Il gattopardo is dominated almost equally by the presence of Prince Salina and the Sicilian landscape. At one point, in conversation with a member of the Piedmontese aristocracy, Prince Salina argues that in Sicily “the environment, the climate, the landscape” all militate against change, and Visconti perfectly captures the feeling of the long, oppressively hot, sleep-inducing Sicilian summers that the original novel describes so evocatively.

—Julian Petley

THE GENERAL

USA, 1926

Directors: Buster Keaton and Clyde Bruckman

Production: Buster Keaton Productions and United Artists; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 74 minutes; length: 8 reels, 7500 feet. Released 18 December 1926, New York. Re-released after 1928 with musical soundtrack and sound effects. Filmed during 1926 in Oregon. Cost: $250,000 (estimated).

Producers: Joseph Schenck and Buster Keaton; scenario: Al Boasberg and Charles Smith after a storyline by Buster Keaton and Clyde Bruckman, adapted by Al Boasberg and Charles Smith from The Great Locomotive Chase by William Pittinger; photography: Dev Jennings and Bert Haines; editors: Sherman Kell with Harry Barnes; production designer: Fred Gabourie; technical director: Fred Gabourie.

Cast: Buster Keaton (Johnnie Gray); Marion Mack (Annabelle Lee); Glen Cavender (Capt. Anderson); Jim Farley (General Thatcher); Frederick Vroom (Southern general); Charles Smith (Annabelle's father); Frank Barnes (Annabelle's brother); Joe Keaton, Mike Denlin, Tom Nawm (Union generals).

Publications

Script:

Keaton, Buster, and others, “Le Mécano de la General,” in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1975.

Books:

- Keaton, Buster, with Charles Samuels, My Wonderful World of Slapstick, New York, 1960; London, 1967.
- Turconi, Davide, and Francesco Savio, Buster Keaton, Venice, 1963.
- Lebel, Jean-Patrick, Buster Keaton, Paris, 1964.
- Oms, Marcel, Buster Keaton, Lyons, 1964.
- Blesh, Rudi, Keaton, New York, 1966.
- McCaffrey, Donald, Four Great Comedians, New York, 1968.
- Robinson, David, Hollywood in the Twenties, New York, 1968.
- Robinson, David, Buster Keaton, London, 1968.
- Brownlow, Kevin, The Parade's Gone By, London and New York, 1969.
- Rubinstein, E., Filmguide to The General, Bloomington, Indiana, 1973.
- Coursodon, Jean-Pierre, Buster Keaton, Paris, 1973; revised edition, 1986.
- Mast, Gerald, The Comic Mind: Comedy and the Movies, Chicago, 1974; revised edition, 1979.
- Kerr, Walter, The Silent Clowns, New York, 1975.
- Anobile, Richard, editor, The Best of Buster, New York, 1976.
- Wead, George, Buster Keaton and the Dynamics of Visual Wit, New York, 1976.
- Moews, Daniel, Keaton: The Silent Features Close Up, Berkeley, 1977.
- Wead, George, and George Ellis, The Film Career of Buster Keaton, Boston, 1977.
- Dardis, Tom, Keaton: The Man Who Wouldn't Lie Down, New York, 1979.
- Benayoun, Robert, The Look of Buster Keaton, Paris, 1982; London, 1984.
- Brunovska Karnick, Kristine, and Henry Jenkins, editors, Classical Hollywood Comedy, New York, 1995.
- Mead, Marion, Buster Keaton: Cut to the Chase, New York, 1995.
- Oldham, Gabriella, Keaton's Silent Shorts: Beyond the Laughter, Carbondale, 1996.
- Amiel, Vincent, Corps au cinéma: Keaton, Bresson, Cassavetes, Paris, 1998.
- Knopf, Robert, The Theater and Cinema of Buster Keaton, Princeton, 1999.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 9 February 1927.
- Keaton, Joseph, in Photoplay (New York), May 1927.
- Penelope Houston, in Sight and Sound (London), April-June 1953.
- Agee, James, Agee on Film I, New York, 1958.
- “Keaton Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August 1958.
- Bishop, Christopher, “The Great Stone Face,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1958.
- Baxter, Brian, “Buster Keaton,” in Film (London), November-December 1958.
- Strick, Philip, in Films and Filming (London), September 1961.
- “Rétrospective Buster Keaton,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1962.
- Sadoul, Georges, “Le Mécano de la General,” in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 28 June 1962.

The General

Eyles, Allen, in Films and Filming (London), October 1963.

Gillett, John, and James Blue, "Keaton at Venice," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1965–66.

Sadoul, Georges, "Le Génie de Buster Keaton," in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 10 February 1966.

Mast, Gerald, "The Gold Rush and The General," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1970.

Villelaur, Anne, "Buster Keaton," in Dossiers du cinéma: Cinéastes 1, Paris, 1971.

Sarris, Andrew, "Buster Keaton," in The Primal Screen, New York, 1973.

Cott, Jeremy, "The Limits of Silent Comedy," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1975.

Wead, George, "The Great Locomotive Chase," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), July-August 1977.

Warshow, Paul, "More Is Less, Comedy and Sound," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1977.

Kirby, Lynne, "Temporality, Sexuality, and Narrative in The General," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 9, no. 1, 1987.

Yperen, Paul van, "Het affiche: The General," in Skrien (Amsterdam), no. 166, June-July 1989.

Sanders, J., "Dreaming in Pictures," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 47, no. 4, 1994.

Rohmer, Éric, in Positif (Paris), no. 400, June 1994.

Horvath, G., "Almomban Keaton," in Filmvilag (Budapest), vol. 38, no. 12, 1995.

Review, in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 178, May-June 1995.

* * *

The General is by far the most famous of the comedy features in which Buster Keaton starred, and in several cases directed or co-directed, between 1923 and 1928. It is also one of the finest, and has appeared on many 10-best-films lists. All of his silent features followed a basic story formula (a popular one in silent comedy): a young "failure" finally displays prowess and wins the girl. In addition, his films demonstrated, in part or in whole, a striking cinematic imagination as well as superb comic acting. While The General may not be a greater artistic achievement than The Navigator or Sherlock, Jr., it has a number of features that have made it a special favorite of silent film fans.

The film is distinctive for its Civil War setting and location shooting. It was shot mostly in Oregon, where the necessary narrow-gauge railroad tracks were still to be found. (Compare, for contrast, the studio look of Chaplin's The Gold Rush, made at about the same time.) The unusually fine photography (Matthew Brady comparisons are inevitable), the extensive action involving the trains, the ambitious subject based on history (the theft and recovery of the locomotive, "The General"), and the serious element of the drama combined to give this film an epic sweep that is surely unique in silent comedy.

In the typical Buster Keaton comedy the hero is at first anything but heroic: he is callow, bumbling, and even in some films effete. Through perseverance, self-teaching, and luck he becomes a success and—sometimes as a bonus but usually as the original goal—he is united with the woman of his dreams. The General is distinctive in that Johnnie Gray is an expert in at least one field, railroad engineering. In fact his competence at his job is what prevents him from being accepted into the Confederate army, setting the rest of the plot in motion. Of course, he must still demonstrate bravery to win the heart of Annabelle Lee; and, to satisfy himself, must succeed as a soldier as well. To be sure, even in railroading he makes some spectacularly comic mistakes in pursuing the Yankee train-nappers. He does, however, demonstrate early on the kind of hilariously smooth efficiency that other Keaton characters learn only with time (as in The Navigator) or achieve in fantasy (Sherlock, Jr.): e.g., his clambering aboard The General and pressing the starter lever in one swift movement; or his deft way of knocking out a Yankee guard face-to-face. The unself-conscious heroism and expertise of Johnnie Gray are simultaneously touching and amusing—though much of his success is also due to good fortune (as with the flyaway blade of his sword in the battle scene).

The heroine of the film, delightfully played by Marion Mack, has a larger and more unusual role than in the other Keaton features (excepting The Navigator). Usually a Keaton heroine is either haughty or sweet, but in each case little more than the goal to be attained; Annabelle is forced by circumstances to become skilled in railroading while fleeing southward with The General. There is some stereotyping of the foolish female in some of Annabelle's earlier efforts to block the pursuers and feed the engine, but the evolving of her role from the "unattainable goal" to a partner in action is still refreshing. The moment in which the exasperated Johnnie feigns strangling his dream girl and then swiftly kisses her is one of the more memorable romantic gestures in silent film.

The General is filled with surprising moments: brilliant comic gags or fine touches of sentiment that never go on long enough to become maudlin. Perhaps the comedy is especially striking because it grows out of a serious melodramatic pursuit—but it is particularly satisfying because it stems from the characters of the hero and heroine or from the ironic perspective of the camera. The point has often been made that the camera in Chaplin's films was used mainly to record the body or facial movements of its pantomime hero, while in Keaton's film the comedy often depends on special placement of the camera, or on special visual effects. A classic example in The General occurs when Johnnie has accidentally caused the cannon attachment to be aimed directly at his own train. However, he and his train are spared, and better yet, the Yankees are convinced of the powers of their pursuer(s), when the forepart of Johnnie's train curves left and the cannon fires directly ahead—nearly blasting the back car of the train on the track ahead. The elegance of the gag centers on the placement of the camera behind and above the cannon car, grandly recording the beautifully timed action in one shot. Another famous moment in the film—this one visually simple and emotionally complex—occurs when Johnnie, rejected by Annabelle, sits disconsolately on the crossbar of the engine's wheels as the train starts up. The crossbar carries him up and down twice before he realizes what is going on. His forlorn, unmoving body posture is at once astonishingly sad and funny; any drift into sentimentality is avoided by Johnnie's suddenly aware look as he passes into the train shed. The overall wit and irony of the shot are dependent on the camera being placed at a sufficient distance to show the small size of Johnnie's body against the sublimely indifferent machine.

Much more could be said about this shot, and has been said by analysts of the film: e.g., the way it stresses a "togetherness" between Johnnie and his beloved engine, which is a major subject of the film; and the way that the final shot of the film is a counterpart to it, with both Johnnie and Annabelle sitting on the crossbar. This correspondence of shots is a reminder that the construction of the film is unusually tight and balanced in its overall arc of chase and return. The more one attempts to analyze the comedy, or merely describe certain brilliant shots—such as the one of Johnnie on the cowcatcher removing logs from the tracks—the more one admires the classic assurance and economy of the film.

—Joseph Milicia

THE GERMAN SISTERS

See DIE BLEIERNE ZEIT

GERMANY IN AUTUMN

See DEUTSCHLAND IM HERBST

GERTIE THE DINOSAUR

USA, 1914

Director: Winsor McCay

Production: Black and white, 35mm, animation, silent; running time: about 7 minutes (length varies). Released as one-reel film in 1914, though the character was created and seen in a short cartoon in McCay's vaudeville act circa 1909.

Script, animation, photography, and editing: Winsor McCay;
assisted by: John Fitzsimmons.

Gertie the Dinosaur

Publications

Books:

- Madsen, Roy, Animated Film: Concepts, Methods, Uses, New York, 1969.
 Everson, William, K., American Silent Film, New York, 1978.
 Canemaker, John, Winsor McCay: His Life and Art, New York, 1987.

Articles:

- Phester, Montgomery, "People of the Stage: Winsor McCay," in Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, 28 November 1909.
 "The History of the Animated Cartoon," in Journal of Motion Pictures Inventors, 24 September 1933.
 McCay, Winsor, "Movie Cartoons," in New York Evening Journal, 27 July 1934.
 Wilson, H., "McCay Before Disney," in Time (New York), 10 January 1938.

Schwerin, Jules, "Drawings That Are Alive," in Films in Review (New York), September 1950.

O'Sullivan, Judith, "In Search of Winsor McCay," in American Film Institute Report (Washington, D.C.), Summer 1974.

Canemaker, J., "Winsor McCay," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1975.

Canemaker, J., "The Birth of Animation," in Millimeter (New York), April 1975.

Hearn, Michael Patrick, "The Animated Art of Winsor McCay," in American Artist (New York), May 1975.

Cornand, A., "Le Festival d'Annecy et les rencontres internationales du cinéma d'animation," in Image et Son (Paris), January 1977.

Blonder, R., "Mosquitoes, Dinosaurs, and the Image-ination," in Animatrix (Los Angeles), no. 8, 1994/1995.

* * *

Gertie the Dinosaur is the masterpiece of early animation. It employed 10,000 animated drawings inked on rice paper and mounted on cardboard. Artist Winsor McCay used full animation—a new drawing for each individual frame of film—and while he himself did all the drawings of Gertie, he hired his young neighbor John Fitzsimmons to assist him in tracing the stationary background of trees, rocks and water. Gertie is the improvement and development of McCay's animation experiments in his first two films, Little Nemo and The Story of a Mosquito.

McCay originally made Gertie for his vaudeville act as a lighting-sketch artist. In the routine, McCay announced that he could make a drawing come to life; then a projected film depicting an animated dinosaur walking from the background into the foreground appeared. McCay talked to the cartoon Gertie and gave her commands to which she would respond. Gertie raised her left leg, devoured a tree stump, became distracted by a sea serpent, lay down and rolled over, tossed a passing elephant into the lake, cried like a child when scolded, and caught a pumpkin supposedly tossed to her by McCay. As the first cartoon star, she displayed the charm, personality, and mischievousness of a playful puppy. For the finale, Gertie bent down and as she got up and walked away, carried an animated man on her back, thus appearing to take McCay into the screen with her.

For wider distribution, McCay turned his Gertie the Dinosaur into a one-reel film which frames the animated sequence with a live-action story. In the live-action portion, McCay accepts a bet from fellow cartoonist George McManus that he can make the dinosaur come to life. McCay is then shown with his stacks of cards demonstrating the laborious process by which he made Gertie. At a dinner of cartoonists, he unveils his masterpiece, and the animated sequence incorporates a series of title cards for McCay's dialogue with Gertie. After the animation ends, the dinner party toasts McCay's achievement, and McManus winds up losing the bet as well as footing the bill for dinner.

In its own time, Gertie the Dinosaur overshadowed all prior animated films, and it inspired a generation of animators who would begin their careers over the next decade. Audiences today still marvel at the fluidity of the movement and the amount of animated detail—Gertie's sides expanding and contracting as she breathes, particles of dirt falling from the tree trunk she devours, Gertie swaying back and forth. The shimmering or vibrating lines in the background (due to a primitive retracing process) hardly matter and do not detract from the captivating dinosaur in the foreground.

McCay also used for the first time an animation method known as the split system. Instead of drawing an "action" in sequential order, he split it up into poses, drawing the first pose, the last pose, the halfway pose, and then continuing to draw the poses in between the last two drawn. In this manner, he was able to simplify timing and placement with a method that underwent further refinement only after the advent of sound cartoons in 1928, when Walt Disney insisted upon its use. McCay also discovered another labor saving device in Gertie by re-using drawings for repeated cycles of action. He drew Gertie making a gesture—breathing or swaying—and rephotographed the same series of drawings several times.

While it was neither the first animated cartoon nor McCay's first animated cartoon, Gertie the Dinosaur is generally regarded as the first important cartoon in film history.

—Lauren Rabinovitz

GERTRUD

Denmark, 1964

Director: Carl Theodor Dreyer

Production: Palladium (Denmark); black and white, 35mm; running time: 115 minutes; length: 3440 meters. Released 8 December 1964, Paris.

Producers: Jørgen Nielsen with John Hilbard as executive producer; screenplay: Carl Theodor Dreyer, from the play by Hjalmar Söderberg; photography: Henning Bendtsen with Arne Abrahamsen; editor: Edith Schlüssel; sound: Knud Kristensen; art director: Kai Rasch; music and solo numbers: Jørgen Jersild; songs: Grethe Risbjerg Thomsen; costume designer: Berit Nykjaer.

Cast: Nina Pens Rode (Gertrud Kanning); Bendt Rothe (Gustav Kanning); Ebbe Rode (Gabriel Lidman); Baard Owe (Erland Jansson); Axel Strøbye (Axel Nygren); Anna Malberg (Kanning's Mother); Edouard Mielche (The Rector Magnificus); Vera Gebuhr (Kanning's Maid); Karl Gustav Ahlefeldt; Lars Knutzon; William Knoblauch; Valsø Holm; Ole Sarvig.

Gertrud

Publications

Script:

Dreyer, Carl Theodor, Gertrud, in Cinque Film, Turin, 1967.

Books:

- Bowser, Eileen, The Films of Carl Dreyer, New York, 1964.
 Dreyer, Carl Theodor, Om filmen, Copenhagen, 1964.
 Monty, Ib, Portrait of Carl Th. Dreyer, Copenhagen, 1965.
 Dyssegaard, Soren, editor, Carl Th. Dreyer, Danish Film Director, Copenhagen, 1968.
 Perrin, Claude, Carl Th. Dreyer, Paris, 1969.
Carl Theodor Dreyer, Amsterdam, 1970.
 Milne, Tom, The Cinema of Carl Dreyer, New York, 1970.
 Sémolué, Jean, Carl Th. Dreyer, Paris, 1970.
 Schrader, Paul, Transcendental Style in Film: Ozu, Bresson, Dreyer, Berkeley, 1972.
 Skoller, Donald, editor, Dreyer in Double Reflection, New York, 1973; revised edition, 1991.
 Nash, Mark, editor, Dreyer, London, 1977.
 Tone, Pier Giorgio, Carl Theodor Dreyer, Florence, 1978.
 Bordwell, David, The Films of Carl Theodor Dreyer, Berkeley, 1981.
 Drouzy, Maurice, Carl Theodor Dreyer nē Nilsson, Paris, 1982.
 Carney, Raymond, Speaking the Language of Desire: The Films of Carl Dreyer, Cambridge, 1989.
 Jensen, Jytte, editor, Carl Dreyer: Films, New York, 1990.
 Houe, Poul, Carl Theodor Dreyer's Cinematic Humanism, Minneapolis, 1992.

Articles:

- Kelman, Ken, "Dreyer," in Film Culture (New York), no. 35, 1964–65.
 Téchiné, André, "La Parole de la fin," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 164, 1965.
 Tournés, Andrée, in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), no. 5, 1965.
 Trolle, Børge, "Ett spel om en dröm: En analys av Carl Th. Dreyers film Gertrud," in Filmrutan (Stockholm), no. 1, 1965.
 Delahaye, Michel, "Between Heaven and Hell: Interview with Carl Dreyer," in Cahiers du Cinema in English (New York), no. 4, 1966.
 Wright, Elsa Gress, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1966.
 Trolle, Børge, "An interview with Carl Dreyer," in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1966.
 Bond, Kirk, "The Basic Demand of Life for Love," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1966.
 Lerner, Carl, "My Working Is in Relation to the Future: A Conversation with Carl Dreyer," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1966.
 Skoller, Donald, "To Rescue Gertrud," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1966.
 Perruzzi, Giuseppe, "Corenza e modernità di Gertrud," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), no. 190, 1967.
 Jones, Chris, in Films and Filming (London), January 1969.
 Burch, Noël, "Propositions," in Afterimage (Rochester, New York), no. 5, 1974.
 El Guedj, F., and E. Decaux, in Cinématographe (Paris), October 1983.

- Magny, Joel, in Cinéma (Paris), October 1983.
 Tesson, Charles, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1983.
 Sainderichin, Guy-Patrick, "Gertrud: Amer omnia," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1983.
 "Gertrud Section" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), December 1984.
 Rosenbaum, Jonathan, "Gertrud: The Desire for the Image," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1985–86.
 Cowie, E., "Zvijace identifikacije," in Ekran, vol. 16, no. 3, 1991.
 Miguez, M., and J.M. Minguet Batllori, and S. Torres, in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 5, January 1991.
 Grob, Norbert, "Gertrud," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 11, no. 6, June 1994.
 De La Fuente, Flavia, "El amor lo es todo," in El Amante Cinema, no. 52, June 1996.
 Idström, Annika, "Kuolematon äiti," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 1, 1997.

* * *

For the last 20 years of his career, Dreyer worked on a film about Jesus Christ. It was never realized, though his script was published posthumously in 1968. Near the end of his life, Dreyer was also planning a film of Medea. He was aiming at tragedy, reflected again in Gertrud, which was to be his last film.

Dreyer's last four films were based on plays. Gertrud is a 1906 play by Hjalmar Söderberg. It is a problem-drama in the manner of Ibsen, but while the play is naturalistic, the film is not. Dreyer considered the film an experiment; he wanted to co-ordinate the word and the image, to create harmony between what is seen and what is heard. The function of the images is to open up a perspective on the characters, who manifest themselves in the way they speak and move. Gertrud contains almost no close-ups; it is a film of travelling shots and long, uncut scenes. The film has only 89 shots, with very few sets and only one exterior scene. The film's depiction of life/reality is antinaturalistic and stylized, and Dreyer treats the story as a tragedy. He called the film "a portrait of time from the beginning of the century," and he has stressed typical features of that period and milieu. As in La passion de Jeanne d'Arc he has tried to transform the whole of "the past reality into camera-reality," to quote Siegfried Kracauer.

Gertrud is the last of Dreyer's many portraits of women. Gertrud, however, is not a suffering woman, submissive to men; she is superior to them. A free intellectual woman with strong willpower, she rejects the men in her life. While these men prefer their careers and pleasures, for Gertrud love is all. Gertrud knows she will always come second, and prefers to abandon men and withdraw into solitude. She knows that her demands on life cannot be fulfilled, so she chooses to live in accordance with her inner demands. In Gertrud, Dreyer finds a greatness which had also fascinated him about Jeanne d'Arc. This is not a naturalistic portrayal, but a tragic one—Gertrud is bound for defeat. Both she and the men are presented in a disquieting double light.

In many ways the 75-year-old Dreyer was in harmony with the modern, younger directors. In films by Antonioni, Godard and Truffaut the women characters often demand a love which should be placed above everything else, a love which was more than most men could or would grant. Gertrud is also amazingly in harmony with the stylistic trends of the films of the 1960s. Because Dreyer never consciously tried to keep up with his time, but kept his integrity, he was more modern in his last film than many of the directors were who tried to adjust to their time.

Gertrud, premiering in Paris, was badly received by most of the Danish and French reviewers. However, in the film magazines Gertrud did find more understanding critics. With his last film, Dreyer once again caused great controversy, even if he did not ask for it. Gertrud is still a film which divides its audience.

—Ib Monty

GIANT

USA, 1956

Director: George Stevens

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures Inc.; Warnercolor, 35mm; running time: 198 minutes. Released 1956. Filmed in Texas.

Producers: George Stevens and Henry Ginsberg; screenplay: Fred Guiol and Ivan Moffat, from the novel by Edna Ferber; photography: William C. Mellor and Edwin DuPar; editors: William Hornbeck, Philip W. Anderson, and Fred Bohanen; art director: Ralph S. Hurst; music: Dmitri Tiomkin; costume designers: Moss Mabry and Marjorie Best.

Cast: Elizabeth Taylor (Leslie Lynnton Benedict); Rock Hudson (Bick Benedict); James Dean (Jett Rink); Mercedes McCambridge (Luz Benedict, the older); Jane Withers (Vashti Snythe); Chill Wills (Uncle Bawley Benedict); Carroll Baker (Luz Benedict, the younger); Dennis Hopper (Jordan Benedict III); Elsa Cardenas (Juana Benedict); Fran Bennett (Judy Benedict).

Award: Oscar for Best Direction, 1956.

Publications

Books:

- Bast, William, James Dean: A Biography, New York, 1956.
 Richie, Donald, George Stevens: An American Romantic, New York, 1970, 1985.
 Hirsch, Foster, Elizabeth Taylor, New York, 1973.
 Phillips, Gene D., The Movie Makers: Artists in the Industry, Chicago, 1973. d'Arcy, Susan, The Films of Elizabeth Taylor, London, 1974.
 Dalton, David, James Dean, The Mutant King, San Francisco, 1974.
 Whittman, Mark, The Films of James Dean, London, 1974.
 Kelly, Kitty, Elizabeth Taylor, The Last Star, New York and London, 1981.

- Bourget, Jean-Loup, James Dean, Paris, 1983.
 Morrissey, Steven, James Dean Is Not Dead, Manchester, 1983.
 Dalton, David, and Ron Cayen, James Dean, American Icon, London, 1984.
 Wickens, Christopher, Elizabeth Taylor: A Biography in Photographs, New York and London, 1984.
 Devillers, Marcel, James Dean, London, 1985.
 Beath, Warren Newton, The Death of James Dean, London, 1986.
 Petri, Bruce, A Theory of American Film: The Films & Techniques of George Stevens, New York, 1987.
 Parker, John, Five For Hollywood: Their Friendship, Their Fame, Their Tragedies, Secaucus, 1991.
 Tanitch, R., James Dean the Actor, London, 1999.

Articles:

- Sarris, Andrew, in Film Culture (New York), no. 10, 1956.
 Rowan, Arthur, "Giant Enhanced by Bold, Offbeat Photography," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), March 1956.
 Whitcomb, Jon, "Liz Taylor as Edna Ferber's Heroine," in Cosmopolitan (New York), August 1956.
Time (New York), 22 October 1956.
 Phipps, Courtland, in Films in Review (New York), November 1956.
 Houston, Penelope, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1956–57.
 Archer, E., "George Stevens and the American Dream," in Film Culture (New York), no. 1, 1957.
 Rotha, Paul, in Films and Filming (London), February 1957.
 Luft, Herbert H., "George Stevens," in Films in Review (New York), November 1958.
 Stang, J., "Hollywood Romantic," in Films and Filming (London), July 1959.
 Whitehall, Richard, in Films and Filming (London), August 1962.
 Mayersburg, Paul, and V. F. Perkins, in Movie (London), November 1962.
 Bartlett, N., "Sentiment and Humanism," in Film (London), Spring 1964.
 Silke, James R., and interview with George Stevens, in Cinema (Beverly Hills), December 1964-January 1965.
 McVay, Douglas, "Greatest—Stevens," in Films and Filming (London), April and May 1965.
 Beresford, B., "George Stevens," in Film (London), Summer 1970.
 Essoe, Gabe, "Elizabeth Taylor," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1970.
 "Stevens Issue" of American Film (Washington, D.C.), no. 1, 1972.
 "Stevens Issue," of American Film (Washington, D.C.), May-June 1975.
 Soule, Maria, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Solman, G., in Films in Review (New York), May 1983.
 Leibman, Nina C., "Leave Mother Out: The Fifties Family in American Film and Television," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 10, no. 4, 1988.
 Larue, Johanne, "À la défense de James Dean," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 159–160, September 1992.
Reid's Film Index, no. 11, 1993.
 Villaneuva, T., "Scenes from the Movie Giant," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), no. 39, June 1994.

Giant

Meisel, M., "Giant Reawakens," in Film Journal (New York), September 1996.

Stevens, George Jr., "A Giant Step in Film Restoration," in DGA Magazine (Los Angeles), vol. 21, no. 4, September-October 1996.

Turner, George, "Giant Still Towers: Resurrecting a Giant," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 77, no. 10, October 1996.

"Resurrecting a Giant," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), October 1996.

Score (Lelystad), no. 101, December 1996.

* * *

Giant, directed by George Stevens, is based on the novel of the same name by Edna Ferber. Stevens won an Academy Award as best director for the film. Giant is a saga about change: change in Texas, change in the lives of Bick and Leslie Benedict and their children and grandchildren, and, ultimately, change in America. It is a giant of a movie, running three hours and eighteen minutes, and covering over 25 years in the characters' lives. It is shot in color, with a tremendously moving musical score by Dimitri Tiomkin.

Giant is a serious picture about accepting the differences of others, be they outsiders, members of one's own culture, or even members of one's own family. It reflects social concerns in America at the time as well as predicting, in a way, the challenges of the civil rights movement to come. The film also contains the idea that people who have prejudices must change to accept and respect others, regardless of their race, background, and circumstances. This is not a new subject for Stevens. After World War II, his films took on a more serious nature, and the theme of acceptance can be clearly seen in I Remember Mama, where a Norwegian family has settled in San Francisco; in Shane, where farmers and cattlemen are at odds; and in The Diary of Anne Frank, where the Nazis are persecuting Jews.

The theme of acceptance is the framework for Giant, upon which all of the parts are attached to form the structure. Stevens believed that a film should be guided by one vision, and in this way, a sense of appropriate structure could be achieved. He said at a symposium on the arts at The Ohio State University in the early 1970s, "I think structure in film, particularly in film of any length, is almost as important as structure in upright architecture." For example, it is not good if a building is leaning, or has elements out of place, or is even falling apart. The same could be said of a film. Giant has a coherent, solid structure which allows Stevens to tell his story and create his meaning in the mind of the viewers.

At the beginning of the film, Jordan Benedict II, known as Bick (Rock Hudson) visits the family of Leslie Lynnton (Elizabeth Taylor) on the East coast to purchase a stud horse named Warwinds to take back to his cattle ranch in Texas. As he emerges from the train, he almost blocks out the image of the land, and looms large over it. The Lynnton family members are cordial to Bick, but he is clearly from a different culture than they are. Bick and Leslie fall in love, and he takes her to Texas as his bride. The scene where Bick almost blocks out the image of the land in the East is echoed, but differently, as Bick and Leslie, on either side of the train window, provide a frame for the image of the land in the West. Together they will help alter it. So the first element of change is that Bick did not marry a Texan but a person from the East, and this integration of cultures will have a positive effect.

Bick's sister Luz (Mercedes McCambridge) cannot accept the change marriage brings to the Benedict family. She cannot control Leslie, and is killed when she is thrown from the horse Warwinds, which she symbolically cannot master.

Leslie treats the Mexican-American workers with respect, and even has the Benedict family doctor treat the sick child of a worker in the nearby town. Also, after dinner parties in her home, she doesn't want to sit with the women, but instead wants to talk politics with the men. There is tension, as Bick is not tolerant of people with Mexican heritage and has his own ideas of a woman's role in the home.

Jett Rink (James Dean), a poor worker for the Benedicts who is constantly at odds with Bick, inherits a piece of land from Luz after her death. He discovers oil on it after Leslie, with whom he is secretly in love, visits him. Her footprint symbolically fills with the black liquid. Jett becomes rich, and eventually convinces Bick to invest in oil wells in addition to cattle at the start of World War II.

The Benedicts have three children, and the theme of acceptance is stated by Leslie, who says, "All you can do is raise them. You can't live their lives for them." Bick wants son Jordan Benedict, III (Dennis Hopper) to become a cattle rancher like he is, but instead Jordan becomes a doctor and even marries a Mexican-American, Juana (Elsa Cardenas). They have a child, Jordan Benedict IV. Daughter Judy Benedict (Fran Bennett) wants to be a rancher. She even marries a rancher, but she and her husband want to have a small place of their own, thereby leaving the Benedict ranch, Reata. They also have a child, Judy Benedict II. Daughter Luz Benedict II is a rebel as well and even dates the person her father hates, the oil millionaire Jett Rink. Although Judy's husband and Jordan both serve in World War II, it is Angel Obregon III (Sal Mineo), the son of a Mexican-American worker, who is killed in battle.

In the present-day 1950s, Jett invites many rich Texans, including the Benedicts, to the opening of his new airport/hotel. Jett has always disliked those of Mexican heritage and does not allow them services in the hotel. When Juana Benedict is refused an appointment in the hotel's beauty salon, Jordan attacks Jett but loses the fight. Bick now wants to fight Jett to avenge his son's honor, and in a famous scene in the hotel's wine cellar, tells the drunk Jett, "You ain't even worth hitting." Bick knocks over racks of liquor. Jett goes to make a speech to the assembled guests and passes out from too much drink.

Jett is a pathetic figure, for despite his money, he is unable to change his past attitudes. Luz II leaves him and goes with her family, and later goes to Hollywood to try to become an actress.

Driving home from the hotel, Bick, Leslie and Luz II go into a diner (Sarge's Place) with Juana and their grandson, Jordan Benedict IV, who resembles his Mexican-American mother. The owner, Sarge (Mickey Simpson), alludes unkindly to the child's Mexican heritage, but will serve the Benedicts. A Mexican-American family enters and Sarge asks them to leave. Bick intervenes on their behalf and finally fights with Sarge. Bick loses the fight and almost passes out on the floor among dirty dishes.

Back home, Leslie and Bick sit and watch their two grandchildren, who are in a playpen. A white sheep and a black calf are behind the playpen. One grandchild has light skin and one has dark skin. During this visual image of the importance of acceptance, Leslie, having commented on how proud she was of Bick in the restaurant, says one of the last lines of the film, which ties all of the vast elements of the structure together. She says, "After one hundred years, the Benedict family is finally a real big success."

By accepting change, from the children, and from the culture, Bick Benedict and his family are indeed a success, and in fact, have become the embodiment of the romantic American dream. They are rich and accepting. Jett Rink, on the other hand, could be considered the embodiment of the American nightmare. He is rich and unaccepting, and therefore is last seen alone in the vast empty ballroom where he was to make his speech, passing out not from fighting for what is right, but from drinking too much.

George Stevens has, within this huge story of a Texas family, provided the viewer with a structure that has universal meaning about change and acceptance, and about hope for freedom and justice for all of us. In the final shots of the film, there are dissolves to close ups of the grandchildren's eyes as the song "The Eyes of Texas are Upon You" plays on the soundtrack. The eyes of the children are the next generation looking at the viewers to see if they can live in harmony together.

—H. Wayne Schuth

GILDA

USA, 1946

Director: Charles Vidor

Production: Columbia; black and white; running time: 109 minutes; length: 9,852 feet. Released March 1946.

Producer: Virginia Van Upp; screenplay: Marion Parsonnet, from Jo Eisinger's adaptation of the story by E. A. Ellington; photography: Rudolph Maté; editor: Charles Nelson; sound recordist: Lambert Day; art directors: Stephen Goosson and Van Nest Polglase; set decoration: Robert Priestley; gowns: Jean Louis; musical director: Morris Stoloff; arranger: Marlin Skiles.

Cast: Rita Hayworth (Gilda); Glenn Ford (Johnny Farrell); George Macready (Ballin Munsden); Joseph Calleia (Obregon); Steven Geray (Uncle Pio); Joseph Sawyer (Casey); Gerald Mohr (Captain Delgado); Robert Scott (Gabe Evans); Ludwig Donath (German); Don Douglas (Thomas Langford); S. Z. Martel (Little man); George Lewis (Huerta); Rosa Rey (Maria); Eduardo Ciannelli (Bendolin).

Gilda

Publications

Books:

- Ringgold, Gene, The Films of Rita Hayworth, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974, 1984.
- Kobal, John, Rita Hayworth: The Time, the Place, and the Woman, New York, 1978.
- Silver, Alain, and Elisabeth Ward, editors, Film Noir, New York, 1979.
- Hill, James, Rita Hayworth: A Memoir, New York, 1983.
- Morella, Joe, and Edward Z. Epstein, Rita: The Life of Rita Hayworth, New York, 1983.
- Dick, Bernard F., Columbia Pictures: Portrait of a Studio, Lexington, 1992.
- Kaplan, Ann, editor, Women in Film Noir, London, 1998.

Articles:

- Hollywood Reporter*, 13 March 1946.
- New York Times*, 15 March 1946.
- Variety* (New York), 20 March 1946.
- Monthly Film Bulletin* (London), April 1946.
- Magill's Survey of Cinema 2*, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Filme* (Paris), no. 13, 1982.
- Martin, Marcel, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), January 1983.
- Ménil, A., in Cinématographe (Paris), February 1983.

- Petat, J., in Cinéma (Paris), February 1983.
- Legrand, Gérard, in Positif (Paris), March 1983.
- Doane, M. A., "Gilda: Epistemology as Striptease," in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Fall 1983.
- Janssen, C., "Film Noir: Darling, are you decent?" in Skoop (Amsterdam), November 1984.
- Aachen, G., and J.H. Reid, in Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 1, 1987.
- Dittmar, Linda, "From Fascism to the Cold War: Gilda's 'Fantastic' Politics," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 10, no. 3, 1988.
- Doane, M. A., and B. Reynaud, "Gilda: Strip-tease épistémologique," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), no. 2, 1993.
- McLean, A. L., "'It's Only That I Do What I Love and Love What I Do': Film Noir and the Musical Woman," in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 33, no. 1, 1993.
- Parsi, Novid, "Projecting Heterosexuality, Or What Do You Mean by 'It'?" in Camera Obscura (Bloomington), no. 38, May 1996.

* * *

"Statistics show there are more women in the world than anything else," snaps the cynical hero, Johnny Farrell (Ford), adding, with peculiar loathing, "except insects!" And yet this misogyny co-exists in the film with Gilda (Hayworth), a character who is at once a total blank and a masterful ironist whose signature tune "Put the Blame on Mame," to which she performs a supremely erotic striptease involving only the removal of her elbow-length velvet gloves, is a pointed exposure of the way women are made to seem responsible for the havoc wreaked by the men who become obsessed with them.

Gilda exists at the crossroads between the hardboiled neo-noir adventure of the 1940s and the contemporary craze for "women's pictures." The former genre, epitomized in classic style by Casablanca and To Have and Have Not but perhaps better represented by such fringe-B quickies as Calcutta, Macao or World for Ransom, is characterized by a studio-bound "exotic" location, preferably centering on a shady nightclub in a Third World country under whose propellor fans can be found an array of slimy, threatening characters, almost always including a slinky femme fatale, who are pitted against a hardboiled American he-man hero who emerges, emotionally bruised but morally untainted, from the twisted plot. The latter, typified by the various vehicles found for strong female stars like Joan Crawford, Bette Davis and Barbara Stanwyck, deal with the romantic, social and professional struggles of independent women who usually win through, after plentiful suffering, at the end. Both genres came to prominence at a time when, thanks to the war, cinema audiences really could be sexually polarised, and so the macho adventurers could appeal to the man in the services while the determined and enterprising women were aimed at the sweethearts and fiancées left to their own devices on the home front.

Released just after the end of the war, Gilda draws much of its peculiar power from its jumble of genres, and the unexpected way its characters grind at each other. Johnny, a hardboiled gambler who looks suavely uncomfortable in his dinner jacket, becomes manager of a casino in Buenos Aires, working for Ballin Mundsden (Macready), a frozen-faced mastermind who wields a swordcane, enjoys spying on his customers and associates from a control room in the gambling joint, and forms the apex of a three-way love triangle that triggers the plot. Mundsén turns out to be fronting for a group of ex-Nazis, and Macready's scarred intensity serves him well as a stereotypical movie Nazi, but the trouble in the film actually comes from his marriage to the beautiful young Gilda (Hayworth), who crucially acts throughout with an un-fatale honesty and finally reveals herself as far stronger than either of her paramours. Johnny and Gilda were once lovers, but the hero's neurotic hatred of her comes because she has alienated the affections of Mundsén, his "best friend," and when the casino owner appears dead, he plans to marry her as a way of punishing her for her treatment of the casino owner. Mundsén returns from the grave to be killed again in a coda that strains hard to get a conventional happy ending out of a situation whose implications skirt the Hays Code's idea of the objectionable.

Photographed by Rudolph Maté with a marvellously oneiric style, making full use of the central casino sets—which are almost as evocative as those of von Sternberg's Shanghai Gesture—and benefiting from all the class a shaky major studio like Columbia could trot out for a prestige production, Gilda is, in many ways, an absolute triumph of the cinema-bis. Ford and Hayworth, usually limited but engaging and photogenic performers, have definitive performances drawn out of them like teeth, and Macready—elsewhere a great heavy in the likes of My Name is Julia Ross, The Bandit of Sherwood Forest and The Big Clock—has the time of his life as the complex villain, prevented from taking top billing for his lead role simply by the dictates of the star system. Charles Vidor was a journeyman otherwise noted—if at all—for his musicals—including a different take on Hayworth in Cover Girl and a replay of the obsessive triangle of Gilda with James Cagney taking over the Macready role as he tangles with Doris Day and Cameron Mitchell in Love Me or Leave Me—was here handed a studio assignment that turned out miraculously right, and has a resonance beyond its immediate exotic charm. As the posters claimed, "there never was a woman like Gilda!"

—Kim Newman

GIRLS IN UNIFORM

See MÄDCHEN IN UNIFORM

THE GOAT HORN

See KOZIYAT ROG

THE GODFATHER TRILOGY

Director: Francis Ford Coppola

THE GODFATHER

USA, 1972

Production: Paramount Pictures; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 176 minutes. Released 11 March 1972. Filmed in New York City and in Sicily. Cost: over $5 million. Oscars for Best Picture, Best Actor (Brando), Best Screenplay, 1972; New York Film Critics' Award, Best Supporting Actor (Duvall), 1972; Directors Guild of America, Director Award (Coppola), 1972.

Producer: Albert S. Ruddy; screenplay: Francis Ford Coppola and Mario Puzo, from the novel by Mario Puzo; photography: Gordon Willis; editors: William Reynolds, Peter Zinner, Marc Lamb, and Murray Solomon; sound: Bud Granzbach, Richard Portman, Christopher Newman, and Les Lazarowitz; production designer: Philip Smith; art director: Warren Clymer; music: Nino Rota; costume designer: Anna Hill Johnstone.

Cast: Marlon Brando (Don Vito Corleone); Al Pacino (Michael Corleone); James Caan (Sonny Corleone); Richard Castellano (Clemenza); Robert Duvall (Tom Hagen); Diane Keaton (Kay Adams); Sterling Hayden (McCluskey); Talia Shire (Connie Rizzi); John Cazale (Fredo Corleone).

Publications

Books:

Zuckerman, Ira, The Godfather Journal, New York, 1972.

Carey, Gary, Brando, New York, 1973.

Jordan, René, Marlon Brando, New York, 1973.

Puzo, Mario, The Making of The Godfather, Greenwich, Connecticut, 1973.

Thomas, Tony, The Films of Marlon Brando, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1973.

Shipman, David, Brando, London, 1974.

Johnson, Robert K., Francis Ford Coppola, Boston, 1977.

Pye, Michael, and Lynda Myles, The Movie Brats: How the Film Generation Took Over Hollywood, London, 1979.

Kolker, Robert Philip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.

Thomson, David, Overexposures: The Crisis in American Filmmaking, New York, 1981.

Chaillot, Jean-Paul, and Elizabeth Vincent, Francis Ford Coppola, Paris, 1984.

Downing, David, Marlon Brando, London, 1984.

Zuker, Joel S., Francis Ford Coppola: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.

Carey, Gary, Marlon Brando, The Only Contender, London, 1985.

Fruntd, Bodo, and others, Francis Ford Coppola, Munich, 1985.

Ray, Robert B., A Certain Tendency of the Hollywood Cinema 1930–80, Princeton, 1985.

Slawson, Judith, Robert Duvall, Hollywood Maverick, New York, 1985.

Weiss, Ulli, Das neue Hollywood: Francis Ford Coppola, Steven Spielberg, Martin Scorsese, Munich, 1986.

Chown, Jeffrey, Hollywood Auteur: Francis Coppola, New York, 1987.

Higham, Charles, Brando: The Unauthorized Biography, London, 1987.

Cowie, Peter, Coppola, London, 1989.

Biskind, Peter, The Godfather Companion: Everything You Ever Wanted to Know about All Three Godfather Films, New York, 1990.

The Godfather

Gardner, Gerald C. and Harriet Modell Gardner, The Godfather Movies: A Pictorial History, New York, 1993.

Lebo, Harlan, The Godfather Legacy, New York, 1997.

Bergan, Ronald, Francis Ford Coppola-Close Up: The Making of His Movies, New York, 1998.

Ciongoli, A. Kenneth, editor, Beyond 'The Godfather': Italian American Writers on the Real Italian Experience, Hanover, 1998.

Browne, Nick, editor, Francis Ford Coppola's 'The Godfather' Trilogy, New York, 1999.

Cowie, Peter, The Godfather Book, Boulder, 1999.

Articles:

Kane, John, and Bruce Rubenstein, in Take One (Montreal), March-April 1971.

Arnold, Gary, in Filmfacts (New York), no. 15, 1972.

Berglund, P., in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 116, 1972.

Rosengren, G., "Två filmer om Maffian," in Filmrutan (Stockholm), vol. 15, no. 3, 1972.

Reilly, C. P., in Films in Review (New York), April 1972.

Faltysova, H., in Film a Doba (Prague), May 1972.

Kane, John, and Bruce Rubenstein, in Take One (Montreal), June 1972.

Chappetta, R., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1972.

Cowie, Peter, in Focus on Film (London), Autumn 1972.

Farber, Stephen, "Coppola and The Godfather," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1972.

Schober, S., in Filmkritik (Munich), October 1972.

Amiel, M., in Cinéma (Paris), November 1972.

Kael, Pauline, "Alchemy," in Deeper into Movies, Boston, 1973.

"How Brando Brought Don Corleone to Life," and "Keeping Up with the Corleones," in Films 72-73, edited by David Denby, Indianapolis, 1973.

Vitoux, F., "Une Gigantesque Metaphore," in Positif (Paris), January 1973.

Latimer, J. P., "The Godfather: Metaphor and Microcosm," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), Spring 1973.

Vogelsan, J., "Motifs of Image and Sound in The Godfather," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), Spring 1973.

Higham, Charles, in Action (Los Angeles), May-June 1973.

"Francis Ford Coppola," in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1974.

Kauffmann, Stanley, Living Images, New York, 1975.

Yates, John, "Godfather Saga: The Death of the Family," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), no. 4, 1975.

Solomon, Stanley, "The Godfather," in Beyond Formula, New York, 1976.

Clarens, Carlos, "The Godfather Saga," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1978.

Thomson, David, "The Discreet Charm of The Godfather," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1978.

Thomson, David, "Two Gentlemen of Corleone," in Take One (Montreal), May 1978.

"Dialogue on Film: Mario Puzo," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), May 1979.

Cebe, G., "Francis Ford Coppola: La Mafia, l'orare, et l'Amérique," in Ecran (Paris), 15 September 1979.

Taubman, Leslie, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Wisinger, I., "Amerikai történet," in Filmkultura (Budapest), May-June 1982.

Greene, N., "Coppola, Cimino: The Operatics of History," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1984-85.

Ciment, Michel, in Positif (Paris), February 1985.

Alexander, M., and H. Homsan, "The Godfather-saga op tv," in Skoop (Amsterdam), June-July 1985.

Film Comment (New York), July-August 1987.

Hirsch, T., "San Francisco szultanja," in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 1, 1991.

Alm, R., "Michael Corleones tapte illusjoner," in Z Filmtidsskrift (Oslo), no. 2, 1991.

Nordstrom, U., "Sag du gudfadern eller gudfadern—eller var det gudfadern?," in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 5, 1991.

Caron, A., "Le tryptique des Godfather," in Sequences (Montreal), March 1991.

Ciment, M., "Lear et l'opera: entretien avec Francis Ford Coppola," in Positif (Paris), April 1991.

Grob, N., "The Empire Strikes Back," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), April 1991.

Morgan, D., "Death and Aging: A Corleone Chronicle," in Cinefex (Riverside, California), May 1991.

Tsyrukun, N., "Sud'ba Korleone v Amerike," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 3, 1992.

Russo, J. P., "Tra i tre Padrini quale il migliore?," in Cinema Nuovo (Rome), May-June 1992.

Solman, G., "Uncertain Glory," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1993.

Thomson, David, "Death and its Details," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1993.

Steele, G., "On Location with The Godfather," in Mensuel du Cinéma, no. 16, April 1994.

Rose, P. W., "The Politics of the Trilogy Form: Lucia, the Orestia, and The Godfather," in Film-Historia (Barcelona), vol. 5, no. 2/3, 1995.

"I Film (1963-1979)," in Castoro Cinema (Milan), no. 81, 2nd ed., July 1995.

"The Godfather," in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 9, March 1996.

Dargis, M., "Dark Side of the Dream," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 6, August 1996.

Perez, G., "Film in Review," in Yale Review, vol. 85, no. 3, 1996.

Sragow, M., "Godfatherhood," in New Yorker, vol. 73, 24 March 1997.

Thomson, D., "Ten Films That Showed Hollywood How to Live," in Movieline (Escondido), vol. 8, July 1997.

THE GODFATHER, PART II

USA, 1974

Production: Paramount Pictures; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 200 minutes. Released 12 December 1974, New York. Filmed in 9 months, 1973-74, on location in New York City, Lake Tahoe and Las Vegas, Nevada, Washington, Sicily, and the Dominican Republic. Oscars for Best Picture, Best Director, Best Supporting Actor (De Niro), Best Screenplay, Best Art Decoration, Best Original Dramatic Score, 1974; Directors Guild of America, Director Award (Coppola), 1974.

Producers: Francis Ford Coppola, Gary Frederickson, and Fred Roos; screenplay: Francis Ford Coppola and Mario Puzo, from the novel by Mario Puzo; photography: Gordon Willis; editors: Peter Zinner, Barry Malkin, and Richard Marks; production designer: Dean Tavoularis; art director: Angelo Graham; music: Nino Rota; additional music: Carmine Coppola; costume designer: Theodora Van Runkle.

Cast: Al Pacino (Michael Corleone); Robert Duvall (Tom Hagen); Diane Keaton (Kay Adams); Robert DeNiro (Vito Corleone); John Cazale (Fredo Corleone); Talia Shire (Connie Corleone); Lee Strasberg (Hyman Roth); Michael V. Gazzo (Frankie Pentangeli); Troy Donahue (Connie's boyfriend).

Publications

Articles:

Bachmann, Gideon, "Godfather II: Zelfkritiek van Coppola," in Skoop (Amsterdam), December 1974.

Cocks, T., "Outs," in Take One (Montreal), December 1974.

Time (New York), 16 December 1974.

Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, 23 December 1974.

Quart, L., and A. Auster, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 6, no. 4, 1975.

Reilly, C. P., in Films in Review (New York), February 1975.

Hess, John, "Godfather II: A Deal Coppola Couldn't Refuse," in Jump Cut (Chicago), May-July 1975.

Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1975.

Rosenbaum, Jonathan, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1975.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), July 1975.

Behar, H., in Image et Son (Paris), September 1975.

Rabourdin, D., in Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1975.

Calum, P., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Autumn 1975.

Farber, Stephen, in Take One (Montreal), December 1975.

Konjar, V., in Ekran (Ljubljana), no. 1, 1976.
 Allombert, G., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), October 1976.
 Bueren, P., and W. Verstappen, in Skoop (Amsterdam), January 1977.
 Rule, P., "The Italian Connection in American Film: Coppola, Cimino, Scorsese," in America (New York), 17 November 1979.
 Taubman, Leslie, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Review, in Casablanca, no. 34, October 1983.
 See also publications for The Godfather.

THE GODFATHER, PART III

USA, 1990

Production: Zoetrope, Paramount Pictures; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 161 minutes.

Producers: Francis Ford Coppola, Gray Frederickson, Fred Roos, and Charles Mulvehill; screenplay: Francis Ford Coppola and Mario Puzo, from the novel by Puzo; photography: Gordon Willis; editors: Barry Malkin, Lisa Fruchtman, and Walter Murch; production designer: Dean Tavoularis; art director: Alex Tavoularis; music: Nino Rota and Carmine Coppola; music director: Carmine Coppola; costume designer: Milena Canonero.

Cast: Al Pacino (Michael Corleone); Diane Keaton (Kay Adams); Talia Shire (Connie Corleone); Andy Garcia (Vincent Mancini); Eli Wallach (Don Altobello); Joe Mantegna (Joey Zasa); George Hamilton (B. J. Harrison); Bridget Fonda (Grace Hamilton); Sofia Coppola (Mary Corleone); Raf Vallone (Cardinal Lambert); Franc D'Ambrosio (Tony Corleone); Donal Donnelly (Archbishop Gilday); Richard Bright (Al Neri); Helmut Berger (Frederick Keinszig); Don Novello (Dominic Abbandando); John Savage (Andrew Hagen).

Publications

Articles:

Cowie, P., "Coppola Remarried to the Mob," in Variety (New York), 3 January 1990.
 Kroll, J., "The Offer He Didn't Refuse," in Newsweek (New York), 28 May 1990.
 Moss, M., "The Godfather Part III: Recapturing the Myth," in Boxoffice (Chicago), October 1990.
 Harrison, Barbara Grizzuti, in Life Magazine (New York), November 1990.
 Coppola, Eleanor, "The Godfather Diary," in Vogue (New York), December 1990.
 Davis, Ivor, and Sally Ogle Davis, "It Ain't Over till the Fat Man Directs: Francis Ford Coppola and the Making of The Godfather Part III," in Los Angeles Magazine, December 1990.
 Garcia, G., "The Next Don?" in American Film (Washington, DC), December 1990.

Rohter, L., "Coppola: It Was an Offer He Couldn't Refuse," in New York Times, 23 December 1990.
 Kroll, J., "The Corleones Return," in Newsweek (New York), 24 December 1990.
 Cowie, P., "Gudfader med starka familjeband," in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 1, 1991.
 Stivers, C., "Family Reunion," in Premiere (New York), January 1991.
 Nissen, D., "Mafia," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Spring 1991.
 Hansen, H. J., "Papa Coppola," in Levende Billeder (Copenhagen), March 1991.
 Clark, J., "Godfather Shoots Blanks at Palermo Premiere," in Variety (New York), 18 March 1991.
 Grant, E., in Films in Review (New York), March-April 1991.
 Grob, N., "The Empire Strikes Back," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), April 1991.
 Katsahnias, I., and N. Saada, "Entretien avec Francis Ford Coppola," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1991.
 Causo, M., "La catarsi del cronotopo," in Filmcritica (Rome), April-May 1991.
 "Il cinema di Coppola (parte III)," in Castoro Cinema (Milan), no. 81, 2nd ed., July 1995.
 See also publications for The Godfather.

* * *

Mario Puzo has said that one of the reasons he wrote his novel, The Godfather, was to get out of debt. He was aiming for a best-seller, and he achieved his goal. Published in 1969, the novel sold 500,000 copies in hardcover and more than ten million copies in paperback by the time the film version was released.

Paramount Studios bought the film rights to Puzo's sprawling roman à clef, which concerned the history and structure of organized crime in America, in manuscript form. The studio proposed to make the film modestly and update it to the present day to avoid costly period sets and costumes. But when the book became a runaway best-seller, it was decided to make The Godfather an "event movie" with widespread release and higher-than-usual ticket prices. At the insistence of producer Al Ruddy and director Francis Ford Coppola, who got the assignment because of his Italian background and low asking price, the studio was also persuaded to return the script to its period milieu (the late 1940s).

With The Godfather, Coppola took a tired cinematic genre, the gangster film, in which all had seemingly been done, and pushed it in an epic new direction. Brutal, bloody, shocking, scary, funny, socially and politically observant, and meticulously performed by everyone from the leads to the bit players, the film offered a panoramic glimpse into the closed society of organized crime—a society ruled by vendetta, where the most sought-after currency, respect, is acquired through fear and intimidation. It's a society where murder is "nothing personal, just business" and casts a shadow over many other levels of American life, as well. Not for nothing has the film been dubbed "the Gone with the Wind of gangster movies."

The film was a financial blockbuster. Paramount demanded a sequel, and Coppola demanded and got complete creative autonomy for The Godfather, Part II. The main criticism leveled at The Godfather was that Coppola had made his Mafia characters sympathetic by giving them too-human a face. Coppola's point about the banality of evil, that members of the underworld are not all eye-rolling, saliva-dripping goons, was apparently lost on them. Still, he took the criticism to heart and in the sequel determined to make the point that Michael Corleone, an antihero who kills to hold his family together through the Mafia wars of the 1940s in the first film, is a Machiavelian figure whose soul is clearly lost by the final reel of the second film.

Coppola saw the sequel not as a way of simply cashing in on the success of the first film but of expanding its elements into a much broader and richer tapestry. The film chronicles the business of organized crime in the United States from 1900 to the 1960s, weaving facts with fiction in the manner of its predecessor. Drawing upon previously unused material in Puzo's book, it flashes back and forth in time to contrast the characters of Michael Corleone and his father, Vito, to reveal that what drives Michael is not what drove his father—that Michael is a more bitter and ruthless character, whereas Vito was a product of his old country ways and viewed the world as a place where only the strong survive.

The Godfather, Part II was a rarity—a sequel that not only deepened our understanding of the first film but bettered it artistically. It was also a huge financial success, but, at twice the budget of its predecessor, not quite the blockbuster the original had been. But since the film ended in the 1960s with Michael Corleone very much alive, Paramount was savvy enough to realize the mine had not yet been fully exploited. It wanted another sequel. Coppola wasn't interested, however, and shelved the idea for almost twenty years.

The Godfather, Part III takes up the saga of Michael Corleone in 1979, as the now guilt-ridden sixty-year-old don is receiving the order of San Sebastian, the highest honor the Catholic Church can bestow upon a layman. In between coping with Mafia plotters, crooked Vatican officials, and cutthroat European businessmen, Michael faces trouble on the homefront, as well. His son has rejected the family business to become an opera singer, while his daughter is carrying on a tempestuous affair with her first cousin (the illegitimate son of Michael's dead brother, Sonny). All these intrigues come to a head during the film's vigorous final thirty minutes, when Michael bloodily settles many scores—this time, he hopes, for good. But his beloved daughter takes an assassin's bullet meant for him and the aging gangster collapses with grief, his daughter and dreams of redemption gone. He dies of a heart attack years later, a white-haired Lear-like figure, alone in his palazzo.

The Godfather, Part III is not without its virtues. Its rich, warm photography, sumptuous production design and operatic style are all remarkably consistent with the first two films in the series. But its flaws are not insignificant. Considering its whopping $55 million budget (more than four times that of Part II), its failure to provide a conclusion to the Corleone saga in keeping with the epic vision of the first two films is a big disappointment. Coppola intended the film to be contemplative, but the effect it produces is ennui. Compared to the first two films, Part III is dull—and its similarly intricate plot is not as gripping as those of the earlier films. In fact, it is downright hard to follow at times.

But the film's biggest flaw is the change undergone by the lead characters, especially Michael, who is simply not the same man we saw at the close of The Godfather, Part II—a fact that becomes strikingly apparent if the two films are viewed consecutively. Monsters may get old and tired, but the outlook that made them monsters does not vanish. Guilt and the need for redemption are simply not a part of the emotionally dead, cold-eyed character Michael had become at the close of The Godfather, Part II.

—John McCarty

GODZILLA, KING OF THE MONSTERS!

See GOJIRA

---

GOJIRA

(Godzilla, King of the Monsters!)

Japan, 1954

Director: Ishirō Honda; U.S. additions, Terrell O. Morse

Production: Toho, Jewell Enterprises, Embassy Pictures, Transworld Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 98 minutes (Japan), 79 minutes (U.S.). Released 3 November 1954 in Japan; released 27 April 1956 in United States with English dubbing; filmed in Tokyo, Japan. Cost: $1 million.

Producer: Tomoyuki Tanaka; screenplay: Ishirō Honda, Takeo Murata, from a story by Shigeru Kayama; cinematographer: Masao Tamai; editor: Yasunobu Taira; music: Akira Ifukube; production design: Satoshi Chuko, Takeo Kita; sound: Hisashi Shimonaga; special effects: Eiji Tsuburaya, Kuichiro Kishida, Hiroshi Mukoyama, Akira Watanabe, Teisho Arikawa (uncredited), Fuminori Ohashi (uncredited); stunts: Haruo Nakajima.

Cast: Akira Takarada (Naval Salvage Officer Hideto Ogata); Momoko Kouchi (Emiko Yamane); Akihiko Hirata (Dr. Daisuke Serizawa); Raymond Burr (Steve Martin [U.S. version only]); Takashi Shimura (Dr. Kyohei Yamane); Fuyuki Murakami (Dr. Tabata); Sachio Sakai (Reporter Hagiwara); Toranosuke Ogawa (President of Nankai Shipping Company); Ren Yamamoto (Masaji Sieji); Miki Hayashi (Chairman of Diet Committee); Takeo Oikawa (Chief of Emergency Headquarters); Seijiro Onda (Mr. Oyama, member of Parliament); Toyoaki Suzuki (Shinkichi Sieji); Kokuten Kodo (Gisaku, Oto Island Patriarch); Kin Sugai (Miss Ozawa, member of Parliament); Tadashi Okabe (Reporter Killed in Tower); Ren Imaizumi (Radio Operator); Junpei Natsuki (Power Substation Engineer); Ishirō Honda (The Hand that Throws the Switch); Kenji Sahara (Man aboard Ship); Ryosaku Takasugi (Gojira); Katsumi Tezuka (Hagiwara's Editor [Japanese version only]; Gojira); Haruo Nakajima (Gojira/ Newspaperman).

Publications

Books:

- Mellen, Joan, Voices from the Japanese Cinema, New York, Liveright, 1975.
- Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, Tokyo, New York, and San Francisco, 1978.
- Glut, Donald, Classic Movie Monsters, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1978.
- Waldecki, Michael E., Godzilla Goes to Hollywood, M. E. Waldecki, 1985.
- Harmon, Jim, The Godzilla Book, San Bernardino, California, 1986.
- Bueher, Beverly Bare, Japanese Films: A Filmography and Commentary, 1921–1989, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1990.
- Lent, John A, The Asian Film Industry, London, 1990.
- Galbraith, Stuart, IV, Japanese Science Fiction, Fantasy, and Horror Films: A Critical Analysis of 103 Features Released in the United States, 1950–1992, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1994.
- Tucker, Guy Mariner, Age of the Gods: A History of the Japanese Fantasy Film, New York, 1996.
- Kalat, David, A Critical History and Filmography of Toho's Godzilla Series, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1997.
- Aberly, Rachel, The Making of Godzilla, New York, 1998.
- Alfonsi, The Official Godzilla Compendium, New York, 1998.
- Lees, J. D., and Marc Cerasini, compiled and edited by Alice Lovece, Frank, Godzilla: The Complete Guide to Moviedom's Mightiest Monster, New York, 1998.

* * *

Gojira (better known in the English-speaking world as Godzilla), though based on American models, is a thoroughly Japanese production. Though it achieved world-wide success, becoming perhaps the most popular science fiction film in cinema history, Godzilla is a significant construction of Japanese popular culture that resonates with themes specific to that country's postwar experience. In fact, it seems to confirm what sociologists such as Siegfried Kracauer have said of mainstream cinema, that, especially in times of profound social crisis, its offerings often screen the fears of disaster and hopes for deliverance that are deep in the unconsciousness of its eager spectators.

Released with great popularity into a Japan just unwillingly liberated from secular and religious authoritarianism, the film traces the depredations of an angry sea monster, a sort of fire-breathing Tyrannosaurus Rex, whom all civilian and military efforts, except the in extremis plan of a brilliant scientist, cannot defeat. Godzilla's sudden, inexplicable appearance, or so one of the film's scientist heroes opines, reflects the disturbance of the natural order effected by the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombs. It was these inconceivable weapons—Emperor Hirohito had less than a decade before emphasized in his public proclamation of surrender—that forced him to think the unthinkable and bear the unbearable. This unanticipated and total capitulation brought about an irreversible turn of fortunes in the nation's political life that is recalled by the sudden advent of the monster. The radiation produced by the bombs, moreover, continued to exact a toll of deformity and disease that many Japanese felt shameful, often shunning its victims. This violation of the national body is figured by Godzilla's assault, which fills hospitals with the mutilated and dying, many of whom are beyond the power of medical science to treat. Furthermore, like the bombing campaign directed with fearful results at the Japanese homeland, Godzilla vents his destructive urges on the nation's capital, leveling the same Tokyo that had been devastated only nine years earlier by a massive firebombing that incinerated more than a hundred thousand of its citizens.

Moreover, a culturalist reading of the film might see in the army's inability to halt this monstrous threat a post-militarist fear of being overcome by a foreign invader. This nightmare had already come true, of course, in the ongoing American military occupation, one of whose results was the transformation of the once powerful Imperial army into a lightly armed defense force. However, invasion was once again threatened at the time of the film's release in 1954 by Communist expansionism in Southeast Asia—just barely and inconclusively halted the year before in Korea—which was a traditional sphere of Japanese influence and occupation. Finally, the resigned helplessness of Tokyo's populace in the face of Godzilla's assaults expresses, perhaps, a collective dread at having violated, through the failure of the war effort, the submissive spirit of traditional culture, which had been largely abandoned in a society now devoted to capitalist self-aggrandizement. Denied the opportunity to die honorably in an apocalyptic defense of the home islands, the Japanese people of the postwar era had survived in the face of an ethical imperative demanding self-annihilation before any acceptance of national dishonor. Godzilla comes, perhaps, to expiate this failure, threatening an apocalypse that is finally averted but only after unspeakable death and destruction.

In any event, the angry giant reptile, who rises from his pelagic home to attack those who have unwittingly aroused him yet is accorded something like religious awe, is unlike the monsters brought to destructive life by nuclear testing in American science fiction films of the same period, the international series to which Godzilla otherwise belongs. The giant aggressive ants in Them (1954) and the huge carnivorous grasshoppers in The Beginning of the End (1957), among other similar threats, find their origin in radiation-caused genetic changes. In these extinction scenarios may be glimpsed a profound terror at the uncontrolled destructiveness that this new weapon has visited upon American culture. Godzilla, in contrast, is no product of a new and terrifying scientific age. Instead, he is an ancient creature come to destroy those who have brought this new age into being. Significantly, however, the guilty party is not the American invaders and occupiers, the bomb droppers who, in an antirealistic gesture, are not to be glimpsed or even mentioned in the world of the film. Instead, the monster's target is the Japanese people themselves and their national, religious capital.

Though its contemporary cultural symbolism is both rich and undeniable, Godzilla actually owes its origin to the long-held desire of special effects man Eiji Tsuburaya to make not a new and potent myth, but rather his own version of King Kong, Hollywood's most impressive monster film to date. In addition, an obvious intertextual influence was the outpouring from Hollywood's "B" producers of similar science fiction films in the American market. This trend was well established when Tsuburaya received the go-ahead from the executives at Toho Studio to make something quite similar. Many of these Hollywood films had been produced on very low budgets, yet had earned proportionally large profits from exhibition to, largely, youthful American audiences, most notably the customers of the thriving drive-in outlets. Tsuburaya read this contemporary popularity accurately, but modeled his production carefully on King Kong, made some two decades earlier. On a very tight budget, however, he did use a man dressed in a rubber suit instead of miniatures for Godzilla. Haru Nakajima, who played Godzilla with talent and subtlety in this and many subsequent productions, became one of the country's best known actors. Tsuburaya's monster film not only did well in the domestic Japanese market, but Embassy Pictures picked up the American rights at a time when few Japanese films, outside the art cinema of Kurosawa and others, enjoyed a release in the United States.

The Hollywood version of the film, released in 1956, was every bit as effective as the original even though it was partly re-produced. Director Terrell Morse shot English language sequences that matched the photographic and compositional style of the Japanese version incredibly well. Raymond Burr, playing an American newspaperman, became the main character and narrator, replacing the Japanese reporter; the other sequences were dubbed, and a new music track added. Significantly, the casting of Burr (a familiar heavy in crime melodramas) as well as an artful use of chiaroscuro effects and voice-over flashback narration connected Godzilla to native film noir in the manner of several other sci-fi films of the period, most notably Don Siegel's Invasion of the Body Snatchers (1956). Interestingly, these noir stylizations effectively matched the tone of helpless resignation in the Japanese original.

Godzilla proved an outstanding success in the United States and, indeed, in its world-wide release. Significantly, the advertising campaign in the United States featured comparisons with King Kong, which, until the time of Godzilla's release, had been the most successful film of this kind ever exhibited in America. Though King Kong is gunned down by attacking airplanes, Godzilla is ultimately destroyed by the invention of a reclusive scientist, reflecting the film's connection to the contemporary Hollywood monster film.

Played by Takashi Shimura (a familiar presence in the samurai films of Akira Kurosawa), the esteemed Dr. Yamano is a kind of Japanese Einstein whose theoretical work has enabled him to perfect a process that fundamentally alters water. His weapon removes its dissolved oxygen, thereby depriving the monster of what he needs to live. Like other sea creatures, Godzilla requires gills to breathe (though, like an amphibian, he seems also to have lungs and thus can survive on land as well). Dropped into Tokyo Bay, where he has retreated from the ineffective attacks of the Japanese army, this oxygen destroyer reduces Godzilla to a stripped skeleton. This ending proved unfortunate when the film's popularity made a sequel an attractive possibility. Even so, a sequel was soon produced by Toho: Gojira no Gyakushyu, literally "Godzilla's Counterattack" but, strangely, given Godzilla's popularity, released in the United States as Gigantis the Fire Monster. In this rather uninspired imitation, Godzilla is found alive and returns to the mainland (his target this time is Osaka), where he meets with another reawakened denizen of the Jurassic period named Angurus. After winning a titanic battle of monstrous reptiles, Godzilla flees the mainland and is destroyed once again. Short on plot and with somewhat inept special effects, Gigantis did not receive the same enthusiastic reception from the world's filmgoers as the original Godzilla. As a result, the series of Godzilla remakes that was to prove popular in Japan and abroad for more than two decades did not derive directly from the original film and its tepid remake. It was the 1962 release King Kong vs. Godzilla that soon became a kind of mini-genre, in which the originally terrifying monster became ever more sympathetic, eventually evolving into the protector of the home islands against the attacks of resurrected perodactyls, giant wasps, and flying turtles as big and fast as jetliners.

—R. Barton Palmer

THE GOLD RUSH

USA, 1925

Director: Charles Chaplin

Production: Charles Chaplin Studio; black and white, 35mm, silent with musical score; running time: 74 minutes; length: 2720 meters. Released 16 August 1925, New York, by United Artists. Re-released 18 April 1942 in edited version of 2150 meters with music by Chaplin, and re-released again April 1956. Filmed January 1924–May 1925 in various studios, and on location in the Sierra Nevadas.

Producer: Charles Chaplin; screenplay: Charles Chaplin; photography: R. H. Totheroh and Jack Wilson; art director: Charles D. Hall; artistic consultant: Harry d'Abbadie d'Arrast, Chaplin also assisted by Charles Reisner.

Cast: Charles Chaplin (The Lone Prospector); Mack Swain (Big Jim McKay); Tom Murray (Black Larsen); Georgia Hale (The Girl); Betty Morrissey (Chum of the Girl); Malcolm White (Jack Cameron); Henry Bergman (Hank Curtis); John Rand, Albert Austin, Heine Conklin, Allan Garcia and Tom Wood (Prospectors).

Publications

Script:

Shot record by Timothy Lyons, in Cinema (Beverly Hills), Summer 1968.

Books:

Frank, Waldo, Charles Chaplin: A Portrait, New York, 1929.
Bowman, William Dodgson, Charlie Chaplin: His Life and Art, New York, 1931.

The Gold Rush

Cotes, Peter, and Thelma Niklaus, Charlot, Paris, 1951.
 Huff, Theodore, Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1951.
 Bessy, Maurice, and Robert Florey, Chaplin et le rire dans la nuit, Paris, 1952.
 Sadoul, Georges, Vie de Charlot, Paris, 1953.
 Tyler, Parker, Chaplin, Last of the Clowns, London, 1954.
 Leprohon, Pierre, Charlot, Paris, 1957.
 Mitry, Jean, Charlot et la fabulation chaplinesque, Paris, 1957.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, Charles Chaplin, Paris, 1963.
 Chaplin, Charles, My Autobiography, New York and London, 1964.
 McDonald, Gerald D., Michael Conway, and Mark Ricci, editors, The Films of Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1965.
 Martin, Marcel, Charles Chaplin, Paris, 1966; third edition, 1983.
 McCaffrey, Donald W., editor, Focus on Chaplin, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1971.
 Mitry, Jean, Tout Chaplin, Paris, 1972.
 Manvell, Roger, Chaplin, London, 1974.
 Chaplin, Charlie, My Life in Pictures, London, 1974; New York, 1975.
 Moss, Robert F., Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1975.
 Lyons, Timothy J., Charles Chaplin: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
 Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Essays and a Lecture, edited by Jay Leyda, Princeton, 1982.
 Haining, Peter, editor, The Legend of Charlie Chaplin, London, 1982.
 Gehring, Wes D., Charlie Chaplin: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, Connecticut, 1983.
 Robinson, David, Chaplin: The Mirror of Opinion, London, 1983.
 Kamin, Dan, Charlie Chaplin's One-Man Show, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.
 Smith, Julian, Chaplin, Boston, 1984.
 Robinson, David, Chaplin: His Life and Art, London, 1985.
 Saint-Martin, Catherine, Charlot/Chaplin; ou, La Conscience du mythe, Paris, 1987.
 Silver, Charles, Charles Chaplin: An Appreciation, New York, 1990.
 Lynn, Kenneth S., Charlie Chaplin and His Times, New York, 1997.
 Mitchell, Glenn, The Chaplin Encyclopedia, Phoenix, 1997.
 Milton, Joyce, Tramp: The Life of Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1998.
 Kimber, John, The Art of Charles Chaplin, Sheffield, 2000.

Articles:

New York Times, 17 August 1925.
Variety (New York), 19 August 1925.
 Wilson, Edmund, in New Republic (New York), 2 September 1925.
 Huff, Theodore, "Chaplin as Composer," in Films in Review (New York), September 1950.
 Dyer, Peter John, "The True Face of the Man," in Films and Filming (London), September 1958.
 Callenbach, Ernest, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1959.
 Mast, Gerald, "The Gold Rush and The General," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1970.
 Paul, William, in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1972.
 Mersand, J., "The Preparation and Use of Study Guides for the Mass Media, with a Study Guide to The Gold Rush," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1975.

Giuricin, in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), May-August 1975.
 Carroll, Noel, in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 2, 1979.
 Shot analysis, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 January 1979.
 Michaels, J. E., "Chaplin and Brecht: The Gold Rush and The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1980.
 Randisi, S., "The Flirting Angel and the Tramp," in Filmfax (Evanston, Illinois), June-July 1993.
 Frumkes, R., "More Chaplin on Laserdisc," in Films in Review (New York), vol. 45, July/August 1994.
 Gill, David, "The Gold Rush 1925-1942-1993," in Griffithiana, no. 54, October 1995.
 "The Gold Rush," in Score (Lelystad), no. 101, December 1996.
 Ekbom, T., "En hemlig bild av var och en," Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 37, no. 5/6, 1995/1996.

* * *

The Gold Rush was Chaplin's favorite among his own films, so much a favorite that he deliberately did not copyright it, allowing it to pass into the public domain as a gift to his future public. As a result, the film has been seen more frequently than any other Chaplin feature, especially between 1952 and 1972, the two decades of Chaplin's disenchantment with America, when he withdrew all his other feature films from public circulation. Inspired by stories of the Donner Party, trapped in a desert of ice, and perhaps by the icy landscapes of Robert Flaherty's popular documentary feature, Nanook of the North, Chaplin took his Tramp character to the frozen gold fields where human beings endure great hardships so that they might strike it rich. As usual in a Chaplin film, the Tramp is very much an outsider in the world of The Gold Rush, even in this society of outsiders and outcasts. The Tramp is too kind, too sensitive to human needs, and too spiritual for that isolated, materialistic world. The Tramp's kindness in befriending Georgia, an abused dance-hall girl, contrasts with other human actions in the film—with those of Jack, Georgia's handsome boyfriend who treats her as his sex object; or with those of Black Larsen, a man so hungry for gold that he robs and kills others.

Despite the serious moral issues which the film raises in its contrast of material and spiritual human pursuits, its popularity derives from the power of its comedy sequences. In one of the most famous of Chaplin's transpositions of objects—his conversion of one kind of physical object into another—the Tramp cooks a dinner for himself and his starving friend, Big Jim McKay. Lacking anything else to eat, the Tramp sacrifices one of his own symbols, his floppy shoe, which he boils carefully in a pot, testing it with a fork for tenderness. He then carves it like a roast beef, twirls the shoestrings around his fork like spaghetti and sucks on the nails like chicken bones. In a later sequence, lacking even a shoe to eat, Charlie converts himself into a mammoth chicken—or so Big Jim imagines. The contrast of Charlie's chickenish actions with the cannibalistic dreams of his sometime friend reveals the typical Chaplin method of making comedy out of the most basic and elemental human needs—love, shelter, hunger.

Balancing the comedic scenes is one of the most effective and powerful sequences of pathos and poignancy in the entire Chaplin canon. Charlie has invited Georgia, whose picture he preserves under his pillow next to a rose, and several of her friends at the dance hall to supper on New Year's Eve. They, making fun of the pathetic little Tramp, have teasingly promised to attend the supper. As he waits for them, Charlie falls asleep and dreams of the delightful dinner that will never be. He entertains the girls by sticking two rolls on the ends of two forks and using them to dance the "Oceana Roll." The sight of Charlie's playful face, coyly peering over the tops of these two tiny, dancing legs is one of the most memorable single images in Chaplin's work. But Charlie awakens to find that his social success has only been a dream—like his many dreams of love and success in earlier films. The pathos of his loneliness is emphasized by the communal society of revelers singing "Auld Lang Syne," while Charlie, shown isolated within the frame, stands outside the circle of their friendship and observes.

However, almost miraculously, the Tramp eventually finds both love and wealth in this film. Charlie, now rich from his gold strike, discovers Georgia on board the same ship on which he is travelling home. She has had enough of the frozen wasteland (Chaplin typically uses the hired dance-hall girl as a metaphor for prostitution, the conversion of female sexuality into a commodity to be bought and sold). Georgia reveals her kindness when she protects Charlie from the ship's captain, believing him to be a stowaway. And Charlie, in turn, returns the girl's kindness by embracing her, now that he can offer her money as well as love. In what seems Chaplin's own conscious comment on the film's happy ending, a group of shipboard photographers, taking pictures of the former Tramp now a millionaire, criticize a photograph of the Tramp's kissing Georgia: "You've spoiled the picture." Chaplin seemed to have been anticipating the film's critics whom he expected to attack this last scene.

The issue that the ending raises is whether the Tramp can ever find happiness with a romantic-sexual mate. Must the Tramp, as outcast and outsider, also be disqualified from the consummation of love, which in our society is formalized by marriage? The previous Chaplin films to end with a happy, affirmative answer to this question (The Vagabond, A Dog's Life, The Kid) also suggest something dreamlike and impossible about such a solution. This dreamlike suggestion about the Tramp's attainment of marital happiness becomes explicit in films like The Bank or Shoulder Arms, in which his attainment of the lady of his dreams literally turns out to be a dream. His next three films, The Circus, City Lights, and Modern Times, will return to the marriage theme with far more ambiguity and uncertainty. The Gold Rush, which lies at the crossroads of Chaplin's lighter early work and his more mature and darker features, is probably his most successful film at producing a completely happy ending without "spoiling the picture."

—Gerald Mast

THE GOLDEN AGE

See L'AGED'OR

THE GOLDEN COACH

See LE CARROSSE D'OR

GONE WITH THE WIND

USA, 1939

Director: Victor Fleming

Production: Selznick International Pictures; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 220 minutes; length: 20,300 feet. Released 15 December 1939 in Atlanta by MGM, some sources list the premiere date as 18 November 1939. Re-released 1947, 1954, 1967, 1969. Filmed 10 December 1938–August 1939 in RKO backlots and studios (rented to Selznick International for the film), and on location at Old Laskey Mesa, California. Cost: $4,250,000.

Producer: David O. Selznick; screenplay: Sidney Howard, with structural innovations by Jo Swerling and some dialogue by Ben Hecht and John van Druten, from the novel by Margaret Mitchell; uncredited directors: George Cukor and Sam Wood; photography: Ernest Haller; cameramen: Lee Garmes, Joseph Ruttenberg, Ray Rennahan, and Wilfred Cline; editors: Hal C. Kern and James E. Newcom; sound recordist: Frank Maher; production designer: William Cameron Menzies; art director: Lyle Wheeler; musical score: Max Steiner; special effects: Jack Cosgrove and Lee Zavitz; costume designer: Walter Plunkett, Scarlett's hats by John Frederics; consulting historian: Wilbur G. Kurtz; dance direction: Frank Floyd and Eddie Prinz.

Cast: Vivien Leigh (Scarlett O'Hara); Clark Gable (Rhett Butler); Leslie Howard (Ashley Wilkes); Olivia De Havilland (Melanie Hamilton); Hattie McDaniel (Mammy); Thomas Mitchell (Gerald O'Hara); Barbara O'Neil (Ellen O'Hara); Carol Nye (Frank Kennedy); Laura Hope Crews (Aunt Pittypat); Harry Davenport (Dr. Meade); Rand Brooks (Charles Hamilton); Ona Munson (Belle Watling); Ann Rutherford (Careen O'Hara); George Reeves (Stuart Tarleton), wrongly credited on screen as Brent Tarleton; Fred Crane (Brent Tarleton); Oscar Polk (Pork); Butterfly McQueen (Prissy); Evelyn Keyes (Suellen O'Hara); Jane Darwell (Mrs. Merriweather); Leona Roberts (Mrs. Meade); Everett Brown (Big Sam); Eddie Anderson (Uncle Peter); Ward Bond (Tom, a Yankee Captain); Cammie King (Bonnie Blue Butler); J. M. Kerrigan (Johnny Gallagher); Isabel Jewell (Emmy Slattery); Alicia Rhett (India Wilkes); Victor Jory (Jonas Wilkerson); Howard Hickman (John Wilkes); Mary Anderson (Maybelle Merriweather); Paul Hurst (Yankee Looter); Marcella Martin (Cathleen Calvert); Mickey Kuhn (Beau Wilkes); Zack Williams (Elijah).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Director, Best Actress (Leigh), Best Supporting Actress (McDaniel), Best Screenplay, Best Cinematography-Color, Best Editing, Interior Decoration, 1939; Academy of Motion Pictures Arts and Sciences Special Awards to William Cameron Menzies for Color Achievement and to Don Musgrave and Selznick International Pictures for pioneering use of coordinated equipment, 1939; New York Film Critics' Award, Best Actress (Leigh), 1939.

Gone with the Wind

Publications

Script:

Howard, Sidney, Gone with the Wind, edited by Richard Harwell, New York, 1980.

Books:

Thomas, Bob, Selznick, New York, 1950.
 Howard, Leslie Ruth, A Quite Remarkable Father, New York, 1959.
 De Havilland, Olivia, Every Frenchman Has One, New York, 1962.
 Samuels, Charles, The King: A Biography of Clark Gable, New York, 1963.
 Farr, Finis, Margaret Mitchell of Atlanta: The Author of Gone with the Wind, New York, 1965.
 Essoe, Gabe, and Ray Lee, Gable: A Complete Gallery of His Screen Portraits, Los Angeles, 1967.
 Dent, Alan, Vivien Leigh: A Bouquet, London, 1969.

Essoe, Gabe, The Films of Clark Gable, New York, 1970.
 Robyns, Gwen, Vivien Leigh, New York, 1971.
 Selznick, David O., Memo from David O. Selznick, edited by Rudy Behlmer, New York, 1972, 1981, 1989, 2000.
 Lambert, Gavin, GWTW, Boston, 1973.
 Flamini, Roland, Scarlett, Rhett, and a Cast of Thousands: The Filming of Gone with the Wind, New York, 1975.
 Mitchell, Margaret, "Gone with the Wind" Letters, edited by Richard Harwell, New York, 1976.
 Tornabene, Lyn, Long Live the King: A Biography of Clark Gable, New York, 1976.
 Edwards, Anne, Vivien Leigh: A Biography, New York, 1977.
 Pratt, William, Scarlett Fever, New York, 1977.
 Have, Ronald, David O. Selznick's Hollywood, New York, 1980.
 Fearfar, R., Clark Gable, Paris, 1981.
 Harwell, Richard, editor, Gone with the Wind, As Book and Film, Columbia, South Carolina, 1983.
 Bridges, Herb, Frankly My Dear: Gone with the Wind Memorabilia, Macon, Georgia, 1986.
 Howard, Sidney, Gone with the Wind: The Illustrated Screenplay, New York, 1986.

Bridges, Herb, The Filming of Gone with the Wind, Macon, Georgia, 1989.

Molt, Cynthia Marylee, Gone with the Wind on Film: A Complete Reference, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1990.

Harmetz, Aljean, On the Road to Tara: The Making of Gone with the Wind, New York, 1996.

Vertrees, Alan D., Selznick's Vision: Gone with the Wind & Hollywood Filmmaking, Austin, 1997.

Bridges, Herb, Gone with the Wind: The Three-Day Premiere in Atlanta, Macon, 1999.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 20 December 1939.
- Nugent, Frank S., in New York Times, 20 December 1939.
- "Directed by Victor Fleming," in Lion's Roar (Los Angeles), September 1941.
- Curtis, David, and Richard Goldhurst, in Film Culture (New York), May-June 1955.
- Dyer, Tom, in Films in Review (New York), May 1957.
- Dickens, Homer, "Leslie Howard," in Films in Review (New York), April 1959.
- Clarens, Carlos, "Clark Gable," in Films in Review (New York), December 1960.
- Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), May 1961.
- Doyle, Neil, "Olivia De Havilland," in Films in Review (New York), February 1962.
- Bowers, Ronald, "Vivien Leigh," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1965.
- Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 26 October 1967.
- Lightman, Herb A., "Creating the New 70mm Stereophonic Sound Version of Gone with the Wind," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), November 1967.
- Reid, John Howard, "The Man Who Made Gone with the Wind," in Films and Filming (London), December 1967.
- De Havilland, Olivia, "Dream That Never Died," in Look (New York), 12 December 1967.
- Gow, Gordon, in Sight and Sound (London), November 1968.
- Stevens, J. D., "The Black Reaction to Gone with the Wind," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Fall 1973.
- Pauly, T. H., "Gone with the Wind and The Grapes of Wrath as Hollywood Histories of the Depression," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), Summer 1974.
- Finney, E., "Now Hollywood Stars Achieve Success in Spite of Themselves," in Classic Film Collector (Indiana, Pennsylvania), Fall 1976.
- Sarris, Andrew, "Frankly My Dear, We Do Give a Damn," in Village Voice (New York), 29 November 1976.
- Gelé, C., in Ecran (Paris), March 1978.
- De Benedictis, M., "Scarlett e altro: Le stagioni di un nostro amore," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), January-February 1979.
- "GWTW Quiz," in Films in Review (New York), December 1979.
- Lindsey, R., in New York Times, 31 December 1979.
- Behlmer, Rudy, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Slifer, C.W.D., "Creating Visual Effects for G.W.T.W.," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), August 1982.
- Taylor, John Russell, in Films and Filming (London), June 1984.
- Janssen, C., in Skoop (Amsterdam), December 1984-January 1985.
- Valkay, S., and P. Szentmihalyi Szabo, in Filmkultura (Budapest), January 1985.
- Weinberger, M., in Cinéma (Paris), May 1985.
- Mancini, M., "Replantation," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), January-February 1986.
- Ven de Ven, L., in Soundtrack! (Los Angeles), June 1986.
- Oney, Steve, "A Second Wind," in American Film (Washington D.C.), December 1986.
- Haun, H., in Films in Review (New York), vol. 42, no. 11-12, November-December 1991.
- Pierpont, C. R., "A Study in Scarlett," in New Yorker, 31 August 1992.
- Beken, Ludo, "The Making of a Legend," in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 426, November 1992.
- McCarver, Pat, "Gone With the Wind: The Best Movie I've Ever Seen," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 218, August 1993.
- Lippert, R., "'You Make Me Feel Like a Natural Woman,'" in Frauen und Film, no. 54-55, April 1994.
- Dagle, J., and Kathryn Kalinak, "The Representation of Race and Sexuality: Visual and Musical Reconstruction in Gone With the Wind," in Post Script (Commerce), vol. 8, no. 2, Winter-Spring 1994.
- French, Tony, "Has Gone With the Wind Gone With the Wind? or, Can we be Intelligent About the Past?" in CineAction (Toronto), no. 40, May 1996.
- Kaufman, D., "LaserPacific Restores Luster to Gone With the Wind," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 78, September 1997.
- Tonkens, S., in Film Score Monthly (Los Angeles), vol. 2, no. 3, 1997.
- Lovell, Glenn, "Frankly, My Dear, This Is No Improvement," in Variety (New York), vol. 371, no. 7, 22 June 1998.

* * *

Gone with the Wind, based on Margaret Mitchell's best-selling novel about the South during the Civil War and Reconstruction, made producer David O. Selznick's name a box-office draw, made the relatively unknown Vivien Leigh an international star, and became the most popular motion picture of all time.

Soon after Selznick bought the movie rights to Mitchell's novel in July 1936, thousands of fan letters began to arrive at Selznick International Pictures, most of them demanding that Clark Gable play the role of Rhett Butler. In order to get Gable, Selznick had to make a deal with MGM and Louis B. Mayer, who held Gable's contract. In exchange for Gable's services and $1,125,000 of the film's budget, MGM would receive the distribution rights and half the profits of GWTW.

Since Selznick had a contract with United Artists to distribute all his films until the end of 1938, principal shooting on GWTW could not start before 1939. In order to maintain public interest in the film before shooting could begin, Selznick launched a nationwide talent search to find an unknown actress to play Scarlett O'Hara. In the course of the two-year search, 1400 candidates were interviewed and 90 were tested, at a total cost of $92,000. Among those considered for the part were Katharine Hepburn and Paulette Goddard. The role eventually went to Vivien Leigh, a British actress who was largely unknown to American audiences.

The production phase of GWTW began auspiciously in December 1938, with the Atlanta fire scene—the largest fire ever staged in a film up to that time. Principal shooting, which started six weeks later, was plagued by numerous problems and required seven months to complete. The main problem was the script, which despite the efforts of more than a dozen writers, remained a confusing mass of revisions, and revisions of revisions, until after shooting was completed. The disorganized condition of the script made shooting difficult and created tension among the production personnel. After only three weeks of principal shooting, Selznick replaced director George Cukor with Victor Fleming. Two months later, Fleming, upset by Selznick's handling of the script, went home and refused to work. Selznick quickly hired Sam Wood to direct and when Fleming decided to return to the film two weeks later, Selznick let the two men split the directorial chores.

When GWTW was finally completed, it turned out to be a monumental film in almost every respect. Its technical achievements included the Atlanta fire sequence, the use of matte paintings to provide distant backgrounds and to complete partially constructed sets (GWTW marked the second use in Technicolor film of the matte process in which painted backgrounds are blended with filmed scenes of live actors), and the railroad depot crane shot, in which the camera pulls back and up to reveal Scarlett O'Hara walking among thousands of wounded Confederate soldiers—about 2000 live extras and dummies. Its total cost was $4.25 million—equivalent to $50 million today. It had the longest running time (3 hours 40 minutes) of its day and the largest titles in cinema history—each word of the film's title fills the screen itself. It was also the first major film to successfully challenge the Production Code's prohibition of profanity—with Rhett Butler's final line, "Frankly, my dear, I don't give a damn."

When GWTW premiered in Atlanta on December 15, 1939, over one million people poured into the city of 300,000, hoping to see Clark Gable, Vivien Leigh, and the other stars who attended the premiere. After three days of parades, celebrations, and Confederate flag-waving, a select audience of 2500 people saw the film, and they loved it. GWTW quickly became a worldwide critical and box-office success and won ten Academy Awards, a record that stood until 1959, when Ben Hur won eleven.

As of 1983, GWTW has earned $76.7 million in domestic rentals. In 1976 NBC paid $5 million for the film's television premiere. The program, aired over two nights in November, 1976, received a 47.6 Nielsen rating—the highest rating ever received by a movie on television. CBS subsequently paid $35 million for 20 airings of GWTW over a 20-year period. When appropriate adjustments for inflation are made, GWTW is the biggest box-office success in cinema history. The current critical consensus is that GWTW is the quintessential Hollywood studio system product.

—Clyde Kelly Dunagan

THE GOOD, THE BAD, AND THE UGLY

See IL BUONO, IL BRUTO, IL CATTIVO

GOODFELLAS

USA, 1990

Director: Martin Scorsese

Production: Warner Bros.; Technicolour; 35mm; running time: 145 minutes. Filmed in New York City, 1989. Released September 1990, USA.

Producer: Irwin Winkler; executive producer: Barbara de Fina; screenplay: Martin Scorsese, Nicholas Pileggi, based on the book Wiseguy by Nicholas Pileggi; photography: Michael Balhaus; editor: Thelma Schoonmaker, James Kwei; assistant directors: Joseph Reidy, Vebe Borge, Deborah Lupard; production designer: Kristi Zea; art director: Maher Ahmad; music editor: Christopher Brooks; sound editors: Skip Lievsay, Philip Stockton, Marissa Littlefield, Fred Rosenberg, Jeff Stern, Bruce Kitzmeyer; title design: Saul Bass and Elaine Bass.

Cast: Ray Liotta (Henry Hill); Lorraine Bracco (Karen Hill); Robert De Niro (Jimmy Conway); Joe Pesci (Tommy DeVito); Paul Sorvino (Paulie Cicero); Frank Sivero (Frankie Carbone); Tony Darrow (Sonny Bunz); Chuck Low (Morrie Kessler); Frank Vincent (Billy Batts); Gina Mastrogiacomo (Janice Rossi); Debi Mazar (Sandy); Frank DiLeo (Tuddy Cicero); Christopher Serrone (Young Henry).

GoodFellas

Awards: Venice Film Festival Award for Best Director, 1990; Oscar for Best Supporting Actor (Pesci), 1990; British Academy Award for Best Director and Best Film, 1990.

Publications

Script:

Scorsese, Martin, and Nicholas Pileggi, GoodFellas, London, 1990.

Books:

- Kelly, Mary Pat, Martin Scorsese: A Journey, New York, 1991.
 Ehrenstein, David, The Scorsese Picture: The Art and Life of Martin Scorsese, New York, 1992.
 Keyser, Les, Martin Scorsese, New York, 1992.
 Connelly, Mary K., Martin Scorsese: An Analysis of His Feature Films, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1993.
 Stern, Lesley, Scorsese Connection, London, 1995.
 Bliss, Michael, The Word Made Flesh: Catholicism and Conflict in the Films of Martin Scorsese, Lanham, 1998.
 Dougan, Andy, Martin Scorsese—Close Up: The Making of His Movies, New York, 1998.
 Friedman, Lawrence S., The Cinema of Martin Scorsese, New York, 1998.
 Brunette, Peter, editor, Martin Scorsese: Interviews, Jackson, 1999.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 10 September 1990.
 Kael, Pauline, New Yorker, 24 September 1990.
 Jousse, T., and B. Reynaud, Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1990.
 Lenne, G., “De grands enfants,” in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), September 1990.
 Murphy, K., “Made Men,” in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1990.
 Donovan, F., Cinéma (Paris), October 1990.
 Rollet, P., and others, “Scorsese sur Scorsese,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1990.
 Tobin, Y., and others, Positif (Paris), October 1990.
 Beauchamp, M., “Ce que filmer veut dire,” in 24 Images (Montreal), November-December 1990.
 Bahiana, A. M., and others, Cinema Papers (Melbourne), December 1990.
 Milne, Tom, Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1990.
 Caron, A., Séquences (Montreal), January 1991.
 Viano, M., Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1991.
 Quart, L., Cineaste (New York), 1991.
 “Film as Literature: Two Screenplays,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 23, no. 1, January 1995.
 Scorsese, M., “De Niro & moi,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 500, March 1996.

Lippe, R., “Style as Attitude: Two Films by Martin Scorsese,” in CineAction (Toronto), no. 41, 1996.

Perez, G., “Film in Review,” in Yale Review, vol. 84, no. 3, 1996.

Bauer, Erik, “Stephen King’s Other Half: Interview with Frank Darabont,” in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), vol. 4, no. 2, Summer 1997.

Amis, M., in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 11, October 1997.

Murphy, Kathleen, “Made Men,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 34, no. 3, May-June 1998.

Smith, Gavin, “Street Smart,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 34, no. 3, May-June 1998.

* * *

Scorsese’s “GoodFellas” are the ironically glamorized criminal underclass who occupy an ambivalent textual position somewhere between a criminal rap sheet and the pages of Modern Screen. With GoodFellas, Scorsese extends and refines his examination of those shadowy figures at the edge of collective media consciousness who seem both to shun exposure and to covet a dubious celebrity. A product of the urban working-class environment, they are “movie stars with muscle,” familiar with the back alleys and circuitous underground routes which seem to lead to the front rows of the urban high life.

Scorsese’s wise guys are the “real,” marginalized characters of criminal biography but also parodic figures who espouse the centralized values of an American business ethos which prizes individualism, ruthless self-interest, and bold opportunism. The display of wealth and power is an essential feature of the guerilla economics practised in the criminal underworld, and as a boy, Henry Hill is attracted to the aura of success, literally to the impression his criminal heroes make upon the world: the self-conscious figures they cut, the garrulous social habits they establish, and the weight and aura of presence that accompany their proceedings. Scorsese records Henry’s recollections in loving detail as the boy detaches himself from normative family allegiances to participate in what seems an emancipatory communal self-fashioning. Henry’s childhood is the “glorious time” of economic expansion, of imaginative criminal subversion and empire-building.

Yet it is a world in which display and concealment must be held in delicate equilibrium, where an incomprehensible chaos simmers beneath the surface textures of “normal” behaviours. Criminal camaraderie co-exists uneasily with virulent self-promotion; Joe Pesci’s unnerving performance as Tommy DeVito provides the central figure for an explosive and unpredictable brutality, a barbarity which is ironically both ethos and threatening “other” to the self-regulating world of corporate criminality. Tommy is the dangerous and disruptive “arch-criminal” whose pathological machismo violates a more-or-less stable corporate hierarchy. His execution is less a visitation of poetic justice than a reminder of the arbitrary stratification which excludes Henry and Jimmy Conway from true success, from the “legitimacy” of more comfortable criminal associations.

By occupation, and by carefully educating himself in a life of crime, Henry seems to choose social over familial connections. Yet the glamorized freedoms of criminal marginality seem to inevitably segue into the restrictive enclosures of traditional domesticity. When

Henry moves in with his mistress, Jimmy and Paulie Cicero order him to “do the right thing,” to return to his wife. Appearances, at least, must be kept up, and deviation from normality frequently exacts the harshest of penalties. Economic freedom itself, the marginal “extras” wise guys struggle after, becomes a form of imprisonment, and criminal conspiracy inevitably demands the social exclusivity of the traditional suburban enclave. As Karen Hill explains, no “outsiders” are admitted into their social circle: “Being together all the time made everything seem all the more normal.”

With the combined pressure of constant police harassment and a radically unpredictable business environment, domestic behaviours are grotesquely exaggerated while at the same time boundaries between private and “public” life are eroded: Karen casually sits in front of the television as detectives execute yet another search warrant; the morning after Henry witnesses another of Tommy’s violent depravities, Karen threatens Henry for his sexual infidelities with a loaded pistol.

Karen’s perception of surface normality is ironically echoed by Henry’s commentary on the acceleration of mob violence throughout the 1970’s. Shooting people simply becomes a “normal thing.” During a lengthy though luxurious prison stay, Henry begins to deal cocaine even though on the outside dealing is an unacceptable form of enterprise because it exposes his superiors to harsh federal penalties. The romanticized illusion of a cohesive criminal community, of conspiratorial confidence, is dissipated with Tommy’s execution and, ironically, with the final big score engineered by Morrie and Jimmy. Calculation and self-interest can no longer be glossed over by social familiarity, and the bodies of Jimmy’s former associates garishly accumulate for months after the Lufthansa robbery.

In the final act, Henry has become the rogue individualist, dealing cocaine through a lucrative out-of-town connection. In a brilliantly adrenalized sequence during which he juggles the mounting pressures of state surveillance, banal domestic appointments, drug-intensified paranoia, professional treachery, and careless babysitters, Henry is finally outmanoeuvred by federal narcotics investigators. His arrest, of course, simultaneously exposes his treachery to his mob superiors, yet Henry remains adept in reading the duplicitous surface of a criminal society in which he has suddenly become a dangerous liability. After his final meeting with Jimmy, Henry opts into the witness protection program which, ironically, subjects him to an inescapable suburban normality. For Henry the hardest thing is not betraying lifelong associates but “leaving the life,” becoming the “average nobody” who has to “wait around like everybody else.”

In GoodFellas, organized crime seems to grow out of and perpetuate class division; it is the shortcut whereby the ambitious working class achieves only a tenuous facsimile of capitalist success. Scorsese’s obvious message is that the American dream feeds upon those it enthralled, that even the criminal “success” story, however perilous, replicates the image of mainstream cultural beliefs.

—Tom Orman

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW

See IL VANGELO SECONDO MATTEO

GÖSTA BERLINGS SAGA

(The Story of Gösta Berling)

Sweden, 1923

Director: Mauritz Stiller

Production: Svensk Filmindustri; black and white, 35mm, silent, shown in two parts; running time: 137 minutes; length: first part-2346 meters, second part-2189 meters, eventually edited by Stiller down to about current length. Released 10 and 17 March, 1924. Re-released 1933–1934 in a re-edited version by Ragner Hylten-Cavallius, with sound. Filmed fall 1923 in Sweden.

Scenario: Mauritz Stiller and Ragner Hyltén-Cavillius, from the novel by Selma Lagerlöf; photography: Julius Jaenzon; art director: Wilhelm Bryde.

Cast: Lars Hanson (Gösta Berling); Gerda Lundequist-Dahlstrom (Majorskan Samzelius); Otto Elg-Lundgren (Major Semzelius); Sixten Melmerfelt (Melchior Sinclaire); Karin Swanstrom (Gustafva Sinclaire); Jenny Hasselqvist (Marianne Sinclaire); Ellen Cedarstrom (Countess Martha Dohna); Mona Martenson (Countess Ebba Dohna); Torsten Hamneren (Count Hendrick Dohna); Greta Garbo (Countess Elizabeth Dohna).

Gösta Berlings Saga

Publications

Books:

- Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, Den Svenska Filmens Drama: Sjöström och Stiller, Stockholm, 1938.
 Hardy, Forsyth, Scandinavian Film, London, 1951.
 Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, Classics of the Swedish Cinema, Stockholm, 1952.
 Bainbridge, John, Garbo, New York, 1955.
 Waldenkranz, Rune, Swedish Cinema, Stockholm, 1959.
 Beranger, Jean, La Grande Aventure du Cinema Suédois, Paris, 1960.
 Conway, Michael, The Films of Greta Garbo, New York, 1963.
 Cowie, Peter, Swedish Cinema, London, 1966.
 Pensel, Hans, Seastrom and Stiller in Hollywood, New York, 1969.

Articles:

- Potamkin, M. C., "The Golden Age of Scandinavian Film," in Cinema (London), September 1930.
 Verdone, Mario, "Stiller," in Cinema (Milan), no. 126, 1954.
 Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, "The Man Who Found Garbo," in Films and Filming (London), August 1956.
 Gronowicz, A., "Greta Garbo and My Book," in Contemporary Review (London), December 1960.
 Robertson, Jo Anne, "Mauritz Stiller," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1977.
 Werner, G., "Svenska giganter," in Filmrutan (Stockholm), no. 3, 1981.
 Paavolainen, Olavi, "Kaski mestaria - kaski vastakohtaa," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 5, 1992.
 Cristalli, P., "How Little You Know About Love," in Cinegrafie (Ancona), vol. 6, no. 10, 1997.

* * *

Gösta Berlings Saga is regarded by many as Sweden's Gone With the Wind. With an epic sweep, episodic structure, and numerous characters, it evokes 19th-century Swedish life and is imbued with a lyricism and vibrancy which places its director Mauritz Stiller among the masters of silent film. The film represents both the pinnacle and the swan song of the "golden age" of Swedish cinema—1913–24. With its plot centering on the search for redemption by Gösta Berling, the defrocked priest, and the several women who disastrously fall in love with him, it numbers, along with Griffith's Intolerance, among the earliest important films of social protest and one of the masterpieces of silent cinema.

Stiller was a flamboyant dandy whose early reputation was built on sophisticated comedies exhibiting visual dexterity and artful editing. In 1919, he directed what is generally regarded as his foremost masterpiece—Sir Arne's Treasure (The Three Who Were Doomed), based on a novel by the popular Nobel Prize-winning Selma Lagerlöf. He directed the De Mille-like sex comedy Erotikon and then returned to adapting Lagerlöf's novels with Gunnar Hede's Saga and finally Gösta Berlings Saga.

Gösta Berlings Saga was a formidable undertaking which encompassed many characters and themes, required elaborate sets and costumes and resulted in a four-hour production shown in two parts on consecutive evenings. Stiller eventually conceded this impracticality and edited the film to 137 minutes. His editing, while judiciously shortening many scenes rather than eliminating them, nonetheless imposed a disjunction which ultimately mars the continuity. Despite this shortcoming, Gösta Berlings Saga remains a remarkable evocation of life among the Swedish aristocracy and mirrors its repression and hypocrisy. The first half of the film is devoted to exposition and the introduction of the many characters while the second half is highlighted by the dramatic fire in Ekeby Hall, a flight from wolves by sleigh across a frozen lake, and the brilliant acting of the venerable Gerda Lundequist-Dahlstrom as the shamed mistress of the manor.

Stiller's directorial technique was displayed through an expressive visual lyricism, an artistic use of light contrasted with shadowy darker hues and a picturesque depiction of the beauty and variety of the Swedish landscape. These elements are particularly evident in his photographing (with the masterful cinematographer Julius Jaenzon) of the then unknown Greta Garbo, who played Elizabeth. Stiller's scenes of Garbo picking flowers in the garden, carrying a lamp through the mansion hallways at night, and her first close-up in the sleigh scene capture the luminescence and radiance that made her the most unique female screen image of all time.

The success of Gösta Berlings Saga resulted in both Stiller and Garbo being hired by MGM in 1925. His three years in Hollywood destroyed Stiller and he returned to Sweden to die at the age of 45 in 1928. That same year Gösta Berlings Saga was released in the United States where a number of religious groups denounced it as "a glorified Elmer Gantry."

Lagerlöf disdained Stiller's interpretation of her novel, claiming he had seen "too many poor serials." For the most part Gösta Berlings Saga is remembered today as the film which introduced Garbo to the screen. However, it is a major work of the silent screen and as French critic Jean Beranger wrote: "If all but one Swedish silent film were to perish, this, probably, would be the one to save as the best witness of its period. All the charm, intelligence, profound human resonance and technical dexterity, here blend into an indissoluble bloc."

—Ronald Bowers

THE GRADUATE

USA, 1967

Director: Mike NicholsProduction: Embassy/Lawrence Turman; Technicolor; Panavision; running time: 108 minutes; length: 9,720 feet. Released December 1967.Producer: Lawrence Turman; screenplay: Calder Willingham, Buck Henry, from the novel by Charles Webb; assistant director: Don

The Graduate

Kranze; photography: Robert Surtees; editor: Sam O'Steen; sound: Jack Solomon; production designer: Richard Sylbert; music: David Grusin; songs: Paul Simon; performed by: Simon and Garfunkel.

Cast: Anne Bancroft (Mrs. Robinson); Dustin Hoffman (Ben Braddock); Katharine Ross (Elaine Robinson); William Daniels (Mr. Braddock); Murray Hamilton (Mr. Robinson); Elizabeth Wilson (Mrs. Braddock); Brian Avery (Carl Smith); Walter Brooke (Mr. Maguire); Norman Fell (Mr. McCleery); Alice Ghostley (Mrs. Singleman); Buck Henry (Room Clerk); Marion Lorne (Miss de Witt).

Award: Oscar for Best Director, 1967.

Publications

Books:

Schuth, H. Wayne, Mike Nichols, Boston, 1978.
Holtzman, Will, Seesaw: A Dual Biography of Anne Bancroft and Mel Brooks, New York, 1979.

Dagneau, Gilles, Dustin Hoffman, Paris, 1981.
Sandre, Didier, Dustin Hoffman, Paris, 1981.
Brode, Douglas, The Films of Dustin Hoffman, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1983; revised edition, 1988.
Lenburg, Jeff, Dustin Hoffman: Hollywood's Anti-Hero, New York, 1983.
Agan, Patrick, Hoffman vs. Hoffman: The Actor and the Man, London, 1986.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 20 December 1967.
Hollywood Reporter, 5 January 1968.
Films in Review (New York), February 1968.
Farber, Stephen, and Estelle Changas, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1968.
Hudson, Chris, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1968.
Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1968.
Austen, David, in Films and Filming (London), October 1968.
Davy, Barry, interview with Mike Nichols, in Films and Filming (London), November 1968.

- Dawson, Jan, "The Acid Test," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1968–69.
- Sarris, Andrew, "After The Graduate," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), July–August 1978.
- Nielson, J.A., in Filmrutan (Stockholm), vol. 25, no. 1, 1982.
- Auster, A., and L. Quart, "American Cinema of the Sixties," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 13, no. 2, 1984.
- "Simon Sues Embassy Over Graduate Music," in Variety (New York), no. 324, 20 August 1986.
- Hendrykowski, Marek, "Absolwent," in Iluzjon, no. 3, July–September 1989.
- Denby, D., "Coo Coo Cachoo, Mrs. Robinson," in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 4, December 1990.
- Medich, R., "Post-'Graduate' Studies," in Premiere (Boulder), June 1992.
- Engel, J., "Call This One 'The Post-Graduate'," in New York Times, vol. 142, section 2, 20 December 1992.
- Premiere* (Boulder), vol. 9, June 1996.

* * *

The Graduate is significant for three reasons. First, it is a major work by director Mike Nichols, who is characteristic of what the French call an auteur. (He is in complete control of his films and they contain consistent themes and elements of style.) The Graduate was Nichols's second film after he directed Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?, and it won him an Academy Award for best film director of 1967.

Second, the film was very popular with young people. The Vietnam War was escalating, and many young people were questioning not only the war but certain values of their society. But The Graduate was not a heavy protest film as Getting Straight or The Strawberry Statement were. The film's concern was not with destroying a materialistic, "plastic" society where people use each other as objects, but with a young man who questions this value system, decides what is important to him, and acts upon it honestly.

Third, the film stands the test of time. It possesses qualities of universality and brilliance because Nichols uses the filmic symbol system to generate laughter and cheers from his viewers.

The story concerns Benjamin (Dustin Hoffman in his screen debut) who returns to California from his eastern college and reacts zombie-like to his parents, their friends, and the values they live by. He is seduced by Mrs. Robinson (Anne Bancroft), the wife of his father's business partner, but he acquiesces to this relationship only to save himself from symbolically drowning in the values and objects of the materialistic sub-culture he is in. In fact, Mrs. Robinson uses Benjamin as an object to satisfy her desire. Benjamin and Mrs. Robinson carry on their affair until he is forced by his parents to have a date with her daughter Elaine (Katharine Ross), currently home from college. One kiss from Elaine changes Benjamin from passivity to action. He now pursues Elaine, and overcoming all odds, rescues her at a church just after she marries a medical student. Benjamin and Elaine (she is still in her wedding gown) leave together on a bus.

The Graduate shares with other Nichols's films the theme of a character who finds himself or herself "drowning" in some way, and who attempts to change. In The Graduate, Nichols shows this drowning visually. Early in the film, Benjamin is in his room alone during his graduation party staring into an aquarium which has a model of a diver at the bottom of the tank. Mrs. Robinson comes in and asks him to drive her home, throwing the car keys into the aquarium. She symbolically has the "key" to his survival. At her home, she makes it clear that she is available to him. He later calls her to begin the affair after he has been humiliated by his father who has given him a diving suit for a birthday present. His father has Benjamin wear the suit to "show off" in front of friends. In this suit, which relates to the diver in the aquarium, Benjamin enters the backyard pool and then just sinks to the bottom. He stays underwater as the camera pulls back, making him almost disappear. His voice, calling Mrs. Robinson, is heard at the end of this shot before we see him making the call from a hotel. Thus, the affair begins his emergence into life and helps him question what is really important to him.

The Graduate also shares with other Nichols films the tentative ending, where the viewer is left to ponder if enough really has changed. In the ending of The Graduate, Benjamin has rescued Elaine and they escape on a bus. They don't speak. Simon and Garfunkel's "Sound of Silence" is sung, as it was at the beginning of the film. The point Nichols is making is that perhaps not enough has changed, and that Benjamin cannot free himself from his society completely; he can only try, by seeing clearly and being true to himself and his own values.

This ending is consistent with the endings in other Nichols films. In Working Girl, 21 years later, which can be compared to The Graduate, the heroine has saved herself from "drowning" (she has crossed the water to Manhattan on the Staten Island ferry, for example) and has become a boss, not a secretary. The last shot has her looking out the window of a huge building with many floors above her in the hierarchy of the business world, suggesting she has made a change but that there is a long way to go.

Elements of style that Nichols uses so well in The Graduate that can also be found in his other films are the use of the environment to comment on the states of his characters (cool colors and white walls in The Graduate emphasize a sterile environment), heads that fill the screen while the background is often out of focus (Benjamin moving through the guests at his graduation party as the camera, concentrating on him, shows his isolation), and the use of filmic technique to comment on the situation (Benjamin runs to the church to rescue Elaine but appears to be running in place without getting anywhere, since Nichols had this action shot through a very long lens that flattens perspective).

The Graduate remains today as funny and profound as it was when first released. It articulates concerns about values. And for Benjamin, Elaine, and the viewer, there is a tentative note of hope.

—H. Wayne Schuth

LA GRANDE ILLUSION

France, 1937

Director: Jean Renoir

Production: Réalisations d'Art Cinématographique (R.A.C.); black and white, 35mm; running time: 117 minutes; length: 10,530 feet.

La grande illusion

Released 4 June 1937, Paris. Re-released 1946 with much footage deleted, re-released in 1959 with most original footage restored, and again in 1972. Filmed from about 30 January-2 April 1937 in Billancourt Studios, Tobis Studios, and Eclair Studios, Epinay; and on location near Neuf-Brisach, the Colmar barracks, and Haut-Koenigsbourg, Alsace.

Producers: Frank Rollmer and Albert Pinkovitch; screenplay: Charles Spaak and Jean Renoir; assistant director: Jacques Becker; photography: Christian Matras (1st operator) and Claude Renoir (2nd operator); editor: Marguerite Marthe-Huguet; sound engineer: Joseph de Bretagne; production designer: Eugène Lourié; music: Joseph Kosma; lyrics: Vincent Tully and A. Valsien; costume designer: Decrais; technical advisor: Carl Koch.

Cast: Erich von Stroheim (von Rauffenstein); Jean Gabin (Maréchal); Pierre Fresnay (de Baëldieu); Marcel Dalio (Rosenthal); Julien Carette (Actor); Gaston Modot (Engineer); Jean Daste (Teacher); Georges Pecket (French soldier); Jacques Becker (English officer); Sylvain Itkine (Demolder); Dita Parlo (Elsa); Werner Florian; Michel Salina; Carl Koch.

Awards: Venice Film Festival, Best Artistic Ensemble, 1937; New York Film Critics' Award, Best Foreign Film, 1938.

Publications

Script:

Spaak, Charles, and Jean Renoir, La grande illusion, London, 1968; Paris, 1971.

Spaak, Charles, and Jean Renoir, Velikaja illuzija, in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 3, March 1996.

Books:

Cauliez, Armand-Jean, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1962.

Chardère, Bernard, Jean Renoir, Lyons, 1962.

Analyses des films de Jean Renoir, Paris, 1966.

Bennett, Susan, Study Unit 8: Jean Renoir, London, 1967.

- Leprohon, Pierre, Jean Renoir, New York, 1971.
- Braudy, Leo, Jean Renoir: The World of His Films, New York, 1972.
- Daniel, Joseph, Guerre et cinéma: Grandes illusions et petits soldats 1895–1971, Paris, 1972.
- Predal, René, editor, La Société française (1914–45), Paris, 1972.
- Bazin, André, Jean Renoir, edited by Francois Truffaut, Paris, 1973; updated edition, 1992.
- Durgnat, Raymond, Jean Renoir, Berkeley, 1974.
- Renoir, Jean, My Life and Films, New York, 1974.
- DeNitto, Dennis, and William Herman, Film and the Critical Eye, New York, 1975.
- Giannetti, Louis D., Godard and Others: Essays on Film Form, Rutherford, New Jersey, 1975.
- Truffaut, Francois, Les Films de ma vie, Paris, 1975; as The Films in My Life, New York, 1978.
- Faulkner, Christopher, Jean Renoir: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
- Sesonske, Alexander, Jean Renoir: The French Films 1924–1939, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1980.
- Gauteur, Claude, Jean Renoir: Oeuvres de cinéma inédites, Paris, 1981.
- McBride, Joseph, editor, Filmmakers on Filmmaking 2, Los Angeles, 1983.
- Serceau, Daniel, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1985.
- Bertin, Celia, Jean Renoir, Paris, 1986.
- Faulkner, Christopher, The Social Cinema of Jean Renoir, Princeton, 1986.
- Vincendeau, Ginette, and Keith Reader, La Vie est à nous: French Cinema of the Popular Front 1935–1938, London, 1986.
- Viry-Babel, Roger, Jean Renoir: Le Jeu et la règle, Paris, 1986.
- Brunelin, André, Gabin, Paris, 1987.
- Renoir, Jean, Renoir on Renoir, New York, translated by Carol Volk, 1990.
- Bergan, Ronald, Jean Renoir: Projections of Paradise, New York, 1994.
- Schneider, Bruno F., Renoir, New York, 1995.
- Renoir, Jean, An Interview: Jean Renoir, with Nicholas Frangakis, Los Angeles, 1998.
- Articles:
- Fainsilber, Benjamin, “Jean Renoir fait son examen de conscience,” in Cinéma (Paris), 20 May 1937.
- Bianco e Nero* (Rome), September 1937.
- New York Times*, 13 September 1938.
- Variety* (New York), 14 September 1938.
- Hochheimer, Rita, editor, “A Guide to the Discussion and Appreciation of the French Photoplay Grand Illusion,” in Photoplay Studies (New York), no. 1, 1939.
- “Renoir Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1952.
- Hift, Fred, “American Commentary: Says M. Renoir,” in Today’s Cinema (London), 9 August 1956.
- “Renoir Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Christmas 1957.
- “Un Film—La Grande Illusion—restauré comme un tableau,” in Lettres Française (Paris), 6 March 1958.
- Beylie, Claude, “Ou est la liberté?,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1958.
- Beylie, Claude, in Cinéma (Paris), November 1958.
- Sadoul, Georges, “The Renaissance of the French Cinema—Feyder, Renoir, Duvivier, Carné,” in Film: An Anthology, edited by Daniel Talbot, New York, 1959.
- Dyer, Peter John, “Renoir and Realism,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1960.
- Brunelin, André, “Jacques Becker; ou, La Trace de l’homme,” in Cinéma (Paris), July 1960.
- Whitehall, Richard, “The Screen in His Canvas,” in Films and Filming (London), July 1960.
- Kauffmann, Stanley, “The Elusive Corporal and Grand Illusion,” in A World on Film, New York, 1966.
- Beylie, Claude, in Cinéma (Paris), November 1969.
- Winsten, Archer, “Grand Illusion,” in American Film Criticism, edited by Stanley Kauffmann, New York, 1972.
- Diehl, Digby, “Directors Go to Their Movies: Jean Renoir,” in Action (Los Angeles), May–June 1972.
- Kauffmann, Stanley, in Horizon (Los Angeles), Summer 1972.
- Fofi, Goffredo, “The Cinema of the Popular Front in France (1934–38),” in Screen (London), Winter 1972–73.
- Sesonske, Alexander, in Georgia Review (Athens), Spring 1975.
- Gauteur, Claude, “Jean Renoir de Nana à La Grande Illusion,” in Image et Son (Paris), May 1975.
- Viry-Babel, Roger, in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Spring 1976.
- Perebinosoff, P. R., “Theatricals in Jean Renoir’s Rules of the Game and Grand Illusion,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Winter 1977.
- Strebel, Elizabeth Grottle, “Jean Renoir and the Popular Front,” in Feature Films as History, edited by K. R. M. Short, London, 1981.
- Toles, G., “Being Well-Lost in Film,” in Raritan (New Brunswick, New Jersey), no. 2, 1993.
- Masson, Alain, in Positif (Paris), no. 395, January 1994.
- Lelouch, C., “A nagy ábránd,” in Filmvilág (Budapest), vol 37, no. 10, 1994.
- Lelouch, C., “La grande illusion,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 482, July/August 1994.
- Casas, Q., J. E. Monterde, and S. Zunzunegui, in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 17/18, March 1995.
- Review, in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 178, May–June 1995.
- Special Issue of Archives: Institut Jean Vigo (Perpignan), no. 70, February 1997.

* * *

The critical estimate of La grande illusion has fluctuated with the vicissitudes of critical theory. In the days when film’s importance was attributed to the importance of its subject, it was widely regarded as Renoir’s masterpiece, a noble humanist antiwar statement. With the development of the auteur theory in the late 1950s, its reputation dwindled. It came to be perceived as a less personal, less intimate and less complex work than La règle du jeu, which superseded it as marking the summit of Renoir’s achievement. Though opposed, these views are based on the same misconception. La grande illusion is much too complex to be reduced to a thesis film, and although an antiwar statement can certainly be read from it (Renoir’s detestation of war is not in doubt), that is incidental rather than essential to the film’s meaning. In fact, it has a great deal in common with La règle du jeu: Renoir’s own account of the thematic premise of the later film applies equally to the earlier (“My preoccupation is with the meeting; how to belong, how to meet”); both have similar four-part structures, moving to a big climactic scene at the end of part two, placing the major climax at the end of part three, with a quieter, more intimate fourth part in which the action moves out of doors or into the countryside.

“How to belong, how to meet”—another way of putting it is to say that Renoir’s perennial concern is with the boundaries; that keep people apart and the possibility of transcending them. The four-part structure enables him to develop this theme through a network of shifting, interlocking relationships presented consistently in terms of difference and the overcoming of difference.

The first part consists of a prologue that introduces three of the four main characters and two of the main boundaries, class and nationality. Bœildieu and Maréchal are connected because both are French and involved in a war against Germany; Bœildieu and von Rauffenstein are connected because both are aristocrats and share a particular code that excludes the proletariat Maréchal. The film’s basic assumption—that “difference” is socially constructed but so thoroughly internalized and so strongly institutionalized as to be very difficult to overcome—is dramatized in the parallels between the two headquarters (French/German) which are identical in structure but different in every detail, the details insisting upon “Frenchness” and “German-ness” respectively.

The second part occurs in the Prison Camp. Another main character, Rosenthal, is introduced, along with a host of minor ones who illustrate diverse aspects of the theme in the particularities of social position, profession, outlook, etc. With Rosenthal a third main boundary is established, that of race and religion. The pattern of alignments/separation becomes more complex: Maréchal/Bœildieu are linked by race and religion (Aryan, Christian) but separated by class position; Bœildieu/Rosenthal are linked by privilege but separated by class tradition (aristocrat/nouveau riche); Rosenthal/Maréchal are linked as non-aristocratic but separated by race/religion and social status. This section of the film makes frequent and expressive use of a favorite Renoir motif, the window, which stresses separation (outside/inside), but is also a boundary that can be crossed or communicated across. The second part culminates in the first big climax, the celebrated scene of the prisoners’ camp show and defiant singing of the “Marseillaise.” Most important here, however, is the film’s raising of the last main issue of boundary, that of gender/sexuality, especially in the extraordinary moment when the young prisoner is seen in women’s clothes (for the show) and all activity and conversation abruptly cease. Its intensity exceeds anything explainable in terms of nostalgia for absent women: the androgynous figure becomes the center of the men’s fascination and attraction.

The third section reintroduces von Rauffenstein (now with broken vertebrae, in a sense as much a prisoner as the men he is in charge of) and the development and culmination of the Bœildieu/von Rauffenstein alignment/separation. A leading concern here again connects the film to Règle du jeu: the notion that the aristocratic order the two men represent will not survive the war. The aristocracy of Règle du jeu is significantly different; they no longer are informed and guided by a clearly defined code of nobility. Règle du jeu’s Marquis is connected, not to Bœildieu, but to Rosenthal (not only are the two characters played by the same actor, but we are told that “Rosenthal” was the name of the Marquis’s grandfather). Renoir views this inevitable destruction of a way of life with marked ambivalence. The aristocratic code is seen at once as based upon an untenable privilege and as embodying a fineness without which civilization will be poorer. This part of the film moves to the second major climax, in which Renoir magnificently ties all the major thematic and dramatic threads together: the escape of Maréchal and Rosenthal, secured by Bœildieu who sacrifices his life by compelling von Rauffenstein to shoot him. The scene echoes the climax of the second section by centering on a “theatrical” performance (Bœildieu playing his penny whistle on the battlements, the searchlights trained on him as “star”). Together with the ensuing scene of Bœildieu’s death and his class friend/national enemy’s grief, the scene enacts the theme of the end of the aristocratic order (the proletarian Maréchal and the nouveau riche Rosenthal are the embryonic future). It achieves the film’s supreme irony in its play on the intimate understanding and affection between two men, one of whom must kill the other.

The last section involves the escape/the farm/the border. The relation of La grande illusion to classical narrative (with its traditional pattern of order-disturbance of order-restoration of order) is complex and idiosyncratic. The narrative actually takes place in the hiatus between two orders: the order the war has destroyed and the new order that will be built when it is over. Between the two, Renoir manages at once to suggest the social order that was left behind and the possibility of a different order no longer based on artificial divisions. In the camps, the boundaries of class, race, and nationality are repeatedly crossed and eroded as new alignments (based on human need and sympathy) are formed. The last section restores what was crucially absent earlier: the presence of a woman. A series of three immediately consecutive scenes can be read as “answering” and containing the eruption of possible bisexuality in part two: Maréchal and Rosenthal sleep in each other’s arms (the motive is warmth, not sexuality, but nonetheless they are in close bodily proximity); awakening, they quarrel violently, Maréchal calls Rosenthal a “dirty Jew,” they separate, then tentatively come together again; hiding in a barn, they hear someone coming and spring to either side of the door; the door opens and, exactly between them, the woman appears. The ensuing scenes restore the heterosexuality that, at the outset, was present only as a song (“Frou-Frou”) and a memory (Maréchal’s Joséphine, the woman recalled by both Bœildieu and von Rauffenstein). This leads to the ultimate expression of togetherness/division: the Christmas celebration in which Rosenthal assists, only to be excluded as the lovers leave to go to bed. If the film celebrates the possibility of demolishing boundaries, it also acknowledges, within the existing social system, their inevitability.

—Robin Wood

THE GRAPES OF WRATH

USA, 1940

Director: John Ford

Production: Twentieth Century-Fox; black and white, 35mm; running time: 128 minutes, some prints are 115 minutes. Released 24 January 1940, New York. Filmed late Summer-early Fall 1939 in Twentieth Century-Fox studios and lots; with some footage shot on location on Highway 66 between Oklahoma and California. Cost: $750,000 (estimated).

The Grapes of Wrath

Producer: Darryl F. Zanuck; screenplay: Nunnally Johnson, from the novel by John Steinbeck; photography: Gregg Toland; editor: Robert Simpson; art directors: Richard Day and Mark Lee Kirk; music arranger: Alfred Newman; special sound effects: Robert Parrish.

Cast: The Joad Party: Henry Fonda (Tom); Jane Darwell (Ma); Russell Simpson (Pa); Charley Grapewin (Grampa); Zeffie Tilbury (Granma); Frank Darien (Uncle John); Frank Sully (Noah); O. Z. Whitehead (Al); Dorris Bowdon (Rosasharn); Eddie Quillan (Connie Rivers); Shirley Mills (Ruthie); Darryl Hickman (Winfield); Others: John Carradine (Casey); John Qualen (Muley Graves); Ward Bond (Policeman); Paul Guilfoyle (Floyd); Charles D. Brown (Wilkie).

Awards: Oscars for Best Director and Best Supporting Actress (Darwell), 1940; New York Film Critics' Awards for Best Picture and Best Direction, 1940.

Publications

Script:

Johnson, Nunnally, The Grapes of Wrath, in Twenty Best Film Plays, edited by John Gassner and Dudley Nichols, New York, 1943.

Books:

Mitry, Jean, John Ford, Paris, 1954.

Kracauer, Siegfried, Theory of Film: The Redemption of Physical Reality, New York, 1960.

Haudiquet, Philippe, John Ford, Paris, 1966.

Bogdanovich, Peter, John Ford, Berkeley, 1968; revised edition, 1978.

Burrows, Michael, John Steinbeck and His Films, 1970.

Springer, John, The Fondas: The Films and Careers of Henry, Jane, and Peter Fonda, New York, 1970.

Baxter, John, The Cinema of John Ford, New York, 1971.

French, Warren, Filmguide to "The Grapes of Wrath," Bloomington, Indiana, 1973.

McBride, Joseph, and Michael Wilmington, John Ford, London, 1975.

Sarris, Andrew, The John Ford Movie Mystery, London, 1976.
 Ford, Dan, Pappy: The Life of John Ford, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.
 Sinclair, Andrew, John Ford: A Biography, London and New York, 1979.
 Stempel, Tom, Screenwriter: The Life and Times of Nunnally Johnson, San Diego, 1980.
 Anderson, Lindsay, About John Ford, London, 1981.
 Caughie, John, editor, Theories of Authorship: A Reader, London, 1981.
 Fonda, Henry, and Howard Teichmann, Fonda: My Life, New York, 1981.
 Schatz, Thomas, Hollywood Genres: Formulas, Filmmaking, and the Studio System, New York, 1981.
 Goldstein, Norm, Henry Fonda: His Life and Work, London, 1982.
 Thomas, Tony, The Films of Henry Fonda, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1983.
 Cole, Gerald, and Wes Farrell, The Fondas, London, 1984.
 Reed, Joseph W., Three American Originals: John Ford, William Faulkner, Charles Ives, Middletown, Connecticut, 1984.
 Roberts, Allen, and Max Goldstein, Henry Fonda: A Biography, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1984.
 Norman, Barry, The Film Greats, London, 1985.
 Conger, Sydney Syndy M., and Janice R. Welsch, Narrative Strategies: Original Essays in Film and Prose Fiction, Urbana, Illinois, 1986.
 Gallagher, Tag, John Ford: The Man and His Films, Berkeley, 1986.
 Stowell, Peter, John Ford, Boston, 1986.
 Lourdeaux, Lee, Italian and Irish Filmmakers in America: Ford, Capra, Coppola & Scorsese, Springfield, 1990; revised, 1993.
 Davis, Ronald L., John Ford: Hollywood's Old Master, Norman, 1997.
 Levy, Bill, John Ford: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1998.
 Eyman, Scott, Print the Legend: The Life and Times of John Ford, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Benton, Thomas, in Life (New York), 22 January 1940.
Collier's (New York), 23 January 1940.
New York Times, 25 January 1940.
 Mok, M., "Slumming with Zanuck," in Nation (New York), 3 February 1940.
 Ferguson, Otis, in New Republic (New York), 12 February 1940.
 Griffith, Richard, "The Film Since Then," in The Film Till Now by Paul Rotha, revised edition, New York, 1949.
 Bluestone, George, Novels into Films, Baltimore, 1957.
 Hill, Derek, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1957.
 Springer, John, "Henry Fonda," in Films in Review (New York), November 1960.
 Cowie, Peter, "Fonda," in Films and Filming (London), April 1962.
 McVay, Douglas, "The Five Worlds of John Ford," in Films and Filming (London), June 1962.
 Fonda, Henry, "Fonda on Fonda," in Films and Filming (London), February 1963.
 "Ford Issue" of Focus on Film (London), Spring 1971.
 "Ford Issue" of Filmkritik (Munich), January 1972.
 Pauly, T. H., "Gone with the Wind and The Grapes of Wrath as Hollywood Histories of the Depression," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), Summer 1974.

Place, J., "A Family in a Ford: The Grapes of Wrath," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1976.
 Campbell, R., "The Ideology of the Social Consciousness Movie: Three Films of Darryl F. Zanuck," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (Pleasantville, New York), Winter 1978.
 Menides, L. J., "John Huston's Wise Blood and the Myth of the Sacred Quest," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), 1981.
 Boyero, C., in Casablanca (Madrid), January 1983.
 Sanderson, J., "American Romanticism in John Ford's The Grapes of Wrath: Horizontalness, Darkness, Christ, and F. D. R.," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1989.
Reid's Film Index, no. 4, 1990.
 Rothstein, M., "Tom Joad: By the Book," in New York Times, no. 139, section 2, 18 March 1990.
 Nielsen, R., "Ray's Way: Eddie Quillan," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 194, August 1991.

* * *

A pet project of Darryl Zanuck's, The Grapes of Wrath exercised the packaging talents of Fox's studio head for a large part of 1939 as he put together a team appropriate to a book with the stature of Steinbeck's novel. John Ford was an obvious choice to direct, Dudley Nichols to write the script, and Henry Fonda to star as Tom Joad, the uneducated ex-convict "Ookie" who becomes the personification of flinty Midwestern integrity and moral worth. Knowing Fonda's wish to play Joad, Zanuck lured him into signing an eight-picture contract by advertising his intention to cast in the role either Don Ameche or Tyrone Power.

Ford, Nichols, Fonda and the supporting cast translated Steinbeck's novel to the screen with proper fidelity, the distortions far outweighed by the spectacular rightness of Fonda's casting and the remarkable cinematography of Gregg Toland, clearly influenced by the dust bowl photographs of Walker Evans and Margaret Bourke-White. The film's opening image of Tom Joad walking with tireless application out of the flat Midwestern landscape against a counterpoint of leaning telephone poles, suggests the themes of society confronted by an ecological and historical disaster against which it is helpless to act. Accustomed to such material from his frontier films, Ford took instinctive and instant command.

Clearly he felt an affinity with the plight of the dispossessed Kansas farmers of Steinbeck's story, which mirrored that of his Irish forebears turned off the land in the potato famine of the 19th century. And he had already established in films like Four Men and a Prayer the image of the family as not only unbreakable but an instrument for change, an institution that could act to improve social conditions. Throughout the film, it is the independents like John Carradine's itinerant preacher Casey and the half-mad fugitive Muley (John Qualen) who seem lost, desperate for companionship, while Jane Darwell and Russell Simpson as Ma and Pa Joad exhale a sense of calm and confidence. As Ma affirms at the end of the film, in a scene added by Zanuck to underline the moral and blunt the harsh dying fall of the novel, no force can destroy the will of people who are determined to live.

The picture Ford and Nichols draw of Depression America pulls few punches. Disinterested banks employ local strong-arm men to dispossess the share croppers and evict farmers unable to keep up mortgage payments on their own over-used, poorly maintained properties. Muley's futile stand against the bulldozers wilts when he recognizes one of his neighbors in the drivers seat. One has to eat even if it means betraying one's own kind. Deprived of his sacred kinship with the earth, sanctified by "living on it and being born on it and dying on it," Muley becomes "just an ol' graveyard ghost" flitting about his crumbling house in the light of Tom Joad's lamp.

The Joads set out for California, their lurching truck loaded up with possessions, relatives and, in a touching gesture, the preacher Casey, invited along after a brief and hurried calculation of the vehicle's strength. Casey is a classic Fordian figure, a religious madman who acts as custodian of principles, the celebrant of rituals like Mose Harper (Hank Worden) in The Searchers. He says the brief funeral oration over Grandpa Joad when he succumbs to the trials of the journey. He also turns into a primitive union organiser when greedy employers exploit the itinerants desperate for work as fruit-pickers. He's no natural radical—just a man with a proper sense of right and wrong. Amused, he says of the bosses' thugs who hunt him, "They think I'm the leader on account of I talk so much." When he dies, murdered by the employers, it is Tom who carries on his duty, instinctively sensing his destiny. "Maybe it's like Casey says. A feller ain't got a soul of his own, but only a piece of a big soul." And he walks off again, as he entered the story, undramatically spreading the gospel of social reform.

The Grapes of Wrath abounds with examples of Ford's skill in visual language. Poor talkers, the Joads express much in a way of standing, looking, responding to the land through which they pass. Ma Joad's cleaning up of the old house is shown largely without dialogue, but her careful turning out of a box of mementoes, the discovery of a pair of earrings and her action of putting them on her ears and looking up into the dark at some half-forgotten moment of youthful pleasure could hardly be bettered with words. Jane Darwell is perhaps too plump, matriarchal, too Irish for her role, and Ford's first choice, Beulah Bondi, has a greater physical claim to the part with her gaunt, stringy resilience, but so effective is Ford's use of the actress that one can no longer imagine anyone else playing it.

Fonda remains the focus of the film, his clear-eyed sceptical gaze reaching out to the camera no matter where he stands in the frame. The strength of his moral convictions is all the more striking for the imperfection of the character which supports them. Just released from jail for a murder, Tom is unrepentant: "Knocked his head plumb to squash," he recalls to an alarmed truck driver who gives him a lift. He has little understanding of politics ("What's these 'Reds' anyway?"), enjoys a drink and a dance, but has no time for abstract discussions. That such a man can be roused to moral wrath by injustice dramatizes the self-evident corruption of the system, and the belief in his conviction carries an audience to a conclusion startlingly radical by the standards of the time. Ford's reactionary politics, his populism and republicanism, must have stood in direct contradiction of the book's harsh message, which may explain his acceptance to the final sugar-coated scene. Yet in Ford's world, to keep faith meant more than any political creed; better to believe in an error than not to believe at all. When Ma Joad at the end of The Grapes of Wrath professes the absolute faith of a peasant people in simple survival, one hears Ford's voice as clearly as that of writer, producer or star.

—John Baxter

THE GREAT DICTATOR

USA, 1940

Director: Charles Chaplin

Production: United Artists; black and white, 35mm; running time: 127 minutes. Released 1940.

Producer: Charles Chaplin; screenplay: Charles Chaplin; photography: Karl Struss and Rollie Totheroh; editor: Willard Nico; art director: J. Russell Spencer; music: Meredith Wilson.

Cast: Charles Chaplin (Adenoid Hynkel, Dictator of Ptomania/A Jewish Barber); Paulette Goddard (Hannah); Jack Oakie (Benzini Napaloni, Dictator of Bacteria); Reginald Gardiner (Schultz); Henry Daniell (Garbitsch); Billy Gilbert (Herring).

Publications

Books:

- Tyler, Parker, Chaplin, Last of the Clowns, New York, 1947.
 Huff, Theodore, Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1951.
 Bessy, Maurice, and Robert Florey, Monsieur Chaplin; ou, Le Rire dans la nuit, Paris, 1952.
 Sadoul, Georges, Vie de Charlot, Paris, 1952.
 Leprohon, Pierre, Charlot, Paris, 1957; revised edition, 1970.
 Mitry, Jean, Charlot et la fabulation chaplinesque, Paris, 1957.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, Charles Chaplin, Paris, 1963.
 Chaplin, Charles, My Autobiography, London, 1964.
 McDonald, Gerald, and others, The Films of Charlie Chaplin, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1965.
 Martin, Marcel, Charlie Chaplin, Paris, 1966; third edition, 1983.
 McCaffrey, Donald, editor, Focus on Chaplin, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1971.
 Mitry, Jean, Tout Chaplin: Tous les films, par le texte, par le gag, et par l'image, Paris, 1972.
 Chaplin, Charles, My Life in Pictures, London, 1974.
 Manvell, Roger, Chaplin, Boston, 1974.
 Moss, Robert, Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1975.
 Sobel, Raoul, and David Francis, Chaplin: Genesis of a Clown, London, 1977.
 Baldelli, P., Charlie Chaplin, Florence, 1977.
 Lyons, Timothy J., Charles Chaplin: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
 Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Essays and a Lecture, edited by Jay Leyda, Princeton, 1982.
 Haining, Peter, editor, The Legend of Charlie Chaplin, London, 1982.
 Gehring, Wes D., Charlie Chaplin: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, Connecticut, 1983.
 Robinson, David, Chaplin: The Mirror of Opinion, London, 1983.
 Kamin, Dan, Charlie Chaplin's One-Man Show, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.
 Smith, Julian, Chaplin, Boston, 1984.
 Robinson, David, Chaplin: His Life and Art, London, 1985.
 Saint-Martin, Catherine, Charlot/Chaplin; ou, La Conscience du mythe, Paris, 1987.

The Great Dictator

Avisar, Ilan, Screening the Holocaust: Cinema's Images of the Unimaginable, Bloomington, Indiana, 1988.
 Chaplin, Charlie, Die Schlussrede aus dem Film Der grosse Diktator, Hamburg, 1993.
 Lynn, Kenneth S., Charlie Chaplin and His Times, New York, 1997.
 Mitchell, Glenn, The Chaplin Encyclopedia, Phoenix, 1997.
 Milton, Joyce, Tramp: The Life of Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1998.
 Kimber, John, The Art of Charles Chaplin, Sheffield, 2000.

Articles:

- Cooke, Alistair, "Charlie Chaplin," in Atlantic (Boston), August 1939.
Life (New York), 2 September 1940.
Times (London), 16 October 1940.
Variety (New York), 16 October 1940.
New York Times, 16 October 1940.
 Todd, Daniel, in New Masses (New York), 17 December 1940.
 "Hitler and Chaplin at 54," in New York Times Magazine, 18 April 1943.
 Warshow, Robert, "A Feeling of Sad Dignity," in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), November-December 1954.
 Baker, Peter, "Clown with a Frown," in Films and Filming (London), August 1957.
 Dyer, Peter John, "The True Face of Man," in Films and Filming (London), September 1958.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 5 and 12 March 1964.
 Goodman, Paul, "Film Chronicle (1940): Chaplin Again, Again, and Again," in Movie (London), Winter 1964.
 Lyons, Timothy J., "Roland H. Totheroh Interviewed," in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1972.
 Harvey, S., in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1972.
 Chevassu, F., in Image et Son (Paris), November 1972.
 Lefèvre, Raymond, "Le Dictateur: Un Culot inoui," in Cinéma (Paris), November 1972.
 Tarratt, Margaret, in Films and Filming (London), March 1973.
 Bourget, J. L., "L'Art des transitions dans Le Dictateur," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1973.
 Boost, C., in Skoop (The Hague), August 1973.
 Friedrich, J., "Die letzte Tortenschlacht: Chaplins Grosser Diktator und das Ende des Slapsticks," in Filmkritik (Munich), November 1973.
 Giuricin, G., "La negazione del dittatore come fenomeno di massa," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), January-February 1977.
 Chaplin, Charles, "Charles Chaplin (en) français," in Image et Son (Paris), January 1977.
 "Chaplin Issue" of Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), March 1978.
 "Chaplin Issue" of University Film Association Journal (Houston), no. 1, 1979.
 Goldfarb, A., "Adolf Hitler as Portrayed in Drama and Film," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), no. 1, 1979.
 Sato, Tadao, "The Comedy of Ozu and Chaplin: A Study in Contrast," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 2, 1979.
 Goldstein, R. M., in Film News (New York), March-April 1979.
 Bodeen, DeWitt, in Magill's Survey of Cinema I, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), Summer 1984.
 Short, K. R. M., "Chaplin's The Great Dictator and British Censorship 1939," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio, and Television (Abingdon, Oxfordshire), March 1985.
 Gyurey, V., "A Harmadik Birodalom es a Fuehrer ket nezopontbol," in Filmkultura (Budapest), no. 6, 1989.
 "'Char': The Great Dictator," in Variety (New York), vol. 336, no. 3, 2 August 1989.
Reid's Film Index, no. 6, 1991.
 Delage, C., "La fiction contre l'histoire?: Le Dictateur," in Vertigo (Paris), no. 13, 1995.
 Roth-Lindberg, O., "En ironisk rockad," in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 37, no. 5/6, 1995/1996.
 Seesslen, G., "Chaplins spaete Filme," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 14, August 1997.
 Rancière, Jacques, "La fiction difficile," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 521, February 1998.

* * *

The Great Dictator was Chaplin's first dialogue film, the first film for which he wrote a script in advance, and the first film in two decades in which he does not star as the Tramp. Instead Chaplin plays a double role—a little Jewish barber, who closely resembles the Tramp, and the great dictator of Ptomania, Adenoid Hynkel, an obvious parody of Adolf Hitler, whom Chaplin ironically resembled.

The funniest sequences of the film are Chaplin's burlesques of Hitler's rhetoric, mannerisms, and delusions of grandeur. In one of those comic sequences, Hynkel delivers a political speech that is so scorching that the microphones melt and bend. Hynkel is so inflamed by his rhetorical passion that he not only has to cool his throat with water but also splashes water down the front of his pants—a brilliantly subtle Freudian suggestion that much of the fire of Hitler's political persuasion derives from the urgings of his genitals. In perhaps the most memorable sequence of the film, Hynkel converts the globe of the earth into his balloon-like plaything, performing a languid, romantic, dreamlike ballet with the floating globe, revealing his aspirations to possess the earth in almost sexual terms. This comic sexuality is reinforced by both the suggestions of masturbation in Hynkel's solo dance with the globe, and in the fact that the sort of actions he performs precisely mirror the twirls and gyrations of a bubble dancer, teasingly playing with the circular globe that hides her most mysterious parts from her leering audience.

In contrast to the delusions of the dictator is the earthy, pragmatic activity of the barber, a German soldier injured in World War I, suffering from amnesia, who awakens and returns to "Ptomanian" society only to find himself in an unfamiliar world where Jews are outcasts. In immediate response to the dictator's dance with the globe is the Jewish barber's snappy shaving of a customer to the precise rhythms of a Brahms Hungarian dance. The barber's snappy, vital, human-oriented actions contrast deliberately with the dictator's masturbatory solo. The barber also contrasts with the dictator in his relationship to language. As opposed to flaming rhetoric, the barber talks very little—another clear parallel to the Tramp. But at the end of the film, the barber, because of his physical resemblance, is mistaken for the dictator and asked to deliver the victorious speech to celebrate the invasion of "Austerlich." The barber becomes very talkative, summoning his courage and feelings to deliver a direct appeal to all his viewers for hope, peace, and humanity. Although the lengthy, explicit political speech is deliberately woven into the film's action—which has contrasted the barber and the dictator in their relationship to human speech—the monologue struck many critics as overly explicit and impassioned, inadequately translated into Chaplin's tools of comedy, irony, and physical action.

Chaplin claims that he was unaware of the horrors of the Nazi death camps when he made the film. The outrageous sense of burlesque in the film implies the general American belief that Hitler was more of a clown to be laughed at than a menace to be feared. The reduction of Hitler's associates and allies to buffoons reveals the same pattern—Goering becomes Herring, Goebbels becomes Barbitsch, Mussolini becomes Benzino Napaloni, impersonated by a pasta-sliding Jack Oakie. Chaplin later stated that if he had known about the seriousness and murderousness of the Nazi threat he would have never made the film.

—Gerald Mast

GREAT EXPECTATIONS

UK, 1946

Director: David Lean

Production: Rank/Cineguild; black and white, 35mm; running time: 118 minutes. Released May 1947 by Universal-International Pictures.

Producer: David Lean; screenplay: David Lean and Ronald Neame with Anthony Havelock-Allan, Kay Walsh and Cecil McGivern; from the novel by Charles Dickens; photography: Guy Green; editor: Jack Harris; art direction: John Bryan; music score: Walter Goehr.

Cast: John Mills (Mr. Pip); Anthony Wager (Pip as a boy); Valerie Hobson (Estella); Jean Simmons (Estella as a girl); Bernard Miles (Joe Gargery); Francis L. Sullivan (Jaggers); Finlay Currie (Magwitch); Alec Guinness (Herbert Pocket); John Forrest (Herbert as a boy); Martita Hunt (Miss Havisham); Ivor Bernard (Wemmick); Freda Jackson (Mrs. Joe); Torin Thatcher (Bentley Drummil); Eileen Erskine (Biddy); Hay Petrie (Uncle Pumblechook); George Hayes (Compeyson); Richard George (Sergeant); Everley Gregg (Sarah Pocket); John Burch (Mr. Wopsie); O. B. Clarence (Aged parent).

Awards: Oscars for Best Cinematography—Black and White and Best Art Direction, 1947.

Publications

Books:

- Tynan, Kenneth, Alec Guinness, New York, 1954.
 Durnat, Raymond, A Mirror for England: British Movies from Austerity to Affluence, New York, 1971.
 Pratley, Gerald, The Cinema of David Lean, New York, 1974.
 Silver, Alain, and James Ursini, David Lean and His Films, London, 1974; revised edition, 1991.
 Zambrano, A. L., Dickens and Film, New York, 1977.
 Castelli, Louis, and Caryn Lynn Cleeland, David Lean: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1980.
 Klein, Michael, and Gillian Parker, editors, The English Novel and the Movies, New York, 1981.
 Hunter, Allan, Alec Guinness on Screen, London, 1982.

- Anderegg, Michael A., David Lean, Boston, 1984.
 Guinness, Alec, Blessings in Disguise, London, 1985.
 Missler, Andreas, Alec Guinness: Seine Filme, sein Leben, Munich, 1987.
 Von Gunden, Kenneth, Alec Guinness: The Films, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1987.
 Silverman, Stephen M., David Lean, New York, 1989; updated version, 1992.
 Brownlow, Kevin, David Lean, Gordonville, 1997.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 25 December 1947.
New York Times, 23 May 1947.
 Lejeune, C.A., "The Up and Coming Team of Lean and Neame," in New York Times, 15 June 1947.
 Pichel, Irving, in Hollywood Quarterly, July 1947.
 Ellin, Stanley, in Hollywood Quarterly, Fall 1947.
 Thompson, Howard, "Career Inventory from the Lean Viewpoint," in New York Times, 9 November 1952.
 Holden, J., "A Study of David Lean," in Film Journal (New York), April 1956.
 Agee, James, Agee on Film I, New York, 1958.
 McVay, Douglas, "David Lean—Lover of Life," in Films and Filming (London), August 1959.
 Watts, Stephen, "David Lean," in Films in Review (New York), April 1959.
 McVay, Douglas, "Alec Guinness," in Films and Filming (London), May 1961.
 Johnson, Ian, "Mills," in Films and Filming (London), June 1962.
 Marill, Alvin, "John Mills," in Films in Review (New York), August–September 1971.
 Silver, A., "The Untranquil Light: David Lean's Great Expectations," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1974.
 Zambrano, in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1974.
 Wilson, D., "Gag Bag," in New Statesman (London), 9 January 1976.
 MacKay, C. H., "A Novel's Journey into Film: The Case of Great Expectations," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), April 1985.
 Hedling, E., "Skuldens labyrinth," in Filmhaftet (Uppsala, Sweden), December 1988.
 "Great Expectations Section" in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 1, 1992.
Reid's Film Index, no. 13, 1994.
 O'Neill, Eithne, "Les grandes espérances: Là-bas, dans les marais grelottants," in Positif (Paris), no. 410, April 1995.
 Baston, Jane, "Word and Image: The Articulation and Visualization of Power in Great Expectations," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 24, no. 3, 1996.
 Kendle, B., "Lean Dickens and Admirable Crichton: Film Adaptations of Literature," in Michigan Academician, vol. 28, no. 1, 1996.
Boxoffice (Chicago), vol. 133, December 1997.

* * *

David Lean was the Great White Hope of postwar British cinema. In Which We Serve, which Lean co-directed with Noël Coward, was the most popular British film of the war years, and Brief Encounter was seen by the critics as a breakthrough into serious adult realism—though working-class audiences found Celia Johnson and Trevor Howard's over-delicate sensibilities hard to comprehend. Great Expectations had a wider appeal. Richard Winnington, one of the most perceptive 1940s film critics, claimed it as "the first big British film to be made, a film that confidently sweeps our cloistered virtues into the open, it casts a complete spell derived from some inner power."

Great Expectations

The film was a commercial success in Britain and America (so successful that Lean couldn't resist following it up with Oliver Twist), and it still stands out as one of the finest of all film adaptations of Dickens. John Bryan's art direction avoids the trap so many designers fall into of striving so hard to recreate authentic period detail that Dickens's richly imaginative world is lost amidst too solid and realistic sets. Bryan, in cooperation with the brilliant cinematographer Guy Green, succeeds in creating an evocative atmosphere which gives the film much of its power and resonance.

Lean, a showman as well as an artist, talks about the need to gain the attention of audiences with a dramatic opening sequence. In Great Expectations he succeeds almost too well: the evocation of the bleak East Kent marshes and Pip's nightmarish encounter with Magwitch in the churchyard sets such a standard of excitement that what follows is almost an anti-climax. It is to his credit, then, that he succeeds in moulding Dickens's rambling novel into a satisfying dramatic shape. Minor characters are sacrificed, but Finlay Currie's Magwitch, Martita Hunt's Miss Havisham, Bernard Miles's Joe Gargery, and Francis L. Sullivan's Jaggers are splendid creations against which all subsequent incarnations have to be measured. In comparison, John Mills's Pip is disappointingly colourless, and the metamorphosis of Estella from Jean Simmons to Valerie Hobson destroys the aura which surrounds her in the first half of the film.

Lean's interpretation of Dickens, like Olivier's interpretation of Shakespeare, is inevitably timebound. There will always be alternative ways of interpreting Great Expectations or Henry V, while a reinterpretation of Noël Coward's slight play which Lean transformed into Brief Encounter could only be a remake of the film.

Thus, where Brief Encounter's limitations—the prissiness of the lovers' attitudes to sex, the syrupy ending—seem movingly evocative of a lost age, Great Expectations's weaknesses—its lapses into whimsicality, the predominance of upper-middle-class accents—seem correctable faults. That said, no other film or television adaptation of Great Expectations has managed to achieve anything like the dramatic intensity and visual richness of Lean's film. Magwitch appearing like a terrifying apparition in the windswept churchyard; Miss Havisham and Estella in their eerie, cobweb-strewn mansion; the journey out to the riverside inn and the disastrous rendezvous with the packet steamer—these are so memorably filmed as to haunt the imagination for years afterwards.

—Robert Murphy

GREED

USA, 1924

Director: Erich von Stroheim

Production: Begun under Goldwyn-von Stroheim Productions for Goldwyn Pictures; released by Metro-Goldwyn Corporation as a Louis B. Mayer Presentation; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 150 minutes, a 109-minute version also exists; originally 7 hours, but Stroheim was forced to edit further, first into a 4 hour version, then into a 3 hour version supervised by Rex Ingram, and finally cut to 2½ hours by the studio; length: 10,212 feet (some sources list length as 10,067 feet or 10,500 feet); originally 47,000 feet, then 45,000 feet, then 42,000 feet, then 24,000 feet, then 18,000 feet, then 16,000 feet, and finally present length. Released December 1924, New York; all scenes with gold or gold-related objects were hand-tinted in original release prints. Filmed in 9 months, 1922–23 and edited in 1 year, 1923–24. Filmed in Oakland, California, and in Death Valley and the Panamint Mountains, California. Cost: over $450,000.

Producers: Erich von Stroheim and Samuel Goldwyn, some sources list Irving Thalberg as producer; screenplay: Erich von Stroheim and June Mathis, from the novel McTeague by Frank Norris; original titles: Erich von Stroheim and June Mathis; released titles: Joseph Farnham; photography: William H. Daniels, Ben F. Reynolds, and Ernest B. Schoedsack; editor: Frank Hull; final version editors: Joseph Farnham and reputedly June Mathis; production designers: Capt. Richard Day and Erich von Stroheim (no actual sets used); art directors: Louis Germonprez and Edward Sowders; music: James and Jack Brennan.

Cast: In the Prologue: Jack Curtis (McTeague, Sr., Shift Boss at the Big Dipper Mine) (role cut from film); Tempé Piggot (Mother McTeague); Gibson Gowland (McTeague, the Son); Günther von Ritzau (Dr. "Painless" Potter); Florence Gibson (Hag); In the Play: Gibson Gowland (Doc McTeague); Jean Hersholt (Marcus Schouler); Chester Conklin (Popper Sieppe); Sylvia Ashton (Mommer Sieppe); ZaSu Pitts (Trina); Austin Jewell ("Owgoost" Sieppe); Oscar and Otto Gotell ("Der Tervins," the twin brothers); Joan Standing (Selina); Frank Hayes (Old Grannis); Fanny Midgley (Miss Baker); Max Tyron (Mr. Oelbermann); Hughie Mack (Heise, the Harness Maker); Tiny Jones (Mrs. Heise); J. Aldrich Libbey (Mr. Ryer); Rita Revela (Mrs. Ryer); Dale Fuller (Maria Miranda Macapa, a Scrubwoman); Cesare Gravina (Zerkow, a Junkman); Lon Poff (Lottery Agent); S. S. Simon (Joe Frenna, the Saloon Keeper); William Mollenheimer (The Palmist); Hugh J. McCauley (The Photographer); Jack McDonald (Cribbens, a Prospector); James Gibson (Deputy Sheriff).

Publications

Script:

Von Stroheim, Erich, and June Mathis, Greed, edited by Joel W. Finler, New York and London, 1972.

Weinberg, Herman G., The Complete Greed by Erich von Stroheim, New York, 1972.

Books:

Fronval, Georges, Erich von Stroheim: Sa vie, ses films, Paris, 1939.
Noble, Peter, Hollywood Scapegoat: The Biography of Erich von Stroheim, London, 1951.

Bergut, Bob, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1960.

Lawson, John Howard, Film: The Creative Process, New York, 1964.
Barna, Jon, Stroheim, Vienna, 1966.

Gobeil, Charlotte, editor, Hommage à Erich von Stroheim, Ottawa, 1966.

Bazin, André, What is Cinema I, Berkeley, 1967.

Ciment, Michel, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1967.

Finler, Joel W., Stroheim, Berkeley, 1968.

Brownlow, Kenvin, The Parade's Gone By, London and New York, 1969.

Curtiss, Thomas Quinn, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1969.

Buache, Freddy, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1972.

Everson, William K., American Silent Film, New York, 1978.

Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.

Koszarski, Richard, The Man You Loved to Hate: Erich von Stroheim and Hollywood, Oxford, 1983.

Bessy, Maurice, Erich von Stroheim, Paris, 1984.

Rosenbaum, Richard, Greed, London, 1993.

Lenning, Arthur, Stroheim, Lexington, 2000.

Articles:

New York Times, 5 December 1924.

Variety (New York), 10 December 1924.

Photoplay (New York), January 1925.

Davay, Paul, "Notes sur les principaux films de Stroheim," in Ecran des Arts (Paris), 1947.

"Erich von Stroheim: His Work and Influence," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1947–48.

Schwerin, Jules, "The Resurgence of von Stroheim," in Films in Review (New York), April 1950.

Lambert, Gavin, "Stroheim Revisited," in Sight and Sound (London), April–June 1953.

Weinberg, Herman J., in Cinemages (New York), 1955.

Fulton, A. R., in Films in Review (New York), June–July 1955.

Eisner, Lotte, "Notes sur le style de Stroheim," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1957.

Everson, William K., "The Career of Erich von Stroheim," in Films in Review (New York), August–September 1957.

"Von Stroheim Issue" of Film Culture (New York), April 1958.

Greed

“Von Stroheim Issue” of Bianco e Nero (Rome), February–March 1959.

Premier Plan (Lyons), August 1963.

Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), no. 48–50, 1966.

Recassens, G., in Téléciné (Paris), January 1967.

Lee, R., “Count von Realism,” in Classic Film Collector (Indiana, Pennsylvania), Spring 1969.

Buñuel, Luis, in Positif (Paris), Summer 1970.

Schepelern, P., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), March 1973.

Weinberg, Herman G., “An Introduction to Greed,” in Focus on Films (London), Spring 1973.

Wolfe, C., “Resurrecting Greed,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1975.

Dahan, L., “Les Rapaces d’Erich von Stroheim,” in Cinématographe (Paris), April 1977.

Henley, John, in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 25 September 1978.

Koszarski, Richard, “A Legend in Its Own Time,” in American Film (Washington D.C.), May 1983.

Slater, Thomas, “June Mathis,” in American Screenwriters, 2nd Series, edited by Randall Clark, Detroit, 1986.

Grindon, L., “From Word to Image: Displacement and Meaning in Greed,” in Journal of Film and Video (Los Angeles), no. 4, 1989.

Dean, T. K., “The Flight of McTeague’s Soul-Bird: Thematic Differences Between Norris’s McTeague and von Stroheim’s Greed,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1990.

Cremonini, G., in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), April 1992.

“Gold Lust,” in New Yorker, vol. 69, 15 March 1993.

Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 177, March–April 1995.

Reisz, Karel, “Stroheim revu par Karel Reisz,” in Positif (Paris), no. 411, May 1995.

Turner, George, “Wrap Shot,” in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 78, no. 9, September 1997.

McCarthy, Todd, “Mutilated Masterpiece Gets the Loving Touch,” in Variety (New York), vol. 376, no. 4, 13, September 1999.

* * *

Frank Norris’ novel McTeague was the basis for Erich von Stroheim’s film Greed. Though he had purchased the rights to it, he never got the production off the ground until Irving Thalberg, disgusted with von Stroheim's method of extravagant production on Merry-Go-Round, quarrelled with him, and von Stroheim was dismissed as Universal's most prestigious director/producer. It did not take long for von Stroheim to sign with Goldwyn studios, where it was soon announced that his first production would be a film depiction of McTeague.

The Norris novel is a dramatic and sordid but realistic preachment of the evils of greed. Heretofore von Stroheim had epitomized the grand scene. At Universal he had directed three big features that showed life on an extravagant scale: his characters were all venal and recklessly amoral; they were decadent, and offered to the public under such lurid titles as Blind Husbands, The Devil's Passkey, and Foolish Wives. His characters were the rich in an Alpine background, on the boulevards and in the boudoirs of Paris, and in the gambling casino at Monte Carlo, which was reconstructed on the Universal lot. McTeague took place wholly in California, specifically in San Francisco, Oakland and the Bay area, and Death Valley, in a very lower middle class, even depressed, society. The title character was a dentist from the lower classes who practiced his dentistry illegally. Both he and the girl he marries, Trina, are crass, uneducated vulgarities possessed and destroyed by a love for gold. It seemed unlike anything von Stroheim had attempted in his previous films.

Early in pre-production, the project was referred to as Greed, and the name soon became the accepted title. Deliberately doing a turnabout, von Stroheim saw it as a venture completely shot in its natural setting, the Bay area, as far as he could get from the studios of Hollywood. The company would even go to Death Valley to film the bitterly ironic finale of the story. He saw the project as a faithful adaptation of the Norris novel, an almost page-by-page recreation of a well-known American novel of the naturalist type. The film grew to monstrous proportions, eventually reaching an estimated nine-and-a-half hours. The studio forced von Stroheim to severely edit it. Secretly, his good friend, Rex Ingram, saw the film and helped him cut one version, but June Mathis was later called in to edit it down to under three hours. It remained, however, a hopelessly gargantuan project. Characters had to be eliminated so that the main story of McTeague, Trina, and Schouler became entirely the story of Greed.

Ironically, it was Irving Thalberg who ordered the drastic cuts in Greed. Thalberg had moved from his berth with Carl Laemmle at Universal to join the new Metro-Goldwyn. He was soon to become head of production at the amalgamated Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, where after Louis B. Mayer officially became head of production, he had his own unit. His first concern was to shape Greed out of the mountainous reels of footage which von Stroheim had so recklessly shot. It was at his order that Greed was released in 1924, but only a quarter of it contained footage shot by von Stroheim. That salvaged edition is the only one unreel at von Stroheim retrospectives nowadays. The unused film was ordered melted down so that the silver in the negative could be salvaged. There would be no ultimate rediscovery of footage unused and fitted into subsequent re-issues of the picture. It would be another chapter in the obliteration of von Stroheim's name as a great director. Not one film he made exists as he originally envisioned it. All have been cut either maliciously or out of necessity. Only one may have escaped obliteration—Universal's The Devil's Passkey, but it is a lost picture. To date, no print whatsoever has survived.

The legend surrounding von Stroheim's name as a great creative director survives, however, nurtured by those who have read the original McTeague written by Frank Norris. There are moviegoers who can relate whole sequences of the film that are just not in the final print. Memorable, however, in the released film are such treasured moments as the wooing of Trina under sedation in a dental chair; the miserably unromantic, even comic, wedding of Trina and McTeague; the brutalization of Trina by McTeague, leading to her murder and his escape with the gold she had even slept with; McTeague's meeting with onetime friend, Marcus Schouler, and their journey across Death Valley. Schouler is slain by McTeague, but before Schouler dies, he handcuffs himself to McTeague, and the picture fades out on McTeague sitting in the murderous heat of Death Valley handcuffed to a corpse he slew.

Greed made no profit either domestic or foreign. Costing $585,000 to film (a fortune in the mid-1920s), Greed showed a gross of only $277,000 domestically, and the foreign receipts were even more disappointing. The world's moviegoing public simply resisted Greed. Von Stroheim and his few faithful cohorts could quite honestly say that the picture as he filmed it was never released. The studio also alibied that Greed never stood a chance of success as a product from a studio noted for creating stars. There were no box-office names in Greed. The cast was hand-chosen by von Stroheim himself—ZaSu Pitts, Gibson Gowland, and Jean Hersholt, who had never brought in a dime on their own. They were more often featured in comedies, as were fellow cast members Dale Fuller, Chester Conklin, and Hughie Mack, and Greed was certainly no comedy.

A few years later, when von Stroheim had chalked up a few more disasters, he abandoned his directorial career for a successful one as an actor. He had often played in some of his own pictures, but as an actor he is a recognizable star in Renoir's La grande illusion and in Hollywood's Sunset Boulevard.

—DeWitt Bodeen

GREGORY'S GIRL

UK, 1980

Director: Bill Forsyth

Production: Lake Film Productions, in association with the National Film Finance Corporation and Scottish Television; color; running time: 91 minutes; length: 8,182 feet. Released May 1981.

Producers: Davina Belling, Clive Parsons; screenplay: Bill Forsyth; assistant directors: Ian Madden, Terry Dalzell; photography: Michael Coulter; camera operator: Jan Pester; editor: John Gow; sound recordist: Louis Kramer; sound re-recordist: Tony Anscombe; art director: Adrienne Atkinson; music: Colin Tully.

Cast: John Gordon Sinclair (Gregory); Dee Hepburn (Dorothy); Jake D'Arcy (Phil Menzies); Clare Grogan (Susan); Robert Buchanan (Andy); William Greenlees (Steve); Alan Love (Eric); Caroline Guthrie (Carol); Douglas Sannachan (Billy); Carol Macartney (Margo); Allison Foster (Madeleine); Chic Murray (Headmaster); Alex Norton (Alec); John Bett (Alistair); David Anderson (Gregory's Dad); Billy Feeley (Mr. Anderson); Maeve Watt (Miss Ford); Muriel Romanes (Miss Welch); Patrick Lewsley (Mr. Hall); Ronald Girvan (Alan); Pat Harkins (Kelvin); Tony Whitmore (Gordon); Denis Criman (Richard); Graham Thompson (Charlie); Natasha Gerson (Brenda); Christopher Higson (Penguin).

Gregory's Girl

Award: Winner of British Academy Award for Best Screenplay, 1981.

Publications

Script:

Forsyth, Bill, Gregory's Girl: The Filmscript, edited by Paul Kelley, Cambridge, England, 1991.

Books:

Park, James, Learning to Dream: The New British Cinema, London, 1985.

Roddick, Nick, and Martin Auty, British Cinema Now, London, 1985.

Krautz, Alfred, Mille Krautz, and Joris Krautz, editors, Encyclopedia of Film Directors in the United States & Europe: Comedy Films to 1991, Munich, 1993.

Articles:

Continental Film Review, March 1981.

Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1981.

Millar, Gavin, in Listener (London), 18 June 1981.

Adair, Gilbert, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1981.

Interview with Bill Forsyth, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1981.

Hibbin, N., in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 24, no. 2, 1982.

Variety (New York), 26 May 1982.

Martineau, R., in Séquences (Montreal), July 1983.

Garel, A., in Revue du Cinéma/Image et Son (Paris), July-August 1984.

Lajeunesse, J., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), Hors serie, vol. 24, 1984.

Nave, B., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), October 1984.

Ardai, Z., "Gregory baratnoje," in Filmvilag (Budapest), vol. 28, no. 11, 1985.

* * *

Forsyth was a key figure in the revival of British film production in the 1980s, and Gregory's Girl was both a popular and critical success. Forsyth's British work has been compared to the Ealing comedies of the late 1940s and early 1950s, with his typically light comic touch, his sense of character and detail, his quirky protagonists, and his ability to find the surreal in the most everyday people and situations.

His work—and Gregory's Girl is no exception—can also be seen as typical of a particular approach to the construction of a national cinema in a Britain overwhelmed by the popularity of Hollywood films: the production of low-budget films with correspondingly modest production values and low-key drama, aimed at the domestic market and the international art market rather than going for broke on the major American circuits; the casting of good character actors rather than big-name stars; the making of tasteful romances for all the family, which carefully resist indulging in the excesses of Hollywood melodrama; and the emphasis on a decidedly ordinary and specifically local or regional setting and milieu, rather than on the internationally recognizable metropolitan centre.

The film thus works within strongly enunciated British cinematic traditions, with something more than a nod to television drama in terms of the carefully limited scope of the action and the clean-cut, uncomplicated mise-en-scène, and a narrative structure (several simple stories, cleverly interwoven) reminiscent of soap opera. The film also owes something to television advertising, with its focus on suburban consumer-land, inhabited by “ideal families” living in modern gadget-laden houses.

The main narrative situates the film as a melodrama: gawky adolescent Gregory attempts to win the favours of the far more sophisticated Dorothy, while a conspiracy of girls effortlessly organises for him to become hitched to a far more suitable partner in Susan. But a quick look at the final four images of the film reveals a much broader filmic system, which also enables the film to articulate a network of interlocking social worlds. First there is a shot of Gregory and Susan kissing, the conventional happy ending of melodrama. In the second shot, we see Gregory and his sister, in a final incantation of the perfection and permanence of the family, in its nice, ordinary, suburban security. Thirdly, there is a reprise of the delightful running gag of Gregory's friend Andy, and his pal, this time seen hitching to Caracas in search of “girls.” Forsyth, like Tati, is a master of the running gag, which produces its comedy through narrative redundancy and eccentric characterisation, as with Andy's search for girls, or the lost penguins, or the burly headteacher secretly playing whimsical tunes on the piano.

The final shot of the film repeats another recurrent image: Dorothy, running alone in the dark, a fleeting image of the impossible object of desire, accompanied by the now familiar, dream-like music. Dorothy's character is highly ambiguous, since she is both a sweet, innocent, asexual girl, and a version of the femme fatale (the most dangerous figure in the film's conspiracy of women), wherein female sexuality becomes a threateningly seductive but unattainable enigma, a mystery, both for Gregory and for the implied spectator who is equally kept apart from understanding the ways and means of the female sex. The film, in this sense, reproduces the point of view of the adolescent male.

The film thus has all the ingredients of the adult melodrama, with Gregory lured by the image of the femme fatale, but finally making it with the right partner. But the film is carefully tailored for the family market, offering us a sweet, innocent, adolescent romance-without-sex (or violence or horror) that has been a feature of several recent British films. This address to the family market is further secured by the very ordinariness of the people and their milieu, and by the sweet loveliness of the youthful actors, aping adult behaviour but with all the innocence and uncomplicatedness of youth. This paradox of maturity and innocence is of course a key source of the film's humour, particularly when stretched to the point of absurd incongruity (as in Gregory's kid sister's relationship with her boyfriend). But despite this veneer of innocence, the film is able to tackle profound social and psychic anxieties concerning heterosexuality and the family.

It seems significant also that a film addressed to the family should locate its drama in the perfect communities of soap powder/breakfast cereal/kitchen technology advertisements, a world that is equally uncomplicated and superficially innocent, and which is itself one of the key sites for the construction and reconstruction of the family.

And while the final shot of the film of the still unattainable Dorothy is a potentially disturbing image for patriarchy, her own apparent innocence and the innocence of the world which surrounds her diminish any such threat and restore faith in the family.

—Andrew Higson

GULING JIE SHAONIAN SHA REN SHIJIAN

(A Brighter Summer Day)

Taiwan, 1991

Director: Edward Yang

Production: Yang and His Gang Filmmakers; colour; running time: 237 minutes.

Producer: Yu Weiyan; screenplay: Edward Yang, Yan Hongya, Yang Shunqing, Lai Mingtang; photography: Zhang Huigong, Li Longyu; editor: Chen Bowen; assistant directors: Cai Guohui, Yang Shunqing; production design: Yu Weiyan; sound: Du Duzhi.

Cast: Zhang Zhen (Xiao Si'er); Lisa Yang (Ming); Zhang Guozhu (Father); Elaine Jin (Mother); Wang Juan (Juan); Zhang Han (Lao Er); Jiang Xiuqiong (Qiong); Lai Fanyun (Yun).

Publications

Articles:

City Limits (New York), 23 February 1989.

Rayns, Tony, “Taipei Story” in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1989.

Variety (New York), 2 September 1991.

Jousse, T., and Y. Umemoto, “Plus de lumière” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1992.

Bassan, R., “Tragique jeux d'adolescents” in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), May 1992.

Ciment, M., and others, “Edward Yang” in Positif (Paris), May 1992.

Guling jie shaonian sha ren shijian

Rayns, Tony, "Lonesome Tonight" in Sight and Sound (London), March 1993.

Charity, T., Sight and Sound (London), April 1993.

* * *

Edward Yang's A Brighter Summer Day comes out of a unique set of circumstances. In the late 1980s the Taiwan film industry almost ceased to exist after its most powerful producer, distributor, and exhibitor—the Nationalist Government-owned Central Motion Picture Corporation—drastically scaled down its activities. Consequently, technicians and actors sought their livelihoods elsewhere in the boom economy. Thus the New Cinema movement, in which Yang had been a leading figure with his three feature films, That Day, On the Beach (Guangyin de Gushi, 1982), Taipei Story (Qingmei Zhuma, 1985) and The Terroriser (Kongbufenzi, 1986), was left in disarray.

In these 80s films, Yang developed a multi-character narrative style of interchanging story lines that was logistically demanding. In the new circumstances, an epic on the scale of A Brighter Summer Day, involving more than 80 speaking parts, ought to have been unimaginable. But Yang used his position as a teacher in the drama department of the National Institute for the Arts to train most of the cast and crew himself. It is one of the immediately impressive aspects of the film that the craft skills on display are superb at every level.

Furthermore, the youth and freshness of the cast proved highly appropriate for a film set in 1960, when the director himself was 13, and built around a tentative love affair between two adolescents: Xiao Si'r, the 14-year-old son of a civil servant, and Ming, the girlfriend of a charismatic gang leader. Their tryst's tragic outcome is hinted at by the Chinese title which translates literally as "The Boy in the Murder Incident on Guling Street." The story was derived from a real incident remembered from Yang's school days. In the three-hour version of the film, which won the Special Jury Prize at the 1992 Tokyo Film Festival, this relationship, with its echoes of West Side Story and Rebel Without a Cause, predominates over the carefully wrought social observation of subplot and mise-en-scène. In the released 127-minute integral version, however, the desire to explain a moment of historical crisis through the minutiae of ordinary lives is paramount.

Families who fled to Taiwan from mainland China with Chiang Kai-Shek found that much of the strict tradition of family life was also uprooted. While parents were absorbed into the militarised island's ruling elite, their children grew up under the double sway of a martial atmosphere and a promise of greater freedom inscribed in the products of the Chinese Nationalist's American backers. Many of these children became involved in gang warfare against the indigenous island youth. Yang describes this bitter period of highly conflicting values and tensions in terms of coolly-distanced melodrama, distanced not so much by a refusal to depict the expression of emotion, as in Fassbinder, but more by a determinedly stand-back camera style of deep-focus, wide-angle group shots that gives each character equal weight.

Thus Yang has Xiao Si'r drawn into the conflict between Honey's Little Park Gang and the indigenous 217 gang not only through his fascination with Ming, but also because of the pressure of academic failure which has condemned him to a less prestigious night school and to the disdain of his ultra-correct, fatally passive father Zhang Ju. Xiao Si'r himself remains a passive observer, but not as a conduit of the audience's point of view. His story provides the turning action of a kaleidoscope of quiet desperation until his inevitable emotional breakdown leads him to finally act violently against the person he idealises most.

In Nicholas Ray's Rebel Without a Cause, James Dean's rage and anguish is similarly set against a passive paternal figure who won't intervene in the mechanical processes of institutional authority. But Ray's film plays complicit games with the narcissism of its lead character, making it primarily about a crisis of individual conscience. Instead Yang offers a position of involved critique, forcing the viewer into an analysis of Xiao Si'r's motives even before he acts.

While the macrocosmic dilemma of an entire generation of Taiwan inhabitants unfolds, the film remains mostly within Xiao Si'r's home turf. Its nocturnal, pressure-cooker mood is circumscribed by the night school, the club house run by the Little Park gang, the bookstores of Guling Street, the pool room and garage used by the 217 gang and the homes of Xiao and his friends. We see Ming's boyfriend Honey, the charismatic leader of the Little Park Gang, return from exile only to be betrayed and murdered. A revenge raid on the 217 gang's headquarters is chaotic and indiscriminately bloody. Zhang Ju's loyalty to the state is rewarded by his arrest and interrogation on suspicion of having communist connections. Xiao Si'r discovers that Ming has been the lover of several of his acquaintances. Every move on the claustrophobic island seems to produce a self-inflicted wound.

Contrasting these apparently fatalistic results of political inevitability is the ethereal balm of Elvis Presley's "Are You Lonesome Tonight?" as mistranslated by Xiao Si'r's sister (the film's English title comes from Presley's delivery of the line "does your memory stray, to a bright uh-summer day) and performed by the Little Park Gang's rock 'n' roll band. However, the semblance of transcendent hope that America represents for the protagonists is itself a chimera, presented with considerable irony by Yang.

A Brighter Summer Day shares the breadth of ambition and distanced, objective point of view of Hou Xiaoxian's 1989 allusive social panorama A City of Sadness (Beiqing Chengshi), which attempted to capture the earlier moment of historical crisis of the 1949 influx. In all other respects, however, it is an utterly unique achievement, one that realises hidden resources of scale and complexity that have been untapped by filmmakers for some years.

—Nick James

GUN CRAZY

(Deadly is the Female)

USA, 1950

Director: Joseph H. Lewis

Production: King Brothers/Universal-International/Pioneer Pictures Corporation; black and white, 35mm; running time: 87 minutes. Released as Deadly is the Female, 26 January 1950; re-released as Gun Crazy, 24 August 1950.

Producers: Frank King and Maurice King; screenplay: MacKinlay Kantor and Dalton Trumbo (fronted by Millard Kaufman), from a Saturday Evening Post story by MacKinlay Kantor; photography: Russell Harlan; editor: Harry W. Gerstad; original music: Victor Young; sound: Tom Lambert.

Cast: Peggy Cummins (Annie Laurie Starr); John Dall (Bart Tare); Berry Kroeger (Packett); Morris Carnovsky (Judge Willoughby); Annabel Shaw (Ruby Tare); Harry Lewis (Clyde Boston); Nedrick Young (Dave Allister); Trevor Bardette (Sheriff Boston); Mickey Little (Bart Tare, age 7); Russ Tamblyn (credited as Rusty Tamblyn) (Bart Tare, age 14); Paul Frison (Clyde Boston, age 14); Dave Bair (Dave Allister, age 14).

Publications

Books:

- Shadoian, Jack, Dreams and Deadends: The American Gangster/ Crime Film, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1977.
 Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Ward, Film Noir, New York, 1979.
 Tuska, John, Dark Cinema: American Film Noir in Perspective, Westport, Connecticut, 1984.
 Kitses, Jim, Gun Crazy, London, 1996.

Articles:

- Anderson, Lindsay, "Gun Crazy," in Sequence (London), Autumn 1950.
 Mysel, Myron, "Joseph H. Lewis: Tourist in the Asylum," in Todd McCarthy and Charles Flynn, editors, Kings of the B's: Working Within the Hollywood System, New York, 1975.
 Borde, Raymond, and Etienne Chaumeton, "A Propos du Film Noir Americain," in Positif (Paris), 1976.
 Ruhmann, Lony, Steven Schwartz, and Rob Conway, "Gun Crazy, 'The accomplishment of many, many minds': An Interview with Joseph H. Lewis," in The Velvet Light Trap, (Austin, Texas), Summer 1983.
 Sattin, R. "Joseph H. Lewis: Assessing an (Occasionally) Brilliant Career," in American Classic Screen, November/December 1983.

* * *

One of the highlights in the career of director Joseph H. Lewis, Gun Crazy is a minor classic, widely regarded as one of the best of the “B” movies. Shot on a low budget as an independent film, it benefits from stylish photography by former stuntman Russell Harlan, who is probably best known as Howard Hawks’s cinematographer on Red River. Lewis is known for his distinctive style as a director, and Gun Crazy is a showcase for his repertoire of odd camera angles, elaborate scene compositions, and the variation of long and short takes for dramatic effect. In one famous scene, a bank robbery is filmed in one take from the rear seat of the getaway car, a technique that seems to involve the viewer in the heist as it takes place.

As with many gangster and crime films, Gun Crazy is an adaptation of a short story, in this case written by novelist MacKinlay Kantor for the Saturday Evening Post. Based on the myths surrounding Bonnie and Clyde, it tells the tale of a doomed love affair between Bart and Laurie, two carnival sharpshooters who embark on a crime spree that ends in murder. Yet the ambition of the film reaches beyond its banal storyline. Bart and Laurie each have their own complex psychological reasons for acting as they do. Bart is a petty criminal lured into violence through his obsessive love for Laurie, while Laurie is a manipulative femme fatale of the most dangerous kind. Yet they seem to carry within themselves and their relationship a desire for self-destruction. In this respect, Gun Crazy is a fine example of how film noirs differ from the crime and gangster movies that preceded them. As John Tuska explains, “[t]he difference between Gun Crazy and the gangster film cycle in the early ‘Thirties is that the protagonists, instead of behaving in a fashion which proves self-destructive, behave according to self-destructive impulses.”

While the film itself portrays Bart and Laurie’s secret life on the run, there is also an element of subterfuge in its making. Millard Kaufman, who was credited as co-writer of the film with MacKinlay Kantor, was actually “fronting” for a blacklisted writer, Dalton Trumbo. Trumbo, one of the “Hollywood Ten” filmmakers who went to prison for refusing to testify at the McCarthy hearings, wrote under various different names and was “fronted” by at least one other writer besides Kaufman. He was unable to collect an Academy Award for his work on Irving Rapper’s The Brave One in 1956 because the screenplay had been penned by someone called “Robert Rich”. He did not receive official credit for his contribution to Gun Crazy from the Writer’s Guild until 1992.

The influence of Gun Crazy has spread much further than its B-movie origins might have suggested. Arthur Penn’s celebrated Bonnie and Clyde (1967) has obvious similarities in plot, though a somewhat lighter tone, while Oliver Stone’s Natural Born Killers (1994) repeats the story of a young couple obsessed with violence and killing and on the run from the law. Gun Crazy is sometimes named as one of the films that began Hollywood’s postwar obsession with the connection between sex and violence, an obsession Stone’s film attempts to satirize.

Joseph H. Lewis went on to make films such as The Big Combo (1955) and 7th Cavalry (1956), but never again achieved the psychological insight or the overall quality of Gun Crazy. The film was remade unsuccessfully as Guncrazy in 1992 with Drew Barrymore and James LeGros in the lead roles.

—Chris Routledge

THE GUNS

See OS FUZIS

GYCKLARNAS AFTON

(The Naked Night; Sawdust and Tinsel)

Sweden, 1953

Director: Ingmar Bergman

Production: Sandrews for Svensk Filmindustri; black and white, 35mm; running time: 92 minutes; length: 2520 meters. Released 14 September 1953, Sweden. Filmed early summer 1953 in Sandrews studios in Stockholm; and exteriors shot in Arild, Sweden.

Producer: Rune Waldekrantz; screenplay: Ingmar Bergman; photography: Hilding Bladh, Göran Strindberg, and Sven Nykvist; editor: Carl-Olav Skeppstedt; art director: Bibi Lindström; music: Karl-Birger Blomdahl; costume designer: Mago.

Cast: Harriet Andersson (Anne); Ake Grönberg (Albert Johansson); Hasse Ekman (Frans); Anders Ek (Frost); Gudrun Brost (Alma); Annika Tretow (Agda, Albert’s wife); Gunnar Björnstrand (Mr. Sjuberg); Erik Strandmark (Jens); Kiki (Dwarf); Ake Fridell (Officer); Majken Torkeli (Mrs. Ekberg); Vanjek Hedberg (Ekberg’s son); Curt Löwgren (Blom).

Publications

Books:

- Béranger, Jean, Ingmar Bergman et ses films, Paris, 1959.
 Billquist, Fritiof, Ingmar Bergman: Teatermannen och filmskaparen, Stockholm, 1960.
 Burvenich, Jos., Thèmes d’inspiration d’Ingmar Bergman, Brussels, 1960.
 Siclier, Jacques, Ingmar Bergman, Paris, 1960.
 Höök, Marianne, Ingmar Bergman, Stockholm, 1962.
 Béranger, Jean, and François Guyon, Ingmar Bergman, Lyons, 1964.
 Donner, Jörn, The Personal Vision of Ingmar Bergman, Bloomington, Indiana, 1964.
 Nelson, David, Ingmar Bergman: The Search for God, Boston, 1964.
 Oldrini, Guido, La solitudine di Ingmar Bergman, Parma, 1965.
 Steene, Birgitta, Ingmar Bergman, New York, 1968.
 Gibson, Arthur, The Silence of God: Creative Response to the Films of Ingmar Bergman, New York, 1969.
 Wood, Robin, Ingmar Bergman, New York, 1969.
 Sjögren, Henrik, Regi: Ingmar Bergman, Stockholm, 1970.
 Young, Vernon, Cinema Borealis: Ingmar Bergman and the Swedish Ethos, New York, 1972.
 Donner, Jörn, The Films of Ingmar Bergman, New York, 1972.
 Simon, John, Ingmar Bergman Directs, New York, 1972.
 Björkman, Stig, and others, editors, Bergman on Bergman, New York, 1973.
 Ranieri, Tino, Ingmar Bergman, Florence, 1974.
 Kaminsky, Stuart M., editor, Ingmar Bergman: Essays in Criticism, New York, 1975.

Gycklarnas afton

Marion, Denis, Ingmar Bergman, Paris, 1979.
 Manvell, Roger, Ingmar Bergman: An Appreciation, New York, 1980.
 Mosley, Philip, Ingmar Bergman: The Cinema as Mistress, Boston and London, 1981.
 Petric, Vlada, editor, Film and Dreams: An Approach to Bergman, New York, 1981.
 Cowie, Peter, Ingmar Bergman: A Critical Biography, New York and London, 1982.
 Livingston, Paisley, Ingmar Bergman and the Ritual of Art, Ithaca, New York, 1982.
 Jones, G. William, editor, Talking with Ingmar Bergman, Dallas, 1983.
 Lefèvre, Raymond, Ingmar Bergman, Paris, 1983.
 Dervin, Daniel, Through a Freudian Lens Deeply: A Psychoanalysis of Cinema, Hillsdale, New Jersey, 1985.
 Gado, Frank, The Passion of Ingmar Bergman, Durham, North Carolina, 1986.
 Bergman, Ingmar, Laterna Magica, Stockholm, 1987; as The Magic Lantern: An Autobiography, London, 1988.
 Steene, Birgitta, Ingmar Bergman: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1987.

Cohen, James, Through a Lens Darkly, New York, 1991.
 Bjorkman, Stig, and Torsten Maans, and Jonas Sima, Bergman on Bergman: Interviews with Ingmar Bergman, Cambridge, 1993.
 Cohen, Hubert I., Ingmar Bergman: The Art of Confession, New York, 1993.
 Long, Robert Emmet, Ingmar Bergman: Film and Stage, New York, 1994.
 Tornqvist, Egil, Between Stage and Screen: Ingmar Bergman Directs, Amsterdam, 1995.
 Blackwell, Marilyn J., Gender and Representation in the Films of Ingmar Bergman, Rochester, 1997.
 Lloyd, Michaels, editor, Ingmar Bergman's Persona, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Austin, Paul, "Ingmar Bergman, Magician of Swedish Cinema," in Anglo-Swedish Review (London), April 1959.
 Archer, Eugene, "The Rack of Life," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1959.
 Alpert, Hollis, "Style Is the Director," in Saturday Review (New York), 23 December 1961.

- Nykvist, Sven, "Photographing the Films of Ingmar Bergman," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), October 1962.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, "Ingmar Bergman," in Image et Son (Paris), March 1969.
- Film Comment* (New York), Summer 1970.
- Rado, P., in Cinema (Budapest), March 1975.
- Koustrup, A., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Spring 1978.
- Listener* (London), 5 March 1987.
- Dahlbeck, E., "En arbetskamrat på väg att kanoniseras," in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 30, no. 2/3, 1988.
- Simon, J., "Det manskliga ansiktet," in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 30, no. 2/3, 1988.
- Simon, John, "The Human Face," in Chaplin (Stockholm), Special Issue, 1988.
- Simon, John, "Det manskliga ansiktet," in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 30, no. 2–3, 1988.
- Trasatti, S., "Bergman, il paradosso di un Ateo cristiano," in Castoro Cinema (Milan), no. 156, November/December 1991.

* * *

The films of Ingmar Bergman have been considered by commercial distributors as "intellectual" films rather than simple entertainment. The themes Bergman has chosen to present in his work—death, fate, love, loneliness—are thought to have only intellectual appeal. The Naked Night exhibits many typical Bergman themes and has been selected by some critics as his best film. However, this favorable acceptance of the film does not reflect the initial popular reaction.

The Naked Night was the first of Bergman's films to be given a wide release in the United States (although it was his eighteenth film as a director). A few of his early films had a limited distribution here, but they were mainly exploited for their nudity as soft-core pornography. The Naked Night was also publicized in this manner, as evidenced by the American title. A more literal translation of Gycklarnas Afton is "twilight of the jugglers." France released the film as Night of the Clowns and England released the film as Sawdust and Tinsel. Only the American version was labeled with a suggestive title.

As in many of Bergman's films, the main theme of The Naked Night is the idea of fate. Fate dictates the kind of lives the characters must lead and they cannot escape their destinies. Their attempts to do so only make their lives more miserable. For example, Albert, the owner of a travelling circus, seeks a more secure life in the traditional family unit. When he tries to make amends with his estranged wife, she rejects him and even thanks him for having left her in the first place. Albert's visit to his wife prompts his mistress, Anne, to have an affair with a local actor. The actor later humiliates Albert in public by bragging about his new conquest. Albert's humiliation leads him to attempt suicide, but he cannot escape his fate and the attempt fails. This string of events eventually comes full circle, until Albert once again sets out on the road with Anne, following the only choice fate allows him.

The Naked Night, not surprisingly, considering the subject matter, does not have a happy ending. Obviously 1953 audiences were not ready for this kind of film as it was quite unsuccessful, not just financially but critically. The film was also unsuccessful in Sweden, as well as in most foreign markets. Critics termed the film too "complex" and "depressing." The failure of The Naked Night affected Bergman deeply. He knew he would have to make changes if he was going to continue to find financial backing for his films. As a result, Bergman's next three pictures were comedies (A Lesson in Love, Dreams, and Smiles of a Summer Night). These films continued to address the issues of his earlier work (fate, love, etc.), but in a lighter vein. This new approach made his films more popular and critically recognized. The change in the reaction to his films encouraged Bergman to turn toward "serious" films again, such as Persona and Cries and Whispers. In the mid-1960s critics rediscovered Gycklarnas Afton, regarding it in a new, more positive light as one of the most significant films of his career.

—Linda J. Obalil

H

HADAKA NO SHIMA

---

(The Island)

Japan, 1961

Director: Kaneto Shindo

Production: Kindai Eiga Kyokai (Japan); black and white, 35mm; running time: 92 minutes, English version is 96 minutes. Released 1961, Japan.

Producers: Kaneto Shindo and Eisaku Matsura; screenplay: Kaneto Shindo; photography: Kiyoshi Kuroda; editor: Toshio Enoki; sound: Kunie Maruyama; music: Hikaru Hayashi.

Cast: Nobuko Otowa (Toyo); Taiji Tonoyama (Senta); Shinji Tanaka (Taro); Masanori Horimoto (Jiro).

Publications

Book:

Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, Japanese Cinema: Art and Industry, New York, 1960; revised edition, Princeton, New Jersey, 1982.

Articles:

“About the Moviemaker,” in Newsweek (New York), 10 September 1962.

Kuhn, Helen, in Films in Review (New York), October 1962.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), December 1962.

Noxor, Gerald, in Cinema Journal (Iowa City, Iowa), no. 3, 1963.

Fradier, George, “Dialogue on the Film The Island,” in UNESCO Courier, April 1963.

“Note,” in International Film Guide (London), no. 2, 1965.

Potrel-Dorget, M. L., in Image et Son (Paris), July-August 1978.

Pasquini, C., “Venezia 79: Kosatsu,” in Filmcritica (Siena), vol. 30, no. 298, September 1979.

* * *

Hadaka no shima (The Island) is the thirteenth feature written and directed by Kaneto Shindo, best known for his depictions of women’s lives. The film stars Nobuko Otowa who has appeared in most of his films. Released in 1961, it is Shindo’s best known work outside Japan.

Constructed like a documentary drama, the film tells the story of a husband (Senta) and wife (Toyo), who live on a small island with their two sons. Their lives are consumed by the necessity of obtaining water from a nearby island twice a day. Like Robert Flaherty’s Nanook and Man of Aran, the film focuses on the family’s struggle against nature for survival. Hadaka no shima is innovative on two levels. First, the narrative is presented without dialogue. Like F. W. Murnau’s silent classic, Der letzte Mann, which is rendered without inter-titles (save one), Hadaka no shima is almost purely visual. Shindo utilizes action, gesture, camera movement, rhythmic editing, close-ups, music and sound effects to make his points.

Second, Shindo experiments with elliptical editing. One scene in particular is noteworthy. On the road Senta and Toyo move towards the audience, carrying their buckets. As soon as they come close to the camera, Shindo cuts and they are once again seen in the distance in the exact position of the opening shot. This device gives the impression of a film loop, serving to emphasize the Sisyphean effort of repeating arduous chores in a never-ending cycle.

The film contains only minimal action. The main events are the accidental spilling of water, which prompts Senta to knock Toyo to the ground; the death of the oldest son after a brief illness; Toyo’s reaction to this loss (she deliberately dumps water on the ground and tramples the plants); and, finally, the family’s visit to the mainland where they unsuccessfully attempt to sell a fish. The remainder of the film details the twice-daily trips to the main island, the slow climb up the hill, the watering of plants, and the family’s eating and bathing.

Shindo is fond of close-ups intercut between long sequence shots. He uses parallel editing, connecting the dining of the family with the eating of the animals, to provide a commentary on the simplicity and poverty of their lives. Shindo likewise includes “pillow shots” similar to the insertions found in Yasujiro Ozu films. Primarily these consist of the image of a small boat which the family uses to row to the main island. The shot functions as a meditative moment which possesses associational meaning like images in a haiku poem.

Shindo offers a portrayal of a primitive way of life, which is contrasted to the frantic mechanized life of the main island. Despite the hardships on the island, the family possesses dignity, perseverance and stamina. Their lives have purpose and meaning. There is joy at the day’s end when their labors cease and they can relax with a bath and the communal meal. The couple exhibits a stoicism bred of necessity and the knowledge that life must go on. After Toyo angrily spills the water, she picks herself up and resumes work. Throughout, the family personifies a Buddhist attitude toward life: a sense of harmony with nature, resignation to man’s insignificance in the universe, acceptance of the flux of life and death. Hadaka no shima is thus pervaded with a sense of mono no aware, a sad awareness of the transience of all things worldly. This attitude is expressed through the film’s dominant metaphor—the island, a small sanctuary surrounded by a vast body of water. Like the famous Zen sand gardens composed of rocks surrounded by raked sand, the island represents everything from the isolated family, to the Japanese people of the island nation, to mankind itself.

Hadaka no shima was critically acclaimed in the United States. Most of the popular critics were taken with its quiet power and simplicity. Only Pauline Kael questioned whether less was really more and wondered at the adulation of such a primitive way of life. Such sentiments were also shared by several Japanese commentators who wondered at the film's foreign popularity and worried about the effect of portraying Japan as an esoteric, primitive people rather than a modern industrial nation. After Hadaka no shima, Shindo turned to new subject matter.

—Patricia Erens

LA HAINE

(Hate)

France, 1995

Director: Mathieu Kassovitz

Production: Les Productions Lazennec, with Studio Canal+, La Sept Cinema, Kasso Inc. Productions, and Gramercy Pictures; black and white, 35 mm; running time: 95 minutes; length: 2,731 meters. Released 31 May 1995.

Producer: Christophe Rossignon; associate producers: Adeline Lecallier, Alain Rocca; screenplay: Mathieu Kassovitz; photography: Pierre Aim, Georges Diane; assistant directors: Eric Pujol; editors: Mathieu Kassovitz, Scott Stevenson; sound: Dominique Dalmasso; sound design: Vincent Tulli; production design: Giuseppe Ponturo; set decoration: Sophie Quideville; costume designer: Virginie Montel.

Cast: Vincent Cassel (Vinz); Hubert Kounde (Hubert); Said Taghmaoui (Sayid); Francois Levantal (Asterix); Edouard Montoute (Darty); Marc Duret (Inspector "Notre Dame"); Tadek Lokcinski (Monsieur Toillettes); Karin Viard (Gallery Girl); Julie Mauduech (Gallery Girl); Vincent Lindon ("Really" Drunk Man); Karim Belkhadra (Samir); Abdel Ahmed Ghili (Abdel); Solo Dicko (Santo); Joseph Momo (Ordinary Guy); Heloise Rauth (Sarah); Rywka Wajsbrodt (Vinz's Grandmother); Olga Abrego (Vinz's Aunt); Laurent Labasse (Cook); Choukri Gabteni (Said's Brother); Peter Kassovitz (Gallery Patron); Mathieu Kassovitz (Young Skinhead).

Awards: Best Director, Cannes Film Festival, 1995; Best Young Film, European Film Awards, 1995; Best French Film, Best Producer, and Best Editor, Cesar Awards, 1996.

Publications

Articles:

Alexander, K., and D. Styan, "La Haine," in Vertigo (Paris), no. 5, 1995.
Leahy, J., "The Children of Godard and 90s TV," in Vertigo (Paris), no. 5, 1995.

Lochen, K., "Verden tilhorer deg," in Film & Kino (Oslo), no. 7, 1995.
Trofimenkov, M., "O nenavisti- o nenavisti," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 10, 1995.
Trofimenkov, M., "Predchuvstvie prazhdanskoi voiny," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 10, 1995.
Morrison, S., "La haine, Fallen Angels, and Some Thoughts on Scorsese's Children," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 39, 1995.
Jousse, T., "Prose combat," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1995.
Lebouc, G., "La Haine," in Grand Angle (Mariembourg, Belgium), June 1995.
Vasse, C., "La Haine," in Positif (Paris), June 1995.
Sibony, D., "Exclusion intrinsèque," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1995.
Nazzaro, G.A., "L'odio," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), October 1995.
Reader, K., "After the Riot," in Sight and Sound (London), November 1995.
Kelly, B., "La Haine Hip-Hops," in Variety (New York), 22–28 January 1996.
Schubert, G., "Zuhanas kozben," in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 1, 1996.
Noh, D., "Kassovitz's Parisian Hate: Not La Vie en Rose," in Film Journal (New York), February 1996.
Swenson, K., "Hommeboys," in Premiere (New York), February 1996.
Hammerschmidt, T., "Filme des Monats," in Medien Praktisch (Frankfurt), February 1996.
Winters, L., "Boyz in the Banlieu," in Village Voice (New York), 6 February 1995.
Evans, G., "Gramercy Levels Hate at Young Americans," in Variety (New York), 12–18 February 1996.
Reynaud, B., "Le Hood," in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1996.
Hollstein, M., "Hass.," in Medien Praktisch (Frankfurt), May 1996.
Royer, G., "La Haine," in Sequences (Quebec), March-June 1997.

* * *

Hate may be a French-language film, set in a specific place and time, but its depiction of alienated, dead-end teens who clash with authority is universal. As such, the film is an explosive, cutting-edge portrait of twisted, wasted lives. Hate is an instant classic of its genre, ranking alongside adolescent angst dramas from Nicholas Ray's 1950s breakthrough, Rebel Without a Cause (whose characters are misunderstood upper-class Southern Californians), to John Singleton's Boyz n the Hood and the Hughes Brothers' Menace II Society. The latter are gutsy, non-romanticized portraits of urban African-America in the 1990s, where guns, drive-by shootings, and "gangsta" attitude are as much a part of everyday life as flipping on a television set. In their depictions of young lives wasting away in an environment of helplessness and hopelessness, Boyz n the Hood and Menace II Society directly parallel the sensibility that permeates Hate. Much of the scenario of Hate, written and directed by 29-year-old Mathieu Kassovitz, is set in a public housing project just outside Paris. As it begins, adolescents and police have just violently clashed, with the conflict sparked by the brutal beating by the cops of a young man named Abdel, who lies near death in a hospital. The main characters are Abdel's three friends: the Arab Sayid, the Jewish Vinz, and the black Hubert.

La Haine

Of the trio, Vinz is the most sociopathic. He idolizes one of the most celebrated of all celluloid psychos: Travis Bickle, the character played by Robert De Niro in Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver. As he glares into a mirror and imitates Travis, Vinz does not exude a "you-talkin'-to-me" cool. Rather, he contorts his face, becoming a hideous and horrifying symbol of contemporary alienated youth.

The genial Sayid is content to play tag-along, following in Vinz's shadow. Hubert, meanwhile, is the most self-aware. He is the only one who can articulate the fact that he will be unable to flourish if he cannot escape the projects. Yet Hubert, Sayid, and Vinz remain inexorably linked by their nonexistent futures. They have neither jobs nor job prospects. The concept of a "career" and economic independence is not in their realm. All they do is hang out and smoke marijuana, and they are constantly harassed by the police. These young men are not inherently violent or bad, yet their economic status, age, and demeanor allow the authorities to single them out as troublemakers.

Forebodingly, Vinz comes into possession of a Smith & Wesson .44. He promises that, if Abdel dies, he will get revenge by "whacking a pig." It seems inevitable that Abdel will die—so watching Hate is like watching a firecracker waiting to explode.

Hate is loaded with perverse irony. The teens are haunted by a phrase—"The World Is Yours"—from an advertisement that is ever-present on billboards. Yet clearly, the reality is that the world is not theirs. These young men have no choices. Their lives are predetermined and, if they protest, there are plenty of police around to keep them in their places.

Another key to the film is the all-encompassing impact of American culture and consumerism on Sayid, Hubert, and Vinz, who refer to themselves as "homeboys" and their neighborhood as "the hood." Their speech is laced with American pop cultural references, from the movies Lethal Weapon and Batman to the animated characters Sylvester and Tweetie and Mickey Mouse. A secondary character wears a Notre Dame jacket. Another dons a T-shirt which proclaims that "Elvis Shot JFK." One puts down another by exclaiming, "Your mother drinks Bud." Another, who is a fence, is nicknamed "Walmart."

Kassovitz also cannily demonstrates how poverty and hopelessness extend beyond racial barriers. Here, a Jew, an Arab, and a black are united by their common experience, and are equally alienated and anti-social. The Jew and Arab do not clash over, for example, the politics of the state of Israel, a conflict that is far removed from their daily lives. The characters are who they are as individuals, rather than being political or sociological, let alone stereotypical, mirrors of their ethnicity. They are not separated by race or religion, but rather are united by age and economic background, by drugs and wretched educations, and by the allure of the culture of violence. At one juncture, Vinz asks his younger sister why she is not in school. "It burned down,” is the blunt reply. All of this helps to make Hate seem ever more real.

Vinz, Hubert, and Sayid may live in the shadow of the Eiffel Tower and the Champs Élysées, yet the affluence and romance symbolized by these monuments to French civilization are unattainable. Because they live in a battle zone that is closer to the South Central Los Angeles depicted in Boyz n the Hood and Menace II Society, Hate has more in common with these films than with the French-language features that celebrate Paris and l’amour.

Kassovitz’ choice to shoot the film in black-and-white is appropriate, as the lack of an on-screen color palette helps to stress the bleakness and sterility of his characters’ surroundings. His use of a hand-held camera gives the film a gritty, cinema-verite feel, and mirrors their disorientation. Not for an instant are Vinz, Hubert, Sayid, and their cronies in any way romanticized. And that is how it should be.

—Rob Edelman

HAIZI WANG

(King of the Children)

China, 1987

Director: Chen Kaige

Production: Xi’an Film Studio; Eastmancolour, 35mm; running time: 106 minutes.

Producer: Wu Tianming; screenplay: Chen Kaige, Wan Zhi, based on the short story by Ah Cheng; photography: Gu Changwei; editor: Liu Miaomiao; lighting: Jia Tianxi; assistant director: Qiang Xiaolu; art director: Chen Shaohua; music: Qu Xiaosong; sound recording: Tao Jing, Gu Changning; sound editor: Liu Miaomiao.

Cast: Xie Juang (Lao Gan); Yang Xuwen (Wang Fu); Chen Shaohua (Headmaster Chen); Zhang Caimei (Laidi); Xu Guoqin (Lao Hei); Le Gang (Cowherd); Tan Tuo (Village Team Leader); Gu Changwei (Secretary Wu); Wu Xiao (Class Monitor); Liu Haichen (Father).

Publications

Books:

Chen Kaige and Rayns, Tony, King of the Children and the New Chinese Cinema, London, 1989.

Articles:

Aubert, J.P., “La cinquième génération” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1988.
Variety (New York), 18 May 1988.

Haizi Wang

- Cahiers du Cinéma* (Paris), June 1988.
 Stanbrook, A., Films and Filming (London), August 1988.
 Glaessner, V., and Rayns, Tony, “Tearing Down the Temple of Culture” in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1988.
 Tessier, M., Revue du Cinéma (Paris), April 1989.
 Baecque, A. de, “L’école en feu” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1989.
 Niel, P., “Traitement de texte” in Positif (Paris), July–August 1989.
Cinemaya (New Delhi), Winter 1989–90.
 Chen Kaige, “Breaking the Circle: The Cinema and Cultural Change in China” in Cineaste (New York), no.3, 1990.
 Chow, R., “Male Narcissism and National Culture: Subjectivity in Chen Kaige’s King of the Children,” in Camera Obscura, January–May 1991.
CinémAction (Courbevoie), March 1993.
 Brochu, D., “Marques d’un cinéma moderne: Le roi des enfants,” in Cinémas (Montreal), vol. 3, no. 2–3, Spring 1993.
 Rayns, Tony, “The Narrow Path: Chen Kaige” in Projections 3, edited by John Boorman and Walter Donoghue, London, 1994.
 Lu, A., “Chen Kaige,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 33, September/October 1997.

* * *

King of the Children is a deceptively simple film. It tells the story of a young man who becomes a teacher of junior high school students in the Yunnan countryside and realizes, in a heart-wrenching way, the extent of his task. He discovers that his students are not given any textbooks and that they are used to learning by rote. The time is the Cultural Revolution. Lan Gan, the young man, was part of a brigade made up of city youths sent to the remote countryside for re-education by working alongside illiterate peasants. He gains a transfer from his brigade to a softer job as a teacher even though he is not qualified, having hardly graduated from high school himself.

The young man's experiences mirror director Chen Kaige's own experiences during the Cultural Revolution as a zhishi qingnian, or "intellectual youth." Sent to Yunnan to work in a production brigade in the late 1960s, early 1970s, Chen was attracted to the story by novelist A. Cheng (a fellow production brigade member in Yunnan) because of its simplicity. But the director has invested his own aesthetic references in the adaptation. These references are entirely visual—their meanings and significance are implicit and open to interpretation. What cannot be denied is the film's emotive power conveyed entirely through its images and an interesting montage-mixture of sound effects which illustrate certain scenes (sounds of tree felling, a voice chanting folk melodies, and so on).

To begin with, Chen films his protagonist Lan Gan mostly in distant long shots, locating him in an environment of harsh, primitive beauty (by the way recalling the stunning compositions in Chen's first film, The Yellow Earth, where earth seems to engulf a man). As well as reinforcing the effect of rural stupor, lethargy and boredom felt by the lead character, these long shots reveal the immensity of space and the concrete, objective world in which the character finds himself. He can no more hope to transcend this space than the problems of humanity within that space. Similarly, we first see the central setting of the school in a very long shot (which in point of fact, opens the film), in a photographic time-lapse sequence from mist to clear sky to sunset. The school, where the central drama unfolds, is seen in open air, flanked by mountains—it appears as a minor, unchanging spot in a flurry of changing time.

The narrative is punctuated with elliptical cuts, deliberate omissions, and long-held shots which impart information on a subliminal level but which in fact hold the key to Chen's mode of visual storytelling. A direct, linear mode is avoided. Instead, we look to visual detail and the behaviour of the characters to draw narrative (and emotional) sustenance. Thus, the film's spare use of medium to close shots, as in the scenes of Lan Gan reacting to his students in class (particularly the sensitive Wang Fu with whom he strikes an uneasy rapport), gain even more impact. Time and space are wondrously controlled. A second viewing of the film shows how tightly edited and temporally well-sustained the narrative actually is (the film even feels shorter than its nearly two hours running time) and also reveals more clearly the rich metaphorical layers which Chen creates to underline the simple story.

The metaphor of objective space to illustrate man's smallness is obvious while it also points out the results of the more complex, and destructive urges, of man, small as he is. The protagonist is shown at crucial points in still shots standing in a wilderness of burned tree stumps. The final scenes of these tree stumps manifested as wooden statues of strawmen and other grotesque figures, the burning of the forest (for swidden agriculture), and the intriguing sub-plot of the young cowherd urinating on the ground to disconcert cows too stubborn to move along (which gives rise to Lao San's explanation of his use of a compound word made of the characters of "cow" and "water" in his valedictory lesson to his students) are all a manifestation of man making a mark on earth.

The last message of Lan Gan to Wang Fu as he leaves the school (having been dismissed for his unorthodox teaching methods) may be summed up in one word: creativity—he implores Wang Fu not to learn by rote and to start thinking for himself. However, man's creativity is compromised, Chen seems to say, by man's failure to understand and come to terms with his environment. On the other hand, even as Chen underscores the effects of human alienation, poverty and neglect, there is no simplistic explanation offered for the obviously disastrous effect that human foolishness has waged on human affairs (the devastation wrought by the Cultural Revolution on a generation of students, for example).

Chen has succeeded in bringing out the abstract core of his story without diminishing its effective simplicity. In fact, the film comes across as a moving indictment of China's education policy, its politics, and the country's backwardness and endemic poverty. King of the Children is also the first film in which Chen deals with the disaster of the Cultural Revolution in personal terms. It is a subject that Chen and other Fifth Generation directors have a great deal to say about having experienced it at first hand. It offers great human drama, ranging from the tragic to the absurd. In King of the Children, Chen depicts the Cultural Revolution as a national tragedy but he does not condemn it outright. In that sense, Chen is less interested in the political implications of the Cultural Revolution. A philosophical-minded director, Chen has shown that his real subject is man and the ambiguities and implications of his behaviour.

—Stephen Teo

HALLELUJAH

USA, 1929

Director: King Vidor

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm, sound and silent versions; running time: about 100 minutes, some sources list 107 minutes; length: 6579 feet (silent), 9711 feet (sound). Released 20 August 1929. Filmed 1929 in MGM Studios in Culver City, California and on location in and around Memphis, Tennessee.

Producer: King Vidor; scenario: Wanda Tuchock; treatment: Richard Schayer; dialogue: Ranson Rideout, from an original story by King Vidor; titles for silent version: Marian Ainslee; photography: Gordon Avil; editors: Anson Stephenson (silent), Hugh Wynn (sound); sound recordist: Douglas Shearer; art director: Cedric Gibbons; music: traditional with 2 songs by Irving Berlin; costume designer: Henrietta Frazer.

Cast: Daniel Haynes (Zeke); Nina Mae McKinney (Chick); William Fountaine (Hot Shot); Harry Gray (Parson); Fannie B. DeKnight (Mammy); Everett McGarrity (Spunk); Victoria Spivey (Missy Rose); Milton Dickerson (One of the Johnson kids); Robert Couch (One of the Johnson kids); Walter Tait (One of the Johnson kids); Dixie Jubilee Singers.

Hallelujah

Publications

Books:

- Noble, Peter, The Negro in Films, London, 1950.
 Vidor, King, A Tree Is a Tree, New York, 1953.
 Rotha, Paul, and Richard Griffith, The Film Till Now, New York, 1960.
 Jacobs, Lewis, The Rise of the American Film: A Critical History, New York, 1968.
 Bogle, Donald, Toms, Coons, Mulattoes, Mammies, and Bucks: An Interpretative History of Blacks in American Films, New York, 1973.
 Murray, James, To Find an Image, Indianapolis, 1973.
 Maynard, Richard A., The Black Man on Film: Racial Stereotyping, Rochelle Park, New Jersey, 1974.
 Leab, Daniel J., From Sambo to Superspade: The Black Experience in Motion Pictures, Boston, 1975.
 Patterson, Lindsay, Black Films and Film-Making: A Comprehensive Anthology from Stereotype to Superhero, New York, 1975.
 Pines, Jim, Blacks in Film: A Survey of Racial Themes and Images in the American Film, London, 1975.
 Baxter, John, King Vidor, New York, 1976.

Cripps, Thomas, Slow Fade to Black: The Negro in American Film 1900–1942, New York, 1977.

Sampson, Henry T., Blacks in Black and White: A Source Book on Black Films, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1977.

Comuzio, Ermanno, King Vidor, Florence, 1986.

Dowd, Nancy, and David Shepard, King Vidor, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1988.

Vidor, King, King Vidor, Lanham, 1988.

Durgnat, Raymond, and Scott Simmon, King Vidor—American, Berkeley, 1989.

Articles:

Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 21 August 1929.

Variety (New York), 28 August 1929.

Braver-Mann, B. G., “Vidor and Evasion,” in Experimental Cinema, vol. 1, no. 3, 1931.

Harrington, Curtis, “The Later Years: King Vidor’s Hollywood Progress,” in Sight and Sound (London), April-June 1953.

Vidor, King, “Hollywood Hallelujah,” in Films and Filming (London), May 1955.

- Higham, Charles, "King Vidor," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Summer 1966.
- "King Vidor at NYU: Discussion," in Cineaste (New York), Spring 1968.
- Luft, Herbert G., "A Career That Spans Half a Century," in Film Journal (New York), Summer 1971.
- Durgnat, Raymond, in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1973.
- "Vidor Issue" of Positif (Paris), September 1974.
- Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1974.
- Leiris, M., in Positif (Paris), November 1974.
- Baumgarten, Marjorie, in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 11 October 1977.
- Cocchi, John, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Brody, S., and P. Bates, "Film and Photo League," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), no. 33, February 1988.
- Ribemont-Dessaignes, G., in October, no. 60, Spring 1992.
- Hoberman, J., "Race to Race," in Village Voice (New York), vol. 39, 22 February 1994.
- Lindvall, T.R., and others, "Spectacular Transcendence: Abundant Means in the Cinematic Representation of African American Christianity," in The Howard Journal of Communications, vol. 7, no. 3, 1996.
- Vidor, K., "Transcript of Tape Recording Made by King Vidor," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 19, no. 2, 1997.

* * *

Hallelujah has fair claim to being the first masterpiece of the sound era. Certainly King Vidor could have realized his frequently-proposed all-black film only at a moment when the Broadway success of Rouben Mamoulian's Porgy, rumors of a similar project at Fox (Hearts of Dixie), and Vidor's own willingness to gamble his salary all combined with corporate confusion at MGM—the last major studio to equip for sound. Ultimately, however, Hallelujah's accompanying music couldn't quite make it a musical, nor defuse its savagery; and it had as much trouble with bookings in the North as in the South.

The film tends to be remembered now under a Birth of a Nation stigma common to "Southerners"—admired technically while damned for its racism. It is true that the contented matriarchal family of cotton-pickin' blacks, singing while they work their patch of land, can seem an image of slave-based Southern prosperity, and the violence of the melodramatic plot can seem straight out of Mrs. Stowe. But the characters are Uncle Tom-ish only outside the context of Vidor's other work: the same documentary of an agrarian lifestyle is at the root of his idealized white cooperative in Our Daily Bread; emotional intensity is everywhere a Vidorian trademark; and an identical ferocity characterizes Northwest Passage and Duel in the Sun. Ruby Gentry, with another murder-in-the-swampwater finale, comes closest to being his whitefolks version of Hallelujah. One needs to recall that Vidor was working at a time when respectable British critic James Agate could dismiss the film with: "Personally, I don't care if it took Mr. Vidor ten years to train these niggers; all I know is that ten minutes is all I can stand of nigger ecstasy." If the film is flawed from the standpoint of social morality, it's for the complete exclusion of whites, which renders imprecise the family's relationship to the land they apparently sharecrop. Additionally, the four brief shots which make an ellipsis of Zeke's prison term for murdering his rival "Hot Shot" deny the experience of punishment—he's soon strummin' on the ol' banjo riding home to Mammy.

Whatever Vidor may have said in interviews about the film's "good vs. evil" structure, its tension comes from pitting against each other two mutually exclusive "goods": family-as-religion vs. passionate sexuality. And the temptress Chick, whose dance-hall sensuality elevates easily into religious fervor, isn't inauthentic in either incarnation. She tempts Zeke from his revivalist preaching, but considering Vidor's very consistent repudiation of narrow religion, from The Sky Pilot (1921) right through Solomon and Sheba (1959), that too might be for the best. The surrealist Ado Kyrou is close to the mark in reading Hallelujah as a celebration of desire.

Early sound equipment limits the musical numbers to relatively static takes, but by any criterion Hallelujah is technically remarkable—the ironic result of Vidor's having had to shoot location sequences silent and post-synch the often expressionistic sound effects of ecstatic wails or physical violence (a procedure which, so Vidor claims, drove his sound editor to a nervous breakdown). The aural expressionism might be written off as circumstantially unavoidable if it hadn't its visual equivalent in such shots as the featureless black half-screen into which Zeke futilely shouts for aid for his dying brother. But to stress expressionism is to ignore the ways Hallelujah anticipates the early-Visconti variety of neorealism, with its authentic dialects, its quirky, slack dialogue, its inexperienced actors, its documentary tracing of rural life, and its relentless analysis of the crime passionnel.

—Scott Simmon

HANA-BI

(Fireworks)

Japan, 1997

Director: Takeshi Kitano

Production: Television Tokyo Channel, Tokyo FM Broadcasting Company, Office Kitano, Bandai Visual; color, 35mm; running time: 101 minutes. Released 3 September 1997 (Venice Film Festival), 11 November 1997 in Germany (theatrical premiere), 24 January 1998 in Japan, and 20 March 1998 in the United States.

Producers: Masayuki Mori, Yasushi Tsuge, Takio Yoshida; screenplay: Takeshi Kitano; photography: Hideo Yamamoto; editors: Takeshi Kitano, Yoshinori Oota; art director: Norishiro Isoda; set decorator: Tatsuo Ozeki; original music: Jo Hisaishi; costume designer: Masami Saito; sound: Senji Horiuchi.

Cast: Takeshi Kitano (billed as "Beat" Takeshi) (Yoshitaka Nishi); Kayoko Kishimoto (Miyuki, Nishi's wife); Ren Osugi (Horibe); Susumu Terajima (Nakamura); Tetsu Watanabe (Tesuka); Hakuryu

Hana-Bi

(Yakuza Hitman); Yasuei Yakushiji (Criminal); Taro Istumi (Kudo); Kenichi Yajima (Doctor); Makoto Ashikawa (Tanaka); Yuko Daike (Tanaka's Widow).

Awards: European Film Awards Five Continents Award, Venice Film Festival Golden Lion, Sao Paulo International Film Festival Critics Award, Camerimage Golden Frog (Hideo Yamamoto), 1997.

Publications

Articles:

- Rooney, D., in Variety (New York), 8–14 September 1997.
 Burdeau, E. and others, interview in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1997.
 Saada, N., “Mirage de la vie,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1997.
 Ciment, Michel, interview in Positif (Paris), November 1997.
 Goudet, S., in Positif (Paris), November 1997.
 Vasse, C., in Positif (Paris), November 1997.

Buccheri, V., in Segnocinema (Vicenza, Italy), November/December 1997.

Rayns, Tony, “Silent Running,” interview in Sight & Sound (London), December 1997.

Rayns, Tony, “Flower and Fire,” in Sight & Sound (London), December 1997.

Kehr, Dave, in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1998.

* * *

Superficially, the main character in Takeshi Kitano's Hana-Bi might be the hero of a generic Hollywood cops-and-robbers thriller. He is Yoshitaka Nishi, a tough veteran police detective who is the picture of cookie-cutter cool. Nishi rarely is without his trademark sunglasses, and he hardly ever displays emotion while going about his professional duties. In this regard, he parallels Clint Eastwood's Dirty Harry and Charles Bronson's character in Death Wish. Yet effortlessly, if not breathlessly, the character and the film transcend these cosmetic trappings, with Nishi becoming a tragic hero of Shakespearean proportion. There are dents in his armor and, as his world crashes in around him, this cop is no indestructible Superman. Nishi (who is played by the filmmaker, billed as “Beat” Takeshi) starts out with a couple of strikes against him, as his young daughter has recently died and his wife is fatally ill. A third strike directly relates to the hazards of his business; over the image of two men tossing a baseball, it is noted that Nishi’s “daughter dies, [his] wife gets sick, and he’s a damn cop.” The reality of police work is that it is a brutal, high-pressure profession. A cop may die in the line of duty, or he may be crippled, or a blunder may result in incalculable tragedy. All of these catastrophes befall Nishi. Once upon a time, he and his longtime partner and friend, Detective Horibe, were “a great team.” Yet at the outset, Horibe is shot and crippled. Additionally, Nishi is involved in a bloody confrontation with a criminal, resulting in the death of one colleague and the maiming of another. Nishi’s sense of responsibility towards his wife and the deceased cop’s widow leads him to borrow money from the yakuza, whose emissaries now are calling for a payback.

In Hana-Bi, the characters of Nishi and Horibe are laden with obstacles. But are there solutions? In a standard Hollywood entertainment, a happy ending would be de rigueur; it would transcend whatever anguish is experienced by the hero during the course of the scenario. Suffice to say, Hana-Bi is no Hollywood escapist product, no cotton-candy amusement. The wheelchair-bound Horibe, who has been abandoned by his family, commences contemplating nature and painting what he observes. Whatever pleasure he derives from this pastime is transitory and meaningless. “I paint pictures to kill time,” he says, matter-of-factly. Meanwhile, Nishi responds to his stresses by becoming prone to increasing outbursts of violence. Not all of his victims are the thugs who harass him for money; Nishi will arbitrarily smack an unsuspecting stranger who has the temerity to mix with him. For instance, he beats up a man who innocently chides Nishi’s wife for watering dead flowers on a beach.

Conversely, when in the company of his wife, Nishi is gentle and loving: a model of compassion in a cruel contemporary world. In this regard, Hana-Bi offers a stinging portrait of an icy-cold society in which cityscapes and bright lights and all the modern conveniences are poor substitutes for warmth, caring, and basic humanity. Society, as depicted by Kitano, is defined by violence and gangsterism—and Nishi, the officer of the law, is reduced to the level of the street thug as he is impacted by his work, his surroundings, and his personal hell. Throughout the film, characters suffer ill luck. When they or their loved ones are afflicted with disease or paralysis, they are left to their own inner resources, their own inner demons, their own solitude.

Hana-Bi is a soulful film, with Kitano often employing the soft sounds of pianos or violins to create moods of melancholy. Most impressive of all, the film is loaded with visual and aural juxtapositions that infuse it with a profound sense of irony. Sometimes, the opposites are strictly in the imagery; on other occasions, an image may be contrasted to a sound, or a penetrating silence. For example, a shot of Nishi quietly, somberly lighting a cigarette while visiting his wife in her hospital room is followed by one of a gun blasting into the gut of Horibe, who grimaces and falls to the pavement. The second shot begins just as Nishi lights the cigarette. Later on, Nishi peacefully sits in a bar. Violent images pass through his mind. Kitano visualizes these thoughts, which appear in slow motion and without sound. As a result, the serenity of the moment is contrasted to the violence replaying in Nishi’s head.

A shot of blood flowing out of the mouth of a thug Nishi has just smacked is followed by a long shot of waves crashing into a beach and two adults and a child walking in the sand. A medium shot of a man standing passively is accompanied by the groans and grunts of a violent confrontation. Nishi aims a gun at a man who is running from him; just as he pulls the trigger, Kitano cuts to Horibe splashing a glob of blood-red paint across his latest artistic creation.

