CHAPTER I.

NARRATIVE OF CIVIL AND MILITARY TRANSACTIONS.

James I.—a. d. 1603.

S soon as Elizabeth breathed her last, Lady Scrope, a daughter of her relative, the late Lord Hunsdon, communicated the intelligence to her brother, Sir Robert Carey, who had been on the watch; and who, anticipating Cecil and the other lords of the council, stole out of the palace at Richmond, where the queen had expired at three o'clock on the morning of Thursday, the 24th of March, and posted down to Scotland, in order to be the first to hail James Stuart as King of England. This tender relative arrived at Edinburgh on the night of Saturday the 26th, four days before Sir Charles Percy and Thomas Somerset, Esq., who were dispatched by the council; but it was agreed with James to keep the great matter a secret, until the formal dispatch from London should reach him.[1] Sir Robert Carey had scarcely taken horse for the north when Cecil, Nottingham, Egerton, and others, met in secret debate at Richmond, at an early hour, before the queen's death was known; and these lords, "knowing above all things delays to be most dangerous," proceeded at once to London, and drew up a proclamation in the name "of the lords spiritual and temporal, united and assisted with the late queen's council, other principal gen-

[1] In Lodge's Illustrations of British History there is a letter to the king from one John Ferrour, who claims to have been "prime messenger of glad tidings about the decease of Queen Elizabeth," and begs a reward for that good service. But we can scarcely agree with Mr. Lodge in taking this letter as a proof that the old story told by Sir Robert Carey himself, in his Memoirs, and by Stow, as well as Weldon, about Sir Robert Carey, is incorrect. We are not informed that Ferrour's claim was allowed. This man may have fancied himself "prime messenger" without being so. We know that several eager courtiers ran a race to Edinburgh, and that James thought well to conceal their arrival. Afterward, when all was settled, there would be no motive for keeping up the mystery, and then the court seems to have given the honor to Sir Robert.

tlemen, the lord mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London, a multitude of other good subjects and commons of the realm." This proclamation bore thirty-six signatures, the three first being those of Robert Lee, Lord Mayor of London, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Lord Keeper Egerton; the three last, these of Secretary Sir Robert Cecil, Sir J. Fortescue, and Sir John Popham. It was signed and ready about five hours after Elizabeth's decease; and then those who had signed it went out of the council-chamber at Whitehall, with Secretary Cecil at their head, who had taken the chief direction of the business, and who, in the front of the palace, read to the people the proclamation, which assured them that the queen's majesty was really dead, and that the right of succession was wholly in James King of Scots, now King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, etc. They then went to the High Cross in Cheapside, where Cecil again read the proclamation, "most distinctly and audibly;" and when he had done, "the multitude with one consent cried aloud—'God save King James!'" for all parties, or rather the three great religious sects, High Churchmen, Puritans, and Papists, all promised themselves advantages from his accession. Cecil next caused three heralds and a trumpeter to proclaim the said tidings within the walls of the Tower, where the heart of many a state-prisoner leaped for joy, and where the Earl of Southampton, the friend of the unfortunate Essex, joined the rest in their signs of great gladness. After consulting for a time in Sheriff Pemerton's house, they sent notice of the happy and peaceable proceeding into the country, and to the authorities in the provincial towns; but notwithstanding the expedition of the messengers, many gentlemen got secret intelligence beforehand, and, in divers places, James had been proclaimed without order or warrant.[1] Of the other thirteen or fourteen conflicting claims to the succession which had been reckoned up at different times during Elizabeth's reign, not one appears to have been publicly mentioned, or even alluded to; and the right of James, though certainly not indisputable, was allowed to pass unquestioned.[2]

[1] Stow.—Weldon.—Osborne.—Memoirs of Sir Robert Carey.

[2] The only pretensions, however, that could with any show of law or reason come into competition with those of James, were those of the representative of Henry VIII.'s younger sister Mary, Duchess of Suffolk, to whose heirs Henry was affirmed by his will to have limited the succession, on failure of the heirs of his three children. But although this will, having been made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, would have been legally valid if authentic, it is more than doubtful if it ever really received the royal signature. (See in support of its authenticity the reasoning of Mr. Hallam, Const. Hist., vol. i. pp. 307-317; and the apparently conclusive reply of Dr. Lingard, Hist. Eng., vol. vi. note L., edit. of 1838.) At the time of the death of Queen Elizabeth, the supposed representative of the Duchess of Suffolk was the son of her granddaughter Catherine, by Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, to whom it was asserted that she had been privately married. But that any such marriage took place was never satisfactorily proved. The boy in question, however, was called by his father's second title of Lord Beauchamp; and his eldest son, previously known as Earl and Marquis of Hertford,—the same who married the Lady Arabella Stuart, to be presently mentioned,—was restored to the title of Duke of Somerset in 1660. Whatever claim the House of Suffolk might have to the crown was afterward transferred to the present Duke of Northumberland, by the marriage of Elizabeth, daughter of the eighth Duke of Somerset, with Sir Hugh Smithson, the first Duke of Northumberland of the last creation.

Such had been the able management of Cecil—such was the readiness of the nation to acknowledge the Scottish king, or their laudable anxiety to avoid a disputed succession and civil war.

There was one person, however, whose claim excited uneasiness in the cautious mind of Cecil,—this was the Lady Arabella Stuart, daughter of the Earl of Lennox, younger brother of James's father, Darnley, and descended equally from the stock of Henry VII.[1] This young lady was by birth an Englishwoman, a circumstance which had been considered by some as making up for her defect of primogeniture, for James, though nearer, was a born Scotchman and alien. Cecil for some time had had his eye upon the Lady Arabella, and she was now safe in his keeping. Eight hundred dangerous or turbulent persons, indistinctly described as "vagabonds," were seized in two nights in London, and sent to serve on board the Dutch fleet. No other outward precautions were deemed necessary by the son of Burghley, who calmly waited the coming of James and his own great reward, without asking for any pledge for the privileges of parliament, the liberties of the people, or the reform of abuses which had grown with the growing prerogative of the crown. But these were things altogether overlooked, not only by Cecil and Nottingham and those who acted with them, but also by the parties opposed to them, the most remarkable man among whom was Sir Walter Raleigh, who, like all the other courtiers or statesmen, looked entirely to his own interest or aggrandizement. Few or none could have been insensible to the advantage likely to accrue from the peaceful union of England and Scotland under one sovereign, with the cessation of those border wars which kept both sides of the Tweed in perpetual turmoil and confusion; and it may be that this bright prospect tended (together with the bright hope of personal advancement) to render the English statesmen subservient and careless at this important crisis.

Between the spiritual pride and obstinacy of his clergy, the turbulent, intriguing habits of his nobles, and his own poverty, James had led rather a hard life in Scotland. He was eager to take possession of England, which he looked upon as the very Land of Promise; but so poor was he that he could not begin his journey until Cecil sent him down money. He asked for the crown jewels of England for the queen his wife; but the council did not think fit to comply with this request; and, on the 6th day of April, he set out for Berwick, without wife or jewels. On arriving at that ancient town, he fired off, with his own hand, a great piece of ordnance, an unusual effort of courage on his part. On the same day he wrote to his "right trusty and right well beloved cousins and counselors, the lords and others of his privy council at London," thanking them for the money which they had sent, telling them that he would hasten his journey as much as conveniently he might,—that he intended to tarry awhile at the city of York, and to make his entry therein in some such solemn manner as appertained to his dignity, and that, therefore, he should require that all such things as they in their wisdom thought meet should be sent down to York. He did not press the lords of the council to go so far north to meet him, "the journey being so long," but he hinted that their going would be agreeable to him. The body of Elizabeth was still above ground, and it would have been regular in him to attend her funeral in person. He assured the lords that he could be well contented to do that, and all other honor he might, unto "the queen defunct;" and he referred it to their consideration, whether it would be more honor for her to have the funeral finished before he came, or to wait and have him present at it. Cecil and his friends knew what all this meant, and hastened the funeral; there was no rejoicing successor present; but fifteen hundred persons, in deep mourning, voluntarily followed the body of Elizabeth to Westminster Abbey. In the same letter James asked for coaches, horses, litters, jewels, stuffs, and "the use of a lord chamberlain which was very needful;" and as the Lord Hunsdon was indisposed, he thought proper to appoint the Lord Thomas Howard of Walden to exercise that office. The king was a slow traveler. Seven days after, or on the 13th of April, he had got no farther than Newcastle, whence he wrote another letter, commanding coins of different denominations to be struck in gold and silver, "forasmuch as the custom of his progenitors, kings of this realm, had been, to have some new moneys made in their own name against the day of their coronation." He gave minute directions as to arms, quarterings, and mottoes. Around the arms of France, and England, and Scotland, and the harp of Ireland, was to be written Exurgat Deus, dissipentur inimici: and, on the other side, around his head, crowned, was to be inscribed the style Jacobus Dei gratia Angliæ, Scotiæ, Franciæ, et Hiberniæ Rex, &c. By the 15th of April he had reached the house of Sir William Ingleby at Topcliff, and from that place he wrote a curious letter to the lord keeper, the lord treasurer, the lord admiral, the master of the horse, and the principal secretary for the time being. All his circumlocution and care could not conceal his ill-humor at their not coming to meet him, and their still delaying to send the crown jewels. He assured them that he would not stay anywhere on the road above one day until he came to Theobalds in Hertfordshire, where he hoped to be on the 28th or 29th of the month.[1] But he did not equal even this slow rate of traveling, loitering three days at York, and seldom going more than fifteen miles a-day. At York he was met and welcomed by the crafty Cecil, who had a secret conference with his majesty, which must have been very full of meaning. On the 21st he was at Newark-upon-Trent, where he gave people a foretaste of his disposition to arbitrary government. "For in this town, and in the court, was taken a cut-purse doing the deed, and being a base, pilfering thief, yet was all gentlemanlike in the outside: this fellow had good store of coin found about him, and, upon examination, confessed that he had, from Berwick to that place, played the cut-purse in the court. The king, hearing of this gallant, directed a warrant to the recorder of Newark to have him hanged, which was accordingly executed," the man being hanged without any legal trial.[1] It is said that James, in conversing with some of his English counselors about his prerogative, exclaimed joyously, "Do I make the judges? Do I make the bishops? Then, God's wounds! I make what likes me law and gospel!" Though he had hardly ever had the due and proper authority of a king in his own country, he had long indulged in a speculative absolutism, and, as far as his cowardice and indolence allowed him, he came fully prepared to rule the people of England as a despot. To enliven his journey, he hunted along the road. He was a miserable horseman, but his courtiers invented for him a sort of "hunting made easy;" yet, notwithstanding their system and his own great caution, his majesty got a fall off his horse, near Belvoir Castle. "But God be thanked," adds Cecil, in relating the accident to the ambassador in France, "he hath no harm at all by it, and it is no more than may befall any other great and extreme rider as he is, at least once every month."[2] As he approached the English capital, hosts of courtiers and aspirants after places hurried to meet him and pay their homage. Among these the last was not the great Francis Bacon, who, in a letter to the Earl of Northumberland, has left us a curious record of his first impressions:—"Your lordship," says Bacon, "shall find a prince the furthest from vain glory that may be, and rather like a prince of the ancient form than of the latter time: his speech is swift and cursory, and in the full dialect of his nation, and in speech of business short, in speech of discourse large. He affecteth popularity by gracing them that are popular, and not by any fashions of his own: he is thought somewhat general in his favors; and his virtue of access is rather because he is much abroad, and in press, than that he giveth easy audience; he hasteneth to a mixture of both kingdoms and nations, faster, perhaps, than policy will well bear. I told your lordship once before my opinion, that methought his majesty rather asked counsel of the time past than of the time to come."[3]

[1] James's claim, however, was not at all through his father, Lord Darnley, but through his mother, who, as the granddaughter of James IV. by his wife Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII., was, after Elizabeth, the next representative of that king. The Lady Arabella and her uncle, Lord Darnley, were descended from the same Margaret Tudor, but by her second marriage with Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lennox.

Other persons who were not, as Bacon was, afraid of going further into these tender arguments, expressed astonishment, if not disgust, at the very unroyal person and behavior of the new sovereign, whose legs were too weak to carry his body,—whose tongue was too large for his mouth,—whose eyes were goggle, rolling, and yet vacant,—whose apparel was neglected and dirty,—whose whole appearance and bearing was slovenly and ungainly, while his unmanly fears were betrayed by his wearing a thickly-wadded dagger-proof doublet, and by many other ridiculous precautions. These cotemporary portraits may be somewhat overcharged here and there: we may suspect a little of the national prejudice against the Scots; but, even after every rational deduction, we can not doubt for a moment that the son of the beautiful and graceful Mary was totally deficient in all personal graces, those important ingredients in the composition of a prince. To such as hungered after the honors of knighthood, he may have appeared in a more favorable light, for, as he went along, he profusely distributed these honors. Before he left Scotland he knighted the son of the lieutenant of the Tower of London; at Berwick he knighted two more Englishmen, at Widrington he knighted eleven, at York thirty-one, at Worksop, in Nottinghamshire, eighteen, at Newark Castle eight, on the road between Newark and Belvoir Castle four, at Belvoir Castle forty-five: in fact he appears to have bestowed the honor of knighthood on nearly every person that came to him during this hey-day journey. At last, on the 3d of May, he reached Theobalds, the sumptuous seat of Secretary Cecil, where, as at other gentlemen's houses at which he had stayed, he was astonished at the luxury, comparative elegance, and comfort he found. He was met by all the lords of the late queen's council, who kneeled down and did their homage, after which the Lord Keeper Egerton made a grave oration, in the name of all, signifying their assured love and allegiance. On the morrow he made twenty-eight more knights.

But it was not for these operations that Cecil had induced him to take Theobalds on his way: and during the four days which the king passed there, that wily statesman ingratiated himself with his new master, and remodeled a cabinet very much (though not entirely) to his own satisfaction. The chief objects of Cecil's present jealousy were the Earl of Northumberland, Lord Grey, Lord Cobham, and the versatile, intriguing, and ambitious Sir Walter Raleigh, who, very fortunately for Cecil, had given grounds of offense to the king. Northumberland, who employed the cogent advocacy and eloquent tongue of Bacon, was promised a share in the king's favor; but Cobham and Grey were cut off from promotion, and Raleigh, who aspired to the highest posts, was deprived of the subordinate ones which he had held.[1] Cecil was retained, together with his friends Nottingham, Henry and Thomas Howard, Buckhurst, Mountjoy, and Egerton, to whom James added four Scottish lords and his secretary, Elphinstone, a nomination which instantly caused jealousy and discontent.

On the 7th of May, the king moved toward London, and was met at Stamford Hill by the lord mayor and aldermen of London, in scarlet robes; and about six o'clock in the evening he arrived at the Charter House, where he made some more knights. On the same day, proclamation was made that all the monopolies granted by the late queen should be suspended till they had been examined by the king and council,[1]—that all royal protections that hindered men's suits in law should cease, and that the oppressions done by saltpetre-makers, purveyors, and cart-takers, for the use of the court, should be put down. These were valuable instalments if they had been held sacred; but a few days after, James, "being a prince above all others addicted to hunting," issued another proclamation, prohibiting all manner of persons whatsoever from killing deer, and all kinds of wild-fowl used for hunting and hawking, upon pain of the severest penalties.[2]

From the Charter House, James removed to the Tower, where he made more knights, and from the Tower he proceeded to Greenwich, where he made more. By the time he had set foot in his palace of Whitehall, he had knighted two hundred individuals of all kinds and colors, and before he had been three months in England he had lavished the honor on some seven hundred; nor was he very chary even of the honor of the English peerage, which Elizabeth held at so high a price. He presently made four earls and nine barons, among whom was Cecil, who became Lord Cecil, afterward Viscount Cranborne, and finally Earl of Salisbury. Several of the English promotions excited surprise and derision; but these feelings gave place to more angry passions when he elevated his Scottish followers to seats in the House of Lords. Before he had done he added sixty-two names to the list of the peerage. This occasioned a pasquinade to be pasted up in St. Paul's, wherein was announced an art to help weak memories to a competent knowledge of the names of the nobility.[3] The English had not yet forgiven Elizabeth the execution of their darling Essex, and other things which cast a gloom on the last years of her reign; but they were irritated at hearing so immeasurably inferior a person as James speak with contempt of the judgment and abilities of that extraordinary woman. He owed her, indeed, little gratitude in his own case; and, as a son, he might have been excused for bearing little affection to the memory of the murderer of his mother. But prudence and decency—particularly on reverting to his own filial conduct—ought to have chained his tongue; and, beside, it was easily perceived that it was not on his mother's account that he maligned his predecessor, but rather out of a mean jealousy of her fame as a mistress of that kingcraft and wisdom which he pretended to possess in greater perfection than any prince since the days of Solomon.

[1] He was allowed to retain the government of the island of Jersey, which had been given to him by Elizabeth.—Ellis's Letters.

[1] Lodge (Illustrations) gives a complete list of these monopolies. One of them gives Symon Farmer and John Crafford an exclusive right "to transport all manner of horns for twenty-one years." One gives Bryan Amersley the sole right of buying steel beyond seas, and of selling the same within this realm. One confines to Ede Schets the sole right of exporting ashes and old shoes for seven years. One gives Sir Walter Raleigh the faculty of dispensing licenses for keeping of taverns and retailing of wines throughout all England. The whole list is curious.

Toward the end of June, James met his queen and his children (with the exception of Charles, his second son, who had been left behind in Scotland) at Windsor Castle, where the young prince Henry, who astonished the English courtiers with his quick, witty answers, princely carriage, and "reverend performing his obeisance at the altar," was installed knight of the Order of the Garter. On the 22d of July, the court removed to Westminster, where the king, in his garden, dubbed knights all the judges, all the sergeants-at-law,[1] all the doctors of civil law, all the gentlemen ushers, and "many others of divers qualities." Splendid preparations had been made for the coronation of the king and queen with pageants and shows of triumph; but as the plague was raging in the city of London and the suburbs, the people were not permitted to go to Westminster to see the sight, but forbidden by proclamation, lest the infection should be further spread—for there died that week in London and the suburbs of all diseases 1103; of the plague 857. To increase the inauspicious aspect of things, the weather was darker and more rainy than had ever been known at such a season.[2] On the 25th of July the coronation took place. On the 5th of August, by the king's orders, there were morning prayers, sermons, and evening prayers, with bonfires at night—all men being charged to praise God for his majesty's escape from the murderous hands of the Earl of Gowry that day three years past; and on the 10th of August, James commanded a fast with sermons of repentance, the like to be done weekly every Wednesday, while the heavy hand of God continued in the plague.[1]

[1] Among the sergeants thus knighted was Francis Bacon. [2] Stow.

However weak might be the personal character of James, the power of the great nation he was called to govern was not to be despised by the contending states on the continent. Almost immediately on his arrival, special ambassadors began to flock from all parts, to congratulate him on his accession, and to win him each to the separate views and interests of his court. As an important state measure, James resolved to make a master of the ceremonies, to receive and entertain all these envoys and princes; and by his letters-patent he appointed Sir Lewis Lewknor, who was the first that held any such office in England. The first embassy that arrived was from the states of Holland, Zealand, and the United Provinces, which stood most in need of English assistance; it was most honorably composed: Frederick Prince of Nassau, son of the Prince of Orange was at the head of it, and he was attended by the great statesmen Falcke, Barnevelt, and Brederode. But they were scarcely arrived when, to oppose them, there came from the opposite party the Count d'Aremberg, as ambassador from the Archduke of Austria, and indirectly as agent for the whole Spanish family. The suitors of Portia in the immortal drama scarcely arrived with more rapidity to woo the beautiful heiress, than did these rival diplomatists to win the good graces of James. Two days after the arrival of D'Aremberg, Rosny, afterward Duke of Sully, the bosom friend of his royal master, came posting to London from Henry IV. of France, who greatly apprehended that the blandishments of D'Aremberg might induce the new and unwarlike king to make peace with Spain, and abandon the cause of the Hollanders, with whom he (Henry IV.) maintained his league. James had no sympathy for the emancipated subjects of Spain, who had prevailed in their struggle for independence, in good part, through the assistance lent to them by Elizabeth; and when over his cups he spoke of the Hollanders as rebels and traitors to their lawful sovereign—for it was a fixed maxim with him, that the people, under no provocation and no extent of wrong, were justifiable in taking up arms against their rulers. The Hollanders, moreover, had not been very grateful for aid, which had been lent from selfish motives, and they were slow in paying the money they owed to England. The Archduke of Austria, on the other hand, showed a great disposition to liberality, and it appears pretty certain that his envoy D'Aremberg would have prevailed with James, had it not been for the address, the winning manners, and the gold of Rosny, who distributed bribes among the needy courtiers, and, it is said, bribed the queen herself. James agreed to, and even ratified a treaty, in which he bound himself with Henry, to send secret assistance in money to the states, and, in case of Philip's attacking France, to join in open hostilites. Rosny departed rejoicing; but it was soon fouud that King James had no money to spare, and that he was resolved to live in peace, even at the cost of the national honor. The great power of Spain had never recovered from the blow of the Armada and the ruinous war in the Netherlands, and it was now rapidly decaying under the imbecile Philip III. and his favorite and minister the Duke of Lerma. Pride prevented the Spanish court from suing directly for a peace, but Philip told some desperate English Catholic plotters that he wished to live in amity with James; and he soon sent over a regular ambassador to negotiate in his own name. Denmark, Poland, the Palatinate, some other German states, Tuscany, and Venice, had already dispatched their envoys, and to all of them the king had said, "Peace at home and abroad! — above all things peace." [1]

But he had already been made acquainted with a plot which he thought threatened not only to disturb peace at home, but also to deprive him of his throne and life. Sir Walter Raleigh, who was smarting with the pangs of disappointed ambition, and transported with jealousy of the prevailing influence of Cecil, formerly his friend, now his bitterest enemy, was further enraged by the king depriving him of his valuable patent of the monopoly of licensing taverns and retailing wines throughout all England, and by seeing his honorable post of captain of the guard bestowed upon one of the Scottish adventurers. In spite of his consummate abilities, he was a rash politician, and our respect for his genius ought not to blind us to the fact that, in the pursuit of rank, power, and wealth, he could be a selfish, dangerous, and remorseless man. His political associate, Lord Cobham, who had joined with him and Cecil in ruining the Earl of Essex, was now equally a disappointed and desperate man, burning with the same hatred against Cecil, and, though dull, and slow to devise, ready to enter into any plot which promised the certain ruin of that astucious minister. The Lord Grey of Wilton, who had partaken in their disgrace, partook also in their discontent and ill-will against Cecil; but he was inspired by higher, or less interested motives, than Raleigh and Cobham. Each of these men had his partisans of inferior condition, and, up to a certain point, the disappointed Earl of Northumberland, whom James had amused with promises "as a child with a rattle," [1] went along with them, and seems to have been a party in intriguing with Rosny and with Beaumont, the resident ambassador of France, who had both been instructed to sow dissensions in the English cabinet, and to overthrow, if possible, the power of Cecil.[2] Here, in part through an accident which happened to him, and in part through irresoluteness, Northumberland stopped. The other three proceeded, at times in concert, at times separately, and with diverging views. They would all have been powerless and clientless but for the unhappy disputes and heartburnings in matters of religion, and the disgust which many men felt at the king being admitted without any pledge or assurance for the redress of grievances, and the better observance of the rights of Parliament. The Puritans, who were still growing in power and consideration, wished for the establishment of a Presbyterian church, somewhat like that which had been set up by Knox and his associates in Scotland; the Catholics wished, for themselves, toleration, and something more; some minor and very weak sects would have been satisfied with simple toleration: but the high-church party—the only true Protestants by Act of Parliament—were determined to oppose all these wishes and claims, and to press for a uniformity of faith to be upheld by the whole power of the penal statutes. Before his coming to the crown of England, James had made large promises to the Catholics; but, on his arrival in London, he threw himself into the arms of the high churchmen, who easily alarmed him as to the intentions of the papists and the anti-monarchical influences of the court of Rome. He swore that he would fight to death against a toleration; and he sent some Irish deputies to the Tower for petitioning for it.[3] The oppressed and impatient began to conspire several weeks before the coronation, and their plots, loosely bound together by their common discontent, were pretty certain to fall asunder of themselves. It should appear that the Catholics, the most oppressed party, took the initiative; but the fact is not certain, and it is impossible to explain by what means they were brought to coalesce with the Puritans, who were more intolerant of their faith than the high churchmen. It is common, however, in the contests of party, for the most opposite sects to unite, in order to carry any point in which they are equally interested at the moment. Sir Griffin Markham, a Catholic of small property or influence, and still less ability, joined with two secular priests, Watson and Clarke, and with George Brooke, a brother of Lord Cobham, and an able but unprincipled man.[1] The priest Watson had been with James in Scotland, previously to Elizabeth's death, to gain his favor for the Catholics; and he said afterward to the council, that the king's broken promises and determination to allow of no toleration to his church had induced him to enter into the plot. He was for a time the chief mover in it: he drew up and administered a terrible oath of secresy, and, together with Clarke, labored and traveled incessantly to induce the Catholic gentry to join the cause. He was, however, remarkably unsuccessful; for, of the Catholic gentry, scarcely one joined the conspirators of any weight or consequence, except Anthony Copley, of the west of England. It was probably on this failure (he must have moved and acted rapidly) that Watson won over the chief leaders of the Puritans by concealing from them the greater part of his views. It might be that he aimed at working his own ends by their means, and then casting them off; as, on the other side, the Puritans might have entertained precisely the same intention, with regard to the Catholics, when they should once have gained the victory over the established church. Lord Grey of Wilton was a Puritan, and, though a young man, the leader of his party; and he entered into the plot, and engaged to furnish one hundred men well mounted. Lord Cobham, and, perhaps, Raleigh, were privy to this conspiracy; but it appears that they took no active part in it, being engaged in a separate plot of their own. Cecil says that Grey was drawn into the "priest's treason" in ignorance that so many papists were engaged in the action, and that as soon as he had knowledge of their numbers, he sought to sever himself from them by dissuading the execution of their project till some future time. This project was, to seize the king's person, and to keep him in confinement (as the Scotch had done before them) till he changed his ministers, and granted a toleration, together with a free pardon to all who had been concerned in the plot. More atrocious designs were imputed to nearly all the parties, but they were never clearly proved. Such was the constitution of the "Bye Plot," as it was called. The "Main," in which Raleigh and Cobham were engaged, was far more compact, but still weak and wild; and George Brooke, the brother-in-law, and suspected tool of Cecil, was engaged in it, as well as in the "Bye." Its objects will be best explained in our account of the trial of Raleigh, though we can not promise an elucidation of the many mysteries it involves.

On the 24th of June, the day appointed by the "Bye" for seizing the king on his road to Windsor, Lord Grey and his hundred men were not at the place of meeting, and the priest Watson and his Catholic friends were too weak to attempt any thing. On the 6th of July Anthony Copley was arrested; and as he was timid and ready to confess, and as Cecil knew already (if not through Brooke, through other parties) of the whole plot of the "Bye," Sir Griffin Markham, the priests Watson and Clarke, and the rest of Copley's confederates, were presently apprehended. Cecil, who appears to have been as well acquainted with the "Main" as with the "Bye," met Sir Walter Raleigh on the terrace at Windsor, and requested his attendance before the lords of the council, then secretly assembled in the castle. Raleigh obeyed the summons, and was instantly questioned touching his friend Cobham's private dealings with the Count d'Aremberg. At first he asserted that there could have been no unwarrantable or treasonable practices between Cobham and that ambassador; but on being further pressed, he said that La Rensy, D'Aremberg's servant, might better explain what passed than he could do. Sir Walter was allowed to depart a free man, and he forthwith wrote a letter to Cecil, recommending him to interrogate La Rensy. It is said that Raleigh then wrote to Cobham, warning him of his danger, and that this letter was intercepted by Cecil. Cobham was called before the council, where, by showing Raleigh's letter to himself, advising him to question D'Aremberg's servant, and by otherwise working on his temper, Cecil made Cobham believe that he had been basely betrayed by Raleigh, and then confess that he had been led into a conspiracy by his friend Sir Walter. Both were secured and committed to the Tower, where, on the 27th of July, two days after the king's coronation, Raleigh is said to have attempted his own life.[1]

On account of the plague, which made the king's ministers, judges, and lawyers flee from place to place, and partly owing to the presence of D'Aremberg, who did not leave England till October, no judicial proceedings were instituted till the 15th of November, when the commoners implicated in the "Bye" were arraigned in Winchester Castle. "Brooke, Markham, Brookesby, Copley, and the two priests, says a narrative of the affair written at the moment, "were condemned for practicing the surprise of the king's person, the taking of the Tower, the deposing of counselors, and proclaiming liberty of religion. They were all condemned upon their own confessions, which were set down under their own hands as declarations, and compiled with such labor and care, to make the matter they undertook seem very feasible, as if they had feared they should not say enough to hang themselves. Pirra[1] was acquitted, being only drawn in by the priests as an assistant, without knowing the purpose; yet, had he gone the same way as the rest (as it is thought), save for a word the Lord Cecil cast in the way as his cause was in handling, that the king's glory consisted as much in freeing the innocent, as condemning the guilty."[2] It had not been thought convenient to place the able Raleigh with these poor blunderers, or to try him for his privity to the "Bye." He was tried upon the "Main;" his trial "served for a whole act, and he played all the parts himself." Raleigh's trial lasted from eight in the morning till eleven at night. "He carried himself both so temperate in all his answers, and answered so wisely and readily to all objections, as it wrought both admiration in the hearers for his good parts and pity toward his person. His answers were interlaced with arguments out of divinity, humanity, civil law, and common law."[3] The only evidence produced against him was the wavering and partly contradictory confession of Cobham, together with a letter written by Cobham the day before, in which he accused Raleigh as the first mover of the plot. The points of treason laid in the indictment were these: — that Sir Walter Raleigh, with other persons, had conspired to kill the king,—to raise a rebellion, with intent to change religion and subvert the government,—and, for that purpose, to encourage and incite the king's enemies to invade the realm. The overt acts charged were, that on the 9th of June, Sir Walter Raleigh had conferred with Lord Cobham about advancing Arabella Stuart to the crown of England; that it was then agreed between them that Lord Cobham should go to the king of Spain and the Archduke of Austria, in order to obtain from them six hundred thousand crowns for the purpose of supporting Arabella Stuart's title; that Arabella Stuart should write letters to the King of Spain, the Archduke, and the Duke of Savoy, and undertake with them these three things: peace with Spain,—toleration of the popish religion in England,—and to marry according to the King of Spain's will. The indictment further charged, that it was agreed that Cobham should return from the continent by Jersey, and there meet Sir Walter Raleigh (who had been allowed to retain the government of that island) to consult further as to the best means of working out the plot, and, as to the public men and others who were to be bribed and bought with the six hundred thousand crowns; that, on the same 9th of June, Lord Cobham communicated the plot to George Brooke, who assented to it; that on the 12th of June, Cobham and Brooke said, "that there never would be a good world in England till the king and his cubs were taken away;" that Raleigh delivered to Cobham a book written against the king's title to the crown; that Cobham, at the instigation of Raleigh, persuaded Brooke to urge Arabella Stuart to write the letters aforesaid; that, on the 19th of June, Cobham wrote letters to the Ambassador d'Aremberg for the advance of six hundred thousand crowns, and sent the letters by La Rensy; that D'Aremberg promised the money; and that then Cobham promised Raleigh that he would give him eight thousand crowns of it, and Brooke one thousand crowns.

[1] Mr. Jardine (Criminal Trials) says, "it is difficult to ascertain what could be Brooke's motive for joining the conspiracy, as he was actuated neither by political nor religious considerations." Mr. Tytler (Life of Raleigh) thinks it extremely probable that Cecil, aware of the intrigues of the Catholic priests, engaged Brooke, who was his brother-in-law, to become a party to their discontents, that he might discover and betray their secrets. And Mr. Tytler quotes several cotemporary documents which go to establish this conviction. Such a scheme was quite in keeping with the character and policy of the son of Burghley.

To this indictment, which indisputably included many absurdities of the invention of James and the crown lawyers, Sir Walter pleaded not guilty. The king's sergeant, Heale, opened the points of the indictment: in the conclusion of his speech he said, with some simplicity, "as for the Lady Arabella, she hath no more title to the crown than I have; and, before God, I utterly renounce any." Raleigh smiled. The great Coke, as attorney-general, then took up the case with excessive heat and bitterness. He began by describing the horrible intentions of the "Bye," among which he mentioned, that the traitors had intended to make proclamation against monopolies. "I pray you, gentlemen of the jury," said Raleigh, "remember I am not charged with the 'Bye,' which was the treason of the priests." "You are not," said Coke, "but it will be seen that all these treasons, though they consisted of several parts, closed in together, like Samson's foxes, which were joined in their tails though their heads were separated." After a deal of pedantry, and some punning, Coke, still connecting the prisoner with the "Bye," Raleigh asked what was the treason of the priests to him. "I will then come close to you," said Coke, "I will prove you to be the most notorious traitor that ever came to the bar: you are indeed upon the 'Main,' but you have followed them of the 'Bye' in imitation." He proceeded with increasing violence, charging Raleigh with things not in the indictment, calling him "a damnable atheist,"—a "spider of hell,"—"the most vile and execrable of traitors!" "You speak indiscreetly, barbarously, and uncivilly," said Raleigh. "I want words!" roared Coke, "I want words to express thy viperous treasons!" "True," replied the witty prisoner, "for you have spoken the same thing half a dozen times over already." In some parts of his remarkable defense, Raleigh rose to a rare eloquence. "I was not so bare of sense," said he, "but I saw that if ever this state was strong and able to defend itself, it was now. The kingdom of Scotland united, whence we were wont to fear all our troubles; Ireland quieted, where our forces were wont to be divided; Denmark assured, whom before we were wont to have in jealousy; the Low Countries, our nearest neighbors, at peace with us; and, instead of a lady whom time had surprised, we had now an active king, a lawful successor to the crown, who was able to attend to his own business. I was not such a madman as to make myself, in this time, a Robin Hood, a Wat Tyler, or a Jack Cade. I knew, also, the state of Spain well,—his weakness, and poorness, and humbleness, at this time; I knew that he was discouraged and dishonored. I knew that six times we had repulsed his forces, thrice in Ireland, thrice at sea, and once at Cadiz, on his own coast. Thrice had I served against him myself at sea, wherein, for my country's sake, I had expended, of my own properties, 4000*l.* I knew that where, beforetime, he was wont to have forty great sails at the least in his ports, now he hath not past six or seven; and, for sending to his Indies, he was driven to hire strange vessels, a thing contrary to the institutions of his proud ancestors, who straitly forbad, in case of any necessity, that the kings of Spain should make their case known to strangers. I knew that of five-and-twenty millions he had from his Indies, he had scarce any left; nay, I knew his poorness at this time to be such that the Jesuits, his imps, were fain to beg at the church doors; his pride so abated as, notwithstanding his former high terms, he was glad to congratulate the king, my master, on his accession, and now cometh creeping unto him for peace. Then, was it ever read or heard of that any prince should disburse so much money without sufficient pawn? And whoso knows what great assurances the King of Spain stood upon with other states for smaller sums will not think that he would so freely disburse to my Lord Cobham six hundred thousand crowns. And if I had minded to set the Lord Cobham to work in such a case, I surely should have given him some instructions how to persuade the King of Spain and answer his objections; for I know Cobham to be no such a minion as could persuade a king, who was in want, to disburse so great a sum without great reason and some assurance for his money. I know the Queen of England lent not her money to the States, but had Flushing, Brill, and other towns in assurance for it: she lent not money to France, but had Newhaven (Havre) for it. Nay, her own subjects, the merchants of London, did not lend her money without having her lands in pawn. What pawn had we to give the king of Spain? What did we offer him?"

Coke said that the Lord Cobham was "a good and honorable gentleman till overtaken by this wretch." Raleigh said that Cobham was "a poor, silly, base, dishonorable soul!" He produced a letter written to him by Cobham in the Tower, in which his lordship protested, upon his soul, and before God and his angels, that he never had conference with Raleigh in any treason, nor was ever moved by Raleigh to the things whereof he had accused him. But Coke produced the letter before alluded to, written by Cobham the day before the trial, and repeating his former accusations.[1] To this Raleigh replied, that Cobham had received a letter from his wife, telling him that there was no way of saving his life but by accusing his friend. He demanded that he and his accuser should be brought face to face: he appealed to the statutes of Edward VI., which required two witnesses for the condemning a man to death on a charge of treason; and to the law of God, or the Jewish law, which made that number of witnesses necessary to prove any capital charge. "If," he said, "you proceed to condemn me by bare inferences, upon a paper accusation, you try me by the Spanish inquisition." At the end of another most eloquent speech, he exclaimed, "My lords, let Cobham be sent for: I know he is in this very house! I beseech you let him be confronted with me! Let him be here openly charged upon his soul,—upon his allegiance to the king,—and if he will then maintain his accusation to my face I will confess myself guilty!" The Lord Chief Justice Popham assured him that the statutes of Edward VI., to which he had appealed, had been annulled in the reign of Philip and Mary, and that he must therefore be tried by the common law, as settled by 25 Edward III., according to which one witness was sufficient, and the accusation of confederates or the confession of others full proof. To his prayer for producing Cobham in court, the crown lawyers paid no attention whatever, persisting in their denunciations and abuse with astounding volubility. But there was not a man less likely to submit easily to the common process of "being talked to death by lawyers:" he could talk with the best of them, and he fought them all, hard and firm, to the last. "I will have the last word for the king!" said Coke. "Nay, I will have the last word for my life!" replied the prisoner. "Go to!—I will lay thee upon thy back for the confidentest traitor that ever came to the bar!" cried Coke. Here Cecil, who, in many a court intrigue in the days of Elizabeth, had been the confederate of Raleigh, and who on this occasion had thought fit to make a decent show of moderation toward his victim, interfered, and told Coke that he was too harsh and impatient. "I am the king's sworn servant," retorted the attorney-general, "and must speak. You discourage the king's counsel, my lord, and encourage traitors." And here Coke sat down in a chafe. In the end, the jury returned a reluctant verdict of guilty. Upon being asked, in the usual form, why judgment should not be passed against him, Sir Walter re-

[1] This letter was as follows:—"I have thought fit to set down this to my lords. Wherein I protest on my soul to write nothing but the truth. I am now come near the period of my time. Therefore I confess the whole truth before God and his angels. Raleigh, four days before I came from the Tower, caused an apple to be thrown in at my chamber-window—the effect of it was to entreat me to right the wrong I had done him in saying that I should come home by Jersey—which, under my hand, I have retracted. His first letter I answered not, which was thrown in the same manner; wherein he prayed me to write him a letter, which I did. He sent me word that the judges met at Mr. Attorney's house, and that there was good hope the proceedings against us would be stayed. He sent me, another time, a little tobacco. At Aremberg's coming, Raleigh was to have procured a pension of 1500*l.* a-year: for which he promised that no action should be against Spain, the Low Countries, or the Indies, but he would give knowledge beforehand. He told me the States had audience with the king. He hath been the original cause of my ruin; for I had no dealing with Aremberg but by his instigation. He hath also been the cause of my discontentment. He advised me not to be overtaken with preachers, as Essex was; and that the king would better allow of a constant denial than to accuse any." Upon this letter Coke commented in this manner:—"Oh, damnable atheist! he hath learnt some text of Scripture to serve his own purpose. He counseled him (Cobham) not to be counseled by preachers as Essex was. Essex died the child of God. God honored him at his death; thou (Raleigh) wast present when he died. Et lupus et turpes instant morientibus ursæ. . . . I doubt not but this day God shall have as great a conquest by this traitor, and the Son of God shall be as much glorified as when it was said Vicisti, Galilæe. You know my meaning."

plied with perfect self-possession, that he was innocent of that whereof Cobham had accused him; that he submitted himself to the king's mercy, and recommended to his majesty's compassion his wife and son of tender years, "unbrought up." The frightful sentence, with all its revolting details, was then pronounced. Sir Walter after this used no words to the court openly, but desired to speak privately with the Earl of Suffolk, the Earl of Devonshire, the Lord Henry Howard, and my Lord Cecil, whom he entreated to be suitors in his behalf to his majesty, that, in regard of the places of honor he had held, his death might be honorable and not ignominious. The lords promised to do their best for him: the court rose, and the undaunted prisoner was carried up again to the castle. Raleigh's conduct gained for him the admiration of his bitterest enemies, and, with the exception of the court cabal, which dreaded his wondrous wit and abilities more than ever, there was scarcely a man in the kingdom but would have become a petitioner for his pardon. "He answered with that temper, wit, learning, courage and judgment, that, save that it went with the hazard of his life, it was the happiest day that ever he spent. And so well he shifted all advantages that were taken against him, that were not fama malum gravius quam res, and an ill name half hanged, in the opinion of all men he had been acquitted. The first two that brought the news to the king were Roger Ashton and a Scotchman; whereof one affirmed, that never any man spoke so well in times past, nor would do in the world to come; and the other said that, whereas, when he saw him first he was so led with the common hatred, that he would have gone a hundred miles to have seen him hanged, he would, ere he parted, have gone a thousand to have saved his life. In one word, never was a man so hated and so popular in so short a time."[1]

The fair and accomplished Lady Arabella, whose name was repeatedly mentioned in the evidence against Raleigh, and who was soon to be more hapless and helpless than the prisoner at the bar, was present at the trial. Cecil said that she, the king's near kinswoman, was innocent of all these things; only she received a letter from my Lord Cobham to prepare her, which she laughed at, and immediately sent it to the king. And the lord admiral (Charles Howard, Earl of Nottingham, formerly Lord Howard of Effingham), who was with the Lady Arabella in a gallery, stood up and said, that the lady there present protested, upon her salvation, that she never dealt in any of these things.[2] It is, indeed, generally admitted that she nevor entertained a hope or a wish of establishing her claim to the throne, and that she was perfectly innocent of any project or plot; yet there was one witness that spoke very grossly and rudely concerning her ladyship.[1] The lords Cobham and Grey were arraigned separately before a commission consisting of eleven earls and nineteen barons.[2] "Cobham," says an eye-witness, "led the way on Friday.... Never was seen so poor and abject a spirit. He heard his indictment with much fear and trembling, and would sometimes interrupt it, by forswearing what he thought to be wrongly inserted..... He said he had changed his mind since he came to the bar; for whereas he came with an intention to have made his confession, without denying any thing, now seeing many things inserted in this indictment with which he could not be charged, being not able in one word to make distinction of many parts, he must plead to all not guilty."[3] He denied having had any design to set up the Lady Arabella, only saying that she had sought his friendship, and his brother Brooke had sought hers. He was all submission and meekness to his judges—all violence against his companions in misfortune. He laid all the blame of what had been done amiss upon Raleigh, exclaiming bitterly against him. He inveighed still more bitterly against his own brother, George Brooke, terming him a corrupt and most wicked wretch, a murderer, a very viper. He accused young Harvey, the son of the lieutenant of the Tower, of having carried letters between him and Raleigh during their confinement, and said that the last letter which had been produced on the trial was the one that contained the truth. "Having thus accused all his friends, and so little excused himself, the peers were not long in deliberation what to judge; and, after sentence of condemnation given, he begged a great while for life and favor, alledging his confession as a meritorious act."[4] To obtain favor he represented that the king's father was his godfather, and that his own father had suffered imprisonment for the king's mother.[5] During the trial, the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, Cecil, and others declared more than once, as from the king, that he would not allow of any toleration in religion, though it should be at the hazard of his crown.[6] The Puritan lord was far more manly. "Grey, quite in another key, began with great spirit and alacrity, spake a long and eloquent speech..... He held them the whole day, from eight in the morning till eight at night; but the evidence was too perspicuous." They had condemned the coward without hesitation, but they hesitated long ere they would give their verdict against this brave young man; "and most of them strove with themselves, and would fain, as it seemed, have dispensed with their consciences to have showed him favor."[7] When the lords had given their verdict, and he was asked, in the usual form, why sentence of death should not be pronounced, these were his only words:—"I have nothing to say;"—here he paused long;—"and yet a word of Tacitus comes in my mind—Non eadem omnibus decora: the House of the Wiltons hath spent many lives in their prince's service, and Grey can not beg his. God send the king a long and prosperous reign, and to your lordships all honor!"[1] The only favor he asked was, that he might be attended by a divine of his own persuasion.[2] King James was not a sovereign of sufficient magnanimity to admire this high bearing. The coward Cobham was considered on the surest side, for he was thought least dangerous, and Cecil undertook to be his friend. Every one thought that Grey and Raleigh would assuredly die. "It was determined" (to use the unfeeling language of a cotemporary) "that the priests should lead the dance;" and, on the 29th of November, Watson and Clarke were executed at Winchester. They "were very bloodily handled; for they were both cut down alive; and Clarke, to whom more favor was intended, had the worse luck; for he both strove to help himself, and spake after he was cut down. They died boldly, both; and Watson (as he would have it seem) willingly—wishing he had more lives to spend, and one to lose for every man he had by his treachery drawn into this treason. Clarke stood somewhat upon his justification, and thought he had hard measure, but imputed it to his function as a Catholic priest, and therefore thought his death meritorious, as a kind of martyrdom."[3] Except among a few papists, who were careful to conceal their emotions, the fate of these men excited no sympathy—their atrocious execution (their bowels were torn out while yet alive) no horror, no disgust among the spectators! On the 5th of December, Cobham's brother, George Brooke, who had been "persuaded to die well," by the Bishop of Chichester,[4] sent from the court for that purpose, was brought to the scaffold also at Winchester; but he was merely beheaded like a gentleman, and was pitied by the people.[5] His last words, with other circumstances, go to confirm the suspicion that Brooke had been first employed, and then abandoned by, Cecil, to whom (as Clarendon has said of him) "it was as necessary there should be treasons as it was for the state to prevent them." By the king's orders, the Bishop of Chichester went from the bleeding body of Brooke to his brother, the Lord Cobham; and, at the same time the Bishop of Winchester was sent to Raleigh—both by express order from the king—as well to prepare them for their ends, as to bring them to liberal confessions. . . . . The Bishop of Chichester had soon done what he came for, finding in Cobham a readiness to die well, with purpose at his death to affirm as much as he had said against Raleigh, but the other bishop had more to do with his charge; for though, for his conscience, he found him (Sir Walter) well settled, and resolved to die a Christian and a good Protestant, touching the point of confession he found him so straight-laced, that he would yield to no part of Cobham's accusation; only a pension, he said, was once mentioned, but never proceeded in."[1] Lord Grey who was also told to prepare for death, was left alone with his Puritan preacher, without being comforted, or troubled, by any bishop of the king's sending: he was devout, and spent much time in praying; but so careless was he "in regard of that with which he was threatened, that he was observed neither to eat or sleep the worse, or be any ways distracted from his accustomed fashions."[2] Markham was told he should likewise die; but he was so assured by secret messages from some friends at court, that he would not believe it. The lords of the council, or some of them, advised the king, as he was in the beginning of his reign, to show examples of mercy as well as of severity; "but some others, led by their private spleen and passions, drew as hard the other way; and Patrick Galloway, in his sermon, preached so hotly against remissness and moderation of justice, in the head of justice, as if it were one of the seven deadly sins." James let the lords know that it became not them to be petitioners for mercy; but he told Galloway, or those who, taking the fanatic cue, pressed for immediate execution, that he would go no whit the faster for their driving.[3] He was reveling in the delights of a maze and mystery the clearing up of which, he fancied, would impress his new subjects with a wonderful notion of his dexterity and genius. Men knew not what to think; but from the care he seemed to take to have the law take its course, and the executions hastened, the friends and relatives of the prisoners concluded that there could be no hope of mercy. He signed the death-warrants of Markham, Grey, and Cobham, on Wednesday; and on Friday—"a fouler day could hardly have been picked out, or one fitter for such a tragedy,"[4] at about ten o'clock, Markham was brought to the scaffold, and allowed to take a last farewell of his friends, and to prepare himself for the block. But, when the victim had suffered all that was most painful in death, one John Gib, a Scotch groom of the bedchamber, secretly withdrew the sheriff for a while; whereupon the execution was stayed, and Markham left upon the scaffold, to his own wretched thoughts. The sheriff, returning at last, told him, that as he was so badly prepared, he should have two hours' respite to make his peace with Heaven; and so led him from the scaffold without giving him any more comfort, and locked him up by himself. The Lord Grey, whose turn was next, was led to the scaffold by a troop of young noblemen, and was supported on both sides by two of his best friends. He had such gayety and cheer in his countenance, that he looked like a young bridegroom. In front of the block he fell upon his knees, and prayed with the fervency and zeal of a religious spirit for more than half an hour, when, as he was ending, and was expecting the signal to stretch his neck under the ax, the sheriff suddenly told him he had received commands from the king to change the order of the execution, and that the Lord Cobham was to go before him. And thereupon Grey was likewise removed from the scaffold and locked up apart; "and his going away seemed more strange unto him than his coming thither . . . . . neither could any man yet dive into the mystery of this strange proceeding." While the people were lost in amazement, the third prisoner was led up to the block. "The Lord Cobham, who was now to play his part, and who, by his former actions promised nothing but matière pour rire, did much cozen the world; for he came to the scaffold with good assurance, and contempt of death. . . . . Some few words he used, to express his sorrow for his offense to the king, and crave pardon of him and the world; for Sir Walter Raleigh he took it, upon the hope of his soul's resurrection, that what he had said of him was true." He would have taken a farewell of the world, when he was stayed by the sheriff, and told that there was something else to be done,—that he was to be confronted with some other of the prisoners, naming no one. And thereupon Grey and Markham were brought back separately, to the scaffold, each believing that his companions were already executed: they were nothing acquainted with what had passed any more than were the spectators with what should follow, and they looked strange and wildly one upon the other, "like men beheaded and met again in the other world." "Now all the actors being together on the stage (as use is at the end of a play), the sheriff made a short speech unto them, by way of interrogatory, of the heinousness of their offenses, the justness of their trials, their lawful condemnation, and due execution there to be performed; to all which they assented: then, said the sheriff, see the mercy of your prince, who of himself hath sent hither the countermand, and given you your lives. There was then no need to beg a plaudite of the audience, for it was given with such hues and cries that it went from the castle into the town, and there began afresh." Raleigh, who had a window in his prison opening upon the castle green, the scene of those strange doings, was hard put to it to beat out the meaning of the stratagem. His turn was to have come on the Monday following; but the king gave him pardon of life with the rest, and ordered him to be sent, with Grey and Cobham, to the Tower of London, there to remain during his royal pleasure.[1] The lively letter-writer,

By connecting him with papists, and particularly with Spanish papists, the government took the sure course to render him odious to the mass of the nation; but Raleigh labored under a great weight of unpopularity on account of his indefensible conduct toward the unfortunate Essex, wherein he was allied with Cecil, who now sought his life. "It is almost incredible with what bitter speeches and execrations he was exclaimed upon all the way he went through London and towns as he went: which general hatred of the people should be to me more bitter than death; which they say he neglected and scorned as proceeding from base and rascally people. They threw tobacco-pipes, stones, and mire at him, as he was carried in the coach."—Letter of Michael Hickes to the Earl of Shrewsbury, in Lodge's Illustrations.

[1] Sir Dudley Carleton. Letters to Mr. John Chamberlain in Hardwicke State Papers. The editor of this important work says—"There are in the Salisbury Collection several letters from these prisoners from whom we have borrowed these details, says, that no one could rob the king of the praise of the action; for the lords of the council knew nothing about it, but expected that execution was to go forward till the very last moment, when his majesty called them before him, and told them "how much he had been troubled to resolve in this business; for to execute Grey, who was a noble, young, spirited fellow, and save Cobham, who was as base and unworthy, were a manner of injustice: to save Grey, who was of a proud, insolent nature, and execute Cobham, who had showed great tokens of humility and repentance, were as great a solecism; and so went on with Plutarch's comparisons in the rest, still traveling in contrarieties, but holding the conclusion in so indifferent balance, that the lords knew not what to look for till the end came out—and therefore I have saved them all." But one thing had liked to have marred the play; for the respite was closed and sealed, and delivered to John Gib, the Scottish messenger, without the royal signature. James, however, remembered this himself, called the messenger back, and signed the paper. But this made it Thursday at noon before the messenger took the road to Winchester, and the prisoners were ordered for execution on the next morning. A lame horse, a lost shoe, a fall, and many another little accident, might have caused the messenger, who had three men's lives in his pocket, to arrive too late. It appears, in fact, that he did not reach Winchester till the fatal hour; and there, "there was another cross adventure; for John Gib, who was little known, could not get so near the scaffold that he could speak to the sheriff, but was thrust out among the boys, and was fain to call out to Sir James Hayes;[1] or else Markham (who had been brought up to the block) might have lost his head."[2] It is not without reason, that a recent writer exclaims—"What a government, with the penal justice of the nation in such hands, and the lives of men at the hazard of such sad buffooneries!"[3] The sapient James, however, congratulated himself on the effect he produced by his wonderful sagacity. Many persons had disbelieved Cobham's confession—some had even doubted whether there had been any serious plot at all, beyond a design on Raleigh's part to get money from the court of Spain, for promoting a favorable treaty of peace; but now they had heard Cobham repeat his confession in sight of the ax;[4] and though in the case of state prisoners many dying speeches had been notoriously false, men were still disposed to give great weight and credit to such orations and depositions. Unfortunately, however, James did not derive all the advantage from the proceeding that he had expected; for, upon reflecting on the bold carriage of the pusillanimous Cobham, who had never been brave before, there were some who were led to suspect that he, at least, was in the king's secret, and had a promise of life when he made his last dying speech on the scaffold. It should be remembered, however, that Cobham was neither the first nor the last coward that could die with firmness—that found, when death was near and inevitable, that it was stripped of many of those terrors which had agonized the imagination at other seasons. At least nothing more positive than a doubt ought to be entertained on this, as on several other points of the perplexing story. The laborious Rushworth, who wrote near the time, confesses that it was "a dark kind of treason," and that in his days the veil still rested upon it; nor has this veil been removed by the hypothesis of modern writers or the few cotemporary documents that have been brought to light since Rushworth's time. If it had not been for the "reason of state," and the diplomatic etiquet which prevented the court from pressing hard upon the Spanish ambassador and other ministers, and from producing their letters and the documents in which they were implicated, we might have been better able to form an opinion.[1]

The king took possession of the estates of the conspirators, but for some time refused to give away any of their lands to his covetous courtiers. Lord Cobham, whose understanding did not improve under imprisonment and poverty, was, after some few years, rather suffered to stray out of his prison in the Tower than released in form: he did not wander far; a beggar, and an object of contempt, he found an asylum in a miserable house in the Minories, belonging to one who had formerly been his servant, and upon whose charity he meanly threw himself. There, in a wretched loft, accessible by means of a ladder, he died, probably of starvation, in 1619, the year after the bloody execution of Raleigh. The Lord Grey was more closely looked to; and he died a prisoner in the Tower, in 1614. Raleigh remained in the same fortress till the month of March, 1615, when we shall meet him again, daring and enterprising as ever. Markham, Brooksby, and Copley, were banished the kingdom. Markham retired to the Low Countries, where, to rescue himself from indigence, he became a spy to Sir Thomas Edmonds, an intriguing courtier and cunning diplomatist, who rose to eminence under the patronage of Cecil and the Earl of Shrewsbury.[2]

In declaring that he would allow of no toleration, James pledged himself to become a persecutor; and there were men about him disposed to urge during their confinement, which probably would throw light on their respective cases, if they were published."

[4] Cecil said that the king's object was to see how far Cobham, at his death, would make good his accusations of Raleigh.

[1] Beaumont, the French ambassador, told his court, in one of his dispatches, that in the month of August a Scotchman had been taken at Dover, on his return from Bruxelles, whither he had carried a packet from D'Aremberg, written upon his conference with Lord Cobham. And Beaumont further stated that the English court "were satisfied that D'Aremberg had encouraged the plot, not only from the Scotchman's confession, but from two original letters of D'Aremberg, which the king showed to M. de Beaumont; and that he (the ambassador) was perfectly satisfied of Raleigh's guilt by various circumstances and relations upon which he could absolutely depend, and by the knowledge he had of his and Cobham's designs, from the proposals made to himself and Sully, and their correspondence in France."—Dispatches, quoted by Carte.

him to a rigid enforcement of the penal statutes, both against Catholics and Puritans. The former, knowing their weakness, were silent; but the Puritans soon drew up what they called their "millenary petition;"[1] wherein they called for reformaation of certain ceremonies and abuses in the church, and for a conference. The latter was the sort of thing that James, who deemed himself the most learned and perfect of controversialists, loved above all others. To his ears there was no music in the shrill trump, the spirit-stirring drum, the ear-piercing fife; but he enjoyed the thumping of thick folios of dusty divinity, the eager voices of polemics, and disputation, for disputation's sake, particularly when, as on the present occasion, he was sure to have the better of the disputants, whatever he had of the argument. He had, beside, a long-standing debt to square with the Puritans, who had not merely been a main cause of his unhappy mother's defamation and ruin—this he might have overlooked—but they also set his authority at naught, contradicted him and pestered him from his cradle till his departure for England, and had made him drain the cup of humiliation to its very dregs. He had been obliged to fall in with their views of church government, to conform to their gloomy creed; and, as he must be doing, he had at one time taken up the pen to proclaim them the only church of Christ, and had delivered to them studied orations in praise of their orthodoxy and godliness: but now he no doubt hated them the more for those forced exercises of his wit which he had considered as things necessary to prop him on his throne. In the general assembly at Edinburgh, in 1590, "he stood up, with his bonnet off, and his hands lifted up to heaven, and said he praised God that he was born in the time of the light of the gospel, and in such a place as to be king of such a church, the sincerest (purest) kirk in the world." "The church of Geneva," continued the royal orator, "keeps pasch and yule (Easter and Christmas); what have they for them? They have no institution. As for our neighbor kirk of England, their service is an evil-said mass in English; they want nothing of the mass but the liftings. I charge you, my good ministers, doctors, elders, nobles, gentlemen, and barons, to stand to your purity, and to exhort the people to do the same; and I, forsooth, as long as I brook my life, shall maintain the same."[2] From the year 1596, however, James had gone upon a directly opposite tack in ecclesiastical matters. In 1598, as has been related in the preceding Book, he had completely changed the constitution of the Scottish church, by appointing certain of the clergy to hold seats in parliament, which was in substance nothing else than making bishops of them, although he found it convenient to declare at the time that "he minded not to bring in papistical or Anglican bishops." The whole course of his policy as to ecclesiastical matters from this time forward tended to transform the Scottish establishment from a Presbyterian to an Episcopalian church. In 1599, he wrote and published, for the instruction of his son Prince Henry, his "Basilicon Doron," a master-piece of pedantry, a model of abuse, against the Puritans and the whole church polity of Scotland! Nothing, he said, could be more monstrous than parity or equality in the church;—nothing more derogatory to the kingly dignity than the independence of preachers. Therefore he advises his son "to take heed to such Puritans, very pests in the church and commonwealth, whom no deserts can oblige—neither oaths nor promises bind,—breathing nothing but sedition and calumnies, aspiring without measure, railing without reason, and making their own imaginations (without any warrant of the word) the square of their conscience." "I protest before the great God," he continued, "and since I am here upon my testament, it is no place for me to lie in, that ye shall never find with any highland or border thieves, greater ingratitude, and more lies and vile perjuries, than with these fanatic spirits; and suffer not the principal of them to brook your land, if ye list to sit at rest; except ye would keep them for trying your patience, as Socrates did an evil wife."[1]

These were the real sentiments of James; but the English bishops had neither a perfect confidence in his steadiness of purpose, nor a full acquaintance with his feelings, and for a while he kept them in an uncomfortable state of suspense. Like the chief personages in the tragi-comedy at Winchester, Markham, Cobham, and Grey, who did not know but that they were to be beheaded, the bishops, almost to the last moment, did not know but that their system would be overthrown. In their anxiety they implored for a private conference with the king, who, even then, is said to have played the Puritan, and to have carried this humor so far that the prelates threw themselves on their knees before him, and entreated him neither to alter the church government, nor give the Dissenters victory in the disputation about to be held, lest the popish recusants should say that they had just cause to insult them as men who had travailed to bind them to that which was now confessed to be erroneous. On the 14th of January, 1604, James held his first field-day in his privy chamber at Hampton Court. On the one side were arrayed nearly twenty bishops and high dignitaries of the established church, the lords of the privy council, and sundry courtiers, all determined to applaud to the skies the royal wisdom and learning: on the other side were only four reforming preachers—Doctors Reynolds and Sparks, professors of divinity at Oxford: and Knewstubs and Chatterton, of Cambridge: the king sat high above them all "proudly preëminent," as moderator. On the first day the learned doctors did not enter upon the real controversy, but, after a day's rest, they met again on the 16th, when the Puritans proceeded roundly to busi-

[1] King James's Works. He afterward said to his English bishops and courtiers—"I will tell you. I have lived among this sort of men (Puritans or Presbyterians) ever since I was ten years old; but I may say of myself, as Christ said of himself, though I lived among them, yet, since I had ability to judge, I was never of them."

ness, beginning by demanding, among other things, that the Book of Common Prayer should be revised; that the cap and surplice, the sign of the cross in baptism, baptism by women, confirmation, the use of the ring in marriage, the reading of the Apocrypha, the bowing at the name of Jesus, should all be set aside; that non-residence and pluralities in the church should not be suffered, nor the commendams held by the bishops; that unnecessary excommunications should cease, as also the obligation of subscribing to the Thirty-Nine Articles. The bishops chose to make their chief stand upon the ceremonies, the Book of Common Prayer, and the Articles; and London and Winchester, assisted by some of the deans, spoke vehemently and at great length. Then, without listening to the four Puritans, James himself took up the argument, and combated for the Anglican orthodoxy, in a mixed strain of pedantry, solemnity, levity, and buffoonery. He talked of baptism, public and private, of confirmation, of marriage, of excommunication, and absolution, which latter he declared to be apostolical and a very good ordinance. But, as it has been remarked, it would be endless to relate all he said, for he loved speaking, and was in his element while disputing. In the heat of his argument he treated St. Jerome very disrespectfully, for saying that bishops were not by divine ordination, closing his speech with this short aphorism :—"No bishop, no king." When he was tired, Dr. Reynolds was allowed to talk a little. The doctor stated his objections to the Apocrypha, which was ordered to be read by the Book of Common Prayer, and particularly to the book of Ecclesiasticus. James called for a Bible, expounded a chapter of Ecclesiasticus in his own way, and then, turning to his applauding lords, said, "What, trow ye, make these men so angry with Ecclesiasticus? By my soul, I think Ecclesiasticus was a bishop, or they would never use him so." The bishops smiled decorously—the courtiers grinned. In answer to a question started by the abashed and browbeaten Puritans—How far an ordinance of the church could bind without impeaching Christian liberty? he said "he would not argue that point, but answer therein as kings are wont to do in parliament, le roy s'avisera, adding withal, that the query smelled very rankly of Anabaptism." And then he told a story about Mr. John Black, a Scottish preacher, who had impudently told him that matters of ceremony in the church ought to be left in Christian liberty to every man. "But," added James, "I will none of that; I will have one doctrine and one discipline—one religion, in substance and in ceremony." It would have been policy to act and speak as if from a spiritual conviction that episcopacy was preferable to presbytery, and essential to salvation; but, as has been observed, James was all his life rather a bold liar than a good dissembler;[1] and he soon let out the very wordly motives of his preference, which had their roots in his high notions about the royal prerogative and supremacy. "If," he said, "you aim at a Scottish Presbytery, it agreeth with monarchy as God with the devil. Then Jack, and Tom, and Will, and Dick shall meet, and at their pleasure censure me, and my council, and all our proceedings. Then Will shall stand up and say, It must be thus: then Dick shall reply and say, Nay, marry but we will have it thus; and, therefore, here I must once more reiterate my former speech, and say, le roy s'avisera." Reynolds was esteemed one of the acutest logicians and most learned divines then in the kingdom, but James treated him in this manner: —"Well, Doctor, have you any thing more to say?" The doctor, who had been constantly interrupted and insulted, replied, "No, please your majesty." Then the king told him, that if he and his fellows had disputed thus lamely in a college, and he, the king, been moderator, he would have had them fetched up and flogged for dunces; that, if this was all they could say for themselves, he would have them conform, or hurry them out of the land, or else to do worse. On the morrow of this glorious day James rested from his labors. On the morning of the 18th he again assembled the bishops, and deans, and lords of the council; but the dissenting divines were not admitted till a late hour, and then not to renew the disputation, but only to implore that conformity should not be enforced till after a certain interval. James granted their request, dismissed them, and gloried in the victory he had obtained. The bishops and courtly ministers had not waited for the finale to shower down their plaudits. Bancroft, Bishop of London, throwing himself on his knees in a paroxysm of of gratitude and adoration, and protested during one of the acts, "that his heart melted with joy, and made haste to acknowledge unto Almighty God the singular mercy in giving them such a king, as, since Christ's time, the like had not been."[1] Whitgift, the primate, without falling upon his knees, exclaimed, that undoubtedly his majesty spake by the special assistance of God's spirit. And that the laity might not be left all behind, the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere said, that the king and the priest had never been so wonderfully united in the same person; and the temporal lords generally applauded his majesty's speeches as proceeding from the spirit of God, and from an understanding heart.[2] This was pretty well; but not the most grateful of bishops, nor the most servile of courtiers, could praise James more than James praised himself. "I peppered them soundly," said he; "they fled me from argument to argument like schoolboys." And he soon after wrote a most conceited lettter to one Blake, boasting of his own superior logic and learning. In his wisdom, however, and of his own prerogative, without consulting either the bishops or parliament, he thought proper to make a few slight alterations in the Book of Common Prayer and the church service; but this step irritated or afflicted the high churchmen, without reconciling any of their opponents to their discipline. Shortly after the conference he put forth a proclamation commanding all ecclesiastical and civil officers strictly to enforce conformity, and admonishing all men not to expect nor attempt any further alteration in the Church.[1] Some months later, when he was hunting near Newmarket, a deputation of Puritan ministers waited upon him to present a petition for further time, that their consciences might be better satisfied. According to his courtiers, he again argued the matter very fully, and put them to a non-plus.[2]

But the king loved hunting as much as he loved polemics, and a proclamation was devised, that none should come to him on hunting days—which days of sport occupied one half of James's year! He had already enjoined the bishops to proceed against all their clergy who did not conform and observe his orders. Whitgift died—some said of mortification at the king's interference—and Bancroft, who succeeded him in the primacy, wanted no royal spur to urge him on in the paths of persecution and severity. Three hundred clergymen were driven from their livings to poverty—some to wander in foreign countries, some to suffer with their wives and children absolute want at home. Ten leading men of those who had presented the millenary petition were arrested; the judges declared, in the Star Chamber, that theirs was an offense fineable at discretion and very near to treason and felony, as it tended to sedition and rebellion; and they were all committed to prison. Spies, such as had been trained to the work in hunting down papists and private masses, found their way to prayer meetings and secret conventicles; and the jails of the kingdom soon began to be crowded with unlicensed preachers. The Puritans soon added to a contempt of the king's person a hatred of the whole system of government. Still, however, they were as distant as ever from any notion of toleration; and when James proceeded to a still more cruel persecution of the Catholics, they only complained that he was not sharp and rigorous enough. Even while smarting themselves under the iron rod of a despotic church, they did not conceal that their wish and object was to get the rod into their own hands, that they might enforce upon all a strict conformity to their own peculiar doctrines.

It was scarcely to be expected, notwithstanding their great loss of spirit, that James would face an English parliament so bravely as a few intimidated preachers. The pestilence was for many months a sufficient reason for not calling one; and his first parliament was not assembled till the 19th of March, 1604, or until he had been nearly a year on the throne. There were probably few people in England or anywhere else, that had taken the pains to read his pedantic writings; but those who had done so must have known that he had expressed the greatest contempt for all parliaments. In his discourse "On the True Law of Free Monarchies, or the Reciproque and Mutual Duty betwixt a Free King and his Natural Subjects," which had been printed in Scotland some years before, he had stated in the broadest terms, that the duty of a king was to command—that of a subject to obey in all things; that kings reigned by divine right, and were raised by the Almighty above all law; that a sovereign might daily make statutes and ordinances, and inflict such punishments as he thought meet, without any advice of parliament or estates; that general laws made publicly in parliament might, by the king's authority, be privately mitigated or suspended upon causes known only to himself; and that, "although a good king will frame all his actions to be according to the law, yet he is not bound thereto, but of his own will, and for example-giving to his subjects." Even in his proclamation for calling together this, his first parliament, he studiously put forth his lofty notions about the prerogative, and schooled his subjects as to the representatives whom they were to choose. For several reigns—certainly under all the princes of the Tudor dynasty—the court had constantly interfered with the freedom of elections; but they had done so with address, and had not made any pedantic exposition of the thing as a fixed principle of government. James, on the contrary, was ostentatious; he ordered that if any returns of members were found to be made contrary to the instructions contained in this his proclamation, the same should be rejected as unlawful and insufficient, and the cities or boroughs fined for making them: and any person, knight, citizen, or burgess, elected contrary to the purport, effect, and true meaning of the proclamation, should be fined and imprisoned. The electors were commanded to avoid "all persons noted in religion for their superstitious blindness one way, or for their turbulent humor otherways,"—that is, they were to elect neither Catholics nor Puritans. But, in spite of king and proclamation, this parliament swarmed with Puritans, who had naturally more courage and confidence than their four baited preachers at Hampton Court. Indeed, the Commons met him on their threshold with a debate about privilege. At the election for Buckinghamshire—that county by a series of curious circumstances so distinguished in the struggle between the people and the Stuarts—Sir Francis Goodwin had been chosen in preference to Sir John Fortescue, the court candidate and a privy councilor; and the writ had been duly returned into Chancery. Goodwin, some years before, had been outlawed: his return was, therefore, sent back to the sheriff as contrary to the late proclamation; and, on a second election, Sir John Fortescue was chosen. But the Commons objected to these proceedings, and, after a full hearing of the case, voted that Goodwin was lawfully elected and returned, and that he ought to take his seat, and not Fortescue. The Lords, by the mouth of Sir Edward Coke and Dr. Hone, requested that the matter might be discussed in a conference between the two Houses, "first of all, before any other matters were proceeded in." The Commons replied with spirit, that they conceived it did not stand with the honor of their House to give any account of their proceedings and doings. The Lords rejoined, through Coke, that, they having acquainted his majesty with the business, his highness "conceived himself engaged and touched in honor that there might be some conference of it between the two Houses." Upon this message, the Commons sent their Speaker and a good number of their members to wait upon the king, to explain why they could not confer with the Lords on any such subject. James was greatly chagrined; he insisted that they ought not to meddle with the returns, and directed them to confer with the judges. The Commons, after a warm debate, unanimously agreed not to have a conference with the judges; but they drew up a written statement, in reply to his majesty's objections, and sent the paper to the Lords, requesting them to deliver it to the king, and be mediators with his majesty in their behalf. This was moderate enough. James, who liked to do things in an odd way, sent privately for the Speaker, and told him that he was now much puzzled as to the merits of the case; but after some logical splitting of straws, he commanded, "as an absolute king," that there might be a conference between the House and the judges. When the Speaker delivered this message "there grew some amazement and silence." But at last one stood up and said: "The prince's command is like a thunderbolt; his command upon our allegiance like the roaring of a lion! To his command there is no contradiction; but how or in what manner we should proceed to perform obedience, that will be the question." It was at length resolved to confer with the judges in presence of the king and council, and the Commons named a select committee for the purpose. In this conference the king, after some wheedling, gently suggested that both Goodwin and Fortescue should be excluded, and a new writ issued. The Commons, who had been disputing the point for nearly three weeks, accepted the compromise with joy, being anxious "to remove all impediments to their worthy and weighty causes." This joy, however, was not universal; and some members said that, by giving up Goodwin's election, they had drawn on themselves the reproach of inconstancy and levity. But James felt as if they had gained a victory over his absolute prerogative, and, in the course of the session, he was vexed by other demonstrations.[1] The Commons instituted an inquiry into monopolies, which, in spite of James's proclamation, seem to have flourished as much as, or more than ever. They also attacked the monstrous abuses of purveyance, and the incidents of feudal tenure, by which, among other things, the king became guardian to wards, and received the proceeds of their estates till they came of age, without accounting for the money. The Commons asserted that, notwithstanding the six-and-thirty statutes which had been made to check the evil, the practice of purveyance was enforced by the Board of Green-Cloth, who punished and imprisoned on their own warrant; that the royal purveyors did what they list in the country, seizing carts, carriages, horses, and provisions; felling trees without the owners' consent, and exacting labor from the people, which they paid for very badly, or not at all. On the subject of wardships they were equally cogent, and the disgust at this lucrative tyranny was increased by the popular belief that Cecil derived a good part of his enormous income from this particular branch of the prerogative. This grievance, with others, was referred to a committee, in which the rising Francis Bacon played a conspicuous part, trying to unite the opposite charcters of a patriot and courtier, a reformer and sycophant. Speaking before the king in council, he said that the king's was the voice of God in man—the good spirit of God in the mouth of man. But in the House of Commons he could speak boldly of the abuses of government and the sufferings of the people. The Lords refused to go with the Commons, and, in the end, and by their advice, the matter was dropped as premature, and somewhat unseasonable in the king's first parliament. None of the other proposed reforms were carried, or even pushed; but as the court did not seem inclined to yield any thing, the Commons resolved not to be over generous with the people's money. They passed the usual bill, granting tunnage and poundage for the king's life, and there they stopped, without hinting at any further supplies. James, though in great want of money, was anxious to preserve his dignity, and apprehending that a demand on his part would be met with a flat refusal, he sent down a message to the Commons, begging them not to enter upon the business of a subsidy. The Commons, having a fearful eye to a relapse into popery, urgently pressed for execution of the penal statutes against Catholics. As the bishops, into whose arms James had thrown himself, united with the Puritans in these demands, no opposition was encountered, and the rivalry of the two divisions of Protestants increased the severity of the existing laws. On the 7th of July the parliament was prorogued to the 7th of February of the following year.

Meanwhile the new king spent most of his time in hunting, his love of field-sports increasing with his means of gratifying it. Whitehall, London, the scenes of business and ceremony, were all deserted for Royston and Newmarket. The affairs of the state might wait, but James would not lose his sport. Men first wondered, and then began to complain and to satirize. Toward the end of the year "a reasonable pretty jest" was played off at Royston. "There was one of the king's special hounds, called Jowler, missing one day. The king was much displeased that he was wanted; notwithstanding, went a hunting. The next day, when they were on the field, Jowler came in among the rest of the hounds; the king was told of him, and was very glad; and, looking on him, spied a paper about his neck, and in the paper was written: 'Good Mr. Jowler, we pray you speak to the king (for he hears you every day, and so doth he not us) that it will please his majesty to go back to London, for else the country will be undone: all our provision is spent already, and we are not able to entertain him longer.' It was taken for a jest, and so passed over, for his majesty intends to lie there yet a fortnight."[1] Except the Earl of Worcester, none of the council—no, not a clerk of the council nor privy signet,—was with his majesty the while. A little later, Matthew Hutton, Archbishop of York, in writing to Cecil, then Lord Cranborne, against papists and recusants, took the liberty to offer some advice about the king's long absences. "I confess," says the prelate, "that I am not to deal in state matters, yet, as one that honoreth and loveth his most excellent majesty with all my heart, I wish less wasting of the treasure of the realm, and more moderation in the lawful exercise of hunting, both that poor men's corn may be less spoiled and other his majesty's subjects more spared." Cecil wrote a truly courtier-like reply to the archbishop, telling him that, as for the toleration in religion, which he seemed to fear, he well knew that no creature living durst propound it to his religious sovereign; and that, as for the hunting, "as it was a praise in the good Emperor Trajan to be disposed to such manlike and active recreations, so ought it be a joy to him to behold the king of so able a constitution, promising long life and a plentiful posterity." Cecil caused both letters to be laid before his majesty by the Earl of Worcester, who presently reported to his ally the impression they had produced on the royal mind. "He was merry at the first," says the earl, "till, as I guessed, he came to the wasting of the treasure, and the immoderate exercise of hunting. He began, then, to alter countenance, and, in the end, said it was the foolishest letter that he ever read, and yours an excellent answer, paying him soundly, but in good and fair terms."[2] In the same epistle Worcester informed his friend that his majesty meant to go from Royston to Newmarket, to hunt there for three or four days, and then from Newmarket to hunt at Thetford. Whither he would have gone hunting after this is not known; but, in the month of March, Worcester entreated Sir James Hay not to urge the king any further, and Hay considerately promised that he would not. During these ambulatory proceedings the Puritan ministers, whom the new primate, Bancroft (quaintly described as "a man of a rough temper and a stout foot-ball player,")[3] had been active in expelling from their livings in the church, gave James some disturbance by waiting upon him to present petitions, and their party caused him further trouble by writing and printing certain letters. Against the authors of these papers, and against others who had ventured to remonstrate, James let loose Cecil, whom he was accustomed to call his "little beagle." Upon quitting the sports of the field his serious attention was devoted to solve the problem, whether a man could preach good sermons and speak exceeding good Hebrew and Greek in his sleep, being, when awake, no divine, and ignorant of both those learned languages. "The king took delight, by the line of his reason, to sound the depths of such impostors. The man, who practiced physic in the day and preached by night, was Richard Haddock, of New College, Oxford, and all the fellows and scholars of the college were wont to go and hear him preach in his sleep, as they would go to any regular sermon; and though some of his auditory were willing to silence him, by pulling, hauling, and pinching him, yet would he pertinaciously persist to the end of his discourse, sleeping all the while."[1] And, to complete the miraculous story, when he awoke he knew nothing of what he had said, but wondered to see so many persons around him. All this was told the king by two or three persons that had heard him, and the king, thinking it a very strange thing, sent for him to court. There Haddock was put into a room to preach and sleep to the king, who summoned Lord Pembroke, Lord Chandos, Lord Danvers, Lord Marr and others to assist him in the weighty business. This conclave sat up a whole night to hear him. "And when the time came in which the preacher thought it was fit for him to be asleep, he began very orderly with a prayer, then took a text of Scripture and divided it into heads, which he explained significantly enough; but afterward he made an excursion against the pope, the use of the cross in baptism, and the last canons of the Church of England, and so concluded sleeping."[2] Haddock was allowed to rest till the next morning, "when the king in private handled him so like a cunning surgeon that he found out the sore place, making him confess, not only his sin and error in the act, but the cause that urged him to it." This weighty business occupied several days, and the members of his council wrote and received long letters about it. In the end, the king forgave him graciously, upon promise that he would never do the like again, and sent him back to Oxford.[3] The depth of his majesty's wonderful judgment was applauded by the whole court, and James was encouraged to devote more of his time to such pursuits. But he was now destined to have more serious work upon his hands.

[1] At their first meeting, the Commons, who were fully aware of James's high pretensions, took care to tell him, by the mouth of their Speaker, that he could not be a law-giver by himself,—"that new laws could not be instituted, nor imperfect laws reformed, nor inconvenient laws abrogated by any other power than that of the high court of parliament,—that is, by the agreement of the commons, the accord of the lords, and the assent of the sovereign." And at the end of the session they told him,—"Your majesty would be misinformed if any man should deliver that the kings of England have any absolute power in themselves either to alter religion, or make any laws concerning the same, otherwise than as in temporal causes, by consent of parliament."

The letter containing the anecdote about the hound, or "Mr. Jowler" (as old Shrewsbury indorsed it), was written to the Earl of Shrewsbury by Mr. Edmund Lascelles, who appears to have lost the king's favor by his jokes. He wasted the whole of his small fortune at court without gaining preferment; and in 1609 he was obliged to fly to the continent from his creditors, leaving a wife and three children behind him in absolute want.

In those sermons that he maketh in his sleep he will speak exceeding good Greek and Hebrew, and when he is awake understand neither of the languages."—Lodge.

[3] It is probable that Haddock was set on by some of the Dissenters. Wilson says, that the "cause that urged him to it," was, "that he apprehended himself as a buried man in the university, being of a low condition, and if something eminent and remarkable did not spring from him, to give life to his reputation, he should never appear any body." "The king," adds Wilson, "finding him ingenuous in his confession, pardoned him, and, after his recantation public, gave him preferment in the church."

The Catholics, who had expected toleration or an approach to it, were enraged at the increased severity of the laws directed against them; and some of them were absolutely maddened by the persecutions they suffered, and by the heavy fines they were constantly called upon to pay. Among the sufferers there was one capable of the most daring deeds. This was Robert Catesby, a gentleman of an ancient family and of a good estate. During one period of his life he had recanted, but he soon returned to the ancient religion, and endeavored to make up for his youthful backsliding by the ardor of his zeal. He had engaged in the rash business of the Earl of Essex, who had promised liberty of conscience; he had intrigued with the court of France, and with the Spanish court; but, at last, seeing no hopes of assistance from those quarters, he conceived the project of destroying, at one blow, King, Lords, and Commons. Horrible and desperate as was the plot, he soon found a few spirits as implacable and furious as his own to join in it. The first person to whom he opened his design was Thomas Winter, a gentleman of Worcestershire, who had been a soldier of fortune in the Low Countries, and a secret agent of the English Catholics in Spain. This man was, at first, overcome with horror, and, though Catesby removed his repugnance by drawing the most frightful picture of the sufferings of their co-religionists, he would not agree to the mighty murder till they had solicited the mediation of the King of Spain, who was then negotiating with James. Winter passed over to the Netherlands, where he soon learned from the Spanish ambassador that his court could not get a clause of toleration inserted in the English treaty. At this moment, when he had made up his mind to coöperate with Catesby, he accidentally encountered, in the town of Ostend, another soldier of fortune, an old fellow-traveler and associate. This was Guy, or Guido, Fawkes, whom (knowing him to be the most daring of men) he carried over to England, without telling him what particular service would be required at his hands. Fawkes did not come for pay. It has been customary to represent him as a low, mercenary ruffian, but it appears, on the contrary, that he was a pure fanatic, and as much a gentleman as the others. Before Winter and Fawkes had been many days with Catesby in London, they were joined by two other conspirators, Thomas Percy, a distant relation and steward to the Earl of Northumberland, and John Wright, Percy's brother-in-law, who was reputed the best swordsman in all England. Percy, during Elizabeth's time, had visited Edinburgh, where James, to secure what influence he could command, had promised "to tolerate mass in a corner." He was now furious at the king's broken promises, and seems to have been more headlong than any of them—more eager even than Catesby to do something, though as yet he knew not what, for the arch-conspirator was cautious in his madness. They all met at Catesby's lodgings. "Well, gentlemen," cried Percy, "shall we always talk and never do?" Catesby said that, before opening the particulars of his scheme, they must all take a solemn oath of secrecy. The condition was accepted by all, and, a few days afterward, they met at a lonely house, in the fields, beyond St. Clement's Inn. "You shall swear by the blessed Trinity, and, by the sacrament you now propose to receive, never to disclose, directly or indirectly, by word or circumstance, the matter that shall be proposed to you to keep secret, nor desist from the execution thereof until the rest shall give you leave." Such was the form of the oath which was taken, on their knees, by Catesby, Percy, Thomas Winter, John Wright, and Fawkes; and immediately after they had taken the oath, Catesby explained that his purpose was to blow up the parliament-house with gunpowder the next time the king should go to the House of Lords. He then made the means clear to their comprehension, and, ceasing this discourse, led them all to an upper room in the same lone house, where they heard mass, and received the sacrament from Father Gerard, a Jesuit missionary, who, it is said, was not admitted into the horrid secret. Percy's zeal was unabated, and an office he held about the court (he was a gentleman pensioner) gave him facilities which the others did not possess. Their first object was to secure a house adjoining the parliament building. As Percy, by his office, was obliged to live during a part of the year near to Whitehall, there would appear nothing strange in his taking a lodging in that quarter. After some search, they found a house held by one Ferris, as tenant to Whinneard, the keeper of the king's wardrobe, which seemed adapted to their purpose. This, Percy hired in his own name, by a written agreement with Ferris.[1] When they took possession they again swore to be faithful and secret. The back of the house, or an outbuilding, leaned against the very wall of the parliament-house. Here they resolved to commence operations by cutting away the wall in order to make a mine through it. It was an arduous task to gentlemen unaccustomed to manual labor; and before they could well begin, they learned that the king had prorogued parliament to the 7th of February, and upon this news they agreed to separate, and, after visiting their friends in the country, to meet again in November. In the interval they hired another house, situated on the Lambeth side of the river. Here they cautiously deposited wood, gunpowder, and other combustibles, which were afterward removed, in small quantities at a time, and by night, to the house at Westminster. The custody of the house at Lambeth was committed to Robert Kay, a Catholic gentleman in indigent circumstances, who took the oath and entered into the plot. When the chief conspirators met again in the capital, they found themselves debarred of the use of their house at Westminster, for the court had thought fit to accommodate therein the commissioners that were engaged on James's premature scheme for a union between England and Scotland.

While they were waiting impatiently for quiet possession of the premises, several circumstances occured that were calculated to keep their deadly purpose alive. At the assizes held in Lancashire in the preceding summer, six seminary priests and Jesuits were tried, condemned, and executed, under the statute of the 27th of Elizabeth, for remaining within the realm. The judges who tried these victims indulged in invectives against the Catholics in general, and one of them was said to have laid it down as law to the jury, that all persons hearing mass from a Jesuit or seminary priest were guilty of felony. Mr. Pound, a Catholic gentleman then living in Lancashire, of an advanced age, who had suffered in Elizabeth's time, persented a petition to the king complaining generally of the persecution, and in particular of the recent proceedings. He was immediately seized, and carried before the privy council, and, after an examination, committed to the tender mercies of the Star Chamber. In that tribunal, on the 29th of November, the poor old gentleman, unaided and alone, was assailed by Coke, the Attorney General, Chief Justice Popham, Chancellor Egerton, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, Cecil, and several other judges and members of the privy council. Coke inveighed against the whole body of papists; but it may be questioned whether he were so violent as the Primate Bancroft. Among them they sentenced Mr. Pound to be imprisoned in the Fleet during the king's pleasure, to stand in the pillory both at Lancaster and Westminster, and to pay a fine of one thousand pounds; nay, they were near doing worse. for an infamous proposition to nail the old man to the pillory, and cut off his ears, was negatived by a majority of only one or two. After this iniquitous sentence there was an increased activity in hunting for priests and levying fines on the recusants; and yet the zealots cried that this was not enough, and that the sword of the law ought to be sharpened at the next meeting of parliament.

At last, on a dark December night, Catesby and his confederates entered the house at Westminster, and commenced operations, having previously laid in a store of hard eggs, dried meats, pasties, and such provisions as would keep, in order to avoid suspicion by going or sending abroad for food. They presently found that the wall to be penetrated was of tremendous thickness, and that more hands would be required to do the work. Kay was therefore brought over from the house at Lambeth, and the party was further reinforced by the enlisting of Christopher Wright, a younger brother of John Wright, who was already in the plot. Now, in all, they were seven. "All which seven," said Fawkes on his examination, "were gentlemen of name and blood; and not any was employed in or about this action (no, not so much as in digging and mining) that was not a gentleman. And while the others wrought, I stood as sentinel to descry any man that came near; and when any man came near to the place, upon warning given by me, they ceased until they had again notice from me to proceed; and we seven lay in the house, and had shot and powder, and we all resolved to die in that place before we yielded or were taken." They lightened, or, it may be, sometimes burdened, their heavy toil with discussions of future plans. They calculated that the king's eldest son, Prince Henry, would accompany his father to the opening of parliament, and perish with him; but Percy undertook to secure Prince Charles, and carry him off to a sure place as soon as the mine should be exploded. Calculating, however, on the possibility of this scheme failing, they made arrangements for carrying off the Princess Elizabeth, who was then under the care of Lord Harrington at his mansion near Coventry. Horses and armor were to be collected in Warwickshire. They resolved if possible to save all members of the two Houses that were Catholics, but they could not agree as to the safest mode of doing this. The notion of applying to the Catholics abroad, and the Pope, was discarded as useless and unsafe. They were working hard to cut their way through the stubborn wall, when Fawkes brought intelligence that the king, who had no great desire to meet that body again, had further prorogued parliament from the 7th of February to the 3rd of October. Hereupon they agreed to separate till after the Christmas holydays, taking good care not to associate or meet abroad, and on no account to correspond by letter on any point connected with the plot.

A. D. 1605. In the month of January, Catesby, being at Oxford, admitted two other conspirators. One of these was John Grant, an accomplished but moody gentleman of Warwickshire, who possessed at Norbrook, between the towns of Warwick and Stratford-on-Avon, a large and strong mansion-house, walled round and moated, which seemed the best possible place for the reception of horses and ammunition. Lamentation and grief had been carried within those walls in Elizabeth's time, and Grant's melancholy disposition took its rise from the persecution he had endured. The other was Robert Winter, the eldest brother of Thomas Winter, who was already engaged, and one of whose sisters was wife to Grant of Norbrook. Shortly after, Catesby suspecting that his servant, Thomas Bates, had an inkling of the plot, thought it prudent to make him a full accomplice, and bind him by the oath of secrecy. This Bates was the only one not of the rank of a gentleman: he was of a mean station and of weak character; but his obscurity and timidity had not saved him from the Elizabethan persecution. About the beginning of February they all met in the house at Westminster, and resumed their painful toils. Their ears were acutely sensible to the least sound, their hearts susceptible of supernatural dread. They heard, or fancied they heard, the tolling of a bell deep in the earth under the parliament-house, and the noise was stopped by aspersions of holy water. But, one morning, while working in their mine, they heard a loud rumbling noise nearly over their heads. There was a pause, a fear that they had been discovered; but Fawkes soon brought intelligence that it was nothing but one Bright, who was selling off his stock of coals, intending to remove his business from a cellar under the parliament-house to some other place. This opportunity seemed miraculous: the cellar was immediately below the House of Lords; the wall of separation was not yet cut through, and doubts were entertained whether they should be able to complete the work without discovery. Percy hired the cellar of the dealer in coals; the mine was abandoned, and they began to remove thirty-six barrels of gunpowder from the house on the opposite bank of the river. They threw large stones and bars of iron among the powder, to make the breach the greater, and they carefully covered over the whole with fagots and billets of wood. All this was completed by the month of May, when they once more separated. Fawkes was dispatched into Spanish Flanders, to win over Sir William Stanley and Captain Owen, who held military commands

there, and who were supposed capable of collecting a good number of men, either English Catholics or foreigners. Fawkes returned in August, having succeeded no further than to obtain a promise from Owen that he would communicate with Stanley, who was at that time absent in Spain. In September, Sir Edmund Baynham, a gentleman of an ancient family in Gloucestershire, was admitted into the whole, or part of the plot, and dispatched to Rome, not to reveal the project, but to endeavor to gain the favor of the Vatican when the blow should be struck. The rest remained in anxious expectation of the day: it was near at hand, when the king still further prorogued the parliament from the 3d of October to the 5th of November. The conspirators thought that they were suspected. Thomas Winter undertook to go into the house on the day on which prorogation was to be made, and observe the countenances and behavior of the lords commissioners. He found all tranquil: the commissioners were walking about and conversing in the House of Lords, just over the thirty-six barrels of gunpowder: he returned, and told his companions that their secret was safe. About Michaelmas it was agreed to admit three more Catholic gentlemen, who were known to have a command of ready money, into the plot. The first of these was Sir Everard Digby, of Drystoke, in Rutlandshire, an enthusiastic young man, and a bosom friend of Catesby. Digby had immense estates, a young wife, and two infant children; but, after some struggle with his domestic feelings and conscience, he yielded to Catesby, promised to furnish fifteen hundred pounds for furthering the plot, and to collect his Catholic friends on Dunsmore Heath in Warwickshire, by the 5th of November, as if for a hunting party. The second was Ambrose Rookwood, of Coldham Hall, Suffolk, the head of a very ancient and opulent family. Like Digby, he had long been the bosom friend of Catesby; and his romantic attachment to that chief conspirator seems to have been a more leading passion than his religious fanaticism. He had a magnificent stud of horses, which made his accession very desirable. Like most of the others, he at first shuddered at the prospect of so much slaughter, but his scruples were quieted by Catesby; and, to be near the general rendezvous at Dunsmore, he removed with his family to Clopton, near Stratford-on-Avon. He had suffered fines and prosecutions, but he was still wealthy, and, until entering the gunpowder treason, a peaceful, happy man. The third accession was in Francis Tresham, eldest son and heir of Sir Thomas Tresham, who had recently succeeded his father in a large estate in Northamptonshire. Sir Thomas had felt the vengeance of the penal laws: he had been brought before both the council and the Star Chamber in Elizabeth's days; he had suffered heavy fines and imprisonments: in his own words, he had undergone "full twenty years of restless adversity and deep disgrace, only for testimony of his conscience." His son Francis had been engaged very actively with the Earl of Essex, and was only saved from the block by his father's bribing a great lady and some people about the court with several thousand pounds: yet, after that narrow escape, Francis Tresham had had his hand in several plots. It appears, however, that he did not enjoy the confidence of the desperate men with whom he had been engaged, and that he passed for a fickle, mean-spirited, and treacherous man; but he was Catesby's near relation, and he had money, whereof (after taking the oath) he engaged to furnish two thousand pounds. But, from the moment Tresham was admitted, Catesby become a prey to misgivings and alarms, and he sorely repented having confided his secret to such an individual.

