves, Norbu’s tribe is forced to move west, and Norbu himself must steal again. In the end, he pays a desperate price for his transgressions.

Director Tian (b. 1952) entered the Beijing Film Academy in 1978, and yet he had to go elsewhere to make the two films on which his reputation is based—to the Inner Mongolia Film Studio for On the Hunting Ground (1985; a film about Mongolian horsemen) and to Xian Film Studio for Horse Thief. In Horse Thief, using only sparse dialogue, Tian has created a stunning poetry with visuals, editing, and sound that convey the very experience of living in an ancient tribal universe, a world of myth and immutable laws. Although the film was not well received in China, selling just seven prints, Tian himself dismissed the lack of audience. As he said in a controversial interview with Yang Ping for the magazine Popular Cinema: “I shot Horse Thief for audiences of the next century to watch.”

—Scarlet Cheng

DAWANDEH

(The Runner)

Iran, 1984

Director: Amir Naderi

Production: Tehran Institute for the Intellectual Development of Children and Young Adults; colour, 35mm; running time: 94 minutes.

Executive producer: Fathola Dalili; screenplay: Amir Naderi, Behruz Gharibpur; photography: Firuz Malkzadeh; editor: Bahram Beyza'i; assistant director: Mohammad Hassanzadeh; production design: Gholam Reza Ramezani; sound: Nezam-e-Din Kia'i.

Cast: Majid Nirumand (Amiro); Musa Torkizadeh (Musa); A. Gholamzadeh (Uncle Gholam); Reza Ramezani (Ramezan).

Publications

Articles:

Variety (New York), 2 October 1985.

Sabouraud, F., “L’enfant double,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1986.

Glaessner, Verina, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1988.

Skrien (Amsterdam), April-May 1990.

* * *

Dawandeh follows the day-to-day life of 13-year-old Amiro. The boy ekes out a living amongst the underclass of an Iranian port community. Depicting the details of his life—collecting bottles discarded from ships, shining shoes, and at home on a derelict boat on the shoreline—this is a remarkable story of a boy who rises above all odds to better himself.

Amiro is charged with a will to survive: in addition to struggling to earn enough money to feed himself, he takes himself to school for literacy classes. Everything to the boy is a challenge, and the almost palpable spark within him drives him onward in his quest for triumph.

Amiro yearns for things outside his grasp: he runs along the shoreline shouting and waving at the great ships; he's fascinated by a light plane he sees at a local aerodrome and is overjoyed to see it take off, seemingly able to whisk people away from his reality of grinding poverty to a new world.

To overcome the difficulties of his life, Amiro learns to outrun his adversaries. When he joins a gang of boys collecting bottles dumped from ships and bobbing about in the shallows, he learns the quickest worker can collect the most—a lesson not without cost, he discovers, as his speed at this task leads to a fight with one of the regular collectors. Another of his attempts to earn a living is selling iced water to the dock workers. This involves buying ice some distance away from the port and running back with it. Amiro's running skills and determination are proven when he is able to wrest the melting ice away from an adult thief.

Amiro must pay for everything in his life: the inner-tube he uses to float out into the bay for the bottle collection, the ice to sell on the port, and even a burnt-out light bulb with which to decorate his makeshift home in an attempt to emulate the "glamour" of the outdoor cafe where he is a shoeshine boy. When one of the customers at the cafe accuses Amiro of stealing his lighter, the boy is aghast at this allegation, as he is innately honest.

This story of a poverty-ridden existence is superbly realised by director Amir Naderi, not only because it is an autobiographical account of his childhood, but also because the filmmaking is of such a high standard. Majid Nerimand as Amiro is wonderful, bringing real feeling and acting skill to his role. Naderi obviously knows his locale intimately and this shows in the film. We see life from Amiro's point of view and accept it for what it is. We have the insider's view of this world and the film gains from that—the unpretentious, yet intimate, forum is Dawandeh's strongest quality.

—Lee Sellars

A DAY IN THE COUNTRY

See UNE PARTIE DE CAMPAGNE

DAY OF WRATH

See VREDENS DAG

DAYBREAK

See LE JOUR SE LEVE

DAYS AND NIGHTS IN THE FOREST

See Aranyer din Ratri

DAYS OF BEING WILD

See AHFEI ZHENG ZHUAN

DAYS OF HEAVEN

USA, 1978

Director: Terrence Malick

Production: O.P. Productions; Metrocolor, 35mm, Dolby sound; running time: 95 minutes. Released 13 September 1978. Filmed on location in the Midwest; cost: $2.5 million.

Producers: Bert and Harold Schneider; executive producer: Jacob Brickman; screenplay: Terrence Malick; photography: Nestor Almendros with additional photography by Haskell Wexler; editor: Billy Weber; sound mixers: George Ronconi, Barry Thomas; special sound effects: James Cox; art director: James Fisk; music: Ennio Morricone and Leo Kottke; special effects: John Thomas and Mel Merrells; costume designer: Patricia Norris.

Cast: Richard Gere (The Brother); Brooke Adams (The Girl); Sam Shepard (The Farm owner); Linda Manz (The Sister); Robert Wilke (The Foreman); Jackie Shultis; Stuart Margolin; Tim Scott; Gene Bell; Doug Kershaw (Fiddle player).

Awards: Oscar for Best Cinematography, 1978; New York Film Critics Award for Best Director, 1978; Cannes Film Festival, Best Director, 1979.

Publications

Articles:

Schreger, C., in Variety (New York), 13 September 1978.

Fox, T. C., in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1978.

Riley, B., "Nestor Almendros Interviewed," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1978.

Films in Review (New York), November 1978.

Insdorf, A., in Take One (Montreal), November 1978.

Hodenfield, Chris, "Terrence Malick: Days of Heaven's Image Maker," in Rolling Stone (New York), 16 November 1978.

Films and Filming (London), December 1978.

Christian Century (Chicago), 3 January 1979.

Schlesinger, Arthur M., "Days of High Seriousness," in Saturday Review (New York), 6 January 1979.

Corliss, Richard, in New York Times, 8 January 1979.

Maraval, P., "Dossier: Hollywood 79—Terrence Malick," in Cinématographe (Paris), March 1979.

Combs, Richard, "The Eyes of Texas: Terrence Malick's Days of Heaven," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1979.

Carcassone, P., in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1979.

Coleman, John, in New Statesman (London), 1 June 1979.

Morris, M., in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), September-October 1979.

Alpert, Hollis, "The Rise of Richard Gere," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), October 1979.

Ciment, Michel, and B. Riley, "Le Jardin de Terrence Malick," in Positif (Paris), December 1979.

Pérez Turrent, T., "Días de Gloria y Badlands: Terrence Malick, nueva personalidad del cine norteamericano," in Cine (Mexico City), March 1980.

Days of Heaven

Bedoya, R., in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), November 1980.

Donough, M., “West of Eden: Terrence Malick’s Days of Heaven,” in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Fall 1985.

Taubin, A., in Village Voice (New York), 8 June 1993.

Wondra, Janet, “A Gaze Unbecoming: Schooling the Child for Femininity in Days of Heaven,” in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 16, no. 4, October 1995.

Séquences (Haute-Ville), March/June 1997.

Positif (Paris), March 1999.

* * *

Of Terrence Malick’s two feature films to date, Badlands is perhaps the more satisfying, Days of Heaven the more remarkable. Malick’s achievement must be seen first and foremost in terms of its opposition to the dominant Hollywood shooting and editing codes of the period. Those codes are centred on the television-derived misuse and overuse of the telephoto (plus zoom) lens, in the interests of speed and economy rather than from any aesthetic interest in its intrinsic properties; this is seconded by the lyrical use of shallow focus and focus-shifts as an instant signifier of “beauty” (flowers in focus in the foreground, out-of-focus lovers in the background, shift focus to the lovers behind a foreground of out-of-focus flowers). Bo Widerberg’s use of this in Elvira Madigan (the decisive influence) had a certain authenticity and originality, but it quickly lapsed into automatic cliché. Within such a context the sharp-etched, crystal-clear, depth-of-field images of Malick and his magnificent cameraman, Nestor Almendros, in Days of Heaven assume the status of protest and manifesto. They restore the concept of “beauty” from its contemporary debasement.

There is a further consequence of this—what one might call the resurrection of mise-en-scène, theorized in the 1950s and 1960s as the essential art of film, and seemingly a lost art since. In place of the “one-shot—one point” of the flat, perfunctory images derived from television, Malick suddenly has a frame within which to compose in depth, where every segment of the image potentially signifies. The desire for precision and definition within the image here combines naturally with a most delicate feeling for nuances of emotion and interchange between the characters. Joseph Conrad’s description of Henry James as “the historian of fine consciences” comes to mind. Aptly enough; for what is Days of Heaven but a re-working of the subject of James's The Wings of the Dove, with the sexes reversed and the protagonists transposed to the working class?

Given the film's concern with the realities of democratic capitalism—manifest inequality, poverty, class oppression—the “beauty” is a potential problem. Indeed it comes perilously close (especially in its opening sequences) to aestheticizing misery in the manner of, for example, Lean's Doctor Zhivago, where the response “Isn't that terrible?” is completely superseded by “Isn't that beautifully photographed?” The distinction of Days of Heaven lies partly in its careful separation of its sense of beauty from the human misery and tension depicted. The pervasive suggestion is that human existence could correspond to the natural and aesthetic beauty the film celebrates, were it not for the oppressive systems of organization that men [sic] have developed: the film's sense of tragedy is firmly grounded in an awareness of class and gender oppression. As in Heaven's Gate, the woman expresses her ability and freedom to love both men. It is the men who precipitate catastrophe by demanding exclusivity and ownership as their right, and as a means of bolstering their threatened egos.

Badlands explicitly acknowledged, in its final credits, the influence of Arthur Penn; in fact, its relation to Bonnie and Clyde is at once obvious and tenuous, restricted to its subject. Far more important seemed the influence of Godard, especially in Les Carabiniers and Pierrot le fou. The film's counterpointing of verbal narration and image is extremely sophisticated and, in relation to classical Hollywood narrative, audaciously unconventional. Days of Heaven simultaneously modifies and develops this strategy; the verbal narration of Linda Manz represents a less jarring dislocation than the use of Sissy Spacek's diary in the earlier film, but provides a continuous and subtle distancing which contributes significantly to the film's unique flavor, in which irony co-exists with intense involvement.

—Robin Wood

DE CIERTA MANERA

(One Way or Another)

Cuba, 1977

Director: Sara Gómez

Production: Instituto Cubano del Arte e Industria Cinematográficos (ICAIC); black and white, 35mm, originally shot in 16mm; running time: 79 minutes; length: 2147 meters. Released 1977.

Producer: Camilo Vives; scenario: Sara Gómez and Tomas González Pérez; screenplay: Tomas Gutiérrez Alea and Julio García Espinosa; assistant directors: Rigoberto López and Daniel Díaz Torres; photography: Luis García; editor: Iván Arocha; sound: Germinal Hernández; production designer: Roberto Larraburre; music: Sergio Vitier; songs: Sara González.

Cast: Mario Balmaseda (Mario); Yolanda Cuellar (Yolanda); Mario Limonta (Humberto).

Publications

Books:

Adelman, Alan, editor, A Guide to Cuban Cinema, Pittsburgh, 1981.
Chanan, Michael, The Cuban Image: Cinema and Cultural Politics in Cuba, London, 1985.

Articles:

Chijona, Geraldo, in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 93.
López, Rigoberto, “Hablar de Sara: De cierta manera,” in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 93.
“Special Sections” of Jump Cut (Berkeley), December 1978 and May 1980.
Lesage, Julia, “One Way or Another: Dialectical, Revolutionary, Feminist,” in Jump Cut (Berkeley), May 1979.
Marrosu, A., in Cine al Día (Caracas), June 1980.
Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1980.
Chanan, M., “Otra mirada,” in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 127, 1989.
Lezcano, J. A., “De cierta manera con Sara Gómez,” in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 127, 1989.
Lopez, A. M., “Parody, Underdevelopment, and the New Latin American Cinema,” in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (New York), no. 1–2, 1990.
Davies, Catherine, “Modernity, Masculinity and Imperfect Cinema in Cuba,” in Screen (Oxford), Winter 1997.

* * *

Here is a revolutionary film: dialectical in form and content, humble in the face of real human experience, proposing no final answers except the unending struggle of a people to make something out of what history has made of them. De cierta manera is that powerful hybrid—the fictional documentary set to a tropical beat—for which the cinema of revolutionary Cuba is justifiably famous. In this instance, the documentary deals with the destruction of slum housing and the struggle against the culture of marginality generated in such slums through the creation of a new housing project (Miraflores) and an accompanying educational program. The fictional embodiment of this historical process is seen in the clash of attitudes between Mario (a product of the slums), his lover Yolanda (a teacher who has come to Miraflores to help integrate such marginal elements into the revolution), and his friend Humberto (a fun-loving slacker). In the course of telling these stories, and others, De cierta manera demolishes the categories of fiction and documentary, insisting that both forms are equally mediated by the intention of the filmmaker, and that both thus require a critical stance.

This insistence on a critical attitude is conveyed, first of all, in the dialectical resonance of the film, a structure characteristic of the best of the Cuban cinema. Visually this resonance is achieved through a rich blending of fictional present and historical recreation with documentary and semi-documentary. In fact, it becomes impossible to distinguish the different forms; fictional characters are set in documentary sequences where they interact with real people and real people re-enact historical re-constructions which are not visually in accordance with their own telling of the stories. Further, the film repeats various sequences several times, twisting the film back on itself and requiring the audience to participate actively in analyzing the different perspectives offered on the problems posed by the film.

The sound track is as creatively textured as are the images, and is every bit as demanding of the audience. The film sets up a tension between the classical documentary and its omniscient narrator, cinema-verité interviews, and fictional cinema. The omniscient documentary provides sociological data on different facets of marginality. Although this data establishes one framework for the “fictional” core of the film, its deliberately pompous tone warns us that we must critically question even such “official” pronouncements.

This omniscient narrator is juxtaposed to the conversations which take place around different aspects of marginalism. The manifestations of the culture of marginality are seen to be manifold—work absenteeism, machismo, delinquency—and the problem is hotly debated by everyone. Humberto is criticized for taking off from work on an unauthorized four-day jaunt with a girlfriend, while lying about his “sick mother.” Mario is criticized for denouncing Humberto, not because his attitude was counterproductive, but because Humberto accused him of being an informer—a violation of male-bonding rules. Yolanda criticizes the mothers of children who misbehave in school, and is in turn criticized by her co-workers for her inability to empathize with women whose background is so different from hers. Although trenchant and acute, these critiques are also loving and constructive. Just as individuals in the film leave these confrontations with a clearer understanding of the revolutionary process to which they are committed, so too does the audience leave the film with a more precise notion of dialectical film.

At the end of the film, the factory workers meet where the fictional confrontation of Mario and Humberto took place and enter into a discussion of the case. They seem to rise up and incorporate themselves into the actual production of the film itself. This is as it should be, for this film demands the participation of all: real people and actors, workers and marginal elements, teachers and housewives, audience and filmmaker. The wrecking ball (in a sequence repeated several times during the film) is not only destroying the slums and (metaphorically) the slum mentality, it may also be demolishing some of the more cherished assumptions of moviegoers in bourgeois cultures.

—John Mraz

THE DEAD

UK/US/West Germany, 1987

Director: John Huston

Production: Liffey; color; running time: 83 minutes. Filmed in Dublin, Ireland, and Valencia, California.

Producer: Wieland Schulz-Keil, Chris Sievernich, William J. Quigley (executive); screenplay: Tony Huston, from a story by James Joyce; cinematographer: Fred Murphy; editor: Roberto Silvi; music: Alex North; casting: Nuala Moisselle; production design: Stephen B. Grimes, J. Dennis Washington; set decoration: Josie MacAvin; costume design: Dorothy Jeakins; production manager: Tom Shaw; makeup: Fern Buchner, Keis Maes, Anthony Cortino, Louise Dowling, Anne Dunne, Christopher Shihar.

Cast: Anjelica Huston (Gretta Conroy); Donal McCann (Gabriel Conroy); Helena Carroll (Aunt Kate); Cathleen Delany (Aunt Julia); Dan O’Herlihy (Mr. Browne); Donal Donnelly (Freddy Malins); Marie Kean (Mrs. Malins); Frank Patterson (Bartell D’Arcy); Rachael Dowling (Lily); Ingrid Craigie (Mary Jane); Maria McDermottroe (Molly Ivors); Sean McGlory (Mr. Grace); Kate O’Toole (Miss Furlong); Maria Hayden (Miss O’Callaghan); Bairbre Dowling (Miss Higgins); Lyda Anderson (Miss Daly); Colm Meaney (Mr. Bergin); Cormac O’Herlihy (Mr. Kerrigan); Paul Grant (Mr. Duffy); Paul Carroll (Young Gentleman); Patrick Gallagher (Mr. Egan); Dara Clarke (Miss Power); Brendan Dillon (Cabman); Redmond Gleeson (Nightporter); Amanda Baird (Young Lady).

Awards: National Society of Films Critics Award for Best Film, 1987; Special Achievement Award (John Huston), Tokyo International Film Festival, 1987; Independent Spirit Awards for Best Director and Best Actress (Angelica Huston), 1988; Best American Film Award, Bodil Festival, 1989.

Publications:

Books:

- McCarty, John, The Films of John Huston, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1987.
 Grobel, Lawrence, The Hustons, New York, 1989.
 Studlar, Gaylyn, editor, Reflections in a Male Eye: John Huston and the American Experience, Washington, D.C., 1993.
 Cooper, Stephen, Perspectives on John Huston, New York, 1994.
 Brill, Lesley, John Huston’s Filmmaking, New York, 1997.
 Cohen, Allen, John Huston: A Guide to References and Resources, New York, 1997.

Articles:

- “Zenith and Huston to Team on The Dead,” in Variety (New York), vol. 325, 17 December 1986.
 Harnetz, A., “Patient: John Huston; Rx: Film,” in The New York Times, 8 March 1987.
 Huston, T., “Family Ties,” in American Film, vol. 12, September 1987.
 Cart, T. McCarthy, “Film Legend John Huston Dead at 81: Final Pic Bows at Venice,” in Variety (New York), vol. 328, 2 September 1987.
 Wiener, D.J., “The Dead: A Study in Light and Shadow,” in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 68, November 1987.
 Sante, L., “The Last Chapter: The Dead,” in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 1, December 1987.
 Cargin, P., “Huston’s Finale,” in Film (London), no. 10, December 1987.
 Kael, P., “The Current Cinema: Irish Voices,” in New Yorker, vol. 63, 14 December 1987.
 O’Brien, T., “Screen: Ethnic Colorings—Emperor, The Dead, and Wannsee,” in Commonweal, vol. 114, 18 December 1987.
 Kauffman, S., “Stanley Kauffmann on Films: Last Rites,” in The New Republic, vol. 197, 21 December 1987.
 Baxter, B., in Films and Filming (London), no. 399, December 1987.
 Pulleine, T., “A Memory of Galway,” in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 5, no. 1, 1987/1988.

The Dead

- Burgess, A., "The Task of Turning Joyce's Prose to Film Poetry," in The New York Times, vol. 137, section 2, 3 January 1988.
- Denby, D., "The Living," in New York Magazine, vol. 21, 18 January 1988.
- Varjola, M., "Elava Kuollut," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 4, 1988.
- James, C., "Film View: When Film Becomes a Feast of Words," in The New York Times, vol. 138, section 2, 30 July 1989.
- Cardullo, B., "Epiphanies," in Hudson Review, vol. 41, no. 4, 1989.
- Shout, J.D., "Joyce at Twenty-Five, Huston at Eighty-One: The Dead," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 17, no. 2, 1989.
- Yetya, N., "Los Muertos," in Dicine, no. 36, September 1990.
- "The Angel Gabriel," in New Yorker, vol. 68, 28 December 1992/4 January 1993.
- Pederson, A., "Uncovering The Dead: A Study of Adaptation," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 21, no. 1, 1993.
- Pilipp, F., "Narrative Devices and Aesthetic Perception in Joyce's and Huston's The Dead," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 21, no. 1, 1993.

* * *

It's hard to think of a major filmmaker who relied more on literary adaptations than John Huston. The great majority of his 36 features—and virtually all the best ones—were drawn from novels, short stories, or plays; and he was invariably, though never slavishly, faithful to the spirit of the original. This quality of loving respect for his source material shines through the culminating film of his long career, The Dead. A bitter-sweet meditation on transience and mortality, The Dead is taken from the last and longest story in James Joyce's 1914 collection Dubliners. The setting is Dublin in the winter of 1904 when two elderly sisters, Kate and Julia Morkan, and their niece, Mary Jane, give their annual dinner party and dance. The scenario, by Huston's son Tony, sticks closely to the original story and often uses Joyce's own dialogue. On the surface, very little happens. ("The biggest piece of action," Huston noted ironically, "is trying to pass the port.") The guests assemble; they eat, drink, dance, banter, and in one or two cases flirt mildly; the party winds to its end; and in the closing fifteen minutes we follow two of the company as they return to their hotel. We seem to be watching the casual, happening flow of life, convivial but unremarkable. No voices are raised, except now and then in song; no dramatic emphases in the acting, scoring, or camerawork urge our attention. Yet every detail, unobtrusively placed, contributes to the final effect: a rare depth of poignancy, all the more moving for being so quietly expressed.

When he made The Dead Huston was himself dying, and knew it. Suffering from terminal emphysema, he directed from a wheelchair, hooked up to an oxygen cylinder. He had hoped to make the film in Ireland, as a farewell to the country where he had lived for twenty years and whose citizenship he'd taken, but it proved impractical. Instead, a wintry Dublin was convincingly recreated in a warehouse in Valencia, north of Los Angeles, with a second unit sent to Ireland to pick up location shots. Much of the time, constrictions of space made it impossible for Huston to be on set with the actors, and he directed via a TV monitor. None of these limitations shows in the film, which feels effortlessly relaxed and natural.

Throughout the long party sequence that takes up the first hour of the film, Huston's camera roams around the various groupings, picking up snatches of conversation, conveying unspoken nuances in a gesture or a glance. Matters of politics and religion are touched on, sketching in a sense of the period: an assertive young woman, Molly Ivors, mocks the hostesses' nephew, Gabriel Conroy, for being a "West Briton" who neglects Irish culture, and Aunt Kate tactfully refers to the Protestant Mr. Browne as being "of the other persuasion." The scapegrace Freddy Malins arrives tipsy, to the alarm of his mother who anxiously steers him away from further boozing. Mary Jane plays a showy piece on the piano; older guests listen politely while the younger ones escape to the drinks table in the next room. The cast, all Irish except Anjelica Huston (who, having grown up in Ireland, fits in seamlessly) and many of them from the Abbey Theatre company, give a note-perfect display of ensemble acting.

Gradually, beneath the light comedy, more sombre themes emerge. The older, frailer sister, Miss Julia, is persuaded to sing a Bellini aria; her quavery voice suggests this will be the last year she'll be there to sing it. Talk turns to lost glories of the past, to friends now dead, to monks who sleep in their coffins as a reminder of "their last end." And alongside these intimations of mortality comes the idea of a love absolute and all-consuming when one of the guests recites an old Irish poem, the sole notable element in the film not drawn from Joyce's original: "You have taken the East and the West from me, you have taken the sun and the moon from me. . . ." During this, Gabriel casts a glance at his wife Gretta (Huston) who is listening, rapt.

This brief shot foreshadows the turning moment of the film. The party is breaking up, Gabriel and Gretta are on their way downstairs, when from above comes the voice of a tenor singing a melancholy old ballad, "The Lass of Aghrim." Gretta stops on the stair, transfixed, her whole posture suggesting a sorrow long held within her like an unborn child. At the hotel she tells Gabriel how the song was once sung by a gentle boy who died—perhaps for love of her. She weeps herself to sleep, while Gabriel gloomily reflects how prosaic, by comparison, is his love for her, "how poor a part I've played in her life." He muses on the dead boy, on his aunt soon to die, on others departed, and as the snow swirls outside the window, his voice-over thoughts ease into the words that end Joyce's story: "Snow is general all over Ireland. . . falling faintly through the universe, and faintly falling, like the descent of their last end, upon all the living and the dead." John Huston's last film, an elegy for Ireland and for himself, closes on a grace-note at once regretful and reconciled.

—Philip Kemp

DEAD OF NIGHT

UK, 1945

Directors: Alberto Cavalcanti, Charles Crichton, Basil Dearden, Robert Hamer

Production: A Michael Balcon Production for Ealing Studios; filmed as a set of five stories, with a linking narrative directed by Dearden from a story by E. F. Benson: "Christmas Party" (director: Cavalcanti, from a story by Angus Macphail), "Hearse Drivers" (director: Dearden, from a story by E. F. Benson), "The Haunted Mirror" (director: Hamer, from a story by John V. Baines), "Golfing Story" (director: Crichton, from a story by H. G. Wells), "The Ventriloquist Dummy" (director: Cavalcanti, from a story by John V. Baines); black and white; running time: 102 minutes. Released September 1945.

Producer: Michael Balcon; associate producers: Sidney Cole, John Croydon; screenplay: John V. Baines, Angus Macphail; additional dialogue: T. E. B. Clarke; photography: Stan Pavey, Douglas Slocombe; editor: Charles Hasse; art director: Michael Relph; music: Georges Auric.

Cast: Linking narrative: Mervyn Johns (Walter Craig); Renee Gadd (Mrs. Craig); Roland Culver (Eliot Foley); Mary Merrall (Mrs. Foley); Frederick Valk (Dr. van Straaten); Barbara Leake (Mrs. O'Hara). "Christmas Party": Sally Ann Howes (Sally O'Hara);

Dead of Night

Michael Allan (Jimmy); Robert Wyndham (Dr. Albury). “Hearse Driver”: Antony Baird (Hugh); Judy Kelly (Joyce); Miles Malleison (Hearse Driver/Bus Conductor). “The Haunted Mirror”: Googie Withers (Joan); Ralph Michael (Peter); Esme Percy (Antique Dealer). “Golfing Story”: Basil Radford (George); Naunton Wayne (Larry); Peggy Bryan (Mary). “The Ventriloquist’s Dummy”: Michael Redgrave (Maxwell Frere); Hartley Power (Sylvester Kee); Elisabeth Welch (Beulah); Magda Kun (Mitzi); Garry Marsh (Harry Parker).

Publications

Books:

- Klaue, Wolfgang, and others, Cavalcanti, Berlin, 1952.
 Pirie, David, A Heritage of Horror: The English Gothic Cinema 1946–1972, London, 1973.
 Everson, William K., Classics of the Horror Film, New York, 1974.
 Barr, Charles, Ealing Studios, London, 1977.
 Perry, George, Forever Ealing, London, 1981.
 Eberwein, Robert T., Film and the Dream Screen: A Sleep and a Forgetting, Princeton, 1984.
 Brown, Geoff, Michael Balcon: Pursuit of Britain, New York, 1990.
 Barr, Charles, Ealing Studios, Berkeley, 1999.

Articles:

- Documentary Newsletter* (London), no. 7, 1945.
Kine Weekly (London), 6 September 1945.
Variety (New York), 19 September 1945.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), 30 September 1945.
Hollywood Reporter, 28 June 1946.
New York Times, 29 June 1946.
Variety (New York), 3 July 1946.
Motion Picture Herald (New York), 6 July 1946.
 Villegas Lopez, Manuel, “Análisis de los valores, Al morir la noche,” in Cinema: Técnica y estética del arte nuevo, Madrid, 1954.
 Agee, James, Agee on Film 1, New York, 1958.
 Barr, Charles, “Projecting Britain and the British Character” (2 parts), in Screen (London), Spring and Summer 1974.
 Brossard, Chandler, in Film Comment (New York), May–June 1974.
Ecran Fantastique (Paris), no. 2, 1977.
Ecran Fantastique (Paris), September 1986.
 Branagh, K., in Premiere (Boulder), February 1993.
 Aachen, G., “Dead of Night,” in Reid’s Film Index (Wyong), no. 30, 1997.

* * *

Dead of Night’s status as the first British horror film of note (advanced most convincingly by David Pirie in his book A Heritage of Horror) rests largely on the Robert Hamer-directed “Haunted Mirror” episode. Certainly this masterful piece of work, with its depiction of a destructive sexuality emerging from the 19th-century setting reflected in the mirror, anticipates elements of Hammer horror in the 1950s and 1960s.

However, the film as a whole can also be seen as a response to the social dislocations caused by the end of the war, and in particular a confusion in masculine identity arising from difficulties in integrating a large part of the male population back into civilian life. On one level, Dead of Night reveals a male fear of domesticity, which is here equated with emasculation and the presence of strong, independent women who are seen to have usurped male authority (one thinks of Googie Withers organising her wedding while her fiancée waits passively in his flat, and of Sally Ann Howes violently rejecting the amorous advances of a fellow teenager). The film is full of weak, crippled, and/or victimised male characters: an injured racing driver, a boy murdered by his elder sister, a meek accountant dominated first by his fiancée and then by the influence of the “haunted mirror,” and—in an extraordinary performance by Michael Redgrave—a neurotic ventriloquist who eventually collapses into complete insanity. It is significant in this light that the character whose dream the film turns out to be is an architect, a symbolically charged profession at a time of national reconstruction. That this architect is indecisive, frightened, and, at the end of his dream, shown as harbouring murderous desires underlines the film’s lack of confidence in the future.

This can be connected with what is in effect a systematic undermining of one of the characteristic themes of British World War II cinema, namely the formation of a cohesive group out of diverse social elements. (Ealing Studios, which produced Dead of Night, contributed to this with, among others, San Demetrio London and The Bells Go Down.) Dead of Night begins with a group of characters coming together, but here this is not in the interests of establishing a national consensus. Instead this group is fragmented by the film’s insistent stress on the ways in which each individual is trapped within his or her own perceptions and mental processes. Each story tells of a private experience, something that more often than not is witnessed by only one person.

The sense of alienation thereby produced further manifests itself in the many references in the film to acts of vision which are unreliable or compromised in some way. Repeatedly characters stare disbelievingly at the “impossible” events unfolding before them. Seeing is no longer believing. The faith in an objective reality central to British wartime documentaries and which also contributed to the style adopted by many fiction films has been eroded. Dreams and fantasies have taken its place, to the extent that, as one character puts it, “None of us exist at all. We’re nothing but characters in Mr. Craig’s dream.”

The complexities of Dead of Night are beautifully crystallised in the moment where the psychoanalyst who throughout the film has argued for logic and reason accidentally breaks his spectacles. The clarity of vision induced by a wartime situation has been similarly shattered. All that remains is an uncertainty and fear which the film records in an obsessive and disturbing detail.

—Peter Hutchings

DEAD RINGERS

Canada, 1988

Director: David Cronenberg

Production: Mantle Clinic II Ltd., in association with Morgan Creek Productions; colour, 35mm; running time: 115 minutes.

Producers: David Cronenberg and Marc Boyman; executive producers: Carol Baum and Sylvio Tabet; screenplay: David Cronenberg and Norman Snider, based on the book Twins by Bari Wood and Jack Geasland; photography: Peter Suschitzky; editor: Ronald Sanders; music: Howard Shore; art director: James McAteer; production designer: Carol Spier; sound: Bryan Day; costumes: Denise Cronenberg; special effects design: Gordon Smith.

Dead Ringers

Cast: Jeremy Irons (Beverly Mantle/Elliot Mantle); Geneviève Bujold (Claire Niveau); Stephen Lack (Anders Wolleck); Heidi von Palleske (Cary); Shirley Douglas (Laura); Barbara Gordon (Danuta); Nick Nichols (Leo); Lynn Cormack (Arlene); Damir Andrei (Birchall); Miriam Newhouse (Mrs. Bookman).

Publications

Books:

Moorman, David, David Cronenberg: A Horror Filmer in Transformation, Rotterdam, 1990.
Cronenberg, David, Cronenberg on Cronenberg, London, 1992.

Shapiro, Steven, The Cinematic Body, Minneapolis and London, 1993.
Parker, Andrew, "Grafting David Cronenberg," in Media Spectacles edited by Marjorie Garber and others, New York and London, 1993.

Morris, Peter, David Cronenberg: A Delicate Balance, Milford, 1994.

Articles:

Jaehne, Karen, "Double Trouble," in Film Comment (New York), September 1988.

Variety (New York), 7 September 1988.

Gleiberman, O., "Cronenberg's Double Meanings," in American Film (Marion), October 1988.

Elia, M., Séquences (Paris), November 1988.

Lee, N., "Visuals for Dead Ringers Inspire Belief," in American Cinematographer (New York), December 1988.

Beauchamp, M., "Frères de sang," in 24 Images (Montreal), Winter 1988–89.

Stanbrook, A., "Cronenberg's Creative Cancers," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1988–89.

Baron, A.-M., Cinéma (Paris), January 1989.

- Bunbury, S., "David Cronenberg Doubles Up," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), January 1989.
- Cook, P., and A. Billson, Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1989.
- Garcia, M., Films in Review (New York), January 1989.
- Katsahnias, I., and others, "La beauté intérieure," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1989.
- Dadoun, R., "L'épouvante intérieure ou Qu'est-ce que l'homme a dans le ventre," in Positif (Paris), March 1989.
- Ramasse, F., and others, "La chair dans l'âme," in Positif (Paris), March 1989.
- Ross, P., Revue du Cinéma (Paris), March 1989.
- Kay, S., "Double or Nothing," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), July 1989.
- Nguyen, D. T., "The Projectile Movie Revisited," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Spring 1990.
- Creed, B., "Phallic Panic: Male Hysteria and Dead Ringers," in Screen (London), Summer 1990.
- Breskin, David, "David Cronenberg: The Rolling Stone Interview," in Rolling Stone (New York), 6 February 1992.
- Winnert, Derek, "Doctor in Double Trouble," in Radio Times (London), 30 May 1992.
- "Special Issue," Post Script (Commerce), vol. 15, no. 2, Winter-Spring 1996.
- Lucas, Tim, and John Charles, in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 36, 1996.

* * *

Since his first commercial film Shivers premiered in the early seventies, David Cronenberg has been saddled with the confining stereotype best exemplified in the nickname the "Baron of Blood." With subsequent films such as Rabid, Scanners, and The Fly Cronenberg has kept this reputation intact and his films rather foreboding to those uninitiated to the Cronenberg vision. With three films in the early 1990s (Dead Ringers, Naked Lunch, and M. Butterfly) however, Cronenberg departed from the conventional science-fiction/horror brand of cinema he has been known for. Dead Ringers is Cronenberg's first attempt at a conventional, tragic, human drama. The film functions in this respect so well that one is left emotionally drained and extremely melancholic after viewing it. In Cronenberg on Cronenberg, the director describes the film as follows: "[It] has to do with that element of being human. It has to do with this ineffable sadness that is an element of human existence."

The production saga of Dead Ringers began when Cronenberg first saw a headline that read something like, "Twin Docs Found Dead in Posh Pad" and decided that it was a story worth telling. "It was too perfect," the director has since said. In 1981, the project began its gestation when Carol Baum approached Cronenberg with the vague idea of doing a film about twins. Although they initially differed on subject matter they eventually settled on the story of Stewart and Cyril Marcus, twin gynecologists who, as the above headlines stated, were found dead, the perpetrators of a joint suicide. Cronenberg next read a book loosely based on the twins called, appropriately enough, Twins, by Bari Wood and Jack Geasland (the name of the film would later be changed from Twins to Dead Ringers prior to release at the request of Cronenberg's old colleague Ivan Reitman so as not to clash with the Arnold Schwarzenegger comedy vehicle). Baum and Cronenberg then enlisted producer Sylvio Tabet and chose Norman Snider to write a script. The script Snider produced however was found unacceptable to Cronenberg due to Snider's attempt to fit too much of the book into the script (Cronenberg wanted as little of the book as possible) and a re-write was commissioned. Tabet's reservations about the rewritten script killed the project at this time however and, in 1982, it seemed as though the film would never be made. Two years later, Cronenberg along with producer Mark Boyman tried to raise interest in the project once again. But, the project was to be met less than enthusiastically, with the main complaint being along the lines of: "Do they have to be gynecologists? Couldn't they be lawyers?" This question signalled to Cronenberg the inability of the studio executives to "get it," so the search for financial backing continued with Cronenberg directing The Fly (1986) in the interim. It was eventually Dino De Laurentiis's DEG company (the company that had produced The Dead Zone) that took on the project. Unfortunately, the De Laurentiis group went bankrupt shortly after agreeing to produce and Cronenberg Productions was left to produce the film independently.

Dead Ringers is the tragedy of identical twin gynecologists Beverly and Elliot Mantle (both played by Jeremy Irons). The Mantles are wunderkind doctors from Toronto who operate the famous Mantle fertility clinic where actress Claire Niveau (Geneviève Bujold) comes seeking advice on how she can become pregnant. Unfortunately, Claire is diagnosed as "trifurcate" (possession of three cervixes—a "mutant" woman) and incapable of bearing children. That evening, Elliot sleeps with Claire and then, in keeping with the twins' sharing of everything, urges Beverly to take his place the following night. Beverly, however, falls in love with Claire until, upon learning of the deception, Claire ends the ruse by refusing to see either of them. Beverly's descent begins here and he becomes addicted to both alcohol and drugs. Following a reunion with Claire, Beverly becomes insanely jealous when she leaves for a shoot and mistakenly believes she is having an affair then falls further into his drug induced depression. Elliot, who has been out of town pursuing his own career, returns to supervise his brother's detoxification but ultimately gives up when Beverly commissions the creation of gynecological instruments for operating on mutant women and uses them on actual patients, consequently destroying the clinic's reputation and the twins' practice. Elliot, in an effort to restore the perfect equilibrium they shared before they met Claire, then tries to synchronize their drug taking and keeps Beverly locked up until Claire returns and he goes to her. A week later, Claire reluctantly allows Beverly to return to his brother who has descended even further than Beverly had. The twins now lock themselves up in the clinic and gradually regress until Beverly operates on Elliot to "separate" them and kills him. Beverly then calls Claire but cannot speak and returns to the clinic and dies silently while lying across Elliot's body.

A major concern embedded in Dead Ringers is the notion of control. Cronenberg acknowledges this in the following way in Cronenberg on Cronenberg: "The whole concept of free will resists the idea of anything determining destiny. Freedom of choice rests on the premise of freedom from physical and material restrictions." The Mantles are the device Cronenberg uses "to investigate that, not as an aberration but as cases in point of genetic power." In fact, the twins have little control over their own lives until the end of the film. Cronenberg consciously constructed their world and lighted it in such a way that it resembles an enormous aquarium wherein the twins are nothing more than inhabitants who consistently run through the monotony of a fragile daily existence. The twins' synchronized world is so fragile in fact that the introduction of Claire as something the twins refuse to share completely decimates them. It is only through death that the twins assert their free will and attain the control they have lacked throughout the film. Therefore, suicide becomes the only instance in the twins' life in which they exert complete control over the outcome and sever the bizarre biological link to destiny.

Although Dead Ringers is a classic story of control, problems with analyzing it as such arise when categorizing that control. The determination of who is controlling who is an endless conundrum within the film. For example, the twins control Claire (who functions as a sort of symbolic representation of women) through gynecology by understanding her body in ways she cannot (Cronenberg's purely narrative construction of mutant women and instruments for operating on them is indicative of this control). At the same time, however, Claire wields control over the twins by using the same device in the guise of her sexuality. It is Claire who, through her control of Beverly, dictates the demise of the twins. The omnipresent nature of control in the film is ultimately its tragedy—you can't escape control. This tragedy erupts from the concept that biology is destiny. Cronenberg succeeds in questioning this theory while at the same time subscribing to it by suggesting that the concept of free will is the destroyer of destiny. That is, while the brothers' profession as gynecologists allows them to control biology to a certain degree, it is death that ultimately triumphs, although they still maintain a certain amount of control over that.

Beginning with Dead Ringers, Cronenberg has made films which seem to suggest that he has abandoned his hybrid-horror child and adopted a more cerebral and suspenseful and less sci-fi narrative style. The maturity with which these films address the Cronenbergian concerns of biological control of destiny and usurpation of that control illustrates that the new Cronenberg film is indeed grounded more in the realm of dramatic tragedy and less in either science fiction or horror.

—Michael J. Tyrkus

DEADLY IS THE FEMALE

See GUN CRAZY

DEATH BY HANGING

See KOSHIKEI

DEATH IN VENICE

See MORTE A VENEZIA

DEATH OF A CYCLIST

See MUERTE DE UN CICLISTA

DECALOGUE

See DEKALOG

THE DEER HUNTER

USA, 1978

Director: Michael Cimino

Production: EMI Films; Panavision, Technicolor, Dolby Stereo; running time: 183 minutes. Released November 1978.

Producers: Barry Spikings, Michael Deeley, Michael Cimino, John Peverall; production consultant: Joan Carelli; screenplay: Deric Washburn; story: Michael Cimino, Deric Washburn, Louis Garfinkle, Quinn K. Redeker; assistant directors: Charles Okun, Mike Grillo; photography: Vilmos Zsigmond; editor: Peter Zinner; sound editors: Teri E. Dorman, James Fritch; art directors: Ron Hobbs, Kim Swados; costumes: Eric Seelig; special make-up: Dick Smith, Daniel Striepeke; music: Stanley Myers; main title theme performed by: John Williams; military adviser: Richard Dioguardi; Vietnamese adviser: Eleanor Dawson.

Cast: Robert De Niro (Michael Vronsky); John Cazale (Stan, "Stosh"); John Savage (Steven); Christopher Walken (Nikanor Chevotarevich, known as Nick); Meryl Streep (Linda); George Dzundza (John); Chuck Aspegren (Axel); Shirley Stoler (Steven's Mother); Rutanya Alda (Angela); Pierre Segui (Julien); Mady Kaplan (Axel's Girl); Amy Wright (Bridesmaid); Mary Ann Haenel (Stan's Girl); Richard Kuss (Linda's Father); Joe Grifasi (Bandleader); Joe Strand (Bingo Caller); Helen Tomko (Helen); Paul D'Amato (Sergeant); Dennis Watlington (Cab Driver); Charlene Darrow (Redhead); Jane-Colette Disko (Girl Checker); Michael Wollett (Stock Boy); Robert Beard, Joe Dizimba (World War Veterans); Father Stephen Kopestonsky (Priest); John F. Buchmelter III (Bar Patron); Frank Devore (Barman); Tom Becker (Doctor); Lynn Kongkham (Nurse); Nongnuj Timruang (Bar Girl); Po Pao Pee (Chinese Referee); Dale Burroughs (Embassy Guard); Parris Hicks (Sergeant); Samui Muang-Intata (Chinese Bodyguard); Sapox Colisium (Chinese Man); Vitoon Winwitoon (N.V.A. Officer); Somsak Sengvilva (V.C. Referee); Charan Nusvanon (Chinese Boss); Hillary Brown (Herself), Choir of St. Theodosius Cathedral, Cleveland, Ohio.

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Director, Best Supporting Actor (Walken), Best Editing, and Best Sound, 1979. British Academy of Film and Television Award for Best Cinematography (Zsigmond), 1979.

Publications

Books:

Adair, Gilbert, Vietnam on Film: From "The Green Berets" to "Apocalypse Now," New York, 1981; revised edition, as Hollywood's Vietnam, London, 1989.

Smurthwaite, Nick, The Meryl Streep Story, London, 1984.

The Deer Hunter

Maychick, Diana, Meryl Streep, New York, 1984.
 Bliss, Michael, Martin Scorsese & Michael Cimino, Lanham, 1985.
 Cameron-Wilson, James, The Cinema of Robert De Niro, London, 1986.
 McKay, Keith, Robert De Niro: The Hero Behind the Masks, New York, 1986.
 Wood, Robin, Hollywood from Vietnam to Reagan, New York, 1986.

Articles:

- Carducci, M., "Stalking the Deer Hunter: An Interview with Michael Cimino," in Millimeter (New York), March 1978.
 Henderson, Scott, "Behind the Scenes of The Deer Hunter," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), October 1978.
Variety (New York), 29 November 1978.
Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 7, no. 4, 1979.
 Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1979.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), March 1979.
Listener (London), 8 March 1979.
 Pilger, John, in New Statesman (London), 16 March 1979.
 Fox, Terry Curtis, in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1979.
 Pym, John, "A Bullet in the Head: Vietnam Remembered," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1979.
 Auster, Al, and Leonard Quart, "Hollywood and Vietnam: The Triumph of the Will," in Cineaste (New York), Spring 1979.
Positif (Paris), April 1979.
 Kinder, Marsha, and others, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1979.
 Mineo, T., "Una falsa storia Vietnamita per rimuovere la colpa americana," in Cinema Nuova (Bari), August 1979.
Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 7, no. 4, 1980.
 Franz, R. C., "Apocalypse Now and The Deer Hunter: The Lies Aren't Over," in Jump Cut (Chicago), October 1980.
 Krohn, B., "Entretien avec Michael Cimino," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1982.
 Koper, B., "Can Movies Kill?" in American Film (Washington, D.C.), July-August 1982.
 Burke, F., "In Defense of The Deer Hunter: The Knee Jerk Is Quicker Than the Eye," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1983.

- Francis, D., "The Regeneration of America: Uses of Landscape in The Deer Hunter," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1983.
- De Marinis, G., in Cineforum (Bergamo), January-February 1983.
- Wander, P., "The Aesthetics of Fascism," in Journal of Communication (Philadelphia), Spring 1983.
- Greene, N., "Coppola, Cimino: The Operatics of History," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1984-5.
- "Vietnam Issue" of Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 7, no. 4, 1985.
- Salminen, K., "Poliittinen ooppera vieraantuneesta sankarista," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 7-8, 1988.
- Burke, F., "Reading Michael Cimino's The Deer Hunter: Interpretation as Melting Pot," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1992.
- Nery, Robert, "How to Have Your Cake and Eat It Too," in Filmnews, December-January 1992-1993.
- Morice, Jacques, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Hors-série, 1993.
- Man, G., "Marginality and Centrality: The Myth of Asia in 1970s Hollywood," in East-West Film Journal (Honolulu), no. 1, 1994.
- Suarez, E., "Deliverance: Dickey's Original Screen Play," in South-ern Quarterly, vol. 33, no. 2-3, 1995.
- Worsley, Wallace, "Worsley's Year of Deliverance," in DGA (Los Angeles), vol. 12, no. 2, May-June 1997.

* * *

When it was first released, The Deer Hunter was widely praised as the first American film to concern itself with the aftermath, social and psychological, of the Vietnam War. Because of this film, in fact, Hollywood discovered that audiences were eager for cinematic treatments of the subject and a number of films dealing with Vietnam were produced in the early 1980s.

The Deer Hunter, however, is not a war film in the ordinary sense: although central episodes treat developments in the late stages of the Vietnam conflict, the main emphasis is on the experiences shared by a group of young men growing up in a small Pennsylvania industrial town. Like many of the so-called "buddy films" of the 1970s, The Deer Hunter is a male melodrama that treats the difficulties, discontents, and triumphs of the growth into manhood, including but not dominated by going to war. It also connects directly to the "artistic" trendiness of the loosely coordinated movement on the part of certain directors in the late 1960s and early 1970s (including Francis Ford Coppola, Stanley Kubrick, and Martin Scorsese) to create a "new wave" American film and to redefine the creative/commercial position of the director (who was to become more of an auteur in the continental sense). Like Coppola with The Godfather or Kubrick with A Clockwork Orange, Cimino dominated the production of The Deer Hunter, stamping it with his own developing style and thematic obsessions: it was intended to be an intensely "personal" film, and both commercial and artistic at the same time.

The Deer Hunter opens with a long and richly detailed examination of the young men whose lives are dominated by dangerous and grueling manual labor in the steel mills and the release of drinking and carousing. Mike (Robert De Niro), Nick (Christopher Walken), and Stevie (John Savage) are just about to depart for military training, having volunteered to go to Vietnam together. Stevie, before he leaves, is to get married to Angela, a local girl pregnant by another man, and Mike and Nick are planning to leave that same night for their annual hunting trip in the nearby mountains with three others. This slice of life is dominated by a concern with masculine styles and attitudes. Mike is cool, laconic, self-contained yet capable of self-destructive wildness. Nick is less sure of himself, competent with others and well-liked, but obviously a follower, not a leader. Stevie is the weakest of the trio, a man satisfied with a marriage of convenience to a woman considered to be a tramp and an opportunist, a man unsure of what he wants from life and who seems content to shape his life after Mike's and Nick's. In the New Hollywood style, the narrative is made to appear undirected, a random and "realistic" examination of working-class ethnic life, although it is in fact a careful character study. Classic Hollywood expository modes are often subverted here (withheld establishing shots or no introductions for new characters, for example), while the acting is archly naturalist in the method tradition (broken sentences, overlapping dialogue, an emphasis on inner, unspoken struggle and, inevitably, male emotion).

An excessive, "realistic" representation marks the difference between The Deer Hunter and the classic Hollywood film. But the masculine values advanced, tested, and endorsed in the film's opening sequences are thoroughly traditional. Vietnam is viewed by the trio of friends as yet another test, yet another opportunity to do the right thing and be a man. The film takes no political stand on the issue of the war. In fact, like the more recent Platoon, it depoliticizes the war, turning it into a morality play where positive and negative qualities of the American character act out a deadly, self-destructive drama. In both films, the real enemy is forgotten: the war becomes a struggle between different masculine styles and philosophies. Mike learns the dangers of the code he had lived by; he survives. Nick lives out the logical and psychological consequences of that code; he dies, in effect, a suicide. The treatment of maleness, however, is hopelessly compromised. Stevie lacks courage and competence; he becomes a pitiful paraplegic, married to a woman who doesn't love him. While the hero may renounce his "right" to assert himself, he remains a hero, at least in large part, because of his willingness to risk life and limb, to be fearless and graceful under pressure. This contradiction, at the same time, is likely what made the film's narrative so attractive to a mass audience, one willing to accept a "softened" maleness only as a renunciation of power, not as an alternative to it.

Historically, The Deer Hunter is important as the last successful realist epic produced by the artistically minded directors of the Hollywood Renaissance. Cimino's subsequent efforts in this form have met with little success. The Deer Hunter, however, was able to achieve an outstanding and surprising success because of its carefully calculated combination of traditional Hollywood melodrama with a style and themes borrowed, to a large degree, from the art cinema.

—R. Barton Palmer

DEKALOG

(Decalogue)

Poland, 1988

Director: Krzysztof Kieślowski

Production: Polish Television, TOR Studios; colour, 35mm; running time: 10 films 53-57 minutes each. Released 1989. Decalogue 5 and Decalogue 6 released theatrically in 1989 as A Short Film About Killing and A Short Film About Love. Filmed on location in Warsaw, 1988.

Producer: Ryszard Chutkowski; screenplay: Krzysztof Kieślowski, Krzysztof Piesiewicz; photography: Wiesław Zdort (Decalogue 1), Edward Klosinski (2), Piotr Sobocinski (3, 9), Krzysztof Pakulski (4), Sławomir Idziak (5), Witold Adamek (6), Dariusz Kuc (7), Andrzej Jaroszewicz (8), Jacek Blawut (10); editor: Ewa Smal; sound: Małgorzata Jaworska (1, 2, 4, 5), Nikodem Wolk-Laniewski (3, 6, 7, 9, 10), Wiesława Demblinska (8); production designer: Halina Dobrowolska; music: Zbigniew Preisner.

Cast: 1: Henryk Baranowski (Krzysztof), Wojciech Kłata (Paweł), Maja Komorowska (Irena). 2: Krystyna Janda (Dorota), Alexander Bardini (Consultant), Olgierd Łukaszewicz (Anrzej). 3: Daniel Olbrychski (Janusz), Maria Pakulnis (Ewa). 4: Adrianna Biedrzyńska (Anka), Janusz Gajos (Michał). 5: Mirosław Baka (Jacek), Krzysztof Globisz (Piotr). 6: Grazyna Szapolowska (Magda), Olaf Lubaszenko (Tomek). 7: Anna Polony (Ewa), Maja Barelkowska (Majka). 8: Maria Koscalkowska (Zofia), Teresa Marczevska (Elżbieta). 9: Ewa Blaszczyk (Hanka), Piotr Machalica (Roman). 10: Jerzy Stuhr (Jerzy), Zbigniew Zamachowski (Arthur).

Publications

Script:

Kieślowski, Krzysztof, and Krzysztof Piesiewicz, The Decalogue, London, 1991.

Kieślowski, Krzysztof, and Krzysztof Piesiewicz, Dekalog, in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), March-December 1993.

Books:

Michalek, Bolesław, and Frank Turaj, The Modern Cinema of Poland, Bloomington, 1988.

Kieślowski, Krzysztof, Kieślowski on Kieślowski, London, 1993.

Garbowski, Christopher, Krzysztof Kieślowski's Decalogue Series: The Problem of the Protagonists and Their Self-Transcendence, Boulder, 1996.

Coates, Paul, editor, Lucid Dreams: The Films of Krzysztof Kieślowski, Wiltshire, 1999.

Indorf, Annette, Double Lives, Second Chances: The Cinema of Krzysztof Kieślowski, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 27 September 1989.

Baron, A.-M., Cinéma (Paris), November 1989.

Ciment, M., and others, Positif (Paris), December 1989.

Rigney, F.J., Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Spring 1990.

Magny, J., and A. de Baecque, "Les règles du hasard," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1990.

Tobin, Y., and others, Positif (Paris), May 1990.

Cavendish, Phil, "Kieślowski's Decalogue," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1990.

Indorf, Annette, "The Decalogue: Re-Examining God's Commands," in New York Times (New York), 28 October 1990.

Tarantino, Michael, "The Cave," in Artforum (New York), December 1990.

Charbonneau, A., 24 Images (Montreal), Summer 1991.

Elia, M., "L'art du risque calculé," in Séquences (Montreal), September 1991.

Klinger, M., "Strazce brany," in Film a Doba (Prague), Summer 1992.

Holden, Stephen, "Chance, Fate and the Bible," in New York Times (New York), 8 March 1996.

Falkowska, J., "Krzysztof Kieślowski's Decalogue Series: The Problem of Protagonists and Their Self-transcendence," in Canadian Journal of Film Studies (Ottawa), no. 2, 1997.

Perlmutter, R., "Testament to the Father: Kieślowski's The Decalogue," in Film Criticism (Meadville), no. 2, 1997/1998.

* * *

Krzysztof Kieślowski, who died in Warsaw at the age of 54 while this essay was being prepared for publication, was the last great director to have emerged from Communist Poland. His Decalogue, made for Polish television in 1988–89, was, perhaps, the last masterpiece from what used to be "Eastern Europe." A product of Kieślowski's odd preoccupation with cycles (Eric Rohmer is the only other major director, similarly obsessed, who comes to mind), Decalogue is not a film, but a compendium of 10 hour-long films, based, presumably, on the Ten Commandments. The premise demands moralizing. The result is far from it. The actual meaning of each film is not in how a dictum is illustrated, and not even in a twist that each story (all of them set in the present-day Poland) gives an old maxim, but in how the material transcends the dogma into a sphere of existential mystery.

There are artists who are late bloomers, who must try out various timbres before they find their own voice. It took Antonioni over ten years and a dozen films, both fiction and documentary, to make Il Grido, his first truly "Antonionian" film. It took Kieślowski over ten years and two dozen films, both fiction and documentary, to make Decalogue, which marks both the climax of a long search and a dramatic shift in direction and quality. That the seed was there is clear in the 1981 feature Blind Chance, which sketches out three possible futures for a man who, like a tabula rasa, is open to either one. The film shows how the filmmaker sensed what was soon to become his territory in art, but didn't yet have the formal means to make that territory his own. That Decalogue changed Kieślowski's life is evident in the way that all his following films—The Double Life of Veronique, Blue, White and Red—stem from Decalogue, developing the earlier work's motifs and sharpening its filmic finesse.

From Decalogue on, Kieślowski focused exclusively on the invisible and how it can be seen. He himself could show it with an incomparable grace: the mysterious links that tie us all together; the signs and omens that nature, uselessly, sends our way; the doom, materialized in things and machines; the sadness of the pond and the clouds. In this world, an ink-spill prophesies trouble, and when somebody dies, holy water freezes in the church. This kind of cinema dangerously balances between the profound and the pretentious. But if Kieślowski slipped into pretentiousness in the occasionally ponderous Blue, Decalogue has a luminosity of milk, left (in Decalogue 1) out in the cold overnight and turned into white ice. Its light breaks the glass of the gratuitous bottle.

Decalogue's world—the world of a grim Warsaw housing development where all the stories originate—is not a collection of entities and events, but a dense substance in which everything is connected with everything. The focus is shifted from things to what lies between them. This philosophy puts Kieślowski into a glorious chain of artists—Dreyer, Bresson, Iosseliani (the line continues with Atom Egoyan and Wong Kar-wai)—and explains why his preoccupation with cycles may not be so odd after all. As people are linked in his films, so are the films themselves. The heroine of Blue shows up in the courtroom of White and then, along with the principals of White, in the coda of Red. A fictitious Dutch Renaissance composer Van den Budelmayer from Red originates in Decalogue 9, as does White's tragi-comic theme of male impotence. The brothers from Decalogue 10 don't want to stay home; they spill into the story of White. A model auteur, Kieślowski in all his later years shot one film; perhaps his decision to stop, which he made in 1994 after completing the Three Colors trilogy, grew out of a realization that his film had come to an end. (It has been reported that Kieślowski was planning another project at the time of his death.)

Like Fassbinder's 14-part Berlin, Alexanderplatz, Decalogue brilliantly utilizes its format: from television it takes not the lack of light and cinematic quality, but the extreme intimacy between the characters and the audience. Most meaningfully, it tells chamber stories in close angles. A cast of the best Polish actors, headed by Maja Komorowska, Krystyna Janda, Grazyna Szapolowska, Daniel Olbrychski, Janusz Gajos, Jerzy Stuhr, and Zbigniew Zamachowski, the work of nine terrific cinematographers, and a touching, minimalist score by Zbigniew Preisner all make Kieślowski's vast ambition possible. From the first, heartbreaking film that puts a computer in place of the "other God," that "thou shalt not have," through the two highlight novellas, later expanded by the director into A Short Film About Killing (Decalogue 5) and A Short Film About Love (Decalogue 6), this is a cinema that mesmerizes you while it's showing and haunts you long after it's all over.

—Michael Brashinsky

DELIVERANCE

USA, 1972

Director: John Boorman

Production: Warner Brothers, Elmer Enterprises; Technicolor; Panavision; running time: 109 minutes. Released July 1972.

Producer: John Boorman; production manager: Wallace Worsley; screenplay: James Dickey, from his own novel; assistant directors: Al Jennings, Miles Middough; photography: Vilmos Zsigmond; 2nd unit photography: Bill Butler; editor: Tom Priestley; sound editor: Jim Atkinson; sound recordist: Walter Goss; sound recordist: Doug Turner; art director: Fred Harpman; music: "Duellling Banjos" arranged and played by Eric Weissberg, with Steve Mandel; creative associate: Rospo Pallenberg; special effects: Marcel Vercoutere; technical advisers: Charles Wiggin, E. Lewis King.

Cast: Jon Voight (Ed); Burt Reynolds (Lewis); Ned Beatty (Bobby); Ronny Cox (Drew); Billy McKinney (Mountain Man); Herbert

"Cowboy" Coward (Toothless Man); James Dickey (Sheriff Bullard); Ed Ramey (Old Man); Billy Redden (Lonny); Seamon Glass (1st "Griner"); Randall Deal (2nd "Griner"); Lewis Crone (1st Deputy); Ken Keener (2nd Deputy); Johnny Popwell (Ambulance Driver); John Fowler (Doctor); Kathy Rickman (Nurse); Louise Coldren (Mrs. Biddiford); Pete Ware (Taxi Driver); Hoyt T. Pollard (Boy at Gas Station); Belinda Beatty (Martha Gentry); Charlie Boorman (Ed's Boy).

Publications

Script:

Dickey, James, Deliverance, Carbondale, Illinois, 1982.

Books:

Piccardi, Adriano, John Boorman, Florence, 1982.

Streetbeck, Nancy, The Films of Burt Reynolds, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1982.

Ciment, Michel, John Boorman, Paris 1985; London 1986.

Articles:

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), February 1972.

Variety (New York), 19 July 1972.

Strick, Philip, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1972.

Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1972.

Ciment, Michel, in Positif (Paris), October 1972.

Allombert, G., in Image et son (Paris), November 1972.

Grisolia, M., "L'Amérique s'est dissociée de la nature, par un sort de névrose commune," interview with John Boorman in Cinéma (Paris), November 1972.

Dempsey, M., "Deliverance/Boorman: Dickey in the Woods," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), Spring 1973.

Armour, Robert, "Deliverance: Four Variations of the American Adam," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1973.

Willson, Robert F. Jr., "Deliverance from Novel to Film: Where Is Our Hero?" in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Winter 1974.

"Boorman Issue" of Positif (Paris), March 1974.

Dunne, Aidan, "Labyrinth of Allusion," in Film Directions (Belfast), vol. 1 no. 4, 1978.

Combs, Richard, "Male Myths," in The Listener (London), 4 July 1985.

Griffith, J. J., "Damned If You Do, and Damned If You Don't: James Dickey's Deliverance," in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Spring-Summer 1986.

Williams, Linda Ruth, "Blood Brothers," in Sight & Sound (London), September 1994.

Suarez, E., "Deliverance: Dickey's Original Screen Play," in Southern Quarterly, no. 2/3, 1995.

Atkinson, M., "Jon Voight in Deliverance," in Movieline (Escondido), May 1996.

Worsley, W., "Worsley's Year of Deliverance," in DGA Magazine (Los Angeles), no. 2, 1997.

* * *

Deliverance

In the early 1970s, accelerated no doubt by Watergate, the optimistic liberal tradition was in some crisis. Conspiracy and paranoia had become common currency in popular culture, a trend evident in such otherwise diverse films as Peckinpah's Straw Dogs, Pakula's The Parallax View, Coppola's The Conversation, and Boorman's Deliverance. Where ten years earlier movie protagonists routinely triumphed over adversity, the heroes of these and other 1970s films were increasingly to find themselves trapped and destroyed by the relentless logic of events.

This is the claustrophobic plight of Deliverance's four central characters: a group of urban men caught in an escalating series of violent confrontations with the Appalachian wilderness and its (to them) alien inhabitants. Carried along by the very linearity of the narrative's voyage structure (the four are canoeing down a wild river before it is dammed to form a lake) we directly experience the constraining force of events in the movie's unremitting emphasis on physical detail. Fat Bobby, struggling in the dirt, groped and fondled at some length before he is forcibly buggered; the close-up sight and sound of an arrow pulled from the body of his attacker; the frenzied scabbling of the group as they dig a grave with their bare hands; the viscera hanging from the wound in Lewis's leg; Drew's body trapped against a boulder, his arm impossibly twisted behind his head. Such scenes are constant reminders of the brute materiality of this wilderness and of the quartet's inability to do anything but react to a succession of real and imagined provocations. Even after their deliverance, Ed wakes screaming, haunted by the fear and guilt embodied in his nightmare image of a hand emerging from the lake. As the credits roll, he lies in bed, unable to sleep.

At this level Deliverance is a pessimistic and absorbing piece of story-telling. But it is also more than that. In charting the collapse of "civilised" values, the film invokes larger, almost metaphysical themes. While they are never simply emblematic, Deliverance's four central characters do represent different aspects of the failings of civilised society, failings crystallised in their confrontation with the wilderness. "There is something in the woods and the water that we have lost in the city" opines Bobby, the brash salesman. "We didn't lose it," Lewis replies, "we sold it." Happily, any tendency to promote a mystic commitment to Nature over Civilisation (all too apparent in Boorman's later ecological parable, The Emerald Forest) is undercut by the fact that Lewis, the self-proclaimed survivor and man of the wilderness, is never elevated into the kind of sub-Nietzschean superman found in, say, The Deer Hunter. Instead, he serves as a foil to the other three, and especially to Ed, whose self-image as a decent, pipe-smoking family man is progressively eroded as the world proves more intractable than he could ever imagine. In the end, though, he does survive, forced to kill and lie to do so. Significantly, it is Drew who dies, his simple belief in the goodness of human nature (exquisitely expressed in his guitar and banjo duet with the moon-faced child and in his evident disappointment when the boy subsequently ignores him) an inadequate defence against a malevolent world.

The film's downbeat mood is sustained in its cinematography as well as its dramaturgy. Seeking to lend what he called an "ominous quality" to the "pleasant and restful" greens and blues of sky, river and trees, Boorman (in conjunction with Technicolor) developed a new color desaturation technique for Deliverance. The result is a film shot in threatening grey-greens, not so much washed-out as evacuated of conventionally pretty nature imagery. Although the big Panavision images of river, cliffs, and forest are impressive enough (there are some breath-taking moving compositions of the two canoes, exploiting both the format and the long lens's flattened perspective) the desaturated color always ensures that they do not become merely picturesque. As befits a story of liberal complacency confronted by brutal antagonism, it is the struggle to survive that predominates, the big screen used more to document than in close-up than to celebrate the pictorial splendours of the setting.

When the survivors emerge from the last rapids onto the lake, it is not—as it might have been—a comforting expanse of calm water that greets them and us. It is the rusting bulk of a wrecked automobile, water lapping around its fender. Bobby splashes through the shallows towards it. "We've made it, Ed," he cries, grateful for this equivocal symbol of civilised society. It is an appropriately two-edged image in a film which, to the last, refuses to accept that there are simple solutions to the moral dilemmas that it poses.

—Andrew Tudor

LA DENTELLIÈRE

(The Lacemaker)

Switzerland-France-West Germany, 1977

Director: Claude Goretta

Production: Citel Films (Geneva), Actions Films (Paris), and Filmproduktion (Frankfort); Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 108 minutes. Released May 1977, France. Filmed in France.

Producer: Yves Peyrot with Yves Gosser; screenplay: Claude Goretta and Pascal Laine, from the novel by Laine; photography: Jean Boffety; editor: Joelle Van Effenterre; sound: Pierre Gemet and Bernard Chaumeil; production design: Serge Etter and Claude Chevant; music: Pierre Jansen; music editor: Georges Bacri.

Cast: Isabelle Huppert (Béatrice); Yves Beneyton (François); Florence Giorgietti (Marylène); Anne-Marie Düringer (Béatrice's mother);

Jean Obe (François' father); Monique Chaumette (François' mother); Michel de Re (The Painter); Renata Schroeter (François' friend); Sabine Azema (Student).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Ecumenical Prize, 1977.

Publications

Script:

Goretta, Claude, and Pascal Laine, La Dentellière, Paris, 1981.

Articles:

Moskowitz, G., Variety (New York), 25 May 1977.

Roulet, C., in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1977.

Maillet, D., "Claude Goretta," in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1977.

Jong, A., "Claude Goretta en La Dentellière," in Skoop (Amsterdam), June-July 1977.

Chevassu, F., in Image et Son (Paris), September 1977.

Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1977.

International Film Guide 1978, London, 1978.

Leroux, A., in Séquences (Montreal), January 1978.

Pruks, I., in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), April-June 1978.

Peterson-Schultz, B., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Summer 1978.

Kass, Judith, "Claude Goretta and Isabelle Huppert," in Movietone News (Seattle), 14 August 1978.

Parker, G., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1978.

Günter, J., in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), October 1978.

Brossard, Jean-Pierre, "Trotz allem hoefe ich," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), October 1978.

Termino, L., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), February 1980.

Cèbe, Gilles, "Une Martyre de l'amour," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 April 1981.

Millar, Gavin, in Listener (London), 3 March 1983.

Télérama (Paris), 6 November 1996.

* * *

Claude Goretta's third feature film, his first made in France, tells a deceptively simple story of lost innocence against the picturesque background of the Normandy coast and the contemporary ambience of Paris. The Lacemaker is marked by the economy, close observations, and compassion of its director and the virtuoso performance of its star, Isabelle Huppert, who plays Béatrice, nicknamed "Pomme," a shy young assistant in a Paris beauty parlor. The film depicts her first romance with a well-bred Sorbonne student named François (Yves Beneyton), who meets her while on vacation in the resort town of Cabourg and rejects her some months later, bringing on an emotional and physical collapse. Goretta has synthesized several potentially sentimental genres—Bildungsroman, pastoral, seduction story, poor-meets-rich romance—and managed to evoke fresh responses to his film's own particular time and place.

The Lacemaker begins by exploring the friendship between Pomme and Marylène (Florence Giorgietti), a slightly older and far more experienced beautician. Like her illustrious namesake, Marilyn Monroe, whose poster adorns a wall in her high-rise apartment, Marylène is blonde, restless, and seductive, a compulsive poseur. Pomme seems her complete opposite: small, quiet, utterly guileless. While Marylène's extroverted personality, sensuousness, and superior position in the shop clearly present her as a foil in the opening sequences, she is soon shown to be no less vulnerable to men than Pomme will become. The opening movement of The Lacemaker thus concludes with Marylène being jilted by her married boyfriend and deciding to forget her troubles by taking Pomme along on a vacation at the seacoast.

La Dentellière

Marylène soon meets a new man and moves out of the hotel room she briefly shared with Pomme, who acquiesces silently. François sees her eating an ice cream at an outdoor cafe and introduces himself to the shy girl as a brilliant student of literature from Paris. Goretta departs from his customary unobtrusive cinematic style at this point with a beautiful sequence of long tracking shots and cross-cutting to depict François and Pomme looking for each other the next day. The distance between them in the panoramic vistas and the high camera placements suggest both the separate worlds they inhabit and the fate that draws them together. When they finally meet on the boardwalk, Pomme wears a white dress and François a dark t-shirt and jeans, visually underscoring their differences at the very moment their romance begins.

Goretta depicts the development of their relationship through a series of delicately woven vignettes, the most clearly symbolic of which involves a game of blindman's bluff on a steep cliff overlooking the Channel. François leads her to the very edge, but Pomme continues to follow his commands without ever opening her eyes. When she finally does, standing at the very edge of the precipice, François has to grab her to keep her from falling with fright. Soon after this strangely disturbing interlude, Pomme agrees to sleep with him, her first time with a man.

Back in Paris and now living in François's flat near the university, Pomme happily cleans and cooks after her own work at the beauty parlor is done so that he might pursue his studies. Their life together seems epitomized in a scene where she tries to eat an apple silently (her nickname, "pomme," means "apple") without disturbing his concentration, and he becomes annoyed not so much by the sound as by her effort at self-effacement. The film's pivotal scene occurs during the couple's visit with François's parents in the country. When the dinner conversation turns to news about François's successful young friends and questions about what she does for a living, Pomme is overcome by a violent fit of choking. In moments such as these, Goretta reveals the subtle unraveling of their romance, without a single argument between them. In a high-angle long shot foreshadowing their parting, and mirroring the panoramic views of Cabourg, François rushes across a city boulevard, leaving Béatrice stranded on a traffic island. Some time after François explains how breaking up will be best for both of them and returns her to her mother's apartment, Béatrice collapses in the middle of a busy intersection.

The Lacemaker's final sequence takes place in a sanatorium where François comes to visit Béatrice, whose altered appearance is profoundly disquieting. She wears a shapeless black dress like a shroud; she moves and speaks mechanically, drained of all her former charm. As they pass the time together in a park filled with fallen yellow leaves, François asks what she has been doing since they parted. When Béatrice tonelessly describes a trip to Greece with someone she met, François seems relieved to learn she has taken other lovers. In the closing shot, however, the camera tracks in on the therapy room where Béatrice sits alone in a corner knitting in front of a bright poster of Mykonos. Her foreign travel was an illusion, both a deception and farewell gift for the guilt-ridden François. As the truth dawns, she turns to the camera with a chilling expression which Goretta then freezes. The closing title appears, with its reference to the anonymous working women—seamstresses, water-girls, lacemakers—of the paintings of the Old Masters.

Goretta's film, like his heroine's face, is deceptively simple. While seemingly inviting interpretation as a modern parable of innocence betrayed, a Marxist allegory on the plight of the working class, feminist tract against patriarchal society, or even a clinical study of mental breakdown, The Lacemaker remains ultimately less moralistic than Eric Rohmer's films, less political than Godard's or Tanner's, less intellectual than Resnais's. Goretta's deepest concern—and the film's ultimate "meaning"—lies with Béatrice herself, with what she has lost and, just possibly, what she has gained.

—Lloyd Michaels

DER VAR ENGANG EN KRIG

(Once There Was a War)

Norway, 1966

Director: Palle Kjaerulff-Schmidt

Production: Nordisk Films Kompagni; black and white, 35mm, widescreen; running time: 94 minutes; length: 2565 meters, or 8460 feet. Released 16 November 1966, Copenhagen. Filmed in Denmark.

Producer: Bo Christensen; screenplay: Klaus Ribbjerg; assistant director: Tom Hedegaard; photography: Claus Loof; editor: Ole Steen; sound: Niels Ishy and Hans W. Sørensen; art director: Henning Bahs; music: Chopin, Beethoven, and Leo Mathisen; costume designer: Lotte Dandanell.

Cast: Ole Busck (Tim); Kjeld Jacobsen (Father); Astrid Villaume (Mother); Katja Mische Renard (Kate, the sister); Birgit Bendix

Der var engang en krig

Madson (Jane); Christian Gottschalck (Grandfather); Yvonne Ingdal (Lis); Karen Marie Løwert (Lis's mother); Gregers Ussing (Frank); Jan Heinig Hansen (Markus); Birgit Brüel (Markus's mother); Jørgen Beck (Friend); Elsa Kourani (Friend's wife); Henry Skjar (Headmaster); Holger Perfort (Teacher in gymnastics).

Publications

Script:

Ribbjerg, Klaus, and Palle Kjaerulff-Schmidt, Der var engang en krig, Copenhagen, 1966.

Books:

Stormgaard, Uffe, and Soren Dyssegaard, Danish Films, Copenhagen, 1973.

Passek, Jean-Loup, editor, Le Cinéma danois, Paris, 1979.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 30 November 1966.

Kosmorama (Copenhagen), December 1966.

Hollywood Reporter, 2 November 1967.

Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1967–68.

Today's Cinema, 13 June 1969.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1969.
Films and Filming (London), September 1969.
 Semprun, Jorge, and Palle Kjaerulff-Schmidt, in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 3, 1976.
 Monty, Ib, "Danish Film," in Factsheet Denmark, Copenhagen, 1983.
Film Dope (Nottingham), January 1985.
 Schepelern, Peter, in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Summer 1987.
 Mitchell, G.J., "Filmmaking History in Denmark," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), February 1989.

* * *

Apart from Carl Th. Dreyer's Gertrud, Der var engang en krig is the most important Danish film of the 1960s. It is a portrait of a 15-year-old boy from middle-class Copenhagen during the German occupation. The German occupation of 1940–45 has been described in several documentaries, most notably in the unique Your Freedom Is at Stake, based on illegally shot material and reflecting the views of the resistance movement—a view quite critical towards the official Danish collaboration policy. Sixteen feature films were inspired by this important period in recent Danish history, most of them stressing the heroic aspects of the resistance. Contrary to this approach, Der var engang en krig uses the war as a background, but reflects the daily life of the Danes in a more authentic and honest manner.

The film is structured as a chain of incidents, showing the boy in relation to family, friends, teachers, and girls. The main story centers on the boy's love for one of his older sister's girlfriends. To her he is a boy, to him she is the object of his adolescent dreams. He fantasizes about her, seeing himself as a resolute hero in a number of daydream sequences, which are among the most problematic scenes in an otherwise beautifully controlled film. It is based on a meticulous care for authentic detail, and its intensity of feeling grows out of these carefully recollected views of the past. Though visually it can be considered within a realistic tradition, it is the situations, the excellently written dialogue, the characters, and the way it brings a period to life which make the film engaging and emotionally rich. The film is not without humor; but as the narrative is from the boy's point of view, he is never presented in an ironic way. The stronger feelings are condensed in the long travelling shots and pans, when the boy is cycling, expressing his feelings in physical activity.

The film was written by Klaus Rifbjerg who, like Palle Kjaerulff-Schmidt, the director, takes advantage of personal experiences to enhance his work. Rifbjerg is the finest poet and author of his generation, and he and Kjaerulff-Schmidt started collaborating on films in 1959. In 1962 they made Weekend, a study of young adults and their emotional problems. Weekend was considered one of the films heralding a new, more modern era in the Danish cinema. Reality has finally returned to the Danish film after a long barren period. The collaboration between Rifbjerg and Kjaerulff-Schmidt culminated with Der var engang en krig, their finest achievement and one of the highlights of contemporary Danish cinema. Influenced by Truffaut (especially The 400 Blows) and similar to films by Ermanno Olmi and Milos Forman, Der var engang en krig represents the best in intimate realism. The film was received very well by Danish critics and also got very fine reviews abroad, especially in England.

—Ib Monty

LE DERNIER TANGO À PARIS

See LAST TANGO IN PARIS

DETOUR

US, 1945

Director: Edgar G. Ulmer

Production: Producers Releasing Corp.; black and white, 35mm, Spherical; running time: 69 minutes.

Producer: Leon Fromkess, Martin Mooney (assistant producer); screenplay: Martin Goldsmith, Martin Mooney (uncredited); cinematographer: Benjamin H. Kline; editor: George McGuire; music: Leo Erdody; sound: Max Hutchison; art director: William A. Calihan, Jr., Edward C. Jewell; set decoration: Glenn P. Thompson; costume design: Mona Barry.

Cast: Tom Neal (Al Roberts, alias Charles Maxwell, Jr.); Ann Savage (Vera); Claudia Drake (Sue Harvey); Edmund McDonald (Charles Haskell Jr.); Tim Ryan (Diner Proprietor); Esther Howard (Holly); Roger Clark (Man); Pat Gleason (Man); Don Brodie (Used Car Salesman).