Occasionally, Nishi’s wife utters a giggle in response to something he does or says. Otherwise, she is silent throughout the entire film—until its final moments. “Thank you. Thank you for everything,” she tells her husband, as she tenderly rests her head on his shoulder. Here, Kitano incorporates the film’s final juxtaposition. His camera lingers on a long shot of an idyllic sand-and-waves setting. Then, to emphasize the point that there will be no reprieve for Nishi and his wife, the lilting music on the soundtrack is interrupted by the sound of two gunshots.

The literal English translation of Hana-Bi is “fireworks.” Split in two, the title is made up of the words “flower” (“hana”) and “fire” (“bi”): a contrast that potently mirrors the two aspects of Nishi’s character. He is a cop who knows all too well that violence is an intrinsic part of contemporary society; when stretched to his limit, he is a willing purveyor of violence. Yet concurrently, in his dealings with his wife, he is capable of extreme tenderness. All of this is most poignantly played out in Kitano’s visual and aural juxtapositions, which ultimately mix devotion with outrage, beauty with anguish.

—Rob Edelman

HARAKIRI

See SEPPUKU

A HARD DAY'S NIGHT

UK, 1964

Director: Richard Lester

Production: Proscenium Films; black and white, 35mm; running time: 85 minutes. Released July 1964, London. Filmed 1964 in London.

Producers: Walter Shenson and Denis O’Dell; screenplay: Alun Owen; title design: Robert Freeman; photography: Gilbert Taylor; editors: John Jympson and Pamela Tomlin; sound recordists: H. L. Bird and Stephen Dalby; sound editor: Gordon Daniel; art director: Ray Simm; music director: George Martin; songs by: John Lennon, Paul McCartney and George Harrison; performed by: The Beatles; costume designer: Julie Harris.

Cast: John Lennon (John); Paul McCartney (Paul); George Harrison (George); Ringo Starr (Ringo); Wilfrid Brambell (Grandfather); Norman Rossington (Norm); Victor Spinetti (Television director);

A Hard Day's Night

John Junkin (Shake); Deryck Guyler (Police inspector); Anna Quayle (Millie); Kenneth Haigh (Simon); Richard Vernon (Man on train); Michael Trubshawe (Club manager); Eddie Malin (Hotel waiter); Robin Ray (Television floor manager); Lionel Blair (Television choreographer); Alison Seebohm (Secretary); David Jaxon (Young boy); Marianne Stone (Society reporter); David Langton (Actor); Clare Kelly (Barmaid).

Publications

Script:

Owen, Alun, The Beatles in Richard Lester's "A Hard Day's Night," edited by Philip DiFranco, New York, 1977.

Books:

Manvell, Roger, New Cinema in Britain, New York, 1969.
Kantor, Bernard, Directors at Work: Interviews with American Film-Makers, New York, 1970.

Betts, Ernest, The Film Business: A History of the British Cinema, New York, 1973.

Walker, Alexander, Hollywood U.K., New York, 1974.

Rosenfeldt, Diane, Richard Lester: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1978.

Sinyard, Neil, The Films of Richard Lester, London, 1985.

Yule, Andrew, The Man Who "Framed" the Beatles, New York, 1994.

Yule, Andrew, Richard Lester and the Beatles: A Complete Biography of the Man Who Directed a Hard Day's Night, and Help!, New York, 1995.

Articles:

Bean, Robin, "Keeping Up with the Beatles," in Films and Filming (London), February 1964.

Baker, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), August 1964.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 27 August 1964.

Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1964.

Seelye, John, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1964.

Hagen, Ray, in Films in Review (New York), October 1964.

- French, Philip, "Richard Lester," in Movie (London), Autumn 1965.
- Bluestone, George, "Lunch with Lester," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1966.
- Sugg, Alfred, "The Beatles and Film Art," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Summer 1966.
- Lester, Richard, "The Art of Comedy," in Film (London), Spring 1967.
- "Richard Lester," in New Yorker, 28 October 1967.
- Shivas, Mark, and Ian Cameron, "An Interview with Richard Lester," in Movie (London), Winter 1968–69.
- Corliss, Richard, "A Hard Day's Night: 10 Years After," in Film Comment (New York), May–June 1974.
- Johnson, Timothy, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, in Image et Son (Paris), November 1982.
- Bortolussi, S., in Cineforum (Bergamo), April 1983.
- Hanke, K., "The British Film Invasion of the 1960s," in Films in Review (New York), April 1989.
- Hanke, K., "The British Film Invasion of the 1960s, part II," in Films in Review (New York), May 1989.
- Savage, J., "Snapshots of the Sixties," in Sight and Sound (London), May 1993.
- Clements, M., "My Technology's in Turnaround," in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 8, November 1994.
- Boxoffice* (Chicago), October 1996.
- Hampton, Howard, "Scorpio Descending: In Search of Rock Cinema," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 33, no. 2, March–April 1997.

* * *

Following the runaway success of Rock Around the Clock in 1956, both British and North American filmmakers sought to capitalize on the box-office appeal of pop music. Although the resulting features were often commercial hits, they also rated low in critical prestige. The pop music film was characteristically a low-budget quickie, designed to cash in on a passing musical trend, and generally devoid of artistic ambitions other than to pack in as many musical numbers as possible or show off the film's stars to best advantage. The release of A Hard Day's Night, in this respect, represents something of a milestone in the history of the genre. Although a vehicle for the Beatles, aimed at exploiting the rising tide of "Beatlemania," the film successfully challenged many of the old conventions of the pop film by introducing a new approach to both plot and visual presentation.

The film, for example, discards the hitherto standard pop film plots—both the "let's put on a show" formula which director Richard Lester had already made affectionate fun of in his earlier It's Trad, Dad (1962) and the "rags to riches" structure used in, among others, the early Elvis Presley films (such as Loving You and Jailhouse Rock). Scripted by the Liverpool playwright, Alun Owen, A Hard Day's Night opts instead for a much looser "a day in the life of" format which, also unlike the Elvis movies, requires that the Beatles play, not fictional characters, but themselves. Indeed, no small part of the film's fascination is its playful confusion of the boundaries between fact and fiction whereby what we see is all staged for the camera (and contains no actuality footage) but nonetheless assumes the air of a documentary presentation (so that the concluding television performance is often taken to have been a real one).

The film, in this regard, is heavily indebted to the French new wave and shares its characteristic blend of ciné-vérité (hand-held camera, location shooting, improvised performances, and a generally casual approach towards filming) and modernism (a self-conscious use of film technique, anti-realist editing, and cinematic pastiche). This mix is well illustrated by the film's lengthy train sequence. This is filmed on a real train using a hand-held camera (with wide-angle lens). The "realism" which this generates, however, is dramatically ruptured when the four Beatles decide to torment the stuffy commuter who has prevented them from opening the compartment window or playing their transistor. In one shot, the four Beatles are standing in the train corridor, their faces glued to the compartment window; in the shot of them which follows, John, Paul, and George are suddenly seen outside, running (and, in George's case, cycling) alongside the train and still shouting at the increasingly harassed passenger inside.

This indifference to the norms of "realism" is extended to the film's treatment of the musical numbers, and represents one of its most important contributions to the genre. Lester had already demonstrated a remarkable visual inventiveness in his filming of the acts in It's Trad, Dad, but had confined himself to realistically motivated performances (in the recording studio, in concert, on TV). A Hard Day's Night is no less reliant on the TV concert but also attempts to integrate plot and music more securely and present its musical numbers in ways other than the simulated performance. Two of these attempts are particularly striking. In the first, the Beatles end their train journey in the guard's van where they embark upon a game of cards. "I Should Have Known Better" is heard on the soundtrack and, shortly after, John produces a harmonica and begins to sing. The camera then cuts to the group, sitting in the same position, but now playing their instruments. As the song finishes, the instruments simply "disappear" and the boys bring their game to a conclusion. The song, in one sense, is "performed" but in a manner which would be impossible other than on film. In the second case, the element of performance is dispensed with entirely. In the course of the concert rehearsals, the group escapes through a fire door to a deserted playing field outside. As "Can't Buy Me Love" begins on the soundtrack, their sense of release is cleverly communicated through a spectacular montage of movement involving aerial photography and accelerated motion. For possibly the first time, the pop film demonstrated it was possible to present a musical number without the illusion of an actual performance.

Ironically, it is often this very element of technical ostentation which is condemned in Lester's work as superficial gimmickry. In the case of A Hard Day's Night, however, it is the very humbleness of the pop film genre, and its lack of social and moral earnestness, which makes such a complaint inappropriate. For while the film may lack substance, it does not pretend otherwise. Moreover, it is precisely because of its rather eclectic modishness that it evokes so successfully both the spirit of the music and the era which spawned it (the "swinging sixties"). In this respect, the film wears rather better than most of the more ambitious and "serious minded" Lester films which were to follow.

—John Hill

HARP OF BURMA

See BIRUMA NO TAGEGOTO

HATE

See LA HAINE

HE LIU

---

(The River)

Taiwan, 1997

Director: Tsai Ming-liang

Production: Color; running time: 115 minutes. Released in France, 27 August 1997, and in England, 20 March 1998; filmed in Taipei, Taiwan.

Producer: Chiu Shun-Ching, Hsu Li-Kong, Chung Hu-pin (executive), Wang Shih-Fang (associate); screenplay: Tsai Ming-liang, Tsai Yi-chun, Yang Pi-ying; cinematographer: Liao Pen-jung; editor: Chen Sheng-Chang, Lei Chen-Ching; production designer: Tony Lan; art direction: Lee Pao-Lin; set decoration: Cheng Nien-Chiu, Kuo Mu-Shan; costume design: Yu Wang; makeup: Yen Pei-Wen.

Cast: Chen Chao-jung (Anonymous Man); Chen Shiang-chyi (Girl); Ann Hui (Director); Lee Kang-sheng (Kang-Sheng, Xiao-Kang); Lu Hsiao-Ling (Mother); Lu Shiao-Lin (Mother's lover); Miao Tien (Father); Yang Kuei-Mei (Girl in Hotel).

Publications

Articles:

- Interview with Tsai, in Sight & Sound (London), March 1997.
 Herpe, N., and M. Ciment, "Tsai Ming-liang," in Positif (Paris), no. 439, September 1997.
 Roy, André, "Les noyés de Taipei," in 24 Images (Montreal), no. 90, Winter 1998.
 Kemp, Peter, "Bodily Fluids," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 8, no. 4, April 1998.

* * *

Tsai Ming-Liang is one of the most distinctive and idiosyncratic of the younger generation of Taiwanese directors. So far, unlike his predecessors such as Hou Hsiao-Hsien and Edward Yang, he's shown no interest in dealing directly with Taiwan's history; instead, he focuses on the outcome of that history, the youth of present-day Taipei—the disaffected heirs of a society that once set greater store by tradition, that held the spirits of the past in higher awe, than any other. Isolated, obscurely dissatisfied, unable or unwilling to form emotional connections with friends, lovers, or family, his young protagonists wander through a city that's bulldozed its past and jerry-built its future.

The River, the third in Tsai's Taipei cycle, shares cast, characters and motifs with its two predecessors, Rebels of the Neon God (Qing Shaonian Nezha, 1992) and Vive l'Amour (Aiqing Wansui, 1994). The lead is again taken by the pensive, delicate-featured Li Kangsheng, as before playing a youth called Xiaokang. He shares an apartment with an older couple, but so rarely do any of the three communicate with each other that it's a while before we realize they're his mother and father. (They're played by Miao Tian and Lu Hsiao-ling, who took the same roles in Rebels.) At one point when Xiaokang is sitting in a hospital corridor his parents, one after the other, walk straight past him without recognizing him. Xiaokang's sole evident emotional attachment is to his scooter; astride it he roams the Taipei streets with an air of obscure discontent, plainly looking for something but unlikely to know it when he finds it.

What he does find, unlooked-for, is pain. The agony that afflicts him, contorting his neck and reducing him to near-suicidal despair, seems on the face of it to result from his immersion in the noxiously polluted waters of the Tanshui river. But after his ducking and before the affliction strikes, Xiaokang has sex with an ex-classmate, Xiangqi; she's affectionate and gentle, but he remains blankly uninvolved throughout. His pain can be seen, not simply as the result of a viral infection, but as an index of his emotional denial; Tsai leaves us to make up our own minds. Still, Xiaokang's suffering at least attracts the concern of his parents, making them talk to him if not to each other. In a recurrent image, comic but touching, we see the father riding pillion behind Xiaokang on the scooter, holding his son's head upright.

As ever in Tsai's films, water represents an insidious and disruptive force. In Rebels of the Neon God a high-rise apartment is constantly and inexplicably flooded to a depth of several inches, with loose rubber flip-flops floating forlornly about the kitchen; the same watery theme recurs in Tsai's most recent film The Hole (Dong, 1998). In The River not only is Xiaokang possibly poisoned by his swim, but the father finds water seeping, then trickling, and finally pouring through the ceiling of his room. Rather than trying to stop it, he rigs up an intricate system of pipes and plastic sheets to deflect the flow out of the window. Since he too is an emotional amputee, estranged from his wife and seeking loveless sex in gay saunas, it's tempting to see this downpour as a symbol of the elements in his own life that he deflects but refuses to confront.

But water can also be taken as the metaphor of a society in a state of uncontrollable flux, where all fixed points have been abandoned. In this high-obsolescence city, where it seems that virtually every building is, or overlooks, a construction site, tradition can be of little help. Besides trying the regular hospital, Xiaokang's parents haul him round to a string of healers, but none of them does him the slightest good.

Tsai (who was born to Chinese expatriate parents in Sarawak) shows scant affection for his adopted city; his Taipei is a transient, comfortless place of drab apartments and hotel rooms, their walls painted in fecal browns and greens. His people occupy these spaces but scarcely seem to live in them, let alone personalize them with possessions or decor. Much of the film's action takes place in corridors—especially in the gay saunas frequented by the father, whose atmosphere offers rather less erotic excitement than the average supermarket. Even when a conjunction occurs, it's brief and joyless—no one speaks, let alone smiles, and only a muted shudder signals climax. Just once, after father and son have unwittingly coincided in an act of masturbatory incest, is there something more. When realization dawns, the father gives a groan of fury and slaps his son's face. Compared to the previous couplings (both gay and hetero), it seems almost like a caress.

All of which might sound terminally depressing. But there's a sly humor in Tsai's gaze, and a quiet, quizzical regard for his bemused wanderers, that rescues his films from misanthropy or facile pessimism. His aim in making The River, he says, was "to go as deeply as possible into the minds of the characters." Despite the laconic action and minimal dialogue, he succeeds in revealing them to us—and also, unexpectedly, in making them sympathetic.

—Philip Kemp

A HEART IN WINTER

See UN COEUR EN HIVER

HEAVENLY CREATURES

New Zealand, 1994

Director: Peter Jackson

Production: Wingnut Films with Fontana Film Corporation GmbH, in association with the New Zealand Film Commission; color, Super 35 (2:35:1); running time: 99 minutes; original running time in New Zealand and Australia, 108 minutes. Released by Miramax Films; filmed in Christchurch, Victoria Park, and other New Zealand locations. Cost: $10,000,000 (estimated).

Producer: Jim Booth; screenplay: Peter Jackson and Frances Walsh; photography: Alun Bollinger; editor: Jamie Selkirk; art director: Jill Cormack; production designer: Grant Major; music: score by Peter Dament, with additional music by Giacomo Puccini.

Cast: Melanie Lynskey (Pauline Parker); Kate Winslet (Juliet Hulme); Sara Peirse (Honora Parker); Diana Kent (Hilda Hulme); Clive Merrison (Henry Hulme); Simon O'Connor (Herbert Rieper); Jed Brophy (John/Nicholas); Peter Elliott (Bill Perry); Gilbert Goldie (Dr. Bennett); Geoffrey Heath (Reverend Norris); Kirsti Ferry (Wendy Rieper); Ben Skjellerup (Jonathan Hulme); Darien Takle (Miss Stewart); Elizabeth Waller (Miss Waller); Peter Jackson (bum outside theatre, uncredited).

Awards: Silver Lion Award for outstanding achievement, Venice Film festival, 1994; Critics' Prize for outstanding achievement, Toronto Film Festival, 1994; New Zealand Film Awards for Best Director, Best Actress (Melanie Lynskey), Best Supporting Actress (Sara Peirse), Best Screenplay, Best Cinematography, Best Foreign Performer (Kate Winslet), Best Film Score, Best Editing, and Best Design, 1995.

Publications

Articles:

- "Peter Makes His Bid: Dustin Makes a Call," in Onfilm (Auckland), vol. 9, no. 9, 1992.
- "Heavenly Creatures a 'Global' Creation," in Onfilm (Auckland), vol. 10, no. 1, 1993.
- Wakefield, P., "Heavenly Creatures to Debut at NZ Fests," in Onfilm (Auckland), vol. 11, no. 4, 1994.
- Murray, S., "Peter Jackson: Heavenly Creatures," in Cinema Papers (Fitzroy), no. 97–98, April 1994.
- Feinstein, H., "Death and the Maidens," in Village Voice (New York), vol. 39, 15 November 1994.
- Weinraub, Bernard, "Making a Film from the Horror of a Mother's Brutal Murder," in The New York Times, 24 November 1994.
- "'Divinely Wicked' Film Wins New Yorkers," in Onfilm (Auckland), vol. 11, no. 11, 1994/1995.
- Jones, A., in Cinefantastique (Forest Park), vol. 26, no. 2, 1995.
- Ribeiro, L.F., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 49, no. 1, 1995.
- Charity, Tom, "Gut Reaction," in Time Out (London), no. 1275, 25 January 1995.
- Atkinson, Michael, "Earthy Creatures," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, no. 3, May–June 1995.
- Walsh, Frances, and Peter Jackson, and Tod Lippy, "Heavenly Creatures: Writing and Directing Heavenly Creatures," in Scenario, vol. 1, no. 4, Fall 1995.
- Murray, J.C., in Metro Magazine (St. Kilda West), no. 102, 1995.
- Henderson, J., "Hose Stalking: Heavenly Creatures as Feminist Horror," in Canadian Journal of Film Studies (Ottawa), vol. 6, no. 1, 1997.
- Hardy, A., "Heavenly Creatures and Transcendental Style: A Literal Reading," in Illusions (Wellington), no. 26, Winter 1997.

* * *

Heavenly Creatures is one of a handful of true crime films, a genre more noted for sensationalism than psychological insight, that strives to do more than just recount the events of the crime it dramatizes—in this case, matricide. It grapples with the larger issue of why? and relentlessly probes for the answer with such extraordinary cinematic verisimilitude that, like the most gripping and multi-leveled fiction, it succeeds in making us comprehend the incomprehensible.

The New Zealand case that inspired the film was one of the most sensational in that country's history. In 1954, two teenage girls, Pauline Yvonne Parker and her school chum Juliet Hulme, conspired to murder Pauline's mother, Mrs. Honora Parker. Juliet's parents were divorcing and planned to ship their daughter to South Africa to stay with relatives. Mrs. Parker denied Pauline's impassioned but unrealistic request to accompany Juliet. The threat of impending separation prompted Pauline to launch a plan for removing the perceived obstacle by killing her mother—a plan Juliet willingly agreed to take part in.

Heavenly Creatures

During an outing with Mrs. Parker, Pauline and Juliet bludgeoned the woman to death, then claimed she had died from an accidental fall. Suspicion of murder fell on the two girls following the discovery of Pauline's diary. In it, Pauline outlined the murder scheme and chronicled the obsessively close-knit relationship and elaborate fantasy life governing the friends' behavior which sparked the crime. Charged with murdering Mrs. Parker, the girls admitted the crime, and voiced no remorse. They were found guilty and sent to prison, but paroled for good behavior in 1960 on the condition that they never meet again. Forty years later, as a result of the hoopla surrounding Jackson's film about the case, a reporter for a New Zealand newspaper looked into what happened to Pauline Parker and Juliet Hulme and found that Parker had changed her name and dropped from sight to lead a life of obscurity presumably "somewhere" in New Zealand.

Hulme, on the other hand, had grown up to become Anne Perry, an internationally best selling author of mystery novels set in Victorian England!

Heavenly Creatures (a title derived from a notation in Pauline's diary) by no means turns a blind eye to the frightfulness of the crime the two girls committed, but it is sympathetic in its portrait of them and the reasons for their intense relationship as well as remarkably non-judgmental about it. The movie—which Jackson and co-writer Frances Walsh (the director's wife) based on court records, interviews with people who knew Parker and Hulme at the time, and Parker's diary—portrays the girls not as monstrous bad seeds approaching full growth but, despite their keen intelligence and precociousness, two lonely, socially immature children who found in each other a kindred spirit—and the missing piece in themselves.

The more unbearably intrusive and uncontrollable real life becomes for them, the more the girls seek refuge in their fantasy world where they exercise complete control—as long as they are together.

So that we understand the bizarre fantasy world the girls create for self-protection but which overtakes them horrifyingly engulfs them, Jackson plunges us headlong into that world, mixing reality and illusion (just as the girls do) with every cinematic technique available to explore the girls' inner lives and expose the psychic wounds that lead, with disturbing inexorability, to tragedy. Heavenly Creatures is a must-see for anyone interested in compelling true crime dramas and a masterpiece of its genre.

—John McCarty

HEIMAT; DIE ZWEITE HEIMAT

Director: Edgar Reitz

HEIMAT

(Homeland)

West Germany, 1984

Production: Edgar Reitz Filmproduktions/WDR/SFB; black and white, parts in color; running time: 924 minutes; length: 83,130 feet. Released September 1984. Later shown on television in 11 parts.

Producer: Edgar Reitz, co-producers: Joachim von Mengershausen, Hans Kwiet; screenplay: Edgar Reitz, Peter Steinbach; assistant directors: Elke Vogt, Martin Höner; photography: Gernot Roll; assistant photographer: Rainer Gutjahr; editor: Heidi Handorf; sound recordist: Gerhard Birkholz; sound re-recordist: Willi Schwadorf; art director: Franz Bauer; costume designers: Reinhold Paul, Ute Schwippert, Regine Bätz; pyrotechnics: Charly Baumgartner; music: Nikos Mamangakis.

Cast: Marita Breuer (Maria Simon, née Wiegand); Michael Lesch (Young Paul Simon); Dieter Schaad (Paul Simon); Karin Kienzler (Young Pauline Kröber); Eva Maria Bayerswaltes (Pauline Kröber); Rüdiger Weigang (Eduard Simon); Gertrud Bredel (Katharina Simon, née Schirmer); Willi Berger (Mathias Simon); Johannes Lobwein (Alois Wiegand); Kurt Wagner (Glasisch-Karl); Marliese Assmann (Apollonia); Eva Maria Schneider (Marie-Goot); Wolfram Wagner (Mätthes-Pat); Alexander Scholz (Hänschen Betz); Arno Lang (Robert Kröber); Otto Henn (Glockziehl); Manfred Kuhn (Wirt); Karin Rasenack (Lucie Simon); Helga Bender (Martina); Rolf Roth (Young Anton Simon); Markus Reiter (Anton Simon); Mathias Kniesbeck (Old Anton Simon); Ingo Hoffmann (Young Ernst Simon); Roland Bongard (Ernst Simon); Michael Kausch (Old Ernst Simon); Andrea Koloschinski (Young Lotti Schirmer); Anke Jendrychowski (Lotti Schirmer); Gabriel Blum (Old Lotti Schirmer); Virginie Moreno (Horsewoman); Rudolph Wessely (Emigrant); Gertrud Sherer (Martha Wiegand); Hans-Jürgen Schatz (Wilfried Wiegand); Kurt Wolfinger (Gauleiter Simon); Jörg Hube (Otto Wohlleben); Johannes Metziori (Fritz Pieritz); Konrad Lindenknecht, Ulrich Lindenknecht (Todt Workers); Joachim Bernard (Pollak); Sabine Wagner (Martha Simon); Gerd Riegauer (Gschrey); Roswitha Werkheiser (Erika 1); Heike Macht (Erika 2); Hans-Günter Kylaue (Captain Zielke); Alexander Katins (Ursel); Ralph Maria Beils (Specht); Gudrun Landgrebe (Klarchen Sisse); Joseph E. Jones (Chauffeur); Andreas Mertens (Horstchen); Frank Kleid (Hermannchen); Jörg Richter (Young Hermann Simon); Peter Harting (Hermann Simon); Ann Ruth (Nurse).

Award: BAFTA Special Award 1986.

Publications

Script:

Reitz, Edgar, and Peter Steinbach, Heimat: Eine deutsche Chronik, Nordlingen, 1985.

Book:

Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema: A History, London, 1989.
Kaes, Anton, From Hitler to Heimat: The Return of History As Film, Cambridge, 1992.

Articles:

- Lughi, P., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), August-October 1984.
Film (West Germany), September 1984.
Variety (New York), 12 September 1984.
Nave, B., and others, in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), November 1984.
Pawlikowski, P., "Home Movies," in Stills (London), November 1984.
Detassis, P., in Positif (Paris), December 1984.
Frodon, J. M., "L'Allemagne se souvient," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1984.
Chalmer, M., in Framework (Norwich), no. 26–27, 1985.
"Dossier Edgar Reitz," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), January-March 1985.
Elsaesser, Thomas, "Memory, Home, and Hollywood," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1985.
Petit, Chris, in Time Out (London), 14–20 February 1985.
City Limits (London), 15–21 February 1985.
Le Roux, H., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1985.
Ranvaud, Don, and John Pym, "Heimat, Home, and the World," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1985.
Syberberg, H. J., "The Abode of the Gods," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1985.
Elsaesser, Thomas, "Our Germany," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), May 1985.
Koch, Gertrud, "Kann man naiv werden?," in Frauen und Film (Berlin), May 1985.
Bachman, G., "The Reitz Stuff," in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1985.
Baron, Saskia, "Home Truths," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), July 1985.
Hager, F., in Filmkunst, August-September 1985.
Berndts, T., in Skrien (Amsterdam), Winter 1985–86.
Soderbergh Widding, A., in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 28, no. 1, 1986.
Listener (London), 10, 17, and 24 April 1986.
Birgel, Franz E., interview with Edgar Reitz, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1986.
Schneider, R., "Aux antipodes du simplisme hollywoodien: Heimat," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), October 1990.
Angier, C., "Edgar Reitz," in Sight and Sound (London), no. 1, 1990–91.
Andres, A., "The Music of Heimat," in Film Score Monthly (Los Angeles), no. 51, November 1994.
Papen, M. von, "Keeping the Home Fires Burning?: Women and the German Homefront Film 1940–1943," in Film History (London), vol. 8, no. 1, 1996.
Liebman, Stuart, "Heimat: A Chronicle of Germany," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 22, no. 3, December 1996.

DIE ZWEITE HEIMAT

(Leaving Home; Heimat II)

Germany, 1992

Production: An Edgar Reitz Production; colour/black and white; running time: 1,532 minutes. Premiered at London Film Festival, November 1992.

Producer: Edgar Reitz; screenplay: Edgar Reitz; photography: Gernot Roll (parts 1–5), Gerard Vanderberg (6–8), Christian Reitz (9–13); editor: Susanne Hartman; assistant director: Robert Busch; production designer: Franz Bauer; music: Nikos Mamangakis; sound: Heiko Hinderks, Haymo Heyder, Manfred Banach, and Reiner Wiehr; costumes: Bille Brassers and Nikola Hoeltz.

Cast: Henry Arnold (Hermann); Salome Kammer (Clarissa); Anke Sevenich (Schnusschen); Daniel Smith (Juan); Michael Schonborn (Alex); Franziska Traub (Renate); Hannelore Hoger (Elisabeth Cerphal); Hanna Kohler (Frau Moretti); Gisela Muller (Evelyne); Michael Seyfried (Ansgar); Armin Fuchs (Volker); Martin Maria Blau (Jean-Marie); Lena Lessing (Olga); Peter Weiss (Rob); Frank Roth (Stefan); Laszlo I. Kish (Reinhard); Susanne Lothar (Esther); Veronika Ferres (Dorli); Franziska Stommer (Frau Ries); Manfred Andrae (Gerold Gattinger).

Publications

Articles:

- Angier, C., "Edgar Reitz," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1990–91.
- Nodolny, Sten, "On Leaving Home and Perfecting Oneself," in The Sequel to Heimat, Jutta Muller, editor, Cologne, 1991.
- Albano, L., "Tra arte e vita," in Filmcritica (Rome), September–October 1992.
- Angier, C., "Like Life Itself," in Sight and Sound (London), November 1992.
- Hansen, E., Variety (New York), 7 December 1992.
- Kilb, A., "Scènes de la vie parallele," in Positif (Paris), January 1993.
- Holloway, R., in Kino (Warsaw), May 1993.
- Pezzotta, A., "Imitation of Life," in Segnocinema (Vicenza), no. 63, September/October 1993.
- Holden, S., "Critic's Notebook: a 25 1/2-hour German Epic of Discovery and Art," in New York Times, vol. 142, 17 June 1993.
- Mephram, John, "Visionary Storytelling," in Vertigo, Spring 1994.
- Andres, A., "The Music of Heimat," in Film Score Monthly (Los Angeles), no. 51, November 1994.
- Feldvoss, M., "Hannelore Hoger: Energie und Eigensinn," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), March 1998.

* * *

Described as a "chronicle in 11 parts," Heimat tells the story of the (fictional) village of Schabbach in the Hunsrück, a rural area of the southern Rhineland, between the years 1919 and 1982, focusing in particular on the members of one family, the Simons. It was shown on West German television in 1984, and was also screened as a film (over two days) in cinemas there. It has been widely seen, both as a film and a television series, in other European countries and in America.

When Heimat was shown in Germany it was a major media event, surpassed only by the television screening of the American mini-series Holocaust in 1979. In fact, the genesis of Heimat lay in its director Edgar Reitz's reaction to Holocaust. Reitz accused Holocaust of reducing the misery caused by the Nazis to a "welcome background spectacle for a sentimental family story," of trivializing German history and, indeed, of willfully expropriating it for simplistic, entertainment purposes. He argued that what Germans needed to do was to take "narrative possession of our past" thus "breaking free of the world of judgments and dealing with it through art." The way to do this, he argued, was to tell stories: "there are thousands of stories among our people worth filming, which are based on endless minutiae of experience. These stories individually rarely seem to contribute to the evaluation and explanation of history, but taken together they could compensate for this lack. We should no longer forbid ourselves to take our personal lives seriously." The source of the problem is, of course, the Nazi past: "we Germans have a hard time with our stories. It is our own history that is in our way. The year 1945, the nation's 'zero hour,' wiped out a lot, created a gap in people's ability to remember. As Mitscherlich put it, an entire people has been made 'unable to mourn.' In our case that means 'unable to tell stories' because our memories are obstructed by the great historical events they are connected with. Even now, 40 years after the war, we are still troubled by the weight of moral judgments, we are still afraid that our little personal stories could recall our Nazi past and remind us of our mass participation in the Third Reich. . . . Our film, Heimat, consists of these suppressed or forgotten little stories. It is a chronicle of both a family and a village and is an attempt of sorts to revive memories. . . . We try to avoid making judgements."

Heimat, then, is an example of what has come to be known as "history from below," an interest in which has increasingly come to the fore in many European countries. It is concerned with oral history, the personal experiences of ordinary people, folklore, the local, the regional, "popular memory" and so on.

Heimat is not only a celebration of the "positive human values and hopes" of the rural community, it is also a lament for their passing. Indeed, a sense of loss and of nostalgia imbues the film's very title, which cannot be adequately translated into English. As Reitz himself has explained: "the word is always linked to strong feeling, mostly remembrances and longing. 'Heimat' always evokes in me the feeling of something lost or very far away, something which one cannot easily find or find again." In a remarkable study of the film, Anton Kaes traces the concern with "Heimat" back to the late nineteenth century and the reaction against rapid industrialisation and urbanisation: "Heimat was precisely that which was abandoned on the way into the cities; from then on the word 'Heimat' began to connote 'region,' 'province' and 'country' . . . Heimat means the site of one's lost childhood, of family, of identity. It also stands for the possibility of secure human relations, unalienated, precapitalist labour, and the romantic harmony between the country dweller and nature. Heimat refers to everything that is not distant and foreign. . . . It conjured up a rural, archaic image of the German Reich and a German community rooted in ahistorical, mythic time."

Reaction to the film in Germany, and elsewhere in Europe, was extremely positive. It was only when Heimat was shown in the United States that the negative opinions which had been expressed in Germany gained a wider hearing. In the light of the above this should not have been surprising; as Thomas Elsaesser noted, calling a German film Heimat was a “calculated provocation and was bound to be controversial.” Likewise Anton Kaes: “scenes of provincial life are never innocent in Germany.”

According to its critics, Heimat's main problems lie as much in what it does not show as what it does. The argument here is one leveled against any broadly realist text, namely, that it cannot escape from the mental horizons of its protagonists. The same criticism can be leveled at some versions of the “history from below” mentioned earlier. Major political events and wider economic factors, which undoubtedly have their influences on individual private lives, are ignored or glossed over because that is what the characters themselves do. This might matter rather less if that history did not include the Third Reich. Indeed, almost half of the film takes place in the years 1933–45. Writing in the New York Review of Books, Timothy Garten Ash stated: “when you show the 1930s as a golden age of prosperity and excitement in the German countryside, when you are shown Germans as victims of the war, then you inevitably find yourself asking: But what about the other side? What about Auschwitz?” Or as one of the film’s sternest critics, Gertrud Koch, has it: “in order to tell the myth of ‘Heimat,’ the trauma of Auschwitz had to be shut out of the story.” The Third Reich seems almost to take place off screen, and when Nazi activities are presented (which is not often) it’s in a curiously elliptical fashion and usually without much explanation—on the grounds, presumably, that this is how they were actually experienced by the characters. Accommodation with the Nazi regime is shown largely as comical, or merely opportunistic, or as the result of seduction of one form or another. Admittedly one or two characters—a Jew, a Communist—disappear, but no one seems to show the slightest curiosity about this. Again, all this might matter less were it not for the historical fact that the countryside was extraordinarily important to the National Socialists ideologically, politically and economically, and found a good deal of support amongst the peasantry. Reitz himself has said that to have taken on the Jewish question would have “overburdened the narrative” and that “the story would have immediately taken a different turn.” He has also argued that there were very few Jews in the Hunsrück and that people there were largely ignorant of Nazi genocide.

Unease about the representation of the Third Reich period is further compounded by the way in which postwar, modern Germany is shown. In short, it appears to be downhill all the way, and the main villain here is definitely America. (One begins to see why it was in America that misgivings about the film were voiced). But this is only the most extreme instance of a process throughout the film whereby no good comes from events, influences or people outside the Edenic, pastoral idyll of the Hunsrück. This comes dangerously close to a reactionary agrarian romanticism with disturbing similarities to the “Blood and Soil” ideology; moreover, it also seems to suggest that all of Germany’s contemporary problems, whether it’s the despoilation of the countryside or people’s inability to connect with their past, can be laid at the door of the Americans, thereby neatly letting the past 100 years of German capitalism (in which the Third Reich and the “Wirtschaftswunder” were both highly significant episodes) neatly off the historical hook.

Die Zweite Heimat is a project even more epic than its predecessor, although it spans a much more limited time period. The entire film runs a remarkable 26 hours (cinema screenings are normally spread over three or four days, television over 13 episodes) and took a total of seven years to make, of which 552 days were taken up by shooting. There are 71 main roles, 310 smaller ones, and 2300 extras. The budget of DM40m was put together by television companies in Germany, Britain, Spain, Finland, Denmark, Norway and Austria, an indication of the enormous popularity of Heimat outside Germany. Although extremely well received both in Germany and abroad it was not a media event of the same proportions as the first film and, to date at least, has attracted rather less critical attention. This may be because the subject matter, and Reitz’s handling of it, is simply less controversial, but it would be paradoxical indeed if this were to limit discussion of what is an undoubted masterpiece.

Die Zweite Heimat's central character is Hermann Simon, born in 1940 in the Hunsrück into the family at the centre of Heimat. At the start of the film he moves to Munich, vowing never to return home, to devote his life to music, and never to love again. Eventually all three vows are broken, and his love affair with the young musician Clarissa runs like a connecting thread throughout the length of the film.

If Heimat is about the country, stability, older generations, people who lived and died where they were born, Die Zweite Heimat is about the city, change, the young, those who pull up their roots. In the first film people are connected by blood ties and the pull of an ancient, close-knit community; in the second by friendship, love, commitment to art and ideas, rejection of the past, and a desire for a better present and future. Quite clearly the title signifies much more than that this is the second part of Heimat; there is a very strong sense of “second home” here. As Hermann puts it at the start of the film: “I left for Munich’s bright lights and mysteries I refused to look back even once. Ahead of me lay freedom. I would be born a second time, not from my mother’s body but from my own mind. I would seek my own, my second home.” And, since these are very much times remembered from a distance, times which include Reitz’s own youthful experiences, the sense of loss and longing that imbues the word “Heimat” is as present here (if perhaps less obviously so) as in the first film.

With 26 hours at its disposal, Die Zweite Heimat succeeds where many films fail—it captures the feeling of life as it is actually lived. Characters appear, disappear, reappear much later, or not at all; at different moments different characters are predominant or subordinate; things are left unexplained and unresolved; pace and tone change from episode to episode, sometimes even within the same episode. Reitz has drawn the analogy with a stream which sometimes flows on the surface, then disappears below ground, only to rise again much later on and further away.

If one of the problems with Heimat was that its basically realist aesthetic meant that it was tied to the limited perceptions of its provincial characters, Reitz avoids this here by presenting us with a very different set of characters and, more importantly, by adopting a different aesthetic approach. Hermann and his friends are people who spend their lives thinking and analysing, they live and breathe ideas, they want their lives to connect with the wider world of history and politics, and above all they’re interested in the relationship between their various forms of artistic practice and society at large. Indeed, the whole epic project of Die Zweite Heimat can be seen as a profound reflection on the nature and value of avant-garde artistic activity, and the fact that it eventually founders here is due not to the shortcomings of its practitioners but to the destructive influence of external, indeed global, forces. Reitz, as himself, along with Alexander Kluge, one of the most aesthetically radical of the new German filmmakers at one time with films such as Cardillac, Geschichten vom Kubelkind and Das Goldene Ding, presents us with a remarkably insightful and sympathetic portrait of the avant-garde, but ultimately he does not shy away from suggesting that whilst these artists were dreaming of creating the alternative society, the history that was being made behind their backs was preparing to render their efforts somewhat irrelevant.

However, unlike in Heimat, Reitz here remembers the avant-garde critique of the shortcomings of realism, and although he by no means abandons realism entirely, he subverts it to a quite remarkable degree. Perhaps the clearest example of Reitz's approach here is provided by the end of the crucial episode which includes the assassination of Kennedy and signals the beginning of the end for Hermann and his friends. On hearing the news, the group gather in Hermann's room, and the episode closes with a deliberately stagey, clearly fabricated and non-naturalistic shot as they all look up simultaneously to a mirror, on which there is a photo of Kennedy and Khrushchev, and contemplate their collective image. This is one of the film's most obvious and decisive breaks with realism and, as Mephram has put it: "What this shot exemplifies is Reitz's method of moving beyond naturalistic image-making and the conventions of realist storytelling, to conjure up a polysemic image, which transcends its literal meaning and proposes a symbolic framework in terms of which we can read the entire episode."

One could also mention, in this context of breaks with realism, the remarkable number of times that the film self-reflexively foregrounds moments of performance of one kind or another, but even more striking, in this respect, is its use of colour and black-and-white. As a general (though by no means unbroken) rule, Reitz uses black-and-white for the daytime scenes, and colour for the night ones. The spectator is thus forced to take notice of colour, rather than unconsciously accepting it as part and parcel of the apparently literal representation of the fictional world. Here, colour, or black-and-white, become significant in their own right, and are clearly labelled as such. In a general sense, black-and-white signifies that, for Hermann and his friends, the days are dull, banal and anodyne, whilst the use of colour underlines the fact that it is at night that they really come alive. But it is much more complex than that; as Mephram puts it, throughout the film "the literal or naturalistic quality of the image is always in question, because there is no one style of image which we can accept as simply showing us what the fictional world is like. Therefore we become used to looking for more than literal significance. Visual poetry becomes the norm, and light and colour become radiant with meaning." Again, the Kennedy episode provides a good example. This opens with one of the most beautiful and haunting images of the entire film: a slow pan in the early morning light across bare trees in which crows are settling. The scene is accompanied by a song about crows, which contains the line: "soon it will snow. Lucky is he who still has a home." There is no question but that this scene has hugely symbolic, connotative overtones; we, the spectators, know exactly what is going to happen on this day, but the characters most certainly do not. However, there is no question of us being asked to accept their viewpoints here—and indeed, this opening is not observed by any of them, it is pure directorial intervention, a deliberate establishing of the symbolic framework which imbues the entire episode, much of whose poignancy stems from the spectator (and of course Reitz) knowing what the characters do not and cannot know. Here, as in many other striking scenes in this truly extraordinary film, Reitz manages triumphantly to pull off the extremely difficult feat of departing from conventional realist practices whilst at the same time presenting an epic fiction which is not only entirely coherent in its own right but deeply moving and thought-provoking at the same time.

—Julian Petley

THE HEIR OF GENGHIS KHAN

See POTOMOK CHINGIS-KHANA

HENRY V

UK, 1944

Director: Laurence Olivier

Production: Two Cities Film, presented by Eagle-Lion; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 153 minutes, some versions are 137 minutes. Released 22 November 1944, Carlton Theatre, London. Filmed 9 June 1943–12 July 1944 in Enniskerry, Eire; and at Denham and Pinewood Studios, England. Cost: about £400,000.

Producers: Laurence Olivier with Dallas Bower; screenplay: Laurence Olivier and Alan Dent, from the play by William Shakespeare; photography: Robert Krasker; editor: Reginald Beck; sound recordists: John Dennis and Desmond Drew; art directors: Paul Sheriff assisted by Carmen Dillon; scenic art: E. Lindgaard; music: William Walton; conductor: Muir Mathieson; played by: London Symphony Orchestra; special effects: Percy Day; costume designers: Roger Furse assisted by Margaret Furse; the film is dedicated to the Commandos and Airborne Troops of Great Britain—"the spirits of whose ancestors it has humbly attempted to recapture"

Cast: Leslie Banks (Chorus); Felix Aylmer (Archbishop of Canterbury); Robert Helpmann (Bishop of Ely); Vernon Greeves (English Herald); Gerald Case (Earl of Westmorland); Griffith Jones (Earl of Salisbury); Morland Graham (Sir Thomas Erpingham); Nicholas Hannen (Duke of Exeter); Michael Warre (Duke of Gloucester); Laurence Olivier (King Henry V); Ralph Truman (Montjoy, the French Herald); Ernest Thesiger (Duke of Berri, French Ambassador); Frederick Cooper (Corporal Nym); Roy Emerton (Lieutenant Bardolph); Robert Newton (Pistol); Freda Jackson (Mistress Quickly, the Hostess); George Cole (Boy); George Robey (Sir John Falstaff); Harcourt Williams (King Charles VI of France); Leo Genn (Constable of France); Francis Lister (Duke of Orleans); Max Adrian (Dauphin); Jonathan Field (French Messenger); Esmond Knight (Fluellen); Michael Shepley (Gower); John Laurie (Jamy); Nial MacGinnis (Macmorris); Frank Tickle (Governor of Harfleur); Renée Asherson (Princess Katherine); Ivy St. Helier (Lady Alice); Janet Burnell (Queen Isabel of France); Brian Nissen (Court, camp-boy); Arthur Hambling (John Bates); Jimmy Hanley (Michael Williams); Ernest Hare (Priest); Valentine Dyll (Duke of Burgundy); and Infantry and Cavalry by members of the Eire Home Guard.

Awards: Special Oscar to Laurence Olivier for his Outstanding Achievement as Actor, Producer, and Director in bringing Henry V to the screen, 1946; New York Film Critics' Award, Best Actor, 1946; Venice Film Festival, Special Mention, 1946.

Henry V

Publications

Script:

Olivier, Laurence, and Alan Dent, Henry V, in Film Scripts One, edited by George P. Garrett, New York, 1971.

Books:

Oakley, C. A., Where We Came In: 70 Years of the British Film Industry, London, 1964.

Whitehead, Peter, and Robin Bean, Olivier-Shakespeare, London, 1966.

Darlington, W. A., Laurence Olivier, London, 1968.

Eckert, Charles W., editor, Focus on Shakespearian Films, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.

Geduld, Harry M., editor, A Filmguide to Henry V, Bloomington, Indiana, 1973.

Perry, George, The Great British Picture Show, from the 90s to the 70s, New York, 1974.

Barsacq, Leon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.

Morley, Margaret, editor, Olivier: The Films and Faces of Laurence Olivier, Godalming, Surrey, 1978.

Hirsch, Foster, Laurence Olivier, Boston, 1979; revised edition, 1984.
Daniels, Robert, Laurence Olivier: Theatre and Cinema, London, 1980.
Olivier, Laurence, Confessions of an Actor: An Autobiography, New York, 1982.

Barker, Felix, Laurence Olivier: A Critical Study, Tunbridge Wells, Kent, 1984.

Bragg, Melvin, Laurence Olivier, London, 1984.

Silviria, Dale, Laurence Olivier and the Art of Filmmaking, Rutherford, New Jersey, 1985.

Tanitch, Robert, Olivier: The Complete Career, London, 1985.

Dunster, Mark, Olivier, Hollywood, 1993.

Spoto, Donald, Laurence Olivier: A Biography, New York, 1993.

Lewis, Roger, The Real Life of Laurence Olivier, New York, 1999.

Granger, Derek, Laurence Olivier: The Life of an Actor: The Authorized Biography, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 24 April 1946.

New York Times, 16 June 1946.

Agee, James, Agee on Film I, New York, 1958.

McVay, Douglas, "Hamlet to Clown," in Films and Filming (London), September 1962.

- Brown, Constance, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1967.
- Hart, Henry, "Laurence Olivier," in Films in Review (New York), December 1967.
- McCreadie, M., "Onstage and on Film," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Fall 1977.
- Manheim, M., "Olivier's Henry V and the Elizabethan World Picture," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), July 1983.
- Reid's Film Index* (Wyong), no. 4, 1990.
- Martini, E., in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), July-August, 1990.
- Nichols, Peter, "A Classy Tale," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 1, no. 6, October 1991.
- Deats, S. M., "Rabbits and Ducks: Olivier, Branagh, and Henry V," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1992.
- Manheim, M., "The Function of Battle Imagery in Kurosawa's Histories and the Henry V Films," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 22, no. 2, April 1994.
- Buhler, S.M., "Text, Eyes, and Videotape: Screening Shakespeare's Scripts," in Shakespeare Quarterly, vol. 46, no. 2, 1995.
- Crowdus, Gary, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 22, no. 1, April 1996.
- Bibliography, in Shakespeare Quarterly, vol. 47, no. 5, 1996.
- Griffin, C.W., "Henry V's Decision: Interrogative [sic] Texts," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 25, no. 2, April 1997.
- Royal, Derek, "Shakespeare's Kingly Mirror: Figuring the Chorus in Olivier's and Branagh's Henry V," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 25, no. 2, April 1997.
- Bibliography, in Shakespeare Quarterly, vol. 48, no. 5, 1997.

* * *

At the beginning of his career Laurence Olivier did not specialize in interpreting Shakespearean roles on the screen. He had played many of Shakespeare's greatest characters on stage, and was especially praised for having alternated with John Gielgud in the roles of Romeo and Mercutio in the 1935 production of Romeo and Juliet at London's New Theatre. He was charming in the 1936 film production of As You Like It as Orlando, but he really didn't take his film career seriously until 1939, when he played Heathcliff in Goldwyn's production of Wuthering Heights.

With the coming of war, his filmmaking was largely curtailed, but more than halfway through the conflict, when the Allied victory seemed certain, Olivier was released from his military duties to produce, direct, and star in a film to be made from Shakespeare's Henry V. Because the play is so patriotic, it was thought by the British government that the project would create a wonderful piece of nationalistic propaganda. Olivier had already played Henry V at the Old Vic, and knew what he wanted to achieve—a movie version that would restore glory to the common man's thinking about his own country.

There were some preliminary setbacks. David O. Selznick refused to allow Vivien Leigh to play the role of the French Princess Katherine; he thought it too small a role for the star of Gone with the Wind. Olivier chose Renée Asherson, Robert Donat's wife, for the part. He wanted William Wyler as director, because Wyler had directed him in Wuthering Heights. But Wyler was busy on another project, and suggested that Olivier himself direct the film. Olivier considered it, and began preproduction work, but the film might never have been made, were it not for the efforts of an Italian lawyer, Filippo del Giudice, who had been the driving force behind Noël Coward in In Which We Serve. Del Giudice wanted another patriotic classic, and he eased Olivier's working budget of £300,000 upward more than another £100,000 for Henry V.

Olivier, preparing his own screenplay from the Shakespearean text, cut the play nearly a quarter so that he could give ample time to the staging of the Battle of Agincourt. He lifted the death of Falstaff from the last scenes of Henry IV, Part II, wisely casting a music hall comedian, George Robey, as Falstaff. He decided to begin his picture and end it as if it were a performance at the Globe Theatre in the time of Shakespeare, who had created the device himself when, in the lines of the Chorus in the Prologue, he instructs the audience, "On your imaginary forces work," leaving the way open for a very inventive cinematic trick: the camera pulls back, and we are out of the Globe and immediately into the conflict.

The critic for Time wrote: "At last there has been brought to the screen, with such sweetness, vigor, insight and beauty that it seemed to have been written yesterday, a play by the greatest dramatic poet who ever lived." Henry V ran for five months in London, and it played on Broadway for 46 weeks. It opened the door for Olivier to other Shakespearean films. His Hamlet (1948) came next; then Richard III (1955). Ten years later in 1965 it was Othello, with Olivier as the Moor of Venice.

—DeWitt Bodeen

HERR ARNES PENGAR

(Sir Arne's Treasure)

Sweden, 1919

Director: Mauritz Stiller

Production: Svenska Biografteatern; black and white; running time: 100 minutes (78 minutes at 18 f.p.s.); length: 5,226 feet. Released 1919.

Screenplay: Gustav Molander, Mauritz Stiller, from the novel by Selma Lagerlöf; photography: Julius Jaenson; art directors: Harry Dahlstrom, Alexander Bako; costumes: Axel Esbensen.

Cast: Mary Johnson (Elsalill); Richard Lund (Sir Archy); Hjalmar Selander (Sir Arne); Concordia Selander (Arne's Wife); Wanda Rothgardt (Berghild); Erik Stocklassa (Sir Philip); Bror Berger (Sir Donald); Axel Nilsson (Torarin); Gustaf Aronson (Ship's Captain); Stina Berg (Innkeeper); with Dagmar Ebbeson, Gösta Gustafsson.

Publications

Books:

- Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, Den Svenska Filmens Drama: Sjöström och Stiller, Stockholm, 1938.
- Hardy, Forsyth, Scandinavian Film, London, 1951.

Herr Arnes Pengar

Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, Classics of the Swedish Cinema, Stockholm, 1952.
 Waldekranz, Rune, Swedish Cinema, Stockholm, 1959.
 Beranger, Jean, La Grande Aventure du cinéma suédois, Paris, 1960.
 Lauritzen, Einar, Swedish Films, New York, 1962.
 Cowie, Peter, Swedish Cinema, London, 1966.
Anthologie du cinéma 3, Paris, 1968.
 Werner, Gösta, Mauritz Stiller och hans filmer, Stockholm, 1969.
 Werner, Gösta, P. A. Norstedt, and Soners Forlag, Herr Arnes Pengar, Stockholm, 1969.

Articles:

Bioscope (London), 15 January 1920.
Kine Weekly (London), 15 January 1920.
Film Daily, 11 December 1921.
New York Times, 25 December 1921.
Variety (New York), 2 December 1925.
 O'Leary, Liam, in Films and Filming (London), August 1960.
 Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1977.

Robertson, JoAnne, "Maurice Stiller," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1977.
 Brewster, B., and G. Sadoul, in Filmviews (Mitcham), vol. 30, no. 123, Autumn 1985.
 Lefebvre, Thierry, "Mary Johnson: Le trésor du Trésor d'Arne," in Archives: Institut Jean Vigo (Perpignan), no. 60, February 1995.
 Short Review, in Télérama (Paris), no. 2354, 22 February 1995.

* * *

Nineteen-hundred and nineteen was a good year for cinema: The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, Lubitsch's Madame Dubarry, Griffith's Broken Blossoms and Gance's J'accuse. From Sweden came what is probably Mauritz Stiller's best film, Herr Arnes Pengar. Based on Selma Lagerlöf's story this "winter ballad" won universal acclaim for its sensitive artistry and technical skill.

The sophisticated and authoritarian Stiller evoked the mood and feeling of sixteenth-century Sweden in the reign of John the Third. Set in a ravaged landscape during a severe winter, it tells of the activities of three mercenary Scottish officers who have escaped from prison after their armies have been banished by the king. Crazed by hunger and drink, they set fire to the parsonage of Solberga and murder all but one of the family, the adopted child Elsalill. Laden with the treasure they have stolen, they escape across the ice. By a quirk of fate Elsalill unknowingly falls in love with Sir Archy, one of the three murderers. On discovering his guilty secret, she is persuaded to denounce him to the town guard. Using her as a shield, he escapes his would-be captors but Elsalill diverts a spear-thrust meant for him to herself. At last a ship that will take him home is reached although it is still frozen in the bay. He sits beside Elsalill's body until the guards arrive to seize the guilty men. The people of Marstrand file across the frozen harbour and carry the body of Elsalill back to the town. With the evil-doers removed, the ice binding the ship melts and it sails into the open sea.

The dramatic structure is such that suspense is ever present and the doomed love affair moves to its tragic close in a deeply felt visual treatment. The camera is used most effectively to create a series of unforgettable images with taste and discretion. The moving camera is used sparingly while the iris "in and out" is used both for emphasis and smooth transition in the advancement of the story.

The snowy Swedish landscape dominates the film. The dwellings and the behaviour of the people have an air of authenticity. The texture of the costumes is a feature of the sensitive camerawork. A historical period is convincingly brought to life.

There is a dark occult motivation in the film, too, which plays a considerable part: the vision of the parson's wife before the attack: "Why are they sharpening knives at Branchög?" Elsalill's dream leads her to the tavern where she hears Sir Archy and his companions talking about their loot from the parsonage. The fisherman Torarin's dog, Grim, senses the evil that is near.

Visually the film is very impressive, especially in the scenes of the escape of the murderers across the ice, laden with their ill-gotten treasure chest. The great finale of the procession of the Marstranders across the frozen harbour to the ship must have influenced Eisenstein's treatment of the procession of the people of Moscow to Ivan the Terrible at Alexandrov. The film owes much to the camerawork of Julius Jaenson, a valued collaborator in the great films of Stiller and Sjöström.

Mary Johnson as Elsalill gives a memorable performance and was moulded by Stiller for the role in the same way he was later to introduce Garbo to the screen. Stiller was an autocratic director and made difficult demands on his players. The physical conditions involved in the production did much to give a painful realism to the film, and the winter hazards encountered during production became part of the mise-en-scène.

The film won critical acclaim outside its country of origin. English critics, for example, could say: "It is notable for its very advanced and original technique as for its brilliant acting it is a credit to the art of the film." And again, "It stands out clearly amongst the greatest of screen productions. It is great art." Certainly it is one of the greatest adornments of the Golden Age of Swedish cinema.

—Liam O'Leary

HIDDEN STAR

See MEGHE DHAKA TARA

HIGANBANA

(Equinox Flower)

Japan, 1958

Director: Yasujiro Ozu

Production: Schochiku; Agfacolor, 35mm; running time: 118 minutes. Released 1958.

Screenplay: Kogo Noda, Yasujiro Ozu, from a novel by Ton Satomi; photography: Yushun Atsuta; editing: Yoshiyasu Hamamura; sound: Yoshisaburo Seno; art direction: Tatsuo Hamada; lighting: Akira Aomatsu; music: Takayori Saito.

Cast: Shin Saburi (Watara Hirayama); Kinoyo Tanaka (Kiyoko Hirayama); Ineko Arima (Setsuko Hirayama); Miyuki Kuwano (Hisako Hirayama); Keiji Sada (Masahiko Taniguchi); Chieko Naniwa (Hajime Sasaki); Fujiko Yamamo (Yukiko Sasaki); Nobuo Nakamu (Toshihiko Kawai); Chishu Ryu (Shukichi Mikami); Yoshiko Kuga (Fumiko Mikami); Teiji Takahashi (Shotaro Kondo); Fumio Watanab (Ichiro Naganuma).

Publications

Books:

Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, The Japanese Film: Art and Industry, New York, 1960.

Richie, Donald, Five Pictures of Yasujiro Ozu, Tokyo, 1962.

Richie, Donald, The Japanese Movie: An Illustrated History, Tokyo, 1966.

Richie, Donald, Japanese Cinema: Film Style and National Character, New York, 1971.

Sato, Tadao, Ozu Yasujiro no Geijutsu [The Art of Yasujiro Ozu], Tokyo, 1971.

Satomi, Jun, and others, Ozu Yasujiro: Hito to shigoto [Yasujiro Ozu: The Man and His Work], Tokyo, 1972.

Schrader, Paul, Transcendental Style in Film: Ozu, Bresson, Dreyer, Berkeley, 1972.

Burch, Noel, Theory of Film Practice, New York, 1973.

Tessier, Max, in Anthologie du Cinéma 7, Paris, 1973.

Richie, Donald, Ozu, Berkeley, 1974.

Schrader, Leonard, and Haruji Nakamura, editors, Masters of Japanese Film, Tokyo, 1975.

Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, New York, 1978; revised edition, Tokyo, 1985.

Burch, Noel, To the Distant Observer, Berkeley, 1979.

Tessier, Max, editor, Le Cinéma japonais au présent 1959–1979, Paris, 1980.

Sato, Tadao, Currents in Japanese Cinema, Tokyo, 1982.

Higanbana

Shindo, Kaneto, Joyu Tanaka Kinuyo, Tokyo, 1983.
Bordwell, David, Ozu and the Poetics of Cinema, Princeton, 1988.

Articles:

Uni-Japan Quarterly, January 1959.
Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1959.
Whitebait, William, in New Statesman (London), 31 October 1959.
“Ozu Issue” of Kinema Jumbo (Tokyo), February 1964.
Philippe, Jean-Claude, “Yasujiro Ozu,” in Dossiers du cinema 1, Paris, 1971.
Branigan, Edward, “The Space of Equinox Flower,” in Screen (London), Summer 1976.
Thompson, Kristin, and David Bordwell, “Space and Narrative in the Films of Ozu,” in Screen (London), Summer 1976.
“Ozu Issue” of Cinéma (Paris), February 1981.
Liola, S., and A. Iwaskak, “Gesprek met Ozu,” in Skrien (Amsterdam), Winter 1983–84.
“Ozu, la vita e la geometria dei film,” in Castoro Cinema (Florence), no. 151, 1991.

Wood, R., “The Noriko Trilogy,” in Cineaction (Toronto), Winter 1992.

Casas, Q., “Flores de equinoccio,” in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 25/26, December 1997.

Zunzunegui, S., “Voces distantes,” in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 25/26, December 1997.

* * *

Though one can agree with Noel Burch (To the Distant Observer) that Ozu’s work declined into academicism, it is possible to date the decline much later, restricting it to his last few films: it seems significant that two of them (Ohayo and Floating Weeds) are remakes of much earlier works and inferior to the originals, giving an impression of fatigue. It may also be significant that, when he began to work in colour, Ozu abandoned camera movement altogether, thereby relinquishing an expressive and/or formal potential the more effective for being used so sparingly. There is not a single camera movement in Ozu’s last six films: his obsession with precise composition seems to have intensified, and he refused to disturb the constructed image by moving the camera. One can analyse in most of Ozu’s films a tension between conservative and radical impulses; towards the end, the conservatism dominates, as one can see if one compares Late Autumn to Late Spring.

Equinox Flower, the first of the six colour films, stands quite apart from its successors, retaining a wonderful freshness of invention, a sense of energy and playfulness; it is also (and this is surely no coincidence) the closest Ozu came to making an explicitly feminist film (one might borrow a title from Mizoguchi and rename it Victory of Women). Here, the radical impulse triumphs, and the film's consistent vivacity comes across as a celebration of this. It can be read as a coda to what can be called Ozu's Setsuko Hara trilogy. Hara was clearly too old to play "her" character (resisting, here, not marriage per se, but arranged marriage); accordingly, the character is named not Noriko but Setsuko. Here, as in Early Summer and unlike in Late Spring, the young woman wins the right to decide her own destiny. This is essentially why Late Spring had to be a tragedy and Equinox Flower a comedy.

There has been very little critical discussion of the question of identification in Ozu's films. Understandably: Western critics have been preoccupied with the uniqueness of Ozu's methodology, and every component of it seems calculated to preclude the possibility of identification. "Seems" but isn't: identification is a complex phenomenon and the achievement of a contemplative distance does not preclude it but merely redefines its nature. Ozu totally rejects the technical apparatus of identification, most obviously the point-of-view shot. Early Summer actually contains what (given Ozu's well-documented knowledge of and fondness for the Hollywood cinema) we must take as a Hitchcock joke: Two characters walk down a corridor, the camera tracking back before them; cut to a forward point-of-view tracking shot. But then we realize that this is a different corridor in a different building, unconnected with the characters whose point-of-view we thought we were sharing. Ozu's camera is never judgmental: the most unsympathetic characters are filmed in exactly the same way as the most sympathetic. Our judgement of them, unprejudiced by camera angle, lighting, "significant" music, must therefore be truly ours: we are left free to assess their behaviour, actions, values, virtues, limitations. This does not so much preclude identification as set it free: the play of our sympathies can shift from character to character, or be divided between two or more characters at the same time. The films can be argued to be (often) about the complexity of point of view, though they are certainly not reducible to "Everyone has his reasons" or "Tout comprendre, c'est tout pardonner." Ozu's judgement is always firm and clear, but it is defined in the movement of the scenario, not imposed by cinematic rhetoric.

Two conflicting levels of sympathy/identification are always present in Ozu's work, the conflict becoming central to the later, post-World War II films: identification with the figure of the threatened or displaced patriarch, identification with the female characters. Equinox Flower enacts this conflict most vividly. The theme of the film is the education by women of the traditional Japanese patriarch (Michael Uno's The Wash contains so many thematic and structural parallels that one wonders whether there was a direct connection between the two films). The strong feminist thrust of Ozu's films (which few seem to have perceived, though the last 15 minutes of Tokyo Story alone should be enough to make it obvious) is strengthened, not weakened, by the empathy he evidently feels for his patriarchs: he understands their position completely, he knows how they feel because a part of him feels the same way, and he knows that their position has become untenable. The logical climax of Equinox

Flower, absolutely demanded by narrative convention, is the wedding of the patriarch's daughter to the man that she, not her father, has chosen. Ozu declines to show it, substituting the reunion of the father with his aging ex-fellow students, which culminates in a communal expression of nostalgia for values that they all recognize to be obsolete. After it, the "victory of women"—to which all the female characters variously contribute (the film is magnificent on the subject of female solidarity)—can be completed, and the father is led to accept his daughter's right to her own judgement and choice. The film never sentimentalizes love matches by suggesting that they are likely to be any more successful than arranged ones, but it is quite unambiguous on the woman's right to reach her own decision.

The celebratory effect of the film's ending is underlined by Ozu's use of colour. He was fascinated by bright red, and in his first colour film he allowed this predilection free play. Especially, a red chair in the family's hallway figures prominently in shot after shot, yet it is always empty. Then, when the women's victory is confirmed by the phone-call in which the father finally agrees to visit his daughter and her husband, the wife at last sits in it in triumph, as on a throne. Ozu cuts to a line of washing on which a scarlet shirt stands out: a fireworks display could not have been more eloquent.

Finally, note the exactness of the film's title: "Equinox Flower," the flower that blossoms out of a time of change.

—Robin Wood

HIGH NOON

USA, 1952

Director: Fred Zinnemann

Production: Stanley Kramer Productions; black and white, 35mm; running time: 84 minutes. Released 1952 by United Artists.

Producer: Stanley Kramer; screenplay: Carl Foreman, from the story "The Tin Star" by John W. Cunningham; photography: Floyd Crosby; editors: Elmo Williams and Harry Gerstad; sound: James Speak; art director: Rudolph Sternad; music: Dmitri Tiomkin; song: "High Noon" by Dmitri Tiomkin and Ned Washington, sung by Tex Ritter.

Cast: Gary Cooper (Will Kane); Thomas Mitchell (Jonas Henderson); Lloyd Bridges (Harvey Pell); Katy Jurado (Helen Ramirez); Grace Kelly (Amy Kane); Otto Kruger (Percy Mettrick); Ian MacDonald (Frank Miller); Lon Chaney (Martin Howe); Harry Morgan (Sam Fuller); Eve McVeagh (Mildred Fuller); Harry Shannon (Cooper); Lee Van Cleef (Jack Colby); Bob Wilke (James Pierce); Sheb Wooley (Ben Miller); Tom London (Sam); Ted Stanhope (Station master); Larry Blake (Gillis); William Phillips (Barber); Jeanne Blackford (Mrs. Henderson); James Millican (Baker); Jack Elam (Charlie).

Awards: Oscar for Best Actor (Cooper), Best Film Editing, Best Scoring of a Dramatic or Comedy Picture, and Best Song, 1952; New York Film Critics' Awards for Best Motion Picture and Best Direction, 1952.

*High NoonPublications

Script:

Foreman, Carl, High Noon, in Three Major Screenplays, edited by Malvin Ward and Michael Werner, New York, 1973.

Books:

- Griffith, Richard, Fred Zinnemann, New York, 1958.
 Fenin, George N., The Western: From Silents to Cinerama, New York, 1962.
 Gehman, Richard, The Tall American: The Story of Gary Cooper, New York, 1963.
 Dickens, Homer, The Films of Gary Cooper, New York, 1970.
 Jordan, Rene, Gary Cooper, New York, 1974.
 Nachbar, Jack, editor, Focus on the Western, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1974.
 Wright, Will, Sixguns and Society: A Structural Study of the Western, Berkeley, 1975.
 Parish, James Robert, and Michael Pitts, editors, The Great Western Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1976.
 French, Philip, Westerns, New York, 1977.
 Arle, Hecton, Gary Cooper: An Intimate Biography, New York, 1979.
 Kaminsky, Stuart M., Coop: The Life and Legend of Gary Cooper, New York, 1980.
 Swindell, Larry, The Last Hero: A Biography of Gary Cooper, New York, 1980.

- Chardair, N., Gary Cooper, Paris, 1981.
 Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
 Rausa, Giuseppe, Fred Zinnemann, Florence, 1985.
 Goldau, Antje, and others, Zinnemann, Munich, 1986.
 Buscombe, Ed, BFI Companion to the Western, London, 1988.
 Zinnemann, Fred, My Life in the Movies, New York, 1992.
 Drummond, Phillip, High Noon, London, 1997.
 Meyers, Jeffrey, Gary Cooper: An American Hero, New York, 1998.
 Nolletti, Arthur, Jr., The Films of Fred Zinnemann, Albany, 1999.

Articles:

- Films in Review* (New York), May 1952.
 Zinnemann, Fred, "Choreography of a Gunfight," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1952.
 Burton, Howard, "High Noon: Everyman Rides Again," in Quarterly of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Fall 1953.
 Warshow, Robert, "Movie Chronicle: The Westerner," in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), March 1954.
 Schein, Harry, "The Olympian Cowboy," in American Scholar (Washington, D.C.), Summer 1955.
 Houston, Penelope, and Kenneth Cavender, "Interview with Carl Foreman," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1958.
 Clarens, Carlos, "Gary Cooper," in Films in Review (New York), December 1959.
 Zinnemann, Fred, "A Conflict of Interest," in Films and Filming (London), December 1959.
 Fenin, George, "Son of Uncle Sam," in Films and Filming (London), October 1962.
 Reid, John Howard, "A Man for All Movies," in Films and Filming (London), May and June 1967.
 Barsness, John A., "A Question of Standard," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1967.
 Folsom, James, "Westerns as Social and Political Alternatives," in Western American Literature (Logan, Utah), Fall 1967.
 Allombert, P., "Le Train sifflera trois fois," in Image et Son (Paris), no. 269, 1973.
 Interview with Carl Foreman, in American Film (Washington, D.C.), April 1974.
 Giannetti, Louis, "Fred Zinnemann's High Noon," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Winter 1976–77.
 Bodeen, DeWitt, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Alfredsson, K., "Sheriffen," in Filmrutan (Stockholm), 1983.
 Palmer, R. B., "A Masculinist Reading of Two Western Films, High Noon and Rio Grande," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Winter 1984–85.
 Bergan, Ronald, in Films and Filming (London), May 1986.
 Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1986.
 McReynolds, D. J., "Taking Care of Things: Evolution in the Treatment of a Western Theme," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1990.
 Rapf, J. E., "Myth, Ideology, and Feminism in High Noon," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), no. 4, 1990.
 Ronnberg, M., "Pliktgubbe moter rattsfajter," in Filmhafset (Uppsala, Sweden), May 1990.
 Comuzio, E., "Tempo reale e tempo iconico allo scoccare del Messogiorno di fuoco," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), January-February 1992.

- Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 13, 1994.
- Foster, Gwendolyn Audrey, "The Women in High Noon: a Metanarrative of Difference," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 18–19, no. 3–1, Spring 1994.
- Prince, Stephen, "Historical Perspectives and the Realist Aesthetic in High Noon," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 18–19, no. 3–1, Spring 1994.
- Zinnemann, F., "Letter from Fred Zinnemann," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 19, no. 2, 1994/1995.
- Prince, S., "Steven Prince Replies," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 19, no. 2, 1994/1995.
- Short Review, in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 179, July-August 1995.
- Caparros-Lera, J.M., "Cinematic Contextual History of High Noon," in Film-Historia (Barcelona), vol. 6, no. 1, 1996.
- Boon, Kevin A., "Scripting Gender: Writing Differences," in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), vol. 4, no. 1, Spring 1997.
- Orme, A., "The Impossibility of Inscribing Meaning: Interdeterminacy and the Interpretive Act in High Noon and John Cunningham's The Tin Star," in Michigan Academician, vol. 29, no. 3, 1997.
- Lefebvre, J., "High Noon: le western devient majeur," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), no. 86, 1998.
- Petit, O., "Sherif et marshal garants de l'ordre social," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), no. 86, 1998.

* * *

High Noon was responsible for setting the career of Gary Cooper moving again and is considered by many the single most important film in his career. However, no one knew or thought the film was destined for big things when it was first conceived.

Cooper was not producer Stanley Kramer's first choice to play Marshal Will Kane. In fact, he was fairly far down the list below Marlon Brando and Montgomery Clift. Charlton Heston was also offered the role. The chief financial backer of the film, however, a Salinas lettuce tycoon, wanted Cooper. The backer threatened to pull his money out and Kramer couldn't change his mind about using Cooper, so the script had been sent to Coop. Later Cooper said he took the film, even though he was ill and emotionally troubled, because it represented what his father had taught him, that law enforcement was everyone's job.

In an interview, Fred Zinnemann gave his recollections of Cooper and High Noon: "His recurring hip problem bothered him on one or two occasions. It made it difficult for him to do the fight with Lloyd Bridges, but it didn't stop him from working very hard and very long hours under some trying conditions. If I remember correctly, we made the entire film in 31 shooting days. Not once were we delayed or held up by him for whatever reason. For most of the time he had seemed in good health, and it was only two or three months after shooting had been completed that he became ill.

"He did in fact look quite haggard and drawn, which was exactly what I wanted for the character, even though this was in contrast to the unwritten law, then still in force, that the leading man must always look dashing and romantic. If I remember correctly, we used a minimum of makeup for Coop, which was perhaps a bit of a novelty in those days.

"Cooper seemed absolutely right for the part. It seemed completely natural for him to be superimposed on Will Kane."

According to Zinnemann, High Noon "is the one picture I directed which more than any other was a team effort. There was a marvelous script by Carl Foreman, a brilliant job of cutting by Elmo Williams, an inspired musical score by Dimitri Tiomkin, a solid contribution by Stanley Kramer. And Gary Cooper was the personification of the honor-bound man. He was in himself a very noble figure, very humble at the same time, and very inarticulate. And very unaware of himself." (Interestingly, in a 1979 interview in American Film, Carl Foreman claimed that he and Zinnemann had made the film apart from the Kramer company. According to Foreman, "neither Kramer nor anyone around him had any use for the film from the beginning.")

In the film, Coop's first line is the same as the first line he had ever uttered in a film back in 1928 in Shopworn Angel—"I do." Kane is marrying Amy on a Sunday morning. It is just past 10:30 when the tale begins, and it ends a few minutes after noon. The length of the story and the length of the film almost coincide. The film is filled with reminders of the passing time, time that brings Marshal Kane closer to having to face Frank Miller when he gets off the noon train in Hadleyville and seeks revenge against Kane, who sent him to prison. Clocks in the background show the time and tick ominously. People refer to meetings in five minutes. One by one the people whom Kane assumes he can count on in the battle against Miller and his gang find reasons or excuses to stay out of the coming fight. Only the town drunk comes forth, but Kane turns him down, realizing he is more of a liability than an asset.

At one point Kane, alone in his office, puts his head down on his desk, possibly to weep, and then wearily pulls himself up again. In the final confrontation with Miller and his gang, Kane does stand alone until the last moment, when Amy saves his life by shooting Frank Miller. Kane then throws down his badge in a sign of contempt for the town and rides out with his bride.

For his performance in High Noon, Cooper won his second Academy Award. Yet it is a performance in which he does less with the character than he had done with almost any of his major roles before. His walk is stiff and pained. His arms remain at his sides through most of the film. He hasn't a single extended speech. What audiences apparently responded to was the look that Zinnemann had captured and that Cooper, with years of experience, had played on. They also responded to the simple story of a man who is not supported by his community in a time of mortal crisis and who triumphs alone through courage and determination.

Will Kane and Gary Cooper were tired, sick men of 51. Cooper's performance is basically put together in relatively short takes and scenes. This was exactly what Zinnemann wanted and what he got, and it was interpreted by a public that loved Cooper as a supreme performance.

Cooper later said that when High Noon was finished, he was "acted out," and that pained weariness is exactly what is seen on the screen. Perhaps for the first time, he had truly become the character he portrayed, for Gary Cooper and Will Kane were the same persona. Kane's pain came from fear and his betrayal by others. Cooper's was a result of illness and domestic and career worries.

As he got older, Cooper tended more and more to be concerned about the West and its portrayal and tended to be disturbed by the lack of historical authenticity in western films. Since his own career as a western star had helped to reinforce the myth of the American fictional West rather than a re-creation of historical data, it is ironic that Cooper should turn to that position.

High Noon is indeed not a tale about the true West, but like so many westerns a presentation of contemporary ideas in the most durable popular genre, the western. In a sense, the myths of the West—and Cooper as an actor is one of them—are as culturally important as what actually transpired on the frontier a century ago.

Will Kane tells us more about how we view our history and myths than any real data we might find out about Wild Bill Hickok, Billy the Kid or Buffalo Bill. Cooper's career as a western figure lasted 35 years, as long, in fact as the time between the end of the Civil War and the start of the twentieth century, as long as the historical time of the real West.

—Stuart M. Kaminsky

HIGH SIERRA

USA, 1941

Director: Raoul Walsh

Production: Warner Bros.; black and white; running time: 100 minutes; length: 8,964 feet. Released January 1941.

Executive producer: Hal B. Wallis; associate producer: Mark Hellinger; screenplay: John Huston and W. R. Burnett, from a novel by Burnett; assistant director: Russ Saunders; dialogue director: Irving Rapper; photography: Tony Gaudio; editor: Jack Killifer; sound: Dolph Thomas; art director: Ted Smith; music: Adolph Deutsch; special effects: Bryon Haskin, H. F. Koenekamp.

Cast: Humphrey Bogart (Roy Earle); Ida Lupino (Marie); Alan Curtis (Babe); Arthur Kennedy (Red); Joan Leslie (Velma); Henry Hull (Doc Banton); Henry Travers (Pa); Jerome Cowan (Healy); Minna Gombell (Mrs. Baughman); Barton MacLane (Jake Kranmer); Elizabeth Risdon (Ma); Cornel Wilde (Louis Mendoza); Donald McBride (Big Mac); Paul Harvey (Mr. Baughman); Isabel Jewell (Blonde); Willie Best (Algernon); Spencer Charters (Ed); George Meeker (Pfiffer); Robert Strange (Art); John Eldredge (Lon Preiser); Zero the dog (Pard).

Publications

Script:

Huston, John, and W.R. Burnett, High Sierra, edited by Douglas Gomery, Madison, Wisconsin, 1979.

Books:

McCarty, Clifford, Bogey: The Films of Humphrey Bogart, New York, 1965.

Michael, Paul, Humphrey Bogart: The Man and His Films, Indianapolis, 1965.

Marmin, Michel, Raoul Walsh, Paris, 1970.

Canham, Kingsley, The Hollywood Professionals, New York, 1973.

Hardy, Phil, editor, Raoul Walsh, Colchester, Essex, 1974.

Walsh, Raoul, Each Man in His Time, New York, 1974.

Benchley, Nathaniel, Humphrey Bogart, Boston, 1975.

Eyles, Allen, Bogart, New York, 1975.

Shadoian, Jack, Dreams and Dead Ends, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1977.

Pettigrew, Terence, Bogart: A Definitive Study of his Film Career, London, 1981.

Comuzio, Ermanno, Raoul Walsh, Florence, 1982.

Winkler, Willi, Humphrey Bogart und Hollywoods Schwarze Serie, Munich, 1985.

Giuliani, Pierre, Raoul Walsh, Paris, 1986.

Fuchs, Wolfgang J., Humphrey Bogart: Cult-Star: A Documentation, Berlin, 1987.

Coe, Jonathan, Humphrey Bogart: Take It & Like It, New York, 1991.

Bogart, Stephen H., and Gary Provost, Bogart: In Search of My Father, New York, 1995.

Schlesinger, Judith, Bogie: A Life in Pictures, New York, 1998.

Sperber, A.M., Bogart, New York, 1998.

Cunningham, Ernest W., Ultimate Bogie, Los Angeles, 1999.

Duchovnay, Gerald, Humphrey Bogart: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1999.

Meyers, Jeffery, Bogart: A Life in Hollywood, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 22 January 1941.

Motion Picture Herald (New York), 25 January 1941.

New York Times, 25 January 1941.

Cinema (Beverly Hills), 28 May 1941.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1941.

Times (London), 4 August 1941.

Whitebait, William, in New Statesman (London), 9 August 1941.

Vermilye, J., "Ida Lupino," in Films in Review (New York), May 1959.

Dienstfrey, Harris, "Hitch Your Genre to a Star," in Film Culture (New York), Fall 1964.

Huston, John, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1965.

Burnett, W. R., in Toronto Film Society Notes, 14 February 1966.

Alley, Kenneth D., "High Sierra: Swansong for an Era," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), vol. 5, no. 3–4, 1976.

Simons, John L., "Henry on Bogie: Reality and Romance in Dream Song No. 9 and High Sierra," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1977.

Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Mate, Ken, and Patrick McGilligan, interview with W. R. Burnett, in Film Comment (New York), January–February 1983.

Marling, W., "On the Relation Between American Roman Noir and Film Noir," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1991.

Marling, W., "On the Relation Between American Roman Noir and Film Noir," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 21, no. 3, 1993.

Howard, T., in Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 15, 1995.

* * *

Jean-Luc Godard canonizes High Sierra at the end of Breathless when he mimes the orphic structure of Raoul Walsh's action melodrama. Walsh depicts an army of police chasing his hero up Mount Whitney, enlisting a sniper to shoot him in the back and send him plummeting down the slope. His body is mourned by a girlfriend, Marie (Ida Lupino), and a cynical bystander, a news reporter named Healy, amidst a chorus of troopers. Godard flattens the hubris that Walsh obtains from a mix of Shakespeare, Greek tragedy, and film noir by having his two adolescents "play" at the fear and terror evinced in High Sierra. If Godard's first feature figures at a threshold between two eras of film, it suggests why Walsh's feature owns a central place in the history of cinema.

High Sierra

On the one hand, the film concretizes elements common both to Walsh as an auteur and to the Hollywood industry in general. Destined to die, an ordinary figure is caught in a skein of tragic forces woven in the later years of the Depression. The protagonist figures as a hero set in a world that has lost its legends, but he is ultimately a pawn in a plot of magnitude beyond his ken. Following Warner Brothers' affiliations with the New Deal, the film shows a world of humans caught in social contradiction. Fate is cast, the film implies, either by gods of nature, the failure of capitalism, or a highly corrupt government. In a montage following the credits that scroll upwards to the majestic sky over Mount Whitney, the initial dissolves suggest that an unnamed state official—ostensibly a governor—has Roy Earle (Humphrey Bogart, whose name bears resemblance to “King Lear,” a figure too late for his milieu, and to a sign of energy, or “oil,” the hidden term of the film) sprung from prison in order to engineer a holdup at Palm Springs. Between the narrative and the visual design the plot is staged to show how profit can be gained when common news items are inflated into national media events. The “real” story does not entail the holdup at the Tropico hotel in Palm Springs but, as Godard intuited, at the end of High Sierra itself: when Earle is pursued up the mountain, a limelight is projected onto its rocky curtain. A radiocaster hypes the silence of the landscape into a drama that inculcates all viewers and listeners as agents of a crime, like the film, collectively contrived.

On the other hand, High Sierra makes obvious its own mechanism of illusion. The image-track effectively theorizes the tenets of the narration. When the squadron of police cars and motorcycles pursues Earle up the winding road, a panoramic shot of 720° encircles the steeplechase. Poised at the opening of the angle of a hairpin turn, the camera follows Earle's coupe, pans around and down to catch the oncoming motorcade, and continues its career. It thus spots its presence in the film as the origin of the narrative “destiny.” Elsewhere it portrays the hero incriminating the spectator with his brutally frontal stare. Facing the windshield of his car, the camera registers Bogart's looking directly at the viewer, almost in defiance of the laws of obliquity that hold in films of the period. Ocularity becomes so pervasive that all illusion of narrative space and time is flattened: Earle stares us down as he looks ahead and into the space moving away in the rearview mirror. The depth of field contains elements that utterly flatten it. Optical stratagems kill the hero. Before he is ambushed Earle appears as a speck on a landscape that has lost all cardinal bearings. And earlier, quick dissolves superimpose characters over writing of vitrines and billboards so as to show how fate legibly casts its spell over the characters and narrative alike.

These objects locate where Walsh's signature is written into the film. Through car mirrors, headlights, monocular forms (an eight-ball, a ring, the circular marquee heralding the Circle Auto Court), and bar-like shadows cast over the frame, tragedy is rendered both deep and matte. Forms arch back to the director's own history of enucleation. In High Sierra, however, it is seen as symbolic castration that literally produces the viewing "subject," the spectator whose vision is skewed and access to nature denied. In a sequence located in neither W.R. Burnett's novel that inspired the film nor John Huston's screenplay, a volley of shots catches a jackrabbit crossing the highway on the western mesa just as Earle overtakes a jalopy sputtering westward. The animal darts across the road, the two cars swerve and almost collide. Although the near-miss primes the fate of the narrative, inner allusion is made to an event that deprived Walsh of his right eye in 1928: when he was driving from the site of In Old Arizona, a hare jumped in front of his vehicle and struck its windshield, smashing the glass and lodging a splinter in his right eye. The traumatic instant of his own enucleation is tipped into High Sierra as if to draw attention to a simultaneous play of monocular and binocular views, or of coextensive flatness and deep focus, that Walsh uses, along with Renoir, Ford, and Welles, to theorize the visibility of cinema in general. Staged carefully in this film, the event recurs often throughout his oeuvre (in The Cockeyed World, They Drive by Night, Colorado Territory, a western remake of High Sierra, Pursued, White Heat, and so on), but in High Sierra it is turned toward broad questions entailing the ideology of Hollywood cinema. Out of the same visual trauma come elements of film noir and, of course, much of the speculations of New Wave theoreticians.

High Sierra shows that Raoul Walsh is far from the simple "action director" of fast-paced films of keen craft and slight content. Close viewing reveals a wealth of transfilmic themes and obsessions that mark an output of over 120 films (his longevity and productivity making him a Victor Hugo of American cinema), but also the strategies of Hollywood and their transformations from the silent period to the 1960s. The film is a complex study of visibility concealed in what it is: a timelessly captivating, fast-paced, action melodrama.

—Tom Conley

DER HIMMEL ÜBER BERLIN

(Wings of Desire)

Germany, 1987

Director: Wim Wenders

Production: Road Movies (Berlin), Argos Films (Paris), Westdeutscher Rundfunk (Köln); black-and-white and color (Kodak), 35mm; running time: 130 minutes. Released 18 May 1987. Filmed on location in Berlin. Cost: $3–3.5 million.

Producers: Wim Wenders, Anatole Dauman; executive producer: Ingrid Windisch; screenplay: Wim Wenders, Peter Handke; photography: Henri Alekan; assistant director: Claire Denis; editor: Peter Przygodda; sound: Jean-Paul Mugel, Axel Arft; art director: Heidi Lüdi; costume designer: Monika Jacobs; music: Jürgen Knieper, Laurent Petitgand (circus music), Nick Cave and the Bad Seeds (songs).

Cast: Bruno Ganz (Damiel); Solveig Dommartin (Marion); Otto Sander (Cassiel); Curt Bois (Homer); Peter Falk (himself); Nick Cave and the Bad Seeds (themselves); Lajos Kovacs (Marion's acrobatics coach).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival Award for Best Director, 1987; Bavarian Film Award for Best Director, 1988; German Film Awards for Outstanding Feature Film and Best Cinematography, 1988; European Film Awards for Best Director and Best Supporting Actor (Bois), 1988; National Society of Film Critics Award for Best Cinematography, 1988; New York Film Critics Circle Award for Best Cinematography, 1988; Los Angeles Film Critics Association Award for Best Foreign Film and Best Cinematography, 1988; Sao Paulo International Film Festival Audience Award for Best Feature, 1988; Independent Spirit Award for Best Foreign Film, 1989.

Publications

Script:

Wenders, Wim, and Peter Handke, Der Himmel über Berlin, ein Filmbuch, Frankfurt, 1987.

Books:

Kolker, Robert Phillip, and Peter Beicken, Wim Wenders: Cinema as Vision and Desire, Cambridge, 1993.

Morgues, Nicole de, Les ailes du désir, Der Himmel über Berlin: étude du film de Wim Wenders, Linnebonne, 1998.

Articles:

Jaehne, Karen, "Angel Eyes: Wenders Soars," in Film Comment (New York), June 1988.

Paneth, Ira, "Wim and His Wings," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1988.

Fusco, Coco, "Angels, History and Poetic Fantasy: An Interview with Wim Wenders," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 16, no. 4, 1988.

Helmetag, Charles H., "Of Men and Angels: Literary Allusions in Wim Wenders' Wings of Desire," in Film/Literature Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 18, no. 4, 1990.

Hooks, Bell, "Representing Whiteness: Seeing Wings of Desire," in Yearning: Race, Gender, and Cultural Politics, Boston, 1990.

Cook, Roger F., "Angels, Fiction and History in Berlin: Wim Wenders' Wings of Desire (1991)," in The Cinema of Wim Wenders: Image, Narrative, and the Postmodern Condition, by Cook and Gerd Gemunden, Detroit, 1997.

Ehrlich, Linda, "Meditations on Wim Wenders' Wings of Desire," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury) vol. 19, no. 4, 1991.

Der Himmel Über Berlin

Caldwell, David, and Paul W. Rea, "Handke's and Wenders' Wings of Desire: Transcending Postmodernism," in German Quarterly (Philadelphia) vol. 64, no. 1, 1991.

Caltvedt, Les, "Berlin Poetry: Archaic Cultural Patterns in Wenders' Wings of Desire," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 20, no. 2, 1992.

* * *

On one level, Wings of Desire's plot outline could be seen as the purest Hollywood-style claptrap: an angel falls in love with a mortal woman—a trapeze artist, no less!—and trades in his wings to be with her. On another level, it may be taken as a meditation on themes that have preoccupied German literature since before the age of Goethe: oppositions of spirit and matter, eternity and time, the abstract and the concrete. Of course, the film gloriously refuses to exist on merely one level, or address itself to one kind of culture—it prefers to have Rilke's angels from the Duino Elegies hobnob with TV's Columbo. The film could be called perfectly postmodern, except that its meanings are not all scattered on a glittering surface; rather, like a number of the great modernist works, starting with Joyce's Ulysses,

Wings of Desire is a rich amalgam of high and low culture. Wim Wenders has pointed out that the pun in his German title (Himmel means both sky or heavens and Heaven) is untranslatable into English, besides the problem that "The Sky Over Berlin sounded like a war movie and Heavens Over Berlin was too romantic." On the other hand, "desire" (French désir) does not, according to Wenders, translate properly into German, so he sees both titles as valid.

Whichever title one uses, the film is certainly—on one level, one must keep adding—about Berlin itself as much as anything else. Indeed, the film now serves as a document of those last years before the Wall came down, when Potsdamer Platz was still a no-man's-land of the most forlorn bleakness, yet graffiti on the Western side of the Wall was making political/aesthetic statements of protest and renewal. One can imagine Wenders spinning his fantasy plot outward from the monuments of Berlin itself: the winged Victory Column inspiring the angels and their lofty perspective; the Wall suggesting every sort of division between humans (one of the characters complains that nowadays everybody needs a password or a toll payment to talk to another person); a modernistic library building—austere and yet somehow spiritual and grandly calming—serving as a suitable hangout for the angels, who love to accumulate knowledge; Potsdamer

Platz and other empty spaces representing the memory erasures and feelings of desolation of postwar German life (though even these spaces can be enlivened by a circus or a mural!); and in opposition to the Wall and the vacant lots, the ubiquitous coffee-and-sandwich stands, which bring people (and angels) casually together.

Berlin's dark Nazi past is evoked both through intercuts of newsreel footage and through the subplot of a movie being shot that uses the fall of Berlin as the backdrop for a detective story starring Peter Falk. (The set featuring a half-bombed building is truly Piranesian in its shadowy depths, though these scenes of the film, showing Nazi horrors made grist for the entertainment mill, also tell us something about the endless self-replications of the postmodern 1980s.) Wenders' Berlin is also an international city: many languages are heard briefly in the course of the film, and two of the major characters, Falk and Marion, speak (and are heard thinking) in English and French respectively. To be sure, a viewer might perceive the entire film not as about Berlin but the other way around, with the city merely providing convenient metaphors for the human condition—but this would ignore the film's rich specificity.

As for what Wenders means by "desire," one must first consider what the angels lack—which means figuring out what they are. These soberly dressed but ponytailed creatures that hover over the city and lean over the shoulders of its citizens are not messengers in the biblical manner, or charioteers to the afterlife as in the ghastly sentimental remake, City of Angels. They are, however, recorders and comforters. They take notes and share stories with one another of lovely, quirky details of humans' lives, or of the natural world in the days before human occupation. (Evidently the angels have inhabited the local terrain since prehistory; only with humankind's arrival have they learned to speak—and laugh.) They do appear to bring moments of peace or inexplicable joy to people in unhappy straits, though they cannot prevent accidents or suicides. Children see them, and are amused, but as in Wordsworth, they lose their intimations of some kind of immortality as they age. Often the angels seem to be an allegory of a certain type of artist, whether poet or painter or filmmaker (Cassiel keeps a notebook; ex-angel Falk is a sketch artist; Wenders' camera and microphone seem endlessly curious): they feel deeply, they love the particulars of everyday life, but they don't make contact, they don't exactly live, they only record. Significantly, they are color blind—a "dimension" is missing. Thus when Damiel falls in love with Marion she is not only an actual woman but the embodiment of life in the flesh, of "becoming" (including changing and dying) rather than pure "being." When he wakes up mortal, he does go looking for her at once, but he is also eager to ask a passerby the names of the colors he now sees decorating the Wall, and to taste his first cup of coffee.

A number of critics have argued that the film falls into a very traditional male—or male filmmaker's—perspective, regardless of whether Marion is a woman, Woman in the abstract, or "earthly delights"; put most simply, the angels and Wenders' camera are voyeurs, most obviously when Damiel watches Marion undress in her room. However, it is important to note that Damiel wants not merely to watch—or to dominate/possess through seeing—but to make contact with Marion, to communicate. Later, when he and Marion finally meet, is it she who finds him—his back is to the camera as she approaches him—and she who does the talking in a rather remarkable and lengthy speech. Kolker and Beicken's book on Wenders claims that the director and his co-writer Peter Handke reclaim male dominance at the point when Marion tells Damiel the choice is now his (they also find her speech leaning toward fascism when she proposes conceiving what they call a "master race" with him). But telling someone he must act is not the same as relinquishing one's own free will, and the intense close-ups of both characters at the end of the speech suggest a relation of equality.

One must say too about Marion's speech that however serious it may look in script form, it is so extravagant (especially compared to most bar pickup lines), and its very first words—"Now it's time to get serious"—are so bold and spoken with such quiet amusement by Solveig Dommartin, that it is outrageously romantic and droll at the same time. Indeed, the entire film has an essential component of whimsy, even outright comedy, which is often overlooked by critics. One finds it in the almost goofy earnestness of Bruno Ganz's Damiel, and in the casting of Peter Falk as an ex-angel. (Falk's down-to-earth geniality—though he also has a serious awareness of Berlin's past—casts a kind of spell over much of the picture.) There is whimsy too in the very idea of an angel falling in love with—and literally looking up to—a trapeze artist who even wears little wings as part of her act. (Early in the film, when a stagehand makes a joke to Marion about "an angel passing by," he is just alluding to her wings, but the invisible Damiel is comically thunderstruck.) And let us not forget that these angels who often seem on the verge of quoting Rilke are also quite serious fans of punk rocker Nick Cave and the Bad Seeds. Though far from making a joke of his whole proceedings, Wenders does undercut his own (or perhaps Handke's) tendency toward solemnity again and again. When Damiel talks with Cassiel about his frustration with his own "spiritual existence"—as they sit in a BMW convertible in a showroom!—he speaks abstractly about wanting "now" instead of "forever," but concludes that "it would be quite something to come home after a long day, like Philip Marlowe, and feed the cat." When he actually becomes human—falling asleep and gently placed by Cassiel on the West side of the Wall, a moment echoing Wagner's The Valkyrie, when the newly mortal, formerly winged-helmeted Brunnhilde is laid to rest by Wotan—he is rudely awakened by his angel's armor crashing down upon him. But most purely hilarious is the inexpressibly weird jacket he trades his armor for. Finally, turning from drollery to a child's delight, one must consider the circus setting in itself. Circuses are by no means always amusing in movies, and American viewers should keep in mind that in much European art the acrobat is not a frivolous, "flighty" person but a richly poetic figure; but Wenders does stress the pleasure children take in the whole show, while seeming himself as fascinated by Marion's act (shown to us at great, even self-indulgent length) as they or Damiel.

For all its leanings toward abstraction and symbol, and its moods of deep seriousness, Wings of Desire is not only surprisingly light-hearted, and hopeful about love relationships (Wenders' previous Paris, Texas had shown some hesitant moves in that direction), but consistently sensuous in image and sound. Much admiration has been expressed for the cinematography of Henri Alekan, whose camera does its own swooping and calm gliding, even when not directly implying an angel's point-of-view. The film has a wonderful sense of light even in shots of the most ordinary city streets, and Wenders never sinks to the spiderwebs-glistening-with-dewdrops clichés of some other filmmakers when conveying the beauty of the everyday. The switch from black and white to color when Damiel loses his wings may be a trick Wenders learned from The Wizard of Oz and another angel movie, the Powell/Pressburger A Matter of Life and Death, but it is not a simple gimmick, for he uses color shots earlier in the film to cue us in that there are other ways of seeing besides the angels', and he will continue to render Cassiel's scenes in black and white. As for the sound design of Wings of Desire, it is in many ways as brilliant as the images, and unusually complex in its weaving of voiceovers of people's thoughts with an ongoing poem of Handke that speaks of "When the child was a child." and with music ranging from the somber strings of Jürgen Knieper's soundtrack to the live circus music and the hypnotic performances of Nick Cave.

Wings of Desire inspired a 1997 American remake, which has some fine images of angels on the rooftops and beaches of Los Angeles but is leaden in almost every other respect. (The profession of acrobat not deemed "serious" enough, Marion becomes a brain surgeon, and dies in an accident, while much of the film is occupied with debate over believing in the supernatural—an issue not of the least concern in Wenders' film.) Wenders himself made a sequel in 1993, Faraway, So Close, in which Cassiel too becomes mortal and a number of new characters are introduced, including an allegorical figure of Time. Though filled with moments of great interest, the relatively baroque plot and the repeating of some familiar material make the sequel seem less fresh, less beautifully clear in its outline, than the original. Sad and funny, conceptual and sensuous, densely complex and as airily simple as a child's storybook, Wings of Desire is a remarkably balanced achievement and a landmark in German cinema.

—Joseph Milicia

HIROSHIMA MON AMOUR

France-Japan, 1959

Director: Alain Resnais

Production: Argos Films-Como Films (Paris), Pathé Overseas, and Daiei (Tokyo); 1959; black and white, 35mm; running time: 91 minutes, some sources list 88 minutes. Released June 1959. Filmed September-December 1958 in film studios in Tokyo and Paris, and on location in Hiroshima and Nevers.

Producers: Sacha Kamenka, Shirakawa Takeo, and Samy Halfon; screenplay: Marguerite Duras; photography: Sacha Vierny and Michio Takahashi; editors: Henri Colpi, Jasmine Chasney, and Anne Sarraute; sound: Pierre Calvet and Yamamoto, and Rene Renault; art directors: Esaka, Mayo, and Petri; music: Giovanni Fusco and Georges Delerue; costume designer: Gérard Collety; literary adviser: Gerard Jarlot.

Cast: Emmanuelle Riva (She); Eiji Okada (He); Bernard Fresson (The German); Stella Dassas (The Mother); Pierre Barbaud (The Father).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, International Critics' Award and Film Writers' Award, 1959; New York Film Critics' Award, Best Foreign Film, 1960.

Publications

Script:

Duras, Marguerite, Hiroshima mon amour, Paris, 1959; translated as Hiroshima, Mon Amour, New York, 1961; London, 1966.

Books:

Cordier, Stéphane, Alain Resnais; ou, La Création au cinéma, Paris, 1961.

Pingaud, Bernard, Alain Resnais, Lyons, 1961.

Bounoure, Gaston, Alain Resnais, Paris, 1962.

Ravar, Raymond, editor, Tu n'as rien vu à Hiroshima, Brussels, 1962.

Cowie, Peter, Antonioni, Bergman, Resnais, London, 1963.

Armes, Roy, The Cinema of Alain Resnais, London, 1968.

Ward, John, Alain Resnais; or, The Theme of Time, New York, 1968.

MacDonald, Dwight, On Movies, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1969.

Bertetto, Paolo, Alain Resnais, Italy, 1976.

Kreidl, John Francis, Alain Resnais, Boston, 1977.

Monaco, James, Alain Resnais: The Role of Imagination, New York, 1978.

Benayoun, Robert, Alain Resnais: Arpenteur de l'imaginaire, Paris, 1980; revised edition, 1986.

Sweet, Freddy, The Film Narratives of Alain Resnais, Ann Arbor, 1981.

Trastulli, Daniela, Della parola all'immagine: Viaggio nel cinema di Marguerite Duras, Geneva, 1982.

Etzkowitz, Janice, Toward a Concept of Cinematic Literature: An Analysis of "Hiroshima Mon Amour," New York, 1983.

Vergerio, Falvio, I film di Alain Resnais, Rome, 1984.

Borgomano, Madeleine, L'écriture filmique de Marguerite Duras, Paris, 1985.

Brossard, Jean-Pierre, editor, Marguerite Duras: Cinéaste, écrivain, La Chaux-de-Fonde, 1985.

Guers-Villate, Yvonne, Continuité/discontinuité de l'oeuvre Durassienne, Brussels, 1985.

Fernandes, Marie-Pierre, Travailler avec Duras: La Musica deuxième, Paris, 1986.

Roob, Jean-Daniel, Alain Resnais: Qui êtes-vous?, Lyons, 1986.

Riambau, Esteve, La ciencia y la ficción: El cine de Alain Resnais, Barcelona, 1988.

Guillaume, Catherine, Trahir la passion: des égarements passionnels aux égards du traitement, Paris, 1992.

Bersani, Leo, and Ulysse Dutoit, Arts of Impoverishment: Beckett, Rothko, Resnais, Cambridge, 1994.

Articles:

"Hiroshima mon amour, film scandaleux?," in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 14 May 1959.

Sadoul, Georges, "Un Grand Film, un grand homme," in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 14 May 1959.

Delahaye, Michel, interview with Alain Resnais, in Cinéma (Paris), July 1959.

Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July 1959.

Marcorelles, Louis, Henri Colpi, and Richard Roud, "Alain Resnais and Hiroshima, Mon Amour," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1959–60.

Colpi, Henri, "Editing Hiroshima, Mon Amour," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1959–60.

Hiroshima mon amour

- Roud, Richard, "Conversations with Marguerite Duras," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1959–60.
- Colpi, Henri, "Musique d'Hiroshima," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1960.
- Egly, Max, interview with Alain Resnais, in Image et Son (Paris), February 1960.
- Burch, Noël, "A Conversation with Alain Resnais," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1960.
- Weiler, A. H., in New York Times, 17 May 1960.
- Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), 25 May 1960.
- Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), June-July 1960.
- Alexander, A. J., in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1961.
- Labarther, Andre, and Jacques Rivette, interview with Alain Resnais, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1961.
- Hart, Henry, in Village Voice (New York), 4 October 1961.
- Kael, Pauline, "Fantasies of the Art House Audience," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1961–62.
- Durnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), May 1962.
- Stanbrook, Alan, "The Time and Space of Alain Resnais," in Films and Filming (London), January 1964.
- Le Troquer, J., in Téléciné (Paris), February 1973.
- Pór, P., in Filmkultura (Budapest), March-April 1973.
- Hanet, K., "Does the Camera Lie? Notes on Hiroshima, Mon Amour," in Screen (London), Autumn 1973.
- Helman, A., in Kino (Warsaw), September 1974.
- Van Wert, W. F., "Point Counterpoint in Hiroshima, Mon Amour," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 2, 1978.
- Mercken-Spaas, C., "Destruction and Reconstruction in Hiroshima, Mon Amour," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1980.
- Boer, L., in Skoop (Amsterdam), December-January 1980–81.
- Glassman, D., "The Feminine Subject as History Writer in Hiroshima, Mon Amour," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Spring 1981.
- Cardullo, B., "The Symbolism of Hiroshima mon amour," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Winter 1984.
- Moses, John W., "Vision Denied in Night and Fog and Hiroshima, Mon Amour," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 15, no. 3, 1987.
- Astala, E., "Hiroshima, rakastettumme," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 1, 1990.
- Della Casa, S., "Amnesia land: il cinema del dimenticare," in Ikon (Milan), October 1990.

- Lane, N., "The Subject In/Of History: Hiroshima, mon amour," in Florida State University Conference on Literature and Film, vol. 15, 1990.
- Grange, M.-F., "Paysage resnaisien ou variations autour de la mise en espace du temps," in Cinemas, vol. 5, no. 1/2, 1994.
- Samson, P., "Le montage comme articulation entre reel et fiction," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), vol. 72, no. 3, 1994.
- O'Connell, Vincent, "The Human Heart," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 6, no. 3, March 1996.
- Michiels, Dirk, "Onuitwisbaar oorlogsstigma," in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 462, May 1996.

* * *

Hiroshima mon amour was the first feature directed by Alain Resnais. Besides establishing the director's international reputation, the film was one of several released in 1959 signalling the emergence of a new generation of French filmmakers working in a modernist narrative vein. Indeed, the film is considered something of a landmark in the history of modernist cinema. The film is also seen as an exemplary instance of artistic collaboration. The scenario by Marguerite Duras, photography of Sacha Vierny, editing of Henri Colpi, and musical score by Giovanni Fusco and Georges Delerue contribute to its dense patterns of repetition and counterpoint.

In the film, an initially casual romantic encounter between a Japanese architect ("He"), and a French actress ("She") working in Hiroshima on a film about peace provides the basis for exploring the nature of memory, experience, and representation. The love affair is important primarily for the chain of memory it triggers, as the woman gradually discloses the story of her first love, a story she has never told before. During World War II, in Nevers, she fell in love with a German soldier. On the day the city was liberated, he was shot and killed. She was subsequently submitted to public disgrace, followed by a period of imprisonment and near-madness in her parents' home. She finally recovered enough to leave home permanently, arriving in Paris on the day the war ended after the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

This story is only revealed in stages, and establishes a complex of metaphoric relations between the past and present. The woman's first memory image is prompted by a direct visual comparison: the twitching hand of her sleeping Japanese lover resembles, and motivates a cut to, the twitching hand of the dying German soldier. This transition is a specific instance of a more complex network of comparisons constructed throughout the course of the film, a concise figure for the film's general pattern of development. A structure of metaphoric logic takes the place of the linear causality, clearly defined goals, and conscious motivation associated with dominant narrative.

For example, the German lover from the past and Japanese lover in the present are comparable as former mutual enemies of France. At the same time, we see the woman victimized in the past for her relations with the German. Her victimization is likened to the victims of the atom bomb seen in the film's opening sequence in a series of images—documentary and reconstructed—depicting the effects of the bomb. These images of destruction and deformity include loss of hair and burnt, distorted skin. Later, we see the woman's head shaved in the public square in Nevers to mark her illicit "collaboration" and her skin broken and bloody as she scrapes it on the walls of her parents' cellar. While the woman is thus "like" the Japanese, a victim of the war's end, she is nevertheless liberated from her private torture, allowed to go free, at the same time the bomb is dropped on Hiroshima.

Through the accumulation of images and narrative information, Hiroshima mon amour provides material for recognizing a complex network of comparison and contrast linking disparate events. As the film progresses, the terms of association become more abstract, a function of formal repetition, as tracking shots through the streets of Hiroshima are intercut with tracking shots through the streets of Nevers. Two places and times converge through the continuity afforded by the camera's point of view. At the same time the relationship between the man and woman in the present is infused with the potency of memory. The Japanese man asks the woman to stay in Hiroshima (not a viable option in any conventional sense, since she has a family in France and his wife is due home from a trip shortly), as she comes to emblemize the inconsolable memory of the past.

Yet her story, once told, transforms the experience and its memory into the order of history. The woman acknowledges this shift in value. She confronts herself in the mirror and addresses her dead lover, announcing her betrayal. At one point, she refers to the event as a "two-penny romance," a common, even trivial affair. This change is a function of narration; having been recounted, the experience has undergone a change in nature. This is one way in which the film explores the nature of representation in relation to experience and memory.

In the course of exploring this issue, Hiroshima mon amour clearly suggests that the mediated account, whether verbal or visual, is qualitatively different from, and supplants, personal experience. The very opening of the film promotes this view, challenging any easy equation of representation and experience. Images of the Hiroshima museum and its repository of documents are accompanied by a woman's voice saying she saw and felt everything in Hiroshima—the heat, the suffering, and so on. Voice and image seem to confirm and validate one another. But a male voice denies her assertions, insisting, "No, you saw nothing." The viewer not only wonders who is speaking, but also is forced to question the woman's certainty, and his own, about the nature of what he is watching. Seeing, in this way, may become misbelieving.

If the woman's narrative of her past displaces the event as pure experience, the initial recounting is not an easy task. Bringing the experience to the level of verbal presence involves the painful eruption of the past ("inconsolable memory") into the present. Temporal distinctions get provisionally confused, and past and present seem to merge, as she first tells the story to her Japanese lover. Her language involves shifts in tense and pronoun use, as past events are spoken of in the present tense and the woman replaces the "he" of her story (referring to the past German lover) with "you" (an apparent address to her present Japanese lover). In this way the nature and act of narrating emerge as a further concern of the film. If the process of narrative is a personal and difficult activity, merging the speaking subject with event, the product eludes the control of the teller. The woman's deeply personal experience, once told, counts as a public story to be judged in the context of narrative history.

For all of these reasons the film is seen to exemplify practices associated with modernist aesthetics. It rejects linear, causal narrative progression, constructs its characters as figures involved in the process of representation, and problematizes the nature of this process. The implications of this investigation extend beyond the characters in the fiction to include the film and its audience, as Hiroshima mon amour challenges the viewer to recognize the metaphoric relations that confer its coherence, and also to question the value and meaning of its own representations.

—M. B. White

HIS GIRL FRIDAY

USA, 1940

Director: Howard Hawks

Production: Columbia Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 92 minutes. Released 18 January 1940.

Producer: Howard Hawks; screenplay: Charles Lederer, with uncredited assistance by Ben Hecht, from the play Front Page by Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur; photography: Joseph Walker; editor: Gene Havlick; art director: Lionel Banks; music: Morris W. Stoloff; costume designer (gowns): Kalloch.

Cast: Cary Grant (Walter Burns); Rosalind Russell (Hildy Johnson); Ralph Bellamy (Bruce Baldwin); Gene Lockhart (Sheriff Hartwell); Helen Mack (Mollie Malloy); Porter Hall (Murphy); Ernest Truex (Benslinger); Cliff Edwards (Endicott); Clarence Kolb (Mayor); Roscoe Karns (McCue); Frank Jenks (Wilson); Regis Toomey (Sanders); Abner Biberman (Louis); Frank Orth (Duffy); John Qualen (Earl Williams); Alma Kruger (Mrs. Baldwin); Billy Gilbert (Joe Pettibone); Pat West (Warden Cooley); Edwin Maxwell (Dr. Egelhoffer).

Publications

Script:

Lederer, Charles, and Alyssa Gallin, and Molly Haskell, “His Girl Friday: From The Front Page to His Girl Friday: Woman’s Work. The Proto-feminism of His Girl Friday,” in Scenario, vol. 1, no. 4, Fall 1995.

Books:

Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Howard Hawks, New York, 1962.
Milliaen, Jean-Claude, Howard Hawks, Paris, 1966.

Wood, Robin, Howard Hawks, London, 1968.
Gili, Jean, Howard Hawks, Paris, 1971.
McBride, Joseph, editor, Focus on Howard Hawks, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.
Haskell, Molly, From Reverence to Rape, New York, 1973.
Johnston, Claire, Notes on Women’s Cinema, London, 1973.
Mast, Gerald, The Comic Mind, New York, 1973.
Vermilye, Jerry, Cary Grant, New York, 1973.
Willis, Donald, The Films of Howard Hawks, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.
Yanni, Nicholas, Rosalind Russell, New York, 1975.
Deschner, Donald, The Films of Cary Grant, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1978.
Murphy, Kathleen A., Howard Hawks: An American Auteur in the Hemingway Tradition, Ann Arbor, 1978.
Cavell, Stanley, Pursuits of Happiness: The Hollywood Comedy of Remarriage, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1981.
Ciment, Michel, Les Conquérants d’un nouveau monde: Essais sur le cinéma américain, Paris, 1981.
Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
Mast, Gerald, Howard Hawks, Storyteller, Oxford, 1982.
McBride, Joseph, editor, Hawks on Hawks, Berkeley, 1982.
Poague, Leland, Howard Hawks, Boston, 1982.
Britton, Andrew, Cary Grant: Comedy and Male Desire, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1983.
Schickel, Richard, Cary Grant: A Celebration, London, 1983.
Dupuis, Jean-Jacques, Cary Grant, Paris, 1984.
Simsolo, Noël, Howard Hawks, Paris, 1984.
Branson, Clark, Howard Hawks: A Jungian Study, Los Angeles, 1987.
Higham, Charles, and Ray Moseley, Cary Grant: The Lonely Heart, New York, 1989.
Buehrer, Beverly B., Cary Grant: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1990.
Hillier, Jim, Howard Hawks: American Artist, Champaign, 1997.
McCarthy, Todd, Howard Hawks: The Grey Fox of Hollywood, New York, 1997.
McCann, Graham, Cary Grant: A Class Apart, New York, 1998.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 10 January 1940.
Nugent, Frank S., in New York Times, 12 January 1940.
Roman, Robert, “Cary Grant,” in Films in Review (New York), December 1961.
Agel, Henri, “Howard Hawks,” in New York Film Bulletin, no. 4, 1962.
Sarris, Andrew, “The World of Howard Hawks,” in Films and Filming (London), July and August 1962.
“Hawks Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1963.
Rivette, Jacques, and François Truffaut, interview with Howard Hawks, in Interviews with Film Directors, edited by Andrew Sarris, New York, 1967.
Ringgold, Gene, “Rosalind Russell,” in Films in Review (New York), December 1970.
Wise, Naomi, “The Hawksian Women,” in Take One (Montreal), January-February 1971.
Brackett, Leigh, “A Comment on the Hawksian Women,” in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1971.
Cooney, K., “Demonology,” in Movietone News (Seattle), April 1975.
Powers, T., “Screwball Liberation,” in Jump Cut (Chicago), April 1978.

His Girl Friday

Yeck, Joanne L., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Guarner, J. L., in Casablanca (Madrid), July-August 1981. Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), no. 5, 1982.

Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 3, 1983.

American Film (Washington, D.C.), July-August 1983.

Cieutat, M., "Spéciale première: Les Trois Versions de The Front Page ou le cinéma-roi," in Positif (Paris), September 1983.

Smith, J. A., "His Girl Friday in the Cell: A Case Study of Theatre-to-Film Adaptation," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), April 1985.

Stevens, J. F. D., "The Unfading Image from The Front Page," in Film and History (Newark, New Jersey), December 1985.

Review, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 6, no. 7, July 1989.

Masson, Alain, "La dame du vendredi: De la satire à comédie," in Positif (Paris), no. 389-390, July-August 1993.

Vatrican, Vincent, "La dame du vendredi: Howard Hawks," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Hors-série, 1993.

Lake, J.M., "What Are Little Girls Made Of?" in Michigan Academician, vol. 26, no. 2, 1994.

Hietala, V., "Meidan vastaeronneiden kesken," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 6, 1995.

Mulvey, Laura, "His Girl Friday," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 7, no. 3, March 1997.

* * *

Hollywood director Howard Hawks said he got the idea for His Girl Friday at a dinner party at which the guests were doing a reading of the Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur play The Front Page. Hawks had handed the male reporter's part (Hildy Johnson) to one of the women while he took the managing editor's lines (Walter Burns). After a few pages of dialogue, Hawks grew excited and decided that the play was better with a girl playing Hildy Johnson. He called Hecht and suggested changing the reporter's sex for a future film project. Hecht liked the idea, but he had other project commitments; so Hawks hired Charles Lederer to write additional dialogue for a new script. Lederer had written the script of the 1931 movie version of The Front Page, directed by Lewis Milestone, and had co-written other Hollywood screenplays with Hecht. On His Girl Friday, he worked with Hecht (who receives no screen credit) to revamp characters and dialogue while preserving the wit and style of the original.

His Girl Friday's pivotal plot issue is Hildy's (Rosalind Russell) decision whether to marry the tepid, dull Bruce Baldwin (Ralph Bellamy) or team up with her ex-boss and ex-husband, newspaper editor Walter Burns (Cary Grant). Although film critic Molly Haskell praised the way that the movie allows a woman to find her identity in a non-domestic sphere, Hildy still faces rather restrictive options—marriage to home, children, and pallid Bruce or marriage to career and ego with a maniacal Walter. Hildy's choice to remain with the press is less a decision to relinquish her "feminine" longings for home and family than a commitment to the continued excitement and kinetic activity of the world of journalism. Her decision to remarry Walter grows out of their mutual understanding, respect, and love for professionalism. Hildy's ultimate decision for an active, motion-filled life is her only possible choice in a "Hawksian" world. As Hawks himself suggested, her solution is the only way that she can work up enough sense of speed so that she won't have to think about how limited her options really are and how bad life really is.

When His Girl Friday premiered in 1940, it baffled and excited critics and public alike for just one reason—its speed. Hawks's actors overlapped their dialogue; they spoke in lower tones of voice; conversations ran almost simultaneously. Hawks reinforced the sensation of speed by keeping his characters in constant activity. For example, when he finds out that Hildy is getting married, Walter nervously reacts by rubbing his hand, touching the phone, picking up a carnation from a vase and slipping it into his buttonhole. All the while, he struggles to keep an impassive face. When he tries to convince Hildy to postpone her wedding plans so that she can write an important story, his impassioned, aggressive speech drives her around the room, first clockwise and then counter-clockwise. When Hawks cannot rely on his characters' motions, he uses such techniques as rapid cuts between the reporters talking into their telephones or a searchlight sweeping across the room to keep the pace frenetic. Hawks's comedy clocks in at 240 words-per-minute, about 100–140 words per minute faster than the average speaking rate; but his timing, camerawork and editing make it seem still faster.

The film is so mannered, especially in its pacing, that the degree of stylization calls attention to itself. When Walter Burns describes Bruce Baldwin, he says that he looks like "That actor—Ralph Bellamy." He later quips to one of the film's characters, "The last man that said that to me was Archie Leach just a week before he cut his throat." (Archie Leach is Cary Grant's real name.) Such references do not really disrupt the film but merely add to the movie's hilarious message on the absurdity of believing in the characters as real people. Coupled with the timing and acting, the parodic elements contribute to the development of an essay on the absurdity of any kind of ethical or moral commitments—any commitments to "normal values"—in the modern world.

His Girl Friday was the first screwball comedy to depart from the money-marriage-ego conflicts of Holiday, My Man Godfrey, and The Philadelphia Story, inserting into the same comic structure and pattern of action a conflict between career and marriage. Throughout the 1940s, career-marriage decisions for women provided the crises in several screwball comedies. His Girl Friday marked the transition from the subversion of women working for ends other than marriage to more explicit statements regarding money-marriage-sex roles in the genre in the 1940s.

—Lauren Rabinovitz

HITLER: EIN FILM AUS DEUTSCHLAND

(Hitler: A Film From Germany; Our Hitler)

West Germany, 1977

Director: Hans-Jürgen Syberberg

Production: TMS Film (Munich), WDR (Cologne), BBC (London), INA (Paris), in color; running time: 400 minutes. Released 1977.

Executive producer: Harry Nap; screenplay: Hans-Jürgen Syberberg; photography: Dietrich Lohmann; editor: Jutta Brandstaedter; sound recordist: Heymo H. Heyder.

Cast: Heinz Schubert; André Heller; Harry Baer; Peter Kern; Hellmuth Lange; Rainer V. Artenfels; Peter Moland; Martin Sperr; J. Buzalsky; Peter Lühr; and others.

Awards: BFI Special Award, London Film Festival, 1977.

Publications

Script:

Syberberg, Hans-Jürgen, Hitler: Ein Film aus Deutschland, Hamburg, 1978.

Books:

Sontag, Susan, Under the Eye of Saturn, New York, 1980.

Syberberg, Hans-Jürgen, Die Freudlose Gesellschaft: Notizen aus dem letzten Jahr, Munich, 1981.

Corrigan, Timothy, New German Film: The Displaced Image, Austin, Texas, 1983.

Rentschler, Eric, West German Film in the Course of Time, New York, 1984.

Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema: A History, London, 1989.

Articles:

Pym, John, "Syberberg and the Tempter of Democracy," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1977.

Syberberg, Hans-Jürgen, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1977.

Robinson, David, in Times (London), 25 November 1977.

Variety (New York), 30 November 1977.

Andrews, Nigel, "Hitler as Entertainer," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), April 1978.

Stimpson, Mansel, in Montage (London), Summer 1978.

Interview with Syberberg, in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1978.

Courant, Gérard, in Cinéma (Paris), July 1978.

Interview with Syberberg, in Ecran (Paris), July 1978.

Hitler: Ein Film aus Deutschland

Lajeunesse, Jacqueline, in Image et Son (Paris), August 1978.
 "Special Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1978.
 Oudart, Jean-Pierre, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1978.
 Brandlmeier, Thomas, in Medien und Erziehung (Munich), no. 1, 1979.
 Frey, Reiner, in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), April-May 1979.
 Buckman, Peter, in Listener (London), 16 August 1979.
 DiMatteo, Robert, in Kino (Berlin), October 1979.
 Hoberman, J., in Voice (Los Angeles), 14 January 1980.
 Pichter, Henry, in Cineaste (New York), Spring 1980.
 Sharrett, C., "Epiphany for Modernism: Anti-Illusionism and Theatrical Tradition in Syberberg's Our Hitler," in Millennium (New York), Fall 1981-Winter 1982.
 Chaput, L., in Séquences (Montreal), January 1982.
 D'Andrea, R., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), August-October 1982.
 Erkkila, Betsy, "Hans-Jürgen Syberberg: An Interview," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), October 1982.
 Piemme, J.-M., and others, in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), Spring 1983.
 "On the Cinematic Photograph and the Possibility of Mourning in Hitler and Nostalgia," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 9, no. 1, 1987.

Socci, S., "Dal paradiso perduto all'inferno culturale (Hitler)," in Castoro Cinema (Florence), September-October 1989.
 Koshar, R., in American Historical Review, vol. 96, no. 4, 1991.
 Santner, E.L., "The Problem with Hitler: Postwar German Aesthetics and the Legacy of Fascism," in New German Critique, vol. 57, Fall 1992.
 "Az inas monologja," in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 1, 1992.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, "Filming Fascism," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 2, no. 5, September 1992.
 Hammond, Wally, "Deutsch Courage," in Time Out (London), no. 1150, 2 September 1992.
 Bacon, Henry, "Hitler—elokuva Saksasta," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 3, 1993.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, "Istorija—vseogo liš' staryj fil'm?" in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 10, October 1994.

* * *

Hans-Jürgen Syberberg's Hitler: A Film from Germany is the most controversial film produced in post-war Germany. The central thesis of the film propounds the notion that Hitler is within all of us.

Syberberg attempts to illuminate the German soul and German myth—and as such recalls romanticism's themes and preoccupations. Moreover, in his seven hour film, Nazi Germany is depicted as a gargantuan spectacle in which Hitler becomes the ultimate showman-filmmaker; thus Syberberg does not only challenge what a film about Hitler should be like, but also raises important questions about cinematic representation in general.

Hitler and the previously published book about the film had so annoyed the German critical establishment that when a section was previewed at Cannes in 1977, the film was virtually boycotted by all the major German reviewers. In protest, Syberberg, who felt himself deliberately misunderstood, withdrew the film from the Berlin Film Festival and blocked its screening in his native land for a couple of years. The world premier was held at the London Film Festival in 1977 and Hitler was awarded the B.F.I.'s annual prize for "the most original and imaginative film of the year." Subsequently the film was on general release for several months in Paris and Cahiers du Cinema enthusiastically devoted a whole issue to Syberberg and his film. Susan Sontag acclaimed Hitler "one of the great works of art of the twentieth century."

Hitler, with two earlier films, Ludwig—Requiem for a Virgin King (1972) and Karl May—In Search of Paradise Lost (1974), forms a trilogy which meditates on German and European history and on the cinema itself. As in the two earlier films, a refined and innovative system of front projection is deployed. Syberberg perceives the idea of projection, in the symbolic sense, as the dominant idea governing the film: "We will show the world of Hitler in the form of projections, fantastic dreams, projections of the will that gave shape to these visions." Syberberg attempts nothing less than a counter-projection which takes the form of cinematic exorcism, to justify the necessary Trauerarbeit (the toil of mourning), i.e. to accept the guilt and loss, and also to register it as such and not to repress it.

Hitler is radically anti-realistic in style, relying on hyperbole, parody, stylization, and montage. Syberberg's aesthetic conception fuses such apparent oppositions as romanticism and modernism. The Wagnerian ideal of Gesamtkunstwerk is evoked through using his music and through the depiction of romantic yearnings and ecstasies—visions of renewal, paradise, and hell. Yet the Brechtian notion of epic theatre is also applicable in strategies of estrangement and distanciation. History is produced as a circus show where famous historical figures (e.g., Caligula and Napoleon) parade as Hitler. Against the background of huge projected slides (Hitler's chancellery and his house in Berchtesgarden), puppets (a toy-dog with Hitler's face), cut-out doubles, and dummies are used to portray the social imaginary of Nazi Germany. The film unfolds through a series of tableaux, endless monologues, direct address, and original sound-material.

Syberberg wants to draw parallels to cinema on different levels. He makes reference to Melies's A Trip to the Moon, Welles's Citizen Kane, and Lang's M (the final scene, where Peter Lorre defends his evil deeds because he can't help himself, is here reenacted by Peter Kern dressed as an SS officer). Cardboard figures from Caligari to Nosferatu punctuate the film, therefore linking them to the idea of Hitler being a subject for projection of the most evil desires in us. Moreover, Syberberg perceives the trend towards ever-increasing conformity in the developments of cinematic codes as a further basis for his comparison with facism. Thus Greed and its botching by MGM becomes an example, but he also examines Sergei Eisenstein's persecution under Stalin. The figures of Hitler and Himmler are shown to be merely representations and not embodiments, when delegating their roles to various actors, historical personalities, and marionettes. The condemnation of commercial cinema culminates in the polemical comparison between Auschwitz and McCarthy's Hollywood. In Syberberg's view it was not the actual physical presence of Hitler which historically mobilized the masses, but Hitler as representation and Nazism as spectacle. He is convinced of the vitality of the myth, which is why he wants to break its fascination through mechanisms of estrangement and montage.

And this is the crux of the controversial German reception of Hitler. It is not so much Syberberg's aesthetics per se, but the fear that his aestheticisation of politics might seduce the spectator since it is bordering on aestheticising Nazism. His "creative irrationality," many critics argue, leads to further mystification and connects too problematically to Nazi-mythology.

—Ulrike Sieglöhr

HOMELAND

See HEIMAT; DIE ZWEITE HEIMAT

HONG GAO LIANG

See RED SORGHUM

HOOP DREAMS

USA, 1994

Director: Steve James

Production: Kartemquin Films/KCTA-TV; color, 35mm (blown-up from 16mm); running time: 169 minutes. Released 1994. Filmed in and around Chicago, Illinois, and at the University of Illinois between 1986 and 1991.

Producers: Frederick Marx, Steve James, and Peter Gilbert; photography: Peter Gilbert; editors: Frederick Marx, Steve James, and Bill Haugse; sound: Adam Singer and Tom Yore; music: Ben Sidran.

Cast: William Gates; Arthur Agee; Emma Gates; Curtis Gates; Willie Gates; Sheila Agee; Arthur "Bo" Agee; Tomika Agee; Joe "Sweetie" Agee; Earl Smith; Gene Pingatore; Isiah Thomas; Dick Vitale; Bobby Knight; Kevin O'Neill; Joey Meyer; Spike Lee; Bo Ellis.

Awards: Best Documentary, Sundance Film Festival; Best Documentary, Los Angeles Film Critics Association; Best Documentary, New York Film Critics Circle; Best Documentary, Boston Society of Film Critics; Best Documentary, Texas Film Critics Awards; Best Documentary, National Board of Review; Best Documentary, National Society of Film Critics; Golden Globe Award, Best Documentary.

Hoop Dreams

Publications

Books:

- Joravsky, Ben, Hoop Dreams: A True Story of Hardship and Triumph, Atlanta, 1995, 1996.
 Pierson, John, Spike, Mike, Slackers & Dykes: A Guided Tour Across a Decade of American Independent Cinema, New York, 1995.

Articles:

- Seigel, Jessica, "Hoop Dreams Rises to the Top at Sundance," in Chicago Tribune, 31 January 1994.
 Ebert, Roger, in Chicago Sun-Times, 13 February 1994.
 Collin, Glenn, in the New York Times, 21 February 1994.
 Zwecker, Bill, in Chicago Sun-Times, 15 July 1994.
 Christiansen, Richard, in Chicago Tribune, 17 July 1994.
 Zwecker, Bill, in Chicago Sun-Times, 16 September 1994.
 Wilmington, Michael, "When Film Dreams Come True," in Chicago Tribune, 2 October 1994.
 Poe, Janita, "High School Calls a Foul, Sues Over Basketball Film," in Chicago Tribune, 6 October 1994.
 Berkow, Ira, "Dreaming Hoop Dreams," in the New York Times, 9 October 1994.
 McGavin, Patrick Z., "From the Streets and the Gyms to the Courtrooms and Beyond," in the New York Times, 9 October 1994.

- Kornheiser, Tony, "Living a Dream and Dreaming to Live," in the Washington Post, 3 November 1994.
 Howe, Desson, in the Washington Post, 13 November 1994.
 Will, George, "Salvation Through Basketball," in the Washington Post, 24 November 1994.
 Dretzka, Gary, "Hoop Dreams Shooting for Best-Picture Oscar," in Chicago Tribune, 10 December 1994.
 Cox, Dan, "Fine Line Has Dreams of Best Pic," in Variety (New York), 2 January 1995.
 "Acad Rebounds After Hoop Airball," in Variety (New York), 20 February, 1995.
 Corliss, Richard, "How the Winner Lost," in Time (New York), 27 February 1995.
 Angell, Roger, "Two Dreams: One Gets Oscar's Nod, One Gets Gumped," in The New Yorker, 13 March 1995.
 Spillane, Margaret, "Slam-dunked," in The Nation (New York), 13 March 1995.
 Ansen, David, "Why Did Oscar Drop the Ball on Hoop Dreams?" in Newsweek (New York), 27 March 1995.
 Diamos, Jason, "Hoop Dream Shot Clock is Slowly Ticking Away," in the New York Times, 27 March 1995.
 Diamos, Jason, "A New Chapter in the Gates Story," in the New York Times, 29 March 1995.
 "Dream of Conquest," in Sight and Sound (London), April 1995.
 Marvel, M., in Interview (New York), April 1995.
 Arthur, Paul and Janet Cutler, "On the Rebound: Hoop Dreams and its Discontents," in Cineaste (New York), Summer 1995.
 Short review, in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 177, March-April 1995.
 Gower, Mike, "Hoop Fantasies," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 5, no. 7, July 1995.
 Sperber, Murray, and Lee Jones, "Hollywood Dreams: Hoop Realities," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), no. 40, March 1996.
 Terry, Cliff, "Kartemquin: a Different Kind of Dream Factory," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 77, no. 4, April 1996.

* * *

Hoop Dreams is a richly human and profoundly American film. It is at once an allegory about striving to achieve, and the politics and pressures of achievement; and a story of the anguish of poverty in urban America and an indictment of the meat market aspect of contemporary scholastic and professional athletics. While the film is a documentary, there is as much drama and suspense as any deftly plotted fiction. The difference is that the emotions and lives unfolding on screen are real.

The film opens with the NBA All-Star game being played in Chicago. Just a few miles beyond the fanfare, two boys are coming of age in rough urban neighborhoods. Both watch the game on television, almost in awe, while nurturing aspirations for stardom as professional basketball players. Both dream of one-way tickets out of the ghetto, complete with new houses and spiffy cars.

William Gates and Arthur Agee have honed their athletic skills on the neighborhood playgrounds. William is seen practicing slam-dunks in a park, by a bare brick building: a world away from the glare of a Madison Square Garden or an Orlando Arena. Both teens are recruited to play basketball at St. Joseph, a suburban Catholic high school. Years earlier, former Detroit Pistons hoop star Isiah Thomas (who also appears in the film) graduated from St. Joseph. The film now asks the question: "If Isiah can become not only a professional athlete but a perennial All-Star and certain Hall of Famer, why not William and Arthur?"

As William's career at St. Joseph progresses, the media compares him to Isaiah, while Gene Pingatore, the school's basketball coach, sees within Arthur the potential to become a "great player." Later on, the image of Arthur shooting hoops in a playground garbed in a red basketball uniform with the name "Thomas" stitched on the back speaks volumes about his dream. Being accepted at St. Joseph, however, is the initial step of a lengthy, arduous process. Arthur and William will have to acclimate themselves to a school outside their neighborhood, in an interracial climate. Each day, they must endure a three-hour commute to and from school. Once there, they will have to succeed academically as well as athletically.

Hoop Dreams is an up-close-and-personal look at five years in the lives of William and Arthur. It opens with their enrollment at St. Joseph, and concludes with their heading off to college. In between are the traumas and victories they experience on and off the basketball court, and the answering of questions which are posed as the boys begin attending St. Joseph: How will William and Arthur relate to the school, and how will the school and the drill sergeant-like coach relate to them? How will their athletic skills develop? How will their lives and perspectives change over the years? How will all this impact on their relatives? Arthur's dad, Bo, is a failed athlete who feels he "could have made the pros," and does not want his son to experience the "bad things" he has known in his life. William's older brother Curtis is another ex-jock who lives through his sibling while observing that "all my basketball dreams are gone."

With keen insight, the film reflects on the value system of contemporary American society. Their basketball prowess certainly affords Arthur and William an opportunity for education, and self-improvement, in an academic environment far superior to their neighborhood high school. When William begins his freshman year at St. Joseph, his reading skills are at the fourth grade level but, by the time he is a sophomore, his reading level has gone up several grades. The film raises several societal questions here, including: "What about all the ghetto kids who do not have William's physical aptitude?" and "How many kids will never have their ability tapped because they are unable to slam a ball through a hoop?" Furthermore, Arthur and William are attending St. Joseph not out of altruism. Are they being exploited for their talents? Are they perceived as being little more than bodies, who will help a team win a championship? If they were to fail on the court, or suffer a potentially career-ending injury, will they be discarded? Arthur is only on a partial scholarship and is booted out of school because his parents cannot keep up tuition payments, then loses all academic credit. St. Joseph refuses to release his transcript until his family pays $1800 in back tuition. The welfare of the teenager becomes secondary to the collecting of a bill from a family where the breadwinner is a minimum wage-earner.

In telling the story of William, Arthur, and their respective families, Hoop Dreams serves to reaffirm the humanity of black males. Bo Agee sadly fits a negative stereotype of the African-American man as an irresponsible, violent, drug-abusing loser. At one point, he even abandons his family and is later seen pushing drugs in the playground where his son plays basketball. Bo's fall continues when he becomes a crack addict, beats his wife, is arrested for battery, and spends seven months in jail for burglary. While his behavior is not condoned in the film, it is clear that he is unable to adequately support his family on a minimum wage and is tragically weakened by his loss of self-esteem.

Despite the specifics of its setting and subject, Hoop Dreams is a film with universal meaning. Arthur is eventually enrolled in a Chicago high school, and leads his unranked team to the city championship. He and his teammates then travel downstate, to play for the state title. In one sequence, Arthur's parents are seen walking across the University of Illinois campus, where the game will be played. One of them notes that "a child" should have the experience of attending such a school. This idle observation expresses every dream that every parent has ever had for any child.

But what resonates long after seeing Hoop Dreams is an unavoidable fact of contemporary American life. For every Michael Jordan, Shaquille O'Neal, or Isaiah Thomas, there are thousands of young men like Arthur Agee and William Gates: young hoop dreamers who are forged in the ghetto, and who never will earn all of the glory and affluence they so desperately crave.

—Rob Edelman

LA HORA DE LOS HORNOS

(The Hour of the Furnaces)

Argentina, 1968

Director: Fernando E. Solanas

Production: Grupo Cine Liberación; black and white, 16 and 35mm; running time: 260 minutes, French version: 200 minutes; the film is composed of 3 parts: "Neocolonialismo y violencia" - 90 minutes, "Acto para la liberación" - 120 minutes, and "Violencia y liberación" - 45 minutes. Released 1968. Filmed in Argentina.

Producer: Fernando E. Solanas; screenplay: Fernando E. Solanas and Octavio Getino; photography: Juan Carlos de Sanzo with Fernando E. Solanas; editor: Fernando E. Solanas; sound: Octavio Getino; music: Fernando E. Solanas.

Publications

Books:

Solanas, Fernando E., and Octavio Getino, Cine, cultura y descolonización, Mexico City, 1973.

Pick, Zuzana, editor, Latin American Filmmakers and the Third Cinema, Ottawa, 1978.

Solanas, Fernando E., La mirada: reflexiones sobre cine y cultura, with Horacio González, Buenos Aires, 1989.

Monteagudo, Luciano, Fernando Solanas, Buenos Aires, 1993.

Articles:

Marcorelles, Louis, "Solanas: Film as a Political Essay," in Evergreen (New York), July 1969.

"Cinema as a Gun: An Interview with Fernando Solanas," in Cineaste (New York), Fall 1969.

Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), October 1969.

- “Fernando Solanas: An Interview,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1970.
- MacBean, James Roy, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1970.
- Matthews, John, “And After?: A Response to Solanas and Getino,” in Afterimage (London), Summer 1971.
- Haycock, Joel, “Notes on Solanas and Godard,” in Film Society Review (New York), November and December 1971.
- Getino, Octavio, and Fernando Solanas, “Towards a Third Cinema,” in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1971.
- “Algunas preguntas a Octavio Getino,” in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 73–75, 1972.
- Solanas, Fernando, and Octavio Getino, “Voor een derde cinema,” in Skrien (Amsterdam), Spring 1972.
- Wilson, David, “Aspects of Latin American Political Cinema,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1972.
- Films and Filming* (London), November 1972.
- MacBean, James Roy, “Fernando Solanas: An Interview,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1972.
- Sibon-Blanc, A., in Image et Son (Paris), no. 269, 1973.
- Carestia Greenwood, Concetta, “The New South American Cinema: From Neo-Realism to Expressive Realism,” in Latin American Library Review, Spring 1973.
- Hennebelle, G., “Le Réalisme magique et les élans du coeur,” in Ecran (Paris), 15 March 1979.
- Ranvaud, Don, “Fernando Solanas: An Interview,” in Framework (Norwich), Spring 1979.
- Solanas, Fernando, and others, “The Cinema: Art Form or Political Weapon,” in Framework (Norwich), Autumn 1979.
- Stam, Robert, “Hour of the Furnaces and the Two Avant-Gardes,” in Millennium (New York), Fall-Winter 1980–81.
- Medina, R., “La Hora de los hornos: Imagen de un pueblo vivo,” in Cine Cubano (Havana), 1981.
- Danvers, Louis, in Visions (Brussels), February 1986.
- “Interview with Solanas,” in Cineaste (New York), volume 16, nos. 1–2, 1987–88.
- “Solanas Issue” of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), January-February 1989.
- Pick, Z. M., “The Dialectical Wanderings of Exile,” in Screen (Oxford), no. 4, 1989.
- Thompson, F., “Metaphors of Space: Polarizations, Dualism and Third World Cinema,” in Screen (Oxford), no. 1, 1993.
- Menna, C., and V. Cervetto, “Cine militante clandestino en Argentina,” in Film-Historia (Barcelona), vol. 6, no. 2, 1996.
- Chanan, Michael, “The Changing Geography of Third Cinema,” in Screen (Oxford), vol. 38, no. 4, Winter 1997.

* * *

The liberation struggles of the 1960s were a fertile seedbed for La hora de los hornos. Independence movements in the colonies and neo-colonies of the Third World, student revolts in the United States and Western Europe, and the brief protest by Czechoslovakians against the dull grey bureaucracy of the Soviet Union were the world context in which Fernando E. Solanas and Octavio Getino’s film exploded. Argentina moved closer to a social revolution than it ever had before (or since), and Hora was an important expression of that movement, as well as a pivotal example for cineastes involved in national liberation movements throughout the world.

The film is a documentary of such length (4½ hours) that most viewers outside of Argentina have probably seen only the first part.

Perhaps influenced by the work of the Cuban documentarist, Santiago Alvarez, the directors have created a film that takes the form of a didactic collage, committed to the denunciation of imperialism and its cultural influences. As is stated in the film: “Mass communications are more effective for neo-colonialism than napalm. What is real, true, and rational is to be found on the margin of the Law, just as are the people.”

That which is most interesting about the film’s form is its relation to the audience. Rather than the conventional finished cinematic product, ready for viewer consumption, the work is conceived as an open-ended militant act, in which the film itself is only important as a “detonator” or “pretext for dialogue.” Parts 2 and 3 were structured with pauses in which the projector was to be turned off and discussion was to take place; groups using the film were encouraged to employ their own visual or sound accompaniment and to cut or add to the film as they saw fit. Of course, the very context in which the film was shown contributed to the sense of audience participation. Because the film was illegal, no one in the audience was a mere spectator: “On the contrary, from the moment he decided to attend the showing, from the moment he lined himself up on this side by taking risks and contributing his living experience to the meeting, he became an actor, a more important protagonist than those who appeared in the films. The situation turned everyone into accomplices of the act.”

Argentina’s climate of political repression also required a novel approach to production. Conceiving of their work as a guerrilla act, Solanas and Getino “provided a model for clandestine activity under an aggressively hostile regime which no filmmakers in Latin America or elsewhere have surpassed,” noted the American critic Julianne Burton. Strict discipline and tight security were the rule, and all who participated in the film’s production were required to develop interchangeable skills. One example of the measures required by the situation was that the film’s footage had to be constantly disassembled and reassembled so that technicians in the processing laboratories would have no hint as to its subversive content.

The film’s strident manichaeism (“our culture and their culture, our films and their films, our sense of beauty and their sense of beauty”) and its puerile historical analysis seem dated today. But, the current situation in Latin America leaves little room for doubt that more such films are both needed and forthcoming. As Solanas and Getino stated in Hora, “At this time in Latin America there is room for neither passivity nor innocence. The intellectual’s commitment is measured in terms of risks as well as words and ideas; what he does to further the cause of liberation is what counts.” What Solanas and Getino did for the cause of liberation was make La hora de los hornos, which, as they reminded us in their first public statement about the film “is an act before it is a film—an act of liberation.”

—John Mraz

HORROR OF DRACULA

See DRACULA (1958)

HORSE THIEF

See DAOMA ZEI

HOT WINDS

See GARAM HAWA

THE HOUR OF THE FURNACES

See LA HORA DE LOS HORNOS

HOWARDS END

UK, 1992

Director: James Ivory

Production: Merchant Ivory Productions; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 142 minutes. Filmed in London, Oxfordshire, Shropshire, 1991.

Producer: Ismail Merchant; screenplay: Ruth Praver Jhabvala, based on the novel by E. M. Forster; photography: Tony-Pierce Roberts; editor: Andrew Marcus; assistant directors: Chris Newman, Simon Moseley, Carol Oprey; production designer: Luciana Arrighi; art director: John Ralph; music: Richard Robbins; sound editors: Campbell Askew, Sarah Morton; sound recordists: Mike Shoring, Keith Grant; costume design: Jenny Beaven, John Bight.

Cast: Anthony Hopkins (Henry Wilcox); Emma Thompson (Margaret Schlegel); Vanessa Redgrave (Ruth Wilcox); Helen-Bonham Carter (Helen Schlegel); James Wilby (Charles Wilcox); Samuel West (Leonard Bast); Prunella Scales (Aunt Juley); Joseph Bennett (Paul Wilcox); Adrian Ross Magenty (Tibby Schlegel); Jo Kendall (Annie); Jemma Redgrave (Evie Wilcox).

Awards: Oscars for Best Actress (Thompson), Best Adapted Screenplay, and Best Art Direction, 1992.

Publications

Books:

Long, Robert Emmet, Films of Merchant Ivory, New York, 1991.
Pym, John, and James Ivory, Merchant Ivory's English Landscape: Rooms, Views, and Anglosaxon Attitudes, New York, 1995.

Articles:

Bates, P., Cineaste (New York), 1992.
Variety (New York), 24 February 1992.
Anderson, P., Films in Review (New York), March-April 1992.
Francke, L., Sight and Sound (London), May 1992.
Guerin, M., "Le collectionneur," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1992.
Roth-Bettoni, D., Revue du Cinéma (Paris), June 1992.
Sineux, M., Positif (Paris), June 1992.
McFarlane, B., "Literature-Film Connections," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), August 1992.
Benjamin, D., Séquences (Montreal), September 1992.

Grugeau, G., 24 Images (Montreal), September 1992.

Frook, J.E., "'Sony Unit's 'Howard' Slow Rollout Pays Off,'" in Variety (New York), 11 January 1993.

Novelli, I., "'Casa Howard,'" in Film (Rome), no. 1, January-February 1993.

Jacobs, J., "'Indies Play the Smiling Game as Academy Honors Outsiders,'" in Film Journal (New York), vol. 96, March 1993.

Jaroš, Jan, in Film a Doba (Prague), vol. 39, no. 2, Summer 1993.

Hipsky, M., "'Anglophil(m)ia: Why Does America Watch Merchant-Ivory Movies?'" in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 22, no. 3, 1994.

* * *

Brand name producer-director teams are a rarity in the movies. Merchant-Ivory is one of the few producer-director teams. It is also the most successful.

Audiences know exactly what to expect of a Merchant-Ivory production: A literate script adapted from an esteemed (and seemingly unfilmable) literary source, sumptuous period decor and costumes, and impeccable acting of the classically trained rather than Method school—a genteel journey into the well-mannered past with not a car chase or explosion in sight nor a foul word to be heard. In other words, a fastidious cinematic equivalent of an episode of public television's long-running series "Masterpiece Theatre"—a comparison Merchant-Ivory's detractors usually point to as the team's major weakness.

Merchant-Ivory's approach certainly flies in the face of conventional wisdom as to what constitutes marketability these days. But their films have been so successful in luring a lucrative new market, the ever-growing over-50 crowd, into theatres that Hollywood could no longer ignore them. As a result, Merchant-Ivory have now been folded into the gargantuan Disney organization and been given the financial backing to up their output, with guaranteed distribution for their elegant period pieces extending far beyond the art house theatres that were previously the team's domain. In addition, other producers have begun adopting the team's formula, turning out one Merchant-Ivory-type film after another like Enchanted April, The Age of Innocence, Shadowlands, Tom and Viv, and Sense and Sensibility, to name but a few.

Producer Ismail Merchant and director James Ivory (who had initially sought entrance into the movies as a set designer) have been making films since 1963. Their trademark combination of literariness, elegance, and well-bred sophistication did not manifest itself until 1979 with their adaptation of Henry James's novel The Europeans. But their fortunes turned most dramatically with the 1992 Howards End, the team's most popular film up to that time and third adaptation of an E. M. Forster novel following such earlier forays into Forster territory as A Room With a View, a modest success and multiple Academy Award winner that proved to be a harbinger of things to come, and Maurice, a relative flop. Like A Room With a View, Howards End scored big come Academy Award night in some of the "lesser" categories as Best Screenplay, Best Art Direction, and Best Costume Design. But it also captured the Best Actress prize for star Emma Thompson, adding millions of dollars to the picture's already substantial box office take.

A study of class distinction in Edwardian England, Howards End focuses on three families whose lives intersect with tragic and ironic results. Thompson and Bonham Carter play Margaret and Helen, sisters of obvious breeding but little means, who befriend working class bank clerk Leonard (West) in an effort to better his situation. They encourage him to get another job when they're tipped that his present employer may go under. They get the tip from wealthy businessman Henry Wilcox (Hopkins) whose wife, Ruth (Redgrave), has befriended Margaret for much the same purpose. Ruth learns that the sisters are faced with losing their home. When Ruth dies, she makes a last-minute bequest, leaving Howards End, her ancestral cottage in the country, to the soon-to-be-displaced Margaret. But Henry and his rotter son, Charles (James Wilby), keep the bequest a secret in order to keep the cottage in the family, even though it goes unused.

Howards End

After Ruth's death, widower Henry takes up with the vibrant Margaret and eventually marries her. Meanwhile, Helen is made pregnant by Leonard—whose low-class wife had been seduced as a young girl, then tossed aside, by Henry himself. When Margaret learns of her manipulative husband's past indiscretion, she forgives him and requests that Helen be allowed to take up residence at Howards End to have her illegitimate baby. But Henry refuses, hypocritically spurning Helen for her indiscretion, even though it mirrors his own.

The perpetually down-on-his-luck Leonard, unaware that Helen is pregnant, shows up for another hand-out from his benefactors and is accidentally killed by Charles after being subjected to a thrashing. The ensuing scandal and exposed wounds of family dysfunction and class hostility boil to a head and Margaret threatens to leave Henry, a basically decent, albeit misguided man. Like the sisters and even the dead Leonard, he has always sought to do what's right, but achieved mostly wrong instead due to class difference. To hold onto Margaret, he agrees to her single demand that Howards End be turned over to her lock, stock, and barrel. Ironically, the tragic collision of classes has resulted in the property winding up in her hands just as the dying Ruth had long ago wished. And Helen, who had earlier been rejected as a suitable wife by another of Henry's sons, is free to live there and raise the offspring of her lower-class union.

The machinations of Forster's plot may strike some as a bit too reliant on coincidence. But Merchant-Ivory and their superlative crew and cast, lead by the engaging Thompson, bring the period story and characters so vividly to life that the coincidences seem not just credible, but inevitable.

Long, slow but never boring, Howards End trenchantly observes the foibles of its characters while creating a remarkable degree of empathy for them and concern for their respective fates. It grips the eye and the emotions like a good read—the good read, in fact, from which it sprang.

—John McCarty

HUANG TUDI

(Yellow Earth)

China, 1984

Director: Chen Kaige

Production: Youth Production Unit, Guangxi Film Studio; Eastmancolor; running time: 89 minutes; length: 8,010 feet. Released 1984. Subtitled version released 1986. Filmed in Mandarin and Shaanxi dialect.

Producer: Guo Keqi; screenplay: Zhang Ziliang, from the essay “Echo in the Valley” by Ke Lan; photography: Zhang Yimou; lighting: Zhang Shubin; editor: Pei Xiaonan; sound recordist: Lin Lin; sound re-recordist: Liu Quanye; art director: He Qun; costumes: Tian Geng and Chen Bona; music: Zhao Jiping; music performed by: The Orchestra and Traditional Music Ensemble of Xi’an Academy of Music; subtitles: Tony Rayns.

Cast: Xue Bai (Cuiqiao); Wang Xueqi (Gu Qing); Tan Tuo (Father); Liu Qiang (Hanhan); The Peasant Waistdrum Troupe of Ansai County.

Publications

Books:

- Berry, Chris, editor, Perspectives on Chinese Cinema, Ithaca, New York, 1985.
- Quiquemelle, Marie-Claire, and Jean-Loup Passek, Le Cinéma chinois, Paris, 1985.
- Armes, Roy, Third World Filmmaking and the West, Berkeley, 1987.
- Clark, Paul, Chinese Cinema: Culture and Politics since 1949, Cambridge, 1987.
- Semsel, George Stephen, editor, Chinese Film: The State of the Art in the Chinese Republic, New York, 1987.
- Kaige, Chen, and Tony Rayns, King of the Children & the New Chinese Cinema, New York, 1989.
- McDougall, Bonnie S., The Yellow Earth: A Film by Chen Kaige with a Complete Translation of the Filmscript, Hong Kong, 1991.

Articles:

- Interview with Chen Kaige, in Skoop (Amsterdam), February 1986.
- Elley, Derek, in Films and Filming (London), August 1986.
- Frodou, Jean-Michel, “Lettre de Chine,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1986.

Huang Tudi

- Rayns, Tony, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1986.
- Films in Review* (New York), December 1986.
- Positif* (Paris), January 1987.
- Jaivin, Linda, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), March and September 1987.
- Film Quarterly* (Berkeley), Winter 1987–88.
- Sight and Sound* (London), Winter 1987–88.
- Rayns, Tony, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1988.
- Interview with Chen Kaige, in Time Out (London), 17 August 1988.
- Chow, R., “Silent is the Ancient Plain: Music, Filmmaking, and the Conception of Reform in China’s New Cinema,” in Discourse (Bloomington, Indiana), Spring-Summer 1990.
- Farquhar, M. A., “The ‘Hidden’ Gender in Yellow Earth,” in Screen (Oxford), no. 2, 1992.
- Short Review, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 429, February 1993.
- Sutton, D.S., “Ritual, History, and the Films of Zhang Yimou,” in East-West Film Journal (Honolulu), vol. 8, no. 2, 1994.
- Donald, Stephanie, “Women Reading Chinese Films: Between Orientalism and Silence,” in Screen (Oxford), vol. 36, no. 4, Winter 1995.
- Lu, A., “Chen Kaige,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 33, September/October 1997.

* * *

Yellow Earth is a pivotal film in China artistically, from the point of view of competing notions of film practice, and explicitly for its place within the continuing debate about film in that country. Both Chen Kaige and his cinematographer Zhang Yimou are members of the “Fifth Generation” of Chinese film makers, the first group of students to graduate from the newly reopened Beijing Film Academy, China’s only film school. It had been closed during the Cultural Revolution, and both personally experienced the dislocations inflicted by the policies of the “revolution,” having had their formal education curtailed during their teens and suffering exile to distant rural areas to labour alongside the peasants.

The film became a test case for “innovative” or art films. Temporarily withdrawn from circulation it was then re-released and a booklet of articles about it published in China. On its international success at foreign film festivals was hung the polemic of an important speech given in 1986 by the head of the Shanghai Film Studio, demanding that less importance be given to making “salon successes” and more to “popular” films for a local audience. (The debate is outlined by Tony Rayns in Monthly Film Bulletin.) Yellow Earth is a film deeply rooted in both the realities of Chinese peasant life and, more specifically, the facts of recent Chinese history. Set in 1939, its spare narrative tells of the visit of a young soldier from the Eighth Route Army to a poverty-stricken North Shaanxi village researching folk songs for adaptation by the Party for more polemical use. (One credo of Chinese Marxism was to learn from the people.) The film tells of the impact of his visit upon one family—a father, aged beyond his 45 years, his daughter, about to be sold into an arranged marriage, and her “silly” brother.

The dialogue is notably spare, but the film conveys its burden through Chen’s monumental direction, Zhang Yimou’s impressive cinematography, which refuses to isolate the characters from the bare, played-out fields of the Loess plateau which determine their mode of existence, and the spare and fierce beauty of the songs themselves, each telling its tale of women’s oppression. Chen’s austere and unwaveringly grave vision allows for no digression into melodrama, social comment, or the merely folkloric. He is not content to document peasant lives. By seeing his story in Shaanxi he ties it to the heart of Chinese Communism. It was there that Mao’s legendary Long March terminated in 1935 and that he framed the discourse on art and literature that was to bear such equivocal fruits.

The “timelessness” of the feudal struggle for existence is shown in scenes unflinchingly illustrative of the direst poverty, meals consumed almost before they are served, a bridal feast that makes do with a carved wooden replica of the traditional fish course no one can afford, the simplicity of the domestic arrangements. Unlike earlier films in which soldiers or teachers carried the promise of revolution to distant parts, the result of soldier Gu’s arrival is anything but a foregone conclusion. Gu respects the peasants’ ways and speaks gently of the possibilities for change, specifically for change in women’s conditions. Women soldiers have short hair and read and write. But the girl Ciuqiao’s attempt to replace her traditional lament for her plight with Gu’s campaign song ends with its promise of Communist victory choked off before she can complete it, by the waters closing over her head as she attempts to swim across the river to Gu’s base. It is a scene which stands as an eloquent memorial to the struggles of a nation.

The same metaphorical force binds together the few crowd scenes—that of the dance to the Dragon King pleading for rain is shown to be not so different (it is viewed in much the same way) from the dance marking the farewell of the soldiers, for instance. Chen throughout shows a fine sense of overall structure and great delicacy in the handling of his performers. Yellow Earth is perhaps the boldest and most essentially Chinese of the films produced in that country during the last decade.

—Verina Glaessner

THE HUMAN BEAST

See LA BÊTE HUMAINE

THE HUMAN CONDITION

See NINGEN NO JOKEN

HUNGER

See SULT

THE HUSTLER

USA, 1961

Director: Robert Rossen

Production: 20th Century-Fox/Robert Rossen Enterprises; black and white; CinemaScope; running time: 135 minutes; length: 12,109 feet. Released September 1961.

Producer: Robert Rossen; screenplay: Robert Rossen, Sidney Carroll, from the novel by Walter Tevis; assistant directors: Charles Maguire, Don Kranz; photography: Gene Shufton (Eugen Schüfftan); editor: Deedee Allan; sound: James Shields; art directors: Harry Horner, Albert Brenner; music: Kenyon Hopkins; technical advisor: Willie Mosconi.

Cast: Paul Newman (“Fast” Eddie Felson); Jackie Gleason (Minnesota Fats); Piper Laurie (Sarah Packard); George C. Scott (Bert Gordon); Myron McCormick (Charlie Burns); Murray Hamilton (Findlay); Michael Constantine (Big John); Stefan Gierasch (Preacher); Jake LaMotta and Vincent Gardinia (Bartenders); Gordon B. Clarke (Cashier); Alexander Rose (Score Keeper); Carolyn Coates (Waitress); Carl York (Young Hustler); Clifford Pellow (Turk).

Awards: Oscars for Best Art Direction and Best Black and White Cinematography, 1961. British Film Academy Awards for Best Film from any Source, and Best Actor (Newman), 1961.

Publications

Script:

Rossen, Robert, The Hustler, in Three Screenplays, New York, 1972, 1985.

Books:

- Casty, Alan, The Films of Robert Rossen, New York, 1969.
 Hamblett, Charles, Paul Newman, London, 1975.
 Harbinson, Allen, George C. Scott: The Man, The Actor, The Legend,
 New York, 1977.
 Godfrey, Lionel, Paul Newman, Superstar: A Critical Biography,
 New York, 1978.
 Landry, J.C., Paul Newman, London, 1983.
 Quirk, Lawrence J., The Films of Paul Newman, Secaucus, 1986.
 Oumano, Elena, Paul Newman, Gordonville, 1989.
 Quirk, Lawrence J., Paul Newman: The Man Behind the Steel Blue Eyes, Dallas, 1997.
 Lax, Eric, Newman: A Celebration, London, 1999.

Articles:

- Motion Picture Herald* (New York), 27 September 1961.
Variety (New York), 27 September 1961.
 Baker, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), December 1961.
 Houston, Penelope, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1961.
 Oakes, Philip, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1961–62.
 Manchel, Frank, and Dan Ort, in Screen Education, March–April 1968.
 Lloyd, Christopher, in Brighton Film Review, March 1970.
 Royer, J.-P., in Cinématographe (Paris), May 1982.
 Baxter, Bryan, in Films and Filming (London), November 1985.
 Jenkins, Steve, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1986.
 Legrand, Gérard, Positif (Paris), May 1987.
 Breakwell, Ian, “The Fat Man Within,” in Sight & Sound (London),
 vol. 4, no. 6., June 1994.
 Stévenin, Jean-François, “Économie d’énergies (sur L’arnaqueur),” in Positif (Paris), no. 400, June 1994.
Premiere (Boulder), vol. 10, October 1996.
 Schaefer, R., in Metro Magazine (St. Kilda West), no. 113/114, 1998.

* * *

Unlike many other self-consciously “serious” American films of its period—the kind of movies Andrew Sarris once described as dealing “Realistically with a Problem in Adult Terms”—The Hustler has aged remarkably well. So much so, in fact, as to encourage the retrospective conviction that more of the movie’s long list of Oscar nominees merited the ultimate accolade. As it is, the film did receive awards for art direction and cinematography, the latter particularly well deserved by the German émigré cameraman Eugen Schüfftan, whose skilled monochrome work on The Hustler remains an object lesson in framing and lighting the wide CinemaScope image.

In 1961 that was no mean achievement, for commercial anamorphic cinematography was still less than a decade old. Nor was it only a question of adapting the 1:2.25 aspect ratio to existing criteria of pictorial elegance or of harnessing it to the particular requirements of The Hustler’s distinctively seedy milieu. Schüfftan also found ways of framing the movie’s characters so as to underline and comment upon their changing relationships, but without that process seeming unduly obtrusive. In so doing he introduced a specifically visual element into the style of Robert Rossen, a director whose films, while always exhibiting the more “literary” values of careful writing and characterization, had hitherto not been especially distinguished by their visual flair.

Rossen was invariably a good director of actors, however, and all the principal performances in The Hustler are of the highest quality. Paul Newman’s account of Fast Eddie Felson is still, perhaps, his most accomplished film characterization, Eddie’s internal stresses finding expression in a kind of controlled physicality—used to enormous effect after the thumb-breaking sequence, when, with his hands encased in plaster, he is unable to light a cigarette or hold a cup, let alone wield a pool cue. As Eddie’s Mephistopheles, the gambler Bert Gordon, George C. Scott smiles like a benevolent shark, modulating that now familiar sandpaper voice across a range from whiplash harshness to silky persuasion. Jackie Gleason and Myron McCormick are impeccable as Eddie’s principal opponent and discarded partner respectively, while Piper Laurie captures Sarah’s enigmatic self-destructiveness with such conviction as to make one deeply regret that, after The Hustler, she retired from acting until Carrie in 1976.

This last judgment, it should be noted, was not wholly shared by reviewers of the period, several of whom identified the Sarah sub-plot as the film’s main weakness. In hindsight, however, it is clear that this is not Piper Laurie’s failing. While it is true that Sarah is observed tangentially, that she is not as clearly defined as Eddie or Bert, it is that ambiguity that makes her significant. She is, after all, central to the film’s resolution. Without her intervention, Eddie’s character could not plausibly meet the developmental requirements of this most classical of narratives. Through her he comes to understand what is really meant by Bert’s facile explanation of his failure to beat Minnesota Fats: that he lacks “character.” But he reaches that understanding not simply because she loves him, a narrative contrivance which, on its own, would be as banal as it is common in the movies, but because her suicide forces him to recognize the price of his own self-absorption. “I loved her, Bert,” he concedes at the film’s end; “I traded her in on a pool game.”

There is, then, a real difficulty about Sarah’s role, but it is intrinsic to the movie’s single-minded focus on Eddie’s progress toward “maturity.” To make that work, a significant part of Sarah’s motivation has to remain oblique for, if she kills herself solely because of Eddie’s behaviour, he would then be beyond redemption. But if we are made to see her as already self-destructive, as in some part “Perverted, Twisted, Crippled” (the final message she scrawls over her own mirror image), it is then conventionally acceptable for Eddie to transcend the tragedy, defeat Minnesota Fats, and, as an appropriate expression of his new found “character,” sacrifice his future in big-time pool.

It is that redemption, of course, which is the whole point of the film. Eddie must overcome his and our irresponsible impulses—here given metaphorical form in the pool hustler’s need for self-restraint in the cause of ultimate victory—if he is to realize humane values on behalf of us all. Our reward is the spine-tingling satisfaction of that final dignified exchange with Minnesota Fats, an exchange appropriately set in the pool hall Eddie has earlier dubbed the “church of the good hustler.” “Fat man,” he says, “you shoot a great game of pool.” “So do you, Fast Eddie.” Redemption indeed.

—Andrew Tudor

I AM A FUGITIVE FROM A CHAIN GANG

USA, 1932

Director: Mervyn LeRoy

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 93 minutes. Released 10 November 1932. Filmed 28 July-7 September 1932 in Warner Bros. studios. Cost: $195,845.

Producer: Hal Wallis; screenplay: Howard J. Green and Brown Holmes, from the autobiography I Am a Fugitive from a Georgia Chain Gang by Robert E. Burns; photography: Sol Polito; editor: William Holmes; art director: Jack Okey; music conductor: Leo F. Forbstein; costume designer: Orry-Kelly; technical advisors: S. H. Sullivan and Jack Miller, uncredited assistance by Robert E. Burns.

I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang

Cast: Paul Muni (James Allen); Glenda Farrell (Marie); Helen Vinson (Helen); Noel Francis (Linda); Preston Foster (Pete); Allen Jenkins (Barney Sykes); Edward Ellis (Bomber Wells); John Wray (Nordine); Everett Brown (Sebastian); Hale Hamilton (The Reverend Robert Allen); Louise Carter (Mother); Sally Blane (Alice); Berton Churchill (Judge); David Landau (Warden); Willard Robertson (Prison Board Chairman); Robert McWade (Attorney); Robert Warwick (Fuller).

Publications

Script:

Green, Howard J., and Brown Holmes, I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang, edited by John E. O'Connor, Madison, Wisconsin, 1981.

Books:

LeRoy, Mervyn, It Takes More Than Talent, New York, 1953.

Warner, Jack L., with Dean Jennings, My First Hundred Years in Hollywood, New York, 1964.

Gussow, Mel, Don't Say Yes Until I Finish Talking: A Biography of Darryl F. Zanuck, New York, 1971.

The Warner Bros. Golden Anniversary Book, New York, 1973.

Lawrence, Jerome, Actor: The Life and Times of Paul Muni, New York, 1974.

LeRoy, Mervyn, with Dick Kleiner, Take One, New York, 1974.

Lorentz, Pare, Lorentz on Film: Movies 1927-1941, New York, 1975.

Roddick, Nick, Warner Bros. in the 1930s: A New Deal in Entertainment, London, 1983.

Articles:

“Article on Robert Burns,” in New York Herald Tribune, 27 November 1932.

“Champion of the Underdog,” in Silver Screen (New York), December 1932.

LeRoy, Mervyn, “The Making of Mervyn LeRoy,” in Films in Review (New York), May 1953.

Campbell, Russell, in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), June 1971.

Ebert, J., “Kracauers Abbildtheorie,” in Filmkritik (Munich), April 1977.

Pulleine, Tim, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1979.

Siclier, J., in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 October, 1979.

Cohen, Joan, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

“Mervyn LeRoy ‘Revisited,’” in Image et Son, no. 378, December 1982.

Checklist and critical notes on Mervyn LeRoy, in Film Dope (Nottingham), no. 35, September 1986.

* * *

During the 1930s Warner Brothers earned a well-deserved reputation of being a studio with a strong social conscience. Hal Wallis, who was production chief at the studio for much of that decade, recalled that “the general impression was that we were very liberal in our selection of material.” Among the Warners’ productions which helped to create that image was I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang, a well-made film that earned the studio’s sound department and Paul Muni Oscar nominations. This production ranks, to use the words of film historian Clive Hirschhorn, as “one of the most vehement, eloquent, and far-reaching of social protest films.”

I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang is based on a book by Robert E. Burns, who recounts his adventures with the prison system in Georgia and his two escapes from the chain gangs. The movie is generally faithful to its sources (although for various reasons Georgia is never mentioned), with some melodramatic flourishes added. The story is deceptively simple: a World War I veteran from a good family returns home after the war and becomes dissatisfied with his circumstances. He takes to the road and becomes innocently involved in a stick-up; found guilty he is sentenced for some years to a chain gang. The film in stark fashion depicts the sadistic brutality and dehumanizing violence with which chain gang inmates are treated. He escapes, goes North, makes something of himself, but is forced into marriage with a woman who has discovered his past; when ultimately he tries to leave her for another woman she denounces him to the authorities. Attempting to clear his record by going South voluntarily to serve a nominal term, he is doublecrossed and returned to the chain gang. He escapes once more, and comes out of hiding one night to see his sweetheart. Restless, fear-ridden, terrified of being returned to the chain gang, he is but a haunted shadow of his former self. In what film critic Pauline Kael has called “one of the great closing scenes in the history of films,” he retreats into the shadows at hearing a sound, and responds to his sweetheart’s question of how he lives by saying “I steal” as the movie ends.

The film is a harsh indictment of the chain gang, and American movie audiences were made aware of the terrible conditions prevalent in the penal system of the South. Moreover, these audiences were presented with a bleak view of contemporary American life in keeping with the harsh realities of the Great Depression which was just then peaking in terms of its impact on life in the United States. Although the bulk of the film’s action is set in the 1920s, the indictment and conditions depicted easily translated to the hard times of the early 1930s. I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang, thanks to a thoughtful script, taut direction, and vibrant central performance remains a powerful indictment and pungent commentary on social ills.

—Daniel Leab

I AM CUBA

See Soy Cuba

I EVEN MET HAPPY GYPSIES

See SKUPLIJACI PERJA

I WAS A FIREMAN

See FIRES WERE STARTED

IDI I SMOTRI

(Come and See)

USSR, 1985

Director: Elem Klimov

Production: Byelarusfilm, Mosfilm; Sovcolor; running time: 142 minutes.

Production manager: J. Tereshenko; screenplay: Ales Adamovich, Elem Klimov, based on works by Ales Adamovich, including The Khatyn Story and A Punitive Squad; photography: Alexei Rodionov; editor: V. Belova; assistant director: V. Pondchevni, Z. Rogozovskaya; production designer: Viktor Petrov; music: Oleg Yanchenko; music editor: M. Blank; costumes: E. Semenova; sound: V. Mors.

Cast: Alexei Kravshenko (Florya); Olga Mironova (Glasha); Liubomiras Laucevicius, Vladas Bagdonas, Victor Lorents.

Publications

Articles:

Diaz Torres, D., “Ven y mira,” in Cine Cubano (Habana), no. 114, 1985.

Variety (New York), 17 July 1985.

Portal, M., “Klimov, un cinéaste visionnaire” in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), November-December 1985.

Strick, P., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1987.

LeFanu, M., “Partisan” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1987.

Bassan, R., and M. Martin, Revue du Cinéma (Paris), May 1987.

Goethals, Piet, “Idi I smotri: die Leiden des jungen Florya,” in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 371, April 1988.

Makkonen, V. -P., “Elem Klimov elokuviansa takana,” in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 6, 1988.

- Noel, J., and D. Fischer, "Viens et vois," in Les Cine-Fiches de Grand Angle, vol. 15, no. 105, May 1988.
- Simons, Jan, "Beeld van de oorlog," in Skrien (Amsterdam), no. 174, October–November 1990.
- Youngblood, D.J., "Post-Stalinist Cinema and the Myth of World War II: Tarkovskii's Ivan's Childhood (1962) and Klimov's Come and See (1985)," Historical Journal of Film and Television (Abingdon), vol. 14, no. 4, 1994.

Interviews:

- Cinéma* (Paris), 23 September 1987.
- Donets, L., "Preodolenie," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 5, 1995.

* * *

Come and See is set in Byelorussia in 1943, and tells the story of German atrocities against the population through the eyes of a young boy, Florya, who, at the start of the film, joins the partisans. Whilst he is away his entire village, including his mother and little sisters, are butchered by the Germans. Returning with a partisan girl, Glasha, he discovers the awful truth, an event which virtually unhinges him. Roaming through the bleak Byelorussian countryside with an ever-dwindling band of displaced people, he eventually witnesses the German destruction of the village of Perekhody and the slaughter of its inhabitants—an event from which he narrowly escapes with his own life. The German unit responsible is caught and destroyed by the partisans, whom Florya, now aged almost beyond recognition by his terrible experiences, rejoins.

The events portrayed in Come and See have been drawn from at least three separate books by Ales Adanovich (who also worked on the screenplay), so that, as Philip Strick put it, "what has been reconstructed is a symbolic tragedy, drawing together a multiplicity of terrible episodes into one condensed nightmare." Indeed, an end credit tells us that there were 628 Perekhodys in Byelorussia, but new evidence unearthed since the fall of the Soviet Union suggests there were far more. Likewise a good deal of recent work emanating from Germany itself—and, in particular, a major exhibition in Hamburg in 1995—has cast a great deal of doubt on the conventional view that atrocities on the Eastern Front were carried out by the SS and various ill-assorted non-German Nazis, whilst the professional Wehrmacht got on with the job of being ordinary soldiers. So whilst it may indeed be the case, as some critics have complained, that Come and See will do little to foster good East-West relations, its representation of German soldiery in Byelorussia as glorying in the most vile and degraded behaviour imaginable, at least has the virtue of historical accuracy, and of puncturing the assiduously cultivated myth of the dutiful Wehrmacht.

Come and See has aptly been described as an "epic of derangement," and long before the horrors of Perekhody are presented in 25 almost unbearable minutes, the spectator has been submerged in a world that seems to have gone stark raving mad. Whether in the opening scene, in which two boys dig for buried guns in a bleak, Beckett-like landscape of sand dunes; Florya and Glasha's agonised struggle through a swamp to reach an encampment of lamenting women surrounding a charred, but still living, body; or the picaresque cross-country journey to find food, accompanied by a death's-head-like effigy of Hitler, in which only Florya survives just, this is a film informed with the spirit of Goya's The Disasters of War. Philip Strick has drawn a parallel with the "fevered expressionism" of Chukrai's

Ballad of a Soldier and Kalatozov's The Cranes are Flying, and whilst it is true that there are plenty of bravura sequences involving long, mobile, hand-held shots, there is nothing particularly heroic about the vision of war on offer here. Indeed, from the moment Florya leaves home—not entirely willingly—it is presented as one long, utterly brutalising experience which leaves him looking like a wizened old man. In the early scene at the partisan camp in which the partisans are photographed in an heroic group pose, and the soundtrack fills with a patriotic song, it's as if Klimov is actually poking fun, not at the partisans themselves of course, but at the conventionalised image which they acquired in the post-war Soviet Union.

The sense of derangement is massively augmented by the film's remarkably orchestrated soundtrack. Aural distortion is present right from the start, when one of the boys looking for guns addresses the camera in a voice that seems to have come straight out of The Exorcist. It becomes much more pronounced, however, after the scene in which the partisan camp is bombed, which causes damage to Florya's hearing. From then on in the soundtrack is what Strick has described as a "stunning tinnitus of distorted tones," in particular making great play with variations on and treatments of the drone of the lone aircraft which reappears throughout the film like the sword of Damocles circling overhead. Not since Raging Bull or The Texas Chainsaw Massacre have the expressive possibilities of the soundtrack been exploited to such devastating effect.

—Julian Petley

IDIOTERNE

(The Idiots)

Denmark 1998

Director: Lars von Trier

Production: Zentropa Entertainments and Liberator Productions; color; running time: 117 min. Released 17 July 1998, Copenhagen. Cost: DKK 12 mio.

Producer: Vibeke Windeløv; screenplay: Lars von Trier; photography: Lars von Trier; editor: Molly Malene Stensgaard; assistant director and photography: Kristoffer Nyholm, Jesper Jargil, Casper Holm; set designer: Lene Nielsen.

Cast: Bodil Jørgensen (Karen); Jens Albinus (Stoffer); Louise Hassing (Susanne); Troels Lyby (Henrik); Nikolaj Lie Kaas (Jepp); Henrik Prip (Ped); Luis Mesonero (Miguel); Louise Mieritz (Josephine); Knud Romer Jørgensen (Axel); Trine Michelsen (Nana); Anne-Grethe Bjarup Riis (Katrine).

Awards: FIPRESCI International Critics Award, London Film Festival, 1998.

Publications

Scripts:

Von Trier, Lars, and Mogens Rukow, Idioterne, Gyldendal, 1999.

Articles:

Skotte, Kim, "Triers gruppeknald," in Politiken, 17 July 1998.

Piil, Morten, article in Gyldendals filmguide: Danske film fra A til Z, Gyldendal, 1998.

Brooks, Xan, "Burn, Baby, Burn," in Sight and Sound (London), May 1999.

Schepelern, Peter, "Filmen ifølge dogme," in FILM, no. 1, Danish Film Institute, 1999.

* * *

When the Dogma 95 manifesto was presented, the general view in Denmark was that Lars von Trier was primarily responsible for it. In all his films and projects he has worked with sets of rules, and now there were some new ones that in addition to saluting the nouvelle vague of French cinema in the 1960s might also have been inspired by the fact that in Breaking the Waves (1996) von Trier had just completed his biggest, most expensive production, and needed a change. It was all seen as rather a joke, but the presentation at Cannes 1998 of Thomas Vinterberg's Festen and Lars von Trier's Idioterne showed that they meant it seriously.

Whereas Vinterberg's film could have been a grand, polished production and even as a Dogma film is an aesthetic pleasure, von Trier's film is a radical breach with ordinary aesthetic rules for film as an idiom and narrative, and is an equally radical breach with the norms and conventions for film content. In this way, too, the film has its roots in the new wave of French film in the 1960s as well as the alternative ways of life and the showdown with middle-class conventions of the same period. In those days people freaked out; in Trier's hands the characters play a game in which they act the idiot, for the film seems to have the romantic notion that it is only via children and idiots that we can access our authenticity, our primitive character. At the same time the film is also a criticism of those who only regard the game as a playful opportunity for a few intense summer months, while the character with genuine pain in her past carries the game into her real life and is left as the only person to truly accept its radical qualities.

This person is Karen. She starts the film by meeting the "idiots" at a restaurant and is indignant when she finds out their behavior is just a game. But she joins the group and in a beautiful scene in the middle of the film she manages to shed her reservations and allow her "inner idiot" to speak out. The film has three layers, each getting darker and darker.

The first part of the film seems to be a game with reality, where a drink at a pub, a tour of a factory, and outings to a swimming pool and a woods provide opportunities to play the idiot in an open, anonymous social space. The second layer brings the characters closer to home, and the film becomes more painful and simultaneously grotesquely funny when the idiots confront specific individuals: good citizens who are forced to buy hopeless Christmas decorations, potential buyers of the house where the idiots hang out, the civil servant who wants to send them out of his wealthy municipality to one crowded with dysfunctional losers, and not least, the group of bikers who believe that the idiots are genuine, an illusion that must be preserved at all costs.

After these encounters the film becomes even darker in tone and perspective, for the third layer concentrates on the group itself. The costs of this serious game are revealed. When a father comes to get his daughter and breaks up a tender, burgeoning love affair the young couple's desperate farewell through a car windscreen becomes one of the emotional peaks and a distillation of the opposition between the efforts of the idiots and the reactions of the people around them. The moving climax is reached when it turns out that Karen, whose moral qualms have made her take longer than anyone else to accept the idiot game, proves to be the only one capable of playing the idiot among people she knows and loves. In the closing scene, when Karen is in the bosom of her family, for whom concealing problems is the abiding principle, and she begins to play the idiot, one loses all one's reservations about the film and its intent, and surrenders completely. Karen plays the idiot to reconcile herself with her traumatic pain over her dead baby and to get through to her lower-middle-class, convention-ridden family, for whom attendance at the funeral is the only conceivable way to express your grief.

With her reservations regarding the grotesque game of "idiot," which she and many viewers find offensive, Karen becomes the figure the viewer identifies with and her pain, a pain we feel and understand. She comes into the group as a solitary figure and by the end is the only person left who is capable of carrying out the game in her own real life. She is a searching sister to Bess of Breaking the Waves, a woman who gives up everything, sheds her inhibitions, and shatters prejudices.

Von Trier tells his story using a hand-held camera and a radically anti-aesthetic idiom in which the scenes do not seem composed but resemble roughly-hewn fragments of a film not completed. This is emphasised by the meta-layer of the film in which von Trier interviews the idiots and they talk about their experiences, emotions, and attitudes to the group as if with hindsight after the group has split up. This lends the project the character of an improvised experiment that von Trier has been following, and the film assumes the character of an uncontrolled film, an anarchic experiment, or a home movie which failed. But the project has been controlled down to the tiniest detail, and is just as formally implemented as his earlier films. One might say that von Trier is playing the idiot with the language of film, and that just as the group breaches the conventions of middle-class society, he breaches the linguistic conventions of cinema in his own quest for authenticity.

—Dan Nissen

IF. . .

UK, 1968

Director: Lindsay Anderson

Production: Memorial Enterprises; color with tinted black and white sequences (EastmanColor), 35mm; running time: 112 minutes, American version 111 minutes. Released December 1968, London. Filmed beginning 8 March 1968 at Cheltenham College, England. Cost: budgeted at £250,000.

Producers: Roy Baird with Michael Medwin and Lindsay Anderson; screenplay: David Sherwin, from the original script “Crusaders” by David Sherwin and John Howlett; photography: Miroslav Ondricek; editor: David Gladwell; sound recordist: Christian Wangler; production designer: Jocelyn Herbert; art director: Brian Eatwell; music: Marc Wilkinson; costume designer: Shura Cohen.

Cast: Malcolm McDowell (Mick); David Wood (Johnny); Richard Warwick (Wallace); Christine Noonan (Girl); Rupert Webster (Bobby Philips); Robert Swann (Rowntree); Hugh Thomas (Denson); Michael Cadman (Fortinbras); Peter Sproule (Barnes); Peter Jeffrey (Headmaster); Arthur Lowe (Mr. Kemp); Mona Washbourne (Matron); Mary MacLeod (Mrs. Kemp); Geoffrey Chater (Chaplain); Ben Aris (John Thomas); Graham Crowden (History Master); Charles Lloyd Pack (Classics Master); Anthony Nicholls (General Denson); Tommy Godfrey (Finchley); Guy Ross (Stephans); Robin Askwith (Keating); Richard Everett (Pussy Graves); Philip Bagenal (Peanuts); Nicholas Page (Cox); Robert Yetzes (Fisher); David Griffen (Willens); Graham Sharman (Van Eyssen); Richard Tombleson (Baird); Richard Davis (Machin); Brian Pettifer (Biles); Michael Newport (Brunning); Charles Sturridge (Markland); Sean Bury (Jute); Martin Beaumont (Hunter).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Grand Prix, 1969.

Publications

Script:

Anderson, Lindsay, and David Sherwin, If. . . : A Film by Lindsay Anderson, New York, 1969.

Books:

Manvell, Roger, New Cinema in Britain, New York, 1969.

Sussex, Elizabeth, Lindsay Anderson, New York, 1969.

Gelmis, Joseph, The Film Director as Superstar, New York, 1970.

Walker, Alexander, Hollywood, England: The British Film Industry in the Sixties, London, 1974.

Silet, Charles L. P., Lindsay Anderson: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1981.

Graham Allison, Lindsay Anderson, Boston, 1981.

Hedling, Erik, Lindsay Anderson: Maverick Film Maker, New York, 1998.

Lambert, Gavin, Lindsay Anderson, New York, 2000.

Articles:

Schrader, Paul, in Cinema (London), no. 3, 1968.

Robinson, David, “Anderson Shooting If. . .,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1968.

Miller, Gavin, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1968.

Shivas, Mark, in Movie (London), Winter 1968.

Powell, Dilys, in Sunday Times (London), 22 December 1968.

Gladwell, David, “Editing Anderson’s If. . .,” in Screen (London), January-February 1969.

Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, March 1969.

Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, New York, March 1969.

Spiers, David, in Screen (London), March-April 1969.

Cocks, Jay, in Time (New York), 21 March 1969.

Hartung, Philip, in Commonweal (New York), 21 March 1969.

Baker, Russell, “Observer: Youth Without Rose-Colored Glasses,” in New York Times, 13 May 1969.

Ebert, Roger, in Chicago Sun Times, 1 June 1969.

Arnold, Gary, in Washington Post, 13 June 1969.

Corliss, Richard, “Hollywood and the Student Revolt,” in National Review (New York), 17 June 1969.

Farber, Stephen, “Before the Revolution,” in Hudson Review (New York), Autumn 1969.

Craddock, John, “If. . . High School Unless,” in Film Society Review (New York), September 1969.

Young, Vernon, “Film Chronicle: Notes on the Compulsive Revolution,” in Hudson Review (New York), Winter 1969.

Welsh, James, “Bergman and Anderson for Sophomores,” in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1971.

Jensen, N., “Lindsay Anderson—romantisk ironiker,” in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), November 1973.

Marszalek, Rafal, “Lindsay Anderson,” in Kino (Warsaw), October 1974.

Rumalho, Jose Jorge, “Un Filme que Evoca Jean Vigo,” in Celuloide (Rio Major, Portugal), November 1974.

Lovell, Alan, “Brecht in Britain—Lindsay Anderson,” in Screen (London), Winter 1975.

Durgnat, Raymond, “Britannia Waives the Rules,” in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1976.

Hedling, E., “Han sag sig om i vrede,” in Filmhaftet (Uppsala, Sweden), May 1990.

Sen, M., “La révolte des adolescents,” in Positif (Paris), no. 400, June 1994.

Turcsanyi, S., “A szabadsag fantomjai,” in Filmvilag (Budapest), vol. 37, no. 12, 1994.

* * *

Lindsay Anderson’s film If. . ., related to Rudyard Kipling’s poem of the same name, has raised much debate politically, stylistically, and structurally, particularly concerning the director’s use or misuse of Brechtian theory. Based on a script by David Sherwin and John Howlett entitled Crusaders, the film uses the British public-school system as a microcosm of society to demonstrate the repression of the individual by authority. In the published screenplay of If. . ., Anderson also credits another source of inspiration for the film, Jean Vigo: “We especially saw Zéro de conduite again, before writing started, to give us courage.”

If...

The mid-1950s marked significant changes in Britain. The New Left emerged, the Free Cinema began, John Osborne was energizing the theater, and Brecht was re-discovered. It was also the period Anderson was writing for Sight and Sound. Not unexpectedly, the influences of that period can be traced to If. . .. The film has a sense of “documentary realism” (Osborne), surprising surrealist passages (Free Cinema), a drive to overthrow authority (New Left), and a use of self-reflexive devices (Brecht).

If. . . functions predominantly within a kind of realism typical of classic narrative films, but one that is undercut by Brechtian concerns and surrealist images. Anderson himself declared that “I think that If. . . is a rather Brechtian film.” There are inherent difficulties with this statement (and regarding “Brechtian cinema” in general), but If. . . does exhibit two ostensible examples of the well-known verfremdungseffekt: the oft-cited black- and white- sections and the title cards. The film is constructed in a series of eight vignettes, each one introduced by a title card. The overall design conveys some idea of a chronology, but the ordering of the scenes could be altered without changing the thematic drive. This type of structural flexibility was central to Brecht’s early writings. The use of black- and white- sections within a color film was entirely random, based on economic and practical considerations. Notwithstanding, both devices are meant to distance the spectator from the film, calling into question the production of the film as text and, theoretically, permitting cool observations of societal machinations. The fact that the fantasy sequences scattered throughout If. . . (the chaplain in a drawer, the naked woman at the cafe, the headmaster’s wife wandering the empty corridors, and possibly the ending) are not delineated from the accepted diegetic reality reflects Anderson’s belief that there are no rigid distinctions between what is real and what is fantasy. This use of surrealism blends nicely with the Brechtian aspects of the film in that it raises similar questions about constructed images and the supposed truth of realism.

To a lesser degree, If. . . also deals with sexuality, especially the repression of desires with its deleterious effects, and the covert homosexuality of an all-male school brought to the fore in certain relationships.

Anderson has said that no authority is necessary and that his sympathies are always with the revolutionaries. If . . . presents contradictions inherent in any authoritarian system and states that without resolution, radical action will be the only means of change—the quite literal “if” of the film.

—Greg S. Faller

IGLA

(The Needle)

USSR, 1989

Director: Rashid Nugmanov.

Production: Kazakhfilm; color; 35mm; running time: 81 minutes. Filmed on location in Alma-Ata and at the Aral Sea.

Producer: Rashid Nugmanov; screenplay: Alexander Baranov, Bakhyt Kilibayev; photography: Murat Nugmanov; design: Murat Musin; music: Viktor Tsoi.

Cast: Viktor Tsoi (Moro), Marina Smirnova (Dina), Pyotr Mamanov (Doctor), Aleksander Baschirov (Spartak).

Publications

Books:

Horton, Andrew, and Michael Brashinsky, The Zero Hour: Glasnost and Soviet Cinema in Transition, Princeton, New Jersey, 1992.

Lawton, Anna, editor, The Red Screen: Politics, Society, Art in Soviet Cinema, London and New York, 1992.

Horton, Andrew, editor, Inside Soviet Film Satire: Laughter with a Lash, 1993.

Brashinsky, Michael, and Andrew Horton, editors, Russian Critics on the Cinema of Glasnost, 1994.

Thompson, Kristin, and David Bordwell, Film History: An Introduction, New York, 1994.

Articles:

Abramovich, A., Soviet Film (Moscow), February 1989.

Plakhov, Andrei, “Soviet Cinema into the 90’s,” in Sight & Sound (London), Spring 1989.

Ciesol, Forrest, “Kazakhstan Wave,” in Sight and Sound (London), Fall 1989.

Drozdova, M., and E. Stisova, Isskustvo Kino (Moscow), March 1989. Variety (New York), 31 May 1989.

Horton, A., “Nomad from Kazakhstan,” in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Winter 1989–90.

Brashinsky, Michael, “The Ant Hill in the Year of the Dragon,” in New Orleans Review (New Orleans), Spring 1990.

Horton, Andrew, “Nomad from Kazakhstan: An Interview with Rashid Nugmanov,” in Film Criticism, Summer 1990.

Hayes, N., “Recent Soviet Film,” in Enclitic, vol. 11, no. 4, 1994.

* * *

In the bleak filmscape of glasnost, The Needle stood out as a black sheep of a movie. The most playful and offbeat of the Soviet films of the period, it contrasted sharply to the mainstream, which was overwhelmed with revisionism of the Stalinist past and nihilistic social criticism.

Made in 1988 by a young Kazakh director, Rashid Nugmanov, fresh out of VGIK (the national film school), The Needle was a pioneering effort in several ways. Having come from a remote, stagnant republic of Kazakhstan, the picture set off a movement that has come to be known as the “Kazakh New Wave.” Represented by such works as Alexander Baranov’s and Bakhyt Kilibayev’s The Three (1988) and Woman of the Day (1990); Kilibayev’s The Tick (1990); Baranov’s He and She (1990); Abai Karypkov’s Little Fish in Love (1989); and Serik Aprymov’s The Last Stop (1989), the Kazakh New Wave was for the agonizing Soviet film of the late 1980s what the French New Wave was for the dusty French film of the late 1950s. The Needle was the movement’s a bout de souffle. The film also became a model for the Russian version of postmodernism—uninhibited and uninformed, compensating for the lack of culture, skill, and resources with mischief and wit. A young man named Moro (played by Viktor Tsoi, the late rock ‘n’ roll legend from the St. Petersburg band “Kino”) returns to his Asiatic hometown only to find his ex-girlfriend, Dina (Marina Smirnova), becoming a drug addict and himself becoming involved in the bizarre life of the city’s underworld. In an attempt to save Dina, Moro takes her away to the Aral Sea, turned into a barren desert by the time they arrive. There Dina seems cured, but back in town everything starts anew. Almost desperate, Moro decides to fight the drug dealers, led by a hospital doctor (played by another rock ‘n’ roll star, eccentric leader of the “Sound of Mu” band and the future star of Taxi Blues, Pyotr Mamonov), when one of them stabs him in a deserted park.

“My film is really about friends who got together to have fun, while playing in filmmaking.” What could have been a quote from Godard or Fassbinder is in fact a remark from Rashid Nugmanov. The Needle is indeed neither about drugs nor about a generation of Soviet youth, lost between the East and West, communism and capitalism, cynicism and romanticism (though its poignant tone hints on the latter). The film’s essence emerges from the director’s manipulation of various cultural stereotypes rather than social or psychological problems. The picture is dedicated “to the Soviet television”—an ironic show of Nugmanov’s trendy obsession with media technology (he likes filling the screen with television screens). In a nod to the Jackie Chan cult, the epilogue plays the outtakes of the action sequences. An inventive predecessor of Pulp Fiction, The Needle weaves its soundtrack out of the Soviet “surfer music” from the 1950s. Every twist of the narrative is “forewarned” by a syrupy voice-over in a manner suggestive of a children’s program a la “Sesame Street.” On top of all this, the film, made by an ethnic Kazakh who never learned Kazakh and starring a Soviet-Korean from St. Petersburg, speaks in various tongues—Kazakh, Russian, Italian, German, and English—which creates the image of a Tower-of-Babel-like world, maybe facing a similar future.

Yet The Needle works best when it plays on the popular image of its star and the genre scenarios it provides. Viktor Tsoi, who followed the tracks of James Dean and Wajda's early protagonist Zbigniew Cybulski when he drove into a tree and into untimely, mythical immortality in 1990, was cultivated in the Soviet pop scene as "the last romantic." That is why and how he was cast in The Needle. Tsoi's romanticism was that of a generation which skipped Byron and Schiller and went straight for Clint Eastwood. It was an ersatz romanticism which could neither admit to nor accept its own secondariness—precisely what made it so unique and attractive in the context of the "tired culture" of remakes and references. In parallel with the Kazakh filmmakers, and indeed unbeknownst to them, the Hong Kong auteurs, especially John Woo, were exercising the same kind of romanticism—violent, stylized, extravagant. Its generic constituents—in The Needle, or in Woo's Killer and Hard-Boiled—are hard to miss: a trenchcoat (both in Alma-Ata and Hong Kong the weather suggests rather a t-shirt); sunglasses, reflecting a gun-wielding opponent; a cigarette, hanging in the corner of a mouth, its smoke not obstructing the view of a target; a wet sidewalk at night; a bluesy score; and a doomed romance—but where Rashid Nugmanov, educated behind the iron curtain, learned the art of cool remains a mystery. Whatever the source of his inspiration—smuggled comic strips or, more likely, Godard with his love/hate relationship with American pop culture and happy sensibility of the "poor cinema"—The Needle stands proudly on its own. That its promise of a new filmic language was never quite realized makes it no less appealing.

—Michael Brashinsky

IKIRU

(To Live; Doomed)

Japan, 1952

Director: Akira Kurosawa

Production: Toho (Tokyo); black and white, 35mm; running time: 143 minutes; length: 3918 meters. Released 9 October 1952. Filmed 1952 in Tokyo.

Producer: Shojiro Motoki; screenplay: Shinobu Hashimoto, Hideo Oguni, and Akira Kurosawa; photography: Asakazu Nakai; editor: Koichi Iwashita; sound: Fumio Yanoguchi; art director: So Matsuyama; music: Fumio Hayasaka; lighting: Shigeru Mori.

Cast: Takashi Shimura (Kanji Watanabe); Nobuo Kaneko (Mitsuo Watanabe); Kyoko Seki (Kazue Watanabe); Makoto Kobori (Kiichi Watanabe); Kumeko Urabe (Taysu Watanabe); Yoshie Minami (Maid); Miki Odagiri (Toyo Odagiri); Kamatari Fujiwara (Ono); Minosuke Yamada (Saito); Haruo Tanaka (Sakai); Bokuzen Hidari (Ohara); Shinichi Himori (Kimura); Nobuo Nakamura (Deputy Mayor); Kazuo Abe (City assemblyman); Masao Shimizu (Doctor); Ko Kimura (Intern); Atsushi Watanabe (Patient); Yunosuke Ito (Novelist); Yatsuko Tanami (Hostess); Fuyuki Murakami (Newspaperman); Seiji Miyaguchi (Gang-Boss); Daisuke Kato (Gangmember); Kin Sugai, Eiko Miyoshi, Fumiko Homma (Housewives); Ichiro Chiba (Police-man); Minoru Chiaki (Noguchi); Toranosuke Ogawa (Park Section Chief); Tomoo Nagai and Hirayoshi Aono (Reprters); Akira Tani (Old man at bar); Toshiyuki Ichimura (Pianist at cabaret).

Award: The David O. Selznick "Golden Laurel" Award, 1961.

Publications

Script:

Hashimoto, Shinobu, Hideo Oguni, and Akira Kurosawa, Ikiru, New York, 1969; also in Contemporary Japanese Cinema, edited by Howard Hibbet, New York, 1977.

Books:

Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, The Japanese Film: Art and Industry, New York, 1960; revised edition, Princeton, 1982.

Richie, Donald, Japanese Movies, Tokyo, 1961; as Japanese Cinema: Film Style and National Character, New York, 1971.

Ezratti, Sacha, Kurosawa, Paris, 1964.

Richie, Donald, The Films of Akira Kurosawa, Berkeley, 1965; revised edition, 1970; 1989; 1999.

Kenny, Don, editor, The Complete Works of Akira Kurosawa, Tokyo, 1971.

Mesnil, Michael, Kurosawa, Paris, 1973.

Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, New York, 1978; revised edition, Tokyo, 1985.

Burch, Noël, To the Distant Observer, Berkeley, 1979.

Erens, Patricia, Akira Kurosawa: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, The Japanese Film: Art and Industry, expanded edition, Princeton, 1982.

Kurosawa, Akira, Something Like an Autobiography, New York, 1982.

Sato, Tadao, Currents in Japanese Cinema, Tokyo, 1982.

Tassone, Aldo, Akira Kurosawa, Paris, 1983.

Goodwin, James, Akira Kurosawa & Intertextual Cinema, Baltimore, 1993.

Goodwin, James, Perspectives on Akira Kurosawa, New York, 1994.

Prince, Stephen, The Warrior's Camera, Princeton, 1999.

Articles:

Anderson, Joseph, "The History of Japanese Movies," in Films in Review (New York), June-July 1953.

Leyda, Jay, "The Films of Akira Kurosawa," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1954.

Miner, Earl Roy, "Japanese Film in Modern Dress," in Quarterly Review of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Summer 1956.

Ikiru

Bazin, André, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1957.

Anderson, Lindsay, "2 Inches off the Ground," in Sight and Sound (London) Winter 1957.

Dyer, Peter John, in Films and Filming (London), August 1959.

Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 30 January 1960.

Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), 10 February 1960.

Roman, Robert, in Films in Review (New York), March 1960.

Bernhardt, William, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1960.

Filmfacts (New York), no. 3, 1960.

McVay, Douglas, in Films and Filming (London), July and August 1961.

"Kurosawa Issue" of Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), Spring 1964.

Richie, Donald, "Kurosawa on Kurosawa," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer and Autumn 1964.

Kauffmann, Stanley, in A World of Film: Criticism and Comment, New York, 1966.

Passek, Jean-Loup, in Cinéma (Paris), December 1974.

Simone, R. Thomas, "The Myths of 'The Sickness unto Death' . . .," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Winter 1975.

Sineaux, Michel, "Eloge de la Folie," in Positif (Paris), January 1975.

Martin, Marcel, in Image et Son (Paris), February 1980.

Magny, Joel, in Cinéma (Paris), March 1980.

Van Beek, S., in Skoop (Amsterdam), August 1980.

Labre, C., "Humilié et initié," in Positif (Paris), October 1980.

Nygren, S., "Doubleness and Idiosyncrasy in Cross-Cultural Analysis," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (New York), no. 1-3, 1991.

Torres, S., "Vivir," in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 11, January 1993.

MacKinnon, Gillies, "Haunting Visions," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 4, no. 11, November 1994.

Bovkis, Elen A., "Ikiru: the Role of Women in a Male Narrative," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 40, May 1996.

Carr, Barbara, "Goethe and Kurosawa: Faust and the Totality of Human Experience—West and East," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 24, no. 3, 1996.

* * *

Akira Kurosawa's popularity in the West has been based primarily on his jidai-geki (period films). The gendai-geki (contemporary dramas), despite the championship of many critics, have been relatively neglected. Ikiru is the major exception to this rule. Its reputation rested initially on the seriousness of its subject (how does a man with only a few months left to live find meaning in life?), its humanism (Kurosawa's commitment to individual heroism, discovered in an apparently insignificant and undistinguished person), its social criticism (the satire on bureaucracy), and the power and directness of its emotional appeal. The film also became central to the anti-Kurosawa backlash led by certain auteur critics bent on attacking the notion that the importance of a film had any connection with the importance of its subject; to them, the humanism seemed naive, the social satire obvious, the emotional effects contrived, laborious and rhetorical. Neither view accounts for the particularity—in some ways the oddy—of Kurosawa's work.

The emphasis on a formal analysis of Ikiru in Noël Burch's brilliant book on Japanese cinema, To the Distant Observer, goes some way towards rectifying the inadequacy of previous approaches. Burch discusses the film in terms of its elaborate and rigorous formal system of symmetries and asymmetries contained within the overall "rough-hewn geometry" that he sees as Kurosawa's most distinctive general characteristic. The film falls into two strongly demarcated sections, the break coming about two-thirds of the way through. The first part begins and ends with the voice of an off-screen narrator, who tells us that Watanabe has only six months to live, and, later, that he has died. The intervening narrative takes us through Watanabe's discovery of his situation and his search to find a meaning for his life, culminating in his moment of decision. The second part (marked formally by the narrator's last intrusion and, in terms of narrative, by the death of the film's hero and central consciousness) shows Watanabe's funeral wake. The two parts are linked by a formal device: each contains five flashbacks the precise pattern of which is inverted in part two. At the same time, each part has its own highly organized formal structure. Part one consists of a prologue which includes the time preceding Watanabe's discovery of his fatal disease, and three sections. The prologue is clearly marked off from the rest by the only use in the film of a striking technical device: the shutting off of the soundtrack in the shot where Watanabe leaves the clinic in a state of shock, totally absorbed by his plight, and is nearly run down by a truck (the sound crashing in again at that moment). The ensuing three sections show the three phases of his search for meaning, each ending in disillusionment: his reevaluation of his relationship with the son to whom his life has been devoted; his plunge into the hedonism of Tokyo's nightlife; his relationship with the young girl who used to work in his office. The first part, then, covers a considerable extent of time and space; the second part (flashbacks and a brief epilogue apart) is contained within a single night and a single room. The three-section structure of part one is "answered" in part two by the three intrusions of outsiders into the wake: the reporters, the women from the district that has benefited from Watanabe's achievement, and the policeman who recounts the manner of his death. Where each of the three sections of part one marked a phase in the search for meaning, each of the intrusions marks a stage in the revelation of the truth about his achievements.

The "rough-hewn geometry," the use of the narrator, the abrupt narrative break, and the frequently disruptive editing all combine to produce a strong sense of distancing. What is remarkable about Ikiru, and crucial to the Kurosawa "flavor," is the way in which this collides with the film's equally strong emotional rhetoric, setting up a continuous tension between involvement and distance.

—Robin Wood

IM LAUF DER ZEIT

(Kings of the Road)

West Germany, 1976

Director: Wim Wenders

Production: Wim Wenders Produktion; black and white, 35mm; running time: 165 minutes, some sources list 176 minutes; length: 15,740 feet. Released 17 March 1976. Filmed along the border regions between West and East Germany.

Producer: Wim Wenders; executive producer: Michael Wiedemann; screenplay: Wim Wenders; photography: Robbie Müller and Martin Schäfer; editor: Peter Przygodda; sound recordists: Martin Müller and Bruno Bollhalder; sound re-recordist: Paul Schöler; art directors: Heidi Lüdi and Bernd Hirsborn; music: Axel Linstädt; performed by: Improved Sound Limited.

Cast: Rüdiger Vogler (Bruno Winter); Hanns Zischler (Robert Lander); Lisa Kreuzer (Cashier); Rudolf Schündler (Robert's father); Marquard Böhm (Man who has lost his wife); Dieter Traier (Garage owner); Franziska Stömmer (Cinema owner); Patrick Kreuzer (Little boy).

Award: Cannes Film Festival, International Critics Award, 1976.

Publications

Script:

Wenders, Wim, "Casem" (script extract) in Film a Doba (Prague), August 1977.

Books:

Sandford, John, The New German Cinema, Totowa, New Jersey, 1980.
Geist, Kathe, The Cinema of Wim Wenders 1967–1977, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

Johnston, Sheila, Wim Wenders, London, 1981.

Buchka, Peter, Augen kann man nicht Kaufen: Wim Wenders und seine Filme, Munich, 1983.

Corrigan, Timothy, New German Cinema: The Displaced Image, Austin, Texas, 1983.

Franklin, James, New German Cinema from Oberhausen to Hamburg, Boston, 1983.

Grob, Norbert, Die Formen des filmische Blicks: Wenders: Die frühen Filme, Munich, 1984.

Phillips, Klaus, editor, New German Filmmakers: from Oberhausen through the 1970s, New York, 1984.

Im Lauf der Zeit

Devillers, Jean-Pierre, Berlin, L.A., Berlin: Wim Wenders, Paris, 1985.
 Boujut, Michel, Wim Wenders, 3rd edition, Paris, 1986.
 Geist, Kathe, The Cinema of Wim Wenders: From Paris, France to Paris, Texas, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1988.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema: A History, London, 1989.
 Wenders, Wim, The Logic of Images, New York, 1992.
 Kolker, Robert P., and Peter Beicken, The Films of Wim Wenders, New York, 1993.
 Cook, Roger F., and Gerd Gemunden, The Cinema of Wim Wenders: Image, Narrative, and the Postmodern Condition, Detroit, 1997.
 Wenders, Wim, The Act of Seeing, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 17 March 1976.
 Wiedemann, H., and F. Mueller-Scherz, Interview with Wenders in Film und Ton Magazine (Munich), May 1976; also in Cinéma (Paris), December 1976.
Skoop (Amsterdam), May 1976.
 Grant, J., in Cinéma (Paris), June 1976.

Maraval, P., in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1976.
 Bracourt, Guy, in Ecran (Paris), July 1976.
Filmkritik (Munich), July 1976.
 Bonitzer, Pierre, "Allemagne, années errantes," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1976.
 Tarratt, Margaret, in Films and Filming (London), May 1977.
 Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1977.
 "Wim Wenders on Kings of the Road," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1977.
 Hallen, S., in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 20, no. 4, 1978.
 Kass, J. M., in Movietone News (Seattle), 22 February 1978.
 "De Emotionele reizen van Wim Wenders," in Skrien (Amsterdam), April 1978.
 Alvarez, R., in Filmcritica (Rome), February 1979.
 Bencivenni, A., in Bianco e Nero (Rome), May-June 1979.
 Balzola, A., "L'afasia del cinema nel silenzio di Wenders," in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), October 1980.
 Huttunen, T., "Hidas kotiinpaluu," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 2, 1989.
 Gemunden, G., "On the Way to Language: Wenders' Kings of the Road," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 2, 1991.

Hurtado, J.A., “Da viajes y nomadas,” in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 16, October 1994.

Torreiro, M., “En el curso del tiempo,” in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 16, October 1994.

* * *

The first image of Im Lauf der Zeit is a title specifying where and when the film was shot. The importance of location becomes obvious from the length of screen time devoted to images of the land, the road, and the small towns along the itinerary which, rather than a script, was the organizing structure of the film.

The choice of subject was made early in the production. The preeminence of the itinerary insured that the spatial dimension would structure the narrative. The choice of route allowed the filmmakers to photograph the east/west borderline guard towers, providing a visual metaphor that functions on several levels. Wenders claims to have chosen the area because it was seldom photographed, an underpopulated, forgotten area he wanted to record on film. He was also able to preserve images of the disappearing small town cinema houses, which served as subject matter in terms of both the condition of the German film industry in 1975 and the history of German cinema. These two facets of the same subject are introduced in a pseudo-interview conducted with an actual movie house owner by a fictional character. Just as important as location is an exactness of time. Wenders and cameraman Robbie Müller were able to make use of the natural light to evoke a precise sense of time of day.

Another significant production decision was to shoot chronologically, allowing the crew to react to what was found along the route—to react to their subject in the sense of documentary filmmaking. It allowed for the workings of chance.

The film does not attempt to reveal the characters psychologically through the editing style. While the film does to a certain extent represent the consciousnesses of its two protagonists, a distance is maintained. The acting is relatively unrevealing, there is little dialogue, and the camera pulls out to extreme long shot at intervals. Most important is an editing style that de-emphasizes point-of-view techniques. This includes the frequent absence of either the glance or reaction shot, a lack of signification registered in the reaction when it is present, and a tendency to cut just after the glance has turned away, rather than on the look.

A primary characteristic of the film is its length, or more exactly the length of time between “events,” resulting in its slowness, or sense of duration. The film covers six and a half days in three hours. It is the time between events that shifts the emphasis from story to setting. These are the summary sequences, transition scenes punctuated by wipes and dissolves. The sense of duration also comes from the types of events portrayed on the screen. It is as if Wenders wanted to record actions which usually are excluded from films—the time it takes to enter a room, climb a stairway or the process of an everyday task—in the same way that he wanted to film in an area that is usually ignored as a film location. Ellipses in this film tend to be between scenes, not within them.

The third part of a loosely connected trilogy (with Alice in den Städten and Falsche Bewegung), Im Lauf der Zeit possesses a documentary quality dependent primarily on its descriptive nature, a preoccupation with recording and preserving events and a concern for surfaces. Its ending suggests the possibility of change for its protagonists, but it is not so optimistic for the future of film in Germany. The last movie house owner has closed her theater, waiting for a change in the industry, but at least no longer complacent and willing to exhibit whatever she is given.

—Ann Harris

IN A LONELY PLACE

USA, 1950

Director: Nicholas Ray

Production: A Santana Production for Columbia; black and white; running time: 93 minutes; length: 8,375 feet. Released May 1950.

Producer: Robert Lord; screenplay: Andrew Solt, from a novel by Dorothy B. Hughes; photography: Burnett Guffey; editor: Viola Lawrence; art director: Robert Peterson; music: George Antheil.

Cast: Humphrey Bogart (Dixon Steele); Gloria Grahame (Laurel Gray); Frank Lovejoy (Brub Nicolai); Carl Benton Reid (Captain Lochner); Art Smith (Mel Lippman); Jeff Donnell (Sylvia Nicolai); Martha Stewart (Mildred Atkinson); Robert Warwick (Charlie Waterman); Ruth Gillette (Martha).

In a Lonely Place

Publications

Books:

- McArthur, Colin, Underworld U.S.A., London, 1972.
 Eyles, Allen, Bogart, New York, 1975.
 Kreidl, John, Nicholas Ray, Boston, 1977.
 Pettigrew, Terence, The Bogart File, London, 1977.
 Kaplan, E. Ann, editor, Women in Film Noir, London, 1978.
 Silver, Alan, and Elizabeth Ward, editors, Film Noir, London, 1981.
 Masi, Stefano, Nicholas Ray, Florence, 1983.
 Blaine, Allan, Nicholas Ray: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.
 Hillier, Jim, editor, Cahiers du cinema 1: Neo-realism, Hollywood, New Wave, London, 1985.
 Erice, Victor, and Jos Oliver, Nicholas Ray y su tiempo, Madrid, 1986.
 Giuliani, Pierre, Nicholas Ray, Paris, 1987.
 Wagner, Jean, Nicholas Ray, Paris, 1987.
 Coe, Jonathan, Humphrey Bogart: Take It and Like It, New York, 1991.
 Eisenschitz, Bernard, Nicholas Ray, New York, 1993, 1996.
 Bogart, Stephen H., and Gary Provost, Bogart: In Search of My Father, New York, 1995.
 Schlesinger, Judith, Bogie: A Life in Pictures, New York, 1998.
 Sperber, A.M., Bogart, New York, 1998.
 Cunningham, Ernest W., Ultimate Bogie, Los Angeles, 1999.
 Duchovnay, Gerald, Humphrey Bogart: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1999.
 Meyers, Jeffery, Bogart: A Life in Hollywood, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- Today's Cinema*, 18 May 1950.
Motion Picture Herald (New York), 20 May 1950.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1950.
 Place, J. A., and L. S. Peterson, "Some Visual Motifs of Film Noir," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1974.
 McVay, Douglas, "Outcast State: In a Lonely Place," in Bright Lights (Los Angeles), no. 7, 1978.
 Ménéil, A., "Le Violent," in Cinématographe (Paris), July-August 1983.
 Telotte, J. P., "Film noir and the Dangers of Discourse," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (New York), Spring 1984.
 Palmer, J. W., "In a Lonely Place: Paranoia in the Dream Factory," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), July 1985.
 Williamson, Judith, in New Statesman (London), 22 January 1988.
 Oplustil, K., in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 6, October 1989.
 Chiacchiari, F., "Il diritto di uccidere di Nicholas Ray," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), October 1990.
 Bawden, James, "In a Lonely Place," in Films in Review (New York), vol. 45, no. 7-8, July-August 1994.
 King, N., "Interview with Dana Polan," in Metro Magazine (St. Kilda West), no. 97, Autumn 1994.
Castoro Cinema (Milan), no. 105, 2nd ed., September 1995.
 Chase, D., "In Praise of the Naughty Mind: Gloria Grahame," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 33, September/October 1997.

* * *

According to Nicholas Ray, "Bogie had seen my first film, They Live by Night, and had admired it greatly. He approached me to make Knock on Any Door, optioned me for a second film and exercised the option immediately in the form of In a Lonely Place." This second actor/director collaboration—an examination of the underside of Hollywood—was made by Humphrey Bogart's production company, Santana, with Bogart also taking the lead role of the screenwriter, Dixon Steele. In preparing this, his fourth feature, Ray immediately dismissed the 1947 novel by the successful suspense writer Dorothy B. Hughes, which was to have formed the basis of the film. He did so, claiming he was interested "in doing a film about the violence in all of us, rather than a mass murder film or one about a psychotic."

As with many of Ray's early films, In a Lonely Place involves a thoughtful examination of the nature of violence, particularly how an individual can be forced to such behavior, either by circumstances beyond his control or by the desperate need to compensate for loneliness.

Ray effectively begins the film by illustrating both the issues of loneliness and violence. As Dixon drives alone late one night down Santa Monica Boulevard, his violent nature comes to the fore as he is provoked by the insensitive comments of a fellow driver. His tendency toward violent solution erupts again later, and more dramatically, when he brutally assaults and almost kills a young college student who taunts him on the road. While the former violent outburst was encouraged by others, the latter is a result of Dixon's mounting frustration at being wrongly suspected of the murder of a young coat check girl. This situation has also taken its toll on his current relationship with Laurel Gray (Gloria Grahame), a neighbor who provided him with an alibi by telling the police that Dixon was at home when the murder was committed. While this relationship with Miss Gray has been of great importance to Dixon—personally, it has helped to heal the wounds of loneliness; professionally, it has been instrumental in his return to the typewriter—the ensuing murder investigation elicits several violent outbursts and brings about his downfall. With others encouraging her suspicions, Laurel begins to fear for her life; ultimately, in the moments before the real murderer confesses, Dixon, crazed with Laurel's doubts, attempts to strangle her.

Using this film also critically to examine Hollywood life, Ray positions Dixon Steele as a representative of what happens to many in Hollywood, as an individual whose loneliness and frustration are the direct result of a hostile artistic climate. And this is where Bogart's influence as producer (uncredited) is most felt. According to Ray, it was Bogart who insisted on the subplot of a has-been actor, Charlie Waterman (Robert Warwick), as a way of further illustrating the violence that men inflict upon each other. Dixon is the only person who defends the aging alcoholic; to everyone else he is a subject for derision.

Throughout the film, Ray effectively translates his thematic concerns of loneliness and violence into key aspects of the film's design. As J. A. Place and L. S. Peterson note in their seminal essay "Some Visual Motifs of Film Noir," In a Lonely Place is characteristic of this cinematic style in its effective establishment of a mood of claustrophobia, paranoia, despair, and nihilism. Many of the film's key scenes occur at night, the lack of light accentuating both the loneliness of the protagonist and impending violence in the city. Early in the film, Dixon is regularly shown alone in his apartment: by day, the light harshly pierces the room through blinds which adorn the windows; by night, the light from Laurel's apartment accentuates the space that separates them. Perhaps most notably, Ray's tight compositional framings and stark lighting contrasts distinguish this as among the best of the film noir cycle.

Originally, the film was to have ended ambiguously, with the spectator never knowing whether Dixon had actually strangled Laurel or not. After shooting that ending, however, Ray cleared the set and spontaneously directed the ending which now exists, an ending in which, after almost killing Laurel, Dixon learns he has been exonerated in the murder case, only to realize that his violence has destroyed his relationship. He then exits Laurel's apartment and is seen against the criss-crossing patterns of the complex courtyard—a lonely figure in a harsh environment.

—Doug Tomlinson

IN SEARCH OF FAMINE

See AKALER SANDANE

IN THE REALM OF THE SENSES.

See AI NOCORRIDA

INDIA SONG

France, 1975

Director: Marguerite Duras

Production: Sunchild, Les Films Armorial, S. Damiani and A. Cavaglione; color, 35mm. Released 1975.

Producer: Stephane Tchalgaldjeff; screenplay: Marguerite Duras; photography: Bruno Nuytten; editor: Solange Leprince; sound: Michel Vionnet; original music: Carlos D'Alessio, recording at the ORTF; Gaston Sylvestre, Beethoven selection: Gerard Fremy, "India Song Blues" interpreted by: Raoul Verez.

Cast: Delphine Seyrig (Anne-Marie Stretter); Michel Lonsdale (Vice-Counsel of France); Matthieu Carriere (Young attaché to the Ambassador); Didier Flamand (Young escort to Stretter); Claude Mann (Michael Richardson); Vernon Dobtcheff (Georges Crown); Claude Juan (A guest); Satasinh Manila (Voice of the beggar); Nicole Hiss, Monique Simonet, Viviane Forrester, Dionys Mascolo, and Marguerite Duras (Voices of Time); François Lebrun, Benoit Jacquot, Nicole-Lise Bernheim, Kevork Kutudjan, Daniel Dobbels, Jean-Claude Biette, Marie-Odile Briot, and Pascal Kane (Voices from the reception).

Publications

Script:

Duras, Marguerite, India Song: Texte—theatre—filme, Paris, 1973; translated as India Song, New York, 1976.

Books:

- Bernheim, N.-L., Marguerite Duras tourne un film, Paris, 1976.
 Ropars-Wuilleumier, Marie-Claire, La Texte divisé, Paris, 1981.
 Trastulli, Daniela, Dalla parola all'immagine: Viaggio nel cinema di Marguerite Duras, Geneva, 1982.
 Borgomano, Madeleine, L'écriture filmique de Marguerite Duras, Paris, 1985.
 Brossard, Jean-Pierre, editor, Marguerite Duras: Cineaste, écrivain, La Chaux-de-Fonde, Switzerland, 1985.
 Guers-Villate, Yvonne, Continuité/discontinuité de l'oeuvre durassienne, Brussels, 1985.
 Hofmann, Carol, Forgetting & Marguerite Duras, Boulder, 1991.
 Hill, Leslie, Marguerite Duras: Apocalyptic Desires, New York, 1993.
 Schuster, Marilyn R., Marguerite Duras: Revisited, New York, 1993.
 Harvey, Robert, and Helene Volat, Marguerite Duras: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1997.
 Williams, James S., The Erotics of Passage: Pleasure, Politics, & Form in the Later Work of Marguerite Duras, New York, 1997.
 Knapp, Critical Essays on Marguerite Duras, New York, 1998.
 Ricouart, Janine, Marguerite Duras Lives On, Lanham, 1998.
 Ladimer, Bethany, Colette, Beauvoir and Duras: Age & Women Writers, Gainesville, November 1999.
 Cody, Gabrielle H., Impossible Performances: Duras As Dramatist, New York, 2000.

Articles:

- Clouzot, C., in Ecran (Paris), April 1975.
 Amiel, M., in Cinéma (Paris), June 1975.
 Moskowitz, G., in Variety (New York), 18 June 1975.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, "Les Yeux fertiles," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1975.
 Bonitzer, Pierre, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1975.
 Lanol, A., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1975.
 Dawson, Jan, "India Song, a Chant of Love and Death: Marguerite Duras Interviewed," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1975.
 Clarens, Carlos, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1975-76.
 Tarantino, M., Interview with Duras in Take One (Montreal), no. 4, 1976.
 "Marguerite Duras," in Film en Televisie (Brussels), November 1976.
 McWilliams, D., in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 4, 1977.
 Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1977.
 Stram, P., "Tanner and Duras," in Cinéma Quebec (Montreal), no. 10, 1977.
 Schepelern, P., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Summer 1978.
 "India Song Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 April 1979.
 Escudero, I., in Cinema 2002 (Madrid), October 1979.
 Forster, A., "Marguerite Duras," in Skrien (Amsterdam), September 1980.
 Duras, Marguerite, and E. Lyon, in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Fall 1980.
 De Kuyper, E., in Skrien (Amsterdam), May 1981.
Undercut (London), nos. 2-5, August 1981-July 1982.
 Porte, M., "The Places of Marguerite Duras," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Fall 1983.
 Loutti, M. A., "Duras' India," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 14, no. 3, 1986.

India Song

- Murphy, C. J., "Duras' New Narrative Regions: The Role of Desire in the Films and Novels of Marguerite Duras," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 14, no. 3, 1986.
- Holmlund, C. A., "Displacing Limits of Difference: Gender, Race, and Colonialism in Edward Said and Homi Bhabha's Theoretical Models and Marguerite Duras's Experimental Films," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (New York), no. 1–3, 1991.
- Williams B., "Splintered Perspectives: Counterpoint and Subjectivity in the Modernist Film Narrative," Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 2. 1991.
- Tesson, C., "J'ecoute India Song," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 459, September 1992.
- Jutel, T., "Marguerite Duras et le cinéma de la modernité: tout [est] ce qu'il n'y a pas dans India Song," in French Review, vol. 66, no. 4, 1993.
- Strauss, Frédéric, "India Song: Marguerite Duras," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Hors-série, 1993.
- Badir, S., "India Song ou le temps tragique," in Cinemas, vol. 5, no. 1/2, 1994.
- Vajdovich, G., "Antiregény és antifilm," in Filmkultura (Budapest), vol. 31, no. 4, April 1995.

McMullen, K., in Vertigo, vol. 1, no. 6, 1996.

Everett, Wendy, "Director as Composer: Marguerite Duras and the Musical Analogy," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 26, no. 2, April 1998.

* * *

India Song is radical in both form and content. Like Alain Resnais's L'année dernière à Marienbad, Duras's film offers an ambiguity of narrative—a type of enigma which paradoxically calls for a reading and yet makes any reading tentative. The film asks, who is Anne-Marie Stretter, the protagonist? What is her relation to men? To India? Or to a beggar woman whose destiny somehow parallels her own? In answering these questions or, more precisely, in eluding any definitive answer, the film expresses some important feminist perspectives while making innovations in film narrative.

Duras, in this film, finally puts into full practice what Sergei Eisenstein posed in theory 45 years earlier—non-synchronous sound. She separates the verbal track of the film from the visual track in such a way that either the narrator or the dialogue is over-voiced with images that do not correspond on a simple story level. Both the verbal and visual tracks offer us fragmented and disparate pieces of the puzzle of Anne-Marie Stretter that the viewer must reassemble.

Duras has structured the plot in layers. Madame Stretter, wife of the French Ambassador to colonial India, has a doppelgänger in an insane beggar woman who haunts the embassy gardens. While we never see the woman, we hear her distant off-camera cries. Often these cries are juxtaposed with the restrained stance and expression of Madame Stretter. It is as if these cries spring from Madame Stretter's inner self, which has no outlet in the oppressive society she inhabits. The beggar woman, whom we learn has followed Madame Stretter from French Indo-China, perhaps is emblematic of India or other lands burdened by European imperialism; her cries may also be theirs.

A sense of the oppressive lends unity to the film. While we never see colonial India beyond the embassy walls, Duras conveys, through actors' movements and details in the mise-en-scène, the oppressively humid atmosphere. Colonialism is shown oppressing not only the Indians but the Europeans who seem in power. There is a double meaning in Madame Stretter's sexual enslavement of the men around her—all members of the apparent ruling-class. She and India are ineluctable forces that elude and, even to some degree, control the male hierarchy which only seems to oppress them.

Duras explores stasis in all of its forms and ramifications. The characters often remain immobile under the influence of both the sultry atmosphere and class-imposed decorum. India Song treats death and life at once, or more precisely, death in life; for Madame Stretter lives a death amid a mise-en-scène filled with funeral objects and flowers. Further, since sound and visuals do not match in a realistic sense, narration and dialogue seem something vaguely heard from beyond the tomb.

Interlacing the destiny of one woman with another and then comparing their situation to nations occupied by foreigners suggests that India Song be read as a film about political oppression on all levels—from personal to national. While some might find Duras's view—that women and, by extension, nations are able to transcend oppression—somewhat naive, the innovative techniques she uses gives this work a haunting quality beyond mere polemics.

—Rodney Farnsworth

THE INFORMER

USA, 1935

Director: John Ford

Production: RKO/Pictures Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 91 minutes; length: 10 reels. Released 1935.

Producer: Cliff Reid; screenplay: Dudley Nichols, from the novel by Liam O'Flaherty; photography: Joseph H. August; editor: George Hively; sound: Hugh McDowell Jr.; art directors: Van Nest Polglase and Charles Kirk; music: Max Steiner; costume designer: Walter Plunkett.

Cast: Victor McLaglen (Gypo Nolan); Heather Angel (Mary McPhillip); Preston Foster (Dan Gallagher); Margot Grahame (Katie Madden); Wallace Ford (Frankie McPhillip); Una O'Connor (Mrs. McPhillip); J. M. Kerrigan (Terry); Joseph Sauers (Bartly Mulholland);

The Informer

Neil Fitzgerald (Tommy Connor); Donald Meek (Peter Mulligan); D'Arcy Corrigan (Blind man); Gaylord Pendleton (Dennis Daly); May Boley (Madame Betty); Leo McCabe (Donahue); Francis Ford (Flynn); Grizelda Harvey (The Lady); Dennis O'Dea.

Awards: Oscars for Best Director, Best Actor (McLaglen), Best Screenplay, Best Score, 1935; Best Screenplay, Venice Film Festival, 1935; New York Film Critics Awards for Best Picture and Best Director, 1935.