As the great day—the 5th of November—approached, the conspirators had several secret consultations at White Webbs, a house near Enfield Chase, then a wild, solitary place.[1] Here it was resolved that Fawkes should fire the mine by means of a slow-burning match, which would allow him time to escape before the explosion of the gunpowder (there was a ship, hired with Tresham's money, lying in the Thames, and in this Guido was to embark and to proceed to Flanders); that, after the catastrophe, the Princess Elizabeth, in case of their losing the Prince of Wales and Prince Charles, was to be immediately proclaimed queen, and a regent appointed during her minority. But now they felt the difficulty there would be in warning and saving their friends, and most of them had dear friends and relations in parliament. In the Upper House, for example, the Lords Stourton and Mounteagle, both Catholics, had married sisters of Francis Tresham, and Tresham was exceeding earnest that they should have some warning given them, in order to keep away from parliament. Percy also was eager to save his relative, the Earl of Northumberland; and Kay, or Keyes, the decayed gentleman who had had charge of the house at Lambeth, was equally anxious to save his friend and patron, Lord Mordaunt, who had given food and shelter to his wife and children. There were others whose fate excited the liveliest interest; and all of them were desirous of warning the youthful Earl of Arundel. But Catesby undertook to prove to them that most of the Catholics would be absent, seeing that their presence would be useless, as they could not prevent the passing of new penal laws against their religion. "But," said Catesby, "with all that, rather than the project should not take effect, if they were as dear unto me as mine own son, they also must be blown up." A day or two after, Tresham suddenly and unexpectedly came upon Catesby, Thomas Winter, and Fawkes, at Enfield Chase, and once more required that warning should be given directly to his brother-in-law Mounteagle. Catesby and his two determined comrades hesitated; and, then, it is said, that Tresham told them that, as he could not furnish the money he had promised for some time to come, it would be much better for them to defer the execution of the plot till the closing of parliament, and pass the interval safely in Flanders. Catesby, Thomas Winter, and Fawkes remained fixed to their purpose. Here the dark story becomes doubly dark and doubtful; but it should seem that Tresham went away and warned more persons than Lord Mounteagle. There is also ground for believing that Sir Everard Digby and some others of the conspirators put their particular friends on their guard, though they may have adopted a different method, and one not likely to reveal the secret. The Lord Mounteagle had a mansion at Hoxton which he seldom visited; but, on the 26th of October, ten days before the intended meeting of parliament, he most unexpectedly ordered a supper to be prepared in that house. As he was sitting at table, about seven o'clock in the evening, his page presented to him a letter, which he said he had just received from a tall man, who had departed, and whose features he could not recognize in the dark. His lordship, still sitting at table, opened the letter, and, seeing that it had neither date nor signature, he tossed it to a gentleman in his service, desiring him to read it aloud. The gentleman read :—

"my lord out of the love i beare to some of youere frends i have a caer of youer preservacion therfor i would advyse yowe as yowe tender youer lyf to devyse some exscuse to shift of youer attendance at this parleament for god & man hathe concurred to punish the wickednes of this tyme & thinke not slightlye of this advertisment but retyere youre self into youre contrie wheare yowe maye expect the event in safti for thowghe theare bé no apparance of anni stir yet i saye they shall receyve a terrible blowe this parleament & yet they shall not seie who hurts them this councel is not to be contemned because it maye do yowe good and can do yowe no harme for the dangere is passed as soon as yowe have burnt the letter and i hope god will give yowe the grace to make good use of it to whose holy proteccion i comend yowe."

The authorship of this letter has been attributed to several persons, to women as well as to men; but it seems to us all but certain that it was really written by, or under the dictation of, Tresham. Lord Mounteagle, who, notwithstanding his religion, was on good terms with the court and council (he had recently received an important favor from the king), carried the letter the same evening to Whitehall, and showed it to Cecil and several of the ministers. The king was away, "hunting the fearful hare at Royston," and Cecil resolved that nothing should be done until his return. On the following morning, Mounteagle's gentleman, who had read the letter at the supper-table, warned Thomas Winter that it had been delivered to Cecil. Winter carried this alarming intelligence to Catesby, who instantly suspected the indiscretion or treachery of Tresham. This suspicion was the stronger, from the circumstance that Tresham had absented himself for several days, having made it be given out that he had gone into Northamptonshire. Nothing, however, occurred to show that government had caught the clue; and, on the 30th of October, Tresham not only returned to town, but attended the summons of Catesby and Winter. The three conspirators met on that same day in Enfield Chase. Catesby and Winter directly charged Tresham with having writtten the letter to Mounteagle: and, while they accused him and he defended himself, they fixed their searching eyes on his countenance. It was clear and firm; his voice faltered not: he swore the most solemn oaths that he was ignorant of the letter; and they let him go. If he had betrayed any signs of fear or confusion, their desperate minds were made up to stab him to the heart where he stood. They then returned to London, and sent Fawkes, who knew nothing of the letter, to see if all was right in the cellar. He presently reported that the barrels of powder and the other things were just as they had been left. Then Catesby and Winter told him of the letter, and excused themselves for having placed him in such danger without a warning. Fawkes cooly said that he should have gone just as readily if he had known all, and he undertook to return to the cellar once every day till the fifth of November. By certain marks which he had put behind the door, he was quite sure that no one could enter without his knowledge.

On the 31st of October, James arrived from Royston, and on the next day Cecil put the letter into his hands, informing him of the curious circumstances of its delivery. According to the story generally received, it was James's wonderful sagacity and penetration that first discovered the meaning of the mysterious epistle; but it is proved beyond a doubt that both Cecil and Suffolk, the lord chamberlain, had read the riddle several days before, and had communicated it to several lords of the council before the subject was mentioned to the king.[1] But as this was an opportunity of flattering James on the qualities in which he most prided himself, the courtly ministers proclaimed to the public that all the merit of the discovery was his. Coke, upon the trial of the conspirators, declared that his majesty had made it through a divine illumination; and, in the preamble of the act for a public thanksgiving to Almighty God, it was roundly said that "the conspiracy would have turned to the utter ruin of this whole kingdom, had it not pleased Almighty God, by inspiring the king's most excellent majesty with a divine spirit to interpret some dark phrases of a letter showed to his majesty, above and beyond all ordinary construction, thereby miraculously discovering this hidden treason." It appears to have been the advice of Cecil that nothing should be done to interrupt "the devilish practice" till the night before the king went to the House, "but rather suffer them to go on to the end of their day." On Sunday, the 3d of November, the conspirators were warned by Lord Mounteagle's gentleman that the king had seen the letter, and made great account of it. Upon this, Thomas Winter sought another interview with Tresham, and they met that same evening in Lincoln's Inn Walk. Tresham spoke like a man beside himself; and said that, to his certain knowledge, they were all lost men unless they saved themselves by instant flight. But these infatuated men would not flee, nor did Tresham himself either flee or seek concealment. Catesby, Winter, and all the rest, were now convinced that Tresham was in communication with Mounteagle, and perhaps with Cecil. Percy insisted that they ought to see what the following day—the last day of anxiety and doubt—would bring forth, before they thought of other measures. Their vessel still lay in the Thames, ready to slip its cable at a moment's notice. It was, however, resolved that Catesby and John Wright should ride off, on the following afternoon, to join Sir Everard Digby, at Dunchurch. That very night, in spite of all their suspicions, Fawkes, with undaunted courage, went to keep watch in the cellar.

On Monday afternoon, Suffolk, the lord chamberlain, whose duty it was to see that all arrangements for the meeting of parliament were properly made, went down to the House, accompanied by Lord Mounteagle. After passing some time in the Parliament Chamber, they descended to the vaults and cellars, pretending that some of the king's stuffs were missing. They threw open the door of the powder-cellar, and there they saw, standing in a corner, "a very tall and desperate fellow." It was Guido Fawkes, whose wonderful nerves were proof even to this trial. The chamberlain, with affected carelessness, asked him who he was? He said that he was servant to Mr. Percy, and looking after his master's coals. "Your master," said the courtier, "has laid in a good stock of fuel;" and, without adding any thing else, he and Mounteagle left the cellar. When they were gone their way, Fawkes hurried to acquaint Percy with their visit, and then returned to the cellar, resolute to the last, hoping against hope! At about two o'clock in the morning (it was now the fifth of November) Fawkes undid the door of the cellar, and came forth, booted and spurred, to look about him. At that instant, and before he could move back, he was seized and pinioned by a party of soldiers under the command of Sir Thomas Knevett, a magistrate of Westminster. If the desperado had only had time to light a match they would all have been blown into the air together. When they had bound him hand and foot, they searched his person and found a watch (which was not common then), some touchwood and tinder, and some slow matches. Within the cellar and behind the door was found a dark-lantern with a light burning in it. The prisoner was carried to Whitehall, and there, in the royal bed-chamber, he was interrogated by the king and council, who seem to have been afraid of him, bound and helpless as he was, for his voice was still bold, his countenance unchanged, and he returned with scorn and defiance their inquisitive glances. His name, he said, was John Johnson,—his condition that of a servant to Mr. Thomas Percy. He boldly avowed his purpose, and said he was sorry it was not done. When pressed to disclose who were his accomplices, he replied that he could not resolve to accuse any. The king asked how he could have the heart to destroy his children and so many innocent souls that must have suffered? "Dangerous diseases," said Fawkes, "require desperate remedies." One of the Scottish courtiers inquired why he had collected so many barrels of gunpowder? "One of my objects," said the conspirator, "was to blow Scotchmen back into Scotland." In the morning of the 6th of November he was removed to the Tower, James sending instructions with him that he was to be put through all the grades of torture in order to elicit confession.[1] For three or four days he would confess nothing (it appears that he was not severely tortured till the 10th); but his accomplices declared themselves by flying and taking up arms,—that is, all of them except Tresham, who remained in London at his usual place of abode, showed himself openly in the streets, and even went to the council to offer his services in apprehending the rebels. Catesby and John Wright had departed for Dunchurch the preceding evening: Percy and Christopher Wright waited till they learned Fawkes's arrest; and Rookwood and Keyes, who were little known in London, determined to remain to see what would follow. In the morning when they went abroad they found that all was known, and that horror and amazement were expressed in every countenance. Keyes then left London; but Rookwood, who had placed relays of his fine horses all the way to Dunchurch, lingered to the last moment, in the hope of collecting more intelligence. It was near the hour of noon when he took horse; but, once mounted, he rode with desperate haste. He soon put the hill of Highgate between him and the capital: he spurred across Finchley Common, where he overtook Keyes, who kept him company as far as Turvey in Bedfordshire. From that point Rookwood galloped on to Brickhill, where he overtook Catesby and John Wright. Soon afterward they came up with Percy and Christopher Wright, and then all five rode together with headlong speed, some of them throwing their clokes into the hedge, to ride the lighter, till they came to Ashby St. Legers, in Northamptonshire, at six o'clock in the evening. The distance from London was eighty miles, which Rookwood had ridden in little more than six hours. If they had chosen to ride on to some sea-port they might certainly have escaped with their lives; but they had no such design. Some of the hunting party, with whom was Winter, a principal conspirator, had taken up their quarters for the night in the house of Lady Catesby, at Ashby St. Legers, and were sitting down to supper when Rookwood, Percy, and the others from London, entered the apartment, covered with dirt, and half dead with fatigue. Their story was soon told; and then the whole party, taking with them all the arms they could find, mounted and rode off to Dunchurch. There they found Sir Everard Digby surrounded by many guests, Catholic gentlemen invited to hunt on Dunmoor, but fully aware that the meeting had reference to some avenging blow to be struck in London, though only a few of them had been admitted into the whole of the secret. But these guests presently perceived that the main plotters had miscarried, and so, without standing on the order of their going, they stole away in the course of the night; and when day dawned, Digby, Catesby, Percy, Rookwood, and the rest, were left alone, with a few servants and retainers. Catesby knew the number of Catholics living in Wales and the adjoining counties, and he suggested that if they made a rapid march in that direction they might raise a formidable insurrection. They got again to their horses, rode through Warwick, where they seized some cavalry horses, leaving their own tired steeds in their places, and then went to Grant's house at Norbrook, where, it appears, they were joined by a few servants, and procured some arms. They then rode across Warwickshire and Worcestershire, to a house belonging to Stephen Littleton, called Holbeach, on the borders of Staffordshire, where they arrived on Thursday night, the 7th of November. On their way they had called upon the Catholics to arm and follow them; "but not one man," said Sir Everard Digby, "came to take our part, though we had expected so many." In several places the Catholic gentry drove them from their doors with the bitterest reproaches, telling them that they had brought down ruin and disgrace on them and their religion.

By this time the conspirators were closely followed by Sir Richard Walsh, sheriff of Worcester, attended by many gentlemen of the country and the whole posse comitatus. Although the road was open toward Wales, they resolved to stand at bay, and defend themselves in the house of Holbeach. If their people had remained firm, they might possibly have repulsed the tumultuary assault of the sheriff, but these serving-men stole away during the night. Early on the following morning Stephen Littleton, who had been admitted into the whole plot, got out of the house, and fled through fear; and Sir Everard Digby went off, in order, as he said, to bring up succor. Sir Everard had scarcely got out of the house when some damp gunpowder, which they were drying before a fire, ignited and blew up with a tremendous explosion. Catesby was burned and blackened and nearly killed, and two or three of the others were seriously injured. They now began to fear that God disapproved of their project; and Rookwood and others, "perceiving God to be against them, prayed before the picture of our Lady, and confessed that the act was so bloody as they desired God to forgive them." Robert Winter, filled with horror and affright, stole out of the house, and came up with Stephen Littleton in a wood hard by, and shortly after his evasion, Catesby's servant, Thomas Bates, escaped in the same manner. About the hour of noon Sir Richard Walsh surrounded the mansion, and summoned the rebels to lay down their arms. A successful resistance was now hopeless; but, preferring to die where they stood, to suffering the horrid death prescribed by the laws, they refused to surrender, and defied their numerous assailants. Upon this, the sheriff ordered one part of his company to set fire to the house, and another to make an attack on the gates of the court-yard. The conspirators, with nothing but their swords in their hands, presented themselves as marks to be shot at. Thomas Winter was presently hit in the right arm and disabled. "Stand by me, Tom," cried Catesby, "and we will die together." And presently, as they were standing back to back, they were both shot through the body with two bullets from one musket. Catesby crawled into the house upon his hands and knees, and, seizing an image of the Virgin which stood in the vestibule, clasped it to his bosom, and expired. Two other merciful shots dispatched the two brothers, John and Christopher Wright, and another wounded Percy so badly that he died the next day. Rookwood, who had been severely hurt in the morning, by the explosion of the powder, was wounded in the body with a pike, and had his arm broken by a bullet. At a rush he was made prisoner, and the other men, wounded and disarmed, were seized within the house. Sir Everard Digby was overtaken near Dudley by the hue-and-cry, and made fast. Stephen Littleton and Robert Winter were betrayed several days after by a servant of Mrs. Littleton of Hagley, in whose house they had been secreted. Thomas Bates, Catesby's servant, was arrested in Staffordshire; Keyes in Warwickshire. They were all carried up to London, and lodged in the Tower. Tresham, who had never left London, and who appears to have been confident of his own safety, was arrested and committed to the Tower on the 12th of November, or four days after the death or seizure of his associates at Holbeach.

Guido Fawkes, in the mean while, had been repeatedly examined, not only by lords commissioners named by the king, but also by the Lord Chief Justice Popham, Sir Edward Coke, and Sir William Wood, the Lieutenant of the Tower. No promises, no threats, could shake his firmness, or disturb his self-possession. When urged with the argument that his denial of the names of his companions was useless, because by their flight they had been sufficiently discovered, he said, "If that be so, it would be superfluous for me to declare them, seeing by that circumstance they have named themselves." He confessed freely to all his own doings, said he was ready to die, and rather wished ten thousand deaths than to accuse Percy or any other. But he was told that Percy and several of his confederates were apprehended, and he was racked apparently beyond the limits of mental endurance. On the 8th of November, before any violent torture was applied, he signed his name to a deposition with a bold, firm hand; but two days after, his signature to a fuller statement, in which he names his accomplices, is in a faint and trembling hand, jagged and incomplete, bearing every appearance of being written in bodily agony. The Christian name (Guido) alone is completed, and after it there is a scrawl as if the pen had fallen from his hand.[1] This single incident tells a tale of horror. But it appears that Fawkes never put the government in possession of a single secret with which they were not previously acquainted, and that he would under no excruciating pain, impeach the Jesuits, some of whom were suspected, from the beginning, of being implicated in the plot. Thus his examiners were barbarous to no purpose. Bates, the servant of Catesby, was less able to go through the ordeal: he confessed whatever was wished, and was the first to implicate the Jesuits. Nor was Tresham much more firm than Bates; for, though he did not implicate the priests in the gunpowder treason, he confessed that Father Garnet and Father Greenway were both privy and party to a traitorous correspondence carried on about a year before the death of Elizabeth with the court of Spain by Catesby and others. Soon after his committal to the Tower, this wretched man, who appears to have been overreached by the government he saved, was attacked by an agonizing disease. In his extremity of weakness he was allowed the assistance of a confidential servant and the society of his wife. On the 22d of December, at the close approach of death, he dictated to his servant a statement in which he most solemnly retracted all that he had confessed about Garnet and Greenway. This paper he signed, and made his man-servant and a female servant of the Tower put their hands to it as witnesses. In the course of the night he gave this statement to his wife, charging her to deliver it with her own hands to Cecil;[2] and he expired about two o'clock on the following morning. Catholic writers have ascribed his death to foul play at the hands of government. This suspicion seems rather groundless, but there are reasons for believing that some state secrects respecting the discovery of the plot were buried in the grave of the miserable man.

On the 15th of January, 1606, a royal proclamation was issued against Garnet, Greenway, and Gerard, all three English Jesuits who had been lurking in the country for years. The trial of the surviving chief conspirators commenced on the 27th of January, having been delayed nearly two months, mainly in order to bring in the priests, and to get possession of the persons of Baldwin, a Jesuit, Owen, and Sir William Stanley, then residing in the Flemish dominions of the Spaniards, who refused to give them up. On the day of the trial, "the queen and the prince were in a secret place by to hear, and some say the king was in another." The prisoners, Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, Thomas Winter, Ambrose Rookwood, John Grant, Guido Fawkes, Robert Keyes, and Thomas Bates, with the single exception of Digby, who confessed the indictment, pleaded not guilty; not, as they observed, because they denied a full participation in the powder plot, but because the indictment contained many things to which they were strangers. The evidence produced consisted entirely of the written depositions of the prisoners and of a servant of Sir Everard Digby. No witness was orally examined. There was nothing developed on the trial to connect the conspiracy with many English Catholics beyond the actual plotters. Indeed, the papists in general regarded the whole affair with horror, and Sir Everard Digby pathetically lamented that the project for which he had sacrificed every thing he had in the world, was disapproved by Catholics and priests, and that the act which brought him to his death was considered by them to be a great sin. In general the principal conspirators again denied that either Garnet or any other Jesuit was aware of the project of the powder, though several allowed that they had frequent conference both with Garnet and Greenway. In extenuation, they pleaded the sufferings they and their families and friends had undergone,—the violated promises of the king, who before his accession had assured them of toleration,—their despair of any relief from the established government,—their dread of still harsher persecution,—and their natural desire to reëstablish what they considered the only true church of Christ. They were all condemned to die the usual death of traitors, and sentence was executed to the letter—for this was not an occasion on which the government was likely to omit an iota of the torturing and bloody law. Sir Everard Digby, Robert Winter, John Grant, and Thomas Bates, suffered on the 30th of January; Thomas Winter, [2] Tresham declared that he made the confession respecting Garnet "only to avoid ill usage" (that is torture), and that he had not "seen Garnet for sixteen years before, nor never had letter nor message from him." Father Garnet himself, his friend Mrs. Anne Vaux, and other witnesses, subsequently agreed in declaring that Garnet had been with Tresham continually in various places until within a few days of the discovery of the gunpowder plot.

Rookwood, Keyes, and Guido Fawkes—"the Devil of the Vault"—on the next day: they all died courageously, repenting of their intention, but professing an unaltered attachment to the Roman church. The scene chosen for their exit was the west end of St. Paul's church-yard.

Before they were led to the scaffold, the Jesuit Garnet, of whom so much has been said, was on his way to the Tower, having been discovered hid in a secret chamber at Hendlip, near Worcester, the seat of Thomas Abingdon, who had married the sister of Lord Mounteagle.[1] The other two Jesuits, Gerard and Greenway, after many adventures, effected their escape to the continent. Garnet, who at some former time had been well known to Cecil, was treated in the Tower with comparative leniency; and, from an expression of regret used by a dignitary of the Protestant church, who afterward became a bishop, we may presume that he was never laid upon the rack. But his companion Hall, or Oldcorn, another Jesuit, who was found in the same hiding-place at Henlip, Garnet's confidential servant, Owen, and another servant called Chambers, appear to have been tortured without mercy, as also without effect—for no one of them would confess any thing of importance against Garnet or any other Jesuit or priest. Owen, after undergoing the minor torments, in order to escape the rack, with which he was threatened on his next examination, tore open his bowels with a blunt knife, which he had obtained by a strategem, and died true to his master. Whatever was the extent of Garnet's guilt, or of the moral obliquity which he derived from the intriguing, crafty order to which he belonged, he was indisputably a man of extraordinary learning and ability: he baffled all the court lawyers and cunningest statesmen in twenty successive examinations. They could never get an advantage over him, nor drive him into a contradiction or an admission unfavorable to his case.[1] But in the congenial atmosphere of the Tower a certain craft had attained to the highest perfection; and there has scarcely been a device fancied by romance writers, but was put into actual operation within those horrible walls. Some of the most revolting practices of the Inquisition may be traced in this English state prison. Garnet's keeper of a sudden pretended to be his friend,—to venerate him as a martyr; and he offered, at his own great hazard, to convey any letters the prisoner might choose to write to his friends. Garnet intrusted to him several letters, which were all carried to the council, as were also the answers to them; but so cautious was the Jesuit, that there was nothing in this correspondence to weigh against him. Failing in this experiment, the Lieutenant of the Tower removed Hall, or Oldcorn, to a cell next to that of his friend Garnet, and they were both informed by the keeper, who recommended extreme caution and secrecy, that, by opening a concealed door, they might easily converse together. The temptation was irresistible, and both the Jesuits fell into the trap. Edward Forset, a man of some learning, and a magistrate, and Locherson, a secretary of Cecil, who had tried his ears before at eaves-dropping, were placed in such a position between the two cells that they could overhear nearly every word the prisoners uttered; and as they conversed they took notes of all that was said. Their main subject was how they should arrange their defense. Garnet said that he must needs confess that he had been at White-Webbs, in Enfield Chase, with the conspirators, but that he would maintain that he had not been there since Bartholomew-tide. "And in truth," said he, "I am well persuaded that I shall wind myself out of this matter." On the following day the conversation was renewed, the eavesdroppers being at their post as before. Garnet said several things which went to connect him with the conspirators; and he told Hall that, at the next visitation of the commissioners, they must both "expect either to go to the rack, or to pass quietly with the rest." He also added, that he had heard that one James, or Johnson, had been upon the rack for three hours. In the third conversation, Hall, or Oldcorn, related how he had been examined, and what he had said. Garnet said, "If they examine me any more, I will urge them to bring proofs against me, for they speak of three or four witnesses." In a fourth conversation there dropped nothing of any consesequence. But the commissioners thought they had already enough to drive the matter home. Garnet had hitherto denied all acquaintance with the first stages of the plot: he and Oldcorn were now charged with their own words; and at first they boldly denied having uttered them. Oldcorn, however, confessed to their truth on the rack. Still Garnet held out; and, when showed Oldcorn's examination, he said that his friend might accuse himself falsely, but that he would not accuse himself. According to the Catholic account, he was then led to the rack, and made sundry admissions to escape torture; but, according to government documents, which, we need hardly say, are in many essentials open to doubt, he began to confess from his inward conviction that it would be of no use to persist in denying a fact, avowed by Oldcorn, and supported by Forset and Locherson. After much subtilizing and equivocating, he was driven to admit that, when Fawkes went over to Flanders, he had given him a recommendatory letter to his brother Jesuit, Baldwin; and, finally, that the design of blowing up the parliament-house with gunpowder had been revealed to him, as far back as the month of July of the preceding year, by Greenway, who had received it in confession from Catesby, and, as he believed, from Thomas Winter also. But he added that he had earnestly endeavored to dissuade Catesby, and desired Greenway to do the same. He further stated that Catesby had at one time propounded a question to him, in general terms, as to the lawfulness of a design meant to promote the Catholic religion, in the execution of which it would be necessary to destroy a few Catholic friends together with a great many heretical enemies. And he said that, in ignorance of what Catesby's design really was, he had replied, that, "in case the object was clearly good, and could be effected by no other means, it might be lawful among many nocents to destroy some innocents." Oldcorn, who was no longer of any use, was now sent down to Worcester, with Mr. Abington, the owner of the house at Henlip, and a priest named Strange, to be tried by a special commission. Abington, whose sole offense appears to have been the concealment of the two Jesuits, received the king's pardon through his brother-in-law, Lord Mounteagle; Oldcorn and Strange, together with several other persons, were executed. The Roman church unwisely and unjustly put the name of Oldcorn on its roll of martyrs.

On the 3d of March "Henry Garnet, superior to the Jesuits in England," was put upon his trial for high treason, before a special commission in Guildhall. The case excited immense interest; all the members of parliament attended; the king himself was present in a by-corner, and the Lady Arabella Stuart in another. Coke had again a grand opportunity for display, and he spoke for some hours. When the Jesuit replied, he was not permitted so much space. Coke interrupted him continually; the commissioners on the bench interrupted him; and James, who seems to have felt a respect for his powers of argument and eloquence, declared that the Jesuit had not fair play allowed him. Garnet pleaded that he had done his best to prevent the execution of the powder treason; and that he could not, by the laws of his church, reveal any secret which had been received under the sacred seal of confession. He carried himself very gravely and temperately, and half charmed that immense audience; but, upon the evidence of the depositions obtained in the Tower, and the oaths of Forest and Locherson, "the spials set of purpose," a verdict of guilty was returned, and the lord chief justice pronounced the sentence of hanging, drawing, and quartering. During the whole trial they extracted nothing from the Jesuit: they had expected great discoveries, but they made none.[1] Instead, therefore, of being hurried to execution, Garnet was kept six weeks in prison, during which the greatest efforts were made to wring further avowals from him, and to lead him to a declaration of the principles of the society to which he belonged. In the first purpose they entirely failed, but in the second they partially succeeded; and, if the declarations concerning equivocation were fairly obtained, and if he expressed his real feelings, the Jesuit certainly entertained "opinions as inconsistent with all good government as they were contrary to sound morality."[2] It happened, however, rather unfortunately, that King James, and his ministers, and their predecessors, had made opinions nearly allied to those of the Jesuit the fixed rules of at least their political conduct. Garnet was executed on the 3d of May; and Cecil got the order of the Garter as a reward for his exertions in the detection of the plot and his "constant dealing in matters of religion." Several other Catholics were put to death in Warwickshire and the adjoining counties; some for being personally concerned, some for harboring priests and proclaimed traitors. There were other victims of a more elevated rank, but not one of these was punished capitally. The Earl of Northumberland, the kinsman of the traitor Percy, was seized on the first discovery of the plot, and committed to the care of the Archbishop of Canterbury; and, after the capture of the conspirators at Holbeach, the three Catholic lords, Stourton, Mordaunt, and Montague, were arrested, upon the ground that they all meant to be absent from parliament, and therefore must have known of the gunpowder treason. No one of them was ever put upon a fair trial, but the Star Chamber arbitrarily condemned them to heavy fines, and to imprisonment during the king's pleasure. The Earl of Northumberland was removed to the Tower, and closely examined many times. He demanded a public trial; but in the month of June they brought him up to the Star Chamber, and there accused him of having sought to be the head of the papists, and a "promoter of toleration;" of having admitted Percy, a Catholic, to be a gentleman-pensioner, without exacting from him the proper oaths, and of having preferred the safety of his money to the safety of the king. It is said that James and his ministers believed that Northumberland was the person to whom the conspirators had intended to offer the regency or protectorship; but no mention was made of this in the Star Chamber. The earl was sentenced to pay a fine of £30,000, to be deprived of all his offices, and to be imprisoned in the Tower for life.[1]

The parliament, which was to have been blown into the air on the 5th of November, met for the dispatch of business on the 21st of January, 1606. The penal statutes had made a few madmen, and, as if the dominant party wished to make more, they immediately called for an increase of severity. James tried to moderate the fierceness of the Commons, by which attempt he put his own orthodoxy in question; and, as he had chosen this unlucky moment for opening a matrimonial negotiation for his son, Prince Henry, with the most Catholic court of Spain, the Puritans began to murmur that he was little better than a papist himself. Laws the most irritating, oppressive, and cruel, against the whole body of Catholics, were carried through both Houses by overwhelming majorities; and James, more from fear than from any other motive, assented to them. A few of these laws will give a notion of the spirit that was abroad. No Catholic recusant was to appear at court, to live in London, or within ten miles of London, or to remove on any occasion more than five miles from his home, without especial license, signed by four magistrates. No recusant was to practice in surgery, physic, or law; to act as judge, clerk, or officer, in any court or corporation, or perform the office of administrator, executor, or guardian. In all cases of marriage where the ceremony was performed by a Catholic priest, the husband, being a Catholic, could have no claim on the property of the wife, nor the wife, if a Catholic, on that of the husband. Every Catholic that neglected to have his child baptized within a month of its birth, by a Protestant minister, was to pay for each omission £100; and £20 was the price to be paid for burying any body in any other place than a church-yard of the establishment. Every householder keeping Catholic servants was to pay for each individual £10 per lunar month, and the same sum was to be paid for each Catholic guest he might entertain. Every Catholic recusant was declared to be in all respects excommunicated: his house might be broken open and searched, his books and furniture, "having any relation to his idolatrous worship," might be burnt, his horses and arms taken from him at any moment by the order of a magistrate. A new oath of allegiance was devised in which was a formal renunciation of the temporal power of the pope, and of his right of interfering in the civil affairs of England. Such Catholics as would take this oath were liable only to the penalties which have been enumerated; but such as refused the oath were to be imprisoned for life, and to forfeit their personal property and the rents of their lands. It was expected that most of the papists would take this oath, which did not trench on any religious dogma; but it was loaded with offensive epithets, and though some of the leaders of Catholic clergy in England decided in its favor, the Jesuits condemned it, and the pope, Paul V., forbad it in a brief, which Blackwall, the archpriest, had the courage to publish to his congregation, though he himself would have recommended the taking of the oath. Blackwall, who was seventy years old, was soon lodged in a prison, where he remained till his death, which happened six or seven years after. Drury, another priest, was hanged, drawn, and quartered. James fondly thought that he could decide the question of the oath with his theological pen; and, with some assistance from his divines, he brought out a tract entitled, "An Apology for the Oath of Allegiance." Parsons, the celebrated Jesuit, and Cardinal Bellarmine, who, according to no favorable judge,[1] "had the best pen of his time for controversy," replied to the Apology. James rejoined by publishing what he called "A Monitory Preface." To Parsons, he said, the fittest answer would be a rope. Bellarmine, who had appeared under a feigned name, was not more gently treated. "An obscure author," said his majesty, "is this, utterly unknown to me, being yet little known to the world for any other of his works; and therefore must he be a very desperate fellow in beginning his aprentisage, not only to refute, but to rail upon a king." James's courtiers, including most of his bishops, told him that he had completely vanquished his opponents, and gained immortal fame; the Catholics (and not a few Protestants) thought that he had done a very silly thing, and his brother princes, that he had degraded the royal dignity.

[1] Jardine, Criminal Trials. The second volume of this work—a highly valuable illustration of English history and English law—is devoted entirely to the gunpowder-plot, and contains, not only every thing valuable that has been published on the subject, but numerous extracts from original and unpublished MSS. in the State Paper Office, Crown Office, and other repositories. The little volume is admirably complete as a contribution to history, and is, at the same time, as exciting and amusing as a romance.

[1] Bayle, Dict

He was by this time in great distress for money. The Commons seemed disposed to vote a liberal subsidy, but the bill lay a good while on their table, and at last they came to a decision that it should not pass till they had prepared their list of grievances. The king, who abhorred the word grievance, had to digest, as he could, sixteen long articles: but he evaded the question of redress, and the Commons kept aloof from the subsidy. Cecil and the other ministers made half-promises in their master's name; the House of Lords was wonderously loyal and liberal, but it was not until the month of May that the Commons voted three subsidies and six fifteenths. While the money question was pending, a report was spread that the king, who was away hunting, was assassinated at Oaking, in Berkshire, together with his three favorites, Philip Herbert Earl of Montgomery; Sir John Ramsay, and Sir James Hay, "which treason some said was performed by English Jesuits, some by Scots in women's apparel, and others said by Spaniards and Frenchmen; but most reports agreed that the king was stabbed with an envenomed knife."[1] Others, however, would have it, that the thing had not been done with a poisoned knife, but that the king had been smothered in his bed as he lay asleep; while others were equally sure that he had been shot with a pistol as he was riding out on horseback. There was a great consternation both in the parliament-house and in the city, with great weeping and lamentation of old and young, rich and poor, maids and wives, who again expected an English St. Bartholomew's. But about three o'clock in the afternoon James arrived safe and sound at Whitehall, and was heartily greeted by the people. It has been supposed that Cecil—perhaps the king himself—was no stranger to the origin of this bruit, which is supposed to have quickened the generosity of the Commons. Having got the subsidies, James prorogued parliament on the 27th of May to the 18th of November.

In the month of July, James received a visit from his brother-in-law, Christian IV., king of Denmark; and in the round of costly feasts, hunts, and entertainments, which he gave on this occasion, he forgot the Commons, Garnet, the gunpowder-plot, and all state matters whatsoever. A satirical letter-writer of the time observes that the parliament had voted the subsidies very seasonably, so that the court was able show off to advantage, and to entertain the royal Dane with shows, sights, and banquetings from morn till eve.[2] "This short month of his stay," says another cotemporary, "carried with it as pleasing a countenance on every side, and their recreations and pastimes flew as high a flight as Love mounted upon the wings of Art and Fancy, the suitable nature of the season, or Time's swift feet could possibly arrive at. The court, city, and some parts of the country, with banquetings, masques, dancings, tiltings, barriers, and other gallantry (besides the manly sports of wrestling and the brutish sports of baiting wild beasts), swelled to such a greatness, as if there were intention in every particular man this way to have blown up himself."[1] We possess too many corroborative accounts of these entertainments to doubt that they were gross and indecorous. At a feast given by Cecil at Theobalds, the two mighty princes, James and Christian, got so drunk that his English majesty was carried to bed in the arms of his courtiers, and his Danish majesty mistook his bedchamber, and offered the last of insults to the Countess of Nottingham, the handsome and spirited wife of the lord high admiral of England. But at the same great entertainment James's subjects, ladies as well as gentlemen of the highest rank, gave proof that they were capable of following the example of their sovereign. "Men," says an eye-witness, "who had been shy of good liquor before, now wallowed in beastly delights; the ladies abandoned their sobriety, and were seen to roll about in intoxication."[2]

The royal Dane was scarcely gone when there arrived another expensive guest, in the person of Prince Vaudemont, one of James's kinsmen of the House of Guise, who brought an immense retinue with him. This led to fresh festivities and hunts, during which James could find no time to attend to business, though he now and then could steal a day or two to give to the orthodox clergy, who were intent on proving, by scripture and history, the royal supremacy, and the grand fact, that in all ages the authority of kings governed and ruled the Church—doctrines most unpalatable to the Presbyterians of Scotland, and tending to disgust them with the project of the union which James had so much at heart. At last Vaudemont departed, and on the appointed day, in the month of November, the parliament met again. The Commons had voted their money, and now the king returned his answer to their grievances, the greater part of which referred to grants, made to particular persons, of the nature of monoplies. These grants, for the most part, James defended with arguments; but in some cases he remitted them to the consideration of the courts of law. In the former session James had caused to be introduced and debated his scheme of a perfect union between England and Scotland: the subject was now again taken up with great earnestness, and Bacon was prepared with a great and statesmanlike speech in support of the measure. But the two countries were in no respects prepared; the antipathies, prejudices, and hostilities of centuries, were not to be cured in three short years; and many recent circumstances and indications had tended greatly to indispose men's minds on either side the Tweed to the grand political experiment. James had so openly and coarsely announced his creed of prerogative that alarms were excited, and people were averse to any measure that might increase his sovereign power. We have already mentioned his determined predilection for episcopacy; and it was generally understood that the state union would be accompanied by a church union, the Scots being made to conform to the Anglican establishment, which they regarded, and which James himself had at one time professed to regard, as something little short of papistry. The king, moreover, had dwelt continually upon the great superiority of the laws of England, which the Scots had no inclination to adopt. Nor is it ever easy to change the laws and institutions of a people except by absolute conquest. The Scots were justly proud of their hardly contested and preserved independence: they regarded with indignation and horror every thing which seemed to fix the badge of submission or inferiority upon them. The English, on the other side, scarcely less proud, were avowedly averse to admitting the Scots to a footing of equality; and the king's indiscretion, at the commencement of his reign, in lavishing English money, posts, and titles upon some Scottish favorites, had raised a popular clamor that the country was to be overrun and devoured by their poor and hungry neighbors. At different stages of the debates several members of the Commons gave full expression to the most angry and contemptuous feeling against James's countrymen. One speaker quoted Scripture to show that the union was altogether unfit and unnatural. He brought in the comparison of the families of Abraham and Lot, which, joining, soon grew to difference, and to the words Vade tu ad dextrum, et ego ad sinistram (go thou to the right hand, and I will go to the left). Sir Christopher Pigot, member for Buckinghamshire, expressed his astonishment and horror at the notion of a union between a rich and fertile country like England, and a land like Scotland, poor, barren, and disgraced by nature—between rich, frank, and honest men, and a proud, beggarly, and traitorous race; and, giving still further license to his rhetoric, he declared that the difference between an Englishman and a Scot was the same as that between a judge and a thief! The whole Scottish nation hotly resented these gross insults, and threatened to take up arms to avenge them. James, in an agony of alarm, rebuked Cecil for allowing such expressions to pass unnoticed; and he declared to his council that the insult touched him as a Scot. Next he rebuked and threatened the Commons, who thereupon expelled Pigot, and even committed him to the Tower. In the session of 1604, the English and Scotch commissioners had agreed to the entire abrogation of all hostile laws between the two kingdoms, to the abolition of border courts and customs, and to a free intercourse of trade throughout the king's dominions. James had also, very soon after his accession, both on coins and in proclamations, assumed the title of King of Great Britain; and here, in prudence, he ought to have stopped, and left the rest to the salutary operation of time and peaceful intercourse. But he drove on to his end, and was greatly enraged with the Commons when they rejected his proposition for the naturalization of the ante-nati, or Scots born before his accession to the English throne. A decision, however, soon after obtained in the courts of law, extended the rights of naturalization to all Scots who were post-nati, or born after the king's accession; so that in the course of a few years the mass of the Scots would become natural subjects of the English crown. The Commons did not venture to call in question this right of the post-nati, though it was evident that they did not admit it with very good will. When urged to go further they invented all kinds of difficulties and delays, which called forth another harsh schooling from the king. In his speech to the two Houses, which had the haughtiness but not the dignity of Elizabeth, he threatened to abandon London, and fix his residence at York or Berwick; and he alluded with bitterness to certain discourses which had been made in the Commons' House. "I looked," cried James, "for no such fruits at your hands,—such personal discourses and speeches, which, of all other, I looked you should avoid, as not beseeming the gravity of your assembly. I am your king; I am placed to govern you, and shall answer for your errors; I am a man of flesh and blood, and have my passions and affections as other men; I pray you, do not too far move me to do that which my power may tempt me unto."[1]

The Commons, who had already learned that James could bark better than he could bite, would not take this castigation in silence. They made known to him, through the speaker, their earnest desire that he would listen to no private reports of their doings, but take his information of the House's meaning from themselves; that he would be pleased to allow such members as had been blamed to clear themselves in his hearing, and that he would, by some gracious message, let them know that they might deliver their opinions in their places without restraint or fear. On the very next day he civilly replied, through the speaker, that he wished to preserve their privileges, especially that of liberty of speech.[2] And yet, a very few days after this message, he was interfering again, and commenting on their speeches, telling them that they were too much given to the discussion of matters above their comprehension. Nay, when they moved the reading of a petition, which contained strong remonstrances against ecclesiastical abuses, now growing in the bright sunshine of the royal countenance, and in favor of the deprived and prosecuted Puritan preachers, the speaker, according to orders received, told the House that his majesty reserved these matters to himself, and would not be pressed thereon. Some members cried out that this was an infringement of their liberties; but the speaker told them (and truly enough) that there were many precedents,—that the late queen had often restrained the House from meddling in politics of divers kinds. A motion was then made for the appointment of a committee to search for precedents that "do concern any messages from the sovereign magistrate, king or queen, of this realm, touching petitions offered to the House of Commons." But here James sent down a second message, telling the House, that, though the petition contained matter whereof they could not properly take cognizance, yet, if they thought good to have it read, he was not against the reading. The Commons were mollified, and the petition was at last, "with general liking, agreed to sleep." In this same session the merchants presented to the Commons a petition upon the grievances they sustained from Spain, entering largely into the cruelties which they and their mariners suffered, particularly in the New World, which the jealous Spainards still pretended to close against all mankind. The Commons named a committee; and, when the committee had made its report, they prayed a conference with the Lords. The Upper House was a mere branch of the court, and so the Lords intimated that it was an unusual matter for the Commons to enter upon. At length, however, they granted the conference, and Bacon reported its result. Cecil was of course the principal speaker on the part of the Lords. He had the double task of removing the odium from Spain (for James was more and more inclined to a close alliance with that monarchy), and supporting his master's high notions touching the prerogative. After considerably extenuating the wrongs imputed to Spain (the merchants had greatly exaggerated their case, but the Spanish principle was monstrous), he went on to argue that, by law, the crown of England was invested with an absolute power of peace and war, and that petitions made in parliament intermeddling with such matters were futile and inconvenient; that, if parliaments had ever been made acquainted with matter of peace or war in a general way, it was either when the king and council conceived that it was material to have some declaration of the zeal and affection of the people, or else when they needed money for the charges of the war, in which case they should be sure enough to hear of it. The Lords would make a good construction of the Commons' desire; but, as Cecil told them, they could not concur in the petition. Henry Howard (one of the sons of the late Earl of Surrey), now Earl of Northampton, and the most thorough-going courtier, followed Cecil, and told the Commons that their duties were confined to the places which they represented, that they had "a private and local wisdom according to that compass, but were not fit to examine or determine secrets of state." It appears that the Commons submitted, and gave up the merchants' petition. But the outcry out of doors was loud, and became the louder as James further betrayed his leaning to Spain.

On the 4th of July, 1607, he prorogued the parliament till the month of November of the same year, but, in effect, it did not meet again till February, 1610. While it was still sitting, in the month of May, 1609, lawless assemblages of men, women, and children were suddenly observed in Northamptonshire, Warwickshire, and Leicestershire. The king was greatly alarmed, and at first thought that it must be an organized insurrection, got up either by the papists or by the Puritans, who were equally dissatisfied with his government. But it was nothing of the sort, but rather resembled the agricultural riots about inclosures which happened in the time of Edward VI.[1] The forfeitures of the estates of some of the gentlemen who had been engaged in the gunpowder-plot threw the lands into the hands of new proprietors, who were disposed to make the most of them, and inclosed many tracts where the former owners had allowed the peasantry right of common. Through the blundering statutes against inclosures, the people might consider themselves justified by law in opposing these encroachments. At Hill Norton, in Warwickshire (formerly an estate of the Treshams), they assembled to the number of a thousand; in other places they were still more numerous. They cut and broke down hedges, filled up ditches, and laid open all such inclosed fields as had formerly been free and common. They termed themselves "Levelers;" and they "bent all their strength to level and lay open the old commons without exercising any manner of theft or violence upon any man's person, goods, or cattle." There was, in fact, an order in their disorder; and not a single crime or atrocity was committed, though for a time, in whole districts, rich and poor were at their mercy. At first they had no particular leader, but afterward they placed at their head "a base fellow," called John Reynolds, whom they surnamed Captain Pouch, from a large pouch or purse which he wore by his side. This poor fellow was a madman. He assured the ignorant peasantry that he had authority from the king's majesty to throw down the new inclosures, and that he was sent from God to satisfy men of all degrees. As in a recent case of a somewhat similar kind, he was quite sure that he was invulnerable—that neither bullet nor arrow could harm him; and he further assured the poor clowns and their wives that he kept a spell in his pouch which would protect them all, provided only they abstained from evil deeds and cursing and swearing. When commanded by proclamation to disperse, they told the magistrates that they were only executing the statutes against inclosures. When the lords-lieutenants endeavored to raise the counties against them, they found the yeomanry rather shy of bearing arms in such a cause; and many country gentlemen, whose interests were not implicated, thought it would be better to yield to the point, and let them enjoy their rights of common as before. But the king sent down the Earls of Huntingdon and Exeter, and the Lord Zouche, with a considerable force of regular troops; and Sir Anthony Mildmay and Sir Edward Montague fell upon a body of them at Newton, another estate which had belonged to Tresham. They were busy digging and leveling, and were furnished with many half-piked staves, long bills, bows and arrows, and stones. "Those gentlemen (Mildmay and Montague), finding great backwardness in the trained bands, were constrained to use all the horse they could make, and as many foot of their own servants and followers as they could trust, and first read the proclamation twice unto them, using all the best provisions to them to desist that they could devise; but when nothing would prevail, they charged them thoroughly, both with their horse and foot. At the first charge they stood, and fought desperately; but at the second charge they ran away; in which there were slain some forty or fifty of them, and a very great number hurt. One Sir Henry Fookes, that led the foot against them, was very sore hurt, and bruised in many places of his body, more likely to die than live."[1] This rout was followed up by others till the insurrection was entirely put down. Many men were taken, tried before Sir Edward Coke, and condemned to death as rebels and traitors, for levying war against the king. Captain Pouch was "made exemplary"—that is to say, he was hanged, drawn, and quartered. The poor fellow ought only to have been sent to a madhouse. Others were condemned for felony because they had not dispersed on reading of the king's proclamation.[2]

Meanwhile James continued his life of indolence and ease, hunting a good part of the year, and lying in bed the greater part of the day when he was not so pleasantly engaged. In Scotland his minister, the Earl of Arran, had desired him to recreate himself at hunting, and he would attend the council, and report at his majesty's return all opinions and conclusions.[3] He was scarcely settled in England when he found "that felicity in the hunting life, that he wrote to the council that it was the only means to maintain his health, which being the health and welfare of them all, he desired them to take the charge and burden of affairs, and foresee that he be not interrupted nor troubled with too much business."[4] He even went so far as to say that he would rather return to Scotland than be chained forever to the council-table. It was rarely that his subjects could get access to him in his retreats. When they did, his address, and demeanor, and appointments, clashed strangely with the notion of a most royal and heaven-descended prince, the image, as he called himself, of the Godhead. He was dressed all over in colors green as the grass, with a little feather in his cap, and a horn instead of a sword by his side.[5] His queen, Anne of Denmark, was as fond of dancing and masques, fine dresses and costly entertainments, as he was of hunting; nor had she, on the whole, much more personal dignity than her husband. She was dissipated, thoughtless, extravagant, and had her favorites. But it was the monstrous favoritism of James that withdrew the eyes of all from his other follies and the follies of the queen, making them appear comparatively of little consequence. When he first entered England, the man he most delighted to honor and enrich was Sir John Ramsay, who had stabbed the Earl of Gowrie at the time of the alledged conspiracy, for which he had been promoted by James to be Viscount Haddington. As soon as they were fairly settled in the land of promise, he received leases of crown-lands, gifts, and pensions. Haddington had recently been £10,000.

deep in the merchants' books; but this debt was presently paid off, and the Scottish viscount was well matched, being married, by the king's desire, to the daughter of the great Earl of Sussex. Toward the end of James's reign he was created an English peer, with the title of Earl of Holderness. In the language of the times, he had a good and a gracious maker in this terrestrial globe.[1] Next to Haddington, the prime favorite was Sir James Hay, another Scotchman, whom we have already mentioned, and who was soon created Lord Hay, and subsequently Viscount Doncaster and Earl of Carlisle. Places, honors, gifts, were showered upon this Scottish Heliogabalus, who, in the course of his very jovial life "spent above £400,000, which, upon a strict computation, he received from the crown, leaving not a house nor acre of land to be remembered by."[2] But nearly all the Scottish favorites, like Carlisle, and their master, the king, spent their money as fast as they could get it; being rapacious, but certainly not avaricious. Nor had they long the field to themselves; for James presently choose to himself minions of English birth, to whom he gave far more than he ever bestowed on the Scots.[3] The first of these favorites was Sir Philip Herbert, brother of the Earl of Pembroke, who was presently created Earl of Montgomery, found in a rich wife, and loaded with gifts. "The Earl of Montgomery," says Clarendon, "being a young man scarce of age at the entrance of King James, had the good fortune, by the comeliness of his person, his skill and indefatigable industry in hunting, to be the first who drew the king's eyes toward him with affection. .... Before the end of the first or second year he was made gentleman of the king's bedchamber and Earl of Montgomery. ... He pretended to no other qualifications than to understand horses and dogs very well; which his master loved him the better for, being at his first coming into England very jealous of those who had the reputation of great parts." The Viscount Haddington, the Scottish favorite, became jealous of Montgomery, and struck the English favorite with his whip on a public race-course at Croydon; an insult which the English took up as offered not merely to the spiritless minion, who had not courage to resent it, but to the whole nation; "so far as Mr. John Pinchback, though a maimed man, having but the perfect use of two fingers, rode about with his dagger in his hand, crying, Let us break our fast with them here, and dine with the rest at London. But, Herbert not offering to strike again, there was nothing spilt but the reputation of a gentleman."[4] This coward's mother, the high-minded sister of Sir Philip Sydney, tore her hair when she heard of her son's dishonor. James took the matter into his own hands, sent Haddington to the Tower for a short time, and then reconciled the parties. He had a deal of work of the like kind—for the Scottish and English courtiers quarreled incessantly, and sometimes fought. Douglas, the master of the horse, was killed by Lee, brother to the Avenor,[1] in a desperate duel. Lee was not much followed (for revenge) by the Scots, because they held there was fair play. The younger Douglas got his brother's place, which helped somewhat to appease the quarrel.[2] Some years after Herbert's quarrel, Crichton Lord Sanquhar, a fiery Scot, was executed for the assassination of a great fencing-master, who had thrust out one of his lordship's eyes. Bacon, in eloquent language, praised his master's love of justice and strict impartiality; and James himself took care to extol his doings; but it appears that he had a personal pique against the Scottish lord; and a caustic chronicler of his deeds says, "He satisfied, in part the people, and wholly himself; it being thought he hated him for his love to the King of France, and not making any reply when he said, in his presence, to one that called our James a second Solomon, that he hoped he was not David the fiddler's son: thus do princes abuse each other."[3]

When Philip Herbert, Earl of Montgomery, saw himself supplanted in the king's strange favor by a new comer, he betrayed no resentment, but clung to the new minion as to a bosom friend—a line of conduct which quite charmed the king, and which secured to Herbert a continuance of the royal liberality and good will. This new favorite, who over-topped all his predecessors, and first put the monstrous folly or vice of James in its full and disgusting light, was Robert Carr, or Ker, of the border family of Fernyherst, which had suffered severely in the cause of the king's mother. It is said that, when a mere child, Robert Carr had been page to James. In his youth he went over to France, according to the custom of Scottish gentlemen, and there acquired many courtly graces and accomplishments. He was poor, even beyond the bounds of Scottish poverty, "straight-limbed, well-favored, strong-shouldered, and smooth-faced, with some sort of cunning and show of modesty;"[4] and he had been taught that personal beauty, gay dress, and manners, would make him a fortune at court. He had recently returned from the continent, and the gloss was not off his French-cut doublet when he appeared, in the month of July, 1606, as page or esquire to the Lord Dingwall, in a grand tilting-match at Westminster. In the course of the chivalrous entertainment he had to present his lord's shield to the king. In doing this his horse fell with him, or threw him, close to James's feet. His leg was broken, but his fortune was made. The king, struck with his beauty, and tenderly moved by his accident, ordered him to be instantly carried into Master Rider's house at Charing Cross, sent his own surgeon to attend him, and, as soon as the tilting was over—"having little desire to behold the triumph, but much to have it ended"—he flew to visit him, and wait upon him in person; and after, by his daily visiting and mourning over him, taking all care for his speedy recovery, he made the day-break of his glory appear."[1] Carr, at this time, was scarcely of age, and, as James soon found out that the more scholastic part of his education had been sadly neglected, he undertook to teach him Latin himself, and gave him a lesson every morning.[2] And soon he began to give court places and rich presents—things which Carr coveted more than all the latinity of James's preceptor Buchanan, or of Cicero and Horace. On Christmas-eve, 1607, the new favorite was knighted, and sworn gentleman of the bedchamber, which place kept him constantly about the king, who took no care to conceal his nauseous affection from the court, leaning on his arm, pinching his cheek, smoothing his ruffled garment, and looking in his face even when directing his discourse to others. Soon every body who had to ask a favor, to press a suit, or to demand simple justice, found that the surest road to success was through the good graces and protection of Sir Robert Carr. Hence rich presents poured in upon him; ladies of the highest rank leered at him; and the haughtiest of the nobles paid their adoration to this rising sun, sparing neither bounty nor flattery. This court picture is too base and revolting to be dwelt upon. It was at first feared that Carr, as a Scot, would especially favor his own countrymen; but this was not the case, probably because the English lords and ladies could pay him best. "He even appeared to be endeavoring to forget his native country, and his father's house, having none of note about him but English. But, above all, was Sir Thomas Overbury his Pythias."[3] This close friendship, which ended in the murder of Overbury, commenced with Carr's first appearance at court; and it became the custom to bribe and flatter Sir Thomas, on account of the influence he had with his friend. Cecil and Suffolk, who were rivals, tried hard which should engross him and make him their monopoly. All this seems to have inflated Overbury, who was otherwise moderate and cunning, and a man of excellent parts. But it was not until after the death of Cecil, in 1612, that the minion was allowed to take his flight to the pinnacle of honor, and to become a sort of dictator both in the court and the kingdom.

[1] "Lord," exclaims Sir Anthony Weldon, "how the great men flocked then to see him, and to offer to his shrine in such abundance, that the king was forced to lay a restraint, lest it might retard his recovery by spending his spirits. And, to facilitate the cure, care was taken for a choice diet for himself and chirurgeons with his attendants, and no sooner recovered but a proclaimed favorite."

A.D. 1608, 1609. All the rest of Europe might despise the personal character and the timid policy of the English monarch; but there was one infant republic obliged, by circumstances which he had not made, to look to James with anxiety and awe. This was the government of Holland and the United Provinces, some of the keys to which he held in the cautionary towns of Flushing, Brill, and Rammekens. At one moment there was a report that James was in treaty with Philip III. for the sale of those places which the Dutch had not been able or willing to redeem with money; and after concluding his treaty of peace with Spain, by which he bound himself to be neutral, he had permitted troops to be levied in England for the service of the Spaniards and the Archduke Albert, who yet flattered himself with hopes of reducing the free States. Soldiers of fortune and volunteers, chiefly papists, passed over to the Low Countries, to endeavor to undo what their Protestant countrymen had done in the time of Elizabeth. But the temper of the English nation made it dangerous to derange the great Protestant scheme of the preceding reign, or to espouse the cause of the Spaniards against the Dutch; and Cecil, to whom was left almost the entire management of foreign politics, apprehended that, if the war should be once finished in the Netherlands, it might be transferred by Philip to Ireland. The Earl of Tyrone, who had incurred the suspicion of planning a new insurrection, had found it expedient to flee from his native country, and throw himself upon the protection of the Spaniards, who treated him as a sovereign prince, and allowed him liberal pensions. Thus Philip had a fireband always ready to throw into Ireland. Cecil had the spirit to resent this conduct. "Tell them," he wrote to Sir Charles Cornwallis, the English ambassador at Madrid, "that, when the King of Spain shall think it time to begin with Ireland, the king, my master, is more likely than ever Queen Elizabeth was to find a wholesome place of the King of Spain's where he would be loth to hear of the English, and to show the Spaniards that shall be sent into Ireland as fair a way as they were taught before."[1] Luckily, however, Philip was not much more warlike than James, and equally poor: Tyrone was allowed to go into Italy to live upon the bounty of the pope; and Ireland, for the present, was left quiet. There was a deal of insidious diplomatizing on all sides—for France (which was an ally of Holland), England, and Spain, had each its views and interests, and the new republic itself was by no means remarkable for sincerity or plain dealing. In the end, the archduke either made or listened to an overture to negotiate separately with the Dutch, upon the basis of their independence, without communicating with James, who would fain have held himself as arbitrator, or with any other party. When a truce was agreed upon with the archduke, the Dutch, in the month of April, 1607, informed the King of France that they had opened negotiations for a definitive peace with Spain, and invited their ally,

Henry, to participate with them in the treaty. Three months after, the States condescended to give, in a formal manner, the same information and the same invitation to the King of England. The vanity of James must have been hurt, but he acceded with alacrity, and joined himself with Henry IV., as mediator and guaranty. The Hague became the scene of apparently endless negotiations; but, at last, on the 29th of March, 1609, a truce was concluded for twelve years between Spain and the new republic—a truce equivalent to a peace. By this treaty the brave and persevering Hollanders, after a forty years' war, obtained from their tyrannical masters entire independence, liberty to trade to the Indies, and the closing of the Scheldt. James got for himself the acknowldgment of a debt of £818,000, as the sum total of what was due the English crown; and the promise of the States to discharge this debt by annual instalments of £60,000 each; the first payment to be made two years after the date of this treaty. In the mean while, and until liquidation, James was to retain possession of Flushing, Brill, and Rammekens.[1]

The grand merit—perhaps the greatest of Elizabeth's government—was its strict order and economy. This, as we have remarked before, enabled, her to maintain her high notions of prerogative, which were, however, on most public occasions, colored over with kind and popular language, and varnished with dignity and grace.[2] But James was extravagant beyond all precedent, and he allowed the queen and his children, or the corrupt and greedy courtiers about them, to squander great sums. He was always in want of money, and people naturally looked more narrowly into the pretensions of a pauper king (though heaven-descended) who had always his hands in their pockets, or wanting to have them there. They also saw the court exposed and humiliated in various ways. In the third year of his reign he could neither pay his servants, nor decently supply his own table. The treasurer, Lord Dorset, was stopped in the streets by the servants of the household, who wanted their wages, and the purveyors refused further supplies till they should be settled with. Upon the death of the Earl of Dorset, in 1608, the Earl of Salisbury (Cecil) succeeded to the post of treasurer, still retaining his secretaryship of state. The Earl of Northampton, who became lord privy seal about the same time, had considerable authority or influence with the king; but Cecil might be regarded now as prime minister, or sole acting minister of England. He found the treasury empty, but fortunately a portion of the subsidies had not yet been paid in and spent. This money was something to stand by, and his fertile mind devised other means of raising supplies without consent of parliament. James, as we have seen, pretended to an authority paramount to all parliaments; in his theory the property of the subject was always the property of the king; and Cecil's political conscience did not prevent his laboring to establish all this in practice. Monopolies more oppressive than any that had preceded them were established and bartered; a right of fishery off the coasts of England and Scotland was sold to the Dutch; a feudal aid of 20*s.* on each knight's fee was levied by an old law, and duties were imposed upon the import and export of goods by the prerogative alone, without any reference even to the sanction of parliament. In the latter course Dorset had begun before him, by laying an import duty on Corinth raisins, or currants, by letters-patent. Bates, a Turkey merchant, resisted payment. He was proceeded against in the Court of Exchequer, where the barons decided for the crown, and laid down a right of taxation in the king without parliament, which was highly satisfactory to James and his ministers. With this precedent before him, Cecil went boldly to work, and imposed duties upon various kinds of goods by orders under the great seal. But all these sources of revenue were not sufficient to supply James's expenditure, and he was driven by his necessities to call together his parliament, which had been prorogued some thirty months.

A.D. 1610. The Houses began their session on the 14th of February, when Cecil represented to the Lords, instead of causing it to be represented to the Commons, that the king's necessities were such as to call for an immediate supply. Neither time nor any thing else was gained by this irregular mode of proceeding, and the minister was brought to a dead pause by the murmurs of the Commons, who took up the question of taxation and duty-making. Several of the members had sifted the legal authorities, and had arrived at the conclusion that the decision of the Barons of the Exchequer in the case of Bates was illegal. Hakewill and Yelverton made two elaborate speeches to this effect, and they were lamely answered by Bacon and Sir John Davies, who sustained the cause of prerogative. The country gentlemen were made to feel that, if the court were allowed to impose duties on merchandise as it chose, it would soon levy taxes on their lands in the same arbitrary manner, and the opposition became resolute and clamorous. James intimated, by a message, that they must not talk upon such subjects; but it appears that they talked louder than ever. He then called both Houses before him at Whitehall, and delivered to them a long lecture, which was at once blasphemous and ridiculous. "Kings," said this royal specimen, "are justly called gods, for that they exercise a manner or resemblance of divine power upon earth; for, if you will consider the attributes of God, you shall see how they agree in the person of a king. God hath power to create or destroy—to make or unmake—at his pleasure; to give life or send death; to judge all, and to be judged nor accountable to none; to raise low things and to make high things low at his pleasure; and to God both soul and body are due. And the like power have kings: they make and unmake their subjects; they have power of raising and casting down, of life and

of death,—judges over all their subjects, and in all causes, and yet accountable to none but God only. They have power to exalt low things and abase high things, and make of their subjects like men of chess,—a pawn to take a bishop or a knight; and to cry up or down any of their subjects as they do their money. And to the king is due both the affection of the soul and the service of the body of his subjects."[1] In the end he told them that it was sedition in subjects to dispute what a king might do in the plentitude of his power,—that kings were before laws, and that all laws were granted by them as matter of favor to the people. But, notwithstanding this parallelizing of himself with the Divinity, the Commons would not allow that he had any right to lay duties upon currants or broadcloth without their consent, and they presented a strong remonstrance against his inhibitions. They claimed "as an ancient, general, and undoubted right of parliament, freely to debate all matters which do properly concern the subject." They did not take upon themselves to review the judgment given by the Court of Exchequer, but they desire to know the reasons whereon that judgment was grounded, "especially as it was generally apprehended that the reasons of that judgment extended much further, even to the utter ruin of the ancient liberty of this kingdom, and of the subjects' rights of property in their lands and goods."[2] They told him that the kings of this realm, with the assent of parliament, make laws and taxes, and impose duties upon goods and merchandise, but not otherwise: that the people of this kingdom had been ever careful to preserve these liberties and rights when any thing had been done to prejudice them: that his majesty's most humble Commons, following the example of their ancestors, and finding that his majesty, without advice or consent of parliament, had lately, in time of peace, set both greater impositions, and far more in number, than any of his ancestors had ever done in times of war, with all humility presume to petition that all impositions set without assent of parliament should be quite abolished and taken away, and that his majesty, in imitation of his noble progenitors, would be pleased that a law be made during this session of parliament, declaring that all impositions or duties set, or to be set, upon his people, their goods or merchandise, save only by common consent of parliament, are, and ever shall be, void.[1] This was gall and wormwood to James; but the Commons did more than petition;—they passed a bill taking away impositions. This, however, was rejected by the Lords, who were not disposed to do any thing to check the march of absolutism; and the bench of bishops were always ready to find texts in Scripture for the support of the prerogative. The whole high-church party had by this time gone far into the divine right, and had adopted the theory that the king's power was of God, and that of the parliament only of man. Bancroft, the primate, would fain have been a sort of Protestant Becket; but the circumstances of the times induced him to seek for power, not by opposing the sovereign, but by making the Church a sharer in the royal prerogative. In his eyes it seemed as a consequence, that if kings were esteemed as being of God, the bishops also, being appointed by him, might claim the divine right under him, and that the crown and the mitre should be alike above law. The ecclesiastical courts were daily encroaching on the temporal courts; and the established clergy were never tired of repeating that the king's authority was paramount in his own courts, and that all jurisdiction, spiritual and temporal, belonged to him. By these pretensions the church exasperated some of the judges, who thenceforward began to regard the Puritans with a less severe eye; and at the same time the common lawyers, who had always been jealous of the ecclesiastical courts, watched their encroachments more keenly than ever. One Doctor Cowell. a high churchman, who was patronized by the archbishop and eulogized by the king, brought the tempest to a head, though unfortunately its bursting did not purify the atmosphere of the court or church. In his Interpreter, or Law Dictionary, which was dedicated to Bancroft, this man explained to the unlearned that the king was solutus à legibus (united from laws),—that he was above all law by his absolute power,—and though in the making of laws he might admit the parliament or three estates into council, this was not of constraint, but of his own benignity, or by reason of the promise made upon oath at the time of his coronation. But never was jesuit made to give less value to an oath than this learned doctor gave to the coronation oath of an English monarch. "Although," he says. "at his coronation he took an oath not to alter the laws of the land, yet, this oath notwithstanding, he may alter or suspend any particular law that seemeth hurtful to the public estate. Thus much, in short, because I have heard some to be of opinion that the laws are above the king." And in treating of parliament, the doctor declares,—"Of these two one must be true, either that the king is above the parliament, that is, the positive laws of the kingdom, or else that he is not an absolute king; and therefore though it be a merciful policy, and also a politic mercy, not alterable without great peril, to make laws by the consent of the whole realm, because so no part shall have cause to complain of a partiality, yet simply to bind the prince to or by these laws were repugnant to the nature and constitution of an absolute monarchy." And as if this were not enough, in that part of his dictionary where he explains the word prerogative, the doctor says that "the king, by the custom of this kingdom, maketh no laws without the consent of the three estates, though he may quash any law concluded of by them:" and that he "holds it incontrollable that the king of England is an absolute king." The Commons were incensed at this bold book, and they requested a conference with the Lords upon it in order to punish its author. The Lords consented, and the conference was managed on the part of the Lower House by Sir Francis Bacon, who could shift and change like Proteus, and be all for prerogative one hour and all for parliamentary rights the next. James shrunk before the storm, and made a scape-goat of his learned doctor, who had only expressed the king's own opinions without his blasphemy. Cowell was sent to prison for a short time, and his book, which had been publicly sold with impunity, was suppressed by the king's proclamation. The Commons, with exceeding great joy, returned thanks.[1]

On coming into the office of the lord treasurer, Cecil had found that the king's debts amounted to £1,300,000, while his ordinary expenditure was calculated to exceed his revenue by £81,000 at least. He had reduced the debt by about two thirds; but he saw it accumulating afresh. He roundly proposed a perpetual yearly revenue to be granted, once for all, by parliament; and, as the price of this vote, he promised in the king's name that every grievance should be redressed and other modes of raising money abandoned. The Commons instantly brought forward a host of grievances: the ministers and the courtiers wished them to vote the money first and complain afterward, but they stuck to their grievances. One of the most important of these was the ecclesiastical High Commission Court, a most arbitrary tribunal, which fined and imprisoned, — passed sentence without appeal,—constantly interfered with men's domestic concerns and their civil rights, and in its ordinary procedure despised the rules and precautions of the common law. Another glaring abuse was the king's attempting to do every thing by his own proclamation. James, indeed, might have been called the King of Proclamations. The Commons told him that there was nothing "which they have accounted more dear and precious than this, — to be guided and governed by the certain rule of the law, which giveth both to the head and the members that which of right belongeth to them, and not by any uncertain or arbitrary form of government." They told him that it was the indubitable right of the [1] Journals of Commons and Lords.—Parl. Hist.—Winwood.—R. Coke's Detection. Coke says that the Commons took fire and intended to have proceeded severely against Cowell; but the king interposed, and promised to call in the books by proclamation, as he did, but they were out, and the proclamation could not call them in, but only served to make them more taken notice of. people of this kingdom not to be made subject to any punishment that shall extend to their lives, lands, bodies, or goods. other than such as are ordained by the common law of this land, or the statutes made by their common consent in parliament. They then complained that it had been attempted to make royal proclamations take the place of law; that proclamations had been of late years much more frequent than they had ever been before, extending to liberty, property, inheritances, and livelihoods of men; some of them tending to alter the law; some made shortly after a session of parliament for matter rejected in the same session; some ordering punishments to be inflicted before lawful trial and conviction; some referring the punishment of offenders to courts of arbitrary discretion; some to support oppressive monopolies, &c. "By reason whereof," continued the Commons, "there is a general fear conceived and spread among your majesty's people, that proclamations will, by degrees, grow up and increase to the strength and nature of laws, whereby not only that ancient happiness and freedom will be much blemished (if not quite taken quite away), which their ancestors have so long enjoyed; but the same may also (in process of time) bring a new form of arbitrary government upon the realm: and this their fear is the more increased by occasion of certain books lately published, which ascribe a greater power to proclamations than heretofore had been conceived to belong unto them; as also by the care taken to reduce all the proclamations made since your majesty's reign into one volume, and to print them in such form as acts of parliament formerly have been, and still are used to be, which seemeth to imply a purpose to give them more reputation and more establishment than heretofore they have had."[1] The Commons, after giving a list of James's arbitrary proclamations, proceeded to complain of the delay of the courts of law in granting writs of prohibition and habeas corpus, and of the jurisdiction of the council of Wales over the four bordering shires of Gloucester, Worcester, Hereford, and Salop, which it was pretended were included within their authority as Marches of Wales. Their other chief grievances were the Duke of Lennox's patent for searching and sealing new drapery, monopolies of wine, licenses and taxes recently set upon all public-houses, and a tax or duty upon sea-coal.

The lofty, the firm, and moderate tone of this petition of grievances ought to have warned James that the spirit of the Commons was undergoing a great change, and that whatever had been their timidity and servility under the House of Tudor, they would now aim at occupying their elevated and proper position in the constitution. But James, though alarmed and in dreadful want of their money, clung fast to his prerogative, and thought to satisfy them with civil words and paltry concessions. With regard to the Court of High Commission, which probably indisposed the minds of a greater number of his subjects than any other single cause, he would not cede a line. As to the proclamations, he vouchsafed to promise that they should never exceed what the law warranted. The royal licenses to public-houses he generously agreed to revoke. But the Commons, who maintained that he had no right to lay it on, would not vote him a perpetual revenue in exchange for this tax upon victualers, and there was a pause exceedingly distressing to the needy king.

There remained certain parts of his royal prerogative which the Commons had hardly ventured to dispute; but as the minister spoke of "retribution" for "contribution," they came under discussion. These were the matters of wardship, tenure by knight service, and the old grievance of purveyance. The Commons got the Lords to discuss the several subjects with them in committees of conference, and Cecil showed a willingness to bargain for the surrender of these feudal sources of revenue in exchange for a fixed annual sum. But it was soon found that James, though willing to give up wardship and purveyance, was exceedingly reluctant to part with tenure by knight service, holding it to be highly indecorous that his nobility and gentry should hold their lands on the same ignoble tenure as base people. Still, however, the Commons thought the concessions he was willing to make well worth the purchasing. It remained to fix the price. James asked £300,000 per annum as a full composition for abolishing the right of wardship, and for taking away all purveyance, with some other concessions.[1] This was thought too dear, and after a good deal of haggling, the king reduced it to £220,000 per annum. The Commons, under the threat of a dissolution, bid up to £200,000, and the court gladly closed with them at that price. But parliament had to guard itself against the prerogative, which had been held up as beyond the control of statute; and they had also to devise by what means the £200,000 per annum should be levied. They were resolved to be slow and cautious; their session had been already prolonged to the middle of July, and it was therefore agreed that they should vote something to meet the king's immediate exigences, and resume the subject after prorogation. All that the Commons voted was an aid of one subsidy and one tenth; upon which they were prorogued to the month of October. When they met again, James was astonished and irritated to find that the Commons were in a less complying humor than before. He wanted to concede less than he had promised: they insisted upon having more than they had bargained for. During the recess they had reflected seriously on the growing extravagance of the king and the rapacity of his courtiers. They suspected that the king would not keep his part of the bargain; they saw that no redress was to be expected as to the tyranny of the ecclesiastical courts,—that illegal customs were still exacted at the out-ports,—that proclamations were to have the force of acts of parliament. In this frame of mind (and there was a large party that had brooded with horror or disgust over James's blasphemous boastings) they declared their reluctance to voting the £200,000 per annum without a better assurance of an equivalent in substantial reforms. James, who never doubted of the efficacy of his mischievous intermeddling and insulting oratory, summoned them to a conference; and about thirty members waited upon his majesty at Whitehall. The king desired them to make a direct answer to some questions which he should put to them. The first was, Whether they thought he was really in want of money, as his treasurer and chancellor of the exchequer had informed them? "Whereto, when Sir Francis Bacon had began to answer in a more extravagant style than his majesty did delight to hear, he picked out Sir Henry Neville, commanding him to answer, according to his conscience. Thereupon Sir Henry Neville did directly answer, that he thought his majesty was in want. 'Then,' said the king, 'tell me whether it belongeth to you, that are my subjects, to relieve me or not.' 'To this,' quoth Sir Harry, 'I must answer with a distinction; where your majesty's expense groweth by the commonwealth, we are bound to maintain it;—otherwise not.' And so, continuing his speech, he gave a note, that in this one parliament they had already given for subsidies and seven fifteenths, which is more than ever was given by any parliament, at any time, upon any occasion; and yet, withal, they had no relief of their grievances. Then was his majesty instant to have him declare what their grievances were. 'To all their grievances,' said Sir Harry, 'I am not privy, but of those that have come to my knowledge I will make recital.' And so began to say that, in matter of justice, they could not have an equal proceeding (aiming, perhaps, at his majesty's prerogative, nullum tempus occurret regi); and then, falling upon the jurisdiction of the Marches of Wales, Sir Herbert Croft took the words out of his mouth, otherwise it was thought Sir Harry, being charged upon his conscience, would have delivered his judgment upon all, in what respect soever it might be taken."[1]

James now prorogued the parliament for nine weeks, a time which, by his orders, was employed by the court party in "dealing every one with his friends and acquaintance in the House, to work them to some better reason."[2] But the Commons would not be so wrought upon; they were resolute not to replenish "the royal cistern" without a guaranty; and this made the king determine that they should not meet again to question his prerogative without filling his exchequer.[3] "For being now seasoned with seven years' knowledge in his profession here, he thought he might set him up for himself, and not be still journeyman to the lavish tongues of men that pried too narrowly into the secrets of his prerogative, which are mysteries too high for them, being arcana imperii, fitter to be admired than questioned. But the parliaments were apprehensive enough that these hidden mysteries made many dark steps into the people's liberties; and they were willing, by the light of law and reason, to discover what was the king's, what theirs; which the king, unwilling to have searched into, after five sessions in six years' time, dissolved the parliament by proclamation."[1]

[1] Winwood, Memorials. [2] Ib. [3] Ib.

The dissolution took place on the 9th of February, 1611, not a single act having been passed in the late session. In the preceding month of November, while the king was smarting under his disappointments and reviling all parliaments, the primate Bancroft departed this life, as much applauded by the high-church party as he was condemned by the Puritans and all classes of dissenters. The orthodox Clarendon afterward declared that "his death was never enough to be lamented," that he "understood the church excellently, and had almost rescued it out of the hands of the Calvinian party, and very much subdued the unruly spirit of the non-conformists by and after the conference at Hampton Court."[2] During the stormy debates of these last sessions, Bancroft had done his best to defend his church from the reformers, and to encourage the king in his prerogative course. In the month of May he addressed a long epistle to James, complaining bitterly of a "bill in hand against pluralities," which bill, he adds, "is the same that, for above forty years, from parliament to parliament, hath been rejected, and that very worthily." After defending pluralities on the ground that there were many livings which, taken singly, were insufficient for the support of a worthy preacher, he said, "We that are bishops will do our best (as heretofore we have to our powers endeavored) for the increasing of a learned ministry; but we may never yield to any course that shall procure, apparently, their utter overthrow, as to expect that they should still make brick without diminishing their task, when their straw is withheld from them, and they shall be driven to gather stubble in the fields." He felt assured that the benefices would not be made sufficient living for the preachers without some attempt either against cathedral churches or for the diminishing of the bishops' revenues; and here he came to the point with the king, greatly fearing that his poverty might force James into compliances. "Moreover," he adds, "upon the advantage of your majesty's great necessities at this time, I do foresee, and partly already perceive, that many things will be pressed upon your majesty against the clergy by the Lower House of parliament, as hoping, now or never, to obtain that which divers of them for many years have aimed at; and that your majesty, for the gaining of your own ends toward your supply and support, may be inclined to give more way unto them therein than, I judge, may stand with the good continuance of that state of this church, wherein you found it to be most royally upheld by the late queen (of most worthy memory), and hath since been likewise maintained by your most excellent majesty accordingly, with a very great increase of many singular benefits and most princely favors toward it. But myself, with the rest of your majesty's bishops and the whole clergy, do so fully repose our trust and assurance in your majesty's most royal and Christian affection toward us, as we know that all the cunning and sleight in the world shall never be able to work your highness to the approbation and allowance of any thing that may either tend to our unjust reproach or to the prejudice of religion, which hitherto hath more flourished in England than in all the churches beside of Christendom; considering that all the plots and practices at this time designed against us may easily be met with by the observation of your own rules and directions, delivered so oft this session to the Lower House by the lord treasurer." In this same letter Bancroft inclosed the copy of a bill against the proceedings of the High Commission Court, telling the king that, though it had been rejected the two last sessions of this parliament by the Lords, it had again passed the Lower House, and had been read upon the preceding Saturday, by the lord chancellor's appointment, to the Upper House. The primate was in an agony about this bill. "Your majesty," he says, "in perusing of it, shall find it to stretch very far, neither regarding some statutes yet in force nor the authority either of your majesty's convocations (representing in former times the Church of England) or of your highness, the chief and supreme governor of it. The last session but one, sundry of your bishops, in a great committee, answered all those reasons that were then thought fit to be alledged for the passage of this bill. But all is one; reason or no reason, it forceth not; it is importunity and opportunity that is relied upon, and we must again endure a new brunt to no purpose, except your majesty shall be pleased to prevent it; and I think it very necessary you should so do, for the avoiding of public scandal, if your majesty's supremacy should now again be called in question, as of necessity it must be, if the authors of this bill do stand to the justification of it against us. I most humbly beseech your most excellent majesty to pardon this my boldness, — sacerdotis vox debit esse libera,—and I could not but condemn myself, being Archbishop of Canterbury, if I should not, with all my strength, and for the preventing of future mischief, stand up in the gap which is sought to be made in the very form and frame of the church, and likewise plead in the best sort I am able before so mighty, so learned, so provident, so religious, and so wise a king, for so well a settled and worthy form of religion, and for so godly, so learned, and so painful a clergy, whom your majesty shall ever have at your commandment, most loyal, most faithful subjects, and always, in their divine meditations and prayers, your daily orators." But notwithstanding this laudation of James's religion, Bancroft knew very well that he was more eager for money than for the prayers of his bishops; and about two months after, to enforce his arguments and to prevent any enactment against the High Commission Court, he wrote a comfortable letter to his majesty to intimate that the bishops and clergy of the province of Canterbury assembled in convocation, "considering his majesty's most princely favor toward them and his present wants, notwithstanding there was an old subsidy of four shillings in the pound behind unpaid, had very willingly, readily, and with one consent, granted to his majesty a new subsidy of six shillings in the pound, and had so ordered the payment of it with the former as that they might be both in his exchequer within one year and a half."[1] James received this liberal grant very joyfully, and the bill, which had passed the Commons, was of course thrown out in the Lords. Immediately after this Archbishop Bancroft died. To the surprise of most people who were unacquainted with certain services, both secret and public, which he had rendered to the king in a recent visit to Scotland, Doctor George Abbot, only eighteen months a bishop, was now promoted to the primacy. Abbot, instead of being a high churchman like Bancroft, was strongly imbued with Presbyterian or Calvinistic principles, and disposed, not merely to tolerate, but to patronize the Puritan preachers, whom his predecessor had so harshly repressed. In the words of Clarendon, who takes the least favorable view of his character, and who is disposed to attribute the growth of puritanism and disaffection to his conduct as head of the Anglican Church under James, Abbot "considered Christian religion no otherwise than as it abhorred and reviled popery, and valued those men most who did that the most furiously. For the strict observation of the discipline of the church, or the conformity to the articles or canons established, he made little inquiry, and took less care; and having himself made a very little progress in the ancient and solid study of divinity, he adhered only to the doctrine of Calvin, and for his sake did not think so ill of that discipline as he ought to have done. But if men prudently forbore a public reviling and railing at the hierarchy and ecclesiastical government, let their opinions and private practice be what it would, they were not only secure from any inquisition of his, but acceptable to him, and at least equally preferred by him."[2] In this way the church became divided against itself; but the intolerance of churchmen in general continued much the same, or, if there were a difference, it was seen in an increased hostility to papists arising out of the more ardent zeal of the Calvinists.

Perhaps they have somewhat overrated the delicate sensitiveness of his mind, or overlooked the diseased, crazy state of his body[3] (and he was sixty-two or sixty-three years old when he died); but historians have pretty generally attributed the death of Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, to the mortifications he experienced in this parliament, and to the pecuniary embarrassments of the government which were consequent on the firmness of the Commons. Though his own coffers were well filled, the treasury was empty, and he probably entertained no very sanguine hope of replenishing it by the sale of crown lands and the raising of loans in the different countries by sending privy seals, which latter exercise of the prerogative was put in force with a trembling hand, lest "that sacred seal should be refused by the desperate hardness of the prejudiced people." Whatever were the cause, the minister fell into a languid, hopeless state, and retired from business to drink the waters at Bath. He derived no benefit from the healing springs, and, on the 24th of May, 1612, he died, worn out and wretched, at Marlborough, on his way back to the court. Long suffering had obliterated the charms of rank and honors, princely mansions, and wide estates, an enormous wealth, and a policy and ambition which had triumphed over many a formidable rival. In his last moments he said to Sir Walter Cope,—"Ease and pleasure quake to hear of death; but my life, full of cares and miseries, desireth to be dissolved." His death was certainly not less welcome to the great mass of the nation; but, in the worse that followed, people soon lamented the bad rule of this remarkable son of a most remarkable father. Though heartless and perfidious, Cecil had abilities of the highest order; and though subservient and ready to erect James into an absolute monarch rather than lose favor and office by thwarting that prince's vehement inclinations, he had a sense of national dignity, and a system of foreign policy which would have saved England from degradation. The scoundrels who succeeded him had all his business and villainy with none of his genius.

Before Cecil found peace in his grave, the fate of an interesting victim, whose adventures furnish one of the most touching episodes in our history, had been sealed by a barbarous hand. The Lady Arabella Stuart, whose descent was a crime never to be forgiven, had been kept chiefly about court ever since the trial of Raleigh and Cobham, who were said to have aimed at her elevation to the throne, though it was proved that the young lady had absolutely nothing to do with their plot. In the disorderly and tasteless revelry of the court she had continued to cultivate a taste for elegant literature, not wholly neglecting the study of divinity, which James seems to have made fashionable with both sexes, and nearly all classes of his subjects. It was her avowed preference of a single life that somewhat disarmed the dangerous jealousy of Elizabeth, though even in that queen's reign her condition was a very unhappy one. James at one time when he had neither wife nor children of his own, asked the hand of the Lady Arabella for his favorite Esme Stuart, Duke of Lennox, who was the lady's cousin. Elizabeth not only forbad this marriage, but she also imprisoned Arabella, using very sharp and insulting language against James for his having dared to propose such a match. On the death of Elizabeth, one of Cecil's first cares was, as we have seen, to secure the person of the lady, and when James was safely and so easily seated on the throne, having now children, he seems to have settled in his own mind that she should never be allowed to marry. In the following year a great ambassador came from the King of Poland, whose chief errand was to demand her in marriage for his master; and at the very same moment there were indirect proposals made for Count Maurice, who claimed to be Duke of Gueldres. "But," says the courtly reporter of the latter news, "my Lady Arabella spends her time in lecture, reading, hearing of service, and preaching. . . . She will not hear of marriage."[1] The pension James allowed her for her support was very irregularly paid; and it should appear that she was frequently reduced to very great distress for want of money. She was also exposed to the persecutions of her aunt, the Countess of Shrewsbury, a violent and vulgar woman, who appears to have been placed over her at times as a sort of duenna. James thought it business worthy of him to settle these womanly quarrels; and in 1608, he did something more, for he gave Arabella a cupboard of plate worth more than £200 for a new-year's gift, and 1000 marks to pay her debts, beside some yearly addition to her maintenance, "want being thought the chiefest cause of her discontentment."[2] Shortly after this, at some court festival, she renewed an acquaintance, which had begun in childhood, with William Seymour, son of Lord Beauchamp and grandson of the Earl of Hereford."[3] If there had not been a tender affection before (and it is probable there had been, and of an old standing), it now sprung up, rapid and uncontrollable. In February, 1610, an arrangement of marriage between them was detected. James was alarmed in the extreme, for the Seymours also were descended from the royal blood of Henry VII.: they might pretend, in some time of trouble, to the throne, and their claim would be wonderfully strengthened by absorbing it in that of the Lady Arabella. The two lovers were summoned before the privy council. There, Seymour was reprimanded for daring to ally himself with the royal blood (his own blood was as royal as Arabella's), and they were both forbidden, on their allegiance, to contract marriage without the king's permission. To escape imprisonment they promised obedience; but, in the following month of July, it was discovered that they were privately married. Instantly James issued his mandate, and Arabella was committed to the custody of Sir Thomas Parry, at Lambeth; her husband to the Tower. This, their first confinement, was not rigorous; the Lady was allowed to walk in a garden, and Seymour, who probably purchased the indulgence from his keepers, met her there, and in her own chamber. She also got letters conveyed to the queen, who interfered in her favor, and to other friends of rank and influence. But one morning she received the dismal news that she must remove forthwith to Durham. She refused to quit her chamber; but the officers carried her in her bed to the water-side, forced her, shrieking, into a boat, and rowed her up the river. Her agitation and distress of mind brought on a fever, and, by the time she reached Barnet, a physician declared that her life would be in danger if she were forced to travel farther. The doctor waited upon the king with this intelligence. James observed, very sapiently, that it was enough to make any sound man sick to be carried in a bed in the manner she was. But his resolution was fixed that she should proceed to Durham, if he were king. The doctor said "that he made no doubt of the Lady's obedience." "Obedience is that required," replied James. But he soon relaxed his severity, and granted her permission to remain for a month at Highgate for the recovery of her health. At Highgate she was lodged in a gentleman's house, and closely watched; yet on the very day (the 3d of June, 1611) that the Bishop of Durham, whose guest or prisoner she was to be, proceeded northward to prepare her lodging, she effected her escape, being assisted by two friends, who were in correspondence with her husband in the Tower. "Disguising herself by drawing a great pair of French-fashioned hose over her petticoats, putting on a man's doublet, a man-like peruke, with long locks over her hair, a black hat, a black cloke, russet boots with red tops, and a rapier by her side, she walked forth, between three and four of the clock, with Markham. After they had gone a-foot a mile and a half to a sorry inn, where Crompton attended with horses, she grew very sick and faint, so as the hostler that held the stirrup said, that the gentleman would hardly hold out to London; yet, being set on a good gelding, astride, in an unwonted fashion, the stirring of the horse brought blood enough into her face; and so she rode on toward Blackwall." There she found boats and attendants who rowed her down the river to Gravesend, where a French bark lay at hand to receive her. She expected to find her husband on board; but though Seymour had stolen out of the Tower in the disguise of a physician, he had not yet reached the vessel. After waiting for a short time, the French captain, who knew the seriousness of the adventure, became alarmed, and, in spite of the entreaties of the Lady, he hoisted all sail and put to sea. When Seymour reached the spot, he found his wife was gone; but he got on board a collier, the captain of which agreed to land him on the coast of Flanders for £40. Meanwhile the intelligence of Arabella's escape from Highgate had reached the palace. There, in an instant, all was alarm, hurry, and confusion, as if a new gunpowder-plot had been discovered. Couriers were dispatched in all directions, with orders to haste for their lives. Ships and boats were hurried down the Thames as if a new Armada were in the Channel. The alarm became the greater when, on dispatching a messenger to the Lieutenant of the Tower, it was learned that his prisoner also had escaped. The privy council believed, or affected to believe, that church and state were in danger,—that the fugitives were going to the Spanish Netherlands, there to put themselves at the head of the papists, and then, aided by the Pope, the King of Spain, and other Catholic sovereigns, to invade England. "In this passionate hurry there was a proclamation, first, in very bitter terms, but, by my lord treasurer's moderation, seasoned at the print. . . . There were likewise three letters dispatched in haste . . . to the king and queen-regent of France, and to the archdukes, all written with harsher ink than now, if they were to do, I presume they should be, especially that to the archdukes, which did seem to pre-suppose their course tending that way, and all three describing the offense in black colors, and pressing their sending back without delay."[1] Seymour got safe to shore, and was not sent back: the poor Lady Arabella was less fortunate, being overtaken by a "pink royal," when about midway across the Channel. The Frenchman stood a sharp but short action; and when he lowered his flag, she was seized, carried back to the Thames, and then shut up in the Tower. Her heart was breaking, yet she said she cared not for captivity if her husband was safe. The advocacy of the queen,—her own eloquent appeals, were all thrown away on James; she never recovered her liberty, and grief and despair made a wreck of her brilliant intellect. She died within the walls of the Tower, and in a pitiable state of insanity, on the 27th of September, 1615.[2]

James, who is described as dividing his time between his inkstand, his bottle, and his hunting, again took up the pen of controversy in 1611. As he was "out in pursuit of hares," a book written by the Dutch divine, Conrad Vorstius, treating of the nature and attributes of the Divinity, was brought to him. He instantly left off hunting, and began reading—and, with so critical an eye, that within an hour he detected and postillated a long list of what he called damnable heresies. With not less activity he wrote to Winwood, his ambassador in the Low Countries, commanding him to accuse Vorstius, before the States, of heresy and infidelity, and to signify to the States his utter detestation of those crimes, and of all by whom they were tolerated. The Hollanders, who had recently elected this heresiarch to the professorship of divinity at Leyden, vacant by the death of Arminius, were not inclined to give ear to this remonstrance from a foreign prince, and they intimated as much in a respectful tone. Thereupon James, "plying his inkstand again," sent them an admonition in his own handwriting. Assuming the tone of a Protestant pope, having authority in spirituals over other countries than his own, he bade them remember that the King of England was the Defender of the Faith, and that it would be in his competency, in union with other foreign churches, to "extinguish and remand to hell these abominable heresies." He told them that this wretched Vorstius deserved to be burned alive, as much as any heretic that had ever suffered. He left it to their own Christian wisdom to burn him or not; but as to allowing him, upon any defense or abnegation, to continue to teach and preach, it was a thing so abominable, that he assured himself that it could never enter into any of their thoughts. To all this the Hollanders returned a very cool and a very evasive answer. Then James entered a public protest against the heresies of Vorstius, and informed the States that they must either give up their divinity professor, or forfeit the friendship of the King of England. Archbishop Abbott applauded the king, and urged him to adopt violent measures; and Winwood, the ambassador, who was equally zealous, thundered threats in the ears of the Dutch ; but still the States refused to displace Vorstius, till he should be heard in his own defense. James put forth a short work, in French, of his own composition, entitled, "A Declaration against Vorstius."[1] But, after all, he would have been defeated in this warfare, if the Hollanders had not been divided as to what was orthodoxy and what heterodoxy. A powerful sect and party, called the Gomarists,[2] hated Vorstius as much as James, and Abbot and Winwood hated him, and, in the end, the divinity professor was not only deprived of his place, but expelled from Leyden to wander about in poverty and obscurity. During six or seven years he was obliged to conceal himself from his intolerant opponents in Tergau ; and at the end of that period he was driven out of Holland, the synod of Dort having given a definitive judgment against him, and the States having sentenced him to perpetual banishment. At this said synod, which was held in 1619, the deputies from the clergy of England and Scotland were the principal promoters of the proscription of Vorstius,[3] which was followed by the barbarous exile of seven hundred families who entertained his tenets. During two years the expelled professor disappeared from the world, being obliged to hide himself in very secret places ; for there were many men who imagined that it would be doing a good deed to murder him. At last the Duke of Holstein offered him and the exiled families a secure asylum. He arrived at this haven of rest in the month of June, 1622, but he soon quitted it for a surer and more lasting one—dying in the month of September of the same year. James was prouder of this victory than he would have been of winning battles like Crecy and Agincourt. Unfortunately, the controversy sharpened his temper ; and, as if to give the Dutch an example, he relighted the fires of Smithfield, being the last English sovereign to sign the writ de hæretico comburendo. Bartholomew Legate, who is described as an obstinate Arian heretic, was apprehended and examined by the king and some of the bishops, and then committed to Newgate. After lying a considerable time in prison, he was tried before the Consistory Court, which, like the Bonners of former times, passed sentence upon him, as contumacious and obdurate, and delivered him over to the secular arm, to be burned ; and he was burned accordingly in Smithfield, on the 18th of March, 1612. On the 11th of April following, which was Easter-eve, Edward Wightman, convicted of heresy of a very multiform character, was burned at Litchfield.[4] A third victim was ready for the flames ; but it was found, notwithstanding the overflowing bigotry of many classes, that the mass of the nation could no longer look upon such executions with any other feelings than those of horror and disgust, not unmixed, in some cases, with an admiration of the courage of the sufferers. The lawyers began to question whether the proceedings were strictly legal, and the bishops to doubt whether they were useful to their church. "The king accordingly preferred the heretics hereafter should silently and privately waste themselves away in prison."[1] In other words men were exposed to a slower and more cruel martyrdom ; but there was no more burning in England.