Awards: Named to National Film Registry, National Film Preservation Board, 1992.

Publications

Books:

Sarris, Andrew, The American Cinema: Directors and Directions 1929–1968, Chicago, 1968.
 Truffaut, Francois, The Films in My Life, New York, 1975.
 Peary, Danny, Cult Movies, New York, 1981.
 Hirsch, Foster, Film Noir: The Dark Side of the Screen, New York, 1981.
 Bogdanovich, Peter, Who the Devil Made It: Conversations with Legendary Film Directors, New York, 1997.

Articles:

Schrader, Paul, "Notes on Film Noir," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 8, no. 1, Spring 1972.
 Combs, R., "Detour," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), vol. 49, no. 582, July 1982.
 Pulleine, T., "Detour," in Films and Filming (South Croydon, Surrey), no. 335, August 1982.

Detour

Belton, John, "Edgar G. Ulmer," in American Directors, vol. 1, New York, 1983.

Miller, Ron, "Detour to Immortality," in San Jose Mercury News, 16 October 1983.

Piccardi, A., "Detour di Edgar G. Ulmer," in Cineforum, vol. 27, no. 261, January-February 1987.

Garsault, A., "Un artiste," in Positif (Paris), no. 358, December 1990.

McBride, J., "Family Drive," in American Film (Marion, Ohio), vol. 15, no. 11, August 1990.

Atkinson, Michael, "Noir and Away. Notes on the Two Detours," in Bright Lights (Cincinnati, Ohio), no. 15, 1995.

* * *

There are more elegant and ambitious examples of classic film noir—Jacques Tourneur's Out of the Past and Robert Aldrich's Kiss Me Deadly leap to mind—but it's unlikely that you will find a more tightly plotted or single-minded example of the postwar, German Expressionist-rooted style than Edgar G. Ulmer's Detour. Indeed, the argument could be made that this Poverty Row gem distills noir to its basic components: suffocating fatalism, sexual paranoia, the down-on-his-luck patsy/protagonist born to come to a bad end. Detour also contains what for many students is the definitive noir plaint. "It was just my luck, picking her up on the road," says Al Roberts (Tom Neal) in morose voice-over. "It couldn't be Helen . . . or Mary or Evelyn or Ruth; it had to be the very last person I should ever have met. That's life. Whichever way you turn, Fate sticks out a foot to trip you."

Of course Fate has less to do with Al's ultimate undoing than Al himself. Fate is noir's all-purpose fall guy. The real cause is Al's obsessive-compulsive personality. A frustrated pianist in a New York dive called the Break O' Dawn Club, Roberts juggles (poorly) dual obsessions: a stalled concert career (he fancies himself a budding Shostakovich) and a relationship with the club's pretty vocalist, Sue (Claudia Drake). Sue's decision to try her luck in Hollywood sets up her beau's fall. Eaten alive by those twin betes noires, jealousy and desperation, Al "takes it on the thumb" and follows his worst instincts west.

Half of this compact (69 minute) programmer is devoted to Al's misfortunes on the road. In Arizona he is picked up by a obnoxious bookie named Haskell (Edmund MacDonald), who rambles on about a childhood duel and some nasty scratches compliments of “the most dangerous animal in the world—a woman.” As Al takes his turn at the wheel, Haskell nods off, has a heart attack, and dies. In the pounding rain, Al, true to form, makes a suspicious situation worse by taking Haskell’s clothes, car, and identity. His muddled reasoning: “By that time I’d done just what the police would say I did, even if I didn’t.”

Al gets himself in deeper when he picks up a sullen vixen named Vera (Ann Savage parodying the trumpy, consumptive Bette Davis). Vera knows Al isn’t Haskell and uses the information to blackmail him into an inheritance scam. Al, thinking only of Sue, resists both the scam and Vera’s drunken advances. A fight ensues and, in an all-too-plausible accident involving a phone chord, Al finds himself fleeing another “murder” scene. Unable to buck Fate, he surrenders to it. “Someday a car will stop to pick me up for a ride that I never thumbed,” he says as a police car pulls up and a door swings open. “Yes, Fate, or some mysterious force, can put the finger on you or me for no good reason at all.”

Adapted by Martin Goldsmith from half of his 1939 novel (which unfolds from both Al’s and Sue’s perspectives) and told in flashback from a Nevada diner playing, mockingly, Sue’s hit song, “I Can’t Believe That You’re in Love with Me,” Detour was shot in six days for the notoriously cheap Producers Releasing Corp. The Czechoslovakian-born Ulmer, who had apprenticed with F.W. Murnau before emigrating to Hollywood in 1931, was, as The Black Cat (1934) and Bluebeard (1944) demonstrate, a past master at employing shadows, tight two-shots, and minimalist set design to create ambience and stretch a budget. After a brief rehearsal period, he told interviewers, he could shoot 60 to 80 setups in a day.

Forced again to economize, this time on less than $30,000, Ulmer turned Detour into an unrelenting journey down what he called “that long road of Fate.” Each element of the mise-en-scene (mirrors, fog, motel blinds, the fuming Vera in profile) serves a distinctly noir overview and sensibility. On the cross-country drive, process shots further distance the already-alienated Al from his surroundings. In the Nevada diner sequences, artificial spotlighting (of Al’s twitching eyes) and exaggerated sound underscore Al’s agitated mental state. As he surveys the second “murder” scene, Al’s disorientation is suggested by a roaming camera that, as it picks out Vera’s things strewn about the room, keeps going out of focus. Tracking shots down foggy roads give the impression that Al is on a conveyor belt, being dragged, inexorably, to his final destination.

Released by PRC as a routine crime “meller” (the tawdry poster contained the come-on “I Used My Body for Blackmail!”), Detour, like many of the great noirs, was championed by France’s Cahiers du Cinéma critics (who dubbed its director “le plus maudit des cineaste” or unjustly cursed) before being discovered by their American counterparts, most notably Andrew Sarris and, in his influential Notes on Film Noir (1972), Paul Schrader. Francois Truffaut, writing in 1956, called Ulmer “the least-known” of American auteurs and his The Naked Dawn (1955) “a small gift from Hollywood.” The first observation no longer applies as scholars find references to Detour in Hitchcock’s Psycho and, more recently, the noir-infused works of David Lynch and Ethan and Joel Coen. The second Truffaut comment is more applicable to Detour, which, for too long, was an unappreciated gift from 1940s Hollywood.

Ironically, Fate wound up putting the finger on some of those connected with this film. Ulmer, confined to a wheelchair after a series of strokes, didn’t live long enough to enjoy Detour’s critical reappraisal (he considered it his best film, along with The Black Cat and Naked Dawn). Widow Shirley Ulmer, in a 1983 interview, said he died a disappointed man. Savage went from low-budget to lowbrow, graduating to such epics as Renegade Girl and Pygmy Island. Neal fared worse. A hopeless alcoholic with a hair-trigger temper, he was imprisoned in 1965 for the murder of his third wife. Perfect tabloid-fodder, he died destitute in 1972 at age 58. An execrable, almost shot-for-shot video remake of Detour appeared in 1992. It was directed by Wade Williams and starred Tom Neal Jr., a dead ringer for his father.

—Glenn Lovell

DEUS E O DIABO NA TERRA DO SOL

(Black God, White Devil)

Brazil, 1964

Director: Glauber Rocha

Production: Copacabana Films (Rio de Janeiro); black and white, 35mm, running time: 125 minutes. Filmed in Monte Santo, Bahia, 1963. Released in Rio de Janeiro, 1 June 1964.

Producer: Luiz Augusto Mendez; associate producers: Glauber Rocha, Jarbas Barbosa; director and screenplay assistant: Walter Lima, Jr.; director and dialog assistant: Paulo Gil Soares; screenplay: Glauber Rocha; photography: Waldemar Lima; editor: Rafael Justo Verde; art director: Paulo Gil Soares; music: Heitor Villa-Lobos and Sergio Ricard (songs by Glauber Rocha).

Cast: Geraldo Del Rey (Manuel); Ioná Magalhães (Rosa); Othon Bastos (Corisco); Lídio Silva (Sebastião); Mauricio do Valle (Antonio das Mortes); Sônia dos Humildes (Dadá); Marrom (Blind Julio); João Gama (The priest); Antônio Pinto (The “Coronel”); Milton Rosa (“Coronel” Moraes).

Awards: Prize of the Mexican Critic at the International Festival of Acapulco (México), 1964; Great Prize, Festival of Free Cinema (Italy), 1964; Gold Naiade—International Festival of Porreta Terme (Italy), 1964; Great Prize Latin American, at the International Mar Del Plata Festival (Argentina), 1966.

Publications

Script:

Rocha, Glauber, Deus e o Diabo na Terra do Sol, Editora Civilização Brasileira, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 1965.

Deus e o Diabo na Terra do Sol

Books:

- Rocha, Glauber, Revisão crítica do cinema brasileiro, Rio de Janeiro, 1963.
- Gardier, René, Glauber Rocha, Paris, 1974.
- Amengual, Barthélemy, Glauber Rocha e os caminhos da liberdade, in Glauber Rocha, Rio de Janeiro, 1977.
- Bernadet, Jean-Claude, Brasil em tempo de cinema, Rio de Janeiro, 1977.
- Rocha, Glauber, Revolução do cinema novo, Rio de Janeiro, 1981.
- Torres, Augusto M., Glauber Rocha, Madrid, 1981.
- Gerber, Raquel, O mito da civilização Atlântica: Glauber Rocha, Cinema, Política e a Estética do Inconsciente, Rio de Janeiro, 1982.
- Rocha, Glauber, O século do cinema, Rio de Janeiro, 1983.
- Xavier, Ismail, Sertão Mar—Glauber Rocha e a Estética da Fome, São Paulo, Brazil, 1983.
- Hollyman, Burnes, Glauber Rocha and the Cinema Novo in Brazil: A Study of his Critical Writings and Films, New York, 1983.
- Johnson, Randal, Cinema Novo X5—Masters of Contemporary Brazilian Film, (Chapter 4: Glauber Rocha: Apocalypse and Resurrection), Austin, Texas, 1984.

- Nazário, Luis, À margem do cinema, São Paulo, Brazil, 1986.
- Pierre, Sylvie, editor, Glauber Rocha: Textes et Entretiens de Glauber Rocha, Collection "Auteurs," Paris, 1987.
- Passek, Jean-Loup, editor, Le Cinéma Brésilien, Paris, 1987.
- Pierre, Sylvie, Glauber Rocha, Paris, 1987.
- Armes, Roy, Third World Film-making and the West, Berkeley, 1987.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 20 May 1964.
- Prédal, René, Jeune Cinéma (Paris), October 1967.
- Gardies, René, "Terres en transes," in Image et Son (Paris), December 1967.
- Rocha, Glauber, "Memorias de Dios y el Diablo en las Tierras de Monte Santo y Coco-Robo," in Cine-Cubano (Havana), 1967.
- Levy, J., "Mythologies: un continent en trois," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1968.
- Zele, Van, Image et Son (Paris), no. 233, 1969.
- Francovich, Alan, Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1969–70.
- Houston, P., Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1970.
- Dawson, J., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1970.

- Tarrat, M., Films and Filming (London), May 1970.
- Williams, B., "Splintered Perspectives: Counterpoint and Subjectivity in Modernist Film Narrative," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Winter 1991.
- Valdes, Zöe, "El Desear poder Querer," in Cine-Cubano (Havana), October-November 1992.
- Diegues, C., Positif (Paris), June 1994.

* * *

"You could say that Deus e o Diabo na Terra do Sol (Black God, White Devil) was a film provoked by the impossibility of doing a truly great Western, as, for instance, John Ford could. Equally, there was a trail of inspiration from Eisenstein, from The General Line, from The Battleship Potemkin, and further ideas from Visconti and Rossellini, from Kurosawa and from Buñuel. Deus e o Diabo arose from this tussle between Ford and Eisenstein, from the anarchy of Buñuel, and from the savage strength of the lunacy of surrealism."

So Glauber Rocha defined the multiple influences which contributed to Deus e o Diabo in an April 1981 interview with João Lopes (in the book Glauber Rocha, by Sylvie Pierre), four months before his death at the age of 42. Shown at Cannes in 1964, Deus e o Diabo, together with Nelson Pereira dos Santos' Vidas Secas (Barren Lives), introduced the international viewing public to the Cinema Novo, an artistic movement which strove, in the name of a political conscience, for a Brazilian identity and ethos. Enthusiastically received at Cannes—Georges Sadoul considered its style "revolutionary"—Deus e o Diabo genuinely lived up to the Cinema Novo's motto: "an idea in the head and a camera in the hand." Glauber Rocha, the Cinema Novo's most controversial figure, was the author of bombastic writings, such as the manifesto "The Aesthetics of Hunger," (presented in Genova in January 1965 during the Reseña del Cine Latinoamericano), in which he stated that "our originality is our hunger." And the concept of hunger—both literally and in reference to a hunger for social justice—is central to Deus e o Diabo na Terra do Sol. The film's opening is prosaic enough: Manuel (Geraldo Del Rey), a poor herdsman, married to Rosa (Yoná Magalhães) and living in the dry, barren countryside of Northeastern Brazil in the early 1940s, decides to sell his cows and buy a plot of land. Things go awry when he ends up killing the buyer of his cows. Fleeing his destiny, he embraces the first option in the gospel according to Glauber Rocha: religious fanaticism, embodied by the Negro god, Beato Sebastião (Lídio Silva), a synthesis of the messianic leaders of that time and region. Sebastião promises his flock divine salvation and foretells the day when "the dry lands will turn into sea and the sea into dry land," which is the leitmotif of the film. Glauber Rocha believed that "the people of the Northeast are truly obsessed by the desire to see the sea, a sea which signifies the broadest sort of liberty."

As Manuel and Rosa follow the fanatic priest, Antonio das Mortes (Maurício do Valle) enters the scene; he is famous for exterminating cangaceiros, the rural and very violent bandits of the region. Hired to kill Sebastião, Antonio das Mortes is a quasi-mythological figure in his intimidating black cape. His character is further developed in a subsequent film, O Dragão da Maldade contra o Santo Guerreiro (Antonio das Mortes). By the time the killer reaches Sebastião, it is too late: the fanatic has already been killed by Rosa in a sacrificial ritual. On the run again, Manuel and Rosa join Corisco (Othon Bastos), the blonde devil. The physical embodiment of bitterness and cruelty, Corisco's ambition is to avenge the death of the legendary cangaceiro Lampião while proffering impassioned speeches in defense of the poor. Antonio das Mortes and Corisco face off in a stylized duel in one of the film's most effective sequences. Corisco is shot and dies screaming "the power of the people will win out."

Manuel and Rosa, true representatives of Corisco's "people," flee headlong through the interior, leaving behind them the fanaticism and the violence until the crazy Sebastião's words become true: the dry lands become sea and the sea becomes dry land. Herein lies the utopia of Glauber Rocha. The voice of the blind man is heard explaining the reasons for so much suffering: "divided up the way it is, the world is wrong. The land belongs to man, not to God nor to the devil."

In Deus e o Diabo, Glauber Rocha's second feature, launched after Barravento in 1961, the director created a tragic and convulsive northeastern opera; it is strongly allegorical, with symbols for "good" and "evil" in constant interaction. Some true-to-life portrayals, such as Manuel and Rosa, contrast with others of a classically theatrical tone, notably Corisco, inspired, according to Rocha, by Brecht. Linking aspects of popular culture with elements of the western, the film is narrated and sung by a blind man, a simplification of the Greek chorus. The outstanding sound track alternates Bach with Villa-Lobos, whose Fifth Bachiana contributes to one of the film's most striking moments: the love scene of Corisco and Rosa, choreographed and rhythmical, an unexpected outpouring of guileless poetry against a desolate backdrop marked by poverty and violence.

A true exponent of the author's cinema style, with the strong political and social concern of the 1960s, Glauber Rocha's restlessness is felt through the impatient use of the hand-held camera, the originality of his framings, and the rhythm of the editing. The use of panoramics, travellings, zooms, and close-ups produces a tense and eloquent narrative, punctuated by philosophical interjections—"fate is greater than we are;" "we have nothing to take but our fate," and "man learns nothing in peace, he needs to fight to live and he needs to die to win."

Thirty years after it was made, Deus e o Diabo retains its contesting tone and the revolutionary personality of Glauber Rocha. At the age of 25, with a camera in his hand and a whirlwind of ideas in his head, Glauber Rocha created one of the most important Brazilian films through the undeniable strength, originality, and beauty of this furious fable about good and evil.

—Susana Schild

DEUTSCHLAND IM HERBST

(Germany in Autumn)

West Germany, 1978

Directors: Alf Brustellin, Hans Peter Cloos, R. W. Fassbinder, Alexander Kluge, Maximiliana Mainka, Beate Mainka-Jellinghaus, Edgar Reitz, Katja Rupé, Volker Schlöndorff, Peter Schubert, and Bernhard Sinkel

Production: Project Filmproduktion/Filmverlag der Autoren; color/black and white, 35mm; running time: 116 minutes. Filmed October 1977. Released in West Germany, 17 March 1978.

Deutschland im Herbst

Producers: Project Filmproduktion/Filmverlag der Autoren/ Halle-lujah Film/Kairos Film Munich; screenplay: Heinrich Böll, Alf Brustellin, Hans Peter Cloos, R. W. Fassbinder, Alexander Kluge, Maximiliane Mainka, Edgar Reitz, Katja Rupé, Volker Schlöndorff, Peter Schubert, Bernhard Sinkel, Peter F. Steinbach; photography: Michael Ballhaus, Günter Hörmann, Jürgen Jürges, Bodo Kessler, Dietrich Lohmann, Werner Lüring, Colin Mounier, Jörg Schmidt-Reitwein; editors: Alexander Kluge, Beate Mainka-Jellinghaus, Heidi Genée, Mulle Goetz-Dickopp, Juliane Lorenz, Tania Schmidbauer, Christine Warnck.

Cast: Mario Adorf (TV committee member); Wolfgang Bächler, Heinz Bennent, Joachim Bissmeier, Joey Buschmann, Caroline Chaniolleau, Hans Peter Cloos (“Foreigner”); Horst Ehmke, Otto Friebel, Hildegard Friese, Vadim Glowna (Freiermuth); Michael Gahr, Helmut Griem (Mahler’s interviewer); Horatius Häberle, Hannelore Hoger (Gabi Teichert); Petra Kiener, Dieter Laser, Lisi Mangold, Enno Patalas (TV committee member), Lila Pempeit, Werner Possardt, Franz Priegel, Leon Rainer, Manfred Rommel, Katja Rupé (Franziska Busch); Walter Schmidinger, Gerhard Schneider, Corinna Spies, Franziska Walser (Ismene); André Wilms, Angela

Winkler (Antigone); Eric Vilgertshofer, Manfred Zapatka. Appearing as themselves: Wolf Biermann (radical poet/singer/songwriter exiled from DDR in 1977), Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Horst Mahler, and Armin Meier.

Awards: Film Strip in Gold for Outstanding Individual Achievement: Film Conception (for the entire film team), German Film Awards, 1978.

Publications

Books:

Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema: A History, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1989.

Kaes, Anton, From Hitler to Heimat: The Return of History as Film, Princeton, New Jersey, 1989.

Corrigan, Timothy, New German Cinema: The Displaced Image, Bloomington, Indiana, 1994.

Elsaesser, Thomas, Fassbinder's Germany: History, Identity, Subject, Amsterdam, 1996.

Articles:

Hansen, Miriam, "Cooperative Auteur Cinema and Oppositional Public Sphere," in New German Critique, no. 24–25, Fall/Winter, 1981–82.

Silberman, Marc, "Introduction to Germany in Autumn," in Discourse, no. 6, 1983.

Lacoue-Labarthe, Philippe, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Jürgen Habermas, and Heiner Müller, "Germany in Autumn," in Documenta X: The Book: Politics Poetics, edited by Catherine David and Jean-François Chevrier, Ostfildern, Germany 1997.

* * *

Germany in Autumn is a politically engaged combination of documentary, media footage, and fictional and autobiographical episodes that covers the emotional gamut from concern, to irony, to despair. A landmark film for the New German Cinema, this collaborative effort between nine acclaimed directors and several prominent writers, songwriters, and poets protests the political oppression of West Germany in the late 1970s. The film's nine vignettes document the rise of urban terrorism, police militancy, and the resurgence of fascist tendencies in postwar Germany.

In the fall of 1977, Germany was almost a nation under siege by its own police, security, and military forces. The headlines told of a plane hijacking and the kidnapping and subsequent murder of German industrialist Hans-Martin Schleyer. Schleyer's kidnappers, the Baader-Meinhof group, were a left-wing terrorist offshoot of the notorious Red Army Faction (RAF). Schleyer had been kidnapped in an effort to negotiate the release of the RAF's most prominent members, Andreas Baader, Gudrun Enslin, and Karl Raspe, who had been imprisoned for terrorist acts. After the failed kidnapping effort resulted in Schleyer's murder, the leaders of the RAF were found dead in Stammheim, a maximum security federal prison. The suspicious circumstances of their deaths led many to conclude that they were murdered by the state, although officials declared and still maintain otherwise. In any case, the treatment of the Baader-Meinhof group confirmed the fears of the political left that the state was willing to use extreme violence to silence its critics.

With these events as its historical backdrop, the film takes on three urgent tasks for the postwar generation: a protest against censorship and political repression; a confrontation with the persistence of fascism reflected in current events; and facing their parents' lack of accountability for the Nazi period. The film's sections address these issues from various perspectives and diverse styles, and are marked by the signature styles of their directors. One sees the overall influence of Alexander Kluge, who together with Beate Mainka-Jellinghaus edited the nine hours of material into a 134 minute film.

According to Kluge—social theorist, filmmaker, author, and one of the most prominent directors of New German Cinema—the contradictions in the film "belong to one nation: only if the contradictions are together, can one accept this history and understand it."

Although there is no real plot, the footage is sequenced around various themes: the role of the media and the importance of debate in the public sphere, confronting the Nazi past, and the necessity to resist police brutality. At a time of official government news blackout, this acclaimed team of filmmakers offered a counter-history, an unofficial response to the official absence of reportage. The experimental montage of short fictionalized pieces even mimics the look of television, with its collection of interviews, documentary, fiction, and autobiographical pieces.

Several of the film's sections explicitly address the theme of state and media censorship and the lack of open debate. Other sections illustrate the political power wielded by those who control the media. The section by Schlöndorff and Heinrich Böll offers an ironic sketch of a contrived meeting of TV officials who ban the dramatic production of Sophocles's Antigone. The classic drama's portrayal of siblings in defiance of the state is seen as advocating a pro-terrorist view too analogous to recent events. This segment's satirical yet pointed testament to the political power of the media demands a public sphere in which debate is encouraged and allowed.

On a thematic level, several sections of Germany in Autumn addressed Germany's difficult recent history and the burden of the historical memory of the Third Reich. Kluge based his critically acclaimed feature film The Patriot on his short section about Gabi Teichert, a high school teacher intent on (literally) digging up Germany's past with a hand spade; in this film, however, the past is not about the extermination of the European Jews in Europe, but about the losses and deprivation of the immediate postwar period; that is, it is about German suffering.

Fassbinder's 24 minute episode, the most personal and emotionally charged of the sections, also addresses the weight of the past but from a different perspective: he confronts the effects of the generational conflict between parents and children. In a staged but highly convincing and seemingly realistic interview with his mother, he elicits the statement from her that what Germany needs today is another "benevolent dictator." Interspersed with this interview, spectators witness the historical transmission of violence on a domestic, private level. Fassbinder alternately abuses, rejects, caresses, and rants with his lover in a dark claustrophobic apartment filled with booze, drugs, and misery. The message seems to be that history is accountable for interpersonal problems as well as political and governmental ones.

Germany in Autumn is also about collective mourning. Funeral scenes frame the various episodes; indeed, the opening and closing of the film documents the funeral of Hans Martin Schleyer as well as the burial of the Red Army leaders. Lastly, the film explores the fine line between patriotism and nationalism. The film uses the national anthem as an ironic leitmotif, underlining the filmmaker's distrust of the government as a result of police brutality directed at so-called leftist sympathizers. The rich texture of the images and the densely layered scenes of Germany in Autumn skillfully merge the terrorism of the present with the fascist totalitarianism of the past. The film remains both an artistic achievement and a statement of the political efficacy of film-making.

—Jill Gillespie

DEVIL IN THE FLESH

See LE DIABLE AU CORPS

THE DEVIL IS A WOMAN

USA, 1935

Director: Josef von Sternberg

Production: Paramount Pictures; black and white, 35mm; running time: 80 minutes, some sources list 82 minutes. Released 1935. Filmed in Paramount studios.

Screenplay: Josef von Sternberg, adapted by John Dos Passos and S. K. Winston, from the novel The Woman and the Puppet by Pierre Louys; photography: Josef von Sternberg and Lucien Ballard; production designer: Hans Dreier; music and lyrics: Ralph Rainger and Leo Robin.

Cast: Marlene Dietrich (Concha Perez); Cesar Romero (Antonio Galvan); Lionel Atwill (Don Pasqual); Edward Everett Horton (Don Paquito); Alison Skipworth (Señora Perez); Don Alvarado (Morenito); Morgan Wallace (Dr. Mendez); Tempe Pigott (Tuerta); Jil Dennett (Maria); Lawrence Grant (Conductor).

Publications

Books:

- Harrington, Curtis, An Index to the Films of Josef von Sternberg, London, 1949.
- Griffith, Richard, Marlene Dietrich—Image and Legend, New York, 1959.
- Von Sternberg, Josef, Fun in a Chinese Laundry, New York, 1965.
- Sarris, Andrew, The Films of Josef von Sternberg, New York, 1966.
- Josef von Sternberg: Dokumentation: Eine Darstellung*, Mannheim, 1966.
- Weinberg, Herman G., Josef von Sternberg, Paris, 1966; as Josef von Sternberg: A Critical Study, New York, 1967.
- Kobal, John, Marlene Dietrich, New York, 1968.
- Dickens, Homer, The Films of Marlene Dietrich, New York, 1968.
- Baxter, John, The Cinema of Josef von Sternberg, New York, 1971.
- Silver, Charles, Marlene Dietrich, New York, 1974.
- Morley, Sheridan, Marlene Dietrich, London, 1976.
- Higham, Charles, Marlene: The Life of Marlene Dietrich, New York, 1977.
- Mérigeau, Pascal, Josef von Sternberg, Paris, 1983.
- Navacelle, Thierry de, Sublime Marlene, London, 1984.
- Seydel, Renate, Marlene Dietrich: Eine Chronik ihres Lebens in Bildern und Dokumenten, East Berlin, 1984.
- Walker, Alexander, Dietrich, London, 1984.
- Spoto, Donald, Falling in Love Again: Marlene Dietrich, Boston, 1985.
- Wilson, George M., “Narration in Light”: Studies in Cinematic Point-of-View, Baltimore, 1986.
- Zucker, Carole, The Idea of the Image: Josef von Sternberg’s Dietrich Films, Rutherford, 1988.
- Dietrich, Marlene, Ich bin, Gott sei dank, Berliner, Frankfurt, 1987; as My Life, London, 1989.
- Bowman, Barbara, Master Space: Film Images of Capra, Lubitsch, Sternberg, and Wyler, New York, 1992.

Baxter, Peter, Just Watch!: Sternberg, Paramount and America, London, 1993.

Bogdanovich, Peter, Who the Devil Made It, New York, 1997.

Articles:

- New York Times*, 4 May 1935.
- Variety* (New York), 8 May 1935.
- “Creative Film Director,” in Cue (New York), 14 December 1935.
- Dekobra, Maurice, “Comment Marlene Dietrich est devenue star,” in Cinéma (Paris), 16 April 1939.
- Knight, Arthur, “Marlene Dietrich,” in Films in Review (New York), December 1954.
- Weinberg, Herman G., “The Lost Films: Part 1,” in Sight and Sound (London), August 1962.
- Weinberg, Herman G., “Josef von Sternberg,” in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1965.
- Green, O. O., “Six Films of Josef von Sternberg,” in Movie (London), Summer 1965.
- Higham, Charles, “Dietrich in Sydney,” in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1965–66.
- Eisenschitz, Bernard, “L’Oeuvre de Josef von Sternberg,” in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), March 1966.
- Positif* (Paris), May 1966.
- Bowser, Ellen, and Richard Griffith, in Film Notes, edited by Bowser, New York, 1969.
- Martineau, Barbara, “Thoughts on the Objectification of Women,” in Take One (Montreal), November–December 1970.
- Flinn, Tom, “Joe, Where Are You?” in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Fall 1972.
- Rheuban, Joyce, “Josef von Sternberg: The Scientist and the Vamp,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1973.
- Magny, Joel, in Téléciné (Paris), November 1976.
- Baxter, P., “On the Naked Thighs of Miss Dietrich,” in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 2, no. 2, 1978.
- Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1978.
- Tessier, Max, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), July–August 1985.
- Thomas, François, in Positif (Paris), January 1986.
- Listener* (London), 7 January 1988.
- Jenkinson, P., “Sternberg’s Last Interview,” in Film Culture (New York), June 1992.
- Koch, Gertrude, and M. Gerber, “Dietrich’s Destiny: Strike a Pose,” in Sight & Sound (London), September 1992.
- Morgan, M., “Sternberg & Dietrich Revisited,” in Bright Lights (Cincinnati), July 1993.

* * *

The Devil Is a Woman is the final film starring Marlene Dietrich made by director Josef von Sternberg. The identifying characteristics of the von Sternberg/Dietrich collaboration, including the ambiguity, often difficult for viewers to accept, are evident here. The Devil Is a Woman is a perfect culmination to an enigmatic relationship and a breathtaking series of visually stunning films.

Based on Pierre Louys’s novel, The Woman and the Puppet, the film is a quintessential example of the von Sternberg filmed universe. To follow the story is to travel through a narrative labyrinth, following the many changes of mood, mind, character and costume of the central character, Concha (Dietrich), the devilish woman of the title.

The Devil Is a Woman

The contradictory Concha is all surface and no depth, a beautiful, fickle, unpredictable woman, or at least that is how she is presented as Don Pasqual (Lionel Atwill) tells Antonio (Cesar Romero) about her. Concha exists at the center of the film, and von Sternberg favors the audience with as few fulfilled expectations and explanations as she has favored her lovers. At the end, Concha (through von Sternberg) has demonstrated the same cruel control over viewers as she has over her lovers, leaving an audience with nothing to grasp, much less to embrace or understand.

The Devil Is a Woman defines the von Sternberg approach to cinema, which is unique. As a film artist, he defies the conceptions most have about what film is or what it can or should do. He seldom develops a logical narrative pattern, with ordinary character motivations. On the contrary, a von Sternberg character frequently makes an abrupt shift that, in literary terms, is unexpected and unjustified. “I changed my mind,” Concha offers as an explanation when she turns back across the border to rejoin her rejected former lover. This arbitrary change of mind is the essence of the von Sternberg film, which forces viewers to realize that the act of seeing is itself the truest meaning of the film. By removing conventional forms of dramatic tension, character development and plot motivation, he asks viewers to accept the things that usually supplement a film story as if they were the story themselves. In never fully explaining Concha, he seduces viewers into observing her more and more closely.

The Devil Is a Woman presents an illusionary world, filled with irony, mockery, androgyny, and a certain amount of implied decadence. As is true of all his films with Dietrich, it is somewhat of a von Sternberg autobiography, with Atwill, a von Sternberg look-alike, playing the character who is toyed with by Concha. The relationship of these two characters is a complicated interplay of master and victim, puppet and manipulator, with no clear indication of which is truly the master and which the puppet.

With The Devil Is a Woman, von Sternberg worked against the tradition of Hollywood in the 1930s, in that he reduced narrative tension to a state in which very little seemed to be happening. “The best source for a story,” he said, “is an anecdote.” Although The Devil Is a Woman is based on a famous novel, von Sternberg liked trivial plots, and never took up great social or political themes. This led to an inevitable rejection of von Sternberg by both critics and audiences, and The Devil Is a Woman was a failure. Seen today, it is a stunning example of pictorial beauty. The use of light and shadow in intricate interplay, the long takes connected by luxuriously slow dissolves, the ironic music, the elegant compositions, and the complicated, layered images make it the work of a major visual artist.

—Jeanine Basinger

LE DIABLE AU CORPS

(Devil in the Flesh)

France, 1947

Director: Claude Autant-Lara

Production: Transcontinental Films; black and white, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes. Released 1947.

Screenplay: Jean Aurenche and Pierre Bost, from a novel by Raymond Radiguet; photography: Michel Kelber; editor: Madeleine Gug; production designer: Max Douy; music: René Cloërec.

Cast: Gérard Philipe (François); Micheline Presle (Marthe); Denise Grey; Jean Debucourt.

Publications

Script:

Autant-Lara, Claude, Le diable au corps, Paris, 1984.

Books:

Philipe, Anne, and Claude Roy, Gérard Philipe: Souvenirs et témoignages, Paris, 1960; revised edition, 1977.

Sadoul, Georges, Gérard Philipe, Paris, 1967; revised edition, 1979.

Perisset, Maurice, Gérard Philipe, Paris, 1975.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946, Volume 1: The Great Tradition, New York, 1976.

Cadars, Pierre, Gérard Philipe, Paris, 1984.

Autant-Lara, Claude, Le bateau coule: discours de réception à l'Académie des beaux-arts, Paris, 1989.

Articles:

Jeanne, Rene, and Charles Ford, "Styles du cinéma français," in La Livre d'or du cinéma français 1947-48, Paris, 1948.

Philipe, Gérard, "In the Margin," in Sequence (London), Spring 1949.

Billard, Ginette, "Gérard Philipe," in Films and Filming (London), October 1955.

Durgnat, Raymond, "The Rebel with Kid Gloves," in Films and Filming (London), October and November 1960.

Le diable au corps

Autant-Lara, Claude, "Comment j'ai pu réaliser Le diable au corps," in Ikon (Milan), January-March 1972.

Autant-Lara, Claude, "La Chasse aux escargots," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Spring 1973.

Oms, Marcel, "La Parole est à Claude Autant-Lara" (interview), in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Summer 1973.

Dazat, O., "Leçons de morale," in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1986.

Oms, M., in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 10, October 1992.

Jeune Cinéma (Paris), January/February 1997.

* * *

Le diable au corps was certainly the French film of 1947. Winner of several European awards, the film was also banned in communities across the Continent. While a proud tribute to the French literary tradition, it posed as the most avant-garde example of postwar cinema in that country.

There is no paradox here, for the aesthetic ideology of the "cinema of quality," of which this film serves as an outstanding example, openly mixes an interest in iconoclastic subject matter, high art tradition, and a refined studio treatment. Aurenche and Bost's careful reworking of a youthful and rebellious novel points up its key social and psychological oppositions. Claude Autant-Lara was then able to put these oppositions into play through the psychological realism of his handling of actors, and through the narrational commentary wrung out of decor, music, and cinematic figures.

Their grim intelligence and determined passion made Gérard Philipe and Micheline Presle an instantly legendary couple; he as a precocious teenage malcontent, son of an upright bourgeois, she the older woman whose husband is off at the front in World War I. Autant-Lara evinces sympathy for their questionable moral position by rendering the action through a series of flashbacks from the boy's point of view. The war is over and the town celebrates the return of its veterans, but he must hide in the room of their forbidden love and go through the anguish of recalling that love. This flashback structure, together with the doomed love of the couple, reminded critics of Le jour se lève, and made the public see Gérard Philipe as the heir of Jean Gabin. But the limpid expressiveness of the prewar realism had been complicated after the war. Philipe's gestures were calculated to display his passion and anguish, whereas Gabin had moved and spoken instinctively, without the hesitation of either good taste or intelligence, hallmarks of the postwar style. The same holds true for the direction. While Carné and Prévert had devised a number of highly charged objects, Autant-Lara multiplies effects wherever he can. The incessant play of reflections in mirrors and by the ferry insists on the significance of the drama, but does so from the outside. Similarly the famous 360-degree camera movement that circles the bed of the couple's lovemaking demands to be noticed as a figure supplied by an external narrator, especially since it begins on a crackling fire and ends on dying embers. This is more than a metaphor for passion, it is a poetic display that lifts an ordinary drama into telling significance.

Altogether Le diable au corps stuns its audience with the cockiness of its presentation as well as with the audacity of its subject matter. This is its conquest as well as its loss; for in only a few years the New Wave critics, led by Truffaut, would clamor for the downfall of psychological realism and of the paternalistic, elitist narration that preaches a liberal morality. If Radiguet, the novelist, likewise condemned a suffocating society, he did so from within, from the perceptions and language of his hero. Autant-Lara has used Radiguet's rebelliousness, has packaged it approvingly, but has made of it a mature, stylish film. Radiguet, legend has it, put everything of himself into this novel and then died. The movie pays tribute to his effort and his views, but is just another very good movie.

—Dudley Andrew

LES DIABOLIQUES

France, 1954

Director: Henri-Georges Clouzot

Production: Filmsonor (Paris); black and white, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes. Released 1954. Filmed in France.

Producer: Louis de Masure; screenplay: Henri-Georges Clouzot, Jérôme Geronimi, René Masson, and Frédéric Grendel, from the novel Celle qui n'était plus by Boileau and Narcejac; photography: Armand Thirard; editor: Madeleine Gug; sound: William-Robert Sivel; production designer: Léon Barsacq; music: Georges van Parys.

Cast: Simone Signoret (Nicole); Véra Clouzot (Christina); Paul Meurisse (Michel); Charles Vanel (Fichet); Jean Brochard (Plantiveau); Noël Roquevert (M. Herboux); Georges Chamarrat (Dr. Loisy); Jacques Varennes (Professor Bridoux); Michel Serrault (M. Raymond).

Awards: Prix Louis Delluc (France), 1955; New York Film Critics Award for Best Foreign Film (shared with Umberto D), 1955.

Publications

Books:

Lacassin, Francis, and others, Le Procès Clouzot, Paris, 1964.

Pilard, Philippe, H. G. Clouzot, Paris, 1969.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946, Volume 1: The Great Tradition, New York, 1976.

Sandre, Didier, Simone Signoret, Paris, 1981.

Bocquet, José-Louis, Henri-Georges Clouzot cinéaste, with Marc Godin, Sèvres, 1993.

David, Catherine, Simone Signoret, New York, 1995.

Articles:

Brunelin, Andre G., in Cinéma (Paris), November 1954.

Brulé, Claude, "Clouzot est-il vraiment diable?" in Ciné-Revue (Paris), 1955.

New York Times, 22 November 1955.

"Frenchman's Horror," in Newsweek (New York), 28 November 1955.

Goulder, Stanley, "The Necrophilist," in Films and Filming (London), December 1955.

Tennant, Sylvia, "Henri-Georges Clouzot," in Film (London), March-April 1956.

Forestier, J., and G. P. Richer, "H. G. Clouzot, L'homme diabolique du cinéma français," in Lettres Françaises (Paris), July 1960.

Schrader, Paul, "An Interview with Henri-Georges Clouzot," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), no. 4, 1969.

Lacourbe, Roland, "Henri-Georges Clouzot," in Anthologie du cinéma 10, Paris, 1979.

Devillers, M., in Cinématographe (Paris), March 1984.

Pulleine, Tim, in Films and Filming (London), December 1985.

Brown, G., "Suspicion," in Village Voice (New York), 25 October 1994.

Herpe, Noël, "Les films criminels de Clouzot," in Positif (Paris), January 1996.

Hottell, Ruth A., "The Diabolic Dialogic," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 24, no. 3, 1996.

"Special Issue," Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), June 1997.

* * *

Henri-Georges Clouzot is a key member of the generation of filmmakers who emerged during the Occupation and dominated

French cinema for a dozen years or so after the war. Les diaboliques is not a masterpiece to rank with such earlier Clouzot films as Le corbeau or Le salaire de la peur, but its particular contradictions allow the principal aspects of what was later to be dubbed the “tradition of quality” to be clearly observed.

The political events of these years—the war in Indo-China leading to the fall of Dien Bien Phu, and the beginning of the Algerian revolution which was to lead to eight years of savage fighting and eventually bring down the Fourth Republic—are ignored, and Clouzot, like so many of his contemporaries, offers a studio reconstruction of the world which is meticulously realist in detail, but essentially timeless. Les diaboliques is set in one of Clouzot’s favorite locations—a shabby, rundown provincial school—and the tensions here between a bullying headmaster, his ailing wife and forceful mistress are methodically set up. The craftsmanship involved in the creation of this world is enormous, and nothing is allowed to stand between the director and his conception of his film. Before 1939 actors had been the monstres sacrés of French cinema and every aspect of a film was subordinate to their will. But Clouzot was from the first renowned for the harsh treatment he meted out to his actors. If the story that he served bad fish to the actors in Les diaboliques and made them eat it so as to capture an authentic sense of disgust is probably apocryphal, it certainly conveys perfectly his essential attitude.

The 1940s and early 1950s was also a time of the totally scripted film in which the diversity and contradictions of life were reduced to a single narrative line relentlessly followed. Though there might be a rich counterpoint of incident as well as the creation of multiple ironies, there was no space for gaps within the plot which would unfold with all the precision of a watch mechanism. In works like Le corbeau and Quai des Orfèvres, Clouzot had shown himself to be a master of the thriller structure, with all the subtle manipulation of audience responses which that implies. But as so often in other aspects of his work, Clouzot seems to have been driven by a desire to take the creation of suspense to extreme limits. For him, as for his contemporary, Alfred Hitchcock, whom he much admired, there could be no half measures. In Les diaboliques Clouzot is tempted into a display of his own narrative skills, and the logic of the film, which has plotted its first murder with brutal precision, is slowly taken apart. Inexplicable things start to happen, and the spectator’s confidence in his own perceptions, in the truth of what he has seen and heard, is undermined. The contradictions are resolved in a virtuoso passage of plot twisting in the final reel, but this very ingenuity destroys the psychological realism on which the film’s opening is constructed. Les diaboliques is exhilarating at first viewing, and proved to be both commercially successful and controversial on its first release. For most critics, however, the contrivance of the ending renders a second viewing meaningless, since it underlines the film’s remoteness from a vivid reality and even makes Clouzot’s deeply felt black vision seem trite and superficial.

—Roy Armes

DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST

See JOURNAL D’UN CURE DE CAMPAGNE

DIARY OF A LOST GIRL

See TAGEBUCH EINER VERELORENEN

DIE LEGENDE VON SÜNDE UND STRAFE

See SODOM UND GOMORRHA

DIRTY HARRY

USA, 1971

Director: Don Siegel

Production: Warner Bros., Malpasco; Technicolor, Panavision; running time: 101 minutes. Released December 1971.

Executive producer: Robert Daley; producer: Don Siegel; screenplay: Harry Julian Fink, Rita M. Fink, Dean Riesner; assistant director: Robert Rubin; photography: Bruce Surtees; editor: Carl Pingitore; sound: William Randall; art director: Dale Hennessy; music: Lalo Schifrin.

Cast: Clint Eastwood (Harry Callahan); Harry Guardino (Lt. Bressler); Reni Santoni (Chico); John Vernon (The Mayor); Andy Robinson (Killer); John Larch (Chief); John Mitchum (De Georgio); Mae Mercer (Mrs. Russell); Lyn Edgington (Norma); Ruth Kobart (Bus Driver); Woodrow Parfey (Mr. Jaffe); Josef Sommer (Rothko); William Paterson (Bannerman); James Nolan (Liquor Proprietor); Maurice S.; Argent (Sid Kleinman); Jo de Winter (Miss Willis); Craig G. Kelly (Sgt. Reineke).

Publications

Books:

Kaminsky, Stuart M., Don Siegel: Director, New York, 1974.

Douglas, Peter, Clint Eastwood: Movin’ On, Chicago, 1974.

Kaminsky, Stuart M., Clint Eastwood, New York, 1974.

Agan, Patrick, Clint Eastwood: The Man behind the Mask, New York, 1975.

Downing, David, Clint Eastwood, All-American Anti-Hero: A Critical Appraisal of the World’s Top Box-Office Star and His Films, London, 1977.

Lovell, Alan, Don Siegel: American Cinema, New York, 1977.

Ferrari, Philippe, Clint Eastwood, Paris, 1980.

Smijewsky, Boris, The Films of Clint Eastwood, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1982.

Dirty Harry

Kapsis, Robert E., Clint Eastwood: Interviews, Jackson, 1999.
Schickel, Richard, Clint Eastwood: A Biography, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 22 December 1971.
Milne, Tom, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1972.
Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Spring 1972.
Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1972.
Films and Filming (London), June 1972.
Shadoian, J., "Dirty Harry: A Defense," in Western Humanities Review (Salt Lake City), Spring 1974.
Friedman, Bruce Jay, "Could Dirty Harry Take Rooster Cogburn?" in Esquire (New York), September 1976.
Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Fall 1976.
Bell, Philip, in Australian Journal of Screen Theory (Kensington, New South Wales), no. 5–6, 1979.
Alpert, Robert, "Clint Eastwood Plays Dumb Cop," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), May 1979.
Listener (London), 14 February 1985.

Fenwick, H., "Dirty Harry Comes Clean," in Radio Times (London), 26 November 1988.
Sarris, Andrew, "Don Siegel: the Pro," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 27, no. 5, September–October 1991.
Hampton, H., "Sympathy for the Devil: In the Cinematic Sniper's Nest," in Film Comment (New York), November–December 1993.
Grenier, Richard, "Clint Eastwood Goes PC (Politically Correct) Movies," in Commentary, vol. 97, no. 3, March 1994.
Duncan, Andrew, "'If People Really Found Out About Me They'd Be Disappointed,'" in Radio Times (London), 9 September 1995.
Persellin, K., "Ariadne's Thread," in Spectator (Los Angeles), no. 2, 1995.
Rabinowitz, Paula, "Screen Memories," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), October 1996.

* * *

"I know what you're thinking," says Harry Callahan, Inspector 71 of the San Francisco police, to the bank robber he's just shot. "Did he fire six shots or only five? Well, to tell the truth, in all this excitement I kinda lost track myself. But being this is a .44 magnum, the most powerful handgun in the world, and would blow your head clean off, you've got to ask yourself one question. 'Do I feel lucky?'" The humourless smile widens. "Well, do you, punk?"

For many, this speech is the most memorable thing about Dirty Harry. But while the film seems destined to be Siegel's masterpiece, it would be an error to confuse Callahan's challenge with the director's own ethic. A gibe in The Line Up (1958) is closer to his concerns. "Ordinary people of your class," says the killer Dancer, "you don't understand the criminal's need for violence."

What Siegel illustrates in his work is the implicit contract that exists between criminals and society. We need criminals to act out our own fantasies of violence. Siegel finds proof of this symbiosis in our legal system, an imperfect tool which we ourselves sabotage. His films mock its structures. The police force of Madigan is corrupt. Riot in Cell Block 11 and Escape from Alcatraz attack the prison system. Coogan's Bluff, like Dirty Harry, parodies sociology, legal procedure, and especially the concept of rehabilitation.

Siegel's special subject is killers, whichever side of the law they may work on. But his murderers and vigilantes are creatures of the imagination. In them, he encourages us to see mirrored our own urges for violence and anarchy. When they die, it is, in effect, for our sins.

By contrast with most real-life murderers, who usually kill loved ones in the heat of passion, Siegel's murderers are loners, conscienceless and mad. They kill for profit, as a profession, or for fun. Andy Robinson's Scorpio in Dirty Harry is his most malevolent creation, leering, anonymous, malign. We'd assume his weaponry had its genesis in Vietnam were it not for his twisted peace symbol belt buckle: evil has no pedigree, just as Scorpio has no biography.

Scorpio preys on innocence; a girl swimming in a penthouse pool, a 10-year-old boy, a teenager he rapes and buries alive. Other targets are a priest, an exaggeratedly effeminate homosexual, a much-robbed liquor store owner, and finally a bus filled with schoolchildren. All that stands between Scorpio and these, the helpless, is Harry Callahan—"Dirty" Harry, because he draws every dirty job, but equally dirty because he does not flinch from violence in doing them.

Harry's methods are endorsed when he tracks the wounded killer to a football stadium. Ignoring gibbering appeals for a lawyer and a doctor, he grinds a heel into the bleeding leg until Scorpio reveals the location of the buried girl. Bruce Surtees's camera pulls back in a vertiginous helicopter shot, losing hunter and prey in night-time mist and the glare of the floodlights. This nightmare image dissolves into a blue dawn above the Golden Gate bridge as a nude corpse is hauled out of her grave and carried away. Birdsong shows nature indifferent to her death, as is the sleeping city. Only Callahan cares.

Harry has flouted every legal procedure, so the murderer goes free, and hijacks a school bus. Taking justice into his own hands, Callahan kills Scorpio, and, as the body sinks into a sump like a slaughtered horror movie monster, flings his police badge after it.

Thus Dirty Harry's first and last images are of this badge. The film opens on a marble honour roll of dead cops. A gold inspector's star, superimposed over a list of the dead, dissolves into the silenced barrel of Scorpio's rifle, fair warning of a significant visual subtext.

Neutral behind dark glasses, Callahan initially appears almost disdainful of his duty. Over the credits, he climbs a building to find the place where Scorpio shot from, the first of many ascents in the film. From that moment, he appears in charge of the city, its avenging angel—a role for which the satanic Scorpio challenges him. (The first word heard in the film is Callahan's expletive when he finds Scorpio's extortion note—"Jesus.") The film thereafter is filled with Christian imagery. The square where Scorpio sets up his second killing is dominated by a church, and Callahan stakes it out from a rooftop where a revolving neon sign announces "Jesus Saves." For the payoff of the ransom, Scorpio chooses a hilltop park dominated by a gigantic cross.

Critics, especially The New Yorker's Pauline Kael, thought Dirty Harry fascistic. Others blamed it for the Death Wish/Walking Tall vigilante films which followed, ignoring the fact that, without exception, they lacked Dirty Harry's moral and psychological dimensions. To classify Harry Callahan as just another right-wing hard-hat was to miss the point of the film as surely as those who call him "Dirty" Harry miss the irony of his nickname. Given the spread of urban violence and the resulting change in public opinion in favour of law and order, vigilantes, gun control, and the death penalty, it must be acknowledged that, while they did not create the New York, Washington and Los Angeles of the 1980s, Siegel and his writers anticipated them with a special prescience.

—John Baxter

THE DISCREET CHARM OF THE BOURGEOISIE

See LE CHARME DISCRET DE LA BOURGEOISIE

DISTANT VOICES, STILL LIVES

UK, 1988

Director: Terence Davies

Production: British Film Institute, in association with Channel 4/ZDF; Metrocolor; running time: 84 minutes. Released 1988.

Producer: Jennifer Howarth; screenplay: Terence Davies; assistant directors: Andy Powell, Glyn Purcell, Marc Munden, Matthew Evans; photography: William Diver, Patrick Duval; camera operator: Harriet Cox; editor: William Diver; collaborative editors: Geraldine Creed, Toby Benton; sound editor: Alex Mackie; sound recordists: Moya Burns, Colin Nicolson; sound re-recordists: Aad Wirtz, Ian Turner; art directors: Miki van Zwanenberg, Jocelyn James; stunt coordinator: Alf Joint.

Cast: Freda Dowie (Mother); Pete Postlethwaite (Father); Angela Walsh (Eileen); Dean Williams (Tony); Lorraine Ashbourne (Maisie); Sally Davies (Eileen as a child); Nathan Walsh (Tony as a child); Susan Flanagan (Maisie as a child); Michael Starke (Dave); Vincent Maguire (George); Antonia Mullen (Rose); Debi Jones (Micky); Chris Darwin (Red); Marie Jelliman (Jingles); Andrew Schofield (Les); Anny Dyson (Granny); Jean Boht (Aunty Nell); Alan Bird (Baptismal Priest); Pauline Quirke (Doreen); Matthew Long (Mr. Spaully); Frances Dell (Margie); Carl Chase (Uncle Ted); Roy Ford (Wedding Priest).

Distant Voices, Still Lives

Awards: International Critics Prize, Cannes Film Festival, 1988.

Publications

Books:

Friedman, Lester, editor, Fires Were Started: British Cinema and Thatcherism, Minneapolis, 1993.

Winston, Wheeler, editor, Re-viewing British Cinema, 1900–1902: Essays and Interviews, Albany, 1994.

Articles:

Stills (London), November 1985.

Wyeth, P., “Voices from the Past,” in Stills (London), March 1986.

Wilson, David, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1988.

Film Comment (New York), September–October 1988.

Barker, Adam, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1988.

Floyd, Nigel, “A Pebble in the Pool and Ships like Magic,” in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1988.

Interview with Terence Davies in Time Out (London), 5 October 1988.

Interview with Terence Davies in City Limits (London), 13 October 1988.

Listener (London), 13 October 1988.

“Valladolid,” in Film (London), December 1988.

In Film & Kino (Oslo), no. 4A, 1989.

Lochen, K., “Stemmer fra fortiden,” in Film & Kino (Oslo), no. 5, 1989.

Cargin, P., “Diver on Distant Voices,” in Film (London), January 1989.

Carr, Jay, “Davies’ Dark Pool of Memories,” in Boston Globe, 13 August 1989.

Billson, A., “The Long and Short of It,” in Village Voice (New York), 15 August 1989.

Kerr, P., “Sound Movie,” in Village Voice (New York), 15 August 1989.

Turroni, G., “Cuginanze, ovvero territori contigui,” in Filmcritica (Rome), November 1989.

Lavery, D., “Functional and Dysfunctional Autobiography: Hope and Glory and Distant Voices, Still Lives,” in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 1, 1990.

Iversen, J., “Man kan ikke forklare magi, kan man vel?” in Z Filmtidsskrift (Oslo), no. 4, 1990.

Wahlstedt, T., “Minnets rorelse mot centrum,” in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 4, 1990.

Quart, Leonard, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 28, no. 3, 1990.

- Keighron, P., "Condition Critical," in Screen (Oxford), no. 2, 1991.
- Lochen, K., "I minnenes rike," in Film & Kino (Oslo), no. 5, 1992.
- Joris, L., "Terence Davies: Rode schoenen, Hitchcock and een spion," in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), November 1992.
- White, A., "Remembrance of Songs Past," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1993.
- Coe, Jonathan, "Jolly and Grim (Terence Davies)," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 5, no. 10, October 1995.
- Davies, Terence, "Twilight Time," in New Statesman, vol. 126, no. 4344, 25 July 1997.

* * *

It is not often that British films win prizes at international film festivals. Truffaut, despite his penchant for Hitchcock, and Satyajit Ray have both remarked that the British are more or less temperamentally incapable of holding movie cameras. A low-budget, BFI-financed account of a working-class childhood in post-war Liverpool hardly seems likely to set the continental critics alight. Nonetheless, Distant Voices, Still Lives received the International Critics Prize at the Cannes Festival, and also shared the Golden Leopard at the Locarno Festival. Perhaps as a result of its European reception, the film was apotheosized by British critics, who, while lavishing extravagant praise, insisted on writing about it as if it were a remake of A Room with a View, as if it were yet another piece of cosy, Edwardian nostalgia: Terence Davies, the "proletarian Proust," had, we were told, "wrenched high art from the lower depths of his deprived Liverpool childhood." His film was like "Coronation Street by Bresson." (It is ironic that a film which recreates an era largely through its popular culture should be treated as a piece of "art house" cinema.)

The film is a diptych. Distant Voices was shot in the autumn of 1985. At that time Still Lives, which was shot in 1987, had not even been written. However, the narrative is elliptical. Depicting various key moments—wedding, christening, illness, war—in the life of a Liverpool family, it jumps from tableau to tableau: there is no jarring disjunction between the two halves. If anything, the gap between them helps to give a real sense of time passing and enables characters to age convincingly.

There is an absolute refusal to see the past through rose or sepia tinted glasses. Visually, the film does not so much evoke 1950s working-class Liverpool as excoriate it, presenting the period in a self-consciously sombre fashion. Through a "Bleach-By-Pass printing process" (also used in Michael Radford's 1984) all colours are desaturated; there are no primary colours, and the emphasis is always on the brown, the grey, on giving a dull clarity.

Lurking ominously at the core of the film, a morose and taciturn presence, is the father, played by Pete Postlethwaite. A splenetic, bitter man, given to arbitrary fits of violence, he beats his wife (Freda Dowie) and daughters, and terrorizes the household in a constant attempt to stifle the "feminine" culture—a culture embodied in radio, cinema, and song—that it represents. As much as he is demonized, the wife and mother is idealized: patient, quietly suffering, holding the family together, hers are the values with which Davies identifies. In the book and film of The Last of England, Derek Jarman reveals a similar split in his familial loyalty. He also reacted against a patriarchal father, allying himself with his mother. Bullying dads seem to have had a strong and positive influence on 1980s British filmmakers.

It is not only the father, with whose death the first half of the film is concerned, but men in general that Davies regards with alarm: a curious belching, farting breed who lock away their wives, on the one hand demanding respect and obedience from them, and on the other, depending on them for food and clothing, and guidance home from the pub when they are too drunk to make their own way.

The spectre of the father pervades the film, making it a peculiarly anguished and lugubrious rekindling of childhood. However, in comparison to Terence Davies's earlier Trilogy, filmed in penumbral monochrome and steeped in sexual and religious guilt, isolation, and fear of death, Distant Voices, Still Lives is a positive romp. At least it has music.

Davies has spoken of the importance of music in the film's construction. The film is full of songs: British songs, American songs, songs to be born to, songs to die to, songs to sing in the pub, songs on the radio, songs in the cinema. (Davies elicited the help of broadcasters Denis Norden, Steve Race, and Roy Hudd, among others, in tracing many of these, of which he could often remember only a phrase or a line.) Visual bleakness is counterpointed with an extraordinary aural extravagance: song cements both family and community together, enabling the women and children to endure the brutal vagaries of the men, overcoming the noise of German bombs, diffusing the horror of death.

The music is almost too positive. The central characters, detested father, adored mother, are one dimensional, and the locations, home, pub, street, are all too familiar. Even if Davies is trying not to sentimentalize the period, the constant singalongs in the pub and the community spirit which so easily transcends the brutal men's attempt to dampen it lend the proceedings an air strangely familiar to that of David Lean's This Happy Breed. Davies risks rejoicing in the good old days of rationing and bad housing.

What enables the film to avoid falling into either Noel Cowardly cooing arms or the kitchen sink is its structure. It discards linear narrative, instead progressing from snapshot to snapshot. There is a constant freezing of images—literally making "still lives." The use of overlapping sound to link discrete scenes; the constant tension between image and sound; the way that sound motivates, humanizes, lends colour to the film's visually drab backcloth: these all combine to fracture narrative unity. One is conscious of the camera from the opening shot, a slow track through the door of the house, approaching the staircase opposite and then revolving to confront the door: before we see anyone, we hear the voice, off screen, of the mother: the voices create character, not vice versa. The film, we are told, is autobiographical, but there is no character portrayed with whom we can immediately identify the filmmaker. It is as if he has removed himself from the family: he is detached, and is looking in at his own life. His character is the camera, recording, remembering.

Arthur Miller professed surprise when Death of a Salesman, to him a quintessentially American play, was successfully produced in China. Distant Voices, Still Lives, despite being located in so specific a time and place, has a similar universality of appeal. It taps into British and American cultural memory; in the way it recreates an era through its media habits, its cinema-going and wireless listening, it is akin to Woody Allen's Radio Days. But its themes, marriage, birth, death, memories of the anguishes and pleasures of family life, make it accessible to almost anyone, even to xenophobic continental critics who still find it impossible to link the idea of "cinema" with that of "Britain."

—G. C. Macnab

DIVA

---

France, 1981

Director: Jean-Jacques Beineix

Production: Les Films Galaxie/Greenwich Film Production/Antenne 2; color, 35mm; running time: 117 minutes; some prints are 123 minutes. Filmed on location in Paris and Normandy (Gatteville Lighthouse).

Producer: Irene Silberman; screenplay: Beineix and Jean Van Hamme, from the novel by Delacorta; photography: Philippe Rousselot; editors: Monique Prim, Marie-Joséphine Yoyotte; sound: Jean-Pierre Ruh; art director: Hilton McConnico; production designer: Uly Pickard; costume design: Claire Fraisse; music: Vladimir Cosma, with arias by Alfredo Catalani (“Ebben? . . . Ne andrò lontano”) from La Wally) and Charles Gounod (“Ave Maria”).

Cast: Wilhelminia Wiggins Fernandez (Cynthia Hawkins); Frédéric Andréi (Jules); Richard Bohringer (Gorodish); An Luu Thuy (Alba); Jacques Fabbri (Jean Saporta); Anny Romand (Paula); Patrick Floersheim (Zatopek); Gerard Darmon (L'Antillais); Dominique Pinon (Le curé)

Awards: César Awards for Best Cinematography, Best Music, Best New Director and Best Sound, 1982; National Society of Film Critics (USA) Award for Best Cinematography, 1982.

Publications

Script:

Beineix, Jean-Jacques, Diva (scenario), in Avant-Scène Cinéma (Paris), December 1991.

Books:

Parent, Denis, et al., Jean-Jacques Beineix, version originale, Paris, 1989.

Powrie, Phil, French Cinema in the 1980s: Nostalgia and the Crisis of Masculinity, Oxford, 1997.

Articles:

Kelly, Ernece B., “Diva: High Tech Sexual Politics,” in Jump Cut (Berkeley), 1984.

Interview in Film Comment (New York), February 1987.

Hagen, W.M., “Performance Space in Diva,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), 1988.

Pearly, “A Tough Act to Follow,” in American Film (Hollywood), January 1990.

Jameson, Frederick, “Diva and French Socialism,” in Signatures of the Visible, New York, 1992.

Yervasi, Carina L., “Capturing the Elusive Representations in Beineix’s Diva,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), 1993.

Olivier, Bert, “No Recording Please! This Is Art. Or: What Do Cynthia Hawkins and Walter Benjamin Have in Common (Not)?” in South African Journal of Philosophy, February 1996.

* * *

Diva was welcomed internationally as an early crest of a French Newer Wave and a major work by a first-time director. Though not truly radical either politically or stylistically—say, in the manner of such “old” New Wavers as Godard or Rivette—it had a hip 1980s sensibility that overlay its indebtedness to the lighter sort of Alfred Hitchcock thriller, in which an innocent but not quite guiltless person becomes the target of an international conspiracy. In contrast to the equally Hitchcockian murder-among-the-haute-bourgeoisie thrillers of Claude Chabrol, Diva was more of a pop entertainment, its hero a moped-riding postal worker who lives in a really cool industrial space, and one of the villains is a punk of the shaven-head-and-sunglasses variety. Moreover, the film featured multiracial casting and a savvy mix of very different kinds of music, from Italian opera to technopop and New Age. Director Jean-Jacques Beineix was not exactly a prodigy—he was 35 and a veteran assistant director when it was released—but Diva, if somewhat of a period piece today, remains brimful of youthful energy.

Beineix’s script asks the viewer to accept an exceedingly unlikely premise. It is not so much that a world-class operatic soprano believes so strongly in the power and integrity of live performance that she refuses to make recordings and has never even heard her own voice—but that no one besides the film’s young hero has ever smuggled a high-quality tape recorder into a concert hall to make an illicit tape of her. The whole plot hinges upon this presumption, beginning with the sinister attempts of two Taiwanese record pirates sitting behind Jules at the concert to get the tape by any means possible. To be sure, if one goes beyond the literal and the expedient (to set the plot in motion), there is much that is fascinating about this situation: for example, the spectacle of a man trying to capture the “essence” of a woman by robbing her, even “violating” her as the diva later claims; or the paradox that the sacred act of live performance, the aura of the glorious moment, can be represented by the endlessly reproducible medium of cinema.

The other moment that sets the plot in motion is the sort of coincidence common among thrillers: a woman about to be stabbed by a member of an international drug and prostitution ring slips an incriminating tape into Jules’ moped bag. The presence of two tapes and two sets of criminals leads to the sort of massive confusion that can only be resolved by a final shootout. But several factors make Diva fresher than most conventional thrillers, and more complex than other hits of its era.

One such factor is the casting. Frédéric Andréi as Jules (an old-fashioned name according to the diva—one which “fits you so badly that it fits you very well”) is the type of slight-of-build, intense young Frenchman embodied most famously perhaps by Jean-Pierre Léaud around the time of Baisers Volés (Stolen Kisses). Wilhelminia Wiggins Fernandez, recruited from the opera stage, may not be a true diva, but as Cynthia Hawkins she is lovely enough of voice and regal enough in demeanor to play one very well. And An Luu Thuy as Alba, the street kid alert to all things “cool” (her word in French), brings into play a very different cultural world from Cynthia’s, while Jules appears to straddle both worlds. (Perhaps the film’s initial success was due in some measure to the “exotic” casting of an African American and a Vietnamese women as the French hero’s potential love interests.) Alba and Jules, becoming pals rather than lovers, parallel each other in interesting ways. Both are shown stealing music—he Cynthia’s voice (and incidentally her gown); she recordings from a store—and both are involved with an older person, though actual sexual relations in either case are unspecified. Jules manages to talk his way into Cynthia’s hotel suite and becomes increasingly intimate with her; Alba evidently lives with Gorodish, a sort of New Age guru whose loft apartment is as vast as Jules’ but more serenely spare. Gorodish, played with unflappable calm by Richard Bohringer, has a curious function in the plot: seemingly detached from all the goings-on, he takes charge during the last third of the film, rescuing Jules and thwarting the villains pretty much single-handedly by doing little more than operating a few gadgets.

Diva

Diva is quite deftly edited, and photographed with great flair by Philippe Rousselot, who went on to works as diverse as Henry and

June and A River Runs Through It. The crew’s panache is amply in evidence in the film’s most famous action sequence, a chase through the Métro with Jules on his moped and a cop (rather improbably) keeping up on foot; but there are less showy scenes that are superbly accomplished, like the opening sequence at the concert hall. Few sopranos on film can have had made a more portentous appearance onstage, with Beineix’s camera alert to every detail of the stripped-down (half-renovated?) gray auditorium—so perfect a foil to the glamorous gown and voice of the diva—plus the mirrorshaded Taiwanese, the wheels of Jules’ tape recorder turning and the tear running down his cheek, all set to music which begins serenely, yet suspensefully, and expands to Italianate passion.

The sets and locations often seem to be the actual stars of the film. The Parisian exteriors are gritty or blatantly romantic (Jules’ and Cynthia’s misty dawn walk), as the occasion demands. A Normandy lighthouse-hideaway is austere monumental and not the least picturesque. Jules’ garage/loft is a cross between an automobile graveyard and a chic art gallery, with surrealistic murals of floating cars with real headlights beyond the wrecks of actual vehicles and his elaborate sound system. Gorodish may have a conventional kitchen for teaching the Zen of baguette-buttering, but most of his loft is empty dark blue space, suitable for Alba to roller-skate around in, with just a few free-standing objects: a wave sculpture, a functioning bathtub, a jigsaw puzzle of a wave.

One other truly distinctive feature of Diva is its juxtapositions of very different kinds of music. The film elevated Catalini's Act I aria from La Wally from a number known mainly to connoisseurs to Puccinian popularity; its several repetitions along with other vocal music—as when Cynthia rehearses at the piano with a damp-from-the-bath Jules at her side—provide moments of great calm amidst the frantic goings-on of the thriller plot. In other scenes, Gorodish plays the sort of New Age music one expects to hear while buying crystals; Jules rides his moped around to stormy operatic interludes we could take for soundtrack music until he abruptly cuts off his motor; and Vladimir Cosma's actual soundtrack has an appropriate Europop beat. One satisfying auditory joke comes near the end when we discover that the icepick-wielding punk villain has been listening to Parisian cafe music, concertina and all, on his headset.

The pastiche of musical styles was one of a great many features which made Diva seem a perfect example of postmodernism to its early critics, including both those who loved it and those who reviled it for the same thing: being all glittering surface and attitude. In any case, Beineix's much anticipated second feature, The Moon in the Gutter (1983), received little but scorn upon its appearance (partly for the artifice of its sets, as in Francis Coppola's 1982 One From the Heart). Since then he has completed only a handful of other films, notably the erotic drama Betty Blue (1986). But Diva, whether analyzed for its representations (perhaps objectification) of women or its postmodern sensibility or celebrated for its perspectives on young love and love of music and Paris—passionate and “cool” at once—remains an important document of its era.

—Joseph Milicia

DO BIGHA ZAMIN

(Two Acres of Land)

India, 1953

Director: Bimal Roy

Production: Black and white, 35mm; running time: 138 minutes. Released 1953. Filmed in India.

Producer: Bimal Roy; screenplay: Hrishikesh Mukerjee, from a story by Salil Chaudhury; photography: Kamal Bose; editor: Hrishikesh Mukerjee; music: Salil Chaudhury.

Cast: Balraj Sahni (Sambhu); Nirum Roy; Rattan Kumar.

Awards: Prize for Social Progress, Karlovy Vary Film Festival, 1954; received one of the 10 international awards at the Cannes Film Festival, 1954.

Publications

Books:

Barnouw, Erik, and S. Krishnaswamy, Indian Film, New York, 1963; revised edition, 1980.

Willemsen, Paul, and Behroze Gandhi, Indian Cinema, London, 1982.

Ramachandran, T. M., 70 Years of Indian Cinema (1913–1983), Bombay, 1985.

Bhattacharya, R., Bimal Roy: A Man of Silence, Indus Publishing, 1994.

Articles:

Ray, S. K., “New Indian Directors,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1960.

Sarha, Kolita, “Discovering India,” in Films and Filming (London), December 1960.

Roy, Manobina, “The Bimal Roy Only I Knew,” in Illustrated Weekly of India, 3 August 1980.

“Film India: Indian Film Festival, Part 2: Historical Perspective,” in Museum of Modern Art Department of Film (New York), Summer 1981.

Tesson, Charles, “Le rêve indien,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1985.

Seton, Marie, “The Indian Film,” in Film (London), March 1985.

Binford, Mira Reym, and others, “Indian Cinema,” in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (Reading), October 1989.

Garda, B.D., “The Great Romantics,” in Cinema in India (Bombay), no. 10, 1991.

* * *

Into a cinema devoted chiefly to gaiety and adventure, Bimal Roy's Do bigha zamin introduced an element of seriousness and naturalism. Roy did not break with tradition in his film: Do bigha zamin includes songs and dances and the usual patterned dialogue. But Roy enlarged the operatic scope of popular films to include location shots of an ordinary, undramatic character (e.g., the look of trees and fields as the peasant leaves the country for Calcutta); well-observed natural actions (e.g., the habitual manner in which the peasant's wife puts out a pan to catch fresh rainwater); and grave subject matter (e.g., the stacking of legal justice against those unskilled in legalities). Roy's use of the familiar musical and melodramatic style enabled audiences to comprehend his films; at the same time the new naturalistic elements prepared the ground for the more uncompromising and formally innovative political cinema of the 1970s.

Do bigha zamin tells the story of a peasant whose meager two acres come in the way of the landlord's scheme to sell a large parcel of the village land to speculators. The landlord fabricates evidence of an unpaid debt and the peasant must leave for the city to earn the cash the landlord requires. The acting in the film veers between the rapid responsiveness of performers in a melodrama and the slow surfacing of responses characteristic of naturalism. At the landlord's, the peasant (played by the deeply intelligent actor Balraj Sahni) acts by formula, but his leave-taking from his wife is simple; his fears for her emerge into natural, unemphatic expression on his face and in his bearing. The lighting, too, varies between the full lighting characteristic of Bombay sets and the chiaroscuro of available light cinematography. The landlord's house is amply lit, but the rickshaw-puller's quarters in Calcutta retain a natural look of charcoal dilapidation.

In sum, an important, earnest, transitional film, which bespeaks the influence of Italian neorealism on Hindi cinema. It won the Prix Internationale at the 1954 Cannes film festival and the Prize for Social Progress at the Karlovy Vary film festival.

—Satti Khanna

DO THE RIGHT THING

USA, 1989

Director: Spike Lee

Production: 40 Acres and a Mule Filmworks; distributed by Universal Pictures; color (DuArt); running time: 118 minutes; Dolby SR; length: 3,292 meters (approx. 10,598 feet). Released 30 June 1989; filmed in Brooklyn, New York; cost: $6,500,000.

Producers: Jon Kilik, Spike Lee, and Monty Ross; screenplay: Spike Lee; photography: Ernest R. Dickerson; editor: Barry Alexander Brown; sound: Tom Fleischman and Skip Lievsay; production designer: Wynn Thomas; costume designer: Ruth E. Carter; music: Bill Lee.

Cast: Danny Aiello (Sal); Ossie Davis (Da Mayor); Ruby Dee (Mother Sister); Richard Edson (Vito); Giancarlo Esposito (Buggin' Out); Spike Lee (Mookie); Bill Nunn (Radio Raheem); John Turturro (Pino); Samuel L. Jackson (Mister Se-or Love Daddy); Rosie Perez (Tina).

Awards: Los Angeles Film Critics Association Awards for Best Picture, Best Director (Spike Lee), Best Music (Bill Lee), and Best Supporting Actor (Danny Aiello), 1989; New York Film Critics Circle Award for Best Cinematography (Ernest R. Dickerson), 1989; National Film Preservation Board (USA) selection for the National Film Registry, 1999.

Publications

Script:

Lee, Spike, Do the Right Thing: A Spike Lee Joint, New York, 1989.

Books:

Reid, Mark A., Spike Lee's Do the Right Thing, New York, 1997.

Articles:

Sanoff, Alvin P., "Doing the Controversial Thing. (Director Spike Lee's Movie Do the Right Thing)," in U.S. News & World Report, 10 July 1989.

Johnson, Victoria E., "Polyphony and Cultural Expression: Interpreting Musical Traditions in Do the Right Thing," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1993.

Lindroth, Colette, "Spike Lee and the American Tradition," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1996.

McKelly, James C., "'The Double Truth, Ruth': Do the Right Thing and the Culture of Ambiguity," in African American Review (Bloomington), Summer 1998.

Radtke, Jennifer, "Do The Right Thing in Black and White: Spike Lee's Bi-Cultural Method," in The Midwest Quarterly (Pittsburgh), Winter 2000.

* * *

Before the release of Do the Right Thing, Spike Lee had made a name for himself as an independent filmmaker who helped to spearhead the rise of film festivals as a market place for independent cinema in the late 1980s. His first two features, She's Gotta Have It (1986) and School Daze (1988), were unique not only because they were made outside of a studio on shoestring budgets and featured primarily black actors, but also because they managed to get mainstream distribution and turn a modest profit as well. The industry cachet these two films earned Lee enabled him to make Do the Right Thing, which was inspired by an actual incident in Howard Beach, New York, in which a group of white kids chased down and killed a young black man. The result is a brilliant film about racism in America that many consider Lee's best to date.

The story takes place on the hottest day of the summer and revolves around Sal's Famous Pizzeria, apparently the only white-owned business in the Brooklyn neighborhood in which the film is set. Sal and his two sons, Nino and Vito, are not without their racist tendencies (especially Nino), but they nevertheless manage to coexist with their black customers. Rather than being a film about clear rights and wrongs, Do the Right Thing is instead a cultural melange that is cumulatively an intricately detailed portrait of an ethnically diverse contemporary urban American neighborhood. In the first three quarters of the film Lee masterfully establishes the tone and texture of the neighborhood by introducing us to a series of interesting characters whose lives intermittently intersect. Among the most important are Mookie, who works as a pizza delivery man for Sal's; Da Mayor and Mother Sister, the neighborhood's elder statespeople; Radio Raheem, whose always booming box is a source of constant irritation for Sal; and Buggin' Out, who in his anger over Sal's wall of fame featuring exclusively Italian Americans will eventually urge his fellow African American Brooklynites to boycott Sal's Famous, which in part leads to the film's electrifying climax.

Do the Right Thing

The catalyst to the film's rising racial tensions is the heat. Accordingly, Lee's mise en scene is carefully constructed so as to visually convey the oppressiveness of Brooklyn's dreadful heat and humidity in the dead of summer. The film as a whole was shot in saturated color, thus rendering the summer heat almost palpable. In addition to close ups of his characters' faces drenched in sweat, Lee time and again features the color red as dominant in the various frames. The characters constantly lament the heat as they all the while move slowly so as not to exert any more effort than absolutely necessary. Further contributing to his audience feeling as ill at ease as his characters is Lee's repeated use of discomfiting Dutch angle shots. As the heat slowly rises, so too does his characters' volatility.

The tensions that build throughout the film eventually explode in what is among the most controversial endings in cinematic history. The differences between the Italians and the blacks in the neighborhood are accentuated by Lee's skillful use of music to compliment his characters' ethnicities. While the Italians favor Sinatresque ballads, the African American characters frequently listen to rap, most notably by Public Enemy. This all comes to a head when Radio Raheem refuses to turn down his radio while in Sal's. Sal and Radio get in a fight and the police are called. An ugly situation turns worse when the police arrive and kill Radio in their efforts to subdue him. The crowd outside of Sal's, gathered by Buggin' Out to protest Sal's ethnically singular wall of fame, quickly turns into a mob. Mookie starts a full scale riot by throwing a garbage can through Sal's front window. Bedlam ensues as Sal's is first looted and then burned to the ground.

This scene forces viewers to take sides. The film's deceptive title becomes not so much an exhortation as a question: What is the right thing to do and what factors should people consider when determining what's right for them? This question has colored the wide and passionate range of critical responses to the film's climax. Its critics are angered by what they feel is Lee's slanted point of view, a frequently cited example of which is the pointed graffiti—"DUMP KOCH"—in the background of many scenes (at the time of filming, New York Mayor Ed Koch, who many blacks felt was ineffectual in his dealings with racial issues, was running for re-election; Lee was openly opposed to his re-election). Conversely, the film's champions claim that Do the Right Thing is remarkably evenhanded in its treatment of race, thus leaving it up to viewers to decide just what the right thing is. As Alvin Sanoff writes, in discussing his film Lee has said, “It wasn’t made to incite riots but to provoke discussion about racism, something people do not want to talk about.”