Publications

Scripts:

Nichols, Dudley, "The Informer" (condensed screenplay), in Theatre Arts (New York), August 1951; as "Le Mouchard," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1965.

Books:

Mitry, Jean, John Ford, Paris, 1954.

Bluestone, George, Novels into Films, Berkeley, 1961.

Haudiquet, Philippe, John Ford, Paris, 1966.

Baxter, John, The Cinema of John Ford, New York, 1971.

McBride, Joseph, and Michael Wilmington, John Ford, London, 1975.

Bogdanovitch, Peter, John Ford, Berkeley, 1978.

- Ford, Dan, Pappy: The Life of John Ford, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.
- Sinclair, Andrew, John Ford, New York, 1979.
- Anderson, Lindsay, About John Ford, London, 1981.
- Caughie, John, editor, Theories of Authorship: A Reader, London, 1981.
- Schatz, Thomas, Hollywood Genres: Formulas, Filmmaking, and the Studio System, New York, 1981.
- Gallagher, Tag, John Ford: The Man and His Films, Berkeley, 1986.
- Stowell, Peter, John Ford, Boston, 1986.
- Lourdeaux, Lee, Italian & Irish Filmmakers in America: Ford, Capra, Coppola & Scorsese, Springfield, 1990; 1993.
- Davis, Ronald L., John Ford: Hollywood's Old Master, Norman, 1997.
- Girus, Sam B., Hollywood Renaissance: The Cinema of Democracy in the Era of Ford, Capra, & Kazan, New York, 1998.
- Levy, Bill, John Ford: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1998.
- Eyman, Scott, Print the Legend: The Life and Times of John Ford, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- New York Times*, 10 May 1935.
- Variety* (New York), 15 May 1935.
- Greene, Graham, in Spectator (London), 11 October 1935.
- Mitry, Jean, "John Ford," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1955.
- Stanbrook, Alan, in Films and Filming (London), July 1960.
- Barkun, Michael, "Notes on the Art of John Ford," in Film Culture (New York), no. 25, 1962.
- McVay, Douglas, "The Five Worlds of John Ford," in Films and Filming (London), June 1962.
- "Special Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1965.
- "John Ford Issue" of Présence du Cinéma (Paris), March 1965.
- "John Ford Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1966.
- "John Ford Issue" of Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), August 1971.
- "John Ford Issue" of Focus on Film (London), Spring 1971.
- Anderson, Lindsay, "John Ford," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), Spring 1971.
- "Ford's Stock Company" in Filmkritik (Munich), January 1972.
- Scapperotti, Dan, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Veress, J., in Filmkultura (Budapest), January 1985.
- Reid's Film Index* (Wyong), no. 3, 1989.
- Fuller, Samuel, "Comment John Ford et Max Steiner ont fait mon film préféré," in Positif (Paris), no. 400, June 1994.

* * *

John Ford was the perfect choice to direct the film version of Liam O'Flaherty's novel about the Sinn Fein Rebellion in Dublin in 1922 as Ford's Irish heritage proved invaluable in setting the background for the film. The Informer was Ford's 74th film as a director and he would do 48 more before his retirement in 1966.

Flaherty's novel was first filmed as an early talkie in Great Britain in 1929 with Lars Hansen in the leading role. Six years later, Ford's version was released through RKO Radio Pictures. The mood piece surprised everyone, including the studio, by winning four Academy Awards and moving John Ford into the top echelon of Hollywood directors and Victor McLaglen into the role of one of the film industry's most trusted character actors.

Strictly observing the unities of time and space, the film traces Gypo Nolan from betrayal to death in just one 12-hour period. Whether Ford was aware he was making a film noir or not, he preceded the 1940s spate of "dark" films by having The Informer take place entirely at night.

The film opens with Gypo encountering a poster stating that there is a reward out for information leading to the capture of Frankie McPhillip, his rebel friend. Tearing the sign down and tossing it away, Gypo goes on his way only to discover, in one of Ford's most brilliant visual moments, that the poster takes on a life of its own and follows him down the street, eventually blowing onto his leg and clinging to it. The visual imagery continues as the viewer is introduced to Gypo's girlfriend Katie as a lovely madonna who suddenly changes into a bleach-blond street-walker by merely removing her scarf.

Reasoning that he and Katie would be able to get a boat to the United States with the money offered to turn Frankie in, Gypo informs on the fugitive to the police. As Frankie visits clandestinely with his mother and sister, he is ambushed and killed. Gypo gets his reward, but is soon under suspicion by rebel leader Dan Gallagher. Celebrating by getting drunk, Gypo is caught and, having spent all the blood money, confesses. He hides in Katie's apartment and when she innocently reveals his whereabouts, he is shot. The wounded Gypo staggers to a church where Frankie's mother is praying. She forgives him and he dies under the altar.

Much has been said about composer Max Steiner's contribution to The Informer. The music suitably underscores all the action from the atmospheric beginning to the religious ending. The flawless cast, composed mainly of Irish-born actors, make the film and the plot believable, and the lighting, costuming, art direction and cinematography all contribute to the stifling and tense atmosphere. Although over 60 years old, this melodrama still holds up well in a period when another Irish rebellion has been raging in the 1990s.

—James Limbacher

INTOLERANCE

USA, 1916

Director: D. W. Griffith

Production: Wark Producing Company, some sources list studio as Epoch Releasing Corp.; black and white (with some scenes tinted in original release prints), 35mm, silent; running time: about 220 minutes, some versions are 129 minutes, original version 8 hours. Released 5 September 1916, New York. Filmed fall 1914-July 1916 in Hollywood, basically on outdoor sets constructed by Griffith and his crew. Cost: about $386,000, though figures differ in various sources. Re-released with new score by Carl Davis, London Film Festival 1988.

Producer: D. W. Griffith; scenario: D. W. Griffith; photography: G. W. (Billy) Bitzer and Karl Brown; editors: James and Rose Smith; production designer (set decorator and architect): Frank Wortman; art directors: Walter L. Hall and others; music score which accompanied the film on its initial release: Joseph Carl Breil and D. W.

Intolerance

Griffith; assistants on film: Eric von Stroheim, W. S. Van Dyke, Tod Browning, Joseph Henabery, Edward Dillon, George Siegman, Lloyd Ingraham, and others.

Cast: The Modern Story: Mae Marsh (The Dear One); Robert Harron (The Boy); Fred Turner (The Girl's Father); Sam de Grasse (Jenkins); Vera Lewis (Miss Jenkins); Walter Long (Musketeer of the Slums); Ralph Lewis (The Governor); Monte Blue (Strike Leader); Tod Browning (Race car owner); Miriam Cooper (The Friendless One). The Babylonian Story: Alfred Page (Belshazzar); Constance Talmadge (The Mountain Girl); Elmer Clifton (The Rhapsode); Seena Owen (The Princess Beloved); George Siegman (Cyrus the Persian); Tully Marshall (High Priest of Bel); Carl Stockdale (King Nabonidus); Elmo Lincoln (Mighty Man of Valor); Jewel Carmen, Carol Dempster, Mildred Harris, Alma Rubens, Pauline Starke, Eve Southern, Natalie Talmadge, and Anna Mae Walthall (Slave girls and dancers); Frank Campeau, Donald Crisp, Douglas Fairbanks, DeWolfe Hopper, Wilfred Lucas, Owen Moore, Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tre, Tammany Young, others (Soldiers, courtiers, etc.). The French Story: Margery Wilson (Brown Eyes); Eugene Pallette (Prosper Latour); Spottiswoode Aitken (Father); Ruth Handford (Mother); Josephine Crowell (Catherine de Medici); Frank Bennett (Charles IX); Maxfield Stanley (Duc d'Anjou); Constance Talmadge (Marguerite de Valois). The Judean Story: Howard Gaye (The Nazarene); Lillian Langdon (Mary); Olga Grey (Mary Magdalene); Bessie Love (Bride of Cana); George Walsh (Bridegroom); W.S. Van Dyke (Wedding guest); Lillian Gish (The Woman Who Rocks the Cradle).

Publications

Script:

Griffith, D. W., Intolerance: Shot-by-Shot Analysis by Theodore Huff, New York, 1966; narrative scheme also published in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Spring 1972.

Books:

Wagenknecht, Edward, The Movies in the Age of Innocence, Norman, Oklahoma, 1962.
Lindgren, Ernest, The Art of the Film, New York, 1963.

- Brownlow, Kevin, The Parade's Gone By, London and New York, 1969.
- Gish, Lillian, The Movies, Mr. Griffith, and Me, New York, 1969.
- O'Dell, Paul, Griffith and the Rise of Hollywood, New York, 1970.
- Griffith, D. W., The Man Who Invented Hollywood: The Autobiography, edited by James Hart, Louisville, Kentucky, 1972.
- Henderson, Robert, D. W. Griffith: His Life and Work, New York, 1972.
- Bitzer, Billy, His Story, New York, 1973.
- Brown, Karl, Adventures with D. W. Griffith, New York and London, 1973; revised edition, 1988.
- Niver, Kemp, D. W. Griffith: His Biograph Films in Perspective, Los Angeles, 1974.
- Wagenknecht, Edward, and Antony Slide, The Films of D. W. Griffith, New York, 1975.
- Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
- Brion, Patrick, editor, D. W. Griffith, Paris, 1982.
- Mottet, Jean, editor, D. W. Griffith, Paris, 1984.
- Schickel, Richard, D. W. Griffith and the Birth of Film, London, 1984.
- Graham, Cooper C., and others, D. W. Griffith and the Biograph Company, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1985.
- Drew, William M., D. W. Griffith's "Intolerance": Its Genesis and Its Vision, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1986.
- Jesionowski, Joyce E., Thinking in Pictures: Dramatic Structures in D. W. Griffith's Biograph Films, Berkeley, 1987.
- Gunning, Tom, D. W. Griffith and the Origins of American Narrative Film: The Early Years at Biograph, Champaign, 1991.
- Leondopoulos, Jordan, Still the Moving World: Intolerance, Modernism, and Heart of Darkness, New York, 1991.
- Simmon, Scott, The Films of D. W. Griffith, New York, 1993.
- Schickel, Richard, D. W. Griffith: An American Life, New York, 1996.
- Articles:
- New York Times*, 6 September 1916.
- Soule, George, in New Republic (New York), 30 September 1916.
- Dell, Floyd, in Masses (New York), November 1916.
- Bitzer, Billy, in International Photographer (Los Angeles), October 1934.
- Joad, C. E. M., in New Statesman and Nation (London), February 1949.
- Trewin, J. C., "Rush Hour in Babylon," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1949.
- Feldman, Joseph and Harry, "The D. W. Griffith Influence," in Films in Review (New York), July-August 1950.
- Dunham, Harold, "Bessie Love," in Films in Review (New York), February 1959.
- Esnault, Philippe, in Cinéma (Paris), 1960.
- Tozzi, Romano, "Lillian Gish," in Films in Review (New York), July-August 1962.
- Bodeen, DeWitt, "Blanche Sweet," in Films in Review (New York), November 1965.
- Meyer, Richard J., "The Films of David Wark Griffith," in Film Comment (New York), Fall-Winter 1967.
- Casty, Alan, "The Films of D. W. Griffith: A Style for the Times," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Spring 1972.
- Oms, Marcel, "Essai de lecture thématique de Intolérance," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Spring 1972.
- "Dossier Intolérance," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Spring 1972.
- Bruno, E., in Filmcritica (Rome), November-December 1972.
- Hanson, Bernard, "D. W. Griffith: Some Sources," in Art Bulletin (New York), December 1972.
- Beylie, Claude, in Ecran (Paris), February 1973.
- Stern, Seymour, "D. W. Griffith's Intolerance: A Sun-Play of the Ages," in The Essential Cinema, New York, 1975.
- Belluccio, A., "Cabiria e Intolerance," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), May-August 1975.
- "Griffith Issue" of Films in Review (New York), October 1975.
- Kepley, Vance, Jr., "Intolerance and the Soviets: A Historical Investigation," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no.1, 1979.
- Merritt, Russell, "On First Looking into Griffith's Babylon: A Historical Investigation," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no.1, 1979.
- Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1979.
- Belaygue, C., and others, "Redécouvrir Intolérance," in Cinéma (Paris), 27 November 1985.
- Chevrie, M., "Le Miroir du muet," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1985.
- Hansen, M., "The Hieroglyph and the Whore: D. W. Griffith's Intolerance," in South Atlantic Quarterly (Durham, North Carolina), no. 2, 1989.
- Leondopoulos, J., "Lost in a Climate of Opinion: Intolerance Revisited," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1990.
- Everson, W. K., in Films in Review (New York), January-February 1990.
- Bassetti, S., "Una questione di omogeneità," in Filmcritica (Rome), November 1990.
- Toeplitz, Jerzy, "Wspaniale widowisko: Kalendarz filmowy," in Iluzjon, no. 3-4, July-December 1991.
- Werner, Gösta, "Intolerance och Griffiths sax," in Filmrutan (Sundsvall), vol. 36, no. 3, 1993.
- Dupre la Tour, C., "The Written Word and Memory in Griffith's Intolerance and Dreyer's La passion de Jeanne d'Arc," in Iris (Iowa City), no. 19, Autumn 1995.
- Merritt, R., "'Bloody Ludlow' auf der Leinwand," in KINtop, vol. 6, 1997.
- Ent, M. van der, "Muzikaal commentaar," in Skrien (Amsterdam), no. 212, February/March 1997.

* * *

Critical judgment remains sharply divided on Intolerance, D. W. Griffith's most expensive and flamboyant spectacle. Those critics who pronounce the film a failure generally point to the four stories, which, they claim, are thematically too diverse to be effectively collated. Taking their cue from Eisenstein's famous indictment, they argue that the film suffers from purposeless fragmentation and thematic incoherence. Others, notably Vachel Lindsay, Georges Sadoul, Edward Wagenknecht, and more recently Pauline Kael, list Intolerance among the masterworks, stressing its formal complexity, experimental daring, and thematic richness. René Clair, taking a middle position, writes, "it combines extraordinary lyric passages, realism, and psychological detail, with nonsense, vulgarity, and painful sentimentality."

Historians agree, however, that Intolerance remains Griffith's most influential film, and that among its most precocious students were the Soviet directors of the 1920s. As Vance Kepley states, "When Intolerance was shown in the Soviet Union in 1919, it popularized a montage style already evolving in the hands of Soviet artists. It was reputedly studied in the Moscow Film Institute for the possibilities of montage and ‘agitational’ cinema (agit-film) and leading Soviet directors, including Eisenstein, Pudovkin, and Kuleshov, acknowledged a debt to Griffith in their writings.’

True to his customary practice of starting one film while finishing another, Griffith began work on Intolerance while editing The Birth of a Nation in the fall of 1914. Intolerance began with the modern story, originally entitled “The Mother and the Law.” It was intended as a companion piece to The Escape (released by Mutual earlier that year), a study of white slavery and the corruption of city slums.

“The Mother and the Law” was virtually completed before The Birth of a Nation was released. Not until May, 1915, after Birth’s controversies were at their peak, did he resume work on it. Determined to surpass the Civil War movie, he decided to expand his modern story to epic proportions. He built lavish sets (notably, the Mary Jenkins ballroom and the Chicago courtroom) and—most important—expanded the story to include the famous strike sequence.

This was, in part, an effort to capitalize on the headlines surrounding John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who had been called up before the Commission on Industrial Relations to explain his role in the 1914 Ludlow massacre. Intolerance’s strike is loosely based on this incident, in which 23 striking employees of Rockefeller’s Colorado Fuel and Iron Company were shot down by the national guard. In these new sequences, Griffith also attacked the Rockefeller Foundation, which, like its founder, came under severe public criticism as the creation of a hypocritical plutocrat, a philanthropy paid for by the exploitation of workers to enhance the reputation of their taskmaster.

Griffith continued shooting his modern story through the summer of 1915. Meanwhile, he began work on a French story, directly patterned after Meyerbeer’s Les Huguenots which had enjoyed great popularity at the Metropolitan Opera with Caruso and Toscanini. Originally, this was to be the lustrous counterpoint to the drab modern story. In original prints, the interiors of the Louvre palace were hand-tinted, while considerable attention was paid to royal costumes and lavish Paris sets.

Not until the end of the year did he begin his most elaborate and expensive story. The Hall for Belshazzar’s Feast has become perhaps the best-known set created for a silent film. Griffith had his set festooned with Egyptian bas-reliefs, Hindu elephant gods, and Assyrian bearded bulls. Practically every Near Eastern style was represented somewhere on the walls or in the costumes—except the styles of Babylon. Until Douglas Fairbanks’s castle set for Robin Hood, it remained the largest backdrop ever created for a movie scene.

The result, when combined with the Passion sequence, was a conglomerate of stories and styles in search of a unifying principle. Part morality play and part three-ring circus, the movie was part of the new eclectic aesthetic that had all but buried the older ideal of organic synthesis. Along with Scott Joplin’s Treemonisha and Charles Ives’s Third Symphony, it remains one of the period’s great hybrids.

As such, it won uniformly enthusiastic critical notices, but proved disappointing at the box office. Produced at a cost of $386,000 (almost four times the expense of The Birth of a Nation) and endowed with an extraordinary cast, it left audiences cold. Although the film cost considerably less and earned more than historians have generally reported, Griffith himself was convinced he had failed. Two years after its release, he released the modern and Babylonian episodes as two separate films. Traditionally, these productions have been dismissed as footnotes to Intolerance, simple attempts to relieve the producer of Intolerance’s burden of debt. Several recent critics, however, have argued that the modern story—released as The Mother and the Law—is improved when separated from the other stories and should be evaluated as a self-contained feature.

Griffith was the most eclectic of American directors, an artist whose work consistently absorbed and reflected American popular culture. Of all his films, Intolerance remains the one most firmly rooted in its own time, a work representing the cultural phenomena of its day. Probably no film before Citizen Kane touched on as many aspects of American popular taste.

Griffith’s instincts cannot be called infallible. In his sweeping dragnet of the fine arts, he intuitively missed every important art movement of his time; the raw materials he gathered were an unsorted miscellany of official art treasures (like the Cluny unicorn tapestries and the Assyrian winged bulls) and parochial 19th century kitsch. As a muckraker, he had trouble distinguishing important social evils (like America’s bloody labor wars and horrible prison conditions) from ephemeral parochial problems. The demons he fought most bitterly, like the Anti-Saloon League, the Rockefeller Foundation, and settlement workers, represented issues far more complex than he ever perceived. He had infinite charity for prodigals, but none for Pharisees, and he depicts “uplifters” as onesidedly in Intolerance as he depicted blacks in The Birth of a Nation.

Today, Intolerance is usually discussed according to memorable isolated sequences, notably Belshazzar’s feast, beginning with its famous crane shot; the strike sequence; the courtship of Mae Marsh and Bobby Harron; the courtroom scene with the famous close-ups of Mae Marsh’s hands; and the Babylonian battles. Although considerable attention has recently been paid to Griffith’s treatment of mise-en-scène, the most durable aesthetic debate continues to center on his intercutting techniques, especially the rhythmic climax built on four intertwined catastrophes, one averted, the others not.

—Russell Merritt

INVASION OF THE BODY SNATCHERS

USA, 1956

Director: Don Siegel

Production: Allied Artists Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm, Superscope; running time: 80 minutes. Released 5 February 1956. Filmed 1955.

Producer: Walter Wanger; screenplay: Daniel Mainwaring, and according to some sources uncredited scriptwriting by Sam Peckinpah, from the novel The Body Snatchers by Jack Finney; photography: Ellsworth Fredericks; editor: Robert S. Eisen; sound engineer: Ralph Butler; sound editor: Del Harris; production designer: Joseph Kish; art director: Edward Haworth; music: Carmen Dragon; music editor: Jerry Irvin; special effects: Milt Rice.

Cast: Kevin McCarthy (Dr. Miles Bennel); Dana Wynter (Becky Driscoll); Larry Gates (Dr. Dan Kauffmann); King Donovan (Jack); Carolyn Jones (Theodora); Jean Willes (Sally); Ralph Dumke (Nick Grivett); Virginia Christine (Wilma Lentz); Tom Fadden (Uncle Ira Lentz); Kenneth Patterson (M. Driscoll); Whit Bissell (Dr. Hill); Sam

Invasion of the Body Snatchers

Peckinpah (Charlie Buckholtz, gas company employee); Guy Way (Sam Janzek); Eileen Stevens (Mrs. Grimaldi); Beatrice Maude (Grandmother Grimaldi); Bobby Clark (Jimmy Grimaldi); Jean Andren (Aunt Eleda Lentz); Everett Glass (Dr. Ed Percy); Richard Deacon (Dr. Harvey Bassett); Dabbs Greer (Mac); Marie Selland (Martha); Pat O'Malley (Man carrying baggage).

Publications

Script:

Mainwaring, Daniel, "L'Invasion des profanateurs de sepultures," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 July 1979.

Books:

Steinbrunner, Chris, and Burt Goldblatt, Cinema of the Fantastic, New York, 1972.

Johnson, William, editor, Focus on the Science-Fiction Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.

Kaminsky, Stuart M., Don Siegel: Director, New York, 1974; revised edition, Chicago, 1983.

Kaminsky, Stuart M., American Film Genres, Dayton, Ohio, 1974.

Lovell, Alan, Don Siegel: American Cinema, London, 1977.

Parish, James Robert, editor, The Science-Fiction Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1977.

Vaccino, Roberto, Donald Siegel, Florence, 1985.

Siegel, Don, A Siegel Film, New York, 1993.

Articles:

Sarris, Andrew, in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.

Martin, Marcel, in Letters Françaises (Paris), 15 November 1967.

Austen, David, in Films and Filming (London), May 1968.

Durnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), February 1969.

Farber, Manny, "The Films of Don Siegel and Sam Fuller," in December (Los Angeles), nos. 1–2, 1970.

Mundy, Robert, "Don Siegel: Time and Motion, Attitude and Genre," in Cinema (London), February 1970.

Bracourt, Guy, in Image et Son (Paris), April 1970.

- Tarratt, Margaret, "Monsters from the Id," in Films and Filming (London), December 1970.
- Gregory, Charles T., "The Pod Society vs. the Rugged Individualist," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Winter 1972.
- Kaminsky, Stuart, and Peter Bogdanovitch, in Take One (Montreal), June 1972.
- Kass, Judith M., "Don Siegel," in The Hollywood Professionals 4 (London), 1975.
- Norgaard, P., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Summer 1975.
- Tarnowski, Jean-François, in Ecran Fantastique (Paris), no. 3, 1977.
- Verstappen, W., "Body Snatchers op de montagetafel: Pseudo-liken in peulen" (shot analysis), in Skoop (Amsterdam), December 1978-January 1979.
- Johnson, G. M., "We'd Fight . . . We Had To: The Body Snatchers," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), no. 1, 1979.
- Freund, C., "Pods over San Francisco," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1979.
- "Invasion of the Body Snatchers Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 July 1979.
- Svehla, G. J., in Midnight Marquee (Baltimore), September 1979.
- McDermott, Elizabeth, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Beltran, A., "El otro, el mismo," in Contracampo (Madrid), February 1981.
- Higashi, S., in Jump Cut (Berkeley), March 1981.
- Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 13 November 1986.
- Telotte, J.P., "The Doubles of Fantasy and the Space of Desire," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 11, no. 1/2, 1987.
- Kurtz, F., in Monsterscene (Lombard), no. 1, October 1992.
- Schuman, Howard, "Gone to Pod," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 2, no. 8, December 1992.
- Jousse, Thierry, "Invasion of the Body Snatchers: Don Siegel," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Hors-série, 1993.
- Reid's Film Index* (Wyong), no. 13, 1994.
- Heredero, C.F., in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 14/15, February 1994.
- Hoberman, J., "Paranoia and the Pods," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 4, no. 5, May 1994.
- Smith, D.G., "Invaders from Mars and Invasion of the Body Snatchers," in Midnight Marquee (Baltimore), no. 51, Summer 1996.
- Zemnick, D.J., in Cinefantastique (Forest Park), vol. 28, no. 1, 1996.
- Turner, George, "A Case for Insomnia," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 78, no. 3, March 1997.

* * *

There are no moments of great violence in Invasion of the Body Snatchers. We see no one die on screen and, technically, no one dies in the film. There are no monsters and only a few special effects, which are confined totally to the construction of a few pods shown but briefly. The essence of Invasion of the Body Snatchers is its aura of normalcy. It is normalcy, the acceptance of the status quo, the desire to escape from the pain of the abnormal that creates the sense of horror in the film.

The thematic goals of Invasion of the Body Snatchers are beautifully expressed in content (the dialogue primarily) and style (the visual body). The fact that one cannot escape from the body-snatching pods is indicated by the director, Don Siegel, in the way the pods are hidden before they take over the minds of the humans. We see them in basements, automobile trunks, a greenhouse, and on a pool table. That the pods are virtually indestructible is shown by Dr. Miles Bennel's repeated attempts to destroy them. When Miles discovers the pods growing in the greenhouse, we are shown a ritual vampire killing. The camera is low in the point of view of the pod. We see Miles's anguished face as he drives the pitchfork down and leaves it like a stake through the heart. But it is not enough. Other pods appear in his trunk. He burns them in much the same way we have seen so many monsters burning in films, only to rise again in a sequel. The pods are not traditional terrors; they are indestructible modern terrors. There is no catharsis in the presentation of a monster being destroyed by love or religious ritual. Here it is the monsters who will prevail.

Siegel expects that his warning of a "pod invasion" will not be heeded. This is indicated in the film in a variety of ways. Perhaps the most striking is that of the small boy, Jimmy Grimaldi, whom we meet along with Miles at the beginning of the picture. As Jimmy runs down the road, he is stopped by Miles. Jimmy informs him that Mrs. Grimaldi (who has become a pod) is not his mother any more. Miles doesn't believe him. The world will not believe him and eventually the boy becomes a pod. Near the end of the film we also see Miles running down the road, searching for someone to tell that the people of Santa Mira (the very name of the town—"mira" in Spanish means "look"—calls attention to itself, and cries to be understood or heeded as a warning) have been consumed by pods. Like Jimmy, we know Miles will not be believed.

A sense of impending doom, or a sense of helplessness in combating the pods, is indicated by depicting Miles as constantly being driven into dark corners and forced to hide. His world is threatened by the pods, and he is reduced to constricted areas of existence. For example, he and Becky Driscoll have to hide in a closet in his office; the camera moves with them into the closet. Through a small hole in the door we see a human-turned-pod turn on a light outside. Later Miles and Becky are forced to hide in a hole in the floor of a cave which they cover with boards. We see the pod people rush over them from Miles's and Becky's point of view. In effect, the places to run have been repeatedly reduced and we suffer the confinement of choices with the protagonists.

One of the most striking and famous sequences in the film is where Miles, having finally escaped from Santa Mira, suddenly finds himself on a highway with hundreds of cars passing him, full of people who are unwilling to listen to him, and thus unwilling to save themselves. The setting is dark with Miles in a sea of machines; the people are hiding within these machines, perhaps the first step toward becoming pods. As he stands on the highway, a truck passes with the names of various cities on it. In the truck, Miles finds the pods, and he realizes they are being taken to the big cities listed on the side of the truck. We feel as hopeless in the face of the image as Miles.

Finally, an important contribution to the total power of the film lies in the performances. Kevin McCarthy (as Miles) conveys a growing frenzy combined with an unfaltering sense of determination. A less restrained actor might well have proved a disaster. The other actors have the burden of appearing normal while at the same time suggesting that they are not. It is in the performances that this ambiguity is carried. Siegel seldom relies on low key lighting, ominous shadows, radical camera angles or shock cutting to carry the terror of the situation. It is in the matter-of-fact quality of the presentation that the film holds its power; and it is Siegel's handling of actors which contributes considerably to the film which Leslie

Halliwell calls “the most subtle film in the science-fiction cycle, with no visual horror whatever.”

—Stuart M. Kaminsky

THE ISLAND

See HADAKA NO SHIMA

ISTORIA ASI KLIACHINOI KOTORAI A LUBILA DA NIE VYSHLA ZAMUZH

(The Story of Asia Kliachina Who Loved but Didn't Get Married; Asya's Happiness)

USSR, 1967/1987

Director: Andrei Konchalovsky

Production: Mosfilm; black and white; running time: 99 minutes; length: 2713 meters. Finished December 1966; received censorship permit for distribution, March 1967; restored and released, 1987.

Screenplay: Yuri Klepikov; photography: Georgy Rerberg; art director: Michael Romadin; music: Viacheslav Ovchinnikov; sound: Raisa Margacheva.

Cast: Iia Savvina (Asia); Aleksander Surin (Stepan); Liubov Sokolova (Maria); Gennadii Jegorychev, Michail Krylov, Nickolai Nazarov, Ludmila Zaiceva, Ivan Petrov, Boris Parfenov, and others.

Award: FIPRESSI Award—Honorable Mention, Berlin International Film Festival, 1988.

Publications

Books:

Konchalovsky, Andrei, Parabola zamysla (Parabola of Concept), Moscow, 1977.

Zorkaya, Neya, The Illustrated History of Soviet Cinema, New York, 1989.

Fomin, Valery, Polka (Shelf), Moscow, 1992.

Articles:

“Istoria Asi Kliachinoi,” in Variety Film Reviews, Vol. 15, New York, 1983.

Zorkaya, Neya, “Ne stoit selo bez pravednicy,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 1, 1989.

Canby, Vincent, “Fable of Life on Collective Farm,” in New York Times Film Reviews, 1987–1988, New York, 1990.

* * *

Istoria Asi Kliachinoi kotorai a lubila da nie vyshla zamuzh (The Story of Asia Kliachina Who Loved but Didn't Get Married) has a long and troubled history. Production was completed in late 1966 and the film was approved by Soviet censors for release in March of 1967, but then, after numerous revisions, changes, and edits, it never was released. Movie fans had to wait twenty years, until 1987, for their first opportunity to view the film.

Even the name of the film was changed numerous times: At first, it was to be called Istoria Asi Khromozhki (Asia, the Lame One). Then it was renamed The Story of Asia Kliachina, Who Loved, but Didn't Get Married because She Was Too Proud. After a number of revisions, the film was given the more optimistic title Asia's Happiness. When it was finally released in 1987 it bore the title The Story of Asia Kliachina, Who Loved, but Didn't Get Married. Yuri Klepikov's screenplay was entitled “The Year of the Tranquil Sun.” During the discussion phase of the script by the Committee on Cinematography (the organization which exercised total control over the movie industry in the Soviet Union), the disorder of the protagonists' lives, the crudeness of their speech, and the stark realism of many of the scenes in the movie were called into question. In preparing the director's script, Andrei Konchalovsky (also known as Andrei Mikhalkov-Konchalovsky) was compelled to make a series of corrections, change some scenes, and eliminate others.

Filming began in the summer of 1966. The entire film was shot on location in the village of Bezdnoe in the Gorky region. It was shot using multiple cameras, almost without retakes, since the majority of the “actors” were non-professionals—they were real collective farm workers from the Gorky and Voronezh regions. There were only three professional actors in the film: Iia Savvina, Liubov Sokolov, and Alexander Surin. By December, the film's editing had been completed and it was shown to filmmakers.

The film astounded the professionals. It seemed at the time that the documentary style of filming and the surprisingly truthful, forthright depiction of the lives of the people, heretofore unseen in Soviet cinema, would open brand new paths for Russian filmmakers. This film, from a creative standpoint, further developed the traditions of Italian neorealism, the achievements of the “thaw” period (the 1960s), and the successes of Russian “village” prose (Rasputin, Belov, Abramov, Shukshin).

We must also remember that at this same time the tragic story of the banning of Andrei Tarkovsky's film Andrei Rublev, one of the screenwriters of which had been Andrei Konchalovsky, was being played out. But while Tarkovsky refused to give in to the demands of the authorities and was able to defend his prized work, Konchalovsky agreed to make extensive edits and drastic changes. As a result, Rublev was finally released, while Asia had to wait twenty years to be seen. This is understandable: Tarkovsky's historical fresco, from an ideological standpoint, was far less dangerous in the eyes of the Soviet authorities than the dismal depiction of contemporary life in the Russian villages.

Among the many criticisms of the film were its pessimism, the poverty of collective farm life, the disorderly lives of its heroes, the crassness of their language, drunkenness, and the naturalism of many of its scenes (including the rape scene, the scene of Asia's attempted suicide, and the childbirth scene.) And although the film was officially passed by the censors (#2047/67 on March 1, 1967), it was never released for viewing. The campaign mounted against the film included not only the Party leader of the Gorky region, but also the chairman of the KGB. The director submitted “corrected” versions of the film three times and each time more and more scenes were cut, dialogue was rewritten, songs were added, etc. For example, the director changed the reason for old man Tikhomir’s eight-year absence from the village (he had been in a concentration camp), and shortened the childbirth scene and the scene of the attempted rape, among other things. The final version of the film (running approximately 90 minutes) was considerably different from the original version, but even it did not suit the Party leadership.

Istoria Asi Kliachinoi kotoraiia lubila da nie vyshla zamuzh

At the center of the film is the lame collective farm cook Asia. As played by Iia Savvina, Asia is a truly Russian character: kind, hard-working, loving, lonely, but proud. Although she is the target of endless derision from her fellow villagers (she is, after all, a cripple), Asia is optimistic and is certain of what she wants out of life. She lives in a dark hut with her great grandmother, grandmother, mother, and niece. There are no men in the house: a typical situation in Russia as the result of war. She lives according to her conscience and for love. She is in love with a shallow, stupid guy named Stepan who treats her contemptibly and has no intention of ever marrying her. A man named Chirkunov arrives from the city and offers Asia his hand in marriage and a comfortable life in a city apartment with indoor plumbing. But Asia does not love him and turns her suitor down. In desperation, Chirkunov tries to rape the pregnant Asia. The birth of her child (which in the first version of the film is a very intense and naturalistic scene) transforms Asia. From a slave to Stepan, she becomes a proud, independent woman and mother: she now has a child, a purpose in life. The talented acting of Iia Savvina made her indistinguishable from the non-professionals in the film.

In addition to the main story line of Asia’s life, the film also contains a number of mass scenes (collecting the harvest, the making of the first bread, seeing a gypsy off to the army, and others), and also three dramatic monologues about life filmed in cinema verite style with a practically still camera, and total naturalness, simplicity, and sincerity on the part of the storyteller. The first story is told by a crippled war veteran, the second by the hunch-backed chairman of a collective farm, and the third by the old man, Tikhomir, who spent eight years in a Stalinist labor camp. These people lived through very hard times, but had not lost their dignity and optimism. Here, contemporary life was closely intertwined with the themes of war, Stalinist repressions, death, and love.

Official Soviet songs are played, but no one listens to them. Yet when the women begin singing a folk song, everyone enthusiastically joins in. The film's rich soundtrack includes the news being constantly broadcast on the radio, the roar of jet fighters flying overhead, shooting exercises, and tanks rolling by.

In Parabola of Concept, Konchalovsky reveals some of the principles that guided his work on this film. At its core was the use of improvisation. Other integral components were black-and-white images; the use of non-professional actors; the use of two or three cameras at once to shoot the film; the simultaneous recording of the sound; the filming of entire episodes without any cutaway shots and subsequent montage; and the predominance of wide angles, rather than close-ups. The entire film was shot in natural interiors or on location.

All of these factors “created the feeling of authenticity, spontaneity, the sense of getting a glimpse of a true slice of life” that the director sought to achieve. The revisions which Konchalovsky was forced to make were undoubtedly a detriment to the film. Elements were introduced that were typical of Soviet propaganda cinematography at the time (the scene of the first bread, the optimistic Soviet songs, the soldiers who help get Asia to the hospital where she gave birth, and others). As a result of the edits, it became difficult to understand what was going on in the suicide scene and old man Tikhomir's story about the Stalinist camps was abridged to the bare minimum.

In 1987, the decision was made to restore the original version of the film and release it for viewing. However, the director was unable to completely reconstruct the original version. The Story of Asia Kliachina has joined the ranks of a number of important films of world cinema which became legendary before they were ever seen by the public.

—Val Golovskoy

IT HAPPENED ONE NIGHT

USA, 1934

Director: Frank Capra

Production: Columbia Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 105 minutes. Released 23 February 1934. Filmed between Thanksgiving and Christmas 1933.

Producer: Harry Cohn; screenplay: Robert Riskin, from the story “Night Bus” by Samuel Hopkins Adams; photography: Joseph Walker; editor: Gene Havlick; sound recordist: E. E. Bernds; art director: Stephen Gooson; music director: Louis Silvers; costume designer: Robert Kalloch.

Cast: Clark Gable (Peter Warne); Claudette Colbert (Ellie Andrews); Walter Connolly (Alexander Andrews); Roscoe Karns (Mr. Shapely); Jameson Thomas (King Westley); Alan Hale (Danker); Wallis Clark (Lovington); Harry Bradley (Henderson); Arthur Hoyt (Zeke); Blanche Frederic (Zeke's wife); Ward Bond (Bus driver).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Actor (Gable), Best Actress (Colbert), Best Directing, and Best Writing—Adaptation, 1934.

Publications

Script:

Riskin, Robert, It Happened One Night, in Four-Star Scripts, edited by Lorraine Noble, New York, 1936.

Books:

Griffith, Richard, Frank Capra, London, 1951.

Essoe, Gabe, The Films of Clark Gable, New York, 1970.

Capra, Frank, The Name above the Title, New York, 1971.

Silke, James, Frank Capra: One Man—One Film, Washington, D.C., 1971.

Willis, Donald, The Films of Frank Capra, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1974.

Glatzer, Richard, and John Raeburn, editors, Frank Capra: The Man and His Films, Ann Arbor, 1975.

Poague, Leland, The Cinema of Frank Capra, New York, 1975.

Scherle, Victor, and William Turner Levy, The Films of Frank Capra, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1977.

Garceau, Jean, and Inez Cooke, Gable: A Pictorial Biography, New York, 1977.

Malard, Charles J., American Visions: The Films of Chaplin, Ford, Capra and Welles, New York, 1977.

Bohnenkamp, Dennis, and Sam Gross, Frank Capra Study Guide, Washington, D.C., 1979.

Malard, Charles, Frank Capra, Boston, 1980.

Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Cavell, Stanley, Pursuits of Happiness: The Hollywood Comedy of Remarriage, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1981.

Fearfar, R., Clark Gable, Paris, 1981.

Quirk, Lawrence, Claudette Colbert: An Illustrated Biography, New York, 1985.

Zagarrio, Vito, Frank Capra, Florence, 1985.

Carney, Raymond, American Vision: The Films of Frank Capra, Cambridge, 1986; 1996.

Wolfe, Charles, Frank Capra: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1987.

McBride, Joseph, American Madness: The Life of Frank Capra, New York, 1989.

Lourdeaux, Lee, Italian & Irish Filmmakers in America: Ford, Capra, Coppola and Scorsese, Springfield, 1993.

Wayne, Jane Ellen, Clark Gable, New York, 1994.

Gehring, Wes D., Populism and the Capra Legacy, Westport, 1995.

Girus, Sam B., Hollywood Renaissance: The Cinema of Democracy in the Era of Ford, Capra, and Kazan, Cambridge, 1998.

Sklar, Robert, editor, Frank Capra: Authorship and the Studio System, Philadelphia, 1998.

Articles:

Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 23 February 1934.

Variety (New York), 27 February 1934.

Baskette, Kirtley, in Photoplay (New York), December 1934.

It Happened One Night

Interview with Frank Capra, in Motion Picture (New York), July 1935.
Agee, James, "Comedy's Greatest Era," in Life (New York), 4 September 1949.

Films and Filming (London), May-June 1958.

Clarens, Carlos, "Clark Gable," in Films in Review (New York), December 1960.

Martin, Marcel, in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 27 December 1962.

Price, James, "Capra and the American Dream," in London Magazine, January 1964.

Richards, Jeffrey, "Frank Capra and the Cinema of Populism," in Cinema (London), February 1970.

Pacheco, Joseph B., Jr., "Claudette Colbert," in Films in Review (New York), May 1970.

Thompson, Howard, "Capra, 74, Looks Back at Film Career," in New York Times, 24 June 1971.

"Capra Issue" of Positif (Paris), December 1971.

Handzo, Stephen, "A Decade of Good Deeds and Wonderful Lives: Under Capracorn," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1972.

Stein, Elliott, "Capra Counts His Oscars," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 41, no. 3, 1972.

Corliss, Richard, "Capra and Riskin," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1972.

Richards, Jeffrey, "Frank Capra: The Classic Populist," in Visions of Yesterday, London, 1973.

Sklar, Robert, "The Making of Cultural Myths: Walt Disney and Frank Capra," in Movie-Made America, New York, 1975.

Manns, T., in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 4, 1976.

Poague, Leland, "As You Like It and It Happened One Night: The Generic Pattern of Comedy," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Fall 1977.

Gehring, Wes, "McCarey vs. Capra: A Guide to American Film Comedy of the '30s," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 7, no. 1, 1978.

Brown, G., in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1978.

Interview with Frank Capra, in American Film (Washington, D.C.), October 1978.

Phelps, G.A., "The 'Populist' Films of Frank Capra," in Journal of American Studies (London), no. 3, 1979.

Self, L., and R. Self, "Adaptation as Rhetorical Process: It Happened One Night and Mr. Deeds Goes to Town," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Winter 1981.

- Frank, Sam, "Robert Riskin," in American Screenwriters, edited by Robert E. Morsberger, Stephen O. Lesser, and Randall Clark, Detroit, 1984.
- Journal of Popular Film and Television* (Washington, D.C.), Autumn 1985.
- Tobin, Yann, in Positif (Paris), December 1986.
- Reid's Film Index* (Wyang), no. 3, 1989.
- Ching, B., and R. Barnard, "From Screwballs to Cheeseballs: Comic Narrative and Ideology in Capra and Reiner," in New Orleans Review, no. 3, 1990.
- Shumway, D. R., "Screwball Comedies: Constructing Romance, Mystifying Marriage," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), no. 4, 1991.
- Hicks, J., "Frank Capra," in Films in Review (New York), January-February 1993.
- Sibley, Brian, "The Wonderful Mr. Capra," in Radio Times (London), vol. 294, no. 3819, 12 April 1997.
- Mistichelli, Bill, "The State of the Union: Capra, Altruism, and the Sociobiologists," in Journal of Popular Film and Television, vol. 25, no. 3, Fall 1997.
- Premiere* (Boulder), vol. 10, May 1997.

* * *

It Happened One Night is the film generally credited with launching the "screwball comedy" genre popular in the 1930s and 1940s. A difficult genre to define, the screwball comedy revolves around the characters' contradictory desires for individual identity and complete union in heterosexual romance. The films pit the couple's erotic moments of courtship against their verbal combats, battles of wit spiced with rapid-fire, brilliant repartee. Because of the resurgence of censorship in 1934 coupled with an American reluctance to be frank about sex, screwball comedies capitalized on the necessity to mask and to express verbally sexual tensions and conflicts. Screwball comedies usually relied upon a final reconciliation or marriage to establish the couple's unity but undercut it as a resolution to the couple's ongoing differences. It Happened One Night established these generic rules and provided a model for incorporating into a comic structure attitudes, fears, and tensions about social, sexual, and economic roles.

It Happened One Night, the story of a runaway madcap heiress who is befriended by an individualistic journalist so he can "scoop" her story, simply adapted for a Depression-era context a popular movie formula of the 1920s. Movies such as Dancing Mothers or A Woman of the World presented man-woman, husband-wife relationships in which both parties were witty, intelligent, charming, and thoroughly at odds with each other. Unlike the screwball comedies that arose later, these films extolled aristocratic life styles and proper behavior while resolving the sexual issues on superficial terms. German-emigré director Ernst Lubitsch strengthened the structural integrity of the formula and created the prototype for the screwball comedy in Trouble in Paradise and Design for Living. Impressed and influenced by Lubitsch's films, Frank Capra borrowed the comic romantic structure that Lubitsch had evolved in order to deal with middle-class sexual and social proprieties. But Capra used the formula as a vehicle for the resolution of all economic and social differences in one vast American middle class united by the virtues of caring and sharing.

Capra's simple Depression-era philosophy, often labelled "Capra-corn," is conveyed in It Happened One Night as a modern folk tale reversal of Cinderella. Rich girl Ellie Andrews flees her father so she can marry the worthless playboy of her dreams. Penniless and thrown on her own, she runs into the out-of-work ace reporter Peter Warne. In exchange for her "story," Warne helps her return to the playboy. Traveling by bus, foot, and auto across the backroads of 1930s America, they discover a mutual independence of spirit, feistiness, and resilience. Warne gets the story, Andrews gets her playboy, but both discover that what they had really been seeking they had found in each other. The rich girl ultimately gets the poor boy proving that even the wealthy, if given a chance, will subscribe to the working class values that were deemed a prescription for fighting the Depression.

One of the most successful films of its time, It Happened One Night is in its making and reception a "rags-to-riches" story. When Capra first proposed the film based on a story serialized in Cosmopolitan, Columbia Pictures executives disliked the idea and thought that the fad had passed for bus movies. At least five Hollywood stars turned down the leading roles. Colbert initially hated the picture, and Gable only made the movie because angry MGM executive Louis B. Mayer had loaned him to Columbia as a punishment. When the finished film finally opened, poor reviews and indifferent moviegoers led to the movie's closing after only one week. The film resurfaced, however, and went on to win the top five Academy Awards. The film made stars of Colbert, Gable, and Capra, and Gable's bare-chested appearance in one scene has been said to be responsible for a 50 percent drop in undershirt sales within the year. Critics have since tried to explain the secret of the film's enduring popularity. They have generally credited Capra with inventing a message that audiences wanted to hear. The nutty romance, a down-to-earth courtship that maintains a spirit of crazy adventure in spite of adversities, showed audiences then as well as today, as critic Andrew Sarris said, "the private fun a man and a woman could have in a private world of their own making."

—Lauren Rabinovitz

AN ITALIAN STRAW HAT

See UN CHAPEAU DE PAILLE D'ITALIE

IT'S A WONDERFUL LIFE

USA, 1946

Director: Frank Capra

Production: Liberty Films; black and white, 35mm; running time: 129 minutes. Released 1946 by RKO/Radio.

Producer: Frank Capra; screenplay: Frances Goodrich, Albert Hackett, and Frank Capra with additional scenes by Jo Swerling, from the story "The Greatest Gift" by Philip Doren Stern; photography: Joseph Walker and Joseph Biroc; editor: William Hornbeck; sound: Richard Van Hesse, Clem Portman, and John Aalberg; art director: Jack Okey; music: Dmitri Tiomkin; special effects: Russell A. Cully; costume designer: Edward Stevenson.

It's a Wonderful Life

Cast: James Stewart (George Bailey); Donna Reed (Mary Hatch); Lionel Barrymore (Mr. Potter); Thomas Mitchell (Uncle Billy); Henry Travers (Clarence); Beulah Bondi (Mrs. Bailey); Gloria Grahame (Violet Bick); H. B. Warner (Mr. Gower); Ward Bond (Bert); Frank Faylan (Ernie); Samuel S. Hinds (Pa Bailey); Mary Treen (Cousin Tilly); Frank Hagney (Bodyguard); Sheldon Leonard (Nick); Alfalfa Switzer (Freddie).

Publications

Script:

Goodrich, Frances, and others, in The "It's a Wonderful Life" Book, edited by Jeanine Basinger, New York, 1986.

Books:

Griffith, Richard, Frank Capra, London, 1951.
 Jones, Ken, D., The Films of James Stewart, New York, 1970.
 Capra, Frank, The Name above the Title, New York, 1971.
 Silke, James, Frank Capra: One Man—One Film, Washington, D.C., 1971.

Willis, Donald, The Films of Frank Capra, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1974.

Thompson, Howard, James Stewart, New York, 1974.

Glatzer, Richard, and John Raeburn, editors, Frank Capra: The Man and His Films, Ann Arbor, 1975.

Poague, Leland, The Cinema of Frank Capra, New York, 1975.

Scherle, Victor, and William Levy, The Films of Frank Capra, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1975.

Malard, Charles J., American Visions: The Films of Chaplin, Ford, Capra, and Welles, New York, 1977.

Bohnenhamp, Dennis, and Sam Grogg, Frank Capra Study Guide, Washington, D.C., 1979.

Malard, Charles, Frank Capra, Boston, 1980.

Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Eyles, Allen, James Stewart, London, 1984.

Hunter, Allan, James Stewart, New York, 1985.

Robbins, Jhan, Everybody's Man: A Biography of Jimmy Stewart, New York, 1985.

Zagarrio, Vito, Frank Capra, Florence, 1985.

Ray, Robert B., A Certain Tendency of the Hollywood Cinema 1930–80, Princeton, 1985.

Carney, Raymond, American Vision: The Films of Frank Capra, Cambridge, 1986.

Wolfe, Charles, Frank Capra: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1987.

McBride, Joseph, American Madness: The Life of Frank Capra, New York, 1989.

Lourdeaux, Lee, Italian & Irish Filmmakers in America: Ford, Capra, Coppola & Scorsese, Springfield, 1993.

Gehring, Wes D., Populism and the Capra Legacy, Westport, Connecticut, 1995.

Hawkins, Jimmy, It's a Wonderful Life: The Anniversary Scrapbook, Philadelphia, 1996.

Hawkins, Jimmy, It's a Wonderful Life Trivia, New York, 1997.

Thomas, Tony, A Wonderful Life: The Films and Career of James Stewart, Secaucus, 1997.

Girus, Sam B., Hollywood Renaissance: The Cinema of Democracy in the Era of Ford, Capra, and Kazan, Cambridge, 1998.

Sklar, Robert, editor, Frank Capra: Authorship and the Studio System, Philadelphia, 1998.

Quirk, Lawrence J., James Stewart: Behind the Scenes of a Wonderful Life, New York, 1999.

Articles:

New York Times, 23 December 1946.

Variety (New York), 25 December 1946.

Parsons, L. Q., in Cosmopolitan (New York), January 1947.

Mannock, P. L., in Films and Filming (London), September 1956.

Price, James, "Capra and the American Dream," in London Magazine, January 1964.

Sweigart, William R., "James Stewart," in Films in Review (New York), December 1964.

"Capra Issue" of Positif (Paris), December 1971.

Handzo, Stephen, "A Decade of Good Deeds and Wonderful Lives: Under Capracorn," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1972.

Richards, Jeffrey, "Frank Capra and the Cinema of Populism," in Cinema (London), February 1970.

Bergman, Mark, "The Telephone Company, the Nation, and Perhaps the World," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Winter 1971-72.

Richards, Jeffrey, "Frank Capra: The Classic Populist," in Visions of Yesterday, London, 1973.

Sklar, Robert, "The Making of Cultural Myths: Walt Disney and Frank Capra," in Movie-Made American, New York, 1975.

Rose, B., "It's a Wonderful Life: The Stand of the Capra Hero," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), vol. 6, no. 2, 1977.

Wood, Robin, "Ideology, Genre, Auteur," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1977.

Quart, Leonard, "Frank Capra and the Popular Front," in Cineaste (New York), Summer 1977.

Phelps, G. A., "The 'Populist' Films of Frank Capra," in Journal of American Studies (London), no. 3, 1979.

Scheer, R., "Double Vision: TV Remakes Frank Capra," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), 1980.

Dickstein, M., "It's a Wonderful Life, But," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), May 1980.

Silverman, K., in Framework (Norwich), Spring 1981.

"Capra Issue" of Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Winter 1981.

"Capra Issue" of Positif (Paris), July-August 1982.

Rodrig, A., in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1983.

Ahrlich, Evelyn, "Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett," in American Screenwriters, edited by Robert E. Morsberger, Stephen O. Lesser, and Randall Clark, Detroit, 1984.

Weinberger, M., in Cinéma (Paris), January 1984.

Napoleon, D., "Wonderful Life: Broadway Bound," in American Film Comment (New York), November-December 1986.

Raynes, Doug, "It's a Wonderful Life," in Soundtrack!, vol. 8, no. 29, March 1989.

Rothman, William, "Hollywood and the Rise of Suburbia," in East-West Film Journal (Honolulu), vol. 3, no. 2, June 1989.

Lamm, R., "Can We Laugh at God? Apocalyptic Comedy in Film," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 19, no. 2, Summer 1991.

Gordon, A., "You'll Never Get Out of Bedford Falls! The Inescapable Family in American Science Fiction and Fantasy Films," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 20, no. 2, Summer 1992.

Diski, Jenny, "Curious Tears," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 2, no. 4, August 1992.

Gysin, C., "The Real George Bailey," in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 6, January 1993.

Magny, Joël, "La vie est belle: Frank Capra," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Hors-série, 1993.

Clements, M., "My Technology's Turnaround," in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 8, November 1994.

Nicolaï, M., "Les anges du ciné," in Télérama (Paris), no. 2345, 21 December 1994.

Herwitz, D., "Expectations of Mastery," in Spectator (Los Angeles), vol. 16, no. 2, 1996.

Fallows, Randall, "George Bailey is the Vital Center: Postwar Liberal Politics and It's a Wonderful Life," in Journal of Popular Film & Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 25, no. 2, Summer 1997.

Alter, J., "It's a Wonderful Legacy," in Newsweek, vol. 130, 14 July 1997.

Deneen, P.J., "George Bailey's Secret Life," in Commonweal, vol. 124, 19 December 1997.

* * *

When Frank Capra returned to Hollywood after coordinating the Why We Fight propaganda series during the war, he resumed the total artistic control over his films for which he had fought during the 1930s. It's a Wonderful Life was made for Liberty Films, the production company organized by Capra, George Stevens, William Wyler and Sam Briskin. The film exemplifies the concept of the independent producer-director, and Capra has called it his favorite film. In the year of its release its importance was overshadowed by Wyler's The Best Years of Our Lives (not made for Liberty Films), but it has since gone on to be one of the most frequently revived of Capra's works.

The impetus and structure of It's a Wonderful Life recall the familiar model of Capra's pre-war successes. Mr. Deeds Goes to Town, Mr. Smith Goes to Washington and Meet John Doe. In each of these films, the hero represents a civic ideal and is opposed by the forces of corruption. His identity, at some point misperceived, is finally acclaimed by the community at large. The pattern receives perhaps its darkest treatment in It's a Wonderful Life. The film's conventions and dramatic conceits are misleading. An idyllic representation of small-town America, a guardian angel named Clarence and a Christmas Eve apotheosis seem to justify the film's perennial screenings during the holiday season. These are the signs of the ingenuous optimism for which Capra is so often reproached. Yet they function in the same way "happy endings" do in Moliere, where the artifice of perfect resolution is in ironic disproportion to the realities of human nature at the core of the plays.

George Bailey is presumably living the "wonderful life" of the title. Having abandoned his ambition to become an architect in order to run a building- and loan- association, and facing arrest for a discrepancy in the books, George is on the verge of suicide. His guardian angel offers him the chance to find out what would have happened had he not been born. George then sees the town as a nightmarish vision of corruption. No one knows him. Even his mother, a benevolent image through the rest of the film, appears hard-bitten and cruel, and refuses to recognize him in a scene that dramatizes a primal identity crisis. George does regain his identity and is euphorically acknowledged by everyone. But this joyous finale caps a film that so often represents pain and despair—from a slap that draws blood from young George's ear, to a marriage proposal expressed in utter frustration, to the images (both inside and outside the fantasy section of the film) of George in a rage, furious with himself and with those he loves. Here, as in Mr. Smith Goes to Washington, James Stewart embodies the hysterical energy of Capra's quintessential American hero, thereby conveying, along with the director, the ambiguities of the American dream along with its promises.

—Charles Affron

IVAN GROZNY

(Ivan the Terrible)

USSR, 1944 (Part I: Ivan Grozny) and 1958 (Part II: Boyarskii Zagovor—The Boyars' Plot)

Director: Sergei Eisenstein

Production: Part I—Alma-Ata Studio, Part II—Mosfilm Studio; Part I—black and white, 35mm, Part II—black and white and Agfacolor, 35mm; length: Part I—2745 meters, Part II—2373 meters. Released Part I—1944, Part II—1958. Shooting for Part I was begun 1 February 1943; Part II was shot September–December 1945, though not released until 1958.

Scenario: Sergei Eisenstein; photography: A. Moskvine and E. Tisse; editor: E. Tobak; sound: V. Bogdankevitch and B. Volsky; production designer: I. Chpinel; music: Sergei Prokofiev; songs: V. Louzowsky; costume designers: L. Naoumova and N. Bouzina for Part I, and L. Naoumova and M. Safonova for Part II; ballet choreographer: R. Zakharov.

Cast: N. Tcherkassov (Ivan); M. Jarov (Maluta Skouratov); A. Boutchma (Alexei Basmanov); M. Kouznetzov (Fedor Basmanov); Kolychev (Monk Philippe); A. Mguebrov (Pimen, Architect of Novgorod); V. Balachov (Piotr Volynetz); S. Birman (Efrossinia Staritzkaia); P. Kadotchnikov (Vladimir Andrevitch); M. Nazvanov

(Prince Andrei Kourbsky) (Part II only); P. Massalsky (Sigismund, King of Pologne) (Part II only); Erik Pyriev (Ivan as a child) (Part II only); L. Tzelikovskaia (Czarina Anastassia Romanovna) (Part I only); Vladimir Staritsky (Son of Staritzkaia) (Part I only); M. Mikhaïlov (Archdeacon) (Part I only); V. Pudovkin (Nikolai) (Part I only); S. Timochenko (Ambassador of the Livonien Order) (Part I only); A. Rounnev (The Stranger) (Part I only).

Publications

Script:

Eisenstein, Sergei, Ivan the Terrible: A Screenplay, New York, 1962; script of unpublished third part published in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), nos. 50–51, 1965.

Books:

Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Sense, edited by Jay Leyda, New York, 1942. Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Form, edited by Jay Leyda, New York, 1948. Seton, Marie, Sergei Eisenstein, London 1952.

Eisenstein, Sergei, Notes of a Film Director, London, 1959.

Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.

Moussinac, Leon, Sergei Eisenstein: An Investigation into His Films and Philosophy, New York, 1970.

Barna, Yon, Eisenstein, Bloomington, Indiana, 1973.

Fernandez, Dominique, Eisenstein, Paris, 1975.

Sudendorf, W., and others, Sergei M. Eisenstein: Materialien zu Leben und Werk, Munich, 1975.

Swallow, N., Eisenstein: A Documentary Portrait, London, 1976.

Mitry, Jean, S. M. Eisenstein, Paris, 1978.

Aumont, Jacques, Montage Eisenstein, Paris, 1979; translated as Montage Eisenstein, London, 1987.

Thompson, Kristin, Eisenstein's Ivan the Terrible: A Neoformalist Analysis, Princeton, 1981.

Leyda, Jay, and Zina Vignow, Eisenstein at Work, New York, 1982.

Eisenstein, Sergei M., Immoral Memories: An Autobiography, Boston, 1983.

Marshall, Herbert, Masters of the Soviet Cinema: Crippled Creative Biographies, London, 1983.

Polan, Dana B., The Political Language of Film and the Avant-Garde, Ann Arbor, 1985.

Montagu, Ivor, With Eisenstein in Hollywood, Merrimac, 1987.

Bordwell, David, The Cinema of Eisenstein, Cambridge, 1993.

Goodwin, James, Eisenstein, Cinema, and History, Champaign, 1993.

Taylor, Richard, editor, The Eisenstein Reader, Bloomington, 1998.

Bergan, Ronald, Sergei Eisenstein: A Life in Conflict, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Madow, Ben, "Eisenstein and the Historical Film," in Hollywood Quarterly, October 1945.

Chartier, Jean-Pierre, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), 1 October 1946.

Garga, B. D., in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1958.

Weinberg, Herman, in Film Culture (New York), no. 20, 1959.

O'Leary, Liam, in Films and Filming (London), January 1959.

Ivan Grozny

Leyda, Jay, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1959.

Films and Filming (London), November 1959.

Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), 9 December 1959.

Valentin, Gregory, in Films in Review (New York), January 1960.

Robinson, David, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1960.

Yourenev, Rostislav, "Eisenstein," in Anthologie du Cinéma 44 (Paris), 1964.

Gerstein, Evelyn, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1968.

Oudart, Jean-Pierre, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1970.

Morse, David, "Style in Ivan the Terrible," in Monogram, April 1971.

Aristarco, G., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), July-August 1973.

Levaco, R., "The Eisenstein-Prokofiev Correspondence," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1973.

Bordwell, David, "Eisenstein's Epistemological Shift," in Screen (London), Winter 1974–75.

Thompson, Kristin, "Ivan the Terrible and Stalinist Russia: A Re-examination," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1977.

Gallez, Douglas W., on the Eisenstein-Prokofiev correspondence, in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1978 (and addenda in Autumn 1978 issue).

Machwitz, Z., in Kino (Warsaw), November 1979.

Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), May 1980.

Téllez, J. L., "Ivan Grozni: El abismo y la mascara," in Contrecampo (Madrid), April-June 1981.

Kinder, Marsha, "The Image of Patriarchal Power in Young Mr. Lincoln and Ivan the Terrible, Part I," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1985–86.

Guibbert, Pierre, "Du vitrail à la scène," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), No. 45, 1986.

Christie, Ian, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1987.

Pescatore, G., "La grana del cinema," in Cinema & Cinema (Bologna), January-August 1989.

Guneratne, A. R., "History as Propaganda: The Portrait of Stalin as Medieval Hero, and its Epic Frame," in Cinefocus (Bloomington, Indiana), no. 2, 1990.

Costa, A., "Ivan e la sua ombra (Ejzenstejn, Bazin e la 'prospettiva rovesciata')," Cinema & Cinema (Bologna), September-December 1990.

Hoberman, J., "Cut ups," in Village Voice (New York), 23 March 1993.

Griffiths, P., "Screening the Music," in New Yorker, 31 July 1995.

Deltcheva, R., and E. Vlasov, "From the Wax of History: Leni's Das Wachsfigurenkabinett and the Cinema of German Expressionism as a Source for Eisenstein's Ivan Groznyi," in Studies in the Humanities, vol. 23, no. 1, 1996.

Nesbet, Anne, "Inanimations: Snow White and Ivan the Terrible," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 50, no. 4, Summer 1997.

* * *

Ivan the Terrible is in structure an unfinished trilogy of three films: Part I, Ivan the Terrible, Part II, the Boyars, Part III, Ivan's Struggles. Recent criticism has made the mistake of viewing the two extant parts as one film. Each part presented to Eisenstein different formal and ideological problems which he solved with varying degrees of success; thus, Parts I and II will be considered separately in this essay before any generalizations will be made on the trilogy as a whole.

Part I takes up the history of Ivan when he is about to take on the trappings of the Byzantine Emperors and the title of Czar (Caesar) instead of the title of his predecessors—Grand Prince of Moscow. The first scene shows his second coronation—that as Czar. This scene also sets the style of the trilogy, in that it prepares the audience for the extremely stylized expression and gestures modeled on Wagnerian music-drama, Marinsky ballet, and Japanese Kabuki theatre. Further, the first scene acts as a sort of overture introducing the three main themes of the trilogy: the personal life of Ivan; domestic problems within Russia and foreign problems of war and trade. The interweaving of these themes into a complex tapestry makes Part I one of the supreme masterpieces of cinematic art.

Ivan, in the solitude of absolute power, is often shown seeking companionship; with two friends, Kolychev and Kourbsky, who eventually betray him and side with his enemies, the boyars; in Anastasia, who is poisoned by Efrossinia, the leader of the boyars; and finally, near the end of the film, with the Oprichniki. Problems with the boyars are crucial to the structure and ideology of the work because Ivan seeks to create a monarchy with a centralized power at the expense of the fragmented powers of the aristocracy. The film is an attempt at embodying in art a part of the Marxist theory—the step from the feudal order to the stage in which the urban merchants (that is, budding capitalists) form an alliance with the monarch to break the power of the aristocrats. Of equal importance is Ivan's desire to change Russia's foreign policy from that of a principedom to that of an empire. He seeks to break the backs of the Poles and Germans to the west, as well as the Tartars to the south and east. Important too is the idea of foreign trade; for in an essay written in 1928, Eisenstein said that if he ever made a film on Ivan, it would show a "merchant-czar" rather than a character from a horror story by Poe. In Part I, Ivan seeks to establish trade with the other great developing European nation-state—England; but his way is blocked by the Poles and Germans.

All three themes come together in the finale of the film: Ivan, after forming the Oprichniki, retreats to a monastery outside Moscow; word is brought that English trading ships have bypassed the Germans and Poles by means of a northern route through the White Sea; and, the townspeople arrive from Moscow to join with their monarch in the great alliance against the boyars. This final scene, which Ivan refers to as his true coronation by the people, formally recapitulates the coronation in the opening scene of the film. The shots of the large figure of the Czar and the tiny figures of the people beyond and below—capture the quintessential relationship between the people and their leader.

Part II remains flawed by its problematic genesis: both it and the aborted Part III were to form one film and were to carry forth the three main themes. Unfortunately, the decision was made to divide this original second part into two and expand the material of the boyar's plot. Part II unfortunately resulted in a hypertrophy of the "cloak and dagger" material. Since Ivan's final victory against the Poles and the Germans was now saved for the third part, only two out of the three themes were allowed to be developed in the second part.

The personal aspects of the Czar, as Eisenstein admitted himself, are developed at the expense of the public figure. At one point, this symbol of ineluctable power all but grovels before his childhood friend Kolychev. The Oprichniki, important figures in his war against the boyars, are shown as mere companions for an orgy. There is nothing inherently wrong with any of these aspects of Ivan's character, except that each, when developed out of proportion to the whole sacrifices any formal and psychological integrity found in Part I. The Oprichniki-orgy scene proved to be a perfect chance for Eisenstein to experiment for the first time with color film stock. At several points in this scene, the filmmaker transcends the usual naturalistic use of color in order to suggest psychological states. In keeping with its excessive emphasis on the private man, the second part makes Ivan's power struggle seem more like a palace soap-opera, and less like a political struggle of national significance. Family jealousies and murder/revenge become the motive of what in the first part had been a fully rounded historical figure, Ivan IV. Worst of all, the theme of foreign policies is awkwardly tacked onto the conclusion of the film in the form of a speech by Ivan.

Taking both parts as a unity, Ivan the Terrible stands as one of the most courageous experiments in film art. The two completed parts of the trilogy (particularly the first) stand as a testimony against film theorists who claim that filmmaking demands by its very nature a realistic approach. Ivan also demonstrates that film can draw upon the other arts and yet not lose its aesthetic integrity. In this work, the great talents of Eisenstein were supplemented by those of the important Soviet composer Sergei Prokofiev to create a work that can be termed operatic—a film in which words, image, and music achieve a perfect dramatic union. Moreover, Part I taken by itself stands as perhaps the only masterpiece of any art which fully embodies the aesthetics preached by Stalin—namely, Soviet Socialist Realism. The first part of Ivan the Terrible offers a figure who is both positive and fully rounded in human complexities, yet who does not wallow excessively in the darker side of the human psyche.

—Rodney Farnsworth

J

JA CUBA

See SOY CUBA

J'ACCUSE

---

France, 1919

Director: Abel Gance

Production: Charles Pathé (major investor); black and white, 35mm, silent; length: 1500 meters. Released 1919. Cost: about 456,000 francs.

Scenario (at least in part): Abel Gance; photography: L. H. Burel, Bujord, and Forster; editor: André Danis; assistant director: Blaise Cendrars.

Cast: Séberin Mars (François Lauron); Romuald Joubé (Jean Diaz); Maryse Dauvray (Edith); Desjardins; Blaise Cendrars.

Publications

Script:

Gance, Abel, J'accuse, Paris, 1922.

Books:

Daria, Sophie, Abel Gance, hier et demain, Paris, 1922.

Icart, Roger, Abel Gance, Toulouse, 1960.

Brownlow, Kevin, The Parade's Gone By, London and New York, 1969.

Sadoul, Georges, French Film, New York, 1972.

Monaco, Paul, Cinema and Society: France and Germany during the 20s, New York, 1976.

Kramer, Steven, and James Welsh, Abel Gance, Boston, 1978.

Icart, Roger, Abel Gance; ou, Le Prométhée foudroyé, Lausanne, 1983.

King, Norman, Abel Gance: A Politics of Spectacle, London, 1984.

Groppali, Enrico, Abel Gance, Florence, 1986.

Articles:

Kine Weekly (London), 29 April 1920.

Bioscope (London), 29 April 1920.

New York Times, 10 October 1921.

Variety (New York), 14 October 1921.

Esnault, Philippe, "Filmographie d'Abel Gance," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1955.

"Gance Issue" of Ecran (Paris), April-May 1958.

Brownlow, Kevin, "Abel Gance: Spark of Genius," in Films and Filming (London), November 1969.

Lenning, Arthur, "The French Film—Abel Gance," in The Silent Voice: A Text (New York), 1969.

"Film as Incantation: An Interview with Abel Gance," in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1974.

Kramer, Steven, and James Welsh, "Abel Gance's Accusation against War," in Cinema Joursenal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1975.

Debacker, J., "Dossier: La Censure, Monsieur J. Brunin: J'accuse," in Apec-Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), no. 4, 1976.

Brownlow, Kevin, "Abel Gance," in Film Dope (London), September 1979.

Cluny, C. M., "Abel Gance: Trop grand pour le cinéma?," in Cinéma (Paris), December 1981.

King, Noel, "The Sound of Silents," in Screen (Oxford), vol. 25, no. 3, May-June 1984.

Veray, L., "J'accuse: un film conforme aux aspirations de Charles Pathé et à l'air de temps," in 1895, no. 21, December 1996.

* * *

Abel Gance was one of the most innovative filmmakers of the silent era. Most famously, in his masterpiece Napoleon, he projected three images on screen at once in a process he called Polyvision. But this film is not Gance's only epic. Eight years before Napoleon, there was J'accuse.

While Napoleon celebrates the exploits of its title character, J'accuse is unabashedly anti-military. The setting is a small French town. A gentle poet, who opposes war and all hostility, loves the wife of a hunter. War is declared, and the husband goes off to fight; jealous of his rival, he dispatches his wife to the Ardennes. When she is captured by the Germans, the poet himself enlists. By the finale, the hunter has been killed in battle, the wife is raped, and the poet, driven mad by the destruction that has destroyed his life, drops dead. While he does not die in combat, his demise—and the tainting of his spirit, his zest for life, his inner peace and love of beauty—becomes the symbol of the pointlessness of war.

J'accuse is one of the earliest cinematic indictments of war. This fact alone earns the film its status in film history. But, additionally, it is one of the first French films to use montage and superimposed shots. In a stunning series of images, closeups of hands grasp each other, pray and raise glasses of wine as soldiers leave to fight. Gance communicates with his audience with visual metaphors: at the film's outset, the head of a dog is placed over the head of the hunter and, at the declaration of war, the Grim Reaper is placed over the poet's work; the filmmaker's rapid montage cutting highlights the horror of the battle sequences, shot by Gance after joining a French army unit. (He perfected this last technique in La Roue, a melodrama released in 1923, and in Napoleon.) The most famous sequence in J'accuse occurs near the finale, when the crazed poet imagines the ghosts of his dead comrades returning from the battlefield and through the countryside to observe the results of their sacrifices. Tragically, many of the real soldiers Gance utilized as extras did not themselves survive the war. (The film was shot during the final stages of the conflict. They were hired while on leave, just prior to their slaughter at Verdun.)

J'accuse

J'accuse was, upon its release, condemned for its anti-war sentiment by those basking in the German defeat. Gance wanted to make two sequels, to be called The Scars (Les cicatrices) and The League of Nations (La Société des Nations). Although these films were never completed, he did revise J'accuse four years after its release, most notably comparing the return of the dead soldiers sequence with a victory celebration.

Gance remade J'accuse with sound in 1937. He wrote that this new version was “intended as a challenge to the countries of Europe for permitting the gradual development of a situation that made war inevitable. Before the present menace became a reality, I wrote an introduction to the film which expresses the prophetic message it conveys from the screen: ‘This film is dedicated to those who will die in the new war of tomorrow, although I am sure that they will view it skeptically and will fail to recognize themselves in it. . . .’”

Unfortunately, like Renoir’s Grande illusion, J'accuse had no effect on altering the events which resulted in the next Great War.

—Rob Edelman

THE JACKAL OF NAHUELTORO

See CHACAL DE NAHUELTORO

JANA ARANYA

(The Middleman)

India, 1975

Director: Satyajit Ray

Production: Indus Films; black and white, 35 mm; running time: 133 minutes. Filmed in Calcutta.

Producer: Subir Guha; screenplay: Satyajit Ray, adapted from the novel Jana Aranya by Manisankar “Sankar” Mukherjee (also known as Samkara and Shankar); photography: Soumendu Roy; editor: Dulal Dutta; art director: Asok Bose; musical director: Satyajit Ray; sound: J.D. Irani, Anal Talukdar, Adinath Nag, Sujit Ghosh.

Cast: Pradip Mukherjee (Somnath Banerjee); Satya Banerjee (Somnath's Father); Dipankar Dey (Bhombol); Lily Chakravarti (Kamala); Aparna Sen (Somnath's girlfriend); Gautam Chakravarti (Sukumar); Sudesna Das (Kauna, known as Juthika); Uptal Dutt (Bisu); Rabi Ghosh (Mr. Mitter) Bimal Bhattacharya (Mrs. Ganguli); Padma Devi (Mrs. Biswas); Soven Lahiri (Goenka); Santosh Dutta (Hiralal).

Publications

Books:

Samkara, Jana Aranya, India, 1974.

Articles:

Moskowitz, G., in Variety, 28 July 1976.
Houston, Penelope, in Sight and Sound (London), no. 2, 1977.
Coleman, J., in New Statesman (London), 11 February 1977
Brown, G., in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1977.
Elley, Derek, in Films and Filming (London), May 1977.
Kuthna, M., in Film (London), 11 May 1977.
Ghosal, Sumantra, in International Film Guide (London), 1978.

* * *

Jana Aranya is a representative Satyajit Ray film in that it features an acutely observed, personality-driven narrative and characters who are well-defined products of their surroundings. At the same time, its concerns are distinctly political, as it offers stinging commentary on the economic plight of contemporary India and the manner in which the individual is destined to be crushed and devoured by a callous material environment.

At its core, Jana Aranya is a story of tainted innocence. Its hero is an unsophisticated young man who is surrounded by depravity. None of the rogues in his midst are blatantly evil. Rather, their villainy is subtle, and they justify their unsavory ethics in the name of rat-race survival.

Somnath Banerjee is a sweetly handsome young man. At the outset, he is about to graduate from Calcutta University when he is victimized by a myopic instructor who cannot read his exam answers, depriving him of a graduation with honors. And so Ray starts out by offering a biting satire of a ludicrous educational bureaucracy. Yet all of Somnath's experiences while a student, and all of his book learning, have left him ill-prepared for the cruel realities he will face while attempting to enter the job market. Harsh fact first intrudes when he is told, “You're so young. It'll be ages before you're established.” These words are prophetic. Long months pass, and Somnath is unable to secure employment. At this point, he can compromise his ideals by marrying a young woman he has never met, enabling him to take over her father's business. But Somnath refuses. Instead, he agrees to go into “business” with an acquaintance. He remains trusting, even upon being told that the young man he is replacing has been missing for two months.

Somnath's job is to act as a middleman, a go-between. He will be “ordering supplies” and, as such, he is to “study the market” and “buy cheap.” “What do I sell?” he asks. “Anything,” is the response. He remains oblivious to the implications of his being instructed to set up bogus companies, and flash different business cards to different clients. “You'll be fine on your own,” the contact tells Somnath. “In two days you'll learn everything, and if you get into trouble . . . of course you'll have to clean up your own mess.”

Somnath's “business” results in his inevitable mixing with an assortment of wizened, corrupt characters. His maturation process climaxes when he is called upon to act as a pimp in a business transaction, a job requirement he finds reprehensible. Furthermore, the prostitute in question is a friend's sister, who is attempting to support her family. Somnath's integrity is irrevocably tainted when his sense of self-preservation obliterates his morality, and he agrees to go along with the scheme. In so doing, he now is trafficking in human beings as well as goods. He has become just as much of a whore as the sister.

All Somnath wants is an honest job, a not-unreasonable request in a fair and equitable world. However, within the parameters of society, the young man—in order to insure his own survival—does not have the luxury of spurning those who would taint him. “Was anyone ever rewarded for saintliness?” asks one of Somnath's contacts, a “public relations” expert. “Name a single person—no matter how high up—whose reputation is spotless.” Jana Aranya is neither the first nor the last film to offer a morality tale in which individuals, in order to guarantee their survival, immerse themselves in mire. What makes it a product of a specific time and place are the economic and political conditions existing in India. “I felt corruption, rampant corruption all around, and I didn't think there was a solution,” Ray declared, in reference to why he chose to make Jana Aranya. “I was only waiting, perhaps subconsciously, for a story that would give me an opportunity to show this.”

In Jana Aranya, Ray also explores a theme that is a constant in his work: familial relations, and the psychology that exists between parent and child. Somnath's obstacles are not all job-related, in that he is influenced by his widowed father's high expectations for him. The old man, lacking in understanding of the manner of the modern world, accordingly is alienated from Somnath.

In his earliest films, the ones that cemented his reputation, Ray offered revealing, humanist portraits of the inner lives of his characters. By the time he made Jana Aranya, he had expanded his cinematic concerns; his films had become more overtly social and political—and the scenario of Jana Aranya is uncompromising as it spotlights the economic dilemmas confronting contemporary India. Its narrative is uncomplicated; primarily, it is a portrait of a young man and the manner in which he is stripped of his impeccability. The film is at its most astute when Ray offers up knowing vignettes featuring the subtly and not-so-subtly repulsive characters with whom Somnath deals. On strictly visual terms, the filmmaker cleverly lampoons bureaucratic inanity. Repeated shots of young men posting job application letters convey the mind-boggling competition Somnath will face as he sets out to secure a job. He also is seen waiting on countless lines, typing and attaching photos to endless job applications, and being asked ludicrous, rapid-fire questions by job interviewers.

In these sequences, Jana Aranya is amusing. Yet it primarily is a serious and sobering film, an unsentimental account of the battle between maintaining one's scruples and doing what one must in order to survive.

—Rob Edelman

LE JARDINIER ET LE PETIT ESPIEGLE

See L'ARROSEUR ARROSE

JAWS

USA, 1975

Director: Steven Spielberg

Production: Universal Pictures; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 124 minutes. Released 20 June 1975. Filmed summer 1974 on location on Martha's Vineyard.

Producers: Richard D. Zanuck and David Brown with William S. Gilmore, Jr.; screenplay: Peter Benchley and Carl Gottlieb, from the novel by Benchley; photography: Bill Butler; editor: Verna Fields; sound: Robert L. Hoyt, Roger Herman, Earl Madery, and John Carter; music: John Williams.

Cast: Roy Scheider (Brody); Robert Shaw (Quint); Richard Dreyfuss (Hooper); Lorraine Gary (Ellen Brody); Murray Hamilton (Vaughan); Carl Gottlieb.

Awards: Oscars for Best Sound, Best Editing, and Best Original Score, 1975.

Publications

Books:

- Gottlieb, Carl, The Jaws Log, New York, 1975.
 Blake, Edith, On Location on Martha's Vineyard: The Making of the Movie Jaws, New York, 1975.
 Monaco, James, American Film Now: The People, the Power, the Money, the Movies, Oxford and New York, 1979.
 Pye, Michael, and Lynda Myles, The Movie Brats: How the Film Generation Took Over Hollywood, London, 1979.
 Kolker, Robert Phillip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Scorsese, Spielberg, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.
 Daly, David Anthony, A Comparison of Exhibition and Distribution Patterns in Three Recent Feature Motion Pictures, New York, 1980.
 Crawley, Tony, The Steven Spielberg Story, London, 1983.
 Goldau, Antje, and Hans Helmut Prinzler, Spielberg: Filme als Spielzeug, Berlin, 1985.
 Mott, Donald R., and Cheryl McAllister Saunders, Steven Spielberg, Boston, 1986.
 Smith, Thomas G., Industrial Light and Magic: The Art of Special Effects, London, 1986.

- Weiss, Ulli, Das neue Hollywood: Francis Ford Coppola, Steven Spielberg, Martin Scorsese, Munich, 1986.
 Godard, Jean-Pierre, Spielberg, Paris, 1987.
 Sinyard, Neil, The Films of Steven Spielberg, London, 1987.
 Von Gunden, Kenneth, Postmodern Auteurs: Coppola, Lucas, De Palma, Spielberg & Scorsese, Jefferson, 1991.
 Brode, Douglas, The Films of Steven Spielberg, Secaucus, 1997.
 Yule, Andrew, Steven Spielberg, New York, 1997.
 Knight, Bertram, Steven Spielberg: Master of Movie Magic, Parsippany, 1998.
 Perry, George, Steven Spielberg-Close Up: The Making of His Movies, New York, 1998.
 Taylor, Philip M., Steven Spielberg: The Man, His Movies and Their Meaning, New York, 1998.

Articles:

- Riger, R., "On Location with Jaws—Tell the Shark We'll Do It One More Time," in Action (Los Angeles), July-August 1974.
 "What Directors Are Saying," in Action (Los Angeles), September-October 1974.
 Cribben, M., "On Location with Jaws," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), March 1975.
 Murphy, A. D., in Variety (New York), 18 June 1975.
 Magill, M., in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1975.
 Shear, D., in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Autumn 1975.
 Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1975.
 Monaco, James, in Sight and Sound (London), no. 1, 1975–76.
 Bonitzer, P., and S. Daney, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April-May 1976.
 Blacher, R., "Le Point de vue d'un psychiatre sur Les Dents de la mer," in Cinéma (Paris), April 1976.
 Fieschi, J., "La Religion du monstre," in Cinématographe (Paris), April-May 1976.
 Paini, D., "Toujours à propos des Dents de la mer," in Cinéma (Paris), May 1976.
 Martin, Marcel, and others, "Vérités et mensonges du cinéma américain," in Ecran (Paris), September 1976.
 Dagneau, G., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), October 1976.
 Cumbow, R. C., "The Great American Eating Machine," in Movietone News (Seattle), 11 October 1976.
 Michalek, B., in Kino (Warsaw), December 1976.
 Dworkin, M. S., "In the Teeth of Jaws," in Ikon (Milan), January-March 1977.
 Kapralov, G., in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), October 1977.
 Caputi, J. E., "Jaws as Patriarchal Myth," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), no. 4, 1978.
 Verstappen, W., in Skoop (Amsterdam), February 1978.
 "Readers' Forum," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), no. 2, 1979.
 Erickson, Glenn, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Vega, F., in Casablanca (Madrid), July-August 1981.
 Fauritte, A., "Super Star Jaws," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), April 1984.
 Fried, B., in Chaplin (Stockholm), 1985.
 Noel, J., "Steven Spielberg (Suite No. 3)," in Grand Angle (Mariembourg, Belgium), July 1990.
 Sheehan, H., "The Panning of Steven Spielberg," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1992.

Jaws

Torry, R., "Therapeutic Narrative: The Wild Bunch, Jaws, and Vietnam," in Velvet Light Trap (Austin, Texas), Spring 1993.

Griffin, Nancy, "In the Grip of Jaws," in Premiere (New York), October 1995.

Askari, Brent, "Jaws: Beyond Action," in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), vol. 3, no. 1, Summer 1996.

Lucas, Tim, "Jaws: Limited Edition Signature Collection," in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 33, 1996.

Dursin, A., "The Laserphile," in Film Score Monthly (Los Angeles), no. 76, December 1996.

Jones, Alan, "Just When You Thought You Knew Everything About Jaws," in Radio Times (London), vol. 295, no. 3849, 8 November 1997.

* * *

Jaws initiated the era of the Hollywood blockbuster. This tale of shark terror, which earned more than $100 million in six months, easily surpassed The Godfather as the all-time Hollywood box-office champ. Although Star Wars, E.T. and Raiders of the Lost Ark set new records, Jaws created marketing precedents that became Hollywood standards: it proved that one film under careful guidance from its distributor, could precipitate a national pop cultural "event."

Universal opened Jaws in 409 American houses in June 1975, establishing late May/early June as the beginning of the movie season. To milk the most from its "national" premiere, Universal fully utilized "saturation advertising" on television. The company purchased at least one 30-second ad on every prime-time network television program during the evening of the three days preceding the premiere; the cost was a million dollars. So successful was this advertising campaign that it became standard operating procedure in the American film industry (thereafter New York premieres and limited newspaper advertising were the exceptions, not the rule). Jaws convinced movie executives that television should be fully exploited for advertising, not avoided as in the past.

In 17 days, Jaws earned an extraordinary $36,000,000. House records were established in cities around the country, and record grosses continued through the summer. Indeed, Universal turned 1975 into the year of the shark. The film inspired pop songs and other films. And there were, of course, the ubiquitous spin-offs: posters, T-shirts, beach towels, shark tooth pendants. The stock of Universal's parent company, MCA, moved up 22½ points in less than a month.

Jaws proved that a single film, marketed in the right way, could make millions of dollars for everyone connected with it.

One direct beneficiary was director Steven Spielberg, who completed the film before his 30th birthday. This film school graduate learned the Hollywood system with his television work for Universal; he directed episodes of Owen Marshall, Marcus Welby, Columbo, and television movies such as the now cult film Duel. The dollars generated by Jaws and by his other films, Close Encounters of the Third Kind, Raiders of the Lost Ark, and E.T., have made Spielberg the most successful box-office director of all time.

But Jaws won few awards, for critics did not consider it a complex artefact. Rather, Jaws was singled out as an example of the success of Hollywood as an entertainment machine. Social and cultural critics have “read” the film in two different ways. Jaws can be seen as a “Watergate” film. In it a public official (the mayor) seeks to hush up a threat to the public good (a shark attack); it takes an heroic outsider (the chief of police) to kill the shark and return things to normal. The overt message seems clear enough: the world does indeed work, if “true heroes” stand up to be counted. But Jaws also skillfully exploits the machine of modern cinema. From the opening sequences Spielberg associates the camera’s point-of-view (under the water) and the major musical motif with the danger of the shark attack. Jaws manipulates our gaze, simultaneously providing the viewer with both enjoyment and fear. It remains a remarkable example of how well Hollywood can control a viewer’s vision to produce pain and pleasure. Jaws is about Watergate America, but it is also about the experience of filmmaking in the 1970s.

—Douglas Gomery

THE JAZZ SINGER

USA, 1927

Director: Alan Crosland

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc.; black and white, 35mm, silent with synchronized musical numbers; running time: 89 minutes. Released October 1927, New York. Filmed June through August 1927 in Warner Bros. studios, and on location in Hollywood, and the Lower East Side and in front of Shuberts’ Winter Garden theater in New York City. Cost: $500,000.

Scenario: Alfred A. Cohn, from the story and play The Day of Atonement by Samson Raphaelson; titles: Jack Jarmuth; photography: Hal Mohr; editor: Harold McCord; sound: George R. Groves; music score and direction: Louis Silvers.

Cast: Al Jolson (Jakie Rabinowitz, later Jack Robin); Warner Oland (Cantor Rabinowitz); Eugenie Besserer (Sara Rabinowitz); Otto Lederer (Moisha Yudelson); Bobby Gordon (Jakie, age 13); Richard Tucker (Harry Lee); May McAvoy (Mary Dale); Nat Carr (Levi); William Demarest (Buster Billings); Anders Randolf (Dillings); Will Walling (Doctor); Roscoe Karns (Agent); Myrna Loy, Audrey Ferris (Chorus girls); Cantor Josef Rosenblatt (Himself, in concert number); Jane Arden, Violet Bird, Ernest Clauson, Marie Stapleton, Edna Gregory, and Margaret Oliver (Extras in Coffee Dan’s sequence).

Award: Special Oscar to Warner Bros. for producing The Jazz Singer “which revolutionized the industry,” 1927–28.

Publications

Script:

Cohn, Alfred A., The Jazz Singer, edited by Robert Carringer, Madison, Wisconsin, 1979.

Books:

Thrasher, Frederick, Okay for Sound: How the Screen Found Its Voice, New York, 1946.

Jolson, Al, Mistah Jolson, as told to Alban Emley, Los Angeles, 1951.

Burton, Jack, The Blue Book of Hollywood Musicals, Watkin’s Glen, New York, 1953.

Sieben, Pearl, The Immortal Al Jolson: His Life and Times, New York, 1962.

Springer, John, All Singing, All Talking, All Dancing, New York, 1966.

Kiner, Larry F., The Al Jolson Discography, Westport, 1983.

Freedland, Michael, Al Jolson, New York, 1972; London, 1984.

Griffith, Richard, editor, The Talkies: Articles and Illustrations from Photoplay Magazine, New York, 1972.

Stern, Lee Edward, The Movie Musical, New York, 1974.

Geduld, Harry M., Birth of the Talkies: From Edison to Jolson, Bloomington, Indiana, 1975.

Kreuger, Miles, editor, The Movie Musical from Vitaphone to 42nd Street, New York, 1975.

Anderton, Barrie, Sonny Boy! The World of Al Jolson, London, 1975.

Everson, William K., American Silent Film, New York, 1978.

Ellis, Jack C., A History of Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.

Oberfirst, Robert, Al Jolson: You Ain’t Heard Nothin’ Yet, San Diego, 1980.

McClland, Doug, Blackface to Blacklist: Al Jolson, Larry Parks, & “The Jolson Story,” Lanham, 1987.

Goldman, Herbert G., Jolson: The Legend Comes to Life, New York, 1990.

Fisher, James, Al Jolson: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1994.

Freedland, Michael, Jolson: The Al Jolson Story, Clearwater, 1995.

Usai, Paolo C., Burning Passions: An Introduction the Study of Silent Cinema, Collingdale, 1999.

Articles:

“Warner Brothers Studios,” in Moving Picture World, 26 March 1927.
Schallert, Edwin, “Vitaphone Activities in Hollywood,” in Moving Picture World, 8 July 1927.

“How the Vitaphone Enters In,” in New York Times, 28 August 1927.
New York Times, 7 October 1927.

Variety (New York), 12 October 1927.

Calhoun, D., “Sketch on Alan Crosland,” in Motion Picture Classic (New York), June 1928.

Close Up (London), February 1929.

The Jazz Singer

“Flicker Veteran,” in Cue (New York), 20 July 1935.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, in Positif (Paris), September 1972.
 Sarris, Andrew, “The Cultural Guilt of Musical Movies: The Jazz Singer, 50 Years After,” in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1977.
 Swindell, L., “The Day the Silents Stopped,” in American Film (Washington, D.C.), October 1977.
 Beylie, Claude, in Ecran (Paris), January 1978.
 Kupferberg, A., in Take One (Montreal), January 1978.
 Farassino A., in Ekran (Ljubljana), no. 2, 1978.
 Bosseno, C., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), 1979.
 Slide, Anthony, in Magill’s Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Gomery, Douglas, “Case Study: The Coming of Sound,” in Film History: Theory and Practice, by Gomery and Robert C. Allen, New York, 1985.
Reid’s Film Index (Wyong), no. 3, 1989.
 Wolfe, C., “Vitaphone Shorts and The Jazz Singer,” in Wide Angle (Baltimore), no. 3, 1990.
 Rogin, M., “Blackface, White Noise: The Jewish Jazz Singer Finds His Voice,” in Critical Inquiry (Chicago), no. 3, 1992.

Rogin, M., “Two Declarations of American Independence,” in Representations, no. 55, Summer 1996.

Mulvey, Laura, “Now You Has Jazz,” in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 9, no. 5, May 1999.

* * *

As it is generally stated, The Jazz Singer’s place in film history as the first talkie is an erroneous one. It was not the first sound picture—sound films are as old as the cinema itself—and it was not the first Vitaphone feature—that was Don Juan—nor was it the first all-talking Vitaphone feature—that was The Lights of New York. The Jazz Singer is important because it was the first film with sound to catch the imagination of an audience. As one contemporary critic, Welford Beaton, wrote, “The Jazz Singer definitely establishes the fact that talking pictures are imminent.”

Unlike the sound films that had preceded it, The Jazz Singer boasted all the right components in the right mixture. It had a sentimental—silly, even by the standards of the day—story involving mother love, honor and a young man’s striving for success. The film featured such songs as “Toot, Toot, Tootsie,” “Mother o’ Mine,” “Mammy,” and “Blue Skies,” which were to become lasting successes. (Irving Berlin had written “Blue Skies” a year earlier, but it became a standard after it was featured in The Jazz Singer.) Above all, The Jazz Singer starred Al Jolson, a legendary performer, on stage from the early years of the century, whose presence somehow lent validity to the production and gave it something special. Robert Benchley, writing in the old humor magazine Life, jokingly summed up the power of Jolson’s performance: “When Jolson enters, it is as if an electric current had been run along the wires under the seats where the hats are stuck. The house came to tumultuous attention. He speaks, rolls his eyes, compresses his lips, and it is all over. He trembles his lip, and your hearts break with a loud snap. He sings, and you totter out to send a night letter to your mother.” And as if Jolson’s presence was not enough, Warner Bros. wisely cast a major silent screen actress, Mae McAvoy, to play opposite him.

Supposedly based on Al Jolson’s own life, The Jazz Singer first saw life as a magazine story, “The Day of Atonement,” by Samson Raphaelson. Raphaelson—who was to become a prominent screen writer in the 1930s—adapted his story into a stageplay, which became a major success for its star George Jessel (who was initially cast in the film version, but backed out at the last minute apparently in a dispute over money). The story of The Jazz Singer concerns Jakie Rabinowitz who yearns to sing popular songs, but whose father, a cantor, wishes him to follow in his footsteps. Jakie leaves home, changes his name to Jack Robin (selecting a Gentile name in rejection not only of his father but also of his Jewish faith), and goes on the stage. As he is about to get his big break, opening as the star of a Broadway musical, Jakie learns that his father has been taken seriously ill. Realizing his true feelings and his place in his Jewish family, serious Jakie sings the “Kol Nidre” that night, delaying the opening of his show. The musical eventually opens, starring Jakie and his Gentile girlfriend, Mary Dale, and that night Jakie’s mother realizes, “He is not my boy any more. He belongs to the world.”

The plot is ludicrous, and was treated as such even by contemporary critics, many of whom complained that the story was “too Jewish.” (Of course, it is worth noting that despite the awfulness of the story, The Jazz Singer has been twice remade.) What is exciting about the film is its use of sound—not only the interpolated dialogue and songs, but also the musical score and sound effects arranged by Louis Silvers (who skillfully blends elements of popular music with elements of serious music by Tchaikovsky, Debussy and others).

Jolson’s first spoken words—“Wait a minute, wait a minute, you ain’t heard nothing yet. Wait a minute, I tell you. You ain’t heard nothing yet. Do you want to hear ‘Toot, Toot, Tootsie?’”—are electrifying in their intensity even today, some 60 or more years since they were first uttered. It is as if the viewer were participating in a very personal way, in a moment of historic significance. Similarly, there is something embarrassingly private about Jolson’s remarks to his mother as he sits at the piano and sings “Blue Skies” to her. Jolson’s apparently improvised ramblings are perhaps a little too real and, therefore, almost a little too artificial and stilted. The impact of this last dialogue sequence is further emphasized by its abrupt ending as Warner Oland (in the role of Cantor Rabinowitz) enters the scene. He looks at his wife and son, and through a title, shouts “Stop.” The dialogue, the human voice, is stilled, and The Jazz Singer once again becomes a silent film with musical accompaniment.

Alan Crosland brings almost a documentary quality to many of the scenes, particularly the opening sequences in which Jakie, as a child, sings at a local saloon. (It is the voice of Jakie as a child, played by Bobby Gordon, that is the voice first heard in the film.) The director is obviously a highly competent technician, and gets the best from his players, even such notorious purveyors of melodrama as Warner Oland and Eugenie Besserer.

The critics admired the film, but loved Al Jolson. One commented that “He is as solitary upon the heights of an art he has made peculiarly his own as Chaplin is upon his.” Indeed, with The Jazz Singer Jolson heralded a new era which was to bring about the ultimate decline of Chaplin and his contemporaries, destroying one art form and creating another. Perhaps the one irony is that despite its place in the history of the sound film, the sound system utilized for The Jazz Singer—Vitaphone—was not the system that ultimately became standard in the industry. Vitaphone utilized sound on disc, and the future of the industry lay with sound on film.

—Anthony Slide

JEANNE DIELMAN, 23 QUAI DU COMMERCE, 1080 BRUXELLES

Belgium-France, 1975

Director: Chantal Akerman

Production: Paradise Films (Brussels) and Unité Trois (Paris), in association with Le Ministère de la Culture française du Belgique; color; running time: 201 minutes; length: 7,232 feet. Released 1976.

Producers: Evelyne Paul, Corinne Jenart; screenplay: Chantal Akerman; assistant directors: Marilyn Watelet, Serge Brodsky, Marianne de Muylder; photography: Babette Mangolte; editor: Patricia Canino; assistant editors: Catherine Huhardeaux, Martine Chicot; sound editor: Alain Marchall; sound recordists: Benie Deswarte, Françoise Van Thienen; sound re-recordist: Jean-Paul Loublrier; art director: Philippe Graff; assistant art editor: Jean-Pol Ferbus; music extract: “Bagatelle for Piano,” No. 27, op. 126 by Ludwig van Beethoven.

Cast: Delphine Seyrig (Jeanne Dielman); Jan Decorte (Sylvain Dielman); Henri Storck (1st Caller); Jacques Doniol-Valcroze (2nd Caller); Yves Bical (3rd Caller); Chantal Akerman (Voice of Neighbor).

Publications

Books:

Margulies, Ivone, Nothing Happens: Chantal Akerman’s Hyperrealist Everyday, Durham, 1996.

Articles:

Rosenbaum, Jonathan, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1975–76.

Maupin, Françoise, in Image et Son (Paris), February 1976.

Alemann, C., and H. Hurst, interview with Akerman, in Frauen und Film (Berlin), March 1976.

Bertolina, G., “Chantal Akerman: Il cinema puro,” in Filmcritica (Rome), March 1976.

Dubroux, Daniele, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March-April 1976.

- Creveling, C., "Women Working," in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Fall 1976.
- Villien, Bruno, and P. Carcassone, "Chantal Akerman," in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1977.
- Kinder, Marsha, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1977.
- Mairesse, E., "Apropos des films de Chantal Akerman: Un Temps atmosphere," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1977.
- Loader, Jayne, in Jump Cut (Berkeley), November 1977.
- Patterson, Patricia, and Manny Farber, "Kitchen without Kitsch," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1977.
- Bergstrom, Janet, in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Autumn 1978.
- Martin, Angela, "Chantal Akerman's Films," in Feminist Review, no. 3, 1979.
- Pym, John, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1979.
- Perlmutter, Ruth, "Feminine Absence: A Political Aesthetic in Chantal Akerman's Jeanne Dielman," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (New York), Spring 1979.
- Lakeland, M. J., "The Color of Jeanne Dielman," in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Summer 1979.
- Seni, N., in Frauen und Film (Berlin), September 1979.
- Jayamanne, L., "Modes of Performance in Chantal Akerman's Jeanne Dielman," in Australian Journal of Screen Theory (Kensington, New South Wales), no. 8, 1980.
- Orellana, M., "Notas sobre un nuevo cine: El de Chantal Akerman," in Cine (Mexico City), January-February 1980.
- Perlmutter, Ruth, "Visible Narrative, Visible Woman," in Millennium (New York), Spring 1980.
- Aranda, I., and A. Pagaolatos, interview with Akerman, in Contra campo (Madrid), March 1981.
- Singer, B., in Millennium Film Journal (New York), Winter-Spring 1989-90.
- von Bagh, P., "Keskusteluvuorossa: Chantal Akerman," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 4, 1991.
- Rabinowitz, Paula, "Screen Memories," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 18, no. 4, October 1996.
- Eslami, M., "The Portrait of a Lady," in Film International (Tehran), vol. 5, no. 2 1997.

* * *

Chantal Akerman, a 25-year-old French-speaking Belgian from a Jewish family, made in Jeanne Dielman, which is perhaps the most prestigious Belgian film and an emblematic masterpiece of the feminist cinema of the 1970s. With no camera movement whatsoever, and very rarely departing from a single medium-long shot per scene, the 201-minute film scrutinizes for three days the rigorously methodical life of a woman approximately 50 years old and her teenage son. The fastidious rituals of her daily existence include prostitution with what appears to be a regulated sequence of men who come to her apartment, presumably without the son's knowledge, on weekly appointments.

Inspired by Michael Snow's cinematic investigations of space and time and the ritualized gestures of Resnais's and Duras's films, Akerman radically understated the dramatic dimension of her film even though it culminates in the unexpected murder of a client after a day in which Dielman's defensive and psychically anesthetizing rituals go awry. The filmmaker's careful compositions, abetted by Babette Mangolte's brilliantly cool cinematography, so frequently recall the features of paintings of 17th-century interiors (Vermeer, De Hooch, Metsu, Ter Borch) that she seems to be commenting on the Netherlandish art of representing women cleaning house, preparing food, reading letters, grooming children, sewing, listening to music, and entertaining men. Jeanne Dielman recasts that treasury of lucid images in rigorously geometrical settings from the perspective of a participating woman, interpreting them as compulsive displacements of anxiety.

Akerman so protracted and extenuated the pace of her film that the subtle shifts in Dielman's behaviour as the film progresses seem to occur at the threshold of attention. The long-held distant shots, with vivid natural sounds but no movie music, and the rhythmical editing that follows the heroine around her house and at times onto the streets, remaining for a few seconds on a location she has left, or anticipating her arrival, inure the viewer to her underplayed emotions. Furthermore, the shot changes so often mark ellipses, and the dialogue is so sparse, that the viewer may become deeply enmeshed in the film before realizing the significance of a scene that occurred much earlier. For instance, the film opens with the departure of one of Dielman's afternoon clients. But it is possible to think that he is her husband, departing for a week and giving her spending money, until the next day's client appears more than an hour later.

Two intertitles, "End of the first day" and "End of the second day," divide the film into three parts. On the second day Dielman's polished routine begins to show some roughness: she mistimes dinner and overcooks potatoes, but it is not until the third day that minute misfunctions begin to indicate an imminent breakdown: she skips a button on her housecoat, drops a shoebrush and some silverware, washes the same dishes twice, goes too early to the post office and too late to her customary cafe, fails to untie a package. These minor lapses prepare us to see the orgasm she experiences while coolly having intercourse with her afternoon client as a massive deviation from her routine of self-control. In the next shot, she drives the scissors she had to use to get her package open into his throat.

Through most of the film we watch Dielman alone. Even when she is with her son or a neighbor, she says very little. The very sparseness of speech gives weight to the rare instances of it. In this way, the recitation of Baudelaire's poem of the ravages of time, "L'Ennemi," which Jeanne helps her son to memorize, takes on importance. But most of all, it is his brief bedtime discussions of love, sex, and Oedipal rage against his dead father which suggest that the sexual maturing of her son might be the catalyst for the fatal disruption of her defensive compulsions.

—P. Adams Sitney

JEDER FÜR SICH UND GOTT GEGEN ALLE

(Every Man for Himself and God Against All; The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser)

West Germany, 1974

Director: Werner Herzog

Production: Werner Herzog Film-Product and ZDF (German television); Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes. Released 1974.

Jeder für sich und Gott gegen alle

Producer: Werner Herzog; screenplay: Werner Herzog; photography: Jorg Schmidt-Reitwein; editor: Beate Mainka-Jellinghaus; sound: Haymo Henry Heyder; production designer: Henning V. Gierke; music: Pachelbel, Orlandi di Lasso, Albinoni, and Mozart; costume designers: Gisela Storch and Ann Poppel.

Cast: Bruno S. (Kaspar Hauser); Walter Ladengast (Daumer); Brigitte Mira (Kate, the Governess); Hans Musaus (The Stranger); Willy Semmelrogge (Circus Master); Michael Kroeher (Lord Stanhope); Henry Van Lyck (Captain of the Cavalry); Enno Patalas (Pastor Führmann); Elis Pilgrim (Pastor); Volker Prechtel (Hiltel, Prison guard); Kidlat Tahmik (Hombrecito, the Indian); Gloria Doer (Madame Hiltel); Helmut Doring (Little King); Andi Gottwald (Young Mozart); Herbert Achternbusch (Farmboy); Wolfgang Bauer (Farmboy); Walter Steiner (Farmboy); Florian Fricke (Monsieur Florian); Clemens Scheitz (Registrar); Johannes Buzalski (Police officer); Dr. Willy Meyer-Furst (Doctor); Wilhelm Bayer (Captain of the Cavalry, domestic); Franz Brumbach (Bear trainer); Alfred Edel (Professor of Logic); Heribert Fritsch (Mayor); Peter Gebhart (Shoemaker who discovers Kaspar); Reinhard Hauff (Farmer); Dorothea Kraft (Little Girl); Markus Weller (Julius, son of Hiltel); Dr. Heinz H.

Niemoller (Pathologist); Dr. Walter Pflaum (Pathologist); Otto Heinzle (Old Priest); Peter-Udo Schonborn (Swordsman).

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Special Jury Prize, the International Critics' Award, and the Ecumenical Prize, 1975.

Publications

Script:

Herzog, Werner, L'Enigme de Kaspar Hauser, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), June 1976.

Books:

Schütte, Wolfram, and others, Herzog/Kluge/Straub, Vienna, 1976.
Ebert, Roger, Werner Herzog: Images at the Horizon, New York, 1980.

Sandford, John, The New German Cinema, Totowa, New Jersey, 1980.
 Franklin, James, New German Cinema: From Oberhausen to Hamburg, Boston, 1983.
 Phillips, Klaus, editor, New German Filmmakers: From Oberhausen through the 1970s, New York, 1984.
 Corrigan, Timothy, The Films of Werner Herzog: Between Mirage and History, New York, 1986.
 Gabrea, Radu, Werner Herzog et la mystique rhénane, Lausanne, 1986.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema: A History, London, 1989.
 Nagib, Lúcia, Werner Herzog: o cinema como realidade, São Paulo, 1991.

Articles:

Eisner, Lotte, "Herzog in Dinkelsbühl," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1974.
 Haakman, A., in Skoop (Amsterdam), February 1975.
 Overbey, D. L., "Every Man for Himself," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1975.
 Ciment, Michel, "Entretien avec Werner Herzog," in Positif (Paris), May 1975.
 Legrand, Gérard, in Positif (Paris), May 1975.
 Moskowitz, G., in Variety (New York), 14 May 1975.
 Ghali, Noureddine, in Cinéma (Paris), September 1975.
 Farocki, H., and Noureddine Ghali, in Filmkritik (Munich), November 1975.
 Clouzot, C., "L'Enigme de Kaspar Hauser: Entretien avec Werner Herzog," in Ecran (Paris), November 1975.
 Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1975.
 Schaub, M., "Bilderarbeit," in Cinema (Zurich), no. 3, 1976.
 Leirens, J., "Ce jour là à Nuremberg," in Amis du Film et de la Télévision (Brussels), March 1976.
 Garel, A., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), October 1976.
 Bronchain, C., in Apec-Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), October 1976.
 Benelli, D., "Mysteries of the Organism: Character Consciousness and Film Form in Kaspar Hauser and Spirit of the Beehive," in Movietone News (Seattle), June 1977.
 Dorr, John, "The Enigma of Werner Herzog," in Millimeter (New York), October 1977.
 Finger, W., "Kaspar Hauser Doubly Portrayed," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1979.
 Horak, J. C., "Werner Herzog's Ecran Absurde," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1979.
 Perlmutter, R., "The Cinema of the Grotesque," in Georgia Review (Athens), no. 1, 1979.
 Bloom, M., "Woyzeck and Kaspar: The Incongruities in Drama and Film," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1980.
 Korsic, I., in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 3, 1981.
 Stefanoni, L., "Fata Morgana: L'enigma di Kaspar Hauser," in Cineforum (Bergamo), May 1981.
 Cinema Nuovo (Bari), June 1981.
 Scarrone, C., "La 'domanda scomoda,'" in Filmcritica (Florence), September-October 1981.
 Gerulaitis, R., "Recurring Cultural Patterns: Werner Herzog's Film Every Man for Himself and God against All, the Enigma of Caspar Hauser," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), no. 4, 1989.

Hainisch, B., and T. Pilz, "Werner Herzog's Jeder für sich und Gott gegen alle - ein Film," in Blimp (Graz), no. 30, Winter 1994.

Brown, G., "Lessons of Darkness," in Village Voice (New York), vol. 41, 2 April 1996.

* * *

In many countries Jeder für sich und Gott gegen alle (Every Man for Himself and God Against All) is distributed under the title Kaspar Hauser—the name of the hero of this film based on the history of a man who in 1828 was found by chance living in a dark cave where he had apparently grown up without any contact with other human beings. Brought to civilization, he experiences many of the events of ordinary life, all of which make him feel equally uneasy.

Werner Herzog, the director, unlike François Truffaut in The Wild Child, is not interested in showing the painful process of adaptation to civilized surroundings; Kaspar has a special consciousness in which the laws of nature have a central place and in which the conventions and norms of civilized behavior are as artificial and inconvenient to him as the black dinner jacket he is forced to wear. His difficulties in communication are not the result of any linguistic inadequacies; simply, he is "different" from other men. That is why Herzog seems to wish to persuade us that, despite being gratuitous, both the early isolation and the surprising death of his hero are somehow logical.

An examination of Herzog's earlier films suggests that he always moves within the same closed circle of his imagination. All of his heroes are in some way related. The deaf-mutes in Land of Silence and Darkness, the dwarfs in Even Dwarfs Started Small or the half-crazy conquistador in Aguirre, the Wrath of God—like Kaspar Hauser—are outsiders, unable to adapt, creatures who have no place in human society.

His later films, if anything, stress this similarity of characters and continuity of motifs. In Stroszek the main characters from Kaspar Hauser reappear but in another historical context—that of our own time. Stroszek—played by Bruno S., the same Berlin hobo who played Kaspar—and his two companions, the old man (Clemens Scheitz) and the girl (Eva Mattes), can no longer find a "place" in their native Germany, so they emigrate to America, where they also fail. This would be the fate of Kaspar Hauser today. Aguirre, the greedy colonist, appears again in Fitzcarraldo—a corrective to the pessimistic conclusion of Aguirre. The wisdom and integrity of the Indians have profound effect on the conqueror, and he comes to see his confrontation with the jungle and the natives as a blessing that saves him from the abyss.

This summary of plot sounds like a fairy tale—and it is. Most of Herzog's films recall fables, and that is surely one of the reasons for their success. There is a kind of magical charm in the way that Herzog composes his shots: these films contain much natural beauty and slow rhythm that evokes splendor and transcendence.

When one speaks of Herzog, one speaks of "mystical cinema, transcendent, an idealistic vision of reality." The film Kaspar Hauser is an example of a kind of narration in which realistically-realized shots are perceived as a perfect, even though unrealistic, fiction.

—Maria Racheva

LES JEUX INTERDITS

(Forbidden Games)

France, 1952

Director: René Clément

Production: Silver-Film; black and white, 35mm; running time: 102 minutes, some sources list 90 minutes, others 84 minutes. Released 9 May 1952. Filmed Fall 1951.

Producer: Robert Dorfmann; screenplay: François Boyer; adaptation and dialogue: Jean Aurenche, Pierre Bost, and René Clément, from the novel by François Boyer; photography: Robert Juillard; editor: Roger Dwyre; sound engineer: Jacques Lebreton; art director: Paul Bertrand; music adaptation and interpretation: Narciso Yepes; costume designer: Major Brandley.

Cast: Brigitte Fossey (Paulette, age 5); Georges Poujouly (Michel Dolle, age 11); Lucien Herbert (Père Dolle); Suzanne Courtal (Mère Dolle); Jacques Marin (Georges Dolle); Laurence Badie (Berthe Dolle); Andre Wasley (Père Gouard); Amedee (Francis Gouard); Denise Peronne (Jeanne Gouard); Louis Sainteve (Le curé); Madeleine Barbulee; Pierre Merovee; Violette Monnier; and Fernande Roy.

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Grand Prix Indépendant, 1952; Venice Film Festival, Best Film—Gold Lion of St. Mark, 1952; New York Film Critics' Award, Best Foreign Film, 1952; Honorary Oscar for Best Foreign-Language Film, 1952.

Publications

Script:

Aurenche, Jean, Pierre Bost, and René Clément, Les Jeux interdits (excerpts), in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 May 1962.

Books:

Siclier, Jacques, René Clément, Brussels, 1956.

Farwagi, Andre, René Clément, Paris, 1967.

Armes, Roy, French Film, New York, 1970.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema since 1946: The Great Tradition, New York, 1970.

Barsacq, Léon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.

Articles:

Eisner, Lotte, "Style of René Clément," in Film Culture (New York), no. 12 and no. 13, 1957.

Clément, René, "Pourquoi j'ai tourné Jeux interdits," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 May 1962.

McVay, Douglas, "The Darker Side of Life," in Films and Filming (London), December 1966.

Reijnhoudt, B., "Bekeken," in Skoop (Amsterdam), July-August 1982.

Comuzio, E., "Giochi proibiti di René Clément," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), November 1992.

Ghiyati, Karim, "Le petit Parisien à la campagne," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), no. 469, February 1998.

* * *

For English-speaking audiences, Les jeux interdits remains one of the two or three most important French films of the pre-New Wave era. Under Clément's direction, the two children are inestimably fresher and more engaging than almost any other child actors of the time. But beyond its immediate appeal, Forbidden Games remains important as an early conjunction of the realist style of director René Clément on the one side and the "cinema of quality" of the Aurenche/Bost script on the other. A tension is created by the film's hesitation between social allegory and anthropology and between a natural and a prettified style.

The film's allegory is transparent from the outset when German Stukas strafe a line of fleeing Parisians. In the gorgeous French countryside at the waning of spring, man's urge to destroy strews bodies around the landscape. Having set a brutal tone, Clément turns to his tender drama and to Brigitte Fossey, already irresistible at five years old. Wandering away from the bodies of her parents and into a pasture of lowing cows, she narrows the film's focus from public to private morals and mores, for her subsequent adoption by a peasant family displaces the social context from international war to domestic strife.

Now little Brigitte and her soulmate, played by Georges Poujouly, observe the stupid bickerings, rituals, and greed both within their household and between the households of the village. Particularly memorable is the death of the older brother who had been kicked by a horse. The children are amused by his ugly demise and the religious trappings of his funeral. Soon they develop rituals of their own, "les jeux interdits." In an abandoned barn they construct an elaborate burial ground for every sort of creature. So fascinated are they by death that they eagerly await (even bring about) the final end of insects, dogs, etc. The religious compensation of their candles and crosses is at once a grotesque and authentic displacement of the petty comforts of adult religion.

This ridicule of peasant life, particularly of religion, distinguishes the film as a serious production, as does the obvious irony at work in comparing a Parisian girl and her rural foster parents. Much of Clément's compositional strategy reinforces supercilious sentiments as when he cuts among rural families at the cemetery from a number of low angles. Such pretty shots progressively make a mockery of the mourners; finally, one shot is taken literally from the bottom of the grave. Clément also ridicules romance: the children discover the older sister in the hay with the boy next door, who had been recently demilitarized. Altogether the dialogue is terribly pointed, even pithy, despite coming from the mouths of peasants. This whole “quality” flavor is summed up in the credits which are rendered over the pages of a book, as if insisting on the literary stature of the film.

Les jeux interdits

But Clément’s roots in realism and his command of location shooting also pull the film in other directions, some of which might be thought to presage the New Wave. Close-ups of the children are excessively lengthy and attain a documentary interest beyond their narrative motivation. They give the viewer a rather direct emotional access to these children apart from the story we find them in. The full power of this technique is reserved for the film’s final sequence in which we observe, without any artifice of editing, the little girl dissolve in tears amidst hundreds like her at the Paris orphanage to which she has been taken. In short, we trust the tears of this child.

A New Wave attitude is associated with the music as well. Not only in the employment of a simple, lyrical guitar, but also in its haunting melody, which often triggers meditation on a recent dramatic action. Frequent promenades to the accompaniment of guitar are dramatic resting places wherein the film addresses the spectator in a new and more direct way.

Altogether then the film highlights in its style(s) and subject the conflicts of purity and the grotesque, of children and adults, of nature and man, of realism and parody.

—Dudley Andrew

JFK

USA, 1991

Director: Oliver Stone

Production: Warner Bros./Le Studio Canal/Regency Enterprises/Alcor; color, 35mm, Panavision; running time: 189 minutes; director’s cut runs 205 minutes. Released 20 December 1991 (U.S.A.).

JFK

Much footage filmed on location in New Orleans, Dallas, Texas, and Washington D.C. Budget: $40 Million (approx.).

Producers: A. Kitman Ho, Oliver Stone; screenplay: Oliver Stone, Zachary Sklar, from the books On the Trail of the Assassins by Jim Garrison and Crossfire: The Plot That Killed Kennedy by Jim Marrs; photography: Robert Richardson; editors: Joe Hutshing, Pietro Scalia; sound: Bill Daly (sound mixer: Dealey Plaza), Gregg Landaker, Tod A. Maitland, Michael Minkler, Wylie Stateman, Michael D. Wilhoit; art directors: Derek R. Hill, Alan R. Tomkins; original music score: John Williams; casting: Risa Bramon Garcia, Billy Hopkins, Heidi Levitt.

Cast: Kevin Costner (Jim Garrison); Sissy Spacek (Liz Garrison); Joe Pesci (David Ferrie); Tommy Lee Jones (Clay Shaw); Gary Oldman (Lee Harvey Oswald); Jay O. Sanders (Lou Ivon); Michael Rooker (Bill Broussard); Laurie Metcalf (Susie Cox); Gary Grubbs (Al Osner); John Candy (Dean Andrews); Jack Lemmon (Jack Martin); Walter Matthau (Senator Long); Ed Asner (Guy Bannister); Donald Sutherland (X); Kevin Bacon (Willie O'Keefe); Brian Doyle-Murray (Jack Ruby); Sally Kirkland (Rose Cheramie); Jim Garrison (Earl Warren).

Awards: Oscars for Best Cinematography and Best Film Editing (Joe Hutshing, Pietro Scalia), 1992; American Cinema Editors Award (Eddie) (Joe Hutshing, Pietro Scalia), 1992; Golden Globe Award for Best Director—Motion Picture, 1992; British Academy Award (BAFTA) for Best Editing (Joe Hutshing, Pietro Scalia) and Best Sound (Gregg Landaker, Tod A. Maitland, Michael Minkler, Wylie Stateman, Michael D. Wilhoit), 1993.

Publications

Script:

Stone, Oliver, and Zachary Sklar, JFK: The Book of the Film, New York, 1994.

Books:

Garrison, Jim, On the Trail of the Assassins: My Investigation and Prosecution of the Murder of President Kennedy, New York, 1988.
Marrs, Jim, Crossfire: The Plot that Killed Kennedy, New York, 1990.
Beaver, Frank, Oliver Stone: Wakeup Cinema, New York, 1994.

- Riordan, James, Stone: The Controversies, Excesses, and Exploits of a Radical Filmmaker, New York, 1994.
- Kunz, Don, editor, The Films of Oliver Stone (Filmmakers Series, No. 55), Metuchen, New Jersey, 1997.

Articles:

- Anson, Robert Sam, "The Shooting of JFK," in Esquire (New York), 1 November 1991.
- Stone, Oliver, interview in Time (New York), 23 December 1991.
- Crowdus, Gary, "Getting the Facts Straight: An Interview with Zachary Sklar," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 19, no. 1, 1992.
- Crowdus, Gary, "Clarifying the Conspiracy: An Interview with Oliver Stone," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 19, no. 1, 1992.
- Medhurst, Martin J., "The Rhetorical Structure of Oliver Stone's JFK," in Critical Studies in Mass Communication, June 1993.
- Romanowski, William D., "Oliver Stone's JFK: Commercial Filmmaking, Cultural History, and Conflict," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Summer 1993.
- Crowdus, Gary, "History, Dramatic License, and Larger Historical Truths: An Interview with Oliver Stone," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 22, no. 4, 1997.
- Sharrett, Christopher, "Conspiracy Theory and Political Murder in America: Oliver Stone's JFK and the Facts of the Matter," in Jon Lewis, editor, The New American Cinema, Durham, North Carolina, 1998.
- Rosenstone, Robert A., "JFK: Historical Fact/Historical Film," in Alan Rosenthal, editor, Why Docudrama?: Fact-Fiction on Film and TV, Carbondale, Illinois, 1999.

* * *

Winner of two Oscars, for cinematography and editing, and nominated for five others, JFK has been praised as a film but heavily criticized as an historical account of the assassination of John F. Kennedy in November 1963. By 1991, when JFK was released, Stone was already well known as a maker of challenging and controversial films, notably about America's involvement in Vietnam. His attacks on the American government and justice system, for their pandering to big business over the needs of the people, are all the more remarkable given that they appeared in the 1980s and early 1990s, a period of conservatism in Hollywood and elsewhere. JFK, arguably his most impressive work as a director, consolidated his reputation as an argumentative and politically awkward filmmaker.

The film revives New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison's 1967 theory that Kennedy was killed in an attempted coup d'état orchestrated by military and industrial influences within the American government. Their motivation, Garrison believed, was opposition to Kennedy's aim of withdrawing American troops from Vietnam. Even before Stone began making the film, Garrison's theory had been shown to have little real evidence to support it, and JFK itself has since been picked over by critics eager to show the inconsistencies in Stone's account.

In attempting to provide as much detail as possible about Garrison's theory, most of it explained in Costner's deadpan drawl, Stone ran the risk of alienating much of his audience. The extreme length of the movie, which runs for well over three hours in its "director's cut," might also have discouraged filmgoers. Yet JFK was a commercial success, at least in part because of its subject matter, which also attracted many well-known actors and others to play minor roles. The most interesting of these cameos is the real Jim Garrison playing Earl Warren. Stone also extracts fine performances from his leading actors, particularly from Tommy Lee Jones, who projects a menacing sense of suppressed violence as Clay Shaw, the businessman with whose trial and acquittal the film ends. Kevin Costner's portrayal of Jim Garrison's single-minded determination to find the truth is compelling, and Kevin Bacon, Joe Pesci, and Sissy Spacek are also impressive.

The film is also very well made; JFK is a masterpiece of well-judged tension, dramatic revelation, and changes of mood. By switching between film stocks, blending documentary and "made" footage, and introducing a series of bizarre and sinister characters, Stone manages to drive the narrative along with vigor, despite its sometimes rather detached, obsessive feel. The repeated showing of the famous Zapruder home movie of the killing helps to lend authenticity to the action, while dramatic set-pieces, such as Garrison's timing a marksman as he attempts to fire three shots from a manual rifle, give a sense of documentary objectivity.

While the film is convincingly detailed and impressive as a detective thriller, its actual value as a documentary is negligible. Stone has rightly been criticized for presenting as true events for which there is no conclusive evidence. What is perhaps more worrying, however, is Stone's manipulation of evidence to prove his point. The blurring of the distinction between documentary and "made" footage is a showcase for the skills of the Oscar-winning editors, but it also obscures the point at which the real evidence begins and Stone's invention ends. Even the short Zapruder film was altered in an effort to suggest the existence of bullets entering Kennedy's body from different directions. Given the authority with which such "evidence" is presented, it is difficult to see any real difference between Stone's manipulation of the known facts and the deception his film identifies at the heart of the Warren Commission's investigation.

As a convincing alternative to the official account of the assassination, JFK has many shortcomings, and one of its more unfortunate effects has been to further mythologize the circumstances of Kennedy's death. But if Stone's intention was to challenge the American government's handling of the case, and renew public interest in finding out the truth about the assassination, JFK was a resounding success. Indeed, the film aroused so much debate and speculation that in an attempt to satisfy public curiosity the U.S. Congress passed the JFK Assassination Records Collection Act of 1992, demanding the early release of almost all of the government's files on the case. Taking account of the controversy the film aroused, hardcore conspiracy theorists should note that Stone himself received no Oscars for JFK.

—Chris Routledge

JIGOKUMON

(Gate of Hell)

Japan, 1953

Director: Teinosuke Kinugasa

Production: Daiei (Tokyo); Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 89 minutes. Released 1953, Japan. Filmed in Japan.

Jigokumon

Producer: Masaichi Nagata; screenplay: Teinosuke Kinugasa, from a 20th century play by Kan Kikuchi; photography: Kohei Sugiyama; art director: Kisaku Itoh; music director: Yasuchi Akutagawa; costume designer: Sanzo Wada; color consultant: Sanzo Wada.

Cast: Machiko Kyo (Wife); Kazuo Hasegawa (Husband); Koreya Senda; Isao Yamagata; Yataro Kurokawa; Kataro Bando.

Awards: Oscar for Best Costume Design-Color and Special Oscar for Best Foreign Film, 1954; New York Film Critics' Award, Best Foreign Film, 1954; Cannes Film Festival, Best Film, 1954.

Publications

Books:

Shinobu Giuglaris, Marcel de, Le Cinéma Japonais, Paris, 1956.
Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, The Japanese Film: Art and Industry, New York, 1960; revised edition, New Jersey, 1982.

Articles:

Life (New York), 15 November 1954.
Knight, Arthur, "Japan's Film Revolution," in Saturday Review (New York), 11 December 1954.
Ozaki, Koji, in Atlantic (Boston), January 1955.
Iwabutchi, Masayoshi, "1954 in Japan," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1955.
Young, Vernon, "Reflections on Japanese Film," in Art Digest (New York), August 1955.
Anderson, Joseph, "Seven from the Past," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1957.
Cohen, R., "A Japanese Romantic: Teinosuke Kinugasa," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 45, no. 3, Summer 1976.
Checklist and critical notes on Teinosuke Kinugasa, in Film Dope (Nottingham), no. 31, January 1985.

* * *

Although today Teinosuke Kinugasa's Jigokumon is seldom treated as an important film, its historical position is secure. It was one of the first post-World War II Japanese films to be accepted and honored by the international film community. Not only did it win the Grand Prize at the 1954 Cannes International Film Festival but also it received two Academy Awards in the United States.

The great commercial and critical success of Akira Kurosawa's Rashomon (1950), Kenji Mizoguchi's Ugetsu (1953), and Jigokumon made the Western world begin to take notice of Japanese films.

Jigokumon was especially noteworthy to Western audiences because it was the first Japanese color film released in the West. Although the Eastmancolor film stock came from the United States, Kinugasa and his cinematographer, art director, and color consultant used it with an artistry and subtlety that was seldom seen in the American films of that time. Many critics praised the filmmakers for giving the color a distinctly Japanese look that was a welcome contrast to the flamboyance of Hollywood.

Although Jigokumon is set in the 12th century, it is based on the 20th-century Japanese play by Kan Kikuchi. The film begins with a war between rival clans, and then, when the war is over, concentrates on only three characters in a story of love, sacrifice, and grief.

The direction of Kinugasa gives intimacy to both parts of the film, even the battle scenes. Kinugasa often highlights the large-scale sequences with small details in the foreground or at the end of a scene. In one scene, for example, the march of warriors in the background is accentuated by a number of chickens fighting in the foreground, and many scenes that involve large numbers of fighting men end with a quiet close-up of an inanimate object.

The second part of the film contrasts the emotion and brutality of the warrior Moritah with the restraint of a man and his wife who value self-sacrifice above violence and revenge. When Moritah tries to take the wife away from her husband, she sacrifices her life rather than accept the warrior; after her death, the husband refuses to take vengeance. The warrior finally realizes that he must atone for his sin by continuing to live with the knowledge of what he has done. This is not a familiar theme for Western audiences, but under Kinugasa's direction the performers who play the couple convey the depth of their feeling without much overt show of emotion. (The wife, incidentally, is played by Machiko Kyo, who also was featured in Rashomon.)

Jigokumon is only one of the many fine films directed by Teinosuke Kinugasa in a career that spanned five decades, but to Western audiences it was a revelation in the artistry of its color and the strength of its story. The audiences that had appreciated the black-and-white masterpieces of Kurosawa and Mizoguchi were astonished by Kinugasa's use of color film. The American Motion Picture Academy gave Sanzo Wada its award for costume design, and because at that time the Academy had no foreign film category, it gave Jigokumon a special award as Best Foreign Film.

—Timothy Johnson

JOHNNY GUITAR

USA, 1954

Director: Nicholas Ray

Production: Republic Pictures; Trucolor, 35mm, Cinemascope; running time: 110 minutes. Released November 1954. Filmed 1953.

Johnny Guitar

Producer: Herbert J. Yates; screenplay: Philip Yordan, from the novel by Roy Chanslor; photography: Harry Stradling, Jr.; editor: Richard L. Van Enger; sound: T. A. Carmen and Howard Wilson; production designer: John McCarthy, Jr. and Edward G. Boyle; art director: James Sullivan; music: Victor Young, with title song by Victor Young and Peggy Lee, sung by Peggy Lee; special effects: Howard and Theodore Lydecker; costume designer: Sheila O'Brien.

Cast: Joan Crawford (Vienna); Sterling Hayden (Johnny Guitar); Mercedes McCambridge (Emma Small); Scott Brady (Dancin' Kid); Ben Cooper (Turkey); Ward Bond (John McIvers); Ernest Borgnine (Bart Lonergan); John Carradine (Tom); Royal Dano (Corey); Frank Ferguson (Sheriff); Paul Fix (Eddie); Rhys Williams (Mr. Andrews); Ian McDonald (Zeke); Will Wright (Ned); John Maxwell (Jake); Robert Osterloh (Sam); Frank Marlowe (Frank); Trevor Bardette (Jenks); Sumner Williams, Sheb Wooley, Denver Pyle, and Clem Harvey (Possemen).

Publications

Script:

Yordan, Philip, Johnny Guitar, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), March 1974.

Books:

- Crawford, Joan, with Jane Kesner, A Portrait of Joan: The Autobiography, New York, 1962.
- Finin, George N., and William K. Everson, The Western: From Silents to Cinerama, New York, 1962; revised edition, 1973.
- Warshow, Robert, The Immediate Experience, New York, 1962.
- Hayden, Sterling, Wanderer, New York, 1965.
- Quirk, Lawrence J., The Films of Joan Crawford, New York, 1968.
- Bazin, André, What Is Cinema, Berkeley, 1971.
- Harvey, Stephen, Joan Crawford, New York, 1974.
- French, Philip, Westerns, New York, 1974.
- Nachbar, Jack, editor, Focus on the Western, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1974.
- Wright, Will, Sixguns and Society: A Structural Study of the Western, Berkeley, 1975.
- Parish, James Robert, and Michael Pitts, editors, The Great Western Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1976.
- Kreidl, John, Nicholas Ray, Boston, 1977.
- Walker, Alexander, Joan Crawford: The Ultimate Star, London, 1983.
- Masi, Stefano, Nicholas Ray, Florence, 1983.
- Blaine, Allan, Nicholas Ray: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.
- Erice, Victor, and Jos Oliver, Nicholas Ray y su tiempo, Madrid, 1986.
- Guiliani, Pierre, Nicholas Ray, Paris, 1987.
- Wagner, Jean, Nicholas Ray, Paris, 1987.
- Buscombe, Ed, The BFI Companion to the Western, London, 1988.
- Eisenschitz, Bernard, Nicholas Ray: An American Journey, New York, 1993, 1996.
- Ray, Nicholas, I Was Interrupted: Nicholas Ray on Making Movies, Berkeley, 1993.

Articles:

- Hollywood Reporter*, 5 May 1954.
- Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 28 May 1954.
- Truffaut, François, in Arts (Paris), February 1955.
- Godard, Jean-Luc, in Image et Son (Paris), July 1956.
- Quirk, Lawrence J., "Joan Crawford," in Films in Review (New York), December 1956.
- Bitsch, Charles, "Entretien avec Nick Ray," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1958.
- Agel, Henri, "Nicholas Ray," in New York Film Bulletin, no. 11, 1961.
- Hagen, Ray, "Mercedes McCambridge," in Films in Review (New York), May 1965.
- Perkins, Victor, "The Cinema of Nicholas Ray," in Movie Reader, edited by Ian Cameron, New York, 1972.
- Rosenbaum, Jonathan, "Circle of Pain: The Cinema of Nicholas Ray," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1973.
- Barr, Charles, "Cinemascope Before and After," in Film Theory and Criticism, edited by Gerald Mast and Mark Cohen, New York, 1974.
- "Johnny Guitar Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), March 1974.
- Biskind, Peter, "Rebel without a Cause: Nicholas Ray in the Fifties," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1974.
- Place, Janey, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Fernandez Santos, A., and J. G. Requena, "Dos miradas sobre Johnny Guitar," in Contracampo (Madrid), December 1980.

- Boyero, C., in Casablanca (Madrid), May 1981.
- Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 7 July 1988.
- Charney, Leo, "Historical Excess: Johnny Guitar's Containment," in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 29, no. 4, Summer 1990.
- Brown, G., "B Happy," in Village Voice (New York), vol. 38, 14 September 1993.
- Wollen, Peter, "Never at Home," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 4, no. 5, May 1994.
- Robertson, Pamela, "Camping Under Western Stars: Joan Crawford in Johnny Guitar," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 47, no. 1-3, Spring-Fall 1995.
- Peterson, Jennifer, "The Competing Tunes of Johnny Guitar: Liberalism, Sexuality, Masquerade," in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 35, no. 3, Spring 1996.
- Voisin, N., in Positif (Paris), no. 435, May 1997.

* * *

Johnny Guitar certainly represents one of the most important Hollywood westerns, recognized at the time by critics throughout Europe. Critic-turned-auteur Bernardo Bertolucci called it "the first of the baroque westerns," while François Truffaut suggested the admiration members of the French New Wave had for the film when in his own Mississippi Mermaid he had Jean Paul Belmondo say to Catherine Deneuve as they emerged from a screening of Johnny Guitar: "It's not about horses and guns. It's about people and emotions." Jean-Luc Godard in his Pierrot le fou had his alienated "hero" (again Belmondo) recommend Johnny Guitar to his maid, and in Weekend had hippie guerrillas broadcast from their hideout: "Johnny Guitar calling Gosta Berling."

But the origins of Johnny Guitar came amidst tumultuous changes in the American film business of the 1950s, and were far more humble than any art film. Johnny Guitar was produced by a former maker of "B" westerns, Republic Pictures. The studio was long famous for its regular production of westerns starring Gene Autry and Roy Rogers. In the decade following the Second World War, the studio boss, Herbert Yates, sought to move into the big time and indeed challenge the major studios. To do this it turned out a couple of big-budget films per year. Johnny Guitar was one of these. Others included John Ford's The Quiet Man (1952) and Ford's Rio Grande (1950). But none helped enough, and by 1958 the forces of change (television, suburbanization, government decrees) saw Republic shut down production altogether.

In Hollywood lore Johnny Guitar is usually remembered for bringing together a talented group of creators. The movie was director Nicholas Ray's first after leaving RKO, the studio that brought him to Hollywood. At Republic Ray was granted absolute creative freedom, even functioning as the film's producer. Ray was in the midst of his most creative and productive period. His Rebel without a Cause, released the following year, allowed him to function as a mainline director for the next five or so years. But after a number of box-office failures, including King of Kings (1961) and 55 Days at Peking (1963), Ray never worked in Hollywood again. Like another enfant terrible of a decade before, Orson Welles, Nicholas Ray did not fit into the Hollywood system.

But Ray was not the lone talent involved in the creation of this most adult of westerns. Philip Yordan, one of Hollywood's most prolific screenwriters, was at the apex of his career. Indeed the following year he penned a western nearly as complex as Johnny Guitar: Anthony Mann's The Man from Laramie. Veteran cameraman Harry Stradling's almost surreal Trucolor (Republic's own) added just the right look to this garish "oater."

But to movie fans of the era Johnny Guitar is probably most remembered as the western starring two women. Joan Crawford, one of Hollywood's longest running stars, experienced a downturn in her career after her Oscar for Mildred Pierce (1945) and thereafter struggled to fashion a career as "the evil older woman" in an industry that did not know what to do with actresses over the age of 30. In Johnny Guitar Crawford represented depravity incarnate, always dressed in black, willing to do anything to hold on to her small saloon. The woman who wanted to take away that bar, played by Mercedes McCambridge, initiated with Johnny Guitar a career in which she was at her best when playing desperate characters.

Although many have labelled the film as offbeat and baroque, Johnny Guitar is not excessively violent. Its settings were traditional, and the cast included such familiar figures from westerns of the 1950s as Ward Bond and Scott Brady (as "Johnny"). The plot seemed untraditional because there was no powerful central, active male figure. Johnny Logan is a notorious "fast draw" with a reputation that precedes him. But throughout the film Johnny does little except save Vienna (Crawford) at one point. He spends most of his time standing around, watching and commenting on the action.

It is impossible to capture the beauty in this complex genre film in a short essay, but as Chicago Tribune film critic Michael Wilmington wrote at the time of the film's release: "Never trust appearances. Beauty and profundity are not always found in the 'obvious' traditional places; a Trucolor Western from humble Republic can throb with the passion of l'amour fou or whisper with an evening delicacy."

—Douglas Gomery

LE JOLI MAI

France, 1963

Director: Chris Marker

Production: Sofracima; black and white, 35mm; running time: 110 and 140 minutes, American version 124 minutes. Released May 1963, Paris. Filmed spring 1962 in Paris.

Producer: Catherine Winter; screenplay: Catherine Varlin and Chris Marker; photography: Pierre Lhomme; editor: Eva Zora; music: Michel Legrand, title song: B. Mokkoussov and Michel Legrand, sung by Yves Montand.

Cast: Commentators: Yves Montand (the French commentary); Simone Signoret (the English commentary).

Awards: Venice Film Festival, Best First Film, 1963; Cannes Film Festival, International Critics' Prize, 1963.

Publications

Script:

Varlin, Catherine, and Chris Marker, Le joli Mai, in Le Cinéma et la vérité, edited by Raymond Bellour, Lyons, 1963.

Books:

Issari, Ali, Cinema Vérité, East Lansing, Michigan, 1971.

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: The Personal Style, New York, 1976.

Horrigan, William, Chris Marker: Silent Movie, Columbus, 1995.

Articles:

Graham, Peter, "The Face of '63—France," in Films and Filming (London), May 1963.

Kustow, Michael, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1964.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), May 1964.

Graham, Peter, "Cinema Vérité in France," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1964.

Jacob, Gilles, "Chris Marker and the Mutants," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1966.

Thomas, John, in Film Society Review (New York), January 1967.

Gauthier, G., in Image et Son (Paris), no. 274, 1973.

Roud, Richard, "The Left Bank Revisited," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1977.

Gaggi, S., "Marker and Resnais: Myth and Reality," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 1, 1979.

Leeuwen, T. van, "Conjunctive Structure in Documentary Film and Television," in Continuum, vol. 5, no. 1, 1991.

Kohn, O., and H. Niogret, "Temoignages," in Positif (Paris), no. 433, March 1997.

"Special Section," in Revue Pour le Cinéma Français, no. 45–47, September 1997.

* * *

Released in 1963, Chris Marker's Le joli Mai was one of the first and finest examples of cinema vérité to come out of France. Poetic, witty, complex, the film uses as its initial focus the spring of 1962, the first spring of peace for France since 1939. With rooftop shots of Paris on the screen, the narrator in the opening commentary tells us: "For two centuries happiness has been a new idea in Europe, and people are not used to it." In the very political film which follows, Marker examines that idea of happiness on the small, private scale and on a larger, societal scale.

Divided into two parts, Le joli Mai first concerns itself with individual happiness in a series of interviews with people from a range of social backgrounds. We meet a nervous clothing salesman concerned about money in the till, a pompous inventor intoning his philosophy of hard work and success, a young couple speaking of eternal happiness. Marker's interviewees are adept, able to elicit revealing statements about individual hopes and beliefs without overpowering the subjects. Some segments need no such devices to make a statement: the glum bride at the jolly wedding party, the joyous mother of eight showing her family their government flat, well-dressed literary types releasing a flock of doves to celebrate a poetry prize.

Le joli Mai

Part II places the small slices of life from the first half of the film onto a larger canvas for clearer definition. We see the shared political and social turmoil of France in 1962 in newsreel-like segments of police charges, demonstrations, and strikes. Cut against the newsreel footage are scenes from a Parisian nightclub where the dancing takes on an almost tribal quality. One of the dancers tell us: “While scientists concentrate on microbes, I concentrate on the twist.” The interviews in this section also contribute to the larger canvas. A black student from Dahomey reveals his first thought on seeing white people, “So these are the people who conquered us,” and his second, “Some day we will conquer them.” A communist worker-priest says he no longer has time to consider whether God exists.

Le joli Mai is distinguished by the witty artistry of its director. A poet and essayist as well as filmmaker, Marker has a wonderful flair for visual asides. When a grumbler disrupts the interview going on with two stock exchange apprentices, Marker turns the camera on the man and, complete with clapper, starts shooting as the interviewer asks the man the same question—what does money mean? When two consulting engineers in their discussion of work refer to nonworkers, Marker shows us shots of marvelously luxuriant, sleek cats. When the inventor propounds his philosophy of life, the camera watches the progress of a daddy longlegs across the man’s lapel. A salesman’s description of new luxury apartments is counterpointed by older people in the background washing in the street.

Throughout, the film is permeated by a bittersweet quality as it evokes the troubles of the past and present and hopes for a better future. That bittersweet tone underscores the inability of the individuals in the first part to cope with the larger reality around them. How can statements on the value of hard work, the meaning of money, the eternal quality of happiness deal with a police charge that kills eight people on the Metro? As one of the consulting engineers at the end of the film comments, “Our dreams are too small for what already exists.” One of the distinctions of Le joli Mai is that it is able to present disparate episodes from real life involving many different people and yet pull them together into a cohesive statement about the milieu in which those individuals exist.

—Sharon Lee

JONAH QUI AURA 25 ANS EN L'AN 2000

(Jonah Who Will Be 25 in the Year 2000)

France-Switzerland, 1976

Director: Alain Tanner

Production: Citel Films and SSR Télévision Suisse (Geneva), Action Films and Société Français de Production (Paris); Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes, some sources list 116 minutes; length: 10,401 feet. Released 25 August 1976.

Producers: Yves Gasser and Yves Peyrot; executive producer: Roland Jouby; screenplay: John Berger and Alain Tanner; photography: Renato Berta; editors: Brigitte Sousselier and Marc Blavet; sound recordist: Pierre Gamet; sound re-recordist: Christian Londe; music: Jean-Marie Senia.

Cast: Jean-Luc Bideau (Max Sitigny); Myriam Boyer (Mathilde Vernier); Myriam Mzière (Madeleine); Rufus (Mathieu Vernier); Roger Jendly (Marcel Certoux); Jacques Denis (Marco Perly); Miou-Miou (Marie); Raymond Bussières (Charles); Dominique Labourier (Marguerite); Jonah (Himself).

Publications

Script:

Berger, John, and Alain Tanner, Jonah qui aura 25 ans en l'an 2000, Lausanne, 1978; as Jonah Who Will Be 25 in the Year 2000, Berkeley, 1983.

Books:

Leach, Jim, A Possible Cinema: The Films of Alain Tanner, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.
Dimitriu, Christian, Alain Tanner, Paris, 1985.
Detassis, Piera, Alain Tanner, Firenze, 1987.

Articles:

Jaeggi, B., in Cinema (Zurich), no. 3, 1976.
Variety (New York), 25 August 1976.
Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, 18 October 1976.
Colpart, C., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), November 1976.
Image et Son (Paris), November 1976.
Haskell, Molly, in Village Voice (New York), 1 November 1976.
Le Pavec, J. P., in Cinéma (Paris), December 1976.
Rubenstein, L., "Keeping Hope for Radical Change Alive," in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1976–77.
Stam, Robert, "Jonah Who Will Be 25 in the Year 2000: The Subversive Charm of Alain Tanner," in Jump Cut (Chicago), no. 15, 1977.
Greene, L., "Jonah: Subversive Charm Indeed!," in Jump Cut (Chicago), no. 15, 1977.
Positif (Paris), January 1977.

Daney, Serge, "Les Huit 'Inside Ma,'" in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January–February 1977.
Heinic, N., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January–February 1977.
Tarantino, M., in Take One (Montreal), March 1977.
Gitlin, T., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1977.
Séquences (Montreal), July 1977.
Brossard, J. P., "Dialektisches Spiel mit den Ausdrucksformen," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), December 1977.
Dawson, Jan, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1978.
Listener (London), 23 February 1978.
Pulleine, Tim, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1978.
Tanner, Alain, in Ecran (Paris), 15 January 1979.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1979.
Harrild, A. E., in Film Directions (Belfast), no. 11, 1980.
Cineforum (Bergamo), January–February 1980.
Prono, F., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), February 1980.
Horton, A., "Alain Tanner's Jonah: Echoes of Renoir's M. Lange," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Spring 1980.
Toubiana, Serge, "20 ans, Jonasp," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 320, February 1981.
Tarantino, M., "Going inside with Tanner," in Movietone News (Seattle), March 1981.
Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1985.
Short review, in Listener, vol. 118, no. 3025, 20 August 1987.
Andrew, D., "Revolution and the Ordinary: Renoir's La Marseillaise," in Yale Journal of Criticism, vol. 4, no. 1, 1990.
Andrew, D., "L'identité a jamais perdue du cinéma français," in CinémAction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), no. 66, February 1993.

* * *

Jonah Who Will Be 25 in the Year 2000 is both a succinct commentary on the disillusionment experienced by the "generation of 1968" and a utopian series of vignettes that looks forward to a more egalitarian future. Jonah is Tanner's most successful collaboration with his frequent scenarist, the Marxist art critic John Berger, and this film follows the great promise shown by the two earlier Berger-Tanner collaborations, La salamandre and The Middle of the World.

All of Tanner's films can be viewed as critiques of the intellectual aridity of Swiss society, and Jonah is his buoyant rejoinder to the complacency of the Swiss bourgeoisie. Jonah celebrates the communitarian idealism of eight disparate individuals at a moment of alleged historical "stasis." Yet the vitality of Tanner's protagonists helps to vitiate standard Time magazine clichés concerning the essentially "ephemeral" radical politics of the 1960s. For example, Max (all of the protagonists' names begin with prefix "Ma"), the disillusioned ex-Trotskyist, and his mystically inclined girlfriend, Madeleine, would seem to represent antithetical extremes of the counter-cultural spectrum. Yet Tanner's qualified optimism enables the politicized (if temporarily sidetracked) Max and the occultish Madeleine to share the same universe of discourse.

As Robert Stam has pointed out, Jonah's emphasis on the need for a radical pedagogy to replace the outmoded strictures of bourgeois discourse has deep affinities with the anarchic spirit of negation embedded in Jean Vigo's classic Zéro de conduite. The spirit of Rousseau's Emile (despite its inherent contradictions, perhaps the first primer of libertarian approaches to education) permeates Jonah, and critical potential that is always latent (but rarely appropriated) in the educational process is highlighted in one of the film's most brilliant sequences. Marco, a charmingly gauche high school teacher, demonstrates how the hallowed "truths" of history tend to dissolve when compared to the indisputably tangible, material folds of a sausage link. Subsequently, Marco teaches his class the harsh realities of economic hardship by having his girlfriend lecture on the daily annoyances of her job as a supermarket cashier. This synthesis of the personal and political is (surprisingly) never cloying, and always reiterates with pointed humor Tanner's desire for social transformation.

Jonah qui aura 25 ans en l'an 2000

Jonah is ultimately one of the most astonishing examples of "Brechtian cinema" to have been engendered by the ongoing reexamination of the late playwright's theoretical corpus. Unlike many other contemporary directors, Tanner realizes that "Brechtian" does not necessarily connote humorless diatribes in the manner of "the master's" most sterile, didactic works. (The dreadful The Measures Taken comes to mind in this context.) Miou-Miou's spontaneous cabaret song, on the other hand, suggests the exuberance of Brecht and Weill, and Tanner's playful, and always unobtrusive, use of quotations from such contemporary savants as Pablo Neruda, Jean Piaget, and Walter Benjamin helps to make Jonah a particularly exhilarating example of 1970s Lehrstücke.

—Richard Porton

LE JOUR SE LÈVE

---

(Daybreak)

France, 1939

Director: Marcel Carné

Production: VOG Sigma (Paris); black and white, 35mm; running time: 85 minutes; length 7995 feet. Released 1939. Filmed in Paris Studios Cinema, Billancourt.

Producer: Brachet; screenplay: Jacques Viot; adaptation and dialogue: Jacques Prévert; photography: Curt Courant, Philippe Agostini, and André Bac; editor: René le Henaff; sound recordist: Arman Petitjean; production designer: Alexandre Trauner; music: Maurice Jaubert; costume designer: Boris Bilinsky.

Cast: Jean Gabin (François); Jacqueline Laurent (Françoise); Arletty (Clara); René Génin (Conciergerie); Mady Berry (Conciergerie's wife); Jules Berry (M. Valentin); Marcel Pérè (Paulo); Jacques Baumer (Inspector); René Bergeron (Café proprietor); Gabrielle Fonton (Woman on the stairs); Arthur Devère (M. Gerbois); Georges Douking (Blind Man); Bernard Blier (Gaston).

Publications

Script:

Viot, Jacques, and Jacques Prévert, Le Jour se lève in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), October 1965; translated as Le jour se lève: A Film, New York, 1970.

Books:

Bernager, Jean-Louis, Marcel Carné, Paris, 1945.
 Queval, Jean, Marcel Carné, Paris, 1952.
 Perrin, Michel, Arletty, Paris, 1952.
 Landry, Bernard, Marcel Carné: Sa vie, ses films, Paris, 1952.
 Chazal, Robert, Marcel Carné, Paris, 1965.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, Prévert, du cinéma, Alger, 1952.
 Queval, Jean, Jacques Prévert, Paris, 1955.
 Jacob, Guy, Jacques Prévert, Lyons, 1960.
 Bergens, Andrée, Jacques Prévert, Paris, 1969.
 Armes, Roy, French Film, New York, 1970.
 Sadoul, Georges, French Film, New York, 1972.
 Gautéur, Claude, and André Bernard, Gabin; ou, Les Avatars d'un mythe, Paris, 1976.
 Missiaen, Jean-Claude, and Jacques Siclier, Jean Gabin, Paris, 1977.
 Betti, Jean-Michel, Salut, Gabin!, Paris, 1977.
 Ariotti, Philippe, and Philippe de Comes, Arletty, Paris, 1978.
 Ellis, Jack C., A History of Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.
 Thiher, Allen, The Cinematic Muse: Critical Studies in the History of French Cinema, Columbia, Missouri, 1979.
 Milhaud, Sylvie, Jean Gabin, Paris, 1981.
 Rachline, Michel, Jacques Prévert, Paris, 1981.
 Perez, Michel, Les Films de Carné, Paris, 1986.
 Brunelin, André, Gabin, Paris, 1987.
 Turk, Edward Baron, Child of Paradise: Marcel Carné and the Golden Age of French Cinema, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1989.
 Carné, Marcel, Ma vie à belles dents: mémoires, Paris, 1996.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 26 July 1940.
New York Times, 30 July 1940.
 Lodge, J. F., "The Cinema of Marcel Carné," in Sequence (London), 1946.
 Sadoul, Georges, and J. Boul, in Ecrans Français (Paris), 12 June 1946.
 Manvell, Roger, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1947.

Le jour se lève

Lambert, Gavin, "Marcel Carné," in Sequence (London), Spring 1948.
 Duvillars, Pierre, "Jean Gabin's Instinctive Man," in Films in Review (New York), March 1951.
 Sadoul, Georges, "Les Films de Marcel Carné: Expression de notre époque," in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 1 March 1956.
 Stanbrook, Alan, "The Carné Bubble," in Film (London), November-December 1959.
 Guillot, Gerard, "Les Visiteurs du soir," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1962.
 Nolan, Jack E., "Jean Gabin," in Films in Review (New York), April 1963.
 Cowie, Peter, "Jean Gabin," in Films and Filming (London), February 1964.
 "Prévert Issue" of Image et Son (Paris), December 1965.
 Helman, A., in Kino (Warsaw), August 1973.
 Quenin, F., in Téléciné (Paris), December 1976.
 Fieschi, J., in Cinématographe (Paris), January 1977.

* * *

Coming at the very end of a decade in which the French cinema reigned intellectually supreme, Le jour se lève was the culminating achievement of the school known as "poetic realism." Fifty years on, the realism looks uncommonly like romanticism, but there can be little doubt about the poetry. The film is suffused with a bittersweet fatalism, a soft, drifting melancholy that invests the drab settings of factory and tenement with its own sad romance. The characters, hero and villain alike, seem to move in a dream, progressing with stoic resignation towards their inescapable destiny. The parallel with prewar France, awaiting defeat with mesmerized passivity, has often been drawn, and is indeed hard to avoid.

The circularity of the film's structure mirrors its fatalistic mood—what will happen, must happen, for we have already seen it happen. In the opening seconds, a man is shot, reeling mortally wounded down the tenement stairs. As police arrive and a crowd gathers, the killer barricades himself in his attic room; and through the long night, smoking his last cigarettes, he recalls events that led him to kill. By way of a carefully structured series of flashbacks, we return full circle to the shooting, seeing it this time from inside the room. As dawn breaks, the police prepare an assault. A final shot is heard; a cloud of tear-gas creeps over a lifeless body in the early rays of the sun; and abruptly, the noise of the dead man's alarm-clock breaks the silence.

Gabin's performance, as the besieged killer, stands as the epitome of his prewar persona as doomed proletarian anti-hero, developed through Duvivier's Pépé le Moko, Renoir's Labête humaine, and his previous Carné film, Quai des brumes. Equally outstanding is Jules Berry's portrayal of his victim, the sadistic animal trainer so compulsively dedicated to destruction that he even brings about his own death in order to destroy others. Le jour se lève—like Quai des brumes and all Carné's other early films—was made in close collaboration with his scriptwriter, the poet Jacques Prévert, whose wit, love of language, and fatalistic poetry permeate the film to such a degree that his name should stand with the director's as co-creator.

Le jour se lève was banned under the Vichy regime, accused of having contributed to the debacle of 1940. (Carné responded that the barometer should hardly be blamed for the storm it foretells.) Widely shown and acclaimed after the war, it was then suppressed again in 1947, this time by RKO, to make way for Anatole Litvak's crass remake, The Long Night (with Henry Fonda in the Gabin role). Rumours that all prints had been destroyed proved mercifully unfounded. Carné's film resurfaced during the 1950s, and is now generally acknowledged, together with Les enfants du paradis, as the finest product of his partnership with Prévert. The film's pre-war despair has transmuted into nostalgic melancholy, closer now to Ophüls than to Renoir; its romantic appeal seems likely to survive undimmed.

—Philip Kemp

JOURNAL D'UN CURÉ DE CAMPAGNE

(Diary of a Country Priest)

France, 1950

Director: Robert Bresson

Production: Union Générale Cinématographique; black and white, 35mm; running time: 120 minutes. Released 1950.

Producer: Léon Carré; screenplay: Robert Bresson, from the novel by Georges Bernanos; photography: Léonce-Henry Burel; editor: Paulette Robert; production designer: Pierre Charbonnier; music: Jean Jacques Grüenwald.

Cast: Claude Laydu (Priest of Ambricourt); Nicole Ladmiral (Chantal); Nicole Maurey (Mademoiselle Louise); Marie-Monique Arkell (Countess); Armand Guibert (Priest of Torcy); Jean Riveyre (Count); Jean Danet (Olivier); Antoine Balpêtré (Doctor Delbende); Martine Lemaire (Séraphita); Yvette Etiévant (Young girl).

Awards: Prix Louis-Delluc, France, 1950; Venice Film Festival, Best Photography and International Prize, 1951.

Publications

Books:

The Films of Robert Bresson, New York, 1969.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: The Great Tradition, New York, 1970.

Cameron, Ian, The Films of Robert Bresson, London, 1970.

Schrader, Paul, Transcendental Style on Film: Ozu, Bresson, Dreyer, Los Angeles, 1972.

De Pontes Leca, C., Robert Bresson o cinematografo e o sinal, Lisbon, 1978.

Horton, Andrew, and Joan Magretta, editors, Modern European Filmmakers and the Art of Adaptation, New York, 1981.

Andrew, Dudley, Film in the Aura of Art, Princeton, 1984.

Arnaud, Philippe, Robert Bresson, Paris, 1986.

Hanlon, Lindley, Fragments: Bresson's Film Style, Rutherford, 1986.

Quandt, James, editor, Robert Bresson, Toronto, 1998.

Articles:

Douchet, Jean, "Bresson on Location: Interview," in Sequence (London), no. 13, 1951.

Lambert, Gavin, "Notes on Robert Bresson," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1953.

Gow, Gordon, "The Quest for Realism," in Films and Filming (London), December 1957.

Baxter, Brian, "Robert Bresson," in Film (London), September-October 1958.

Ford, Charles, "Robert Bresson," in Films in Review (New York), February 1959.

Green, Marjorie, "Robert Bresson," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1960.

Young, Colin, "Conventional/Unconventional," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1960.

Roud, Richard, "French Outsider with the Inside Look," in Films and Filming (London), April 1960.

Johnson, Ian, and Raymond Durnat, "Puritans Anonymous," in Motion (London), Autumn 1963.

Sontag, Susan, "Spiritual Style in the Films of Robert Bresson," in Seventh Art (New York), Summer 1964.

Milne, Tom, "The Two Chambermaids," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1964.

Godard, Jean-Luc, and Michel Delahaye, "The Question: Interview with Robert Bresson," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), May 1966.

Durnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), December 1966. Sarris, Andrew, "Robert Bresson," in Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.

Journal d'un curé de campagne

Skoller, Ronald S., "Praxis as a Cinematic Principle in the Films of Robert Bresson," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1969.

Armes, Roy, "The Art of Robert Bresson," in London Magazine, October 1970.

Zeman, Marvin, "The Suicide of Robert Bresson," in Cinema (London), Spring 1971.

Prokosch, M., "Bresson's Stylistics Revisited," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1971-72.

Samuels, Charles Thomas, "Robert Bresson," in Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.

Polhemusin, H. M., "Matter and Spirit in the Films of Robert Bresson," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1974.

Prédal, René, interview with Léonce-H. Burel, in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1974.

Nogueira, Rui, "Burel and Bresson," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1976-77.

Bazin, André, in Filmkritik (Munich), May 1979.

Estève, M., "Bresson et Bernanos," in Cinéma (Paris), June 1983.

Brisset, S., in Cinema89, no. 459, September 1989.

Lopate, Phillip, "Films as Spiritual Life," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1991.

Predal, R., in Avant Scène du Cinéma (Paris), January-February 1992.

Helman, Alicja, "Dziennik wiejskiego proboszcza Bressona," in Kino (Warsaw), vol. 47, no. 2-3, February-March 1993.

Lyons, Donald, "Priests," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, no. 3, May-June 1995.

Short review, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 465, October 1996.

Amengual, Barthélemy, "Les pouvoirs de l'abstraction," in Positif (Paris), no. 430, December 1996.

Muriac, F., "Egy falusi plebanos naploja," in Filmvilag (Budapest), vol. 40, no. 10, 1997.

Mazierska, Ewa, "Dziennik wiejskiego proboszcza," in Kino (Warsaw), vol. 32, no. 373, June 1998.

* * *

In the politics of adaptation, Robert Bresson's Diary of a Country Priest must stand out as a revolutionary event. Taking over the project of this novel after its author, Georges Bernanos, had repudiated the version offered by Aurenche and Bost, Bresson promised to get beyond the cinema in order to embody, or act out, the spiritual drama that was at its core. Initially supported by producer Pierre Gerin, Bresson found himself abandoned after Bernanos's death in 1948. Nevertheless, he obtained the rights, finished his austere and unconventional script, and appealed to Bernanos's literary executor, Albert Beguin. Not only did Beguin accept Bresson's project, but this influential editor of the journal Esprit also helped him secure financing through the recently established national production agency, Union Générale Cinématographique.

Bresson chose for his hero a young Swiss actor from among a great many candidates, all of them practicing Catholics. For over a year Bresson and Claude Laydu met each Sunday to discuss the role. Laydu went so far as to live for a time in a monastery to accustom himself to priestly garb and gestures. Bresson insisted that he cease acting and become a "model," an instinctive presence to be sculpted by light and camera.

The French press covered the production and premiere of the film with pride. They helped guide it to a new audience, of intellectuals and of the pious, two groups that had never frequented the cinema. Cinephiles were encouraged to see the film twice. In this way Diary of a Country Priest opened up new options in the conception, realization, and exploitation of a film.

Using fidelity of adaptation as an issue, Bresson actually challenged the entire aesthetics of French cinema of quality. His film overturns received notions of "the primacy of the image" and of the "cinematic story," abandoning the theatrical, public and architectural ostentation of quality for a fluid, musical, interior, and ascetic expression. Bresson spoke of his work as an "écriture" (Sartre) demanding new notions of the actor, the shot, and the soundtrack. Most critics could barely digest the film, for as Bazin said, it is a film not so much to read as to directly feel. While one can analyse the subject "christologically" according to the Stations of the Cross (the curé's falls, the wiping of his face by Seraphita, his glorious motorcycle ride to the big city where he will die, that death occurring between two outcasts in a high attic room), Bresson's is the opposite of an allegorical film. He cut 45 minutes without hesitation because the true drama was internal and was present in the quality of each of its moments. The spirituality every critic feels emanating from the film is really an effect produced by the accumulation of details rather than by dramatic plotting. A spiritual rhythm invades the images through the repetition of scenes, gestures, sounds, lighting and decor. Dialogue, monologue, landscape shots, scenes of writing, intensely composed music and natural sounds orchestrate a meditation rather than a story.

The diary form itself becomes the true site of meditation. It is variously represented as written pages on the screen, as a voice which situates the actions we see, and as those actions themselves, when through fades, ellipses and the like we realize that what is represented is reflection upon an event, not the event itself. In the penultimate sequence at the cafe, all three diary forms are present simultaneously: we see him writing, hear him say "I must have dozed off for a while," and sense that doze through a slight reframing after a dissolve. In this key moment we realize that he is recording the very episode we are watching, layering reflection on reflection as he sums up his life just before it ends.

But the diary is also treated as one physical object among others. Bresson capitalizes on the cinema's indifferent attachment to the objects of the world by filming lamps, winebottles, furniture, and prayerbooks in closeup. Bazin always claimed that style is a pattern of selection. If this is so, then Bresson gets to the interior via these objects as they interact with the hands, feet, and eyes of characters in a landscape of barren trees, narrow roads and the interiors of cold houses the doors and windows of which are at once invitations and warnings.

The gray and spongy atmosphere that lights this world is transcended by the priest in his diary. Certain scenes let us sense this transcendence in their lighting. The dialogue with Chantal in the confessional is the greatest such scene, for Bresson allows us to witness the luminosity of two faces and two hands in a dark space where only voice and intention matter. Light is the metaphor of the curé's discourse as he passes dark nights and is drawn to the warmth of lamps in windows and to the promise of dawn. At times light is not even a clarifying medium but a substance surrounded by darkness.

The curé's homelessness is seldom pictured in a single image, but exists as a rhythm of entrances and exits in which the world seems distant from him. The diary shapes a life in transit, at home only with itself and its meditation. Diary of a Country Priest is a landmark in subjective cinema. No establishing shots put the priest in context. Characters accelerate away from him. Bresson refuses to situate him dramatically, sociologically, or theologically. We are locked within his point of reflection. The soundtrack alone reminds him and us of the wider world. The natural sounds of feet on cobblestones, of a motorcycle, of people whispering, or of a breeze blowing constitute the true atmosphere of a search for grace. Together with the voice of the diary and the finality of the musical score (the last time Bresson would lean on a score), these natural sounds present the whole of the curé's world in each moment of the film: its pastness, its responsiveness, its fidelity, its limitation of vision, its productive loneliness and suffering.

The stakes of this film are high. Like the curé, Bresson is banking on the power of humility and discipline. Instead of achieving a life, Bresson would achieve a film. He would do so by thwarting the cinema. Many believers, especially the young Cahiers critics Truffaut and Godard, have had to defend their faith against those outraged by a film emanating in fragments from an obscure and obsessive mind. Diary of a Country Priest remains a watershed film in the history of adaptations and in the politics of style.

—Dudley Andrew

JOURNEY OF HOPE

(Reise der Hoffnung; Umud'a yolculuk)

Switzerland/Turkey, 1990

Director: Xavier Koller

Production: Catpics AG/Condor features (Switzerland), Antea, Dewe, Cinerent, SRG, RTSI, Film Four International, and Eurimages; color; running time: 111 minutes. Released in Switzerland, August 1990, and in the United States, May 1991; distributed in the United States by Miramax Films. Languages: Turkish, Kurdish, and German.

Producer: Peter-Christian Fueter and Alf Sinniger; screenplay: Xavier Koller, Feride Çiçekoglu; photography: Elemér Ragályi;

Journey of Hope

editors: Daniel Gibal, Galip Iyitanir; art director: Kathrin Brunner; costumes: Grazia Colombini; original music: Manfred Eicher, with Jan Garbarek, Terje Rypdal, Arild Andersen, Egberto Gismonti.

Cast: Necmettin Çobanoğlu (Haydar Sener); Nur Sürer (Meryem); Emin Sivas (Mehmet Ali); Yaman Okay (Turkmen); Erdinc Akbas (Adama); Mathias Gnädinger (Truckdriver Ramser); Dietmar Schönherr (Massimo); and others.

Awards: Bronze Leopard, Locarno International Film Festival, 1990; Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film, 1991.

Publications

Articles:

Cado, Valerie, review in Studio (Paris), November 1991.
Neubourg, Monique, review in Première (Paris), November 1991.

Gentele, Jeannette, "Prisbelönat flyktningdrama," in Svenska Dagbladet (Sweden), 6 March 1992.

Rosenthal, A., "Journey of Hope: Reflections of a Documentary Screenwriter," in International Documentary (Los Angeles), vol. 16, March 1997.

* * *

Journey of Hope is the European answer to Nelson Pereira dos Santos's Vidas Secas (1963) and Gregory Nava's El Norte (1983), a story of weak and helpless people hopefully struggling to secure what they believe may be a better life. Based on a real story, it was one of the first widely seen feature films to tackle the problem of migrations from the peripheries of Europe to the rich Western societies, which have not by chance been described as "Fortress Europe." The hostile and unwelcoming treatment of underprivileged newcomers has since become one of the major topics in European art and politics. Numerous cinematic works that treat these problems came into being.

A Kurdish family, pressed by economic needs, leave their native village and travel to Europe, aiming to penetrate into Switzerland and begin a new life. Leaving is particularly painful for Meryem, the wife, who has to leave behind six of her seven children. Haydar, the father, agrees that they may take along one of their boys, Mehmet Ali. The presence of the boy, however, complicates their original transfer plan, and they have to struggle to get themselves to Italy and then Switzerland as clandestines under particularly difficult conditions. They are smuggled on board a ship in a cargo container, and later on end up stranded in the hostile Alps amidst a snowstorm. The family gets separated and loses their way; Myriam is injured but eventually makes her way to safety. Heydar, however, is lost and spends the freezing night desperately wandering in the snow and looking for help. By the time he is found in the morning, his little boy is gone.

Scripted by director Koller and with impressive performances from the lead actors, the film builds on the contrasts between the self-content affluence of the West and the grim poverty of Asia Minor. It exposes exploitative individuals like the profiteers involved in human trafficking on the Swiss border, but it does not find them at fault. It rather blames the social rules designed to safeguard the rich from the poor. Most of the individual Westerners whom the clandestines encounter—an Italian sailor, a Swiss truck driver, and a Turkish émigré-interpreter—are sympathetic to them, and try to help in their limited ways. Nonetheless, the system is hostile and merciless, and there is no chance for miracles. A picture postcard from Switzerland describing the country as “paradise” figures as a recurring motif in the film; when the protagonists finally reach the deceptive “paradise” it becomes clear that for the boy it has been a journey into heaven in the literal sense.

A number of remarkable cinematic works of the past have recorded the troublesome experiences of the economic migrations of the Turks. Before Journey of Hope, the denigrating struggles of penetrating into “Fortress Europe” have been treated in films by Turkish émigré directors such as Swedish-based Tunç Okan whose film The Bus (1977) featured illegal Turkish immigrants left on their own in Stockholm, who do not dare to leave the vehicle and venture into the unknown territory of the Western metropolis. The unsettling experiences of life in a foreign land have been further problematized by German-based Tevfik Baser in his films Forty Square Meters Germany (1986) and Farewell to False Paradise (1989), both exploring the adaptation difficulties of Turkish protagonists in Germany.

—Dina Iordanova

JOURNEY TO ITALY

See VIAGGIO IN ITALIA

JU DOU

China/Japan, 1990

Directors: Zhang Yimou, Yang Fengliang (some sources list Yang as Zhang’s collaborator)

Production: China Film Co-Production Corporation, China Film Export and Import Corporation, Tokuma Shoten Publishing Company Ltd., Tokuma Communications Company Ltd, Xi An Film

Ju Dou

Studio; color, 35mm.; Panavision; running time: 95 minutes. Released April 1991 in United States.

Producers: Zhang Wenzhe, Yasuyoshi Tokuma, Hu Jian; screenplay: Liu Heng, based on his novella; photography: Gu Changwei, Yang Lun; editor: Du Yuan; art directors: Cao Juiping, Cao, Xia Rujin; original music: Zhao Jipin; sound: Li Lanhua.

Cast: Gong Li (Ju Dou); Li Baotian (Yang Tianqing); Li Wei (Yang Jinshan); Zhang Yi (Yang Tianbai [infant]); Zheng Jian (Yang Tianbai [Youth]).

Award: Chicago Film Festival Golden Hugo Award, 1990.

Publications

Articles:

- Lochen, K., in Film & Kino (Oslo), no. 4, 1990.
- Stratton, David, in Variety (New York), 30 May 1990.
- Grosoli, F., in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), June 1990.
- Rabinovici, J., in Cinema 90 (Paris), June 1990.
- Jousse, T., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1990.
- Tessier, M., in Revue du Cinéma (Cretail Cedex, France), July/August 1990.
- Paranagua, P.A., in Positif (Paris), July/August 1990.

- James, Caryn, "On Oppression of Women in China," in New York Times, 22 September 1990.
- Lochen, K., in Film & Kino (Oslo), no. 3, 1991.
- Vos, J. M. de, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), January 1991.
- Kreps, K., in Box Office (Hollywood), January 1991.
- Derobert, E. and Y. Tobin, in Positif (Paris), February 1991.
- Bassan, R., in Revue du Cinéma (Cretail Cedex, France), 17 February 1991.
- Koetsenruijter, B., in Skrien (Amsterdam), February/March 1991.
- James, Caryn, "Adultery and Aftermath in a Chinese Village," in New York Times, 17 March 1991.
- Corliss, R., and J.A. Florcrus, "Tainted Love by the Dye Vat," in Time (New York), 18 March 1991.
- Hoberman, J., "Fine China," in Village Voice (New York), 19 March 1991.
- Orr, D., "Undertones," in New Statesman (London), 22 March 1991.
- Kempley, Rita, in Washington Post, 22 March 1991.
- Denby, David, "The Pursuit of Unhappiness," in New York, 25 March 1991.
- Rayns, Tony, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1991.
- Chua, R., "Homeland Movies," in Village Voice (New York), 2 April 1991.
- Ebert, Roger, in Chicago Sun-Times, 12 April 1991.
- Noh, D., in Film Journal (New York), April/May 1991.
- Worm, V., in Levende Billeder (Copenhagen), July 1991.
- Kissin, E.H., in Films in Review (New York), July/August 1991.
- Gansera, R., in EPD Film (Frankfurt), September 1991.
- Skram-Jensen, U., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Fall 1991.

* * *

Ju Dou may be viewed on two levels: as a folktale of innocence and evil, a simple and powerful work of cinematic art; and as a biting and controversial political allegory. Its success helped thrust its director, Zhang Yimou, into the international spotlight. Zhang, working in collaboration with Yang Fengliang, has made a haunting film about the manner in which peoples' lives are stifled when they are ruled by rigid custom, rather than human desire.

The setting is a small village somewhere in China during the 1920s. The three primary characters, each broadly drawn, are a heroine, hero, and villain. The latter is the most conventional: Yang Jinshan, a miserly, sadistic old man who owns a dye mill. Desperate to father a male heir, Jinshan already has purchased two wives, whom he has tortured to death when they failed to bear him a child. Ju Dou is his newest spouse, his latest possession. Because she has not immediately become pregnant, he is battering her. "I bought you, now obey me," he tells her. "When I buy an animal, I treat it as I wish. And you're no better than an animal."

Yang Tianqing is Jinshan's shy, repressed nephew. He was adopted by the old man after his parents died, and he is treated more like a slave than a relation. Each night, Tianqing silently listens to Ju Dou's screams and pleadings. He is not even introduced to her, and first sees Ju Dou while peeping at her through a hole in the wall as she removes her blouse. Inevitably, Ju Dou and Tianqing are drawn to each other—and Ju Dou becomes pregnant during their first sexual encounter. So Jinshan's own impotence is the explanation for Ju Dou's and her predecessors' inability to bear him children—and his tirades and beatings only add to his hypocrisy. Even more to the point, in feudal China, the only weapon that the poor and powerless Ju Dou and Tianqing can employ in rebellion against Jinshan is their sexual attraction.

By far the film's most intriguing character is Ju Dou, who is victimized because of her gender. While it would be unrealistic for her to openly oppose Jinshan, she defies him in a subtler—and more believable—manner. Within the boundaries of her situation, she proves to be remarkably bold and decisive. That she is able to gain a modicum of control over her life is extraordinary, given her plight. It is Ju Dou who initiates the relationship with Tianqing, and not the other way around; she is the aggressor, while he is passive. Essentially, Tianqing is weak-willed: an observer rather than participant, a peeping tom who never would defy his uncle on his own. He only resists at Ju Dou's prodding, and when overcome by his lusty urges.

After Jinshan is paralyzed from the waist down in an accident, Tianqing has the opportunity to kill him. But he does not. He and Ju Dou may now feel empowered—Ju Dou brazenly reveals to Jinshan the true identity of the father of her newborn son—but the old man has his revenge when the toddler mistakenly recognizes him as his parent. Finally, Ju Dou's and Tianqing's son grows into an angry, tyrannical devil, a pint-sized duplicate of Jinshan, with the boy manipulated by the old man into despising his real father.

And so the point is clear: in order to destroy evil, you must not allow it to fester. You must completely snuff it out. If you let it exist because you have the upper hand, it surely will regain its foothold and destroy you. Later on, after Jinshan accidentally drowns, Tianqing does not rejoice. Rather, he automatically assumes that Ju Dou murdered the old man. Tianqing insists on adhering to the customs that have made his life wretched, and have kept him from openly being with Ju Dou. "Killing one's husband cries out for punishment," he pronounces. "Didn't he deserve to die?" Ju Dou asks. In response, Tianqing slaps her. After the town's elders deem that Ju Dou can never remarry, and that Tianqing must move out of the mill, Ju Dou wants to leave the village. But Tianqing insists on staying—and prolonging his and Ju Dou's misery.

On one level, Ju Dou clearly is a condemnation of the oppressiveness of feudal China and the ancient customs and ancestral heritage that resulted in a patriarchal society. Yet the film also may be interpreted as a critique of modern, communist China. The villain of the piece is a belligerent, sexually impotent old man—and the film is the product of a nation that is ruled by old men who often are perceived as contentious. Ju Dou might be viewed as an allegory for the manner in which a small group of elderly Maoists oversee Chinese society; meanwhile, Ju Dou and Tianqing, as they fearfully cling to one another, are representative of the beaten-down masses; and their cold, uncomprehending son symbolizes the Red Guard. The dye factory setting is not at all arbitrary. The bright pigments—and especially the reds—that dominate the coloring process are reflective of Ju Dou's and Tianqing's passion. However, unlike the colored sheets, which shine brightly in the sun, their emotions must be repressed, must remain clandestine.

Unsurprisingly, Ju Dou—which was partially produced with Japanese financial backing—was banned in China. Its controversy was sparked by the allegorical nature of the story, and the depiction of characters whose needs, desires, and individuality take precedence over their relation to a group. Additionally, the sexuality portrayed, while tame by Western standards, is brazen for a Chinese film.

Ju Dou could not be completely repressed. First, it was a hit on the international film festival circuit. Then it became the initial Chinese feature ever to win a Best Foreign Film Academy Award nomination.

—Rob Edelman

JUD SÜSS

Germany, 1940

Director: Harlan Veit

Production: Terra Film; black and white; running time: 85 minutes. Filmed in Berlin and Prague, March-August 1940.

Screenplay: Veit Harlan, Eberhard Wolfgang Möller, Veit Harlan, and Ludwig Metzger, from the novel by Lion Feuchtwanger; photography: Bruno Mondy; music: Wolfgang Zeller.

Cast: Ferdinand Marian (Süss); Werner Krauss (Rabbi Loew, secretary Levy, and other unidentified characters); Heinrich George (Duke of Württemberg); Kristina Söderbaum (Raped girl); Eugene Klöpfer (Raped girl's father); Hilde von Stolz; Malte Jäger; Albert Florath; Theodor Loos; and Wolfgang Staudte.

Publications

Script:

Knihl, Friedrich, and others, Jud Süß: Filmprotokoli, Programmheft und Einzelanalysen, Berlin 1983.

Books:

Feuchtwanger, Lion, Jud Süß, Munich, 1928.
 Wulf, Joseph, Theater und Film im Dritten Reich, Gütersloh, 1964.
 Harlan, Veit, Im Schatten Meiner Filme, Gütersloh, 1966.
 Eisner, Lotte H., The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, 1973.
 Hull, David Stewart, Film in the Third Reich, New York, 1973.
 Zielinski, Siegfried, Veit Harlan: Analysen und Materialien zur Auseinandersetzung mit einem Film-Regisseur des deutschen Faschismus, Frankfurt/Main, 1981.
 Fröhlich, Gustav, Waren das Zeiten: Mein Film-Heldenleben, Munich, 1983.
 Friedman, Régine Mihál, L'Image et son juif: le juif dans le cinéma nazi, Paris, 1983.
 Welch, David, Propaganda and the German Cinema, Oxford 1987.
 Gethmann, Daniel, Das Narvik-Projekt: Film und Krieg, Bonn, 1998.

Articles:

Tegel, S., "Veit Harlan and the Origins of Jud Süß 1938–1939: Opportunism in the Creation of Nazi Anti-Semitic Film Propaganda," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Basingstoke), vol. 16, no. 4, 1996.

* * *

Jud Süß is very loosely based on the historical personage of Josef Süß Oppenheimer who, in the early-18th century became a financial adviser to Duke Karl Alexander of Württemberg, with the authority to collect taxes; this, naturally, did not endear him to the Duke's subjects. When Karl Alexander suddenly died, Süß was put on trial and was hanged. The eventual transmogrification of the historical Süß, and of the several previous fictions based on his fate (Wilhelm Hauff, Lion Feuchtwanger) into the Jud Süß of the movie was mainly the work of the Nazi minister of propaganda himself, Dr. Josef Goebbels.

The idea for a film about Süß had been peddled in German studios by scriptwriter Ludwig Metzger since 1921, but it wasn't until Goebbels saw the British film-adaptation of Lion Feuchtwanger's novel Jud Süß (1934) that he realized the anti-semitic potential the material had, if interpreted not as a human tragedy (as in the British film), but as a tale of Jewish arrogance and infiltration. The story of how the director and the actors were selected for the film is a tragic farce of coercion, extortion, and eventual capitulation to the fear endemic to cruel dictatorships.

Pieced together from sources at my disposal, it seems obvious that almost all chief actors, and the director himself, tried—by various tricks—to escape the assignment. Goebbels either outwitted them, or knew about compromising circumstances in their lives and used this knowledge for bludgeoning them into acceptance. The reluctance to participate in this politically-most-correct film shows how aware most German artists were of the fact that anti-semitism under Hitler changed from prejudice to murder. They could have, of course, refused but saying "no" required extraordinary courage: the dire consequences of such an act of defiance were only too easy to imagine.

One of the paradoxes of this sinister film is how many participants in the violently racist project had either Jewish spouses or relatives, were disciples of Jewish artists and known friends or Jews, or had been—before the Nazi takeover—left-leaning intellectuals, even communists (such as Heinrich George, who eventually died in a Soviet concentration camp). Thus the director Veit Harlan's first wife was Jewish, he himself had been an admirer of Max Reinhardt and Stanislavski, and, earlier in life, flirted with socialism. Werner Krauss's daughter-in-law was Jewish, and Ferdinand Marian, who played the title role, had a half-Jewish daughter from his first marriage. His second wife had been married to a Jew, whom Marian hid in his house. Another actor, Hans Meyer-Hanno, reportedly a communist, acted in Nazi films apparently to protect his Jewish wife, the pianist Irene Saager.

Harlan, who obviously did not mind making films with heavy infusions of Nazi ideology (Der Herrscher, 1937, and many films made after Jud Süß), tried very hard to avoid this particular assignment. At first he raised objections to the artistic quality of the script; when this didn't work he even volunteered for frontline military service. Goebbels proclaimed the making of Jud Süß a wartime duty and thus turned possible refusals into acts of desertion. Harlan's Swedish wife, Kristina Söderbaum, the leading lady of the film, who had just had a baby, attempted to use breast-feeding as an excuse; but a wet nurse was hired. Moreover, Harlan was permitted to stop all work in the studio whenever the baby became hungry. Werner Krauss tried another ruse: he knew that Goebbels disliked casting the same actor in two roles, and so he demanded that he play all the main Jewish characters arguing that the role of the rabbi was too small for an actor of his stature. Goebbels consented. Marian, on purpose, bungled his screen test but Goebbels saw through it, and all the actor could do was to get drunk, which he promptly did. After the war, Marian died in a car accident which most sources interpret as suicide. In any case, his widow committed suicide shortly after she had appeared as witness at Harlan's denazification hearings.

Jud Süß

Some, however (for instance, Emil Jannings), succeeded in tricking their way out of the role: Jannings maintained that he was too old for the part of the Jewish Casanova, and also too fat; and since there were already two corpulent leading men in the cast (George and Klöpfer) it would be like "an opera with three basses."

Coerced into taking the job, Harlan tried to direct his actors in such a way that they would not sink to the level of Stürmer-like anti-semitic caricatures. He also attempted to soften the impact of the repulsive rape scene by giving Süß as motivation, revenge for having been refused the girl's hand by her father rather than "Jewish lewdness." In the final scene of Süß's brutal execution Harlan wrote a defiant speech for Marian, who had biblical overtones, and condemned the German authorities. When Goebbels was shown a rough-cut copy, he flew into a rage and had the outspoken speech replaced with one in which the cowardly Jew begged for his life.

Thus, no matter how Harlan and his actors tried to dilute the vile message of the movie (Krauss, for instance, successfully argued against having to perform with an artificial crooked "Jewish" nose because it limited the movement of facial muscles), the outcome, in the historical context of anti-Jewish hysteria, was a film which substantially exacerbated anti-semitic feeling. For the purpose of ideology it introduced into Süß's story fictional characters (the raped "Aryan" girl; her husband exposed to torture on Süß's orders), and distorted the historical personage of Süß Oppenheimer to conform to the racist image of the Jew as poisoner of society.

The resulting film is a mediocre melodrama at best. Harlan's direction is, mildly speaking, uninspired. Most of the acting is bombastic, except for, on occasion, that of Krauss and Marian, whose portrayal of Jewish characters can, perhaps, be traced to Vachtangov's documentary about the Moscow Jewish theatre which, for study purposes, was screened for the cast. The camera work is a far cry from the lively photography of the best German films of the silent era. All in all, the film is not only repugnant but uninteresting as cinema.

After the Nazis came to power some of Germany's best artists, unable to compromise their artistic integrity, left the country (Fritz Lang, Marlene Dietrich, Conrad Veidt, Peter Lorre, among others). Harlan opted to compromise. The result was a number of films which are memorable only as examples of how deep art can sink if it—voluntarily or not—serves ideological lies.

—Josef Škvorecký

JUDAS WAS A WOMAN

See LA BÊTE HUMAINE

JUDEX

France, 1916

Director: Louis Feuillade

Production: Film Gaumont, Paris; serial in 12 episodes: 1. L'ombre mystérieuse; 2. L'erpiation; 3. La meute fantastique; 4. La secret de la tombe; 5. Le moulin tragique; 6. Le même reglisse; 7. La femme en noir; 8. Les souterrains du chateau rouge; 9. Lorsque l'enfant parut; 10. Le coeur de Jacqueline; 11. Ondine; 12. Le pardon d'amour. Length: between 427 and 1262 meters per episode. Released together, 16 December 1916.

Screenplay: Arthur Bernède and Louis Feuillade; photography: Klausse and A. Glattli.

Cast: René Cresté (Judex); Musidora (Diana Monti, Mlle. Verdier); Yvette Andreyor (Jacqueline); Marcel Levesque (Cocantín); Bout-de-Zan (Le Môme reglisse); Louis Leubas (Favraux); Edouard Mathé (Roger de Trémeuse); Georges Flateau (Vicomte de la Rochefontaine); Gaston Michel (Le vieux Kerjan); Jean Devadle (Morales); Yvonne Dario (Comtesse de la Trémeuse); Olinda Mano (Le Petit Jean); Juliette Clarens (Gisèle).

Publications

Books:

Delluc, Louis, Cinéma et compagnie, Paris, 1919.
Védres, Nicole, Images du cinéma français, Paris, 1945.

Lacassin, Francis, Louis Feuillade, Paris, 1964.
Anthologie du cinéma 2, Paris, 1967.
Armes, Roy, French Film, New York, 1970.
Barsacq, Léon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.

Articles:

Bioscope (London), 26 July, 2 August and 23 August 1917.
Beylie, Claude, "Louis Feuillade," in Ecran de France (Paris), 15 May 1959.
Cinéma (Paris), no. 84, 1964.
Lacassin, Francis, "Louis Feuillade," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1964–65.
Roud, Richard, "Maker of Melodrama," in Film Comment (New York), November–December 1976.
"Louis Feuillade," in Film Dope (London), September 1978.
Champreux, J., "Louis Feuillade, poète de la réalité," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 July 1981.
"Judex Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), April 1984.
Redi, Riccardo, in Bianco e Nero (Rome), January–March 1987.
Beylie, C., "Judex et Les vampires," in Cinema 91, no. 482, November 1991.
Masson, A., "Voilà le passage secret!" in Positif (Paris), January 1993.
"Feuillade and the French Serial," in Velvet Light Trap (Austin), no. 37, Spring 1996.
Callahan, Vicki, "Detailing the Impossible," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 9, no. 4, April 1999.

* * *

Unlike Feuillade's earlier Fantômas and Les vampires, Judex celebrates the exploits of a defender of the law and upholder of right and wrong rather than glorifying crime and ridiculing the police. Indeed, Feuillade himself described it as "a spectacle for all the family, exalting the most noble sentiments." Such a change of tack can no doubt be explained partly by the censorship problems faced by Les vampires, which the Ministry of the Interior found too "demoralising" for wartime, and in which certain spectators found rather disturbing echoes of the activities of the anarchist Bonnot gang, which had terrorised Paris in 1912.

The twelve episodes of Judex are among the peaks of the French serial, which has become somewhat eclipsed by its American counterpart. In France, the serial was a development of the prewar series film which had its roots in the popular literature of the time—indigenous and imported cheap paperbacks, and the serialised stories to be found in weekly magazines and parts of the daily press. Fantômas was one such series (running to five separate films), and others featured heroes such as Nick Winter, Zigomar, Onésime, Rocambole, and Bout-de-Zan (The Licorice Kid, who also crops up in Judex). At their height, the French serials proved a valuable counterweight to the flood of American imports and, to quote Feuillade again, showed that "French production is not definitively outclassed by the Americans and that we are not henceforward going to be reduced always to be following in others' footsteps."

Judex, the film's avenging hero, is in fact the Comte de Trémeuse, the son of a Corsican banker who killed himself after being ruined by a former friend, Favraux. Spurred on by his mother, he swears to wreak revenge for his father's death and, disguised in black cape and broad-brimmed hat, he sets out in pursuit of Favraux. Believing that he has killed him, he falls in love with Favraux's beautiful daughter, the young widow Jacqueline, only to discover that Favraux is still alive after all. Judex imprisons him in the dungeons of a ruined castle in which he has built a laboratory, but Favraux's evil schemes are by no means at an end.

Judex

No synopsis could adequately communicate the flavour and atmosphere of Judex, whose basic story is simply a pretext for a seemingly endless and remarkably inventive series of incidents and striking moments. Feuillade may have reversed the moral order of Les vampires, but both films inhabit the same mysterious universe, underlined by the reappearance of the great comic actor Marcel Levesque as the detective Cocontin and Musidora as the vamp-ish Diana Monti. Both, along with Bout-de-Zan, were very much part of Feuillade's stock company, and Musidora herself went on to direct a number of films. Even the titles of the episodes are evocative—for example, The Mysterious Shadow, The Fantastic Hounds, The Secret of the Tomb, The Tragic Mill—and although Feuillade was dismissed by critics of the time as beneath serious consideration it should come as no surprise to discover that he was feted by the Surrealists and also now tends to be regarded as one of the precursors of “poetic realism.”

What particularly attracted the Surrealists to his work was his sense of landscape and place, and in particular his entirely unforced co-mingling of the fantastic and the everyday. Like so many of the Surrealists' heroes, Feuillade had discovered the secret of revealing the surreal behind the real: by setting fantastic happenings in familiar, modern environments he succeeded in revealing the mysterious poetry of the urban and every day. Or as Breton and Aragon put it, in Feuillade's films “one discovers a real sense of our century.”

With his distinctive hat, and black cape tossed over one shoulder, Judex rapidly became something of an iconic figure. Just as the early series and serials had drawn on the printed word for inspiration, so the story of Judex was serialised in Le petit Parisien. Judex was followed in 1918 by La nouvelle mission de Judex, and was later re-made twice—the first time by Feuillade's son-in-law Maurice Champreux in 1933, and the second by Georges Franju in 1963, from a script co-written by Feuillade's grandson Jacques Champreux.

—Sylvia Paskin

JUJIRO

---

(Crossroads)

Japan, 1928

Director: Teinosuke Kinugasa

Production: Kinugasa Motion Pictures Association and Shochiku; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 80 minutes; length: 7 reels. Released 11 May 1928. Re-released 1976.

Producer: Teinosuke Kinugasa; screenplay: Teinosuke Kinugasa; photography: Kohei Sugiyama; art directors: Yozo Tomonari, some sources list Bonji Taira; lighting: Masao Uchida and Kinshi Tsuruta.

Cast: Junosuke Bando (Rikiya, the brother); Akiko Chihaya (Older sister); Yukiko Ogawa (O-une, woman of Yoshiwara); Ipppei Soma (Man with the Constable's stick); Yoshie Nakagawa (Woman who sells women); Misao Seki (Old landlord); Myoichiro Ozawa (Man who quarrels); Teruko Sanjo (Mistaken woman).

Publications

Books:

Shinobu Giuglaris, Marcel de, Le Cinéma Japonais, Paris, 1956.

Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, editors, The Japanese Film: Art and Industry, New York, 1960; revised edition, Princeton, New Jersey, 1982.

Cinémathèque Française, Invitation au Cinéma Japonais, Paris, 1963.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey One: The Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Articles:

Anderson, Joseph, "Seven from the Past," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1957.

McVay, Douglas, in Films and Filming (London), June 1960.

* * *

After the commercial disaster of the experimental Page of Madness (1926), Kinugasa's independent production company made its last film, Jujiro, in 1928. Thus freed somewhat from the pressure of maintaining the company's image (and solvency), everybody in the staff decided to explore whatever he wanted in the company's swan song. The result was this unique avant-garde jidaigeke (period film): Kinugasa completely eliminated from this film swordplay, which was then the norm, and concentrated on the depiction of the characters' psychology, thus creating a new style in this genre.

Visually, the film is one of astonishing effects and powerful images. Because of financial limitations, old boxes and wood used in the previous films were collected, painted and deliberately reused to create a bizarre atmosphere of poverty. The whole set design is based on unbalanced and distorted images, which happen to be similar to those of German Expressionism. Parallel lines are carefully avoided in the shapes of roofs, at the window lines and in the interior architecture.

The strong contrast of light and shadow is also expressionistic. Particularly skillful is the highlighting of characters' dramatic emotion by exploiting a heightened effect of counterlight. Raindrops are captured dripping from the hair of the doomed sister and brother, shining in the strong counterlight. The grotesque and nasty face of the man with the constable who is trying to make advances to the helpless sister is illuminated from behind in the dark as he ascends the stairs to the attic. The chiaroscuro photography, by then the young and ambitious Kohei Sugiyama, is exquisite.

The upstairs room is symbolically presented as the only sanctuary from the lower world of evil and malice. The tragedies of the sister and the brother both originate in credulous mistakes (she believes the false identity of the man with the constable; he believes that he committed a murder which in fact never took place). This theme is conveyed by the numerous scenes of fantasy and dream, as well as by the use of the flashback and flash-forward techniques. The boundary between reality and imagination is left ambiguous in mesmerizing effects created by camera movements, such as quick tracking shots, quick panning shots and numerous superimpositions.

An especially sophisticated sequence is the scene in which ashes are thrown in the brother's face dazzling him. Interrupting the fight sequence is a sequence of black- and white- designs, used to create a flickering effect: there then follows a close-up shot of the brother's agonized face within the image of a storm of falling ashes. This is followed by a shot of him staggering, frames with black- and white-lightning-like shapes, and then the shot of an object accelerating toward the camera. Finally, the camera tilts almost 90 degrees and captures the tottering brother crashing into objects. This complicated process of mixing the establishing shots and close-up shots of him staggering with images from his subjective point-of-view succeeds in conveying his despair and disorientation.

The recurrent spinning image is prevalent throughout the film. It is suggested by the image of targets at an archery shop that employs the hero's love interest. This shop is surrounded by other round and spinning images such as umbrellas and lanterns. The pattern of the woman's kimono suggests playfully those targets and arrows (relevant to the theme of stalking of a love partner). At the house of the brother and his sister, there is a big spinning wheel in the upstairs room; the downstairs is filled with round objects such as mats and straw hats.

The image of the crossroads is strikingly simple: only a few naked trees along the white roads in the dark. This set conveys artificiality, yet it also successfully suggests the helplessness and desperation of the sister finally waiting alone in vain for her brother.

Kinugasa's ambitious film was received far more appreciatively in Europe than in his home country. The re-release of Jujiro in Japan in 1976, however, created an excitement appropriate to the rediscovery of an avant-garde classic.

—Kyoko Hirano

Jujiro

JULES ET JIM

---

(Jules and Jim)

France, 1962

Director: François Truffaut

Production: Films du Carosse and SEDIF; 1962; black and white, 35mm, Franscope; running time: 105 minutes. Released 23 January 1962, Paris. Filmed 1963 Alsace, Paris, and Venice.

Producer: Marcel Berbert; screenplay: François Truffaut and Jean Gruault, from the novel by Henri-Pierre Roché; photography: Raoul Coutard; editor: Claudine Bouche; sound: Témoin; music: Georges Delerue, song “Le Tourbillon” by Bassiak; costume designer: Fred Capel.

Cast: Jeanne Moreau (Katherine); Oscar Werner (Jules); Henri Serre (Jim); Vanna Urbino (Gilberte); Boris Bassiak (Albert); Sabine Haudepin (Sabine); Marie Dubois (Thérèse); Jean-Louis Richard (1st Customer in café); Michel Varesano (2nd Customer in café); Pierre Fabre (Drunkard in the café); Danielle Bassiak (Albert’s friend); Bernard Largemains (Merlin); Elen Bober (Mathilde); Michel Subor (Narrator).

Publications

Script:

Truffaut, François, and Jean Gruault, Jules et Jim, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1962; as Jules and Jim, New York, 1968.

Books:

Graham, Peter, The New Wave, New York, 1968.

Petrie, Graham, The Cinema of François Truffaut, New York, 1970.

Crisp, C. G., and Michael Walker, François Truffaut, New York, 1971.
Boyum, Joy, and Adrienne Scott, Film as Film: Critical Responses to Film Art, Boston, 1971.

Crisp, C. G., François Truffaut, London, 1972.

Jules et Jim

Fanne, Dominique, L'Univers de François Truffaut, Paris, 1972.
 Allen, Don, Finally Truffaut, London, 1973; revised edition, 1985.
 Monaco, James, The New Wave, New York, 1976.
 Collet, Jean, Le Cinéma de François Truffaut, Paris, 1977.
 Insdorf, Annette, François Truffaut, Boston, 1978, 1989.
 Horton, Andrew, and Joan Magretta, Modern European Filmmakers and the Art of Adaptation, New York, 1981.
 Walz, Eugene P., François Truffaut: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1982.
 Winkler, Willi, Die Filme von François Truffaut, Munich, 1984.
 Bergala, Alain, and others, Le Roman de François Truffaut, Paris, 1985.
 Collet, Jean, François Truffaut, Paris, 1985.
 Truffaut, François, Truffaut par Truffaut, edited by Dominique Rabourdin, Paris, 1985.
 De Fornari, Oreste, I filme di François Truffaut, Rome, 1986.
 Dalmais, Hervé, Truffaut, Paris, 1987.
 Cahoreau, Gilles, François Truffaut: 1932–1984, Paris, 1989.
 Brunette, Peter, editor, Shoot the Piano Player: François Truffaut, Director, New Brunswick, 1993.
 Le Berre, Carole, François Truffaut, Paris, 1993.
 Truffaut, François, The Films in My Life, Cutchogue, 1994.

Holmes, Diana, and Robert Ingram, François Truffaut, Manchester, 1998.
 Labarthe, André S., La nouvelle vague: Claude Chabrol, Jean-Luc Godard, Jacques Rivette, Eric Rohmer, François Truffaut/textes et entretiens parus dans les Cahiers du cinéma, réunis par Antoine de Baecque et Charles Tesson, Paris, 1999.
 Jacob, Gilles, François Truffaut: Correspondence, 1945–1984, Lanham, 2000.

Articles:

Marcorelles, L., "Interview with François Truffaut," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1961–62.
 Truffaut, François, in Films and Filming (London), no. 10, 1962.
 "Conversation with François Truffaut," in New York Film Bulletin, no. 3, 1962.
 Delahaye, Michel, "Les Tourbillons élémentaires," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1962.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 3 May 1962.
 Baker, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), June 1962.
 Roud, Richard, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1962.

- Tyler, Parker, in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1962.
- Stanbrook, Alan, "The Stars They Couldn't Photograph," in Films and Filming (London), February 1963.
- Graham, Peter, "The Face of '62—France," in Films and Filming (London), May 1963.
- Greenspan, Roger, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1963.
- Shatnoff, Judith, "François Truffaut: The Anarchist Imagination," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1963.
- Klein, Michael, "The Literary Sophistication of François Truffaut," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1965.
- Solomon, Stanley, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1965–66.
- Rosenblatt, Daniel, in Film Society Review (New York), November 1968.
- Houston, Beverley, and Marsha Kinder, "Truffaut's Gorgeous Killers," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1973–74.
- Coffee, Barbara, "Art and Film in François Truffaut's Jules and Jim and Two English Girls," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1974.
- Mast, Gerald, "From 400 Blows to Small Change," in New Republic (New York), 2 April 1977.
- Thiher, A., "The Existential Play in Truffaut's Early Films," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1977.
- Davidson, D., "From Virgin to Dynamo: The 'Amoral Woman' in European Cinema," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1981.
- Marinero, F., in Casablanca (Madrid), May 1982.
- Carreno, J. M., in Casablanca (Madrid), February 1984.
- Norman, Barry, "Barry Norman on" in Radio Times (London), vol. 273, no. 3572, 13 June 1992.
- Murphy, K., "La belle dame sans merci," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1992.
- Stonehill, B., "Les auteurs terribles," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1992.
- Flitterman-Lewis, S., "Fascination, Friendship, and the 'Eternal Feminine' or the Discursive Production of (Cinematic) Desire," in French Review, vol. 66, no. 6, 1993.
- Garcin, J., "Jules et Jim: François Truffaut," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), Hors-série, 1993.
- Lucas, Tim, "The 400 Blows/Jules et Jim," in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 19, September-October 1993.
- Crowdus, Gary, "Truffaut on Laserdisc," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 3, 1994.
- Dalle Ore, F., "A Voice in the Dark: Feminine Figuration in Truffaut's Jules et Jim," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 22, no. 4, October 1994.
- Landrot, Marine, "La chambre ouverte," in Télérama (Paris), no. 2340, 16 November 1994.
- Andrew, Geoff, "Rum Truffaut," in Time Out (London), no. 1350, 3 July 1996.

* * *

Jules and Jim is among the masterpieces of the French New Wave and may be considered the high achievement of that movement. The first films of Truffaut, Godard, Chabrol & Co. had astonished the world with a vitality that seemed evanescent, while too many of the films after 1962 are generally thought to be decadent and cloying in their search for novel effects. But with Jules and Jim we have a film that is at once vital, astonishing, and mature. Its solidity as well as its richness have kept it from fading even under the intense light of scholarship and criticism to which it has been continually subject.

In some respects it is not a characteristic New Wave film, for it chronicles 30 years in the lives of its characters, opening brightly in La Belle Epoque and closing in the grim era of the Depression and the rise of Hitler. Whereas most New Wave films sought to express the rhythms of their own epoch with complete freshness, Truffaut in this film retreated to the past. But in its own way Jules and Jim is faithful to the existentialist ethic and aesthetic of the New Wave period, for no film strives more obviously for authenticity in its quest to tap the feelings of a liberated generation whose morality must be achieved on the run.

Oddly, it was through the intermediary of a 75-year-old sensibility, that of novelist Henri-Pierre Roché, that Truffaut was able to shape this past into a pure picture of his own generation. When he read the novel upon its publication in 1955, he immediately contacted Roché, initiating a correspondence that continued until the latter's death which occurred just before the film went into production. Of course in 1955 Truffaut was but a minor critic who could only dream of the film this novel might become. Nevertheless, even at that time he mentioned it as an example of the kind of living, breathing story he claimed was missing from the moribund "Cinema of Quality" which dominated the 1950s in France.

What was it that gave this novel its vigor, and how did Truffaut succeed in letting its spirit animate his film when at length he was able to make it? One must begin with the plethora of incidents spilling out of the novel's first pages. While Truffaut has drastically reduced their number and, more certainly, the number of characters he introduces, both works dizzy their audience. La Belle Epoque is carefree and exciting as lived through Jules and Jim. It becomes more dangerous and even more exciting once they attach themselves to Katherine.

The bubbling first third of the film is a textbook in photographic and editing effects (stop frame, swish pans, stock footage, jump cuts). Only the narrator who ties together these fragments hints wistfully at the trouble to come. The film makes its inevitable descent just as Katherine accepts Jules' marriage proposal. For his dream has been attained on the eve of the outbreak of the Great War, a war so graphically documented that it brutalizes the earlier sentiments of the film, tossing its characters off their merry-go-round where they land, still and stunned. This second movement shows the reality of living with Katherine, the dream they had so hectically pursued. Her fickleness makes them prisoners of their own desires, and their imaginations, still rich with inventiveness, are tethered to one who is neither beautiful nor intelligent but for whom they would surrender their lives because she is pure woman (spontaneous, tender, cruel). The conclusion is more sombre still, as each character achieves a compensating wisdom, a sense of self. Katherine is both fire and water, the vitriol she pours down the sink. She chooses water for death, cremation for burial. Jim is romantic, a dashing Parisian novelist who travels after the war in search of the 20th century. Comfortable with his shifting feelings, he runs from Gilberte to Katherine whenever she calls him. Finally there is Jules who treasures their lives to the full. A Buddhist in sensibility, he possesses Katherine through patience. An entomologist, he would write of the loves that insects aspire to. Nothing is too small for his attention. His resignation and nostalgia place him nearest the narrator, as he looks back at a time when life was full of freedom and promise.

If the film's plot is a progressive decline, its images set off these oppositions at every turn. The film's first enthusiasts pointed to the interplay of circles and triangles. The lovers directly illustrate the triangle they are living as they welcome the morning from three separate windows at the seashore. The sharp angular pans of the camera keep us wondering in which direction love must flow. But it is the spinning circularity of the cinemascope most viewers recall, a circularity repeated in the cafe tables, the tadpoles swimming round their bowl, in Katherine's cosmology which holds the world to be an inverted bowl. Bicycles are in circles; Sabine rolls over and over to the music which culminates in Katherine's prophetic song, her "Rondo of love."

These two master graphic forms come together, Roger Greenspun observed, in the hourglass measuring out the final days of La Belle Epoche and the preciousness of the briefest instants of life. Art is another such measure, and Jules and Jim is a catalogue of the arts. Scattered through its texture are references to old films, to photography and slideshows, to statues, paintings, novels, the theater, and music. This is a story about the drive to raise life to art and art to eternity. In the abundance of its episodes, symbols, citations, and tales, and in its mixture of excitement and resignation, Jules and Jim never lets up in its own drive to give meaning to and express the vitality of life. This was the ambition of the New Wave, and this film is its apotheosis.

—Dudley Andrew

K

KAAGAZ KE PHOOL

---

(Paper Flowers)

India, 1959

Director: Guru Dutt

Production: Guru Dutt Films Pvt. Ltd.; colour, 35mm; CinemaScope (first Indian CinemaScope production); running time: 150 minutes.

Producer: Guru Dutt; screenplay and dialogue: Abrar Alvi; photography: V. K. Murthy; editor: Y. G. Chauhan; art director: M. R. Achrekar; sound: S. V. Rama; music: S. D. Burman; songs: Kaifi Azmi; costumes: Bhanumati.

Cast: Baby Naaz (Pammy); Venna (Bina); Mahesh Kaul (Father-in-law); Waheeda Rehman (Shanti); Guru Dutt (Suresh Sinha); Johnny Walker (Bina's brother-in-law); Minoos Mumtaz; Pratima Devi; Niloufer; Sulochana; Sheila Vaz; Bikram Kapoor; Mehmood; Mohan Choti; Haroun; Munshi Munaqqa; V. Ratra; Tony Walker; Tun Tun.

Publications

Books:

Khopkar, Arun, Guru Dutt: A Three Act Tragedy, Marathi, n.d. Rangoonwala, Firoze, Guru Dutt 1925–1965: A Monograph, Poona, 1973.

Micciollo, Henri, Guru Dutt, Paris, 1978.

Burra, Rani, editor, Looking Back, 1896–1960, New Delhi, 1981.

Gandhy, Behroze, and Paul Willeman, Indian Cinema, London, 1982.

Banerjee, Shampa, Profiles: Five Film-makers from India: V. Shantaram, Raj Kapoor, Mrinal Sen, Guru Dutt, Ritwik Ghatak, New Delhi, 1985.

Kabir, Nasreen M., Guru Dutt: A Life in Cinema, New York, 1996, 1998.

Articles:

Padukone, Vasanthi, “My Son Gurudutt,” in Imprint, April 1979.

Blanchet, C., Cinéma (Paris), December 1984.

Bassan, R., “Une autopsie du monde du spectacle,” in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), December 1984.

Ostria, V., “L’ombre d’un Dutt,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1984.

Niogret, H., “Les moyens de l’emotion,” in Positif (Paris), January 1985.

Mishra, V., “Decentering History: Some Versions of Bombay Cinema,” in East-West Film Journal (Honolulu), vol. 6, no. 1, 1992.

Rajadhyaksha, Ashish, “The Epic Melodrama: Themes of Nationality in Indian Cinema,” in Journal of Arts and Ideas, nos. 25–26, 1993.

Khan, Pervaiz, Nasreen Munni Kabir, and Ashish Rajadhyaksha, “The Song Picture Man,” in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 4, no. 10, October 1994.

* * *

Guru Dutt’s tour de force, Kaagaz Ke Phool, is a tale of a movie director who reflects on his life. Unhappily married to Bina, mainly because her elitist, colonial family cannot reconcile themselves to his career in the degraded movie industry, Suresh Sinha falls in love with a young orphaned woman, Shanti. He makes her into a famous movie star, and gossip journals suggest a romantic liaison between the two. Sinha’s daughter Pammy, who believes that her parents can reconcile their differences if Shanti were to quit films, gets Shanti to promise to disappear from Sinha’s life. However, her disappearance only leads to a rapid decline in Sinha’s fortunes. Refusing to face Shanti in his impoverished condition, Sinha eventually dies sitting on the director’s chair in a gigantic, womb-like studio interior.

The plot is often seen as Dutt’s autobiography, and to some extent derives its astonishing power in the director/lead star’s extraordinary impersonation of the tragic hero, rejected as it were by fate itself—as suggested in the opening musical refrain (Waqt hai meharbaan) and repeated throughout the film. The persona continues from Dutt’s previous work, Pyaasa, where he plays a romantic poet exiled from the world and believed dead while his oppressors celebrate his greatness.

Such an idiom—of the romantic melodrama—was well established especially in the Hindi cinema when the film was made. Critics generally accept that the idiom, which I have elsewhere (1993) called the “epic melodrama,” emerged in the context of Indian nationalism, especially as the utopian dimension of the freedom struggle gave way to a coercive state, corruption, mass culture, and to the despair that Dutt, better than any other filmmaker, expresses in Pyaasa with his lines: “This land of castles, thrones and crowns/ . . . /Burn this land/ Blow it away/Remove it from my sight” (Yeh mehlon ki duniya). To a great extent Dutt, as actor, comes in line with the previous male stars reflecting this infantile Oedipal longing, with images built up over a body of work: Dilip Kumar (e.g. in Deedar, 1951, where he blinds himself), Raj Kapoor, the outcast of modern society. Kaagaz Ke Phool in fact refers directly to what is considered by some as the origin of this romantic stereotype: Devdas, a Saratchandra literary character filmed by P. C. Barua with K. L. Saigal in 1935, and then by Bimal Roy with Dilip Kumar in 1955. The fictional Suresh Sinha is in fact directing a Devdas version, and is desperately looking for an ideal Paro when he chances upon Shanti.

Kaagaz Ke Phool however, took that tradition of romantic melodrama onto a wholly new, and unprecedented plane, and to see how it did so, we need only to continue with the sequence of how Sinha discovers Shanti. He has been rejected by his wife and by his haughty father-in-law, and stands beneath a tree to shelter himself from the rain. Shanti, standing next to him and shivering in the cold, receives a gift of his overcoat, and later, arrives on his film set to return that coat. She intrudes onto Sinha's frame, and in an extraordinary follow-up, is seen in close-up in the director's editing room where he realizes that she is the star he is waiting for.

That sequence spins throughout the film a whole dimension of cinematic space, as shown by the two extraordinary and justly celebrated scenes of Sinha and Shanti standing apart in a cavernous studio, lit centrally by a straightforward metaphoric beam, as their disembodied spirits emerge and unite; and at the end when the director dies in that very space. It extends into one of the most sophisticated crane movements in what was India's first full CinemaScope film, constantly dramatizing the conflict between open and constricted spaces, spaces controlled by the director and spaces constraining him, spaces that he can enter and those from which he is excluded.

It also extends into the poet Kaifi Azmi's remarkable songs, set to music by Burman and picturized in an unprecedentedly new idiom by Dutt. The best known is of course the Waqt hai meharbaan which resurfaces, e.g. when the director, reduced to being an extra on a movie set, faces a giant stone eagle, and then escapes from Shanti even as nature generates a storm of protest all around him. The songs, especially, evoke something like a Sufi idiom, of the tragedy of unreachable, unattainable desire, and in the process also rescue the film from the sentimentalism that afflicts several other filmmakers working in the idiom of romantic melodrama—notably Kidar Sharma.

The film, it might be added, was a commercial failure when it was first released, prompting Dutt to not sign his future productions. Over the years it has, however, become something of a cult movie, notably for its songs and their picturization.

—Ashish Rajadhyaksha

DAS KABINETT DES DR. CALIGARI

(The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari)

Germany, 1920

Director: Robert Wiene

Production: Decla Filmgesellschaft (Berlin); black and white, 35mm, silent, originally tinted in green, brown, and steely-blue; length: 4682 feet. Released February 1920, Berlin. Filmed Winter 1919 in Decla studios; cost $18,000.

Producer: Erich Pommer; screenplay: Carl Mayer and Hans Janowitz, from an original story by Carl Mayer and Hans Janowitz; photography: Willy Hameister; production designers: Hermann Warm, Walter Reimann, and Walter Röhrig; costume designer: Walter Reimann.

Cast: Werner Krauss (Dr. Caligari); Conrad Veidt (Cesare); Friedrich Feher (Francis); Lil Dagover (Jane); Hans Heinz von Twardowski (Alan); Rudolf Lettinger (Dr. Olsen); Rudolph Klein-Rogge (Criminal).

Publications

Script:

Mayer, Carl, and Hans Janowitz, The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, edited by Robert Adkinson, New York, 1972; also included in Masterworks of the German Cinema, edited by Roger Manvell, London and New York, 1973.

Books:

Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Cinema, Princeton, 1947.

Wollenberg, Hans H., 50 Years of German Cinema, London, 1948.

Huaco, George A., The Sociology of Film Art, New York, 1965.

Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, 1969.

Manvell, Roger, and Heinrich Fraenkel, The German Cinema, New York, 1971.

Everson, William K., Classics of the Horror Film, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1974.

Laqueur, Walter, Weimar: A Cultural History 1918–1933, New York, 1974.

Prawer, S. S., Caligari's Children: The Film as Tale of Terror, New York, and Oxford, 1980.

Barton, John D., German Expressionist Film, Boston, 1982.

Brunner, Stephen Eric, and Douglas Kenner, Passion and Rebellion: The Expressionist Heritage, London, 1983.

Budd, Mike, editor, The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari: Texts, Contexts, Histories, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1990.

Hardt, Ursula, From Caligari to California: Eric Pommer's Life in the International Film Wars, New York, 1996.

Robinson, David, Das Cabinet des Dr. Caligari, London, 1998.

Jung, Uli, and Walter Schatzberg, Beyond Caligari: The Films of Robert Wiene, New York, 1999.

Articles:

New York Times, 4 April 1921.

Variety (New York), 8 April 1921.

Kracauer, Siegfried, in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), March-April 1947.

Melnitz, William, "Aspects of War and Revolution in the Theater and Film of the Weimar Republic," in Hollywood Quarterly, no.3, 1948–49.

Luft, Herbert, in Quarterly of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Summer 1954.

Das Kabinett des Dr. Caligari

- Pegge, C. Denis, "Caligari: Its Innovations in Editing," in Quarterly of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Winter 1956.
- Lightman, Herb A., "From Caligari to Caligari," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), July 1962.
- Whitford, Frank, "Expressionism in the Cinema," in Studio International (Lugano), January 1970.
- Helman, A., "Robert Wiene czyli pozory niefilmowosci," in Kino (Warsaw), April 1974.
- Clement, Catherine, "Les Charlatans et les hysteriques," in Communications (Paris), no.23, 1975.
- "Caligari et la critique," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1975.
- Carroll, Noël, "The Cabinet of Dr. Kracauer," in Millenium (New York), no. 2, Spring-Summer 1978.
- Budd, M., "Retrospective Narration in Film: Re-Reading The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), no.1, 1979.
- Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1979.
- Mazowa, M., "Sleepwalking Through Weimar," in Stills (London), Spring 1981.
- Budd, M., in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Winter 1981.
- Warm, Hermann, "Naissance de Caligari: Les Trois Lumières," in Cinématographe (Paris), February 1982.
- Simsolo, Noël, in Image et Son (Paris), October 1982.
- Cardullo, B., "Expressionism and the Real Cabinet of Dr. Caligari," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Winter 1982.
- Tomasulo, F., "Cabinet of Dr. Caligari: History/Psychoanalysis/Cinema," in On Film (Los Angeles), Summer 1983.
- Budd, Michael, "Authorship as a Commodity: The Art Cinema and The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol.6, no.1, 1984.
- Gout, C., in Skoop (Amsterdam), September-October 1984.
- Ahlander, L., "Filmhistoriskt nytt: Dr. Caligari och Queen Kelly," in Chaplin (Stockholm), 1985.
- Williams, D., "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari: The Remake," in Film Threat (Beverly Hills), no. 20, 1989.
- Weihsmann, H., "Die vierte dimension—architektur im film," in Blimp (Graz, Austria), Summer 1989.
- Schneider, I., "Deus ex animo, or Why a Doc?," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), no. 1, 1990.
- Cappabianca, A., "Cine/archeologia," in Filmcritica (Rome), November 1990.

Kuleshov, L., “Caligari, Mr. West, Aelita: Trois conceptions du film muet,” in Positif (Paris), January 1991.

Pratt, D. B., “Fit Food for Madhouse Inmates: The Box Office Reception of the German Invasion of 1921,” in Griffithiana (Gemona, Italy), October 1993.

* * *

The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari is usually identified as the first significant German Expressionist film, exemplifying the narrative and visual traits of that movement. The primary story concerns a series of murders which occur in a German town, coinciding with the arrival of Dr. Caligari who runs a side-show at the local fair. Alan and Francis, friends and rivals for the affection of the same woman, Jane, witness his show; there the somnambulist Cesare predicts the future, and forecasts Alan’s impending death. That night, Alan is murdered. Francis pursues the mysterious Caligari as Cesare kidnaps Jane. In the ensuing chase, Cesare collapses and dies. The investigation then leads to a local asylum from which Cesare has reportedly escaped. Dr. Caligari is discovered to be the director of the hospital, gone mad in his obsessive efforts to re-enact an 18th century showman’s murders-by-proxy. This story is presented as the narrative account of Francis. The film opens in a park; Francis sits with another man as Jane, in a trance-like state, walks by. To explain her condition, Francis recounts the bizarre events of the central story. At the end of the film, the scene returns to Francis, who is revealed to be an inmate at the asylum. His doctor is actually the Caligari figure from his tale. Upon hearing Francis’s ravings in the courtyard, the doctor declares that he now understands the case.

The history of the framing device is well known, and is discussed by Siegfried Kracauer in his study of post-World War I German cinema, From Caligari to Hitler. It was not a part of the initial script, by Carl Mayer and Hans Janowitz, but was presumably added by the producer Erich Pommer. According to Kracauer this framing contrivance served to contain the inherent horror of the original story. A study of authoritative madness and abusive power was recast as the delusion of an insane narrator; the evil doctor was re-defined as a benign, ministering figure who can cure the lunatic. At the same time Kracauer sees the final film as a powerful expression of the inherent tensions of the collective German psyche of the period—the fear that individual freedom will lead to rampant chaos which can only be constrained by submission to tyrannical authority. If the original script depicted the potential abuses of absolute authority, the framing scenes concede to this authority and suggest it may be beneficial.

But the narrative significance of the film is not necessarily an either/or proposition as Kracauer suggests. The film does start by presenting Francis as a credible narrator. His reliability as a source is only called into question in the final scenes. In this sense the film is more equivocal and expresses a more disturbed sensibility than even Kracauer allows. Indeed, the film simultaneously presents at least two viewpoints on the depicted events: 1) Francis is in fact mad and his story totally or partially delusional; 2) Francis is a reliable source, a position assumed through most of the film. From this second perspective the director of the asylum might be considered a psychotic tyrant whose power extends to include Francis’ confinement. One is not, however, led directly to this conclusion. Rather, this version of the narrative causes a disruption of any stable or conclusive perception of character status and narrational authority within the film. This in turn opens the film to a range of possible readings. The film has been seen, for example, in terms of a female fantasy, focusing on Jane as the enigmatic source of the narrative.

In other words, the film is structured in such a way that it represents contradictory ways of understanding the central sequence of events. This is supported by the consistency of the film’s mise-en-scène. The artificiality and stylized exaggeration of acting, decor, and lighting are maintained throughout the film. There are no visual cues to indicate that the world of the framed tale of past events is different from the framing scenes in the asylum. The film’s visual style is crucial to its exemplary status within the context of the German Expressionist film movement. In The Haunted Screen Lotte Eisner explains that the overall design scheme of the film creates a pervasive feeling of anxiety and terror. It is characterized by extreme contrasts in light and dark, distorted angles, exaggerated perspective and scalar relations within the decor, and painted backdrops and shadows. The basic tone of the decor extends to costume and make-up.

These qualities came to be known as the defining stylistic trait of German Expressionist film. Some critics have argued that German film producers consciously adopted this “arty” style to differentiate German film from other national cinemas (notably American) in order to compete in the international film market. Others have stressed the fact that this movement expresses the troubled state of the German national psyche after the war, or represents a retreat to Romantic despair. In addition, the film’s artificiality and subversion of realistic codes of representation have led to discussion of the film as an early example of self-reflexivity and deconstructive processes in the cinema.

The film’s equivocal narrative and visual stylization combine to create a disturbing fictional world. Moreover, its position in German cinema, and in German history, makes it a compelling case for examining relations between films and their social context. In these terms The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari provides a wealth of material to be mined by film critics and historians.

—M.B. White

KAMERADSCHAFT

(Comradeship)

France-Germany, 1931

Director: G. W. Pabst

Production: Nero-Film (Berlin) and Gaumont-Franco (Paris), the collaboration of these two companies frequently referred to as Nero-Film AG; black and white, 35mm; running time: 85 minutes, French version is 93 minutes, length: 3060 feet (German version). Released 1931.

Producer: Seymour Nebenzel; screenplay: Ladislaus (Laszlo) Vajda, Karl Otten, Peter Martin Lampel and Fritz Eckardt, from a story by

Kameradschaft

Karl Otten; photography: Fritz Arno Wagner and Robert Baberski; editor: Hans Oser; sound recordist: A. Jansen; production designers: Ernö Metzner and Karl Vollbrecht; French advisor: Robert Beaudoin.

Cast: Alexander Granach (Kaspar); Fritz Kampers (Wilderer); Daniel Mendaille (Pierre); Ernst Busch (Kaplan); Elisabeth Wendt (Françoise); Gustav Püttjer (Jean); Oskar Höcker (Emile); Hélène Manson (Albert's wife); Andrée Ducret (Françoise); Alex Bernard (Grandfather); Pierre Louis (George).

Publications

Script:

Otten, Karl, and others, Kameradschaft, in Le Cinema réaliste allemande, edited by Raymond Borde, Lyons, 1963.

Books:

Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1947.

Joseph, Rudolph, editor, Der Regisseur: G. W. Pabst, Munich, 1963.
Buache, Freddy, G. W. Pabst, Lyons, 1965.

Amengual, Barthélemy, Georg Wilhelm Pabst, Paris, 1966.
Aubry, Yves, and Jacques Pélat, "G. W. Pabst," in Anthologie du Cinéma 4, Paris, 1968.
Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, 1969.
Manvell, Roger, and Heinrich Fraenkel, The German Cinema, New York, 1971.
Atwell, Lee, G.W. Pabst, Boston, 1977.
Barth, Hermann, Psychagogische Strategien des Filmischen Diskurses in G. W. Pabst's Kameradschaft, Munich, 1990.

Articles:

Metzner, Ernö, in Close Up (London), March 1932.
New Statesman and Nation (London), 5 March 1932.
Spectator (London), 12 March 1932.
New York Times, 9 November 1932.
Variety (New York), 15 November 1932.
Potamkin, Harry A., "Pabst and the Social Film," in Hound and Horn (New York), January-March 1933.
Manvell, Roger, in Sight and Sound (London), November 1950.
"Pabst Issue" of Filmkunst (Vienna), no. 18, 1955.
"Pabst Issue" of Cinemages (New York), May 1955.
Image et Son (Paris), November 1960.
Cineforum (Bergamo), no. 14, 1962.
Luft, Herbert, "G. W. Pabst," in Films in Review (New York), February 1964.
Luft, Herbert, "G. W. Pabst," in Films and Filming (London), April 1967.
Pulleine, Tim, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1978.
Carroll, N., "Lang, Pabst, and Sound," in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Fall 1978.
Filmkunst (Vienna), no. 86, 1980.
Cinématographe (Paris), February 1981.
Sauvaget, D., in Image et Son (Paris), March 1981.
"Kameradschaft oder Neoverismo anno 1931," in Filmkunst (Vienna), no. 124, 1990.