Some time before these events Henry IV. of France had fallen beneath the knife of an assassin. The treaty of the Hague, which was signed in March, 1609, ran a risk of being broken as soon as made. John, Duke of Cleves, Juliers, and Berg, died without children, and the emperor seized the city of Juliers and laid claim to the whole succession. The Elector of Brandenburg, the Duke of Newburg, and the Elector of Saxony, pretended each to a better and an exclusive right. Religion as well as policy was involved in this dispute, it being deemed no less expedient for the Protestant interests to check the Roman church than to prevent the further extension of the wide dominions of the House of Austria. The Protestant princes of Germany and the States of Holland formed a league with the kings of England and France, for the support of the Protestant claimant, the Elector of Brandenburg, and for the expulsion of the Austrians from Juliers. On the other side were the King of Spain, the archduke, and the other princes connected by family and religion. The Protestants of Germany and Holland agreed to furnish among them nine thousand foot and two thousand horse ; the French king a like number, and the King of England four thousand foot. But Henry IV., who was indifferent to the question of religion, and who entertained far wider views than the expulsion of the Austrians from Juliers, raised a splendid army of thirty thousand men, with a great train of artillery, and prepared all things for taking the command in person. On the 14th of May, 1610, three days before that fixed for his departure, as he was on his way to the arsenal, he was stabbed in a street of Paris, by Francis Ravaillac, a young fanatic friar of the order of the Jacobins.[2]

An opinion prevailed, or is said to have prevailed, among the French populace, that the king, who had allied himself with Protestants and heretics, was going to wage war against the Pope ; and attempts were made at the time, and long afterward, to connect the regicide with the court of Rome, with the court of Spain, with the Jesuits : but the murderer, even on the rack, maintained that he had had no accomplices or instigators whatever, and that he had been carried to do the deed only by an instinct or impulse which he could neither control nor explain. The truth appears to be, that the monk was mad, and unconnected with any party either religious or political: but this did not save him from a horrible death, nor prevent James from persecuting more sharply the English Catholics. In all this, however, James had the full consent of his parliament, which was then sitting, and which would readily have carried him to greater extremities. In Scotland, perhaps, more than in England, people were convinced that Henry had fallen a sacrifice to the Pope and the Jesuits, and that an attempt would be made on the sacred person of James. The Scottish privy council addressed a long letter to their most "gracious and dread sovereign," beseeching him (most unnecessarily) to have a care of himself, and recommending him to call up a body-guard of native Scots, that might attend him in all his huntings and games. "We can not," said they, "but be much dismayed, and driven into a just fear thereby, to see these last frogs, foretold in the Apocalypse, thus sent out by the devil, and his supporters on earth, to execute their hellish directions upon God's own lieutenants; which damnable persons may think perhaps no time or occasion more probably and likely for achieving of such a villainy than when your majesty shall be at game abroad; at which time every one almost, albeit unknown, have heretofore been accustomed, upon pretence of seeing of the sport, to have more access near your sacred person than was expedient, which form can not hereafter continue without too much likelihood of danger and peril; and in so far as your majesty's guard are most of them unfit for any such purpose, and that in the time of your highness's progress, the pensioners have not been much accustomed to attend, we could therefore wish that some should be especially designed for this intent only, and to be exempted from all other service or attendance, other than their waiting upon your majesty's person in the time of your being abroad, at hunting, hawking, or any other pastime or game in the fields; who, being to the number of some twenty gentlemen, under the commandment and charge of that worthy nobleman, the captain of your majesty's guard, may be ever still attending your person, stopping and debarring all men from access, or coming in any sort near to your majesty, enduring your highness being abroad, except noblemen, your majesty's own known servants, and such others as it shall please your majesty to call upon."[1]

By the death of Henry IV. the crown of France fell to his son, Louis XIII.—a weak boy, who never became a man in intellect or strength of character. During his minority, the post of regent was occupied by his mother, Mary de Medici, who soon undid the good which her husband had done to the French people, without reforming the morals of the court. It was her general system to pursue a course of politics directly contrary to that of Henry, who had been a most unfaithful husband; but, notwithstanding this system, she adhered to the Protestant league, and sent ten thousand men to join four thousand English who had landed on the continent, under the command of Sir Edward Cecil. These allies joined the Dutch and Germans under the commands of the Prince of Orange and the Duke of Anhalt. The Austrians were presently driven out of Juliers; and as the emperor was not in a condition to renew the struggle, and as James and Mary de Medici were most anxious for peace, the tranquillity of Europe was not very seriously disturbed.

While these events were passing abroad and at home, Robert Carr, the handsome Scotchman, was eclipsing every competitor in the English court. He was created Viscount Rochester in the month of March, 1611; was made a member of the privy council in April, 1612; and he received also from his lavish master the Order of the Garter. Upon the death of the Earl of Salisbury (Cecil) he became lord chamberlain, that post being given up to him by the Earl of Suffolk, who succeeded Cecil as lord treasurer. And as the post of secretary remained vacant for a considerable time, the favorite did the duties of that office by means of Sir Thomas Overbury, whose abilities and experience made up in part for his own deficiences. Carr, Viscount Rochester, became in effect prime minister of England as much as Cecil had been, though nominally he held no official situation; and his power and his influence were not decreased when the king nominated Sir Ralph Winwood and Sir Thomas Lake to be joint secretaries of state; for these men were not high and mighty enough to oppose the wishes of the favorite. But Sir Thomas Overbury, who, on several accounts, was distasteful to the king, became an object of his jealousy and hatred when James saw the entire confidence and affection which his minion reposed in him.

Prince Henry, the heir to the crown, had now entered his eighteenth year, and had been for some time the idol of the people. If his character is fairly described by his cotemporaries, he was entitled to this admiration; but we can not but remember the universal practice of contrasting the heir apparent with the actual occupant of the throne; and this prince's untimely end may very well have produced some of that exaggeration which arises out of tenderness and hopeless regret. In person, in manners, and in character, he differed most widely from his father. He was comely, well made, graceful, frank, brave, and active. Henry V. and Edward the Black Prince were proposed to him as models; and it was the example of those warlike princes that he determined to follow. Though not absolutely averse to learning, spending two or three hours a day in his study, he loved arms better than books. He employed a great part of his time in martial exercises, in handling the pike, throwing the bar, shooting with the bow, vaulting and riding. He was a particular lover of horses, and what belonged to them, but not fond of hunting like his father; and, when he engaged in it, it was rather for the pleasure of galloping his gallant steeds than for any which the dogs afforded him. It was not wonderful that he should have been annoyed by James's pedantry and schoolmaster manners. His mother is said to have encouraged this feeling, and to have represented to him, out of contempt for his father, that so much learning was inconsistent with the character of a great general and conqueror, which he ought to be. One day, as he was tossing the pike, when the French ambassador asked him whether he had any message for the king his master, Henry replied, "Tell him what I am now doing." He studied fortification, and at a very early age turned his attention to ships and sea matters. Sir Walter Raleigh, the brave and the scientific soldier and sailor, who was still languishing in the Tower, became an object of his enthusiastic admiration; and he was often heard to say that no other king but his father would keep such a bird in such a cage. All this was when he was a mere child. It is remarked by an old writer, that he was too soon a man to be long-lived. As he grew up, he practiced tilting, charging on horseback, and firing artillery. He caused new pieces of ordnance to be cast, with which he learned to shoot at a mark. He was no less careful in furnishing himself with great horses of the best breeds, which he imported from all countries. He delighted to converse with men of skill and experience in wars, whether natives or foreigners; and he entertained in his household a celebrated Dutch engineer. It is quite possible that all this warlike ardor and activity might have proved more fatal to his country than the pedantry and pusillanimity of his father; but the young spirits of England would hardly reflect on such a possibility. In other particulars, Prince Henry was strikingly and studiously contrasted with his parent. James could never be quiet in church time, having always an eagerness to be preaching himself: Henry was a most attentive hearer of sermons, and, instead of disputing with them, was wont to reward the preachers,—no uncertain road to popularity, James was a most profane swearer,—Henry swore not at all; and he had boxes kept at his three houses—at St. James's, Richmond, and Nonsuch—to receive the fines on profane swearing which he ordered to be strictly levied among his attendants. The money thus collected was given to the poor. "Once when the prince was hunting the stag, it chanced the stag, being spent, crossed the road, where a butcher and his dog were traveling; the dog killed the stag, which was so great that the butcher could not carry him off: when the huntsmen and company came up, they fell at odds with the butcher, and endeavored to incense the prince against him; to whom the prince soberly answered, 'What if the butcher's dog killed the stag, what could the butcher help it?' They replied, 'if his father had been served so, he would have sworn so as no man could have endured it.' 'Away!' replied the prince: 'all the pleasure in the world is not worth an oath.'" . . . His court was more frequented than the king's, and by another sort of men; so the king was heard to say, "Will he bury me alive!" And the high-church favorites taxed him for being a patriot to the Puritans. To the last named class, indeed, he appeared as a ruler promised in the prophecies of Scripture, as one that would complete the reformation of the Church of Christ.

[1] Dalrymple. The lords of the Scottish council were too cautious to hint at the propriety of his majesty spending less time in his hunting, &c. They told him, on the contrary, that they knew it "to be most necessary and expedient" for the preservation of his health, that he should "continue his frequent exercises abroad, the deserting whereof could not be without the hazard and danger of insuring infirmity and sickness." They trusted "that He who holdeth the bridle in the devil's mouth would never so loosen the reins as to allow of any harm to him, the chief and greatest protector and nursing father of God's church."

"Henry the Eighth pulled down the abbeys and cells, But Henry the Ninth shall pull down bishops and bells."

was a rhyme common in the mouths of the people, among whom the spirit of dissent gained strength in proportion to the efforts made to force them to conformity, and the monstrous growth of episcopal tyranny. Yet when the usual age for marrying princes arrived, his father, who was less particular about any other point than about a high alliance, wished to marry Henry to a Catholic wife—a match which would have cost him the favor of the Puritans. A negotiation with Spain for the hand of the eldest infanta, was carried on for years, and when it grew languid or hopeless, James listened to an overture from Mary de Medici, the queen-regent of France, who was anxious for a marriage between Prince Henry and Madame Christine, second daughter of France. At the same time James was tempted by an offer of a daughter of the Duke of Florence, with millions of crowns for her dower; and shortly after an ambassador-extraordinary arrived from Savoy to solicit the hand of James's daughter, Elizabeth, for the heir of that dukedom, and to offer that of his sister to Prince Henry. This double commission led to no results, though James was willing to bestow his daughter on the Catholic Savoyard. To his father, Henry was all submission, protesting his readiness to marry whomsoever he might choose for him:[1] but to other persons he held a different language; and the Puritans, who most admired him and most feared or hated the papists, seem to have comforted themselves with the conviction that he would never marry a Catholic wife.[1]

A match, which was perfectly to the taste of the people, though not to that of her mother, was at length proposed for the Princess Elizabeth; and on the 16th of October, 1612, Frederick V., the count-palatine, the bridegroom elect, who had the good wishes of all zealous Protestants, arrived in England to receive his young bride. In the midst of the festive preparations for this marriage, Prince Henry, who appears to have outgrown his strength, and to have greatly neglected the care of his health, was seized with a dangerous illness at Richmond, where he was preparing his house for the reception of the Palatine. Recovering a little, and hoping to conquer the disease by the vigor of his spirit, he rode up to London to welcome his intended brother-in-law at Whitehall. On the 24th of October, notwithstanding the weak state of his body, and the coldness of the season, he played a great match of tennis with the Count Henry of Nassau, in his shirt. That night he complained exceedingly of lassitude and a pain in his head. The following morning, being Sunday, though faint and drowsy, he would rise and go to the chapel. Mr. Wilkinson, for whom he had a great esteem, preached a sermon upon the text—"Man, that is born of a woman, is of short continuance, and full of trouble." From this sermon in his own house the prince went to Whitehall, where he heard another with the king. After this he dined with his majesty, and ate with a seemingly good appetite, but his countenance was sadly pale, and his eye hollow and ghastly. After dinner his courage and resolution in combating with and dissembling his disorder gave way to the force of it, and he was obliged to take a hasty leave and return to St. James's. There he grew daily worse, the doctors disagreeing as to his treatment, and pursuing no fixed or bold course. His head frequently wandered, but on the night of the 2d of November his delirium increased alarmingly: he called for his clothes, for his armor and sword, saying he must be gone. On Thursday, the 5th of November, the anniversary of the gunpowder-plot, the king was informed that there was no hope. Upon this, James, who had visited him several times at St. James's, being "unwilling and unable to stay so near the gates of sorrow, removed to Theobalds, in Hertfordshire, to wait there the event." Abbot, the archbishop of Canterbury, attended the prince, told him of his danger, and took his confession of faith. In the course of that day the prince repeatedly called out "David!" "David!" meaning Sir David Murray, his confidential friend and servant; but, when Murray stood by his bedside, he always answered with a sigh, "I would say something, but I can not utter it." During that night he made many efforts to speak on some secret matter which seemed to press heavily on his heart, but he could

[1] Burnet, however, says, "He was so zealous a Protestant, that, when his father was entertaining propositions of marrying him to popish princesses—once to the archduchess, and at another time to a daughter of Savoy, he, in a letter that he wrote to the king on the 12th of that October in which he died (the original of which Sir William Cook showed me), desired that, if his father married him that way, it might be with the youngest person of the two, of whose conversion he might have hope, and that any liberty she might be allowed for her religion might be in the privatest manner possible."—Own Times, vol. i. p. 11. not be understood by reason of the rattling in his throat. Sir David Murray, however, contrived to understand his earnest wish, that a number of letters in a certain cabinet in his closet should be burned. It is said that these letters were burned accordingly. On the following morning his attendants thought him dead, and raised such a cry of grief that it was heard by the people in the streets, who echoed the loud lamentation. The prince recovered from his faint, and in the afternoon took two cordials or nostrums, one of which was prepared and sent by the captive Raleigh. But the sufferer was now past cure and help, and he expired at eight o'clock that night, being Friday, the 6th of November, 1612. He was eighteen years eight months and seventeen days old. The people had not been made aware of his danger till almost the last moment: their grief at his loss was unbounded; and all classes were deeply affected by the early death of the spirited youth. He was the more regretted because his only surviving brother, Prince Charles, was a sickly and retiring boy, and had not had the fortune to acquire popularity. In a short time dark rumors were raised that Prince Henry had been poisoned by the favorite, Rochester, with whom he could never agree; and these horrid suspicions did not stop till they had included his own father as an accomplice. The whole notion was absurd; the youth died of the effects of a putrid fever on a debilitated constitution.[1] But though James was innocent of the poisoning, he showed a brutal indifference to the fate of his son. Only three days after the event he made Rochester write to Sir Thomas Edmonds, his ambassador at Paris, to recommence, in the name of Prince Charles, the matrimonial treaty which he had begun for his brother. In a very few days more he prohibited all persons from approaching him in mourning; and though he thought fit to delay the marriage, he affianced his daughter Elizabeth to the Palatine in December, kept his Christmas with the usual festivities, and solemnized the nuptials on St. Valentine's Day with an expense and magnificence hitherto unknown in England. Queen Anne, Prince Charles, now heir to the throne, and even the uncouth person of James himself, were covered all over with the crown jewels. The noble bridemaids, the courtiers, the nobles, were all glittering in white robes and diamonds; so that the path of the bride was compared to the milky way. The Princess Elizabeth was in her sixteenth year, handsome, and light-hearted. While the archbishop was reading the service, "some coruscations and lightnings of joy appeared in her countenance, that expressed more than an ordinary smile, being almost elated to a laughter, which could not clear the air of her fate, but was rather a forerunner of more sad and dire events."[2] In the evening the fireworks and mock fight exhibited upon the Thames cost nearly £7000. The nobility got up at their own charge a very rich and sumptuous masque, which however was, according to the critics, "long and tedious." The gentlemen of the Middle Temple and of Lincoln's Inn rode in state to court, and exhibited an entertainment in which their fine dancing was much admired. The gentlemen of Gray's Inn and the Inner Temple showed their loyalty and ingenuity upon the water, making in boats and barges an allegorical device which was said to represent the marriage of the river Thames with the river Rhine. But "these fading joys for this marriage were succeeded by fixed and real calamities, which the king took little care to prevent."[1] Long before these calamities fell upon the Palgrave and his bride,—indeed, before they were well out of England,—the court was hampered and vexed by pecuniary embarrassments. James had exacted the old feudal aid for the marriage of his daughter, as he had done before for the knighting of his eldest son; but the sum thus obtained (it was only about £20,000) went but a very short way toward paying for the dowry, the entertainment of the bridegroom with his numerous retinue, and the marriage feast. Lord Harrington, who accompanied the bride to the Rhine, claimed on his return, £30,000. The king having no money to give him, gave him a grant for the coining of base farthings in brass.

A.D. 1613. The two noble Howards, the Earl of Suffolk, and the Earl of Northampton,[2] seeing that there was no possibility of checking the mighty rise of Rochester, sought to bind him to their family, and so share the better in the good things which the king continued to lavish on the favorite. Suffolk had a daughter, the most beautiful, the most witty, and the most fascinating young woman in the English court. This Lady Frances Howard had been married at the age of thirteen to the Earl of Essex, only a year older than herself, the son of the unfortunate earl who had perished on the scaffold in Elizabeth's time. James had promoted this ill-omened match out of a pretended regard to Essex's father. As the parties were so young, the bride was sent home to her mother, a weak and vain, if not a vicious woman; the bridegroom was sent to the university, whence he went on his travels to the continent. At the end of four years they went to live together, as one of them supposed, as man and wife; but if Essex rejoiced in the loveliness of his bride, and the universal admiration she attracted, his joy was soon overcast, for he found her cold, contemptuous, and altogether averse to him. In effect, his countess was already enamored of Rochester and his splendid fortunes. Prince Henry, it is said, had disputed her love with the handsome favorite, but in vain. Sir Thomas Overbury had assisted Rochester in writing his passionate love letters, and had even managed sundry stolen interviews between the lovers, in which what remained of the innocence of the young countess had been made a wreck; but though Overbury's lax morality did not prevent him from rendering such services as these, his policy was strongly opposed to his friend committing himself further

He well knew the odium which Rochester would bring upon himself by proclaiming his love and contracting an adulterine marriage with the countess: and, wishing to retain his own ascendency over the favorite, the fountain of riches and honor, he was averse to the influence which the noble Howards would obtain by the union. As the favorite was indebted to him "more than to any soul living, both for his fortune, understanding, and reputation," he spoke his mind freely and boldly, objecting the "baseness of the woman," the dishonor of such a marriage, and declaring that, if Rochester persisted, he would raise an insuperable obstacle to the divorce from Essex, which was to precede any open talk about the new marriage. The favorite seemed to yield to the strong remonstrances of his friend and counselor. Overbury, though familiar with the intrigues of a court and the worst vices of human nature, foresaw no mischief to himself: he continued to derive profit and credit from his close connection with the favorite; and on the morning of the 21st of April, 1613, he boasted to a friend of his good fortune and brilliant prospects. That very evening he was committed to the Tower. Rochester, in his infatuation, had told all that he had said to his beautiful and revengeful mistress, who, from that moment, had vowed his destruction. In her first fury she offered £1000 to Sir John Wood to take his life in a duel. But there was a too apparent risk and uncertainty in this course; and her friends (her uncle, the Earl of Northampton, was among these advisers) suggested a wiser expedient,—which was to send Overbury on an embassy to the Great Duke of Russia. If he accepted this mission he would be out of the way before the question of the divorce came on; if he took the appointment in the light of a harsh exile, and refused it, it would be easy to irritate the king against him as an undutiful subject. When the mission to Russia was first mentioned to him, Sir Thomas seemed not unwilling to undertake it. But then, it is said, his friend Rochester told him how much he relied upon his integrity and talent for business,—how much he should lose by his absence; and, in the end, implored him to refuse the unpromising embassy, undertaking to reconcile him soon with the king if his majesty should testify any displeasure. By this time nothing but Sir Thomas's immediate death would satisfy the malignant countess; and Rochester had become as a pipe upon which she played her stops as she chose. As soon as Overbury had refused the mission which was offered to him by the Lord Chancellor and the Earl of Pembroke, the favorite represented to the king that Sir Thomas was not only grown insolent and intolerable to himself, but audacious and disobedient to his sacred majesty. James, who already hated Overbury, readily agreed with his minion and the rest of his council that Overbury was guilty of contempt of the royal authority. A warrant was brought up and signed, and Sir Thomas was sent to his dungeon. The countess's uncle, Northampton, and her lover Rochester, had prepared the business so that Sir William Wade was removed from the lieutenancy of the Tower, and Sir Jervis Elvis, or Elwes, a person wholly dependent upon them, put in his place. By their order, Elwes confined Overbury a close prisoner, so that his own father was not suffered to visit him, nor were any of his servants admitted within the walls of the Tower.

A few days after these strange practices, the Countess of Essex, backed by her father the Earl of Suffolk, who signed the petition with her, sued for a divorce from her husband upon the ground of the marriage being null by reason of physical incapacity. Forthwith James appointed, under the great seal, a commission of delegates to try this delicate cause. The delegates named by his majesty were Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of London, Winchester, Ely, Litchfield and Coventry, and Rochester; with Sir Julius Cæsar, Sir John Parry, Sir Daniel Dunne, Sir John Bennet, Francis James, and Thomas Edwards, doctors of the civil law. The Earl of Essex, who had suffered enough already from the beautiful demon, made no resistance, but seems to have gone gladly into measures which would free him from such a wife. It has been mildly said that "all the judicial forms usual on such occasions were carefully observed;"[1] but it can not be denied that the course of the disgraceful investigation was biassed by interferences and influences of a most unusual and irregular character. Abbot, the primate, who in all this foul business acted like a man of honor and conscience, objected strongly to to the divorce; but James took up the pen, and answered the archbishop in the double capacity of absolute king and special pleader. He told Abbot, roundly, that it became him "to have a kind of implicit faith" in his royal judgment, because he was known to have "some skill in divinity," and because, as he hoped, no honest man could doubt the uprightness of his conscience. "And," continued James, "the best thankfulness that you, that are so far my creature, can use toward me, is, to reverence and follow my judgment, and not to contradict it, except where you may demonstrate unto me that I am mistaken or wrong informed."[2] The king was never backward in writing or delivering this kind of schooling, or in seconding his minions through right and wrong; but it is believed that his zeal was quickened on the present occasion by the opportune gift of £25,000 in gold, which Rochester made to him out of his handsome savings. The primate, however, would not sacrifice his conscience, and three out of five of the doctors of civil law took part with him. The bishops were less scrupulous, for, with the exception of London, they all voted as the king wished; and on the 25th of September a divorce was pronounced by a majority of seven to five. Such of the judges and delegates as voted for the nullity were rewarded by James but censured by his subjects. The son of Bilson, the bishop of Winchester, was knighted in consequence of his father's subserviency, but the people recorded the origin of the honor by calling him ever after Sir Nullity Bilson. The day before the sentence of divorce was pronounced Sir Thomas Overbury died in his dungeon. His body was hastily and secretly buried in a pit dug within the walls of the Tower, and care was taken to circulate a report that he had died of an infectious and lothsome disease. But from the first it was generally whispered that he had been poisoned. On the 4th of November, in order that the Countess of Essex should not lose rank by marrying his favorite, James created Rochester Earl of Somerset. The marriage ceremony was performed on the 26th of December, in the Royal Chapel at Whitehall, in the presence of the king and queen, Prince Charles, and a great confluence of the bishops and temporal nobility. The countess appeared in the costume of a virgin bride, with her hair hanging in loose curls down to her waist. James Montague, bishop of Bath and Wells, the king's favorite bishop, and afterward the editor of his works, united the hands of the guilty pair, and pronounced the nuptial benediction; and Dr. Mountain, dean of Westminster, preached the marriage sermon. At night there was a gallant masque got up by the lords of the court. "The glorious days were seconded with as glorious night, where masques and dancings had a continued motion; the king naturally affecting such highflying pastimes and banquetings as might wrap up his spirit, and keep it from descending toward earthly things."[1] Upon the Wednesday following there was another grand masque got up by the lords and gentlemen of Prince Charles's household; and this so far surpassed the other, and pleased the king so well, that he caused it to be acted again on the Monday following, being the 4th of January (1614). "But Whitehall was too narrow to contain the triumphs of this marriage,—they must be extended into the city; and upon the 4th of January the bride and bridegroom, accompanied by the Duke of Lenuox, my Lord Privy Seal (Northampton), the Lord Chamberlain, the earls of Worcester, Pembroke, and Montgomery, with a numerous train of nobility and gentry, were invited to a treat in the city at Merchant Tailors' Hall, where my lord mayor and aldermen entertained them in their scarlet gowns. At their entry they were accosted by a gratulatory speech and music; the feast served by the choicest citizens, selected out of the twelve companies, in their gowns and rich foines:[2] after supper they were entertained with a wassail, two pleasant masques, a play, and dancing; and, after all, the bride and bridegroom, with all this noble crew, were invited to a princely banquet, and at three in the morning the bride and bridegroom returned to Whitehall: and before this surfeit of pleasure and excess was well digested, the gentlemen of Gray's Inn, upon Twelfth Day, invited the bride and bridegroom to masque."[3] It is said that the gentlemen of Gray's Inn did not very willingly commit this act of sycophancy, and that the great Bacon claimed for himself the entire merit of vanquishing their repugnance. In all things this shameful marriage, which insulted and shocked the moral feelings of the people, was celebrated with far more pomp and parade than that of the king's own daughter. The Puritans, who were wont to declaim against all shows and sports whatsoever, found in these doings an inexhaustible subject for reproach and invective. The countess, the favorite, the bishops, the king himself, all came in for their share of opprobrium; and the people generally, whether puritans, churchmen, or papists, regarded the triumph of profligacy with disgust, horror, and wrath. And all this time James kept trumpeting louder and louder that he was a heaven-made king, and that the duty of his subjects was a passive obedience in all things to his absolute and infallible will. But the pinching of pecuniary embarrassment must have reminded him continually that he was of the earth, earthy; and the course of life he led was fatal to any great reverence on the part of his subjects. "This year (1614), as it was the meridian of the king's reign in England, so it was of his pleasures. He was excessively addicted to hunting and drinking, not ordinary French and Spanish wines, but strong Greek wines; and though he would divide his hunting from drinking these wines, yet he would compound his hunting with drinking; and to that purpose he was attended with a special officer who was, as much as could be, always at hand to fill the king's cup in his hunting, when he called for it. . . . Whether it were drinking these wines, or from some other cause, the king became so lazy and unwieldy, that he was trussed on horseback, and, as he was set, so would he ride, without otherwise poising himself on his saddle: nay, when his hat was set on his head, he would not take the pains to alter it, but it sat as it was put on."[1] And all this while he never heard any thing from his favorites and flatterers without the prelude of "sacred," "wise," "most learned," &c.

A.D. 1614. Since the dissolution of parliament, in 1611, James had attempted, as usual, to raise loans by writs under the great seal; but the merchants, to whom he principally applied, refused him the accommodation. He opened a market for the sale of honors; sold several peerages for large sums; and created a new order of knights called baronets, whose honors were hereditary, and who paid £1000 each for their patents under the great seal. "Some of these new honorable men (whose wives' pride and their own prodigalities had pumped up to it) were so drained that they had not moisture to maintain the radical humor, but withered to nothing. This money, thus raised, is pretended for planting the north of Ireland, but it found many other channels before it came to that sea. And though, at our king's first access to the crown, there was a glut of knights made, yet after some time he held his hand, lest the kingdom should be cloyed with them; and the world thrived so well with some, that the price was afterward brought up to £300 a-piece. But now, again, the poor courtiers were so indigent, that £60 would purchase a knighthood, the king wanting other means to gratify his servants."[1] He still continued giving with as lavish a hand as ever to these servants, by which must be understood his favorites and courtiers; for the true servants of the state were often left unpaid, and told that they must support themselves on their private patrimonies. Such as obtained the higher employments paid themselves by means of bribes and peculations. These places were generally sold to the highest bidders by the minion Somerset and the noble Howards. Thus, Sir Fulke Greville obtained the Chancellorship of the Exchequer for the sum of £4000, which he paid to Lady Suffolk, now the favorite's mother-in-law.[2]

The States of Holland had neither paid principal nor interest of their debt. Some of the ministers proposed adopting bold and decisive measures, in order to obtain this money, but James was too timid to follow their advice; and as his exchequer was bare and his credit exhausted, he reluctantly made up his mind to meet parliament once more. It appears that even at this extremity he would have avoided a parliament had it not been for Bacon, who was now attorney-general, and high in the royal favor, from which his rival, Coke, had wonderfully declined. Bacon, who had drawn up a regular plan for managing the House of Commons, assured the king that the chief leaders of the late opposition, such as Neville, Yelverton, Hyde, Crew, and Sir Dudley Digges, had been won over to the court; that much might be done by forethought toward filling the House of Commons with persons well affected to his majesty, winning or blinding the lawyers, the literæ vocales of the House, and drawing the country gentlemen, the merchants, the courtiers, to act with one accord for the king's advantage. But Bacon told James, at the same time, that it would be expedient to tender voluntarily certain graces and modifications of the prerogative, such as might with smallest injury be conceded.[3] This advice was seconded by Sir Henry Neville, a place-hunter, as ambitious a man as Bacon, and scarcely more honest. In a well written memorial he suggested to his majesty that he should consider what had been demanded by the Commons, and what promised by the crown during the last session; that he should grant now the more reasonable of the Commons' requests, and keep all the promises which he had actually made; that he should avoid irritating speeches to his parliament, and make a show of confidence in their good affections.[4] Upon these conditions, and under this system, they undertook to manage the Commons (the Lords had long been tame enough), and carry the king triumphantly through parliament to abundant votes of the public money; and hence they were called undertakers. James, in his embarrassments, acceded to the plan, and Somerset put himself at the head of it with Bacon and Neville.[5] In later years the system was carried to a high degree of perfection, but it was not destined to be very successful under James. On the 5th of April, 1614, he opened the session with a conciliatory speech, descanting on the alarming growth of popery (he knew a little persecution would please them well), and on his zeal for the true religion; and then he told them how much he was in want of money, and how many graces he intended for them in this present session. But the Commons would not be cajoled: they passed at once to the great grievance—the customs at the outports and impositions by prerogative. "And such faces appeared there as made the court droop. Some of the courtiers and members returned or won over by the "undertakers," made a faint effort, but their voices were drowned, and died away in a helpless murmur about the hereditary right of kings to tax their subjects as they list. The Commons demanded a conference on this momentous subject with the Lords. The Lords hesitated, and consulted with the judges. Before the opinion of the latter was known, the Commons objected to the way in which several members had been elected, and they went nigh to expel the attorney-general, Bacon. Coke, who had attained to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench, who could hope for no higher promotion, and who was irritated into something like patriotism by his hatred of Bacon and the ill usage he had received from the court, after a private consultation with the rest of the judges, declined giving any opinion to the Lords touching the legality of impositions on merchandise by prerogative, because it was proper that he and his brethren, who were to speak judicially between the king and his subjects, should be disputants in no cause on any side. The Lords, who had expected a very different answer, now declined the conference: and Neyle, bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, who, for the share he had taken in the Countess of Essex's divorce, had been recently translated to the see of Lincoln, rose in his place, and said that the Commons were striking at the root of the prerogative, and that, if admitted to conference, they might proceed to undutiful and seditious speeches, unfit for the ears of their lordships. This Neyle was one of the worst of James's bench of bishops, and an object of detestation to the Puritans, whom he had harassed and persecuted. The Commons fell upon him in a fury, and demanded reparation; for the practice did not yet obtain of one House of parliament supposing itself ignorant of what is done or said in the other House. The bishop instantly changed his tone, excused himself, and, with many tears, denied the most offensive of the words which had been attributed to him, not forgetting to profess a wonderful respect and veneration for the Commons. By this time James must have discovered that the undertakers had engaged for more than they could accomplish. Indeed, the discovery of this scheme, which was made public before the meeting of parliament, contributed to the ill humor of the Lower House. James, in his opening speech, positively denied that there was any such plan entertained, protesting that, "for undertakers, he never was so base to call, or rely on any;" and Bacon had pretended to laugh at the notion that private men should undertake for the Commons of England. A few days after, Sir Henry Neville's memorial to the king was read at full length in the House, and at the opening of the Session of 1621 James himself expressly confessed that there had been such a scheme. Seeing no likelihood of the dispatch of the business for which alone he had summoned them, James sent a message, that if they further delayed voting supplies he would dissolve parliament. The Commons, in reply, stated that they would vote no supplies till their grievances should be redressed. It is said, on a questionable authority, that he then sent for the Commons, and tore all their bills before their faces in Whitehall; but whatever was James's indiscretion, his cowardice would be likely to prevent such an offensive and violent act. What is certain, however, is, that he carried his threat into execution on the 7th of June, and, on the following morning, committed five of the members to the Tower, for "licentiousness of speech." At the time of this hasty and angry dissolution, the parliament had sat two months and two days, but had not passed a single bill. It was afterward called the Addle Parliament; but few parliaments did more toward the proper establishment of the rights of the Commons.[1]

[5] Arthur Wilson says, "Yet there was a generation about the court, that to please and humor greatness undertook a parliament, as men presuming to have friends in every county and borough, who, by their power among the people would make election of such members for knights and burgesses as should comply solely to the king's desires and Somerset is the head and chief of these undertakers. But this was but an embrion, and became an abortive."

For the next six years James depended upon most uncertain, and, for the greater part, most illegal means. People were dragged into the Star Chamber on all kinds of accusations, that they might be sentenced to pay enormous fines to the king; monopolies and privileges were invented and sold, and the odious benevolences were brought again into full play; and such as would not contribute had their names returned to the privy council. Mr. Oliver St. John, who put himself in this predicament, who explained his reasons in writing like a lawyer and statesman,[2] and who did not spare the king, was sentenced by the Star Chamber to a fine of £5000, and to be imprisoned during the royal pleasure. But greatly as James wanted money, he was of himself disposed to be much less severe against those who refused it than against those who questioned his divine right in the abstract, or censured his kingly conduct. There was one Edmond Peacham, a minister of the gospel in Somersetshire, who probably first attracted attention by preaching puritanically. His study was suddenly broken open, and in it was found a manuscript sermon, which had never been preached, nor intended to be preached, sharply censuring the king's extravagance and love of dogs, dances, banquets, and costly dresses, and complaining of the frauds and oppressions practiced by his government and officers. The poor old man, was seized, dragged up to London, and committed to the Tower. There he was examined by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, the Earls of Suffolk and Worcester, Sir Ralph Winwood, the Lord Chief Justice Coke, and others, touching his motives, advisers, and instructors. "I find not the man," wrote Winwood, "to be, as was related, stupid or dull, but to be full of malice and craft."[1] This opinion was formed on the preacher's denying that he had had any advisers or accomplices, and his stating that what he had written had been "by his own observation and imagination; and the application of it made out of the example of Herod."[2] James, who in such cases would always read the law in his own way, insisted that the offense amounted to high treason, and, taking up his pen, he drew out for the instruction of his ministers and judges what he called, "The true state of the question."[3] But Coke, who had not always been so scrupulous, who, before the tide of his favor was on the ebb, had concurred and coöperated in many arbitrary measures, maintained that the offense might be a criminal slander, but did not amount to treason. On the next horrible examination of the prisoner, Coke was not present, but his rival, Bacon, was there in his stead, and an assenting witness to the atrocities committed. Twelve interrogatories were put to the preacher, who, according to the horribly concise expression of Secretary Winwood, in his report, was examined upon them, "before torture, in torture, between torture, and after torture." "Notwithstanding," continues Winwood, "nothing could be drawn from him, he still persisted in his obstinate and insensible denials and former answer." Some two months after, the poor captive changed his key somewhat, but still he would make no confession likely to bring any one into trouble; and, in the end, he would not sign this examination, which was taken before Bacon, Crew, and two other lawyers.[4] In the absence, therefore, of all other evidence, James resolved that the manuscript unpreached sermon should be taken as the overt act of treason. And he called in the willing Bacon to smooth the legal difficulties to this strange course. Bacon conferred with the judges one by one, and found them all ready to be as base as himself except Coke, who

[4] It was a palpable and very excusable evasion. His name was to the MS., and he now said that it was not written by him, but by one of his name, "a divine, scholar, and traveler, that came to him some years past, the certainty of the time he can not remember, and lay at his house a quarter of a year, and took so much upon him, as he had scarce the command of his own house or study; but that he would be writing, sometimes in the church, sometimes in the steeple, sometimes in this examinate's study; and now he saith further, that those papers, as well loose as contexted, which he had formerly confessed to be of his own hand, might be of the writing of the said Peacham; . . . and whatsoever is in his former examination, as well before his majesty's learned council, as before my Lord of Canterbury, and other the lords, and other of his majesty's privy council, was wholly out of fear, and to avoid torture, and not otherwise." objected that "such particular, and, as he called it, auricular taking of opinions (from the judges) was not according to the custom of this realm." This resistance to his infallibility stung James to the quick, and prepared, perhaps more than any other single circumstance, the triumph of Bacon over his great rival. In the end, Coke, finding himself standing alone, consented to give some opinions in writing; but these were evasive, and did not lend the king the confirmation of his high legal authority. "As Judge Hobart, that rode the western circuit, was drawn to jump with his colleague, the chief baron, Peacham was sent down to be tried and trussed up in Somersetshire," where the overt act of writing the libel was supposed to have been committed. The poor old preacher was accordingly condemned for high treason, on the 7th of August, 1615. They did not, however, proceed to execution, and Peacham died a few months after in Taunton jail. This has been considered as the worst and most tyrannical act of James's reign; but there are others scarcely inferior in violence and illegality. For example, Thomas Owen was indicted and found guilty of high treason, for saying that "the king, being excommunicated by the pope, might be lawfully deposed and killed by any one." This position was atrocious, but it could hardly be twisted into treason—for, as James had never been excommunicated, the words could not apply to him. Owen pleaded in this sense, and Coke at first said that his defense was good in law, and his case not treasonable; but he was afterward induced to concur with the king and the other judges, who wished to have the man hanged, drawn, and quartered. Williams, another papist, was convicted of high treason, for writing a book in which he predicted that the king would die in the year 1621. Those writers who consider this reign as an amusing farce, and nothing worse, appear to have forgotten such incidents.

On the 15th of June, 1614, about a week after the dissolution of the Addle Parliament, the Earl of Northampton, the grand-uncle of Somerset's wife, and the most crafty statesman of that faction, departed this life. His nephew, the Earl of Suffolk, and the favorite divided his places between them, or filled them up with their own creatures; but his death was a fatal blow to their interests; for they neither had his cunning or ability themselves, nor could procure it in any of their allies and dependents. But they might have maintained their ascendency had it not been for the appearance at court of another beautiful young man, and for the declining spirits of the actual favorite. Somerset, guilty as he was, was no hardened or heartless sinner. From the time of the death of his friend Overbury, a cloud settled upon his brow; his vivacity and good humor departed from him; he neglected his dress and person, and became absent-minded, moody, and morose, even when in the king's company. All the courtiers, who envied him and the Howards, were on the watch, and as James grew sick of his old minion they threw a new one in his way. This was George Villiers, the youngest son of Sir Edward Villiers of Brookesby, in Leicestershire, by his second wife, a poor and portionless, but very beautiful woman. George, who appears, at least for a short time, to have been brought up expressly for the situation he succeeded in obtaining, was sent over to Paris, where he acquired the same accomplishments which had so fascinated the king in the Scottish youth, Robert Carr. When he appeared at the English court he had all these French graces, a fine suit of French clothes on his back, and an allowance of £50 a-year from his widowed mother. James was enchanted, and in a few weeks or days young Villiers was installed as his majesty's cup-bearer. He was tall, finely proportioned, far more handsome—or so thought the king—than ever Somerset had been, and, unlike that now careworn favorite, his face was always dressed in smiles. Soon after there was a great but private supper-entertainment at Baynard's Castle, at which the noble Herberts, Seymours, Russels, and other courtiers of high name, devised how they should get Somerset wholly out of favor and office, and put George Villiers in his place.[1] Their only difficulty was to induce the queen to enter into their plot, for they knew "that the king would never admit any to nearness about himself but such as the queen should commend to him, that if she should complain afterward of the dear one, he might make answer, it is along of yourself, for you commended him unto me."[2] Now, though her majesty Queen Anne hated Somerset, she had seen Villiers, and did not like him. To remove this feeling of the queen's, to labor for the substitution of one base minion for another, was thought a duty not unsuitable to the primate of the English church; and Archbishop Abbot, in his animosity to Somerset, undertook it at the request of the noble lords. When he first opened his commission to the queen, she told him that she saw that in Villiers which, if he became a favorite, would make him more intolerable than any that were before him. In the end, however, the importunities of the primate prevailed; but Anne told him that they should all live to repent what they were doing in advancing this new minion.[3]" On St. George's feast, April 24th, 1615, his onomastic day, the young cup-bearer was sworn a gentleman of the privy chamber, with a salary of £1000 a-year; and on the next day he was knighted. The doom of Somerset was now sealed; his enemies had chuckled over the success of their scheme, and the most timid saw that there would no longer be any danger in accusing the favorite of a horrible crime which had long been imputed to him by the people.[4] He was not so blind to his danger as court favorites have usually been; and before any proceedings were instituted against him he endeavored to procure a general pardon to secure him in his life and property. Sir Robert Cotton drew one out, "as large and general as could be," wherein the king was made to declare, "that, his own motion and special favor, he did pardon all, and all manner of treasons, misprisions of treasons, murders, felonies, and outrages whatsoever, by the Earl of Somerset committed, or hereafter to be committed."[1] James, hoping hereby to rid himself forever of his disagreeable importunities, approved of the document most heartily; but the Chancellor Ellesmere refused to put the great seal to it, alledging that such an act would subject him to a præmunire.

[4] According to Weldon, George Villiers, by the king's desire, waited upon Somerset, and told him that he desired to be his "servant and creature," and to take his court preferment wholly under his favor; and Somerset frankly replied, "I will have none of your service, and you shall have none of my favor; I will, if I can, break your neck." "Had Somerset only complied with Villiers," continues Weldon, "Overbury's death had still been raked up in his own ashes."

Secretary Winwood is said to have been the first to declare to James that the Countess of Essex and Somerset had caused Sir Thomas Overbury to be poisoned. When James privately summoned Elwes, the lieutenant of the Tower, into his presence, and questioned and cross-questioned him, he was fully convinced of the fact; but he still kept the earl about his person, concealed all he knew, and even stimulated a return of his former warm affection. He went to hunt at Royston, and took Somerset with him. There, as he seemed "rather in his rising than setting," he was attached by the warrant of the Lord Chief Justice Coke, who, however, had refused to proceed until James had joined several others in commission with him. "The king had a lothsome way of lolling his arms about his favorites' necks, and kissing them: and in this posture Coke's messenger found the king with Somerset, saying, 'When shall I see thee again?—When shall I see thee again?'" When Somerset got the warrant in the royal presence, he exclaimed, that never had such an affront been offered to a peer of England. "Nay, man," said the king, wheedlingly, "if Coke sends for me, I must go;" and, as soon as Somerset was gone, he added, "Now the devil go with thee, for I will never see thy face more!" This was at ten o'clock in the morning. About three in the afternoon the lord chief justice arrived at Royston, and to him James complained that Somerset and his wife had made him a go-between in their adultery and murder. He commanded him, with all the scrutiny possible, to search into the bottom of the foul conspiracy, and to spare no man how great soever. And, in conclusion, he said to Coke, "God's curse be upon you and yours, if you spare any of them; and God's curse be upon me and mine, if I pardon any one of them!"[2]

Coke, who had many motives, beside the love of justice, was not idle. He had owed many previous obligations to Somerset; but he saw that earl could never again be of use to him. He and his brother commissioners took three hundred examinations, and then reported to the king that Frances Howard, some time Countess of Essex, had employed sorcery to incapacitate her lawful husband, Essex, and to win the love of Rochester; that, afterward, she and her lover, and her uncle, the late Earl of Northampton, had, by their joint contrivance, obtained the committal of Sir Thomas Overbury, the appointment of their creature Elwes to be lieutenant of the Tower, and one Weston to be warden or keeper of the prisoner; and, further, that the countess, by the aid of Mrs. Turner, had procured three kinds of poison from Franklin, an apothecary, and that Weston, the warder or keeper, had administered these poisons to Sir Thomas. Coke had also obtained possession of many note-books and letters; and, from a passage in a letter from Overbury to Somerset, alluding to the secrets of the latter, he pretended to derive proof that these secrets must have been of a treasonable nature, and he ventured thereupon to charge the earl with having poisoned Prince Henry! In reality there was nothing in Overbury's letter which could bear this construction; Sir Thomas merely said that he had written a history of his confidential connection with the favorite, from which his friends might see the extent of that man's ingratitude. The queen, however, entered into Coke's view of the case, and openly declared that she had no doubt of the murder of her eldest son. But the king discouraged this interpretation, and only believed, or pretended to believe, that, in addition to his guilt in being an accomplice in the poisoning of Overbury, Somerset had received bribes from Spain, and had engaged to place Prince Charles in the hands of that court.

Weston, the warder, who had been servant to Franklin, the apothecary who furnished the poison, had been arrested and examined at the first opening of these proceedings, and the countess and all the other guilty parties were secured without any difficulty, for not one of them suspected what was coming. Weston at first stood mute, but his obstinacy gave way to Coke's threats of the peine forte et dure, and to the exhortations of Dr. King, bishop of London, and he consented to plead. But even then he pleaded not guilty, and so did Mrs. Turner, Franklin the apothecary, and Elwes the lieutenant of the Tower. Their trials disclosed a monstrous medley of profligacy and superstition; and what seems almost equally monstrous is the fact that the learned Coke, the other judges, and all the spectators believed in the force of astrology and witchcraft, and considered the credulity of two frantic women as the most damnable of their crimes. Mrs. Turner, now the widow of a physician of that name, had been in her youth a dependent in the house of the Earl of Suffolk, and a companion to his beautiful daughter, Frances Howard, who contracted a friendship for her which survived their separation. As certain vices, not unknown in the court of the virgin queen, had become common and barefaced in that of her successor, it would not be fair to attribute the demoralization of the Lady Frances solely to her connection with this dangerous woman; though it should appear that she led her into the worst of her crimes, and found her the means of

[1] Such pardons, or pardons very like them, had been sometimes granted in other cases. executing them. When they renewed their intimacy in London, the Lady Frances was the unwilling wife of Essex, and enamored of the favorite Rochester. Mrs. Turner had had her illicit amours also; and believing, as most ladies then believed, in the efficacy of spells and love philtres, she had found out one Dr. Forman, a great conjuror, living in Lambeth, and who was frequently consulted by court dames and people of the best quality. Forman engaged to make Sir Arthur Manwaring love Mrs. Turner as much as she loved him; and soon after Sir Arthur traveled many miles by night, and through a terrible storm, to visit the widow. Instead of ascribing this passion to her own personal charms,—and she was a most beautiful woman,—she attributed it entirely to the charms of the conjuror at Lambeth. All this she told to the amorous Lady Essex, who, anxious for a like spell upon Rochester, went with her to the house of Dr. Forman. Like Mrs. Turner, the fair countess thought her beauty less potent than his incantations. She was grateful to him for the favorite's love, and frequently visited him afterward with Mrs. Turner, calling him "father!" and "very dear father!" It appeared, also, that the countess had secret meetings with Rochester at the house in Lambeth. The wizard was since dead, but they produced in court some of the countess's letters to him, in which she styled him "sweet father!" and some of his magical apparatus, as pictures, puppets, enchanted papers, and magic spells, which made the prisoners appear the more odious, as being known to have had dealings with witches and wizards. At this moment a loud crack was heard from the gallery, which caused great fear, tumult, and confusion among the spectators and throughout the hall, every one fearing hurt, as if the devil had been present, and grown angry to have his workmanship shown by such as were not his own scholars. There was also produced a list on parchment, written by Forman, signifying "what ladies loved what lords" in the court. The Lord Chief Justice Coke grasped this startling document, glanced his eye over it, and then insisted that it should not be read. People immediately said that the first name on the list was that of Coke's own wife, the Lady Hatton. It was further proved — though in some respects the evidence seems to have been such as would not satisfy a modern jury,—that Weston had once lived as a servant with Mrs. Turner, who had recommended him to the countess; that it was at the request of the countess and her uncle Northampton, communicated through her friend Sir Thomas Monson, chief falconer, that Elwes, the lieutenant of the Tower, had received him as warder, and placed him over Sir Thomas Overbury; that Weston administered the poison, which was of several kinds, and procured from his former master, Franklin, in Sir Thomas's medicines, soups, and other food; that he, Weston, had told his employers that he had given him poison enough to kill twenty men, administering it in small doses at a time through a course of several months; and that Somerset had commanded, through the Earl of Northampton, that the body of the victim should be buried immediately after his death. Franklin, the apothecary, made a full confession, in the vain hope of saving his own neck; Weston also confessed the murder, and many particulars connected with it. Coke pronounced sentence of death upon all these minor criminals. As Weston was on the scaffold at Tyburn, Sir John Holles and Sir John Wentworth, with other devoted friends of the fallen Somerset, rode up to the gallows, and endeavored to make him retract his confession; but the miserable man merely said, "Fact, or no fact, I die worthily!"—and so was hanged. Elwes, the lieutenant of the Tower, who had made a stout defense on the trial, confessed all on the scaffold, and ascribed his misfortune to his having broken a solemn vow he had once made against gambling. The fate of the beautiful Mrs. Turner excited the most interest. Many women of fashion, as well as men, went in their coaches to Tyburn to see her die. She came to the scaffold rouged and dressed, as if for a ball, with a ruff, stiffened with yellow starch, round her neck; but otherwise she made a very penitent end.[1]

Both Coke and Bacon eulogized the righteous zeal of the king for the impartial execution of justice: but their praise was at the least premature. James betrayed great uneasiness on hearing that his chief falconer, Sir Thomas Monson, was implicated, and would "probably play an unwelcomed card on his trial." And when Monson was arraigned, some yeomen of the guard, acting under the king's private orders, to the astonishment and indignation of the public, carried him from the bar to the Tower. After a brief interval he was released from that confinement, and allowed not only to go at large, but also to retain some place about the court.[2] As for the trial of the great offenders, the Earl and Countess of Somerset, it was delayed for many months. The delay was imputed for a time to the necessity of waiting for the return of John Digby, the ambassador at Madrid, afterward Baron Digby and Earl of Bristol, who, it was said, could substantiate the late favorite's treasonable dealings with the Spanish court; but, when Digby came, he could do nothing of the sort; and every thing tends to prove that James had all along a dread of bringing Somerset to trial. Even from the documents which remain, we may see the king's unceasing anxiety, and a system of trick and manœuver almost unparalleled, and which can not possibly admit of any other interpretation than this: — Somerset was possessed of some dreadful secret, the disclosure of which would have been fatal to the king. The two prisoners, who were kept separate, were constantly beset by ingenious messengers from court, who assured them that, if they would only confess their guilt, all would go well,—that they would have the royal pardon to secure them in their lives and estates. Nay, more, there was held out to Somerset,

[1] Mrs. Turner had introduced yellow starched ruffs, &c. The fashion went out with her exit at Tyburn.

[2] Roger Coke, the author of the detection, and the grandson of the great Coke, says that the lord chief justice, Judge Dodridge, and Judge Hyde, declared Sir Thomas Monson to be as guilty of the murder as any of the others.

"indirectly, as it were, a glimmering of his majesty's benign intention to reinstate him in all his former favor." When we mention that James's chief messenger and agent was Bacon, it will be understood that the business was ably done, and that the hopes and fears of the prisoners were agitated with a powerful hand.[1] The countess, after much pains had been taken with her, confessed her guilt; but Somerset resisted every attempt, most solemnly protesting his innocence of the murder of Overbury. When Bacon spoke of the king's determination to secure him in life and fortune, he replied, "Life and fortune are not worth the acceptance when honor is gone." He earnestly implored to be admitted to the king's presence, saying that, in a quarter of an hour's private conversation, he could establish his innocence, and set the business at rest forever. But James' shrunk from this audience; and the prisoner's request to be allowed to forward a private letter to the king was denied him. Then Somerset threatened, instead of praying; declaring that, whenever he should be brought to the bar, he would reveal such things as his ungrateful sovereign would not like to hear. James Hay, afterward Earl of Carlisle, the friend and countryman of Somerset, and other particular friends, were dispatched from time to time by the trembling king to the Tower to work upon the prisoner; but though, in the end, something must have been done by such means, they for a long time produced no visible effect upon the resolution of the earl. When the confession of his wife was obtained (it did not materially bear against him), Bacon and the other commissioners, among whom were Coke and Chancellor Ellesmere, told Somerset that his lady, being touched with remorse, had at last confessed all, and that she that led him to offend ought now, by her example, to lead him to repent of his offense; that the confession of one of them could not singly do either of them much good; but that the confession of both of them might work some further effect toward both; and that therefore they, the commissioners, wished him not to shut the gates of his majesty's mercy against himself by being obdurate any longer. But his reasoning was thrown away upon him: Somerset would not "come any degree farther on to confess; only his behavior was very sober, and modest, and mild; but yet, as it seemed, resolved to expect his trial." Then they proceeded to examine him touching the death of Overbury; and they made this further observation, that, "in the questions of the imprisonment," he was "very cool and modest;" but that, when they asked him "some questions that did touch the prince,[2] or some foreign practice" (which they did "very sparingly"), he "grew a little stirred."[1] James received a letter from the prisoner, but not a private one. The tone of the epistle was enigmatical, but bold, like that of a man writing to one over whom he had power.[2] In it Somerset again demanded a private interview; but James replied that this was a favor he might grant after, but not before, his trial.[3]

Bacon was intrusted with the legal management of the case, but he appears hardly to have taken a step without previously consulting the king, who postillated with his own hand the intended charges, and instructed the wily attorney-general so to manage matters in court as not to drive Somerset to desperation, or give, in his own words, "occasion for despair or flushes." He was perfectly well understood by Bacon, who undertook to have the prisoner found guilty before the peers without making him too odious to the people. The whole business of Bacon was to put people on a wrong scent, for the purpose of preventing Somerset from making any dangerous disclosure, and the other judges from getting an insight into some iniquitous secret which it imported the king to conceal. On the 24th of May, 1616, the countess was separately arraigned before the peers. The beautiful but guilty woman looked pale, and sick, and spiritless; she trembled excessively while the clerk read the indictment; she hid her face with her fan at mention of the name of Weston; and she wept and spoke with a voice scarcely audible when she pleaded guilty and threw herself on the royal mercy. As soon as this was done she was hurried from the bar, and then, when she was not present, to say that her confession did not involve her husband, Bacon delivered a very artful speech, stating the evidence he had to produce if she had made it necessary by pleading not guilty. After this speech the countess was recalled for a minute to the bar of the Lords to hear sentence of death, which was pronounced by the Chancellor Ellesmere, whom the king and Bacon, after long deliberation, had appointed High Steward for the trials. On the same day Somerset, who ought to have been tried with his wife, was warned by Sir George More, the present lieutenant of the Tower, that he must stand his trial on the morrow. Owing to some causes not explained, but at which we may easily guess, the earl, who had before desired this, absolutely refused to go, telling the lieutenant that he should carry him by force in his bed; that the king had assured him he should never come to any trial, and that the king durst not bring him

[2] It is by no means clear that Prince Henry is here alluded to. Bacon may possibly refer to the living prince, Charles, and the rumor of Somerset's undertaking to deliver him into the hands of the Spaniards. But it seems scarcely possible that Somerset should have betrayed agitation at an unfounded report. On a former examination, when, as we learn from Bacon himself, the charge was clearly that of a treasonable correspondence with Spain, Somerset showed no emotion whatever, merely saying that he had been too well rewarded by his majesty ever to think of Spain.—"If he (Prince Henry)," says Lord Dartmouth, in a note to Burnet's "History of his Own Time" (vol. i. p. 11), "was poisoned by the Earl of Somerset, it was not upon the account of religion, but for making love to the Countess of Essex; and that was what the Lord Chief Justice Coke meant, when he said, at the Earl of Somerset's trial, 'God knows what went with the good Prince Henry, but I have heard something.'"

[1] Bacon's Letter to the King in Cabala. In his postscript the wily attorney-general says,—"If it seem good unto your majesty, we think it not amiss some preacher (well chosen) had access to my Lord of Somerset, for his preparing and comfort, although it be before his trial." From the whole tenor of this correspondence there can be no doubt whatever as to the sort of service Bacon would expect from this "well chosen" preacher! Several of the letters about the old favorite are addressed, with slavish and disgusting protestations, to the new minion, Sir George Villiers.

to trial. This language made More quiver and shake; .... "yet away goes More to Greenwich, as late as it was, being twelve at night, and bounces up the back stairs as if mad." The king, who was in bed, on hearing what the lieutenant had to say, fell into a passion of tears, and said, "On my soul, More, I wot not what to do! Thou art a wise man; help me in this great strait, and thou shalt find thou dost it for a thankful master."[1] "Returning to the Tower, the lieutenant told his prisoner that he had been with the king, and found him a most affectionate master unto him, and full of grace in his intentions toward him; but, said he, to satisfy justice, you must appear, although you return instantly again, without any further proceeding, only you shall know your enemies and their malice, though they shall have no power over you. With this trick of wit he allayed his fury, and got him quietly, about eight in the morning, to the hall; yet feared his former bold language might revert again, and, being brought by this trick into the toil, might have more enraged him to fly out into some strange discovery, that he had two servants placed on each side of him, with a cloak on their arms, giving them a peremptory order, if that Somerset did any way fly out on the king, they should instantly hoodwink him with that cloak, take him violently from the bar, and carry him away; for which he would secure them from any danger, and they should not want also a bountiful reward."[1]

[1] Weldon says that Sir George More "was really rewarded with a suit worth to him £1500, although Annandale, his great friend, did cheat him of one half; so there was falsehood in friendship."

Somerset, however, when brought to the bar of the Lords, was in a very composed easy humor, which Bacon took good care not to disturb by any of those invectives that were usually employed against prisoners. He abstained, he said, from such things by the king's order, though of himself he were indisposed to blazon his name in blood.[2] He handled the case most tenderly, never urging the guilt of Somerset without bringing forward the hope or assurance of the royal mercy. But the prisoner, who displayed far more ability than he had ever been supposed to possess, though he abstained from any accusations or outpourings of wrath against James, was not willing to submit to a verdict of guilty, however sure of a pardon. He maintained his innocence, and defended himself so ably that the trial lasted eleven hours. In the end the peers unanimously pronounced him guilty. He then prayed them to be intercessors for him with the king, adding, however, words which meant that he thought that it would hardly be needed. "But who had seen the king's restless motion all that day, sending to every boat he saw landing at the bridge, cursing all that came without tidings, would have easily judged all was not right, and that there had been some grounds for his fears of Somerset's boldness; but at last, one bringing him word he was condemned, and the passages, all was quiet."[1] A few weeks after sentence James granted a pardon to the countess, "because the process and judgment against her were not of a principal, but as of an accessory before the fact." A like pardon was offered to the earl, who said that he, as an innocent and injured man, expected a reversal of the judgment pronounced by the peers. After a few years' imprisonment, Somerset and his lady retired into the country,—there, as it is said, to reproach and hate one another. The king would not permit the earl's arms to be reversed and kicked out of the chapel of Windsor; and upon his account it was ordered "that felony should not be reckoned among the disgraces for those who were to be excluded from the Order of St. George, which was without precedent."[2] Further, to keep the discarded favorite and depositary of royal mysteries from desperation, he was allowed for life the then splendid income of £4000 a-year. Considering the power of money and the baseness of the age, we are inclined to doubt the oratorical accounts of the loneliness and abandonment into which he fell. The countess died in 1632, in the reign of Charles I.; the earl, who survived her thirteen years, will reappear on the scene toward the close of the present reign. Their daughter, an only child, the Lady Anne Carr, who was born in the Tower, was married to William, fifth Earl, and afterward first Duke, of Bedford, by whom she had many children, one of whom was the celebrated Lord Russell, who died on the scaffold in the time of Charles II. She is described as a lady of great honor and virtue: and it is said that her mother's history was so carefully concealed from her that she knew nothing of the story of the divorce of Lady Essex until a year or two before her death.[3] The ill-used Earl of Essex will appear hereafter, and most conspicuously, as the leader of the parliament army against the unfortunate successor of King James.

The Lieutenant of the Tower may have thought of providing the two sentinels and the hood-winking cloaks, but all the rest had certainly been suggested beforehand by Bacon, in a "Particular Remembrance for his Majesty." "It were good," says this miracle of genius and profligacy, "that after he is come into the hall, so that he may perceive he must go to trial, and shall be retired to the place appointed till the court call for him, then the lieutenant shall tell him roundly that if in his speeches he shall tax the king, that the justice of England is that he shall be taken away, and the evidence shall go on without him; and then all the people will cry, 'Away with him!' and then it shall not be in the king's will to save his life, the people will be so set on fire."—State Trials.

It should appear that the services of Bacon in the Overbury and Somerset case secured his triumph over his rival. Coke, however, had long been hated by the king, and in his irritation thereat he took an independent, and what might otherwise have been a patriotic course in administering the law. Hence he incensed James more and more, and involved himself in a quarrel with the old Chancellor Ellesmere, whom Bacon flattered and cajoled in the hope of succeeding to his high office. Many things had made the lord chief justice totter in his seat, but a dispute with Villiers, the new favorite, about a patent place at court, a dispute with the king about bishoprics and commendams, and the ingenious malice of Bacon, who had James's ear, laid him prostrate at last. By the advice of Bacon, he was called before the council: the other judges had all been there before him, to kneel to the king and ask pardon for attempting to act according to law. Bacon, Ellesmere, and Abbot the primate had been employed for some time in collecting charges against him. Coke was accused of concealing a debt of £12,000 due to the crown by the late Chancellor Hatton; of uttering on the bench words of very high contempt, saying that the common law would be overthrown, wherein he reflected upon the king; and, thirdly, of uncivil and indiscreet carriage in the matter of commendams. Coke repelled the charge about the money, and he afterward obtained a legal decision in his favor: without denying his words on the bench, he palliated the second charge; to the third he confessed, and prayed forgiveness. The king ordered him to appear a second time before the council, and then the proud lawyer was brought to his knees to hear the judgment of his royal master, which was, that he should keep away from the council-table, and not go the circuit, but employ himself in correcting the errors in his book of Reports. When Coke reported to the king that he could discover only five unimportant errors in his book, James chose to consider that he was proud and obstinate, and gave the chief justiceship to Montague, the recorder of London. It is said that Coke, on receiving his supersedeas, wept like a child. Bacon not only made merry with the new favorite on his fall, but wrote Coke an insulting and most unmanly letter, made trebly atrocious by an assumption of exceeding great godliness.[1]

Prince Charles, now created Prince of Wales, was in his seventeenth year, and the king had not yet succeeded in negotiating what he considered a suitable marriage for him. The religious feelings of his subjects, both in England and Scotland, were violently opposed to any Catholic match; but James's pride led him to prefer a family alliance with some one of the royal houses in Europe, and of those houses the greatest were all Catholic. Suspecting at last that the court of Spain had no intention to conclude any arrangement with him, he opened negotiations with that of France for the hand of Madame Christine, sister to the young King Louis XIII.; but, notwithstanding an extravagant and pompous embassy, the French court preferred an alliance with the Duke of Savoy. Shortly after the failure of this treaty Concini, Marshal d'Ancre, a Florentine, who had accompanied the queen-mother, Marie de Medici, into France, and who, since the death of Henry IV., had ruled the whole kingdom, was murdered on the drawbridge of the Louvre by Vitry, one of the captains of the body-guard. The deed was done in broad daylight by order of Louis, who had been kept in a state of sub-

[1] Weldon. Old Sir Anthony's pen was no doubt occasionally dipped in gall, but his account of these transactions, which he says he and a friend had from Sir George More's own mouth verbatim in Wanstead Park, after being long ascribed to his libelous spirit and hatred of James, has received the most complete confirmation by some letters from More himself, published in the Archælogia, vol. xviii. When he is found so veracious in one important particular it may be questioned whether Weldon has not been unfairly doubted in others.

jection, and almost of bondage, by his mother's favorite. On the following day the people of Paris raised a cry against the excommunicated Jew and wizard; they dug up his body, which had been hastily buried,—dragged it through the streets,—hung it by the heels on a gibbet on the Pont Neuf.—cut it up,—burned part of it before the statue of Henry IV., and threw the rest into the Seine. The parliament of Paris proceeded against the memory of the deceased favorite, declared him to have been guilty of treason both against God and the king,—condemned his wife to be beheaded, and her body afterward burned,—and declared his son to be ignoble and incapable of holding any property or place in France. In this strange process there was more talk of sorcery and devil-dealing than there had been on the trial of the murderers of Overbury; and it was pretended that monstrous proofs were discovered of the Judaism and magic of the wretched Florentine. As soon as Louis saw Concini fall on the drawbridge, he presented himself at a window, exclaiming, "Praised be the Lord, now I am a king!" and the officers of his guard went through the streets of Paris shouting, "God save the king! The king is king!" James made haste to congratulate his most Christian majesty: and Sir Thomas Edmonds, his special ambassador, was instructed by the king or Villiers, or by both, to pay a high compliment to Vitry, the actual murderer.[1] But France, after all, did not gain much by the change, for Louis soon submitted to a contemptible favorite of his own, the Duke de Luines, who misgoverned the country as much as Concini had done.

In the mean while James's new favorite, Villiers, was becoming far more powerful and mischievous than his predecessor, Somerset. The old Earl of Worcester was made to accept a pension and the honorary office of President of the Council, and to resign his place of Master of the Horse to the minion, who was now Viscount Villiers, and was soon after (on the 5th of January, 1617) created Earl of Buckingham. Bacon, who told the king that he was afraid of nothing but that his excellent servant the new Master of the Horse and he should fall out as to which should hold his majesty's stirrup best, and who, on Villiers's first advancement, had written an elaborate treatise to show him how to demean himself in his post of prime favorite, got some reward at the same time.[2] The old Chancellor Ellesmere, who in moments of sickness had repeatedly complained of his great age, his griefs, and infirmities, of the dullness and heaviness of his sense, and his decaying memory, but who, when the fit was past, had baffled the hopes of the attorney-general and had clung to his place, having been gratified with the title of Viscount Brackley in November, 1616, felt his end approaching in the month of February, formally resigned the seals in March, and died a fortnight after. James gave the seals, with the title of Lord Keeper, to Bacon, who had pledged himself to do the royal will in all things. The great philosopher, now in the fifty-fourth year of his age, was made giddy by his elevation: he rode to Westminster Hall on horseback, in a gown of rich purple satin, between the Lord Treasurer and the Lord Privy Seal, with a splendid escort of lords, courtiers, judges, lawyers, law students, officers, and servants. He seemed inclined to rival the magnificence and finery of Buckingham, and, in the absence of that creature of the court, the fullest-blown fop was at the head of the English law, the restorer of philosophy, the greatest wit, scholar, and scoundrel of his age. Before this, his last and fatal promotion, his income was immense, though apparently inadequate to his lavish expenditure: he came to the seals a needy, greedy man, but in his hopeful eyes there was no end to the wealth which the seals might command.

When James took his leave of his loving subjects of Scotland, he had promised that he would gladden their hearts and eyes with his presence at least once every three years; but fourteen years had elapsed, and he had never been able to recross the Tweed. This was owing to his improvidence and consequent poverty. It would have been too much to expect the poor Scots to pay the expenses of his costly progress. But in the course of the preceding year (1616) he had restored the cautionary towns of Brill, Flushing, and Rammekins to the Dutch for 2,700,000 florins, which was about one third of the debt really owing to him.[1] This Dutch money enabled James to pay off some of his most pressing debts, and to raise on the first blush of his improved credit nearly £100,000 at ten per cent. per annum, for his journey into Scotland. "He begins his journey with the spring, warming the country as he went with the glories of the court; taking such recreations by the way as might best beguile the days, and cut them shorter, but lengthen the nights (contrary to the seasons); for what with hawking, hunting and horse-racing, the days quickly ran away; and the nights, with feasting, masking, and dancing, were the more extended. And the king had fit instruments for these sports about his person, as Sir George Goring, Sir Edward Zouch, Sir John Finnit, and others, that could fit and obtemperate the king's humor; for he loved such representations, and disguises in their maskaradoes, as were witty and sudden; the more ridiculous, the more pleasant. . . . . And his new favorite, being an excellent dancer, brought that pastime into the greater request. . . . . He now reigns sole monarch in the king's affection—every thing he doth is admired for the doer's sake. No man dances better; no man runs or jumps better; and, indeed, he jumped higher than ever Englishman did in so short a time, from a private gentleman to a dukedom. But the king is not well without him—his company is his solace; and the court grandees can not be well but by him; so that all addresses are made to him, either for place or office in court or commonwealth, The bishops' sees did also ebb and flow, from the wane or fullness of his influence upon them."[1] At Berwick the king and his favorite, and his English courtiers and jesters, were met by a numerous deputation of the Scottish nobility, who conducted them by slow stages to Edinburgh—for James loved to stop at every good house or sporting ground that he came nigh. His chief object in visiting Scotland was, however, to effect the complete establishment of the episcopal form of church government, and to assimilate the religious worship of the two countries. Without the least spark of religious zeal or fanaticism, James was most determinately bent on the subversion of the Presbyterian system, the spirit and form of which he detested more than ever, as inimical to his notion of the divine right of kings, and their absolute supremacy over the church as well as state. From the time of his controversy with the English Puritans at Hampton Court, he had been devising how he should fully restore episcopacy in Scotland; and, by means of English money, and the boldness and cunning of his principal minister there, Sir George Hume, afterward Earl of Dunbar, he had made some progress in this direction. The first blow was struck at the general assembly of the Scottish kirk in 1605. This assembly was arbitrarily prorogued by royal authority three times in rapid succession. A number of the clergy met at Aberdeen; their meeting was prohibited, but they proceeded to assert their rights, chose a moderator, fixed an assembly to be held in the course of that year, and then dissolved themselves, in compliance with an order from the privy council. Thirteen of the leading members were forthwith selected for fierce prosecution; and out of this number Welsh, Dury, and four other popular preachers, were convicted by the crown lawyers and a slavish jury of high treason. After a rigorous confinement, sentence of death was commuted into perpetual banishment. These conscientious men, whose fate would excite more sympathy if they had been themselves less intolerant, retired to the Protestant churches in France and Holland, whither they were soon followed by many voluntary exiles, who revered their doctrines, and who were scared by the approaching horns of the mitre. The clergy at home, in spite of an admonition from the court, bewailed in prayer the tribulations of their brethren; and in their sermons boldly announced the impending danger and ruin of the true church of Christ. Soon after the bishops, who had never altogether ceased to exist in name, were reëstablished in authority and in revenue—that is, to the extent of the power of James and his slavish court. These occupants of dilapidated sees, who were ready on all occasions to maintain that it was a part of the royal prerogative to prescribe the religious faith and worship of the people, soon came into conflict with the Presbyterian clergy. Old Andrew Melvil, the successor of John Knox, James Melvil, his nephew, and six others, were summoned up to London, where James disputed with them about doctrine and practice. It is probable that the king did not treat them with more respect than he had treated the Puritans at Hampton Court; and old Melvil was made of firmer materials than those preachers. To the king his behavior was respectful; but when he was interrogated by some Scottish lords he said, indignantly, "I am a free subject of Scotland—a free kingdom, that has laws and privileges of its own. By these I stand. No legal citation has been issued against me, nor are you and I in our own country, where such an inquisition, so oppressive as the present, is condemned by parliament. I am bound by no law to criminate or to furnish accusation against myself. My lords, remember what you are; mean as I am, remember that I am a free-born Scotsman; to be dealt with as you would be dealt with yourselves, according to the laws of the Scottish realm."

Secretary Winwood, writing to Sir Guy Carleton, ambassador in Holland, about this murder and special embassy, says,—"But what opinion soever private particular men, who aim at nothing else but the advancement of their own fortunes, have of this action (the murder of Concini), his majesty is pleased to approve of it, which doth appear not only by the outward demonstration of his exceeding joy and contentment when first he received the news thereof, but also by letters which, with his own hand, he hath written to the French king. . . . Beside, Mr. Controller, who hath charge in all diligence to return into France, hath express order to congratulate with the Marshal de Vitry, for so now he is, that by his hands the king his master was delivered out of captivity."

James, who had only invited them to a free conference, prohibited the return of the Scottish preachers to their own country, and insisted on their attending worship in his royal chapel, where they might hear the preaching of his courtly bishops. This made matters worse. The characters of the bishops most about court were not spotless, and their discourses seemed monstrously slavish to the proud Calvinists: nor did the rites and oblations of the chapel, the gilded altar, the chalices, the tapers, improve in their eyes upon a closer but compulsory acquaintance. Old Andrew Melvil vented his feelings of disgust in a Latin epigram of six lines, in which he set down all these things as relics of the scarlet she-wolf of Rome.[1] The verses were shown to James, who summoned the author before his English privy council, where Andrew was so irritated, that he burst forth into an invective against the whole Anglican church, and pulled or shook what he called the Romish rags of the Archbishop of Canterbury's surplice. For all these offenses, James arbitrarily committed him to the Tower of London, where he lay for four years. He was then liberated at the earnest prayer of the Duke of Bouillon, but only upon condition that he should pass the remainder of his life in some foreign country. The venerable champion of Calvinism, the bosom friend of Theodore Beza, retired to Sedan, and died abroad in 1620. His nephew, James Melvil, was confined for life to Berwick, on the confines of his native country, where he died six years before his uncle. The other six Scottish preachers who had accompanied them to the free conference were banished to separate and remote districts in Scotland. To quiet the murmurs of the Presbyterian clergy,—to win them over to the bishops, whose indefinite powers the king continued to advance,—the Earl of Dunbar employed threats and bribes. Forty thousand marks were distributed among the members of an ecclesiastical convention summoned by royal authority, that met at Linlithgow, at the end of the year 1606, and appointed certain clergymen to be permanent moderators of the presbyteries within which they resided, and the bishops to be ex officio the moderators of the provincial synods. But the great body of the Scottish clergy—a spiritual republic—were incensed at this subversion of equality; they soon resumed their independence in the synods, and set aside the authority of the bishops as perpetual moderators. The synods were then, as seditious bodies, prohibited from assembling. In 1609 the Consistorial Courts, which at the Reformation had been given to civil judges, were restored to the bishops; and the Archbishop of Glasgow was created an extraordinary lord of session, in order to restore a spiritual intermixture to that high court of law, which had originally consisted of an equal number of temporal and spiritual judges. But this latter plan was stopped in the commencement, by the determination of James to establish a separate and paramount court, which, if he was so minded, he might fill entirely with bishops. The High Commission Court—the greatest grievance of the land—existed in England as a part or a result of the king's supremacy over the church; but in Scotland this supremacy had not yet been acknowledged, and no such court could be imposed with any thing like a decent regard to law. Yet notwithstanding this fact, and the violent repugnance of the people, James, in 1610, erected two courts of High Commission—one at St. Andrew's, the other at Glasgow, —more arbitrary, more absolute than the detestable court in London. They had power given to them to receive secret depositions, to cite and examine any individual whatsoever touching his religious opinions or general life and conduct, to excommunicate, imprison, fine, and outlaw. And, as if the Scots did not already sufficiently hate the name of bishop, the archbishops of St. Andrew's and Glasgow, were put at the head of these tyrannical courts, and it was declared that either of these prelates and four assistants should compose a quorum, from whose sentence there was no appeal. Schools and colleges were subjected to their visitation, and they could suspend, deprive, or imprison at discretion any of the clergy who disobeyed their orders. It was soon evident that an expression of this kind must be enforced by troops of horse, as well as by bishops; but the peace-loving king would not see the inevitable result of his system.

An assembly of the kirk was held at Glasgow in June, 1610, for the purpose of confirming the authority of the bishops within their respective dioceses; and partly by the high exercise of authority, partly by a trick which kept away the bolder ministers, and partly by bribery, the primate obtained several important concessions. Then Dunbar, and some of the bishops would have proceeded to the entire suppression of presbyteries; but the more prudent considered such a measure as dangerous or premature, and it was laid aside for the present. The packed clergy, however, solemnly recognized the king's ecclesiastical supremacy, and the right of bishops to ordain and induct to churches. Under the crafty and bold management of the Earl of Dunbar, the Scottish parliament confirmed and enlarged these decisions. Hitherto the Scottish prelates had not been consecrated by the imposition of prelatical hands; but, now, three of their number were summoned up to London to undergo that ceremony, and on their return they imposed their hands on the other Scottish bishops, who were thus presented to the scorning and incredulous people as legitimate successors of the Apostles. These proceedings were soon followed by the death of the Earl of Dunbar, whose place, whether for the king or the bishops, was badly supplied by some of the kinsmen of Carr, earl of Somerset, who misruled Scotland till the downfall of that favorite.

In 1616, the year before James's visit, the Episcopalians and the Presbyterians, seem to have witnessed with equal satisfaction the barbarous execution of one Ogilvy, a Jesuit. Presently after James's arrival, in the month of June, 1617, a parliament assembled to establish, upon an unchangeable basis, the faith, and ceremonies, and discipline of the Scottish church. But by this time sundry of the lords, who were holders of lands which had formerly belonged to the bishoprics, began to be alarmed as to the security of those parts of their property. James disarmed their opposition by inviting these great nobles to a secret conference, wherein it is generally supposed, he addressed himself to their most sensitive feelings, and promised that they should not be disturbed in any of their possessions. Forthwith an act was prepared to declare, "that, in ecclesiastical affairs, whatever should be determined by the king, with the advice of the prelates and a competent number of the clergy, should receive the operation and the force of law." This bill was brought suddenly into parliament, and passed there; and James was on the point of making it law in the Scottish manner, by touching it with the scepter, when the clergy presented to parliament a loud and alarming remonstrance or protest against it. James trembled and hesitated; and, in the end, to save his honor, he pretended that it was idle to give him by statute that which was part of the inherent prerogative of the crown; and the bill was silently withdrawn. Another bill, assigning chapters to the different bishoprics, and regulating the methods to be followed in the election of bishops, appears to have passed without any sturdy opposition either in parliament or out of it. After a very short session parliament was dissolved, and James removed to St. Andrew's, to attend a great meeting of the clergy. There he caused Simpson, Ewart, and Calderwood, distinguished preachers, who had signed the late protest (which they were supposed to have penned), to be brought before the High Commission Court, and convicted of seditious behavior. Simpson and Ewart were suspended and imprisoned; Calderwood, the most learned and most hated or feared of the three, was condemned to exile for life. The people soon began to consider these victims of kingly and prelatical rage as martyrs, and bitterly did they avenge their wrongs on James's successors. But, now, that complacent sovereign proceeded to announce to the clergy assembled at St. Andrew's, how they must forthwith transplant and adopt the ceremonies of the English church. It was his royal will,—1st. That the eucharist should be received in a kneeling, and not in a sitting posture, as hitherto practiced by the Presbyterians. 2dly. That the sacrament should be given to the sick at their own houses, in all cases where there was imminent danger of dissolution. 3dly. That baptism should be administered in private houses in similar cases. 4thly. That the bishops should give confirmation to youths. 5thly. That the festivals of Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, Ascension Day, and Whit Sunday, should be commemorated in Scotland as in England. It was his prerogative as a Christian king to command in these matters,—so he told the clergy,—nor would he regard their disapprobation or remonstrances; but, if they could convince him in fair, theological disputation, then he might withdraw his ordinances. But the Scottish theologians were too wise to gratify the king with the field-day he desired. They knew all about his great victory at Hampton Court, and the result of his free conference with old Andrew Melvil; the fate of their three brethren, Simpson, Ewart, and Calderwood, was appalling; and, so, instead of disputing or opposing the royal will, they fell on their knees and implored him to remit the five articles of the ceremonies to the consideration of a general assembly of the old kirk. James at first turned a deaf ear to their prayer; but he graciously granted it when some minister or ministers assured him that matters would be so managed as to make the general assembly altogether submissive to his will. He, however, insisted on the immediate enforcement of some of the ceremonies at court; and he kept Whitsuntide in the English manner, surrounded by his applauding bishops and courtiers, whose knees and consciences were flexible. And from that time no man was admitted into any office or employment that would not kneel as ordered, and conform in the other particulars. James slowly wended his way back to England in all the pride of victory; but he was followed by the curses of the large majority of his Scottish subjects, who had not forgotten his former solemn pledges to maintain their church and their liberties, and who regarded him as an apostate, a renegade, and a faithless tyrant. And James himself soon found that, instead of finishing, he had but begun the war between episcopacy and presbytery,—a war which was not to be finished by synods and assemblies, but by bullets and broadswords.[1]

During the king's absence in Scotland he had been greatly annoyed by the strict manner in which the Sabbath was kept by the Presbyterians. As he traveled southward he thought over these things, and no doubt talked of them too. In Lancashire, where the Catholics were numerous, and, it was said, increasing in numbers, petitions were presented to him complaining that the strictness of the Puritans in keeping the Sabbath, and putting down all manly exercises and harmless recreations, drove men to popery and the ale-house, where "they censured in their cups, his majesty's proceedings in church and state." Being met by his hounds and hunters, James made his progress through the hunting counties, stopping at Sherwood forest, Needwood, and all the other parks and forests in his way; but when he got to London he did not forget the Presbyterians or Puritans, and their observance of the Lord's Day. Assisted by some of his chaplains and bishops,—many were opposed to the measure on the grounds both of religion and policy,—he prepared and put forth his Book of Sports, pointing out to the people with his usual minuteness what pastimes they might, and indeed ought to use, on Sabbath-days and festivals of the Church,—what running, vaulting, archery, and morrice-dancing, what May-poles, church-ales, and other rejoicings they might indulge in "upon Sundays, after evening prayers ended, and upon holydays." He was also pleased to ordain "that women should have leave to carry rushes to the church, for the decorating of it, according to their old custom." He prohibited, upon Sundays only, all bear and bull baitings, interludes, and bowls; and he barred from the benefit and liberty of the other sports "all such known recusants, either men or women," to quote the words of the declaration, "as will abstain from coming to church or divine service; being therefore unworthy of any lawful recreation after the said service, that will not first come to the church and serve God: prohibiting, in like sort, the said recreations to any that, though conform in religion, are not present in the church at the service of God, before their going to the recreations. His majesty's pleasure likewise is, that they to whom it belongeth in office shall present and sharply punish all such as, in abuse of this his liberty, will use these exercises before the end of all divine services for that day. And he doth likewise straitly command that every person shall resort to his own parish church to hear divine service; and each parish by itself to use the said recreation after divine service: prohibiting likewise any offensive weapons to be carried or used in the same times of recreation. And his pleasure is, that this his declaration shall be published, by order from the bishop of the diocese, through all the parish churches; and that both the judges of the circuits and the justices of the peace shall be informed thereof." It is quite certain that Abbot, the primate, disapproved of the whole measure, and thereby he increased the suspicion which attached to him at court of being a Puritan or precisian himself; and it is said that he positively refused to read the book in his own church of Croydon. But the other bishops were less bold or less convinced that some amusements, after the celebration of divine service, were so heinous; and the Book of Sports seems to have been generally read as appointed.

In many parts of the country, more particularly in the north, the peasantry, tired of the severity and gloom of the puritanic Sabbath, which was that of Moses rather than that of Christ, fell readily into the spirit of the new law, and people again came from church with merry faces, and the village-green again resounded on the Sunday evening with merry voices. But except to the poor laborers in these parts, and to the high-church party, the measure was, in the highest degree, odious; and many people, who were not convinced, perhaps, that the Christian Sunday ought to be kept as the old Jewish Sabbath, refused to be merry and sportful upon compulsion, and thought it absurdly illegal that the king, of his own and sole authority, should issue such an ordinance. "This book," said a sturdy Puritan, "was only a trap to catch conscientious preachers that they could not otherwise, with all their cunning, ensnare; for they would preach the gospel in a fool's coat (as some of them expressed) rather than be silenced for a surplice. And their conjuring of them with the cross in baptism, and the circle of the ring in marriage, could not make a well-composed reason and a sound conscience then start at it; but when so frightful an apparition as the dancing-book appeared, some of the ministers left all for fear, others by force, they were so terrified with it."* If nothing worse, the Book of Sports was a great political blunder, tending to increase ill-will and irritation. But for the present the murmurs of the Puritans were timid and subdued, and the full danger to royalty was not felt till the year 1633, when, by the advice of Laud, Charles I. revived his father's book, and tried to give it the force of law—"out of a like pious care for the service of God, and for suppressing of any humors that oppose truth, and for the ease, comfort, and recreation of his well-deserving people."

In departing from Scotland James had intrusted extraordinary powers to Lord Keeper Bacon, whose head was thereby turned more than ever, and who, during his majesty's absence, conducted himself in such a manner as to give mortal offense to most of the ministers and men of business that were left behind. According to a caustic reporter of his doings, he instantly began to believe himself king, to lie in the king's lodgings, to give audience in the great banqueting-house at Whitehall to ambassadors and others, to make the rest of the council attend his motions with the same state that the king was used to do, and to tell the councilors when they sat with him for the dispatch of business to know their proper distance. "Upon which," continues Weldon, "Secretary Winwood rose, went away, and would never sit more, but instantly dispatched one to the king to desire him to make haste back, for his seat was already usurped; at which, I remember, the king reading it unto us, both the king and we were very merry. . . . In this posture he lived until he heard the king was returning, and began to believe the play was almost at an end, he might personate a king's part no longer, and therefore did again reinvest himself with his old rags of baseness, which were so tattered and poor at the king's coming to Windsor: he attended two days at Buckingham's chamber, being not admitted to any better place than the room where trencher-scrapers and lackeys attended; there, sitting upon an old wooden chest (among such as, for his baseness, were only fit for his companions, although the honor of his place did merit far more respect), with his purse and seal lying by him on that chest.[1] . . . After two days he had admittance: at his first entrance he fell down flat on his face at the duke's (earl's) foot, kissing it, and vowing never to rise till he had his pardon, and then was he again reconciled, and since that time so very a slave to the duke, and all that family, that he durst not deny the command of the meanest of the kindred, nor yet oppose any thing: by which you see a base spirit is ever most concomitant with the proudest mind; and surely never so many brave parts and so base and abject a spirit tenanted together in any one earthen cottage as in this one man." Buckingham, at this reconciliation, told the Lord Keeper that he had been obliged to go down on his own knees to implore the king not to put a public disgrace upon him. But the great offense of Bacon, for which, more than for any thing else he was made to lick the dust at the minion's feet, was his conduct in an affair which closely concerned the "kindred" of the favorite.

Coke, who in many things was not a whit more high-minded than his rival Bacon, perceiving the capital error he had committed in opposing the views of Buckingham, took up, by the advice of Secretary Winwood, a little family project which he thought would restore him to place, and give him again his old superiority over his rival. The ex-Lord Chief Justice of England had a marriageable daughter,—a young lady that was considered a great match,—for Coke had kept his money instead of spending it like Bacon, and his wife, the Lady Hatton, was very wealthy, from the lands and houses which Elizabeth had bestowed on her handsome and dancing chamberlain and chancellor. One of the first uses made by Sir George Villiers of his high favor at court and of the influence of James, who was a prince very prevalent in such matters, was to secure rich wives for his poor brothers and kindred. His elder brother, John Villiers, afterwards created Viscount Purbeck, was proposed as a suitable husband for this young lady; but Coke then, being not sufficiently informed of court news, and not foreseeing the mighty destinies of the new favorite, rejected the proposal. But when he saw himself deprived of office and the favorite in the ascendant, he changed his tone, and before Buckingham's departure with the king for Scotland, he made a secret bargain to give his

* Arthur Wilson. Wilson says that it was some of the bishops that procured the king to put out this book; and that the ministers who would not read it in church to their parishioners, were brought to the High Commission Court, imprisoned, and suspended. The following passage marks the creed of this writer, and the non-episcopal times in which he wrote;—"These, and such like machinations of the bishops, to maintain their temporal greatness, ease, and plenty, made the stones in the wall of their palaces, and the beam in the timber, afterward cry out, molder away, and come to nothing: whereas, if those in most authority had not been so pragmatical, but holy, prudent, and godly men (as some others of the function were), their light might have shined still upon the Mount, and not have gone out, as it did, offensive to the nostrils of the rubbish of the people."

[1] "Myself," says Weldon, "told a servant of my Lord of Buckingham, it was a shame to see the purse and seal of so little value or esteem in his chamber, though the carrier, without it, merited nothing but scorn, being worst among the basest: but he (the servant) told me they had command it must be so."

daughter, and to take place and honors in return. Bacon, a courtier to the backbone, soon discovered this secret compact, which boded him no good; but counting as well on his own great favor with the king as on Coke's disfavor with the favorite and the king, and relying on his own ready wit and talent for intrigue, he fondly fancied that he had conjured down this brewing storm, and made Buckingham and "the kindred" averse to the marriage. At the same time he had spirited on Coke's wife, who was always disposed to act in direct opposition to the wishes of her husband, whom she despised and hated with an intensity rare even in the matrimonial history of those days, to carry off her daughter and lodge her for safety in the house of her friend Sir Edward Withipole, near Oxford, and to conclude a written contract of marriage with Henry de Vere, earl of Oxford, for whom it appears the young lady herself entertained some affection. Coke, in a fury, followed the fugitive, and recovered his daughter by force. As for his wife, he was but too happy to leave her where she was. Upon this the proud widow of Lord Hatton, the granddaughter of the great Burghley, carried her complaints before the privy council, where her ally for the occasion, the Lord Keeper Bacon, charged the disgraced chief justice with a flagrant breach of the peace, and countenanced Yelverton, the new attorney-general, in filing an information in the Star Chamber against Coke. Bacon would not have gone thus far if he had not been convinced that the absent favorite had given up the scheme; but, to be doubly sure, he now wrote two letters to Scotland, one to Buckingham and one to the king. In the first, after treating the renewed scheme for the match between his brother, Sir John Villiers, and the young lady solely as a device of Coke and Winwood, he went on to tell him that many a better match, upon reasonable conditions, might be found; that the mother's consent to it was not had, "nor the young gentlewoman's, who expecteth a great fortune from her mother, which, without her consent, is endangered;" and that this match was altogether very inconvenient, both for his brother and himself. Because, "First, he shall marry into a disgraced house, which in reason of state, is never held good. He shall marry into a troubled house of man and wife, which, in religion and Christian discretion, is disliked." "Your lordship," continues Bacon, "will go near to lose all such your friends as are adverse to Sir Edward Coke (myself only except, who, out of a pure love and thankfulness, shall ever be firm to you). And lastly and chiefly, believe it, it will greatly weaken and distract the king's service; for though, in regard of the king's great wisdom and depth, I am persuaded those things will not follow which they imagine, yet opinion will do a great deal of harm, and cast the king back, and make him relapse into those inconveniences which are now well on to be recovered." Therefore, according to Bacon, his lordship would gain a great deal of honor, if, according to religion and the law of God, he would think no more of this marriage for his elder brother. To the king Bacon begged to state his disinterested opinion in the business of this match, which he took to be magnum in parvo. After saying some bitter things to keep alive James's hatred of the ex-chief justice, he reminded him of his own servility, and how, by God's grace and his majesty's instructions, he had been made a servant according to his heart and hand. If, indeed, it was his majesty's desire that the match should go on, then, upon receiving his express will and commandment from himself, he would conform himself thereunto, imagining, though he would not wager on women's minds, that he could prevail more with the mother of the young lady than any other man. And then, returning to his attack on Coke, he begged the king to observe how much more quietly matters had gone on since that judge and minister had been in disgrace. "Let me most humbly desire your majesty," continued Bacon, "to take into your royal consideration, that the state is at this time not only in good quiet and obedience, but in good affection and disposition: your majesty's prerogative and authority having risen some just degrees above the horizon more than heretofore, which hath dispersed vapors. Your judges are in good temper, your justices of peace (which is the body of the gentlemen of England), grow to be loving and obsequious, and to be weary of the humor of ruffling; all mutinous spirits grow to be a little poor, and to draw in their horns; and not the less for your majesty's disauctorising the man I speak of. Now, then, I reasonably doubt that if there be but an opinion of his coming in with the strength of such an alliance it will give a turn, and relapse in men's minds into the former state of things hardly to be holpen, to the great weakening of your majesty's service. Again, your majesty may have perceived that, as far as it was fit for me in modesty to advise, I was ever for parliament, which seemeth to me to be cardo rerum, or summa summarum for the present occasions. But this, my advice, was ever conditional—that your majesty should go to a parliament with a council united and not distracted; and that your majesty will give me leave never to expect if that man come in. Not for any difference of mine own (for I am omnibus omnia for your majesty's service), but because he is by nature unsociable and by habit popular, and too old to take a new ply. And men begin already to collect, yea, and to conclude, that he that raiseth such a smoke to get in, will set all on fire when he is in."[1] This letter went home to the bosom of James; but Buckingham, who now led him as he chose, was not only fully bent upon the marriage, but was intriguing, by means of which probably both Coke and Bacon were ignorant, to remove the violent objections of Coke's termagant wife. As for the affections of the young lady, they were things too trivial to enter into the consideration of any party. Thus, when the great philosopher brought down his glorious intellect to low cunning and matrimonial court intrigues, notwithstanding his boast of his great experience in the world, he could be outwitted by an ignorant stripling like Buckingham, to whom he had given the power of insulting him and degrading him in his own eyes. Buckingham wrote him a stinging letter, reproaching him with his pride and audacity, and giving him to understand that he who had made him could unmake him at his pleasure. James, taking the cue from his favorite, dispatched an admonitory epistle of awful length, rating and scolding the mighty sage like a schoolboy. Upon this Bacon veered round and went before the wind with an alacrity known only to harlequins or courtiers of the true breed. He stopped proceedings begun against Coke in the Star Chamber; sent for the Attorney-General, and made him know that, since he had heard from court, he was resolved to further the match; sent also for my Lady Hatton and some other special friends, to let them know that they must not hope for his assistance in their disobedience to the young lady's father; wrote to the mother of Buckingham, to offer all his good offices for furthering the marriage; and addressed a humble letter of excuses and protestations to the favorite, telling him that his apprehension that this alliance would go near to lose him his lordship, whom he held so dear, was the only respect particular to himself that had moved him to be as he was, till he had heard his lordship's pleasure. But all this was not enough; and about a month after writing this letter, Buckingham kept him in the hall among trencher-scrapers, and brought him to his feet. After the reconciliation at Windsor he wrote another base letter to thank the minion.[1] The marriage now proceeded apace, the king driving at it as if the safety of the state depended upon its completion. Lady Hatton was confined and interrogated by the council, instead of her husband; and Coke, to use his own expression, "got upon his wings again." The obstinacy of this dame yielded at last to the instances of the king, and the manœuvers of the favorite's mother, by her second marriage Lady Compton, who was all-powerful at court, and who pretended a sudden friendship for her. She made a liberal settlement out of her own property upon her daughter; and in the month of September that unwilling fair one was dragged to the altar, in the Chapel Royal at Hampton Court, to marry a sickly idiot. A splendid feast, enlightened by the presence of royalty, was given soon after at Lady Hatton's house in Holborn; and to make it more absolutely her own, express orders were given by her ladyship, as was reported, that neither Sir Edward Coke nor any of his servants should be admitted.[2] The union, as might be expected, turned out a most wretched one; and this appears to have been the case with nearly all the matches promoted by James, who, in the matter of number, was one of the greatest of match-makers. The daughter of Coke became a profligate and an adulteress;[1] and the crazy Sir John Villiers, created Viscount Purbeck about a year and a half after his marriage, became so mad that it was necessary to place him in confinement. His brother, Buckingham, took charge of the property his young wife had brought him, and kept it, or spent it upon himself.[2] But, after all, the selfish father of the victim,—the great lawyer,—was juggled by Buckingham and that courtly crew. As soon as the favorite saw the marriage completed and the dower safe, he felt a natural repugnance to risking favor by urging the suit of a bold-spoken, obnoxious man. Bacon, again in cordial alliance with Lady Hatton, who was most conjugally disposed to thwart and spite her husband in all things, administered daily to the king's antipathies; and all that Coke got by sacrificing his poor child, was his restoration to a seat at the council-table,—a place where he was no match for his rival.