Ultimately, whether one sides with the film’s defenders or its detractors is beside the point; in arriving at their own conclusions, viewers can’t help but consider the state of race relations in America, which in the end is what Lee most hoped to accomplish by making Do the Right Thing, the amazing film that, along with Malcom X, will likely be his cinematic legacy.

—Robert C. Sickels

DR. JEKYLL AND MR. HYDE

USA, 1931

Director: Rouben Mamoulian

Production: Paramount Pictures; black and white, 35mm; running time: 82 minutes, some sources list 90 minutes. Released 1931. Filmed in Paramount studios.

Producer: Rouben Mamoulian; screenplay: Samuel Hoffenstein and Percy Heath, from the novel by Robert Louis Stevenson; photography: Karl Struss; editor: William Shea; sound: the Paramount sound department; production designer: Hans Dreier.

Cast: Frederic March (Dr. Henry Jekyll/Mr. Hyde); Miriam Hopkins (Ivy Pearson); Rose Hobart (Muriel Carew); Halliwell Hobbes (Brigadier General Carew); Holmes Herbert (Dr. Lanyon); Edgar Norton (Poole).

Awards: Venice Film Festival citations for Most Original Film and Favourite Actor (March), 1932, note: there were not official awards that year, but acknowledgements were by public referendum; Oscar for Best Actor (March), 1932.

Publications

Script:

Hoffenstein, Samuel, and Percy Heath, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, edited by Richard Anobile, New York, 1976.

Books:

Sarris, Andrew, Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.

Milne, Tom, Rouben Mamoulian, London, 1969.

Burrows, Michael, Charles Laughton and Frederic March, New York, 1970.

Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde

Silke, James, editor, Rouben Mamoulian: Style Is the Man, Washington, D.C., 1971.

Quick, Lawrence J., The Films of Frederic March, New York, 1971.

Everson, William K., Classics of the Horror Film, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.

Aylesworth, Thomas G., Movie Monsters, Philadelphia, 1975.

Luhr, William, and Peter Lehman, Authorship and Narrative in the Cinema, New York, 1977.

Prawer, S. S., Caligari's Children: The Film as Tale of Terror, New York, 1980.

Klein, Michael, and Gillian Parker, The English Novel and the Movies, New York, 1981.

McCarty, John, Psychos: Eighty Years of Mad Movies, Maniacs, and Murderous Deeds, New York, 1986.

Prinzler, Hans Helmut, and Antje Goldau, Rouben Mamoulian: Eine Dokumentation, Berlin, 1987.

Articles:

New York Times, 2 January 1932.

Variety (New York), 5 January 1932.

Tozzi, Romano, “Frederic March,” in Films in Review (New York), December 1958.

Robinson, David, “Painting the Leaves Black,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1961.

Sarris, Andrew, “Fallen Idols,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.

- “Mamoulian on His Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde,” in Cinefantastique (Oak Park, Illinois), Summer 1971.
- Atkins, T., in Film Journal (Hollins College, Virginia), January-March 1973.
- Prawer, S. S., “Book into Films: Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde,” in Times Literary Supplement (London), 21 December 1979.
- Huskins, D. Gail, in Magill’s Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Wide Angle* (Athens, Ohio), vol. 5, no. 3, 1983.
- Sevastakis, Michael, “The Stylistic Coding of Characters in Mamoulian’s Jekyll and Hyde,” in Journal of Film and Video (River Forest, Illinois), Autumn 1985.
- Weaver, T., “Rose Hobart,” in Filmfax (Evanston, Illinois), October-November 1991.
- Fyne, Robert, “Reinventing Reality: The Life and Art of Rouben Mamoulian,” in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon), vol. 15, no. 1, March 1995.
- Newitz, Annalee, “A Lower-class Sexy Monster: American Liberalism in Mamoulian’s Dr. Jekyll & Mr. Hyde,” in Bright Lights (Cincinnati), no. 15, 1995.
- O’Neill, Eithne, and others, “Stephen Frears,” in Positif (Paris), May 1996.
- Norman, Barry, “Which is the Best Jekyll and Hyde?” in Radio Times (London), 19 April 1997.
- Turner, George, “Wrap Shot,” in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), August 1997.
- Arnold, Gary, “Overlooked American Achievements (Directors Left Out of the ‘100 Greatest American Movies’ List),” in Insight on the News, vol. 14, no. 43, 23 November 1998.

* * *

Rouben Mamoulian’s Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde is perhaps the most stylish and technically innovative of any of the several versions of Robert Louis Stevenson’s classic novel, for Mamoulian integrated both the new and established film technologies into his individual filmmaking style. Dissolves, superimpositions, camera movements, and expressionistic lighting are synthesized into his vision of the struggle within man, which is the heart of Stevenson’s tale.

While other directors seemed shackled by the then infant sound technology, Mamoulian freely moved the camera within the frame. Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde in fact opens with an extensive tracking shot that the viewer quickly realizes represents the subjective point of view of Dr. Jekyll. The effect of characters directly addressing the camera (as Dr. Jekyll) is disarming. Not only is such a shot a masterful technical innovation, in light of the obstacle posed by sound recording, but it is a striking narrative device as well. Mamoulian’s subjective camera foreshadows the use, some 50 years later, of the same device to similar ends by John Carpenter in Halloween. Since Halloween, it has become a characteristic element of those kinds of films which indeed bear resemblance to Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. No less striking is the 360-degree pan which accompanies Dr. Jekyll’s initial transformation to Hyde. The shot underscores the duration of the transformation, solidly placing it in time and space. Mamoulian claims that the pan was the first of its kind in Hollywood film. The shot not only presented the obvious challenge of lighting, but also posed unique problems for recording sound. Mamoulian overcame this by mixing a sound effects track. The track is dominated rhythmically by a heartbeat (Mamoulian’s own) and serves as an early example of a complex sound mix in a Hollywood film. In addition, as he had done earlier in City Streets and particularly in Applause, Mamoulian utilized multiple microphones for recording live sound. He even pioneered a mobile microphone used in situations such as the opening shot of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.

This version of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde is ahead of its time in Mamoulian’s exploitation of the potential eroticism of Stevenson’s novel. Miriam Hopkin’s streetwalker, Ivy, is at once sympathetic and highly sensual. Unlike Stevenson’s gnarled, diminutive Hyde, Mamoulian’s representation of Hyde is that of an enlarged, powerful, bestial man. Both characterizations heighten the intensity of their moments together on screen. Jekyll first meets Ivy in her room where he has gone to return a discarded garter. He finds her nearly undressed as she slips beneath the bedcovers and taunts him coquettishly. The scene closes with Ivy’s legs dangling from beneath the covers deliciously—superimposed on the image of Jekyll and his friend Lanyon departing below.

Superimpositions and dissolves were not new to the cinema in 1932. However, Mamoulian’s use of them to heighten aesthetically the impact of various scenes was not characteristic of Hollywood in the 1930s. For example, the superimpositions used in the scene where Jekyll meets Ivy suggest that the image of Ivy’s leg lingers in Jekyll’s mind. Mamoulian’s use of dissolves may be somewhat more traditional in that they are the primary means for showing Jekyll’s transformations into Hyde.

Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde represents the strengths of Mamoulian’s style. Perhaps as an extension of his experience directing theater and opera, where the proscenium limits space, Mamoulian’s style emphasizes lighting and framing. In the film, when Hyde’s passion for Ivy becomes rage, he begins to strangle her. The two figures fall, struggling below the frame. Only when Hyde returns to frame does the viewer understand Ivy’s fate. Similarly, when Jekyll undergoes his first transformation, he falls, writhing out of frame. Mamoulian combines this technique with lighting in a later scene to create an enormous shadow—Hyde. The shadow is formed as Hyde runs from the frame, his departure signalled by his ever increasing shadow on the wall. This shot echoes a similar shot in F. W. Murnau’s Nosferatu where Count Dracula’s shadow gradually engulfs the cowering figure of Jonathan Harker.

Several nuances of Mamoulian’s style are also reinforced with this film. Split-screen is used, for example, to suggest a symbolic proximity between otherwise distant spaces and events. Another characteristic is the use of counterpoint to heighten dramatic effect. When Jekyll arrives to tell his fiancée, Muriel, that they must separate it is accompanied not by a dirge, but by the waltz to which they had danced earlier. Counterpoints such as this create a dynamism between the visuals and the sound. The waltz serves as a powerful reminder of Jekyll’s price for tampering with nature. Perhaps the strongest example of Mamoulian’s individuality as a filmmaker is the final shot, where Lanyon and the authorities stand over the body of the fallen Jekyll. Shot from inside and behind the flames of the fireplace, it is a complete synthesis of the medium’s potential for narrative discourse.

—Robert Winning

DR. MABUSE THE GAMBLER

See DOKTOR MABUSE DER SPIELER

DR. STRANGELOVE; OR, HOW I LEARNED TO STOP WORRYING AND LOVE THE BOMB

UK, 1964

Director: Stanley Kubrick

Production: Hawk Films, a Stanley Kubrick Production; black and white, 35mm; running time: originally 102 minutes, edited down to 93 minutes. Released 30 January 1964. Cost: $1,500,000.

Producer: Stanley Kubrick; associate producer: Victor Lyndon; screenplay: Stanley Kubrick, Terry Southern, and Peter George, originally conceived as a serious adaptation of Red Alert by Peter George, main titles by Pablo Ferro; photography: Gilbert Taylor; editor: Anthony Harvey; sound supervisor: John Cox; sound recorder: Richard Bird; dub mixer: John Aldred; sound editor: Leslie Hodgson; production designer: Ken Adam; art director: Peter Murton; music: Laurie Johnson, song "We'll Meet Again," is the original recording by Vera Lynn; special effects: Wally Veevers; travelling matte: Vic Margutti; costume designer: Pamela Carlton; aviation advisor: Capt. John Crewdson.

Cast: Peter Sellers (Group Capt. Lionel Mandrake/President Muffley/Dr. Strangelove); George C. Scott (Gen. Buck Turgidson); Sterling Hayden (Gen. Jack D. Ripper); Keenan Wynn (Col. Bat Guano); Slim Pickens (Maj. T. J. "King" Kong); Peter Bull (Ambassador de Sadesky); Tracy Reed (Miss Scott); James Earl Jones (Lieut. Lothar Zagg); Jack Creley (Mr. Staines); Frank Berry (Lieut. H. R. Dietrich); Glenn Beck (Lieut. W. D. Kivel); Shane Rimmer (Capt. G. A. "Ace" Owens); Paul Tamarin (Lieut. B. Goldberg); Gordon Tanner (General Faceman); Robert O'Neil (Admiral Randolph); Roy Stephens (Frank); Laurence Herder, John McCarthy, Hal Galili (Burpelson defense team members).

Award: New York Film Critics' Award, Best Direction, 1964.

Publications

Books:

Austen, David, The Cinema of Stanley Kubrick, London, 1969.
Walker, Alexander, Stanley Kubrick Directs, New York, 1972.
Kagan, Norman, The Cinema of Stanley Kubrick, New York, 1972.
Devries, Daniel, The Films of Stanley Kubrick, Grand Rapids, Michigan, 1973.
Bobker, Lee R., Elements of Film, New York, 1974.
Phillips, Gene D., Stanley Kubrick: A Film Odyssey, New York, 1975.
Leyda, Jay, editor, Voices of Film Experience, New York, 1977.
Monaco, James, How to Read a Film, New York, 1977.
O'Connor, John E., and Martin A. Jackson, editors, American History/American Film: Interpreting the Hollywood Image, New York, 1979.
Ciment, Michel, Kubrick, Paris, 1980; revised edition, 1987; translated as Kubrick, 1983.
Kolker, Robert Phillip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.

Hummel, Christoph, editor, Stanley Kubrick, Munich, 1984.
Brunetta, Gian Piero, Stanley Kubrick: Tempo, spazio, storia, e mondi possibili, Parma, 1985.

Articles:

Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), February 1962.
Kubrick, Stanley, "How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Cinema," in Films and Filming (London), June 1963.
Prideaux, T., "Take Aim: Fire at the Agonies of War," in Life (New York), 20 December 1963.
Tornabene, Lyn, "Contradicting the Hollywood Image," in Saturday Review (New York), 28 December 1963.
Milne, Tom, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1963–64.
Taylor, Stephen, in Film Comment (New York), Winter 1964.
Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 31 January 1964.
Forbes, Bryan, in Films and Filming (London), February 1964.
Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 13 February and 11 June 1964.
Burgess, Jackson, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1964.
Milne, Tom, "How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love Stanley Kubrick," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1964.
Goldberg, Joe, "Dr. Kubrick," in Seventh Art (New York), Spring 1964.
Price, James, "Stanley Kubrick's Divided World," in London Magazine, May 1964.
Russell, Lee, "Stanley Kubrick," in New Left Review (New York), Summer 1964.
Macklin, F. A., "Sex and Dr. Strangelove," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1965.
MacFadden, Patrick, in Film Society Review (New York), January 1967.
Manchel, Frank, in Media and Methods (Philadelphia), December 1967.
Edelman, Rob, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
Verstappen, W., "Dr. Strangelove: Analyse op de montagetafel," in Skoop (Amsterdam), October 1980.
Hoberman, J., "When Dr. No Met Dr. Strangelove," in Sight and Sound (London), December 1993.
Lefcowitz, Eric, "Dr. Strangelove Turns 30. Can it Still be Trusted?" in New York Times, 30 January 1994.
Southern, T., "Strangelove Outtake: Notes from the War Room," in Grand Street, no. 49, Summer 1994.
Tweg, S., "Reading Dr. Strangelove," in Metro Education (Melbourne), no. 6, 1995.
Séquences (Haute-Ville), September–October 1995.
Kubrick, Stanley, "Une comédie cauchemardesque," in Positif (Paris), September 1997.
Bourguignon, Thomas, in Positif (Paris), September 1997.
Macnab, Geoffrey, "Will it Dress?," an interview with set designer Ken Adams, in Sight & Sound (London), September 1999.

* * *

Stanley Kubrick's Dr. Strangelove, which has won wide and continued acceptance from the time of its release, has come to be considered one of the screen's great masterpieces of black comedy. Yet Kubrick had originally planned the film as a serious adaptation of Peter George's Red Alert, a novel concerned with the demented General Jack D. Ripper (Sterling Hayden) and his decision to order a group of B-52 bombers to launch an attack inside Russia. Gradually Kubrick's attitude toward his material changed: "My idea of doing it as a nightmare comedy came in the early weeks of working on the screenplay. I found that in trying to put meat on the bones and to imagine the scenes fully, one had to keep leaving out of it things which were either absurd or paradoxical, in order to keep it from being funny; and these things seemed to be close to the heart of the scenes in question."

Dr. Strangelove

Kubrick remembers that he kept revising the script right through the production period. "During shooting many substantial changes were made in the script, sometimes together with the cast during improvisations. Some of the best dialogue was created by Peter Sellers himself." Sellers played not only the title role of the eccentric scientist, but also the president of the United States and Captain Mandrake, a British officer who fails to dissuade General Ripper from his set purpose.

General Ripper's mad motivation for initiating a nuclear attack is his paranoid conviction that the explanation of his diminishing sexual potency can be traced to an international Communist conspiracy to taint the drinking water. Kubrick subtly reminds us of the general's obsession by a series of suggestive metaphors that occur in the course of the film. The very opening image of the film shows a nuclear bomber being refueled in mid-flight by another aircraft, with "Try a Little Tenderness" appropriately playing on the sound track to accompany their symbolic coupling. As Ripper describes to Mandrake his concern about preserving his potency, which he refers to as his "precious bodily essence," Kubrick photographs him in close-up from below, with a huge phallic cigar jutting from between his lips while he is talking. Later, when the skipper of a B-52 bomber (Slim Pickens) manages to dislodge a bomb that has been stuck in its chamber and unleash it on its Russian target, he sits astride this mighty symbol of potency clamped between his flanks, as it hurtles toward the earth.

Black ironies abound throughout the picture. During an emergency conference called by President Muffley, a disagreement between General Buck Turgidson (George C. Scott) and the Russian ambassador (Peter Bull) threatens to turn into a brawl, and the president intervenes by reminding them, "Please, gentlemen, you can't fight here; this is the War Room!" Later, when Mandrake tries to reach the president in order to warn him about the imminent attack on Russia, he finds that he lacks the correct change for the pay telephone he is using, and that the White House will not accept a collect call. He then demands that Colonel Bat Guano (Keenan Wynn) fire into a Coca-Cola machine in order to obtain the necessary coins. Guano reluctantly agrees, ruefully reminding Mandrake that it is he who will have to answer to the Coca-Cola Company. Guano blasts the machine, bends down to scoop up the silver—and is squirted full in the face with Coca-Cola by the vindictive machine.

Kubrick had originally included a scene in which the Russians and the Americans in the War Room engage in a free-for-all with custard pies, but deleted it from the final print of the film when he decided that “it was too farcical, and not consistent with the satiric tone of the rest of the film.” Very much in keeping with the satiric, dark humor of the picture is the figure of Dr. Strangelove himself, Kubrick’s grim vision of man’s final capitulation to the machine: he is more a robot than a human being, with his mechanical arm spontaneously saluting Hitler, his former employer, and his mechanical hand, gloved in black, at one point trying to strangle the flesh and blood still left in him.

In the end a single U.S. plane reaches its Russian target, setting off the Russian’s retaliatory Doomsday machine. There follows a series of blinding explosions, while on the sound track we hear a popular song which Kubrick resurrected from World War II: “We’ll meet again, don’t know where, don’t know when.” (Kubrick used the original World War II recording by Vera Lynn, which brought popularity back not only to the song but to Ms. Lynn as well.)

One critic summed up the film by saying that the black comedy which Kubrick had originally thought to exclude from Dr. Strangelove provides some of its most meaningful moments. “They are made up of the incongruities, the banalities, and misunderstandings that we are constantly aware of in our lives. On the brink of annihilation, they become irresistibly absurd.”

The theme that emerges from Dr. Strangelove is the plight of fallible man putting himself at the mercy of his “infallible” machines and thus bringing about his own destruction. Kubrick, who is always on the side of humanity in his films, indicates here, as in 2001: A Space Odyssey, that human fallibility is less likely to destroy man than the relinquishing of his moral responsibilities to his supposedly faultless machinery. Summing up his personal vision as it is reflected in Dr. Strangelove, the director has said: “The destruction of this planet would have no significance on a cosmic scale. Our extinction would be little more than a match flaring for a second in the heavens. And if that match does blaze in the darkness, there will be none to mourn a race that used a power that could have lit a beacon in the stars to light its funeral pyre.”

—Gene D. Phillips

DOG STAR MAN

USA, 1964

Director: Stan Brakhage

Production: Color and black and white, 16mm; silent; running time: 75 minutes (24 f.p.s.); released 1964. The film is composed of five parts which appeared separately before being brought together in the complete Dog Star Man; the parts are: Prelude (26–1/2 minutes, 1961), Part 1 (31 minutes, 1962), Part 2 (6–1/2 minutes, 1963), Part

3 (8 minutes, 1964), and Part 4 (7 minutes, 1964). Distributors continue to make the sections available for rent individually or together as a single, complete work; released in complete form on video by Mystic Fire Video, 1987.

Producer, photography, and editing: Stan Brakhage, assisted by Jane Brakhage.

Cast: Stan Brakhage and Jane Brakhage

Publications:

Books:

Clark, Dan, Brakhage, New York, 1966.

Brakhage, Stan, Metaphors on Vision, New York, 1976.

Sitney, P. Adams, Visionary Film: The American Avant-Garde, 1943–1978, 2nd ed, New York, 1979.

James, David, Allegories of Cinema: American Film in the Sixties, Princeton, New Jersey, 1989.

Wees, William C., Light Moving in Time: Studies in the Visual Aesthetics of Avant-Garde Film, Berkeley, California 1992.

Articles:

McClure, Michael, “Dog Star Man: The First 16mm Epic,” Film Culture (New York), no. 29, Summer 1963.

Wees, William C., “Visual Renewal in Stan Brakhage’s Dog Star Man,” in Atropos (Montreal), vol. 1, no. 2, Spring 1979.

* * *

Widely recognized as one of the monuments of experimental/avant-garde/personal film, Dog Star Man is a compendium of unorthodox filmmaking techniques applied to a deceptively simple narrative: a man (played by Brakhage) carrying an axe and accompanied by a dog, struggles up a steep mountainside and chops down a dead tree. Originally, Brakhage has said, “I thought it would be a little, simple film on a woodsman, myself as the woodsman, the wood-gatherer,” but “it ended up as . . . an exploration of the whole history of man. I mean, as I climb this hill the images suggest in many ways, metaphorically and in other ways, the history of man himself and his endeavor, and the meaning of whatever it is he does and makes.” While that claim may sound excessively grand, it is in keeping with the formal and thematic complexity of the work, not to mention the unusually heavy demands it places on viewers’ patience, visual literacy, and interpretive skills. If Dog Star Man is a “difficult” work, it nevertheless repays close study and repeated viewing.

Moving from complete darkness, to intermittent flares and flickers of light, and then to quick glimpses of seemingly unrelated images, Prelude, the first of the film’s five parts, introduces the principal images and formal techniques that will recur as the film progresses. Most shots are brief and combined with other shots through superimposition and intricate, highly kinetic montage. Dynamic camera movement—usually hand-held—adds to the intense, compelling rhythm of the work. The surge and flow of light, color, texture, and rapidly changing images propel the film forward and engage the viewer in “an adventure of perception,” as Brakhage has called it, but the significance of the images is, at first, hard to determine—immediate perceptual impact prevails over conceptual understanding. But through repetition and associations built up among groups of related images, graspable meanings and the rudiments of a narrative begin to emerge. Like the leitmotifs in Richard Wagner’s Ring cycle, key images—the axe-bearing woodsman, a full moon, a birth, a lactating breast, a naked woman, mountains and trees that appear to stretch and writhe, a weathered, grey, dead tree, to mention just a few—return numerous times but nearly always modified in some way: in color or texture (including being painted over or scratched on), in length and clarity, in combination with other images. The images thus accumulate multiple meanings—literal, metaphoric, symbolic—as the work progresses.

“The images,” Jonas Mekas has suggested, “become like words: they come back again, in little bursts, and disappear, and come back again—like in sentences—creating visual and mental impressions, experiences.” P. Adams Sitney finds the images related to “four basic visual themes,” which he summarizes as, “(1) the four elements, air, earth, fire and water; (2) the cosmos represented in stock footage of the sun, the moon, and the stars; (3) Brakhage’s household—himself, his dog and cat, his baby, and particularly his wife’s nude body; and (4) artificial, yet purely filmic devices such as painting or scratching on film, distorting lenses, double exposure and clear leader.” A fifth important theme involves microscopic footage of blood vessels, close-ups of a beating heart, and other images of viscera and bodily fluids.

Part I offers a change of pace from Prelude’s “pyrotechnic, split-second montage with as much varied material as [Brakhage] could force into a half hour” (Sitney). Many of its shots are longer and there is only one layer of images. Its principal subject is the woodsman, with his axe and dog, working his way up a snowy mountainside, slipping and stumbling in a kind of two-steps-forward-one-step-back progression (echoed in microscopic images of the advance and retreat of blood in a vein or artery at the end of Part I). Part 2, in which two layers of images are superimposed, features extreme close-ups of a new-born child and a technique that is new to the film: bits of images inserted into holes punched in successive frames of the film to produce a kind of animated mosaic or collage-like effect suggesting the infant’s initial, disjointed engagement with the world outside the womb. Among the superimposed images are more shots of the woodsman working his way upwards as Part 2 begins, and falling backwards as it ends.

Adding a third layer of superimposition, Brakhage devotes Part 3 to the erotic body. Bare flesh, breasts and buttocks, vagina and penis, caressing hands and undulating bodies meet, overlap, merge, dissolve, and metamorphose. Distinctions between male and female and markers of separate individualities become increasingly blurred, and near the end the camera “penetrates” the fleshy, erotic surface of the body to display a beating heart and other more ambiguous images connoting the body’s interior fluids, tissues, cavities, and organs. Finally, within the density of four layers of superimposition, images of the woodsman chopping the dead tree dominate Part 4, until the final moments when, as at the beginning of Prelude, the screen returns, by way of abstract flashes of light, to total darkness.

As even a brief and inadequate summary of the complete Dog Star Man indicates, particular images and themes introduced in Prelude predominate in different parts of the film, but never to the complete exclusion of the others. The result is an organic unity between the parts and the whole, reflecting, in formal terms, the work’s theme of the interrelatedness of all things—animal, vegetable and mineral; microcosmic and macrocosmic; male and female; natural and artificial; external and internal (dreams, desires, the imagination, and what Brakhage has called “closed-eye vision” and “patterns that move straight out from the inside of the mind through the optic nerves”).

In an interview conducted while he was in the midst of editing Dog Star Man, Brakhage summed up this urge to bring everything together—to “bring forth children and films and inspire concerns with plants and rocks and all sights seen.” While deeply personal in inspiration, Dog Star Man is also the preeminent example of an avant-garde film with epic scope and a hero of mythic proportions, comparable to other twentieth century, modernist classics like Ezra Pound’s Cantos or James Joyce’s Ulysses.

—William C. Wees

DOKTOR MABUSE DER SPIELER; DAS TESTAMENT DES DR. MABUSE

Director: Fritz Lang

DOKTOR MABUSE DER SPIELER

(Dr. Mabuse the Gambler)

Germany, 1922

Production: Uco-Film Studios; black and white, 35mm; silent; length: Part I (Der grosse Spieler—Ein Bild der Zeit) originally 3496 meters, Part II (Inferno—Ein Spiel von Menschen unserer Zeit) 2560 meters. Released 17 April 1922 (Part I) and 26 May 1922 (Part II). Filmed 1921–22. Part I in 8 weeks and Part II in 9 weeks; in Uco-Film studios in Berlin.

Screenplay: Fritz Lang and Thea von Harbou, from a novel by Norbert Jacques published in Berliner Illustrierte Zeitung; photography: Carl Hoffman; art directors: Carl Stahl Urach (died during production), Otto Hunte, Erich Kettelhut, and Karl Vollbrecht; costume designer: Vally Reinecke.

Cast: Rudolph Klein-Rogge (Dr. Mabuse); Aud Egede Nissen (Cara Carezza, the dancer); Gertrude Welcker (Countess Told); Alfred Abel (Count Told); Bernhard Goetzke (Detective von Wenck); Paul Richter (Edgar Hull); Robert Forster-Larringa (Dr. Mabuse’s servant); Hans Adalbert Schlettow (Georg, the chauffeur); Georg John (Pesche); Karl Huszar (Hawasch, manager of the counterfeiting factory); Grete Berger (Fine, Mabuse’s servant); Julius Falkenstein

Das Testament des Dr. Mabuse

(Karsten, Wenck's friend); Lydia Potechina (Russian woman); Julius E. Herrman (Schramm, the proprietor); Karl Platen (Told's servant); Anita Berber (Dancer); Paul Biensfeldt (Man with the pistol); Edgar Pauly (Fat Man); Lil Dagover.

Publications

Books:

Rotha, Paul, The Film Till Now, London, 1930.
 Weinberg, Herman G., An Index to the Creative Work of Fritz Lang, London, 1946.
 Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1947.
 Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Form, New York, 1949.
 Courtade, Francis, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.
 Moullet, Luc, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.
 Eibel, Alfred, editor, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1964.
 Jensen, Paul M., The Cinema of Fritz Lang, New York, 1969.

Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, 1969.
 Johnston, Claire, Fritz Lang, London, 1969.
 Manvell, Roger, and Heinrich Fraenkel, The German Cinema, New York, 1971.
 Henry, Michael, Le Cinéma expressionniste allemand, Paris, 1971.
 Grafe, Frieda, Enno Patalas, and Hans Helmut Prinzler, Fritz Lang, Munich, 1976.
 Eisner, Lotte, Fritz Lang, London, 1977.
 Armour, Robert, Fritz Lang, Boston, 1978.
 Ott, Frederick W., The Films of Fritz Lang, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1979.
 Jenkins, Stephen, editor, Fritz Lang: The Image and the Look, London, 1979.
 Kaplan, E. Ann, Fritz Lang: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1981.
 Maibohm, Ludwig, Fritz Lang: Seine Filme—Sein Leben, Munich, 1981.
 Dürrenmatt, Dieter, Fritz Lang: Leben und Werk, Basel, 1982.
 Bronner, S. E., and D. Kellner, Passion and Rebellion: The Expressionist Heritage, London, 1983.
 Schnauber, Cornelius, Fritz Lang in Hollywood, Wein, 1986.

Jacques, Norbert, Dr. Mabuse, der Spieler: Roman, Film, Dokumente, St. Ingbert, 1987.
 Humphries, Reynold, Fritz Lang: Genre and Representation in His American Films, Baltimore, 1989.
 McGilligan, Patrick, Fritz Lang: The Nature of the Beast, New York, 1997.
 Phillips, Gene D., Exiles in Hollywood: Major European Film Directors in America, London, 1998.

Articles:

Berliner Tageblatt, 30 April 1922.
Variety (New York), 2 June 1922.
 Ihering, Herbert, in Berliner Börsen-Courier, 11 June 1922; reprinted in Von Reinhardt bis Brecht, East Berlin, 1958.
 Lang, Fritz, "Kitsch: Sensation-Kultur und Film," in Das Kulturfilmbuch, edited by E. Beyfuss and P. Kossowsky, Berlin, 1924.
New York Times, 10 August 1927.
 Hooper, Trask C., in New York Times, 20 May 1928.
 Goetz, Fritz, in New York Times, 9 August 1928.
 Eisner, Lotte, "Notes sur le style de Fritz Lang," in Revue de Cinéma (Paris), 1 February 1947.
 Wilson, Harry, "The Genius of Fritz Lang," in Film Quarterly (London), Summer 1947.
 Gesek, Ludwig, "Fritz Lang: Suggestion und Stimmung," in Gestalter der Filmkunst von Asta Nielsen bis Walt Disney, Vienna, 1948.
 Lang, Fritz, in Penguin Film Review (London), vol. 5, 1948.
 Franju, Georges, "Le Style de Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1959.
 Everschor, Franz, in Film-Dienst (Dusseldorf), 5 April 1961.
 Taylor, John Russell, "The Nine Lives of Dr. Mabuse," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1961.
 Gregor, Ulrich, and Enno Patalas, "Deutschland: Expressionismus und neue Sachlichkeit," in Geschichte des Films, Gütersloh, 1962.
 Shivas, Mark, "Fritz Lang Talks about Dr. Mabuse," in Movie (London), November 1962.
 Berg, Gretchen, editor, "La Nuit viennoise: Une Confession de Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August 1965.
 Freund, Rudolf, "Zwischen Kunst und Kolportage," in Film Spiegel (East Berlin), 1 December 1965.
 Legrand, Gérard, "Nouvelles notes pour un éloge de Fritz Lang," in Positif (Paris), April 1968.
 Toeplitz, J., in Kino (Warsaw), March 1972.
 Burch, Noël, "De Mabuse a M: Le Travail de Fritz Lang," in Revue d'Esthétique (Paris), 1973.
 Sayre, Nora, in New York Times, 15 October 1973.
 Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1974.
 Boost, C., "Fritz Lang," in Skoop (Amsterdam), February 1975.
 Blumenberg, Hans, "Kino der Angst," in Die Zeit (Hamburg), 13 September 1976.
 Jubak, J., "Lang and Parole: Character and Narrative in Doktor Mabuse, der Spieler," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), no. 1, 1979.
 Fischer, Lucy, "Dr. Mabuse and Mr. Lang," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), Winter 1980.
 Kane, P., "Revoir Mabuse," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1980.
 Burch, Noël, "Notes on Fritz Lang's First Mabuse," in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Spring 1981.
 Johnston, S., in Films and Filming (London), July 1982.

Bergstrom, J., "Expressionism and Mabuse," in Iris (Iowa City), Autumn 1992.
 Brandlmeier, T., "Mabuse komplett," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), April 1995.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, "Fritz Lang: The Illusion of Mastery (German Film Director)," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 10, no. 1, January 2000.

DAS TESTAMENT DES DR. MABUSE

(The Last Will of Dr. Mabuse)

Germany, 1933

Production: Nero-Film A.G. Studios; black and white, 35mm; running time: about 122 minutes; length 3334 meters. Released 5 December 1933 in Vienna, a French version (95 minutes) was shot simultaneously with the same technical crew and released April 1933 in Paris. Filmed in 10 weeks in 1932 in Nero-Film A.G. studios in Berlin.

Producer: Seymour Nebenzal; screenplay: Thea von Harbou and Fritz Lang, from the characters in a novel by Norbert Jacques; photography: Fritz Arno Wagner and Karl Vass; art directors: Karl Vollbrecht and Emil Hasler; music: Hans Erdmann.

Cast: Rudolph Klein-Rogge (Dr. Mabuse); Oskar Beregi (Dr. Baum); Karl Meixner (Landlord); Theodor Loos (Dr. Kramm, assistant to Baum); Otto Wernicke (Detective Lohmann); Klaus Pohl (Müller, Lohmann's assistant); Wera Liessem (Lilli); Gustav Diessl (Thomas Kent); Camilla Spira (Jewel-Anna); Rudolf Schündler (Hardy); Theo Lingen (Hardy's friend); Paul Oskar Höcker (Bredow); Paul Henckels (Lithographer); Georg John (Baum's servant); Ludwig Stössel (Worker); Hadrian M. Netto (Nicolai Grigoriev); Paul Bernd (Black-mailer); Henry Pless (Dunce); A. E. Licho (Dr. Hauser); Karl Platen, Anna Goltz, and Heinrich Gretler (Sanitarium Assistants); Gerhard Bienart, Paul Bernd, Ernst Ludwig, Klaus Pohl, and Paul Rehkopf (Detectives).

Publications

Articles:

Variety (New York), 9 May 1933.
 Rotha, Paul, in Cinema Quarterly (London), Autumn 1934.
 Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 20 March 1943.
 Romano, Sergio, in Cinema (Rome), 10 November 1948.
 "One Facet of Lang's Art Prophetic of Hitlerism," in Herald Tribune (New York), 21 March 1949.
 Ruppert, Martin, in Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 13 September 1951.
 G.J., in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1954.
 Kipfmüller, Erwin, "Gespräch mit Fritz Lang," in Film (Munich), December 1956.

Mardore, Michel, "Le Diabolique Docteur Mabuse," in Cinéma (Paris), August-September 1961.

Rhode, Eric, "Fritz Lang (The German Period, 1919–1933)," in Tower of Babel, London, 1966.

New York Times, 6 December 1973.

Greenspun, Roger, in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1973.

William, Paul, in Village Voice (New York), 12 September 1974.

Phillips, Gene D., "Fritz Lang Gives His Last Interview," in Village Voice (New York), 16 August 1976.

Lang, Fritz, "On Dr. Mabuse," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1978.

Audibert, L., in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1979.

Cluny, C. M., in Cinéma (Paris), January 1980.

Legrand, Gérard, "Le Nom de l'innommable," in Positif (Paris), March 1980.

Werner, G., "Fritz Lang and Goebbels: Myth and Facts," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), no. 3, 1990.

Lenne, Gérard, "Le testament du Dr Mabuse: les inventions de Lang," in Mensuel du Cinéma, no. 10, October 1993.

Brandlmeier, T., "Mabuse komplett," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), April 1995.

Also see list of publications following the Doktor Mabuse, Der Spieler credits.

* * *

The popular novelist Thea von Harbou began her unbroken 12-year scripting association with Fritz Lang in 1920. Divorcing the actor Rudolf Klein-Rogge, she married Lang in 1924, working with him until 1932 when they separated and subsequently divorced after Lang's hasty departure from Germany. Lang had already gained considerable success as the writer-director of Die Spinnen. In Thea von Harbou, he found an ideal writing partner to develop the psychological potentiality of a psychotic genius and master-criminal, Dr. Mabuse. Mabuse became the protagonist in Lang's two celebrated films of 1922 and 1933.

Dr. Mabuse the Gambler, Part I, began by showing Mabuse making a fortune on the stock market and using hypnotism to win $50,000 from Edgar Hull, whom Mabuse finally murders after inducing his own exotic mistress, the dancer Cara Carezza, to seduce him. He induces Cara to commit suicide when she is faced with arrest. Opposed to Mabuse is von Wenck, the public prosecutor; in Part II Wenck manages to resist Mabuse's attempts to hypnotise him and traces the criminal to his head-quarters, a building placed under siege by the police. When arrested Mabuse goes insane. Reviving the character of Mabuse 10 years later in The Last Will of Dr. Mabuse Lang and Harbou show how the insane Mabuse uses his hypnotic powers to induce Dr. Baum, director of the asylum where he is being held, to maintain his criminal activities outside and, indeed, on Mabuse's death to accept that he is the reincarnation of the mad doctor. Commissioner Lehmann (the dedicated police superintendent Lang had introduced in M), exposes Baum, who finally goes mad after the model of Mabuse and inhabits the criminal's original cell. Mabuse was revived, according to Lang, as a projection of Hitler: "I put all the Nazi slogans into the mouth of the ghost of the criminal," he has stated. In 1933 Goebbels banned both Mabuse films. "Out of the Mabuses," Lang wrote later when The Last Will of Dr. Mabuse was salvaged and released in America in 1943, "came the Heydrichs, the Himmlers and the Hitlers." He added, "This film was made as an allegory to show Hitler's processes of terrorism."

Lang always insisted that the original character of Mabuse had contemporary significance even in 1922. He seems to represent an arch criminal of that period of galloping inflation that destroyed the German currency, and with it German social morale. According to Lotte Eisner, Lang's friend and biographer, the Berlin critics accepted his reference to the times without demur. Writing of the period, Lang himself said, "The First World War brought changes. In Europe, an entire generation of intellectuals embraced despair; young people, myself among them, made a fetish of tragedy." This helps to account for the fact that insanity in various forms became a recurrent theme in German cinema of the 1920s. Lang regarded his film not merely as a box-office thriller but as a document of the time, and Siegfried Kracauer terms Mabuse, "a contemporary tyrant," a symbol of mad, anti-social domination, combining a lust for absolute tyranny with the desire to effect social chaos. Like Caligari before him, he is insane and makes continual use of hypnosis to overcome his victims: an attempt is even made to hypnotise the audience. Lang indeed was concerned to give his film a contemporary psychological touch; Mabuse's thirst for power and his Protean manifestations in a ceaseless flow of disguises make him seem ever-present and ever-active in society. Eric Rhode, writing in Tower of Babel (1966), sees the original film and the character of Mabuse as a myth of its time reflecting "not only the confusion and anxieties of the Weimar Republic," but also Oswald Spengler's romantic, fatalistic thesis in his bestseller, The Decline of the West (1918), in which he claimed that city-bound man is doomed through his power-lust for money. This was relevant not only to Lang's Mabuse but to his most spectacular work of the 1920s, Metropolis. In Mabuse his primary settings are gambling dens, depraved nightclubs, and the Stock Exchange. Mabuse is a vampire gambler and cheat extraordinary, operating against society on a universal scale, typified here by such characters as the wealthy, degenerate Count and Countess Told. As played by Rudolf Klein-Rogge, Mabuse has all the appearance of an actor-like, romantic genius—the penetrating eyes and the flowing mane of hair swept back from a towering brow.

Lang, whose father was a Viennese architect and whose training had been in art, had a strongly developed visual and structural eye. Paul Rotha, himself trained as an artist, admits that Mabuse "was far ahead of its time in décor." He writes of "the perfection of camera work and lighting effects" in Lang's films. Lang employed the iris device to dramatic effect, double, triple and quadruple exposures, and chiaroscuro lighting: for visual effect, Eric Rhode suggests the scene when the "mad count wanders with a candelabrum through his twilight mansion." Lang, he points out, "favours middle or long distance shots, and a rim lighting that gives his characters both dimension and solidity. In Dr. Mabuse rooms tend to be ample, while streets are so narrow that cars jam and bump into each other." Sergei Eisenstein, who had assisted Esther Shub in re-editing Dr. Mabuse for Russian audiences, commented on "the mystic criminal reaching out towards us from our screens showing us a future as an unrelieved night crowded with sinister shadows."

Lang was to make one further film featuring Mabuse in 1960, working again in Germany. Though adroitly made, The Thousand Eyes of Dr. Mabuse, a somewhat pale revival of Mabuse in the form of a madman who believes himself the reincarnation of the dead criminal but turns out to be Mabuse's son, seemed out of place by the 1960s.

—Roger Manvell

LA DOLCE VITA

(The Sweet Life)

Italy-France, 1960

Director: Federico Fellini

Production: Riama Film (Rome) and Pathé Consortium Cinéma (Paris); black and white, 35mm. Totalscope; running time: 180 minutes. Released February 1960. Rome. Filmed 16 March-27 August 1959 in Rome, the Odescalchi Palace, Fregene, and in the studios of Cinecittà.

Producers: Giuseppe Amato with Angelo Rizzoli, and Franco Magli as executive producer; screenplay: Federico Fellini, Tullio Pinelli, Brunello Rondi, and Ennio Flaiano, from an original story by Federico Fellini, Tullio Pinelli and Ennio Flaiano; photography: Otello Martelli; editor: Leo Cattozzo; sound: Agostino Moretti; art director: Piero Gherardi; music: Nino Rota; costume designer: Piero Gherardi; artistic collaborator: Brunello Rondi.

Cast: Marcello Mastroianni (Marcello Rubini); Walter Santesso (Paparazzo, the photographer); Anouk Aimée (Maddalena); Adriana Moneta (Prostitute); Yvonne Furneaux (Emma, Marcello's mistress); Anita Ekberg (Sylvia, a Hollywood star); Lex Barker (Robert, Sylvia's fiancée); Alan Dijon (Frankie Stout); Alain Cuny (Steiner); Valeria Ciangottini (Paola); Annibale Ninchi (Marcello's father); Magali

La dolce vita

Noel (Fanny, a chorus girl); Nadia Gray (Nadia); Jacques Sernas (Matinee idol); Polidor (Clown).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Gold Palm, 1960; Oscar for Best Foreign Picture, 1961; New York Film Critics Award, Best Foreign Film, 1961.

Publications

Script:

Fellini, Federico, and others, La dolce vita, edited by Tullio Kezich, Bologna, 1960; translated as La Dolce Vita, New York, 1961; also included in Quattro film, Turin, 1974.

Books:

Renzi, Renzo, Federico Fellini, Lyons, 1960.

Agel, Henri, Le Cinéma et le sacré, Paris, 1961.

Lo Duca, Giuseppe, editor, La Dolce Vita, Paris, 1961.

Borde, Raymond, and André Bouissy, Nouveau cinéma italien, Lyons, 1963.

Budgen, Suzanne, Fellini, London, 1966.

Huss, Roy, and Norman Silverstein, The Film Experience, New York, 1968.

Richardson, Robert, Literature and Film, Bloomington, Indiana, 1969.

Ketcham, Charles, Federico Fellini: The Search for a New Mythology, New York, 1976.

Rosenthal, Stuart, The Cinema of Federico Fellini, London, 1976.

Strich, Christian, editor, Fellini on Fellini, New York, 1976.

Stubbs, John, Federico Fellini: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1978.

Alpert, Hollis, Fellini: A Life, New York, 1981.

Fruttero, Carlo, and Franco Lucentini, Je te trouve un peu pâle: Récit d'été avec trente fantômes féminins de Federico Fellini, Paris, 1982.

Costello, Donald, P., Fellini's Road, Notre Dame, Indiana, 1983.

Grazzini, Giovanni, editor, Federico Fellini, Intervista sul cinema, Rome, 1983.

Burke, Frank, Federico Fellini: Variety Lights to La Dolce Vita, Boston, 1984.

Chandler, Charlotte, The Ultimate Seduction, New York, 1984.

Fava, Claudio F., and Aldo Vigano, The Films of Federico Fellini, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1985.

Murray, Edward, Fellini the Artist, New York, 1985.

Kezich, Tullio, Fellini, Milan, 1987.

Bondanella, Peter, The Cinema of Federico Fellini, Princeton, 1992.

Secchiaroli, Tazio, Tutto Fellini, New York, 1994.

Costantini, Costanzo, Conversations with Fellini, San Diego, 1996.

Chandler, Charlotte, I, Fellini, Collingdale, 1998.

Articles:

“Su La dolce vita la parola a Fellini,” in Bianco e Nero (Rome), January-February 1960.

Aristarco, Guido, in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), January-February 1960.

Bruno, Edoardo, in Filmcritica (Rome), February 1960.

Pasolino, Pier Paolo, “L’irrazionalismo cattolico di Fellini,” in Filmcritica (Rome), February 1960.

- Rondi, Brunello, "Dialectica de La dolce vita," in Filmcritica (Rome), February 1960.
- Laura, Ernesto, "La stagione delle mele d'oro," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), March-April 1960.
- Delouche, Dominique, "Un Fellini baroque," in Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), Spring 1960.
- Grandi, Libero, "Filming La Dolce Vita in Black-and-White and Wide-Screen," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), April 1960.
- Lane, John Francis, "Fellini Tells Why," in Films and Filming (London), June 1960.
- Agel, Henri, in Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), Summer 1960.
- Laugier, Jean-Louis, "Il dolce Fellini," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July 1960.
- Mardore, Michel, in Positif (Paris), July-August 1960.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, in Image et Son (Paris), October 1960.
- Rhode, Eric, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1960.
- Durgnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), January 1961.
- "Quattro domande sul cinema italiano," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), January-February 1961.
- Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), April 1961.
- Alpert, Hollis, in Saturday Review (New York), 15 April 1961.
- Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 20 April 1961.
- Kauffmann, Stanley, in New Republic (New York), 1 May 1961.
- Lane, John Francis, in Films and Filming (London), June 1961.
- Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), June-July 1961.
- Franchi, R. L., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1961.
- Holland, Norman, "The Follies Fellini," in Hudson Review (New York), Autumn 1961.
- Peri, Enzo, "Federico Fellini: An Interview," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1961.
- Duprey, Richard, "Bergman and Fellini, Explorers of the Modern Spirit," in Catholic World (Paramus, New Jersey), October 1961.
- Bergtal, Eric, "The Lonely Crowd in La Dolce Vita," in America (New York), 7 October 1961.
- Flaus, John, in Film Journal (Evanston, Illinois), April 1962.
- Kael, Pauline, "The Come-Dressed-As-the-Sick-Soul-of-Europe Parties," in Massachusetts Review (Amherst), Winter 1963.
- Harcourt, Peter, "The Secret Life of Federico Fellini," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1966.
- Levine, Irving R., "I Was Born for the Cinema," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1966.
- Wood, Robin, "The Question of Fellini Continues," in December (London), nos. 2-3, 1967.
- Baldelli, P., "Dilatazione visionaria del documento e nostalgia della madre chiesa in Fellini," in Cinema dell'ambiguità: Rossellini, De Sica e Zavattini, Fellini, Rome, 1971.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, "Fellini," in Image et Son (Paris), January 1971.
- Julia, Jacques, "Psychanalyse de Fellini," in Cinéma (Paris), May 1971.
- Martin, Marcel, "Un Artiste sous le chapiteau," in Cinéma (Paris), May 1971.
- Torres Fernández, A., in Contracampo (Madrid), June-July 1981.
- Villien, Bruno, in Cinématographe (Paris), September 1981.
- Film Criticism* (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Autumn 1984.
- Pulleine, Tim, in Films and Filming (London), September 1987.
- Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1987.
- Rhodie, S., "How Sweet It Is: La Dolce Vita," in Cinema Papers (Fitzroy), March 1989.
- Kiarostami, Abbas, "De Sophia Loren à La dolce vita," in Positif (Paris), June 1994.
- Childebert, T., and André Moreau, "Dolce vita dolorosa: La dolce vita," in Télérama (Paris), 26 October 1994.
- Amengual, Barthélemy, "Propositions pour un portrait du jeune Fellini en néo-réaliste," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1995.
- Hutera, Donald, interview with David Glass, in Time Out (London), 3 April 1996.
- Castiel, E., in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 189, March/June 1997.
- Statta, Gloria, "The Buzz About Paparazzi: Marcello Mastroianni Remembers Working with Federico Fellini and Tazio Secchiaroli, the First Paparazzo," in Aperture, no. 150, Winter 1998.
- Gundle, Stephen, La Dolce Vita, in History Today, vol. 50, no. 1, January 2000.
- * * *
- Fellini's epic study of the loss of values at the climax of the Italian "economic miracle," delineates the daily activities of a writer, turned reporter for a sensationalist journal, who is too deeply compromised by the degeneracy around him to see it, never mind report on it. The opening and closing scenes of the film are cleverly matched allusions to Dante which underscore the moral loss and its consequences for Italy, at the very moment when the revival of Fascism was beginning to make a difference in the balance of political powers.
- Marcello follows a helicopter delivering a monumental statue of Christ, on a tow line, to the Vatican. From his own helicopter, he flirts with women sunbathing on a roof. The noise of the machine drowns out his voice as he tries to shout for their telephone numbers. In a parallel scene of shot-countershot the film ends with Marcello accosted by a charming and innocent girl who had once waited on his table. A stretch of water separates them and the noise of the sea makes her words inaudible to him. An Italian audience might recognize the allusion to the Medusa of the Inferno in the grotesquely reified image of Christ soaring through the Roman sky; even more evident would be the figure of Matilda at the top of Purgatorio who represents the summit of earthly beauty, irradiated by divine grace. Marcello has lost the ability to react to the grossness of the former and the saving promise of the latter. The world he inhabits is as lost as he is: Marcello moves from prostitutes to aristocratic women while, at the same time, deceiving his girlfriend; his intellectual friend, Steiner, who had urged him to find more fulfilling work, kills himself and his children; he covers for his newspaper the scene of a false miracle where someone is trampled by the enthusiastic crowd; he follows an American movie star as she utters banalities and poses for the press. In the center of the film Marcello accompanies his father on his first night in Rome since he was one of Mussolini's blackshirts (this is subtly suggested by the old man's references, never bluntly stated). The father's physical collapse and profound embarrassment when he fails to perform with a prostitute predicts the hero's eventual confrontation with the limitation of his values, just as it suggests that the playboy figure of 1959, brilliantly represented by Marcello Mastroianni, is a modern version of the Fascist ideal.
- The moral atmosphere of La dolce vita reflects that in all of Fellini's films, but the grandeur of its scale, the refusal to resort to a pitiful or lovable protagonist, and the accuracy of its caricatures make it one of his most enduring achievements. Its initial success was, however, due in great part to the supposedly daring and sensational manner with which it dealt with sexual themes. Actually, it was one of three films to emerge from Italy at the end of the 1950s which heralded a powerful renewal of that national cinema. The others were Michelangelo Antonioni's L'avventura and Luchino Visconti's Rocco e i suoi fratelli, both released in 1960.

—P. Adams Sitney

DOM ZA VESANJE

(Time of the Gypsies)

Yugoslavia-USA, 1989

Director: Emir Kusturica

Production: Forum Film, Sarajevo TV and Columbia Pictures; colour, 35mm; running time: 142 minutes.

Producer: Mirza Pasic; executive producer: Milan Martinovic; co-producer: Harry Saltzman; screenplay: Emir Kusturica, Gordan Mihic; photography: Vilko Filac; editor: Andrija Zafranovic; assistant directors: Maja Gardinovacki, Dragan Kresoja; production design: Miljen Kljakovic; music: Goran Bregovic; sound: Gordana Petakovic, Ivan Zakic, Srdan Popovic, Theodore Mitchel Yannie, Mladen Prebil.

Cast: Davor Dujmovic (Perhan); Bora Todorovic (Ahmed Dzida); Ljubica Adzovic (Baba); Husnija Hasmovic (Uncle Merdzan); Sinolicka Trpkova (Azra); Zabit Memedov (Zabit); Elvira Sali (Daca); Suada Karisik (Dzamila); Ajnur Redzepi (Perhan's son).

Awards: Best Director, Cannes 1989.

Publications

Books:

Horton, Andrew, "Time of the Gypsies," Writing the Character Centered Screenplay, Berkeley, 1994.

Horton, Andrew, "Ethnic Godfathers and Grandmothers: Emir Kusturica & Time of the Gypsies's Balkan Makeover of Coppola's Godfathers" in Play It Again, Sam: Retakes on Remakes, edited by Andrew Horton & Stuart McDougal, Berkeley, 1996.

Bertellini, Giorgio, Emir Kusturica, Milano, 1996.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 17 May 1989.

Brisset, S., and G. Ptilat, Cinéma (Paris), October 1989.

Grugeau, G., "Entre ciel et terre" in 24 Images (Montreal), Fall 1989.

Gauthier, G., Revue du Cinéma (Paris), November 1989.

Gili, G.A., and others, "Emir Kusturica" in Positif (Paris), November 1989.

Katsahnias, I., "Freaks, freaks. . ." in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1989.

Insardorf, Annette, "Gypsy Life Beguiles a Film Maker" in The New York Times, February 4, 1990.

Brown, G., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1990.

Beauchamp, M., and G. Grugeau, "La quête du pays" in 24 Images (Montreal), Summer 1990.

Schupp, P., Séquences (Montreal), June 1990.

Feldvoss, Marli, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), September 1991.

Binder, David, "A Bosnian Movie Maker Laments the Death of the Yugoslav Nation" in The New York Times, October 25, 1992.

Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), December 1992.

Dakovic, Nevena, "Mother, Myth, and Cinema: Recent Yugoslav Cinema," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 21, no. 2, Winter 1996–1997.

Wrathall, John, "Gypsy Time," in Sight & Sound (London), December 1997.

Rouyer, Philippe, and Michel Ciment, "Emir Kusturica," in Positif (Paris), October 1998.

"Misdirected Pride (Bosnian Filmmaker Emir Kusturica)," in Economist, vol. 351, no. 8115, 17 April 1999.

Horton, Andrew, "'But to Have Dreamed It All': The Balkans' Healing Irony (Balkan Cinema)," in Chronicle of Higher Education, vol. 45, no. 43, 2 July 1999.

* * *

It is one of the ironies of contemporary cinema that one of the most celebrated filmmakers anywhere is Emir Kusturica, a Bosnian Muslim from Sarajevo, who has been able to draw upon his rich yet troubled former country to weave memorable tales of humor, horror and pathos, all under the banner word he calls "joy." When Father Was Away On Business won the Palm D'Or at the Cannes Film Festival in 1985 as a powerful tale about the survival of a Muslim family under the anti-Stalinist terrorism in Yugoslavia in the 1950s, and he won the Palm D'Or a second time in 1995 for Underground, a darkly carnivalesque vision of the breakup of Yugoslavia mixing equal doses of realism and Balkan surrealism. And Time of the Gypsies won the Cannes Best Director Award in 1989 for this exuberant yet pessimistic narrative based on a true story of Yugoslav gypsies selling their own children into a form of slavery in Italy.

An appreciation of Kusturica's film today, of course, comes with the uneasy awareness of how strangely cinematic narratives can sometimes foreshadow history. For while Kusturica's tale which echoes Coppola's Godfather trilogy in a number of ways does not speak of ethnic cleansing and religious intolerance, the forces of chaos suggested in the film do seem to provide some insight into the horrors of the current Bosnian and Balkan conflicts.

Kusturica manages a difficult balancing act in this film as he was able to use American financing (Columbia Pictures produced and released the film) to shoot a film almost entirely in the gypsy language which meant it would need subtitles in every country, including the soon-to-collapse Yugoslavia. He also took a chance on a number of gypsy actors and actresses including the wonderful Hasnija Hasmovic who plays an almost mythical Earth Mother-Grandmother figure at the center of everything in the film.

Dom za vesanje

At its core, Time of the Gypsies is a coming-of-age story in line with Kusturica's previous work including Do You Remember Dolly Bell? (1981), his first feature, which tracks a teenage Bosnian Muslim would-be rock star through his first love and sexual experience in 1970s Sarajevo. Similarly When Father Was Away on Business follows an eight-year-old son who is trying both to grow up and hold onto a childhood in a world fragmented by political, religious and ethnic hatreds.

Writing with one of Yugoslavia's most talented screenwriters, Goran Mihic, Kusturica fashioned in Time of the Gypsies a tale of young Pehan who passes through the joy and heartbreak of first love onto his rites of passage as a gypsy gangster protégé of a flamboyant gypsy Godfather played with memorable brio by Yugoslavia's John Wayne-like icon, Bora Todorovic.

Kusturica and Mihic draw strict tensions between the orphaned Pehan's love for his grandmother who is raising him and her centered life in Yugoslavia, and his desire to help his ailing sister by working as a pickpocket and common thief in Northern Italy under Todorovic's exploitive gaze. Completely caught in the middle is Azra, the girl next door, whom he marries at last, but cannot trust.

At turns tragic and comic, realistic and touching on magic realism (Pehan, for instance, has telekinetic powers that come into play for the unusual revenge scene at the end), Time of the Gypsies is also a vibrant hymn to the "time of cinema" on the big screen with big sound and big themes—the homeless, the downtrodden, the importance of love, self worth, loyalty and friendship.

It almost seems not an accident that this film came out the same year as Cinema Paradiso which also celebrates the power of cinema through a male coming-of-age tale. Kusturica's film is the more tragic simply because the Balkans themselves are more troubled than the sun drenched lands of Southern Italy seen in Cinema Paradiso.

But, rather than depressed, the viewer comes away with an admiration of a simple tale told with such elaborate gusto as well as with appreciation for what a filmmaker working at the peak of his powers can do with the craft and art of cinema. For while this film is firmly rooted in the Balkans, it is also a tribute to world cinema. Kusturica has made it abundantly clear that he is strongly influenced by John Ford, Luis Bunuel, Coppola, various Russian and Czech directors (he was educated like many Yugoslav directors of his generation in Prague at the well-known FAMU Academy) and Chaplin.

For all the heartbreak and humor, the final image of this troubled epic is of the Uncle figure, back to the camera, jacket clutched around him, doing a funny little walk, going away from us, looking amazingly like Chaplin going down the road of life as he did in the final shot of almost all of his films. For Chaplin too played the Outsider, the Homeless One, the Unlucky in Love fellow who survives and hopes and travels.

—Andrew Horton

DONA FLOR E SEUS DOIS MARIDOS

(Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands)

Brazil, 1976

Director: Bruno Barreto

Production: Produções cinematográficas L.C. Barreto; Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes. Released in 1976. Filmed in Salvador and Rio de Janeiro.

Producers: Luis Carlos Barreto, Newton Rique, Cia Serrador, Paula Cezar Sesso, Nelson Potro; screenplay: Bruno Barreto; adapters: Eduardo Coutinho, Leopoldo Serran; photography: Maurilo Salles; editor: Raimundo Higino; assistant director: Jorge Duran, Emiliano Ribeiro; art director: Anísio Medeiros; music: Chico Buarque de Holanda; songs: Simone; sound: Walter Gulart, Antonio Cezar.

Cast: Sonia Braga (Dona Flor); José Wilker (Vadinho); Mauro Mendonça (Teodoro); Dinorah Brillanti (Rozilda); Nelson Xavier (Mirandão); Arthur Costa Filho (Carlinhos); Rui Rezende (Cazuza); Mário Gusmão (Arigof); Nelson Dantas (Clodoaldo); Haydíl Linhares (Norma); Nilda Spencer (Dinorá); Silvia Cadaval (Jacy); Helio Ary (Venceslau Diniz); Mara Rúbia (Claudete); Manfredo Colassanti (Pelanchi).

Publications

Books:

Mitchell, Robert, in Magill's Survey of Cinema: Foreign Language Films, Volume 2, edited by Frank Magill, Englewood, New Jersey, 1985.

Aycock, Wendell, and Michael Schoenecke, editors, Film and Literature: A Comparative Approach to Adaptation, Lubbock, Texas, 1988.

Articles:

Ribeiro, Leo Gilson, Jornal da Tarde (São Paulo), 23 November 1976.

Veja, "Dona Flor e o cinema brasileiro," Editora Abril (São Paulo), 1 December 1976.

Vartuck, Pola, O Estado de São Paulo (São Paulo), 2 December 1976.

Ferreira, Fernando, O Globo (Rio de Janeiro), 16 December 1976.

Queiroz, Dinah Silveira, O Imparcial (São Luís), 7 January 1977.

Amado, Jorge, "A minha Dona Flor," Estado de Minas (Belo Horizonte), 29 January 1977.

Stigger, Ivo Egon, Correio do Povo (Porto Alegre), 17 April 1977.

Nascimento, Helio, Jornal do Comércio (Porto Alegre), 20 April 1977.

Branco, Heloísa Castello, Jornal do Brasil (Rio de Janeiro), 10 August 1977.

Variety (New York), 14 September 1977.

Lefèvre, R., Cinéma (Paris), October 1977.

Pilla, M. R., and P. A. Paranagua, "Deux éléphants ça trompe énormément," in Postif (Paris), November 1977.

Haun, Harry, Daily News (New York), 2 February 1978.

Schiller, Beatriz, Jornal do Brasil (Rio de Janeiro), 23 February 1978.

Maslin, Janet, New York Times, 27 February 1978.

Ferreira, Sonia Nolasco, O Globo (Rio de Janeiro), 1 March 1978.

Jornal da Tarde (São Paulo), 20 March 1978.

Francis, Paulo, Folha de São Paulo (São Paulo), 10 June 1978.

Webb, Michael, Jornal do Brasil, 25 July 1978.

Revista Filme e Cultura, number 33, May 1979.

Auty, M., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1979.

Critical Dossiers. Embrafilme, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

Stjerne, H., Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 22, no. 5, 1980.

Santos Moray, Mercedes, Cine Cubano (Habana), no. 119, 1987.

Horton, Andrew, "Bakhtin, Carnival Triumph, and Cinema: Bruno Barreto's Doña Flor and Her Two Husbands and Dusan Makavejev's Innocence Unprotected Reconsidered," Quarterly Review of Film and Video (Reading), May 1990.

Edinger, C., "Doña Flor in Two Cultures," Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), October 1991.

* * *

Irrespective of its other qualities, Dona Flor e seus dois maridos is noteworthy for having attracted an audience larger than any other Brazilian film. Due to the serious crisis curtailing the output of the Brazilian film industry over the last few years, the film's public of 12 million spectators is unlikely to be surpassed before the end of the century. Bruno Barreto was aged 21 when Dona Flor was launched in November 1976, but, despite his youth, was not a newcomer on the film scene. He is the son of Luiz Carlos Barreto, one of the most important Brazilian producers, responsible for several significant films during the Cinema Novo period. Bruno Barreto grew up in the film world; at the age of 11 he started to film in 16 mm, and at the age of 17 concluded his first feature film, Tati, a Garota, establishing not only his precocity, but also a propensity for easy communication with the masses.

What, then, is the secret of the incredible success of Dona Flor, whose impact in Brazil is unparalleled and whose repercussion abroad was such as to provoke a lackluster remake (Kiss Me Goodbye, directed by Robert Mulligan, with Sally Field and James Caan in the leading roles)?

Dona Flor e seus dois maridos

In one sequence, Dona Flor (Sonia Braga) shows pupils at her tiny cookery school how to prepare a typically Bahian dish, spicy and exotic. Bruno Barreto used a variety of related ingredients in teasing the palate of the public: he took to the screen the best-selling novel of Brazil's premier popular author, Jorge Amado; he gave the title role to Sonia Braga, then a star of daily television series, whose greatest success to date had been the lead in Gabriela Clove and Cinnamon, also by Jorge Amado. To these, Barreto added other piquant—for their times—ingredients: the nudity of Sonia Braga and the bed scenes, which took on a forbidden flavour in a country traumatized, both culturally and politically, by the repression of the military regime.

A contemporary evaluation of Dona Flor, abstracted from the impact caused by its launch, reveals the keeping qualities of a delicious comedy of good and bad manners. It is set in the provincial city of Salvador, Bahia, in the early 1940s. The lightheartedness and folklore of Brazilian carnival are shared early on; beautiful girls dance for the camera and the men in drag so typical of street carnival are seen on their scandalous progress. The most outrageous of these revellers is Vadinho (José Wilker), who dies as he lived: partying. His lovely but much-abused young widow, Dona Flor, joins his grieving friends. In a vivid and sensual flash-back, she recalls with the viewer not only his gambling, drinking and womanizing, but also his talents in bed.

Dona Flor, whose dichotomous existence comprised not only the circumspect behaviour of the 1940s but also the liberated sexuality expected by moviegoers of the late 1970s, enters into a period of traditional mourning. When she finally emerges she is courted by the pharmacist Teodoro (Mauro Mendonça), a timid, hardworking and methodical man—the exact antithesis of the late Vadinho. Pressed by her mother and friends, she agrees to remarry, after a platonic courtship. Her second honeymoon is a far cry from her first, with Teodoro dressed in yellow pajamas talking about the stars and promising fidelity until death. They make love in the dark under cover of the sheets, which would have been sacrilege to Dona Flor's first husband. Vadinho, the eternal rake, had not hesitated in abandoning his new wife after some lively lovemaking on their wedding night to go gambling in the casino.

Dona Flor accepts the rules of her new marriage, at least overtly. Her sleep, however, is tortured by the ghost of her late husband, which emerges from The Hereafter to remind her of more exciting times, especially in bed. Vadinho's ghost can be interpreted either as a crystallization of Dona Flor's fantasy or as the return of a spirit which refuses to die, as in the Bahian religion, candomblé. The ghost is as irreverent as Vadinho was in life, and before long is making up a threesome with Dona Flor and Teodoro in the marriage bed. This unorthodox three-way relationship is the high point of the film. The scene in which Vadinho's ghost sits shaking with laughter on top of the wardrobe observing Dona Flor and Teodoro making love is priceless. Before long, Dona Flor and Vadinho are reunited in bed in a stormy outpouring of sexuality. Thus Dona Flor solves all her problems by acquiescing in the "presence" of Vadinho and welcomes him into her married life; in the fantasy world of Dona Flor all are free and all are equal—the living and the dead.

Freed of the pressure for narrative innovation which marked the previous decade and especially the Cinema Novo period, Dona Flor has won its place through its technical qualities and its outstanding popular appeal. Its success is also due to its easy consumption by the international market, captivated by the exuberance of the Bahian atmosphere, the postcard scenery and the intensity of its regional characters. The sound track is greatly enhanced by Chico Buarque de Holanda's "O Que será," a ballad laden with lyricism and sensuality.

Dona Flor turned Sonia Braga into a box-office phenomenon who was seen, for a time, as the epitome of Brazilian female sexuality. Bruno Barreto attempted, in 1983, to repeat the successful recipe with Gabriela, an international co-production, starring Sonia Braga in the role she had made famous on television and Marcello Mastroianni. Despite having some of the same ingredients, the production came nowhere near the spice of the delicious Dona Flor. Gabriela is to Dona Flor approximately what the dull Teodoro is to vital Vadinho.

—Susana Schild

DOOMED

See IKIRU

DOOMED LOVE

See AMOR DE PERDICA

DOUBLE INDEMNITY

USA, 1944

Director: Billy Wilder

Production: Paramount Pictures; 1944; black and white, 355mm; running time: 107 minutes. Released 7 September 1944. Filmed 27

September–24 November 1943 in Paramount studios, and on location in Jerry's Market in Los Angeles.

Producer: Joseph Sistrom; screenplay: Billy Wilder and Raymond Chandler, from the novel 3 of a Kind by James M. Cain; photography: John F. Sitz; editor: Doane Harrison; sound: Stanley Cooley; art director: Hal Pereira; supervisor: Hans Dreier; set decoration: Bertram Granger; music: Miklos Rozsa; costume designer: Edith Head.

Cast: Fred MacMurray (Walter Neff); Barbara Stanwyck (Phyllis Dietrichson); Edward G. Robinson (Barton Keyes); Porter Hall (Mr. Jackson); Jean Heather (Lola Dietrichson); Tom Powers (Mr. Dietrichson); Byron Barr (Nino Zachette); Richard Gaines (Mr. Norton); Fortunio Bonanova (Sam Gorlopi); John Phillipber (Joe Pete); Clarence Muse (Black man).

Publications

Script:

Chandler, Raymond, and Billy Wilder, Double Indemnity, in Best Film Plays 1945, edited by John Gassner and Dudley Nichols, New York, 1946.

Books:

Del Buono, Oreste, Billy Wilder, Parma, 1958.

Madsen, Axel, Billy Wilder, Bloomington, Indiana, 1969.

Wood, Tom, The Bright Side of Billy Wilder, Primarily, New York, 1970.

Smith, Ella, Starring Miss Barbara Stanwyck, New York, 1973.

Vermilye, Jerry, Barbara Stanwyck, New York, 1975.

Zolotow, Maurice, Billy Wilder in Hollywood, New York, 1977.

Seidman, Steve, The Film Career of Billy Wilder, Boston, 1977.

Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Ward, editors, Film Noir, Woodstock, New York, 1979.

Sinyard, Neil, and Adrian Turner, Journey Down Sunset Boulevard: The Films of Billy Wilder, Ryde, Isle of Wight, 1979.

Kaplan, E. Ann, editor, Women in Film Noir, London, 1980.

Dick, Bernard F., Billy Wilder, Boston, 1980.

Ciment, Michel, Les Conquistadors d'un nouveau monde: Essais sur le cinéma américain, Paris, 1981.

Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Jacob, Jerome, Billy Wilder, Paris, 1988.

Seidl, Claudius, Billy Wilder: Seine Filme, sein Leben, Munich, 1988.

Schickel, Richard, Double Indemnity, London, 1992.

Phillips, Gene D., Exiles in Hollywood: Major European Film Directors in America, Bethlehem, 1998.

Sikov, Ed., On Sunset Boulevard: The Life and Times of Billy Wilder, New York, 1998.

Wilder, Billy, Conversations with Wilder, with Cameron Crowe, New York, 1999.

Double Indemnity

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 26 April 1944.
New York Times, 7 September 1944.
 Pryor, Thomas, "End of a Journey," in New York Times, 23 September 1945.
 Luft, Herbert, and Charles Brackett, "Two Views of a Director: Billy Wilder," in Quarterly of Radio, Television, and Film (Berkeley), Fall 1952.
 McVay, Douglas, "The Eye of a Cynic," in Films and Filming (London), January 1960.
 Domarchi, Jean, and Jean Douchet, "Entretien avec Billy Wilder," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August 1962.
 Higham, Charles, "Cast a Cold Eye: The Films of Billy Wilder," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1963.
 Ringgold, Gene, "Barbara Stanwyck," in Films in Review (New York), December 1963.
 Ciment, Michel, "Sept réflexions sur Billy Wilder," in Positif (Paris), May 1971.
 Farber, Stephen, "The Films of Billy Wilder," in Film Comment (New York), Winter 1971.
Ecran (Paris), July 1972.
 Bourget, Jean-Loup, "Le Dernier Carré," in Positif (Paris), April 1973.
 Jensen, Paul, "Raymond Chandler and the World You Live In," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1974.
 Corliss, Richard, "The Author-Auteurs," in Talking Pictures: Screenwriters in the American Cinema, New York, 1975.
 Borde, Raymond, and E. Chaumeton, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 October 1979.
 Leese, Elizabeth, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Berns, T., "Film noir: Fiktie in de fiktie," in Skrien (Amsterdam), November-December 1984.
 Alsted, C., "Kvinder uden samvittighed—en arketypisk film noir," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), July 1985.
 Buchsbaum, J., "Tame Wolves and Phony Claims: Paranoia and Film Noir," in Persistence of Vision (Maspeth, New York), Summer 1986.
 Gallagher, B., "Sexual Warfare and Homoeroticism in Billy Wilder's Double Indemnity," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 15, no. 4, 1987.
 Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 4 June 1987.

- Rozgonyi, J., "The Making of Double Indemnity," in Films in Review (New York), June-July 1990.
- Pichler, O. H., "Some Like It Black," in Blimp (Graz, Austria), Fall 1991.
- Marling, W., "On the Relation Between American Roman Noir and Film Noir," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1993.
- Biesen, S.C., "Censorship, Film Noir, and Double Indemnity," in Film & History, no. 25, 1995.
- Ross, Tony, "Updated Noir," in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), Spring 1995.
- Naremore, James, "Making and Remaking Double Indemnity," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1996.
- Arthur, P., "Los Angeles as Scene of the Crime," in Film Comment (New York), July/August 1996.
- Armstrong, R., "Double Indemnity: An American Tragedy," in Audience (Simi Valley), February/March 1997.

* * *

Although James M. Cain's memorable novel of crime and passion, The Postman Always Rings Twice, predated his equally potent, similarly themed Double Indemnity by almost a decade, it is Indemnity that has proven the more influential, due largely to the uncompromising and suspenseful film writer-director Billy Wilder made from it. Wilder's film remains the model for just about every film noir of this type (Born to Kill, The Prowler, The Pushover, Body Heat, et al.) to come our way since.

Cain's novel was translated to the screen with the full force of the author's ugly tale of lust, greed, and murder intact. In fact, the film version is in many ways tougher than its source. Wilder's intention to make it so prompted his longtime partner, writer-producer Charles Brackett, to back away from the project even though he and Wilder were one of Hollywood's most successful teams. Brackett found Cain's book distasteful and felt the film would be little more than a "dirty movie." He told Wilder to get another collaborator. Wilder tried to get Cain himself, but the author was busy on another project, and Wilder opted for Raymond Chandler instead.

Chandler detested working with Wilder and disliked the final film. Cain on the other hand totally approved of what Wilder had done to his book, even considered it an improvement. The two works are certainly different. In addition to changing the names of Cain's main characters (in the book they are Walter Huff and Phyllis Nirdlinger), Wilder changed the ending and altered other aspects of the story as well. Whereas Cain unfolded his tale in a linear manner, Wilder revealed the fate of his protagonist in the opening scene. Insurance investigator MacMurray arrives at his office mortally wounded and confesses into the dictaphone of his colleague, Robinson, the murder plot and insurance scam gone awry that led to MacMurray's downfall. Wilder cuts back to the dying MacMurray several times, but for the most part the film unfolds as a series of flashbacks showing how MacMurray got embroiled with femme fatale Stanwyck in a scheme to murder her oilman husband, make it look like an accident, collect a bundle on the husband's double indemnity claim, and run away together. But when their scheme began to unravel, their relationship fell apart, and they wound up shooting each other. (In the book, the lovers get away with the crime because the Robinson character who is hot on their trail has no proof, but are doomed anyway due to their growing mistrust of one another.)

Cain loosely based his novel on the real-life Roaring Twenties case of Ruth Snyder and Judd Gray who conspired to murder Snyder's husband for $100,000 in insurance money. Snyder and Gray were caught and went to the chair. An enterprising newspaper reporter smuggled a camera into the execution chamber and snapped a shot of Snyder moments before the juice was turned on. The ghoulish shot caused a furor when it was published in the paper. Wilder wanted to end his film with a similar scene showing MacMurray's execution in California's gas chamber. The scene was shot, but Wilder decided against using it; he felt it to be too strong and anticlimactic as well. He replaced it with the trenchantly written and beautifully performed final confrontation scene between the self-destructive MacMurray and the fatherly Robinson that movingly concludes this exceptionally fine and biting film noir. As MacMurray slumps to the floor, he tells Robinson how he'd been able to elude the dogged investigator. "Because the guy you were looking for was too close, Keyes. Right across the desk from you." "Closer than that," Robinson responds emotionally as the film fades to black.

—John McCarty

DOUGLAS TRILOGY

Director: Bill Douglas

MY CHILDHOOD

UK, 1972

Production: British Film Institute Production Board; black and white, 16mm and 35mm; running time: 48 minutes.

Producer: Geoffrey Evans; screenplay: Bill Douglas; photography: Mick Campbell; additional photography: Gale Tattersall, Bahram Manocheri; editor: Brand Thumin; assistant director: Nick Moes; sound editor: Tony Lewis; sound recording: Bob Withey; sound mixer: Mike Billings.

Cast: Stephen Archibald (Jamie); Hughie Restorick (Tommy); Jean Taylor Smith (Grandmother); Karl Fiesler (Helmut); Bernard Mckenna (Tommy's father); Paul Kermack (Jamie's father); Helena Gloag (Tommy's mother); Ann Smith (Nurse); Helen Crummy (Schoolteacher).

Awards: Silver Lion and Critic's prize, Venice 1972.

MY AIN FOLK

UK, 1973

Production: British Film Institute Production Board; black and white, 16mm; running time: 55 minutes.

Douglas Trilogy: My Childhood

Producer: Nick Nascht; screenplay: Bill Douglas; photography: Gale Tattersall; editor: Peter West, Brand Thumin; sound editor: Michael Ellis, Peter West; sound recording: Peter Harvey.

Cast: Stephen Archibald (Jamie); Hughie Restorick (Tommy); Jean Taylor Smith (Grandmother); Bernard Mckenna (Tommy's father); Munro (Jamie's grandfather); Paul Kermack (Jamie's father); Helena Gloag (Father's mother).

MY WAY HOME

UK, 1978

Production: British Film Institute Production Board; black and white, 35mm; running time: 72 minutes.

Production supervisor: Judy Cottam; screenplay: Bill Douglas; photography: Ray Orton; editor: Mick Audsley; art director: Olivier Boucher, Elsie Restorick; assistant director: Martin Turner; sound editor: Peter Harvey; sound recording: Digby Rumsey.

Cast: Stephen Archibald (Jamie); Paul Kermack (Jamie's father); Jessie Combe (father's wife); William Carrol (Archie).

Awards: Firesci Prize, Berlin 1979. Trilogy: Interfilm Jury Special Prize, Berlin 1979.

Publications

Script:

Dick, Eddie, and others, Bill Douglas—A Lanternist's Account, London 1993.

Books:

Dick, Eddie, From Limelight to Satellite: A Scottish Film Book, London, 1990.