* * *

Kameradschaft is a noble film—in theme and execution. It reflects the proletarian idealism of its time. It smacks of Toller and Rolland, and like them it has at the back of its mind a shadow of doubt. In 1931 in Germany events were moving slowly to the rise of Hitler, which all the good will in the world could not stop, and the film does in fact end on an ironic note.

The action turns on a single event. On the borders of France and Germany a vein of coal cuts through the frontier. Above ground a frontier post separates two communities; in the mine a brick wall separates the German and French workers. From the very first shots of boys quarrelling over a game of marbles to those of three German workers who decide to spend a Saturday night in a French dance hall, the director G. W. Pabst sets the mood of the film. Action is sparked off when an explosion in the French mine is reported to the German miners as they stand naked in the great shower room with their clothes raised above the sprinklers by chains. Ernst Busch, their spokesman, decides to lead a rescue party which ultimately breaks through the frontier barrier and arrives at the gates of the French mine to the astonishment of the waiting and despairing relatives. “Les Allemands. Ce n’est pas possible.” The rest of the film is concerned with the rescue.

Pabst has stamped the exterior and interior of the mine with uncompromising realism. The people are the protagonists, and individual characters never leave the ambience which shapes them and to which they belong. With the brilliant cooperation of his designer, Ernö Metzner, Pabst has achieved a triumph of studio construction. Life in the mine and the terror of the disaster are translated into film terms that remain unforgettable. No music is used. The noises of the mine, the clanking of chains, metal rubbing against metal, the whirring sounds of lifts—all this brings the strange world of the miner vividly before the spectator. It is a shared and illuminated experience. Pabst’s great humanity shines through the film. Its technical virtuosity is no less. Wagner’s camera catches the light shining in darkness, follows the ravaged, terrified faces. It gives significance to darkness.

There is no plot as such. Human relations are hinted at. But the mine disaster leaves us in no doubt as to those relationships: Françoise and her lover; The old man and his grandson; The three German friends. All are people we know, and from the event Pabst creates a richly textured canvas of life and reality.

Faces haunt us. The hysterical miner, tap tapping a signal on metal pipe, who hears the guttural sounds of his German rescuer wearing a gasmask; he thinks he is back in the war and hurls himself on his rescuer. Anna dragging her child beside the lorry that carries her husband to the dangers of rescue work. The actors do not play in this film; they are embedded in it.

The technical problems of creating movement in a narrow space were superbly overcome, as were the problems of proportioning light in dark areas. But above all it is the great spirit of Pabst that is the real triumph of the film.

Sadly, as the miners celebrate their new found friendship—“Why must we cooperate only at times of disaster. Why not every day”—below ground the brick wall which was smashed to allow the German rescuers through is rebuilt with much official rubber-stamping and exchanging of documents. A new shadow was falling on the German people.

—Liam O’Leary

KANAL

(Canal)

Poland, 1957

Director: Andrzej Wajda

Production: Film Polski and ZAF; black and white, 35mm; running time: 95 minutes, some sources list 97 minutes; length: 8569 feet. Released April 1957. Filmed 1957 in Poland.

Producer: Stanisław Adler; screenplay: Jerzy Stefan Stawiński, from a short story by Jerzy Stawiński; photography: Jerzy Lipman; art directors: Roman Mann and Roman Wołznic; music: Jan Krenz, ocarina theme by Adam Pawlikowski.

Cast: Wieńczysław Gliński (Lt. Zadra); Tadeusz Janczar (Korab); Teresa Izewski (Stokrotka); Emil Karewicz (Madry); Władysław Sheybal (Composer); Tadeusz Gwiżdowski (Kula); Stanisław Mikulski (Slim); Teresa Berezowska (Halinka); Adam Pawlikowski (German officer).

Award: Cannes Film Festival, Special Prize, 1957.

Publications

Script:

Stawinski, Jerzy Stefan, Kanal, in Three Films by Andrzej Wajda, New York, 1973.

Books:

Rhode, Eric, Tower of Babel: Speculations on the Cinema, New York, 1967.

Geduld, Harry M., editor, Film Makers on Filmmaking, Bloomington, Indiana, 1967.

McArthur, Colin, editor, Andrzej Wajda: Polish Cinema, London, 1970.

Michatek, Boleslaw, The Cinema of Andrzej Wajda, London, 1973.

Stoil, Michael Jon, Cinema Beyond the Danube: The Camera and Politics, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1974.

Leihm, Mira, and Antonin Liehm, The Most Important Art: East European Film After 1945, Berkeley, 1977.

Douin, Jean-Luc, Wajda, Paris, 1981.

Paul, David W., editor, Politics, Art, and Commitment in the Eastern European Cinema, New York, 1983.

Wajda, Andrzej, Un Cinéma nommé désir, Paris, 1986.

Wajda, Andrzej, Wajda on Film: A Master’s Notes, Los Angeles, 1989.

Wajda, Andrzej, Double Vision: My Life in Film, New York, 1989.

Articles:

Wajda, Andrzej, “Destroying the Commonplace,” in Films and Filming (London), November 1961.

Higham, Charles, “Grasping the Nettle: The Films of Andrzej Wajda,” in Hudson Review (New York), Autumn 1965.

“Wajda Issue” of Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), no. 69–72, 1968.

Hauru, A., “Kanal—kirrottujen tie,” in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 2, 1979.

Holloway, Ronald, in Variety (New York), 5 September 1979.

“Wajda Issue” of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 January 1980.

“Andrzej Wajda,” in Village Voice (New York), 20 December 1981.

“Andrzej Wajda,” in Current Biography Yearbook, New York, 1982.

Kanal

Lewis, Clifford, and Carroll Britch, "Andrzej Wajda's War Trilogy: A Retrospective," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Spring 1986.

Bukoski, A., "Wajda's Kanal and Mrozek's Tango," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1992.

* * *

Kanal, Andrzej Wajda's second film, is based on a story by Jerzy Stefan Stawiński which appeared in the magazine Twórczość. The events of the story are drawn from the writer's personal experience. Stawiński had taken part in two battles for Warsaw, as an 18-year-old in 1939 and then in the Warsaw Uprising of 1944.

Wajda quite purposely renounced any possibility of producing an exhaustive chronicle of the Uprising or commemorative poem on the heroic insurgents. His approach to examining this event was different. From the outset he limited himself to the time in which the story itself is set. The Uprising lasted 63 days, and he followed his heroes from the fifty-seventh day, just a few days and nights before the Uprising was suppressed. Defeat is present in the film from the introductory commentary which presents the individual characters: "These are the main heroic tragedies. Watch them closely; these are the last hours of their lives." It is from this point of view that we see the unfolding story of one group of fighters who are no longer able to hold off the enemy and must retreat through underground sewers.

The film is structured in two parts which differ from one another in their use of cinematic techniques. The first part is documentary in nature. It acquaints the viewer with the heroes and briefly conveys something of their lot before the Uprising. The camera follows them through everyday situations: they prepare their food, shave, make love, and talk about their loved ones and about their past. The effects of the war are ever present as these apparently everyday moments occur amid the ruins of the city where not a single house has been left standing. The war itself intrudes only with occasional explosions and small-scale attacks. This relative quiet is expressed through long takes, tracking shots and the use of only a minimum of detail. The actual tragedy commences only after the group has withdrawn underground. There is also a change in the style of representation, which takes on an expressive eloquence; the lighting changes, there are more contrasts of light and dark, the camera focuses on the heroes in detail, the sequences of reality alternate with scenes that have symbolic meaning. A comparison of the two parts brings out the specific use of sound, light, and darkness.

Above ground in the film's beginning, the basic component of the soundtrack is the staccato of firearms, while underground the sound component is far richer—the distorted voices of the heroes, dissonant sounds which the viewer is often unable to identify, even a solitary harmonic note of an ocarina. Here, sound has the extra function of heightening the drama, for the underground odyssey must take place in absolute stillness so that the insurgents do not betray their positions to the Germans who are lurking above. Light and shadow play a similar role. The first part is depicted in light, non-contrasting shades of grey, while darkness and sharp flashes of light are assigned to the underground sequences. Traditionally, the light/sun is a symbol of hope. For Wajda, the symbol has the opposite meaning, for the fulfilment of longing for light would mean death for the heroes. Therefore, at the conclusion both symbolic meanings—light as good, darkness as threat—flow together and empty into tragedy; both extremes of the light spectrum bring the ineluctable ending.

Kanal had its Polish premiere in the spring of 1957, the same year it was introduced at the International Festival at Cannes, where it won a prize. Its reception abroad was decidedly positive, while its appearance in Poland stirred discussions that included both positive and negative views. The country still had a tragic reminder of the Uprising; people who had been direct participants in this tragedy of modern history were still living. Their attitude towards the film was sometimes too uncompromising; they wanted it to be a literal depiction of what they had experienced. However, Wajda could not make such a film. He emphasized his personal approach as a director by presenting the experiences of a specific group of people whom he divests of heroism but does not condemn, for they chose their fate freely and fought not for glory but against bondage and enslavement, and paid the highest price.

Kanal occupies a crucial position in the Polish cinema. It ushered in a series of films noted for their sober view of the myths engendered by the war and the Uprising. From this standpoint the film is similar in function to a declaration of policy.

—B. Urgošikova

KAOS

Italy, 1984

Directors: Paolo Taviani and Vittorio Taviani

Production: Filmte, for RAI Channel 1; Eastmancolor; running time: 187 minutes; length: 16,816 feet. Released 1984.

Producer: Giuliani G. De Negri; screenplay: Paolo Taviani, Vittorio Taviani, and Tonino Guerra, from Novelle per un anno by Luigi Pirandello; photography: Giuseppe Lanci; editor: Roberto Perpignani; sound recordist: Sandro Zanon; sound re-recordist: Fausto Ancillari; art director: Francesco Bronzi; costumes: Lina Nerli Taviani; music: Nicola Piovani.

Cast: L'Altro figlio (The Other Son): Margarita Lozano (spoken by Fiorella Mari) (Mother); Mali di luna (Moon Sickness): Claudio Bigagli (Bata); Enrica Maria Modugno (Sidora); Massimo Bonetti (Saro); Anna Malvica (Sidora's Mother); La giara (The Jar): Ciccio Ingrassia (Don Lollo); Franco Franchi (Zi' Diam); Requiem: Biagio Barone (Salvatore); Salvatore Rossi (Patriarch); Franco Scaldati (Father Sarso); Pasquale Spadola (Baron); Colloquio con la madre (Conversing with Mother): Omero Antonutti (Luigi Pirandello); Regina Bianchi (Mother).

Publications

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 12 September 1984.
 Coleman, John, in New Statesman (London), 5 October 1984.
 Robinson, David, in Times (London), 5 October 1984.
Bianco e Nero (Rome), October–December 1984.
 Rayns, Tony, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1984.
 Ranvaud, Don, "Taking the Centre Ground," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1984.
 Adair, Gilbert, "La tragedia dell'arte," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1984–85.
 Wahlstedt, T., in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 27, no. 3, 1985.
 Amiel, M., and J. Kermabon, in Cinéma (Paris), January 1985.
 Legrand, Gérard, in Positif (Paris), January 1985.
 Martin, Marcel, in Revue du Cinéma/Image et Son (Paris), January 1985.
 Philippon, A., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1985.
 Delmas, G., and A. Tournes, "Quand la terre est protagoniste: Kaos," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), January–February 1985.
 Orto, N., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), February 1985.
 Rinieri, D., in Cinématographe (Paris), February 1985.
 Schouten, R., in Skoop (Amsterdam), March–April 1985.
 Giguere, A., in Séquences (Montreal), April 1985.
 Maslin, Janet, in New York Times, 13 October 1985.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 18 February 1986.
 Denby, David, in New York, 24 February 1986.
 Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, 10 March 1986.
Listener (London), 27 October 1988.
 Andrew, Geoff, "Double Takes," in Time Out (London), no. 1082, 15 May 1991.
 Trémois, Claude-Marie, "Fiorile: Fantômes de la liberté," in Télérama (Paris), no. 2262, 19 May 1993.

* * *

While films are traditionally considered collaborative efforts, few have been so to the extent that two directors have purposefully initiated collaboration on the same film. Yet the Italian directors and scenarists Paolo and Vittorio Taviani, like their older English counterparts Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger, have uniquely created through their writing and directing duality some of the most innovative films of the last decade.

Kaos

Though the brothers began working as a team in the mid-1950s, their international fame was not well established until the release of Padre padrone in 1977. Night of the Shooting Stars (1983), coming after their reputations had grown, was also an international critical success.

Thus their 1984 film Kaos, loosely adapted by themselves and co-writer Tonino Guerra from short stories contained in Luigi Pirandello's Novelle per un anno, was chosen to close the 1985 New York Film Festival. Though it was not a resounding success and was not generally released in the U.S., some critics ranked it above the Taviani's previous works.

For Kaos, the Taviani utilized the infrequently seen compendium format, separate short films loosely tied together by a theme or locale. Kaos, a title taken from the Greek word for chaos, which formed the linguistic root of the name for an area near Pirandello's birthplace in Sicily, consists of four separate stories, a prologue, and an epilogue, each illustrating aspects of Sicilian life. These cinematic folk tales, though, like Pirandello's works, contain universal elements that transcend the superficial quaintness of the stories.

Of the four tales, "The Other Son," "Moon Sickness," "The Jar," and "Requiem," the story of a lonely wife and her husband who becomes insane during the full moon, is considered the best. The brief segment before "The Other Son" sets the somber pace of the film and introduces the signature of the flying crow which is seen throughout the other segments, threading them together. The epilogue completes the cycle with Pirandello himself (played by the Taviani favorite Omero Antonutti) conversing with his mother about a pleasant experience from her childhood.

Though each segment is filmed in the aesthetic starkness typical of the Taviani's work (which might appropriately be labelled "neo-neo Realism"), they are peppered with Pirandello's ironic fatalism: things are what they are, yet not as they seem; the lines between sanity and order and chaos and insanity cannot be distinctly drawn. His stories reflect characteristics of his region, but the psychological make-up of the characters and their sociological choices can be paralleled in any time or age.

The Taviani have taken the currents of the Pirandello stories, if not their exact content, and elaborated them in a simple, muted style, with lingering shots and recurring images. While some critics have occasionally found their style too heavy-handed, it blends perfectly with the simple, yet unsettling nature of Pirandello's works.

—Patricia King Hanson

LA KERMESSE HÉROÏQUE

(Carnival in Flanders)

France-Germany, 1935

Director: Jacques Feyder

Production: Film Sonores Tobis, distributed through Films Sonor; black and white, 35mm; running time: 115 minutes. French version released 3 December 1935, Paris; German version released 16 January 1936, Berlin. Filmed June-July and September 1935 in Tobis d'Épinay-sur-Seine studios (France).

Screenplay: Charles Spaak, adapted by Charles Spaak and Jacques Feyder, dialogue by Bernard Zimmer (French) and A. Rabenalt

La Kermesse héroïque

(German), from a story by Charles Spaak; photography: Harry Stradling, Louis Page, and André Thomas; editor: Jacques Brillouin; sound: Hermann Storr; art directors: Lazare Meerson, Alexandre Trauner, and Georges Wakhévitch; music: Louis Beydte; costume designers: Georges K. Benda and J. Muelle; artistic consultant: Charles Barrois; history consultant: M. Sterling of the Louvre; technical assistant: Marcel Carné.

Cast: French version: Louis Jouvet (Chaplain); Françoise Rosay (Cornelia, the Burgomaster's wife); Jean Murat (Duke of Olivares); André Alerme (Burgomaster); Lyne Clévers (Fishmonger's wife); Micheline Cheirel (Siska); Maryse Wendling (Baker's wife); Ginette Gaubert (Innkeeper's wife); Marguerite Ducouret (Brewer's wife); Bernard Lancret (Jean Breuchel); Alfred Adam (Butcher); Pierre Labry (Innkeeper); Arthur Devère (Fishmonger); Marcel Carpentier (Baker); Alexandre Darcy (Captain); Claude Sainval (Lieutenant); Delphin (Midget); German version: Wilhelm Holsboer (Chaplin); Françoise Rosay (Burgomaster's wife); Paul Hartmann (Duke); Will Dohm (Burgomaster); Charlott Daubert (Siska); Albert Lieven (Jean Breughel); Paul Westermeier (Butcher); Carsta Loegk (Fishmonger's wife); Trude Marlen (Innkeeper); Erika Helmke (Baker's wife); Hans Heninger (Fishmonger); Wilhelm Gombert (Innkeeper); Heintz Forster Ludwig (Baker); Werner Scharf (1st Spanish Lieutenant); Paul Wolka Walker (Midget).

Awards: Venice Film Festival, Best Direction, 1936; Le Grand Prix du Cinéma Français, 1936.

Publications

Script:

Spaak, Charles, and others, La Kermesse héroïque, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), May 1963.

Books:

Buzzi, Aldo, La kermesse eroica, Milan, 1945.

Feyder, Jacques, and Françoise Rosay, Le Cinéma, notre métier, Geneva, 1946.

Jacques Feyder, ou, le Cinéma concret, Brussels, 1949.

Bachy, Victor, "Jacques Feyder," in Anthologie du Cinéma 18, Paris, 1966.

Bachy, Victor, Jacques Feyder, artisan du cinéma, Louvain, 1968.

Régent, Roger, "Louis Jouvet," in Anthologie du cinéma 5, Paris, 1969.

Sadoul, Georges, French Film, New York, 1972.

Ford, Charles, Jacques Feyder, Paris, 1973.

Barsacq, Léon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.

Ellis, Jack, C., A History of Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.

Feyder; Zavattini; Trésors de cinémathèque, Perpignan, 1984.

Articles:

New York Times, 23 September 1936.

Variety (New York), 30 September 1936.

Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1936.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1936.
Motion Picture Herald (New York), 3 October 1936.
Today's Cinema, 15 October 1936.
 Greene, Graham, in Spectator (London), 30 October 1936.
 "Hommage a Jacques Feyder," in Ecran Français (Paris), 8 June 1948.
 "Feyder Issue" of Ciné-Club (Paris), 2 November 1948.
 Auriol, J.-G., and Mario Verdone, "L'Art du costume dans le film," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), Autumn 1949.
Today's Cinema, 31 December 1952.
 Sadoul, Georges, "Jouvet et le cinema," in Lettres Françaises
 (Paris), 25 August 1961.
Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), May 1963.
Skrien (Amsterdam), December 1977.
 Dossier on Jacques Feyder, in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), no. 40, Summer 1984.
 Bíró, G., in Filmkultura (Budapest), March 1985.
 Virmaux, Alain, "D'Alfred Machin à Jacques Feyder: Débuts du cinéma belge (années 1910–1930) (musée d'Orsay, mars-avril 1997)," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), no. 245, September-October
 1997.

* * *

Jacques Feyder had already made two sound films in France; his creative skills were by no means diminished by the new dimension. His successful collaboration with Charles Spaak was to further produce one of the wittiest, most colourful and amusing comedies to reach the screen, La kermesse héroïque. Taking as his subject the period of the great Renaissance of Flemish painting and the less happy era of Spanish domination, Feyder made a major contribution to "women's lib." The film satirizes political, religious, and moral pretentiousness, and the men come off second best when a strong-minded and realistic woman encounters a tricky diplomatic situation.

The little town of Boom's fussy Burgomaster and his officials cannot cope with the threat to their town when the news comes of the approach of the Spanish army under the command of a Duke. Cornelia, the Burgomaster's wife, has a plan. The Burgomaster will pretend to be dead, and she will receive the Duke and hope that in the sad circumstances he will be gentleman enough not to overstay his leave. The possibilities for comedy are wide open.

From this situation Feyder fashioned a film full of sly and subtle comment on human foibles, designed with lavish elegance, at all times a feast for the eye. Feyder, himself a Belgian, created a monument to the great visual artists of his country. The film was a crowning jewel in the great flowering of the French cinema of the 1930s. The designs of Lazare Meerson and the costumes of Benda come alive with the superb acting Feyder extracts from his players. The subtle and delicate humour, the gentle implications of the dialogue, are epitomized in the sly performance of Louis Jouvet as the Duke's chaplain. Needless to say, the Flemish ladies thoroughly enjoy the elegant manners of the Spaniards while their menfolk look helplessly on. There is a little sadness in the air as the Duke and his army leave. One feels life in the little town of Boom will never be the same again.

In making this film, of course Feyder trod on the toes of his fellow countrymen. The reaction was much like that of the Irish to The Playboy of the Western World and chauvinistic sensibilities were not easily smoothed. But the success of the film was universal, and Feyder was established as a great director.

Through an irony of history the significance of the film was soon to change. Belgium was, in fact, invaded by a less charming enemy than the Spanish Duke. Collaboration soon became a very ugly word indeed. But time was on Feyder's side, and today his masterpiece is secure in the annals of film history.

—Liam O'Leary

THE KID

USA, 1921

Director: Charles Chaplin

Production: Charles Chaplin Productions for First National; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 52 minutes; length: 6 reels, 5300 feet. Released 6 February 1921.

Producer: Charles Chaplin; screenplay: Charles Chaplin; photography: Rollie Totheroh.

Cast: Jackie Coogan (The Kid); Edna Purviance (The Woman); Carl Miller (The Man); Charles Chaplin (The Tramp); Tom Wilson (The Policeman); Chuck Reisner (The Bully); Thelbert Theustin (The Crook); Nellie Bly Baker (Slum Woman); Henry Bergman (Proprietor of lodging house); Lita Grey (Flirting angel).

Publications

Books:

- Tyler, Parker, Chaplin, Last of the Clowns, New York, 1947.
 Huff, Theodore, Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1951.
 Bessy, Maurice, and Robert Florey, Monsieur Chaplin; ou, Le Rire dans la nuit, Paris, 1952.
 Sadoul, Georges, Vie de Charlot, Paris, 1952.
 Leprohon, Pierre, Charlot, Paris, 1957; revised edition, 1970.
 Mitry, Jean, Charlot et la fabulation chaplinesque, Paris, 1957.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, Charles Chaplin, Paris, 1963.
 Chaplin, Charles, My Autobiography, London, 1964.
 McDonald, Gerald, and others, The Films of Charlie Chaplin, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1965.
 Martin, Marcel, Charlie Chaplin, Paris, 1966; third edition, 1983.
 McCaffrey, Donald, editor, Focus on Chaplin, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1971.
 Mitry, Jean, Tout Chaplin: Tous les films, par le texte, par le gag, et par l'image, Paris, 1972.
 Chaplin, Charles, My Life in Pictures, London, 1974.
 Manvell, Roger, Chaplin, Boston, 1974.
 Moss, Robert, Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1975.
 Sobel, Raoul, and David Francis, Chaplin: Genesis of a Clown, London, 1977.

The Kid

- Baldelli, P., Charlie Chaplin, Florence, 1977.
- Lyons, Timothy J., Charles Chaplin: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
- Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Essays and a Lecture, edited by Jay Leyda, Princeton, 1982.
- Haining, Peter, editor, The Legend of Charlie Chaplin, London, 1982.
- Gehring, Wes D., editor, Charlie Chaplin: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, Connecticut, 1983.
- Robinson, David, Chaplin: The Mirror of Opinion, London, 1983.
- Kamin, Dan, Charlie Chaplin's One-Man Show, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.
- Smith, Julian, Chaplin, Boston, 1984.
- Robinson, David, Chaplin: His Life and Art, London, 1985.
- Saint-Martin, Catherine, Charlot/Chaplin; ou, La Conscience du mythe, Paris, 1987.
- Silver, Charles, Charles Chaplin: An Appreciation, New York, 1990.
- Lynn, Kenneth S., Charlie Chaplin and His Times, New York, 1997.
- Milton, Joyce, Tramp: The Life of Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1998.
- Turk, Ruth, Charlie Chaplin: From Tears to Laughter, Minneapolis, 1999.
- Kimber, John, The Art of Charles Chaplin, Sheffield, 2000.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 21 January 1921.
- New York Times*, 22 January 1921.
- "Charlie Chaplin's Art Dissected," in Literary Digest (New York), 8 October 1921.
- Grein, J. T., "Chaplin as Film Producer," in Illustrated London News, 15 March 1924.
- Grace, Harry A., "Charlie Chaplin's Films and American Culture Patterns," in Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism (Cleveland), June 1952.
- Brownlow, Kevin, "The Early Days of Charlie Chaplin," in Film (London), Summer 1964.
- Lyons, Timothy J., "Roland H. Totheroh Interviewed: Chaplin Films," in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1972.
- Schickel, Richard, "Hail Chaplin—The Early Chaplin," in New York Times Biography Edition, 2 April 1972.
- Carey, Gary, in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1972.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, in Cinéma (Paris), February 1974.
- Ferrari, A., in Téléciné (Paris), March 1974.
- Monthly Film Bulletin* (London), March 1975.
- Salko, S., in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 2, 1979.
- Papson, S., "The IBM Tramp," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), April 1990.
- Randisi, S., "The Flirting Angel and the Tramp," in Filmfax (Evanston, Illinois), June-July 1993.
- Rosi, F., "Entre Le kid et La terre tremble," in Positif (Paris), no. 400, June 1994.
- Woal, M., and L.K. Woal, "Chaplin and the Comedy of Melodrama," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 46, no. 3, 1994.
- Gunning, Tom, "Buster Keaton or the Work of Comedy in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 21, no. 3, 1995.
- Nysenholc, A., "Chaplin: du reve au mythe vivant," in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), no. 42, Summer 1997.

The Kid was the first feature film that Charles Chaplin devised and directed, the longest film in which he had appeared since Keystone's Tillie's Punctured Romance seven years earlier, three times longer than the typical two-reeler at which he had specialized for six years, and almost twice as long as his other major films produced for First National since 1918. The film's greater length reveals Chaplin's expansion of his comic focus to include more powerful and more personal social, moral, and emotional material. At the centre of the film is the Tramp's relationship to Little Jackie (Jackie Coogan), a five-year-old child who has been abandoned by his unwed mother, found and raised by the Tramp as his own surrogate son. Like the mongrel, Scraps, of A Dog's Life (1918), Jackie is a smaller, alternate version of the Tramp himself—a social outcast, defined as illegitimate by the laws and conventions of organized society, able to survive because he is tough though small, mentally agile though uneducated, alternately hard-headed and soft-hearted when it becomes necessary to be either.

Chaplin transferred many of the Tramp's traits, as well as many of his own comedic skills, to little Jackie. Coogan's brilliant performance, responsible for much of the success and popularity of the film, was the first by another performer that Chaplin totally dominated and controlled, in effect creating an alternative Chaplin in a different physical guise (Edna Purviance's performance in A Woman of Paris, Virginia Cherrill's in City Lights, and Paulette Goddard's in Modern Times would be three later such transmutations). Beneath the fictional material in the film one can strongly sense the influence of Chaplin's own personal experiences—his own life as an abandoned child of the London slums, the death of his own first child, born prematurely, and the collapse of his own first marriage, at least partially resulting from the child's death.

Framing the serio-comic study of Charlie and Jackie's domestic bliss, their poor but tranquil existence vivified by love, is material of an entirely different sort. The film begins with a sequence on the unwed mother's (Edna Purviance) difficult decision to abandon her child, depicting her relationship to the callous father (a painter who no longer thinks of the woman) and to the conventional societal definitions of morality and legitimacy (fraught with explicit Christian symbolism). Whereas the woman observes a socially "legitimate" marriage that pairs a young woman with an old, rich man, her own sort of affair is considered illegitimate, even if the action resulted from love and not money. The Christian symbolism returns at the end of the film when Charlie, searching for the child who has been stolen from him, falls asleep to dream of a more pleasant place where, as in so many other Chaplin dream sequences, the painful realities of earthly existence no longer exist. In this dream, considered irrelevant by some critics, Chaplin recreates a comic version of "the Fall" as a group of heavenly angel-people, including the Tramp and all his other neighbors in the slum, fly through the now white-washed and flower-garlanded streets of a utopian city. The dream collapses and the perfect peace turns to bitter chaos when the Satanic spirits of lechery and jealousy sneak through the gates of the heavenly city. Although the sleeping Tramp is roused from this dream to be reunited with Jackie and Edna, the dream sequence suggests Chaplin's sense of the fragility and transience of the true moments of human love and happiness, only temporary escapes from the sordid realities and painful necessities of earthly life.

—Gerald Mast

THE KILLERS

USA, 1946

Director: Robert Siodmak

Production: Mark Hellinger Productions; black and white, 35mm; running time: 105 minutes, some sources list 102 minutes. Released 28 August 1946 by Universal. Filming completed 28 June 1946 in Universal studios.

Producer: Mark Hellinger; screenplay: Anthony Veiller, from the short story by Ernest Hemingway; photography: Woody Bredell; special photography: David S. Horsely; editor: Arthur Hilton; sound: Bernard Brown and William Hedgecock; art directors: Jack Otterson and Martin Obzina; music: Miklos Rozsa; costume designer: Vera West.

Cast: Edmond O'Brien (Riordan); Ava Gardner (Kitty Collins); Albert Dekker (Colfax); Sam Levene (Lubinsky); John Miljan (Jake); Virginia Christine (Lilly); Vince Barnett (Charleston); Burt Lancaster (Swede); Charles D. Brown (Packy); Donald MacBride (Kenyon); Phil Brown (Nick); Charles McGraw (Al); William Conrad (Max); Queenie Smith (Queenie); Garry Owen (Joe); Harry Hayden (George); Bill Walker (Sam); Jack Lambert (Dum Dum); Jeff Corey (Blinky); Wally Scott (Charlie); Gabrielle Windsor (Ginny); Rex Dale (Man).

Publications

Books:

- McArthur, Colin, Underworld U.S.A., London, 1972.
 Kaminsky, Stuart M., American Film Genres, Dayton, Ohio, 1974; revised edition, Chicago, 1985.
 Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Ward, editors, Film Noir, Woodstock, New York, 1979.
 Phillips, Gene D., Hemingway and Film, New York, 1980.
 Laurence, Frank M., Hemingway and the Movies, Jackson, Mississippi, 1981.
 Dumont, Hervé, Robert Siodmak: Le Maître du film noir, Lausanne, 1981.
 Alpi, Deborah Lazaroff, Robert Siodmak: A Biography, with Critical Analyses of His Films Noirs and a Filmography of All His Works, Jefferson, 1998.
 Greco, Joseph, The File on Robert Siodmak in Hollywood: 1941–1951, Parkland, 1999.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 7 August 1946.
New York Times, 29 August 1946.
 Marshman, D., "Mister Siodmak," in Life (New York), 25 August 1947.
 Lillich, Richard, "Hemingway on the Screen," in Films in Review (New York), April 1959.

- Taylor, John Russell, "Encounter with Siodmak," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer-Autumn 1959.
 Siodmak, Robert, and Richard Wilson, "Hoodlums: The Myths and Their Reality," in Films and Filming (London), June 1959.
 Sarris, Andrew, "Esoterica," in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.
 Nolan, Jack, "Robert Siodmak," in Films in Review (New York), April 1969.
 Flinn, Tom, "Three Faces of Film Noir," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Summer 1972.
Ecran (Paris), Summer 1972.
 Eyles, Allen, "Edmond O'Brien," in Focus on Film (London), Autumn 1974.
 Kaminsky, Stuart M., "Hemingway's The Killers," in Take One (Montreal), November 1974.
 Jenkins, Steve, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1981.
 Goldschmidt, D., in Cinématographe (Paris), July 1985.
 Slater, Thomas, "Anthony Veiller," in American Screenwriters, 2nd Series, edited by Randall Clark, Detroit, 1986.
 Review, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 7, no. 8, August 1990.
 Wald, Marvin, "Richard Brooks and Me," in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), vol. 1, no. 2, Summer 1994.
 Aachen, G., in Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 23, 1996.
 Lucas, Tim, "The Killers, Criss Cross, The Underneath, Brute Force, The Naked City," in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 32, 1996.
 Mumby, J., "The 'Un-American' Film Art: Robert Siodmak and the Political Significance of Film Noir's German Connection," in Iris, no. 21, Spring 1996.
 Telotte, J.P., "Fatal Capers: Strategy and Enigma in Film Noir," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 23, no. 4, Winter 1996.
 Brierly, D., "Robert Siodmak," in Filmfax (Evanston), no. 62, August/September 1997.

* * *

The Killers begins with literature and ends with film noir. The unlikely death of a filling station attendant prompts an insurance investigator to solve a puzzle of events that leads him to the cause of the murder and then envelops him in a plot ending with the murderer's death. After staging Ernest Hemingway's story in the opening sequence, the plot follows a structure that prevails in the convention of the 1940s: a man utters his last words, "I did something wrong, once," to avow his fatal mistake of falling in love with a woman who doublecrosses him. His relentless passion and blindness lead the two of them and her husband to their demise.

Director Robert Siodmak makes filmic innovation from a model anticipated in Renoir's La bête humaine (1938) and standardized since Double Indemnity (1944). The opening shots afford visual splendor in deep-focus shots taken in the confines of an empty café. Hemingway's narrative is translated into a tense volley of words and images. The rest of the film "catches up" with the initial murder after 11 major flashbacks—and flashbacks within flashbacks—before the insurance agent (Edmond O'Brien) witnesses the dying culprit's confession inculcating his attendant spouse. Something of a proto-nouveau roman, the script has the narrative cross over an unnamed abyss of time—the amnesia of the Second World War—in ways that determine the absolute immobility of the present. Recent history, as if it were a memory too traumatic to be named, figures as a central abyss of violence gnawing at the surrounding fiction. 22 lap dissolves throw the narrative into a configuration of overlapping surfaces.

The Killers

Narrative intricacy aside, the film is a masterful exercise in the creation of subjectivity that political scientists call “interpellation,” or the forces that determine the human being as a social subject. No other film noir—save Siodmak’s Phantom Lady (1944) or Crisscross (1949)—makes such sustained use of voice-off as instances of interpellation. Figures on frame are continually “marked” by imperatives, off, having no discernible visual origin. They leave an eerie effect matched by back lighting that makes the characters’ shadows more revealing than their persons. The resulting fragmentation and doubling of figures, along with rifts of voice and image, show where the film theorizes the conventions its narrative seems to develop so patently. The film’s broken synchronies not only give evidence of what film noir is and how it is effected; like Citizen Kane, Siodmak’s film anticipates future experiment in European and American cinema.

Three sequences are noteworthy. In the re-enactment of Hemingway’s tale, script and deep focus are used to truncate cinematic illusion and ideation. Seated in contrapuntal relation to the two gunmen at the other end of the counter, bewildered by what he sees, Nick Adams directs his words both to the killers and the spectator. Astonished, he exclaims, “What’s the idea?” To which the hefty thug (William Conrad) snarls (off) in the direction of Adams and the viewer, “There isn’t any idea.” The riposte orients the eye away from metaphysics or invisibility of language to a richer play of prismatic form. The moment also shows how, second, the violence of history will be scripted onto the surface of the tale. In the first flashback that depicts Nick Adams’s reconstruction of the victim’s last days, told to the insurance investigator, the camera frames the protagonist (Burt Lancaster), standing in front of the “Tristate Station.” He is visibly ill at the sight of the return of his repressed, the gangster Jim Colfax, who will now set a price on his life. Standing under the marquee above him, Lancaster nods and puts his hands to his stomach. His head shifts position over the letters STATE STATIC (the O of “station” carefully cut in half by a pole). His head blocks and uncovers the letters “ATE STATIC.” The wording scripts the fate of a character as it figures a global malaise of narrative and political stasis in 1946. Adjacent to a sign that spells TIRES in acrostic to his left, Lancaster is a figure worn down—fatigued—by history and fate. He is not only a victim of a tri-state tryst, but also of a political atmosphere, a cold war of 1946, as “state static,” determining the visible field of the narrative.

A third sequence, also crucial to the historical relation of film noir and nouvelle vague, stages a conversation between the sleuth and his boss. The latter is seen reading a newspaper clipping of 1940 recounting the story of a payroll heist from a Hackensack hat company. The present tense in the insurance office dissolves into a long crane shot that visibly depicts what is being told in words on the sound track. Seen in silence, in the style of Joseph Mankiewicz’s silent flashbacks that pull an event out of time, the moving camera arches over the men staging the holdup and driving off in an exchange of mute gunfire. At one point, as it follows the vehicle exiting under the open-work metal sign over the entry to the factory (spelling the “Prentiss Hat Company”), the camera registers the reflection of the mirrored letters on the windshield, twice reversed so as to be read correctly, visibly enough to draw the spectator’s attention to the reflection of the crane, the camera, and its operator. The film-in-the-film is glimpsed: invisible editing, it had for decades excluded the camera from the image-track, is broken down; omnipresence of writing makes the deep focus flat and at once visible and legible; the illusion of narrative synchrony is divided and flattened; attention is brought to deliberate camera movement that evokes a timeless oblivion of memory. The sequence heralds techniques soon exploited by Bresson, Resnais, and Godard.

Along with Citizen Kane and Sullivan’s Travels, The Killers ranks as one of the more “theoretical” films of the 1940s at the same time that it concretizes the essence of film noir. It uses Hemingway to threshold a Baroque structure of surfaces, and its self-consciousness arches verbal and visual discourses over each other, leaving the effect of a film looking at the very forms it is unfolding. Siodmak’s work occupies a central niche in the history of film theory, in film noir, and in the relations of cinema and literature.

—Tom Conley

KIND HEARTS AND CORONETS

UK, 1949

Director: Robert Hamer

Production: Ealing Studios; black and white, 35mm; running time: 106 minutes; length: 9529 feet. Released 1949. Filmed in England.

Producer: Michael Balcon; screenplay: Robert Hamer and John Dighton, from the novel Israel Rank by Roy Horniman; photography: Douglas Slocombe; editor: Peter Tanner; music: Wolfgang Mozart.

Cast: Dennis Price (Louis Mazzini/Mazzini’s father); Joan Greenwood (Sibella); Valerie Hobson (Edith); Alec Guinness (Ascoyne d’Ascoyne/Henry d’Ascoyne/Canon d’Ascoyne/Admiral d’Ascoyne/General d’Ascoyne/Lady Agatha d’Ascoyne/Lord d’Ascoyne/Ethelbert the Old Duke); Audrey Fildes (Mrs. Mazzini); John Penrose (Lionel); Miles Malleon (Hangman); Clive Morton (Prison governor).

Award: Venice Film Festival, Best Scenography, 1949.

Publications

Script:

Hamer, Robert, and John Dighton, Kind Hearts and Coronets, New York, 1974, revised edition, 1984.

Books:

- Tynan, Kenneth, Alec Guinness, New York, 1955.
 Balcon, Michael, A Lifetime of Films, London, 1969.
 Butler, Ivan, Cinema in Britain, New York, 1973.
 Betts, Ernest, The Film Business: A History of British Cinema, New York, 1973.
 Barr, Charles, Ealing Studios, London, 1977, 1982, 1999.
 Perry, George, Forever Ealing, London, 1981.
 Hunter, Allan, Alec Guinness on Screen, London, 1982.
 Kurdish, Laurence, Michael Balcon: The Pursuit of British Cinema, New York, 1984.
 Taylor, John Russell, Alec Guinness: A Celebration, London, 1984, 1994.
 Guinness, Alec, Blessings in Disguise, London, 1985.
 Missler, Andreas, Alec Guinness: Seine Filme, sein Leben, Munich, 1987.
 Von Gunden, Kenneth, Alec Guinness: The Films, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1987.
 Brown, Geoff, Michael Balcon: Pursuit of Britain, New York, 1990.
 Guinness, Alec, My Name Escapes Me: The Diary of a Retiring Actor, New York, 1998.

Articles:

- Schwerin, Jules, in Films in Review (New York), March 1950.
 Lockart, Freda Bruce, “Interview with Robert Hamer,” in Sight and Sound (London), October–December 1951.
 Hill, Derek, “Man of Many Faces,” in Films and Filming (London), February 1955.
 Tynan, Kenneth, “Ealing: The Studio in Suburbia,” in Films and Filming (London), November and December 1955.
 McVay, Douglas, “Alec Guinness,” in Films and Filming (London), May 1961.
 Houston, Penelope, “Survivor,” in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1962–63.
 Stanbrook, Alan, in Films and Filming (London), April 1964.
 Mazoyer, J., “Noblesse oblige,” in Image et Son (Paris), no. 274, 1973.
 Barr, Charles, “Projecting Britain and the British Character: Ealing Studios,” in Screen (London), Summer 1974.
 Hopkins, Charles, in Magill’s Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Porter, Vincent, “The Context of Creativity: Ealing Studios and Hammer Films,” and Ian Green, “Ealing: In the Comedy Frame,” both in British Cinema History, edited by James Curran, and Vincent Porter, London, 1983.
 Glassman, M., and J. Wolfe, “The Studio with the Team Spirit: a Look at Ealing Comedies,” in CineAction (Toronto), no. 9, Summer 1987.
 Sontag, S., “In Conclusionp” in East-West Film Journal (Honolulu), vol. 2, no. 1, 1987.

Kind Hearts and Coronets

Palmer, James, "Enunciation and Comedy: Kind Hearts and Coronets," in Screen (Oxford), vol. 30, no. 1–2, Winter-Spring 1989.
 Andrew, Geoff, "Ealing Touch," in Time Out (London), no. 1197, 28 July 1993.

* * *

Kind Hearts and Coronets is an Ealing Comedy in name only. True, it is a comedy, and it was produced by Michael Balcon's Ealing Studios. Even so, the film has little in common with its stablemates. Ealing comedies (with the exception of Mackendrick's) were cosy. Kind Hearts is callous, even cruel. The humour of Ealing comedies was generally warm, cheerful, and folksy; Kind Hearts is cool, ironic and witty. Sex, in Ealing comedies, was kept at a safe distance, and handled (if at all) with embarrassed jocularly; Kind Hearts includes scenes that carry a powerful erotic charge.

Hamer stated his intentions as: "Firstly, that of making a film not noticeably similar to any previously made in the English language. Secondly, that of using this English language, which I love, in a more varied and more interesting way. Thirdly, that of making a picture which paid no regard whatever to established, although not practised, moral convention." Much of the humour is indeed verbal, elegantly Wildean, carried by the hero's voice-over narration—yet always aptly counterpointed by the visual effects. The shape of the film is satisfyingly classic, a long flash-back. It opens with Louis Mazzini (Dennis Price) in prison, condemned to death for a murder of which he is innocent, composing his memoirs, in which he recounts all the murders of which he is guilty. His mother, a member of the proud d'Ascoyne clan, had married an Italian singer; for this they disowned her, condemning her to poverty and eventual death. At her grave, Louis vows vengeance, and gradually eliminates every d'Ascoyne (all played by Alec Guinness) between himself and the dukedom.

Louis's narration serves as a unifying factor, effectively sustaining the tone of cool irony throughout the film. Cool—but not cold; there is a pervasive undercurrent of passion beneath the urbane wit, motivating Louis in his systematic slaughter, and surfacing both in the erotic passages with his mistress Sibella (Joan Greenwood), and in his embittered outburst before shooting the Duke, his final victim. The Duke, most repellent of the d'Ascoynes, has been decoyed by Louis into one of his own mantraps; but Louis, too, is caught in his own trap. In revenging himself on the d'Ascoynes for their heartlessness, he has become as heartless, cold and calculating as they.

But the film can readily be enjoyed without any such consideration of its serious undertones. Kind Hearts is very funny, wickedly subversive, and probably the finest black comedy the British cinema has ever produced. It is certainly Hamer's masterpiece, a highly successful fusion of his dominant influences: Wildean comedy, and classic French cinema (notably, in this case, Sacha Guitry and the Renoir of La règle du jeu). The film made Alec Guinness's international reputation, and rapidly attained the status of a classic—which it has consistently maintained. Such polished excellence makes it even more regrettable that Hamer's masterpiece was also the last major film of his sadly blighted career.

—Philip Kemp

KING KONG

USA, 1933

Directors: Merian C. Cooper and Ernest B. Schoedsack

Production: RKO Radio Pictures Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 100 minutes. Released 2 March 1933, Radio City Music Hall and RKO Roxy Theatre, New York. Re-released 1938 with a few scenes censored. Filmed 1932–33 in RKO Studios and backlots, also in San Pedro Harbor and Shrine Auditorium, Los Angeles. Cost: $670,000.

Producers: Merian C. Cooper and Ernest B. Schoedsack with David O. Selznick as executive producer; screenplay: James Creelman and Ruth Rose, from a story by Merian C. Cooper and Edgar Wallace based on an idea conceived by Cooper; photography: Edward Linden, Vernon L. Walker, and J. O. Taylor; optical photography: Linwood C. Dunn and William Ulm; editor: Ted Cheesman; sound recordist: E. A. Wolcott; sound effects: Murray Spivack; production technicians: Mario Larrinaga and Byron L. Crabbe; art director: Archie S. Marshek and Walter Daniels; art direction supervisor: Van Nest Polglase; music: Max Steiner; chief technician: Willis H. O'Brien; special effects: Harry Redmond Jr.; Williams Matte supervision: Frank Williams; technical artwork: Juan Larrinaga, Zachary Hoag, and Victor Delgado; projection process: Sydney Saunders; costume designer: Walter Plunkett; King Kong modelist: Marcel Delgado.

Cast: Fay Wray (Ann Darrow); Bruce Cabot (Jack Driscoll); Sam Hardy (Weston); James Flavin (2nd mate); Victor Wong (Charley); Paul Porcasi (Fruit vendor); Dick Curtis (Crewman); Robert Armstrong (Carl Denham); Frank Reicher (Captain Englehorn); Noble Johnson (Native chief); Steve Clemento (Witch king); Roscoe Ates (Press photographer); Leroy Mason (Theater patron).

Publications

Books:

McBride, Joseph, Persistence of Vision, Madison, Wisconsin, 1968.
Gifford, Denis, Movie Monsters, New York, 1969.

Steinbrunner, Chris, and Burt Goldblatt, Cinema of the Fantastic, New York, 1972.

Gubern, Roman, Homenaje a King Kong, Barcelona, 1974.

Goldner, Orville, and George E. Turner, The Making of King Kong, New York, 1973.

Gottesman, Ronald, and Harry M. Geduld, editors, The Girl in the Hairy Paw, New York, 1976.

Mathews, J. H., Surrealism and American Feature Films, Boston, 1979.

Powers, Tom J., Movie Monsters, Minneapolis, 1989.

Wray, Fay, On the Other Hand: A Life Story, New York, 1989.

Erb, Cynthia, Tracking King Kong: A Hollywood Icon in World History, Detroit, 1998.

Articles:

New York Times, 5 March 1933.

Variety (New York), 7 March 1933.

Troy, William, in Nation (New York), 22 March 1933.

Boone, Andrew R., in Popular Science Monthly (New York), 1933.

Kennedy, X. J., "Who Killed King Kong," in Dissent (New York), Spring 1960.

Boulet, Jean, "Willis O'Brien; or, The Birth of a Film from Design to Still," in Midi-Minuit Fantastique (Paris), October-November 1962.

Ollier, Claude, "A King in New York," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May-June 1965.

Behlmer, Rudy, "Merian C. Cooper," in Films in Review (New York), January 1966.

Peary, G., "Orphan in the Storm: Son of Kong," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1973–74.

Peoples, S. A., in Films in Review (New York), January 1974.

Osborne, A., "Father of Kong," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), July 1974.

Peary, G., "A Speculation: The Historicity of King Kong," in Jump Cut (Chicago), November-December 1974.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), January 1975.

Rosen, D. N., "Race, Sex, and Rebellion," in Jump Cut (Chicago), March-April 1975.

Mayne, Judith, "King Kong and the Ideology of the Spectacle," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (Pleasantville, New York), No. 4, 1976.

Fieschi, J., "La Religion du monstre," in Cinématographe (Paris), April-May 1976.

Maraval, P., "Trucages pro-filmiques et filmiques dans King Kong," in Cinématographe (Paris), April-May 1976.

Sabatier, J.-M., in Image et Son (Paris), September 1976.

Markfield, Wallace, "The Kong and I," in New York Times, 12 December 1976.

Dunn, L. G., "Creating Film Magic for the Original King Kong," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), January 1977.

Jackson, F., "Doctor, I Have These Strange Dreams," in Take One (Montreal), January 1977.

"The Making of the Original King Kong," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), January 1977.

Wellman, H., "King Kong—Then and Now," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), January 1977.

Garsault, A., and A. Marty, in Positif (Paris), February 1977.

King Kong

Fiedel, R., "Sound Track: And the Beast Goes On," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), March 1977.

Broske, Pat J., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

"O'Brien Issue" of Cinefex (Riverside, California), January 1982.

Mandrell, P. R., and George E. Turner, in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), August 1983.

Strick, Philip, in Films and Filming (London), September 1986.

MacQueen, Scott, "Old King Kong Gets Face Lift," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 70, no. 1, January 1989.

Snead, J., "Spectatorship and Capture in King Kong: The Guilty Look," in Critical Quarterly, vol. 33, no. 1, 1991.

"THE Marks 'Kong's' 60th Anni with Triple-whammy Release," in Variety (New York), vol. 347, 13 July 1992.

Clayton, J., "King Kong: The Ultimate Fantasy," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 205, July 1992.

Fein, D.C., "The Eighth Wonder," in Cinefex (Riverside), no. 51, August 1992.

"The Big Picture," in Boxoffice (Chicago), vol. 128, October 1992.

Harmetz, A., "Kong and Wray: 60 Years of Love," in New York Times, vol. 142, sec. 2, 28 February 1993.

Girard, Martin, "King Kong et la critique: 60 ans de relations," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 164, May 1993.

Pouw, A., "Laserdisc in opmars," in Score (Lelystad), no. 87, June 1993.

Messias, Hans, "Kong und Ann: eine Liebesgeschichte," in Film-Dienst (Cologne), vol. 47, no. 14, 6 July 1993.

Berenstein, Rhona, "White Heroines and Hearts of Darkness: Race, Gender, and Disguise in 1930s Jungle Films," in Film History (London), vol. 6, no. 3, Autumn 1994.

Bansak, Edmund G., "The Children of Kong," in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), no. 23, 1996.

McGurl, M., "Making it Big: Picturing the Radio Age in King Kong," in Critical Inquiry, vol. 22, no. 3, 1996.

"King Kong Soundtrack Released," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 273, March 1998.

* * *

Few films can compete with the longevity of King Kong. The film is as popular today, on television and in revival theaters, as it first was in its initial release in 1933. Ironically, the film's contemporary setting of 1933 has now made it a period piece, though the ideas and themes have never aged.

The story was conceived by producer/director Merian C. Cooper and inspired by his trips to Africa and Southeast Asia to shoot documentary films. Cooper imagined setting a primitive giant ape against the civilization of a modern New York City. This vision was eventually realized on the screen with the aid and collaboration of special visual effects artist and innovator, Willis H. O'Brien.

The special visual techniques developed for King Kong were numerous. One of the more important technical advances was the development of a safe (cellulose-acetate) rear-projection screen by Sidney Saunders. Although earlier films had used a more primitive glass rear-projection screen (which, if accidentally broken, could cause serious injuries to actors and crew), the cellulose-acetate screen allowed King Kong to be the first film to use large-scale rear projection. Another innovation was the invention and use of the optical printer by Vernon Walker and Linwood Dunn. The optical printer presented a new way of combining optical mattes that was superior to the old, and more complex, Dunning process. The enormous amount of matte work in the film (used to combine the special effects with the live action) would not have been feasible without the help of the printer.

Although stop-motion animation had been used previously in other films (such as O'Brien's The Lost World in 1925), King Kong was the first feature film to use stop-motion to create a continuous character. The model of King Kong was constructed by artist Marcel Delgado out of metal, rubber, cotton and rabbit fur, yet it was truly an "actor." He could express emotions and react logically to the situation around him.

The making of King Kong also presented a problem in the area of sound effects. Kong had to sound believable, yet unlike any other creature on earth. The sound department at RKO, headed by Murray Spivak, ran dozens of new and innovative experiments to create the right soundtrack. Kong's roar was a combination of lion and tiger sounds slowed down and played backwards. The music is still another example of the film's originality. Many films in the early 1930s used classical music as background accompaniment. King Kong was one of the first films for which an entire score was created. Composer Max Steiner carefully plotted out each scene in the film so that he could synchronize his music with the action.

The technical innovations found in King Kong are not the only reasons for its success; every good film must start with a good story. King Kong has a universal appeal, making it one of the most popular and well-known American films.

—Linda J. Obalil

KING LEAR

See KOROL LIR

KING OF CHILDREN

See HAIZI WANG

KINGS OF THE ROAD

See IM LAUF DER ZEIT

KINO-PRAVDA

(Film-Truth)

USSR, 1922–25

Director: Dziga Vertov

Production: Black and white, 35mm, series of 23 newsreels-documentaries, released over a period of 3 years; First issue released 21 May 1922, the 23rd and last issue released 1925. Filmed in the Soviet Union.

Photography: Mikhail Kaufman, I. Belyakov and A. Lemberg; editor: Dziga Vertov; assistant editor: Yelizaveta Svilova; assistant director: Ilya Kopalin.

Publications

Books:

De La Roche, Catherine, and Thorold Dickinson, Soviet Cinema, London, 1948; New York, 1972.

Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.

Abramov, Nikolai, Dziga Vertov, Moscow, 1962; French edition, Lyons, 1965.

Vertov, Dziga, Aufsätze, Tagebücher, Skizzen, edited by Sergej Drobashchenko, Berlin, 1967.

Borokov, V., Dziga Vertov, Moscow, 1967.

Rotha, Paul, and others, Documentary Film, New York, 1968.

Sitney, P. Adams, editor, Film Culture Reader, New York, 1970.

Sadoul, Georges, Dziga Vertov, Paris, 1971.

Issari, M. Ali, Cinema Vérité, East Lansing, Michigan, 1971.

Schnitzer, Luda, Jean Schnitzer, and Marcel Martin, Cinema in Revolution: The Heroic Era of the Soviet Film, New York, 1973.

Rimberg, John, The Motion Picture in the Soviet Union 1918–1952, New York, 1973.

Cohen, Louis Harris, The Cultural-Political Traditions and Developments of the Soviet Cinema 1917–1972, New York, 1974.

Feldman, Seth R., Evolution of Style in the Early Works of Dziga Vertov, New York, 1977.

Ellis, Jack C., A History of Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.

Feldman, Seth R., Dziga Vertov: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Marshall, Herbert, Masters of the Soviet Cinema: Crippled Creative Biographies, London, 1983.

Vertov, Dziga, Kino-Eye: The Writings, edited by Annette Michelson, Berkeley, 1984.

Waugh, Thomas, editor, “Show Us Life”: Toward a History and Aesthetics of the Committed Documentary, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.

Petric, Vlad, Constructivism in Film: The Man with the Movie Camera: A Cinematic Analysis, Cambridge, 1987.

Ellis, Jack C., The Documentary Idea, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1989.

Devaux, Frédérique, Homme à la camera, de Dziga Vertov, Crisnée, 1990.

Articles:

Abramov, Nikolai, “Dziga Vertov es a dokumentufilm muvezsete,” in Filmkultura (Budapest), January 1961.

“The Writings of Dziga Vertov,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1962.

Bordwell, David, “Dziga Vertov: An Introduction,” in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1972.

Feldman, Seth R., “Cinema Weekly and Cinema Truth,” in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1973–74.

Mayne, Judith, “Kino-Truth and Kino-Praxis: Vertov’s Man with a Movie Camera,” in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Summer 1977.

Lebedev, A., in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), October 1977.

Dille, J., “‘Konstruktivizm’ and ‘Kinematografiya’,” in Artforum, vol. 16, May 1978.

* * *

The 21 May 1922 debut of the innovative newsreel Kino-Pravda came at a crucial time in Soviet history. The nature and reception of Kino-Pravda are best understood against that background. In August of the previous year, Lenin, in a desperate move to spark an economy prostrated by years of turmoil—revolution, civil war, occupation by foreign troops—had decreed a “New Economic Policy” i.e., a temporary invocation of private enterprise, including concessions to foreign interests. With striking promptness theatres began showing pre-war Russian films and imports from the major capitalist powers (e.g., Evil Shadows, Daughter of Tarzan, The City’s Temptation). Even as their armies departed, their films flooded in, providing some of the needed economic stimulus. But the young film worker Dziga Vertov described the deluge as “living corpses of movie dramas garbed in splendid technological dressing.” With the rhetorical flair for which he would become noted, he protested: “The body of cinema is numbed by the terrible poison of habit. We demand an opportunity to experiment with this dying organism, to find an antidote.” For him the antidote was “reality.” His apparent contempt for fiction films antagonized many in the Russian film world, but his words won support in high places. Lenin had recently declared that it hardly mattered if people were drawn to theatres by nonsense films, provided there was also a proportion dealing with world realities. The need for a “Leninist film proportion” (never clearly defined) became Soviet doctrine and seemed to be implemented with the authorized launching of Kino-Pravda, under the leadership of the 26-year-old Dziga Vertov.

For many Russian film-goers the monthly issues of Kino-Pravda released during the next two years must often have seemed the only items touching their lives. They saw such events as: the day a Moscow trolley line, long out of service in torn-up streets, resumed running; a tank levelling a field for an airport-to-be; homeless children, surviving in rubble, getting medical attention from a hospital; a hydroelectric project under construction. Kino-Pravda occasionally turned a camera on its own operations. One episode showed a film worker arriving in a village, setting up a screen and projector, and, when a crowd gathered, showing them a Kino-Pravda reel.

Kino-Pravda was the work of a compact group. Its creator, Dziga Vertov (real name, Denis Kaufman) hailed from Bialystok in the Polish part of the Tsarist domain. With the outbreak of war in 1914 his parents, both librarians, had taken their three young sons—Denis, Mikhail, Boris—to what must have seemed the comparative safety of Russia. The two older sons, Denis and Mikhail, took up university studies in St Petersburg. In 1917 both were caught up in the fever of the revolution, with Denis volunteering to the cinema committee; he was soon editing agit-prop films despatched to fighting units as well as to towns and villages. He renamed himself Dziga Vertov, names suggesting a spinning top, perhaps symbolizing a revolving film reel, or revolution itself. By 1921, as the fighting ended, he was a seasoned film worker. He foresaw a crucial role for film in the coming Soviet state and wrote manifestos to that effect. When his Kino-Pravda project won approval, he enlisted his brother Mikhail Kaufman, one year his junior, as chief cameraman, joined by others as needed. Vertov’s wife, Yelizaveta Svilova, became Kino-Pravda’s editor. (Boris, youngest of the Kaufman brothers, was sent to France to be educated. He eventually pursued a notable film career there, and later in Canada and the United States).

The Kino-Pravda group began its work in a basement in the centre of Moscow. Vertov later described it as damp and dark with an earthen floor and holes one stumbled into at every turn. “This dampness prevented our reels of lovingly edited film from sticking together properly, rusted our scissors and our splicers.” To get an issue out in time, they often worked into the night. “Before dawn—damp, cold, teeth chattering—I wrap comrade Svilova in a third jacket.”

Vertov remained the guiding force. He outlined general strategy, then sent Mikhail and other cameramen in various directions, allowing them wide latitude. They were to shoot what seemed important. Staged action was taboo. They wished to catch life “unaware.” They never asked permission. They sometimes shot from concealed positions. The epoch provided the themes. Mikhail would remember the period with nostalgia. His camera was always with him. They worked hard but never thought of it as hard work. It was “like breathing or eating.” Once when Vertov ordered him to take a rest in the country, he went reluctantly. It was beautiful, “but when I could not see it with the help of my camera, it was not beauty for me.”

Like the American film pioneer Robert Flaherty, a contemporary, Vertov and Mikhail considered the camera a miraculous “machine for seeing.” The camera eye could help the human eye perceive things it could not otherwise see. To exploit this to the fullest, Kino-Pravda welcomed such devices as speeded and slowed action, and vistas from impossible angles. In one of his manifestos, Vertov lets the camera do the explaining: “I, a machine, show you a world such as only I can see. From now on and for always I cast off human immobility, I move constantly, I approach and move away from objects, I creep under them, I leap onto them, I move alongside the mouth of a galloping horse, I cut into a crowd, I turn on my back,

I take off with an airplane, I fall and rise without falling and rising bodies.” Such words help to explain why Kino-Pravda was considered livelier than most newsreels. It dealt with “the prose of life,” but processed with any device that would convey symbolic values. Thus in issue No. 24 (1925), on the first anniversary of the death of Lenin, we see people streaming past the dead leader in his coffin. Meanwhile the living Lenin appears by superimposition in the corner of the screen as though still speaking to them.

The Kino-Pravda series had a considerable influence beyond its short life. Its footage and techniques were used in a number of subsequent feature-length documentaries by Vertov and his associates, notably in Shestaya Chast Mira (One Sixth of the World, 1926), a widely admired film.

Kino-Pravda's magazine-like newsreel seems to have contributed to Time's decision to create The March of Time. Even more significant was the inspiration Kino-Pravda gave to the cinéma vérité movement of the 1960s, which took not only its name, but some of its basic ideas, from the Vertov newsreel. Synchronized sight-and-sound shooting had by then made possible, in a fuller sense than in Vertov's time, the Kino-Pravda aspiration of capturing life “on the run.”

—Erik Barnouw

KISS ME CASANOVA

See Märchen vom Glück

KISS ME DEADLY

USA, 1955

Director: Robert Aldrich

Production: Parklane Pictures; black and white; running time: 98 minutes, censored version 96 minutes; original length: 8,893 feet. Released April 1955.

Producer: Robert Aldrich; screenplay: A. I. Bezzerides, from the novel by Mickey Spillane; photography: Ernest Laszlo; editor: Mike Luciani; art director: William Glasgow; music: Frank Devol.

Cast: Ralph Meeker (Mike Hammer); Albert Dekker (Dr. Soberin); Paul Stewart (Carl Eyello); Juano Hernandez (Eddie Eager); Wesley Addy (Pat); Marian Carr (Friday); Maxine Cooper (Velda); Cloris Leachman (Christina); Nick Dennis (Nick).

Publications

Books:

Micha, Rene, Robert Aldrich, Brussels, 1957.

Higham, Charles, The Celluloid Muse: Hollywood Directors Speak, New York, 1969.

Combs, Richard, editor, Robert Aldrich, London, 1978.

Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Ward, Robert Aldrich: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Salizzato, Claver, Robert Aldrich, Florence, 1983.

Piton, Jean-Pierre, Robert Aldrich, Paris, 1985.

Arnold, Edwin T., and Eugene L. Miller, The Films and Career of Robert Aldrich, Knoxville, Tennessee, 1986.

Maheo, Michel, Robert Aldrich, Paris, 1987.

Silver, Alain, and James Ursini, What Ever Happened to Robert Aldrich?: His Life and His Films, New York, 1995.

Bogdanovich, Peter, Who the Devil Made It: Conversations with Robert Aldrich, George Cukor, Allan Dwan, Howard Hawks, Alfred Hitchcock, Chuck Jones, Fritz Lang, Joseph H. Lewis, Sidney Lumet, Leo McCarey, Otto Preminger, Don Siegel, Josef von Sternberg, Frank Tashlin, Edgar G. Ulmer, Raoul Walsh, New York, 1997.

Articles:

Rivette, Jacques, “On Revolution,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 54, 1955.

Hollywood Reporter, 20 April 1955.

Variety (New York), 20 April 1955.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1955.

Fenin, George, interview with Aldrich, in Film Culture (New York), July/August 1955.

Truffaut, François, interview with Aldrich, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1956.

Jarvie, Ian, “Hysteria and Authoritarianism in the Films of Robert Aldrich,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1961.

Cameron, Ian, and Mark Shivas, “Interview and Filmography,” in Movie (London), April 1963.

Motion, no. 3, 1962.

Chabrol, Claude, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1964–January 1965.

Bertolucci, Bernardo, “Dialogue,” in Action (Los Angeles), March–April 1974.

Ringel, Harry, interview with Aldrich, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1974.

Silver, Alain, “Kiss Me Deadly: Evidence of a Style,” in Film Comment (New York), March–April 1975.

Legrand, Gérard, “Robert Aldrich et l'incomplétude du nihilisme,” in Positif (Paris), June 1976.

Sauvage, Pierre, “Aldrich Interview,” in Movie (London), Winter 1976–77.

“Dialogue on Film: Robert Aldrich,” in American Film (Washington, D.C.), November 1978.

Combs, Richard, in Listener (London), 14 March 1985.

Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Summer 1985.

Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 8, no. 3–4, 1986.

Cinema Journal (Champaign, Illinois), Spring 1988.

Telotte, J. P., “The Big Clock of Film Noir,” in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 2, 1990.

Wood, R., “Creativity and Evaluation,” in Cineaction (Toronto), Summer–Fall 1990.

Telotte, J. P., “The Fantastic Realism of Film Noir: Kiss Me Deadly,” in Wide Angle (Baltimore), no. 1, 1992.

Kiss Me Deadly

- Osteen, M., "The Big Secret: Film Noir and Nuclear Fear," in Journal of Popular Film, vol. 22, no. 2, 1994.
- Hill, Rodney F., "Remembrance, Communication, and Kiss Me Deadly," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 22, no. 2, April 1995.
- Kohn, Olivier, and others, "Hommage à Robert Aldrich," in Positif (Paris), no. 415, September 1995.
- "What's New with the Great Whatzit?" in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 40, 1997.
- Lucas, Tim, "Kiss Me Deadly," in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 42, 1997.
- Riordan, P.M., "Atomic Blonde," in Filmfax (Evanston), no. 63/64, October/January 1997/1998.
- Thomson, David, "Deadlily," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 33, no. 6, November-December 1997.

* * *

The end of a particular stylistic period, in film as in the other arts, is often marked by a few masterpieces whose dizzying complexity seems to carry the style as far as it can be taken. Just as the end of the Romantic symphony is marked by Mahler's last few works in that form, and the end of Hollywood silent cinema is marked by films like Sunrise and Street Angel, so at the end of the film noir period come the two ultimate examples of the form, Touch of Evil and Kiss Me Deadly. Kiss Me Deadly is also in many ways, the ultimate film of 1950s America, with its themes of speed, money, power, sex, and the atomic bomb intertwined in a tale of a detective who becomes an extortionist in an attempt to turn a chance discovery into personal gain.

The film's night-for-night opening sets the tone: A woman dressed only in a coat appears out of the darkness on a lonely highway. She forces a car driven by Mike Hammer to stop, and as they drive one is aware of the loud drone of the engine and of the disorienting darkness, in which the disembodied lights of distant cars and the white lines of the road are virtually our only co-ordinates. What is established here is worked out in detail during the whole remainder of the film, in a soundtrack which uses a variety of noises of violent intensity and intrusiveness, and in imagery which uses light/dark contrasts utterly to undermine stability.

Hammer, happening on a plot involving the theft and attempted sale of fissionable material, does not know these specifics until the film's end. He guesses only that he has lucked on to "something big," and that “a piece of something big has got to be something big.” He follows his thread through a befuddling labyrinth of bizarre characters, common in Spillane’s detective fiction, which finds its visual equivalent in the film in a panoply of foreground objects, bizarre shifts of camera perspective, and highly disjunctive editing. The camera follows Hammer down a dark street; suddenly a brightly lit newsstand comes into the foreground, utterly transforming the space. We see a beachfront fight from eye-level, and then cut to an extreme high angle. In many compositions, oblique camera angles combine with cluttered foregrounds to produce oddly asymmetrical spaces. The effect of these devices is to place the viewer in a world utterly different from that of Ford, or Walsh or Hawks. In their films, paradigms of the classical Hollywood style, the consistency of the relationship between earth and sky, or between the bodies and body-movements of the characters, serves as a kind of fixed basis against which all deviations of movement, behavior, and image may be judged. In Kiss Me Deadly, on the other hand, we are plunged from the opening images into a world utterly without ground, without stability, without predictability, in which the only constant is the ability of the image to suddenly transform itself into another, very different one. Space, and the objects that fill it, are presented as physically malleable; there are no absolutes. The noir themes of violence, paranoia, and despair, and the visual motifs that accompany them, are here carried to a visionary extreme that becomes a total world-view. This is a realm in which there can be firm basis for moral judgements, and if the film ultimately renders a negative judgment on Hammer’s self-serving quest, it does so more because of the actual ugly consequences than because of any fundamental belief.

In a universe without belief, one lives for, and celebrates, the senses. Aldrich, and A. I. Bezzerides in his brilliant script, present the ethos of 1950s America quite brilliantly. Nick, Hammer’s Greek auto mechanic, uses the phrase “Va-va-voom—pow!” to express his attraction to Hammer’s fast cars and his interest in picking up “a couple of Greek girls”—and yet, in that phrase, the film’s whole plot finds epigrammatic expression. Fascinated with speed and sex, the men who pursue both often wind up endangered, injured, or dead; Nick’s “pow” is not only the thrill of moving at maximum speed, and the thrill of orgasm, but also a forecast of the explosion that ends the film, itself only a hyperbolization of the film’s earlier small explosions. The script’s mythological and biblical references contrast a modern world without values and a heroic past whose heroism is now rendered, in the fragments of fables we hear, as empty actions almost devoid of meaning.

In one of the film’s many small brilliant touches, a boxing promoter sees Hammer and tries to get him to bet on his latest fighter. Hammer suggests that the promoter will ultimately have the fighter throw his big fight, as he had in fact done in the past, because there’s more gambling money to be made that way. The promoter replies, “not this one.” Later, near the film’s end, Hammer, drugged with “truth serum,” is tied to a bed and interrogated; he soon manages to outwit and murder his captors. During this section, we hear the sound of the big fight on the radio; at the end, the fighter who had been winning suddenly loses, presumably “throwing” it. This is more than simply another of the venal betrayals that dot the film; it is an example of the way that the film’s quest, for speed, sex, and power, must, since it is a quest without moral basis, ultimately turn back on itself, annihilating all the seekers.

—Fred Camper

KLUTE

USA, 1971

Director: Alan J. Pakula

Production: Warner Bros.; Technicolor; Panavision; running time: 114 minutes; length: 10,240 feet. Released June 1971.

Producer: Alan J. Pakula; co-producer: David Lange; screenplay: Andy K. Lewis, Dave Lewis; assistant director: William Gerritty; photography: Gordon Willis; editor: Carl Lerner; sound: Chris Newman; art director: George Jenkins; music: Michael Small.

Cast: Jane Fonda (Bree Daniel); Donald Sutherland (John Klute); Charles Cioffi (Cable); Roy Scheider (Frank Ligourin); Dorothy Tristan (Arlyn Page); Rita Gam (Trina); Vivian Nathan (Psychiatrist); Nathan George (Lt. Trask); Morris Strassberg (Mr. Goldfarb); Barry Snider (Berger); Anthony Holland (Actor’s Agent); Richard Shull (Sugarman); Betty Murray (Holly Gruneman); Fred Burrell

Klute

(Man in Hotel); Jean Stapleton (Goldfarb's Secretary); Robert Milli (Tom Gruneman); Jane White (Janie Dale); Shirley Stoler (Momma Reese); Mary Louise Wilson (Producer in Ad Agency); Marc Malvin (Assistant Producer in Ad Agency); Jan Fielding (Psychiatrist's Secretary); Antonia Ray (Mrs. Vasek); Robert Ronan (Director in Little Theatre); Richard Ramos (Assistant Director in Little Theatre).

Award: Oscar for Best Actress (Fonda), 1971.

Publications

Books:

Kiernan, Thomas, Jane: An Intimate Biography of Jane Fonda, New York, 1977.
 Kaplan, E. Ann, editor, Women in Film Noir, London, 1978.
 Jeien, Thomas, Jane Fonda: Ihre Filme, ihr Leben, Munich, 1981.
 Erlanger, Ellen, Jane Fonda, Minneapolis, 1981.
 Haddad, G. G., The Films of Jane Fonda, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1981.
 Guiles, Fred, Jane Fonda: The Actress in Her Time, New York, 1982.
 Cole, Gerald, and Wes Farrell, The Fondas, London, 1984.
 Robbiano, Giovanni, Alan Pakula, Firenze, 1985.
 French, Sean, Jane Fonda: A Biography, London, 1998.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 30 June 1971.
 Milne, Tom, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1971.
 Sirkin, Elliot, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1971.
 Houston, Penelope, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1971.
 Rignall, John, in Monogram (London), No. 4, 1972.
 Legrand, Gérard, in Positif (Paris), March 1972.
 Eyles, Allen, "Donald Sutherland," in Films in Review (New York), Autumn 1973.
Cineaste (New York), vol. 11, no. 2, 1981.
 Lovell, Terry, and Simon Frith, "How Do You Get Pleasure? Another Look at Klute," in Screen Education (London), Summer 1981.
 Kornatowska, M., "Eros i cywilizacja," in Kino (Warsaw), August 1985.
 Caputo, R., "Film Noir: 'You Sure You Don't See What You Hear?,'" in Continuum, vol. 5, no. 2, 1992.
 Atkinson, M., "Jane Fonda in Klute," in Movieline (Escondido), vol. 6, April 1995.
 Jönsson, Mats, "Parallax Paranoia: On Alan J. Pakulas amerikanska trilogi," in Filmhäftet (Stockholm), vol. 27, no. 105, 1999.

* * *

Jane Fonda's Academy Award-winning performance as Bree Daniels, a New York prostitute with modeling aspirations, was her latest in a series of roles that paralleled the course of American society. After initially appearing as a cheerleader in Tall Story, Fonda had become increasingly political, prompting the ire of American conservatives by appearing in Tout va bien, made by Jean-Luc Godard, who in A Letter to Jane attacked her for the Hollywood liberalism of Klute. Though Klute did appeal to some early feminist critics who regarded it as a psychologically realistic portrait of a woman's inner conflict, later feminists have discussed it in political terms, finding a subtext which endorses patriarchy.

In an interview in Positif Alan Pakula stated that he regarded the film as similar to a 1940s thriller, a genre that he could use for his own purposes. In fact, Klute possesses several film noir characteristics, both in style and content, but Pakula shifts the psychological focus from Klute, the detective, to Bree, the intended victim. Klute's attempts to discover the identity of the killer pale in comparison to Bree's efforts at self-discovery, which are aided by a female psycho-therapist. Thus the film is generically both film noir thriller and a psychological thriller, and the audience identifies with Bree, a developing character whose inner conflict torments her, not with Klute, the static and reticent male.

Bree wants to leave "the life," which ironically gives her control and independence, for modeling, but the audition with its "lineup" and depersonalization, seems to offer only a different "life." When Klute, the small-town friend of a murder victim, pursues the identity of the murderer, he seems to offer her another option, love and its accompanying dependence; for he comes to love and protect her. Ironically, his love and protection further endanger her, and as she relinquishes control to Klute, she nearly loses her life. Like Cable, the murderer, Klute poses a real threat, though it is more psychological than physical. At one point Bree attacks Klute with scissors and twice flees from him to her ex-pimp, only to find that prostitution itself involves dependency and, eventually, death. Just as Klute represents an appeal to dependency and loss of control, Cable, the murderer, represents control in the form of detachment. Neither Bree nor Cable is emotionally involved in sex, which becomes an act by which each wields power, and both wish to be emotionally numb. Even their voices, as rendered on the tape recorder, seem similar. Although the stereotypical roles of detective and criminal are antithetical, Klute and Cable actually have a great deal in common, thereby reinforcing the image of Klute as a threat to Bree. After the tape recorder is played in rural Pennsylvania, Klute appears in New York; and both men use similar methods, though for different purposes.

Just as Klute and Cable can be viewed as dramatic projections of the forces within Bree's mind, her apartment may also represent herself. She is spied on in her apartment, which is subsequently and brutally penetrated by Cable; Bree's semen-soaked underpants suggest that Cable, too, sees his action as rape. When she leaves her apartment and sleeps with Klute, she also leaves her "self" and becomes dependent on him. At the end of the film she and Klute leave her apartment, which is empty, except for the ringing telephone, her link with the "johns" and her therapist. Her furnishings, that which made the apartment "hers," are gone; and she may be empty of her past, ready to acquire Klute's furnishings, his values, his life, his identity.

Though Cable's death and Bree's decision to leave dark, claustrophobic New York for the sunlight of rural Pennsylvania imply that she has opted for love and dependence, Pakula does create some ambiguity. She has told her analyst that she will probably be back next week for an appointment, but that verbal message does not carry the weight that the visual one does: standing in the empty apartment, she is wearing the same clothes she wore at the beginning of the film. Bree may have chosen love and dependency for the present, through the efforts of the female therapist who has encouraged that choice, but the choice is not without personal cost.

—Thomas L. Erskine

KNIFE IN THE WATER

See N"Z W WODZIE

KOMISSAR

(The Commissar)

USSR, 1967

Director: Alexander Askoldov

Production: Gorky Studios; colour, Cinemascope; running time: 108 minutes. Not released until 1988, following an unscheduled screening at the Moscow Film Festival.

Producers: V. Levin, V. Grigorev, L. Prilutzkaya; screenplay: Alexander Askoldov, based on the novel In the Town of Berdichev by Vasily Grossman; photography: Valery Ginsburg; editors: V. Isayeva, N. Loginova, S. Lyashinskaya; assistant directors: B. Dokuchaev, G. Balinskaya; art director: Sergei Serebrennikov; music: Alfred Shnittke; sound: V. Sharoy, E. Bazanov, L. Benevolskaya.

Cast: Nonna Mordyukova (Claudia Vavilova); Rolan Bykov (Yefim); Raisa Niedashkovskaya (Maria); Vasily Shuskin (Commander).

Awards: Silver Bear, Berlin 1988.

Publications

Books:

Russian Critics on the Cinema of Glasnost, Michael Brashinsky and Andrew Horton, ed., Cambridge, 1994.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 5 August 1987.

Wolf, W., and A. Williamson, "Askoldov!," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1988.

Carlisle, O. A., American Film (Washington D.C.), June 1988.

Reynaud, B., and F. Strauss, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1988.

Johnson, Brian D., "Glasnost on Screen," in Maclean's (Toronto), 26 September 1988.

Navailh, F., in Cinéma (Paris), October 1988.

Delmas, G., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), November-December 1988.

Derobert, J., in Positif (Paris), December 1988.

Brub, R.-C., in Séquences (Montreal), January 1989.

Menashe, Louis, in Cineaste (New York), 1989.

Glaessner, V., in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1989.

Sherwood, Pippa, "The Russian Restitution," in Films and Filming, no. 415, May 1989.

Batchan, A., Cineaste (New York), 1989.

Stishova, E., "Passions over Commissar" in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), October 1990.

Navailh, F., "Le drapeau rouge et les gants blancs," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Perpignan, France), no. 67, December 1997.

* * *

When director Aleksandr Askoldov completed his first and only feature, The Commissar, in 1967, it was immediately banned and he was blacklisted as a film director. In December of 1987, in an atmosphere of glasnost, The Commissar was permitted a showing in Moscow and soon received international attention and critical praise. The film, based on the story "In the Town of Berdichev" by Vasily Grossman, is about love, war, maternity and betrayal, and presents a frightening foreshadowing of the Holocaust.

The pregnant commissar of a Red Army unit, Klavdia Vavilova, enters the town of Berdichev at the head of her battalion in 1922 and shoots a deserter who had escaped home to his wife. While occupying the town, this hard-edged, dedicated Bolshevik must tell her second-in-command that she must leave the Army because she is pregnant. The home of a Jewish tinsmith and his wife, mother-in-law and six children is commandeered for her confinement, and the commissar and her baby become assimilated into this family. A friendship develops between Klavdia and Raisa, the tinsmith's wife, and both begin to adopt characteristics of the other. After her baby is born, the commissar becomes nurturing, gentle, and protective of her child, while, Raisa, the tinsmith's wife, begins to assert her individuality. Realizing the fragility of new life and responsibilities of motherhood, Klavdia questions whether the consequences of war are too costly for her to return to battle. She finally decides to resume her duties as commissar and leaves her infant with the Jewish family.

The film has elements of warmth and humor as the tough commissar clashes with the gentle tinker, and as they eventually develop a strong bond. The large loving family represents a nurturing Jewish ethic, which Askoldov contrasts with the uncompromising Russian will to conquer in the name of universal justice. The Jewish family is treated sympathetically, but as William Wolf asserts in Film Comment, "Paying special attention to the persecution of Jews has long conflicted with the Soviet policy of downplaying Jewish identity."

The film was banned due to tension derived from the Soviet Union's troubled history with Jews and Askoldov's refusal to change or remove any part of the film which exposes anti-Semitism and portrays the military unfavorably. Anne Williamson stated in Film Comment (May/June 1988): "In 1967, just as Israel had triumphed in the Six Day War, Askoldov was finishing the edit on The Commissar, which sympathetically portrays a Jewish family. Soviet censors realized that scenes like the commissar's vision of the future Holocaust and of the Magazanik family being led to the gas chambers hinted darkly at a connection between Nazism and Russian anti-Semitism and could possibly remind audiences of Stalin's appeasement of Hitler." In addition to the powerful flash forward of the family members trudging along to their impending terrifying demise, the film includes a disturbing child's fantasy of a pogrom. As Louis Menashe suggests in Cineaste, 1989, "What appears to be Askoldov's preference for humanism over Bolshevism probably contributed to official wrath toward the film."

The Commissar was produced at the Gorky Studio, which rejected the finished product as its "greatest political and esthetic failure." Askoldov was fired for incompetence and the film was destroyed. But Gorbachev's policy of glasnost led to a revolution in Russia's film industry and many blacklisted films reemerged. In May, 1986, conservatives were ousted from the leadership of the Soviet Filmmakers Union and control over the movie industry shifted from the state bureaucracy to the union's new leaders—directors whose films had been shelved in the past. Askoldov was given permission to search for his film in the state archives, and he found a print in a damp cellar. The black-and-white film had been partially destroyed, but Askoldov restored it by piecing together various copies.

The Commissar is visually striking and incorporates features of Askoldov's great predecessors. Williamson identifies a brilliant metaphor in the cross-cutting of soldiers and sees Vsevolod Pudovkin's sense of realism as Klavdia struggles to push a cannon up a hill of sand and in the birth sequence. The rhythm and energy of Sergei Eisenstein are evoked in the scene of the caravan in which the commissar's revolutionary lover dies a gallant death. Brian Johnson notes in his article in Maclean's (26 September 1988): "Askoldov broke the fetters of the socialist realism that prevailed at the time of the film's release with fluid camerawork and dreamlike scenes of cavalry horses galloping riderless across a battlefield." The clarity of the images and varying pace of editing offers moments enhanced by an excited tempo as well as those reserved for reflection and contemplation.

—Kelly Otter

KONGI'S HARVEST

Nigeria, 1970

Director: Ossie Davis

Production: Calpenny-Nigeria Films Ltd (Nigeria); color; running time: 85 minutes. Released 1970.

Producers: Francis Oladele, Arthur Dubons, and Lennart Berns; screenplay: Wole Soyinka, from his own play; assistant directors: Dandy E. Oyegunle and Tunde Adeniji; photography: Åke Dahlquist; editors: Sharon Sachs, Jerry Gränsman, and Gboyega Arulogun; sound: Bo Abrahamsson; art directors: D. Lindersay and J. K. Ogunbiyi; costumes: Danny Moquette, Agbo Folarin, Ayo Aderemi, and Fadeke Akinwunmi.

Cast: Wole Soyinka (Kongi); Rashidi Onikoyi (Oba Danlola); Banjo Solaru (Sarumi); Femi Johnson (Organising Secretary); Nina Baden-Semper (Segi); Dapo Adelugba (Daodu); Orlando Martins (Dr. Gbenge); Wale Ogunyemi (Dende).

Publications

Books:

- Soyinka, Wole, Kongi's Harvest, London, 1967.
 Gibbs, James, Kongi's Harvest by Wole Soyinka (typescript), Kenneth Library, University of Ibadan, n.d. (c. 1969).
 Gibbs, James, Study Guide to Kongi's Harvest, London, 1973.
 Gibbs, James, Wole Soyinka, Basingstoke, London, 1986.
 Ekwuazi, Hyginus O., Film in Nigeria, 2d ed., Jos, Nigeria, 1991.

Articles:

- Davis, Ossie, "When Is a Camera a Weapon?" in New York Times, 20 September 1970.
 "People," in West Africa, no. 2821, 1971.
 Soyinka, Wole, "Class Discussion," in In Person: Achebe, Awoonor, and Soyinka at the University of Washington, edited by Karen L. Morell, Seattle, Washington, 1975.
 Soyinka, Wole, "Theatre and the Emergence of the Nigerian Film Industry," in The Development and Growth of the Film Industry in Nigeria: Proceedings of a Seminar on the Film Industry and Cultural Identity in Nigeria, edited by Alfred E. Opubor and Onuora E. Nwuneli, Lagos and New York, 1979.
 Gugler, Josef, "Wole Soyinka's Kongi's Harvest from Stage to Screen: Four Endings to Tyranny," in Canadian Journal of African Studies, vol. 31, 1997.

* * *

Kongi's Harvest is an important film because it is the most significant attempt to date to take a play by Wole Soyinka—Africa's preeminent playwright and winner of the Nobel Prize in 1986—to the screen. Soyinka's eponymous play was the first of several to denounce tyranny, and was perhaps the most distinguished aesthetically. Kongi's Harvest analyzes the degeneration of personal rule in independent Africa and satirizes the resulting tyranny in terms of the confrontation between a populist politician and a traditional ruler. When Kongi's Harvest was first performed in Nigeria in 1965 it was topical: just a few years after independence authoritarian one-man regimes had imposed themselves in a number of African countries. By the time the film was released in 1970, such regimes had become common throughout the region.

Kongi's Harvest is, as the playwright put it, a play "about Power, Pomp and Ecstasy": the power of autocratic president Kongi, the pomp of detained king Danlola, the ecstasy of Segi and Daodu who oppose the dictator. It is one of Soyinka's finest plays. The film, unfortunately, must be considered a failure. It follows the play closely in most respects but falls far short of its accomplishments and betrays it in the end. Still, it conveys Soyinka's bitter satire of the recurrent features of dictatorships—the sycophants surrounding the dictator, the dictator's megalomania, the ideological isms invoked to justify absolute-ism, the propaganda blared at the population, the repression of dissent, and the economic concomitants of such political features: mismanagement and corruption.

The film was directed by the distinguished African-American actor Ossie Davis, who appears as narrator in the early scenes. He had come to Nigeria full of enthusiasm to direct what was to be one of the very first major motion pictures produced in Africa South of the Sahara by an African film company, Francis Oladele's Calpenny-Nigeria Films. Arthur DuBow of Herald Productions had raised the funds in the U.S. and Lennart Berns of Omega Film in Sweden had furnished the crew. The film never had much exposure. In the 1970s, New Line Cinema provided limited distribution in the United States, before the film was withdrawn from distribution altogether. By now it has all but disappeared. (It may be seen at the Film Archives of the Institute of African Studies at the University of Ibadan, Nigeria.)

The film conveys the pageantry of a Yoruba royal court: the royal drums, the royal dance and chant, most strikingly the praise song to the king, in Yoruba. And it departs from the play to take advantage of the opportunities the medium offers. It presents an aerial view of Ibadan, the largest metropolis in tropical Africa until the 1950s, including street and market scenes, preparations for the festival, a motorcade with motorcycle outriders, a street barricade, the famous Olumo rock in Abeokuta, the dictator's militia singing and drinking, Oba Danlola's large retinue, and a masquerade of the Yoruba Gelede. It adds scenes of Daodu and Segi visiting a shrine at the palace of the Alafin of Oyo, and of Kongi enacting a last supper with his twelve advisors.

The production of Kongi's Harvest suffered from its low budget, reported at a pitiful $300,000. The photography is amateurish, the editing poor, the sound-track bad. The stage experience of the actors in Kongi's Harvest turned out to be a handicap for most. Soyinka's script, while quite inspired in places, remained too beholden to the rich dialogue of his play. Endless cross-cutting and the absence of sustained dramatic sequences make the film appear disjointed. As for Ossie Davis, he had no formal training and little experience as a director. In 1969, he had been offered a role in Cotton Comes to Harlem and had wound up directing it. At that time he had a $1.2 million budget, but now he was operating with a much lower budget, in a foreign environment, and a very difficult one at that. In short, the film does not do justice to the magnificent play. Soyinka has gone so far as to disown the film altogether, even though he had written the script and acted, in a fine display of self irony, the role of Kongi. We are left to speculate about his reasons. He may have wanted to dissociate himself from the failed enterprise. He clearly was concerned about the political implications of the play. Probably most importantly, the film's ending drastically departed from Soyinka's script.

When the play was first performed in Nigeria in 1965 there was no doubt that Kongi stood for Kwame Nkrumah, the president of Ghana, whose regime had degenerated over the years and exhibited the very traits castigated by Soyinka. But when Nkrumah was overthrown in 1966 to popular acclaim, Soyinka, like many intellectuals, refused to join the anti-Nkrumah crowd that gathered once he was overthrown. Nkrumah had been—and Soyinka now argued should continue to work as—the foremost leader for African emancipation, socialism, and unification.

The ending of the film diverges altogether from both Soyinka's play and his film script. The tyrannicide succeeds, but in the final scene Dr. Gbenge, the leader of the opposition, is seen taking on the dictator's role, repeating the very same megalomaniac slogans: "The will of the State is supreme, destiny has entrusted in our hands the will of the State, the will of the State is supreme." The film thus presents a stunning reversal. This makes for a dramatic ending, and it emphasizes the point that power corrupts—a recurrent theme in Soyinka's work. However, the eclipse of the process of moral renewal that might be expected to come with a new revolutionary regime seems all too cynical. Indeed, the author has cautioned us against such a simplistic approach. He has Segi observe that, at some point in the past, "Kongi was a great man." Likewise we should expect Dr. Gbenge to have a time of greatness before his regime deteriorates.

The change in the ending of Kongi's Harvest would appear not to have been acceptable to Soyinka. He has emphasized that the film does not correspond to his script, and the film, contrary to the U.S. distributor's blurb, does not credit the script to Soyinka, or anybody else for that matter. We may surmise that the film's cynical, circular view of history, or perhaps just African history, was meant to appeal to the intended U.S. audience. It is subject to charges of conservatism and racism. Ossie Davis is a most unlikely target for such charges. Soyinka has commented, with respect to anglophone African cinema, on producers' subservience to financial sponsors and the potential U.S. audience and on their dominant position vis-à-vis editors, and he has complained that Kongi's Harvest had been "badly butchered" by the overseas (i.e. U.S.) partners of Calpenny Productions. Presumably that's where the playwright, script writer, and lead actor puts the blame. It would appear that the U.S. sponsors short-changed the production of a major play by the preeminent African playwright with insufficient financing and insisted on subverting the authorial intent.

—Josef Gugler

KONYETS SANKT-PETERBURGA

(The End of St. Petersburg)

USSR, 1927

Director: Vsevolod Pudovkin

Production: Mezhrabpom-Russ; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 110 minutes; length: 8202 feet. Released 1927.

Screenplay: Nathan Zarkhi, from the poem "The Bronze Horseman" by Pushkin and the novel St. Petersburg by Andrey Biely; photography: Anatoli Golovnya and K. Vents; art director: S. Kozlovsky.

Cast: A. P. Chistyakov (Worker); Vera Baranovskaya (His wife); Ivan Chuvelov (Ivan, a peasant); V. Chuvelov (Friend from the village); V. Obolensky (Lebedev, Steel Magnate); A. Gromov (Revolutionary); Vladimir Tzoppi (Patriot); Nikolai Khmelyov and M. Tzibulsky (Stockbrokers).

Publications

Books:

- Korolevich, V., Vera Baranovskaya, Moscow, 1929.
- Yezuitov, N., Pudovkin, "Pouti Tvortchevstva," Les Voies de la création, Moscow, 1937.
- De La Roche, Catherine, and Thorold Dickinson, Soviet Cinema, London, 1948; New York, 1972.
- Mariamov, A., Vsevolod Pudovkin, Moscow, 1952.
- Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.
- Schnitzer, Luda and Jean, Vsevolod Poudovkine, Paris, 1966.
- Amengual, Barthélemy, V. I. Poudovkine, Lyons, 1968.
- Schnitzer, Luda and Jean, and Marcel Martin, Cinema in Revolution: The Heroic Era of the Soviet Film, New York, 1973.
- Rimberg, John, The Motion Picture in the Soviet Union 1918–1952, New York, 1973.
- Dart, Peter, Pudovkin's Films and Film Theory, New York, 1974.
- Cohen, Louis Harris, The Cultural-Political Traditions and Developments of the Soviet Cinema 1917–1972, New York, 1974.
- Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey One: The Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

- Taylor, Richard, The Politics of the Soviet Cinema: Nineteen Seventeen to Nineteen Twenty-Nine, New York, 1979.
- Marshall, Herbert, Masters of the Soviet Cinema: Crippled Creative Biographies, London, 1983.
- Masi, Stefano, Vsevolod I. Pudovkin, Florence, 1985.
- Zorkaya, Neya, Illustrated History of the Soviet Cinema: Nineteen Seven to Today, New York, 1989.
- Youngblood, Denise J., Soviet Cinema in the Silent Era: 1919–1934, Ann Arbor, 1985, 1991.
- Kenez, Peter, Cinema & Soviet Society: 1917–1953, New York, 1992.

Articles:

- Close Up* (London), April 1928.
- New York Times*, 31 May 1928.
- Variety* (New York), 6 June 1928.
- Potamkin, Harry A., “Pudovkin and the Revolutionary Film,” in Hound and Horn (New York), April–June 1933.
- Leyda, Jay, “Index to the Creative Work of Vsevolod Pudovkin,” in Sight and Sound (London), November 1948.
- “Pudovkin Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August–September 1953.
- Weinberg, Herman, “Vsevolod Pudovkin,” in Films in Review (New York), August–September 1953.
- Macdonald, Dwight, “Eisenstein and Pudovkin in the Twenties,” in On Movies (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey), 1969; as On Movies (New York), 1981.
- “Pudovkin Issue” of Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), February 1973.
- Hudlin, E., “Film Language: Pudovkin and Eisenstein and Russian Formalism,” in Journal of Aesthetic Education (Urbano, Illinois), No. 2, 1979.
- Burns, P. E., “Linkage: Pudovkin’s Classics Revisited,” in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Summer 1981.
- Sasin, O., “Konec Sankt-Peterburga,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 8, August 1987.
- Sonnenberg, B., “Aelita, Queen of Mars, Others from U.S.S.R.,” in Nation, vol. 254, 9 March 1992.
- Caruso, U.G., “La Madre/La fine di San Pietroburgo/Tempete sull’Asia,” in Cineforum (Bergamo), vol. 33, no. 5(325), June 1993.
- Smith, M., “The Influence of Socialist Realism on Soviet Montage: The End of St. Petersburg, Fragment of an Empire, and Arsenal,” in Journal of Ukrainian Studies, vol. 19, no. 1, 1994.
- Kepley, V., Jr., “Pudovkin and the Continuity Style: Problems of Space and Narration,” in Discourse (Detroit), no. 17.3, Spring 1995.

* * *

Pudovkin made The End of St. Petersburg in 1927 for the tenth anniversary of the Soviet Revolution. From an earlier conception of the film as a 200-year history of St. Petersburg and its changing political climate, Pudovkin focused instead on the struggle for that city at the time of the Revolution. As in Mother, Pudovkin charted the developing awareness of the (mass) protagonist from political naiveté to Marxist consciousness. The film’s distinction is in the conjunction of this personal mode of Marxist analysis with two other major points of reference: the St. Petersburg cityscape itself and its representation in the Russian literary tradition; and Pudovkin’s theoretical writings (Film Technique and Film Acting), particularly on the role of editing.

The portrayal of a protagonist who interacts with the animated architecture of St Petersburg follows in the tradition of Pushkin’s poem “The Bronze Horseman” and Andrey Biely’s symbolist novel St. Petersburg, written in 1910–11 but set during the unsuccessful rebellion in 1905. Pudovkin superimposes a Marxist interpretation on Pushkin’s Bronze Horseman, the “Soul of Russia.” Through editing, he causes the statue to cry during the bombardment of the Czar’s Winter Palace. Biely’s vivid city geometry becomes in the film a maze of revolutionary activity. Pudovkin shifts the major site of conflict from the homes of the workers (in Biely) to the foundries in which they work. The realism of the photographic image would serve him well, allowing him to rely on the spectator’s familiarity with the architecture of the city. He vivifies the city’s monumental buildings and squares (as well as its famous statues), lending credibility to his political narrative. The tradition of romanticized urbanism, from Dickens through Griffith, takes on a Marxist ideological thrust in The End of St. Petersburg.

Pudovkin conveys the revolutionary and urban themes through precise techniques of editing, which he had codified in Film Technique. His re-assemblage of filmed reality recalls Constructivism in its tight integration of form and content. The camera records real space and time; the director creates filmic space and time through editing. Pudovkin called this the “linkage” of the film strips, “brick by brick.” Kuleshov had taught him the importance of the legibility of individual shots when trying to emphasize the relationships among shots. Pudovkin would elaborate important details and eliminate others, often stressing the metaphorical nature of a particular detail. It is the editing that gives the film its strong metaphorical potential.

The various ways in which Pudovkin alternates these details in the editing gives the film its distinctive rhythm. He establishes oppositions, cutting for contrast between day and night, as well as between large open spaces and claustrophobic interiors. He inserts ironic inter-titles to contrast with visual images. Most significantly, he employs parallel editing to contrast static shots with dynamic activity. Pudovkin maintains this rhythm throughout the film, often cutting on human movement to provide fluid continuity.

Pudovkin’s conception of the mass hero would unfortunately set the pattern for what would become the official aesthetic of Socialist Realism. His cinematic dynamization of St. Petersburg would remain a more enduring contribution.

—Howard Feinstein

---

KÖRKALEN

(The Phantom Chariot)

Sweden, 1921

Director: Victor Sjöström (Seastrom)

Production: Svensk Bio; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 120 minutes; length: 5 reels, 6122 feet. Released 1 January 1921. Re-released in a re-edited version in America in 1922. Filmed 1920 in Sweden.

Screenplay: Victor Sjöström (Seastrom), from the novel by Selma Lagerlöf; photography: Julius Jaenzon; art directors: Aleksander Bako and Axel Esbensen.

Körkale

Cast: Victor Sjöström (David Holm); Hilda Borgstrom (His wife); Astrid Holm (Sister Edith); Tor Weijden (Gustafsson); Tore Svenberg (Georg); Concordia Selander (Edith's mother); Lisa Lundholm (Sister Maria); Olaf Aas (Coachman); Nils Aréhn (Prison chaplain).

Publications

Books:

- Charenso, Georges, 40 ans de cinéma nordique 1895–1935, Paris, 1935.
 Hardy, Forsyth, Scandinavian Film, London, 1951.
 Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, Den Svenska Filmens Drama: Sjöström och Stiller, Stockholm, 1952.
 Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, Classics of the Swedish Cinema, Stockholm, 1952.
 Waldenkranz, Rune, Swedish Cinema, Stockholm, 1959.
 Jean, Rene, and Charles Ford, Sjöström, Paris, 1963.
 Cowie, Peter, Swedish Cinema, London, 1966.

“Sjöström,” in Anthologie du cinéma I, Paris, 1966.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, Cinema, the Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey One; The Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Barsacq, Léon, Caligari's Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.

Ellis, Jack C., A History of Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.

Forslund, Bengt, Victor Sjöström, New York, 1988.

Cowie, Peter, Scandinavian Cinema: A Survey of the Films and Filmmakers of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, London, 1992.

Articles:

Potamkin, M. C., “The Golden Age of Scandinavian Film,” in Cinema (London), September 1930.

Idestam-Almquist, Bengt, “Victor Sjöström,” in Biografbladet (Stockholm), Summer 1950.

Turner, Charles L., “Victor Sjöström,” in Films in Review (New York), May and June 1960.

- Bagh, Peter von, "Seikkailu ajassa," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 8, 1987.
- Wiklund, K., "Sett I medvetsloshetens ogonblick," in Filmrutan (Sundsvall), vol. 30, no. 3, 1987.
- Cremonini, G., "Il carretto fantasma di Victor Sjoström," in Cineforum (Bergamo), vol. 34, no. 339, November 1994.
- Florin, B., "Korkarlen: en stilstudie," in Filmhäftet (Stockholm), vol. 23, no. 1/2, 1995.
- DeBartolo, J., "Video Tape Reviews," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 242, August 1995.
- Florin, B., "Camouflaged Technique: Optical Transitions in the Films of Victor Sjöström," in Lahikuva, no. 3, 1995.
- "La charrette fantôme," in Télérama (Paris), no. 2367, 24 May 1997.

* * *

Although it was made more than 60 years ago, The Phantom Chariot is still considered to be a film remarkable for its sophisticated narrative structure. Though flashbacks were not unheard-of narrative devices in the cinema of that time, The Phantom Chariot was not understood by many audiences, and had to be re-edited to facilitate comprehension. The narrative is developed according to a mise-en-abyme construction, wherein flashback issues from flashback, and stories are contained by or within other stories. Audiences of the time were sufficiently educated viewers, cinematically speaking, to grasp one temporal level of flashback description, but beyond that had some difficulty in deciphering further narrative complexities.

The articulation of the different temporal layers in the film serves to fill out its penultimate meaning (the ultimate one being concerned with repentance and redemption of the soul), which has to do with the notion that time is multi-dimensional and multi-perspectival. In La Jetée, Chris Marker pursues this concept, and in doing so suggests that the Western world's current perception of time is not only too restrictive but needlessly fatal as well. In The Phantom Chariot David Holm, the main character, is "given another chance" at life via a "non-linear" portal, the point at which the time cycle begins and also can be arrested; in this case it is New Year's Eve.

Most of the filmic narrative actually takes place or at least is generated in a cemetery where David Holm and two drinking buddies are getting ready to toast the incoming year. A shot of a nearby clock tower lets us know that it is 20 minutes to midnight. Then David Holm tells a story about how one gets to be driver of "the phantom chariot." The tale has it that any man who breathes his last at the stroke of midnight before the beginning of a new year must then take over the ghastly chore of gathering up departed souls during the coming year. Another shot of the clock tower reveals that ten minutes have elapsed during the telling of this story within the diegesis of the film. A policeman comes along to ask David if he would please come and visit Edith, a salvation army nurse who had once been kind to him and is now dying of consumption. He refuses, then fights with his two companions. They knock him out and leave quickly, presuming him dead. A magnificent superimposition of David Holm's spirit leaving his body follows. At that moment the phantom chariot arrives, driven by an old drinking buddy, Georg, who has died the previous New Year's Eve at precisely midnight.

The narrative then proceeds through a series of flashbacks: we see how David Holm met Georg, and that Georg was a bad influence on him, encouraging him to drink heavily and consequently mistreat his wife and two young children; we are introduced to Edith and the Salvation Army Mission where David Holm stayed after being released from prison and finding that his wife had left him.

Returning to the cemetery once again, the film is now three fourths complete (or roughly an hour and a half into the total viewing time), and Georg has one last soul to collect—David Holm's. But, according to the time registered by the clock tower in the film it is midnight, ten minutes after David Holm had finished telling the story about the phantom chariot. Georg ties up his body with invisible yet binding rope and loads him into the carriage. David Holm's spirit rides up front with Georg as they ride to the house where Edith is about to die. Georg also "shows" David Holm that his wife is about to take her own life as well as the lives of their children. At the moment of Edith's death, David Holm breaks down into tears, praying desperately to God for another chance in life so that he can prevent the death of his innocent family. An abrupt cut back to the cemetery shows him waking up, his body and spirit intact. He rubs his head and eyes for an instant, then gets up—a bit shakily at first, for he is still drunk from all the liquor he has consumed this New Year's Eve. He arrives home just in time to stop his wife from going through with the fatal poisonings.

In 1920, "zero-degree" writing or a "zero-degree" narrative structure was still 40 odd years away from being invented, yet The Phantom Chariot is clearly an example of just such a representational construct.

—Sandra L. Beck

KOROL LIR

(King Lear)

USSR, 1971

Director: Grigori Kozintsev

Production: Lenfilm: black and white, 35mm, scope; running time: 140 minutes; length: 12,500 feet. Released 1971, USSR. Filmed 1970 in the USSR.

Producer: Grigori Kozintsev; screenplay: Grigori Kozintsev, from Boris Pasternak's translation of the play by William Shakespeare; photography: Jonas Gritsius; sound: Eduard Vanunts; production designer: Yevgeny Yenei (Jenöcek Jenei); sets: Vsevolod Ulitko; music: Dmitri Shostakovich; costume designer: Suliko Virsaladze.

Cast: Yuri Yarvet (King Lear); Elsa Radzinya (Goneril); Galina Volchek (Regan); Valentina Shendrikova (Cordelia); Oleg Dal (The Fool); Karl Sebris (Earl of Gloucester); Leonard Merzin (Edgar); Regimantas Adomaitis (Edmund); Vladimir Emelyanov (Earl of Kent); Alexander Volkach (Duke of Cornwall); Alexei Petrenko (Oswald); Yumas Budraitis (King of France); Donatas Banionis (Duke of Albany).

Publications

Books:

- Kozintsev, Grigori, Shakespeare: Time and Conscience, New York, 1966.
- Eckert, Charles, editor, Focus on Shakespearian Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.
- Rapisarda, Guisi, editor, La Feks: Kozintsev e Trauberg, Rome, 1975.
- Kozintsev, Grigori, King Lear: The Space of Tragedy: The Diary of a Film Director, Berkeley, 1977.
- Liehm, Mira, and Antonin Liehm, The Most Important Art: East European Film After 1945, Berkeley 1977.
- Leaming, Barbara, Grigori Kozintsev, Boston, 1980.
- Buchman, Lorne Michael, From the Globe to the Screen: An Interpretive Study of Shakespeare Through Film, Ann Arbor, 1984.

Articles:

- Barteneva, Yevgeniya, "One Day with King Lear," in Soviet Film (Moscow), no. 9, 1969.
- Yutkevitch, Sergei, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1971.
- Filmfacts* (New York), No. 24, 1971.
- International Film Guide*, London, 1972.
- Tatarkiewicz, A., and Z. Pitera, in Kino (Warsaw), March 1972.
- Koltain, T., in Filmkultura (Budapest), May-June 1972.
- "Er widmete sein Talent der Revolution," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), September 1973.
- Marienstras, R., "Deux versions du Roi Lear," in Positif (Paris), April 1974.
- Welsh, James M., "To See Feelingly: King Lear Through Russian Eyes," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1976.
- Hodgdon, B., "Kozintsev's King Lear," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Fall 1977.
- Hodgdon, B., "Two King Lears: Uncovering the Filmtext," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), July 1983.
- Radliff-Umstead, "Order and Disorder in Kozintsev's King Lear," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), October 1983.
- Schmalz, W., "Pictorial Imagery in Kozintsev's King Lear," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), April 1985.
- Parker, R.B., "The Use of Mise-en-scene in Three Films of King Lear," in Shakespeare Quarterly, vol. 42, no. 1, Spring 1991.
- Angulo, J., "El rey Lear," in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 8, February 1992.
- Daems, J., "Wijsheid in waanzin," in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 441, April 1994.

* * *

Korol Lir was the last film of Kozintsev's long career, which began with the delirious experimentalism of the early 1920s and ended with two towering adaptations of Shakespeare. His version of Hamlet is probably the better-known of the two, but some critics have considered his Lear even finer. In its austere grandeur the film conveys, more effectively perhaps than any stage production could ever do, the majestic stature of the play, extending it to its utmost range without in the least distorting it. Kozintsev's Lear remains, with all its gritty strength, still very much Shakespeare's Lear.

"This is not the story of one man," Kozintsev commented; "everything occurs among many other people." His aim is to place Lear in context, showing that the schemes and caprices of royalty bring disaster not only to themselves, but also to the whole nation. In the opening sequence a meandering procession of ragged vagabonds (immediately recalling the line of suppliants winding through the snow in Ivan the Terrible) make their painful way to Lear's castle. Later, as war and destruction rage across the stark landscape, the entire populace of Britain seems to have been reduced to such scurrying wretchedness, with the king himself merely one among their number. The closing scenes take place amid the scorched and shattered ruins of Dover, whose inhabitants continue while Lear dies to forage gloomily among the rubble, indifferent to one more death after so many.

Pictorially the film is consistently superb. Kozintsev deploys his widescreen monochrome photography to impressive effect, creating panoramic compositions which echo the elemental forces unleashed by the play. In one vivid overhead shot, the camera even seems to become one with the elements as it glares down on the cowering figures of Lear and the Fool stumbling blindly across the storm-swept heath. At other times it identifies with the king in his changing moods, sweeping vertiginously upwards with him to the mad heights of the battlements, or panning slowly across a darkening horizon as if in apprehension of the coming storm.

In the title role, the Estonian actor Yuri Yarvet is imaginatively cast: a diminutive, bird-like man with quick eyes, he seems at first almost childishly unfitted for kingship, yet by the end of the film has acquired a touchingly frail nobility, transcending his own inadequacies as he gains in understanding. The other roles are equally individually characterised, drawing on a wealth of personal detail, from the gossipy fussiness of Gloucester to the Fool's crop-haired innocence. Pasternak's sinewy translation audibly recaptures, even for those with no Russian, the rhythms and inflection of Shakespeare's verse; while in its power and energy, Shostakovich's music (the last of his many outstanding film scores) perfectly complements Kozintsev's epic conception of the play.

There are no compromises in Korol Lir. In its visual style it is thoroughly Russian, very much Kozintsev. (The hand of the director of New Babylon, 40 years earlier, is clearly evident.) It conforms to a Marxist reading of the text, but without being in any way doctrinaire, nor perverting Shakespeare's intentions. Along with Kurosawa's Throne of Blood, and Kozintsev's own Hamlet, it provides a rare example of a Shakespeare film that succeeds in being at once superb cinema and superb Shakespeare.

—Philip Kemp

KOSHIKEI*(Death by Hanging)

Japan, 1968

Director: Nagisa Oshima

Production: Sozo-sha and A.T.G.; black and white, 35mm, Vistavision size; running time: 117 minutes. Released 1968, Japan. Cost: 10 million yen.

Koshikei

Producers: Masayuki Nakajima, Takuji Yamaguchi and Nagisa Oshima; screenplay: Tsutomu Tamura, Mamoru Sasaki, Michinori Fukao and Nagisa Oshima, from a newspaper story; assistant director: Kiyoshi Ogasawara; photography: Yasuhiro Yoshioka; editor: Sueko Shiraishi; sound: Hideo Nishizaki; sound effects: Akira Suzuki; production designer: Jusuo Toda; music: Hikaru Hayashi.

Cast: Kei Sato (Officer in charge of the execution); Fumio Watanabe (Official educator); Yun do-Yun (R); Mutsuhiro Toura (Doctor); Hosei Komatsu (Prosecutor); Akiko Koyama (Woman); Toshiro Ishido (Priest); Masao Adachi (Security officer); Masao Matsuda (Official witness).

Awards: Kinema Junpo's Best Screenplay Prize and one of Kinema Junpo's Best Films of 1968.

Publications

Script:

Oshima, Nagisa, and others, Koshikei, in Sekai no Eigasakka no. 6: Nagisa Oshima, Tokyo, 1972.

Books:

Sato, Tadao, Oshima Nagisa no sekai [The World of Nagisa Oshima], Tokyo, 1973.

Mellen, Joan, Voices from the Japanese Cinema, New York, 1975.

Cameron, Ian, and others, Second Wave, New York, 1975.

Mellen, Joan, The Waves at Genji's Door, New York, 1976.

Bock, Audie, Japanese Directors, New York, 1978; revised edition, Tokyo, 1985.

Burch, Noël, To the Distant Observer: Form and Meaning in the Japanese Cinema, Berkeley, 1979.

Oshima, Nagisa, Ecrits (1956–1978): Dissolution et jaillissement, Paris, 1980.

Tessier, Max, editor, Le Cinéma japonais au présent 1959–1979, Paris, 1980.

Sato, Tadao, Currents in Japanese Cinema, Tokyo, 1982.

Magrelli, Enrico, and Emanuela Martini, Il rito, il rivolta: Il cinema di Nagisa Oshima, Rome, 1984.

Polan, Dana B., The Political Language of Film and the Avant-Garde, Ann Arbor, 1985.

Danvers, Louis, and Charles Tatum, Nagisa Oshima, Paris, 1986.

Oshima, Nagisa, Cinema, Censorship, and the State: The Writings of Nagisa Oshima, 1956–1978, translated by Dawn Lawson, Cambridge, 1992.

Nagib, Lúcia, Em torno da nouvelle vague japonesa, Campinas, 1993.

Turim, Maureen Cheryn, The Films of Oshima Nagisa: Images of a Japanese Iconoclast, Berkeley, 1998.

Articles:

Tessier, Max, "Entretien avec Oshima," in Cinéma (Paris), no. 140, 1969.

Bory, Jean-Louis, in Nouvel Observateur (Paris), 29 September 1969.

Niogret, Hubert, in Positif (Paris), October 1969.

de Baroncelli, Jean, in Monde (Paris), 4 October 1969.

Tournes, Andrée, in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), November-December 1969.

Cameron, Ian, "Nagisa Oshima," in Movie (London), Winter 1969–70.

Gardies, René, in Image et Son (Paris), February 1970.

"Entretien avec Oshima," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1970.

International Film Guide 1971, London, 1970.

Corbucci, G., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), January-February 1972.

Scheplern, P., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), December 1972.

Heath, Stephen, in Screen (London), Winter 1976–77.

Image et Son (Paris), September 1978.

Polan, Dana, "Politics as Process in Three Films by Nagisa Oshima," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Fall 1983.

Polan, Dana, "Politics as Process in Three Films by Nagisa Oshima," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 11, no. 1–2, Fall-Winter 1986–87.

Santos Fontenla, C., in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 11, January 1993.

* * *

Death by Hanging is an excellent example of the marriage of Oshima's stylistic experiments to his thematic concerns. Inspired by the true story of a Korean youth condemned and hanged for raping and murdering two Japanese girls, Oshima confronts us with the problems of discrimination against Koreans in Japan, the protagonist's discovery of his own identity, nationalism and the function of the state, and the relationship of imagination and reality.

Oshima cleverly arranges a situation in which the execution of R (identified by his initial to symbolize all Koreans in Japan) fails, or, as a written title explains, "body of R refuses to die." The dismayed officers try to stimulate his memory by reenacting the roles of R and the people around him, while R, in a state of amnesia, keeps asking them naive questions, thus confronting the officers and the audience with fundamental problems—for example, the meaning of the state, the definition of a "Korean." Through their discussions and actions, the executioners' prejudice, their dishonorable past lives as war-criminals, their sexual frustrations, and blind faith in the authorities are revealed. The poverty and internal struggles of R's family are also illustrated, as is the historical context of Japanese importation of Koreans as forced laborers.

The intensity of the mise-en-scène is related to the closed and fixed space of the set of the execution ground. This set's artificiality and claustrophobic atmosphere (partly necessitated by the film's low budget) is marvellously contrasted with the open space, natural light and sound of the outdoor sequences. When the film returns to the original prison setting, it becomes more abstract and surrealistic.

One victim's body, which is visible to the audience from the beginning, is recognized by the officers one by one, and finally it comes to life as a symbolic "sister" of R. Her role is to agitate R politically, and awaken in him his identity as a Korean in Japan. R then refuses to be executed, condemning the nation as murderers if the execution is carried out. Finally, although he believes he is innocent, R returns to be executed, accepting it for "all the R's in the world." However, the scene with the empty noose after the execution conveys the idea that the authorities are not capable of executing R.

The Japanese authorities, and Oshima's ideological position in relation to them, are represented by the director's favourite symbol, the national flag in which the rising sun appears black (because the film is black-and-white). The flag appears on the wall, frequently behind the faces of the public prosecutor and R.

Oshima also employs various experimental methods. Single actions are portrayed twice from different angles. Hand-written titles accompanied by discordant music are used to divide the film into sequences or to express the protagonist's emotions. The continuity of action between shots is intentionally broken during the first half of the film. The characters, particularly R, often talk to the camera directly. Oshima's ideological concerns require this Brechtian style.

The film's primary purpose is to provoke the audience through the visual and auditory images. It was not, despite winning the highest critical acclaim, commercially successful in Japan.

—Kyoko Hirano

KOZIYAT ROG

(The Goat Horn)

Bulgaria, 1971

Director: Métođi Andonov

Production: Studiya za igralni filmi (Sofia, Bulgaria); black and white, 35mm, wide-screen; running time: 105 minutes, some versions 95 minutes; length: 2824 meters. Released February 1972. Filmed 1971 in Bulgaria.

Screenplay: Nikolai Haitov, from the short story by Nikolai Haitov; photography: Dimo Kolarov; editor: Evgeniya Radeva; sound: Mithen Andreev; production designer: Konstantin Dzhidrov; music: Siméon Pironkov; song: Maria Neikova; special effects pyrotechnics: Ivan Angelov; costume designer: Vladislav Schmidt; stunts: Petar Klyavkov.

Cast: Katya Paskaléva (Maria); Anton Gorchev (Karaivan); Kliment Denchev, Stefan Manrodiev, Todor Kolev, Marin Yanev (Turk rapists); Milén Pénev (The Shepherd); Nevena Andonova (Maria as a girl); Krasimira Petrova (Turk's wife); Ivan Obretenov (Poor man); Ivan Yanchev (Man with scar).

Awards: Bulgarian Film Festival at Varna, Prize of the Audience, 1972; Chicago Film Festival, Silver Hugo (2nd prize), 1973.

Publications

Book:

Liehm, Mira, and Antonin Liehm, The Most Important Art: East European Film After 1945, Berkeley, 1977.
Holloway, Ronald, The Bulgarian Cinema, Cranbury, 1986.

Articles:

Ignatovski, V., in Kinoizkustvo (Sofia), March 1972.
Variety (New York), 16 August 1972.
Ivasiuc, A., in Cinema (Bucharest), September 1972.
Kopanevova, G., in Film a Doba (Prague), October 1972.
Cowie, Peter, in International Film Guide (London), 1973.
Malina, Martin, in Montreal Star, 27 January 1973.
Greenspun, Roger, in New York Times, 3 April 1973.

Cinéma (Paris), May 1973.
Mruklik, B., in Kino (Warsaw), May 1973.
Variety (New York), 30 May 1973.
Van Gelder, Lawrence, in New York Times, 23 August 1973.
Gomiscek, T., in Ekran (Ljubljana), no. 9–10, 1979.
Grozev, Aleksandr, "Metodi Andonov," in Kinoizkustvo (Sofia), vol. 37, no. 3, March 1982.
Young, D., "The Goat Horn (Kozijat rog)," in Variety (New York), vol. 360, 7/13 August 1995.

* * *

One of the most successful Bulgarian films ever made and probably the best known abroad, Koziyat rog was based on a legend that was first retold and later worked into a short story by Nikolai Haitov. He emerged in the 1960s as one of the most popular of Bulgarian writers, especially famous for his descriptions of the people and traditions in the somewhat isolated and "wild" regions of the Rhodope mountains in the southern part of the country. The screenplay drifted yet further from the historical and psychological accuracy in search of a larger truth, that of a shattering human tragedy. An introductory title ("This bloody story happened in the XVII century. It starts with an act of violence.") makes apparently intentional the shift from the original story of blood revenge to a more ambitious study of the devastating chain-reaction effect of violence on man's soul—which gradually becomes the film's main theme.

In parallel with the thematic evolution is a formal development: the film discards what was perhaps considered a "more cinematic" dramatization, with flashbacks and intriguing tension, for a straightforward narration with very sparse dialogue and a more predictable yet moving plot. Katya Paskaleva gives a memorable performance in the roles of both shepherd Karaivan's wife, raped and eventually killed by a band of Turks, and their daughter Maria, who is brought up by her father to be a man and to seek revenge, but who falls in love and commits suicide after Karaivan kills her lover. The bold treatment of sex and violence made the film a box-office record-breaker, while the critics praised its rhythm, stark black-and-white photography and its inherent Bulgarian-ness. It touched, no doubt, a very intimate chord in the collective consciousness of a country in which the last hundred years of its independence had been painfully dominated by the consequences of a fierce Ottoman oppression, threatening at times its very existence.

The song from the film, with lyrics added, became a hit, and ten years after the film's release the short story was successfully made into a ballet at the National Opera and Ballet Theatre in Sofia. Koziyat rog is now widely recognized by Bulgarian critics and public alike as not only the best screen adaptation of Haitov's work and the best film of director Metodi Andonov (whose untimely death in 1974 put an end to a promising career) but also as a landmark in Bulgarian cinema, one that raised its prestige for a generation of film-goers and helped to move it to the forefront of the country's contemporary culture.

—Dimitar Bardarsky

KWAIDAN

See K Aidan

L.A. CONFIDENTIAL

---

USA, 1997

Director: Curtis Hanson

Production: Monarchy Enterprises B.V. and Regency Enterprises; distributed by Warner Brothers; 35mm, Technicolor; DTS/Dolby Digital; running time: 136 minutes; length: 3915 meters (approx. 12836 feet). Released May 14, 1997, France (Cannes Film Festival), September 5, 1997, Canada (Toronto Film Festival), September 19, 1997, U.S.A. Filmed in Hollywood, West Hollywood, and Los Angeles, California; cost: $35,000,000.

Producers: Curtis Hanson, Brian Helgeland, Dan Kolsrud, Arnon Milchan, Michael G. Nathanson, and David L. Wolper; screenplay: Brian Helgeland and Curtis Hanson, from the novel by James Ellroy; photography: Dante Spinotti; assistant directors: Jim Goldthwait, Heather Kritzer, Linda Montanti, and Drew Ann Rosenberg; editor: Peter Honess; sound: SoundStorm; art director: William Arnold; production designer: Jeannine Oppewall; costume designer: Ruth Myers; music: Jerry Goldsmith.

Cast: Kevin Spacey (Jack Vincennes); Russell Crowe (Bud White); Guy Pearce (Ed Exley); James Cromwell (Dudley Smith); Kim Basinger (Lynn Bracken); Danny DeVito (Sid Hudgeons); David Strathairn (Pierce Patchett); Ron Rifkin (D.A. Ellis Loew); Matt McCoy (Brett Chase); Graham Beckel (Dick Stensland); Amber Smith (Susan Lefferts).

Awards: Oscars for Best Supporting Actress (Kim Basinger) and Best Adapted Screenplay, 1998; Australian Film Institute Best Foreign Film Award, 1998; Golden Globe for Best Supporting Actress (Kim Basinger), 1998; London Critics Circle Awards for Director of the Year, Film of the Year, Screenwriter of the Year, and Supporting Actor of the Year (Kevin Spacey), 1998; Los Angeles Film Critics Association Awards for Best Cinematography, Best Director, Best Picture, and Best Screenplay, 1998; National Board of Review Awards (U.S.A.) for Best Director and Best Picture, 1998; National Society of Film Critics Awards (U.S.A.) for Best Director, Best Film, and Best Screenplay, 1998; New York Film Critics Circle Awards for Best Director, Best Film, and Best Screenplay, 1998.

Publications

Script:

Helgeland, Brian, and Curtis Hanson, L.A. Confidential: The Screenplay, New York, 1997.

Books:

Ellroy, James, L.A. Confidential, New York, 1997.

Articles:

Lane, Anthony, "L.A. Confidential," in The New Yorker, 22 September 1997.

Denby, David, "L.A. Confidential," in New York, 29 September 1997.

Ansen, David, "The Neo-Noir '90s," in Newsweek (New York), 27 October 1997.

Taubin, Amy, "L.A. Lurid," in Sight and Sound (London), November 1997.

Wrathall, John, "L.A. Confidential," in Sight and Sound (London), November 1997.

Lyons, Donald, "L.A. Confidential," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1997.

Arthur, Paul, "L.A. Confidential," in Cineaste (New York), Summer 1998.

* * *

Prior to the release of L.A. Confidential, director Curtis Hanson spent nearly 30 years learning the movie business, working as an actor, writer, producer, and director. He eventually earned a reputation as a skilled craftsman, as evidenced by lightly regarded but well made genre films such as Bad Influence (1990), The Hand that Rocks the Cradle (1992), and The River Wild (1994). Just as the old studio system provided filmmakers with the opportunity to hone their craft, so too did Hanson's time as a director for hire heighten his filmmaking abilities. By the time Hanson took on L.A. Confidential, he was poised to make the leap from workmanlike director to filmmaker par excellence; the result was a film that is widely considered the best neo-noir since Chinatown (1974).

Masterfully adapted from James Ellroy's novel of the same name, L.A. Confidential is set in Los Angeles in 1953. As the opening voice-over narration kicks in we see a montage of gorgeous Southern California shots. The stage for what follows is set by Sid Hudgeons (Danny DeVito), a sleazy tabloid reporter for Hush-Hush magazine: "Life is good in Los Angeles. It's paradise on earth. That's what they tell you anyway. Because they're selling an image. They're selling it through movies, radio and television. . . . You'd think this place was the garden of Eden, but there's trouble in paradise." And indeed there is. The film follows the lives of three Los Angeles police officers, Bud White (Russell Crowe), Jack Vincennes (Kevin Spacey), and Ed Exley (Guy Pearce), as they try to unravel the mystery of the Night Owl Cafe massacre, in which several people, including White's former partner Dick Stensland (Graham Beckel), were shot dead during what was ostensibly a robbery gone bad.

The story is a complicated, densely layered mystery that deepens at every turn. The three protagonists are all different personalities with unique motivations, but as they chase down their leads their investigations begin to cross until it becomes clear that each is after the same thing: the search for a “truth” that, when discovered, will also serve as a means for personal redemption. Along the way the story seamlessly blends fiction with historical fact, involving crooked cops, Los Angeles mobster Mickey Cohen, his bodyguard Johnny Stompanato (Lana Turner’s real life lover, who her daughter shot and killed), hookers surgically altered to resemble movie stars (Kim Basinger’s turn as Lynn Bracken, a luminous Veronica Lake look-alike, won her an Academy Award for Best Supporting Actress), and Pierce Patchett (David Strathairn), a shadowy businessman loosely based on Walt Disney. But the backdrop for it all, and in many ways the star of the picture, is Hanson’s vision of Los Angeles in the 1950s. This isn’t the L.A. of our dreams, but Raymond Chandler’s L.A., the weary town behind the facade. Beautifully shot by Dante Spinotti, the promise of Los Angeles as a land of milk and honey is exposed as false, just another in a long line of sun drenched Hollywood fabrications. Beginning with the opening montage and including meticulously detailed period recreations such as the Night Owl Cafe, a neighborhood liquor store, and the Frolic Room bar, Hanson’s Los Angeles perfectly embodies an American Eden gone awry.

The various individual investigations eventually lead to Captain Dudley Smith (James Cromwell), a L.A.P.D. institution who has all along been orchestrating a behind-the-scenes takeover of the jailed Mickey Cohen’s rackets. Vincennes’ discovery costs him his life, while White and Exley, who for most of the film are arch-enemies, finally join forces to face down Smith and his men in an apocalyptic gunfight at the hellish Victory Motel. Neo-noirs often try to capture the feel of Classical Hollywood Noirs, which were shot in black and white, but most fall short for either one or both of two reasons: first, the play between shadow and light normally just isn’t as effective in color, and, second, most are set in the recent present, while Classical Noir narratives are inextricably rooted in the nuclear paranoia and McCarthyism of America in the late 1940s and early 1950s. L.A. Confidential ingeniously gets around both common shortcomings. Its taking place in 1953 neatly connects it to the Noirs of yesteryear, as does its cinematography; while the daylight scenes are awash in light, giving them a saturated look that contributes to the overall sense of decay, the nighttime scenes are shot in such a way as to highlight the contrast between light and dark. The best example of this technique is the shoot-out at the Victory Motel, during which White and Exley hole up in a dark hotel room in an attempt to fend off Smith’s men. As the barrage of gunfire from the outside hits the walls of the room, each succeeding bullet hole provides an opening for another shaft of ethereal blue light to pierce the darkness. Although not a movie that influenced an onslaught of neo-noirs in its wake, L.A. Confidential is among the best of its kind.

In addition to being an exemplary genre film, L.A. Confidential is one of the best critically received films ever. In fact, as of 2000, it is the only film in history to have won the best picture and the best director awards from the four major American film critics associations, the National Board of Review, the New York Film Critics Circle, the Los Angeles Association of Film Critics, and the National Society of Film Critics. It was also extremely well received internationally, both in theatrical release and on the film festival circuit. Unfortunately, although nominated for nine Academy Awards, L.A. Confidential had the misfortune of being released in the same year as Titanic, the most financially successful film ever. However, even though it was Titanic that walked away with the major awards at the 1998 Oscars, Titanic will be remembered as a well made but maudlin special effects film, while L.A. Confidential will be remembered as a masterpiece of its kind and the film that marked Curtis Hanson as a major Hollywood director.

—Robert C. Sickels

THE LACEMAKER

See LA DENTELLIERE

LADIES OF THE BOIS DE BOULOGNE

See LES DAMES DU BOIS DE BOULOGNE

LADRI DI BICICLETTA

(The Bicycle Thief)

Italy, 1948

Director: Vittorio De Sica

Production: Produzioni De Sica; black and white, 35mm; running time: 90 minutes. Released 1948. Filmed in Rome.

Producer: Umberto Scarpelli; screenplay: Cesare Zavattini with Oreste Biancoli, Suso Cecchi d’Amico, Vittorio De Sica, Adolfo Franci, Gherardo Gherardi, and Gerardo Guerrier, from a novel by Luigi Bartolini; photography: Carlo Montuori; editor: Eraldo da Roma; production designer: Antonino Traverso; music: Alessandro Cicognini.

Cast: Lamberto Maggiorani (Antonio Ricci); Enzo Staiola (Bruno Ricci); Lianella Carell (Maria Ricci); Elena Altieri; Gino Saltamerenda; Vittorio Antonucci; Giulio Chiari; Michele Sakara; Carlo Jachino; Nando Bruno; Fausto Guerzoni; Umberto Spadaro; Massimo Randisi.

Awards: New York Film Critics Award, Best Foreign Film, 1949; Belgium World Festival of Film and Arts, Grand Prix, 1949; Festival of Film at Locarno, Social Prize, 1949; Special Oscar as Most Outstanding Foreign Film, 1949.

Publications

Script:

Zavattini, Cesare, and others, The Bicycle Thief, New York, 1968.

Books:

Castello, G.C., Il cinema neorealista italiano, Turin, 1956.
Rondi, Brunello, Il neorealismo italiano, Parma, 1956.

Ladri di biciclette

Ferrara, Giuseppe, Il nuovo cinema italiano, Florence, 1957.
 Hovald, Patrice G., Le Néo-Realisme italien et ses créateurs, Paris, 1959.
 Bazin, André, Qu'est-ce que le cinéma, Paris, 1962.
 Agel, Henri, Vittorio De Sica, Paris, 1964.
 Leprohon, Pierre, Vittorio De Sica, Paris, 1966.
 Armes, Roy, Patterns of Realism: A Study of Italian Neo-Realist Cinema, New York, 1971.
 Samuels, Charles Thomas, Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.
 Guaraldi-Rimini, Mario, editor, Neorealismo e vita nazionale: Antologia di cinema nuovo, Florence, 1975.
 Mercader, Maria, La mia vita con Vittorio De Sica, Milan, 1978.
Anthologie du cinéma 10, Paris, 1979.
 Bolzoni, Francesco, Quando De Sica era Mister Brown, Turin, 1984.
 Darreta, John, Vittorio De Sica: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1988.

Articles:

Jacobson, Herbert L., "De Sica's Bicycle Thief and Italian Humanism," in Hollywood Quarterly, Fall 1949.
New York Times, 13 December 1949.

Variety (New York), 15 December 1949.
 Zavattini, Cesare, and others, in Ciné-Club (Paris), January 1950.
 Winnington, Richard, in Sight and Sound (London), March 1950.
 Koval, Francis, "Interview with De Sica," in Sight and Sound (London), April 1950.
 Bazin, André, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1954.
 De Sica, Vittorio, in Films and Filming (London), January 1956.
 Chevalier, J., in Image et Son (Paris), December 1956.
 Rhode, Eric, "Why Neo-Realism Failed," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1960–61.
 McVay, Douglas, "Poet of Poverty," in Films and Filming (London), October and November 1964.
 Harcourt, Peter, in Screen Education (London), July-August 1965.
 Leprohon, Pierre, "La Perennité du Voleur de bicyclette," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), December 1967.
 Passek, J.-L., "Le Cinéma du néo-réalisme italien est en berne: Vittorio De Sica," in Cinéma (Paris), January 1975.
 "De Sica Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), September-December 1975.
 "De Sica Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 October 1978.
 La Fuente, L., in Cinéma (Paris), November 1978.

- Lawton, B., "Italian Neo-Realism: A Mirror Construction of Reality," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), no. 2, 1979.
- Carcassonne, P., in Cinématographe (Paris), January 1979.
- "De Sica Issue" of Cahiers Lumière (Paris), November 1980.
- Tomasulo, F. P., "Bicycle Thieves: A Rereading," in Cinema Journal (Chicago), Spring 1982.
- Magny, Joel, in Cinéma (Paris), November 1983.
- Ardanaz, S., "Sin mi Vittorio De Sica no habría pasado a la historia del cine," in Cine Cubano (Havana), 1984.
- Weemaes, G., in Film en Televisie (Brussels), May-June 1984.
- Alix, Y., in Positif (Paris), February 1985.
- "Le voleur de bicyclette de Vittorio De Sica: Decoupage plan a plan et dialogues bilingues," and C. Vasse, "Qui vole une bicyclette. . .," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), no. 430, March 1994.
- Cartier, C. Zavattini, "Le voleur de bicyclette et les problèmes d'écriture: Entretien avec Suso Cecchi d'Amico," in CinémaAction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), no. 70, 1994.
- Toles, George, "This May Hurt a Little: The Art of Humiliation in Film," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1995.
- Serceau, M., "La ville dans le neorealisme," in CinémaAction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), no. 75, 1995

* * *

Before examining the film, it is important to point out that the oft-used English language title "The Bicycle Thief" is misleading and injurious to the meaning of the film. Ladri di biciclette translates as "Bicycle Thieves," the plural marking an allegorical intention. Vittorio De Sica's film suggests a universe inextricably interrelated through perverse economic ties—the bicycle one man needs to work and support his family, another man steals to support his, and still another sells. Singulars will not do in this film. De Sica presents the story in terms of a man's relation to a crowd, but this crowd is more than just a picturesque background. It is the modern equivalent of a Greek chorus and represents both the higher and lower aspects of human character. It is an extension of the protagonist.

Ricci, the victimized worker, emerges from this crowd at the beginning of the film, called to work after months of unemployment, but his accession to the status of modern tragic hero is a matter of random choice and necessity, not of birth, self-determination, or desire. For a while, endowed with the promise of a steady salary and the ability to once again be the breadwinner in his family, Ricci is permitted to dream of material success. When he retrieves his bicycle from the municipal pawnshop, exchanging for it the family linen, the camera pans up, following the clerk as he climbs to deposit the sheets on what seems a pile of thousands of similar bundles. Ricci is not the exception—like the traditional tragic hero—he is the rule, one of thousands or more. Searching desperately all over the city, he will again encounter this societal chorus; as workers readying a strike; as the denizens of a black market; as a mass of poor people praying in a church; as a crowd lamenting a drowned child; as a gang of toughs in a crowded street protecting a local boy from Ricci's accusations; as a pack of football fans who thwart Ricci's feeble attempt to steal a bicycle himself in a rash, despairing decision to reject moral restraint; and finally, as an anonymous, everyday crowd, walking, going about their business peacefully, hopefully—the crowd to which Ricci is returned.

Ricci's relation to society, in general, and the political and economic situation of postwar Italian society in particular, is reflected by a series of encounters with crowds to which the protagonist's membership is cyclically articulated at the beginning and end of the film. In Crowds and Power, Elias Canetti offers a taxonomy of such groups: "baiting crowds" intent on blood; "prohibition crowds"; "feast crowds"; the "lamenting pack"; and the "hunting pack." Most importantly, the activities of these crowds are to be historically construed.

One significance of Ladri di biciclette, and to a larger extent that of neo-realism, then, lies in the predominance of the role of representation, not only of those inexhaustible details of everyday existence, but also of popular life in all its diversity. Still, Ladri di biciclette does not explore the area of popular, political action. Any solidarity among people in the film is a matter of personal friendship (between Ricci and the sanitation workers who help him search Rome in their truck) or that between father and son. The effectiveness of political struggle to improve the inequitable economic conditions at fault here is not considered beyond the brief glimpse of the strike preparations.

The story was brought to De Sica's attention by Cesare Zavattini, screenwriter for the film and one of the seven who adapted the novel by Luigi Bartolini; yet, no film adaptation was ever so disrespectful of its original as this one. Bartolini's protagonist is not a man brought forward from the crowd, a man like any other, he is a disgruntled and supercilious artist who opines the most reactionary prejudices about the poor. Moreover, in order to find his stolen bicycle, the protagonist gets about on a second one which apparently he kept around for just such emergencies.

De Sica and Zavattini use the bicycle as a "vehicle" to organize the narrative. The theft of a bicycle authorizes a wide search through Rome; hence, the narrative discloses itself as an odyssey structure (there are interesting parallels between Ricci and Ulysses, too). The filmmakers' immense capacity to introduce metaphor into the most everyday context and the puissance of that metaphor (we recall the white stallion in Sciuscià) becomes clear when we attempt to bracket the idea of the bicycle. For example, if we substitute a worker's tool box for the bicycle, the narrative loses much of its momentum, its mythical implications, and even part of its effectiveness as a tragedy.

Veteran actor De Sica's talent for molding the raw material of the non-professional actor is prominently displayed. He knew it would be difficult for the trained actor to forget his/her highly coded technique to become the man in the street. He felt that better results were to be obtained by teaching the non-actor just enough to serve the purposes of the scene being shot. Compare, for example, the latitude of his actors with those of Visconti's in La terra trema. In that film, the non-professionals are stiff and gesturally inarticulate; their inexperience tends to stand in the way of a heightened dramatic communication. In the other hand, De Sica's actors signal physically a greater alertness and sensitivity to their immediate problems and awareness of the social and psychological conformations of their characters. Ricci was played by Lamberto Maggiorani, a factory worker who had brought his small son to audition for the role of Bruno; his wife Maria (Lianella Carell) was a journalist who had approached the director for an interview. Bruno (Enzo Staiola), the last cast member to be found, was watching the shooting when De Sica noticed him. The scene in which Ricci takes his son to a trattoria in order to make up for having scolded him involves some of the most subtly nuanced and believable expression of a father-son relationship in the history of cinema.

—Joel E. Kanoff

THE LADY EVE

USA, 1941

Director: Preston Sturges

Production: Paramount; black and white; running time: 94 minutes; length: 8,421 feet. Released March 1941.

Producer: Paul Jones; screenplay: Preston Sturges, from a story by Monckton Hoffe; photography: Victor Milner; editor: Stuart Gilmore.

Cast: Barbara Stanwyck (Jean); Henry Fonda (Charles); Charles Coburn (“Colonel” Harrington); Eugene Pallette (Mr. Pike); William Demarest (Muggsy); Eric Blore (Sir Alfred McGlennan Keith); Melville Cooper (Gerald); Martha O’Driscoll (Martha); Janet Beecher (Mrs. Pike); Robert Greig (Barrows); Dora Clement (Gertrude); Luis Alberni (Pike’s Chef).

Publications

Script:

Sturges, Preston, The Lady Eve, in Five Screenplays, edited by Brian Henderson, Berkeley, 1986.

Books:

Springer, John, The Fondas: The Films and Careers of Henry, Jane and Peter Fonda, New York, 1970.

Ursini, James, The Fabulous Life and Times of Preston Sturges, An American Dreamer, New York, 1973.

Smith, Ella, Starring Miss Barbara Stanwyck, New York, 1974; revised edition, 1985.

Vermilye, Jerry, Barbara Stanwyck, New York, 1975.

Kerbel, Michael, Henry Fonda, New York, 1975.

Cavell, Stanley, Pursuits of Happiness: The Hollywood Comedy of Remarriage, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1981.

Cywinski, Ray, Satires and Sideshows: The Films and Career of Preston Sturges, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

Gordon, James R., Comic Structure in the Films of Preston Sturges, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

Fonda, Henry, and Howard Teichman, Fonda: My Life, New York, 1981.

Godl Goldstein, Norm, Henry Fonda: His Life and Work, London, 1982.

Curtis, James, Between Flops: A Biography of Preston Sturges, New York, 1982.

Thomas, Tony, The Films of Henry Fonda, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1983.

Di Orio, Al, Barbara Stanwyck, New York and London, 1983.

Cywinski, Ray, Preston Sturges: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.

Dickens, Homer, The Films of Barbara Stanwyck, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1984.

Cole, Gerald, and Wes Farrell, The Fondas, London, 1984.

Roberts, Allen, and Max Goldstein, Henry Fonda: A Biography, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1984.

Dickos, Andrew, Intrepid Laughter: Preston Sturges and the Movies, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1985.

Wayne, Jane Ellen, Stanwyck, New York, 1985.

Spoto, Donald, Madcap: The Life of Preston Sturges, New York, 1990.

Jacobs, Diane, Christmas in July: The Life & Art of Preston Sturges, Berkeley, 1994.

Rozgonyi, Jay, Preston Sturges’s Vision of America: Critical Analyses of Fourteen Films, Jefferson, 1995.

Harvey, James, Romantic Comedy in Hollywood From Lubitsch to Sturges, New York, 1998.

Articles:

New York Times, 26 February 1941.

Variety (New York), 26 February 1941.

Motion Picture Herald (New York), 1 March 1941.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1941.

Times (London), 19 May 1941.

Today’s Cinema (London), 21 May 1941.

Kracauer, Seigfried, “Preston Sturges; or, Laughter Betrayed,” in Films in Review (New York), February 1950.

Farber, Manny, and W. S. Poster, “Preston Sturges: Success in the Movies,” in Film Culture (New York), no. 26, 1962.

Houston, Penelope, “Preston Sturges,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1965.

Corliss, Richard, in Cinema (Beverly Hills), Spring 1972.

Rubinstein, Eliot, “The End of Screwball Comedy . . .,” in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Spring-Summer 1982.

Interview with William Demarest, in Classic Images (Indiana, Pennsylvania), February 1984.

Cavell, Stanley, in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Autumn 1985.

Comuzio, Ermanno, “L’uso della retorica in Lady Eva di Preston Sturges,” in Cineforum (Bergamo), vol. 26, no. 259, November 1986.

Tobin, Yann, in Positif (Paris), December 1986.

Di Battista, M., “The Lady Eve and the Comedy of Innocence,” in Motion, no. 1, 1986.

Denby, D., “Adam and Eve on a Luxury Liner,” in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 5, October 1991.

Lippe, R., “Cukor and Garbo,” in CineAction (Toronto), no. 35, 1994.

Hietala, V., “Lady Eve/Nainen Eeva,” in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 6, 1995.

* * *

The Lady Eve—arguably the most completely satisfying of the brilliant but uneven series of comedies Sturges made for Paramount in the 1940s—is structured upon a thematic complex that transcends authorial and generic boundaries and is deeply rooted in the sexual politics of our culture. The most obvious parallels are with Cukor’s Two-Faced Woman (made the same year), Hitchcock’s Vertigo, and Minnelli’s On a Clear Day You Can See Forever, but a serious critical inquiry into the ways in which the thematic has been treated intelligently and progressively would inevitably lead one also to the films Sternberg made with Dietrich.

The theme is that of the problem of female identity within a patriarchal culture, wherein men have the power of definition; or, more precisely, the male’s attempts to construct a female identity that will flatter his ego, the woman’s resistance to that construction, and the relationship between the constructed image and the reality. In the four films cited, the woman either assumes (The Lady Eve, Two-Face Woman, Vertigo) or reveals (On a Clear Day) an alternative identity, and the man falls in love with a romantic and/or erotically fascinating image which can never be possessed in actuality (in Sturges, Cukor and Hitchcock, because it is a false and deliberate construction, in Minnelli because it existed only in the distant past, in the heroine's earlier incarnation). All these films, then, probe the relationship between romantic love and the male ego, the man's desire not for an actual woman but for a projection of his fantasy which would perfectly fulfil his desire but for the slight disadvantage that it has no real existence and must remain forever inaccessible. Sturges suggests this brilliantly in the love speech that Fonda delivers to Stanwyck in both her identities, believing her to be two different women, repeating its clauses verbatim: he is not addressing a woman so much as his own fantasy of her.

The Lady Eve

Two-Faced Woman offers the closest parallels to The Lady Eve, but Vertigo provides a particularly fascinating comparison, the relationship being that of simultaneous complement and inversion. One is a tragedy, the other a comedy; one is told almost exclusively from the male viewpoint, the other predominantly from the woman's. In

Vertigo the woman's deceptive masquerade occupies the first part of the film, in The Lady Eve the second. Despite the fact that it was made sixteen years earlier (and without wishing to postulate any causal connection), one is tempted to think of The Lady Eve as "Revenge of Vertigo." The generic difference is partly determined by the point of view: told from the male viewpoint, The Lady Eve could no longer be a comedy (Hawks's comedies of male humiliation—Bringing Up Baby, I Was a Male War Bride, Man's Favorite Sport?—are made possible by the fact that romantic love has no place in his imaginative universe). Most of the film's humor is dependent on the woman's control of situations, and even apparently marginal gags (Eugene Pallette's percussive response to the lateness of his breakfast) arise from the deflation of male power.

Vertigo, although narrated from the male position, is not of course an endorsement of it: from the moment at which identification is interrupted (Kim Novak's flashback), it becomes a devastating critique of the male obsession with total domination and possession known in our culture as "romantic love." Vertigo is built upon our identification with the male gaze, its assumption of dominating/controlling the action, and the gradual recognition that it controls nothing, that the illusion of control is a product of the (culturally constructed) male ego. In the comic mode, the critique offered by The Lady Eve is scarcely less devastating. Here Jean/Stanwyck has control of the gaze from the outset, literally holding Fonda's image and actions (unbeknownst to him) in the palm of her hand—reflected in the mirror of her compact. And she is permitted to retain this control throughout most of the film, losing it temporarily only at the turning-point (her exposure as a professional cardsharp) and triumphantly regaining it in her masquerade as “the Lady Eve.” Cukor's original version of Two-Faced Woman (which should now be made generally available for reassessment—prints exist) offers very close parallels, the whole point of the bowdlerized version (after the film's condemnation by the Catholic Legion of Decency) being that it restores control to the male, thereby ruining the whole conception at a blow.

Sturges's use of star personas/personalities is masterly. Stanwyck's combination of streetwise toughness (she was often cast in proletarian roles) and a capacity for intense suffering—a combination central to her distinguished career in the woman's melodrama—adds depth to her superb comic timing. Fonda's image, developed especially by Ford in Young Mr. Lincoln and Drums Along the Mohawk, compounded of innocence, naiveté and idealism, is here subjected to astringent revision. The “innocence” prevents him from recognizing the sincerity of Jean's feelings, and is shown to be inseparable from an assumption of gender and class superiority, so that we register his chastisement at the hands of “Eve” as at once a just revenge and the necessary prerequisite for his final acceptance of the “real” Jean.

—Robin Wood

THE LADY FROM SHANGHAI

USA, 1948

Director: Orson Welles

Production: Columbia Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 86 minutes. Released 10 June 1948. Filmed for the most part in fall 1946, in Central Park and the Maritime Union Headquarters, New York; the Aquarium and the Chinese Mandarin Theatre, San Francisco; the Walhalla Bar and Cafe, Sausalito; various locations in Acapulco; and aboard the yacht “Zaca” owned by Errol Flynn.

Producers: Orson Welles with Richard Wilson and William Castle; screenplay: Orson Welles, from the novel Before I Die by Sherwood King; photography: Charles Lawton, Jr; editor: Viola Lawrence; sound: Lodge Cunningham; art director: Stephen Goosson and Sturges Carne; music: Heinz Roemheld; special mirror effects: Lawrence Butler; costume designer: Jean Louis.

Cast: Rita Hayworth (Elsa Bannister); Orson Welles (Michael O'Hara); Everett Sloane (Arthur Bannister); Glenn Anders (George Grisby); Ted de Corsia (Sidney Broome); Erskine Sanford (Judge); Gus Schilling (Goldie); Carl Frank (District attorney); Louis Merrill (Jake); Evelyn Ellis (Bessie); Harry Shannon (Cab driver); Wong Show Chong (Li); Sam Nelson (Yacht captain).

Publications

Books:

- Bazin, André, Orson Welles, Paris, 1950; revised edition, Berkeley, 1979.
- Noble, Peter, The Fabulous Orson Welles, London, 1956.
- Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Orson Welles, New York, 1961.
- Cowie, Peter, The Cinema of Orson Welles, London 1965.
- Higham, Charles, The Films of Orson Welles, London, 1965.
- Bessy, Maurice, Orson Welles, New York, 1971.
- McBride, Joseph, Orson Welles, London, 1972; New York, 1977.
- Naremore, J., The Magic World of Orson Welles, New York, 1978.
- Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Ward, editors, Film Noir, Woodstock, New York, 1979.
- Valentinetti, Claudio M., Orson Welles, Florence, 1981.
- Bergala, Alain, and Jean Narboni, editors, Orson Welles, Paris, 1982.
- Andrew, Dudley, Film in the Aura of Art, Princeton, 1984.
- Higham, Charles, Orson Welles: The Rise and Fall of an American Genius, New York, 1985.
- Leaming, Barbara, Orson Welles: A Biography, New York, 1985.
- Parra, Daniele, and Jacques Zimmer, Orson Welles, Paris, 1985.
- Weis, Elisabeth, and John Belton, editors, Film Sound; Theory and Practice, New York, 1985.
- Taylor, John Russell, Orson Welles, A Celebration, London, 1986.
- Bazin, Andre, Orson Welles: A Critical View, Venice, 1991.
- Welles, Orson, This Is Orson Welles, New York, 1993.
- Beja, Morris, Perspective on Orson Welles, New York, 1995.
- Kaplan, E. Ann, Women in Film Noir, London, 1998.
- Taylor, John Russell, Orson Welles, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- Pariante, Roberto “Orson Welles from Citizen Kane to Othello,” in Bianco e Nero (Rome), March 1956.
- “L'Oeuvre d'Orson Welles,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1958.
- Stanbrook, Alan, “The Heroes of Orson Welles,” in Film (London), no. 28, 1962.
- Cowie, Peter, “Orson Welles,” in Films and Filming (London), April 1961.
- “Welles Issue” of Image et Son (Paris), no. 139, 1961.
- “Welles Issue” of Cineforum (Venice), no. 19, 1962.
- “Welles Issue” of Etudes Cinématographiques (Paris), 1963.
- Interview with Everett Sloane, in Film (London), no. 37, 1965.
- Cobos, Juan, Miguel Rubio, and J. A. Pruneda, “A Trip to Don Quixoteland: Conversations with Orson Welles,” in Cahiers du Cinema in English (New York), June 1966.
- Henderson, Brian, “The Long Take,” in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
- Goldfarb, Phyllis, “Orson Welles' Use of Sound,” in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1971.
- Graham, M., “The Inaccessibility of The Lady from Shanghai,” in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Spring 1981.
- West, A., “A Textual Analysis of Lady from Shanghai,” in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Fall 1981-Spring 1982.
- Goldschmidt, D., in Cinématographe (Paris), February 1982.
- Houston, Beverle, “Power and Dis-Integration in the Films of Orson Welles,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1982.
- Albano, L., in Filmcritica (Florence), February 1985.

The Lady from Shanghai

- Moilanen, H., "Aani & vimma, tasta maailmasta," in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 7–8, 1988.
- Nielsen, N. A., "Et allerhovedes perspektiv," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Fall 1989.
- Naremore, James, "Between Works and Texts: Notes from the Welles Archive," in Persistence of Vision (Maspeth), no. 7, May 1989.
- Rampazzoni, Guido, "Cristallisation," in Vertigo (Paris), no. 6–7, 1991. Short review, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), no. 470, April 1991.
- Schactman, K., in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), no. 6, Spring 1992.
- McLean, A. L., "'It's Only That I Do What I Love and Love What I Do': Film Noir and the Musical Woman," in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 33, no. 1, 1993.
- Reid's Film Index* (Wyong), no. 13, 1994.
- Rosenbaum, Jonathan, "The Battle Over Orson Welles," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 22, no. 3, December 1996.
- Tobin, Yann, "Près des yeux, près du coeur: Les gros plans de La Dame de Shanghai," in Positif (Paris), no. 449–450, July–August 1998.

* * *

The Lady from Shanghai can be viewed as a variation on film noir. Set in Orson Welles's peculiar aesthetic and autobiographical mold, it acquires its own autonomy. It makes a self-conscious and intricate use of the frame, and its lush compositions in deep focus push together the foreground and background. The script appears to be written for the purpose of coordinating glaring ruptures breaking the synchrony of image and sound tracks that had prevailed in the studio tradition. The plot develops a play of human figures confined in a closed world of cross purposes. Michael O'Hara (Welles) is victimized in a skein of machinations wrought by Elsa Bannister (Hayworth) in collusion with and against her husband (Sloane), an aging, cane-swaggering cripple who happens to be a brilliant criminal lawyer. Framed by a set of fake self-murders, Welles portrays himself as a tough, soft-hearted, anti-Fascist refugee from the Spanish Civil War, an Irish innocent who adventures through life with resolution and independence. That he is a function of the others shatters his American dream of poetic self-identity.

Simplicity and complication collapse in the mix of narrative and visual composition, the film ostensibly unfolding not for its narrative but to threshold experiment in uncanny renderings of scenes that had become too standard in film noir. Characters are destined to meet and miss each other in what appear to be a photographer's retinal tricks. In the beginning, Welles encounters Hayworth during a carriage ride that is shot with vertical pans isolating and combining the two protagonists in two adjacent photograms. Later, they find themselves framed in backlit tableaux, notably in the sequence shot in the San Francisco aquarium. Close-ups of her sensuous profile and uncanny blonde—not red—chevelure are offset by lurid projections of monstrous fish, groupers swimming just behind Hayworth's face. Narrative turns into a mix of tourism, noir, and comedy. Obtained by the natural back lighting of the aquarium, Chiaroscuro makes Hayworth a playful figure of deceit, or a "phallic" female in a comic mode. Later, in the "Crazy House" of mirrors, the characters are multiplied prismatically as they seek to shoot their images to bits. "If I kill you, I kill myself," murmurs Bannister in close-up exactly where the frame places his reflection against Elsa's. Carnival ensues, bullets shattering mirrors until they finally reach the two spouses. A cinematic potlatch, the finale celebrates and consumes the entire film exactly where it comically displaces the tensions of the protagonist's fatal attraction for the woman who charms him. Relieved, and contrary to the hero of a noir scenario, the narrator slips away from the destruction and into the airy cityscape of San Francisco. "The only way to grow wise is to get old," he predicts, pacing off into the outdoors that eclipse him in light.

High tonal contrasts produce images with razor-sharp outlines. On the one hand, the backlit decor yields chiaroscuro and indeterminate depth of field, while on the other, in the sequences shot off the California coast, the luminosity becomes a crucial element in the story. And Welles shoots from uncanny positions, in extreme tilts and countertilts, less predictable than those used in Citizen Kane, to obtain a total sense of disorientation. His camera establishes intimacy between forms at once in extreme closeup and in great depth. Shots of Hayworth on the rocks off Acapulco isolate her in such extreme depth of field that her body is barely recognizable next to O'Hara's nose in the foreground. As in Renoir or in Welles's earlier work, self-conscious use of optical instruments in the film-images reflected on the convex lenses of binoculars, water tumblers, anamorphic mirrors, windshields—tend to make the objects in frame theorize the visibility of the tale that is being told. And, as usual in the director's visual style, the play within the play mirrors the diegesis in mise-en-abyme. Just prior to the "Crazy House" sequence, Hayworth, who set about to "shanghai" O'Hara, leads the hero into a puppet show in a Chinese playhouse near Union Square. At that moment, in a sudden frenzy, he evades the police after being framed in a kangaroo trial. Elsa and the police seek O'Hara hidden among wizened Oriental spectators in a theater in Chinatown. Gongs and cymbals deafen the ear, dancers turn in stylized motion that signals patent melodrama; Elsa's blonde beauty, seen in closeup, matches her incomprehensible whispers murmured in the ears of her underworld cronies. The sequence doubles both the story and the visual style toward which the film had directed its play of narrative and visual form.

In sum, the viewer is offered the pleasure of seeing cinema extended as neither the studio tradition nor film noir had yet done up to 1947. Welles works within an aesthetic matrix that had already stamped him as a foremost auteur in the movie industry, but his visual and narrative obsessions also inflect cinema in ways unknown up to that time. The film exceeds itself in other ways: it figures in a number of conventions but also works through Welles and Hayworth's own divorce that was taking place as they portrayed themselves in the production. Hayworth's blonde beauty emphasizes the travesty of both the narrative and visual style. The Lady from Shanghai cannot be easily classified. Its genre is its own and must be viewed independently of the high expectations that had been set for viewers since Citizen Kane or The Magnificent Ambersons.

—Tom Conley

LADY OF FORTUNE

See BECKY SHARP

THE LADY VANISHES

UK, 1938

Director: Alfred Hitchcock

Production: Gainsborough; black and white; running time: 96 minutes; length: 8,650 feet. Released 1938.

Producer: Edward Black; screenplay: Sidney Gilliat and Frank Launder, from the novel The Wheel Spins by Ethel Lina White; additional dialogue: Alma Reville; photography: Jack Cox; editor: R. E. Dearing; art director: Alec Vetchinsky; music: Louis Levy.

Cast: Margaret Lockwood (Iris Henderson); Michael Redgrave (Gilbert); Paul Lukas (Dr. Hartz); Dame May Whitty (Miss Froy); Googie Withers (Blanche); Cecil Parker (Mr. Todhunter); Linden Travers (Mrs. Todhunter); Mary Clare (The Baroness); Naunton Wayne (Caldicott); Basil Radford (Charters); Emile Boreo (Hotel Manager); Sally Stewart (Julie); Philip Leaver (Signor Doppo); Selma Vaz Dias (Signora Doppo); Catherine Lacey (The Nun).

Publications

Script:

Gilliat, Sidney, and Frank Launder, The Lady Vanishes, New York, 1984.

Hitchcock, Alfred, editor, The Lady Vanishes, New York, 1988.

Books:

Noble, Peter, An Index to the Creative Work of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1949.

Findlater, Richard, Michael Redgrave, Actor, New York, 1956.

Amengual Barthélemy, and Raymond Borde, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1957.

Rohmer, Eric, and Claude Chabrol, Hitchcock, Paris, 1957.

Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1962.

The Lady Vanishes

Perry, Gerogr, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1965.
 Wood, Robin, Hitchcock's Films, London, 1965, updated 1989.
 Truffaut, François, Le Cinéma selon Hitchcock, Paris, 1966; as Hitchcock, New York, 1985.
 La Valley, Albert J., editor, Focus on Hitchcock, Englewood Cliffs,
 New Jersey, 1972.
 Durgnat, Raymond, The Strange Case of Alfred Hitchcock; or, The Plain Man's Hitchcock, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1974.
 Brown, Geoff, Lauder and Gilliat, London, 1977.
 Yacowar, Maurice, Hitchcock's British Films, Hamden,
 Connecticut, 1977.
 Taylor, John Russell, Hitch, London and New York, 1978.
 Armes, Roy, A Critical History of British Cinema, London, 1978.
 Bellour, Raymond, L'Analyse du film, Paris, 1979.
 Hemmeter, Thomas M., Hitchcock, the Stylist, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.
 Bazin, Andre, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock,
 New York, 1982.
 Narboni, Jean, editor, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.
 Rothman, William, Hitchcock—The Murderous Gaze, Cambridge,
 Massachusetts, 1982.

Villien, Bruno, Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.
 Weis, Elisabeth, The Silent Scream: Alfred Hitchcock's Sound Track, Rutherford, New Jersey, 1982.
 Spoto, Donald, The Life of Alfred Hitchcock: The Dark Side of Genius, New York, 1982; London, 1983.
 Phillips, Gene D., Alfred Hitchcock, Boston, 1984.
 Barbier, Philippe, and Jacques Moreau, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.
 Douchet, Jean, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.
 Deutelbaum, Marshall, and Leland Poague, A Hitchcock Reader,
 Ames, Iowa, 1986.
 Humphries, Patrick, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, Greenwich,
 Connecticut, 1986, 1994.
 Hogan, David J., Dark Romance: Sexuality in the Horror Film,
 Jefferson, North Carolina, 1986.
 Ryall, Tom, Alfred Hitchcock and the British Cinema, London, 1986.
 Kloppenburg, Josef, Die dramaturgische Funktion der Musik in Filmen Alfred Hitchcocks, Munich, 1986.
 Sinyard, Neil, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1986.
 Modleski, Tania, The Women Who Knew Too Much: Hitchcock and Feminist Theory, New York, 1988.
 Sterritt, David, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1993.

Argenteanu, Judy, The Movies of Alfred Hitchcock, Minneapolis, 1994.
 Boyd, David, editor, Perspectives on Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1995.
 Harris, Robert A., Complete Films of Alfred Hitchcock, Secaucus, 1999.

Articles:

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), no. 56, 1938.
Today's Cinema (London), 24 August 1938.
Kine Weekly (London), 25 August 1938.
Variety (New York), 31 August 1938.
Motion Picture Herald (New York), 3 September 1938.
 Whitebait, William, in New Statesman (London), 15 October 1938.
 Nugent, Frank, Jr., in New York Times, 26 December 1938.
 "Hitchcock Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1953.
 Redgrave, Michael, in Sight and Sound (London), January-March 1955.
 "Hitchcock Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August-September 1956.
 Stanbrook, Alan, in Films and Filming (London), July 1963.
 Kael, Pauline, in Kiss Kiss Bang Bang, Boston, 1968.
 French, Philip, in Observer Magazine (London), 28 September 1980.
 Ferzetti, F., in Filmcritica (Florence), January 1981.
 Chion, M., "Chiffre de destinée," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1984.
 Thomas, François, "Subtiliser: Sur trois films anglais d'Alfred Hitchcock," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1984.
 Bikacsy, G., "Londoni randevu," in Filmvilag (Budapest), vol. 29, no. 12, 1986.
 Ferrara, P., "The Discontented Bourgeois: Bourgeois Morality and the Interplay of Light and Dark Strains in Hitchcock's Films," in New Orleans Review, vol. 14, no. 4, 1987.
 Foley, J., "The Lady Vanishes: Notes on Memory in Hitchcock," in Bright Lights (Cincinnati), no. 10, July 1993.
Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 21, 1996.
 Beckman, Karen, "Violent Vanishings: Hitchcock, Harlan, and the Disappearing Woman," in Camera Obscura (Bloomington), no. 39, September 1996.
 Kock, I. de, "De Hitchcock touch (4)," in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 473, July 1997.

* * *

The Lady Vanishes is probably Alfred Hitchcock's most popular film of the 1930s. Scripted by Sidney Gilliat and Frank Launder from a novel, The Wheel Spins (1936), by the best-selling novelist Ethel Lina White, the film was shot in five weeks during the late autumn of 1938. Although the project was originally offered to an American director, Roy William Neill, the film was abruptly cancelled after a Gainsborough film crew, doing some exterior shooting in Yugoslavia, created a minor political furor when the local authorities became nervous about how their native country was to be depicted in the British cinema. The film received new life, however, when Hitchcock read the script, in October 1937, and, after the director made some minor additions, Gainsborough went into almost immediate production.

In spite of the film's popular and financial success, it has fared badly in the hands of the critics. For example, John Russell Taylor described the film as the "lightest and purist of diversions" with little claim on logic or to any deep meaning. Donald Spoto called it a mere divertissement, a cinematic soufflé. Even Raymond Durnat, after a rather lengthy analysis of the film, characterized it as one of Hitchcock's "least substantial." Hitchcock himself, in his interview with François Truffaut, has added to such critical trivializing by concentrating his remarks on the technical experiment of achieving the scene in the dining car with the close-up of the drugged drinks. Yet in spite of such critical evasion there is reason to regard the film as a serious work.

Among the first substantial accounts of the film was the one written by Raymond Durnat in his study The Strange Case of Alfred Hitchcock. Durnat explores the film's contemporary political ramifications and writes about the film as a reaction to the mounting European crisis brought on by the allies' attempt to pacify Hitler at Munich. Durnat's analysis centres on how the various British characters interact with each other in face of a "political" danger. At first unaware of the crisis or self-consciously avoiding it, the various members of the microcosm of British society on the train awaken to the importance of becoming involved in the effort to restrain the forces of evil represented by the German-accented doctor and his uniformed as well as un-uniformed accomplices. Such a sociological reading is not difficult to fathom given the time period of the film and given Hitchcock's preoccupation with spies and spying in his films of the 1930s, such as Secret Agent, Sabotage, and The 39 Steps, and although Durnat's analysis is not particularly sophisticated as political criticism goes, it does help to refute the claim that The Lady Vanishes is undeserving of detailed analysis. It also opens up a wide-ranging and potentially exciting direction for further examination of Hitchcock's films of the 1930s as expressive of a variety of political issues, including a fairly critical examination of British inter-war society.

A far more complex and in many ways more difficult approach to the film has recently emerged as feminist critics, spurred on by the work of Laura Mulvey and Raymond Bellour, and as evidenced in a recent study by Tania Modleski, have come to see Hitchcock's cinema as a fruitful site for exploring the treatment of women in classical cinema. Such an approach focusses less on the realpolitik of the film and concentrates more forcefully on the treatment of the female characters. By shifting the critical focus back to the female protagonist, Iris Henderson (Margaret Lockwood), the analysis of the film returns the critical emphasis to questions of gender, the relationship between female characters, and women as structural agents in the narrative.

The focus of the criticism then becomes less what is happening, and its possible external meanings (Durnat) and more on how the female character has become a cluster of values and ideologies which can be made intelligible by a careful analysis of such things as the disruptive femaleness of Miss Froy (Dame May Whitty), or the mother/daughter combination of Miss Froy and Iris Henderson and how that relationship is modified by the presence of the male protagonist, Gilbert (Michael Redgrave). This approach opens the film to depth psychology and political criticism of the most sophisticated nature.

Although it remains a popular item on film society offerings, its wit still appreciable some 50 years after it was made, The Lady Vanishes also now occupies, along with The 39 Steps, Secret Agent, Sabotage, and the early Man Who Knew Too Much, a central place as a formative Hitchcock film.

—Charles L. P. Silet

LAN FENGZHENG

---

(The Blue Kite)

Hong Kong-China, 1992

Director: Tian Zhuangzhuang

Production: Longwick Film Production, Beijing Film Studio; color; running time: 138 minutes.

Producers: Luo Guiping, Cheng Yongping; screenplay: Xiao Mao; photography: Hou Yong; editor: Qian Lengleng; assistant directors: He Jianjun, Zhang Weiyong; art director: Zhang Xiande; music: Yoshihide Otomo; costumes: Dong Juying.

Cast: Yi Tian (Tietou infant); Zhang Wenyao (Tietou child); Chen Xioman (Tietou teenager); Lu Liping (Mother); Pu Quanzin (Father); Li Xuejian (Uncle Li); Guo Baochang (Stepfather); Zhong Ping (Chen Shusheng).

Publications

Articles:

Variety (New York), 14 June 1993.

Lapinski, Stan, "Woede en doortrapte mildheid," in Skrien (Amsterdam), no. 197, August-September, 1994.

Rayns, T., in Sight and Sound (London), February 1994.

Rayns, T., "Flying Colours," in Time Out (London), 2 February 1994.

Sklar, Robert, "People and Politics, Simple and Direct," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 4, 1994.

* * *

Tian Zhuangzhuang's The Blue Kite is one of a number of contemporary films which charts the ever-changing face of life in post-revolutionary China. The film is most effective as an uncompromisingly humanistic examination of the impact of politics and blind revolution on the individual and family unit. In this regard, it is a sobering censure of the hypocrisy existing within China under the domain of Mao. What is the point of revolution, the film maker asks, if basic human needs (let alone common civility and compassion) end up taking a back seat to that revolution?

The Blue Kite chronicles the emotional fireworks occurring within one Chinese family during the tumultuous 1950s and 60s. The unfolding events are considered from the point of view of Tietou, a child who narrates the proceedings and is seen from infancy through adolescence. The scenario opens in 1953, upon the death of Josef Stalin. Chen Shujuan (Lu Liping), a teacher, and Lin Shaolong (Pu Quanzin), a librarian, are about to be married in Beijing, and Tietou will be their son. Not long after his birth, a movement towards nationalism begins in China and the long arm of Communist Party politics stretches into the commonplace lives of all citizens.

The point of the scenario is that all which befalls Tietou and his family does not emerge from the natural ebb and flow of life. They are not allowed to evolve with the same freedom a kite has as it sails through the sky, with only the wind determining its direction. Instead, their fates are affected by the constantly evolving political correctness. They become victims of their society, where a revolution has taken place which presumably will improve their plight. But instead, they are irrevocably thrust into chaos: during repercussions against a movement which had advocated uncensored criticism of the Party, Shaolong is thrown into a labor camp; he eventually dies, and Shujuan marries a friend who cared for her and Tietou in Shaolong's absence; after the demise of her second husband, Shujuan weds an elderly Party member. Meanwhile, Tietou (now played by Chen Xiaoman) grows into a disaffected teen. His life—and that of all others—will undergo further upheaval in 1967, at the advent of the Cultural Revolution.

The Blue Kite contrasts the rhetoric versus the reality of life in contemporary China. Under communism, all citizens are supposed to be equal, but a class system and a political hierarchy remains in place. There are haves and have-nots, Communist Party members and peasants. The sole difference from the pre-revolutionary days is the identity of those in power. Meanwhile, young people are taught that "revolution is good," and politics must come first in their lives. As a result, petty adherence to Party rules takes preference over logic and humanity.

Tian vividly depicts the manner in which those who are at the political vanguard one year may find themselves chastised, beaten and scarred the next. In Communist China, yesterday's "good politics" just may become today's "bad politics." Yesterday's comrade is today's counter-revolutionary.

Thematically speaking, The Blue Kite is the sister film of Chen Kaige's Farewell, My Concubine and Zhang Yimou's To Live. Farewell, My Concubine runs from the 1920s through the 1970s and tells the story of a trio of characters, while To Live follows the fortunes of one Chinese family from the 1940s on; both narratives examine the manner in which their protagonists become swept up in the events of Chinese history. Despite their larger-than-life natures, all three films are, at their core, simple, personal stories of love, devotion, loss and forgiveness. The characters are deeply human and individualistic, rather than political caricatures.

The filming of The Blue Kite was almost complete in 1991, when it was screened for Chinese officials. Its production was summarily halted, because of its "political leanings." Postproduction was completed in Japan, using Tian's notes. Earlier, the overseas marketing of a pair of the film maker's other works, On the Killing Ground and Horse Thief, was disrupted by Chinese authorities. Similarly, the country's censors initially banned Farewell, My Concubine and, over the years, the Western media has reported Zhang Yimou's endless conflicts with his government, and the censoring of his films.

If The Blue Kite, among these other films, has been unable to directly alter the social and political fabric of China, the fact that it was completed, and made available to audiences across the world, remains a triumph in itself.

—Rob Edelman

Lan fengzheng

THE LAND

USA, 1942

Directors: Robert J. Flaherty with Frances H. Flaherty

Production: Agricultural Adjustment Agency, U.S. Department of Agriculture; black and white, 35mm; running time: 42 minutes. Though it has been shown non-theatrically, the film has never had a general release; its premiere showing was in April 1942, at the Museum of Modern Art, New York. Filmed summer 1939-March 1940 in the American South and Midwest.

Screenplay: Robert J. Flaherty; commentary: Russell Lord; photography: Irving Lerner, Douglas Baker, Floyd Crosby, and Charles Herbert; editor: Helen Van Dongen; sound engineers: A. Dillinger and Reuben Ford; music: Richard Arnell; consultant: Wayne Darrow; research and field assistance: W. H. Lamphere and Lamp Hart.

Cast: Robert Flaherty (Narrator).

Publications

Books:

- Lord, Russell and Kate Lord, Forever the Land: A Country Chronicle and Anthology, New York, 1950.
- Gromo, Mario, Robert Flaherty, Parma, 1952.
- Rotha, Paul, Documentary Film, New York, 1952.
- Griffith, Richard, The World of Robert Flaherty, New York, 1953.
- Flaherty, Frances, The Odyssey of a Film-Maker: Robert Flaherty's Story, Urbana, Illinois, 1960.
- Quintar, Fuad, Robert Flaherty et le documentaire poétique, Paris, 1960.
- Rotha, Paul and Richard Griffith, The Film Till Now, New York, 1960.
- Clemente, Jose L., Robert Flaherty, Madrid, 1963.
- Cuenca, Carlos Fernandez, Robert Flaherty, Madrid, 1963.
- Calder-Marshall, Arthur, The Innocent Eye: The Life of Robert J. Flaherty, London, 1963; New York, 1966.
- Klaue, Wolfgang, editor, Robert Flaherty, East Berlin, 1964.
- Agel, Henri, Robert J. Flaherty, Paris, 1965.
- Snyder, Robert, Pare Lorentz and the Documentary Film, Norman, Oklahoma, 1968.

The Land

Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.
Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.

Wright, Basil, The Long View, London and New York, 1974,
Napolitano, Antonio, Robert J. Flaherty, Florence, 1975.

Murphy, William T., Robert Flaherty: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Weaver, Mike, Robert Flaherty's "The Land," Exeter, Devon, 1979.

Hardy, Forsyth, editor, Grierson on the Movies, London, 1981.

Rotha, Paul, Robert J. Flaherty: A Biography, Philadelphia, 1983.

Articles:

Griffith, Richard, "Flaherty and the Future," in New Movies (New York), January 1943.

Pandolfi, Vito, "Documentare a lotta per la vita," in Cinema (Rome), 15 December 1950.

"Gli uomini hanno fame mella terra de Flaherty," in Cinema (Rome), November 1951.

Rucon Turconi, Davide, "Il film proibito di Flaherty," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), no. 2, 1962.

Van Dongen, Helen, "Robert J. Flaherty," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1965; and in Non-Fiction Film: Theory and Criticism, edited by Richard Barsam, New York, 1976.

Achtenberg, Ben, "Helen Van Dongen: An Interview," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1976.

Strauss, Theodore, "The Giant Shinnies down the Beanstalk: Flaherty's The Land," in The Documentary Tradition, edited by Lewis Jacobs, New York, 1979.

Lee, R., "Robert Flaherty: Free Spirit," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 65, no. 1, January 1984.

Leacock, Richard, "In Defense of the Flaherty Traditions," in Film Culture (New York), no. 79, Winter 1996.

* * *

The Land, the least typical, least known, and most controversial of Robert Flaherty's films, depicts a vast and vague territory across the southern and midwestern United States. Here, in the period between the Depression's end and the beginning of World War II, abandoned farmhouses lined dusty roadways, and forgotten farm people had almost ceased to hope for a better life. On the face of it, The Land might have become the earthly counterpart to Pare Lorentz's The River, easily the best known and most widely praised American documentary film. But as it turned out, The Land pleased few people, least of all Flaherty himself.

As head of the new U.S. Film Service, Lorentz had invited Robert Flaherty (perhaps at John Grierson's suggestion) to make a film on the New Deal's efforts to restore American farmers and farmlands to their productive fullness. Flaherty and his wife collaborator, Frances, welcomed the chance to explore their homeland as they had previously explored many distant corners of the world. Flaherty's brief experience with government sponsorship while making Industrial Britain, or most of it, for Grierson's E.M.B. Film Unit in 1931 had not prepared him for the frustrations and troubles that lay ahead.

To make The Land Robert and Frances Flaherty travelled some 100,000 miles, shooting 25,000 feet of 35mm film—all silent (narration and music were added later). "A long and gruelling job," Flaherty later described it. While he was still filming, Lorentz started a new film of his own (The Fight for Life) and in his absence Congress abruptly dismantled the U.S. Film Service. The Land was shunted to Henry Wallace's Department of Agriculture. All through the summer and fall of 1941, the Department's experts tinkered with Flaherty's footage, trying to make it conform to the government's rapidly changing needs and policies. As the U.S. came closer to entering the war, unemployment gave way to a farm labor shortage, mechanization became part of the solution to the farm problems rather than a threat. It fell to Helen van Dongen (who had edited Joris Ivens' later European films, and his just finished Power and the Land) to find structure for Flaherty's random footage and make sense of the changing government directives.

The film's most memorable scenes are those in which Flaherty (narrating the film himself) briefly dramatizes poignant human incidents: a young couple with two small children packing their pitiful belongings on an old mule cart; an old Negro man living alone on a once-abundant plantation, wondering where everyone has gone; a boy sleeping, while his mother explains that his hands move because he thinks he's shelling peas. Flaherty conceded that the film had no specific solutions for what the camera saw; he found it amazing that so critical a film could be made at all. "It shows that democracy can face itself in the mirror without flinching," he told an interviewer a short while before the film's intended release.

Within a few short weeks, however, democracy flinched. With the U.S. now at war, government officials feared that so dismal a picture would serve mainly to aid the enemies' propaganda campaigns. A prestige premiere was held at the Museum of Modern Art in early 1942, but the film's release was permanently denied. (The Museum still distributes 16mm prints for study purposes. Calder-Marshall's The Innocent Eye, Appendix 4, contains the final narration, written by Russell Lord based on Flaherty's comments, interspersed with critical descriptions of each sequence by Paul Rotha and Basil Wright.)

Critical opinion about The Land has been divided, then as now, into two more or less exclusive areas: style and content. Basil Wright has called it "the most important film in Flaherty's development as an artist . . . a cry of protest . . . impressive because of its passionate incoherence." Siegfried Kracauer found its "plot" lacking precision and failing to get hold of the very problems it attacked; its true merits (deep honesty, the beauty of its pictures, and its avoidance of hasty conclusions) added up to "fragments of a lost epic song." Frances Flaherty did not mention The Land in her book, The Odyssey of Filmmaker considering only their four "free" films as bearing the true Flaherty mark.

Although the first credit after the main title on The Land reads "Directed by Robert J. Flaherty in collaboration with Frances H. Flaherty," her name often does not appear in books listing those credits. Richard Griffith, in The World of Robert Flaherty, details the nature of the Flahertys' "filmmaking partnership" in creating a film method which Frances later called "non-preconception," which she championed after Flaherty's death through her writings and her talks, and through the Flaherty Seminars which she founded in 1955.

The Land was Flaherty's major effort to align himself with the social-minded documentarists. If he failed, it was no more or less a failure than his efforts to become part of the commercial movie world. Like the great Sergei Eisenstein, Flaherty was a man of mythic vision; his films were mythic too, despite earnest efforts to conform to pre-determined rules and counter-regulations. At Flaherty's death in 1951, Grierson re-assessed Flaherty's "handful of lovely films" with the thousands of educational and propaganda productions, made by the "documentary people who went the other way," financed by the million in government services all over the world. "I look at it all today and think with the gentler half of my head that Flaherty's path was right and the other wrong." Certainly Flaherty's path was right for Flaherty, if for no others.

—Cecile Starr

LÁSKY JEDNÉ PLAVOVLÁSKY

(Loves of a Blonde)

Czechoslovakia, 1965

Director: Miloš Forman

Production: Barrandov Film Studio for Československý Film; black and white, 35mm; length: 2915 metres. Released November 1965. Prague. Filmed 1965 in Zruč and Sázavou, Czechoslovakia.

Producer: Rudolf Hajek; screenplay: Jaroslav Papoušek, Ivan Passer, Miloš Forman, and Václav Sašek; assistant director: Ivan Passer; photography: Miroslav Ondříček; editor: Miroslav Hájek; sound: Adolf Böhm; art director: Karel Cerný; music: Evžen Illin.

Cast: Hana Brejchová (Andula); Vladimír Pucholt (Milda); Vladimír Menšík (Vacovský); Ivan Kheil (Maňas); Jiří Hrubý (Burda); Milada Ježková (Milda's mother); Josef Sebak (Milda's father); Marie Salačová (Marie); Jana Nováková (Jana); Jana Crkalová (Jaruška); Zdeňka Lorencová (Zdena); Táňa Zelinkaová (Girl); Jan Vostreil (Colonel); Josef Kolb (Prkorný); Antonín Blažejovský (Tonda); M. Zedníčková (Educator).

Award: Venice Film Festival, Prize of CIDLAC, 1965.

Lásky jedné plavovlásky

Publications

Script:

Forman, Milos, and others "Lásky Jedne Plavovlasky," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), no. 60, 1966.

Forman, Milos, Turnaround: A Memoir, New York, 1996.

Byrge, Duane, Private Screenings: Insiders Share a Century of Great Movie Moments, Collingdale, 1999.

Books:

Boček, Jaroslav, Modern Czechoslovak Film 1945–1965, Prague, 1965.

Whyte, Alistair, New Cinema in Eastern Europe, New York, 1971.

Dewey, Langdon, Outline of Czechoslovakian Cinema, London, 1971.

Henstall, Bruce, editor, Miloš Forman, Ingrid Thulin, Washington, D.C., 1972.

Liehm, Antonin, Closely Watched Films, White Plains, New York, 1974.

Stoil, Michael Jon, Cinema Beyond the Danube, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1974.

Liehm, Antonin, The Miloš Forman Stories, White Plains, New York, 1975.

Liehm, Mira and Antonin, The Most Important Art: East European Film after 1945, Berkeley, 1977.

Vecchi, Paolo, Milos Forman, Firenze, 1981.

Poizot, Claude, Milos Forman, Paris, 1987.

Forman, Miloš, Turnaround: A Memoir, with Jan Novak, New York, 1994.

Articles:

Janousek, J., in Film a Doba (Prague), no. 5, 1965.

Dyer, Peter John, "Star-Crossed in Prague," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1965–66.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), February and July 1966.

"Adula's Dream," in Newsweek (New York), 19 September 1966.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 10 November 1966.

Kahan, Saul, in Cinema (Beverly Hills), December 1966.

Blue, James, and Gianfranco de Bosio, interview with Milos Forman, in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), February 1967.

Frazer, Graham, in Take One (Montreal), February 1967.

- Clouzot, Claire, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1967.
- Polt, Harriet, "Getting the Great 10%," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1970.
- Conaway, James, "Miloš Forman's America is Like Kafka's—Basically Comic," in New York Times Magazine, 11 July 1971.
- Gow, Gordon, "A Czech in New York: An Interview with Miloš Forman," in Films and Filming (London), September 1971.
- Földes, A., in Filmkultura (Budapest), September-October 1971.
- Földes, A., "Idotálló kérdések," in Filmkultura (Budapest), vol. 15, no. 5, September-October 1979.
- Somen, B., "Plavolaskine ljubezni znova," in Ekran, vol. 5, no. 2/3, 1980.
- Prádná, Stanislava, "Sila pravdivosti a hranice možnosti nehereckeho," in Film a Doba (Prague), vol. 37, no. 2, Summer 1991.
- "Les amours d'une blonde," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 180, September-October 1995.
- Rollet, S., "L'enigmatique present," in Positif (Paris), no. 433, March 1997.

* * *

The heroes of Miloš Forman's first films are quite ordinary young people, like most of the young people in the world. They do not stand out; they are not too good and not too bad, not particularly clever, but not particularly stupid either. In Konkurs (The Competition) they are girls who long to sing in the popular theater of Prague but are incapable of assessing their own abilities. In Cerný Petr (Black Peter) the hero is a young man who is learning to be a salesman because he has no precise goals in life. In Loves of a Blonde the central figures are young women who work in a shoe factory. All they want is a little happiness and a nice romantic love. Forman systematically chooses these non-heroic heroes for his films; he is interested precisely in the kind of people who will never be astronauts, outstanding scientists, actors or professional singers. In his opinion, they, too, are worthy of filmmakers' attention. This is the underlying premise of his early films, which derive their form from it, a form obviously different from traditional cinema not only in its conception of the hero but also in its distinct type of narrative. In these films Forman builds his style on the conviction that the most ordinary banalities of life contain more drama and more truth than the carefully elaborated form of a classically developed drama.

It is such everyday banalities that constitute the simple action of Loves of a Blonde. Its heroine, the young girl Andula, longs for love. She tries to find it with several men she happens to meet in her neighborhood. But she finds true love—or so she thinks—only after meeting a pianist from Prague. After a few beautiful moments, however, disappointment sets in, and Andula must once again content herself with her dreams. Her story, this slice of her life, is based on a linear succession of episodic situations with no gradations whatsoever. The director then develops these situations before the camera, and it is the viewer who combines them into a mosaic that has narrative value. Forman first took up filmmaking with a documentary bent; his quest for drama and truth in his films' characters in banal situations therefore has, to a certain extent, the nature of a documentary record. He follows his heroine and her comrades during their conversations at boarding school, at work in the factory, at a dance party, in talks with parents, and at meetings. The camera jumps from one face to another, fixing on them in an attempt to catch those imperceptible signs of inner feelings—boredom, longing, sadness, bitterness. The indifferent gaze of the camera could have a cruel effect, but it is softened by Forman's spontaneous sense of humor, which flows from the recognition that the most tragic occurrence, experienced and examined from without—and Forman looks at it with the same distance as the viewer—has comic and grotesque aspects. He finds and reveals the comedy in every situation involving the worker Andula, and even makes it the foundation of a love scene in which malfunctioning blinds undercut the significance Andula attaches to her feelings in her relationship with the pianist. However, Forman's humor is not malicious. He observes his heroes without ridiculing them, with kind sympathy and with the conviction that through laughter there is always a greater hope of penetrating beneath the surface of things. But he does not stop at the level of humorous portrayal. Through intimately familiar detail he brings the viewer to an understanding of the more general essence of the situations he depicts. And this essence is neither banal nor sentimental. Against the background of everyday activity, with all its comic situations, there is the weighty social problem of the isolated life of young women working in a remote Bohemian town where there are no opportunities to find acquaintances or love, resulting in the playing out of their emotional lives in cheap, demeaning short-term affairs. Ultimately, despite all the film's lighter moments, the viewer is left with a slight sense of sadness and bitterness.

Forman embarks on his subjects and themes with a thorough knowledge of the matter at hand; the life of the young women factory workers is depicted without the slightest artificiality. A contributing factor is the measured guidance of the actors, which makes one forget that, except for a few professionals, most of the actors had never been in front of a camera before. Another virtue of Forman's films of this period is the lively dialog, which becomes a vital element for enhancing the verisimilitude of the film situations.

In the history of Czechoslovak cinematography Forman's films represent a new achievement, from the standpoint of the choice of theme and content as well as techniques of expression. They have signaled a deviation from previous filmmaking and the start of a new course.

—B. Urgošiková

THE LAST LAUGH

See DER LETZTE MANN

THE LAST PICTURE SHOW

USA, 1971

Director: Peter Bogdanovich

Production: BBS Production and Last Picture Show Productions; black and white, 35mm; running time: 118 minutes. Released 1971 by Columbia-Warner. Filmed in Texas.

Producer: Stephen F. Friedman; executive producer: Burt Schneider; screenplay: Larry McMurtry and Peter Bogdanovich, from the novel by Larry McMurtry; photography: Robert Surtees; editor: Don Cambern; sound: Tom Overton; production designer: Polly Platt; art director: Walter Scott Herndon; music: Hank Williams, Bob Wills and the Texas Playboys, Eddy Arnold, Eddie Fisher, Phil Harris, Pee Wee King, Hank Snow, Tony Bennett, Lefty Frizzell, Frankie Laine, Johnnie Ray, Johnny Strindley, Kay Starr, Hank Thompson, Webb Pierce, and Jo Stafford.

The Last Picture Show

Cast: Timothy Bottoms (Sonny Crawford); Jeff Bridges (Duane Jackson); Cybill Shepherd (Jacy Farrow); Ben Johnson (Sam the Lion); Cloris Leachman (Ruth Popper); Ellen Burstyn (Lois Farrow); Eileen Brennan (Genevieve); Clu Gulager (Abilene); Sam Bottoms (Billy); Sharon Taggart (Charlene Dugs); Randy Quaid (Lester Marlow); Joe Heathcock (Sheriff); Bill Thurman (Coach Popper); Barc Doyle (Joe Bob Blanton); Jessie Lee Fulton (Miss Mosey); Gary Brockette (Bobby Sheen); John Hillerman (Teacher); Helena Humann (Jimmie Sue); Loyd Catlett (Leroy); Robert Glenn (Gene Farrow); Janice O'Malley (Mrs. Craig); Floyd Mahaney (Policeman); Kimberley Hyde (Annie Martin); Noble Willingham (Chester); Pamela Kelier (Jackie Lee French); Gordon Hurst (Monroe); Mike Hosford (Johnny); Charlie Seybert (Any Fanner); Grover Lewis (Mr. Crawford); Rebecca Ulrick (Marlene); Merrill Shephard (Agnes); Buddy Wood (Bud); Leon Brown (Cowboy in the cafe).

Awards: Oscars for Best Supporting Actor (Johnson) and Best Supporting Actress (Leachman), 1971; New York Film Critics awards for Best Supporting Actor (Johnson), Best Supporting Actress (Burstyn), and Best Screenwriting (tied with Sunday Bloody Sunday), 1971.

Publications

Books:

Sherman, Eric, and Martin Rubin, The Director's Event: Interviews with Five American Film-makers: Budd Boetticher, Peter Bogdanovich, Samuel Fuller, Arthur Penn, Abraham Polonsky, New York, 1970.

Bogdanovich, Peter, Pieces of Time, New York, 1974.

Giacci, V., Bogdanovich, Florence, 1975.

Harris, Thomas J., Bogdanovich's Picture Shows, Metuchen, 1990.

Yule, Andrew, Picture Shows: The Life and Times of Peter Bogdanovich, New York, 1992.

Articles:

- “The Last Picture Show: A Study in Black and White,” in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), January 1972.
- O’Brien, G., and R. Feiden, “Inter/View with Peter Bogdanovich,” in Inter/View (New York), March 1972.
- Dawson, Jan, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1972.
- Pulleine, Tim, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1972.
- Goodwin, M., in Take One (Montreal), April 1972.
- Allombert, G., in Image et Son (Paris), May 1972.
- Haustrate, G., in Cinéma (Paris), June 1972.
- Jordan, I., in Positif (Paris), June 1972.
- Turroni, G., in Filmcritica (Rome), November-December 1972.
- Duprez, L., in Filmruian (Tyreso, Sweden), no. 2, 1973.
- Cerlich, John, “The Last Picture Show and One More Adaptation,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), April 1973.
- Piro, S., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), May-June 1973.
- Starr, Cecile, “Peter Bogdanovich Remembered and Assessed,” in Filmmakers Newsletter (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), September 1973.
- Cohen, M. S., “The Corporate Style of BBS,” in Take One (Montreal), November 1973.
- “Cybill and Peter” (interview), in Inter/View (New York), June 1974.
- Pietzsch, I., in Film and Fernsehen (Berlin), January 1977.
- Bogdanovich, Peter, in American Film (Washington, D.C.), December 1978-January 1979.
- O’Guinn, Tom, in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 16 January 1979.
- Grimes, Teresa, “BBS: Auspicious Beginnings, Open Endings,” in Movie (London), Winter 1986.
- Fleming, M., “‘Picture’ Return May Be Too Late for Texasville,” in Variety (New York), 22 October 1980.
- McKibbins, Adrienne, “Bogdanovich Looks at the Past Through the Present,” in Filmnews, vol. 22, no. 3, April 1992.
- McReynolds, Douglas J., “Alive and Well: Western Myth in Western Movies,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 26, no. 1, January 1998.

* * *

The Last Picture Show is director Peter Bogdanovich’s painful and moving look at life in a small Texan town. Adapted by Bogdanovich and Larry McMurtry from McMurtry’s novel, the film chronicles the coming of age of two young men in an era that saw the final fadeout of the American frontier.

Underlying the film’s story is its haunting theme of lost hopes and half-forgotten dreams. Bogdanovich captures the mood of desolation and boredom that grips the town of Anarene, contrasting it with the frustrated energy of the local teenagers as they struggle toward a future which holds only the emptiness they see in the lives of the adults around them. The end of their youth will bring death of their belief in a brighter life ahead, just as the passage of time has brought about the disappearance of the Old West and left a bleak, dying town in its place. Sam the Lion, the theatre and poolhall owner who had been a cowboy in his youth, is the story’s link to an earlier time. His wisdom and innate dignity provide a role model for the boys, and his death marks the close of a chapter in their lives as well as the severing of the town’s past and present.

The Last Picture Show is also a film about the decline of the “Golden Age” of Hollywood moviemaking. Set in 1951, it presents a culture on the verge of change, as the arrival of television signals the end of the studio system. The “last picture show” to play the local movie house before lack of business closes it down is Howard Hawks’s Red River, one of the final epics of frontier life. Bogdanovich, a former film critic and the author of books on John Ford and Orson Welles, pays tribute in the film to the work of the legendary directors he admires. The style he adopts is reminiscent of the classic “invisible” approach to filmmaking favored by such directors as Ford and Hawks, whose camera remains an unobtrusive observer of the story. Like Ford, he makes use of occasional sweeping long shots, although here the shots record only the deserted, dusty streets of the town, providing a sad coda to Ford’s majestic Western landscapes.

In 1970, Bogdanovich’s decision to shoot his film in black and white was a somewhat radical choice. By the end of the 1960s, black and white photography had all but vanished from American feature films. Yet the powerful dramatic possibilities of the format, as well as the contrasts and shadings it offers, are ideally suited to the film’s subject matter, and Robert Surtees’s cinematography achieves a documentary-like realism.

This illusion is enhanced by the film’s soundtrack of 1950s pop and country-western tunes and by the remarkable naturalism of its performers. From Cloris Leachman as the lonely affection-starved coach’s wife to Cybill Shepherd as the beautiful, self-centred Jacy, the film is an example of ensemble playing at its finest. Particularly memorable among the strong performances is veteran character actor Ben Johnson’s portrayal of Sam the Lion. Johnson, who received an Academy Award for his work, embodies the independence and strength of character which are the hallmarks of the heritage the town has lost.

The Last Picture Show is a film rich in both style and substance. Bogdanovich recaptures the atmosphere of his 1950s setting with careful attention to detail, and creates a moving portrait of a town slowly dying as America moves into a new age.

—Janet E. Lorenz

LAST TANGO IN PARIS

(Le Dernier Tango à Paris; Ultimo tango a Parigi)

Italy-France, 1972

Director: Bernardo Bertolucci

Production: P.E.A. (Rome) and Artistes Associés (Paris); Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 126 minutes. Released 15 December 1972, Paris. Filmed 1971–72 in Paris.

Producer: Alberto Grimaldi; screenplay: Bernardo Bertolucci and Franco Arcalli; photography: Vittorio Storaro; editor: Franco Arcalli; sound: Antoine Bonfanti; production designer: Ferdinando Scarfiotti; music: Gato Barbieri; costume designer: Gitt Magrini.

Cast: Marlon Brando (Paul); Maria Schneider (Jeanne); Jean-Pierre Léaud (Tom); Massimo Girotti (Marcel); Maria Michi (Rosa’s mother);

Last Tango in Paris

Giovanna Galetti (Prostitute); Catherine Allegret (Catherine); Darling Legitimus (Landlady); Marie-Hélène Breillet (Monique); Catherine Breillet (Mouchette); Veronica Lazare (Rosa); Luce Marquand (Olympia); Gitt Magrini (Jeanne's mother); Rachel Kesterber (Christine); Armand Ablanalp (Prostitute's client); Mimi Pinson (Jury president); Ramon Mendizabal (Orchestra leader); Stephane Kosiak (Small dancer); Gérard Lepennec (Large dancer); Catherine Sola (TV script girl); Mauro Manchetti (TV cameraman); Dan Diament (TV sound engineer); Peter Schommer (TV assistant cameraman).

Awards: New York Film Critics Award, Best Actor (Brando), 1973.

Publications

Script:

Bertolucci, Bernardo, and Franco Arcalli, Last Tango in Paris, New York, 1973.

Books:

- Carroll, Kent E., editor, Close Up—Last Tango in Paris, New York, 1973.
- Mellen, Joan, Women and Sexuality in the New Film, New York, 1973.
- Shipman, David, Brando, London, 1974.
- Casetti, F., Bertolucci, Florence, 1975.
- Braithwaite, Bruce, The Films of Marlon Brando, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1977.
- Kuhlbrodt, Dietrich, and others, Bernardo Bertolucci, Munich, 1982.
- Ungari, Enzo, Bertolucci, Milan, 1982.
- Dowling, David, Marlon Brando, New York and London, 1984.
- Carey, Gary, Marlon Brando: The Only Contender, London, 1985.
- Kolker, Robert Phillip, Bernardo Bertolucci, London, 1985.
- Higham, Charles, Brando: The Unauthorized Biography, London, 1987.
- Kline, T. Jefferson, Bertolucci's Dream Loom: A Psychoanalytic Study of the Cinema, Amherst, Massachusetts, 1987.
- Kline, T. Jefferson, I film di Bernardo Bertolucci: Dialogo con Bernardo Bertolucci, Rome, 1994.
- Loshitzky, Yosefa, The Radical Faces of Godard and Bertolucci, Detroit, 1995.

Tonetti, Claretta Micheletti, Bernardo Bertolucci: The Cinema of Ambiguity, New York, 1995.
 Soggi, Stefano, Bernardo Bertolucci, Milan, 1996.
 Campani, Ermelinda M., L'anticonformista: Bernardo Bertolucci e il suo cinema, Firenze, 1998.

Articles:

Kovacs, Steven, in Take One (Montreal), November-December 1971.
 Roud, Richard, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1972.
 Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, 28 October 1972.
 Benayoun, Robert, in Point (Paris), 11 December 1972.
 Baroncelli, Jean de, in Monde (Paris), 16 December 1972.
 Björkman, S., "En Passion," in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 1, 1973.
 Amiel, M., "Bernardo Bertolucci: Au cinéma le temps se glisse entre les choses et les gens . . .," in Cinéma (Paris), January 1973.
Time (New York), 22 January 1973.
 Cremonini, G., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), January-February 1973.
 Turrone, G., in Filmcritica (Rome), January-February 1973.
Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1973.
 Cornand, A., in Image et Son (Paris), February 1973.
 Bertolucci, Bernardo, "Mon film n'est pas pornographique," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1973.
 Martin, Michel, "Entretien avec Bernardo Bertolucci," in Ecran (Paris), February 1973.
 Kovacs, S., in Take One (Montreal), March 1973.
 Ciment, Michel and G. Legrand, "Entretien avec Bernardo Bertolucci," in Positif (Paris), March 1973.
 Legrand, G., "The Last Time I Saw Hollywood," in Positif (Paris), March 1973.
 Jebb, Julian, "The Unvisitable Past," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1973.
 Bachmann, Gideon, "Every Sexual Relationship Is Condemned: Interview," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1973.
 Mellen, Joan, "Sexual Politics and Last Tango in Paris," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1973.
 Buffa, M., in Filmcritica (Rome), April 1973.
 Schober, S., in Filmkritik (Munich), April 1973.
 Robinson, H., in Films in Review (New York), April 1973.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), May 1973.
 Weinberg, H. G., "A Woman of Paris in 1973," in Take One (Montreal), May 1973.
 Speciale-Bagliacca, R., "Tango tra un incognita e un passato irrisuperabile," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), May-June 1973.
 Phelps, G., "Censorship and the Press," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1973.
 Ebert, J., in Filmkritik (Munich), July 1973.
 Bonitzer, P., "L'Expérience en intérieur," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1973.
 Kinder, Marsha and Beverle Houston, "Bertolucci and the Dance of Danger," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1973.
 Rice, J. D., in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Spring 1974.
 Sadkin, D., "Theme and Structure: Last Tango Untangled," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1974.
 "Bernardo Bertolucci Seminar," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), April 1974.
 Kaplan, E. Ann, "The Importance and Ultimate Failure of Last Tango in Paris," in Jump Cut (Chicago), November-December 1974.
 Lopez, D., "The Father Figure in The Conformist and in Last Tango in Paris," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Summer 1976.

Frias, I. Leon, in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), June 1981.

Cinema Novo (Porto), 9 October 1983.

Barr, A., "The Better to See . . . : Improbable Vision in Last Tango in Paris," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Maryland), Winter 1983.

Bundtzen, L. K., "Bertolucci's Erotic Politics and the Auteur Theory: From Last Tango in Paris to The Last Emperor," in Western Humanities Review (Salt Lake City, Utah), no. 2, 1990.

Pal'tsev, N., and A. Shemiakin, "Poslednee tango v Parizhe—20 let spustia," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 11, 1992.

* * *

A piece of filmmaking that earned its creator a suspended two-month prison sentence in his native Italy and an X-rating in the U.S., Bernardo Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris is a heartbreaking, revelatory masterpiece which has not aged one bit since its completion, a quarter of a century ago.

Although the plot concerns a private affair, the film's magnitude is that of a true tragedy, the genre that celluloid does not usually capture well. What makes it a tragedy is the intensity of its conflict that, as in Medea or Hamlet, can be solved by no means but one—death. Like any tragedy, classical or modern, Last Tango knows no compromise. Like any tragedy, it is inhabited by people who act according to the tragic inevitability and are led by destiny. Like any tragedy, this one has an epic dimension to it: it speaks of global changes and apocalyptic results. (That the two rare screen tragedies of recent decades—another one being Nagisa Oshima's In the Realm of the Senses—both tie together sex and death may say something about our times.)

Like most tragedies, Last Tango is about an end. Bertolucci's ambition goes further than a CAT scan of a relationship; the film depicts nothing less than the end of the modern age and character. Paul, the protagonist, who, having just lost his wife to suicide, begins a sexual relationship with a rival prospective tenant of a vacant Paris apartment, is an epitome of a modernist romantic. He is burdened by the past, rebellious against the present, and doomed for the future. That he is an American (something of a cultural virgin and an heir to Hemingway and Henry Miller) and the Marlon Brando of Streetcar Named Desire and On the Waterfront is essential. His anonymous, primal and ruthless engagement with Maria Schneider's Jeanne, who does not have a past and embodies, voluptuously, the bourgeois spirit, is juxtaposed with the cute, naive, "French" and Truffaut-esque romanticism of Jeanne's affair with Tom (Jean-Pierre Leaud). That affair lovingly mocks Vigo's "L'Atalante" and is decidedly anticlimactic. Unlike Leaud's Tom, who is an ever-filming filmmaker and a loveable impotent, Brando's Paul is virile, but cannot express himself—an Artaud without an art. Moving by the modernist trajectory, he strives to abandon culture and go back to nature; to create a world outside the real world; to reinvent the language; to start all over again. This is why Last Tango is rooted in sex, and this is why the sex in it is so fierce and unerotic. In its relentless deconstruction of the norm, modernist art arrives at the darkness of "The Black Square," the silence of John Cage, the filmlessness of Stan Brakhage. Paul, in turn, falls in love, and thus fails his quest. Like another American in Europe, Jack Nicholson's Passenger, he finds it not possible to rewrite his identity or to regain the paradise lost.

Brando as Paul is a model of acting exorcism. He growls and dashes around like a caged animal; the whole world is his cage. His intensity is so high that even today, when we know what has happened with the great Marlon Brando, one fears that he will burn out there on the screen, like an overcharged fuse.

Vittorio Storaro's breathtaking camera films Brando and Schneider against the sunset spectrum of red, orange, yellow and pink—painful colors of Francis Bacon, the modernist painter who influenced Bertolucci's vision. Gato Barbieri's Latin saxophone produces swirls and crescendos that add to the desperation of the screen image.

Being one of the most intelligent films ever made, Last Tango is also one of the most honest. It keeps no defenses, it takes everything off—the characters, the filmmakers, and ourselves.

—Michael Brashinsky

THE LAST WAVE

Australia, 1977

Director: Peter Weir

Production: Ayer Productions Pty. Ltd., McElroy production, South Australian Film Corp., and the Australian Film Commission. Atlab color, 35mm; running time: 106 minutes; length: 9513 feet. Released 16 November 1977. Filmed in Australia.

Producers: Hal McElroy and James McElroy; screenplay: Tony Morphett, Petru Popescu, and Peter Weir, from an idea by Peter Weir; photography: Russell Boyd; additional photography: Ron Taylor, George Greenough and Klaus Jaritz; editor: Max Lemon; sound editor: Greg Bell; sound recordist: Don Connolly; sound re-recordist: Phil Judd; production designer: Goran Warff; art director: Neil Angwin; music: Charles Wain; special effects: Monty Fieguth and Bob Hilditch; costume designers: Annie Bleakley; adviser on tribal Aboriginal matters: Lance Bennett.

Cast: Richard Chamberlain (David Burton); Olivia Hammett (Annie Burton); Gulpilil (Chris Lee); Frederick Parslow (Rev. Burton); Nandjiwarra Amagula (Charlie); Vivean Gray (Dr. Whitburn); Walter Amagula (Gerry Lee); Roy Bara (Larry); Cedric Lalara (Lindsey); Morris Lalara (Jacko); Peter Carroll (Michael Zeadler); Athol Compton (Billy Corman); Hedley Cullen (Judge); Michael Duffield (Andrew Potter); Wallas Eaton (Morgue doctor); Jo England (Babysitter); John Frawley (Policeman); Jennifer de Greenlaw (Zeadler's secretary); Richard Henderson (Prosecutor); Penny Leach (Schoolteacher); Merv Lilley (Publican); John Meagher (Morgue clerk); Guido Rametta (Guido); Malcolm Robertson (Don Fishburn); Greg Rowe (Carl); Katrina Sedgwick (Sophie Burton); Ingrid Weir (Grace Burton).

Publications

Books:

- Stratton, David, The Last New Wave: The Australian Film Revival, Sydney, 1980.
- Tulloch, John, Australian Cinema: Industry, Narrative, and Meaning, Sydney and London, 1982.
- Peeters, Theo, Peter Weir and His Films: A Critical Biography, Melbourne, 1983.
- Hall, Sandra, Critical Business: The New Australian Cinema in Review, Adelaide, 1985.

Moran, Albert and Tom O'Regan, An Australian Film Reader, Sydney, 1985.

McFarlane, Brian, Australian Cinema 1970–85, London, 1987.

Mathews, Sue, 35mm Dreams: Conversations with Five Directors about the Australian Film Revival, Ringwood, Victoria, 1987.

Haltof, Marek, Peter Weir: When Cultures Collide, London, 1996.

Rayner, Jonathan, The Films of Peter Weir, Poole, 1998.

Bliss, Michael, Dreams Within a Dream: The Films of Peter Weir, Carbondale, 2000.

Articles:

Cinema Papers (Melbourne), April 1977.

Murray, S., in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), October 1977.

Moskowitz, G., in Variety (New York), 16 November 1977.

Clancy, J., in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), January 1978.

Béhar, H., in Image et Son (Paris), February 1978.

Films and Filming (London), February 1978.

Garsault, A., in Positif (Paris), March 1978.

Tournès, A., "Naissance d'un cinéma australien," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), March 1978.

Combs, Richard, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1978.

Pulleine, Tim, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1978.

Boyd, Russell, "Photographing The Last Wave," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), April 1978.

Fox, J. R., in Cinefantastique (Oak Park, Illinois), no. 2–3, 1979.

Buckley, T., in New York Times, 12 January 1979.

Jacobs, D., "His Subject—Mysteries of Different Cultures," in New York Times, 13 January 1979.

Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 21 January 1979.

Kael, Pauline, in New Yorker, 22 January 1979.

Blake, R. A., in America (New York), 27 January 1979.

Cocchi, J., in Boxoffice (Kansas City), 29 January 1979.

Holthof, M., in Film en Televisie (Brussels), March 1979.

Childs, P., "New Wave Director Peter Weir Rides The Last Wave into U.S. Market," in Millimeter (New York), March 1979.

Kass, J. M., "It Doesn't Take Any Imagination at All to Feel Awed: Peter Weir," in Movietone News (Seattle), December 1979.

Vogrinc, J., in Ekran (Ljubljana), 1982.

Masson, A., in Positif (Paris), September 1982.

Pouille, F., in "Retour au fantastique: La Dernière Vague," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), September 1982.

Piton, J.-P., and F. Schall, "Le cinéma australien," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), no. 386, September 1983.

Matteuzzi, F., "Peter Weir: Il mistero e il sogno," in Cinema & Cinema (Milan), no. 47, December 1986.

Giavarini, Laurence, "Horreurs australes," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 447, September 1991.

Routt, W. D., "Are You a Fish? Are You a Snake?: An Obvious Lecture and Some Notes on The Last Wave," in Continuum (Mt. Lawley), vol. 8, no. 2, 1994.

Coursodon, Jean-Pierre, and Michel Ciment, and Agnès Peck and Alain Garsault, "Peter Weir," in Positif (Paris), no. 453, November 1998.

* * *

"Hasn't the weather been strange?" muses the advertising slogan for Peter Weir's The Last Wave. "Could it be a warning?" This tone of covert menace, of nasty things unseen by naive protagonists, characterizes Weir's films, but none more than this atmospheric thriller. Troubled by dreams of his home city, Sydney, inundated by a vast flood, lawyer Richard Chamberlain is drawn into the underground world of Sydney's aboriginals who still live a tribal life in the slums. To them, the city is merely a transient facade obscuring ancient mysteries, the ritual objects of which remain buried in forgotten catacombs. Chamberlain's discovery of these tunnels and the resulting revelation give the film its final enigmatic scenes.

The Last Wave

Weir conceived the film after discovering (by precognition, he feels) a piece of statuary on a Tunisian beach. Early drafts of the script represented, in a Von Daniken-like manner, ancient races dragging rafts across the Australian desert. In collaboration with various writers, Weir shaped a story of city aboriginals protecting ritual stones brought to Australia by a long dead race. As Australia is gripped by fierce storms and an unrelenting downpour, Chamberlain finds his way to the caves where ancient wall paintings foretell the world's destruction by water. He emerges on a beach to face the ultimate reality of the prophecy.

Australian backers derided the film, and a shortage of money forced many compromises—notably in the last sequence, where Weir used a clip from the surfing film Crystal Voyager to stand in for the tidal wave. The Aztec ruins lost something in their rough and ready construction. The use of aboriginal myths led to picketing by militant black groups who charged Weir with debasing their mythology. However, Weir acknowledged that his contact with aboriginal performers led to a widening and deepening of the script. Gulpilil's appearance in a dream, the rain streaming down, with a scored sacred stone in his out-thrust hand, is particularly striking.

Weir calls The Last Wave his "roughest, most awkward" film. But despite a certain tentativeness in the use of large resources, it is significant as the first new Australian film to reveal an interest in wider issues and a less chauvinistic sensibility.

—John Baxter

THE LAST WILL OF DR. MABUSE

See DOKTOR MABUSE DER SPIELER; DAS TESTAMENT DES DR. MABUSE

LAST YEAR AT MARIENBAD

See L'ANNEE DERNIERE A MARIENBAD

THE LATE MATTHEW PASCAL

See FEU MATHIAS PASCAL

LATE SPRING

See BANSHUN

LAURA

USA, 1944

Director: Otto Preminger

Production: Twentieth Century-Fox; black and white, 35mm; running time: 88 minutes. Released 1944. Filmed 24 April-29 June 1944 (retakes 15-20 July 1944), in Fox studios.

Producer: Otto Preminger; screenplay: Jay Datler, Samuel Hoffenstein and Betty Reinhardt, uncredited collaboration on screenplay by Ring Lardner, Jr., and Jerome Cady, from the play and novel by Vera Caspary; photography: Joseph LaShelle; editor: Louis R. Loeffler; sound: E. Clayton Ward and Harry M. Leonard; production designers: Thomas Little and Paul S. Fox; art directors: Lyle Wheeler and Leland Fuller; music: David Raksin; music director: Emil Newman; special effect photography: Fred Sersen; costume designer: Bonnie Cashin.

Cast: Gene Tierney (Laura Hunt); Dana Andrews (Mark McPherson); Clifton Webb (Waldo Lydecker); Vincent Price (Shelby Carpenter); Judith Anderson (Anne Treadwell); Dorothy Adams (Bessie Clary); James Flavin (McAvity); Clyde Fillmore (Bullitt); Tom Dillon replaced Ralph Dunn as (Fred Callahan); Kathleen Howard (Louise); Lee Tung Foo (Waldo's Servant); Harold Schlickemayer, Harry Strang, and Lane Chandler (Policemen); Non-Credited Roles: Frank La Rue (Hairdresser); Dorothy Christie, Aileen Pringle, Terry Adams, Jean Fenwick, Kay Linaker, and Yolanda Lacca (Women); Cara Williams, Gloria Marlin, Beatrice Gray, Kay Connors, and Frances Gladwin (Young girls); Buster Miles (Johnny); Jane Nigh (Secretary); William Forrest, Alexander Sacha, Forbes Murray, Cyril Ring, and Nestor Eristoff (Men); John Dexter (Jacoby); Bess Flowers (Girl in the hall of the theater); Major Sam Harris (Anne Treadwell's escort).

Award: Oscar for Best Cinematography, 1944.

Publications

Script:

Datler, Jay, and others, Laura, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1978.

Books:

- Lourcelles, Jacques, Otto Preminger, Paris, 1965.
 Pratley, Gerald, The Cinema of Otto Preminger, New York, 1971.
 Parish, James Robert, The Fox Girls, New Rochelle, New York, 1971.
 Frischauer, Willi, Behind the Scenes of Otto Preminger, London, 1973.
 Preminger, Otto, An Autobiography, New York, 1977.
 McAsh, Iain, The Films of Vincent Price, London, 1977.
 Parish, James Robert, and William T. Leonard, The Funsters, New Rochelle, New York, 1979.
 McAsh, Iain, Vincent Price: A Biography, Farncombe, Surrey, 1982.
 McNamara, Eugene, Laura as Novel, Film, and Myth, Lewiston, New York, 1992.
 Bächler, Odile, Laura: Otto Preminger, Paris, 1995.
 Williams, Lucy C., The Complete Films of Vincent Price, Secaucus, 1995.
 Bogdanovich, Peter, Who the Devil Made It: Conversations with Robert Aldrich, George Cukor, Allan Dwan, Howard Hawks, Alfred Hitchcock, Chuck Jones, Fritz Lang, Joseph H. Lewis, Sidney Lumet, Leo McCarey, Otto Preminger, Don Siegel, Josef von Sternberg, Frank Tashlin, Edgar G. Ulmer, Raoul Walsh, New York, 1997.
 Phillips, Gene D., Exiles in Hollywood: Major European Film Directors in America, Bethlehem, 1998.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 11 October 1944.
New York Times, 12 October 1944.
Times (London), 27 November 1944.
 Borde, Raymond, and Etienne Chaumeton, Panorama du film noir, Paris, 1955.
 Reid, John Howard, in Films and Filming (London), February and March 1961.
 "Preminger Issue" of Présence du Cinéma (Paris), February 1962.
 "Preminger Issue" of Movie (London), September 1962.
 "Preminger Issue" of Movie (London), no. 4, 1963.
 Agel, Henri, "Laura; ou, L'Epanchement de la mort dans la vie," in Romance Amérique, Paris, 1963.
 "Preminger Issue" of Visages du Cinéma (Paris), March 1963.
 Sarris, Andrew, "Preminger's Two Periods—Studio and Solo," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1965.
 "Clifton Webb," in Films in Review (New York), January 1970.
 Caspary, Vera, "My Laura and Otto's," in Saturday Review (New York), 26 June 1971.
 Shields, Jonathan, "Gene Tierney," in Films in Review (New York), November 1971.
 Borok, B., "Laura: The Story Behind the Picture," in Thousand Eyes (New York), November 1976.
 Thompson, Kristin, "Closure Within a Dream: Point of View in Laura," in Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), no. 3, 1978.
 "Laura Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July-September 1978.
 McVay, Douglas, "Faithful in His Fashion: Otto Preminger's Laura," in Bright Lights (Los Angeles), no. 4, 1979.
 Leese, Elizabeth, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), no. 5, 1982.
 Marinero, M., in Casablanca (Madrid), May 1983.
 Blanchet, C., in Cinéma (Paris), November 1983.

Laura

Legrand, G., “Laura et Mark Dixon, détective: Au bois dormant, une jeune Parque,” in Positif (Paris), May 1984.

Catsos, G.J.M., “Remembering Laura,” in Hollywood Studio Magazine (Studio City), vol. 20, no. 3, 1987.

Reid’s Film Index (Wyong), no. 1, 1987.

Leandoer, K., “Otto Preminger’s Laura,” in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 31, no. 4, 1989.

Telotte, J. P., “The Big Clock of Film Noir,” in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 2, 1990.

Carluccio, G., and L. Cena, “Otto Preminger, la persistenza di uno sguardo,” in Castoro Cinema (Florence), January-February 1990.

Ward, L.E., “The Great Films,” in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 177, March 1990.

Nielsen, R., “Ray’s Way,” in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 187, January 1991.

Denby, D., “Thrillers with a Twist,” in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 4, August 1991.

Carluccio, G., and G. Pescatore, “Dal nero. Del noir, dello schermo,” in Cinema & Cinema (Bologna), May-August 1991.

Schactman, K., “Laura,” in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), no. 7, Summer 1992.

Raksin, David, “Music Via a Devious Root,” in Cue Sheet (Hollywood), vol. 10, no. 1–2, Spring 1993–94.

Feigelson, Roger, “Laura/Jane Eyre,” in Télérama (Paris), no. 2305, 16 March 1994.

Kock, I. de, “Laura,” in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 453, July 1995.

Care, Ross, “Forever Raksin,” in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), no. 22, 1996.

Loban, Lelia, “The Face in the Misty Light, Laura,” in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), no. 22, 1996.

* * *

“Laura is Preminger’s Citizen Kane, at least in the sense that Otto’s detractors, like Orson’s [Welles] have never permitted him to live it down,” comments Andrew Sarris in his essay, “Preminger’s Two Periods.”

The film, which is based on Vera Caspary’s very popular book of the same name, was brought to Darryl F. Zanuck’s attention by Otto Preminger. Although Preminger was allowed to produce it, Zanuck insisted that someone else be brought in to direct it. Rouben Mamoulian was subsequently brought into the project. However problems with the initial shooting and characterization in the film led to Mamoulian's removal as director, and subsequent replacement by Preminger.

Although Preminger claims to have reshot all of Mamoulian's earlier work, the latter states that three-quarters of the released version of Laura was part of his original footage—a fact that his cameraman, Lucien Ballard confirms. However, Preminger confided to Joseph La Shelle, who replaced Ballard as cameraman, that “We’re not going to leave any scene at all of Mamoulian’s in this picture.”

Despite these problems and the tension that existed between cast and director when Preminger took over and characters in the script were reassessed and changed, Laura to everyone's surprise became a blinding success. However, the author Vera Caspary had great problems with the film's script not least of which was the use of a clock as the hiding place for the murder weapon. In Caspary's book the gun is hidden in Waldo Lydecker's cane. The author argued that this symbolized the murderer's impotence; Preminger contested that the audience would not understand this Freudian idea.

Essentially a crime story, Laura centers around the murder of a woman, who has been shot in the face, and the effect that it has on the people around her. The investigating detective brought in to solve the case, Mark McPherson (Dana Andrews) is a hard-boiled policeman—a far cry from the “highly intelligent criminologist” Andrews originally envisaged. McPherson sees a portrait of the alleged murder victim and falls in love with her. In a highly charged, very sexual scene McPherson wanders around Laura's apartment, touching her possessions, loosening his tie, and clutching a drink, as he stares moodily at the portrait. He dozes off fixating on Laura, and awakens to find the object of his passion standing before him. Lydecker (Clifton Webb) recognizes this strange fixation and says: “You’ll end up in a psycho ward. I don’t think they’ve ever had a patient who fell in love with a corpse.”

Waldo Lydecker, the highly intellectual news columnist, tells McPherson about Laura. She approached Lydecker while he was having lunch at the Algonquin, and asked him to endorse a pen. Although he refused, he could not get Laura out of his mind and tracked her down. Taking her under his wing, Lydecker groomed her introducing her to important people. However, while Waldo fulfilled an emotional and intellectual need, Laura looked to other men for relationships. For the most part these men were meaningless until she met the debonair but spineless Shelby Carpenter (Vincent Price), and became engaged to him. Just before her murder Lydecker told Laura that her fiancé was having an affair with a young model, Diane Redfern. Laura went away to think about their relationship.

McPherson embarks on a determined quest to find the identities of the real victim and the murderer. Piecing events together he works out that the victim is Diane Redfern. Shelby reluctantly admits that he met Diane at Laura's flat. When the doorbell rang, Diane answered it and was shot in the face by her killer. Shelby panicked and left; he confesses that he thought that Laura was the murderer.

McPherson, suspicious of Lydecker goes to his flat and searches it. He finds a baroque clock identical to one in Laura's flat. Searching Laura's clock he finds the murder weapon concealed within it. He leaves to arrest Lydecker, not realizing that Lydecker is incensed that Laura is in love with McPherson, and has returned to try and kill Laura again. Luckily McPherson rescues her in time.

The male characters in Laura are interesting. They present different aspects of masculinity, and are all in a sense symbols of impotency. Shelby is a weak, amoral man who uses Laura for his own ends but does not really see or desire her as a woman; Lydecker is the cynical, witty friend who can never be a lover but idealizes her; and McPherson is a masculine, brawny man, who illustrates his impotency by falling in love with a dead woman. As the hero he, however, moves beyond this point into a new realm with his dream woman.

Laura does not physically enter the story until about half way through the film when her persona has already been set up. The audience is aware that she is a beautiful, intelligent, and sensual woman. Her world is one of rich, sophisticated people. She is set up on a pedestal well before she appears on screen. However in reality Gene Tierney's Laura is an ambitious woman—a woman who knows her mind, who states “I’ll never do anything that isn’t of my own free will.”

The whole of the film has a dream-like feel to it. This was mostly due to La Shelle's camera work. He reportedly took hours to set up each scene, fiddling over lighting. The film contains many long shots in which the camera pans the landscape—the shot of Lydecker's apartment, which is based on an unused scene in Hitchcock's Rebecca, is an example of this. The end result well justified the time and deliberation that went into planning these shots as the film won an Academy Award for Best Cinematography in 1944.

—A. Pillai

THE LAVENDER HILL MOB

UK, 1951

Director: Charles Crichton

Production: A Michael Balcon Production for Ealing Studios; black and white; running time: 78 minutes; length: 7,043 feet. Released June 1951.

Producer: Michael Balcon; associate producer: Michael Truman; screenplay: T. E. B. Clarke; photography: Douglas Slocombe; editor: Seth Holt; art director: William Kellner; music: Georges Auric.

Cast: Alec Guinness (Holland); Stanley Holloway (Pendlebury); Sidney James (Lackery); Alfie Bass (Shorty); Marjorie Fielding (Mrs. Chalk); Edie Martin (Miss Evesham); Ronald Adam (Bank Official); Clive Morton (Police Sergeant); John Gregson (Farrow); Sidney Tafler (Stallholder); Patrick Barr (Inspector); Meredith Edwards (P.C. Edwards); Robert Shaw (Police Scientist); Michael Trubshawe (British Ambassador); Audrey Hepburn (Chiquita).

Awards: Oscar for Best Script, 1952; British Film Academy Award for Best Film, 1951.

Publications

Script:

Clarke, T. E. B., The Lavender Hill Mob in The Cinema 1952, edited by Roger Manvell and R. K. N. Baxter, London, 1952.

The Lavender Hill Mob

Books:

- Tynan, Kenneth, Alec Guinness, New York, 1955.
 Michael Balcon, A Lifetime of Films, London, 1969.
 Butler, Ivan, Cinema in Britain, New York, 1973.
 Betts, Ernest, The Film Business: A History of British Cinema, New York, 1973.
 Barr, Charles, Ealing Studios, London, 1977.
 Perry, George, Forever Ealing, London, 1981.
 Hunter, Allan, Alec Guinness on Screen, London, 1982.
 Kadish, Laurence, Michael Balcon: The Pursuit of British Cinema, New York, 1984.
 Taylor, John Russell, Alec Guinness: A Celebration, London, 1984, 1994.
 Guinness, Alec, Blessings in Disguise, London, 1985.
 Missler, Andreas, Alec Guinness: Seine Filme, sein Leben, Munich, 1987.
 Von Gunden, Kenneth, Alec Guinness: The Films, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1987.
 Brown, Geoff, Michael Balcon: Pursuit of Britain, New York, 1990.
 Guinness, Alec, My Name Escapes Me: The Diary of a Retiring Actor, New York, 1998.

Articles:

- Today's Cinema* (London), 20 June 1951.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1951.
Variety (New York), 4 July 1951.