A.D. 1618. On the 4th of January the supple Lord Keeper was converted into Lord High Chancellor, and in the month of July following he was created Baron Verulam. "And now Buckingham, having the Chancellor or Treasurer, and all great officers his very slaves, swells in the height of pride, and summons up all his country kindred, the old countess providing a place for them to learn to carry themselves in a court-like garb." Rich heiresses, or daughters of noblemen, were soon provided as wives for his brothers, half-brothers, and cousins of the male gender. "And then must the women kindred be married to earls' eldest sons, barons, or chief gentlemen of greatest estates; insomuch that his very female kindred were so numerous as sufficient to have peopled any plantation. . . . So that King James, that naturally, in former times, hated women, had his lodgings replenished with them,

[1] This is the epistle:—"My ever best lord, none better than yourself; your lordship's pen, or rather pencil, hath portrayed toward me such magnanimity, and nobleness, and true kindness, as methinketh I see the image of some ancient virtue, and not any thing of these times. It is the line of my life, and not the lines of my letter, that must express my thankfulness; wherein, if I fail, then God fail me, and make me as miserable as I think myself at this time happy by this reviver, through his majesty's singular clemency and your incomparable love and favor."

[2] Strafford Papers. It is said that Coke, on the day of this great feast, dined among the lawyers at the Temple.

[1] Mr. D'Israeli (Curiosities of Literature) says that Coke's daughter, Lady Purbeck, was condemned, as a wanton, to stand in a white sheet; but he does not give his authority for this assertion, which seems to be contradicted by published letters of the time.

[2] In a letter in the Cabala, without date, we find Lady Purbeck complaining most piteously to the Duke of Buckingham of being kept from her husband (which was certainly no hardship), and deprived of her property. She says, that if he will give her husband her company, which she desires above all things, she will, notwithstanding his sickness, bear with him, and give what comfort she can to his afflicted mind. "But," she adds, "if you can so far dispense with the laws of God as to keep me from my husband, yet aggravate it not by restraining from me his means, and all other contentments; but, which, I think, is rather the part of a Christian, you especially ought much rather to study comforts for me, than add ills to ills, since it is the marriage of your brother makes me thus miserable. For if you please but to consider, not only the lamentable state I am in, deprived of all comforts of a husband, and having no means to live of, beside falling from the hopes my fortune then did promise me; for you know very well I came no beggar to you, though I am like so to be turned off. For your own honor and conscience sake take some course to give me satisfaction, to tie my tongue from crying to God and the world for vengeance for the unworthy dealing I have received. And think not to send me again to my mother's, where I have stayed this quarter of a year, hoping (for that my mother said you promised) order should be taken for me, but I never received penny from you. Her confidence of your nobleness made me so long silent; but now, believe me, I will sooner beg my bread in the streets to all your dishonors, than any more trouble my friends." In the same letter she says that she has, with too much credulity, waited the performance of Buckingham's fair promises "almost these five years." In is necessary to take a glance at details like these, in order to have a notion of the wretched private history which forms so large a part of the history of James's reign.

and all of the kindred; . . . and little children did run up and down the king's lodgings like little rabbits started about their burrows. Here was a strange change! that the king, who formerly would not endure his queen and children in his lodgings, now you would have judged that none but women frequented them. Nay, this was not all; but the kindred had all the houses about Whitehall, as if bulwarks and flankers to that citadel."[1]

People now looked back with regret to the days of Somerset, for that favorite had some decency, some moderation; and, if he trafficked in places and honors, he trafficked alone. But "the kindred," one and all, engaged in this lucrative business. The greatest trafficker, or most active broker, in the market, was the Old Countess, as Buckingham's mother, though not an old but very beautiful woman —and infamous as beautiful—was commonly called.[2] She sold peerages and took money for all kinds of honors and promotions, whether in the army, navy, courts of law, or the church. There were plenty of purchasers not over-scrupulous as to the purity of the sources whence they derived their honors or titles; but, in some cases, wealthy men were forced into the market against their inclination, and made to pay for distinctions which they were wise enough not to covet. Thus one Richard Robartes, a rich merchant of Truro in the county of Cornwall, was compelled to accept the title of Baron Robartes of Truro, and to pay £10,000 for it.[3] The titles that were not sold were given out of family considerations: one of the favorite's brothers, as already mentioned, was made Viscount Purbeck, another Earl of Anglesey; Fielding, who married the favorite's sister, was made Earl of Denbigh, and Fielding's brother Earl of Desmond in Ireland. Cranfield also "mounted to be Earl of Middlesex, from marrying one of Buckingham's kindred."[4] James, in one of his lengthy speeches delivered in the Star Chamber in 1616, complained that churchmen were had in too much contempt by people of all degrees, from the highest to the lowest, and yet, notwithstanding the sharp criticisms of the Puritans, who were every day finding more reasons for reviling the whole hierarchy, he permitted his minion and "the kindred" to hold all the keys to church promotion, and to sell every turn of them to the highest bidder, or to give them as rewards to their companions and creatures. Williams, dean of Westminster, a "secret friend" of the Old Countess, whom at one time it was said he was to marry, retained the rectories of Dinam, Waldgrave, Grafton, and Peterborough, and was also chanter of Lincoln, prebendary of Asgarbie, prebendary of Nonnington, and residentiary of Lincoln.[1] And when Williams, failing in his scheme to get the bishopric of London, was advanced to the see of Lincoln, he retained the deanery of Westminster and all his other preferments; so that, as Heylin says, he was a perfect diocese within himself, being bishop, dean, prebendary, residentiary, and parson; and all these at once! This Williams was an accomplished courtier and man of business, and paid for his promotions in services to Buckingham. But Martin Fotherby, of Salisbury, paid in cash £3500 for his bishopric. And when men could not pay in ready money, they contracted to pay by instalments out of their revenues when they should be put in possession of the good things of the church. "There were books of rates on all offices, bishoprics, and deaneries in England, that could tell you what fines, what pensions were to pay."[2]

In the course of this year, the favorite was created a marquis, and as he expressed a desire for the post of Lord High Admiral, the brave old Howard, earl of Nottingham, the commander-in-chief of the fleets that had scattered the Spanish Armada in 1588, was obliged to accept a pension, and make room for the Master of the Horse, who was entirely ignorant of ships and sea affairs. To all these high offices were subsequently added those of Warden of the Cinque Ports, Chief Justice in Eyre of all the parks and forests south of Trent, Master of the King's Bench-office, High Steward of Westminster, and Constable of Windsor Castle. The doting, gloating king had taught Somerset Latin; Buckingham he attempted to teach divinity and prayer-writing, and these exercises appear prominently in a correspondence, for the most part too gross for quotation, wherein the favorite calls the king "dear dad and gossip," or "your sow-ship," and the king calls the favorite "Steenie."

Never before was there such a mixture of finery and effeminacy as in the person of this minion. As dancing was the thing he could do best, he made the court almost a constant scene of balls and masks. "It was common for him at an ordinary dancing to have his clothes trimmed with great diamond buttons, and to have diamond hat-bands, cockades, and earrings; to be yoked with great and manifold ropes and knots of pearl; in short, to be manacled, fettered, and imprisoned in jewels." This year Buckingham attacked the Earl of Suffolk, lord treasurer, and father-in-law of the disgraced Somerset—all the rest of that party had long since been dismissed the court—and that noble Howard was now charged with peculation and corruption, particularly with reference to the money paid by the Dutch for the recovery of the cautionary towns, a business in which, as we have already stated, all the public men had taken bribes. Suffolk and his wife were both thrown into the Tower, and the ingenuity of Bacon and of commissioners appointed by him, was employed in making out a strong case of embezzlement against the treasurer. The earl wrote to the king, imploring him by his former services, by his majesty's sweet and princely disposition, and by that unmatchable judgment which the world knew his majesty possessed, to pardon his weakness and errors—guilt he would never confess—and telling him that, instead of being enriched by the places he had held, he was little less than £40,000 in debt.[1] The name of this Howard was rather popular, for he had fought bravely at sea in the time of Elizabeth, and James was half inclined to stop proceedings against him: but Buckingham was of a different mind, and the earl and countess were brought up to the Star Chamber. There Coke, who hoped to fight his way back to favor by some of his old sharp practices, charged the prisoners on one side, while Bacon, who spoke like an Aristides, assailed them on the other. The venal and corrupt chancellor was eloquent in exposing the shameful vice of corruption. The countess, he said, was like unto an exchange woman, who kept her shop, while Sir John Bingley, her husband's chief officer in the Treasury, went about crying, "What d'ye lack?" Suffolk, disregarding a hint to plead guilty and make sure of the royal pardon, stood upon his innocence, and it was the general opinion that, as compared with his wife, he was innocent. But the Star Chamber sentenced them to pay a fine of £30,000, and sent them both to the Tower. After some time, however, the fine was reduced to £7000, which was "clutched up by Ramsay Earl of Haddington," and the Count and Countess of Suffolk recovered their liberty. The post of lord treasurer was sold to Sir Henry Montague, chief-justice of the King's Bench, for a large sum; but in less than a year it was taken from him and bestowed on Cranfield, afterward Earl of Middlesex, who had married one of "the kindred."

[3] All the titles of that date, borne by the Spensers, the Fanes, the Petres, the Arundels, the Sackvilles, the Cavendishes, the Montagues, &c., were purchased à poids d'or, except those that were granted to the vilest favoritism. This practice also continued through the reign of Charles I., and was even more publicly acted upon as the necessities of the king and his courtiers rendered the sums of money so obtained the more necessary to them. Among the noble families who appear to owe their honors to these causes, may be mentioned the Stanhopes, Tuftons, and many others.—Remarks on the Origin of the Families and Honors of the British Peerage, by the late Lord Dover.

To the disgusting trial of Lady Roos and Lady Lake, we shall do little more than refer. It was a case involving accusations of double adultery, incest, and obscene mysteries, and as such it was calculated to take hold on the prurient fancy of James. But the characteristic incident was this: a servant wench swore to certain particulars which she had seen and heard from behind the hangings of a room. His majesty posted down to the house in question—it was at Wimbleton—placed himself behind the hangings, and made some of his courtiers walk and talk in the room, and thus he practically arrived at the conclusion that the wench could not have seen and heard from behind that hanging the thing she had sworn to. Nay, he even ascertained that, if Sally Swarton had stood behind the said hangings, her legs must have been seen by any one within the apartment, because the hangings were too short, and did not reach the floor. Swollen with these important discoveries, he took his seat behind the judges in the Star Chamber, and directed their proceedings, which ended in sending the servant girl to be whipped at a cart's tail, and sentencing Lady Lake, or rather her husband, who had positively nothing to do with the business, to the payment of fines and damages to the enormous amount of £15,000.

But this same year witnessed a far more memorable proceeding—one which, while it blackened for all ages the name of James, has perhaps brightened beyond their deserts the fame and character of the illustrious victim. Sir Walter Raleigh, it will be remembered, after receiving sentence of death at Winchester, was immured in the Tower of London. In that dismal state prison he found several men fit to be his mates, and these were increased year after year by the absurd tyranny of the court, until it seemed almost to be James's intention to shut up all the genius, taste, and enterprise of England in that great cage. Henry Percy, the accomplished and munificent earl of Northumberland, the friend of science and scientific men, the enthusiastic promoter of natural and experimental philosophy, the favorer of all good learning; and Serjeant Hoskins, the scholar, poet, wit, and critic, the admired of Camden, Selden, Daniel, the friend and polisher of Ben Jonson, were among the distinguished comates of Raleigh; and these men constantly attracted to the Tower some of the most intellectual of their cotemporaries, who enlivened their captivity with learned and pleasant discourse. Thomas Hariot, the astronomer, the algebraist, the traveler, who had been mathematical tutor to Raleigh, and his companion, at a later period, in his voyage to Virginia; Doctor Robert Burchill, the learned Grecian and Hebrew scholar, a distinguished Latin poet and commentator of the Scriptures, were frequent visitors at different times. Northumberland served as a center for these wits, and his purse appears to have been always open to such as were in need, whether prisoners or free. For some time Raleigh did not require pecuniary assistance, for, though his movable estate was forfeited by his attainder, it was consigned to trustees appointed by himself for the benefit of his family and creditors, and his principal estate and castle of Sherborne in Dorsetshire, which his taste and unsparing outlay of money in his prosperous days "had beautified with orchards, gardens, and groves of much variety and great delight," had been cautiously conveyed to his eldest son some time before the death of Elizabeth and the beginning of his troubles. But some sharp eye, in looking for prey, discovered that there was a legal flaw in the deed of conveyance, and the chief-justice, Popham, Raleigh's personal enemy, and the same that had sat on his trial, decided that, from the omission of some technicality, the deed was altogether invalid. No doubt the chief-justice knew beforehand that the king wanted the property for his minion Robert Carr, who was just then commencing his career at court, and who forthwith got from James a grant of the land and castle. From his prison Raleigh wrote to the young favorite, telling him that, if the inheritance of his children were thus taken from them for want of a word, there would remain to him but the name of life. Some of the expressions in this letter are exceedingly affecting; but, in reading them, we can not but remember that Raleigh himself, at his own dawn, had greedily grasped at the possessions of the fatherless—that he himself had got from Elizabeth a grant of the lands of Anthony Babington, leaving the young and innocent widow and children to beggary.[1] The letter to the favorite produced no effect. Then the prisoner's wife, the devoted and spirited Lady Raleigh, got access to the king, and, throwing herself on her knees, with her children kneeling with her, implored him to spare the remnant of their fortunes. James's only reply was, "I maun ha' the land—I maun ha' it for Carr;" and the minion had it accordingly. From this time it is probable that the hospitable table kept by the Earl of Northumberland was of consequence to Raleigh on other grounds than those of society and conversation. This extraordinary man had always had a determined turn to letters and the sciences; in the bustle of the camp, in the court, in the discomforts of the sea, he had snatched hours for intense studies, which had embraced the wide range of poetry, history, law, divinity, astronomy, chemistry, and other sciences. In the Tower, the quiet of the place, the necessity his restless mind felt for employment and excitement, and the tastes of his fellow-prisoners and visitors, all led him to an increased devotion to these absorbing pursuits. If he was a rarely-accomplished man when he entered his prison-house, the thirteen years he passed there in this kind of life were likely to qualify him for great literary undertakings. During one part of his confinement he devoted a great deal of his time to chemistry,[1] not without the usual leaning to alchemy, and an indefinite hope of discovering the philosopher's stone—a dream which was fully indulged in by his friend Northumberland, and which was no stranger to Bacon himself. Raleigh fancied that he had discovered an elixir, or grand cordial of sovereign remedy in all diseases, a sort of panacea. On one occasion, when the queen was very ill, she took his draught, and experienced or fancied immediate relief. Prince Henry, who had always taken a lively interest in his fate, and for whom Raleigh had written some admirable treatises in the Tower, joined his grateful mother in petitions for his liberation; but without avail. Indeed it may be doubted whether the prince's enthusiastic admiration of the captive was not of prejudice to him in the eyes of James. For the instruction of the young prince, Raleigh commenced his famous History of the World—a work, as far as it goes, of uncommon learning and genius, and altogether extraordinary if we consider the time, the trying circumstances under which it was written, and the previous busy life of the author. The first part was finished in 1612.[1] Shortly after young Henry died; and then, though (to use his own expression) he had "hewn out" the second and third parts, he had not heart to finish them.[2] The portion of the History of the World which we possess, is so full of classical and other learning, that attempts have been made to deprive him of the honor of the authorship, but with singularly bad success. In 1614 the revolutions at court had thrown Somerset into disgrace, and brought Buckingham into favor. Raleigh built new hopes on the change, and instantly became a suitor to George Villiers. But he and his friends had never ceased their endeavors at court, and before this time Sir Walter had proposed to Secretary Winwood a scheme which, he fancied, must excite the king's cupidity, and lead to his immediate release. In the year 1595, Raleigh, in the course of one of his adventurous voyages, had visited Guiana in South America, the fabled El Dorado, or Land of Gold, which, though discovered by the Spaniards, had not been conquered or settled. The capital city of Manoa, which had been described by Spanish writers as one vast palace of Aladdin—a congeries of precious stones and precious metals—eluded his pursuit; but he found the country to be fertile and beautiful, and he discovered at an accessible point, not far from the banks of the mighty Oronoco, some signs of a gold mine. He now proposed to Secretary Winwood an expedition to secure and work that virgin mine, which he was confident would yield exhaustless treasures. The ships necessary, their equipment, and all expenses, he undertook to provide by himself and his friends: he asked nothing from the king, who was to have one fifth of the gold, but his liberty and an ample commission. Winwood, though a practiced and cautious man of business, was captivated by the project—it is possible that the empty state of the treasury made him grasp eagerly at even a desperate hope—and he recommended it to the king as a promising speculation. James, who was almost pennyless, entered into it at first with more eagerness than the secretary; but, on reflection, he fancied that the enterprise might involve him in a war with Spain, which still pretended its exclusive right, by papal bull, to all those regions; and war was James's horror. Still, however, his increasing wants made him often dream of El Dorado, and he began to talk about Raleigh as a brave and skillful man. Some noble friends of the captive took advantage of this frame of mind; but nothing was now to be done at court without conciliating "the kindred;" and it was a sum of

"A grant of Anthony Babington to Sir Walter Raleigh."

The touching expressions of Raleigh's letter to Carr are these:—

"And for yourself, sir, seeing your fair day is now in the dawn, and mine drawn to the evening, your own virtues and the king's grace assuring you of many favors and of much honor, I beseech you not to begin your first building upon the ruins of the innocent, and that their sorrows with mine may not attend your first plantation. . . . I therefore trust, sir, that you will not be the first who shall kill us outright, cut down the tree with the fruit, and undergo the curse of them that enter the fields of the fatherless; which, if it pleases you to know the truth, is far less in value than in fame."—*Scrin. [2] The Lieutenant of the Tower, at the time, was the father of the famous Mrs. Hutchinson, Sir Allen Apsley—"a father to all his prisoners." Mrs. Hutchinson says, "Sir Walter Raleigh and Mr. Ruthin, being prisoners in the Tower, and addicting themselves to chemistry, she (my mother) suffered them to make their rare experiments at her cost, partly to comfort and divert the poor prisoners, and partly to gain the knowledge of their experiments, and the medicines to help such poor people as were not able to seek physicians."—Fragment of Autobiography prefixed to her Life of her husband Colonel Hutchinson, Governor of Nottingham Castle, &c.

£1500 paid to Sir William St. John and Sir Edward Villiers, uncles of the favorite, that undid the gates of the Tower. Raleigh walked forth in the beginning of March, leaving behind him, in that fortress, the fallen Robert Carr, earl of Somerset, who, in the following month, was brought to his trial for the murder of Overbury. The contrast of circumstances was dramatic, and Raleigh had the folly to liken himself to Mordecai, Somerset to Haman—a comparison that did him no good with the king. But, though admitted to liberty, Sir Walter as yet had no pardon; and to obtain one, and to restore his shattered fortune, to indulge again in his favorite pursuits, his romantic adventures, he labored heart and soul to remove the king's objections to his great project. James had a hard struggle between his timidity and his cupidity: he longed for the gold as the traveler in the desert longs for water, but still he dreaded the Spaniards, the dragons of the mine. His indecision was increased when, by his indiscreet gossiping, the project became known to the Spanish ambassador. Count Gondomar was a very accomplished diplomatist, the best that could possibly have been found for such a court as that of James. "He had as free access to the king as any courtier of them all, Buckingham only excepted, and the king took delight to talk with him, for he was full of conceits, and would speak false Latin a purpose, in his merry fits, to please the king; telling the king plainly, 'You speak Latin like a pedant, but I speak it like a gentleman.'"[1] While he could drink wine with his majesty and the men, he could win the ladies of the court by his gallantry and liberality; and it is said that, in that sink of dishonor and immorality, he intrigued with some of the highest dames, and bribed some of the proudest nobles. If the indiscretion of the king over his cups were not enough, he had plenty of other keys to the secrets of government. According to James's own declaration, Gondomar "took great alarm, and made vehement assertions, in repeated audiences, that he had discovered the objects of the expedition to be hostile and piratical, tending to a breach of the late peace between the two crowns."[2] Raleigh drew up a memorial, stating that he intended to sail not for any Spanish possession, but for a country over which England could claim a right both by priority of discovery and by the consent of the natives; that there would be no hostile collision with the Spaniards; and that the arms and soldiers he took with him would be solely for self-defense. According to James, the ambassador then seemed to be satisfied, observing to Secretary Winwood, that if Raleigh only meant to make a peaceful settlement, Spain would offer no resistance. Thereupon the energetic adventurer pressed the preparations for his expedition, and his reputation and merit "brought many gentlemen of quality to venture their estates and persons upon the design." Sir Walter obtained from the Countess of Bedford £8000 which were owing to him, and Lady Raleigh sold her estate of Mitcham for £2500; all of which money he embarked in the adventure. Having obtained ample information as to the course he intended to pursue, and securities, in persons of wealth and rank, for his good behaviour and return, James granted his commission under the privy seal, constituting Raleigh general and commander-in-chief of the expedition, and governor of the colony which he was about to found. On the 28th of March, 1617, he set sail with a fleet of fourteen vessels. The "Destiny," in which he hoisted his flag, carried thirty-six pieces of ordnance, and had on board two hundred men, including sixty gentlemen, many of whom were his own or his wife's relations. The voyage began inauspiciously; the ships were driven by a storm into the Cove of Cork, where they lay till the month of August. They did not reach the Cape de Verd Islands before October, and it was the 13th of November when they "recovered the land of Guiana." During the long rough voyage, disease had broken out among the sailors; forty-two men died on board the admiral's ship alone, and Raleigh suffered the most violent calenture that ever man did and lived. But he wrote to his wife "We are still strong enough, I hope, to perform what we have undertaken, if the diligent care at London to make our strength known to the Spanish king by his ambassador have not taught that monarch to fortify all the entrances against us." He was received by his old friends, the Indians on the coast, with enthusiasm;[1] but he soon learned that the Spaniards were up the country, and prepared to dispute with him the possession of it. Being himself so reduced by sickness as to be unable to walk, he sent Captain Keymis up the river Oronoco with five of the ships, and took up his station with the rest at the island of Trinidad, close to the mouths of that river. He had been given to understand that a Spanish fleet was in the neighborhood; and it is quite certain that he intended not only to fight it if challenged, but also to fight in order to prevent it following Keymis up the river. This brave captain, who had been for many years devoted to Raleigh, and had suffered many troubles on his account, had explored the country where the mine was situated in 1595, and he was now ordered to make direct for the mine, "the star that directed them thither." If he found it rich and royal he was to establish himself at it; if poor and unpromising, he was to bring away with him a basket or two of ore, to convince the king that the design was not altogether visionary. Keymis began sailing up the river on the 10th of December. If we are to believe the English accounts, the Spaniards began the war, and shot at the ships both with their ordnance and muskets, which they were very likely to do, even without a reference to the exclusive pretension of sovereignty, from the recollection of the mode in which the great Drake and other English commanders had behaved, and that too when, as now, there was no declaration of war between England and Spain.[1] Keymis soon arrived off the town of St. Thomas, which the Spaniards had recently built on the right bank of the river; and he landed and took up a position between that town and the mine. It is said that he had no intention of attacking the place—we confess that, from a consideration of the circumstances, we doubt the assertion—and that the Spaniards broke in upon him by surprise, in the middle of the night, and butchered many of his people in their sleep. In the morning the English assaulted the town and forced their way into it. The fight was desperate: on one side the governor, who was a near relation of the ambassador Gondomar, was slain; on the other the brave young Captain Walter Raleigh, the general's eldest son. This young Walter was the true son of his father; he cut down one of the chief officers of the Spaniards, and was cut down himself in the act of charging at the head of his own company of pikemen. His death infuriated the English, who loved him dearly; and, after much bloodshed, they set fire to the houses. All the Spaniards that escaped retired to strong positions among the hills and woods, to guard, as Raleigh said, the approaches to some mines they had found in the neighborhood of St. Thomas. We cannot help suspecting that the adventurers expected to find and secure some rich prize, like what had been pounced upon by the Drakes and Hawkinses, but all they really found in the captured and destroyed town of St. Thomas were two ingots of gold and four empty refining-houses. They immediately showed their disappointment and discontent, became mutinous and dangerous, and Keymis, oppressed with grief for the loss of young Raleigh, and confounded by their clamors and conflicting projects, appears to have lost his head. He however led them some way higher up the river; but, on receiving a volley from a body of Spaniards lying in ambush, which killed two and wounded six of his men, he retreated and made all haste to join his chief. Their meeting was dreadful: Raleigh, in anguish and despair, accused Keymis of having undone him, and ruined his credit for ever. The poor captain answered, that when his son was lost, and he reflected that he had left the general himself so weak that he scarcely thought to find him alive, he had no reason to enrich a company of rascals, who, after his son's death, made no account of him. He further urged, that he had hardly force sufficient to defend the town of St. Thomas, which they had taken, and therefore, for them to pass through thick woods it was impossible, and more impossible to have victuals brought them into the mountains. Raleigh, in the utter anguish of his soul, repeated his charges. Keymis drew up a defense of his conduct in a letter to the Earl of Arundel, which he requested his commander to approve of; but, though some days had been allowed to elapse, Raleigh was not yet in a humor to be merciful to the brave friend of many years. He refused to sign the letter; he vented reproaches of cowardice or incapacity; and then Keymis retiring to his cabin, which he had in the general's ship, put an end to his existence with a pistol and a knife.[1] All now was horror, confusion, and mutiny in the fleet. Captain Whitney, for whom Raleigh said he had sold all his plate at Plymouth, and in whom he reposed "more credit and countenance" than in all the other captains, took off his ship, and sailed for England, and Captain Woolaston went with him. Others followed—"a rabble of idle rascals,"—and Sir Walter was soon left with only five ships. But the men that remained were, for the most part, dashing, daring sailors, or desperate adventurers; and these men would have wished Raleigh to take a leaf or two out of the book of the lives of some of his predecessors (men honored above all naval heroes in the annals of their country); and, though Raleigh rejected their plans of plunder, it appears to have been after a struggle with the overwhelming feeling of his utter desperation. With his "brains broken,"[2] he sailed down the North American coast to Newfoundland, where he refitted his ships. When they were fit for sea, a fresh mutiny broke out, and Raleigh avowedly kept them together by holding out the hope of intercepting the treasure galleons. What followed at sea is open to much doubt; but, in the month of June, 1618, Sir Walter came to anchor at Plymouth, where he was welcomed by the intelligence that there was a royal proclamation against him. Gondomar, who had received intelligence of all that had passed on the Oronoco, and of the death of his kinsman, had rushed into the royal presence, crying, "Pirates! pirates!" and had so worked upon James that the worst possible view of Raleigh's case was instantly adopted at the English court, and a proclamation was published, accusing him of scandalous outrages in infringing the royal commission, and inviting all who could give information to repair to the privy council, in order that he might be brought to punishment; and, a few days after Raleigh's arrival, Buckingham wrote a most humble letter to the Spanish ambassador, informing him that they had got the offender safe, and had seized his ships and other property; that King James held himself more aggrieved by the proceedings than King Philip could do; that all kinds of property belonging to the subjects of the king of Spain, should forthwith be placed at his disposal; and that, though the offenders could not be put to death without process of law, the king of England promised that a brief and summary course should be taken with them, and that he would be as severe in punishing them as if they had done the like spoil in an English town. As if this were not enough, Buckingham concluded by saying that the king, his master, would punctually perform his promise by sending the offenders to be punished in Spain, unless the king of Spain should think it more satisfactory and exemplary that they should receive the reward of their crimes in England: and he requested the ambassador to send an express messenger into Spain, because the king his master would not have the vindication of his affection to the king of Spain, or his sincere desire to do justice, long suspended. This warmth of affection arose out of James's belief that Philip was now quite ready to bestow the Infanta, with a large sum of ready money, upon Prince Charles.

[1] It was an axiom with sailors long before and long after this voyage of Raleigh, that the treaties of Europe did not extend across the ocean—that there was "no peace beyond the Line."

[1] "I rejected all these his arguments, and told him that I must leave it to himself to answer it to the king and state. He shut himself into his cabin, and shot himself with a pocket-pistol, which brake one of his ribs; and finding that he had not prevailed, he thrust a long knife under his short ribs up to the handle, and died."—Raleigh's letter to his wife.

The thirst of the Spaniards for Raleigh's blood was provoked by many causes beside the burning of the little town of St. Thomas. He was hated and feared as the ablest commander England possessed, and one whose place it was thought would not soon be supplied. It was remembered how he had butchered the Spaniards in the surrendered fort on the coast of Ireland, and the feeble garrison on the coast of Guiana, at the time of his first voyage thither in 1595. There were other bitter recollections of his exploits with Essex among the Azores and the Canary Islands, and Gondomar was eager to avenge the death of his kinsman. Sir Walter was fully aware of his danger; his sailors had told him that if he returned to England he would be undone; but, according to the testimony of his younger son Carew, given many years after his father's death, the earls of Pembroke and Arundel had become bound for his return, and he had therefore come to discharge his friends from their heavy engagement, and to save them from trouble on his account. Upon landing at Plymouth, he was arrested by Sir Lewis Stukely, vice-admiral of Dover, and his own near relation, who took him to the house of Sir Christopher Harris, not far from the sea-port, where he remained more than a week. As he had returned and delivered himself up, Pembroke and Arundel were released from their bond, and Sir Walter now attempted to escape to France, but he failed through his indecision, or—which is more probable—through the faithlessness of his agents and the vigilance of Stukeley.

When he was carried forward from the coast to be lodged again in the Tower, Sir Walter feigned to be sick, to have the plague, to be mad; and if what is related of him be true, which we doubt, never did man play wilder or sadder pranks to save his life. Having gained a little wretched time and the king's permission to remain a few days at his own house in London before being locked up, he sent forward Captain King, one of his old officers and friends, to secure a bark for him in the Thames, in which he might yet escape to the continent. He then followed slowly to the capital, giving a rich diamond to his loving kinsman Stukely, and some money to one Manourie, a Frenchman, Stukely's servant, who both took the bribes, and promised to connive at his escape. On reaching London, his faithful friend, Captain King, informed him that he had a bark waiting near Tilbury Fort; and on the same evening Le Clerc, the French chargé d'affaires, sought him out privately, and gave him a safe conduct to the Governor of Calais, with letters of recommendation to other gentlemen in France. On the following morning, as he was descending the Thames, he was basely betrayed by Stukeley, who, to the last moment, pretended that he was assisting him through the toils.[1] He was brought back to London, and securely lodged in that wretched prison where he had already spent so many years, and where he was soon subjected to frequent examination by a commission composed of the Archbishop of Canterbury (Abbot), Lord Chancellor Bacon, Sir Edward Coke, his old and fierce antagonist, and some other members of the privy council. He was charged, first, with having fraudulently pretended that his expedition was to discover a mine, while his real object was to recover his liberty, and commence pirate; secondly, that he intended to excite a war with Spain; thirdly, that he barbarously abandoned his ships' companies, and exposed them unnecessarily to extreme danger; fourthly, that he had spoken disrespectfully of the king's majesty; that he had imposed upon the king by feigning sickness and madness; and lastly, had attempted to escape in contempt of his authority. Raleigh calmly replied that his sincerity as to the gold mine was proved by his taking out refiners and tools, at his own expense, "of not less than £2000;" that the affair of St. Thomas was contrary to his orders; that he never abandoned his men, or exposed them to more danger than he underwent himself; and that all that he had said of the king was, that he was undone by the confidence he had placed in his majesty, and that he knew his life would be sacrificed to state purposes. As to his feigning sickness and attempting to escape, it was true, but natural and justifiable. As the commissioners could gain no advantage over him in these interrogatories, it was resolved to place a familiar or spy over him who might ensnare him into admission and dangerous correspondence. The person chosen for this detestable but at that time not uncommon office was Sir Thomas Wilson, keeper of the State Paper Office, a learned, ingenious, base scoundrel. If this Wilson is to be credited Raleigh acknowledged that, had he fallen in with the treasure-ships, he would have made a prize of them according to the old principles which he had learned in the school of Drake and Cavendish. "He fell of himself into discourse, telling what the lords asked, and what he answered; . . . . also what discourse he and my lord chancellor had about taking the Plate-fleet, which he confessed he would have taken had he lighted on it; to which my lord chancellor said, 'Why, you would have been a pirate.' 'Oh!' quoth he, 'did you ever know of any that were pirates for millions? They that work for small things are pirates.'"[2] Bacon's palm must have itched as he thought of all this gold, and perhaps, in spite of James's fears, Raleigh's fate would have been somewhat different if he had returned with the "millions," or even brought back as good a booty as Drake had landed at Plymouth, in time of peace, forty-five years before. But as things were, there was no making a capital crime of an intention; nor could all the cunning, and zeal, and perseverance of Sir Thomas Wilson, though acting in many ways at once, both within the Tower and without, extract or detect any thing of the least consequence. As it was fully resolved that he should lose his head,[1] James ordered his council to devise some other means; and, on the 18th of October, Bacon and Coke and the other commissioners who had examined him presented two forms of proceeding for his majesty's consideration. The one was to send his death-warrant at once to the Tower, only accompanying it with a narrative of Raleigh's late offenses, to be printed and published; the other form, to which they said they rather inclined, as being nearer to legal proceedings, was, "that the prisoner should be called before a council of state, at which the judges and several of the nobility and gentlemen of quality should be present; that some of the privy council should then declare that this form of proceeding was adopted because he was already civilly dead (in consequence of the sentence pronounced at Winchester fifteen years before); that, after that, the king's council should charge his acts of hostility, depredation, abuse of the king's commission, and of his subjects under his charge, impostures, attempts to escape, and other his misdemeanors:" and they recommended that, after this charge, the "examinations should be read, and Sir Walter heard, and some persons confronted against him, if need were; and then he was to be withdrawn and sent back, because no sentence could by law be given against him; and, after he was gone, that the lords of the privy council and the judges should give their advice whether upon these subsequent offenses the king might not, with justice and honor, give warrant for his execution."[1] For reasons not explained this latter form was rejected, and the former alternative, somewhat modified, was adopted; and a privy seal was sent to the judges of the Court of King's Bench, directing them to order immediate execution of the old sentence upon Sir Walter Raleigh. The judges, cowardly and corrupt as they were, were startled with the novelty and injustice of the case, and a consultation of all the twelve judges was held, wherein it was determined that neither a writ of privy seal, nor a warrant under the great seal, would be a sufficient authority, after so great a lapse of time, to order execution without calling upon the party to show cause against it;[1] and, in the end, they unanimously resolved that the legal course would be to bring the prisoner to the bar by a writ of habeas corpus. Accordingly, such a writ was issued to the Lieutenant of the Tower, who, upon the 28th of October, at an early hour of the morning, made Raleigh, who was suffering from fever and ague (this time his maladies were not feigned), raise from his bed and dress himself. As soon as he was brought to the bar of the Court of the King's Bench at Westminster, Sir Henry Yelverton, the attorney-general, said, "My lords, Sir Walter Raleigh, the prisoner at the bar, was fifteen years since convicted of high treason at Winchester; then he received judgment to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; but his majesty, of his abundant grace, hath been pleased to show mercy unto him till now, when justice calls upon him for execution. Sir Walter Raleigh hath been a statesman and a man who, in respect of his parts and quality, is to be pitied; he hath been as a star at which the world hath gazed; but stars may fall, nay, they must fall when they trouble the sphere wherein they abide. It is, therefore, his majesty's pleasure now to call for execution of the former judgment, and I now require your lordships' order for the same." Then, the clerk of the crown having first read the old conviction and judgment, the prisoner was asked why execution should not be awarded. "My lords," replied Raleigh, "my voice is grown weak by reason of sickness." Montague, the chief justice, told him his voice was audible enough. "Then, my lords," continued Raleigh, with admirable composure, "all I have to say is this: I hope that the judgment which I received to die so long since can not now be strained to take away my life; for, since that judgment was passed, it was his majesty's pleasure to grant me a commission to proceed in a voyage beyond the seas, wherein I had power, as marshal, over the life and death of others; so, under favor, I presume I am discharged of that judgment. By that commission I gained new life and vigor; for he that hath power over the lives of others, must surely be master of his own. . . . Under my commission I departed the land, and undertook a journey, to honor my sovereign and to enrich his kingdom with gold, the ore whereof this hand hath found and taken in Guiana; but the voyage, notwithstanding my endeavor, had no other event but what was fatal to me—the loss of my son and the wasting of my whole estate." The chief justice told him that he spoke not to the purpose; that his voyage had nothing to do with the judgment of death formerly given against him, which judgment it was now the king's pleasure. upon certain occasions best known to himself, to have executed; that the commission given to him could in no way help him, for by that he was not pardoned, nor was there any word tending to pardon him in all that commission;[1] that in case of treason there must be a pardon by express words. To this Raleigh replied, that, if such was the law, he must put himself on the mercy of the king, and hope that he would be pleased to have compassion. He then said, "Concerning that judgment at Winchester passed so long ago, I presume that most of you that hear me know how that was obtained; nay, I know that his majesty was of opinion that I had hard measure therein, and was so resolved touching that trial; and if he had not been anew exasperated against me, certain I am, I might, if I could by nature, have lived a thousand and a thousand years before he would have taken advantage thereof." The chief justice told him that he had had an honorable trial at Winchester (and honorable it was to Raleigh!); that for fifteen years he had been as a dead man in the law, and might at any minute have been cut off, had not the king, in mercy, spared him. "You might justly think it heavy," he continued, "if you were now called to execution in cold blood; but it is not so; for new offenses have stirred up his majesty's justice to revive what the law hath formerly granted." (This was admitting what Raleigh said, and what all the world knew.) And after praying God to have mercy on his soul, he ended with the fatal words—"Execution is granted." The undaunted victim then begged for a short respite to settle his affairs, and for the use of pen, ink, and paper to "express something," and to discharge himself of "some worldly trust;" "and I beseech you," he said, "not to think that I crave this to gain one minute of life; for now, being old, sickly, disgraced, and certain to go to death, life is wearisome unto me." The gentle James had the barbarity to refuse the brief respite; but pen, ink, and paper were allowed, or procured from the humanity of the jailer. Sir Walter, instead of being carried back to the Tower, was conveyed to the Gate-House at Westminster, where, in the evening, his affectionate wife took her last farewell. On parting, she told him that they had granted her the favor of having his body. "It is well, Bess," said he, smiling at the conceit, "that thou may'st dispose of that dead thou had'st not always the disposing of when alive."

At an early hour on the following morning (October the 29th) Raleigh was waited upon by Dr. Tounson, dean of Westminster, appointed by the court to give him ghostly consolation; for he was not allowed to choose his own minister. This dean administered the sacrament, which he took very reverently, declaring that he forgave all men, even

[1] "For, it was said, among other reasons, that the original judgment being of so long standing, the party might have a pardon to show, or he might plead that he was not the same person."—Hutton's Reports, as quoted by Mr. Jardine, Crim. Trials.

[1] "The old sentence," says Howell, "still lies dormant against him, which he could never get off by pardon, notwithstanding that he mainly labored in it before he went; but his majesty could never be brought to it; for he said he would keep this as a curb to hold him within the bounds of his commission, and of good behavior."—Letters his relative Sir Lewis Stukely, who had so basely betrayed him. It has been well said of Raleigh, by a cotemporary, that he rather loved life than feared death—the reverse we believe being generally the case with inferior minds. He would have lived on for the beauty of this visible world, of which, as a traveler, he had seen so much,—for the science and the literature he cultivated, — for the grand schemes of discovery he indulged in to the last,—for his wife and dear boy;—but, as soon as he felt his doom to be inevitable, he made up his mind to meet it with alacrity and cheerfulness. He breakfasted heartily, smoked a pipe of tobacco after it, as was his usual practice, and when they brought him a cup of good sack, and asked him how he liked it, he said, gayly, that it was good drink if a man might tarry by it. It was mercifully arranged at court that he should be beheaded instead of being hanged, drawn, and quartered. At about eight o'clock in the morning he was conveyed to the scaffold erected in Old Palace Yard, Westminster, where an immense crowd was collected, including many great lords and courtiers, and no doubt ladies—for it was common then for high-born dames to attend these scenes of blood. There was so great a press that it was with difficulty the sheriffs and their men could get him through. When Sir Walter was upon the scaffold, he saluted, with a cheerful countenance, the lords, knights, and gentlemen. He then began to speak, and, perceiving a window where the lords Arundel, Northampton, and Doncaster were seated, he said he would strain his voice, for he would willingly have them hear. But my Lord of Arundel said, "Nay, we will rather come down to the scaffold." And this he and some others did; and then Raleigh, after saluting them one by one, continued to speak. He thanked God heartily that he had brought him to die in the light, and not left him to perish obscurely in the dark prison of the Tower, where for so many years he had been oppressed with many miseries: he denied, by all his hopes of salvation, that he ever had any plot or intelligence with France; that he had ever spoken dishonorably or disloyally of his sovereign. He solemnly asserted, that in going to Guiana he knew that the mine he spoke of really existed, and that it was his full intent to search for gold for the benefit of his majesty and himself, and of those that ventured with him, together with the rest of his countrymen.[1] Then, after defending himself at some length against other charges — never once mentioning the enmity of the Spaniards—he spake about the fall and death of the gallant Essex, by which he knew he had lost the favor of the people, and which (as we believe) weighed heavily on his soul, in spite of his denial of having hastened that execution. "It doth make my heart to bleed," said he, "to hear that such an imputation should be laid upon me; for it is said that I was a prosecutor of the death of the Earl of Essex, and that I stood in a window over against him when he suffered in the Tower, and puffed out tobacco in disdain of him. I take God to witness that I had no hand in his blood, and was none of those that procured his death. I shed tears for him when he died; and, as I hope to look to God in the face hereafter, my Lord of Essex did not see my face when he suffered; for I was afar off, in the Armory, where I saw him, but he saw not me. I was heartily sorry for him, though I confess I was of a contrary faction, and helped to pluck him down; but in respect of his worth I loved him, and I knew that it would be worse with me when he was gone; for I got the hate of those that wished me well before; and those that set me against him afterward set themselves against me, and were my greatest enemies. My soul hath many times since been grieved that I was not nearer to him when he died; because, as I understood afterward, he asked for me at his death, to have been reconciled unto me."[1] Then the Dean of Westminster asked him in what faith he meant to die; and Raleigh said in the faith professed by the church of England. "Then, before he should say his prayers, because the morn-

[1] Here, turning to the Earl of Arundel, he said, "My lord, being in the gallery of my ship, at my departure, I remember your lordship took me by the hand, and said you would request one thing of me, which was, 'That I would not turn pirate when I got abroad, and that, whether I made a good voyage or a bad, I should not fail to return again into England;' which I then promised you, and gave you my faith I would, and so I have." To which the Earl of Arundel answered and said, "It is true, I do very well remember it; they were the very last words I spake unto you."

[1] We have already alluded (vol. ii. p. 631) to a remarkable letter written by Raleigh to Sir Robert Cecil, recommending that minister to get Essex put out of the way. We here give the whole of that epistle, from Murdin's Burghley Papers. It is generally admitted that Essex was designated under the nickname of Bothwell: "I am not wise enough to give you advice, but if you take it for a good counsel to relent toward this tyrant, you will repent it, when it shall be too late. His malice is fixt, and will not evaporate by any your mild courses, for he will ascribe the alteration to her majesty's pusillanimity, and not to your good nature, knowing that you work but upon her humor, and not out of any love toward him. The less you make him, the less he shall be able to harm you and yours. And if her majesty's favor fail him, he will again decline to a common person. For, after revenges, fear them not. For your own father, that was esteemed to be the contriver of Norfolk's ruin, yet his son followeth your father's son and loveth him. Humors of men succeed not, but grow by occasions, and accidents of time and power. Somerset made no revenge on the Duke of Northumberland's heirs. Northumberland that now is thinks not of Hatton's issue. Kelloway lives that murdered the brother of Horsey; and Horsey let him go by all his lifetime. I could name you a thousand of those; and, therefore, after fears are but prophecies, or rather conjectures, from causes remote. Look to the present, and you do wisely. His son shall be the youngest earl of England but one; and if his father be now kept down, Will Cecil shall be able to keep as many men at his heels as he, and more too. He may also match in a better house than his; and so, that fear is not worth the fearing. But if the father continue, he will be able to break the branches, and pull up the tree, root and all. Lose not your advantage; if you do, I read your destiny.

"Let the queen hold Bothwell while she hath him. He will ever be the canker of her estate and safety. Princes are lost by security, and preserved by prevention. I have seen the last of her good days and all ours after his liberty."

Mr. Tytler and other writers who have taken a more favorable view of the moral character of Raleigh than we can possibly adopt, have raised some doubts as to the precise date of this letter; but the date signifies little—it may have been written at the time of Essex's first disgrace, or at the time of his second imprisonment—it matters not when it was written. It may, however, be argued that its design was to recommend, not the putting of Essex to death, but only what Raleigh called in his dying speech the plucking of him down. Some of the words, indeed, seem to imply that the earl's life should be spared, and that he should be only reduced to a safe insignificance, or perhaps kept in confinement. But even this interpretation convicts Raleigh of having behaved with sufficient ingratitude to the man who had been his friend. We believe, on the evidence of his own writings, that the heart of Raleigh was chastened by misfortune; that he came out of the Tower a much better man than he entered it; but, to propose him at any period of his life as a high moral example and model, is worse than ridiculous

ing was sharp, the sheriff offered him to bring him down off the scaffold to warm himself by a fire. "No, good Mr. Sheriff," said he, "let us dispatch, for within this quarter of an hour mine ague will come upon me, and, if I be not dead before then, mine enemies will say that I quake for fear." So he made a most divine and admirable prayer, and then rose up and clasped his hands, saying, "Now I am going to God." He then took his leave of the lords, knights, and gentlemen. Though so ready to die, he was anxious for the fame that should survive him; and, in bidding farewell to the Earl of Arundel, he entreated him to desire the king that no scandalous writing to defame him might be published after his death. He poised the ax, felt its edge, and then said, with a smile, "This is a sharp medicine, but it will cure all diseases." He laid his neck across the block; the executioner hesitated; "What dost thou fear?" said he; "strike, man!" The headsman struck, and at two blows severed the neck of the soldier, sailor, statesman, poet — the universal Raleigh, who was then in the sixty-seventh year of his age:—

> "Even such is Time, that takes on trust
> Our youth, our joys, our all we have,
> And pays us but with age and dust:
> Who, in the dark and silent grave,
> When we have wander'd all our ways,
> Shuts up the story of our days!"[1]

King James made a merit of this execution with the court of Spain: the people set it down to his eternal disgrace.

The death of Sir Walter Raleigh was soon followed by that of Queen Anne, who had interceded warmly but in vain in his favor; and by a war into which James found himself dragged, in spite of his soul, and in which, though it was conducted with no spirit, it was scarcely possible not to miss the genius and bravery of Raleigh.

The country of Bohemia, surrounded on all sides by mountains, was occupied by an interesting people, a branch of the great Slavonian family of nations. The Cteches, or Bohemians, as they were called in the rest of Europe, maintained their independence, and were governed by an elective king of their own choosing till the year 1526, when the House of Austria, a house which has gained more by fortunate marriages than by arms, obtained the sovereignty through the union of Ferdinand I. with the daughter of Lewis II. Long before this event, sects had arisen in the country inimical to the church of Rome: Conrad Stekna, John Milicz, and Mathias Janowa, between the middle and the end of the fourteenth century, had raised their voices against some of the fundamental doctrines, for which the Pope proceeded against them as heretics. They were obliged to seek refuge in Poland, where they continued to preach their doctrines, which were not eradicated in Bohemia by their persecution. The reader will remember that our unfortunate King Richard II. married a Bohemian princess, the good Queen Anne, as she was called by the gratitude of the English people. At her death, in 1394, many persons of her household who had accompanied her from her native country, returned thither and contributed to spread the doctrines of our first reformer, Wycliffe. At the same period, a considerable intercourse existed between the universities of Prague and Oxford; English students occasionally frequented the former—Bohemian students the latter. Hieronymus of Prague, the friend of John Huss, and, in the end, his companion at the stake, is supposed to have returned from Oxford about the year 1400. He probably assisted Huss when, shortly after, that reformer translated all the works of Wycliffe, which, aided by the preaching of Huss, had a much greater effect in Bohemia than in England. Huss was burned in 1414, by sentence of the Council of Constance; but his opinions survived him, and. when Luther began his great work, about a century after, the majority of the Bohemians became ready converts. Their religious feelings allied themselves with the hereditary hostility which existed between the Slavonian and the German races, and with their nationality and jealousy of the House of Austria, which remained steadfast in its attachment to the Roman church, and which was not very scrupulous in performing its engagement to maintain the ancient rights of the Bohemian nation.[1] There followed a series of insurrections and sanguinary conflicts; but in the year 1609, the Emperor Rodolph conceded the boon of religious freedom to Bohemia, formally acknowledging by treaty the right of every man there to worship God in his own way. This treaty was not very religiously observed by Rodolph's successor; but, at the same time, it must be allowed that the Protestant Bohemians were not satisfied with a simple toleration: their aim and object was to establish their own faith as the only or the dominant church, and to snatch their old Slavonian crown out of the grasp of the Tudesque house of Austria—to restore the nationality in all respects. The latter aim was natural and honorable, but unfortunately the Protestant Bohemians had not all adopted the same branch of the Reformation; some were Lutherans, some Calvinists; and these sections hated each other as much as they did the Pope and the Devil. The Catholics also were still numerous, and included some of the noblest families. Hence the national cause was sacrificed, for the people were divided against themselves. The Calvinists, the most numerous or the boldest, began the quarrel this time by seizing some lands, which belonged to the Catholic Archbishop of Prague and the Abbot of Brunaw, to build Protestant churches upon. The archbishop and the abbot appealed to the emperor, who gave a decision in their favor. Thereupon the Calvinists fasted and prayed, and deliberated during two whole days, and upon the third day (the 23d of May, 1618) they repaired well armed to the castle of Prague, where the council of state was sitting, and after some altercation flung Martinitz Slavatta and Philip Fabricius.

[1] Some interesting information regarding the history of religion among the Bohemians, and other people of the Slavonian stock, has been recently given by Count Valerian Krasinski, a Polish exile, in the first volume of his "Historical Sketch of the Rise, Progress, and Decline of the Reformation in Poland." London, 1838.

members of the council and zealous papists, out of the windows into the castle ditch. The Catholics said that the lives of these men were saved by a miracle; but it appears that there was plenty of mud and water in the ditch, so that they fell in soft places. Immediately after their unceremonious ejection, Count Thurn, the leader of the insurrection, delivered a spirited harangue to the people, telling them that the privileges of their old and free kingdom had been violated, their religion made dependent upon the will of princes not their own, that their crown had been converted into a revenue and inheritance for a foreign house, that the sovereign who claimed to rule over them had been brought up in the abhorrence of all Protestants, and was governed by that sort of religious priests and people who detested, with an equal aversion, the liberty and the belief of the Bohemians; and he ended by assuring them that their lot was drawn, that nothing was left for them but liberty or the scaffold. The Calvinists to a man flocked round the national banner; but the Lutherans and the Catholics remained loyal to the House of Austria, or were neutral. In a very short time most of the fortresses were taken, two armies were raised, a manifesto was published, and a provisional government established. The old Emperor Matthias offered an amnesty, and proposed that the grounds of the quarrel should be referred to the amicable arbitration of the two Catholic Electors of Mentz and Bavaria, and the two Protestant Electors of Saxony and the Palatinate; but the Bohemians, who were greatly encouraged by seeing the insurrection spread into the provinces of Lusatia, Silesia, and Moravia, rejected the proposal. The old emperor died at the end of the year, and was succeeded by his cousin, Ferdinand II., a weak and bigoted prince. The Bohemians reviving the old principle, that their crown was elective, that their sovereign was to be chosen by themselves, offered the dangerous honor to two of the princes who had been selected by the emperor as arbitrators—first to John George, Elector of Saxony, who refused it, and then to the Elector Palatine. The Palatine Frederick, without taking counsel of his honor, without making a proper estimate of his means to resist the great confederacy of the Catholics and the House of Austria, and blindly counting upon the assistance of his father-in-law, the King of England, as chief of the Protestant interests, accepted the invitations of the Bohemians, or rather of the Calvinist insurgents, hastened with his family to Prague, and was crowned on the 4th of November, 1619.[1] Frederick had declared that the finger of God was made visible in his election; the Protestants abroad considered it as a great and glorious victory obtained over the papists, and the encroaching spirit of the House of Austria; and the Protestants of England were disposed to view it in the same light. Nobody looked coolly at the question as a political one: Abbot, the primate, declared that the Palatine ought to follow where God led him, and the mass of the people thought that a holy war ought to be made to secure him in possession of the kingdom of Bohemia. In a short time, the cry for war spread thoughout Scotland and England, and became louder and louder, when news arrived that immense preparations were making by the Catholic powers to drive Frederick not only from Bohemia, but also out of his hereditary dominions. James was astounded, and gored by the horns of several dilemmas. Could he, who had declared, written, and preached against the transfer of crowns on religious pretexts, and by the will of the people and popular revolutions, assist the Bohemians against their lawful sovereign lord the emperor? But could he, on the other hand, remain quiet, and see his son-in-law ruined? the inheritance of the children of his only daughter swallowed up? Could he, as a Protestant monarch, witness the aggrandizement of the Catholic powers? But, on the other side, what sympathy could he feel with Calvinists? If he assisted his son-in-law, he should lose that Spanish daughter-in-law elect, and that rich dower, his heart had so long yearned after. If he should enter into the war without money in the treasury, without ships in his arsenals, what chance had he of success? But then, on the other side, in the inflamed state of his subjects' minds, would it be safe for him to try to remain at peace? He procrastinated, equivocated, and shuffled. He told the Protestant envoys from Germany and Bohemia, that he would assuredly support the true faith, and aid his dear son: he told Gondomar that the Palgrave was a villain, a usurper, and he gave his royal word that he would not assist him and the confederate princes. But when, while Frederick was in his new kingdom, the Catholics fell, might and main, upon the Lower Palatinate, the cry of indignation in England was so terrifying that he was obliged to do something more than talk, and, without flying in the face of his principles, he thought he might assist his son-in-law in his own patrimonial states, if he meddled not with Bohemia. After sending ambassadors to Brussels and Madrid on negotiations that proved altogether fruitless, he raised and equipped four thousand volunteers, who, under the command of the earls of Oxford and Essex, and Sir Horatio Vere, proceeded by Holland and the Rhine to the Palatinate. This force was too small and too late to be of much service; but in the raising of it James had completely exhausted his means and his credit, and he found himself again driven to the hard necessity of thinking about a parliament.

A.D. 1621.—James summoned a parliament to meet on the 16th of January, taking care to give in his proclamation as many unconstitutional directions or commands, touching what sort of members the people should elect, as he had done in 1604. At the same time, he warned the people not "to presume to talk or write saucily of the arcana imperii, or state affairs."[1] The session did not actually commence till the 30th of January, when James delivered what was meant to be a very conciliatory speech. He well knew how much that alliance was hated, and he asserted that he had no particular disposition toward the Spanish match; he even acknowledged that he had been misled by evil counselors, "that bred an abruption," and that at the last parliament, "there came up a strange kind of beasts called undertakers, which had done mischief." He gave promises of better government for the future, and then with a bold face asked for liberal supplies to carry on war in the Palatinate, which he said he was determined to preserve for his son-in-law. The commons were ready enough to vote supplies for this popular war; but, before giving their money, they requested the king to be more rigorous with regard to the papists, upon whom they laid the blame of the miscarriages in Bohemia, and they asked satisfaction for the imprisonment of four of their members at the close of the last parliament. James promised in general terms to attend to their requests; and on the 15th of February they voted two subsidies. Then he told them, that though the supply was small, he preferred it to millions, because it was so freely given, and he promised again that he would check popery, and respect the freedom of speech in parliament. The commons then proceeded to attack the patent monopolists, who robbed the people, and shared their spoils with the government or with the courtiers. Sir Giles Mompesson, and his partner, Sir Francis Mitchell, a justice of peace, were particularly obnoxious. Mompesson, seeing that the court had abandoned him as a scape-goat, fled beyond sea; Mitchell was taken, voted by the Commons to be incapable of being in the commission, and sent by them to the Tower. As the Lords had never shown any alacrity in the correction of abuses, the Lower House had taken all this upon themselves, and in so doing had clearly exceeded their jurisdiction. Coke, who was not without a hope of implicating Bacon with Mompesson, took a deal of trouble with the case, and proved to the Commons that the proper mode of conducting it would be by joining with the Lords in an impeachment. The Commons then requested a conference, at which they informed the other House generally as to the offense; and then the Lords, taking upon themselves the inquiry, and becoming satisfied of the guilt of the parties, sent for the Commons and delivered judgment, which was, that Mompesson and Mitchell should be degraded from the honor of knighthood, fined, and imprisoned. James, who had been frightened out of endeavors he was making to save them, came forward to express his detestation of their offense, and to increase the severity of their punishment. By a very unusual exercise of the prerogative, it was settled that Sir Giles should be banished for life. Sir Henry Yelverton, the attorney-general, who was connected with the illegal practices, and who boldly charged Buckingham at the bar of the Lords with being a partaker in them, was condemned to two heavy fines and imprisonment for life. The ball, once set agoing down such a foul and slippery declivity, was not likely to stop soon. Sir John Bennet, judge of the Prerogative Court, was impeached for corruption in his office; and Doctor Field, now Bishop of Landaff, was impeached for being concerned in a matter of bribery in the Chancery Court. The Lord Chancellor Bacon, whose own hour was coming, said truly that corruption was the vice of the time. Within not many days after, Bacon was impeached himself for corruption in his high office. Coke took a prominent share in this business; but Buckingham wanted the seals for his creature, Bishop Williams. James had never had much affection for Bacon, and, even if that wonderful man had been as innocent as he was notoriously guilty, he would have been degraded. A report of a committee of the Lower House to inquire into abuses in the courts of justice, recommended proceedings against the Lord Chancellor, Viscount St. Albans[1]—"a man endued with all parts both of nature and art," said Sir Robert Phillips, who reported for the committee, "as that I will say no more of him, being not able to say enough" (the most violent, the most incensed at his dishonesty, could not withhold their admiration of his genius); and the Commons, having been told by the king to proceed fearlessly, charged him before the Lords with twenty-two several acts of bribery and corruption. A constitutional timidity, united with a consciousness of guilt, or still more perhaps, the certainty that the court had devoted him to ruin, made Bacon's heart sink within him. He took to his bed, wrote an affecting letter to the Lords, and prayed for time that he might recover from his sickness, and prepare his defense. He was gratified in this respect, for the two Houses adjourned from the 27th of March to the 17th of April. In that interval the falling chancellor was admitted to an audience of the king. On the 24th of April, a week after the reassembling of parliament, Bacon sent his submission, and a confession in general terms to the Lords, which, it appears, was presented by Prince Charles. "This poor gentleman," writes Sir Arthur Wilson, "mounted above pity, fell down below it: his tongue, that was the glory of his time for eloquence (that tuned so many sweet harangues), was like a forsaken harp, hung upon the willows, whilst the waters of affliction overflowed the banks. And now, his high-flying orations are humbled to supplications, and thus he throws himself and cause at the feet of his judges before he was condemned." His humble submission, he said, came from a wasted spirit and oppressed mind, from the midst of a state of as great affliction as a mortal man might endure, honor being above life. Still, he continued, he found gladness in some things: the first being, "that hereafter the greatness of a judge or magistrate shall be no sanctuary or protection to him against guiltiness, which is the beginning of a golden work. The next: after this example, it is like that judges will fly from any thing in the likeness of corruption (though it were at a great distance) as from a serpent; which tends to the purging of the courts of justice, and reducing them to their true honor and splendor. And in these two points (God is my witness), though it be my fortune to be the anvil upon which these two effects are broken and wrought, I take no small comfort." He told the Lords, his "judges, under God and his lieutenant" (the king), that he understood some justification had been expected from him, but that the only justification he would make should be out of Job, and that he should justify with Job in these words,—"I have not hid my sin, as did Adam, nor concealed my faults in my bosom." He then proceeded:—"It resteth, therefore, that without fig-leaves I do ingenuously confess and acknowledge that, having understood the particulars of the charge, not formally from the house, but enough to inform my conscience and memory, I find matter sufficient and full, both to move me to desert my defense, and to move your lordships to condemn and censure me. Neither will I trouble your lordships by singling these particulars, which I think might fall off. Quid te exempta juvat spinis de millibus una? Neither will I prompt your lordships to observe upon the proofs where they come not home, or to scruple touching the credits of the witnesses. Neither will I represent to your lordships how far a defense might, in divers things, extenuate the offense, in respect of the time and manner of the guilt, or the like circumstances;[1] but only leave things to spring out of your more noble thoughts, and observations of the evidence, and examinations themselves, and charitably to wind about the particulars of the charge, here and there, as God shall put into your minds, and to submit myself wholly to your piety and grace." Having, as he said, spoken to their lordships as judges, he would say a few words to them as peers and prelates, humbly commending his cause to their noble minds and magnanimous affections. He told them a story out of Livy, to show that the questioning of men in eminent places had the same effect as their punishment; adding, "My humble desire is, that his majesty would take the seals into his hands, which is a great downfall, and may serve, I hope, in itself, for an expiation of my faults." He hoped that the peers "would behold their chief pattern, the king—a king of incomparable clemency, and whose heart is inscrutable for wisdom and goodness—a prince whose like had not been seen these hundred years—a prince who deserved to be made memorable by records of acts mixed of mercy and justice." "And yourselves," continued Bacon, "are nobles (and compassion ever beateth in the veins of noble blood) or reverend prelates, who are the servants of Him that would not break the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax. You all sit upon a high stage, and therefore can not but be sensible of the change of human conditions, and of the fall of any from high place." He told them that corruption and bribery were the vices of the time, and that any reform would, in the beginning, be attended with danger. "The beginning of reformation," said he, "hath the contrary power to the pool of Bethesda; for that had strength to cure him only that was first cast in, and this hath strength to hurt him only that is first cast in; and, for my part, I wish it may stay here, and go no farther." He reminded their lordships of their noble feeling and loving affections toward him as a member of their own body, and concluded his remarkable letter with these words:—"And, therefore, my humble suit to your lordships is, that my penitent submission may be my sentence, the loss of my seal my punishment, and that your lordships would recommend me to his majesty's grace and pardon for all that is past. God's holy spirit be among you."[1] But the Lords were not satisfied with this submission, humble as it was, nor with this general and vague confession; and though they excused him from appearing as a criminal at their bar, they exacted from him a distinct confession to all the charges specifically brought against him. He then wrote and signed a confession of particulars; and to a deputation of the lords, who waited upon him to know whether this paper was his own voluntary act, he said, with tears, "It is my act—my hand—my heart. Oh, my lords, spare a broken reed." Our own hearts ache at this sad spectacle.

On the 30th of April his second confession was read in the Lords, who, on the 3d of May, informed the Lower House that they were ready to pronounce sentence against the late Lord Chancellor, if it pleased the House, with the Speaker, to come and demand judgment. So the House went up, and the Speaker demanded judgment. The Lord Chief Justice (sitting as Speaker in the higher House) said that the Lords had duly considered of the complaints presented by the Commons against the Lord Verulam, Viscount St. Albans, late Lord Chancellor, and had found him guilty, as well by oath of witnesses as by his own confession, of those and many other corruptions, for which they had sent for him to come and answer; and upon his sincere protestation of sickness, they, admitting his excuse of absence, had yet notwithstanding proceeded to his judgment, namely—That he be fined £40,000; to be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure; made incapable to bear office in the commonwealth; never to sit in parliament; nor to come within the verge, which is within twelve miles of the court.[2] Bacon had not £40,000—so steadily had his expense kept pace with his increasing income that he probably had not 40,000 pence. James was pleased to remit the fine, which he never could have paid, and to liberate him from the Tower after a pro forma imprisonment of two days. Such a man could not be without his friends and admirers—even in the House of Commons, Sir Edward Sackville and others adventured to speak in his favor; and, apart from politicians and courtiers, there were, no doubt, many high and honest minds that revered the philosopher, the wit, the scholar, though they condemned and despised the chancellor. It is, at all events, a sort of consolation to know that, when Bacon took his departure from the verge of the court, a beggared and dis-

[1] When the fierce general attack first began, Bacon wrote to the king:—"I hope I shall not be found to have the troubled fountain of a corrupt heart, in a depraved habit of taking rewards to pervert justice, however I may be frail, and partake of the abuses of the times." graced man, he was not wholly forsaken even in that time-serving generation. On that day, as Prince Charles was returning from hunting, "he espied a coach, attended with a goodly troop of horsemen," who, it seems, were gathered together to wait upon the chancellor to his house at Gorhambury, at the time of his declension. At which the prince smiled; "Well, do what we can," said he, "this man scorns to go out like a snuff."[1] He had inscribed his name on the scroll of the immortals—he had written his greatest works before his fall: his History of Henry VII., and some other things, were produced after his disgrace. If he had satisfied himself with these ennobling pursuits—if he had remained quiet in the beautiful solitudes of Gorhambury, which lie like a piece of Paradise under the ancient town of St. Alban's, he would have risen into respect, even personally, from the moment he fell from power; but so mean was this great man's soul—so dependent was he for his gratifications on money, and place, and court honor, that he struggled and begged incessantly, and wrote the most humiliating of letters for the light of the king's countenance, for a pension, for some fresh employment. The king, the favorite Buckingham, the prince, received these letters, and despised the man that could write them. At times his baseness and flattery were closely allied to impiety. He wrote, for example, to the prince, that he hoped, as his father, the king, had been his creator, so he, the son, would be his redeemer.[2]

The Commons had scarcely made this session memorable by the impeachment of high delinquents, when they proceeded to make it disgraceful by a spiteful and meanly tyrannical prosecution—a glaring instance of vulgar, savage intolerance. There was one Edward Floyde, a Catholic of good family, a prisoner in the Fleet for debt or popery, or both, who sorely offended Protestant ears by rejoicing at the success of the Catholic arms against the new king of Bohemia, or by saying, simply (for this was the burden of the matter), that Prague was taken, and goodman Palgrave and goodwife Palgrave had taken to their heels. For this offense, which was not worthy the attention of the pettiest court, the Commons, in a headlong fury, sentenced him to pay a fine of £1000, to stand in the pillory in three different places, and to be carried from place to place on a horse without a saddle, and with his face turned to the tail. But the next day the Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered a message from the king, telling the Commons that his majesty thanked them for their zeal; but, lest it should transport them to inconveniences, he would have them reconsider whether they could sentence one who did not belong to them, and who had not offended against their house or any member of it; and whether they could sentence a denying party without the oath of witnesses.[3] His majesty further reminded them that the judicial power of parliament did not belong to the Commons alone; and at the end of his message he desired them to consider whether it would not be better to leave the case of Floyde in his hands. Nothing could well be clearer than that the Commons had exceeded their jurisdiction, as they had so recently done, and confessed it too, in the case of Sir Giles Mompesson; but, now, instead of yielding the point, they debated it long and loudly, and persisted in their first votes. James, who for once was perfectly right, asked them to show precedents—they had none to show. The Lords requested a conference; and this, with the declaration of Noye, that the matter of judicature clearly remained with the Upper House, led the Commons to yield. The difference was merely between the two Houses—a conflict of privileges: but Lords and Commons were alike ready to be unmerciful to the poor offender; and the Lords, "to keep up a good understanding between the two Houses," augmented the severity of the original sentence. The fine of £1000 was raised to £5000. Whipping at the cart's tail from the Fleet to Westminster Hall was added to the infamous punishment of the pillory: Floyde was to be degraded from his rank of a gentleman, to be held an infamous person, and, as a climax to all this brutality and injustice, he was to be imprisoned in Newgate for life. Prince Charles, to his honor, interfered and obtained the remission of the whipping; but the unfortunate man, it appears, underwent the rest of the atrocious sentence. The king was what we have seen; but, assuredly, lords, commons, and people had yet much to learn—had yet to free themselves from some of the worst of vices ere there could be any rational hope of true liberty and good government. In the whole of this particular business the blame rests with them; for James had been talked into something like a jealousy of his own son-in-law, who, though in reality rather a contemptible personage, was constantly represented by the Calvinistic Puritans as a great and godly prince, the champion of the true faith; and James would certainly of himself have punished no man for talking of his defects and calling him goodman Palgrave.

The king considered that he had done a great deal to conciliate the Commons in this session, but still there was no prospect of their voting the fresh supplies which he needed. Therefore, on the 24th of May, as they were going on in full career with other bills for reformation of abuses, for the checking of popery, &c., he unexpectedly announced his intention of proroguing the parliament at the end of the week. The Commons petitioned for a longer time. The king offered them a fortnight, which they considered too little; and the parliament was prorogued to November, by commission, after a unanimous declaration made by the Commons, and entered on record in the Journals, of their resolution to spend their lives and fortunes for the defense of the Protestant religion and the Palatinate.[1]

It was, indeed, time to be stirring if they meant to keep the Palatine from utter ruin. In the month of November of the preceding year (1620) the im-perialists and the Spaniards, commanded by his own relative, but bitter enemy and rival, the Duke of Bavaria, and by the famous Tilly, gained a decisive victory over him in the neighborhood of Prague, drove him from that city, where he had been king twelve months all but three days, took all his artillery, baggage, standards, and a great treasure he had not the heart to touch, and which, if properly and timely employed, might have given him the advantage over his enemies. He fled, with his wife and children, to Breslaw, leaving the heads of his party in Prague to be victims to their enraged enemies. From Breslaw he got to Berlin, and thence to the Hague in Holland, "having made a long progress, or rather a pilgrimage, about Germany."[1] During this flight the fair and captivating Elizabeth of England, who was styled Queen of Hearts when she could no longer be called Queen of Bohemia, was far advanced in pregnancy. The princes of the Protestant union, to whom the Palatine had intrusted the defense of his patrimonial possessions during his absence in Bohemia, were no match for the great Italian general, Spinola, with his army of "old tough blades"[2] and veteran commanders. They lost town after town, and were constantly outmanœuvred or beaten by very inferior forces. The 4000 English were far too few, and their generals too unskillful, to turn the fortune of the war. The petty princes were jealous of each other; they acted upon no one concerted plan of operations; and when they were all put to the ban of the empire, they began to abandon as hopeless the cause of the Palatine, who soon found himself left alone in the war, with no other means at his disposal than the weak English force and two free corps commanded by a younger son of the House of Brunswick and Count Mansfeldt. The English threw themselves into Heidelberg, Manheim, and Frankendael. Brunswick and Mansfeldt carried on a very irregular, partisan-like warfare. Sir Arthur Chichester, one of the envoys, said plainly, that the English army should have been greater or none at all; but James had neither the means nor the steady wish to increase it. He fondly fancied that he could reinstate his son-in-law, and make up all those differences—which eventually ran into the "Thirty Years' War," the starting point being Bohemia—by his admirable skill in diplomacy; and he continued to send ambassadors in all directions, with instructions that were very minute and deeply laid, but frequently contradictory the one to the other. The earls of Essex and Oxford, who had returned from the Palatinate, said that the only way to recover that country was by force of arms; and the English people not only believed them, but joined in their complaints that the money which ought to be spent in retrieving the national honor was wasted in inglorious idlings. The discontents of these two noble commanders, and of the Earl of Southampton, gave rise to a great political novelty—a spirited opposition to the court in the House of Lords.

During the recess, James, acting, it is said, under the advice of Bishop Williams, to whom, to the great vexation of all lawyers, he had given the seals, abolished, by proclamation, thirty-six of the most oppressive of the patents and monopolies, and adopted certain regulations meant for the improvement and protection of foreign commerce. These measures were calculated to put the Commons and the nation in good-humor; but other circumstances had happened that tended to produce a very different effect. The pirates of Algiers and other ports on the African coast had for some years been very troublesome to all the flags of Europe. Several English ships trading to Smyrna had been plundered, and occasionally the corsairs, issuing from the Mediterranean, had made prizes on the coast of England, and had carried off people into slavery from the coast of Ireland. James proposed that the different Christian powers should unite to destroy the pirates' chief nest, Algiers, and burn all their ships. Spain, whose subjects had suffered most, engaged to coöperate; but when the time came, they fell short of the promised supply, and Sir Robert Mansell sailed to Algiers with an insufficient force and a cramped commission, by which, it should appear, he was ordered by the timid, needy king of England not to risk his ships. On the 24th of May Mansell sailed up to the port, and the English sailors soon set fire to the ships and galleys; but they had scarcely retired when the Algerines, assisted, it is said, by a "cataract of rain which hindered the working of the English fireworks," put out the flames, recovered their ships, brought down artillery, mounted batteries on the mole, and threw booms across the harbor-mouth. We may safely calculate that Mansell did not much expose himself or his fleet, for he lost only eight men in the whole affair, and brought back all his ships undamaged; in fact, he did not renew the attack, and all the Algerine ships were saved with the exception of two that were burned to the water's edge.[1] This was clearly another case where more ought to have been done or nothing at all. The pirates turned their whole fury against the flag of James, and, within a few months, thirty-five English merchantmen were captured by them, and the crew sold as slaves. The country was filled with bitter and just complaints, when in the month of November, the parliament reassembled. The king lay at Royston under a real or feigned sickness; but, by his orders, Lord Digby, at a conference of the Houses, explained his bootless embassies into Germany for the recovery of the Palatinate, which he plainly hinted was now hopeless unless by means of English arms and English money. There were, he said (with a very considerable exaggeration), yet 21,000 men in the Lower Palatinate, 16,000 under Count Mansfeldt, and 5000 Englishmen, now under the supreme command of Sir Horatio Vere, who would certainly mutiny unless they got their pay. But money for other purposes, and more men, were needed immediately, and, if they were not sent, his lordship saw no chance of success. Lord Cranfield, the treasurer, told the Commons that, to maintain a sufficient force in that country for one year would require

£900,000: all that the Commons would vote was one subsidy, which would make about £70,000! We can scarcely be surprised at this parsimony; they had every ground for believing that the money would have been applied to other purposes than the Protestant war; and, in spite of the mystery kept up by the court, they knew that James was, at the very moment, engaged in a treaty with Spain to get for his son a Catholic wife, which, according to most of them, would be a bringing back of Antichrist into the kingdom. And, indeed, it required some uncommon faculty to discover how James should wage a fierce war with the whole House of Austria (for Spain had been as active as the emperor against his son-in-law) and intermarry with that House at one and the same time. The Commons, moreover, and not a few of the Lords, were exasperated by fresh stretches of the prerogative. Since the adjournment, the earls of Oxford and Southampton, Sutcliff, dean of Exeter, Brise, a puritan preacher, Sir Christopher Neville, Sir Edwin Sandys, who was a bold-spoken member of the Lower House, and the great constitutional lawyer and antiquary Selden, who had been in prison before for differing in opinion with the king and the bishops in the matter of tithes, had all been arbitrarily arrested; and Coke, whose patriotic vigor increased with his years and his disappointments at court, and who had boldly espoused the country party—as the popular party was called—in the preceding session, had been exposed to a prosecution for various offenses and malpractices committed when he was a judge.[1] It was felt by the Commons that all this severity had been provoked by the expression of liberal opinions; and, putting aside Coke, though not until they attempted to prove that there was a conspiracy against him, they stood by the only other member of their House, Sir Edwin Sandys (against whom there were no legal proceedings) and, as he was sick in bed, they sent two members to wait upon him and hear from his own mouth the cause of his arbitrary arrest, giving no credit whatever to the declaration of Secretary Calvert, that he had not been committed for any parliamentary matter. Together with intelligence of these proceedings, James received information respecting a petition, proposed by Coke in the Commons, against the growth of popery and the Catholic marriage of the Prince of Wales (though Spain was not named, she was clearly designated, and set down as the worst enemy of England and Protestantism), and for the vigorous prosecution of the war in the Palatinate — an unreasonable prayer when they would not trust the king with the money necessary to carry on that war. The petition encountered a strong opposition in the House; those who supported it were fain to agree to the insertion of a clause that "they did not mean to press on the king's most undoubted and royal prerogative;" and it neither passed nor was very likely to pass when James, proud of his finding the Commons in error in two cases in the preceding session, inflated by his extravagant notions of prerogative, and enraged and transported out of all discretion by this bold intermeddling with his arcana imperii, addressed a most absolute letter to Sir Thomas Richardson, speaker of the House of Commons. It was as follows:—

"Mr. Speaker, we have heard by divers reports, to our great grief, that our distance from the Houses of Parliament, caused by our indisposition of health, hath emboldened the fiery and popular spirits of some of the Commons to argue and debate publicly of matters far above their reach and capacity, tending to our high dishonor and breach of prerogative royal. These are, therefore, to command you to make known, in our name, unto the House that none therein from henceforth do meddle with any thing concerning our government, and deep matters of state; and, namely, not to deal with our dear son's match with the daughter of Spain, nor to touch the honor of that king, or any other of our friends and confederates; and also not to meddle with any man's particulars, which have their due motion in any of our ordinary courts of justice. And whereas we hear they have sent a message to Sir Edwin Sandys, to know the reasons of his late restraint, you shall, in our name, resolve them, that it is not for any misdemeanor of his in parliament; but, to put them out of doubt of any question of that nature that may arise among them hereafter, you shall resolve them, in our name, that we think ourself very free and able to punish any man's misdemeanors in parliament, as well during their sitting as after; which we mean not to spare hereafter upon any occasion of any man's insolent behavior there that shall be ministered unto us: and if they have already touched any of these points which we have forbidden, in any petition of theirs which is to be sent to us, it is our pleasure that you tell them that, except they reform it before it comes to our hands, we will not deign the hearing nor answering of it."

The House received this letter with less warmth than might have been expected; but they were unanimous, or nearly so, in their resolution to disapprove of and resist the propositions it contained. They drew up a remonstrance, in firm but mild and respectful language, telling the king that they could not conceive how his honor and safety, or the state of the kingdom, could be matters unfit for their consideration in parliament, and asserting their undoubted right of liberty of speech as an inheritance received from their ancestors. James replied at length, showing them how unfit they were for entering on high matters of government, and criticising the language of their remonstrance. In the end he told them that, although he could not allow of the style of calling their privileges an undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wished that they had said that their privileges were derived from the grace and permission of his ancestors and himself, yet, as long as they contained themselves within the limits of their duty, he would be as careful of their privileges as of his own prerogative, so that they never touched on that prerogative, which would enforce him or any just king to retrench their privileges. This was bringing matters to an issue: this was an explicit assertion on the part of the sovereign that the privileges of parliament existed only by sufferance, or depended entirely upon what the court might choose to consider good behavior. The assertion exasperated the House beyond measure, and Secretary Calvert and other ministers or courtiers vainly attempted to pacify them by admitting that the king's expressions were incapable of defense, and calling them a mere slip of the pen. James, in a fright, wrote a letter to Calvert to qualify what he had said; but, even in this conciliatory epistle, he could not abstain from reasserting that the liberties and privileges of the House were not of undoubted right and inheritance unless they were so from their being granted by the grace and favor of his predecessors on the throne: and therefore, on the memorable 18th of December, a day which forms an era in constitutional history, they drew up the following protestation:—

"The Commons now assembled in parliament, being justly occasioned thereunto, concerning sundry liberties, franchises, and jurisdictions of parliament, among others not herein mentioned, do make this protestation following:—That the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England; and that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the king, state, and the defense of the realm, and of the Church of England, and the making and the maintenance of laws, and redress of mischiefs and grievances, which daily happen within this realm, are proper subjects and matter of counsel and debate in parliament; and that, in the handling and the proceeding of those businesses, every member of the House hath, and of right ought to have, freedom of speech to propound, treat, reason, and bring to conclusion the same: that the Commons in parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of those matters, in such order as, in their judgments, shall seem fittest; and that every such member of the said House hath like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, and molestation (other than by the censure of the House itself), for or concerning any bill, speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the parliament or parliament business; and that, if any of the said members be complained of and questioned for any thing said or done in parliament, the same is to be showed to the king, by the advice and assent of all the Commons assembled in parliament, before the king give credence to any private information." After a long and spirited debate (it lasted till the unusual hour of five or six in the evening, being carried on even by candle-light![1]) the Commons entered this protestation in their journals, "as of record."

James's wrath overcame his caution and cowardice, and he forgot that he was reported sick: he rode up to London foaming or slavering at the mouth—prorogued parliament—ordered the clerk of the House of Commons to bring him the journals—erased the famous protestation with his own royal hand, in the presence of the judges of the land and a full assembly of the council—commanded an act of council to be made thereon, and what he had done to be entered in the council-book—and a few days after (on the 6th of January, 1622) dissolved the parliament by an insulting proclamation, taking care, however, to inform his subjects that though this late parliament had offended him with their evil-tempered spirit, he should be glad to call another on the first convenient occasion, and that he intended to govern well in the interval.[2]

The first act the king did to make good his promise to govern well was to commit Coke and

Sir Robert Phillips to the Tower;—Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, and Mr. Mallery to other prisons,—and to send Sir Dudley Digges, Sir Thomas Crew, Sir Nathaniel Rich, and Sir James Parott on a commission into Ireland, as a sort of a cover for banishment. It was evident to every one that the offense of these men was their free conduct in the House of Commons, or, as in the case of Selden, who was not a member, conversations out-of-doors or writings in support of the privileges of parliament. It will be remembered that an opposition party had sprung up in the House of Lords; therefore several of the peers were called before the privy council, and one or two of them committed to the Tower.

It is said that Prince Charles was rather constant in his attendance in the House of Lords during this most significant session; but, if so, he certainly had neither the good sense nor the good fortune to understand its meanings and indications, or to perceive the great changes men's minds were undergoing—the mighty events that were indeed casting their shadows before them.

The day of the dissolution of parliament had well-nigh been that of the mortal dissolution of King James, for "he rode by coach to Theobald's to dinner, and, after dinner, riding on horseback abroad, his horse stumbled and cast his majesty into the New River, where the ice broke, and he fell in, so that nothing but his boots were seen. Sir Richard Yong was next, who alighted, went into the water, and lifted him out. There came much water out of his mouth and body; but his majesty rode back to Theobald's, went into a warm bed, and did well."[1]

A.D. 1622–3. At this time the popular feeling was greatly excited by the misfortunes and sufferings of the king's daughter, which, by a little exaggeration, were heightened into a wonderfully dramatic interest. The young and the brave declared themselves her champions, and troubled James with their enthusiasm. "The Lieutenant of the Middle Temple played a game this Christmas time, whereat his majesty was highly displeased. He made choice of some thirty of the civilest and best-fashioned gentlemen of the House to sup with him, and, being at supper, took a cup of wine in one hand, and held his sword drawn in the other, and so began a health to the distressed Lady Elizabeth; and, having drunk, kissed his sword, and laying his hand upon it, took an oath to live and die in her service; then delivered the cup and sword to the next, and so the health and ceremony went round."[2] Every step that the Palatine took was a blunder, and James could do little for him but send more ambassadors. His relation, the King of Denmark, was no longer able or willing to do him service; and the Dutch, who were said to have contributed to all his troubles, by urging him to accept the crown of Bohemia, could not do much by themselves. The Catholics of Antwerp turned all these illustrious parties into ridicule in their public theaters. A courier came puffing on the stage with cries of "News!—great news!" Upon being asked what news? he replied that the Count Palatine was likely to have a formidable army soon, for the King of Denmark was to send him a thousand, the Hollanders ten thousand, and the King of England a hundred thousand. Thousands of what? asked the bystanders? Oh! said the courier, the King of Denmark's are red herrings, the Hollanders are Dutch cheeses, and the King of England's are ambassadors.[1] At the same time they pictured King James at one place with a scabbard without a sword; in another with a sword which nobody could pull out of its sheath, though many kept tugging at it. In Brussels they painted him with his pockets turned inside out, and his purse empty: and at Antwerp they drew a large caricature, representing the ex-queen of Bohemia trudging on foot, with her child on her back, and her father, King James, carrying her cradle after her: and all these caustic specimens of art had stinging mottos, aimed more particularly at his sacred majesty.

The French, out of their ancient rivalry and jealousy of the House of Austria, and their love of war, would have been disposed to strike a blow for the dispossessed prince; but their young king, like our old king, was ruled by a despicable favorite:[2] their court was occupied by profligate intrigues and selfish factions; and their country was again the scene of a civil and religious war, for the Huguenots about this time rushed or were driven into open hostilities. Instead of being in a condition to lead an army to the Rhine, Louis XIII. saw himself compelled to lay siege to his own cities in the heart of France. The French Protestants, as usual, applied to England for assistance; but all that James could do for them was to transmit a few diplomatic messages to their young king. The French ministers told him, in return, that before he interfered with their persecutions of Protestants, he would do well to leave off persecuting his own Catholic subjects: and when the ambassador, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, became importunate, hoping that, when they had established peace at home by toleration, they would be the more easily disposed to assist the Palatine, the favorite Luynes told him that they would have none of his advice, and that they did not fear his master.[3] The Catholic priests, or at least such of them as were about the court, urged on the war against those of the religion; and the king's confessor "made a sermon upon the text that we should forgive our enemies; upon which argument, having said many good things, he at last distinguished forgiveness, and said, we were indeed to forgive our enemies, but not the enemies of God, such as were heretics, and particularly those of the religion; and that his majesty, as the most Christian king, ought to extirpate them whoresoever they could be found."[1] This was atrocious; but at the same time there was scarcely a better spirit on our side the Channel.

[2] Meade tells another story, not less amusing. "The gentlemen of Gray's Inn, to make an end of Christmas on Twelfth Night, in the dead time of the night, shot off all the chambers (small pieces of ordnance) they had borrowed from the Tower, being as many as filled four carts. The king awakened with this noise, started out of his bed, and cried "treason! treason!" The city was in an uproar, and the whole court almost in arms; the Earl of Arundel running to the bed-chamber with his sword drawn, as to rescue the king's person."

The Count Mansfeldt, and Prince Christian of Brunswick, after maintaining a wild sort of war, more on their own account than on that of the ex-King of Bohemia, evacuated the Palatinate, and took service with the Dutch: and James, who found it burdensome to pay the garrison, and who wished to propitiate his Catholic majesty, delivered up Frankendael to the Spaniards, upon their promise of restoring it if a satisfactory peace were not concluded in eighteen months. The emperor had already given the greater part of the Palatine's territories to the Duke of Bavaria, who was formerly invested with the electorate by the diet of Ratisbon. Without kingdom or electorate, without a province, without a house or home of his own, the luckless Palatine, with his wife and family, was left to subsist at the Hague upon a Dutch pension. But the Solomon of his age, his loving father-in-law, who found a gratification in the fulfillment of his prophecy, and who was little touched by his disgrace, saw elevation in this depression—a light in all this darkness. He had done the will of Spain in many things; he was doing it in more, even at the risk of a civil war at home; and he deluded himself with imagining that, with his own consummate skill and coolness, he had at last removed all obstacles to the Spanish match, and that the treaty of marriage would be followed by the entire restitution of the Palatinate to his son-in-law. Philip III. had died in the month of March, 1621, and had been succeeded by his son Philip IV., brother to the intended bride of Prince Charles. The Lord Digby, now Earl of Bristol, and special ambassador to the young sovereign, reported that he was favorable to the match, but that Philip could not marry his sister to a Protestant without a dispensation from the pope, and a full assurance that she should be left to the enjoyment of her own conscience and her own religion in England. Gondomar, who had returned from London to Madrid, to forward, as he said, the plans and wishes of his royal friend and boon companion, gave equally hopeful assurances. In fact, the King of Spain applied to Rome for a dispensation. James, impatient of delay—and the churchmen of Rome were seldom quick in these matters—dispatched an agent of his own (Mr. George Gage) to the Vatican, while his favorite, Buckingham, employed another. Nay, in his anxiety, James did, what he had done before in Scotland—he wrote himself two letters to the pope, or rather to two popes, for there was a death and a new election during the negotiations.[2]

It was well for James that the secret correspondence with Rome was not discovered by the Puritans, who, however, were wonderfully disquieted by certain proceedings which arose out of it and James's eagerness to gratify the pope. If what he did had been his own free and disinterested act, it would have entitled him to high praise. He issued pardons for recusancy to all English Catholics that should apply for them; and he ordered the judges on their circuits to discharge from prison every recusant that could find security for his reappearance. The prisoners thus liberated were counted by thousands. All the zealots took the alarm, and the Lord Bishop, and Lord Keeper Williams, to quiet their fears, represented, by order of the king, that this lenity was only meant to secure better treatment for the Protestants abroad; and that, though the recusants were released from prison, they had still the shackles about their heels, and might be seized again at the shortest notice. But some preachers thundered from their pulpits, and provoked his majesty to issue orders that no preacher, under the degree of bishop or dean, should, in preaching, deviate from the subject of his text; and that no preacher whatsoever should fall into bitter invectives or indecent railings against papists or Puritans. No doubt James thought to conciliate the latter class, but he was miserably mistaken: the loudest of the preachers of intolerance at this moment were Puritans in disguise: the Puritans, as a body, wished not for a toleration, but for a universal conformity to their particular faith and practice; they were bent on establishing a persecuting church of their own, and scorned to share a minor boon with papists and idolaters.

By the month of January, 1623, such progress was [1] Life of Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury, written by himself.