Dick, Eddie, and Andrew Noble, and Duncan Petrie, editors, Bill Douglas: A Lanternist's Account, London, 1993.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 13 September 1972.
 Wilson, D., Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1973.
 Torok, J.-P., "Village of the Damned" in Positif (Paris), December 1975.
 Wilson, D., "Images of Britain" in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1974.
Variety (New York), 20 November 1974.
 Sussex, E., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1974.
 Hardwick, C., Jeune Cinema (Paris), September/October 1973.
 Cannière, P., "Portrait d'enfance" in Cinéma (Paris), Summer 1978.
 Pym, J., Sight and Sound (London), November 1978.
 Pulleine, T., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1978.
Variety (New York), 15 November 1978.
 Elley, Derek, "My Way Home," Films & Filming, December 1979.
 Malmberg, C.-J., "Hem till natten," Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 24, no. 2, 1982.
 Hassan, Mamoun, and J. Caughie, "His ain man: The Way Home," Sight & Sound (London), November 1991.
 Hodgson, P. and, B. Douglas, "My Childhood," Trafic (Paris), no. 23, Fall 1997.
 Bénoliel, Bernard, "Ma vie de chien," Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1997.

* * *

The three intimate autobiographical films written and directed by Bill Douglas under the auspices of the BFI production board in the 1970s collectively represent one of the most original and visceral contributions to British cinema during a decade remembered more for its mediocrity than its inspiration. Yet the Trilogy remains as a testament to the power of the image to fundamentally move the viewer, even when rendered with a quiet and deceptive simplicity. The films chart the harrowing and poverty-stricken childhood and adolescence of a boy in a Scottish mining village in the aftermath of World War II. Jamie's path towards adulthood and the acquisition of understanding of self and others is relentless in its brutality. Yet this is ultimately a tale of redemption, of the triumph of the human spirit over material suffering, which avoids the usual sentimental and melodramatic impulses of such narratives.

The force of the Trilogy is rooted in Douglas's idiosyncratic approach to the medium. Eschewing the visual pyrotechnics which became popular in the 1960s and 1970s, Douglas pares his aesthetic to the very bone. The black-and-white images are marked by a profound stillness in both space and time. Not only is there minimal camera movement in the three films but individual shots are frequently left to dwell, slowly absorbing the subject matter. The only exception is the 360-degree pan around the room at the very end of My Way Home, a shot which signifies a subjective return to the house where Jamie spent much of his childhood. The soundtrack is also largely subordinated to the image. The dialogue is minimal and non-diegetic music entirely absent from the Trilogy, evoking an affinity with silent cinema.

This desire for stillness is related to Douglas's humanistic belief in the power of the camera to reveal certain ontological truths. This also explains his casting of non-actors in many of the key roles, including those of the two young boys in the film, Jamie and his cousin Tommy—the idea being that real rather than imagined experience would be rendered on screen through the faces of the performers. The pained expression of Stephen Archibald, aged beyond his years, which haunts the Trilogy bears witness to the success of this strategy. But Douglas is also well served by the professionals in his cast, particularly Jean Taylor Smith as the wraith-like maternal grandmother, fighting both the rigours of poverty and extreme emotional distress in the struggle to raise her two grandsons.

Yet while the images of Bill Douglas invoke poets like Dreyer or Bresson, these images are contained within highly formalized montage structures derived from Soviet stylistics such as Donskoi and Dozvenko. The Trilogy is constructed out of filmic blocks which progress in a relationship of dialectical tension described by John Caughie in terms of "aesthetic distance and intense intimacy," serving to both objectively analyze the material poverty of Jamie's childhood while providing insights into his own limited understanding. The films also resound with narrative ellipses and echoes, providing an almost organic coherence to the meticulously crafted structures.

My Childhood centres around the triangular relationship between Jamie, Tommy, and their grandmother. The narrative is one of a groping on the part of the child towards a self knowledge. The confusion over his parentage—his mother is confined to an asylum, his father as yet unknown to him—leads him to seek companionship in Helmut, a German POW, who works in the local fields. Helmut cannot speak English, yet communication between the two is achieved through emotional warmth rather than language. There are also powerful juxtapositions of almost casual brutality with fleeting moments of tenderness which tragically capture the tenacity of humanity in the most inhumane of circumstances.

My Childhood concludes with Granny's death. My Ain Folk leads Jamie to the house of his paternal grandmother, an embittered old woman whose intense jealousy fires her hatred towards Jamie's mother and by extension to the young boy himself. He spends much of the film cowering in corners or hiding under the table. Yet he can never escape her malevolence. There are enough glimmers of pathos to cast her as yet another victim, a product of a brutal uncaring existence. My Ain Folk also extends the narrative to take in the wider community. The film begins with the image of a Technicolor sequence from a "Lassie" film. We see Tommy's engrossed face watching the movie in wonderment. The next cut is to a view of the mine workings, an image framed as if by a cinema screen. The camera then descends into the earth as we realize that this is the point of view of the miners starting their shift. In a later sequence which begins with Jamie fleeing his grandmother, the individual suffering of the child opens out into the context of the classroom where he sits in a puddle of his own urine. This then cuts to a shot of the miners going to work signifying an inevitable progression, a grim future for the children already mapped out. By the end of My Ain Folk Jamie is taken into care, echoing Tommy at the beginning.

My Way Home shifts the attention away from childhood onto the problems of adolescence. Jamie, at last, has found some comfort in the children's home yet the world of work beckons. He returns to the village but quickly realizes it has nothing to offer but a life down the mine. He lodges with a foster mother in Edinburgh and starts a job but rejects both and ends up in a doss-house. After a final desperate return to his village the film cuts to the bright sunlight of the Egyptian desert. James has been called up and is serving in the canal zone. This journey away from home is to inadvertently provide the means whereby Jamie finds himself (the way home proving to be a rather different kind of journey) through his friendship with Robert, a young Englishman passionately interested in the arts who opens up un-dreamt-of horizons. The seeds of hope and redemption have been sown enabling Jamie finally to grow and realize his own humanity.

—Duncan Petrie

DRACULA

USA, 1931

Director: Tod Browning

Production: Universal Pictures; black and white, 35mm; running time: 84 minutes, some sources list 76 minutes; length: 6978 feet. Released Valentine's Day, 1931. Re-released 1938. Filmed in Universal studios.

Producer: Carl Laemmle Jr.; screenplay: Garrett Fort, dialogue by Dudley Murphy, from Hamilton Deane's and John L. Balderston's stage adaptation of the novel by Bram Stoker; photography: Karl Freund; editor: Milton Carruth; editing supervisor: Maurice Pivar; sound: C. Roy Hunter; production designer: Charles Hall; music director: David Broekman; makeup: Jack P. Pierce.

Cast: Bela Lugosi (Count Dracula); Helen Chandler (Mina); David Manners (Jonathan Harker); Dwight Frye (Renfield); Edward Van Sloan (Professor Van Helsing); Herbert Bunston (Dr. Seward); Frances Dade (Lucy Weston); Joan Standing (Briggs); Charles Gerrard (Martin); Moon Carroll (Maid); Josephine Velez (Nurse); Donald Murphy (Man in coach); Michael Visaroff (Innkeeper).

Publications

Script:

Fort, Garrett, and others, Dracula: The Original 1931 Shooting Script, Absecon, New Jersey, 1990.

Books:

Butler, Ivan, The Horror Film, New York, 1967.

McBride, Joseph, editor, Persistence of Vision: A Collection of Film Criticism, Madison, Wisconsin, 1968.

Huss, Roy, and T. J. Ross, Focus on the Horror Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.

Edelson, Edward, Great Monsters of the Movies, New York, 1973.

Everson, William K., Classics of the Horror Film, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.

Frank, Alan G., Horror Movies, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.

Lamberti, Mark, Transylvanian Catalogue, Mount Vernon, New York, 1974.

Lenning, Arthur, The Count—The Life and Films of Bela "Dracula" Lugosi, New York, 1974.

Annan, David, Beyond the Dream Machine, New York, 1975.

Pattison, Barrie, The Seal of Dracula, New York, 1975.

Gifford, Denis, Monsters of the Movies, London, 1977.

Halliwell, Leslie, The Dead That Walk: Dracula, Frankenstein, the Mummy, and Other Favorite Movie Monsters, New York, 1988.

Marrero, Robert, Dracula: The Vampire Legend on Film, Key West, Florida, 1992.

Prüssmann, Karsten, Die Dracula-Filme von Friedrich Wilhelm Murnau bis Francis Ford Coppola, Munich, 1993.

Skal, David J., Dark Carnival: The Secret World of Tod Browning, Hollywood's Master of the Macabre, New York, 1995.

Articles:

New York Times, 13 February 1931.

Variety (New York), 18 February 1931.

Addams, Charles, "Movie Monster Rally," in New York Times Magazine, 9 August 1953.

Geltzer, George, "Tod Browning," in Films in Review (New York), October 1953.

Everson, William K., "A Family Tree of Monsters," in Film Culture (New York), no. 1, 1955.

Gur, Roy, "The Browning Version," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), June-July 1963.

Halliwell, Leslie, "The Baron, the Count, and Their Ghoul Friends," in Films and Filming (London), June 1969.

Evans, W., "Monster Movies: A Sexual Theory," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Fall 1973.

Rosenthal, Stuart, "Tod Browning," in The Hollywood Professionals 4, London, 1975.

Garsault, A., "Tod Browning: A la recherche de la réalité," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1978.

Huxner, V. I., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Turner, George, "The Two Faces of Dracula," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), May 1988.

McBride, W. T., "Dracula and Mephistopheles: Shyster Vampires," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1990.

Thomson, David, "Really a Part of Me," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1995.

Haas, R., "The Monster Boomer: An Interview with David J. Skal," in Post Script (Commerce), no. 3, 1996.

Holt, Wesley G., "Dracula," in Filmfax (Evanston), August-September 1996.

Ford, J.E., "Dracula," in Films of the Golden Age (Muscatine), Fall 1997.

"Dracula Revived (Restoration that Features a New Score Composed by Philip Glass)," in Stereo Review's Sound & Vision, vol. 64, no. 8, October 1999.

* * *

Like other horror films of the period (e.g., Frankenstein, 1931, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, 1932, Island of Lost Souls, 1933), Dracula is about sex—perverse and passionate—and, like those other pictures, it has a short running time for an "A" film because it suffers from self- and outside censorship; material was excised from the screenplay or the finished film because of its “questionable” aspects. This and other deficiencies dilute the movie’s effectiveness for contemporary audiences.

Dracula (1931)

For example, the heroine, Mina, tells Professor Van Helsing that she’s seen her dead friend Lucy walking about “alive.” The Professor promises that he will put Lucy to rest forever. In the novel, this leads to a harrowing scene wherein Van Helsing and Lucy’s fiancé stake and behead the recently undead woman. Arthur Lennig says that Lucy “actually was dispatched by Van Helsing, but this episode, along with the others, was not in the release prints.”

Later, after Mina’s tearful confession, almost thrown away on the soundtrack, that Dracula opened a vein in his arm (a phallic metaphor) and made her drink, the count again visits her in her bedroom. (There’s a discreet fade-out as he bends over to bite her neck; actual penetration is never shown in Dracula.) Then everybody converges upon Carfax Abbey for the finale. How they get there (and why they go there) is not shown.

After a half-dozen remakes of Dracula (none of which completely captures the excitement of the book or gets the plot right), and hundreds of other vampire films, where the sexual nature of vampirism is more explicit, it’s difficult for contemporary viewers to understand the filmmakers’ reticence or to feel the impact the movie had when it first opened. Universal advertised the film (released, appropriately perversely, on Valentine’s Day, 1931) as “the strangest love story ever told” (partly because there was no established horror genre to exploit), and it certainly was that.

The attraction of the foreign lover is present in the vampire Count’s power over women, but the sexual liberation (wantonness) vampirism inspires in his female victims is absent. His three “brides” are not the quick, alluring, dangerous creatures of the novel but staid, staring zombies. So is Lucy, in the one shot we see of her as a vampire. Only Mina is allowed a brief glimmer of desire when she eyes her fiancé’s neck, but her—off-screen—coitus is interrupted by ever-vigilant Van Helsing.

The lack of a score hampers the film. It has to work harder to create mood, and often images alone aren’t enough to accomplish this. The filmmakers, still laboring under the delusion that all onscreen music must spring from a “realistic” physical source, dispensed with it altogether, except over the opening and closing credits and during the famous scene in the theatre, where the lights go down as the music comes up, and Dracula makes his tragi-romantic assertion, “To die, to be really dead—that must be glorious.”

Frankenstein suffers from the same deficiencies as Dracula (censorship, scorelessness) but it remains a more thrilling, fluid film. That's because Frankenstein was directed by the eccentric James Whale, whereas Dracula was directed by Tod Browning, a pedestrian director with a taste for the grotesque (no doubt because of his circus background) but no feeling for the supernatural. Except for Dracula, his films are all solidly, stolidly grounded in reality.

Given Browning's limitations and his particular cinematic bent, he really couldn't bring much to a subject like Dracula. The beginning at the Count's castle and the ending on the seemingly endless stairs of Carfax Abbey are impressive because Browning and the cinematographer Karl Freund had good sets to shoot, but neither knew what to do with the long, stagey middle section of Dracula, taken from the Balderston-Dean play. (Significantly, the effective Transylvanian opening and the theatre scene were written by the uncredited scenarist Louis Bromfield). So all that the viewer is left with is a lot of static shots, almost a series of still photos instead of a moving picture, animated only by some mellow performances and ripe language. For, despite its lack of background music, Dracula is very much a sound movie, full of memorable dialogue memorably delivered, especially by Bela Lugosi with his mellifluous accent, Edward Van Sloan with his pompous pronouncements, and Dwight Frye with his maniacal cackling. In contemporary jargon, it's a film about competing discourses, and on that rests its continuing appeal.

—Anthony Ambrogio

DRACULA

(Horror of Dracula)

UK, 1958

Director: Terence Fisher

Production: Hammer; Eastmancolor; running time: 82 minutes. Released May 1958.

Producer: Anthony Hinds; screenplay: Jimmy Sangster, from the novel by Bram Stoker; photography: Jack Asher; camera operator: Len Harris; editors: James Needs, Bill Lenny; sound: Jock May; art director: Bernard Robinson; music: James Bernard.

Cast: Peter Cushing (Dr. Van Helsing); Christopher Lee (Count Dracula); Michael Gough (Arthur); Melissa Stribling (Mina); Carol Marsh (Lucy); Olga Dickie (Gerda); John Van Eyssen (Jonathan); Valerie Gaunt (Vampire Woman).

Publications

Script:

Sangster, Jimmy, Dracula, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July–September 1975.

Books:

Pirie, David, Heritage of Horror: The English Gothic Cinema 1946–1972, London, 1973.

Eyles, Allen, Robert Adkinson, and Nicholas Fry, The House of Horror: The Story of Hammer Films, London, 1973; revised edition, 1981.

Glut, Donald F., The Dracula Book, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Rohle, Jr., Robert W., and Douglas C. Hart, The Films of Christopher Lee, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1983.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 7 May 1958.

Motion Picture Herald (New York), 10 May 1958.

Today's Cinema (London), 19 May 1958.

Kine Weekly (London), 22 May 1958.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1958.

Huss, Roy, "Vampire's Progress: Dracula from Novel to Film via Broadway," in Focus on the Horror Film, edited by Huss and T. J. Ross, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.

Photon, no. 27, 1976.

Schneider, M., "Hammer Horrors: The Dracula Films of Christopher Lee," in Monsterscene (Lombard), no. 3, Fall 1994.

Ray, F.O., "The Hammer Factory," in Midnight Marquee (Baltimore), no. 47, Summer 1994.

Brunas, M., in Midnight Marquee (Baltimore), no. 49, Summer 1995.

Fischer, D., "Colossus/Silent Running," in Cinefantastique (Forest Park), no. 8, 1997.

Thornton, S., "Barbara Shelley," in Midnight Marquee (Baltimore), no. 54, Summer 1997.

* * *

Many consider Terence Fisher's Dracula to be the director's finest film. It is certainly Fisher's most visible work, but it is unfortunate that its fame obscures the many other excellent films which he created in his lifetime. It does seem that in reviving the Gothic tradition in Britain, Fisher found a comfortable niche for himself with both the public and Hammer. Dracula (1958) is just one of a series of excellent Gothic romances Fisher made during Hammer's "Golden Age" (roughly 1957–65). As late as 1967, Fisher showed that he was capable of first-rate work with The Devil Rides Out. There is no question that he was the finest director working for Hammer during this period, but there is also no question that his current high critical reputation has been long in coming. The reason for this is simple: horror films have always been considered on the fringe of respectable cinematic discourse, because they push the limits of graphic representation.

When Dracula first appeared, the reviews in the popular press were almost uniformly negative, despite the great popular acclaim the film received. Hammer, for their part, did little to discourage any sort of publicity, and took the bad reviews in stride. As long as the film made money, Hammer was satisfied. Fisher's earlier films for Rank were simply ignored, and he was considered by most to be simply a commercial director with no personal investment in the films he created. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Dracula is more than a stylish, rapidly paced redaction of Bram Stoker's novel; it is a film which explores and explodes the surface of Victorian society, using Dracula as a metaphor for the release of sexual urges which had long been repressed or sublimated. Dracula is also seen by Fisher as a parable of righteousness against the attraction of evil; although Dracula enslaves his victims, Fisher shows that there is considerable allure in the life of the undead. Those who fall under Dracula's spell are addicted to vampirism, as one is addicted to drugs; the power of free will alone cannot save the newly recruited vampires. If Dracula is "evil incarnate," as Fisher insisted he was on several occasions, the scholar/scientist represented by Cushing's Van Helsing is at once a redemptive figure who combines in equal parts faith and knowledge, with respect for the separate powers inherent in each. Lee's Dracula is a radical departure from the role as interpreted by Bela Lugosi; for the first time, Dracula is seen as a figure of sexual magnetism, rather than a rapacious animal slaving for blood alone. Fisher's Dracula is an aristocrat first, who hides his rupture with society beneath precisely clipped speech and elegant manners. It is only the night which liberates Dracula's other personality, based entirely on need, addiction, and the use and abandonment of others as mere vessels of momentary satisfaction.

What makes Dracula all the more remarkable is the precise assurance with which Fisher handles his camera. The opening of the film, detailing Jonathan Harker's abortive trip to rid the world of Dracula, is framed within the confines of a diary narrative. Yet the device of the diary notebook is never allowed to slow down the film; rather, Harker comes face to face with castle Dracula in the first seven shots of the film, placing him in immediate jeopardy. Fisher stages Harker's entry into the castle in smooth, contemplative tracking shots, mirroring the ease with which Dracula moves about his domain. When Dracula himself does appear, in a shot which has become justly famous, he is framed in silhouette at the top of a long staircase, which he noiselessly descends. Demonstrating his characteristic economy, Fisher holds on the shot until Dracula walks directly to the camera and addresses it in the first person (the shot is from Harker's point-of-view), dominating the frame. One must remember that, after early work as a clapper boy, magazine loader, and third assistant director, Fisher spent most of his time in the cutting room, working on many of the most important British films of the early 1940s. This precision in editorial construction thus comes from a thorough understanding of the uses and abuses of camera coverage, and it comes as no surprise to learn that Fisher shot very little more than he needed, although he never story-boarded a film in the Hitchcock manner. Jack Asher's cinematography creates a world of blues, reds, and greens, which punctuate rather than dominate Fisher's compositions.

In addition, Asher's lighting locates the actors within the confines of the set as figures fixed in stygian gloom, illuminated by shafts of light from above or from the side, but never bathed in light. This makes the final sequence in the library all the more effective, as Van Helsing runs down the refectory table, rips the curtains from the window, grabs two candlesticks to form a hastily improvised cross, and, with a combination of light and faith, sends Dracula to his doom. We realize during this climactic scene that we have been living in a world of night, or twilight, a world entirely under the control of Dracula, for most of the film. It is the light we all share, and the light of faith: these forces alone will account for our salvation. Asher's gloomy, moody lighting during the main body of the film reinforces this, and works in perfect harmony with the over-dressed, claustrophobic sets of Bernard Robinson.

The role of Dracula made Christopher Lee a star, and Peter Cushing made an indelible mark as Van Helsing, but both continued to work outside the horror genre. Fisher, however, was typecast as a horror director, and a Hammer director, and made few attempts to break away from this public perception of his work. In part this was because Fisher enjoyed making Gothics; he believed in the films he made, and spent a great deal of time and care with them, within the confines of the time and budgetary constraints imposed by Hammer.

Nevertheless, Fisher's work there, using the services of Hammer's excellent technical staff and superlative stable of character and lead actors, revitalized, transformed, and re-created the horror film for an entire new generation of viewers, who enthusiastically enjoyed Fisher's work while their elders denigrated it in favor of the Universal expressionist Gothics of the 1930s and 1940s. It is now clear that Fisher was simply ahead of his time, and the degree of graphic violence which pervades his horror films was simply a response to the needs of the viewing audience for greater generic realism. Fisher's work stands as one of the signal achievements of the British cinema, and paved the way for the next cycle of horror films, which would start with George Romero's Night of the Living Dead, a film shot through with a pessimistic spirit Fisher would never have allowed to inhabit his films. Though the battle may be vigorous and hazardous in Fisher's films, good, being infinite, will inevitably triumph over the finite evil of Dracula and his minions. Some see this as a structural weakness in Fisher's vision; if so, it is a weakness shared by Britain's two greatest Gothic writers, Mary Shelley and Bram Stoker.

—Wheeler Winston Dixon

O DRAGAO DA MALDADE CONTRA O SANTO QUERREIRO

See ANTONIO DAS MORTES

THE DRAUGHTSMAN'S CONTRACT

UK, 1982

Director: Peter Greenaway

Production: British Film Institute Production Board, in association with Channel 4; colour; 16mm; running time: 108 minutes. Released 1982.

Executive producer: Peter Sainsbury; producer: David Payne; screenplay: Peter Greenaway; assistant director: Andy Powell; photography: Curtis Clark; rostrum camera: Hugh Gordon; assistant photographer: Luke Cardiff; editor: John Wilson; assistant editor: John Taylor; sound editor: Doctor Lion; sound recordists: Godfrey Kirby, Martin Rex; sound re-recordist: Tony Anscombe; art director: Bob Ringwood; assistant designers: Jane Hamilton, Digby Howard; costumes: Sue Blane; music: Michael Nyman; music producer: David Cunningham.

Cast: Anthony Higgins (Mr. Neville); Janet Suzman (Mrs. Herbert); Anne Louise Lambert (Sarah Talmann); Neil Cunningham (Thomas Noyes); Hugh Fraser (Louis Talmann); Dave Hill (Mr. Herbert); David Gant (Mr. Seymour); David Meyer and Tony Meyer (The Poulencs); Nicolas Amer (Mr. Parkes); Suzan Crowley (Mrs. Pierpoint); Lynda Marchal (Mrs. Clement); Michael Feast (The Statue); Alistair Cummings (Philip); Steve Ubels (Mr. van Hoyten); Ben Kirby (Augusta); Sylvia Rotter (Governess); Kate Doherty (Maid); Joss Buckley (Mr. Porringer); Mike Carter (Mr. Clarke); Vivienne Chandler (Laundress); Geoffrey Larder (Mr. Hammond); Harry van Engel and George Miller (Servants).

The Draughtsman's Contract

Publications

Script:

Greenaway, Peter, "Meurtre dans un jardin anglais," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), no. 333, 1984.

Articles:

Brown, Robert, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1981–82.

Variety (New York), 8 September 1982.

Forbes, Jill, "Marienbad Revisited," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1982.

Brown, Robert, "From a View to Death," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1982.

McVay, D., in Films and Filming (London), November 1982.

Malmberg, C.-J., and D. Joyeux, in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 25, no. 5., 1983.

Stills (London), May-June 1983.

Newman, B., and B. Evans, "Super 16 for The Draughtsman's Contract: An Interview with Curtis Clark," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), September 1983.

Zocaro, E., "Conversando con Peter Greenaway," in Filmcritica (Florence), October 1983.

Vecchi, P., in Cineforum (Bergamo), December 1983.

Malcomson, S., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1983–84.

Jaehne, K., "The Draughtsman's Contract: An Interview with Peter Greenaway," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 13, no. 2, 1984.

Ciment, Michel, and others, in Positif (Paris), February 1984.

Blanchet, C., and others, in Cinéma (Paris), March 1984.

Tessier, Max, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), March 1984.

Villien, Bruno, and others, in Cinématographe (Paris), March 1984.

Welsh, H., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), April 1984.

"Special Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), October 1984.

Frauen und Film (Berlin), August 1986.
 Goerling, R., "Barocke Peruecken and postmoderne spielreigen," in Filmwaerts (Hannover), Winter 1992.
 In Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), December-January 1992–93.
 Andrew, Geoff, "Contract Chiller," in Time Out (London), 18 May 1994.
 Gras, V., "Dramatizing the Failure to Jump the Culture/Nature Gap: The Films of Peter Greenaway," in New Literary History, no. 1, 1995.
Castoro Cinema (Milan), May/June 1995.
Dicine, January/February 1996.
 Aldersey-Williams, Hugh, "Framing the Future (Filmmaker Peter Greenaway)," in New Statesman, vol. 128, no. 4466, 13 December 1999.

* * *

The Draughtsman's Contract marks something of a caesura in the Greenaway oeuvre. For one thing it cost a great deal more than any of his previous films. His earlier British Film Institute projects, A Walk Through H and The Falls, came in at £7500 and £35,000 respectively. The production of The Draughtsman's Contract coincided with the BFI's decision to finance fewer but larger projects, and was budgeted at £120,000. However, the final budget was around £300,000, of which half came from Channel 4, here making one of its most spectacularly successful early investments in feature film production. Secondly, the film was the nearest that Greenaway had then come to a conventional feature. This is not to say that The Draughtsman's Contract is a conventional feature—far from it—but simply to note certain structural traits. For example, it is the first film in which Greenaway uses actors playing characters who speak to each other and are involved in various sets of relationships. It is also his first film to be set in a specific location in the known world. The film also develops a linear narrative, in which music plays the same kind of punctuating and expressive roles as in other, more straightforward, cinematic fictions. And thirdly, The Draughtsman's Contract marks the point at which Greenaway moved from being the maker of quirky, obsessive conceits to a major figure in international art house cinema with films such as A Zed and Two Noughts and The Belly of an Architect. The Draughtsman's Contract has been described as "an elaborate conspiracy thriller about class, sex and landscape, set at the feverish close of the 17th century." It tells the story of Mr. Neville, an ambitious young draughtsman, who, in 1694, is contracted by Mrs. Herbert for 12 drawings of her husband's country property at Compton Anstey. On arrival he soon becomes involved in the household's complex affairs, and is also perturbed to find that every time he begins a new drawing an item of the absent Mr. Herbert's clothing is stubbornly in view. Then Mr. Herbert is discovered dead, floating in the moat.

Greenaway's films, in which a formal concern with structures rubs shoulders with something decidedly more Romantic and even absurdist, have been described as revolving around the contradiction between "the encyclopaedic minutiae of a constructed world-in-microcosm and the aleatory perception of a contingent Nature," and The Draughtsman's Contract is no exception to this schema. In particular, the way in which the businesslike, dispassionate Mr. Neville is constantly intruded upon by human passions and their visible traces on the landscape testifies to the impossibility of purely abstract systems of any kind—systems of representation included. Indeed, even the landscape in which Compton Anstey is set, and which forms the background to the drawings, is far from being simply natural or neutral. As both Nikolaus Pevsner and W. G. Hoskins have repeatedly pointed out, the English landscape in particular always carries the traces of human activity upon it, and can thus be read as a kind of social and political map, as well as a simply geographical one. Neville's mistake is to fail to "read" the landscape in which he finds himself: narrowly limiting himself to what he can see in his viewing frame, to formal composition and to the formal terms of his contract, he fails to understand the relations of patronage and inheritance that are inscribed upon the landscape, or to see the signs of passion and intrigue which keep breaking through onto the otherwise orderly surface. This notion of landscape as something to be "read" becomes abundantly clear after Mr. Herbert's death, when the various members of the household scrutinise Neville's drawings for clues to the identity of the murderer.

It is its concern with landscape that, above all else, marks out The Draughtsman's Contract as a Peter Greenaway film. However, there is much else besides—the deliberately literary dialogue shot through with puns and conceits, the concern with visual symmetry (which results in a stylised, stilted mise-en-scène which is sometimes reminiscent of Last Year at Marienbad), and Michael Nyman's not-quite-pastiche score, with its echoes of Purcell. It is less hermetic than his earlier films, less obsessed with purely structural matters and more concerned with telling a story. As usual the range of reference—cinematic and otherwise—is enormously wide (with Restoration comedy to the fore), but perhaps two of the strongest (and most unexpected) reference points are the costume drama and the country-house murder mystery, both of which add their curious resonances to this playful, idiosyncratic charade about the interconnections between representation, property, and sex in the England of William of Orange.

—Sylvia Paskin

DIE DREIGROSCHENOPER

(The Threepenny Opera)

USA-Germany, 1931

Director: G. W. Pabst

Production: Warner Bros. First National (USA), Tobis Klang-Film, and Nero-Film (Germany); black and white, 35mm; running time: 111 minutes (German version) and 104 minutes (French version); length 3097 meters (German version). Released 19 February 1931, Berlin. Filmed in Berlin.

Producer: Seymour Nebenzahl; screenplay: Leo Lania, Bela Balász and Ladislaus Vajda, from the play by Berthold Brecht; adaptation for the French version: Solange Bussi, André Mauprey, and Ninon Steinhoff; photography: Fritz Arno Wagner; editors: Hans Oser (German version), Henri Rust (French version); sound: Adolf Jansen; production designer: Andrei Andreiev; music: Kurt Weill; orchestration: Theo Mackeben.

Cast: German: Rudolph Forster (Mackie Messer); Carola Neher (Polly); Reinhold Schünzel (Tiger Brown); Fritz Rasp (Peachum);

Die Dreigroschenoper

Valeska Gert (Mrs. Peachum); Lotte Lenya (Jenny); Hermann Thimig (Vicar); Ernst Busch (Street-singer); Vladimir Sokolov (Smith); Paul Kemp, Gustav Puttjer, Oskar Höcker, and Kraft Raschig (Mackie's Gang); Herbert Grünbaum (Filch); French: Albert Préjean (Mackie Messer); Florelle (Polly); Jack Henley (Tiger Brown); Gaston Modot (Peachum); Jane Markem (Mrs. Peachum); Margo Lion (Jenny); Antonin Artaud, Vladimir Sokolov, and Merminod (Mackie's Gang).

Publications

Scripts:

Lania, Leo, Bela Balasz, and Ladislaus Vajda, Die Dreigroschenoper, in Masterworks of the German Cinema, edited by Roger Manvell, London, 1973; also published separately, Berlin, 1978.

Books:

Rotha, Paul, Celluloid: The Film Today, London, 1931.
 Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1947.
 Joseph, Rudolph, editor, Der Regisseur: G. W. Pabst, Munich, 1963.
 Buache, Freddy, G. W. Pabst, Lyons, 1965.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, Georg Wilhelm Pabst, Paris, 1966.
 Aubry, Yves, and Jacques Pétat, "G. W. Pabst," in Anthologie du cinéma 4, Paris, 1968.
 Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, 1969.

Masterworks of the German Cinema: Nosferatu, M, the Threepenny Opera, introduction by Roger Manvell, New York, 1973.
 Barsacq, Leon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.
 Atwell, Lee, G. W. Pabst, Boston, 1977.

Articles:

Chavance, Louis, "Un Mystérieux Musée de figures de cire," in La Revue du Cinéma (Paris), 1 May 1931.
New York Times, 18 May 1931.
Variety (New York), 20 May 1931.
Close Up (London), June 1931.
 Potamkin, Harry, "Pabst and the Social Film," in Hound and Horn (New York), January-March 1933.
 Bachmann, Gideon, editor, "Six Talks on G. W. Pabst," in Cinemages (New York), no. 3, 1955.
 "Special Issue" of Filmkunst (Vienna), no. 18, 1955.
 Seiting, Mark, in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1960.
 Croce, Arlene, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1960.
 Stanbrook, Alan, in Films and Filming (London), April 1961.
 Tyler, Parker, in Classics of the Foreign Film, New York, 1962.
 Luft, Herbert, "G. W. Pabst," in Films and Filming (London), April 1967.
 Brecht, Bertolt, and V. Gerhage, "Het Driestuiversproces—een sociologies experiment," in Skrien (Amsterdam), November-December 1973.
 Rayns, Tony, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1974.
 Pitera, Z., in Kino (Warsaw), August 1976.
 "Special Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 December 1976.
 Horak, J. C., "Three Penny Opera: Brecht vs. Pabst," in Jump Cut (Chicago), no. 15, 1977.
 Virmaux, Alain, and Odette Virmaux, "L'Affaire: Quat sous de dommages et intérêts," in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1986.
 "Cinema and Opera Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), May 1987.
Film Dope (Nottingham), April 1994.
 Löser, Claus, "Ein ehrenvolles Schicksal," in Film-Dienst (Cologne), 7 November 1995.
 Mahrenholz, S., in EPD Film (Frankfurt), November 1995.
 Kemp, Philip, "Mud in Your Eye," in Sight & Sound (London), October 1998.

* * *

G.W. Pabst's film version of Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill's The Threepenny Opera is a fascinating though flawed curio. The property, initially presented on the stage in 1928, is an adaptation of John Gay's The Beggar's Opera, a parody of Italian musical dramas first performed 200 years earlier.

While Brecht retained the basic plot of The Beggar's Opera, he updated it and related the satirical elements to his own era. At the same time, he was concerned more with ideas than coherent storyline or character development. In cinematizing the play, Pabst treated the plot and characters far more realistically, with greater emphasis on the feelings and motivation of the principal roles; in this regard, the film bears more the mark of Pabst than Brecht or Weill.

The sets, lighting and props are very stylized (except for the sequence detailing a beggar's demonstration) resulting in an odd conglomeration of surrealism and reality. Brecht originally collaborated on the film, but the script was rewritten when his ideas clashed with those of Pabst. Brecht and Weill were displeased with the filmmaker's interpretation, and took out a lawsuit over the material's copyright.

Brecht's social satire is still preserved though, along with this unaffected lyricism. The theme is as relevant to the present as to 1928 or 1728: the government and the underworld are as equally amoral in terms of self-interest. A once orderly world—which may only exist in the fantasies of those nostalgic for the “good old days” that in reality were never really so good—has been polluted by economic and political chaos. The setting is a dreary Victorian London of pimps and prostitutes, thieves and killers, and crooked politicians. (The Threepenny Opera was banned in London after a single showing). Polly Peachum, with the members of Mackie Messer's gang, opens a bank, in the belief that “honest” thievery is more profitable than larceny outside the law. In the end Polly's father (who is king of the beggars), Tiger Brown (the corrupt police commissioner), and Mackie become partners in the bank—and mainstays of society.

Weill's songs, so important in the stage production, seem less so here: some—“Ballad of Sexual Dependency,” “The Tango Ballad,” and “The Ballad for the Hangman”—were omitted by Pabst. On one level the film is difficult to evaluate because current prints are faded; and the soundtrack seems archaic because of the technology then available for recording dialogue and music. But the disunity of style (a fault) and the keenly realized satire (an asset) are both lucidly apparent.

The Threepenny Opera is one of a trio of films Pabst directed in the 1930s that were anti-capitalist, stressing the importance of friendship and the moral obligation to oppose the forces of evil. The others were Westfront 1918 and Kameradschaft. Though The Threepenny Opera is far more romantic and stylized than the first two, all are united thematically.

The film was released on the eve of Hitler's seizure of power in Germany. Pabst captured the essence of the atmosphere which allowed the existence of the Nazi state, and all original German prints were destroyed by the Third Reich. The film was shot simultaneously in both German and French, with different casts; the French Threepenny Opera became a success in Paris, and was hailed as a masterpiece, but the German version is more well-known in America. A complete negative of the latter was reconstructed by film distributor Thomas J. Brandon in 1960, after a decade-long search through Europe for sections and scenes.

—Rob Edelman

DRIFTERS

UK, 1929

Director: John Grierson

Production: New Era Studios for the Empire Marketing Board; black and white, 35mm; running time: about 40 minutes. Released 10 November 1929, premiered at the London Film Society. Filmed 1929 in a small fishing village in Northern England, and on board a herring boat at sea. Cost: Grierson declares cost to have been about £2500, while Rotha remembers it as being less than £2000.

Produced, scripted, directed, and edited by John Grierson; photographed by John Grierson and Basil Emmott.

Publications

Books:

- Rotha, Paul, Documentary Film, London, 1952.
 Grierson, John, Grierson on Documentary, edited by Forsyth Hardy, London, 1966.
 Jacobs, Lewis, editor, The Documentary Tradition: From Nanook to Woodstock, New York, 1971.
 Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.
 Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.
 Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of the British Documentary: The Story of the Film Movement Founded by John Grierson, Berkeley, 1975.
 Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: Theory and Criticism, New York, 1976.
 Beveridge, James, John Grierson, Film Master, New York, 1978.
 Hardy, Forsyth, John Grierson: A Documentary Biography, London, 1979.
 Ellis, Jack C., John Grierson: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1986.
 Ellis, Jack C., The Documentary Idea, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1989.

Articles:

- Close Up* (London), November 1929.
Bioscope (London), 27 November 1929.
 Grierson, John, “E.M.B. Film Unit,” in Cinema Quarterly (London), Summer 1933.
 Blumer, Ronald, “I Derive My Authority from Moses,” in Take One (Montreal), no. 9, 1970.
 Sussex, Elizabeth, “John Grierson,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1972.
Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1972.
 “Grierson's Hammer,” in Films and Filming (London), July 1972.
 Sussex, Elizabeth, “Grierson on Documentary: Last Interview,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1972.
Travelling (Lausanne), Summer 1979.
 Forsyth, Scott, “The Failures of Nationalism and Documentary: Grierson and Gouzenko,” in Canadian Journal of Film Studies (Ottawa), vol. 1, no. 1, 1990.
 Bernstein, Matthew, “Film and Reform: John Grierson and the Documentary Film Movement,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 47, no. 2, Winter 1993.
 Acland, Charles R., “National Dreams, International Encounters: The Formation of Canadian Film Culture in the 1930s,” in Canadian Journal of Film Studies (Ottawa), Spring 1994.
 Crothall, Geoffrey, “Images of Regeneration: Film Propaganda and the British Slum Clearance Campaign, 1933–1938,” in Historical

Drifters

Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon), vol. 19, no. 3, August 1999.

* * *

Drifters was John Grierson's first film, and the only one of thousands of films for which he was responsible that he completely controlled creatively. Not only did he write the script, produce, direct and edit, but, according to Forsyth Hardy in his biography of Grierson, he shot much of the film himself. In its editing he was assisted by Margaret Taylor, who became his wife.

About the work of herring fishermen in the North Sea, Drifters has a simple narrative structure. The men board their ships in harbor, sail to the banks, lay the nets, haul in the catch in the midst of a storm, race homeward to the auction of the catch at quayside. It includes images of Scotland and the sea, both important in Grierson's life and recurring in the films he produced. Herring fishing was a canny choice since the Financial Secretary to the Treasury was an authority on the subject.

Drifters marked the beginning of the British documentary film and served as a prototype for many of the films that followed. But, rather than evidence of an innovative genius, it represents the work of a brilliant analyst and synthesist who had absorbed what was at hand for the making of the kind of films he wanted to see made. In it are reflections of Flaherty's Nanook of the North, with brave men eking out their existence in the face of the elements. Eisenstein's Potemkin is even more heavily called upon. In Drifters the loving long takes of a Flaherty are cut up and banged together in Eisensteinian montage to provide a modern energy and rhythm, and the individual accomplishments of Nanook are replaced by the collective efforts of a crew, as in Potemkin. It is unlike both models, however, in eschewing the exotics of Flaherty and the heroics of the Soviets. In Drifters the drama is in the everyday workaday. By ending on the fish being sold at market, Grierson sets the fishermen's work within the context of the economic actualities of contemporary Britain.

Its premiere at the Film Society in London was as the first half of a double bill on which the British premiere of Potemkin was the main attraction, with Eisenstein in attendance. Though risking the comparison must have taken considerable nerve on Grierson's part, he knew that the audience for that event would comprise the intellectual elite and correspondents for the national press. Drifters was very well received and went on to modest commercial distribution. It was the first instance in English cinema in which work had been given this sort of importance and members of the working class were presented with dignity rather than as comic relief. As a silent film it was severely handicapped, however; at the time of its release the transition from silence to sound was becoming complete.

Rather than continuing as a personal filmmaker, as he might have done, Grierson used the success of Drifters as the basis for establishing the Empire Marketing Board Film Unit, for hiring others who would make more films and develop the British documentary film movement.

—Jack C. Ellis

DU RIFIFI CHEZ LES HOMMES

(Rififi)

France, 1955

Director: Jules Dassin

Production: Miracle Productions for Indus, Pathé, and Prima (France); black and white, 35mm; running time: 113 minutes, some sources list 116 minutes. Released 1955 in France.

Screenplay: René Wheeler, Jules Dassin, and Auguste le Breton, from the novel by Auguste le Breton; photography: Philippe Agostini; editor: Roger Dwyre; sound: J. Lebreton; art director Auguste Capelier; music: Georges Auric.

Cast: Jean Servais (Tony le Stéphanois); Carl Mohner (Jo le Suedois); Robert Manuel (Mario); Perlo Vita (Cesar); Magali Noe (Viviane); Marie Subouret (Mado); Janine Darcy (Louise); Pierre Grasset (Louise); Robert Hossein (Remi); Marcel Lupovici (Pierre); Dominique Maurin (Tonio); Claude Sylvain (Ida).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Best Director (shared with Serge Vasiliev), 1955.

Publications

Books:

Ferrero, Adelio, Jules Dassin, Parma, 1961.

McArthur, Colin, Underworld USA, London, 1972.

Parish, James R., and Michael R. Pitts, The Great Gangster Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1976.

Siclier, Fabien, and Jacques Levy, Jules Dassin, Paris, 1986.

Articles:

Chabrol, Claude, and François Truffaut, interview with Dassin, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April-May 1955.

Wilcox, John, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1955.

Raper, Michael, in Films and Filming (London), September 1955.

Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), June-July 1956.

Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 6 June 1956.

Bourjaily, Vance, in Village Voice (New York), 4 July 1956.

Mayer, Andrew, in Quarterly of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Winter 1956.

Grenier, Cynthia, "Jules Dassin," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1957–58.

Bluestone, George, "An Interview with Jules Dassin," in Film Culture (New York), no. 17, 1958.

Johnson, Ian, in Films and Filming (London), April 1963.

Dassin, Jules, "Style and Instinct," in Films and Filming (London), February 1970.

Carcassonne, P., "Trois hommes du milieu," in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1980.

Carril, M., "Los vaivenes de Jules Dassin," in Cinematoteca Revista (Montevideo), July 1981.

Verdone, M., "Rififi," in Rivista del Cinematografo, April Supplement, 1993.

Lewis, Kevin, "Love and Noir with Jules Dassin," in DGA Magazine (Los Angeles), April-May 1995.

McGilligan, Patrick, "I'll Always Be an American," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1996.

Hanisch, Michael, "Fremder in Hollywood," in Film-Dienst (Cologne), 17 December 1996.

* * *

Despite his Gallic-seeming name, Du Rififi chez les hommes was Jules Dassin's first French film. In the late 1940s he had pioneered a vivid new style of urban thriller, bringing an incisive, documentary-influenced realism to the mean streets of New York (The Naked City) and San Francisco (Thieves' Highway). Forced into exile by McCarthyism, he discovered an equally stark vision of London (Night and the City) before crossing the Channel to make (in the opinion of most critics) the finest film of his career. The richly textured evocation of Paris which Dassin created for Rififi perhaps betrays, in the sheer profusion of its detail, the eye of a fascinated visitor rather than the intimate glance of a native. But the film is convincingly authentic in its exact sense of milieu, its close attention to the tawdry glitter and stoic conventions of the small-time underworld it describes. Along with Jean-Pierre Melville's Bob le flambeur and Jacques Becker's Touchez pas au Grisbi, Rififi stands as one of the most accomplished French thrillers of the 1950s, all three films acknowledging, while never slavishly imitating, their American sources.

Like Grisbi, Rififi derives from a novel by Auguste le Breton, and shares the same downbeat, doom-laden atmosphere. The characters of Rififi inhabit a small, hermetic world, bounded by rigid precepts, in which even the police scarcely seem to figure. Danger threatens, not from the forces of law and order, but from rival gangs: the final shoot-out takes place in a half-built villa on the outskirts of Paris, a setting as ramshackle, bleak and devoid of bystanders as any Main Street in a western. From the first reel, the final outcome of events is never in doubt. With his racking cough and air of aging, existential gloom, Tony le Stéphanois is marked down for destruction. The best he can hope for is a good death, according to his own strict code of honor.

The plot follows the accepted caper format, as laid down by John Huston's The Asphalt Jungle: a robbery is meticulously planned, flawlessly executed—but the gang is subsequently betrayed by its own weaknesses or internal dissensions, and all is lost. Rififi's most notable innovation, for which the film is still best remembered, is the classic half-hour sequence covering the robbery, executed in unprecedented detail and total silence, mesmerizing in its coolly sustained suspense. The gang members are depicted as conscientious craftsmen, carrying out their task steadily and skillfully, to a predetermined system. This sequence has since been much imitated (not least by Dassin himself, in Topkapi), but never yet surpassed.

Du Rififi chez les hommes

Dassin portrays his doomed criminals with warmth and sympathy, aided by fine performances from a cast which includes (under the stage name of Perlo Vita) the director himself, as the dapper Italian cracksman whose susceptibility to women brings about the gang's downfall. Rififi marks the high point—and, regrettably, the conclusion—of Dassin's urban thriller cycle. Soon afterwards came the meeting with Melina Mercouri, and his descent into the pretensions of Phaedra and the cheerful hokum of Never on Sunday. Nothing in his subsequent career recaptured a fraction of the atmosphere and control of Rififi.

—Philip Kemp

DUCK SOUP

USA, 1933

Director: Leo McCarey

Production: Paramount Pictures; 17 November 1933; black and white, 35mm; running time: 72 minutes, some sources list 68 minutes. Released 22 November 1933.

Screenplay: Bert Kalmar and Harry Ruby, dialogue by Nat Perrin and Arthur Sheekman; photography: Henry Sharp; editors: Hans Dreier and Arthur Johnston; music director: Arthur Johnston.

Cast: Groucho Marx (Rufus T. Firefly); Harpo Marx (Brownie); Chico Marx (Chicolini); Zeppo Marx (Bob Rolland); Raquel Torres (Vera Marcal); Louis Calhern (Ambassador Trentino); Margaret Dumont (Mrs. Teasdale); Edgar Kennedy (Lemonade Seller); Edmund Breese (Zander); Edwin Maxwell (Minister of War); William Worthington (Minister of Finance); Leonid Kinsky (Agitator); Vera

Duck Soup

Hillie (Secretary); George MacQuarrie (Judge); Fred Sullivan (Judge); Davison Clark (Minister); Charles B. Middleton (Prosecutor); Eric Mayne (Judge).

Publications

Script:

Kalmar, Bert, and others, Monkey Business and Duck Soup, London, 1972.

Books:

Crichton, Kyle, The Marx Brothers, New York, 1951.
 Marx, Harpo, Harpo Speaks, New York, 1961.
 Eyles, Allen, The Marx Brothers: Their World of Comedy, London, 1966.
 Zimmerman, Paul, and Burt Goldblatt, The Marx Brothers and the Movies, New York, 1968.
 Anobile, Richard, Why a Duck? Visual and Verbal Gems from the Marx Brothers Movies, New York, 1971.
 Matthews, J.H., Surrealism and American Feature Film, Boston, 1971.

Anthologie du Cinéma 7, Paris, 1973.

Gehring, Wes, Leo McCarey and the Comic Anti-Hero in American Film, New York, 1980.

Articles:

M.H., in New York Times, 23 November 1933.
 Rowland, Richard, in Hollywood Quarterly, April 1947.
 Kurnitz, Harry, "Return of the Marx Brothers," in Holiday (New York), January 1957.
 Davey, S., and J. L. Noames, "Taking Chances: Interview with Leo McCarey," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), February 1965.
 Carey, Gary, in Film Notes, edited by Eileen Bowser, New York, 1969.
 Adamson, Joseph, "Duck Soup for the Rest of Your Life," in Take One (Montreal), September-October 1970.
 Silver, C., "Leo McCarey: From Marx to McCarthy," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1973.
 Rosenblatt, R., "Taking Stock of Duck Soup," in New Republic (New York), 20 November 1976.
 "Marx Brothers Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 April 1985.
 Winokur, M., "Smile, Stranger: Aspects of Immigrant Humor in the Marx Brothers Humor," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), July 1985.

- Smith, M., "Laughter, Redemption, Subversion in Eight Films by Leo McCarey," in Cineaction (Toronto), Summer-Fall 1990.
- Groch, J.R., "What Is a Marx Brother?: Critical Practice, Industrial Practice, and the Notion of an Auteur," in Velvet Light Trap (Austin), Fall 1990.
- Haas, S., "The Marx Brothers, Jews & My Four-Year-Old Daughter," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 19, no. 2–3, 1992.
- Amengual, Barthélemy, in Positif (Paris), June 1998.
- Arnold, Gary, "Overlooked Achievements (Directors Left Out of '100 Greatest American Movies' List)," in Insight on the News, vol. 14, no. 43, 23 November 1998.

* * *

Duck Soup was the fifth movie made under the Marx Brothers' five-picture contract with Paramount, and circumstances surrounding its production were not especially promising. The Paramount company was internally turbulent at the time, and in the early part of 1933 the Marx Brothers became involved in a dispute with the studio about the proceeds of some of their earlier films. Leo McCarey, whom they had selected as their director, was not enthusiastic about the project, and there were difficulties in completing the script. However, eventually all disagreements were resolved, and, amid the usual confusion surrounding Marx Brothers movies, the film was made. McCarey, often described as the only "real" director the Marx Brothers ever had, has said that he did not consider it one of his best pictures; later critics do not agree with him.

The virtue of Duck Soup is its simplicity. The unembellished plot, involving the rivalry of the Ruritania principalities of Freedonia and Sylvania, is both a parody of the "mythical kingdom" genre and an ideal environment for Marx Brothers material; the setting is, in Gerald Weales's phrase, congenial rather than antagonistic to their style. There are no interpolated harp or piano solos for Harpo or Chico; in fact, there are only three musical numbers in all: a song for Groucho, and two enormous, impeccably staged and filmed production numbers, perfectly integrated into the action. There is no love interest for Zeppo, and no attempt to provide a conventional social framework for the zany personae of the stars.

Within this setting, the story is carried forward almost operatically by a remarkable profusion of gags and comedy routines. A great deal has been written about the sources of these routines; some, particularly those involving Edgar Kennedy, have been traced to the Laurel and Hardy films on which Leo McCarey had worked earlier. Many gags were recycled from other Marx Brothers material; as many as 15 routines were identified in the rediscovered scripts of Flywheel, Shyster & Flywheel, the 1932–33 radio program starring Groucho and Chico. Even the superlative mirror scene has its antecedents elsewhere; it is a traditional vaudeville and music hall number, described by Variety in its 1933 review of the film as "the old Schwartz Bros. mirror routine," and used by others previously on film. But all these apparent borrowings might be viewed as no more than the use of material from a common pool of comedic material going back much further than any of these sources. What is significant in Duck Soup is the aptness of the material selected, and the elegance of its presentation.

McCarey, whose relaxed personality and improvisational methods seem to have combined well with those of his stars, had an unerring sense of what was best about the Marx Brothers style, and a remarkably fresh approach to its use. Harpo is still a satyr in Duck Soup, rather than the pixie he later became, and McCarey is not afraid to let us watch him perform his mayhem. Chico, as the spy Chicolini, perfectly logically chooses to be an Italian peanut vendor as "cover," thereby setting up encounters with Edgar Kennedy's lemonade vendor in routines which combine the rhythms of Laurel and Hardy with Marx Brothers gags. And Groucho, the consummate verbal comedian, has some of his most famous dialogue scenes but also, astoundingly, performs the totally silent, completely physical, and justly renowned mirror scene with Harpo. The film contains the only musical number to feature all four of the Marx Brothers together; it marks the welcome return of Margaret Dumont as Groucho's foil; and it displays wonderful supporting performances by Louis Calhern as a sleek and impeccably tailored diplomat and Raquel Torres as a sinuous secret agent, simultaneously spoofing all Mata Hari movies and providing something for the baldheads to look at. McCarey's timing and that of the Marx Brothers work perfectly together in the overall pacing of the film; despite his insistence that he was most comfortable with physical comedy, McCarey was sensitive to the internal logic of Marx Brothers humor, which takes place at the level of the word or sentence, rather than the concept or situation.

Comparatively few critics liked the film when it was first released. Variety was almost alone in giving it an unreservedly favorable review, and the picture did not do well at the box office. However, later writers on film have had a great deal to say about it, and it has become a favorite with revival audiences. French critics have considered it, with the rest of the Marx Brothers oeuvre, as a work of surrealism. Other writers have treated it as a deliberate satire on government diplomacy, and war, or as an overtly pacifist statement. Most of the people involved with the making of Duck Soup have denied that they were consciously attempting anything other than entertainment, but it is certainly the case that the war in Duck Soup has a very silly cause, and is fought as a very silly war. If depicting a silly war can be construed as making the statement that war is silly, then Duck Soup is a pacifist film.

Duck Soup was the last film the Marx Brothers made for Paramount. When it was completed, Zeppo retired from show business, and Groucho, Chico, and Harpo moved to MGM where, under the guidance of Irving Thalberg, they began A Night at the Opera—an entirely different kind of film, and one perceived at the time as a comeback for the team. Despite its initial lack of success, Duck Soup has come to be considered one of the best and perhaps the most characteristic of the Marx Brothers films. Critical literature about the Marx Brothers and their work now probably exceeds the work itself in volume; indicative of the status of Duck Soup in the Marx Brothers canon is the fact that the periodical devoted to its entirety to Marx Brothers research is called The Freedonia Gazette.

—Annette Fern

DUVIDHA

(Two Roads)

India, 1973

Director: Mani Kaul

Production: Mani Kaul Productions; colour, 35mm; running time: 81 minutes. Filmed on location in Rajasthan.

Producer: Mani Kaul; screenplay: Mani Kaul, based on a short story by Vijaydan Detha; photography: Navroze Contractor; editor: Ravi Shankar Patnaik; music: Ramzan Khan, Hammu Khan, Latif, and Ski Khan.

Cast: Ravi Menon (The Husband); Raisa Padamsee (The Wife); Hardan (The Father); Shambudan (The Shepherd).

Publications

Articles:

Variety (New York), 19 November 1976.

Singh, Madan Gopal, "The Cinematic Exploration," in Filmikon, volume 5, number 1, December 1976.

Ray, Satyajit, "Four and a Quarter," in Our Films, Their Films, Orient Longman, Calcutta, 1976.

Kaul, Mani, "Towards a Cinematic Object," in Indian Cinema Superbazaar, Vikas Publishing, 1983.

Kaul, Mani, "Seen from Nowhere," in Concepts of Space: Ancient and Modern, Indira Gandhi National Centre for Art/Abhinav Publications, New Delhi, 1991.

"Mani Kaul (Interview with Indian Film Director)," in UNESCO Courier, July-August 1995.

Roy, L. Somi, "Mani Kaul at Flaherty," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 17, no. 1-4, 1995.

Roy, I.Y., P. Chatterjee, and M.G. Singh, and U. Vajpeyi, "Mani Kaul," in Cinemaya (New Delhi), Winter 1995/1996.

* * *

Mani Kaul's third feature, his first in colour, continued his path-breaking experimentation with what he called the "cinematic object." The film is very much a part of the director's early work (which has changed remarkably over the decades, e.g. his latest, the big budget multi-cast Idiot, 1919). His first two, Uski Roti (1969) and Ashad Ka Ek Din (1971), and then Duvidha, posed the question with great rigour—and for the first time in the long history of Indian cinema—of what the cinematic form itself was, and what it could do.

For him, at the time he made these films, cinema was explicitly not a composite of disciplines arriving at a specificity. He argued that whereas most forms preceding the cinema attempt transformations into specific modes, in film in sharp contrast, the extreme particularization of image/sound denotation inhibits any finite cinematic linguistic, and furthermore, that it is only when the specificity of the image/sound formation is treated as substantial and unique that a violation of this specificity becomes disciplined and positive: open to development (1983).

Towards that end he attempted a process of self-conscious specificity, emphasizing the particular, in order to be able to bracket it and eventually open it out. In Duvidha the location of the film's plot itself is significant to the formalist effort: it tells a Rajasthani folk story of a merchant's son who returns to his village with his new bride. He has to leave the village on business, leaving her alone. A ghost, hiding in a tree, witnesses his arrival and departure, and impersonating the husband, starts living with the wife. In time, a child is born to the woman and her ghost-husband. When the real husband returns, this causes a major dilemma, solved when the ghost is trapped by a shepherd in a leather bag. The socializing of the crisis and its neat solution, as the real husband is reinstated, of course, takes place without anyone taking the wife's feelings into account. Her silent desolation, at the end, leads the film itself to conclude with a strongly stated feminist position, one usually ignored by critics in favour of its more obviously stated formalist experiments.

Kaul himself presents in his cinematic object essay a hypothetical example that evidently relates to Duvidha:

In feudal social formations it was adequate to respond to oppression as an internal phenomenon, since the external social structure was absolutely fixed. An internalized violence totalized the imagined and lived world of mythos. With the disappearance of the feudal order a violent reality externalized solidly, upon the social landscape. The course of the individual in society suddenly appeared hazardous. The older, subtler myths now appear meaningless with the collapse of an outmoded world . . . the solid mass is not able to will: nothing moves. A new abstraction.

It can be reasonably argued that in the film, the totalized internalized violence of the woman is "solidly externalized" by the ghost's physical presence. The trapping of the ghost into a bag in the end, like the trapping of the world of "mythos" by a new social system appears to be a solution, but its utter inability to solve the hazardous journey of the wife's attempt at individuation eventually means that it is no solution at all.

The film intervenes into the process of looking, of taking in that process, but instead of replicating its specificity, tries instead to seek for that abstraction which may allow for a frozen historical situation to find its mobility again.

The frozen nature of the film is of course its most critical aspect: attacked, above all by Satyajit Ray ("Four and a Quarter" in Our Films Their Films) for its unrealism, its exotica and its sparse visual and sound, contrasted as it was especially by the full-throated songs by Ramzan and Hammu on the title track. Into that historical freeze, however, Kaul brings in a variety of historically contradictory, till then considered hierarchical languages. The woman—especially as she enters the village in a palanquin—clearly evokes the Basohli and Kangra miniature forms, extended into the framing, editing and the colour schemes used. Contrasted by the folk nature of the tale itself, and the music that represents the form in which it is traditionally told, Kaul also orchestrates with extraordinary skill the way that classical and folk forms apparently contradict, eroticize and freeze each other, both refusing to let the other go beyond apparent specificities and into a form that can develop and adapt to historical change.

Duvidha was made with the informal support of a multi-arts co-op led by the noted painter Akbar Padamsee. Although this film was extensively screened and telecast in Europe (to a point where Kaul, nearly a dozen films later is still associated with this relatively early work), it may be added that the apparent commercial failure of this film forced the director to make only non-fiction for over 15 years, a genre to which he has returned only in the 1990s, with his explorations of Dostoevsky (Nazar, 1989 and Idiot, 1991).

—Ashish Rajadhyaksha

E

THE EARRINGS OF MADAME DE . . .

See MADAME DE . .

EARTH

See ZEMLYA

EAST OF EDEN

---

USA, 1955

Director: Elia Kazan

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc. and First National; Technicolor (Warnercolor), 35mm, CinemaScope; running time: 115 minutes; length: 3415 meters. Released 9 April 1955, New York.

Producer: Elia Kazan; screenplay: Paul Osborn; dialogue: Guy Tomajean, from the novel by John Steinbeck; photography: Ted McCord; editor: Owen Marks; sound engineer: Stanley Jones; art directors: James Basevi and Malcolm Bert; music: Leonard Rosenman; costume designer: Anna Hill Johnstone.

Cast: James Dean (Cal Trask); Julie Harris (Abra); Raymond Massey (Adam Trask); Richard Davalos (Aron Trask); Jo Van Fleet (Kate); Burl Ives (Sam Cooper, the Sheriff); Albert Dekker (Will Hamilton); Lois Smith (Ann); Harold Gordon (Mr. Albrecht); Timothy Carey (Joe); Mario Siletti (Piscora); Roy Turner (Lonny Chapman); Nick Dennis (Rantany).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Prix du Film Dramatique, 1955; Oscar, Best Supporting Actress (Van Fleet), 1955.

Publications

Script:

Osborn, Paul, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), November 1975.

Books:

Bast, William, James Dean: A Biography, New York, 1956.
Thomas, T. T., I, James Dean, New York, 1957.

Tailleur, Roger, Elia Kazan, revised edition, Paris, 1971.

Basinger, Jeanine, John Frazer, and Joseph W. Reed, Jr., Working with Kazan, Middletown, Connecticut, 1973.

Ciment, Michel, Kazan on Kazan, New York, 1974.

Dalton, David, James Dean—The Mutant King, San Francisco, 1974.

Herndon, Venable, James Dean—A Short Life, New York, 1974.

Whittman, Mark, The Films of James Dean, London, 1974.

Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Bourget, Jean-Loup, James Dean, Paris, 1983.

Morrissey, Steven, James Dean Is Not Dead, Manchester, 1983.

Pauly, Thomas H., An American Odyssey: Elia Kazan and American Culture, Philadelphia, 1983.

Dalton, David, and Ron Cayen, James Dean: American Icon, London, 1984.

Devillers, Marcel, James Dean, London, 1985.

Michaels, Lloyd, Elia Kazan: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1985.

Beath, Warren Newton, The Death of James Dean, London, 1986.

Jones, David Richard, Great Directors at Work: Stanislavsky, Brecht, Kazan, Brook, Berkeley, 1986.

Kazan, Elia, Elia Kazan: A Life, New York, 1988.

Ciment, Michel, An American Odyssey: Elia Kazan, London, 1989.

Articles:

Gavin, Arthur, "The Photography of East of Eden," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), March 1955.

Gerstle, Ralph, in Films in Review (New York), March 1955.

Cole, Clayton, in Films and Filming (London), April 1955.

Sarris, Andrew, in Film Culture (New York), May-June 1955.

Prouse, Derek, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1955.

Bazin, André, "L'Indéniable Puissance lyrique de Kazan," in France-Observateur (Paris), 3 November 1955.

Archer, Eugene, "The Genesis of a Style," in Film Culture (New York), no. 8, 1956.

Truffaut, François, "Les Haricots du Mal," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1956.

Archer, Eugene, "Genesis of a Genius," in Films and Filming (London), January 1957.

Connolly, Ray, "Eden Revisited," in Motion (London), Winter 1961-62.

Bean, Robin, "The Young Agony," in Films and Filming (London), March 1962.

Stein, Jeanne, "Raymond Massey," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1963.

Bean, Robin, in Films and Filming (London), May 1964.

Bean, Robin, "Dean—10 Years After," in Films and Filming (London), October 1965.

Delahare, Michel, "Preface to an Interview," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), October 1966.

East of Eden

“A Natural Phenomenon: Interview with Elia Kazan,” in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), November 1966.

Benayoun, Robert, “Cain, Abel et le dollar,” in Positif (Paris), May 1967.

Byron, Stuart, and Martin L. Rubin, “Elia Kazan Interview,” in Movie (London), Winter 1971–72.

Hillier, Jim, in Movie (London), Winter 1971–72.

Kitses, Jim, “Elia Kazan: A Structuralist Analysis,” in Cinema (Los Angeles), Winter 1972–73.

Truffaut, François, “James Dean est mort,” in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), November 1975.

Small, Edward S., in Magill’s Survey of Cinema 1, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Comuzio, Ermanno, in Cineforum (Bergamo), August 1984.

Rathgeb, D.L., “Kazan as Auteur: The Undiscovered East of Eden,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), January 1988.

Dancyger, K., “The Bigger Picture: A Consideration of the Influence of Journalism and Theatre on the Feature Length Screenplay,” in Journal of Film and Video (Los Angeles), no. 3, 1990.

Simmons, Jerrold, “The Production Code & Precedent,” in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Fall 1992.

Larue, Johanne, in Séquences (Haute-Ville), September 1992. Kino (Warsaw), June 1993.

Séquences (Haute-Ville), July-August 1995.

“A Tune Is Worth 1,000 Pictures: The Neglected Craft of Film Music,” in Economist, vol. 343, no. 8018, 24 May 1997.

* * *

If East of Eden were remembered only for introducing to the screen its legendary star, James Dean, its place in film history would be assured. As it is, however, the techniques developed by the director to capture and translate the actor’s performance most effectively within a widescreen format also lend the film the artistic distinction of being one of the first serious attempts at a creative use of CinemaScope. Elia Kazan’s bag of stylistic tricks, regarded by many critics as technical abnormalities, consisted of such devices as canting the camera to distort angles, use of swinging pans to sustain a sense of movement in stacy scenes, unusually moody lighting effects, horizontal pans, and experiments with soft focus lenses. Through these techniques, the director used his camera to accompany his actors’ performances, effectively and imaginatively enhancing their work. At the same time, he effected a visual impression of continuous movement while constantly redirecting the viewer's attention to the appropriate area of the screen, maximizing the dramatic advantages of its vast expanse. The resulting effect is an amplification of the film's symbolic motifs through their placement in shifting but visually highlighted contexts.

In a sense, the effective translation of East of Eden to the large screen required a visual equivalent to the acting method pioneered by the Actors Studio, of which Kazan was a co-founder. Drawing on his own "emotional memory," the actor recalls feelings comparable to those experienced by a fictional character. A number of Kazan's actors, particularly Dean and Marlon Brando (in A Streetcar Named Desire), were practitioners of "the Method," which required a considerable degree of adaptation in terms of the cinematography. Through Kazan's visual style in East of Eden, the camera, in a manner similar to that used in the German Expressionist films of the 1920s, reflects the psychological aspects of the characters under its scrutiny. For example, the story, a modern version of the Biblical tale of Cain and Abel, centers on the relationship between a father and his two sons. Its point of view is that of the youngest son Cal who, like his Biblical counterpart Cain, performs certain acts that are subject to at least two interpretations. Viewed simplistically, they can, in the case of both characters, be seen as the vile deeds of an inherently evil son. Yet, through Dean's eccentric interpretation, the modern boy can also be recognized as a psychologically complex, insecure child who is starved for parental love. In scenes in which Cal appears with his father Adam (Raymond Massey), Kazan tilts the camera to dramatically characterize both figures as being in an essentially aberrant, distorted relationship. Both actor and camera combine to place the character's actions within an abnormal family context and reveal Cal's actions to be those of a boy consumed by an overwhelming need to win his father's approval. It is significant that the angle of vision is most distorted in the scene in which Adam refuses his son's heartfelt but slightly tainted gift of money. Adam cannot look beneath the surface of the act to assess its meaning in terms of their relationship.

Interspersed throughout the film are long, almost theatrical scenes, indicative of the director's stage experience, which provide the film with its thematic unity as ideas are raised which will later result in violent confrontations. Even in these scenes, there is a constant sense of movement expressed through the use of settings such as a Ferris wheel or swing. Additional coherence is provided by the film's glimpse of the plight of California's immigrant population, a subject close to Kazan's heart. Some scholarship makes a case for East of Eden as the first in a series of Kazan films which examine various psychological and sociological aspects of the immigrant experience, a series continued by Wild River, America, America and The Arrangement.

—Stephen L. Hanson

EASY RIDER

USA, 1969

Director: Dennis Hopper

Production: Raybert Productions and Pando Company; Technicolor, 35mm (LSD sequence shot in 16mm); running time: 94 minutes; length: 2561 meters. Released 14 July 1969, New York. Filmed 1968–69 on location between California and New Orleans. Cost: about $375,000.

Producers: Peter Fonda with Bert Schneider and William L. Hayward; screenplay: Peter Fonda, Dennis Hopper, and Terry Southern; photography: Laszlo Kovacs; editor: Donn Cambern; sound: Ryder Sound Service; sound mixer: Leroy Robbins; art director: Jerry Kay; music: Steppenwolf, The Byrds, The Band, The Holy Modal Rounders, Fraternity of Man, The Jimi Hendrix Experience, Little Eva, The Electric Prunes, The Electric Flag, and Roger McGuinn; special effects: Steve Karkus; stunt gaffer: Tex Hall.

Cast: Peter Fonda (Wyatt); Dennis Hopper (Billy); Antonio Mendoza (Jesus); Phil Spector (Connection); Mac Mashourian (Bodyguard); Warren Finnerty (Rancher); Tita Colorado (Rancher's Wife); Luke Askew (Stranger on Highway); Luana Anders (Lisa); Sabrina Scharf (Sarah); Sandy Wyeth (Joanne); Robert Walker, Jr. (Jack); Robert Ball, Carmen Phillips, Ellie Walker, and Michael Pataki (Mimes); Jack Nicholson (George Hanson); George Fowler, Jr. (Guard); Keith Green (Sheriff); Hayward Robillard (Cat Man); Arnold Hess, Jr. (Deputy); Buddy Causey Jr., Duffy Lamont, Blase M. Dawson, and Paul Guedry (Customers in the Café); Toni Basil (Mary); Karen Black (Karen); Lea Marmer (Madame); Cathi Cozzi (Dancing Girl); Thea Salerno, Anne McClain, Beatriz Monteil, and Marcia Bowman (Hookers); David C. Billodeau and Johnny David (Men in pickup truck).

Awards: New York Film Critics' Award, Best Supporting Actor (Nicholson), 1969; Cannes Film Festival, Best First Film, 1969.

Publications

Script:

Easy Rider: Original Screenplay by Peter Fonda, Dennis Hopper, Terry Southern plus Stills, Interviews, and Articles, edited by Nancy Hardin and Marilyn Schlossberg, New York, 1969.

Books:

Springer, John, The Fondas: The Film and Careers of Henry, Jane, and Peter Fonda, New York, 1970.

Mast, Gerald, A Short History of the Movies, New York, 1971.

Downing, David, Jack Nicholson: A Biography, London, 1983.

Cagin, Seth, and Philip Dray, Hollywood Films of the Seventies: Sex, Drugs, Violence, Rock'n'Roll, and Politics, New York, 1984.

Rodriguez, Elean, Dennis Hopper: A Madness to His Method, New York, 1988.

Stayton, Richard, Dennis Hopper, New York, 1997.

Articles:

Tuten, Frederick, in Film Society Review (New York), May 1969.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 3 July and 14 August 1969.

Reif, Tony, and Iain Ewing, "Fonda," in Take One (Montreal), no. 3, 1969.

Easy Rider

- Fonda, Peter, and Leslie Reyner, "Thoughts and Attitudes about Easy Rider," in Film (London), Autumn 1969.
- Macklin, F. A., "Easy Rider: The Initiation of Dennis Hopper," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1969.
- Milne, Tom, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1969.
- Polt, Harriet, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1969.
- "What Directors Are Saying," in Action (Los Angeles), September-October 1969.
- Farber, Stephen, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1969-70.
- Warshow, Paul, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1969-70.
- Sullivan, Tom R., "Easy Rider: Comic Epic Poem in Film," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), Spring 1970.
- Sullivan, Mary Rose, "Easy Rider: Critique of the New Hedonism," in Western Humanities Review, no. 24, 1970.
- Hampton, Charles, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1970.
- Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, 3 October 1970.
- "Easy Rider Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), September 1971.
- Cohen, M. S., "The Corporate Style of BBS," in Take One (Montreal), November 1973.
- Herring, H. D., "Out of the Dream and into the Nightmare: Dennis Hopper's Apocalyptic Vision of America," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Winter 1983.
- Hugo, Chris, "Easy Rider and Hollywood in the 1970s," in Movie (London), Winter 1986.
- McGilligan, Patrick, "The Ballad of Easy Rider (Or, How to Make a Drug Classic)," in Los Angeles Magazine, March 1994.
- MacGregor, Jeff, "The Hot Day Terry Southern, Cool and Fatalistic, Strode In . . .," in New York Times, 12 November 1995.
- Hirschman, E.C., "A Cinematic Depiction of Drug Addiction: A Semiotic Account," in Semiotica, no. 104, 1995.
- Laderman, D., "What a Trip: The Road Film in American Culture," in Journal of Film and Video (Los Angeles), no. 48, 1996.
- Redman, Nick, in DGA Magazine (Los Angeles), July-August 1996.
- Hampton, Howard, "Scorpio Descending: In Search of Rock Cinema," in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1997.
- Singer, Mark, "Whose Movie is This (How Much of Easy Rider Belongs to Novelist Terry Southern)," in New Yorker, vol. 74, no. 17, 22 June 1998.

* * *

Easy Rider remains a cinematic hallmark primarily for negative reasons; the preeminent film dealing with the subject and style typifying the late 1960s, it remains an interesting cultural and historical document of the industry's response to "youth culture." Unfortunately, the film seemed trite even two years after its initial critical and public triumph. Produced for $375,000, it made over $50,000,000 and spawned a number of less-effective imitators; the film's profits convinced even the most reticent backers in Hollywood that the youth market was ready to be tapped. In fact, it may have been its imitators that made the original date so quickly; many of the films produced after Easy Rider were of such inferior quality that they couldn't be sold to television after their initial release in regular theaters.

The film is not without value. Film historian Gerald Mast sees Easy Rider as a landmark of the "New Hollywood" as well as the culmination of films representing our experience of the American West through the narrative device of the journey, the film being a sort of New Wave cowboy epic. It reflects the sexual and social values of the American counter-culture of the period: the protagonists are social misfits and outlaws. Unlike filmic outlaws of the past—Little Caesar, Scarface—these heroes can be charming, good-humored, warm and often compassionate. Their humorless and finally deadly pursuers, predictably, represent the "older generation." In Mast's words, "Given the outlaw protagonists, the new obligatory ending was the unhappy rather than happy one. The protagonists die; law triumphs over lawlessness. However, good did not triumph over evil, for law and good were antithetical."

Easy Rider dealt openly with violence and paranoia, appropriate themes given the ideological divisions of the United States in the late 1960s. As David Cook notes, the film "was praised for its radical social perspective far beyond its value as a film." For him as well it is the western/quest film revisited: two "hippies," their journey made on motorcycles rather than horses, go "in search of America." The film concerns freedom, or the illusion of freedom—for ultimately the bikers "can't find it anywhere," as the promotional copy read.

Easy Rider merges the American past and present, city and country, gangsters and cowboy through the main characters played by Dennis Hopper and Peter Fonda. Civilization is personified by small-town bigots and the county sheriff, and characterized by institutionalized love (a whorehouse), and even institutionalized death (a very large cemetery). The romantic journey seems less than it should be; a commune of hip kids from the city acts with as much hostility towards the easy riders as the "straights" in the towns. Freedom is represented by the road, but as the ending of the film illustrates, even that cannot last.

Andrew Sarris stressed the "assortment of excellences . . . lift Easy Rider above the run and ruck of its genre. The first and foremost is the sterling performance of Jack Nicholson as George Hanson, a refreshingly civilized creature from Southern comfort and interplanetary fantasies." Among the film's other strengths are its traveling shots on the road accompanied by the rock music of Jimi Hendrix, The Byrds, Steppenwolf, The Band, Bob Dylan, Roger McGuinn, and others. But Sarris's main point is that "with all the rousing rhythmic revelry and splendiferously scenic motorcycling, Easy Rider comes to resemble a perceptual precredit sequence, but reasonably pleasant withal." However, "there is something depressingly deja vu about the moralistic view of America from a motorcycle." And this from a critic who essentially likes the film.

Critical opprobrium of its time notwithstanding, Easy Rider's jury still hasn't returned a less than contradictory verdict. For all its apparent triteness, for all of its "Man-cool mumbles," even mainstream critics like Sarris warn, "beware of all generalizations, including this one; the nouvelle vague tricks and Bergman-Fellini-Antonioni mannerisms are no more voguish today than the UFA German Expressionist and Soviet montage tricks were in the late twenties."

The film has dated badly, yet its value lies in capturing one of the United States' most divisive times, illustrating where the frontier legacy begun with Stagecoach seems to have led. It's often impossible to tell the heroes from the villains in Easy Rider, as now.

—Deborah H. Holdstein

L'ECLISSE

(The Eclipse)

Italy-France, 1962

Director: Michelangelo Antonioni

Production: Interopa Film and Cineriz (Rome) and Paris Film Production (Paris); black and white, 35mm; running time: 125 minutes. Released 1962. Filmed in Italy.

Producers: Robert and Raymond Hakim; screenplay: Michelangelo Antonioni and Tonino Guerra, with Elio Bartolini and Ottiero Ottieri; photography: Gianni Di Venanzo; editor: Eraldo Da Roma; sound: Claudio Maielli and Mario Bramonti; production design: Piero Poletto; music: Giovanni Fusco.

Cast: Alain Delon (Riccardo); Monica Vitti (Vittoria); Francisco Rabal; Lilla Brignone; Rosanna Rory; Mirella Ricciardi; Louis Seigner.

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Special Jury Prize and Catholic Film Office Award, 1962.

Publications

Scripts:

Antonioni, Michelangelo, and Tonino Guerra, L'eclisse, 1962; translated in Screenplays of Michelangelo Antonioni, New York, 1963.

Books:

Leprohon, Pierre, Michelangelo Antonioni: An Introduction, New York, 1963.

Cowie, Peter, Antonioni, Bergman, Resnais, New York, 1963.

Strick, Philip, Antonioni, London, 1965.

Cameron, Ian, and Robin Wood, Antonioni, London and New York, 1969.