- Lambert, Gavin, in Sight and Sound (London), August-September 1951.
Motion Picture Herald (New York), 13 and 20 October 1951.
New York Times, 16 October 1951.
Image et Son (Paris), October 1954.
 Tynan, Kenneth, "Ealing: The Studio in Suburbia," in Films and Filming (London), November and December 1955.
 McVay, Douglas, "Alec Guinness," in Films and Filming (London), May 1961.
 Barr, Charles, "Projecting Britain and the British Character: Ealing Studios," in Screen (London), Summer 1974.
 Green, Ian, "Ealing: In the Comedy Frame," in British Cinema History, edited by James Curran and Vincent Porter, London, 1983.

* * *

In the three films which T. E. B. Clarke and Charles Crichton—respectively the most talented writer and director of the Ealing mainstream—made together at Balcon's studio, the whole trajectory of Ealing comedy can be traced. Hue and Cry, their first collaboration, initiated the cycle with its fresh, original approach. With their third, The Titfield Thunderbolt, the genre can be seen declining into self-conscious, sentimental whimsy. And between these two stands The Lavender Hill Mob, which in many ways qualifies as the quintessential Ealing comedy.

Mainstream Ealing comedy (as against the tougher, maverick strain of Hamer and Mackendrick) tends to act out fantasies of wish-fulfilment—in Charles Barr's words, "the triumph of the innocent, the survival of the unfittest." The Lavender Hill Mob makes this explicit. Having opened on an escapist dream of tropical luxury, with Holland (Alec Guinness) dispensing largesse in a Rio bar, fawned upon by ambassadors, society hostesses, and shapely señoritas (Audrey Hepburn in a 30-second bit part), we fade back to his drab past, "when I was merely a nonentity among all those thousands who flock every morning into the City," with an image that recalls The Waste Land:

Under the brown fog of a winter dawn,
 A crowd flowed over London Bridge, so many,
 I had not thought death had undone so many.

And at the end of the film, in a neat ironic twist, he evades police pursuit by briefly rejoining his fellow-nonentities, one indistinguishable bowler-hatted figure among many, before taking off into his exotic dreamworld.

"Most men who long to be rich know inwardly that they will never achieve their ambition." Nor will we; but Holland, our meek surrogate, will achieve it for us. Hemmed in by the stuffy respectability of the Balmoral Guest House (that same Victorian world of little old ladies sardonically targeted by Mackendrick in The Ladykillers), and by his dismissive superiors—"He's no imagination, no initiative"—the worm turns. "OK, you're the boss," says Lackery (Sidney James), as they plan the robbery. Holland leans back, a gleam of delight behind his spectacles as the idea sinks in. "Yes. Yes, that's right. I am."

Guinness's performance, hinting at wild insubordination lurking beneath the prissy, deferential exterior, is finely balanced by the more stolid presence of Stanley Holloway as Pendlebury, the artist manqué churning out shoddy souvenirs ("I propagate British cultural depravity"). Sex, as often with Ealing, scarcely figures as such; but the relationship between the two men takes on a tangential sexuality, as in the justly celebrated “seduction scene” where Holland, Eve to Pendlebury’s Adam, circles slyly round his slower-witted partner dropping hints until realisation dawns: “By Jove, Holland, it’s a good job we’re both honest men.” And later, as the first of the gold-bullion Eiffel Towers emerges from the mould, Holland breathes tenderly, “Our first-born.”

Though Ladykillers will also feature Guinness as gang boss, there’s little otherwise in common between the two films; Mackendrick’s gleeful mayhem would shatter the gentle make-believe of Clarke’s comedy, where crime entails neither violence nor victim. And while Crichton’s crisp editing and flair for comic pacing are everywhere in evidence, it’s probably fair to consider Clarke the film’s primary auteur—not only for the frequent similarities, in mood and characterisation, with other Clarke comedies such as Passport to Pimlico and Hue and Cry, but for the gusto with which the writer, himself an ex-policeman, parodies his own police chase sequence from The Blue Lamp.

Thoroughly characteristic of Clarke, too, is the conclusion of the film. Back in the tropical bar, the polite stranger to whom Holland has been telling his story stands up, and Holland with him. A pair of handcuffs links their wrists. The wish-fulfilment dream is over; the anti-social impulse, no matter how innocuous, how engagingly personified, must ultimately be restrained. The Lavender Hill Mob was hugely popular, and won an Oscar for its script. It remains lively, inventive, and a pleasure to watch. But it marks an ending; after it, the vitality drained out of Ealing comedy, save only those directed by Mackendrick. Once in place, the handcuffs proved impossible to remove.

—Philip Kemp

LAWRENCE OF ARABIA

UK, 1962

Director: David Lean

Production: Horizon Pictures; color, Super-Panavision 35mm; running time: 222 minutes. Director’s cut released 1989.

Producer: Sam Spiegel; screenplay: Robert Bolt, Michael Wilson; photography: Freddie Young; second unit photography: Nicolas Roeg, Skeets Kelly, Peter Newbrook; editor: Anne V. Oates; assistant director: Roy Stevens; production designer: John Box; art directors: John Stoll, John Box; music: Maurice Jarre; sound editor: Winston Ryder; sound recording: Paddy Cunningham.

Cast: Peter O’Toole (Lawrence); Omar Sharif (Sherif Ali); Anthony Quinn (Auda Abu Tayi); Alec Guinness (Prince Feisal); Jack Hawkins (General Allenby); Jose Ferrer (Turkish Bey); Anthony Quayle (Colonel Brighton); Claude Rains (Mr. Dryden); Arthur Kennedy (Jackson Bentley); Donald Wolfit (General Murray).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Director, Best Photography, Best Score, Best Editing, Best Art Direction, Best Sound, 1962.

Publications

Books:

- Pratley, G., The Cinema of David Lean, New York, 1974.
 Silver, Alain, and James Ursini, David Lean and His Films, New York, 1974.
 Anderegg, M.A., David Lean, Boston 1984.
 Wapshott, Nicholas, Peter O’Toole: A Biography, New York, 1984.
 Silverman, S.M., David Lean, New York, 1989, 1992.
 Morris, R.L., and Lawrence Raskin, Lawrence of Arabia: The 30th Anniversary Pictorial History, New York, 1992.
 Hodson, Joel C., Lawrence of Arabia & American Culture: The Making of a Transatlantic Legend, Westport, 1995.
 Brownlow, Kevin, David Lean, New York, 1997.
 Caton, Steven C., Lawrence of Arabia: A Film’s Anthropology, Berkeley, 1999.

Articles:

- Barra, A., “The Incredible Shrinking Epic,” in American Film (Washington D.C.), March 1989.
 Frumkes, R., “The Restoration of Lawrence of Arabia,” in Films in Review (New York), April and May 1989.
 Solman, G., “Uncertain Glory,” in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1993.
 Caron, A., in Séquences (Montreal), June 1989.
 Combs, R., in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1989.
 Benayoun, R., “The Long Last Cut,” in Positif (Paris), July-August 1989.
 Gauthier, G., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1989.
 Crowds, G., in Cineaste (New York), 1989.
 Bohne, L., “Leaning toward the Past,” in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Fall 1990.

* * *

Lawrence of Arabia has been described as a “thinking man’s epic.”

The film has all the ingredients of a classic adventure yarn. Typically in epics, these ingredients are showcased to the detriment of character and plot in order to keep the action rolling. But in David Lean’s epic, the title character and the political machinations surrounding his exploits take center stage; what’s more, he remains an enigma even as the final credits fade to black.

Like the vast, arid landscape that, in the words of Alec Guinness’s Prince Feisel, proves such a mystical allure for this latest in a line of “desert-loving Englishmen,” the mystery of Lawrence’s character is never quite fathomed. There is no Rosebud here. Even his rape at the hands of the Turks, which Lawrence described in his memoirs as the key assault on “the citadel of my integrity” and which may or may not have revealed to him a latent homosexuality, explains nothing.

The film overwhelms with its images of the desert and men at war, but the uncompromising genius of Lean’s direction, Robert Bolt’s screenplay and Peter O’Toole’s starmaking performance as the obscure British map maker who becomes a national hero only to flee back to obscurity is that the focus always remains on the quest for

Lawrence of Arabia

Lawrence himself. You never stop thinking about and trying to understand him even though the quest ultimately proves unsuccessful, for the filmmakers and for us, just as it did for Lawrence himself. Our final image of the man as he is driven from the scene of his wartime triumphs to a yearned-for life of invisibility is through the windshield of a jeep, the dust-streaked glass obscuring his face. Even the film's initial advertising art (subsequently changed) showing Lawrence in arab head gear, his face in shadow, cued audiences to the puzzle without a solution they were in for. One can't even imagine a film—certainly not an epic one—like this being made today, where it is insisted upon that whatever we know or need to know about a given film's main character(s) is spelled out fully, usually in the first ten minutes.

Lawrence of Arabia appeared at a time when the British cinema that produced it and Lean were taking a decidedly different turn. Lean began his career as an editor then director of small, mostly black and white, dramas about English life drawn from the works of Charles Dickens and Noel Coward. He established himself a master of the epic with The Bridge on the River Kwai (1957), the superlative World War II adventure film that won a slew of Oscars, including one for him as Best Director.

He began preparing Lawrence in 1960 when the foundering British film industry was being reshaped by a younger generation of filmmakers who scorned Lean's classically trained approach to narrative moviemaking and fondness for large scale canvases and subjects. They preferred to train their cameras not on vast landscapes and enigmatic heroes but on working class anti-heroes and the dreariness of British lower class life. Their small, black and white "kitchen sink" dramas, not Lean's behemoth tales of romantic characters swept up in the turbulence of historical events, were the future of British films, they maintained.

After the success of Lawrence, which took longer to make than it took the events the film chronicled to take place, Lean continued to invite scorn by making epics. When Lawrence was restored for re-release in 1989, he explained why. He'd envisioned a future when the astronomical costs of making such movies would eventually become prohibitive, so he made them while he had the chance. But there was more to it. As the curtains opened on the giant 70mm screen at the London premiere of the restored Lawrence, the ailing director, speaking on audio tape, invited the audience to sit back and experience "what the movies used to be"—i.e. something that could not be experienced the same way except at the movies.

His younger colleagues' "kitchen sink" dramas and even his own earlier films in a similar vein could be shown on television with no loss in emotional effect. But not the epic, and certainly not Lawrence. For him a film like Lawrence of Arabia was what cinema in the post-TV era was all about: a grand opportunity for larger than life adventure, in both the making of it and the seeing of it, that should be seized upon if for no other reason than the unlikelihood of it ever coming our way again.

—John McCarty

LEAVING HOME

See HEIMAT; DIE ZWEITE HEIMAT

THE LEOPARD

See IL GATTOPARDO

LETTER FROM AN UNKNOWN WOMAN

USA, 1948

Director: Max Ophüls

Production: A Rampart Production for Universal-International; black and white; running time: 86 minutes (re-released in 1979 in a 90 minute version); length: 7,844 feet. Released April 1948.

Producer: John Houseman; screenplay: Howard Koch, from the story by Stefan Zweig; photography: Frank Planer; editor: Ted J. Kent; sound: Leslie J. Carey, Glenn E. Anderson; art director: Alexander Golitzen; music: Daniele Amfitheatrof, David Tamkin.

Cast: Joan Fontaine (Lisa Berndle); Louis Jourdan (Stefan Brand); Mady Christians (Frau Berndle); Marcel Journet (Johann Stauffer); Art Smith (John); Carol Yorke (Marie); Howard Freeman (Herr Kastner); John Good (Lt. Leopold von Kaltnegger); Leo B. Pessin (Stefan, Jr.); Erskine Sandford (Porter); Otto Waldis (Concierge); Sonia Bryden (Frau Spitzer).

Publications

Script:

Koch, Howard, Letter from an Unknown Woman, edited by Virginia Wright Wexman, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1986.

Books:

Roud, Richard, Index to the Work of Max Ophüls, London, 1958.
Beylie, Claude, Max Ophüls, Brussels, 1958.

Letter from an Unknown Woman

- Annenkov, Georges, Max Ophüls, Paris, 1962.
Beylie, Claude, Max Ophüls, Paris, 1963.
Max Ophüls par Max Ophüls, edited by Robert Laffont, Paris, 1963.
Sarris, Andrew, Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.
Wood, Robin, Personal Views: Explorations in Films, London, 1976.
Willeman, Paul, editor, Ophüls, London, 1978.
Williams, Alan Larson, Max Ophüls and the Cinema of Desire, New York, 1980.
Wilson, George M., Narration in Light: Studies in Cinematic Point of View, Baltimore, Maryland, 1986.
Payán, Miguel Juan, Max Ophüls, Madrid, 1987.
García Riera, Emilio, Max Ophüls, Guadalajara, 1988.
Guérin, William Karl, Max Ophüls, Paris, 1988.
Ophüls, Max, Theater, Hörspiele, Filme, St Ingbert, 1993.
Tassone, Aldo, Max Ophüls: l'enchanteur, Torino, 1994.
White, Susan M., The Cinema of Max Ophüls: Magisterial Vision and the Figure of a Woman, New York, 1995.
Bacher, Lutz, Max Ophüls in the Hollywood Studios, New Brunswick, 1996.
Berthomé, Jean-Pierre, Le plaisir, Paris, 1997.

Articles:

- Hollywood Reporter*, 8 April 1948.
New York Times, 29 April 1948.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1949.
Winnington, Richard, in News Chronicle (London), 7 January 1950.
Sight and Sound (London), February and March 1950.

Ray, Cyril, in Sunday Times (London), 16 July 1950.
 Whitebait, William, in New Statesman (London), 22 July 1950.
 Archer, Eugene, "Ophüls and the Romantic Tradition," in Yale French Studies (New Haven), Summer 1956.
 "Ophüls Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1958.
 Beylie, Claude, in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1969.
 Williams, Forrest, "The Mastery of Movement: An Appreciation of Max Ophüls," in Film Comment (New York), Winter 1969.
 Kerbel, Michael, in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
 Sarris, Andrew, "Max Ophüls: An Introduction," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Summer 1972.
 Camper, Fred, in Monogram (London), no. 5, 1974.
 Greenspun, Roger, in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1975.
 "Ophüls Issue" of Filmkritik (Munich), November 1977.
 Coleman, John, in New Statesman (London), 23 November 1979.
Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), no. 4, 1979.
Positif (Paris), July-August 1980.
 Archibald, Lewis, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
 Perkins, V. F., in Movie (London), Summer 1982.
 Walker, M., "Ophüls in Hollywood," in Movie (London), Summer 1982.
 Modleski, Tania, "Time and Desire in the Woman's Film," in Cinema Journal (Champaign, Illinois), Spring 1984.
Frauen und Film (Frankfurt), December 1985.
 Gallagher, Tag, in Cinema Journal (Champaign, Illinois), Winter 1986.
 Verstraten, P., "Raconter sa propre tragedie: Lettre d'une inconnue," in Iris (Iowa City), no. 8, 1988.
 Cavell, S., "Postscript (1989): To Whom it May Concern," in Critical Inquiry (Chicago), no. 2, 1990.
 Fadda, M., "Lacrime di fantasma," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), September 1991.
 Wood, R., "Letter from an Unknown Woman: The Double Narrative," in Cineaction (Toronto), Spring/Summer 1993.

* * *

The film Letter from an Unknown Woman is such an icon of cinema scholarship that it is difficult to realize it was not well received when it first appeared in the spring of 1948. Described by Bosley Crowther in the New York Times as containing "an hour and a half of wistfulness, of lingering love-lorn expressions and pseudo-Viennese 'schmaltz,'" the movie garnered a series of inconsequential reviews and slipped quietly into obscurity. Letter from an Unknown Woman was Max Ophüls's second Hollywood film after he fled the unstable political situation in Europe in the late 1930s, and although a seasoned director, he was relatively little known in America. In fact, he spent the first six years of his Hollywood exile unemployed until through the efforts of Robert Siodmak, another émigré director, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., asked Ophüls to direct The Exile (1948). It was to be the first of his four American films.

His second directorial opportunity came through the screenwriter Howard Koch, already at work on the script of Letter from the Viennese Stefan Zweig novella Brief einer Unbekannten. John Houseman had been persuaded to produce the film for Joan Fontaine and her husband William Dozier who had just formed Rampart Productions. Koch knew of Ophüls's work, he was later to write, through Liebelei (1932) which was set in Vienna. Houseman also knew the film and approved of using Max on Letter. The collaboration with Koch, Houseman and Rampart Productions proved congenial, for the most part, and the shooting went smoothly with only minor disagreement about the finished musical score, which Ophüls wanted integrated carefully into the film and not just used for background atmosphere. As the critics were to discover somewhat later, Ophüls had made an exceptionally fine film.

If the movie did not attract much attention in the United States, its fate in Great Britain was quite different. Deprived of a London opening it was consigned to the provincial theatres, but due to the intervention of Gavin Lambert and Karel Reisz, then writing for the avant-garde cinema journal Sequence, the film was given a London run some six months after its UK release. The continued interest on the part of Sequence critics kept the interest in Ophüls and his work alive and eventually lead to Richard Roud's index of Ophüls's films and the Ophüls retrospectives at the National Film Theatre and Cinemathèque Française in the late 1950s. A steady series of articles and reassessments appeared during the 1960s, and in 1968 in The American Cinema Andrew Sarris, the influential auteurist critic, placed Ophüls in his pantheon of directors who transcended their materials with a personal vision of the world. What has followed has been an increasing fascination in Ophüls's work and in his Letter from an Unknown Woman.

Of the various approaches taken by critics towards Ophüls's film three stand out as clearly generative. The first was summed up most succinctly by Robin Wood in his 1974 essay "Ewig hin der Liebe Glück" in which he examined the formal properties of Ophüls's cinema. Extending the assessment of Sarris and other formalist critics, Wood set forth some 22 separate categories of stylistic or thematic characteristics to be found in the Ophüls oeuvre. These properties he applied especially to Letter as an embodiment of the romanticism to be found in formal repetition and symmetry in an attempt to elevate the film from a "mere" romantic woman's film to the status of a genuine work of art, albeit in the romance vein. Wood saw the film as being neither debased nor simplified for its attachment to the heroine's yearnings. The sophisticated formal properties of the film elevated its romanticism to art.

The second major critical approach to Letter appeared in 1978 in a publication on the director issued by the British Film Institute and edited by Paul Willemen. As Virginia Wright Wexman has observed, Willemen, as part of the editorial collective which founded Screen, was committed to an ideological perspective which grew out of a synthesis of "semiotics, Althusserian Marxism, Lacanian psychoanalysis, and feminism." The BFI anthology followed the retrospective of Ophüls films at the Edinburgh Film Festival and reflected Willemen's ambivalence towards the auteurist critics who tended to consecrate the director as a great artist. Willemen preferred to examine the films as examples of a far ranging spectrum of political repression which were rooted, according to him, in the commercial, i.e., Hollywood, cinema. Of particular interest to him were the strategies of voyeurism and exhibitionism relating to political questions of gender difference. Ophüls's extraordinary style, under such an examination, revealed a political sub-text which supported the generic and sexual properties of the film. Such an ideological approach exposed social assumptions often obscured by aesthetic criticism. Willemen's analysis opened up Ophüls's text to new interpretations which both enriched the process of watching and of criticism.

Finally, Letter from an Unknown Woman has assumed a central place in the current canon of feminist film criticism. Since the film is easily subsumed into the category of “women’s films” and since the themes of the film, such as desire, personal renunciation, and death, all fall well within the areas traditionally encompassed by the Hollywood film aimed at female audiences, feminist film critics have discovered in the film a congenial ground for exploration. Ophüls’s curious position within the Hollywood system also provides an opportunity for analysis in so far as he was making movies in Hollywood but from a particularly European point of view, a position reinforced by the fact that as opposed to other émigré directors he did not stay in America but returned to Europe to finish out his career.

Within a patriarchal political and economic system, which dominated the production of the “Hollywood Film,” such movies as Letter provide a unique perspective on the place of women both within the system of texts created by the studios and within broader social contexts. If most films project women from a male point of view and determine women through the gaze of the male spectator, some films, such as Letter, offer a slightly different opportunity to “see” women as proprietors of the masculine defining characteristics. The female voice-over and hence the female character in many ways “control” the film, limiting the freedom of the male figures in a reversal of patriarchy. Such an approach greatly problematizes the text and opens it up not only to a variety of readings but to revolutionary ones. Implicit in the text is what the text does not seem to be, and such a recognition significantly alters our experience of the film, of the director, and of the system within which the film was produced.

Max Ophüls’s Letter from an Unknown Woman provides an exemplary instance of the interpretability of artistic texts. Each new generation of film critics has discovered in its experience with the film new perspectives and in the process reinvigorated the text with each examination. If any possibility still exists that Letter from an Unknown Woman is capable of eliciting only a surface wishfulfillment surely such critical resilience should put such fears to rest.

—Charles L. P. Silet

LETYAT ZHURAVLI

(The Cranes are Flying)

USSR, 1957

Director: Mikhail Kalatozov

Production: Mosfilm; black and white, 35mm; running time: 94 minutes, some sources list 97 minutes; length: about 8,697 feet. Released October 1957.

Screenplay: Victor Rozov, from the work Eternally Alive by Rozov; photography: Sergei Urusevsky; editor: M. Timofeyeva; production designer: E. Svidetelev; music: Moisei Vaynberg.

Cast: Tatyana Samolova (Veronika); Alexei Batalov (Boris Borozdine); Vassili Merkuriev (Dr. Fedore Ivanovitch Borozdine); A. Shvorin (Mark); S. Kharitonova (Irina); K. Nikitine (Volodia); Valentin Zubkov (Stépan); Anna Bogdanova (Grandmother); K. Nikitine (Volodya); B. Kokobkin (Tyernov); E. Kupriyanova (Anna Mikhailovna).

Award: Cannes Film Festival, Palme d’Or, 1958.

Publications

Books:

Schnitzer, Luda and Jean, Vingt ans de cinéma soviétique, Paris, 1964.
Rotha, Paul, and Richard Griffith, The Film Till Now, New York, 1967.
Liehm, Mira, and Antonin, The Most Important Art: East European Film after 1945, Berkeley, 1977.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey Two, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1979.

Krasnetskaya, M., Alexei Batalov, Moscow, 1983.

Articles:

Billard, Pierre, in Cinéma (Paris), June 1958.

Martin, André, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1958.

Monod, Martine, “Un Authentique Chef-d’oeuvre,” in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 19 June 1958.

Doniol-Valcroze, Jacques, “Par la grâce du formalisme,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July 1958.

Leyda, Jay, “Qui est Kalatozov,” in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1958.

Dyer, Peter John, in Films and Filming (London), November 1958.

Cros, J. Louis, in Image et Son (Paris), November 1958.

Image et Son (Paris), December 1959.

Lifton, Michael, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1960.

Hibbin, Nina, “Ivan the Magnificent,” in Films and Filming (London), February 1963.

Anninsky, L., in Film a Doba (Prague), 1971.

Yutkevich, S., in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), March 1980.

Zorkaia, N., in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 5, 1995.

* * *

Along with Grigori Chukhrai’s 1959 film Ballada o soldate (Ballad of a Soldier), Letyat Zhuravli won immediate acclaim on its release in the West, including the Palme d’Or at Cannes in 1958, because of its radical departure from the Socialist Realist style that had dominated Soviet cinema under Stalin. It was the product of the slight easing of constraints on Soviet film-makers at the end of the 1950s, following Khrushchev’s famous denunciation of Stalin’s crimes at the 20th Congress of the Soviet Communist Party in 1956. This shift is most apparent, perhaps, in the way that the film replaces the abstract entities—such as “the people,” “the workers,” or “the nation”—that had dominated and defined the narratives of Socialist Realist cinema, with individual characters and their personal aims and desires. Predictably, this was hailed by critics in the West as a welcome return on the part of Soviet cinema to the “universal” themes of humanism that have “no awareness of geographical or political bounds,” as Bosley Crowther aptly put it in his review of the film. However, Letyat Zhuravli goes further than a simple focus on individuals, in its use of the conventions of classic melodrama and its relentless emphasis on the emotional vicissitudes of the romantic couple, to weave its narrative of innocent love ruined by the arbitrary events of a cruel war.

Letyat zhuravli

Veronica, a young Russian woman living in Moscow just before World War II, loves Boris, a factory worker, and they plan to marry. However, when the German army attacks the Eastern Front, Boris dutifully volunteers to fight, and triumphantly marches off to war with his fellow workers. Veronica, left homeless and alone in Moscow after a bombing raid in which her family dies and her home is obliterated, is invited to live with Boris' family by Boris' kind father Fyodor. However, during another dramatic bombing raid, she makes love to Boris' selfish, draft-dodging cousin Mark, and then marries him—even though she still loves Boris—much to the dismay of Fyodor and his family. While Veronica lives miserably with Mark, yearning for letters from Boris and spending her time nursing wounded soldiers, Boris is killed in action. Eventually, Fyodor throws Mark out of his home, having learned that he is a draft-dodger, and Veronica leaves her husband to stay with Boris' family, caring for an orphan she has adopted. Learning of Boris' death from a soldier in his regiment, she nevertheless holds out hope that he has somehow survived, until, in the final scene, she goes to welcome the troops back home from the front and is informed by Boris' closest friend that he had seen Boris die with his own eyes. Now accepting Boris' death, she hands out the flowers she had bought in the hope that Boris would return to the soldiers around her, as a flock of cranes flies over Moscow for the first time since the beginning of the war.

As this synopsis indicates, Letyat Zhuravli is a fairly standard melodrama. The cruel disruption of a young romance by an outside event over which the protagonists have no control: the “evil” relative waiting in the wings to exploit the heroine’s loneliness and vulnerability, the “true” emotions which cannot be expressed because of circumstances, the love that persists in the face of death—all of these are familiar from countless Hollywood narratives. However, within the context of Soviet cinema, the use of a melodramatic plot in a wartime scenario is highly significant. In the cinema under Stalin, the trauma of World War II, in which one in ten Russians lost their lives, had been overwhelmingly represented in terms of the clichés of willing sacrifice and patriotic collective duty, and even the slightest hint at personal suffering had been rigorously excluded. In Letyat Zhuravli, however, suffering, as personified by Veronica, is both foregrounded and made into the very dynamic that drives the narrative forward. It is the pathos of Veronica’s desperate hope that Boris is still alive, when we the audience know he is dead, as well as the impossibility of Veronica’s own circumstances—her hapless and unhappy marriage—that sustains the central drama.

Just as crucially, Veronica's suffering is explicitly linked by the film's melodramatic structure to the war and the topsy-turvy world war produces. Once the war begins, confusion reigns and the safe, habitual social order of the opening sequences of the film is turned upside down. Veronica, for example, cannot find Boris to say good-bye to him in the mass of soldiers marching off to war, and it is in the confusion of a bombing raid, amongst darkness, breaking glass and explosions, that Veronica falls prey to Mark. Thus, Letyat Zhuravli boldly appropriates melodrama to articulate wartime suffering. However, it is also equally distinctive in its use of techniques reminiscent of the revolutionary Soviet cinema of the 1920s prior to the onset of official Socialist Realism. Dynamic, angular framing, extreme close-ups, and superimpositions all combine to create a highly expressionistic film, and it remains interesting today just as much for its stylistic as well as its narrative break with Stalinist Soviet cinema.

—Kris Percival

DER LETZTE MANN

(The Last Laugh)

Germany, 1924

Director: F. W. Murnau

Production: Universum-Film-Aktiengesellschaft (UFA); black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 73 minutes; length: 2,036 meters, 8 reels. Released 23 December 1924, Berlin. Filmed 1924 in UFA studios.

Screenplay: Carl Mayer, under the supervision of Erich Pommer; photography: Karl Freund; production designers: Robert Herlth and Walter Röhrig; accompanying musical score: Guiseppe Becce.

Cast: Emil Jannings (Doorman); Maly Delschaft (His daughter); Max Hiller (Her fiancé); Emilie Kurtz (His aunt); Hans Unterkircher (Manager); Olaf Storm (Young hotel resident); Hermann Valentin (Hotel resident); Emmy Wyda (Thin neighbor); Georg John (Night watchman).

Publications

Books:

- Mitry, Jean, Emil Jannings, Paris, 1927.
 Bie, Richard, Emil Jannings, Berlin, 1936.
 Ihering, Herbert, Emil Jannings, Heidelberg, 1941.
 Kurtz, Rudolph, Emil Jannings, Berlin, 1942.
 Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1947.
 Huff, Theodore, An Index to the Films of F. W. Murnau, London, 1948.

- Borde, Raymond, and others, Le Cinéma réaliste allemand, Paris, 1959.
 Jameux, Charles, Murnau, Paris, 1965.
 Domarchi, Jean, "Murnau," in Anthologie du cinéma I, Paris, 1966.
 Hempel, Rolf, Carl Mayer: Ein Autor schreibt mit der Kamera, Berlin, 1968.
 Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, 1969.
 Manvell, Roger, and Heinrich Fraenkel, The German Cinema, New York, 1971.
 Eisner, Lotte, Murnau, Berkeley, 1973.
 Monaco, Paul, Cinema and Society: France and Germany During the Twenties, New York, 1976.
 Collier, Jo Leslie, From Wagner to Murnau: The Transposition of Romanticism from Stage and Screen, Ann Arbor, 1988.
 Gehler, Fred, Friedrich Wilhelm Murnau, Augsburg, 1990.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 10 December 1924.
New York Times, 21 December 1924.
 Josephson, Matthew, "F. W. Murnau—The German Genius of the Films," in Motion Picture Classic (New York), October 1926.
 Lane, Tamar, "The Last Laugh is on Hollywood," in Motion Picture Magazine (New York), November 1926.
 Blin, Roger, "Murnau—ses films," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), July 1931.
 White, Kenneth, "F. W. Murnau," in Hound and Horn (New York), July–September 1931.
 Wilhelm, Wolfgang, "Carl Mayer," in Sight and Sound (London), July 1944.
 Brunius, Jacques, "Un Hommage au scénariste de Caligari, Carl Mayer," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), Spring 1947.
 Luft, Herbert, "Notes on the World and Work of Carl Mayer," in Quarterly of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Summer 1954.
 Billard, Pierre, "Quarante ans après," in Cinéma (Paris), November 1965.
 Murnau, F. W., "Fire and Ice," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), January 1966.
Image et Son (Paris), no. 214, 1968.
 "Carl Mayer e l'espressionismo Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), 1969.
 Truscott, Harold, "Emil Jannings—A Personal View," in Silent Picture (London), Autumn 1970.
 Guillermo, Gilberto Perez, "F. W. Murnau: An Introduction," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
 Helman, A., in Kino (Warsaw), April 1973.
 Rayns, Tony, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1974.
 "Der Letzte Mann Issue" of Filmcritica (Rome), July 1974.
 Koch, V., in Ekran (Ljubljana), no. 3–4, 1977.
 "Murnau Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July–September 1977.
 Wynne, Cicely, in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 3 October 1978.
 Cardullo, B., "Der Letzte Mann Gets the Last Laugh: F. W. Murnau's Comic Vision," in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Fall 1981.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, "Secret Affinities: F. W. Murnau," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1988–89.
 Wolf, R., and others, "De films van F. W. Murnau," in Skrien (Amsterdam), February–March 1990.

* * *

Had scenarist Carl Mayer not quarrelled with director Lupu Pick, his collaborator on two previous films, Scherben and Sylvester, Der letzte Mann would undoubtedly have been more like its Kammerspiel (literally “chamber play”) predecessors. In these two films Mayer and Pick had abandoned the Expressionist concern for subjective vision and instead dealt with the intimate details of petit bourgeois existence. Mayer and Pick together create a Stimmung or “mood” of inevitable domestic tragedy brought on by the workings of instinct, a force so natural and all-conquering that it cannot even be expressed in language (hence, in part, the films’ lack of inter-titles). This treatment of the workings of obsession, of course, suggests a rapprochement between the psychologism of Caligari and the Zolaesque determinism suitable for presenting a social critique. In fact, it is often noted that the Kammerspiel films as a group can be viewed as continuing the Expressionist examination of disturbed minds and emotions within settings and with characters that are essentially realistic. In the case of Pick’s two efforts with Mayer, this realism even takes on socio-political overtones, developed by the contrast between the miseries of lower-middle class existence and the easy, but unattainable life of the rich.

Even with F. W. Murnau as director, Der letzte Mann has much in common with Mayer’s two previous films, which together form a triptych. Once again, the narrative deals with the hardships suffered by the petit bourgeoisie. The central character is a hotel doorman who, as such, must serve the rich, but is still admired by his fellow tenement dwellers because of the status implied by his ornate uniform. Removed from his post because of old age, the doorman cannot adjust to his new position as lavatory attendant. His desperate struggle to retain his former standing in the neighborhood eventually fails, and he becomes an object of ridicule and shame. The doorman’s decline takes on a larger socio-political significance as he seems the only mediator between life in the slums and in the luxury hotel. The film’s ending, however, undercuts this sharp critique of lower-middle-class disenchantment, symbolized, in a specifically German fashion, by the loss of the uniform. When the doorman is reduced to utter abjectness, the film’s only inter-title declares that, although in the real world he would have no chance, the filmmakers will have mercy on him. What follows defies the film’s carefully developed vraisemblance. The doorman becomes the beneficiary of an eccentric American millionaire who, having willed his fortune to the “last man” to serve him, had died in the hotel lavatory. The film ends with the doorman and his partner, the night watchman, enjoying a suitably vulgar and ostentatious dinner in the hotel dining room and leaving for parts unknown in a huge limousine. The carnival celebration of Der letzte Mann’s conclusion finds no equivalent in the unrelieved grimness of the earlier Kammerspiel film.

The differences between Der letzte Mann and its predecessors, however, are not simply those of narrative construction. Scherbern and Sylvester attained only limited critical and commercial success, while Der letzte Mann was hailed as a masterpiece both in Germany and abroad. It became one of the most important films to emerge from Weimar Germany and was influential in Hollywood, where it aroused an enthusiasm for German films and filmmakers that was to last for many years. Much of the acclaim centered around the cinematic techniques devised by Mayer, Murnau, and the cameraman Karl Freund to present the narrative.

Murnau often receives full credit for inventing the “unchained camera” that explores both the inner and outer worlds of Der letzte Mann, but the innovations resulted from collaborative effort. Murnau, more than Pick, was able to realize Mayer’s ideas about dynamic and flexible point of view; his previous work, particularly in Nosferatu, reveals an expert handling of camera placement and angles. Griffith may have invented both tracking movements and point-of-view editing, but these elements of film grammar are refined and extended in Der letzte Mann. In the famous drunk scene, the camera records the doorman’s distorted perceptions, an effect Freund achieved by strapping the camera to his chest and staggering about the set. In the dream sequence that follows, Murnau suggests an even more subjective experience, the distortions imposed by the unconscious upon conscious concerns; here the Expressionist influence is strongest and is achieved largely through special effects, not, as in Caligari, through set design.

This linkage between the camera and the doorman’s perceptions or feelings is not sustained. Several sequences suggest the camera’s independence from both narrative and character. In the opening sequence, a long travelling shot, entirely unmotivated, takes the spectator down the hotel elevator, through the lobby, and out the revolving door that serves as symbol of fate. Freund achieved this effect by mounting the camera on a bicycle. Later, at a crucial moment in the story, the camera positions itself outside a glass wall and, by means of a discreet dissolve, gradually moves into the room to record the interview between the doorman and the manager. When the doorman is later accused of slackness by an irate customer, the camera refuses to follow the manager down to the lavatory. In these sequences and others, the camera calls attention to itself rather than presenting the narrative through the doorman’s experience. This reflexivity finds its culmination in the artificiality of the film’s conclusion.

Der letzte Mann is noteworthy not simply because it inaugurated the use of subjective camera, but because it revealed the potentially complex relationship between camera and narrative. If its elaborate and virtuoso production exceeds the intimate atmosphere of Kammerspiel films, lending the doorman’s simple story a grandiosity it can hardly sustain, it is because Murnau, Mayer and Freund discovered storytelling techniques that could barely be contained by the limitations of that genre.

—R. Barton Palmer

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF COLONEL BLIMP

UK, 1943

Directors: Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger

Production: The Archers; Technicolor; running time: 163 minutes, length: 14,701 feet. Released June 1943.

Producers: Michael Powell, Emeric Pressburger; screenplay: Michael Powell, Emeric Pressburger, from the cartoon character created by David Low; photography: Georges Périnal; process photography: W. Percy Day; camera operators: Geoffrey Unsworth, Jack Cardiff, Harold Haysom; editor: John Seabourne; sound recordists: C. C.

The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp

Stevens, Desmond Dew; production designer: Alfred Junge; costume design: Joseph Bato, Matilda Etches; music: Allan Gray.

Cast: Anton Walbrook (Theo Kretschmar-Schuldorff); Deborah Kerr (Edith Hunter/Barbara Wynne/Angela Cannon); Roger Livesey (General Clive Wynne-Candy); Roland Culver (Colonel Betteridge); Harry Welchman (Major Davies); Arthur Wontner (Embassy Counsellor); Albert Lieven (von Ritter); John Laurie (Murdoch); James McKechnie (Lieutenant "Spud" Wilson); David Hutcheson (Hoppy); Ursula Jeans (Frau von Kalteneck); Reginald Tate (van Zijl); A. E. Matthews (President of Tribunal); Neville Mapp (Stuffy Graves); Vincent Holman (Club Porter, 1942); Spencer Trevor (Period Blimp); James Knight (Club Porter, 1942); Dennis Arundell (Cafe Orchestra Leader); David Ward (Kaunitz); Jan van Loewen (Indignant Citizen); Valentine Dyall (von Schönborn); Carl Jaffé (von Reumann); Eric Maturin (Colonel Goodhead); Frith Banbury (Baby-Face Fitzroy); Robert Harris (Embassy Secretary); Count Zichy (Colonel Borg); Jane Millican (Nurse Erna); Phyllis Morris (Pebble); Muriel Aked (Aunt Margaret); Captain W. H. Barrett, U.S. Army (Texan); Corporal Thomas Palmer, U.S. Army (Sergeant); Yvonne Andree (Nun); Marjorie Gresley (Matron); Felix Aylmer (Bishop); Helen Debroy (Mrs. Wynne); Norman Pierce (Mr. Wynne); Edward Cooper (BBC Official); Joan Swinstead (Secretary).

Publications

Script:

Powell, Michael, The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp, London, 1994.

Books:

Robson, E. W. and M. M., The Shame and Disgrace of Colonel Blimp, London, 1943.

Durnat, Raymond, A Mirror for England: British Movies from Austerity to Affluence, London, 1970.

Christie, Ian, editor, Powell, Pressburger and Others, London, 1978.

Cosandey, Roland, editor, Retrospective: Powell and Pressburger, Locarno, 1982.

Gottler, Fritz and others, Living Cinema: Powell and Pressburger, Munich, 1982.

- Aldgate, Anthony, and Jeffrey Richards, Best of British: Cinema and Society 1930–1970, Oxford, 1983.
- Christie, Ian, Arrows of Desire: The Films of Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger, London, 1985, 1994.
- Martini, Emanuela, editor, Powell and Pressburger, Bergamo, 1986.
- Powell, Michael, A Life in Movies: An Autobiography, London, 1986, 1998.
- Powell, Michael, Million-Dollar Movie, New York, 1995.
- Howard, James, Michael Powell, North Pomfret, 1996.
- Salwolke, Scott, The Films of Michael Powell & the Archers, Lanham, 1997.

Articles:

- Monthly Film Bulletin* (London), no. 114, 1943.
- Kine Weekly* (London), 10 June 1943.
- Variety* (New York), 23 June 1943.
- Motion Picture Herald* (New York), 10 July 1943.
- New York Times*, 30 March 1945.
- Agee, James, in Agee on Film I, New York, 1958.
- Taylor, John Russell, "Michael Powell: Myths and Supermen," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1978.
- Christie, Ian, "The Colonel Blimp File," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1978–79.
- Badder, David, "Powell and Pressburger: The War Years," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1978–79.
- Everson, William K., "Michael Powell," in Films in Review (New York), August–September 1980.
- Thompson, David, "The Films of Michael Powell: A Romantic Sensibility," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), November 1980.
- "Special Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 December 1980.
- Bassan, Raphaël, "Michael Powell: Un Orfèvre de l'objectif," in Image et Son (Paris), May 1981.
- McVay, Douglas, "Cinema of Enchantment: The Films of Michael Powell," in Films and Filming (London), December 1981.
- Millar, Gavin, in Listener (London), 25 August 1983.
- Scorsese, Martin, in Time Out (London), 18–24 July 1985.
- Powell, Michael, in City Limits (London), 19–25 July 1985.
- Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1985.
- Baxter, Brian, in Films and Filming (London), August 1985.
- Bourget, E., "Colonel Blimp: Le voyeur," in Positif (Paris), September 1992.
- Chapman, James, "The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp (1943) Reconsidered," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon), vol. 15, no. 1, March 1995.
- "Written, Produced and Directed by Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger: Film Auteurs in the 1940s," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, no. 2, March–April 1995.
- Gough-Yates, Kevin, "Pressburger: England and Exile: Emeric Pressburger," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 5, no. 12, December 1995.

* * *

With The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp, the idiosyncratic partnership of Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger hit its stride. Though they had already made four highly individual films together, Blimp was the first for their newly formed independent production company, The Archers—and also their first movie in colour. Not that monochrome could be said to cramp their imaginations—witness A Canterbury Tale or I Know Where I'm Going—but colour, and especially the heightened, unreal quality of 1940s Technicolor, gave full play to the richly stylised extravagance of their vision.

If realism never counted for much in Powell-Pressburger's films, the same went for intellectual consistency, and Blimp thrives on ambiguity to the point of blatant self-contradiction. The original Blimp, as created by the great political cartoonist David Low, stood for all that was most crassly reactionary in the British military establishment. The film's Blimp, incarnated by Roger Livesey's General Clive Wynne-Candy, is a lovable old walrus, maybe a touch set in his ways, but altogether a spirited survivor from a more honourable age. Livesey gives the performance of a lifetime, but wholly misses the mean, vicious side of Blimp which Olivier, Powell-Pressburger's initial choice, might well have brought to the role.

Given this central characterisation, it's inevitable that the film's ostensible message (most clearly enunciated by the "good German," Theo Kretschmar-Schuldorff) and its emotional drift should be at odds almost from the start. "They are children. War is playing cricket," Theo reflects about his captors after World War I; and later, with the next conflict under way: "If you let yourselves be defeated by [the Nazis], just because you are too fair to hit back the same way they hit at you, there won't be any methods but Nazi methods . . . This is not a gentleman's war. This time you are fighting for your very existence." His views are implemented by the young lieutenant in the 1943 framing episode, pulling a sneak attack "by the authority of these guns and these men"—and we hear similar sentiments from Edith, the young woman Candy meets, loves and loses to Theo in 1902 Berlin: "Good manners cost us . . . 6,000 men killed and 20,000 men wounded—and two years of war. When with a little common sense and bad manners there would have been no war at all."

Yet this advocacy of realpolitik is constantly undermined, not only by Candy's own actions—far from displaying "bad manners" in Berlin, he accedes to a duel with scrupulous correctness—but by the affection with which the film portrays both him, and the era he represents. In a British film of this period, we might expect to see Wilhelmine Germany peopled with proto-Nazis; Powell-Pressburger view the details of ceremony and protocol with a sly delight, tinged with nostalgia, that anticipates the Ophüls of Lola Montès or La Ronde. As the duel—staged with hieratic formality in a high, white gymnasium—gets started, the camera pulls up and away through the roof in a dreamlike movement, to gaze out across a prospect of nocturnal spires swathed in drifting snow.

But again—since Blimp is nothing if not multi-layered—there's the covert implication that Candy preserves his ideals only through wilful ignorance, overlooking dirty tricks by others on his behalf. His mission in Berlin was to counter shameful rumours of the British herding Boer women and children into concentration camps—which of course were quite true. "Clean fighting, honest soldiering have won," he muses in 1918, having left a South African major—the irony is evident—to interrogate prisoners by methods less scrupulous than his own. Throughout, the film is sustained and vitalised by these ideological tensions, which save it from slipping into the bland, celebratory mode of such Hollywood counterparts as Forever and a Day—and which could be seen as reflecting the disparate outlooks of its begetters, with Candy an ironic portrait of Powell, the romantic-Tory Englishman, and Theo (astringently played by Anton Walbrook, who wrote most of his own dialogue) standing in for the mid-European Pressburger.

Such ambiguity, at a time of national crisis, was scarcely calculated to appeal to the authorities. Churchill detested Blimp and did his best to get it banned. He failed, doing the film nothing but good at the box-office; but his curse may have had some delayed effect. For years, the only available prints were heavily truncated and rearranged, making nonsense of the subtle flashback structure. In the late 1970s, though, the National Film Archive mounted a rescue operation; and the complete version was restored to circulation, to take its place as one of the most intriguing and complex treatments of the national wartime myth.

—Philip Kemp

LIFE AND NOTHING MORE

See AND LIFE GOES ON

LIFE IS SWEET

UK, 1990

Director: Mike Leigh

Production: Thin Man, in association with Film Four International, British Screen; colour; 35mm; running time: 103 minutes; length: 9131 feet.

Producer: Simon Channing-Williams; screenplay: Mike Leigh; photography: Dick Pope; editor: Jon Gregory; assistant directors: Gus MacLean, Simon Moseley, David Gilchrist, Hedda Moore; production designer: Alison Chitty; art director: Sophie Becher; music: Rachel Portman; sound editor: Sue Baker; sound recording: Malcolm Hirst, Dick Lewzey.

Cast: Alison Steadman (Wendy); Jim Broadbent (Andy); Claire Skinner (Natalie); Jane Horrocks (Nicola); Stephen Rea (Patsy); Timothy Spall (Aubrey); David Thewlis (Nicola's lover); Moya Brady (Paula); David Neilson (Steve).

Publications

Books:

Clements, Paul, The Improvised Play: The Work of Mike Leigh, London, 1983.

Coveney, Michael, World According to Mike Leigh, London, 1996.

Carney, Raymond, and Leonard Quart, The Films of Mike Leigh: Embracing the World, New York, 2000.

Leigh, Mike, Mike Leigh: Interviews, edited by Howie Movshovitz, Jackson, 2000.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 24 December 1990.

Pym, J., and M.Kermode, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1991.

Ostria, V., "Le sitcom idéal," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1991.

Kennedy, H., in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1991.

Cieutat, M., in Positif (Paris), October 1991.

Klawans, Stuart, "Life Is Sweet," in Nation, vol. 253, no. 19, 2 December 1991.

Rafferty, Terrence, "Shocks to the System (Mike Leigh Film Retrospective)," in New Yorker, vol. 68, no. 1, 24 February 1992.

Bowman, James, "Life Is Sweet," in American Spectator, vol. 25, no. 3, March 1992.

Quart, B., and others, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1992.

Bates, P., in Cineaste (New York), 1992.

Ellickson, Lee, and Richard Porton, "I Find the Tragicomic Things in Life: An Interview with Mike Leigh," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 3, Summer 1993.

"Leigh, Mike," in Current Biography, vol. 55, no. 6, June 1994.

Coen, Stephanie, "More Than Words: An Interview with Mike Leigh," in American Theatre (New York), vol. 12, no. 5, May-June 1995.

Quart, Leonard, "Raising Questions and Positing Possibilities: An Interview with Mike Leigh," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 22, no. 4, Fall 1996.

* * *

In his contributory note to the 1990 London Film Festival Programme, Director Mike Leigh mischievously lists an alphabet of some 104 incidental items, issues, and ideas he suggests Life Is Sweet is about. These include accordians, Princess Margaret, and stuffed dogs, elements that figure fleetingly in the film, only part of its rich tapestry of ordinary, everyday life. But a more relevant vocabulary emerges which proves to be the underlying organising principle of the film—anorexia, catering, chocolate, chips, dieting, eatables, fatness, garlic, jam, nibbling, nutrition, pineapples, prawns, quiche, restaurants, roast lamb, sugar and spice, and tripe all detail the film's central premise of playing out the intricacies of personal relationships through scenarios involving food, an ever rich metaphor.

The story concerns Andy, a chef who buys a caravan-cum-snack bar in an attempt to liberate himself from a hum-drum job. His daughter, Nicola, is an anorexic who secretly gorges on chocolate and makes herself sick. Friend of the family Aubrey opens the "Regret Rien" restaurant, providing an assortment of unusual and unappealing nouvelle cuisine such as "pork cyst" while Wendy, Andy's happy-go-lucky wife, accepts a temporary job as a waitress in Aubrey's establishment. These are merely brief summations of highly nuanced personal stories, each person seeking out some bigger purpose beyond Leigh's beautifully observed and carefully choreographed representation of social existence, an existence informed by dull routine, life-sustaining rituals and the intensity and insistence of habit.

Andy and Wendy are inspirational characters because they have not been deadened by their experience of life. Almost relentlessly cheerful, they enjoy their togetherness and share a playfulness and good humour that emerges from their complete trust in, and love for, each other. Having survived the initial difficulties of becoming pregnant with their twin daughters, Nicola and Natalie, when they were young, Andy and Wendy possess a stability and determination which enables them to engage with life in a positive way. Both take pleasure in the apparently banal, but they invest the banal with an energy and excitement that renders it rich and fulfilling. The source of their joy and optimism is family life, even despite the difficulties they experience with the deeply troubled, anorexic Nicola, who is perpetually anxious and antagonistic, taking solace in a hollow sounding and ill-informed commitment to feminism and political correctness. The deep-seated self-loathing that characterises Nicola is the underlying narrative tension in Life Is Sweet; this tension emerges in one of Leigh's customary scenes of emotional revelation—a necessary crisis in the process of healing and redemption. Rejected by her boyfriend, who refuses to satisfy her perverse sexual needs, Nicola is humiliated by her inability to articulate her feelings or experience intimacy. She does not even trust the affection of her mother, and it is this that informs one of the film's climactic scenes as Wendy addresses Nicola's joylessness and inner pain, encouraging her to fight back and not to give in, especially as she had once nearly died from starvation herself. The underlying principle here is that life is precious and must be lived positively, even in the face of great trial.

Life Is Sweet

Natalie, by contrast, is stable and well adjusted. She enjoys family life, going to the pub with her friends, and anticipating her holiday to the United States. Natalie is a employed as a plumber and clearly likes the independence her job gives her—but she also harbours a longing for a family herself. Leigh is careful not to overstate these issues, as he wishes to illustrate how ordinary people merely endure their fate. Occasional scenes reveal private preoccupations in public dialogues, demonstrating different degrees of inner turmoil beneath socially conditioned modes of behaviour. Natalie discusses having a family with Nicola, but Nicola not surprisingly resists, determined as she is to distance herself from anyone else's concern for, or interest in, her life. This situation changes in the final scene of the film, after Nicola's emotional crisis with her mother, when Natalie tries to offer Nicola comfort and support. Their exchange, muted and tentative though it is, signals reconciliation and growth. The comfortable silence they share is hopeful and secure. It is in these scenes that Leigh successfully shows the inhibitions and limitations in his characters. "Life Is Sweet" if we accept our flaws, our self-delusions, and our inadequacies, yet still retain the capability to love.

It is perhaps Wendy who most exemplifies this principle. She supports Aubrey in his doomed enterprise of opening a restaurant and even endures the horrendous (if hilarious) opening night, when Aubrey gets drunk and makes a pass at her (he ends up semi-naked among the tables he has up-turned in his frustration). Wendy also supports Andy's snack-bar venture in the full knowledge that it more represents Andy's desire to be successful on his own terms than a genuine possibility for change. Wendy enables her daughters to accept themselves and still believes that life is worth living. She is perhaps one of Leigh's most heart-warming and moving characters in that she embodies hope in an often hopeless world.

—Paul Wells

THE LIFE OF OHARU

See SAIKAKU ICHIDAI ONNA

THE LIGHT

See YEELEN

LIMITE

Brazil, 1931

Director: Mario Peixoto

Production: Mario Peixoto; silent, black and white; running time: 120 minutes. Released 17 May 1931. Filmed in the South littoral of Rio de Janeiro.

Producer: Mario Peixoto; screenplay: Mario Peixoto; photography: Edgar Brazil; editor: Mario Peixoto; musical director: Brutus Pedreira; director's assistant: Rui Costa.

Cast: Olga Breno (Woman number 1); Taciana Rei (Woman number 2); Carmen Santos (The Whore); Mario Peixoto (The Man at the cemetery); Brutus Pedreira (Man number 2 and the pianist); Edgar Brazil (The Man asleep at the cinema); Faciana Rei; Raul Schnoor.

Publications

Script:

de Mello, Sãoulo Pereira, Limite, filme de Mario Peixoto, Edição Inelivro/Funarte, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 1979.

Books:

Andrade, R., and others, Il Cinema Brasileiro, Silva Editore, n.d.
 Rocha, Glafuber, Revisão crítica do cinema brasileiro, Editora Civilização Brasileira, Rio de Janeiro, 1963.
 Bernadet, Jean-Claude, Brasil em tempo de cinema, Paz e Terra, 1977.
 Ferreira, Jairo, Cinema de invenção, Embrafilme/Max Limonad, São Paulo, 1986.
 Gomes, Paulo Emilio Salles, Crônica de Cinema no Suplemento Literário, Embrafilme/Paz e Terra, Rio de Janeiro, 1982.
 Salem, Helena, 90 Anos de Cinema, Uma adentura brasileira, Editora Nova Fronteira, Rio de Janeiro, 1988.
 Peixoto, Mário, Limite: "Scenario Original," Rio de Janeiro, 1996.

Articles:

Jornal do Brasil (Rio de Janeiro), 25 July 1970.
 Azeredo, Ely, Jornal do Brasil (Rio de Janeiro), 28 August 1977.
 Ferreira, Fernando, O Globo (Rio de Janeiro), 26 May 1978.
 Rocha, Glauber, Folha de São Paulo, São Paulo, 3 June 1978.
O Estado de São Paulo (São Paulo), 11 June 1978.
 Schiller, Beatriz, Jornal do Brasil (Rio de Janeiro), 2 May 1979.
 Mello, Sãoulo Pereira de, 50 Anos de Limite (pressbook), 1981.
 Bassan, R., "Le mythe Limite," in Avant-Scène (Paris), April 1983.
 Chnaiderman, Miriam, "Filmes que olham," Folha de São Paulo, 8 October 1988.
 Mello, Sãoulo Pereira de, Ver Limite (São Paulo), December/January/February, 1990.
Folha de São Paulo, 17 May 1991.
Variety (New York), 10 August 1992.

* * *

On May 17, 1931, the first public screening of Limite, directed by the 19 year old novice Mario Peixoto, took place in a cinema in downtown Rio de Janeiro. It is said that commotion and controversy broke out at the end of the screening. Despite the immediate enthusiasm of some intellectuals, the film failed to work any magic on the public or distributors. After a few more screenings, Limite was withdrawn, and remained, for the next 50 years, in the dark, surrounded by mystery and controversy. It is, without a doubt, the most legendary of all Brazilian films.

During these 50 years, everything has been said about Limite—even that it was never made. The career of its creator only added to the mystique. Mario Peixoto, who wrote, produced, directed, and acted in (he is the man in the cemetery) the film died in 1992, leaving two unfinished films dating from the 1930s (Onde a Terra Acaba and Maré Baixa), an autobiographical novel, poetry, and an unfilmed screenplay, A Alma Segundo Salustre. He spent the greater part of his life in isolation on an island off the coast of Rio de Janeiro, near to some of the Limite locations, surrounded by his art collection.

In 1978, 20 years of restoration work by the physicist and intellectual Plínio Sussekind Rocha and Sãoulo Pereira de Mello put Limite back on the screen, at its original speed of 16 frames per second. The difficulties of making the film in the first place were known; its re-emergence showed that it had lasted through the laborious reconstruction process and that it continued to exercise its magic, despite an absence of 50 years. Three hundred critics and film specialists, consulted in 1989, rated Limite the most important Brazilian film.

Inspiration for Limite—the chained woman on the cover of the magazine Vu—came to Mario Peixoto, then a student in Paris, in 1928. To tell the story of Limite, however, is to over-simplify its aesthetic range, to denigrate its daring narrative and the impact of its form. The psychological depth of its characters is lost in description; its mystery becomes banal. Limite stands apart from everything else that was happening at that time in the embryonic Brazilian film industry for its audacity in a context that permitted no experimentation. Through flash-backs, it tells the story of three characters, a man and two women, who are adrift at sea. The film's free narrative style can be traced to the European fashion avant-garde of the 1920s, its editing to influences of the Soviet school. Its setting, however, is genuinely Brazilian, with its seascapes, luxuriant vegetation, and typical scenes of doors and window frames in poor villages.

The restorer of the film, Sulo Pereira de Mello, defines the film: "Limite is a cosmic tragedy, a cry of anguish, a piercing meditation on human limitations, a painful and icy acknowledgment of human defeat. It is a tragic film, a glacial tragedy."

More than a mere vehicle for one or three stories, Limite expresses defeat and desolation, and the impotence of the three characters, adrift forever, at outs with the forces of nature. This defeat is shown through the careful editing, paced and rhythmical, replete with dissolving images (such as the wheel of a train which becomes the wheel of a sewing machine) or the alternating close-ups which reshape parts of the body (feet, eyes, neck, mouths, hair) and inanimate objects (the magnificent sequence of the sewing accessories—buttons, cotton reels, scissors). Another example of skillful editing which produces a highly impactful scene takes place in a cinema, during a Chaplin screening. Mario Peixoto rapidly alternates clips from the film with shots of the cackling mouths of the audience, producing a sequence of high drama.

Virtually minimalist portrayals express human despair, not through broad gestures or exalted utterings, but through inert bodies, blank and forlorn stares. Dating from the transition from silent to spoken films, Limite has but three titles, and imparts an eloquent silence, punctuated only by a superb sound-track, organized by Brutus Pedreira (who also acts in the film), including compositions by Eric Satie, Debussy, and Stravinsky, among others.

Mario Peixoto's castaways exhaust the limits of their strength and their hope; they live an impotent challenge to the forces of nature, perhaps the principal element in the film. The timing of the scenes, the imaginative framings and the rhythm and tension of the editing are impressive; the beauty of the images is registered by notable photographer Edgar Brasil. His camera, unlike his characters, enjoys total freedom, either to remain motionless or to spin 360 crazy degrees to capture the final storm.

A young man's only film, in no manner does Limite appear to be the work of a novice. At every level the high standards and confidence of a director who had fully honed the tools of his trade are evident, as are his existentialist convictions. Today, Limite, available in video and shown at several international festivals, is exposed to fresh scrutiny which renews its impact and mystery. But the riddle of its creator, perhaps an unwitting victim of having reached his creative limits with his first film, persists; Mario Peixoto spent the next 60 years of his life as a voluntary castaway from his time, reliving the isolation of the characters of his first and only film.

—Susana Schild

LITTLE CAESAR

USA, 1930

Director: Mervyn LeRoy

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 77 minutes. Released January 1931. Filmed summer-fall 1930 in Warner Bros. studios. Cost budgeted at £700,000.

Screenplay: Frances Faragogh and Robert E. Lee, from a novel by William B. Burnett; photography: Tony Gaudio; editor: Ray Curtiss; art director: Anton Grot; music director: Erno Rapee.

Cast: Edward G. Robinson (Cesare Bandello, alias Rico); Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. (Joe Massara); Glenda Farrell (Olga Stasoff); Sidney Blackmer (Big Boy); Thomas Jackson (Sergeant Flaherty); Ralph Ince (Pete Montana); William Collier, Jr. (Tony Passa); Maurice Black (Little Arnie Lorch); Stanley Fields (Sam Vettori); George E. Stone (Otero); Armand Kaliz (DeVoss); Nick Bela (Ritz Colonna); Noel Madison (Pepi); Ben Hendricks, Jr. (Kid Bean); Lucille La Verne (Ma Magdalena); Landers Stevens (Commissioner McClure); George Daly (Machine gunner); Ernie Adams (Cashier); Larry Steers (Cafe guest); Louis Natheaux (Hood); Kerman Cripps (Detective).

Publications

Script:

Faragogh, Frances, and Robert E. Lee, Little Caesar, edited by Gerald Peary, Madison, Wisconsin, 1981.

Books:

- Tyler, Parker, The Hollywood Hallucination, New York, 1944.
 LeRoy, Mervyn, as told to Alyce Canfield, It Takes More Than Talent, New York, 1953.
 Connell, Brian, Knight Errant: A Biography of Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., New York, 1955.
 Everson, William K., The Bad Guys, New York, 1964.
 Baxter, John, The Gangster Film, New York, 1970.
 McArthur, Colin, Underworld U.S.A., London, 1971.
 Lee, Raymond, and B. C. Van Hecke, Gangsters and Hoodlums: The Underworld in Cinema, New York, 1971.
 Bergman, Andrew, We're in the Money: Depression America and Its Films, New York, 1971.
 Parish, James Robert, and Alvin H. Marill, The Cinema of Edward G. Robinson, South Brunswick, New Jersey, 1972.
 Canham, Kingsley, The Hollywood Professionals, vol. 5, 1973, London.
 Robinson, Edward G., and Leonard Spigelgass, All My Yesterdays, New York, 1973.
 Kaminsky, Stuart M., American Film Genres, Dayton, Ohio, 1974; revised edition, Chicago, 1985.
 LeRoy, Mervyn, Take One, New York, 1974.
 Parish, James Robert, and Michael Pitts, The Great Gangster Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1976.
 Shadoian, Jack, Dreams and Dead Ends: The American Gangster/Crime Film, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1977.
 Clarens, Carlos, Crime Movies, New York, 1980.
 Schatz, Thomas, Hollywood Genres, New York, 1981.
 Marill, Alvin H., The Complete Films of Edward G. Robinson, Secaucus, 1990.
 Munby, Jonathan, Public Enemies, Public Heroes: Screening the Gangster from Little Caesar to Touch of Evil, Chicago, 1999.

Little Caesar

Articles:

- Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 10 January 1931.
Variety (New York), 14 January 1931.
New Yorker, 17 January 1931.
 LeRoy, Mervyn, "The Making of Mervyn LeRoy," in Films in Review (New York), May 1953.
 Eyles, Allen, "Edward G. Robinson," in Films and Filming (London), January 1964.
 Roman, Robert, "Edward G. Robinson," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1966.
 Warshow, Robert, "The Gangster as Tragic Hero," in The Immediate Experience, New York, 1970.
Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), June 1971.
 Kaminsky, Stuart M., "Little Caesar and Its Role in the Gangster Film Genre," in Journal of Popular Culture (Bowling Green, Ohio), Summer 1972.
 Kjørup, S., "Klassiske gangsterfilm og deres baggrund," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), August 1973.
 Peary, Gerald, "Vers une définition du film de gangster," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1975.

- Monthly Film Bulletin* (London), November 1975.
 Canham, Kingsley, "Mervyn LeRoy: Star-Making, Studio Systems, and Style," in The Hollywood Professionals 5, London, 1976.
 Perez, M., in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 October 1979.

* * *

Little Caesar, like any of the early 1930s gangster films, provides a convenient starting point for discussing four historical (and traditional) topics: the relationship between film and society, generic evolution, censorship and self-regulation, and sound technology. I wish to stress the interdependence of these four aspects.

Many historians cite the gangster film as one of the Hollywood genres which emerged with the dissemination of sound technology. The colloquial dialogue, jazz music, and sound effects clearly help delineate the genre, but nonetheless, the gangster film began during the silent era. Sound technology merely provided the means for a secondary step in the genre's evolution. The power of this "second phase" gangster film stems from its contemporaneous setting and social commentary on violence, organized crime, Prohibition, and the Depression, and the urban environment. Addressing such topical subjects invoked the threat of censorship and led to the industry's response of self-regulation. This in turn forced the genre to change once again. Since Little Caesar seems most readily and specifically classified as a gangster film (as opposed to a sound film or a self-regulation film) I will focus my discussion around the film as an example of the gangster genre.

Thomas Schatz, in Hollywood Genres, borrows from Christian Metz and Henri Focillon to analyze the evolution of genres. He proposes four stages (from Focillon): "experimental" which establishes visual, structural, and thematic conventions; "classical" which reifies the conventions and uses them to directly address cultural values; "refined" which adds visual and structural flourishes but maintains cultural values through reified thematic concerns; and "baroque" which employs self-reflexivity, intertextuality, and most importantly, deconstructs themes and cultural values. I need only address the first three stages for Little Caesar.

The silent gangster films like D. W. Griffith's Musketeers of Pig Alley (1912), Howard Hughes's The Racket (1927), and Josef von Sternberg's "trilogy" of Underworld (1927), The Dragnet (1928), and Thunderbolt (1929), and the early sound films like Thunderbolt (which began production as a silent but also released in a sound version) and Bryan Foy's The Lights of New York (1928) easily fit the "experimental" label. They developed the basic conventions of the genre, but failed to establish a strong and direct connection to the culture.

By the early 1930s, sound technology posed few problems; the "blimped" camera allowed exterior shooting and mobility and sound-on-film guaranteed synchronous projection. The Depression entered its worst period. Prohibition drew to a close and, as it did, gang wars escalated; the St. Valentine's Day Massacre of 1929 focussing public attention on the organized power and violence of the gangster. This combination of events provided the necessary background for the "classical" phase. Films of this stage, which Little Caesar initiated, include two other "standards": Public Enemy (1931) and Scarface (1932). Together these three films express the visual, structural, and thematic values most closely associated with the genre and clearly comment on the culture of the early 1930s.

Little Caesar tells the story of the rise and fall of a petty thief, Rico Bandello, with ambition to become a crime lord. He achieves his goal, but dies under the hail of machine gun fire. Little Caesar celebrates the gangster, establishing Rico romantically; as a "tragic hero" according to Robert Warshow. As a "tragic hero" he must die, and he dies because of a tragic flaw. Warshow sees Rico's tragic flaw, like all gangsters, as a too strong drive for success and self-assertion.

Organized crime differs from organized business only in its means and cultural stigma. Both function as rational enterprises and permit a man to become "self-made," well-known, admired by his peers, and share in the wealth of America. Rico desires the same American dream Western culture assumes we all share: upward social and economic mobility and individual recognition. Denied a legitimate route to power and success, but cursed with his "tragic flaw," Rico must employ means deemed "illegal." His violent deeds turn the American dream of success into an American nightmare of success.

Little Caesar also depicts society's efforts to maintain social order and similarity against Rico's criminal drive for success and individuality. Rico must fall from the top of the criminal ladder and then die to emphasize what happens to those who challenge society. Exactly what constitutes the "crime" for which he must fall and die? His breaking of the law or his too strong drive for personal success? Both: Rico must die legally and ideologically. Rico doesn't die simply because he transgressed the law of society, he dies because he aggressively asserted himself as an individual and as a success. Gangster films, like all genres, maintain the status quo and make it ideal. Little Caesar shows that crime doesn't pay and that an over-riding desire for wealth, power, and individuality is culturally unhealthy.

This social commentary remained part of the gangster genre since its "classical" stage, but never in deeper relief than during the early 1930s. The economic plight of millions of American citizens seemed to find an answer in the gangster's method. An audience, enduring the Depression and the backlash of Prohibition (organized crime greatly expanded in urban centers), could vicariously participate in a gangster's rise to wealth and power. Yet the generic demands for the gangster's legal and ideological death would re-assure an audience that those means would ultimately prove untenable. The status quo must prevail even during the double crisis of the Depression and Prohibition.

The enormous popularity of the gangster films coupled with their romantic depiction of achieving success and fame during the Depression, led to the "classical" stage's quick demise. By refracting so strongly the cultural climate of the day, they posed a threat to the status quo. In 1934, the Catholic Legion of Decency formed, in part to combat the popular depiction of the gangster as a folk hero, and the Hays Office created the Production Code of America essentially for the same reason. Consequently, the "classical" stage lasted only four years (1930–34). With the threat of censorship, boycotts, and self-regulation, the gangster film evolved into two "diluted" species: what Schatz labels the "gangster-as-cop" variation (e.g. G-Men [1935] and Racket Busters [1938]) and the "Cain-and-Abel" variation (e.g. Manhattan Melodrama [1934] and Angels With Dirty Faces [1938]). Both forms constitute the "refined" stage. They permit stylistic flourishes yet maintain, however watered-down and disguised by style, the same themes and cultural values of the "classical" stage.

Little Caesar stands as a perfect example of the short-lived "classical" period. Rico functions as the prototype of all subsequent gangsters. His career trajectory allowed audience identification and provided a warning to embrace the status quo. That the type of film Little Caesar initiated flourished only briefly, attests to the strength of that identification and the calling into question of American cultural values during times of crisis.

—Greg S. Faller

THE LITTLE FOXES

USA, 1941

Director: William Wyler

Production: RKO/Radio Pictures; black and white, 35mm; running time: 115 minutes. Released 1941.

Producer: Samuel Goldwyn; screenplay: Lillian Hellman; additional scenes and dialogue: Dorothy Parker, Alan Campbell, and Arthur Kober, from the play by Lillian Hellman; photography: Gregg Toland; editor: Daniel Mandell; production designer: Stephen Goosson; music: Meredith Wilson.

The Little Foxes

Cast: Bette Davis (Regina Giddens); Herbert Marshall (Horace Giddens); Teresa Wright (Alexandra Giddens); Richard Carlson (David Hewitt); Charles Dingle (Ben Hubbard); Carl Benton Reid (Oscar Hubbard); Dan Duryea (Leo Hubbard); Patricia Collinge (Birdie Hubbard).

Publications

Books:

Noble, Peter, Bette Davis: A Biography, London, 1948.
 Griffith, Richard, Samuel Goldwyn: The Producer and His Films, New York, 1956.
 Reisz, Karel, William Wyler: An Index, London, 1958.
 Davis, Bette, The Lonely Life, New York, 1962.
 Ringgold, Gene, The Films of Bette Davis, New York, 1965.
 Bazin, André, What Is Cinema, Berkeley, 1971.
 Madsen, Axel, William Wyler, New York, 1973.
 Vermilye, Jerry, Bette Davis, New York, 1973.

Kolodiaznaia, V., William Wyler, Moscow, 1975.
 Marill, Alvin R., Samuel Goldwyn Presents, South Brunswick, New Jersey, 1976.
 Tuska, Jon, editor, Close-Up: The Hollywood Director, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1978.
 Anderegg, Michael A., William Wyler, Boston, 1979.
 Epstein, Lawrence J., Samuel Goldwyn, Boston, 1981.
 Higham, Charles, Bette: A Biography of Bette Davis, New York, 1981.
 Robinson, Jeffrey, Bette Davis: Her Film and Stage Career, London, 1982.
 Kern, Sharon, William Wyler: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.
 Champion, Isabelle, Bette Davis, Paris, 1986.
 Walker, Alexander, Bette Davis: A Celebration, London, 1986.
 Davis, Bette, with Michael Herskowitz, This 'n' That, New York, 1987.
 Bowman, Barbara, Master Space: Film Images of Capra, Lubitsch, Sternberg, & Wyler, Westport, 1992.
 Jacobsen, Wolfgang, and Helga Belach, and Norbert Grob, William Wyler, Berlin, 1996.
 Herman, Jan, A Talent for Trouble: The Life of Hollywood's Most Acclaimed Director, William Wyler, New York, 1997.

Articles:

- Times* (London), 19 January 1941.
Spectator (London), 23 January 1941.
Variety (New York), 13 August 1941.
New York Times, 22 August 1941.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1941.
 Isaacs, Hermine Rich, "William Wyler: Director with a Passion and a Craft," in Theatre Arts (New York), February 1947.
 Koenig, Lester, "Gregg Toland, Film-Maker," in Screen Writer (London), December 1947.
 Slocombe, Douglas, "The Work of Gregg Toland," in Sequence (London), Summer 1949.
 Griffith, Richard, "Wyler, Wellman, and Huston," in Films In Review (New York), February 1950.
 Reisz, Karel, "The Later Films of William Wyler," in Sequence (London), no. 13, 1951.
 Quirk, Lawrence J., "Bette Davis," in Films in Review (New York), December 1955.
 Mitchell, George, "A Great Cameraman," in Films in Review (New York), December 1956.
 Reid, John Howard, "A Little Larger Than Life," in Films and Filming (London), February and March 1960.
 Hanson, Curtis Lee, "William Wyler," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), Summer 1967.
 Carey, Gary, "The Lady and the Director: Bette Davis and William Wyler," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1970.
 Doeckel, Ken, "William Wyler," in Films in Review (New York), October 1971.
 Higham, Charles, "William Wyler," in Action (Los Angeles), September-October 1973.
American Film (Washington, D.C.), April 1976.
 Von Cottom, J., "Les Immortels du cinéma: William Wyler," in Ciné Revue (Brussels), 30 August 1979.
 Karnes, Cheryl, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 2, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

* * *

Lillian Hellman's play, a prime example of the "well-made" variety, is precisely the kind of successful middle-brow property that appealed to Samuel Goldwyn. He had already produced Hellman's controversial The Children's Hour (also directed by William Wyler, with cinematographer Gregg Toland), a play that handsomely survived a title change to These Three and the transformation of the issue of lesbianism into an illicit heterosexual affair. No major alterations were required for The Little Foxes. The film even resists the conventional "opening up" so often applied to theatrical texts, in the mistaken notion that fundamental cinematic values are expansively pictorial ones.

Wyler's directing energies are deployed in the concentrated focus that suits the closed-in nature of this fiction. He exploits the closure of a house, its rooms and furniture to convey the power struggles of ambitious siblings, a rotten marriage, and the coming-of-age of the daughter, in the turn-of-the-century South. The family is the scene of an action whose violence (and theatricality) is augmented by the tightness of the area in which it is enacted. The various postures of Regina Giddens provide the fulcrum for the shots of which she is the center, and of the family configuration that she dominates. She exercises her intelligence and her desire in the manipulation of the figures around her, plotting and placing them with an expertise and a tyranny that is matched by the director himself.

The expertise was recognized by André Bazin in his essay on Wyler included in the French edition of What Is Cinema? Bazin analyzes the properties of hard and soft focus in the scene where Regina refuses to give her husband his medicine, while he is in the throes of a heart attack. She remains rooted in her divan during his struggle from the foreground to the background of the frame. Here, the famous Wyler-Toland deep-field staging eschews hard focus on the background. Horace's death on the staircase is a function of the hard focus on Regina's face and torso. This sort of strategy is what constitutes the cinematic in The Little Foxes, a film that requires great attention in order to be read in its fullness. The explicit dramaturgy is contained, of course, in the dialogue and plot. But this bourgeois drama truly challenges us in the nuances of its staging, in what must be seen rather than said about family relationships—the slight camera pan on a group of four characters as Aunt Birdie confesses her drinking, the duplicitous play of the faces of the father and son in a shaving mirror, the low camera placement that captures Regina's swaying progress up her lonely staircase.

The care of the staging and the long shot durations are what make Wyler an actor's director, and no more so than in this ensemble film, where the strength of the company enhances and is enhanced by the star performance of Bette Davis. To the actress's regret, this was her last collaboration with Wyler, the director of her great successes, Jezebel and The Letter.

—Charles Affron

LITTLE VERA

See MALENKAYA VERA

LIUBOV V TROEM

See TRETIA MESHCHANSKAIA

LOLA

West Germany, 1981

Director: Rainer Werner Fassbinder

Production: Rialto Film-Preben-Philipsen and Trio Film Westdeutschen Rundfunk; color, 35mm; running time: 115 minutes; length 10,313 feet. Released 1981, West Germany.

Producers: Rainer Werner Fassbinder with Horst Wendlundt; screen-play: Peter Märthesheimer, Pea Frölich, and Rainer Werner Fassbinder; photography: Xaver Schwarzenberger; editors: Juliane Lorenz and Franz Walsch (Rainer Werner Fassbinder); sound recordists: Vladimir Vizner and Milan Bor; art director: Helmut Gassner; music: Peer Raben; costume designers: Barbara Baum and Egon Strasser; artistic consultant: Harry Baer; choreography: Dieter Gackstetter; staging: Peter Marklewitz and Uwe Ringler.

Lola

Cast: Barbara Sukowa (Lola); Armin Mueller-Stahl (Von Bohm); Mario Adorf (Schukert); Matthias Fuchs (Esslin); Helga Feddersen (Frau Hettich); Karin Baal (Lola's mother); Ivan Desny (Wittich); Elisabeth Volkmann (Gigi); Hark Böhm (Völker); Karl-Heinz von Hassel (Timmerding); Rosel Zech (Frau Schukert); Sonja Neudorfer (Frau Fink); Christine Kaufmann (Susi); Y Sa Lo (Rosa); Günther Kaufmann (GI); Isolde Barth (Frau Völker); Harry Baer (Ist demonstrator); Rainer Will (2nd demonstrator); Karsten Peters (Editor); Herbert Steinmetz (Concierge); Nino Korda (TV delivery man); Raul Gimenez (Ist waiter); Udo Kier (2nd waiter); Andrea Heuer (Librarian); Ulrike Vigo (Mariechen); Helmut Petigk (Bouncer); Juliane Lorenz (Saleswoman); Marita Pleyer (Rahel); Maxim Oswald (Grandfather Berger).

Publications

Books:

Baer, Harry, Schlafen kann ich, wenn ich tot bin: Das atemlose Leben des Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Cologne, 1982.
 Eckhardt, Bernd, Rainer Werner Fassbinder: Im 17 Jahren 42 Filme—Stationen eines Lebens für den deutschen Film, Munich, 1982.
 Iden, Peter, and others, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Munich, 1982.
 Raab, Kurt, and Karsten Peters, Die Sehnsucht des Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Munich, 1982.

Foss, Paul, editor, Fassbinder in Review, Sydney, 1983.
 Franklin, James, New German Cinema: From Oberhausen to Hamburg, Boston, 1983.
 Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, Film befreien den Kopf: Essays und Arbeitsnotizen, edited by Michael Töteburg, Frankfurt, 1984.
 Hayman, Ronald, Fassbinder, Film-Maker, London, 1984.
 Phillips, Klaus, New German Filmmakers: From Oberhausen Through the 1970s, New York, 1984.
 Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, Die Anarchie der Phantasie: Gespräche und Interviews, edited by Michael Töteburg, Frankfurt, 1986.
 Katz, Robert, and Peter Berling, Love Is Colder Than Death: The Life and Times of Rainer Werner Fassbinder, London, 1987.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, New German Cinema: A History, London, 1989.
 Fassbinder, Rainer Werner, The Anarchy of the Imagination: Interviews, Essays, Notes, Baltimore, 1992.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, Fassbinder's Germany: History, Identity, Subject, Amsterdam, 1996.
 Watson, Wallace Steadman, Understanding Rainer Werner Fassbinder: Film as Private and Public Art, Columbia, 1996.
 Kordish, Laurence, editor, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, New York, 1997.
 Thomsen, Christian, Fassbinder: The Life & Work of a Provocative Genius, New York, 1997.
 Lorenz, Juliane, editor, Chaos As Usual: Conversations About Rainer Werner Fassbinder, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 2 September 1981.
 Serceau, D., in Image et Son (Paris), November 1981.
 Audibert, L., in Cinématographe (Paris), November 1981.
 Magny, Joel, "Lola, une femme allemande: Des fantasmes de la petite-bourgeoisie liberale et des leurs consequences politiques," in Cinema (Paris), November 1981.
 Bonitzer, P., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1981.
 Tobin, Yann, "Den das ist meine Welt, und sonst gar nichts . . .," in Positif (Paris), December 1981.
 Jarto, G., in Film & Kino, (Oslo), 1982.
 Wortzelius, H., in Filmrutan (Stockholm), 1982.
 Caron, A., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), February 1982.
 Auty, Chris, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1982.
 Nelissen, I., in Film en Televisie (Brussels), April 1982.
 Johnson, S., in Films and Filming (London), May 1982.
 Bernts, T., and P. Janssen, in Skrien (Amsterdam), May-June 1982.
 Boer, L. de, in Skoop (Amsterdam), June 1982.
 Franchi, I., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), August-October 1982.
 Stefanoni, L., in Cineforum (Bergamo), September 1982.
 Hoberman, J., in American Film (Washington, D.C.), September 1982.
 Chicoine, J. F., in Séquences (Montreal), October 1982.
 Mravcova, M., in Film a Doba (Prague), November 1982.
 Macbean, J. R., "The Cinema as Self Portrait: The Final Films of R. W. Fassbinder," in Cineaste (New York), 1983.
Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1983.
 Turovskaya, M., in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), December 1983.
 Elbert, L., in Cinematoca Revista (Montevideo), January 1984.
 Willemse, H., in Skoop (Amsterdam), November 1985.
 Moeller, H.-B., "Fassbinder's Use of Brechtian Aesthetics," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), April 1990.
 Levy, Shawn, "Rainer Werner Fassbinder: When the Movies are Great, Does Their Maker's Manner Matter?" in American Film, vol. 16, no. 7, July 1991.

- Schlumberger, Hella, "I've Changed Along with the Characters in My Films': An Interview with Rainer Werner Fassbinder," in Performing Arts Journal, no. 41, May 1992.
- Seesslen, Georg, "Lola," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 9, no. 6, June 1992.
- Shattuc, Jane, "R.W. Fassbinder as a Popular Auteur: The Making of an Authorial Legend," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 45, no. 1, Spring 1993.
- Niroumand, Miriam, "German as a Foreign Language: Fassbinder on Video," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 1, Winter 1993.
- Medhurst, Andy, "The Long Take: Films of Rainer Werner Fassbinder," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 6, no. 2, February 1996.
- Indiana, Gary, "All the Rage: Retrospective on Director Rainer Werner Fassbinder at the Museum of Modern Art," in Artforum, vol. 35, no. 6, February 1997.

* * *

Rainer Werner Fassbinder was by far the most prolific of Germany's Neue Welle directors, a group which includes Volker Schlöndorff, Werner Herzog, Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, and Wim Wenders. During his short life, the controversial and iconoclastic Fassbinder directed 41 feature films of which Lola is arguably his best, perhaps his masterpiece.

Fassbinder's prodigious cinematic oeuvre abounded in political statements protesting psychological and material corruption. He held a lifelong contempt for those who lived for profit. The subject matter of the majority of his films is the post-World War II Adenauer years of Fassbinder's youth when Germany underwent its economic miracle. Fassbinder's political stance was not that of a great thinker. His socio-political philosophies emanated from his personal feelings, and his dissection of Germany's materialism was saved from total misanthropy by his abrasive wit and sense of the ironic. He disavowed those who called him a cynic by explaining, "My work is not cynical; it is realistic. Pessimistic. Life is pessimistic in the end because we die, and pessimistic in between because of corruption in our daily lives. . . . It is still the fact that you win by playing by the rules, and the pure person doesn't have much of a chance."

His depiction of the corruption which permeated his homeland was never more satisfying than in his allegorical quartet: The Marriage of Maria Braun, Lili Marlene, Lola, and Veronika Voss. These films span the social history of Germany from 1938 to the late 1950s and each is told from the point of view of a strong-willed woman (the mother country).

In Lola, a small town in Bavaria is controlled by the power elite, birds of prey who extort the poor and underprivileged. Led by Schukert, the building contractor, these officials conspire to gain political control over von Bohm, the new building commissioner. Their deus ex machina is Lola, Schukert's mistress, the mother of his illegitimate daughter and the singer in his whorehouse/cabaret. Von Bohm's moral and physical seduction by Lola is Fassbinder's cinematic metaphor for German corruption.

Lola obviously is a derivation of von Sternberg's Der blaue Engel, but it is only a derivation and not a re-make. The film expertly employs all of Fassbinder's filmic devices—his vivid use of color, his circular moving camera and long pans, his penchant for melodrama, his expert handling of actors, and most of all the distancing of himself and his camera from the subjects on the screen. All come together to better advantage here than in his previous works, making this easily his most accessible film.

Lola is a combination of themes from Der blaue Engel, Lillian Hellman's The Little Foxes, Ibsen's An Enemy of the People, and the many influences of directors Fassbinder admired, such as Godard and Douglas Sirk, and stands as the best expression of his extraordinary personal cinema.

—Ronald Bowers

LOLA MONTÈS

France-West Germany, 1955

Director: Max Ophüls

Production: Gamma-Films, Florida-Films (Paris), and Oska Films (Munich); Eastmancolor, 35mm, CinemaScope; running time: original version 110 minutes, later cut to 90 minutes; length: originally 9900 feet, later cut to 8100 feet. Released 23 December 1955. Released 23 December 1955. Re-released 1968 with 30 minutes missing. Filmed 28 February-29 July 1955 in Studio Joinville, Paris, Studio Geiseltal, Munich, Studio Victorine, Nice, and on location in Bavaria, Côte d'Azur, and around Paris. Cost: 650 million francs.

Producer: Albert Caraco, some sources list Ralph Baum; screenplay: Jacques Natanson, Annette Wademant, Max Ophüls, and (for the German version) Franz Geiger, from the novel La Vie extraordinaire de Lola Montès by Cecil St. Laurent; photography: Christian Matras; editor: Madeleine Gug; sound: Antoine Petitjean with J. Neny and H. Endrulat; production designers: Jean d'Eaubonne, Jacques Guth, and (for the German version) William Schatz; music: Georges Auric; costume designers: Georges Annenkov, Monique Plotin, and Marcel Escoffier; choreography: Helge Pawlinin.

Cast: Martine Carol (Maria Dolorès Porriz y Montès, alias Lola Montès); Peter Ustinov (Ringmaster); Anton Walbrook (King Louis I of Bavaria); Ivan Densy (Lt. James, 1st husband of Lola Montès); Lise Delamare (Mrs. Craigie); Henri Guisol (Maurice, Lola's driver); Paulette Dubost (Josephine, servant to Lola); Will Quadflieg (Franz Liszt); Oscar Werner (The student); Jacques Fayet (Steward); Daniel Mendaille (Captain); Jean Gallard (Secretary to the Baron); Claude Pinoteau (Orchestra leader); Béatrice Arnac (Circus rider); Willy Eichberger (Carl Esmond); Werner Finck (Painter); Germaine Delbat (Stewardess); Helena Manson (James's sister); Walter Kiaulehn (Attendant in the theater); Willy Rösner (1st Minister); Friedrich Domin (Director of the circus); Hélène Iawkoff; Gustav Waldou (Rhino trainer); Betty Philipsen.

Lola Montès

Publications

Script:

Natanson, Jacques, and others, “Lola Montès: Scenario and Adaptation,” edited by Claude Beylie, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), January 1969.

Books:

Leprohon, Pierre, Présences contemporaines-cinéma, Paris, 1957.
 Willans, Geoffrey, Peter Ustinov, London, 1957.
 Golea, A., Georges Auric, Paris, 1958.
 Roud, Richard, Index to the Work of Max Ophüls, London, 1958.
 Beylie, Claude, Max Ophüls, Brussels, 1958.
 Annenkov, Georges, Max Ophüls, Paris, 1962.
Max Ophüls par Max Ophüls, edited by Robert Laffont, Paris, 1963.
 Sarris, Andrew, Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.
 Thomas, Tony, Ustinov in Focus, London, 1971.

Haskell, Molly, From Reverence to Rape, Baltimore, 1974.
 Barsacq, Leon, Caligari’s Cabinet and Other Grand Illusions: A History of Film Design, New York, 1976.
 Willemen, Paul, editor, Ophüls, London, 1978.
 Williams, Alan Larson, Max Ophüls and the Cinema of Desire, New York, 1980.
 Tassone, Aldo, Max Ophüls, l’enchanteur, Torino, 1994.
 White, Susan M., The Cinema of Max Ophüls: Magisterial Vision & the Figure of a Woman, New York, 1995.

Articles:

Truffaut, François, in Arts (Paris), December 1955.
Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1956.
 Audibert, Jacques, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1956.
 Archer, Eugene, “Ophüls and the Romantic Tradition,” in Yale French Studies (New Haven), Summer 1956.
 Interview with Ophüls, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1957.
 Robinson, David, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1957–58.
 Cutts, John, in Films and Filming (London), January 1958.
 “Ophüls Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1958.

Weinberg, G., in Films In Review (New York), Summer 1963.
 Greenspun, Roger, in Film Society Review (New York), October 1968.
 Beylie, Claude, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), January 1969.
 Gilliat, Penelope, in New Yorker, 3 May 1969.
 Williams, Forrest, "The Mystery of Movement: An Appreciation of Max Ophüls," in Film Comment (New York), Winter 1969.
 Henderson, Brian, "The Long Take," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
 Sarris, Andrew, "Max Ophüls: An Introduction," in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
 Simsolo, Noel, in Image et Son (Paris), March 1972.
 Schmidt, K., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), August 1973.
 Bitomsky, H., in Filmkritik (Munich), June 1974.
 Baumgarten, Marjorie, in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 6 October 1977.
 "Ophüls Issue" of Filmkritik (Munich), November 1977.
 Robinson, David, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1978.
 Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1978.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), October 1978.
 Audibert, L., and J. Tonnorred, "La Dernière Femme de Max Ophüls," in Cinématographe (Paris), May 1980.
 Le Pavec, J. P., in Cinema (Paris), May 1980.
 Lefèvre, Raymond, in Image et Son (Paris), May 1980.
 Tobin, Yann, "Ich bin die Fesche Lola . . .," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1980.
 "Schein und Sein: Glanz und Grausemkeit der Repräsentation," in Frauen und Film (Berlin), February 1981.
 Ophüls, Max, "Lola Montès mat auf den Weg," in Filmkritik (Munich), February 1982.
 Britton, Andrew, and others, in Movie (London), Summer 1982.
 Lord, S., "Fugitive Details: Readings of Image and Context in Madame de . . . and Lola Montès," in Cineaction (Toronto), Winter-Spring 1990.
 Amiel, Vincent, "Couleurs d'Ophüls," in Positif (Paris), no. 375–376, May 1992.
 Belloï, Livio, "Max Ophüls: le cristal et la tache," in Cinémathèque (Paris), no. 6, Autumn 1994.
 Douin, Jean-Luc, "La passion des femmes," in Télérama (Paris), no. 2308, 6 April 1994.
 Girard, Martin, "Le purgatoire de Lola Montès," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 176, January-February 1995.
 Burns, Mickey, "Lola Montès," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 40, May 1996.
 La Rochelle, R., "Les petites révolutions," in 24 Images (Montreal), no. 83/84, Autumn 1996.

* * *

From the time of its premier in Paris in December of 1955 Lola Montès has created controversy with the critics and the public alike. During its initial release audiences booed the film. Some grew so rowdy that the exhibitors were forced to call in the police. An open letter appeared in Le Figaro pleading for restraint on the part of those patrons who remained perplexed by the film. It argued that a film as technically new and audacious as Lola was just the breath of fresh air the cinema needed, and that to condemn the film was to do a disservice not merely to this film but to the cinema in general. The letter was signed by Jean Cocteau, Roberto Rossellini, Jacques Tati, and Jacques Becker, among others. While less impassioned, the critical response was no less polarized. On one side the film was dismissed as boring and incoherent because of its sumptuous excess of decor, mise-en-scène and narrative convolution. On the other, by reason of this same excess, it was hailed as a masterpiece of the baroque.

Much of this controversy can be attributed to the way in which the film was touted. Hoping to capitalize on the popularity of such lush costume spectacles as Lucrece Borgia and Madame Du Barry, Gamma Films advertised a super-production based on the life and loves of the most scandalous woman of all time, Lola Montès—the Spanish-Irish cabaret dancer who became the mistress of Franz Liszt and Ludwig I, King of Bavaria. The film would feature Martine Carol, France's foremost sex goddess, then at the pinnacle of her career, and would be adapted from a novel by Cecil St. Laurent, author of a series of tastefully erotic novels, including Caroline and Chérie. It would boast an all-star supporting cast headed by Peter Ustinov, Anton Walbrook, and the latest heart-throb from Germany, Oskar Werner. Finally, the film was to be directed by Europe's most urbane master of the "woman's film," Max Ophüls, in lavish Eastmancolor and CinemaScope. All of these ingredients promised a blockbuster, a film which would provide a titillating view of tragic love among the aristocratic classes while never overstepping the boundaries of good taste and middle-class morality.

However, this was not the film that Ophüls delivered. Instead, he chose to take aim at the very mechanism that Gamma Films was using to market the film: lurid publicity. In an interview with François Truffaut, Ophüls cites the fate of Judy Garland and Diana Barrymore, which he blamed on the public's appetite for scandal and on the entrepreneurs who shamelessly exploit scandals. "We must kill publicity . . . I find it dreadful, this vice of wanting to know everything, this irreverence in the face of mystery. It is on this theme that I have built my film: the annihilation of the personality through the cruelty and indecency of spectacles based on scandal." Cinema made a voyeur of everyone—producer, performer, and spectator alike. For Ophüls the true subject of Lola Montès became the demystification of the publicity and exhibitionism that characterizes our era. To achieve this, he turns his customary style on its head. He sets the glittering display of his previous films against itself, and transforms his formerly refined depiction of a decadent world into a virulent condemnation of itself.

All aspects of the film's technique attempt to subvert the spectator's voyeuristic gaze and turn it back on itself. The framing device of the mammoth circus serves to distance the spectator from the events of Lola's life presented in flashback. Lola, confined in a cage, is introduced by the suitably oily ringmaster as a beast more dangerous than any other found in the circus's menagerie. Lola's entrance has been preceded by a parade of clowns representing a caricature of a parade of Lola's lovers. She is displayed on a pedestal revolving in one direction, while the camera orbits about her in a 360-degree track moving in the opposite direction. A short mime show prefaces each flashback, undermining the suspense of the episodes. Even the woodenness of Martine Carol's performance, which many critics felt marred the film, is turned to advantage. Lola is treated as an object, a beautiful but hollow doll, an empty manikin, to be invested with the fantasies of the men who possess her. Like the earrings in Ophüls's earlier Madame De . . ., the character of Lola functions as a focal point around which the desires of the other characters (especially those of the circus spectators) are gathered and then reflected back with striking clarity.

Ophüls mustered all his expertise in mounting this, his final film. Though it marked his first use of color and CinemaScope, what he is able to accomplish is often stunning. Each flashback is set off by a dominant hue to suggest Lola's psychological state. These range from the blue of the episode of Lola as a young girl to the autumnal yellow and ochre of her sojourn at the court of Ludwig. In his encounter with the wide-screen format, Ophüls discovered solutions to compositional problems which had perplexed users of the unwieldy aspect ratio since its inception, and which look forward to effects that Anthony Mann, Nicholas Ray, and Douglas Sirk would realize in the late 1950s. Of course in his use of the moving camera Ophüls remains without peer. The circular tracking shot which opens the film, the camera's plunge which duplicates Lola's at the climax of her performance, and the final track back revealing the line of men queuing up to pay for a brush with immortality at Lola's hand, still prove capable of taking the breath away.

When Lola Montès failed so miserably with Parisian audiences, the producers decided to recall all prints and despite Ophüls's protests, recut the film. Their version reduced the film from 140 to 90 minutes by abandoning the flashback structure in favor of a strict chronological rendering of the story. A happy epilogue spoken by Martine Carol was also added. This mutilated version opened in Monte Carlo in February, 1957, and succeeded only in calling forth the unanimous disapprobation of both critics and the public. It was withdrawn from further distribution. By a bitter coincidence, Ophüls died in March, 1957, without completing another film. Lola Montès remained unseen in any version for nearly a decade. In 1966 a group of scholars purchased the prints that remained available and patched together a version which, as far as possible, corresponds to the cut Ophüls had authorized, though it still lacks 30 minutes of the original. This version premiered in 1968, and has since become a staple of film societies and re-run houses around the world. It has been justly hailed as Ophüls's masterpiece and, as Claude Beylie has written, after Rules of the Game and Citizen Kane, it is "the third and decisive stage in the development of modern cinema."

—Dennis Nastav

LOLITA

UK, 1962

Director: Stanley Kubrick

Production: AA Productions. An Anya Productions/Transworld Pictures production, in association with Seven Arts Productions, for MGM; black and white; running time: 153 minutes; length: 13,798 feet. Released June 1962.

Producer: James B. Harris; screenplay: Vladimir Nabokov, from his own novel; additional dialogue: Stanley Kubrick; second unit director: Dennis Stock; assistant directors: René Dupont, Roy Millichip, John Danischewsky; photography: Oswald Morris; camera operator: Denys N. Coop; editor: Anthony Harvey; assistant editor: Lois Gray; sound editor: Winston Ryder; sound recordists: Len Shilton, H. L. Bird; art directors: Bill Andrews, Sidney Cain; music: Nelson Riddle.

Cast: James Mason (Humbert Humbert); Sue Lyon (Lolita Haze); Shelley Winters (Charlotte Haze); Peter Sellers (Clare Quilty); Diana Decker (Jean Farlow); Jerry Stovin (John Farlow); Suzanne Gibbs (Mona Farlow); Gary Cockrell (Richard Schiller); Marianne Stone (Vivian Darkbloom); Cec Linder (Physician); Lois Maxwell (Nurse Mary Lore); William Greene (George Swine); C. Denier Warren (Potts); Isobel Lucas (Louise); Maxine Holden (Receptionist); James Dyrenforth (Beale); Roberta Shore (Lorna); Eric Lane (Roy); Shirley Douglas (Mrs. Starch); Roland Brand (Bill); Colin Maitland (Charlie); Irvine Allen (Hospital Attendant); Marion Mathie (Miss Lebone); Craig Sams (Rex); John Harrison (Tom).

Publications

Script:

Nabokov, Vladimir, Lolita, New York, 1974; second edition, 1983.

Books:

Austen, David, The Cinema of Stanley Kubrick, London, 1969.

Walker, Alexander, Stanley Kubrick Directs, New York, 1972.

Kagan, Norman, The Cinema of Stanley Kubrick, New York, 1972.

Devries, Daniel, The Films of Stanley Kubrick, Grand Rapids, Michigan, 1973.

Hirschhorn, Clive, The Films of James Mason, London, 1975.

Phillips, Gene D., Stanley Kubrick: A Film Odyssey, New York, 1977.

Winters, Shelley, Shelly, Also Known as Shirley, New York, 1980.

Ciment, Michel, Kubrick, Paris, 1980; revised edition, 1987; translated as Kubrick, London, 1983.

Kolker, Robert Philip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.

Walker, Alexander, Peter Sellers: The Authorised Biography, London, 1981.

Sylvester, Derek, Peter Sellers: An Illustrated Biography, London, 1981.

Hummel, Christoph, editor, Stanley Kubrick, Munich, 1984.

Brunetta, Gian Piero, Stanley Kubrick: Tempo, spazio, storia, e mondi possibili, Parma, 1985.

Falsetto, Mario, Stanley Kubrick: A Narrative and Stylistic Analysis, Westport, 1994.

Jenkins, Greg, Stanley Kubrick and the Art of Adaptation: Three Novels, Three Films, Jefferson, 1997.

Howard, James, Stanley Kubrick Companion, London, 1999.

Sweeney, Kevin, James Mason: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1999.

Garcia Mainar, Luis M., Narrative & Stylistic Patterns in the Films of Stanley Kubrick, Rochester, 2000.

Nelson, Thomas Allen, Kubrick: Inside a Film Artist's Maze, Bloomington, 2000.

Lolita

Articles:

- Hollywood Reporter*, 13 June 1962.
Variety (New York), 13 June 1962.
New York Times, 14 June 1962.
Kine Weekly (London), 6 September 1962.
 Croce, Arlene, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1962.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1962.
 Buckley, Michael, "Shelley Winters," in Films in Review (New York), March 1970.
 Posthumus, P., in Skrien (Amsterdam), February 1982.
 Sineux, M., "Lolita: De mirage en cauchemar," in Positif (Paris), March 1984.
 Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1984.
 Burns, D. E., "Pistols and Cherry Pies: Lolita from Page to Screen," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), October 1984.
 Combs, Richard, "Motel Passion," in Listener (London), 12 April 1985.
 Schrader, Paul, "Lolita," in American Film, vol. 15, no. 1, October 1989.
 "Quilty by Suspicion," in New Yorker, vol. 68, 18 January 1993.
 Bick, Ilsa J., and Krin Gabbard, "'That Hurts!': Humor and Sadomasochism in Lolita: The Circulation of Sadomasochistic Desire in the Lolita Texts," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 46, no. 2, Summer 1994.
 Gabbard, Krin, "The Circulation of Sadomasochistic Desire in the Lolita Texts," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 46, no. 2, 1994.
 Elia, M., "Lolita de Stanley Kubrick," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 189/190, March/June 1997.
 Taubin, A., "Hell's Belles," in Village Voice (New York), vol. 42, 29 April 1997.
 McGinn, Colin, "The Moral Case for Lolita," in Times Literary Supplement, no. 4926, 29 August 1997.
 Seesslen, G., "3x Lolita," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 15, January 1998.

* * *

Undoubtedly a film by a great director benefits from being seen again in retrospect, since the films he has directed subsequently shed a new light on it. Such is the case with Lolita (1962), misunderstood at the time of its release when Kubrick's status as an auteur was not yet firmly established. The reputation of Vladimir Nabokov, author of the original and scandalous book, overshadowed the director's attempt at translating it for the screen. Two main criticisms were levelled at the film: one was its 'betrayal' of a literary masterpiece, its failure to create an equivalent style, while the other was the disappointment of many who expected a titillating erotic experience. Seen today Lolita appears as a turning point in Kubrick's career.

On the most superficial level it marks his departure from America (to which he would never return). Because of the pressure of the moral leagues and also probably for financial reasons, Kubrick decided to shoot the film in London and decided to settle there. Lolita is the first feature where he decides to recreate a concrete world (the American province and its highways) in the artificial setting of a studio as he would with the Vietnam war of Full Metal Jacket. But more deeply Lolita is a study of madness that anticipates Dr. Strangelove and The Shining. Because of the censorship problems Kubrick displaced the focus of the story from the nymphet's relationship with an older man (Sue Lyon was too old to be a convincing nymphet anyway) to the obsessional nightmare of Humbert Humbert. From the first shot of Lolita appearing in a sunlit garden the film progressively becomes a journey to the end of the night which leads James Mason to a crisis of insanity in a dark hospital corridor and the murder of Clare Quilty (Peter Sellers) among the shadows of a baroque mansion.

The producer, James B. Harris, and Kubrick had acquired the rights of the novel in 1958 in the wake of their recent successes The Killing (1956) and Paths of Glory (1957). Asked to write an adaptation Nabokov delivered a script that would have led to a seven-hour film. He resumed work on it but eventually Kubrick changed it considerably, more than the credits suggest. In the foreword to his original screenplay, published in 1974, Nabokov writes, with wry humor and admiration, "At a private screening I had discovered that Kubrick was a great director, that his Lolita was a first-rate film with magnificent actors and that only ragged odds and ends of my script had been used . . . . My first reaction to the picture was a mixture of aggravation, regret, and reluctant pleasure."

The transformations made by Kubrick were all directed towards black humor and a sense of the grotesque. He particularly developed the character of Clare Quilty, a kind of superego for Humbert Humbert (Sellers, in anticipation of his three roles in Dr. Strangelove, disguises himself as a school psychiatrist, the threatening Dr. Zempf, and also a member of a Police convention, being clearly marked as an authority figure) and introduced scenes of macabre irony, like the ping-pong game before Quilty's murder.

Kubrick also emphasizes the social satire, looking at the American small town's life from the point of view of the visiting European Professor (played by the always suave and sophisticated English actor James Mason), as if he, who had just settled in England, were already a stranger in his own country. The scene in the drive-in with Lolita and her mother, the chess-game, and his listening to the mourners after Charlotte's death as he sits in the bath-tub are obvious examples of this satirical look at the vulgarity of the middle-class.

Followed as it was by the science-fiction trilogy (Dr. Strangelove, 2001: A Space Odyssey, and A Clockwork Orange) Lolita may have looked at one time to be far away from Kubrick's new concerns. However, both Barry Lyndon and The Shining, two studies (among other elements) of domestic life, force us to look back on the earlier film with its intimation of the work to come. Kubrick casts the same cold eye and adopts the same pessimistic derision as he portrays the fate of his masochistic hero. But at the same time he lets the emotions come through at key moments, allowing Humbert Humbert to appear as a three-dimensional character, a rare feature in Kubrick's films, which generally tend to offer stylized heroes or abstract silhouettes.

—Michel Ciment

LONE STAR

USA, 1996

Director: John Sayles

Production: Columbia Pictures; color, 35 mm, Panavision; running time: 135 minutes; length: 3781 meters. Filmed in Eagle Pass, Texas. Cost: $5 million.

Producer: R. Paul Miller, Maggie Renzi, John Sloss (executive), Jan Foster (associate); screenplay: John Sayles; cinematographer: Stuart Dryburgh; editor: John Sayles; music: Mason Daring; casting: Avy Kaufman; production design: Dan Bishop; art direction: J. Kyler Black; set decoration: Dianna Freas; costume design: Shay Cunliffe.

Cast: Stephen Mendillo (Cliff); Stephen J. Lang (Mikey); Chris Cooper (Sam Deeds); Elizabeth Peña (Pilar Cruz); Oni Faida Lampley (Celie); Eleese Lester (Molly); Joe Stevens (Deputy Travis); Gonzalo Castillo (Amado); Richard Coca (Enrique); Clifton James (Mayor Hollis Pogue); Tony Frank (Fenton); Miriam Colon (Mercedes Cruz); Kris Kristofferson (Sheriff Charlie Wade); Jeff Monahan (Young Hollis); Matthew McConaughey (Buddy Deeds); Frances McDormand (Bunny); and others.

Publications

Script:

Sayles, John, Men with Guns and Lone Star, New York, 1998.

Books:

Sayles, John, and Gavin Smith, Sayles on Sayles, New York, 1998.

Ryan, Jack, John Sayles, Filmmaker: A Critical Study of the Independent Writer-Director, Jefferson, 1998.

Carson, Diane, John Sayles: Interviews, Jackson, 1999.

Molyneaux, Gerry, John Sayles: An Unauthorized Biography of the Pioneering Indie Filmmaking, Los Angeles, 2000.

Articles:

Ratner, M., "Borderlines," in Filmmaker: The Magazine of Independent Film (Los Angeles), vol. 4, no. 4, 1996.

Smith, Galvin, "John Sayles: 'I Don't Want to Blow Anything by People,'" in Film Comment (New York), vol. 32, no. 3, May-June 1996.

Sayles, John, and Tod Lippy, "Lone Star: Writing and Directing Lone Star," in Scenario (Rockville), vol. 2, no. 2, Summer 1996.

Comer, Brooke, "Sayles Concocts Authentic Tex-Mex Murder Mystery," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 77, no. 6, June 1996.

Lone Star

Alexander, Max, "Sayles-manship," in Variety (New York), vol. 363, no. 7, 17 June 1996.

Ungar, Sanford J., "Immigrants' Tale, In Subtle Shades of Gray," in New York Times, 23 June 1996.

Spines, Christine, "John Sayles," in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 9, no. 11, July 1996.

Holden, Stephen, "Real Men: An Endangered Species on Film," in New York Times, 7 July 1996.

Simon, J., "Small-Town Sagas," in National Review, vol. 48, 29 July 1996.

Nechak, P., "Rapping with John Sayles," in Moviemaker Magazine (Los Angeles), no. 20, July/August 1996.

Blake, R.A., "Texas Mosaic," in America, vol. 175, 3 August 1996.

Curtis, Gregory, "Shooting on the Border," in Texas Monthly, vol. 24, no. 8, August 1996.

Sipe, Jeffrey R., "Low Budget, High Art: Critically Acclaimed Independent Filmmaker John Sayles Proves That Less Equals More," in Insight on the News, vol. 12, no. 31, 19 August 1996.

Andrew, Geoff, "Classified Sayles," in Time Out (London), no. 1363, 2 October 1996.

West, Dennis, and Joan M. West, "Borders and Boundaries: Lone Star," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 22, no. 3, December 1996.

Menard, Valerie, "Best and Worst of 1996," in Hispanic, vol. 9, no. 12, December 1996.

Philippon, A., "A Star is Dead," in Trafic (Paris), no. 21, Spring 1997.

Linfield, Susie, "American Graffiti: Reflections on Race, Memory and Dreams," in The Nation, vol. 268, no. 3, 5 April 1999.

Goodale, Gloria, "Risk-Taking Director: In Life and On Screen," in Christian Science Monitor, 4 June 1999.

Stein, Harry, "How John Sayles Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Studio," in Premiere (Boulder), vol. 12, no. 11, July 1999.

* * *

The final words of Lone Star are "Forget the Alamo." Along the Tex-Mex border—a region which, as local sheriff Sam Deeds remarks with laconic understatement, "has seen a good number of disagreements over the years"—the past weighs heavy, distorting relationships between individuals, generations, and whole communities. "All that stuff, that history—the hell with it, right?," says Sam's lover Pilar, aiming to break free from the trap of past guilts and enmities and start from scratch. According to John Sayles, the film is "about history and what we do with it. Do we use it to hit each other? Is it something that drags us down? . . . At what point do you say about your parents, 'That was them, this is me?'"

Even so, the phrase, "Forget the Alamo"—which Sayles at one point considered as a title for the film—shouldn't be taken too literally. Neither Pilar (a history teacher, after all) nor Sayles is suggesting anything so crude as simply junking the past, even if any of us could. Lone Star develops the theme that has underpinned all Sayles's work to date: the sense of character as a product of accumulated social and cultural influences, the way people are moulded by their backgrounds—but can surmount that conditioning if they try hard enough. “Blood only means what you let it,” bar-owner Otis Payne tells his grandson, even while teaching him to be proud of his mixed Afro-Seminole ancestry. “Most people,” says Cody, the redneck barman, “don’t want their salt and sugar in the same jar,” but under his morose gaze two army sergeants, one black and one white, are giving him the lie as they plan their life together.

With Lone Star Sayles returned to the broad-canvas, multiple-character mode of Matewan and City of Hope. In many ways the film forms a companion-piece to City of Hope—one northern and urban, the other southern and smalltown-rural, but both tracing lines of tension and interconnection between a wide spread of individuals, charting the social cross-currents and showing how these people impinge on each other, no matter how hard they try to keep themselves separate. Several characters in Lone Star strive to stay aloof: Mercedes Cruz, proud of her American citizenship, rejecting her own Hispanic background; Delmore Payne, Otis's estranged son, retreating into the rigid disciplines of army life; the Anglo parents at the school, resentful at finding themselves a minority in “their” community. Lone Star is a film about connections and also, as Sayles notes, “a film about borders” which, however artificial, must be acknowledged—but can still be crossed. In the final scene Sam and Pilar decide to cross one of the most fundamental borders of all, the incest taboo, since it matters less than their own happiness.

In its visual style, too, the film elides borders. Flashbacks are presented, not by cuts or dissolves, but by the camera simply panning left or right, up or down into a different time-zone that nonetheless occupies part of the same space. The past, Sayles implies, isn't another country; it's still here and people like Sam are living in it, carrying it with them. And as the flashbacks accumulate, the line between moral absolutes also starts to blur. At first the two former sheriffs, Charlie Wade and Sam's father Buddy, are seen as polar opposites: bad guy and good guy, “your ol’ time bribe and bullets sheriff” versus the paragon of civic integrity. But as Sam, weary of living in his dead father's shadow, digs away around the feet of the idol to expose the clay, a less clear-cut, more human figure emerges: a man less bad than Sam wants him to be, but less perfect than the legend paints him. “It's not like there's a borderline between the good people and the bad people,” Otis observes.

At times, the film's narrative density becomes excessive; Sayles (a fine novelist in his own right) seems to be aiming for a novel-like complexity, and several minor plot strands could be dropped without much damage. But Lone Star's ambitions easily outweigh its defects; while breaking new ground in Sayles's ongoing exploration of the American myth, it retains his key qualities of intelligence, political acuteness, and narrative lucidity. An actors' director par excellence, he draws fine, naturalistic performances from his whole cast, besides giving Kris Kristofferson (as the corrupt, chuckling Charlie Wade) his first worthwhile role in years.

Sayles has always taken an inventive, oblique angle on genre, and in Lone Star he turns the conventions and vocabulary of the Western to his own ends. The central strand of a man gradually stripping the legend away from an admired father-figure carries echoes of Bertolucci's Spider's Stratagem (to say nothing of Citizen Kane). But, although Sayles has often said he wants his films to make people think about their own lives, not about other films, Lone Star's overall structure, and especially its final revelation, come so close to the crux of The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance that it can only be intentional. The whole film, in fact, could be read as a covert critique of the earlier movie: where John Ford saw the passing of the old gun-law West as a matter for nostalgia and regret, Sayles celebrates the growth in tolerance and civic order it represents. And it says a lot for Sayles's achievement that, even set against Ford's elegiac classic, Lone Star isn't in the least diminished by the comparison.

—Philip Kemp

THE LONELY WIFE

See CHARULATA

THE LOST WEEKEND

USA, 1945

Director: Billy Wilder

Production: Paramount; black and white; running time: 99 minutes; length: 8,912 feet. Released August 1945.

Producer: Charles Brackett; screenplay: Charles Brackett and Billy Wilder, from the novel by Charles R. Jackson; photography: John F.

The Lost Weekend

Seitz; process photography: Farciot Edouart; special effects: Gordon Jennings; editor: Doane Harrison; art directors: Hans Dreier, Earl Hedrick; music: Miklos Rozsa, Guiseppe Verdi.

Cast: Ray Milland (Don Birnam); Jane Wyman (Helen St. James); Phillip Terry (Wick Birnam); Doris Dowling (Gloria); Frank Feylen (Bim); Mary Young (Mrs. Deveridge); Lillian Fontaine (Mrs. St. James); Anita Bolster (Mrs. Foley); Lewis R. Russell (Charles St. James); Helen Dickson (Mrs. Frink); David Clyde (Dave); Eddie Laughton (Mr. Brophy).

Awards: Oscars for Best Actor (Milland), Best Picture, Best Director and Best Screenplay.

Publications

Script:

Brackett, Charles, and Billy Wilder, The Lost Weekend, in The Best Film Plays of 1945, edited by John Gassner and Dudley Nichols, New York, 1946.

Books:

Madsen, Axel, Billy Wilder, Bloomington, Indiana, 1969.
 Zolotow, Maurice, Billy Wilder in Hollywood, New York, 1977, 1988.
 Seidman, Steve, The Film Career of Billy Wilder, Boston, 1977.
 Cook, Jim, and Mike Lewington, editors, Images of Alcoholism, London, 1979.
 Sinyard, Neil, and Adrian Turner, Journey Down Sunset Boulevard: The Films of Billy Wilder, Ryde, Isle of Wight, 1979.
 Dick, Bernard F., Billy Wilder, Boston, 1980, 1996.
 Ciment, Michel, Les Conquérants d'un nouveau monde: Essais sur le cinéma américain, Paris, 1981.
 Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
 Morella, Joe, and Edward B. Epstein, Jane Wyman, New York, 1985.
 Jacob, Jerome, Billy Wilder, Paris, 1988.
 Seidl, Claudius, Billy Wilder: Seine Filme, sein Leben, Munich, 1988.
 Lally, Kevin, Wilder Times: The Life & Times of Billy Wilder, New York, 1995.
 Crowe, Cameron, Conversations with Wilder, New York, 1999.
 Armstrong, Richard, Billy Wilder: American Film Realist, Jefferson, 2000.

Articles:

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), no. 142, 1945.
Hollywood Reporter, 14 August 1945.
Variety (New York), 15 August 1945.
Motion Picture Herald (New York), 18 August 1945.
Kine Weekly (London), 27 September 1945.
 Powell, Dilys, in Sunday Times (London), 7 October 1945.
New York Times, 3 December 1945.
Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1945–46.
 Milland, Ray, "The Role I Liked Best," in Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), 8 November 1947.
 Agee, James, in Agee on Film I, New York, 1958.
Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

"Le poison," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), no. 441, 1988.

Alix, Y., "Un, deux, trois Wilder," in Positif (Paris), no. 336, February 1989.

"The Lost Weekend," in Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 4, 1990.

Pichler, O.H., "Some Like It Black," in Blimp (Graz), no. 18, Fall 1991.

Hirschman, E.C., "A Cinematic Depiction of Drug Addiction: A Semiotic Account," in Semiotica, vol. 104, no. 1/2, 1995.

Linville, James, "The Art of Screenwriting," in Paris Review, vol. 38, no. 138, Spring 1996.

Prelutsky, Burt, "An Interview with Billy Wilder," in Michigan Quarterly Review, vol. 35, no. 1, Winter 1996.

Thomas, T., "Rozsa noir," in Film Score Monthly (Los Angeles), vol. 2, no. 3, 1997.

* * *

This was Hollywood's first serious treatment of the problem of alcoholism and was made in spite of studio jitters, and protests from the brewers that it would discourage drinking and from prohibitionists that it would encourage it. It also was something of a landmark in Wilder's output; as he put it, "it was after this picture that people started noticing me." The film also contains the finest performance which Ray Milland had so far given in his career; however, like Gloria Swanson in Sunset Boulevard he was to find the role something of a mixed blessing. Bob Hope's quip on finding a hidden bottle (in My Favorite Brunette) "Ray Milland's been here" was the expression, albeit in comic form, of a certain tendency to confuse Milland with Don Birnam, the failed, alcoholic writer at the centre of The Lost Weekend.

The story is simple and covers five days in the life of an alcoholic who has more or less conspired to get rid of his girlfriend and brother for the weekend so that he can indulge in a massive binge. It ends with her returning and encouraging him to try to write a book about his experiences in the hope that this may keep him off the bottle. There is no such ray of hope, incidentally, at the end of Charles Jackson's original novel. Furthermore, the script also suppresses the suggestion that Birnam's drinking may be due to closet gayness, though this doesn't stop it representing the sadistic nurse in the Bellevue Hospital alcoholic ward in unmistakably gay terms.

In other respects, however, the film was undoubtedly very daring for its time, and even the "happy ending" is not particularly reassuring in the light of what has gone before. As Wilder himself put it "we don't say that the man is cured. We just try to suggest that if he can lick his illness long enough to put some words down on paper, then there must be some hope." Certainly, for the most part, the film avoids sugar coating or preachy-ness and isn't even particularly concerned with the reasons for Birnam's state. Rather, it tries to communicate what it's like actually to be an alcoholic. But although very much a "first person" film, like Double Indemnity and Sunset Boulevard, it largely avoids voice-over narration and the usual "subjective" visual devices. This means that when they are used—as when Birnam falls downstairs, or in the horrific hallucination in which a bat appears to kill a mouse—they are all the more effective for being sparingly applied. Nonetheless, the whole mise-en-scène is the expression of Birnam's bleary, drink obsessed perspective. Everything looks drained, bleak and tawdry, the frame seems haunted by bottles, and at the opera all he can focus on in La Traviata are the tempting glasses in the famous "Drinking Song." Rozsa's Theremin-dominated score is the perfect counterpoint to this eerie, hazy vision of a world at one remove from reality. One of the film's supreme achievements in conjuring this effect is Birnam's famous walk up Third Avenue in an attempt to pawn his typewriter so that he can carry on drinking. Wilder had considerable difficulty in getting the studio to let him take his cameras out on the street, as location shooting was still relatively uncommon in those days, but the effect (which was achieved by hiding the cameras in trucks) is quite remarkable. Birnam's walk developing into a veritable Via Crucis as he discovers that all the pawn shops are closed for Yom Kippur.

Later, other movies such as Smash Up, I'll Cry Tomorrow, and Days of Wine and Roses would tackle the theme of alcoholism impressively enough. Addicts of one kind or another also crop up in other Wilder films such as Some Like It Hot, The Private Life of Sherlock Holmes, and Fedora. None of these, however, can match The Lost Weekend's sheer unremitting quality, its terrifying sense of an ineluctable descent into the depths.

—Julian Petley

LOUISIANA STORY

USA, 1948

Director: Robert Flaherty

Production: Robert Flaherty Productions, Inc. (Standard Oil of New Jersey); black and white, 35mm; running time: 77 minutes. Released September 1948, New York by Lopert Pictures, premiered at Edinburgh Film Festival, August 1948. Filmed in Louisiana bayou country. Cost: $258,000.

Producers: Robert Flaherty with Richard Leacock and Helen Van Dongen; screenplay: Robert Flaherty and Frances Flaherty, from their original story; photography: Richard Leacock; editors: Helen Van Dongen, assisted by Ralph Rosenblum; sound: Benjamin Donniger; music: Virgil Thompson; music performed by: Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy.

Cast: Joseph Boudreaux (Boy); Lionel Le Blanc (Father); Mrs. E. Bienvenu (Mother); Frank Hardy (The driller); C. T. Guedry (His boilerman).

Award: Venice International Film Festival, International Award for "its lyrical beauty," 1948.

Publications

Books:

- Gromo, Mario, Robert Flaherty, Parma, 1952.
 Reisz, Karel, The Technique of Film Editing, New York, 1953; London, 1958.
 Flaherty, Frances, The Odyssey of a Film-Maker: Robert Flaherty's Story, Urbana, Illinois, 1960.
 Cuenca, Carlos Fernandez, Robert Flaherty, Madrid, 1963.
 Clemente, Jose, Robert Flaherty, Madrid, 1963.

Calder-Marshall, Arthur, The Innocent Eye: The Life of Robert Flaherty, London, 1963; New York, 1966.

Klaue, Wolfgang, editor, Robert Flaherty, Berlin, 1964.

Agel, Henri, Robert J. Flaherty, Paris, 1965.

Thomson, Virgil, Virgil Thomson, New York, 1966; London, 1967.

Griffith, Richard, The World of Robert Flaherty, New York, 1970.

Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.

Armes, Roy, Film and Reality: An Historical Survey, Baltimore, 1974.

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.

Napolitano, Antonio, Robert J. Flaherty, Florence, 1975.

Murphy, William T., Robert Flaherty: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1978.

Rosenblum, Ralph, and Robert Karen, When the Shooting Stops . . . the Cutting Starts: A Film Editor's Story, New York, 1979.

Williams, Christopher, Realism and Cinema: A Reader, London, 1980.

Rotha, Paul, Robert J. Flaherty: A Biography, Philadelphia, 1983.

Barsam, Richard M., The Vision of Robert Flaherty: The Artist As Myth & Filmmaker, Bloomington, 1988.

Orbanz, Eva, Filming Robert Flaherty's Louisiana Story: The Helen Van Dongen Diary, New York, 1998.

Articles:

Roulet, Serge, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), April 1948.

Variety (New York), 22 September 1948.

New York Times, 29 September 1948.

"Old Master," in Time (New York), 20 September 1948.

Weinberg, Herman, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1948.

Life (New York), 4 October 1948.

Losey, Mary, "More Seeing, Less Selling," in Saturday Review (New York), 9 October 1948.

Hatch, Robert, in New Republic (New York), 11 October 1948.

Carancini, Gaetano, in Bianco e Nero (Rome), April 1949.

"How He Made the Louisiana Story in the Bayous of Louisiana," in Travel (New York), May 1949.

Houston, Penelope, "Interview with Flaherty," in Sight and Sound (London), December 1949.

Taylor, Robert Lewis, "Flaherty—Education for Wanderlust," in The Running Pianist, New York, 1950.

Gray, Hugh, "Robert Flaherty and the Naturalist Documentary," in Hollywood Quarterly, Fall 1950.

Van Dongen, Helen, "350 Cans of Film," in Cinema 51, London, 1951.

Flaherty, Robert, "Films: Language of the Eye," in Theatre Arts (New York), May 1951.

Sammis, Edward, "Flaherty at Abbeville," in Sight and Sound (London), December 1951.

George, George L., "The World of Robert Flaherty," in Film News (New York), no. 4, 1953.

Manvell, Roger, in The Film and the Public, London, 1955.

Flaherty, Frances, "Explorations," and "Robert Flaherty: The Man and the Filmmaker" by Charles Siepmann, in Film Book I: The Audience and the Filmmaker, edited by Robert Hughes, New York, 1959.

Stanbrook, Alan, and Ralph Stephenson, in Films and Filming (London), December 1961.

Van Dongen, Helen, "Robert J. Flaherty," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1965.

Louisiana Story

Weinberg, Gretchen, in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1966.
 Sadoul, Georges, "A Flaherty Mystery," in Cahiers due Cinema in English (New York), September 1967.
 Fondiller, Harvey, "Bob Flaherty Remembered," in Popular Photography (Boulder, Colorado), March 1970.
 Leacock, Richard, "Remembering Frances Flaherty," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1972.
 Achtenberg, Ben, "Helen Van Dongen: An Interview," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1976.
Skoop (Amsterdam), December 1979.
 Holm, Sally V., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Leacock, R., "The Making of Louisiana Story," in Southern Quarterly, vol. 23, no. 1, 1984.
 Starr, C., "Robert Flaherty's Louisiana Story," in Southern Quarterly, vol. 23, no. 1, 1984.
 Lerner, Jesse, "Flaherty in Motion: The 38th Annual Robert Flaherty Film Seminar," in Afterimage (London), vol. 20, no. 5, December 1992.
 Kaneko, Ann, "40th Annual Robert Flaherty Seminar," in Afterimage (London), vol. 22, no. 4, November 1994.

Marks, Dan, "Ethnography and Ethnographic Film: From Flaherty to Asch and After," in American Anthropologist, vol. 97, no. 2, June 1995.

Goldstein, Yosha, "Here's Looking at You: 41st Annual Robert Flaherty Film Seminar," in Afterimage (London), vol. 23, no. 2, September-October 1995.

Leacock, Richard, "In Defense of the Flaherty Traditions," in Film Culture (New York), no. 79, Winter 1996.

Short review, in Télérama (Paris), no. 2439, 9 October 1996.

Pennebaker, D.A., "Looking Back: Film Directors Robert Flaherty, Michael Powell and Jean-Luc Godard," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 7, no. 4, April 1997.

* * *

Robert Flaherty's last film is a fitting culmination to a long career. It is less a documentary about the Cajun people of Louisiana's bayou country, than an autobiographical film about Flaherty himself. From the viewpoint of a Cajun boy the film reveals the mysteries of the bayou wilderness, portrayed as an enchanting world of fantasy, filled with beauty and danger. The film is a poetic reflection of Flaherty's youth, in which he explores his own life-long relationship to the wilderness and natural environment, and to the people who live there.

The opening sequence is one of the most celebrated in film history. Shots of alligators, magnificent birds, floating lily ponds, slithering snakes, and other wildlife and flora are given unity, continuity, and a sense of graceful movement. The brilliance of these sequences was the result of the troubled but highly successful collaboration between Flaherty and his talented editor, Helen Van Dongen. The outstanding night-time oil drilling sequence succeeds because of the interplay of images of the derricks accompanied by an atonal sound track. Flaherty's strength was in direction and shooting; Van Dongen's in her exceptional skill as an editor.

The film's visual beauty is so effective that it overshadows the sponsor's message. Oil drilling technology, first seen as an unknown threat to the tranquility of the bayou, in the end appears benign, leaving the impression that the unspoiled wilderness is safe.

The simple visual beauty of this film pleased most of the contemporary critics, though the film's theme or message bewildered some. Many recognized that the scenes with speaking parts were not terribly convincing. As in other Flaherty films, the cast was chosen from the locals, more for their appearance than acting ability. Making them speak their roles showed the limitation of using real people in dialogue situations that must be rehearsed. They become stilted and artificial before the camera.

Louisiana Story remains an enduring work of art for its sheer visual beauty, though some have argued its qualifications as a documentary, due to the manipulation of events depicted. Among films essentially based in reality, however, it remains one of the most successful collaborations of all time, with an impressive amalgamation of talent in direction, photography, editing, writing, and music.

—William T. Murphy

LOVES OF A BLONDE

See LÁSKY JEDNÉ PLAVOVLÁSKY

LUCIA

Cuba, 1968

Director: Humberto Solás

Production: Instituto Cubana del Arte e Industria Cinematograficos (ICAIC); black and white, 35mm; running time: 160 minutes. Released 1968. Filmed 1967 in Cuba.

Producer: Raúl Canosa; screenplay: Humberto Solás, Julio García Espinosa and Nelson Rodríguez; photography: Jorge Herrera; editor: Nelson Rodríguez; sound engineers: Ricardo Istueta and Carlos Fernández; music: Leo Brower; costume designer: María Elena Molinet.

Cast: Raquel Revuelta (Lucia, Part 1); Eslinda Núñez (Lucia, Part 2); Adela Legrá (Lucia, Part 3); Adolfo Llauradó (Tomás).

Award: Moscow Film Festival, Gold Medal, 1969.

Publications

Script:

Solás, Humberto, Julio García Espinosa, and Nelson Rodríguez, "Lucia (Part III)," in Memories of Underdevelopment: The Revolutionary Films of Cuba, edited by Michael Myerson, New York, 1973.

Books:

Nelson, L., Cuba: The Measure of a Revolution, Minneapolis, 1972.
Chanan, Michael, The Cuban Image, London, 1985.

Burton, Julianne, editor, Cinema and Social Change in Latin America: Conversations with Filmmakers, Austin, 1986.

Articles:

Geoffrey Minish, and M. E. Douglas, in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1969.

Engel, Andi, "Solidarity and Violence," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1969.

Interview with Humberto Solás, in Atlas (New York), April 1970.

Adler, Renata, "Three Cuban Cultural Reports with Films Somewhere in Them," in A Year in the Dark, Berkeley, 1971.

Matthews, M., in Films in Review (New York), May 1974.

Biskind, P., "Lucia: Struggles with History," in Jump Cut (Chicago), July-August 1974.

Blanco, Jorge Ayala, "Cine Cubano: Revaluaciones, Devaluaciones, y Presentaciones," in Movietone News (Seattle), November 1974.

Taylor, A. M., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1974-75.

Kovacs, Steven, "Lucia: Style and Meaning in Revolutionary Film," in Monthly Review (New York), June 1975.

Luxemburg, Leonardo, "Latin American Films: Fourth Frontier," and "The Role of Film in Cuban Development" by Andres Hernandez, in Films of a Changing World: A Critical International Guide, edited by Jean Marie Ackerman, Washington, D.C., 1977.

"Special Issue" of Jump Cut (Chicago), December 1978.

King, J., interview with Humberto Solás, in Framework (Norwich), Spring 1979.

Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 107, 1983.

Lopez Morales, E., "Descubrimiento de Lucia," in Cine Cubano (Habana), no. 124, 1988.

Gonzalez, J.A., "Humberto Solás o la audacia de la emocion," in Cine Cubano (Habana), no. 128, 1990.

Benamou, Catherine, "Cuban Cinema: On the Threshold of Gender," in Frontiers, vol. 15, no. 1, Winter 1994.

Rose, P. W., "The Politics of the Trilogy Form: Lucia, the Oresteia and The Godfather," in Film-Historia (Barcelona), vol. 5, no. 2/3, 1995.

Braun, Rainer, "Kino in Kuba," in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 14, no. 5, May 1997.

* * *

Lucia

Robert Phillip Kolker has called Humberto Solás's Lucia "something of an encyclopedia of progressive film in the sixties," and this invigoratingly feminist trilogy is indeed one of the greatest examples of stylistic virtuosity to emerge from any national cinema in recent years. Solás's film depicts three women, all named Lucia, in their gradual acquisition of revolutionary consciousness, as they confront the specific historical dilemmas of their respective epochs—1895, 1932, and the post-revolutionary era of the 1960s. The film is remarkable in its ability to integrate diverse cinematic styles with an almost seamless fluidity. Lucia is a unique amalgam of Soviet style montage, hand-held shots in the manner of the early New Wave, and baroque stylization that recalls Antonioni and Bertolucci.

The first episode (1895) is the most ambitious in its epic grandeur, although Solás's directorial restraint prevents his mise-en-scène from becoming hopelessly florid. This segment is superficially a revenge tragedy, although the emphasis on the suffering engendered by Spanish imperialism serves as tragic counterpoint to the central, doomed love affair. The frenetic shots of impoverished black soldiers on horseback remind the viewer of the travails of war at the very point that a Hollywood film would revert to a political escapism.

After the inspired grandiosity of the 1895 segment, the second episode is conceived within the more modest requirements of Hollywood melodrama. Yet, paradoxically, this segment is perhaps the most subtly subversive of Solás's film. He has absorbed all of the mannerisms of melodramatic kitsch, but subverts them in order to make a political statement that transcends the common, soap-operaish woes of the isolated individual. The 1932 Lucia's romantic disillusion coincides with her disillusion with the regime that replaces that of the dictatorial Machado. Personal happiness and societal goals have become dialectically intertwined.

Lucia's last episode is understandably the most upbeat, although it is curiously the most dated of the trilogy. This exuberant study in "consciousness raising" takes place during the ambitious literacy campaign of the 1960s. This was the time when many Cuban women first grasped the ways in which sexism continued to contaminate their lives during the post-revolutionary period. Although the third episode of Lucia seems relatively minor when contrasted with the other two, its comic brio and good-natured didacticism make it enjoyable.

Julianne Burton has remarked that "post-revolutionary Cuban cinema strives to unite cultural expression and political consciousness." Lucia is one of the most admirable results of his aspiration since Solás's narrative genius succeeds in explaining that much remarked-upon fusion of personal and political motivations during periods of revolutionary upheaval.

—Richard Porton

LULU

See DIE BÜCHSE DER PANDORA

M

M

---

(M, Mörder unter uns)

Germany, 1931

Director: Fritz Lang

Production: Nero-Film A. G. Verlag Star Film-G.m.b.H.; black and white, 35mm; running time: originally 117 minutes, according to Eisner an 89 minute version is most commonly shown now, though some sources list current version as 99 minutes. Released 11 May 1931, Berlin. Re-released 1933 in the U.S. in a dubbed version. Filmed during 6 weeks of 1931 in Nero-Film A. G. Verlag Star Film-G.m.b.H. studios in Berlin.

Producer: Seymour Nebenzal; scenario: Thea von Harbou and Fritz Lang, from an article by Egon Jacobson, based on the Düsseldorf child murder case; photography: Fritz Arno Wagner and Gustav Rathje; editor: Paul Falkenberg; sound: Adolf Jansen; production designers: Emil Hasler and Karl Vollbrecht; music (Murderer's Theme): Edward Grieg, based on an extract from Peer Gynt; back-drop photographs: Horst von Harbou.

Cast: Peter Lorre (Hans Beckert, the murderer); Gustaf Gründgens (Schränker); Ellen Widmann (Mrs. Beckman); Inge Landgut (Elsie Beckman); Otto Wernicke (Inspector Lohmann); Franz Stein (Minister); Theodor Loos (Inspector Groebor); Fritz Gnass (Burglar); Fritz Odemar (Safecracker); Paul Kemp (Pickpocket); Theo Lingens (Con-Man); Georg John (Blind beggar); Karl Platen (Night Watchman); Gerhard Bienart (Inspector's secretary); Rosa Valetti (Landlady of the Crocodile Club); Hertha von Walther (Prostitute); Ernst Stahl-Nachbaur (Chief of Police); Rudolf Blümner (Lawyer).

Publications

Script:

von Harbou, Thea, and Fritz Lang, M, edited by Gero Gandert and Ulrich Gregor, Hamburg, 1963; translated as M, London and New York, 1968.

M le maudit, Paris, 1990.

M, in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 11, November 1994.

Books:

Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1947.

Courtade, Francis, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.

Moulet, Luc, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.

Eibel, Alfred, editor, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1964.

Huaco, George, The Sociology of Film Art, New York, 1966.

Jensen, Paul M., The Cinema of Fritz Lang, New York, 1969.

Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, 1969.

Johnston, Claire, Fritz Lang, London, 1969.

Manvell, Roger, and Heinrich Fraenkel, The German Cinema, New York, 1971.

Grafe, Frieda, Enno Patalas, and Hans Helmut Prinzler, Fritz Lang, Munich, 1976.

Eisner, Lotte, Fritz Lang, London, 1977.

Armour, Robert, Fritz Lang, Boston, 1978.

Ott, Frederick W., The Films of Fritz Lang, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1979.

Jenkins, Stephen, editor, Fritz Lang: The Image and the Look, London, 1979.

Kaplan, E. Ann, Fritz Lang: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1981.

Maibohm, Ludwig, Fritz Lang: Seine Filme—Sein Leben, Munich, 1981.

Ropars-Wuilleumier, Marie-Claire, Le Texte divisé: Essai sur l'écriture filmique, Paris, 1981.

Eisner, Lotte H., Fritz Lang, Cambridge, 1988.

Humphries, Reynold, Fritz Lang: Gender & Representation in His American Films, Ann Arbor, 1989.

Levin, David, Richard Wagner, Fritz Lang & the Nibelungen: The Dramaturgy of Disavowal, Princeton, 1998.

McGilligan, Patrick, Fritz Lang: The Nature of the Beast, New York, 1998.

Gunning, Tom, The Films of Fritz Lang: Modernity, Crime & Desire, London, 2000.

Articles:

Lang, Fritz, "Mein Film M: Ein Tatsachenbericht," in Filmwoche (Berlin), May 1931.

Hirsch, Leo, in Berliner Tageblatt, 12 May 1931.

Arnheim, Rudolf, in Weltbühne (Berlin), 19 May 1931.

Variety (New York), June 1931.

Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 3 April 1933.

Troy, William, in Nation (New York), 19 April 1933.

Barry, Iris, in Museum of Modern Art Bulletin (New York), June 1933.

Eisner, Lotte, "Notes sur le style de Fritz Lang," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), 1 February 1947.

Wilson, Harry, "The Genius of Fritz Lang," in Film Quarterly (London), Summer 1947.

Gesek, Ludwig, "Fritz Lang: Suggestion und Stimmung," in Gestalter der Filmkunst: Von Asta Nielsen bis Walt Disney, Vienna, 1948.

"One Facet of Lang's Art Prophetic of Hitlerism," in Herald Tribune (New York), 21 March 1949.

M

Autera, Leonardo, "Il parabola di Fritz Lang," in Cinema (Rome), 15 January 1954.

Mourley, Michel, "Trajectoire de Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1959.

Franju, Georges, "Le Style de Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1959.

Ramseger, Georg, "30 Jahre alt und alterlos: In der Urania ist Fritz Langs M jetzt wieder greifbar," in Welt (Hamburg), 16 January 1960.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 1 September 1960.

Bellour, Raymond, in Cinéma (Paris), no. 58, 1961.

Kuhlbrodt, Dietrich, "M: Wieder in Deutschland," in Filmkritik (Munich), no. 3, 1961.

Domarchi, Jean, "Avec M le Maudit: Fritz Lang en 1932 annonçait la destinée de l'Allemagne," in Arts (Paris), 26 April 1961.

Gilson, René, in Cinéma (Paris), August-September 1961.

"Kein Mörderspiel: Fritz Lang's M von 1931," in Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 11 December 1961.

Lefevre, Raymond, in Image et Son (Paris), June 1962.

Porter, Miguel, "La estructura profetica en M," in M: El vampiro de Dusseldorf, Barcelona, 1964.

Sandras, Michel, "M le Maudit et l'expressionisme," in Image et Son (Paris), January 1964.

Eisner, Lotte, "Le Style de M le Maudit," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 July 1964.

Jensen, Peter, in Classics of the Film, edited by Arthur Lennig, Madison, Wisconsin, 1965.

Jahnke, Eckart, in Film (East Berlin), no. 6, 1965.

Rhode, Eric, "Fritz Lang (The German Period 1919–1933)," in Tower of Babel: Speculations on the Cinema, New York, 1966.

Wiegand, Wilfried, "Der Regisseur von M," in Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, 5 December 1970.

Kinder, Marsha, and Beverle Houston, in Close-Up: A Critical Perspective on Film, New York, 1972.

Burch, Noël, "De Mabuse à M: Le Travail de Fritz Lang," in Revue d'Esthétique (Paris), 1973.

Kuntzel, Thierry, "The Treatment of Ideology in the Textual Analysis of Film," in Screen (London), Autumn 1973 (and reply by Nicolas Garnham in same issue).

Dadon, R., "Le Pouvoir et sa folle," in Positif (Paris), December 1976.

- Del Ministro, M., "Una ipotesi psicoanalitica per la lettura," in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), November–December 1977.
- Carroll, Noël, "Lang, Pabst, and Sound," in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Fall 1978.
- Chang, J. S. M. J., "M: A Reconsideration," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1979.
- Audibert, L., "Dossier: Du muet au parlant: L'Ombre du son," in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1979.
- Barros, L. de, "Uma obraprimeira de Fritz Lang," in Celuloide (Rio Major, Portugal), August 1979.
- Petat, J., "L'Ouverture de M le Maudit," in Cinema (Paris), June 1982.
- Frascani, F., "Hitler era geloso del Morder di Fritz Lang," in Cinema Nuovo (Rome), May–June 1989.
- Garncarz, J., "Fritz Lang's M: A Case of Significant Film Variation," in Film History (London), vol. 4, no. 3, 1990.
- Koseluk, C., "Comic Book Antihero," in American Film, vol. 16, no. 2, February 1991.
- Rolfé, Hilda, "The Perfectionist," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 28, no. 6, November–December 1992.
- Kaes, A., "The Cold Gaze: Notes on Mobilization and Modernity," in New German Critique, no. 59, Spring/Summer 1993.
- Lattuada, A., "Un film, un réalisateur, deux comédiennes," in Positif (Paris), no. 400, June 1994.
- Hoberman, J., "Stormy Weather," in Village Voice (New York), vol. 42, 17 June 1997.
- Dimendberg, Edward, "From Berlin to Bunker Hill: Urban Space, Late Modernity and Film Noir in Fritz Lang's and Joseph Losey's M," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 19, no. 4, October 1997.
- Elsaesser, Thomas, "Fritz Lang: The Illusion of Mastery," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 10, no. 1, January 2000.

* * *

Fritz Lang's films are marked by an uneasy tension between moral opposites: light and dark, innocence and evil, order and chaos. No subject is too mean or sordid to be outside or beneath human experience or to be illuminated, ultimately, by the vision of the artist. According to Lang, his films are like "the loveliest German fairy tales," which, despite their beauty, accumulate "an enormous amount of brutality, of cruelty and crime." Lang explains why this tension works, both in children's stories and in his films:

... In fairy tales the most simple and most moral law of mankind is upheld. The good are rewarded, the evil punished. The good becomes more touching through sorrow, the evil more hateful by the initial success of their wickedness. Film yields the satisfaction of the fulfilled law just as naively as does the fairy tale, only in a form which conforms with its time.

Certainly M, Lang's first sound film, functions in this manner. Considered by most critics to be Lang's masterwork, M concerns the fulfilment of moral law while amply reflecting the horrors of its time: the years following World War I in Germany, a period, according to Lang, "of the deepest despair, hysteria, cynicism, unbridled vice." Rampant inflation and other chaotic elements gradually eroded the public order. By 1930, the year before Lang made M, Nazi paramilitary groups, with their own police and tribunals, murdered, bombed, and sabotaged while the Weimar bureaucracy slowly strangled in its own red tape.

Through a highly ordered juxtaposition of visual and aural images, and through an effective blending of expressionistic and realistic styles, Lang explores the effects of this growing chaos by depicting it on personal and social planes. On the personal plane, M's central character, child murderer Hans Beckert, embodies the struggle between a weakening order and an increasingly malevolent and powerful chaos. Possessed by a doppelgänger, Beckert is a childish, soft-bellied, petit bourgeois seized by uncontrollable homicidal passions:

I can't help myself! I haven't any control over this evil thing that's inside me. It's there all the time, driving me out to wander through the streets. It's me, pursuing myself. I want to escape to escape from myself! But it's impossible. I have to obey.

When pursued by this doppelgänger, he whistles a theme from Peer Gynt, an appropriate leitmotif for his personal demon. A capricious and irresponsible character with no sense of self, Gynt saved his own life by allowing another man to drown. Similarly, Beckert keeps his own divided psyche intact by killing young girls, by submitting irresponsibly to his most primal urges.

Lang portrays Beckert as both doppelgänger, victim and victimizer, and Gynt, a self-absorbed child, in a series of images, the chief ones being mirrors and other reflective surfaces. While the police attempt to develop a psychological profile of Beckert the camera cuts to Beckert peering and making faces at himself in the mirror. In another scene the camera catches Beckert eating an apple and looking into a store window where we see him surrounded by a diamond-shaped display of knives; when the camera shifts back to Beckert's point of view, we see a mirror at the back of the window display—again surrounded by knives—where a little girl, a potential victim, suddenly appears. Beckert then begins to whistle the theme from Peer Gynt, indicating that his doppelgänger has assumed control. Finally, Beckert doesn't know that his doppelgänger has become visible to others as well until he sees reflected in the window the mark of Cain, the "M," chalked on his shoulder.

Beckert's shadow is also a projection of the doppelgänger. As Elsie's ball bounces against a billboard posting a reward for the murderer, his shadow falls across the pillar—a visual echo of the "evil man in black" (with a chopper) portrayed in the opening children's ditty.

Such images suggest two ideas: 1) Beckert is self-absorbed and involuted, and 2) Beckert can be known only through his projections. The first point is conveyed through various visual and aural images: the target in a toy window spiralling endlessly into its own centre (recalling the circles on the policemen's map); Beckert's oral fixations (eating apples and candy, drinking brandy, smoking cigarettes, biting his hand after a foiled abduction attempt); Beckert's relative silence until the last scene when he is forced to come to his own defense (that is, he can only speak to himself or to children). His projections and oral obsessions ultimately reveal and trap him: a pack of cigarettes puts the police on his trail, and his compulsive whistling alerts the beggars to his presence. He is trapped by his own "garbage" as it were (another example being the red pencil shavings). Lang repeats this theme by locating Beckert's final hiding place in a small locker full of junk—a vivid metaphor both for the meaningless disorder of his mind and for his self-confinement. Other scenes reinforce this notion: Beckert is stalked by beggars who live off the refuse of others, and he is ultimately brought to trial in an abandoned brewery by society's outcasts.

Beckert's personal chaos aggravates the chaos existing on the social plane: the apparent struggle between the police (who symbolize the Weimar Republic) and the underworld (who symbolize the Nazi organization). The real struggle, however, is between the two groups, who represent control, and Beckert, who represents lack of control. The erosion of control in postwar Germany is thus reflected in the growing similarity, not struggle between the two organizations. Lang conveys this resemblance through skillful editing and scripting and by the use of similar settings, camera angles, and images for the two groups.

Lang's portrayal of their parallel investigations emphasizes the complementary nature of the police and the underworld. The camera cuts back and forth between police conferences and underworld meetings to show the following: a gesture and remark begun by the head of the underworld are completed by the chief of police. After a safecracker declares that the police must stop looking for Beckert in the underworld, an elderly detective concludes that the murderer must be a "peaceful little family man who wouldn't hurt a fly." A burglar stands up and leans against the back of his armchair, while the scene shifts to an inspector leaning over the back of his chair. Both rooms are slowly engulfed by cigarette smoke as the meetings progress, and the people get up and wander about as the parallel discussions unfold. Identical camera angles reinforce the similarities in dialogue and settings. The ultimate exchange of identities comes near the end of the manhunt and involves the leaders of the two groups: Schränker, the head of the underworld, disguises himself as a policeman to penetrate Beckert's hiding place, and Lohmann, the chief of police, uses "illegal" methods (lies and blackmail) to determine where the underworld has taken Beckert to be "tried."

Not content to make a "talking picture" as such, Lang again uses the technical innovation of sound to complement the message of the camera. Film scholar Thierry Kuntzel has argued that, to connect the police and the underworld, Lang employs two separate chains of visual and aural clues. At first, the underworld's surveillance (visual) and the police interrogations (aural) yield no results. Then two important clues emerge: the letter to the press (visual) and the whistling in front of the blind man (aural). The letter ultimately yields two visual clues for the police—the cigarette pack and the pencil shavings—whereas the underworld narrows in on Beckert through two aural clues—Beckert's second whistling in front of the blind man of the Peer Gynt theme and the sounds he makes while trying to escape from his hiding place.

In equating the police with the underworld Lang muddies the distinction between good and evil, order and chaos, on the social plane. In M's final judgment scene, the distinctions are obscured on the personal plane as well. In his eloquent plea before the kangaroo court, Beckert changes from villain to helpless victim, both of his doppelgänger and of the criminal element of society. How can Lang deliver his fairy tale ending of a fulfilled moral law when innocence and guilt have become so hopelessly confounded? Lang's solution is to move "above" the action aurally, just as in earlier scenes he moved above the action visually—employing overhead or crane shots to imply omniscience or a divine perspective. We hear off-camera, "In the name of the law," and the action freezes. Because we do not see the speaker, higher law is implied—one that will stop the criminal elements of society and protect both innocent children and the murderous child within Beckert.

—Catherine Henry

MADAME DE . . .

(The Earrings of Madame de . . .)

France, 1953

Director: Max Ophüls

Production: Franco-London Films, Indus, and Rizzoli; black and white, 35mm; running time: 105 minutes. Released 1953.

Producer: Ralph Baum; screenplay: Max Ophüls, Marcel Achard, and Annette Wademant, from a novella by Louise de Vilmorin; photography: Christian Matras; editor: Boris Lewin; production designer: Jean d'Aubonne; music: Oscar Strauss and George Van Parys.

Cast: Danielle Darrieux (Madame De); Charles Boyer (Monsieur De); Vittorio De Sica (Baron Donati); Lia de Léa (Monsieur De's mistress); Jean Debucourt.

Publications

Script:

Ophüls, Max, Marcel Achard, and Annette Wademant, Madame de . . ., in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), June 1986.

Books:

Roud, Richard, Max Ophüls: An Index, London, 1958.

Annenkov, Georges, Max Ophüls, Paris, 1962.

Max Ophüls par Max Ophüls, Paris, 1963.

Beylie, Claude, Max Ophüls, Paris, 1963.

Leprohon, Pierre, Vittorio De Sica, Paris, 1966.

Armes, Roy, French Film, New York, 1970.

Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: The Great Tradition, New York, 1970.

Willemen, Paul, editor, Ophüls, London, 1978.

Williams, Alan, Max Ophüls and the Cinema of Desire, New York, 1980.

Swindell, Larry, The Reluctant Lover: Charles Boyer, New York, 1983.

Tassone, Aldo, Max Ophüls, l'enchanteur, Torino, 1994.

White, Susan M., The Cinema of Max Ophüls: Magisterial Vision & the Figure of a Woman, New York, 1995.

Articles:

Anderson, Lindsay, in Sight and Sound (London), April-June 1954. New York Times, 20 July 1954.

Archer, Eugene, "Ophüls and the Romantic Tradition," in Yale French Studies (New Haven), Summer 1956.

"Ophüls Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1958.

Whitehall, Richard, "Danielle Darrieux," in Films and Filming (London), December 1961.

Giard, Robert, in Seventh Art (New York), Summer 1964.

Beylie, Claude, "Max Ophüls," in Anthologie du Cinéma, Paris, 1965.

Madame de ...

Kael, Pauline, in I Lost it at the Movies, Boston, 1965.

Sarris, Andrew, "Memory and Max Ophüls," in Moviegoer, Summer 1966.

"Ophüls Issue" of Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.

Haskell, Molly, and Peter Harcourt, in Favourite Movies: Critics' Choice, edited by Philip Nobile, New York, 1975.

Jouvet, P., "Rythmes et masques," in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1977.

"Ophüls Issue" of Filmkritik (Munich), November and December 1977.

Britton, Andrew, "Metaphor and Mimesis: Madame de . . .," in Movie (London), Summer 1982.

Amiel, V., "Mouvements d'un couple et de la société," in Positif (Paris), August 1982.

Britton, A., "Metaphor and Mimesis: Madame De . . .," in Movie (London), no. 29/30, Summer 1982.

Lord, S., "Fugitive Details: Readings of Image and Context in Madame de . . . and Lola Montes," in Cineaction (Toronto), Winter-Spring 1990.

Dunant, C., "Visions of Paris," in Sight and Sound (London), no. 1, 1990–91.

Legrand, Gérard, "Madame de . . .: Des effets et des feux," in Positif (Paris), no. 381, November 1992.

Murphy, K., "Portrait of a Lady X 2," in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1993.

Belloï, Livio, "Max Ophüls: le cristal et la tache," in Cinémathèque (Paris), no. 6, Autumn 1994.

Marty, J., "Madame de . . . de Max Ophüls," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), no. 62, March 1995.

* * *

The Earrings of Madame de . . . is one of the four films—all made in the 1950s shortly before his death—that constitute the highest expression of Max Ophüls's personal style. Along with La ronde, Le plaisir, and Lola Montes, the film combines all the technical ingredients and thematic concerns that had preoccupied Ophüls throughout his rather "up and down" career. Foremost among these interests, of course, was the intricate blending of complex, dazzling camera work with the themes of mankind's obsession with material objects—and a kind of poignant romanticism usually misconstrued by critics attempting to pigeonhole him as a director of women's films much like Douglas Sirk.

In Madame de there is a notion of mutability: the earrings, being material, remain constant, but the changing emotional circumstances of their possessors increase their symbolic value until they become the emblems of a domestic catastrophe. To some extent, however, the characters also remain static: they are unchanging in surface demeanour, yet the rush of time alters each one's status and effects a transition in their personalities. Madame de, for example, matures from a supercilious young girl into a truly passionate woman betrayed by the depth of her emotion, while, at the same time, her husband and lover evolve correspondingly but somewhat less noticeably because they are more reluctant than Madame de to deviate from their sense of propriety.

One element in the clash between relentless time and the seeming intransigence of objects and events is Ophüls's tenacious tracking camera and its unrelenting interchange of shots and episodes. Another is the brisk unfolding of the narrative, which delicately balances a lush, rich atmosphere with lean camera technique. This interplay is particularly evident in the film's opening scene: the camera follows a woman's hand as it glides along a rack of expensive clothes in a lavishly appointed wardrobe, and then, without a pause, the camera clings to the woman as she admires her earrings in the mirror of her dressing table. In one continuous shot, Ophüls establishes a world of extravagant material possessions and then hones in on the frivolous, silly woman who seems virtually a part of them as she sits reflected in the mirror.

Later, however, in the ball sequence, the camera dazzlingly plays against the sumptuous surroundings to create a rush of time that encapsulates Madame de's progress from frivolity to tragedy without her having changed the tempo of her dance (a parallel to the changing value of the symbolic earrings as they float from hand to hand while remaining materially constant). With her lover she dances round and round from one elegant ballroom to another under the constant gaze of the encircling camera, which reveals the deepening feelings of the couple. Finally, as they slowly glide through the last dance in the sequence, the air of gaiety disappears. The camera then moves to follow a servant in one long continuous shot as he goes from light to light, extinguishing them; the sequence ends in darkness as he throws a cover over a harp.

The party is over. Frivolity has become romance, and love becomes tragedy. As in all of Ophüls's best films, every element is interconnected—technique, pacing, theme, and character—to intertwine both the light and tragic strains and to resolve the seemingly divergent tensions into a final mood of desolation.

—Stephen L. Hanson

MÄDCHEN IN UNIFORM

(Girls in Uniform)

Germany, 1931

Director: Leontine Sagan with Carl Froelich

Production: Deutsches Film Gemeinschaft; black and white, 35mm; running time: 98 minutes; length: 8799 feet. Released 1931. A new, reconstructed print was released in the 1970s.

Screenplay: Christa Winsloe and F. D. Andam, from the play Yesterday and Today by Christine Winsloe; photography: Reimar Kuntze and Franz Wehmayr; music: Hansom Milde-Meissner.

Cast: Dorothea Wieck (Fraülein von Bernburg); Hertha Thiefe (Manuela von Meinhardis); Emilie Unda (Headmistress); Ellen Schwanneke (Ilse von Westhagen); Hedwig Schlichter (Fraülein von Kosten); Gertrud de Lalsky (Manuela's aunt).

Publications

Books:

Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1947.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey One: The Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Sagan, Leontine, Lights and Shadows: The Autobiography of Leontine Sagan, edited and introduced by Loren Kruger, Johannesburg, 1996.

Articles:

Close Up (London), March 1932.

New York Times, 21 September 1932.

Herald Tribune (New York), 21 September 1932.

National Board of Review Magazine (New York), September-October 1932.

Hardy, Forsyth, interview with Leontine Sagan, in Cinema Quarterly (London), Winter 1932.

Potamkin, Harry, "Pabst and the Social Film," in Hound and Horn (New York), January-March 1933.

Jahier, Valerio, "42 ans de cinema," in Le Role intellectuel du cinéma, Paris, 1937.

Kael, Pauline, in Kiss Kiss Bang Bang, Boston, 1968.

Kjborup, S., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), December 1972.

Scholar, N., in Women in Film (Berkeley), Summer 1975.

Rich, B. Ruby, "From Repressive Tolerance to Erotic Liberation," in Jump Cut (Chicago), March 1981.

Schlüpmann, H., and K. Gramann, "Vorbemerkung," in Frauen und Film (Berlin), June 1981.

Thiefe, Hertha, "Gestern und Heute," an interview, in Frauen und Film (Berlin), June 1981.

Lefanu, Mark, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1982.

* * *

Mädchen in Uniform was directed by Leontine Sagan under the supervision of Carl Froelich in 1931; it was based on the play Yesterday and Today by Christine Winsloe. Its subversive anti-Fascist, anti-patriarchal themes seem astonishing when one realizes that the film was shot in Germany just two years before Hitler's rise to power.

Mädchen in Uniform achieved great popularity in Paris, London and Berlin, but it was later banned in Germany by Goebbels, Hitler's cultural minister, for its unhealthy moral conclusions. For the next few decades, the film was almost forgotten and received little critical attention. It seems to have been lost somewhere in film history between German expressionism and the Nazi cinema. In the early 1970s interest in the film was revived by women's film festivals; it has come to be seen as the first truly radical lesbian film; and in the last decade Mädchen in Uniform has finally received the recognition it deserves.

Mädchen in Uniform

The structure of the film is a mixture of montage and narrative sequences which inform each other and create an atmosphere which perhaps could not have been achieved by the use of one of these methods alone. The montage sequence at the beginning of the film—stone towers, statues, and marching soldiers—sets up a compliance and strength, a tone that introduces the audience to the life of the girls at school. From the constricting montage shots, the camera turns immediately to the girls' school. Periodically, still shots of the militaristic, patriarchal world outside the school are interspersed with the narrative. The audience is reminded that although the school is a feminine space (indeed, there are no male characters in the film), it is surrounded and even permeated by ubiquitous male authority. Yet, that authority is itself called into question by the narrative, the defiance that continues despite the prevalence of authoritarianism. By its structure, the film succeeds in creating a feminine space enclosed in the literal walls (as exemplified by the montage) of the outside world.

In her utilization of the new sound medium, Sagan was the most advanced director in pre-war Germany. Lotte Eisner said: "With this work, the German sound film reached its highest level." Not only Sagan's precise use of dialogue but also her use of sound as metaphor (the sounding trumpet at the beginning and end of the film) and her creation of atmosphere, the whispers of the girls exchanging secrets, their final desperate chanting of Manuela's name—all attest to the accuracy of Eisner's statement.

Siegfried Kracauer also praised Sagan for her cinematography. He noted her ability to impart the "symbolic power of light" to her images. Sagan's use of shadows adds not only depth to the flat screen but also meaning and atmosphere. Sagan's cinematography is an excellent example of what Eisner calls "stimmung" (emotion), which suggests the vibrations of the soul through the use of light. The lighting and shooting of the stairway is a notable example. Its ascending shadows and its center depth create a tension in which the girls must operate, for the front, well-lighted stairs are off limits to them. The staircase is then a symbol of the girls' confinement, and its darkness literally shadows all of their activities.

Sagan also pioneered the cinematic convention of superimposition of one character's face over that of another to symbolize a deep psychological connection between them. She uses this technique in the film to convey moments of deep attraction between the teacher Fraulein von Bernburg and her student Manuela. The fusion of their images suggests the strength of their bond. It was a technique used 30 years later by Bergman in Persona to achieve the same effect.

Mädchen in Uniform was the first film in Germany to be cooperatively produced. The Deutsches Film Gemeinschaft was created especially for this project—a cooperative film company formed by the cast and crew in which shares rather than salaries were distributed.

—Gretchen Elsner-Sommer

THE MAGNIFICENT AMBERSONS

USA, 1942

Director: Orson Welles

Production: Mercury Productions; black and white, 35mm; running time: 88 minutes; Released 1942 by RKO Radio Pictures Inc.

Producer: Orson Welles; screenplay: Orson Welles, from the novel by Booth Tarkington; photography: Stanley Cortez; editor: Robert Wise; sound: Bailey Fesler and James G. Stewart; art director: Mark-Lee Kirk; music: Bernard Herrmann; special effects: Vernon L. Walker; costume designer: Edward Stevenson.

Cast: Joseph Cotten (Eugene Morgan); Dolores Costello (Isabel Amberson Minafer); Anne Baxter (Lucy Morgan); Tim Holt (George Minafer); Agnes Moorehead (Fanny Amberson); Ray Collins (Jack Amberson); Richard Bennett (Major Amberson); Don Dillaway (Wilbur Minafer).

Award: New York Film Critics' Award, Best Actress (Moorehead), 1942.

Publications

Books:

Bazin, André, Orson Welles, Paris, 1950.
 Noble, Peter, The Fabulous Orson Welles, London, 1956.
 Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Orson Welles, New York, 1961.
 Bessy, Maurice, Orson Welles, Paris, 1963; as Orson Welles, New York, 1971.
 Cowie, Peter, The Cinema of Orson Welles, London, 1965.
 Higham, Charles, The Films of Orson Welles, Berkeley, 1971.
 Bogdanovich, Peter, and Orson Welles, This Is Orson Welles, New York, 1972.

McBride, Joseph, Orson Welles, London, 1972, 1996.
 Naremore, James, The Magic World of Orson Welles, New York, 1978.
 Valentinetti, Claudio M., Orson Welles, Florence, 1981.
 Bergala, Alain, and Jean Narboni, editors, Orson Welles, Paris, 1982.
 Andrew, Dudley, Film in the Aura of Art, Princeton, 1984.
 Higham, Charles, Orson Welles: The Rise and Fall of an American Genius, New York, 1985.
 Leaming, Barbara, Orson Welles: A Biography, New York, 1985.
 Parra, Daniele, and Jacques Zimmer, Orson Welles, Paris, 1985.
 Weis, Elisabeth, and John Belton, editors, Film Sound: Theory and Practice, New York, 1985.
 Taylor, John Russell, Orson Welles: A Celebration, London, 1986.
 Cotten, Joseph, Vanity Will Get You Somewhere, New York, 1987.
 Wood, Bret, Orson Welles: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1990.
 Howard, James, The Complete Films of Orson Welles, Secaucus, 1991.
 Carringer, Robert L., The Magnificent Ambersons: A Reconstruction, Berkeley, 1993.
 Beja, Morris, Perspective on Orson Welles, New York, 1995.
 Callow, Simon, Orson Welles: The Road to Xanadu, New York, 1997.
 Welles, Orson, This Is Orson Welles, New York, 1998.
 Taylor, John Russell, Orson Welles, New York, 2000.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 1 July 1942.
 "Controversy with RKO," in Time (New York), 20 July 1942.
Newsweek (New York), 20 July 1942.
Times (London), 5 March 1943.
Revue du Cinéma (Paris), December 1946.
 Castello, G. C., "The Magnificent Orson Welles," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), January 1949.
 Prouse, Derek, "Notes on Film Acting," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1955.
 "Agnes Moorehead," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1955.
 Pariante, Roberto, "Orson Welles from Citizen Kane to Othello," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), March 1956.
Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1958.
 Stanbrook, Alan, "The Heroes of Welles," in Film (London), no. 26, 1961.
 "Welles Issue" of Image et Son (Paris), no. 139, 1961.
 "Welles Issue" of Cine Forum (Venice), no. 19, 1962.
 Bowers, Ronald, "Agnes Moorehead," in Films in Review (New York), May 1966.
 Johnson, William, "Orson Welles: Of Time and Loss," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1967.
 "Welles Issue" of Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
 Goldfarb, Phyllis, "Orson Welles' Use of Sound," in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1971.
 Smith, J., "Orson Welles and the Great American Dummy; or, The Rise and Fall and Regeneration of Benjamin Franklin's Model American," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1974.
 Vialle, G., in Image et Son (Paris), no. 308 bis, 1976.
 Schwartz, H., "An American Film Institute Seminar with Stanley Cortez, ASC," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), November 1976.

The Magnificent Ambersons

- Bawden, J., "Anne Baxter," in Films in Review (New York), October 1977.
- Passler, Susan Karnes, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Kalinak, Kathryn, "The Text of Music: A Study of The Magnificent Ambersons," in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 27, no. 4, Summer 1988.
- Nielsen, N. A., "Et allerhelvedes perspektiv," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Fall 1989.
- Rochester, D., "Compelling Evidence," in American Film, vol. 15, no. 3, December 1989.
- Doherty, Jim, "The Magnificent Ambersons," in Soundtrack (Mechelen), vol. 9, no. 36, December 1990.
- Cunningham, S., "The Magnificent Ambersons: Deep Focus, the Long Take and Psychological Representation," in Continuum, vol. 5, no. 2, 1992.
- Pernod, P., in Positif (Paris), July-August 1992.
- La Polla, F., "Welles e la frequentazione delle tenebre," in Quaderni di Cinema (Florence), July-September 1992.
- Bogdanovich, P., "En magnifik massaker," in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 3, 1993.

- Rosenbaum, Jonathan, "Pages from the Endfield File," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 29, no. 6, November-December 1993.
- Garcia, Maria, "Re-inventing Orson Welles," in Films in Review (New York), vol. 45, no. 5-6, May-June 1994.
- Wojahn, D., "Beginning in Las Vegas," in Michigan Quarterly Review, vol. 35, no. 1, 1996.
- "The Construction of Space and the Monstrous-Feminine in the Welles-Text," in Critical Survey, vol. 10, no. 2, May 1998.

* * *

The Magnificent Ambersons has been called Orson Welles's near-masterpiece, second to Citizen Kane. That qualified description derives more from the fact that the film was "butchered" by RKO, rather than from any intrinsic shortcoming on the part of its director.

Following the financial disaster of Kane, RKO executives compelled Welles to choose as his next film a subject with commercial appeal. Welles wanted to film The Pickwick Papers with W. C. Fields but Field's schedule would not permit it. As Booth Tarkington was a favorite novelist of Welles, he selected instead the author's 1919

Pulitzer Prize-winning novel about the decline and fall of an aristocratic family brought on by the encroaching industrial revolution at the turn of the century. Welles had already presented a radio version of the novel in 1939 starring himself and Walter Huston.

Welles wrote the script in nine days, deleting much of Tarkington's sentimentality, and with a Proustian remembrance of a life of gentility now past, concentrated on the psychological darkness which destroyed the Amberson clan. His was a literary rendering of what was essentially a second-rate novel, a lament, he says, "not so much for an epoch as for the sense of moral values which are destroyed." The film centers on the ill-fated love between the gentlemanly horseless carriage manufacturer Eugene Morgan and the exquisitely beautiful Amberson matriarch, Isabel; the reaction of her spoiled son George Minafer, whose "come-uppance" eventually transpires; and the fate of neurotic spinster aunt Fanny Minafer.

Welles's completed version ran 148 minutes which he reduced to 131. RKO then sent him to Brazil to direct the aborted It's All True and proceeded to edit the film to 88 minutes, including the insertion of the hospital scene at the end. This scene had not been written by Welles and was directed by Freddie Flick and scored by Roy Webb, instead of Bernard Herrmann whose haunting score is so essential a part of the film. This truncated version, says Welles, destroyed "the whole heart of the picture really."

Nevertheless what remains is a luxuriant motion picture combining Welles's unique directorial flair with what Jean Cocteau called "calm beauty." The beginning of the film provides a picture of a bygone era with its good humor and homey virtues, after which Welles slowly and deliberately unmask the Ambersons' imperfections. The dramatic use of light and shadow in Stanley Cortez's deep-focus photography accentuates and enhances the characters' conflicts. Welles employed a nostalgic iris in and out to begin and end scenes, and he edited the film in the camera—scene by scene, vignette by vignette—rather than relying on the cutting room after the fact. He spoke the voice-over narration himself, a skill honed through his vast experience with radio, a narration he likened to the titles in silent films. He also incorporated overlapping dialogue and street noises as part of the sound track and used groupings of the townspeople in the film as a Greek chorus, whose chattering, gossipy observations of the vicissitudes of the Amberson-Morgans provided succinct commentary and embellished the storyline.

Paramount to the success of Ambersons is the excellent acting. Welles worked meticulously with his cast. Using his script as a guide, he discussed their characters with the actors, rehearsed them at length and then shot the scenes, often allowing them to improve the actual dialogue based on their understanding of their parts. The cast constituted a first-rate ensemble with Joseph Cotten a standout as the gentle, suave Eugene, though the acting honors unequivocally belong to Agnes Moorehead. Her virtuoso performance is one of the finest on the American screen and earned her the New York Film Critics Award.

Reviews of Ambersons were less than enthusiastic. Many seemed to expect a depiction of the typical family wrapped in sugar-spun Americana, rather than the in-depth analysis which revealed warts and all. The New York Times opined that Welles had wasted his abundant talents on "a relentlessly somber drama on a barren theme." The picture was not the commercial success that RKO had hoped for and it was well over a decade before the film was received and appreciated for the master stroke it is.

—Ronald Bowers

MALCOLM X

USA, 1992

Director: Spike Lee

Production: Marvin Worth and Spike Lee for 40 Acres and a Mule Filmworks, in association with Largo International N.V.; 35mm; running time: 201 minutes; released 1 November 1992 by Warner Brothers. Filmed in Saudi Arabia and the USA.

Producer: Marvin Worth, Spike Lee; screenplay: Arnold Perl, Spike Lee, based on The Autobiography of Malcolm X as told to Alex Haley; photography: Ernest Dickerson; editor: Barry Alexander Brown; assistant directors: Randy Fletcher, H. H. Cooper, Dale Pierce, Samir Seif, Ntshavheni Wa Luruli; production design: Wynn Thomas; art director: Tom Warren; music: Terence Blanchard; sound editor: Skip Lievsay; sound recording: Rolf Pardula; costumes: Ruth E. Parker; choreography: Otis Sallid; stunt coordination: Jeff Ward.

Cast: Denzel Washington (Malcolm X); Angela Bassett (Betty Shabazz); Albert Hall (Baines); Al Freeman Jr. (Elijah Muhammad); Spike Lee (Shorty); Delroy Lindo (West Indian Archie); Theresa Randle (Laura); Kate Vernon (Sophia); Lonette McKee (Louise Little); Tommy Hollis (Earl Little); James McDaniel (Brother Earl); Nelson Mandella (Himself); Ossie Davis (Himself).

Publications

Script:

Lee, Spike, with Ralph Wiley, By Any Means Necessary: The Trials and Tribulations of the Making of Malcolm X, including the Screenplay, New York, 1992.

Hardy, James E., Spike Lee: Filmmaker, Broomall, 1995.

Jones, K. Maurice, Spike Lee & the African American Filmmakers: A Choice of Colors, Brookfield, 1996.

Haskins, Jim, Spike Lee: By Any Means Necessary, New York, 1997.

Chapman, Ferguson, Spike Lee, Mankato, 1998.

McDaniel, Melissa, Spike Lee: On His Own Terms, Danbury, 1999.

Articles:

Hollywood Reporter, 10 November 1992.

Variety, 10 November 1992.

Newsweek, 16 November 1992.

McCarthy, T., Variety (New York), 16 November 1992.

Chicago Tribune, 18 November 1992.

Christian Science Monitor, 18 November 1992.

Los Angeles Times, 18 November 1992.

New York Times, 18 November 1992.

Washington Post, 18 November 1992.

Entertainment Weekly, 20 November 1992.

Time (New York), 23 November 1992.

Harrell, Alfred D., "Malcolm X: One Man's Legacy to the Letter," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 73, no. 11, November 1992.

Malcolm X

- Crowdus, Gary, and Dan Georgakas, "Interview with Spike Lee," in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1992/1993.
- Amiel, V., and others, Positif (Paris), February 1993.
- Baccque, A. de., "Docteur Spike et Mr. Lee," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1993.
- Roy, A, "La nouvelle histoire," in 24 Images (Montreal), February 1993.
- Alexander, K., Sight and Sound (London), March 1993.
- Welsh, J. M., Films in Review (New York), March 1993.
- Riley, V., Cinema Papers (Melbourne), May 1993.
- "Malcolm Little's Big Sister," in New Yorker, vol. 70, no. 47, 30 January 1995.
- Reid, M.A., "The Brand X of Post Negritude Frontier," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 20, no. 1/2, 1995/1996.
- Bowman, James, "Spike Lee: 'Artist'," in National Review, vol. 50, no. 14, 26 July 1999.

* * *

Malcolm X is the first film about an African American to be given a blockbuster budget by a Hollywood studio. That the film was made at all, much less as an epic, is primarily due to writer/director Spike Lee's history of producing controversial films that make money. Not surprisingly, Malcolm X was surrounded by racially-based tensions from the onset. Lee used racial considerations to wrest control of the project from white directors only to find himself maligned by some African American intellectuals who felt he was not qualified to take on so weighty a subject. Yet another racial nuance arose when Warner Brothers refused to approve completion funding after Lee went over budget. The director had to obtain millions in gifts from prominent African American entertainers and athletes to continue the film while Warner Brothers feuded with a bond company.

Despite this considerable pre-release sound and fury, including numerous predictions in the press that the film would surely inflame white and/or black audiences to violence, when Malcolm X finally appeared, public reaction was remarkably subdued. Rather than provoking his audiences with a film about social and racial conflict, Lee had opted for a hagiographic script stressing the theme of personal redemption. The three main sections of the film might easily have been subtitled "Malcolm the Criminal," "Malcolm the Prophet," and "Malcolm the Martyr."

After sensationalistic opening credits in which an X becomes a burning American flag and contemporary conflicts between African Americans and police are referenced, the film opens with Malcolm in his zoot suit period. An elaborate dance hall sequence has Malcolm hurrying home a respectable black woman in order to return for a tryst with Sophia, a white woman who will become his consort. He soon becomes part of Harlem's crime scene and is shown at bars handling gambling transactions but not pimping or selling drugs, other facets of his criminal years. After a fallout with West Indian Archie, the mob boss, Malcolm and his sidekick Shorty flee to Boston where they become house robbers until caught and sent to prison. The house-breaking is mainly played for laughs as are Malcolm's repeated hair straightening shampoos, painful procedures used in his autobiography to symbolize self-hatred and wanting to be white.

The prison sequences dramatize Malcolm's conversion to the Nation of Islam by a fellow inmate who will later grow jealous of his pupil's fame. This is one of many departures from the autobiography Lee vehemently insists was his final guide in shaping the script. In reality Malcolm's conversion was mainly the work of his immediate family and daily correspondence from Elijah Muhammad, the sect's leader.

Following his release from prison, Malcolm is shown having a meteoric rise through the ranks of the Nation until he is second in importance only to Elijah Muhammad. Viewers unfamiliar with the movement are likely to get the impression that it was much larger than it was (a few thousand at most), but Malcolm's pivotal role in its growth and public image is on target. His anti-white speeches and virulent attacks on civil rights leaders are mainly kept off screen while his equally strong views on personal and community self-help are spotlighted. His personal life, particularly his marriage, is projected as exemplary. In that regard, Denzel Washington who does a superb job conveying the zeal, body language, and speaking style of the public Malcolm renders a private Malcolm who is rather saccharine and humorless.

The least convincing aspects of the film chronicle Malcolm's pilgrimage to Mecca where he discovers the Nation is regarded as heretical because of its teachings that all white people are devils. Upon his return to America, Malcolm breaks with the Nation to form rival religious and secular organizations. From what is projected on the screen Malcolm's motivation appears to be disillusionment with Elijah Muhammad's spiritual authority compounded by knowledge of Elijah's sexual infidelities. What robs these crucial moments in Malcolm's life of their dynamism is the complete omission of Malcolm's subsequent trips to Africa and the Middle East.

During those journeys Malcolm met many heads of state, the majority of whom considered themselves socialists and revolutionaries. They urged him to join the civil rights movement for an integrated America and to internationalize the African American struggle by making it an issue at the United Nations. Malcolm X followed that advice by taking steps to mend the feud he had instigated with Martin Luther King and to align his new secular organization, the Organization of Afro-American Unity, with the mainstream civil rights movement. Omission of this trajectory distorts the account of his final year.

Lee takes great pains to show us CIA agents photographing Malcolm in Egypt and FBI agents bugging his phone and premises in New York. Given the context Lee has set up, this seems simple racist paranoia rather than a concern about Malcolm's international contacts and his ideological drift to the political left. Rather than probe this aspect of Malcolm's final days, the film takes the easier course of presenting the mechanics of the assassination in great detail. What amounts to an epiphany has been signalled from the start by various devices, including Malcolm's repeated visual recall of his father's persecution by klansmen. His own assassins are shown as Muslims solely motivated by religious fanaticism.

Ossie Davis's funeral oration is used to segue to a montage sequence in which Malcolm's name and image become the symbols of integrity and rebellion for black America. Black children chant, "I am Malcolm," and Nelson Mandela appears as a school teacher imploring us all to study Malcolm's life. The film concludes with engaging documentary footage of the real Malcolm. These few moments offer images of a man far more vital and complex than the staid icon depicted in the fictional portions of the film.

Both the strengths and weaknesses of Malcolm X stem from the decision to make it an inspirational biopic. The hero's worst behavior, his most controversial ideas, and his changing political views have all been muted. What is projected is the story of how a young black man caught in the racism and crime of the big city completely remade his life and finally even shed off racism only to be gunned down by former compatriots whose vision could not grow as full as his own.

Lee's response to criticism that his film is too superficial is that he did not intend it to be the last word on Malcolm X but a stimulus for further study, particularly by young people. Using that standard as a measure, Lee more than met his goal. The baseball caps with X on them that he used to promote the film became omnipresent in black communities. The film also sent sales of books by and about Malcolm into the millions of copies. Despite a running time of 201 minutes, the film turned a modest profit while garnering its share of awards at various national and international film events.

—Dan Georgakas

MALENKAYA VERA

(Little Vera)

USSR, 1988

Director: Vasili Pichul

Production: Gorky Studios; colour, 35mm; running time: 134 minutes.

Production manager: Yuri Prober; screenplay: Mariya Khmelik; photography: Yefim Reznikov; editor: Yelena Zabolotskaya; assistant director: Valentina Pereverzeva; art director: Vladimir Pasternak; music: Vladimir Matetski; sound editor: Pavel Drozdov.

Cast: Natalya Negoda (Vera); Liudmila Zaitseva (Mother); Andrei Sokolov (Sergei); Yuri Nazarov (Father); Alexander Alexeyev-Negreba (Viktor); Alexandra Tabakova (Christyakova); Andrei Fomin (Andrei); Alexander Mironov (Tolik); Alexander Linkov (Mikhail).

Publications

Books:

- Brashinsky, Michael, and Andrew Horton, Russian Critics on the Cinema of Glasnost, Cambridge University Press, 1994.
 Beumers, Birgit, editor, Russia on Reels: The Russian Idea in Post-Soviet Cinema, London, 1999.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 20 July 1988.
 Williamson, Anne, "Rubles of the Game," in Film Comment, January/February 1989.
 Bassan, R., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), April 1989.
 Legrand, J., "Le feu aux poudres" in Positif (Paris), June 1989.
 Mazabard, C., and L. Danilou, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1989.
 Horton, A., in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1989.
 Glaessner, V., in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1989.
 Scheck, F., in Films in Review (New York), October 1989.
 Delmas, G., in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), October-November 1989.
 Elia, M., in Séquences (Montreal), November 1989.
 Eagle, H., "The Indexicality of Little Vera and the End of Socialist Realism," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), October 1990.
 Sperling, V., "Peeking Behind the Celluloid Curtain," in Journal Of Popular Film and Television (Berkeley), Winter 1991.
 Cymbal, Evgenij, "Into a New World," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 2, no. 7, November 1992.
 Mury, Cécile, "La scandaleuse de Moscou," in Télérama (Paris), no. 2360, 5 April 1995.
 Gessen, M., "Sex in the Media and the Birth of the Sex Media in Russia," in Genders, no. 22, 1995.

* * *

While Little Vera, directed by Vasili Pichul, was the most popular film in Russia in 1988, its appearance was met with criticism and skepticism as well as excitement. As the political climate in the Soviet Republics changed once again, the country's relationship with its art transformed as well. Just as Stravinsky's Rite of Spring had accompanied the beginning of the 20th century with atonality and discordance in contrast to the tradition of tonality and comfortable, predictable melodic forms, Little Vera marked the end of Socialist Realism, which depicted reality according to the dictums of the Communist Party, in Soviet film.

This film deals with such unsavory issues as teenage sexuality, alcoholism, and criminality, suggesting the failure of the socialist experiment. As Herbert Eagle observed in Wide Angle, many viewers of this bold work objected to its casual portrayal of sexuality, the crass and hostile behavior of some characters, and its focus on the dismal features of modern Soviet life. "One might therefore have the impression that Little Vera deals with a particularly antisocial, anarchic, uneducated or even criminal stratum of Soviet society," Eagle writes. "In fact, Little Vera's characters are solidly mainstream and their actions rather typical."

Little Vera takes place in a drab, industrial Ukrainian town, Zhdanov, a standard Soviet town shown as it really is. The atmosphere is hovered with gray smoke; massive blocks of buildings, homes to thousands, are crowded together. Vera, a recent high school graduate, lives with her parents and works as a telephone operator. Her strict mother and alcoholic father are frustrated by her surly attitude and carefree lifestyle. Written by Maria Khemlik, Pichul's wife, the story addresses the hopelessness of this young woman's existence and the degree to which she is defined by the men in her life. Her brother has the elevated status of a doctor and lives in Moscow, many miles removed from his humble beginnings; her devoted boyfriend Andrei pursues Vera tirelessly and offers her secure social status through traditional marriage, which she rejects. But more importantly, as Andrew Horton argues in his review of Little Vera in Film Quarterly, "Vera exists between the sympathetic acceptance of her quietly desperate father and the antisocial freedom represented in Sergei and their tempestuous affair. Neither wholly modern (despite her streaked hair and mod clothes) nor traditional, Vera is squarely caught in the middle with little hope of escape."

As noted in Soviet Cinematography, 1918–1991, the success of Little Vera is incomparable with other films that became prominent in the first years of perestroika (thaw). Various surveys indicate this film was more popular than all the others. It can be considered a clear example of Gorbachev's glasnost (new openness) policy by marking a pivotal point at which the cinema defied Communist Party values and objectives, reflexively examining and criticizing the social and economic conditions arrived at in the late 20th century by communism. In these early years of glasnost, filmmakers treated social issues in their films with an unfiltered lens and unabashed honesty that had previously been unacceptable. This low-budget Soviet feature was the first Soviet film with a sense of sexual candor, the first to mention AIDS in a feature film, and the first to acknowledge the prevalence of non-white children of white mothers. Cinematographers considered the expansion of sexual matters in movies to be an important aspect of the struggle against official ideology; hence, the movies of 1986–1988 presented a challenge to traditional Soviet ideology by dealing with the realities of sexuality, such as the sexual activity of teenagers, which had not been addressed by official propaganda, and by presenting sexual relationships as pleasurable in and of themselves. The world in Little Vera is ripe with sensuality and passion—but plagued by dysfunction and brutality as well.

Glasnost allowed filmmakers to take new liberties with an audience primed for uncharted material. Pichul's film deals with working-class subject matter and was produced by Gorky Studios in Moscow, one of the smaller studios previously overshadowed by Mosfilm in Moscow and Lenfilm in Leningrad (St. Petersburg). The production quality is at times low, in contrast to the seamless, high-quality films that had established the tradition for Soviet films for decades. Little Vera is evidence of how contemporary Soviet cinema moved away from the idealism of Socialist Realism. As Horton observes, the film "is an important contribution to a growing number of films that honestly capture a 'no win' mood of many Soviet young people. . . as opposed to the forced optimism of so many Socialist Realist films of the past." And Eagle argues that "Little Vera's stylistic raggedness seems intended as a deliberate appeal to indexicality, an assertion that this is life, not Socialist Realism." Little Vera, he believes, can be viewed as the work which marks the arrival of narrative film as an index of actual life, thus it looks and feels like a documentary filmed in a cramped environment.

Anne Williamson, writing in Film Comment, notes that hard-hitting features on contemporary Soviet life had been almost nonexistent for nearly 50 years before the arrival of Little Vera: "When Lenin declared cinema to be the most important of all the arts, he intended to harness film's energy to the ambitions of the Soviet state.

Under Stalin these aims were further refined in Socialist Realism, which promptly strangled Soviet cinema. After Stalin's passing, the effort to shape and lead the audience devolved into sentimental drivel.' In the period of glasnost the cinema could explore a new, ironic beauty on the screen: images untethered by ideology and fear of political sanctions. The camera could once again function as Sergei Eisenstein's kino eye and present film truth. The cinema could capture life and project it on the screen, giving audiences a Lilliputian view of themselves. This honest, cathartic look at Russian society, one hopes, might be a move (as Vera's father toasts before swallowing a glass of vodka) "Forward, singing."

—Kelly Otter

THE MALTESE FALCON

USA, 1941

Director: John Huston

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 100 minutes. Released 3 October 1941. Filmed June–July, 1941 in Warner Bros. studios. Cost: budgeted at $300,000.

Producers: Hal B. Wallis with Henry Blanke; screenplay: John Huston, from the novel by Dashiell Hammett; photography: Arthur Edson; editor: Thomas Richards; sound: Oliver S. Garretson; art director: Robert Haas; music: Adolph Deutsch; musical director: Leo. F. Forbstein; costume designer: Orry-Kelly.

Cast: Humphrey Bogart (Sam Spade); Mary Astor (Brigid O'Shaughnessy); Sidney Greenstreet (Kasper Gutman, the Fat Man); Peter Lorre (Joel Cairo); Elisha Cook, Jr. (Wilmer Cook); Lee Patrick (Effie Perine); Barton MacLane (Detective Lieutenant); Jerome Cowan (Miles Archer); Gladys George (Iva Archer); Ward Bond (Detective Polhaus); James Burke (Luke); Murray Alper (Frank Richman); John Hamilton (Bryan); Walter Huston (Ship's officer).

Publications

Script:

Huston, John, The Maltese Falcon, New York, 1974.

Books:

Davay, Paul, John Huston, Paris, 1957.
 Allais, Jean-Claude, John Huston, Paris, 1960.
 Nolan, William, John Huston, King Rebel, New York, 1965.
 Hill, Jonathan, and Jonah Ruddy, Bogey: The Man, The Actor, The Legend, London, 1965.
 Hyams, Joe, Bogie, New York, 1966.
 Benayoun, Robert, John Huston, Paris, 1966; revised edition, 1985.
 Cecchini, Riccardo, John Huston, Viridiana, 1969.
 Tozzi, Romano, John Huston: A Picture Treasure of His Films, New York, 1971.

McArthur, Colin, Underworld U.S.A., London, 1972.
 Sklar, Robert, Movie-Made America, New York, 1975.
 Madsen, Axel, John Huston, New York, 1978.
 Kaplan, E. Ann, editor, Women in Film Noir, London, 1978.
 Kaminsky, Stuart M., John Huston: Maker of Magic, Boston, 1978.
 Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Ward, editors, Film Noir, Woodstock, New York, 1979.
 Pettigrew, Terence, Bogart: A Definitive Study of His Film Career, London, 1981.
 Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
 Winkler, Willi, Humphrey Bogart und Hollywoods Schwarze Serie, Munich, 1985.
 Hammen, Scott, John Huston, Boston, 1985.
 Fuchs, Wolfgang J., Humphrey Bogart, Cult-Star: A Documentation, Berlin, 1987.
 McCarty, John, The Films of John Huston, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1987.
 Studlar, Gaylyn, editor, Reflections in a Male Eye: John Huston & the American Experience, Washington, D.C., 1993.
 Cooper, Stephen, Perspectives on John Huston, New York, 1994.
 Luhr, William, editor, The Maltese Falcon: John Huston, Director, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1996.
 Brill, Lesley, John Huston's Filmmaking, New York, 1997.
 Cohen, Allen, John Huston: A Guide to References & Resources, New York, 1997.
 Cunningham, Ernest W., Ultimate Bogie, Los Angeles, 1999.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 1 October 1941.
New York Times, 4 October 1941.
Times (London), 22 June 1942.
 "Huston Issue" of Positif (Paris), August 1952.
 "John Huston," in Films and Filming (London), October 1954.
 Barnes, Peter, "Gunman No. 1," in Films and Filming (London), September 1955.
 Houston, Penelope, "The Private Eye," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1956.
 "Huston Issue" of Positif (Paris), January 1957.
 "Huston Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), April 1957.
 Archer, Eugene, in Film Culture (New York), no. 19, 1959.
 Archer, Eugene, in Films and Filming (London), September and October 1959.
 Martin, Marcel, in Cinéma (Paris), no. 64, 1962.
 Eyles, Allen, in Films and Filming (London), November 1964.
 Mallory, David, in Film Society Review (New York), February 1966.
 Taylor, John Russell, "John Huston and the Figure in the Carpet," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1969.
 Schrader, Paul, "Notes on Film Noir," in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1972.
 Naremore, James, "John Huston and The Maltese Falcon," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), July 1973.
 Gow, Gordon, "Pursuit of the Falcon," in Films and Filming (London), March 1974.
 Beal, Greg, and Peg Masterson, in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 16 September 1976.
 Profirio, Robert, "No Way Out," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1976.

- Guerif, F., in Lumière du Cinéma (Paris), March 1977.
- McVay, Douglas, in Focus on Film (London), no. 30, 1978.
- Journal of Popular Film* (Washington, D.C.), vol. 7, no. 1, 1978.
- Benayoun, Robert, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 October 1979.
- Everson, William K., in Films in Review (New York), March 1980.
- Jenkins, Stephen, "Dashiell Hammett and Film Noir," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November, 1982.
- Benaquist, L., "Function and Index in Huston's The Maltese Falcon," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Winter 1982.
- Johnson, W., "Sound and Image," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), no. 1, 1989.
- Maxfield, J. F., "'La Belle Dame Sans Merci' and the Neurotic Knight: Characterization in The Maltese Falcon," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1989.
- Reid's Film Index* (Wyong), no. 6, 1991.
- Marling, W., "On the Relation Between American Roman Noir and Film Noir," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 3, 1993.
- Edelman, Lee, "Plasticity, Paternity, Perversity: Freud's 'Falcon,' Huston's 'Freud,'" in American Imago, (Highland Park, New Jersey), Spring 1994.
- Thomson, D., "Junior," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, September/October 1995.
- Gale, Steven H., "The Maltese Falcon: Melodrama or Film Noir?" in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 24, no. 2, April 1996.
- Marks, M., "Music, Drama, Warner Brothers: The Cases for Casablanca and The Maltese Falcon," in Michigan Quarterly Review, vol. 35, no. 1, 1996.
- Turner, George, "The Maltese Falcon: A Tale Thrice Filmed," in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 78, no. 4, April 1997.
- Boon, Kevin A., "In Debt to Dashiell: John Huston's Adaptation of The Maltese Falcon," in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), vol. 4, no. 2, Summer 1997.

* * *

The Maltese Falcon opens with credits appearing over the falcon statue, which casts a shadow into the depth of the frame. There follows a printed commentary, over the image, about the falcon's history. A shot of San Francisco, the Golden Gate Bridge, establishes location, and we move to the Spade and Archer sign on the window of their office. The shadow letters "Spade and Archer" appear on the office floor throughout the opening scene. Spade and Archer share the same office, are inextricably linked, and, we discover, even share Archer's wife, Iva (Gladys George). John Huston, in his first directing effort, quickly establishes the link between the two men so that later, when Spade (Humphrey Bogart) denounces Brigid (Mary Astor) for Archer's murder, we understand that it has nothing to do with Spade's like or dislike of his partner. The situation and atmosphere have been economically achieved.

To emphasize the construction of investigation, Huston frequently limits the space in which Spade must move. Spade's office is small; so is his apartment. In fact, in a departure from convention, Huston chose to build some of his sets with ceilings. (The more usual procedure during that period of filmmaking was not to show the ceiling so that lights could be placed above the action and the camera could be free to move upward) Huston also explored a unique style of framing with The Maltese Falcon. Following his own sketches, he set up shots as if they were paintings. For instance, Huston placed characters in the foreground of a shot, their faces often covering half the screen. Frequently, too, the character is not talking, but listening. His reactions thus become more important than those of the person who is speaking or moving.

The Maltese Falcon presented situations that Huston would return to again and again. Spade is the obsessed professional, a proud man who will adhere to a principle unto death. Women are a threat, temptations that can only sway the hero from his professional commitment. They may be wilfully trying to deceive, as Brigid and Iva, or (as in later Huston films), they may be the unwitting cause of the protagonist's defeat or near-defeat. Protagonists in Huston films frequently take risks, gamble with their lives. Spade constantly taunts the mad Wilmer, even using Huston's favourite personal referent—"kid"—to goad him. The taunting is potentially dangerous, but Spade enjoys it.

As Huston was to develop as a director, the image of the ill-fated group that begins with Falcon was to emerge more strongly. Gutman, Cairo, Wilmer, and Brigid are parts of an alliance of greed. They distrust each other but also respect each other. Spade refuses to join the group and survives. The others don't. Huston was to increasingly develop the idea that groups are doomed families, the survivors of which must learn to accept defeat with grace and dignity.

The idea of appreciating expert deception also emerges in Falcon. Bogart's admiration for Brigid's ability to lie is part of his love for her "You're good, you're real good," he says with a smile after a particular lie. In contrast, Spade is scornful of Iva because her lies are so transparent. A Huston hero, like Huston, appreciates wit, intelligence, and a good performance even if they come from a consummate villain.

Although Huston and others have suggested that The Maltese Falcon is almost a line-by-line filming of the novel, there are important technical and sequential, as well as plot and character, differences between the two versions of the story. Hammett's original novel was written and set in 1928–1929; the Huston version is clearly updated to 1940. Also, the conclusions of Hammett's novel is quite different from that of Huston's film. The film ends with Sam Spade watching Brigid disappear through the prisonlike bars of the elevator of his apartment building. Hammett's novel ends with Spade back in his office, where he puts his arm around the waist of his secretary, Effie, and she pulls away from him in confusion because he has turned Brigid in. The novel's last few lines indicate that Spade will have to deal with Iva Archer, who has come to see him again.

Such alterations are, however, less important than the film's dark humor, the deceit and paranoia of its characters, and the brooding darkness and matter-of-fact presentation that made The Maltese Falcon the first clear step into film noir.

—Stuart M. Kaminsky

MAN BITES DOG

See C'EST ARRIVÉ PRÈS DE CHEZ VOUS

A MAN ESCAPED

See UN CONDAMNÉ A MORT S'EST ECHAPPE

MAN OF MARBLE

See CZŁOWIEK Z MARMURU

MAN OF ARAN

UK, 1934

Director: Robert Flaherty

Production: Gainsborough Pictures, Ltd. for Gaumont-British Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 76 minutes. Released 25 April 1934, London. Filmed approximately 1931–33 in the Aran Islands, off the coast of Ireland.

Producer: Michael Balcon; screenplay: Robert Flaherty with Frances Flaherty, with scenarist credit for John Goldman; photography: Robert Flaherty, David Flaherty, and John Taylor; editor: John Goldman; sound: H. Hand; music: John Greenwood.

Cast: Colman “Tiger” King (A Man of Aran); Maggie Durrane (His wife); Michael Dillane (Their son); Pat Mullin (Himself); Patch Ruadh (Red Beard); Patcheen Flaherty and Tommy O’Roarke (The Shark hunters); Patcheen Conneely, Stephen Durrane, Mac McDonough (The Curragh men).

Award: Venice International Film Festival, Best Foreign Film, 1934.

Publications

Books:

- Griffith, Richard, The World of Robert Flaherty, New York, 1953.
 Quintar, Fuad, Robert Flaherty et le documentaire poétique, Paris, 1960.
 Flaherty, Frances, The Odyssey of a Film-Maker: Robert Flaherty’s Story, Urbana, Illinois, 1960.
 Clemente, Jose L., Robert Flaherty, Madrid, 1963.
 Cuenca, Carlos Fernandez, Robert Flaherty, Madrid, 1963.
 Calder-Marshall, Arthur, The Innocent Eye: The Life of Robert J. Flaherty, London, 1963; New York, 1966.
 Klaue, Wolfgang, editor, Robert Flaherty, East Berlin, 1964.
 Agel, Henri, Robert J. Flaherty, Paris, 1965.
 Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.
 Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.
 Napolitano, Antonio, Robert J. Flaherty, Florence, 1975.
 Murphy, William T., Robert Flaherty: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
 Williams, Christopher, Realism and Cinema: A Reader, London, 1980.
 Rotha, Paul, Robert J. Flaherty: A Biography, Philadelphia, 1983.
 Barsam, Richard, The Vision of Robert Flaherty: The Artist as Myth and Filmmaker, Bloomington, 1988.

Articles:

- Rotha, Paul, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1934.
 Sennwald, Andre, in New York Times, 19 October 1934.
Variety (New York), 23 October 1934.
 O’Neil, Brian, in New Masses (New York), 30 October 1934.
 Ferguson, Otis, in New Republic (New York), 7 November 1934.
 Grenville, Vernon, in Commonweal (New York), 9 November 1934.
 Greene, Graham, “Subjects and Stories,” in Footnotes to the Film, edited by Charles Davy, New York, 1938.
 Sadoul, Georges, “Hommage à Robert Flaherty,” in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 13 September 1951.
 Kempe, Fritz, “Robert Flaherty und seine Film,” in Film Bild Ton (Munich), December 1952.
 Flaherty, Frances, “How Man of Aran Came into Being,” in Film News (New York), no. 3, 1953.
 Lee, Rohama, “Flaherty’s Finest Film,” in Film News (New York), no. 3, 1953.
 Martin, Marcel, “Robert Flaherty,” in Anthologie du cinéma 1, Paris, 1965.
 Van Dongen, Helen, “Robert J. Flaherty,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1965.
 Armes, Roy, “Flaherty and the Idea of Documentary,” in Film and Reality: An Historical Survey, Baltimore, 1974.
 Van Dongen, Helen, “Robert J. Flaherty,” in Non-Fiction Film: Theory and Criticism, edited by Richard Barsam, New York, 1976.
 Hitchens, G., “How the Myth Was Made,” in Film Library Quarterly (New York), no. 3, 1978.
 Vogel, A., “Independents,” in Film Comment (New York), March–April 1979.
 Lerner, Jesse, “Flaherty in Motion: The 38th Annual Robert Flaherty Film Seminar,” in Afterimage (London), vol. 20, no. 5, December 1992.
 Kaneko, Ann, “40th Annual Robert Flaherty Seminar,” in Afterimage (London), vol. 22, no. 4, November 1994.
 Short review, in Télérama (Paris), no. 2357, 15 March 1995.
 Marks, Dan, “Ethnography and Ethnographic Film: From Flaherty to Asch and After,” in American Anthropologist, vol. 97, no. 2, June 1995.
 Pilard, Philippe, and Richard Leacock, “Robert Flaherty,” in Positif (Paris), no. 412, June 1995.
 Goldstein, Yosha, “Here’s Looking at You: 41st Annual Robert Flaherty Film Seminar,” in Afterimage (London), vol. 23, no. 2, September–October 1995.
 Leacock, Richard, “In Defense of the Flaherty Traditions,” in Film Culture (New York), no. 79, Winter 1996.
 Pennebaker, D.A., “Looking Back: Film Directors Robert Flaherty, Michael Powell and Jean-Luc Godard,” in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 7, no. 4, April 1997.

* * *

Third in the corpus of Flaherty’s four major films, Man of Aran is preceded by Nanook of the North (1922) and Moana (1926), followed by Louisiana Story (1948). It shares—in some ways makes most pronounced—the special beauties and difficulties his work presents.

Man of Aran

Its blend of idiosyncratic anthropological observation, a story constructed, for the most part, from non-fictional materials and enacted by non-actors, and the understanding it offers of the essentials of human existence are what make Flaherty's work uniquely valuable—sui generis.

Man of Aran has in common with the other films, as principal cast of characters, what anthropologists call the nuclear family—more appropriate to Inishmore than to Samoa. There is the strong and experienced father, the helpful and caring mother, and a boy (who moves increasingly towards the centre of the films—both as their subject and point of view—becoming dominant in Louisiana Story.) The mother in Aran is a stronger and more important figure than she is in the other films. Nature is prominent—preeminent you might even say—water and boats, hunting and fishing abound. In short it would seem the conditions in his films are much like those Flaherty grew up amidst in Northern Michigan and Canada, son of a mining engineer with Indians (as he would have called the native Americans) for companions.

These common elements may represent Flaherty's way of seeing the variegated cultures in which he set himself; they certainly become a major part of the substance of his films, organized along a simple chronological narrative line. In Aran he was attempting to repeat the very considerable success of Nanook (Moana, because it lacked Nanook's drama it was thought, received almost no distribution) and also to move on from it.

In Aran the story becomes more articulated and coherent than in Nanook; more dramatic than in Moana. It still has the separate sequences dealing with various aspects of work for subsistence, but the identification is now more loosely with the son; frequently we take on his point of view. The scene in which the basking shark first appears below the cliff like a sea monster is pointed and masterful in this respect. And the drama of the storm concludes the film on a cosmic scale with the family—father, mother, son—surviving together after danger and loss in the face of the vast overwhelming sea and giant unyielding rock.

But it was exactly these elements of story and drama, the concentration on the elemental struggle that faced 20th-century Aran, that caused the film to be subjected to angry criticism—particularly from the political left in those years of deep economic depression. Rather than having the islanders recreate the capture of basking sharks, which they hadn't done for 60 years, why hadn't Flaherty dealt with the real and present economic concerns like absentee landlordism that plagued the society? The answer to that question seems to be that that was not what Flaherty saw, or what interested him anyway.

Though they had had some famous rows over these exact same issues, his old friend John Grierson, founder and leader of the British documentary movement, who had helped Flaherty set up the production of Man of Aran, came to his defence. Grierson singled out one of the detractors, “whose article puts the principal objections: that Flaherty is a romantic escapist and that the film is only so much idyllic fudge. As I originally, I think, invented the word ‘escapism’ [in response to Flaherty’s earlier work] . . . it may seem scurvy in me to double-cross a supporter. But I do not agree with his estimate either of Flaherty or Man of Aran.”

After praising the truths and beauties contained in Aran, unrivalled among films made within the commercial conditions of the theatrical film industry, Grierson returned to the central distinction between Flaherty’s work and the documentary being made under his own leadership. “Seen as the story of mankind over a period of a thousand years, the story of the Arans is very much a story of man against the sea and woman against the skyline. It is a simple story, but it is an essential story, for nothing emerges out of time except bravery. If I part company with Flaherty at that point, it is because I like my braveries to emerge otherwise than from the sea, and stand otherwise than against the sky. I imagine they shine as bravely in pursuit of Irish landlords as in the pursuit of Irish sharks.” (“John Grierson Replies,” Cinema Quarterly, Autumn 1934.)

But what ultimately seems most important in Man of Aran, as in all his films, is Flaherty’s special use of the film medium, which grew out of his creative impulse. Stated simply, he used film to show people he loved and admired the rest of us. He was not an anthropologist; he idealized and interpreted as an artist does, a visual poet in his case. The view he offers is his view, admittedly. In some respects his films are as much about him—his pleasures, his prejudices, his convictions—as about the people he was filming. Often he set them back in time to recapture and preserve cultures that were disappearing, and he always presented them at their finest, simplest, and noblest, gaining their cooperation to achieve this presentation. But Flaherty did not invent or glamorize. Aran and the rest were not created from make-believe or fakery; all that he shows did happen or had happened.

To patronize Flaherty as a “romantic,” as Paul Rotha and others did in the 1930s, seems to me to miss the point. One can see what Rotha is thinking of if the people and settings Flaherty chose and the way he chose to present them are linked with the noble savage of Jean-Jacques Rousseau and the idealized landscapes of early 19th-century painters. But Flaherty’s films have little to do with the romanticism of the romantic movement, resting as it does on individual imagination and subjective emotions. On the contrary, his work might be said to be “classical,” as I understand the romantic/classical dichotomy; it is spare and uninvolved with individual psychologies. He seems like a genial pagan or a prefall Adam—lacking interest in Christian notions of sin and guilt in any case.

Flaherty worked with what he understood and said what he had to say. That statement was, throughout his work, that humankind has an innate dignity, and that beauty dwells in its patterns of survival and existence. Considered in this way, Man of Aran takes its proper place as a master work within the Flaherty canon.

—Jack C. Ellis

THE MAN WHO SHOT LIBERTY VALANCE

USA, 1962

Director: John Ford

Production: Ford Productions-Paramount; black and white, 35mm; running time: 122 minutes. Released April 1962. Filmed September 1961 in Paramount studios. Cost: budgeted at $3.2 million, (according to Ford’s grandson).

Producer: Willis Goldbeck; screenplay: Willis Goldbeck and James Warner Bellah, from the story by Dorothy M. Johnson; photography: William H. Clothier; editor: Otho Lovering; sound: Philip Mitchell; art directors: Hal Pereira and Eddie Imazu; music: Cyril Mockridge; music director: Irvin Talbot (theme from Young Mr. Lincoln by Alfred Newman); costume designer: Edith Head.

Cast: James Stewart (Ransom Stoddard); John Wayne (Tom Doniphon); Vera Miles (Hallie Stoddard); Lee Marvin (Liberty Valance); Edmond O’Brien (Dutton Peabody); Andy Devine (Link Appleyard); Ken Murray (Doc Willoughby); John Carradine (Starbuckle); Jeanette Nolan (Nora Ericson); John Qualen (Peter Ericson); Willis Bouchey (Jason Tully); Carleton Young (Maxwell Scott); Woody Strode (Pompey); Denver Pyle (Amos Carruthers);

The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance

Strother Martin (Floyd); Lee Van Cleef (Reese); Robert F. Simon (Handy Strong); O. Z. Whitehead (Ben Carruthers); Paul Birch (Mayor Winder); Joseph Hoover (Hasbrouck); Jack Pennick (Barman); Anna Lee (Passenger); Charles Seel (President, Election Council); Shug Fisher (Drunk); Earle Hodgins; Stuart Holmes; Dorothy Phillips; Buddy Roosevelt; Gertrude Astor; Eva Novak; Slim Talbot; Monty Montana; Bill Henry; John B. Whiteford; Helen Gibson; Major Sam Harris.

Publications

Books:

Mitchell, George J., The Films of John Ford, 1963.
 Haudiquet, Philippe, John Ford, Paris, 1964.
 Bogdanovich, Peter, John Ford, Berkeley, 1968; revised edition, 1978.
 Kitses, Jim, Horizons West, Bloomington, Indiana, 1970.
 Jones, Ken D., The Films of James Stewart, New York, 1970.
 Ricci, Mark, and Boris and Steve Zmijewsky, The Films of John Wayne, New York, 1970; revised edition, as The Complete Films of John Wayne, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1983.
 Baxter, John, The Cinema of John Ford, New York, 1971.
 Cawelti, John, The Six-Gun Mystique, Bowling Green, Ohio, 1971.
 Place, Janey, The Western Films of John Ford, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1973.
 Kaminsky, Stuart M., American Film Genres, Dayton, Ohio, 1974; revised edition, Chicago, 1985.
 Barbour, Alan, John Wayne, New York, 1974.
 Thompson, Howard, James Stewart, New York, 1974.
 McBride, Joseph, and Michael Wilmington, John Ford, New York and London, 1975.
 Sarris, Andrew, The John Ford Movie Mystery, London, 1976.
 Sinclair, Andrew, John Ford, London and New York, 1979.
 Ford, Dan, Pappy: The Life of John Ford, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.
 Eyles, Allen, John Wayne, South Brunswick, New Jersey, 1979.
 Zec, Donald, Marvin: The Story of Lee Marvin, London, 1979.
 Anderson, Lindsay, About John Ford, London, 1981; New York, 1983; 1999.
 Caughie, John, editor, Theories of Authorship: A Reader, London, 1981.
 Schatz, Thomas, Hollywood Genres: Formulas, Filmmaking, and the Studio System, New York, 1981.
 Reed, Joseph W., Three American Originals: John Ford, William Faulkner, Charles Ives, Middletown, Connecticut, 1984.
 Eyles, Allen, James Stewart, London, 1984.
 Hunter, Allan, James Stewart, New York, 1985.
 Robbins, Jhan, Everybody's Man: A Biography of James Stewart, New York, 1985.
 Ray, Robert B., A Certain Tendency of the Hollywood Cinema 1930–1980, Princeton, 1985.
 Kieskalt, Charles John, The Official John Wayne Reference Book, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1985.
 Shepherd, Donald, and others, Duke: The Life and Times of John Wayne, London, 1985.

Gallagher, Tag, John Ford: The Man and His Films, Berkeley, 1986.
 Stowell, Peter, John Ford, Boston, 1986.
 Lepper, David, John Wayne, London, 1987.
 Levy, Emanuel, John Wayne, Prophet of the American Way of Life, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1988.
 Riffin, Judith M., John Wayne: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1992.
 Lourdeaux, Lee, Italian & Irish Filmmakers in America: Ford, Capra, Coppola and Scorsese, Springfield, 1993.
 Davis, Ronald L., John Ford: Hollywood's Old Master, Norman, 1995.
 Darby, William, John Ford's Westerns: A Thematic Analysis, with a Filmography, Jefferson, 1996.
 Thomas, Tony, A Wonderful Life: The Films & Career of James Stewart, Secaucus, 1997.
 Girgus, Sam B., Hollywood Renaissance: The Cinema of Democracy in the Era of Ford, Capra, and Kazan, New York, 1998.
 Levy, Bill, John Ford: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1998.
 Eyman, Scott, Print the Legend: The Life & Times of John Ford, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Mifflin, Wilfred, in Films in Review (New York), May 1962.
 McVay, Douglas, "The Five Worlds of John Ford," in Films and Filming (London), June 1962.
 Jones, DuPre, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1962.
 Sarris, Andrew, "Cactus Rosebud; or, The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance," in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1962.
 Callenbach, Ernest, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1963–64.
 Vöbel, F. W., in Filmanalysen 2, edited by Franz Everschor, Düsseldorf, 1964.
 Sweigart, William, "James Stewart," in Films in Review (New York), December 1964.
 "John Ford Issue" of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1966.
 Kennedy, Burt, "Our Way West," in Films and Filming (London), October 1969.
 Hall, Dennis John, "Tall in the Saddle," in Films and Filming (London), October 1969.
 Wood, Robin, "Shall We Gather at the River: The Late Films of John Ford," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1971.
 Bordwell, David, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1971.
 Pechter, William, "Persistence of Vision," in 24 Frames a Second, New York, 1971.
 Wollen, Peter, "The Auteur Theory," in Signs and Meaning in the Cinema, London, 1972.
 Pye, D., "Genre and History—Fort Apache and Liberty Valance," in Movie (London), Winter 1977–78.
 Coursen, D. F., "John Ford's Wilderness—The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1978.
 Lowry, Ed., in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 9 November 1978.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, "La Structure de l'eglantine," in Positif (Paris), June 1981.
 Boyero, C., in Casablanca (Madrid), January 1983.
 Skerry, P. J., "The Western Film: A Sense of an Ending," in New Orleans Review, no. 3, 1990.
 Braad Thomsen, C., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Summer 1990.
 Della Casa, S., "Amnesia land: il cinema del dimenticare," in Ikon (Milan), October 1990.

- Darby, W., "Musical Links in Young Mr. Lincoln, My Darling Clementine, and The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), no. 1, 1991.
- Doyle, Kevin M., "The L.A.P.D. and the Doniphon Syndrome (Glorification of Vigilante-style Police Tactics in Popular Movies and the Rodney King Beatings)," in America, vol. 165, no. 1, 6 July 1991.
- Roche, Mark W., and Vittorio Hosle, "Vico's Age of Heroes and the Age of Men in John Ford's Film The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance," in CLIO, vol. 23, no. 2, Winter 1994.
- Ingrassia, Catherine, "'I'm Not Kicking, I'm Talking': Discursive Economies in the Western," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 20, no. 3, Spring 1996.

* * *

John Ford's The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance opened to mixed reviews in 1962, and played on the second half of many double bills. But two decades later critics see this film quite differently. The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance is now regarded as one of the greatest works of one of America's greatest filmmakers. It reaffirms John Ford's reputation as the master of the most American of the film genres, the western.

Coming late in the career of a director with a long-standing reputation as a creator of popular films, The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance was completely an auteur project. Ford located the property, developed a script with long-time associates Willis Goldbeck and James Warner Bellah, and raised half the proposed $3.2 million budget needed for an all-star cast which included John Wayne and James Stewart in their first film together. Because Wayne had just signed a ten picture contract with Paramount (for which he was paid $6 million in advance), Ford took his package deal to that particular studio. Shooting commenced in September 1961. The completed film was released in April 1962, and quickly played out, to be resurrected a decade later in revivals and retrospectives.

The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance presents a very dark view of the western legend. Although the opening sequence is of an "iron horse," confidently moving through the desert, the rest of the film is by and large confined to sequences indoors, usually taking place at night—recorded on a Hollywood sound stage. The Old West has lost the epic proportions of Monument Valley, and moved to a ramshackle town, populated by a handful of people. (An unseen range war occurs off-screen.) The West has been settled; the myth of the western hero is remembered only in flashbacks. Indeed, the western era has already past when the film begins. Senator Ransom Stoddard (James Stewart) and his wife Hallie (Vera Miles) journey to hometown Shinbone to attend the funeral of an old friend, the true western hero Tom Doniphon (John Wayne). Through a long flashback (one that comprises most of the film) we learn how progress came to the West. On his first journey to Shinbone, Stoddard, an earnest young lawyer from the East, is robbed and beaten by archetypal outlaw Liberty Valance (Lee Marvin). Stoddard seeks revenge by trying to civilize the community. But in the end Stoddard can bring the civilized values of the East only through deception and violence. He earns his fame not through the law but as a man who stood up to and killed evil incarnate, Liberty Valance.

Tom Doniphon is more tragically caught up in the conflict between civilization and chaos, order and violence. Doniphon is doomed to live in a world to which he can not adapt. Structurally, the film counterpoints the rise of Stoddard with the fall of Doniphon. Gradually Stoddard educates and draws Doniphon's "girl" to him through his teachings. (Stoddard literally becomes the school teacher.) Ultimately, when Stoddard does face off with Liberty Valance, the film tells the viewer that it is Doniphon, in a last heroic act, who shoots Liberty Valance. If a viewer looks closely, however, nowhere does the film actually show us who killed Liberty Valance. It is impossible to tell visually whether the bullet was from the gun of Tom Doniphon or that of Ransom Stoddard. But the myth continues. The out-of-date western hero loses his girl, and settles into a life of obscurity, while the lawyer from the East rises to heights of political power, becoming a senator in Washington, D.C.

At the nominating convention for statehood, Stoddard assumes authority. In this sequence Ford mocks the heart of the American political process. This becomes clear when the cattle-baron candidate, one Buck Langhorn, is nominated. Dressed in western dude fashion, this grotesque cowboy "image" is all that remains of the values and honor associated with a western hero like Tom Doniphon. Aptly, when the doors swing shut on the convention, that is the last time we see Doniphon alive. As the newspaper editor notes later about Stoddard's rise to power, "When the legend becomes fact, print the legend." The desert is now a garden, full of the symbolic cactus rose. The myth is complete with "progress" coming to the old West. The honor and values of Stagecoach, the Iron Horse, and earlier Ford westerns will never return again.

To deconstruct the western as story, Ford finally acknowledged its role as a myth and legend in the history and development of the United States. To create a timeless world of formal artifice, Ford filmed The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance in black and white on a studio soundstage. Furthermore, Ford's distinction between fact and legend also involved the restructuring of the film's time by placing the act of telling between past and present, thus reinforcing the process of deconstructing mythmaking. This narrative framework, the stark stylization of mise-en-scène, and the use of lighting render the flashback (and the flashback in the flashback) into nightmare. This is a stripped down western; the colorful legend and look of Monument Valley have become a barren world of broken dreams.

In the end The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance is a great filmmaker's own critique of the form in which he did his best work. It probably now ranks second to The Searchers (1956) in Ford's oeuvre, and is part of what critics and historians now consider Ford's greatest period, the films—especially the westerns—made after World War II. Ford's career is now seen as a slow, steady parabola of change, beginning with certainties about the values of civilization and ending with abject filmmaking, always seeming to follow the rules, yet always breaking with them. The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance must be seen as a great achievement of a filmmaker at the height of his power and understanding.

—Douglas Gomery

THE MAN WITH THE MOVIE CAMERA

See CHELOVEK S KINO APPARATOM

MANHATTAN

USA, 1979

Director: Woody Allen

Production: A Jack Rollins-Charles H. Joffe Production for United Artists; black and white, 35mm, Panavision; running time: 96 minutes. Released 1979. Filmed 1978 in New York City.

Producer: Charles H. Joffe; screenplay: Woody Allen and Marshall Brickman; photography: Gordon Willis; editor: Susan E. Morse; production designer: Mel Bourne; music: George Gershwin; costume designer: Albert Wolsky.

Cast: Woody Allen (Isaac Davis); Diane Keaton (Mary Wilke); Mariel Hemingway (Tracy); Michael Murphy (Yale); Meryl Streep (Jill); Anne Byrne (Emily).

Awards: New York Film Critics Awards for Best Direction (shared with Robert Benton for Kramer vs. Kramer) and Best Supporting Actress (Streep, award also includes her performances in Kramer vs. Kramer and Seduction of Joe Tynan), 1979.

Publications

Script:

Allen, Woody, and Marshall Brickman, Manhattan, in Four Films of Woody Allen, New York, 1982.

Books:

Jacobs, Diane, But We Need the Eggs: The Magic of Woody Allen, New York, 1982.

Brode, Douglas, Woody Allen: His Films and Career, London, 1985, 1997.

Benayoun, Robert, Woody Allen: Beyond Words, London, 1987.

Bendazzi, G., The Films of Woody Allen, Florence, 1987.

Navacelle, Thierry de, Woody Allen on Location, London, 1987.

Pogel, Nancy, Woody Allen, Boston, 1987.

Jarvie, Ian, Philosophy of the Film: Epistemology, Ontology, Aesthetics, London, 1987.

McCann, Graham, Woody Allen: New Yorker, Malden, 1991.

Spignesi, Stephen J., Woody Allen Companion, Kansas City, 1992.

Champlin, Charles, Woody Allen at Work: The Photographs of Brian Hamill, New York, 1995.

Curry, Renee, Perspectives on Woody Allen, London, 1996.

Fox, Julian, Woody: Movies from Manhattan, New York, 1996.

Allen, Woody, Woody Allen on Woody Allen: In Conversation with Stig Bjorkman, Collingdale, 1998.

Lax, Eric, Woody Allen: A Biography, Collingdale, 1998.

Nichols, Mary P., Reconstructing Woody: Art, Love and Life in the Films of Woody Allen, Lanham, 1998.

Articles:

Quart, L., in Cineaste (New York), no. 4, 1979.

Pym, John, in Sight and Sound (London), no. 4, 1979.

Morris, G., "Manhattan: A Cerebral Approach to Filmmaking," in Take One (Montreal), no. 6, 1979.

Maraval, P., and J. C. Bonnet, "Images de la ville: Allen et Duras," in Cinématographe (Paris), no. 53, 1979.

Gitelson, N., "The Maturing of Woody Allen," in New York Times, 22 April 1979.

Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 25 April 1979.

Ginsberg, S., in Variety (New York), 25 April 1979.

Gilliatt, Penelope, in New Yorker, 30 April 1979.

Kroll, Jack, in Newsweek (New York), 30 April 1979.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 30 April 1979.

Denby, D., in New York, 7 May 1979.

New Republic (New York), 19 May 1979.

Maslin, J., "I Share My Character's Views on Men—and Stuff Like That," in New York Times, 20 May 1979.

Corliss, Richard, in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1979.

Dempsey, M., "The Autobiography of Woody Allen," in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1979.

Weidner, H., "Woody Allen: God's Answer to Job," in Christian Century (Chicago), 6 June 1979.

Simon, John, in Nation (New York), 22 June 1979.

Bartholomew, D., in Film Bulletin (Philadelphia), June 1979.

Friend, D. M., "Woody Allen's Jewish American Gothic," in Midstream (New York), June-July 1979.

Simon, John, "Our Aliens and Theirs," in National Review (New York), 6 July 1979.

Grenier, R., "Woody Allen in the Limelight," in Commentary (New York), July 1979.

Thurman, J., in MS (New York), July 1979.

Mallow, S., "Lens Cap: Making Sense in Metuchen," in Filmmakers Monthly (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), July 1979.

Amiel, M., in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1979.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), August 1979.

Letremble, M., in Séquences (Montreal), August 1979.

Alpert, Hollis, in American Film (Washington, D.C.), September 1979.

Cebe, G., "Woody Allen: Portrait de l'acteur en cinéaste: Manhattan; ou, Le Temps retrouvé," in Ecran (Paris), 15 September 1979.

McMurty, L., in American Film (Washington, D.C.), September 1979.

Quart, L., in USA Today (New York), September 1979.

Kritz, J., interview with Woody Allen, in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), October 1979.

Baer, W., in Film und Ton (Munich), October 1979.

Fuksiewicz, J., in Kino (Warsaw), November 1979.

Wolf, W.R., in Film en Televisie (Brussels), December 1979.

Sarris, Andrew, "The New Phase of Intelligence," in Village Voice (New York), 3 December 1979.

Blau, Douglas, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Termine, L., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), February 1980.

Median de la Serna, R., "El cine de Woody Allen," in Cine (Mexico City), March 1980.

Teitelbaum, D., "Producing Woody: An Interview with Charles H. Joffe," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), April-May 1980.

Manhattan

Ruiz, J., "Dos encuentros con Woody Allen," in Casablanca (Madrid), February 1981.

Goodhill, Dan, "Manhattan: Black and White Romantic Realism," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), November 1982.

Gallanfent, E., "Moonshine: Love and Enchantment in Annie Hall and Manhattan," in Cineaction (Toronto), Summer 1989.

Girlanda, E., and A. Tella, "Allen, Manhattan transfert," in Castoro Cinema (Florence), July-August 1990.

Chances, Ellen, "Moscow Meets Manhattan: The Russian Soul of Woody Allen's Films," in American Studies International, vol. 30, no. 1, April 1992.

DeCurtis, Anthony, "Woody Allen: The Rolling Stone Interview," in Rolling Stone (New York), no. 665, 16 September 1993.

Deleyto, C., "The Narrator and the Narrative: The Evolution of Woody Allen's Film Comedies," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 19, no. 2, 1994/1995.

Premiere (Boulder), vol. 9, January 1996.

Garbarz, F., "Manhattan: une autre femme," in Positif (Paris), no. 444, February 1998.

* * *

Manhattan opens with images of New York City over which the voice of Woody Allen, as writer Isaac Davis, begins chapter one of his new book: "He adored New York City. He idolized it out of proportion." The film is an homage to "Allen-town," to the city that spawned him, but unlike Allen's homage to the woman of his dreams (Annie Hall), here he idolizes the good while systematically removing the obviously negative. In the prologue he presents us with New York City's most glorious vistas: fireworks over Central Park, the skyline at dawn, the Empire State Building, the Brooklyn Bridge, all to the lush romantic sound of George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue. Gone are the messy vistas, the untidy streets, the horrors of the subway system, people of non-white lineage. His book, an expanded version of an article he had written about his mother entitled "The Castrating Zionist," is, one can assume, this movie, and Isaac Davis is its author.

With typical deprecation, Isaac decides that the best way to achieve success is to write an autobiographical novel that is neither preachy nor angry, which focuses on an explication of his desired self-image. That image, like his image of the city, is a castrated one. While dwelling on the city's physical beauty, Isaac proceeds to effect an autopsy on his social set, his ultimate desire being an exposé of the decay of contemporary culture.

That social set consists of writers. Four of the main characters belong to that occupation: Isaac Davis is a television writer who quits his job to write his book; Yale is a teacher who is working on a biography of O'Neill; Mary Wilke is a journalist who writes on art and a variety of other topics; Jill is Isaac's ex-wife who publishes a feminist tract on their marriage entitled Marriage, Divorce and Selfhood. Throughout the film the names of great writers are bandied about, each one cited as if he were a reference point in the psychological development of the character. Thus Isaac refers to Strindberg, Bergman, Fellini, Kafka and Groucho Marx, his strategy being both reverential and referential. As he says to Yale: "I gotta model myself after someone!" The blend of writers cited certifies Isaac's neurotic condition. His problems, like those of the city, are intellectual.