[2] The greatest caution was used in this correspondence. In the first letter, which was addressed to Gregory XV., James merely dwelt upon generalities, and, for what remained further to say, referred his holiness to the bearer, George Gage, who would deliver unto him more at large. The king did not even mention the marriage, or the toleration which was to accompany it. He only said that he was most anxious to put a stop to the calamities, discords, and bloodsheds which so miserably rent the Christian world; and that he hoped, as Catholics and Protestants agreed to worship the same most blessed Trinity, and to hope for salvation through the same Savior, that he and his holiness might agree to act together in putting an end to all these storms and rancors.—See Cabala.

James's second letter has not been discovered, but there are some allusions to it in a letter written by the prince to Buckingham. Charles's letter is a curiosity:—

"His majesty," says he, to his dear Steeny, "likes the last letter better than the first, only it has two faults, where the other has but one. In the first it has only this—that it binds his majesty to a promise, that if any of his majesty's popish subjects offend, he must let the pope know of it before he punish them, which ye may remember upon the inditing of the letter his majesty stuck upon; and the second error in the new letter is, that his majesty wishes the pope to expel the Jesuits by order. Now his majesty leaves the ordinary form of doing it to the pope, by his own ordinary ways; his majesty hath nothing ado to teach him by what order to do it. He has likewise put in the last letter before the subscription, S. V. devotissimus; whereas, in his majesty's letter to the former pope there was nothing written but his majesty's name. He likewise, in one place, at least of the second letter, omits to put in Romanos after Catholicos. Now, ye know my father has ever stood upon it, both by word and writing, that he is as good a Catholic as the pope himself; therefore, since they take to themselves the style of Catholic Roman, let them brook it a God's name, he will not scant them of a syllable of it. . . . As for your letter to the cardinal, he likes very well of it." The rest of the epistle is all about his majesty's amusements and sports. Charles says it will be against his majesty's heart to stay much longer at Theobalds, "where he can have no reception but to doil up and down the park, for there is no kind of field hawking there."—Hardwicke State Papers.

made in the Spanish match, that James and his son signed articles, promising that the English Catholics should be relieved from all kinds of persecution, and permitted to have their masses and other ceremonies in their own houses; and the Spanish king agreed to give his sister two millions of ducats, and to celebrate the espousals at Madrid (the Prince of Wales being represented by proxy), within forty days after the arrival of the dispensation from Rome. James wished to have the money, which was to be paid by instalments, at closer intervals; Charles wished to shorten the period, which, according to Spanish etiquet, was to elapse between the espousals and the actual marriage; and both appear to have apprehended that the business, which had already been seven years on the carpet, might still be spun out a year or two longer, if left to the management of ministers and diplomatists. It is said that the strange idea of the prince's journey into Spain was first suggested by a few words which dropped from Olivares, the Spanish favorite, who said, or who was reported to have said, to an English envoy, that, if Charles were himself at Madrid, all would go on well. But, if Olivares really said this, he certainly never expected that the heir-apparent of the English crown would undertake such a Quixotic journey. Charles and Buckingham, however, suddenly made up their minds to become travelers. If the precious scheme had not been seconded by the all-prevailing minion, it would assuredly have failed through the opposition of the king. Various motives are assigned for Buckingham's going into it with the eagerness he did: according to some, he already hated the Earl of Bristol, and was jealous of the consideration and the influence over the mind of the Spanish Infanta which that nobleman would obtain, if he were left to bring the match to completion, and conduct the bride into England; while Clarendon says, not only that he entered into the scheme to gain favor with the prince, but that he originated it, and that it was "the beginning of an entire confidence between them, after a long time of declared jealousy and displeasure on the prince's part, and occasion enough administered on the other." But we can discover nothing of these displeasures and jealousies; there is, on the contrary, every ground for believing that Buckingham and the prince had long lived on the most friendly terms, and the favorite was not likely to forget the advice given to him at the beginning of his career at court by Bacon.[1] There can be no doubt, however, that the merit of the project rested entirely with the prince and the favorite, who concerted in private how they should prevail over the king. One morning Charles waited upon his father, declaring that he had an earnest desire and suit, upon which the happiness of his life depended; but that, as the doing or not doing what he desired depended wholly and entirely upon his majesty's approbation and command, he would not communicate the substance of his suit without his father's promise to decide upon it himself, and not to consult with, or communicate the secret to, any person whatsoever. James gave his promise, and then grew very eager to know what this great secret could be. Then, watching the moods and turns of the king's humor, and seizing their opportunity, Charles fell on his knees, and stated his request, the duke standing by without saying a word. The king talked over the whole matter to the prince with less passion than they expected, and then looked at the favorite, as inclined to hear what he would say. Buckingham spoke nothing to the point, but enlarged upon the infinite obligation his majesty would confer upon the prince by his yielding to the violent passion his highness was transported with; and then, after he had gone on to state that his refusal would make a deep impression upon the spirits and peace of mind of his only son, Charles, seeing that his father was touched, put in his word, and represented that his arrival at Madrid must certainly be presently followed by his marriage, and in a moment determine the restitution of the Palatinate to his brother and sister. "These discourses, urged with all the artifice and address imaginable, so far wrought upon and prevailed with the king, that, with less hesitation than his nature was accustomed to, and much less than was agreeable to his great wisdom, he gave his approbation, and promised that the prince should make the journey he was so much inclined to." But as soon as James was left to his reflections he bitterly repented; and, when his son and favorite next presented themselves, he fell into a great passion, with tears, and told them that he was undone, and that it would break his heart if they persisted; and after exposing to them the uselessness and danger of such a journey, the power it would give the Spaniards, the jealousies and suspicions it would excite among the English, he implored them to release him from his promise, and concluded, as he had begun, with sighs and tears. Neither the prince nor the favorite took any pains to answer the reasons his majesty had insisted on: but Charles put him in mind of the sacredness of his promise, telling him that the breaking of it would make him never think more of marriage; and Buckingham, who, according to the royalist historian, better knew what kind of arguments were of force with him, treated him more rudely, telling him that nobody could believe any thing he said, when he retracted so soon the promise he had so solemnly made; and that he plainly perceived it all proceeded from another breach of his word, in communicating with some rascal who had furnished him with those pitiful reasons. His majesty passionately, and with many oaths, denied that he had communicated the matter to any person living; and presently, con-

[1] In his celebrated Letter of Advice to George Villiers, when he first became favorite. The very long and elaborate epistle concludes with these words:—

"I have but one thing more to mind you of, which nearly concerns yourself: you serve a great and gracious master, and there is a most hopeful young prince, whom you must not desert; it behooves you to carry yourself wisely and evenly between them both: adore not so the rising son, that you forget the father who raised you to this height, nor be you so obsequious to the father, that you give just cause to the son to suspect that you neglect him; but carry yourself with that judgment, as, if it be possible, you may please and content them both, which, truly, I believe will be no hard matter for you to do; so may you live long beloved of both, which is the hearty prayer of

quered by the "humble and importunate entreaty," of his son, and "the rougher dialect of his favorite, he withdrew his opposition to the journey; and it was settled that in two days they should take their leave," his highness pretending to hunt at Theobald's, and the duke to take physic at Chelsea. They told the king that, as it was before resolved they should only take two persons with them, they had selected Sir Francis Cottington and Endymion Porter as men grateful to his majesty and well acquainted with Spain. The king approved of their choice, and called for Sir Francis Cottington, who was in waiting. "Cottington will be against the journey," whispered Buckingham to the prince. "No, sir," said Charles, "he dares not." But the prince was somewhat mistaken; for, when the king told Cottington that Baby Charles and Steeny had a mind to go by post into Spain, to fetch home the infanta, and commanded him to tell him, as an honest man, what he thought about it, Cottington, after such a trembling that he could hardly speak, told the king that the expedition was unwise and unsafe; and then the king threw himself upon his bed, crying, "I told you so, I told you so before; I shall be undone, and lose Baby Charles." The prince and Buckingham were furious, and the latter fell upon poor Cottington as if he had been a courier or post-boy, telling him that he should repent his presumption as long as he lived. This put the king into a new agony. "Nay, by God, Steeny," said he, "you are very much to blame to use him so: he answered me directly to the question I asked him, and very honestly and wisely." After all this passion on both sides, James again yielded, plainly perceiving, it is said, that the whole intrigue had been originally contrived by Buckingham, whom he durst not oppose, and whom Clarendon says he was never well pleased with afterward. On the 17th of February, 1623, the two knights-errant took their leave of the king, and on the following day they began their journey from New Hall, in Essex, a seat which Buckingham had recently purchased, setting out with disguised beards and borrowed names. The prince was John Smith—the noble marquis, Thomas Smith. They were attended only by Sir Richard Graham, master of the horse to the marquis, and "of inward trust about him." On crossing the river to Gravesend they excited suspicion, by giving a piece of gold to the ferry-man, and were near being stopped at Rochester. On ascending the hill beyond that city they were perplexed at seeing the French ambassador in the king's coach, "which made them baulk the road, and teach post-hackneys to leap hedges." At Canterbury an officious mayor would have arrested them, but Buckingham took off his beard, and told him who he was. Then, on the road, the baggage post-boy, who had been at court, got a glimmering who they were, but his mouth was easily shut—at least so they thought. At Dover they found Sir Francis Cottington and Master Endymion Porter, who had been sent before to provide a vessel; and on the following morning they hoisted their adventurous sails for the French coast.[1] Even as a masquerade the performance did them little credit, for they were discovered nearly everywhere they went; and as for their secret being kept at court, it was blown abroad through town and country almost as soon as they put on their false beards. For a day or two, however, it was not known whither they had directed their steps. When it was discovered that the prince was going to Spain, to throw himself among priests and monks, familiars and inquisitors, there was a dreadful consternation among the people, who declared at once that he would never come back alive, or if he did, he would come a papist. James commanded his clergy "neither in their sermons nor prayers to prejudicate his journey, but yet to pray to God to preserve him in his journey, and grant him a safe return unto us, yet not in more nor in any other words."[1] James heard not the alarming talk of the people; and a week or two after the prince's departure he let loose at once all the Jesuits and seminary priests that were in prison in London. He, however, thought fit to send two Protestant chaplains after Baby Charles, "together with all stuff and ornaments fit for the service of God." "I have fully instructed them" (the chaplains), says his majesty, in announcing their departure, "so as all their behavior and service shall, I hope, prove decent and agreeable to the purity of the primitive church, and yet so near the Roman form as can lawfully be done; for it hath ever been my way to go with the church of Rome usque ad aras."[2]

At the same time James sent an ambassador from the King of Spain, and a Flemish ambassador, to visit the universities, which two learned bodies had made themselves very conspicuous by their servility and fulsome adulation, and their prompt falling in with the whims of the court. On this occasion the men of Cambridge seem to have surpassed themselves; vice-chancellor, doctors, regents, non-regents, all met the ambassadors at Trinity College gate; they gave up the greater part of the college

[1] Meade's Letter to Sir M. Stuteville. This amusing newsmonger in another letter gives a pleasant jest. "The Bishop of London, you know, gave order, from his majesty, to the clergy, not to prejudicate the prince's journey in their prayers, but only to pray God to return him home in safety again to us, and no more. An honest plain preacher, being loth to transgress the order given, desired, in his prayer, 'That God would return our noble prince home in safety again to us, and no more:' supposing the words no more to be a piece of the prayer enjoined, whereas the bishop's meaning was, they should use no more words, but that form only."—Sir H. Ellis.

[2] The two chaplains selected were Dr. Mawe, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, afterward Bishop of Bath and Wells, and Dr. Wren, afterward Bishop of Norwich, and then of Ely. They had some scruples and misgivings as to how they should behave; and on taking their leave of the king, who was hunting at Newmarket, they asked his advice what they should do, if they chanced to meet the host carried in the streets, as the manner is. The king told them that they should avoid meeting it if they could; if not, they must do as people did there. Meade, who tells the story, says this was a very hard case. The Puritans, if they knew it, must have set it down as something worse. The "stuff and ornaments" were never used at Madrid. Howell, writing on the spot, says, "The prince hath no public exercise of devotion, but only bedchamber prayers; and some think that his lodging in the king's house is like to prove a disadvantage to the main business; for, whereas most sorts of people here hardly hold us to be Christians, if the prince had a palace of his own, and been permitted to have used a room for an open chapel, to exercise the Liturgy of the Church of England, it would have brought them to have a better opinion of us; and to this end there were some of our best church plate and vestments brought hither, but never used."—Letters.

for their use; they addressed them with a speech in every college they went to see; and their orators fathered the foundation of the university upon the Spaniards, out of an old legend about Cantaber, and told the ambassadors how happy they should be to have the Spanish blood come hither. When their excellencies walked privately into King's College chapel, in the middle of prayer-time, they broke off their prayers in the middle to salute and entertain them. The doctors pledged healths fathoms deep to the infanta, the promised bride; and, if any of them left heel-taps in their glasses, the Spanish ambassador, who was a jovial person, or who had caught the genius of the place (like Gondomar at court), would cry "Super naculum! super naculum!"[1] The two ambassadors, two gentlemen of their retinue, and Sir Lewis Lewknor, the master of the ceremonies, were all made masters of arts. The ambassadors requested the same honor for one Ogden, a Catholic priest, a native of Cambridge, and once belonging to St. John's College; but this was denied them as a thing not in the power of the university unless he would take the oaths. "Upon this," adds the Cantab, "the said Ogden out-faced us all on our own dung-hill, and threatened us all openly that the king should know of it, and such like."[2]

Meanwhile, the prince and Buckingham, or, as the king addressed them, the "sweet boys and dear venturous knights, worthy to be put in a new romanso," continued their journey in disguise. Late one night, the English ambassador at Paris, Mr. Edward Herbert, afterward Lord Herbert of Cherbury, was waited upon by one Andrews, a Scotchman, who asked him whether he had seen the prince. The ambassador asked what prince? "He told me," says Herbert, "the Prince of Wales, which yet I could not believe easily, until, with many oaths, he affirmed the prince was in France, and that he had charge to follow his highness, desiring me, in the mean while, on the part of the king, my master, to serve his passage the best I could."[3] Though nettled that the prince should have passed without visiting him and letting him into the secret, Herbert, full of anxiety for his safety, went, very early the next morning, to Monsieur Puisieux, principal secretary of state, whom, in his urgency, he dragged out of bed, telling him he had important business to dispatch. The French secretary's first words were, "I know your business as well as you. Your prince is departed this morning post to Spain!"[4] And then he added that he would suffer him quietly to hold his way without interrupting him. The French ministry certainly did not regard the matrimonial alliance between England and Spain with pleasant feelings; but what they more immediately apprehended was that Charles, who was stealing secretly through their kingdom, might have dangerous communications with the disaffected or revolting Huguenots; and, when Herbert requested that no one might be sent after him, the secretary replied, politely and adroitly, that he could do no less than send some one to know how the prince fared on his journey. The hint was enough: Herbert hurried home and dispatched a courier after Charles, warning him to make all the haste he could out of France, and not to treat with any of the religion on the way, since his being in Paris was publicly known, and, though the French secretary of state had promised that he should not be interrupted, yet they were sending after him, and might, if he gave an occasion of suspicion, perchance detain him. The ambassador afterward learned that Charles had spent the whole of the preceding day in "seeing the French court and city of Paris, without that any body did know his person, but a maid that had sold linen heretofore in London, who, seeing him pass by, said, certainly this is the Prince of Wales, but withal suffered him to hold his way, and presumed not to follow him,"[1] On that same night the prince had written to tell his father how he and Buckingham had been at court, without being known by any one, where he saw the young queen, and little monsieur, and nineteen "fair dancing ladies" practicing a masque, and the queen was the handsomest of them all, which had wrought in him the greater desire to see her sister.[2] Among these fair dancing ladies was one really destined to become his wife, and it has been suspected that the dark eyes of Henrietta Maria now fascinated Charles, and that he went to pay his court to the infanta with his mind preoccupied by another. At Bayonne the venturous knights were detained and examined, and, for a moment, fancied they would not be allowed to proceed across the Pyrenees; but their fears proved to be unfounded, and they presently crossed the Spanish frontier. At the close of an evening toward the end of March, two mules stopped at the house of my Lord of Bristol in Madrid. The riders alighted. Mr. Thomas Smith went in first, with a portmanteau under his arm; and then Mr. John Smith, who staid awhile on the other side of the street in the dark, was sent for. When the diplomatist recognized in this John Smith the heir to the English crown, and in Thomas the Marquis of Buckingham, he stared as if he had seen two ghosts; but presently he took the prince up to his bed-chamber, wrote a letter, and dispatched a courier that night to acquaint the King of England

[4] The two travelers, it appears, were recognized even before they finished their journey from Boulogne to Paris. "Some three posts before, they had met with two German gentlemen that came newly from England, where they had seen at Newmarket the prince and the marquis taking coach together with the king, and retained such a strong impression of them both that they now betrayed some knowledge of their persons; but were out faced by Sir Richard Graham, who would needs persuade them they were mistaken."—Reliquiæ Wottonianæ.

[1] Reliquiæ Wottonianæ. It should appear that Charles and Buckingham were two days in Paris. According to Lord Herbert, "The Duke of Savoy said that the prince's journey was un tiro di quelli cavallieri antichi che andavano cosi per il mondo a diffare li incanti; that it was a trick of those ancient knights-errant, who went up and down the world after that manner to undo enchantments."

how his son, in less than sixteen days, had arrived safely at the capital of Spain. The next day Sir Francis Cottington and Mr. Porter rode into Madrid, the prince and Buckingham having outridden them, and dark rumors ran in every corner how some great man was come from England; "and some would not stick to say, among the vulgar, it was the king."[1] Knowing that their arrival must be discovered, and, not wishing the discovery to be made by a postillion, the prince and the favorite lost no time in sending for Count Gondomar, the man who had sent Raleigh to the block, and who was now in very high favor at court.[2] Gondomar hastened to Lord Bristol's, and then back to the palace (we must use the words of Charles, in the joint letter he and Buckingham wrote to Solomon), and "presently went to the Condé of Olivares, and as speedily got me your dog Steenie a private audience of the king; and, when I was to return back to my lodging, the Condé of Olivares himself alone would accompany me back again to salute the prince in his king's name." "The next day" (we continue the story in the appropriate language of the other chief performer in it) "we had a private visit of the king, the queen, the infanta, Don Carlos, and the cardinal, in the sight of all the world, and I may call it a private obligation hidden from nobody; for there was the pope's nuncio, the emperor's ambassador, the French, and all the streets filled with guards and other people; before the king's coach went the best of the nobility, after followed all the ladies of the court; we sat in an invisible coach, because nobody was suffered to take notice of it, though seen by all the world; in this form they passed three times by us, but before we could get away, the Condé of Olivares came into our coach and conveyed us home, where he told us the king longed and died for want of a nearer sight of our wooer. First, he took me in his coach to go to the king; we found him walking in the streets, with his cloak thrown over his face, and a sword and buckler by his side; he leaped into the coach, and away he came to find the wooer in another place appointed, where there passed much kindness and compliment one to another." Steenie goes on to tell his master that Philip is in raptures with the journey and with the prince; that Olivares, the potent favorite, had told him, that very morning, that, if the pope would not give a dispensation for a wife, they would give the infanta to his son Baby "as his wench;" and that he had just written to the pope's nephew, entreating him to hasten the dispensation. He then mentions that the Pope's nuncio, at Madrid, was working maliciously against the match, and concludes with these ominous words:—"We make this collection, that the pope will be very loth to grant a dispensation, which, if he will not do, then we would gladly have your directions how far we may engage you in the acknowledgment of the pope's special power, for we almost find, if you will be contented to acknowledge the pope chief head under Christ, that the match will be made without him."[1] Meanwhile, all honor was paid by the Spanish court to the Prince of Wales: grandees were appointed to attend him, and various diversions were proposed to amuse him till the time of his solemn entrance and public reception, when the king was to charge himself with his entertainment, and keep him company. On the Sunday afternoon, Charles having signified his desire to see his bride again, the king went abroad to take the air with the queen, his two brothers, and the infanta, who were all in one coach; but the infanta sat in the boot, with a blue ribbon about her arm, on purpose that the prince might distinguish her. The royal carriage was followed by twenty coaches, full of grandees and ladies. Then his highness of Wales, with the Earl of Bristol and Gondomar, took coach and drove to the Prado, where he met and passed the king's carriage three several times. As there had been no public presentation, etiquet did not allow his majesty to notice the prince or stop his coach; but as soon as the infanta saw the prince, her color rose."[2] The infanta, Donna Maria, who was then in the bloom of youth, is thus described by the lively and attentive observer of these doings:—"She is a very comely lady, rather of a Flemish complexion than Spanish, fair-haired, and carrying a most pure mixture of red and white in her face. She is full and big-lipped, which is held a beauty rather than a blemish."[3] According to this portrait, the fair Spaniard must have been less striking than the lively, black-eyed Frenchwoman. In the following week Charles was amused with hunting and hawking, and parties of pleasure to the Casa de Campo; but on Sunday he was conducted to the royal monastery of St. Jerome, whence the kings of Spain were wont to proceed on the day of their coronation. As soon as he was there, Philip, attended by his two brothers, his eight ministers of state, and the flower of the Spanish nobility, went to bring him back in triumph to Madrid. Charles rode at the king's right hand, through the heart of the town, under a great canopy, and was brought so into his lodgings in the king's palace, and the king himself accompa-

[2] Gondomar had lost none of his wit and genius in compliment-making. "I have forgot to tell you," says Howell, "that Count Gondomar being sworn councilor of state that morning, having been before but one of the council of war, he came in great haste to visit the prince, saying he had strange news to tell him, which was, that an Englishman was sworn privy councilor of Spain, meaning himself, who, he said, was an Englishman in his heart."

[1] Hardwicke State Papers. This letter, like the many other joint letters, is signed, "Your majesty's humble and obedient son and servant, Charles—Your humble slave and dog, Steenie." This name, the Scotch for Stephen, is said to have been bestowed by James upon his minion in allusion to St. Stephen, who is always painted as a good-looking saint.

[3] Howell. In the following short epistle to the king will be found Buckingham's description of the infanta, from the Hardwicke State Papers:—

"Dear Dad and Gossip—The chiefest advertisement of all we omitted in our other letter, which was to let you know how we like your daughter, his wife, and my lady mistress; without flattery, I think there is not a sweeter creature in the world. Baby Charles himself is so touched at the heart, that he confesses all he ever yet saw is nothing to her, and swears that, if he want her, there shall be blows. I shall lose no time in hastening their conjunction, in which I shall please him, her, you, and myself most of all, in thereby getting liberty to make the speedier haste to lay myself at your feet; for never none longed more to be in the arms of his mistress. So, craving your blessing, I end, "Your humble slave and dog, nied him to his very bedchamber. "It was a very glorious sight to behold," says our reporter, who adds, that the common people were enthusiastic in their applause, and did mightily magnify the gallantry of the prince's journey. From his apartment (it was the most magnificent in the palace) Charles proceeded to visit the royal family. Four chairs of precisely equal size (an important matter) were placed under a canopy of state; one for the king, one for the queen, one for the infanta, and one for his highness of Wales. The Earl of Bristol attended, as usual, as interpreter, for Charles knew no Spanish, and the royal personages possessed no one language in common. It is said that the queen spoke first, and that the conversation was carried on for half an hour in a most spirited and agreeable manner.[1] When Charles went back to his chamber, he found many costly presents which the queen had sent him.[2] Though he had arrived so poorly attended, the Prince of Wales had by this time a pretty numerous retinue, which kept increasing with fresh arrivals from England. James made haste to send the Earl of Carlisle to the French court to excuse his son's incognito. Carlisle was accompanied by Lord Mountjoy; and when they had given their explanations at Paris, these two lords rode on toward Madrid. A few days after this, James hurried off, in the same track, Master Kirk and Master Gabriel to carry Georges and Garters with all speed, and the Lords Holland, Rochfort, Denbigh, Andover, Vaughan, and Kensington, and a whole troop of courtiers, to keep "the sweet boys" company. Others followed from time to time, some going by land and some by sea—some receiving money from the king, and some defraying their own expenses. Archibald Armstrong, the famous court fool, was among these travelers to Madrid, so that, by the time they all arrived, his royal highness must have had a tolerably complete court. This said Archy, notwithstanding his professsion, and the cap and bells, was a stout Presbyterian or Puritan, and, as such, very much averse to the Catholic match. "Our cousin Archy," says the attentive observer of this court comedy, "hath more privilege than any; for he often goes with his fool's coat where the infanta is with her Meninas and ladies of honor, and keeps a blowing and blustering among them, and blurts out what he list."[3] They were altogether an ill-bred, disorderly crew, and the wonder is, that with such conflicting prejudices, and such fiery tempers as those of the Spaniards, they did not get knocked on the head. Before quarreling about religion, they quarreled about cookery—a point on which rationality is extremely susceptible, every people considering their own kitchen, like their own religion, not merely the best, but the only good one in the world. The King of Spain "used all industry to give contentment" to this rabble rout, and appointed his own servants to wait upon them at table in the palace; "where," adds Howell, "I am sorry to hear some of them jeer at the Spanish fare, and use other slighting speeches and demeanor." King Philip, a weak youth of nineteen, but accomplished, cheerful, and good-natured, associated familiarly with Charles, who was four years his senior; but not only the rigid etiquet of that court, but also the universal custom of the country, were opposed to any tête-à-tête, or private meetings, between the English prince and his bride. He was, however, allowed plenty of opportunities of seeing her in company. "There are comedians," says Howell, "once a-week come to the palace, where, under a great canopy, the queen and the infanta sit in the middle, our prince and Don Carlos on the queen's right hand, the king and the little cardinal on the infanta's left hand. I have seen the prince have his eyes immovably fixed upon the infant a half an hour together, in a thoughtful, speculative posture, which sure would needs be tedious, unless affection did sweeten it: it was no handsome comparison of Olivares that he watched her as a cat doth a mouse." But, though the prince was thus demure in public, he ventured upon a freak of a very strange and indecorous kind. "Understanding," says Howell, in a letter to Captain Thomas Porter, "that the infanta was used to go some mornings to the Casa de Campo, a summer-house the king hath on the other side the river, to gather May-dew, he rose betime, and went thither, taking your brother (Endymion Porter) with him; they were let into the house, and into the garden, but the infanta was in the orchard. And there being a high partition wall between, and the door doubly bolted, the prince got on the top of the wall, and sprung down a great height, and so made toward her; but she, spying him first of all the rest, gave a shriek, and ran back: the old marquis that was then her guardian came toward the prince, and fell on his knees conjuring his highness to retire, in regard he hazarded his head if he admitted any to her company: so the door was opened, and he came out under that wall over which he had got in."

One of the graces conferred on Charles was the release of all the prisoners in Madrid, and the royal promise that, for a whole month, any petition presented through him should be granted; but he showed himself wonderfully sparing in receiving any such petitions, especially from any Englishman, Irishman, or Scot.[1] Bull-fights,[2] feasts, fencing-matches, religious processions, tournaments, hunts, and feasts, were exhibited in rapid succession, to while away the time. Charles began to study Spanish—the infanta English. King James, in one of his paternal letters, besought Baby Charles and Steenie not to forget their dancing, though they should whistle and sing the one to the other, like Jack and Tom, for fault of better music. "But," he adds in the same letter, "you must be as sparing as you can in your spending, for your officers are already put to the height of their speed to provide the £5,000 by exchange, and now your tilting stuff, which they know not how to provide, will come to three more; and God knows how my coffers are already drained. I know no remedy, except you procure the speedy payment of that £150,000 which was once promised to be advanced. . . . . . I pray you, my baby, take heed of being hurt if you run at tilt."[1] But James was not blind to the peril of acting upon Charles and Buckingham's suggestions of acknowledging the pope; and in reply to that particular part of their letter, he told them that he knew not what was meant by his acknowledging the pope's spiritual supremacy; that he was sure they would not have him renounce his religion for all the world; that all he could guess at their meaning was, that it might be an allusion to a passage in his book against Cardinal Bellarmin, where he offered, if the pope would quit his godhead and usurping over kings, to acknowledge him for the chief bishop, to whom all appeal to churchmen ought to lie, en dernier ressort. "And this," continued his majesty, "is the farthest that my conscience will permit me to go upon this point; for I am not a monsieur, who can shift his religion as easily as he can shift his shirt when he cometh from tennis."[2] Buckingham, whose mother was an avowed papist—and in all things this woman had the greatest influence over her son—would, in all probability, have voted readily for a change in religion; but the decided feelings of some of the English people about him, and his own reflections, shallow as they were, must have dispelled any such notion. That the Spanish court flattered itself with the hope of reclaiming Prince Charles, and, by his means, reconciling the English nation to the church of Rome—nay, that efforts were made to bring about this great end—is undeniable; and if Charles was, as that not very religious courtier, the Earl of Carlisle expressed it, well grounded "in piety and knowledge of the religion wherein he was bred," and if he escaped the dogmas of papal supremacy, purgatory, and transubstantiation, he certainly contracted a fondness—a passion—which afterward proved fatal to him, for a gorgeous hierarchy and a splendid ceremonial in the Anglican church. Nor did he ever frankly close the door to the Spaniard's hope, or honestly declare, that neither his conviction nor his interest would permit him to recant. Every part of this story is interesting and important, as tending to throw light on the character of Charles. If properly attended to, the reader will understand how the English people were ever after doubtful of his word and promise. He entreated his father to advise as little with his council as was possible, but to trust to the discretion of himself and Buckingham; and he asked and obtained from the weakness of James a pledge of full power, conceived in the following words, which he and Buckingham had remitted as a copy: "We do hereby promise, by the word of a king, that whatsoever you our son shall promise in our name, we shall punctually perform."[1] The Catholic refugees from England gathered round the prince and Buckingham, and were for some time cheered with the prospect of a most ample toleration in their native land, if not of the reëstablishment of their religion to the exclusion of all other faiths. The priests tampered with Charles's attendants and servants, a kind of proceeding which greatly irritated the sturdier Protestants. One day Sir Edmund Varney found a learned priest, a doctor of the Sorbonne, by the bedside of one of the prince's pages, who was sick of a deadly fever, and he put a stop to his labors of conversion by doubling his fists instead of arguments, and hitting the priest under the ear.[2]

At the same time the Spanish court represented to the pope that Prince Charles would become a good Catholic, or, if he did not, would secure every advantage to the professors of that religion in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Gregory XV. had already written to the inquisitor-general of Spain, expressing his desire that the most should be made of the opportunity offered by Heaven itself. "We understand," says the pope, "that the Prince of Wales, the King of Great Britain's son, is lately arrived there, carried with a hope of Catholic marriage. Our desire is that he should not stay in vain in the courts of those kings to whom the defense of the pope's authority, and care of advancing religion, hath procured the renowned name of Catholic. Wherefore, by apostolic letters, we exhort his Catholic majesty that he would greatly endeavor sweetly to reduce that prince to the obedience of the Roman church, to which the ancient kings of Great Britain have (with Heaven's approbation) submitted their crowns and scepters. Now, to the attaining of this victory, which to the conquered promiseth triumphs and principalities of heavenly felicity, we need not exhaust the king's treasure, nor levy armies of furious soldiers; but we must fetch from heaven the armor of light, whose divine splendor may allure that prince's eye, and gently expel all errors from his mind. Now, in the managing of these businesses, what power and art you have, we have well known long ago: wherefore we wish you to go like a religious counselor to the Catholic king, and to try all ways which, by this present occasion, may benefit the kingdoms of Britain and the church of Rome. The matter is of great weight and moment, and therefore not to be amplified with words. Whosoever shall inflame the mind of this royal youth with the love of the Catholic religion, and breed a hate in him of heretical impiety, shall begin to open the kingdom of heaven to the Prince of Britain, and to gain the kingdoms of Britain to the apostolic see."[1] Soon after, Gregory addressed a gentle letter to Prince Charles himself, exhorting him to embrace the religion of his ancestors, and expressing his hope that, as he intended to match with a Catholic damsel, he would give new life to that piety for which the kings of England had been so celebrated.[2] (The Catholics, who generally believed—as indeed they still believe—that the religion of England had been changed wholly and solely on account of Henry VIII.'s irregular marriage with Anne Boleyn, thought it perfectly natural that it should be rechanged by another royal marriage.) The proofs on record are too numerous and glaring to permit us to challenge the position that Charles was an early proficient in hypocrisy. He wrote a letter to the pope, in reverential terms, calling him Most Holy Father, telling him how much he deplored the divisions in the Christian church, and how anxious he was to restore union.[3] Gregory XV. died before this epistle reached Rome; but his successor, Urban VIII., considered it as equivalent to a recantation, and, in answering it, the new pontiff said, "We lifted up our hands to heaven and gave thanks to the Father of mercies, when, in the very entry of our reign, a British prince began to perform this kind of obeisance to the Pope of Rome."[4] The events at the Vatican occasioned delay. Gregory had dispatched a dispensation, which was in the hands of the legate at Madrid, who, however, had orders not to deliver it until he had made a surer bargain with the English court as to a full toleration, at least, of the Catholic religion; and now the Spanish court declared that it was essential to obtain a confirmation of the bull from the new pope. Olivares, moreover, remodeled the matrimonial treaty, inserting several new clauses.[5] It was provided that the infanta should have an open oratory, or chapel, in the palace, that she should choose the nurses and governesses of her children. and that her children should be brought up by her till they were at least ten years of age; that her children's proving Catholics should not exclude them from the succession; and, finally, that the King of England should give security for the fulfillment of these stipulations. James ratified all these clauses; but as for security, he could give none beyond his word, and that was not very highly valued. His majesty, however, did not sign without hesitation and fear: he felt that to obtain the sanction of his parliament would be impossible; but that which "pinched and perplexed him most," was, that he had given his power to Prince Charles, according to which power his royal highness had already concluded all these articles, and promised the required security; so that now "it went upon the honor of his majesty and the prince, and perhaps upon the liberty of his highness, his power to return home, and the safety of his person." Between tender considerations of honor, security of his estate, fatherly love, and conscience, "his majesty debated some days with as much wisdom, natural affection, courage, and piety, as became a great, wise, religious king, and tender, loving father"[1]—at least so saith his secretary. In the end, his majesty, in his great perplexity, resolved to call some of the most eminent of his council (he had hitherto kept them in the dark as much as he could, at the earnest prayer of his son), that he might open himself to them, and receive their advice. These chosen councilors met the king at Wanstead. "His majesty," continues Secretary Conway, "made the most serious, the most sad, fatherly, kingly, wise, pious, manly, stout speech that ever I heard, which no man can repeat or relate (without blemishing) but himself. But this effect it wrought—all the lords were of opinion that his highness's words and articles must be made good; that the oath by the council must be taken; and with one voice gave counsel (as without which nothing could be well) that the prince must marry and bring his lady away with him this year—this old year; or else, the prince presently to return without marriage or contract; leaving both those to be accomplished by the usual forms." A day or two after this meeting at Wanstead, both the king and the lords of the council swore to observe the treaty in the Chapel Royal at Westminster. Several of the lords who took this oath, which was valueless and strictly illegal without consent of parliament, did it unwillingly through fear or interest. Among them was Abbot, the half Puritan primate, who had been in great trouble and humiliation on account of an unhappy accident.[2] James afterward privately swore to observe certain secret articles in the treaty. The Spanish ambassadors then desired that he would make a beginning, and publish a proclamation forbidding all persecution of Catholics; but James, fearful of so public a measure, told them that a proclamation was but a suspension of the law, which might be made void by another proclamation, and which did not bind a

[2] Rushworth. Howell tells the same story, a day or two after it happened, thus—"Mr. Washington, the prince's page, is lately dead of a calenture, and I was at his burial under a fig-tree behind my Lord of Bristol's house. A little before his death, one Ballard, an English priest, went to tamper with him; and Sir Edmund Varney meeting him coming down the stairs out of Washington's chamber, they fell from words to blows, but they were parted. The business was like to gather very ill blood, and to come to a great height, had not Count Gondomar quashed it, which I believe he could not have done unless the times had been favorable; for such is the reverence they bear to the Church here, and so holy a conceit they have of all ecclesiastics, that the greatest don in Spain will tremble to offer the meanest of them any outrage or affront."

[5] By this time Buckingham had quarreled with the Spanish favorite. "There is some distaste," writes Howell, "taken at the Duke of Buckingham here, and I heard this king should say he would treat no more with him, but with the ambassadors, who, he saith, have a more plenary commission, and understand the business better. As there is also some darkness happened betwixt the two favorites, so matters stand not right betwixt the duke and the Earl of Bristol."—Letters. Howell saw at this moment that these bickerings might "renverse this business of so high a consequence."

[2] Abbot, while hunting with the Lord Zouch, shot a gamekeeper instead of a fat buck, at which he had taken aim. In consequence of this unintentional homicide, the archbishop, according to canon law, had become incapacitated for exercising his functions. After suffering much anxiety, he was absolved by James, who claimed the same kind of power which the Catholics acknowledged in the pope. This obligation, however, did not always bind the primate to the king's will; he repeatedly resisted that will; and if his motives are not altogether above suspicion, it will be difficult to deny to Abbot the credit of more courage than can be allowed to the rest of the bishops.

successor. Still, however, the two Spanish diplomatists fought hard for their proclamation. James offered in lieu to give an indemnity to the Catholics for the time to come, to give order for a pardon for all things past that stood to the advantage of the king and in his power to release; and for the time to come, to give likewise under his majesty's seal a dispensation from all penal laws, statutes, or ordinances whatsoever the Catholics were subject to for their consciences. And the ambassadors were told of the inviolable dignity of the great seal, of the roundness and integrity of his majesty's intentions, and of the impropriety of a proclamation in a constitutional point of view. But when the proposed immunity, with a prohibition to bishops, judges, and magistrates, was submitted to the Lord Keeper Williams, he refused to issue it as being a dangerous thing without a precedent. The ambassadors, who must have learned and seen that James and his son contracted for far more than they could perform, intimated to their court that a full toleration of the Catholics in England was all but hopeless. At the same time, with the usual sincerity of diplomatists, they told the King of England that his majesty had fulfilled every jot of that he was bound to, and more;[1] and James prepared presents and jewels—Buckingham and his son had almost emptied his purse and his diamond cases before this[2]—to be laid at the foot of the infanta, and a small fleet of ships to carry her to England with her sweet husband. At London it was generally believed that this long treaty was settled at last, and even at Madrid grand festivals were given as if in honor of the approaching union. But Olivares, the pope's nuncio, and a junta of Spanish priests, to whom the business was referred, found many reasons for avoiding a final settlement; and still the new pope delayed sending a new dispensation. When it was perceived that Charles, and, still more, the double favorite Buckingham, were eager to return home, it was proposed that the marriage, when the pope was willing, should be solemnized in Spain, and that the princess and her dower should not be sent to England till the spring of the following year, by which time his English majesty would be able to carry into effect his good intentions toward his Catholic subjects. But this proposal was odious to James, who had set his heart upon having a large instalment immediately; and he again urged his son and Buckingham to return home, with the infanta, and some money if possible,—if not, without them. It is probable, however, that the poor king might long have urged their return in vain, if it had not been for the quarrels and disgust which Buckingham had excited at Madrid, and for certain fears and jealousies he entertained of what was passing in London. Since his departure, that he might be more on a level with the grandees, James had made him a duke; but no move in the soiled and disgraced peerage-book could elevate this man's mind or improve his manners. His levity, choleric disposition, and low profligacy disgusted the whole court; and the freedoms he took with the Prince of Wales excited the greatest astonishment, and lowered Charles, who permitted them. He called his royal highness by all kinds of ridiculous nicknames, lolled about his room with clothes half on, and kept his hat on his head while the prince was uncovered. He introduced loose and improper company into the very palace. It had been predicted to James that the two great favorites of two mighty kings would never agree; and the prediction was more than verified. It should be stated, however, in fairness, that, bad as he was, Olivares was a gentleman, and that he invaribly acted with a decency and dignity of which the English upstart was altogether incapable. More than half of the grossness and insolence of Buckingham escaped him, for, when ruffled, the duke was wont to swear in his vernacular, and Olivares was unacquainted with the English language. He could see, however, that Buckingham presumed to take the greatest liberties with his prince, and with every body else, even in the presence of the King of Spain. "All this administered wonderful occasion of discourse in the court and country, there never having been such a comet seen in that hemisphere, their submissive reverence to their princes being a vital part of their religion.[1] Philip himself was greatly disgusted, and said that his sister must be wretched if so violent and unprincipled a man was to enjoy the confidence and friendship of her husband. Buckingham, fool as he was, saw clearly that he was hated by the whole Spanish court, and that, if Charles married the infanta, he would always have an enemy at the English court,—that if she acquired the natural influence of a wife over the prince,

[2] For some time after their arrival in Spain every letter from Buckingham and the prince contained a demand for jewels,—jewels,—more jewels! The following are amusing specimens taken from different joint epistles:—

"I confess that you have sent more jewels than (at my departure) I thought to have use of; but, since my coming, seeing many jewels worn here, and that my bravery can consist of nothing else; beside that, some of them which you have appointed me to give to the infanta, in Steenie's opinion and mine, are not fit to be given to her; therefore I have taken this boldness to entreat your majesty to send more for my own wearing, and for giving to my mistress: in which I think your majesty shall not do amiss to take Carlisle's advice.

"Though your baby himself hath sent word what need he hath of more jewels, yet will I by this bearer, who can make more speed than Carlisle, again acquaint your majesty therewith, and give my poor and saucy opinion that will be fittest more to send. Hitherto you have been so sparing, that whereas you thought to have sent him sufficiently for his own wearing, to present his mistress, who I am sure shall shortly now lose that title, and to lend me, that I, to the contrary, have been forced to lend him. You need not ask who made me able to do it. Sir, he hath neither chain or hatband; and I beseech you consider, first, how rich they are in jewels here, then in what a poor equipage he came in, how he hath no other means to appear like a king's son, how they are usefullest at such a time as this when they may do yourself, your son, and the nation honor, and lastly, how it will neither cost nor hazard you any thing. These reasons, I hope, since you have ventured already your chiefest jewel—your son, will serve to persuade you to loose these more after him: first, your best hatband; the Portugal diamond; the rest of the pendant diamonds, to make up a necklace to give his mistress; and the best rope of pearl; with a rich chain or two for himself to wear, or else your dog must want a collar; which is the ready way to put him into it. There are many other jewels which are of so mean quality as deserve not that name, but will save much in your purse, and serve very well for presents. They had never so good and great an occasion to take the air out of their boxes as at this time. God knows when they shall have such another: and they have need sometimes to get nearer the sun (son) to continue them in their perfection."—Sir H. Ellis.

she might break the string with which he had hitherto led both son and father. And at the same time Buckingham was warned by Bishop Laud, and other friends or creatures of his faction, that the party of Lord Bristol were making head at court; that certain persons were so bold as to complain of his insolence and abuses of power; that the king listened to their complaints; and that there would be a complete revolution at court unless he returned forthwith to manage his old master. If Charles had not been apprehensive about their liberty and safety, he would have called for horses, and ridden away at once with his dear Steenie;[1] but, as it was, he submitted to a course of mental reservation, evasion, lying, and perjury. There may be some doubt entertained with respect to the sincerity of the Spanish court, but the conduct of the Prince of Wales has not the benefit of the shadow of a doubt. He fancied that, if he failed to give them satisfaction, or cast a slight upon their princess, the Spaniards would detain him as a state prisoner, and he was ready to promise and vow whatever they chose, in order to get safe out of their country, fully resolving to break all these engagements as soon as he conveniently might. He intimated to his Catholic majesty that his father, who was growing old and sick, had commanded him to return, and that his presence was indispensable to quiet the alarms of the English people at his long absence, as well as to prepare them for the reception of his Catholic wife, and for that toleration of all Catholics, which had been settled by treaty. Philip and Olivares readily agreed to take charge of the dispensation when it should arrive, and to have the espousals celebrated before Christmas, at the latest; and Charles agreed to lodge a procuration, with full powers, in the hands of the Earl of Bristol, who was to deliver it to Philip ten days after the arrival of the expected paper from Rome, and to name the king, or his brother, the Infant Don Carlos, as proxy. Charles, in the presence of the Patriarch of the Indies, solemnly swore, with Philip, upon the Scriptures, to observe and faithfully keep this agreement. The Infanta Donna Maria took the title of Princess of England, and a separate court was formed for her by her brother.

Charles now prepared to depart, and Buckingham got all things ready with amazing alacrity.[2] Philip presented the prince with some fine Spanish and Barbary horses, a diamond-hilted sword and dagger, some muskets and cross-bows richly ornamented, various pictures by the great Titian, a master-piece of Correggio's, and various other articles indicative of his taste, as well as of his liberality. The young Queen of Spain gave a great many bags of amber, with some dressed kid-skins, and linen; Olivares gave a few choice Italian pictures, three sedan chairs of curious workmanship, and some costly articles of furniture; and the chief grandees all gave something, as horses, fine mules with trappings, &c., &c. In return, the Prince of Wales gave to the king an enameled hilt for a sword and a dagger, studded with precious stones; to the queen a pair of curious earrings, and to the infanta a string of pearls, and a diamond anchor as the emblem of his constancy.[1] At his parting interview with the young queen and Donna Maria, Charles played the part of a disconsolate lover, forced from the object of his passionate affections. The infanta gave him a letter, written with her own hand, for the celebrated nun of Carrion, who had attained in her lifetime to the reputation of a beatified person, praying him to deliver it in person, with the hope, no doubt, of his being converted by the sight of so much holiness, and the princess afterward caused an extra mass to be said for his safe voyage. Gondomar, the Count of Monterey, and other noblemen, were ordered to accompany the prince all the way to St. Andero, where the English fleet was lying under the command of Lord Rutland. But Philip himself, with his two brothers, would see his highness on his road: they traveled with him to the Escurial, where they entertained him splendidly for several days, and then, as if loth to part, they went on with him as far as Campillo. "When the king and he parted, there passed wonderful great endearments and embraces in divers postures between them a long time; and in that place there was a pillar to be erected as a monument to posterity."[2] Passing through Segovia, Valladolid, by the cell of the nun of Carrion, traveling by easy journeys, and lodging in the castles of the provincial nobility, who, everywhere, gave him a most kind and hospitable reception, Charles at length reached the seaport. He had a narrow escape from drowning while going in a boat from the town of St. Andero to the admiral's ship. His first remark on finding himself in safety was, that he had duped the Spaniards; that the Spaniards were fools to let him depart so freely! The voyage was most prosperous, and the prince and Buckingham landed safely at Portsmouth on the 5th of October. Charles, it was observed, had got a beard during his absence, and was cheerful; but the duke, as some conceived, was not so.[3] They were received with much joy and tenderness by the common people, as if they had miraculously escaped from a den of wild beasts. On the following day they reached London, "where the people's joy, elevated above bonfire expression, might teach misguided princes that love is the firmest foundation of security and happiness."[4] For some days there

[1] "There were whisperings," says Howell, "that the prince intended to run away disguised, as he came; and the question being asked by a person of quality, there was a brave answer made—That if love brought him hither, it was not fear should drive him back."

[2] There were doubts entertained as to his intentions; but so much did Charles deceive his own countrymen, that wagers of thirty to one were offered among the English at Madrid, that the marriage would still take effect."—Howell.

[1] Mendozza (in the Italian translation). The Spaniards speak rather contemptuously of Charles's presents. There is a letter from Buckingham to the king, announcing the fine things they were bringing away with them, at which it is impossible not to laugh. "Four asses you I have sent, two hes and two shes. Five camels, two hes, two shes, with a young one; and one elephant, which is worth your seeing. These I have impudently begged for you. There is a Barbary horse comes with them, I think from Watt Aston. My Lord Bristol sayeth, he will send you more camels. When we come ourselves, we will bring you horses and asses enough. If I may know whether you desire mules or not, I will bring them, or deer of this country either. And I will lay wait for all the rare color birds that can be heard of."—Ellis. [2] Howell. was nothing but a ringing of bells, a making of bonfires, with drums, guns, and fireworks: and without waiting for the word of command from king or bishop, several zealous preachers offered public thanksgivings in the churches for the safe return of the godly young prince, the only hope of the nation. In the mean while, the effects of his double dealing were manifesting themselves. A few days after his departure from Madrid, there arrived from him one Mr. Clerk, a creature of Buckingham, who took up his lodging in the house of the Earl of Bristol, to the great surprise of those who knew it: "Considering the darkness that happened betwixt the duke and the earl, we fear," writes Howell, "that this Clerk hath brought something that may puzzle the business." The fear was not unfounded. In the course of a few days it was rumored that the pope's rescript was arrived, and thereupon Clerk desired to speak with my Lord Bristol, for he had something to deliver him from the prince; and "my lord ambassador being come to him, Mr. Clerk delivered a letter from the prince, the contents whereof were, that, whereas he had left certain proxies in his hands to be delivered to the King of Spain after the dispensation was come, he desired and required him not to do it till he should receive further order from England."[1] The only reason alledged by Charles was, that he feared that the infanta, immediately after the marriage by proxy, would shut herself up in a nunnery! Bristol, lost in amazement, would not see that this most absurd pretext was merely meant to cover over a fixed determination not to marry the princess at all. As the rumor which hastened Clerk's disclosure was premature, he had time, as he thought, to set matters right. He went straight to court, where Philip gave him every possible assurance that his sister would be sent into England at the time, and in the manner already agreed upon, and where the infanta made herself very merry, saying that she must confess she never in all her life had any mind to be a nun, and hardly thought she would be one now, only to avoid the Prince of Wales.[2] He then dispatched a courier with life and death speed to King James, telling him of the absolute removal of the only difficulty; and he continued to dress and furnish his household in velvet and silver lace, so that they might do honor to the ceremony of the espousals. But Charles and Buckingham closeted James, and made him write to Bristol, that he might deliver his proxy at Christmas, because "that holy and joyful time was best fitting so notable and blessed an action as the marriage." To this dispatch Bristol replied in all speed, that (as Buckingham and the Prince well knew) the powers in the proxy expired before Christmas, and it would be a most grievous insult to present it when it had ceased to be of value; that the pope had already signed the paper, and that he, Bristol, should consider himself bound by treaty, and by the oath he had taken to that treaty, to deliver the proxy whenever it should be asked for by the King of Spain, unless his master should send him positive orders to the contrary.

[1] Howell. [2] Clarendon State Papers.—Hardwicke Papers.

"I must humbly crave your majesty's pardon," says Bristol, "if I write unto you with the plainness of a true-hearted and faithful servant, who have ever coöperated honestly unto your majesty's ends, if I knew them. I know your majesty hath long been of opinion that the greatest assurance you could get that the King of Spain would effectually labor the entire restitution of the Prince Palatine was, that he really proceeded to the effecting of the match; and my instructions under your majesty's hand were, to insist upon the restoring of the Prince Palatine, but not so as to annex it to the treaty of the match, as that thereby the match should be hazarded. . . . . The same course I observed in the carriage of the businesses by his highness and my lord duke, at their being here, who, though they insisted on the business of the Palatinate, yet they held it fit to treat of them distinctly, and that the marriage should proceed as a good pawn for the other."[1] In plain truth, Charles took little heed of his unfortunate sister and brother-in-law, and in the joint letters written by him and Buckingham from Madrid, when they mentioned the Palatinate, which they rarely did at all, they spoke of it as a secondary affair. Having given what he considered satisfactory assurances to his ambassadors at the English court, Philip, upon the actual arrival of the document from Rome, which came in about a fortnight, fixed the day for the marriage by proxy, invited the grandees and great ladies to the ceremony, and sent orders to all the towns and seaports to discharge their great ordnance. His infant daughter, of whom the queen had been delivered a little while before, was to be christened on the same auspicious day: a splendid platform, covered all over with tapestry, was erected from the palace to the church, and all things were prepared to honor the solemnities. But, when all Madrid was at the height of its joy and pleasant expectations, when it wanted but three days of the day, three English couriers, dispatched for greater certainty, arrived, one upon the back of the other, with a new commission to my Lord of Bristol, countermanding the delivery of the proxy, until full and absolute satisfaction should be given for the immediate surrender of the Palatinate, or war declared by the King of Spain for the obtaining of that surrender to the King of England's son-in-law. Philip indignantly countermanded the preparations for the marriage, broke up the household of his sister, and ordered her to quit the study of the English language, and relinquish the title of Princess of Wales—which, it is said, the infanta could not do without shedding some tears. When the Spanish sovereign's anger cooled, he entered into explanations with Bristol, for whom he entertained a high esteem.[2] He said that the Palatinate

was not his to give, and that it was scarcely to be expected he should enter into a war with his relative, the emperor, and with half the Catholic powers of Europe, for its recovery; but if a friendly negotiation could secure it, he would guaranty it—nay, if, after a time, negotiations were found unavailing, he would take up arms to restore the Palatine to his hereditary dominions. The Spanish council, moreover, affirmed that his majesty was resolved to employ his utmost endeavors to satisfy the King of England, but to have it extorted from him by way of menace, or that it should now be added to the marriage by way of condition, and that his own sister must be rejected, unless the king would make a war with the emperor, was too humiliating, and whatsoever his majesty's resolution might be, he could neither with his honor, nor with the honor of his sister, whom he would in no way force or thrust upon the prince, make any more concessions at present. But, in a day or two, Philip put his signature to a formal promise, written in the form of a letter to King James, and this, it was thought, would satisfy the English court. But Charles had resolved not to marry the infanta at any price, and he and Buckingham, encouraged by the popular feeling at home, had made up their minds to a war with Spain. Bristol received his recall, and Philip then prepared for a war with England. The ambassador represented to James, that having contracted a debt of 50,000 crowns, and pledged all his lady's jewels at Madrid for Prince Charles, he had not a quarter of the money necessary for his journey; and he humbly besought his majesty to consider that his leaving that court ought not to be like a running away in debt, though, rather than disobey his commands, he would go home on foot. It does not appear that James remitted a sixpence. But Philip commiserated the hard case of Bristol, gave him a rich sideboard of plate, and, being fully aware of the fate that Buckingham was preparing for him in England, he made him an offer, that if he would stay in any of his dominions, he would give him money and honor equal to what the highest of his enemies possessed; but Bristol declined this splendid offer, saying, that he was so confident of the king, his master's justice, and of his own innocence, that he feared no mischief in his native country, which he must ever love and prefer to any other. Though Charles and Buckingham were very anxious to get Bristol away from Madrid, they were by no means desirous of his presence in England: he was told to travel by slow stages; and when he arrived, he was ordered to go instantly to his house in the country, and there consider himself a prisoner. But for the opposition of the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Pembroke, the vindictive Buckingham would have had him committed to the Tower. As it was, without any trial—without a hearing—he was forbidden either to visit the court, or to take his seat as a peer in parliament.[1]

The king's joy for the return of the "dear boys" was soon overcast by a gloomy reflection upon the consequences of their rash journey. No money from Spain, fresh debts contracted, his jewels nearly all gone, his daughter still an outcast, a war in perspective, — those thoughts harassed him to death, and made him forego his hunting and his hawking, and shut himself up in solitude. In other directions, Buckingham was eliciting the most deplorable exhibitions of human baseness. Cranfield, the lord treasurer, Bishop Williams, the lord keeper, and others of his creatures, who had joined in censuring his conduct during his absence, because they thought his influence was on the decline, were all brought to crawl like reptiles before him; and more they would have done, had more been exacted, because they saw that his power was likely to be as great as ever. The bishop surpassed those who competed with him, begging his good lord, the duke, to receive his soul in gage and pawn, and telling him how he had wept at the thoughts of his displeasure.[2]

A. D. 1624. Nothing remained for James but the last and painful resource of assembling a parliament. This time he issued no arbitrary proclamation, laid down no lessons to the electors; and when the house met (on the 19th of February), he addressed them in a tone of great moderation and sweetness; but he could not conquer his nature or his inveterate habit, and, in the end, this falsetto gave way to his real voice. He told them that he remembered and regretted former misunderstandings; that he earnestly desired to do his duty, and manifest his love to his people. Forgetting previous declarations, he told them that he had been long engaged in treaties with Spain; that he had sent his own son with the man he most trusted, the faithfullest and best of counselors, into Spain; that all that had passed should be disclosed to them; and that he should entreat their good and sound advice, super totam materiem. He hoped they would judge him charitably, as they wished to be judged; he declared that, in every treaty, whether public or private, he had always considered, above all things, the Protestant religion. He had, it was true, sometimes caused the penal statutes to bear less rigorously upon the Catholics than at other times; but to dispense with the statutes, to forbid or alter the law in that matter, he had never promised or yielded any such thing. But though he appealed to God for the truth of this assertion, though he repeated it at court and in the field, in speech and in writing—for he was alarmed at the loud denunciations of the Puritans—there was scarcely a person the least conversant with affairs but must have known that his majesty was lying and committing perjury. Nobody, of course, knew it so well as his own son, Buckingham, Bristol, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the lords of the council, and the two Spanish ambassadors,[1] who were still in England. But all except Bristol and the ambassadors were ready to add falsehood to falsehood, perjury to perjury. In the conclusion of his long speech in parliament, he told them to beware of jealousy, to remember that time was precious, and to make no impertinent and irritating inquiries.[2] Five days after, on the 24th of February, Buckingham, at a general conference held at Whitehall, delivered to the house a long, rambling, but specious narrative, the Prince of Wales standing beside him to assist his memory, and give weight to his assertions. The Lord Keeper Williams, who had rehearsed the matter beforehand with the prince, had warned Buckingham not to produce or refer to all the dispatches, for fear parliament should fall to examine particular dispatches, wherein they could not but find many contradictions, "and because his highness wished to draw on a breach with Spain without ripping up of private dispatches." In fact, if the dispatches had been produced, they would have proved the king to be an astonishing liar, and they would have disproved nearly every thing that Buckingham uttered. Bold in the absence of Bristol, in the servility and connivance of the lords of the council, in the countenance of the heir to the throne, in the sympathy of the commons and the people, who were ready to credit any thing about the breach of the match, which they always abhorred, the double favorite solemnly declared, that, after many years' negotiation, the king had found the Spaniards were as far from coming to an honest decision as ever; that the Earl of Bristol had never brought the treaty beyond mere professions and declarations on their part (the truth being, that that ambassador had brought the treaty to a conclusion); that the prince, doubting of their sincerity, had gone to Spain himself; that he had there found such artificial dealing as convinced him that they were false and deceitful; that the king, his master, had always regarded the restitution of the Palatinate as a preliminary; and that, in fine, the prince, after enduring much ill treatment, was obliged to return home, bereft of all hope of obtaining either the infanta or the Palatinate. This tissue of misrepresentations was received with enthusiasm by parliament. Old Coke, in the House of Commons, called Buckingham the savior of the nation, and out of doors the people sang his praises, lighted bonfires, and insulted the Spanish ambassadors. These gentlemen protested against the duke's speech as false and injurious to their sovereign's honor; but the two Houses defended the favorite, and presently proceeded to declare that their king could no longer negotiate with honor or safety. The people were eager for a war; but James, in growing old, had not grown warlike; he trembled, hung back, talked of the long standing of his character as a righteous and pacific monarch, of his debts, of his poverty; but it was this very poverty that forwarded the views of Buckingham and his son, who represented that money he must have, that there was no such sure way of obtaining a round supply as by declaring war against his Catholic majesty; and, in the end, though with sore fears and misgivings, James resolved to assume the novel attitude of a belligerent.[1] The idea made the Spaniards laugh. Gondomar had told them that there were no men in England—and, if he meant public men, he was not far wrong; they despised this kingdom as weak, poor, disunited, led by a timid king and an inexperienced prince, whose anger they ridiculed, comparing it to a revolt of the mice against the cats. Such had become, in the hands of James, the thunderbolts of Elizabeth. But, with unusual alacrity, the king told the Commons that, if they would vote him money, the sums must be large, as his debts were heavy, his treasury empty, his allies very poor, his ships out of repair—he would apply it to a war with Spain; and, as he was well aware that the Commons had no confidence in him, he graciously told them that the money voted might be paid to a committee of parliament, to be managed and paid out by them, without his touching any part of it.

And there is a commission sent to the Earl of Bristol to treat of these two businesses jointly; and if the King of Spain give not a satisfactory answer therein, then he is to return home. Buckingham hath little obligation to Spain; therefore, for his own particular, he hath good reason, if he can not prop himself this way, to find other means for his support: unkindness passed between him and Olivares, and a hot heart-burning between him and Bristol, who told him here, before the prince, that, being so far his superior in honor and might, he might haply contemn him, but he could never hate him. Ever since his departure, he hath attempted to crush Bristol to pieces, who is out of purse £2000 of his own since his coming hither, and he is so crossed, that he can not get a penny from England. If he can not get a surrender of the Palatinate to the king's mind, he is in a poor case, for he must hence presently: he is much favored of the king here, and Olivares, therefore they will do much for him before Buckingham work his revenge upon him. . . . . . . We are all in suspense, and a kind of maze to see the event of things, and how matters will be pieced together again we know not."—Scrin. Sac.

The Commons took him at his word, and a joint address from both Houses, with an offer to support him in the war, with their persons and fortunes,

[1] On the 20th of July, in the preceding year, James, in swearing to the Spanish treaty, in presence of the two ambassadors, and in their house, had sworn to the following clause:—"Quod nulla lex particularis contra Catholicos Romanos lata, necnon leges generales sub quibus omnes ex æquo comprehenduntur, modo ejusmodi sint quæ religioni Romanæ repugnant, ullo unquam tempore, ullo omnino modo aut casu, directe vel indirecte, quoad dictos Catholicos, executioni mandabitur." —Prynne.—Hardwicke Papers.

[1] In the Hardwicke Papers there is a curious letter from Buckingham to his "Dear dad and gossip," urging him to war. It is quite in the popular strain:—

"I beseech you," says the duke, "to send me your plain and resolute answer, whether, if your people so resolve to give you a royal assistance, as to the number of six subsidies and fifteenths, with a promise after, in case of necessity, to assist you with their lives and fortunes; whether then you will not accept it, and their counsel, to break the match, with the other treaties; and whether or no, to bring them to this, I may not assure some of them, underhand (because it is feared that when your turns are served, you will not call them together again to reform abuses, grievances, and the making of laws for the good government of the country), that you will be so far from that that you will rather weary them with it, desiring nothing more than their loves and happiness, in which your own is included. Sir, I beseech you, think seriously of this, and resolve once constantly to run one way. For so long as you waver between the Spaniards and your subjects, to make your advantage of both, you are sure to do it with neither." He goes on to tell the king, that his majesty's going two ways, and himself only one, occasions many disputes between them; that for him to be of his majesty's opinion would be flattery, and not to speak humbly his own would be treachery; and he proposes—1. That the king should give thanks to parliament for their uniform offer of advice. 2. That he should take notice of their careful proceedings in the Lower House. 3. That he should not desire to get their money until he had declared about their advice. 4. To assure them that, if he engaged in war by their advice, he would not hearken to a peace without first hearing them. 5. That he should be contented that they choose a committee to see the issuing out of the money they give for the recovery of the Palatinate. 6. That he should show them that this is the fittest time that ever presented itself to make a right understanding between him and his people. 7. That he should assure himself that their behavior would continue to be as they had begun toward him; and that he should let them see, by proof, how far he would be in love with parliaments for making of good laws and reforming of abuses. This rare patriotic epistle is subscribed, "A Lover of You, and your Majesty's most humble Slave and Dog, Steenie."

was presented to him by Abbot, the archbishop of Canterbury—a strange choice, both because it was unseemly that a churchman should deliver a message leading to war and blood, and because the archbishop had sworn with the lords of the council to the Spanish treaty. But Abbot had taken that oath most unwillingly, and it was probably with an expression of joy, or even of triumph, that he congratulated the king on his having become sensible of the insincerity of the Spaniards, for James interrupted him by saying, "Hold! you insinuate what I have never spoken. Buckingham hath made you a relation on which you are to judge; but I never yet declared my mind upon it."[1]

It is needless to say that James had sanctioned Buckingham's statements beforehand; but he was looking for loopholes through which he might creep, and he was very anxious that the abuse of the King of Spain should not be laid upon his shoulders, and that the war should not be attributed to him. Five days after this message, the question of supplies came on in the Commons. The king asked for £700,000 to begin the war, and for £150,000 per annum to pay his debts. These demands made the Commons falter in their warlike note, but Buckingham and the prince hinted that a smaller sum would be accepted, and, without noticing the king's debts, they voted three subsidies and three fifteenths, making about £300,000, which was all to be raised within a year, to be applied to the war, and to be put into the hands of treasurers appointed by themselves, who were to issue money on the warrant of the council of war, and on no other orders. The king then declared, by proclamation, that the treaties with Spain were at an end. In their bigotry the Lower House forgot their old jealousy of proclamations, and resolved to petition the king for another proclamation against the Catholics; but the Lords objected to this course, and in the end, a joint petition from both Houses, with some of the sting taken out of it, was presented, praying the king to enforce the penal statues. James again called God to witness that it was his intention so to do, his determination never to permit of any indulgence or toleration; and Prince Charles also swore that, if it should please God to bestow upon him any lady that was popish, she should have no further liberty but for her own family, and no advantage to the recusants at home.[2] All missionaries were ordered, by proclamation, to leave England under the penalty of death; the judges and magistrates were instructed to act vigorously, and the Lord Mayor of London was especially admonished to arrest all such persons as went to hear mass in the houses of the foreign ambassadors. The Commons drew up a list of Catholics holding places under government, and unanimously petitioned for their removal; but these placemen were saved for the present by the interference of the Lords. Patents, and monopolies, and the bitter recollection of the manner in which parliament had been dissolved, still rankled in the hearts of the Commons, and in their committee of grievances they pronounced some of the patents illegal, and reserved others for future examination. The king, much nettled, told them that he too had his grievances to complain of: that they, the Commons, had encroached on his prerogative and condemned patents that were very useful, and had suffered themselves to be led by the lawyers, who were the greatest grievances of all. But the Commons were bent upon striking a blow in higher quarters; they had taken their measures for impeaching Cranfield, now Earl of Middlesex, the Lord Treasurer of England, and Master of the Court of Wards, for deficiency, bribery, and oppression. This lord treasurer was one of the creatures of Buckingham, who had intrigued against him during his absence in Spain, and on his return he was less successful than Bishop Williams, the lord keeper, in making his peace with the incensed favorite by vile prostrations and abjurations. Buckingham, moreover, in starting as a fiery Protestant and patriot, had cultivated a good understanding with some of the leaders of the opposition or country party. Now these men wanted a victim —not that the treasurer was not guilty—and Buckingham gladly gave him up. The king would fain have protected his servant, and he lost his temper both with Buckingham and Charles for favoring the impeachment; he told the duke that he was a fool, and was making a rod for his own breech; and the prince, that he would live to have his bellyfull of impeachments.[1] Nor did he stop here; he wrote to tell the Commons that the Lord Treasurer had not, as they supposed, advised the dissolution of the last parliament, but, on the contrary, had begged on his knees for its continuance: he covered or palliated the treasurer's offenses, to the Lords; but all this was of no avail, and Middlesex, being only allowed three days to prepare his defense, was convicted by the unanimous vote of the Peers, condemned to pay a fine of about £5000, to be imprisoned during pleasure, and to be forever excluded from his seat in parliament, and from the verge of the court.[2] The country party had also intended to impeach the Lord Keeper, Williams; but the supple prelate was protected by Buckingham, to whom, during the session, he rendered a most important piece of service. The story is altogether worthy of this disgraceful and dissolute reign.

Finding that there was no possibility of obtaining a private audience of the king, Ynoiosa, one of the Spanish ambassadors, seizing his opportunity, slyly slipped into his hands a note, which James as slyly put into his pocket. In consequence of this paper, the Spanish Secretary of Legation, Don Francisco Carondolet, was that very evening conducted to the king's apartment, when Charles and Buckingham were away;[3] and then James was told that he was considered as a prisoner in his own palace, and so beset by spies and informers that none of his friends or faithful subjects could approach to warn him of the ruin which Buckingham was bringing upon him. Three or four nights later, the secretary

[3] Roger Coke says that the prince and duke were attending the debates in the Lords; but this could hardly be, as Carondolet was not smuggled into the palace till eleven o'clock at night, and it was only recently and on very rare occasions that the House sat so late as six in the evening.

was again admitted clandestinely, and this time he delivered a long invective and remonstrance in writing, which had been corrected by the ambassadors' own hands. This paper is described as somewhat general, and very rhetorical, if not tragical, in its style. The heads of it were—"1. That the king was no more a freeman, at this time, than King John of France when he was a prisoner in England, or King Francis when he was at Madrid, being besieged and closed up with the servants and vassals of Buckingham. 2. That the ambassadors knew very well, and were informed, four months ago, that his majesty was to be restrained, and confined to his country-house and pastimes, and the government of the state to be assumed and disposed of by others, and that this was not concealed by Buckingham's followers. 3. That the duke had reconciled himself to all the popular men of the state, and drawn them forth out of prisons, restraints, and confinements, to alter the government of the state at this parliament, as Oxford, Southampton, Say, and others, whom he met at suppers and ordinaries, to strengthen his popularity. 4. That the duke, to breed an opinion of his own greatness, and to make the king grow less, hath oftentimes bragged openly in parliament that he had made the king yield to this and that, which was pleasure unto them; and that he mentioned openly before the House his majesty's private oath, which the ambassadors have never spoken of to any creature to this hour. 5. That these kingdoms are not now governed by a monarchy, but by a triumviri, whereof Buckingham was the first and chiefest, the prince the second, and the king the last; and that all look toward solem orientem. 6. That his majesty should show himself to be, as he was reputed, the oldest and wisest king in Europe, by freeing himself from this captivity and imminent danger wherein he was, by cutting off so dangerous and ungrateful an affecter of greatness and popularity as the duke was."[1] His majesty was requested to conceal this free dealing, because it might breed them much peril and danger; but, if he considered it necessary for his service, he might reveal it to whomsoever he chose, notwithstanding the consequences. James was much troubled, and hardly knew what to say. He stammered out a few words about his confidence in the prince, and his own power to sever him and Buckingham when he pleased; but, then, giving way to his feelings, he told Carondolet, "that, when his highness went to Spain, he was as well affected to that nation as heart could desire, and as well disposed as any son in Europe; but now he was strangely carried away with rash and youthful counsels, and followed the humor of Buckingham, who had he knew not how many devils within him since that journey."[2] At first he professed a doubt whether Buckingham "affected popularity to his disadvantage; because he had tried him of purpose, and commanded him to make disaffecting motions to the Houses, which he had performed, whereby his majesty concluded he was not popular:" but he presently confessed that he had good cause to suspect the duke of late, and, as he had no servant of his own that would venture to accuse him, he desired Don Francisco and the Spanish ambassadors to procure him some grounds for a charge, and then he would quickly take a course with him. And, to complete this strange but characteristic scheme, he afterward sent Padre Maestro, a Jesuit, to renew his request that these foreigners would find the materials for an accusation against his favorite! These thoughts so wrought upon the king that his countenance fell suddenly, he mused much in silence, and entertained the prince and duke with mystical and broken speeches. Charles and Buckingham were thrown into consternation, which was increased a morning or two after, when the king prepared to take coach for Windsor, ordering his son to accompany him, and the duke to remain behind. As the king was stepping into his carriage, Buckingham, with tears in his eyes, implored to know how he had offended his good and gracious master, vowing, by the name of his Savior, that if he knew what he was charged with, he would clear himself, or confess it if true. James did not satisfy him, but drove off with the prince, crying or blubbering all the way to Windsor, and saying that he was the unhappiest man alive to be forsaken by those that were dearest to him. Both Charles and the duke suspected the quarter whence this storm had been blown, but they were wholly in the dark as to particulars, and knew not what course to steer. The duke, forlorn, retired to Wallingford House in a state of confusion and distraction, and threw himself upon a couch, where he lay like one dead or stupefied. In this state he was found by Williams, the lord bishop of Lincoln and lord keeper, who told him that he could bring him out of that sorrow, and that he verily believed God's directing hand was in it to have stirred up his grace to advance him so that he might be able to do him service at this pinch. The fact was, Williams had got possession of the whole secret. The Spanish secretary Carondolet[1] kept an English mistress, and this woman had been for some time in the pay of my Lord Bishop the Keeper, who recompensed her bountifully. The meretrix, though she lived in Mark-lane, is said to have had a deal of courtly wit, so much that the poor secretary could keep no secret from her which she had a mind to know. She put into Williams's hands the rough draft of the paper which had been presented to the king, and gave him notice at the same time of an English Catholic priest, living in Drury-lane, whom her lover loved above all other priests, not excepting even his own confessor. My Lord Keeper presently seized this man,—a dead man by the statutes,—and Carondolet, as was expected, hastened to intercede for his friend. He obtained the priest's liberty; but it was at the price of the entire secret, which had been more than half revealed before. And now Williams told the reviving duke to make haste to Windsor before supper time, to communicate with the prince, to whom he had given a memorial in answer to the charges contained in the paper which the Spaniards had given the king;[1] and he further advised the duke to "deport himself with all amiable addresses," and not stir from his majesty day nor night. The duke, who had not had wit to help himself, followed the bishop's advice, and, at a seasonable moment, the bishop's memorial was presented to the king, backed by the remarks and arguments of Charles. James read the paper deliberately, stopping many times and saying, "Well, very well." At last he tenderly embraced both Charles and Buckingham, sorrowing much that he should have wronged them with a jealousy fomented by the Spanish traitors. "I ask no more from you," said James, "but that you tell me who is your engineer that struck the sparks out of the flint to light the candle." The prince stood mute: the duke vowed that he knew not the author of the paper. "Well," said James, "I have a good nostril, and will answer mine own question: my Keeper had the main finger in it. I dare swear he bolted the flour and made it up into paste."[2] All this, of course, passed among the trio, but, when the king consulted with others, or took counsel from reflection, he resolved to draw up a set of interrogatories, and to examine the members of his council upon their oaths. Charles surreptitiously obtained possession of a copy of the interrogatories, which he inclosed to Buckingham in the following memorable letter:—

"Steenie—I send you here inclosed the interrogatories that the king thinks fit should be asked concerning the malicious accusations of the Spanish ambassador. As for the way, my father is resolved (if you do not gainsay it, and show reason to the contrary) to take the oaths himself, and to make Secretary Calvert, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to take the examination in writing under their hands that are examined; thus much is by the king's command. Now, for my opinion, it is this: that you can incur no danger in this but by opposing the king's proceedings in it, to make him suspect that you have spoken somewhat that you are unwilling he should hear of; for I can not think that any man is so mad as to call his own head in question, by making a lie against you, when all the world knows me to be your true friend; and, if they tell but the truth, I know they can say but what the king knows that you have avowed to all the world, which is, that you think, as I do, that the continuance of these treaties with Spain might breed us much mischief; wherefore my advice to you is, that you do not oppose, or show yourself discontented at, the king's course herein, for I think it will be so far from doing you hurt, that it will make you trample under your feet those few poor rascals that are your enemies. Now, sweetheart, if you think I am mistaken in my judgment in this, let me know what I can do in this, or any thing else, to serve thee."[3]

[1] Charles asked Williams how he had made this opportune discovery. "Truly," said the bishop, "another would blush to tell you what heifer he ploughed with; but all my intelligence comes out of a lady's chamber; and I have found this maxim in my studies of divinity:—Alieno peccato uti licet."

If there had not been something to conceal, Charles would not have written this letter, nor would Buckingham have been afraid of the king's design. Without seeing the epistle, the counselors were perfectly well aware of the close union between the duke and the heir to the throne, of the resolution Charles had expressed on other occasions to consider the duke's enemies as his own, and of the declining health of James, who was prematurely old and sickly. Therefore, when the king swore them all upon the Bible, in the council-chamber, to speak the truth, they one and all declared that they were ignorant of any sinister designs—that they believed the duke to be one of the most faithful of servants, &c. Buckingham, thus exonerated, complained and fell sick, or feigned sickness. The king then asked the Spanish ambassadors for the names of the Englishmen who had given them their information: Ynoiosa demanded a private audience. This greatly alarmed Charles and Buckingham, who, not without difficulty, made the king refuse to see him, and refer him to one of his ministers. Upon this the Spaniard quitted the kingdom, and returned to Madrid, where he reasserted all that had been laid down in the memorial presented by Carondolet. James maintained that he had maliciously accused his only son and his favorite minister, and had then refused to produce his proofs. But the king acted under fear and the painful conviction that he was too old and helpless to overthrow the dominion which Charles and the duke had agreed to divide between them, and the minister was no longer his favorite. Indeed, some short time before this crisis, he had entertained a notion such as few other men were capable of—to make his peace with his old minion, the Earl of Somerset, and to place that convicted murderer once more at the head of the nation. Perhaps he hoped that the man's crimes might be forgotten; and certainly many persons had long been complaining that the government of Buckingham was incomparably worse than that of his predecessor. By means of a third party[1] Somerset opened a communication with the king, and dwelt at length, and with some ability, on the misconduct of Buckingham. From a letter which has recently been brought to light, it should appear that Somerset acted in concert with the Spanish ambassadors, or with an English party that maintained, like those diplomatists, that James was little better than a prisoner, and that the prince was wholly guided by Buckingham, who, in all things, had shown himself a rash, heady young man, a novice in the managing of business. "The duke," says this letter, "doth so much presume upon his favor, that he contemneth all men, as knowing that those who are obedient to his highness will also subject themselves to his will."[2] Buckingham himself, though probably ignorant of Somerset's movements, felt that he had lost the good-will of his old master; but this only made him cling the closer to his son, who would soon be king, and to his recently-found popularity in parliament and in the country, as the determined enemy of the Spaniards and all papists. While James trembled, and talked of the blessedness of peace, his son and the duke, in his name and with the concurrence of parliament, attended to the raising of troops and the concluding of alliances against the House of Austria, for the humbling of Spain, and for the recovery of the Palatinate. "This spring gave birth to four brave regiments of foot (a new apparition in the English horizon), fifteen hundred in a regiment, which were raised and transported into Holland under four gallant colonels, the earls of Oxford, Southampton, and Essex, and the Lord Willoughby."[1] The Dutch were already at war with their old enemies, the Spaniards, who had invaded their territory under the command of the great Italian general, Spinola; and the United Provinces, which had done their best by means of ambassadors and secret agents to break the Spanish match, and encourage Buckingham to come to a rupture with Spain, gladly concluded a treaty which promised them assistance.

A fearful tragedy, enacted on a small island in the Eastern Ocean, should have seemed likely to make this Dutch alliance unpopular with the English people. Ever since the conclusion of the long truce at the Hague the Dutch had been colonizing, and trading on a most extensive scale in the seas of India and China. Among other islands they possessed Amboyna, one of the Molucca, or Spice Islands, which they had taken from the Portuguese. They pretended not only an absolute sovereignty over this island—part of which continued to be occupied for some years by independent natives—but also an exclusive right to the spice trade in all that Archipelago. Their friends and allies, the English, soon became desirous of sharing in this profitable trade; they sent some ships to obtain cloves from the natives, and in 1612 the East India Company formed a little settlement at Cambello, in Amboyna, from which they were forced to retire two years after. In 1619, a treaty was concluded in London, by which the English thought themselves entitled to share in the trade; but the Dutch settlers and the local government were jealous in the extreme, and they had recently seized Captain Gabriel Towerson and nine Englishmen, with nine poor Japanese, and one Portuguese, charged them with a conspiracy to surprise the garrison and expel the Dutch from Amboyna, tortured them till they confessed what was an impossibility or a flitting dream of madness,[2] and then cut off their heads or strangled them.

The news of this atrocious proceeding reached England just at the moment that Buckingham was preparing to assist the Dutch in their own country. The English court made formal remonstrances; the States apologized and promised redress; and the massacre of Amboyna, as it was called by the people, was lost sight of for a time. Though it was the high notion of Buckingham to make this a war of religion, it was found necessary to include in the league the Catholic states of France, Savoy, and Venice, who were led on by their jealousy of the House of Austria. After the Dutch, the Protestant powers that contracted were Denmark, Sweden, and some of the German states, who all required subsidies in English money. The first object to be achieved was the expulsion of the Spaniards from the Netherlands, and of the Spaniards, Austrians, and Bavarians from the Palatinate. The result of the campaign, as far as the English were engaged, may be told in a few words of shame and disgrace. The six thousand men already in Holland acted as auxiliaries to the Dutch army commanded by Prince Maurice of Orange, who soon felt himself overmatched by Spinola. The Italian took Breda before the prince's eyes. Maurice moved upon the castle of Antwerp, which, he was informed, had been left with a weak garrison; and he was so confident of taking it, that he would have none but the Dutch with him. Here also he failed. "And so, with some few little bickerings of small parties of horse, betwixt two intrenched armies, the whole summer was shuffled away;" and, winter approaching, Prince Maurice retired to winter-quarters. The prince died at the Hague; the Earl of Southampton and other English officers returned home to England. During the summer, Count Mansfeldt, one of the former heroes of the Palatinate war, was employed in raising mercenaries on the continent, and in the autumn he embarked from Zealand to procure English money and English troops which had been promised him. The ship which bore him was wrecked; the English captain and crew were drowned; but Mansfeldt, with some of his followers, escaped in the long boat, and got safe to England. There was at least one person here who wished the waves had swallowed him—and this was King James, who for some time would not admit the adventurer to an audience. But, in the end, Mansfeldt obtained the promise of £20,000 per month, and of the command of twelve thousand Englishmen, who were to be levied by press. These pressed men when raised were fitter to march through Coventry than to retrieve the somewhat tarnished honor of the British arms. No time was allowed to train and discipline them; they were marched to Dover (where several of them were hanged), and then hurried on board ship. The court had negotiated for their passage through a part of France, but when they appeared off Calais they were refused a landing. Mansfeldt thence led them to the island of Zealand, where the Dutch were scarcely more willing to receive them than the French had been. The authorities affirmed, that if they landed they would cause a famine in the towns, as no previous arrangement of any kind had been made, nor notice given; and

[1] Arthur Wilson.

[2] "There were not twenty Englishmen, nor above thirty Japanese in the whole island, with whom they were said to machinate this conspiracy, and the castle had in it two hundred Dutch soldiers, and eight ships riding before it well manned, whereof two were above twelve hundred tons apiece; beside, the Dutch had two other castles in the same island; and what probability could there be (if the plot were as plain as their malicious tongues could make it) that so weak a force should attempt upon so many, having men enough in the ships and castles to have devoured the attempters?"—Wilson.

while these cool-blooded gentlemen deliberated, the troops, cooped up in small, miserable transports, began to perish of sickness. This was another barbarous proceeding on the part of a people who had owed so much to this country, and it was carefully registered with the massacre at Amboyna in the memory of the English. When, at last, Mansfeldt reached the Rhine and the border of the Palatinate, he found that more than one half of his army was gone, and that it would be impossible for him to undertake any offensive operations.

While these events were in progress, nay, even before the warlike note was sounded, and before the Spanish match was actually broken off, a new matrimonial treaty was set on foot with France for the hand of Louis's sister, Henrietta Maria. Some time before, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, the resident ambassador, was assured by the favorite, De Luynes, that if there were any overture made for such a match, it should be received with all honor and affection. An overture was made; and it was thought fit, for the concluding of the match, that the Earl of Carlisle and Lord Kensington—created on the occasion Earl of Holland—should be sent as ambassadors extraordinary to France.[1] It was in this embassy that Hay displayed all his pomp and extravagance; but though a sensualist and a solemn fop, the Scottish Earl of Carlisle was destitute neither of abilities nor spirit. But he had to measure himself against one of the most wonderful of men—the incomparably crafty and resolute Cardinal Richelieu, who had now established a sort of dictatorship over both the court and the nation, and who was at once a ruthless tyrant and a benefactor to France. Richelieu, who was most eager to defeat Charles's Spanish match, was all obsequiousness till it was absolutely broken off, and then he "stood upon his tiptoes," resolving not to abate a jot of the articles of religion, and of liberty to the Catholics in England, which had been agreed upon with Spain, and to have the fullest assurances that these articles should be faithfully observed. This was excessively inconvenient to King James and Prince Charles, who only six months before had both solemnly vowed that they would never tolerate the papists. In fact, when the proposal was made, they were permitting a fresh persecution of the recusants. James, however, signed a private paper, promising favor to the Catholics, without which the pope would not grant the dispensation.[2] Carlisle presented this document, and endeavored to convince Richelieu and his colleagues that it was security enough. "But," say they, "we did sing a song to the deaf, for they would not endure to hear of it." "In the next place," continue these diplomatists, "we offered the same to be signed by his highness (Prince Charles) and a secretary of state, wherein we pretended to come home to their own asking; but this would not serve the turn neither." Carlisle made a good stand, and would have bartered a toleration in England for French troops to be sent into the Palatinate. He repeated words which they had used at the first opening of the negotiation—"Give us priests," said the cardinal, "and we will give you colonels." "Give us pomp and ceremony to content the pope," said another, "and we will throw ourselves wholly in your interests." "Yes," said the chancellor, "we will espouse all your interests as if they were our own." They confessed to these expressions, but pretended that they had already done enough in joining the league.

Carlisle made several good struggles, but he was badly supported, and seems never to have known the real and full intentions of his court, or how far he might go in procuring advantages for the king's daughter, when the demand of them might impede or defeat the obtaining of a wife for the king's son. Secretary Conway, whose instructions and dispatches seem to have been dictated entirely by Charles and Buckingham, became very obscure or ambiguous, so that "sometimes he so cautiously and prudently involved his meaning in a close and covered style that forced their lordships (Carlisle and Holland) to assemble their wits together to pick it out."[1] After some negotiation, Richelieu consented to the écrit secret, as it was styled in French diplomacy, and Carlisle dropped the question of the French army for the Palatinate. The secret promise imported that James, upon the faith and word of a king, in contemplation of the marriage of his dearest son, and of Madame, sister of his most Christian majesty, would permit all his Roman Catholic subjects to enjoy greater franchise and freedom of religion than they would have enjoyed in virtue of any articles of the Spanish treaty of marriage, without molestation in their persons, or properties, or conscience, provided that they rendered the obedience due by true and faithful subjects to their king, who would never exact from them any oath contrary to their religion. This paper was duly signed in November, by James, by Charles, and by a secretary of state; and a copy of the engagement was signed by Carlisle and Holland. The marriage treaty was signed and ratified by the solemn oaths of King James and King Louis. But even after this the French ministers raised a fresh objection. They represented that the secret promise was conceived in general or vague terms, and they demanded that James should specify the [2] Lord Nithsdale, a Catholic, was sent to Rome to make promises and compliments to the pope, in the name of King James and his son. There is a letter from Buckingham to his lordship, urging him to use dispatch. The duke tells him that his majesty has prorogued parliament, so that the exorbitant or ungentle motions might be stayed, and his majesty enabled to proceed in those passages of favor, grace, and goodness, which he had promised for the ease of the Roman Catholics, not merely in contemplation of that incomparable lady (Henrietta Maria), but as a desire worth the cherishing, to make a beginning of a straighter correspondence between "him that you went to" (i. e. the pope) than could be hoped for these many years past. "Beside," continues Buckingham, "you may be pleased to lay before him I forbear to name (wanting a cypher) the obligation which must fall upon the prince in a thing which, though it be to them but a circumstance of time, yet is to him an essential favor, being passionately in love; and among princes and generous spirits, things themselves take not so much as the manner they are done with: therefore, I conjure you as a work of more consequence than can at the first view be conceived, to use all possible diligences, that where you are there be used no delays nor interruptions to hinder the speedy dispatching of the dispensation, which work I hope will not be hard."—Sir Henry Ellis.

favors he intended. Carlisle was indignant, and recommended a resistance to this demand, telling Buckingham that he was convinced it would be given up without any injury to the match, if firmness were displayed on the part of the English court. But he demanded firmness from the weak —dignity from the debased. James and his son feared to try the temper of Richelieu and the queen-mother, and they submitted to the specification of the three following articles:—1. That all Catholics in prison for their religion since the rising of parliament should be set free. 2. That all fines levied on them since that period should be repaid. 3. That, for the future, they might freely exercise their own worship in private. There was another incident of a very different kind, which occurred during the latter part of these negotiations, to the great alarm of James. The Huguenots, or "those of the religion," as they were called in France, had received harsh treatment from Louis: Soubise, who was now at their head, and who at one time had maintained very friendly relations with some members of the English government, seized upon the island of Rhé, near Rochelle, fortified it, fitted out some ships, and proclaimed that he would not lay down his arms till he obtained a better security for the observation of the public faith and the edicts granting toleration to French Protestants. Carlisle declared this proceeding to be unadvised, unseasonable, shameful; the French court agreed to believe that the English Protestants had nothing to do with the movement, which ought in no way to alter the resolutions Louis had taken for the public good, nor the particular promises he had made to the King of England; and the lively Henrietta Maria prepared for her removal to England. Her portion was fixed at eight hundred thousand crowns; a small sum compared with the dower which had been promised with the infanta.

But James did not live to see the arrival either of the money or of the long-sought daughter-in-law. His health had long been breaking under the united influences of anxiety, fear, full-feeding, and continual use of sweet wines; and he returned to Theobalds from his last hunting party with a disease which the doctors called a tertian ague. But it should appear that he had also the worst kind of gout upon him. He had always entertained a great aversion to medicine and physicians; but at this extremity all the court doctors were called in. While they were in attendance, Buckingham's mother presented herself with an infallible remedy, in the shape of a plaster and a posset, which she had procured from one Remington, a quack, living in Essex, where, it was said, he had cured many agues. It should appear that the plaster was applied and the drink given contrary to the advice of the physicians. They may have produced irritation and done mischief; but we can not believe that they were the cause of the death of James, or even intended to hasten his end. On the fourteenth day of his illness, being Sunday, the 27th of March,[1] he sent before daybreak for the prince, who rose out of his bed and went to him in his night-gown. The king seemed to have some earnest thing to say to him, and so endeavored to raise himself upon his pillow; but his spirits were so spent that he had not strength to make his words audible. He lingered for a few hours, and then "went to his last rest, upon the day of rest, presently after sermon was done."[1] James was in his fifty-ninth year, and he had been twenty-two years king of England. As soon as the breath was out of his body the privy-council, or all the members of it that were at Theobalds, assembled, and in less than a quarter of an hour King Charles was proclaimed at Theobalds court-gate by Sir Edward Zouch, knight-marshal.[1]

[1] That excellent letter-writer, James Howell, who was at Theobalds, tells us that the knight-marshal proclaimed Prince Charles, the rightful and dubitable heir, to be king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland; but he was set right by Mr. Secretary Conway, and then said, indubitable heir.

A.D. 1625. On the afternoon of Monday, the 28th of March, Charles took coach at Theobalds with the Duke of Buckingham, and came to Whitehall. On the same day he was proclaimed at Whitehall-gate and in Cheapside, in the midst of a sad shower of rain; and the weather was thought suitable to the condition in which he found the kingdom. A few days after, the plague broke out in Whitechapel, whence it extended its ravages to every part of London. It was said to be even a worse plague than that which raged at the time of his father's coronation. Charles reappointed the council and the officers of government, making scarcely any change. Buckingham stood forward more powerful and vainglorious than ever. There was, however, some change for the better at court; the fools, and buffoons, and other familiars of James were dismissed, the courtiers were required to be attentive to religion, and modest and quiet in their demeanor, and they gradually became, if not more moral, far more decorous. In a few days after the accession, it was reported of the new sovereign that he was zealous for God's truth, a diligent frequenter of the church, and an attentive listener to prayers and sermons; that he intended to pay all his father's, mother's, and brother's debts, and that by disparking most of his remote parks and chases; to reform the court of unnecessary charges, and to drive from it all recusant papists. On the 30th of March, three days after his father's death, Charles ratified, as king, the treaty with France; and on the 1st of May the marriage ceremony was performed at Paris—the Duke of Cherreu, a member of the House of Guise, acting as Charles's proxy. Buckingham was appointed to bring the bride to England, and he proceeded with an immense retinue to Paris, where he dazzled all eyes with his splendor. This man's gallantry was not checked by the national shyness of Englishmen; for he had scarcely set foot in the French court, when he declared love to the young Queen Anne of Austria. The Cardinal Richelieu made all the haste he decently could to get him back to England; and, after eight days, Buckingham left Paris, with Henrietta Maria. They traveled very slowly, or stopped very frequently; for though they began their journey on the 23d of May, they did not reach Dover till the 27th of June, in the evening. That night the young queen slept in Dover Castle. On the morrow morning, Charles, who had slept at Canterbury, rode to Dover to receive his wife. They met in the castle: the bride knelt down at his feet, and would have kissed his hand, but the king took her up in his arms and kissed her with many kisses.[1] The royal couple proceeded together to Canterbury, on the following day to Rochester, the day after to Gravesend, and, on the 19th, there being a very great shower, the king and queen, in the royal barge, passed through London Bridge to Whitehall. Notwithstanding the rain and the plague, the Londoners crowded the river and its banks to get a sight of the bride, whose appearance and cheerful manners gave them much satisfaction. Stories were soon circulated of her wit, and freedom from bigotry. It was said (and the thing was considered very important) that she had eaten pheasant and venison on a fast-day, notwithstanding the remonstrance of her confessor, and that, upon being asked if she could abide a Huguenot, she replied, "Why not?—was not my father one?" In short, before she had been four-and-twenty hours at Whitehall, it was joyfully announced that she had already given some good signs of hope that she might ere long become a very good Protestant. But in a few days these bright hopes seemed to fade; and people began to count the great number of priests she had brought over in her train, and to murmur at the idolatry of the mass being again set up in the palaces of their king. She had twenty-nine priests, fourteen of them Theatines,[1] and fifteen seculars, beside a bishop, a young man under thirty years of age. On Sundays and saints' days mass was celebrated in the queen's closet at Whitehall, Charles giving strict orders that no English man or woman should come near the place during the celebration. The priests were very importunate to have a large chapel finished at St. James's, but the king was very slow in gratifying them in this particular. Charles also began to take umbrage at the friars so constantly being in the queen's private chamber, and he told these Frenchmen, who appear to have been overzealous and injudicious, that he had granted them more than sufficient liberty in public. If the French princess had been the most excellent and amiable of women, these circumstances would have rendered her odious in the eyes of the nation; but Henrietta Maria, though lively and pleasant, when pleased, was not the most amiable of women; she was self-willed, obstinate, haughty, and overbearing, and began to show her temper, even in public, before she had been a fortnight in England.[1] Meanwhile the plague grew worse and worse. In the eyes of the Puritans the inference was obvious: the land was scourged for relapsing into idolatry.