Samuels, Charles Thomas, Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.

Poague, Leland, and William Cadbury, Film Criticism: A Counter Theory, Ames, Iowa, 1982.

Rifkin, Ned, Antonioni's Visual Language, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.

Barthes, Roland, and others, Michelangelo Antonioni, Munich, 1984.

Biarese, Cesare, and Aldo Tassone, I film di Michelangelo Antonioni, Rome, 1985.

Dervin, Daniel, Through a Freudian Lens Deeply: A Psychoanalysis of Cinema, Hillsdale, New Jersey, 1985.

Antonioni, Michelangelo, That Bowling Alley on the Tiber: Tales of a Director, Oxford, 1986.

L'Eclisse

Perry, Ted, and Rene Prieto, Michelangelo Antonioni: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1986.

Tinazzi, Giorgio di, Michelangelo Antonioni, Firenze, 1989.

Giaume, Joëlle Mayet, Michelangelo Antonioni: le fil intérieur, Crisnée, Belgium, 1990.

Rohdie, Sam, Antonioni, London, 1990.

Prédal, René, Michelangelo Antonioni, ou, La vigilance du désir, Paris, 1991.

Arrowsmith, William, Antonioni: The Poet of Images, New York, 1995.

Brunette, Peter, The Films of Michelangelo Antonioni, Cambridge, 1998.

Scemama-Heard, Céline, Antonioni: le désert figuré, Paris, 1998.

Articles:

Lane, John Francis, "Antonioni Diary," in Films and Filming (London), March 1962.

"Antonioni Issue" of Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1962.

Barthelme, Donald, in New Yorker, 2 March 1963.

Gerard, L. N., "Antonioni," in Films in Review (New York), April 1963.

"Antonioni Issue" of 7th Art (New York), Spring 1963.

"Antonioni Issue" of Motion, no. 5, 1963.

Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, "Shape Around the Black Point," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1963–64.

Houston, Penelope, "Keeping Up with the Antonionis," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1964.

Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, "The Event and the Image," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1964–65.

Godard, Jean-Luc, "Night, Eclipse, and Dawn: An Interview with Michelangelo Antonioni," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), January 1966.

Andrew, J. Dudley, "The Stature of Objects in Antonioni's Films," in Triquarterly (Evanston, Illinois), Winter 1968.

Gow, Gordon, "Antonioni Men," in Films and Filming (London), June 1970.

Perry, Ted, "A Contextual Analysis of Antonioni's L'eclisse," in Speech Monographs, June 1970.

Tudor, Andrew, "Antonioni: The Road to Death," in Cinema (London), August 1970.

Hernacki, T., "Michelangelo Antonioni and the Imagery of Disintegration," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Autumn 1970.

- Decaux, E., "Une Musique: L'eclisse," in Cinématographe (Paris), November 1980.
- Affron, Mirella Joan, "Text and Memory in Eclipse," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 9, no. 3, 1981.
- Tarnowski, J. F., "Identification d'une oeuvre," in Positif (Paris), January 1983.
- Espósito, J., "Antonioni and Benjamin: Dialectical Imagery in Eclipse," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Fall 1984.
- Perez, G., "The Point of View of a Stranger: An Essay on Antonioni's Eclipse," in Hudson Review (New York), no. 2, 1991.
- Tomasulo, F. P., "The Architectonics of Alienation: Antonioni's Edifice Complex," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), no. 3, 1993.
- Predal, R., "L'eclisse, l'ellipse," in Avant Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1993.
- Peck, Ron, "Chance Encounters," in Sight & Sound (London), December 1994.
- Landrot, Marine, "Identification d'un cinéaste," in Télérama (Paris), 6 September 1995.
- Moore, K.Z., "Eclipsing the Commonplace: The Logic of Alienation in Antonioni's Cinema," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 48, no. 4, Summer 1995.
- Nowell-Smith, G., "Antonioni," in Sight & Sound (London), December 1995.
- Chatman, Seymour, "The Films of Michaelangelo Antonioni," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 53, no. 1, Fall 1999.

* * *

Michelangelo Antonioni's L'eclisse is the most succinct expression of moral ambiguities of the Italian "economic miracle" of the late 1950s and early 1960s to come from the national cinema. It is the complement of Federico Fellini's La dolce vita. Whereas Fellini dwells upon the hellish and grotesque dimensions of Roman life during that period, Antonioni focuses upon its inauthenticity and its impermanence. The "eclisse" of the title refers primarily to the brief affair of the protagonists Vittoria, a translator, and Piero, a stock jobber; and secondarily to a brief tailspin in the stockmarket which forms the backdrop of their liaison. In an even wider sense, it alludes to the brief span of human life on earth, literalized in a scene in a natural history museum which the filmmaker had to cut perhaps under pressure from the producers. The sole vestige of this dimension is a fossil Vittoria hangs as a decoration on her wall.

From the opening scene of Vittoria arranging objects in a frame to the final, magnificent montage of the nearly empty, vespertine streets of Rome's fashionable and modernistic E.U.R. district, Antonioni's typical love of composition and attention to significant detail is in evidence. In this film, things overwhelm people. Even the accidental meeting of Piero and Vittoria for the first time occurs during an ominous pause—a literal "minute of silence" in the stock exchange honoring a dead broker—and they whisper to each other around a monumental pillar (the Roman stock market is built in the ruins of an ancient temple).

The rootlessness of this couple is emphasized in the scenes of their mutual seduction which take place, not in their modern apartments, but in their parents' stuffier dwellings in the center of the city. By locating their amours in the vacant parental apartments, Antonioni underlines the dimensions of compulsion and regression in their relationship. Without pain, almost cheerfully, they exploit each other, playing at seriousness and constancy.

The ironic counterpoint to their homelessness is Vittoria's neighbor, Marta, who longs for her family plantation in Kenya. Her home is decorated with African trophies and giant enlargements of photographs of East Africa. A nostalgist and a racist, who refers to the natives as "apes," she had reified her environment. Antonioni underscores the illusory status of her feeling for Africa by depicting her hysterical attitude to her effeminately mannered poodle amid the vestiges of safaris.

The final minutes of the film sustain a remarkable suspense as the viewer is lead to expect either Vittoria or Piero to appear at the corner of their assignations. Instead, the camera focuses upon the objects and people that had been backdrops and tangents of their actions. As we come to realize that neither will appear, we get a glimpse of a man reading a newspaper (one of the many false identifications of the protagonists) with the headline about the threat of atomic war. The final, sustained close-up of a street light suggests a nuclear explosion which can eclipse human time.

—P. Adams Sitney

DIE EHE DER MARIA BRAUN

(The Marriage of Maria Braun)

West Germany, 1978

Director: Rainer Werner Fassbinder

Production: Albatros Film (M. Fengler), Trio Film, WDR, and Filmerlog Der Autoren (all of West Germany); Fujicolor, 35mm; running time: 120 minutes; length: 10,764 feet. Released 1978, Germany, and 28 February 1979, United States. Filmed in Germany.

Producer: Michael Fengler; screenplay: Peter Märthesheimer and Pea Fröhlich; dialogue: Rainer Werner Fassbinder; from an idea by Fassbinder; photography: Michael Ballhaus; editors: Juliane Lorenz and Franz Walsch (Fassbinder); sound recordists: Jim Willis and Milan Bor; art directors: Norbert Scherer, Helga Ballhaus, Claus Kottmann, and Georg Borgel; music: Peer Raben; costume designers: Barbara Baum, Susi Reichel, George Kuhn, and Ingeborg Pröller.

Cast: Hanna Schygulla (Maria Braun); Klaus Löwitsch (Hermann Braun); Ivan Desny (Karl Oswald); Gottfried John (Willi Klenze); Gisela Uhlen (Mother); George Byrd (Bill); Elisabeth Trissenaar (Betty Klenze); Rainer Werner Fassbinder (Dealer); Isolde Barth (Vevi); Peter Berling (Bronski); Sonja Neudorfer (Red Cross Nurse); Lieselotte Eder (Frau Ehmke); Volker Spengler (Train Conductor); Michael Ballhaus (Counsel, Anwalt); Günther Kaufmann (American on train); Karl-Heinz von Hassel (Prosecuting counsel).

Awards: Berlin Film Festival, Best Actress (Schygulla) and Best Technical Team, 1979.

Die Ehe der Maria Braun

Publications

Script:

Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, Peter Märthesheimer, and Pea Fröhlich, The Marriage of Maria Braun, in Rutgers Films in Print 4, Rutgers, New Jersey, 1984.

Books:

- Sandford, John, The New German Cinema, Totowa, New Jersey, 1980.
 Baer, Harry, Schlafen kann ich, wenn ich tot bin: Das atemlose Leben des Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Cologne, 1982.
 Eckhardt, Bernd, Rainer Werner Fassbinder: Im 17 Jahren 42 Filme—Stationen eines Lebens für den deutschen Film, Munich, 1982.
 Iden, Peter, and others, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Munich, 1982.
 Raab, Kurt, and Karsten Peters, Die Sehnsucht des Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Munich, 1982.
 Foss, Paul, editor, Fassbinder in Review, Sydney, 1983.
 Franklin, James, New German Cinema: From Oberhausen to Hamburg, Boston, 1983.
 Bauschinger, Sigrid, Susan Cocalis, and Henry A. Lea, editors, Film und Literatur: Literarische texte und der neue deutsche film, Munich, 1984.
 Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, Film Befreien den Kopf: Essays und Arbeitsnotizen, edited by Michael Töteburg, Frankfurt, 1984.
 Hayman, Ronald, Fassbinder: Film-maker, London, 1984.

- Phillips, Klaus, New German Filmmakers: From Oberhausen through the 1970s, New York, 1984.
 Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, Die Anarchie der Phantasie: Gespräche und Interviews, edited by Michael Töteburg, Frankfurt, 1986.
 Katz, Robert, and Peter Berling, Love Is Colder Than Death: The Life and Times of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, London, 1987.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, The New German Cinema, London, 1989.
 Lardeau, Yann, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Paris, 1992.
 Shattuc, Jane, Television, Tabloids, and Tears: Fassbinder and Popular Culture, Minneapolis, 1995.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, Fassbinder's Germany: History, Identity, Subject, Amsterdam, 1996.
 Kardish, Lawrence, editor, with Juliane Lorenz, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, New York, 1997.

Articles:

- Dawson, Jan, "Den kvinnohatande feministen: Om Fassbinder's kvinnosyn och Die Ehe der Maria Braun," in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 2, 1979.
 Moskowitz, G., in Variety (New York), 28 February 1979.
 Hosman, H., "Interview with Fassbinder," in Skoop (Amsterdam), August 1979.
 Kauffmann, Stanley, in New Republic (New York), 29 September 1979.
 Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 14 October 1979.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 15 October 1979.
 Rich, F., in Time (New York), 22 October 1979.
 Hatch, R., in Nation (New York), 27 October 1979.
 Adler, Renata, in New Yorker, 29 October 1979.
 Kroll, Jack, in Newsweek (New York), 29 October 1979.
 Curran, T., in Films in Review (New York), November 1979.
 Lardeau, Y., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1980.
 Sauvaget, D., in Image et Son (Paris), February 1980.
 Bonnet, J.-C., in Cinématographe (Paris), March 1980.
 Domecq, J.-P., "Comment désire la femme au temps du miracle allemand," in Positif (Paris), March 1980.
 McCormick, R., in Cineaste (New York), Spring 1980.
 Noonan, T., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1980.
 Orto, N., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), June 1980.
 Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1980.
 Elley, Derek, in Films (London), December 1980.
 Reimer, R. C., "Memories of the Past: A Study of The Marriage of Maria Braun," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Fall 1981.
 Koskinen, M., "Fassbinders kvinnotrilogo—en allegori över det tyska undret," in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 25, no. 1, 1983.
 Ledgard, R., in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), February 1983.
 Feinstein, Howard, "BRD 1–2–3: Fassbinder's Postwar Trilogy and the Spectacle," in Cinema Journal (Champaign, Illinois), Fall 1983.
 Kaes, A., "History, Fiction, Memory: Fassbinder's The Marriage of Maria Braun," in Persistence of Vision (Maspeth, New York), Fall 1985.
 Haralovich, M. B., "The Sexual Politics of The Marriage of Maria Braun," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), no. 1, 1990.
 Moeller, H.-B., "Fassbinder's Use of Brechtian Aesthetics," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), April 1990.

- New German Critique*, no. 63, Fall 1994.
Télérama (Paris), 15 February 1995.
Séquences (Haute-Ville), September-October 1995.
 Medhurst, A., "The Long Take," in Sight & Sound (London),
 February 1996.
 Hogan, D.J., "The Music from Rainer Werner Fassbinder Films," in
Filmfax (Evanston), no. 65, February/March 1998.
 Dixon, Wheeler Winston, "Rainer Werner Fassbinder," in Film
Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 51, no. 4, Summer 1998.

* * *

The importance of The Marriage of Maria Braun, released in Germany in 1978, can be seen on a number of levels. It is the first of Rainer Werner Fassbinder's works to win him popularity not only in his own country but also abroad. Prior to this film, Fassbinder's foreign success was limited to art-house audiences. The Marriage of Maria Braun belongs to the trilogy of films in which Fassbinder examines post-World War II Germany. These films unfold through the stories of three women whose names provide the titles—The Marriage of Maria Braun, Veronika Voss, and Lola—and whose stories present a glimpse into the history of the Federal Republic.

Maria Braun also belongs to a special group of Fassbinder films which are indebted in structure to the melodramas of Douglas Sirk. Fassbinder gave the conventional melodrama, of which Sirk's films are a prime example, new life by infusing it with the social and political concerns of modern Germany. At the same time he foregrounded and laid bare the structures of film melodrama itself. The structure of Maria Braun is so deeply embedded in the content that a study of one inevitably illuminates the other. The fusing of these two elements may account for the popular and also critical success of the film; audiences could easily relate to the emotionally charged story of a woman struggling to survive, while simultaneously, through the same actress in the same film, understand the options faced by a Germany struggling to survive.

Born in 1945, Fassbinder grew up in a country rebuilding itself with American aid during the "economic miracle" of the 1950s. Germany was surfeited with American films during this period, including the melodramas of Sirk. Fassbinder, familiar with these, attempted to discover what made them so successful, and to duplicate that success with his own work.

The intensity of the emotional scenes in Maria's story (for example, her marriage, her search for her husband, her realization that he is dead) is emphasized by lighting, music, and expressive camera angles. All of these elements stretch the limits of the conventional style of film melodrama. Yet they are undercut by the deadpan acting of Hanna Schygulla in the title role, and by the sheer profusion of heartrending situations in which Maria finds herself. The audience is drawn into the emotionally charged moment, then distanced from it and forced to look elsewhere for content. It looks instead to the social and political background to Germany's economic miracle. That history and Maria's story are so closely intertwined that the viewer may hardly notice the shift in attention. The scene, for example, in which Maria announces to her American G.I. lover that her husband is dead, implying that she is now free to go with him, ought to be feverish with emotion, but it is completely cooled by Schygulla's unemotional delivery of the line "Mein Mann ist tot." The scene is heavy with the symbolism of a despondent Germany which, after the war, turned to America. Maria comes to her G.I. lover not out of love but out of need to be cared for and because he is there and willing to give. All the trappings of great emotion are present, but there is no emotion on her face or in her voice. Likewise, Germany follows America out of the same need down the capitalistic road but with no thought or emotion that would imply that it is a true alliance.

Schygulla, with a great deal of class, moves through scene after scene of a devastated Germany. Surrounded by bombed-out buildings and broken walls, she moves through the debris with courage and skill, but no integrity. The camera follows her in long sweeping movements which reflect the aplomb of her transactions; the same way, the rigid frequently off-centered cinematography reflects the starkness of the world around her. Vincent Canby sums up the essence of Schygulla's character when he refers to Maria as a Mother Courage type who wouldn't be caught dead pulling a cart.

The most important characteristic of The Marriage of Maria Braun is its ability to successfully blend the elements of classical melodrama with aspects of modernist theory and contemporary social-political themes. Fassbinder has not only prolonged the life of the melodramatic mode, but has also embedded the sometimes confusing characteristics of an alienating modernism into the romance of the melodrama.

—Gretchen Elsner-Sommer

8½ (EIGHT AND A HALF)

See 8½ (OTTO E MEZZO)

---

ELIPPATHAYAM

(The Rat Trap)

India, 1981

Director: Adoor Gopalakrishnan

Production: General Films; Eastmancolour, 35mm; running time: 121 minutes.

Producer: Ravi; screenplay: Adoor Gopalakrishnan; photography: Ravi Varma; editor: M. Mani; assistant directors: Meera, Mohan, Babu; art director: Sivan; music: M. B. Srinivasan; sound recording: Deva Das, Chandran, Suresh; costumes: Ganeshan.

Cast: Karamani (Unni); Sarada (Rajamma); Jalaja (Sridevi); Rajam K. Nair (Janamma); Prakash (Janamma's son); Sonan (Estate Manager).

Elippathayam

Publications

Articles:

Variety (New York), 10 February 1982.

Daney, Serge, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1982.

Pulleine, T., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1984.

Dissanayake, W., "Self and Modernization in Malayalam Cinema," in East-West (Honolulu), June 1987.

Film a Doba (Prague), October 1989.

"Not So Servile: Indian Films (Film Industry in India)," in Economist, vol. 331, no. 7863, 14 May 1994.

Ganguly, S., "Mapping Interiors: An Interview with Adoor Gopalakrishnan," in Asian Cinema (Drexel Hill), no. 1, 1997.

Tournès, Andrée, and Lucien Logette, "Pesaro 1997," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), May-June 1998.

* * *

Gopalakrishnan's melodrama hinges around the paranoid central character of Unni. Utterly dependent for the running of his home, and for his personal needs on his unmarried sister Rajamma, Unni demonstrates his pathological insecurities with, for example, a horror of getting mud on his spotless clothing, of cows entering his ancestral yard, and through his utter inability to intervene into—or even address—the growing difficulties posed to his family by a decaying feudal system.

His elder sister arrives asking for a division of the family property; his coconut grove is invaded by thieves; his youngest sister Sridevi elopes with a flashy youth working in the Middle East. Eventually, when Rajamma collapses under the strain, Unni withdraws, literally like a rat into a hole.

The motif of the rat trap is written large into the film. It begins with a whimpering Unni, calling for assistance when a rat enters his room, and replicates the early chase for the rat with the villagers chasing Unni himself in the film's end.

This is Adoor Gopalakrishnan's third feature, his first in colour, and the film that established him as one of India's foremost independent directors. His first two, Swayamvaram (1972) and Kodiyettam (1977), were both melodramas, in which he worked with a specific, relatively unchanging style: with a few characters, an episodic narrative, and a style of quite literally shooting close to his central characters. He tries a larger expanse here, with a circular, slow pattern of shooting: typically through close-ups, tracking cutaways onto the different characters of his plot, thereby creating a series of narrative bridges from person to person, space to space. The spaces are patches of light and dark, and the soundtrack often consists of isolated units of realist effects and long silences. The result is a numbing, obsessive style, which is the only way his drama—which actually features something as abstract as a decaying feudal system—can focus on specific characters, and from them onto a loaded, obvious, repeatedly mentioned, metaphoric image of the rat caught in a trap.

Crucial to the understanding of the film is the fact that Unni comes from Kerala's Nair community: the community that, together with the Namboodiris (Brahmins) formed the land-owning class of the state. Historically a military caste, later moving towards administrative service with the formation of a modern state in Travancore (now Southern Kerala), the Nairs are most distinctive for their matrilineal family structure "so loosely arranged as to raise doubts as to whether 'marriage' existed at all" (Nossiter, 1982). It was, as Nossiter shows, the end of a long era: "the ending of the warrior role, the abolition of agrestic slavery, the growth of a money economy, and the impact of Western education that combined to undermine the relevance of Nair traditions. The young men of the tarawad (joint family) were condemned to idleness; the management of the estates was more difficult; the expenses of customary practices more burdensome; and the competition of rival communities, notably the Syrian Christians and Ezhavas, more challenging."

Most of these issues are directly illustrated by Gopalakrishnan's plotting: Unni's undefined marital status, his effort to keep Rajamma under his control when the three sisters—notably the eldest, Janamma—have clear rights to the family property, the thief Meenakshi's barely concealed effort to seduce the vacillating hero, Janamma's son Ravikuttan smoking idly behind the barn. In this, to some extent, the film adheres to an established literary genre pioneered by the noted novelist M. T. Vasudevan Nair, featuring the Nair community's decline in several existentialist stories (some of which he later adapted to film).

The film, however, differs from that established genre in significant ways: particularly in consonance with Gopalakrishnan's controversial next movie, Mukha Mukham (1984). The Nair community, it is known, were among the strongest supporters of Congress, Congress socialist, and Communist parties during the turbulent 1940s that effectively saw Travancore catapult directly from a regressive, authoritarian feudal state into one ruled by a communist agenda. Gopalakrishnan, it is arguable, attempts in both these films, Elippathayam and Mukha Mukham, to create something like a backdated social reform for a people who saw no measured historical transition into modernity. It is as though he critiques feudalism in his state, but from a perspective that sees Kerala's emergence into modernity as a process that it had no means to comprehend. It is as though he now wishes to provide his people with that perspective through using his cinema, his slow visuals and soundtrack, so that the tragedy of Unni could itself be bracketed through a metaphor, for defining—but also evacuating—that tragic, existential, history of noncomprehension.

—Ashish Rajadhyaksha

THE EMPIRE STRIKES BACK

See STAR WARS SAGA

THE END OF ST. PETERSBURG

See KONYETS SANKTA-PETERBURGA

LES ENFANTS DU PARADIS

(The Children of Paradise)

France, 1945

Director: Marcel Carné

Production: S. N. Pathé Cinema; black and white, 35mm; running time: originally 195 minutes for both parts, current version—Part I is 100 minutes, Part II is 86–88 minutes; length: current versions—Part I is 9066 feet, Part II is 7762 feet. Released 9 March 1945, Paris. Filming began August 1943, but was interrupted by WWII, resuming 9 November 1943; filmed in Joinville studios, Paris, La Victorine studios in Nice, and on an outdoor set constructed by Carné's crew in Nice.

Screenplay: Jacques Prévert; scenario structure: Marcel Carné, from an original idea by Marcel Carné and Jacques Prévert; photography: Marc Fossard and Roger Hubert; editors: Henri Rust and Madeleine Bonin; sound engineer: Robert Teisseire; production designers: Léon Barsacq, Raymond Gabutti, and Alexandre Trauner; music: Joseph Kosma, Maurice Thierie and Georges Mouque; music director: Charles Munch; costume designer: Antoine Mayo.

Cast: Jean Louis Barrault (Baptiste Debureau); Arletty (Garance); Pierre Brasseur (Frederick Lamaitre); Marcel Herrand (Lacenaire); Pierre Renoir (Jericho); Fabien Loris (Avril); Louis Salou (Count de Montray); Maria Cassares (Nathalie); Etienne Decroux (Anselm Debureau); Jeanne Marken (Madame Hermine); Gaston Modot (Blind Man); Pierre Palau (Director); Albert Remy (Scarpia Barigni); Paul Frankeur (Inspector of Police).

Award: Venice Film Festival, Special Mention, 1946.

Publications

Scripts:

Prévert, Jacques, and Marcel Carné, Les enfants du paradis, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July–September 1967; also as Children of Paradise, New York, 1968.

Carné, Marcel, Children of Paradise, New York, 1988.

Books:

Beranger, Jean-Louis, Marcel Carné, Paris, 1945.

Sadoul, Georges, French Film, Paris, 1947.

Quéval, Jean, Marcel Carné, Paris, 1952.

Landry, Bernard, Marcel Carné: Sa vie, ses films, Paris, n.d.

Garbicz, Adam, and Jacek Klinowski, editors, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievements: Journey 1, the Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: The Great Tradition, New York, 1976.

Barsacq, Leon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.

Perez, Michel, Les films de Carné, Paris, 1986.

Turk, Edward B., Child of Paradise: Marcel Carné and the Golden Age of French Cinema, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1989.

Forbes, Jill, Les enfants du paradis, London, 1997.

Articles:

Sadoul, Georges, in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 17 March 1945.

Manvell, Roger, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1946.

Phillips, James, in Hollywood Quarterly, July 1946.

New York Times, 20 February 1947.

Variety (New York), 26 February 1947.

Lambert, Gavin, "Marcel Carné," in Sequence (London), Spring, 1948.

Bodian, Alan, in Village Voice (New York), 23 November 1955.

Agee, James, in Agee on Film I, New York, 1958.

Hedges, William, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1959.

Stanbrook, Alan, "The Carné Bubble," in Film (London), November–December 1959.

Durnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), October 1965.

"Les enfants du paradis Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July–September 1967.

Chaumeton, E., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Winter 1973.

Les enfants du paradis

- Lefèvre, Raymond, in Cinéma (Paris), February 1974.
- Turk, E. B., "The Birth of Children of Paradise," in American Film (Washington D.C.), July-August 1979.
- Oms, Marcel, "Les enfants du paradis: La Mutation cinématographique du mélodrame," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), no. 28, 1979.
- Chion, M., "Le Dernier mot du muet," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1981.
- Freadman, A., "Reading the Visual," in Framework (London), nos. 30–31, 1986.
- Szots, I., "Komamasszony, hol az ollo?," in Filmkultura (Budapest), no. 1, 1990.
- Zagari, P., "Carné e Resnais echi dal boulevard," in Cinema Nuovo (Rome), March-April 1990.
- Stonehill, Brian, "Forbidden Games," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1991.
- Turan, Kenneth, "Children of Paradise Regained," in Los Angeles Times, 16 January 1992.
- Sellier, Genevieve, "Les enfants du Paradis dans le cinema de l'occupation," in I895, no. 22, July 1997.
- Vincendeau, G., "Paradise Regained," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 7, 1997.

* * *

Marcel Carné described his greatest work, Les enfants du paradis, as a "tribute to the theatre," and the story breathes with the very life and soul of French theatrical tradition. Three of its characters are based on historical personages famous during the reign of Louis-Phillippe (two actors, the pantomimist, Debureau and the ambitious romantic actor, Frederick Lemaître, and a debonair but ruthless criminal known as Lacenaire). Their meeting ground is Paris in the vicinity of the Théâtre des Funambules, in the Boulevard du Temple, sometimes called the Boulevard du Crime because it was the scene for many unsolved thefts and murders. A quarter of a mile of street fronts, as well as the complete theater, were constructed at great cost.

The film, made during the Nazi occupation of Paris, took over two years to complete. Production was often deliberately sabotaged, or halted because actors had disappeared and had either to be found again or their roles re-cast. Some performers active in the Resistance arranged to have their scenes shot secretly.

The Nazis, anxious to keep film production active in France, were more than willing to cooperate. German films were not patronized by the French people, and the Nazis decided that making films in the French language was essential to the Occupation. Over 350 feature films were shot in occupied France, and the most ambitious of these was Les enfants du paradis, yet Carné contrived to slow up production, sometimes deliberately hiding key reels already shot from Nazi supervisors, waiting hopefully for the Germans to be forced to evacuate Paris before the film was premiered.

On March 9, 1945, Les enfants du paradis was finally presented in Paris, the first important movie premiere after the end of the Occupation. It was received with adoration by the public. Comprised of two parts, each of which is feature-length, the film's running time was originally 195 minutes. This shortened by 45 minutes when the picture was first shown in New York. Most of the edited film was later restored, and prints of Les enfants du paradis now run 188 minutes.

The genesis for the story occurred in Cannes during the second year of the Occupation when actor Jean-Louis Barrault met over lunch with director Carné and screenwriter Jacques Prévert. When Barrault learned that they were seeking a subject for filming, he suggested a story be written about Debureau, who had been France's greatest pantomimist. (In 1950, Sacha Guitry, forced into inactivity during the immediate postwar years, would create a play on this subject in verse.)

Carné and Prévert's fame was established by three fatalistic, romantic melodramas, Quai des brumes, Hôtel du nord and Le jour se lève, generally considered to exemplify "poetic realism." Under the Occupation such films were banned, and they turned to a radically different style of period spectacle, first seen in the medieval fable Les visiteurs du soir. The scope of the movie envisioned by Carné, Prévert and Barrault was very wide. Its message—that the drama could only flourish where men are free—required a subtlety of interpretation that eluded the Nazi mind; otherwise they would never have authorized production of the film. The script is one of Prévert's finest, full of wit and aphorism; farce and tragedy are effortlessly combined. Carné's handling of both his all-star cast and the complex crowd scenes is masterly.

In French, "paradis" is the colloquial name for the gallery or second balcony in a theater, where common people sat and viewed a play, responding to it honestly and boisterously. The actors played to these gallery gods, hoping to win their favor, the actor himself thus being elevated to an Olympian status.

The French theatre at the time was as Dumas knew it, and as Balzac subsequently wrote about it. It was a theatre for the people, catering to their romantic and extravagant tastes. Mountebanks, clowns, and courtesans quickened its rich blood. Debureau, whose father was an actor, became the idol of his time, touching the emotions of his public with a few well-timed gestures. He rose to fame at the same time as Lemaître captured the fancy of the nation. Their fates mingled with that of the daring criminal, Lacenaire. All three loved and were loved, however briefly, by Garance, the beautiful adventuress idolized as an actress. In the film she is presented as a woman who rejects those men who try to possess her. However, only when she learns that Debureau is the father of a young son does she abandon her hold on him, relinquishing him to his wife and child while she pursues a new chapter in her life, praying that it will lead her to ultimate freedom. Garance becomes a forerunner of this century's emancipated woman, a sophisticate knowing everything about living, and resisting all attempts to control her.

Had the Germans even guessed that in authorizing production of Les enfants du paradis, they were condoning the exploits of a woman like Garance, they would have withdrawn their approval of the film immediately. She symbolized the activating spirit of the Free French, a spirit of revolt and independence, a spirit that can never be broken or subjugated, as Hitler's generals soon learned.

Beautifully cast, with the triumphant Arletty as Garance, the picture also boasts the presence of Jean-Louis Barrault as Debureau. He was the finest pantomimist of his generation in the French theatre, and he simply transferred his special gifts to the role he was playing. Handsome Pierre Brasseur is an immaculate Lemaître, and Marcel Herrand offered a stunning portrayal of the criminal. Lovely Maria Casarès is very appealing as the wife of Debureau.

All in all, Les enfants du paradis, in spite of its large canvas, remains a very intimate study of the French theatre, inviting its audience not only to know and appreciate its people, but also acquainting them with the Free French spirit.

—DeWitt Bodeen

DER ENGEL MIT DER POSAUNE

(The Angel with the Trumpet)

Austria, 1948

Director: Karl Hartl

Production: Vindobona Film; black and white, 35mm; length: 3370 meters. Released 19 August 1948 in Salzburg, Austria.

Producer: Karl Ehrlich; screenplay: Karl Hartl, Franz Tassié, from the novel by Ernst Lothar; photography: Günther Anders; art directors: Otto Niedermoser, Walter Schmiedl; music arranger: Willy Schmidt-Gentner.

Cast: Paula Wessely (Henriette Alt); Attila Hörbiger (Franz Alt); Oskar Werner (Hermann Alt); Hans Holt (Hans Alt); Maria Schell

Der Engel mit der Posaune

(Selma Rosner); Paul Hörbiger (Otto Eberhard Alt); Helene Thimig (Gretel Paskiewicz); Carl Günther (Oberst Paskiewicz); Hedwig Bleibtreu (Sophie Alt); Fred Liewehr (Kronprinz Rudolf); Curd Jürgens (Count Poldo Traun); Gustav Waldau (Simmerl); Karlheinz Böhm (son of Hans); Hermann Erhardt (Drauffen, painter); Adrienne Gessner (Countess Pauline Metternich); Karl Paryla (Czerny, worker); Erni Mangold (Martha Monica Alt).

Awards: Sascha-Pokal, Vienna, 1948; Venice Festival, 1948.

Publications

Books:

Lothar, Ernst, Angel with the Trumpet, New York, 1944.

Lothar, Ernst, Das Wunder des Überlebens, Vienna and Hamburg, 1961.

* * *

On August 19, 1948, people in the American occupation zone in Salzburg, Austria, could witness the premiere of a film which claimed to be an Austrian national epos, spanning the time from the suicide of Crown Prince Rudolf in Mayerling in 1889 to the present. The film was based on a novel of the same name by Ernst Lothar (1890–1974), a successful Austrian writer, theater director, and friend of Max Reinhardt. Like so many others, Lothar had to flee into exile in the United States in 1938. He joined the American army to return to Austria as soon as possible, and in June 1946 he arrived in Vienna charged with reviving the theaters, operas, and the Salzburg festival. He also took part in the de-Nazification of actors and musicians.

Lothar had published his book in English during his American emigration; the German edition also met with success. He wanted to expose the scandals hidden behind the attractive baroque facade of the Viennese home of the wealthy Alt family, decorated by the angel with the trumpet. This house symbolizes Austria: The piano manufacturer Franz Alt and his brother Otto Eberhard imitate the Emperor Franz Joseph's dedication to the status quo and suffocation of progressive ideas; Franz's wife Henriette lives a life of outward submission and deception; their son Hans, well-meaning but without orientation, represents the typical Austrian, in Lothar's view.

Lothar entrusted the filming to the experienced director Karl Hartl, the production head of Wien-Film during the Nazi era from 1938 to 1945, although he himself was no Nazi. Hartl gathered prominent actors of divergent ideological positions: returned exiles like Helene Thimig, Max Reinhardt's widow who also directed the Salzburg Festival, and Adrienne Gessner, Lothar's wife, as well as Paula Wessely and Attila Hörbiger, who had starred in the notorious anti-Semitic Nazi film Heimkehr (1940). It is at least surprising, if not tactless and inappropriate, that Wessely would play Henriette, this half-Jewish woman who ultimately fell victim to the Nazis. But Lothar himself reports in his autobiography, Das Wunder des Überlebens, that the Americans wanted Wessely for this role as a means of restoring her acting career: they considered the film a vehicle for helping Austrians to overcome the past. The filming promoted reconciliation over the settling of accounts.

The Austrian past is mirrored in the family history of the Alts and their four-story villa in the first district of Vienna. When Franz Alt, neither young nor good-looking, marries Henriette, the worldly daughter of a Jewish university professor, he knows that she had been close to Crown Prince Rudolf. However, as a patriarchal male, he never suspects that Rudolf had been his wife's great love and that she only married him when she recognized that there would be no life with Rudolf. The wedding is interrupted by the news of the Crown Prince's sudden death at Mayerling. Henriette knows that the prince committed suicide because of his father's mistreatment, but at her audience with the emperor she consoles him with the lie that he did not cause his son's death.

Several years later, the bored Henriette begins an affair—portrayed as platonic in the film, in contrast to the book—with Rudolf's friend Count Poldo Traun. The wordly count makes her all the more conscious of the restricted life in which she is trapped. When by chance her husband discovers the relationship, he challenges Count Traun to a duel, kills him, and then calmly returns to his business as usual.

The end of World War I brings not only the collapse of the monarchy and with it the value system of the Alts, but also claims other sacrifices: Franz has become paralyzed; Hans, a prisoner of war, does not return for six years but at any rate healthy; Hermann becomes a weapons dealer and Hitler follower.

Hans takes control of the family piano factory, marries an aspiring pianist, and has a family with her. In 1938, when three Nazi storm troopers try to arrest Henriette, the old woman throws herself out of the window. Lothar's book is more brutal: she is strangled by the Nazis. In 1945 Vienna lies in ruins from the bombing attacks. Only the angel with the trumpet projecting out of the rubble marks the Alt House. Hans, who now has a grown family, expresses modest optimism for the future to his workers and his children, speaking for Austria as well as for his business. He personifies the self-righteous Austria that is not conscious of any guilt.

The film offers a tame version of Ernst Lothar's angry, unsparing book. The splendid performance of Paula Wessely also leads the film in the direction of the usual lighthearted Viennese film; Henriette appears as a positive heroine, which she definitely is not in Lothar's novel. Most viewers therefore accept the film as a generational love story set in Old Vienna rather than as a mirror of the darker side of the Austrian soul and of Austrian history.

Numerous compromises were made to ensure the film's commercial success. Since film had become prudish in the late 1940s and the 1950s, care was taken to avoid offensive or controversial topics. In the book Henriette had sexual relationships with the Crown Prince and Count Traun, but the film pretends that these relationships stayed platonic. Neither is Hans the wholesome character portrayed in the film. In the book his wife Selma continues her career as an actress at the Burgtheater, while in the film she sacrifices her career as a pianist to devote herself solely to her family. Her representation as the virtuous German hausfrau reflects involuntarily that, perhaps unconsciously, the female role model of the Third Reich was still present in the fifties.

The Aryanization of the Alts' piano factory is never mentioned in the film. Clearly, one did not want to stir up such matters. Hermann's attraction to Nazism is glossed over by explaining that his character was damaged in the First World War. His preference for modern American dances instead of classical music proves he has a criminal character, the same naive suggestion made in some 1950s Heimatfilme which equate bad character with modern music or art. The film tries to serve the purpose of reconciliation by explaining the difficult political ordeal which Austria had to undergo in a relatively short time span.

The success of the film induced Sir Alexander Korda, who knew Hartl from the time they worked together for the Austrian film pioneer Count Sascha Kolowrat, to produce a British version, The Angel with the Trumpet (1950). Only the actors of minor roles were retained, including Maria Schell and Oskar Werner, for whom this film signified the beginning of their international career.

—Gertraud Steiner Daviau

THE ENIGMA OF KASPAR HAUSER

See JEDER FÜR SICH UND GOTT GEGEN ALLE

ENTOTSU NO MIERU BASHO

(Where Chimneys Are Seen; The Four Chimneys)

Japan, 1953

Director: Heinosuke Gosho

Production: Studio 8 Productions and Shin Toho Co.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 108 minutes; length: 9678 feet. Released 5 March 1953, Japan. Filmed in Japan.

Producer: Yoshishige Uchiyama; screenplay: Hideo Ogunil, from the novel Mujaki na Hitobito by Rinzo Shiina; assistant director: Akira Miwa; photography: Mitsuo Miura; editor: Nobu Nagata; sound: Yuji Dogen; art director: Tomoo Shimogahara; music: Yasushi Akutagawa.

Cast: Ken Uehara (Ryukichi Ogata); Kinuyo Tonaka (Hiroko Oyata); Hiroshi Akutagawa (Kengo Kubo); Hideko Takamine (Senko Azuma); Cheiko Seki (Yukiko Ikeda); Haruo Tanaka (Chujiro Tsukahara); Ranko Hanai (Katsuko Ishibashi).

Awards: Kinema Jumbo, Tokyo Citizen Film Concours Prize, 1953; Berlin Film Festival, International Peace Prize, 1954.

Publications

Books:

Mellen, Joan, The Waves at Genji's Door, New York, 1976.

Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, New York, 1978; revised edition, Tokyo, 1985.

Garbicz, Adam, and Jack Klinowski, editors, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievements: Journey 2, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1979.

Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, The Japanese Film: Art and Industry, revised edition, Princeton, 1982.

Articles:

Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, "The Films of Heinosuke Gosho," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1956.

Gillett, John, "Coca-Cola and the Golden Pavilion," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1970.

Gillett, John, "Heinosuke Gosho," in Film Dope (London), April 1980.

Tessier, Max, "Heinosuke Gosho," in Image et Son (Paris), June 1981.

Chevrie, Marc, "1. Gosho, cinéaste de la réconciliation," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1984.

Le Fanu, Mark, "To Love Is to Suffer," in Sight & Sound (London), Summer 1986.

Calderale, Mario, "Sette giorni di nome Gosho," in Segnocinema (Vicenza), September 1989.

Johnson, William, "The Splitting Image," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1991.

* * *

The film's title Where Chimneys are Seen, refers to an industrial-residential area in Tokyo's downtown, where a set of huge chimneys is a familiar sight to its lower-middle-class inhabitants. The protagonist discovers that, according to where you are, the number of these chimneys varies from one to four. This observation typifies the philosophy of Rinzo Shiina (who wrote the original story) that nothing is absolutely true or false; everybody has to believe something or pretend to. Director Heinosuke Gosho takes splendid advantage of his most familiar subject, the life of ordinary people, and elegantly portrays their humor and pathos.

The story develops around the four main characters; Ryukichi, an honest salesman at a wholesale socks store; his diligent wife Hiroko whose previous marriage was unofficially terminated by her husband's disappearance during the war; their young upstairs lodgers, Kengo, a serious and good natured tax officer, and Senko, a pretty and vivacious bargain announcer on a commercial street. As Gosho seems to be more interested in depicting each character's personality and emotional situation and their interrelationships than in detailing a completed plot, he successfully makes the viewer feel intimate with these likable and good-willed people.

The film's light and humorous tone is first manifested in the opening narration by Ryukichi. In an aerial shot, the camera shows us downtown Tokyo, focusing on Ryukichi's busy neighborhood with its small houses packed together; his usual neighbors are presented as a constant yet unwitting source of humor (e.g., the weird, loud morning chanting of a religious leader and the radio repairman with seven children). Finally his modest household is shown, and the habitual peace is broken by the sudden appearance of the baby left by Hiroko's previous husband to Hiroko and Ryukichi. Though it obviously creates tension between the couple, ultimately the baby becomes a symbol of unification: the childless couple confirm their love through their care for the sick baby; Kengo's (the young man upstairs) voluntary efforts to locate the baby's parents make Senko aware of his character, thus drawing the couple closer together; and the baby's mother finally realizes her responsibility to reclaim the baby.

The film's narrative structure involves numerous episodes which look simplistic, but cumulatively show the charms of everyday life. A memorable example is the scene in which Senko plays with pencils on Kengo's desk during their conversation on his daily, frustrating search for the baby's parents. This scene is noteworthy not only for its intimate humor, but also for its meditative effect, for the pencils, like the chimney, make Senko realize the relativity of life. Another good example is the scene in which Senko's modern girlfriend follows an older woman on the river bank—after the older one's sandal gets broken, the other also takes off one of her shoes. This lame pair create a wryly humorous image through their leisurely walking in the airy, bright morning light.

Gosho here, as in his other films, makes use of many close ups to indicate the subtle expressions of its characters. He also uses occasional long shots and long takes. Particularly effective is a long-shot sequence from a bus window where Kengo, after an exhausting search, notices the mystery of the chimneys. The fluidly vibrating image of the chimneys as the scenery swiftly passes is visually refreshing.

This film distinctively reflects the Japanese film's shomin-geki genre (films about the lives of ordinary people), with its superb characterizations, successful portrayal of everyday life and emotions, rich depiction of details and the particular bittersweet atmosphere created by skillful timing, comfortable pace and excellent acting. Overall, the film displays Gosho's belief that the sincere efforts of good people are understood and rewarded. This film not only has won the highest critical acclaim, but has also remained one of the most beloved of Gosho's films in Japan.

—Kyoko Hirano

ENTR'ACTE

France, 1924

Director: René Clair

Production: Black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: 22 minutes. Released 1924, at the Theatre des Champs Elysées between acts of the ballet "Relâche" by Francis Picabia as performed by the Ballets Suédois, Paris. Re-released 1968 with musical soundtrack directed by Henri Sauguet. Filmed 1924 in and around Paris.

Producer: Rolf de Maré; scenario: from an outline by Francis Picabia, adapted by René Clair; photography: Jimmy Berliet; editor: René Clair; music composed specially for the film: Erik Satie.

Cast: Jean Borlin; Francis Picabia; Man Ray; Marcel Duchamp; Erik Satie; Marcel Achard; Pierre Scize; Louis Touchagues; Rolf de Maré; Roger Lebon; Mamy; Georges Charensol; Mlle. Friis.

Publications

Scripts:

A Nous la liberté, and Entr'acte: Films by René Clair, New York, 1970.
Clair: Four Screenplays, New York, 1970.

Books:

Viazzi, G., René Clair, Milan, 1946.
Bourgeois, J., René Clair, Geneva, 1949.
Charenzol, Georges, and Roger Regent, Un Maître du cinéma: René Clair, Paris, 1952.
Solmi, A., Tre maestri del cinema, Milan, 1956.
De la Roche, Catherine, René Clair: An Index, London, 1958.
Amengual, Barthélemy, René Clair, Paris, 1963; revised edition, 1969.
Mityr, Jean, René Clair, Paris, 1969.
Samuels, Charles Thomas, Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.
McGerr, Celia, René Clair, Boston, 1980.
Barrot, Olivier, René Clair; ou, Le Temps mesuré, Renens, Switzerland, 1985.
Greene, Naomi, René Clair: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1985.
Dale, R. C., The Films of René Clair, Metuchen, New Jersey, 2 vols., 1986.

Articles:

New Republic (New York), 15 September 1926.
Potamkin, Harry, "René Clair and Film Humor," in Hound and Horn (New York), October-December 1932.
Causton, Bernard, "A Conversation with René Clair," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1932-33.
Jacobs, Lewis, "The Films of René Clair," in New Theatre (New York), February 1936.
Lambert, Gavin, "René Clair," in Sequence (London), Winter 1948-49.
"Clair Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), August-September 1951.
Ford, Charles, "Cinema's First Immortal," in Films in Review (New York), November 1960.
"Picabia, Satie, et la première d'Entr'acte," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), November 1968.
Beylie, Claude, "Entr'acte, le film sans maître," in Cinéma (Paris), February 1969.
Gallez, D. W., "Satie's Entr'acte: A Model of Film Music," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), no. 1, 1976.
Carroll, Noël, "Entr'acte, Paris, and Dada," in Millenium (New York), Winter 1977-78.
Dale, R. C., "René Clair's Entr'acte, or Motion Victorious," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 2, 1978.
Brunius, Jacques, in Travelling (Lausanne), Summer 1979.
Sandro, P., "Parodic Narration in Entr'acte," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 1, 1979.
Magill's Survey of Cinema: Silent Films, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1982.
Amengual, Barthélemy, "Entr'acte et ses mystères," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 February 1982.

Herpe, Noël, "René Clair ou l'or du silence," in Positif (Paris), February 1993.
Trémois, Claude-Marie, "La belle époque de René Clair," in Télérama (Paris), 8 September 1993.
Faulkner, Christopher, "René Clair, Marcel Pagnol and the Social Dimension of Speech," in Screen (Oxford), Summer 1994.
Clair, R., "De Stroheim a Chaplin," in Positif (Paris), January 1998.

* * *

In November of 1924, Paris anticipated another performance by The Swedish Ballet, a company which had outraged its audience since its residency began in 1920. The centerpiece of one particular evening was to be a new work created by Francis Picabia, the Dadaist artist. When Picabia learned that the opening night might be obstructed by censors, he ruefully entitled the work Relâche, or Theatre Closed or Performance Suspended. When the event did not take place on the announced night (due to an illness rather than censorship), patrons surmised this to be simply another Dadaist prank. Opening night finally did occur, and the events became firmly inscribed in French cultural history.

That infamous evening included a screening of the film Entr'acte. Shown between the two acts of Relâche, it was greeted with as much hissing and booing as it was with applause; the Dadaist philosophy, based in part on offending its audience, was once again triumphantly realized.

While Relâche remained mostly unknown until the Joffrey Ballet revived it in New York City during its 1980 season, Entr'acte has long since become a staple of film classes as an example of the French avant-garde cinema of the 1920s and as the prime exemplification of the Dada spirit in the film.

In his search for "pure" cinema, René Clair followed the Dadaist approaches of photomontage (as advocated by John Heartfield—a technique which involved "the meeting place of a thousand spaces"), and the random (as advocated by Tristan Tzara). True to those premises, Clair juxtaposed images and events as disparate as a chess game played by Marcel Duchamp and Man Ray, a cannon ignited by Erik Satie and Francis Picabia, a funeral where the coat of arms bearing the initials of Satie and Picabia was displayed, a ballerina, a sniper, inflatable balloon heads, the Luna Park rollercoaster, etc. These events were shot from a number of angles (including the ballerina from below through a plate of glass), and at varying speeds (from Satie and Picabia jumping toward the cannon in slow motion to the funeral procession racing off at the speed of the Keystone cops). While the images stressed the content as play, the director stressed the style as playfulness.

Through his film Clair invoked the entire catalogue of available cinematic techniques, abandoned the notion of narrative causality, and in true Dadaist style, espoused the overthrow of the bourgeois norm. The audience was assaulted with a series of non-related and often provocative images—from a "legless" man rising from his wagon and running away at full tilt, to a ballerina transformed into a bearded man—within a work which stressed the pleasure of inventing new spatial and temporal relations while provoking random laughter. While Clair often referred to this film as "visual babblings," audiences of today can see the film as a serious attempt to subvert traditional values, both cinematic and social.

—Doug Tomlinson

EQUINOX FLOWER

See HIGANBANA

---

ERASERHEAD

---

USA, 1976

Director: David Lynch

Production: David Lynch, AFI Centre for Advanced Film Studies; black and white, 16mm; running time: 89 minutes. Filmed in Los Angeles, 1971–76.

Producer: David Lynch; screenplay: David Lynch; photography: Frederick Elmes, Herbert Cardwell; editor: David Lynch; production designer: David Lynch; sound: Alan Splet; special effects: David Lynch; special photographic effects: Frederick Elmes; art director: Jack Fisk.

Cast: Jack Nance (Henry Spencer); Charlotte Stewart (Mary); Allan Joseph (Bill); Jeanne Bates (Mary's mother).

Publications

Books:

- Peary, Danny, Cult Movies, New York, 1983.
 Hoberman, J., and Jonathan Rosenbaum, Midnight Movies, New York, 1983.
 Samuels, Stuart, Midnight Movies, New York, 1983.
 Kaleta, Kenneth, David Lynch, New York, 1992.
 Alexander, John, The Films of David Lynch, London, 1993.
 Lynch, David, Images, New York, 1994.
 Chion, Michel, David Lynch, Bloomington, 1995.
 Nochimson, Martha P., The Passion of David Lynch, Austin, 1997.
 Woods, Paul A., Weirdsville U.S.A., London, 1997.
 Rodley, Chris, Lynch on Lynch, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 23 March 1977.
 Taylor, D., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1979.
 Braun, E., Films and Filming (London), April 1979.
 Island, Russ, Cinemonkey (Portland, Oregon), Spring 1979.
 Rosenbaum, J., "Eraserhead à New York," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1981.
 Godwin, K. George, "Eraserhead: The Story behind the Strangest Film Ever Made and the Cinematic Genius Who Directed It," in Cinefantastique (New York), September 1984.

- Angst, W., "David Lynch," in Dark Movies, no. 6, 1989.
 Breskin, David, "The Rolling Stone Interview with David Lynch," in Rolling Stone, no. 586, 6 September 1990.
 Thomas, J.D., "A Divide Erased," in Village Voice (New York), 7 June 1994.
 Ostria, V., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July/August 1994.
 Satuloff, Bob, "Movie Memories," in Christopher Street, no. 225, May 1995.
 Landrot, Marine, "Le maître d'immonde: Eraserhead," in Télérama (Paris), 18 October 1995.
 Poussu, Tarmo, in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 4–5, 1997.

* * *

In Midnight Movies, which devotes an entire chapter to Eraserhead, Jonathan Rosenbaum and J. Hoberman describe David Lynch's first feature as "an intellectual splatter film-cum-thirty-five-millimetre nightmare sitcom of the urban soul." Significantly, mainly through footnotes, Rosenbaum and Hoberman qualify their account of the film as art work and cult case history with hints that neither of them like it all that much. In a "Personal View" accompanying a retrospective piece in Cinefantastique, K. George Godwin compares Eraserhead with the archetypal midnight cult movie, Jim Sharman's The Rocky Horror Picture Show (1975):

They [the audience] come to laugh, to talk back at the screen, to participate. As the film begins, they are loud, jeering, laughing at any and everything . . . but as it progresses, the laughter thins, becomes more nervous and defensive. The film, for all of its weird humour, is not funny; it is strange, and its strangeness is of an unfamiliar kind. There is something uniquely disturbing about it, something which works even on those who have not come to take it seriously. Unlike Sharman's film, Eraserhead steadfastly refuses to provide a communal experience . . . somehow it instead isolates the individual viewer, absorbs him into a nightmare of personal experience. Seeing Eraserhead is an unshared experience: it is as if the film plays not on the screen but inside one's own head.

Lynch is an American original, committed enough to his own vision to wagon-master Eraserhead through nearly seven years of low-budget production, persuading collaborators to endure severe hardships (actor Jack Nance sported his character's Bride of Frankenstein quiff year after year as shooting continued) in the service of the end product. Eraserhead seems a free-form nightmare, but it has a tight narrative and strains for extreme technical sophistication. Asked what inspired the film, Lynch, in typically reductive fashion, has cited Philadelphia, where he lived in a bad neighbourhood for a while. The urban nightmare, weighed down by alienation and physical disgust, is played out in dingy apartments whose windows afford views of brick walls, with few ventures out onto grimy industrial streets and occasional fantastic plunges into a vaudeville dreamland behind a hissing radiator. Henry Spencer (Nance), who adopts Lynch's trademark blank stare, is on vacation from his job and finds himself drawn back into a relationship with Mary X (Charlotte Stewart), who invites him to her family apartment for a hideous dinner where he is presented with a tiny living cooked chicken to carve and is also shown a rabbit-like skinless mutant Mary claims is his own baby. Mary and Henry move in together with the eternally-mewling creature, but Mary leaves and Henry has a strange tryst with the Beautiful Girl Across the Hall (Judith Anna Roberts) which segues into a dream in which Henry is decapitated from within by the parasitical baby and his head is mined for rubber to put on the ends of pencils. One of the film's wryer ideas is the redundancy of featuring a "nightmare sequence" which is no more nor less realistic or fantastical than the surrounding scenes. In the climax, Henry tentatively dissects the baby, which disgorges a tide of excrement and a giant plant creature who could be the humourless twin of Audrey Jr. from The Little Shop of Horrors (1960). Henry is sucked into the light where, in an almost upbeat touch repeated in Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me (1992), he is embraced by an angel, the fungus-cheeked Lady in the Radiator (Laurel Near). The whole story is bracketed by an observer, the Man in the Planet (art director Jack Fisk), who guides the audience into and out of Lynch's private horror show.

Eraserhead

Of all the underground artist-turned-filmmakers, Lynch is the one who can also function as a Hollywood (or even television) professional: Eraserhead was "written, produced, and directed" by its auteur. The film probes unhealthy spots and nightmare extremes but does so with a steady, professional fascination that refuses to be classed as trash: no Warholian letting the camera run on and on without caring what's in front of it, no Kuchar Brothers home movie melodrama, no John Waters-ish community panto production values and strident amateur performances, no George Romero reliance on the conventions and concerns of low-rent horror films. These directors and their collaborators, let alone other painter-cum-filmmakers like Derek Jarman, Michael Snow, or Peter Greenaway, have never risked Academy Award nominations while Lynch (a Best Director nominee for The Elephant Man) and several of his crew—art director Fisk, sound designer Alan Splet (who won an Oscar for his work on The Black Stallion, 1979), even set decorator Sissy Spacek—have secured resident alien status in Hollywood.

Eraserhead is remarkably concentrated and consumed with disgust for the physical, free-associating weirdness as it plays out the grimy anecdote of Henry's entrapment, destruction, and (perhaps) redemption. In subsequent work, from The Elephant Man (1980), through Dune (1984), Blue Velvet (1986), Wild at Heart (1990), and the Twin Peaks TV series and movie, Lynch would adopt a more mainstream disguise for his concerns, adding character (especially in

The Elephant Man), colour (especially in Blue Velvet), and almost-warm wit (especially in Twin Peaks), increasingly embracing the trappings of popular culture (music, B movies, soap opera, horror films, pretty stars). Here, working in isolation from commercial cinema, he was either less compromising or more recalcitrant, creating a work of slick strangeness which remains the dark heart of his developing oeuvre and whose almost subliminal artistic (and political) conservatism perhaps explains its lasting cult success. Withal, it remains—unlike much of Lynch's later films—a work of genius it is impossible to love, so personal for its makers and its individual audience members that its many admirable or astonishing features still don't make it a film whose world one cares to revisit at all often.

—Kim Newman

EROICA

Poland, 1958

Director: Andrzej Munk

Production: Film Polski, ZAF "Kadr," and WFD (Warsaw); black and white, 35mm; running time: 87 minutes; length: 7787 feet. Filmed in Poland. Released January 1958.

Producer: Stanisław Adler; screenplay: Jerzy Stefan Stawiński, from the collection of Stawiński's short stories, Węrzy and Ucieczka; photography: Jerzy Wójcik; editors: Jadwiga Zajiczek and Mirosława Garlicka; sound: Bohdan Jankowski; art director: Jan Grandys; music: Jan Krenz.

Cast: Scherzo alla polacca: Edward Dziewoński (Dzidzius Górkiewicz); Barbara Polomska (Zosia Górkiewicz); Ignacy Machowski (Major Grzmet); Leon Niemszyk (Hungarian officer); Kazimierz Opaliński (Commander of Mokotów); Ostinato lugubre: Kazimierz Rudzki (Turek); Henryk Bak (Krygier); Mariusz Dmochowski (Korwin Makowski); Roman Kłosowski (Szpakowski); Bogumil Kobiela (Lieutenant Dabecki); Józef Kostecki (Zak); Tadeusz Lomnicki (Lieutenant Zawistowski); Józef Nowak (Kurzawa); Wojciech Siemion (Marianek).

Award: Prize of the International Film Press, the "Fipresci," 1959.

Publications

Books:

Haudiquet, Philippe, Nouveaux cinéastes polonais, Lyons, 1963.
Andrzej Munk, Warsaw, 1964.

Liehm, Antonin, and Mira Liehm, The Most Important Art: East European Film after 1945, Berkeley, 1977.

Garbicz, Adam, and Jacek Klinowski, editors, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievements: Journey 2, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1979.

Historia filmu polskiego 4, Warsaw, 1981.

Articles:

Thirard, P.-L., "Experience du Cinéma polonais," in Lettres Françaises (Paris), no. 790, 1959.

Variety (New York), 20 May 1959.

Sadoul, Georges, "Andrzej Munk," in Lettres Françaises (Paris), no. 894, 1961.

Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1961.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1961.

Film (West Germany), August-September 1964.

"Andrzej Munk Issue" of Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), no. 45, 1965.

Moulet, Luc, "Andrzej Munk," in Cahiers du Cinema (Paris), February 1965.

Brighton Film Review, April 1970.

Gyula, K., in Filmkultura (Budapest), July-August 1975.

Cieslar, J., "Andrzej Munk (1921–1961)," in Film a Doba (Prague), October 1981.

Modrzejewska, E., in Iluzjon, no. 3, 1986.

Film Dope (Nottingham), 1991.

Kino (Warsaw), May and June, 1994.

Litka, P., in Rezyser (Warsaw), no. 59, 1996.

* * *

Eroica, Andrzej Munk's third film, is based on the contemporary drama Człowiek na torze. As in his debut Blekity krzyz, he returns again to World War II for subject matter. The film consists of two parts, both of which deal with the theme of heroism which in a certain historical situation becomes myth.

The initial episode, centered on the tragic Warsaw uprising of 1944, sounds a new note in Munk's artistic method as well as for Polish cinema. It is the presentation of an ironic, sarcastic anti-hero and his deeds, a view that is quite exceptional within the body of Polish film that treated either the uprising or the war in general. The protagonist is a Warsaw good-for-nothing who is calculating and forever oscillating between cowardice and a utilitarian world view. Suddenly, and against his will, he becomes a hero. In drawing his character Munk does not obscure a single negative feature; in certain sections of the story Munk consistently emphasizes aspects of character and plot that lead the protagonist to greedy calculations of profit and loss. However, the hero is not a schematic one-dimensional character. At the moments when he sets aside his own principles to defend the uprising, Munk lends him a certain grandeur, which flows from the tragedy of the solitary deed that is ultimately useless and unnecessary. The director's ability to find elements of the comic and the grotesque even in tragic events has enabled him to catch some of the paradoxes of the Warsaw uprising. However, the film is not a satire, as has been charged by some Polish critics. Munk does not mock his hero but shows how the atmosphere of the time can influence a totally unheroic individual and impel him to act.

The second episode unfolds on a tragic plane. It takes place in a POW camp, where a significant moment in the joyless lives of the Polish officers occurs when the rumor that one of their comrades has managed to escape is heard. The story is false—the fugitive hides until his death inside the camp. Here Munk contemplates the meaning of an artificially sustained myth and, in this connection, examines and traces its influence on the entire camp. In this case, too, he is not demeaning the importance of the rumor; from the outset he even ascribes to it a certain power that should help the captives in their struggle for survival. Analysis of the mechanics of the story, however, gradually reveals its destructive nature, for it paralyzes activity and displaces courage and the will to act.

Eroica

The structure of Eroica is loosely built according to the rules of musical composition using contrastive means. The tragi-comic hero of the first novella, who belongs nowhere and to nobody, is placed in the boundless space of a large city in ruins, among streets that no longer have names; the viewer does not learn where these streets lead, where they end or where they begin. The officers of the second novella, on the other hand, move within a strictly limited geometric space tightly compressed into a tense order accented by non-dynamic compositions. These images not only convey hopelessness but also show the sophistication of the enemy, who suppress their opponents through psychological stress. They understand quite well that the worst punishment for prisoners is having to live with each other.

One further note of interest: Eroica was supposed to have had three parts. The third section had a rather intricate and elusive story that unfolded in a mountain setting and involved a spurious nun. This novella, however, did not come up to the level of the first two, and Munk himself eliminated it from the film.

—B. Urgosíková

EROTIKON

---

(Bonds That Chafe)

Sweden, 1920

Director: Mauritz Stiller

Production: Svensk Filmindustri; black and white, 35mm, silent; length: 5998 feet. Released 8 November 1920, Sweden. Filmed in Sweden, theater scenes shot in Royal Opera House, Stockholm.

Screenplay: Mauritz Stiller and Arthur Norden, from the play A Kék Róka by Ferenc Herczeg; photography: Henrik Jaenzon; production designers: Mauritz Stiller and Axel Esbensen; musical score which accompanies film: Kurt Atterburg.

Erotikon

Cast: Tora Teje (Irene Charpentier); Lars Hanson (Preben); Karin Molander (Marthe, the niece); Anders de Wahl (Prof. Leo Charpentier); Wilhelm Bryde (Baron Felix); Elin Lagergren (Irene's mother); Torsten Hammaren (Prof. Sedonius); Stina Berg (Servant); Gucken Cederborg (Cook); Vilhelm Berntsson (Butler); Bell Hedqvist (Friend of Baron Felix); John Lindlof (Friend of Preben's); Greta Lindgren (Model); Carl Wallin (Furrier); Carina Ari and Martin Oscar (Ballet dancers).

Publications

Books:

Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, Den Svenska Filmens Drama: Sjöström och Stiller, Stockholm, 1938.

Hardy, Forsyth, Scandinavian Film, London, 1951.

Waldenkranz, Rune, Swedish Cinema, Stockholm, 1959.

Beranger, Jean, La Grande Aventure du cinéma suédois, Paris, 1960.

Lauritzen, Einar, Swedish Film, New York, 1962.

Cowie, Peter, Swedish Cinema, London, 1966.

Werner, Gosta, Mauritz Stiller och hans filmer, Stockholm, 1969.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, editors, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey 1, The Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Articles:

Potamkin, M. C., "The Golden Age of Scandinavian Film," in Cinema (London), September 1930.

Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, "The Man Who Found Garbo," in Films and Filming (London), August 1956.

"Mauritz Stiller," in Anthologie du Cinéma, vol. 3, Paris, 1968.

Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1977.

Robertson, Jo Anne, "Mauritz Stiller," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1977.

* * *

By 1920 the artistic achievements of the Swedish cinema, under the inspired leadership of Victor Sjöström and Mauritz Stiller, were universally recognized. Most of these films reflected the life of rural Sweden. Stiller, a cultured man, decided to make a film set in a sophisticated urban milieu. His scriptwriter, Arthur Norden, brought to his attention Ferenc Herczeg's play, A Kék Róka, which he and Norden adapted to their purpose, dropping any acknowledgement to the author. From its premiere at the Roda Kvarn Cinema in Stockholm on the 8 November 1920, its success was assured.

Stiller lavished attention on this film, building elaborate sets and commissioning a special exotic ballet for the theatre scenes which were shot in the Royal Opera House of Stockholm, with a host of society extras for an audience. The film reflected the fashionable life of the city and a modernity indicated by the inclusion of scenes with airplanes.

The story about a professor of entomology who is sustained in his work by his devoted niece while his neglected wife seeks consolation elsewhere seems more like the work of Noel Coward than Selma Lagerlöf, who contributed so much to the Swedish cinema. It is handled with the lightest of touches; the irony of the scene where the man who tries to reconcile the married pair becomes the wife's lover is reminiscent of Ernst Lubitsch. Stiller's stylish direction works well with his talented players. Tore Teje's delightful portrayal of the wife is witty, wise and worldly. It is in striking contrast with the peasant role she had played the previous year in Sjöström's Karin Ingmarsdotter. Karin Molander's charming performance as the young niece is equally effective; Torsten Hammaren's caricature of a dry old stick is inspiring; and Lars Hanson and Anders de Wahl maintains the elegant style of the film.

Erotikon helped create a new genre of social comedy, and attracted considerable attention in the movie world. Jean Renoir admired it very much; Lubitsch mentioned it as one of the best films he had ever seen and it may well have influenced his work from The Marriage Circle onwards; Chaplin would have seen it during his European tour and the style of A Woman of Paris may have been influenced by it. On the other hand, while admiring its freshness of approach, the socially conscious critic Georges Sadoul regretted that the social satire had not gone further, "There is no satiric intention in Erotikon; the humor is gentle and pleasant, defensive rather than attacking . . . we are far from Beaumarchais or even Marivaux."

Stiller never made another film like Erotikon, which is curious, for it represented his own outlook on life. His next great success was the monumental Gösta Berlings Saga, which introduced Greta Garbo to the world. The delicacy and subtlety of the acting and the gentle observation of human foibles make Erotikon a film that transcends its time and fashion.

—Liam O'Leary

EL ESPIRITU DE LA COLMENA

(Spirit of the Beehive)

Spain, 1973

Director: Victor Erice

Production: Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 98 minutes; length 8785 feet. Released 1973. Filmed in Spain.

Producer: Elias Querejeta; screenplay: Francisco J. Querejeta, from an idea by Victor Erice and Angel Fernández Santos; assistant director: José Ruis Marcos; photography: Luis Cuadrado; editor: Pablo G. del Amo; sound: Luis Rodríguez; sound effects: Luis Castro and Sire Castro; art director: Adolfo Cofiño; music: Luis de Pablo.

Cast: Fernando Fernan Gomez (Fernando); Terésa Gimpera (Terresa); Ana Torrent (Ana); Isabel Telleria (Isabel); Lady Soldevilla (Don Lucia); Miguel Picazo (Doctor); José Villasante (Frankenstein); Juan Margallo (Outlaw).

Publications

Books:

Ellis, Jack C., A History of Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.

Schwartz, Ronald, Spanish Film Directors (1950–1985): 21 Profiles, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1986.

Articles:

Gillett, John, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1973–74.

Rabago, J., "Film Spanje," in Skoop (Amsterdam), February 1974.

Mortimore, R., "Spain: Out of the Past," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1974.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), Autumn 1974.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1974.

McGuinness, R., in Thousand Eyes Magazine (New York), October 1976.

Simon, John, "From Ineptitude to Incompetence," in New York, 4 October 1976.

Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 10 October 1976.

Bodeen, DeWitt, in Films in Review (New York), November 1976.

Abet, A., in Cinéma (Paris), December 1976.

Jordan, I., "La Couleur du rêve," in Positif (Paris), February 1977.

Chevalier, J., in Image et Son (Paris), March 1977.

Dubroux, D., "La Lumière et l'ombre," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1977.

Predal, R., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), March 1977.

Benelli, D., "Mysteries of the Organism: Character Consciousness and Film Form in Kasper Hauser and Spirit of the Beehive," in Movietone News (Seattle), June 1977.

Troeslen, A., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Winter 1977.

Rotker, S., in Cine al Dia (Caracas, Venezuela), November 1977.

Vrdlovec, Z., "Duh panja," in Ekran (Ljubljana), no. 9–10, 1979.

Duarte, R., and J. Matos-Cruz in Celuloide (Rio Major, Portugal), May 1980.

Pellizzari, L., in Cineforum (Bergamo), December 1982.

Arata, L. O., "I Ana: The Plat of the Imagination in The Spirit of the Beehive," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (New York), Spring 1983.

Paranagua, P. A., "La Solitude de Victor Erice," in Positif (Paris), April 1984.

Cobos, J., and M. Rubio, "Tunteiden heijastumia," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 8, 1989.

Castro, A., Interview with Victor Erice, in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), Winter 1989.

El espíritu de la colmena

Ehrlich, L. C., "The Name of the Child: Cinema as Social Critique," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 2, 1990.

Kovacs, K. S., "The Plain in Spain: Geography and National Identity in Spanish Cinema," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (New York), no. 4, 1991.

Martin-Marquez, S. L., "Monstrous Identity: Female Socialization in El espíritu de la colmena," in New Orleans Review, no. 2, 1992.

Toles, G., "Being Well-Lost in Film," in Raritan (New Brunswick, New Jersey), no. 2, 1993.

Morgan, R., "Victor Erice: Painting the Sun," in Sight and Sound (London), April 1993.

Hellman, M., in Positif (Paris), June 1994.

Bagh, Peter von, in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 4, 1995.

Poulet, Jacques, "Espace mental et filmique dans le cinéma espagnol," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), April 1995.

Ehrlich, Linda C., "Interior Gardens: Victor Erice's Dream of Light and the Bodegón Tradition," in Cinema Journal (Austin), Winter 1995.

* * *

Most critical attention paid to El espíritu de la colmena has focused on its elliptical relationship with precise moments in Spanish history, both the immediately post-Civil War (1940) of its setting and the tail-end of Franco's regime (1973) in which it was made. Whether its tactful reticence in political matters was due to artistic intent or a desire to skirt censorship, this is actually a film whose significance is as universal as it is specific. The static images and haunted faces suggest situations that have endured for centuries and which will persist no matter who rules the country. The wounded refugee from the war who turns up late in the film as a reminder of the unseen conflict stands less for adult concerns than he does an answer to the yearning fantasies of Ana, the pre-teenage heroine. To Ana, the soldier is just as real and just as magical as the Frankenstein Monster, another lost soul whom she encounters in the vicinity of her parents' desolate Castillian home.

In 1940, Ana and her slightly older sister, Isabel, attend a traveling film show and are hugely impressed by James Whale's 1931 Frankenstein, a work which even penetrates their bee-keeping father's veil of obsession as he is distracted from his books by snatches of Colin Clive's ranting visionary dialogue dubbed into Spanish. Discussing the film, Isabel tells Ana that the monster is a spirit who can never die, whereupon many tiny details come to convince the girl that the spirit is close: a primitive anatomy lesson in which pupils slot wooden organs into the torso of an artificial man is a reminder of the creation of the monster, a large footprint in which Ana's tiny foot is dwarfed suggest Karloff's asphalt-spreader's boots, and the fleeing soldier—whom she unwittingly betrays to a quiet mob as dangerous as the torch-bearing peasantry of Universal's horror films—is another kindred spirit to the gentle, pained big baby of film and folklore.

The snippet from Frankenstein which we see is the still-powerful lakeside vignette between the monster and the little girl, which ends with his accidental drowning of her. This is the scene which is recreated in the eerily delicate finale as Ana's reflection in a pool ripples and is replaced by that of the monster, who gently joins her for a communion that ends not in death but an awakening. Choosing to inhabit entirely Ana's world, and never explaining any of the mundane or marvelous elements, Victor Erice only hints at what has passed between Ana and the monster and how it will affect her relationship with family and community, but young Ana Torrent's quite remarkable performance shows quite clearly how at odds this child is with her world. At the time of the film's release, Erice—who has not subsequently been a prolific director—said that he would like to return to Ana's story in 30 years, to see what manner of adult she became, suggesting that he too was mystified by the qualities Torrent brought to the role.

The rest of the cast seem locked into a slightly over-Bergmanesque rut—the father toiling amid his hives, the mother writing to an adopted child in France, the sister playing malevolent games with the cat and faking her own death. Ana, whose personality is as unformed as that of Karloff's creature, is far freer than these sad souls, and is the only person in the film who actually seems to be in motion. While they focus on their obsessions Ana is forever examining and being intrigued by things, allowing Erice to isolate the traces of life in his mostly poised still images. Ana resists being interpreted as a stand-in for all Spain, simply because her huge-eyed stare, which ranges across cinema from Karloff's heavy-lidded monster to Kubrick's star child, betokens too much unsettling individuality.

—Kim Newman

ET . . . DIEU CREA LA FEMME

(And . . . God Created Woman)

France, 1956

Director: Roger Vadim

Production: Iena-Films-U.C.I.L.-Cocinor; Eastmancolor, 35mm, CinemaScope; running time: 95 minutes. Released 28 November 1956, Paris. Filmed in St. Tropez.

Producer: Raoul-J. Levy; screenplay: Roger Vadim and Raoul-J. Levy; photography: Armand Thirard; editor: Victoria Mercanton; sound engineer: Pierre-Louis Calvet; production designers: Jean Andre with Jean Forestier and Georges Petitot; music: Paul Misraki

Cast: Brigitte Bardot (Juliette Hardy); Curt Jurgens (Eric Carradine); Jean-Louis Trintignant (Michel Tardieu); Christian Marquand (Antoine Tardieu); Georges Poujouly (Christian Tardieu); Jeanne Marken (Mme. Morin); Isabelle Corey (Lucienne); Jean Lefebvre (René); Philippe Grenier (Perri); Jacqueline Ventura (Mme. Vigier-Lefranc); Jean Tissier (M. Vigier-Lefranc); Jany Mourey (Young Girl); Mary Glory (Mme. Tardieu); Jacques Giron (Roger); Paul Faivre (M. Morin); Leopoldo Frances (Dancer); Toscano (René).

Publications

Script:

Vadim, Roger, and Raoul-J. Levy, "Et Dieu créa la Femme" (excerpts), in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 November 1962.

Books:

- Carpozi, George, The Brigitte Bardot Story, New York, 1961.
 De Beauvoir, Simone, Brigitte Bardot and the Lolita Syndrome, London, 1961.
 Alpert, Hollis, The Dreams and the Dreamers, New York, 1962.
 Frydland, Maurice, Roger Vadim, Paris, 1963.
 Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: The Personal Style, New York, 1966.
 Durnat, Raymond, Films and Feelings, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1973.
 Evans, Peter, Bardot: Eternal Sex Goddess, New York, 1973.
 Vadim, Roger, Memoirs of the Devil, New York, 1977.
 Crawley, Tony, Bebe: The Films of Brigitte Bardot, London, 1975.
 Frischauer, Willi, Bardot: An Intimate Biography, London, 1978.
 Vadim, Roger, Bardot, Deneuve, Fonda, New York, 1986.

Articles:

- Truffaut, François, in Arts (Paris), November 1956.
 Rivette, Jacques, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1957.
 Godard, Jean-Luc, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July 1957.
 Mardore, Michel, "Roger Vadim," in Premier Plan (Lyons), October 1959.
 Billard, G., "Ban on Vadim," in Films and Filming (London), November 1959.
 Burch, Noël, "Qu'est-ce que la Nouvelle Vague?" in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1959.
 "Two Actors," in Films and Filming (London), October 1960.
 "Nouvelle Vague Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1962.
 Durnat, Raymond, "B.B.," in Films and Filming (London), January 1963.
 Haskell, Molly, "Jean-Louis Trintignant," in Show (Hollywood), 20 August 1970.
 "Conversation with Roger Vadim," in Oui (Chicago), October 1975.
 Copie Zero (Montreal), no. 3, 1979.
 Mancini, M., "A Moved Feast: French Filmmakers in America," in Film Criticism (Meadville), no. 2, January 1983.
 Maslin, J., in New York Times, no. 137, 4 March 1988.
 McCarthy, T., in Variety (New York), no. 330, 9 March 1988.

Et ... Dieu créa la femme

Allen, M., in Film Journal (New York), no. 91, April 1988.
 Chase, D., “Close-ups: Roger Vadim,” in Millimeter (Cleveland), no. 16, April 1988.
 Harvey, S., in Premiere (Boulder), no. 1, April 1988.
 Kauffmann, S., “Stanley Kauffmann on Films: Stale Roles,” in New Republic, no. 198, 4 April 1988.
 Matthews, T., in Boxoffice (Chicago), no. 124, May 1988.
 Williamson, B., “Movies,” in Playboy, no. 35, May 1988.
 Beauchamp, M., in 24 Images (Montreal), no. 39, Fall 1988.
 Vincendeau, Ginette, “L’ancien et le nouveau: Brigitte Bardot dans les années,” in Cinémaction (Courbevoie), no. 67, March 1993.
 Review, in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 179, July-August 1995.

* * *

Conventional accounts of the nouvelle vague commence with the annus mirabilis of 1959, when the new directors Truffaut, Camus and Resnais swept the Cannes Film Festival. But the true beginning took place three years earlier, when ex-Paris Match journalist Roger Vadim, then 28, released his debut feature Et . . . Dieu créa la femme. Its initial succès de scandale was reflected at the box office, and for the first time independent producers opened their purses to the frustrated generation of the new French filmmakers.

In 1952 Vadim had married 19-year-old Brigitte Bardot. After working as assistant to Marc Allegret, he felt confident enough to direct a vehicle for her sullen, bitchy beauty. Producer Raoul Levy helped raise funds via ex-band leader Ray Ventura. German actor Curt Jurgens agreed to take a role and guarantee the obligatory international appeal. Jean-Louis Trintignant, then unknown, played opposite the provocative Bardot, and would soon have a well-publicized affair with her.