As with other Allen films, this one also dwells on the impossibility of lasting relationships. If Bergman and Fellini were the influences of Interiors and Stardust Memories, Orson Welles seems to be the working model here, most specifically the Welles of The Lady from Shanghai. A reflection of the real-life decay of Welles's marriage to Rita Hayworth, Lady abounds with bitter commentary on relationships. References to Hayworth, the buggy ride in Central Park, the use of the planetarium for a love scene, the romantic voice-over which begins Manhattan, and themes of decay all point to this film as an influence. In fact, the last line of dialogue from Shanghai could have been used to end Manhattan.

Filmed in Panavision on Technicolor stock, then printed in black and white, this film is Allen's most complex reflection on the artist as romantic—his draining of its color the most bitter-sweet stroke.

—Doug Tomlinson

MARAT/SADE

(The Persecution and Assassination of Jean-Paul Marat as Performed by the Inmates of the Asylum of Charenton under the Direction of Monsieur de Sade)

Great Britain, 1966

Director: Peter Brook

Production: United Artists; De Luxe Color; running time: 115 minutes. Released in USA February 1967.

Producer: Lord Michael Birkett with the Royal Shakespeare Company; screenplay: Adrian Mitchell; English translation by Geoffrey Skelton; based on a play by Peter Weiss; assistant director: Anthony Way; photography: David Watkin; editor: Tom Priestly; sound: Robert Allen; art director: Ted Marshall; music: Richard Peaslee; choreographer: Malcolm Goddard.

Cast: Patrick Magee (Marquis de Sade); Ian Richardson (Jean-Paul Marat); Glenda Jackson (Charlotte Corday); Clifford Rose (Coulmier); Brenda Kempner (Mme Coulmier); Ruth Baker (Mlle. Coulmier); Freddie Jones (Cucurucu); Robert Lloyd (Jacques Roux); Leon Lissek (Lavoisier); John Harwood (Lavoisier); Jack Steiner (Dupperet); Michael Williams (Herald); Hugh Sullivan (Kokol); Jonathan Burn (Polpach); Jeanette Landis (Rossignol); Susan Williamson (Simone Evrard); Mark Jones (Abbott); and others.

Awards: Silver Ribbon for Best Director of a Foreign Film, Italian National Syndicate of Film Journalists, 1966; Special Mention (Brook), Locarno International Film Festival, 1967.

Publications

Articles:

Brook, Peter, et. al., "Marat/Sade Forum," in Tulane Drama Review, vol. 10, no. 4, Summer 1966.

New York Times, 23 February 1967.

White, John J., "History and Cruelty in Peter Weiss's Marat/Sade," in Modern Language Review, vol. 63, 1968.

Roberts, David, "Marat/Sade, or the Birth of Postmodernism from the Spirit of the Avant-Garde," in Postmodern Conditions, edited by Milner, Thompson, and Worth, New York, 1990.

Holderness, Graham, "Weiss/Brook: Marat/Sade," in Twentieth Century European Drama, edited by Brian Docherty, New York, 1994.

* * *

In 1966, world-famous stage director Peter Brook adapted the visionary play by Peter Weiss, a German dramatist who lived in Sweden until his death in 1982. The full title of the film is The Persecution and Assassination of Jean-Paul Marat as Performed by the Inmates of the Asylum at Charenton Under the Direction of the Marquis de Sade. The complexity of the title is matched by the complicated relationship to history and politics it offers. The didactic full title of the play heralds a complex political drama rarely seen on film. This film does not aim at persuasiveness or at presenting an objective analysis of a distinct historical event. Instead, it offers a complicated unfolding of a play within a play about drama and history that simultaneously challenges the spectator to rethink political philosophy and the nature of human nature.

Brook's filmed version of Weiss's play opens in the bathhouse of the insane asylum at Charenton, France, in the year 1808. The asylum's most notorious inmate, Marquis de Sade (Patrick Magee), has been commissioned to write and direct a play for the inmates to perform "as therapy," for Parisian high society. Sade stages a play about the assassination of the French revolutionary leader Jean-Paul Marat at the height of the Terror in 1793. The play itself represents four historical levels: the failed revolution in 1793, the asylum where the play was staged in 1808, the filming in 1966, and the spectator's current viewing.

The play is based on two historical truths: that the Marquis de Sade was interned in the asylum in the Paris suburb of Charenton for 13 years (from 1801 until his death in 1814); and that Marat was fatally stabbed in a bathtub by Charlotte Corday at the height of terror in the French Revolution in 1793. The sparse facts form the basis of an imagined performance by members of asylum. The play is performed by inmates of the asylum and overseen, monitored, and intermittently interrupted by the asylum's staff. The patients' white costumes and the white face worn by some of the cast provide a drab background for the opulent aristocratic audience, who have come to the asylum to watch the show. Thematically, this film is about history itself, the events of the French revolution, class conflict, and the conditions of an early nineteenth century asylum, where plays were part of the therapeutic process. But the play-within-a-play is not just a historical drama. Rather, it is clearly concerned with the problem of revolution.

Marat and Sade debate the philosophical and political impact of the French Revolution while surrounded by inmates of the asylum. Their debate circulates around certain compelling and difficult questions: are the things that are true for the masses also true for their leaders? Where, in modern times, lies the borderline of sanity? Marat advocates the need for revolution. Sade (who historically did write while an inmate of the asylum) views the world solely in individualistic terms and voices extreme pessimism about the outcome of revolution.

For Marat, the problems of existence have social and political solutions and revolution holds the potential for transformation. Sade, on the other hand, champions the depravity and perversity inherent in human nature. In addition to these two poles of belief, a chorus of other voices are present: The asylum director is present, with his wife and daughter, to interrupt the action when the revolutionary rhetoric goes too far and the historical revision not far enough. The priest strives to uphold the rules of the church, and the audience is bent on entertainment. The herald provides an ongoing ironic commentary on events, while Charlotte Corday, the narcoleptic heroine and assassin, speaks contemptuously of the slaughter in Paris, with phrases like, "They talk of people now as gardeners talk of leaves for burning."

The collision of existentialism with political fanaticism amid chaos provides no easy answers. Whether a parable of modern society (life is a madhouse in which we are all prisoners) or a deliberate technique designed to shock and push action and dialogue to excess, this film is not a patronizing, overwrought debate; on the contrary, it provides an intellectual, chronological, and visual challenge. In the 34 years since its premiere, the simply staged, one-room film remains unprecedented in its combination of classic Brechtian and Artaudian theory as well as Marxist political critique and experimental vision. The members of the Royal Shakespeare Company provide a compellingly disturbed rendition of the claustrophobic atmosphere of a Parisian insane asylum in the early nineteenth century.

The unusual, minimalist cinematography of Watkins creates a harsh, at times surreal, effect. His skillful camera work varies extreme, lingering close-ups with erratic camera movement to heighten the unpredictability and exacerbate the feeling of uncontrolled violence building beneath the surface. The camera work implicates the spectator in the play's unfolding, revealing that there is no safe place from which to watch the film at a distance. The use of a hand-held camera, especially, makes us feel that we too are inmates involved in the activity of the asylum.

In a similarly innovative manner, the spectator is not given a linear narrative, except in the synopsis of the entire film provided at the beginning of the play by a herald. Thus, one is forced to participate actively in the making of the meaning and message of the play (and the film). According to Graham Holderness, "the play present[s] political violence and human extremity through a philosophical violence and a self-reflexive theatrical medium." The film raises such questions as, who benefits from the revolution? Do the ends justify the means? Charenton, "an intense characterization of the wretched of the earth" writes Holderness, was a place for the socially unacceptable (whether clinically insane or not). This institution was, according to Weiss, a "hiding place for the moral rejects of civilized society" and was designed to maintain discipline, order, and social control for 'civilized' societies.

Brook's adaptation of the play reveals strong overtones of Antonin Artaud's 'Theater of Cruelty,' which touted a new dramatic language, liberated from the narrative continuity and the conventions of realist theater. The events of the play and its the setting in an asylum jar the senses of both the audience and the performers, agitating viewers at a sensory level and thus involving them emotionally as well as intellectually. One witnesses the use of Brechtian estrangement as asylum inmates constantly forget their lines, fall out of their roles, and have to be prompted. Moreover, the film is divided into episodes, all of which are continuously interrupted by formal debate, political songs, direct audience address, mime, and pageant. The characters break into song, speak in rhyme, have mental attacks (narcolepsy, seizures, itching attacks, and so forth.) This constant interruption and mixing of the different historical levels serves as a reminder of the blurry line between life and representation.

The film concludes with Marat's rising from his death to pronounce final words of faith in revolutionary collectivism: "Others now will carry on/the fight that I Marat begun/until one day the hour shall strike/when men will share and share alike." Sade rejoins with pour individualism "So for me the last word can never be spoken/I am left with a question that is always open." The entirely imagined encounter between Marat and Sade reflects the Marxist belief in history as a conflict between two contradictory forces, represented by the beliefs of Marat and Sade. On one level a historical drama about France in the aftermath of the 1789 revolution, and a philosophical debate between the collective and the individual, Brook's film also pushes the limits, testing whether a film should take up a political stance or maintain a dignified detachment in the interests of objectivity.

—Jill Gillespie

THE MARCH OF TIME

USA, 1935–51

Director: Louis de Rochemont

Production: Time Inc.; black and white, 35mm; running time: about 20 minutes per episode. First episode released 1 February 1935, New York, by First Division Exchanges, Inc. After 1935 The March of Time was distributed through RKO/Radio, and later 20th Century-Fox. The last episode was released in August, 1951. Cost: the first 3 reels cost approximately $40,000, while $150,000 was used to launch the series.

Producers: Louis de Rochemont and Roy Larsen, but during WWII Louis resigned and was replaced by his brother Richard de Rochemont; editors: Louis de Rochemont and Roy Larsen, Louis replaced by brother Richard during WWII; technical management: Jack Bradford and Lothar Wolff.

Cast: Westbrook Van Voorhis (Narrator).

Awards: Special oscar for the series' significance to motion pictures for having revolutionized one of the most important branches of the industry—the newsreel, 1936.

The March of Time

Publications

Books:

Bluem, A. William, Documentary in American Television, New York, 1965.

Elson, Robert T., Time Inc., New York, 2 vols., 1968.

Fielding, Raymond, The American Newsreel 1911–1967, Norman Oklahoma, 1972.

Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.

Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.

Fielding, Raymond, The March of Time 1935–1951, New York, 1978.

Ellis, Jack C., The Documentary Idea, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1989.

Articles:

Newsweek (New York), 9 February 1935.

Cooke, Alistair, in Sight and Sound (London) Autumn 1935.

“Celluloid Censorship,” in Time (New York), 1 June 1936.

Dangerfield, George, “Time Muddles On,” in New Republic (New York), 19 August 1936.

“Freedom of Film and Press,” in Christian Century (Chicago), 2 February 1938.

Galway, Peter, “Inside Nazi Germany, 1938: The March of Time,” in New Statesman and Nation (London), 30 April 1938.

Frakes, Margaret, “Time Marches Back: Propaganda for Defense,” in Christian Century (Chicago), 16 October 1940.

de Rochemont, Louis, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1941.

Anstey, Edgar, “The Magazine Film,” in Penguin Film Review (London), May 1949.

Fielding, Raymond, in Quarterly of Film Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Summer 1957.

Fielding, Raymond, “Mirror of Discontent: The March of Time and Its Politically Controversial Film Issues,” in Wisconsin Political Quarterly (Madison), March 1959.

Barsam, Richard, “This Is America,” in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1973.

Lichty, L. W., and T. W. Bohn, “The March of Time: News as Drama,” in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Fall 1973.

- Elson, Robert T., "Time Marches on the Screen," in Non-Fiction Film: Theory and Criticism, edited by Richard Barsam, New York, 1976.
- Cook, B., "Whatever Happened to Westbrook Van Voorhis?," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), March 1977.
- Rollins, P. C., "Ideology and Film Rhetoric: Three Documentaries of the New Deal Era," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), no. 2, 1977.
- Fielding, Raymond, "The March of Time 1935–51," in Filmmakers Monthly (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), February 1979.
- Martin, Marcel, in Ecran (Paris), 20 October 1979.
- Lafferty, William, "A Reappraisal of the Semi-Documentary in Hollywood 1945–1948," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Summer 1983.
- City Limits* (London), 11–17 October 1983.
- Dunlap, Donald, "The March of Time and The Ramparts We Watch (1940)," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio, and Television, vol. 5, no. 2, 1985.
- Hastings, M., "Time Marches On!," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1985.
- Short, K. R. M., "The March of Time, Time Inc., and the Berlin Blockade, 1948–1949: Selling Americans on the 'New' Democratic Germany," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon, Oxfordshire), no. 4, 1993.
- Leahy, J., "Image, Meaning, History and the Voice of God," in Vertigo (London), vol. 1, no. 4, 1994/1995.

* * *

The March of Time had the most substantial and sustained success of any documentary-like film series prior to television; it lasted from 1935 to 1951. It offered a new and distinctive kind of screen journalism, a cross between the newsreel and the documentary. At its peak, in the late 1930s and during the years of World War II, it was seen in the United States alone by more than 20 million people a month in 9,000 theaters. It was distributed internationally as well.

The MOT was sponsored by the Time-Life-Fortune organization of Henry Luce. The monthly film series was preceded by a weekly radio series of the same title. Roy Larsen of Time was responsible for the initiation of both series; Louis de Rochemont became the principal creator of the film series.

Though originating from a conservative organization, the MOT was identified with a liberal stance, more so than Time magazine. This was particularly true in foreign affairs; the films tended to be more conservative or erratic on domestic issues. Still, while features in the 1930s ignored or dealt only covertly with the Depression, MOT acknowledged the bread lines, unemployment, and political demagoguery that it gave rise to. Internationally, while the newsreel avoided controversial political and military developments, MOT tackled the machinations of Hitler, Stalin, Mussolini, and Tojo. One of the most politically controversial films in the history of American cinema was MOT's "Inside Nazi Germany" (1938). It examined in some detail (16 minutes) the regimentation of the German people, the control and consolidation of nationalistic allegiances, and the preparations being made for future military and economic expansion. This was at a time when the majority of the American public was still strongly isolationist and the government maintained a careful impartiality.

The success of The March of Time—fueled by the controversy it aroused by its press agency as well as by its energetic innovations—encouraged imitations, especially after World War II began. Created along the same lines were the National Film Board of Canada's monthly Canada Carries On (1939–50) and The World in Action (1940–45). When the distribution of The March of Time moved from RKO to Twentieth Century-Fox in 1942, RKO replaced it with its own series, This Is America (1942–51). Immediately after the war, in England, the J. Arthur Rank organization produced and distributed This Modern Age (1946–50). The influence of March of Time extended into American documentaries of World War II as well, the most important being the Why We Fight series. MOT is the principal American model for what is now called the "compilation documentary."

A standard format for The March of Time was worked out early and varied little, regardless of subject. The fixed form may have been necessitated by the pressures of monthly production with modest resources; it must also have come to seem desirable given the considerable popularity of the series in the form in which it was offered. One of the most important ingredients was the voice and delivery style of its commentator, Westbrook Van Voorhis. His "Voice of Time" (sometimes irreverently referred to as the "Voice of God") was deep and commanding, ominous and reassuring at the same time. Spoken words carried the weight of the communication; the footage (largely stock), music (obvious and clichéd), and sound effects (sparse and highly selective) were cut to them. Often the pictures were given their meaning by the words, as part of "the dramatization of the news" that MOT practiced. An extreme close-up of a face and mouth at a telephone becomes "An angry refusal"; a long shot of a city street at night with a few electric signs becomes "That evening Shanghai is tense" ("War in China," 1937). Editing was the key. The pace is fast, with a hard rhythmic impact; a great deal of information is presented dramatically to capture the attention of the popcorn-chewing Friday night audience.

Structurally, each issue had four parts, with titles announcing each part. The first established the magnitude and urgency of the problem being dealt with. The second offered a historical survey of its origins and causes. Part three presented the immediate complications, confirming its newsworthiness. The concluding part looked to the future, stressing that the problem was a matter for continuing and serious concern.

By 1951 the losses of The March of Time had become too heavy for even the Luce organization to sustain. It was suffering from the competition of television news and public affairs programs, which could do the same thing as MOT films in theaters with much greater immediacy. It was suffering even more from rising costs and inadequate rentals paid for shorts by the theaters, geared largely to the selling of feature films. And finally it was no doubt suffering from its own fixed style and approach which, through repetition of 205 issues over 16 years, had lost much of the freshness and excitement of its earlier days.

The March of Time must be acknowledged, however, as an event in the history of popular American culture. Its influence has extended down to much of the documentary and public affairs programming on television today.

—Jack C. Ellis

MÄRCHEN VOM GLÜCK

(Traum vom Glück; Kiss Me Casanova)

Austria, 1949

Director: Arthur de Glahs

Production: Belvedere Film; black and white; running time: 90 minutes. Released September 1949 by Sascha Film; reissued 1951 as Traum vom Glück by Panorama Film. Filmed at Belvedere Studios and Rosenhügel Studios, Vienna.

Producers: August Diglas, Emmerich Hanus, Elfi von Dassanowsky; screenplay: Arthur de Glahs and Franz Krpata; photography: Hans Nigmann; assistant director: Hanns Matula; editor: Hanns Matula; sound: Alfred Norkus and Hans Riedl; production designers: Gustav Abel and Fred Kollhanek; music: Franz Thurner; songs with music by Franz Thurner and lyrics by Hans Werner; music performed by Vienna Symphony Orchestra, Vienna Dance Orchestra, and Hot Club Vienna; Horst Winter; costume designers: Gerdago and Hedy zum Tobel, executed by Atelier Ella Bei; production manager: Otto Diglas; production assistant: Leo Höger; choreography: Elfi Kose; makeup: Hans Kres and Ludwig Langer.

Cast: O.W. Fischer (Fernando di Castro); Maria Holst (Danielle); Gretl Schörg (Violetta Valona); Hans Olden (Police Chief); Gunther Philipp (Jean); Erika Berghöfer (Elvira); Felizitas Falzari (Marga Stella); Edith Prager (Tamara); Hilde Schreiber (Amelie); Nadja Tiller (Lucia); Erich Dörner (Minister of Police); Richard Eybner (Ballet Master); Otto Fassler (Young Cavalier); C.W. Fernbach (Rodrigo); Karl Fochler (Theater Director); Oskar Hugelmann (Guiseppe di Como); Hans Kurth (Pietro Oviedo); Walter Ladengast (Prof. Ferraris); Evelyn Künneke (Singer); Emmerich Hanus (Himself).

Publications:

Articles:

Füring, Marielies, “Besuch in Wiens kleinstem Film-Atelier,” in Mein Film (Austria), 7 March 1947.

Von Dassanowsky, Elfi, “Märchen vom Glück am Bauernmarkt: Erinnerungen an die Belvedere-Filme und das Aufbruchstadium im österreichischen Nachkriegskino,” in Wiener Zeitung (Austria), 10–11 September 1999.

* * *

Märchen vom Glück was the final and most ambitious production of Vienna’s Belvedere Film company, which was created in 1946 as the first new studio in postwar Austria. During that period, all of Austria’s major studio facilities were controlled by the four-power Allied occupation administration, which encouraged the birth of many short-lived independent production companies. Belvedere, however, was conceived as a traditional studio responsible for and housing all aspects of its productions. It began modestly, but soon gained wide attention and was responsible for having cultivated major talent on both sides of the camera. “Kick-starting” postwar German-language film, as John Walker, author of Halliwel’s Who’s Who in the Movies 13th Ed. put it, the studio also attempted to reconnect with the provocative entertainments of the interwar period and the Viennese musical-comedy genre of the Reich’s semi-autonomous Wien-Film Studio. It also hoped to reinvent genres that had been tainted by Nazi cinema—the Heimatfilm, provincial comedies, and operetta—for a new, more sophisticated postwar audience exposed to British, French, and American film.

The studio produced only seven films, but it satisfied its goals in presenting new and important talent (on both sides of the camera), exporting its work, and attaining, if not always critical praise, then certainly popular appeal. The studio was headed by August Diglas and producers Emmerich Hanus—famed silent-film director and brother of Heinz Hanus, one of Austria’s film pioneers—and Elfi von Dassanowsky. It is Von Dassanowsky, the second female film producer and studio administrator in Austrian cinema history, who has brought Belvedere’s important but nearly forgotten history and legacy back to the cinematic canon in recent years. Along with many other cinema classics, all of the studio’s films had been missing since the withdrawal of Soviet Occupation forces in Austria in 1955 and were deemed lost. In 1998, however, Elfi von Dassanowsky discovered a print of Märchen vom Glück, and an incomplete copy of another Belvedere Film, Dr. Rosin, in the Austrian Film Archives. As many so-called “lost” Austrian films, particularly from the pre-Anschluss era, have recently turned up in Russia and Eastern Europe, there is now an effort to locate the rest of this maverick studio’s creations.

Märchen vom Glück may have been envisioned as a light, star-studded musical comedy destined for audiences tired of what had become a long postwar occupation trauma (see The Third Man), as its banal and escapist title suggests, but its risky, progressive quality makes it a stand-out in the era. The film was populated with famous character actors and provided the comeback roles for two young stars popular during the Reich: leading man O.W. Fischer, who had his only singing role in this film and went on to become one of the major figures in German cinema; and Maria Holst, an attractive musical actress who later specialized in playing elegant ladies. Märchen vom Glück gave German and Austrian cinema and television comedian Gunther Philipp his first film role as Jean, servant to Fischer’s reticent Security Chief. The Miss Austria of 1949, Nadja Tiller, who gained international fame as a film star in the 1950s and 1960s, also had her film debut here. Additionally, singer and actress Evelyn Künneke and cinematographer Hanns Matula mark this film as the start of their long careers. The film was the most expensive one Belvedere produced and among the most expensive in postwar Austria to that date—one of the factors that contributed to the eventual shuttering of the studio.

The plot is a simple one, designed to allow a maximum of cinematic excursions into song and dance numbers, comedy set pieces, and parody. In Utopistan, a country with dictatorial overtones, shy but wealthy Fernando (Fischer), rejected by the bored socialite Danielle (Holst) for being unexciting and weak, concocts a Don Juan-like persona who kidnaps women for three days, in order to fulfill their personal romantic fantasies. The members of the government panic but fail to capture this love-bandit. Ultimately, it is Danielle’s turn but Fernando reveals himself, proving he could be “dangerous” but also that she misunderstood what she truly wanted in a man. The swipes at an arrogant but incompetent authoritarianism are an obvious reaction to the Nazi past and the occupation of Austria, and the film deals with officialdom in an iconoclastic manner reminiscent of the Marx Brother's Duck Soup.

Märchen vom Glück

Märchen vom Glück demonstrates the particular affinity Viennese comedy has for the American Screwball style with its manic language-based comedy of manners, a concept fostered in early Viennese film and exported to and developed in Hollywood by many of the exiled Austrian film talents. In overall style, the film is a precursor to such sociopolitical satires as Billy Wilder's 1961 One, Two, Three (itself a product of an original Austro-Hungarian text and an Austrian-American director), and the kaleidoscopic all-star international comedies of the mid-1960s, such as Casino Royale (1967), Bedazzled (1967), The Honey Pot (1967), and Candy (1968). The episodic structure, cameo appearances, and the anarchic feel of such "experimental" pastiches are already apparent to a large extent in Märchen vom Glück. Although it is unique, it is not surprising given the roots of such psychedelia in the screwball comedy, and given the shared (albeit different) "crisis society" which both films reflect. Von Dassanowsky maintains that the film was actually directed by Emmerich Hanus and August Diglas under the "de Glahs" pseudonym. Certainly the strong visuals and the brevity of dialogue in this film and in the other "de Glahs" opus, Dr. Rosin, suggests the technique of a silent-film maker (Diglas also began his career in silents) which find similarities to Chaplin's late sound work.

The film is subversive of static "cultural tradition" from the start: the pre-title vignette features a cameo of Hanus putting aside a copy of Goethe's Faust, to read the tale that is the film. Obviously deflating the cliché male-power role of the Nazi period and the lingering militarism of Cold War Europe, Fischer's Fernando is a bespectacled intellectual, a gentle-man, who is able to slip into an aggressively sexual pose at will. His character suggests that gender roles are chosen, but also that society prefers to uphold archaic ideals. He is no less a man of many costumes than the women he targets (designs by the legendary Gerdago at her best), but his alter ego, a foretaste of Jerry Lewis' Buddy Love in The Nutty Professor (1963), alters himself to suit the personality of the particular woman. He even rejects the amorous notions of the too-young daughter of the President, giving her instead a three-day return to the enjoyment of being a child. The "victims," who appear as strong, intelligent, and independent women in comparison to their addled men, never divulge that the only thing that happened with Fernando is that he appreciated their desires and entertained them with their fantasy. The film's revision of the image of the "leading man" and the recognition of female sexual desire, fantasy, and self-realization are far beyond its era. Märchen vom Glück inspired other forays into experimentation in mainstream Austrian and West German entertainment films in its time, most notably Wolfgang Liebeneiner's futuristic satire on Austria and the Cold War, 1 April 2000 (1952). Nevertheless, its unfortunate long disappearance makes it a missing piece in Austrian cinema history that has yet to find its deserved classic status.

—Robert von Dassanowsky

THE MARIUS TRILOGY

MARIUS

France, 1931

Director: Alexander Korda

Production: French Paramount; black and white; running time: 120 minutes; length: 11,000 feet. Released 1931.

Producer: Marcel Pagnol; screenplay: Marcel Pagnol, from his own play; production designer: Vincent Korda; art director: Alfred Junge.

Cast: Raimu (César); Pierre Fresnay (Marius); Orane Demazis (Fanny); Alida Rouffe (Honorine); Charpin (Panisse).

Publications

Books:

- Fronval, Georges, Raimu: Sa vie, ses films, Paris, 1939.
 Olivier, Paul, Raimu; ou, La Vie de César, Paris, 1947; as Raimu; ou, L'Épopée de César, 1977.
 Dubeux, Albert, Pierre Fresnay, Paris, 1950.
 Tabori, Paul, Alexander Korda, London, 1959.
 Beylie, Claude, Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1972; as Marcel Pagnol; ou, Le Cinéma en liberté, 1986.
 Kulik, Karol, Alexander Korda: The Man Who Could Work Miracles, London, 1975.
 Fresnay, Pierre, with François Possot, Pierre Fresnay, Paris, 1976.
 Leprohon, Pierre, Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1976.
 Perisset, Maurice, Raimu, Paris, 1976.
 Ford, Charles, Pierre Fresnay: Gentilhomme de l'écran, Paris, 1981.
 Pagnol, Marcel, Confidences, Paris, 1981.
 Castans, Raymond, and André Bernard, Les Films du Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1982.
 Pompa, Dany, Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1986.
 Vincendeau, Ginette, and Susan Hayward, editors, French Film: Texts and Contexts, London, 1989.
 Stockham, Martin, The Korda Collection: Alexander Korda's Film Classics, London, 1992.

Articles:

- New York Times*, 14 April 1933.
New Yorker, 14 April 1933.

Variety (New York), 25 April 1933.

Jacobson, H. L., "Homage to Raimu," in Hollywood Quarterly, Winter 1947–48.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1949.

Pagnol, Marcel, "Adieu à Raimu," in L'Ecran Française (Paris), 3 October 1951.

"Marius Section" of Image et Son (Paris), July 1958.

Fieschi, J.-A., and others, interview with Marcel Pagnol, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1965.

Leprohon, Pierre, "Raimu," in Anthologie du cinéma 2, Paris, 1967.

Polt, Harriet, "The Marcel Pagnol Trilogy," in Film Society Review (New York), October 1967.

Delahaye, Michel, "La Saga Pagnol," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1969.

"Pagnol Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July/September 1970.

Turk, Edward Baron, "Pagnol's Marseilles Trilogy," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), October 1980.

CESAR

France, 1936

Director: Marcel Pagnol

Production: Marcel Pagnol; black and white; running time: 117 minutes; length: 10,500 feet. Released 1936.

Screenplay: Marcel Pagnol; photography: Willy; music: Vincent Scotto.

Cast: Raimu (César); Pierre Fresnay (Marius); Charpin (Panisse); Orane Demazis (Fanny); André Fouche (Cesariot); Alida Rouffe (Honorine); Paul Dullac (Escartefigue).

Publications

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 25 November 1936.
Esquire (New York), February 1938.
New York Times, 28 October 1948.
Today's Cinema (London), 15 February 1951.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1951.
Image et Son (Paris), September–October 1968–69.

Also see list of publications following Marius.

FANNY

France, 1932

Director: Marc Allégret

Production: Marcel Pagnol; black and white; running time: 120 minutes; length: 10,800 feet. Released 1932, not released in UK until 1950.

female sexual desire, fantasy, and self-realization are far beyond its era. Märchen vom Glück inspired other forays into experimentation in mainstream Austrian and West German entertainment films in its time, most notably Wolfgang Liebeneiner's futuristic satire on Austria and the Cold War, 1 April 2000 (1952). Nevertheless, its unfortunate long disappearance makes it a missing piece in Austrian cinema history that has yet to find its deserved classic status.

—Robert von Dassanowsky

THE MARIUS TRILOGY

MARIUS

France, 1931

Director: Alexander Korda

Production: French Paramount; black and white; running time: 120 minutes; length: 11,000 feet. Released 1931.

Producer: Marcel Pagnol; screenplay: Marcel Pagnol, from his own play; production designer: Vincent Korda; art director: Alfred Junge.

Cast: Raimu (César); Pierre Fresnay (Marius); Orane Demazis (Fanny); Alida Rouffe (Honorine); Charpin (Panisse).

Publications

Books:

- Fronval, Georges, Raimu: Sa vie, ses films, Paris, 1939.
 Olivier, Paul, Raimu; ou, La Vie de César, Paris, 1947; as Raimu; ou, L'Épopée de César, 1977.
 Dubeux, Albert, Pierre Fresnay, Paris, 1950.
 Tabori, Paul, Alexander Korda, London, 1959.
 Beylie, Claude, Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1972; as Marcel Pagnol; ou, Le Cinéma en liberté, 1986.
 Kulik, Karol, Alexander Korda: The Man Who Could Work Miracles, London, 1975.
 Fresnay, Pierre, with François Possot, Pierre Fresnay, Paris, 1976.
 Leprohon, Pierre, Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1976.
 Perisset, Maurice, Raimu, Paris, 1976.
 Ford, Charles, Pierre Fresnay: Gentilhomme de l'écran, Paris, 1981.
 Pagnol, Marcel, Confidences, Paris, 1981.
 Castans, Raymond, and André Bernard, Les Films du Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1982.
 Pompa, Dany, Marcel Pagnol, Paris, 1986.
 Vincendeau, Ginette, and Susan Hayward, editors, French Film: Texts and Contexts, London, 1989.
 Stockham, Martin, The Korda Collection: Alexander Korda's Film Classics, London, 1992.

Articles:

- New York Times*, 14 April 1933.
New Yorker, 14 April 1933.

Variety (New York), 25 April 1933.

Jacobson, H. L., "Homage to Raimu," in Hollywood Quarterly, Winter 1947–48.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1949.

Pagnol, Marcel, "Adieu à Raimu," in L'Ecran Française (Paris), 3 October 1951.

"Marius Section" of Image et Son (Paris), July 1958.

Fieschi, J.-A., and others, interview with Marcel Pagnol, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1965.

Leprohon, Pierre, "Raimu," in Anthologie du cinéma 2, Paris, 1967.

Polt, Harriet, "The Marcel Pagnol Trilogy," in Film Society Review (New York), October 1967.

Delahaye, Michel, "La Saga Pagnol," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1969.

"Pagnol Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July/September 1970.

Turk, Edward Baron, "Pagnol's Marseilles Trilogy," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), October 1980.

CESAR

France, 1936

Director: Marcel Pagnol

Production: Marcel Pagnol; black and white; running time: 117 minutes; length: 10,500 feet. Released 1936.

Screenplay: Marcel Pagnol; photography: Willy; music: Vincent Scotto.

Cast: Raimu (César); Pierre Fresnay (Marius); Charpin (Panisse); Orane Demazis (Fanny); André Fouche (Cesarriot); Alida Rouffe (Honorine); Paul Dullac (Escartefigue).

Publications

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 25 November 1936.
Esquire (New York), February 1938.
New York Times, 28 October 1948.
Today's Cinema (London), 15 February 1951.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1951.
Image et Son (Paris), September–October 1968–69.

Also see list of publications following Marius.

FANNY

France, 1932

Director: Marc Allégret

Production: Marcel Pagnol; black and white; running time: 120 minutes; length: 10,800 feet. Released 1932, not released in UK until 1950.

Producer: Marcel Pagnol; screenplay: Marcel Pagnol; music: Vincent Scotto.

Cast: Raimu (César); Pierre Fresnay (Marius); Oriane Demazis (Fanny); Charpin (Panisse); Alida Rouffe (Honorine); Mouries (Escartefigue); P. Asso (M. Brun).

Publications

Articles:

Variety (New York), 21 June 1948.

New Republic (New York), 2 February 1948.

New York Times, 13 February 1948.

Today's Cinema (London), 19 July 1950.

Houston, Penelope, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1950.

Also see list of publications following Marius.

* * *

When Marcel Pagnol adapted his play Marius for the cinema in 1931, he was a relatively well-known young playwright who had recently left behind his modest Marseillais beginnings and a teaching career. By the time César, the third part of the trilogy, came out in 1936 (and was the no. 1 box-office hit for that year), he had become one of the most popular filmmakers in France, was running parallel careers as novelist, journalist, and publisher, and had founded his own film production company. His “empire” was completed by the opening of his own cinema in Marseilles for the release of César. For although Pagnol had to move to Paris to “make it,” his roots remained in the south, and the trilogy is first of all a tribute to Marseilles and its people.

Critics at the time may have preferred the cinematically innovative work of Renoir or Grémillon, or the committed manifestos of the Popular Front, but audiences flocked to see Pagnol’s films and in particular the trilogy. Constant repeats on French television show that time has done nothing to erode this tremendous popularity, and some of the trilogy’s phrases have entered the national vocabulary (“tu me fends le coeur!”). Apart from a first-class cast, Pagnol’s joky claim that “I only write about clichés” may give a clue to this lasting appeal and relevance: like all Pagnol’s films, Marius, Fanny, and César share a direct concern with simple but basic psychological and social relations, and primarily the family. The plot is simple: in Marseilles’s old harbour, Fanny (a shellfish seller) and Marius (who works in his father’s bar) love each other, but Marius longs for the sea. After he sails away (at the end of Marius), the pregnant Fanny has to marry the older and wealthier Panisse to save the family’s honour. Marius comes back to claim his “wife” and son Césariot, but his father, César, sends him packing; this constitutes the plot of Fanny. César opens with Panisse’s death (20 years later), upon which Césariot learns the truth about his paternity and seeks out his real father. Fanny and Marius are finally reunited. Although its ending seems positively to demand a sequel, Marius in fact was written as a single stage play. First performed in March 1929, it was an instant hit, so much so that Pagnol and Alexander Korda filmed it for Paramount in Paris, with almost the same cast. As was the practice at the time, foreign language versions were also shot (in this case German and Swedish). The film’s triumph prompted Pagnol to write a follow-up, Fanny, also for the theatre but clearly with a film in mind. César was written directly as a screenplay and performed on stage only after the release of the film. The shift from stage play to film is reflected in the proportion of outdoor scenes, from the studio-bound Marius to César, where 25 minutes of the film were shot on location.

In the heated debates surrounding the coming of sound, Pagnol went against the dominant anti-sound trend, headed by people like René Clair. On the contrary, he declared that “any sound film that can be projected silently and still remain comprehensible is a very bad film.” True to this principle, Pagnol always considered the writer the true auteur of a film, and the mise-en-scène of the trilogy unashamedly puts the image to the service of the dialogue. Whether the films were technically directed by Korda, Marc Allégret, or Pagnol himself, they are “Pagnol films,” and the trilogy is, undoubtedly, theatrical, both in its overall “classical” structure, and in the presence of a “chorus” of minor characters who comment on the main action. It also draws on the tradition of stage melodrama: the illegitimate child, the overbearing father, the unexpected return of Marius in the dead of the night. Above all, it focuses on dialogue, written in Pagnol’s unique blend of classical French and Marseillais idiom, spoken with the strong southern accent—its mark of local specificity and paradoxically its recipe for universal success. The trilogy was both leader and part of a new nation-wide fashion for the “midi” in the early 1930s, triggered off by sound cinema, although Marseilles and Provence had long boasted their own literary, theatrical, and music-hall traditions. Indeed, out of the Marseilles music-hall and theatre came most of the trilogy’s actors: Raimu, Charpin, Alida Rouffe; Demazis was from Oran; Fresnay was the only non-southerner and he painstakingly—and successfully—learned the accent for Marius. These actors were central to the trilogy’s success, cementing its unity and functioning as powerful box-office draw. But performance is also of structural importance to the films. Characters constantly perform for each other in the key spaces of French popular culture—the café, the shop, the street—while the actors act “for” the spectators in a manner reminiscent of the live entertainment traditions they came from, a common feature of French cinema of the 1930s. And just as the trilogy constantly mixes melodrama with comedy, they vary their register, from outrageous excess to intense sobriety (Raimu in particular excels at it). Accent, milieu, and performance lend the trilogy a naturalism which, despite its theatrical structure, makes it one of the recognised precursors of Italian Neo-Realism.

Family, patrimony, and community are at the core of Marius, Fanny, and César. Marius may be the archetypal romantic hero—crossed with Ulysses—but he is ultimately marginal. Whether Marius is present (in Marius) or absent (throughout most of the rest), the central figure is César, who is in turn father, godfather, and grandfather, the domineering and garrulous patriarch who decides or interferes with everyone’s fate; the centrality of the role is given even more weight by Raimu’s talent and charisma. A more benign patriarchal figure is that of Panisse, the shopkeeper who gives both name and inheritance to Fanny’s son, allowing him to climb the social scale from bartender’s grandson to student at the highest-ranking (Parisian, of course) university, Polytechnique. Meanwhile, Fanny’s role is to produce a son and accept her marriage to Panisse, 30 years her senior, as atonement for her “sin.” To say that Pagnol’s universe is oppressively patriarchal is to state the obvious. Clearly the films corresponded to dominant discourses about gender roles—either actual at the time of their release, or nostalgically desired later. However, Fanny is not, as most of her Hollywood counterparts at the time, “punished” by death or madness; she lives to bring up her son, happily as it turns out, accepted by the whole community, and eventually reunited with her romantic lover. Fanny, the central episode of the trilogy, is largely devoted to her. Interestingly, although it is rated the weakest of the three films by most critics, it was the most popular at the box-office, a success which cannot be simply ascribed to a masochistic identification on the part of women spectators. No doubt moral acceptance of Fanny’s illicit pregnancy had to do with the dubious “natalist” ideologies of the time, but it was also a way of exposing and vindicating a woman’s place in an oppressive society. In this respect, the dialogue of the trilogy gives Fanny space to vent her frustration at the patriarchs who rule her life.

Beyond individual characters, the trilogy stages a tight-knit community which vanished sociologically and geographically (if indeed it ever existed) under the bombs of World War II. In an urban setting, the films create a warm, close, pre-industrial society in which caring and nurturing are taken on by the whole group: César is a patriarch who prepares the food and sweeps the floor. Within this nostalgic structure, the melodramatic form allows the trilogy to state completely contradictory—and hence more “realistic”—values: sexuality as both socially divisive and cohesive, escape as both condemnable (Marius) and desirable (Césariot). Reconciling opposites is the privilege of myth, a status which these crackly, old-fashioned melodramas have undoubtedly attained.

—Ginette Vincendeau

THE MARRIAGE OF MARIA BRAUN

See DIE EHE DER MARIA BRAUN

M*A*S*H

USA, 1970

Director: Robert Altman

Production: Twentieth Century-Fox; color, 35mm, Panavision; running time: 116 minutes. Released 1970.

Producer: Ingo Preminger; screenplay: Ring Lardner, Jr., from the novel by Richard Hooker; photography: Harold E. Stine; editor: Danford Greene; art directors: Jack Martin Smith and Arthur Lonergan; music: Johnny Mandel.

Cast: Donald Sutherland (Hawkeye); Elliott Gould (Trapper John); Tom Skerritt (Duke); Gary Burghoff (Radar O'Reilly); Sally Kellerman (Major Margaret "Hot Lips" Houlihan); Robert Duvall (Major Frank Burns); John Shuck (Painless Pole); Roger Bowen (Colonel Henry Blake); René Auberjonois (Dago Red); Jo Ann Pflug (Lieutenant Dish).

Awards: Oscar for Best Screenplay—Material from another medium, 1970; Best Film, Cannes Film Festival, 1970.

Publications

Books:

- Feineman, Neil, Persistence of Vision: The Films of Robert Altman, New York, 1976.
- Kass, Judith M., Robert Altman: American Innovator, New York, 1978.
- Sind, Lawrence H., Guts and Glory: Great American War Movies, Reading, Massachusetts, 1978.
- Kolker, Robert Philip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.
- Bourget, Jean-Loup, Robert Altman, Paris, 1981.
- Karp, Alan, The Films of Robert Altman, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1981.
- Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
- Kagan, Norman, American Sceptic: Robert Altman's Genre-Commentary Films, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.
- Wexman, Virginia Wright, and Gretchen Bisplinghoff, Robert Altman: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.
- Plecki, Gerard, Robert Altman, Boston, 1985.
- Wood, Robin, Hollywood from Vietnam to Reagan, New York, 1986.
- Keyssar, Helene, Robert Altman's America, New York, 1991.
- Cagin, Seth, Born to Be Wild: Hollywood and the Sixties Generation, Boca Raton, 1994.
- O'Brien, Daniel, Robert Altman: Hollywood Survivor, New York, 1996.
- Sterritt, David, editor, Robert Altman: Interviews, Jackson, 2000.

Articles:

- Trutta, G., in Harper's Bazaar (New York), March 1970.
- Bartlett, Louise, in Films and Filming (London), March 1970.
- Johnson, William, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1970.
- Dawson, Jan, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1970.
- Time* (New York), 13 July 1970.
- “What Directors Are Saying,” in Action (Los Angeles), July-August and November-December 1970.
- Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), August 1970.
- Tavernier, Bertrand, “D. W. Griffith se porte bien, moi aussi, merci!,” in Positif (Paris), October 1970.
- Cutts, John, “MASH, McCloud, and McCabe,” in Films and Filming (London), November 1971.
- Grisolia, M., “Entretien avec Robert Altman,” in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1972.
- Baker, C. A., “The Theme of Structure in the Films of Robert Altman,” in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Summer 1973.
- Corliss, Richard, “Outlaws, Auteurs, and Actors,” in Film Comment (New York), May-July 1974.

M*A*S*H

“Altman Seminar” in Dialogue on Film (Beverly Hills), February 1975.

Rosenbaum, Jonathan, “Improvisations and Interactions in Altmanville,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1975.

Wood, Robin, “Smart-Ass and Cutie-Pie: Notes Toward an Evaluation of Altman,” in Movie (London), Autumn 1975.

“Altman Issue” of Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1975.

Pittman, Bruce, in Take One (Montreal), August 1976.

Piotot, P., and H. Talvat, “Robert Altman de Mash à Nashville,” in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1976.

Jacobs, Diane, “Robert Altman,” in Hollywood Renaissance, New York, 1977.

Michener, Charles, interview with Robert Altman, in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1978.

Desmarais, James J., in Magill’s Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Yacowar, Maurice, “Actors as Conventions in the Films of Robert Altman,” in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1980.

Olin, Joyce, “Ring Lardner, Jr.,” in American Screenwriters, edited by Robert E. Morsberger, Stephen O. Lesser, and Randall Clark, Detroit, 1984.

Freedman, C., “History, Fiction, Film, Television, Myth: The Ideology of *M*A*S*H*,” in The Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), no. 1, 1990.

Freedman, C., “*M*A*S*H* och anti-antikommunismen,” in Filmhafstet (Uppsala, Sweden), December 1990.

Tibbetts, John C., “Robert Altman: After 35 Years, Still the ‘Action Painter’ of American Cinema,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 20, no. 1, January 1992.

Breskin, David, “Robert Altman: The Rolling Stone Interview,” in Rolling Stone, no. 628, 16 April 1992.

Norman, Barry, in Radio Times (London), vol. 279, no. 3649, 11 December 1993.

Buchsbaum, T., “*M*A*S*H*,” in Film Score Monthly (Los Angeles), no. 58, June 1995.

* * *

*M*A*S*H*, one of the most popular films of the early 1970s, achieved stardom for Donald Sutherland and Elliott Gould, spawned a successful television series, and gave its innovative director, Robert Altman, his first financial and critical success.

In *M*A*S*H*—and to a greater extent in his later films—Altman abandons conventional Hollywood narrative techniques in favor of a very personal style characterized by overlapping dialogue, improvisational acting, elliptical editing, wide-screen Panavision compositions, telephoto shots (specifically shots through windows and past obstructing foreground objects), and the development of a large community and of major characters within a limited time and space. These techniques alter conventions of narrative structure in two ways. First, the improvisational acting, the multiple babble of overlapping dialogue, and the frequently voyeuristic telephoto shots (particularly the shots of explicit gore in the operating scenes) generate a sense of spontaneity and authenticity usually found in documentary, rather than narrative, films. Second, the large number of characters arranged within the wide Panavision frame, the compression of space caused by the telephoto lens, and the continuous barrage of overlapping dialogue, music and P.A. announcements on the soundtrack combine to create an aural and visual denseness that demands much more of a viewer's attention and active participation than does the shallow-focus cinematography, the separation of major characters from peripheral characters, and the one-speaker-at-a-time dialogue of conventional narrative.

When *M*A*S*H* appeared in 1970, audiences—caught up in the spirit of rebellion generated by the civil rights movement, the women's movement, the drug culture, the demonstrations against the Vietnam War, etc.—revelled in the film's iconoclastic humor, its joyous deflation of patriotism, religion, heroism, and other values cherished by the establishment. The film became an immediate box office success, earning over $36 million in domestic rentals by 1983. The critics also favored *M*A*S*H*, but while they praised its innovative techniques, some critics thought that the film's humor was too smug and the scenes involving the trip to Tokyo and the football game were flaws in the film's structure. Today critics feel that *M*A*S*H* is inferior to most of Altman's later films (none of which proved as successful at the box office), though the film is still highly regarded for its innovative narrative techniques and its effective humor.

—Clyde Kelly Dunagan

THE MASQUE OF THE RED DEATH

UK, 1964

Director: Roger Corman

Production: Alta Vista/Anglo Amalgamated; Pathécolor, Panavision; running time: 84 minutes. Released August 1964.

Producer: George Willoughby; screenplay: Charles Beaumont and R. Wright Campbell, from the story by Edgar Allan Poe; photography: Nicolas Roeg; editor: Anne Chegwidden; sound: Richard Bied, Len Abbott; art director: Robert Jones; music: David Lee.

Cast: Vincent Price (Prince Prospero); Hazel Court (Juliana); Jane Asher (Francesca); David Weston (Gino); Patrick Magee (Alfredo); Nigel Green (Ludovico); Skip Martin (Hop Toad); John Westbrook (Man in Red); Gay Brown (Senora Escobar); Julian Burton (Senor Veronese); Doreen Dawn (Anna-Marie); Paul Whitsun-Jones (Scarlati); Jean Lodge (Scarlati's Wife); Verina Greenlaw (Esmerelda); Brian Hewlett (Lampredi); Harvey Hall (Clistor).

Publications

Script:

Beaumont, Charles, and R. Wright Campbell, The Masque of the Red Death, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 May 1980.

Books:

Will, David, and others, Roger Corman: The Millenic Vision, Edinburgh, 1970.

McCarthy, Todd, and Charles Flynn, King of the Bs, New York, 1975.

Turoni, Giuseppe, Roger Corman, Florence, 1976.

Marcus, Fred H., Short Story/Short Film, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1977.

McAsh, Iain, F., The Films of Vincent Price, London, 1977.

de Franco, J. Philip, The Movie World of Roger Corman, New York, 1979.

Hillier, Jim, and Aaron Lipstadt, Roger Corman's New World, London, 1981.

Naha, Ed, The Films of Roger Corman, New York, 1982.

McAsh, Iain F., Vincent Price: A Biography, Farncombe, Surrey, 1982.

Bourgoin, Stephane, Roger Corman, Paris, 1983.

McGee, Mark Thomas, Fast and Furious: The Story of American International Pictures, Jefferson, North Carolina, 1984.

Morris, Gary, Roger Corman, Boston, 1985.

Eisner, Joel, The Price of Fear: The Film Career of Vincent Price, Staunton, 1993.

Williams, Lucy C., The Complete Films of Vincent Price, Secaucus, 1995.

McGee, Mark Thomas, Roger Corman: The Best of the Cheap Acts, Jefferson, 1997.

Corman, Roger, How I Made a Hundred Movies in Hollywood & Never Lost a Dime, New York, 1998.

Frank, Alan, Films of Roger Corman, London, 1998.

Price, Victoria, Vincent Price: A Daughter's Biography, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Films and Filming (London), February 1964.

Hollywood Reporter, 24 June 1964.

Variety (New York), 24 June 1964.

Kine Weekly (London), 25 June 1964.

Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), August 1964.

New York Times, 17 September 1964.

Marill, Alvin H., "Vincent Price," in Films in Review (New York), May 1969.

"Corman Issue" of Cinema Nuovo (Turin), January-February 1984.

Del Valle, D., "Roger Corman," in Films and Filming (London), November 1984.

The Masque of the Red Death

Newman, Kim, "The Roger Corman Alumni Association," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November and December 1985.

Pearly, Gerald, "The Masque of Red Death," in American Film, vol. 15, no. 9, June 1990.

Peary, Gerald, "Roger Corman: They Call Him Cheap, Quick and 'America's Greatest Independent Film Maker'," in American Film, vol. 15, no. 9, June 1990.

Weiner, Rex, "Thrifty Corman Healthy in 4th Decade," in Variety (New York), vol. 359, no. 10, 10 July 1995.

Farrell, Sean, "The Raven & The Masque of Red Death," in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), no. 20, Fall 1995.

Lucas, Tim, "The Raven/Masque of Red Death," in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 29, 1995.

Lucas, Tim, "Disque of the Red Death - Incomplete," in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 32, 1996.

* * *

The Masque of the Red Death was the seventh of Roger Corman's eight Poe adaptations, and one of two (the other being The Tomb of Ligeia) to be produced in Britain on slightly larger budgets than usual. Throughout the cycle Corman's distinctive mise-en-scène—comprising an expressive use of colour and sweeping, elegant camera movements—had represented in external form his characters' troubled psychological states. (This differentiated him sharply from the more moralistic approach adopted by contemporaneous British horror filmmakers.)

In many ways, Masque is the least coherent of all the Poe films. While the psychological element is still present—notably at the conclusion, where the cloaked figure which brings death to Vincent Price's Prince Prospero is played by Price himself—its development is hampered by a loss of focus within the organization of the narrative. This can be attributed to the script's rather clumsy stitching together of two of Poe's short stories, "Hop-Frog" and "The Masque of the Red Death," and it results in Price, usually the most precise and expert of actors, seeming uncertain at times as to what tone to adopt. The banality of his "philosophy" of evil is a further hindrance as is the lacklustre concluding masque (which was apparently curtailed during production by budgetary restrictions).

In order then to locate the film's merits, which are considerable, one needs to look elsewhere. Firstly, to Corman's use of colour which, largely detached as it is from its usual psychologically expressive function, takes on a non-representational, kinetic force—most impressively in the various camera tracks through a series of rooms, each of which has been decorated in a different colour—which is rarely seen in mainstream commercial productions and which anticipates moments of psychedelic abstraction in Corman's later “drug-culture” film The Trip.

Secondly, all the scenes involving Juliana, played by British actress Hazel Court. Court had already appeared in several British horror films (The Curse of Frankenstein, The Man Who Could Cheat Death) in conventionally staid leading roles. In Corman's films (she also appears in The Raven and The Premature Burial) she is unexpectedly transformed into a figure of awesome sexual perversity. Her masochistic preparations for her “marriage” to Satan are given us in meticulous detail; first she brands herself and then has a series of hallucinations (cut from the initial British release print), all of which re-enact a brutal rape fantasy. Marriage—in a Poe-like equation—is linked to the death of the bride, and Court commits herself to this with an eagerness which is truly disturbing. The intensity of her performance has only been equalled within the horror genre in some of the films featuring Barbara Steele (another British actress who left her native country and developed her career elsewhere: she had starred in an earlier Corman production, The Pit and the Pendulum). It is only in these brilliantly executed scenes, in which the film's formal qualities most eloquently match its content, that Corman finds a coherent theme upon which he can exercise his formidable ability to visualise a character's perverse desires. The film's true dramatic climax is the chilling epitaph spoken by Prospero over Juliana's dead body: “I beg you, do not mourn for Juliana. We should celebrate. She has just married a friend of mine.” As is so often the case in Corman's work, the forces of good that eventually triumph, represented here somewhat half-heartedly by Jane Asher's Francesca, are, in comparison with this vividly drawn picture of a desire unto death, anaemic and unconvincing.

—Peter Hutchings

MAT

(Mother)

USSR, 1926

Director: Vsevolod I. Pudovkin

Production: Mezhrabpom-Russ.; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 90 minutes; length: 1800 meters, or 5906 feet. Released 11 October 1926. Re-released 1935, with musical soundtrack.

Scenario: Nathan Zarkhi, from the novel by Maxim Gorky; assistant directors: Mikhail Doller and V. Strauss; photography: Anatoli Golovnya; art director: Sergei Kozlovsky; music (1935): S. Blok.

Cast: Vera Baranovskaya (Pelageya Vlasova, the mother); A. Tchistyakova (Vlasov, her husband); Nikolai Batalov (Pavel, her son); Alexander Savitsky (Isaika Gorbov, the foreman); Ivan Koval-Samborsky (Vesovshchikov, Pavel's friend); Anna Zemstova (Anna, a girl student); Vsevolod Pudovkin (Police officer); N. Vidonov (Misha).

Publications

Script:

Zarkhi, Nathan, Mother, in Mother and Earth, New York, 1973.

Books:

Korolevich, V., Vera Baranovskaya, Moscow, 1929.

Yezeitov, N., Poudouvkine, “Pouti Tvortchestva, Les Voies de la création,” Moscow, 1937.

Mariamov, A., Vsevolod Pudovkin, Moscow, 1952.

Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.

Schnitzer, Luda and Jean, Vsevolod Poudouvkine, Paris, 1966.

Amengual, Barthélemy, V. I. Poudouvkine, Lyons, 1968.

Dickinson, Thorold, and Catherine de la Roche, Soviet Cinema, New York, 1972.

Schnitzer, Luda and Jean, and Marcel Martin, editors, Cinema in Revolution: The Heroic Era of the Soviet Film, New York, 1973.

Dart, Peter, Pudovkin's Films and Film Theory, New York, 1974.

Cohen, Louis Harris, The Cultural-Political Traditions and Developments of the Soviet Cinema, New York, 1974.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey One: The Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Taylor, Richard, Film Propaganda: Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany, London, 1979.

Leyda, Jay, An Index to the Creative Work of V.I. Pudovkin, New York, 1980.

Karaganov, Aleksandr Vasil'evich, Vsevolod Pudovkin, Moscow, 1983.

Masi, Stefano, Vsevolod I. Pudovkin, Florence, 1985.

Marshall, Herbert, Masters of the Soviet Cinema: Crippled Creative Biographies, London, 1985.

Articles:

New York Times, 8 January 1928.

Close Up (London), October–November 1928 and January 1929.

Leyda, Jay, “Index to the Creative Work of Vsevolod Pudovkin,” in Sight and Sound (London), November 1948.

Manvell, Roger, in Sight and Sound (London), August 1950.

“Pudovkin Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August–September 1953.

Weinberg, Herman, “Vsevolod Pudovkin,” in Films in Review (New York), August–September 1953.

“Pudovkin Issue” of Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), February 1973.

Stoianov-Bigor, G., in Kinoizkustvo (Sofia), July 1979.

Hudlin, E., “Film Language: Pudovkin and Eisenstein and Russian Formalism,” in Journal of Aesthetic Education (Urbana, Illinois), no. 2, 1979.

- Burns, P. E., "Linkage: Pudovkin's Classics Revisited," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C), Summer 1981.
- Rubin, S.K., "Videotape Reviews," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 109, July 1984.
- Dufour, Dirk, "'!Revolutie? (4): Wolken doorheen de vlag,'" in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 432, May 1993.
- Kepley, Vance Jr., "Pudovkin, Socialist Realism, and the Classical Hollywood Style: Hollywood's Impact on Vsevolod Pudovkin's Film Making Style," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 47, no. 4, Winter 1995.

* * *

Mother might rightfully be labelled Soviet propaganda. It is the story of a poor working-class woman at the time of the 1905 Revolution who, through her relationship with her worker son, becomes politicized. At first, she is oppressed, just another anonymous pawn of the power structure; at the finale she is exultant, a heroine and a martyr. However, the film is no boring treatise on the wonders of revolutionary spirit. Mother is a drama of love and conflict that can be universally understood and appreciated. In the scenario, based on a Maxim Gorky novel, a traditional theme—a mother's concern for her beloved son—may be stretched to fit into a propagandistic framework. But this fact does not obscure the heart-wrenching storyline and superior cinematic techniques of its maker, Vsevolod Illareonovitch Pudovkin.

Mother is Pudovkin's first feature produced on his own, independent of his colleagues at the State Film School. Here, under the tutelage of Lev Kuleshov, the filmmaker had defined and sharpened his cinematic grammar, and this film became his initial major achievement; he followed it a year later with The End of St. Petersburg and, thereafter with The Heir to Genghis-Khan. Mother, made when Pudovkin's relative inexperience prevented him from initially receiving adequate funding, is a superior example of the filmmaker's concern with camera angles, montage and editing. He and his cinematographer, Anatoli Golovnya, photographed the actors from every which angle: a military officer's self-importance would be conveyed by shooting him from below; the mother's early frustration would be emphasized by shooting her from above, and at the end, her triumph and liberation is highlighted by shooting from below. When Pudovkin places his camera in this position, the character's upper body and head seem further away, more inaccessible, reaching to the sky and towering over the viewer; when the actor is beneath the camera he becomes inferior, in that the viewer is literally looking down on him. Pudovkin does not shoot his performance straight on, as if he is recording a stage play. Mood and characterization are communicated in Mother not by the actor emoting before the camera; the performer is almost a passive participant in the filmmaking process.

Pudovkin believed that the manner and order in which pieces of film are spliced together can have the most powerful effect on the viewer. Mother is structured like a musical composition: a balance of action and reaction, seemingly disconnected shots—opposites, if you will—coming together to form a coherent whole. For example, the son receives some happy news while in prison. Instead of just editing in a simple reaction shot of his actor, Nikolai Batalov, Pudovkin combines shots of hands energetically in motion and a close-up of the bottom part of Batalov's face with scenes of a sun-lit stream, birds cavorting in a pond, and a happy child. Mother is a creative leap in the advancement of the editing process as an important filmmaking tool.

Pudovkin's individual images are, when contrasted to his cutting, relatively insignificant. But they are not uninteresting. One example: the mother visits the bier of her just-deceased husband. The filmmaker conveys a stark, sad mood by shooting only the dark shape of Vera Baranovskaya (who plays the role) casting an ominous shadow on the nearby grey wall, and a white sheet covering the body.

Pudovkin was also allegedly inspired by artists, painters and printmakers. The mother's characterization is modelled after the creations of Kathe Kollwitz, Picasso (especially the works of his Blue Period) and Degas. A sequence in a prison has its roots in Van Gogh's "Prison Courtyard." The film's influences are also literary: the trial scenes are based more on Tolstoy's Resurrection than in anything from the original source material.

Mother is expertly cast, from the actors playing mother and son (Baranovskaya and Batalov were recruited from the Moscow Art Theater) to the extras on screen for a split second. Pudovkin favored using non-actors in smaller roles, people whose real-life experience would provide a heightened sense of reality. In a sequence depicting the son's arrest after a search of his home, a former tsarist officer plays the colonel supervising the interrogation. After all, who else but an authentic career military man would know how to look the part of a professional soldier?

Interestingly, Mother might easily have been made by another director. Yuri Zhelyabuzhsky was initially assigned to direct the film, but was unable to cast the title role and even requested that scenarist Nathan Zarkhi transform her into a father. Finally, the project came to Pudovkin, who could never have worked independently within, or outside, the Soviet cinema establishment. His films are not pure works of art: Mother is similar to The End of St. Petersburg and The Heir to Genghis-Khan in that its motives are unabashedly political. Every great Russian film of the era, including Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin, Strike and October, are in some way linked to the Revolution. But Mother is the most personalized, and most poetic, of them all.

—Rob Edelman

MATKA JOANNA OD ANIOLOW

(Mother Joan of the Angels)

Poland, 1961

Director: Jerzy Kawalerowicz

Production: Kadr Film Unit for Film Polski; black and white, 35mm; running time: 125 minutes and 105 minutes, English version is 101 minutes. Released 1961, Poland.

Screenplay: Tadeusz Konwicki and Jerzy Kawalerowicz, from a novel by Jarosław Iwaszkiewicz which in turn was based on 17th century documents about the events at the convent in Loudon, France; photography: Jerzy Wójcik; editors: Wiesława Otocka and Felicja Ragowska; sound recordists: Józef Bartczak, Zygmunt Nowak, and Jozef Kensikowski; art directors: Roman Mann and Tadeusz Borowczyk (some sources list Tadeusz Wybult); music: Adam Walaciński.

Matka Joanna od aniołów

Cast: Lucyna Winnicka (Mother Joan); Mieczysław Voit (Father Jozef Suryń/the Rabbi); Anna Ciepielewska (Sister Margaret, or Małgorzata); Maria Chwalibóg (Awdosia); Kazimierz Fabisiak (Father Brym); Stanisław Jasiukiewicz (Chrzaszczewski); Zygmunt Zintel (Wołodkowicz); Franciszek Pieczka (Odryl); Jerzy Kaczmarek (Kaziuk); Jarosław Kuszewski (Juraj); Lech Wojciechowski; Marian Nosek.

Publications

Books:

Jerzy Kawalerowicz: Filmtexte, Munich, 1963.
Grzelecki, Stanisław, 20 Years of Polish Cinema, Warsaw, 1969.

Wegner, Jacek, Konwicky (in French), Warsaw, 1973.
Liehm, Mira and Antonin, The Most Important Art: East European Film after 1945, Berkeley, 1977.
Kuszewski, Stanisław, Contemporary Polish Film, Warsaw, 1978.

Articles:

Flacon, Michel, in Cinéma (Paris), no. 57, 1961.
Douchet, Jean, in Arts (Paris), 7 June 1961.
Siclier, Jacques, "Paphnuce et les Chacals," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July 1961.
Thirard, Paul-Louis, "Le Père Joseph et la Mère Jeanne," in Positif (Paris), September 1961.
Kawalerowicz, Jerzy, "Angles on the Angels," in Films and Filming (London), November 1961.
Hitchens, Gordon, in Vision (New York), Spring 1962.
Durnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), May 1962.
Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), May 1962.
Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), 17 May 1962.
Lefèvre, Raymond, in Image et Son (Paris), October 1962.
Callenbach, Ernest, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1963–64.

Michalek, Boleslaw, in Kino (Warsaw), no. 6, 1967.
 Hopfinger, Maryla, in Kino (Warsaw), no. 11, 1971.
 Cluny, C. M., in Cinéma (Paris), November 1982.
 Helman, Alicja., in Kino (Warsaw), April 1986.
Iluzjon, no. 3–4 (51–52), 1993.

* * *

“The revolt of oppressed humanity” is how one Polish critic described Mother Joan of the Angels and with this definition various levels of meaning may be glimpsed. The novel of the same name by the well-known author Jarosław Iwaszkiewicz, deals with an occurrence in the eastern region of Poland in the 17th century. The young ascetic priest Suryn ventures into a cloister where, it is said, all of the nuns are in the terrible grip of Satan. Four exorcists have made every effort, but in vain, to drive out the evil.

In his first encounter with the Mother Superior Joan, the priest is somewhat disappointed—instead of a miserable creature in the Devil’s grasp, he is greeted by a beautiful, dignified, and proud woman who engages him in a serious philosophical discussion. Between the two a shy, tender affection develops, a kind of halting love which they cannot resolve. The closed world of religious dogma and ritual shut out such a love. (Another nun, Małgorzata, has let herself be led astray by a nobleman who later abandons her, and she despairs of returning to the convent).

Suryn, in a tragic conflict with himself, with his feelings and his principles, decides on radical measures; to begin with he builds a screen in the attic where he meets with Joan, so that she can not come too near. Then he brings in two innocent boys with the aim of concentrating the satanic might onto them, thereby freeing Joan. In his holy foolishness, he suspects no tragic consequences; for him everything is only a game, a challenge to moral norms and customs, to the mendacity of his surroundings. For the clever woman, religion is not a calling but an opportunity to live free of the burden of a woman’s fate at that time.

Even in the cloister, in the perfect, uniformed and regulated system, Joan has rebelled against a one-dimensional, determinedly average existence. She unleashes this theater of darkness, with its possession by the devil and exorcisms, in order to express her need for love and spiritual contact. That is her vengeance on the cruel world; and as is the rule in the great tragedies, she causes the sacrifice of her beloved.

Kawalerowicz has succeeded in creating a poetically stylized work full of contrasts, elevated in its sincerity. The impressive, emotionally-laden, subtle interpretations by Lucyna Winnicka (Joan) and Mieczysław Voit (Suryn), grab the viewer and awake similar feelings. Without any physical contact, only through close-ups, eyes, glimpses, hands, the film refracts a delicate, but elusive eroticism. The film is full of erotic allusions, indirect, unprovoked, transmitted through atmosphere and images. As a pure art work, Mother Joan embodies an almost mystic ambivalence which releases intense feelings and many-layered thoughts. It is completely wrong to view the film as a critique of the church or religion. Rather, this Polish film should be seen as a lyrical tragedy of human existence, as a striving toward spiritual freedom, toward emotion and dreams. The director’s visual symbolism and his means of expression all point to this. Plagued by the contradictions of his situation, Suryn goes looking for a rabbi. Astonishingly, he discovers that the rabbi is himself (played by the same actor). He sees the situation with more wisdom and composure, realizing that there are no solutions to the existential questions of life. Mother Joan of the Angels is a film about the eternal quest for those answers.

—Maria Racheva

THE MATRIX

USA, 1999

Directors: Andy Wachowski and Larry Wachowski

Production: Village Roadshow Productions, Grouch II Film Partnership, and Silver Pictures; distributed by Warner Brothers; color, 35mm; running time: 136 minutes; sound mix: DTS, Dolby Digital, SDDS. Released March 1999, USA. Filmed in Sydney, Moore Park, and Waterloo, Australia, and in Istanbul, Turkey; cost: $63 million.

Producers: Bruce Berman (executive), Dan Cracchiolo (co-producer), Carol Hughes (associate), Andrew Mason (executive), Richard Mirisch (associate), Barrie Osborne (executive), Joel Silver, Erwin Stoff (executive), Andy Wachowski (executive), Larry Wachowski (executive); screenplay: Andy Wachowski, Larry Wachowski; cinematography: Bill Pope; assistant directors: Colin Fletcher, Bruce Hunt, James McTeigue, Toby Pease, Tom Read, Noni Roy, Jeremy Sedley, Paul Sullivan; editor: Zach Staenberg; supervising sound editor: Dane Davis; art directors: Hugh Bateup, Michelle McGahey; production designer: Owen Paterson; costume designer: Kym Barrett; original music: Don Davis; sound effects editors: Julia Eversshade, David Grimaldi, Eric Lindemann; casting: Mali Finn, Shauna Wolfson; special effects supervisors: Steve Courtley, Brian Cox; visual effects supervisors: Lynne Cartwright (Animal Logic), John Gaeta; digital effects supervisor: Rodney Iwashina; Bullettime composite supervisor: John Sasaki; stunt coordinator: Glenn Boswell; set designer: Godric Cole; music supervisor: Jason Bentley; kung fu choreographer: Yuen Wo Ping.

Cast: Keanu Reeves (Thomas A. Anderson/Neo); Laurence Fishburne (Morpheus); Carrie-Anne Moss (Trinity); Hugo Weaving (Agent Smith); Gloria Foster (Oracle); Joe Pantoliano (Cypher/Mr. Reagan); Marcus Chong (Tank); Julian Arahanga (Apoc); Matt Doran (Mouse); Belinda McClory (Switch); Ray Anthony Parker (Dozer); Paul Goddard (Agent Brown); Robert Taylor (Agent Jones); David Aston (Rhineheart); Marc Gray (Choi); Ada Nicodemou (DuJour); Denni Gordon (Priestess); Rowan Witt (Spoon Boy); Fiona Johnson (Woman in Red); Andy Wachowski (Window cleaner, uncredited); Larry Wachowski (Window cleaner, uncredited).

Awards: Academy Awards for Best Editing (Zach Staenberg), Best Effects, Sound Effects Editing (Dane A. Davis), Best Effects, Visual Effects (Steve Courtley, John Gaeta, Janek Sirrs, Jon Thum), and Best Sound (David E. Campbell, David Lee, John T. Reitz, Gregg Rudloff), 2000; Academy of Science Fiction, Horror, and Fantasy Films Awards for Best Science Fiction Film, Best Director (Andy and Larry Wachowski), Best Actor (Keanu Reeves), Best Costume Design

The Matrix

(Kym Barrett), Best Make-Up (Nikki Gooley, Bob McCarron, Wendy Sainsbury), Best Special Effects (Courtley, Gaeta, Sirrs, Thum), Best Supporting Actor (Laurence Fishburne), and Best Writer (Andy and Larry Wachowski), 2000; American Cinema Editors Eddie Award for Best Edited Feature Film-Dramatic (Zach Staenberg), 2000; British Academy (BAFTA) Awards for Best Achievement in Special Visual Effects (Courtley, Gaeta, Sirrs, Thum), Best Sound (David E. Campbell, David Lee, John T. Reitz, Gregg Rudloff), Best Cinematography (Bill Pope), Best Editing (Staenberg), and Best Production Design (Owen Paterson), 2000; Csapnivalo Golden Slate Awards for Best Actor in a Leading Role (Keanu Reeves), Best Actress in a Leading Role (Carrie-Anne Moss), and Best Visual Effects, 2000; Hugo Award for Best Dramatic Presentation, 2000; Motion Picture Sound Editors Golden Reel Award for Best Sound Editing-Effects and Foley (crew), 2000.

Publications

Script:

Wachowski, Andy, Larry Wachowski, Geof Darrow, Phil Osterhouse, Steve Skroce, and Spencer Lamm (editor), The Matrix: The Shooting Script and Complete Storyboards, New York, 2000.

Articles:

- Palermo, Chandra, "Ghost in the Machine," in Cinescape, vol. 5, no. 2, March 1999.
- McCarthy, Todd, "Silly F/X, Matrix Are For Kids," in Variety, vol. 374, no. 6, 29 March 1999.
- Schwarzbaum, Lisa, "Techno Prisoners," in Entertainment Weekly, no. 480, 9 April 1999.
- Essex, Andrew, "Matrix Mania," in Entertainment Weekly, no. 485, 14 May 1999.
- Graham, Bob, "Reeves Lost in The Matrix/Skillful Effects Serve Pretentious Sci-Fi Yarn," in The San Francisco Chronicle, 24 September 1999.
- Wright, Richard, "The Matrix Rules," in Film-Philosophy Internet Salon, <http://www.film-philosophy.com>, vol. 5, no. 3, January 2000.
- Hutchings, Peter, "The Matrix," in Scope: An Online Journal of Film Studies, http://www.nottingham.ac.uk/film/journal/filmrev/the\_matrix.htm, May 2000.

* * *

Three years after impressing critics with their Hollywood debut, Bound—a visually-stunning, highly suspenseful, lesbian neo-noir—Chicago-based brothers Andy and Larry Wachowski conceived of, wrote, and directed The Matrix, a science-fiction blockbuster that managed to effectively fuse (a la Star Wars) pop-philosophical themes with skillfully choreographed action sequences and state-of-the-art special effects.

The film stars Keanu Reeves (in a role that may have resuscitated his flagging career) as a dutiful company man who doubles at night as a hacker named Neo. Neo's Cartesian-esque scepticism concerning the true nature of reality is validated after a beautiful mystery woman, Trinity (Moss), introduces him to legendary zen-hacker Morpheus (Fishburne). Accepting Morpheus's invitation to take a mind/brain opening techno-drug trip, Neo discovers that the world in which he previously "existed" is nothing but a computer-generated Virtual Reality program controlled by the very artificial intelligence machines developed by mankind years ago. It seems that the machines, which require endless supplies of electrical current to survive, keep the entire human population (save for a smattering of rebels and one underground city) in a state of perpetual hallucination; lying unconscious in automated incubators, people are deceived into believing that they are actually living productive lives, while in reality vampiric computers are siphoning off their precious mojo. Morpheus is certain that Neo is the Messianic "One" who, according to legend, will show up one day to save the human race from eternal subjugation. Although initially dissuaded by a surprisingly domestic soothsayer (Foster), Neo manages to summon the inner fortitude necessary to defeat the waspy A.I. defense squad with the help of John Wooian martial arts-ballet, Sam Peckinpah-inspired slow motion gunfighting, and repeated self-affirmations.

The Matrix stands as the most successful entry in the budding sci-fi subgenre of Virtual Reality pictures. Other entries include John Carpenter's They Live! (1988), Paul Verhoeven's Total Recall (1990), Brett Leonard's Lawnmower Man (1992), Kathryn Bigalow's Strange Days (1995), Alex Proyas's Dark City (1998), Josef Rysnak's The Thirteenth Floor (1999), and David Cronenberg's eXistenZ (1999). Metaphysical musings, justified paranoia, and a constant questioning of authority are staples of all these films, which find not-too-distant relatives in Peter Weir's The Truman Show (1998) and Gary Ross's Pleasantville (1998). Separating The Matrix from the rest of the pack are its epic pretensions, apocalyptic overtones, and breathtaking visuals. New technologies such as "Bullettime" super slo-mo photography, wire enhanced gymnastics, and Woo-Ping Yuen (Black Mask, Fist of Legend)-choreographed Kung Fu fight scenes together served to raise the bar significantly for big-budget Hollywood action sequences. At the time of its release, producer Joel Silver gushed that "The style and the visual effects within [The Matrix] are something that has never been seen before, plus we have fighting styles and photographic techniques used in this movie that weren't possible even six months ago." Some of the fight scenes were so distinctive that spoofs turned up in the Rob Schneider vehicle, Deuce Bigalo: Male Gigolo (1999), as well as in one of the popular 1-800-CALL-ATT commercials starring David Arquette. Perhaps Peter Hutchings summed it up best when he wrote that The Matrix "replace[s] what in Woo is possible if unlikely with what is completely impossible."

The romanticized, even glorified depiction of violence in The Matrix came under attack after a pair of teenage boys, dressed in black trenchcoats not unlike the one worn by Neo, went on a shooting spree at their high school in Littleton, Colorado, a mere sixteen days after the film opened. Twelve students and one teacher were left dead; dozens more were seriously injured. Distraught parents and outraged politicians cited The Matrix's numerous fight scenes—scenes in which the heroes possess a seemingly inexhaustible supply of guns and ammo, move with acrobatic grace, and suffer little if any pain or negative consequences—as stimulants to the real-life massacre. (It is worth noting that the Wachowski brothers are former comic book writers, a pop literary genre in which scenes such as these are ubiquitous.) Although debate over the possible effects of cinematic violence on impressionable adolescents has raged for decades, the Littleton shootings brought the issue to the fore, and Hollywood had no choice but to respond with vague public statements and the temporary shelving of some controversial projects (the title of Kevin Williamson's Killing Ms. Tingle, about a nasty high school teacher who gets imprisoned by a few of her students, was changed just before its release to the far less indelicate, far less interesting, Teaching Ms. Tingle).

One of the most fascinating things about The Matrix is the manner in which the film attempts to negotiate, with only moderate success, between progressive messages of non-conformity and self-realization, and the generic imperatives imposed by Hollywood's conservative studio system. Roger Ebert put the point succinctly when he wrote that "It's cruel, really, to put tantalizing ideas on the table and then ask the audience to be satisfied with a shoot-out and a martial arts duel." Other critics praised the Wachowski brothers for beginning their film with an extended fight scene starring Trinity, only to note with disappointment her relegation to "Neo's love interest" status for the rest of the picture. The Matrix's mixed messages reappear at the level of narrative. Considering that what remains of post-war planet Earth is a bleak, inhospitable "desert of the real," and that the virtual world in which Neo grew up is not without its advantages, it is not entirely clear what the human resistance hopes to gain by its struggles.

In the final analysis, The Matrix stands as a textbook example of what has been called "postmodern" art, in which allusions to other texts (cinematic and otherwise) dominate, and nothing is referred to besides other representations. From the Bible to The Wizard of Oz, from Sleeping Beauty to Alice in Wonderland, from The Wild Bunch to Hard Target, The Matrix quotes from a multitude of sources, and in so doing adds an ironic twist to a film that is ostensibly concerned with exposing the limitations of simulated modes of experience.

—Steven Schneider

A MATTER OF LIFE AND DEATH

(Stairway to Heaven)

UK, 1946

Directors: Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger

Production: The Archers; color and dye-monochrome processed in Technicolor; running time: 104 minutes; length: 9,372 feet. Released November 1946.

Producers: Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger; screenplay: Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger; photography: Jack Cardiff; editor: Reginald Mills; sound recordist: C. C. Stevens; production designer: Alfred Junge; special effects: Douglas Woolsey, Henry Harris, Technicolor Ltd.; additional effects: Percy Day; music: Allan Gray.

A Matter of Life and Death

Cast: David Niven (Peter Carter); Kim Hunter (June); Robert Coote (Bob); Kathleen Byron (An Angel); Richard Attenborough (An English Pilot); Bonar Colleano (An American Pilot); Joan Maude (Chief Recorder); Marius Goring (Conductor 71); Roger Livesey (Doctor Reeves); Robert Atkins (The Vicar); Bob Roberts (Dr. Gaertler); Edwin Max (Dr. McEwen); Betty Potter (Mrs. Tucker); Abraham Sofaer (The Judge); Raymond Massey (Abraham Farlan).

Publications

Script:

Powell, Michael, and Emeric Pressburger, A Matter of Life and Death, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 December 1980.

Books:

Durgnat, Raymond, A Mirror for England: British Movies from Austerity to Affluence, London, 1970.

Garrett, Gerard, The Films of David Niven, London, 1975.

Christie, Ian, editor, Powell, Pressburger, and Others, London, 1978.
Cosandey, Roland, editor, Retrospective: Powell and Pressburger, Locarno, 1982.

Gottler, Fritz, and others, Living Cinema: Powell and Pressburger, Munich, 1982.

Morley, Sheridan, The Other Side of the Moon: A Biography of David Niven, London, 1985.

Christie, Ian, Arrows of Desire: The Films of Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger, London, 1985.

Martini, Emanuela, editor, Powell and Pressburger, Bergamo, 1986.

Powell, Michael, A Life in Movies: An Autobiography, London, 1986.

Salwolke, Scott, The Films of Michael Powell and the Archers, Lanham, 1997.

Articles:

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1946.

Winnington, Richard, in News Chronicle (London), 2 November 1946.

Lejeune, C. A., in Observer (London), 3 November 1946.

Powell, Dilys, in Sunday Times (London), 3 November 1946.

Shaw, Alexander, in Spectator (London), 7 November 1946.

- Kine Weekly* (London), 7 November 1946.
Variety (New York), 13 November 1946.
Motion Picture Herald (New York), 16 November 1946.
New York Times, 26 December 1946.
Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1946–47.
Revue du Cinéma (Paris), Summer 1947.
 Lightman, Herb A., “Two Worlds in Technicolor,” in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), July 1947.
 Thomas, A., “David Niven,” in Films in Review (New York), February 1962.
 Taylor, John Russell, “Michael Powell: Myths and Supermen,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1978.
 Everson, William K., “Michael Powell,” in Films in Review (New York), August–September 1980.
 Thompson, David, “The Films of Michael Powell: A Romantic Sensibility,” in American Film (Washington, D.C.), November 1980.
 Everson, William K., in MOMA Program Notes (New York), 7 December 1980.
 McVay, Douglas, “Cinema of Enchantment: The Films of Michael Powell,” in Films and Filming (London), December 1981.
 Harper, Sue, and Vincent Porter, “A Matter of Life and Death: The View from Moscow,” in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon), vol. 9, no. 2, June 1989.
 Horton, Robert, “A Matter of Life and Death,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 26, no. 3, May–June 1990.
 “Written, Produced and Directed by Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, no. 2, March–April, 1995.
 Stein, E., in Village Voice (New York), vol. 40, 18 April 1995.
 Tanner, Louise, “Accents and Umlauts,” in Films in Review (New York), vol. 46, no. 5–6, July–August 1995.
 Gough-Yates, Kevin, “Pressburger: England and Exile,” in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 5, no. 12, December 1995.
 Burres, S., and J. Stevenson, “Stairway to Heaven (A Matter of Life and Death),” in Cinefantastique (Forest Park), vol. 27, no. 8, 1996.

* * *

During the 1940s, Hollywood produced a number of films, mostly light comedy-dramas, which portrayed a slightly sugar-coated metaphysical world. Fantasies like The Devil and Daniel Webster (1941), Here Comes Mr. Jordan (1941), The Ghost and Mrs. Muir (1947), and It's a Wonderful Life offered stories about ordinary people who were able to change their earthly situations with the real or imagined aid of supernatural beings. Although these films each had plots that were possible only in a dream state existence, they also provided escapist, supernatural avenues for those who preferred them. Despite the popularity of this genre in Hollywood, though, the definitive example of the dream state fantasy did not come from America, but from England.

Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger, who had solidified their co-writing, directing and producing partnership in 1943 under the composite name of “The Archers,” previously produced four big-budget British films beginning with the Technicolor The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp. A Matter of Life and Death (released under the less metaphysical title Stairway to Heaven in the United States), was one of several films made by the Archers that coalesced the elements of lavish budgets, Technicolor, and fantasy, and, though an enchantingly light film on a superficial level, is one of the most metaphysically complex films ever made in the English language.

The film’s narrative structure concerns a British flyer, Peter Carter (David Niven) who makes radio contact with June (Kim Hunter), an American operator stationed on the English coast just before the end of World War II. The hopelessness of Peter’s situation touches June and their immediate rapport develops into an innocent kind of love. Peter bravely jumps out of his plane before it crashes into the Sea and June is certain that he has died. But, the next morning, Peter has not died. Although he at first believes he has gone to heaven, it soon becomes apparent that he has somehow lived and is near Leighwood, the village in which June is billeted. When he meets June on the road, they fall in love, marveling at their good fate.

To this point in the film, the audience and the characters are aware of the same information: Peter has somehow survived a parachuteless jump from an airplane into the English Channel. There is no obvious or plausible reason why he survived; Peter and June call it “a miracle” but don’t care to explore the reason.

In a brief written prologue, the filmmakers had advised the audience that they would be seeing a story of two worlds—one that exists in reality and one that merely exists in the mind of a young flier. But the reality of Peter’s survival and subsequent encounters with the metaphysical world is continually at odds with that statement.

The film develops two distinct dramatic proscenias after Peter’s survival: Leighwood, an ordinary English village, and an unnamed otherworldly place, which Peter, as well as the audience, interprets as heaven. Taking a less predictable road, Powell and Pressburger decided to have Leighwood always appear in Technicolor, while the other world “up there” exists only in black-and-white.

In Leighwood, Peter and June develop their romance and Peter forms a strong friendship with Doctor Frank Reeves (Roger Livesey), a neurologist friend of June’s. In the other realm, the very orderly rituals of logging and placing “new arrivals” such as Peter’s dead friend, Bob Trubshaw (Robert Coote) take place according to strict schedules. This again goes against type as the supernatural world appears rigid and bureaucratic while earth seems a happier, more idealized place.

As revealed in the heavenly world, there has been an unheard of mistake—Peter was supposed to be dispatched, but his attendant, Conductor 71 (Marius Goring), got lost in the fog and Peter has inadvertently survived. To rectify this error, Conductor 71 must go to earth and bring Peter to his rightful place.

As Peter and June are picnicking, time in Leighwood stops and Peter is confronted by Conductor 71, a whimsical 17th century Frenchman. Peter is naturally sceptical, but when he starts to believe, he adamantly refuses to leave earth. He wants to stay because of June. Time starts again and Conductor 71 goes to report this new development.

The worlds begin to collide more and more frequently as the days pass. Peter, who begins to experience headaches with increasing frequency and intensity, moves into Frank’s home so that Frank can observe him more closely. Though Peter relates to Frank and June all of Conductor 71’s visits, his extramental reality exists only for Peter.

Frank is convinced that the “visits” are merely hallucinatory symptoms of a brain tumor. As Peter’s time between headaches (the signals of the conductor’s presence) decrease, he becomes desperate about his ability to hang on to life. He tells Frank that there will be a “trial” to determine the outcome of his case and that he must find someone to defend him. Convinced that Peter must have an immediate operation to relieve the pressure on his brain, Frank rushes on his motorcycle to the hospital but is killed on the road.

Even though Peter faces his operation with trepidation because Frank will not be there to perform it, he is certain that having Frank as his champion at the celestial trial will save him. While Peter is under the anaesthesia, Frank wins his case, not through the persuasive arguments that Peter thought would sway his jury, but because June (again in Peter's subconscious) has offered to exchange her life for his. As Peter comes to, he tells June that they have won.

There are several metaphorical layers in the film. Peter substitutes his fear of death from a brain tumor for fear that he will not prove the merits of his case to live in heaven. To him the "matter of life and death" is not medical, but metaphysical. He must prove that his survival is justified.

This is lived out in the construction of his (or the) fantasy. He secretly believes that the "miracle" of his survival is a mistake, so he constructs an elaborate rationale for the error. He loves an American, so his prosecutor, Abraham Farlan (Raymond Massey) is an early American patriot who hates the English. In a sense he must prove to himself that he is worthy of her love. And finally, when the man he trusts most in the world, the man who is working the hardest to save him medically, dies, he looks to him in death as his most potent defense.

Another important metaphor exists outside of Peter's subconscious self. When June visits Frank in his camera obscura over the village, they look down on Leighwood as if from heaven. Frank's vantage point makes him all seeing and all knowing. Like the scenes in which Conductor 71 appears to Peter, everything in Leighwood seems to stand still as the godlike Frank looks on.

Though most of the supernatural elements can be dismissed within the context of Peter's own dreams or fantasies, two points are never fully explained: how did Peter survive the jump from his plane and how did a book, borrowed by Conductor 71 from Frank's study, come to be in Peter's suitcase? Though logical reasons could be found for both, Powell and Pressburger do not offer them, relying instead on the audience's desire to interpret them either as aspects of escapist fantasy or additional manifestations of a medically induced trauma.

Though two later productions of "The Archers," Black Narcissus (1946) and The Red Shoes (1948), have attained greater recognition among cinema historians, A Matter of Life and Death, remains for some their collaborative masterpiece.

—Patricia King Hanson

THE MAXIM TRILOGY

USSR, 1935–39

Directors: Grigori Kozintsev and Leonid Trauberg

PART 1: YUNOST MAXIMA (The Youth of Maxim)

PART 2: VOZVRASHCHENIYE MAXIMA (The Return of Maxim)

PART 3: VYBORGSKAYA STORONA (The Vyborg Side)

Production: Lenfilm (Leningrad); black and white, 35mm; Part 1: running time: 98 minutes, some versions 86 minutes; length: 2,678 meters; Released 27 January 1935. Part 2: running time: 112 minutes; length: 3,082 meters; released 23 May 1937. Part 3: running time: 120 minutes; length: 3,276 meters; released 2 February 1939.

Scenario and screenplay: Grigori Kozintsev and Leonid Trauberg (with Lev Slavina for Part 1); assistant directors: N. Kosheverova, Kh. Lokshina, and M. Nesterov; photography: Andrei Moskvina; sound: I Volk; art directors: Evgeny Enei (Parts 1 and 2), V. Vlasov (Part 3); music: Dmitri Shostakovich.

Cast: Boris Chirkov (Maxim); Valentina Kibardina (Natasha); A. Kulakov (Andrei); Mikhail Tarkhanov (Polivanov); M. Shchelkovsky (Foreman); S. Leontyev (Engineer); P. Volkov (Worker); Stepan Kayukov (Dyoma); Alexandr Zrazhevsky (Yerofeyev); A. Kuznetsov (Turaev); Mikhail Zharov (Dymba, the Anarchist); Vasily Vanin (Nikolai); A. Chistyakov (Mishchenko); Yuri Tolubeyev (Bugai); A. Bondi (Menshevik); Vasily Merkuriev (Student); N. Kriuchkov (Soldier); Maxim Strauch (Lenin); Mikhail Gelovani (Stalin); Natalia Uzhvi (Yevdokia); L. Lyubashevski (Sverdlov); B. Zhukovski (Attorney); D. Dudnikov (Ropshin); M. Nazarov (Lapshin).

Awards: Order of Lenin to Lenfilm studios for producing Yunost Maxima, 1935. Stalin Prize awarded to the entire trilogy, 1941.

Publications

Books:

Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.

Verdone, Mario, and Barthélemy Amengual, La Feks, Paris, 1970.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey One: The Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.

Rapisardi, Giusi, editor, La Feks: Kozintsev e Trauberg, Rome, 1975. Learning, Barbara, Grigori Kozintsev, New York, 1980.

Houten, Theodore van, Leonid Trauberg and His Films: Always the Unexpected, 's-Hertogenbosch, 1989.

Houten, Theodore van, 'Eisenstein Was Great Eater': In Memory of Leonid Trauberg, 's-Hertogenbosch, 1991.

Articles:

Pudovkin, V. I., in New Theatre, February 1935.

New York Times, 12 May 1939.

Boehnel, William, in New York World Telegram, 13 May 1939.

Variety (New York), 17 May 1939.

Kozintsev, Grigori, "Over the Parisiana," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1962–63.

Museum of Modern Art Department of Film Program Notes (New York), 25 September–11 November 1969.

"Grigori Kozintsev," in International Film Guide 1972, London, 1971.

"A Child of the Revolution," in Cinema in Revolution, edited by Luda and Jean Schnitzer, New York, 1973.

Volochova, Sonia, "Films from the Archive," in Museum of Modern Art Department of Film Program Notes (New York), 26–27 February 1987.

Henderson, Brian, "Leonid Trauberg and His Films," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 46, no. 1, Fall 1992.

Kepley, V., Jr., "Pudovkin, Socialist Realism, and the Classic Hollywood Style," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 47, no. 4, 1995/1996.

"Etpy bol'shogo puti," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow) no. 5, 1996.

* * *

The first episode of The Maxim Trilogy was released a few months after Chapaev and provided an alternative, equally successful, answer to that perennial but seldom soluble obsession of the Soviet arts establishment: the search for an ideal Communist hero. Whereas the Vasiliev brothers had patiently re-created Chapaev, a real-life champion, the directorial team of Grigori Kozintsev and Leonid Trauberg came up with an entirely synthetic hero, their own invention, Maxim. First envisaged as a conventional proto-Bolshevik—in an early treatment described as "a lean lad, of intelligent appearance, with a sharp nose and a shock of straight hair, withdrawn a bookworm self-taught"—he grew in the hands of the young but highly experienced and original filmmakers into a very different, more interesting and much more believable individual, with a touch of Til Eulenspiegel perhaps, or, as Kozintsev himself observed, with his roots in the favourite characters of Russian folklore, of fairground farces, Petrushka and Ivan Durak (Ivan the Fool), the holy innocent and the dumb youngest brother who always gets the Princess in the end.

This, of course, was only Maxim's ancestry: his personality grew, as might be expected, from the workings of two creative and complementary minds. But Maxim was no test-tube baby: together with the scripts as a whole he was developed against a background of thorough research into the history and actual documents of the period and locale—pre-revolutionary St. Petersburg. Once cast in the role, Boris Chirkov joined the process and was made, for instance, to try out any number of pre-1914 songs before one was found to fit the character: it was to become a leit-motif for the whole trilogy—but the composer, Shostakovich, and the directors were well aware of the oft-neglected truth that "music from nowhere," however inspired, whatever its contribution to mood, is the enemy of reality. In the first film, The Youth of Maxim, therefore, except for the opening prologue, there is little symphonic "background," only the actual sounds of song, accordion and guitar that belonged to the environment and the era.

Sense of period is also enhanced by Andrei Moskvina's photography and Evgeny Enei's art direction; both men were regular members of K and T's team. A memorable example is the scene in which police break up a demo in front of a huge bill-board announcing "ARA PILLS—THE BEST IN THE WORLD," giving us in one bold brush-stroke, as it were, an uncluttered background to the action, a sharp stab of visual irony and, in the simplistic advertising message, so remote in time and space from Madison Avenue, a glimpse of a complacent and unsuspecting "bourgeois" society. By such juxtapositions, by a succession of apparently disparate, even "unimportant" images, by a series of incidents rather than a relentless plot, the whole trilogy is allowed to grow. There is, however, a stylistic unity, and the strong central character helps to hold the kaleidoscope together.

On the other hand, Maxim is not continuously shoved into the centre of things. Dovzhenko reproached K and T for this: "Maxim is frequently out of focus!" he complained, comparing the film, in a sense, unfavourably with Chapaev: that film's "secret of success" was said to be that "the Commander is always to be found at the centre of things." But within a much freer framework, and throughout the whole trilogy, Maxim is never too far away. The real "secret of success" shared by both teams of directors (but absent from most attempts to idealize revolutionary heroes) was a warm and liberating sense of humour.

Most of the belly laughs are in the first film: open and innocent, the youthful Maxim, chasing a clucking chicken or a pretty girl, singing his "Blue Globe" song, provides plenty of fun himself, and there are many humorous confrontations as the future revolutionary learns who his enemies are—masters, bosses, police, informers.

In Part II, The Return of Maxim, although he still appears to be the same naive youth, his naiveté has become a sort of disguise: for Maxim is now a revolutionary, working in the "underground." In the course of this dangerous activity he has to learn who are his "new enemies—Mensheviks and dissidents," says a Soviet film historian, who adds: "Maxim shows himself unable to reconcile himself with any kind of ideological vacillation." But the heavy political message is made much lighter (in both senses) by a masterly evocation of the glorious summer of 1914, the last before "the lights went out all over Europe," particularly poignant perhaps in Saint Petersburg.

In Part III, The Vyborg Side (the slummier side of St. Petersburg), although never allowed to forget, or regret, his working-class origins, and not entirely denied his sense of humour, Maxim is already a commissar somewhat sober, dignified and strict. In the final significant sequence, which is played for laughs, he confronts some definitely "vacillating" bank employees, who plead "We are peaceful Russian people." "What's Russian about you?" he replies—"Messrs Schumacher, Andersen, etc. Your surnames are German: you have consorted with English spies and have thought about setting up Japanese accounting systems." An odd piece of dialogue, one might think, when one of the directors was called Trauberg: but, with the Nazi menace already building up, it is an early example of the shift from the "class struggle" towards the more chauvinistic "patriotic" propaganda of the following decade.

And even the immensely popular "synthetic" hero was not allowed to die. By popular demand the somewhat reluctant Boris Chirkov was made to re-enact Maxim (by now a member of the Central Committee) in Ermler's two-part Great Citizen, just before World War II and, in 1941, still singing his "Blue Globe" song (with appropriate new lyrics), he opened the first "Fighting Film Album," under Gerasimov's direction, in Meeting with Maxim.

Indeed, the outstanding excellence of the Maxim Trilogy (and the first part, at least, is a true classic) has been almost overshadowed by the authors' successful creation of their "Communist hero"—one of the few fictitious characters who, like Sherlock Holmes, is obstinately believed, against all the evidence, to have actually existed.

—Robert Dunbar

MEAN STREETS

USA, 1973

Director: Martin Scorsese

Production: Taplin-Perry-Scorsese; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes. Released 1973. Filmed in New York City.

Producer: Jonathan T. Taplin; screenplay: Martin Scorsese and Mardik Martin; photography: Norman Gerard; editor: Sid Levin.

Mean Streets

Cast: Harvey Keitel (Charlie); Robert De Niro (Johnny Boy); David Proval; Amy Robinson; Richard Romanus; Cesare Danova.

Publications

Books:

- Jacobs, Diane, Hollywood Renaissance, New York, 1977.
- Kolker, Robert Phillip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.
- Weiss, Ulli, Das neue Hollywood: Francis Ford Coppola, Steven Spielberg, Martin Scorsese, Munich, 1985.
- Bliss, Michael, Martin Scorsese and Michael Cimino, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1986.
- Arnold, Frank, and others, Martin Scorsese, Munich, 1986.
- Cietat, Michel, Martin Scorsese, Paris, 1986.
- Domecq, Jean-Philippe, Martin Scorsese: Un Rêve italo-américain, Renens, Switzerland, 1986.
- Wood, Robin, Hollywood from Vietnam to Reagan, New York, 1986.
- Cameron-Wilson, James, The Cinema of Robert De Niro, London, 1986.
- McKay, Keith, Robert De Niro: The Hero Behind the Masks, New York, 1986.
- Weiss, Marian, Martin Scorsese: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1987.
- Lourdeaux, Lee, Italian and Irish Filmmakers in America: Ford, Capra, Coppola, and Scorsese, Philadelphia, 1990.
- Connelly, Marie Kathryn, Martin Scorsese: An Analysis of His Feature Films, With a Filmography of His Entire Directorial Career, Jefferson, 1993.
- Bliss, Michael, The Word Made Flesh: Catholicism and Conflict in the Films of Martin Scorsese, Lanham, 1995, 1998.
- Friedman, Lawrence S., The Cinema of Martin Scorsese, New York, 1997.
- Kelly, Mary P., Martin Scorsese: A Journey, New York, 1997.
- Dougan, Andy, Martin Scorsese - Close Up: The Making of His Movies, New York, 1998.
- Brunette, Peter, editor, Martin Scorsese: Interviews, Jackson, 1999.
- Grist, Leighton, The Films of Martin Scorsese, 1963–1977: Authorship and Context, New York, 2000.

Articles:

- Films in Review* (New York), November 1973.
- Ney, J., in Inter/View (New York), November 1973.
- Delson, J., in Take One (Montreal), November 1973.
- Denby, David, "Mean Streets: The Sweetness of Hell," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1973–74.
- Rubenstein, L., in Cineaste (New York), no. 2, 1974.
- Bobrow, A. C., "The Filming of Mean Streets," in Filmmakers Newsletter (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), January 1974.
- Stein, J., in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1974.
- Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), May 1974.
- Macklin, F. A., "It's a Personal Thing for Me," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1975.
- "Scorsese Seminar" in Dialogue on Film (Beverly Hills), April 1975.
- Henry, M., "La Passion de Saint Martin Scorsese," in Positif (Paris), June 1975.
- Beylie, Claude, in Ecran (Paris), July–August 1975.
- Lindberg, I., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), no. 131, 1976.
- Turroni, G., in Filmcritica (Rome), January–February 1976.
- Hosman, H., in Skoop (Amsterdam), February–March 1976.
- Rinaldi, G., in Cineforum (Bergamo), March 1976.
- Renaud, T., in Cinéma (Paris), July 1976.
- Eder, K., "Rebel Heroes der 70er Jahre: Kontaktlos und Gewalttätig: Zu zwei Filmen von Martin Scorsese," in Medium (Frankfurt), July 1976.
- Cros, J. L., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), October 1976.
- Jansen, P. W., "Eastside Story: Hexenkessel von Martin Scorsese," in Film und Ton (Munich), December 1976.
- Hermann, R., in Cinemonkey (Portland, Oregon), no. 4, 1979.
- Walsh, Michael, "Slipping into Darkness: Figures of Waking in Cinema," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 5, no. 4, 1983.
- Bruce, Bryan, "Martin Scorsese: Five Films," in Movie (London), Winter 1986.
- Lane, J., "Martin Scorsese and the Documentary Impulse," in Framework (London), no. 1, 1991.
- Sitney, P. A., "Cinematic Election and Theological Vanity," in Raritan (New Brunswick, New Jersey), no. 2, 1991.
- Librach, R. S., "The Last Temptation in Mean Streets and Raging Bull," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 1, 1992.
- Hosney, J., and others, "The Passion of St. Charles: Martin Scorsese's Mean Streets," in South Atlantic Quarterly (Durham, North Carolina), no. 2, 1992.
- Thompson, David, "Harvey Keitel: Staying Power: Interview with Harvey Keitel," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 3, no. 1, January 1993.
- Penman, Ian, "Juke-Box and Johnny Boy: Music in Martin Scorsese's Film Mean Streets," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 3, no. 4, April 1993.
- McGreal, Jill, "Mean Streets," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 3, no. 4, April 1993.
- Clements, Marcelle, "Martin Scorsese's Mortal Sins," in Esquire, vol. 120, no. 5, November 1993.
- Chanko, Kenneth M., "Martin Scorsese," in Films in Review (New York), vol. 44, no. 11–12, November–December 1993.
- Maxfield, James F., "'The Worst Part': Martin Scorsese's Mean Streets," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 23, no. 4, October 1995.
- Morrison, S., "La haine, Fallen Angels and Some Thoughts on Scorsese's Children," in CineAction (Toronto), vol. 39, 1995.
- Scorsese, Martin, "De Niro and moi," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 500, March 1996.
- Blake, Richard A., "Redeemed in Blood: The Sacramental Universe of Martin Scorsese," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 24, no. 1, Spring 1996.
- Hampton, Howard, "Scorpio Descending: In Search of Rock Cinema," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 33, no. 2, March–April 1997.
- Taubin, A., "The Old 'Hood,'" in Village Voice (New York), vol. 43, 17 March 1998.
- Conn, Andrew Lewis, "The Adolescents of Martin Scorsese: The Drama of the Gifted Child," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 34, no. 3, May–June 1998.

* * *

Mean Streets is the film that established director Martin Scorsese's reputation, and it is often considered his most personal and emblematic work. In comparison with his later films, however, Mean Streets seems more like a rough sketch (both thematically and stylistically) than a fully-realized achievement, despite the film's distinction when viewed as an isolated work.

At the centre of Mean Streets is Charlie (Harvey Keitel). Of all of Scorsese's male protagonists he is arguably the least mentally unstable and the least prone to movement and action. Like Travis Bickle in Taxi Driver, Charlie's responses to his surroundings are so internalized that the film must utilize devices like voice-over monologues and subjective slow-motion shots in order to clarify those responses. But unlike Travis (or even unlike Ellen Burnstyn's Alice), there is no point in the film at which Charlie is jolted out of his inactive state. While the protagonists of Scorsese's later films almost continually create the action and upheaval that set in motion and propel forward the narrative, Charlie remains in an almost constant state of indecision and stasis, as does the movement of the narrative in Mean Streets.

It is the presence of Johnny Boy (Robert De Niro) that suggests Scorsese's later protagonists with their propensity towards emotional and physical violence that they are unable to fully comprehend. In Scorsese's collaborations with De Niro after Mean Streets the two men were able to fuse the masochistic Charlie with the violent, inarticulate Johnny Boy. But in Mean Streets Johnny Boy's almost total inarticulateness results in his being slightly displaced from the center of the narrative by his more "normal" friend Charlie, even though Johnny Boy's accumulated actions lead to the shoot-out on Charlie, Theresa and himself.

The shoot-out itself leaves the unanswered question whether Charlie will ever become active rather than (essentially) passive. In all of Scorsese's subsequent narrative films, the extremely violent and/or emotional upheavals that serve as a climax have a kind of cleansing effect, unleashing all of the psychological problems, the private demons, of the main characters. Nevertheless, the epilogues in each of these post-Mean Streets films tend to re-state the essential problems of the characters, giving an impression of apparent unity and order precariously on the brink of collapsing once again and thus denying any "true" catharsis. Mean Streets simply ends with the shoot-out, an act of violence perpetrated not by the central characters but on them, with Scorsese playing their would-be assassin, ending the film on a note of total disorder. Charlie, with a confused and uncertain future before him, is essentially the ‘hero’ of an extraordinary work-in-progress.

—Joseph McElhaney

MEET ME IN ST. LOUIS

USA, 1944

Director: Vincente Minnelli

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Picture Corp.; color, 35mm; running time: 113 minutes. Released 1944. Filmed in MGM studios. Cost: $1,700,000.

Producer: Arthur Freed; screenplay: Irving Brecher and Fred F. Finklehoffe, from the novel by Sally Benson; photography: George J. Folsey; editor: Albert Akst; art directors: Cedric Gibbons, Lemuel Ayers, and Jack Martin Smith; music director: George Stoll; music numbers: Ralph Blane and Hugh Martin; costume designer: Irene Sharaff; choreography: Charles Walters.

Cast: Judy Garland (Esther Smith); Margaret O’Brien (Tootie Smith); Lucille Bremer (Rose Smith); Mary Astor (Mrs. Anna Smith); Leon Ames (Mr. Alonzo Smith); Tom Drake (John Truett); Harry Davenport (Grandpa Potter); Marjorie Main (Katie); Henry H. Daniels, Jr. (Lon Smith, Jr.); Joan Carroll (Agnes Smith); Robert Sully (Warren Sheffield); Chill Wills (Mr. Neely); Hugh Marlowe (Colonel Daryl).

Award: Oscar to Margaret O’Brien for Outstanding Child Actress, 1944.

Publications

Books:

- Burton, Jack, The Blue Book of Hollywood Musicals, Watkins Glen, New York, 1953.
- Truchaud, François, Vincente Minnelli, Paris, 1966.
- Springer, John, All Talking, All Singing, All Dancing, New York, 1966.
- Morella, Joe, and Edward Epstein, Judy: The Films and Career of Judy Garland, New York, 1969.
- Astor, Mary, A Life on Film, New York, 1971.
- Thomas, Lawrence B., The MGM Years, New Rochelle, New York, 1972.
- Di Orio, Al, Jr., Little Girl Lost: The Life and Hard Times of Judy Garland, New Rochelle, New York, 1973.
- Minnelli, Vincente, with Hector Arce, I Remember It Well, New York, 1974; 1990.
- Stern, Lee Edward, The Movie Musical, New York, 1974.
- Baxter, Brian, The Films of Judy Garland, London, 1974.
- Juneau, James, Judy Garland, New York, 1974.
- Edwards, Anne, Judy Garland: A Biography, New York, 1975.
- Kepler, M., Judy Garland, Paris, 1981.
- Guerif, Francois, Vincente Minnelli, Paris, 1984.

- Brion, Patrick, and others, Vincente Minnelli, Paris, 1985.
- Dyer, Richard, Heavenly Bodies: Film Stars and Society, London, 1987.
- Harvey, Stephen, Directed by Vincente Minnelli, New York, 1989.
- Lang, Robert, American Film Melodrama: Griffith, Vidor, Minnelli, Princeton, 1989.
- Naremore, James, The Films of Vincente Minnelli, Cambridge, 1993.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 1 November 1944.
- New York Times*, 29 November 1944.
- Times* (London), 26 February 1945.
- St. Johns, A. R., in Photoplay (New York), April 1945.
- “Minnelli’s Talents,” in Time (New York), 14 May 1945.
- Harcourt-Smith, Simon, “Vincente Minnelli,” in Sight and Sound (London), January-March 1952.
- Rosterman, Robert, “Judy Garland,” in Films in Review (New York), April 1952.
- Chaumeton, Etienne, “L’Oeuvre de Vincente Minnelli,” in Positif (Paris), November-December 1954.
- Johnson, Albert, “The Films of Vincente Minnelli,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1958 and Spring 1959.
- “The Rise and Fall of the Musical,” in Films and Filming (London), January 1962.
- “Minnelli Issue” of Movie (London), June 1963.
- Galling, Dennis Lee, “Vincente Minnelli,” in Films in Review (New York), March 1964.
- Galling, Dennis Lee, “Arthur Freed,” in Films in Review (New York), November 1964.
- Turrone, G., “Minnelli e l’architettura del tempo (a proposito di Meet Me in St. Louis),” in Filmcritica (Rome), April 1976.
- Britton, Andrew, “Meet Me in St. Louis: Smith; or, The Ambiguities,” in Australian Journal of Screen Theory (Kensington, New South Wales), no. 3, 1977.
- Wood, Robin, “The American Family Comedy: From Meet Me in St. Louis to Texas Chain Saw Massacre,” in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 2, 1979.
- De Fornari, O., “Nuove retrospettive: Due film di Judy Garland,” in Filmcritica (Rome), February 1979.
- Karr, Kathleen, in Magill’s Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Telotte, J.P., “Self and Society: Vincente Minnelli and Musical Formula,” in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 9, no. 4, 1982.
- Ward, L.E., “The Great American Films: Meet Me in St. Louis,” in Classic Images (Muscatine), vol. 120, June 1985.
- Hoberman, J., “Scanners: Oh, You Kid,” in Village Voice (New York), vol. 30, 10 December 1985.
- Aachen, G., in Reid’s Film Index (Wyong), no. 1, 1987.
- Hunsecker, J.J., “Off Her Trolley,” in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 59, no. 1, 1989/1990.
- Masson, Alain, “La douceur du foyer et le charme des soirs,” in Positif (Paris), no. 374, April 1992.
- Thomson, D., “Happiness: Movies in Which Nothing Happens,” in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1992.
- Britton, A., “Meet Me in St. Louis: Smith, or the Ambiguities,” in CineAction (Toronto), no. 35, 1994.
- Rimolodi, Oscar A., “Produced by Arthur Freed,” in Films in Review (New York), vol. 45, no. 7–8, July-August 1994.

Meet Me in St. Louis

Fitzpatrick, Eileen, "Tapes Offer Rare Musical Soundtracks," in Billboard, vol. 106, no. 34, 20 August 1994.

Care, R., "Meet Me in St. Louis," in Film Score Monthly (Los Angeles), no. 65/66/67, January/February/March 1996.

Short review, in El Amante Cinema, no. 53, July 1996.

Higgins, Scott, "Color at the Center: Minnelli's Technicolor Style in Meet Me in St. Louis," in Style, vol. 32, no. 3, Fall 1998.

* * *

As with many of the finest Hollywood films, the richness of Meet Me in St. Louis derives from the interaction of a number of sources and determinants, some of them complex in themselves, producing a filmic text to which no single, "coherent" reading can do justice. A few of these determinants include:

The dominant ideological project. Bordwell and Thompson give a clear account of this aspect in Film Art (unfortunately, they give the impression that there is nothing more to the film). They stress the film's release date (1944), a time when "families were often forced apart. In context Meet Me in St. Louis appeared as a nostalgic look back at America in 1903. It suggested an ideal of family unity for the future." The superficial level of familial celebration is the most easily perceived, and Bordwell and Thompson are doubtless correct in assuming that it was responsible for the film's contemporary popularity. Today, it is obvious that it is disrupted by numerous other factors.

Ideological contradiction. Through American art and culture the concepts "home" and "family," are central to ideological tension and conflict, perceived at once as the repositories of security and happiness where "good" values are preserved and as prisons in which energy is repressed, human beings trapped and frustrated. Beneath its level of affirmation, this tension is dramatized in Meet Me in St. Louis more thoroughly than in almost any other American film. To give one example only: the "happy ending" can be achieved only through the symbolic castration of the father (the "snow-people" scene), his capitulation expressing itself in the line, "We'll stay here till we rot."

Genre. The film basically crosses two genres, the musical (often regarded in terms of "celebration of vitality") and the small town domestic comedy (traditionally concerned with the containment of energy). Instead of concealing the potential tension here, the film consistently exploits it, making it its central principle. Even more remarkable is the eruption of a third (totally incompatible) genre: the famous Halloween sequence is built unambiguously on the iconography of the horror film and can now be seen to be the antecedent of the “demon child” movies of the 1970s (The Exorcist, The Omen, Halloween).

Stars. The film draws particularly on the personalities/star images of two performers: Judy Garland, with her combination of energy, neuroticism and precariously-suppressed hysteria, and Margaret O’Brien, who became famous overnight in her first film, Journey for Margaret, especially for her scene of prolonged hysterical breakdown.

Director. There was a time when Minnelli’s musicals were critically downgraded in favour of those by Donen and Kelly: the latter certainly correspond more unproblematically to the simple “celebration of vitality” formula. Minnelli’s musicals—full, like melodramas, of tension, excess, dislocation—produce continuous uneasiness. Virtually every number in Meet Me in St. Louis (including the famous “Trolley Song”) ends not in the ultimate release of exuberance but in frustration. “Release” in Minnelli, in fact, usually takes the form of the explosion of hysteria (see, for example, the frenetic car-rides of The Bad and the Beautiful and Two Weeks in Another Town, the fairground climax of Some Came Running, the “goldfish” scene of Courtship of Eddie’s Father, the “Mack the Black” fantasy of The Pirate). Both the major sequences of Meet Me in St. Louis centred on Margaret O’Brien (Halloween and the smashing of the snow people) have this function; both are also concerned with the symbolic destruction of parent-figures. Even the apparent affirmation of the end of the film is severely undercut—by its anti-climactic nature, by Tootie’s dream of apocalyptic destruction, by John’s casual remark that he “liked it better when it was just a swamp.”

Meet Me in St. Louis, then, must be read not as a simple celebration of family life but as the point of intersection of some of the major ideological tensions in American culture. For a detailed account, the reader is referred to Andrew Britton’s “Smith, or the Ambiguities” in The Australian Journal of Screen Theory, one of the most comprehensive and intelligent readings of a Hollywood film so far attempted.

—Robin Wood

MEG KER A NEP

(Red Psalm)

Hungary, 1971

Director: Miklos Jancso

Production: Mafilm Studio; Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 88 minutes; length: 7920 feet. Released 1971, Hungary. Filmed 1971.

Screenplay: Gyula Hernádi; photography: János Kende; editor: Zoltán Farkas; art director: Tamás Banovich; musical arrangements: Ferenc Sebo; choreography: Ferenc Pesovár.

Cast: Lajos Balázsovits (Officer Cadet); András Bálint (Count); Gyöngyi Bürös (Young peasant woman); Andrea Drahotá (Militant girl); József Madoras; Tibor Molnár; Tibor Orbán; Bertalan Solti.

Award: Cannes Film Festival, Best Director, 1972.

Publications

Books:

Liehm, Mira and Antonin, The Most Important Art: East European Film after 1945, Berkeley, 1977.

Petrie, Graham, History Must Answer to Man: The Contemporary Hungarian Cinema, London, 1978.

Marlia, Giulio, Lo schermo liberato: il cinema di Miklós Jancsó, Firenze, 1982.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 24 May 1972.

Beylie, Claude, “Les Maelstroms de la liberté,” in Ecran (Paris), July-August 1972.

Hollywood Reporter, 3 October 1972.

Varga, V., in Filmkultura (Budapest), November-December 1972.

Passek, J. L., “Psaume rouge: La Tactique et le rite,” in Cinéma (Paris), December 1972.

Beylie, Claude, “L’Idéologie, la technique, et le rite,” in Ecran (Paris), December 1972.

Langlois, G., “Miklos Jancso: ‘Le Plan séquence: Le Rythme le plus près de la réalité,’” in Cinéma (Paris), December 1972.

Desmet, P., and J. C. Guiguet, in Image et Son (Paris), January 1973.

Magny, Joel, in Téléciné (Paris), January 1973.

Cornaud, A., “Entretien avec Miklos Jancso,” in Image et Son (Paris), January 1973.

Jeancolas, J. P., “Vers le corpus sacre de la révolution,” in Positif (Paris), February 1973.

Cinématographe (Paris), February 1973.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1973.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), May 1973.

Andersson, W., in Filmrutan (Stockholm), no. 3, 1974.

Tomasino, R., “Circolarità della rivoluzione,” in Filmcritica (Rome), August-September 1974.

Gay, B., in Image et Son (Paris), June-July 1975.

Film Form (Newcastle upon Tyne), Spring 1976.

Cinema Papers (Melbourne), June-July 1976.

Escobar, R., and V. Giacci, “Miklos Jancso: I riti della rivoluzione, la morte, la resurrezione, il futuro,” in Cineforum (Bergamo), November 1976.

Baticle, Y.R., “Communication audio-visuelle et pedagogie: le message de l’affiche cinematographique,” in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), vol. 14, no. 3, 1977.

Biro, Y., “Landscape During the Battle,” in Millennium Film Journal (New York), no. 4/5, Summer/Fall 1979.

* * *

Of all of his films, Meg ker a nep perhaps best exemplifies the stylistic hallmarks with which Miklós Jancsó is most often associated: long takes (frequently 5 to 8 minutes in length), a constantly moving camera which weaves in and out of groups of moving figures, and an array of visual metaphors and exotic images rooted in Hungarian folklore and his own personal mythology.

On its most simple level, Meg ker a nep is set in Hungary in the 1890s and presents the emergence of agrarian socialist movements—but Jancsó isn’t interested in a realistic depiction of isolated historical events. Through his unconventional cinematic style, Jancsó creates a “ritualistic portrayal of revolution” which takes on universal significance, and the success of the film derives from the manner in which its form becomes its content.

Meg ker a nep

For Jancsó, “one can imagine a film other than in the form of a story. We must try to widen the limits of expression.” With his reduction of the primacy of narrative, Jancsó also diminishes depth of characterization, the importance of individual action, and complex psychological explanations of behavior. In spite of these simplifications, Jancsó claims that his films are still “a means of expression with several dimensions.” His undercutting of an audience’s emotional identification with characters and situations creates, in his mind, “active” viewers and “makes [them] think”—and presumably take action at a later time.

If, in Meg ker a nep, Jancsó reduces traditional cinematic elements to a minimum, his style creates a heightened sense of the importance of movement, both in aesthetic and ideological terms. “It seems to me that life is a continual movement. In a procession, a demonstration, there’s movement all the time, isn’t there? It’s physical and it’s also philosophical: the contradiction is founded on movement, the movement of ideas, the movement of the masses. A man also is always surrounded, threatened by oppression: the camera movements I create suggest that too.” In Meg ker a nep, the complex interweaving of the moving camera with the carefully choreographed groups of soldiers, horsemen, and villagers reflects the ideological conflicts central to the film. The long takes and the examples of nearly invisible editing allow the spectator to concentrate on non-verbal devices to understand the unfolding action. For example, foreground activity becomes background activity only to return minutes later to the foreground of the screen as a manifestation of the continual shifting nature of power. Geometric shapes (most notably vertical lines and circles) are also in constant conflict and in constant movement, and the shifting fortunes of ideological struggles are also indicated in the clash of various types of music in the film.

Music is especially important in Meg ker a nep; the narrative action is delineated as much by music and song as by the film’s rather abstract, depersonalized dialogue. Beyond that, music universalizes the film’s theme. Aside from Hungarian folk songs that tell of the events depicted in the film and the repetition of a key song in multiple contexts, Jancsó’s music, which includes the Scottish ballad “Charlie Is My Darling” and the French “Marseillaise,” suggests that all revolutions are part of one continuing revolution.

Miklós Jancsó, like Sergei Eisenstein and Sergei Paradzhanov, is a master of synesthesia, a director who fuses multiple art forms to create in film the perfect medium for Wagner's Gesamtkunstwerk. Meghera nep, which won the "Best Director" award at the 1972 Cannes Film Festival, is perhaps Jancsó's best example of "fusion of the arts" and has been justly praised as Jancsó's best film by critics John Russell Taylor and Roy Armes.

—Joseph A. Gomez

MEGHE DHAKA TARA

(Hidden Star)

India, 1959

Director: Ritwik Ghatak

Production: Chitrakalpa; colour, 35mm; running time: 126 minutes.

Screenplay: Ritwik Ghatak, from the book by Shaktipada Rajguru; photography: Dinen Gupta; editor: Ramesh Joshi; music: Joyotirindra Moitra; sound: Satyen Chattopadhyay; art direction: Rabi Chattopadhyay.

Cast: Supriya Chowdhury (Nita); Anil Chatterjee (Shankar); Bijon Bhattacharya (Father); Gita Ghatak (Gita); Guita De (Mother); Dwijen Bhowal (Montu); Niranjan Roy (Sanat); Gyanesh Mukherjee (Bansi Dutt); Satindra Bhattacharya (the landlord).

Publications

Books:

- Hashmi, Safdar, Ritwik Retrospective, New Delhi, 1981.
 Banerjee, Shampa, editor, Ritwik Ghatak: An Attempt to Explore His Cinematic Perception, New Delhi, 1982.
 Rajakhyaksha, Ashish, Ritwik Ghatak: A Return to the Epic, Bombay, 1982.
 Banerjee, Haimanti, Ritwik Kumar Ghatak, Poona, 1985.
 Gangar, Amrit, and Ashish Rajadhyaksha, editors, Ritwik Ghatak: Arguments/Stories, Bombay, 1987.
 Ghatak, Ritaban, and Satyajit Ray, editors, Cinema and I, Calcutta, 1987.
 Joseph, Josephine, editor, Ritwik Ghatak, Madras, 1990.

Articles:

- Shahani, K., "Violence and Responsibility" in Filmfare (Bombay), 1976.
 Bhasker, I., "Myth and Ritual in Meghe dhaka tara" in Journal of Arts and Ideas (New Delhi), no. 3, 1982.
 Kapur, G., "Articulating the Self into History" in Framework (London), 1987.
 Singh, M., Cinemaya (New Delhi), 1989.
 Amiel, V., and others, Positif (Paris), October 1990.

Magny, J., "L'étoile brisée" in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1990.

Bassan, R., Positif (Paris), November 1990.

"Ritwik Ghatak and Some Directions for the Future," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 1, no. 5, September 1991.

Stein, E., "Cinema as a Weapon: Ritwik Ghatak's Unknown Masterworks," in Village Voice (New York), vol. 41, 1 October 1996.

"Ritwik Ghatak Retrospective," in Cinemaya (New Delhi), no. 35, January/February/March 1997.

Levich, Jacob, "Subcontinental Divide: The Undiscovered Art of Ritwik Ghatak," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 33, no. 2, March-April 1997.

Kemp, Philip, "Cloud-capped Star: Meghe dhaka tara," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 7, no. 9, September 1997.

* * *

Meghe dhaka tara is a film about displacement and exile. It is about the displacement of peoples who have been uprooted in the wake of India's partition which followed her independence in 1947. It is also about the exile of the classical, creative and feminine principles which, despite their nurturing potentials, find themselves being ruthlessly edged out of the socio-cultural space.

Meghe dhaka tara is a seminal film in the history of Indian cinema for more reasons than one. First and foremost, it looks at the cultural and political formations which the topographic break in the life of the peoples of India seems to put into a major crisis. The partition of India remains one of the most traumatic divisions of peoples in recent history. It also resulted in unprecedented diaspora. In the film the crisis, however starkly lived, is viewed against the evocative simultaneity of mythic presence. Even the bare documentative inserts of buildings, offices, pavements and roads seem to invoke a poetic conscience. It is not, as has been stated by many Indian commentators, a film that "returns to the epic." On the contrary, it is a work that definitively opens up a new cinema of the "grand poetic conscience." The epic references are not opened up for historical enlightenment but to deepen the very grain of existence that has become increasingly vulnerable. The film, therefore, addresses the question of nationality mainly within the modes of memory and melodic excess and disavows a direct referentiality and, hence, a rhetoric of identity. In a way, it marks the beginning of Ghatak's remarkable contribution to the rich Indian melodramatic tradition. He pushes melody into the space of memory; movement-gesture into the space of myth. It is also a film that pushes the debate about nationality beyond the realm of ideological certainties. Unlike a conventional epic, it dissolves facial iconicities into sound which works through a dialectic or relay between melody and dissonance. The dissonance and distortion flow from the state of imbalance into which the image has found a fleeting sense of home almost like the uprooted refugee. Almost the entire film is shot with a 16mm lens. The film again and again arrives at haunting close-ups till they finally appear as the masks of light beyond the reality of socio-political space.

Meghe dhaka tara is woven around the life of a refugee family in a resettlement colony in Calcutta. Uprooted from the other Bengal during the partition, the family is pushed to the margins of middle class existence and is barely able to keep itself together. More specifically, the narrative unfolds through Nita—the eldest daughter and the sole breadwinner of the family. The basic narrative structure of the film is laid out in terms of eight movements in which Nita is seen to be returning home after a day's work outside. Through these literal and figurative movements, she is seen to become inexorably involved in the task of keeping the family afloat against severe economic uncertainties. With each new movement, the homeward journey becomes increasingly strained till, finally, she loses all sense of reality and retracts to the virtual space of myth. Getting herself cast within the paradox of the benign and narcissistic mould of the nurturing mother, she is ruthlessly exploited by her mother and her younger sister and brother. Eventually, when, one by one, all the younger members of the family leave the house for a better life outside, the bitter irony of movements towards home strikes with the ferocity of a terminal illness.

Meghe dhaka tara

There are no more options left for Nita except that she be carried to the bills (the childhood romance having now given way to the desperation to somehow survive). As if in a ritual return to nature—the cultural gamut of life having slipped out of her hands almost fully. The reference, here, is to the goddess of Durga's immersion in the holy river after she has sojourned at her father's place for a fortnight. Nita's father and elder brother, Shankar, who have been closest to her, repeat the ritual in all its melodic/melodramatic excess and, consequently, associations of memory. This is the point in the film where, the physical spaces having completely recoiled from the terminally ill Nita, the cinema intercedes to receive her within the virtual space of the film frame, her lover having deserted her; her own young sister having usurped her place in the failed relationship; her younger brother having left the house to stay in the factory's dorm because of better food; her elder brother having left the house to protest against the injustice done to Nita by the entire family. Nita's descent into despair is thus complete. Even as she prepares to merge with an indifferent nature, cinema moves in compassionately to save her.

The motif of exile is also extended to the classical-romantic order to which Nita's benign and nostalgic father belongs. He seems to revel in the joyous and dramatic shifts which characterized the 19th-century Bengal renaissance where the folk articulations seemed to hold as much sway as the poetry of Keats and Wordsworth. He lapses into insignificance not being able to negotiate new forms of socio-political aggression. Yet another exile that eventually carves a niche for himself within the new world is the initially marginalized elder brother, Shankar, who is aspiring to be a classical vocalist. However, he is the one who is able to negotiate the new world in successfully asserting the dignity of the classical-romantic mode of being. Nita's anguished cry professing her desire to live even as she is facing death is to be understood within the context of this assertion of dignity. It is not possible for the feminine, creative and classical-romantic principles to survive in any other, prosaic manner. The call is, as such, extendable to the people who have been so brutally split along two zones despite belonging to the same melodic memory-resonance.

Meghe dhaka tara forms part of a larger trilogy which Ghatak made around the theme of displacement and exile. It was followed by Komal gandhar (E Flat, 1962) and Subarnarekha (named after the river Subarnarekha, 1964). The theme of partition and cultural split and the schism within the Indian Left and its cultural wing IPTA (the Indian People's Theatre Association) was at the core of all three films. It was taken up yet again with the traumatic birth of Bangladesh when Ghatak returned to the material energy of the Bengali culture to create Titash eki nadir naam (Titash, the Name of a River, 1972).

—Rashmi Doraiswamy

MELODY HAUNTS MY MEMORY

See SAMO JEDNOM SE LJUBI

MEMORIAS DEL SUBDESARROLLO

(Memories of Underdevelopment)

Cuba, 1968

Director: Tomás Gutiérrez Alea

Production: Instituto Cubano del Arte e Industria Cinematograficos (ICAIC); black and white, 35mm; running time: 104 minutes. Released 1968. Filmed in Havana.

Producer: Miguel Mendoza; screenplay: Tomás Gutiérrez Alea and Edmundo Desnoes, from the novel by Edmundo Desnoes; photography: Ramón Suárez; editor: Nelson Rodríguez; sound engineers: Eugenio Vesa, Germinal Hernández, and Carlos Fernández; production designer: Julio Matilla; music: Leo Brower, conducted by Manuel Duchezne Cuzán, recorded by Medardo Montero; optical effects: Jorge Pucheux; costume designer: Elba Perez; animation: Roberto Riquenes.

Cast: Sergio Corrieri (Sergio); Daisy Granados (Elena); Eslinda Núñez (Noemi); Omar Valdés; René de la Cruz; Yolanda Farr; Ofelia González; José Gil Abad; Daniel Jordan; Luis López; Rafael Sosa.

Awards: Warsaw Festival, Mermaid Prize, 1970.

Publication

Script:

Gutiérrez Alea, Tomás, and Edmundo Desnoes, Memories of Underdevelopment: The Revolutionary Films of Cuba, edited by Michael Myerson, New York, 1973; also contained in Memories of Underdevelopment: Tomas Gutierrez Alea, Director, Inconsolable Memories: Edmundo Desnoes, Author, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1990.

Books:

Nelson, L., Cuba: The Measure of a Revolution, Minneapolis, 1972.
Chanan, Michael, The Cuban Image, London, 1985.

Burton, Julianne, editor, Cinema and Social Change in Latin America: Conversations with Filmmakers, Austin, 1986.

Sánchez Oliva, Iraida, editor, Viewer's Dialectic: Tomás Gutiérrez Alea, translated by Julia Lesage, Havana, 1988.

Gutiérrez Alea, Tomás, Tomás Gutiérrez Alea: los filmes que no filmé, Ciudad de La Habana, 1989.

Gutiérrez Alea, and Edmundo Desnoes, Memories of Underdevelopment/Inconsolable Memories, introduction by Michael Chanan, New Brunswick, 1990.

Articles:

Douglas, M. E., "The Cuban Cinema: Filmography," in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1968.

Murphy, Brian, in Films and Filming (London), September 1969.

Allen, Don, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1969.

Engel, Andi, "Solidarity and Violence," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1969.

Bullita, Juan M., in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), no. 54, 1970.

Adler, Renata, "Three Cuban Cultural Reports with Films Somewhere in Them," in A Year in the Dark, Berkeley, 1971.

Hamori, O., in Filmkultura (Budapest), January-February 1972.

Murphy, W., in Take One (Montreal), April 1972.

Torres Diaz, D., "Cine Cubano en EEUU," in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 189-90, 1974.

"The Alea Affair," in Film 73/74, edited by David Denby and Jay Cocks, Indianapolis, 1974.

Lesage, Julia, "Images of Underdevelopment," in Jump Cut (Chicago), May-June 1974.

Martin, Marcel, in Ecran (Paris), December 1974.

"Three on Two: Henry Fernandez, David I. Grossvogel, and Emir Rodriguez Monegal on Desnoes and Alea," in Diacritics: A Review of Contemporary Cinema, Winter 1974.

Lieberman, S., "Women: The Memories of Underdevelopment," in Women and Film (Berkeley), Summer 1975.

Burton, Julianne, in Center for Inter-American Relations Review, Fall 1976.

Kernan, Margot, "Cuban Cinema: Tomás Gutiérrez Alea," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1976.

Burton, Julianne, "Individual Fulfillment and Collective Achievement: An Interview with Tomás Gutiérrez Alea," in Cineaste (New York), January 1977.

Burton, Julianne, in Cineaste (New York), Summer 1977.

Kavanagh, Thomas M., "Dialectics and the Textuality of Class Conflict," and "Revolutionary Cinema and the Self-Reflections on a Disappearing Class" by Albert Michales, in Journal of Latin American Lore, vol. 4, no. 1, 1978.

Memorias del subdesarrollo

Fernandez, Enrique, "Witnesses Everywhere: The Rhetorical Strategies of Memories of Underdevelopment," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), Winter 1980.

Gutiérrez Alea, Tomás, "Memorias del subdesarrollo: Notas de trabajo," and "Se llamaba Sergio" by Edmundo Desnoes, in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 45-46.

Burton, Julianne, "Modernist Form in Land in Anguish and Memories of Underdevelopment," in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Winter 1984.

Alexander, W., "Class, Film Language, and Popular Cinema," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), March 1985.

Gutiérrez Alea, Tomás, "The Viewer's Dialectic III," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), no. 32, April 1986.

Lopez, A. M., "Parody, Underdevelopment, and the New Latin American Cinema," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (New York), no. 1-2, 1990.

Oroz, Silvia, "Mémoires du sous-développement," an interview with Tomás Gutiérrez Alea, in Revue de la Cinéma (Montreal), no. 10, February-April 1991.

Thompson, F., "Metaphors of Space: Polarization, Dualism and Third World Cinema," in Screen (Oxford), no. 1, 1993.

"Tomas Gutiérrez Alea: Interview with Cuban Director," in UNESCO Courier, July-August 1995.

Beer, A., "Plotting the Revolution: Identity and Territory in Memories of Underdevelopment," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 43, 1997.

* * *

The self and society, private life and history, individual psychology and historical situation—this is the core of Memories, and film has rarely (if ever) been used so effectively to portray this relationship. The dialectic of consciousness and context is presented through the character of Sergio, a wealthy but alienated member of the bourgeoisie who stays in Cuba after the triumph of the revolution and whose experiences, feelings, and thoughts in being confronted by the new reality form the basis of the film.

The formal inventiveness of the film has its origin in the dialectical resonance created through the juxtaposition of various cinematic forms, a characteristic of revolutionary Cuban cinema at its best. Here, the film begins by re-working the book which inspired it, taking the form of the novel—Sergio's subjective revolutionary Cuba, presented in documentary footage. Through this formal juxtaposition, the film “objectifies” the internal monologue of Sergio—criticizing and contextualizing his psychological subjectivism and confronting his attempts to retreat into his pre-revolutionary psychology and ways of seeing with the “fact of history” presented by the revolutionary situation.

Visually, the film’s dialectic is presented through the use of three forms of cinematic structure. Documentary and semi-documentary footage is used to depict the “collective consciousness” of the revolutionary process, a consciousness that is pre-eminently historical. This footage presents us with the background of the revolution and establishes the historical context of the film’s fictional present by placing it between the 1961 exodus in the aftermath of the failed Bay of Pigs invasion and the defensive preparations for the Missile Crisis of 1962. Fictional footage is used in two ways. The majority of the fictional sequences are presented in the traditional form of narrative cinema, in which the camera functions as omniscient narrator. However, at times the camera presents us with Sergio’s point-of-view, the way in which his consciousness realizes itself in his forms of perception—what he looks at and how he sees it. Thus, the film shows and creates an identification with what it is simultaneously criticizing. Through this juxtaposition of visual forms, and through the visual contradiction of Sergio’s reflections, the film insists that what we see is a function of how we believe, and that how we believe is what our history has made of us.

Sergio’s way of seeing was formed in pre-revolutionary Cuba. As a member of the educated elite, he developed a disdain for Cuban reality and a scorn for those who believe that it could be changed. Critical of his bourgeois family and friends (who are, however, capable of making the commitment to leave Cuba), he is nonetheless unable to overcome his alienation and link himself to the revolution. The “ultimate outsider,” he attempts to content himself by colonizing and exploiting women—a metaphor for the colonization of Cuba. His personal fate is finally and paradoxically irrelevant, for as the film ends the camera moves out from his individual vision to the larger revolution beyond.

The film “shocked” U.S. critics when released there in 1973, and they described it variously as “extremely rich,” “hugely effective,” “beautifully understated,” and “a miracle.” No “miracle” at all, but simply one of the finest examples of revolutionary Cuban cinema, Memories has also received a warm reception from Cuban audiences, some film-goers returning to see it again and again. Memories’ complex structure and dialectical texture merit such repeated viewings, for it transforms the now familiar themes of alienation and the “outsider” by placing them within a revolutionary setting. We identify with and understand Sergio, who is capable of moments of lucidity. However, we also understand that his perspective is neither universal nor timeless but a specific response to a particular situation. Memories of Underdevelopment insists that such situations are not permanent and that things can be changed through commitment and struggle. History is a concrete, material process which, ironically, is the salvation of the Sergios.

—John Mraz

MEMORIES OF UNDERDEVELOPMENT

See MEMORIAS DEL SUBDESARROLLO

MENILMONTANT

France, 1924

Director: Dimitri Kirsanoff

Production: Dimitri Kirsanoff’s production company; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 50 minutes; length: 1800 feet. Released 1924, France. Filmed in Paris.

Producer: Dimitri Kirsanoff; screenplay: Dimitri Kirsanoff; photography: Léonce Crouan (uncredited) and Dimitri Kirsanoff; editor: Dimitri Kirsanoff (uncredited).

Cast: Nadia Sibirskaia (Younger sister); Yolande Beaulieu (Elder sister); Guy Belmont (Young man); Jean Pasquier; Maurice Ronsard.

Publications

Articles:

Sitney, P.A., “The Idea of Abstraction,” in Film Culture (New York), no. 63/64, 1977.

Travelling (Lausanne), Summer 1979.

Brown, Geoff, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1981.

Prouty, Richard, “The Well-Furnished Interior of the Masses: Kirsanoff’s Menilmontant and the Streets of Paris,” in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 36, no. 1, Fall 1996.

* * *

Menilmontant, the best known and the most impressive film of the Russian émigré cellist, Dimitri Kirsanoff, takes its title from the working-class district of Paris where its drama occurs. This short film is remarkable for the honesty with which it represents seduction, jealousy, and prostitution, and, even more so, for its economical and powerful use of montage to narrate a complex story completely within intertitles.

The film opens with an unexplained axe murder, brilliantly conceived in a montage of violent details. The remainder of the film describes the life of the two daughters of the murdered couple, who both fall in love with a Parisian thug; one ends up with a baby and the other becomes a prostitute. In the final moments of the film they are reconciled and return to their first job in a sweatshop, while the thug, unbeknownst to them, is murdered in an obscure brawl, the mystery and violence of which reflect the opening murders.

A series of hand-held views of Paris, together with superimpositions, simultaneously propels the story elliptically and gives us insights into the psychology of the two girls. The first such sequence marks the abrupt transition from the country to the city, and conveys in its rhythm the excitement Paris possesses for the two new arrivals. When the sister who eventually will have a baby spends her first night with her lover, another moving camera sequence, superimposed over the other sister, vividly portrays her jealousy, and her fantasy, of her sister’s initiation into the excitements of the city. A gloomier version of the same dynamic camera movement is superimposed over the face of the young mother when she leaves the maternity ward, thinking (as the montage makes perfectly clear) of killing herself and her baby.

The final round of this stylistic trope introduces the idea of prostitution and culminates in the meeting of the two sisters.

They had become estranged when the first one to be seduced saw, from a distance, her sister also seduced by the thug. Kirsanoff brilliantly emphasizes her shock by cutting to a series of progressively closer shots of her face, in precisely the manner that he had earlier edited the scene in which she comes upon her slaughtered parents. By reserving this figure for those two scenes alone, he urges the viewer to connect the two traumas psychologically. The entire film is constructed around an elaborate network of such cinematic figures, making it one of the most interesting psychological narratives of its period.

—P. Adams Sitney

MEPHISTO

Hungary-West Germany, 1981

Director: István Szabó

Production: Mafilm-Objektiv Studio (Budapest) in cooperation with Manfred Durniok Productions (West Berlin); Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 146 minutes, some sources list 144 minutes. Released 1981. Filmed in Germany.

Producer: Manfred Durniok; screenplay: István Szabó and Péter Dobai, from the novel by Klaus Mann; photography: Lajos Koltai; editor: Zsuzsa Zsa Kany; music: Zdenkó Tamássy.

Cast: Klaus Maria Brandauer (Hendrik Höfgen); Krystyna Janda (Barbara Bruckner); Ildikó Bánsági (Nicoletta von Niebuhr); Karin Boyd (Juliette Martens); Rolf Hoppe (The General); Christine Harbort (Lotte Lindenthal); Gyögy Cserhalmi (Hans Miklas); Martin Hellberg (Professor).

Award: Oscar for Best Foreign Film.

Publications

Books:

Spangenberg, Eberhard, Karriere eines Romans: Mephisto, Klaus Mann, und Gustav Gründgens: Ein dokumentarischer Bericht aus Deutschland und dem Exil 1925–81, Munich, 1982.

Paech, Joachim, editor, Literatur und Film: Mephisto, Frankfurt, 1984.

Articles:

Szabó, István, "Mephistopheles," in Hungarofilm Bulletin (Budapest), no. 5, 1980.

Vrdlovec, Z., in Ekran (Ljubljana), no. 2, 1981.

Fenyves, G., "Leider kann man einen Film nur einmal drehen," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), March 1981.

Moskowitz, G., in Variety (New York), 18 March 1981.

New York Times, 29 September 1981.

Györfy, M., in Filmkultura (Budapest), September-October 1981.

Robinson, David, "My Homeland," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1981.

Auty, Martyn, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1981.

Frey, R., in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), November 1981.

Forbes, Jill, in Films and Filming (London), December 1981.

De Santi, G., and P. Maté, in Cineforum (Bergamo), December 1981.

Bader, K. L., in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), December 1981-January 1982.

Elley, Derek, in International Film Guide 1982, edited by Peter Cowie, London, 1982.

Edelman, Rob, in Magill's Cinema Annual, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1982.

Szabo, György, in Filmkultura (Budapest), no. 2, 1982.

Hagen, O., in Film & Kino (Oslo), 1982.

Fonda-Bonardi, C., in Cineaste (New York), 1982.

Engven, I., in Filmrutan (Stockholm), 1982.

Szabó, István, in Cinéma (Paris), January 1982.

Martin, Marcel, in Image et Son (Paris), January 1982.

Roy, J., in Cinéma (Paris), January 1982.

Schepeleyn, P., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), February 1982.

Orto, N., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), April 1982.

New Republic (New York), 7 April 1982.

New Yorker, 17 May 1982.

Seegers, R., in Skrien (Amsterdam), May-June 1982.

Szabo, G., in Filmkultura (Budapest), May-June 1982.

Heijer, J., in Skoop (Amsterdam), June 1982.

McFarlane, Brian, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), June 1982.

Hughes, J. W., interview with Istvan Szabo, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1982.

Chanko, K. M., in Films in Review (New York), June-July 1982.

Mracová, M., in Film a Doba (Prague), July 1982.

Rashish, P., in Stills (London), Winter 1982.

Chijona, G., in Cine Cubano (Havana), 1983.

Bérubé, R. C. in Séquences (Montreal), January 1983.

Seberechts, K., in Film en Televisie (Brussels), January 1983.

Rutkowski, A. M., in Filmowy Serwis Prasowy (Warsaw), 1–15 February 1983.

Zapiola, G., in Cinematca Revista (Montevideo), November 1983.

Nagy, M., in Filmkultura (Budapest), November-December 1983.

Somogyi, L., in Filmkultura (Budapest), November-December 1983.

Wanat, A., "Höfgen i Gründgens," in Kino (Warsaw), April 1984.

Eidsvik, C., "Tootsie Versus Mephisto: Characterization in a Cross-Cultural Context," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 3, 1989.

Mills, M. C., "The Three Faces of Mephisto: Film, Novel, and Reality," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1990.

Gabor, Bota, "A Fight at the Opera: Film Director Istvan Szabo," an interview, in World Press Review, vol. 41, no. 2, February 1994.

Landrot, Marine, "Les exorcistes," in Télérama (Paris), no. 2344, 14 December 1994.

Piette, Alain, "The Face in The Mirror: Faust as a Self-deceived Actor," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 26, no. 2, April 1998.

* * *

István Szabó, probably the most engagingly intelligent of the younger Hungarian filmmakers who began working after 1956, earned a reputation among serious observers of the international cinema during the 1960s—most of all for the wonderfully bright and inventive The Father (1966). More than a decade later, his Confidence (1979) was nominated for an Academy Award; an exceptional film, its subtle complexities and quiet beauty did not win either the Oscar or the wider public his work deserves. Both trophies did, however, come soon thereafter with Mephisto, the director's first major international production.

Mephisto

The idea behind Mephisto is a promising one—to explore the psyche of a chameleon-like actor living through the rise of Nazism in Germany (the filmmakers actually choose not to specify the precise time or place) and accommodating himself to the new regime in any way necessary to maintain his position and acclaim. Most promising of all is the fact that this central character is based on the life of Gustav Gründgens (1899–1963), Germany's most commanding actor, theatrical director, and impresario of his generation. (Among his film roles, Gründgens played the wily chief of the underworld in Fritz Lang's M in 1931.) The screenplay, which Szabó wrote with Péter Dobai, is based on the 1936 roman à clef, also titled Mephisto, by Klaus Mann, the son of Thomas Mann and brother of Erika, to whom Gründgens was married before she fled from Hitler's Germany. (The title is an ironic reference to the actor's celebrated role, Mephistopheles in Faust.)

In Szabó's film, the Gründgens character is named Hendrik Höfgen. There are intimations that the fictional Höfgen shares some of Gründgens's early leftist leanings as he embarks on a propitious acting career. To keep that career afloat in the mounting tide of fascism, Höfgen ingratiates himself with a powerful leader in the new regime—a proxy for Göring, whose protégé Gründgens became. And, like Gründgens, Höfgen chooses to remain in his position rather than avail himself of an opportunity to emigrate. Mephisto ends before the war, as its version of the Gründgens character begins to see himself becoming a puppet of his protectors.

The film is brilliant and enthralling, a whirlwind of color and motion that suggests its protagonist's rapid success and self-absorption. A virtuosic achievement as a succession to Szabó's finely modulated previous work, Mephisto is near-perfect within the scope of its ambition—to delineate the course of an opportunist whose life is nothing more or less than the sum of all the roles he plays. But its tone of moral indignation is all too easy, its moral crux so very familiar and predictable, and its rendering of the central figure a pat oversimplification of the unacknowledged character who inspired it. Klaus Maria

Brandauer's manic performance in the part of Höfgen, as is apt for this film, represents a self-illuminating style of acting that one esteems or rejects according to one's critical disposition toward work of its kind. Neither the role nor Brandauer's portrayal suggests whether Höfgen is a genuinely great actor (as Gründgens was) or simply an effectively truculent and narcissistic one. (The other performers are quite fine, although the many Hungarians in the cast have been dubbed into German for the film's distribution outside Hungary.)

Klaus Mann's aim was to condemn Gründgens. Szabó sought to universalize the character, "a man who considers it his only possibility in life to make people accept him." But beyond the simple figure who appears in Mephisto lies the complex and ambivalent case of Gründgens himself. Despite his tacit support for Hitler, he was cleared after the war and continued his prominence in the theatres of both West and East Germany. He was even credited with upholding artistic standards during the Third Reich (Höfgen participates in plays reinterpreted to fit fascist ideology) and with helping many who were threatened by the Nazis (Höfgen does obtain an exit visa for his lover, a black actress).

In the shadow of Stalinism, many Eastern European directors have made films set around the time of World War II, with safe, anti-Nazi topics, when current issues could not be broached. Szabó understands very well the real difficulties and ambiguities of individuals who chose to continue living and working under compromising political circumstances, and in fact his own contemporary films have frequently focused on their dilemmas with sympathy and resonance. With Mephisto and the aspiration for wide popularity, it seems he has limited his scrutiny to an extreme case and held it at a safe distance.

—Herbert Reynolds

LE MÉPRIS

(Contempt)

France, 1963

Director: Jean-Luc Godard

Production: Rome-Paris Films, Films Concordia, Embassy; Technicolor, Franscope, 35mm; running time (restored print): 105 minutes; Italian version shortened, dubbed, with new music, against the director's wishes. Filmed on location in Cinecittà (Rome) and the Villa Curzio Malaparte, Capri. Cost: $1 million (estimated).

Producers: Georges de Beauregard, Carlo Ponti, and Joseph E. Levine; screenplay: Jean-Luc Godard, from the novel Il disprezzo by Alberto Moravia; photography: Raoul Coutard; assistant director: Charles Bitsch; editors: Agnes Guillemot and Lila Lakshmanan; sound: William Sivel; music: Georges Delarue.

Cast: Brigitte Bardot (Camille Javal); Michel Piccoli (Paul Javal); Jack Palance (Jerry Prokosch); Georgia Moll (Francesca); Fritz Lang (himself); Jean-Luc Godard (assistant director).

Publications

Script:

Godard, Jean-Luc, Le Mépris (scenario), in Avant-Scène Cinéma (Paris), May-June 1992.

Books:

Interview with Jean Collet, in Jean-Luc Godard, New York, 1968.
Mussman, Tony, "Notes on Contempt," Jean-Luc Godard, New York, 1968.

Interview with Yvonne Baby, in Focus On Godard, Englewood Cliffs, 1972.

Lesage, Julia, Jean-Luc Godard: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Viminet, Pascal, Le Mépris, Jean-Luc Godard: Un film produit par Georges de Beauregard, Paris, 1991.

Lev, Peter, The Euro-American Cinema, Austin, 1993.

Marie, Michel, Le Mépris, Jean-Luc Godard: etude critique, Paris, 1995.

Dixon, Wheeler Winston, The Films of Jean-Luc Godard, New York, 1997.

Lopate, Phillip, Totally, Tenderly, Tragically: Essays and Criticism from a Lifelong Love Affair With the Movies, New York, 1998.

Silverman, Kaja, and Harun Frocki, Speaking About Godard, New York, 1998.

Articles:

MacCabe, Colin, "Le Mépris/Il disprezzo/Contempt," in Sight and Sound (London), September 1996.

Kehr, Dave, "Gods in the Details: Godard's Contempt," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1997.

Rosenbaum, Jonathan, "Critical Distance," in Chicago Reader, 5 September 1997.

* * *

Le Mépris is the closest Jean-Luc Godard has ever come to making a Hollywood-style film: international stars, relatively big budget, script based upon a "prestige" novel, glamorous locations shot in color and 'scope. Of course, it is subversive toward all of the above, and is, among other things, about the absurdities of making a Hollywood-style film. Received with a good deal of puzzlement during its initial release, it was greeted with huge critical acclaim upon its re-release in 1997.

Freely adapting Alberto Moravia's Il disprezzo (Kaja Silverman and Harun Frocki's book on Godard supplies detail), Godard tells the story of a writer (Michel Piccoli) who earns the contempt of his wife (Brigitte Bardot) when he appears to pander—in more ways than one—to an American film producer (Jack Palance). Though an aspiring "serious" writer, Paul accepts the high-paying job of dumbing down (as we would now call it) the shooting script of a film of The Odyssey being directed by the venerated Fritz Lang (playing himself), and worse yet, he seems to push his beautiful wife into the philandering producer's path. To be sure, nothing is quite so simple as it seems: the rushes we see from Lang's film are so bizarrely abstract (and unlike anything the real Lang ever directed) that one may imagine the consternation of even a less crass producer than Jerry Prokosch (Palance); and Paul's "crime" against his wife is no more tangible than his urging her to go off with Jerry in the latter's two-seater to his villa while Paul takes a cab. But Le Mépris is among other things a semiotician's delight: Lang's footage and Paul's sendoff of his wife in the sports car are signifiers of much else, not to be taken at face value.

Much of Le Mépris is structured upon contrasts of the Classical and the Modern, though what Godard means by "classical" is complex and partly unorthodox. The Modern is easier to specify: it is Jerry's vulgarity and money-lust, and Paul's neurotic psychologizing over Ulysses' motives for leaving Penelope and taking so long to get back to Ithaca. Clearly Paul projects his own confused feelings about his marriage upon the ancient narrative. If Le Mépris were an allegory, Paul and Jerry would be modern parallels for Ulysses and the Suitors; but neither of them cuts a heroic enough figure for the analogy to be much more than a joke. When Jerry hurls a can of film in a fit of anger, inadvertently looking like a discus thrower, Lang dryly remarks, "Finally you get the feel of Greek culture."

Lang, the spokesman for the Classical (as Camille is the embodiment), insists that in The Oyssey there are no hidden motives, no tortured dissembling—all is starkly forthright. Lang stands for clarity, simplicity, power allied with gracefulness, as his footage with the camera revolving around Greek statues of Poseidon and Athena suggest. In another sense of the term, Godard clearly reveres Lang as a "classic"—both as a filmmaker and as a repository of culture, someone who quotes effortlessly from Dante and Hölderlin. For that matter, American movies from Griffith to Minnelli, alluded to in dialogue and posters scattered through Le Mépris, are classics as well.

Godard evokes the Classical in a variety of other ways as well, beginning with Georges Delarue's score for the film: stark, somber passages, seemingly tragic in mood, punctuating key moments of the drama, as hieratic as the statues in Lang's footage. Equally classical are the Mediterranean vistas so hauntingly photographed in the second half of the film—sunburnt rock, splendid blue sea, cloudless or hazy sky. (Rather more eccentrically, Godard alludes to primal matters by emphasizing the primary colors red, yellow, and blue throughout the film, most abstractly in the opening nude shot of Bardot, which uses a red and a blue filter in turn, plus a yellow cloth in the unfiltered portion.) The elegantly gliding tracking shots have their own serene beauty—though Godard also uses jump cuts and other ways of disregarding continuity rules of the classical cinema. And the face and unclad body of Bardot are equally treated as classical in their stately beauty. The most famous anecdote about the shooting of Le Mépris has to do with producer Joseph E. Levine demanding that Godard insert footage of a nude Bardot, and Godard complying by opening the film with a long take of his star stretched across the full length of the Franscope screen, as if to get it over with at once. But in fact her serene nudity is completely integral to the film's representation of Bardot, including one close-up as she calmly recites a list of "dirty words" and shots of her profile in the Rome villa garden. Camille is compared to one of The Odyssey's Sirens as well as to Penelope, but rather than lure Paul she literally swims away from him near the end of the film. Finally, her siding with Lang against Paul and Jerry (she even reads a book on Lang in the bathtub) is one more way in which Camille/Bardot is aligned with the Classical. With all of this said, one must still be wary of schematizing a film that has so much of a feel of the improvisatory.

Le Mépris is also very much about the collapse of a marriage. The causes remain obscure, in the sense that the film does not present us with a neat set of reasons, Hollywood-style, for the breakdown. Indeed, Camille impatiently dismisses Paul's supposition of one cause of her anger, his desultory pass at Francesca, Jerry's assistant/translator/mistress. But signs of dissatisfaction, even perhaps clues to deeper problems, are scattered through the film. Most obvious is Paul's slapping Camille (after nastily knocking his hand upon a bronze female torso); more subtle is the sports-car incident (though viewers of today must make a cultural adjustment to a world in which husbands "give permission" to wives to be alone with other men). But most often we must draw conclusions from slight variations in tone of voice and body language. All these signs of distance, disagreement, distraction can be observed in the remarkable half-hour scene—practically the whole middle third of the film—in which the couple pace around their half-finished new apartment, arguing, taking baths in turn, flipping through a book of Roman erotic art which Jerry has given Paul to "inspire" him, reconciling and then renewing the quarrel, until Camille cries that Paul fills her with contempt (and Delarue's tragic music bursts out to accompany her). Godard's restless 'scope camera records all this mostly in long shot, often down corridors or through doorways, and most famously tracking back and forth between them as they sit separated by a lamp which Paul flips impatiently on and off.

In countless ways, Godard interrogates not just a marriage but the cinema itself. Here come into play his explicit homages to classic American filmmaking (most amusingly when Paul wears his hat in the bathtub to look like Dean Martin in Some Came Running) and at the same time his disregard of the rules of continuity editing and conventional motivation. Certain plot developments—Paul grabbing a gun but never using it, the unexpected auto crash at the end—seem more like allusions to Hollywood melodrama than integral parts of the film. Le Mépris begins with a shot of Raoul Coutard's camera tracking toward us and peering down at us as we peer up at it, while a voice reads not only the credits (as Orson Welles does at the end of The Magnificent Ambersons) but also a statement about the nature of cinema. In the last shot Lang is still shooting The Odyssey, with Godard himself now playing an assistant director shouting "Silence!" as the camera tracks past the shoot to gaze out at the empty horizon. Godard also plays games with the soundtrack: for example, when our characters talk to one another during a concert, the loud music does not just drop in volume, as convention dictates—it drops out entirely.

Godard surely realized that his big-star, widescreen spectacle of sex and power in a show-business milieu—his own version of The Bad and the Beautiful or Two Weeks in Another Town—would be far from what his producers were hoping for. If Le Mépris is an allegory in any way, it is a tale of a cinematic auteur having either to defy, pander to, or somehow trick the money-men, like Ulysses confronting not so much the Suitors as the Cyclops, while the Siren of beauty and art swims ever outward, toward the horizon.

—Joseph Milicia

MESHERS OF THE AFTERNOON

USA, 1943

Director: Maya Deren

Production: Black and white, 16mm; running time: 18 minutes, some sources list 14 minutes. Released 1943.

Screenplay: Maya Deren and Alexander Hammid; editor: Maya Deren; photography: Alexander Hammid.

Cast: Maya Deren (Woman); Alexander Hammid (Man).

Publications

Books:

Deren, Maya, An Anagram of Ideas on Art, Form, and the Film, New York, 1946.

Jacobs, Lewis, editor, Introduction to the Art of the Movies: An Anthology of Ideas on the Nature of Movie Art, New York, 1960.

Tyler, Parker, Underground Film, New York, 1969.

A History of the American Avant-Garde Cinema, New York, 1976.

Sitney, P. Adams, Visionary Film, New York, 1974; revised edition, 1979.

Clark, VeVe A., and Millicent Hodson, and Catrina Neiman, and Francine B. Price, The Legend of Maya Deren: A Documentary and Collected Works, Vol. 1, Pt. 1, New York, 1984.

Brakhage, Stan, Film at Wit's End: Eight Avant-garde Filmmakers, Kingston, 1989.

Rabinovitz, Lauren, Points of Resistance: Women, Power & Politics in the New York Avant-garde Cinema, 1943–71, Urbana, 1991.

Sudre, Alain-Alcide, Dialogues théoriques avec Maya Deren: du cinéma expérimental au film ethnographique, Paris, 1996.

Sullivan, Moira, Anagram of the Ideas of Filmmaker Maya Deren: Creative Work in Motion Pictures, Stockholm, 1997.

Rice, Shelley, Inverted Odysseys: Claude Cahun, Maya Deren, Cindy Sherman, Cambridge, 1999.

Deren, Maya, Essential Deren: Complete Film Writings, Kingston, 2000.

Articles:

Farber, Manny, "Maya Deren's Films," in New Republic (New York), 28 October 1946.

Tyler, Parker, "Experimental Film: A New Growth," in Kenyon Review (Gambier, Ohio), no. 1, 1949.

"Writings of Maya Deren and Ron Rice," in Film Culture (New York), Winter 1965.

Cornwell, Regina, "Maya Deren and Germaine Dulac: Activists of the Avant-Garde," in Film Library Quarterly (New York), vol. 5, no. 1, 1971.

Sitney, P. Adams, "The Idea of Morphology," in Film Culture (New York), nos. 53–55, 1972.

Mayer, T., "The Legend of Maya Deren: Champion of the American Independent Film," in Film News (New York), September–October 1979.

Bruno, Giuliana, and I. Cahn, "Afterimage," in Segnocinema (Vicenza), vol. 4, no. 12, March 1984.

Kuhn, Annette, "Meshes of the Afternoon," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), vol. 55, no. 653, June 1988.

Carty, Brad, "Maya Deren: Experimental Films 1943–1959," in Wilson Library Bulletin, vol. 63, no. 4, December 1988.

Ouellette, Laurie, "Maya Deren Experimental Films," in UTNE Reader, no. 48, November–December 1991.

Fabe, Marilyn, "Maya Deren's Fatal Attraction: A Psychoanalytic Reading of Mesher of the Afternoon with a Psycho-biographical Afterword," in Women's Studies, vol. 25, no. 2, January 1996.

Nekola, Charlotte, "On Not Being Maya Deren," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 18, no. 4, October 1996.

Pramaggiore, M., "Performance and Persona in the U.S. Avant-garde: The Case of Maya Deren," in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 36, no. 2, 1997.

Dilas, Vikica, "Meshing with Lynch," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 7, no. 10, October 1997.

* * *

Mesher of the Afternoon launched the American avant-garde film movement after World War II. Made in collaboration by Maya Deren and her husband Alexander Hammid, the film depicts a woman's imaginative dream and the way it eventually destroys the woman herself. The film established dream imagery and visual poetic devices as the chief type of cinematic language for a new generation of postwar filmmakers and their audiences.

The story of Mesher is this: a woman (played by Deren) enters her home and falls asleep in a chair. As she sleeps and dreams, she repeatedly encounters a mysterious hooded figure whom she chases but cannot catch. With each failure, she re-enters her house, where the household objects she employs in her waking state—a key, a knife, a flower, a phonograph, and a telephone—assume intensifying potency in an environment that becomes increasingly disoriented. Through such filmic means as creative editing, extreme camera angles, and slow motion, the movie creates a world in which it is more and more difficult for the woman to master the space and rooms around her. Finally, multiplied into three versions of herself, the woman attempts to kill her sleeping body. But she is awakened by a man (played by Hammid) only to find that physical reality, too, gives away to the dream logic of her imagination, ultimately causing her death.

Made privately in Deren's and Hammid's home over a few weeks and for a few hundred dollars, Mesher of the Afternoon revived a European cinematic tradition established in the 1920s a tradition in which Hammid participated in his native Czechoslovakia. Mesher of the Afternoon sustained and developed the cinematic style of such leading European avant-garde filmmakers of the 1920s as Germaine Dulac, Luis Buñuel, and Jean Cocteau.

Mesher is a landmark film that has provided an important model, setting the tone and style for other individual efforts over the next decade. It launched Deren's career as one of the leading avant-garde filmmakers of the 1940s and 1950s. She showed the film at colleges, museums, and film societies across Canada and the United States. Her numerous bookings encouraged many younger artists interested in a personal cinema controlled by the individual artists. The film consequently inspired poetic self-exploratory films by such other filmmakers as Kenneth Anger, Stan Brakhage, and Willard Maas.

Meshes of the Afternoon is still one of the most popular of all American experimental films. It is revered as a classic mood poem which investigates a person's psychological reality.

—Lauren Rabinovitz

METROPOLIS

Germany, 1927

Director: Fritz Lang

Production: Universum-Film-Aktiengesellschaft (Ufa) studios; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 2 hours originally, no complete master copy now exists but the Staatliches Archiv in East Berlin has compiled a new copy from all remaining footage: length 4189 meters originally, current copies are now 3170 meters. Released 10 January 1927, Berlin. Filmed 1925–26, in 310 days and 60 nights, in UFA Studios, Berlin. Cost: $2,000,000. Released in a new tinted print, with musical score by Giorgis Moroder, 1985.

Screenplay: Fritz Lang and Thea von Harbou, from the novel by von Harbou (Eisner disputes this in The Haunted Screen, 1969, claiming the film preceded the novel); photography: Karl Freund and Günther Rittau; art directors: Otto Hunte, Erich Kettelhut, and Karl Vollbrecht; music: Gottfried Huppertz; special effects: Eugene Schufftan; costume designer: Anne Willkomm; sculptures: Walter Schultze-Mittendorff.

Cast: Brigitte Helm (Maria/the Mechanical Maria); Alfred Abel (John Fredersen); Gustav Fröhlich (Freder); Rudolf Klein-Rogge (Rotwang); Fritz Rasp (Slim); Theodor Loos (Josaphat/Joseph); Heinrich George (Grot, the foreman); Olaf Storm (Jan); Hanns Leo Reich (Marinus); Heinrich Gotho (Master of Ceremonies); Margarete Lanner (Woman in the car); Max Dietze, Georg John, Walter Kühle, Arthur Reinhard, and Erwin Vater (Workers); Grete Berger, Olly Böheim, Ellen Frey, Lisa Gray, Rose Lichtenstein, and Helene Weigel (Female workers); Beatrice Garga, Anny Hintze, Margarete Lanner, Helen von Münchhofen, and Hilde Woitscheff (Women in the Eternal Garden); Fritz Alberti (Robot); 750 secondary actors; and over 30,000 extras.

Publications

Script:

Lang, Fritz, and Thea von Harbou, Metropolis, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 December 1977.

Books:

Rotha, Paul, The Film Till Now, London, 1930.

Kalbus, Oskar, Vom Werden deutscher Filmkunst, Part I: Der Stummfilm, Altona, 1935.

Holl, W., Gustav Fröhlich, Künstler und Mensch, Berlin, 1936.

Koch, H., Heinrich George, Berlin, 1940.

Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1947.

Frews, Berta, Heinrich George, Hamburg, 1959.

Courtade, Francis, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.

Moulet, Luc, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.

Rhode, Eric, Tower of Babel, London, 1966.

Agel, Henri, Les Grands Cinéastes que je propose, Paris, 1967.

Durnat, Raymond, Films and Feelings, London, 1967.

Jensen, Paul, The Cinema of Fritz Lang, New York, 1969.

Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, 1969.

Mitry, Jean, Histoire du cinéma: Art et industrie, vol. 3, 1923–30, Paris, 1973.

Berger, Erich M., Heinrich George in Film seiner Zeit, Wiesbaden, 1975.

Grafe, Frieda, Enno Patalas, and Hans Helmut Prinzler, Fritz Lang, Munich, 1976.

Eisner, Lotte, Fritz Lang, London, 1977.

Armour, Robert, Fritz Lang, Boston, 1978.

Ott, Frederick W., The Films of Fritz Lang, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1979.

Jenkins, Stephen, editor, Fritz Lang: The Image and the Look, London, 1981.

Kaplan, E. Ann, Fritz Lang: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1981.

Maibohm, Ludwig, Fritz Lang: Seine Filme—Sein Leben, Munich, 1981.

Dürrenmatt, Dieter, Fritz Lang: Leben und Werk, Basel, 1982.

Keiner, Weinhild, Thea von Harbou und der deutsche Film bis 1933, Hildesheim, 1984.

von Harbour, Horst, and Claude-Jean Philippe, Metropolis: Un Film de Fritz Lang: Images d'un tournage, Paris, 1985.

Gehler, Fred, Fritz Lang, die Stimme von Metropolis, Berlin, 1990.

Bogdanovich, Peter, Who the Devil Made It: Conversations with Robert Aldrich, George Cukor, Allan Dwan, Howard Hawks, Alfred Hitchcock, Chuck Jones, Fritz Lang, Joseph H. Lewis, Sidney Lumet, Leo McCarey, Otto Preminger, Don Siegel, Josef von Sternberg, Frank Tashlin, Edgar G. Ulmer, Raoul Walsh, New York, 1997.

Levin, David J., Richard Wagner, Fritz Lang, and the Nibelungen: The Dramaturgy of Disavowal, Princeton, 1998.

McGilligan, Patrick, Fritz Lang: The Nature of the Beast, New York, 1998.

Gunning, Tom, The Films of Fritz Lang: Modernity, Crime, and Desire, London, 2000.

Minden, Michael, and Holger Bachmann, editors, Fritz Lang's "Metropolis": Cinematic Views of Technology and Fear, Rochester, 2000.

Articles:

Lang, Fritz, "Was ich noch zu sagen habe," in Mein Film, edited by Frederick Proges, Vienna, 1927.

"Metropolis Film Seen: Berlin Witnesses a Grim Portrayal of Industrial Future," in New York Times, 10 January 1927.

Hildebrandt, Fred, in Berliner Tageblatt, 11 January 1927.

Eggebrecht, Axel, in Weltbühne (Berlin), 18 January 1927.

Metropolis

- Arnheim, Rudolf, in Stachelschwein, 1 February 1927.
 Gerstein, Evelyn, in Nation (New York), 23 March 1927.
 Barry, Iris, in Spectator (London), 26 March 1927.
 Wells, H. G., in New York Times, 17 April 1927.
 Herring, Robert, in London Mercury, May 1927.
 "Metropolis Issue" of Petite Illustration (Paris), no. 372, 1928.
 "Metropolis Issue" of Cinéma (Paris), March 1928.
 Eisner, Lotte, "Notes sur le style de Fritz Lang," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), 1 February 1947.
 Gesek, Ludwig, "Fritz Lang: Suggestion und Stimmung," in Gestalter der Filmkunst, Von Asta Nielsen bis Walt Disney, Vienna, 1948.
 Douchet, Jean, "L'Oeuvre de Fritz Lang à la cinémathèque: Le Piège considéré comme l'un des beaux-arts," in Arts (Paris), 1 July 1959.
 Domarchi, Jean, and Jacques Rivette, "Entretien avec Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1959.
 Franju, Georges, "Le Style de Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1959.
 Luft, Herbert, "Erich Pommer," in Films in Review (New York), November 1959.
 Luft, Herbert, "Karl Freund," in Films in Review (New York), February 1963.
 Sarris, Andrew, "Fritz Lang," in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.
 Schütte, Wolfram, "Kolportage, Stilisierung, Realismus: Anmerkungen zum Werk Fritz Langs," in Filmstudio (Frankfurt), September 1964.
 Berg, Gretchen, "La Nuit viennoise: Une Confession de Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August 1965 and June 1966.
 Pieyre de Mandiargues, André, "L'Ecran démoniaque," in Cinéma (Paris), no. 100, 1966.
 Jensen, Paul, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1968.
 Bunuel, Luis, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August-September 1971.
 Williams, Alan, "Structures of Narrativity in Fritz Lang's Metropolis," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1974.
 Phillips, Gene D., "Fritz Lang: An Interview," in Focus on Film (London), 1975.
 Tulloch, John, "Genetic Structuralism and the Cinema: A Look at Fritz Lang's Metropolis," in Australian Journal of Screen Theory (Kensington, New South Wales), no. 1, 1976.
 Boost, C., in Skoop (Amsterdam), March 1976.
 Basset, V., and D. Sotiaux, in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), June 1977.

- Roth, Lane, "Metropolis: The Lights Fantastic: Semiotic Analysis of Lighting Codes in Relation to Character and Theme," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Fall 1978.
- Willis, Don, "Fritz Lang: Only Melodrama," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1979–80.
- Mellenkamp, P., "Oedipus and the Robot in Metropolis," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Spring 1981.
- Posthumus, P., in Skrien (Amsterdam), Summer 1982.
- Beylie, Claude, in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1984.
- Sauvaget, D., "Metropolis: Rencontre Kitsch," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), September 1984.
- Rotondi, C. J., and E. Gerstein, in Films in Review (New York), October 1984.
- Cieutat, B., "Fritz Lang 'Morodernise'; ou, L'Art du détournement: Metropolis," in Positif (Paris), November 1984.
- Elsaesser, Thomas, "Innocence Restored," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), December 1984.
- Patalas, E., in Filmkultura (Budapest), March 1986.
- Esser, M., "Rooms of Felicity," in Filmbulletin (Winterthur, Switzerland), no. 5, 1990.
- Hogue, Peter, "Fritz Lang: Our Contemporary: 100th Anniversary of the Birth of the Noted Film Director," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 26, no. 6, November-December 1990.
- Cieutat, B., "Le symbolisme des figures géométriques dans Metropolis," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1991.
- Zagula, J.T., "Saints, Sinners and Society: Images of Women in Film and Drama from Weimar to Hitler," in Women's Studies, vol. 19, no. 1, 1991.
- Owens, N., "Image and Object: Hegel, Madonna, Metropolis," in Spectator (Los Angeles), vol. 12, no. 2, 1992.
- Rolfe, Hilda, "The Perfectionist: Film Director Fritz Lang," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 28, no. 6, November-December 1992.
- Joselit, D., "Marcel Duchamp's 'Monte Carlo Bond' Machine," in October, no. 59, Winter 1992.
- Rutsky, R.L., "The Mediation of Technology and Gender: Metropolis, Nazism, Modernism," in New German Critique, no. 60, Fall 1993.
- Génin, Bernard, "Metropolis," in Télérama (Paris), no. 2354, 22 February 1995.
- Bertellini, Giorgio, "Restoration, Genealogy and Palimpsests: On Some Historiographical Questions," in Film History (London), vol. 7, no. 3, Autumn 1995.
- Dolgenos, Peter, "The Star on C.A. Rotwang's Door: Turning Kracauer on its Head: An Analysis of Fritz Lang's Film, the Metropolis," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 25, no. 2, Summer 1997.
- Elsaesser, Thomas, "Fritz Lang: The Illusion of Mastery," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 10, no. 1, January 2000.

* * *

The year 1927 witnessed the appearance in Germany of the most significant utopian film of the silent era—Metropolis. In the film, director Fritz Lang achieves the realization of his ideas about the possible future organization of society. The introductory sequences present this social organization in a very attractive light. In a magnificent, gigantic city with gleaming skyscrapers, suspension bridges, and bustling street, people live in comfort and plenty, with every possibility for intellectual and physical development. However, Metropolis is not a city of freedom and equality. Below ground, working for the chosen elite, are masses of nameless workers who have no more value within the social order than a cog in a machine or a tool or production. It is for this reason that the workers revolt and almost destroy the city; only then is there a reconciliation and an equalization of rights for the two strata, the elite and the workers. Lang honestly believed in this idea of reconciliation, and his attitude to a certain extent reflected the German reality, in which there were growing indications of stabilization and attempts to resolve social problems. But Lang's views on these questions, conveyed finally in the reconciliation of the two classes under the slogan "the heart must serve as intermediary between the brain and the hands," did not sound convincingly progressive, either when the film was made or in the years that followed. Lang himself acknowledged this when, after the Nazi Putsch, Propaganda Minister Goebbels had him summoned: "(Goebbels) told me that years before, he and Hitler had seen my film Metropolis in some small town and that at that time Hitler declared that he would like me to make Nazi films." (Siegfried Kracauer: From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film.)

In the 1920s Lang was strongly influenced by Expressionist film, particularly its artistic forms. Originally an architect, Lang was a man of unusually sensitive visual perceptions. His films of those years show an expressionistic sense for the plastic and the lighting, which emphasized architectonic lines and conveyed a sense of geometric construction that not only extends to the sets and the depicted milieu but even influenced the positioning of the actors in individual shots. In Metropolis the artistic techniques of expressionism were more in evidence than in Lang's previous films, which were temporally closer to the greatest blossoming of that movement in the cinema. In keeping with the conventions of expressionism, the inhabitants of the subterranean city have no individuality, and the crowd represents a compact mass from which personality projects only as a stark exception and only in a definite rhythm. Extreme stylization is used in scenes depicting the alternation of work shifts. Lang also shapes space with the help of human bodies and uses light in accordance with the principles of expressionism. Sometimes he uses light so intensively that it takes the place of sound; for example, reflectors replace a siren with light functioning as an outcry. The pictorial formulation also reflects the antagonism between the ideas in the film. A salient example is the contrast between the supermodern metropolis of the future and the house of the scientist Rotwang, the spiritual creator of Metropolis. His dwelling in the shadows of the skyscrapers belongs more to the age when alchemists attempted to discover the philosophers' stone and the elixir of life, and the clay figure of the Golem roamed the streets. Also in his appearance and behavior, Rotwang does not fit the stereotype of a modern scientist, and there are indications that he may be in league with the devil.

Metropolis inaugurated a series of utopias on film that attempted to resolve the difficulties of the contemporary state of society by projecting them into a story with a futuristic setting. The film was preceded by a large public relations campaign which stressed the grandiose nature of what was at the time a super-production by detailing and enumerating all the costs of production and the individual components (how many costumes were used in the film, how many wigs, how many extras, etc.). The premiere took place in an atmosphere of great expectation. However, the reactions of contemporary critics and reviews show that the film was, to some extent, a disappointment. There were great reservations about the plot and content, and the script by Lang's wife, Thea von Harbou, came under sharp attack. H. G. Wells, the well-known English writer of science fiction novels, criticized the film in unusually harsh terms.

Despite the reservations about the film voiced by its contemporaries and by other generations, it cannot be denied that the story of Metropolis is told in refined cinematic language. On this point even some critics of the 1920s agree. With the passage of time it has become possible to ascertain the film's contribution and its influence on the development of filmmaking. The film contained a number of technical innovations and influenced, for example, the narrative Hollywood films of the 1930s and 1940s. From the standpoint of film as visual art, one could cite sequences which remain to the present day examples of the potential of the film image to generate meaning. Metropolis particularly influenced the development of the science fiction genre. German expressionism brought new codes of artistic expression to the whole current of fantasy—uneven lines, contrasts of light and dark, half-shadows and silhouettes—which serve to suggest mysterious and menacing actions, events, and emotions. Lang applied these techniques effectively and successfully to one of the varieties of the fantasy genre—the utopian work (in modern terminology, science fiction). Some of these elements were still used in the science fiction genre when the rest of the cinema was no longer influenced by expressionism. The amorphous mass or the nameless crowd, as depicted by Lang, found its continuation in anti-utopian films of the postwar years. The wondrous atmosphere of the scene in which Rotwang brings a robot to life is encountered in a number of subsequent science fiction films, especially those that border on horror, as in The Bride of Frankenstein. Of course, Lang's robot, with its glittering female body, stylized breasts and inhuman mask instead of a face, is unsurpassed in its artistic beauty. The personality of the scientist Rotwang belongs to one of the most interesting antagonists of the screen. The possibility of an ambivalent interpretation of his character—he is a scientist, but also something of a sorcerer allied with satanic forces—gives him greater complexity. This character type recurs in films of the 1930s and 1940s (Son of Frankenstein) and continues without major changes into the most recent science fiction films, as well as into numerous horror and fantasy films.

Diverse audience response to the film's premiere influenced its fate in later years. For its time, Metropolis was a lengthy work. Its partial failure resulted in its release often with modifications, cuts, and abridgements. In the 1970s the film archive of the German Democratic Republic in Berlin undertook a reconstruction of the film; the work was completed in 1981 with the collaboration of several member archives of the International Federation of Film Archives (F.I.A.F.) and other film collectors. The result was an approximation of Lang's original version.

—B. Urgosíková

THE MIDDLEMAN

See JANA ARANYA

MIDNIGHT COWBOY

USA, 1969

Director: John Schlesinger

Production: Jerome Hellman Productions; DeLuxe colour, 35mm; running time: 113 minutes. Filmed in New York, 1968.

Producer: Jerome Hellman; screenplay: Waldo Salt, based on the novel by James Leo Herlihy; photography: Adam Holender; editor: Hugh A. Robertson; assistant director: Michael Childers; production design: John R. Lloyd; music: John Barry; sound: Jack Fizstephens, Vincent Connelly.

Cast: Jon Voight (Joe Buck); Dustin Hoffman (Ratso Rizzo); Sylvia Miles (Cass); Brenda Vaccaro (Shirley); John McGiver (Mr. O'Daniel); Bernard Hughes (Towny); Ruth White (Sally Buck); Jennifer Salt (Annie).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Director, and Best Adapted Screenplay, 1969.

Midnight Cowboy

Publications

Books:

- Marcus, F. H., editor, Film and Literature: contrasts in media, New York, 1971.
- Brooker, Nancy J., editor, John Schlesinger: A Guide to References & Resources, London, 1978.
- Phillips, Gene D., John Schlesinger, Boston, 1981.
- Kagan, Norman, Greenhorns: Foreign filmmakers interpret America, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.
- Brode, Douglas, The Films of Dustin Hoffman, Secaucus, 1988.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 14 May 1969.
- Dawson, J., Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1969.
- Gow, Gordon, Films and Filming (London), October 1969.
- Wilson, D., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1970.
- Fiore, R.L., "The Picaresque Tradition in Midnight Cowboy," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1975.
- Raman, N.K., "Individualism and the Pseudo-Epic Sensibility," in Deep Focus (Bangalore), vol. 3, no. 2, 1990.
- Spotnitz, Frank, "John Schlesinger: A Director with a Blueprint and a 'Pincher' of Ideas," in American Film, vol. 16, no. 1, January 1991.
- Moon, M., "Outlaw Sex and the 'Search for America': Representing Male Prostitution and Perverse Desire in Sixties Film (My Hustler and Midnight Cowboy)," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (Reading), vol. 15, no. 1, November 1993.
- Porton, Richard, and Lee Ellickson, "Reflections of an Englishman Abroad," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 4, 1994.
- "John Schlesinger, Joe Buck and Ratso," in New Yorker, vol. 70, no. 2, 28 February 1994.
- Kort, Michele, "After 'Midnight,'" in The Advocate, no. 651, 22 March 1994.
- Biskind, P., "The Other Side of 'Midnight,'" in Premiere (New York), vol. 7, April 1994.
- Daly, Steve, "Midnight Cowboy: Everybody's Still Talkin' about It," Entertainment Weekly (New York), March 1995.
- Berg, J., "Midnight Cowboy 25th Anniversary Edition," in Film Threat (Beverly Hills), no. 21, April 1995.
- Nocenti, A., "My Father, Waldo Salt," "Directing Midnight Cowboy," and "Producing Midnight Cowboy," in Scenario (Rockville), vol. 3, no. 4, 1997.
- Salt, W., in Scenario (Rockville), vol. 3, no. 4, 1997.
- Price, Victoria, "A Life on the Edge," in The Advocate, 28 March 2000.

* * *

John Schlesinger wanted to make a film of James Leo Herlihy's 1965 novel Midnight Cowboy soon after it was published. When he suggested the project to United Artists, however, he found that a reader in their story department had already submitted an unfavourable report on the book. The reader said that the action of the novel went steadily downhill from the outset, and had recommended that the company not acquire the film rights. Schlesinger, on the other hand, saw dramatic possibilities in the story of a Texan named Joe Buck, who comes to New York with illusions that he can make easy money as a male companion to wealthy women. United Artists eventually decided to let him make Midnight Cowboy (1969), and the film won Academy Awards for best director, best adapted screenplay, and best film; and was a huge financial success in both America and England.

Joe (Jon Voight) is himself taken advantage of repeatedly by the assortment of tough and desperate individuals he encounters in the course of his descent into the netherworld of New York's slums, and at one point it looks as if he will become as ruthless as the rest. However, he makes a friend of Ratso Rizzo (Dustin Hoffman), a repulsive-looking bum who needs companionship as much as Joe does; and the two take refuge in each other's friendship. Their relationship is not homosexual; rather, as Schlesinger pointed out to this writer, the story shows "how two men can have a meaningful relationship without being homosexual." The film is faithful to the novel from which it is derived, but Schlesinger and screenwriter Waldo Salt exercised some degree of freedom in adapting it to the screen. The first third of the novel, dealing with Joe's lonely youth, is compressed into a few fragmented flashbacks, as he makes his way cross-country by bus. These flashbacks indicate how unsuccessful Joe's search for friendship and love has been up to this point and explain why Ratso is fulfilling a need in Joe's emotional life.

There is an interesting religious dimension that becomes apparent in the film when one examines it in-depth. While Joe travels cross-country on his way to New York, his Bible-belt religious formation is sketched for us as he listens to a faith healer preaching on the radio and notices through the bus window the words "Jesus Saves" painted on the roof of an abandoned shed. Once in New York Joe meets a Mr. O'Daniel (John McGiver), a religious fanatic who tries to force Joe to pray with him before a garish statue of Christ that flashes on and off like a neon sign. As Joe escapes from Mr. O'Daniel's shabby hotel room, Schlesinger intercuts shots of Joe's boyhood baptism in a river. Though Joe's religious experiences have not always been pleasant, there is inbred in him a need for some kind of religious belief to give meaning and purpose to his life. Significantly, the only friend that Joe makes in New York is Ratso, an Italian Catholic from the Bronx, who sleeps in the condemned tenement they share with a picture of Christ hanging over his bed. Small church candles provide illumination at night because the electric power has long since been shut off. These and other religious references in the film have a cumulative effect on the viewer. "Is God dead?" a bishop asks rhetorically in a TV sermon. One might be tempted to answer "yes"—at least in the corrupt world in which Joe finds himself among the low life of New York's slums. Yet these isolated reminders of religion, which Joe encounters throughout the film, are like so many souvenirs of a faith that he has somehow mislaid, but which he has never completely abandoned hope of finding again. It is true that Joe does not have his faith in God strengthened in any explicit way in the picture but through his friendship with Ratso, he does have his faith in mankind restored; and that in itself is significant.

As their various money-making schemes fail ludicrously, Joe and Ratso begin to care about each other's welfare—something that has never happened to either of them before. Joe literally sells his blood for money in order to buy medicine for his tubercular friend. Joe and Ratso are like two orphans in a storm, huddling together for safety. More than once they are photographed through a fence, implying that they are imprisoned together in a cruel and indifferent world and must stick together for survival. It is all the more poignant, therefore, when Joe and Ratso both begin to realize that Ratso's illness is fatal and that he is never going to recover. Frantically, Joe steals money to take Ratso to Florida before he dies, since they have both looked forward to going there as a kind of retreat to a benign earthly paradise, however Ratso dies aboard the bus just before they reach their destination. Joe, tears in his eyes, puts his arm around Ratso in the only overt gesture of affection in the film. The ending, nonetheless, is not pessimistic. Having experienced the friendship denied him in youth, Joe is ready to embark on a more mature way of life; his adolescent illusions about the easy life are now shattered.

Schlesinger says that he tried to breathe into the film “the mixture of desperation and humour” which he found all along Forty-second Street in New York while filming there, and in fact he does. It is noteworthy that a British director could bring such an authentic sense of realism to a film made in what for him is a foreign country. He has captured the atmosphere of New York, Miami Beach, and the Texas Pandhandle in Midnight Cowboy as surely as he captured the atmosphere of his native England in films like Sunday, Bloody Sunday.

—Gene D. Phillips

MIDNIGHT EXPRESS

UK, 1978

Director: Alan Parker

Production: Casablanca Film Works, for Columbia; Eastmancolor, 35mm; running time: 123 minutes.

Producers: David Puttnam, Alan Marshall; screenplay: Oliver Stone, based on the novel by Billy Hayes and William Hoffner; photography: Michael Seresin; editor: Gerry Hambling; assistant directors: Ray Corbett, David Wimbury, Kieron Phipps; production design: Geoffrey Kirkland; art director: Evan Hercules; music: Giorgio Moroder; sound editor: Rusty Coppleman; sound recording: Clive Winter; costumes: Milena Canonero.

Cast: Brad Davis (Billy Hayes); Randy Quaid (Jimmy Booth); John Hurt (Max); Irene Miracle (Susan); Bo Hopkins (Tex); Paolo Bonaccelli (Rifki); Paul Smith (Hamidou); Norbert Weisser (Erich); Mike Kellin (Mr. Hayes).

Awards: Oscars for Best Adapted Screenplay, and Best Score, 1978.

Publications

Books:

Hayes, Billy and William Hoffer, Midnight Express, New York, 1977.
Hacker, Jonathan, and David Price, Take 10—Contemporary British Directors, Oxford 1991.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 24 May 1978.
Gourdon, G., Cinématographe (Paris), June 1978.
Pym, J., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1978.
Maupin, F., Image et Son (Paris), September 1978.

Gastellier, F., Jeune Cinéma (Paris), October 1978.
Ansen, David, “Turkey Hash,” in Newsweek (New York), 16 October 1978.
Schickel, Richard, “Ugly Trips,” in Time (New York), 16 October 1978.
Magny, J., Cinéma (Paris), November 1978.
Nordlinger, N., “The Making of Midnight Express,” in Filmmakers Monthly (London), November 1978.
Hodenfield, Chris and Angela Gaudio, “The Man Who Got Away,” in Rolling Stone (New York), 30 November 1978.
Biskind, P., Cineaste (New York), Winter 1978–79.
Beaulieu, J., Séquences (Montreal), January 1979.
“Alan Parker: Director of Midnight Express and Angel Heart,” an interview, in American Film (Washington, D.C.), January/February 1988.
“Michael Apted and Alan Parker,” an interview, in American Film, vol. 15, no. 12, September 1990.
Basutcu, M., “The Power and the Danger of the Image,” in Cinemaya (New Delhi), no. 17/18, Autumn/Winter 1992/1993.
“Parker, Alan,” in Current Biography, vol. 55, no. 3, March 1994.

* * *

British director Alan Parker told American Film in 1988, “It’s not my job to make you comfortable in the cinema.” He was referring to several films in his body of work like Shoot the Moon and Birdy, but none was more uncomfortable and disturbing than Midnight Express (1978), a film based on the real-life story of Billy Hayes, a 23-year-old American who spent five long, agonizing years in a Turkish prison for attempting to smuggle two kilos of hashish on his way home to the USA in 1970.

Midnight Express could have been a garden variety prison picture, except for several interesting plot twists—not all factual—that place it above most films in the genre. First, there was the painful revelation that Americans, ignorant of justice systems abroad, can find themselves in trouble, with the US Government and/or its representatives often times powerless to help. As the real-life Hayes toured the college lecture circuit, according to Rolling Stone, he “found the same stunning ignorance of international law among college students all over.” He confessed, “I was an idiot, and there are more just like me who got the brunt of it. The rich, powerful heroin dealers never got caught. Once I got through customs I thought, ‘You clever son of a bitch, you really did it.’” But he didn’t.

Secondly, there was the hellish nature of Sagmalcilar, the Turkish prison itself, a damp, decaying, rat-infested medieval dungeon where beatings and torture were routine for even the slightest infractions. Parker’s portrayal of the Turkish people and the prison system drew harsh criticism, causing the director to lament years later, “Yes. . . there wasn’t a pleasant Turk in it. Looking back, I think that I was possibly politically naïve in that respect. I was so concentrated, so determined to make a film about what I thought was an unjust, unfair prison system—which just happened to be in Turkey.” Hayes, however, was less sympathetic to the outcries: “If they don’t like it, they should do something about the system, not the film. You are not seeing the Turkish people, you’re seeing the lowest stratum of society, it’s prisons. It’s like seeing Short Eyes and saying it’s a brutal picture of American life.”

Midnight Express

Thirdly, there was the injustice of Billy's sentence. Originally given four years, his sentence was appealed by the prosecutor to a higher court in Ankara in order to make him a political example, since President Nixon had been putting pressure on the Turkish government to curb poppy production by some 200,000 Turkish farmers. The result was that Billy's sentence was changed to life imprisonment with the possibility of parole in 30 years.

Finally, there was the revelation of Hayes' homosexual relationship with a Swedish inmate, prompting reviewer Richard Shickel of Newsweek to remark, "From the first gorgeously modeled shot of Billy stripped before his captors to the hazy sequence of him and a friend doing yoga exercises behind bars (so reminiscent of the nude wrestling scene in Women in Love), to the final farewell kiss Billy bestows on yet another male before his escape, we are in the possession of perverse romanticism, or should one say romantic perversity?"

Much of the criticism surrounding the actual versus fictional events of Midnight Express can be traced to the often problematic adaptation of novels into film, as Chris Hodenfield of Rolling Stone noted, "Hayes' book is about struggle. The movie focuses on decay." Newcomer Oliver Stone (who would go on to become one of the more controversial directors of the 1980s with such films as Platoon, Born on the Fourth of July, JFK, and Natural Born Killers) penned the adaptation of Midnight Express, taking a number of liberties with the novel apparently for the purpose of enhancing the film's violent assault on the senses, while at the same time turning the film into a "statement film" on human rights abuses abroad: (1) In real life, Billy slipped into the airport quite confidently, but the movie depicts him as sweating profusely as he passes nervously through customs and just before the two kilos of hashish taped to his body are found by the Turkish military looking for weapons or bombs carried by would-be hijackers; (2) the fictitious speech Billy delivers to the Turkish court was denounced by reviewer David Ansen of Newsweek when he wrote, "Especially disturbing is the film's eagerness to arouse the worst xenophobic fantasies: scriptwriter Oliver Stone even invents an impassioned speech in which Billy denounces the Turks as pigs"; (3) Billy never murdered anyone in prison, much less his prison keeper, the brutal Hamidou, to escape to freedom; the man was actually gunned down in a café by a former Turkish inmate at Sagmalcilar prison; (4) the Billy Hayes that actor Brad Davis portrays in the film is the total opposite of the real Mr. Hayes in both looks and in his spectacularly violent actions—like ripping out the tongue of fellow inmate Rifki (a Turkish prisoner who rats on Billy's friend Max) with his own teeth; in real life this incident never happened. The downplaying of factual events, such as the relationship between Billy and the Swedish inmate, Erich, was apparently a conscious decision to make the sexual aspect of the story much more palpable and digestible for general audiences. To dismiss it completely would have been a violation of the material. To integrate it more fully might have undermined the film's hero in the eyes of the movie-going public. Even so, Hayes was quick to remark to the press: "Columbia [Pictures] is going to hate me, but I think it's the only cop-out in the movie." The manufactured scenes designed to bolster the action and the violence tend to undermine the film's credibility in the long term, but obviously added to the film's overall impact. The real Mr. Hayes had the option of taking his name off the film's credits if he didn't like it, but admitted to Rolling Stone, "I loved the movie. I don't want to hear about gratuitous violence. It was tokenism next to Sagmalcilar prison." But Hodenfield notes in his Rolling Stone review, Hayes' novel makes for "a fine yarn, natural for the movies," giving pause to wonder if any of the invented scenes were necessary at all to enhance the story.

Despite criticisms Midnight Express stands out as one of the most remarkable thrillers in the 1970s, and certainly one of the more memorable prison pictures ever filmed. At the time of its release in 1978, approximately 330 Americans were still sitting in foreign prisons on drug related charges. If the film had any social impact at all, it helped to wise up an entire society—one that had become, by the late 1970s, fairly comfortable with recreational drug use—about the consequences of drug involvement abroad.

—Donald R. Mott

MILDRED PIERCE

USA, 1945

Director: Michael Curtiz

Production: Warner Bros.; black and white; running time: 110 minutes. Released October 1945.

Producer: Jerry Wald; screenplay: Ranald Macdougall and Catherine Turney, from the novel by James M. Cain; photography: Ernest Haller; editor: David Weisbart; art director: Anton Grot; special effects: Willard Van Enger; music: Max Steiner.

Cast: Joan Crawford (Mildred Pierce); Jack Carson (Wally); Zachary Scott (Monty Beragon); Eve Arden (Ida); Bruce Bennett (Bert Pierce); Ann Blyth (Veda Pierce); Jo Ann Marlowe (Kay Pierce); Mannart Kippen (Dr. Gale); Lee Patrick (Mrs. Biederhof); Moroni Olsen (Inspector Peterson); Barbara Brown (Mrs. Forrester); Charles Trowbridge (Mr. Williams); John Compton (Ted Forrester); Butterfly McQueen (Lottie); Chester Clute (Mr. Jones).

Award: Oscar for Best Actress (Crawford), 1945.

Publications

Script:

Macdougall, Ranald, and Catherine Turney, Mildred Pierce, edited by Albert J. La Valley, Madison, Wisconsin, 1980.

Books:

Tyler, Parker, Magic and Myth of the Movies, New York, 1947.

Quirk, Lawrence J., The Films of Joan Crawford, New York, 1968; Secaucus, 1988.

Canham, Kingsley, Michael Curtiz, Raoul Walsh, Henry Hathaway, London, 1973.

Harvey, Stephen, Joan Crawford, New York, 1974.

Thomas, Bob, Joan Crawford: A Biography, New York, 1978.

Crawford, Christina, Mommie Dearest, New York, 1978; London, 1979.

Kaplan, E. Ann, editor, Women in Film Noir, London, 1978; revised edition, 1980.

Rosenzweig, Sidney, "Casablanca" and Other Major Films of Michael Curtiz, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.

Walker, Alexander, Joan Crawford: The Ultimate Star, London and New York, 1983.

Walsh, Andrea S., Women's Films and Female Experience, New York, 1984.

Arden, Eve, Three Phases of Eve: An Autobiography, New York, 1985.

Kinnard, Roy, and R. J. Vitone, The American Films of Michael Curtiz, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1986.

Gledhill, Christine, editor, Home Is Where the Heart Is: Studies in Melodrama and the Woman's Film, London, 1987.

Robertson, James C., The Casablanca Man: The Career of Michael Curtiz, New York, 1993.

Guiles, Fred L., Joan Crawford: The Last Word, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1995.

Articles:

New York Times, 29 September 1945.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1946.

Kine Weekly (London), 14 March 1946.

Times (London), 29 April 1946.

Quirk, Lawrence J., "Joan Crawford," in Films in Review (New York), January 1965.

Nolan, Jack Edmund, "Michael Curtiz," in Films in Review (New York), no. 9, 1970.

David, John, "The Tragedy of Mildred Pierce," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Fall 1972.

Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Summer 1976.

Nelson, Joyce, "Mildred Pierce Reconsidered," in Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), January 1977.

Gorbman, C., "The Drama's Melos: Max Steiner and Mildred Pierce," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), no. 19, 1982.

Mildred Pierce

Film Reader (Evanston, Illinois), no. 5, 1982.

Krutnik, Frank, "Desire, Transgression, and James M. Cain," in Screen (London), May-June 1982.

Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 11, no. 1, 1983.

Historical Journal of Film, Radio, and Television (Abingdon, Oxfordshire), vol. 3, no. 1, 1983.

Waymark, Peter, in Times (London), 11 August 1984.

Roodnat, J. "Femme fatale: Maar niet heus," in Skoop (Amsterdam), November 1984.

Ward, L.E., "The Great Films: Mildred Pierce," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 119, May 1985.

Telotte, J.P., "A Consuming Passion: Food and Film Noir," in Georgia Review, vol. 39, no. 2, 1985.

Buller, R., "James M. Cain: The Hollywood Years (1944–1946)," in Hollywood Studio Magazine (Studio City), vol. 18, no. 11, 1985.

Rivera, A., "The Ideological Function of Genres in Mildred Pierce," in Imágenes (Hato Rey), vol. 3, no. 1, 1987.

Schegan, N., "Missing Mothers/Desiring Daughters: Framing the Sight of Women," in Critical Inquiry, vol. 15, no. 1, 1988.

Robertson, P., "Structural Irony in Mildred Pierce, or How Mildred Lost Her Tongue," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), no. 1, 1990.

Hollinger, K., "Listening to the Female Voice in the Woman's Film," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 3, 1992.

Haralovich, M. B., "Too Much Guilt Is Never Enough for Working Mothers: Joan Crawford, Mildred Pierce, and Mommie Dearest," in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Spring 1992.

Seville, J., "The Laser's Edge: James M. Cain and Film Noir," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 210, December 1992.

Weiss, J., "Feminist Film Theory and Women's History: Mildred Pierce and the Twentieth Century," in Film & History, vol. 22, no. 3, 1992.

Boozler, J., Jr., "Entrepreneurs and 'Family Values' in the Postwar Film," in Florida State University Conference on Literature and Film, vol. 18, 1993.

Fox-Genovese, Elizabeth, "Mixed Messages: Women and the Impact of World War II," in Southern Humanities Review, vol. 27, no. 3, Summer 1993.

Williams, L., and G. Vencendeau, "Mildred Pierce, la Seconde Guerre mondiale et la théorie féministe du cinéma," in Cinémaction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), no. 2, 1993.

Phelps, D., "Gros Garçon," in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1993.

Hindes, Andrew, "Surprise Endings Highlight Actress Award Competition," in Variety (New York), vol. 357, no. 9, 2 January 1995.

Garrett, Greg, "The Many Faces of Mildred Pierce: A Case Study of Adaptation and the Studio System," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 23, no. 4, October 1995.

Lyons, Donald, "Iron Mike: At Home with Michael Curtiz," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 32, no. 2, March-April 1996.

* * *

When Monty Beragon (Scott), a playboy whose worthlessness is immediately apparent from his thin moustache and quivering chin, is shot dead in a shadowy beach house—a triumphantly noir-ish opening sequence—restaurateur Mildred Pierce (Crawford) confesses to the crime and her complicated life story unfolds in a series of flashbacks. As in the other great James M. Cain adaptation of the 1940s, Double Indemnity, a confessional narration "explains" to us the route which has taken the central character from a brightly lit, drably ordinary daytime world into a nightmare of carnality, criminality, corruption, and chaos. Mildred walks out on her marriage to dull, struggling middle-class broker Bert (Bennett) so that she can provide for her spoiled, petulant, demanding daughter Veda (Blyth). Becoming a waitress, which causes the nasty teenager to turn snobbishly against her, Mildred struggles for a living, and finally opens a restaurant, "Mildred's," which becomes a successful chain. Meanwhile, she is torn between the romantic advances of the puzzled and decent Bert, the smarmily lecherous Wally (Carson), and the slickly empty Monty. She marries the playboy, and he squanders her hard-won fortune while making a play for the tramp Veda. Unlike Double Indemnity, which is notable for Walter Neff's unflinchingly honest confession, the film leads up to a series of revelations which cast doubt over what we have seen. Although the movie generally reveals the truths about the characters that they are trying to hide, Mildred's confessional narration is essentially a lie, designed first to throw suspicion on Wally and, then, to claim the guilt for herself, though it was actually Veda who committed the murder.

Mildred Pierce is an unusual film noir, in that the amour fou which drags the central character down into the gutter inhabited by such doomed protagonists as Edward G. Robinson in Scarlet Street or Robert Mitchum in Out of the Past is not sexual in nature. Crawford's Mildred, one of the few obsessional female protagonists in the genre, is in the line of material sacrifice that extends throughout the women's weepie genre from Stella Dallas to Terms of Endearment, while Ann Blyth's girlish monster is a less substantial femme fatale than is usual in noir, almost like the petulant teenager who will grow up into Barbara Stanwyck's Phyllis Dietrichson in Double Indemnity, and all the more horrifying for her lack of psychotic class. The film is rooted in the shadowy alleyways of film noir, and the director, Michael Curtiz, and the cinematographer, Ernest Haller, use the darkest possible compositions, while the composer, Max Steiner, overlays a driving, downbeat, relentless score to add to the oppression. A perfectly assembled Warner Brothers contract stable supporting cast—including Eve Arden as the heroine's traditional wisecracking girlfriend—are exactly right as a collection of variously feckless, selfish, flawed, and feebler-than-Joan Crawford characters.

This is a film full of night and rain, of trapped characters struggling against their situations, dragged down by their weaknesses. But Mildred Pierce is at least as much a woman's picture as it is a film noir. The versatile and visionary Curtiz, whose only pure noir was The Unsuspected, was here channelled by ex-journalist producer

Jerry Wald, whose allegiance to the form resulted in such female-centered psychodramas as Humoresque, Possessed, Flamingo Road, Caged, Miss Sadie Thompson, and Peyton Place. Wald's women suffer, but generally come through in the end, and Mildred is saved despite herself, as Veda is dragged off screaming, "I'll change, I promise I will," to Tehachapi while Bert reappears to take the heroine off to a possible happy ending. Whereas the male protagonists of Scarlet Street or Double Indemnity were too corrupt in their love to be free even after they have murdered their scheming mistresses, Mildred can be redeemed because her maternal love, though misguided, is untainted by sin. (Given the posthumous image of Crawford presented by Mommie Dearest, this aspect of the film has a heavy irony now.) Her essential strength of character, the quality which makes her movie heroine material and the quintessential Joan Crawford role, is rewarded in the understated but emotive fade-out by the implication of a bright future.

—Kim Newman

LE MILLION

France, 1931

Director: René Clair

Production: Films Sonores Tobis (France); black and white, 35mm; running time: 89 minutes. Released 1931.

Producer: Frank Clifford; screenplay: René Clair, from the musical comedy by Georges Berr and M. Guillemaud; photography: Georges Périnal and Georges Rault; production designer: Lazare Meerson; music: Georges Van Parys, Armand Bernard and Philippe Parès.

Cast: René Lefèvre (Michel); Annabella (Beatrice); Louis Allibert (Prosper); Vanda Gréville (Vanda); Paul Olivier (Father Tulipe, a gangster); Odette Talazac (Prima donna); Constantin Stroësco (Sopranelli, the tenor); Raymond Cordy (Taxi driver).

Publications

Script:

Clair, René, Le Million, in Avant-Scène Cinéma (Paris), March 1988.

Books:

Rotha, Paul, Celluloid: The Film Today, London, 1931.

Viazzi, G., René Clair, Milan, 1946.

Bourgeois, J., René Clair, Geneva, 1949.

Charensol, Georges, and Roger Regent, Un Maître du cinéma: René Clair, Paris, 1952.

Manvell, Roger, The Film and the Public, London, 1955.

Solmi, A., Tre maestri del cinema, Milan, 1956.

De La Roche, Catherine, René Clair: An Index, London, 1958.

Amengual, Barthélemy, René Clair, Paris, 1963; revised edition, 1969.

Mitry, Jean, René Clair, Paris, 1969.

Le Million

Samuels, Charles Thomas, Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.
McGerr, Celia, René Clair, Boston, 1980.

Warfield, Nancy, René Clair's Grand Maneuver, New York, 1982.

Barrot, Oliver, René Clair; ou, Le Temps mesuré, Renens, Switzerland, 1985.

Greene, Naomi, René Clair: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1985.

Dale, R. C., The Films of René Clair, Metuchen, New Jersey, 2 vols., 1986.

Billard, Pierre, Le mystère René Clair, Paris, 1998.

Articles:

New York Times, 21 May 1931.

Variety (New York), 27 May 1931.

Potamkin, Harry, "René Clair and Film Humor," in Hound and Horn (New York), October-December 1932.

Causton, Bernard, "A Conversation with René Clair," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1933.

Jacobs, Lewis, "The Films of René Clair," in New Theatre (New York), February 1936.

Lambert, Gavin, "The Films of René Clair," in Sequence (London), no. 6, 1949.

"Clair Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), August-September 1951.

Berti, V., "L'arte del comico in René Clair," in Bianco e Nero (Rome), March-April 1968.

Helman, A., in Kino (Warsaw), June 1974.

Fischer, L., "René Clair, Le Million, and the Coming of Sound," in Cinema Journal (Iowa City), Spring 1977.

Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1977.

Adair, Gilbert, "Utopia Ltd.: The Cinema of René Clair," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1981.

Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), no. 369, March 1988.

Faulkner, C., "René Clair, Marcel Pagnol and the Social Dimensions of Speech," in Screen (Oxford), vol. 35, no. 2, 1994.

Pappas, Ben, "Le Million," in Forbes, vol. 161, no. 6, 23 March 1998.

Trumpener, Katie, "The René Clair Moment and the Overlap Films of the Early 1930s: Detlef Sierck's April, April!," in Film Criticism (Meadville), Winter-Spring 1999.

* * *

Of the series of comedies that René Clair made for Tobis Films at the beginning of the sound era, Le million remains the most satisfying. It was preceded by the half-silent/half-musical Under the Roofs of Paris and followed by A nous la liberté, making Clair the first internationally acclaimed sound film director.

Clair had become one of the most vociferous opponents of the sound film, claiming that it could only mire down the silent film's flights of images. He had begun his career with the anarchic Paris qui dort (1923) and Entr'acte (1924), and he feared the added equipment and personnel, the excessively wordy scripts, and the close-ups of the actors speaking those scripts. It took someone as skeptical as Clair to overcome these problems in the early sound film. In Under the Roofs of Paris he freed the camera from street singers and let it scale an apartment house, peering in at every floor to watch the effects of their song. He joked with the medium by cutting the sound when a door was closed. In this way he made the first international talkie a success by keeping talk to a minimum.

With Le million his ambitions grew. Every element (sets, lighting, acting, noise, speech, and camerawork) was broken into parts capable of fitting an overriding rhythm that didn't properly belong to any of them. Characters don't walk or gesture so much as half-dance their way from scene to scene. Double chases, near misses, and parallel plots give Clair the chance to syncopate the action with his razor-edge cutting. Scenes are stopped just as one character leaves the frame, and another enters the next. Every shot offers a single dramatic or rhythmic jolt. Ultimately these tidy bits collect on stage for the delightful denouement.

The plot is as symmetrical as the decor. The lyric opera is set off against the bohemian life of two poor artists both in love with a ballerina. Their happiness depends on finding a lottery ticket which through a clever series of reversals finds its way into the jacket of the lead singer in "The Bohemians." The struggle to grab the ticket involves the police and a Robin Hood band led by the master of the underworld, the master of Paris, the master of ceremonies, Père Tulipe. At its height Clair abandons even the abstract tone of natural sound and lays the noise of a rugby crowd over the madcap actions as the jacket is passed from person to person until it appears in the hands of Père Tulipe who produces the winning ticket for our hero.

Afraid of the talkie, Clair gave cinema its purest example of what a lyrical film might be.

—Dudley Andrew

MIRACOLO A MILANO

(Miracle in Milan)

Italy, 1950

Director: Vittorio De Sica

Production: Soc. Produzioni De Sica, in cooperation with Ente Nazionale Industrie Cinematografiche (Rome); black and white, 35mm; running time: 101 minutes, some versions are 95 minutes. Released 1951. Filmed in Milan.

Screenplay: Cesare Zavattini and Vittorio De Sica with Suso Cecchi d'Amico, Mario Chiari, and Adolfo Franci, from the novel Totò, il buono by Cesare Zavattini; photography: G. R. Aldo; editor: Eraldo da Roma; sound: Bruno Brunacci; art director: Guido Fiorini; music director: Alessandro Cicognini; special effects: Ned Mann.

Cast: Emma Gramatica; Francesco Golisano; Paolo Stoppa; Guglielmo Barnabò; Brunella Bovo; Anna Carena; Alba Arnova; Flora Cambi; Virgilio Riento; Arturo Bragaglia; Ermino Spalla; Riccardo Bertazzolo; Francesco Rizzone; Angelo Priolli.

Awards: Cannes Film Festival, Grand Prix, 1951; New York Film Critics' Award, Best Foreign Film, 1951.

Publications

Script:

Zavattini, Cesare, and others, Miracolo a Milano, New York, 1968; also included in Bianco e Nero (Rome), April-June 1983.

Books:

Castello, G. C., Il cinema neorealistico italiano, Turin, 1956.

Rondi, Brunello, Il neorealismo italiano, Parma, 1956.

Ferrare, Giuseppe, Il nuovo cinema italiano, Florence, 1957.

Hovald, Patrice G., Le Néo-Réalisme italien et ses créateurs, Paris, 1959.

Agel, Henri, Vittorio De Sica, Paris, 1964.

Lepohon, Pierre, Vittorio De Sica, Paris, 1966.

Armes, Roy, Patterns of Realism: A Study of Italian Neo-Realist Cinema, New York, 1971.

Samuels, Charles Thomas, Encountering Directors, New York, 1972.

Guaraldi-Rimini, Mario, editor, Neorealismo e vita nazionale: Antologia di cinema nuovo, Florence, 1975.

Mercader, Maria, La mia vita con Vittorio De Sica, Milan, 1978.

Anthologie du Cinéma 10, Paris, 1979.

Bolzoni, Francesco, Quando De Sica era Mister Brown, Turin, 1984.

Darreta, John, Vittorio De Sica: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1988.

Micciché, Lino, De Sica: autore, regista, attore, Venice, 1992.

Governi, Giancarlo, Vittorio de Sica: Parlami d'amore Mariù, with Anna Maria Bianchi, Rome, 1993.

Nuzzi, Paolo, and Ottavio Iemma, editors, De Sica & Zavattini: parliamo tanto di noi, Rome, 1997.

Articles:

Maddison, John, "The Case of De Sica," in Sight and Sound (London), June 1951.

New York Times, 18 December 1951.

New Yorker, 5 April 1952.

Grinstein, Alexander, "Miracle of Milan: Some Psychoanalytic Notes on a Movie," in American Image (Detroit), Fall 1953.

Sargeant, Winthrop, "Profiles: Bread, Love, and Neo-Realismo," in New Yorker, 29 June and 6 July 1957.

McVay, Douglas, "Poet of Poverty," in Films and Filming (London), October and November 1964.

"De Sica Issue" of Bianco e Nero (Rome), September-December 1975.

La Polla, F., "La città e lo spazio," in Bianco e Nero, Fall 1976.

Passalacqua, J., "Vittorio De Sica," in Films in Review (New York), April 1978.
 "De Sica Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 October 1978.
 Bondanella, P., "Neorealist Aesthetics and the Fantastic," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), no. 2, 1979.
 "De Sica Issue" of Cahiers Lumière (Paris), November 1980.
 Cohn, Lawrence, "De Sica Retro Underway in Gotham," in Variety (New York), vol. 344, no. 13, 7 October 1991.
 Bonadella, Peter, "Three Neorealist Classics by De Sica," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 23, no. 1, 1997.

* * *

Miracolo a Milano, which won the Grand Prize at the Cannes Film Festival and was named Best Foreign Film by the New York Film Critics, is one of Vittorio De Sica's lesser masterpieces, not so renowned as Sciuscia (1946), The Bicycle Thief (1948) and Two Women (1960). Today De Sica's reputation as a filmmaker has been diminished by a climate of film criticism which maintains that much of Italian neorealism was little more than an idealistic masquerade. Nonetheless, De Sica contributed much that was powerful and authentic in neorealism, especially with the shattering stark drama of both Sciuscia and The Bicycle Thief.

The whimsy and fairy tale atmosphere that pervade Miracolo a Milano were De Sica's respite from the severity of his earlier films, an exercise in satire and irony which he linked to the world of Hans Christian Anderson wherein "virtue triumphs and evil is punished." He also said that he drew his inspiration from Chaplin and René Clair, an observation confirmed by the first paragraph of the New York Times review of the film; but he did not abandon neorealism in Miracolo a Milano, as so many critics have suggested. The first half of the film, (based on the novel, Toto, il buono, by Cesare Zavattini, de Sica's frequent collaborator) adheres to the documentary re-creation of Milan's impoverished outcasts.

Miracolo a Milano is a modern-day fable which implies that the "pure in heart" must seek their heaven apart from earth. Toto the Good (Francesco Golisano) is an orphan who is discovered as a baby in the cabbage patch of the kindly old Lolotta (wonderfully played by the great Emma Gramatica), who teaches him to be good and pure of heart. When she dies, he spends several years in an orphanage after which he becomes an apostle for the beggars of Milan, aided by a white dove which possesses the power of miracles—the dove being a gift from Lolotta, now his guardian angel and benefactress. As he endeavors to improve the life of the beggars he discovers seeds of caste dissent, then their sense of unity is further disrupted by the discovery of oil on their adopted encampment. When they are forced to fight the landowner's police who are armed with billy clubs and tear gas, Toto's only resource is to have his band of hobos snatch up the brooms of street cleaners and fly to a land "where there is only peace, love, and good."

De Sica's combination of realism and fantasy is seductive, and his use of the fanciful sometimes overshadows the social commentary about the exploitation and dispossession of the innocent when confronted by the vagaries of poverty and the industrial society. And although De Sica steadfastly refused to admit it, the film has an element of despair, of spiritual quandary, as a dominant theme.

Miracolo a Milano was greeted with sharp denunciation from critics on the Italian right, all of whom accused De Sica of Communist leanings. It was much more wholeheartedly received in the United States, although its many levels of meaning were no less discussed here than in Italy. It is a transitional film in De Sica's career, for with it he moved out of the mainstream of neorealism. It remains a charming salute to the hope and perseverance of the common man, enhanced by the consummate cinematography of G. R. Aldo, a melodious score by Alessandro Cicognini and the wholly believable and unprepossessing acting of a cast made up of professional and non-professional actors.

—Ronald Bowers

MIRROR

See ZERKALO

THE MISFITS

USA, 1961

Director: John Huston

Production: Seven Arts Productions; black and white, 35mm and 16mm; running time: 125 minutes.

Producer: Frank E. Taylor; screenplay: Arthur Miller; photography: Russell Metty; editor: George Tomasini; assistant director: Carl Beringer; art directors: Stephen Grimes, Bill Newberry; music: Alex North; sound recording: Phil Mitchell.

Cast: Clark Gable (Gay Langland); Marilyn Monroe (Roslyn Taber); Montgomery Clift (Perce Howland); Eli Wallach (Guido); Thelma Ritter (Isabelle Steers); Kevin McCarthy (Raymond Taber).

Publications

Script:

Garret, G.P., and others, Film Scripts 3, New York, 1972.

Books:

Kaminsky, Stuart, John Huston: Maker of Magic, London, 1978.

Madsen, Axel, John Huston, New York, 1978.

Goode, James, The Making of The Misfits, Indianapolis, 1986.

McCarthy, John, The Films of John Huston, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1987.

Studlar, Gaylyn, editor, and David Desser, Reflections in a Male Eye: John Huston & the American Experience, Washington, D.C., 1993.

Cooper, Stephen, editor, Perspectives on John Huston, New York, 1994.

Brill, Lesley, John Huston's Filmmaking, New York, 1997.

Cohen, Allen, John Huston: A Guide to References and Resources, London, 1997.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 1 February 1961.

Cieutat, M., Positif (Paris), October 1961.

Oms, Marcel, Positif (Paris), September 1961.

The Misfits

- Hart, Henry, Films in Review (New York), February 1961.
 Lejeune, C.A., Films and Filming (London), June 1961.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1961.
 Cieutat, Michel, "Les Misfits," in Positif (Paris), no. 260, October 1982.
Listener, vol. 116, no. 2967, 3 July 1986.
 "Miller + Huston = Les Misfits," in Cinéma (Paris), no. 422, 30 December 1987.
 Lippe, R., "Montgomery Clift: A Critical Disturbance," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 17, Summer 1989.
 Miller, A., "Snips About Movies," in Michigan Quarterly Review, vol. 34, no. 4, 1995.
 Shoilevska, Sanya, "Alex North's Score for The Misfits," in Cue Sheet (Hollywood), vol. 7, no. 2, April 1996.
 Jacobowitz, F., and R. Lippe, "Performance and the Still Photograph: Marilyn Monroe," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 44, 1997.

* * *

Some thirty years after its release, The Misfits remains an impressive and affecting film but nonetheless a failure. The film, which is based on a screenplay written by Arthur Miller expressly as a homage to his wife, Marilyn Monroe, shies away from probing too deeply into its material and never manages to integrate its various thematics into an organic whole. Monroe's character, Roslyn, is the centre of the film and the character's impact on the men she meets gives the film its structure and narrative movement. In regard to Monroe/Roslyn, the film is highly reflexive and cannot but be read in part as a meditation on Monroe's star image, persona and presence.

The first time Monroe appears on-screen, she is attempting unsuccessfully to memorize the lines she needs to say in a divorce court hearing; as she rehearses, her face is seen reflected in a mirror as she puts finishing touches on her made-up face. To anyone even slightly familiar with Monroe's star image, the introductory sequence signals that the film is to be read as being about Marilyn Monroe. As the film progresses, there are other references to Monroe's public persona—like the actress, Roslyn was abandoned early on by her parents and grew up searching for love and security. Of the various references to Monroe, the strongest and most significant is the character's femininity and her almost exquisite sensitivity to human experience. Monroe/Roslyn is presented as an essence of the "feminine." The image is in keeping with the direction Monroe's screen persona and presence was taking in the late 1950s—she was no longer the dumb blonde but the innocent; whereas earlier in her career, she embodied physicality, she now is presented as representing the spirit of a life-force. The film underscores this conception of Monroe/Roslyn by having each of the principal male characters comment on her ability to feel, to intuitively respond to and empathize with human life and nature. The Misfits was Monroe's first dramatic film as a major star and was intended to consolidate her image as a serious person (New York and the Actor's Studio, a film with Olivier, the marriage to Arthur Miller) and actor.

With so much emphasis placed on Monroe and her femininity, it is highly fitting that her co-star in The Misfits is Clark Gable. Gable's star persona had been built on his masculine appeal. If Monroe was the 1950s archetypal female, Gable was the traditional archetypal male. As iconic figures the pairing of the two has a certain logic although their respective screen personas do not particularly mesh. While The Misfits is about Monroe, it is equally a meditation on both heterosexual relations and the conflict between the feminine and the masculine. As conceived by Miller and the film's director, John Huston, the feminine and the masculine are taken on face value. There is no consideration that an individual person may embody feminine and masculine traits or that the concepts themselves are cultural constructions. Montgomery Clift's presence and his characterization are the closest the film comes to acknowledging the possibility of a person having both a feminine and masculine identity but the character he plays is intended to be contrasted to Gable and Eli Wallach, a friend of Gable's who is gradually revealed to be irredeemably embittered, cynical and a misogynist; Gable and Wallach are "men" and not the man-child Clift is presented as being.

In The Misfits a masculine presence is interchangeable with a male's heterosexual orientation and Gable's "manly" image is further enhanced in that he is a cowboy. It is Gable's mature (that is, aging) cowboy which is used by the film to both place the Monroe character and provide a lament for the passing of a "genuine" masculine ethos which has been eroded by urbanization, women, and the death of the West and the male world of freedom, action, and mastery. In regard to Monroe and Gable's relationship, the film has two primary concerns: although Monroe is extremely attuned to other people's feelings and needs, she doesn't fully comprehend until late in the narrative that Gable is in emotional pain; and, secondly, as the mustang hunt dramatizes, while Gable is willing to acknowledge that he and the West belong to a bygone era, he needs to maintain his self-respect and not be "broken" ie emasculated. The Misfits moves to a climactic confrontation between Monroe and Gable over his sensitivity and hurt and it is Monroe who must give way if their relationship is to have a future.

The Misfits somewhat uneasily places its struggle between the female and male within the context of the crisis of the nuclear family; Roslyn had experienced an unhappy childhood, Gable's Gay has had an unsuccessful marriage and he and his children have a strained relationship, and Clift's Perce feels alienated from his mother who has chosen a second husband/lover over his affections. In the film's "happy ending" resolution, Monroe and Gable drive off together with her letting him know that she is now ready to have a child.

If the film's "troubled-family" thematic points back to the 1950s, The Misfits also looks forward to the 1960s and beyond. In addition to its self-conscious presentation of Monroe and, for that matter, Gable and Clift, the film is an early 1960s attempt to critically address the Western, the genre's values and its contemporary status. It is also a (post)modern film in the privileging of digression and ambience over narrative. And, in embryonic form, Monroe's identity raises issues directly relevant to feminism; she also aligns herself to what are essentially environmental and animal rights issues.

Although the film lacks a strong narrative drive, Huston's direction is taut and Russell Metty's elegantly sombre and sparse black and white images provide the feel of a spontaneous and almost documentary-like approach to the material. The Misfits lends itself to readings from numerous critical perspectives but it is perhaps most meaningfully a film concerned with stardom and in particular its complex relation to both the star and her or his audience. As the film illustrates, Monroe hadn't really resolved the split between her being perceived as a sex symbol (the paddle-ball sequence) and as a serious performer. And, the fact that The Misfits is Monroe's and Gable's final film and one of Clift's last efforts, makes it an inescapably sad film.

—Richard Lippe

MISS JULIE

See FRÖKEN JULIE

MR. HULOT'S HOLIDAY

See LES VACANCES DE MONSIEUR HULOT

MR. SMITH GOES TO WASHINGTON

USA, 1939

Director: Frank Capra

Production: Columbia Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 130 minutes. Released 1939. Filmed in Columbia Pictures studios.

Producer: Frank Capra; screenplay: Sidney Buchman, from a story by Lewis R. Foster; photography: Joseph Walker; editors: Gene Havlick and Al Clark; sound engineer: Ed Berndt; art director: Lionel Banks; music score: Dimitri Tiomkin; musical director: M. W. Stoloff; costume designer (gowns): Kalloch; montage effects: Slavko Vorkapich.

Cast: Jean Arthur (Saunders); James Stewart (Jefferson Smith); Claude Rains (Senator Joseph Paine); Edward Arnold (Jim Taylor); Guy Kibbee (Governor Hopper); Thomas Mitchell (Diz Moore); Eugene Pallette (Chick McGann); Beulah Bondi (Ma Smith); H. B. Warner (Senate Majority Leader); Harry Carey (President of the Senate); Astrid Allwyn (Susan Paine); Ruth Donnelly (Mrs. Hopper); Grant Mitchell (Senator MacPherson); Porter Hall (Senator Monroe); Pierre Watkin (Senate Minority Leader); Charles Lane (Nosey); William Demarest (Bill Griffith); Dick Elliot (Carl Cook); Billy Watson, Delmar Watson, John Russell, Harry Watson, Gary Watson, and Baby Dumpling (the Hopper Boys).

Mr. Smith Goes to Washington

Awards: Oscar for Best Original Story, 1939; New York Film Critics Award, Best Actor (Stewart), 1939.

Publications

Script:

Buchman, Sidney, Mr. Smith Goes to Washington, in Twenty Best Film Plays, edited by John Gassner, and Dudley Nichols, New York, 1943.

Books:

Griffith, Richard, Frank Capra, London, 1951.
 Jones, Ken D., The Films of James Stewart, New York, 1970.
 Capra, Frank, The Name above the Title, New York, 1971.
 Silke, James, Frank Capra: One Man—One Film, Washington, D.C., 1971.
 Willis, Donald, The Films of Frank Capra, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1974.