Charles had issued writs for a parliament to meet on the 17th of May; but in consequence of two prorogations, it did not assemble till the 10th of June, the very day after his arrival at Whitehall with his queen. Though not yet crowned, he wore the crown on his head. Before proceeding to business, he ordered that one of the bishops should say prayers, and that the doors should be shut. This was done so suddenly, that the popish lords were obliged to be present at the service. "Some whereof kneeled down, some stood upright, and one did nothing but cross himself." The young king (he was in his twenty-fifth year) was no orator, and he had the defect of stammering; but the words of his first address were plain and sensible. Instead of trying the patience of the Houses with long, rambling, pedantic speeches, he went at once to the point. He wanted money, and he told them so. In fact the debts which his father had left amounted to £700,000; he had already contracted considerable debts of his own; and the money voted for the war was long since swallowed up. He did not hint at a peace;[2] he said, on the contrary, that the war must be pushed with vigor, and he reminded them that they themselves had voted a recourse to arms, and, therefore, the war being their own work, the dishonor would lie upon them, if it were not followed up with spirit, from want of the necessary supplies. But though still inclined to hostilities with Spain and the Catholics, the Commons knew by this time that the war had been most miserably conducted; that the money formerly voted had been absolutely thrown away without doing the least good to the Palatine or the Protestant cause. They now hated and suspected Buckingham, whose popularity bloomed and died almost as fast as a flower; and they required from the new king, who had already declared against concession, some pledges of an extensive reform. In this temper they limited their votes to two subsidies (about £140,000), and the duties of tunnage and poundage, not for life, as had been practiced for two centuries, but for one year. They were also distressed by the anomalous position of the king—the head of the Protestant league, the chief of a war of religion, or, what they at least meant should be such—and yet suffering mass to be celebrated in his own house, and his court to swarm with papists and priests. Every day they had learned more and more of the compliances made in matters of religion at Madrid, at Paris, and at Rome itself, and they verily believed that their faith was in danger. They presented a "pious petition" to his majesty, conjuring him, as he valued the established and true religion of the land, to put into immediate execution all the penal statutes against Catholics and missionaries. Charles had promised, had signed, and sealed, and solemnly sworn, in his matrimonial treaty with France, to do no such thing; but he durst not avow his engagement, and he returned a gracious answer to the petition of the Commons. In another matter, however, he was less timid and complying. One of his chaplains, Dr. Montague, the editor of his father's works, was a decided champion of those Arminian tenets for and by which Laud afterward set the kingdom in a blaze. He taught and wrote that there was a monstrous difference between the doctrines of Calvin and the Puritans and those entertained by the Anglican church, and that in many points the established church agreed more closely with that of Rome than with that of Geneva. If all the ministers of the establishment had believed according to some acts of parliament and the late king's determined will, Montague would have been correct in this latter statement; but this was far from being the case—a large portion of the clergy was strongly Calvinistic, and the great majority of the laity who cared any thing at all about religion were passionate Calvinists. Two Puritan ministers drew up an information against what they considered the doctor's heresy, to be laid before parliament. Montague thereupon published a tract which was called "An Appeal to Cæsar," and dedicated to King Charles. Many who read the tract pronounced the author to be a papist in disguise, and one that, under the encouragement of the court, was attempting gradually to reintroduce the old religion. The Commons drew up articles against the doctor, declaring him to have "maintained and confirmed some doctrine contrary to the articles agreed by the archbishops and bishops, and the whole clergy, in the year 1562; and by his so doing, to have broke the laws and statutes of this realm." They took him into custody, and commanded him to appear at the bar of their House to answer for his writings. The king represented that it was for him, and not for them, to take cognizance of the conduct of his chaplains; but the Commons replied that they were competent to visit such offenses in a chaplain or in any other servant of the court; and they would not let the doctor go till he had given bail in £2000 for his reappearance.[1] Charles had expressed indignation at the vote of supplies, and the Lords threw out the tunnage and poundage part of the bill, because the grant of these duties was not for life. Lord Conway, the chief secretary, was pressing the Commons for more money, when the plague became so alarming that many members absented them-

[1] Meade, in one of his epistles, gives the following passage from a letter written by his court-frequenting friend, Mr. Mordant:—

"The queen, howsoever very little of stature, is yet of a pleasing countenance (if she be pleased), but full of spirit and vigor; and seems of more than ordinary resolution. With one frown, divers of us being at Whitehall to see her (being at dinner, and the room somewhat overheated with the fire and company), she drove us all out of the chamber. I suppose none but a queen could have cast such a scowl."

[2] Although troops had been sent to Holland and the Rhine, no war had been declared against any one, either at Charles's accession or at the dissolution of the late parliament. If Charles had not been more eager for war than his people, he might easily have negotiated.

selves, and the king adjourned the parliament to the 1st of August, appointing it to meet, not at Westminster, but at Oxford.[1]

Previously to the calling of a parliament, Charles, of his own authority, had issued warrants for levying troops for the Palatinate: and, having no money, had exacted that the charges of "coat and conduct" should be borne by the people, who were, in return, to receive a promise of repayment from his exchequer. This gave rise to great discontents: but the king continued the practice during the recess: and other circumstances meanwhile occurred still further to bring his government into disrepute. Soubise and the Huguenots still kept possession of Rochelle and the island of Rhé, and their fleet was so powerful at sea that the French Catholics could not meet it. In virtue of the recent alliance, Cardinal Richelieu applied to the English for assistance against the French Protestants. Charles and Buckingham complied: but, to deceive the people, it was given out that the armament was intended, not against Rochelle, but against the city of Genoa, which was in alliance with the House of Austria, and which, so went the story, was to be assaulted by a united force of French and English. Ever since Buckingham had been lord admiral, the navy had been wofully neglected, in consequence of which the seas were infested by pirates, and the trade of the country frequently molested. The only man-of-war in a state fit to put to sea was the Vanguard: but the French ministry was urgent, and so seven merchant vessels of the largest size were pressed into the king's service. Buckingham provided the little fleet with stores and ammunition as he best could: and in the month of May he caused a warrant under the great seal to be issued to call the ships' companies aboard, with orders to repair to such a part as the French ambassador might direct. The fleet stood across the Channel; but, when off Dieppe, they learned from the Duke of Montmorency, the lord admiral of France, that they were expected to take on board French sailors and soldiers, and then to proceed to fight against the Protestants of Rochelle. Captains and men instantly refused, drew up a protest or petition, and forced Pennington, the commander of the little fleet, to sail back to the Downs. Pennington himself then begged to be excused going on such a service; and presently the Duke of Rohan, Soubise, and the other Huguenot chiefs who had got a hint of what was intended, dispatched an envoy to London, to implore the king not to employ his forces against his Protestant brethren. The envoy had good words and hopes from Charles: but Buckingham told him that the king, his master, had pledged his word, and that the ships must and should go. The captains and owners of the merchant vessels, however, represented that they had been hired and impressed for the King of England's service, and that they could not be passed into the hands of the French without higher orders and a new agreement. Hereupon Buckingham posted down to Rochester with the French ambassador, who undertook to charter the merchants' ships for King Louis. But, in spite of the high and absolute tone of the favorite, merchants, captains, and men were alike averse to the service. In the beginning of July, Secretary Conway wrote a letter in King Charles's name to Vice-Admiral Pennington, telling him that his master had left the command of the ships to the French king, and that he, Pennington, should take on board at Dieppe as many men as the French pleased, and that this letter was to be his warrant. A trick was put upon the sailors—they were told again they were to go to Genoa—and they once more sailed to Dieppe. Pennington having another letter, written by Charles himself, which charged and commanded him, without delay, to put his majesty's ship, the Vanguard, into the hands of the French, and to require the commanders of the seven merchant ships, in his majesty's name, to do the same—nay, in case of backwardness, to use forcible means, even to sinking, to compel them. As soon as he reached Dieppe, Pennington delivered up the Vanguard, and acquainted the rest of the captains with the king's commands. Again, they all refused to obey. When they prepared to heave anchor, Pennington fired into them from the man-of-war, and compelled them to stay, all but the brave Sir Ferdinand George, in the Neptune—"more brave in running away from this abominable action than charging in the midst of an enemy." The Frenchmen were embarked, and Pennington led them to Rochelle: but to make the Englishmen fight under such circumstances was beyond his power. They deserted, and joined the Huguenots, or returned home, giving an exasperating account of all that had passed. The siege of Rochelle was abandoned, and Charles drew upon himself an almost crushing weight of odium without being of any use to Louis.[1]

On the 1st of August the parliament met in the good city of Oxford, but certainly not in a good humor. Charles summoned both Houses to attend him in the hall of Christ Church, and there asked for more money to carry on the war.[2] A day or two after, it was seen that, notwithstanding this demand, and the earnest representations of ministers, the Commons would not vote any more subsidies, or change their previous decision about tunnage and poundage. They, in fact, applied themselves to the redress of grievances, foremost among which they placed the non-enforcement of the penal statutes against papists. Old Coke, more bold and impressive from his great age, denounced new-invented offices and useless officers, which cost much money, and ought to be abolished; the multiplicity of great offices in one man—meaning, of course, Buckingham—the prodigality of the court and household, and the paying of certain pensions, which ought to be stopped until the king was out of debt. Others denounced with as much vehemence, if not eloquence, the now common practice of selling the offices of government. By this time the Earl of Bristol had explained to many his own conduct and the conduct of Buckingham at Madrid; and an inquiry was proposed into the maladministration of the favorite as lord admiral, and his having brought the country into a war merely from personal spite against the Spanish favorite, Olivares. The tone of the House was bold and resolute; they compelled one of their members who censured the freedom of their speech to make submission upon his knees at the bar. The learned Sir Robert Cotton, after applauding the "constant wisdom" of the House, as shown in their censure of that ill-advised member for trenching upon their ancient liberties, told them that, notwithstanding those walls could not conceal from the ears of the captious, guilty, and revengeful men without, the council and debates within, he would express his honest thoughts, and show the crimes which parliament had impeached other minions for in elder times. And then he compared the administration of Buckingham with that of the preceding favorite, Somerset, showing how much worse it was to the country, and gave a sketch of the rise aud fall of the Spencers, the Gavestons, the De la Poles, and other minions of royalty. Buckingham, at the desire of the king, who had removed to Woodstock, presented an account of the navy, and a denial of having acted through personal feelings in the quarrel with Spain. His tone was mild and gentle—almost pathetic in speaking of his loss of the Commons' favor—but when he alluded to the Earl of Bristol, he could not conceal his deadly hatred. "I am minded," said he, "to leave that business asleep; but, if it should awake, it will prove a lion to devour him who coöperated with Olivares." When they had sat nine days, the Commons were told from the king that his business required a speedy dispatch; that the plague might touch them, and that he desired a present answer about his supplies; that if they would not give such answer without loss of time, he would take more care of their health than they themselves seemed disposed to take, and shift for himself as he could. They were debating upon the subject of a supply, but were not inclined to be very liberal without some tender of redress, when this threat of dissolution reached their ears. A most animated debate ensued, and they appointed a committee to prepare their answer. This proved to be a spirited but respectful declaration, putting forward abuses, but not refusing fresh supplies. They told his majesty that they were abundantly comforted by his majesty's late gracious answer touching their religion, and his message for the care of their health, and they solemnly vowed and protested before God and the world, with one heart and voice, that they would ever continue most loyal and obedient servants. But, they added, "We will, in a convenient time, and in a parliamentary way, freely and dutifully do our utmost endeavors to discover and reform the abuses and grievances of this realm and state, and in like sort to afford all necessary supply to his most excellent majesty upon his present occasions and designs: most humbly beseeching our said dear and dread sovereign, in his princely wisdom and goodness, to rest assured of the true and hearty affections of his poor Commons; and to esteem the same to be (as we conceive it is indeed) the greatest worldly reputation and security that a just king can have; and to account all such as slanderers of the people's affections, and enemies to the commonwealth, that shall dare say the contrary." This declaration was passed as the sense of the House; but they had not had time to present it when they were suddenly summoned to the Lords to hear the king's commission for dissolving parliament. Thus inauspiciously ended, on the 12th of August, the first parliament under Charles.

During this Oxford session of twelve days, he of course obtained not a farthing; but he fancied that he could take money from the pockets of his subjects in right of his prerogative, without consent of parliament; and the hare-brained Buckingham, who had been the instigator of the hasty dissolution, cheered him with prospects of great wealth to be obtained by the plunder of Spain. Writs under the privy seal were issued to the nobility, gentry, and clergy, calling upon them to lend money to his majesty; and wherever any reluctance was encountered, threats of vengeance were employed; the duties of tunnage and poundage were levied, though the bill had not passed; the salaries of the servants of government were left in arrears; the amusements, and even the daily table,[1] at court were trenched upon in order to save money for the fitting out of an expedition, which, according to the calculation of the favorite, would pay cent. per cent. By these means an army of ten thousand men was collected on the western coast, ships of war were fitted out, and merchant vessels engaged as transports, and armed. Not a word was said about the destination of these forces;—Buckingham's blow was to fall by surprise.[2] The States of Holland contributed a squadron of sixteen sail; the English fleet counted eighty sail—the greatest joint naval power that had ever spread sail upon salt water—which made the world abroad to stand astonished how so huge a fleet could be so suddenly made ready.[3] The command of both fleet and army was given to Sir Edward Cecil, now created Lord Wimbledon, a general who had served with very bad success in the Palatinate and the Low Countries. This appointment of a mere landsman surprised and vexed the seamen, who looked upon Wimbledon with contempt. It belonged properly to Sir Robert Mansel, vice-admiral of England, and an experienced sailor, in case the high admiral himself went not; but Buckingham, for selfish motives, made the odd choice, and then persisted in it. The fleet set sail in the month of October, shaping its course

[1] Charles found himself obliged to borrow £3000, to procure provisions for his table, from the corporations of Salisbury and Southampton.

[2] Howell, however, says that the secret was badly kept, as all state secrets were in those days. He attributes, in part, the failure to the "blazing abroad of this expedition ere the fleet went out of the Downs; for Mercurius Gallo-Belgicus had it in print, that it was for the Straitsmouth: now, it is a rule, that great designs of state should be mysteries till they come to the very act of performance, and then they should turn to exploits."—Letters.

for the coast of Spain. In the Bay of Biscay the ships were damaged, and in part scattered by a storm. One vessel (the Long Robin) foundered with one hundred and seventy men on board. This was but the beginning of misfortune. The confusion of orders was such, that the officers and soldiers scarcely knew whom to command, or whom to obey. When he got in sight of the Spanish shores, Wimbledon called a council of war, the usual and dangerous resource of incompetent commanders. His instructions, like those given to the great Drake in former times, were, to intercept the Plate ships from America, to scour the Spanish coast, and destroy the shipping in the ports. But where should he begin? In the council of war some recommended one point, some another: in the end, it was determined to make for Cadiz Bay. But while they were consulting, the Spaniards got notice of their approach, and prepared to receive them. Moreover, Wimbledon allowed seven large and rich Spanish ships to escape him, and sail into the bay, where they afterward (when he had effected his landing) did him great mischief with their ordnance.[1] A sudden attack on the shipping at Cadiz and Port Santa Maria could hardly have failed even now; but the land admiral preferred taking ships by land—perhaps he meant to take and plunder Cadiz, as Essex had done—and disembarking his troops, he took the paltry fort of Puntal. Then he moved toward the bridge which connects the Isla de Leon with the continent, to cut off the communication. No enemy was seen on this short march; but, in the wine-cellars of the country, which were broken open and plundered, a foe was found which has ever been more dangerous to undisciplined English troops than bullets and pikes. The men got drunk, and became unmanageable; and if the Spaniards had known their condition, they might, at one moment, have cut them to pieces. Lord Wimbledon, as the best thing he could do, led them back to the ships, leaving some hundreds of stragglers to fall under the knives of the enraged peasantry. There still remained the hope of intercepting the Plate fleet; but an infectious disease broke out in my Lord Delaware's ship, and in consequence of an insane order given by Wimbledon, that the sick should be distributed into the healthy ships, the malady was spread exceedingly. After beating about for eighteen days, with a dreadful mortality on board, and without a glimpse of the fleet from the New World, Wimbledon resolved to carry his dirtied, dishonored flag home again, "which was done in a confused manner, and without any observance of sea orders." The Plate fleet, which had been hugging the Barbary coast, appeared off the coast of Spain two or three days after his departure, and got safely into Cadiz. And while he was master of those seas a fleet of fifty sail of Brazil men got safe into Lisbon, with four of the richest caracks that ever came from the Indies. With the troops and crews dreadfully reduced, with sickness in every ship, and without a single prize of the least value, Wimbledon arrived at Plymouth, to be hissed and hooted by the indignant people. This sorry and unsuccessful return of an expedition which had cost him so much was a grievous blow to Charles, who, however, betrayed no vindictive temper, being even averse to call the leaders of it to a court-martial; but, as the popular outcry was tremendous, he set on foot an examination in the privy council. Then the Earl of Essex and other officers attributed the failure to the incapacity of the commander-in-chief; and he attributed it to their jealousy and insubordination. But Wimbledon told Buckingham that the command had been forced upon him, against his judgment, by himself and the king, and that he had foretold to his majesty all that would happen; "and," added he, "had it not been for my obedience to his majesty, and my good affection to your excellency, I would rather have been torn in pieces than to have gone with so many ignorant and malicious people." He complained grievously of his exclusion from his majesty's presence, and of the course pursued in the privy council. After a time, the examinations were stopped, and then renewed, to the great vexation of Wimbledon, who repeated his accusations against his colonels and officers. "I have been your excellency's officer," said he, "in as difficult and miserable an action as ever any one hath undertaken, and with as little assistance as ever any one had. For many of those that should have assisted me, were more careful in betraying me than in forwarding his majesty's service." He then implored the favorite to carry him through, and obtain for him the honor of kissing the hand of his sovereign lord the king, concluding with these words: "All power is in your lordship's hands, whether you will uphold me in my cause or no, or let me be ruinated for want of it; so that I can say no more, but that, if I suffer. I shall be your excellency's martyr."[1] Buckingham did uphold him, and, in the end, neither commander-in-chief nor Essex, with the subordinates, was punished, it being agreed to attribute the failure of the expedition to Providence.[2]

As Buckingham's plan for enriching his master with the produce of the Spaniards' mines of Mexico and Peru had thus failed, the favorite undertook to go over to the Dutch, and raise money by pawning the crown jewels and plate; and to the Hague he went, taking with him those articles and the Earl of Holland, who is said to have governed him as much as he governed the king. He raised some £300,000 among the money-lenders; drew closer the treaty of alliance with the States; and negotiated with other Protestant powers, which sent their agents to treat with him. From the Hague he would have proceeded to Paris; but his amorous impudence had given much disgust there, and Riche-

[2] Wimbledon's charge against the Earl of Essex was grave and direct:—"He may give your excellency many thanks," said he to Buckingham, "that his lordship is not called into question for letting pass some of the King of Spain's ships that offered him fight, which would have been the chief service, having instructions not to let any fly or break out without fighting with them."

lion informed him that his return to that capital could not be suffered. This message, added to some preceding circumstance, almost entirely personal to Buckingham, had the effect of giving an entirely new direction to the policy of England. In his wrath, Buckingham would at once have undone what he had done only a few months before. His friend Holland, and Sir Dudley Carleton, who went to Paris in his stead, were instructed to demand the immediate restitution of the English ships which had been lent to Louis, and to tell that king that he ought to make peace with his Protestant subjects, with whom they the ambassadors were to open a secret correspondence, giving them assurance that the king of England would assist them, and asking them what force they could raise in case of Charles's declaring war against Louis. For the present, Richelieu was enabled to conjure the storm; but he was obliged to submit to several indignities and breaches of treaty on the part of the English court.

Apart from any consideration of religion, Charles had conceived a violent dislike of the Frenchmen and priests that had come over with his young wife: and, if the truth is told of them, they must have been a most intriguing and troublesome crew. Henrietta Maria, naturally enough, took the part of her countrymen and ghostly comforters, and this led to frequent quarrels with her husband. Charles reported all his conjugal troubles to Buckingham, and Buckingham did all he could to provoke fresh ones. The favorite was not only jealous of the influence of the young queen, but also disgusted with her whole nation; and he was still further incensed against her by some accidental, or probably intentional, slights which she put upon his intriguing and insolent mother. One day, the unmanly minion entered her apartment in a great passion, and, after some rude expostulation, told her she should repent it. Her majesty answering with some quickness, he told her, insolently, that there had been queens in England who had lost their heads. "And," continues Clarendon, "it was universally known that, during Buckingham's life, the queen never had any credit with the king with reference to any public affairs, and so could not divert the resolution of making a war with France." On the 20th of November, Charles wrote from Hampton Court to inform Steenie that he had fully made up his mind to cashier all the Monsers (Messieurs), and send them back to France. In his not very royal letter he talks of their making plots with his own subjects, and attempts to steal away his wife; of their maliciousness in making and fomenting discontents in his wife; and he desires the favorite to let him know, with all the speed he can, whether he likes this course or not, as he would put nothing of this in execution until he heard from him. "But I am resolute," continued the king; "it must be done, and that shortly." On the same day, however, when his passion cooled, he wrote another letter to the favorite, telling him that the thing must be done with management and delicacy. "You must, therefore," says Charles, "advertise my mother-in-law that I must remove all those instruments that are the causes of unkindness between her daughter and me, few or none of the servants being free of this fault in one kind or other; therefore I would be glad that she might find a means to make themselves suitors to be gone: if this be not, I hope there can be no exceptions taken at me to follow the example of Spain and Savoy in this particular."[1] The favorite was then on the continent, and had not as yet received the interdict of the cardinal. He was thinking of a gay visit to Paris, and therefore, as it appears, he begged his master to be patient under his domestic grievances. Some time after, Charles writes to him that his "wife begins to mend her manners." "I know not," adds his majesty, "how long it will continue, for they say it is by advice; but the best of all is, they say the Monsieurs desire to return home; I will not say this is certain, for you know nothing that they say can be so."[2] His doubt was not unfounded; the Frenchmen would not ask to go. When Buckingham returned, full of rage, from the continent, violent quarrels began anew on this score. It was thought that the queen's servants would refuse to take the oath of allegiance, and it was tendered to them as a means of getting rid of them; but they all took it except the priests.

Nothwithstanding his open declaration to the council that he abhorred the name of parliament, Charles saw that he must inevitably meet that body again, and that soon. Whatever sums had been borrowed abroad by Buckingham, or extorted at home under the privy seal, were absorbed by arrears, and all things were at a stand-still for want of money. In his own complaints against the French attendants we do not find any great stress laid upon their religion; but he knew very well that their faith and open practice of it were their real crimes in the eyes of his people, and that nothing was so likely to put the House of Commons into better humor as a rude expulsion of the entire court of his queen, men and women, priests and laymen; but, partly perhaps out of tenderness to his wife, partly out of a desire to avoid going to extremities with the French government while he was so poor, he hesitated long ere he would resort to that measure. Leaving the French for the present, he sought to gratify the intolerance of the Commons and the people, by persecuting and annoying the English-born Catholics, in doing which, he broke the treaty of matrimony, to which he had so solemnly sworn. No doubt he was the more ready to revive the old statutes against recusants, because they offered a source of revenue in the shape of fines and forfeits, which had been very productive during the two preceding reigns. He issued orders to his Protestant magistrates to hunt up the game, and he appointed a commission to levy fines on the Catholics: he commanded, by proclamations, the immediate return of all English children and youths that were studying in Catholic seminaries on the continent, and the instant departure out of England of all priests and missionaries. He also resolved, by the advice of his council, to disarm all the popish lords. In the execution of this order, which implied an odious searching of men's houses, great care was taken to give no offense to the family and connections of the favorite, who, mother and all, were known or suspected Catholics. "In the disarming of the lords recusants," writes Carlisle, himself suspected of being a papist, "there was as much respect had of some who have relation to your lordship as you yourself would desire."[1] But upon other noble families who had no such relationship with the favorite, the blow fell with unmitigated severity. The magistrates, their spies, and the fanatics searched castles and manor-houses as if there had been a new gunpowder-plot; and many an irritating scene occurred, not without a mixture of the ridiculous and farcical. The deputy-lieutenant of Northamptonshire, with two other worthy knights, and a Mr. Knightly, a very zealous actor in this line, went to the house of Mrs. Vaux, a Catholic lady, and mother of Lord Vaux, to search for martial munition. They found his lordship in the mansion, and, according to the official accounts, civilly acquainted him and his mother with the object of their visit. His lordship and the old lady respectfully consented to the search, which was duly performed, and no arms found. But, in conclusion, a younger brother of Lord Vaux got heated at this invasion of the domestic sanctuary, which possibly was not conducted so civilly as was represented, and he said that they gave to the recusants the worst usage they could, except they should cut their throats; and he swore, with divers oaths, that he wished it were come to that. The zealous Mr. Knightly told the irritated young man that there were divers statutes against the recusants which they were not troubled withal. This, young Vaux denied. Knightly then quoted the statute which imposed a fine of £20 per month for non-attendance at church, and further informed him that there was a late statute against swearing, which put a penalty of twelve pence upon every oath, and intimated that he must exact that from him; to which Mr. Vaux gave an answer with ill and scornful words. Then Knightly asked Mrs. Vaux and the Lord Vaux to pay for Mr. Vaux's oaths; and, upon their refusal, he charged the constable to distrain so much of Mr. Vaux's goods as would satisfy three shillings, and give that to the poor, according to the statute. Here Lord Vaux lost patience, and, taking Knightly aside, he told him that if he found him in another place he would call him to account for his behavior. Knightly boldly replied that his lordship knew where he lived. Lord Vaux then went into the hall, followed by one of the knights; but Knightly, also, would follow; upon which his lordship thrust him out by the shoulder, telling him that now he had done his office he might be gone. Knightly turned again to the hall, saying that he had not done, and that he might search more if he chose. Then Lord Vaux gave him a good blow on the face, and they scuffled together till they were parted. But Lord Vaux hit Mr. Knightly's man (probably the constable) with a cudgel, broke his head, and knocked him down. Whereupon the deputy lieutenants, with the rest, fearing further inconveniency, withdrew, and lodged their complaint, which was heard before the king and council. Lord Vaux was presently committed prisoner to the Warden of the Fleet, and his cause remitted to the despotic Star Chamber.[1]

The French court remonstrated upon this fresh persecution, and reminded Charles of his treaty and his oath; but this only piqued him, without effecting any change in favor of the recusants.

Having thus done something for popularity, the king devised how he might clear the House of Commons of some of its most obnoxious members, and he hit upon an artifice which was singularly transparent and bungling. Persons acting as sheriffs could not sit in parliament, and, therefore, when the judges presented the list of sheriffs for the ensuing year, he struck out seven names, and wrote in their places those of Sir Edward Coke, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Robert Philips, Sir Grey Palmer, Sir William Fleetwood, and Mr. Edward Alford, seven members who had given him the most trouble in the late parliament, and who were all resolute in their intention of impeaching the favorite.[2]

A.D. 1626. The opening of the session was fixed for the 6th of February. The king was to have been crowned at Christmas, but for several reasons —we believe the want of money may have been the principal—that ceremony was not performed till the 2d of February. There were several things too striking to be omitted, which occurred in the ceremonial of this great Thursday. The queen, as a Catholic, was neither crowned nor present in the abbey. They offered to have a place fitted up for her, but she preferred occupying a window of a room at the palace gate, whence she might see them go and return, without witnessing the religious ceremonies, which she had been taught to consider as heretical and damnable. It is mentioned by a careful relater of small things, that while her majesty stood at the window looking on the procession, her French ladies were frisking and dancing in the room. An important part was played in the abbey by Laud, now bishop of St. David's, prebendary of Westminster, and on the high road to greater promotions, being much distinguished and favored both by Buckingham and Charles. Buckingham was lord constable for the day: in ascending the steps to the throne he took the right hand of the king, and offered his left to his majesty, who, putting it by with his right hand, helped up the duke, saying to him, with a smiling countenance, "I have as much need to help you, as you to assist me." When the archbishop presented Charles, bare-headed, to the people, proclaiming, in an audible voice, "My masters and friends, I am here come to present unto you your king, King Charles, to whom the crown of his ancestors and predecessors is now devolved by lineal right, and he himself come hither to be settled in that throne which God and his birth have appointed for him; and therefore I desire you, by your general acclamation, to testify your consent and willingness thereunto," the people preserved a dead silence, and not one word followed the primate's adjuration till my Lord Arundel, the earl-marshal, told them they should cry out "God save King Charles!" upon which there followed a little shouting. The unction —the anointing of the king's naked shoulders, arms, hands, and head—things most abominable in the eyes of the Puritans, and ridiculous in the eyes of many other men, was all done behind a traverse or screen, and was performed by Archbishop Abbot, who, notwithstanding the absolution he had obtained from King James, was still suspected as being uncanonical and irregular, from his unfortunate killing of a man while hunting. Laud made several alterations in the usual service, and composed an entirely new prayer, which went to establish a closer union than ever between king and bishops, and to give great offense to the Puritans. "It was," says a courtly knight, "one of the most punctual coronations since the Conquest." It may have been this, but it was assuredly one of the dullest or the least honored by the spontaneous joy of the nation. The fact is, Charles's sayings had gone abroad; and he was suspected in politics, in religion, and in every thing else.

Four days after his coronation he opened the session of parliament,[1] with a very short speech, telling them he was no orator, but desired to be known by his actions, not by his words, and referring them to the lord keeper, who would explain the business for which he had called them together. Bishop Williams, the man that was a diocese in himself—the ready-witted Williams, who had saved Buckingham at his crisis, who had rendered many secret services—was no longer lord keeper. He had quarreled with the favorite at, or immediately after, the Oxford session; he had ventured to tell him "that he was engaged with the Earl of Pembroke to labor in the redress of the people's grievances, and was resolved to stand upon his own legs,"—and of course the bishop had fallen. The present lord keeper was Sir Thomas Coventry, the son of a judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and a thorough-bred lawyer, who had gone through the grades of recorder of London, solicitor-general, and king's attorney. But if he knew law better than Bishop Williams, he was equally ready to stretch the royal prerogative as far as ever that base timeserver had done. In his opening speech, to which the king had especially referred them, Coventry told the parliament, "If we consider aright, and think of that incomparable distance between the supreme height and majesty of a mighty monarch and the submissive awe and lowliness of loyal subjects, we can not but receive exceeding comfort and contentment in the frame and constitution of this highest court, wherein not only the prelates, nobles, and grandees, but the commons of all degrees, have their part; and wherein that high majesty doth descend to admit, or rather to invite, the humblest of his subjects to conference and counsel with him." But the Commons had never been less disposed to listen to such language or submit to such pretensions. They had again met with a resolute will to canvass grievances and to punish the favorite of majesty; and dividing themselves into sections, and appointing standing committees, they proceeded to work fearlessly. Guided by the force without, by the zealous feelings of the people, and following in many particular instances their own inward conviction, they began again with the question of religion, and insisted on sharpening still more the legal sword against papists. These champions of civil liberty would allow no freedom of conscience; and they invited their countrymen to aid them in a detestable system of denunciation and espionage. Dr. Montague, who had given bail in £2000 for his book, was supported at court by Bishop Laud, who endeavored to make the king and the favorite stand by him in parliament; but they had agreed to leave the chaplain to his fate, which probably would have been a hard one if the Commons had not left Montague to fall upon Buckingham himself, and by so doing induced the king to close their labors. In the very first week of the session a speech was made "somewhat eagerly, aiming at, but not naming the duke; but it was not applauded nor seemingly liked by the House."[1] But this discouragement was merely given to some overhasty orator: they were preparing a regular attack, and wished not for petty skirmishes. Their committee of grievances drew up an account of sixteen capital abuses, all fatal to the liberties of the people. Among these were the old curse of purveyance, and the new practice of levying the duties of tunnage and poundage without consent of parliament; monoplies; great prodigality and malversation on the part of the ministry. They traced all these evils, all the disgraces sustained by the English flag by land and by sea, and all other wrongs and misfortunes, to the "great delinquent." The king, anticipating their resolves, sent a message to the Commons, in which he chose to overlook the precedents of Bacon and Middlesex, and the notorious fact that he himself, as Prince of Wales, had joined Buckingham in procuring Middlesex's impeachment. "I must let you know," said he, "that I will not allow any of my servants to be questioned among you, much less such as are of eminent place and near unto me. The old question was, what shall be done to the man whom the king shall honor; but now it hath been the labor of some to seek what may be done against him whom the king thinks fit to honor. I see you especially aim at the Duke of Buckingham. I wonder what hath so altered your affection toward him. I do well remember his favor with you in the last parliament of my father's time. . . . What he had done since to alter and change your minds I wot not, but can assure you he hath not meddled or done any thing concerning the public or commonwealth but by special directions and appointment, and as my servant. . . . I wish you would hasten my supply, or else it will be worse for yourselves; for, if any ill happen, I shall be the last to feel it."

[2] The great lawyer, after vexing the government with other legal points, maintained that, though a sheriff could not be returned for his shire, he might yet sit for some other shire or borough; and Coke actually got himself elected for the county of Norfolk. He did not, however, take his seat, though he was permitted to enjoy the other privileges of a member of parliament.

[1] Meade.

But the Commons maintained that it was "the ancient, constant, and undoubted right and usage of parliaments to question and complain of all persons, of what degree soever, found dangerous to the commonwealth, in abusing the power and trust committed to them by the sovereign:" they stopped the question of supplies,—they proceeded more vigorously than before against the favorite,—and, not having as yet got ready their direct testimony, they voted, almost by acclamation, that common fame was a good ground of proceeding, either by inquiry, or presenting the complaint to the king or Lords. Instead of taking warning, Charles sent down the lord keeper to rate them for their presumption, and to require the punishment of two members who had given him offense by insolent discourses in the House,—to tell them that it was his majesty's express and final commandment that they should yield obedience and cease this unparliamentary inquisition, and that if they complied not they might expect to be dissolved. There were some few court members who entertained the constitutional heresy that parliaments existed only by sufferance, and that they were things that might be made or unmade at the will of the sovereign. Sir Dudley Carleton, who, as a diplomatist, had traveled a great deal in the despotic states of the continent, drew a frightful but scarcely exaggerated picture of the misery of the people there. He could scarcely have found a better argument in favor of the determined struggle the Commons were making to check that despotism which was established elsewhere, and was the cause of the people's misery and abjectness; but, with an obliquity of vision scarcely conceivable in a well-educated gentleman, he saw in it an argument for the court. "He cautioned them not to make the king out of love with parliaments, by encroaching on his prerogative; for in his messages he had told them that he must then use new counsels. In all Christian kingdoms there were parliaments anciently, till the monarchs, seeing their turbulent spirits, stood upon their prerogatives, and overthrew them all, except with us. In foreign countries the people look not like ours, with store of flesh on their backs, but like ghosts, being nothing but skin and bones, with some thin cover to their nakedness, and wearing wooden shoes on their feet—a misery beyond expression, and that we are yet free from; and let us not lose the repute of a free-born nation by our turbulency in parliament."[1] And that there might be no possibility of a mistake as to the king's real sentiment, or his absolute way of expressing it, Charles himself again addressed them, bidding them remember that parliaments were altogether in his power for their calling, sitting, or dissolution, and that therefore as he should find the fruits of them good or evil, they were to be or not to be. The Commons, thereupon, retired to deliberate, and they locked the door of the house, and placed the key in the hands of the speaker, Sir Heneage Finch. This unusual measure created a panic at court, and Charles himself proposed and obtained a conference between the two Houses. In that meeting the favorite attempted to explain away the passages in the royal speeches and messages which had given so much offense to the Commons, and to justify his own conduct. He told them, moreover, that the king was willing to submit to the consideration of a secret committee of both Houses those defects of his estate which were not fit for the eyes of a multitude. But the Commons would not be moved from their original purpose; and, after the Easter recess, they impeached the favorite at the bar of the House of Lords. Buckingham, however, was attacked in that assembly by the Peers themselves before the Commons brought up their impeachment. As if seized by a vertigo, Charles, not content with exasperating one branch of the legislature, engaged in a mad quarrel with the other. The Earl of Arundel, the marshal, had given some offense to Buckingham, and his son, Lord Maltravers, had privately married a daughter of the Duke of Lennox without obtaining the royal consent. Leaving the young lord, Charles fell upon the father, and, by royal warrant, Arundel was shut up in the Tower. This seemed to the contrivers of it a masterly stroke; for Arundel, beside his own vote in the House of Lords, held five or six proxies, which would all have been turned against the favorite. But the Lords presently took up the business, and, after a formal examination of precedents, they resolved, "that no lord of parliament, the parliament sitting, or within the usual time of privilege of parliament, is to be imprisoned or restrained without sentence or order of the House, unless it be for treason or felony, or for refusing to give surety for the peace." They then sent an address to the king, respectfully calling for the immediate liberation of the Earl of Arundel. Charles returned an evasive answer;—the Lords sent him another address. The king deputed the attorney-general to explain the royal prerogative; but the Lords would not yield, and they came to a resolution to suspend all other business. At last the king yielded in a very ungracious manner: Arundel was set at liberty, and he took his seat amid the triumphant shouts and cheers of the House. After another struggle, still more disgraceful, the court sustained another humiliating defeat in the same high quarter, and another and a more deadly enemy of the favorite took his seat in the Lords. The Earl of Bristol, since his return from Spain, had never ceased petitioning that he might be heard in his defense, and allowed to come to London. Now that he saw a strong opposition party organized in the House of Lords, which had so long been so very submissive and slavish, he sent up to claim from his peers his indisputable right. Buckingham would have preferred meeting the devil, but, upon deliberation, it was deemed expedient to comply in outward appearance. A writ of summons was issued to call the earl up to parliament, but this was accompanied by a letter privately written, and charging him, as he feared the king's displeasure, to keep away. Bristol sent the letter to the House of Lords, inclosed in one of his own, soliciting their advice and demanding permission to accuse, in his place, the favorite. Upon this the king and Buckingham sent down the attorney-general, who the very next day charged Bristol at their lordship's bar with high treason. But the Lords could not help understanding this manœuver, and they voted that the one charge should be heard after the other,—that Bristol should make his accusation, and that the counter-accusation should neither prevent nor prejudice his evidence.[1]

Bristol drove to the House of Lords in a kind of triumph, with eight horses to his coach, brave and rich with cloth of gold or tissue; but my Lord Duke of Buckingham went much more modestly than was his wont, in an old coach, with only some three footmen and no retinue. When he entered upon his accusation, Bristol charged the favorite with plotting with Gondomar to get the Prince of Wales into Spain for the purpose of converting him to popery previously to his marriage there; with having conformed to popish rites himself, and led an immoral and depraved life while in that country as the companion of the prince, and the guest of the Spanish monarch; with having broken off the treaty of marriage out of private resentment and spite at the Spanish government, which had expressed its desire to have no more negotiating with so dissolute and dangerous a man; and with his abusing and deceiving King James and both Houses of parliament on his return from Spain with a feigned and false narration.[2] On the other hand, Heath, the attorney-general, charged Bristol with having persuaded the prince to change his religion in order to marry the infanta,—with having endeavored to force that marriage upon his highness by delivering the procuration, and with having presented to the House of Lords a petition full of scandal, and highly insulting to his majesty. The Lords agreed that these charges against the earl should be heard first. Bristol asked the attorney-general, who was the prosecuting witness? Heath replied, that the prosecution was commanded by the king, and that some of the charges had been dictated by his majesty. Upon this avowal Bristol said, "that he would not contend with his sovereign, but that it might be of dangerous consequence if the king should be accuser, judge, witness, and have the confiscation."[3] The king ought in decency to have been quiet; but he could not trust the Lords. He was fearful that, if left to themselves, they might weigh and judge too impartially, and he sent the Lord Keeper Coventry, a principal agent and the legal adviser in this dilemma, to tell them that he himself, of his own knowledge, could exculpate the Duke of Buckingham; that Bristol, in impeaching the narrative of the [2] Bristol also brought articles against Secretary Conway, now Lord Conway, whom he fairly represented as the creature of Buckingham. Conway maintained, that if he had done wrong it was in obedience to orders,—that he had never done any thing without the king's express command.

Spanish match which the duke had made to parliament, touched him, who, as Prince of Wales, had vouched for the truth of that narrative; and that he trusted confidently that they would not equal the duke and the earl by a proceeding pari passu. The Peers had the wisdom and spirit to disregard this message, upon which the king attempted to remove, by his arbitrary will, the case of Bristol from the House of Lords to the Court of King's Bench; but here again he was foiled by the Peers, who firmly maintained their privileges. The Lords consulted the judges upon the two following points: Whether the king could be a witness in a case of treason? Whether, in Bristol's case, he could be a witness, admitting the treason done with his privity? The timid judges required a short time to deliberate: the king sent them a message and command to give no answer to the questions, seeing that he knew not what consequences might ensue to the prejudice of the rights of his crown, which he would not suffer to be diminished in his time. Bristol answered every particular of the charges brought against him with great spirit and perspicuity: his answer, which appears to have given general satisfaction to the Lords, was entered on the journals.[1]

It was deemed expedient, or perhaps absolutely necessary, that Buckingham should stand the fire of the Commons before he met the charges of Bristol. The Lower House, by the beginning of the month of May, had appointed eight managers, with sixteen assistants, to confer with the Lords on the impeachment, and had voted, by a large majority, that the Lords should be moved to commit the Duke of Buckingham to the Tower. On the 8th of May the impeachment was carried up to the Peers. It was divided into thirteen separate charges, the chief of which were, that Buckingham had bought for money the posts of high admiral and warden of the Cinque Ports; had invested himself with several of the highest offices of the state which had not before been held by one individual; had culpably neglected the guarding of the seas, and suffered the trade of the country to fall to ruin; had illegally detained, for his private profit, a French ship, and so provoked the French king to make reprisals on English merchants; had extorted £10,000 from the East India Company; had put a squadron of English ships into the hands of the French king to be employed against the Protestants of Rochelle; had sold places of judicature; had procured honors and wealth for his poor kindred; had committed malversation in the treasury; and had presumed to apply a plaster and give a drink to the late king, on his death-bed, against the orders of his physicians. The eight managers for the Commons were Sir Dudley Digges, Sir John Eliot, Sergeant Granville, Selden, Whitelock, Pym, Herbert, and Wandesford. Digges spoke the prologue. After comparing the parliament to the universe, the Lords to the fixed stars, the Commons to the lower world, the king to the glorious sun, he called Buckingham a comet—a prodigious comet—against whom, and his irregular ways, there were legal articles of charge to be delivered to their lordships. He then entered upon the articles of the impeachment; and, when he had done, Glanville, Selden, and Pym spoke in detail upon the several charges. Sir John Eliot delivered the epilogue to the impeachment. He compared the inward character of the duke's mind to the beast called by the ancients stellionatus;[1] a beast so blurred, so spotted, so full of foul lines, that they knew not what to make of it. "You have seen his power," continued the orator, "and some, I fear, have felt it. You have known his practice, and heard the effects. . . . . I can hardly find him a parallel; none so like him as Sejanus, thus described by Tacitus, audax, sui obtegens, in alios criminator, juxta adulator et superbus. . . . . For his pride and flattery it is noted of Sejanus that he did clientes suos provinciis adornare: doth not this man the like? Ask England, Scotland, and Ireland, and they will tell you. Sejanus's pride was so excessive, as Tacitus saith, he neglected all counsel, mixed his business and service with the prince, and was often styled imperatoris laborum socius. My lords, I have done; you see the man: by him came all the evils; in him we find the cause; in him we expect the remedies; and to this we met your lordships in conference." During these vehement speeches Buckingham jeered and fleered, showing that he had more confidence in the power of the king to protect than in that of the parliament to punish him. Sir Dudley Digges, or Sergeant Glanville, was so provoked by his insolence, that, turning to the duke, he exclaimed, "My lord, do you jeer me?—are these things to be jeered at? My lord, I can show you when a man of a greater blood than your lordship, as high in place and power, and as deep in the favor of the king as you, hath been hanged for as small a crime as the least of these articles contain."[2] Sir John Eliot's quotations from Tacitus stung to the quick. For Buckingham to be a Sejanus the king must be a Tiberius—the inference was inevitable; and Charles, beside, knew that, in the charge about the plaster and the posset, it was meant that the late king had met with foul play,—a horrible, and, as we believe, an unfounded suspicion, which obtained among the people both before and long after this impeachment. He resolved to take vengeance on Eliot and Sir Dudley Digges: two days after they were called out of the House, as if the king had sent for them, and were carried to the Tower by water, it being given out that their arrest was for high treason. As soon as the news was carried into the House, there was a cry of "Rise! rise! rise!" which Mr. Pym, not well understanding, stood up, and began to insinuate an exhortation to patience and wisdom. Whereunto one Walters replied that he seemed to mistake the voice of the House, which, as he understood, had no other meaning but that it was time to rise and go to dinner. The House, however, was greatly incensed. Pym, no doubt, had seen already that there would be a rising in arms. Charles, in the mean while, hurried to the House of Lords in a fury, not merely to complain of the insult offered to himself, but also to interpose his ægis between Buckingham and his accusers.[1] "I have thought fit," said he, "to punish some insolent speeches lately spoken. I have been too remiss, hitherto, in punishing such speeches as concern myself; not that I was greedy of their moneys, but that Buckingham, through his importunity, would not suffer me to take notice of them, lest he might be thought to have set me on, that he might come the forwarder to his trial. And to approve his innocency as touching the matters against him, I myself can be a witness to clear him in every one of them." While the king delivered this speech to the Lords, Buckingham, who ought to have been in the Tower, or at least in custody of the Black Rod, stood confidently by his side. But, again, they were both foiled by the high spirit of the Commons, who debated with closed doors on the violation of their privileges, and came to the resolution to stay all business till satisfaction were given. In a few days Charles was fain to release Sir Dudley Digges and Sir John Eliot, who returned to their seats in the House, which voted that they had not exceeded the commission intrusted to them.[2]

Just at this moment the chancellorship of the University of Cambridge fell vacant, and Charles resolved that the high honor—as it was esteemed—should be conferred on the favorite, who was lying under two impeachments and branded by the people. The Earl of Suffolk died at two o'clock on the morning of Sunday; on Monday, about noon, as soon as the news of his death had reached Cambridge, Dr. Wilson, chaplain to my Lord Bishop of London (Montaigne), arrived there without any letter, but with a message from his lordship that they should choose the duke, such being his majesty's desire and pleasure. In the emulation which had been going on for preëminence in the arts of flattery, subserviency, and baseness, the leaders of the two universities seem to have won the prize, or to have shared it with the bishops and court divines. The heads of the colleges met immediately after sermon, when "this motion was urged by Dr. Wren, Dr. Maw, and two others, with great vehemency, and, as it were, confidence of authority, so that the rest were either awed or persuaded; and those that would not have the duke durst not venture to make further opposition, though they inclined to more advised council." "It was vain," continues Meade (himself a fellow, and one that regarded the proceeding as a rare curiosity), "it was in vain to say that Dr. Wilson's bare word from his lord was not sufficient testimony of his majesty's pleasure, nor such as might be a ground of an act of such consequence that we should by this act prejudge the parliament; that, instead of patronage we sought for, we might bring a lasting scandal, and draw a general contempt and hatred upon the university, as men of most prostitute flattery; that it would not be safe for us to engage ourselves in public differences; that at least, to avoid the imputation of folly and temerity in the doing, it would be wisdom to wait our full time of fourteen days, and not to precipitate the election. To this was answered, 'The sooner the better, and more acceptable.' If we stayed to expect the event in parliament, it would not be worth 'God-ha-mercy!'" Upon the news of this consultation and resolution of the heads, the fellows and younger members began to murmur, and to run to one another to complain, and to say that the heads had no more to do with the election than any of them. They determined to set up a nobleman of themselves, and in their hurry selected Thomas Howard, Viscount Andover, recently created Earl of Berkshire, who had no knowledge of the honor intended him. On Tuesday morning every head sent for his fellows, to persuade or force them to vote for the duke; but, notwithstanding these endeavors, some of the fellows went publicly to canvass for the earl, and some more privily inquired how their friends and others were affected. "But on the same day, about dinner-time, the Bishop of London in person, with Mr. Mason, my lord duke's secretary, and Mr. Cozens, arrived with letters expressly signifying, in his majesty's name, that his majesty would be well pleased if they chose the duke." The scene which followed among the colleges is full of meaning—a key to the understanding of other manœuvers. "My lord bishop labors, Mr. Mason visits for his lord, Mr. Cozens for the most true patron of the clergy and of scholars. Masters belabor their fellows. Dr. Maw sends for his, one by one, to persuade them, some twice over. On Thursday morning (the day appointed for the election) he makes a large speech in the college chapel, that they would come off unanimously: when the school-bell rung he caused the college-bell also to ring as to an act, and all the fellows to come into the hall and to attend him to the schools for the duke, that so they might win the honor to have accounted it their college act. Divers in town got hackneys, and fled to avoid importunity. Very many, some whole colleges, were gotten by their fearful masters, the bishops and others, to suspend, who otherwise were resolved against the duke, and kept away with much indignation: and yet, for all this stir, the duke carried it but by three votes from my Lord Audover, whom we voluntarily set up against him, without any motion on his behalf—yea, without his knowledge. You will not believe how they triumphed (I mean the masters above-named) when they had got it. Dr. Pash made his college exceed that night," &c. There was only one doctor that durst vote against the duke. Some of the fellows thought of questioning the legality of the election; but they preferred their own ease, not knowing what mischief they might bring upon themselves. "What will the parliament say to us?" exclaims the narrator. The House of Commons did not leave him long in doubt; though it may be doubted whether, notwithstanding the grossness of the provocation, they had any legal right to interfere. They made an order that their disapprobation should be conveyed to the university, and letters sent to fetch up the doctors to answer for it; but the king stopped them, and commanded them not to stir in this business, which belonged not to them, but to himself.[1] Buckingham gave Mr. Reading, who went to announce his election, a fine gold chain, a letter of thanks to the university from himself, another from the king, and two from the bishops who had been engaged in the business. The king's letter, it was imagined, was "purposely framed to stop all gaps if parliament should fall upon the heads." It thanked the university for having followed his pleasure, as intimated to them by the Bishop of London; and told them that he could not, in his princely nature, forbear to let them know how much they had made themselves partakers of his royal approbation; "and," continued Charles, "we shall ever conceive that an honor done to a person we favor is out of a loyal respect had unto ourself; and as we shall ever testify Buckingham worthy of this your election, so shall you find the fruit of it; for we have found him a faithful servant to our dear father of blessed memory, and ourself," &c. In order that this letter might be generally known, it was publicly read in the Regent's House.[2]

[1] That industrious collector and transmitter of news, Meade, who evidently drew his information from near sources, writes, on the 13th of May,—"His majesty's affection no whit abates toward him, but seems rather to increase. Lord help us; what will come of these things? The distraction is great, and of great consequence; and, unless God shows the way out, we are but in ill case. Domine, Miserere! The duke being in the bedchamber, private with the king, his majesty was overheard (as they talk) to use these words: 'What can I do more? I have engaged mine honor to mine uncle of Denmark and other princes. I have, in manner, lost the love of my subjects. And what would'st thou have me to do?' Whence some think the duke moved the king to dissolve the parliament."

The favorite had now been allowed some time to prepare his defense to the Commons' impeachment, in doing which he had the assistance of Sir Nicholas Hyde. On the 8th of June, a week after his Cambridge election, he rose in the Lords with great grace and modesty, and began his reply. He affirmed that some of the accusations against him were grossly exaggerated; that others were altogether groundless: but his great argument was, that he was only the servant of royalty—that all that he had done had been done in obedience either to the late or to the present king. He confessed that he had purchased the post of Warden of the Cinque Ports; but that he thought a very excusable offense, or no offense at all. When he spoke to the charge relating to the delivery of the Vanguard and the merchant-ships to the French government, he hesitated, and then said that, though he could justify his own conduct in that particular, it would be dangerous and improper for him to divulge secret reasons of state. He pleaded an anticipatory pardon, which had been granted him by Charles on the 10th of February, or four days after the opening of the present parliament. He said, however, that it was his earnest wish to go through a regular trial. But, on the very next day, the king addressed the following message to the Speaker of the Commons:—"We hold it necessary, by these our letters, to give them this our last and final admonition, and to let them know that we shall account all further delays and excuses to be express denials; and therefore we will and require you to signify unto them that we do expect that they do forthwith bring in their bill of subsidy to be passed without delay or condition, so as it may fully pass the House by the end of next week at furthest; which, if they do not, it will force us to take other resolutions." The Commons, who had been all along resolute that a reform of abuses and the dismissal of Buckingham should precede their bill of subsidy, drew up a declaration which they meant to present to the king in a body; but, while the business was still under discussion, they were suddenly summoned to attend his majesty in the House of Lords. Knowing what this signified, they took their declaration, which had been hastily drawn up, with them. Instead of the king, they found his commissioners for the dissolution of parliament. The Speaker held up his paper and proclaimed its contents, the most important of which was a humble petition to his majesty for the removal of the favorite from access to his royal presence. The Lords, foreseeing much mischief, implored Charles for a short delay: his answer was, "No, not for a minute."[1] Thus ended, on the 15th of June, 1626, his second parliament. Before they retired to their homes, to await in patience to see what the assumed divine right would do for the king without their vote of supplies, the Commons took care to disperse their declaration or remonstrance. The paper was calculated to make a deep impression on the popular mind. The king replied, by a counter-declaration, an excusable measure, though his paper contained many equivocations and some falsehoods: but, not resting here, he, by a proclamation, commanded all persons having a copy or notes of the Commons' paper to burn the same, under pain of his indignation.

Immediately after the dissolution, the Earl of Arundel was confined to his own house, and the Earl of Bristol was sent to the Tower. Having taken this petty vengeance, Charles and his favorite devoted their whole attention to the raising of money by illegal means. A warrant was issued under the great seal for levying duties on all imports and exports; the trade in fines for religion was revived with more vigor than ever; a commission was appointed to inquire into the arrears due by the Catholics, to compound with them for immediate payments, and to secure regular returns of this odious kind of revenue; another commission was appointed to manage the extensive crown lands, and to improve in various ways the rents derived from [1] Meade's Letter, in Sir Henry Ellis.—Journals. The Commons, however, would not cede the point without a struggle. They replied to the king's order, which was delivered to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by a humble address; Charles repeated the prohibition, and, after some postponements, the subject was lost sight of, and then the hasty dissolution prevented further discussion.

[2] Meade. Buckingham's letter was also read in the same place. The favorite told them that there was nothing in the world he held more dear than the good opinion of learned and honest men, such as they were; that he could not attribute the honor they had done him to any desert of his own, but to the respect they bore the sacred memory of his dead master, the king of scholars, and to his gracious master now living; that he would maintain their charters, privileges, and immunities, &c.

them; fresh privy seals for loans were issued to the nobility, gentry, and merchants; and a demand for £120,000 was made upon the city of London. Moreover, London and the seaport towns were commanded to furnish ships for the defense of the coast and the protection of commerce in the narrow seas; and the lords-lieutenants of the counties were ordered to muster troops to be ready to meet insurrection at home or invasion from abroad. But all these minor resources of despotism were insufficient to supply the vacuum in the royal treasury, and Charles presently proceeded to the extreme measure of a forced loan on a grand scale. The members of the Protestant alliance had reaped nothing but disgrace and loss from their connection with him and his unfortunate brother-in-law the Palatine. His uncle, the King of Denmark, was completely routed on the 27th of August, and driven behind the Elbe by the imperialists under Count Tilly; and not only the cause of the Palatine, but also the cause of Protestantism in Germany, seemed desperate. The council impudently pretended that parliament was not called together at this crisis only because the urgency of the case would not allow time for their assembling and deliberating; and, therefore, a general loan was exacted, and each individual was called upon to contribute according to his rating in the last subsidy. Commissioners were let loose upon the land with books and registers, and most tyrannical instructions of the king's and the council's making. They were to examine upon oath all those that refused their money, as to the motives of their conduct, and the persons who advised them to it; and the individuals so examined were to be charged upon their allegiance never to divulge what might pass between them and the commissioners. The money, it was said, would all be paid back by the king to his loving subjects out of the next subsidies voted by parliament: but people knew not when the king and parliament would agree, and they had already ample grounds for doubting the veracity and good faith of Charles and Buckingham, who still seemed one and indivisible. Many who had refused to contribute to the loan were visited by all the vengeance of absolutism: the rich were imprisoned—the poorer sorts sent to serve in the army or navy; nor would Charles in any one instance step between the severity of his agents and their victims. In the list of the sufferers are the illustrious names of Sir John Eliot and Mr. John Hampden.[1] Sir John Wentworth, afterward Earl of Strafford, who began his political career as a reformer and patriot, was also imprisoned. The poor—the victims too obscure to be named—suffered most; but their wrongs equally with those of the greater patriots helped to swell the detestation of despotism, and to purchase the liberties which we enjoy. In several towns the tradespeople made a bold resistance. In Chelmsford "six poor tradesmen stood out stiffly, notwithstanding the many threats and promises made them."[2] In London even the rabble understood the great constitutional principle, and they shouted in the avenues of the court, "A parliament! a parliament! No parliament, no money!" Any opposition or lukewarmness on the part of a crown officer or any servant of government insured his disgrace and dismissal. Sir Randolph Crew, the chief justice of the King's Bench, was removed for "showing no zeal, and his place was given to Sir Nicholas Hyde, who had assisted Buckingham in his defense."[1] We believe that there were not many sufferers of this class. The lawyers and judges, however, subservient as they were, were patriots compared to the bishops and the high-church party. Laud, whom Charles had translated on the 20th of June, 1626, from the see of St. David's to that of Bath and Wells, drew up a set of instructions in the king's name, to the clergy, who were enjoined to preach the merits of lending or giving money without authority of parliament, and to make those merits appear as essential to salvation. To remove any doubt as to his approbation of a confederacy or league of church and state against parliament and the people, Laud expressly avowed it in the preamble to these instructions.[2] Forthwith the pulpits resounded with this exchequer preaching, and the established clergy tried to outstrip one another in a race whose goal was marked by a miter. Dr. Roger Mainwaring, one of the king's chaplains, delivered two sermons highly against the power of parliament before the king and court at Whitehall, proclaiming and attempting to prove by texts of scripture, that the sovereign was not bound to keep and observe the laws of the realm; that parliament was an inferior sort of council; that the royal will was enough for the imposing of taxes: and that any disobedience or refusal to pay money for his use would assuredly be punished in the next world. Robert Sibthorp, vicar of Brackley, who was tired of the obscure life of a country parson and longing after promotion, went, if possible, beyond Dr. Mainwaring. In an assize sermon, preached at Northampton, upon the text—"Render, therefore, to all their dues."[3]—he told the people that, even if the prince, the anointed of the Lord, should command a thing contrary to the laws of God or of nature, still the subjects were bound to submit to the punishment, only praying secretly that Heaven might turn the prince from the error of his ways, but offering no resistance, no railing, no reviling—nothing but a passive obedience. His great proof for all this was a verse in the Book of Ecclesiastes: —"Where the word of a king is, there is power: and who may say unto him, what doest thou?"[4] Not satisfied with merely preaching this sermon, Sibthorp determined to print it under the title of "Apostolic Obedience." Here a license was necessary, and an application was made for one to the primate. Abbot, notwithstanding the king's orders, absolutely refused to grant the license or declare that the precious stuff was orthodox. Hereupon Abbot was suspended, and confined to a country-house in Kent; his functions were intrusted to a commission; and Laud, who was one of the commissioners, licensed the sermon. This rising churchman, who, if we may believe Abbot and others, was "the only inward counselor" with Buckingham, received the new promotion of dean of the Chapel Royal. Dr. Roger Mainwaring, like Montague, got a bishopric; Sibthorp was not quite so fortunate—for he could obtain only a chaplainship in ordinary to his majesty, a stall in Peterborough, and the rectory of Burton Latimer, in Northamptonshire.[1] For twenty years the high-church party had been laboring hard for despotism, but their system only drove people the faster into the ranks of their opponents, the Puritans; and these last proceedings tended wonderfully to convince men's minds that the bishops, and priests, deacons, and other ministers, were the creatures of the court, the instinctive enemies of all who cherished the ancient liberties of the land, and who contemplated the extension of those liberties and their establishment upon a broader and sounder foundation. Thus many men of mark who had no love for the more fanatic notions of the Puritans, and no decided aversion to the creed and ceremonies of the church by law established, arrayed themselves against the whole hierarchy, and prepared to make the Puritan fanaticism a sharp sword against civil tyranny.

In the mean time, while clouds were gathering abroad, Charles had nothing but storms in his own house. These latter he attributed entirely, not to his wife's natural temper, but to the influence of the French people about her. At last, seeing that they would not be gone unless they were forced away, and being less delicate than formerly about the French court, he came to an unalterable decision. One fine summer afternoon he passed, apparently without being announced, into the queen's side of the house, "and, finding some Frenchmen, her servants, unreverently dancing and curveting in her presence, took her by the hand, and led her into his lodgings, locking the door after him, and shutting out all save only the queen. Presently upon this, my Lord Conway called forth the French bishop and others of that clergy into St. James's Park, where he told them the king's pleasure was, all her majesty's servants of that nation, men and women, young and old, should depart the kingdom; together with the reasons that enforced his majesty so to do. The bishop stood much upon it, that, being in the nature of an ambassador, he could not go unless the king his master should command him; but he was told again, that the king his master had nothing to do here in England, and that if he were unwilling to go, England would find force enough to convey him hence."[2] Having brought the bishop to reason, my Lord Conway, accompanied by Mr. Treasurer and Mr. Controller, went into the queen's apartments, and told all the French that were there that it was his majesty's pleasure they should all depart thence to Somerset House, there to remain away from the queen till further orders. "The women howled and lamented as if they had been going to execution, but all in vain, for the yeomen of the guard, by that lord's appointment, thrust them and all their countryfolks out of the queen's lodgings, and locked the doors after them. It is said also the queen, when she understood the design, grew very impatient, and broke the glass windows with her fist; but since, I hear, her rage is appeased, and the king and she, since they went together to Nonsuch, have been very jocund together. The same day, the French being all at Somerset House, the king (as I have heard some to affirm) went thither and made a speech to them to this purpose:—that he hoped the good king, his brother of France, would not take amiss what he had done; for the French, he said (particular persons he would not tax), had occasioned many jars and discontents between the queen and him; such, indeed, as longer were insufferable. He prayed them, therefore, to pardon him, if he sought his own ease and safety; and said, moreover, that he had given order to his treasurer to reward every one of them for their year's service. So the next morning, being Tuesday, there was distributed among them eleven thousand pounds in money, and about twenty thousand pounds' worth of jewels."[1] Two of the queen's women-servants—her nurse, and one that had used to dress her—and some dozen others of the inferior sort, as cooks, bakers, &c., were allowed to remain: all the rest were shipped at Dover a week after. It appears that Buckingham executed the high commission, which was not unattended with difficulty, of getting them out of London: for on the 7th of August the king, who was at Oaking, wrote entirely with his own royal hand the following letter: "Steenie, I have received your letter by Dick Græme; this is my answer. I command you to send all the French away to-morrow out of the town. If you can, by fair means (but stick not long in disputing), otherways force them away, driving them away like so many wild beasts until ye have shipped them; and so the devil go with them. Let me hear no answer, but of the performance of my command. So I rest, &c."[2]

Some time before the scene at Whitehall, four new ladies of the queen's bedchamber, all English, had been sworn. The first of these was the Duchess of Buckingham, who is supposed to have contributed to the crisis. Charles immediately dispatched Sir Dudley Carleton to Paris, to explain away and justify his breach of the marriage treaty. Louis, his mother Maria de Medici, his minister Richelieu, all gave Carleton a very cold reception. There was even a talk of avenging the wrongs of Henrietta Maria by a recourse to arms: but Richelieu had already wars enough on his hands; and in the month of September they sent the gallant, witty, splendid, and profligate Marshal de Bassompierre to England.

as special ambassador, to set it all right. The marshal was very courteously received by Buckingham, the Earl of Dorset, and other courtiers; but Charles sent his master of the ceremonies, Sir Lewis Lewkenor, to tell him that he must immediately send back to France Father Sancy of the Oratory, whom he had brought with him. Bassompierre absolutely refused, saying that the priest was his own confessor, and that the king had nothing to do with his family. Two days after this, Buckingham waited upon the marshal, telling him that the king desired to know beforehand what he purposed saying to him; that his majesty insisted that he should not speak to him about any business, for otherwise he would not give him an audience. The marshal, an experienced diplomatist, told the favorite that the king his master should know what he had to say from his own mouth, and that it was not the custom to limit an ambassador in what he had to represent to the sovereign to whom he was sent, and that if Charles did not wish to see him, he was quite ready to go back. Buckingham, who understood enough of this kind of business to know that he had delivered an absurd message, swore to the marshal that the only reason which induced the king to take this course was, that he could not help putting himself into a fury in treating the matters in dispute—which would not be decent in the chair of state, in the presence of the chief personages of the kingdom; and, moreover, his majesty feared that the queen his wife, incensed at the dismissal of her servants, might commit some extravagance, and cry in sight of every body.[1] At last it was agreed between the duke and the marshal, that the latter might keep what he had to say till the time of a private audience, which soon followed the public one. At the private audience Charles, as had been previously announced, put himself into a violent passion, and he treated the ambassador with great rudeness. The sum of his complaints against the expelled French household of his wife was, that they were intriguing and factious; that they had maliciously endeavored to estrange the queen's affections from him, and insolently disposed her against the English language and nation. The king, at last, got so warm that he exclaimed, "Why do you not execute your commission at once, and declare war against me?" "I am not a herald to declare war, but a marshal of France, to make it when declared"—was the appropriate and dignified reply of the ready-witted ambassador. "I witnessed there," says Bassompierre, "an instance of great boldness, not to say impudence, of the Duke of Buckingham, which was, that when he saw us the most heated, he ran up suddenly and threw himself between the king and me, saying, I am come to keep the peace between you two." The favorite's real object was, no doubt, to hear with his own ears every thing that was said; but the marshal took off his hat, and considered that it was no longer an audience, but a private conversation; and he would neither put on his hat to represent his sovereign, nor return to his business, till Buckingham was gone. The reproof was two-edged—for the arrogant minion, as usual, had kept his own hat on in the presence of royalty. Buckingham afterward had several long interviews in private with Bassompierre, a principal object of them being to induce the marshal to attempt to remove the obstacles which barred his journey to Paris, and his casting himself again at the young queen's feet. The ambassador had several audiences of her English majesty; but one day when he was with her, Charles entered, upon which she picked a quarrel. The king took him away to his own chamber, where he made many complaints of his wife, who was furious against Buckingham. All this was not very dignified; but there was more that was less so. Bassompierre was requested to reconcile her majesty to the favorite; and he conducted Buckingham to her, when peace was made between them, which the ambassador had brought about with infinite trouble. And then the king went in and was reconciled with her, and caressed her very much, thanking Bassompierre for reconciling the duke and his wife. The favorite's head still running on his mad amour, he was ready to betray his trust, to do any thing to get back to the French court, through the means of the gallant marshal, who was familiar with all kinds of royal intrigues, and who, very probably, to serve his purpose promised him what he wished. He secretly told Bassompierre that the answer which Charles and his council proposed to give him was good for nothing, but that he should not be uneasy thereat, but reply stoutly; and afterward he (Buckingham) would make it all up to his satisfaction. The marshal, acting according to this prompting, complained of the answer, and spake with great vehemence to the council for a full hour.[1]

The French court had complained, through its ambassador, as well of the general infraction of the promises made by Charles and his father of a full toleration, as of the treatment of the queen and her domestics; and it had also requested his majesty the king of Great Britain, to ordain a better and more moderate usage of his subjects professing the Catholic Apostolical Roman religion. The English council, at the very moment when the Catholics were being disarmed, fined, imprisoned, and made to compound with the sacrifice of their property for the privilege, not to profess their religion openly, but to live in England, insisted that there was no persecution, no infraction of the treaty upon that point. They boasted that his present majesty had made no new laws against the Catholics, and that he had not allowed one drop of blood to be spilled either of Jesuit, priest, or other Roman Catholic, since his accession. They could not deny that Charles and his father had allowed the French court to interfere in the religion and government of the nation; they admitted all the articles of the marriage treaty, which had been confirmed by Charles since his accession, but they pretended that all the religious part of that treaty was simply a matter of form to satisfy the Roman Catholic party of France, and the pope, who might otherwise have withheld the necessary dispensation. When statesmen could make treaties and speak of them a few months after in this manner, national agreements were no better than so much dirty paper. The English council then turned the tables upon the French, who had not been more honest, but who had taken good care not to commit themselves, as the English court had done, by signing treaties and specific clauses. It was alledged that King Louis had solemnly promised, as a sequel to the marriage of his sister, to convert his alliance with England into an alliance offensive and defensive,—to coöperate with arms and money for the recovery of the Palatinate,—to allow Count Mansfeldt to land at Calais, with free permission on all occasions to march, take up quarters in France or reëmbark,—and to assist Mansfeldt, the King of Denmark, and the Protestant princes of Germany; and the council maintained that none of these promises had been kept, and that hence numerous disasters had befallen the friends, relations, and allies of King Charles. They also accused Louis of not conforming to the articles he had entered into with the Huguenots, and particularly those of Rochelle, who had consented to accept them by the friendly interposition of King Charles; and they asserted that his majesty considered himself bound, not only by the prayers of the party interested and the confidence they reposed in him, but also by the feelings and opinions of the world at large, to importune his brother-in-law to observe this compact with his Protestant subjects. On the other great point the council admitted that it was expressly promised in the treaty of marriage that Madame Henrietta Maria and all her household should enjoy the free exercise of their religion, and that all her servants and officers should be French Roman Catholics, selected by his most Christian majesty; but they insisted that neither the letter nor the spirit of the agreement had been violated, for, though the French had been sent back, it was not as Catholics, but as offenders who had disturbed the affairs of the kingdom and the domestic government of his majesty's house. They then asserted, as proofs, several flagrant cases, of which the following are the most important:—1. That the bishop and his priests had created factions and dissensions,—excited fear and mistrust in the Protestants,—encouraged the Catholics, and even instigated the disaffected in parliament. 2. That some of the French had lent their names to others for the purpose of taking houses in the fields, where, under their protection, priests had their retreat and performed their masses, &c. 3. That they had converted the queen's own lodgings into a place of rendezvous for Jesuits and fugitives, and a place of security for the persons, property, and papers of such as had violated the laws. 4. That they had labored to create in the gentle mind of the queen a repugnance to all that his majesty desired or ordered, even to what he did for the honor of his dignity, and for the comfort and establishment of his household, and had avowedly fomented discords between their majesties as a thing essential to the welfare of their church. 5. That they had subjected the person of the queen to the rules of, as it were, monastic obedience, in order to oblige her to do many base and servile acts, which were not only unworthy of the majesty of a queen, but also very dangerous to her health. 6. That they had abused the influence which they had acquired over the tenderness and religious mind of her majesty, so far as to lead her a long way on foot, through a park, the gates of which had been expressly ordered by the Count de Tilliers to be kept open, to go in devotion to a place (Tyburn) where it had been the custom to execute the most infamous malefactors and criminals of all sorts, exposed on the entrance of a high road; an act not only of shame and mockery toward the queen, but of reproach and calumny of the king's predecessors of glorious memory, as accusing them of tyranny in having put to death innocent persons, whom these people look upon as martyrs; although, on the contrary, not one of them had been executed on account of religion, but for high treason.[1] 7. That King Charles, having borne with them long, and admonished them in the vain hope of amendment, and being most anxious to preserve a good understanding and friendship with his dear brother, he had commissioned the Duke of Buckingham to go from Holland into France, to give full information in these matters, conceiving the duke, who had contributed so much to the accomplishment of the marriage, to be the most proper agent; but that this journey had been prevented by the intimation which was given to the duke that the King of France was averse to it. Bassompierre defended as best he could, and without any scrupulous adherence to truth, the political conduct of his own court; and he then spoke for the expelled French attendants, palliating or denying altogether the charges brought against them. With respect to the procession to Tyburn and the prayers offered there, he told the council he knew very well that they themselves did not believe that story which they wished to make other people believe. It was true, he said, that the Queen of Great Britain, by permission of the king her husband, kept her jubilee in the chapel of the Fathers of the Oratory at St. James's; and after her devotions, which terminated with vespers, she went in the cool of the evening to promenade in St. James's

[1] "The rest of that clergy were the most superstitious, turbulent, and Jesuited priests that could be found in all France, very fit to make firebrands of sedition in a foreign state, so that his majesty, so long as he gave them entertainment, did but nourish so many vipers in his bosom. Nay, their insolences toward the queen were not to be endured, for beside that those . . . . . knaves would, by way of confession, interrogate her majesty . . . . ; and, no longer ago than upon St. James's Day last, those hypocritical dogs made the poor queen to walk a-foot (some add barefoot) from her house at St. James's to the gallows at Tyburn, thereby to honor the saint of the day in visiting that holy place, where so many martyrs (forsooth) had shed their blood in defense of the Catholic cause. Had they not also made her to dabble in the dirt in a foul morning from Somerset House to St. James's, her Luciferian confessor riding along by her in his coach! Yea, they have made her to go barefoot, to spin, to eat her meat out of tryne (wooden) dishes, to wait at the table and serve her servants, with many other ridiculous and absurd penances." In this account, contained in Pory's letter (of 5th July, 1626) to Meade, there is no doubt considerable exaggeration.

Park, and thence to Hyde Park, as she had often done before, but that she did not go in procession, nor say any prayers, nor kneel, nor approach the gibbet within fifty paces. But, not satisfied with this denial, he offered to justify the fact, or rather that part of it which related to praying for those who had suffered at Tyburn, if it had taken place. "Whatever criminal," said Bassompierre, "may have been executed there was condemned to death, but not to damnation, and it has never been forbidden to pray to God for such persons. You tell me that it is a blaming of the memory of the kings who made them die; on the contrary, I applaud the justice of those kings, and implore the mercy of the King of kings, that he may be satisfied with the bodily death, and pardon, through our prayers and intercessions, the immortal soul, over which the justice and mercy of the kings of this world have neither power nor effect. In conclusion, I formally deny that this action has been committed, and offer to prove that they would have done well if they had committed it." In the end of all, Charles conceded that his wife should have one French bishop and twelve French priests (none of them to be Jesuits), two French ladies of the bed-chamber, and three French femmes de chambre, a laundress, a clear-starcher, two physicians, one apothecary, a surgeon, a lord chamberlain, an equerry, a secretary, a gentleman usher, three valets, cooks at discretion, two chapels, ten musicians, a burying-ground, and the particular glory of giving freedom to a certain number of English priests detained in prison. Bassompierre left London with sixteen English priests included in his numerous retinue. Buckingham followed him on his road to talk about his own expedition to Paris, but the marshal now persuaded him to break off or delay that journey. As soon as Bassompierre arrived at Paris, he found (what he knew very well before) that the coming of the Duke of Buckingham was not agreeable; and the queen herself desired him to write and let him know that he should desist from it.[1]

It has been generally admitted by historians—and we see slight ground for questioning the received opinion—that from this moment Buckingham, who had been heard to swear that he would go into France again in spite of King Louis—as an enemy if they would not admit him as a friend—determined at all hazards to force a war with France upon his master, who had not the means of honorably supporting the war in which he was already engaged with Spain. It was true that there had been many previous causes of difference between the two courts,—that there had been seizures of ships and merchandise on both sides,—and that Soubise and other Huguenot agents had been received at St. James's, to the great vexation and rage of the French court, while Montague and other English agents had been dispatched to Rochelle and the places occupied by the French Protestants. But it was not till this critical juncture that Charles gave Soubise a royal commission to levy men and ships under pretext of their being employed against Spain.[2]

The relief of the Rochellers—the support of the Protestant cause in France,—had ever been an object near to the hearts of the English people; and it is pretty safe to conjecture that, among the motives that drove Charles and the favorite into this rash war was a glimmering of hope that they might thereby recover the short popularity they had enjoyed during the last parliament of King James. By the month of May (1627) they had collected a fleet of one hundred sail, giving out that it was intended to chastise the Spaniards and retrieve the honor lost on the Isla de Leon. Buckingham, who, it appears, attributed that failure to the circumstance of his not having personally commanded, resolved to go with the present expedition as high admiral and generalissimo. This self-confident, vainglorious man had no knowledge or experience of the art of war: he had never seen a gun fired except on parade or in a salute, and his high presumption made him despise the advice and guidance of others. But as if this were not enough to insure fresh defeat and disgrace, he went to sea without any concert or understanding with those with whom he was to act. Leaving Portsmouth on the 27th of June, with his hundred ships and seven thousand land troops, who knew not whither they were going, he came to anchor off Rochelle on the 11th of July. There he expected to be received with open arms, but the Rochellers refused to admit him into their town, and advised him to go and make himself master of the Isle of Rhé, in the neighborhood, which the Huguenots had possessed some time and then surrendered to their king. On the following day he landed a part of his army under the fire of his ships, and defeated a small French force commanded by Thoiras, the governor of the island who was taken completely by surprise. Buckingham then wasted four or five days in landing the rest of his troops, or in doing nothing. Thoiras employed this precious time in conveying all the wine and provisions from the town of St. Martin into the strong fortress, and in improving the defenses of the castle. When Buckingham moved, instead of taking the fort of La Prée, which then might easily have been done, he turned it and left it in his rear. He poured his troops into the bare and empty town of St. Martin; but the citadel, strongly placed on a rock, filled the minds of those who knew something about war with serious apprehensions. Sir John Burrough, a general officer who had earned experience in the wars and sieges of the Low Countries, maintained that the place was almost impregnable. Buckingham, who had expected to take it by a coup de main, now resolved upon a regular siege, the preparations for which were much criticised by Burrough. A few days later a random shot removed this unheeded and unwelcomed remonstrant. On the 13th of August, Charles wrote to felicitate (rather prematurely) the favorite upon his taking of Rhé,—to promise him more men—more provisions—more money—and to tell him to prosecute the war, and "by no means to be the first motioner of a treaty; .... but if the French court should offer, then to hearken, but not to believe too hastily."[1] In the same letter the king spoke of a manifesto, which Buckingham had prepared, to rouse all the French Protestants to arms. "I would wish you," he says, "to alter one point in it, that, whereas ye seem to make the cause of religion the only reason that made me take arms, I would only leave you declare it the chief cause, you having no need to name any other; so that you may leave those of the religion to think what they will; but I think it much inconvenient by a manifesto to be tied only to that cause of this war; for cases may happen to force me to go against my declaration (being penned so), which I should be loth should fall out."[2] The manifesto, when it went forth to the Huguenots, seconded by Soubise, his brother the Duke of Rohan, and their stirring agents, produced a much greater effect than Buckingham's great guns were doing. In the south of France the Protestants rose almost to a man, and the Rochellers, for the last time, openly raised the standard of revolt. Toward the end of August—for days and weeks went on without any impression being made upon the citadel—an attempt was made, or was said to have been made, upon the life of Buckingham by a French papist or Jesuit, with a thick three-edged knife.[3] Notwithstanding Charles's praise, that the duke was "proficient in the trade of war which he had so happily begun," every part of the service was conducted wildly and at random. Even the fleet, which remained to prevent the landing of any French reinforcements upon the island, did its duty so badly that, on the 28th of September, a French flotilla broke through and revictualed the garrison of St. Martin, which must otherwise have surrendered for want of provisions. It is exceedingly probable that the English fleet was serving without pay or the hope of getting their arrears; for, before the sailing of the expedition, the sailors, clamoring for their wages, had taken his horses by the head and stopped the duke's carriage in the streets of London. The army was quite ready to lay the whole blame upon the navy, and to be gone; and the colonels of regiments signed a paper, which recommended the abandonment of the siege. Buckingham knew not whether he should go or stay, changing his mind several times a-day. On the 1st of August, the king wrote to apologize for his slowness, the cause whereof was the hardness of getting mariners and the slow proceedings of the commissioners of the navy; but he assured the duke that his friend, the Earl of Holland, should soon be with him; and he thanked him for his stout heart in not leaving the siege and coming home.[1] Holland landed on the island of Rhé on the 27th of October, with fifteen hundred men; and the

[2] Hardwicke Papers. At the end of this letter is the following important paragraph,—important as showing how free the king considered himself of parliament. "I have set three main projects a-foot (beside many small), mint, increasing of the customs by imposing on the book of rates, and raising of a bank; the two first I shall certainly go speedily through withal; the last is most difficult, but I have good hopes of it."

[3] Hardwicke Papers. The very most was made of this incident, as if to endear the favorite to all good Protestants. As soon as he came home covered with disgrace, a narrative was published in a quarto pamphlet; and to make the thing more striking to vulgar minds, there was given in it a wood-cut representing the identical three-edged knife.

[1] Hardwicke Papers. Charles tells Buckingham that he fears lest "some rascal may cast doubts in the army, as if I neglected you, which I imagine is likely enough to fall out, since some villains here stick not to divulge it." These hard terms, rascal, villain, &c., are constantly flowing from the royal pen.

Rochellers sent a reinforcement of six or seven hundred. On the 6th of November the duke, who had not made a single breach, led his men to storm the hard rocks and walls of the citadel, where they were repulsed with loss at all points. He then turned to retreat to his ships; but this was no longer an easy operation; Marshal Schomberg, with a considerable French army, had thrown himself between the duke and the fleet, and had put a strong corps and artillery into the fort of La Prée, which Buckingham had left in his rear. There was also to cross a narrow causeway, flanked on both sides with marshes and salt-pits, and now swept by Schomberg with a cross-fire. Not a single precaution had been taken, and nothing but the native courage of the men and their leader (for Buckingham himself was personally brave) prevented a surrender at discretion, or an absolute destruction. The English rushed like bull-dogs upon the causeway; and when they got beyond it, notwithstanding their frightful loss, they turned their faces toward the French, formed in good order, and offered them battle. But Schomberg, too glad to see them gone, declined the contest, and permitted them to reëmbark without offering them further molestation. The precious fruits of this expedition were the loss of half the English troops that had been engaged in it, and the speedy ruin of the Rochellers and French Protestants. Charles, however, wrote to assure Buckingham that he, as a general, had "done past expectation, and (if a man might say it) beyond possibility;" and that he, the king, was much comforted to see how nobly he had carried himself.[1] The duke, still loth to leave the French shore, and seeing no hope of doing any thing near Rochelle, where an immense army was concentrating under the command of Louis's brother, Gaston, duke of Orleans, conceived some very notable project upon that old jewel of the English crown, the city of Calais; and his master had written to tell him that he much approved of that design, and would see him provided in all things necessary for the execution of it with all dilligence; "and for secrecy," added Charles, "I shall speak of it to no living soul but to Jack Epslie, whom I have sent for."[2] But when the favorite counted his losses, he thought it better to give up this enterprise and return straight to England, where, as his master told him, he could not come sooner than welcome. And, in effect, when he arrived at the end of November, with a disgraced flag and a murmuring fleet, Charles received him with an increase rather than diminution of affection and confidence, at which people lifted up their hands; and some said that assuredly nothing but death would part the king and this minister. The nation was now sorely hurt in its pride and thus made the more sensible to the illegal attacks on its purse. "The refusers," as those were called who resisted the loan, had been brought up to London and imprisoned by scores. When they claimed their liberty by habeas corpus, they were told they were detained by the king's especial commandment; and the court lawyers maintained that, in this as in all other matters, the king's power was unquestionable. Selden and the other constitutional lawyers referred to Magna Charta and its thirty times repeated confirmation by different sovereigns, and their discourses sent the people to study the ancient charters and rights of the nation.

[2] Hardwicke Papers. This Jack Epslie was a confidential messenger much employed by Buckingham.

A.D. 1628. Such was the state of affairs at home when Charles was persuaded, much against his own feelings, to summon a parliament, in order to obtain the means of renewing, with better success, the war abroad. The writs were issued on the 29th of January for a parliament to meet on the 17th of March; but they had scarcely gone forth when the king appointed commissioners to collect war-money from the different counties, and inform the people that if they paid dutifully the sums required of them he would meet the parliament, if not, he would think of some more speedy way. Upon this mad proceeding there arose a universal cry of disappointment and anger; the commissioners stood aghast, and Charles made haste to revoke the commission by a proclamation, wherein he promised to rely on the love of his people as expressed by parliament. But this revocation could not undo the mischief which had been so rashly done; and, pinched by his necessities, Charles in a few days proceeded to impose some new duties on merchandise of his own authority. Both ministers and judges seem to have feared impeachment: the judges had the honesty to declare that the duties were illegal; and here again the king retracted his steps and called in his orders.[1] At this time Charles had an unusual number of troops at his command, and a project was entertained, and even settled in all its details, for the bringing over some thousands of foreign mercenaries. When the people learned this, they concluded that the foreign force was to be employed in establishing a despotism. Hence arose a greater excitement than ever, and a resolution to return the most patriotic or democratic members to the House of Commons. The people of Westminster elected Bradshaw, a brewer, and Maurice, a grocer; other places followed their example in rejecting the men that had betrayed either timidity or subservience to the court. When the Commons met, on the 17th of March, their house was crowded, and their aggregate wealth was said to be three times greater than that of the House of Lords;—such had been the fruits of commerce and industry,—such the rise of the third estate, which had now the power as well as the right of asserting its due influence. It was also observed that many of the popular members were followed up to London by a train of well-doing, hardy freeholders, far more numerous than the train of any of the peers. Shortly before their assembling, Charles (as boons and great graces) liberated seventy-eight gentlemen, who were in prison for refusing to contribute to his forced loan, opened the gates of the Tower to the Earl of Bristol, and restored Archbishop

Abbot to the exercise of his authority. The people, though not without a suspicion of ungenerous motives, were gratified by these proceedings; but such was the temper of Charles, he could not make an opening speech to go in tune with the times. "I have called you together," said he, "judging a parliament to be the ancient, the speediest, and the best way to give such supply as to secure ourselves and save our friends from imminent ruin. Every man must now do according to his conscience; wherefore if you, which God forbid, should not do your duties in contributing what this state at this time needs, I must, in discharge of my conscience, use those other means which God has put into my hands to save that which the follies of other men may otherwise hazard to lose. Take not this as a threatening (I scorn to threaten any but my equals), but as an admonition from him that, both out of nature and duty, hath most care of your preservation and prosperities."[1]

The Commons had not met to threaten; they were cool and collected, and did not even lose temper at this irritating speech, or the more biting harangue of the lord keeper, who told them that the king had chosen a parliamentary way to obtain supplies, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not because he was destitute of other means, but because this was most agreeable to the goodness of his own most gracious disposition. "If this be deferred," cried this precious politician, "necessity and the sword may make way for others. Remember his majesty's admonition; I say remember it!" Here was threatening enough; but the House maintained its composure, and, without invective or much delay, resolved to grant five subsidies, and agreed that the whole should be paid within the year; but they also resolved that the king should not have his money until he formally recognized some of the most sacred rights of the people, and gave a solemn pledge for the redress of grievances. "It will in us be wrong done to ourselves, to our posterity, to our consciences, if we forego this just claim and pretension," said Sir Francis Seymour. "We must vindicate — what?" said Sir Thomas Wentworth—"New things? No; our ancient, legal, and vital liberties, by reinforcing the laws enacted by our ancestors,—by setting such a stamp upon them that no licentious spirit shall dare henceforth to invade them. And shall we think this a way to break a parliament? No; our desires are modest and just. I speak both for the interests of king and people. If we enjoy not these rights, it will be impossible for us to relieve him. Let us never, therefore, doubt a favorable reception." Coke, more vigorous than ever, because more patriotic, invoked the ancient laws, and made several effective speeches against forced loans and irregular imprisonments. Other members spoke well and at large upon the recent abuses of billeting soldiers, raising money by loans, by benevolences, and privy seals; "and, what was too fresh in memory, the imprisonment of certain gentlemen who refused to lend, and, afterward bringing their habeas corpus, were, nevertheless, remanded to prison."[1] In vain one court member bade them take heed of distrusting the king, who was young and vigorous, and did these and the like things out of necessity; in vain another spoke of the king's goodness being next only to that of God; the Commons would not be moved a hair's breadth from their purpose. "Let us work while we have time," cried Coke; "I am absolutely for giving supply to his majesty, but yet with some caution. Let us not flatter ourselves. Who will give subsidies if the king may impose what he will? I know he is a religious king, free from personal vices; but he deals with other men's hands, and sees with other men's eyes." Even Secretary Coke was obliged to admit that the granting of supplies and the redress of grievances ought to go hand in hand.