Vadim wrote the story, based on fact, of two fisherman brothers feuding over a girl in the remote town of St. Tropez. Bardot, nude, pouting, deceitful, embodied the popular public stereotype of dissident youth. Christian Marquand and Trintignant were the brothers, Jurgens the rich man fascinated by a woman he can’t buy. Pursuing his theories about the dramatic and erotic impact of color, Vadim set the tanned Bardot against white—sand, linen—to spectacular effect. Her appearance sun-bathing behind sun-dried bed sheets, and later at her own wedding breakfast wrapped in a sheet, were spectacular proof of Vadim’s skill.

Shrewdly shot in Eastmancolor and CinemaScope, Et . . . Dieu créa la femme sold speedily to international markets, its notoriety feeding Bardot’s fame and announcing to audiences everywhere that a new spirit was stirring in French cinema. Vadim’s career did not flourish, but Bardot’s did: in creating a character who followed her instincts in her contempt for money and for the sensibility of others, Vadim produced an emblem for the “Me Decade.”

Jeanne Moreau is unequivocal about the significance of Et . . . Dieu créa la femme and Bardot’s potency as a symbol. “Brigitte was the real modern revolutionary character for women. And Vadim, as a man and a lover and a director, felt that. What was true in the New Wave is that suddenly what was important was vitality, eroticism, energy, love and passion. One has to remember it was Vadim who started everything, with Bardot.” In 1987, Vadim re-made the film in a New Mexico setting with Rebecca de Mornay and Frank Langella. It was not a success.

—John Baxter

E.T.—THE EXTRATERRESTRIAL

USA, 1982

Director: Steven Spielberg

Production: Universal Pictures; DeLuxe color, 70mm, Dolby sound; running time: 115 minutes. Released June 1982.

Producers: Steven Spielberg and Kathleen Kennedy; associate producer: Melissa Mathison; production supervisor: Frank Marshall; screenplay: Melissa Mathison; photography: Allen Daviau; editor: Carol Littlestone; production designer: James D. Bissell; music: John Williams; special effects: Industrial Light and Magic; supervisor: Dennis Muren; E.T. created by: Carlo Rambaldi.

Cast: Dee Wallace (Mary); Henry Thomas (Elliott); Peter Coyote (Keys); Robert MacNaughton (Michael); Drew Barrymore (Gertie); K.C. Martel.

Publications

Books:

Kolker, Robert Phillip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Scorsese, Spielberg, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.
 Crawley, Tony, The Steven Spielberg Story, London, 1983.
 Short, Robert, The Gospel from Outer Space, San Francisco, 1983.
 Goldau, Antje, and Hans Helmut Prinzler, Spielberg: Filme als Spielberg, Berlin, 1985.
 Mott, Donald R., and Cheryl McAllister Saunders, Steven Spielberg, Boston, 1986.
 Smith, Thomas G., Industrial Light and Magic: The Art of Special Effects, London, 1986.
 Weiss, Ulli, Das Neue Hollywood: Francis Ford Coppola, Steven Spielberg, Martin Scorsese, Munich, 1986.
 Godard, Jean-Pierre, Spielberg, Paris, 1987.
 Sinyard, Neil, The Films of Steven Spielberg, London, 1987.
 Ebert, Roger, and Gene Siskel, The Future of the Movies, Kansas City, 1991.
 Von Gunden, Kenneth, Postmodern Auteurs: Coppola, Lucas, De Palma, Spielberg & Scorsese, Jefferson, 1991.
 Sanello, Frank, Spielberg: The Man, the Movies, the Mythology, Dallas, 1996.
 Brode, Douglas, The Films of Steven Spielberg, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1997.
 Perry, George, Steven Spielberg—Close Up, New York, 1998.
 Gish, Melissa, Steven Spielberg, Mankato, 1999.
 McBride, Joseph, Steven Spielberg, Cambridge, 1999.

E.T.—The Extraterrestrial

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 26 May 1982.
- McCarthy, Todd, "Sand Castles: An Interview with Steven Spielberg," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1982.
- Interview with Spielberg in Casablanca (Madrid), September 1982.
- Gartenberg, J., in Films in Review (New York), October 1982.
- Schupp, P., in Séquences (Montreal), October 1982.
- "The Making of E.T.," in Cinefantastique (Chicago), November-December 1982.
- Marsh, J., in Stills (London), November-December 1982.
- Amiel, M., in Cinema (Paris), December 1982.
- Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1982.
- Conn, R., in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), December 1982.
- Iversen, E., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), December 1982.
- Pede, R., in Film en Televisie (Brussels), December 1982.
- Strick, Philip., in Films and Filming (London), December 1982.
- Tessier, Max, in Image et Son (Paris), December 1982.
- Den Uyl, B., in Skoop (Amsterdam), December 1982-January 1983.
- Adair, Gilbert, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1982-83.
- Bartolone, A., Interview with Spielberg, in Filmcritica (Florence), June 1982.
- Lannes-Lacrouetz, M., and B. Philbert, in Cinématographe (Paris), January 1983.
- Marias, M., in Casablanca (Madrid), January 1983.
- Sammon, P. M., "Turn On Your Heartlight: Inside E.T.," in Cinefex (Riverside, California), January 1983.
- Tarnowski, J. F., in Positif (Paris), January 1983.
- Turner, George, and others, in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), January 1983.
- Vallerand, F., "Accords parfaits et dissonances," in Séquences (Montreal), January 1983.
- Zapiola, G., in Cinematoca Revista (Montevideo), January 1983.
- Martini, E., and others, in Cineforum (Bergamo), January-February 1983.
- Jameson, R. T., in Film Comment (New York), February 1983.
- Lewis, B., in Films and Filming (London), February 1983.
- "E.T. Section" of Filmcritica (Montepulciano), April 1983.
- Balzola, A., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), April 1983.
- Michalek, B., in Kino (Warsaw), April 1983.
- Richardson, M. A., "A Dream in the Making," in Cinefex (Riverside, California), April 1983.
- Deutsch, P., in Jump Cut (Berkeley), April 1983.
- Heung, M., "Why E.T. Must Go Home: The New Family in American Cinema," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Summer 1983.
- Benabou, R., "L'Erotisme anal dans le film E.T.," in Positif (Paris), November 1983.

- Horgas, B., in Filmkultura (Budapest), November-December 1983.
- Dassone, M. Marcone, in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), December 1983.
- “E.T. Section” in Movie (London), Winter 1983.
- Ledgard, M., in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), March 1984.
- Shumaker, C., “More Human than Humans: Society, Salvation, and the Outsider in Some Popular Films of the 1980s,” in Journal of American Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), no. 4, 1990.
- Bick, Ilsa J., “The Look Back in E.T.,” in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 31, no. 4, Summer 1992.
- Review, in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 181, November-December 1995.
- Cole, James, “E.T.: The Scenes Left Behind,” in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 38, 1997.
- Dursin, A., and J.H. Lee, in Film Score Monthly (Los Angeles), no. 2, 1997.
- Redman, Nick, “E.T.: The Extraterrestrial—The Signature Collection,” in DGA Magazine (Los Angeles), vol. 22, no. 2, May-June 1997.

* * *

In itself, E.T. would hardly concern us; if not entirely negligible (it manifests certain skills, and contains a few memorable turns of dialogue, such as the question of how one explains “school” to a “higher intelligence”), it has no greater claim on the attention than countless other minor Hollywood movies. It does demand consideration as a cultural phenomenon: not merely the film itself and what it signifies, but the commercial hype, the American critics’ reviews, the public response, the T-shirts, the children’s games, the candy advertisements. It represents a moment in American cultural history. The film is distinguishable from the Disney live action movies it otherwise so closely resembles only by virtue of Steven Spielberg’s evident commitment to his own infantile fantasy. Where the Disney films seemed more or less shrewd commercial exploitations of the child-audience, we have the sense here of a filmmaker infatuated with what he is doing. Just what difference that makes is open to argument: bourgeois society sets a high value on “sincerity,” regardless of what the possessor of that virtue is being “sincere” about. Suffice it to comment that the precise quality of Spielberg’s sincerity remains open to question. I am not convinced that it is entirely innocent and uncompromised.

E.T. belongs to the Reagan era as surely as the genuinely distinguished works of the period (the films of Martin Scorsese and Michael Cimino, or even of a minor figure like Brian De Palma) do not. It is an era profoundly inimical to serious art, especially within the field of popular culture. “Serious art” is, by definition, challenging and progressive; what is wanted now—after the upheavals of the 1970s, the era of Vietnam and Watergate, the era when every American institution was called into question and radical movements suddenly flourished—is reassurance, the restoration of the symbolic Father, preferably in a form that allows one simultaneously to believe and disbelieve.

The premise of E.T. is essentially the appearance of the “Other” within the bourgeois home. Roland Barthes suggests in Mythologies that bourgeois ideology has two ways of coping with Otherness: it either denies it, and if possible exterminates it, or converts it into a replica of itself. American civilization was founded upon the denial/extermination of the Other (in form of the Indians); during the 1970s the Other erupted in numerous forms—women, blacks, gays—demanding recognition. Now, in the Reagan era, Spielberg presents the Other in the shape of a lovable, totally innocuous little extra-terrestrial, who just wants to go home (to his own nuclear family?). The treatment of E.T. himself is shamelessly opportunistic for he becomes whatever is convenient to the development of the narrative from scene to scene: mental defective, higher intelligence, child figure, father figure.

The film is extremely sexist. Spielberg seems unable to conceive of women as anything but wives and, in particular, mothers. Apart from almost dying, the worst thing that happens to E.T. is being dressed in female clothes, an event which is shown to deprive him of his dignity. At the end of the film, as all-purpose friend, Christ figure and patriarch, he lays his finger on Elliott’s head to transmit to him his power and knowledge, but tells the boy’s younger sister to “be good.” (I have not yet found a woman who likes the film: the fantasy about childhood that it enacts is heavily male-oriented.)

Crucially, the cultural phenomenon presented in E.T. signifies a choice made by the critical establishment, the public, and the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, who nominated it for many Academy Awards even though they ultimately found in Gandhi an even more respectable and archetypal liberal/bourgeois recipient of honors. One must compare E.T. with the commercial/critical failure of the infinitely more interesting Blade Runner (released the same week) and its troubling and complex presentation of the Other. The most pertinent comparison remains, however, with the two It’s Alive films of Larry Cohen, which provide numerous suggestive parallels. Critically despised, they lack E.T.’s aura of expensiveness, an essential component of reassurance within the context of capitalism’s decline.

—Robin Wood

EVERY MAN FOR HIMSELF AND GOD AGAINST ALL

See JEDER FÜR SICH UND GOTT GEGEN ALLE

DER EWIGE JUDE

Germany, 1940

Director: Fritz Hippler

Production: Deutsche Film Gesellschaft; black and white, 35mm, documentary; running time: 78 minutes, other versions include a 67-minute print; length: 1753 feet, other versions include a 1830-foot print. Released 4 November 1940 in Uraufführung, Germany. Filmed in Poland and Germany, with library footage from many sources, including the United States.

Der ewige Jude

Scenario: Eberhard Taubert; photography: A. Endrejat, A. Hafner, A. Hartman, F. C. Heere, H. Kluth, E. Stoll, and H. Winterfeld; editors: Hans Dieter Schiller and Albert Baumeister; music: Franz R. Friedl.

Publications

Books:

Albrecht, G., Nationalsozialistische Filmpolitik: Eine Soziologische Untersuchung über die Spielfilme des Dritten Reichs, Stuttgart, 1969.
Hull, David Stewart, Film in the Third Reich, Berkeley, 1969.

Baird, J. W., The Mythical World of Nazi War Propaganda, Minneapolis, 1974.

Leiser, Erwin, Nazi Cinema, New York, 1974.

Welch, David, Propaganda and the German Cinema 1933–1945, Oxford, 1983; revised edition, 1987.

Ahren, Yizhak, Der Ewige Jude: Wie Goebbels Hetzte, Untersuchungen zum Nationalsozialistischen Propagandafilm, Aachen, 1990.

Articles:

Doob, L. W., "Goebbels' Principles of Propaganda," in Public Opinion and Propaganda, edited by D. Katz, New York, 1954.

Hoffman, Hilmar, "Manipulation of the Masses through the Nazi Film," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1965.

Filmstudio, January 1966.

Walker, G., "An Analysis of Der ewige Jude: Its Relationship to Nazi Anti-Semitic Ideas and Policies," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 4, 1980.

Welch, David, "Nazi Wartime News-Reel Propaganda," in Film and Radio Propaganda, edited by K. R. M. Short, London, 1983.

- Kimmel, Daniel M., "Goebbels' Work," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1986.
- Friedman, R. M., "Juden-Ratten," in Frauen und Film (Frankfurt), September 1989.
- Hornshoj-Moller, S., and D. Culbert, "Der ewige Jude: Joseph Goebbels' Unequaled Monument to Anti-Semitism," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon, United Kingdom), no. 1, 1992.
- Avisar, Ilan, "The Historical Significance of Der ewige Jude," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio & TV (Abingdon), August 1993.
- Hornshoj-Moller, S., "Kultfilm der Neonazis," in Medium (Frankfurt am Main), no. 3, 1994.
- Kracauer, S., "Program Notes by Siegfried Kracauer for Fritz Hippler's The Eternal Jew," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 19, no. 2, 1997.

* * *

Fritz Hippler's Der ewige Jude was an exemplary moment in the history of Nazi cinema. A dutiful Nazi Party functionary, Hippler was unrestrained by considerations of objectivity, balance, or even the sensibilities of the less fanatical members of his audience. Indeed, his virulent anti-Semitic excesses so repelled some German audiences that in a few cities the film attracted "only the politically active" segments of the populace.

Artistically, the film is a "black masterpiece" of the cinematic conventions of 1940; a German version of The March of Time style that included animated maps, falsely labeled stock footage, segments of feature films borrowed to make some ideological point, stills, decoupages of evocative bookjackets and headlines, and an omniscient voice-over narration.

The importance of Der ewige Jude lies not in its technique but in its brutal service to the cause of Nazi racism. Hippler, after reading law and sociology at Heidelberg, entered the German Propaganda Ministry, specializing in military films such as Westwall, Feldzug in Polen, and Sieg im Westen. On orders from Joseph Goebbels himself, Hippler in 1940 began an anti-Semitic film that, according to its official synopsis, would "fill the spectator with a feeling of deep-seated gratification for belonging to a people whose leader has absolutely solved the Jewish problem." In fact, it has been asserted that Der ewige Jude helped prepare the German people to accept the eventual policy of genocide inflicted upon Jews.

The controlling metaphor—the Jew as parasite in an otherwise healthy host—is found throughout the film in several forms, all of them designed to reveal to Germans the "true" Jew underneath the veneer of European culture that concealed Jewish parasitism. Jews are introduced as a foreign, swarthy, hook-nosed, untidily bearded, sullen presence that clogs the teeming streets of middle Europe. They haggle, squabble over food at the table, hoard with wealth, conceal it from tax collectors, and grow sleek and fat at the expense of good Germans. Their religion and culture are seen as cabalistic sources of secret powers.

Animated maps alive with pulsing, arterial tentacles extending outward from Palestine invoke a history of Jewish expansion into Europe. Even distant America offers no immunity from the spread of Jewish power. Stock shots of Wall Street and outtakes from the American movie The House of Rothschild throb with new meaning given them by the voice-over. The world seems in the thrall of a network of great Jewish banking houses whose interlocking pedigrees are traced in animated diagrams. Reinforcing the image of the Jew as international parasite, Hippler punctuates the film with cutaways to rats crawling out of sewers, plundering granaries, and scurrying pell-mell through the streets of Europe. So compelling was the imagery, the government reported the collective relief expressed by audiences at the appearance of Hitler at the end, comforting the nation with the news that Nazi race laws had saved the day.

The Nazi period of Hippler's life ended with his capture by the British in 1944. He escaped prosecution as a criminal when Allied tribunals failed to convict other filmmakers, notably Veit Harlan. After a process of "de-Nazification" Hippler served the American Army as a translator. In later life, he lived apart from cinema circles, earning a living as a travel agent.

—Thomas Cripps

EXOTICA

Canada, 1994

Director: Atom Egoyan

Production: Ego Film Arts and Miramax Films; color, 35 mm, Spherical; running time: 104 minutes; length: 2953 meters. Filmed in Toronto, Ontario; cost: $5 million (Canadian).

Producers: Atom Egoyan, Camilia Frieberg, Robert Lantos, David J. Webb (associate); screenplay: Atom Egoyan; cinematographer: Paul Sarossy; music: Mychael Danna, Leonard Cohen; editor: Susan Shipton; production design: Linda Del Rosario, Richard Paris; art direction: Linda Del Rosario, Richard Paris; costume design: Linda Muir.

Cast: Mia Kirshner (Christina); Elias Koteas (Eric); Bruce Greenwood (Francis Brown); Don McKellar (Thomas Pinto); Victor Garber (Harold); Arsiniée Khanjian (Zoe); Sarah Polley (Tracey); Calvin Green (Customs Officer); David Hemblen (Inspector); Peter Krantz (Man in Taxi); Damon D'Oliveira (Man at Opera); Jack Blum (Scalper); Billy Merasty (Man at Opera); Ken McDougall (Doorman).

Awards: Genie Awards for Best Art Direction/Set Direction, Best Cinematography, Best Costume Design, Best Director, Best Film, Best Screenplay, Best Supporting Actor (McKellar), and Best Score, 1994; FIPRESCI Award, Cannes Film Festival, 1994; Best Canadian Feature Film, Toronto International Film Festival, 1994.

Publications:

Script:

Egoyan, Atom, Exotica, Toronto, 1995.

Exotica

Books:

- Desbarats, Carole, Atom Egoyan, Paris, 1993.
 Weinrichter, Antonio, Emociones formales: el cine de Atom Egoyan, Valencia, 1995.

Articles:

- Banning, K., "Lookin' in All the Wrong Places: The Pleasures and Dangers of Exotica," in Take One (Toronto), no. 6, Fall 1994.
 James, Caryn, "Innocence Beyond the Erotic Glimmer," in The New York Times, 24 September 1994.
 Johnson, Brian D., "Exotic Atom: With Exotica, Atom Egoyan Has Become the Most Celebrated Canadian Film-Maker of His Generation," in Maclean's, vol. 107, no. 40, 3 October 1994.
 Dubeau, Alain, "Exotica: l'anti-catharsis canadienne," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 175, November-December 1994.
 Masson, Alain, and others, "Atom Egoyan," in Positif (Paris), no. 406, December 1994.
 Calhoun, John, "The New York Film Festival," in TCI, vol. 29, no. 1, January 1995.
 Winters, Laura, "Atom Egoyan Is Watching Us," in Interview, vol. 25, no. 3, March 1995.
 Maslin, Janet, "Bucking the System, but Still Part of the Buzz: Atom Egoyan May Have His Breakthrough in Exotica," in The New York Times, 5 March 1995.
 Harcourt, Peter, "Imaginary Images: An Examination of Atom Egoyan's Films," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 48, no. 3, Spring 1995.
 Kobel, Peter, "They Like to Watch," in Entertainment Weekly, no. 267, 24 March 1995.
 Edelstein, David, "Discovering Atom," in Vogue, vol. 185, no. 3, March 1995.
 Johnston, Trevor, "Atomic Energy," in Time Out (London), no. 1288, 26 April 1995.
 Romney, Jonathan, Tony Rayns, and Amanda Lipman, "Exploitations/ Everybody Knows/ Exotica," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 5, no. 5, May 1995.
 Wise, Wyndham, "The True Meaning of Exotica," in Take One (Toronto), no. 9, Fall 1995.
 Baber, Brendan, "Big Worlds in Small Packages," in Interview, vol. 27, no. 12, December 1997.

Jones, Kent, "The Cinema of Atom Egoyan," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 34, no. 1, January 1998.

Johnson, Brian D., "Atom's Journey: Canada's Celebrated Director Reveals the Rite of Passage Behind His Cinematic Obsessions," in Maclean's, 13 September 1999.

* * *

On the basis of Exotica alone, writer-director Atom Egoyan could rightly be called "the un-Hitchcock." Where Hitchcock takes the point of view of a particular character through whom the clearly told, well-defined plot is revealed, Egoyan is the objective observer, cutting back and forth between seemingly unconnected scenes and frequently leading the audience to make incorrect assumptions until, at last, the various strands start fitting together. Egoyan does not confuse for confusion's sake; in Exotica, form follows function, and by allowing viewers to draw their incorrect assumptions, he is illustrating that, whenever we first meet someone, we invariably draw the wrong conclusions because people are always much more complex than any set of assumptions we might make based on mere outward appearances. Egoyan is not so much concerned with revealing plot as revealing character, while dealing with such concerns as the universal need for a feeling of family, the need for sex (which in a way is an extension of the need for family), and the psychic contortions individuals undergo in order to feel whole.

The film begins with a customs inspector training a new employee. As the two look through a one-way mirror at Thomas (Don McKellar), a young man having his bags inspected, the trainer says, "You have to ask yourself what brought the person to this point. . . You have to convince yourself that this person has something hidden that you have to find." As the viewer soon discovers, every major character in the film has something hidden, including Thomas and his trainee. The film moves to the interior of Exotica, a gentlemen's club where strippers perform onstage, then do table dances for those willing to spend an extra five dollars. The beautiful young Christina (Mia Kirshner) comes onstage wearing a schoolgirl's uniform, and when she begins her table dance for the middle-aged, bearded Francis (Bruce Greenwood), most viewers make the same assumptions about the dynamic involved, assumptions that prove to be totally wrong. When Francis is seen paying another young woman while dropping her off in a seedy section of town, more assumptions can be drawn—the single discordant note being when Francis says to the girl, "Say hi to your dad." Other major characters include the strip club's pregnant female owner, Zoe (Arsinée Khanjian), and the club's emcee, Eric (Elias Koteas), who was once Christina's lover. How these various plot strands weave together tells volumes about all the characters involved.

The film brings together a number of ideas Egoyan had been toying with for years. As a youth he was involved with a girl he later learned was a victim of child abuse. In the film, Christina was abused, and her dancing is a parody of her own sexual identity as she attempts to convince herself that that part of herself which has been destroyed is suitable for mockery, and therefore trivial; otherwise it would be too painful to deal with. Egoyan was also fascinated by such awkward encounters as those between a table dancer and the man watching her, or between a father and the baby sitter he is driving home—a situation Egoyan has referred to as "the first encounter many adolescent women have with older men" and "fraught with sexual tension." In both cases there is little to be said, yet small talk seems mandatory because without it the tension, the weirdness of the situation, would become unbearable. Egoyan agrees with Andrei Tarkovsky's description of film as "sculpting in time," and one of the things that makes this film so intriguing is what he has chosen not to show. We see Eric and Christina before and after their relationship, but never during their relationship. We see the bizarre ritual that Christina and Eric repeatedly play out, but never how it evolved.

According to Egoyan, all the relationships in the film are defined by the exchange of money because money "makes tangible that which is too terrifyingly abstract otherwise." Asking a woman to dance at your table or to baby-sit your nonexistent child may be grotesque or pathological but, by putting a dollar amount on the act, it begins to seem as normal as anything else in a market economy. "It's a way of saying, 'Hey! This is quite normal, because I pay for it.'" And in this and other films, Egoyan has had an interesting slant on such "normal" jobs as insurance adjuster (in his film The Adjuster) or tax auditor or customs inspector (in Exotica). As Egoyan told the New York Times, "From the outside these may appear to be very banal, but they're jobs that are infused with all sorts of psychological needs. They involve digging into someone else's life, and they're a way of legitimizing what might otherwise be pathological behavior." All his characters demonstrate extraordinary impulses beneath mundane surfaces.

Egoyan's particular genius here is his ability to weave these and other interests and concerns into a coherent work of art that illuminates the human condition, while creating a film language unlike anything preceding it, perhaps helping the cinema to break further away from its written-word and theatrical-stage antecedents. Exotica won the International Critics' Prize at the 1994 Cannes Film Festival and top awards in Belgium and France; it swept the Genies in Canada; both Siskel and Ebert put it on their Top Ten lists; and it was also a commercial success, indicating that it may very well influence future filmmakers. Exotica shows how much a film's structure may be bent while remaining coherent and, more importantly, it suggests new structures for films far removed from mere storytelling—films that are fragmented and elusive, and therefore a better reflection of how we know and feel about the real people in our lives, as opposed to fictional characters. While simple structures may be optimal for relating plots, something more complex may be needed to relate character. As Egoyan himself has said, "There's nothing simple about representing a human being."

—Bob Sullivan

THE EXTRAORDINARY ADVENTURES OF MR. WEST IN THE LAND OF THE BOLSHEVIKS

See NEOBYCHANYE PRIKLYUCHENIYA MITERA
VESTA V STRANE BOLSHEVIKO

EYES WITHOUT A FACE

See LES YEUX SANS VISAGE

F

FACES

---

USA, 1968

Director: John Cassavetes

Production: Maurice McEndree; colour, 16mm; running time: 130 minutes.

Producer: Maurice McEndree; screenplay: John Cassavetes; photography: Al Ruban; editor: Al Ruban, Maurice McEndree; assistant director: George O'Halloran; art director: Phedon Papamichael; music: Jack Ackerman; sound: Don Pike.

Cast: John Marley (Richard Forst); Gena Rowlands (Jeannie Rapp); Lynn Carlin (Maria Forst); Fred Draper (Freddie); Seymour Cassel (Chet); Val Avery (McCarthy); Dorothy Gulliver (Florence); Joanne Moore Jordan (Louise); Darlene Conley (Billy Mae); Gene Darfler (Jackson); Elizabeth Deering (Stella).

Publications

Script:

Cassavetes, John, Faces, New York, 1970.

Books:

Adler, Renata, A Year in the Dark: Journal of a Film Critic 1968–69, New York, 1969.

Kael, Pauline, Going Steady, New York, 1970.

Sarris, Andrew, Confessions of a Cultist: On the Cinema 1955–1969, New York, 1970.

Kauffman, Stanley, Figures of Light: Film Criticism and Comment, New York, 1971.

Simon, John, Movies into Film: Film Criticism 1967–70, New York, 1971.

Kinder, Marsha, Close-up: A Critical Perspective on Film, New York, 1972.

Bowers, Ronald, in Magill's Survey of Cinema: Volume 2, edited by Frank Magill, Englewood, New Jersey, 1981.

Alexander, George, John Cassavetes, Munich, 1983.

Carney, Raymond, American Dreaming: The Films of John Cassavetes and the American Experience, Berkeley, 1985.

Gavron, Laurence, and Denis Lenoir, John Cassavetes, Paris, 1985.

Carney, Raymond, The Films of John Cassavetes: Pragmatism, Modernism and the Movies, Cambridge, 1994.

Amiel, Vincent, Corps au cinéma: Keaton, Bresson, Cassavetes, Paris, 1998.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 26 June 1968.

Austen, David, "Masks and Faces," in Films and Filming (London), September 1968.

Madsen, Axel, Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1968.

Dawson, J., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1968.

Gow, G., Films and Filming (London), December 1968.

Clouzot, C., Film Quaterly (Berkeley), Spring 1969.

Benoliel, B., "L'idéal du collectivisme," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), March 1992.

Nevers, C., Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1992.

De Bruyn, O., Positif (Paris), June 1992.

Carney, Ray, "Seven Program Notes from the American Tour of the Complete Films: Faces, Husbands, Minnie and Moskowitz, A Woman Under the Influence, The Killing of a Chinese Bookie, Opening Night, Love Streams," in Post Script (Commerce), vol. 11, no. 2, Winter 1992.

Levich, Jacob, "John Cassavetes: An American Maverick," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 2, 1993.

Hejll, A., "Nargangen Kamera," in Filmrutan (Sundsvall), vol. 36, no. 1, 1993.

Review, in Télérama (Paris), no. 2365, 10 May 1995.

* * *

An admirer of the stark cinema verité style of documentarians Lionel Rogosin and Shirley Clarke, actor-director John Cassavetes strived to achieve the same sense of in-your-face realism in his fiction films.

Cassavetes's modus operandi was to bring together a group of his committed actor-artist friends, hand them a script that served mainly as a blueprint, then let them cut loose before his camera, capturing their improvisational investigations of character like a roving news-reel photographer, shooting on nights and weekends over several months, even years, until he had a feature length film in the can.

The end product, typically, was a somewhat ragged, even amateurish, type of moviemaking in the technical sense—but a blow-out demonstration of the actor's art. Cassavetes' style of moviemaking, which he termed "actor's cinema" rather than "director's cinema," was to foster a creative environment that enabled his actors to do their own thing—and thereby surprise him, even though he'd written the script—with the behavioral tics, twists, and turns they revealed about his characters. In a sense, his actors were left free to unmask themselves through their characters, unleashing an emotional intensity rare in the Hollywood-style American films in which Cassavetes and his chums regularly made their living. As often as not, Cassavetes's actors, many of whom (Peter Falk, Ben Gazzara) were big name stars, gave the performances of their lives in his films—performances that often went unnoticed by most moviegoers as Cassavetes’s low-budget, independent features seldom received widespread circulation.

Faces

Faces, a tale of suburban angst and adultery, was an exception. It was a major hit. Faces wound up on many important film critics’ Ten Best lists and scored three Oscar nominations, two in the Best Supporting Actor and Actress categories (for Seymour Cassel and Lynn Carlin, respectively) and one for Cassavetes’s original screenplay. None of them won, but their accomplishment was no mean feat in the face of the competition Cassavetes’s $50,000 black-and-white film had that year from such films as Oliver!, 2001: A Space Odyssey, The Lion in Winter, and Rosemary’s Baby (in which Cassavetes had co-starred).

Faces was Cassavetes’s fourth feature as a director. He had previously helmed two films for the major studios, Too Late Blues (with Stella Stevens and Bobby Darin) and A Child Is Waiting (with Judy Garland and Burt Lancaster). Finding the studio system too restrictive for his semi-improvisational style, he opted to work outside that system, bankrolling his own films from his fees as an actor in big-budget Hollywood movies and using his friends as players (they were paid a percentage of the profits, if there were any, rather than a salary), as he had done with his debut feature, Shadows (1960).

Cassavetes financed Faces from his earnings in two Hollywood blockbusters, The Dirty Dozen and Rosemary’s Baby. He shot the picture over a four-year period with a hand-held 16mm camera, using his own home, the houses of his cast members and other readily accessible (i.e. inexpensive) locales. The first cut was six hours long, but Cassavetes and his editor reduced this to a releasable 129 minutes. He then had the film blown up to 35mm, the standard gauge for theatrical distribution, and launched a tireless campaign single-handedly to get the film noticed and acquired. Traveling the film festival circuit with the cans of film under his arm, and using his status as a popular movie star to trumpet his movie on talk shows from coast to coast, Cassavetes marketed Faces into a small but lucrative hit.

In addition to those already mentioned, the standout cast includes John Marley portraying the TV producer husband of Carlin who seeks solace from his stale marriage in the arms of a prostitute (played by Gena Rowlands, Cassavetes’s real-life wife and a ubiquitous presence in most of the actor-director’s handmade productions). Seymour Cassel’s sympathetic hippie, who picks up Carlin when she visits a discotheque with some girlfriends, then saves her from a suicide attempt brought on by her guilt over their affair, serves as the film's conscience.

There aren't a lot of laughs in Faces, but there is a lot of laughter—most of it on the verge of hysteria—as Cassavetes's eavesdropping camera relentlessly exposes, with power and precision, the layers and layers of suppurating emotional wounds and longstanding despair ripping apart the lives of his desperate middle-aged suburbanites.

—John McCarty

FANNY

See MARIUS TRILOGY

FANNY OCH ALEXANDER

(Fanny and Alexander)

Sweden, 1982

Director: Ingmar Bergman

Production: Cinematograph, for the Swedish Film Institute/Swedish Television STV 1/Gaumont/Personafilm/Tobis Filmkunst; Eastmancolor. Released for the cinema in a 189 minute version, 1982; also released as a 300 minute version in four parts.

Executive producer: Jörn Donner; screenplay: Ingmar Bergman; assistant director: Peter Schildt; photography: Sven Nykvist; assistant photographers: Lars Karlsson, Dan Myhrman; editor: Sylvia Ingemarsson; sound recordists: Owe Svensson, Bo Persson, Björn Gunnarsson, Lars Liljeholm; art director: Anna Asp, costume design: Marki Vos; music: Daniel Bell; special effects: Bengt Lundgren; laterna magica: Christian Wirsén; puppets: Arne Hogsander.

Cast: The Ekdahl Residence: Kristina Adolphson (Siri, Housemaid); Börje Ahlstedt (Carl Ekdahl); Pernilla Allwin (Fanny Ekdahl); Kristian Almgren (Putte); Carl Billquist (Police Superintendent); Axel Düberg (Witness); Allan Edwall (Oscar Ekdahl); Siv Ericks (Alida, Emilie's Cook); Ewa Fröling (Emilie Ekdahl); Patricia Gelin (Statue); Majlis Granlund (Vega, Helena's Cook); Maria Granlund (Petra Ekdahl); Bertil Guve (Alexander Ekdahl); Eva von Hanno (Berta, Helena's Housemaid); Sonya Hedenbratt (Aunt Emma); Olle Hilding (Old Clergyman); Svea Holst (Ester, Helena's Parlour Maid); Jarl Kulle (Gustav Adolf Ekdahl); Käbi Laretei (Aunt Anna); Mona Malm (Alma Ekdahl); Lena Olin (Rosa, New Nursemaid); Gösta Prüzelius (Dr. Fürstenberg); Christina Schollin (Lydia Ekdahl); Hans Strååt (Clergyman at the Wedding); Pernilla Wallgren (Maj, Emilie's Nursemaid); Emilie Werkö (Jenny Ekdahl); Gunn Wällgren (Helena Ekdahl); Inga Alenius (Lisen, Emilie's Housemaid); The Bishop's Palace: Marianne Aminoff (Blenda Vergéus, the Bishop's Mother); Harriet Andersson (Justina, Kitchen Maid); Mona Andersson (Karna, Housemaid); Hans Henrik Lerfeldt (Elsa Bergius, the Bishop's Aunt); Jan Malmström (Bishop Edward Vergéus); Marianne Nielsen (Selma, Housemaid); Marrit Olsson (Malla Tander, Cook); Kerstin Tidelius (Henrietta Vergéus, the Bishop's Sister); Theatre: Anna Bergman (Miss Hanna Schwartz); Gunnar Björnstrand (Filip Landahl); Nils Brandt (Mr. Morsing); Lars-Owe Carlberg, Hugo Hasslo, and Sven Erik Jakobsen (Glee Singers); Gus Dahlström (Props Man); Heinz Hopf (Tomas Graal); Maud Hyttenberg-Bartoletti (Miss Sinclair); Marianne Karlbeck (Miss Palmgren); Kerstin Karte (Prompter); Tore Karte (Office Manager); Ake Lagergren (Johan Armfeldt); Sune Mangs (Mr. Salenius); Per Mattson (Mikael Bergman); Lickå Sjöman (Grete Holm); Jacobi's House: Erland Josephson (Isak Jacobi); Stina Ekblad (Ismael); Mats Bergman (Aron); Viola Aberlé, Gerd Andersson, and Anne-Louise Bergström (Japanese Ladies).

Awards: Oscars for Best Foreign Language Film, Best Art Direction, Best Cinematography, and Best Costume Design, 1983.

Publications

Books:

- Jones, G. William, editor, Talking with Ingmar Bergman, Dallas, Texas, 1983.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, Ingmar Bergman, Paris, 1983.
- Dervin, Daniel, Through a Freudian Lens Deeply: A Psychoanalysis of Cinema, Hillsdale, New Jersey, 1985.
- Gado, Frank, The Passion of Ingmar Bergman, Durham, North Carolina, 1986.
- Bergman, Ingmar, Laterna Magica, Stockholm, 1987; as The Magic Lantern: An Autobiography, London, 1988.
- Steene, Birgitta, Ingmar Bergman: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1987.
- Cohen, James, Through a Lens Darkly, New York, 1991.
- Bjorkman, Stig, and Torsten Maans, and Jonas Sima, Bergman on Bergman: Interviews with Ingmar Bergman, Cambridge, 1993.
- Cohen, Hubert I., Ingmar Bergman: The Art of Confession, New York, 1993.
- Long, Robert Emmet, Ingmar Bergman: Film & Stage, New York, 1994.
- Tomqvist, Egil, Between Stage and Screen: Ingmar Bergman Directs, Amsterdam, 1995.
- Blackwell, Marilyn J., Gender and Representation in the Films of Ingmar Bergman, Rochester, 1997.
- Lloyd, Michaels, editor, Ingmar Bergman's Persona, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- Marker, L., and F. J., "The Making of Fanny and Alexander," interview with Ingmar Bergman, in Films and Filming (London), February 1983.
- Chaplin (Stockholm), February 1983.
- Jensen, N., "Fanny og Alexander og alle de andre i Bergmans univers," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), March 1983.
- Pym, John, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1983.
- Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1983.

Fanny och Alexander

Bonizto, P., and M. Chion, "Portrait de l'artiste en jeune mythomane: Bergman et Alexandre," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1983.

Bonnet, J.-C., and M. Lannes Lacrouz, in Cinématographe (Paris), April 1983.

Lefèvre, Raymond, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), April 1983.

Benayoun, Robert, and others, in Positif (Paris), May 1983.

Corliss, Richard, and W. Wolf, "God, Sex, and Ingmar Bergman," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1983.

Strick, Philip, in Stills (London), May-June 1983.

McLean, T., "Knocking on Heaven's Door," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), June 1983.

Solman, G., in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1983.

Quart, B., and L. Quart, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1983.

Giguère, A., in Séquences (Montreal), October 1983.

Timm, M., in Chaplin (Stockholm), December 1983.

Comuzio, E., and G. De Santi, in Cineforum (Bergamo), January-February 1984.

Fagiani, E., in Filmcritica (Florence), January-February 1984.

Pintus, P., in Bianco e Nero (Rome), January-March 1984.

Block, B. A., "Sven Nykvist, ASC, and Fanny and Alexander," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), April 1984.

Aghed, J., in Positif (Paris), March 1985.

Bergman, Ingmar, "Propos," in Positif (Paris), March 1985. Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol.16, no.3, 1988.

Werner, A., "Nocy dnia," in Kino (Warsaw), May 1991.

Salinger, E., "Fanny et Alexandre: Ingmar Bergman," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Hors-série, 1993.

Hayes, J., "The Seduction of Alexander Behind the Postmodern Door: Ingmar Bergman and Baudrillard's De la seduction," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), no. 1, 1997.

Jablonski, Witold, "W poszukiwaniu utraconej familii," in Kino (Warsaw), vol. 31, no. 359, May 1997.

* * *

Ingmar Bergman has said that he made Fanny and Alexander as his final film. It is an ingratiating and expansive film, ultimately a festive comedy, with its bleakest moments embedded between two extended family celebrations, the Christmas during which the father of Fanny and Alexander dies, and the christenings of the sister their mother had from her second husband and the cousin a maid conceived from their married uncle. In its scope, its concatenation of realism and fantasy, and its emotional reversals, the film owes something to Charles Dickens—perhaps to Our Mutual Friend, in particular, for a fire that rids the story of its villains and the intercessions of a benevolent stage Jew. More overtly, Bergman pays homage to Shakespeare and Strindberg, for the children of the title are part of the third generation of a theatrical family; their father collapses during a rehearsal of Hamlet in which he played the ghost, and dies shortly afterwards. (Throughout the film, he haunts Alexander.) The film ends with their grandmother reading the then-fresh script of Strindberg's A Dream Play.

Despite the title, Alexander is the unmistakable center of the film. Bergman's autobiography, The Magic Lantern, indicates that much of the film is based on his life; he has given Alexander a number of autobiographical traits, including a fascination with a magic lantern, and found an actor to portray him who looks remarkably like the pre-adolescent Bergman. Yet the film projects an idealized version of that childhood, as Dickens often did; it is, in fact, Bergman's richest instance of what Freud called "the family romance." Set in turn-of-the-century Uppsala, it chronicles the Ekdahl family, their friends, servants and lovers.

Plot is secondary to characterization. After the death of Oscar Ekdahl, his widow, Emilie, marries the severe and brutal Bishop Vergérus, taking Fanny and Alexander to live with her in the Bishop's house with his two sisters. The children suffer prolonged isolation in the attic of the house, and Alexander is severely beaten for lies and defiance. Eventually Isak Jacobi, a Jewish cabalist who had been the lover of Helena, the Ekdahl matriarch, spirits away the children in a magical chest. He hides them in his shop of puppets and occult wonders until a fire destroys the Vergérus household except for Emilie, who gives birth to a daughter and rejoins her children and the Ekdahls.

The universe of Fanny and Alexander is "the little world" (Oscar's phrase) of the theater, an affectionate environment that reflects the greater exterior world while defending itself against it. Thus Alexander's active imagination includes an intricate meshing of fantasies, visions, lies, theatricalizations, and magical violence. At the climax of the film Bergman ambiguously intercuts parallel scenes of the Vergérus home and its inhabitants consumed by flames with an encounter between Alexander and Isak's nephew, Ismael, himself ambiguously played by a woman, so that we can read the montage as merely simultaneous or sinisterly causal. As Ismael—whom Alexander visits in his locked room against Isak's warning—caresses him in a manner suggestive of anal intercourse, he encourages the frightened and pained boy to imagine the cruel death of his antagonist.

The film is 189 minutes long; a version in four parts ran as a television serial for a total of 300 minutes. It did not alter substantially the plot of the film; rather it showed more of the Ekdahl theater and enlarged the portraits of Alexander's uncles, the morose professor Carl, and the high spirited adulterer Gustav Adolf. It also included a parable, invented by Bergman but presented as a translation from the Hebrew by Isak, into which Alexander imaginatively projects himself. The published script of the film gives Fanny and Alexander a sister, Amanda, two years older. Its "Prologue" informs us that all three of Emilie's children from her marriage to Oscar were from different fathers, implying Oscar's impotence.

—P. Adams Sitney

FANTASIA

USA, 1940

Story Directors: Joe Grant and Ben Sharpsteen

Production: Walt Disney Productions; Technicolor, 35mm, animation, Fantasound; running time: 126 minutes, British version cut to 105 minutes, later versions cut to 81 minutes; length: originally 11,361 feet, cut to 9405 feet for British version. Released 13 November 1940 by RKO/Radio. Re-released every 5–7 years, beginning in 1946. Re-released in 1982 with soundtrack in digital audio. Filmed in Walt Disney Studios. Cost: $2,280,000.

Producer: Walt Disney; story developers: Lee Blair, Elmer Plummer, and Phil Dike ("Toccata and Fugue in D Minor" episode); Sylvia Moberly-Holland, Norman Wright, Albert Heath, Bianca Majolie, and Graham Heid ("The Nutcracker Suite" segment); Perce Pearce and Carl Fallberg ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice" segment); William Martin, Leo Thiele, Robert Sterner, and John Fraser McLeish ("The Rite of Spring" segment); Otto Englander, Webb Smith, Erdman Penner, Joseph Sabo, Bill Peet, and George Stallings ("Pastoral Symphony"); Martin Provinsen, James Bodrero, Duke Russell, and Earl Hurd ("Dance of the Hours"); Campbell Grant, Arthur Heinemann, and Phil Dike ("Night on Bald Mountain/Ave Maria" segment); directors: Samuel Armstrong ("Toccata and Fugue in D Minor" and "The Nutcracker Suite" segments); James Algar ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice" segment); Bill Roberts and Paul Satterfield ("The Rite of Spring" segment); Hamilton Luske, Jim Hangle, and Ford Beebe ("Pastoral Symphony"); T. Hee and Norman Ferguson ("Dance of the Hours" segment); Wilfred Jackson ("Night on Bald Mountain/Ave Maria" segment); animation directors: Samuel Armstrong ("Toccata and Fugue in D Minor" and "The Nutcracker Suite"); Bill Roberts ("The Rite of Spring"); James Algar ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice"); Hamilton Luske, Jim Handley and Ford Beebe ("Pastoral Symphony"); T. Hee and Norman Ferguson ("Dance of the Hours"); and Wilfred Jackson ("Night on Bald Mountain/Ave Maria"); musical film editor: Stephen Csillag; sound and music recordists: William E. Garity, C. O. Slyfield, and J. N. A. Hawkins; sound system, called Fantasound, designed especially for the film; art directors: Robert Cormack ("Toccata and Fugue in D Minor" segment); Robert Cormack, Al Zinnen, Curtiss D. Perkins, Arthur Byram, and Bruce Bushman ("The Nutcracker Suite" segment); Tom Codrick, Charles Phillippi, and Zack Schwartz ("The Sorcerer's Apprentice" segment); McLaren Stewart, Dick Kelsey, and John Hubley ("The Rite of Spring" segment); Hugh Hennesy, Kenneth Anderson, J. Gordon Legg, Herbert Ryman, Yale Gracey, and Lance Nolley ("Pastoral Symphony" segment); Kendall O'Connor, Harold Doughty, and Ernest Nordli ("Dance of the Hours" segment); Kay Nielson, Terrell Stapp, Charles Payzant and Thor Putnam ("Night on Bald Mountain/Ave Maria" segment); music director: Edward H. Plumb; music conductor: Leopold Tokowski (Irwin Kostal for 1982 release); music: selections include Bach's "Toccata and Fugue in D Minor"; Tchaikovsky's "The Nutcracker Suite"; Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring"; Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony"; Ponchielli's "Dance of the Hours"; Mussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain"; and Schubert's "Ave Maria"; special animation effects: Joshua Meador, Miles E. Pike, John F. Reed, and Daniel Leonard Pickely; animation supervisors: Fred Moore and Vladimir Tytla (“The Sorcerer’s Apprentice” segment); Wolfgang Reitherman and Joshua Meador (“The Rite of Spring”); Fred Moore, Ward Kimball, Eric Larsen, Arthur Babbitt, Oliver Johnson Jr., and Don Townsley (“Pastoral Symphony” segment); Norman Ferguson (“Dance of the Hours” segment); Vladimir Tytla (“Night on Bald Mountain/Ave Maria” segment); animators: Cy Young, Art Palmer, Daniel MacManus, George Rowley, Edwin Aardal, Joshua Meador, and Cornett Wood (“Toccata and Fugue in D Minor” segment); Arthur Babbitt, Les Clark, Don Lusk, Cy Young, and Robert Stokes (“The Nutcracker Suite” segment); Les Clark, Riley Thompson, Marvin Woodward, Preston Blair, Edward Love, Ugo D’Orsi, George Rowley, and Cornett Wood (“The Sorcerer’s Apprentice” segment); B. Wolf, J. Campbell, J. Bradbury, J. Moore, M. Neil, B. Justice, J. Elliotte, W. Kelly, D. Lusk, L. Karp, M. McLennan, R. Youngquist and H. Mamsel (“Pastoral Symphony” segment); J. Lounsbury, H. Swift, P. Blair, H. Fraser, H. Toombs, N. Tate, H. Lokey, A. Elliott, G. Simmons, R. Patterson, and F. Grunden (“Dance of the Hours” segment); John McManus, W. N. Shull, Robert Carlson Jr., Lester Novros, and Don Patterson (“Night on Bald Mountain/Ave Maria” segment).

Fantasia

Cast: Deems Taylor (Narrative Introductions).

Awards: New York Film Critics’ Special Award, 1940; Oscars, Special Awards (certificates), to Walt Disney, William Garity, John N. A. Hawkins, and RCA for Contributions to the Advancement of Sound in Motion Pictures, 1941; Oscar, Special Award (certificate), to Leopold Stokowski for his Achievement in the Creation of a New Form of Visualized Music, 1941.

Publications

Books:

Taylor, Deems, Walt Disney’s Fantasia, New York, 1940.

Field, Robert D., The Art of Walt Disney, New York, 1942.

Manvell, Robert, and J. Huntley, The Technique of Film Music, New York, 1957.

Stevenson, Ralph, Animation in the Cinema, New York, 1967.

Schickel, Richard, The Disney Version: The Life, Times, Art, and Commerce of Walt Disney, New York, 1968; revised edition, 1986.

- Bessy, Maurice, Walt Disney, Paris, 1970.
- Finch, Christopher, The Art of Walt Disney: From Mickey Mouse to the Magic Kingdoms, New York, 1973; revised edition, 1999.
- Maltin, Leonard, The Disney Films, New York, 1973; revised edition, 1984, 2000.
- Thomas, Bob, Walt Disney: An American Original, New York, 1976.
- Edera, Bruno, Full-length Animated Features, edited by John Halas, New York, 1977.
- Leebron, Elizabeth, and Lynn Gartley, Walt Disney: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
- Thomas, Frank, and Ollie Johnston, Disney Animation: The Illusion of Life, New York, 1982.
- Culhane, John, Walt Disney's Fantasia, New York, 1983.
- Bruno, Eduardo, and Enrico Ghezzi, Walt Disney, Venice, 1985.
- Mosley, Leonard, Disney's World: A Biography, New York, 1985; as The Real Walt Disney, London, 1986.
- Culhane, Seamus, Talking Animals and Other People, New York, 1986.
- Thomas, Frank, and Ollie Johnston, Too Funny for Words: Disney's Greatest Sight Gags, New York, 1987; revised edition 1999.
- Grant, John, Encyclopedia of Walt Disney's Animated Characters: From Mickey Mouse to Hercules, New York, 1998.
- Thomas, Bob, Building a Company: Roy O. Disney and the Creation of an Entertainment Empire, New York, 1998.
- Smith, Dave, Disney A to Z: The Updated Official Encyclopedia, New York, 1999.
- Solomon, Charles, The Art of Disney, New York, 2000.
- Articles:
- Variety* (New York), 21 August 1940.
- Robins, S., "Disney Again Tries Trailblazing," in New York Times Magazine, 3 November 1940.
- Variety* (New York), 13 November 1940.
- New York Times*, 14 November 1940.
- Time* (New York), 18 November 1940.
- Hollering, F., in Nation (New York), 23 November 1940.
- Ferguson, O., in New Republic (New York), 25 November 1940.
- Hartung, P. T., in Commonweal (New York), 29 November 1940.
- Gessner, Robert, "Class in Fantasia," in Nation (New York), 30 November 1940.
- Hollister, P., "Walt Disney, Genius at Work," in Atlantic (Boston), December 1940.
- Isaacs, H. R., in Theatre Arts (New York), January 1941.
- Peck, A. P., "What Makes Fantasia Click?," in Scientific American (New York), January 1941.
- Boone, Andrew R., "Mickey Mouse Goes Classical," in Popular Science Monthly (New York), January 1941.
- Haggin, B. H., in Nation (New York), 11 January 1941.
- Iwerks, Ub, in Popular Mechanics (New York), January 1942.
- Ericsson, Peter, "Walt Disney," in Sequence (London), no. 10, 1950.
- Fallberg, Carl, "Animated Film Technique" (series of nine articles), in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), July 1958 through March 1959.
- Hicks, Jimmie, in Films in Review (New York), November 1965.
- Zinsser, W., "Walt Disney's Psychedelic Fantasia," in Life (New York), 3 April 1970.
- "Disney Issue" of Kosmorama (Copenhagen), November 1973.
- Moritz, W., "Fischiner at Disney; or, Oscar in the Mousetrap," in Millimeter (New York), February 1977.
- Paul, William, "Art, Music, Nature, and Walt Disney," in Movie (London), Spring 1977.
- Canemaker, J., "Disney Animation: History and Technique," in Film News (New York), January-February 1979.
- Canemaker, J., in Millimeter (New York), February 1979.
- Coleman, John, in New Statesman (London), 30 March 1979.
- Stuart, A., in Films and Filming (London), April 1979.
- Andrault, J. M., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), November 1979.
- Prouty, Howard H., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Starburst* (London), vol. 3, no. 2, 1980.
- Mallow, S., "Lens Cap: Finding Fantasia," in Filmmakers Newsletter (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), March 1980.
- Braun, E., in Films (London), August 1982.
- Soundtrack!* (Los Angeles), September 1982.
- Adler, Dick, "Hippo's Revenge: A Behind-the-Cels Look at Fantasia on the 50th Anniversary of What They Called Walt's Folly," in Los Angeles Magazine, September 1990.
- Adler, Dick, "The Fantasy of Disney's Fantasia," in Chicago Tribune, 23 September 1990.
- Alexander, M., "Disney Sweeps the Dust off Fantasia at 50," in New York Times, 30 September 1990.
- Solomon, Charles, "It Wasn't Always Magic," in Los Angeles Times, 7 October 1990.
- Phinney, K., "Shot by Shot," in Premiere (New York), November 1990.
- Review, in Listener, vol. 125, no. 3197, 3 January 1991.
- Heuring, D., and G. Turner, "Disney's Fantasia: Yesterday and Today," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), February 1991.
- Magid, Ron, "Fantasia-stein," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 71, no. 10, October 1991.
- Barron, J., "Who Owns the Rights to 'Rites'?" in New York Times, no. 142, 22 January 1993.
- Review, in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 178, May-June 1995.
- Evans, G., "Disney Dishes New Look for Fantasia in 1998," in Variety (New York), no. 358, 6/12 February 1995.
- Lyons, M., "Fantasia 2000," in Cinefantastique (Forest Park), no. 9, 1998.
- * * *
- According to Deems Taylor, writing in 1940 (although the story was later denied by Disney sources), Fantasia first began as a comeback vehicle for Mickey Mouse after the Disney Studio had turned from modest cartoon production to large-scale animation features. Certainly Disney had used the Silly Symphony format to introduce additional cartoon figures—Pluto in 1930, the Three Pigs in 1933, and then Donald Duck in 1934, who went on to challenge Mickey's top billing. Also in 1934 Disney began work on Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, a considerable gamble that came to be regarded as "Disney's Folly," but went on to turn a profit of $8 million in its first release in 1937 and earned a special Oscar from the Motion Picture Academy. Pinocchio followed the success of Snow White, introducing Jiminy Cricket as an ingenuous narrator. At this point, then, in 1938, Disney began thinking about a new role for Mickey.
- Disney's solution was to make Mickey the lead figure of a special cartoon rendering of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice", a fairy tale that had been set to music by the French composer Paul Dukas. Needing musical advice, Disney broached the project to the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, who was interested not only in the Dukas/Mickey idea but also in extending the project to an animated concert feature. Disney then began thinking in terms of “The Concert Feature” that was to become Fantasia. Whether the idea to expand was Disney’s or Stokowski’s has also been disputed.

At any rate, Deems Taylor, the radio voice of the Metropolitan Opera, was brought in to provide further advice and to handle the narrative transitions among the concert film’s various “movements,” involving eight different musical compositions. Disney presumably saw the project as a challenging experiment in animated technique rather than an opportunity to use animation merely as a means of popularizing classical music for the masses. In the Bach Tocatta and Fugue portion, for example, Disney artists were encouraged to experiment visually and boldly, in ways never before imagined. This sequence, early in the film, signals its experimentalism, departing from the usual Disney style and moving in abstract directions, imitating the techniques of Oscar Fischinger, who was originally to direct that sequence but left the project before completing it, after discovering the studio had altered his original designs. Other experiments are elsewhere in evidence, as when the sound track is visualized through animation midway through the film, recalling the abstract experiments of Len Lye and anticipating those of Norman McLaren. More conventional Disney whimsy is elsewhere in evidence, however, and there is perhaps the danger of vulgarizing the music through the imposed visual patterns. In fact, the sequences are diverse and uneven.

The film has been criticized for its “ponderous didacticism” (the visualization of the “paleontological cataclysm” in the Stravinsky Rite of Spring sequence, for example, and the simplistic contrasts of the final sequences—Moussorgsky’s Night on Bald Mountain against Schubert’s Ave Maria, with Good triumphing over Evil in a finale of Christian tranquility) and praised for those sequences in which Disney contented himself with being Disney and avoided self-conscious attempts at being “artistic.”

Fantasia came to Disney at a time when risks were being taken. After the demonstrated success of “Disney’s Folly,” animation began on Fantasia early in 1938. The production cost $2,280,000, including $400,000 for the music alone. Disney began thinking in terms of wide-screen production, multiplane Technicolor, and “Fantasound,” representing a major technical innovation involving the use of stereophonic sound and employing a new four-track optical stereophonic system. The achievement of “Fantasound” was something of a compromise: according to Peter Finch, Disney “developed a sound system utilizing seven tracks and thirty speakers,” but the system was “prohibitively expensive” and only installed in a few theatres. The score was recorded at the acoustically splendid Academy of Music in Philadelphia.

For the first time, moreover, Disney became his own distributor with Fantasia, since, as Variety reported, the film was so different as to require a different sales approach. It premiered on 13 November 1940, at the Broadway Theatre in New York, and was not an immediate success. Its original running time, with an intermission, was about 130 minutes, later cut to 81 minutes. It was reissued in 1946, but it would only build its audience strength over time. By 1968, for example, it had earned $4.8 million in North American markets, more than doubling its original investment, and finally taking its place among the top 200 grossing films.

In musical terminology, a fantasia is “a free development of a given theme.” Disney’s achievement, though often impressive and no doubt ahead of its time, has nonetheless had its detractors.

Stravinsky was not pleased that his music had been restructured and that the instrumentation had been changed. “I will say nothing about the visual complement,” Stravinsky remarked, “as I do not wish to criticize an unresisting imbecility . . . “The film succeeds best when it is at its most playful—the hippopotamus ballerinas in the “Dance of the Hours” sequence, for example, which Richard Schickel has described as “a broad satirical comment on the absurdities of high culture.” The visuals for Beethoven’s Pastoral Symphony strain contrivedly for a mythic charm in an Arcadian setting populated by fabulous creatures. Far more interesting are the animated dances from Tchaikovsky’s Nutcracker Suite, and the whimsical treatment of Ponchielli’s “Dance of the Hours” or Mickey’s struggle with the dancing brooms in “The Sorcerer’s Apprentice,” the conceptual core of the picture. John Tibbetts has written that the results of Mickey’s “union with high art were questionable for some, just as Walt’s collision with the likes of Stravinsky, Beethoven, and Moussorgsky raised (or lowered) many a brow.”

Disney’s undertaking Fantasia brings to mind an artisan who has only a superficial knowledge of religion undertaking to sculpt a monumental pieta out of sand as the tide moves in, threatening to erode it. Some passers-by will no doubt pause to watch out of curiosity, but the spectacle will not for most of them constitute a conversion. If anything, Fantasia does not teach a musical lesson, but it often fascinates and delights the eye.

Reviewing Fantasia in 1940, Otis Ferguson called it “a film for everybody to see and enjoy,” despite its “main weakness—an absence of story, of motion, of interest.” Bosley Crowther was less harsh, remarking that the images often tended to overwhelm the music, but praising the film for its “imaginative excursion” and concluding that it was a milestone in motion picture history. Despite its sometimes elaborate pretensions and its many innovations, the boldness of its concept quite overrides the “disturbing jumble” of its achievement. It is, indeed, a “milestone” in the history of animated film.

—James Michael Welsh

FAREWELL

See PROSHCHANIE

FAREWELL MY CONCUBINE

See BA WANG BIE JI

FARGO

US, 1996

Director: Joel Coen

Production: Gramercy Pictures, PolyGram Filmed Entertainment, Working Title Films; color, 35mm; running time: 98 minutes; length:

Fargo

2732 meters. Filmed in Minnesota and North Dakota; cost: $7 million.

Producers: Ethan Coen, Tim Bevan (executive), Eric Fellner (executive); screenplay: Joel Coen, Ethan Coen; cinematographer: Roger Deakins; music: Carter Burwell; editors: Ethan Coen (as Roderick Jaynes), Joel Coen (as Roderick Jaynes); casting: John Lyons; production design: Rick Heinrichs; art direction: Thomas P. Wilkins; set decoration: Lauri Gaffin; costume design: Mary Zophres; makeup: John Blake, Daniel Curet.

Cast: William H. Macy (Jerry Lundegaard); Steve Buscemi (Carl Showalter); Frances McDormand (Marge Gunderson); Peter Stormare (Gaezar Grimsrud); Kristin Rudrüd (Jean Lundegaard); Harve Presnell (Wade Gustafson); Tony Denman (Scotty Lundegaard); Gary Houston (Irate Customer); Sally Wingert (Irate Customer's Wife); Kurt Schweickhardt (Car Salesman); Larissa Kokernot (Hooker #1); Melissa Peterman (Hooker #2); Steve Reevis (Shep Proudfoot); Warren Keith (Reilly Diefenbach); Steve Edelman (Morning Show Host); Sharon Anderson (Morning Show Hostess); Larry Brandenburg (Stan Grossman); James Gaulke (State Trooper); and others.

Awards: Cannes Film Festival Best Director Award (Coen), 1996; National Board of Review Awards for Best Actress (McDormand) and Best Director (Coen), 1996; Australian Film Institute Best Foreign Film Award, 1996; Casting Society of America Artios Award (John S. Lyons), 1996; Academy Award for Best Actress (Frances McDormand) and Best Writing, Screenplay Written Directly for the Screen (Ethan Coen and Joel Coen), 1997; American Cinema Editors Eddie Award for Best Edited Feature Film, 1997; Bodil Festival Award for Best American Film, 1997; British Academy Awards David Lean Award for Direction (Joel Coen), 1997; Writers Guild of America Screen Award for Best Screenplay Written Directly for the Screen (Coen and Coen), 1997; Screen Actors Guild Award for Outstanding Performance by a Female Actor in a Leading Role (McDormand), 1997; and many other awards.

Publications:

Script:

Coen, Joel, and Ethan Coen, Fargo, London, 1996.

Books:

Wood, Paul A., Blood Siblings: The Cinema of Joel and Ethan Coen, Austin, 1999.

Ashbrook, John M., and Ellen Cheshire, Joel and Ethan Coen, Harpenden, 2000.

Korte, Joel and Ethan Coen, Cambridge, 2000.

Articles:

Sante, Luc, "The Rise of the Baroque Directors," in Vogue, vol. 182, no. 9, September 1992.

Friend, Tad, "Inside the Coen Heads," in Vogue, vol. 184, no. 4, April 1994.

Robertson, William Preston, "The Coen Brothers Made Easy," in Playboy, vol. 41, no. 4, April 1994.

Lally, K., "Up North with the Coen Brothers," in Film Journal (New York), vol. 99, February 1996.

Dafoe, W., "Frances McDormand," in Bomb, no. 55, Spring 1996.

Probst, Christopher, "Cold-Blooded Scheming," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 77, no. 3, March 1996.

Biskind, Peter, "Joel and Ethan Coen," in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 9, no. 7, March 1996.

Fuller, Graham, "Do Not Miss Fargo," in Interview, vol. 26, no. 3, March 1996.

McCarthy, Todd, and Derek Elley, "Global Helmers Fill Croisette Coffers," in Variety (New York), vol. 362, no. 11, 15 April 1996.

Blake, R.A., "Whiteout," in America, vol. 174, 20 April 1996.

Simon, J., "Forgo Fargo," in National Review, vol. 48, 22 April 1996.

Francke, Lizzie, "Hell Freezes Over," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 6, no. 5, May 1996.

Andrew, Geoff, "Pros and Coens," in Time Out (London), no. 1343, 15 May 1996.

"Special Issue on Fargo," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), no. 456, November 1996.

Roman, Monica, "New York Crix Circle Takes Trip to Fargo," in Variety (New York), vol. 365, no. 7, 16 December 1996.

Probst, Christopher, "Exemplary Images," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 78, no. 6, June 1997.

Norman, Barry, "A Case of Knowing When to Go to Fargo," in Radio Times (London), vol. 294, no. 3839, 30 August 1997.

* * *

"This is a true story," reads the on-screen caption at the beginning of Fargo. Ethan Coen's introduction to the published script tells it rather differently: "The story . . . aims to be both homey and exotic, and pretends to be true." Either way, this teasing, typically Coenesque ambiguity is something of a red herring (since fiction, in the classic definition, is a lie that tells the truth) but it makes an apt introduction to a film where the only people who win out are those who make no pretense to being anything other than they are.

Fargo marks a significant tonal shift in the Coens' work. It shares several favorite black-comedy elements with their earlier films—the solemnly off-the-wall dialogue, the laughably inept yet lethal heavies, the snowball effect of a relatively minor act of deception spiraling disastrously out of control—but also for the first time sets up a center of normality to counterpoint the off-kilter eccentricities on display elsewhere. Some previous Coen films do provide a focus for our sympathies, such as the childless Hi and Ed (Nicolas Cage and Holly Hunter) in Raising Arizona, but that pair are themselves fairly advanced-state deranged. Fargo's Marge Gunderson (Frances McDormand), the heavily pregnant police chief, and her aptly-named husband Norm (John Carroll Lynch) present a picture of married life that's conventional to the point of stodginess, but sustained by a mutually supportive love.

Though Marge serves as the film's moral center, it's a full thirty minutes before she appears on screen. By then, the picture's been all but stolen by William H. Macy in his breakthrough role as Jerry Lundegaard, the hapless car salesman so desperate for money that he arranges to have his own wife kidnapped. With his wide, unhappy grin and paper-thin bonhomie ("You're darn tootin'!"), Jerry is visibly flailing on the edge of the abyss—and as so often happens in the Coens' tortuous world, the people he turns to for help are just as inept, and far less scrupulous, than he is.

Even in the rich gallery of Coen villains, the mismatched pair of Carl Showalter and Gaear Grimsrud stand out as relishably vivid. (A running gag is that none of the witnesses can ever describe this highly distinctive duo beyond saying they were "kinda funny-lookin'.") Right from the start it is clear that the teaming of the small, twitchy, voluble Carl (Steve Buscemi at his most weaselly) and the huge, menacingly taciturn Gaear (Peter Stormare) is headed for a particularly vicious meltdown. Gaear, whose name and demeanor suggest one of the less savory denizens of the Icelandic sagas, is another of those monstrous figures-from-the-id who recur in the Coens' films, close kin to the Lone Biker of the Apocalypse in Raising Arizona or Charlie Meadows in Barton Fink. He also seems to be blood-brother to Paul Bunyan, whose mad-eyed effigy we glimpse by the highway outside Brainard, carrying an axe much like the one Gaear eventually buries in Carl's neck. (Following through on these forestry impulses, he proceeds to feed his ex-partner into a wood-chipper.)

Embodiments of the destructive instinct at its most self-defeating, Carl and Gaear casually bump off anybody who irritates them or even momentarily incommodes them. The death of the luckless Jean Lundegaard, Jerry's kidnapped wife, rates just two lines—Carl: "The fuck happen to her?" Gaear: "She started shrieking, y'know." Against these lethal clowns Marge Gunderson initially seems a hopelessly inadequate opponent, with her waddling, pregnant walk and slow speech. (The Coens, themselves Minnesota-born, have fun with local Scandinavian speech-patterns; most exchanges consist largely of "Oh, yah?" "Yah.") But Marge, compassionate but not sentimental, combines her nurturing role with the tenacity of the tough cop whose accepted image she so little resembles. Carl, Gaear, and Jerry violate everything her down-to-earth common sense believes in, summed up in her remarks to the captured Gaear: "And for what? For a little bit of money. There's more to life than a little money, y'know. . . . And it's a beautiful day. I just don't understand it."

Marge's innate decency, and her comfortably affectionate relationship with Norm, provide Fargo with the core of warmth that was often lacking from the Coens' earlier films. The filmmakers also, for the first time, admit the intrusion of genuine grief in the reaction of Jerry's son Scotty to his mother's kidnaping.

Their next film, The Big Lebowski, features "Dude" Lebowski (Jeff Bridges) a character whose instinctive (if dope-hazed) humanity stands in contrast to the cheats, double-dealers, and thugs around him. Such elements seem set to add a deeper emotional investment to the Coens' work, without in the least detracting from their wit, inventiveness, and stylistic bravura.

—Philip Kemp

FARREBIQUE

France, 1947

Director: Georges Rouquier

Production: L'Ecran Français and Les Films Etienne Lallier; black and white, 35mm; running time: 100 minutes; some versions are 85 minutes. Released 11 February 1947. Filmed from about 1944 to 1946 on location at the farm Farrebique.

Producer: Jacques Girard; screenplay: Georges Rouquier, from an idea by C. Blanchard; photography: André Danton; editor; Madeleine Gug; sound: Lecuyer; music: Henri Sauguet; special effects: Jean Painleve, Daniel Senade, and Jean-Jacques Rebuffet.

Cast: The Owners of the farm of Farrebique and some of their neighbors as themselves.

Publications

Script:

Rouquier: Album de Farrebique, Paris, 1947.

Books:

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.

Armes, Roy, French Film Since 1946: The Great Tradition, New York, 1976.

Auzel, Dominique, Georges Rouquier: cinéaste, poète & paysan, Rodez, 1993.

Articles:

Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1946–47.

Revue du Cinéma (Paris), January 1947.

Cinéma Français (Paris), 15 February 1947.

New York Times, 24 February 1948.

New Republic (New York), 1 March 1948.

Time (New York), 15 March 1948.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), 30 April 1948.

Agee, James, in Agee on Film I, New York, 1958.

Bowser, Eileen, "New Acquisitions: Le Tempestaire and Farrebique," in Museum of Modern Art. Film Notes, (New York), 2 and 4 April 1978.

Weiss, J. H., "An Innocent Eye? The Career and Documentary Vision of Georges Rouquier," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1981.

Jeune Cinéma (Paris), January 1984.

Olive, Jean-Louis, "Farrebique, Biquefare ou les morceaux de la memoire," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque, no. 41, Winter 1984.

Berelowitch, Irène, and Jacques Siclier, "Le printemps revient toujours. Farrebique ou les quatre saisons: Biquefarre," in Télérama (Paris), no. 2252, 10 March 1993.

Auzel, Dominique, "Georges Rouquier, cinéaste, poète et paysan," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 170, March 1994.

Sorlin, Pierre, "'Stop the Rural Exodus': Images of the Country in French Films of the 1950s," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television, vol. 18, no. 2, June 1998.

* * *

The roots of the style which George Rouquier brought to full maturity with his first feature-length film, Farrebique, released in 1946, lie in a number of short documentary studies of rural crafts, such as Le tonnelier and Le charron, which the director had made during the Occupation years. In the immediate post-war years, Farrebique's picture of French farming life was hailed as a break with the past, its deeply-felt concern to present realist detail being contrasted with the escapist fantasy that was felt to characterize the cinema of the Pétain years. Certainly this aspect of the film remains impressive. The everyday activity of the farming family is precisely observed—the breadmaking, ploughing and harvesting, evening prayers, and trips to church or bistro—and forms the context for the film's fictionalized sequence of events. They include the grandfather's account of the family history, his death and the birth of a baby, the younger son's injury and engagement, and they are staged in a slightly clumsy fashion which is in perfect keeping with the film's strategy of presenting its story as a 'real' document. The understatement of joys and sorrows and the unemphatic playing reinforce this tone. But the film as a whole does not have any of the coldness or objectivity that such a stance might lead one to expect, for these family events are not presented neutrally but are fitted into what can be aptly characterised as a pageant of the seasons. The director views nature with true poetic intensity, stressing always its dynamic aspect, particularly in the long lyrical passage celebrating the coming of the spring. This vision allows the film to remain optimistic and affirmative despite the inclusion of such events as the grandfather's death, which can be seen as part of a rhythm of change and development. Though moving in itself, this death is merely part of the process of seasonal renewal and can be supplanted by the son's engagement and the promise of spring.

In the mid- and late-1940s, Farrebique was generally seen as belonging alongside René Clément's documentary drama La bataille du rail, about the French railway workers' efforts to resist the German occupiers, as an example of the postwar French realism which failed to develop on the lines of that emerging during these years in Italy. Comparisons with Italian neorealism are fruitful, for it is immediately apparent that Rouquier has not attempted to integrate rural life into a wider social framework. In Farrebique virtually the only contact with the outside world concerns the installation of electricity, and even this is treated as a comparatively minor incident and incorporated in the film's conception of change as part of a natural rhythm.

Certainly Rouquier offers none of the social analysis which characterises Luchino Visconti's La terra trema, a study of an equally isolated fishing community made some two years later. But while such an approach to Farrebique has great relevance and considerable value, relating closely to André Bazin's 1940s advocacy of realist styles, it can be seen in retrospect as somewhat limited. Bazin's formulation of the problematics of realism leaves out of account any consideration of political issues. Yet from today's perspective one of the most fascinating aspects of Farrebique is the way it questions the neat separation of Occupation years from the postwar renewal that underpins so many accounts of France in the 1940s. Planned during the Occupation, Farrebique reflects the all-pervasive influence of the Pétainist ideology of "work, family and fatherland" at least as strongly as it affirms a new postwar realist approach. Far from lessening the value and significance of Farrebique, this essential ambiguity makes it a key document for the re-examination of French culture that looks beneath the comfortable myths of Occupation and Resistance.

Farrebique

—Roy Armes

FATHER PANCHALI

See THE APU TRILOGY

LA FEMME DU BOULANGER

(The Baker's Wife)

France, 1938

Director: Marcel Pagnol

Production: Les Films Marcel Pagnol; black and white, 35mm; running time: 120 minutes, some sources list 110 minutes. Released 1938.

Screenplay: Marcel Pagnol, from Jean le Bleu by Jean Giono; photography: G. Benoît, R. Lendruz, and N. Daries; editors: Suzanne de Troye, Marguerite Houllé, and Suzanne Cabon; music: Vincent Scotto.

Cast: Raimu (Aimable Castenet); Ginette Leclerc (Aurélie Castenet); Charpin (M. de Monelles); Robert Vattier (Priest); Basac (Teacher); Charles Moulin (Dominique); Delmont (Mailletterre); Alida Rouffe (Marie); Maximillienne (Angèle); Maupi, Dullac, Blavette, Odette Roger, Castan, Maffre, and Charblay.

Publications

Books:

Sadoul, Georges, French Film, London, 1953.
 Armes, Roy, French Film, New York, 1970.
 Domeyne, P., Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1971.
 Beylie, Claude, Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1972.
 Castans, Raymond, Marcel Pagnol's m'a raconte . . ., Paris, 1975.
 Leprohon, Pierre, Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1976.
 Castans, R., Il était une fois Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1978.
 Pagnol, Marcel, Confidences, Paris, 1981.
 Castans, Raymond, and Andre Bernard, Les Films du Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1982.
 Beylie, Claude, Marcel Pagnol: Ou, Le Cinéma en liberté, Paris, 1986, 1995.

Pompa, Dany, Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1986.
 Bens, Jacques, Pagnol, Paris, 1994.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 12 October 1938.
 Greene, Graham, in Spectator (London), 24 February 1939.
 Whitebait, William, in New Statesman (London), 25 February 1939.
New York Times, 2 March 1940.
 "Adieu à Raimu," in L'Ecran Française (Paris), 3 October 1951.
 "Marcel Pagnol," in Current Biography Yearbook 1956, New York, 1957.
 "Souvenirs sur Raimu," in Figaro Littéraire (Paris), 7 September 1963.
 "Guiltry-Pagnol Issue," of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), 1 December 1965.
 Ford, Charles, "Marcel Pagnol," in Films in Review (New York), April 1970.
 "L'Adieu de Marcel Pagnol à Raimu," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1970.

La femme du boulanger

- Gevaudin, F., "Marcel Pagnol: Un Cinéaste mineur?" in Cinéma (Paris), June 1974.
- Harvey, S., "Pagnol, From the Source," in New York Times, 21 February 1988.
- Brisset, S., "Pagnol, cineaste de la Méditerranée," in Cinema 90, no. 470, October 1990.
- La Breteque, F. de, "Le goût pour la pédagogie et la didactique de Marcel Pagnol," in Les Cahiers de la Cinematheque (Perpignan), no. 54, December 1990.
- Faulkner, C., "Rene Clair, Marcel Pagnol and the Social Dimension of Speech," in Screen (Oxford), no. 2, 1994.
- Review, in Télérama (Paris), no. 2377, 2 August 1995.
- Bazin, A., "The Case of Marcel Pagnol," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), no. 3, 1995.

* * *

La femme du boulanger is a film which can stand as a summation of Marcel Pagnol's work in the cinema and of a certain style of 1930s filmmaking. It was a period in which the star and his or her attendant dialogue writer reigned supreme in French cinema. Despite the film's title, the sultry Ginette Leclerc has only a small role as the errant wife, but in compensation we are given Raimu at the height of his powers in a part shaped by Pagnol so as to give the maximum relief and humanity to the figure of a village baker deceived by his faithless wife, who runs off with a stranger. The plot could hardly be simpler: the husband now refuses to bake bread; the villagers have to join forces to "engineer" the wayward wife's return and acceptance by the baker.

In terms of Marcel Pagnol's work, La femme du boulanger, though it holds together remarkably well, is in many ways a hybrid, combining two divergent tendencies. The source of the film is a novel by Jean Giono, who had earlier provided the stimuli for the rural epics, Angèle and Regain. As with those films, La femme du boulanger breathes an authentic country atmosphere, with its open air meetings and sense of real village community. But here the epic qualities of Giono's vision are scaled down, and the village, though remote, is a microcosm of the city, with its social stratifications and religious differences. The performance of Raimu calls to mind the atmosphere of Pagnol's marvellous Marseilles trilogy—Marius, Fanny, and César—which the director and the star had completed just two years previously. This trilogy had its roots in Pagnol's writing for the stage, and it was essentially a studio work, in which the atmosphere of the Mediterranean port was summoned up through vivid dialogue and accent. Raimu's role in La femme du boulanger has the same verbal richness. These are speeches written to be performed—as in the theatre—and since Raimu was unhappy acting in the open air, many of them were restaged in the studio, giving the film its sometimes awkward combination of location and studio work. As always, the themes of Pagnol's work are simple, bordering on the melodramatic, but they are captured in dialogue of such verbal felicity, and shaped so cunningly as drama, that they hold the attention effortlessly, especially when—as here—they are set against a vividly drawn background.