Thompson, Howard, James Stewart, New York, 1974.
 Glatzer, Richard, and John Raeburn, editors, Frank Capra: The Man and His Films, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1975.
 Maland, Charles, American Visions: The Films of Chaplin, Ford, Capra, and Welles 1936–1941, New York, 1977.
 Scherle, Victor, and William Levy, The Films of Frank Capra, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1977, 1992.
 Bohnenkamp, Dennis, and Sam Grogg, Frank Capra Study Guide, Washington, D.C., 1979.
 Maland, Charles, Frank Capra, Boston, 1980.
 Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
 Eyles, Allen, James Stewart, London, 1984.
 Hunter, Allan, James Stewart, New York, 1985.
 Robbins, Jhan, Everybody's Man: A Biography of Jimmy Stewart, New York, 1985.
 Zagarrio, Vito, Frank Capra, Florence, 1985.
 Carney, Raymond, American Vision: The Films of Frank Capra, Cambridge, 1986, 1996.
 Wolfe, Charles, Frank Capra: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1987.

McBride, Joseph, American Madness: The Life of Frank Capra, New York, 1990.

Lourdeaux, Lee, Italian and Irish Filmmakers in America: Ford, Capra, Coppola and Scorsese, Springfield, 1993.

Gehring, Wes D., Populism and the Capra Legacy, Westport, 1995.

Girgus, Sam B., Hollywood Renaissance: The Cinema of Democracy in the Era of Ford, Capra, and Kazan, New York, 1998.

Sklar, Robert, and Vito Zagarrio, Frank Capra: Authorship and the Studio System, Philadelphia, 1998.

McBride, Joseph, Frank Capra: The Catastrophe of Success, New York, 2000.

Articles:

Herzberg, Max J., editor, "A Guide to the Appreciation of Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," in Photoplay Studies (New York), no. 21, 1939.

Variety (New York), 11 October 1939.

New York Times, 20 October 1939.

Ferguson, Otis, in New Republic (New York), 1 November 1939.

Ferguson, Otis, "Democracy at the Box Office," in New Republic (New York), 24 March 1941.

Biberman, Herbert, "Frank Capra's Characters," in New Masses (New York), 8 July 1941.

Capra, Frank, "Do I Make You Laugh?," in Films and Filming (London), September 1962.

Price, James, "Capra and the American Dream," in London Magazine, vol. 3, no. 10, 1964.

"Capra Issue" of Positif (Paris), December 1971.

Handzo, Stephen, "A Decade of Good Deeds and Wonderful Lives: Under Capracorn," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 8, no. 4, 1972.

Richards, Jeffrey, "Frank Capra and the Cinema of Populism," in Film Society Review (New York), vol. 7, no. 6 and nos. 7-9, 1972.

Nelson, J., "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington: Capra, Populism, and Comic-Strip Art," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Summer 1974.

Sklar, Robert, "The Making of Cultural Myths: Walt Disney and Frank Capra," in Movie-Made America, New York, 1975.

Rose, B., "It's a Wonderful Life: The Stand of the Capra Hero," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), vol. 6, no. 2, 1977.

Phelps, G. A., "The 'Populist' Films of Frank Capra," in Journal of American Studies (London), no. 3, 1979.

Browne, N., "The Politics of Narrative Form: Capra's Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), no. 3, 1980.

Dickstein, M., "It's a Wonderful Life, But," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), May 1980.

"Capra Issue" of Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Winter 1981.

Edgerton, G., "Capra and Altman: Mythmaker and Mythologist," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1983.

Alix, Yves, "La Machine à tuer les méchants," in Positif (Paris), November 1987.

Tomasulo, F. P., "Colonel North Goes to Washington," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), no. 2, 1989.

Kanjo, Judith, in English Journal, vol. 80, no. 2, February 1991.

Gehring, Wes D., "The Capra Touch: Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 19, no. 1, Spring 1991.

"Capra's America," in Migration World Magazine, vol. 20, no. 1, January-February 1992.

Alonge, A. G., "Mr. Smith a Washington ovvero il trionfo della liberta," in Quaderni di Cinema (Florence), October-December 1992.

Hicks, J., "Frank Capra (Part 2)," in Films in Review (New York), January-February 1993.

Mortimer, L., "The Charm of Morality: Frank Capra and His Cinema," in Continuum, vol. 7, no. 2, 1994.

Smoodin, Eric, "'Compulsory' Viewing for Every Citizen: Mr. Smith and the Rhetoric of Reception," in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 35, no. 2, Winter 1996.

Alter, Jonathan, "It's a Wonderful Legacy: Two of Stewart's Classic Characters Helped Change How We View Our Politics - and Ourselves," in Newsweek, vol. 130, no. 2, 14 July 1997.

Ophuls, Marcel, "Freedom and the Dream Factory: These are the Times That Try Men's Wallets In a Hollywood of Greedy Conformism," in Nation, vol. 265, no. 11, 13 October 1997.

Arnold, Gary, "Though More Than 60 Years Old, Films of Frank Capra Stay Fresh," in Insight on the News, vol. 14, no. 5, 9 February 1998.

Hertzberg, Hendrik, "Upset Victory: Primary Colors Triumphs Over the Old Politics of Hollywood," in New Yorker, vol. 74, no. 5, 23 March 1998.

Vidal, Gore, "I Fired Capra: Recollections of the Life and Career of Frank Capra," in Newsweek, vol. 131, no. 25A, Summer 1998.

Brown, Stephen J., "Theological Optimism in the Films of Frank Capra," in Theology, vol. 101, no. 804, November-December 1998.

* * *

The halo surrounding the accolade "film classic" can weigh heavily, indeed, and few films have encountered the extremes of opinion as has Frank Capra's classic, Mr. Smith Goes to Washington. It has been considered a most profound American tragedy. It has also been called sheer cornball on celluloid, even a veiled paean to fascism.

When an idealistic youth leader is named to the U.S. Senate to fill an unexpired term, he clashes with the party machine. Senator Paine (Claude Rains), industrial magnate Jim Taylor (Edward Arnold) and others are pushing through a bill giving the State an unneeded dam, one yielding real estate profits to the corrupt bosses. The patriotic young Jefferson Smith (James Stewart), chosen as perfect stooge for his naivete, is deflected with a bill for a boy's camp, a pet dream of his, which he wants built on the same land. Taylor attempts first to buy him off, then to break him. Framed, Smith defends himself and, in the climactic scene, challenges both the machine and the Senate itself by filibustering for 23 hours on the Senate floor, finally appealing to the now conscious-stricken Paine. He confesses all. Faith and vindication of Smith's idealism win out.

Despite the pressure to have the film withdrawn by politicians (including Joseph Kennedy), diplomats and reporters, who were either concerned that foreign powers would hold the film up as an example of corrupt Western democracy or objected to their professions being sourly painted, Mr. Smith became one of Capra's most successful works. Ironically, it was warmly embraced overseas, because it demonstrated the freedom America had to criticise its own system.

Made in a time when the country was still absorbing the shockwaves of the Depression and had recently seen World War II break out in Europe, knowing they would soon be involved, the illustration that America still had ideals worth fighting for struck a powerful chord. As the cynicism and seemingly moral and social disenfranchisement has grown with every decade, so has the appeal of Mr. Smith, Capra's commercial reminder that the spark of humanism could still flare, correct, and ultimately save.

With an everyman name, the Christ-figure allusions, and the innocent coming to a sadder-but-wiser adulthood, Smith voices a public that feels both impotent against and disconnected from a world grown cold and massive; it also illustrates the conundrum of anyone who has felt passion or imagination, and has nowhere to put it, nobody to listen to it.

Critics commenting biliously upon Capra's romanticism nevertheless have been nearly unanimous in giving credit to Capra's mastery of the film medium, from the painstaking authenticity (the Senate reconstruction, made alive as few film interiors have been, and the government ritualist procedures written into the script) to, especially, the editing, paced to both his characterisation and the dialogue's thematic importance. (The filibuster scene was shot by six cameras.) The montage expert Slavko Vorkapitch added his contribution to the mise en scene with a compilation using such U.S. monuments as the Lincoln Memorial, the Capitol Dome, the Constitution, and others. Mr. Smith's "fantasy" is grounded in a strong physical reality.

So, too, his actors. Capra utilised a strong stable of people who consistently turned in well-crafted performances—Arnold, Stewart, Harry Carey (wonderful as the dry Senate President), Jean Arthur as the cynical secretary Saunders—even holding up production for months to gather the perfect cast. His use of faces has been a trademark, peppering his films with very American types, instinctively perceiving collective nationalistic natures. Guy Kibbee, Eugene Palette and the others, with their years of roles ingrained on the filmgoing public, articulate before their lines are even spoken.

The dialogue is sharp and fast, segueing from verbal duets to—in Smith's speech—hoarse entreaty, to crisp and urgent explanation—in Saunders' explanation of due process—crucial to the action. Saunders' speech could be a textbook in any civics class. It serves not only as the exposition for the rest of the film, but sets the balanced tone of surface cynicism and underlying emotions, which makes James Stewart's passion completely valid.

The casting of Stewart as Jefferson Smith is inspired. Ironically, Capra had wanted Gary Cooper, but Stewart's hero is more proactive, more an articulate force for social change. Any unevenness of his character—for example, when he discovers the press has been ridiculing him, his reaction is harsh, ugly, inconsistent—is completely absorbed within his gangly sincerity. In that speech, he is by turns defensive, uncertain, defiant, wounded and inspired, all at once. It is not he who is the hero, but his beliefs; therein lies Stewart's genius: his style is organic to the character. Capra keeps this fundamental scene from being a mere photographed moral lecture. With his use of reaction shots (he reinforces what the audience already thinks, not merely creates it) and his structure of complicated relationships, such as Smith being the Senator 25 years later, with choreographed shots, makes his suicide attempt ("I'm not fit to be Senator!") a credible outburst.

Given Capra's defining his own genre—Richard Griffith refers to it as "the fantasy of goodwill"—his so-called moral tales, attention can be more fruitfully focused upon his technique; when tales are simple, the more important the telling, and the more glaring the faults. Those who would paint Capra as the Norman Rockwell of cinema haven't looked behind the storyline, nor have they discerned why the focus on corruption-then-restoration of ideals can come so organically from a director, an immigrant from the Italian slums who indeed made good. Hence the underlying theme of so many of his works; namely, that everything's possible, as well as the unavoidable frustration with and reaction to excess success. Many Capra heroes are, in addition to being unheroic, too naive, clumsy, and not on the best terms with reality. The folk artist homes in on the inherited myth of the American Past in a way that, unlike Rockwell, is neither synthetic nor saccharine, but identifiable. His happy ending in Mr. Smith is not sealed; less than a minute long in resolution, nothing is really changed beyond the incident; the Senate ends in turmoil and the fate of the political machine, beyond Taylor's, is unresolved.

The last quarter of the film is almost as dizzy as the best of Eisenstein's—or Vorkapitch's—montage, encapsulating numerous small vignettes and reactions, always with the central characters in focus. Yet Capra establishes the premise economically; in the film's opening, a rat-faced reporter callously spouts the news of a Senator's death into a telephone, then a swish pan sets in gear scenes leading to the stooge appointment of Smith. A series of wipes then establishes the power relationships. . . all of this in 60 seconds.

Capra's film doesn't descend into mere sentimentality due to the editing. A taut rhythm is structured, which organises chaos using surprisingly few close-ups, those being saved for reactions finely honed to audience expectation. They often act as counterpoint to cliché, as when he cuts to Saunders' cynical expression upon hearing platitudes intended to gloss over the corruption and ignorance of Taylor's crew to the naive new senator. Sour comment, too, reflecting our own jaded attitude. How that seeming immunity to moral and political optimism responds to a so-called "fantasy" on film is the result of somebody's skill. Must be Capra's.

—Jane Ehrlich

MRS. MINIVER

USA, 1942

Director: William Wyler

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer; black and white; running time: 133 minutes; length: 12,010 feet. Released June 1942.

Producer: Sidney Franklin; screenplay: Arthur Wimperis, George Froeschel, James Hilton, and Claudine West, from the novel by Jan Struther; assistant director: Walter Strohm; photography: Joseph Ruttenberg; editor: Harold S. Kress; art director: Cedric Gibbons; associate art director: Urie McCleary; music: Herbert Stothart.

Cast: Greer Garson (Mrs. Miniver); Walter Pidgeon (Clem Miniver); Teresa Wright (Carol Beldon); Dame May Whitty (Lady Beldon); Henry Travers (Mr. Ballard); Reginald Owen (Foley); Miles Mander (German Agent's Voice); Henry Wilcoxon (Vicar); Richard Ney (Vin); Clare Sander (Judy); Christopher Severn (Toby); Brenda Forbes (Glady's); Rhys Williams (Horace); Marie De Becker (Ada); Helmut Dantine (German Flyer); Mary Field (Miss Spriggins).

Mrs. Miniver

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Actress (Garson), Best Actress in a supporting Role (Teresa Wright), Best Black and White Cinematography, Best Director, Best Screenplay.

Publications

Script:

Wimperis, Arthur, and others, Mrs. Miniver, in Twenty Best Film Plays, edited by John Gassner and Dudley Nichols, New York, 1943.

Books:

- Reisz, Karel, William Wyler: An Index, London, 1958.
 Madsen, Axel, William Wyler, New York, 1973.
 Kolodiaznaia V., William Wyler, Moscow, 1975.
 Tuska, Jon, editor, Close-Up: The Hollywood Director, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1978.
 Anderegg, Michael A., William Wyler, Boston, 1979.
 Baker, M. Joyce, Images of Women in Film: The War Years 1941–45, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1980.
 Kern, Sharon, William Wyler: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.
 Bowman, Barbara, Master Space: Film Images of Capra, Lubitsch, Sternberg, and Wyler, Westport, 1992.
 Herman, Jan, A Talent for Trouble: The Life of Hollywood's Most Acclaimed Director, William Wyler, Cambridge, 1997.

Articles:

- Documentary Newsletter* (London), 1942.
Variety (New York), 13 May 1942.
 Crowther, Bosley, in New York Times, 5 June 1942.
Life (New York), 8 June 1942.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1942.
Times (London), 8 July 1942.
 Lejeune, C. A., in Observer (London), 12 July 1942.
 Whitebait, William, in New Statesman (London), 18 July 1942.
 Isaacs, Hermine Rich, "William Wyler: Director with a Passion and a Craft," in Theatre Arts (New York), February 1947.
 Griffith, Richard, "Wyler, Wellman, and Huston," in Films in Review (New York), February 1950.
 Luft, Herbert G., "Greer Garson," in Films in Review (New York), March 1961.
 Hanson, Curtis Lee, "William Wyler," in Cinema (Beverly Hills), Summer 1967.
 Marill, Alvin H., "Walter Pidgeon," in Films in Review (New York), November 1969.
 Doeckel, Ken, "William Wyler," in Films in Review (New York), October 1971.
 Higham, Charles, "William Wyler," in Action (Los Angeles), September-October 1973.
 von Cottom, J., "Les Immortels du cinema: William Wyler," in Ciné Revue (Brussels), 30 August 1979.
Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.
 Nielsen, R., "Ray's Way," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 181, July 1990.
 Raskin, R., "Set-Up/Pay-Off and a Related Figure," in P.O.V., no. 2, December 1996.
 Christensen, Jerome, "Studio Identity and Studio Art: MGM, Mrs. Miniver, and Planning the Postwar Era," in EHL, vol. 67, no. 1, Spring 2000.

* * *

During the early years of World War II, when the United States was still wavering between isolationism and interventionism, Britain was facing the possibility of invasion and defeat by the Nazis. The American film industry showed marked sympathies for Britain, but had mainly used the new war as a backdrop for the usual spy stories and action/adventure films. The MGM producer Sidney Franklin, whose films often used British settings, had the idea of making a tribute to Britain at war, a feature film intended to persuade Americans to help the beleaguered British.

Mrs. Miniver was the culmination of Franklin's efforts. The sentimental yet gripping story of "an average middle-class English family" (as the opening titles describe them) in the midst of total war, won six Academy Awards and was the box-office hit of 1942 on both sides of the Atlantic. President Roosevelt was given a preview and urged the film's early release, and Winston Churchill referred to it as "propaganda worth 100 battleships."

The Miniver family, though, is anything but average. As the film opens in 1939 they are conspicuously well-off, with a large suburban home, two maids, a boat, and a new convertible car. They are a wholesome, idealized middle-class, that American audiences could respect as well as identify with. Once the identification is established, though, the Miniver's comfortable complacency is shaken by the war. The director, William Wyler, portrays the family's hardships by gradually closing their once spacious home in upon them. This process culminates during the air raid sequences, when the terrified but stoic Minivers huddle together in their tiny bomb shelter. Whistling bombs descend around them, literally destroying their home.

Despite an enthusiastic critical response in America, and the sympathetic intentions of the filmmakers, many British critics vehemently rejected this portrait of Britain at war. They found particular offence in the emphasis placed upon the heroism and sacrifice of the upper middle-class Minivers. At a time when British films were emphasizing realism and the contribution of the ordinary man to the “people’s war,” Mrs. Miniver played the war for melodrama in the grand tradition of MGM. As the title suggests, this is a “woman’s film,” with the focus of the narrative placed squarely on the shoulders of the eponymous heroine, played by Greer Garson. Garson is far too young to play a woman with a son in the RAF, but otherwise rings true in this role of dignified maturity. Teresa Wright, as the Miniver’s daughter-in-law, is another sympathetic lead; and even Dame May Whitty manages to breathe life into her usual appearance as a crusty old aristocrat. The affable but vacuous male leads, Walter Pidgeon and Richard Ney, were perhaps cast so as not to detract attention from the more formidable women.

The landscape the Minivers inhabit is MGM’s often used contemporary Olde England: a land of castles and quaint villages, populated by servile working-class caricatures and the landed gentry. In order to present Britain as a democracy worthy of being saved from Nazi rule, Mrs. Miniver attempts to alter this scenario only slightly: the middle-class Minivers are highlighted, while the marginal classes are seen to mingle harmoniously. A prolonged subplot involving the village flower show takes this idea to an absurd length. The filmmakers don’t deny that an antiquated class system operates in Britain, but try to appear progressive in suggesting that class differences are differences of accent and disposition rather than economic inequalities.

Mrs. Miniver was the right film at the right time. Its blatant pro-British propaganda was somewhat alleviated in America by the U.S. entry into the war before the film was released. Mrs. Miniver thus came to symbolize not only the British sacrifice, but the sacrifices Americans were facing. Its enormous success encouraged MGM to embark on an entire series of films either celebrating the British at war or using their “castles and class” vision of England as a romantic setting. It seemed that there would indeed always be an England, so long as MGM was there to concoct it. The more memorable of these films, such as Random Harvest, kept the propaganda to a minimum. But the stodgy, message-filled White Cliffs of Dover, made just two years later, bared all of the presences of Mrs. Miniver without supplying the compensatory charms.

—H. M. Glancy

MODERN TIMES

USA, 1935

Director: Charles Chaplin

Production: United Artists-Charles Chaplin; black and white, 35mm, mostly synchronized musical soundtrack; running time: 85 minutes; length: 7634 feet. Released 1936.

Modern Times

Producer: Charles Chaplin; screenplay: Charles Chaplin; photography: Rollie Thotheroh and Ira Morgan; editor: Charles Chaplin; art directors: Charles D. Hall and J. Russell Spencer; music directors: Alfred Newman; music: Charles Chaplin; music arrangers: David Raksin and Edward Powell.

Cast: Charles Chaplin (A Worker); Paulette Goddard (A Gamine); Henry Bergman (Café proprietor); Chester Conklin (Mechanic); Stanley Sandford, Louis Natheux, and Hank Mann (Burglars); Allan Garcia (President of a steel corporation).

Publications

Books:

- Cooke, Alistair, editor, Garbo and the Night Watchman, London, 1937.
 Tyler, Parker, Chaplin, Last of the Clowns, New York, 1947.
 Cotes, Peter, and Thelma Miklaus, The Little Fellow, London, 1951.
 Huff, Theodore, Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1951.
 Mitry, Jean, Charlot et la “fabulation” chaplinesque, Paris, 1957.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, Charles Chaplin, Paris, 1963.
 Chaplin, Charlie, My Autobiography, London, 1964.
 McDonald, Gerald, and others, The Films of Charlie Chaplin, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1965.
 Martin, Marcel, Charlie Chaplin, Paris, 1966; 2nd edition, 1983.
 Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Essays and a Lecture, edited by Jay Leyda, London, 1968; Princeton, 1982.

Mitry, Jean, Tout Chaplin: Tous les films, par le texte, par le gag, et par l'image, Paris, 1972.

Chaplin, Charlie, My Life in Pictures, London, 1974.

Sadoul, Georges, Vie de Charlot, Paris, 1978.

Lorcey, J., Charlot, Paris, 1978.

Lyons, T. J., Charles Chaplin: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Haining, Peter, editor, The Legend of Charlie Chaplin, London, 1982.

Gehring, Wes D., Charlie Chaplin: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, Connecticut, 1983.

Robinson, David, Chaplin: The Mirror of Opinion, London, 1983.

Smith, Julian, Chaplin, Boston, 1984.

Robinson, David, Chaplin: His Life and Art, London, 1985.

Saint-Martin, Catherine, Charlot/Chaplin; ou, La Conscience du Mythe, Paris, 1987.

Silver, Charles, Charles Chaplin: An Appreciation, New York, 1990.

Lynn, Kenneth S., Charlie Chaplin and His Times, New York, 1997.

Milton, Joyce, Tramp: The Life of Charlie Chaplin, New York, 1998.

Turk, Ruth, Charlie Chaplin: From Tears to Laughter, Minneapolis, 1999.

Kimber, John, The Art of Charles Chaplin, Sheffield, 2000.

Articles:

Shumiatski, B., in New Masses (New York), 24 September 1935.

New York Times, 6 February 1936.

Newsweek (New York), 8 February 1936.

Variety (New York), 12 February 1936.

Greene, Graham, in Spectator (London), 14 February 1936.

Van Doren, Mark, "Charlie Chaplin," in Nation (New York), 19 February 1936.

Newhouse, Edward, "Charlie's Critics," in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), April 1936.

Cooke, Alistair, "Charlie Chaplin," in Atlantic Monthly (Boston), August 1939.

Eisenstein, Sergei, "Charlie the Grown Up," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1946.

Grace, Harry A., "Charlie Chaplin's Films and American Culture Patterns," in Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism (Cleveland), June 1952.

Marks, Louis, in Films and Filming (London), October 1954.

Whitebait, William, in Sight and Sound (London), January-March 1955.

Hinxman, Margaret, "Interview with Chaplin," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1957.

Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 21 May 1964.

Téléciné (Paris), January 1972.

Lefèvre, Raymond, "Voie et revoir Les Temps modernes," in Cinema (Paris), January 1972.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), April 1972.

Lyons, T. J., interview with Roland H. Totheroh, in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1972.

Robinson, David, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1972.

Aristarco, G., "L'uomo in pericolo nei Tempi Moderni di Chaplin," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), May-June 1972.

Denby, David, in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1972.

Amengual, Barthélemy, "Style et conscience de classe," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1973.

"Chaplin Issue" of Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), March 1978.

"Chaplin Issue" of University Film Association Journal (Houston), no. 1, 1979.

Berg, Charles, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Winokur, M., "Modern Times and the Comedy of Transformation," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 15, no. 4, 1987.

Abel, "Modern Times," in Variety (New York), vol. 336, no. 3, 2 August 1989.

Papson, S., "The IBM Tramp," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), April 1990.

Troehler, M., "Der stumme Aufstand der Bilder gegen die herrschenden Toene," in Cinema (Switzerland) (Basel), no. 36, 1990.

Robinson, D., and G. Molyneaux, "The 'Script' of Modern Times," in Cinefocus (Bloomington), vol. 2, no. 1, 1991.

Marshall, C. I., "Imitation as Imitation: The Brechtian Aspect of Chaplin's Cinema," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1991.

Maxfield, James F., "The Metamorphoses of the Mother: The Heroines of Chaplin's Silent Films," in Midwest Quarterly, vol. 32, no. 2, Winter 1991.

Kuriyama, Constance Brown, "Chaplin's Impure Comedy: The Art of Survival," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 45, no. 3, Spring 1992.

Bloom, Claire, "Charles the Great: Remembering Charles Chaplin," in Vogue, vol. 182, no. 12, December 1992.

Lieberman, Evan A., "Charlie the Trickster," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 46, no. 3, Fall 1994.

Wool, Michael, and Linda Kowall Wool, "Chaplin and the Comedy of Melodrama," in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 46, no. 3, Fall 1994.

Adorno, Theodor W., and John MacKay, "Chaplin Times Two: Comedian Charlie Chaplin," in Yale Journal of Criticism, vol. 9, no. 1, Spring 1996.

Lemaster, David J., "The Pathos of the Unconscious: Charlie Chaplin and Dreams," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 25, no. 3, Fall 1997.

Faure, Elie, "The Art of Charlie Chaplin," in New England Review, vol. 19, no. 2, Spring 1998.

Douglas, Ann, "Charlie Chaplin: The Comedian," in Time, vol. 151, no. 22, 8 June 1998.

Doppen, Franz, "Modern Times: The Industrial Revolution and the Concept of Time," in Social Education, January-February 1999.

* * *

Charles Chaplin was the last holdout in an industry that had uncritically turned its mode of production away from the visual developments of the end of the silent period to the spoken word and the theatrical trappings which that change entailed. In 1931, two years after the end of the silent period, Chaplin directed City Lights; five years later came Modern Times, his last film to extensively and specifically employ silent film strategies. A stylistic anachronism, the film was both a tribute to the glories of the silent period and a sociological perspective on industrialized society. If Chaplin considered sound likely to become an enslavingly mechanized aspect of movie making, he rendered that vision nonsensically by portraying himself as the factory worker forced to undergo a new approach to factory life—eating while working, using both mouth and body simultaneously. Not surprisingly, this experiment in modernization has disastrous consequences for our hero, the machine designed to feed the worker running disastrously amuck, serving food but rendering it inedible. Having been served by a machine, Charlie is later literally served to a machine. The film becomes a satire on the mechanization of thought and industry, a plea for the reinstatement of human individual values over those of industrialization and mass production.

The year of Chaplin's City Lights—1931—was also the year of À nous la liberté, René Clair's film attacking mechanized society. Both films share an assembly line scene of humorous yet socially critical implications; both directors posit a rather utopian ending in which man abandons the mechanized world for a life of individual freedom outside the urban landscape; both resist the use of dialogue as a naturalistic element of filmmaking. Although À nous la liberté contains some dialogue, the strength of the soundtrack is an operetta of sounds and music, occasional pieces of dialogue being part of that source. In Modern Times, machines, not people, are allowed voice, Chaplin using the musical soundtrack to evoke the sentimental nostalgia inherent in all of his films and ultimately to introduce us to the tramp's heretofore unheard voice, when, near the end of the film, he finds employment as a singing waiter. In this scene Chaplin defies the law of naturalism by singing a lyric totally in gibberish, preferring to detail the song's narrative through the brilliance of his pantomime. Here he recapitulates his belief that actions speak louder than words by rendering the words superfluous.

When Modern Times was released, Tobis, the company that controlled the rights to À nous la liberté, brought suit against Chaplin for his "borrowing" from Clair. The suit, however, was never brought to court because of Clair's refusal to sanction the action: Clair claimed that he had been greatly inspired by Chaplin, and that if that director had been inspired by him in return, he was greatly honored. Critics of the day generally noted the similarities between the two films but rarely to the detriment of either.

The staple Chaplin narrative involved a struggle, and in Modern Times the tramp is shown encountering the modern urban landscape with its overabundance of menacing institutions. He assumes a variety of occupations from nightwatchman to singing waiter, from worker on the assembly line to worker at a shipyard. Each time his employment is short-lived, not because Charlie is incapable but because his human qualities interfere with the system. In the factory, the monotony of his job as a bolt tightener reduces him to a machine off the job—he is unable to stop fulfilling his mechanized duties, continuing to tighten everything in sight: noses, waterplugs, buttons, etc. This problem takes him to a hospital where, after recovering, he returns to the streets. There, picking up a red warning flag which has fallen off a truck, he unwittingly becomes the front man in a parade of radicals, his carrying of the flag landing him in jail. He unwittingly thwarts a jailbreak for which he is rewarded first with more luxurious quarters, then to his dismay, with an honorable discharge. Back in the work force, he gets a job at a shipyard, only to be fired when he accidentally and prematurely launches a new ship. Continuing along the path where good intentions misfire, he meets the gamine. He witnesses her act of thievery, realizes that it is provoked by hunger, and attempts to take the rap. Unfortunately, an eye witness thwarts Charlie's intentions, and the girl is taken away. Incensed, he goes about purposely committing a crime: he enters a restaurant and, after eating a large meal and smoking the best cigars, admits to having no money to pay. Gamine and tramp meet through their mutual arrests and escape together to the (dis)comfort of her waterfront shack, the location of which allows Chaplin some of his most elegant balletics, notably his dive into two feet of water in an attempt to cleanse himself.

Once again Charlie attempts to integrate himself into the modern system, this time by taking a job as a nightwatchman in a department store. Misplaced confidence in some friendly burglars ends in his being sent back to prison. When he is released, the gamine is waiting and takes him to his next job, that of a singing waiter. No sooner does he enjoy some success at this job than a juvenile court officer comes looking for the gamine. Deciding to forsake this entertainment industry job, he and the girl go arm in arm into the sunset, unemployed but happy. Optimism infuses this final image, but as always, pessimism has been firmly situated throughout: his aesthetic rejection of cinematic advances, his moral rejection of industrialization.

This last scene, the indestructible tramp walking into the sunset empty of hand but full of heart, is but one of many references in this film to Chaplin's silent comedies. In the factory he converts the moment of despair into one of humor, notably when the feeding machine goes berserk, and by so doing refers to the slapstick comedy of the teens when food was used as an arsenal rather than as goods for consumption. In the parade scene he reinterprets the meaning of an object—the flag's being transformed from a warning of danger to a symbol of freedom from incarceration; in the toy store he reinvents his roller skating scene from The Rink (1916); in the restaurant he recreates his Gold Rush dinner scene, changing the food from sustenance for the stomach to sustenance for the spirit by using the duck first as a football then a chandelier ornament rife with delight rather than calories. Throughout the film Chaplin continues to assert his belief that actions speak louder than words, that the dictum "don't bite the hand that feeds you" is fallacious, that optimism must prevail despite omnipresent pessimism and adversity, and that one must continue to uphold the values that have served him well in the past. The reappearance of Chester Conklin and other silent film players in this film further strengthens Chaplin's ode to the past and past values.

Initially a financial failure, Modern Times has since been hailed as one of Chaplin's most eloquent social statements. Accused of embodying Red propaganda, the film was banned in Germany and Italy, and in Austria it was trimmed of the flag waving scene by incensed censors. At best a flirtation with radical politics, its real message lies in the rejection of modern urban life and the need for the reinstatement of human rather than mechanical values. With Modern Times Chaplin retained his position as spokesman for the underprivileged.

—Doug Tomlinson

MONA LISA

UK, 1986

Director: Neil Jordan

Production: A Palace Production for Handmade Films; Technicolor; running time: 104 minutes; length: 9,368 feet. Released 1986.

Executive producers: George Harrison, Denis O'Brien; producers: Stephen Woolley, Patrick Cassavetti; screenplay: Neil Jordan, David Leland; photography: Roger Pratt; camera operator: Mike Roberts; editor: Lesley Walker; sound editors: Jonathan Bates, Chris Kelly; sound recordists: David John, Dave Hunt; sound re-recordists:

Mona Lisa

Paul Carr, Brian Paxton, Andy Jackson; production designer: Jamie Leonard; art director: Gemma Jackson; costume designer: Louise Frogley; music: Michael Kamen.

Cast: Bob Hoskins (George); Cathy Tyson (Simone); Michael Caine (Mortwell); Robbie Coltrane (Thomas); Clarke Peters (Anderson); Kate Hardie (Kathy); Zoe Nathansen (Jeannie); Sammi Davis (May); Rod Bedall (Terry); Joe Brown (Dudley); Pauline Melville (George's Wife); Hossein Karimbeik (Raschid); John Darling (Hotel Security); Bryan Coleman (Gentleman in Mirror Room); Robert Dorning (Hotel Bedroom Man); Raad Raawi (Arab Servant); David Halliwell (Tim Devlin); Stephen Persaud (Black Youth in Street); Maggie O'Neill (Girl in Paradise Club); Gary Cady (Hotel Waiter); Donna Cannon (Young Prostitute); Perry Fenwick (Pimp); Dawn Archibald (Wig Girl in Club); Richard Strange (Porn Shop Man); Alan Talbot (Bath House Attendant); Geoffrey Larder (Hotel Clerk); Helen Martin (Peep Show Girl); Kenny Baker, Jack Purvis, Bill Moore (Brighton Busters).

Awards: Palme d'Or, Cannes Festival, 1986; BAFTA Award for Best Actor (Hoskins) 1986.

Publications

Script:

Jordan, Neil, and David Leland, Mona Lisa, London, 1986.

Books:

Tummolini, Stefano, and Chiara Calpini, Neil Jordan, Rome, 1996.
Rogers, Lori, Feminine Nation: Performance, Gender, and Resistance in the Works of John McGahern and Neil Jordan, Lanham, 1998.

Articles:

Stills (London), December 1985-January 1986.
Film Directions (Belfast), vol. 8, no. 31, 1986.
Variety (New York), 14 May 1986.
Hollywood Reporter, 19 June 1986.
City Limits (London), 28 August-4 September 1986.

- Codelli, Lorenzo, in Positif (Paris), September 1986.
 Combs, Richard, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), September 1986.
 Pym, John, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1986.
 Anderson P., in Films in Review (New York), October 1986.
 Roddick, Nick, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), January 1987.
 Barra, Allen, "Here Comes Mr. Jordan: Irish Literary Man Neil Jordan Made a Splash with Mona Lisa: Now He Arrives in Hollywood with We're No Angels: Will They Let Him Stay?" in American Film, vol. 15, no. 4, January 1990.
 Glicksman, Marlaine, "Irish Eyes: Interview with Irish Motion Picture Director Neil Jordan," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 26, no. 1, January-February 1990.
 "Jordan, Neil," in Current Biography, vol. 54, no. 8, August 1993.
 James, Joy, "Black Femmes Fatales and Sexual Abuse in Progressive 'White' Cinema: Neil Jordan's Mona Lisa and The Crying Game," in Camera Obscura (Bloomington), no. 36, September 1995.
 Schruers, Fred, "Neil Jordan: Film Director," in Rolling Stone, no. 747, 14 November 1996.
 "Borderline Case: Neil Jordan Has Gone Crazy for Things Irrational, But There Is a Power of Method in His Madness," in Time International, vol. 150, no. 26, 23 February 1998.

* * *

Following his characteristically ebullient and pugnacious portrayal of East End gang boss Harold Shand in The Long Good Friday Bob Hoskins plunges back again into the London underworld in this story of George, a small-time gangster released from a seven-year stretch for someone else's crime only to find his old world utterly changed. Eventually his former boss gives him a menial job chauffeuring Simone, a young, black, and very exclusive prostitute. George falls in love with her, but she is concerned only with finding her friend Cathy, a heroin-addicted fellow prostitute who has mysteriously disappeared. She enlists George's help and eventually they track her down. However, George then discovers, much to his chagrin, that the two women are in fact lovers.

Mona Lisa is at its best in the passages in which it comes across as a contemporary British film noir, a kind of latterday Night and the City. Particularly impressive in this respect are the scenes in the Kings Cross red-light district (somewhat cleaned up since the film's production) which have a genuinely infernal, Taxi Driver-ish feel about them, the plush hotel foyers which conceal less salubrious goings-on behind their luxurious facades, Michael Caine's briefly glimpsed but convincingly nasty gangster Mortwell (not unlike John Osborne's crime boss in Get Carter), the final bloodbath in Brighton, and George's seemingly endless trapeze through the strip joints, peep shows, and hostess clubs of Soho. Certainly the view of human relationships which emerges from this urban nightmare is as black as anything produced by Hollywood in the 1940s: the central theme emerges clearly as the illusory nature of romantic love and, more specifically, the male habit of projecting hopelessly idealized, unrealistic images onto women to whom they are attracted. Director Neil Jordan describes it as an "anti-erotic movie" which deals with "misplaced passions and emotional devastation," whilst writer David Leland admitted that "what emerged for me working on this film is the extraordinary capacity human beings seem to have to lead double lives, and it makes me wonder if any of us can ever know who the hell it is we're living with. It must involve an incredible amount of lying to one's partner, to the other people one's close to—and to oneself." Undoubtedly the film's thoroughly unromantic view of sexual relationships of any kind owes something to the fact that Leland's previous script—Personal Services—also revolved around the world of prostitution.

On the other hand, Mona Lisa, as an urban thriller, lacks a certain necessary élan. The problem here (as in so much British cinema) is a tendency towards literariness, towards spelling things out and dotting the 'i's' and crossing the 't's' as opposed to embedding the themes as it were "invisibly" in the narrative. In other words what it finally lacks is the characteristic narrative economy of the Hollywood model—as the self-reflexively inserted clip from They Live by Night rather unfortunately emphasises. (That such a cultural transition is in fact possible is proved by the existence of the aforementioned Get Carter; typically, however, the best British thriller of recent times—Philip Saville's Gangsters—was made for television and now lies unseen, gathering dust in the BBC vaults.) The problem is compounded by allowing George to become something of a comic, lovable misfit—for example, in the scene (reprised from The Long Good Friday) in which he returns to his neighbourhood after his years inside to find it considerably changed, his rather sentimentalized relationship with his old friend Thomas, and his inability to distinguish between smart and merely flashy clothes. As Richard Combs concludes in Monthly Film Bulletin, "in this respect, and for all the film's toughness and violence, we are not very far from the kind of British cinema—sort of Ealing-Forsyth—which is always inclined to bury everything in eccentricity and whimsy."

—Julian Petley

MONANIEBA

See POKAIANIE

DIE MÖRDER SIND UNTER UNS

(The Murderers are Among Us)

East Germany, 1946

Director: Wolfgang Staudte

Production: DEFA (East Germany); black and white, 35mm; running time: 86 minutes; length: 2400 meters. Released 1946. Filmed spring 1946 in Berlin.

Producer: Herbert Uhlich; screenplay: Wolfgang Staudte; photography: Friedl Behn-Grund and Eugen Klagemann; editor: Lilian Seng; sound recordist: Dr. Klaus Jungk; production designers: Otto Hunte and Bruno Monden; music: Ernst Roters.

Cast: Hildegard Knef (sometimes Neff) (Susanna Wallner); Ernst Fischer (Dr. Mertens); Arno Paulsen (Captain Bruckner); Erna Sellmer (Frau Bruckner); Robert Forsch (Herr Mondschein); Albert Johann (Herr Timm).

Die Mörder sind unter uns

Publications

Books:

- Manvell, Roger, and Heinrich Fraenkel, The German Cinema, New York, 1971.
 Wollenberg, H. H., 50 Years of German Film, London, 1972.
 Netenjakob, Egon, Staudte, with Eva Orbanz, Hans Helmut Prinzler, and Heinz Ungereit, Berlin, 1991.
 Ludin, Malte, Wolfgang Staudte, Rowohlt, 1996.

Articles:

- Monthly Film Bulletin* (London), no. 172, 1948.
Today's Cinema (London), 2 April 1948.
Kine Weekly (London), 15 April 1948.
Cue (New York), 21 August 1948.
Bianco e Nero (Rome), September 1948.
 George, Manfred, "Hildegard Neff," in Films in Review (New York), November 1955.
Filmkritik (Munich), no. 1, 1960.

- Bachmann, J., "Wolfgang Staudte," in Film (London), Summer 1963.
 Mancina, Adrienne, "Films from the German Democratic Republic," in Museum of Modern Art Department of Film (New York), 20 November-29 December 1975.
Information (Wiesbaden), no. 3-6, 1976.
 Karkosch, K., "Wolfgang Staudte," in Film und Ton (Munich), March 1976.
Information (Wiesbaden), January-February 1978.
 Interview with Wolfgang Staudte, in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), vol. 19, no. 5, May 1991.
 Baker, M., "'Truemmerfilme': Postwar German Cinema, 1946-1948," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 20, no. 1/2, 1995/1996.

* * *

By March 1946, nine months after the armistice, a film crew dominated by veterans of the Nazi industry was out in the streets of devastated Berlin, in front of Stettiner railway station and on flattened Alexanderplatz, shooting the first postwar German film, Die Mörder sind unter uns. The director, Wolfgang Staudte, worked under the auspices of DEFA, the only production company licensed in the Soviet Zone. Founded on the remains of the old Ufa empire, DEFA had a distinct material advantage over its western counterparts: what remained of giant studios and even raw stock plants was concentrated in the eastern, Soviet Zone, of Germany. Mörder is both an exposé denouncing the ability of Nazi war criminals to bury their pasts and to enjoy respected positions in the new German society and a romance between a returning concentration camp survivor and a doctor whose participation in the war has left him an alcoholic with no will to rebuild his life.

The prominence of the love story and the casting of Hildegard Knef (a very unlikely looking camp victim) effectively mutes the political criticism implied by the film. Nevertheless, Mörder was well received by contemporary critics as a serious and realistic drama. The arrival of this film in Western Europe and America occasioned speculation that a new German film industry would soon spring to life. This prediction was, of course, premature. Today, in spite of the location shooting, it is the leftovers of an older expressionist style that seem to permeate Staudte's work. The ruins of Berlin were a ready-made horror film set, and expressionist stylization sets the tone in this film much as it did in postwar American film noir—the heavy shadows, the weird angles, the use of frames within frames. Ravaged Berlin is used as a metaphor for the broken people who live there. In one emphatic cut, the film switches from the hero's confession of his own war guilt to a long held shot of a crumbling building, dust rising from the rubble beneath it. Staudte indulges in heavy irony. The camera zooms in on a poster advertizing "beautiful Germany" in the midst of desolation through the rubble; he quips, "The city is coming back to life." With oblique camera angles, the film also creates a subjective view of the doctor's drunken interludes.

Mörder was the first in a cycle of "Trümmerfilme" or "rubble films," produced mainly by DEFA, using the streets of Berlin as backdrops for melancholy dramas concerning contemporary issues—the returning soldier, the black market, war criminals. Meanwhile, as the many competing companies licensed in the west went into action, more escapist, apolitical films began to dominate German production. Staudte, who had worked in the Nazi film industry, may have retreated from a clear coming to terms with the issue of war guilt in Die Mörder sind unter uns, but he did produce a serious drama securely moored in a contemporary milieu, something German filmmakers had refused to do for years. What seems lacking is a break with the past in style as well as subject matter.

—Ann Harris

MORTE A VENEZIA

(Death in Venice)

Italy, 1971

Director: Luchino Visconti

Production: Alfa Cinematografica (Rome) and P.E.C.F. (Paris); Technicolor, 35mm, Panavision; running time: 131 minutes, some versions are 128 minutes. Released 1971.

Morte a Venezia

Producers: Mario Gallo with Luchino Visconti, Nicolas Badalucco; and Robert Gordon Edwards; screenplay: Luchino Visconti and Nicolas Badalucco, from the novel by Thomas Mann; photography: Pasquale De Santis; editor: Ruggero Mastroianni; sound: Vittorio Trentino with Giuseppe Muratori; art director: Ferdinando Scarfiotti; music: Gustav Mahler; music director: Franco Mannino; costume designer: Piero Tosi.

Cast: Dirk Bogarde (Gustav von Aschenbach); Romolo Valli (Director of the "Hotel Des Bains"); Nora Ricci (Governess of Tadzio); Mark Burns (Alfried); Marisa Berenson (Mogol of G.V.A.); Carole André (Esmeralda); Leslie French (Cook's agent); Sergio Garfagnoli (Jasciu); Franco Fabrizi (Barber); Dominique Darel (English tourist); Masha Predit (Russian tourist); Silvano Mangano (Tadzio's mother); Ciro Cristogoletti; Antonio Apicella; Bruno Boschetti; Luigi Battaglia; Mirella Pompili; Björn Andersen (Tadzio).

Award: Cannes Film Festival, Special Prize, 1971.

Publications

Script:

Visconti, Luchino, and Nicolas Badalucco, Morte a Venezia, edited by Lino Micciché, Bologna, 1971.

Books:

- Baldelli, Pio, Luchino Visconti, Milan, 1973.
 Hinxman, Margaret, and Susan d'Arcy, The Films of Dirk Bogarde, London, 1974.
 Ferrero, Adelio, editor, Visconti: Il cinema, Modena, 1977.
 Bianchi, Pietro, Maestri del cinema, Milan, 1977.
 Tornabuoni, Lietta, editor, Album Visconti, Milan, 1978.
 Stirling, Monica, A Screen of Time: A Study of Luchino Visconti, New York, 1979.
 Servadio, Gaia, Luchino Visconti, Milan, 1980; as Luchino Visconti: A Biography, London, 1981; New York, 1983.
 Becivenni, Alessandro, Luchino Visconti, Florence, 1982.
 Tonetti, Claretta, Luchino Visconti, Boston, 1983.
 Ishaghpour, Youssef, Luchino Visconti: Le Sens et l'image, Paris, 1984.
 Sanzio, Alain, and Paul-Louis Thirard, Luchino Visconti: Cinéaste, Paris, 1984.
 De Giusti, Luciano, I film di Luchino Visconti, Rome, 1985.
 Geitel, Klaus, and others, Luchino Visconti, Munich, 1985.
 Mancini, Elaine, Luchino Visconti: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1986.
 Villien, Bruno, Visconti, Paris, 1986.
 Schifano, Laurence, Luchino Visconti: Les Feux de la passion, Paris, 1987.
 Tanitch, Robert, Dirk Bogarde: The Complete Career Illustrated, London, 1988.
 Partridge, C.J., Senso: Visconti's Film and Biotto's Novella: A Case Study in the Relation between Literature and Film, Lewiston, NY, 1992.
 Bacon, Henry, Visconti: Explorations of Beauty and Decay, Cambridge and New York, 1998.

Articles:

- Elsaesser, Thomas, "Luchino Visconti," in Brighton Film Review, February 1970.
 "Visconti Issue" of Cinema (Rome), April 1970.
 Alpert, Hollis, in Saturday Review (New York), 8 August 1970.
 Hinxman, Margaret, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1970.
 Radkai, K., "Luchino Visconti," in Vogue (New York), 1 November 1970.
 Tynan, Kenneth, "Death in Venice: At the End of the Path of Beauty Lies Eros," in Vogue (New York), December 1970.
 "Mort à Venise Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), July 1971.
 Korte, Walter, "Marxism and Formalism in the Films of Luchino Visconti," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1971.
 Oudart, J. P., and S. Daney, "Le Nom-de-l'auteur," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January-February 1972.
 Guiguet, J. C., in Image et Son (Paris), February 1972.
 Hutchinson, A., in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Winter 1974.
 Bogemski, G., "Nachkomme eines alten Herrscher-geschlechts," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), October 1979 to June 1980.
 Galerstein, C., "Images of Decadence in Visconti's Death in Venice," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1985.
 Amengual, Barthélemy, in Positif (Paris), September 1985.
 Medhurst, Andy, "Dirk Bogarde," in All Our Yesterdays, edited by Charles Barr, London, 1986.

- Badalucco, N., "Come si scrive una sceneggiatura," in Cinema & Cinema (Bologna), September-December 1989.
 Bolleme, G., "Plus beau que l'on ne saurait dire," in Camera/Stylo (Paris), December 1989.
 Verdier, A., "De l'écrit à l'image," in Camera/Stylo (Paris), December 1989.
 Málek, Petr, "Variace na téma Viscontiho Smrti v Benátkách," in Illuminace, vol. 7, no. 1, 1995.
 Hallouin, L., "Text, Film, Memory: Note on Two Variations of Melancholy," in Iris (Iowa City), no. 19, Autumn 1995.
 Bertellini, G., "A Battle d'arrière-garde," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 50, no. 4, 1997.
 Rohdie, S., "Time and Consciousness in Luchino Visconti," in Metro (Victoria, Australia), no. 113, 1998.

* * *

Director Luchino Visconti's screen adaptation of Thomas Mann's Death in Venice is both a triumph of visual style and a problematic study of literature-into-film translations. In collaboration with cinematographer Pasquale De Santis, Visconti captures Mann's haunting story in images of hypnotic beauty, yet they are images which the film's verbal exposition cannot always equal.

One of the themes of Mann's brilliant novella has to do with the artist's recognition of the power and validity of physical beauty, and Visconti's cinematic approach conveys his understanding of this theme in every frame. The splendor of Venice, the elegance of Aschenbach's seaside hotel, the androgynous perfection of the boy Tadzio—all are photographed in a lush, unhurried manner that allows the viewer to linger on a detail or to simply absorb the richness of the scene as a whole. This is a story—and a film—of contemplation, and Visconti permits his audience to share in the overwhelming sensuality that will penetrate Aschenbach's emotional reserve and shatter his lifelong convictions about philosophy and art.

Yet as this is also a story of death—Aschenbach's own, as well as the destruction of his rigidly-held ideas—Visconti has permeated his film with an atmosphere of decay. Images of death are everywhere. Indeed, when Aschenbach at last allows himself to be powdered and rouged into a pathetic parody of youthfulness, his face resembles nothing so much as a death mask, streaked with black as the sun melts the paint around his eyes. This pairing of beauty and death, which lies at the heart of the story itself, lends the film an unsettling, almost oppressive air, reminiscent of flowers on the verge of wilting. Visconti himself was close to 70 when Death in Venice was made and would complete only three more pictures after its release. It is clear from the film's painful illumination of the gulf between youth and old age that it was a concern much on the filmmaker's own mind.

The shortcomings of Death in Venice are those which every film adaptation must face, i.e. the nearly insurmountable difficulties inherent in transposing interior thoughts into visible images. To understand the effect that his obsession with Tadzio has on Aschenbach, one must first grasp the rejection of emotion and the physical senses that has informed Aschenbach's work as an artist. Mann conveys this information through straight-forward description of his character's meditations on art, a method not available to Visconti. Instead, the director resorts to a series of flashbacks in which Aschenbach and a friend argue bitterly over their opposing views on art and life. The resulting scenes seem static and talky when juxtaposed with Visconti's fluid—and virtually wordless—presentation of the delicate interplay between Aschenbach and the enigmatic Tadzio.

The flashbacks, however, merely lay the groundwork for most of the film's action, and in depicting Aschenbach's growing love for Tazio and the older man's subsequent decline, Visconti's strong cinematic sense serves him well. He is aided by a finely textured performance from Dirk Bogarde, who has been made up to resemble composer Gustav Mahler, upon whom Mann is said to have based his character, and by Mahler's stirring Fifth Symphony which is the basis of the film's soundtrack. Despite its flaws, Death in Venice remains an absorbing and visually stunning adaptation of Mann's challenging work.

—Janet E. Lorenz

MOSCOW DISTRUSTS TEARS

See MOSKVA SLEZAM NE VERIT

MOSCOW DOES NOT BELIEVE IN TEARS

See MOSKVA SLEZAM NE VERIT

MOSKVA SLEZAM NE VERIT

(Moscow Does Not Believe in Tears; Moscow Distrusts Tears)

USSR, 1979

Director: Vladimir Menshov

Production: Mosfilm; color; running time: 145 minutes.

Producer: V. Kuchinsky; screenplay: Valentin Yornykh; photography: Igor Slabnjewitsch; editor: Jelene Mischajora; music: Sergei Nikitin; art designer: Said Menyalshchikov.

Cast: Vera Alentova (Katya); Alexsei Batalov (Goscha); Irina Muravyova (Lyuda); Raissa Ryazanova (Antonia); Yuri Vasilyav (Rudolf).

Awards: Oscar for Best Foreign Language Film, 1980.

Publications

Articles:

Bauman, E., "Vremia skvoz' sud'by," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 2, 1980.

Ishimov, V. and others, "Pochemu tak vzolnovany zriteli," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 9, 1980.

Moskva slexam ne verit

Engvan, I., "Moskva tror inte pa tarar," in Filmrutan (Sweden), no. 4, 1981.

Fonda-Bonardi, C., in Cineaste (New York), vol. 11, no. 3, 1981.

Gusner, I., "Lieber arm, aber gluecklich: der Autor des Films Moskau glaubt den Traenen nicht, Walentin Tschernych, ueber seine Arbeit," in Film and Fernsehen (Berlin), vol. 9, no. 1, 1981.

Tschernych, W., "Ein phaenomenaler Erfolg," in Film and Fernsehen (Berlin), vol. 9, no. 6, 1981.

Schickel, Richard, "Cinema: Lovers and Laziness," in Time (New York), 11 May 1981.

Kauffman, Stanley, New Republic (New York), 23 May 1981.

Grenier, R., "Movies: A Soviet 'New Wave'?", in Commentary (New York), July 1981.

Stefanoni, L., "Mosca non crede alle lacrime," in Cineforum (Bergamo), December 1981.

Poitras, H., "Moscou est insensible aux larmes," in Sequences (London), January 1982.

Bruciamonti, A., "Mosca non crede alle lacrime," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), February 1982.

Portal, M., "Moscou ne croit pas aux larmes," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), February 1982.

Thirard, P. -L., "Moscou ne croit pas aux larmes," in Positif (Paris), June 1982.

Schmemann, S., "Ordinary Life Stars in Soviet Films," in the New York Times, 14 August 1983.

Skoop, vol. 22, no. 3, April-May 1986.

Galiano, C., "Salir no quiere decir ilegal," in Cine Cubano (Habana), no. 119, 1987.

Koroleva, A., "Odnazhdy v SSSR," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 2, 1996.

Balynina, N., "Moskvici i gosti stolicy," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 8, August 1997.

* * *

It may be true that Moscow does not believe in tears but the film by this title is at least a two-handkerchief movie. Russian sentiment is the ultimate driving force in this exploration of love, social class, success and failure, male-female roles, traditional versus modern Russian values, and the nature of family. Part I focuses on the social circle of a young working-class Russian woman, a factory worker whose ambition leads to dramatic professional and personal choices; Part II examines the consequences of these decisions 20 years later. We also see what has happened to her contemporaries over two decades, and how Soviet society has changed as well. Though romantic in its resolution, the film is also sometimes as tough-minded as its title suggests, with fairly scathing commentaries on how the new Soviet society has gone wrong.

Katerina, the heroine, played by Vera Alentova, and her more extroverted friend Ludmilla (Irina Muravyova) are non-Muscovites employed in a factory and living in a workers' dormitory in Moscow. Katerina has failed her college entrance exam by just two points, and her drive to succeed is contrasted, often amusingly, with Ludmilla's search for a quick way up. "Life is a lottery," she maintains, in which women can win the right kind of socially prestigious husband and Moscow citizenship with all the privileges it brings. A third friend, Tonya is more conventional than Katerina or Ludmilla, marrying early for love and settling for a typical domestic life with a kindly man. When Ludmilla's uncle lends her a dream apartment (in fact, a real edifice built by Stalin and famed as a touchstone of unimaginable wealth), she and Katerina, claiming they are daughters of a famous professor, play host to a party for successful males (some of whom Ludmilla picks up in the Lenin library). This ploy allows Ludmilla to snare her mate, a popular athlete, and leads to the seduction of Katerina by Rudolph, a young television cameraman, who has a ready patter about the coming triumph of technology. When Katerina becomes pregnant, she refuses to press him for marriage or even help, Ludmilla's intervention notwithstanding; Rudolph proves a weak mama's boy and Katerina has the baby alone, beginning a hard life as a single mother working her way up in the male world of the factory.

Part I has some sharp defining moments which illuminate Soviet life of the late 1950s. The long nightmare of Stalin was over and young people could speak more freely than their parents ever could, but the agonizing rebuilding period after World War II, the Great Patriotic War, was not yet finished, with cramped and flimsy "Khrushchev apartments" unable to accommodate the flood of immigrants to the cities. Rudolph's mother says explosively that she's had enough of communal living, and won't allow Katerina and her baby into her apartment already filled with four people; crowded shots of wedding celebrations and meals accentuate her complaint, the camera angles showing ceilings and doorways framing teeming groups. The class system is alive and well, as former peasants take new roles in factories that only enforce their distance from the educated nomenklatura, the elite academic and managerial class. Ludmilla comments that two things give you away—incorrect speech and dumb questions—and goes on to explain that stupidities spoken with confidence become a "point of view." But how she overcomes speech is never explained. There is a lusting after things urban and foreign: Rudolph the cameraman has a non-Russian name and is far more enchanted with his glitzy technology than with human or social values. A festival of French films draws groupies squealing at the sight of Russian stars in attendance, including, amusingly, Innokenty Smoktundusky, the Soviet Union's most popular star, playing himself as he was in 1958, an unknown and aging bit player. Yet in spite of these faults, Soviet society then offered hope for the future, a hope manifest in the character of Katerina and Ludmilla, both struggling in their own ways for a better life.

Part I ends with Katerina setting her alarm clock. Part II begins with the shot dissolving into an alarm ringing, but it is a newer, fancier clock, in a far nicer apartment, 20 years having passed. Katerina's daughter, Alexandra, is now a young woman, and Katerina herself is an executive running a factory, a series of shop floor promotions having provided her with a later 1970s dream lifestyle: office job, car, a nice apartment. A chance television appearance reintroduces Rudolph (now Rodion, a Russian name), who has two failed marriages behind him and is still pushing a camera around. He asks to see his daughter, but Katerina refuses. She is having an unsatisfactory affair with a married man but is still reluctant to accept the advances of Gosha, a handsome fitter she meets on a train. He pursues her charmingly, cooking meals, winning over her daughter, and generally epitomizing the idealized socialist man, a manual worker completely satisfied by the challenges of his research institute work unit, while also exhibiting literacy and amazing technical and social competence. Rudolph's crashing into the scene to see his daughter leads to Gosha walking out, not over sexual jealousy, but because Katerina has never revealed the importance and salary of her job to him; this contretemps is resolved in a very Russian way, with huge quantities of vodka. The film ends with Katerina, Gosha, and Alexandra eating at the kitchen table, a domestic tableau emblematic of the triumph of Russian family values. The passionate tangos which had dominated the background music of Katerina's earlier, superficial relationships are replaced by bitter-sweet Russian love songs indicative of her finally having found her true place.

Moscow Does Not Believe in Tears has it both ways: it is sometimes harsh in its depiction of individual frailty (alcoholism, male ego, female duplicity) while implying that the authorities provide insufficient remedies, a neat trick that surprised American audiences but not Russian ones, but it is also soft, even sentimental, in the final analysis. Katerina exclaims to Gosha, "How long I searched for you!" He replies, "Eight days," the period of his tantrum, and she repeats her line, indicating a faith in the idea of the One True Other, the ultimate romantic concept. Gosha has complained earlier that growing cabbages is as noble a work as being an emperor. He also is offended that Katerina might think a person's social standing is more important than their personal qualities. If all Soviets had lived by these values, the Union would survive still: socialist morality and domesticity meet ambition tamed by common sense.

Unfortunately, the main characters of Moscow have much in common with the heroic statues of male and female workers which rise above exhibits to working-class accomplishments: they are too perfect, too idealized, simply too much to engage the long-term imagination. (Katerina and Gosha admit he is "perfect"). As glossy exemplars of their place and time, however, they are excellent, as evidenced by the phenomenal box-office successes of this film, both in the Soviet Union (where it was the most popular film of the 1970s) and the US (Academy Award for Best Foreign Language Film of 1980). Happily, the film overcomes its hortatory roots, providing a wonderfully satisfying emotional experience: when viewed, this is not Soviet woman and man, but rather skillfully realized individual portraits created through fine acting and an engaging plot. Ultimately, comedy rescues Moscow from sentimentality—the viewer chuckles at these very human mortals struggling to get by.

—Andrew and Gina Macdonald

MOTHER

See MAT

MOTHER INDIA

See BHARAT MATA

MOTHER JOAN OF THE ANGELS

See MATKA JOANNA OD ANIOLOW

MUERTE DE UN CICLISTA

(Death of a Cyclist)

Spain, 1955

Director: Juan Antonio Bardem

Production: Cesareo Gonzalez (Madrid), Trionfalcine (Rome), and Guion PC (Paris); black and white, 35mm; running time: originally 91 minutes but cut by Spanish censors to 88 minutes. Released 9 September 1955, Madrid. Filmed 29 November 1954–29 March 1955.

Screenplay: Juan Antonio Bardem and Luis F. De Igoa, from the novel by De Igoa; photography: Alfredo Fraile; editor: Margarita Ochoa; sound: Alfonso Carvajal; sound for French version: Jacques Bonpaint; art director: Enrique Alarcon; art director for French version: Jacques Willemetz; music: Isidro B. Maztegui.

Cast: Lucia Bose (Maria Jose de Castro); Alberto Closas (Juan); Carlos Casaravilla (Rafael Sandoval, called Rafa); Otello Toso (Miguel de Castro); Bruna Corra (Matilde); Alicia Romay (Cristina); Julia Delgado Caro (Dona Maria); Matilde Muñoz Sampedro (Neighbor); Mercedes Albert (Cristina); Emilio Alonso (Jorge).

Award: Cannes Film Festival, Critics Prize, 1955.

Publications

Script:

Bardem, Juan Antonio, and Luis F. De. Igoa, Mort d'un cycliste, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 February 1964.

Books:

Oms, Marcel, J. A. Bardem, Lyons, n.d.

Gomez, Angel A. Perez, and Jose L. Martinez Montalban, Cine espanol 1951–1978: Diccionario de directores, Bilbao, 1978.

Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, editors, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to Its Achievement: Journey Two, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1979.

Egido, Luciano G., J.A. Bardem, Huelva, 1983(?).

Schwartz, Ronald, Spanish Film Directors (1950–1985): 21 Profiles, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1986.

Abajos de Pablos, Juan Eugenio Julio de, Mis charlas con Juan Antonio Bardem, Valladolid, 1996.

Articles:

“New Names: Spain,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1956.

Bardem, Juan, “Spanish Highway,” in Films and Filming (London), June 1957.

Aranda, J. F., “Bardem: Une Methode de travail,” in Cinéma (Paris), no. 33, 1959.

Durand, Philippe, “Juan Antonio Bardem, homme d’Espagne,” in Image et Son (Paris), October 1959.

Sadoul, Georges, “Un Evénement important,” in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 February 1964.

* * *

At a meeting in Salamanca in 1955 Spain’s young filmmakers declared: “We want to struggle for a national cinema. Through our cinema we want to enter into contact with the people and the regions of Spain, with the people and the regions of the entire world.” The spirit of Salamanca was manifested in a film released that same year, Muerte de un ciclista. Directed by Juan Antonio Bardem, Muerte de un ciclista won the critics grand prize at the Cannes Film Festival. It established contact not only with the people of Spain but also with international audiences and marked the rebirth of Spain cinema in the post-Civil War period.

The style of Muerte de un ciclista attests to the influence of a number of diverse filmmakers. In its dramatic use of cross-cutting it follows Eisenstein’s principle of montage by collision; in its themes and subject matter it resembles such Italian neorealist works as Antonioni’s Cronaca di un amore (1950). Indeed, some critics have criticized Bardem’s style for being too eclectic and derivative. Nevertheless, Muerte de un ciclista is of exceptional interest as a document of the early 1950s in Spain. It reveals how privileged members of the Franco regime lived and provides a critical view of those who profited socially and financially from the dictatorship. It also offers brief glimpses of Madrid’s lower classes and of university students impatient for change. Both of these groups would reject the assertion made by one of the upper class characters that they are living in a “golden age.”

Muerte de un ciclista begins as a domestic drama. A car speeding down a windswept, deserted highway hits a man on a bicycle. After stopping and confirming that the victim is still alive, the couple in the car speed away, leaving the stricken man on the road. We subsequently learn that Juan, the man in the car, is a university professor; the woman who was driving is the wife of a wealthy businessman.

Muerte de un ciclista

Afraid that the accident will reveal their adulterous affair, they choose to let the cyclist die, thereby touching off a chain of events that leads the protagonist, a former soldier on the Falange side, to re-examine his life and to see the compromises that he has made and the ideals that he has sacrificed.

Juan is both an individual and a representative of a social class and a particular generation. He stands in sharp contrast to the university students whom he teaches. These students, like the real students in Madrid in the 1950s, hold demonstrations and denounce what they perceive to be injustices in the system. By alternating scenes between the university students and the upper class world of the lovers, Bardem expands the focus of his story and explores the social and political dimensions of the protagonists' actions.

Although the ending of the film remains ambiguous (because of conditions imposed by the censor, some would argue), Bardem's point of view is clear. Muerte de un ciclista is a parable on the selfishness of the ruling classes, a meditation on the impact of Spain's past upon the present, and an expression of Bardem's fervent hope that the future will be different.

—Katherine Singer Kovács

MUI DU DU XANH

See L'ODEUR DE LA PAPAYE VERTE

MUJERES AL BORDE DE UN ATAQUE DE NERVIOS

(Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown)

Spain, 1988

Director: Pedro Almodovar

Production: El Desoe and Lauren Films; Eastmancolor; running time: 98 minutes.

Executive producer: Agustin Almodovar; associate producer: Antonio Llorens; screenplay: Pedro Almodovar; photography: Jose

Luis Alcaine; editor: Jose Salcedo; sound: Guilles Ortion; music: Bernardo Bonezzi; costume designer: Jose Maria de Cossio.

Cast: Carmen Maura (Pepa); Antonio Banderas (Carlos); Fernando Guillén (Ivan); Julieta Serrano (Lucia); Maria Barranco (Candela); Rossy de Palma (Marisa); Kiti Manver (Paulina); with Chus Lampreave, Yayo Calvo; Lotes Leon, and Angel de Andres Lopez.

Publications

Books:

- Bouza Vidal, Nuria, The Films of Pedro Almodovar, translated by Linda Moore and Victoria Hughes, Madrid, 1988.
- Smith, Paul Julian, García Lorca/Almodóvar: Gender, Nationality, and the Limits of the Visible, Cambridge, 1995.
- Vernon, Kathleen M., and Barbara Morris, editors, Post-Franco, Postmodern: The Films of Pedro Almodovar, Westport, 1995.
- Allinson, Mark, A Spanish Labyrinth: The Films of Pedro Almodovar, London, 2000.
- Smith, Paul J., Desire Unlimited: The Cinema of Pedro Almodovar, New York, 2000.

Articles:

- Bergdahl, G., "Pedro Almodovar—en motvillig surrealist," in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 5, 1988.
- Toubiana, S., "Femmes au bord de la crise de nerfs," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1988.
- Interview* (New York), November 1988.
- Kael, Pauline, "The Current Cinema: Unreal," in New Yorker, 14 November 1988.
- Klawans, S., in Nation (New York), 5 December 1988.
- New Republic* (Washington, D.C.), 12 December 1988.
- Los Angeles Times*, 20 December 1988.
- Razlogov, K., "Karmen Maura na grant nervnogo sryba," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 4, 1989.
- Robertson, R., "Augustin Almodovar," in Millimeter (New York), January 1989.
- Films in Review* (New York), February 1989.
- Canby, Vincent, in New York Times Current Events Edition (New York), 17 December 1989.
- James, C., "Film View: Sometimes Light Comes from Dark Places," in the New York Times, 24 June 1990.
- D'Lugo, M., "Almodóvar's City of Desire," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (Reading), vol. 13, no. 4, 1991.
- Warren, Michael, "Spanish Director Samples Realism," in Columbian (Vancouver), 5 May 1996.
- Neuhaus, Mel, in Video Magazine (New York), vol. 21, no. 8, December 1997.
- Holland, Jonathan, "Pedro Reigns in Spain: Almodovar Still Considered an Icon," in Variety (New York), vol. 370, no. 10, 20–26 April 1998.
- Willem, Linda M., "Almodóvar on the Verge of Cocteau's La voix humaine," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 26, no. 2, April 1998.
- Van Meter, Jonathan, "A Man of Many Women," in New York Magazine (New York), 12 September 1999.

Cortina, Betty, "On the Verge," in Entertainment Weekly (New York), 19 November 1999.

Terry-Azios, Diana, "All About Almodóvar," in Hispanic (Washington, D.C.), vol. 13, no. 3, March 2000.

* * *

Pedro Almodovar's Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown, a hilarious, offbeat and witty farce, follows the attempts of Pepa, a television actress forcefully played by Carmen Maura, to confront her estranged betrayer, an aging Lothario of a voice-over actor, who is unable to stay faithful even to his mistress. Pepa's progress can be tracked by the film's music: it begins with seductive mariachi music, a paean to love and romance, switches to mock-heroic sounds, and ends with a bitter-sweet song about broken hearts. The comedy comes from several factors: the increasing absurdity of the unravelling situation; the quasi-feminist outlook on female-male relationships; and a truly brilliant reversal of manners and expectations.

Although some action takes place at Pepa's studio, at the home of her lover's wife, in a lawyer's office, and in a wildly decorated taxi driven by a bleached blond driver, the main action, like that of a French bedroom farce, occurs in a single setting: Pepa's luxurious, but rapidly disintegrating, penthouse apartment. As she becomes more and more disturbed about her relationship to Ivan, Pepa tosses his possessions and pictures about, sets her bed on fire, throws a telephone and telephone answering machine through a window, frees chickens and ducks engaged on her balcony, and makes a dangerous, barbiturate-spiked gazpacho which guests splash on carpet and couch. At the same time, the number of people in the apartment grows rapidly as disparate actions become entangled around Pepa and her unhappy romance. Candela, who finds herself part of a Shiite terrorist conspiracy, seeks refuge from the police. Ivan's son, Carlos, and his possessive girlfriend, Marisa, come looking for an apartment to rent. Ivan's wife, crazed with jealousy, comes for a confrontation with the woman she thinks is running away with her husband. A telephone repairman and two policemen investigating an anonymous call about terrorists join the party. Downstairs, Ivan and his new girlfriend try to quietly remove his suitcase from the concierge's cubicle, only to find themselves thwarted, their car accidentally bombarded by flying objects from Pepa's apartment. What makes all this chaos doubly hilarious is the calm with which it is received: this is the way normal life works.

As in a Buñuel film, unlikely coincidences and chance encounters bring together seemingly perfect strangers—all of whom engage in intense conversations about life and love and all of whom ultimately have some interest in an evening flight to Stockholm. And as in Buñuel serious concerns are treated with a light, witty, irreverent touch. Almodovar addresses questions of insanity, parental rejection of children, marital infidelity, the breakup of marriage and family, the use and abuse of barbiturates, suicide, Shiite terrorists blowing up airplanes full of innocent passengers, lawyers who betray their clients' interest for personal gain, feminism and so on. Typical is a television advertisement for detergents: Pepa plays a typical mother, proud of her detergent which removes even the hard-to-get stains of blood and guts left on her serial-murderer son's shirts.

All of Almodovar's women are frustrated by the childish self-absorption of the men with whom they are involved. Ivan has literally driven his wife crazy. Son Carlos—a chip off the old blockhead—finds himself immediately attracted to his father's mistress, Pepa, but at the same time physically drawn to Candela, while his virginal girlfriend is passed out in a gazpacho-induced drug stupor on the patio. Candela thought her affair with a Shiite romantic, but, when he bought home his fellow terrorists, she discovered she was a safe house, not an object of affection. Pepa has had a comfortable, long-term affair with Ivan, a handsome womanizing weakling whose sexual impulses lead him to betrayal after betrayal. While continuing to mouth sweet-nothings to Pepa, he is running away with his wife's lawyer, Paulina (who helped him win his wife's case against him), and Paulina herself finds Ivan murmuring sweet nothings to Pepa at the airport on his way to Stockholm with Paulina. The initial shots of Ivan sum up the male as butterfly: he glides past beautiful woman after beautiful woman and to each murmurs words of flattery, romance and love; he wants them all and turns readily from one attraction to the next as his eyes lead him on. At the end Ivan's wife finds solace in insanity and institutionalization; Candela plunges into a new affair with Carlos—a younger Ivan; Paulina is left wondering whether she really wants this man she has betrayed her professional ethics for; Lucia has found a dream of seduction more satisfying than her real-life fiancé; and Pepa has undergone a catharsis and is ready to begin her life anew. The last scene has Pepa and Lucia exchanging female confidences, one of which is that Pepa is carrying Ivan's child; the cycle continues.

Feminist concerns, however, take a backseat to comedy. Almodovar, again like Buñuel but with his own distinctive touch, piles surreal detail on surreal detail, all presented with a completely straight face. Pepa's balcony is her "Noah's Ark," with various animals installed two by two (no one finds this odd in downtown Madrid, which itself is a fakey set). The taxi driver who continually picks her up by absurdly happy accident has shockingly bleached-blond hair and an impressive variety of dry goods for sale in the backseat; when he fails to provide eye drops for her on one trip he apologetically restocks for the next taxi ride. Pepa flirts immediately and unapologetically with her lover's grown son; he unashamedly flirts back in front of his girlfriend and a strange young woman he will almost immediately make a pass at. Pepa's apartment manager is a Jehovah's Witness who apologizes profusely for not being able to lie; she wishes she could. The climatic chase scene with an aging woman on the back of an aging Harley Davidson motorcycle potting shots at the taxi cum boutique is handled straight. Post-Franco Spain is a funny place, says Almodovar.

Women on the Verge is the kind of comedy that loses much in translation into critical prose, but which rewards the viewer with a hilarious experience. It is also a refreshingly sane take on male-female relations, as Almodovar's women are brought to the brink by their childish narcissistic men, only to recover their sanity on the verge of disaster.

—Andrew and Gina Macdonald

THE MURDERERS ARE AMONGST US

See DIE MÖRDER SIND UNTER UNS

MURMUR OF THE HEART

See SOUFFLE AU COUER

THE MUSIC BOX

USA, 1932

Director: James Parrott

Production: Hal Roach; black and white; running time: 29 minutes; length: 2000 feet. Released 1932.

Screenplay: H. M. Walker; photography: Len Powers.

Cast: Stan Laurel, Oliver Hardy, Billy Gilbert (Professor).

Award: Oscar for Best Comedy Short, 1932.

Publications

Books:

- Borde, Raymonde, and Charles Perrin, Laurel et Hardy, Paris, 1965.
 Coursodon, Jean-Pierre, Laurel et Hardy, Paris, 1966.
 Everson, William K., The Films of Laurel and Hardy, New York, 1967.
 Barr, Charles, Laurel and Hardy, London, 1967.
 McCaffrey, Donald, Four Great Comedians, New York, 1968.
 Maltin, Leonard, Movie Comedy Teams, New York, 1970.
 Maltin, Leonard, and others, The Laurel and Hardy Book, New York, 1973.
 McCabe, John, The Comedy World of Stan Laurel, New York, 1974.
 McCabe, John, Laurel and Hardy, New York, 1975; as Mr. Laurel and Mr. Hardy, London, 1984.
 Lacourbe, Roland, Laurel et Hardy, Paris, 1975.
 Anobile, Richard J., A Fine Mess, New York, 1975.
 Giusti, Marco, Laurel and Hardy, Florence, 1978.
 Guiles, Fred, Stan, London, 1980.
 Pantieri, Jose, I magnifico Laurel e Hardy, Forli, 1986.
 Crowther, Bruce, Laurel and Hardy: Crown Princes of Comedy, London, 1987.
 Skretvedt, Randy, Laurel and Hardy: The Magic Behind the Movies, Beverly Hills, 1987, 1994.
 Gehring, Wes D., Laurel and Hardy: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1990.
 Bergen, Ronald, Laurel and Hardy, New York, 1992.
 McGarry, Annie, Laurel and Hardy, New York, 1992.
 Grant, Neil, Laurel and Hardy, New York, 1995.
 Mitchell, Glenn, The Laurel and Hardy Encyclopedia, North Pomfret, 1995.
 MacGillivray, Scott, Laurel and Hardy: From the Forties Forward, Lanham, 1998.

Articles:

- Wright, Basil, in Cinema Quarterly (London), Autumn 1932.
Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1946.

Today's Cinema (London), 8 May 1946.
Kine Weekly (London), 16 May 1946.
 Robinson, David, "The Lighter People," in Sight and Sound (London), July-September 1954.
 Barnes, P., "Cuckoo," in Films and Filming (London), August 1960.
 "Laurel and Hardy Cult," in Time (New York), 14 July 1967.
 Bracourt, Guy, "Non, Loreleardi n'est pas mort!" in Ecran (Paris), April and May 1972.
 Allombert, G., "V.I.P. B.I.S.," in Image et Son (Paris), no. 269, 1973.
 Le Gueay, P., "Laurel et Hardy: Une Allegorie de la catastrophe," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1978.
Classic Images (Indiana, Pennsylvania), July 1981, also September 1981, July 1982, and April 1984.
 Reijnhout, B., "Een sentimentele reis naar de wereld van Laurel & Hardy," in Skoop (Amsterdam), May-June 1984.
 "The Music Box," in Pratfall (Universal City), vol. 2, no. 6-9, 1985.
 Teleky, R., "The Empty Box," in Studies in Popular Culture, vol. 15, no. 1, 1992.

* * *

With the combination of a superior director, James Parrott, an experienced comic writer, H. M. Walker, and a skillful photographer, Len Powers, to support the strong performances of Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy, the 1932 Oscar winner, The Music Box, evolved. This three-reeler remains the quintessence of this duo of incompetence. Like many of their short works, this vehicle called for the performance of a task that baffled the meager brainpower of Stan and Ollie. While a number of misalliances concerning a domestic situation provided the basis for a string of gags and a plot for the team's films, comedy also developed from their attempt to fulfil various occupations—such as their roles as detectives, process servers, waiters, itinerant musicians, salesmen, and carpenters. In The Music Box they have a delivery and moving service. The task: get a piano up a hill with as many, if not more hillside steps than those employed by Sergei Eisenstein in the Odessa steps sequence of the 1925 classic, Potemkin.

What could have been one joke repeated over and over to the point of monotony, became, instead, a comic fugue with innovative variations. Stan and Ollie grunt and sweat to move the piano up the long flight of stairs, only to meet a nursemaid, a policeman, and a professor (played by Billy Gilbert) who interfere with their Sisyphian labors. The piano gets out of control three times because of the distractions from these onlookers and meddlers. Each time the crated piano on rollers plunges down the battery of steps, it creates increasing comic frustration for the bungling movers. At first the piano rolls by itself down the steps to the street below. Gag writer-director Parrott builds the joke with variations by having Ollie, more than Stan, become the victim of the runaway piano. Ollie tries to stop the piano the second time as it moves with a will of its own until it rolls over him; in a third plunge he catches the back of the crate and is dragged all the way down the steep steps. Yells of agony, accompanied by the jangling of the piano, punctuate the execution of this wild slapstick gag.

As in many of the team's movies, they labor with a mighty effort but obtain minimal results or a complete reversal of their goal. But with pathetic, whining determination they try again. Told by a mailman there is a back road up the hill, Stan and Ollie finally deliver the piano to the door. But, before the instrument is installed, many more mishaps occur, and they become increasingly angry with each other—to the point of exchanging effete blows. In the living room, which they have ravaged by their clumsiness and fighting, an interesting reversal develops in the humorous spirit of play. Since they have delivered a player piano, they plug it in and clean up the room as they execute a little, impromptu music-hall dance to the music. The comrades forget the recent altercations they have had over how to move the instrument. It is a light, fanciful vaudeville turn that they would later repeat in Bonnie Scotland (1935) when they pick up trash in a military compound.

The Music Box was considered by Stan Laurel to be the best short he and Oliver Hardy created. And, it should be realized, he often was, although he enacted the denser character of the two, the brains behind many elaborate gag variations on a situation in their features. This three-reeler ranks with some of the best short works of silent screen comedians Charles Chaplin, Harold Lloyd, and Buster Keaton. It is also testament to the fact that the silent screen tradition of innovative and cumulative gag sequences continued into the sound comedy films of the 1930s. Furthermore, The Music Box reveals the bond between two struggling, inferior men whose everyday lives are plagued with obstacles. Laurel and Hardy's plight promotes laughter and evokes a degree of sympathy which exceeds that accorded all other comedy teams.

—Donald W. McCaffrey

MY BEAUTIFUL LAUNDRETTE

UK, 1985

Director: Stephen Frears

Production: Working Title/SAF Productions for Channel 4; colour; 16mm; running time: 97 minutes; length: 3,507 feet. Released 1985.

Producers: Sarah Radclyffe, Tim Bevan; screenplay: Hanif Kureishi; assistant directors: Simon Hinkly, Waldo Roeg, Gary Davies; photography: Oliver Stapleton; editor: Mick Audsley; assistant editors: Jason Adams, Chris Cook; sound editor: "Budge" Tremlett; sound recordist: Albert Bailey; sound re-recordist: Peter Maxwell; designer: Hugo Luczyc Wyhowski; music: Ludus Tonalis.

Cast: Saeed Jaffrey (Nasser); Roshan Seth (Papa); Daniel Day-Lewis (Johnny); Gordon Warnecke (Omar); Derrick Branche (Salim); Shirley Anne Field (Rachel); Rita Wolf (Tania); Souad Faress (Cherry); Richard Graham (Genghis); Winston Graham (1st Jamaican); Dudley Thomas (2nd Jamaican); Garry Cooper (Squatter); Charu Bala Choksi (Bilquis); Persis Maravala (Nasser's Elder Daughter); Nisha Kapur (Nasser's Younger Daughter); Neil Cunningham (Englishman); Walter Donohue (Dick O'Donnell); Gurdial Sira (Zaki); Stephen Marcus (Moose); Dawn Archibald (1st Gang Member); Jonathan Moore (2nd Gang Member); Gerard Horan (Telephone Man); Ram John Holder (Poet); Bhasker (Tariq); Ayub Khan Din (Student); Dulice Leicier (Girl in Disco); Badi Uzzaman (Dealer);

My Beautiful Laundrette

Chris Pitt (1st Kid); Kerryan White (2nd Kid); Colin Campbell (“Madame Butterfly” Man); Sheila Chitnis (Zaki’s Wife).

Publications

Script:

Kureishi, Hanif, My Beautiful Laundrette, London, 1986.

Books:

O’Neill, Eithne, Stephen Frears, Paris, 1994.

Kaleta, Kenneth C., Hanif Kureishi: Postcolonial Storyteller, Austin, 1998.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 21 August 1985.

Cook, Pam, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1985.

Lloyd, A., in Films and Filming (London), November 1985.

Root, Jane, “Scenes from a Marriage,” in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1985.

Walters, Margaret, in Listener (London), 21 November 1985.

Robinson, David, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1985–86.

Blaney, M., “The Empire Strikes Back,” in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), February–March 1986.

Sawyer, C., in Films in Review (New York), June–July 1986.

Pally, M., “Kureishi like a fox,” in Film Comment (New York), September–October 1986.

Sinyard, Neil, “Dickensian Visions in Modern British Film,” in Dickensian, vol. 85, part 2, 1989.

Sinyard, Neil, “Little Dorrit,” in Cinema Papers (Fitzroy), no. 72, March 1989.

Chari, H., “Decentered on the (A)isle of the Post-Colonial,” in Spectator (Los Angeles), vol. 10, no. 1, 1989.

Dancyger, K., “The Bigger Picture: A Consideration of the Influence of Journalism and Theatre on the Feature Length Screenplay,” in Journal of Film and Video (Los Angeles), no. 3, 1990.

“Frears, Stephen,” in Current Biography (Bronx), vol. 51, no. 4, April 1990.

Gustavsson, Y., “Maktkriget i det privata,” in Filmhaftet (Uppsala, Sweden), May 1990.

Quart, L., “The Politics of Irony: The Frears-Kureishi Films,” in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), no. 1–2, 1991–92.

“Kureishi, Hanif,” in Current Biography (Bronx), vol. 53, no. 2, February 1992.

Miller, J.B., “For His New Film, Hanif Kureishi Reaches for a Beautiful Laundrette,” in New York Times Current Events Edition (New York), 2 August 1992.

Salmon, P., “Revising the Traditions: Hanif Kureishi and Contemporary British Cinema,” in Canadian Journal of Film Studies (Ottawa), vol. 2, no. 2–3, 1993.

Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 181, November/December 1995.

Hedling, E., “Shopkeepers, Profiteers, and Libertines,” in Lahikuva (Turku), no. 3, 1995.

“Hanif Kureishi,” in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 6, no. 5, May 1996.

Snyder, Trish, in Chatelaine (Toronto), February 1998.

* * *

In an interview, Haneif Kureishi, the writer of My Beautiful Laundrette, revealed that his original idea for the film was an historical epic tracing the fortunes of a Pakistani family from their emigration to Britain in 1945 until the 1970s. Yet the film was realised as a surrealistic comedy-thriller set exclusively in Thatcher-stricken south London, with the narrative drive supplied by the meteoric rise of Omar, a young Asian businessman. Commercial pressures may have insured this transformation of the My Beautiful Laundrette project but the end result suggests a transcendence of inevitable constraints. The film, which cost the meagre sum of £60,000, was commissioned for the “Film on Four” slot on television, but after a screening at the Edinburgh festival had received enthusiastic reviews, it succeeded on the international cinema trail, picking up prizes and helping to provoke numerous claims of a British cinema renaissance.

Critical and box-office success is unusual for a film in which the main protagonist is black and gay, a representation which until My Beautiful Laundrette had been virtually absent from British cinema. Kureishi has spoken of his positive prejudice against white middle-class heterosexual men within his work, a stance which is maintained by his subsequent script for Sammie and Rosie Get Laid. In My Beautiful Laundrette conventional heterosexuality is parodied in the scene which shows the opening of Omar’s new laundrette. Here

Omar's uncle waltzes with his mistress Rachel among the washing machines, oblivious to both the onlooking crowd and Omar and Johnny's lusty celebrations in the back-room. One camera position during this scene is a spy's view of Nasser and Rachel from this back-room. This contributes to the ironic treatment of the heterosexual pair because it provides the audience with a vantage point on their activity. It is noteworthy, however, that this position does not coincide with the point of view of the gay lovers and that the Nasser/Rachel relationship is not representative of heterosexuality in general.

The film's politics cannot be pigeon-holed. If it was a gay separatist film we might expect it to emphasize more strongly the oppression of gay sexuality and to depart from the romantic conventions of mainstream cinema. Instead the film shows to a degree how a gay relationship may be celebrated as an old-fashioned romance. For the most part other characters are unaware of Omar and Johnny's love. The audience is asked to cherish this love as a secret rather than dwelling on the problems of a relationship barred from the public realm. When the laundrette opens Omar looks into a transparent division and sees Johnny looking back. Their reflections are shown to overlap, an effect which intimates a sublime notion of romantic union.

Equally striking is the way that My Beautiful Laundrette departs from the liberal view that racial minorities require positive images in order to counter-act racism and under-representation. The men within Omar's family are to an extent selfish gangsters. Omar exploits his lover Johnny; Uncle Nasser is a Rachman-style landlord; meanwhile Salim, whose status as a relation remains enigmatic and dubious, shares a store of reciprocal contempt and violence with a National Front gang. The film is out to show that the Asian minority is not automatically in opposition to the dominant ideology, while shaking the conservative assumption that British identity is a stable property.

However, Omar's male kin are not all Thatcherites. In contrast to Uncle Nasser, Omar's father has a past as a left-wing journalist in Bombay. Despite being confined to bed and the bottle he continues to advise his son that education is the only virtue. We can see here how the film retains a sense of history alongside its innovative representations of the Asian community. The opposition established between the father and Uncle Nasser alludes to a complex heritage of conflicting ideologies within the community. The development of the narrative provides us with a sense of history in which beliefs from the past become the debris of today: Omar's triumph with the washing machines makes his father's humanistic hopes seem like futile idealism and brings the father and Nasser together again as a generation which has been superseded.

The emergence of a new era is conveyed by the refurbished laundrette where the task of washing is packaged as an entertaining past-time. "Powders," as they call the building, is not just an entrepreneurial investment but also a space in which customers can play out their fantasies, as Nasser and Rachel demonstrate. The spectacular interior of "Powders" reveals the deviation of My Beautiful Laundrette from the strict visual code of verisimilitude, which broadly speaking has had a certain hold on ideas about what constitutes "Quality" British cinema.

The menacing atmosphere which certain scenes achieve indicates the influence of director Stephen Frears whose previous work for the cinema included the stylish gangster film The Hit. In particular, the encounters between Selim and the gang are nightmarish, even though this troupe of thugs are at times comically grotesque. Critics have also praised Frears's capacity to let strong performances emerge, a quality born out by his Hollywood debut, Dangerous Liaisons. My Beautiful Laundrette provided a springboard to stardom for the actor Daniel Day Lewis, while Saeed Jaffrey and Shirley Anne Field received high acclaim.

—Daniel Williams

MY BRILLIANT CAREER

Australia, 1979

Director: Gillian Armstrong

Production: New South Wales Film Corporation and Margaret Fink Films; Panavision, Eastmancolor; running time: 100 minutes; length: 9,005 feet. Released 1979.

Producer: Margaret Fink; associate producer: Jane Scott; screenplay: Eleanor Witcombe, from the novel by Miles Franklin; assistant directors: Mark Egerton, Mark Turnbull, Steve Andrews; photography: Don McAlpine; camera operators: Louis Irving, Peter Moss; editor: Nicholas Beauman; sound editor: Greg Bell; sound recordist: Don Connolly; production designer: Luciana Arrighi; art director: Neil Angwin; costume designer: Anna Senior; music: Nathan Waks.

Cast: Judy Davis (Sybylla Melvyn); Sam Neill (Harry Beecham); Wendy Hughes (Aunt Helen); Robert Grubb (Frank Hawden); Max Cullen (Mr. McSwat); Pat Kennedy (Aunt Gussie); Aileen Britton (Grandma Bossier); Peter Whitford (Uncle Julius); Carole Skinner (Mrs. McSwat); Alan Hopgood (Father); Julia Blake (Mother); Tony Hughes (Peter McSwat); Tina Robinson (Lizer McSwat); Aaron Corrin (Jimmy McSwat); Sharon Crouch (Sarah McSwat); Robert Austin (Willie McSwat); Mark Spain (Tommy McSwat); Simone Buchanan (Mary Anne McSwat); Hayley Anderson (Rosie Jane McSwat); Marion Shad (Gertie); Suzanne Roylance (Biddy); Zelda Smyth (Ethel); Amanda Pratt (Blanche Derrick); Bill Charlton (Joe Archer).

Publications

Books:

Tulloch, John, Australian Cinema: Industry, Narrative, and Meaning, Sydney and London, 1982.

McFarlane, Brian, Words and Images: Australian Novels into Films, Richmond, Victoria, 1983.

Hall, Sandra, Critical Business: The New Australian Cinema in Review, Adelaide, 1985.

Moran, Albert, and Tom O'Regan, editors, An Australian Film Reader, Sydney, 1985.

Mathews, Sue, 35mm Dreams: Conversations with Five Directors about the Australian Film Revival, Ringwood, Victoria, 1987.

My Brilliant Career

McFarlane, Brian, Australian Cinema 1970–85, London, 1987.
Collins, Felicity, The Films of Gillian Armstrong, St. Kilda, 1999.

Articles:

Fink, Margaret, and Gillian Armstrong, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne) March–April 1979.
Metro, Spring 1979.
Variety (New York), 23 May 1979.
McFarlane, Brian, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), September–October 1979.
Adair, Gilbert, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1980.
Wallace, Melanie, in Cineaste (New York), Spring 1980.
Image et Son (Paris), November 1980.
Oakes, Philip, in Listener (London), 23 February 1984.
Arnold, Gordon B., “From Big Screen to Small Screen: My Brilliant Career Directed by Gillian Armstrong and Starring Judy Davis,” in Library Journal (New York), vol. 114, no. 9, 15 May 1989.
Bertrand, I., “Woman’s Voice: The Autobiographical Form in Three Australian Filmed Novels,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1993.

“Armstrong, Gillian,” in Current Biography (Bronx), vol. 56, no. 8, August 1995.

Wood, Gaby, “My Brilliant Career Down Under in Film and Feminism,” in New Statesman (London), 27 March 1998.

* * *

Gillian Armstrong’s film of Miles Franklin’s novel remains remarkably true to the spirit of the original which, almost unbelievably, considering the modernity of its sentiments and the ebullient confidence of its tone, was written by a young woman of 16 and first published in 1901. That it was not reprinted until 1966 can be explained partly by the fact that it was withdrawn by its author, who was annoyed at the “stupid literalness” with which it was taken to be her own autobiography. However, the fact that the novel’s sequel, My Career Goes Bung, was rejected by publishers as too outspoken and not published until 1946, also suggests that, even if it had not been withdrawn, My Brilliant Career would have stood little chance of establishing itself in the male-dominated pantheon of “great” Australian literature at the turn of the century.

The story centres on Sybylla Melvyn, a young woman living with her parents on a remote farm in the bush. She dreams of living a more intellectually and culturally rewarding life, and is writing a memoir. When she goes to stay on her grandmother's estate at Caddagat things improve somewhat, and she is also courted by Frank Hawden, a rather fatuous English immigrant, and Harry Beecham, a young landowner. She is attracted by the latter, and is faced with the choice of trying to pursue a "brilliant career" or getting married.

There are, of course, parallels with Miles Franklin's own life here—the dusty, arid Possum Gully is clearly modelled on Stillwater, the smallholding to which her family moved from a far more attractive cattle station in the mountains of New South Wales; and Caddagat is a fictional version of Talbingo, where her maternal grandmother lived and with whom she went to stay for a few years of her adolescence. But these are incidental details, and the real importance of both novel and film lies in their acute delineation of a young woman's feelings at a transitional moment in her life. As Carmen Callil has aptly noted, "Miles Franklin was decades ahead of her time, and My Brilliant Career was written for an audience not yet born. For in the character of Sybylla Melvyn, Miles Franklin created a character who mouths with incredible charm but deadly accuracy the fears, conflicts and torments of every girl, with an understanding usually associated with writers of the 1960s and 70s." All the qualities which Callil admires in the book have been triumphantly retained by the film which, it might be added, also manages to exclude some of the original's slightly less attractive qualities, such as its nationalism (which it shared with many of its literary contemporaries) and a certain tendency to let ebullience and exuberance overflow into gush and overly self-conscious romanticism. The dialogue, too, has been considerably updated and "de-literacised," but the sentiments expressed by Sybylla are very much those that animate her in the novel.

All credit must go here to Judy Davis, whose performance makes Sybylla utterly convincing and never allows her effervescence and high spirits to become wearying or trying. The only problem, perhaps, is that in her hands Sybylla comes across as so attractive, capable, and accomplished that it sometimes becomes difficult to understand the oft-mentioned fact of her "plain-ness" and the various other negative judgements passed upon her by the other characters. Gillian Armstrong's mise-en-scène is also a triumph, not simply in its loving attention to period detail but in the way in which it is used to comment on or reflect Sybylla's feelings, and in particular her growing consciousness of herself as being different from those around her and as destined for higher things. Particularly important in this respect are the contrasts between Possum Gully and Caddagat, the latter making Sybylla more aware than ever of the possibilities of life beyond the bush. Significantly, when Sybylla plays the piano at home, with no-one paying any attention, the effect is decidedly jangly, whereas at her grandmother's, with an appreciative audience, the change in style is most striking. At the same time, however, the elegance of some of the scenes at Harry Beecham's mansion suggest not simply the lifestyle which Sybylla desires but also the kinds of constraints and limitations that she fears may come with it.

Scenes such as these work extremely effectively to communicate the sense that Sybylla is still in the process of developing and maturing, that she is still trying to decide on her role in life, and is subject to all sorts of contradictory pressures, both internal and external. Important here, too, is the characterization of Harry, who is portrayed very much as a potential soul-mate and worthy partner, thus facing Sybylla with a very real and difficult choice with which the spectator can clearly empathise. Indeed, although nothing actually "happens," some of the scenes between Sybylla and Harry contain a distinct sexual charge.

My Brilliant Career has been "rediscovered" as something of a proto-feminist text, which it undoubtedly is, but it is also very much a Bildungsroman which works remarkably well on both a particular and more general level. Like the best of all such works in the genre it is both poignant and amusing and both of these qualities have been well served by Armstrong's meticulous and occasionally sumptuous mise-en-scène, Judy Davis's splendid performance, which never goes over the top, as it so easily could, and a score which makes poignant use of (what else?) Schumann's Scenes from Childhood.

—Sylvia Paskin

MY DARLING CLEMENTINE

USA, 1946

Director: John Ford

Production: Twentieth Century-Fox; black and white, 35mm; running time: 97 minutes. Released November 1946. Filmed on location in Monument Valley, Utah and in New Mexico.

Producer: Samuel G. Engel; screenplay: Samuel G. Engel and Winston Miller based on a story by Sam Hellman, from the novel Wyatt Earp, Frontier Marshal by Stuart N. Lake; photography: Joseph P. MacDonald; editor: Dorothy Spencer; art directors: James Basevi and Lyle R. Wheeler; music: Cyril Mockridge and David Buttolph; orchestrator: Edward B. Powell; special effects: Fred Sersen; costume designer: Rene Hubert.

Cast: Henry Fonda (Wyatt Earp); Linda Darnell (Chihuahua); Victor Mature (Doc John Holliday); Walter Brennan (Old Man Clanton); Tim Holt (Virgil Earp); Ward Bond (Morgan Earp); Cathy Downs (Clementine Carter); Alan Mowbray (Granville Thorndyke); John Ireland (Billy Clanton); Grant Withers (Ike Clanton); Roy Roberts (Mayor); Jane Darwell (Kate Nelson); Russell Simpson (John Simpson); Francis Ford (Dad, old soldier); J. Farrell McDonald (Mac the barman); Don Garner (James Earp); Ben Hall (Barber); Arthur Walsh (Hotel clerk); Jack Pennick (Coach driver); Louis Mercier (Francois); Micky Simpson (Sam Clanton); Fred Libby (Phin Clanton); Harry Woods (Luke); Charles Stevens (Indian Joe); Danny Borzage (Accordian player); Mae Marsh.

Publications

Script:

Engel, Samuel G., and Winston Miller, in My Darling Clementine: John Ford, Director, edited by Robert Lyons, New Brunswick,

My Darling Clementine

New Jersey, 1984; also in Avant-Scène Cinéma (Paris), February 1985.

Books:

- Mitry, Jean, John Ford, Paris, 1954.
- Everson, William K., and George N. Fenin, The Westerns: From Silents to Cinerama, New York, 1962.
- Haudiquet, Philippe, John Ford, Paris, 1964.
- Bogdanovich, Peter, John Ford, Berkeley, 1968; revised edition, 1978.
- Springer, John, The Fondas: The Films and Careers of Henry, Jane and Peter Fonda, New York, 1970.
- Kitses, Jim, Horizons West, Bloomington, Indiana, 1970.
- Baxter, John, The Cinema of John Ford, New York, 1971.
- Place, Janey, The Western Films of John Ford, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1973.
- McBride, Joseph, and Michael Wilmington, John Ford, New York and London, 1975.
- Sarris, Andrew, The John Ford Movie Mystery, London, 1976.
- Sinclair, Andrew, John Ford, London and New York 1979.
- Ford, Dan, Pappy: The Life of John Ford, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979.
- Anderson, Lindsay, About John Ford, London, 1981; New York 1983.
- Caughie, John, editor, Theories of Authorship: A Reader, London, 1981.
- Schatz, Thomas, Hollywood Genres: Formulas, Filmmaking, and the Studio System, New York 1981.
- Fonda, Henry, and Howard Teichmann, Fonda: My Life, New York, 1981.
- Goldstein, Norm, Henry Fonda: His Life and Work, London, 1982.
- Thomas, Tony, The Films of Henry Fonda, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1983.
- Reed, Joseph W., Three American Originals: John Ford, William Faulkner, Charles Ives, Middletown, Connecticut, 1984.
- Gallagher, Tag, John Ford: The Man and His Films, Berkeley, 1986.
- Stowell, Peter, John Ford, Boston, 1986.
- Lourdeaux, Lee, Italian & Irish Filmmakers in America: Ford, Capra, Coppola and Scorsese, Springfield, 1990; 1993.
- Darby, William, John Ford's Westerns: A Thematic Analysis, with a Filmography, Jefferson, 1996.
- Davis, Ronald L., John Ford: Hollywood's Old Master, Norman, 1997.

- Girus, Sam B., Hollywood Renaissance: The Cinema of Democracy in the Era of Ford, Capra, and Kazan, New York, 1998.
 Levy, Bill, John Ford: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1998.
 Eyman, Scott, Print the Legend: The Life and Times of John Ford, New York, 1999.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 9 October 1946.
New York Times, 4 December 1946.
New Yorker, 14 December 1946.
 Auriol, Jean-Georges, "Lettre à John Ford sur My Darling Clementine," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), Spring 1947.
 Rieuperout, Jean-Louis, in Quarterly of Film, Radio and Television (Berkeley), Winter 1952.
 Springer, Henry, "Henry Fonda," in Films in Review (New York), November 1960.
 Cowie, Peter, "Fonda," in Films and Filming (London), April 1962.
 McVay, Douglas, "The Five Worlds of John Ford," in Films and Filming (London), June 1962.
 Fonda, Henry, "Fonda on Fonda," in Films and Filming (London), February 1963.
 Brode, Henry, in Cineaste (New York), Fall 1968.
 Wood, Robin, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1971.
 "Ford Issue" of Filmkritik (Munich), January 1972.
 Buffa, M., and C. Scarrone, "Per una rilettura del cinema classico americano," in Filmcritica (Rome), October-December 1973.
 Gomery, Douglas, "Mise-en-Scène in John Ford's My Darling Clementine," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 2, no. 4, 1978.
 Marinero, P., in Casablanca (Madrid), January 1983.
 Darby, W., "Musical Links in Young Mr. Lincoln, My Darling Clementine, and The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance," in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), no. 1, 1991.
 Nielsen, R., "Ray's Way: John Ireland in My Darling Clementine," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 191, May 1991.
 Erisman, F., "The Night Christopher Lloyd Danced with Mary Steenburgen," in Journal of Popular Film and Television, vol. 22, no. 1, Spring 1992.
 Luhr, W., "Reception, Representation, and the OK Corral," in Florida State University Conference on Literature and Film, vol. 18, 1993.
 Kermode, Mark, "Video: My Darling Clementine Directed by John Ford," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 4, no. 5, May 1994.
 Combs, Richard, "The First Cut is Still the Bleakest: The Wild Bunch Directed by Sam Peckinpah/My Darling Clementine Directed by John Ford," in Times Literary Supplement (London), no. 4832, 10 November 1995.
 Romney, Jonathan, "America's Creation Myth: My Darling Clementine Directed by John Ford," in New Statesman & Society (London), vol. 8, no. 381, 1 December 1995.
 Simmon, Scott, "Concerning the Weary Legs of Wyatt Earp: The Classic Western According to Shakespeare," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 24, no. 2, 1996.
 Yawn, M., and B. Beatty, "John Ford's Vision of the Closing West: From Optimism to Cynicism," in Film and History (Cleveland), vol. 26, no. 1/4, 1996.
 Schwengler, O., "Exercices de style a 'OK Corral,'" in Cinémaction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), vol. 86, no. 1, 1998.

* * *

My Darling Clementine is considered the archetype of the classic western. In retelling the familiar story of the Earp brothers standing up to the evil Clanton family, director John Ford proved Hollywood genre films would become great cultural artefacts. However, Ford, one of the industry's most honored directors, is usually better remembered for other masterworks. While My Darling Clementine is considered one of his better films, it is only one of many in a truly remarkable career.

Ford, however, did not want to direct this classic work originally. After World War II Ford, like many of Hollywood's highly rated directors, formed an independent company, in this case Argosy Pictures. But he still owed Twentieth Century-Fox one more film. (Fox's production chief Darryl F. Zanuck tried to tempt Ford to renegotiate his Fox contract for a guaranteed $600,000 per year plus limited freedom but Ford refused.) Zanuck assigned Ford to My Darling Clementine starring Fox stars Henry Fonda and Victor Mature. Shooting began in Monument Valley in May, 1946, and was completed within 45 days. Zanuck found Ford's version too long, and the story unclear, so he cut 30 minutes, and re-structured some of the remaining material. Released in November, 1946 the film received favorable reviews, and earned respectable, but not record-breaking revenues.

The structure of My Darling Clementine is straightforward, and symmetrical, opening with the ominous meeting of the Earps with the Clantons, and closing with the gun-fight at the OK Corral (and Wyatt's half-hearted promise to return). All this seems to take place in three or four days. Although the events are grounded in history (Ford claimed to have gotten this version directly from friend Wyatt Earp), the details were transformed to make a popular film. The Doc Holliday figure was transfigured the most. Like central characters in The Searchers and The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance, Holliday tragically stands between primitivism and civilization. Unlike the Earps, this character fails to find a way to reconcile his place in the changing world, and turns to alcohol and a desire for death.

Disintegration of the family was a dominant theme in Ford's work prior to World War II. In My Darling Clementine the contrast between the Earps and Clantons is clearly drawn, with death at the ultimate shootout predestined. The Earps are diametrically opposed to the Clantons, yet strong similarities exist. In both cases, the father holds powerful authority. "Old Man" Clanton beats his sons with a whip, bullying them like animals. The Earps, however, are more civilized, and continually appeal to their unseen father ("How will we tell Pa?"). In the end Wyatt and Morgan, the surviving brothers choose to return to tell Pa of recent events rather than remain to help civilize Tombstone.

My Darling Clementine seems to present a well known story, set in the familiar context of the western. Upon closer examination of the film, however, one can still see the confusion Zanuck must have sensed, such as the sequence in which the Earps come to town. Wyatt settles down for a shave when gunshots arouse him. He goes through the hotel (next to the barber shop) and emerges, in a medium long shot, alone on the sidewalk. A barber pole serves as a reference to locate him in the darkness. Wyatt goes across the street to the source of the trouble. We see him with the Oriental Saloon in the background, its doors clearly seen in deep space. Wyatt enters the Oriental saloon to capture Indian Joe, the perpetrator of the trouble. Wyatt then gathers the barber from the crowd of spectators and seeks a continuation of his shave. Later in the film we learn, through several long establishing shots, that there is no Oriental saloon on the other side of the street. This absence of the continual "referential focus" disrupts the film's visual rhythm, setting this sequence apart from the rest of the film. There are numerous other examples of visual discontinuity in this film, all violating rules of classical Hollywood style. Indeed in this seemingly simple work Ford develops a complex visual pattern of stability and disruption in the world of Tombstone. Ford seems to be foreshadowing his autocritiques of the western genre made throughout the 1950s and 1960s.

In its use of generic elements My Darling Clementine suggests the western myth might not be as stable as it was prior to World War II. Although in the end the film seems to promise the formation of a utopian community, the western hero does not seem to be able to reconcile his individual and social roles. He rides off in the closing sequence with only a vague suggestion he will return to Clementine and the community. To further play on the hero's ambiguous character Ford continually reminds us that he does not fit in. My Darling Clementine's most cited sequence is not its elaborate gunfight, but rather a dance in which Wyatt Earp displays his lack of grace on the dance floor. This Eastern ritual is here to stay, whether the western hero fits in or not. Ford seems to have been influenced in My Darling Clementine by his recent military experience during World War II. Despite the fact Ford made seven films about the United States Cavalry, My Darling Clementine seems to be his most militarist western, both in theme and action. The Earps represent a new type of law—cold and calculating. They operate within the law, yet are always clearly able to kill in a most efficient manner. Family ties and a sense of justice seem all that is necessary to justify action. Civilization defends itself only by obliterating the other side, and then leaving when the job is done, much as the popular image of the role of the American military during World War II.

In the end, in structure, theme and style Ford seems to be undercutting the anarchic spirit of the western, so celebrated in 1939 with his Stagecoach. The style seems classical but upon closer inspection is not. The themes seem classical, but contradictions and loose ends abound. Even closure, the Hollywood system's point of "wrapping the package," is confused and ambiguous. My Darling Clementine represents the work of a filmmaker ready to break out of the studio system and go onto more complex projects, as Ford would. In an uneven path he would make his way to his masterworks, westerns of complexity and ambiguity: The Searchers (1956) and The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance (1962). My Darling Clementine, a masterwork in its own right, foreshadows Ford's greatest films.

—Douglas Gomery

MY LIFE TO LIVE

See VIVRE SA VIE

MY NAME IS JOE

Great Britain, 1998

Director: Ken Loach

Production: Parallax Pictures and Road Movies Vierte Produktion; color; running time: 103 min. Released 15 May 1998, Cannes Film Festival, France, and 6 November 1998, London. Filmed in Glasgow and Inverary, Scotland.

Producer: Rebecca O'Brien; executive producer: Ulrich Felsberg; screenplay: Paul Laverty; photography: Barry Ackroyd; editor: Jonathan Morris; production design: Martin Johnson; casting: Gillian Berrie, Steven Mochrie; music: George Fenton; makeup: Anastasia Shirley; sound: Ray Beckett, John Hayward.

Cast: Peter Mullan (Joe); Louise Goodall (Sarah); Edna McKay (Liam); Annemarie Kennedy (Sabine); Gary Lewis (Shanks); Lorraine McIntosh (Maggie); David Hayman (McGowan).

Awards: British Independent Film Awards for Best Director of an Independent British Film, Best British Independent Film, and Best Original Screenplay, 1998; Cannes Film Festival Best Actor Award (Peter Mullan), 1998; Danish Film Critics Award (Bodil) for Best Non-American Film, 1998; Danish Film Academy Award (Robert) for Best Non-American Film, 1998; London Critics Circle Award for Best British Newcomer of the Year (Peter Mullan), 1999.

Publications

Articles:

Niogret, Hubert, review in Positif (Paris), October 1998

Williamson, Judith, review in Sight and Sound (London), November 1998

Distelmeyer, Jan, review in EPD Film (Frankfurt), January 1999

* * *

In the 1990s Ken Loach gave us a string of powerful human dramas borne by the social commitment and humane solidarity with the weakest members of society so characteristic of the director; in his films they are not mere victims, but also strong individuals, people possessed of integrity and identity. However, the difference from his political television films of the 1960s and 1970s is pronounced. They depicted the class struggle, but in the 1990s films the focus shifted to people marginalized by the labor market who were fighting for their self-esteem in an England where industrialism was on its way out. In the 1990s, too, Loach made what is for him a rare trip beyond the shores of England to countries and periods where people could talk of revolution with hope. But Land and Freedom and Carla's Song are not Loach at his best. He is at his best when portraying the English worker.

The Joe of the title is a former alcoholic who is trying to stay on the wagon. He lives on social security and moonlighting, and works off his restless energy coaching a group of social rejects on the football field. One of his proteges is an ex-junkie, Liam, whose girlfriend Sabine is mainlining, and whose offspring is monitored by the local health department visitor, Sarah. This is how Sarah and Joe meet, and although they have both been bitten and are now twice shy, their encounter develops into a tentative, exploratory love—a rare theme for Loach, and rarer still depicted with such warmth and subtlety. Their growing love is put to the test when Joe agrees to run drugs in order to save Liam from McGowan's gangsters, to whom he owes £1500. Joe's solidarity with and human sympathy for Liam butts up against Sarah's view that he is thereby obtaining drugs to create even more Liams. The difference in perception is not only personal but also determined by class, for although they both move among the underclass, Joe is part of it and indeed grew up with McGowan, the gangster boss, while Sarah views it from without. She is a professional with a car and a regular job, and faced with the alternatives Joe lists for Liam's predicament, the natural rhetorical question is "What would you have done?"

The film opens with a close-up of Joe telling his story to an Alcoholics Anonymous meeting, and ends on a calm long shot of Joe and Sarah leaving Liam's funeral: from the man on his own to a hint of a future together. Between the two shots we are given the story of a man who is repeatedly being forced to struggle his way out of his own and other people's problems: alcohol, drug-related jobs, debts, and old but compromising friendships. The first half of the film is related in light, comedy-colored tones, with a restless energy in the editing and movement shaped in accordance with Joe's own temperament. Everything takes place at a run as Joe keeps up his level of activity so as not to relapse into alcoholism. There is great strength and humanity in this character, a powerful warmth and charisma that Sarah falls for, too—and is afraid of. But just as Liam is the cause of their meeting, he is also the cause of their separation. The light tone fades and the story assumes gloomy hues with the assault on Liam on the football pitch cross-edited with Sabine's behavior at the social services office, which leads directly to Joe's job as a drug courier. The insoluble moral and human dilemma now becomes didactically illustrated, with Joe torn between his desire to keep his relationship and his desire to help Liam. Behind this, the other issues pile up. How and why did Liam get into this predicament? Why has Sarah been unable to do anything about a situation of which she, if anyone, is aware? However, if Liam is a loser there is a cause, and if Joe is a fighter, he is also up against impossible odds. Even if the film ends with a hint of conciliation between Sarah and Joe, any hope is not unequivocal but merely defiant.

To Joe, like other Loach characters of the 1990s, what counts is surviving with some kind of self respect, although not necessarily in accordance with the accepted definitions. In My Name is Joe and Raining Stones stealing money to pay for a dress for a first communion or stealing Brazilian football kit to boost the self-esteem of a team that has never won a match isn't depicted as breaking the law, but rather as a strength, a positive manifestation of solidarity and independent initiative. Those scenes condense the dilemma of the working class.

Ken Loach possesses a rare ability to depict a community as if it were cut straight out of real life, a reality Loach observes from a distance but with empathy and repose, devoid of sentimentality or easy answers such as those provided by feel-good films like The Full Monty and Brassed Off. Authenticity and genuineness are the key, and for viewers they endow the people and the setting with as much importance as the surrounding plot. One of the best sides of cinema has always been its inherent ability to record and capture reality. For an artist like Loach the result is a successful fusion of a human, powerful, politically and socially relevant story with images from a world that seldom appears on the silver screen, and even more rarely with the solidarity and concerned commitment characteristic of his films.

—Dan Nissen

N

THE NAKED CITY

---

USA, 1948

Director: Jules Dassin

Production: Hellinger Productions for United-International Pictures; black and white, 35mm; running time: 96 minutes. Released 4 March 1948. Filmed in Stillman's Gym, the Roxy Theater, the Whitehall Building, the City Morgue, Roosevelt Hospital, the Universal Building, and Williamsburg Bridge in New York City.

Producers: Mark Hellinger with Jules Buck; screenplay: Malvin Wald and Albert Maltz, from an unpublished story by Malvin Wald; photography: William Daniels; editor: Paul Weatherwax; sound: Leslie I. Carey and Vernon W. Kramer; art director: John F. DeCuir; set decorators: Russell Gausman and Oliver Emert; music: Miklos Rozsa and Frank Skinner; music supervisor: Milton Schwarzwald; costume designer: Grace Houston.

Cast: Barry Fitzgerald (Lt. Dan Muldoon); Howard Duff (Frank Niles); Dorothy Hart (Ruth Morrison); Don Taylor (Jimmy Halloran); Ted De Corsia (Garzah); House Jameson (Dr. Stoneman); Anne Sargent (Mrs. Halloran); Adelaide Klein (Mrs. Batory); Grover Burgess (Mr. Batory); Tom Pedi (Detective Perelli); Enid Markey (Mrs. Hylton); Frank Conroy (Captain Donahue).

Publications

Script:

Wald, Malvin, and Albert Maltz, The Naked City, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli, Carbondale, Illinois, 1979.

Books:

Ferrero, Adelio, Jules Dassin, Parma, 1961.

McArthur, Colin, Underworld USA, London, 1972.

Silver, Alain, and Elizabeth Ward, editors, Film Noir, Woodstock, New York, 1979.

Siclier, Fabien, and Jacques Levy, Jules Dassin, Paris, 1986.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 21 January 1948.

Brooks, Richard, on Mark Hellinger, in Screen Writer (Los Angeles), March 1948.

New York Times, 5 March 1948.

New Yorker, 13 March 1948.

Grenier, Cynthia, "Jules Dassin," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1957–58.

Lane, John Francis, "I See Dassin Make the Law," in Films and Filming (London), September 1958.

Dassin, Jules, "Style and Instinct," in Films and Filming (London), February and March 1970.

Martinez Carril, M., "Los vaivenes de Jules Dassin," in Cinemateca Revista (Montevideo), July 1981.

Kozloff, S., "Humanizing 'the Voice of God': Narration in The Naked City," in Cinema Journal (Champaign, Illinois), Summer 1984.

Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 5, 1990.

"Classics—The Naked City Directed by Jules Dassin," in Video Magazine (New York), vol. 16, no. 11, February 1993.

Farrell, Sean, "The Naked City," in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), no. 21, Winter 1996.

Lucas, Tim, "The Killers: Criss Cross: The Underneath: Brute Force: The Naked City," in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 32, 1996.

Patterson, Troy, "The Naked City," in Entertainment Weekly (New York), vol. 470, 5 February 1999.

Atkinson, Michael, "Shelf Life," in The Village Voice (New York), vol. 44, no. 13, 6 April 1999.

* * *

The Naked City is New York, a metropolis of playgrounds and police precincts, fire escapes and brownstones and neon lights, rush-hour subways packed like sardine cans and fire hydrants sprinkling the streets on a sweltering summer day. It is most definitely not a city constructed on a Hollywood back lot, not a set designer's stylized or otherwise exaggerated vision of Manhattan canyons. To paraphrase Mark Hellinger, the film's producer and narrator, the actors play their roles in the actual apartments, skyscrapers and city streets—107 total locations in all.

During and after World War II, several Hollywood thrillers were shot in a documentary-like manner, away from the studio in actual urban locales: The House on 92nd Street (the trendsetter, filmed in New York and released three years before The Naked City), Panic in the Streets and Walk East on Beacon (which were shot in, respectively, New Orleans and Boston). Jules Dassin's The Naked City may not be the first of its type, but its almost revolutionary union of actors and real people, on real streets, has inspired scores of films ever since. The camera crew worked inside a van equipped with a one-way mirror, enabling them to film the city while remaining invisible to passersby. New York, and New Yorkers, become the leading performers, the film's major attraction.

The Naked City is a series of powerful scenes, first depicting the murder of a pretty, man-hungry, larcenous young model, and then detailing the efforts of the cops to sniff out her killers. Of course, they unravel the case, which culminates in a thrilling chase sequence across the Williamsburg Bridge from Manhattan's Lower East Side to Brooklyn. The homicide detectives are meticulous, but their labors are decidedly tedious and unglamorous. They are not heroically superhuman Clint Eastwoods, and they do not exchange sexy banter with voluptuous heroines whom they bed before the final reel. The major role is played by Barry Fitzgerald; he could be only May Robson's idea of a sex symbol, but his character is a sharp, 30-odd year veteran at the New York Police Department. His associate, young eager-to-please Don Taylor, might be more attractive, but he lives in an undistinguished working class neighborhood and kisses his wife goodbye each morning. Fitzgerald tells a co-worker that he hasn't had a busy day since yesterday; he and his fellow flatfoots forever "ask a question, get an answer, ask another." The Naked City does not contain street language or bloody corpses; it is no Sharky's Machine or True Confessions or Prince of the City. But it is as realistic as a major studio film could be in 1948.

The Naked City

The leading actors are familiar faces, but not stars. Except for, perhaps, Barry Fitzgerald, their names were unfamiliar to audiences. The Naked City is peopled not so much by performers as faces, everyday faces. The murder victim's parents appear in several key scenes, and the actors portraying them give heartwrenching performances. But, most importantly, they look like an anonymous couple from the New Jersey boondocks who have lost their only child to the glitter of the big city.

From Brute Force to Rififi to Never on Sunday, director Jules Dassin's career has been disconnected: The Naked City is more the cousin of The House on 92nd Street than anything else in Dassin's filmography (with the possible exception of Night and the City, shot in London). All have their roots more in Italian neorealism—or even the ashcan paintings of Robert Henri, George Bellows, John Sloan, George Luks and William Glackens—than in anything from Hollywood.

—Rob Edelman

THE NAKED NIGHT

See GYCKLARNOS AFTON

NANIWA EREJI

(Osaka Elegy)

Japan, 1936

Director: Kenji Mizoguchi

Production: Daiichi Eiga; black and white, 35mm. Released 1936.

Screenplay: Yoshikata Yoda, from the story “Mieko” by Saburo Okada; photography: Minoru Miki; sound: Hisashi Kase and Yasumi Mizoguchi.

Cast: Isuzu Yamada (Ayako Murai); Benkei Shinganoya (Sonosuke); Eitaro Shindo (Yoshizo Fujino); Kensaku Hara (Susumu Nishimura); Seiichi Takegawa (Ayako's father); Shinpachiro Asaka (Ayako's brother); Chiyo Okura (Ayako's sister); Yoko Umemura (Sonosuke's wife); Shizuko Takezawa (Mine Fukuda); Kuneo Tamura (Doctor Yoko); Kiyoko Okubo (Doctor's wife).

Publications

Books:

- Anderson, Joseph, and Donald Richie, The Japanese Film: Art and Industry, New York, 1960; revised edition, Princeton, 1982.
- Ve-Ho, Kenji Mizoguchi, Paris, 1963.
- Mesnil, Michel, Kenji Mizoguchi, Paris, 1965.
- Yoda, Yoshikata, Mizoguchi Kenji no hito to geijutsu [Kenji Mizoguchi: The Man and His Art], Tokyo, 1970.
- Tessier, Max, Kenji Mizoguchi, Paris, 1971.
- Mellen, Joan, Voices from the Japanese Cinema, New York, 1975.
- Mellen, Joan, The Waves at Genji's Door: Japan Through Its Cinema, New York, 1976.
- Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, New York, 1978; revised edition, Tokyo, 1985.
- Burch, Noël, To the Distant Observer: Form and Meaning in the Japanese Cinema, Berkeley, 1979.
- Freiberg, Freda, Women in Mizoguchi Films, Melbourne, 1981.
- Sato, Tadao, Currents in Japanese Cinema, Tokyo, 1982.
- Andrew, Dudley, Kenji Mizoguchi: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1982.
- Serceau, Daniel, Mizoguchi: De la révolte aux songes, Paris, 1983.
- Andrew, Dudley, Film in the Aura of Art, Princeton, 1984.
- McDonald, Keiko, Mizoguchi, Boston, 1984.
- Kirihara, Donald, Patterns of Time: Mizoguchi and the 1930s, Madison, 1992.
- O'Grady, Gerald, editor, Mizoguchi the Master, Ontario, 1996.
- Tomasi, Dario, Kenji Mizoguchi, Milan, 1998.

Articles:

- “Mizoguchi Issue” of Cinéma (Paris), no. 6, 1955.
- Richie, Donald, and Joseph Anderson, “Kenji Mizoguchi,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1955.
- “Mizoguchi Issue” of Ecran (Paris), February-March 1958.
- “Mizoguchi Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1958.

- Iwasaki, Akira, “Mizoguchi,” in Anthologie du cinéma 29, Paris, 1967.
- Yoda, Yoshikata, “The Density of Mizoguchi’s Scripts,” in Cinema (Los Angeles), Spring 1971.
- Braucourt, G., and others, “Trois cinéastes de la femme,” in Ecran (Paris), August-September 1974.
- Cros, J. L., in Image et Son (Paris), April 1978.
- Sato, Tadao, and Dudley Andrew, “On Kenji Mizoguchi,” in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Spring 1980.
- McDonald, K., “Form and Function in Osaka Elegy,” in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Winter 1982.
- Russell, Catherine, “‘Overcoming Modernity’: Gender and the Pathos of History in Japanese Film Melodrama,” in Camera Obscura (Bloomington), no. 35, May 1995.
- Burdeau, Emmanuel, and others, “Mizoguchi Encore,” in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 504, July-August 1996.
- Hoberman, J., “Great Leaps Backward,” in The Village Voice (New York), vol. 41, no. 38, 17 September 1996.

* * *

The term “feminist” has been applied to the films of Kenji Mizoguchi frequently and somewhat indiscriminately. The term can involve three rather different approaches: 1) films that explicitly confront and endorse the theories and values of the women’s liberation movement; 2) films that analyze the ways in which women are oppressed within society; and 3) films in which the director appears to identify with, show special sympathy for, female characters. The interest in Mizoguchi’s work is that it covers this entire spectrum of approaches. Only two of his films that have become accessible in the West (Victory of Women and My Love Has Been Burning) employ the first approach (both belong to the immediate aftermath of World War II and to the enforced “democratization” of Japan under the American occupation). The late films, especially, are examples of the third approach, and involve the constant risk of succumbing to traditional male-created myths of women, especially woman-as-redeemer, with the emphasis on female sacrifice. Osaka Elegy (as it is generally known in the West), like Sisters of Gion made later in the same year, is that of the second approach. Here the risk is that the films will become “melodramas of defeat,” reinforcing myths of woman-as-victim, with an emphasis on female masochism.

The importance of Osaka Elegy lies in its position within the series of increasingly radical feminist films that culminates in the magnificent My Love Has Been Burning (1949), one of Mizoguchi’s greatest achievements, for which no equivalent exists within the commercial cinema of the West. Osaka Elegy marks, in many respects, a point of hesitation prior to the director’s total (if temporary) commitment to feminist principles. Noël Burch is clearly correct (in To the Distant Observer) in arguing for the superiority of Sisters of Gion, though it is a pity the argument is conducted on purely formal grounds: the formal and stylistic rigour of the later film is paralleled in its altogether tougher and more uncompromising treatment of women’s oppression, central to which is its female protagonist, whom the film credits with a rebelliousness and ideological awareness far beyond that of Ayako in Osaka Elegy (the two characters are played, splendidly, by the same actress, Isuzu Yamada, which underlines the continuity between the two films).

Naniwa ereji

As Noël Burch suggests, Osaka Elegy is stylistically torn between a capitulation to the codes of dominant cinema—Hollywood—and the repudiation of them marked so emphatically by Sisters of Gion. It is also torn, thematically and dramatically, between the female masochism of earlier Mizoguchi films (such as Taki No Shiraito, 1933) and the feminist protest to come—marvellously anticipated in the final shot, in which Ayako walks and stares straight into camera, with a look combining defiance with denunciation of the society (i.e., the film's contemporary audience) that has condemned her to prostitution. The film also has a dimension lacking in its successors: an analysis of the oppression of women within the family, in the name of familial “loyalty” and “duty”—the duty of the daughter to serve, unquestioningly, father and brother.

Where Sisters of Gion breaks with the codes of western cinema, Osaka Elegy evokes direct comparison with certain Hollywood films of the same period, especially the films of von Sternberg with Marlene Dietrich, where the resemblance is stylistic as well as thematic. It lacks the extraordinary excess and obsessiveness that give the von Sternberg films their unique distinction; on the other hand, the political rigour that was to characterize the Mizoguchi films centred on women up to 1950 is here more than embryonic.

—Robin Wood

NANOOK OF THE NORTH

Canada, 1922

Director: Robert Flaherty

Production: Révillon Frères; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: 75 minutes; length: 1525 meters. Released 11 June 1922, New York. Re-released July 1947 with narration and music. Re-released 1976 with music track only. Filmed August 1920–August 1921 in the area around the Hudson Strait, Canada; and along the shores of the Hopewell Sound, Quebec, Canada. Cost: $55,000.

Producer: Robert Flaherty; screenplay and photography: Robert Flaherty; titles: Robert Flaherty and Carl Stearns Clancy; editors: Robert and Frances Flaherty.

Publications

Books:

Talbot, Frederick A., Moving Pictures, Philadelphia, 1923.
 Flaherty, Robert, My Eskimo Friends, New York, 1924.
 O'Dell, Scott, Representative Photoplays Analyzed, Los Angeles, 1924.
 Canudo, Ricciotto, L'Usine aux images, Paris, 1927.
 Stefansson, Vilhjalmur, The Standardization of Error, London, 1928.
 Weinberg, Herman, Two Pioneers: Robert Flaherty, Hans Richter, London, 1946.
 Grierson, John, Grierson on Documentary, edited by Forsyth Hardy, New York, 1947.

Gromo, Mario, Robert Flaherty, Parma, 1952.
 Rotha, Paul, Documentary Film, London, 1952.
 Griffith, Richard, The World of Robert Flaherty, New York, 1953.
 Flaherty, Frances, The Odyssey of a Film-Maker: Robert Flaherty's Story, Urbana, Illinois, 1960.
 Gobetti, Paolo, Robert Flaherty, Turin, 1960.
 Quintar, Fuad, Robert Flaherty et le documentaire poétique, Paris, 1960.
 De Heusch, Luc, The Cinema and Social Science: A Survey of Ethnographic and Sociological Films, Paris, 1962.
 Clemente, Jose L., Robert Flaherty, Madrid, 1963.
 Cuenca, Carlos Fernandez, Robert Flaherty, Madrid, 1963.
 Calder-Marshall, Arthur, The Innocent Eye: The Life of Robert J. Flaherty, London, 1963; New York, 1966.
 Klaue, Wolfgang, editor, Robert Flaherty, East Berlin, 1964.
 Agel, Henri, Robert J. Flaherty, Paris, 1965.
 Pratt, George C., Spellbound in Darkness: A History of the Silent Film, New York, 1966.
 Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.
 Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.
 Napolitano, Antonio, Robert J. Flaherty, Florence, 1975.

Nanook of the North

Murphy, William T., Robert Flaherty: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Williams, Christopher, Realism and Cinema: A Reader, London, 1980.

Rotha, Paul, Robert J. Flaherty: A Biography, Philadelphia, 1983.

Barsam, Richard, The Vision of Robert Flaherty: The Artist as Myth and Filmmaker, Bloomington, 1988.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 16 June 1922.

Tidden, Fritz, in Moving Picture World (New York), 24 June 1922.

Patterson, Frances Taylor, in New Republic (New York), 9 August 1922.

Ramsay, Terry, "Flaherty, Great Adventurer," in Photoplay (New York), May 1928.

Needham, Wilbur, "The Future of American Cinema," in Close Up (London), June 1928.

Interview with Flaherty in Sight and Sound (London), no. 71, 1949.

Taylor, Robert Lewis, "Profile of Flaherty," in New Yorker, 11, 18, and 25 June 1949.

Campassi, Osvaldo, in Cinema (Rome), 15 July 1949.

Taylor, Robert Lewis, "Flaherty—Education for Wanderlust," in The Running Pianist, New York, 1950.

Knight, Arthur, and Cecile Starr, in Saturday Review (New York), 6 January 1951.

Scherer, Maurice (i.e., Eric Rohmer), in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1951.

Flaherty, Frances, "The Flaherty Way," in Saturday Review (New York), 13 September 1951.

Sadoul, Georges, "Hommage à Robert Flaherty," in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 13 September 1951.

"Flaherty in Review," in Sight and Sound (London), November-December 1951.

Manvell, Roger, "Robert Flaherty, Geographer," in Geographical Magazine (New York), February 1957.

Flaherty, Frances, "Explorations," and "Robert Flaherty—The Man and the Film-Maker" by Charles Siepmann, in Film Book No. 1: The Audience and the Filmmaker, edited by Robert Hughes, New York, 1959.

Flaherty, Frances, "Flaherty's Quest for Life," in Films and Filming (London), January 1959.

Flaherty, Robert, "How I Filmed Nanook of the North," in Filmmakers on Filmmaking, New York, 1967.

Flaherty, Robert, in The Emergence of Film Art, edited by Lewis Jacobs, New York, 1969.

Barnouw, Erik, "Robert Flaherty," in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1972.

Helman, A., in Kino (Warsaw), March 1973.

Corliss, Richard, "Robert Flaherty: The Man in the Iron Myth," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1973.

Ruby, J., "A Re-examination of the Early Career of Robert J. Flaherty," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (Pleasantville, New York), Fall 1980.

Godard, Jean-Luc, "Introduction à une véritable histoire du cinéma," in Camera Obscura (Los Angeles), Fall 1982.

Arnold, Gordon B., "From Big Screen to Small Screen: Nanook of the North Directed by Robert Flaherty," in Library Journal (New York), vol. 114, no. 9, 15 May 1989.

Carpenter, E., "Assassins and Cannibals: Or I Got Me a Small Mind and I Means to Use It," in SVA Newsletter, vol. 5, no. 1, 1989.

Everson, William K., "Collectibles: Nanook of the North Directed by Robert Flaherty/Man of Aran Directed by Robert Flaherty/Louisiana Story Directed by Robert Flaherty," in Video Review (New York), vol. 12, no. 7, October 1991.

Dick, Jeff, "North to Alaska: Nanook of the North Directed by Robert Flaherty," in Library Journal (New York), vol. 119, no. 9, 15 May 1994.

Wall, J.M., "Mesmerized," in Christian Century, vol. 111, 21/28 September 1994.

Berger, Sally, "Move Over Nanook," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 17, no. 1-4, 1995.

Shepard, David H., "The Nanook Crisis (1960-75)," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 17, no. 1-4, 1995.

Russell, Catherine, "Jouer aux Indiens: In the Land of the Headhunters on War Canoes," in Cinémas (Montreal), vol. 6, no. 1, Fall 1995.

Grace, Sherrill, "Exploration as Construction: Robert Flaherty and Nanook of the North," in Essays on Canadian Writing (Toronto), no. 59, Fall 1996.

Leacock, Richard, "In Defense of the Flaherty Traditions," in Film Culture (New York), no. 79, Winter 1996.

Nolley, K., "Finding Alternatives to Gossip: Reflexivity and the Paradigm of Traditional Documentary," in Visual Anthropology (Newark), vol. 9, no. 3/4, 1997.

Umland, Rebecca, and Sam Umland, "Nanook of the North," in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 48, 1998.

* * *

Through the everyday life of one family, Nanook of the North typifies Eskimo life in the Arctic; it uses a number of sequences that demonstrate Inuit ingenuity and adaptability in one of the world's harshest climates. Flaherty filmed his documentary during the years 1920-1921 on the eastern shore of Hudson Bay's Ungava Peninsula. He brought with him a Carl Akeley gyroscope camera which required minimum lubrication in cold climates to facilitate pans and tilts; Flaherty was something of a pioneer in the camera's use. He also brought along printing equipment to process and develop the film on location and a portable theater to involve the Eskimos more intimately in the film's production, to enable them to understand its purpose.

Despite the license that Flaherty took in portraying some events and conditions, the film's most important feature was its very basis in reality. Nanook and his family were real persons who reenacted their lives before Flaherty's camera. Not to be confused with cinema vérité, Flaherty carefully selected his "cast" and directed them to "play" their own roles and to carry out tasks that would demonstrate to the outside world how they conducted their lives. Through a careful selection of details, Flaherty succeeded in conveying the drama, the struggle, underlying their daily existence.

Nanook was a significant departure both from the fiction and nonfiction films that preceded it. It departs from fiction because it lacks a plot or story. The background comes to the fore. Man's struggle to survive in this bleak environment becomes an inseparable part of the film's dramatic development. Its photographic detail was also far superior to other films of actuality. The film departs from nonfiction, newsreels and other actualities, in its narrative editing (for 1922), its ability to tell a story through images, and its use of the shot as the basis of a sequence. The film provides detailed pictorial information of the environment, narrative structure, and the filmmaker's art with its implicit emotive statement.

Nanook is a reflection of Flaherty's life-long interest in the interaction of diverse cultures. To be sure, Flaherty wanted to give the outside world a glimpse of Eskimo life as he had experienced it during his years as an explorer, surveyor, and prospector in the lower Arctic region. However, he also wanted to capture on film a way of life threatened by encroaching civilization. Nanook, like other Flaherty films, is not depicted in a particular historical setting or context; the timeless appearance was deliberate. He also wanted to capture the Eskimos' essential nobility, to portray them as they saw themselves.

The building of the igloo sequences serves to illustrate Flaherty's technique. Detail upon detail demonstrates Nanook's amazing ingenuity. He builds a shelter out of ice and snow. The sequence is not overexplained. The audience is left to discover each new step and its significance—such as the way in which the translucent block of ice is used as a window. What perhaps has sparked the most discussion is Flaherty's shooting of the interior shots inside the igloo. Restricted to camera negative stock with relatively slow speed or slow sensitivity to light, he had an igloo constructed to twice the average size with half of it cut away to permit sunlight to brighten the scene. The Nanook family goes to sleep during the day for the benefit of Flaherty's camera. This sequence illustrates Flaherty's dictum that sometimes it is necessary to exaggerate reality in order to capture its real essence.

Professor Frances Taylor Patterson of Columbia University was one of the first to recognize the documentary value of Nanook. It differed from travel exotica, she wrote, because it did not wander but used one location and one hunter to present an entire culture. Later in the decade some writers criticized Nanook for lack of authenticity. However, most modern writers have been delighted with the film's emotive powers which have made audiences identify with the fundamental struggle to survive with all its sociological and philosophical implications.

Nanook, opening to rave reviews, almost immediately was considered one of the greatest films of all times; it quickly received worldwide distribution. Robert Sherwood, for example, called it "literally in a class by itself." No one called it a documentary, though, until as a result of the release of Moana (1926) and the writings of John Grierson, parallels could be seen in Flaherty's work. They became the foundation for the development of documentary film as an art form and as a new filmic sensibility. It is perhaps Edmund Carpenter, the cultural anthropologist, who best elucidated Nanook of the North and Flaherty's work in general by noting a relationship between this film and Eskimo art. To the Eskimo, he wrote, the creation of art is "an act of seeing and expressing life's values; it's a ritual of discovery by which patterns of nature and of human nature are revealed by man." The drama of daily existence in the North is not imposed from the outside but discovered by exploration, a process that takes into account the natural environment and a philosophy of life.

Nanook remains the most enduring of all Flaherty's films for its simplicity of purpose, structure, and design. It ennobles its subjects rather than exploits them. It relies on a few well-developed sequences. The images, sharp and uncluttered, are still memorable.

—William T. Murphy

NAPOLEON

(Napoléon vu par Abel Gance)

France, 1927

Director: Abel Gance

Production: Westi/Société générale de films, Paris; black and white, 35mm, Polyvision (some versions without Polyvision); running time: originally about 270 minutes, but the film has always existed in several versions, some up to 5 hours in length; length: originally about 32 reels. Released 7 April 1927, Paris. Released without Polyvision 1929, New York. Re-released 1934 with sound. In 1971 Napoléon—Bonaparte et la Revolution was re-released with sound and with some footage added and some eliminated. In 1981 Napoléon, the original version, was restored by Kevin Brownlow and re-released in its entirety with music by Carl Davis, also re-released in the US by Francis Coppola with some footage cut and music by Carmine Coppola. Filmed 1925–26 in France.

Producers: Wengoroff and Hugo Stinnes; screenplay: Abel Gance; photography: Jules Kruger, Léonce-Henry Burel, Jean-Paul Mundwiller, assisted by Lucas, Briquet, Emile Pierre, and Roger Hubert; editors: Marguerite Beaugé and Henriette Pinson; production designers: Alexandre Benois, Schildnecht, Jacouty, Meinhardt, and Laourie; music: Arthur Honegger; consultants: Jean Arroy, Jean Mitry, and Sacher Purnal; assistant directors: Henry Krauss, Alexandre Volkov, and Viatcheslaw Tourjansky.

Cast: Albert Dieudonné (Bonaparte); Vladimir Roudenko (Young Bonaparte); Edmond van Daele (Robespierre); Alexandre Koubitsky (Danton); Antonin Artaud (Marat); Abel Gance (Saint-Just); Pierre Batcheff (Hoche); Maxudian (Barras); Chakatouny (Pozzo di Borgo); Philippe Hériat (Salicetti); Nicolas Koline (Tristan Fleuri); Daniel Mendaille (Fréron); Alexandre Bernard (Dugommier); Philippe Rolla (Masséna); Robert Vidalin (Camille Desmoulins); Roger Blum (Talma); Paul Amiot (Fouquier-Tinville); Boudreau (La Fayette); Georges Lampin (Joseph Bonaparte); Alberty (J.-J. Rousseau); R. de Ansorena (Desaix); Jack Rye (Louis XVI); Armand Bernard (Jean-Jean); Albert Bras (Monge); Georges Cahuzac (Beauharnais); Favière (Fouché); Harry Krimer (Rouget de Lisle); Genica Missirio (Murat); Rauzena (Lucien Bonaparte); Viguier (Couthon); Vonnelly (André Chenier); Jean d'Yd (La Bussière); Gina Manès (Joséphine de Beauharnais); Annabella (Violaine Fleuri); Suzanne Blanchetti (Marie-Antoinette); Eugénie Buffet (Letizia Bonaparte); Damia (la Marseillaise); Yvette Dieudonné (Elisa Bonaparte); Marguerite Gance (Charlotte Corday); Simone Genevois (Pauline Bonaparte).

Publications

Script:

Gance, Abel, Napoléon vu par Abel Gance, Paris, 1927; selections in Ecran (Paris), April-May 1958.

Napoleon

Books:

- Arroy, Jean, En tournant "Napoléon" avec Abel Gance: Souvenirs et impressions d'un sans-culotte, Paris, 1927.
 Sadoul, Georges, French Films, London, 1953.
 Icard, Roger, Abel Gance, Toulouse, 1960.
 Brownlow, Kevin, The Parade's Gone By, London and New York, 1969.
 Mast, Gerald, Film/Cinema/Movie, New York, 1977.
 Kramer, Steven, and James Welsh, Abel Gance, Boston, 1978.
 Brownlow, Kevin, Napoléon: Abel Gance's Classic Film, London, 1983.
 Icart, Roger, Abel Gance: ou, Le Prométhée foudroyé, Lausanne, 1983.
 King, Norman, Abel Gance: A Politics of Spectacle, London, 1984.
 Groppali, Enrico, Abel Gance, Florence, 1986.
 Kaplan, Nelly, Napoléon, London, 1994.

Articles:

- Graham, James, in New York Times, 5 June 1927.
 "France Films Her Napoleon," in New York Times, 4 March 1928.

- Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 12 February 1929.
 Gance, Abel, "Les Nouveaux Chapitres de notre syntaxe," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1953.
 Gance, Abel, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1954.
 Thompson, Howard, in New York Times, 25 September 1967.
 Lenning, Arthur, "The French Film—Abel Gance," in The Silent Voice: A Text, New York, 1969.
 Brownlow, Kevin, in Films and Filming (London), November 1969.
 Blumer, R. H., "The Camera as Snowball," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1970.
 Greenspun, Roger, "Bonaparte and the Revolution," in New York Times, 16 October 1971.
 McKegney, Michael, in Village Voice (New York), 11 November 1971.
 Brownlow, Kevin, "Abel Gance's Napoleon and the Revolution," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1971–72.
 Canby, Vincent, in Film 71/72, New York, 1972.
 Gilliat, Penelope, in New Yorker, 6 September 1976.
 Brownlow, Kevin, "Napoléon—A Personal Involvement," in Classic Film Collector (Indiana, Pennsylvania), 23 August 1977.
 Everson, William K., in Variety (New York), 12 September 1979.

Grant, F., in Broadcast (London), 8 December 1980.

Eisenschitz, B., "The Music of Time: From Napoleon to New Babylon," in Afterimage (London), no. 10, 1981.

Pappas, P., "The Superimposition of Vision: Napoleon and the Meaning of Fascist Art," in Cineaste (New York), no. 2, 1981.

Brownlow, Kevin, in American Film (Washington, D.C), January-February 1981.

Everson, William K., "The Many Lives of Napoleon," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1981.

Elley, Derek, in Films (London), February 1981.

Welsh, James M., in Films in Review (New York), March 1981.

Allen, W., interview with Kevin Brownlow, in Stills (London), Autumn 1981.

Assayas, O., "Mensonges et vérités," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1981.

Hogekamp, B., in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), December 1981-January 1982.

French, Sean, "The Napoleon Phenomenon," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1982.

Abel, R., "Change and Counter-Change: Coherence and Incoherence in Gance's Napoléon," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1982.

Vallerand, F., "Napoléon Coppola et les autres," in Séquences (Montreal), April 1982.

Verstappen, W., in Skoop (Amsterdam), June 1982.

Tobin, Yann, "Sur Napoléon d'Abel Gance: La Folie du docteur Gance," in Positif (Paris), June 1982.

Aristarco, G., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), August-October 1982.

Icart, Roger, "La Representation de Napoleon Bonaparte dans l'oeuvre d'Abel Gance," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Autumn 1982.

"Napoléon Issue" of Cinématographe (Paris), November 1982.

Arnaud, C., and Jean Mitry, "Sur les ailes de l'aigle: Notes sur Napoléon," in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1982.

Philpott, R., "Whose Napoleon?," in Framework (Norwich), 1983.

Jeancolas, J.P., "Gance au Havre," in Positif (Paris), January 1983.

Lardeau, Y., "L'Empereur contre-attaque," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1983.

Bassan, R., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), September 1983.

Leblanc, G., "Gance dans le regard de l'aigle," in Cinétique (Paris), May 1984.

Weijel, H., in Skoop (Amsterdam), November 1984.

"Napoléon Issue" of Skrien (Amsterdam), November-December 1984.

Nørrested, C., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), December 1984.

Deburchgrave, K., in Film en Televisie (Brussels), January 1985.

Filmfaust (Frankfurt), January-February 1987.

Stewart, Garrett, "Leaving History: Dickens, Gance, Blanchot," in The Yale Journal of Criticism (New Haven), vol. 2, no. 2, Spring 1989.

Arnold, Gordon B., "From Big Screen to Small Screen: Napoleon Directed by Abel Gance," in Library Journal (New York), vol. 114, no. 9, 15 May 1989.

Lafaye, C., "Gance et 'son' Napoléon," in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan, France), no. 53, 1990.

Comuzio, E., "La musica dell'Imperatore salvata dal diluvio," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), May 1990.

Gordon, M., "Some Things I Saw," in Salmagundi (Saratoga Springs, New York), Fall-Winter 1990-1991.

Gerstenkorn, Jacques, "L'empire de l'analogie," in Vertigo (Paris), no. 6-7, 1991.

Seville, J., "The Laser's Edge: Napoléon vu par Abel Gance," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 194, August 1991.

Conforti, A., and M. Lori, "La metafora nel cinema: Napoléon di Abel Gance," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), July-August 1992.

Fernandez, C., " Napoléon vu par Abel Gance: el poder de la mirada—Napoleon y el aguila," in Film-Historia (Barcelona), vol. 5, no. 1, 1995.

* * *

The showing of Napoléon vu par Abel Gance on 7 April 1927 at the Opéra in Paris was in every sense a triumphant occasion. For the invited audience it meant the culminating point of the restoration of French cinema after its virtual annihilation in 1914. For writer-director Abel Gance himself it was the climax to 18 years of work in the cinema and 10 years of rigorous and innovative exploration of the visual potential of the medium. Napoléon alone had taken three years of unremitting research, writing and shooting, cost several million francs, involved thousands of extras and a team of a dozen assistants and at least eight cameramen and directors of photography.

The project had been initially conceived as a massive six-part work which was to include the whole of Napoleon's life. The eventual six hours of edited footage in fact covers only a portion of the first part of this grandiose scheme, so the scale of Gance's imagination is immediately apparent. The truncation of the project means that though Napoléon has a greater sweep than any other Gance epic, it lacks the tragic resolution which usually completed Gance's tales of heroic endeavour, whether that of Jean Diaz in J'accuse, Savaronola in Lucrece Borgia, or Beethoven in Un grand amour de Beethoven. Despite its length, the film offers only the education and shaping of its hero, leaving him at an early point of triumph—the entry of his armies into Italy.

It is the technical aspects of Napoléon that have always received the most attention. The context in which Gance was working was one highly receptive of visual experimentation. After the constriction of the pre-1914 system organised by Charles Pathé and Léon Gaumont, in which Gance had made his debut, the new postwar generation to which he belonged strove to give a new dignity to the cinema. Despising the underfinanced, totally commercially oriented cinema of the early 1910s, with its philistine disregard for artistic aspiration and its conception of films as products to be made as if they were canned peas, Gance and his contemporaries strove to develop the visual potential of the new medium, experimenting with mobile cameras and the new editing techniques pioneered by the emergent Hollywood narrative cinema and indulging in a profusion of optical effects—masks and superimpositions, distorting lenses and pulled focus. All of these tendencies reach their climax in Napoléon. To help with the massive project and the manipulation of the crowd scenes, Gance sought the assistance of fellow directors Henry Krauss, Alexandre Volkov and Viatcheslaw Tourjansky. With the aid of a team of cinematographers led by Jules Kruger, Léonce-Henry Burel and Jean-Paul Mundwiller, Gance moved his camera in every conceivable fashion—to imitate a ship tossed by a storm, the view from a galloping horse or even a snowball in flight. As if this welter of visual effects were not in itself sufficiently dazzling, Gance arranged for the screen width to be tripled at the end, so that Napoleon's entry into Italy, recorded in widescreen and with triptych effects, becomes a stunningly unique visual experience.

The climate of French 1920s cinema was conducive to Gance's project, and there was nothing to restrain his exuberant imagination.

The most successful films of the decade were super-productions with an exotic, literary or historical flavour, and Napoléon was designed to outmatch them all. It combined breathtaking virtuosity with a totally personal conception of the subject, and not until the 1970s masterpieces of Coppola and Spielberg do we find a similar harnessing of the entire resources of an industry to an unfettered personal vision. Central to Gance's conception was a 19th-century romantic view of the artist. It has been well observed that just as Un grand amour de Beethoven depicts the artist as hero, Napoléon offers a view of the hero as artist. Though Gance himself played the role of Saint Just, he identified himself as creator of the film with Napoleon (played by Albert Dieudonné) as creator of a new France and master of the forces of history. Napoleon—man of action, politician and military genius—becomes a largely passive figure, a pensive visionary. Much stress is placed on Napoleon's childhood, and the hero's ability to crush dissent with a steely gaze is anticipated in early scenes of the schoolboy leading his side in a snowball fight. The boy is endowed with an all-too-symbolic pet eagle. But if these early scenes are often lively and well-realised, the most remarkable feature of this inevitably uneven work is the handling of action, nowhere better shown than in the celebrated scenes which intercut shots of Napoleon at sea in a tiny boat rocked by a storm with the human storm in the Convention in revolution-torn Paris.

In the 1980s Napoléon became probably the most celebrated of all silent masterpieces. Kevin Brownlow's 20-year self-imposed task of bringing together all extant footage of the film is a remarkable endeavour, but for film historians it raises a whole host of questions about authenticity and authorship. There are now two quite different Napoléon restorations, Brownlow's own English version with its music by Carl Davis and preservation of silent running speed, and the version distributed in the United States by Francis Coppola's company which is cut, run at the inappropriate speed of 24 frames a second and endowed with a questionable score by Coppola's father. Moreover, far from simply constituting a restoration of a mutilated film and a recreation of the viewing conditions of silent cinema with full orchestral accompaniment, Brownlow's five-hour version is as much a modern interpretation and distortion as Henri Langlois's seven- or eight-hour compilations of episodes from Judex or Les vampires. These versions led to the rediscovery of Louis Feuillade's work and the restoration of his reputation, but by compressing up to a dozen episodes, designed to be seen separately at fortnightly intervals, into a single massive viewing session, Langlois created a work that owed nothing to 1920s conceptions of film narrative and time-span. This new relationship of film and spectator can have an immediate "modern" impact, as the films of Jacques Rivette, one of the Cinémathèque Française's most faithful habitués, show, but it is not a recreation of the 1920s experience.

Similarly, Brownlow's "original" version corresponds to none that was ever shown in Paris in the 1920s, and there is nothing to indicate that audiences then would have accepted this five-hour endurance test. The actual Napoléon, like so many silent films, existed in several versions, and the 1927 showings were either of a shortened version with triptych effects (as at the premiere in the Opéra) or a four- or six-episode version without triple screen and shown over a period of weeks. Despite such paradoxes, the Brownlow version has many virtues, not least of which has been its revival of interest in silent cinema. Moreover, whereas Gance's own reworkings of his material—the 1934 sound version, the re-edited 1971 compilation Bonaparte et la révolution—like his 1960s feature Austerlitz, are simplifications and at times trivialisations, this 1980s version restores the work to full complexity and to its status of one of the 1920s most remarkable achievements.

—Roy Armes

NARAYAMA BUSHI-KO

(The Ballad of Narayama)

Japan, 1983

Director: Shohei Imamura

Production: Toei Company; colour, 35mm; running time: 130 minutes.

Producer: Jiro Tomoda, Goro Kusakabe; screenplay: Shohei Imamura, based on the novels Narayama bushi-ko and Tohoku no zunmutachi by Shichiro Fukazawa; photography: Masao Tochizawa; editor: Hajime Okayasu; assistant director: Kunio Takegishe; music: Shinichiro Ikebe; sound recording: Yoshiichi Beniya; costumes: Kyoto Isho.

Cast: Ken Ogata (Tatsuhei); Sumiko Sakamoto (Orinyan); Tonpei Hidari (Risuke); Takejo Aki (Tama-yan); Shoichi Ozawa (Shozo); Mitsuaki Fukamizu (Tada-yan); Seiji Kurasaki (Kesakichi); Junko Takada (Matsu-yan); Mitsuko Baisho (Oei).

Narayama bushi-ko

Publications

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 25 May 1983.
 Tesson, C., and Y. Lardeau, Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June-July 1983.
 Renaud, C., 24 Images (Montreal), Autumn 1983.
 Masson, A., and others, Positif (Paris), September 1983.
 Tessier, M., Revue du Cinéma (Paris), September 1983.
 Magny, J., Cinéma (Paris), October 1983.
 Beaulieu, J., Séquences (Montreal), January 1984.
 Rayns, T., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), May 1984.
 Stanbrook, A., "Taking Mum to the Mountain" in Stills (London), June-July 1984.
 Breen, M., Cinema Papers (Victoria), August 1984.

* * *

The Ballad of Narayama is perhaps one of the most overrated films of recent years, an ahistorical fantasy by an urban intellectual about a rural society that never existed. Its favourable reception among some critics and audiences is more interesting than the film itself, which fails as a drama, as a commentary on Japan and as a philosophical statement.

The film is based on two novels by Fukazawa Shichiro, each of which has been adapted for the cinema before, Narayama bushi-ko in 1956 and Tohoku no zunmutachi in 1957. Imamura's decision to combine them in one allegedly realistic film, made to resemble a documentary as much as possible, is one of the sources of the film's dramatic weakness. The central plot device, the decision of Orin, an aged widow, to sacrifice herself on the mountain (Narayama) so that her family may survive, is discussed and elaborated so often that many viewers will wonder why she does not just hurry up and carry it out. It is also obscured by subplots, in which her elder son Tatsuei enters a second marriage; her grandson Kesakichi loses his lover Matsu when her entire family is killed because her father is a thief; and her younger son Risuke, shunned by the other villagers because he smells bad, is fixed up with a woman for the first time in his life.

The narrative depends for its effect on treating legends about ancient Japan as if they were historical truths. Yet there never was a real mountain where old people abandoned themselves, or were abandoned, to the elements; there is no historical evidence that thieves were killed by their fellow-villagers, let alone their entire families; as for Risuke, perhaps people who smelled bad were indeed shunned in primitive Japan, but it is now impossible to know, nor are we told why Risuke has this particular problem—or, for that matter, how everyone else in the village manages to smell good. Imamura's refusal to specify where and when the events he depicts are taking place consigns them to an undifferentiated "Past" which has no plausibility, either as legend—in contrast, for example, to Oni Baba, or Ingmar Bergman's The Seventh Seal—or as a basis for trustworthy or thoughtprovoking reflection on the present.

Skillful cinematography, acting or other elements can sometimes compensate for deficiencies in the direction or writing of a film, but not in this case. The progress of the year from winter to winter is laboriously and clumsily indicated by predictable clichés: rice shoots in spring, shimmering heat in summer, leaves changing colour in the fall and snow falling and falling, with soporific effect, in winter. The actors in the film have evidently been encouraged to represent primeval drives by grunting and shouting throughout the film, and can do little with their impossible roles, ranging from the saintly Orin herself, through her sons, one laughably macho, the other irritatingly pathetic, to the monotonously hysterical Matsu.

It is particularly distressing to see Baisho Mitsuko and Ogata Ken, two highly intelligent and sophisticated actors, reduced to performing as pawns in Imamura's game, his attempt to present a shallow and unconvincing utopia as if it was once, or ever could have been, a real society. The novelist Fukazawa's intention was to recreate what he believed had been the way of life of the ancient Japanese, before the importation of, first, Chinese influences and, later, Western influences which have, in his view, corrupted the "purity" of Japanese culture. Imamura's intention seems to be to pass off such harmless, if threadbare, fantasies as if they were not only historically accurate but also spiritually resonant or philosophically stimulating. But there is no irony, humour or other distancing effect in the film, and Imamura excludes any character capable—as almost all real human beings have always been capable—of reflection or questioning about the customs being observed. But by demeaning the people in the film Imamura implicitly demeans the people watching it, and the gap between his grand ambitions and his shoddy achievements presents its own stark contrast with the skillfully plotted, beautifully staged and acted, historically accurate and deeply moving masterpieces of Kurosawa, Mizoguchi and other genuine masters of the Japanese cinematic tradition.

It is striking that this film, which had limited critical and commercial success in Japan, won the Grand Prize at the Cannes Film Festival in 1983 and was hailed as a masterpiece by leading Western film critics, many of whom knew little or nothing about Japan, past or present. This suggests that some Western filmgoers still cling to an outdated, misinformed and even racist notion of Japan as extremely alien and exotic, a country of people "close to nature" whose films can be patronised by refusing to apply normal critical standards to them; and that some Japanese, including Imamura, are all too happy to foster such attitudes, for their own nationalistic reasons.

—Patrick Heenan

NASHVILLE

USA, 1975

Director: Robert Altman

Production: Paramount Pictures; Metrocolor, 35mm, Panavision; running time: 159 minutes. Released 1975. Filmed on location in Nashville.

Producer: Robert Altman; screenplay: Joan Tewkesbury; title design: Dan Perri; photography: Paul Lohmann; editors: Sidney Levin and Dennis Hill; sound: Jim Webb and Chris McLaughlin; music director: Richard Baskin.

Cast: David Arkin (Norman); Barbara Baxley (Lady Pearl); Ned Beatty (Delbert Reese); Karen Black (Connie White); Ronee Blakley (Barbara Jean); Timothy Brown (Tommy Brown); Keith Carradine (Tom Frank); Geraldine Chaplin (Opal); Robert Doqui (Wade); Shelley Duvall (L. A. Joan); Allen Garfield (Barnett); Henry Gibson

Nashville

(Haven Hamilton); Scott Glenn (Pfc. Glen Kelly); Jeff Goldblum (Tricycle man); Barbara Harris (Albuquerque); David Hayward (Kenny Fraiser); Michael Murphy (John Triplett); Allan Nichols (Bill); Dave Peel (Bud Hamilton); Christina Raines (Mary); Bert Remsen (Star); Lily Tomlin (Linnea Reese); Gwen Welles (Sueleen); Keenan Wynn (Mr. Green).

Awards: Oscar for Best Song ("I'm Easy" by Keith Carradine), 1975; New York Film Critics' Awards for Best Motion Picture, Best Direction, and Best Supporting Actress (Tomlin), 1975.

Publications

Script:

Tewkesbury, Joan, Nashville, Toronto, 1976.

Books:

Feineman, Neil, Persistence of Vision: The Films of Robert Altman, New York, 1976.
 Kass, Judith M., Robert Altman, American Innovator, New York, 1978.
 Kolker, Robert Phillip, A Cinema of Loneliness: Penn, Kubrick, Coppola, Scorsese, Altman, Oxford, 1980; revised edition, 1988.
 Karp, Alan, The Films of Robert Altman, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1981.
 Bourget, Jean-Loup, Robert Altman, Paris, 1981.

Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Tuska, Jon, editor, Close-Up: The Contemporary Director, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1981.

Kagan, Norman, American Sceptic: Robert Altman's Genre-Commentary Films, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.

Wexman, Virginia Wright, and Gretchen Bisplinghoff, Robert Altman: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1984.

Plecki, Gerard, Robert Altman, Boston, 1985.

Wood, Robin, Hollywood from Vietnam to Reagan, New York, 1986.

Keyssar, Helene, Robert Altman's America, New York, 1991.

McGilligan, Patrick, Robert Altman: Jumping Off the Cliff, New York, 1991.

Cagin, Seth, Born to Be Wild: Hollywood and the Sixties Generation, Boca Raton, 1994.

O'Brien, Daniel, Robert Altman: Hollywood Survivor, New York, 1996.

Sterritt, David, and Peter Brunette, editors, Robert Altman: Interviews, Jackson, 2000.

Articles:

Ciment, Michel, and M. Henry, "Entretien avec Robert Altman," in Positif (Paris), February 1975.

"Altman Seminar" in Dialogue on Film (Beverly Hills), February 1975.

Rosenbaum, Jonathan, "Improvisations and Interactions in Altmanville," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1975.

Murphy, A. D., in Variety (New York), 11 June 1975.

Reilly, C. P., in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1975.

Glaessner, Verina, in Focus on Film (London), Autumn 1975.

Rosenbaum, Jonathan, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1975.

Wood, Robin, "Smart-ass and Cutie-pie: Notes Toward an Evaluation of Altman," in Movie (London), Autumn 1975.

"Altman Issue" of Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1975.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), October 1975.

Strick, Philip, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1975.

Benayoun, Robert, "Altman, U.S.A.," in Positif (Paris), December 1975.

Interviews with Joan Tewkesbury, Ronee Blakley, and Keith Carradine, in Positif (Paris), December 1975.

Byrne, Connie, and William O. Lopez, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1975-76.

Blaedel, M., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), no. 131, 1976.

Self, Robert, "Invention and Death: The Commodities of Media in Robert Altman's Nashville," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), no. 5, 1976.

Cardullo, R. J., "The Space in the Distance: A Study of Altman's Nashville," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1976.

Knorr, W., "Buffalo Bill und die Indianer: Nashville," in Medien und Pädagogik (Munich), no. 4, 1976.

Belmans, J., "Pour bientôt de Robert Altman," in Amis du Film et de la Télévision (Brussels), January 1976.

Verstappen, W., in Skoop (Amsterdam), March 1976.

Magrelli, E., and G. Turroni, in Filmcritica (Rome), April 1976.

Giuricin, G., in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), July-August 1976.

Colpart, G., in Téléciné (Paris), July-August 1976.

Pitiot, P., and H. Talvat, "Robert Altman de Mash a Nashville," in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), September-October 1976.

Sauvaget, D., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), October 1976.

Frezzato, A., in Cineforum (Bergamo), October 1976.

Macklin, F. A., "The Artist and the Multitude Are Natural Enemies," interview with Robert Altman, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Winter 1976-77.

Binni, W., and A. Lombardo, "Poetiche ed ideologie de tre registi," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), January-February 1977.

Levine, R., "R. Altman & Co.," in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1977.

Plazewski, J., in Kino (Warsaw), March 1977.

Elsaesser, Thomas, "Ou finit le spectacle?," in Positif (Paris), September 1977.

Sack, C., "Joan Tewkesbury on Screenwriting: An Interview," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Winter 1978.

Cook, B., "Bob and Pauline: A Fickle Affair," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), December 1978-January 1979.

Bowles, Stephen E., "Cabaret and Nashville," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), no. 3, 1978-79.

Masbany, R., "Saturday Night Fever and Nashville: Exploring the Comic Mythos," in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), no. 3, 1978-79.

MacCabe, Colin, "The Discursive and the Ideological in Film: Notes on the Conditions of Political Intervention," in Screen (London), no. 4, 1978-79.

Tewkesbury, Joan, in American Film (Washington, D.C.), March 1979.

Taubman, Leslie, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Yacowar, Maurice, "Actors as Conventions in the Films of Robert Altman," in Cinema Journal (Evanston, Illinois), Fall 1980.

Edgerton, G., "Capra and Altman: Mythmaker and Mythologist," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1983.

Elsaesser, Thomas, "Nashville: Putting on the Show," in Persistence of Vision (Maspeth, New York), Summer 1984.

Listener (London), 22 August 1985.

Rush, J. S., "Who's in on the Joke; Parody as Hybridized Narrative Discourse," in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (New York), no. 1-2, 1990.

Comuzio, E., "Una canzone-azione in Nashville di Robert Altman," in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), January-February 1990.

Altman, Rick, "24-Track Narrative? Robert Altman's Nashville," in Cinemas (Montreal), vol. 1, no. 3, Spring 1991.

James, C., "Film View: Nashville Political Prescience," in New York Times, 8 November 1992.

Salamon, Julie, "On Film: Altman's in a Class by Himself," in Wall Street Journal (New York), 30 September 1993.

Lippy, T., "Writing Nashville," in Scenario (Rockville), vol. 1, no. 1, Winter 1995.

Tewkesbury, Joan, and Tod Lippy, "Nashville," in Scenario (Rockville), vol. 1, no. 1, Winter 1995.

Kostik, Damian, "Creation, Content and Context: Interview with Joan Tewkesbury," in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), vol. 4, no. 3, Fall 1997.

Hoban, Phoebe, "The Outsider as Hollywood Favorite: Biography," in New York Times (New York), 15 June 1997.

Ross, B., "Neither Plot nor Hero: The Script of Nashville," in Michigan Academician, vol. 29, no. 3, 1997.

Gross, Larry, "Nothing Fails Like Success," in Premiere (New York), vol. 12, no. 9, May 1999.

* * *

Robert Altman's Bicentennial epic about one weekend in the lives of people in Nashville, Tennessee, conveys his personal reflection on the state of the nation and his political call to fellow Americans on the nature of the state. Altman's artistic success results from the way he shapes uniquely American materials and sensibilities into a complex ideological network.

After three prologue scenes, Altman introduces a staggering total of 24 characters in one long location sequence at the Nashville airport (only Connie White—Karen Black—is not there, but her poster image represents her). The interweaving of characters, music, sights, and sounds in the airport and freeway sequences establishes them and their lives within a modernist context, a barrage of sensory impressions which Altman choreographs into a bombardment of movement and timing. The continuously moving camera, rhythmic cuts between characters, background band music, TV announcer both on screen and as off-screen voice-over commentator, airport noises, characters talking and overlapping each other, continue to build in momentum until all characters are on the freeway on the way to town. The freeway sequence incorporates wider perspectives in aerial and high angle shots, highway noises, conversations and arguments until, as screenwriter Joan Tewkesbury said, "Everything has whirled and spun and played through your senses."

Following this barrage-like exposition, Altman departs from stylistic sensational overload and moves to a "floating narrative," much like the style of TV soap operas in which the lives and events of many characters are presented by cutting back and forth between them. Altman periodically brings together and connects his 24 characters through devices of communication: telephones and telephone conversations, radio programs, tape recorded songs, the p.a. announcements of a presidential campaign van. He presents events happening simultaneously while slowly allowing for the evolution of time. Altman then cuts between four simultaneous church scenes, offering perspectives on as many characters as possible, then moves forward by cutting events into a progressive 24-hour period. Fewer things occur simultaneously as the camera begins more and more to catch each character impressionistically rather than following them all at the same time.

Cutting back and forth between gestures, reactions, and responses, their dynamic personalities of the characters emerge. But nothing is hinted at of their internal workings. They remain the sum of their exposed surfaces as no psychological or narrative meaning is assigned to their existences. Country singing star Barbara Jean (Ronee Blakley) comes the closest to exposing an internal emotional depth, but that is because her emotions have become her raw surface, both as a star and as a person, turning her into a fragile human being. Because she is the key narrative character, her fate and its meaning is more unresolved than anyone else's at the film's end.

In the last sequence of the film, the rally at the Nashville Parthenon, Altman reunites and refocuses on all his characters in one place. Unlike the airport scene, here the characters are united by a single event on which their reactions and responses depend. The Parthenon rally and the subsequent assassination act as the narrative's culminating hub, while all the characters move like spokes of a wheel in relation to it. Altman moves from the barrage of simultaneous moments in many characters' lives to a progressively more linear pattern until he is once again able to present many perspectives simultaneously responding to one single unifying element.

By creating a mosaic of contemporary American life, Nashville suggests a cultural view of reality that is made up of fragmented images and their incomprehensibility. But Altman overturns a bleak finale with the optimism that learning to live with uncertainty yields an affirmation and assignment of meaning to life in and of itself.

When influential New Yorker critic Pauline Kael first saw the film, she applauded Altman's vision, "I've never before seen a movie I loved in quite this way." Her laudatory review, based on a screening of a pre-release version of the film, caused a minor flurry of controversy about critical responsibility and was not able to help the film out of its box-office doldrums. But despite its lack of popular success, Nashville has since been heralded as one of director Altman's finest films and one of the quintessential American movies of the 1970s.

—Lauren Rabinovitz

THE NEEDLE

See IGLA

NEOBYCHANYE PRIKLYUCHENIYA MISTERA VESTA V STRANE BOLSHEVIKOV

(The Extraordinary Adventures of Mr. West in the Land of the Bolsheviks)

USSR, 1924

Director: Lev Kuleshov

Production: Goskino; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: 80 minutes. Released 1924.

Scenario: Nikolai Aseyev and V. I. Pudovkin; photography: Alexander Levitsky; production designer: V. I. Pudovkin; assistants: Alexandra Khokhlova, Leonid Obolensky, Sergei Komarov, Porfiri Podobed, and Leo Mur.

Cast: Porfiri Podobed (Mr. J. S. West); Boris Barnet (Jeddy, the cowboy); Alexandra Khokhlova (or Chochlowa) (Countess); V. I. Pudovkin (Zhban, the con-man); S. Komarov (One-eyed man); Leonid Obolensky (The dandy); V. Lopatina (Ellie, the American girl); G. Kharlampiev (S'enka Svisch); P. Galadzhhev, S. Sletov, and V. Latyshevskii (Con-men); A. Gorjchilin (Millionaire); Vladimir Fogel.

Publications

Books:

- Yezuitov, N., Poudouvkine, "Pouti Tvortchestva, Les Voies de la création," Moscow, 1937.
- Mariamov, A., Vsevolod Pudovkin, Moscow, 1952.
- Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, London, 1960.
- Schnitzer, Luda and Jean, Vsevolod Poudouvkine, Paris, 1966.
- Amengual, Barthélemy, V. I. Poudouvkine, Lyons, 1968.
- Rimberg, John, The Motion Picture in the Soviet Union 1918–1952: A Sociological Analysis, New York, 1973.
- Schnitzer, Luda and Jean, and Marcel Martin, editors, Cinema in Revolution: The Heroic Era of the Soviet Film, New York, 1973.
- Levaco, Ronald, editor, Kuleshov on Film, Berkeley, 1974.
- Dart, Peter, Pudovkin's Films and Film Theory, New York, 1974.
- Cohen, Louis, Harris, The Cultural-Political Traditions and Development of the Soviet Cinema, New York, 1974.
- Masi, Stefano, Vsevolod I. Pudovkin, Florence, 1985.
- Marshall, Herbert, Masters of the Soviet Cinema: Crippled Creative Biographies, London, 1985.
- Mariniello, Silvestra, Lev Kulesov, Firenze, 1990.

Articles:

- Sovietski Ekran* (Moscow), 12 March 1929.
- Weinberg, Herman, "Vsevolod Pudovkin," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1953.
- Zorkaia, Neia, "Lve Kouleshov," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May-June 1970.
- Levaco, Ronald, "Kuleshov," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1971.
- "The Classic Period of Soviet Cinema," in Film Journal (New York), Fall-Winter 1972.
- "Soviet Silent Cinema, Part I: 1918–1925," in Museum of Modern Art Department of Film Notes (New York), 7 March-15 April 1974.
- Duarte, F., and M.F. Feis, "Kuleshov, Kozintsev e Trauberg," in Celuloide, vol. 27, no. 342/343, December 1982.
- Bergroth, T., and Koller M., "The Extraordinary Adventures of Mrs. West in the Land of the Bolsheviks," in Filmviews (Mitcham), vol. 30, no. 124, Winter 1985.
- Bruno, Edoardo, in Filmcritica (Siena), vol. 39, no. 387, September 1988.
- Garroni, Emilio, in Filmcritica (Siena), vol. 39, no. 387, September 1988.
- Montani, P., "Il viaggio interminabile e la rappresentazione dell'altro," in Filmcritica (Siena), vol. 39, no. 387, September 1988.
- Bassan, R., "Lev Koulechof," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), no. 446, February 1989.
- "Lo 'scandalo' Kulesov," in Castoro Cinema (Florence), May-June 1989.
- Kulešov, Lev, "Caligari, Mr. West, Aélita: trois conceptions du film muet," in Positif (Paris), no. 359, January 1991.
- Sonnenberg, B., "Aelita: Queen of Mars, Others from the U.S.S.R.," in Nation, vol. 254, 9 March 1992.
- Christensen, P. G., "Contextualizing Kuleshov's Mr. West," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), vol. 18, no. 1, 1993.

Yampolsky, Mikhail, and Larry Joseph, "Mask Face and Machine Face: Film Theories of Lev Kuleshov," in TDR (Cambridge), vol. 38, no. 3, Fall 1994.
Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 5, 1996.

* * *

It is doubtful whether many historians would regard a Soviet filmmaker of the 1920s as having delivered an opening salvo in what would be known as now termed the "cold war." Yet Lev Kuleshov's The Extraordinary Adventures of Mr. West in the Land of the Bolsheviks so completely foreshadows the attitudes inherent in more modern East-West tensions that it has lost little of its satiric bite today more than 70 years after its original release. At the same time, it has grown in stature to become one of the pivotal films in the early development of cinema.

Conceived initially as a demonstration of the theory of montage developed by Kuleshov's experimental film group, the "Kuleshov Workshop," which operated outside the formal curriculum of the Soviet State Film School, it advanced the art of the film on a number of fronts. Not the least of these was its employment of a number of brilliant young directors including Vsevolod Pudovkin who with Sergei Eisenstein would develop variations on the theory of montage that would produce most of the outstanding Soviet films of the 1920s. For three years preceding the production of The Extraordinary Adventures, the group, because of a scarcity of film stock, conducted filmless exercises in editing and reconstructing imported films such as D. W. Griffith's Intolerance in an effort to analyze the precise manner in which a film produces meaning.

The Extraordinary Adventures, however, provided the first lengthy, practical opportunity to put the workshop's theories into practice. Interestingly, one of the group's overriding concerns was to demonstrate that a different type of actor was needed for the screen than for the stage—still a major issue in the Soviet Union which had been relatively cut off from the films of Griffith and other innovators. Since, in Kuleshov's view, film creates meaning through a number of interacting images of which the actor constitutes only one, the acting technique must support the visual images that are intercut with it—an idea unheard of on the stage. His characters themselves, however, shared one characteristic obviously borrowed from the theater, that of personification. Mr. West, the most obvious example of this trait, is a typical American holding views representative of most of his countrymen. But his views or, more precisely, fears become personified in the symbolic characters that his entourage encounters in the Soviet Union and, though the actors deftly underplay their roles, the satiric undertones come through. For the most part the staging of West's misadventures is inspired by American Westerns and action comedies of the late teens—although probably not by the films of Charlie Chaplin or Buster Keaton, as some have suggested; few such films were exported to the Soviets during and immediately after the revolution.

The Extraordinary Adventures of Mr. West in the Land of the Bolsheviks proved that Kuleshov's theories were viable. Although he had somewhat miscalculated the degree of sophistication needed by his actors to fully carry out his goals, it was a good start. Further, it gave an emerging generation of directors the impetus that would eventually result in the great classics of theoretical montage, Storm over Asia (1928) and October (1927).

—Stephen L. Hanson

NESTO IZMEDJU

(Something in Between)

Former Yugoslavia, 1982

Director: Srdjan Karanovic

Production: Yugoslavia Centar Film, Belgrade; running time: 107 minutes. Filmed in New York, Dubrovnik, Belgrade, and Istanbul, 1982.

Executive producer: Milan Zmukic; screenplay: Srdjan Karanovic, Milosav Marinovic, and Andrew Horton; photography: Zivko Zalar; editor: Branko Ceperac; art director: Miljen Kljakovic; music: Zoran Simjanovic.

Cast: Caris Corfman (Eva); Predrag Miki-Manojlovic (Janko); Dragan Nikolic (Marko); Zorka Doknic-Manojlivic (Mother); Renata Ulmanski (Aunt); Gorica Popvic (Dunja); Sonja Savic (Tvigica); Peter Ilic-Hajne (Son); Nina Kirsanova (Grandmother).

Awards: Golden Arenas, Festival of Yugoslavian Film.

Publications

Articles:

Chion, M., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June-July 1983.

Coselli, L., in Positif (Paris), July-August 1983.

Chicoine, J. -F., in Séquences (Montreal), October 1983.

Chevrie, M., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1984.

Pratley, G., "No Censorship in Yugoslavia," in Cinema India International, vol. 5, no. 4, 1988.

* * *

Srdjan Karanovic was part of a new wave of then-Yugoslav directors who trained at Prague's famous FAMU Academy, and who in their films, combined frivolous, seemingly superficial entertainment with a consideration of the current state of politics and society. According to co-screenwriter Andrew Horton, "The Prague Group shares a concern for the ways which a degree of social realism can be juxtaposed to an expanded reality reflective of individual freedom and the free play of the imagination; none of them preaches a political dogma. The film tends to be critical of all forces that work against individual fulfillment and happiness within a social context."

For his first film, Drustven Igra (Party Games), produced in 1972, Karanovic advertised for his cast in a newspaper, asking people to write why they would like to appear in the film, and what they would like to do. A script was constructed around the twenty "actors" chosen from the 4000 applications—what resulted was a playful combination of spontaneity and absurdity. Miris Poljskog Cveca (The Fragrance of Wild Flowers), his second film, continues the theme of "film as play." A middle-aged actor, fed up with marriage, gives up everything to live on a barge on the Danube, just as he is about to open in Oscar Wilde's An Ideal Husband. His action becomes a media event, and soon the small village where he comes to rest by the Danube is transformed into a Felliniesque circus as people gather, inspired by the actor, to live out their fantasies. The film won the FIPRESCI award at Cannes in 1978.

In Nesto Izmedju, Eva (Caris Corfman), a journalist from New York, splits up with her boyfriend and decides to go to Turkey. She has a stopover in Belgrade, and looks up an old surgeon-friend, Janko (Predrag Miki-Manojlovic). Arriving at his mother's house she finds that he is not at home, and she is taken care of by his playboy-businessman best friend, Marko (Dragan Nikolic), a charming good-for-nothing whose English comprises mostly film titles. Eva and Marko fly to Dubrovnik for lunch (there was a time when this would not have been unusual in Yugoslavia). They meet up with Janko, who is attending a medical conference there, and Eva and Janko embark on a serious love affair.

Nesto Izmedju is a bittersweet picture typical of Karanovic. It is set in former Yugoslavia which at the time of filming was literally "something in between"—neither East nor West, Catholic nor Muslim nor Orthodox, Balkan nor Austro-Hungarian. In the same way echoing this the characters are in limbo. Eva was on her way to Turkey and gets waylaid in former Yugoslavia; Marko wants to get to the U.S. and starts a business and is bidding his time in the country; and Janko is a famous surgeon who wants a serious relationship with Eva but holds back from making a commitment.

This is Karanovic's fourth feature film. He wrote the first draft in Belgrade in 1980, and rewrote it extensively while on a Fulbright lecture visit to Harvard University in spring 1981. Shooting began in July 1982 in New York, Dubrovnik, Belgrade, and Istanbul. At the Festival of Yugoslavian Film, in Pula, it won the five top awards (Golden Arenas), as well as the jury prize in Valencia, the special jury prize in Bastia, and was screened in the "Un Certain Regard" section at Cannes, Montreal, and Cairo.

—Mike Downey

THE NEW BABYLON

See NOVYI VAVILON

NEW EARTH

See NIEUWE GRONDEN

DIE NIBELUNGEN

Germany, 1924

Director: Fritz Lang

PART 1: SIEGFRIED

PART 2: KRIEMHILDS RACHE

Production: Decla-Bioscop-Ufa Studios (Decla-Bioscop and Ufa merged during production); black and white, 35mm; silent; Part I:

Siegfried; length: 3216 meters originally; released 14 February 1924; Part II: Kriemhilds Rache (Kriemhild's Revenge); length: 3576 meters; released 26 April 1924. Both parts were combined in a shortened version of 2743 meters, with music from Wagner's Der Ring des Nibelungen as arranged by Hugo Reisenfeld, released in 1925. Part I released in 1933 in a 688-meter version under the title Siegfrieds Tod. Parts 1 and 2 filmed simultaneously between 1922–1924 in Decla-Bioscop-Ufa Studios in Berlin.

Screenplay: Thea von Harbou and Fritz Lang, from the opera Das Nibelungenlied by Richard Wagner and from Norse sagas; photography: Carl Hoffman and Günther Rittau, with Walter Ruttman ("Dream of the Falcon" sequence); art directors: Otto Hunte, Erich Kettelhut, and Karl Vollbrecht; music: Gottfried Huppertz; costume designers: Paul Gerd Guderian (who died during production) and Anne Willkomm; armor and weapons: Heinrich Umlauff.

Cast: Paul Richter (Siegfried); Margarethe Schön (Kriemhild); Theodor Loos (King Gunther); Hanna Ralph (Brunhild); Georg John (Mime, the Smith, and Alberich); Gertrud Arnold (Queen Ute); Hans Carl Müller (Geremot); Erwin Biswanger (Giselher); Bernhard Goetske (Volker von Alzey); Hans Adalbert Schlettow (Hagen Tronje); Rudolf Rittner (Markgraf Rüdiger von Bechlarn); Hardy von Francois (Dankwart); Fritz Alberti (Dietrich von Bern); Georg August Koch (Hildebrand); Rudolph Klein-Rogge (King Etzel); Hubert Heinrich (Werbil); Grete Berger (Hun); Frida Richard (Lecturer); Georg Jurovski (Priest); Iris Roberts (Page); Rose Lichtenstein.

Publications

Books:

- Von Harbou, Thea, Das Nibelungenbuch, Berlin, 1923.
 Rotha, Paul, The Film Till Now, London, 1930.
 Weinberg, Herman, An Index to the Creative Work of Fritz Lang, London, 1946.
 Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1947.
 Courtade, Francis, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.
 Moullet, Luc, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1963.
 Eibel, Alfred, editor, Fritz Lang, Paris, 1964.
 Pensen, Paul, The Cinema of Fritz Lang, New York, 1969.
 Johnston, Claire, Fritz Lang, London, 1969.
 Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, Berkeley, 1969.
 Grafe, Frieda, Enno Patalas, and Hans Helmut Prinzler, Fritz Lang, Munich, 1976.
 Eisner, Lotte, Fritz Lang, London, 1977.
 Armour, Robert A., Fritz Lang, Boston, 1978.
 Ott, Frederick, The Films of Fritz Lang, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1979.
 Jenkins, Stephen, editor, Fritz Lang: The Image and the Look, London, 1981.
 Kaplan, E. Ann, Fritz Lang: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1981.
 Maibohm, Ludwig, Fritz Lang: Seine Filme—Sein Leben, Munich, 1981.
 Dürrenmatt, Dieter, Fritz Lang: Leben und Werk, Basel, 1982.
 Wirwalski, Andreas, Wie macht man einen Regenbogen?: Fritz Langs Nibelungenfilm: Fragen zur Bildhaftigkeit des Films und seiner Rezeption, Frankfurt, 1994.

Die Nibelungen: Siegfried

Bogdanovich, Peter, Who the Devil Made It: Conversations with Robert Aldrich, George Cukor, Allan Dwan, Howard Hawks, Alfred Hitchcock, Chuck Jones, Fritz Lang, Joseph H. Lewis, Sidney Lumet, Leo McCarey, Otto Preminger, Don Siegel, Josef von Sternberg, Frank Tashlin, Edgar G. Ulmer, Raoul Walsh, New York, 1997.

Levin, David J., Richard Wagner, Fritz Lang, and the Nibelungen: The Dramaturgy of Disavowal, Princeton, 1998.

McGilligan, Patrick, Fritz Lang: The Nature of the Beast, New York, 1998.

Gunning, Tom, The Films of Fritz Lang: Modernity, Crime, and Desire, London, 2000.

Minden, Michael, and Holger Bachmann, editors, Fritz Lang's 'Metropolis': Cinematic Views of Technology and Fear, Rochester, 2000.

Articles:

Berliner Tageblatt, 15 February 1924.

Ybarra, T. R., in New York Times, 29 April 1924.

Berliner Tageblatt, 2 May 1924.

Hardt, Romey, in Kritiker (Berlin), May-June 1924.

Barry, Iris, in Spectator (London), 14 June 1924.

Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 24 August 1925.

“How Siegfried Was Produced,” in New York Times, 6 September 1925.

Krutch, Joseph Wood, in Nation (New York), 16 September 1925.

Fraenkel, Heinrich, “The Story of Fritz Lang, Maker of Siegfried,” in Motion Picture Classic (New York), March 1926.

New York Times, 16 October 1928.

New Republic (New York), 13 August 1930.

Eisner, Lotte, “Notes sur le style de Fritz Lang,” in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), 1 February 1947.

Wilson, Harry, “The Genius of Fritz Lang,” in Film Quarterly (London), Summer 1947.

Gesek, Ludwig, “Fritz Lang: Suggestion und Stimmung,” in Gestalter der Filmkunst, Von Asta Nielsen bis Walt Disney, Vienna, 1948.

Manvell, Roger, “Siegfried 1922–1924,” in Sight and Sound (London), April 1950.

Granich, Tom, “Fritz Lang,” in Ferrania (Milan), August 1950.

Autera, Leonardo, “Il parabola di Fritz Lang,” in Cinema (Rome), 15 January 1954.

- Truffaut, François, "La Cinquième victime," in Arts (Paris), 22–24 August 1956.
- Luft, Herbert G., "Erich Pommer," in Films in Review (New York), November 1959.
- Berg, Gretchen, "La Nuit viennoise: Une Confession de Fritz Lang," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), August 1965 and June 1966.
- Rhode, Eric, "Fritz Lang (The German Period 1919–1933)," in Tower of Babel, London, 1966.
- Oudart, Jean Pierre, "La Sature," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April and May 1969.
- Barsacq, Léon, "Toward a Film Aesthetic: Sweden and Germany 1917–1922," in Le Décor de film, Paris, 1970.
- "Selbstdarstellung: Fritz Lang," in Frankfurter Rundschau, 15 May 1971.
- Phillips, Gene D., "Fritz Lang: An Interview," in Focus on Film (London), Spring 1975.
- Phillips, Gene D., "Fritz Lang Gives His Last Interview," in Village Voice (New York), 16 August 1976.
- Jouvert, P., "Les Images de Kriemhild," in Cinématographe (Paris), January 1977.
- Stiles, V. M., "The Siegfried Legend and the Silent Screens: Fritz Lang's Interpretation of a Hero Saga," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1980.
- Lorenzen, Dagmar, and Ulrike Weinitschke, in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Summer 1985.
- Kramer, S. P., "Fritz Lang's Definitive Siegfried and Its Versions," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), October 1985.
- Hake, S., "Architectural Hi/Stories: Fritz Lang and The Nibelungen," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), no. 3, 1990.
- Esser, M., "Rooms of Felicity," in Filmbulletin (Winterthur, Switzerland), no. 5, 1990.
- Hauer, Stanley R., "The Sources of Fritz Lang's Die Nibelungen," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 18, no. 2, 1990; "Additions and Corrections," in vol. 18, no. 4, 1990.
- DeBartolo, J., "Video Tape Reviews," in Classic Images (Muscatine), no. 235, January 1995.

* * *

The filming of a national epic was a large undertaking even for Fritz Lang. Die Nibelungen emerged as a masterpiece of design based on a script by the talented Thea von Harbou, Lang's wife. It was an architectural concept from beginning to end (Lang himself had been an architect), and it was a triumph of studio craftsmanship at which the Germans excelled. The castles, the forests, the brooks and caverns were all studio-made.

The story fell naturally into two parts: the love of Siegfried and Kriemhild ending in his death and the vengeance of Kriemhild wreaking destruction on her husband's murderers; to this end she gives herself to the barbarian Attila and uses her power to destroy her brothers and the sinister Hagen Tronje. The essential drama of the film lies in the contrast between the stately formal beauty of the first part and the desolate and arid lovelessness of part two. The formal patterns, magnificent though they are, exclude dynamic development, and the progress of the film is slow and static. The Soviet critic Vladimir Nilsson faults the film on these grounds. In Part 2, however, the revenge of Kriemhild hastens the pace until the final holocaust.

The version of the saga used by Lang is very different from that used by Wagner. It is concerned less with Gods and more with human beings. In their symmetrical patterned costumes Lang's people are still human; the world of magic which he evokes does not diminish them. Without any tricks of editing or visual fireworks, Lang approaches his subject with sober observation. It is nevertheless a magic world. The tall stately trees of the forest, the flower-laden banks of streams, the great steps of the cathedral, the drawbridges high in the air, the armour of the knights are all part of a world designed by Lang and his architect, Kettelhut. Scene after scene is memorably beautiful: the fight with the dragon; the flaming fortress of Brunhilde; the great cathedral of Worms.

The acting is strong and firm with a finely contrasted performance by Margarethe Schön as Kriemhild, the gentle lover who becomes the half-demented fury. In the final catastrophe, as the crazed widow of Siegfried sways in front of the blazing hostel, one thinks of the fanatical woman outside the burning jail in Lang's first American film, Fury. The theme of the dual nature of woman is a recurring one with Lang to which he returns in Metropolis in which Maria and the Robot represent the forces of love and destructiveness.

It is interesting to compare this early film with John Boorman's Excalibur (1981), because they have so many elements in common. But the tautness of Lang's structure gains over the looser and more diffused film by Boorman. Die Nibelungen is a film without off-spring, a beautiful pageant by a master, to be admired and enjoyed for its own sake.

—Liam O'Leary

NIEUWE GRONDEN

(New Earth)

Netherlands, 1934

Director: Joris Ivens

Production: Capi, Amsterdam/Information Bureau, Royal Netherlands Government; black and white, 16mm; running time: 28 minutes; length: 2,050 feet. Released Amsterdam 1934.

Producer: Joris Ivens; screenplay: Joris Ivens; photography: Joris Ivens, John Fernhout, Joop Huisken, Helen van Dongen; editor: Helen van Dongen; music: Hanns Eisler.

Cast: Joris Ivens (Narrator).

Publications

Books:

Eisler, Hanns, and Theodore Adorno, Composing for the Films, New York, 1947.

Van Dongen, Helen, and others, Joris Ivens, edited by Wolfgang Klau, Berlin, 1963.

Zalzman, Abraham, Joris Ivens, Paris, 1963.

Wegner, Hans, Joris Ivens: Dokumentarist den Wahrheit, Berlin, 1965.

Grelier, Robert, Joris Ivens, Paris, 1965.

Nieuwe Gronden

- Ivens, Joris, The Camera and I, New York, 1969.
 Kremeier, Klaus, Joris Ivens: Ein Filmer an den Fronten der Weltrevolution, Berlin, 1976.
 Delmar, Rosalind, Joris Ivens: 50 Years of Filmmaking, London, 1979.
 Devarrieux, Claire, Entretiens avec Joris Ivens, Paris, 1979.
 Passek, Jean-Loup, editor, Joris Ivens: 50 ans de cinema, Paris, 1979.
 Ivens, Joris, and Robert Destanque, Joris Ivens; ou, La Memoire d'un regard, Paris, 1982.
 Brunel, Claude, Joris Ivens, Paris, 1983.
 Waugh, Thomas, editor, "Show us Life": Towards a History and Aesthetic of the Committed Documentary, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1984.
 Bakker, Kees, Joris Ivens and the Documentary Context, Amsterdam, 1999.
 Schoots, Hans, Joris Ivens: Living Dangerously, Amsterdam, 2000.

Articles:

- New Republic* (New York), 15 April 1936.
National Board of Review, May 1936.
Today's Cinema (London), 14 June 1944.

- Monthly Film Bulletin* (London), May 1945.
Variety (New York), 3 March 1947.
Cinema Nuovo (Turin), 15 February 1953.
 "Ivens Issue" of Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 3, 1960.
 Ferguson, Otis, in The Collected Film Criticism of Otis Ferguson, Philadelphia, 1971.
 Hogenkamp, B., "Joris Ivens and the Problems of the Documentary Film," in Framework (Norwich), Autumn 1979.
 "Ivens Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 January 1981.

* * *

In 1930 the Dutch Building Trades Union commissioned Joris Ivens to record Holland's reclamation from the North Sea of a half-million acres of the Zuyder Zee, her "inland sea," for agriculture. The project involved 12,000 men working on a two-shift basis for ten years, and caught the international imagination, as a wonder of world engineering, although the unions had a special interest in labor's contribution. Ivens's camera-team (John Fernhout, also known as Ferno, Joop Huisken, Helen van Dongen, Eli Lotar, and Ivens himself) filmed the work over three years, alongside other industrial documentaries (some are often misdescribed as spin-offs from this project; no doubt Ivens re-used material as convenient). Scarcely was a film called Zuyder Zee assembled (45 minutes, 1933, silent) than the Depression hit Dutch agriculture, and the wheat grown in the laboriously reclaimed land was burned or fed to pigs. The outrageous irony provoked Ivens to shorten the existing material, overlay music by a “leftist” composer, and add an epilogue, combining new material, newsreel footage, a few “staged” shots, an accusatory voice-over, and a sarcastic song à la Brecht, to denounce the global capitalist system. The new version was banned in most countries, and most Anglophone viewers will know only a “shorn” version derived from it, using Eisler’s music but omitting the epilogue; it’s reputedly a wartime edit, devised to elicit admiration for our Dutch allies.

The Zuyder Zee sections make pictorially striking, dynamically edited, documentary narrative; they go from the initial dredging-up of sea-bed boulder-clay, and its redeposition as a sea-wall, to the closure of the last gap, through which the North Sea’s violent currents flow only more fiercely as men and machines narrow it. What risked being either a dry record of constructional procedures, or a mere symphony of forms rhapsodising over man’s battle against nature (or some such generality), discovers instead what can for shorthand be called the poetics of material structuration. The seabed becomes a barrier against the sea, hydraulic jets set sand flowing like water against water, the screen becomes a flux of forces involving salt water, fresh water, basalt slabs, steel claws, clay sticky or dripping, vast “mattresses” of woven willow, the mechanical and the manual, the hard tight shapes of machines and the formless but indefatigable sea. The spectator not only grasps this dialectic intellectually, thanks to that elementary but uncommon virtue, clear exposition, he also feels it, as it were in his muscles, thanks to Ivens’s remarkable kinaesthetic sense. In My Camera and I Ivens describes how he selected the camera-angles for the stone-lifting sequence by closely analysing, and then repeatedly performing, the job himself; on discovering that the greatest strain came at the shoulder-muscles and on the chin, he used these “organic” work-points as visual motifs—which “happened to be the most beautiful angle” (exactly as the era’s materialist-functional aesthetic, which surely influenced Ivens, would predict). Otis Ferguson brilliantly analyses the cutting’s precise response to detail, to the exact interactions of operators, controls, and machines.

Ivens structured the closure of the last, 32-km., gap (at 1302 hrs on 28/5/32) as a “dramatic dialogue.” “One of our cameras was the land-camera and the cameraman identified himself with the land’s fight against the sea. . . . Another camera was the sea-camera, it said: ‘My current is strong, I will be here after you have given up and gone away. . . .’ The third camera identified with man and machines sharing human effort.” Though individual shots may seem as impersonal and alienating as Dziga Vertov-type “enthusiasm,” the structure generates an “organic pathos” according to Eisenstein, while the muscularity of man and machine evokes Flaherty and the ditch-digging of Vidor’s Our Daily Bread. It’s a remarkable synthesis. The first protrusion of man’s submarine mountains from these angry waters is strangely poignant, providing a rare provocation to celebrate industry as something itself primeval, yet nobly creative. Eisler’s music is brilliant: the expression in sound of hard energy, gutsy yet pure; thanks to its prominence, one might almost say that the film honours industry as a “symphonic” activity, as an expression of organising intelligence, just as “high” as music is.

Entirely different in style, the final section makes an extremely effective tract, but is no more the last word on “capitalism” than the Depression was. Though such a reading would surely distress Ivens, who became increasingly uncritical of any Communist regime, it’s arguable that the usual, shorn version of the film is complete in itself, and constitutes a Social-Democratic counterpart to Leninist montage epics like Turksib. A Cahiers du Cinéma critic suggested that the shots of children happily playing would then have suggested “our nation’s future,” and reminded contemporary spectators that the Dutch government organised the project without incurring one loan to burden its children with debt.

—Raymond Durnat

THE NIGHT

See LA NOTTE

NIGHT AND FOG

See NUIT ET BROUILLARD

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA

USA, 1935

Director: Sam Wood

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Picture Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 96 minutes. Released 1935. Filmed in MGM studios.

Producer: Irving Thalberg; screenplay: George S. Kaufman and Morrie Ryskind, uncredited assistance by Bert Kalmar and Harry Ruby, with gagwriter Al Boasberg, from a screen story by James Kevin McGuiness; photography: Merritt B. Gerstad; editor: William Levanway; sound recording director: Douglas Shearer; art director: Cedric Gibbons; music score: Herbert Stothart; costume designer: Dolly Tree; dances: Chester Hale.

Cast: Groucho Marx (Otis B. Driftwood); Chico Marx (Fiorello); Harpo Marx (Tomasso); Kitty Carlisle (Rosa Castaldi); Allan Jones (Ricardo Baroni); Walter Woolf King (Rudolfo Lassparri); Sig Rumann (Herman Gottlieb); Margaret Dumont (Mrs. Claypool); Edward Keane (Captain); Robert Emmett O’Connor (Detective Henderson); Gino Corrado (Steward); Purnell Pratt (Mayor); Frank Yaconelli (Engineer); Billy Gilbert (Engineer’s assistant/peasant); Sam Marx (Extra on ship and at dock); Claude Peyton (Police captain); Rita and Rubin (Dancers); Luther Hoobyar (Ruiz); Rodolfo Hoyos (Count di Luna); Olga Dane (Azucena, Gypsy woman); James J. Wolf (Ferrando); Ines Palange (Maid); Jonathan Hale (Stage manager); Otto Fries (Elevator man); William Gould (Captain of police); Leo White, Jay Eaton, and Rolfe Sedan (Aviators); Wilbur

A Night at the Opera

Mackand George Irving (Committee); George Guhl (Policeman); Harry Tyler (Sign painter); Phillip Smalley and Selmer Jackson (Committee); Alan Bridge (Immigration inspector); Harry Allen (Doorman); Lorraine Bridges (Louisa).

Publications

Script:

Kaufman, George S., and Morrie Ryskind, A Night at the Opera, New York, 1972.

Books:

Treadwell, Bill, 50 Years of American Comedy, New York, 1951.
 Crichton, Kyle, The Marx Brothers, New York, 1951.
 Marx, Arthur, Groucho, New York, 1954.
 Cahn, William, The Laugh Makers, New York, 1957.
 Eyles, Allen, The Marx Brothers: Their World of Comedy, New York, 1966.

Zimmerman, Paul D., and Burt Goldblatt, The Marx Brothers and the Movies, New York, 1968.

Thomas, Bob, Thalberg: Life and Legend, New York, 1969.

Anobile, Richard, editor, Why a Duck? Visual and Verbal Gems from the Marx Brothers Movies, New York, 1971.

Boyum, Joy Gould, and Adrienne Scott, Film as Film: Critical Responses to Film Art, Boston, 1971.

Joseph Adamson, Groucho, Harpo, Chico, and Sometimes Zeppo: A History of the Marx Brothers and a Satire on the Rest of the World, New York, 1973.

Mast, Gerald, The Comic Mind: Comedy and the Movies, New York, 1973; revised edition, Chicago, 1979.

Marx, Samuel, Mayer and Thalberg, London, 1976.

Chandler, Charlotte, Hello, I Must Be Going: Groucho and His Friends, New York, 1978.

Arce, Hector, Groucho, New York, 1979.

Gehring, Wes D., The Marx Brothers: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1987.

Marx, Groucho, The Marx Brothers Scrapbook, New York, 1989.

Bergan, Ronald, Marx Brothers, Edison, 1992.

Eyles, Allen, The Complete Films of the Marx Brothers, Secaucus, 1992.

Stables, Kate, Marx Brothers, New York, 1992.
 Mitchell, Glenn, The Marx Brothers Encyclopedia, North
 Pomfret, 1996.

Articles:

Sennwald, Andre, in New York Times, 7 December 1935.
Variety (New York), 11 December 1935.
New Yorker, 14 December 1935.
 "Sam Wood," in Current Biography Yearbook, New York, 1944.
 Rowland, Richard, in Hollywood Quarterly, April 1947.
 Eyles, Allen, in Films and Filming (London), February 1965.
 Kael, Pauline, in Kiss Kiss Bang Bang, Boston, 1968.
 Denton, Clive, "Sam Wood," in The Hollywood Professionals 2,
 New York, 1974.
 Prouty, Howard H., in Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood
 Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Vega, J., in Contracampo (Madrid), October 1981.
 Urban, M., in Filmkultura (Budapest), May 1985.
 Hemming, Roy, "LV Classics: Singin' in the Rain/A Night at the Opera," in Video Review (New York), vol. 9, no. 11, February 1989.
 Arnold, Gordon B., "From Big Screen to Small Screen: A Night at the Opera Directed by Sam Wood and Starring the Marx Brothers," in Library Journal (New York), vol. 114, no. 9, 15 May 1989.
 Catsos, G. J. M., "Allan Jones Remembers: Night and Day with the Marx Bros.," in Filmfax (Evanston, Illinois), February-March 1991.
 "A Night at the Opera," in Premiere (New York), vol. 10, November 1996.

* * *

A Night at the Opera is the sixth Marx Brothers movie and their first with MGM Studios. Duck Soup (1933) had been a critical and commercial failure, and marked the end of the Marx Brothers' contract with Paramount. Zeppo Marx had left the team, and for a time it appeared that the brothers' movie career was at an end. However, producer Irving Thalberg became interested in them, and an MGM contract was negotiated. It was Thalberg's contention that the audience for Marx Brothers movies could be broadened by bringing the story line, characterizations, musical numbers, and production values up to the high standard already set by their comedy sequences; that is, by putting the Marx Brothers into a musical comedy, rather than surrounding a collection of their vaudeville-style routines with a sketch intended only to glue them together. The Marx Brothers, who had attempted something similar on Broadway without finding an appropriate property, agreed with him, and an excellent working relationship was established.

The script of A Night at the Opera provides sympathetic, integrated characters for all of the Marx Brothers, and the operatic and shipboard settings make an appropriate contrast to the team's anarchic comedy style and offer opportunities for good roles for regular Marx Brothers supporting players Margaret Dumont and Sig Rumann. Final credit for the screenplay went to George S. Kaufman and Morrie Ryskind, but the concept was apparently also treated earlier by Bert Kalmar and Harry Ruby, and received significant additions from gagwriter Al Boasberg. Zeppo was replaced as romantic lead by Allan Jones, a convincing actor and excellent singer who, with ingenue Kitty Carlisle, managed to supply both a believable love story and strong musical numbers.

Thalberg also suggested trying out the comedy numbers on the road for audiences, a system that the team continued to use in later productions. The Marx Brothers, with part of the rest of the cast, took a tabloid version of the show on a short tour of four western cities, accompanied by writers Ryskind and Boasberg (Kaufman, who disliked Hollywood, had returned to New York). Audience reactions were monitored and scenes rewritten for maximum effect. Filming included not only the perfected routines, but also reaction time for laughs, which had been timed by stop-watch during live performances. It appears that the completed film owes little to director Sam Wood; the concept was Thalberg's, and the execution was chiefly by the writers and the Marx Brothers themselves.

The resulting film was the Marx Brothers' most successful with both critics and the public. It contains some of the team's best comedy routines, including the famous stateroom scene; the contract scene, in which Groucho and Chico edit a legal document by simply tearing off the offending clauses; and a spectacular finale in which the three Marx Brothers demolish a full-scale production of Il Trovatore. However, it also has straight musical numbers which became hit songs outside the film; logical places in the plot for Harpo's and Chico's musical specialties; and an overall polish and integrity which had not been present in their earlier movies. Its success prompted the team to apply the same formula to most of their subsequent films, but only A Day at the Races comes close to matching its quality. Thalberg died during the making of A Day at the Races, and no other producer was willing to invest the same resources in a Marx Brothers comedy.

Recent critical opinion allows A Night at the Opera to retain status as one of the best, if not absolutely the best, of the Marx Brothers films. Duck Soup, despite its early failure, has become a favorite of those Marx Brothers audiences who feel that any interruption of comedy sequences is a waste of time, and of those who profess to see it as a powerful statement against war. However, A Night at the Opera is generally considered to equal Duck Soup in the perfection of its comedy routines and dialogue, and certainly to surpass it in the quality of the film as a whole.

—Annette Fern

THE NIGHT OF THE HUNTER

USA, 1955

Director: Charles Laughton

Production: United Artists; black and white, 35mm; running time: 93 minutes. Released 1955.

Producer: Paul Gregory; screenplay: James Agee, rewritten by Charles Laughton, from the novel by Davis Grubb; photography: Stanley Cortez; editor: Robert Golden; art director: Hilyard Brown; set decorator: Al Spencer; music: Walter Schumann; special effects: Jack Rabin and Louis De Witt.

Cast: Robert Mitchum ("Preacher" Harry Powell); Shelley Winters (Willa Harper); Lillian Gish (Rachel); Billy Chapin (John); Sally Jane Bruce (Pearl); Peter Graves (Ben Harper); Evelyn Varden (Icey Spoon); Don Beddoe (Walt Spoon); James Gleason (Uncle Birdie); Gloria Castillo (Ruby).

The Night of the Hunter

Publications

Script:

Agee, James, Night of the Hunter, in Agee on Film 2, New York, 1960.

Books:

Brown, William, Charles Laughton: A Pictorial Treasury of His Films, New York, 1970.

Burrows, Michael, Charles Laughton and Frederic March, Cornwall, 1970.

Tomkies, Mike, The Robert Mitchum Story, Chicago, 1972.

Higham, Charles, Charles Laughton: An Intimate Biography, New York, 1976.

Matthews, J. H., Surrealism and American Feature Films, Boston, 1979.

Lanchester, Elsa, Elsa Lanchester Herself, New York, 1983.

Malcolm, Derek, Robert Mitchum, Tunbridge Wells, Kent, 1984.

Downing, David, Robert Mitchum, London, 1985.

Callow, Simon, Charles Laughton: A Difficult Actor, London, 1987, 1989, 1997.

Roberts, Jerry, Robert Mitchum: A Bio-Bibliography, Westport, 1992.

Marill, Alvin H., The Films of Robert Mitchum, Secaucus, New Jersey, 2000.

Articles:

Hart, Henry, in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1955.

Archer, Eugene, in Film Culture (New York), Winter 1955.

Lambert, Gavin, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1955–56.

Benayoun, Robert, "Freud au pays de l'ogre," in Demain (Paris), 1956.

Truffaut, François, in Arts (Paris), 23 May 1956.

Labarthe, André S., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1956.

Tozzi, Romano, "Lillian Gish," in Films in Review (New York), December 1962.

Vermilye, Jerry, "Charles Laughton," in Films in Review (New York), May 1963.

Johnson, Ian, and Raymond Durnat, editors, "Puritans Anonymous," in Motion (London), Autumn 1963.

- Ringgold, Gene, "Robert Mitchum," in Films in Review (New York), May 1964.
- Kael, Pauline, in Kiss Kiss Bang Bang, Boston, 1968.
- Wood, Robin, "Night of the Hunter: Novel into Film," in On Film, London, 1970.
- Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), February 1975.
- "La Nuit du chasseur Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 February 1978.
- Hammon, P., "Melmouth in Norman Rockwell Land: The Night of the Hunter," in Sight and Sound (London), no. 2, 1979.
- Lucas, Blake, in Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Ferrario, D., in Cineforum (Bergamo), January-February 1982.
- Le Pavec, J. P., in Cinéma (Paris), February 1982.
- Tobin, Yann, in Positif (Paris), May 1982.
- Turner, G. E., "Creating The Night of the Hunter," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), December 1982.
- Listener* (London), 6 March 1986.
- Ravage, Jack, "Reviews: The Night of the Hunter," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 42, no. 1, Fall 1988.
- Trojan, Judith, "Front Row Center: Lillian Gish: The Actor's Life for Me directed by Terry Sanders/The Night of the Hunter written by James Agee and directed by Charles Laughton with Lillian Gish and Robert Mitchum," in Wilson Library (Bronx), vol. 63, no. 6, February 1989.
- Rainer, Peter, "The Best Movies on Video You've Never Seen: The Night of the Hunter Directed by Charles Laughton," in Connoisseur (New York), vol. 221, no. 951, April 1991.
- Secchi, C., "Fiaba e sogno in The Night of the Hunter di Charles Laughton," in Cinema & Cinema (Bologna), May-August 1991.
- Hoberman, J., "Down by the River," in Village Voice (New York), vol. 37, 28 July 1992.
- Berthome, J.-P., "Deux voix dans la nuit," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1993.
- Svehla, G.J., "Robert Mitchum's Cinema of Evil: Cape Fear and Night of the Hunter," in Midnight Marquee (Baltimore), vol. 46, Winter 1994.
- Moorhouse, Jocelyn, "Enduring: Night of the Hunter Directed by Charles Laughton," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 5, no. 4, April 1995.
- Duras, Marguerite, "La nuit du chasseur," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 501, April 1996.
- Gross, Larry, "Baby, I Don't Care," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 7, no. 9, September 1997.
- Gee, Maggie, "Songs of the Sweet Enchanter," in TLS: The Times Literary Supplement (London), no. 5009, 2 April 1999.
- Romney, Jonathan, "Long Shadows," in New Statesman (London), vol. 12, no. 549, 2 April 1999.
- Thomson, David, "A Child's Demon," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 9, no. 4, April 1999.

* * *

Published in 1953, Davis Grubb's Depression-era novel about a serial killer preacher in relentless pursuit of two orphans in order to get a cache of stolen loot in their possession shot to the top of the bestseller list and stayed there for months.

The book was brought to the attention of Charles Laughton by the actor's business associate, producer Paul Gregory. Though still in demand as an actor on the stage, Laughton's movie career had hit the skids; he wanted to make the transition to movie director. Gregory thought the book ideal for Laughton's debut effort. James Agee was hired to adapt the book, but his draft proved too unwieldy and unfilmable and Laughton proceeded to adapt the book himself, though he took no screen credit for his work.

To prepare for the film, which he wanted to exude an atmosphere of early rural Americana, Laughton screened a collection of silent films by the undisputed master of such atmosphere, D. W. Griffith—then, in a further nod to the master, cast Griffith's greatest leading lady, Lillian Gish, in an important role. Robert Mitchum was Laughton's first and only choice to play the killer preacher, Harry Powell, whose warring inner demons are symbolized by the words "love" and "hate" tattooed on his knuckles.

The released film was a pictorially striking but decidedly unusual combination of picaresque adventure, fairy tale, and psychological thriller that eluded the grasp of most critics, who voted "thumbs down." A box-office failure, it marked not just Laughton's screen directorial debut, but swan song as well. Over the years, however, The Night of the Hunter has come to be viewed as a masterpiece—filmed in a kaleidoscope of styles, ranging from expressionism to film noir to avante-garde, that is breathtakingly cinematic yet boldly theatrical, employing a marvelously intricate and evocative soundtrack and extraordinary music score. Very few first-time film directors have displayed such a natural gift for the medium as Laughton did with The Night of the Hunter; it's a shame he never had the opportunity to direct another movie.

The performances Laughton drew from his cast are remarkable. But the standout performance is Robert Mitchum's; the actor's frequently listless performances in other films often disguise what a fine actor he can be given a guiding hand like Laughton's. His performance as Powell is one of the screen's most chilling portraits of perversity and genuine evil. He is astonishingly persuasive as he gently coaxes orphan Pearl to tell where the money is hidden, then flies into a rage scarily calling her a "poor, silly, disgusting little wretch" when she obeys her brother's instructions to keep silent. And his frustrated cry of sheer animal rage when the skiff carrying the fleeing children slips from his grasp as he wades into the water after them sends a cold breeze from hell up the viewer's spine to this day.

So expertly made and definitive is Laughton's memorable screen version of Grubb's novel that it would seem foolhardy for anyone to attempt to remake and improve upon it. But director David Greene tried to do so in a 1991 version made for television, starring a miscast Richard Chamberlain in the Mitchum role. Astonishingly, the remake dispensed with the final third of Grubb's novel wherein Powell is brought to justice by the orphans' savior, a Mother Courage figure named Rachel—a denouement Laughton had brought potently to life with Lillian Gish in the part.

Only Diana Scarwid's touching performance as the doomed Willa (played differently but with equal vulnerability by Shelley Winters in the original), the mother of the two children who is killed by Powell rendering them orphans, saved the remake from being worthy of total dismissal—unlike Charles Laughton’s version, which remains unforgettable in every way.

—John McCarty

NIGHT ON BALD MOUNTAIN

See UNE NUIT SUR LE MONT CHAUVE

1900 (NINETEEN HUNDRED)

See 1900 (NOVECENTO)

NINGEN NO JOKEN

(The Human Condition)

Japan, 1959–61

Director: Masaki Kobayashi

Production: Ningen Productions for Shochiku Co.; black and white, 35mm; Shochiku Grandscope; released in three parts: Part I: Ningen no joken (The Human Condition); running time: 208 minutes; length: 5501 meters; released 1959; Part II: Zoko ningen no joken (Road to Eternity); running time: 181 minutes; length: 4938 meters; released 1959; Part III: Ningen no joken III (A Soldier’s Prayer); running time: 190 minutes; length: 5197 meters; released 1959. All three parts re-released in 1969.

Producers: Shigeru Wakatsuki (Parts I and III), Tatsuo Hasoya (Part II), Masaki Kobayashi (Part III); screenplay: Masaki Kobayashi and Zenzo Matsuyama, with Koichi Inagaki (Part III only), from the six-volume Ningen no joken by Jumpei Gomikawa; photography: Yoshio Miyajima; editor: Keiichi Uraoka; sound recordist: Hideo Nishizaki; art director: Kazue Hirataka; music: Chuji Kinoshita.

Cast: Tatsuya Nakadai (Kaji); Michiyo Aratama (Michiko); So Yamamura (Okishima); Eitaro Ozawa (Okasaki); Akira Ishihama (Chen); Shinji Manbara (Kao); Ineko Arima (Yang Chun Lan); Chikage Awashima (Jin Tung Fu); Keiji Sada (Kageyama); Toru Abe (Watai); Masao Mishima (Kuroki); Koji Mitsui (Furya); Kyu Sazanka (Cho Meisan); Seiji Miyaguchi (Wang Heng Li); Nobuo Nakamura

(Chief of Head Office); Michio Minami (Yoshida); Hideo Kisho (Kudo); Kei Sato (Shinjo); Taketoshi Naito (Tange); Kunie Tanaka (Obara); Kokinjo Katsura (Sasa); Kaneko Iwasaki (Nurse); Keijiro Morozumi (Corporal Hironaka); Yusuke Kawazu (Private Terada); Kyoko Kishida (Ryuko); Reiko Hitomi (Umeko); Fijio Suga (Captain Nagata); Nobuo Kaneko (Corporal Kirahara); Tamao Nakamura (Femle Refugee); Hideko Takamine (Woman in Settlers’ village); Chishu Ryu (Village elder).

Publications

Books:

Mellen, Joan, Voices from the Japanese Cinema, New York, 1975.
Bock, Audie, Japanese Film Directors, New York, 1978; revised edition, Tokyo, 1985.
Blouin, Claude R., Le Chemin détourné: Essai sur Kobayashi et le cinéma japonais, Quebec, 1982.

Articles:

Richie, Donald, “The Youngest Talents,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1960.
Dyer, Peter John, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1961.
Iwabuchi, M., “Japanese Cinema 1961” and “Kobayashi’s Trilogy,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.
Blouin, Claude R., “Kobayashi, à l’uquam: Anarchiste ou utopiste?,” in Cinéma Québec (Montreal), February–March 1974.
Tucker, Richard, “Masaki Kobayashi,” in International Film Guide, London, 1975.
Niogret, H., in Positif (Paris), October 1984.
Tessier, M., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), October 1984.
Télérama (Paris), no. 2284, 20 October 1993.
Niogret, H., “Entretien avec Masaki Kobayashi,” in Positif (Paris), December 1993.
Gauthier, Guy, in Mensuel du Cinéma, no. 12, December 1993.

* * *

“It’s not my fault that I’m Japanese—yet my worst fault is that I am.” The words are those of Kaji, protagonist of Kobayashi’s Ningen no joken; but they can also be taken, in the fierce agony of their moral paradox, as speaking for the director himself. Ningen no joken, nearly ten hours long, four years in the making, undertaken in the teeth of opposition from Kobayashi’s studio, Shochiku, and of virulent hostility from conservative forces in Japanese society, can be seen as the most massive act of personal atonement in the history of cinema.

The film is shot through—some would say distorted—with the intensity of Kobayashi’s identification with his hero, whose experiences so closely paralleled his own. (“Film” rather than “films,” since though released, and often shown, in three separate parts, the work forms an aesthetic and conceptual unity.) Like Kaji, Kobayashi had been conscripted wholly against his will, had opposed the rigidly authoritarian ethos of the Imperial Army, and had been held after the war in a prisoner-of-war camp. “I am Kaji. . . . The life the hero leads is much the same life I lived as a soldier.” In Jumpei Gomikawa’s six-volume novel, to which Kobayashi immediately bought the film rights, the filmmaker found the ideal vehicle for his perennial theme: the struggle of the individual against a harsh and oppressive society.

Ningen no joken

Kaji, in effect, becomes the conscience of wartime Japan, a lone voice raised in protest against a system whose sole principles are blind obedience to authority and brutality to everyone else. Yet, for all his antipathy, he finds himself repeatedly implicated in the system he loathes, simply by virtue of being Japanese. Attempting to improve the appalling conditions of Chinese slave labourers in the prison camp to which he’s posted, he ends up mistrusted by both sides—by the Chinese as a member of the oppressor race, and by his compatriots as an “enemy sympathiser.” Transferred, by way of punishment, to the army, he tries vainly to protect younger recruits from the officially sanctioned sadism of the veterans. Their prime victim, the sensitive and delicate Obara, is driven to a wretched suicide, while Kaji—whose stubbornness, ironically, proves him potential “officer material”—survives through his initiative on the battlefield. “I am a murderer,” he reflects amid the mud and corpses, “but I must go on living.”

The film’s bitterest irony comes in the third part. Captured by the Russians, Kaji, the idealistic socialist, expects to be treated with justice and humanity. But Russia is dominated by a system as tyrannical as that of Japan—a huge portrait of Stalin glowers down on the interrogation room—and, labelled a “fascist samurai,” Kaji finds himself enslaved and degraded like the Chinese whom he once supervised. Managing to escape, he tries to trek back to his beloved wife; but the Chinese peasantry, seeing in him only the hated and despised enemy, refuse him food, and he dies in the snow.

As Kaji, Tatsuya Nakadai—Kobayashi’s favourite actor, in the role which brought him to fame—dominates the action with a performance of burning conviction, off-screen for no more than a few minutes of the film’s epic duration. Repeatedly, Kobayashi emphasises his moral exposure, and the hopelessness of his stance, by isolating him in a bleak, sterile terrain—the ravaged mining landscape of the first part, the battlefield of the second, the final pitiless snowscape—that exploits Yoshio Miyajima’s black-and-white scope cinematography to stunning effect. Yet the film includes moments of intimacy, even tenderness—as in the scene where Kaji, allowed a brief visit from his wife and sensing they may never meet again, asks her to stand naked by the dawn-lit window, to leave him with the memory of her beauty.

Ultimately, perhaps, the film suffers from its sheer size, from its relentlessly sombre mood. Content, impelled by the uncompromising seriousness of Kobayashi’s vision, has burst the bounds of form; eased of the burden of his memories, the director would proceed to a finer alignment of the two in Seppuku (Harakiri) or Joiuchi (Rebellion). But Ningen no joken remains an achievement of extraordinary power and emotional resonance: at once a celebration of the resilience of the individual conscience, and a purging of that forced complicity in guilt (not just of a nation but, as the title implies, of the whole human race) which Kaji expiates through his death, and Kobayashi through the making of this film.

—Philip Kemp

NINOTCHKA

USA, 1939

Director: Ernst Lubitsch

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Corp.; black and white, 35mm; running time: 110 minutes. Released 3 November 1939. Re-released 1947. Filmed 19 May 1939–16 July 1939 in MGM studios.

Producer: Ernst Lubitsch; screenplay: Charles Brackett, Billy Wilder, and Walter Reisch, from the story by Melchior Lengyel; photography: William Daniels; editor: Gene Ruggiero; sound recording director: Douglas Shearer; production designer: Edwin Willis; art director: Cedric Gibbons; music score: Werner R. Heymann; costume designer: Adrian.

Cast: Greta Garbo (Ninotchka); Melvyn Douglas (Count Léon d'Algout); Ina Claire (Grand Duchess Swana); Sig Rumann (Iranoff); Felix Bressart (Buljanoff); Alexander Granach (Kopalski); Bela Lugosi (Commissar Razinin); Gregory Gayle (Count Rakonin); Rolfe Sedan (Hotel Manager); Edwin Maxwell (Mercier); Richard Carle (Gaston).

Publications

Script:

Brackett, Charles, Billy Wilder, and Walter Reisch, Ninotchka, New York, 1966; edited by Richard Anobile, New York, 1975.

Books:

Bainbridge, John, Garbo, New York, 1955.

De Acosta, Mercedes, Here Lies the Heart, New York, 1960.

Conway, Michael, The Films of Greta Garbo, New York, 1963.

Verdone, Mario, Ernst Lubitsch, Lyons, 1964.

Weinberg, Herman, The Lubitsch Touch: A Critical Study, New York, 1968, 1983.

Viertel, Salka, The Kindness of Strangers, New York, 1969.

Zierold, Norman, Garbo, New York, 1969.

Kanin, Garson, Hollywood, New York, 1974.

Corliss, Richard, Talking Pictures: Screenwriters in the American Cinema 1927–1973, Woodstock, New York, 1974.

Corliss, Richard, Greta Garbo, New York, 1974.

Whittemore, Don, and Philip Alan Cecchetti, editors, Passport to Hollywood: Film Immigrants Anthology, New York, 1976.

Poague, Leland, The Cinema of Ernst Lubitsch: The Hollywood Films, London, 1977.

Zolotow, Maurice, Billy Wilder in Hollywood, New York, 1977.

Affron, Charles, Star Acting: Gish, Garbo, Davis, New York, 1977.

Sands, Frederick, and Sven Broman, The Divine Garbo, New York, 1979.

Walker, Alexander, Greta Garbo: A Portrait, New York, 1980.

Linton, George, Greta Garbo, Paris, 1981.

Paul, William, Ernst Lubitsch's American Comedy, New York, 1983, 1987.

Prinzler, Hans Helmut, and Enno Patalas, editors, Lubitsch, Munich, 1984.

Ernst Lubitsch, Paris, 1985.

Bourget, Eithne and Jean-Loup, Lubitsch; ou, La Satire romanesque, Paris, 1987.

Nacache, Jacqueline, Lubitsch, Paris, 1987.

Bowman, Barbara, Master Space: Film Images of Capra, Lubitsch, Sternberg, and Wyler, Westport, 1992.

Hake, Sabine, Passions and Deceptions: The Early Films of Ernst Lubitsch, Princeton, 1992.

Eyman, Scott, Ernst Lubitsch: Laughter in Paradise, New York, 1993.

Harvey, James, Romantic Comedy: In Hollywood, from Lubitsch to Sturges, Cambridge, 1998.

Articles:

New York Times, 16 April and 10 and 19 November 1939.

Variety (New York), 11 October 1939.

Garbo, Greta, and Ernst Lubitsch, in New York Times, 22 October 1939.

Newsweek (New York), 30 October 1939.

Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1939–40.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), 31 January 1940.

New Yorker, 29 June and 10 August 1940.

Variety (New York), 29 October and 5 and 26 November 1947.

Lengyel, Melchior (interview), in New York Times, 4 January 1948.

Pozzi, Gianni, “Parere su Lubitsch,” in Critica Cinematografica (Parma), May 1948.

Weinberg, Herman, “A Tribute to Ernst Lubitsch,” in Films in Review (New York), August–September 1951.

Paoletta, Roberto, “Ernst Lubitsch, regista del tempo perduto,” in Bianco e Nero (Rome), January 1958.

“Lubitsch Issue” of Film Journal (Melbourne), June 1959.

Cutts, John, in Films and Filming (London), March 1962.

Whiteball, Richard, “Garbo—How Good Was She?,” in Films and Filming (London), September 1963.