On the 8th day of May the Commons passed the following resolutions, without a dissentient voice:— "1. That no freeman ought to be committed, or detained in prison, or otherways restrained, by command of the king, or the privy council, or any other; unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint, be expressed, for which, by law, he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained. 2. That the writ of habeas corpus can not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by command of the king, privy council, or any other; he praying the same. 3. That if a freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained by command of the king, privy council, or any other, no cause of such commitment, &c., being expressed; and, the same be returned upon an habeas corpus granted for the said party, that then he ought to be delivered or bailed. 4. That the ancient and undoubted right of every freeman is, that he hath a full and absolute property in his goods and estate; and that no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other like charges, ought to be commanded, or levied by the king or his ministers, without common assent of parliament."[2] The Lords were not altogether prepared to second the Commons; the king was determined to cling to the prerogatives or abuses of his predecessors; and, above all, to that particular practice by which, at his own will, he sent the subject to a prison without assigning cause, or bringing him to a fair trial; and, though eager for the five subsidies, which he must have well known he could not get without gratifying the Commons, Charles let his intentions appear broadly through a very thin and transparent veil of compliment and cajolery. Buckingham also did infinite mischief to his cause, by an impertinent interference which was denounced in the Commons by Sir John Eliot. "I know not," said Eliot, "by what fatality or importunity it has crept in, but I observe, in the close of Mr. Secretary's relation, mention made of another in addition to his majesty; and that which hath been formerly a matter of complaint I find here still—a mixture with his majesty, not only in business, but in name. Let me beseech you, sir, let no man hereafter within these walls take this boldness to introduce it." Meanwhile the mighty stream rolled onward in its resistless course. After some conferences with the Lords, who were as anxious as themselves to put an end at least to arbitrary imprisonment, the Commons, on the 28th of May, prayed the king's assent to the celebrated "PETITION OF RIGHT." They humbly showed to his majesty that, by the statute made in the reign of King Edward I., commonly called Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo, no tallage or aid could be levied by the king without consent of parliament; that, by authority of parliament, holden in the 25th year of King Edward III., it was declared and enacted, that from thenceforth no person should be compelled to make any loans to the king—such loans being against reason and the franchises of the land. "And," continued the petition, "by other laws of this realm, it is provided that none should be charged, by any charge or imposition called a benevolence, nor by such like charge; by which the statutes before mentioned, and the other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not set by common consent in parliament; yet, nevertheless, of late, divers commissions, directed to sundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have issued, by pretext whereof your people have been in divers places assembled, and required to lend certain sums of money unto your majesty, and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an unlawful oath administered unto them, not warrantable by the laws and statutes of this realm, and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance and give attendance before your privy council, and in other places; and others of them have therefore been imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted; and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people in several counties, by lords lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majesty or your privy council, against the laws and free customs of this realm." Then, invoking Magna Charta, the Commons declared that, by that great charter of the liberties of England, it was enacted, that no freeman should suffer in person or property, be imprisoned, outlawed, or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land. "Nevertheless," they continued, "against the tenor of the said statutes, and other the good laws and statutes of your realm, to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned, without any cause showed; and when, for their deliverance, they were brought before your justices, by your majesty's writs of habeas corpus, there to undergo and receive, as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the causes of their detainer, no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your privy council; and yet were returned back to several prisons, without being charged with any thing, to which they might make answer by due process of law." They next recited how of late great companies of soldiers and mariners had been dispersed through the counties and billeted in the private houses of the inhabitants, to their great grievance and vexation, and against the laws and customs of this realm. And they then proceeded to make their complaint against martial law, which had been introduced, ostensibly at least, to check the excesses of the troops destined for the continental wars. They told the king, that, by the said great charter and other laws and statutes of this his realm, no man ought to be condemned to death except by the laws established. "Nevertheless," they added, "of late, divers commissions under your majesty's great seal have issued forth, by which certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authority to proceed, within the land, according to the justice of martial law, against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or misdemeanor whatsoever; and, by such summary course or order as is agreeable to martial law, and is used in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and put to death, according to the law martial; by pretext whereof, some of your majesty's subjects have been, by some of the said commissioners, put to death, when and where, if by the laws and statutes of the land they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought to, have been adjudged and executed; and, also, sundry grievous offenders, by color thereof claiming an exemption, have escaped the punishment due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused, or forborne to proceed against such offenders, according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the said offenders were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissions as aforesaid; which commissions, and all others of like nature are wholly and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of this your realm." In the end, they prayed that all these proceedings and practices should cease, as being contrary to the rights and liberties of the subject, and the laws of the land. Charles, who would fain have avoided committing himself by any direct answer,—who was averse to the surrender of the smallest portion of what he considered his prerogative, but who was gasping for the subsidies,—returned this answer to the Petition of Right: "The king willeth, that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm; and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrongs or oppressions, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the preservation whereof he holds himself, in conscience, as well obliged, as of his own prerogative."[1]

To have remained satisfied with a stinted and indirect assurance like this would have been the act of imbeciles or cowards. The Commons, who felt the righteousness of the cause they had taken in hand, and the consciousness of their own great power, not only were not contented, but were indignant. And Charles added fluel to the flames by sending a message to acquaint them with his intention of proroguing parliament on the 11th of June. This message was delivered on the 5th of June, and on the following day the king repeated it, accompanied with a harsh command not to censure, or enter upon any new business which might lead to the censuring or aspersion of any of the officers of his government. The anger of the Commons was expressed in eloquent language, mingled with, but scarcely softened by, the religious feeling. Several members said that the sinful state of the nation went to defeat the glorious hopes they had entertained. "I perceive," said Sir Robert Philips, "that toward God and toward man, there is little hope, after our humble and careful endeavors, seeing our sins are many and so great. I consider my own infirmities, and if ever my passions were wrought upon, it is now. This message stirs me up, especially when I remember with what moderation we have proceeded." Sir John Eliot continued in the same religious strain:—"Our sins," said he, are so exceedingly great, that unless we speedily turn to God, God will remove himself farther from us. Ye know with what affection and integrity we have proceeded hitherto to have gained his majesty's heart; and, out of the necessity of our duty, were brought to that course we were in: I doubt, a misrepresentation to his majesty hath drawn this mark of his displeasure upon us. I observe in the message, among other sad particulars, it is conceived that we were about to lay some aspersions on the government. Give me leave to protest, that so clear were our intentions, that we desire only to vindicate those dishonors to our king and country. It is said also as if we cast some aspersions on his majesty's ministers: I am confident no minister, how dear soever, can——" Here Finch, the courtly speaker of the House, started up from his chair, and, apprehending that Sir John intended to fall upon the duke, said, with tears in his eyes, "There is a command laid upon me to interrupt any that should go about to lay an aspersion on the ministers of state." Upon this, Sir John sat down, and there was silence for a while. Then Sir D. Digges said, "Unless we may speak of these things in parliament, let us arise and begone, or sit still and do nothing." And hereupon there was another deep silence for a while, which was at last broken by Sir N. Rich, who said, "We must now speak, or forever hold our peace; for us to be silent, when king and kingdom are in this calamity, is not fit. The question is, whether we shall secure ourselves by silence, yea or no. . . . Let us go to the Lords, and show our dangers, that we may then go to the king together, with our representation thereof." After some more members had spoken to the same effect, the House resolved itself into a committee, to consider what was fit to be done for the safety of of the kingdom, and declared that no man should leave his seat under pain of being sent to the Tower, But before the speaker left the chair he desired leave to go forth for half an hour. The permission was granted, and Finch hurried to the king. The heat increased on his departure. Mr. Kirton, taking care to preface his remarks with the assertion that the king was as good a prince as ever reigned, said, "That it was time to find out the enemies of the commonwealth who had so prevailed with him, and then he doubted not that God would send them hearts. hands, and swords, to cut all their throats." And he added, that for the speaker to desire to leave the House as he had done was a thing never heard of before, and which he feared was ominous. Soon after this outbreak old Coke rose and said, "We have dealt with that duty and moderation that never was the like, after such a violation of the liberties of the subject. Let us take this to heart. In the time of Edward III. had parliament any doubt as to naming men that misled the king? They accused John of Gaunt, the king's son, Lord Latimer, and Lord Nevil, for misadvising the king, and they went to the Tower for it. And now, when there is such a downfall of the state, shall we hold our tongues? . . . . And why may we not name those who are the cause of all our evils? . . . . Let us palliate no longer: if we do, God will not prosper us. I think the Duke of Buckingham is the cause, and till the king be informed thereof, we shall never go out with honor, nor sit with honor here. That man is the grievance of grievances; let us set down the causes of all our disasters, and they will all reflect upon him. As for going to the Lords, that is not via regia: our liberties are now impeached; we are deeply concerned: it is not via regia, for the lords are not participant with our liberties. It is not the king but the duke [a great cry of ''Tis he, 'tis he!'] that saith, we require you not to meddle with state government, or the ministers thereof. Did not his majesty, when prince, attend the Upper House, in our prosecution of Lord Chancellor Bacon, and the Lord Treasurer Middlesex?" This last argument was overwhelming, and Charles had felt the whole force of it before now. Other members accused the duke of treachery and incapacity as high-admiral and general-in-chief;—as an encourager and employer of papists,—as an enemy, not only to his country, but to all Christendom; and Sir Robert Philips complained that his majesty, to their great misfortunes, had been led to answer their petition by dark oracles. Selden rose up and proposed a declaration under four heads:—"1. To express the House's dutiful carriage toward his majesty. 2. To tender our liberties that are violated. 3. To present what the purpose of the House was to have dealt in. 4. That that great person (the duke), fearing himself to be questioned, doth interpose and cause this distraction." "All this time," continued the learned orator, "all this time we have cast a mantle over what was done last parliament; but now, being driven again to look to that man, let us proceed with that which was then well begun; and let us renew the charge that was made last parliament against him, to which, in sooth, he made an answer, but so insufficient, that we might demand judgment upon that very answer only."

At this critical moment, Finch, the speaker, coming in breathless haste from the king, told them that his majesty's commands were, that they should adjourn till the next morning, and that all committees should cease in the mean time. The House quietly adjourned. When they met on the morrow, the speaker endeavored to excuse his conduct in going to the king, whereby he hoped he had done nothing, nor made any representation to his majesty, but what was for the honor and service of the House. "May my tongue," said he, "cleave to the roof of my mouth ere I speak to the disadvantage of any member of this House." After this adjuration he delivered a second message from the king, declaring that his majesty had no intention or meaning of barring them from what had been their right, but only wished to avoid all scandals on his council and actions past, and that his ministers might not be taxed; and that no such particulars should be entered upon as would require a longer time for consideration, than what he had prefixed, and still resolved to hold for the sitting of this parliament. His majesty, moreover, said that he hoped that all Christendom might have to take notice of a "sweet parting" between him and his people, and then he would not be long in having another meeting with them, when they might talk of their grievances at their leisure and convenience. The Commons denied any intention of taxing the king, but they reasserted their right of examining his ministers.[1] On the next day they went into committee, and examined Burlemachi, a foreign speculator, who had obtained a warrant under the privy seal, and, as he confessed before the committee, £30,000 for the hiring and bringing over troops of German horse.[2] One thousand of these mercenaries were already levied and armed, and waiting for transports on the coast of Holland. "The intent of bringing over these German horse," exclaimed one of the members, "is to cut our throats, or else to keep us at their obedience." Mr. Windham said that twelve of the German commanders had already arrived, and had been seen in St. Paul's. Burlemachi, however, asserted that the order for the embarkation of these troops had been countermanded. At the same time the House fell upon a new project of excise, copied apparently after the Dutch excise, and intended to be levied, as heretofore, without consent of parliament. It was confessed by Williamson, clerk of the crown, that this business was actually in the lord keeper's hands, and under the broad seal; whereupon it was agreed, "That if any member of the House knew any thing touching the excise that should be set upon native commodities in this realm, and did hold his peace, he should be voted an enemy to the state, and no true Englishman."

The Lords joined the Commons in petitioning the king to give a more explicit answer to the Petition of Right. On the same day, at four o'clock, Charles, having come down to the House of Lords, commanded the attendance of the Commons, and told them that he had thought that the answer already given was full and satisfactory; but that to avoid all ambiguous interpretations, and to show them that there was no doubleness in his meaning, he was willing to pleasure them as well in words as in substance. "Read your petition," said he, "and you shall have such an answer as I am sure will please you." The petition was then read, and the clerk of parliament gave the royal assent in the usual old Norman form,—"Soit droit fait comme il est desiré."[1] Then Charles further said, "This, I am sure, is full; yet no more than I meant in my first answer. . . . . You neither mean nor can hurt my prerogative. I assure you that my maxim is, that the people's liberties strengthen the king's prerogative, and that the king's prerogative is to defend the people's liberties. You see, now, how ready I have showed myself to satisfy your demands, so that I have done my part; wherefore, if this parliament hath not a happy conclusion, the sin is yours—I am free of it." Thus the Petition of Right, which confirmed some of the most sacred clauses of Magna Charta, became one of the statutes of the realm,—one of the great victories obtained over the arbitrary principle, not by blood, but by money, or the timely withholding of it. Three days after—on the 10th of June—the king, still further to ingratiate himself, and to hurry the supplies, assured the Commons, by Sir Humphrey May, that he was pleased that their Petition of Right, with his answer, should be not only recorded in both Houses of parliament, but also in all the Courts of Westminster: and, further, that his pleasure was, that it should be printed for his honor, and the content and satisfaction of his people; and that the Commons should proceed cheerfully to settle business for the good and reformation of the commonwealth. On the 12th of June the Commons passed the bill for granting the five subsidies; but, at the same time, they desired to have a copy of the new commission of excise, and demanded that it should be canceled, as being contrary to the letter and spirit of the Petition of Right. Charles made haste to cancel it, taking care, however, to state that this was done because the granting of the subsidies had rendered unnecessary that mode of raising money.

After obtaining judgment from the Lords upon Dr. Mainwaring, and animadverting on the conduct of Laud in licensing the printing and publishing of unconstitutional sermons, and entertaining designs contrary to the independence and conscience of the [1] Notice being taken of Mr. Kirton's speech, "That he hoped they had all hearts, hands, and swords to cut the throats of the enemies to the king and state," that expression being this day called in question, it was resolved, "That therein he had said nothing beyond the bounds of duty and allegiance; and that they all concurred with him therein." —Journals.

[2] In this force one Dalbier was to be employed. Sir John Maynard said that "Dalbier was the only cause of the overthrow of our army at the Isle of Rhé, he being an engineer; and boasted that it was his doing that got the French so cheap a victory over the English, and that they might thank him for it: therefore this fellow, being a stranger and a juggler, is deemed an unfit man to be a commander in our kingdom." —*Parl. people,[1] the Commons fell again upon Buckingham, and voted a long and formidable remonstrance against him, which was presented to the king by the speaker. On that same day the duke complained to the Lords of a member of the Lower House who had attributed to him a disrespectful speech[2] which he had never made; and he moved that the said member should be called upon to justify himself, and his grace heard against him. The Lords, considering this complaint, ordered "That the duke should be left to himself to do therein as he thought proper." He protested, upon his honor, that he had never had the words imputed to him so much as in his thoughts, and the Lords ordered this protestation to be entered on their journals.[3] The Commons took up the tunnage and poundage bill, with the intention of passing it for one year, preceded, however, by a remonstrance against the levying of the duties, as Charles had done, without their consent. Before the bill was passed, and while the clerk was reading this remonstrance, they were summoned by the king to attend him in the House of Lords at an early hour. His majesty had come down unexpectedly to the Upper House, and neither he nor the Lords had had time to robe themselves when the Commons appeared with their speaker at their head. However, Charles, unrobed as he was, but seated on the throne, addressed the following speech to the two Houses, clinging, as it will be seen, with the most tenacious grasp to his old notions of prerogative:—"It may seem strange," said he, "that I come so suddenly to end this session. Before I give my assent to the bills, I will tell you the cause, though I must avow that I owe the account of my actions to God alone. It is known to every one that, a while ago, the House of Commons gave me a remonstrance, how acceptable every man may judge, and, for the merit of it, I will not call that in question, for I am sure no wise man can justify it. Now, since I am truly informed that a second remonstrance is preparing for me, to take away the profit of my tunnage and poundage, one of the chief maintenances of my crown, by alledging I have given away my right thereto by my answer to your petition, this is so prejudicial to me, that I am forced to end this session some few hours before I meant, being not willing to receive any more remonstrances to which I must give a harsh answer. And since I see that even the House of Commons begins already to make false constructions of what I granted in your petition, lest it be worse interpreted in the country, I will now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof. The profession of both Houses, in the time of harmonizing this petition, was no way to trench upon my prerogative, saying they had neither intention nor power to hurt it. Therefore it must needs be conceived that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient, liberties of my subjects. Yet, to show the clearness of my intentions, that I neither repent nor mean to recede from any thing I have promised you, I do here declare myself, that those things which have been done, whereby many have had some cause to expect the liberties of the subjects to be trenched upon, which, indeed, was the first and true ground of the petition, shall not hereafter be drawn into example for your prejudice; and, from time to time, on the word of a king, ye shall not have the like cause to complain. But as for tunnage and poundage, it is a thing I can not want, and was never intended by you to ask, nor meant by me, I am sure to grant. To conclude, I command you all that are here to take notice of what I have spoken at this time to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but especially you, my lords the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of laws; for none of the Houses of parliament, either joint or separate (what new doctrine soever may be raised), have any power either to make or declare a law without my consent." It is undeniable that, by this abrupt prorogation while so great a matter as tunnage and poundage was still unsettled, the king returned upon his late footsteps, and dissipated what little hopes might have arisen from his tardy assent to the Petition of Right.[1] And it should be borne in mind how frequently Charles pursued the same retrograde course,—how constantly he grudged the smallest concession,—how eager he was to avail himself of any subterfuge by which he might escape the bonds of his pledged word. It was thus that the nation, which began by doubting his sincerity, ended in disbelieving his most solemn assurances. Charles, moreover, had another dangerous practice, which was, to hasten to honor the men marked with the reprobation of the House of Commons. Thus, one of his first acts after this prorogation was to translate the obnoxious Laud from the see of Bath and Wells to that of London. Laud testified his gratitude to the court by drawing up a reply to the remonstrance of the Commons.

Before Buckingham began his inglorious retreat from Rhé, the city of Rochelle was invested by a royalist army, under the command of the Duke of Angoulême and Buckingham's quondam friend Marshal Bassompierre. Although he had incited them to take up arms, Buckingham sailed away without throwing into the place the corn and provisions which he had promised, and which the Rochellers greatly needed.[2] Cardinal Richelieu, who had set his whole soul upon reducing this last stronghold of the French Protestants, made immense preparations for pressing the siege, and induced Louis XIII. to go thither in person to excite the zeal of his numerous troops. The king soon grew tired of the tedious operations, and returned to Paris: but Richelieu, a better soldier than priest, remained upon the spot,

[2] Buckingham's speech, delivered at his own table, was, or was said to be, "Tush! it makes no matter what the Commons or parliament doth; for, without my leave and authority, they shall not be able to touch the hair of a dog."

[3] According to Whitelock, Buckingham also "charged one Melvil, a Scotchman, for saying that he, the duke, intended to put the king upon a war against the commonalty, with the assistance of Scotland, and the like, and that Sir Thomas Overbury had poisoned Prince Henry by his instigation."—Memorials.

and superintended the construction of the celebrated dyke, which was compared to the works raised by Alexander the Great for the reduction of old Tyre.

The Rochellers clamored for succor where succor was due; the English people were much animated by religious sympathy; Charles was disposed to assist them, and Buckingham was burning to retrieve his honors and humble the French court. During the sitting of parliament preparations were made for another expedition, and the vote of the five subsidies might have enabled the king to do more than was really done. But the nation was vexed with rumors of some new intrigues set on foot between the French queen and the English favorite, and they might well doubt the result of any warlike enterprize that was to be conducted by so incapable a commander as Buckingham. The people of London had continued to express their detestation of this man, and their fury had broken out in one dark act, unusual to an English rabble even in the worst times of excitement. On the day on which the House of Commons had pronounced the duke to be the curse of the nation, they barbarously murdered, in the streets of London, Dr. Lambe, his physician, who was supposed to have a principal part in his evil counsels.[1] They then made a doggrel distich, which ran from mouth to mouth like some of the bloody rhymes of a more recent, but not English, revolution:—

> "Let Charles and George do what they can,
> The duke shall die like Dr. Lambe."[2]

A few days after the murder of Lambe, a label was stuck upon a post in Coleman-street, which ran thus:—"Who rules the kingdom? The king. Who rules the king? The duke. Who rules the duke? The devil."[3] On the Wednesday of the following week "his majesty went with the duke (taking him in his own coach, and so riding through the city, as it were to grace him) to Deptford, to see the ships; where, having seen ten fair ships ready rigged for Rochelle, they say he uttered these words to the duke:—"George, there are some that wish that both these and thou mightest both perish. But care not for them. We will both perish together, if thou doest."[4] After these unequivocal indications it scarcely required a spirit from the other world to intimate that the life of the favorite was in danger.[5] But the gay and confident Buckingham proceeded to Portsmouth, where he was to embark for Rochelle. Upon Saturday, the 23d of August, "being St. Bartholomew's eve," writes Howell, "the duke did rise up in a well-disposed humor out of his bed, and cut a caper or two; and being ready, and having been under the barber's hand (where the murderer had thought to have done the deed, for he was leaning upon the window all the while), he went to breakfast attended by a great company of commanders, where Monsieur Soubise came to him, and whispered him in the ear that Rochelle was relieved: the duke seemed to slight the news, which made some think that Soubise went away discontented." This admirable letter-writer is generally well informed as to passing events, but it should appear that it was Buckingham who attempted to persuade Soubise that Rochelle was relieved. Soubise knew very well that the place was not relieved, but he had other grounds for discontentment; and as no state secrets were kept, as scarcely a servant of the king or of Buckingham had the honesty to conceal what he could make money by disclosing, he probably knew that Secretary Carleton, who had at that moment arrived at Portsmouth with dispatches, brought the duke orders to open a correspondence with Richelieu as soon as he should reach Rochelle, and abandon the French Protestants for the sake of an advantageous peace with Louis. Beside Soubise, there were many refugees about Buckingham; and they were seen to gesticulate very violently in conversing with the duke. This was only the habit of their country when excited, but to the English it seemed as if they threatened his grace with actual violence. The duke left his chamber to proceed to his carriage, which was in waiting, still followed by the vociferating and gesticulating Frenchmen. In the hall he was stopped by one of his officers, and at that moment he received a knife in his left breast. He drew forth the weapon, staggered, and fell; and died with the word "Villain!" upon his lips. In the throng and confusion no one saw the hand that struck the mortal blow. Suspicion fell upon the Frenchmen, who were with difficulty saved from the fury of the duke's attendants. Then some ran to keep guard at the gates, some to the ramparts of the town. During this time there was a man who went into the kitchen of the very house where the deed was done, and stood there unnoticed of all. But when a multitude of captains and gentlemen rushed into the house, exclaiming, "Where is the villain?—where is the butcher?"—that man calmly came forth among them, saying, boldly, "I am the man!—here I am!" They drew their swords, and would have dispatched him on the spot but for the timely interference of Secretary Carleton, Sir Thomas Morton, and some others, who took charge of him till a guard of musketeers arrived and conveyed him to the governor's house. The assassin, who might most easily have escaped, had he been so minded, had written a paper to declare his motive, imagining that he must perish on the spot, and leave no one to speak for him. This paper was sewed in the crown of his hat, half within [5] Lord Clarendon, who was certainly not in advance of his age in philosophy, tells a long story about the ghost of Sir George Villiers, the father of the duke, appearing three several times to an officer in the king's wardrobe, in Windsor Castle, to tell him to go to his son and warn him that, unless he did something to ingratiate himself with the people, or at least to abate the extreme malice they bore him, he would be suffered to live but a short time.—*Hist. the lining, and was to this effect:—That man is cowardly base, and deserveth not the name of a gentleman or soldier, that is not willing to sacrifice his life for the honor of his God, his king, and his country. Let no man commend me for the doing of it, but rather discommend themselves as the cause of it; for if God had not taken our hearts for our sins, he had not gone so long unpunished.—John Felton."[1]

Mr. John Felton, a gentleman by birth and education, was no stranger to many of the men and officers then collected at Portsmouth, among whom he had served on former occasions. He had been a lieutenant in a regiment employed the preceding year in the wretched expedition to the Isle of Rhé, but had thrown up his commission in disgust because he saw another man promoted irregularly over his head, and because he was refused payment of his arrears. According to his own account, he was a zealous Protestant: his zeal amounted to fanaticism. He was now thrust into a dungeon, and horribly laden with irons, and a royal chaplain was sent to commune with him. Felton understood that this clergyman came not merely to offer ghostly comfort, but to search him as to his motives and accomplices, and he said to him—"Sir, I shall be brief:—I killed him for the cause of God and my country." The chaplain replied that the surgeons gave hopes of the duke's life. "It is impossible," exclaimed Felton, "I had the power of forty men, assisted by Him that guided my hand." The chaplain failed in his mission, and the enthusiastic assassin was conveyed from Portsmouth to the Tower of London, there to be examined by bishops and lords of the council. On his road he was greeted with prayers and blessings by the common people, who regarded him as a deliverer.[1]

"The court," says Clarendon, "was too near Portsmouth, and too many courtiers upon the place, to leave this murder (so barbarous in the nature and circumstances, the like whereof had not been known in England many ages) long concealed from the king. His majesty was at the public prayers of the church, when Sir John Hippesly came into the room with a troubled countenance, and, without any pause in respect of the exercise they were performing, went directly to the king and whispered in his ear what had fallen out. His majesty continued unmoved, and without the least change in his countenance, till prayers were ended, when he suddenly departed to his chamber and threw himself upon his bed, lamenting with much passion, and with abundance of tears, the loss he had of an excellent servant, and the horrid manner in which he had been deprived of him; and he continued in this melancholic discomposure of mind many days. Yet his manner of receiving the news in public, when it was first brought him in the presence of so many (who knew or saw nothing of the passion he expressed upon his retreat) made many men believe that the accident was not very ungrateful, at least, that it was very indifferent to him, as being rid of a servant very ungracious to the people, and the prejudice of whose person exceedingly obstructed all overtures made in parliament for his service. And, upon this observation, persons of all conditions took great license in speaking of the person of the duke, and dissecting all his infirmities, believing they should not thereby incur any displeasure of the king; in which they took very ill measures, for from that time almost to the time of his own death, the king admitted very few into any degree of trust who had ever discovered themselves to be enemies to the duke, or against whom he had manifested a notable prejudice."[1]

For the present Charles took the duke's widow and children under his special protection, paid his debts, which were considerable, styled Buckingham his martyr, and ordered his body to be buried among the illustrious dead in Westminster Abbey. He could not, however, venture upon a grand public funeral. At ten o'clock at night, on the 18th of September, a coffin was borne on men's shoulders, and in a poor and confused manner, from Wallingford House over against Whitehall to Westminster Abbey, there being not much above a hundred mourners, who attended upon an empty coffin, for the duke's corpse itself had been secretly interred the day before, as if it had been doubted the people in their madness might have surprised it. As the empty coffin was carried along by night, to prevent disorder, the train-bands kept guard on both sides of the way, beating their drums to drown the voices of the people, and carrying their pikes and muskets upon their shoulders as in a march, not trailing them as was usual at a mourning.[2] Felton, meanwhile, persisted in his assertion that he had no accomplices, and no motive but that of doing good to his country and the cause of the true religion.[3] The Earl of Dorset, who, according to some accounts, was accompanied by Bishop Laud, went to the Tower and threatened the prisoner with the rack. "I am ready," said Felton: "yet I must tell you that I will then accuse you, my Lord of Dorset, and no one but yourself." The king was desirous of employing the rack; but the House of Commons had of late given many salutary lessons and warnings, and the judges unanimously declared that the use of torture had been at all times unwarrantable by the laws of England; and upon this declaration Charles declined to use his prerogative. For some time Felton gloried in his deed; but at length, "through the continual inculcation of his majesty's chaplains and others of the long robe," he was induced to consider himself in the light of a foul murderer. It may be doubted, however, whether he ever really regretted that Buckingham was removed. When put upon his trial, he confessed the fact with which he was charged, but added, that he did it not maliciously, but out of an interest for the good of his country. The attorney-general made a speech in aggravation of the offense, showing the high quality of the person killed, who was so dear and near a subject of the king's, so faithful a servant to his majesty, so great a counselor of state, a general, high-admiral, &c., &c; and, producing the knife in open court, he compared Felton to Ravaillac, who had murdered Henry IV. of France. Judge Jones asked Felton what he could say why judgment should not be given against him, without empanneling a jury or examining witnesses. Felton answered that he was sorry if he had taken away so faithful a servant to his majesty as Mr. Attorney had described the duke to be, and, lifting up his arm, he said, "This is the instrument which did the fact: I desire it may be first cut off." The judge told him that, by the law, if a man strike in the king's palace, he is to lose his hand, &c.; but it was not his majesty's pleasure that they should proceed against him in any other way than that which the law had ordinarily determined in such cases. "You shall therefore," said he, "have the law and no more;" and so gave sentence he should be hanged until he were dead. Felton bowed and thanked his lordship. He was hanged at Tyburn, and his body, by the king's orders, was sent down to Portsmouth and fixed on a gibbet.[1]

In lieu of Buckingham as commander of the expedition to Rochelle, Charles appointed the Earl of Lindsey, who sailed on the 8th of September with a formidable fleet and army, which did no more than might have been done had they still been commanded by the favorite. At the same time private negotiations were carried on with the French court by means of Mr. Walter Montague,[2] who was then a Catholic in heart, and, as such, averse to the Protestant Rochellers. Lindsey returned with dishonor, and soon after Rochelle, the last bulwark of the Huguenots, was taken by Richelieu. When the siege began there were fifteen thousand souls within those walls; when it ended there remained but four thousand, and these half dead from famine.

A.D. 1629. Parliament, which had been further prorogued from the 20th of October to the 20th of January, met when the spirit of Protestantism was imbittered by these events, and when the English people were irritated by fresh excesses of the Star Chamber and High Commission, and the levying of duties upon merchandise, and the collecting of tunnage and poundage. The first things the Commons did was to revive all committees of religion and grievances, and to take into consideration what things the liberty of the subject had been invaded in against their petition of right since the end of the last session. Mr. Selden soon after reported to the House that the unpalatable speech which his majesty made in the Lords the last day of the last session had been entered on the Journals along with the Petition of Right, and the proper answer, by his majesty's command. But in fact, to the country Charles had suppressed the proper document, and circulated in its stead a copy of the Petition with his first answer to it, which parliament had rejected. The king's printer being sent for to know by what authority he had suppressed the original impression and printed another with unwarrantable additions, answered that he had a warrant for it; and upon sending some of the members to his house, it was found that the clerk of the Lords had sent the proper papers; that, during the sitting of parliament, fifteen hundred copies of them had been printed, but very few divulged; and that the day after the session was ended the attorney-general had sent for the printer and told him, as from the king, that he must not publish these papers,—that the Lord Privy Seal, the Earl of Worcester, had told him as much; and that soon after the printer was sent for to court, and told that he must make a new impression, and print the Petition of Right with the king's first answer to it, and his majesty's last speech in the Lords. The House was indignant at this double dealing. "For this Petition of Right," said Selden, "we know how it has been invaded since our last meeting. Our liberties of life, person, and freehold have been invaded,—men have been committed contrary to that petition. . . . No man ought to lose life or limb but by the law, and hath not one lately lost his ears by order of the Star Chamber? Next, they will take away our arms, and then our legs, and so our lives. Let all see we are sensible of this. Evil customs creep in on us: let us make a just representation thereof to his majesty." But the attention of the House was presently drawn away to the case of Mr. Rolles, a merchant and a member of the house, who complained that his goods were seized by the officers of the customs, for refusing to pay the rates by them demanded, although he told them what was adjudged to be due by law he would pay them. This case, which was only one of many, transported the Commons. "Cast your eyes which way you please," exclaimed Sir Robert Philips, "you see violations of the liberty of the subject. Look on the privileges of this House. . . They knew the party was a parliament man; nay, they said if all the parliament was with him, or concerned in the goods, they would seize them just the same." "We have had good admonitions," cried Littleton, "and we have followed them. We have had moderation preached to us in parliament, and we follow it. I would others did the like out of parliament. Let the parties be sent for that violated the liberties of parliament, that they may have their doom." The king sent a message by Secretary Coke, commanding them to stay any further debate or proceedings in that case until the morrow at two o'clock in the afternoon, when his majesty was resolved to speak with both Houses in the Banqueting House at Whitehall. On the morrow—the 24th of January—the two Houses attended at the time and place appointed, and Charles thus addressed them, paying a compliment to the Lords at the expense of the Commons: "The care I have," he said, "to remove all obstacles that may hinder the good correspondency, or cause a misunderstanding, betwixt me and this parliament, made me call you hither at this time, the particular occasion being a complaint lately moved in the Lower House. For you, my lords, I am glad to take this and all other occasions whereby you may clearly understand both my words and actions: for, as you are nearest in degree, so you are the fittest witnesses for kings. The complaint I speak of is for staying men's goods that deny tunnage and poundage. This may have an easy and short conclusion, if my words and actions be rightly understood; for, by passing the bill as my ancestors have had it, my by-past actions will be concluded and my future proceedings authorized, which certainly would not have been struck upon if men had not imagined that I had taken these duties as pertaining unto my hereditary prerogative, in which they are much deceived: for it ever was, and still is, my meaning, by the gift of my people to enjoy it; and my intention in my speech at the end of the last session was not to challenge tunnage and poundage as of right, but de bene esse, showing you the necessity, not the right, by which I was to take it until you had granted it unto me, assuring myself, according to your general professions, that you wanted time, and not good-will, to give to me." He proceeded to tell the Commons he expected that they, without loss of time, would vote the tunnage and poundage, and so put an end to all questions arising out of this subject. "To conclude," he proceeded, "let us not be jealous one of the other's actions; for, if I had been easily moved at every occasion, the order made in the Lower House on Wednesday night last might have made me startle, there being some show to suspect that you had given yourselves the liberty to be the inquisitors after complaints, the words of your order being somewhat too largely penned; but, looking into your actions, I find you only hear complaints, not seek complaints, for I am certain you neither pretend nor desire to be inquisitors of men's actions before particular complaint be made."

[3] Meade says that it was reported that he affirmed in the Tower, "that his only confederate and setter on was the remonstrance of the parliament, which he then verily thought in his soul and conscience to be a sufficient warrant for what he did upon the duke's person." And Sir Dudley Carleton, who wrote a long account of the assassination to the queen, avers that Felton had said, at Portsmouth, on his first arrest, "that, reading the remonstrance of the House of parliament, it came into his mind that, in committing the act of killing the duke, he should do his country great good service."

The truth was, the Commons were jealous of the king's intentions, and more doubtful than ever of his sincerity and love of his people, for though the grievance of grievances was gone, the death of Buckingham had made no visible change in the spirit of Charles's government. They were also resolute to be inquisitors of many men's actions; men like Laud and other bishops, counselors, and ministers, who attacked their consciences and their property. The Commons knew well that the voting of tunnage and poundage for life was a comparatively modern practice, and they were determined not only not to vote these duties for life, but not even for a term of years,—no, not for a single year,—unless they should see a change in the conduct of the king. They proceeded in the first place to the subject of religion, declaring that the business of the kings of this earth should give place to the business of the King of heaven. For doctrine and discipline, and all matters connected with the church, Charles had given the reins to Bishop Laud, who was not only resolved to introduce great and manifold changes, which certainly went to assimilate more and more the Anglican establishment to the Roman church, but also to tolerate no delay or dissent, —to enforce conformity by imprisonment, the pillory, the hangman's whip and knife. Laud's creed was Arminianism in the widest sense. The Commons coupled the two things together, and complained of the rapid increase of Arminianism and papistry, much resenting the fact, that of late not one papist had been hanged for receiving orders in the church of Rome. Mr. Pym proposed that the House should take a covenant for the maintenance of their religion and rights, which were both in danger; and he and other members inveighed loudly touching the late introducing of idolatrous ceremonies in the church by Cosens and others. As the sins of the land were deemed to be greater than its troubles, they ordered that a conference should be desired with the Lords about a petition to the king for the ordering a general fast. The Lords granted the conference and joined in the petition, which was granted by the king, with a few remarks, which greatly irritated the zealots. The king admitted the deplorable estate of the reformed churches abroad, which was made the chief ground for the petition; but he told parliament that certainly fighting would do those churches more good than fasting. "Though," continued he, "I do not wholly disallow the latter, yet I must tell you that this custom of fasting every session is but lately begun; and I confess I am not wholly satisfied with the necessity of it at this time." A day or two after, the king sent a message to the Commons to tell them that they ought to settle the question of tunnage and poundage before they meddled more with religion; and the court party, now weak and timid, made some speeches in recommendation of the message; but the Puritans only fell the more violently upon some of the bishops for introducing the new ceremonies. They again indignantly asserted that popery and Arminianism were joining hands to produce a Romish hierarchy and a Spanish tyranny; that civil liberty was but a dependence of the true Protestant faith; that religion was in danger, and the necessity of securing it the chief matter of all others. On the 28th of January, Secretary Coke delivered a second message from the king, telling the Commons that his majesty expected rather thanks than a remonstrance; that still he would not interrupt them, so that they trenched not on that which did not belong to them. "But his majesty," added Coke, "still commands me to tell you that he expects precedency of tunnage and poundage." Sir Thomas Edmunds, treasurer of the household, reminded the Commons how industrious his majesty had been to procure them gracious laws in his father's days; how much since then he had enlarged their liberties! "And yet," said he, "we give him cause to repent of the good he has done us by neglecting his business. Consider how dangerous it is to alienate his majesty's heart from parliament!" Mr. Coriton replied:—"When men speak here of neglect of duty toward his majesty, let them know we know of no such thing, nor what they mean. I see not how we neglect the same. I see it is all our hearts' desire to expedite the bill of tunnage and poundage in due time. Our business is still put back by their messages, and the business in hand is God's; and his majesty's things are certainly amiss, and every one sees it; but wo be unto us if we present not the same to his majesty." Dark rumors were abroad of the king's intention to dissolve parliament as soon as they should vote the tunnage and poundage for life, and "not soon to call another." The Commons continued to occupy themselves with the subject of religion, and they drew up a brief resolution, stating that they held for truth the articles of religion as established by parliament in the reign of Elizabeth, and utterly rejected the sense of Jesuits and Arminians. On the 2d of February, instead of their bill of tunnage and poundage, they presented to the king their "Apology" for delaying that bill. They complained of his majesty's sending them two messages in three days, telling him that that manner of pressing the House was inconsistent with their orders and privileges. On the following day Secretary Coke assured the House, in his majesty's name, that he was misunderstood as to a command, which was not the meaning, but simply a desire on the king's part, for the sake of concord; that his majesty was as anxious as they were for the true faith, but must needs think it strange that this business of religion should be only a hinderance of his affairs. And, in the end, the king insisted on their passing the tunnage and poundage bill, telling them they must not think it strange, if he found them slack, that he should give them such further quickening as he might find cause. This message did Charles far more harm than good: the House stuck to their grievances, and went on debating about popery and Arminianism. Mr. Kirton declared that the "two great bishops" (Laud and Neile) were the main great roots of all those evils which were come upon them and their religion. "Let us inquire," added he, "what sort of men they have preferred in the church, and why?" Every body knew that Mainwaring, and Sibthorp, and Cosens, and other men obnoxious for their Arminianism and their advocacy of an absolute monarchy,—individuals condemned and sentenced by parliament,—had been recently put upon the ladder of promotion; and the House now appointed a sub-committee to inquire into the pardons granted to those offenders, in scorn of their own justice. In the course of the debates on this subject there rose to speak, for the first time, a sturdy, somewhat clownish-looking man, of about thirty years of age, with a slovenly coat and a neglected hat. His speech was thick and graceless, but there was an earnestness in his manner, a look of command about his person, that imposed respect, if not awe. It was Mr. Oliver Cromwell, the new member for Huntingdon. "I have heard," said Cromwell, "from one Dr. Beard, that Dr. Alabaster hath preached flat popery at St. Paul's Cross, and that the Bishop of Winchester (Dr. Neile) commanded him, as his diocesan, to preach nothing to the contrary. And Dr. Mainwaring, so justly censured for his sermons in this House, has been, by this bishop's means preferred to a rich living. If these are steps to church preferment, what may we not expect?" Mr. Kirton said, that though this bishop (Neile) had leaped through many bishoprics, yet he had ever left popery behind him; that the Book of Common Prayer had been recently reprinted with many illegal alterations, ordered by this same bishop and his creature Dr. Cosens, who had changed the word minister into the word priest, and had put out in another place the word elect. The result of the whole inquiry was, that the bishops and the court had in all cases taken the obnoxious preachers and their principles, both political and theological, into special favor. The Commons, however, did not altogether lose sight of illegal taxation. They brought Acton, the sheriff of London who had seized the merchants' goods, on his knees to the bar of their House, and thence sent him to the Tower. They also brought to their bar some of the officers of customs, who declared that they had made the seizures by the king's warrant; and one of the officers said he had been sent for and commanded by the king to give them no further answer. The Commons even brought the barons of the Exchequer to account; and those high functionaries declined justifying the legality of the measures which had been pursued.

On the 25th of February the sub-committee of religion presented a long and circumstantial report, under the title of "Heads of Articles agreed upon, and to be insisted on by the House." In this paper no quarter was shown to Laud and Arminianism. They complained especially of the publishing, by bishop's license, of books in favor of popery, and of the suppressing of books against popery. They asked, among many other things, for the removal of candlesticks from the communion-table, which they said was now wickedly called a high altar; for the removal of pictures, lights, and images, and of praying towards the east, and crossing ad omnem motum et gestum. They complained of the bishops bringing men to question and trouble for not obeying their commands in these respects; but they themselves called with stentorian voices for the persecuting of the papists and the exemplary punishment of all teachers, publishers, and maintainers of popish opinions, and all practicers of superstitious ceremonies. They required, moreover, that books like those of Montague and Mainwaring should be burned; that some good order should be taken for licensing books hereafter; that bishoprics and other ecclesiastical preferments should be conferred by his majesty, with advice of his privy council, upon learned, pious, and orthodox men; that the bishops and clergymen thus chosen should reside upon their charge, and that some course might be taken in the present parliament for providing competent means for the maintenance of a godly, able minister in every parish of the kingdom.

In the face of this determined opposition, Charles rashly determined, at all hazards, to maintain Laud and the hierarchy. Immediately after the reading of the above articles, he sent to command both Houses to adjourn to Monday, the 2d of March, notwithstanding the right which the Commons claimed to fix their own adjournment. Thereupon the house adjourned; but, on the 2d of March, Sir John Eliot stood up, and, after expressing his duty to the king, once more denounced Arminianism, and then fell with his whole weight upon the great Bishop of Winchester and his greater abettor —"that is," continued Eliot, "the Lord Treasurer Weston, in whose person all evil is concentrated, both for the innovation of religion and invasion of our liberties; he being now the great enemy of the commonwealth. I have traced him in all his actions, and I find him building on those grounds laid by his master, the great duke; he, secretly, is moving for this interruption; and, from this fear, they go about to break parliaments, lest parliaments should break them." Then the speaker, Sir John Finch, delivered a message from the king, commanding him "to adjourn the house until Tuesday come seven-night following." Several members objected that this message was vexatious and irregular, and that it was not the office of their speaker to deliver any such commands—for the adjournment of the House properly belonged to themselves. And then they said that, after they had settled a few things, they would satisfy his majesty. Sir John Eliot forthwith produced a remonstrance to the king against the illegal levying of tunnage and poundage, and against the lord treasurer, who "dismayed the merchants, drove out trade," &c. Eliot desired the speaker to read this paper, but the speaker said he could not, as the king had adjourned the House. It was then proposed that the remonstrance should be read by the clerk of the House, at the table, but the clerk also refused. And thereupon Eliot read it himself with much more effect than either of the officials could have produced. When Sir John had finished the reading, the speaker refused to put it to the vote, saying, "he was commanded otherwise by the king." Mr. Selden then got up and said, "Mr. Speaker, if you will not put the question, which we command you, we must sit still; and so we shall never be able to do any thing. We sit here by command from the king, under the great seal; and, as for you, you are, by his majesty, appointed our speaker; and do you now refuse to be a speaker?" The speaker replied, that he had an express command from the king, so soon as he had delivered his message of adjournment, to rise. And thereupon he rose; but Hollis, son to the Earl of Clare, Mr. Valentine, and other members of that stamp, forced him to sit down again, and held him fast to his chair. At the same time some of the patriots locked the doors of the house, and brought up the keys to the table. Sir Thomas Edmonds and other members of the house, who were privy councilors or courtiers, rushed to the release of the pinioned speaker, "God's wounds," cried Hollis, "he shall sit still till it pleases us to rise." A rude scuffle ensued, during which the speaker shed an abundance of tears. As the courtiers were too weak to release him, he at last sat still, and said, crying more than ever, "I will not say I will not, but I dare not. I have his majesty's commands. I dare not sin against the express commands of the sovereign." Selden then delivered a constitutional speech on the duties of a speaker of the House of Commons, and told him that he ought to proceed and put the remonstrance to the vote; but the speaker "still refused, with extremity of weeping and supplicatory orations. Sir Peter Hayman, a gentleman of his own county and of his own blood, told him that he blushed at being his kinsman; that he was a disgrace to his country—a blot to a noble family; that all the inconveniences that might follow—yea, even to the destruction of parliament—would be considered as the issue of his baseness by posterity, by whom he would be remembered with scorn and disdain." Sir Peter ended by recommending, that if he would not do his duty, he should be brought to the bar of the House, and a new speaker chosen at once. As neither advice nor threats could prevail on the speaker, and as they well knew they would not again be allowed the opportunity of expressing their sentiments in parliament, the Commons hastily drew up a protest under the following heads: 1. "Whosoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or by favor seek to extend or introduce popery or Arminianism, or other opinions disagreeing from the true or orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. 2. Whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking and levying of the subsidies of tunnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to this kingdom and commonwealth. 3. If any merchant or other person whatsoever shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidies of tunnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberty of England, and an enemy to the same." As Mr. Hollis read these articles, he was loudly cheered by the House, who expressed their full assent to them, one by one. While they were reading, the king, who had hurried down to the House of Lords, and who was perplexed at not seeing the speaker, sent a messenger to bring away the sergeant with his mace—a symbol almost as important as the speaker, and without which there could be no House. But the members stopped the sergeant, and, taking the key of the door from him, gave it to a member of the house to keep safe and sure. Not seeing sergeant or mace, the king dispatched the usher of the black rod to call up the commons, that he might dissolve the parliament; but the Commons refused to receive either the black rod or his black message. When Charles heard this he grew furious, and, sending for the captain of the pensioners and his guards, he ordered them to force the door; but the Commons, in the meanwhile, having voted their protest, and adjourned themselves to the 10th of March, had risen and were gone.

Upon the 10th of March the king went down to the Lords with the proclamation for the dissolution of parliament, which had been signed on the 3d. Several members of the Lower House were in the Lords when the king arrived, but the Commons had not been summoned as was usual, and their speaker was not present as he ought to have been. "My lords," said Charles, "I never came here upon so unpleasing an occasion: therefore many may wonder why I did not rather choose to do this by commission; it being a general maxim of kings to lay harsh commands by their ministers—themselves only executing pleasing things. But, considering that justice is as well answered in commending and rewarding of virtue as punishing of vice, I thought it necessary to come here this day, to declare to you, my lords, and all the world, that it was only the disobedient carriage of the Lower House that hath caused this dissolution at this time; and that you, my lords, are so far from being causers of it, that I have as much comfort in your lordships' carriage towards me, as I have cause to distaste their proceedings. Yet, that I may be clearly understood, I must needs say, that they do mistake me wonderfully that think I lay the fault equally upon all the Lower House; for, as I know there are many as dutiful and loyal subjects as any are in the world, so I know that it was only some vipers among them that had cast this mist of difference before their eyes; although there were some among them that would not be infected with this contagion—insomuch that some by their speaking (which indeed was the general fault of the House on the last day) did show their obedience. To conclude, my lords, as those evil-affected persons must look for their rewards, so you that are here of the Higher House may justly claim from me that protection and favor that a good king oweth to his loyal and faithful nobility. And now, my lord keeper, do what I have commanded you." Then the lord keeper said, "My lords, and gentlemen of the House of Commons, the king's majesty doth dissolve this parliament." And thus, flattering the Lords, and threatening the Commons, Charles ended his third parliament, on the 10th of March, 1629.[1]

But before the closing scene the king had laid his hands upon some of those whom he called the "vipers." Eliot, Hollis, Selden, Valentine, Coriton, Hobart, Hayman, Long, and Stroud, the members who had been the most active in getting up the protest, and keeping the speaker in his chair, were summoned by warrant (dated the 5th of March) before the privy council. With the exception of Long and Stroud they all presented themselves, but refused to answer out of the House for the things they had said in it; and they were thereupon committed to the Tower. Long and Stroud surrendered upon the issuing of a proclamation for their arrest, and they were sent to join their friends. The houses of Eliot, Hollis, Selden, Long, and Valentine were forcibly entered, their studies broken open, and their papers seized by the king's warrant.

Charles issued a long declaration to all his loving subjects, explaining the causes which moved him to dissolve the last parliament; but every step he now took only added to the exasperation of the people. Being fully resolved to proceed in the Star Chamber against the members of parliament whom he had committed to the Tower, he propounded a series of questions to the judges, who again were found somewhat less complying than was expected. Judge Whitelock afterward (and we believe timidly and privately) complained against this way of sending to the judges for their opinions beforehand, and said, that if Bishop Laud went on in this way, he would kindle a flame in the nation. At the same moment of excitement the High Commission Court and the Star Chamber passed several harsh sentences; and on the 22d of March the infatuated king issued a proclamation, which was interpreted by many as meaning a determination on his part to discontinue parliaments altogether, unless he could reduce the House of Commons to be the instrument of his will. "We have showed," said Charles, "by our frequent meeting our people, our love to the use of parliaments; yet, the late abuse having for the present driven us unwillingly out of that course, we shall account it presumption for any to prescribe any time unto us for parliaments, the calling, continuing, and dissolving of which is always in our power; and shall be more inclinable to meet in parliament again, when our people shall see more clearly into our interests and actions, and when such as have bred this interruption shall have received their condign punishment." He afterward graciously told the nation that he would not overload his subjects with any more burdens, but satisfy himself with those duties that were received by his father, which he neither could nor would dispense with, but should esteem them unworthy of his protection who should deny them.[1]

The apprehensive, or that numerous class which, for the sake of excitement, exaggerate calamities, spoke in corners of Tower Hill and the block, or Tyburn and the gallows; but the arbitrary faction could not venture upon such extreme measures, and the imprisoned members, in the end, met with nothing but illegal fines in addition to their harsh imprisonment. When they sued for their habeas corpus, and were brought up before the Court of King's Bench, the court lawyers made a return that they were detained for notable contempts, and for stirring up sedition, as alledged in a warrant under the king's sign manual. Their counsel argued against the legality of the proceeding, and made a stand on the king's explicit confirmation of principles and precedents in the Petition of Right. The king's counsel slurred over that great constitutional enactment, and the attorney-general, Heath—"a fit instrument for those times"—quibbled and evaded, and set up the old tyrannical doctrine of imprisonment at the king's will. "A petition in parliament," said he, "is no law, yet it is for the honor and dignity of the king to observe it faithfully; but it is the duty of the people not to stretch it beyond the words and intention of the king. And no other construction can be made of the Petition of Right, than that it is a confirmation of the ancient liberties and rights of the subjects. So that now the case remains in the same quality and degree as it was before the petition." In this manner—this wretched, irritating manner—did Charles and his tools endeavor to explain away every confirmation of constitutional rights,—every concession made to the people, till the people would no longer give the slightest credit to his most solemn promises. The Attorney-General Heath recited old authorities to prove that prisoners committed by the sovereign or the privy council were not bailable. The judges, however, wrote "a humble and stout letter" to the king; "that by their oaths they were to bail the prisoners; but thought fit, before they did it, or published their opinions therein, to inform his majesty thereof, and humbly to advise him (as had been done by his noble progenitors, in like case) to send a direction to his justices of his bench to bail the prisoners."[1] The Lord Keeper Coventry would not tell the judges whether he had shown this, their letter, to the king or not; but dissembled the matter, and told them that they must attend his majesty at Greenwich. There the king received them in a manner which showed he was displeased with them, and he commanded them not to deliver any opinion in this case without consulting with the rest of the judges. These judges, obviously by royal command, delayed the business, and so it was put off till the end of the term. When the Court of King's Bench was ready to deliver its opinion, the prisoners, by the king's command, were removed from other places of confinement to the Tower; so that, the writs of habeas corpus having been addressed to their former keepers, who of course could not produce them, the prisoners were not forthcoming to claim the right of bail. They were thus detained in close custody during the whole of the long vacation which ensued.[2] Charles justified his manœuver to the judges of the King's Bench, by telling them that he had removed the prisoner, "not as some people might say, to decline the course of justice, but because they had carried themselves insolently and unmannerly to himself and their lordships."

Toward the end of the vacation the judges were commanded to attend at Sergeants' Inn, as his majesty had urgent need of their services. Upon Michaelmas-day — the day appointed — the judges attended; and then the Chief Justice Hyde and Judge Whitelock were sent by the lord keeper to advise with the king at Hampton Court. There the privy council was sitting; but Charles took the two judges aside, and told them he was willing the imprisoned members should be admitted to bail, notwithstanding their contumacy in refusing to declare that they were sorry for having offended him: and he also told them that he should abandon the Star Chamber proceedings, and prosecute them in the King's Bench. The answers of the judges, who felt what was right, but who were not bold enough to oppose the king, did not give entire satisfaction—for Charles spoke disrespectfully of their "oracles and riddles."[3]

Upon the first day of Michaelmas Term, the prisoners, who had been already thirty weeks in close confinement, without resort of friends or family, debarred from the use of books, and pen and ink, were brought into court, and ordered not only to find bail for their present charge, but sureties for their good behavior in future. They refused to give these sureties, but were ready with bail for their appearance to answer the present charge. The judges intimated that they would accept the same persons both for sureties and bail; but the captives were determined not to tie their own tongues and fetter their own hands by making their friends answerable upon so ticklish a point as good behavior, which was to be judged of by the king and his ministers. They all firmly refused to give the sureties in any shape, and thereupon they were all sent back to the Tower.

The attorney-general then exhibited an information in the King's Bench against Sir John Eliot, Mr. Denzil Hollis, and Mr. Valentine. Sir John was charged with words uttered in the Commons' House, and particularly with saying that the privy council and judges had conspired to trample under foot the liberties of the subject,—that no man was ever blasted in the House of Commons but a curse fell upon him, &c. Hollis and Valentine were charged with the tumult on the last day of the session, when the speaker was forcibly held down in the chair. The defendants put in a plea excepting to the jurisdiction of the court:—"Forasmuch," it was alledged, "as these offenses are supposed to have been done in parliament, they ought not to be punished in this court, or any other except in parliament." The judges, upon demurrer, overruled this plea, and the prisoners refused to put in any other. Upon the last day of the next term judgment was given against them upon a nihil dicit by Mr. Justice Jones, who said,—"We will not draw the true liberties of parliament-men into question, to wit, for such matters which they do or speak in a parliamentary manner; but, in this case, there was a conspiracy between the defendants to slander the state, and to excite sedition and discord between the king, his peers, and people: and this was not a parliamentary course. . . . . Members have no privilege to speak at their pleasure. The parliament is a high court, therefore it ought not to be disorderly, but ought to give good example to other courts. If a judge of our court shall rail at the state or clergy, he is punishable for it. A member of the parliament may charge any great officer of the state with any particular offense; but this was a malevolous accusation, in the generality, against all the officers of state; therefore the matter contained within the information is a great offense, and punishable in the court." But, heavy as was their offense, Jones assured the prisoners that their punishment should be laid "with a light hand;" and then he delivered sentence,—"1. That every of the defendants shall be imprisoned during the king's pleasure: Sir John Eliot to be imprisoned in the Tower of London, and the other defendants in other prisons. 2. That none of them shall be delivered out of prison until he give security in this court for his good behavior, and have made submission and acknowledgment of his offense. Sir John Eliot, inasmuch as we think him the greatest offender, and the ringleader, shall pay to the king a fine of £2000, and Mr. Hollis a fine of 1000 marks, and Mr. Valentine, because he is of less ability than the rest, shall pay a fine of £500." And to all this all the other justices, with one voice, assented.[1] Long, who had been pricked sheriff of Wiltshire, was not brought into the King's Bench for his conduct in the House, but into the Star Chamber, for attending in parliament when he was bound, as a sheriff, to be present in his own county. This was a revival of an old manœuver, and people understood perfectly well that Long's severe sentence, condemning him to a fine of 2000 marks, imprisonment during the king's pleasure, and a public submission, was solely on account of his behavior in the House of Commons.

Previously to the passing of these tyrannical sentences against members of parliament, a merchant had felt the ruthless severity of the court. Richard Chambers was summoned before the privy council for refusing to pay any further duty for a bale of silks than might be demanded by law. The bale of goods had been seized by the officers; but this was not deemed punishment enough, and Charles wanted an opportunity to restate his principle, in scorn of the Petition of Right, that he could lay on duties by prerogative. Smarting under his wrongs, and foreseeing the deplorable consequences that must ensue if this arbitrary principle were established, Chambers told the privy council "that merchants had more encouragement, and were less screwed and wrung, in Turkey than in England." For these words an information was preferred against him in the Star Chamber; and that detestable court, declaring itself of opinion that the words were intended to make the people believe that the happy government under which they lived was worse than a Turkish tyranny, forthwith sentenced Chambers to pay a fine of £2000, and to sign a written acknowledgment that he had spoken the words insolently, contemptuously, seditiously, falsely, and maliciously. The honest merchant signed the paper; but it was to this effect:—"All the above contents and submission, I, Richard Chambers, do utterly abhor and detest, as most unjust and false, and never till death will acknowledge any part thereof." And being a devout man, a Puritan or precisian, he subjoined several texts of Scripture, one of which was,—"Wo unto them that devise iniquity, because it is in the power of their hand." His fine was immediately estreated into the Exchequer, where he pleaded Magna Charta and other statutes against the fine by the king and his council, it not being by legal judgment of his peers; but the barons would not suffer his plea to be filed. Afterward Chambers brought his habeas corpus, but the judges remanded him; and after twelve years' imprisonment, and a long waiting for satisfaction for his losses from the Long Parliament, this champion and martyr of law and right died at last in want.[2]

Every thing now went to spread the conviction that Charles intended to throw off forever the restraint of parliament, and to rule undisguisedly as an absolute king. The orthodox pulpits were made to shake with loud expoundings of the divine right; and about this time a pamphlet was put forth advising the king to have no more parliaments, recommending to him the example of Louis XI. of France, who had put down parliaments in that kingdom, and submitting a regular scheme of despotism to be upheld by a military police.[1] But still there were circumstances which might seem to indicate that Charles thought of managing the House of Commons, by winning over some of its most influential members, than of taking the more desperate step alluded to. Perhaps, however, he considered the services of such eminent men as Sir Thomas Wentworth, Sir Dudley Digges, Noye, and Littleton, to be worth the purchasing, parliament or no parliament: for the country contained none more able, and their promptness in apostatizing gave him a reasonable ground for believing that they would not be deterred by a sense of shame, or by scruple of conscience, from going any lengths in the service of their new master. Wentworth, the most renowned of the set, had gone over to the court some time before this. After being one of the sturdiest of the reformers and boldest declaimers in the House of Commons—after suffering imprisonment for refusing to contribute to the forced loan—this eminent person, a gentleman of Yorkshire, who boasted his descent, by bastardy, from the royal line of the Plantagenets, out of a very ignoble rivalry and an ambition for rank and titles (even his friends could find out no purer motives), made his peace with Buckingham a short time before that favorite's death, and sold himself, body and soul, to the court. He had his reward; and the splendor of it, no doubt, served as a decoy to other patriots of his stamp. He was elevated to the peerage by the title of Baron Wentworth; he was caressed by the king; he was taken to the bosom of Laud; and by the end of the year 1628, he was made a viscount and lord president of what was called the Court of York, or the Council of the North. From the first moment he obtained power he used it against his former political associates without mercy or remorse; and it may be that, from that very moment, the party set down the regenade for a sacrifice whenever the wheel of fortune should turn in their favor. The indisputable and commanding abilities of the man also made them hate him the more because they feared him. Sir Dudley Digges, though a spirited debater and a man of talent, had been known for some time to be without principle; and, upon being offered the post of Master of the Rolls, he closed at once with the bargain, and turned round upon "the vipers," as the king called his former friends, the leaders of the opposition. Noye and Littleton, both distinguished lawyers, followed the same course: Noye was made attorney-general, Littleton solicitor-general. Being thus placed in a position to explain and stretch the prerogative, they did that work apparently without a blush at the recollections which were but as yesterday, when they combated for the rights of parliament and the liberties of the people. There was no new king's favorite in lieu of Buckingham, for the Earl of Holland was rather the favorite of the queen (scandal said her paramour) than of Charles. Holland, however, like the extravagant Hay, earl of Carlisle, had a seat at the council-table, where also sat the pompous and empty-headed Arundel, earl-marshal; the contemptible, horse-whipped Earl of Montgomery; his brother, the Earl of Pembroke; and the Earl of Dorset; who, one and all, thought more of pleasure than of business, and were content that the king should ruin himself or the nation, provided they could have their enjoyments. Charles's two secretaries of state at this time were Sir John Coke and Sir Dudley Carleton; his chancellor, or rather lord-keeper, was Lord Coventry; his lord privy seal the Earl of Manchester; and his lord-treasurer the Lord Weston, whom Eliot had denounced in the last session as the great enemy of the commonwealth. But all these councilors together had not the power over the king of Wentworth and Laud. The rise of the churchman had been forwarded rather than checked by the assassination of his great patron Buckingham. Charles knew that he had long been in the habit of writing for the duke, and guiding him in matters of business: he called Laud into the privy council, and promised to raise him to the primacy as soon as it should please Heaven to remove old Archbishop Abbot. It should seem that, on a closer acquaintance, the sympathies of the king and bishop chimed together wonderously well; and that, while Laud adored the divine right of kings, Charles embraced with the zeal of a crusader the right of the bishops to coerce the faith of his people. Between them they would have allowed no liberty to men either in their bodies and goods, or in their souls and consciences. It was this union of the two tyrannies that hurried on the crisis. To the civil despotism singly, and as exercised by Charles, the English people might possibly have submitted some while longer; but the scourge of Laud lashed them into a fury.

[1] It was proved, however, that this precious production was not written for Charles, but for his father James, many years before; and that it was now made public and "bruited" by the patriotic party, in order to put their fellow-subjects on their guard against the encroachments of despotism. But the pamphlet scarcely contained a principle that was not cherished, and even acted upon more or less openly, either now or soon afterward, by Charles, and Laud, and Wentworth. At court the queen was constantly talking of the difference between a quasi king, like the kings of England, and a real, mighty king, like the absolute sovereigns of her own country and family.

All this time England was at war with France, Spain, and, in effect, with the Emperor of Germany; but so insignificant were the events that rose out of this state of hostility, compared with the events at home which signalized the struggle between the sovereign and people, that the minutest historians scarcely devote a page to them. Indeed, without any comparison with the important transactions at home, the warlike operations in which the English were actively concerned were paltry and honorless in themselves, being, in fact, little more than an exhibition of Charles's weakness. With France he had gone to war without reason, and he was glad to make a peace without honor, abandoning the French Protestants to their fate, and scarcely mentioning the cause of his sister and brother-in-law the Palatine. This peace with France was made public in the spring of 1629, and in the following year, Charles, notwithstanding the prayers and tears of his wife,[1] would have prolonged the war, because France was still at war with Spain and the whole House of Austria, he concluded a peace with Philip, the pacification of King James being assumed as the groundwork of the treaty.

But the other belligerents on the continent were carrying on the Thirty Years' War, which arose out of the Bohemian insurrection, with a very different spirit. The Lion of the North had started from his lair—Augustus Adolphus, the most warlike sovereign, and perhaps the very best general of his time, had crossed the Baltic on the 24th of June, 1630, and rushed into Germany for the support of Protestantism, and the humbling of the Emperor Ferdinand. A series of most brilliant victories was obtained by the daring Swede, who was in close league not only with the Protestants of the empire, but with the French, who, guided by the bold policy of Cardinal Richelieu, now omnipotent in France, stretched their arms in all directions, across the Alps, the Pyrenees, to the frontiers of the Spanish Netherlands, to the Rhine and the Elbe. Savoy was not only overrun, but almost entirely conquered; and in Italy the cardinal dictated terms to the pope, who, as much out of necessity as out of inclination, had adhered to the House of Austria and to the emperor, who was considered as waging a religious war against heretics. When Gustavus Adolphus entered Germany as the champion of Protestantism, the power of the emperor was almost everywhere predominant. His generals, the ferocious Tilly, the bloody Pappenheim, the ambitious Maximilian of Bavaria, and Wallenstein, in whom all these qualities were united in their extreme proportions, had crushed the power of the Protestant states, and laid waste, with every circumstance of cruelty, the territories of friends and foes. Wallenstein had been removed from command by the jealous fears of Ferdinand, who at one time fancied that the fortunate and aspiring general aimed, if not at the imperial crown, at the old crown of Bohemia; Maximilian of Bavaria was rejoicing in the possession of the Palatinate, which he had helped to win from his cousin Frederick; but Tilly and Pappenhim were still in the field with a vast army of veteran troops, so flushed with their many recent victories, that they called themselves invincible. But they were soon found

[1] "Sir Francis Cottington went toward Portsmouth, on his ambassage (to Madrid), on Monday that week, and was now at length really gone, mauger the French ambassador, who, with all the strength he had, opposed his journey, and used the queen's assistance therein: so that, when Sir Francis Cottington came to take his leave of her, and to know what service her majesty would be pleased to command him to her sister, [she] answered him as I told you in my last. And, then, when she could not prevail with his majesty to cross the ambassage, she shed tears in anger."—Meade to be no match for the highly disciplined, hardy troops from old Scandinavia, led on by a hero and a great tactician. From Pomerania and Mecklenburg, where the fortresses and towns submitted to him as soon as he approached, Gustavus Adolphus entered the electorate of Brandenburg, and forced Tilly to retire on the Elbe. The courtiers at Vienna told the emperor that the Swede was but a king of snow, who would melt away as he approached the south; but the Swede continued his onward course, and there was no melting away, or, if there was, it was of that nature which releases the avalanche from the mountain, to thunder through and overwhelm the valley beneath. The only event that clouded the joy and success of the Protestants was the capture of the rich and Protestant city of Magdeburg, which was effected by Tilly and Pappenheim while the Swedes were occupied in another direction. The ferocious Tilly let loose his wild Croats, Walloons, and Pandours upon the devoted citizens, who were massacred without distinction of age or sex. When they had sacked the richest houses they set fire to the rest, and, a violent wind rising, the whole town was soon wrapped in flames, which consumed both quick and dead. In less than twelve hours one of the finest cities of Germany was reduced to an unsightly heap of ruins and ashes, and thirty thousand of its industrious inhabitants had perished by different kinds of deaths, but all horrible. Such a tragedy had not often been perpetrated in modern wars: the sack of Magdeburg excited horror throughout the civilized world; but the Protestants consoled themselves with the belief that it must be followed by the curse of the Almighty—and, in fact, it was the last of the emperor's successes in this war. We are called upon to mention the moral and devout bearing of the victorious Swedes, both because it was rare and beautiful in itself, and because, in the course of a few years, it became the model of that English army which terminated the civil war. In the imperial army, which also professed to fight for the blessed cause of religion, there reigned only immorality, lust, cruelty, and disregard of all the virtues and decencies of life: in the army of Gustavus, on the contrary, every fault was punished with severity; but, above all, blasphemy, violence to women, stealing, gaming, and fighting duels. Simplicity also of manners and habits was commanded by the military laws of Sweden; and in the whole camp, and even in the king's tent, there was neither silver nor gold plate. The eye of the sovereign observed as carefully the morals of his troops as their bravery. Every regiment was obliged to form itself in a circle round its chaplain for morning and evening prayers; and this pious act was then performed in the open air.[1]

It was in the month of November, 1630, that Charles signed his solemn treaty of peace with Spain. Philip, not in the treaty, but in a private letter, promised Charles to restore to his brother-in-law, the Palatine, such parts of his territories (they must have been very inconsiderable) as were then occupied by Spanish troops, and to use his best endeavors with his near relative, the emperor, to reinstate the expelled prince as he was before his acceptance of the Bohemian crown. And Charles, as a fitting return, entered upon a secret contract, whereby he agreed to unite his arms with those of Spain for the subjugation of the Seven United Provinces, which his great predecessor Elizabeth had so largely contributed to free from the oppressive Spanish yoke. Charles, as a share of the spoil, was to have and hold Zealand and other territories. There had been a talk of this precious scheme before, when Charles and Buckingham were at Madrid wooing the infanta. But now the matter went so far that the agreement was signed by Charles's ambassador, Cottington, and by Olivares, who was still the favorite and prime minister in Spain. All this had been done in the closest secrecy—not a breath of the mystery had got abroad; but Charles, seeing the violence of his Protestant subjects, even when they knew nothing of this projected league with papists against a Protestant people, might easily divine what would be their fury when the scheme should be broached and carried into operation. It appears to have been this consideration which induced him to hesitate in ratifying the agreement which he had allowed his minister to sign. Thereupon Philip, of course, considered himself freed from the promises he had made concerning the Palatine. A few months after, Charles went into a project the very reverse of that he had recently entertained. Flanders and Brabant, which remained to Spain and the pope after so many years of sanguinary warfare, had become the scenes of discontent; or, at least, a certain party had conceived the notion of erecting them into independent states. The King of England forthwith dispatched to them Sir Balthazar Gerbier, a native of Antwerp, a good painter, a distinguished critic in the fine arts, an excellent penman, and a very accomplished man of business or intrigue, who had passed from the service of Buckingham into that of Charles. On the 14th of August,[1] 1632, Gerbier, writing from Brussels, informed his employer that those states, perceiving that the Spaniards were no longer able to defend them and their religion, were determined to make themselves free states, drive out the Spaniards, contract alliances with their neighbors, and conclude a peace with the Hollanders. He assured Charles that he had not failed to have a careful eye thereunto, that nothing might be neglected which concerned his majesty's glory and the interest of his kingdoms, and that he had acted his part without putting himself too forward, merely, as it were, hearkening to what passed. The infanta and the Spanish council, he said, were already greatly alarmed and on the alert, for they had received advertisements from England, from one Nicolaldy and another, that those states were resolved to shake off the Spaniards and make themselves free. "The infanta," continues Gerbier, "showed the said letters to Sir Peter Rubens, who told me that they bore such information as would hazard the lives of many in those countries." The French had been already in this field of intrigue, offering assistance; for it was an idea among them at least as as old as the time of Henry IV., if not of Louis XI., that the Rhine was the proper and natural frontier to their fine kingdom, and nobody better understood how to work by indirect means than Cardinal Richelieu. The party with whom Gerbier was intriguing in Flanders and Brabant, indeed, suspected that the French aimed at a conquest, nor were they less suspicious of the intentions of their neighbors the Hollanders, who also had offered them assistance. These particulars, Gerbier says, were communicated to him by a person in disguise, who had chosen an hour in the night for the dangerous conference, and who had the appearance of being a man of high rank. "He spoke to me," continues the secret agent, "as in the name of a whole body which aimed to be supported by an alliance with England, to counterbalance France, who, instead of a confederacy, prepared means to bring these provinces into subjection; which to prevent, the support of England was conceived to be the strongest remedy, and therefore it was desired I should procure, under your majesty's hand and seal, power to hear (under profound secret) what was so considerable, that, showing my authorization, and engaging my word for secrecy. I might know not only the party, but be sure it was no French." The party, however, were no patriots, for one of the first of these proposals was to obtain for themselves English court distinctions—ribbons and garters.[1] "I was very attentive," says Gerbier, "unto this discourse, my mind still fixed on the proverb Diffidentia est mater prudentiæ, not being certain but that this person might be set on purposely to sound me, if England was desirous of the subversion of the Spanish government. Wherefore my first answer was with admiration, feigning not well at first to comprehend their design, and with much difficulty these high resolutions, less their success, considered the troubles past and present among them, intimating thereby that I lived not here to forge factions; but that, withal, England ought to be accounted as their best and most considerable neighborhood, both for its situation, strength by sea, commerce, and affection of the people, who have always lived in good intelligence with these countries, being from France whence all the stirs proceed, as the histories do bear record. The said person promised that, upon the procuring of my authorization, he would make known himself, desiring that no time might be lost. Considering, therefore, the advantages your majesty might reap hereby, and, on the other part, how prejudicial it would be to your majesty that France should procure a primitive alliance with these states. if not the conquest, which would render France too potent a neighbor, I thought fitting to advertise your majesty thereof in these terms, and believe your majesty will approve that, upon this consideration, I set down those of Queen Elizabeth in the years 1576, 1577, and 1578, who, by a singular prudence, labored to hinder this people from casting themselves under the protection of France. . . . And seeing the lives of great persons might run hazard by the discovery of these designs, I find myself bound in charity and loyalty to communicate them any further than to your majesty, who may impart them unto your prudent council, as in your royal wisdom shall be thought fitting, it being the request made by the secret party. Your majesty may be pleased to weigh the glory which will redound unto your majesty from this alliance, which, excluding the Spaniards forever from this part of the world, will serve as an assured rampart to other countries, neighbors, and allies of your majesty, and free them from any change or invasion." Gerbier went on to give the king more particulars touching "the great business," telling him how cautious he had been to prevent all subject of suspicion in the King of Spain's ministers, and how he had been continually pressed by the person in disguise to know whether they could count upon Charles's assistance. He said that there were only some six thousand men, Spaniards and Italians, in the country; and that, as for the Walloons, who made ten thousand men, they would not fight for Spain when it should come to the push; but Charles must make haste, for the Hollanders were very anxious to intermeddle. Charles immediately replied by letter, written secretly, and all in his own hand. The business, he said, was so great that, merely to manage it, he was forced to trust somebody, but, as secrecy was especially necessary, he had only trusted Secretary Coke. He told Gerbier that, as he was in peace and friendship with the King of Spain, it would be against both honor and conscience, if without any just cause or quarrel, he debauched his subjects from their allegiance. "But," continued the king, "since I see a likelihood (almost a necessity) that his Flanders subjects must fall into some other king's or state's protection, and that I am offered, without the least intimation of mine, to have a share therein, the second consideration is, that it were a great imprudence in me to let slip this occasion, whereby I may both advantage myself and hinder the overflowing greatness of my neighbors." He was willing, he said, to take the protection of these people into his hands, as they flew to him without his seeking: if he did not protect them others would; and the King of Spain, instead of being offended, ought to be pleased; for if he, Charles did not interfere, then the states would fall into the hands of Philip's enemies or rebels. "And therefore," continued the royal casuist, "upon great consideration I have sent you power to treat with these disguised persons, and do hereby authorize you to promise them, in my name, protection against anybody but the King of Spain, and to defend them from him and all the world else from injuries." This letter, with a commission to Gerbier, was inclosed in a dispatch written by Secretary Coke, who told the agent that the commission was as full as could be expected, secrecy not now permitting more formalities. "Your instructions," said the secretary, "will be made more particular and full when the parties discover themselves, and when you send word what they offer and what they require."

[1] "This party (as the said person told me) being in no small emulation with the other for points of honors, expecting no less from your majesty than, as the King of Spain had honored them with the Fleece, they might have to wear the Garter, as a mark of dependency of honors, and to be even with those who should be honored with the order of the Holy Ghost."—Gerbier's Letter to Charles in Hardwicke State Papers.

On the 24th of September, Secretary Coke wrote again to instruct him how to convince the Catholic states of Flanders and Brabant that France was not to be thought of, and that England was their surest refuge, which would best agree both with their ecclesiastical and temporal estates, "both which," continues the secretary, running in search of arguments to prove how nicely and nearly the Anglican church could agree with the Roman, "you must endeavor to persuade to be of the same; for their churchmen, you say, are the most active for this change, and, if it had not been for the scandal of religion, they would have expressed themselves for a treaty with England before others. . . . Yet England, in respect of religion, is far more proper for them to join withal than the Seven United Provinces can be; for, howsoever of late they have given their neighbors a specious freedom of the Catholic religion, yet they have reserved in every town a free church for their own profession; and what distraction their continued intercourse with such a mixture would breed may easily be conceived. Whereas, no such effect can be feared from the English, who, as they enjoy at home their honors, freedom, and estates, without difference, so much less will trouble or restrain men's consciences abroad; nor are so incorporate by language, or by general resort to that nation, that they can be capable to make any change." These were most lame and absolutely decrepit arguments, but those which followed were perhaps somewhat more convincing to the dignitaries of the church in Flanders and Brabant, who had a profound abhorrence of the poverty and political insignificance of churchmen in Holland. "But," continues the secretary, "what is more considerable, churchmen among the states have no part in the government or in the laws; neither do their elders comport with our hierarchy of archbishops, bishops, deans, canons, and parish curates; and, which doth yet debase them more, they there possess neither glebe-lands nor tithes, nor other stable revenues, but depend altogether upon voluntary contributions, which will bring their rich clergy in short time to a very mean and poor estate. These differences you must infuse into the minds of their ecclesiastics, who were not so mortified that they will not take their own interests to heart, and prefer our alliance in respect thereof." Having thus arranged for the clergy, Secretary Coke, who, no doubt, wrote under the dictation of Charles, proceeded to deal with the nobility, bidding Gerbier to declare to them at large, and on all occasions, how much better it would be for them to adhere to a potent king like the King of England than to a popular and factious government like that of the Hollanders. "Among those boors," continues the secretary, "where all are equal and capable of the highest places, their honors and degrees can have no preeminence, but be subject to the affronts of the baser sort, without civility or respect, which noble minds can not endure." From the nobility he passed to the merchants and base traders, and from these to the native soldiery, telling Gerbier how to deal with these classes in order to draw them to the king's interest. "But," said Coke, "in conclusion, because the Spaniards are not yet excluded, you must not, by a total adhering to the faction, either cry down their authority or neglect their interests, who may well be able to do that there for us which they can not for themselves; and, when they perceive they can not help themselves, and that they must quit their hold, will probably incline rather to deposit their right in our hands (chiefly the sea-towns) than to suffer their rebels or their opposites to carry them by force. In this your dexterity must be employed rather in drawing on overtures from themselves than in offering propositions." This underhand negotiation was prolonged through many months, the King of England wishing the conspirators to declare their country independent, and the conspirators wishing him to give them something more than general and vague promises. At last the Spanish court, which had some clue to the secret correspondence from the beginning, discovered the whole,[1] and reinforced its army in Flanders and Brabant; and thereupon the plot fell to the ground. If such proceedings had taken place between private individuals, no one would hesitate as to the proper epithet to be applied to them; but they had been so common between kings and governments, that we think Charles's conduct on this occasion has been censured with undue severity. He acted precisely as the great Elizabeth would have done; and even at a much later and morally better age, English statesmen would not have hesitated to do as much in the same dark manner to counteract the intrigues of other states, and more especially to prevent the French from making themselves masters of the Low Countries. But, on the other hand, if Charles had been that high model of religion and sanctity, probity, and honor, which some have tried to represent him, we should hardly have found him engaged in such a scheme.

Charles now concluded, or rather renewed, a treaty with Gustavus Adolphus, and undertook to send six thousand men to join that victorious sovereign in the heart of Germany. But, as there was no declaration of war with the emperor, he thought it proper and delicate to make it appear as if this force was raised in Scotland by the Marquis of Hamilton on his own account, and without the king's knowledge. When Hamilton was getting ready, Donald, Lord Reay, and Major Borthwick accused the marquis of raising troops to usurp the crown of Scotland. Reay said that this plot was discovered to him by one Ramsay, and Borthwick said that it had been revealed to him by one Meldrum. Neither of the accusers had any witnesses to produce, but Lord Reay proposed having recourse to the now antiquated barbarism of a trial by single combat, and challenged Ramsay, who denied having made any such communication to his lordship as was alledged. Ramsay was as ready to fight as Reay; and a court of chivalry was regularly constituted to arrange and witness the combat, over which the Earl of Arundel, as earl-marshal, was to preside. But, when every thing was ready, the king revoked his commission, and the absurd proceeding was abandoned.[1] The original charge, which was in itself scarcely less ridiculous, originated in the malice of Lord Ochiltrie and the Lord Treasurer Weston, who was very jealous of Hamilton's influence at court, for, next to Wentworth and Laud, the marquis was supposed to be "closest with the king." Hamilton had already embarked with his little army,—"but so little care was taken of provisions and accommodations for his men that they were brought into a sick and shattered condition, so that they moldered away in a short time; and the marquis was forced to return to England without gaining any great renown by this action, wherein he neither did service to the King of Sweden nor to himself, or to the Protestant cause in Germany."[2] When Hamilton returned, Charles received him into as great favor and trust as ever.

We cannot condense half of the circumstances which occurred at home between the dissolution of the parliament of 1629 and the calling that of 1640, —circumstances which discontented the mass of the English people, and which gave zeal to the timid or lukewarm, fury to the zealots. We shall, however, try to explain, in as few words as possible, the most important of these provocations. In contempt of the Petition of Right, the king persisted in levying tunnage and poundage, even augmenting the rates on sundry kinds of goods, and ordering that the goods of such as refused payment should be instantly seized and sold. The Commons, it will be remembered, had denounced the man as a traitor that should pay these illegal taxes. And, at the same time that Charles thus availed himself of the resources of modern commerce, he arbitrarily revived certain feudal uses or abuses. Henry III. and Edward I., when their poverty obscured their chivalry, had introduced the practice of summoning their military tenants, worth £20 per annum, to receive at their hands the costly honor of knighthood: many declined this honor, and were allowed to compound by paying a moderate fine. Elizabeth and James had both availed themselves of this ancient prerogative; and the change in the value of money rendered it more oppressive than formerly, though only persons esteemed worth £40 per annum were now subjected to it. In many instances, in James's time, the sheriffs purposely neglected to serve these writs, and many persons, when they were served, took no notice of them; but now Charles appointed a regular commission to attend solely to this vexatious method of raising money; and these commissioners called upon all landed proprietors, rated at £40., to pay their fines for not being knighted. When any resistance was offered, the parties were dragged into the expensive law-courts, and there invariably cast, and forced to pay, or thrown into prison. Nor was there any fixed rule or rate; for, when any man was a known Puritan or precisian, or otherwise obnoxious to the court, he was made to pay a great deal more than another. Nor was the practice limited to those who were liable as military or feudal tenants: lessees, who held no land by any such tenure; merchants, whose fortunes had risen from bales of goods, and not from the sword or lance, were called upon to pay, were prosecuted, and persecuted. It would not have been easy to find a more effective method of indisposing that numerous and influential class of the lesser landholders and country gentlemen. It is said that £100,000 were thus screwed and squeezed out of the subject; and the king preferred this method to meeting and agreeing with the House of Commons. The most intolerable sufferings of the people had arisen in the old time from the atrocious game or forest laws. This bloody and disgraceful code had been allowed in good part to drop into desuetude; but Charles resolved to revive at least all such parts of it as might tend to the increase of his revenue. The Earl of Holland was appointed to hold a court for the recovery of the king's forestal rights, or those lands which had once belonged to the royal chases. In this manner people were driven from many tracts which they and their fathers had long occupied as their own; gentlemen's estates were encroached upon, and, as the king was the litigant, the opposite party, even if he gained his cause, which in such circumstances he had but slight chance of doing, was distressed or ruined by the costs of the action, which he had to pay whether he was the loser or the winner. The Earl of Southampton was reduced almost to poverty by a decision which deprived him of his estate adjoining the New Forest in Hampshire. In Essex the royal forests grew so large, that people said they had swallowed up the whole county. Buckingham Forest was increased from a circuit of six miles to one of sixty miles, and all trespassers were punished by the imposition of enormous fines. "Which burden," says Clarendon, "lighted most upon persons of quality and honor, who thought themselves above ordinary oppressions, and were therefore like to remember it with more sharpness."[1] To enlarge Richmond Park, Charles deprived many proprietors, not merely of their rights of common, but also of their freehold lands. It should appear that he afterward gave some compensation; but the act at first had in it all the worst features of a cruel and plundering despotism. The House of Commons had scarcely rendered a service more important to the nation than by insisting on the suppression of monopolies: but now the king began to revive those abuses also; and, for the sum of £10,000, which they paid for their patent, and for a duty of £8

sterling upon every tun of soap they should make, which they promised to pay the king without vote of parliament, he chartered a company with exclusive privileges to make soap. The patent permitted every soap-boiler or manufacturer to become a member of the chartered company; and that precious turn-coat, Attorney General Noy, who devised the project, probably thought he had in this way evaded the letter of the law, the act of parliament being more particularly directed against individuals or two or three monopolists favored by the court. But the circumstance of the monopoly being in the hands of a numerous company made little or no difference to the consumers of the article, who were still obliged to pay for their soap whatever price the monopolists demanded. These incorporated soap-boilers, as a part of their bargain, received powers to appoint searchers, and they exercised a sort of inquisition over the trade. Such dealers as resisted their interference, or tried to make soap on their own account, were handed over to the tender mercies of the Star Chamber. This precedent was followed in the erection of a similar company of starch-makers, and in a great variety of other grants, till monopolies, in transgression or evasion of the late statute, became as common as they had been under James and Elizabeth.[1] And no less unjust proceedings of other kinds, some of them ridiculous, some scandalous, all very grievous, were set on foot; the envy and reproach of which (we should say justly) fell to the king, the profit to other men—for the expense of collection was enormous, and only a small portion of the money ever reached the royal coffers.[2] Proclamations, which James had carried to such excess, and which had been branded by parliament, were again brought into play, and arbitrary fines were exacted from such as disobeyed these proclamations, which were in themselves illegal. The late Solomon had decided in his wisdom that the plague and other great mischiefs were solely owing to the excessive and constantly increasing size of London, and he had proclaimed over and over again that people must not be so wicked and so foolhardy as to build any more houses in the metropolis. But his proclamations were disregarded—the judges had declared them not to be according to law; and the Londoners had gone on building faster than ever. Charles, who was more steady in wrong proceedings than his father, appointed a commission to examine into this growth and increase, and to make money of those who had built the new houses. In general the latter got off by paying a fine equivalent to three years' estimated rent of their houses, and an annual tax to the crown; but in some instances the houses were knocked down, and the owners made to pay a penalty beside suffering this destruction of their property. Thus, a Mr. Moore lost forty-two houses of the better kind, with coach-houses and stables, which he had erected near St. Martin's in the Fields; and, after these houses had been demolished by the sheriffs, heavy fines were levied on him by distress warrants.[1] And, as if all these were not sufficient causes of disgust and irritation, there were the galling and high-handed proceedings of the Earl-Marshal's Court, which will be described more particularly hereafter. But what more than any thing heaped coals on the doomed head of the king was the conduct of the high-church party, led on by Laud. This bishop is allowed, by one of his warmest admirers, to have been a zealot in his heart, "of too warm blood and too positive a nature;"[2] but he followed the course of Archbishop Bancroft, and was an emphatic flatterer of the king. When, in the month of May, 1630, Henrietta Maria gave birth to a prince, afterward that godly king Charles II., Laud baptized the infant, and composed a prayer upon the occasion, in which was the petition—"Double his father's graces, O Lord! upon him, if it be possible." Bishop Williams, the ex-lord keeper, now in disgrace, and almost a patriot, forgetting his own performances in former times, called this "three-piled flattery and loathsome divinity." A few months after composing this prayer, Laud called before him, in the Star Chamber, Alexander Leighton, a Scotchman and a Puritan preacher, for writing against the queen and the bishops in a book entitled "An Appeal to the Parliament, or Sion's Plea against Prelacy." The tone of the book was disrespectful, fanatic, and in some respects brutal; but we lose sight of its demerits in the atrocious punishment of the author, who vainly pleaded, in the Star Chamber, that he had offended through zeal, and not through any personal malice. He was degraded from the ministry, publicly whipped in Palace-yard, placed in the pillory for two hours, had an ear cut off, a nostril slit, and was branded on one of his cheeks with the letters S. S., for "Sower of Sedition." After these detestable operations he was sent back to his prison; but, at the end of one short week, before his wounds were healed, he was again dragged forth to public whipping, the pillory, the knife, and the brand; and, after he had been deprived of his other ear, split in the other nostril, and burned on the other cheek, he was thrust back into his dungeon, there to lie for life. After ten years, indeed, Leighton regained his liberty, but it was by the mercy neither of Laud nor Charles, but through that parliament which destroyed alike the bishop and the king.[3]

Blind to the almost inevitable consequences of persecution, Laud neglected no opportunity of enforcing conformity. By his advice Charles had issued a proclamation forbidding all preachers to condemn Arminianism or to enter upon that controversy. Though not yet the chief of the Anglican church, for old Abbot, the archbishop of Canterbury was still living, Laud wielded or directed all its thunders. "He prevented likewise a very private and clandestine design of introducing nonconformists into too many churches; for that society of men (that they might have teachers to please their itching ears) had a design to buy in all the lay impropriations which the parish churches in Henry VIII.'s time were robbed of, and, lodging the advowsons and presentations in their own feoffees, to have introduced men who would have introduced doctrines suitable to their dependencies, which the court already felt too much the smart of, by being forced to admit the presentations of the lay patrons, who too often dispose their benefices to men rather suitable to their own opinions than the articles and canons of the church."[1] But this is the showing of a royalist and high churchman, who conceived that every thing done by Laud was right; the other party might have reasonably pleaded their great and natural desire to procure preachers whose notions and practices agreed with their own. And, then, if they had done what was illegal in associating for the purchase of livings, and for the establishment of afternoon lectures in boroughs and cities, where, as they considered, the service of God was much neglected, we can scarcely see upon what principle of law the large sums of money which had been contributed should be seized by the king and Laud. Noy, the attorney-general, brought the trustees in whom the money was vested into the Court of Exchequer, and there, after production of their books and deeds, and counsel heard on both sides, their corporation was dissolved, and all the money adjudged to the king, who, at some future time, was to employ it in his own way for what he might consider the benefit of the church.[2]

The Puritans now began to emigrate in great numbers to North America, preferring a wilderness with religious liberty to their native country without it. The pilgrim fathers chiefly settled in New England. Those who remained at home were sharpened and imbittered by persecution, and by the whole tone and manner of Charles's court, which, be it said, though moral, or at least decent, compared with that of James, was far from being so pure and exemplary as it has been described by certain writers.[3] Being pretty well shut out from the pulpit, and hunted down in their conventicles—having no other valve through which to let off their rarefied feelings—they had recourse to the shackled press. In Hilary Term, 1634, by which time Laud was primate, Mr. William Prynne, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, was brought into the Star Chamber, together with Michael Sparkes, "a common publisher of unlawful and unlicensed books," William Buckmer, and four other defendants, upon informations filed by the attorney-general, Noy.[1] The offense charged was, that Mr. Prynne, about the eighth year of Charles's reign (being the current year), had compiled and put in print a libelous volume, entitled by the name of "Histrio-Mastix; the Player's Scourge, or Actor's Tragedie;" which was directed against all plays, masques, dances, masquerades, &c. "And although he knew well that his majesty's royal queen, the lords of the council, &c., were, in their public festivals, oftentimes present spectators of some masques and dances, and many recreations that were tolerable and in themselves sinless, and so declared to be by a book printed in the time of his majesty's royal father; yet Mr. Prynne, in his book, had railed not only against stage-plays, comedies, dancings, and all other exercises of the people, and against all such as frequent or behold them; but further, in particular, against hunting, public festivals, Christmas-keeping, bon-fires, and May-poles; nay, even against the dressing-up of houses with green-ivy." He was also accused of directly casting aspersions upon her majesty the queen, and of stirring up the people to discontent against his majesty the king, whom he had treated with "terms so unfit for so sacred a person." The fact was, Prynne was a learned fanatic, a spiritual ascetic, who conscientiously believed that plays, and masques, and other sports, in which the queen and court indulged to excess, were unlawful to Christians; and he particularly attempted to demonstrate, in his book of a thousand pages, that "by divers arguments, and by the authority of sundry texts of Scripture—of the whole primitive church—of fifty-five synods and councils—of seventy-one fathers and Christian writers before year of our Lord twelve hundred—of above one hundred and fifty foreign and domestic Protestant and popish authors since—of forty heathen philosophers, &c.—and of our own English statutes, magistrates, universities, writers, preachers—that popular stage-plays are sinful, lewd, ungodly spectacles, and most pernicious corruptions." Against masques and dancing (the last a dangerous thing to touch when there was a French queen on the throne), Prynne was equally severe. "If," said my Lord Cottington upon the trial, "Mr. Prynne should be demanded what he would have, he liketh nothing: no state or sex; music, dancing, &c., unlawful even in kings; no kind of recreation, no kind of entertainment, no not so much as hawking; all are damned." But the whole tenor of the book, according to Noy, was not less against the orthodox church of England, than against their sacred majesties. "The music in the church," said the attorney-general, "the charitable term he giveth it is, not to be a noise of men, but rather a bleating of

[3] The letters of Garrard and of Conway, in the Strafford Correspondence, several of the cotemporary Memoirs, and even occasional passages and hints in Clarendon's great but one-sided work, will fully bear out our statement as to the morals of Charles's court. The words of Lord Sunderland have often been quoted. That nobleman, writing from the army to his wife, says that the indecency of the language he heard in the camp was so great, that it made him fancy himself at court.—Sydney Papers.