The controversy which surrounded Marcel Pagnol's work in the late 1930s, the result of his enthusiastic welcoming of sound cinema as no more than a perfected means of recording and distributing theatrical works, has now subsided. His own work proved richer than the polemical positions which he adopted at the time. Despite his advocacy of the studio, he was in fact one of the first to record sound on location and take his players into the countryside around Marseilles. Formerly regarded as a marginal provincial figure, cut off from the mainstream of Parisian cinema, Pagnol was in fact consistently able to produce two or three films a year. That made him a major figure at a time when the major production companies had long since vanished and most films were made by ephemeral companies set to organise just a single production. Owning his own production and distribution companies, his own laboratories and cinemas, Pagnol created his films en famille in a uniquely personal atmosphere. La femme du boulanger, his last film of the 1930s, conveys perfectly the strengths of this spontaneous, uninhibited approach to production.

—Roy Armes

LA FEMME INFIDÈLE

(The Unfaithful Wife)

France, 1969

Director: Claude Chabrol

Production: Les Films La Boétie and Cinégay; Eastmancolor (print by Deluxe), 35mm; running time: 105 minutes, English version: 98 minutes; length: 2900 meters. Released January 1969, Paris. Filmed 1968 in and around Paris.

Producer: André Génovès and Georges Casati; screenplay: Claude Chabrol; photography: Jean Rabier; editor: Jacques Gaillard; sound: Guy Chichignoud; art director: Guy Littaye; music: Pierre Jansen; music conductors: André Girard and Dominique Zardi; costume designer: Maurice Albray.

Cast: Stéphane Audran (Hélène Desvallées); Michel Bouquet (Charles Desvallées); Maurice Ronet (Victor Pegala); Serge Bento (Bignon); Michel Duchaussoy (Police officer); Guy Marly (Police Officer Gobert); Stéphane Di Napoli (Michel Desvallées); Louise Chevalier (Maid); Louise Rioton (Mother-in-Law); Henri Mateau (Paul); François Moro-Giafferi (Frédéric); Dominique Zardi (Truck driver); Michel Charrel (Policeman); Henri Attal (Man in cafe); Jean-Marie Arnoux (False witness); Donatella Turri (Brigitte).

Publications

Script:

Chabrol, Claude, "La femme infidèle," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), May 1969.

Books:

Wood, Robin, and Michael Walker, Claude Chabrol, New York, 1970.
Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, and others, Reihe Film 5: Claude Chabrol, Munich, 1975.

La femme infidèle

Taylor, John, Directors and Directions, New York, 1975.
 Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: The Personal Style, New York, 1976.
 Monaco, James, The New Wave, New York, 1976.
 Magny, Joel, Claude Chabrol, Paris, 1987.
 Blanchet, Christian, Claude Chabrol, Paris, 1989.
 Austin, Guy, Claude Chabrol: Autoportrait, Manchester, 1999.

Articles:

Comolli, Jean-Louis, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1969.
 Baxter, Brian, "Claude Chabrol," in Film (London), Spring 1969.
 "Chabrol Issue," of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), May 1969.
 Dewey, Langdon, "Chabrol Rides the Waves," in Film (London), Summer 1969.
 Millar, Gavin, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1969.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), October 1969.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 13 November 1969.
 Wood, Robin, in Movie (London), Winter 1969–70.
 Allen, Don, "Claude Chabrol," in Screen (London), February 1970.
 Milne, Tom, "Chabrol's Schizophrenic Spider," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1970.
 Kernan, Margot, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1970.
 "An Interview with Claude Chabrol," in Take One (Montreal), September–October 1970.
 Legrand, Gérard, Michel Ciment, and J. Torok, "Interview with Chabrol," in Movie (London), Winter 1970–71.
 Nogueira, R., and N. Zalaffi, "Conversation with Claude Chabrol," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1970–71.
 Haskell, Molly, "The Films of Chabrol—A Priest among Clowns," in Village Voice (New York), 12 November 1970.
 Ebert, Roger, "This Man Must Commit Murder," in New York Times Biography Edition, 29 November 1970.
 Harcourt, P., in Film Comment (New York), November–December 1976.
 Anderson, S., "True Love and the Bourgeoisie," in Filament (Dayton), no. 2, 1982.
 Dennis, J., "Hitchcockian Influences on Claude Chabrol," in Filament (Dayton), no. 2, 1982.
 Jousse, T., and others, "Entretien avec Claude Chabrol," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 437, November 1990.

Berthomieu, P., and others, "Entretien avec Claude Chabrol," in Positif (Paris), September 1995.

Feinstein, H., "Killer Instincts," in Village Voice (New York), 24 December 1996.

Magny, J., "Questions de mise en scene," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Hors-serie, 1997.

* * *

Claude Chabrol's La femme infidèle is perhaps the director's most characteristic film: an extraordinarily spare thriller emphasizing the subtle psychologies of its few major characters. Although the film presents Chabrol's typical triangle—Charles and his wife, Héléne, who has taken a lover—the members of the triangle never all come together; and the film is organized very formally; one scene between Héléne and her lover, one scene between Charles and her lover, and many scenes between Héléne and Charles. The film is almost completely subtext; although the film's primary subject is the relationship between Charles and Héléne (and the sociopolitical implications of its failings), not one word ever passes between Charles and Héléne about her love affair or the problems of their marriage.

The indirectness of the film seems apposite, since Chabrol indicates that the violence which erupts so suddenly in the film is repressed beneath the apparently civilized surface of bourgeois society. Chabrol emphasizes those surfaces: the beautiful greens of the couple's landscaped garden, the shine on the silverware, the bouquets of flowers, the informal family grouping outdoors which is masked by a cheery blue canopy. True to his manner, Chabrol entirely eschews sentiment, and yet—although apparently cold and distant—condemns no one. If this witty, ironic film holds neither Héléne nor Charles completely responsible for her affair, it credits the act of violence the affair precipitates for the rekindling of the couple's passions for each other, as each suddenly sees the other in a new light. By the end of the film, Héléne is all too willing to cover up her husband's crime and lovingly accept the kind of transference of guilt typical of the Hitchcock films Chabrol so obviously admires.

There are very few emotional outbursts or expressions of feeling in the film; the murder of Héléne's lover, which comes unexpectedly; three choked sobs that Héléne gives when she discovers her lover has been killed; and one truly heartfelt embrace between husband and wife. Rather, the emotion, as repressed as the natural instincts of the characters, is displaced instead onto the decor; indeed, there are flashes of red throughout—Héléne's earrings, a bedroom wall, a beauty shop awning, a bright dress, a lampshade, a cabinet, and so forth. As usual for Chabrol, objects are consistently used as symbols; a white, aloof statue that Charles tries to cleanse of red blood and which stands, perhaps, for Héléne; a huge cigarette lighter, which represents the passion Héléne has transferred from her husband to her lover; and the jigsaw puzzle, put together by the couple's son, which seems to represent their marriage and/or the narrative.

The cinematography by Jean Rabier and the score by Pierre Jansen are impeccable and provocative. So too are the performances, especially by Chabrol's wife, Stéphane Audran, as Héléne (note the cool expressiveness of her beauty as she descends the stairs at the end of the film), and Michel Bouquet as Charles. A small but perfect film, La femme infidèle represents only one variation on the theme in a series of films directed by Chabrol in the late 1960s and 1970s in collaboration with Audran, Rabier, and Jansen.

—Charles Derry

FESTEN

(The Celebration)

Denmark, 1998

Director: Thomas Vinterberg

Production: Nimbus Film in collaboration with DR/TV and Swedish TV; color, 35mm; running time: 106 min. Released 19 June 1998, in Copenhagen. Cost: DKK 8 mio.

Producer: Birgitte Hald; Screenplay: Thomas Vinterberg and Mogens Rukow, from an idea by Thomas Vinterberg based on an authentic case made public on Danish Radio. Photography: Anthony Dod Mantle; Editor: Valdis Oskarsdottir.

Cast: Ulrich Thomsen (Christian); Thomas Bo Larsen (Michael); Henning Moritzen (Father); Paprika Steen (Helene); Birthe Neumann (Mother); Trine Dyrholm (Pia); Helle Dolleriis (Mette); Klaus Bondam (Toastmaster).

Awards: (Major awards only) Prix de jury, Cannes Film Festival; Danish Film Academy Award (Robert) for Best Director, Best Actor, Best Actress, Best Supporting Actress, Best Editor, Best Cinematographer, and Best Scriptwriter; Danish Film Critics Award (Bodil) for Best Director and Best Leading Actor; Fassbinder Award as European Discovery, European Film Academy Awards, 1998; Los Angeles Film Critics Award for Best Foreign Language Film; New York Film Critics Award for Best Foreign Language Film; Swedish Film Institute Award (Guldbagge) for Best Foreign Language Film.

Publications

Script:

Vinterberg, Thomas, and Mogens Rukow, Festen, København, 1998.

Articles:

Interview and review, in Positif (Paris), no. 455, January 1999.

Macnab, Geoffrey, "The Big Tease," in Sight and Sound (London), February 1999.

Matthews, Peter, review in Sight and Sound (London), March 1999.

* * *

When Lars von Trier, Thomas Vinterberg, Søren Kragh-Jacobsen, and Christian Levring signed the Dogma manifesto in 1995 their intention was to counter certain tendencies in contemporary cinema: cosmetic technical perfection, predictable dramaturgy, and superficial action. The various commandments of the Dogma manifesto, which might appear to be a straitjacket, were in fact conceived as a chance to concentrate the art of film on what matters most: the plot and the characters.

The Celebration, by Thomas Vinterberg, was the first Dogma film and from the very outset it was obvious that something extraordinary was afoot. The Celebration is a film born out of the happy moments when a director unites the combination of a good story and superb acting by every member of the cast into a film narrative which makes a tremendous impact with its palpitating editing, sensitively mobile camera, and striking sense of framing and composition.

The film is the story of a family party to celebrate a 60th birthday. It is attended by the birthday boy's three children, grandchildren, and sundry friends and relatives. When Christian, one of the three sons, starts his speech by thanking his father for raping him and his twin sister, who went on to commit suicide, the black comedy commences, with baroque farce alternating with excruciatingly painful revelations of stunted family relationships. Christian then tries to depart from the paralyzed company, who don't know whether it is a sickly inappropriate joke, but is persuaded by an old friend to stay and see his showdown to its conclusion. He returns to the dinner three times to maintain and elucidate his accusations, finally raising his glass to his father, "the man who murdered my sister."

Vinterberg moulds his story around the Aristotelian unities of time, place, and action, and composes it in blocks: arrival, before the party, the party, and the next day, with the conflicts of the night as a climactic epilogue. The night is an hour of truth for the doubting brother Michael, who now denies his father, beats him up in impotent fury, and refuses to let him see his grandchildren. It is a story and a form which might have called for an almost classical stage performance or been made as a theatrically played-through film the way Fassbinder made some of his best films. But Thomas Vinterberg uses the Dogma hand-held camera rule—and lightweight video equipment—and in his pursuit of his characters learned more from Cassavetes than Fassbinder. Thus the camera pursues the characters beyond the limits of modesty, does not stop when things get painful, but pinpoints and penetrates to the very core of the pain threshold. At the same time it seems omnipresent, capable of capturing the most revealing reactions of the characters and their most secret expressions. Using extremes of motion from room to room it either follows the characters or proceeds in choreographed movements towards or across their moves, thereby generating dynamic rhythm and furious intensity.

Vinterberg, whose graduation in 1993 at the age of twenty-four made him the youngest student to emerge from the National Film School of Denmark, demonstrated in his graduation film a unique talent for the film medium, for moving narrative in moving images, a talent he also demonstrated in his short fiction masterpiece, Drengen der gik baglæns (The Boy who Walked Backwards), about a boy who loses his brother and tries to come to terms with the pain. But in The Celebration, his second feature, he shows sharper teeth and a more mature bite in the tradition of realism in which Danish film is so rich.

At the same time the film is broad enough to avoid absolute villains and absolute victims, possessing the energy and humanity to form multifaceted characters, showing if not all, then at least a large number of their facets. Christian, who makes the speech, is not only a victim, but also a stunted, introverted man and cowed son, who tries to flee but then decides to stay and assume his role of embittered avenger, choosing with suicidal stubbornness to maintain his charges until it is no longer possible to reject them as a bad joke. When his dead sister's letter, read by his other sister, proves the ultimate trump card, we glimpse Christian's wan but triumphant smile of revenge. His brother, Michael, who has tried to stop Christian with all his might, and who is portrayed throughout the film as a lout, vicious in his racial prejudice towards his surviving sister's boyfriend—a racial prejudice which he gets the company to sing along to with disturbing ease—ends with the most bitter night of reckoning with his father.

The father, played by one of the most beloved personalities in Danish theatre, starts as the celebrated, successful patriarch, but ends as a rotten, worm-riddled apple nobody wants anything to do with. But his brief, dignified speech in which he acknowledges his guilt and asks for forgiveness allows him to assume some dignity in the moment of defeat. The film is an ensemble performance at the highest level, orchestrated with a virtuosity that means that the day of reckoning between father and son is reflected and faceted by the entire company, many of whom have their own little personal vignettes.

For good reason this film has aroused enthusiasm all over the world. The otherwise ominously well-worn incest theme is given a new lease on life by a film that casts its richly faceted light on a gallery of characters so human that we feel for and suffer with them.

—Dan Nissen

FEU MATHIAS PASCAL

(The Late Matthew Pascal)

France, 1925

Director: Marcel L'Herbier

Production: Cinégraphic Albatross/Films L'Herbier; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: English version is 192 minutes; length: 4617 feet. Filmed in Paris.

Producer: Alexandre Kamenka; screenplay: Marcel L'Herbier, from the novel Il fu Mattia Pascal by Luigi Pirandello; photography: René Guichard, Jean Letort, Bourgassof, and Berliet; art directors: Alberto Cavalcanti and Lazare Meerson.

Cast: Ivan Mosjoukine (Mathias Pascal); Marthe Belot (Maria Pascal, Mathias's mother); Pauline Carton (Scolastique Pascal, Mathias's aunt); Michel Simon (Jérôme Pomino); Marcelle Pradot (Romilde Pescatore); M. Barsac (Mariana Dondi Pescatore); Isaure Douvane (Batta Maldagna); Georges Terof (Gambler); Lois Moran (Adrienne Paleari); Philippe Hériat (Anselmo Paleari); Irma Perrot (Saldia Caporale); Jean Hervé (Térence Papiano); Pierre Batcheff (Scipion Papiano).

Publications

Books:

Arroy, Jean, Ivan Mosjoukine, Paris, 1927.

Jaque-Catelain présente Marcel L'Herbier, Paris, 1950.

Klaue, Wolfgang, and others, Cavalcanti, Berlin, 1952.

Sadoul, Georges, French Film, London, 1953.

Feu Mathias Pascal

Armes, Roy, French Film, New York, 1970.
 Burch, Noël, Marcel L'Herbier, Paris, 1973.
 Barsacq, Leon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.
 Brossard, Jean-Pierre, editor, Marcel L'Herbier et son temps, La-Chaux-de-Fonds, Switzerland, 1980.
 Canosa, Michele, Marcel L'Herbier, Parma, 1985.

Articles:

Theatre Arts (New York), April 1927.
 O'Leary, Liam, "Ivan Mosjoukine," in Silent Picture (London), Summer 1969.
 Blumer, R. H., "The Camera as Snowball: France 1918–1927," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1970.
 Burch, Noël, "Marcel L'Herbier," in Cinema d'Aujourd'hui (Paris), 1973.
Ecran (Paris), January 1976.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1976.
 "L'Herbier Issue," of Avant Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 June 1978.
 Fieschi, J., in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1979.

Milani, R., "Il cinema di Marcel L'Herbier: le forme evanescenti della realtà," in Filmcritica (Siena), vol. 37, no. 364, May 1986.
 "Marcel L'Herbier," in Film Dope (Nottingham), no. 35, September 1986.
 Review, in Variety (New York), 2 May 1990.

* * *

Marcel L'Herbier's Feu Mathias Pascal is a key work of French cinema of the 1920s, valuable both for its intrinsic merits and its representative qualities. It was a period of some uncertainty in the French film industry, but the very lack of any organized studio structure on the lines similar to those which had emerged in Hollywood offered filmmakers a rare degree of freedom. This freedom was exploited to the full by filmmakers such as L'Herbier, Abel Gance and Jean Epstein, all of whom produced highly personal works the experimental and innovative visual style of which continues to astonish even today.

Feu Mathias Pascal was made in conditions that the director has described as completely ideal, produced by his own Cinégraphique company in collaboration with the Société Albatros, founded three years before by the Russian émigré producer, Alexandre Kamenka. The highly talented group around Kamenka had considerable influence on the work of French-born filmmakers, and for this film L'Herbier had the advantage of the collaboration of two of the most gifted of the exiles: his star, the great silent actor Ivan Mosjoukine, and his designer, Lazare Meerson, who had arrived in Paris just one year before and was to have a crucial shaping impact on the development of French cinema over the next dozen years through his work with Clair and Feyder. The choice of subject matter points to the literary origins of filmmakers of this generation. Like Gance and Clair, L'Herbier had envisaged a career as a writer before turning to the cinema under the influence of the American films which began to be widely shown in France after World War I. Feu Mathias Pascal was the first work by Luigi Pirandello to be adapted for the screen, and it is clear from later accounts that the author's literary prestige was one of the motivating impulses behind L'Herbier's decision to undertake a production which was never likely to be more than a succès d'estime.

In terms of L'Herbier's own artistic development, Feu Mathias Pascal is remarkable for its unity and balance. The director was attracted by the challenge of creating a complex narrative structure, and for once the story is not simply a pretext for that play with the whole panoply of visual effects—superimpositions, masking, dream sequences and so on—so beloved of French filmmakers of the period. L'Herbier has not pushed his film towards psychological realism, however; he was evidently fascinated, rather, by the fantastic aspects of his picaresque hero's adventures. Mosjoukine's masterly performance and magnetic personality hold the film together, and the shifts and changes of Mathias's life offer full scope for the actor's virtuoso talents. In other ways—in the mixture of studio work and location shooting and the resultant combination of play with shadows and at times almost documentary-style realism—the film shows characteristic eclecticism of the kind which had reached its extreme point in L'Herbier's previous film, L'inhumaine.

The qualities of the story and performance made Feu Mathias Pascal one of L'Herbier's most accessible works and gave it its high reputation among traditional historians. Ironically it is precisely these factors that have to some extent worked against the film in current critical evaluations. The pioneering studies by Noël Burch, which have done so much to re-establish the director's status as a major silent film maker, prize L'Herbier's work for the alternative he offers, in a film like L'argent, to the dominant codes of Hollywood cinema, while Feu Mathias Pascal is in this sense one of the director's more conventional pieces of film narrative.

—Roy Armes

Screenplay: Louis Delluc; photography: A. Gibory and Lucas; decor: Becan.

Cast: Eve Francis (Sarah); Edmond Van Daele (Militis); Elena Sagrary (Orientale); Gaston Modot (Topinelli); Footit (Man in the Grey Hat); L. V. de Malte (The Drunk); Yvonne Aurel (The Woman with the Pipe); A. F. Brunelle (The Little Clerk); Solange Rugiens (Patience); Barral (Card-Player); Gastao Roxo (Colis); Lili Samuel (The Dwarf); Marcel Delville (Pompon); Noemi Scize (La Rafigure); Waroquet (Grimail); Leon Moussinac (Cesar); Bayle (Piquignon); Line Chaumont (Peche verte); Siska (Prunelle); Jeanne Cadix (Flora); Vintiane (Javette); Bole (Tonneau); W. Bouchgard (Alvar).

Publications

Script:

Delluc, Louis, Fièvre, in Drames de cinema, Paris, 1923.

Books:

Delluc, Louis, La Jungle du cinéma, Paris, 1921.

Amiguet, Philippe, Cinéma! Cinéma!, Lausanne, 1923.

Gance, Abel, Prisme, Paris, 1930.

Francis, Eve, Temps héroïque, Paris, 1949.

Tariol, Marcel, Louis Delluc, Paris, 1965.

Delluc, Louis, Ecrits cinématographiques, edited by Pierre Lherminier, Paris, 2 vols., 1985–86.

Articles:

“Delluc Issue” of Ciné-Club (Paris), March 1949.

Bianco e Nero (Rome), no. 8–9, 1953.

Image et Son (Paris), July 1957.

Francis, Eve, and others, in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 19 March 1964.

McCreary, E. C., “Louis Delluc, Film Theorist, Critic, and Prophet,” in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1976.

Régent, R., “Le Delluc: Un Prix de copains,” in Avant-Scene du Cinéma (Paris), 15 April 1981.

Abel, Richard, “On the Threshold of French Film Theory and Criticism, 1915–1919,” in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 25, no. 1, Fall 1985.

Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Autumn 1987.

Darrigol, J., “Un homme lumière, Louis Delluc,” in Mensuel du Cinéma, no. 14, January 1994.

* * *

It was Thoreau who said that the masses of men lead lives of quiet desperation. It is in the spirit of this pessimistic observation that Delluc assembles his motley collection of the world's misfits in a sleazy Marseilles bar. The original title of the film was La boue (The Mire) which didn't please, for some peculiar reason, the French film censor. Indeed, the film itself was subjected to his scissors. Such

FIÈVRE

France, 1921

Director: Louis Delluc

Production: Société Alhambra-Film; black and white. Released 1921.

a film was at the time an innovation and was to inspire a whole new genre in French cinema, typical of which were the films of Marcel Carné.

The action, apart from some shots of the harbour and bar exteriors, takes place within the barroom, giving it a unity and intensity. Its drama occurs within a short space of time. It draws heavily on its atmosphere, and the dramatic structure is spare and economic. The interaction of the characters is subtle and significant. Topinelli, the bar owner, is jealous of his wife Sarah, who is in love with the sailor Militis. There is also the sad introspective little oriental girl who seems to represent the ideal of beauty.

As the film opens we are informed that Sarah's lover, the sailor, has deserted her and she is now married to the brute Topinelli. There is an expectancy among the women. A ship has come into port from the Orient. The sailors arrive at the bar, including Militis, the former lover of Sarah. Exotic presents are displayed. Card playing and dancing are going on. There are rough play and scuffles. Sarah dances with Militis, who has brought with him a little oriental girl whom he bought in the Far East. Drunken tensions mount. Sarah and Militis awaken their former love for each other. A fight takes place between Militis and a customer who is attacking the little girl. In the melee Militis is killed by Topinelli who departs with the sailors leaving Sarah beside the dead body of her lover. The police arrive and arrest her. A tulip in a vase attracts the little girl. The film ends with the girl seated on the ground, the flower between her fingers, smiling with a sad frozen smile.

In the hands of Delluc Fièvre is more than a mere slice of life. He moulds his scene and characters to fit into a sustained mood throughout. He evokes their psychological reactions to events and by suitable lighting expresses their personalities.

As Sarah, Delluc's wife Eve Francis gives a beautiful performance, as she always does in the films of her husband and those of Marcel l'Herbier. There is an air of fatality about her which holds the centre of the action. The ubiquitous Gaston Modot as Topinelli is appropriately unsympathetic and brutal. Modot has been almost a trademark of French films from Gance to Buñuel. All the other characters are equally impressive.

It is not a very long film but within its frame Delluc has evoked an intense experience of life illuminated by his poetic vision.

—Liam O'Leary

FILM D'AMORE E D'ANARCHIA

(Film of Love and Anarchy)

Italy, 1973

Director: Lina Wertmüller

Production: Europ International (Italy); Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 108 minutes, some versions are 125 minutes. Released 1973. Filmed in Italy.

Producer: Romano Cardarelli; screenplay: Lina Wertmüller; photography: Giuseppe Rotunno; editor: Franco Fraticelli; sound:

Mario Bramonti; production designer: Enrico Job; music: Carlo Savina; songs: Nino Rota; costume designer: Enrico Job.

Cast: Giancarlo Giannini (Tunin); Mariangela Melato (Salomé); Lina Polito (Tripolina); Eros Pagni (Spatoletti); Pina Cei (Madame Aida); Elena Fiore (Donna Carmela); Isa Bellini; Giuliana Calandra; Isa Danieli; Anna Bonaiuto; Mario Scaccia.

Award: Cannes Film Festival, Best Actor (Giannini), 1973.

Publications

Script:

The Screenplays of Lina Wertmüller, translated by Steven Wagner, New York, 1977.

Books:

Michalczyk, John J., The Italian Political Filmmakers, New Jersey, 1986.

Dokumentation: Lina Wertmüller/Martin Scorsese, edited by Filmstelle Vseth/Vsu, Zurich, 1986.

Jacobsen, Wolfgang, and others, Lina Wertmüller, Munich, 1988.

Articles:

Delmas, J., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1973.

Rubinstein, L., in Cineaste (New York), no. 3, 1974.

Erens, Patricia, "Love and Anarchy: Passion and Pity," in Jump Cut (Chicago), July-August 1974.

Van Wert, W., "Love, Anarchy, and the Whole Damned Thing," in Jump Cut (Chicago), November-December 1974.

Gorbman, C., in Movietone News (Seattle), April 1975.

Jacobs, Diane, "Lina Wertmüller," in International Film Guide (London), 1977.

Sternborn, B., in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), April-May 1985.

* * *

Film d'amore e d'anarchia is Lina Wertmüller's fourth feature and the first work to bring her critical attention in the United States. The film reveals the influence of Federico Fellini for whom Wertmüller worked as an assistant director on 8½, and it incorporates most of the elements that were to become trademarks of the Wertmüller canon. From Fellini she inherited a tendency towards comic exaggeration, both in creating types and in producing broad performances. Typical to her own concerns are the thematic interest in sexual politics, frequently set against a political backdrop; commanding heroines, and flawed, vulnerable heroes.

D'amore e d'anarchia is framed by two scenes: the first depicts the childhood trauma of the peasant Tunin (Giancarlo Giannini). When Tunin's father, a rural anarchist, is shot by the police, the young boy assumes his father's mission to assassinate Mussolini. The second framing scene is his death in a Roman prison some decades later. The remainder of the film takes place in a Roman bordello where the adult Tunin meets Salomé (Mariangela Melato), an anarchist sympathizer, and Tripolino (Lina Polito), a young prostitute.

Film d'amore e d'anarchia

As protector and lover, Salomé provides Tunin with information that she extracts from a self-important client, Spatoletti, the head of Mussolini's secret police. Yet, gradually, Tunin falls in love with Tripolino. The climax of the film takes place on the day appointed for Mussolini's assassination. Tripolino hides the key to Tunin's bedroom; she hopes that by allowing him to oversleep, she will prevent both the deed and the punishment. She and Salomé fight over the "key" to Tunin's fate: a struggle between love and anarchy. Finally Tripolino succeeds in convincing Salomé that she should opt for personal happiness. But that is not to be; once Tunin discovers their collusion, he goes berserk, shooting widely at some policemen who have come to check the prostitute for venereal disease. The film ends with Tunin's execution, as the police repeatedly strike Tunin's head against the stone walls of his cell.

D'amore e d'anarchia is part of that outpouring of Italian films, released between 1969 and 1972, that examines the relations of individuals and institutions of authority, particularly during the Fascist period. Included in this group are Bertolucci's Il conformista and Strategia del ragno, Bellocchio's Nel nome del padre, and Visconti's La caduta degli dei. In contrast to her compatriots or the Greek Costa-Gavras (Z and The Confession, also released at this time), Wertmüller provides only minimal insight into the workings of political tyranny. Further, it is difficult to decipher her position from the evidence of the film. At the film's conclusion, a quotation from the 19th-century anarchist Malatesta cautions against assassination as a political expedient; it refers to assassins as saints as well as heroes. Yet the one clear message of the film remains the certain failure of political naiveté and the ineffectuality of individual action.

The film's most original moments are three lyrical interludes which crystalize mood rather than further plot; they demonstrate Wertmüller's ability to expose humor in the midst of dark circumstances. The interludes include a break-neck motorcycle ride through the Italian countryside; a series of seduction scenes as the prostitutes begin their day's business; and a filmic and poetic chronicle of a holiday that Tunin and Tripolino take before the final tragedy.

D'amore e d'anarchia is most memorable for its spirited performances; the lusty Salomé, the freckled and wide-eyed Tunin, the angelic Tripolino, and the bombastic Spatoletti. In addition, Giuseppe Rotunno's fluid camerawork, Nino Rota's music, and Wertmüller's exuberant scenario combine to create an overall impression of a fine Italian opera.

—Patricia Erens

FILM-TRUTH

See KINO-PRAVDA

IL FIORE DELLE MILLE E UNA NOTTE

(Arabian Nights)

Italy-France, 1974

Director: Pier Paolo Pasolini

Production: PEA (Rome), Les Productions Artistes Associés (Paris); Technicolor; running time: 155 minutes. (GB version: 128 minutes.)

Producer: Alberto Grimaldi; screenplay: Pier Paolo Pasolini; photography: Giuseppe Ruzzolini; editor: Enzo Ocone, Nino Baragli, Tatiana Casini Morigi; assistant directors: Umberto Angelucci, Peter Sheperd; art director: Dante Ferretti; music: Ennio Morricone; sound: Luciano Welisch; costumes: Danilo Donati.

Cast: Ninetto Davoli (Aziz); Ines Pellegrini (Zumurrud); Franco Citti (Demon); Tessa Bouche; Margaret Clementi; Franco Merli; Francesila Noel; Ali Abdulla; Christian Alegni.

Publications

Books:

Bertini, Antonio, Teoria e tecnica del film in Pasolini, Rome, 1979.
 Snyder, Stephen, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Boston, 1980.
 Bergala, Alain, and Jean Narboni, editors, Pasolini Cinéaste, Paris, 1981.
 Gerard, Fabien S., Da Accattone a Salò: 120 scritti sul cinema di Pier Paolo Pasolini, Bologna, 1982.
 Siciliano, Enzo, Pasolini: A Biography, New York, 1982.
 DeGiusti, Luciano, I film di Pier Paolo Pasolini, Rome, 1983.
 Greene, Naomi, Pier Paolo Pasolini: Cinema as Heresy, Princeton, New Jersey, 1990.

Schwartz, Barth D., Pasolini Requiem, New York, 1995.
 Gordon, Robert S., Pasolini: Forms of Subjectivity, New York, 1996.
 Rohdie, Sam, The Passion of Pier Paolo Pasolini, Bloomington, 1996.
 Rumble, Patrick Allen, Allegories of Contamination: Pier Paolo Pasolini's Trilogy of Life, Toronto, 1996.
 Baranski, Zymunt G., editor, Pasolini: Old & New: Surveys & Studies, Dublin, 1999.

Articles:

Bachmann, G., "Pasolini in Persia: The Shooting of 1001 Nights" in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1973–74.
Variety (New York), 29 May 1974.
 Delmas, G., Jeune Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1974.
 Amiel, M., Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1974.
 Allombert, G., Image et Son (Paris), September-October 1974.
 Martin, M., Ecran (Paris), October 1974.
 Rayns, T., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1975.
 Tellez, J. L., "La voluntad de narrar," in Contracampo, no. 15, September 1980.
 Beaulieu, J., "Arabian Nights," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 106, October 1981.
 Loshitzky, Y., "The Tourist/Traveler Gaze: Bertolucci and Bowles's 'The Sheltering Sky,'" in East-West (Honolulu), no. 2, 1993.
 Taviani, P., and V. Taviani, "Souvenir de Pasolini," in Positif (Paris), no. 400, June 1994.
 "La 'Trilogia della vita': 'Il Decameron,' 'I racconti di Canterbury,' 'Il fiore delle mille e una notte,'" in Castoro Cinema (Milan), no. 166, July-August 1994.
 Rohdie, S., "Pasolini's Third World," in Metro Magazine (St. Kilda West), no. 107, 1996.

* * *

Pasolini was one of the most idiosyncratic of all filmmakers, the strangeness and difficulty of his work arising from his commitment to contradiction: Arabian Nights (the crowning achievement of the trilogy begun with The Decameron and continued with The Canterbury Tales) opens with the quotation "The complete truth lies not in one dream but in several." The basis of this commitment was his refusal to abandon any of the diverse and partly irreconcilable influences that determined the nature of his art: Catholicism, Marxism, homosexuality, the urban slums (settings of his early novels), the peasantry (he wrote poetry in the Friulan dialect), neo-realism, an attachment to the fantastic and miraculous. While Arabian Nights seems as far removed as one can imagine from the subject-matter one associates with neo-realism (the attempt to capture both the external and internal realities of the contemporary moment), it remains remarkably faithful to the neo-realist aesthetic: the use of non-professionals, location shooting, spontaneity valued above polish or deliberation. The corollary of this is that when artifice is demanded by the subject-matter (the flight of the genie, Nureddin's encounter with the lion in the desert), the special effects are always patently visible, as primitive and naive as possible (cf. Jesus walking on the water in The Gospel According to St. Matthew).

It is the commitment to dramatizing (rather than attempting to reconcile or eradicate) contradiction that led Pasolini toward the experimentations with narrative that characterize his best work (Teorema, Medea, Salo). Nowhere is this more evident than in Arabian Nights, where the intricate interlocking of diverse tales seems motivated by the desire to juxtapose the several dreams that (taken in conjunction) might, if they cannot reveal, at least point toward, the complete truth.

Using the story of Nureddin and Zumurrud as a unifying thread, Pasolini contains six other stories (organized in two groups of three) within a five-part structure as follows:

Number one: Zumurrud (the “slave” who is allowed to choose her new “master”) chooses the young boy Nureddin because (a) he has beautiful eyes, (b) she senses his sexual energy, (c) he is not at all an authority figure, and (d) with him she can fully express, on equal terms, her sexuality.

Number two: The first trio of tales (read to Nureddin by Zumurrud): the beautiful woman seen bathing (scarcely even an anecdote); the three young men chosen by the older man to enjoy mutual pleasure; the wager between the elder couple about the relative strength of sexual attraction between a young man and a young woman.

Number three: Development of the Nureddin/Zumurrud story (Zumurrud drugged and kidnapped, subsequently mistaken for a man and made king of a city; Nureddin’s frantic search for her, and first two “diversions” with other women).

Number four: The second trio of tales: the princess’s dream; the story of Aziz and the mad Badur; the story of the two artisans. Unlike the first trio, these (a) are fully developed tales with a beginning, a middle and a resolution, (b) involve the fantastic and the supernatural, and (c) are not consecutive but intertwined: we reach a point where we are watching a story within a story within a story, from which Chinese box Pasolini works his way out to return us to. . . .

Number five: The conclusion of the Nureddin/Zumurrud story.

Each trio of stories has its own internal themes. The first three (brief anecdotes) are concerned with free sexuality and equalization: the wager of the third (and most developed) ends in a tie, the demonstration that female desire and male desire are equally potent. The interwoven tales of the second trio are all concerned with notions of Fate: two stories in which fate is shown to be inescapable are enclosed within a story in which fate is overcome. Further, the story of Aziz, Aziza and Badur stands in contradiction to the framework story of Nureddin and Zumurrud. They are linked by the dictum (itself a contradiction) that “fidelity is beautiful, but no more than infidelity.” In the Aziz tale the conflict leads to death and castration, but in the framework story fidelity and infidelity are reconciled: Nureddin, in his search for his beloved, can be led into countless delightful sexual diversions, but his fidelity to Zumurrud is always triumphant over them, and finally rewarded in a happy ending that plays on (in order to repudiate) sexual power-relations.

The acknowledgement and celebration of diversity is an aspect of one of the central drives of Pasolini’s work: the effort to rediscover a sense of the wonderful, the magical. In Teorema, the sense of wonder has been destroyed by the bourgeoisie and can be regained (very problematically) only through the liberation of sexuality; in Medea, the magical world of the opening is eroded by the growth of patriarchy and capitalism, until “Nothing is possible any more.” Of all Pasolini’s films, Arabian Nights comes closest to realizing the sense of wonder, through an eroticism purged of all contamination by the pornographic.

—Robin Wood

FIRES WERE STARTED

(I Was a Fireman)

UK, 1943

Director: Humphrey Jennings

Production: Crown Film Unit, with the co-operation of the Home Office, Ministry of Home Security, and National Fire Service; black and white, 35mm; running time: 63 minutes, some sources state 60 minutes. Released 1943. Filmed in London.

Producer: Ian Dalrymple; screenplay: Humphrey Jennings; photography: C. Pennington-Richards; editor: Stewart McAllister; sound recordists: Ken Cameron and Jock May; production designer: Edward Carrick; music: William Alwyn; musical direction: Muir Mathieson.

Cast: Officer George Gravett (Sub-Officer Dykes); Lt. Fireman Philip Dickson (Fireman Walters); Lt. Fireman Fred Griffiths (Johnny Daniels); Lt. Fireman Loris Rey (J. Rumbold); Fireman Johnny Houghton (S. H. Jackson); Fireman T. P. Smith (B. A. Brown); Fireman John Barker (J. Vallance); Fireman W. Sansom (Barrett); Asst. Group Officer Green (Mrs Townsend); Firewoman Betty Martin (Betty); Firewoman Eileen White (Eileen).

Publications

Books:

- Grierson, John, Humphrey Jennings: A Tribute, London, 1951.
 Hardy, Forsyth, Grierson on Documentary, revised edition, London, 1966.
 Lovell, Alan, and Jim Hillier, Studies in Documentary, New York, 1972.
 Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.
 Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.
 Sussex, Elizabeth, The Rise and Fall of British Documentary: The Story of the Film Movement Founded by John Grierson, Berkeley, 1975.
 Hodgkinson, Anthony, and Rodney Sheratsky, Humphrey Jennings: More Than a Maker of Films, Hanover, 1982.
 Jennings, Mary-Lou, editor, Humphrey Jennings: Film-Maker/Painter/Poet, London, 1982.

Fires Were Started

Vaughan, Dai, Portrait of an Invisible Man: The Working Life of Stewart McAllister, Film Editor, London, 1983.

Aldgate, Anthony, and Jeffrey Richards, Britain Can Take It: The British Cinema in the Second World War, Oxford, 1986.

Ellis, Jack C., The Documentary Idea, Englewood Cliffs, 1989.

Jennings, Humphrey, The Humphrey Jennings Film Reader, New York, 1995.

Articles:

Wright, Basil, "Humphrey Jennings," in Sight and Sound (London), December 1950.

Lambert, Gavin, "Jennings' Britain," in Sight and Sound (London), May 1951.

Vedres, Nicole, "Humphrey Jennings—A Memoir," in Sight and Sound (London), May 1951.

Mekas, Jonas, "Index to the Creative Work of Humphrey Jennings," in Film Forum (Mesdetten), 8 July 1954.

Dand, Charles, "Britain's Screen Poet," in Films in Review (New York), February 1955.

Strick, Philip, in Films and Filming (London), May 1961.

"Jennings Issue," of Film Quarterly (London), Winter 1961–62.

Millar, Gavin, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1969.

Belmans, Jacques, "Humphrey Jennings, 1907–1950," in Anthologie du Cinéma 6, Paris, 1971.

Bitomsky, H., "Über Humphrey Jennings und einige seiner Filme," in Filmkritik (Munich), November 1975.

Sharatsky, R. E., "Humphrey Jennings: Artist of the British Documentary," in Film Library Quarterly (New York), vol. 8, no. 3–4, 1975.

Anderson, Lindsay, "Only Connect: Some Aspects of the Work of Humphrey Jennings," in Non-Fiction Film Theory and Criticism, edited by Richard Barsam, New York, 1976.

Barrot, O., in Cinéma d'Aujourd'hui (Paris), February–March 1977.

Colls, R., and P. Dodd, "Representing the Nation: British Documentary Film 1930–45," in Screen (London), January–February 1985.

Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, "Humphrey Jennings: Surrealist Observer," in All Our Yesterdays, edited by Charles Barr, London, 1986.

Britton, A., "Their Finest Hour: Humphrey Jennings and the British Imperial Myth of World War II," in CineAction (Toronto), Fall 1989.

- Stewart, S., and Lester D. Friedman, "An Interview with Lindsay Anderson," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 16, no. 1–2, Fall–Winter 1991–92.
- Thomson, D., "A Sight for Sore Eyes," in Film Comment (New York), no. 29, March/April 1993.
- Williams, D., "Humphrey Jennings: a Sense of Consciousness," in Metro Magazine (St. Kilda West), no. 103, 1995.

* * *

Fires Were Started was one of the semi-documentary features produced in Britain during World War II by both the government Crown Film Unit and the commercial studios following the success of such prototypes as Target for Tonight (1941) and In Which We Serve (1942). This film combined the actuality of documentary (a recreated or composite and representative event portrayed by people who had actually been involved in such an event) with the narrative line and dramatic heighting of fiction.

Fires Were Started is about the work of the Auxiliary Fire Service during the dreadful German fire-bomb raids on London. It follows a new recruit through a 24-hour shift with one unit. During the day the men train and perform menial chores. Following dinner they briefly relax and their camaraderie and understated humor become fully evident. As the raid begins, they proceed to their perilous and exhausting work, on this occasion putting out a fire raging near a munitions ship docked along the Thames. Though one of their number falls from a burning building to his death, the fire is finally extinguished. The film ends with the burial of the dead fireman intercut with the munitions ship moving out to sea.

As was usual with the British wartime films, the emphasis is given to the togetherness of the British people (with the cast a cross-section of classes). The propaganda function of this particular film seems to have been to show the quality and courage of the brave men and women who were working to insure that Britain would withstand the enemy assault. The enemy remains offscreen, and none of the hatred is portrayed which might have seemed an appropriate response to the bombing; instead, the destruction is treated almost as if it were a natural disaster.

By using the device of the new recruit, Jennings can let us see and learn not only about the functioning of this fire-fighting service but also about the diverse and likable personalities it brings together. When the raid begins, we are able to follow, without aid of commentary, the tactics of the fire-fighters through their actions and conversations; the phone calls from headquarters; the maps with pins stuck in them; the chalked lists of equipment. Among other things, Fires Were Started is a model of teaching without didacticism.

But where its true greatness lies is in the way it simultaneously informs, persuades, and moves us. In this film Jennings goes beyond other of the semi-documentaries in differentiating and developing the characters of his non-actor firemen. Besides being very skillful at narrative, Jennings was a visual-aural poet who captured the precise image for a feeling, which also contained symbolic reverberations of English tradition and wartime exigencies—a poet who offered the exact words men might have spoken and even the songs they might have sung in the circumstances. The mood of this film may have well matched the mood of its wartime audience. It has lasted as a supplement to the national memory of what wartime England felt like.

—Jack C. Ellis

FIREWORKS

See HANA-BI

THE FIRST CHARGE OF THE MACHETE

See LA PRIMERA CARGA AL MACHETE

FISTS IN THE POCKET

See I PUGNI IN TASCA

FIVE EASY PIECES

USA, 1970

Director: Bob Rafelson

Production: B.B.S.; Technicolor; running time: 98 minutes; length: 8,828 feet. Released September 1970.

Executive producer: Bert Schneider; producers: Bob Rafelson, Richard Wechsler; screenplay: Adrien Joyce, from a story by Joyce, and Bob Rafelson; assistant director: Sheldon Schrager; photography: Laszlo Kovaks; editors: Christopher Holmes, Gerald Sheppard; sound recordist: Charles Knight; art director: Toby Rafelson.

Cast: Jack Nicholson (Robert Eroica Dupea); Karen Black (Rayette Dipesto); Lois Smith (Partita Dupea); Susan Anspach (Catherine Van Ost); Billy "Green" Bush (Elton); Fannie Flagg (Stoney); Ralph Waite (Carl Fidelio Dupea); Helena Kallianiotis (Palm Apodaca); Toni Basil (Terry Grouse); Sally Ann Struthers (Betty); Marlena Macguire (Twinky); John Ryan (Spicer); Irene Dailey (Samia Glavia); Lorna Thayer (Waitress); Richard Stahl (Recording Engineer); William Challee (Nicholas Dupea).

Publications

Books:

Crane, Robert David, and Christopher Fryer, Jack Nicholson—Face to Face, New York, 1975.

Braithwaite, Bruce, The Films of Jack Nicholson, Farncombe, 1977.

Downing, David, Jack Nicholson, London, 1983; New York, 1984.

Boyer, Jay, Bob Rafelson: Film Director, Bristol, 1996.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 16 September 1970.

Motion Picture Herald (New York), 23 September 1970.

Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1970–71.

Mundy, Robert, in Cinema (Beverly Hills), Spring 1971.

Pirie, David, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1971.

Snoding, Clifton, in Films and Filming (London), May 1971.

Five Easy Pieces

Martin, Marcel, in Cinéma (Paris), June 1971.

Farber, Stephen, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1971.

Campbell, Gregg M., "Beethoven, Chopin, and Tammy Wynette: Heroines and Archetypes in Five Easy Pieces," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), Summer 1974.

Cohen, Mitchell, "The Corporate Style of BBS: Seven Intricate Pieces," in Take One (Montreal), Winter 1974–75.

Thousand Eyes Magazine, June 1976.

Carcassone, P., "Bob Rafelson," in Cinématographe (Paris), November 1979.

Combs, Richard, and John Pym, "Prodigal's Progress: An Interview with Bob Rafelson," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1981.

King, Norman, "Mersault Goes West: Five Easy Pieces and Art Cinema," in Framework (Norwich), no. 20, 1983.

Grimes, Teresa, "BBS: Auspicious Beginnings, Open Endings," in Movie (London), Winter 1986.

Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 1 October 1987.

Mongin, O., "Le crepuscule des emotions," in Esprit, no. 10, October 1989.

Seven, M., "Letters: Toast the Screenwriter, Not the Actor," in New York Times, 20 October 1989.

Norman, Barry, in Radio Times (London), 17 September 1994.

Premiere (Boulder), no. 9, November 1995.

Laderman, D., "What a Trip: The Road Film and American Culture," in Journal of Film and Video, no. 1/2, 1996.

Floyd, Nigel, "Blood Brothers," in Time Out (London), no. 1385, 5 March 1997.

* * *

In many ways Five Easy Pieces marks the end of the 1960s, a decade captured best in Easy Rider, another film in which Jack Nicholson appeared. The youthful drugged dropouts of the earlier film are succeeded in Five Easy Pieces by an older dropout, one who has abandoned the world of classical music to find himself in the southern California oil fields. Bobby Dupea's new, assumed identity, evidence that he is not "really" an oil rigger, consists of a phoney southern accent and Rayette (Karen Black), a "country woman" he has impregnated. Fleeing again from responsibility, Bobby journeys to Los Angeles—his travels mirror his psychological journey—and learns from his concert-pianist sister that their father has suffered a stroke and is incapacitated at the family home in Washington. When Bobby and Rayette, whom he cannot escape, return to his home, the trip is literal and symbolic, for here he must confront his past.

The “homecoming” is a disaster, for his past is his present: Carl Fidelio Dupea, his brother, is an uptight classical musician; his invalid father is still an autocrat; and his sister subscribes unthinkingly to the family’s bourgeois cultural values. In effect, the family remains the society Bobby has rejected. Attracted to his brother’s fiancée, Catherine Van Ost (Susan Anspach), Bobby seduces her, partly through his accomplished playing of a Chopin prelude. Catherine, however, will not leave with him when he again flees from his past, and after he successfully evades Rayette, a solitary Bobby continues his self-destructive northward journey.

Because of Nicholson’s charisma, audiences overlooked Bobby’s entertaining but indulgent tantrums and his ranting invectives against rigidity and conformity (behaviors Nicholson is particularly adept at portraying). The most memorable scene from the film is Bobby’s manic verbal attack on the waitress, a scene at once amusing and cruel. Audiences identify and empathize with the male protagonist, who expresses the anger they share and who does not alienate them because his irresponsibility and selfishness (later expressed by Nicholson in One Flew over the Cuckoo’s Nest) is so engagingly expressed. Bobby’s treatment of Rayette is similarly ignored by an audience which regards country culture and country folk with amused contempt; the cultivated, talented pianist is simply too good for the likes of Rayette.

Fortunately, the film also provides another reading, one which questions easy assumptions about the male chauvinism of the film. The title Five Easy Pieces refers to a book of music which piano students must master before going on to more complex compositions, and it also suggests, through the Chopin seduction linking music and sex, Bobby’s sexual conquests. If he must similarly know himself before he can confront life, then Bobby is only an accomplished pianist and womanizer, not a master of his life in pursuit of the truth. He is a drifter whose northern journey, without the coat he has given away, will culminate in death.

Five Easy Pieces concerns cultural clashes, which are reflected in the classical music associated with the Dupeas, which Bobby has mastered, and the country sound track sung by Tammy Wynette (as in Rayette), but Adrien Joyce’s screenplay (based on a story she and director Rafelson wrote) does not insist on the superiority of either class. There are real people who do know themselves and conduct themselves with dignity in both classes: Bobby’s friend Elton, Rayette and Catherine. Like Bobby, Catherine recognizes hypocrisy and corruption; unlike Bobby, she realizes that she cannot save herself through sex, flight, or power. She will remain true to her values and her work, rather than retreat through alienation and nihilism.

Five Easy Pieces has been compared to Truffaut’s Shoot the Piano Player, for both concern dropouts from the world of classical music; but unlike Bobby, who plays on a moving van in a traffic jam or as a foreplay to sex, Charlie Kohler continues to play the piano. Robert Eroica Dupea (the Eroica is the Beethoven work dedicated to Napoleon, whose promise also lapsed into ego) becomes another contemporary American male protagonist whose life is characterized by lack of identity, impotence, and despair. When he resumes his journey at the end of the film, Bobby resembles Huck Finn “lighting out for the territory,” but Bobby is hardly an uneducated adolescent. Though he behaves like Huck, who comes to know himself, Bobby is an adult whose actions spring from frustrations, cruelty, and despair—he is a charming but destructive loser.

—Thomas L. Erskine

FLAMING CREATURES

USA, 1963

Director: Jack Smith

Production: Distributed by Film-Makers Cooperative; black and white, 16mm; running time: 45 minutes. Released 7 December, 1963, New York City. Filmed on a rooftop in New York City.

Screenplay: Jack Smith; photography: Jack Smith.

Cast: Francis Francine, Delores Flores (a.k.a. Mario Montez), Joel Markman, Shirley.

Publications

Books:

Tyler, Parker, Underground Film: A Critical History, New York, 1969.
Suarez, Juan Antonio, Bike Boys, Drag Queens, Superstars: Avant-Garde, Mass Culture, and Gay Identities in the 1960s Underground Cinema, Bloomington, 1996.

Leffingwell, Edward, Carole Kismaric, and Marvin Heiferman, editors, Jack Smith, Flaming Creature: His Amazing Life and Times, New York, 1997.

Articles:

“Avant-garde Movie Seized as Obscene,” in New York Times, 4 March 1964.

Levy, Alan, “Voices of the Underground Cinema,” in New York Times, 19 September 1965.

Lester, Elenore, “Mr. Godard, Fire That Cameraman!,” in New York Times, 29 January 1967.

Regelson, Rosalyn, “Where Are ‘The Chelsea Girls’ Taking Us?” in New York Times, 24 September 1967.

Hoberman, J., “Treasures of the Mummy’s Tomb,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 33, November-December 1997.

Jerome, Judith, “Creating a World Waiting to Be Created: Karen Finley and Jack Smith,” in Women & Performance (New York), no. 1–2, 1999.

* * *

Though it was produced in the early 1960s, Flaming Creatures—a seminal work of the American underground cinema movement of the mid-twentieth century—is a cinematic poem born of an earlier beat generation. In the 1950s, this generation of poets—unfairly enshrined en masse in popular memory garbed in stereotypical black turtleneck shirts and mohair sweaters—shunned the plasticized, sterilized, march-in-step order of the decade in favor of a more shaggy, offbeat lifestyle. In keeping with the beat aesthetic, the technical values of Flaming Creatures are more primitive than they need have been, the camera movements purposefully herky-jerky. Actors appear in costumes and trinkets gathered from the finery of their home closets or perhaps from a Washington Square or East Village five-and-dime store. As a result, Flaming Creatures comes off as a homemade concoction—certainly not from the kitchen of Betty Crocker, but from the New York Greenwich Village rooftop where filmmaker Jack Smith and his friends converged to produce the film.

For decades, Flaming Creatures has rarely been seen and, for this reason, it has frequently been misinterpreted, misunderstood, and analyzed in generalities. Thus it is worthwhile to examine its content in greater detail. As the film unfolds, the viewer sees the faces of women from a harem and learns that Ali Baba “comes today.” Then the small, handwritten credits become visible. Already difficult to read, the credits are further obscured by characters—a masked, helmeted man and a woman who sticks out her tongue—who walk left-to-right and right-to-left in front of the information. Then, with the effect of a needle hitting a phonograph turntable, the sounds of an old-fashioned, operatic rendition of “Amapola-Pretty Little Poppy” commence. A vamping woman and a drag queen wiggle, wave, and converse near a large vase of flowers. This pair and others, including more drag queens, put on lipstick to the soundtrack for a lipstick commercial. The group lies about, intermingling, and the camera wanders about the intertwined bodies at odd angles. As the soundtrack announces that this indelible lipstick does not come off “when you suck cocks,” viewers see a close-up of a penis at the face of a man wearing a large false nose. Soon we hear animal noises, as if from an out-of-control kennel.

Is this a languid recovery from a sex orgy, or a drugged-out group who simply are enjoying slow-paced genital contact? Just as thoughts begin to arise of illicit lillied pipes in Limehouse opium dens, a lively, campy oriental-style song starts to play, and the action accelerates in pace. People in the group run left-to-right, right-to-left across the screen. A drag queen wrestles down a woman, who is then ravaged by several people as she screams. The camera moves to a close-up of her large, round, jiggling breast, as she gyrates and screeches. This rape sequence, to which the film returns, is a disturbing, cruel segment that seems out of place amid the otherwise offbeat but mellow exoticism.

The action continues, with cutaways to a swaying ceiling lamp, a flash of lightning and, again, the vase of flowers. The group members have their orgy, including kissing and organ caressing and stimulation, and the camera shakes wildly as it explores the scene. The orgy continues amidst shrieks and wild animal sounds. Only the ravaged woman, her single breast still hanging exposed from her dress, appears to be touched against her will. She is standing, and is dragged to a spot by a blonde woman, who peacefully caresses her. The orgy continues, and is recorded in pieces—arms, legs, faces—by the lens of the curious camera. Flower petals fall on the ravaged woman, while veils blow in front of the vase of flowers.

In the next section, a fly has landed on a piece of cloth. The top of a wooden coffin opens, and the music changes again. The soundtrack changes to the nasal strains of a country-western song, the lyrics of which declare “It Wasn’t God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels,” as a blonde, high-heeled drag queen arises from the coffin. She is a vampire; first she begins sucking blood from the neck of another drag queen, and then she masturbates. This sequence is chronicled in side shots, close-ups, and overhead shots. The two drag queens dance to a slow, torrid, campy South American-style song. At first, a new group of people watches them. They include a Spanish dancer with a rose between her teeth, a sailor, a drag queen carrying a lily, an African-American drag queen, and the muscular masked man in a loin cloth who was first seen in front of the credits. They all begin dancing; as they swirl about, the camera remains close, alternating frontal shots with overhead positions.

Once more the camera notices the ravaged woman with her single exposed breast. She lies on the floor, and a disengaged finger touches near her nipple. The following shots show her and her partner, and others of the group who lie near them as if in a tableau. The camera explores the group through intimate shots, including a series of close-ups of faces and a kiss between two drag queens. The cool, deliberate beat of “Bebop a Lula, She’s My Baby” begins as the camera shows more close-up detail of the scene. “The End” finally appears on a piece of cloth, followed by one last glimpse of the jiggling, exposed breast of the ravaged woman.

The individuals who appear in Flaming Creatures constitute a sexual subculture—and, surely, back in the 1950s and early 1960s, their antics never would have been depicted on The Dinah Shore Chevy Show or The Many Loves of Dobie Gillis! Indeed, whenever a “beat” character would appear in mainstream entertainment—Maynard G. Krebs, the beatnik pal of Dobie Gillis, is a perfect case in point—that character would be stereotyped and lampooned. Beat generation types were also demonized. In countless “B” teen pot-boilers, the villain—the character who attempts to seduce the virginal heroine, or turn her on to drugs—was the goateed hipster. Yet even the most broadly cliched subculture type depicted in mainstream popular culture is orthodox when compared to the eccentric personalities portrayed in Flaming Creatures. Drag characters and spoofs would not be accepted by mainstream audiences for decades, until the popularity of Tootsie and The Crying Game and the eventual, above-ground fame of Divine and RuPaul. And to this day, the explicit views and fondling of genitalia in Flaming Creatures would label it in many quarters as a homosexual stag film.

However, the film cannot be written off as low-budget sexploitation. What seems so ragged and homespun in Flaming Creatures—resulting from Jack Smith’s use of hand-held camera, primitive lighting, and awkward, untrained actors—is a triumph of beat art structure and content. Unsurprisingly, the film was the subject of much legal controversy. In December 1963, it was banned from the Experimental Film Festival in Belgium. The following March, filmmaker/journalist/underground film distributor Jonas Mekas and three others were arrested and, according to a report in the New York Times, “charged with showing an obscene motion picture” at the New Bowery Theater on Manhattan’s Lower East Side. The film in question was Flaming Creatures. “The police seized reels of film, a projection machine and a portable screen,” continued the report.

Within the underground artist communities throughout the United States, Flaming Creatures was considered a bold visual-poetic record of a subculture that most of America wanted to keep hidden. Smith’s film gained a reputation among underground artists, including Andy Warhol, who was influenced by Smith to make films in a similar crude style. Both artists played with the mix of eccentric characters and symbols of the drag queen culture with popular culture icons to create the fundamental language of an alternative cinema.

—Audrey E. Kupferberg

FOOLISH WIVES

USA, 1922

Director: Erich von Stroheim

Production: Universal Super Jewel; black and white; originally shot in 35mm, original length: 14,210 feet; released in a version of 2,765 feet (at 24 f.p.s.), running time: 77 minutes.

Producer: Carl Laemmle; screenplay: Erich von Stroheim; titles: Erich von Stroheim, Marian Ainslee; assistant directors: Edward Sowders, Jack R. Proctor, Louis Germonprez; special assistant to von Stroheim: Gustav Machaty; photography: Ben Reynolds, William Daniels; illumination and lighting effects: Harry J. Brown; editor: Erich von Stroheim; editor for release version: Arthur D. Ripley; art directors: E. E. Sheeley, Richard Day; scenic artist: Van Alstein; technical directors: William Meyers, James Sullivan, George Williams; music: Sigmund Romberg.

Cast: Rudolph Christians/Robert Edenson (Andrew J. Hughes); Miss Du Pont/Patsy Hannen (Helen Hughes); Maude George ("Princess" Olga Petschnikoff); Mae Busch ("Princess" Vera Petschnikoff); Erich von Stroheim ("Count" Sergius Karamzin); Dale Fuller (Maruschka); Al Edmundsen (Pavel Pavlich, the Butler); Cesare Gravina (Signor Gaston); Malvina Polo (Marietta, Gaston's Daughter); Louis K. Webb (Dr. Judd); Mrs. Kent (Mrs. Judd); C. J. Allen (Albert I, Prince of Monaco); Edward Reinach (Secretary of State of Monaco).

Publications

Books:

- Fronval, Georges, Erich von Stroheim: Sa vie, ses films, Paris, 1939.
 Noble, Peter, Hollywood Scapegoat: The Biography of Erich von Stroheim, London, 1951.
 Bergut, Bob, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1960.
 Barna, Jan, Erich von Stroheim, Vienna, 1966.
 Gobeil, Charlotte, editor, Hommage à Erich von Stroheim, Ottawa, 1966.
 Ciment, Michel, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1967.
 Finler, Joel, Stroheim, Berkeley, 1968.
 Brownlow, Kevin, The Parade's Gone By . . ., London and New York, 1969.
 Curtiss, Thomas Quinn, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1969.
 Buache, Freddy, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1972.
 Pratt, George C., Spellbound in Darkness, Greenwich, 1973.
 Weinberg, Herman G., Stroheim: A Pictorial Record of His Nine Films, New York, 1975.
 Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.
 Koszarski, Richard, The Man You Loved to Hate: Erich von Stroheim and Hollywood, Oxford, 1983.
 Bessy, Maurice, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1984.
 Lenning, Arthur, Stroheim, Lexington, 2000.

Articles:

- New York Times*, 12 January 1922.
Variety (New York), 20 January 1922.
Motion Picture Classic, April 1922.
Kine Weekly (London), 28 September and 5 October 1922.
Picturegoer, November 1922.
 "Stroheim Issue," of Ciné-Club (Paris), April 1949.
Cinema (Beverly Hills), 15 March 1954.
 Everson, William K., "The Career of Erich von Stroheim," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1957.
 "Stroheim Issue" of Film Culture (New York), April 1958.
 "Stroheim Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), February-March 1959.
 "Stroheim Issue" of Premier Plan (Lyons), August 1963.
 "Stroheim Issue" of Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), no. 48-50, 1966.
 "Stroheim Issue" of Cinema (Zurich), December 1973.
 Rosenbaum, Jonathan, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1976.
Magill's Survey of Cinema, Silent Films, Englewood Cliffs, 1982.
 Blanchet, C., in Cinéma (Paris), March 1985.
 Tesson, C., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1985.
 Dazat, O., in Cinématographe (Paris), March 1985.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, "Quelques notes sur Folies de femmes de Stroheim," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), June 1985.
 Legrand, Gérard, in Positif (Paris), June 1985.
Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 8, no. 1, 1986.
 Donovan, F., in Cinema 89, no. 459, 5 September 1989.
 Paavola, Olavi, "Kaksi mestaria - kaksi vastakohtaa," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 5, 1992.
Mensuel du Cinéma, no. 10, October 1993.
 Fisher, L., "Enemies, a Love Story: von Stroheim, Women and World War I," in Film History (London), vol. 6, no. 4, Winter 1994.
Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 486, December 1994.
Cinegrafie, no. 8, 1995.
 Clair, René, "De Stroheim à Chaplin," in Positif (Paris), no. 443, January 1998.

* * *

Foolish Wives, von Stroheim's third feature as a director, presents close analogies with his first two as the last part of a triptych on the "innocent abroad," a new triangle comedy with the blind husband (this time an American ambassador), his foolish wife, and the devil with his passkey (von Stroheim himself playing a pseudo-Russian Count). Far superior to Blind Husbands (1919), and probably to The Devil's Passkey (a lost film, 1920), its action is again set in Europe, Monte Carlo succeeding the Austrian Dolomites of the first film and the Paris of the second.

To measure up its originality and boldness it has to be compared to the sophisticated comedies of the time whose greatest exponent was Cecil B. De Mille with films like Why Change Your Wife? or The Affairs of Anatol. De Mille as early as 1919 brought to the American screens a mixture of spice and sex but within strict moral limits. Von Stroheim, however, through his unsparing vision of human psychology, his probing of hidden motives, and his harsh realism made the American cinema (particularly with Foolish Wives) enter the 20th century, away from the Victorian and romantic sensibility of Griffith and Tourneur. Chaplin would soon follow with A Woman of Paris (1923) and Lubitsch with The Marriage Circle (1924).

Foolish Wives

While confirming his image of “the man you love to hate,” established in the war years when he played the role of the wicked German in several films, Foolish Wives, his third feature for Carl Laemmle’s Universal, created his reputation as a money-spender and an intractable director. Started on 12 July 1920, the shooting ended almost one year later on 15 June 1921. The costs were soaring as von Stroheim with his manic perfectionism insisted on the veracity of every detail. The main facades of the casino, the Hotel de France, and the Cafe de Paris were built by Richard Day (his first assignment) on the backlot of Universal. The initial budget of $250,000 ended up at $750,000 according to von Stroheim and $1,225,000 in the studio’s estimate. In the middle of production Laemmle had appointed his 20-year-old secretary Irving Thalberg as the head of Universal, and he started to oppose von Stroheim as he would do on his next films, Merry Go Round and Greed.

Before release there were both censorship and length problems. In the wake of Fatty Arbuckle’s scandal the company decided to delete the most provocative shots; after screening a rough cut of six and half hours, it took the film from von Stroheim’s hands and asked Arthur Ripley to reduce it from 30 reels to 14. Ultimately it ran only ten reels.

Even in its present shape, however, the film is one of the most stunning of the silent era. It also exercised a major influence on future directors, including Renoir, Buñuel, and Vigo. Von Stroheim shows a world that lies to itself, where swindlers and rich people mix, and where the heroine reads a book called Foolish Wives. The writer-director deals with false appearances: the titles of Count Wladislas Sergius Karamzin and his two princess cousins are fake (von Stroheim himself was not an Austrian aristocrat as he would have us believe during his lifetime, but the son of a Jewish hat-maker), the money is counterfeit, and the sentiments are fraudulent; Karamzin playing at love to seduce his maid, the ambassador’s wife, and an idiotic 14-year-old girl. This hypocrisy of the social game is set in the context of World War I, which had just ended: an armless veteran, a nurse pushing a soldier in a wheelchair, a little girl on crutches, a boy playing with a military helmet.

In Foolish Wives von Stroheim also gives the final—and most brilliant—touch to his portrait of the cynical seducer, equally eager for money and sex. His physical appearance is as recognisable as Chaplin’s, with his military cap, his whip, and his monocle. Unlike Don Juan who seeks his own downfall or Casanova who is constantly in love and taken in by his own illusions, von Stroheim embodies here an energy and sensuality in their purest form and seeks to destroy the world around him until his final death, not unlike a de Sade character.

But one should not forget the comic side of the film, its scathing irony, even its farcical moments. In many respects, Foolish Wives anticipates two subversive works that open and close the 1930s: Buñuel's L'âge d'or and Renoir's La règle du jeu.

—Michel Ciment

FORBIDDEN GAMES

See LES JEUX INTERDITS

42nd STREET

USA, 1933

Director: Lloyd Bacon

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 85 minutes, some sources list 89 minutes. Released 4 March 1933 (premiere). Filmed in Warner Bros. studios in Hollywood, cost: budgeted at £400,000.

Producer: Hal B. Wallis; screenplay: James Seymour and Rian James, from the novel by Bradford Ropes; photography: Sol Polito; editor: Thomas Pratt; art director: Jack Okey; music numbers: Al Dubin and Harry Warren; costume designer: Orry Kelly; choreography: Busby Berkeley.

Cast: Warner Baxter (Julian Marsh); Bebe Daniels (Dorothy Brock); George Brent (Pat Denning); Una Merkel (Lorraine Fleming); Ruby Keeler (Peggy Sawyer); Guy Kibbee (Abner Dillon); Ned Sparks (Barry); Dick Powell (Billy Lawler); Ginger Rogers (Anytime Annie); George E. Stone (Andy Lee); Eddie Nugent (Terry); Allen Jenkins (MacElroy); Robert McWade (Jones); Harry Axt (Jerry); Clarence Nordstrum (Leading man); Henry B. Whitehall (The actor).

Awards: National Film Registry, National Film Preservation Board, 1998.

Publications

Script:

Seymour, James, and Rian James, 42nd Street, edited by Rocco Fuments, Madison, Wisconsin, 1980.

Books:

Springer, John, All Talking, All Dancing, New York, 1966.
Bergman, Andrew, We're In The Money: Depression America and Its Films, New York, 1971.

42nd Street

Pike, Bob, and Dave Martin, The Genius of Busby Berkeley, Resada, California, 1973.

Thomas, Tony, Jim Terry, and Busby Berkeley, The Busby Berkeley Book, New York, 1973.

Stern, Lee Edward, The Movie Musical, New York, 1974.

Kreuger, Miles, editor, The Movie Musical from Vitaphone to 42nd Street, New York, 1975.

Meyer, William, Warner Brothers Directors, New York, 1978.

Hirschhorn, Clive, The Warner Bros. Story, New York, 1979.

Delameter, James, Dance in the Hollywood Musical, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

Attman, Rick, editor, Genre: The Musical, London, 1981.

Feuer, Jane, The Hollywood Musical, London, 1982.

Roddick, Nick, A New Deal in Entertainment: Warner Brothers in the 1930s, London, 1983.

Morsiani, Alberto, Il Grande Busby: Il Cinema di Busby Berkeley, Modena, 1983.

Hoberman, J., 42nd Street, London, 1993.

Articles:

Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 10 March 1933.

Variety (New York), 14 March 1933.

“Lloyd Bacon . . . Warner Brothers’ Ace,” in Cue (New York), 6 April 1935.

“Obituary: Lloyd Bacon,” in New York Times, 16 November 1955.

Thomas, Anthony, “Dick Powell,” in Films in Review (New York), May 1961.

- Durgnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), January 1962.
- Brion, P., and R. Gilson, "A Style of Spectacle," and Comoll, J.-L. "Dancing Images," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), no. 2, 1966.
- Jenkinson, Philip, "The Great Busby," in Film (London), Spring 1966.
- Gruen, John, "Interview with Berkeley," in Close-Up (New York), 1968.
- Sidney, George, "The Three Ages of the Musical," in Films and Filming (London), June 1968.
- Gorton, D., "Busby and Ruby," in Newsweek (New York), 3 August 1970.
- Bengtsson, Y., in Filmrutan (Stockholm), no. 1, 1973.
- Knight, Arthur, "Busby Berkeley," in Action (Los Angeles), May-June 1974.
- Hodgkinson, A. W., "Forty-Second Street New Deal: Some Thoughts About Early Film Musicals," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), no. 1, 1975.
- Turroni, G., in Filmcritica (Rome), March 1975.
- Fischer, Lucy, "The Image of Women: The Optical Politics of Dames," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1976.
- Dyer, Richard, "Entertainment and Utopia," in Movie (London), no. 24, 1977.
- Belton, John, "The Backstage Musical," in Movie (London), Spring 1977.
- Roth, Mark, "Some Warners Musicals and the Spirit of the New Deal," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Winter 1977.
- Delameter, James, in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), volume 1, no. 1, 1979.
- Johnson, Julia, in Magill's Survey of Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Clark, D., "Acting in Hollywood's Best Interest; Representations of Actors' Labor During the National Recovery Administration," in Journal of Film and Video (Los Angeles), no. 4, 1990.

* * *

42nd Street was the first of three films released in quick succession by Warner Brothers in 1933 (the other two were Gold Diggers of 1933 and Footlight Parade) that are generally regarded as having revitalized the musical as a genre. 42nd Street gave Busby Berkeley (known for his unique overhead camera shots in Eddie Cantor films) full rein to develop his ideas of choreography. The Depression-weary public was obviously fascinated: Variety listed 42nd Street as one of the top six money-making films of 1933, and it was nominated for an Oscar as best picture. Based to some extent on The Broadway Melody (MGM, 1929), 42nd Street continued the sub-genre of the "backstage musical" but added new dimensions with its hard-hitting references to the Depression and with Berkeley's opulent staging of the musical numbers.

The film refuses to be completely escapist: the main thrust of the narrative is the need to get a job, create a viable product (the show Pretty Lady) and to make money. The structural tension results from the separation of the production numbers (glimpses of Pretty Lady) from the narrative; those numbers are indeed escapist in nature. Richard Dyer, in "Entertainment and Utopia," regards this separation as an ideological method of suggesting that the musical numbers are the Utopia we all seek from the hard work of the narrative reality—that the "ills" of capitalism (the Depression) can be resolved through the "means" of capitalism (putting on a successful show). Mark Roth puts forward a similar theory; he notes a social connection between 42nd Street and newly-elected President Roosevelt's New Deal: by working together under a strong leader (the director), the United States (the cast and crew) can lift itself out of the Depression and towards prosperity. (42nd Street opened in Washington, D.C. on March 4, 1933, the day on which Roosevelt was inaugurated).

Regardless of these factors, 42nd Street is usually labelled a "Busby Berkeley musical." Backstage musicals had existed since the beginning of sound, but they were always shot straight-on, as if on stage. Berkeley freed the camera and took advantage of its mobility. He was not a trained dancer, and consequently his "dancers" did not dance so much as move about; the camera did the dancing. By disrupting spatial integrity (the production numbers would begin and end on a theatrical stage but would inevitably move into a realm of limitless dimension), Berkeley created a surrealistic world that thrilled movie audiences. His predilection for beautiful women resulted in some of the most voyeuristic fantasies ever put on film. Recent feminist film critics, particularly Lucy Fischer, have justifiably attacked Berkeley's objectification of the female body.

42nd Street also introduced Ruby Keeler and Dick Powell to movie audiences and contains that immortal line, "... You're going out a youngster, but you've got to come back a star!"

—Greg S. Faller

THE FOUR CHIMNEYS

See ENTOTSU NO MIERU BASHO

THE FOUR HORSEMEN OF THE APOCALYPSE

USA, 1921

Director: Rex Ingram

Production: Metro Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 150 minutes; length: 11 reels. Released 6 March 1921 at the Lyric Theatre, New York.

Producer: Rex Ingram; scenario: June Mathis, from the novel Los cuatros jinetes del Apocalipsis by Vicente Blasco-Ibáñez; art titles: Jack W. Robson; photography: John F. Seitz; editors: Grant Whytock and June Mathis; art directors: Walter Mayo and Curt Rehfeld; music for accompanying film: Louis F. Gottschalk; technical assistants: Amos Myers and Joseph Calder; makeup: Jean Hersholt.

Cast: Rudolph Valentino (Julio Desnoyers); Alice Terry (Marguerite Laurier); Pomeroy Cannon (Madariaga, the Centaur); Josef Swickard (Marcelo Desnoyers); Brinsley Shaw (Celendonio); Alan Hale (Karl von Hartrott); Bridgetta Clark (Doña Luisa); Mabel Van Buren (Elena); Nigel De Brulier (Tchernoff); Bowditch Turner (Argensola); John Sainpolis (Laurier); Mark Fenton (Senator Lacour); Virginia Warwick (Chichi); Derek Ghent (René Lacour); Stuart Holmes (Captain von Hartrott); Jean Hersholt (Professor von Hartrott); Henry Klaus (Heinrich von Hartrott); Edward Connolly (Lodgekeeper);

The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse

Georgia Woodthorpe (Lodgekeeper's wife); Kathleen Key (Georgette); Wallace Beery (Lieutenant-Colonel von Richthoffen); Jacques D'Auray (Captain d'Aubrey); Curt Rehfeld (Major Blumhardt); Harry Northrup (The Count); Claire De Lorez (Mademoiselle Lucette, the model); Bull Montana (French butler); Isabelle Keith (German woman); Jacques Lanoe (Her husband); Noble Johnson (Conquest); Minnehaha (Old nurse); Arthur Hoyt (Lieutenant Schnitz); Beatrice Dominquez (Dancer); also featuring Ramon Samaniegos (later Novarro) in small role.

Publications

Books:

Milne, Peter, Motion Picture Directing: The Facts and Theories of the Newest Art, New York, 1922.
 Shulman, Irving, Valentino, New York, 1967.
 Jacobs, Lewis, The Rise of the American Film: A Critical History, revised edition, New York, 1968.
 Predal, René, Rex Ingram, Paris, 1970.

Lahue, Kalton C., Gentlemen to the Rescue: The Heroes of the Silent Screen, New York, 1972.

Everson, William K., American Silent Film, New York, 1978.

O'Leary, Liam, Rex Ingram, Master of the Silent Cinema, Dublin, 1980; updated revision 1994.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 18 February 1921.

New York Times, 7 March 1921.

Robinson, J., interview with Ingram in Photoplay (New York), August 1921.

Lambert, Gavin, "Fairbanks and Valentino: The Last Heroes," in Sequence (London), Summer 1949.

Huff, Theodore, "The Career of Rudolph Valentino," in Films in Review (New York), April 1952.

Geltzer, George, "Hollywood's Handsomest Director," in Films in Review (New York), May 1952.

McPherson, Mervyn, in Films and Filming (London), May 1956.

O'Leary, Liam, "Rex Ingram and the Nice Studios," in Cinema Studies (England), December 1961.

Bodeen, DeWitt, "Rex Ingram and Alice Terry," in Films in Review (New York), February and March 1975.

Graham, Ian, "Rex Ingram: A Seminal Influence, Unfairly Obscured," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 74, no. 4, April 1993.

Cherchi Usai, P., "Elogio dell'istinto," in Segnocinema (Vicenza), no. 61, May/June 1993.

Bourget, J.-L., "Entre Stroheim et David Lean: le roi Ingram," in Positif (Paris), no. 404, October 1994.

"Les quatre cavaliers de l'apocalypse," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 177, March-April 1995.

* * *

When screenwriter June Mathis campaigned among the executives of the then none-too-sound Metro Film Company to have Blasco Ibáñez's best-selling novel The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse transferred to the screen, she was on shaky ground. The war had been over for two years, there had been a surfeit of war films, and people wanted to forget. She succeeded, however, and she also had the intelligence to recognize the talents of two young men—the director, Rex Ingram, and the actor, Rudolph Valentino. In production the film gathered momentum; there was an air of expectation. Ingram, who had hitherto produced distinguished work without achieving full recognition, had a talent for moulding actors, and the young and largely inexperienced Valentino, lithe and graceful as a dancer, with style and charm and a touch of the devil, proved ideal material for the screen. Ingram, who had come from an Irish rectory and an artistic training at the Yale School of Fine Arts, had inherited his father's capacity for study and research. He had never been to France, knew nothing of European culture, and yet he succeeded in creating in Hollywood the atmosphere of Paris in wartime and the tragedy of the destruction that had ravaged Europe.

The Four Horsemen was an immediate sensation, comparable in its success only to the major films of D. W. Griffith some years earlier. In all the large cities it was sumptuously presented with large orchestras and backstage sound effects for the battle scenes. Its story had all the ingredients for success: a dazzling gigolo hero and a tragic story of frustrated illicit love. It ranged from the pampas of South America and the glittering world of Paris, to the horrors of war and the invasion of a French village by the Germans. Pervading everything was the anti-war theme and the mystical element of the four terrible horsemen. It was also anti-German to the point of caricature: it was banned in Germany and indeed withdrawn from circulation many years later when a campaign was launched to suppress films promoting hatred between nations.