Ninotchka

- “Lubitsch Issue” of Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1968.
- Sarris, Andrew, “Lubitsch in the 30s,” in Film Comment (New York), Winter 1971–72.
- Mast, Gerald, “The ‘Lubitsch Touch’ and the Lubitsch Brain,” in The Comic Mind: Comedy and the Movies, Indianapolis, 1973.
- Trueba, F., in Casablanca (Madrid), May 1983.
- Amiel, V., “Paroles de Billy Wilder, ‘touch’ de Ernst Lubitsch,” in Positif (Paris), September 1983.
- Mindich, J., “Re-reading Ninotchka: A Misread Commentary on Social and Economic Systems,” in Film & History (Coral Gables, Florida), no. 1, 1990.
- Gensler, Howard, “Détente: Ninotchka Directed by Ernst Lubitsch and Starring Melvyn Douglas and Greta Garbo,” in Premiere (New York), vol. 3, no. 10, June 1990.
- Rosterman, R., in Hollywood: Then and Now, vol. 25, no. 7, 1992.
- Beller, J.L., “The Radical Imagination in American Film,” in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), vol. 1, no. 4, Winter 1994.
- “Ninotchka,” in Premiere (New York), vol. 12, no. 3, November 1998.

* * *

The advertising campaign for Ninotchka is proof of a publicist’s faith in the collective amnesia of the American public. “Garbo Laughs” was treated as momentously as was “Garbo Talks,” the slogan that announced her first sound film, Anna Christie. The marketing of Ninotchka takes no account of Greta Garbo’s frequent laughter, her smile and the lightness of her touch throughout her 1930s films. Just three years before, in Camille, playfulness and humor inflect her doomed “lady of the camellias.” Ninotchka is, however, her first comedy. Its principal comic ploy is a paradoxical reflection on Garbo as actress. Here she is made to play, through the first part of the film, a woman who apparently has no emotions. Audiences must read this as they would a scene that suggests that Fred Astaire is clumsy or that John Wayne is a coward. Ninotchka extracts much of its humor from the deadpan expression of an actress whose presence is a sign of deep emotional resonance.

The story of the rigid, businesslike commissar who awakens to luxury and love in Paris is coherent with director Ernst Lubitsch’s stylistics. His major films demonstrate the connections between an elegance of decor, elegance of manner, and elegance of the heart. The film’s narrative pretext is the sale of jewels; Ninotchka falls in love with an absurd hat just as she falls in love with Léon. Much humor is drawn from the contrast between a lush Parisian hotel and the austere Moscow room Ninotchka shares with a cello player and a streetcar conductor.

As is usually the case in the films of Lubitsch, the comedy reflects back upon the characters. The director uses the comedy of manners to authenticate and dramatize the feelings of the protagonists, and in this, he is at odds with the hard-edged, satirical bent that is characteristic of the writers of Ninotchka, Charles Brackett, Billy Wilder and Walter Reisch, a mode that becomes particularly apparent when Wilder turns to directing their scripts. The appeal of Ninotchka is in the mix of talents, from Garbo's emotional complexity, to Lubitsch's wry sentiment, to the writer's acerbic wit. The range of the performances includes the broadness of the three bumbling commissars and the drawing-room bitchery of the Grand Duchess Swana (to which Ina Claire brings her distinctively brittle sophistication). Melvyn Douglas provides the pratfall that inspires Garbo's celebrated laugh, and the warm charm that inspires her love.

Very successful at its release, it seemed to promise a new direction in Garbo's faltering career. Her next and final film, Two Faced Woman, also co-starring Melvyn Douglas, proved that considerable comic talents also require a comic script. But Ninotchka was reborn, first as a Cole Porter's Broadway musical, Silk Stockings, with film stars Hildegard Knef and Don Ameche, and then as a musical film with Cyd Charisse and Fred Astaire.

—Charles Affron

LA NOIRE DE . . .

Senegal-France, 1966

Director: Ousmane Sembene

Production: Les films Domirev (Dakar) and Les Actualités Françaises (Paris); black and white, 35mm; running time: 70 minutes. Released March 1966, France; English version released 1969, New York.

Producer: André Zwobada; screenplay: Ousmane Sembene, from a short story by Sembene first published in Voltaïque (1961); photography: Christian Lacoste; editor: André Gaudier; assistant director: Ibrahima Barro; second assistant: Pathé Diop.

Cast: Thérèse N'Bissine Diop (Diouana); Robert Fontaine (The patron); Momar Nar Sene (Friend); Anne-Marie Jelinek (The patroness); Ibrahima Boy (Boy with mask); Philippe, Sophie, and Damien (Infants); plus the voices of Toto Bissainthe, Robert Marcy, and Sohie Leclerc; Bernard Delbaro; Nicole Donati; Raymond Lemery; Suzanne Lemery.

Awards: Prix Jean Vigo, Paris, 1966; Festival mondial des Arts nègres, Antilope d'argent, 1966; Journées cinématographiques de Carthage, Tanit d'Or, 1966.

Publications

Books:

- Vieyre, Paulin Soumanou, Ousmane Sembene, cinéaste: Première période 1962–1971, Paris, 1972.
- Vieyre, Paulin Soumanou, Le Cinéma africain des origines à 1973, Paris, 1975.
- Martin, Angela, editor, African Films: The Context of Production, London, 1982.
- Moore, Carrie Dailey, Evolution of an African Artist: Social Realism in the Works of Ousmane Sembene, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1984.
- Pfaff, Françoise, The Cinema of Ousmane Sembene, Westport, Connecticut, 1984.
- Armes, Roy, Third World Filmmaking and the West, Berkeley, 1987.
- Peters, Jonathan A., Ousmane Sembene: Contemporary Griot, Boulder, 1987.
- Gadjigo, Samba, and Ralph Faulkingham, and Thomas Cassirer, and Reinhard Sander, editors, Ousmane Sembene: Dialogues with Critics and Writers, Amherst, 1993.
- Petty, Sheila, A Call to Action: The Films of Ousmane Sembene, Westport, 1996.

Articles:

- Morgenthau, H., "On Films and Filmmakers," in Africa Report, May-June 1969.
- Mortimer, Robert, "Engaged Film-Making for a New Society," in Africa Report, November 1970.
- Paquet, A., and G. Borremans, "Ousmane Sembene: Les 'Franc-tireurs' senegalais," in Cinéma Québec (Montreal), March-April 1973.
- Perry, G. M., interview with Ousmane Sembene, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1973.
- Weaver, H. D., Jr., interview with Ousmane Sembene, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 6, no. 1, 1973.
- Cheriaa, T., "Ousmane Sembene, Carthage, et le cinéma africain" and "Problématique du cinéaste africain: L'Artiste et la révolution," in Cinéma Québec (Montreal), August 1974.
- Ghali, N., "Ousmane Sembene," in Cinématographe (Paris), April 1976.
- Bonnet, J.-C., interview with Ousmane Sembene, in Cinématographe (Paris), June 1977.
- Grelier, R., interview with Ousmane Sembene, in Image et Son (Paris), November 1977.
- "Ousmane Sembene," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 1 June 1979.
- Bosseno, C., interview with Ousmane Sembene, in Image et Son (Paris), September 1979.
- Landy, M., and others, "Ousmane Sembene's Films," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), July 1982.
- Film Library Quarterly* (New York), vol. 16, no. 4, 1983.
- Atkinson, M., "Ousmane Sembene," in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1993.
- "Sembene, Ousmane," in Current Biography (Bronx), vol. 55, no. 4, April 1994.
- Niang, Sada, "Interview with Ousmane Sembene," in Research in African Literatures (Austin), vol. 26, no. 3, Fall 1995.

* * *

La noire de . . ., by the Senegalese filmmaker Ousmane Sembene, is the first feature-length film to come out of sub-Saharan Africa. Technically flawed, it is nevertheless a cultural and cinematographic achievement, and it marks an important date in the history of African cinema. Based on a short story of the same title, written by Sembene and published in Voltaire (1961), La noire de . . . tells the story of a young African woman who goes to France to work for the French couple who have employed her in Dakar. Filled with joy at the prospect of the trip, she soon becomes disillusioned, and finally, feeling imprisoned and isolated from the support of her own community, kills herself.

The film is remarkable in several ways. The force of this tragic tale, itself based on a real-life incident, is developed with considerable skill, especially for a filmmaker with only two short subjects to his credit at the time. The visual impact is great—an accomplishment that is especially noteworthy when one considers that Sembene first told the story in another form, then adapted it into a film that stands completely on its own merits. Sembene's ability at adaptation distinguishes this work from unsuccessful film adaptations in general and marks his progress from the making of his second film Niaye, in which the original literary text is still respected to the detriment of the visual presentation. One major difference between La noire de . . . and the original short story is in the powerful emphasis placed on an African mask, raising it to the level of a symbol. We see the mask first in its African context, then see it given joyfully by Diouana, the African maid and central character, to the European couple after she begins to work for them. It appears again in Antibes, hung on a very white wall in the couple's apartment. When Diouana breaks into open revolt at her dismal situation, she reclaims it, and we see the two women—one white, one black—fighting over the mask. The mask is returned by the Frenchman to Diouana's family, along with her other belongings, after her death. The film closes with a wonderfully dramatic sequence in which the dead woman's younger brother, wearing the mask, pursues the Frenchman out of the African residential area, as the music in the background rises in pace and intensity.

The conditions of the making of this film are unusual, if not unique, and speak directly to Sembene's vision of cinema as both art and politics: the African actors, including the woman who plays Diouana, were all non-professionals. The film sequences—despite the extensive use of flashbacks—had to be shot in strictly chronological order because of the lack of experience and sophistication with regard to the medium, and this circumstance engendered further problems with lighting in the film. In addition, the sound was dubbed in France. Despite all of these difficulties, the film succeeds admirably in conveying, through the life of one otherwise unremarkable African woman, the brutal realities of neo-colonialism on the African continent.

Sembene's conception of his role as African artist is central to an understanding of his work. Known first as a writer of novels and short stories, he was moved to study cinema at the age of 38 by the realization that, for several reasons, his French-language writings were reaching only a minute segment of his African compatriots. Film allows him to reach many more people, and he sees it as the best way to educate the masses: he claims that he can reach more people with cinema than are likely to attend all the political rallies, all the Christian and Muslim religious gatherings. The fact that La noire de . . . is in French shows that the metamorphosis was incomplete at this point in his career. Le mandat (Mandabi), his next film, would be in Wolof, a language spoken by some 90% of his fellow Senegalese.

—Curtis Schade

NORTH BY NORTHWEST

USA, 1959

Director: Alfred Hitchcock

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures Corp.; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 136 minutes; length: 12,256 feet. Released 1959. Filmed in New York City, Long Island, Chicago, and at the Mount Rushmore National Memorial, South Dakota.

Producer: Alfred Hitchcock; screenplay: Ernest Lehman; titles: Saul Bass; photography: Robert Burks; editor: George Tomasini; sound recording supervisor: Franklin Milton; production designer: Robert Boyle; set decorations: Henry Grace and Frank McKelvey; art directors: William A. Horning and Merrill Pye; music: Bernard Herrmann; special effects: A. Arnold Gillespie and Lee LeBlanc.

Cast: Cary Grant (Roger Thornhill); Eva Marie Saint (Eve Kendall); James Mason (Phillip Vandamm); Jessie Royce Landis (Clara Thornhill); Leo G. Carroll (Professor); Philip Ober (Lester Townsend); Josephine Hutchinson (Handsome woman); Martin Landau (Leonard); Adam Williams (Valerian); Edward Platt (Victor Larrabee); Robert Ellenstein (Licht); Les Tremayne (Auctioneer); Philip Coolidge (Dr. Cross); Edward Binns (Captain Junkett); Pat McVey, Ken Lynch (Chicago policemen); John Berardino (Sgt. Emile Klinger); Nora Marlowe (Housekeeper, Anna); Doreen Lang (Maggie); Alexander Lockwood (Judge Anson B. Flynn); Stanley Adams (Lt. Harding); Larry Dobkin (Cartoonist); Madge Kennedy (Housewife); Tommy Farrell (Elevator starter); Maudie Prickett (Maid, Elsie); Ned Glass (Ticket agent); Alfred Hitchcock (Man who misses bus); Harvey Stephens (Stockbroker); Walter Coy (Reporter); Harry Seymour (Captain of waiters); Frank Wilcox (Weltner); Robert Shayne (Larry Wade); Carleton Young (Fanning Nelson); Paul Genge (Lt. Hagerman); Robert B. Williams (Patrolman Waggoner); James McCallion (Valet); Baynes Barton (Taxi driver); Doris Singh (Indian girl); Sally Fraser (Girl attendant); Susan Whitney (Girl attendant); Maura McGiveney (Girl attendant).

Publications

Script:

Lehman, Ernest, North by Northwest, New York, 1972.

Books:

Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1962.

Manz, Hans-Peter, Alfred Hitchcock, Zurich, 1962.

Wood, Robin, Hitchcock's Films, London, 1965.

Perry, George, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1965.

North by Northwest

- Truffaut, François, Le Cinéma selon Hitchcock, Paris, 1966; as Hitchcock, New York, 1985.
- Douchet, Jean, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1967.
- Simsolo, Noël, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1969.
- LaValley, Albert J., editor, Focus on Hitchcock, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.
- Durnat, Raymond, The Strange Case of Alfred Hitchcock, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1974.
- Hirschhorn, Clive, The Films of James Mason, London, 1975.
- Taylor, John Russell, Hitch, London and New York, 1978.
- Hemmeter, Thomas M., Hitchcock the Stylist, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.
- Narboni, Jean, editor, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.
- Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.
- Rothman, William, Hitchcock: The Murderous Gaze, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1982.
- Villien, Bruno, Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.
- Weis, Elisabeth, The Silent Scream: Alfred Hitchcock's Sound Track, Rutherford, New Jersey, 1982.
- Wollen, Peter, Readings and Writings: Semiotic Counter-Strategies, London, 1982.
- Spoto, Donald, The Life of Alfred Hitchcock: The Dark Side of Genius, New York, 1982; London, 1983.
- Britton, Andrew, Cary Grant: Comedy and Male Desire, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1983.
- Schickel, Richard, Cary Grant: A Celebration, London, 1983.
- Wansell, Geoffrey, Cary Grant: Haunted Hero, London, 1983.
- Dupuis, Jean-Jacques, Cary Grant, Paris, 1984.
- Phillips, Gene D., Alfred Hitchcock, Boston, 1984.
- Barbier, Philippe, and Jacques Moreau, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.
- Douchet, Jean, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.
- Bruce, Graham, Bernard Herrmann: Film Music and Narrative, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1985.
- Wilson, George M., Narration in Light: Studies in Cinematic Point of View, Baltimore, 1986.
- Deutelbaum, Marshall, and Leland Poague, A Hitchcock Reader, Ames, Iowa, 1986.
- Humphries, Patrick, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, Greenwich, Connecticut, 1986.
- Kloppenborg, Josef, Die dramaturgische Funktion der Musik in Filmen Alfred Hitchcock, Munich, 1986.
- Sinyard, Neil, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1986.
- Modleski, Tania, The Women Who Knew Too Much: Hitchcock and Feminist Theory, New York, 1988.
- Higham, Charles, and Ray Moseley, Cary Grant: The Lonely Heart, New York, 1989.

Naremore, James, editor, North by Northwest: Alfred Hitchcock, Director, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1993.
 Sterritt, David, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1993.
 Arginteanu, Judy, The Movies of Alfred Hitchcock, Minneapolis, 1994.
 Boyd, David, editor, Perspectives on Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1995.
 Condon, Pauline, Complete Hitchcock, London, 1999.
 Harris, Robert A., Complete Films of Alfred Hitchcock, Secaucus, 1999.
 Bellour, Raymond, The Analysis of Film, Bloomington, 2000.
 McGilligan, Patrick, Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 2001.

Articles:

Hitchcock, Alfred, in Arts (Paris), January 1959.
 Houston, Penelope, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer-Autumn 1959.
 Interview with Hitchcock, in Films and Filming (London), July 1959. New York Times, 7 August 1959.
 Fitzpatrick, Ellen, in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1959.
 Baker, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), September 1959.
 Moullet, Luc, in Arts (Paris), October 1959.
 Douchet, Jean, "Le Troisième Clé d'Hitchcock," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1959.
 Richardson, A.W., in Screen Education Yearbook (London), 1963.
 Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), October 1974.
 "Hitchcock Issue" of Take One (Montreal), 21 May 1976.
 Magny, Joel, in Cinéma (Paris), October 1978.
 Lowry, Ed., in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 11 November 1978.
 Sator, M., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1978.
 Bergstrom, Janet, "Enunciation and Sexual Difference," in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Summer 1979.
 Keane, Marian, "The Designs of Authorship," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 4, no. 1, 1980.
 Boost, C., and W. Verstappen, in Skoop (Amsterdam), May-June 1980.
 Giacci, V., in Filmcritica (Florence), January 1981.
 "North by Northwest de Bernard Herrmann," in Séquences (Montreal), April 1981.
 Marinero, N., in Casablanca (Madrid), May 1981.
 Roquena, J. G., "En el unbral de lo in verosimil," in Contracampo (Madrid), September 1981.
 Brill, L., "North by Northwest and Hitchcockian Romance," in Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Spring 1982.
 Bourget, J. L., in Positif (Paris), May 1982.
 Bannon, B. M., "Double, Double, Toil and Trouble," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 13, no. 1, 1985.
 Ven de Ven, L., "Alfred Hitchcock's Film Music," in Soundtrack (Los Angeles), January 1985.
 Dean, Peter, "Video: North by Northwest Directed by Alfred Hitchcock," in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 3, no. 11, November 1993.
 Burlingame, Jon, "Scoring Hitchcock," in Grand Street (New York), vol. 13, no. 1, Summer 1994.
 Petersen, George, "Building Character Through Violence: A One-Two Punch," in Creative Screenwriting (Washington, D.C.), vol. 3, no. 1, Summer 1996.
 Lehman, Ernest, "Back Story," in Fade In (Beverly Hills), vol. 2, no. 3, 1996.

Care, Ross, "Record Rack," in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), no. 21, Winter 1996.
 Worden, J., "Thirty-nine Steps to Immortality," in Armchair Detective, vol. 29, no. 4, 1996.
 Lehman, Ernest, and Joel Engel, "North by Northwest/Writing North by North-West," in Scenario, vol. 3, no. 1, Spring 1997.
 Morris, Christopher D., "The Direction of North by Northwest," in Cinema Journal (Austin), vol. 36, no. 4, Summer 1997.
 Butte, G., "Theatricality and the Comedy of the Mutual Gaze in Hitchcock's Cary Grant Films," in Hitchcock Annual (Gambier), Fall 1997/98.
 Teachout, Terry, "The Genius of Pure Effect," in Civilization (Washington), vol. 5, no. 1, February 1998.

* * *

Screenwriter Ernest Lehman wanted to write the definitive Hitchcock movie. The assignment Hitchcock chose for him, an adaptation of Hammond Innes' novel The Wreck of the Mary Deare, was not it; in Lehman's opinion the novel, about a Marie Celeste-type sea mystery, began with an intriguing premise but concluded with a let-down of a denouement the writer felt was impossible to lick. He turned the master of suspense down; shortly thereafter, Hitchcock abandoned the project for the same reason. (Lehman and Hitchcock were right; the film, eventually made by Michael Anderson, failed to solve the problem.)

Still wanting to write that definitive Hitchcock movie, Lehman hastily launched into a spec script he hoped would capture the director's interest. It was a thriller Lehman initially titled In a Northerly Direction, then Breathless, about an advertising man who is mistaken by spies for a government agent on their trail. Completing it in record time, he submitted the script to Hitchcock, who was delighted with it—and the script, finally retitled North by Northwest, went before the cameras almost immediately.

North by Northwest is not the definitive Hitchcock movie, for while the master's metier is indeed the thriller, his thrillers are not all the same type. Vertigo, his previous film, is as different in style and tone from North by Northwest as Psycho, the film he made after North, is from both of them.

What Lehman did achieve is the definitive Hitchcock chase movie, a delightful homage to and summation of such earlier Hitchcock films in the same vein as Saboteur, Foreign Correspondent, and the granddaddy of them all, The 39 Steps, the prototypical wrong man on the lam who finds romance chase thriller that brought Hitchcock international acclaim and, ultimately, his ticket to Hollywood.

Saboteur and Foreign Correspondent remain noted for their memorable climactic set pieces—a fall from the Statue of Liberty in the former, a subjective eye view of a plane crash in the latter. The 39 Steps sparkled with charm and wit, as well as thrills, while lacking such spectacular set pieces. North by Northwest offers the best of all three. It is a film of spectacular set pieces linked by some of the brightest dialogue in the romantic comedy canon and performances to match.

Two of the film's set pieces are among the most famous in movie history: Grant's pursuit through a cornfield by a plane dusting crops where there aren't any crops; and the hair-raising climax on Mount Rushmore where Grant and Eva Marie Saint are chased across the faces of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln and Roosevelt by thugs Martin Landau and Adam Williams. The crop-dusting chase was shot on location, but the Mount Rushmore sequence was not. The U.S. Department of the Interior denied its cooperation and Hitchcock was forced to shoot the scene in the studio, employing oversized sets, backdrops and photographic plates of the actual monument to remarkable effect. Next to the shower murder in Psycho, it's probably the most acclaimed, and frequently studied, scene in a Hitchcock movie.

North by Northwest marked the fourth and final appearance by Cary Grant, one of Hitchcock's favorite leading men, in a Hitchcock movie—in a role that was written expressly for him and suits his persona of comic urbanity to a T. As complacent ad man turned long-distance runner for his life Roger O. Thornhill ("That's me. Rot."), Grant charms the pants off the audience and co-star Saint, the not-so-ice-cool blonde who may or may not be on his side.

James Mason makes a perfect match for Grant in the suavity department as the bad guy—and is axiomatic of Hitchcock's policy that the better the villain, the better the film. Composer Bernard Herrman's striking, and still influential, fandango score is also a high point—although, amazingly, there's only seventeen minutes of it in the entire 136-minute film!

—John McCarty

NOSFERATU

(Nosferatu, Eine Symphonie des Grauens; Nosferatu, a Symphony of Horror)

Germany, 1922

Director: F. W. Murnau

Production: Prana-Film (Berlin); black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: about 74 minutes. Released 5 March 1922, Germany. Re-released as Die zwölfte Stunde or Eine Nacht des Grauens in 1930 in a sound version, but it was re-released under mysterious circumstances as the original negative had been taken by a Dr. Waldemar Roger some time earlier. Filmed in Jofa studios, Berlin-Johannistal; exteriors shot in the Upper Tatras, Czechoslovakia, near Zakopane, Propad, and Smokovec; also at Wismar, Rostock, and Lübeck.

Scenario: Henrik Galeen, from the novel by Bram Stoker (out of copyright); photography: Fritz Arno Wagner and Gunther Krampf; production designer: Albin Grau; original music: Hans Erdmann; costume designer: Albin Grau.

Cast: Max Schreck (Nosferatu, or Graf Orlok); Alexander Granach (Jonathan Knock, an estate agent); Gustav von Wangenheim (Hutter); Greta Schröder (Nina); G. H. Schnell (Harding, a shipbuilder); Ruth Landshoff (Annie Harding); John Gottowt (Professor); Gustav Botz

Nosferatu

(Town doctor); Max Nemetz (Captain of the "Demeter"); Wolfgang Heinz (1st mate); Albert Venohr (2nd mate); Hersfeld (Innkeeper); Hardy von François (Hospital doctor); Heinrich Witte.

Publications

Script:

Galeen, Henrik, Nosferatu, in Masterworks of the German Cinema, edited by Roger Manvell, London, 1973; also included in Murnau, by Lotte Eisner, Berkeley, 1973.

Books:

Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, 1947.

Huff, Theodore, An Index to the Films of F. W. Murnau, London, 1948, 1976.

Byrne, Richard B., Films of Tyranny, Madison, Wisconsin, 1966.

Anthologie du cinéma 1, Paris, 1966.

Eisner, Lotte, The Haunted Screen, London, 1969.

Eisner, Lotte, Murnau, Berkeley, 1973; revised edition, 1979.

Collier, Jo Leslie, From Wagner to Murnau: The Transposition of Romanticism from Stage to Screen, Ann Arbor, 1988.

Articles:

- Variety* (New York), 25 December 1925.
New York Times, 4 June 1929.
 Blin, Roger, "Murnau—ses film," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), July 1931.
 Mori, Phil, in Bianco e Nero (Rome), April 1951.
 Eisner, Lotte, "L'Enigme des deux Nosferatus," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1958.
 Guillermo, Gilberto Perez, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1967.
 Guillermo, Gilberto Perez, and Robin Wood, in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1971.
 Kerouac, Jack, in Focus on the Horror Film, edited by Roy Huss and T. J. Ross, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.
 Toepflitz, J., in Kino (Warsaw), February 1972.
 Beylie, Claude, in Ecran (Paris), July-August 1973.
 Milne, Tom, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1974.
 "Nosferatu Issue," of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), no. 228, 1979.
 Tulloch, J., "Narrative/Structure/Ideology in Murnau's Nosferatu: Another Start from Propp," in Australian Journal of Screen Theory (Kensington, New South Wales), no. 5–6, 1979.
 Roth, L., "Dracula Meets the 'Zeitgeist': Nosferatu as Film Adaptation," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1979.
 Petat, J., and others, "De Murnau à Herzog: L'Éternel Retour de Nosferatu le vampire," in Cinéma (Paris), March 1979.
 Termine, L., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), October 1979.
 Exertier, S., "La Lettre oubliée de Nosferatu," in Positif (Paris), March 1980.
 Todd, Janet M., "The Classic Vampire," in The English Novel and the Movies, edited by Michael Klein and Gillian Parker, New York, 1981.
 Rognoni, L., in Cinema Novo (Porto), January-February 1981.
 Biró, G., in Filmkultura (Budapest), January-February 1981.
 Ishaghpour, Y., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1981.
 Bouvier, M., and J. L. Leutrat, "Pour mémoire," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1982.
 Cherchi Usai, P., "Nosferatu: Dal film all'orchestra," in Segnocinema (Vicenza), January 1985.
 Elsaesser, Thomas, "Secret Affinities: F. W. Murnau," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1988–89.
 Wolf, R., and others, "De films van F. W., Murnau," in Skrien (Amsterdam), February-March 1990.
 Perez, G., in Raritan (New Brunswick, New Jersey), no. 1, 1993.
 James, C., "Critic's Notebook: Nosferatu, the Father of All Horror Movies," in New York Times, 2 April 1993.
 Holt, Wesley G., in Filmfax (Evanston), no. 38, April-May 1993.
 Dalle-Vacche, Angela, "Murnau's Nosferatu: Romantic Painting as Horror and Desire in Expressionist Cinema," in Post Script (Commerce), vol. 14, no. 3, Summer 1995.
 Dilivio, Lois, "Two Reviews: Music for Silent Films in Contemporary Performance," in Cue Sheet (Hollywood), vol. 11, no. 4, October 1995.
 Lansing Smith, Evans, "Framing the Underworld: Threshold Imagery in Murnau, Cocteau, and Bergman," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 24, no. 3, 1996.
- Larson, Randall D., "James Bernard's Nosferatu," in Soundtrack (Melechen), vol. 15, no. 58, June 1996.
 Rhodes, Gary D., in Filmfax (Evanston), no. 61, June-July 1997.
 Stevens, Brad, "Nosferatu Rises Again," in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 44, 1998.

* * *

Nosferatu was the first film version of Dracula; more than 70 years later, it remains easily the most intelligent adaptation of Bram Stoker's novel (its nearest, not very close, rival being John Badham's 1978 version with Frank Langella).

Given the way in which Stoker's vampire aristocrat has haunted popular culture since the appearance of the novel in 1890, the figure's social/ideological significance can scarcely be exaggerated. Conceived at the height of Victorian sexual repression, the Count Dracula of the novel embodies, to varying degrees of explicitness, all the sexual dreads that our culture has still not exorcised or come to terms with: non-procreative sexuality, promiscuity, bisexuality, the so-called "perversions," incest, even (indirectly, through the preferences of the vampirized Lucy) the sexuality of children. Much of our sexual social history can be traced through the transformations the Count has undergone from Stoker's novel to Badham's movie. With his origins in sexual repression, he transplants very logically and easily into the climate and ethos of German Expressionism.

Between Stoker's novel and Murnau's film came Freud, to whose theories of repression and the unconscious the Expressionist movement, like the Surrealist movement later, was heavily indebted. The essential difference between the two movements lies in their contrasting inflections of Freudian theory: the Surrealists were committed to liberation and the overthrow of repressive bourgeois norms whatever the costs, whereas the Expressionists consistently conceived the repressed forces as evil, their release cataclysmic. The extraordinary power, and continuing fascination, of Murnau's film are rooted in this vision.

The distinction of Nosferatu can be partly suggested by examining the changes Murnau and his scriptwriter Galeen made from novel to film. What novel and film have in common (and no other film version to the same degree except the Badham) is the perception that it is the woman who is the centre of the conflict, that the work is really about her. The uses made of this insight are, however, quite different. In Stoker's novel the battle is fought for the woman; in Murnau's film she becomes the vampire's active antagonist and destroyer. In Stoker the battle is fought between van Helsing and Dracula (conceived, in the terms of Victorian sexual morality, as "good" and "evil"—in Freudian terms they represent superego and id); Murnau reduces van Helsing to an ineffectual old fuddy-duddy who lectures on Venus fly-traps but contributes nothing whatever to the vampire's overthrow. In the novel, the woman (Mina) must be saved from contagion and corruption: the Victorian dread of a released female sexuality is basic to the conception; in the film, the woman (now called Nina) realizes that only she can save civilization from the vampire's contagion, by offering herself to him. Murnau's Nina is a character of quite extraordinary ambivalence: emaciated, as if drained of blood, she suggests both vampire and Christian martyr; the strange abandon with which she gives herself to Dracula (first throwing open a window, then prostrating herself on the bed) suggests the close relationship between religious ecstasy and sensual fulfilment. The ambiguity is set up much earlier in the film, in the protracted and elaborate cross-cutting between Nina (ostensibly awaiting Jonathan's return) and the journeys of Jonathan and Dracula (a sequence that makes nonsense of Bazin's claim that "in neither Nosferatu nor Sunrise does editing play a decisive part"). Jonathan, who travelled by land, is returning by land; the vampire (having taken over a ship) is coming by sea. Nina sits by the shore, gazing out to sea, awaiting her "husband." Her exclamation, as she awakens from sleepwalking ("He is coming! I must go to meet him!") follows a shot, not of Jonathan, but of Dracula's ship.

Jonathan and Dracula also undergo significant alteration from their originals. Stoker's Jonathan is a conventional "noble hero" (although he doesn't actually achieve much of note). Murnau transforms him into the vampire's double, through an intricate series of "mirror" images involving arch-structures: at their first meeting, for example, Jonathan enters the castle under one arch, and this is immediately "answered" by Dracula emerging out of darkness under another. Murnau, following Freud, dramatizes the vampire quite explicitly in terms of repression: he is the repressed under-side of Jonathan, of civilization. As he falls under Dracula's influence, Jonathan is reduced to total impotence: even when he discovers the vampire asleep in his coffin, during the day, he can do nothing but cower back; when Dracula visits his bedchamber at night, to suck his blood, he can do nothing but prostrate himself. At the film's climax, when Nina reveals to him the vampire's presence at the window of the house directly opposite, across the water (another mirror-image), he once again collapses, helpless.

In the novel, Dracula himself is at first quite old, becoming progressively rejuvenated in England by fresh blood; but he is never as grotesque as Max Schreck in Murnau's version and never as romantically attractive as Frank Langella in Badham's—the two films inflect him, significantly, in precisely opposite directions. Murnau's most striking development of the original material is his elaboration of the vampire. In the novel, Dracula disappears quite early from the surface of the narrative (which is told entirely through letters, diaries, etc.) appearing only in brief glimpses; in the film he becomes the dominant figure, a redevelopment especially clear in the long central section of the voyage (for which the novel has no equivalent). Murnau greatly extends Dracula's association with animals, and with a dark, nocturnal underside of nature: he has pointed ears, is visually connected with a jackal, emerges from his castle as out of the blackness of an animal's lair. Above all, the film associates him with rats and plague: wherever he goes, rats swarm, and the precise nature of the spreading pestilence is kept carefully ambiguous.

The re-thinking of Dracula in Badham's film offers a fascinating comparison, an attempt at a "progressive" re-interpretation with a far more positive view of the repressed forces the vampire represents: the heroine becomes a "liberated" woman who freely chooses Dracula as her lover, and it is the father-figure, van Helsing, who is finally impaled on a stake. In fact, what Badham's film proves is the intractability of the material for such a purpose: Dracula becomes a kind of sexual superman, the film develops disturbing Fascist overtones, and many of the complex connotations of the vampire are eliminated. While Murnau's film—heavily determined by its Expressionist background—can depict repressed sexuality and its release only in the most negative terms, it manages to endow it with far greater force and potency, dramatizing the basic Freudian quandary—the necessity for repression, yet the appalling cost of repression—with a much more suggestive complexity.

—Robin Wood

NOT ON YOUR LIFE

See EL VERDUGO

NOTORIOUS

USA, 1946

Director: Alfred Hitchcock

Production: RKO; black and white; running time: 102 minutes; length: 9,136 feet. Released August 1946.

Producer: Alfred Hitchcock; screenplay: Ben Hecht, from a theme by Alfred Hitchcock; assistant director: William Dorfman; photography: Ted Tetzlaff; editor: Theron Warth; sound: John Tribby,

Notorious

Clem Portman; art directors: Albert S. D'Agostino, Carol Clark, Darrell Silvera, Claude Carpenter; special effects: Vernon L. Walker; music: Roy Webb.

Cast: Ingrid Bergman (Alicia Huberman); Cary Grant (Devlin); Claude Rains (Alexander Sebastian); Louis Calhern (Paul Prescott); Leopoldine Konstantin (Mrs. Sebastian); Reinhold Schunzel (Dr. Anderson).

Publications

Books:

Noble, Peter, An Index to the Creative Work of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1949.

Amengual, Barthélemy, and Raymond Borde, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1957.

Rohmer, Eric, and Claude Chabrol, Hitchcock, Paris, 1957.

Bogdanovich, Peter, The Cinema of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1962.

Perry, George, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1965.

Wood, Robin, Hitchcock's Films, London, 1965.

Truffaut, François, The Cinema selon Hitchcock, Paris, 1966; as Hitchcock, New York, 1985.

Quirk, Lawrence J., The Films of Ingrid Bergman, New York, 1970.

LaValley, Albert J., editor, Focus on Hitchcock, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1972.

Brown, Curtis F., Ingrid Bergman, New York, 1973.

Vermilye, Jerry, Cary Grant, New York, 1973.

Durgnat, Raymond, The Strange Case of Alfred Hitchcock; or, The Plain Man's Hitchcock, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1974.

Fetherling, Doug, The Five Lives of Ben Hecht, Toronto, 1977.

Taylor, John Russell, Hitch, London and New York, 1978.

Deschner, Donald, The Films of Cary Grant, Secaucus, New Jersey, 1978.

Hemmeter, Thomas M., Hitchcock the Stylist, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.

Narboni, Jean, editor, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.

Rothman, William, Hitchcock—The Murderous Gaze, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1982.

Villien, Bruno, Hitchcock, Paris, 1982.

Weis, Elisabeth, The Silent Scream: Alfred Hitchcock's Sound Track, Rutherford, New Jersey, 1982.

Spoto, Donald, The Life of Alfred Hitchcock: The Dark Side of Genius, New York, 1981; London, 1983.

Britton, Andrew, Cary Grant: Comedy and Male Desire, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1983.

Schickel, Richard, Cary Grant: A Celebration, London, 1983.

Wansell, Geoffrey, Cary Grant: Haunted Idol, London, 1983, New York, 1984.

Taylor, John Russell, Ingrid Bergman, London and New York, 1983.

Dupuis, Jean-Jacques, Cary Grant, Paris, 1984.

Phillips, Gene D., Alfred Hitchcock, Boston, 1984.

Barbier, Philippe, and Jacques Moreau, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.

Martin, Jeffrey Brown, Ben Hecht, Hollywood Screenwriter, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1985.

Douchet, Jean, Alfred Hitchcock, Paris, 1985.

Deutelbaum, Marshall, and Leland Poague, A Hitchcock Reader, Ames, Iowa, 1986.

Humphries, Patrick, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, Greenwich, Connecticut, 1986.

Kloppenburger, Josef, Die dramaturgische Funktion der Musik in Filmen Alfred Hitchcocks, Munich, 1986.

Sinyard, Neil, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, London, 1986.

Leamer, Laurence, As Time Goes By: The Life of Ingrid Bergman, New York, 1986.

Modleski, Tania, The Women Who Knew Too Much: Hitchcock and Feminist Theory, New York, 1988.

Higham, Charles, and Ray Moseley, Cary Grant: The Lonely Heart, New York, 1989.

Spoto, Donald, Art of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1991.

Kapsis, Robert E., Hitchcock: The Making of a Reputation, Chicago, 1993.

Sterritt, David, The Films of Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1993.

Argenteanu, Judy, The Movies of Alfred Hitchcock, Minneapolis, 1994.

Boyd, David, editor, Perspectives on Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 1995.

Condon, Pauline, Complete Hitchcock, London, 1999.

Harris, Robert A., Complete Films of Alfred Hitchcock, Secaucus, 1999.

Bellour, Raymond, The Analysis of Film, Bloomington, 2000.

McGilligan, Patrick, Alfred Hitchcock, New York, 2001.

Articles:

Sight and Sound (London), no. 59, 1946.

Kine Weekly (London), 6 March 1946.

Motion Picture Herald (New York), 17 July 1946.

Variety (New York), 24 July 1946.

New York Times, 16 August 1946.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1947.

Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1969.

Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 1, no. 1, 1979, and vol. 4, no. 1, 1980.

Bonitzer, P., in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), March 1980.

Paganelli, M., in Filmcritica (Florence), January 1981.

Piccardi, A., "I meccanismi del cinema di Hitchcock," in Cineforum (Bergamo), April 1982.

Clark, Randall, "Ben Hecht," in American Screenwriters, edited by Robert E. Morsberger, Stephen O. Lesser, and Randall Clark, Detroit, 1984.

Arnold, Gordon B., "From Big Screen to Small Screen: Notorious Directed by Alfred Hitchcock and Starring Cary Grant, Ingrid Bergman and Claude Rains," in Library Journal (New York), vol. 114, no. 9, 15 May 1989.

Beebe, John, "The Notorious Postwar Psyche," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington), vol. 18, no. 1, Spring 1990.

McGuinness, M., "The Notorious Alice in Hitchcockland," in Spectator (Los Angeles), vol. 12, no. 2, 1992.

Osteen, M., "The Big Secret: Film Noir and Nuclear Fear," in Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), vol. 22, no. 2, 1994.

Byars, Jackie, and Eileen R. Meehan, "Once in a Lifetime: Constructing 'The Working Woman' Through Cable Narrowcasting," in Camera Obscura (Bloomington), no. 33–34, May–June 1994–1995.

- Howard, T., "Notorious," in Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 16, 1995.
- Suarez, J. and M. Manglis, "Cinema, Gender, and the Topography of Enigmas: A Conversation with Laura Mulvey," in Cinefocus, vol. 3, 1995.
- Kirshner, Jonathan, "Alfred Hitchcock and the Art of Research," in PS, Political Science and Politics (Washington), vol. 29, no. 3, Washington, September 1996.
- Christie, Ian, Leslie Felperin, and Nick Roddick, "Alfred Hitchcock and the British Cinema," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 6, no. 11, November 1996.
- "Classic Scene: Notorious," in Premiere (New York), vol. 11, no. 3, November 1997.
- Butte, G., "Theatricality and the Comedy of the Mutual Gaze in Hitchcock's Cary Grant Films," in Hitchcock Annual (Gambier), Fall 1997/1998.
- Gottlieb, S., "Hitchcock and the Art of the Kiss: A Preliminary Survey," in Hitchcock Annual (Gambier), Fall 1997/1998.
- Leff, Leonard J., "Ingrid in the Lion's Den: Cutting Notorious," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 35, no. 2, March/April 1999.
- Wood, Catherine, "The Influence of Art of the Master of Suspense," in The Lancet (London), vol. 354, no. 9181, 4 September 1999.
- McClain, Buzz, "That Obscure Object of Desire," in Playboy (Chicago), vol. 47, no. 2, February 2000.

* * *

Notorious (1946) is a key film in the Hitchcock canon, one which builds upon thematic elements gradually developed in a series of British (Blackmail, 1929; Sabotage, 1936) and early American (Rebecca, 1940; Suspicion, 1941; Shadow of a Doubt, 1943) pictures. But Notorious significantly extends Hitchcock's fascination with men and women bonded in relationships, real or imagined, of an unholy nature. The film takes his portrayal of obsessive behavior in a direction that anticipates Vertigo (1958), Marnie (1964), and, notably North by Northwest (1959), in which, again using Cary Grant in the male lead, he replays Notorious's chief romantic relationship but reshapes its brooding, uncharacteristically humorless intensity into the format of vibrant comedy.

On its surface, Notorious appears to exploit the period's patriotic fervor by connecting the post-World War II hunt for escaped Nazis to such narrative staples of classic Hollywood cinema as the damsel in distress and the "bad" woman redeemed by the love of a "good" man. In fact, Hitchcock and screenwriter Ben Hecht artfully interweave those plot elements to conceal Notorious's true subject: sexual betrayal which poisons several sets of criss-crossing relationships within the world of the film.

Paramount among those relationships is the one between Alicia Huberman (Ingrid Bergman), the daughter of a man convicted for Nazi war crimes, and T. R. Devlin (Grant), a federal agent who convinces her to atone for her father's sins by spying on a Nazi group based in Rio de Janeiro. Alicia performs her role too well: Alex Sebastian (Claude Rains), the primary target of U.S. surveillance, proposes marriage. In one of the screenplay's dark ironies, Alicia accepts the offer because Devlin fails explicitly to dissuade her from doing so—thereby infuriating the already jealous Devlin by acquiescing to what she thought he wanted her to do in the first place. Though she clearly loves Devlin, as he loves her, she proceeds with her action largely to spite him. ("Love" and the self-serving uses to which that word is put formulate a primary element in the Notorious narratology.)

The romantic relationship between Alicia and Devlin continually undermines 1940s cinema conventions. The couple is kept apart for long stretches of the film, limited to fleeting meetings in which wounded pride prevails on both sides to deny the articulation of true feeling. In Grant's against-type performance, Devlin is cynical and unyielding, a man whose cruel willingness to believe the worst of Alicia inflicts pain almost as lethal as the poison administered to her in the last section of the film. Much of the dialogue between them (within allowable limits of the period's censorship code) is as abusive as any spoken by a romantic couple in the Hitchcock canon. (Alicia: "You can add Sebastian's name to my list of playmates." Devlin: "Pretty fast work." Devlin: "You almost had me believing in that little hokey-pokey miracle of yours—that a woman like you could ever change her spots" Alicia: "I see, some kind of love test." Devlin: "You look all mashed up. Must have been quite an evening.") Moreover, an abrupt ending fails to certify a permanent union, or even that the heroine will reach the hospital alive.

Alex Sebastian is jealous too, with justification. He functions in the narrative as another figure betrayed by the person he adores. (Devlin feels betrayed by Alicia; Alicia feels betrayed by Devlin and by her father; others in the film believe that Alicia has betrayed her Nazi father by refusing to testify on his behalf; Alex's mother feels betrayed by her son's marriage to Alicia: all are variations on the film's central preoccupation.) The presence of Alex's mother, the Nazi dragon who rules his roost and one of those oedipally inclined mother figures in the Hitchcock universe, enables Alex to become a relatively sympathetic figure, an extraordinary risk for a film released in 1946 and a major instance of Hitchcock's development of the complex villain figure. Positively exultant when she learns from him that her suspicions have been confirmed ("Mother . . . I am married to an American agent"), Madame Sebastian assumes the major burden of spectator hostility by reclaiming her authority over her son and directing the attempt on Alicia's life. The film's final shot reasserts Alex's importance to the narrative by forcing the viewer to speculate on the future of this villain manqué, another Hitchcock son who, in Norman Bates's words 14 years later, learns that "a son is a poor substitute for a lover."

Notorious emerges as a major film in the critical debate weighing charges against Hitchcock's alleged misogyny. Like Melanie Daniels at the end of The Birds (1963), Alicia Huberman is rendered virtually catatonic, near death at the film's conclusion; and it is only when she reaches this state that Devlin appears able to treat her with compassion. (See, for an illuminating and balanced reading of this issue, Tania Modleski's The Women Who Knew Too Much: Hitchcock and Feminist Theory, 1988.)

Camera movement and frame composition repeatedly reinforce Notorious's major themes of stealth, mistrust, and betrayal. Notable among many examples of the film's visual virtuosity are distorted point-of-view shots to reflect the effects of Alicia's drinking early in the film and her poisoning toward its conclusion; pans to and closeups of keys, wine bottles, and coffee cups, props which function as instruments of violation in a film that explores the invasion of privacy on numerous levels; the frequency of intense closeups; the device of photographing Devlin with his back to the camera to deny the spectator full access to him; the justifiably famous shot in which the camera glides from a high perch downward to record the presence of a key in Alicia's hand. In a genuinely imaginative way, Notorious links its form tightly with its content.

—Mark W. Estrin

LA NOTTE

(The Night)

Italy-France, 1960

Director: Michelangelo Antonioni

Production: Nepi Film (Rome), Sofitedip (Paris), and Silver Films (Paris); black and white, 35mm; running time: 120 minutes. Released February 1961, Italy. Filmed 1960 in Milan.

Producer: Emanuele Cassuto; screenplay: Michelangelo Antonioni, Ennio Flaiano, and Tonino Guerra; photography: Gianni Di Venanzo; editor: Eraldo Da Roma; sound: Claudio Maielli; art director: Piero Zuffi; music: Giorgio Gaslini and his Quartette.

Cast: Jeanne Moreau (Lidia); Marcello Mastroianni (Giovanni); Monica Vitti (Valentina Gerardini); Bernhard Wicki (Tommaso);

La notte

Rosi Mazzacurati (Resy); Maria Pia Luzi (Nymphomaniac); Vincenzo Corbella (Gerardini); Gitt Magrini (Signora Gerardini); Giorno Negro (Roberto); Guido Aimone Marsan (Fanti); Roberta Speroni (Beatrice); Vittorio Bertolini; Ugo Fortunati; Pompiani.

Award: Berlin Film Festival, Best Film, 1961.

Publications

Script:

Antonioni, Michelangelo, Ennio Flaiano, and Tonino Guerra, La notte, in Screenplays, New York, 1963.

Books:

Cowie, Peter, Antonioni, Bergman, Resnais, New York, 1963.

Leprohon, Pierre, Michelangelo Antonioni: An Introduction, New York, 1963.

Strick, Philip, Antonioni, London, 1965.

Cameron, Ian, and Robin Wood, Antonioni, New York, 1969.

Rifkin, Ned, Antonioni's Visual Language, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1982.

Barthes, Roland, and others, Michelangelo Antonioni, Munich, 1984.

Biarese, Cesare, and Aldo Tassone, I film di Michelangelo Antonioni, Rome, 1985.

Dervin, Daniel, Through a Freudian Lens Deeply: A Psychoanalysis of Cinema, Hillsdale, New Jersey, 1985.

Antonioni, Michelangelo, That Bowling Alley on the Tiber: Tales of a Director, Oxford, 1986.

Perry, Ted, and Rene Prieto, Michelangelo Antonioni: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1986.

Johnson, Charles W., Philosophy in Literature, San Francisco, 1992.

Arrowsmith, William, Antonioni: The Poet of Images, New York, 1995.

Chatman, Seymour B., Antonioni, or, the Surface of the World, Berkeley, 1996.

Brunette, Peter, The Films of Michelangelo Antonioni, New York, 1998.

Tomasulo, Michelangelo Antonioni, Old Tappan, 1998.

Wenders, Wim, My Time with Antonioni, New York, 2000.

Articles:

Fitzpatrick, Ellen, in Films in Review (New York), December 1961.
Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1961–62.

Mekas, Jonas, in Village Voice (New York), 15 February 1962.

“Antonioni Issue” of Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.

Aristarco, Guido, in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.

Young, Vernon, “Of Night, Fire, and Water,” in Hudson Review (New York), Summer 1962.

“Antonioni Issue” of Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1962.

Alpert, Hollis, “Talk with Antonioni,” in Saturday Review (New York), 27 October 1962.

Cinema (Beverly Hills), no. 2, 1963.

Taylor, John Russell, “Antonioni,” in Cinema Eye, Cinema Ear, New York, 1964.

Davis, Melton S., “Most Controversial Director,” in New York Times Magazine, 15 November 1964.

Godard, Jean-Luc, “Night, Eclipse, Dawn,” in Cahiers du Cinema in English (New York), January 1966.

- Gow, Gordon, "Antonioni Men," in Films and Filming (London) June 1970.
- Tudor, Andrew, "Antonioni: The Road to Death Valley," in Cinema (London), August 1970.
- Hernacki, T., "Michelangelo Antonioni and the Imagery of Disintegration," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Autumn 1970.
- Burke, F., "The Natural Enmity of Words and Moving Images: Language, La Notte and the Death of the Light," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 1, 1979.
- Bonnet, J. C., Interview with Jeanne Moreau, in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1982.
- Blanchet, C., in Cinéma (Paris), May 1984.
- Gansera, R., in EPD Film (Frankfurt), April 1986.
- "Antonioni, Michelangelo," in Current Biography, vol. 54, no. 5, May 1993.
- Toamsulo, F. P., "The Architectonics of Alienation: Antonioni's Edifice Complex," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), no. 3, 1993.
- Perez, Gilberto, "A Man Pointing: Antonioni and the Film Image," in Yale Review, vol. 82, no. 3, July 1994.
- Rudman, Mark, "The Night: On Michelangelo Antonioni," in Raritan: A Quarterly Review, vol. 14, no. 2, Fall 1994.
- Moore, Kevin Z., "Eclipsing the Commonplace: The Logic of Alienation in Antonioni's Cinema," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 48, no. 4, Summer 1995.
- "La nuit," in the Special Issue of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), no. 446, November 1995.
- Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, "Antonioni: Before and After," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 5, no. 12, December 1995.
- Chatman, Seymour, "Antonioni in 1980: An Interview," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 51, no. 1, Fall 1997.

* * *

Michelangelo Antonioni's La notte is about an artist's life at the height of Italy's economic miracle; it depicts several hours, including the whole night, in the life of Giovanni Pontano, a novelist, on the day of the publication of his latest book.

The film opens with a visit by Pontano and his wife, Lidia, to the most sympathetic figure of the film, the Marxist editor Tommaso, who is in a hospital dying of cancer. Later, during a long and tedious all-night party at the home of a Milanese industrialist, who wants to buy Pontano's services to promote his business, Lidia learns that Tommaso has died.

The fascination of the film lies in its representation of boredom: a routine book party unenlivened by the actual appearance of Salvatore Quasimodo, then a recent Nobel laureate; Lidia's aimless walk at the outskirts of Milan, while Giovanni tries to nap in his study; an unsatisfying visit to a nightclub; and the endless meanderings and regroupings of the affluent guests at the party.

Within that matrix Pontano's sexual adventures become an index of his moral, and even artistic, collapse. He allows himself to be grabbed and caressed by a nymphomaniac in the hospital until two brutal nurses separate them and beat the woman; he trails the dilettante daughter of the industrialist around her mansion and ultimately fails to seduce her: and, in the film's last moments, on what appears to be the host's private golf course, he starts to make love to his wife, after she reads him an old love letter which he does not recognize as his own.

Antonioni manipulates entrances and exits and ambiguous shifts of scale, in order to shift regularly between his principal characters while maintaining the impression that their independent actions are linked together, almost as if they could see each other in their privacy. This impression is furthered by the well-ordered system of countershots which stress distance between characters even when they are behaving intimately. This is the most emphatic in the increasing lengths at which the camera is placed from the couple at the film's conclusion.

—P. Adams Sitney

1900

(Novecento)

Italy, 1976

Director: Bernardo Bertolucci

Production: TCF, PEA, Artistes Associés, and Artemis Productions; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: originally 320 minutes, US version is 245 minutes, usually shown in two parts. Released Cannes Film Festival, 1976.

Producer: Alberto Grimaldi; screenplay: Bernardo Bertolucci, Franco Arcalli, and Giuseppe Bertolucci; photography: Vittorio Stovaro; editor: Franco Arcalli; art director: Enzo Frigiero; music: Ennio Morricone.

Cast: Robert De Niro (Alfredo, the grandson); Burt Lancaster (Alfredo, the grandfather); Romolo Valli (Giovanni); Anna-Marie Gherardi (Eleonora); Laura Betti (Regina); Paolo Pavesi (Alfredo, as a child); Dominique Sanda (Ada); Sterling Hayden (Leo Dalco); Gérard Depardieu (Olmo Dalco); Roberto Maccanti (Olmo, as a child); Stefania Sandrelli (Anita Foschi); Donald Sutherland (Attila); Werner Bruhns (Octavio); Alida Valli (Signora Pioppi); Francesca Bertini (Sister Desolata).

Publications

Script:

Bertolucci, Bernardo, and others, 1900, Turin, 1976.

Books:

Casetti, F., Bertolucci, Florence, 1975.

Hunter, Allan, Burt Lancaster: The Man and His Movies, New York, 1980; Edinburgh, 1984.

Kuhlbrodt, Dietrich, and others, Bernardo Bertolucci, Munich, 1982.

Ungari, Enzo, Bertolucci, Milan, 1982.

Kolker, Robert Phillip, Bernardo Bertolucci, London, 1985.

Cameron-Wilson, James, The Cinema of Robert De Niro, London, 1986.

1900

Lacombe, Roland, Burt Lancaster, Paris, 1987.

Kline, T. Jefferson, Bertolucci's Dream Loom: A Psychoanalytic Study of the Cinema, Amherst, Massachusetts, 1987.

Tonetti, Claretta, Bernardo Bertolucci, New York, 1995.

Articles:

"1900 Issue" of Filmcritica (Rome), July 1976.

Le Puyat, S., and M. Olmi, in Téléciné (Paris), October 1976.

Bickley, D., and others, in Cineaste (Paris), Winter 1976–77.

Elbert, L., in Cinematca Revista (Montevideo), 1976–77.

Gilbert, B., "Bertolucci's 1900: Stormy Beginnings," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), January 1977.

Schepelern, P. in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Spring 1977.

Alemanno, R., in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), March-April 1977.

Filmfaust (Frankfurt), April-May 1977.

Netzeband, G., in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), June 1977.

di Bernardo G., interview with Bernardo Bertolucci, in Skrien (Amsterdam), July-August 1977.

De Vico, F., and R. Degni, "Bertolucci: Interview 2," in Skrien (Amsterdam), September 1977.

Canby, Vincent, in New York Times, 8 October 1977.

Cornand, A., in Image et Son (Paris), November 1977.

Young, D., "History Lessons," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1977.

Quart, Leonard, "1900: Bertolucci's Marxist Opera," in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1977–78.

Erikson, S., in Filmavisa (Oslo), no. 1–2, 1978.

Sevensson, A., in Filmrutan (Stockholm), no. 1, 1978.

Paret, R., in Cinéma Québec (Montreal), no. 4–5, 1978.

Dean, D., in Films in Review (New York), January 1978.

Forbes, Jill, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1978.

Aitken, W., in Take One (Montreal), March 1978.

Nowell-Smith, Geoffrey, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1978.

Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), April 1978.

Karaganov, A., "Vom Monolog zum Epos," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), April 1978.

Arbasino, A., in Cine (Mexico City), May 1979.

Horton, A., "History as Myth and Myth as History in Bertolucci's 1900," in Film and History (Newark, New Jersey), February 1980.

Firas, I. Leon, in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), November 1980.

Filmcritica (Rome), October-November 1984.

- Burgoyne, Robert, "The Somatization of History in Bertolucci's 1900," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Autumn 1986.
- Burgoyne, Robert, "Temporality as Historical Background in Bertolucci's 1900," in Cinema Journal (Austin), Spring 1989.
- Alion, Yves, "[Novecento]1900," in Mensuel du Cinéma, July-August 1993.
- Castoro Cinema*, November/December 1995.
- Jenkins, E., "Charivari Rituals and the 'Revoltist Tradition,'" in 1900," in Cinefocus (Bloomington, Indiana), vol. 4, 1996.

* * *

Bernardo Bertolucci's 1900 (Novecento) is an attempt at a "popular," accessible film presenting the complexities of the social and political history of Italy between 1901 and 1945, specifically in the region twenty miles from Parma, where the director was born and brought up. It exists in two versions—an original Italian-language epic, five and half hours long, and an abridged English and French version, 75 minutes shorter and often shown in two parts, which is what most viewers have seen. In either version the central themes of this epic film are the same: the local struggle between the peasants and the feudal landowners and, on the national and local levels alike, the rise and fall of Fascism. In taking on such an ambitious set of themes Bertolucci raises high expectations; unfortunately, he does not fulfill them.

The structure of 1900 is premised on a flashback from the opening scene—set on Liberation Day, 25 April 1945—telling the story of a friendship spanning forty years between Alfredo (Robert De Niro), from the landowning class and Olmo (Gerard Depardieu), from the peasantry, both born on 27 January 1901, the day (as we are told in the film) that the great Italian operatic composer Giuseppe Verdi died. The date presumably symbolises the end of the 19th century, but it also hints that the film is to be seen as within the tradition inaugurated by Verdi's tragic operas. The first part of the film, dealing with the relations between the two boys' families, unfolds against the background of a major peasant revolt in 1908, which includes Alfredo's grandfather, the padrone Berlinghieri (Burt Lancaster), among its targets; the First World War, in which Alfredo and Olmo both fight; and their witnessing of the beginnings of Fascism. Although Alfredo is shown to be sympathetic to the poor and degraded peasants, he follows the destiny of his class, while Olmo's slow development of political consciousness does not go so far as to affect their friendship. In this part Bertolucci's depiction of the peasantry, though it is said to have been largely based on memories of his own years as a middle-class child in a rural setting, is highly romanticised, with the spectacular cinematography of Vittorio Storaro, especially his long shots of the wheat fields, enhancing the picturesqueness of rural life while, ironically, cutting some of the ground from under the seriousness of the peasants' protests against their exploitation.

In the second part of the film the change in the political climate is symbolised by the wintry setting of the opening scene: the Fascist march on Rome (in 1922) has already taken place and the Berlinghieri's steward Attila (Donald Sutherland) has become head of the Black Shirts in the area. Bertolucci here uses colour and lighting effectively for atmosphere, with bright reds and yellows for the peasants and workers and darker hues for the Fascists, but the suspicion that this is simplistic and manipulative is reinforced by the presentation of the main Fascist characters, Attila and his wife Regina, as sexual sadists hungering for power. One example of this sadism is when Attila enjoys killing a cat by smashing its head against a post. This equation of Fascism with purely individual sadism serves only to present it as a psychological manifestation, when in fact it was (and still is) a highly developed, complex and subtle ideology, and all the more dangerous because of these features. Bertolucci's caricatures, though no doubt well-meant, only undermine his attack on Fascism and what it represents.

If the peasants are portrayed as little more than figures in a landscape, and the Fascists as figures out of horror comics, what of the central figures of Alfredo and Olmo? Alfredo marries a wealthy girl while Olmo marries a politically radical school teacher and becomes involved with politicising the peasants. After the death of his father, Alfredo becomes the padrone and suffers a disintegrating relationship with his wife Ada (Dominique Sanda), who has become an alcoholic. Although fundamentally a liberal, Alfredo is too weak to resist the influence of Attila and thus slowly distances himself with Olmo. The story comes full circle and recounts events on Liberation Day and after, as the victims of Fascism seek revenge. In these sections we are at least presented with plausible human beings, whose emotions are mixed, whose characters develop over time and whose views cannot be reduced to slogans; yet their plausibility, well-served by the work of the principal actors, functions in a vacuum, since the external events which influence their lives are so sketchily conveyed and the other characters they deal with are so fundamentally implausible.

In short, in either of its two versions, 1900 is a fatally disjointed work. Foreground and background do not fit together; landscapes and sets threaten at times to swamp the human stories being told; epic detachment alternates with intimate narrative, psychological melodrama with broadbrush social history. It is not surprising that the Italian Communist Party, which at that time Bertolucci sympathised with, criticised the film's historical inaccuracies and ideological inconsistencies, as did many other Italian critics and groups. The party's specific criticism—that Bertolucci shows, in the scene of Alfredo's trial, an event that never happened—produced the revealing response that this scene was a fantasy. Yet nothing in the film itself indicates this—which suggests, as do the romanticisation of the peasants, the simplification of Fascism and the alternation between sympathy for Alfredo and sympathy for Olmo, that at the heart of the film is the director's own political confusion. 1900 particularly suffers by comparison with Bertolucci's earlier attempt to depict the Fascist era, The Conformist. Perhaps because of the discipline imposed by relying on a single literary source (Alberto Moravia's novel), perhaps because the story is small-scale and yet complex, the earlier film can make viewers ask themselves what they might have done under Fascism, while watching 1900 makes them ask what Bertolucci really thinks Fascism was about.

In 1900, the first of Bertolucci's series of historically based epics, he evidently bit off more than he, or his audience, could chew. For all its visual beauty, its frequent scenes of convincing and moving personal drama and its occasional moments of well-composed and exciting political narrative, 1900 is ultimately disappointing, an incoherent and frustrating film unworthy of the cast and crew involved in its making.

—Monique Lamontagne

NOVYI VAVILON

(The New Babylon)

USSR, 1929

Directors: Grigori Kozintsev and Leonid Trauberg

Production: Sovkino Studios, Leningrad; black and white, silent; 6 reels, running time: 111 minutes. Released 1929. Re-screened with original score at London Film Festival, 1982.

Screenplay: Grigori Kozintsev and Leonid Trauberg, from an idea by P. Bliakin; photography: Andrei Moskvina and E. Mikhailov; art director: Yevgeni Enei; music: Dimitry Shostakovitch; historical consultant: A. Molok.

Cast: Elena Kuzmina (Louise Poirier); Piotr Sobolevskii (Jean the Soldier); David Gutman (Grasselin); Sophie Magarill (An Actress); Sergei Gerasimov (Lutro, a journalist); S. Gusev (Old Poirier); Janina Jeimo (Therese, a needlewoman); A. Gluchkova (Washerwoman); Evgeni Chervakov (Soldier in National Guard); Andrei Kostrichkin (Old shop assistant); Anna Zarazhinskaia (Young girl at barricades); Vsevolod Pudovkin (Shop assistant).

Publications

Script:

Kozintsev, Grigori, and Leonid Trauberg, Novyi Vavilon, in Avant-scène du Cinéma (Paris), December 1978.

Books:

Leyda, Jay, Kino, London, 1960.

Schnitzer, Jean and Luda, Le Cinéma soviétique par ceux qui l'ont fait, Paris, 1966; as Cinema in Revolution: The Heroic Era of the Soviet Film, London, 1973.

Verdone, Mario, and Barthélemy Amengual, La Feks, Paris, 1970.

Furhammer, Leif, and Folke Isaksson, Politics and Film, London, 1971.

Rapisarda, Giusi, editor, La Feks: Kozintsev e Trauberg, Rome, 1975.

Christie, Ian, and John Gillett, Futurism, Formalism, FEKS: Eccentrism and Soviet Cinema 1918–36, London, 1978.

Leaming, Barbara, Grigori Kozintsev, Boston, 1980.

Bordwell, David, Narration in the Fiction Film, London, 1985.

Christie, Ian, and Richard Taylor, editors, The Film Factory: Russian and Soviet Cinema in Documents 1896–1939, London, 1988.

Houten, Theodore van, Leonid Trauberg and His Films: Always the Unexpected, 's-Hertogenbosch, 1989.

Articles:

Close Up (London), June 1929.

New York Times, 2 December 1929.

Variety (New York), 4 December 1929.

Times (London), 21 November 1935.

Kozintsev, Grigori, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July and August–September 1971.

Positif (Paris), June 1977.

Afterimage (London), Autumn 1981.

Pulleine, Tim, in Guardian (London), 17 September 1982.

Brown, Geoff, in Times (London), 18 September 1982.

Variety (New York), 6 October 1982.

Eisenschitz, B., “La Musique du silence,” in Cinématographe (Paris), November 1982.

Elley, Derek, in Films and Filming (London), November 1982.

Dignam, Virginia, in Morning Star (London), 7 January 1983.

New York Times, 3 and 5 October 1983.

Robinson, David, interview with Leonid Trauberg, in Times (London), 20 November 1983.

Leyda, Jay, “Un cinema fatto e pezzi per la musica di Sostakovic,” in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), February 1984.

Listener (London), 23 January 1985.

Morrison, Richard, in Times (London), 13 January 1986.

Nusinova, N., “Novyi Vavilon: stareiut li fil'my?” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 4, 1990.

Tsikounas, M., “Il était excentrique,” in Positif (Paris), no. 363, May 1991.

* * *

The New Babylon is a metaphorical clash of glittering surfaces and deep social cynicism that marked the climax of Grigori Kozintsev and Leonid Trauberg's experimentations with the conventions of the Soviet silent cinema. Taking their thematic inspiration from the story of the Paris Commune of 1871, the two directors fashioned a highly conceptualized allegory of social strata under pressure that transcends its historical roots to form a sardonic comment on the human condition.

In actuality, the commune had been composed of a group of French patriots who seized power during the Franco-Prussian War after the city of Paris fell before the advance of the Germanic invaders. Though the experiment in communal government lasted but a few short weeks, it caught the attention of Marxists and Socialists alike. Yet, it was not strictly the commune's historical reality that inspired Kozintsev and Trauberg. It was the movement's symbolic re-invention of “The City of Light”—an attempt at the creation of a universal socialistic “Paris of the Mind” that the two Soviet artists found most intriguing.

In 1921, Kozintsev and Trauberg had created FEKS, The Factory of the Eccentric Actor, a theatre group dedicated to the creation of avant-garde and unorthodox productions. After producing a number of controversial multi-media stage representations, the two found their true forum in the cinema, and made six highly experimental films between 1924 and 1927. The New Babylon, which began production in 1928, was their first project undertaken with the support of the Soviet government.

Although their desire for authenticity was extensive enough to prompt them to embark on a photographic expedition to Paris to record the sights and sounds of their subject matter, they had no intention of employing the resulting images in a conventional manner. The creation of a “Paris of the Mind” mandated a multi-textual approach. Thus, while Kozintsev and Trauberg embraced the paintings of Renoir and Manet and the novels of Emile Zola, they reinterpreted these cultural icons in the light of their reading of Karl Marx's The Class Struggle in France. The symbolic center of the film is the New Babylon, a Parisian department store which is, in effect, a crucible for the interaction of the French social classes. At the outset of the film, a fast-moving camera and a collage of glittering images portrays the store as an idolatrous Babylonian temple awash with materialistic and fleshly pleasures. The mode of representation, at this point, is expressionistic in nature but not the type of dark, moody distortionism embodied by the German aesthetics of the early 1920s. Expressionism, as employed by Kozintsev and Trauberg, is much lighter, and makes calculated use of glitter and flamboyance as rhetorical devices within a visual collage. For example, the frenetic sequence of images that dominates the early department-store scenes emphasizes lavish sets strewn with such exotic objects as brocades, kimonos, fans, and parasols, and an agitated salesman (played by Vsevolod Pudovkin) hawking his wares. Such imagery dynamically conveys the psychological preoccupations of the bourgeoisie who frequent the store.

Novyi Vavilon

The disparate groups that comprise the film's "class struggle" are joined and commented upon through the interactions of Louise Poirier (Elena Kuzmina), a salesgirl at the store. Forced by the circumstances of her position to cater to the whims of the rich, it is clear that her sympathies are actually with the working-class patriots who will form the Commune. The actress Kuzmina wrote some years afterwards that the character of Louise was, ironically, not found in the literature of the time but was instead intended to be a synthetic communist girl representing the entire epoch.

The frenzy of contrasts conveyed by the opening scenes of a sale in progress at the New Babylon is sustained in the subsequent scenes of an uncomfortable Louise at the music hall. But here the filmmakers vary their mode of expression somewhat by constantly interspersing the fast-moving camera work with isolated, almost static vignettes unfolding against action filled backdrops. Prominent among these latter events is the meeting between Louise and Jean, a soldier who becomes her lover as the Prussians march into Paris.

In the film's middle and later segments, which are more conventionally sequential in nature. The early expressionism gives way to the more clearly delineated realism embodied in the battle scenes. Here, it is a combination of longer, more slowly moving sequences interspersed with short episodes that show the fall of the Paris administrative seat and the rise of the Commune.

When the Commune is ultimately betrayed by the bourgeoisie and attacked by the soldiers, Kozintsev and Trauberg create a heightened sense of irony by blending pastoral and battle images in a gross parody of reality. Through the use of repugnant close-ups of aristocrats picnicking on a hilltop at Versailles as the battle rages below, the self-serving treason of the upper classes is brought sharply into contrast with the patriotism of the workers. The film shifts dramatically between portraits of bloated faces sipping champagne and the blank faces of the dead communards on the barricades.

The New Babylon derives much of its energy and momentum from its union of narrative styles. On the visual level, the cinematography of former graphic artist Andrei Moskvin intersperses crisp black and white images reminiscent of fine engravings with the glitzy, stylized, and more softly rendered representations characteristic of Soviet expressionism. The latter visual style is also highly evident in the performances of the actors. The exaggerated facial expressions and gestures of the actors evident in such scenes as the one in the music hall are used to symbolize psychological states rather than to convey simple emotions. Finally, in a number of instances, images and motifs are structured into fast-moving collages designed to distance the viewer emotionally from the action and to elicit an intellectual awareness of how various visual components of the film interact with others to produce a particular meaning.

The music, by Dimitry Shostakovich, is also integral to the film's narrative structure. Normally in film, the music serves to compliment or amplify the visual image. The relationship is one of conjunction. In The New Babylon, however, Shostakovich creates a relationship through the opposition of sound and image. In the music hall scene, for example, the composer interfaces components of the "can-can" and the "Marseillaise" with the vulgar spectacle of the pageant to form a musical comment on the French middle class.

Although the avant-garde aspects of The New Babylon caused it to fall somewhat in disfavor during the regime of Josef Stalin, it is precisely those elements that cause it to remain of interest today. Although ranking somewhat below the pioneering efforts of Sergei Eisenstein and Vsevolod Pudovkin whose theories greatly influenced its creation, The New Babylon still represents an innovative use of the cinema and one of the highpoints of the Soviet silent cinema.

—Stephen L. Hanson

NOW VOYAGER

USA, 1942

Director: Irving Rapper

Production: Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc. black and white, 35mm; running time: 117 minutes. Released 1942.

Producer: Hal B. Wallis; screenplay: Casey Robinson, from the novel by Olive Higgins Prouty; photography: Sol Polito; editor: Warren Low; art director: Robert Haas; music: Max Steiner.

Cast: Bette Davis (Charlotte Vale); Paul Henreid (Jerry Durrance); Claude Rains (Dr. Jaquith); Gladys Cooper (Mrs. Henry Windle Vale); Bonita Granville (June Vale); Ilka Chase (Lisa Vale); John Loder (Elliot Livingston); Lee Patrick (Deb McIntyre); Franklin Pangborn (Mr. Thompson); Katherine Alexander (Miss Trask); James Rennie (Frank McIntyre); Mary Wickes (Dora Pickford); Janis Wilson (Tina Durrance); Michael Ames (Dr. Dan Regan); Charles Drake (Leslie Trotter); Frank Puglia (Manoel); David Clyde (William).

Award: Oscar for Music—Scoring of a Dramatic or Comedy Picture, 1942.

Publications

Script:

Robinson, Casey, Now Voyager, edited by Jeanne Thomas Allen, Madison, Wisconsin, 1984.

Books:

Davis, Bette, The Lonely Life: An Autobiography, New York, 1962.
Ringgold, Gene, The Films of Bette Davis, New York, 1966; updated edition 1990.

Mancia, Adrienne, editor, Hal Wallis, Film Producer, New York, 1970.
Higham, Charles, Bette: A Biography of Bette Davis, New York, 1981.
Robinson, Jeffrey, Bette Davis: Her Film and Stage Career, London, 1982.

Henreid, Paul, with Julius Fast, Ladies Man: An Autobiography, New York, 1984.

Champion, Isabelle, Bette Davis, Paris, 1986.

Walker, Alexander, Bette Davis: A Celebration, London, 1986.

Davis, Bette, with Michael Herskowitz, This 'n' That, New York, 1987.

Gledhill, Christine, editor, Home Is Where the Heart Is: Studies in Melodrama and the Woman's Film, London, 1987.

Leaming, Barbara, Bette Davis: A Biography, New York, 1993.

Riese, Randall, All About Bette: Her Life from A to Z, Lincolnwood, 1993.

Spada, James, More Than a Woman, New York, 1994.

Hadleigh, Boze, Bette Davis Speaks, London, 1997.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 19 August 1942.

New York Times, 23 October 1942.

Flanner, Janet, "Bette Davis," in New Yorker, February 1943.

Times (London), 4 November 1943.

Raper, Michell, "Mannerisms—in the Grand Manner," in Films and Filming (London), September 1955.

Quirk, Lawrence, "Bette Davis," in Films in Review (New York), December 1955.

Stein, Jeanne, "Claude Rains," in Films in Review (New York), November 1963.

Eyles, Allen, in Films and Filming (London), February 1965.

Guerin, Ann, "Bette Davis," in Show (New York), April 1971 and May 1972.

Rhodie, Sam, "Semiotic Constraints in Now Voyager," in Australian Journal of Screen Theory (Kensington, New South Wales), no. 4, 1978.

Greenberg, J., "Writing for the Movies: Casey Robinson," in Focus on Film (London), April 1979.

Villien, Bruno, in Cinématographe (Paris), July 1979.

Nacache, J., in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1979.

Merigeau, P., in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), September 1979.

Positif (Paris), October 1979.

Jacobs, L., "Now Voyager: Some Problems of Enunciation and Sexual Difference," in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Spring 1981.
m/f Journal (London), no. 9, 1984.

Now Voyager

La Place, Maria, "Bette Davis and the Ideal of Consumption: A Look at Now Voyager," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 6, no. 4, 1985. Journal of Popular Film and Television (Washington, D.C.), Autumn, 1985.

Palmer, R. Barton, "The Successful Failure of Therapy in Now Voyager: The Women's Picture as Unresponsive Symptom," in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 8, no. 1, 1986.

Cavell, S., "Ugly Duckling, Funny Butterfly: Bette Davis and Now Voyager," in Critical Inquiry (Chicago), no. 2, 1990.

Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 4, 1990.

De Lauretis, T., "Il fantasma del cinema: sulla funzione spettatoriale come rapporto di produzione fantasmatico-sociale," in Cinema & Cinema (Bologna), September-December 1991.

Britton, A., "A New Servitude: Bette Davis, Now Voyager, and the Radicalism of the Woman's Film," in CineAction (Toronto), Winter 1992.

Wood, R., "Letters," in CineAction (Toronto), no. 29, Fall 1992.

Greskovic, Robert, "Now Voyager," in The Village Voice (New York), vol. 40, no. 42, 17 October 1995.

* * *

Now Voyager is today one of the best remembered and best loved woman's films, or "weepies," of the 1930s and 1940s. Bette Davis remembers it as one of her most satisfying movies. But during its initial release in 1942, the film received a mixed critical response; the New York Times called the film a "prudish fantasy." The low esteem in which critics held the film seems in retrospect to be due to the low regard in which critics held the "woman's picture." Now Voyager succeeds, not because it explores any new thematic or formal areas within the genre of "woman's pictures," but because it utilizes generic conventions in a highly polished manner.

The "woman's film" is characterized by a central female protagonist whose concerns revolve around a romantic or maternal relationship. In the case of Now Voyager, the film weaves both into the narrative. The first half of the film documents Charlotte Vale's (Bette Davis) growth into a sexually mature and attractive woman who must overcome the repressive influence of her mother. In the first segment, Charlotte's mother, psychiatrist, and sister-in-law discuss Charlotte before she appears, making her the center of the story without necessitating her on-screen presence. The camera introduces Charlotte with a closeup of her hands working on an ivory box, then discloses her feet walking down the stairs, finally offering a long shot of her entering the parlor. In the second segment, Dr. Jaquith (Claude Rains) and the sister-in-law discuss Charlotte before she is actually seen. The camera here introduces her with a closeup of her hands operating a loom. In the third segment, which takes place on an ocean liner, the passengers discuss Charlotte prior to the camera's introductory closeup panning from her feet up to her head. Upon Charlotte's return to New York City in the film's fourth segment, a discussion of Charlotte precedes the medium shot introducing her. Each discussion creates a sense of expectancy and interest about the character, while the introductions themselves follow a course that visually parallels Charlotte's character development from disjointed close-ups of fragmented body parts to the completely integrated portrait in one shot. It is only after an innocent shipboard romance with a married man has sexually awakened her that Charlotte achieves her sense of identity as a woman and a person. In the second half of the movie, Charlotte supplants her earlier womanly hobbies—carving ivory boxes, weaving and knitting—with socializing, mothering and philanthropy, completing her journey toward the assumption of her socially acceptable roles.

Several motifs provide a symbolic continuity to the film. The most notable, Paul Henreid lighting Davis's cigarette, operates as a poetic visual sign that may be likened to the intricate musical dances of Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers. Only during the shared intimacies of the couple's "cigarette breaks" does the camera break from the almost continuous objective viewpoint to a series of subjective shot-reverse shots of Davis and Henreid. In this way, the camera forces the audience to shift from its fixation on Davis as an object-to-be-consumed to an alternating identification with her and Henreid. The audience vicariously participates as both parties in their fleeting and harmless romantic moments. Thus, the viewer retains a distance from Charlotte Vale that makes her problems seem as though they are happening to someone else, while fully identifying with her few moments of idealized romantic pleasure.

Max Steiner's Academy Award-winning score and the references to the relationship between Charlotte's life and the art of fiction reinforce an idealized discovery of sexuality. Steiner's melodramatic lover's theme song appears not only when Henreid and Davis get together, but also as the piece the orchestra plays when the two must sit next to each other without acknowledging their love; and after Jerry (Henreid) returns to his wife and family, it comes over the radio reminding Davis and the audience of her emotional ties to him while she chats with another man. The music helps set up a world that seems to exist only to underscore the poignancy of their situation. The ludicrousness of such an idea is overcome by equating how one acts and lives with the way that novels work. Charlotte repeatedly refers to her understanding of life, and especially her life, as having come from novels, and the dissolves into and out of the flashbacks are accomplished via the turning pages of a book. Charlotte's life and world fulfill one's expectations of the romance formula, and they are believable because she believes and acts as if life is a romance formula.

The credit for making Charlotte Vale's identity and life appear so attractive should go largely to Bette Davis for suggestively giving, through gestures, movements, rhythms, timing and articulation, an assertive and independent awareness to the role. Secondly, the film preserves much of the dialogue from Olive Higgins Prouty's 1941 novel on which it is based; its rhythms, tempo and the words themselves underscore a developing assertiveness, control and mastery in Charlotte Vale's speech.

In the end, Charlotte Vale may not be able to achieve complete fulfillment of her destined womanly role through marriage to the man she loves, but she hangs on to the independence, her own identity, while she captures the semblance of a nuclear family. The resolution allows Charlotte to become adoptive mother to Jerry's unhappy daughter while he remains faithful to his legal wife. In one of the great screen romance endings of all time, Charlotte Vale's compromised balance between self-sufficient independence and romantic longings provides an impossible illusory alternative to the unmasking of romance and the loss of independence that would result in daily married life with Jerry and his daughter.

—Lauren Rabinovitz

NÓZ W WODZIE

(Knife in the Water)

Poland, 1962

Director: Roman Polanski

Production: Kamera Film Unit for Film Polski; black and white, 35mm; running time: 94 minutes. Released Poland, 1962. Filmed 1962 in Poland.

Producer: Stanisław Zyewicz; screenplay: Jerzy Skolimowski, Jakub Goldberg, and Roman Polanski; photography: Jerzy Lipman; sound: Halina Paszkowska; music: Krzysztof Komeda.

Cast: Leon Niemczyk (Andrzej); Jolanta Umecka (Christine/Krystanal); Zygmunt Malanowicz (Young man).

Award: International Film Critics Award (Fipresci), Venice Film Festival, 1962.

Publications

Books:

Butler, Ivan, The Cinema of Roman Polanski, New York, 1970.

Kane, Pascal, Roman Polanski, Paris, 1970.

Belmans, Jacques, Roman Polanski, Paris, 1971.

Liehm, Mira and Antonin, The Most Important Art: East European Cinema after 1945, Berkeley, 1977.

Bisplinghoff, Gretchen, and Virginia Wexman, Roman Polanski: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.

Kiernan, Thomas, The Roman Polanski Story, New York, 1980.

Leaming, Barbara: Polanski: The Filmmaker as Voyeur: A Biography, New York, 1981; as Polanski: His Life and Films, London, 1982.

Paul, David W., Politics, Art, and Commitment in the Eastern European Cinema, New York, 1983.

Polanski, Roman, Roman, London, 1984.
Dokumentation: Polanski und Skolimowski: Das Absurde im Film,
 Zurich, 1985.
 Wexman, Virginia, Roman Polanski, Boston, 1985.
 Jacobsen, Wolfgang, and others, Roman Polanski, Munich, 1986.
 Avron, Dominique, Roman Polanski, Paris, 1987.
 Parker, John, Polanski, London, 1995.

Articles:

Haudiquet, Philippe, "Nouveaux cinéastes polonais: Roman Polanski," in Premier Plan (Lyons), no. 27, 1962.
 Torok, Jean-Paul, "Prelude à Polanski," in Positif (Paris), March 1962.
 Baker, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), February 1963.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 31 October 1963.
 March, Sibyl, in Seventh Art (New York), Winter 1963.
 Weinberg, Gretchen, "Interview with Roman Polanski," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1963–64.
Cinema (Beverly Hills), February–March 1964.
 Delahaye, Michel, and Jean-André Fieschi, "Landscape of the Mind: Interview with Roman Polanski," in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), no. 3, 1966.
 McCarty, John Alan, "The Polanski Puzzle," in Take One (Montreal), no. 5, 1969.
 Gow, Gordon, "Satisfaction—A Most Unpopular Feeling," in Films and Filming (London), April 1969.
 Nairn, Tom, "Roman Polanski," in Cinema (London), June 1969.
 Cugny, L., and H. Guibert, in Cinématographe (Paris), no. 40, 1978.
 Lawton, A. M., "The Double: A Dostoevskian Theme in Polanski," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 2, 1981.
Film (Warsaw), 8 July 1984.
Kino (Warsaw), no. 8, 1987.
 Andrew, Geoff, "Stabbing Pains," in Time Out (London), no. 1177,
 10 March 1993.
 Thompson, David, in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 3, no. 3,
 March 1993.
Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 180, September–October 1995.
 Thompson, David, "I Make Films for Adults," in Sight and Sound
 (London), vol. 5, no. 4, April 1995.
 Richardson, John H., "What I've Learned: Roman Polanski," in
Esquire (New York), vol. 132, no. 6, December 1999.
 Stanley, Alessandra, "Polanski: The Once and Future Auteur," in
New York Times, 16 January 2000.

* * *

Roman Polanski emerged as a highly individual artist when he made his directorial debut with a few short films—Dwaj ludzie z szafa; his graduation project Gdy spadają anioły; Gros et le maigre, produced in France; and the grotesque Ssaki. These films startled audiences and critics alike and won praise at various film festivals. They amazed viewers with their unusually innovative approach of pure experiment combined with elaborated philosophical import and elements of absurd humor. The critics anxiously awaited his first feature-length film which came in 1962 and was entitled Nóz w wodzie (Knife in the Water).

What was so startling about Nóz w wodzie? At first glance, it seems to be a simple story with neither an attractive setting nor much external dramatic action. However, within the ordinary plot a bitter internal drama is played out in the form of a minor allegory. It is an intimate drama of three people in the enclosed space of a sailboat in the middle of a lake, and it takes place over the 24 hours of a single Sunday. A young hitchhiker steps out in front of the car of an elegant married couple, Andrzej and Christine. The hitchhiker's clumsiness appeals to the older man, who finds in it an opportunity to show off his own strength, make fun of the hitchhiker and provoke him. Andrzej invites him to go out sailing with him and his wife. Their relationship gradually comes to a critical point; more and more, Andrzej asserts his role as captain and forces the youth into an audacious reprisal. Somewhere in the relationship between the two men stands Christine. The conflict reaches a climax, when, in one of their quarrels, Andrzej throws the boy's knife into the water. The boy jumps in after it but doesn't come up. Andrzej attempts to rescue the boy, but the latter had only pretended to drown and has returned to the boat, where he again confronts Christine. With morning the drama ends. The boy goes off, and the husband and wife, having cleared up the situation, fall back into the routine of their peculiar conjugal life.

Nóz w wodzie is a cold work that exposes the general norms of human relations defined by generational conflicts and social factors. The drama is characterized by short, clipped pieces of dialogue, each of which serves to determine the character and conduct of the protagonists. Both the beginning and end of the film are wrapped in silence and the quiet, disturbing isolation of the "heroes." Some critics noted, at the time of the film's release, the similarity between Polanski's development and the directorial style of Michelangelo Antonioni. Nevertheless, this work bears a uniquely individual directorial stamp. The film opens with an automobile ride; across the windshield and the faces of the husband and wife flit the shadows of branches and tree trunks. The image is cold and grey. So, too, are the world and the relationship of the central couple into which the hitchhiker intrudes. The enclosed space of the boat surrounded by water intensifies the drama of the situation and the coldness and hopelessness of the human relationships. There is an intrinsic drama hidden somewhere beneath the exterior of these people who have nothing to say to each other. The boy serves as a kind of catalyst for the development of the action, for the exposure of relationships and character. But the authors present everything as a mere game which, in the end, can start all over again despite the malicious accusations and the disclosure of egoism and cowardice; in spite of the pain and cruelty of an empty conjugal existence, everything remains as it had been. The drama is heightened by the brilliant camera work of Jerzy Lipman, which captures both the surroundings and the people in cold, grey tones; looks at them as a tangle of ropes, objects and bodies; and uses discrete images to portray the contrasts between expressions and utterances. The attention concentrated on the strangeness of human communication is emphasized further by the jazz elements in Krzysztof Komeda's music.

Nóz w wodzie was the confession of a generation, the warning of dangerous trends of philistinism, thoughtlessness, and authoritarianism. It is at this general level that the film is important today as well, and it has lost nothing of its suggestiveness in the years since its first appearance. It is a masterpiece which has risen above generational conflict to confront the viewer with the universal problem of human intolerance.

—V. Merhaut

NUIT ET BROUILLARD

---

(Night and Fog)

France, 1955

Director: Alain Resnais

Production: Argos-Como-Cocinor (Paris); Eastmancolor, some sequences in black and white, 35mm; running time: 32 minutes. Filmed near Auschwitz. Released 1955.

Text: Jean Cayrol; photography: Ghislain Cloquet; editor: Alain Resnais; music: Hans Eisler; historical consultants: André Michel and Olga Wormser.

Cast: Michel Bouquet (Narrator).

Award: Prix Jean Vigo, France, 1956.

Publications

Script:

Cayrol, Jean, Nuit et brouillard, in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), February 1961; also in Film: Book 2—Films of Peace and War, edited by Robert Hughes, New York, 1962.

Books:

- Cordier, Stéphane, editor, Alain Resnais; ou, La Création au cinéma, Paris, 1961.
- Pinguad, Bernard, Alain Resnais, Lyons, 1961.
- Bournoure, Gaston, Alain Resnais, Paris, 1962.
- Cowie, Peter, Antonioni, Bergman, Resnais, London, 1963.
- Armes, Roy, French Cinema Since 1946: The Personal Style, New York, 1966.
- Armes, Roy, The Cinema of Alain Resnais, London, 1968.
- Ward, John, Alain Resnais; or, The Theme of Time, New York, 1968.
- Prédal, René, Alain Resnais, Paris, 1968.
- Daniel, Joseph, Guerre et Cinéma: Grandes illusions et petits soldats, 1895–1971, Paris, 1972.
- Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.
- Bertetto, Paolo, Resnais, Alain Resnais, Florence, 1976.
- Kreidl, John Francis, Alain Resnais, Boston, 1977.
- Monaco, James, Alain Resnais: The Role of Imagination, New York, 1978.
- Benayoun, Robert, Alain Resnais: Arpenteur de l'imaginaire, Paris, 1980; revised edition, 1988.
- Sweet, Freddy, The Film Narratives of Alain Resnais, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.
- Vergerio, Falvio, I film di Alain Resnais, Rome, 1984.
- Roob, Jean-Daniel, Alain Resnais: Qui êtes-vous?, Lyons, 1986.
- Riambau, Esteve, La ciencia y la ficción: El cine de Alain Resnais, Barcelona, 1988.
- Thomas, François, L'atelier d'Alain Resnais, Paris, 1989.

- Bersani, Leo, and Ulysse Dutoit, Arts of Impoverishment: Beckett, Rothko, Resnais, Cambridge, 1994.
- Callev, Haim, Stream of Consciousness in the Films of Alain Resnais, New York, 1997.
- Fleischer, Alain, L'art d'Alain Resnais, Paris, 1998.

Articles:

- Truffaut, François, interview with Alain Resnais, in Arts (Paris), 20 February 1956.
- Marcorelles, Louis, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1956.
- Bazin, André, "Alain Resnais," in Qu'est-ce que le cinéma (Paris), 1959.
- Sandall, Roger, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1961.
- Taylor, John Russell, "Alain Resnais," in Cinema Eye, Cinema Ear (New York), 1964.
- "Resnais Issue" of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), Summer 1966.
- Roud, Richard, "Memories of Resnais," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1969.
- "Resnais Issue" of Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1980.
- Michael, R., in Cineaste (New York), 1984.
- Krantz, C., "Teaching Night and Fog: History and Historiography," in Film and History (Newark, New Jersey), February 1985.
- Moses, John W., "Vision Denied in Night and Fog and Hiroshima mon amour," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 15, no. 3, 1987.
- Arnold, Gordon B., "From Big Screen to Small Screen: Night and Fog (Nuit et brouillard) Directed by Alain Resnais," in Library Journal (New York), vol. 114, no. 9, 15 May 1989.
- Donova, F., "Nuit et brouillard: Hiroshima mon amour," in Cinema 89 (Paris), no. 459, September 1989.
- Chevallier, J., "Le kepi de Pithiviers," in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), no. 462, July/August 1990.
- Slavin, J., "The Butterflies in the Bonfire: The Holocaust as Art," in Metro Magazine (St. Kilda West), no. 99, Summer 1994.
- Rabinowitz, Paula, "Screen Memories," in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 18, no. 4, October 1996.
- Jousse, Thierry, "Trois vidéos et un CD-ROM autour de Chris Marker," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 515, July-August 1997.
- Dümling, Albrecht, "Eisler's Music for Resnais' Night and Fog (1955): A Musical Counterpoint to the Cinematic Portrayal of Terror," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon), vol. 18, no. 4, October 1998.

* * *

Two closely related problems: How does one make a film about the concentration camps? and how does one write a reference book entry about a film about the concentration camps? The facts are too appalling to be aesthetically encompassed; any attempt to encompass them seems almost beyond criticism. The word that rises automatically to one's lips to describe what was done in the camps is "inhuman"; yet it was human beings who performed those acts. For both the film-maker and the critic, it is one's own "humanity" that is in question.

In making Night and Fog director Alain Resnais and his writer Cayrol confronted a problem that is simultaneously aesthetic and moral: how does one adequately represent the enormity of the camps without so overwhelming the spectator that the only possible response is a despairing impotence?—how to achieve and sustain a contemplative distance without softening or trivializing the material? Their solution, curiously seductive (and the strangeness of that word in such a context is deliberate), is ultimately unsatisfying. The failure lies in the fact that the kind of distance achieved is aesthetic rather than analytical; we find ourselves invited to contemplate, not the historical/material realities, but an art-object.

Nuit et brouillard

The film is built on a systematic pattern of related oppositions: present/past, colour/black-and-white, tranquility/horror, natural environment/buildings, footage shot for the film/archive material. Particularly stressed is the recurrent Resnais theme: importance of memory/difficulty of remembering. Nothing can mitigate the appalling impact of the newsreel material incorporated in the film, with the horrors carefully built up to, yet introduced almost casually, so that we at once expect them and are taken unawares. The problem arises from the attitude to the horror that the film, overall, constructs.

One omission—startling today, though no one seems to have commented on it at the time—is symptomatic in more than one way of the film's failure. One sequence carefully specifies the various coloured triangles that identified different groups of victims, distinguishing the Jews from other ethnic groups, political prisoners, etc.

Presumably Resnais and Cayrol had very thorough documentation at their disposal, yet no reference is made to the pink triangle: the filmmakers surround the deaths of the (approximately) 300,000 homosexuals who died in the camps with their own “night and fog” of silence. A sinister enough comment on the “liberal” conscience in itself, this omission has implications that lead much further. The fact that the Nazis attempted to exterminate gays as well as Jews points to certain fundamental traits of Fascism that our culture generally prefers to gloss over for its own comfort. Alongside the demand for racial purity went the insistence on extreme sexual division: “masculinity” and “femininity” must be strictly differentiated, women relegated to the subordinate position of the mothers who would produce future generations of “pure” aryan. The reason why patriarchal capitalist society is so reluctant to confront this aspect of Nazism is clearly that it has its own stake in the same assumptions.

The problem, however, is not simply that Resnais and Cayrol cannot make that analysis (though it is a fundamental one); they really offer no analysis at all (with the result that they tend to repress the possibility of really understanding the camps). The final moments of the film are extremely moving: at the post-war trials, we are led through the whole hierarchy of camp authority; everyone denies responsibility; we are left with the question, “Then who is responsible?” Yet the implication is something like: “These things have always happened; they have happened again; they will always happen.” Denied concrete material/historical analysis, we are thrown back on “the human condition.” The answer the film (without much hope) proposes is eternal vigilance. Yet no “liberal” vigilance is going to prevent the recurrence of the camps (or related phenomena) until the fundamental premises and structures of our culture are radically transformed.

This account of Night and Fog is perhaps ungenerous, the problems inherent in the undertaking being so daunting. The film is intensely moving. Yet to confront the human monstrousness of the camps demands the utmost rigour from both the film-maker and the critic. Ultimately, the kind of “distance” constructed by Resnais and Cayrol seems less honourable, as a response, than the direct emotional assault of work like Schönberg’s “A Survivor from Warsaw.”

—Robin Wood

UNE NUIT SUR LE MONT CHAUVE

(Night on Bald Mountain)

France, 1933

Directors: Alexander Alexeieff and Claire Parker

Production: Black and white, 35mm, animation; running time: 8 minutes, some sources list 9 minutes. Released 1933, Paris.

Narrative development: Alexander Alexeieff, inspired in part by Moussorgsky’s music and notes, and a short story based on a Slavic fairy tale by Gogol; music: Moussorgsky; arrangement: Rimski-Korsakov, “His Master’s Voice” interpreted by: London Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Albert Coates; animation: Alexander Alexeieff and Claire Parker.

Publications

Books:

- Alexandre Alexeieff* (catalogue), Edinburgh, 1967.
 Rondolino, G., Alexandre Alexeieff, Este, 1971.
 Starr, Cecile, Discovering the Movies, New York, 1972.
 Bendazzi, G., editor, Alexandre Alexeieff, Milan, 1973.
 A. Alexeieff, C. Parker: Films et eaux-fortes (catalogue), Annecy, 1975.
 Russett, R., and Cecile Starr, Experimental Animation, New York, 1976.
 Bendazzi, G., editor, Pages d’Alexeieff, Milan, 1983.
 A. Alexeieff; ou, La Gravure animée (catalogue), Annecy, 1983.
 Bisaccia, Antonio, Alexandre Alexeieff: il cinema d’incisione, Castel Maggiore, 1993.

Articles:

- Cheronnet, L., in Art et Décoration (Paris), no. 63, 1934.
 Priacel, S., “Gravure animée,” in Art Vivant (Paris), no. 188, 1934.
 Grierson, John, in Cinema Quarterly (London), Autumn 1934.

Martin, A., “Alexandre Alexeieff et les cinémas possibles,” in Cinéma (Paris), no. 81, 1963.

Alexeieff, Alexandre, “Reflections on Motion Picture Animation,” in Film Culture (New York), no. 32, 1964.

Alexeieff, Alexandre, “The Synthesis of Artificial Movements in Motion Picture Projection,” in Film Culture (New York), no. 48–49, 1970.

Arnault H., editor, “Le Chant d’ombres et de lumières de 1,250,000 épingles,” in Cinéma Pratique (Paris), no. 123, 1973.

Jouvanceau, J.P., and Gaudillière, C., “A. Alexeieff,” in Banc-Titre (Paris), no. 25, 1982.

* * *

The power of Night on Bald Mountain derives from the extraordinary versatility that Alexander Alexeieff and Claire Parker brought to their unusual medium. Their “pinboard” (l’écran d’épingles) is an upright perforated screen, three by four feet, with 500,000 (one million in later films) headless steel pins as its physical matrix. Images created on the pinboard take their character from the depth of the pins and their oblique lighting. Pushed forward, the pins create an entirely dark surface; when fully recessed, they produce a white ground. By varying the depth of the pins, one creates between the extremes of white and black a wide variety of subtle shades the brilliance and delicacy of which exceed that of engravings. The pinboard screen yields a single picture at a time which must be photographed as part of a sequence of thousands of such shots to shape the cumulative effect.

This frame-by-frame creation during the process of filming, rather than before it, is the earliest form of direct animation. Alexeieff acknowledges the pointillism of Seurat as analogous to the character of his images. The delicacy of this process of image-building becomes apparent when one realizes that four minutes of production requires a year of work. Since the artist can see only the current frame, the procedure is akin to writing a short story sentence-by-sentence and locking away each one until completion of the narrative. During the interactive process of creating and filming, the only original of a pinboard picture that remains is its photographic negative; there are almost 12,000 for this eight-minute film.

It is important to note that Night on Bald Mountain has about as much affinity to Walt Disney’s evocation of the same Moussorgsky work in Fantasia (1940) as Lotte Reininger’s Cinderella has to Disney’s version, i.e. the relationship is one of contrast more than of comparison. While Disney’s Fantasia used cell animation in a direct and explicit way, which includes a sketching from life of Bela Lugosi as a Moussorgsky demon, Alexeieff and Parker employ indirection and impression, eminently conscious of art’s power to universalize experience, of animation’s power to create movement that is not “live” in the conventional ways of narrative, feature-length films. Their technique is most closely akin to the music that they visualize in their manipulation of time and space through shadowy referents. More physicists than engineers, their mobile structures reflect the changing character of thought and feeling, depict imaginary rather than static worlds. To photography and painting’s laws of perspective they add the suggestive movement of implicit images. To the dance they add weightless figures whose unlimited metamorphoses invoke the license of Ovid’s epic poem or the transitory, spatial and temporal fluidity of musical patterns. More than do other approaches to cinema, that of Alexeieff and Parker embodies Suzanne Langer’s description of cinema as a dream mode.

Night on Bald Mountain is a nightmare, a Walpurgisnacht, inspired by Moussorgsky's music and written notes, by childhood recollections, by the Russian short-story writer Gogol's record of an ages-old Slavic fairytale, and by a dancing windmill in Pushkin's Eugene Onegin. The film's witches, demons and skeletal horses, in contrasting day and night reflection of each other, create a feverish tone poem that Moussorgsky's music "describes" as powerfully as would a verbal soundtrack. The description, however, of both sight and sound is poetic and lyric rather than narrative and prosaic. The correlative and opposing patterns of visual and musical images create unexpected harmonies whose tonalities are both elastic and balanced. The clash of old and new realities, of expected and unexpected sights and sounds that regularly, rather than continually, complement each other provides the conceptual unity that is finally as satisfying as it is initially troubling. The audience comes to realize that the animation and the music are metaphorical equivalents to one another and that in combination they tell a tragicomic story of life and death, which calls upon the vertical complexity of poetic allusion and brevity for its thrilling and very temporary resolution of basic human contradictions.

The first pinboard was built in 1932, for Night on Bald Mountain, and was used by Alexeieff and Parker for all their non-commercial films. Jacques Drouin's Le paysagiste (Mindscape: National Film Board of Canada, 1976) continues their tradition. Because of the difficulty of the technique, however, Alexeieff and Parker have had many more admirers than cinematic descendants.

Following the traditional path of successful experimenters, they earned well deserved critical acclaim, but the applause only gradually expanded beyond the ranks of film experts and film society aficionados. Initial success in Paris did not yield widespread distribution in spite of John Grierson's generous praise in the Autumn 1934 issue of Cinema Quarterly. In 1970 Norman McLaren proclaimed Night on Bald Mountain "first and foremost" on his list of the world's best animated films, and in 1980 it earned inclusion on a list of the eight best short animation films of all time.

—Arthur G. Robson

LES NUITS FAUVES

(Savage Nights)

France, 1992

Director: Cyril Collard

Production: Banfilm Ter, La Sept Cinéma, Erre Produzioni, SNC, Sofinergie 2, CNC, Canal Plus, Procirep; color, 35mm; running time: 126 minutes.

Producer: Nella Banfi; screenplay: Cyril Collard, Jacques Fieschi, from the novel by Cyril Collard; photography: Manuel Teran; editor: Lise Beaulieu; assistant director: Jean-Jacques Jauffret; sound editors: Patrice Grisolet, Frédéric Attal; sound recording: Michel Brethez; costumes: Régine Arniaud.

Cast: Cyril Collard (Jean); Romane Bohringer (Laura); Carlos Lopez (Samy); Corine Blue (Laura's mother); Claude Winter (Jean's mother); René Marc Bini (Marc); Maria Schneider (Noria); Clémentine Célarié (Marianne); Laura Favali (Karine).

Publications

Articles:

Toubiana, S., Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1992.

Strauss, F., Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1992.

Rooney, D., Variety (New York), 7 December 1992.

Roy, A., "La vie a tout prix" in 24 Images (Montreal), February-March 1993.

Castiel, T., Séquences (Montreal), March 1993.

Strauss, F., and others, "Cyril Collard—un art neuf" in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1993.

Lipman, A., Sight and Sound (London), June 1993.

Burston, P., "The Loving End" in Time Out (London), 9 June 1993.

Cheshire, G., "Self-Expressions" in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1994.

Tanner, Louise, "Who's in Town," in Films in Review (New York), vol. 45, no. 1-2, January-February 1994.

Travers, P., "Savage Nights," in Rolling Stone, no. 675, 10 February 1994.

Powers, J., "Anything for Love," in New Yorker, vol. 27, 7 March 1994.

Nash, Mark, "Chronicle(s) of a Death Foretold: Notes Apropos of Les Nuits Fauves," in The Critical Quarterly (Hull), vol. 36, no. 1, Spring 1994.

Alleva, R., "Love in the Ruins," in Commonweal, vol. 121, 3 June 1994.

Feinstein, Howard, "Savage Nights," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 4, 1994.

Sluhovskiy, M., "Philadelphia; An Early Frost; Our Sons; Silvertake Life; The View from Here; Savage Nights," in American Historical Review, vol. 99, no. 4, 1994.

Oleksiewicz, M., "Sweet Cyril?" in Kino (Warsaw), vol. 29, May 1995.

Worth, F.A., "Le sacre et le SIDA (AIDS): Sexuality and Its Contradictions in France 1971-1996," in Discourse (Detroit), vol. 19, no. 3, Spring 1997.

* * *

Oscillating abruptly between a brash, visceral dramatic style, and a quieter, more lyrical mode, Cyril Collard's Les Nuits fauves is distinguished precisely by its bold eclecticism. Most obviously, it is a film that strategically dispenses with generic consistency, mixing melodramatic, often violent (and occasionally turgid) emotional excess with muted art cinema introspection. This narrative heterogeneity is further extended into the film's overall stylistic design, which skillfully combines quasi-documentary, cinéma vérité techniques and their conventional effect of energetic spontaneity, with an intricate and meticulously orchestrated mise-en-scène. By way of this unique narrative and stylistic quilting, the film exploits the dynamic possibilities of juxtaposition to the full, almost revelling in the power and raw exhilaration of contrasting and clashing character events, emotions and styles. Thus, it succeeds in traversing a wide range of emotions and behaviors, from the hectic and volatile dimension of the lives of the main characters, instantiated in the liberal use of vérité devices such as a shaky, hand-held camera and fast-paced editing, to the more subtle and often enigmatic interactions between them. For example, the erotically charged first meeting between the central protagonist Jean and his girlfriend Laura stitches together the excitement of a free-wheeling camera with a carefully organized and reflective exchange of looks and words, played out through and around the viewfinder of Jean's video camcorder.

However, this calculated patchwork of styles and modes ultimately has a more important rationale. For Les Nuits fauves is ostensibly a film about a young man who discovers he is HIV positive. Yet it is also, deliberately, about a lot more besides, and it is the film's above mentioned eclecticism that enables it to refuse any easy identification or comfortable "AIDS film" label, a difficulty that was remarked upon by a number of both hostile and sympathetic reviewers on the film's release.

The narrative centers on Jean, a professional photographer living in Paris, who discovers that he has contracted the HIV virus following his return from a job in Morocco. At first, he seemingly refuses to come to terms with the virus, becoming involved with Laura, a young actress whom he meets at an audition for a commercial he is working on. They have sex without any protection, she being unaware of his HIV status. Meanwhile, Jean also continues having clandestine gay encounters, as well as a sexual relationship with Samy, an aggressive and narcissistic young bodybuilder who becomes increasingly involved with a group of violent fascists. Laura is angry when Jean finally tells her he is HIV positive, yet her emotional attachment to him becomes more and more intense and they begin living together. She also becomes increasingly possessive of Jean and jealous of his relationship with Samy. Returning from a short vacation, Laura finds Samy and Jean living together, and she reacts furiously. Jean begins AZT treatment and goes to visit his parents. Having confided his illness in his mother who consoles him, he deliberately speeds home and crashes his car.

Jean decides to end his relationship with Laura, who is now obsessed with him to the point of self-destruction. Having gone to live with her mother, she descends further and further into hysteria, occupying her time by phoning Jean and screaming insults at him. Finally, having claimed that she herself has contracted the HIV virus, she is taken to a psychiatric hospital, where tests reveal that she does not have the virus. Meanwhile, Jean encounters Samy and his gang of fascists one night, torturing a young Arab boy in the street, and he uses his infected blood as a weapon to rescue the boy. When he sees Laura again, she has nearly fully recovered and has a new boyfriend. She now accepts that her relationship with Jean is over, and they say good-bye to each other. Refusing to settle down and wait for the gradual onset of his illness, Jean travels to the desert, where he seems to find happiness and tranquillity through a lyrical, expressionistic affirmation of his own existence and the life around him.

In spite of its use of melodrama and emotional hyperbole, Les Nuits fauves is refreshingly original in its rejection of the two standard narrative options—victimization and deification—typical of melodramas that use illness as their point of departure, both of which, incidentally, figure prominently in Jonathan Demme's film Philadelphia which also deals with HIV and AIDS. Jean, played by Collard himself, who has since died of AIDS, is neither "victim" nor "saint," but is instead a complex creature, at once reckless with himself and with others, often cruel and calculating, having unprotected sex, for instance, with an unwitting Laura, almost killing himself in his passion for driving fast, and so on. Yet, he is also brimming full of love both for the people around him and for his world, a love that translates into a consuming, sensuous hunger for physical pleasure, companionship, and excitement, as well as an abiding moral concern for life and "things living" in general. In a sense, the narrative of Les Nuits fauves is driven by Jean's attempt to make sense of his contradictory nature, to find a common ground on which the seemingly irreconcilable elements of his identity might be unified. And it is certainly the urgency brought on by the HIV virus itself that impels this search. Yet, much more importantly, the HIV virus also functions in Les Nuits fauves as the catalyst for a tentative answer for Jean. Having initially refused to face his HIV status, Jean's denial turns into a conscious affirmation of life itself and the drive to experience life to the full which he exemplifies. Without a doubt, this Romantic "answer" to Jean's search—his cathartic, rapturous immersion in life at the film's lyrical climax which is figured by fast, dizzying camera work and editing—may strike many as clichéd and unsatisfactory. However, it should be recognized that Collard has effectively attempted to reinvent this well-worn Romantic cliché by appropriating it for the contemporary context of HIV and AIDS, within which it assumes a very different valence. For ultimately, it transforms Les Nuits fauves into a film that is not simply about HIV and the way it takes away life, but rather about what happens to a life when HIV enters into it.

—Kris Percival

O SLAVNOSTI A HOSTECH

---

(A Report on the Party and the Guests)

Czechoslovakia, 1968

Director: Jan Němec

Production: Barrandov Film Studio for Československý Film; black and white, 35mm; running time: 70 minutes. Released Czechoslovakia, 1968. Filmed 1966 in Czechoslovakia.

Producer: Carlo Ponti; screenplay: Ester Krumbachová and Jan Němec; photography: Jaromír Sofr; editor: Miroslav Hájek; sound: Jiří Pavlík; art director: Oldřich Bosák; music: Karel Mareš.

Cast: Ivan Vyskočil (Host); Jan Klusák (Rudolf); Jiří Němec (Josef); Zdena Skvorecká (Eva); Pavel Borek (František); Helena Pejšková (Marta); Karel Mareš (Karel); Jana Pracharová (Wife); Evald Schorm (Husband).

Publications

Books:

Whyte, Alistair, New Cinema in Eastern Europe, New York, 1971.
Liehm, Antonín, Closely Watched Films, New York, 1974.
Liehm, Mira, and Antonín, The Most Important Art: East European Film After 1945, Berkeley, 1977.
Habova, Milada, and Jitka Vysekalova, editors, Czechoslovak Cinema, Prague, 1982.
Hames, Peter, The Czechoslovak New Wave, Berkeley 1985.

Articles:

Green, Calvin, in Film Society Review (New York), October 1968.
“Jan Němec: Filmography,” in International Film Guide, London, 1968.
Gow, Gordon, in Films and Filming (London), March 1969.
Amengual, Barthélemy, “Allegorie et Stalinisme dans quelques films de l’est,” in Positif (Paris), January 1973.
Revue du Cinéma (Paris), no. 481, April 1992.

* * *

O Slavnosti a hostech is the best-known and most respected of the feature films directed by Jan Němec in Czechoslovakia. The film is his second feature and was co-scripted by Ester Krumbachová, his wife at that time.

The work is a thinly veiled critique of the Communist regime and a parable on authoritative oppression and the nature of conformity. Although the movie was completed in 1966, it was not exhibited in Czechoslovakia until 1968, following a two-year struggle supported by many of the country’s leading intellectuals to have it shown. Its subsequent appearance in the 1968 New York Film Festival brought Němec to world attention.

The plot begins as a group of ordinary men and women frolic in the countryside, enjoying an afternoon picnic. Suddenly several men appear from behind the trees. Despite their smiles, the men forcefully direct the group to a clearing. A leader appears and takes up a position of authority behind a small table. He sets forth the rules by which the group will be governed and their movements confined. The women comply readily; the men make attempts to protest, but in the end acquiesce as well. Tension and incipient violence hang in the air when suddenly an older man appears, apologetic for the stridency of his hirelings, particularly the leader whom he refers to as his adopted son, Rudolph. He invites the group to a birthday celebration in the forest.

Among the trees which line the lake, banquet tables have been set with elaborate dishes and candelabras. The host speaks about the small differences in shape and design which distinguish the tables, but proudly points out how all fit together into one distinguishable whole. The host is openly paternalistic and all present toast his benevolence. The harmony is interrupted when one woman discovers she is sitting at the wrong place. Her desire to move sets a chain reaction which disturbs the entire group, much to the dismay of the host. More urgent is the discovery that one of the guests has disappeared. Finding his departure intolerable, the host instructs Rudolph to bring him back. Delighted with this opportunity, Rudolph leaves with a sharp-toothed dog and is joined in the chase by the entire party. The tables are abandoned and the film closes with the sound of the barking dog.

O Slavnosti a hostech deals with the themes common to all of Němec’s films, although they are the best developed here. Most prominent are the restriction on human freedom, the reactions of human beings under stress, and the ease with which man utilizes violence. In O Slavnosti a hostech, however, Němec goes a step further and treats the degree to which men are complicit in their own fate. Like his other works, the film possesses a surreal quality, especially in its presentation of extraordinary occurrences in a realistic manner, such as the fairy tale-like outdoor court scene and the elaborate banquet.

The film was critically praised and Němec was considered among the front ranks of the new Czech directors. His sensibility was compared to that of Franz Kafka, his compatriot, and Feodor Dostoevski.

However, following the fall of the short-lived Dubcek government which allowed for artistic freedom in Czechoslovakia, Němec was blacklisted and unable to make films after 1968. More than his other two features, O Slavnosti a hostech was seen as a direct attack on Eastern European Communism and was responsible for his being barred from directing.

—Patricia Erens

OBCHOD NA KORZE

(The Shop on Main Street)

Czechoslovakia, 1965

Directors: Ján Kadár and Elmar Klos

Production: Barrandov Film Studio for Československý Film; black and white, 35mm; running time: 128 minutes; length: 3428 meters. Released Czechoslovakia, 1965. Filmed 1964 Barrandov Film Studio; location scenes filmed in Sabinov, Czechoslovakia.

Producers: Marie Desmarais and Eurofilm Ltd.; head of production: Ladislav Hanuš; screenplay: Ladislav Grosman, Ján Kadár, and Elmar Klos, from the book Obchod na korze by Ladislav Grosman; English sub-titles: Lindsay Anderson; photography: Vladimír Novotný; editors: Jaromír Janáček and Diana Heringová; sound: Dobrosław Srámek; art director: Karel Skvor; music: Zdeněk Liška; costume designer: Marie Rosenfelderová.

Cast: Jozef Króner (Tono Brtko); Ida Kamińska (Rozálie Lautmannová); Hana Slivková (Evelyna Brtková); František Zvarík (Markus Kolkocká); Elena Zvaríková (Ružena Kolkocká); Martin Hollý (Imro Kuchar); Martin Gregor (Katz, the barber); Adam Matejka (Piti Báči); Mikuláš Ladižinský (Marian Peter); Eugen Senaj (Blau, the Printer); František Papp (Andorić); Gita Mišurová (Andoričová).

Awards: Oscar for Best Foreign Film, 1965; New York Film Critics Award, Best Foreign Film, 1966.

Publications

Books:

Boček, Jaroslav, Modern Czechoslovak Film 1945–1965, Prague, 1965.
 Hibbin, Nina, Eastern Europe: An Illustrated Guide, New York, 1970.
 Whyte, Alistair, New Cinema in Eastern Europe, New York, 1971.
 Liehm, Antonín, Closely Watched Films, New York, 1974.
 Liehm, Mira, and Antonín Liehm, The Most Important Art: East European Film After 1945, Berkeley, 1977.
 Jan Kadar: Study Guide: The American Film Institute, Washington, D.C., 1979.
 Habova, Milada, and Jitka Vysekalova, editors, Czechoslovak Cinema, Prague, 1982.
 Hames, Peter, The Czechoslovak New Wave, Berkeley, 1985.

Articles:

Cowie, Peter, in Films and Filming (London), June and August 1965.
 “Director,” in New Yorker, 12 February 1966.

Wharton, Flavia, in Films in Review (New York), March 1966.
 Sarris, Andrew, in Village Voice (New York), 10 March 1966.
 Seelye, John, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1966.
 Cohen, Jules, “Elmar Klos and Ján Kadár,” in Film Comment (New York), Fall and Winter 1967.
 Livingston, Howard, in Film Society Review (New York), December 1967.
 Bond, Kirk, “The New Czech Film,” in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1968.
 “Czechs in Exile,” in Newsweek (New York), 27 July 1970.
 “The Czech Who Bounced Back,” in Films Illustrated (London), April 1972.
 Liehm, Antonín, “En för alla . . .,” in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 14, no. 1, 1972.
 Haller, R. A., “Interview with Ján Kadár,” in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1973.
 Obituary of Kadár, in New York Times, 4 June 1979.
 Moret, H., obituary of Kadár, in Ecran (Paris), 15 July 1979.
 Gervais, G., obituary of Kadár, in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), July–August 1979.
 “The Shop on Main Street,” in Reid’s Film Index (Wyong), no. 6, 1991.
 Saperstein, J., “‘All Men Are Jews’: Tragic Transcendence in Kadár’s The Shop on Main Street,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 4, 1991.

* * *

In the mid-1960s, young, creative artists appeared on the Czech film scene with fresh film and projected a new conception of the present and the past in a new way. The Shop on Main Street, however, was made by Ján Kadár and Elmar Klos in the tradition of classical film, without any particular formal innovations such as complicated dramatic structure or impressive camera work, and even without any visible influence of the international trends of those days such as cinema verité or the French New Wave. The modernity of The Shop on Main Street was not based on any technical characteristics but on its content—on another way of viewing the reality of the Second World War. After a series of movies about the occupation years of 1939–1945, narrating or describing this period in a linear and uniform way, opposing heroism and cowardice, The Shop on Main Street concentrates instead on profoundly penetrating the thoughts and feelings of people who lived at that time and experienced a fear which broke their will to resist and led them to criminal acts. It asks the question whether a human being has the right to build his happiness and personal security on the misfortune of others, and answers that question with a story of someone who committed a crime because he did not have the strength to resist evil.

The locale of the story is a typical small town in the so-called Slovak State (established by secession of Slovakia from the Czechoslovak Republic at the beginning of the Second World War), where the citizens gradually come under the disintegrative influence of the new order organized by the government under the protection of the expanding German empire. Seemingly—at least in the beginning—this influence manifests itself in comical and provincial ways. However, behind all this funny business is a tragic reality—the Jewish residents of the town will be deported to concentration camps and face death. In this situation the moral conflict unfolds, the conflict of the main protagonist whom the viewer meets at the moment when the new society distributes power, rank and wealth. This fellow acquires a portion of the loot and although it is very negligible and almost worthless, still it signifies the first step toward a compromise which, in the end, logically leads him to crime. At the beginning of the story, he is scarcely distinguishable from his victim. Both of them—he a common little businessman, she an aging owner of a small store and a Jewess—used to accept the same moral code and honor the same rules of living. Their collision does not take place at the intellectual level but rather in the deeper layers of life. Its roots are really misunderstanding and misinterpretation of one's own actions and also of the actions of others. The old lady does not comprehend anything taking place before her eyes, anything of what looms ahead. The carpenter Brtko does not understand the senselessness and criminality of his compromise. They both pay for it by their death.

The film is made with an unusual sensitivity toward the need to alternate bearable doses of the tragicomic with fully tragic elements and situations. It has outstanding editing and music, and shows a fine sense for detail. The acting performances of the Slovak actor Jozef Kroner and the Polish actress Ida Kaminska mesh beautifully, and the picture was honored by a number of prizes.

—B. Urgošková

OCTOBER

See OKTIABR

ODD MAN OUT

UK, 1947

Director: Carol Reed

Production: Two Cities Films; black and white; running time: 116 minutes; length: 10,488 feet. Released 23 April 1947.

Producer: Carol Reed; screenplay: F. L. Green and R. C. Sherriff, from the novel by Green; photography: Robert Krasker; editor: Fergus McDonnell; art director: Ralph Brinton; music: William Alwyn.

Cast: James Mason (Johnny); Robert Newton (Luke); Robert Beatty (Dennis); F. J. McCormick (Shell); Fay Compton (Rosie); Beryl Measor (Maudie); Cyril Cusack (Pat); Dan O'Herlihy (Nolan); Roy Irving (Murphy); Maureen Delany (Theresa); Kitty Kirwan (Granny); Min Milligan (House-keeper); Joseph Tomelty (Cabby); W. G. Fay (Father Tom); Arthur Hambling (Alfie); Kathleen Ryan (Kathleen); Denis O'Dea (Head Constable); William Hartnell (Fencie); Elwyn Brook-Jones (Tober).

Awards: BFA Award for Best Film, 1947.

Publications

Script:

Green, F. L. and R. C. Sherriff, Odd Man Out, in Three British Screenplays, edited by Roger Manvell, London, 1950.

Books:

- Manvell, Roger, The Film and the Public, London, 1955.
 Phillips, Gene D., The Movie Makers: Artists in an Industry, Chicago, 1973.
 DeFelice, James, Filmguide to Odd Man Out, Bloomington, Indiana, 1975.
 Hirschhorn, Clive, The Films of James Mason, London, 1975.
 Armes, Roy, A Critical History of the British Cinema, London, 1978.
 Mason, James, Before I Forget, London, 1981.
 Hill, John, Kevin Rockett, and Luke Gibbons, Cinema and Ireland, London, 1987.
 Moss, Robert, The Films of Carol Reed, New York, 1987.
 Wapshott, Nicholas, Carol Reed: A Biography, New York, 1997.

Articles:

- Monthly Film Bulletin* (London), vol. 14, no. 160, 1947.
 Polonsky, Abraham, in Hollywood Quarterly, January 1947.
 Winnington, Richard, in News Chronicle (London), 1 February 1947.
 Lejeune, C. A., in Observer (London), 2 February 1947.
 Powell, Dilys, in Sunday Times (London), 2 February 1947.
 Wright, Basil, in Spectator (London), 7 February 1947.
 Whitebait, William, in New Statesman (London), 8 February 1947.
Variety (New York), 12 February 1947.
Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1947.
New York Times, 24 April 1947.
Documentary Newsletter (London), April-May 1947.
 Goodman, E., "Carol Reed" in Theatre Arts (New York), May 1947.
 Wright, Basil, "The Director: Carol Reed," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1951.
Image et Son (Paris), October 1954.
 Sarris, Andrew, "Carol Reed in the Context of his Time," in Film Culture (New York), no. 10, 1956, and no. 11, 1957.
 Sarris, Andrew, "First of the Realists," in Films and Filming (London), September, 1957.
 "Carol Reed," in Encountering Directors, by Charles Thomas Samuels, New York, 1972.
 Voight, M., "Pictures of Innocence: Sir Carol Reed," in Focus on Film (London), Spring 1974.
 "James Mason," in Films in Review (New York), May 1982.
 Phillips, Gene D., "Carol Reed," in Films in Review (New York), August-September 1982.
 Interview with James Mason in Cinéma (Paris), September 1984.
 Combs, Richard, in Listener, 5 June 1986.
 Polanski, Roman, "Odd Man Out," in Positif (Paris), no. 400, June 1994.
 Thomson, David, "Reeds and Trees," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 30, no. 4, July 1994.
 Christie, Ian, Leslie Felperin, and Nick Roddick, "Film Criticism: Odd Man Out by Dai Vaughan," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 5, no. 11, November 1995.
 Howard, T., in Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 15, 1995.

* * *

Odd Man Out was Carol Reed's first postwar feature and the first of a quartet of films, including The Fallen Idol, The Third Man, and Outcast of the Islands, which were to mark the highpoint of a lengthy film-making career. Based on F. L. Green's novel of the same name, the film was partly shot in Belfast with a predominantly Irish cast, including many Abbey Theatre regulars. Robert Krasker, the cameraman on Brief Encounter, was responsible for the film's striking photography, and William Alwyn contributed a memorable musical score, incorporating individual leitmotifs for three of the central characters. On its release, the film was met by almost unanimous praise ("the best film that has ever been made in Britain" according to the Daily Express) and received the British Film Academy's award for the Best British Motion Picture of 1947.

Odd Man Out

Unlike much of the British cinema's wartime output, the film has little truck with social realism. Formally, the film is heavily indebted to both German Expressionism and French poetic realism—indeed, its ending is practically a copy of Julien Duvivier's Pépé le Moko (1936)—and has much in common with its similarly stylised postwar US counterpart, the film noir. This is evident in the film's approach to both plot and visual presentation. Like classical tragedy, the film's story is concerned with the irreversible consequences of an initial error. Johnny McQueen (James Mason) is shot following an ill-advised, and armed, mill robbery and is left to wander the city at night. Despite the efforts of others to save him, his fate is already sealed and, in a moving climax, Johnny meets his death in the arms of the woman he loves, while his last remaining hope of escape, the ship, is seen to sail off without him.

This aura of doom is reinforced by the film's iconography (the recurring appearance of the Albert Clock, the deteriorating weather) as well as its distinctive visual style. As in film noir, both lighting and composition are used to striking effect. Lighting is predominantly low-key, creating strong chiaroscuro contrasts and vivid patterns of light and shadow. Compositions tend to be imbalanced and claustrophobic, with characters either cramped into enclosed interiors (as at Granny's) or rendered small by their surrounding environment (as in many of the night scenes). The use of a tilted camera (almost a Reed trademark), acute angles, and wide-angle lenses adds to these effects, especially in the chase sequences involving Dennis (Robert Beatty) as he races down long and imprisoning alley-ways or clambers his way through a maze of scaffolding. While such scenes as these, with their imaginative combination of real locations and expressive visual design, have retained an air of freshness, the film's resort to full-blooded expressionism in its subjective sequences has worn less well. Although much admired at the time, the attempts to visualize Johnny's hallucinations by superimposing faces onto beer bubbles or by putting paintings into flight now seem simply belaboured (and, no doubt, represent the type of device which led Andrew Sarris to include Reed, somewhat unkindly, in his category of "less than meets the eye").

Debate over the merit of Reed's technique, however, has also tended to discourage too close an inspection of the meanings which the film projects (although the documentarist Edgar Anstey did attack the film at the time of its release for apparently importing French existentialism). For while the film's opening title disclaims any specific connection to the conflicts in Northern Ireland and the film itself studiously avoids referring to either Belfast or the IRA by name, it is also quite clear from the film that it is dealing with a recognisable setting and situation. Indeed, critics have, at various times, praised the film for both its distinctive Irish flavour and the enduring relevance of one of its apparent messages (the futility of violence). What the film does, in this respect, is not so much dispense with local details as deprive them of their social and political dimension. For, by employing the conventions of expressionism, and introducing an element of religious allegory, the film's interpretation of events is inevitably metaphysical rather than social. It is not history and politics which can explain the characters' motivations and actions, only an inexorable fate or destiny. In doing so, it also reinforces a view of the Northern Ireland situation as fundamentally irrational. As Tom Nairn has noted (in The Break-up of Britain), it has become quite common to account for the "troubles" in terms of what he labels "the myth of atavism." It is only "a special historical curse, a luckless and predetermined fate," he observes, "which can account for the war." And it is this viewpoint which is effectively reinforced by Odd Man Out. For Johnny too is "cursed," by virtue of his adoption of violence, and becomes, in his turn, the victim of an apparently "luckless and predetermined fate."

—John Hill

L'ODEUR DE LA PAPAYE VERTE

(Mui Du Du Xanh; The Scent of Green Papaya)

France, 1993

Director: Tran Anh Hung

Production: Les Productions Lazannek, Paris, in co-production with LA SFP Cinéma, La Sept Cinéma, Canal Plus, Centre Nationale de la Cinématographie; colour, 35mm; running time: 104 minutes. Filmed entirely on two sound stages outside Paris, at the studios of Société Française de Production.

Producer: Christophe Rossignon; screenplay: Tran Anh Hung; photography: Benoit Delhomme; editor: Nicole Dedieu, Jean-Pierre Roques; assistant director: Nicolas Cambois; music: Tiet Ton-That; sound recording: Michel Guiffan; costumes: Jean-Phillipe Abril.

Cast: Tran Nu Yên-Khê (Mui, age 20); Lu Man San (Mui, age 10); Truong Thi Loc (Mother); Nguyen Anh Hoa (Old Thi); Vuong Hoa Hoi (Khuyen); Ngoc Trung Tran (Father); Vantha Talisman (Thu); Keo Souvannavong (Trung).

Publications

Articles:

Elley, D., Variety (New York), 7 June 1993.

Jeancolas, J.P., "Un vietnam mental," in Positif (Paris), July-August 1993.

Kauffman, Stanley, The New Republic (New York), 28 February 1994.

Corliss, Richard, Time (New York), 7 March 1994.

Johnson, Brian D., Macleans, 21 March 1994.

Romney, Jonathan, New Statesman and Society, 25 March 1994.

Rayns, Tony, Sight and Sound (London), April 1994.

Cross, A., "Portraying the Rythm of the Vietnamese Soul," in Cineaste (New York), 1994.

Kissin, E.H., Films in Review (New York), 3/4, 1994.

Dinh, T., "The Scent of Green Papaya: Ambiguity in the Vietnam Essence," in Amerasia Journal, vol. 20, no. 3, 1994.

L'odeur de la papaye verte

Cheng, Scarlet, Cinemaya (New Delhi), Summer 1994.
 Dick, Jeff T., "Fast Scans: Foreign and Indie Films," in Library Journal (New York), vol. 123, no. 7, 15 April 1998.
 Winters, Laura, "A Risk-Taking Perfectionist behind the Camera," in New York Times, 5 December 1999.

* * *

In a lushly visual and lyrical style, L'odeur de la papaye verte (The Scent of Green Papaya) tells the story of Mui, a 12-year-old servant girl (Lu Man San) who comes to work in a well-to-do Saigon household in the 1950s. The gentle, modest child accepts her fate and dutifully learns her tasks, even while being taunted by the younger son. But young French Vietnamese filmmaker Tran Anh Hung, who directed from his own script, makes clear that Mui is not a mere drudge. With her lively, inquisitive eyes and her sense of wonder at the limited world around her, Lu projects sensitivity and scope.

But all is not well in the seemingly tranquil household. Although the mother, played with great dignity and grace by Troung Thi Loc, tries bravely to hold the family together, earning their income by running a fabric shop adjoining the house, her profligate husband is usually absent. He returns now and then only to make off with the savings. The two sons feel the tension, with the younger one acting out his frustrations on Mui. "I didn't want to do a documentary-style film about Vietnam," the director says, "but I wanted to show a mental landscape. I wanted to create film based on the life experience of my mother. There's a certain gentleness I wanted to recreate. I wanted to show how the servitude of women transforms itself into a form of self-sacrifice."

Ten years later, the family falls on hard times. The mistress tearfully sends Mui (now played by Tran Nu Yên-Khê) away to look after Khuyen (Vuong Hoa Hoi), a dashing young music composer recently back from his European studies. He is engaged to an equally Westernized young Vietnamese woman, but with her mercurial temper, her wild laugh, and her stiletto pumps, perhaps she is too challenging for him, too free. He finds his attention diverting more and more to the sweetly innocent and more traditionally feminine Mui.

Tran cautions against seeing the film as a mere fairy tale, where the East triumphs over the West. For him, the ending is far more ambiguous and unsettling than that. "There's a moment that is at once the most terrible and the most beautiful in a woman's life," he noted.

“It’s that moment when she falls in love and servitude becomes a pleasure. Love delivers woman from servitude, but at the same time reinforces servitude.”

Much of the film’s power derives from its visual expressiveness. Cinematographer Benoit Delhomme captures long and loving takes of the faces of characters (all wonderfully cast), of the open architecture of the traditional-style Vietnamese domicile, of the lush green foliage and the insects abounding in the garden. There is a fascination with food and food preparation—done in a minimal outdoor kitchen, with the old housekeeper (Nguyen Anh Hoa) teaching Mui how to cook and Mui watching intently, from the time she comes to the household as a young girl to the time she begins to become a woman.

We are treated to a scene of how the famous Vietnamese green papaya salad is made—the fruit is peeled, the tender meat is hacked, then sliced off into julienned strips. The scene ends with Mui cutting the remaining fruit in half and coming upon, with wonderment and delight, the pearly black seeds nestled within the center. As she presses her small finger into the nest of seeds to touch them, to stir them, the scene becomes sensual. And indeed, the air of this film is dense with sweet sensuality, both repressed and softly expressed. While dialogue is sparse, even terse, the storytelling is nevertheless superb, with Tran, who wrote the script, showing sympathetic insight into all the characters.

Tran Ang Hung left Vietnam at age 11 with his family in 1975, just before the fall of Saigon to Communist forces. Resettling in France, he eventually went on to study film at the Ecole Louis Lumière, but he deliberately failed to get his diploma. “If I had graduated,” he explains, “I would have been tempted to go into television, where I could have made a lot of money. Instead, I went to work in a bookstore for a living and ended up writing five scripts.”

While at the school, Tran made two short films, La femme mariée de Nam Xuong and La Pierre de l’Attente, which were based on Vietnamese folk tales. With the collaboration of Christophe Rossignon, who found the money, Tran was able to make The Scent of Green Papaya, his first feature. At first they went to Vietnam to make the film but were stopped by the rainy season. Later a co-production offer from Société Française de Production persuaded them to shoot in France, so in fact the film was shot in its entirety on two studios outside Paris.

To ensure authenticity, they gathered old photographs of Vietnamese households and village streets and carefully researched the plants and insects of the region. Tran called upon family members to help out—his mother made all the food seen in the film, his father, a tailor, made all the costumes—and, last but not least, Tran’s wife played the key part of the older Mui. In fact, all the roles were filled by amateurs found in a wide-ranging talent search throughout France. The one exception was Nguyen Anh Hoa, a professional actress who played the older servant and was found in Vietnam.

In 1993 The Scent of Green Papaya proved another unexpected hit for Asian filmmakers. At the Cannes Film Festival, the film was selected for the Un Certain Regard program, then won the prestigious Camera d’Or for best feature by a first-time director. Later Tran picked up the French film industry’s Cesar award for the same category. In 1994 the film garnered a best foreign language film nomination from the American Academy Awards, along with Chen Kaige’s Farewell My Concubine and Ang Lee’s Wedding Banquet. None of the Asian films took home the prize, but Tran says with great ease, “I was happy to be nominated. I was happy to have a chance to go to the awards ceremony and meet others in the field.” The film has been released widely in Europe, in nearly 60 U.S. cities, and in many Asian countries. In 1994 it was also featured at both the Hong Kong International Film Festival and the Singapore International Film Festival.

Having been raised in two different cultures, Tran certainly realizes that he is caught between East and West, rather like the composer in his film. “It’s complicated—I couldn’t say everything in the film [Green Papaya]. Of course, there are certain contradictions in myself . . . But it’s not disagreeable—it’s rather interesting actually.”

—Scarlet Cheng

OFFRET

(The Sacrifice)

Sweden-France, 1986

Director: Andrei Tarkovsky

Production: Swedish Film Institute (Stockholm)/Argos Films (Paris), in association with Film Four International, Josephson and Nykvist, Sveriges Television/SVT 2, and Sandrew Film and Teater, with the participation of the French Ministry of Culture; Eastmancolor, part in black and white; running time: 149 minutes; length: 13,374 feet. Released 1986.

Executive producer: Anna-Lena Wilbom; producer: Katinka Farago; screenplay: Andrei Tarkovsky; assistant directors: Kerstin Eriksdotter, Michel Leszczylowski; photography: Sven Nykvist; camera operators: Lasse Karlsson, Dan Myhrman; editors: Andrei Tarkovsky, Michel Leszczylowski; editorial consultant: Henri Colpi; sound recordists: Owe Svensson, Bosse Persson, Lars Ulander, Christin Loman, Wikee Peterson-Berger; art director: Anna Asp; music: The St. Matthew Passion by J. S. Bach.

Cast: Erland Josephson (Alexander); Susan Fleetwood (Adelaide); Valérie Mairesse (Julia); Allan Edwall (Otto); Gudrún Gísladóttir (Maria); Sven Wollter (Victor); Filippa Franzen (Marta); Tommy Kjellqvist (Little Man); Per Kallman and Tommy Nordahl (Ambulancemen).

Award: BAFTA Award for Best Foreign Language Film, 1987.

Publications

Books:

Tarkovsky, Andrei, Sculpting in Time: Reflections on the Cinema, London, 1986.

Borin, Fabrizio, Andrei Tarkovskij, Venice, 1987.

Jacobsen, Wolfgang, and others, Andrei Tarkovskij, Munich, 1987.

LeFanu, Mark, The Cinema of Andrei Tarkovsky, London, 1987.

Gauthier, Guy, Andrei Tarkovski, Paris, 1988.

- Borin, Fabrizio, Cinema di Andrej Tarkovskij, Rome, 1989.
- Turovskaja, Maïia Iosifovna, Tarkovsky: Cinema as Poetry, translated by Natasha Ward, London, 1989.
- Green, William, "Video: The Sacrifice (Offret) Directed by Andrei Tarkovsky," in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 1, no. 12, April 1992.
- Johnson, Vida T., and Graham Petrie, The Films of Andrei Tarkovsky: A Visual Fugue, Bloomington, 1994.
- Kovács, András Bálint, Tarkovszkij: az orosz film Sztalkere, Budapest, 1997.
- Tarkovski, Larissa, Andrei Tarkovski, with Luba Jurgenson, Paris, 1998.

Articles:

- Benayoun, Robert, and others, in Postif (Paris), May and June 1986.
- Variety* (New York), 14 May 1986.
- Chaplin* (Stockholm), June 1986.
- Magny, Joel, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1986.
- Bonitzer, P., and M. Chion, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1986.
- LeFanu, Mark, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1986.
- Taylor, John Russell, in Films and Filming (London), September 1986.
- Strick, Philip, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), January 1987.
- Filmfaust* (Frankfurt), January-February 1987.
- Christie, Ian, "Raising the Shroud," in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1987.
- Green, Peter, "Apocalypse and Sacrifice," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1987.
- Alexander, John, "Tarkovsky's Last Vision," in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), May 1987.
- de Brant, C.-H., "Krasota slaset mir. . .," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 2, 1989.
- Lothwall, L.-O., "Kazhdyi den' s Tarkovskim," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 2, 1989.
- Lovgren, H., "Svart pa fragan ar livet sjalvt," in Chaplin (Stockholm), no. 3, 1990.
- Iensen, T., and A. German, "Vysokaia prostota," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 6, 1990.
- Iensen, T., and I. Norshtein, "Ognennoe iskushenie," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 6, 1990.
- Gauthier, G., "Andrei Tarkovski et la tentation de l'Occident," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), July 1990.
- Livingston, J., "New Rage," in Village Voice 36 (New York), Literary Supplement, no. 99, 8 October 1991.
- Levgren, K., "Leonardo da Vinchi i Zhertvoprinoshenie," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 6, 1992.
- Aleksandr, L., "Tarkowski," in Kino (Warsaw), October 1992.
- Crowdus, Gary, "Two by Tarkowski," in Cineaste (New York), vol. 20, no. 4, 1994.
- Paquette, J.-M., "Tarkovski: Cineaste Cynique," in Cinemas (Montreal), vol. 4, no. 3, 1994.
- "Le Sacrifice," in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 181, November-December 1995.
- Wiese, I., "Andrej Tarkovskij," in Z Filmtidsskrift, no. 1, 1996.
- Beasley-Murray, J., "Whatever Happened to Neorealism?: Bazin, Deleuze, and Tarkovsky's Long Take," in Iris (Iowa City), no. 23, Spring 1997.

* * *

There is a documentary featuring Tarkovsky at work on his last film. Made by The Sacrifice's editor, Michel Leszczykowski, and entitled simply Directed by Andrei Tarkovsky, it provides a revealing insight into the Russian's methods. One episode in particular captures Tarkovsky's attitude toward his craft. The final shot of The Sacrifice lasts ten minutes and depicts the protagonist of the film burning down the house round which most of the action has centred. This is a typically complex Tarkovsky "take," involving elaborate camera movement and pulling together all the discrete strands of the narrative. As Leszczykowski shows, disaster struck. Although the house burnt down to the ground in a very satisfactory manner, and although the cast followed Tarkovsky's choreography to perfection, there was no footage to record the event; Sven Nykvist's camera had jammed at the crucial moment. Tarkovsky was distraught, claiming that The Sacrifice would be worthless without this image. He absolutely refused to compromise. He was not going to edit or to use trick photography or to alter the script; he wanted the shot in its entirety. Somehow, despite sub-zero temperatures, despite the hiccup this would cause in the schedule and in the budget, he managed to persuade backers, cast, and crew to rebuild the house. As soon as the house was rebuilt, it was promptly burnt down again. This time Nykvist's camera did not jam. A perfectionist with a highly personal view of the film he wanted to make, Tarkovsky would let nothing stand in his way. His skill was in convincing others that his idiosyncratic vision was their own.

Given the fact that The Sacrifice is a meditation on death and destruction, and considering that its maker succumbed to cancer shortly after its completion, it is hard not to see the film as Tarkovsky's last testament. The mood and tempo are certainly elegaic. In over two hours, there are only 120 cuts. (Tarkovsky was opposed to "montage cinema," believing that it constrained spectators, preventing them from bringing their own personal experiences or interpretation to bear on any given set of images: montage did the spectators' work for them.) The Sacrifice is a difficult film to watch. If cinema for Tarkovsky is "sculpting in time"—his favourite analogy—then, to see his sculptures, spectators must commit themselves for the duration: they must sacrifice their own time. Tarkovsky is keen to let us know that cinema is no mere popular cultural form. In his hands, it is "high art." (Just so we're aware of the fact, we see the opening credits over a Leonardo painting as we listen to Bach on the soundtrack.) Why did Tarkovsky make The Sacrifice? As he explains in his programme notes, we are living in a spiritually impoverished era: we are slaves to materialism. We need to find our souls. (For soul finding, as Strindberg, Ibsen, and Bergman have shown us, Scandinavia is the only place. The Sacrifice was shot in Sweden and financed by the Swedish Film Institute.)

Something Tarkovsky's hagiographers, of whom there are many, fail to notice is that his films are made not with "spirituality" or with "devotion" or with "inscrutable poetic instinct." Like most other films—with the possible exception of some of Stan Brakhage's work—they are made with cameras. From the laudatory reviews and fawning interviews that so often accompanied Tarkovsky, one gets the impression that his films came into being already perfectly formed; that they were divinely conceived. Tarkovsky did little to disabuse us of the idea. Critics he held in some contempt, and he demanded that we react to his films intuitively, with feeling and not with intellect. Children and animals always understand his films.

The Sacrifice has a quirky narrative structure. An old actor and writer, Alexander (Erland Josephson), is celebrating his birthday with his family at his secluded country house. He has spent the morning planting a tree with his son and discussing Nietzsche with the psychic postman. Jets fly overhead. Suddenly we learn that the world is liable to be blown up. Alexander makes the vow that he will live in isolation and silence if Armageddon can be avoided. The postman tells him that he can save the world by sleeping with his Icelandic, white-witch maid. Under the cover of darkness, he borrows the postman's bicycle and pays a visit to the maid. He threatens that he will commit suicide unless he is allowed to make love to her. She accedes to his wish, and the couple literally take off, hovering several feet above her bed. The next morning, he sets fire to the family house and is taken away in an ambulance.

Tarkovsky's Swedish landscape serves him well. At the beginning of the film, before there are any intimations of nuclear disaster, it seems pastoral, idyllic, a country retreat where a foolish, fond father can play with his son. But, with the possibility of destruction, the landscape itself becomes threatening: it is transformed into bare, denuded wasteland. (Mud, water, and fire are familiar motifs in all Tarkovsky's work.) Parallels with Bergman are obvious. The Swede dealt with a similar theme in Shame (1968) in which two concert musicians, Max Von Sydow and Liv Ullmann, are caught up in civil war. Alexander in The Sacrifice is not too far removed from the old doctor of Wild Strawberries (1957). Both are Prospero-like figures, half estranged from their families, confronted with death, ruminating over the past. The Sacrifice is photographed by the celebrated "master of light," Sven Nykvist, who has also worked extensively with Bergman. (Apparently, Nykvist initially had difficulties with Tarkovsky; he felt that the Russian, who was always first to operate the camera, and who dictated exactly what he wanted within the frame, was doing his job for him.) Whatever reservations one might have about its story and about Tarkovsky's homespun homilies on life and art (this is a wordy film: the soundtrack is largely composed of monologues) there can be no doubting its visual beauty. The long, lingering pans, the slow tracking shots, the use of natural light in the interior scenes, the black and white images of the devastated city, and, above all, the mise-en-scène, make the film a pleasure to watch. A characteristic Tarkovsky conceit is to make the movement of objects, the action in the external world, correspond to human emotion. To put it simply, every event, the planting of the tree, the burning of the house, the love making, are not straightforwardly physical, but are manifestations, visual metaphors of the characters' feelings. When the planes fly overhead, all the furniture in the house begins to quake. This seems plausible. A big cabinet is rattling. Noise vibration might cause this to happen. Out of the cabinet, in a gentle slow motion, a jar of milk falls, crashes on the floor, breaks into fragments. Why one is tempted to ask, is milk kept in a cabinet anyway? Wouldn't it be better off in the kitchen? Yet the image of the fracture of the jar encapsulates the burgeoning panic of every character.

The Scandinavian country house, familial discord, and 19th-century costume lend the film a theatrical, naturalistic air. Despite this, Tarkovsky is not overly concerned with formal realism. Events are not meant to make sense. They are supposed to have a dreamlike quality. If an ambulance arrives in the middle of nowhere without anybody having telephoned it, if lovers levitate, if the family home is burnt down for a bet, all is perfectly consistent. Were it not for the film's self-important gravity, if there were a little humour to lighten proceedings, we might be watching something surrealist, something akin to a film by Buñuel (whom Tarkovsky was known to admire) or to a canvas by Chagall. Characterization is weak. There is a squabbling family, with unfilial sons and daughters, potential Gonerils and Regans, and there is Alexander's neurotic wife, Adelaide. But Tarkovsky is not interested in familial relationships. The only perspective we are offered is that of Alexander. The psychic postman, whose bicycle seems to be the film's sole comic motif, the son, who is idealized, and the white-witch maid are not embroiled in the materialistic world: they help Alexander resolve this metaphysical anxieties. In the end, The Sacrifice is a solipscist's film; one man's redemption seems more important than the fact that a whole world has avoided calamity. It is perhaps instructive to note that, at the time of his death, Tarkovsky was working on a Hamlet script.

—G. C. Macnab

OKTIABR

(October; Ten Days That Shook the World)

USSR, 1928

Director: Sergei Eisenstein

Production: Sovkino; black and white, 35mm, silent; running time: 103 minutes; length: 2000–2200 meters, originally 3800 meters and then 2800 meters in the U.S.S.R. Released 20 January 1928. Re-released with musical soundtrack by Shostakovich, 1966, Paris. Filmed in spring 1927 in Leningrad.

Scenario: Sergei Eisenstein with Grigori Alexwithrov; from 10 Days That Shook the World by John Reed; associate director: Grigori Alexwithrov; photography: Edward Tisse; production designer: Vladimir Kovrighine; camera assistants: Vladimir Nilsin and Vladimir Popov.

Cast: V. Nikandrov (Lenin); N. Popov (Kerensky); Boris Lianov (Minister Tereshchenko); Chibisov (Minister Kishkin); Smelsky (Minister Verderevsky); N. Podvoisky (Bolshevik Podvoisky); Edward Tisse (A German).

Publications

Script:

Eisenstein, Sergei, Octobre, edited by Jacques Charriere, Paris, 1971; also in Eisenstein: 3 Films, edited by Jay Leyda, New York, 1974, and October and Alexander Nevsky, edited by Leyda, New York, 1984.

Books:

Rotha, Paul, John Grierson, and Ivor Montagu, Eisenstein, London 1948.

Seton, Marie, Eisenstein, London, 1957.

Leyda, Jay, Kino: A History of the Russian and Soviet Film, New York, 1960.

- Martin, Marcel, Panorama du cinéma soviétique, Brussels, 1960.
- Sergei Eisenstein: Künstler der Revolution, Berlin, 1960.
- Nizhny, Vladimir, Lessons with Eisenstein, London, 1962.
- Konlecher and Kubelka, editors, Serjei Michailowitsch Eisenstein, Vienna, 1964.
- Eisenstein, Sergei, Film Form and Film Sense, New York, 1965.
- Barna, Yon, Eisenstein, Bloomington, Indiana, 1973.
- Fernandez, Dominique, Eisenstein, Paris, 1975.
- Klinowski, Jacek, and Adam Garbicz, editors, Cinema, The Magic Vehicle: A Guide to its Achievement: Journey One: The Cinema Through 1949, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1975.
- Ropars-Wuilleumier, Marie-Claire, and others, Octobre: Ecriture et idéologie, Paris, 1976.
- Swallow, Norman, Eisenstein: A Documentary Portrait, New York, 1977.
- Aumont, Jacques, Montage Eisenstein, Paris, 1979; London, 1987.
- Ropars-Wuilleumier, Marie-Claire, and others, La Revolution figurée, Paris, 1979.
- Taylor, Richard, Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany, London, 1979.
- Leyda, Jay, and Zina Vignow, Eisenstein at Work, New York, 1982.
- Eisenstein, Sergei M., Immoral Memories: An Autobiography, Boston, 1983.
- Marshall, Herbert, Masters of the Soviet Cinema: Crippled Creative Biographies, London, 1983.
- Polan, Dana B., The Political Language of Film and the Avant-Garde, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1985.
- Eisenstein, Sergei M., Selected Works, Volume 1: Writings 1922–1934, edited by Richard Taylor, London, 1988.
- Bordwell, David, The Cinema of Eisenstein, Cambridge, 1993.
- Goodwin, James, Eisenstein, Cinema, & History, Champaign, 1993.
- Lovgren, Hakan, editor, Eisenstein's Labyrinth: Aspects of a Cinematic Synthesis of the Arts, Philadelphia, 1996.
- Taylor, Richard, editor, The Eisenstein Reader, Bloomington, 1998.
- Bergan, Ronald, Sergei Eisenstein: A Life in Conflict, New York, 1999.
- Articles:
- Hall, Mordaunt, in New York Times, 3 November 1928.
- Variety* (New York), 7 November 1928.
- Close Up* (London), December 1928.
- Barr, Alfred, Jr., "Sergei Michailovitch Eisenstein," in Arts (New York), December 1928.
- Grigs, Derick, and Guy Cote, in Sight and Sound (London), November-December, 1951.
- Lachize, Samuel, "Quand le souffle de l'histoire passe par le baroque cinématographique," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), October 1967.
- Macdonald, Dwight, "Eisenstein and Pudovkin in the 20s," and "Soviet Cinema, 1930–1940," in On Movies, New York, 1969.
- Durgnat, Raymond, in Films and Filming (London), March 1970.
- Brik, O. M., and V. B. Sklovskij, in Screen (London), Winter 1971–72.
- Argan, G. C., "Storia non come memoria ma presente a realtà in atto," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), January-February 1972.
- Simsolo, Noël, in Image et Son (Paris), March 1972.
- Lagny, M., Marie-Claire Ropars-Wuilleumier, and Pierre Sorlin, "Octobre: Quelle histoire?" in Image et Son (Paris), December 1976.
- Sperber, M., "Eisenstein's October," in Jump Cut (Berkeley), March 1977.
- Marie, M., "La Lettre et le cinématographe," in Image et Son (Paris), April 1977.
- Meisel, E., in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 5, 1977.
- Eisenstein, Sergei, "Das russische Volk filmt," in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), January 1978.
- Ropars-Wuilleumier, Marie-Claire, "The Function of Metaphor in Eisenstein's October," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Winter-Spring 1978.
- Berg, Charles, in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 14 February 1978.
- Goodwin, J., "Eisenstein: Ideology and Intellectual Cinema," in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (New York), Spring 1978.
- Ropars-Wuilleumier, Marie-Claire, "The Overture of October," in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Autumn 1978 and Spring 1979.
- Bukatman, S., "Battles with Songs: The Soviet Historical Film and Historical Document," in Persistence of Vision (Maspeth, New York), Summer 1986.
- Mayne, J., "Soviet Film Montage and the Woman Question," in Camera Obscura (Bloomington), no. 19, January 1989.
- Kenez, Peter, "Film Reviews: October (Oktiabr) Directed by Sergei Eisenstein," in The Russian Review (Columbus), vol. 50, no. 4, October 1991.
- Dufour, Dirk, "Revolutie? Zwierige wals tussen fictie en werkelijkheid," in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 427, December 1992.
- Sorensen, J., "Lef, Eisenstein, and the Politics of Form," in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 19, no. 2, 1994/1995.
- * * *
- In 1927 Sergei Eisenstein, along with V. I. Pudovkin and Esther Shub, was commissioned to make a film to contribute to the celebration commemorating the tenth anniversary of the 1917 Revolution. Eisenstein and Edward Tisse were called away from the production of The General Line to begin work on the anniversary project. The film that resulted, Oktiabr, was not the anticipated popular successor to Potemkin but instead a bold experiment in intellectual montage.
- Preparation for Oktiabr included research into newspaper reports, news photographs, newsreels, Esther Shub's footage taken in Petrograd during the revolution, and historical memoirs. An additional source was John Reed's Ten Days That Shook The World (the title used for the version of Oktiabr prepared for release abroad). The initial scenario covered the events leading up to the 1917 Revolution through post-Civil War reconstruction. Although the scope of the film was eventually narrowed, an abundance of information remains, which according to critics both in the Soviet Union and abroad was still too extensive. Much of the power of the film is lost because the viewer is faced with not only too much detail, but also with too large a vista—too large a vision to comprehend.
- Portions of the film brought criticism even before Oktiabr was screened. As Eisenstein explains, "the timing was accidentally unfortunate. A crisis in the Communist Party and among Government leaders coincided with the completion of a film in which both the now-divided factions were unmistakably represented on the screen." The two factions Eisenstein referred to were the government group headed by Joseph Stalin and the Opposition led by Leon Trotsky. As the date for the anniversary celebration approached, Stalin's offensive against Trotsky and the Opposition reached its peak. Eisenstein, as Yon Barna states, was "expected (by Stalin) to take account of the ‘new historical facts.’” As a result, only certain select reels of Oktiabr were ready to be screened at the jubilee on November 7, 1927. The film was re-edited and publicly released in March of 1928. Although scenes of Opposition leaders were cut from the film, Trotsky does appear in two scenes of the final version of Oktiabr, but not as a significant figure.

Government leaders, critics, and the general public were anticipating another Potemkin from Eisenstein. Oktiabr, however, never approached the popular appeal of that previous work. Reaction inside Russia to the completed version of the film was mixed. Oktiabr was praised as being the beginning of the Soviet cinema art of the future and also criticized as being too abstract for the masses—the working-class population—to comprehend, often within the same review. The elements of typage and intellectual montage, the main reasons for both the praise and the condemnation of Oktiabr, were first developed in Potemkin and are basic to Eisenstein’s theory of the “montage of attractions.”

Typage, a concept originating with Vsevolod Meyerhold, involves the use of persons whose physical appearance conveys the personality or spirit of a character as opposed to using trained actors. Through the use of typage, Eisenstein wanted to create visual impressions of models or representative figures so perfect that an audience could know the character at the first glimpse of him on the screen. The use of typage to represent Lenin on the screen in Oktiabr brought much criticism. The worker chosen to play Lenin, V. Nikandrov, resembled him physically but was criticized for an empty portrayal that did not convey the inner character of the man. Rather than a poor representation, however, this use of typage seems to be an attempt by Eisenstein to create a model character that embodies the mass rather than a single individual acting apart from the collective. (Eisenstein is more successful with this particular use of typage in Alexander Nevsky.) Eisenstein’s contemporaries and critics since have argued that the symbolism was not comprehensible by the masses. Nevertheless, they did recognize Eisenstein’s technique and purpose in the sequences in Oktiabr that are developed through intellectual montage.

Intellectual montage, the use of visual images to express abstract ideas, is the core of Eisenstein’s film theory. The specific idea behind intellectual montage is that the juxtaposition of two separate images can convey an idea which is not represented by either of those images when viewed separately. Such sequences in Oktiabr, of which there are many, brought a wider range of responses from the film’s reviewers. In one sequence, Eisenstein ridicules the concept of God through a series of symbolic deities in which a Baroque Christ figure is ultimately equated with a primitive idol. The idea of the gradual debasement of the Christ figure is conveyed through the relationships between the images of the deities and not by the individual images themselves. While acknowledging the artistic and cinematic value of this sequence and others like it (Kerensky’s climb up the stairs leading to the Tsar’s apartment, the association of Kerensky and Napoleon), reviewers criticized the fact that these sequences could not be interpreted by the masses. Oktiabr was commissioned to be part of the celebration of the proletarian revolution, but the proletariat could not understand the film.

—Marie Saeli

OLD CZECH LEGENDS

See STARÉ POVÌSTI CISKÉ

LOS OLVIDADOS

(The Young and the Damned)

Mexico, 1950

Director: Luis Buñuel

Production: Ultramar Films, SA for Tepeyac Studios; black and white, 35mm; running time: 88 minutes; length: 8020 feet. Released 9 November 1950, Mexico. Filmed 6 February-9 March 1950 in Mexico. Cost: budgeted at 450,000 pesos.

Producer: Oscar Dancigers; screenplay: Luis Buñuel, Luis Alcoriza and Oscar Dancigers; photography: Gabriel Figueroa; editor: Carlos Savage; sound engineers: Jesus Gonzalez and Jose B. Carles; art director: Edward Fitzgerald; music: Gustavo Pitaluga; music arranger: Rodolfo Halfter.

Cast: Estela Inda (Marta, Pedro’s mother); Miguel Inclán (Don Carmelo, the blind man); Alfonso Mejia (Pedro); Roberto Cobo (Jaibo); Alma Delia Fuentes (Meche); Francisco Jambrina (Farm school director); Mario Ramírez (Big-Eyes); Efrain Arauz (Pockface); Javier Amezcua (Julian); Jesus García Navarro (Julian’s father); Jorge Perez (“Pelón”); Sergio Villareal.

Award: Cannes Film Festival, Best Director, 1951.

Publications

Script:

Buñuel, Luis, Luis Alcoriza, and Oscar Dancigers, Exterminating Angel, Nazarin, and Los Olvidados: Three Films by Luis Buñuel, London, 1972; also in The Exterminating Angel and Los Olvidados, London, 1984.

Books:

Kyrou, Ado, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1962.

Lizalde, Eduardo, Luis Buñuel: Odisea del demoleedor, Mexico City, 1962.

Estève, Michel, editor, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1962–63.

Grange, Frédéric, and Charles Rebolledo, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1964.

Goetz, Alice, and Helmut Banz, Luis Buñuel: Eine Dokumentation, Munich, 1965.

Buache, Freddy, Luis Buñuel, Lausanne, 1970.

Alcalá, Manuel, Buñuel (cine e ideología), Madrid, 1973.

Buache, Freddy, The Cinema of Luis Buñuel, London, 1973.

Cesarman, Fernando, El ojo de Buñuel, Barcelona, 1976.

Drouzy, M., Luis Buñuel, architects du rêve, Paris, 1978.

Durgnat, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Berkeley, 1978.

Mellen, Joan, editor, The World of Luis Buñuel: Essays in Criticism, New York, 1978.

Los olvidados

- Cameron, Ian, Luis Buñuel, Berkeley, 1979.
- Higginbottom, Virginia, Luis Buñuel, Boston, 1979.
- Bazin, André, The Cinema of Cruelty: From Buñuel to Hitchcock, New York, 1982.
- Edwards, Gwynne, The Discreet Art of Luis Buñuel: A Reading of his Films, London, 1982, 1991.
- Buñuel, Luis, My Last Breath, London, 1983.
- Rees, Margaret A., editor, Luis Buñuel: A Symposium, Leeds, 1983.
- Lefèvre, Raymond, Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1984.
- Vidal, Agustín Sánchez, Luis Buñuel: Obra Cinematográfica, Madrid, 1984.
- Aub, Max, Conversaciones con Buñuel: Seguidas de 45 entrevistas con familiares, amigos y colaboradores del cineasta aragones, Madrid, 1985.
- Bertelli, Pino, Buñuel: L' arma dello scandalo: L' anarchia nel cinema di Luis Buñuel, Turin, 1985.
- Oms, Marcel, Don Luis Buñuel, Paris, 1985.
- De la Colina, Jose, and Tomás Pérez Turrent, Luis Buñuel: Prohibido asomarse al interior, Mexico City, 1986.
- Sandro, Paul, Diversions of Pleasure: Luis Buñuel and the Crises of Desire, Columbus, Ohio, 1987.
- Williams, Linda, Figures of Desire: A Theory and Analysis of Surrealist Film, Berkeley, 1992.
- De la Colina, Jose, and Tomas P. Turrent, Objects of Desire: Conversations with Luis Buñuel, New York, 1994.
- Evans, Peter William, The Films of Luis Buñuel: Subjectivity and Desire, New York, 1995.
- Baxter, John, Buñuel, New York, 1999.
- Almeida, Diane M., The Esperpento Tradition in the Works of Ramón del Valle Inclán and Luis Buñuel, Lewiston, 2000.
- Articles:
- Doniol-Valcroze, Jacques, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1951.
- Kast, Pierre, "Une fonction de constat: notes sur l'oeuvre de Buñuel," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1951.
- Barcia, J. Rubia, "Luis Buñuel's Los Olvidados," in Quarterly of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Summer 1953.
- Richardson, Tony, "The Films of Luis Buñuel," in Sight and Sound (London), January-March 1954.
- Cinemas* (New York), no. 1, 1955.

- Garcia Riera, Emilio, "The Eternal Rebellion of Luis Buñuel," in Film Culture (New York), no. 21, 1960.
- Dale, R. C., in Classics of the Film, Madison, Wisconsin, 1965.
- Milne, Tom, "The Mexican Buñuel," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1965–66.
- Hammond, Robert, "Luis Alcoriza and the Films of Luis Buñuel," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1965.
- Harcourt, Peter, "Luis Buñuel: Spaniard and Surrealist," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1967.
- Cornand, André, "Donner à voir," in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), June 1973.
- Diaz, Torres, D., in Cine Cubano (Havana), nos. 78–80, 1973.
- Lord, J., in Lumière (Melbourne), April-May 1974.
- Dale, R. C., in Movietone News (Seattle), February 1975.
- Fernández, Enriquè, "A Recipe for Andalusian Chicken," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Winter-Spring 1978.
- Contracampo* (Madrid), October-November 1980.
- Hoberman, J., "Take Two: Los Olvidados," in American Film (Washington, D.C.), June 1983.
- Rainer, Peter, "Los Olvidados/Nazarin," in American Film (New York), vol. 14, no. 9, July 1989.
- Biskind, Peter, "New and Recommended: Los Olvidados Directed by Luis Buñuel," Premiere (New York), vol. 3, no. 1, September 1989.
- Oms, M., "Don Luis le Mexican," in Cinemaction (Conde-sur-Noireau, France), July 1990.
- Schatzberg, Jerry, in Positif (Paris), no. 400, June 1994.
- Pena, Richard, "Que Viva Mexico: Los Olvidados (The Young and the Damned) Directed by Luis Buñuel," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, no. 6, November 1995.
- Gaytan, F., "Los Olvidados and Its Second Ending," in Journal of Film Preservation (Brussels), no. 54, April 1997.

* * *

Los olvidados was Luis Buñuel's favorite film, and the one with which he returned to mainstream motion picture directing after a 17-year hiatus. The film shocked many audiences for its pessimistic, unrelentingly realistic depiction of the futility in the lives of the abandoned children of Mexico City's slums. It is the first film of any reputation to present a realistic picture of what life was like in the Third World; its unequivocal soberness and topicality not only make it the prototype of Hector Babenco's Pixote and Yılmaz Güney's Yol, but allows it to stand on its own as a viable and searing indictment of society's ills.

Buñuel ended his exiled inactivity by signing a contract with Mexican producer Oscar Dancigers in 1947. The first film for Dancigers was Gran casino, "a film with songs" which proved unsuccessful; the second was the comedy, El gran calavera. The success of the latter encouraged Danciger to back Buñuel's production of Los olvidados, a film which Buñuel said he had to make. The budget was a meagre 450,000 pesos.

The idea for the film came from Buñuel's exploration of Mexico City where he witnessed the "wretchedness in which many of its inhabitants lived." He researched the project in the files of a local reformatory and explained, "My film is entirely based on real cases. I tried to expose the wretched condition of the poor in real terms, because I loathe films that make the poor romantic and sweet."

Using a combination of professional and non-professional actors, Buñuel focuses his story on the bond of power and duplicity between two young Mexican boys—Jaibo (Roberto Cobo), a hardened murderer, and Pedro (Alfonso Mejia), an innocent drawn into a life of crime by the cruelty of his environment. When Pedro's father abandons him, the boy is befriended by a ruthless, miserly blind beggar. Jaibo, recently escaped from reform school, robs and stones the beggar; soon after, Pedro sees Jaibo kill another youth who had informed on him. This shared experience leads to Jaibo becoming Pedro's mentor/master as the innocent boy falls into petty thievery. Imprisoned for stealing a knife, Pedro is tested by his liberal school director and sent on the outside on an errand. He encounters Jaibo who robs and kills him; Jaibo in turn is shot down by the police. Buñuel ends his film with the devastating scene of Pedro's body thrown into the sewer by Jaibo's grandfather.

Buñuel's semi-documentary approach is mediated somewhat by the picturesque, studio-influenced cinematography of Gabriel Figueroa, but the penetrating, unsentimental surrealism of Buñuel is omnipresent. In the forward to the film, Buñuel states: "The task of finding a solution lies with the force of progress," and Los olvidados offers no romantic answers for the social ills he records. The film is not without Buñuel's sense of symbolism, however, as evidenced by Pedro's Oedipal dream sequence and Jaibo's dying hallucinations.

Los olvidados earned Buñuel the Best Director prize at the Cannes Film Festival and was greeted with astonishment by critics internationally. André Bazin called it "a film that lashes the mind like a red-hot iron and leaves one's conscience no opportunity for rest." Its pessimism and violence was too much for the New York Times's conservative Bosley Crowther. Released in the U.S. under the title, The Young and the Damned, Crowther called the film "brutal and unrelenting" and added, "Although made with meticulous realism and unquestioned fidelity to facts, its qualifications as dramatic entertainment—or even social reportage—are dim." Obviously Crowther missed the point of the film entirely, for while Buñuel wisely chose not to soften his interpretation by providing pat answers, the abiding message here, as in much of his work, is, as his biographer, Francisco Aranda states, "By creating a society which is not criminal, we shall ourselves cease to be criminal."

—Ronald Bowers

OLYMPIA

(Olympische Spiele 1936)

Germany, 1938

Director: Leni Riefenstahl

Production: Tobis Cinema (Germany); black and white, 35mm; running time: Part I. 100 minutes, and Part II, 105 minutes; length: Riefenstahl's final cut was 18,000 feet. Released 20 April 1938. Filmed 20 July–4 August 1936 in Berlin at the Olympic Games. Cost 2.2 million Reichsmarks (approximately $523,810 in 1938).

Producers: Walter Traut and Walter Grosskopf; Screenplay: Leni Riefenstahl; photography: Leni Riefenstahl, Hans Ertl, Walter Frenztz, Guzzi Lantschner, Kurt Neubert, Hans Scheib, Willy Zielk; editor: Leni Riefenstahl; music: Herbert Windt.

Olympia

Awards: Biennale Film Festival, Venice, 1st Prize, 1938; State Prize (Staatspreis) of Germany, 1938; Polar Prize, Sweden, n.d.

Publications

Books:

- Riefenstahl, Leni, Schönheit im Olympischen Kampf, Berlin, 1937.
 Riefenstahl, Leni, Notes on the Making of Olympia, London, 1958.
 Sarris, Andrew, editor, Interviews with Film Directors, Indianapolis, Indiana, 1967.
 Mandell, Richard, D., Nazi Olympics, 1971.
 Stewart, Hull, David, Film in the Third Reich, Berkeley, 1971.
 Young, Vernon, On Film: Unpopular Essays on a Popular Art, Chicago, 1972.
 Barsam, Richard, Nonfiction Film: A Critical History, New York, 1973.
 Barnouw, Erik, Documentary: A History of the Non-Fiction Film, New York, 1974.
 Johnson, Lincoln, F., Film: Space, Time, Light, and Sound, 1974.

Infield, Glenn, Leni Riefenstahl, The Fallen Film Goddess, New York, 1976.

Ford, Charles, Leni Riefenstahl, Paris, 1978.

Infield, Glenn, Leni Riefenstahl et le 3e Reich, Paris, 1978.

Berg-Pan, Renata, Leni Riefenstahl, Boston, 1980.

Welch, David, Propaganda and the German Cinema, Oxford, 1983; revised edition, 1987.

Graham, Cooper C., Leni Riefenstahl and Olympia, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1986.

Downing, Taylor, Olympia, London, 1992.

Kubler, Manon, Olympia, Caracas, 1992.

Riefenstahl, Leni, Olympia, New York, 1994.

Riefenstahl, Leni, Leni Riefenstahl: A Memoir, New York, 1995.

Salkeld, Audrey, Portrait of Leni Riefenstahl, London, 1996.

Hinton, David B., The Films of Leni Riefenstahl, Lanham, 2000.

Articles:

New York Times, 9 March 1940.

Monthly Film Bulletin (London), no. 175, 1948.

- Gunston, D., "Leni Riefenstahl," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall, 1960.
- Gardner, Robert, in Film Comment (New York), Winter, 1965.
- "Statement on Sarris-Gessner Quarrel about Olympia," in Film Comment (New York), Fall, 1967.
- Swallow, Norman, interview with Riefenstahl on Olympia, in Listener (London), 19 September 1968.
- Corliss, Richard, "Leni Riefenstahl: A Bibliography," in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1969.
- Richards, J., "Leni Riefenstahl: Style and Structure," in Silent Pictures (London), Autumn 1970.
- Barsam, Richard, "Leni Riefenstahl: Artifice and Truth in a World Apart," in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1973.
- "Olympia Issue" of Film Culture (New York), Spring 1973.
- Barkhausen, H., "Footnote to the History of Riefenstahl's Olympia," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1974.
- Riefenstahl, Leni, "Notes on the Making of Olympia," in Nonfiction Film: Theory and Criticism, edited by Richard Barsam, New York, 1976.
- Interview with Riefenstahl, in Montreal Star, 20 July 1976.
- Vaughan, Dai, "Berlin versus Tokyo," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1977.
- Tyler, Parker, "Leni Riefenstahl's Olympia," in The Documentary Tradition, edited by Lewis Jacobs, 2nd edition, New York, 1979.
- Horton, W. J., "Capturing the Olympics," in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), July 1984.
- "American Intelligence Report on Leni Riefenstahl: May 30th, 1945," in Film Culture (New York), no. 77, 1992.
- Foldenyi, F. L., "Felhotlen almok nyomaszto vilaga," in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 2, 1993.
- Graham, C. C., "Olympia in America, 1938: Leni Riefenstahl, Hollywood, and the Kristallnacht," in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and Television (Abingdon, Oxfordshire), no. 4, 1993.
- Rose, Charlie, "Film Scholars Debate Riefenstahl," in Film Culture (New York), no. 79, Winter 1996.
- Hitchens, Gordon, "Recent Riefenstahl Activities and a Commentary on Nazi Propaganda Filmmaking," in Film Culture (New York), no. 79, Winter 1996.
- von Dassanowsky, Robert, "Entertaining the Third Reich: Illusions of Wholeness in Nazi Cinema," in The Germanic Review (Washington), vol. 72, no. 4, Fall 1997.

* * *

Any film of the Olympic Games would be useless, Goebbels maintained, unless it could be shown a few days after they ended. Who could be interested after the excitement and the memory faded? Fortunately, director Leni Riefenstahl, with Hitler's approval, overrode any objections with astonishing results. While Olympia is a superb example of the sports documentary, it also stands on its own as an aesthetic achievement.

The fact its creator is a controversial figure whose alliance with the Nazi Party is still held up to scrutiny, and still as coolly contested by Riefenstahl, forces one to examine the boundaries of "artistic integrity" versus a very fundamental morality. One cannot view Olympia simply as film, or simply as propaganda.

There was almost as much preparation for Olympia's shooting as for the Games themselves. For the best angles, uninterrupted by distracted participants, two steel towers were built in the stadium infield, and pits were dug for the sprinting and jumping events.

Scaffolding platforms caught the rowing teams in their winning strokes thanks to cameras pulled along tracks by car. Hundreds of technicians and advisors were brought in, as were some of the best camera people. Several cameramen had previously worked with Riefenstahl on her earlier film, Triumph of the Will, a stunning record of Hitler's Nazi rallies, as well as the "mountain" films by Arnold Fanck that she had starred in. Despite Riefenstahl's total control, much of the look of Olympia was due to people such as Hans Ertl, for the celebrated diving sequences, Walter Frenz for the marathon, yachting events and the romantic opening scenes in Part II, and Gustav Lantschner for the gymnastic, equestrian and some of the diving.

Three kinds of film stock were used; one was good for half-tones, one flattering to outdoor scenes, a third for architecture. Over ten hours of film were shot each day during the 16-day games. Including training footage (incorporated into the film) and reshooting (some winning athletes were delighted to recreate their finest moments), there were 250 hours for her, alone, to edit. Logging the film took a month, viewing the rushes more than two. According to the director, editing took a year and a half: "It was cut like a symphony . . . according to laws of aesthetics and rhythm." Adding the sound took another six weeks. It must be remembered that in 1936-37, there were no zoom lenses, no soundproof cameras, no computer mixing—merely what was, to us now, primitive technology.

After nearly three years, Riefenstahl was finished. Her powerful 12-minute open-sequence in Part I evokes the classical past, an analogy dear to Nazi propagandist hearts. Classical ruins—ironically to be come Nazi ones—Wagnerian strains, whirling clouds and Greek statues; together with the human body celebrated in motion via the discus throw, the shot-put and the javelin, the epic stance is firmly established. The international foundation of the games was exploited to produce a propaganda climax; in a series of shots, the torch aloft, carried from Greece, is ignited, the flame returns to life, only in Germany, only under Hitler, who pronounces the games open. With lab effects, the results are almost religious.

The high jump becomes a filmic ballet, with slow-motion, different camera angles and cross-cuts. Then follow the discus, hurdles, throwing the hammer, pole vaulting, relays. The long-jump is one of the more interesting pieces in the film, having a personal dimension. The competition between Aryan Lutz Long and American (and, gallingly for the games hosts) black star Jesse Owens. Riefenstahl, sensitive to the symbolism, accomplishes the drama effectively, incorporating the tension in the situation, the personal drive of the two contestants with honed slow-motion camera work, fast audience reaction shots (significantly, not Hitler's who rarely appears applauding any but German athletes), the sharp timing. Primarily, her camera is not aimed at documenting history-making records, but at the athletes themselves. Interestingly, more of the slow-motion effect, with the result of making the bodies almost superhuman, is aimed at the German athletes, whether or not they win, although the film's content is not, presumably, out to confirm the superiority of the "master" race.

The bodies seem to add another dimension, almost bursting out of the flat screen, which is seemingly barely able to contain the exuberance, the strength. And while many sports event have, by their nature, repeated actions by series of contestants, Riefenstahl films each in a slightly different manner to keep the movements fresh by her choreography.

The handling of the marathon, the antidote to any possible flagging attention, is the high point of Part I. Taylor Downing, in her book Olympia refers to this segment, rightly, as “a film within a film. It creates a statement about achievement and endurance, and takes the viewer right inside the race itself. Rarely has a marathon been treated with such imagination on film.” Using the distorted shadows of the runners, interspersed with shots of feet pounding the pavement, leg muscles pulsing, the viewer’s own body tenses, feeling the strength flowing from, then, as the runners feel the exhaustion, draining out of their bodies; each frame fairly courses with energy, and with the constant drive. The marathon is not an event, in Riefenstahl’s camera eye, it is each athlete’s personal trial.

One of Riefenstahl’s gifts is her ability to manipulate the range of responses (within the film, within the audience) through her use of music, content, editing and tone, not only within each individual sequence but the combining/contrasting of them for the bigger effect. For example, the dramatic rowing sequence is then followed by the occasionally humorous riding event; the result is a dynamic, filmic flow. In Part II, she begins sensuously, with reflected pools of mist-layered water, the tiny details such as a bird’s wing in flight, a drop of water trembling on a spider web, with violin music threading through shots of muscled male bodies bathing, birching one another . . . Aryan Fatherland and Mother Nature in harmony. She cuts—like a hit of ice—to the rousing ceremony march, then on to physical training, as the different nationalities get into their stride for the bustling day’s events. A shot of mass gymnastics is a long pan; tens of thousands of women in endless regimented lines do push-ups. The result is oddly dehumanising; like Busby Berkeley’s routines, individual grace is transformed into a pop design. Here the effect is one of uneasiness, not thrill.

Part II also ends with a crescendo. The diving sequence is justly the most celebrated in the film, even in film history. Camera people Ertl and Dorothy Poynton-Hill had to adjust for distance during the dive, change exposure the second the diver hit the water, then reverse the process when s/he resurfaced. An elevator-type device mounted by the pool insured a fluid movement. The divers become suspended, as the camera seemingly redefines the physical laws of motion, of space and of time. The divers appear in the sky from nowhere, defying gravity; in slow-motion, they become surreal. Bodies twist, twirl, arc and never descend. No commentary mars the effect. Once again, no matter how beautiful each movement, repetition with each contestant could visually numb. To avoid that, Riefenstahl matched each shot with the movement of the dive preceding it; at the end, to the dive following. Such grace shows the director at her best; one forgets the background outside the realm of pure artistry.

She has perennially maintained her political innocence, reminding us of the gold medal the Olympic Committee awarded her in 1948. To many people, her stance rings hollow. Olympia is a stunning, and reasonably accurate account of the games. However, she was only independent of the propaganda ministry because of Hitler’s personal involvement. It partly transcends politics, but it was established for political motives for political propaganda. Olympia is not a product of the political naif (she would “borrow” a group of gypsies from a nearby concentration camp for a later film — then return them when she was through), but a brilliant, ambitious director who wanted her work seen. Genius can work both ways.

—Jane Ehrlich

ON THE SUBJECT OF NICE

See A PROPOS DE NICE

ON THE TOWN

USA, 1949

Directors: Stanley Donen and Gene Kelly

Production: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Picture Corp.; Technicolor, 35mm; running time: 98 minutes. Released 1949. Filmed in MGM studios and some location shots in New York City.

Producer: Arthur Freed; screenplay: Adolph Green and Betty Comden, from the musical play by Comden and Green based on an idea by Jerome Robbins; photographer: Harold Rossen; editor: Ralph E. Winters; art directors: Cedric Gibbons and Jack Martin Smith; music director: Lennie Hayton; songs: Roger Edens, Adolph Green, and Betty Comden; additional original music: Leonard Bernstein; orchestrations: Conrad Salinger; vocal arrangements: Saul Chaplin; costume designer: Helen Rose; choreography: Gene Kelly and Stanley Donen.

Cast: Gene Kelly (Gabey); Frank Sinatra (Chip); Betty Garrett (Brunhilde Esterhazy); Ann Miller (Claire Huddesen); Jules Munshin (Ozzie); Vera-Ellen (Ivy Smith).

Award: Oscar for Music-Scoring of a Musical Picture, 1949.

Publications

Books:

- Burton, Jack, The Blue Book of Hollywood Musicals, New York, 1953.
 Griffith, Richard, The Cinema of Gene Kelly, New York, 1962.
 Springer, John, All Talking, All Singing, All Dancing, New York, 1966.
 Kobal, John, Gotta Sing, Gotta Dance: A Pictorial History of Film Musicals, New York, 1970.
 Lonstein, Albert I. and Vito R. Marino, The Compleat Sinatra, New York, 1970.
 Ringgold, Gene, and Clifford McCarty, The Films of Frank Sinatra, New York, 1971.
 Thomas, Lawrence B., The MGM Years, New York, 1972.
 Stern, Lee Edward, The Movie Musical, New York, 1974.
 Hirschhorn, Clive, Gene Kelly, Chicago, 1975; revised edition, London, 1984.
 Charness, Casey, Hollywood Cine-Dance: A Description of the Interrelationship of Camera Work and Choreography in the Films of Stanley Donen and Gene Kelly, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1978.
 Altman, Rick, editor, Genre: The Musical, London, 1981.
 Delameter, James, Dance in the Hollywood Musical, Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1981.

On the Town

Feuer, Jane, The Hollywood Musical, London, 1982.
 Casper, Joseph Andrew, Stanley Donen, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1985.
 Altman, Rick, The American Film Musical, London, 1989.
 Silverman, Stephen M., Dancing on the Ceiling: Stanley Donen and His Movies, New York, 1996.
 Yudkoff, Alvin, Gene Kelly: A Life of Dance and Dreams, New York, 1999.

Articles:

Variety (New York), 7 December 1949.
New York Times, 9 December 1949.
Time (New York), 2 January 1950.
 Knight, Arthur, "From Dance to Film Director," in Dance (New York), August 1954.
 Freed, Arthur, "Making Musicals," in Films and Filming (London), January 1956.
 Johnson, Albert, "The 10th Muse in San Francisco," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1956.
 Knight, Arthur, "Dance in the Movies," in Dance (New York), October 1958.
 Luft, Herbert, "Donen at Work," in Films in Review (New York), February 1961.

Behlmer, Rudy, "Gene Kelly," in Films in Review (New York), January, 1964.
 Cutts, John, "Dancer, Actor, Director," in Films and Filming (London), August and September 1964.
 Lloyd, P., "Stanley Donen," in Brighton Film Review, March 1970.
 Lucas, Blake, "On the Town," in Magill's Survey of Cinema 3, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Telotte, J. P. "Ideology and the Kelly-Donen Musicals," in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Spring 1984.
 Jousse, T., and N. Saada, "Un Americain à Paris," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1989.
 Parkinson, D., "Dancing in the Streets," in Sight and Sound (London), January 1993.
Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 179, July-August 1995.
 Reid, J.H., and G. Aachen, in Reid's Film Index (Wyong), no. 24, 1996.

* * *

On the Town may not be the greatest Hollywood musical ever produced; Singin' in the Rain, The Wizard of Oz, The Band Wagon, and several others would all garner consideration with Singin' in the Rain probably receiving the most attention. But On the Town, so unconventional for its time, is separate from the rest for several very special reasons. Most significantly, the film was partially shot outdoors; it instigated the use of increased on-location shooting for films of that genre. On the Town is one of the few features in which the talents of two filmmakers are so happily blended; Gene Kelly and Stanley Donen, the co-directors, later went on to make Singin' in the Rain, and It's Always Fair Weather. The songs and dances—modern, as well as ballet and tap—were not necessarily by and of themselves, but were related to character development and assisted in moving along the story.

On the Town was a ground-breaking property in the theater. It was initially presented as Fancy Free, a modernistic ballet with music by Leonard Bernstein and choreography by James Robbins, in which a trio of sailors dance their experiences while on shore leave. From this, Betty Comden and Adolph Green fashioned a musical comedy storyline, adding a book and lyrics. The resulting Broadway musical, which opened three days after Christmas, 1944, successfully united story, song, music, comedy and dance. In this respect, it is a theatrical first.

Both Kelly and Donen made their directorial debuts with the film version, released five years later with several songs eliminated and six new ones added. Kelly pressured MGM into allowing him to film in New York, though some of the musical and dance numbers were shot on sets. Donen allegedly worked mainly with the non-dance material. Kelly, Frank Sinatra and Jules Munshin, cast as the carefree sailors who partake in various romantic escapades while on 24-hour passes, cavort outdoors on Wall Street, near Grant's Tomb and the Statue of Liberty, in Rockefeller Center, the RCA Building, Central Park and, most memorably, while singing the praises of the city—"New York, New York, it's a wonderful town"—in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. The action never halts for an elaborate production number. Characterizations are established not only by dialogue and performance but in terms of song and dance: "Prehistoric Man," set in the Museum of Natural History and tap-danced by anthropology student Ann Miller, displays her character's aggressiveness in pursuing Munshin; in "Come Up to My Place," shy Sinatra finally succumbs to the charms of taxi driver Betty Garrett. These two women are certainly no standard, passive heroines, and are unusually liberated for their day by the manner in which they relate to, and compete with, men.

Most of those involved in the production had worked together previously in Take Me Out to the Ball Game. Ball Game's credits include, in similar and different capacities from On the Town, Kelly, Sinatra, Munshin, Donen, Comden, Green, Cedric Gibbons, Roger Edens and Arthur Freed (who produced most of Kelly's musicals from For Me and My Gal, 1942, through It's Always Fair Weather, 1955, and allowed him creative freedom here). From Anchors Away (also featuring Kelly and Sinatra in the navy) to Words and Music (in which Kelly and Vera-Ellen are superb in the "Slaughter on Tenth Avenue" dance sequence), various combinations of On the Town's talent collaborated on other films. Yet, excluding Singin' in the Rain, none is as delightful or memorable. Without question, these two are the key musicals of their period rather than the then more highly regarded An American in Paris, which won the Best Picture Academy Award.

On the Town is an energetic, effervescent combination of reality and fantasy. West Side Story, Funny Girl, and so many other subsequent musicals owe their very existence to the creativity and vision of Gene Kelly and company.

—Rob Edelman

ON THE WATERFRONT

USA, 1954

Director: Elia Kazan

Production: Horizon Productions; black and white, 35mm, Cinemascope; running time: 108 minutes. Released 1954, by Columbia Pictures Corp. Filmed in New York and Hoboken, New Jersey.

Producer: Sam Spiegel; screenplay: Budd Schulberg, from his original story suggested by a series of newspaper articles by Malcolm Johnson; photographer: Boris Kaufman; editor: Gene Milford; art director: Richard Day; music score: Leonard Bernstein.

Cast: Marlon Brando (Terry Malloy); Eva Marie Saint (Edie Doyle); Karl Malden (Father Barry); Lee J. Cobb (Johnny Friendly); Rod Steiger (Charles Malloy); John Hamilton ("Pop" Doyle); Pat Henning ("Kayo" Dugan); James Westerfield (Big Mac); Leif Erickson (Glover); Martin Balsam (Gillette); Tony Galento (Truck); Tami Maurriello (Tillio); Abe Simon (Barney); John Heldabrand (Mott); Rudy Bond (Moose); Thomas Handley (Tommy); Anne Hegira (Mrs. Collins); Don Blackman (Luke); Arthur Keegan (Jimmy); Barry Macollum (J.P.); Mike O'Dowd (Specs); Fred Gwynn (Slim); Pat Hingle (Bartender).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Director, Best Actor (Brando), Best Supporting Actress (Saint), Best Writing-Story and Screenplay, Best Cinematography-Black and White, Best Art Direction-Black and White, and Best Editing, 1954; New York Film Critics Awards for Best Picture, Best Direction, and Best Actor (Brando); Venice Film Festival, Silver Prize, 1954.

Publications

Script:

Schulberg, Budd, On the Waterfront, New York, 1955; Carbondale, Illinois, 1980.

Books:

Tailleur, Roger, Elia Kazan, Paris, 1966; revised edition, 1971.

Ciment, Michel, Kazan on Kazan, New York, 1974.

Parish, James R., and Michael Pitts, The Great Gangster Pictures, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1976.

Davies, Philip, and Brian Neve, Cinema, Politics, and Society in America, Manchester, 1981.

Giannetti, Louis, Masters of the American Cinema, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1981.

Pauly, Thomas H., An American Odyssey: Elia Kazan and American Culture, Philadelphia, 1983.

Downing, David, Marlon Brando, London, 1984.

Carey, Gary, Marlon Brando: The Only Contender, London, 1985.

Michaels, Lloyd, Elia Kazan: A Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1985.

Higham, Charles, Brando: The Unauthorized Biography, London, 1987.

Kazan, Elia, Elia Kazan: A Life, New York, 1988, 1989, 1997.

On the Waterfront

Grobel, Lawrence, Conversations with Brando, Lanham, 1993, 1999.
 Brando, Marlon, Songs My Mother Taught Me, with Robert Lindsey, New York, 1994.

Malden, Karl, and Carla Malden, When Do I Start?: A Memoir, New York, 1997.

Girgus, Sam B., Hollywood Renaissance: The Cinema of Democracy in the Era of Ford, Capra and Kazan, New York, 1998.

Lobrutto, Elia Kazan, Old Tappan, 1999.

Young, Jeff, editor, Kazan—The Master Director Discusses His Films: Interviews with Elia Kazan, New York, 1999.

Baer, William, editor, Elia Kazan: Interviews, Jackson, 2000.

Articles:

Johnson, Malcolm, "Crime on the Waterfront," in New York Sun, 8 November-10 December 1948.

Brinson, Peter, "Brooder," in Films and Filming (London), October 1954.

Anderson, Lindsay, "The Last Sequence of On the Waterfront," in Sight and Sound (London), January-March 1955.

Hendricks, Gordon, in Film Culture (New York), January 1955.

Hughes, Robert, "On the Waterfront: A Defense," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1955.

Laurot, Edouard De, in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1955.

McVay, Douglas, "The Brando Mutiny," in Films and Filming (London), December 1962.

Tailleur, Roger, "Elia Kazan and the House Un-American Activities Committee," in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1966.

Hall, John Dennis, "Method Master: Rod Steiger's Career," in Films and Filming (London), December 1970 and January 1971.

Smith, J. M. "Three Liberal Films," in Movie (London), Winter 1971-72.

Movie (London), Spring 1972.

Haskell, Molly, articles on Brando, in Village Voice (New York), 14 June-30 August 1973.

Biskind, Peter, "The Politics of Power in On the Waterfront," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1975.

Borde, R., in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 5, 1976.

Theberge, Rita, in Cinema Texas Program Notes (Austin), 1 December 1976.

Hey, Kenneth, in Film and History (Newark, New Jersey), December 1979.

- “Kazan Section” of Positif (Paris), April 1981.
- Canby, V., “My Hero May be Your Stoolie,” in New York Times, vol. 138, section 2, 27 August 1989.
- Caprara, V., “I tre ‘scandali’ di un capolavoro,” in Filmeritica (Rome), January-February 1990.
- Alion, Yves, “Les quatre films du docteur Brando,” in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), no. 479, February 1992.
- Manso, P., “Bringing Up Baby,” in Premiere (New York), vol. 8, October 1994.
- Catsos, Gregory J.M., “Immediate Reward,” in Outré (Evanston), vol. 1, no. 4, 1995.
- Reeves, Saskia, “Caged Birds,” in Sight & Sound (London), vol. 6, no. 2, February 1996.
- Braudy, L., “‘No Body’s Perfect’: Method Acting and 50s Culture,” in Michigan Quarterly Review, vol. 35, no. 1, 1996.
- Schulberg, B., “Life in Hollywood Department,” in New Yorker, vol. 74, 30 March 1998.
- Wheatcroft, Geoffrey, “The Waterfront All Over Again: He Told the Truth. They Lied for Communism. And He’s the Bad Guy?” in Wall Street Journal (New York), 19 March 1999.
- Bosworth, Patricia, “Kazan’s Choice,” in Vanity Fair (New York), vol. 469, September 1999.

* * *

The genesis of On the Waterfront is nearly as fascinating as the film itself. In April 1948, a New York dock hiring boss was murdered; it was the second killing in a short time. Reporter Malcolm Johnson was assigned by the now-defunct New York Sun to cover the story. Johnson’s initial inquiries developed into a full investigation of waterfront crime. His findings were revealed in a series of 24 pieces, called “Crime on the Waterfront,” published in the Sun between 8 November–10 December 1948. The exposé revealed rampant thievery, bribery, shake-downs, kickbacks, payoffs, shylocking and murder that was costing the port of New York millions of dollars in lost shipping trade. The articles earned Johnson a Pulitzer Prize.

Elia Kazan was among the most successful and influential directors on Broadway and in Hollywood at this time. Despite his considerable reputation, Kazan had fallen into disfavor with many for his cooperation with the House Un-American Activities Committee during their investigations of communist activity in the film industry. Budd Schulberg was an established author who had won esteem for his novel about motion picture business What Makes Sammy Run?, and his hard-hitting exposé of prize-fighting, The Harder They Fall, as well as the best-seller The Disenchanted. Like Kazan, Schulberg had also flirted with communism in the 1930s and voluntarily testified before HUAC in 1951.

Schulberg had already drafted a script based on Johnson’s articles when Kazan approached him about doing a film on the east coast. Their collaboration resulted in a script based on the waterfront scandals but imbued with a message about the virtues of “right-thinking men in a vital democracy.” Although the project was supported by the combined expertise of Kazan/Schulberg, no Hollywood studio would finance the venture; some argued that the issues were too depressing, others that filming on actual locations would be too dangerous, but ultimately the reason for rejection seemed to be the meager commercial prospects. Just as the project seemed unrealizable, independent producer Sam Spiegel, looking for a property, accepted the challenge and financed the film.

In keeping with the documentary nature of its source material, On the Waterfront was to be filmed on the streets and docks of Hoboken, New Jersey, where it takes place. With a singularity of purpose, the film was to expose not only the corruption of the waterfront unions but also reflect the day-to-day struggle for work and dignity among the longshoremen. Frank Sinatra was approached for the leading role of a slow-witted dockworker who, through a strange brew of conscience and vengeance, emerges from the group to break the stranglehold maintained by the corrupt union. When terms with Sinatra could not be reached, Marlon Brando, who had won Oscar nominations in two previous Kazan films, was signed. A substantial array of acting talent was recruited for supporting roles, including Lee J. Cobb, Rod Steiger, Karl Malden and Eva Marie Saint. The production cost $820,000 and made an immediate and astonishing impression on both audiences and critics when released in 1954.

The narrative centers around Terry Malloy, a former boxer turned dockworker, who becomes the unwitting pawn in the murder of a fellow longshoreman preparing to testify against gangsters who tyrannize the docks. Through the insistent priest, Father Barry, Terry is drawn into a moral dilemma. His loyalties to the racketeers, led by Johnny Friendly and Terry’s brother Charlie, have been weakened by the murder. His growing affection for Edie and the persuasive tactics of Father Barry gradually draw his allegiance away from the gangsters. Terry is served with a subpoena to testify before the Waterfront Crime Commission about the Joey Doyle murder. In love with Edie, manipulated by the priest and in disfavor with the mob, Terry’s conversion is completed when his own brother is brutally murdered as a warning to him. Terry testifies against Friendly and is ostracized as a “stoolie.” When he confronts Friendly and his cohorts, he is brutally beaten. In a final effort of will, Terry rallies and leads the loitering longshoremen to work as an act of defiance against the racketeers.

The technique of the film is as basic and effective as the story. There are no attempts at a self-conscious aesthetics or pyrotechnics. There are no compromises in rendering the locale as anything but the urban jungle that it is. We follow the story as it takes us into the cargo holds of the ships, the slum dwelling of the workers, the shack that serves as headquarters for the union leaders, the seedy bars, the littered streets, the rooftops, the alleyways. Everything about the film is grimy and oppressive. The waterfront is presented as a harsh place where violence and betrayal have become an accepted way of life; it is a place where the strong prey upon the weak and a self-defeating code of silence prevails. We not only see and hear the sub-human malaise of the neighborhood, but we feel the suffering of the dockworkers as they mull about in a fraternal hopelessness.

At the center of On the Waterfront is Terry Malloy. Terry is a man in his 30s always exploited by others; Johnny Friendly callously uses him to set up Joey Doyle just as Father Barry manipulates him against his loyalties. Terry initiates nothing of his own, yet he is redeemed through love from the limitations of his background. Left to himself, it is probable that he would remain just another likable but expendable dockworker and errand boy.

At the beginning of the film, Terry is barely articulate and painfully confused about himself and his situation. Not only is he mired in the urban jungle of greed, deceit and betrayal, but he is at loss to understand it or change himself. As he tells Edie in the tavern; “Wanna know my philosophy of life?” Yet beneath his layered exterior of toughness, Terry possesses traits that seem contradictory to his own philosophy: his fondness for pigeons, the tender way he wears Edie's glove, the rejection he feels at being excluded from the protection and confidence of his brother.

As Brando interprets him, Terry Malloy also possesses a touch of sadness. He is a man who, at one time, had the opportunity to rise above his condition through his skill as a prizefighter. Although he could have had a personal sense of self-respect and self-worth as a contender for the title, he was prevented from it by others (including his brother). Embittered but not self-piteous, he reveals his self-awareness in a touching scene with his brother in the back seat of a cab. Although well suppressed, the seed of something better resides in him. It is Edie's love that nurtures that seed.

Reduced to its basics, On the Waterfront is a morality tale about how corruption can (indeed must) be fought and defeated when a man of courage and conscience emerges from the crowd to oppose the corruption. Although the narrative progresses in a linear manner without flashbacks and subplots, the power of the film is announced from the opening scene, with its assertive orchestral percussion, in which Terry is dispatched to lure Joey Doyle into a setup. In addition to dominating the Academy Awards of 1954, it garnered some additional laurels. It brought credibility to the method technique of acting taught at the Actors Studio. It certified the acting credentials of a number of talents trained for the theater. It brought acclaim and stardom to Marlon Brando, and even briefly made mumbling fashionable. It also created at least one enduring vignette ("I coulda been a contender") which has frequently been parodied.

Even though On the Waterfront is universally hailed as a milestone, the film's denouement still taints its reputation as a classic. Terry informs before a congressional committee on those who have exploited him and the other longshoremen. In the context of the narrative, he is elevated to heroic proportions (even though his heroism is misunderstood by others) through a behavior that is typically classified by both the film and society as reprehensible. As a result of his informing through public testimony, Terry is considered an outcast by everyone from the police assigned to protect him to his friends who now refuse to speak to him. But after he confronts Friendly, he is the lone man of strength who wins the support of the longshoremen. In a turn-about, the act of informing is not only justified but sanitized and made admirable.

The fact that Terry moves, perhaps too conveniently, from a complex individual through the act of informing to an emblem of Christian integrity and suffering has aggravated certain viewers. Some have argued that the optimistic ending is a reversal of the film's narrative premise. In another attack, critic-filmmaker Lindsay Anderson, writing in Sight and Sound, considered the film's violent conclusion to be "implicitly (if unconsciously) fascist." Others have cited the parallels to Kazan-Schulberg's own situation and objected to the ending as an unconvincing effort to vindicate their own informing to HUAC. Whatever interpretation one prefers, it is interesting to observe that in writing the novelization of his screenplay, Schulberg chose to end it not with Terry's heroic leadership but with his ignoble death (stabbed 27 times with an ice pick and then deposited in a barrel of lime left in a Jersey swamp).

None of these criticisms, however, has diminished the dramatic power of the film. Regardless of political considerations or implications, the film has found its way into the ranks of cinema classics.

—Stephen E. Bowles

ONCE THERE WAS A WAR

See DER VAR ENGANG EN KRIG

ONCE UPON A TIME IN AMERICA

USA, 1984

Director: Sergio Leone

Production: The Ladd Company, for Embassy International, Warner Bros.; Technicolour/Eastmancolour, 35 mm; running time: 229 minutes.

Producer: Arnon Milchan; screenplay: Leonardo Benvenuti, Piero De Bernardi, Enrico Medioli, Franco Arcalli, Franco Ferrini, and Sergio Leone, based on the novel The Hoods by Harry Grey (David Aaronson); photography: Tonino Delli Colli; editor: Nino Baragli; set designer: Giovanni Natalucci; art directors: Carlo Simi and James Singelis; music: Ennio Morricone.

Cast: Robert De Niro (Noodles); James Woods (Max); Elizabeth McGovern (Deborah); Treat Williams (Jimmy O'Donnell); Tuesday Weld (Carol); Burt Young (Joe); Joe Pesci (Frankie); Danny Aiello (Police Chief Aiello); William Forsythe (Cockeye); James Hayden (Patsy); Darlann Fleugel (Eve); Larry Rapp (Fat Moe); Scott Tiler (Young Noodles); Rusty Jacobs (Young Max); Jennifer Connely (Young Deborah); James Russo (Bugsy); Brian Bloom (Young Patsy); Adrian Curran (Young Cockeye); Mike Monetti (Young Fat Moe).

Publications

Books:

Gabutti, Diego, C'era una volta in America, Milano, 1984.

Cumbow, Robert C., Once Upon a Time... The Films of Sergio Leone, London, 1987.

Simsolo, Noël, Conversations avec Sergio Leone, Paris, 1987.

Gressard, Gilles, Sergio Leone, Paris, 1989.

Di Claudio, Gianni, Directed by Sergio Leone, Cheti, 1990.

Ortoli, Philippe, Sergio Leone: une Amérique de légendes, Paris, 1994.

De Cornare, Oreste, Sergio Leone: The Great American Dream of Legendary America, Rome, 1997.

Frayling, Christopher, Sergio Leone: Something to Do with Death, New York, 2000.

Articles:

Chion, M., and others, Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1984.

Variety (New York), 23 May 1984.

Once Upon a Time in America

Gili, J.-A., and others, "Reflets dans un saxo d'or," in Positif (Paris), June 1984.
 Hamill, P., American Film (Washington, D.C.), June 1984.
 Simsolo, N., and others, Revue du Cinéma (Paris), June 1984.
 Corliss, M., and E. Lomenzo, Film Comment (New York), July-August 1984.
 Leone, Sergio, Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1984.
 Nave, B., Jeune Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1984.
 Hutchinson, C., Films and Filming (London), September 1984.
 Martineu, R., Séquences (Montreal), October 1984.
 Rayns, T., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), October 1984.
 Peachment, C., "The World Was Yours," in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1984.
 Caputo, R., Cinema Papers (Victoria), December 1984.
 Knee, A., Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Fall 1985.
 Thomson, D., "Leonesque," in American Film, vol. 14, September 1989.
 Little, K., "Letters: Gremlins—the In-house Batch," in Film Comment (New York), vol. 27, July/August 1991.
 Weinraub, B., "Uncut Version of 1984 Cult Film to Be Released," in New York Times, vol. 142, C19, 22 October 1992.

Norman, Barry, in Radio Times (London), vol. 258, no. 3760, 17 February 1996.

Lucas, Tim, "What Are Those Strange Drops of Blood in the Scripts of Ernesto Gastaldi?" in Video Watchdog (Cincinnati), no. 39, 1997.

Godden, Richard, "Maximizing the Noodles: Class, Memory, and Capital in Sergio Leone's Once Upon a Time in America," in Journal of American Studies (Cambridge), vol. 31, December 1997.

Martin, A., "Euphoria and Liberating Laughter: The Cinema of Sergio Leone," in Metro Magazine (St. Kilda West), no. 113/114, 1998.

Meyer, David N., "Once Upon a Time, an Epic Was Shorn of Grandeur," in New York Times (New York), 14 February 1999.

* * *

Sergio Leone's Once Upon a Time in America—a larger-than-life title which is a variation of his earlier Once Upon a Time in the West—is the story of the plight and fate of a group of Jewish immigrant sons and childhood friends. They come of age on New York's Lower East Side in the early 20th century and eventually become wealthy, powerful Depression-era gangsters. The film has all the atmosphere and scope of Francis Coppola's first two Godfather epics, with its complex scenario crammed with corrupt public officials and gangland rivalries, references to real-life individuals and events, raw sex and bloody killings. Its narrative spans decades, all the way through the late 1960s, with past and present events blended seamlessly.

Notwithstanding all of this, Once Upon a Time in America is merely masquerading as a gangster movie. Primarily, it is an allegory of the experience of being a first-generation American. The principal connections in the film are between Noodles (Robert De Niro), whose real name is David Aaronson, and Max (James Woods), his closest partner-in-crime; and Noodles and Deborah (Elizabeth McGovern), his childhood sweetheart. As a teenager, Deborah reads a poem to Noodles. One of the lines—"He'll always be a two-bit punk, so he'll never be my beloved. What a shame!"—reflects the manner in which their relationship evolves.

In America, all men are supposed to be equal. But, given their roots, these immigrant sons and daughters remain eternally outside of the national fabric. They are not of the culture of their parents. "My old man's praying and my old lady's crying," young Noodles observes. "What the hell should I go home for." Yet their ghetto world is a universe away from Uptown New York, where families have been rooted for generations. As Jews—let alone ghetto Jews—they will not be allowed Ivy League educations and jobs in society's upper echelons. They remain separated from the mainstream of America, and so they are disaffected, and become blindly ambitious. Consequently, they crave success and acceptance. Max may store away a $1-million nest egg, but he is not satisfied. He talks of making $20 million, $50 million—friendship and loyalty be damned as he plots the betrayal of his cronies for their money. Deborah, meanwhile, aspires to become a famous actress; the entertainment industry being one of the few "legitimate" professions in which a ghetto child can rise in class. She tells Noodles, "I've got to get where I'm going. . . . To the top."

Noodles, Max and their pals start out as uncouth, unwashed youngsters whose sense of identity develops as they roll drunks, torch newsstands, and blackmail a crooked cop. Eventually, during Prohibition, they become fabulously wealthy bootleggers. However, whatever power they achieve, and whatever high circles they come to travel in, their ghetto roots (and baser instincts) remain with them throughout their lives. They may wear fancy suits and have wads of money, but they are ruthless, brutal thugs. Noodles is a man of animalistic urges, who is unable to control his sexuality. As a youngster, he has sex in a bathroom with the local tramp-in-training; as an adult, he rapes a woman during a robbery. His low point comes when he transforms a tender moment with Deborah into an ugly one as he molests her in the back of a limousine: an act which forever ends their relationship.

In order to fit in the only way they know how, the characters in Once Upon a Time in America go about reinventing themselves. David Aaronson might be the name of a pious rabbi, but his identity changes when he becomes "Noodles": a thug who might be played by James Cagney in a 1930s gangster film. As a young ghetto girl, Deborah spouts poetry; she goes on to become a renowned actress, and enjoys the glitter and fame of movie star life. As an actress, she can play roles that are as far-removed from the ghetto as Saks Fifth Avenue is from the Lower East Side. In the film's major plot twist, it is revealed that Max, whom the elderly Noodles has thought dead for over thirty years, has become the rich, powerful "Secretary Bailey." Max, in fact, twice reinvents himself. He changes from ghetto kid to gangster, and from gangster to "Secretary Bailey." Despite these transformations, there remains a sense of sadness to their lives, if only because they can never really escape their roots. This is especially the case with Noodles. Despite the level of power he achieves during Prohibition, he spends many of his formative years in prison. After his cronies are killed—a symbolic act which occurs in 1933, at the tail end of Prohibition—he is marked for death. He escapes from New York and fades into obscurity, passing the decades in Buffalo where, as he explains, he has been "going to bed early" every night. Even if, like Max, he had been able to maintain his power, his background and the coarseness of his personality would never have allowed him to mingle confidently among the elite. This, in fact, is precisely the case with Max. He may have become "Secretary Bailey," and may live on a palatial Long Island estate, but he is an aged variation of a crude, crazy street kid. His wealth is not inherited, but has been earned via unsavory means. Not without irony, his past is coming to public light, as he is the focus of what has come to be known in the media as the "Bailey scandal."

On another level, Once Upon a Time in America serves as an account of the manner in which power is achieved in America. Its scenario covers the establishment of, and gangland influence in, the Teamsters Union, with Treat Williams appearing as a thinly-veiled version of James Hoffa. Leone's point is that, in America—the "land of opportunity"—power and riches can only be achieved by corruption and thuggery.

If Once Upon a Time in the West is Leone's masterwork, Once Upon a Time in America—the last feature he completed before his death in 1989—is his most challenging film. Unfortunately, both were severely edited when released in the United States; Once Upon a Time in America came to theaters in a muddled, truncated 139 minutes. The complete version runs 227 minutes, and is available on video.

—Rob Edelman and Audrey E. Kupferberg

ONCE UPON A TIME IN THE WEST

See C'ERA UNA VOLTA IL WEST

ONE FLEW OVER THE CUCKOO'S NEST

USA, 1975

Director: Milos Forman

Production: Fantasy Films; Deluxe color, 35mm; running time: 134 minutes.

One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest

Producers: Saul Zaentz, Michael Douglas; screenplay: Lawrence Hauben, Bo Goldman, based on the novel by Ken Kesey; photography: Haskell Wexler; editor: Richard Chew, Lynzee Klingman, Sheldon Kahn; assistant directors: Irby Smith, William St. John; production design: Paul Sylbert; art director: Edwin O'Donovan; music: Jack Nitzsche; sound editor: Mary McGlone, Robert R. Rutledge, Veronica Selver; sound recording: Lawrence Jost; costumes: Agnes Rodgers.

Cast: Jack Nicholson (Randall P. McMurphy); Louise Fletcher (Nurse Ratched); Will Sampson (Chief Bromden); Brad Dourif (Billy Bibbit); William Redfield (Harding); Christopher Lloyd (Taber); Sydney Lassick (Cheswick); Danny De Vito (Martini); Delos V. Smith Jr. (Scanton); Scatman Crothers (Spivey); Marya Small (Candy); William Duell (Sefelt); Louisa Moritz (Rose); Dean R. Brooks (Dr. Spivey); Michael Berryman (Ellis).

Awards: Oscars for Best Picture, Best Director, Best Actor (Nicholson), Best Actress (Fletcher), and Best Adapted Screenplay, 1975.

Publications

Books:

Poizot, Claude, Milos Forman, Paris, 1987.

Slater, Thomas J., Milos Forman: A Bio-Bibliography, Connecticut, 1987.

Aycock, Wendell, and Michael Schoenecke, Film and Literature: A Comparative Approach to Adaptation, Lubbock, Texas, 1988.
 Brode, Douglas, The Films of Jack Nicholson, New York 1990, 1996.
 Goulding, Daniel J., Five Filmmakers, Indianapolis, 1994.
 Forman, Milos, and Jan Novak, Turnaround: A Memoir, London, 1994, 1996.

Articles:

Walker, B., Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1975.
Variety (New York), 19 November 1975.
 Cowie, P., and A. Ayles, Focus on Film (New York), Winter 1975–76.
 MacReadie, M., Films in Review (New York), January 1976.
 Milne, T., Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February 1976.
 Treilhou, M.C., "Une vieille imagerie de la folle" in Cinéma (Paris), January 1976.
 Maupin, F., Image et Son (Paris), February 1976.
 Combs, R., Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1976.
 Benoit, C., Jeune Cinéma (Paris), March 1976.
 Ciment, M., "Une expérience américaine" in Positif (Paris), March 1976.
 Martin, M., Ecran (Paris), March 1976.
 Dawson, I., Cinema Papers (Melbourne), March–April 1976.
 Sineux, M., "Big Mother Is Watching you" in Positif (Paris), March 1976.
 Gow, G., Films and Filming (London), April 1976.
 Daney, S., "Réserves" in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1976.
 Van Wert, W., "An Aerial View of the Nest" in Jump Cut (Berkeley), Summer 1976.
 Hunter, I., Cinema Papers (Melbourne), June–July 1976.
 McCreddie, Marsha, "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest: Some Reasons for One Happy Adaptation," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 5, no. 2, Spring 1977.
 Safer, E.B., "'It's the Truth Even if It Didn't Happen': Ken Kesey's One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 5, no. 2, Spring 1977.
 Wexler, Haskell, and M. Douglas, in American Film, vol. 4, no. 10, September 1979.
 Gow, G., in Films and Filming (London), no. 422, December 1989.
 Warchol, T., "The Rebel Figure in Milos Forman's American Films," in New Orleans Review, vol. 17, no. 1, 1990.
 Sadowsky, G.R., and R.E. Sadowsky, "Different Approaches to Psychopathology and Symbolism in the Novel and Film One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," in Literature and Psychology, vol. 37, no. 1/2, 1991.
 Zubizarreta, J., "The Disparity of Point of View in One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 22, no. 1, January 1994.
 Raskin, R., "Set Up/Pay-Off and a Related Figure," in P.O.V., no. 2, December 1996.

* * *

One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest—the first film to win Academy Awards for Best Picture, Director, Actor, Actress and Screenplay

since It Happened One Night in 1934—is more than a superlative human drama. It is, on a broader level, one of the seminal works of its time in that it keenly reflects the systematic stifling of individuality within post-World War II American society.

The year is 1963, and Randall Patrick McMurphy (Jack Nicholson) is a new patient in a mental ward. He has been sent there from a prison work farm because he is a nonconformist, and so the authorities, having labelled him “belligerent,” “resentful” and “lazy,” want to evaluate him and determine if he is mentally ill.

McMurphy’s “problem” is that he is a logic-minded individual in a society ruled by bureaucratic illogic. McMurphy dares to think for himself, and question authority. He resists taking his medication, and makes a perfectly rational declaration to Mildred Ratched (Louise Fletcher), the ward’s head nurse: “I don’t like the idea of taking something if I don’t know what it is.” Her immediate response—“Don’t get upset, Mr. McMurphy”—mirrors the manner in which those in power will pigeonhole the individual who questions the rules. Of course, McMurphy does not belong in a mental ward, but his objection to blind authority makes him as much a threat to society as the worst kind of sociopath. “He’s not crazy,” one of the hospital doctors tellingly observes at one point, “but he’s dangerous.”

The situation on Nurse Ratched’s ward goes directly against McMurphy’s nature. His fellow patients are compliant and spiritless. They lack individuality, and are so drugged out on medication that their emotions are warped and exaggerated. The two key ones are Billy Bibbit (Brad Dourif), who incessantly stutters, and Chief Bromden (Will Sampson), a towering Indian who is presented as being deaf and dumb. McMurphy eventually learns that many of the men are self-committed, and have the freedom to leave at any time they choose. In other words, they have been so repressed by society that they have willingly accepted their fate.

McMurphy maintains his individuality by wearing jeans and colored shirts, while his fellow patients mostly are garbed in white, antiseptic hospital gowns. He promptly goes about goading the men, and showing them that it is better to try and fail than to meekly accept an unsatisfactory status quo. From the outset, he attempts to elicit a response from Chief Bromden, who eventually reveals to McMurphy that he indeed can speak and hear, but has chosen to close himself off from a society that is neck-deep in hypocrisy.

McMurphy and his irrepressible spirit are the best therapy for the men, who soon begin using their minds and expressing their feelings. The major villain of the piece is Nurse Ratched. Beneath her outwardly soothing demeanor is a neurotic, sexually repressed woman who relishes controlling the patients. She wants McMurphy kept in the hospital rather than returned to the work farm, because she is determined to break him. She knows that he will be set free once his prison sentence is completed. If he remains in the hospital, he will be under her control.

The mental ward in One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest serves as a metaphor for American society, the point being that citizens are inmates of that society. They are expected to conform, by fitting in as members of a status quo. Even more specifically, as a mirror of post-World War II America, the scenario depicts a specific point in history where conformity was encouraged and free-thinking was a perilous endeavor. During the late 1940s and 50s, the House Un-American Activities Committee was allowed to strip citizens of their constitutional rights, throw them in jail, blacklist them from their jobs. In the 1960s came the escalation of the war in Vietnam; “good, patriotic Americans” supported the war, while “un-American communist dupes” protested it. One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest takes on a political edge when McMurphy urges the patients to “be good Americans” and vote for changing their work detail schedule so that they may watch a World Series game on television. The analogy here is that it is the American way to think and choose for oneself, and even change a system if that system does not benefit the majority. Furthermore, what is more American than watching baseball! By coming together as a group and altering the rules, the men simply are exercising their rights as American citizens.

It is most interesting, then, that the film’s director, Milos Forman, is not American-born. He is from Czechoslovakia, and was one of the leading directors of his country’s “new wave” before Russian tanks rolled through the streets of Prague in August, 1968. As such, his background allows him insight into the manner in which freedom of expression may be stifled by authority.

One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest also reflects on the sexual repression of pre-1960s American society. McMurphy had been jailed for statutory rape, yet he points out that his sex partner was “fifteen going on thirty-five. . . she told me she was eighteen, and was very willing. . . .” His argument is that he had not committed rape, or sexually abused a child—his partner was acquiescent, and presented herself as above the age of consent, so where is his crime? Additionally, in group therapy sessions, Nurse Ratched constantly brings up topics relating to problems the men have had with wives and girlfriends. Near the finale, McMurphy smuggles two young women into the ward, and Billy Bibbit loses his virginity to one of them. Afterwards, he no longer stutters. “No, I’m not,” he proudly responds to Nurse Ratched’s asking him if he is “ashamed.” But the nurse craftily exploits Billy’s weaknesses. She summarily squeezes the manhood out of him by declaring, “What worries me is how your mother’s going to take this.” Not only does Billy begin stammering again, he promptly commits suicide.

McMurphy, the autonomous rascal, might have escaped to freedom during all of this. But he has been transformed by his stay in the ward in that he has developed a sense of responsibility towards his new-found friends, and feels compelled to remain on the scene. He knows that Nurse Ratched—the twisted authority figure in a repressed society—is directly responsible for Billy’s suicide. While McMurphy’s fate is a sad one—he is lobotomized into a glassy-eyed zombie—the story ends on a positive note as Chief Bromden crashes out of the ward to freedom. The point—ever so meaningfully illustrated—is that the individual may fail in his quest for liberation, but he still may inspire those around him. His failure is no reason for the next person to remain compliant.

—Rob Edelman

ONE WAY OR ANOTHER

See DE CIERTA MANERA

ONLY THE HOURS

See RIEN QUE LES HEURES

ORDET

---

(The Word)

Denmark, 1955

Director: Carl Theodor Dreyer

Production: Palladium (Copenhagen); black and white, 35mm; running time: 124 minutes; length: 3440 meters. Released 10 January 1955, Denmark.

Screenplay: Carl Theodor Dreyer, from the play by Kaj Munk; photography: Henning Bendtsen; editor: Edith Schlüssel; sound: Knud Kristensen; art director: Erik Aaes; music: Poul Schierbeck; costume designer: N. Sanat Jensen; dialogue expert: Svend Poulsen. Filmed in and near Veders, Denmark, Venice Film Festival, Leone d'Oro, 1955.

Cast: Henrik Malberg (Morten Borgen); Emil Hass Christensen (Mikkel, his son); Preben Lerdorff Rye (Johannes, his son); Cay Kristiansen (Andre, his son); Birgitte Federspiel (Inger, Mikkel's wife); Ann Elisabeth (Maren); Susanne (Little Inger); Ove Rud (The priest); Ejnar Federspiel (Peter the tailor); Sylvia Eckhausen (Kirstine, the tailor's wife); Gerda Nielsen (Anne, the tailor's daughter); Henry Skjaer (The doctor); Hanne ågesen (Karen); Edith Thrane (Mette Maren); Kirsten Andreasen and the peasants and fisherman of the district of Veders.

Publications

Script:

Dreyer, Carl Theodor, Ordet, in Five Films of Carl Theodor Dreyer, Copenhagen, 1964; also in Four Screenplays of Carl Theodor Dreyer, London, 1970.

Books:

Neergaard, Ebbe, Carl Theodor Dreyer: A Film Director's Work, London, 1950.

Trolle, Børge, The Art of Carl Dreyer: An Analysis, Copenhagen, 1955.

Bowser, Eileen, The Films of Carl Dreyer, New York, 1964.

Dreyer, Carl Theodor, Om Filmen, Copenhagen, 1964.

Monty, Ib, Portrait of Carl Th. Dreyer, Copenhagen, 1965.

Dyssegaard, Soren, editor, Carl Th. Dreyer, Danish Film Director, Copenhagen, 1968.

Perrin, Claude, Carl Th. Dreyer, Paris, 1969.

Sémolué, Jean, Carl Th. Dreyer, Paris, 1970.

Milne, Tom, The Cinema of Carl Dreyer, New York, 1971.

Skoller, Donald, editor, Dreyer in Double Reflection, New York, 1973.

Nash, Mark, editor, Dreyer, London, 1977.

Tone, Pier Giorgio, Carl Theodor Dreyer, Florence, 1978.

Bordwell, David, The Films of Carl Theodor Dreyer, Berkeley, 1981.

Carney, Raymond, Speaking the Language of Desire: The Films of Carl Dreyer, New York, 1989.

Jensen, Jytte, editor, The Films of Carl Theodor Dreyer, New York, 1989.

Dreyer, Carl Theodor, Dreyer in Double Reflection: Carl Dreyer's Writings on Film, Cambridge, 1991.

Drum, Jean, and Dale D. Drum, My Only Great Passion: The Life and Films of Carl Theodor Dreyer, Lanham, 2000.

Articles:

Ecran Français (Paris), 11 November 1947.

Wahl, Jan, "Ordet og billederne," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), no. 3, 1954.

Bianco e Nero (Rome), no. 9–10, 1955.

Fønns, Mogens, in Films in Review (New York), no. 1, 1955.

Neergaard, Ebbe, in Sight and Sound (London), no. 4, 1955.

Trolle, Børge, "The World of Carl Dreyer," in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1955–56.

Rohmer, Eric, "Une Alceste chrétienne," in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), no. 55, 1956.

Séguin, Louis, in Positif (Paris), no. 16, 1956.

Schein, Harry, "Mankind on the Border," in Quarterly of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Spring 1956.

Luft, Herbert, "Carl Dreyer—A Master of his Craft," in Quarterly of Film, Radio, and Television (Berkeley), Winter 1956.

Mekas, Jonas, in Film Culture (New York), no. 1, 1958.

Montanari, Armando, "Ordet, la critica, e Kierkegaard," in Cinema Nuovo (Turin), no. 134, 1958.

Bruno, Eduardo, in Filmcritica (Rome), no. 88, 1959.

Luft, Herbert, "Dreyer," in Films and Filming (London), June 1961.

Bond, Kirk, "The World of Carl Dreyer," in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1965.

Kosmorama (Copenhagen), June 1968.

Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1968.

Adams Sitney, P., editor, "Metaphysic of Ordet," in The Film Culture Reader, New York, 1970.

Vaughan, Dai, "Carl Dreyer and the Theme of Choice," in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1974.

Petric, Vlada, "Dreyer's Concept of Abstraction," in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1975.

Thomsen, C.B., "Mirakulos eller monstros," in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), vol. 35, no. 187, Spring 1989.

Minguet Batllori, J.M., "Carl Theodore Dreyer: clasicismo y cine," in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 5, January 1991.

Miguez, M., in Nosferatu (San Sebastian), no. 5, January 1991.

* * *

By any critical standard, Carl Dreyer's Ordet (The Word) is an enormously accomplished work of film art. It combines what might be in others' hands an unwieldy mix: formal and technical mastery, a clean (illusory), simple style and, a qualification seen in all of his best films, enormous depth of atmosphere for powerful results.

Ordet

Adapted from a play by Kaj Munk, a Lutheran pastor murdered by the Nazis for speaking out against them, Dreyer changed the ending and more than halved the dialogue, thus streamlining, “purifying” the play to extend it beyond a filmed moral parable that many reviewers limited it to. Indeed, there is a cinematic authenticity that is subtle but integral. The power of the play is magnified many times.

A young theology student, through overwork (or, for Munk’s reason, studying Kierkegaard!), loses his grip on sanity, becoming convinced he is Christ. Now home, he lives with his father, brother Anders, and other brother Mikkel, who is married to Inger. Anders loves the tailor’s daughter, Anne, but in true Romeo and Juliet tradition, both families refuse any union, because of antagonistic religious divisions. It is not until Inger suffers a miscarriage and dies that the quarrelling neighbours are united, as are the two young lovers. “Nobody thought to ask Inger back from Death,” says Johannes. “She will rot because the times are rotten.” Only Inger’s daughter Maren believes in Johannes’ ability to perform miracles. Because of her, or for her, he pronounces the word which brings Inger back to the living.

As with many of his films, Dreyer has sculpted a film with a life versus death theme; however, as Jeanne d’Arc and Vredens Dag (Day of Wrath) existed in a historical world, and Vampyr in a dream world, Ordet is very much in today’s. Yet the underlying mood is spiritual, deliberate, thoughtful, conveying not only the gravity of his characters’ existence, but the collective Nordic consciousness about the transience of life, of love, and, especially, of belief.

Because every image is measured—with the formal construction Dreyer is known for, each survives on its own as a beautiful still—Ordet withstands not only the more orthodox, critical interpretation but the viewer’s own, on varying levels; the combination of Munk’s text and Dreyer’s visualisation creates a third “presence” the way the fusion of a playwright’s character and an actor’s portrayal does. His style—cool, stylised, austere, with sharp matte blacks and luminous whites, as opposed to the tonality of his other works—is one of elimination, simplicity for the stern Lutheran “spiritual content.” (The dialogue is more to be heard for its argument and exploration, less for the evocative quality as in Vampyr.) Even in the sequence where Ingrid gives birth, pivotal for both character and plot as is Jeanne’s trial, Leone’s blood transfusion in Vampyr and Anne’s “trial” in Vredens Dag, the doctor’s movements accord exactly with the beating of a pulse. And with Dreyer's long takes, some lasting 8 minutes, we are insinuated into the hearts and souls of Ordet's personalities.