But for years it was the major box-office attraction, and was revived on the death of Valentino. Indeed, it is now remembered more for its star than for the genuine achievement of Ingram himself. Yet today's viewers, even those whose main interest is in nostalgia for Valentino, will be struck by the excellence of the film itself. With the help of his constant collaborator, the cameraman John Seitz, Ingram infused the film with great visual beauty, a sensitivity to light and shade, and an unusual feeling for composition.

The effect of the film was to shore up the finances of the shaky Metro company, recently taken over by Marcus Loew. It established Valentino as a star, and it established Ingram as a major director who henceforth had carte blanche and full control of his films. A "Rex Ingram Production" thereafter carried as much weight as the star's billing, and indeed Ingram can be said to have set an aesthetic standard for the screen image.

—Liam O'Leary

THE 400 BLOWS

See LES QUATRES CENTS COUPS

FRANKENSTEIN

USA, 1931

Director: James Whale

Production: Universal Pictures; black and white, 35mm; running time: 71 minutes. Released 1931. Filmed in Universal studios. Cost: $250,000.

Producer: Carl Laemmle Jr.; screenplay: Garrett Fort, Francis Faragoh, and John L. Balderston, uncredited first draft by Robert Florey, from John Balderston's adaptation of Mary Shelley's novel adapted from the play by Peggy Webling; photography: Arthur Edeson; editor: Clarence Kolster; sound recording supervisor: C. Roy Hunter; art director: Charles Hall; music: David Broekman; makeup: Jack Pierce; laboratory equipment: Ken Strickfadden.

Cast: Colin Clive (Dr. Henry Frankenstein); Boris Karloff (The Monster); Mae Clarke (Elizabeth); John Boles (Victor); Edward Van Sloan (Dr. Waldman); Dwight Frye (Fritz); Frederick Kerr.

Publications

Script:

Fort, Garrett, Francis Faragoh, and John L. Balderston, James Whale's Frankenstein, edited by Richard Anobile, New York, 1974.

Books:

Laclos, Michel, Le Fantastique au Cinéma, Paris, 1958.

Clarens, Carlos, An Illustrated History of the Horror Film, New York, 1968.

Gifford, Denis, Movie Monsters, New York, 1969.

Baxter, John, Science Fiction in the Cinema, New York, 1970.

Butler, Ivan, Horror in the Cinema, revised edition, New York, 1970.

Huss, Roy, and T. J. Ross, editors, Focus on the Horror Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.

Underwood, Peter, Karloff: The Life of Boris Karloff, New York, 1972.

Gifford, Denis, Karloff: The Man, The Monster, The Movies, New York, 1973.

Glut, Donald, The Frankenstein Legend: A Tribute to Mary Shelley and Boris Karloff, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1973.

Bojarski, Richard, and Kenneth Beale, The Films of Boris Karloff, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.

Frankenstein

Everson, William, Classics of the Horror Film, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.

Jensen, Paul, Boris Karloff and His Films, New York, 1974.

Barsacq, Leon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, revised and edited by Elliott Stein, Boston, 1976.

Tropp, Martin, Mary Shelley's Monster: The Story of Frankenstein, Boston, 1976.

Derry, Charles, Dark Dreams: A Psychological History of the Modern Horror Film, New York, 1977.

Ellis, Reed, Journey Into Darkness: The Art of James Whale's Horror Films, New York, 1980.

Klein, Michael, and Gillian Parker, editors, The English Novel and the Movies, New York, 1981.

Curtis, James, James Whale, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1982.

Articles:

New York Times, 5 December 1931.

Variety (New York), 8 December 1931.

New York Times, 20 December 1931.

Edwards, Roy, "Movie Gothic: A Tribute to James Whale," in Sight and Sound, Autumn 1957.

Karloff, Boris, "My Life as a Monster," in Films and Filming (London), November 1957.

Fink, Robert, and William Thomaier, "James Whale," in Films in Review (New York), May 1962.

"Memories of a Monster," in Saturday Evening Post (New York), 3 November 1962.

Bloom, Harold, in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), Fall 1965.

Roman, Robert C., "Boris Karloff," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1969.

Gerard, Lillian, "Boris Karloff: The Man Behind the Myth," in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1970.

Hitchens, Gordon, "Some Historical Notes on Dr. Frankenstein and his Monster," in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1970.

Jensen, Paul, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1970.

Jensen, Paul, "James Whale," in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1971.

Verstappen, H., "Schept vreugde met mij, horror freaks," in Skoop (Amsterdam), no. 2, 1972.

- Dillard, R. H. W., "Drawing the Circle: A Devolution of Values in 3 Horror Films," in Film Journal (Hollins College, Virginia), January-March 1973.
- Schepelern, P., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), March 1973.
- Evans, Walter, "Monster Movies: A Sexual Theory," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Fall 1973.
- Evans, Walter, "Monster Movies and Rites of Initiation," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Spring 1975.
- Huskins, D. Gail, in Magill's Survey of Cinema I, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Starburst* (London), no. 32, 1981.
- Viviani, C., "Fausces pistes," in Positif (Paris), June 1983.
- American Cinematographer* (Los Angeles), April 1987.
- Mank, G., "Robert Florey, James Whale, and Universal's Frankenstein," in Midnight Marquee (Baltimore), Fall 1988.
- Mank, Gregory, "Frankenstein Restored," in Films in Review (New York), vol. 40, no. 6-7, June-July 1989.
- Mank, Gregory, "Little Maria Remembers," in Films in Review (New York), vol. 43, no. 9-10, September-October 1992.
- Holt, Wesley G., in Filmfax (Evanston), no. 35, October-November 1992.
- Thompson, David, "Really a Part of Me," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, no. 1, January-February 1995.
- Senn, B., "The Monster, Bride, and Sonp" in Monsterscene (Lombard), no. 4, March 1995.
- Pizzato, M., "The Real Edges of the Screen: Cinema's Theatrical and Communal Ghosts," in Spectator (Los Angeles), vol. 16, no. 2, 1996.
- Sarver, Stephanie, "Homer Simpson Meets Frankenstein: Cinematic Influence in Nathanael West's The Day of the Locust," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 24, no. 2, April 1996.
- Mitchell, C.P., "Marilyn and the Monster," in Films of the Golden Age (Muscatine), no. 11, Winter 1997-1998.
- Mitchell, C.P., "The Unkindest Cut," in Films of the Golden Age (Muscatine), no. 11, Winter 1997-1998.

* * *

James Whale's 1931 version of Frankenstein remains a cinema miracle that defies time. Some 50 years since its premiere, its sensitive craftsmanship and relentlessly macabre tone still set horror movie standards, even after decades of noisome parodies and splatter-film overkill.

Whale treats his protagonist's obsession with galvanizing life from sewn corpses as a stark and shadowy moral tale, more in keeping with the German Expressionist influence of Robert Wiene's Caligari than Mary Shelley's Gothic overtones. Though heavy on dialogue in the beginning, Frankenstein unfolds as an intensely visual nightmare, a sleepwalker's journey along hideous graveyards, gibbets, and gnarly corridors—leading up to the meticulous penultimate climax when Dr. Frankenstein's creation slowly turns his face towards the camera.

Ironically, Frankenstein profits from the very qualities other critics have claimed drag it down. Its leaden mood, stagey acting and lack of a musical score make it all the more somber and bleak. Whale's camera is quite active throughout these funereal settings and suffers very little from the manacles inherent in other early talkies. In fact, practically all of the cinematic innovations credited to Whale's sequel Bride of Frankenstein are already here: the tracking camera, the sudden jumps from long-shot to close-up, the extreme high and low angles during the creation sequence, and the lurid sets with their demented religious icons.

At the same time, Whale flaunts his theatrical origins with a reverence for the stage. The very first frames when Edward Van Sloan (who plays Frankenstein's mentor, Dr. Waldman) confronts the footlights for his teasing introduction, and the later tracking shots along the opulent rooms of Baron Frankenstein's castle, remind us that this is, after all, nothing but artifice, a world where scenery is a trompe l'oeil projection of Dr. Frankenstein's subconscious fears.

Frankenstein still scares viewers because it works as both a horror film and a psychological study. As Frankenstein, Colin Clive, with his harsh enunciations and jittery motions, is perfect in his portrayal of a man beleaguered by twisted dreams and ambiguous morals. Is this really, as Shelley claimed, a story about the perils of hubris, or is it more concerned with a man apprehensive about falling into a connubial quagmire? By suggesting more of the latter, Whale may have directly borrowed from Thomas Edison's long lost silent version, which reportedly ends with a dissolve between the mirrored faces of Dr. Frankenstein and his Monster just before Elizabeth is about to be murdered. Edison allowed the creature to die so that the doctor could face up to marital obligations, but Whale suggests that Frankenstein's darker passions surpass the tedium Elizabeth (an appropriately bland role for Mae Clarke) has to offer him. In this regard, the Monster is less a sub-human fiend and more like the third party in a lover's triangle or quadrangle when we consider that Frankenstein's friend Victor Moritz (John Boles) has eyes on the future bride.

Whale's delight in lampooning "normal" sexual mores (a penchant culminating in his 1938 film Wives under Suspicion) is buttressed by Garrett Fort and Francis E. Farragoh's ambivalent script which questions how the characters really feel about one another. Elizabeth has countless anxieties about her nuptial partner and even seems coy when Victor vies for her affections. On the wedding day, when news hits that the Monster is loose, Whale inserts a curious close-up of Frankenstein's hands locking Elizabeth in her bridal chamber, suggesting perhaps that the doctor is unconsciously making her more vulnerable since the would-be killer will soon enter her room through the window. Off to reunite with his nemesis in a vigilante search, Frankenstein looks firmly into Victor's eyes while surrendering Elizabeth into his care. The scene ends with Victor creeping towards Elizabeth's room.

As a homewrecker, Frankenstein's Monster merits the humanity and dignity of Boris Karloff's performance, despite the grease paint, wire clamps, wax eyelids, and a 48-pound steel spine designed by Jack Pierce. Karloff's empathy is unfortunately diminished by the subplot in which Frankenstein's hunchback assistant Fritz (Dwight Frye as comic relief) unwittingly acquires a "criminal" brain from his boss, thereby ruining the notion that the Monster's brutality is a learned response.

Whale's film leaves us with the unsettling conclusion that the real monsters are the diurnal world's dim-witted denizens, a fact made more apparent when Baron Frankenstein (Frederick Kerr) predicts that the townspeople revelling over his son's wedding will soon be fighting again. Hours later, the news of little Maria's murder turns the jocular crowd into a bloodthirsty mob. The recently restored footage (missing since its screen debut) of the Monster throwing Maria (Marilyn Harris) into a lake transpires so quickly and nonchalantly that the pedophile scenarios left to our imaginations all these years are debunked. Now we have proof that the child murder was an innocent error. Not content simply to cast his Monster as a pariah, Whale promotes him to a Christ figure in the final scene when the creation throws his creator from the abandoned windmill into the vengeful crowd. An extreme long-shot of the burning mill resembles the cross on Calvary. Though he disapproved of the tacked-on happy ending when Frankenstein survives his fall, Whale still achieved that supreme inversion of “good” and “evil” that makes the best horror films survive.

—Joseph Lanza

FREAKS

USA, 1932

Director: Tod Browning

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 90 minutes originally, later 64 minutes, some sources state that existing copies are 53 minutes. Released February 1932, New York and San Francisco. Filmed in Hollywood.

Producer: Irving Thalberg with Harry Sharock (some filmographies state Dwain Esper as producer, but he was responsible for the 1940s re-issue, other sources list Browning as producer); screenplay: Willis Goldbeck, Leon Gordon, Al Boasberg, and Edgar Allen Woolf, from the book Spurs by Clarence Tod Robbins; photography: Merritt B. Gerstad; editor: Basil Wrangell; sound engineer: Gavin Barns; art directors: Cedric Gibbons with Merrill Pye; music: Gavin Barns.

Cast: Olga Baclanova (Cleopatra); Henry Victor (Hercules); Wallace Ford (Phroso); Harry Earles (Hans); Leila Hyams (Venus); Roscoe Ates (Roscoe); Rose Dione (Mme. Tetralini); Daisy and Violet Hilton (Siamese Twins); Schlitz (Herself); Peter Robinson (Human Skeleton); Elisabeth Green (Bird Woman); Randion (Larva Man, or Living Torso); Joseph-Josephine (Androgyne); Johnny Eck (Trunk Man); Frances O'Connor and Martha Morris (Women without arms); Olga Roderich (Bearded Woman); Koo-Koo (Herself); Edward Brophy and Mat-Mac Huch (The Rollo Brothers); Angelo Rossitto (Angeleno); Daisy Earles (Frieda); Zip and Flip (Pinheads).

Award: Honored at the Venice Film Festival, 1962.

Publications

Script:

Goldbeck, Willis, and others, Freaks, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 March 1981.

Books:

Thomas, John, Focus on the Horror Film, New Jersey, 1972.

Everson, William K., Classics of the Horror Film, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.

Skal, David J., Dark Carnival: The Secret World of Tod Browning, Hollywood's Master of the Macabre, New York, 1995.

Articles:

New York Times, 9 July 1932.

Variety (New York), 12 July 1932.

Geltzer, George, “Tod Browning,” in Films in Review (New York), October 1953.

Romer, Jean-Claude, “Tod Browning,” in Bizarre (Paris), no. 3, 1962.

Guy, Rory, “Horror: The Browning Version,” in Cinema (Beverly Hills), June-July 1963.

Kael, Pauline, in Kiss Kiss Bang Bang, Boston, 1968.

Schmidt, K., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), September 1972.

Savada, Eli, “Tod Browning,” in Photon (New York), no. 23, 1973.

Beylie, Claude, in Ecran (Paris), July-August 1973.

Rosenthal, Stuart, “Tod Browning,” in The Hollywood Professionals 4, London, 1975.

“Freaks et la critique,” in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1975.

Léger, Jean-Marie, “Ni Fantastique ni ‘normal’,” in Avant Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1975.

James, N., in Classic Film Collector (Indiana, Pennsylvania), Fall 1976.

Carcassonne, P., in Cinématographe (Paris), April 1978.

Biette, J.-C., and F. Ziolkowski, “Tod Browning and Freaks,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1978.

Cluny, C. M., “Freaks dans l’oeuvre de Tod Browning,” in Cinéma (Paris), May 1978.

Sauvaget, D., in Image et Son (Paris), May 1978.

Hoberman, James, in Village Voice (New York), 17 September 1979.

Film Psychology Review (New York), Summer-Fall 1980.

“Freaks Issue,” of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 March 1981.

Cinématographe (Paris), May 1982.

Starburst (London), no. 59, 1983.

Moorman, M., in Skoop (Amsterdam), September-October 1985.

Hodges, Albert, “Remembering Johnny Eck,” in Filmfax (Evanston), no. 26, April-May 1991.

Douin, Jean-Luc, “L’horreur est humaine,” in Télérama (Paris), no. 2265, 9 June 1993.

Vieira, Mark A., and Gary Morris, “Freaks: Production and Analysis,” in Bright Lights (Cincinnati), no. 1, Fall 1993.

Holt, Wesley G., in Filmfax (Evanston), no. 52, September-October 1995.

Skal, David J., and Elias Savada, “‘Offend One and You Offend Them All’,” in Filmfax (Evanston), no. 52, September-October 1995.

Skal, David J., and Elias Savada, “‘One of Us’,” in Filmfax (Evanston), no. 53, November-December 1995.

Wood, Bret, “Hollywood’s Sequined Lie: The Gutter Roses of Tod Browning,” in Video Watchdog, no. 32, 1996.

* * *

Although it has been seldom shown in the fifty years since its introduction in 1932 as a “masterpiece of horror,” Tod Browning’s Freaks has achieved near-legendary cult status and continues to exert a major influence on modern attempts at the baroque film. Certainly the powers of its wedding feast sequence was not lost on Luis Buñuel when he staged the tramp’s “last supper” in his 1961 Viridiana. And the works of such diverse filmmakers as Max Ophüls, Federico Fellini, and Ingmar Bergman have shown traces of the film’s influence.

Freaks

Today it is difficult to believe that the film was produced at MGM. It more closely resembles the kind of horror films being released during the 1930s by Universal Studios, which had in fact made a fortune with Browning's earlier Dracula, as well as James Whale's Frankenstein. However, Irving Thalberg, MGM's president, noting the success of these two efforts, purchased Clarence Robbins's grisly tale Spurs, hired Browning and, over considerable objections within the studio, adapted it for the screen as Freaks. Yet in the transition to film, the story deviated from the traditional horror format and evolved into gothic social commentary that closely resembled the kind of sociological treatments being attempted by Warner Bros. in their great gangster films of the period.

If Freaks is not totally satisfactory to audiences of today, that is perhaps due, for the most part, to the fundamental conflicts inherent in merging horror and social criticism. Although Browning was successful in portraying his deformed subjects sympathetically and causing his viewer to re-evaluate their concepts of what is normal, he succumbs to the obvious temptation to "scare the pants" off his viewers in the film's final scene. For most of the film, he portrays the freaks as human beings going about their daily rituals. (Significantly, we never see them on stage as sideshow performers.) At the wedding feast, however, when one of their number marries a "normal" person, we sense their solidarity as they go through an elaborate ritual to admit Cleo to their circle. This triggers a course of events in which the innate humanity of the freaks is juxtaposed with the inherent ugliness, evil and abnormality of the so-called normal people.

But in the film's final sequences, Browning emphasizes the physical grotesqueness of the freaks as they slither and crawl through the mud to exact their revenge on Cleo and the strong man Hercules after she has betrayed them. At the end of the film, we find that Cleo has turned into a freak herself at the hands of the little people. The scene, contrived as it is, clouds the image of the humanity of the deformed creatures by emphasizing the enormity of their vengeance, and because the costuming of Cleo as a freak is technically crude, it erodes the worthwhile themes of the film and makes its subjects objects of scorn.

Still, individual scenes, in their power and construction, provide unforgettable images and truly extend the boundaries of baroque filmmaking. The film is still today a virtual textbook on the horror film, and enough of its nobler aspirations come through to allow it to remain as undoubtedly the ultimate challenge to the old fiction that beauty is necessarily synonymous with truth. Although it was banned in many countries for its graphic depiction of this theme, it was honored in 1962 at the Venice Film Festival and has been shown periodically thereafter.

—Stephen L. Hanson

FRESA Y CHOCOLATE

(Strawberry and Chocolate)

Cuba, 1993

Director: Tomás Gutiérrez Alea and Juan Carlos Tabío

Production: El Instituto Cubano del Arte e Industria Cinematográficos, with the support of Instituto Mexicano de Cinematografía, TeleMadrid, La Sociedad General de Autores y Editores de España, and Tabasco Films; color, 35 mm; running time: 110 minutes. Released in the United States in 1994 by Miramax Films; Spanish with English subtitles.

Producer: Georgina Balzaretta (executive), Frank Cabrera (executive), Camilo Vives (executive), Nacho Cobo (associate), Juan Muñoz (associate); screenplay: Senel Paz (based on the story, The Wolf, the Woods and the New Man) photography: Mario García Joya; editor: Miriam Talavera, Rolando Martínez, Osvaldo Donatien; production manager: Miguel Mendoza; sound editor: Germinal Hernandez; makeup: Graciela Grossas, María Elena del Toro; music: José; María Vitier; production designer: Fernando O'Reilly; costumes: Miriam Dueñas.

Cast: Jorge Perugorria (Diego); Vladimir Cruz (David); Jorge Angelino (Germán); Francisco Gattorno (Miguel); Mirta Ibarra (Nancy); Marilyn Solaya (Vivian); Antonio Carmona (Artist); Diana Iris del Puerto (Neighbor); Andrés Cortina (Santería Priest); Ricardo Ávila (Taxi Driver); María Elena del Toro (Passenger); Zolanda Oña (Passenger).

Awards: ARCI-NOVA Award, Audience Award, Best Actor (Jorge Perugorria), Best Actress (Luisina Brando), Best Director, Best Supporting Actress (Mirta Ibarra), FIPRESCI Award, Grand Coral First Prize, and OCIC Award, Havana Film Festival, 1993; Special Jury Prize, Silver Bear Award, and Teddy Award for Best Feature Film, Berlin International Film Festival, 1994; Golden Kikito for Best Latin Film, Gramado Latin Film Festival, 1994; Goya Award for Best Spanish Language Foreign Film, 1995; Special Jury Award, Sundance Film Festival, 1995.

Publications

Books:

Burton, Julianne, editor, Cinema and Social Change in Latin America: Conversations with Filmmakers, Austin, Texas, 1986.
Pick, Zuzana M., The New Latin American Cinema: A Continental Project, Austin, Texas, 1993.

Cook, David A., A History of Narrative Film, 3rd Ed. New York, 1996.
Channan, Michael. "New Cinemas in Latin America" and "Tomás Gutiérrez Alea," in The Oxford History of World Cinema: The Definitive History of Cinema Worldwide, edited by Geoffrey Nowell-Smith, Oxford, 1997.

Articles:

Burton, Julianne, "Film and Revolution in Cuba: The First Twenty-Five Years," in Jump Cut: Hollywood, Politics and Counter-Cinema, edited by Peter Steven, New York, 1985.
Alea, Tomás Gutiérrez, "I Wasn't Always a Filmmaker," in Cineaste (Berkeley), vol. 14, no. 1, 1985.
Smith, Paul, Teresa Toledo, and Philip Kemp, "The Language of Strawberry/Intolerance/Fresa y Chocolate," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 4, no. 12, December 1994.
Wise, Michael, "In Totalitarian Cuba, Ice Cream and Understanding," in New York Times, 22 January 1995.
Ebert, Roger, "'Strawberry' Defies Notions of Cuba's Politics and Passions," in Chicago Sun-Times, 10 February 1995.
Ebert, Roger, "Cuban Filmmaker Counts His Blessing; 'Strawberry' Harvest Tastes Better Than Making a Mint," in Chicago Sun-Times, 10 February 1995.
West, Dennis, "Strawberry and Chocolate, Ice Cream and Tolerance: Interviews with Tomás Gutiérrez Alea and Juan Carlos Tabío," in Cineaste (Berkeley), Winter-Spring 1995.
Marsolais, Gilles, "Un humour décapant: coup d'oeil sur quelques films de Tomás Gutiérrez Alea," in 24 Images (Montreal), no. 77, Summer 1995.
Hess, John, "Melodrama, Sex, and the Cuban Revolution," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), no. 41, May 1997.

* * *

The film Fresa y Chocolate opened in Cuba in the year 1993 and within the space of a few months became one of the biggest box-office successes for Tomás Gutiérrez Alea, one of Latin America's celebrated and Cuba's most revered filmmakers. The story is set in 1979, a year before the upheaval of the Mariel boatlift. We meet Diego, a flamboyant, gay man who spots the beautiful young David at an ice cream shop and sets out to woo him. "I knew he was a homosexual," Diego later reveals to his roommate Miguel, "there was chocolate and he chose strawberry."

Diego manages to lure the supremely heterosexual and devoutly Marxist David to his apartment with the promise of books, music, and other accouterments not readily available in Cuba. Diego is immediately smitten by David, who "has a face of an angel." But David's only reason for befriending the non-conformist Diego is to do his duty for the Party by exposing him as a counter-revolutionary, a charge that could bring a penalty of a decade or more in prison. Here is where the real fun begins, for with their subsequent visits the issues become cloudy. David is fascinated by the quirky, educated, and cultured Diego. Moreover, there is more to Diego than meets the eye. At one point, Diego toasts their new friendship with contraband liquor from America, dubbing it "the enemy's whiskey." Is Diego a counter-revolutionary or isn't he?

Some have criticized the inclusion of obvious gay clichés: Diego's apartment is cluttered with a dazzling array of eclectic antiques, he serves Indian tea on exquisite china, he revels in opera, and struts his stuff in a black tank top and blue Japanese kimono. Yet this is not a “gay” film. There is sexual tension, but no sex. Notes film critic Robert Ebert, the film is not “about the seduction of a body, but about the seduction of a mind.” Nor is the film to be dismissed as simply a light comedy about manners and morality. There are many issues cleanly woven into this unique tapestry.

Fresa y Chocolate

Probably most striking to non-Cuban viewers is the film’s serious and sensitive treatment of gay characters in a Cuban film set during a period in the country’s history when anti-gay sentiment and discrimination ran especially high. For Alea however, it is more a film about tolerance than it is a call for gay rights. “The gay subtheme,” notes Alea in Cineaste, “is merely a convenient illustration. . . .” Fresa y Chocolate examines freedom of expression, surveillance, revolutionary watchfulness, the black market, and the flaws of revolutionary Cuban society.

This may seem radical, arising as it does from the camera of one of Cuba’s most devoted revolutionaries. But not so if one is familiar with the firebrand tone of Alea’s work. The Cuban director has never shied away from the contradictions in his country’s policies. His submerged criticism of the exigencies of life in communist Cuba has resonated throughout his films. “It’s seen as a communist hell or a communist paradise,” he was quoted as saying by the Associated Press. In one scene the two men escape to Diego’s rooftop to take in the beauty of their city. A wide shot pans a beautiful dock with clear waters, shore birds, and small sea vessels. Diego warns David to enjoy it now “before it collapses.” Clearly, Diego loves Cuba but is tortured by the fact that its beauty is crumbling before his own eyes.

Fresa y Chocolate is a splendid piece of filmmaking by one of Latin America’s most celebrated film artists. Alea made his mark in filmmaking with the production of El mégano in 1955. This documentary explored the exploitation of peasant labor in the charcoal swamps and caused Alea to be arrested by the secret police of the Batista regime. It was during this turbulent period in postwar film history that Latin American countries began to loose the stranglehold of the Hollywood machine to allow the voices of native film artists to be heard. A number of film movements emerged, including “Cinema Novo,” when young Latin filmmakers took on the tenants of Italian Neo-Realism and French New Wave to explore issues of colonization, slavery, economic limitation, misery, and protest, and in the process created a new Latin American cinema. It was the 1964 dark comedy Muerta de un burócrata (Death of a Bureaucrat) that helped established Alea as an international film artist.

Fresa y Chocolate is richly photographed and filled with charming portrayals and very good acting. And it makes for delightful comedy. David is a University student studying political science but is quite naive and unsophisticated. During one of many heated discussions with Diego, David confuses Truman Capote with Harry Truman for dropping the atomic bomb. He tells Diego that being gay is “in the glands.” Then there is Nancy, Diego’s middle-aged and sexually appealing neighbor, a part-time hooker with mental baggage who supports herself by selling contraband pantyhose and cosmetics and who becomes intensely physically drawn to David—especially when she finds out he is still a virgin.

Alea, who was 69 years old at the time of the shooting of Fresa Y Chocolate, became ill and called upon his long-time colleague, filmmaker Juan Carlos Tabio, to complete the film. In 1996, after the release of his final film, Guantanamo, Alea died of cancer.

—Pamala S. Deane

FRÖKEN JULIE

(Miss Julie)

Sweden, 1950

Director: Alf Sjöberg

Production: Sandrew Bauman Produktion; black and white, 35mm; running time: 87 minutes, some sources list 90 minutes. Released 1950. Filmed in Sweden.

Producer: Rune Waldekranz; screenplay: Alf Sjöberg, from the play by August Strindberg; photography: Göran Strindberg; editor: Lennart Wallén; art director: Bibi Lindström; music: Dag Wirén.

Cast: Anita Björk (Miss Julie); Ulf Palme (Jean); Anders Henrikson (The Count); Marta Dorff (Christine); Lissi Alandh (Berta, the Countess); Inga Gill (Viola); Kurt-Olof Sundström (The fiancé); Ake Claessens (Doctor); Jan Hagerman (Jean, as a child); Inger Norberg (Julie as a child); Ake Fridell (Robert); Max von Sydow (Groom).

Award: Cannes Film Festival, Best Film (shared with Miracolo a Milano), 1951; Honored at Venice Film Festival, as part of a retrospective program, 1964.

Publications

Books:

Cowie, Peter, Swedish Cinema, New York, 1966.

Cowie, Peter, and Arne Svensson, Sweden, New York, 2 vols., 1970.

Barsacq, Leon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, Cinema, the Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey Two, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1979.

Lundin, G., Filmregi Alf Sjöberg, Lund, 1979.

Ek, Sverker R., Spelplatsens magi: Alf Sjöberg regikonst 1930–1957, Gidlund, 1988.

Esposito, Vincenzo, Alf Sjöberg: un maestro del cinema svedese, Rome, 1998.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 16 May 1951.

Cinématographe Français (Paris), 28 July 1951.

Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July–August 1951.

Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1951.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), no. 216, 1952.

Sight and Sound (London), January–March 1952.

Films in Review (New York), May 1952.

Variety (New York), 4 September 1952.

De La Roche, Catherine, “Swedish Films,” in Films in Review (New York), November 1953.

Morrisett, “The Swedish Paradox,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1961.

Cinema Nuovo (Turin), August 1965.

Coiner, M., “Myth, Style and Strindberg in Sjöberg’s Miss Julie,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 1, 1991.

Bjorkin, M., “Fröken Julies rakkniv,” in Filmhäftet (Stockholm), vol. 23, no. 1/2, 1995.

* * *

In Miss Julie, there is a prolific use of “flashbacks,” one flash forward and two dream sequences, all of which serve to articulate the opposing but also disintegrating class values of Miss Julie, who represents the feudal aristocracy, and of her father’s valet, Jean, who is of lower class, servant background. The difference in director Alf Sjöberg’s use of the flashback device in Miss Julie from its standard employment in strictly conventional, (i.e. “Hollywood”) films, is that there is not the usual cinematic punctuation demarcating exactly when the narrative is speaking about the present and when it is referring to the past.

In the play, the past is evoked through the use of dialogue, which characteristically involves an exchange among two or more people seeking mutual understanding. However, the key to the success of dialogue, insofar as its communicative status is predicated upon the arrival of this understanding, is one of intentionality. The speakers must be able to make one another recognize the meaning intended in what they are trying to express. In Miss Julie the dialogue—as a means of describing for example, the conflicts Miss Julie harbors about morality, class distinction, and sexual roles—has been translated cinematically into the flashback. That the flashbacks in the film are not marked off in the traditional manner indicates that they are not to be understood in the usual sense—not as simply retrogressive delineations of time. Instead they are intended by the filmmaker to illustrate, in formal terms, the indecisive and confused nature of Miss Julie’s conception of herself, of her conception of how others see her, and of what she should do or be in the world.

The rules of verbal communication must be followed by the speakers involved. If they are not, of course, an incorrect meaning or set of meanings will be derived from the exchange. Specifically, flashbacks in Miss Julie are constructed so that there is no spatial and thus temporal differentiation made between the people, objects and places of the present and those of the past. Miss Julie’s mother, who is dead in the present time of her daughter's affair with Jean, walks into the "frame" of this time from the midst of one from the past. The camera moves with her across these two temporal dimensions passing on its way people of the present who are speaking about her in the past. This overlapping occurs as a rule of the flashback structure in the film. Its meaningful effect is one of instability, of alternating balances and contrasts of moods. The viewer understands ultimately that Miss Julie will remain an illusionary and impenetrable fiction.

Fröken Julie

To further create a sense of the basic unreality and illusion of imagination in the diegesis, landscapes, objects, and the natural elements (wind, etc.) are not represented or portrayed as things existing merely in themselves. Rather, Sjöberg manipulates them in such a way that they take on a symbolic life of their own. They become anthropomorphized conveyors of the character's emotions as well as expressive means of the larger and more pervasive moods of the film. This anthropomorphization process, which affords significance to objects usually represented statically, as devoid of meaning, does not in the overall perception of the film simply consign the narrative and its means of presentation to the realm of the melodramatic.

—Sandra L. Beck

FROM HERE TO ETERNITY

USA, 1953

Director: Fred Zinnemann

Production: Columbia Pictures Corp.; 1953; black and white, 35mm; running time: 118 minutes. Released 1953. Filmed in Hawaii at the Schofield Barracks.

Producer: Buddy Adler; executive producer: Harry Cohn; screenplay: Daniel Taradash, from the novel by James Jones; photography: Burnett Guffey; editor: William A. Lyon; sound: John P. Livadary and Columbia Studio Sound Department; art director: Cary Odell; music: George Dunning.

Cast: Burt Lancaster (Sergeant Milton Warden); Montgomery Clift (Robert E. Lee "Prew" Prewitt); Deborah Kerr (Karen Holmes); Frank Sinatra (Angelo Maggio); Donna Reed (Alma "Lorene"); Philip Ober (Captain Dana Holmes); Ernest Borgnine (Sergeant "Fatso" Judson).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Supporting Actor (Sinatra), Best Supporting Actress (Reed), Best Director, Best Screenplay, Best Cinematography—Black and White, Best Sound Recording, and Best Editing, 1953; New York Film Critics' Awards for Best Motion Picture, Best Actor (Lancaster), and Best Direction, 1953; Cannes Film Festival, Out of Competition Prize, 1954.

Publications

Books:

Griffith, Richard, Fred Zinnemann, New York, 1958.
 Thomas, Bob, King Cohn, New York, 1967.
 Ringgold, Gene, and Clifford McCarty, The Films of Frank Sinatra, New York, 1971.
 Phillips, Gene D., The Movie Makers: Artists in an Industry, Chicago, 1973.
 Thomas, Tony, Burt Lancaster, New York, 1975.
 Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Rausa, Guiseppe, Fred Zinnemann, Florence, 1985.
 Goldau, Antje, and others, Zinnemann, Munich, 1986.
 Zinnemann, Fred, My Life in the Movies, New York, 1992.
 Nolletti, Arthur, Jr., The Films of Fred Zinnemann, Albany, 1999.

Articles:

Look (New York), 25 August 1953.
 Kass, Robert, in Films in Review (New York), October 1953.
 Reisz, Karel, in Sight and Sound (London), January-March 1954.
 Wald, Jerry, "Screen Adaptation," in Films in Review (New York), February 1954.
 Taradash, Daniel, "Into Another World," in Films and Filming (London), May 1959.
 Zinnemann, Fred, "A Conflict of Conscience," in Films and Filming (London), December 1959.
 Zinnemann, Fred, "From Here To Eternity," in Films and Filming (London), November 1961.
 Zinnemann, Fred, "Montgomery Clift," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1966.

From Here to Eternity

- Reid, John Howard, "A Man For All Movies: The Films of Fred Zinnemann," in Films and Filming (London), May and June 1967.
- Schuster, Mel, "Burt Lancaster," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1969.
- Braun, Eric, "From Here to Esteem," in Films and Filming (London), May 1970. Also April and June 1970.
- Colpart, G., in Cinema (Paris), November 1978.
- Jensen, Jeffrey Michael, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Lippe, R., "Montgomery Clift: A Critical Disturbance," in Cineaction (Toronto), Summer 1989.
- Simmons, Jerrold, "The Production Code & Precedent," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 20, no. 3, Fall 1992.
- Hall, P., and N. Sivulich, "Letters: Military Movies," in New York Times, section 2, 25 April 1993.
- Vineberg, S., "Fred Zinnemann's Actors," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 18/19, no. 3/1, 1994.
- Sternberg, D., "Real-life References in Four Fred Zinnemann Films," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 18-19, Spring 1994.
- Zinnemann, F., "Letter from Fred Zinnemann," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 19, no. 2, 1994/1995.
- Reid, J.H., in Reid's Film Index, no. 32, 1997.
- Horton, R., "Fred Zinnemann," in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1997.
- MacCabe, Colin, and Geoffrey Macnab, "Bayonets in Paradise: Soldier Stories," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 9, no. 2, February 1999.

* * *

James Jones's novel From Here to Eternity was a bestseller. Portraying Army life immediately before Pearl Harbor, its racy sex scenes, lively and rough language, and vivid characterizations of men under stress made it one of the most widely read books to come out of World War II. Hollywood was interested but felt that the book would be a difficult project. Obviously the realistic and explicit sex scenes were the basis for much of the book's appeal. The book was also very lengthy and somewhat rambling. If one could conquer the problems of translating the language and sex to the screen, could a film be made that captured the spirit of the book? Hollywood wanted to try because the loss of its audience to television and divestiture of the studios' theater chains were forcing Hollywood to provide forms of entertainment that could not be found elsewhere.

Columbia's chief executive Harry Cohn bought the rights and worked on the project directly with producer Buddy Adler, director Fred Zinnemann, and writer Dan Taradash. Cohn appeared on the set to make suggestions and felt that he really contributed to the project. For the first and only time in his career, his name was included in the ads for the film. But Cohn and his director did not have a smooth relationship. Zinnemann had his own ideas how to handle the film.

Zinnemann was an excellent choice as a director. He was known for his respect of actors, and the film was one that for success would depend on the performance of the cast. Zinnemann had also worked on short subjects earlier in his career and had developed a technique of cutting away everything but the necessities—important in bringing From Here to Eternity down to a workable but effective size. Already evident in his work (High Noon, 1952), the thematic concern of From Here to Eternity, how an individual fights for what he believes to be right, was important to Zinnemann and a theme he would return to in later films (A Nun's Story, 1959; A Man for All Seasons, 1966).

Surprisingly, considering the Cold War temperament of the times, the film is not a glorification of military life. Although the problems of bad leadership and abuse of authority are solved by the army in the film (unlike the book), officers are shown to be pompous, arrogant and ignorant. Only some of the enlisted men are shown heroically. No glorious battles are depicted, and the climax is the Japanese sneak attack on Pearl Harbor. With love affairs involving an officer's wife and an enlisted man, a military outcast and a prostitute, the melodrama of military life is the focus of the film. The beach love scene of Burt Lancaster and Deborah Kerr has become a cliché, although at the time it was considered very risqué and erotic.

The film was a very big moneymaker for Columbia, and the production won eight Academy Awards. One of those, for Best Supporting Actor, marked the comeback of Frank Sinatra. Probably most important of all, Hollywood learned that the American audience would support films that attempted to deal with adult situations and problems. The next year Columbia verified this theory with another successful adult drama, On the Waterfront.

—Ray Narducy

FUKUSHU SURU WA WARE NI ARI

(Vengeance Is Mine)

Japan, 1979

Director: Shohei Imamura

Production: Schochiku Co. Ltd.; color, 35mm; running time: 128 minutes. Released 1979. Filmed in Japan.

Producer: Kazuo Inoue; screenplay: Masaru Baba, from a book by Ryuzo Saki; photography: Shinsaku Himeda; editor: Keiichi Uraoka; music: Shinichiro Ikebe.

Cast: Ken Ogata (Iwao Enokizu); Rentaro Mikuni (Shizuo Enokizu); Chocho Mikayo (Kayo Enokizu); Mitsuko Baisho (Kazuko Enokizu); Mayumi Ogawa (Haru Asano); Nijiko Kiyokawa (Hisano Asano).

Award: Kinema Jumbo Award, Best Film, 1979-80.

Publications

Books:

Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, New York, 1978, revised edition, Tokyo, 1985.

Tessier, Max, editor, Le cinéma Japonais au present: 1959-1979, Paris, 1980.

Richie, Donald, with Audie Bock, Notes for a Study on Shohei Imamura, Sydney, 1983.

Piccardi, Adriano, and Angelo Signorelli, Shohei Imamura, Bergamo, 1987.

Quandt, James, Shohei Imamura, Bloomington, 1999.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 26 March 1980.
 “New Directors/New Films,” in The Museum of Modern Art Film Notes, 11–23 April 1980.
 Sartor, F., in Film en Televisie (Brussels), May–June 1980.
 Hoas, S., “Interview with Imamura,” in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), September–October 1981.
 Niogret, B., in Positif (Paris), January 1982.
 Magny, Joel, in Cinéma (Paris), November 1982.
 Tessier, Max, in Image et Son (Paris), November 1982.
 Carrere, E., in Positif (Paris), December 1982.
 Lardeau, Yann, “Je tue donc je suis,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1982.
 Gillett, John, “Shohei Imamura,” in Film Dope (London), January 1983.
 Thibert, X., in Cinématographe (Paris), January 1983.
 Welsh, H., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), February 1983.
 Baecque, Antoine de, “Histoire de douleur,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 425, November 1989.
 Bouquet, Stéphane, “Imamura: le porc et son homme,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 512, April 1997.
 Tobin, Yann, and Hubert Niogret, “Shohei Imamura,” in Positif (Paris), no. 440, October 1997.
 Eisenreich, Pierre, and Hubert Niogret, “Shohei Imamura,” in Positif (Paris), no. 454, December 1998.

* * *

After a long search, in Vengeance Is Mine, the Japanese police finally capture Iwao Enokizu, an almost legendary criminal who’s left a trail of corpses to mark the last year of his murderous rampage across Japan. As the police drive him to prison, a flashback recounts the key moments in Enokizu’s life: the humiliation of his father, a Japanese Catholic, by the military during the war; Enokizu’s brutal murders; and his relationship with the proprietress of a small inn at Hamamatsu, where he has avoided the police dragnet by passing himself off as a professor from Kyoto University. After finally being brought to justice, Enokizu confronts his wife and father—who have entered into an incestuous relationship—and declares that he finally understands the reason behind his rage.

Considered by many critics to be his masterpiece, Vengeance Is Mine marked a return to feature filmmaking for director Shohei Imamura after an eight year “retirement” during which time he worked exclusively on documentaries for Japanese television. The film was extremely successful with both Japanese audiences and critics, who voted it “Best Japanese Film of the Year” in the prestigious film journal Kinema Jumbo. Its box office success allowed Imamura to enter into an advantageous financial relationship with Shochiku Studios, which gave him the possibility of a better level of production while creating new national and international outlets for his work.

Imamura’s work up until 1970 can be characterized as highly textured, almost baroque narratives which freely intertwined the sociological, the sexual, and the political; this was followed by a period in which he explored the outer limits of the documentary and the possibility of attaining a kind of “truth” on film. Vengeance Is Mine introduced a new stage in Imamura’s development. He returns to the narratological complexity of the pre-1970 work, but dispenses with the strong central character (usually female in the earlier films) whose odyssey structures the film. Instead, Vengeance Is Mine introduced a new series of films built on patterns of continuous disorientation, which causes each spectator to question the relation of each image to the next. Often, just the beginnings and ends of actions are shown; it is only later that we discover what actually happened. In Vengeance Is Mine the focus of the action glides between Enokizu, his father, the proprietress at Hamamatsu, and the police investigation, deliberately undercutting any concentration on a single main character. Imamura instead creates a portrait of a world, of which Enokizu is perhaps the ugliest, yet most revealing, manifestation. Brilliantly photographed by Shinsaku Himeda, one of the greatest of all Japanese cinematographers and a frequent collaborator of Imamura’s, Vengeance Is Mine also features a superb performance by Ken Ogata as Enokizu.

—Richard Peña

FUNNY GAMES

Austria, 1997

Director: Michael Haneke

Production: Wega-Film, Vienna; distributed by Metro Tartan Distributors; first released 14 May 1997; color; sound: Dolby Digital; running time: 108 minutes, 59 seconds; length: 9,808 feet.

Producer: Veit Heiduschka; screenplay: Michael Haneke; photography: Jürgen Jürges; assistant director: Hanus Polak, Jr.; editor: Andreas Prochaska; art director: Christoph Kanter; sound: Walter Amann; sound editor: Bernhard Bamberger; special effects/makeup: Waldemar Poktomski; Simone Bachl; special effects/stunts: Mac Steinmeier; Danny Bellens; Willy Neuner; costumes: Lisy Christl; wardrobe: Katharina Nikl; mixer: Hannes Eder; production manager: Werner Reitmeier; united production managers: Alfred Strobl; Phillip Kaiser; post-production: Michael Katz; Ulrike Lasser; script supervisors: Katharina Biro; Jessica Hausner; animals: Animal Action; dog trainer: April Morley.

Cast: Susanne Lothar (Anna Schober); Ulrich Mühe (Georg Schober); Arno Frisch (Paul); Frank Giering (Peter); Stefan Clapczynski (Georg “Schorsch” Schober); Doris Kunstmann (Gerda); Christoph Bantzer (Fred Berlinger); Wolfgang Glück (Robert); Susanne Meneghel (Gerda’s sister); Monika Zallinger (Eva Berlinger).

Awards: Silver Hugo award for Best Director, Chicago International Film Festival, 1997; International Fantasy Film Special Jury Award (for Michael Haneke), Fantasporto (Portugal), 1998.

Funny Games

Publications:

Articles:

Romney, Jonathon, "A Trial by Cinema," in The Guardian (London), 15 May 1997.

Haneke, Michael, "Believing Not Seeing," in Sight and Sound, LFF Supplement (London), November 1997.

Hoberman, J, "Head Trips," in Village Voice (New York), 17 March 1998.

Falcon, Richard, "The Discreet Harm of the Bourgeoisie," in Sight and Sound (London), May 1998.

Film Ireland (Dublin), August/September 1998.

Cinema Papers (Victoria) October 1998.

Andrew, Geoff, "Hurt of the Matter," in Time Out (London), 21–28 October 1998.

Time Out (London) 28 October-4 November 1998.

Sight and Sound (London), December 1998.

Engleberg, Achim, "Nine Fragments about the Films of Michael Haneke," in Filmwaves (London), Winter 1999.

* * *

A celebrated writer and director of television and theatre in Austria, Michael Haneke first grabbed the attention of the international film community with his trilogy of films reporting on "the progressive emotional glaciation" of his country. Manifesting his hatred for the kind of sensationalized violence that, he believes, induces audience passivity, each film was designed to show how desensitization leads to societal alienation and dehumanization. The first, The Seventh Continent (1989), focused on a family's collective suicide; the second, Benny's Video (1992), examined a boy's fatal relationship with a girl and his video-camera; the third and most accessible, 71 Fragments of a Chronology of Chance (1994), foregrounded the senselessness of motiveless murder and suicide.

With Funny Games Haneke went one step further to provoke his audience into considering their relationship to, and consumption of, screen violence. Challenging the conventions of the thriller genre itself, the film confounds expectation and keeps the majority of the violence off-screen, heard but not seen, witnessed only by us through the reactions of the other characters. It is this manner of stylization that most divided critics upon its release. While some were eager to praise the film for its daring originality, others accused it of being both manipulative and patronizing in its tone and approach.

The narrative of the film is simple and centers on a middle-class couple and their son whose idyllic holiday in their lakeside retreat is interrupted by the arrival of two anonymous, well-spoken youths.

Wearing clinical white gloves and calling themselves Peter and Paul (or, with referential irony, Tom and Jerry, Beavis and Butthead), the youths proceed to subject the family to a night of mental and physical torture, referring to each act as a game.

Sign-posting some classic horror/thriller conventions, the film opens upon the tranquillity of an ordered world that is soon to be disrupted by the threat of the unknown. Listening to classical music as they travel by car through the country lanes, the family is coded as safe and bourgeois. At this stage they remain blissfully unaware that, as a portent of the sudden and alarmingly vicious acts to follow, their music is being drowned out by screamingly chaotic heavy metal. Yet despite these early warning notes the film is otherwise relentlessly measured in its slow build up of tension and execution of events.

Although the situation itself seems bizarre, emphasis is placed on the realism of the family's reactions. When the son, Schorsch, is shot (his blood splashed symbolically over the television set) and the youths apparently leave, the camera fixes in excruciatingly long takes—first of the mother, Anna, and then of the father, George. Rather than attempting an immediate escape they sit motionless, caught up in their own personal humiliation and despair, too wounded to move.

To further test the viewers' perceptions of reality, Haneke seeks to increase awareness of the film's fiction. Paul, the more dominant of the psychotic pair, occasionally makes post-modern asides to the camera, psychologically taunting us as much as he taunts the family. "What do you think?" he asks, having told his victims that they will be dead within twelve hours, "Do you think they have a chance of winning?" When Anna manages to grab the shotgun and shoot Peter, he picks up the remote and rewinds the film, bringing his partner back to life again, thereby changing the course of the narrative. At one point he winks towards the screen as if to include the spectators in his game—a hint from the filmmaker that by continuing to watch they make themselves responsible for the perpetration of screen violence.

Upon the release of Funny Games Haneke contentiously declared that "anyone who leaves the cinema doesn't need the film, and anyone who stays does." Bearing in mind the director's desire to educate, the problem with this film is its effectiveness. Although very different from most other horror/thrillers it is a worthy addition to the genre, ranking alongside other experimental works such as The Texas Chainsaw Massacre, Man Bites Dog and Henry, Portrait of a Serial Killer. Shockingly frightening and nihilistic, the spare visual style and subtle insinuation mesmerizes and intrigues rather than discourages. The manner of the two youths is extremely disquieting. These are not the archetypal villains whose behavior is a result of a terrible childhood or trauma—they play merely because they can, because they are bored of their middle-class existence and can no longer maintain any normal human connection. There is also a great sense of loss when the final member of the family to be killed, Anna (played by with devastating sincerity by Susanne Lothar), is pushed into her watery grave. The act finally makes real what has been a suspicion for the last third of the film, that the captors will get away with their crime and, contrary to any hopes and expectations, none of their victims will manage to survive.

Whether or not the central message of Funny Games will make any practical difference to the way in which violence is either presented on the screen or received by its viewers remains to be seen. One suspects not, for as an arthouse rather than a mainstream hit it clearly has a limited audience. The wider audience it seems keen to preach to will therefore remain unconverted while the rest, contrary to Haneke's wishes, will stay in the cinema, continuing to view both this and other violent films out of an "academic" interest.

—Hannah Patterson

FURY

USA, 1936

Director: Fritz Lang

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer; black and white; running time: 92 minutes, length: 8292 feet. Released June 1936.

Producer: Joseph L. Mankiewicz; screenplay: Fritz Lang and Bartlett Cormack, from the novel Mob Rule by Norman Krasna; photography: Joseph Ruttenberg; editor: Frank Sullivan; art directors: Cedric Gibbons, William A. Horning; music: Franz Waxman.

Cast: Spencer Tracy (Joe Wheeler); Sylvia Sidney (Katherine Grant); Walter Abel (District Attorney); Bruce Cabot (Kirby Dawson); Edward Ellis (Sheriff); Walter Brennan (Bugs Meyers); Frank Albertson (Charlie); George Walcott (Tom); Arthur Stone (Durkin); Morgan Wallace (Fred Garrett); George Chandler (Milton Jackson); Roger Gray (The Stranger); Edwin Maxwell (Vickery); Howard Hickman (Governor); Jonathan Hale (The Defence Counsel).

Publications

Script:

Lang, Fritz, and Bartlett Cormack, Fury, in Twenty Best Screenplays, edited by John Gassner and Dudley Nichols, New York, 1943.

Books:

Courtade, Francis, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.

Moulet, Luc, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.

Eibel, Alfred, editor, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1964.

Bogdanovich, Peter, Fritz Lang in America, New York, 1967.

Deschner, Donald, The Films of Spencer Tracy, New York, 1968.

Swindell, Larry, Spencer Tracy: A Biography, New York, 1969.

Jensen, Paul, The Cinema of Fritz Lang, New York, 1969.

Johnston, Claire, Fritz Lang, London, 1969.

Tozzi, Romano, Spencer Tracy, New York, 1973.

Grafe, Frieda, Enno Patalas, and Hans Prinzier, Fritz Lang, Munich, 1976.

Eisner, Lotte, Fritz Lang, edited by David Robinson, New York, 1977.

Armour, Robert, Fritz Lang, Boston, 1978.

Ott, Frederick, The Films of Fritz Lang, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1979.

Jenkins, Stephen, editor, Fritz Lang: The Image and the Look, London, 1981.

- Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
- Kaplan, E. Ann, Fritz Lang: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1981.
- Maibohm, Ludwig, Fritz Lang: Seine Filme, sein Leben, Munich, 1981.
- Dürrenmatt, Dieter, Fritz Lang: Leben und Werk, Basel, 1982.
- Humphries, Reynold, Fritz Lang: Cinéaste américain, Paris, 1982; as Fritz Lang: Genre and Representation in His American Films, Baltimore, 1988.
- Davidson, Bill, Spencer Tracy, Tragic Idol, London, 1987.
- Humphries, Reynold, Fritz Lang: Genre & Representation in His American Films, Ann Arbor, 1989.
- Levin, David J., Richard Wagner, Fritz Lang, and the Nibelungen: The Dramaturgy of Disavowal, Princeton, 1998.
- McGilligan, Patrick, Fritz Lang: The Nature of the Beast, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- New York Times*, 6 June 1936.
- Variety* (New York), 10 June 1936.
- Times* (London), 24 June 1936.
- Kine Weekly* (London), 25 June 1936.
- Sight and Sound* (London), Summer and Autumn 1936.
- Spectator* (London), 3 July 1936.
- Lambert, Gavin, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer and Autumn 1955.
- Cohn, Bernard, in Positif (Paris), February 1964.
- Springer, John, "Sylvia Sidney," in Films in Review (New York), January 1966.
- Thousand Eyes Magazine* (New York), January 1977.
- Listener* (London), 13 August, 1987.
- Kurowski, U., "Fritz Lang," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 7, no. 12, December 1990.
- Smedley, N., "Fritz Lang's Trilogy: The Rise and Fall of a European Social Commentator," in Film History (London), vol. 5, no. 1, March 1993.
- Greene, Graham, "Deux critiques," in Positif (Paris), no. 441, November 1997.

* * *

Like many of Fritz Lang's post-Hitler films, Fury almost didn't get made; according to Lotte Eisner, the project was a "last chance" effort before Lang's one-year MGM contract lapsed. But as Lang's inaugural Hollywood effort, Fury was certainly worth the wait, and in retrospect can be taken as emblematic of the way Lang would be treated by successive generations of reviewers and critics.

A significant number of Fury's contemporary reviewers, for example, divided the film into two halves, the first, in the words of Otis Ferguson, "a powerful and documented piece of fiction about a lynching," the second "a desperate attempt to make love, lynching, and the Hays office come out even." In certain respects the "two parts" description is accurate. Part One: En route to meet his fiancée, Katherine Grant (Sylvia Sidney), Joe Wilson (Spencer Tracy) is arrested for kidnapping on the basis of circumstantial evidence (peanuts, a five dollar bill). An anxious Katherine arrives on the scene just in time to see a mob of locals setting fire to the jailhouse while Joe watches the crowd through the bars of his second story cell. Part Two: After Joe's "death," his tormentors are put on trial for murder and the only witness who will attest to Joe's presence in the jail is Katherine, who slowly comes to suspect (on the basis of a coat she once mended for Joe and a characteristically misspelled note) that Joe is not dead, a fact confirmed when conscience prompts Joe to halt the trial by "presenting" himself in court.

Add to this picture of Fury's sharply bifurcated and allegedly ill-balanced structure related complaints about the story's overall ideological trajectory (shifting the guilt from the mob to Joe) and the film's ending (specifically the courtroom kiss of Joe and Katherine), however, and it is easy to take Fury as two films, its first M-like half the last of Lang's expressionist/social realist masterpieces, its second half the first instance of Lang's debilitating accommodation to the stylistic demands of the Hollywood system. Indeed, there is a substantial body of Lang criticism which contends that Lang never recovered from the Judas kiss of Hollywood after he bowed to MGM's dictate on the matter of Joe and Katherine's courtroom clinch.

There is considerable Langian irony in the fact that defenders of Lang's Hollywood films often derive the terms of their defense from critics, like Noel Burch, who condemn those movies as "a silence lasting some thirty films." Burch, that is, praises Lang for perfecting the transparency of the "continuity" system early in his career, with Dr. Mabuse, der Spieler, after which, on Burch's reading, Lang proceeded to deconstruct continuity conventions by systematic variations, often in the form of editing and narrative ellipses (as in Spione) which finally become, with M, an "auto-nomous" textual system, an "(abstract) function, but in symbiosis with the plot which they both support and challenge." Of the many (mostly French) critics who have written about Lang's American films in similar terms, the most important in regards to Fury is Reynold Humphries, whose central claim is that Lang, contra Burch, never stopped experimenting with the technology and epistemology of cinema.

The central figure of this epistemological concern in Fury is the repeated auto-reference in (of) the film to the fact of movie-going which culminates in the use of newsreel footage at the climax of the trial to prove that various defendants, despite their testimony to the contrary, were indeed at the scene of the riot. According to Humphries, the effect of the newsreel sequence, like the effect of Hollywood films generally, is to confirm the truth of the (film) world, just as Hollywood confirms the truth of our world, even though the truth confirmed is, in fact, a "fiction," authored, in this case, by Joe Wilson, the fiction of Joe's death. And the irony here, in Humphries' view, is that the newsreel footage bears not at all on the question of the alleged crime. The result is that Fury, the frames of which exactly correspond at times to those of the newsreel image, thus undercuts its ostensible (fictive) claim to "objective" photographic truth.

We can go Humphries one better in this analysis by noting, as it were, the "production history" of the newsreel footage. It is quite clear that only a single newsreel camera was at work in the film world; we see the four-man camera/sound crew en route to Strand; we see their fixed tripod camera position in a hotel room overlooking the County Jail square; the prosecuting attorney introduces the footage as the work of a single photographer. Moreover, we saw what they were ostensibly recording (though often from positions the newsreel camera couldn't have occupied); the jail fire is lit from within the building, the crowd gathers in a now quiet square to watch the conflagration (here Katherine arrives), a kid announces the arrival of soldiers, and the crowd scatters while two men dynamite the jail.

Some of the resulting footage is quickly processed and shown in movie houses; Joe sees it some 20 times, he tells his brothers, before he shows up at his gas station, seemingly convinced, almost on its basis, that he was, in fact, “murdered.”

And yet the footage shown in court comes as a complete shock, as if none of the defendants had ever heard of or bothered to see the newsreel. And the shock is justified; what the “newsreel” shows it could not have seen, or have seen that way. We get closeups of Dawson helping to wield the battering ram, though we saw that action and saw no camera crew anywhere near; we see Dawson help construct and Sally Humphrey help ignite a bonfire outside the jail, from camera positions which would have come between the two participants singled out, though both seem amazed when the footage is screened in court; we see Fred Garrett gleefully cutting firehoses with an axe while others wrestle with firemen, yet no fire trucks are evident during the jail-burning sequence, and the square is cleared of bystanders by the time authorities arrive.

All of which can be taken to “reverse” the Reynold Humphries scenario of Fury’s “subject effect”; rather than encouraging us to take a (true) newsreel as confirming a (false) fiction, Lang encourages us to see a (false) newsreel as confirming a (true) fiction, the fiction that, among other things, human beings are capable of grotesque violence, even to their own memories (Mrs. Garrett faints in the courtroom, as if genuinely surprised by her husband’s guilt). At least part of the film’s desire is to recall to mind a national history of forgetfulness on the matter of racial and social violence. And that desire is finally well served by the epistemological hesitancy which Lang’s narrational strategies introduce into our “reading” of Fury. You never know when it might happen to you.

—Leland Poague

OS FUZIS

(The Guns)

Brazil, 1964

Director: Ruy Guerra

Production: Copacabana Films, Embracine, and Daga Filmes (Brazil); black and white, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes; length: 3300 meters. Released 1964. Filmed in Milagres.

Producer: Jarbas Barbosa; screenplay: Miguel Torres and Ruy Guerra, from an adaptation by Pierre Pelegri, Demosthenes Theokary, and Philippe Dumarçay from an original story by Ruy Guerra; photography: Ricardo Aronovich; editor: Ruy Guerra; music: Moacyr Santos.

Cast: Atila Lorio (Gaúcho, the truck driver); Nelson Xavier (Mario); Maria Gladys (Luisa); Leonides Bayer (Sergeant); Paulo Cesar (Soldier); Mauricio Loyola (Bearded prophet); Rui Polanah (Civilian); Hugo Carvana (Soldier); Joel Bacecos (Father of the dead baby); Ivan Candido.

Publications

Book:

Johnson, Randall, and Robert Stam, editors, Brazilian Cinema, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1982.

Articles:

Fieschi, J. A., and J. Narboni, Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1967.
Leduc, F., “Interview with Guerra,” in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), April 1967.

Langlois, G., “Interview with Guerra,” in Cinéma (Paris), June 1967.
Pelegri, P., in Positif (Paris), July 1967.

Zelevan, Van, in Image et Son (Paris), November 1969.

Ciment, Michel, “Ruy Guerra,” in Second Wave (New York), 1970.
Tarratt, Margaret, in Films and Filming (London), December 1972.
Elsaesser, Thomas, “Interview with Ruy Guerra,” in Monogram (London), April 1974.

Burns, Bradford E., and others, “History in the Brazilian Cinema,” in Luso-Brazilian Review (Madison, Wisconsin), Summer 1977.

“The Fall: Formal Innovation and Radical Critique,” in Jump Cut (Berkeley), May 1979.

Castillo, L., “Ruy Guerra: sonar con los pies sobre la tierra,” in Cine Cubano (Habana), no. 134, 1992.

* * *

Os fuzis (The Guns) is, arguably, Ruy Guerra’s greatest political film. This landmark work is unusual in that it relies primarily on a tradition of mainstream commercial cinema—the linear narrative—to convey profoundly political themes. Guerra imaginatively and effectively blends this tradition with features typical of documentary filmmaking.

The action is set in Brazil’s semi-arid, underdeveloped Northeastern backlands (the sertão), and Guerra uses numerous devices, in addition to location shooting, to give his film the look of a documentary. Early in the film, a subtitle appears that specifies the time and place of the action. The sub-plot of the holy man and his bull is, according to Guerra, based on a historical incident. Local customs (a procession of people praying for rain) and types (the leather-clad vaqueiros) are observed. In interview-like sequences, elderly inhabitants recall past events and personages in the region’s history, such as religious zealot Antônio Conselheiro and the government he established and defended at Canudos.

The film’s plot and sub-plot weave together the political problems of the oppression of the villagers by the military and by the forces of fanatic religious mysticism. Gaúcho’s solution, to battle the soldiers, fails because it springs from emotional impulses rather than from any revolutionary consciousness. Gaúcho—himself an outsider—is not a revolutionary leader; his response is personal, and it is not supported by the masses. The butchering of the sacred bull, however, is a collective revolutionary action reflecting a change of consciousness on the part of the villagers. The followers of the holy man had been seeking a fantastic solution (worshipping an animal) instead of a political and/or economic solution to the problem of hunger. The crowd’s cry, “It’s meat!” heralds the downfall of the holy man: his bull has been discarded as a religious symbol; it is now perceived as a source of food.

Unlike many Latin American political films, Os fuzis not only avoids facile political solutions, but it also features complex characters and interpersonal relations. Gaúcho initially acts like a typically exploitative truck driver, but his moral behavior evolves when he sinks as low as the starving villagers. The tortuous mise-en-scène of the love scene between Mario and his girlfriend brilliantly reflects the complex approach-avoidance conflict the girl faces; she loves Mario, but she is restrained in expressing this love by her identification with the villagers and by her revulsion over Mario's complicity in the cover-up. At the end of the film, the villagers have derived no political profit from Gaúcho's suicidal act, and they will continue to be subject to military oppression. The soldiers themselves remain the corrupt victims of the system.

Many Brazilians see Os fuzis as a forceful condemnation of the needless killing, the corruption, and the ties to powerful landowning and entrepreneurial interests that have characterized their country's military. The references in the film to Antônio Conselheiro's rebellion (1896–97) remind viewers that the Brazilian military in the 1960s still operated much as it did during the infamous Canudos campaign—a totalitarian crime perpetrated against a backlands community.

When first shown in Brazil in 1963, Os fuzis did poorly because many viewers considered the film's narrative needlessly obscure and complex. Today, however, critics recognize the film as a great, typical work of the first phase of Brazil's highly regarded Cinema Novo. Guerra, like other filmmakers of this period, opposed the ideology and aesthetics of Hollywood and Brazilian commercial cinema by favoring low-budget, independently produced films shot on location. For Guerra and his colleagues, filmmaking was a key political-cultural activity in the battle against Brazil's neo-colonialism.

—Dennis West

G

GARAM HAWA

---

(Hot Winds)

India, 1973

Director: M.S. Sathyu

Production: Unit 3MM; color, 35mm; running time: 136 minutes (some prints are 144 minutes). Released 1973.

Producer: Ishan Arya, M.S. Sathyu, Abu Siwani; screenplay: Kaifi Azmi, Shama Zaidi, from the unpublished story by Ismat Chughtai; photography: Ishan Arya; editor: S. Chakrabort; music: Ustad Bahadur Khan.

Cast: Balraj Sahni (Salim Mirza); Gita Shauhat Kaifi (Amina Mirza); Jalal Agha (Shamshad); Dinanath Zutski (Halim); Badar Begum (Salim's mother); Abu Siwani (Baqar Mirza); Faroukh Shaikh (Sikander Mizra); Jamal Hashmi (Kazim).

Awards: National Award for Best Film on Integration and Best Screenplay, India, 1974; Filmfare Award for Best Screenplay and Best Story Writer, India, 1974.

Publications:

Script:

Azmi, Kafi and Shama Zaidi, Three Hindi Film Scripts, 1974.

Books:

Barnouw, Erik, and S. Krishnaswamy, Indian Film, New York and London, 1963.

Chakravarty, Sumita S., National Identity in Indian Popular Cinema, 1947–1987, Austin, Texas, 1993.

* * *

Garam Hawa (Hot Winds) was the first feature from director M.S. (Mysore Shrivinas) Sathyu of India. The film was controversial from its inception, as it was the first film to deal with the human consequences resulting from the 1947 partition of India. This action, ordered by British Lord Mountbatten, split India into religious coalitions, with India remaining Hindi and the new country of Pakistan serving as a refuge for Muslims.

Despite its controversial subject matter the film was initially accepted by a commercial producer, but then pressure and fear of the critical and governmental reception of such a work led to a rapid withdrawal of the offer. Sathyu turned to the government sponsored Film Financing Corporation (FFC) for support. This agency was created as an alternative for filmmakers seeking financing for work which was not commercially embraced by institutional distributors. Its aim was to free these artists from the dominance of loan agencies and their control of film content. Sathyu secured FFC financing and his film, based on an unpublished story by Marxist activist Ismat Chughtai, was completed in the city of Agra. The production of the film was plagued by a smattering of public protests; ultimately, Sathyu had to divert attention from his actual locations by using a fake second unit crew and sending them out with an unloaded camera.

Once finished, Garam Hawa was again the subject of controversy; it was banned as an “instigation to communal dissension.” Sathyu was strong in his conviction, however, and he showed the film to many government leaders and journalists. The influence of these people on the censorship board led to a reversal of the ban. The film went on to win a national award for its contribution to “national integration.” More recognition followed, including accolades that praised the film’s efforts to create “a language of common identity” and to humanize the situation endured by Muslims in North India who did not wish to move from their homes after the partition.

The screenplay for Garam Hawa was written by Kaifi Azmi (an Indian poet and lyricist) and Shama Zaidi, Sathyu’s wife. The tale is a complex narrative assembled with loving attention to detail. The story’s main focal point is Salim Mirza, played by veteran actor Balraj Sahani in his final film before his death. Salim is a Muslim shoemaker and patriarch who does not want to relocate to Pakistan. There is the added element of a love story woven into this political narrative, however, and it is this element which adds greater meaning to the story. The filmmaker’s adept use of light and framing adds dimension to the characters and their struggles.

Salim’s daughter, Amina (Gita Shauhat Kaifi), is betrothed to Kazim (Jamal Hashmi); they are shown to be deeply in love and very happy together. Kazim goes across the border to Pakistan to find work (as there is none for Muslims in Agra as the story progresses). When he returns to marry Amina, he is arrested. She pines for her lost lover, but has the attentions of Shamshad (Jalal Agha), whom she does not love and does not wish to marry. Her agony is a reflection of her father’s; these people are trapped between two worlds.

Salim is powerless against the shift in attitudes and political climate; he finds himself unable to secure bank loans, unable to keep possession of his family home, and losing his means of survival as once-loyal customers take their business elsewhere. He has done nothing wrong, yet he is punished by the post-partition environment in Agra. As Salim's situation becomes more grave, the camera frames him in smaller spaces, implying his imprisonment in his own hometown. He says, "They have taken everything. Only our faith will survive." He is strong, but he is discouraged by the exodus of family members into Pakistan. In the end, he too makes the journey to the train. On the way, Salim and his son Sikander (Faroukh Shaikh) encounter a massive protest rally which seeks to unite the dispossessed of the nation. First Sikander, and then Salim, join the flag-waving mob. The train is forgotten, and the final scene brings a sense of hope as we see Salim accept his situation in a new way and begin to take charge of his life.

Garam Hawa

—Tammy Kinsey

GATE OF HELL

See JIGOKUMON

IL GATTOPARDO

(The Leopard)

Italy-France, 1962

Director: Luchino Visconti

Production: Titanus (Rome)/SN Pathe-Cinema (Paris)/SGC (Paris); DeLuxe color (original version: Technicolor); CinemaScope (original version: Technirama); running time: 184 minutes (British version 161 minutes), original running time: 205 minutes. Dubbed. Released 1962.

Producer: Goffredo Lombardo; executive producer: Pietro Notarianna; screenplay: Suso Cecchi D'Amico, Pasquale Festa Campanile, Massimo Franciosa, Enrico Medioli, Luchino Visconti, from the novel by Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa; assistant directors: Rinaldo Ricci, Albino Cocco, Francesco Massaro, Brad Fuller; dialogue director: Archibald Colquhoun; photography: Giuseppe Rotunno; editor: Mario Serandrei; sound: Mario Messina; art director: Mario Garbuglia; costumes: Piero Tosi; music: Nino Rota.

Cast: Burt Lancaster (Don Fabrizio, Prince of Salina); Alain Delon (Tancredi); Claudia Cardinale (Angelica Sedara); Paolo Stoppa (Don Calogera Sedara); Rina Morelli (Maria Stella); Serge Reggiana (Don Ciccio Tumeo); Romolo Valli (Father Pirrone); Leslie French (Chevally); Ivo Garrani (Colonel Pallavicino); Mario Girotti (Count Cavriaghi); Pierre Clementi (Francesco Paolo); Lucilla Morlacchi (Concetta); Giuliano Gemma (The Garibaldino General); Ida Galli (Carolina); Ottavia Piccolo (Caterina); Carlo Valenzano (Paolo); Anna Maria Bottini (Mlle. Dombreuil); Marino Mase (Tutor); Lola Braccini (Donna Margherita); Howard N. Rubien (Don Diego).

Publications

Script:

Visconti, Luchino, and others, Il gattopardo, Bologna, 1963.

Books:

Baldelli, Pio, I film di Luchino Visconti, Manduria, 1965.
 Guillaume, Yves, Visconti, Paris, 1966.
 Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, Luchino Visconti, New York, 1968.
 Baldelli, Pio, Luchino Visconti, Milan, 1973.
 Thomas, Tony, Burt Lancaster, New York, 1975.
 Ferrero, Adelio, editor, Visconti: Il cinema, Modena, 1977.
 Rode, Henri, Alain Delon, Paris, 1977.
 Tornabuoni, Lietta, editor, Album Visconti, Milan, 1978.
 Stirling, Monica, A Screen of Time: A Study of Luchino Visconti, New York, 1979.
 Rondolini, Gianni, Luchino Visconti, Turin, 1981.
 Servadio, Gaia, Luchino Visconti: A Biography, London, 1981.
 Zana, Jean-Claude, Alain Delon, Paris, 1981.
 Bencivenni, Alessandro, Luchino Visconti, Florence, 1982.
 Barbier, Philippe, Alain Delon, Paris, 1983.
 Tonetti, Claretta, Luchino Visconti, Boston, 1983; revised edition, 1998.
 Clinch, Minty, Burt Lancaster, London, 1984.
 Hunter, Allan, Burt Lancaster: The Man and His Movies, New York, 1984.

Il Gattopardo

Ishaghpour, Youssef, Luchino Visconti: Le Sens et l'image, Paris, 1984.
 Sanzio, Alain, and Paul-Louis Thirard, Luchino Visconti: Cinéaste, Paris, 1984.
 Windeler, Robert, Burt Lancaster, London, 1984.
 De Guisti, Luciano, I film di Luchino Visconti, Rome, 1985.
 Geitel, Klaus, and others, Luchino Visconti, Munich, 1985.
 Mancini, Elaine, Luchino Visconti: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1986.
 Villien, Bruno, Visconti, Paris, 1986.
 Lacourbe, Roland, Burt Lancaster, Paris, 1987.
 Schifano, Laurence, Luchino Visconti: Les Feux de la passion, Paris, 1987.
 Lagny, Michèle, Senso, Luchino Visconti: étude critique, Paris, 1992.
 Renzi, Renzo, Visconti segreto, Rome, 1994.
 Bacon, Henry, Visconti: His Life, His Films, New York, 1998.
 Bacon, Henry, Visconti: Explorations of Beauty and Decay, Cambridge, 1998.

Articles:

Cinema Nuovo (Bergamo), 1962.
 Sadoul, Georges, in Filmstudio, no. 41, 1963.
 "Visconti Issue" of Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), no. 26–27, 1963.
Variety (New York), 17 April 1963.
 "Visconti, the Leopard Man," in Vogue (New York), July 1963.
Motion Picture Herald (New York), 21 August 1963.
Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August 1963.
 Martin, Marcel, "Visconti et l'histoire," in Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1963.
Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1963–64.
 Mendes Sargo, Tino, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1963–64.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1964.
 Davies, Brenda, "Can the Leopard?," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1964.
 "Visconti Issue" of Cinema (Rome), April 1970.
 Bogemski, G., in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), October and December 1979 and January, April, and June 1980.
 Turroni, G., "Le citazioni del gusto," in Filmcritica (Florence), January 1982.
 Ehrenstein, D., "Leopard Redux," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1983.
 Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, in "Lampedusa Revisited," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1983.
 Gordon, A., "Has the Leopard Got Its Spots Back," in Stills (London), November-December 1983.
 Ranvaud, Ron, "Remounting the Leopard," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1983.
 Lehti, S., in Soundtrack (Los Angeles), June 1984.
 Villier, Bruno, "Tancredi," in Cinématographe (Paris), September-October 1984.
Frauen und Film (Berlin), August 1986.
 Bouvier, M., "Entre-temps," in Camera/Style (Paris), December 1989.
 Roberti, B., "Ombre allo specchio," in Filmcritica (Rome), November 1991.
 Piersanti, A., "Il gattopardo e morto viva il gattopardo," in Revue de la Cinémathèque (Montreal), May 1992.
 Rotunno, Giuseppe, "Recupero dei film Il gattopardo e Le notti bianche," in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), vol. 42, no. 346, November-December 1993.

Cieslar, Jirí, "Concettino ohlédnutí," in Film a Doba (Prague), vol. 40, no. 4, Winter 1994.
 Liempt, J. Van, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 455, October 1995.
 Mandolini, C., "Le guepard," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 189/190, March/June 1997.
 Rohdie, S., "Time and Consciousness in Luchino Visconti," in Metro Magazine (St. Kilda West), no. 113/114, 1998.

* * *

Only in recent years has it been at all possible to appreciate Il gattopardo in Britain and the United States, where the film was originally released in a hideously mutilated version rightly disowned by Visconti. Twentieth Century-Fox, who had co-financed the film with the Italian company Titanus, cut it from 206 to 161 minutes, printed it on DeLuxe as opposed to the original Technicolor stock (resulting in a look both muddy and garish), and substituted a crudely dubbed American soundtrack for the carefully prepared Italian original. The version now in circulation respects all of Visconti's original intentions, the running time of 186 minutes being the length to which Visconti finally cut his film.

Il gattopardo is based on the novel of the same name written by the Sicilian Prince Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa and published in 1958. Like Visconti's earlier Senso it is set at the time of the Risorgimento, only here the setting is Sicily and the action takes place against the background of Garibaldi's expedition to Sicily to depose the Bourbon kingdom of Francis II and to unite the island with Italy. The film focuses on the Salina family, at the head of which stands Prince Fabrizio, who stands aloof from the whole Garibaldi affair, seeing it as little more than a change of dramatis personae in the same old play. However, his nephew Tancredi Falconeri joins Garibaldi's army and becomes an officer in the army of Victor Emmanuel, the first king of a unified Italy. He also falls in love with Angelica, the daughter of Don Calogero Sedara, a former peasant who has risen to the rank of mayor of Donnafugata, where Prince Salina has his summer residence. Not only is she beautiful but also very rich, and Tancredi needs her money if he is to fulfil his political ambitions, since his family, though aristocratic, are relatively impecunious. Conscious of the decline of his class, Prince Salina asks Don Calogero for the hand of his daughter on Tancredi's behalf and the film climaxes in a sumptuous ball for the noble society of Palermo at which the young couple are officially "introduced" to the social world.

The central, overriding theme of Il gattopardo, like Senso, is "trasformismo," neatly encapsulated by the opportunistic Tancredi in the words "if we want things to stay as they are, things will have to change." What the film presents is the gradual submergence and transformation of a noble Italian family; as Geoffrey Nowell-Smith puts it, "the bourgeoisie marry into the aristocracy and the Byronic aristocrat sinks gently into bien-pensant mediocrity as the revolutionary storm subsides." The truly remarkable ball scene, which takes up about one-third of the film's length and involves some 200 people in 14 interconnected rooms, is not simply an incredible directorial tour-de-force; rather it decisively marks the transition from the tired, old nobility represented by Prince Salina to the thrusting ambition of the new ruling class represented by Don Calogero. Burt Lancaster's performance during this extended climax to the film is nothing short of remarkable, as is Visconti's consummate skill in blending the various intimate, personal dramas within the wider mise-en-scène. As in the rest of the film only Prince Salina seems fully aware of what is happening to his class, and as the sumptuous festivities continue he assumes an expression of increasing disgust and melancholy, at one moment pointedly studying a painting entitled The Death of the Just. However, his nobility and dignity never desert him, and, when Angelica invites him to waltz with her, his awareness of her youth and beauty eclipses his sadness for a moment and, in an extraordinarily moving scene, he symbolically hands over power with grace and pride.