[1] Prynne had already undergone some persecution. He was one of the first to attack the arbitrary doctrines of Montague. Laud and his party attempted to suppress these books and pamphlets, and called Prynne, Burton, and others into the High Commission Court, and "they were at the point to have been censured, when a prohibition comes from Westminster Hall to stay the proceedings in that court, contrary to his majesty's will and pleasure, expressed so clearly and distinctly in the said proclamation; which prohibition they tendered to the court in so rude a manner, that Laud was like to have laid them by the heels for their labor."—Heylin.

brute beasts: choristers bellow the tenor as it were oxen, bark a counter-point as a kennel of dogs, roar out a treble like a sort of bulls, grunt out a bass as it were a number of hogs: his complaint for suppressing repetitions, by way of conventicles; also his general censure of all the bishops and of all the clergy; they scorn to feed the poor; the silk and satin divines: very charitable terms upon them of the church! Christmas, as it is kept, is a devil's Christmas; nay, he doth bestow a great number of pages to make men affect the name of Puritan, as though Christ were a Puritan, and so he saith in his index." Laud was also incensed at Prynne's bestowing some praise upon the factious book of Dr. Leighton. Prynne's book had been written four years ago, and the greater part of it had been printed, if not published, two years ago; but it happened that, at the moment it was mentioned to the king by the bishop, Henrietta Maria was rehearsing a part which she shortly afterward acted in a play or pastoral with her maids of honor.[1] Hence every abusive term was held to be directed against her majesty; and, though the mass of those terms were strictly scriptural, there are some of them that could scarcely bear repeating. Charles was greatly exasperated; but it is said that he would have let the matter drop, and the author go unpunished, if it had not been for the activity of Laud and his chaplains. In mentioning that the tribunal was the Star Chamber, we have sufficiently indicated that Prynne's sentence must be atrocious. "For the book," said the Lord Chief Justice Richardson (encouraged into eloquence by the approving nods of Laud, who was present during the whole trial, as he generally was at all the most important or most arbitrary Star Chamber prosecutions), "for the book, I do hold it a most scandalous, infamous libel to the king's majesty, a most pious and religious king; and to the queen's majesty, a most excellent and gracious queen (he could not praise her religion, because she was a Roman Catholic), such a one as this kingdom never enjoyed the like, and I think the earth never had a better. It is scandalous to all the honorable lords and the kingdom itself, and to all sorts of people. I say eye never saw, nor ear ever heard of, such a scandalous and seditious thing as this mis-shapen monster is. . . . . Yet give me leave to read a word or two of it, where he cometh to tell the reasons why he writ this book: because he saw the number of plays, play-books, play-haunters, and play-houses so exceedingly increased, there being above forty thousand play-books, being now more valuable than the choicest sermons. What saith he in his epistle dedicatory, speaking of play-books? They bear so big a price, and are printed in far better paper, than most octavo and quarto Bibles, which hardly find so good a vent as they; and then come in such abundance, as they exceed all number, and 'tis a year's time to peruse them over, they are so multiplied: and then he putteth in the margin Ben Jonson, &c., printed in better paper than most Bibles. . . . . This monster, this huge, mis-shapen monster, I say it, is nothing but lies and venom against all sorts of people. It is a strange thing what this man taketh upon him. He is not like the powder traitors—they would have blown up all at once; this throweth all down at once to hell together, and delivereth them over to Satan. . . . Stage-players, &c., saith he, none are gainers and honored by them but the devil and hell; and when they have taken their wills in lust here, their souls go to eternal torment hereafter. And this must be the end of this monster's horrible sentence. He saith, so many as are in play-houses are so many unclean spirits; and that play-haunters are little better than incarnate devils. He doth not only condemn all play-writers, but all protectors of them, and all beholding of them; and dancing at plays, and singing at plays, they are all damned, and not less than to hell. I beseech your lordships, but in a word, to give me leave to read unto you what he writes of dancing. It is the devil's profession, and he that entereth into a dance entereth into a devilish profession; and so many paces in a dance, so many paces to hell. This is that which he conceiveth of dancing. The woman that singeth in a dance is the prioress of the devil, and those that answer are clerks, and the beholders are parishioners, and the music are bells, and the fiddlers are the minstrels of the devil." All this was Puritanism run mad—the being righteous overmuch, at the expense of the lightest and brightest enjoyments of all ages and all climes; but how it could be made sedition, and almost high treason, we know not, unless it were connecting it with the fact—which was not done openly—that the queen was a great dancer, and by holding it to be seditious and treasonable to hint that a queen could go to the place so often mentioned by the lord chief justice. This high functionary, however, went on to make out his case upon other grounds. "He writeth thus: that Nero's acting and frequenting plays was the chiefest cause that stirred up others to conspire his death. . . . And, in another place, that Tribellius Pollio relates that Martian, Heraclius, and Claudius, three worthy Romans, conspired together to murder Gallienus, the emperor, a man much besotted and taken up with plays, to which he likewise drew the magistrates and people by his lewd example. . . . Now, my lords, that they should be called three worthy persons that do conspire an emperor's death, though a wicked emperor, it is no Christian expression. If subjects have an ill prince, marry, what is the remedy? They must pray to God to forgive him, and not say they are worthy subjects that do kill him." After sundry invectives, which the prisoner heard, standing behind that other fierce persecutor of the Puritans, Bishop Neile, the lord chief justice concluded: "Mr. Prynne, I must now come to my sentence; though I am very sorry, for I have known you long; but now I must utterly forsake you, for I find that you have forsaken God, his religion, and your allegiance, obedience, and honor, which you owe to both their excellent majesties, the rule of charity to all noble ladies and persons in the kingdom, and forsaken all goodness. Therefore, Mr. Prynne, I shall proceed to my censure, wherein I agree with my Lord Cottington:—First, for the burning of your book in as disgraceful a manner as may be, whether in Cheapside or Paul's churchyard; for though Paul's churchyard be a consecrated place, yet heretical books have been burned in that place.[1] And because Mr. Prynne is of Lincoln's Inn, and that his profession may not sustain disgrace by his punishment, I do think it fit, with my Lord Cottington, that he be put from the bar and degraded in the university; and I leave it to my lords the lord bishops to see that done; and for the pillory, I hold it just and equal, though there were no statute for it. In the case of a high crime it may be done by the discretion of the court; so I do agree to that too. I fine him £5000; and I know he is as well able to pay £5000 as one half of £1000; and perpetual imprisonment I do think fit for him, and to be restrained from writing,—neither to have pen, ink, nor paper; yet let him have some pretty prayer-book, to pray to God to forgive him his sins; but to write, in good faith, I would never have him; for, Mr. Prynne, I do judge you by your book to be an insolent spirit, and one that did think by this book to have got the name of a Reformer, to set up the Puritan or separatist faction." One might have fancied that such a rating and such a tremendous sentence were enough for any criminal; but so thought not the officials of the Star Chamber! Mr. Secretary Coke next fell upon the condemned prisoner, beginning with an unquestionable truth. "By this vast book," said the secretary, "it appeareth that Mr. Prynne hath read more than he hath studied, and studied more than considered, whereas, if he had read but one sentence of Solomon, it had saved him from this danger. The preacher saith, be not over just, nor make thyself over wise, for why wilt thou destroy thyself?" Coke then proceeded to show the necessity of mildness and toleration to the vices of society, quoting Scripture again and again, but in rather an awkward manner, considering the monstrous intolerance which the court had shown to the prisoner. He insisted particularly that every man was not a fit reprehender of folly and vice,—that Mr. Prynne had no invitation, no office, no interest to make himself a censor. "And certainly," said Coke, "the faults that have been tolerated in all times were greater than modest plays or modest dancing. It is not my intention, neither do I think it is the intention of any of your lordships to apologzie for stage-plays, much less for the abuse of them. I wish, and so I think doth every good man, that the abuse of them were restrained; but, my lords, not by railing, cursing, damning, and inveighing, not only against the faults and players themselves, but against all spectators and those that come to them, and that of all degrees, &c." But every thing hitherto said was milk and honey compared to the gall poured forth by the noble Earl of Dorset. After complaining of the swarms of murmurers and mutineers not fit to breathe, he exclaimed, "My lords, it is time to make illustration to purge the air. And when will justice ever bring a more fit oblation than this Achan? Adam, in the beginning, put names on creatures correspondent to their natures. The title he hath given this book is Histrio-mastix, or rather, as Mr. Secretary Coke observed, Anthropomastix; but that comes not home, it deserves a far higher title, Damnation, in plain English, of Prince, Prelacy, Peers, People. . . . My lords, when God had made all his works, he looked upon them and saw that they were good. This gentleman, the devil having put spectacles on his nose, says that all is bad; no recreation, no vocation, no condition good: neither sex, magistrate, ordinance, custom divine or human; things animate and inanimate, all, my lords, wrapt up in massa damnata,—all in the ditch of destruction." In some respects this was a just criticism of Prynne's sour book; but their lordships presently showed that they could be as abusive and uncharitable as the fanatic Puritan. "Do you, Mr. Prynne," said the Earl of Dorset, "find fault with the court and the courtiers' habits, with silk and satin divines? I must say of you, you are all purple within—all pride, malice, and all disloyalty; you are like a tumbler, which is commonly squint-eyed, you look one way and run another way; though you seemed, by the title of your book, to scourge stage-plays, yet it was to make people believe that there was an apostasy in the magistrates; but . . . . when did ever church so flourish, and state better prosper? And, since the plagues happened, none have been sent among us such as this caterpillar is. What vein hath opened his anger? or who hath let out his fury? When did ever man see such a quietus est as in these days? yet in this golden age is there not a Shimei among us that curseth the anointed of the

[1] "That which the queen's majesty, some of her ladies, and all her maids of honor, are now practicing upon, is a pastoral penned by Mr. Walter Montague, wherein her majesty is pleased to act a part, as well for her recreation as for the exercise of her English. Ben Jonson (who I thought had been dead) hath written a play against next term, called the Magnetick Lady."—Letter from Mr. Pory to Sir Thomas Puckering, in Sir H. Ellis.

[1] In proposing the sentence of Michael Sparkes, the printer of Prynne's book, Cottington had said, "I do fine Sparkes £500 to the king, and to stand in the pillory, without touching of his ears, with a paper on his head to declare his offense, and it is most necessary in these times; and for the pillory to be in Paul's churchyard." Here Laud had exclaimed, evidently to the annoyance of Cottington. "It is a consecrated place!" "I cry your grace mercy," said my Lord Cottington; "then let it be in Cheapside."

This talking of consecrated places was rather new to the English Protestants; but Laud was now ceremoniously consecrating churches, churchyards, &c., to the horror of the Puritans. The lord chief justice might have said that not only had heretical books been burned, but blood also spilt in St. Paul's churchyard. The horrid execution of the gunpowder conspirators, Digby, Robert Winter, Grant, Bates, Thomas Winter, Rookwood, Keyes, and Guido Fawkes, had been performed at "the west end of St. Paul's churchyard."

It is worthy of remark that Cottington, in treating of Sparkes's case, alluded to the inevitable consequences of prohibition. "I do find that he (Sparkes) persuaded men to buy this book after it was prohibited; and before it was prohibited he persuaded men to buy it, saying it was an excellent book, and it would be called in, and then sell well!"

Buckner, who had been chaplain to Archbishop Abbot, and who was accused of having licensed at least a part of the Histriomastix, was let off very easily; but poor Sparkes suffered the sentence proposed by Cottington. Beside being a printer, he was (as was common in those days) a publisher, bookseller, and bookbinder. The noble Earl of Dorset suggested that he ought henceforward "to be barred from printing and selling books, and kept wholly to binding of books." —Rushworth.

Lord, so puffed with pride; nor can the beams of the sun thaw his frozen heart; and this man appeareth yet. And now, my lords, pardon me, as he hath wounded his majesty in his head, power, and government, and her majesty, his majesty's dear consort, our royal queen and my gracious mistress, I can spare him no longer—I am at his heart. Oh quantum!" &c. The courtier, who was an adept at long speeches, proceeded to draw an oratorical eulogium of the immeasurable virtues of Henrietta Maria. He described that passionate, willful woman as being not less mild and meek than majestic, of a sweet disposition, and for compassion always relieving some oppressed soul, having a heart full of honor, a soul full of chastity. Nay, Dorset, in the swing of his eloquence, did not scruple to praise her religion, saying that her zeal in the ways of God was unparalleled, and if all its saints were as she, the Roman church was not to be condemned. Going even further than this, he spoke as if he were privy to what passed between the queen and her confessor. "On my conscience," said he, "she troubleth her ghostly father with nothing, but that she hath nothing, to trouble him withal." But then, changing this gentle tone, the noble Dorset again addressed the Puritan in the following words, which should be remembered whenever the reader is startled by the denunciations of the religious party:—"Mr. Prynne, I do declare you to be a schism-maker in the Church, a sedition-sower in the commonwealth, a wolf in sheep's clothing,—in a word, omnium malorum nequissimus. I shall fine him £10,000, which is more than he is worth, yet less than he deserveth; I will not set him at liberty, no more than a plagued man or a mad dog, who, though he can not bite, he will foam: he is so far from being a sociable soul that he is not a rational soul; he is fit to live in dens with such beasts of prey as wolves and tigers like himself; therefore I do condemn him to perpetual imprisonment as those monsters that are no longer fit to live among men, nor see light. Now, for corporal punishment, my lords, I should burn him in the forehead and slit him in the nose; for I find that it is confessed of all that Dr. Leighton's offense was less than Mr. Prynne's; then why should Mr. Prynne have a less punishment? He that was guilty of murder was marked in a place where he might be seen, as Cain was. I should be loth he should escape with his ears, for he may get a periwig, which he now so much inveighs against, and so hide them, or force his conscience to make use of his unlovely love-locks on both sides. Therefore I would have him branded on the forehead, slit in the nose, and his ears cropped too."[1]

The infamous sentence was executed with the additional barbarities proposed by the noble and gallant Earl of Dorset. A cotemporary, of some learning and note, says he went to visit Prynne in the Fleet, and to comfort him, and found, in his serenity of spirit and cheerful patience, the rare effects of an upright heart and a good conscience. But Sir Symonds D'Ewes was a favorable reporter; and though the victim was no doubt cheered by his conscience, he was certainly neither serene nor patient. He sent Laud from his prison a stinging letter about his Star Chamber sentences, which letter Laud showed to the king, and then (as he informs us), by the king's command, to Mr. Attorney Noy. Noy forthwith had Mr. Prynne brought to his chamber, showed him the letter, and asked him whether it were his hand-writing. Mr. Prynne said he could not tell unless he might see it nearer. The letter being then given into his hands, and Mr. Attorney going to his closet for a pressing necessity, Prynne, when his back was turned, tore it into small pieces, and threw them out of a window; "fearing," says Laud, "ore tenus." Noy then brought the victim again into the Star Chamber, where all this was proved against him, and where, according to the persecuting prelate's own account, he mercifully forgave him this last offense.

Between the first arrest and the punishment of Prynne, Charles had made a magnificent journey into Scotland, where the people, too forgetful of the effects of the last royal visit they had received from James, had been complaining of neglect—as if the king thought the ancient crown of Scotland not worth his journey thither. Charles was attended in this journey by Laud, it being a principal object with him to force the Liturgy, with all the innovations in the Anglican church proposed, or about to be proposed, by his favorite bishop, upon his Scottish subjects. The Scots received him with great demonstrations of joy; many of the nobility ruined themselves by feasting and entertaining his numerous court; and on the 18th of June, 1633, Charles was crowned at Edinburgh. The ceremony was performed, as of right, by the Archbishop of St. Andrew's; but there were several circumstances in it which gave offense to the people. Laud, for example, rudely jostled and displaced the Archbishop of Glasgow, who was standing by the king's side, because that prelate had scrupled to officiate in the embroidered habits—very like the robes of the Roman hierarchy—which the English bishop had prescribed.[1] The introduction of a high altar, tapers,

[1] As to the book, Dorset said,—"My lords, I now come to this ordure,—I can give no better term to it,—burn it, as is practiced in other countries, or otherwise we shall bury Mr. Prynne, and suffer his ghost to walk. I shall therefore concur to the burning; but also let there be a proclamation made, that whosoever shall keep any of the books in his hands, and not bring them to some public magistrate to be burned in the fire, shall fall under sentence of this court."

The very loyal Sir Philip Warwick, who never even mentions or alludes to the trial and barbarous punishment of Prynne, calls the Earl of Dorset "a gentleman of great parts and elocution. Clarendon, as is usual with that great penman, gives the earl's character at greater length; but, though eulogistic, the violence, dissipation, and other vices of the man shine through all his rhetorical varnish. Some years before this, Dorset, then Sir Edward Sackville, signalized himself by a murderous duel. According to Clarendon, "he entered into a fatal quarrel, upon a subject very unwarrantable, with a young nobleman of Scotland, the Lord Bruce, upon which they both transported themselves into Flanders, and, attended only by two surgeons, placed at a distance, and under an obligation not to stir but upon the fall of one of them, they fought under the walls of Antwerp, where the Lord Bruce fell dead upon the place; and Sir Edward Sackville being likewise hurt, retired into the next monastery."—Hist.

[1] Immediately before the coronation a sermon was preached by David Lindsey, then bishop of Brechin, upon the text, 1 Kings, v. 39: "And all the people said God save King Solomon." During the coronation "it was observed that Dr. Laud, then bishop of London, who chalices, and genuflections, recalled the memory of the old religion, and the oil, and the unction, and other parts of the performance, all savored to the majority of the Scots of the rankest idolatry.[1] The coronation was succeeded by a parliament—stratagem having been employed to secure the election of such lords of the articles as were noted for their entire and unscrupulous devotion to the royal will. They voted supplies with unprecedented liberality and promptitude. A land-tax of £400,000 Scotch, and the sixteenth penny of legal interest were granted for six years. The regular rate of interest was reduced from ten to eight per cent., and the difference of two per cent., taken by this act from the creditor, was vested in the king for three years. The harmony of the parliament was first disturbed by a question about the attire of the clergy; Laud and the king having made up their minds that the Scottish ministers should wear precisely the same garments as their English brethren. The subject seemed one of awful importance to many of the Scotch; and it was not trivial, if taken in connection with other circumstances and the temper of the government. If Charles, by his arbitrary will, should impose the embroidered cope and the white surplice—which the people abominated as vestiges of papistry—he might, by a like process, interfere with the most important rights and privileges of the nation. Silence now would assuredly be taken as a tacit submission to further encroachments. But the Scottish lords were not disposed to be silent. The aged Lord Melville, addressing himself to Charles, exclaimed, "I have sworn with your father and the whole kingdom to the Confession of Faith, in which the innovations intended by these articles were solemnly abjured." Charles was disconcerted and confounded by this bold remark; he rose, and withdrew to take counsel of himself and others. But soon he returned, repossessed of his authoritative tone; and when they resumed their deliberations, he haughtily commanded them not to debate, but to vote; and, refusing to separate the questions which they were willing to approve, from his copes and surplices, to which they objected, he produced a paper containing a list of the members, and said, "Your names are here; I shall know to-day who will do me service and who will not." The articles were rejected by fifteen peers and forty-five commoners, making a clear majority of the House; and yet the lord register impudently reported them as affirmed by parliament. The Earl of Rothes boldly declared that the votes were erroneously collected, or falsely reported, and demanded a scrutiny. If Charles's conduct be correctly reported, it is decisive in itself of his whole character and temper. It is said that he stood up, and refused the scrutiny, unless the Earl of Rothes would, at his peril, take upon himself to arraign the lord register of the capital and treasonable crime of falsifying the votes—a proceeding which would have involved the unsuccessful accuser in ruin; and, from the tone of the king and the timidity or subservience of that parliament, Rothes might well despair of establishing his accusation, however just. He was silent; the articles, though really rejected by a majority, were ratified in the Scottish manner by the touch of the scepter; and the parliament was forthwith dissolved upon the 28th of June. Charles did not venture upon his English practice of imprisoning refractory members, but he studiously testified his high displeasure against those who had opposed his will. They were excluded from a lavish dispensation of honors and promotions; were received at court with reproaches or sullen silence; were turned into ridicule; were set down as schismatic and seditious men.[1] Having made Bishop Laud a privy councilor of Scotland, and heard him preach in pontificalibus in the royal chapel of Holyrood; having established "singing men" in the said chapel, and set up an episcopal see at Edinburgh, with a diocese extending over ancient Lothian from the Forth to Berwick, and with rich endowments in old church lands, which certain great nobles had, by a private and not unprofitable bargain, agreed to surrender, for the sake of example, to others. Charles made a posting journey to the queen at Greenwich, where he arrived after four days' traveling, on the 20th of July.[2] Laud, who was not so good a traveler, followed him by slow stages, and reached his palace at Fulham, on the 26th. "On Sunday, August the 4th" (we use the prelate's own words), "news came to court of the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury's death, and the king resolved presently to give it me, which he did August 6th. That very morning at Greenwich, there came one to me seriously that vowed ability to perform it, and offered me to be a cardinal. I went presently to the king, and acquainted him both with the thing and person." To be promised the primacy of the Anglican church, and a cardinal's hat from the pope, upon one and the same day, was a combination of circumstances of a very extraordinary kind! We would not make more of the mystery than his conduct and proceedings justify; but we think it can scarcely be doubted, attended the king (being a stranger), was high in his carriage, taking upon him the order and managing of the ceremonies; and, for an instance, Spotswood, archbishop of St. Andrew's, being placed at the king's right hand, and Lindsey, then archbishop of Glasgow, at his left, Bishop Laud took Glasgow, and thrust him from the king, with these words: 'Are you a churchman, and wants the coat of your order?' (which was an embroidered coat, and that he scrupled to wear, being a moderate churchman;) and in place of him put in the Bishop of Ross at the king's left hand."—Rushworth.

[1] "The passing of the act concerning ecclesiastical habits did much perplex the dissenting lords and others, which occasioned some of them to divulge in writing a paper reflecting upon his majesty (adjudged afterward to be a libel), wherein was contained this reflection—how grievous a thing it was for a king in that place, by making of the subjects' votes to overawe his parliament; and that the same was a breach of privilege, &c. This writing, as afterward appeared, was drawn by one William Hagg, who fled for it, but, being found in the custody of the Lord Balmerino, that lord, by the instigation of Archbishop Spotswood, and others of the privy council, was, in a court of his peers, found guilty of concealing treason, and therefore condemned to lose his head, but afterward pardoned by his majesty."—Rushworth.

[2] From the 1st of July to the 10th, the king and his favorite bishop had made excursions to St. Andrew's, Dundee, Falkland, Dumblane, &c. Laud, in his Diary, describes his journey to Dumblane and Stirling, as his "dangerous and cruel journey, crossing part of the Highlands by coach, which was a wonder there." It appears that King Charles was in some danger of being drowned or wrecked; at least, Laud has in his Diary—"July 10th, Wednesday, his majesty's dangerous passage from Brunt Island to Edinburgh."

that some high Catholics, who had watched his conduct, fancied that Laud's great project was, gradually to bring back the English to the bosom of the Roman church, or that he himself was, from conviction and practice, already worthy of being a prince of that church. Under date of Saturday, August the 17th, he says: "I had a serious offer made me again to be a cardinal (this seems to prove that he had not rejected the first offer in a very angry or decided manner): I was then from court: but so soon as I came thither (which was Wednesday, August 21) I acquainted his majesty with it; but my answer again was, that somewhat dwelt within me, which would not suffer that, till Rome were other than it is." At a later period, when the scourged, mutilated, and maddened Puritans were hunting Laud to the scaffold, he said, in alluding to this remarkable passage of his life: "His majesty, very prudently and religiously, yet in a calm way, the person offering it having relation to some ambassador, freed me from that both trouble and danger."[1] Some agent in the singular transaction let out the secret of the hat, the effect of which upon the Puritans, who saw that Laud was every day laboring to assimilate the ceremonies of the English church to the Roman model, may be easily conceived, although they had no positive proof of the transaction.[2] Having definitively settled the business of the cardinalate, Laud was formally installed in the archbishopric of Canterbury on the 19th of September. About the beginning of the month of November, the Lady Davies prophesied against the new primate, that he should "a very few days outlive the 5th of November."[3] This lady was the widow of Sir John Davies, the author of several poetical productions of much merit, and of sundry slavish speeches in King James's time in support of the prerogative in the House of Commons. It was said that she had correctly predicted the death of the Duke of Buckingham. Laud, who was excessively superstitious, a believer, beyond the general credulity of the times, in dreams, omens, and prognostics, had her dragged into the Star Chamber, which was not often the scene of such a merry, and laughable, and harmless trial. "The woman was grown so mad, that she fancied the spirit of the prophet Daniel to have been infused into her body; and this she grounded on an anagram which she made of her name—viz. Eleanor Davies,—Reveal, O Daniel. And though the anagram had too much by an L, and too little by an S, yet she found Daniel and Reveal in it, and that served her turn. Much pains was taken by the court to dispossess her of this spirit, but all would not do, till Lamb, then dean of the arches, shot her through and through with an arrow borrowed from her own quiver; for while the bishops and divines were reasoning this point with her out of holy scripture, he took a pen into his hand, and at last hit upon this excellent anagram, viz.—Dame Eleanor Davies,—Never so mad a Ladie: which having proved to be true by the rules of art, Madam, said he, I see you build much on anagrams, and I have found out one which I hope will fit you. This said, and reading it aloud, he put it into her hands in writing, which happy fancy brought that grave court into such a laughter, and the poor woman thereupon into such a confusion, that afterward she grew either wiser or was less regarded."[1]

Thus happily surviving the 5th of November, Laud went on fearlessly with his high-handed proceedings in the church. But he had not waited for the primacy to begin these: for, even during old Abbot's life he had obtained the almost entire disposal of bishoprics, and, as Bishop of London, had introduced numerous changes in the churches of his diocese, and the cathedral of St. Paul's, which he began to rebuild and beautify with money obtained, for the most part, in an irregular and oppressive manner. According to the doctrine of the majority of the English preachers and of the reformed churches abroad, the Almighty cared not for temples built with hands: simplicity as far as possible removed from the pomp, the glare, and glitter of the Roman church, was most acceptable unto him, and a barn as good a temple as the vast and wondrous dome of St. Peter's itself, provided only those within it worshiped in sincerity and truth. Laud thought differently, as no doubt did many good and conscientious persons, who had long been representing that it was indecorous to worship God in places no better than stables. "The remissness of Abbot and of other bishops by his example," says Clarendon, "had introduced, or at least connived at a negligence, that gave great scandal to the church, and no doubt offended very many pious men. The people took so little care of the churches, and the parsons as little of the chancels, that, instead of beautifying or adorning them in any degree, they rarely provided against the falling of many of their churches, and suffered them at least to be kept so indecently and slovenly, that they would not have endured it in the ordinary offices of their own houses; the rain and the wind to infest them: and the sacraments themselves to be administered where the people had most mind to receive them."[2] Soon after the death of Buckingham, when Bishop Laud "had great favor with the king," a proclamation was issued to the bishops for the repair of decayed churches throughout the kingdom.

[2] Hobbes, in his tractate "De Cive," published some nine years after, alludes to the strange rumor, but treats it as an absurd and malicious party calumny. But Laud's own Diary had not then been made public, to show the man in his true colors as painted by himself.

[1] Heylin, Life of Laud. An odd account of Lady Davies's predictions was published, in quarto, in 1649, under the title of "Strange and Wonderful Prophecies." Old Anthony à Wood, in relating her husband Sir John's death, says:—"It was then commonly rumored, that his prophetical lady had foretold his death in some manner, on the Sunday going before. For while she sat at dinner by him, she suddenly burst out with tears; whereupon he asking her what the matter was, she answered, 'Husband, these are your funeral tears;' to which he made reply, 'Pray, therefore, spare your tears now, and I will be content that you shall laugh when I am dead.'"—*Ath. [2] Hist. The loyal historian, after praising "so pious a work" as repairing and adorning the churches, is obliged to add,—"Yet, I know not how, the prosecution of it, with too much affectation of expense, it may be, or with too much passion between the ministers and the parishioners, raised an evil spirit toward the Church, which the enemies of it took much advantage of it, as soon as they had an opportunity to make the worst use of it."

It was asserted in this royal ordinance, that by law the same ought to be repaired and maintained at the charge of the inhabitants and others having land in those chapelries and parishes respectively, who had willfully neglected to repair the same, being consecrated places of God's worship and divine service. His majesty charged and commanded all archbishops and bishops to take special care that these repairs were done, and by themselves and their officers to take a view and survey of them. The parishioners and landlords thought that a part, if not the whole, of the expense, instead of falling solely upon them, ought to be defrayed out of the tithes which they paid; but what was calculated to produce still greater disgust was the concluding clause of the proclamation, wherein the bishops were ordered "to use the powers of the Ecclesiastical Court for putting the same in due execution; and that the judges be required not to interrupt this good work by their too easy granting of prohibitions."[1] That is, the judges were not to interfere to stop the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Court in extorting money from the subject for the repairing and adorning of churches and chapels. Nor did Charles and Laud stop here; for in the month of May, 1631, a commission was issued, with the usual arbitrary forms, empowering the privy council "to hear and examine all differences which shall arise betwixt any of our courts of justice, especially between the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction."[2] Some three months before the issuing of this commission, Laud astonished the people of London by his newly made or revived ceremonial of consecrating churches. The first which he so consecrated was that of St. Catherine Creed, a London church, which had not been rebuilt, but only repaired, but which was pronounced by him to require the ceremony, because new timber and other materials, not consecrated, had been introduced. He proceeded to St. Catherine's in the greatest state, an infinite number of people of all sorts "drawing together," says his sympathizing biographer, Heylin, "to behold that ceremony to which they had so long been strangers, ignorant altogether of the antiquity and the necessity of it." In fact, the Romish aspect of the ceremony, from beginning to end, gave scandal and alarm to the majority of the spectators. To begin his repairs at St. Paul's with pomp and effect, he conducted the king thither in state, and after a fitting sermon Charles took a view of the dilapidations of the church, which appear to have been very serious. Soon after a commission was issued under the great seal, appointing money brought in for the purpose of repairs to be paid into the chamber of London, and declaring further, that "the judges of the prerogative courts, and all officials throughout the several bishoprics of England and Wales, upon the decease of persons intestate, should be excited to remember this church out of what was proper to be given to pious uses."[3] The clergy, being summoned by their ordinaries, gave toward the repairs of St. Paul's a kind of annual subsidy; Sir Paul Pindar gave £4000 and other assistance; the king contributed altogether about £10,000, Laud himself only £100 per annum. As more money was wanted, it was sought for in the arbitrary fines extorted in the Star Chamber and in the High Commission Courts, in which Laud was all prevalent, and where he carried two great objects at once, by intermeddling with men's consciences and private conduct, and by making their punishment contribute to his great object of making St. Paul's a kind of rival of St. Peter's. "He intended the discipline of the church," says Clarendon, in a striking passage, "should be felt as well as spoken of, and that it should be applied to the greatest and most splendid transgressors as well as to the punishment of smaller offenses and meaner offenders; and thereupon called for, or cherished the discovery of those who were not careful to cover their own iniquities, thinking they were above the reach of other men, or their power or will to chastise. Persons of honor and great quality, of the court and of the country, were every day cited into the High Commission Court, upon the fame of their incontinence, or other scandal in their lives, and were there prosecuted to their shame and punishment; and as the shame (which they called an insolent triumph upon their degree and quality, and leveling them with the common people) was never forgotten, but watched for revenge, so the fines imposed there were the more questioned, and repined against, because they were assigned to the rebuilding St. Paul's church, and thought, therefore, to be the more severely imposed, and the less compassionately reduced and excused: which likewise made the jurisdiction and rigor of the Star Chamber more felt and murmured against, and sharpened many men's humors against the bishops, before they had any ill intention toward the church."[1] Well supplied with money from this curious variety of sources, and spurred by the active, impatient spirit of Laud, the workmen proceeded apace, but with more rapidity than good taste or attention to congruity. Inigo Jones restored the sides with a clumsy Gothic, and threw up in the western front a fine Corinthian portico; and before the body of the work was finished the bishop was brought to the block; and during the civil wars St. Paul's was converted into barracks for the parliament's dragoons. It got abroad that Laud, in speaking before his majesty, had expressed himself in favor of the rule of celibacy as imposed on all Roman priests by Pope Gregory, and in disparagement of the married clergy, saying that he, for his part, other things being equal, should, in the disposal of benefices, always give the preference to such clergymen as lived in celibacy. This was touching a most sensitive chord: there were some things in which the churchmen of the establishment would willingly have resumed the ancient usage; but a return to celibacy was horrible and atrocious in their eyes: everywhere the ministers of the reformed churches looked upon the vindication of the rights of nature as the most signal advantage obtained over popery, and they were indignant, infuriated at the slightest hint of the vows of chastity being essential to the servants of the gospel. A loud and universal murmur warned Laud that he had gone too far. His retractation was adroitly managed. He immediately got up a marriage between one of his own chaplains and a daughter of his friend or creature Windebank, performed the nuptial service himself in a very public manner, and gave the married chaplain preferment. We have deplored the fanatical and barbarous destruction of the works of art connected with the old religion: Laud—we can scarcely believe from mere taste—was most anxious to preserve such fragments as had hitherto escaped, and to supply the places of some of those which had perished. But the way in which he went to work only gave a fresh impetus to the iconoclastic fury. Mr. Sherfield, a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and recorder of Sarum, by direction of a vestry, and in accordance with acts of parliament and canons of the reformed church, caused a picture on glass to be removed from a window of a church and broken to pieces.[1] Laud, thereupon, brought him up in the Star Chamber, maintaining that he had usurped on the jurisdiction of the bishop, and that of his majesty as supreme head of the Church. He there ventured to defend the use of painted images in places of worship, and counted among the evils which attended their destruction the keeping moderate Catholics away from church. Some members of the court presumed to hint that Laud was leaning toward popery; but the majority sentenced Sherfield to pay £500 to the king, to lose his office of recorder, to find security that he would break no more images, and also "to make a public acknowledgment of his offense, not only in the parish church of St. Edmond's, where it was committed, but in the cathedral church itself, that the bishop, in contempt of whose authority he had played this pageant, might have reparation."[2] Upon Laud's first removal to the see of London, he presented to Charles a list of "considerations for the better settling of the church government." He proposed that the bishops should be commanded to reside in their several dioceses, excepting those who were in attendance at court, that a special charge should be given them against frequent and unworthy ordinations, and that especial care should be had over the lecturers, which, by reason of their pay, were the people's creatures, and blew the coals of their sedition. "For the abating of whose power," continues Laud, "these ways may be taken:—That the afternoon sermons in all parishes be turned into catechising; that every lecturer do read divine service according to the liturgy, printed by authority, in his surplice and hood, if in church or chapel, and if in a market town, then in a gown, and not in a cloak; that the bishop should suffer none under noblemen and men qualified by law to keep any private chaplain in their houses; that his majesty should prefer to bishoprics none but men of courage, gravity, and experience in government; that Emanual and Sydney colleges, in Cambridge, "which are the nurseries of Puritanism," be from time to time provided with grave and orthodox men for their governors; that more encouragement should be given to the High Commission Court; that some course should be taken to prevent the judges from sending so many prohibitions," &c. &c.[1] Charles regulated his conduct according to these suggestions, and shortly after he issued his "regal instructions," which differed very slightly from the considerations presented by Laud, and included all the clauses except those relating to the Cambridge colleges and the High Commission Court, which it was neither necessary nor expedient to mention in public. Laud, upon the appearance of these instructions or injunctions, which were of his own devising and composition, summoned all the ministers and lecturers within the city and suburbs of London, and, making a solemn speech, pressed them all to be obedient to his majesty's orders, as being full of religion and justice, and advantageous to the church and commonwealth, although they were mistaken by some hasty and incompetent persons.[2] But, at the same time, Laud projected several things which were good and laudable in themselves, without being opposed to the national liberties. Such were the buildings at St. John's College, Oxford, wherein he had been bred; the setting up a Greek press in London;[3] the appointment of a professor of Arabic at Oxford; the foundation of a hospital at Reading; all of which works were perfected in his lifetime. He had proposed to find a way to increase the stipends of poor vicars, but this remained an intention.

[1] The particular picture destroyed by Mr. Sherfield appears to have been barbarous in taste and offensive in other respects. The subject was the Creation. The poor recorder said in defense, "That the true history of the creation was not contained in that window, but a false and impious one. God the Father was painted like an old man with a blue coat, and a pair of compasses, to signify his compassing the heavens and the earth. In the fourth day's work there were fowls of the air flying up from God, their maker, which should have been the fifth day. In the fifth day's work a naked man is lying upon the earth asleep, with so much of a naked women as from the knees upward, growing out of his side, which should have been the sixth day; so that the history is false."

[2] Cyprianus Anglicus.

[1] Laud, in his "Considerations," recommended the king to prevent bishops from wasting the woods on their lands "where any were left." Charles, in his "Regal Injunctions," went more at length into the business, showing some curious practices of the prelates on their translations. "Every bishop that, by our grace and favor, and good opinion of his service, shall be nominated by us to another bishopric, shall, from that day of nomination, not presume to make any lease for three lives or twenty-one years, or concurrent lease; or any wav to renew any estate, or cut any wood or timber, but merely to receive the rents due, and quit the place; for we think it a hateful thing, that any man leaving a bishopric should almost undo his successor."—Rushworth.

[2] Rushworth. Just at this time Mr. Bernard, lecturer at St. Sepulcher's church, London, said, in his prayer before sermon,—"Lord open the eyes of the queen's majesty, that she may see Jesus Christ, whom she has pierced with her infidelity, superstition, and idolatry." For these words he was questioned in the High Commission Court, which declared the same to be scandalous and unadvised, and not to be repeated. The zealous preacher, however, escaped any severe punishment, by making a very humble submission.—Ib.

[3] The whole or part of the Greek type, was, however, obtained in an arbitrary manner truly characteristic of Laud. The king's printers, in an edition of the Bible, had committed the very awkward mistake of omitting the word not in the Seventh Commandment. The bishop called in the impression, and called up the poor printers to the High Commission Court, which sentenced them to pay an exorbitant fine, with part of which Laud provided the Greek type for printing ancient manuscripts, &c.

Maintaining the closest correspondence with Viscount Wentworth, now (1632) not merely President of the North, but also Lord Deputy of Ireland, Laud endeavored to surround the king with persons devoted to his own views and interests. On the 15th of June, 1632, Francis Windebank, his old friend, whose daughter he had married to his chaplain, was sworn secretary of state; and in the month of July another old and sturdy friend, Dr. Juxon, the dean of Worcester, at his suit, was sworn clerk of his majesty's closet. "So that Windebank having the king's ear on one side, and the clerk of the closet on the other, he might presume to have his tale well told between them, and that his majesty should not easily be possessed with any thing to his disadvantage."[1] If Laud had taken all to himself in the business of the church while only bishop of London, he became far more absolute on his promotion to the primacy. He commanded like a pope of the fourteenth century. The communion-table, which, according to Clarendon, had not been safe "from the approaches of dogs," was, by an order of council, directed to be removed in all cases from the center to the east end of the church, to be railed in and called by its old Roman name of altar. Against disobedient priests, nay, even against neglectful church-wardens, were hurled the thunders of excommunication. Not merely painted glass began to reappear in the windows, but pictures in the body of the churches and over the altars. Laud was inexorable on the subject of surplices and lawn sleeves. Everywhere great pains were taken to give pomp and magnificence to the national worship, and a dignified or imposing appearance to the persons of the officiating ministers. At the present day there can scarcely be a difference of opinion as to the savage severity with which Laud enforced these changes; but still many may doubt whether the popular religion would not have been benefited in some respects by their introduction.

The more religious part of the Protestant community, however — the classes branded with the general name of Puritans—regarded the attempt with horror, and considered it as nothing less than an engine to batter down the pure worship, and destroy the pure worshipers of God;[2] and they were further confirmed in this feeling by every subsequent step taken by the archbishop and his master. They had delighted especially in evening lectures and extemporary prayers of wondrous length, wherein they were often carried away by their fervor to utter things displeasing to the court: Laud, by a stroke of his pen, suppressed the evening meetings and the extemporary praying. In the beginning of October, 1633, there were complaints made to the council concerning church-ales and revels upon the Lord's Day in Somersetshire. The Lord Chief Justice Richardson and Baron Denham, being on the circuit in that county, thought it incumbent on them to issue an order similar to divers others that had been made heretofore by the judges of assize, for the suppressing of these noisy sports. As soon as intelligence of this proceeding reached the ears of Laud, he complained of it to the king as an insolent invasion of his province; and the chief justice was commanded to attend the council, where he was not only made to revoke his order, but also received "such a rattle, that he came out blubbering and complaining that he had been almost choked with a pair of lawn sleeves."[1] The justices of peace, being much troubled at the revocation of the order, drew up a petition to the king, showing the great mischiefs that would befall the country if the Sabbath were not better kept, and if these meetings at church-ales, bid-ales, and clerk-ales, condemned by the laws, should now be set up again. The petition was subscribed by Lord Poulet, Sir William Portman, Sir Ralph Hopeton, and many other gentlemen of rank and fortune; but before they could deliver it to the king, a declaration came forth concerning "lawful sports to be used of Sundays," which was little more than a republication of King James's "Book of Sports," which, after a time, had been disregarded and cast aside. Charles gave his warrant to Laud, and Laud had the paper printed and published on the 18th of October, with the following preamble: "James, of blessed memory, in his return from Scotland, coming through Lancashire, found that his subjects were debarred from lawful recreations, upon Sundays after evening prayers ended, and upon holydays. And he prudently considered, that if these times were taken from them, the meaner sort, who labor all the week, should have no recreations at all, to refresh their spirits. And after his return, he further saw that his loyal subjects in all other parts of his kingdom did suffer in the same kind, though perhaps not in the same degree; and did, therefore, in his princely wisdom, publish a declaration to all his loving subjects, concerning lawful sports to be used at such time, which was printed and published by his royal commandment in the year 1618." After giving the whole of the document, Charles, or Laud, added, that his present majesty "ratified and published this his blessed father's declaration; the rather because of late in some counties, under pretense of taking away abuses, there had been a general forbidding, not only of ordinary meetings, but of the feasts of the dedication of the churches, commonly called wakes. "Now," continued this renvoi, "his majesty's express will and pleasure is, that these feasts, with others, shall be observed, and that his justices of the peace, in their several divisions, shall look to it, both that all disorders there may be prevented or punished, and that all neighborhood and freedom, with manlike and lawful exercises, be used. And his majesty further commands all justices of assize in their several circuits to see, that no man do trouble or molest any of his loyal and dutiful people, in or for their lawful recreations, having first done their duty to God, and continuing in obedience to his majesty's laws. And this his majesty commands all his judges, justices of peace, as well within liberties as without, mayors, bailiffs, constables, and other officers, to take notice of, and to see observed, as they tender his displeasure. And doth further will, that publication of this command be made by order from the bishops, through all the parish churches of their several dioceses respectively."[1] The bishops, it should appear, were obedient enough; but many ministers, very conformable to the church in other respects, refused to read this order in their churches; for which some were suspended, some silenced from preaching and otherwise persecuted. This made men to look again beyond the Atlantic for some place where they might be free from the "haughty prelates' rage." At the same time, Laud stretched his hands to Scotland and Ireland, making a sad turmoil in both countries; and Charles continued to issue proclamations without number, and on an infinite variety of subjects, from fixing the religion that people were to profess, down to fixing the price of poultry—from a prohibition of heresy to a prohibition of the abuses growing out of the retailing of tobacco. In the mean while the people murmured and railed; some, not exactly of the people, broadly prophesied in what all this would end; but the power of Archbishop Laud kept steadily on the increase, and certainly the proud churchman neglected none of the arts of a courtier, or those adroit compliances which smooth his ascent. He had, however, now and then to sustain a check from the queen, whose influence over Charles seemed to grow with years and troubles, and with his now cherished plan of governing like a king—like a very king of France—without intermeddling and impertinent parliaments. Henrietta Maria's temper was almost as difficult to manage as a sturdy Puritan's conscience: at times she conceived plans connected with her religion, and exacted services, which startled even the boldness of the primate. "On the 30th of August, 1633," says he in his Diary, "the queen, at Oatlands, sent for me, and gave me thanks for a business with which she had trusted me, and her promise then that she would be my friend, and that I should have immediate address to her when I had occasion." What the business was we know not, but, soon after, Laud was put into the Commission, or, as he calls it, the Great Committee, of Trade and the king's revenue. On March the 14th of the following year he was named chief of the Board of Commissioners of the Exchequer, appointed upon the death of Lord Weston (recently created Earl of Portland), the lord high treasurer. After presiding over the board for about a year, he induced the king to make his friend Juxon, bishop of London, lord high treasurer; in doing which, he did not "want some seasonable consideration for the good of the Church."[2] His biographer says that Bishop Juxon was a most upright man; yet it was generally conceived that the archbishop, in making this appointment, neither consulted his present ease—for which he should have procured the treasurer's white staff, for Cottington, who had long been chancellor of the Exchequer, and who looked to the staff almost as his due[1]—nor his future security; for which he ought to have advised the delivery of the staff to some popular nobleman, such as the Earl of Bedford, Hertford, or Essex, or Lord Say.[2] It is quite certain that several great noblemen, who had borne rather patiently with Laud's tyranny in church and state, became very patriotic after the disposal of this high and lucrative office: and it is almost equally certain that Juxon was an honester man than most of his predecessors. It is difficult to conceive a learned body carrying baseness and adulation farther than was practised at this time by the University of Oxford, the proceedings of which, in Puritan notions, verged on idolatry and blasphemy. They gave Laud the title of Holiness, which the papists bestowed on the pope, and they applied to him the other title attached to the tiara of "Summus Pontifex." They told him in their Latin epistles, that he was "Spiritu Sancto effusissime plenus," "Archangelus, et ne quid minus," &c.[3]

And even when this vision of vain-glory was departing from him, Laud maintained that these expressions, so offensive to Protestant ears, so inapplicable to frail humanity, were proper and commendable, because they had been applied to the popes and fathers of the Roman church. But at the time of which we are speaking the archbishop no doubt considered himself as a sort of Protestant pope. Not satisfied with coercing men's consciences in England, Scotland, and Ireland, he was determined to establish a uniformity of worship, including all his innovations, wherever there was an English colony or factory—wherever a few subjects of the three kingdoms were gathered together for the purpose of commerce, or even for the military service of foreign states. In 1622, when his power and influence were in their infancy, he offered to the lords of the council certain considerations for the better and more orthodox regulation of public worship among the English factories and regiments beyond sea. He never forgot nor neglected a scheme of this kind, and as soon as he attained to the primacy he procured an order in council for the observance of the Anglican liturgy by the factories in Holland and the troops serving in that country, and a chaplain of his own choice was sent to the factory at Delf to establish this orthodoxy, and to report the names of all such as should prove refractory. What made the case the harder was, the fact that nearly all the soldiers and most of the merchants were Scotch or English Puritans, who had abandoned their own country for the sake of liberty of conscience. "The like course was prescribed for our factories in Hamburgh and those farther

[2] Heylin. "No churchman," says Laud himself, "had it since the time of Henry VII. I pray God bless him to carry it so, that the Church may have honor, and the king and the state service and contentment by it. And now if the Church will not hold up themselves under God, I can do no more."—Diary.

[1] In his Diary, Laud marks the months of May, June, and July (1635), as being stormy or troublesome months on account of the commission for the Treasury, "and the differences which happened between Lord Cottington and himself." And upon Sunday, the 12th of July, he notes that his old friend Sir F. W. (Francis Windebank), forsook him, and joined with the Lord Cottington, which put him to the exercise of a great deal of patience, &c.

off, that is to say, in Turkey, in the Mogul's dominions, the Indian islands, the plantations in Virginia, the Barbadoes, and all other places where the English had any standing residence in the way of trade. The like was done also for regulating the divine service in the families of all ambassadors abroad. . . . The English agents and ambassadors in the courts of foreign princes had not formerly been so regardful of the honor of the church of England as they might have been, in designing a set room for religious uses, and keeping up the vestments, rites, and ceremonies prescribed by law in the performance of them. It was now hoped that there would be a church of England in all courts of Christendom, in the chief cities of the Turks, and other great Mohammedan princes, and all our factories and plantations in every known part of the world, by which it might be rendered as diffuse and catholic as the church of Rome."[1] In his paper, presented to the council in 1622, Laud had also proposed reducing the French and Dutch churches in London to conformity; and now, having vexed the Scotch and English who had fled abroad for religion, he proceeded to harass the Dutch and the French who had fled to England for the same cause. The French were all Huguenots, or extreme Calvinists, and as such hateful in the eyes of this Summus Pontifex. Without condescending to ask the concurrence of his master, he addressed to the French church in Canterbury, and the Dutch churches in Sandwich and Maidstone, the three following questios:—1. Whether they did not use the French or Dutch liturgy? 2. Of how many descents they were for the most part born subjects of England? 3. Whether such as were born subjects would conform to the church of England? These foreign congregations in Kent declined answering these interrogatories, and pleaded the national hospitality which had been extended to them when they fled from papal persecution, and the privileges and exemptions which had been granted to them by Edward VI., and which had been confirmed not only by Elizabeth and James, but also by Charles himself. Laud, who cared little for these solemn pledges given to industrious and ingenious classes of men, who, in some respects, had essentially improved the country which they had chosen for their home, issued an order as absolute as a pope's bull, that such as were natives should regularly attend their parish churches, and (a condition as weighty as their conformity) contribute in money to the support of the Anglican clergy; and that such as were aliens should use the English liturgy in their own places of worship, faithfully translated into their own language. The Protestant refugees were troubled and dismayed as if a new Duke of Alva was thundering at their doors: they sought a respite by addressing an humble petition to the primate. Laud answered it in the very tone of a Hildebrand of the old time. He told the dismayed French and Dutch that his course was not to be stopped either by the letters-patent of Edward VI., or by any argument they were able to use; that their churches were nests and occasions of schism; that it were better there were no foreigners in England than that they should be permitted to prejudice and endanger the church government of the realm; that they were endeavoring to make themselves a state within a state; that the dissipation of their churches, and the maintenance of their ministers, were things not to be laid in the same balance with the peace and happiness of the church of England; that their ignorance of the English tongue was no proper reason for their not attending the parish churches, considering that it was an affected ignorance, and that they might learn English when they would; and finally, that he had the power and the right of enforcing obedience, and that they must conform at their peril by the time appointed. Hereupon the refugees presented a petition to the king, who churlishly left it without any answer. Soubise, who, like many others of the French Protestants, had been precipitated into ruin by the mad expedition ordered by Charles and conducted by Buckingham, was now in England, and he took charge of a second petition, and pleaded to his majesty of England the danger of fresh persecutions of the Protestants in France, if it should be seen that their brethren were discountenanced and oppressed in the country of their choice.[1] The reasonings of this nobleman made a deep impression, but all that Charles would grant was, that those who were born aliens might still enjoy the use of their own church service; insisting at the same time, that their children born in England should go regularly to the parish churches. But even this narrow concession was limited to the province of Canterbury: in the province of York, where the foreign congregations were weaker in numbers, money, and friends, Laud's original injunctions were imposed. "When these injunctions were to be put in execution at Norwich, the Dutch and French congregations petitioned Dr. Matthew Wren, (the bishop of the diocese) that these injunctions might not be imposed upon them; but finding no relief, appealed to the archbishop, who returned a sharp answer, that unless they would submit, he would proceed against them according to the laws and canons ecclesiastical. Here take notice, that, as the Spanish trade was the most enriching trade to this nation, so the trade to Hamburgh, and the countries and kingdoms within the Sound, with our woolen manufactures, was the best the English had for employment of people, shipping, and navigation: the company which traded into the Sound was called the East Country Company, and Queen Elizabeth, and after her King James, to honor them, called it the Royal Company. This trade the English enjoyed time out of mind; and the cloths which supplied it were principally made in Suffolk and Yorkshire; and Ipswich, as it was the finest town in England, and had the noblest harbor on the east, and most convenient for the trade of the northern and eastern parts of the world, so till this time it was in as flourishing a state as any other in England. The Bishop of Norwich, straining these injunctions to the utmost, frightened thousands of families out of Norfolk and Suffolk into New England; and about one hundred and forty families of the workers of those woolen manufacturers, wherewith Hamburgh and the countries within the Sound were supplied, went into Holland; where the Dutch, as wise as Queen Elizabeth was in entertaining the Walloons, persecuted by the Duke of Alva, established these English excise-free, and house-rent-free, for seven years; and from these the Dutch became instructed in working these manufacturers, which before they knew not."[1]

[1] Charles was also told that Cardinal Richelieu had said, that if a king of England, who was a Protestant, would not permit two church disciplines in his kingdom, it could not be expected that the king of France, who was a Catholic, would allow of two religions in his kingdom. From the beginning to the end of the chapter, Protestant intolerance was the best whetstone for the sharpening of Roman persecution.

Laud, primate and first peer of England, seems to have imagined that there could be no limits to his authority. He was already chancellor of Oxford, and now he would visit both universities by his metropolitan right, and not by commission from the king, as had been customary. The two universities replied, that they could not admit his visitation without a warrant from the sovereign; and reminded his grace that he was only chancellor of Oxford, and the Earl of Holland of Cambridge. The cause was brought to a hearing before the king and council, on the 21st of June, 1634. Sergeant Thynne, who was retained for Oxford, showed that no archbishop had visited that university by his own right; but Gardener, the recorder of London, who was retained for Cambridge, could not say quite so much for that university; inasmuch as, in the reign of Richard, when the doctrines of Wycliffe prevailed much in both universities, Thomas Fitz-Alan, alias Arundel, then primate of England, did visit Cambridge jure metropolitano, and Cambridge submitted to the visitation, whereas Oxford resisted it forti manu. Fitz-Alan appealed to the king, and Richard declared the right of visitation to be in the archbishop. This decision was adopted by Henry IV., and confirmed afterward by parliament; but then Oxford was named in the act, and Cambridge was not. It appears to have been proved, however, that no archbishop of Canterbury, since the beginning of the fifteenth century, had ever visited either university jure metropolitano. But after much talk Laud had his will, and, "plumed thus in his own feathers, all black and white, without one borrowed from Cæsar, he soared higher than ever."

The intriguing Williams, bishop of Lincoln, and ex-lord keeper, was not only still alive, but a sort of favorite with the people on account of his unquestionable talent, eloquence, and address, his munificence, his hospitality, and his harsh treatment by the court, which had induced him, like many others, to lean to the side of the patriots. At the instigation of his lord and master, Buckingham, this prelate had helped Laud over the first difficult steps of church promotion, and Laud had assured him that his life would be too short to requite his lordship's goodness. But when Laud rose, and Williams declined, the former hated the latter as the only churchman and statesman that was likely to check his absolute dominion. The intensity of this feeling on the part of Laud was a tribute to or acknowledgement of the abilities and savoir faire of Williams. He dragged the ex-lord keeper into the Star Chamber,[1] for, in addition to his former ground of enmity, Williams had published a tract entitled, "The Holy Table," in which he lashed with much wit and some learning Laud's love for high altars, &c., and he had, moreover, refused to surrender his deanery of Westminster, which the primate would at one moment have accepted as a peace-offering, because, lacking the deanery, Williams would have had no pretexts for his frequent visits to London, and the primate, by a high exercise of his authority, could have kept him to his diocese among the fens of Lincolnshire, far away from court and the resort of public men and politicians. "Would he have quitted his deanery, perhaps he might have been quiet;"[2] but Williams had lost his old pliability, and his indignation against Laud made him bold. After a series of iniquitous and arbitrary proceedings on the part of Laud, his servant Windebank, and his master Charles, who threw witnesses into prison to make them swear what they wanted, brow-beat the judges, and removed Chief Justice Heath, putting in his place one "who was more forward to undo Lincoln than ever the Lord Heath was to preserve him;" a compromise was effected, chiefly by the means of Lord Cottington, who, though he had no great love for the Bishop of Lincoln, had a very cordial hatred to the Archbishop of Canterbury, for coming between him and the white staff. The business was made the easier by the king's great want of money, and his indifference as to the modes of obtaining it. Cottington, as the result of his negotiation to save the ex-lord keeper from entire ruin, told Williams that he must part with £4000, with his deanery, and two commendams. Williams did not object to the money, but he stickled about the preferments. Cottington returned to court, and then to the disgraced bishop with new terms, that is, that he should pay another £4000 in lieu of surrendering the deanery and the commendams. The bishop held up his hands in amazement at it. "But you will lift your hands at a greater wonder," said Lord Cottington, if you do not pay it;" and he consented to "satisfy the king." The money was paid wholly or in part, and in return a royal pardon was proffered to Williams, who hesitated at accepting it, because it contained a statement of offenses of which he held himself to be entirely innocent. Taking advantage of this circumstance, Laud worked afresh upon the king, who, without restoring the money he had received for a free and full pardon, allowed of a new prosecution

[1] Before star-chambering Williams, Laud indirectly got a bill filed against him for betraying the king's counsels, but the charge was so frivolous, that it was thrown out by the privy council. At this juncture, Williams made an humble submission, and presented a petition to the king, who promised that this accusation should be quashed; but Charles afterward permitted it to be made one of the charges against him in the Star Chamber process.—Life of Williams.

in the Star Chamber. Williams was there charged with tampering with witnesses in order to procure evidence favorable to his cause.[1] (The court and the archbishop had not merely tampered with witnesses to elicit evidence unfavorable to the accused, but had also imprisoned witnesses, threatened them with ruin, and menaced the judges;[2] and there was not a scoundrel sitting in the Star Chamber but must have known these notorious facts.) On the ninth day of the proceedings, Cottington, who had forsaken Williams probably from a fear of consequences, stood up and said, that the bishop had sought and wrought his own overthrow; that he was sorry so great a person, so wise and so well experienced a man, and one who had sat on the judgment-seat of the Star Chamber himself, should now come to be censured for foul crimes, undue practices, heinous attempts, and foul faults in his agents and servants, who were countenanced, maintained, and set on by his instigation; and then, proceeding to sentence, Cottington proposed that Powel should be fined £200, and Walker, Catlin, and Lunn, other servants or agents of the bishop, £300 a-piece. "And," said this gentle friend in conclusion, "for my Lord Bishop of Lincoln, I fine him at £10,000 to the king, and to be imprisoned in the Tower during his majesty's pleasure, and to be suspended from all his ecclesiastical functions, both ab officio et beneficio; and I refer him over to the High Commission Court to censure him as they think fit."[3] After Finch, Sir John Bamston, Secretary Windebank, Sir Thomas Germine, the Lord Treasurer (Bishop Juxon), and the three noble earls of Lindsey, Arundel, and Manchester, had spoken in the same sense, most of them paying a compliment to Williams's abilities, learning, and high rank in church and state, but not one of them recommending any diminution of his punishment, the triumphant Laud stood up and delivered a speech, which has justly been characterized as one of the most detestable monuments of malice and hypocrisy extant.[4] He expressed his deep sorrow that such a man as my Lord Bishop of Lincoln should come to stand there culpable of such faults, and then continued:—"When I look upon and consider his excellent parts, both of nature and achieved unto by study and art; when I think upon his wisdom, learning, agility of memory, and the experience that accompanies him with all those endowments, it puts me to a stand, that, after he had been overtaken in one error in the first cause, he should not have recalled himself, and made a stand, but that he hath now run into a far worse and more desperate one in this cause, by obnoxious and criminal ways, even to a very precipitation and downfall of himself and his credit. What though there was some question made, and some proofs on foot, whereby his loyalty to the king his master seemed to be in dispute, and his discretion might have some ways come to trial in matter of words, discovering his affection in some matter of state: must he seek unlawful means to procure his actions and words to be lawful, and leave the course of a good conscience, to bolster up a fancy of innocency in another man, and make himself plainly faulty, for to make another man free from shame?" He openly declared that this new offense was Williams's not submitting in silence to the accusations laid against him. When St. Cecilia was charged unjustly with many things, and all the stream and current was quite against her, she called no one to prove her innocence, but used the saying of holy Job, testis meus est in cœlis, my witness is in heaven,—and so, said Laud, ought the Bishop of Lincoln to have done. "I am sure," continued the primate, "if the circumstance of his behavior had been more temperate and mixed with more patience, the event could not have been so unlucky, and his censure so sharp, as it is now likely to be. I may be bold to say it, my lords, for it is no untruth;—I have been five several times upon my knees to the king, my master, in his behalf; I delivered for him several petitions myself into the king's own hand; and I then did that which, had I known what now I do, I should not have done—I sent him, under my own hand, the king's answer upon every petition. And after all those five several services, I must tell you, my lords, I was but coarsely dealt withal, nay, very ill requited."[1]

He assured the Star Chamber that many ill-disposed persons had boldly given out that Williams had not committed any fault whatever, "only that he was rich, and must be let blood, and the king wanted £10,000 or £12,000." "But," continued Laud, "howsoever these reports go, the king is just as he is honorable." The primate proceeded to quote and distort the Mosaic books of Leviticus, Exodus, and Deuteronomy, St. Paul's Epistles, the laws of the twelve tables, the councils of the Roman church the canon laws, St. Augustine, and other authorities to prove the enormity of Williams's offense of tampering with witnesses, which, in plain English, was not an offense provided for by the statutes. But according to Laud, whose logic and language were worthy of the cause he was pleading,—"he that is a tamperer this way is guilty of no small crime, doing at the same time wrong to three of the greatest persons in the world, viz., to God, to the king, to the innocent." He compared Williams's delinquencies to the devilish practice and leading piece of impiety set on foot by Jezebel—which odious practice "was not rooted in human nature, but took its birth from hell"—and he concluded his very long speech by saying that he should therefore agree with my Lord Cottington, and the rest that went before him, for the fine of £10,000 to his majesty, for the imprisonment in the Tower during the king's pleasure, for the suspension from

[1] During the iniquitous process other charges were introduced, and Williams was particularly accused of "undue practicing, to gain a sight of some examinations kept in the council chamber, by the clerks of the council;" of "preparing and instructing witnesses by the said examinations," &c.

[2] When Williams asked Lord Finch, one of his judges, why he had so used an old acquaintance, Finch replied, "he had been soundly chidden by his majesty, and would not destroy himself for any man's sake."

the exercise of his ecclesiastical function, and for turning Williams over to be proceeded against in the High Commission Court.[1]

The Bishop of Lincoln, who had reveled in the good things of the church, who had been a whole diocese in himself, was forthwith shut up in the dismal state prison, and the agents of government, among whom, by special appointment, was a furious enemy, were let loose to fell his timber, to kill his deer, to consume his stores, and to sell his movable property for payment of his enormous fine. But this was not revenge enough for the large stomach of Archbishop Laud, who wanted to change suspension into deprivation, imprisonment into deportation. He held that there was ground enough for this commutation in Williams's tract of "The Holy Table;" but the attorney-general was of a different opinion, and this course was abandoned. Soon after, Laud got possession of some private letters from Osbaldeston, the learned master of Westminster school, which letters were addressed to the Bishop of Lincoln, and contained much scurrilous abuse of the "little urchin," the "vermin and meddling hocus-pocus"—terms which Laud maintained could apply only to himself. Upon the evidence of these letters, or rather of the archbishop's interpretation of the offensive passages, the Star Chamber sentenced Osbaldeston to deprivation and branding, and to stand in the pillory with his ears nailed to it in front of his own school; but the poor schoolmaster was fortunate enough to escape the search of the officers, and he left a note to say that he was "gone beyond Canterbury." All the wrath of the primate fell, therefore, upon Williams, who was condemned to pay a further fine of £8000.

The licensing of all new books was in the power of Laud. There was nothing new in this; Milton had not yet written his glorious argument in defense of unlicensed printing; the liberty of the press, which was not established in reality till long after, had scarcely entered as an idea into the head of any one; and the archbishops of Canterbury had long been considered censors by right of their spiritual dignity and office. But what was really new was Laud's method of exercising this function. Hitherto many works, not strictly in accordance with the views of the high-church party and of the court, had been permitted by indolence, or indifference, or connivance to go abroad into the world. Now, on the contrary, such strictness was used, that nothing could pass the press without the approbation of Laud, or of his substitutes and dependents. The printers finding that their business was almost destroyed by the tediousness, uncertainty, and severity of this censorship, bethought themselves of employing their types in reprinting old books of divinity, and works already licensed by former archbishops. But Laud would allow of neither new nor old without his imprimatur, and against some of the old books he had a particular spite; and he procured from the Star Chamber, which was now set above all law and all reason too, a decree: "That no person shall presume to print any book or pamphlet whatsoever, unless the same be first licensed, with all the titles, epistles, and prefaces therewith imprinted, by the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London, and within the limits of either university by the chancellor or vice-chancellor thereof; upon pain that every printer so offending shall for ever be disabled to exercise the art of printing; and shall suffer such further punishment as to this court or the High Commission shall be thought fitting. That before any books imported from foreign parts shall be exposed to sale, a true catalogue thereof shall be presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London. And that no officers of the customs shall deliver any foreign books out of their hands before those bishops shall have appointed one of their chaplains, or some other learned man, with the master and wardens of the company of stationers, or one of them, to be present at the opening of the packs or fardels, and to view the same. And if in this search there happen to be found any schismatical or offensive books, they shall be brought to the aforesaid bishop or the High Commission office, that the offenders may be punished. That no person whatsoever shall imprint beyond the seas, or import from thence, any English books, or whereof the greater part is English, whether formerly printed or not. And that no books whatsoever shall be reprinted, though formerly licensed, without a new license first obtained, upon pain of like censure and punishment. And that if any person whatsoever, that is not an allowed printer, shall presume to set up a press for printing, or work at any such press, or set and compose letters for the same, he shall be set in the pillory, and whipped through the city of London."[1] There was one particular book which had gone through various editions, and which all zealous Protestants loved and, perhaps, esteemed next to their Bible; it was a book giving striking and in many instances exaggerated accounts of their countrymen who had suffered on the rack and at the stake for conscience sake; it was a book full of horror and excitement—abounding with the most frightful pictures of papal persecution—the "Acts and Monuments," more commonly called the "Book of Martyrs," of the Puritan Fox. This book was unsavory to Laud on many accounts, and forthwith he struck it with his fiat that it should be printed no more. At the same time he refused new licenses to Bishop Jewel's works, and to other books formerly printed by authority.[2] Divinity and law had suffered the most degrading punishments and the mutilation of the hangman's scissors, in the person of Leighton and Prynne, and now, while one of those sufferers was to pass through fresh tortures, the other faculty was to be struck in the person of Bastwick, a physician. In Trinity Term, 1637, this Dr. Bastwick, together with Prynne, still a prisoner in the Tower, and Henry Burton, a bachelor in divinity, was prosecuted in the Star Chamber for writing and publishing seditious, schismatical, and libelous books against the hierarchy of the church, and to the scandal of the government. The defendants drew up their answers in writing, but their counsel were backward to sign them, for fear of offending the Court of Star Chamber; but it was said on the other side that their answers were so violent and of such a nature that their counsel disapproved of them in toto. The details we have given of preceding cases will have sufficiently explained the course of Star Chamber proceedings. We may therefore pass at once to the sentence, which was—"That each of the defendants should be fined £5000; that Bastwick and Burton should stand in the pillory at Westminster, and there lose their ears; and that Prynne, having lost his ears before by sentence of this court, should have the remainder of his ears cut off, and should be branded on both cheeks with the letters S. L., to signify a seditious libeler." These execrable barbarities were all publicly performed on the 20th of June, the hangman rather sawing than cutting off the remainder of Prynne's ears; and then they were sent to solitary confinement in the castles of Launceston (in Cornwall), Lancaster, and Carnarvon.[1] The king was told that not less than one hundred thousand persons had gathered together to see Burton, the minister, pass by, and that much money had been thrown to his wife, who followed him in a coach: but Charles would not be warned. As Prynne went through Chester, on his way to Carnarvon castle, one of the sheriffs with several other gentlemen met him, and conducted him to a good dinner, defrayed his expenses, and gave him some coarse hangings or tapestry to furnish his dungeon at Carnarvon. Money and other presents were offered but refused by Prynne. Laud forthwith dispatched a pursuivant to bring the sympathizing sheriff up to London.[2] The three captives were afterward removed out of the way of their friends to the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, and Scilly; "the wives of Bastwick and Burton not being allowed, after many petitions, to have access unto them, nor to set footing in the island; neither was any friend permitted to have access to Mr. Prynne."[3]

A.D. 1638. About six months after the punishments above described, John Lilburne and John Warton were Star-Chambered (the practice had become so prevalent that people had made a verb for it), for the unlawful printing and publishing of libelous and seditious books, entitled "News from Ipswich," &c. The prisoners both refused to take an oath to answer the interrogatories of the court, Lilburne saying that no free-born Englishman[4] ought to take it, not being bound by the laws of his country to accuse himself. His offense was aggravated in the estimation of the court in consequence of Laud's recent prohibitory decree against printing without his license. Upon the 9th of February the Star Chamber ordered that, as the two delinquents had contemptuously refused to take the oaths tendered to them, they should be remanded to the Fleet prison, there to remain close prisoners, and to be examined; and that, unless they yielded to take the said oaths, they should be proceeded against for contempt, on the Monday following. Upon the 13th of February they were again brought to the bar of the Star Chamber, and still continuing in their former obstinacy, their lordships adjudged and decreed that Lilburne and Warton should be sent back to the Fleet, there to remain until they conformed themselves,—that they should pay £500 a-piece, as fines, for his majesty's use,—and, before their enlargement, find good sureties for their good behavior. "And," continued the sentence, "to the end that others may be the more deterred from daring to offend in the like kind hereafter, the court hath further ordered and decreed that the said John Lilburne shall be whipped through the streets from the prison of the Fleet unto the pillory, to be erected at such time and in such place as this court shall hold fit; and that both he and Warton shall be set in the said pillory, and from thence returned to the Fleet."[1] To make the whipping the longer, and to have the punishment performed near to the court which had decreed it, the pillory was placed between Westminster Hall gate and the Star Chamber; and to that point Lilburne was smartly whipped all the way from his prison. But this enthusiast had a spirit which was not to be subdued by the scourging of his body. "While he was whipped at the cart, and stood in the pillory, he uttered many bold speeches against tyranny of bishops, &c.; and, when his head was in the hole of the pillory, he scattered sundry copies of pamphlets (said to be seditious), and tossed them among the people, taking them out of his pocket; whereupon the Court of Star Chamber, then sitting, being informed, immediately ordered Lilburne to be gagged during the residue of the time he was to stand in the pillory, which was done accordingly; and, when he could not speak, he stamped with his feet, thereby intimating to the beholders he would still speak were his mouth at liberty."[2] The Star Chamber, moreover, ordered that Lilburne "should be laid alone,

[1] "The main scope of their libels," said Laud in the Star Chamber, "was to kindle a jealousy in men's minds, that there are some great plots in hand; dangerous plots (so says Mr. Burton expressly) to change the orthodox religion established in England, and to bring in I know not what Romish superstition in the room of it: as if the external decent worship of God could not be upheld in this kingdom, without bringing in of popery." When the atrocious sentence was pronounced the primate thanked the lords "for their just and honorable censure upon these men, and for their unanimous dislike of them, and defense of the Church."—Rushworth.

[2] No doubt Laud had the gags ready; for Prynne, Bastwick, and Burton, while suffering their punishment, had addressed the people, "who cried and howled terribly, especially when Burton was cropped." In writing to the Lord Deputy Wentworth, the primate says:—"What say you to it, that Prynne and his fellows should be suffered to talk what they pleased while they stood in the pillory, and win acclamations from the people, and have notes taken of what they spake, and those notes spread in written copies about the city; and that, when they went out of town to their several imprisonments, there were thousands suffered to be upon the way to take their leave, and God knows what else. . . . . You observe most rightly that these men do but begin with the church, that they might after have the freer access to the state; and I would to God other men were of your lordship's opinion, or, if they be so already, I would they had some of your zeal, too, for timely prevention; but, for that, we are all too secure, and will not believe there is any foul weather toward us till the storm break upon us."—Strafford Letters.

with irons on his hands and legs, in the ward of the Fleet, where the basest and meanest sort of prisoners are used to be put;" and that the warden should prevent his getting any books, letters, or writings, or his seeing any of his friends; taking care at the same time to note who the persons were that attempted to visit him, and report their names to the board. On the same day the Court of Star Chamber prayed and required his majesty's attorney and solicitor general to take strict examination of John Lilburne, prisoner in the Fleet, touching his demeanor and speeches during the time of his whipping and standing in the pillory. When the prisoner had endured, for some time, close confinement in the innermost and most unhealthy part of the prison, borne down by the weight of his double irons, a fire broke out in the Fleet near to the place where he lay. Either out of pity for his sad case, or out of real fear, the citizens who lived in the narrow street outside the Fleet, and the prisoners within, said that, in his fury and anguish, he had become desperate, and had set fire to the prison, in the intention of being burned with it; and the prisoners within, all cried, "Release Lilburne, or we shall all be burnt;" and, running to the warden, they made him remove him out of his hole; and the fire was quenched, and he was put into a place where he had some more air. We shall soon meet John Lilburne again.

While these transactions were spreading horror and disgust through England and Scotland, fresh religious alarms were excited by a mysterious negotiation with the court of Rome, and the arrival of Gregorio Panzani, an envoy from the Vatican, who was courteously received by Charles and his queen, by Lord Cottington (a Catholic in disguise), and by Secretary Windebank. Panzani had frequent interviews with Montague, and some others of the bishops; but Laud cautiously kept away from these conferences, which are said to have turned almost entirely on the possibility of reuniting the Anglican and Roman churches. The Italian had a very limited commission, and, as an acute and observing man, it was not difficult for him to perceive the insuperable obstacles which existed in the resolute opinions of the English people. He soon returned to Rome; but two accredited agents to the queen, Rosetti, an Italian priest, and Con, a Scotch priest, arrived, and were entertained at London. At the same time Henrietta Maria sent an agent of her own to reside at Rome. And though proselytism, which the queen ever had much at heart, made no progress among the people, it was otherwise with the court gentry, among whom several sudden conversions were witnessed and paraded. Not only were the old penal laws allowed to sleep, but fresh favors and indulgences were daily shown to the Catholics,—not out of toleration, for that blessed spirit would have prevented Charles from persecuting the Protestant sectarians, but as a tribute paid to the still increasing influence of the queen, and to the slavish devotion to the crown professed by the members of the old church, who, however, may be forgiven by liberal minds for preferring a despotism with some religious freedom to an alliance with the Protestant patriots, who would allow them neither this blessing, nor a share, as English citizens, in the great boon of civil liberty.

By this time Laud had accumulated upon himself a burden of hate heavy enough to crush any man; but his bosom friend Wentworth is not much behindhand with him, having been as tyrannical in state matters, as Laud had been in ecclesiastical. From the moment of his apostasy, his rise, or, as it has been rather happily called, his "violent advancement," was most rapid. President of the North, a privy councilor, baron, and viscount,—"the Duke of Buckingham himself flew not so high in so short a revolution of time."[1] But if his promotion was rapid, his devotion to the principle of despotism, his activity, his boldness, and, for a time, his success in serving the government as Charles wished to be served, were all extreme. There was no post in England which offered so large a field for tyranny and lawlessness as that of the presidency of the Council of the North; and there never was a man put in it so apt to take the full range of the power it conferred as Thomas Wentworth. The Council of the North, an offspring of blood and tyranny, was first erected by Henry VIII. after the suppression of the great insurrection of the northern provinces, known by the name of the Pilgrimage of Grace. This council had a criminal jurisdiction over all Yorkshire and the four more northern counties, in cases of conspiracies, riots, and acts of violence. It had also, in its origin, a jurisdiction in civil suits, or at least the faculty of deciding causes, when either of the parties litigating was too poor to bear the expenses of a process at common law. But, as far back as the time of Elizabeth, the judges had held this latter authority to be illegal. Indeed the lawfulness of the whole tribunal, which was regulated at the arbitrary will of the court, expressed in instructions under the great seal, had always been very doubtful; and, unless it was pretended to exclude that important part of England from the benefits of that great national act, it had become more problematical than ever since the passing of the Petition of Right. But, heedless of these considerations, Wentworth immediately began to enlarge the jurisdiction of his court; and he was seconded by the king, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the privy council. In 1632, he got a commission empowering the Council of the North to hear and determine all offenses, misdemeanors, suits, debates, controversies, demands, causes, things and matters whatsoever therein contained, within certain precincts,—that is to say, in the whole country from the Humber to the Scottish border. Nor did the despotic commission end here. The council, or rather Wentworth, was appointed to judge certain offenses, according to the course pursued by the Star Chamber, whether provided for by act of parliament or not; also to hear complaints like the Court of Chancery, and stay proceedings at common law by injunction; and also to attach persons in any part of the realm. It has been fairly observed that the soliciting or procuring such inordinate powers as these, and that, too, by a person so well versed in the laws and constitution of his country, was of itself ground sufficient for an impeachment. But Wentworth not only obtained these powers, but abused them when he had got them, to gratify his own pride and lust for domineering, or to strike terror into the hearts of the party he had abandoned, and of all who sought to oppose arbitrary measures. He ruled like a king, and like a despotic king, uncontrolled by parliaments or laws, and his name became a word of terror through all the north. Several of his prosecutions of gentlemen of rank and influence, were personally vindictive, and carried on with a most rancorous spirit. But where his pride was not irritated, where the prerogative was not questioned, or where money was not wanted, he managed affairs with honor and ability. In 1633, without resigning the presidency of the North, he obtained the still more important and unchecked post of Lord Deputy of Ireland. Dublin was as much better a field for such a man than York, as York was better than London. The ordinary course of affairs in Ireland was in the main, lawless and absolute. Even in times when the sovereign professed more reverence for the laws and constitution, the Irish people were treated by the lord deputies in much the same fashion in which the rayah subjects of the Turkish empire were treated by the pashas. It was in Ireland chiefly that Wentworth raised himself to that bad eminence which is now as everlasting as our annals and language: and yet, in spite of all his dark deeds, his government was for a time in some respects advantageous to the country. Before his arrival there were hundreds of tyrants, but where Wentworth was, there could be no tyrant save himself: his bold and grandiose despotism swallowed up all smaller despotisms. He put down at once the oppressions and malversations of his subordinates; and in the offices of government and the whole administration of affairs, where there had been nothing but a chaotic confusion, he introduced and maintained something like order. His keen eye detected at once several of the causes which had contributed to make Ireland an expensive burden rather than a profit to the English crown. It had long been the practice to consider that country in the light of a new-discovered land inhabited by savages, or as a colony of measureless extent, with the faculty of expanding itself by encroaching on the backwoods or territories occupied by the natives. Whenever the sovereign was at a loss for the means of paying some service or gratifying some favored petitioner, he took up his pen and drew a grant of crown lands in Ireland (a sort of property never very nicely defined), or he granted a patent, a monopoly, or a military commission for the same country, where there was as yet no patriotic band to resist these abuses. Wentworth represented to his master that the Irish people were thus kept in such a state of poverty that it was impossible to hope that they should enrich his exchequer, and he obtained a promise from Charles that no more Irish grants should be given without his consent or advice. But the king could do nothing in a plain, straightforward way. He entertained the applications of the Duke of Lennox, the Earl of Arundel, and other noble courtiers: he had evidently promised them what they asked for in Ireland, and then he told Wentworth that, if there was any thing to be denied, he might do it, so that he (the king) "should have thanks howsoever."[1] And, shortly after, Secretary Windebank had occasion to write to the lord deputy that he must be content to take upon himself "the refusing part."[2] Wentworth refused in the same determined style in which he did every thing else, thereby making himself many enemies among the great, who praised the generous intentions of the king, and threw the whole blame of their disappointment upon his arrogant lieutenant; but, at the same time, he improved the resources of the country, so that, by these and other means, he was enabled to pay off the debts of the crown, and eventually even to remit some sums of money to the English exchequer. He saw, however, from the beginning, that little or nothing could be done without calling together an Irish parliament: and, confident in his own powers of intriguing, imposing, and domineering, he ventured to recommend that measure to his master as one of expediency, and which, under his management and control, would be perfectly harmless. His arguments were put with great skill and force; but he encountered some difficulty in obtaining the consent of Charles, who now hated the very name of parliament. "As for that hydra," writes the king, "take good heed; for you know that here I have found it as well cunning as malicious. It is true that your grounds are well laid, and I assure you that I have a great trust in your care and judgment: yet my opinion is, that it will not be the worse for my service, though their obstinacy make you to break them, for I fear that they have some ground to demand more than is fit for me to give. This I would not say if I had not confidence in your courage and dexterity, that, in that case, you would set me down there an example what to do here."[3]

[3] Strafford Letters. Of the arguments used by Wentworth to persuade the king to permit the calling of the Irish parliament, that which had the most weight with the king was, that if the parliament, when called, did not vote its money freely, and behave submissively in all things, it could be summarily dissolved, and then its misconduct might be a good cover to whatever arbitrary proceedings Charles might please to institute. Or, in Wentworth's own words, "then their unthankfulness to God and the best of kings becomes inexcusable before all the world, and the regal power more warrantably to be thereafter extended for redeeming and recovering your majesty's revenues thus lost, and justly to punish so great a forfeit as this must needs be judged to be in them."—Ib. It will be understood that both the king and the lord deputy wanted nothing of parliament but its money. It was agreed between them that two sessions should be held; that the first should be given entirely to the service of his majesty, and then, in the second, such acts and graces might be passed as seemed to his majesty and his attorney-general proper and fitting, and not likely to prejudice the crown. "And if," says Charles, in a letter to Wentworth, "they will not proceed or be satisfied with our royal promise for the second session, or shall deny

Wentworth omitted no arts, no cajolery, promises, or threats, to prepare beforehand for a submissive assembly. He told some of the leading men that it was absolutely in their power to have the happiest parliament that ever was in that kingdom; that nothing was wanting thereunto but their putting an absolute trust in the king, without offering any condition or restraint at all upon his royal will. The bronze-faced renegade, who had himself made the loudest thunder that had been heard in the English House of Commons, bade them take warning by the fate of that House, and be wise by others' harms. They were not ignorant, he said, of the misfortunes these meetings had run in England of late years, and therefore they were not to strike their foot upon the same stone of distrust, which had so often broken them.[1] Even his admiring friend, Archbishop Laud, appears to have blushed at this daring piece of effrontery. Wentworth, however, obtained his object in a promise that no bills should be introduced but such as were agreeable to him; and he then opened the parliament with royal pomp, delivered a speech which might have served Milton as a model for the harangue of the proud Lucifer himself, and forthwith demanded and obtained the extraordinary grant of six subsidies. When the second session came, in which the parliament were to debate upon the grievances of the country, they were cut short ab initio, taunted, reviled, menaced, by the man who had made them solemn promises in the king's name, and by the king's express orders, but who, by his commanding person and manners, and overwhelming eloquence, made them appear like criminals before an inflexible and upright judge, and hold their timid tongues. He was not backward in claiming his reward for these very acceptable services; he wanted to change his viscountship for an earldom, and applied to his master, "not only primarily but solely, without so much as acquainting anybody with it." Charles acknowledged "that noble minds are always accompanied with lawful ambition;" but he would not give him what he asked for; and the reason for his refusing is as clear as it is characteristic of the king: he wished his lord deputy to bear the whole odium of deceiving and tyrannizing over the parliament; and, therefore, he abstained from hastening to honor his true and accepted servant. If Wentworth's mad ambition, and his enjoyment in the present possession of arbitrary power, had permitted him to reflect upon these things and upon the mind of his master, as partially disclosed in his letters,[2] he must inevitably have foreseen his own fate; but he went on as he had begun, sharpening the ax for his own neck, whenever it should suit Charles to deliver him up as a sacrifice. He was so elated by his success, so doubly confident in his faculty of managing and controlling the parliament, that he suggested it might be useful to prolong the existence of that assembly beyond a second session; but here he utterly failed in convincing the king, who told him that "parliaments are of the nature of cats—they ever grow cursed with age; so that, if ye will have good of them, put them off handsomely when they come to any age; for young ones are ever most tractable."[1]

Charles and his lieutenant, not satisfied with refusing any more grants of the crown lands in Ireland, suddenly laid claim to all the lands in the province of Connaught. It was maintained that this great province had fallen to the crown through the forfeiture of an Irish rebel, as far back as the reign of Edward IV. Since that time it had been granted out in parcels by patents, which the occupants and the courts of law also long considered to be good titles in all respects. James had listened to the tempting arguments of his crown lawyers, who undertook to demonstrate that the said patents were worth nothing, and that all Connaught was his; but he had not ventured upon the experiment of actually seizing it. Nor was it the design of his son to take absolute possession of all the province; it was rather to frighten men out of their money, by making them believe that they held their property by an insecure tenure. The men of Connaught were told that they must produce their titles, and surrender them, when proved defective, to the king's majesty, who, upon such terms as he might choose, would grant them valid titles to their property. The lord deputy, who had told Charles that he had made him as absolute a king in Ireland as any prince in the whole world could be,[2] proceeded, at the head of a commission, to hold an inquisition in each county of Connaught. Beginning at Roscommon, he summoned a jury purposely composed of "gentlemen of the best estates and understandings," in order that more weight might be given to their decisions, if favorable to the crown, or that they might "answer the king a round fine in the Castle Chamber," if their decisions were not such as were wished for. These gentlemen were instructed beforehand, that it would be best for their own interests to return such a verdict as his majesty desired, since he was able to establish his right without their consent, and wished only to settle the cause on a proper basis intending graciously to reinvest them legally with what they now held unlawfully. These threats, and the artful and imposing eloquence of Wentworth, who, when the counsel had spoken, always summed up himself, prevailed in the counties of Roscommon, Sligo, and Mayo; but in county Galway, which was almost entirely occupied by Irish and Catholics, a jury stood out manfully against the crown, and, as Wentworth expressed it, "most obstinately and perversely refused to find for his majesty." The lord deputy, who had not threatened without a resolution to execute his threats, forthwith levied a fine of £1000 on the sheriff, for returning so improper a jury, and he dragged all the jurymen into the Castle Chamber, which was his Star Chamber, where they were condemned in fines of £4000 a-piece. He then endeavored to bring about the destruction of the Earl of Clanrickard and of other great proprietors of the county; to seize the Fort of Galway; to march a good body of troops into the county, and take possession of the estates of all such as were not ready to comply with the king's will.[1] Some of these suggestions, and the mode proposed for carrying them into execution, were detestable, but Charles hastened to express his cordial approbation of them. The Galway propriotors, who were certainly not aware of this fact, for they had been by Charles's management induced to believe that the harshness proceeded, not from him, but from the malice and tyranny of his lieutenant, sent over agents to represent their case to his majesty. Charles received them at Royston, and met their complaints with reproaches, telling them how undutiful they had been; and, in the end, he sent them back to Ireland as state prisoners. Old Clanrickard, whose virtuous and high-minded son had headed the deputation, died a few weeks after these tyrannical proceedings. "It is reported," says Wentworth, in a letter to his master, "that my harsh usage broke his heart: they might as well have imputed unto me for a crime his being threescore and ten years old." He had already fallen upon the Earl of Cork, who was obnoxious to him by reason of his great reputation for wisdom and experience in the state business; and he pursued the Lord Wilmot. It was one of the avocations of the primate of the English church to make espials or watch the impressions made at court by these proceedings, and to report to his friend whatever was said against him. At this time there was a loud murmur at Whitehall; and things "were somewhat loudly spoken by some on the queen's side." Laud, in making this report, after praising Wentworth's wise and noble proceedings, said.—"And yet, my lord, if you could find a way to do all these great services, and decline these storms, I think it would be excellent well thought of."[2] But the lord deputy would not be warned; and if he looked to the line of conduct which was actually pursued by the archbishop in England, he must have seen an example at variance with Laud's recommendation of leniency and moderation. Lord Mountnorris, vice-treasurer of Ireland, after enjoying for a brief space the friendship of Wentworth, incurred his high displeasure, which blighted every object upon which it chanced to fall. The vice-treasurer was accused of extortion and corruption; but Wentworth and his creatures could not make good this charge. A gouty foot, and some hasty words stood him in better stead. It chanced that a relation of Lord Mountnorris, in moving his stool, struck Wentworth's gouty member, and that the accident was spoken of at the table of Loftus, the chancellor. "Perhaps," said Mountnorris, "it was done in revenge; but he has a brother who would not have taken such a revenge." For these hasty words, which were repeated by some spy, Mountnorris was proceeded against as a "delinquent in a high and transcendent manner against the person of his general and his majesty's authority." As he held a commission in the Irish army, it was resolved to try him by a court-martial, over which Wentworth presided as commander-in-chief. This court sentenced his lordship to be cashiered, to be publicly disarmed, and then to be shot. It was not the intention of the lord deputy to take his victim's life in this manner; he only wanted to grind him to the dust—to humiliate him by making it appear that he owed his life to his enemy. He recommended the prisoner to the royal mercy, and Charles remitted the capital part of the sentence. But Mountnorris was kept a close prisoner, separated from his wife and children, stripped of all his offices and emoluments, and treated in other respects with the greatest harshness. The case excited much dissatisfaction in England and even in the council-chamber; but the king silenced the murmurs of his ministers and courtiers, and gave his approval to all that had been done. But the tale of infamy is not yet complete. Strafford wanted Mountnorris's place of vice-treasurer for Sir Adam Loftus, and, knowing that such patronage was generally sold, he placed £6000 in the hand of his friend, Lord Cottington, who was to distribute it in those quarters where it would prove the most effectual. "I fell upon the right way at once," said Cottington, in return; "which was, to give the money to him that really could do the business—which was the king himself: and this hath so far prevailed, as, by this post, your lordship will receive his majesty's letter to that effect; so as there you have your business done without noise: and now it rests that the money be speedily paid, and made over hither with all expedition. For the king hath already assigned it in part of twenty and two thousand pounds for land, which he hath bought in Scotland."[1] Soon after this precious transaction, Wentworth came over to pay a visit to court, where his master received him with open arms, but where the Earl of Holland and the queen's party were intriguing to bring about his overthrow. After visiting his presidency of the North, he returned to Dublin, to lengthen and darken the list of his iniquities. Wentworth, though long passed the heyday of youth, was a notorious libertine; and one of the victims of his seduction was the daughter of Loftus, the lord chancellor of Ireland, the wife of Sir John Gifford. Sir John claimed from his father-in-law, the chancellor, a large settlement on his wife and her children. The chancellor refused. Thereupon Wentworth offered the dishonored husband the resources of his Star Chamber, and the head of the law in Ireland was brought into the Castle Chamber at the suit of Gifford. That board decided against the chancellor, who challenged its authority, and maintained that the cause ought to be tried in the ordinary courts of law. As Wentworth was well aware of the existence of powerful enemies in court and country, as his connection with the lady, the wife of the plaintiff, was no secret, it might have been expected that he would have been glad to let this delicate matter drop; but any opposition to his arbitrary will blinded him to all considerations of danger or shame. He represented to his master that this was pernicious contumacy; and Charles, who had a wonderful reverence for Star Chamber tribunals sent him what he wished, which was an order to take the seals from Loftus, to turn him out of the council, and to throw him into a prison until he should submit to the award. The lord chancellor, who was a very old servant of the crown, appealed to Charles, but without any effect, and, to regain his liberty, he complied with the award of the Castle Chamber, and made his submission to the man who had first seduced his daughter, and then sought to enrich her by forcing money from her parent. The outcry was now tremendous, but, loud as it was, Wentworth deafened the king's ear to it by constantly urging the licentiousness of the people's tongues and their proneness to censure all such as were by the will of God placed in authority over them. He made it a merit in the eyes of his master that he was so unpopular, which he said arose solely from his contending to establish and enforce his majesty's authority. "And," wrote he to the king, "while my heart tells me I am therein guided by a perfect will and zeal, nay, indeed, a necessity imposed upon me so to do, I am able, without amazement, to hear myself reported, nay, cried out aloud in the streets, to be the outrageous, where verily I take myself to be the patient—and that entirely for the service of my master."

[2] In the very letter in which Charles refuses to gratify Wentworth with the earldom, he says; "I must tell you, that your last public dispatch has given me a great deal of contentment, and especially for keeping of the envy of a necessary negative from me, of those unreasonable graces that that people expected from me."—Strafford Papers.

Wentworth proposed making a settlement on a grand scale in Connaught, where the lands, which had been seized for the crown, were to be occupied by a very obedient and thoroughly orthodox (in Laud's sense) set of English, if such could be found; but there were several serious obstacles to this scheme, and before he could make much progress in it, the civil war broke out in England. He, however, made a beginning to plantations in Ormond and Clare, and this Laud declared to be a marvelous great work for the honor and profit of the king, and safety of that kingdom. It appears, however, that Wentworth's tyranny, both in religious and civil matters, made the English and Scottish emigrants, who were all Dissenters, prefer the wilds of America to the pleasant banks of the Shannon; for the archbishop adds, "but I am sorry to read in your letters that you want men extremely to fill that work; and this is the more considerable a great deal that you should want men in Ireland, and that the while there should be here such an universal running to New England, and God knows whither; but this it is when men think nothing is their advantage but to run from government. As for your being left alone in the envious and thorny part of the work, that's no news, at least to me, who am forced to the like here, scarce a man appearing where the way is rough indeed."[1]

[1] Strafford Letters.

There were reasons enough for this want of men; and, as if they were not powerful enough, the lord deputy began a crusade against the Presbyterians established in Ulster. It will be remembered that a very unsuccessful attempt had been made to colonize that great province in the time of Elizabeth. It is an anomaly, but quite certain that James met with better success in the same enterprise. Soon after the flight of the great Earl of Tyrone, the brave O'Dogherty, the leader of the insurgents. was driven back to the bogs and mountains, where he was killed by a chance shot. His followers thereupon dispersed; and nearly the whole of the country, or two millions of acres, was declared to be the lawful prey of the crown. This enormous tract of land was separated into lots or portions, varying from two thousand to one thousand acres each. The larger lots were reserved for undertakers, or adventurers of capital from England and Scotland, and for the military and civil officers. The smaller lots were divided among these and the Catholic natives of the province (the last-named class, it should appear, got very little; but the undertakers or capitalists, at least according to Wentworth, had generally taken to themselves more land than was specified in their patents). It was wisely regulated that the Scotch and English colonists should occupy the hilly country and all the strong positions, and thus isolate and gird in the native Irish, who were to have their allotments in the plains; but this scheme was widely departed from in practice, as the settlers naturally preferred the fertile soil of the plains to the moors and morasses of the mountains. Several of the native chieftains were allowed to retain possesion of the poor and hungry country, but some hundred thousand acres were planted by the new comers, who were chiefly Scotch, and who, not less by their prudence than their bravery, kept the province in a tranquil state. Now Wentworth, who was called by Laud a glorious champion of the church, and who was resolved to make all Ireland as conformable as England, fiercely interfered with the kirk of these spirited, industrious, and bigoted colonists, threw many of their elders into prison, and banished many of their ministers who would not conform to what they considered an idolatrous form of worship. These preachers returned to their parent hive in Scotland, whence there soon issued such a swarm as darkened the sun of the House of Stuart.

These high doings of Wentworth were greatly to the satisfaction of Laud, who in fact had approved and applauded every part of the arbitrary system pursued in Ireland. The two congenial despots. in their close correspondence, had established a cant term to express briefly the system so dear to both. It was the word "Thorough"—a proper word to express their thorough-going proceedings![1] "For the state," writes the primate, "indeed, my lord, I am for thorough; but I see both thick and thin stays somebody, where I conceive it should not, and it is impossible to go thorough alone."[2] In another letter Laud says, "I am very glad to read your lordship so resolute, and more to hear you affirm that the footing of them that go thorough for our master's service is not upon fee, as it hath been. But you are withal upon so many ifs, that by their help you may preserve any man upon ice, be it never so slippery. . . . . I am certain it is; if we grow not faint, if we ourselves be not in fault, if we come not to a peccatum ex te, Israel, if others will do their parts thoroughly, as you promise for yourself, and justly conceive of me. Now, I pray, with so many and such ifs as these, what may not be done in a brave and noble way? But can you tell when these ifs will meet, or be brought together? Howsoever, I am resolved to go on steadily in the way which you have formerly seen me go; so that (to put in one if too), if any thing fail of my hearty desires for the king and the church's service, the fault shall not be mine." In another place the archbishop writes, "As for my marginal note, I see you decipher it well,[1] and I see you make use of it too; do so still, thorough and thorough." And pathetically lamenting, as if his own hands were tied in England, he goes on to say, "Oh that I were where I might do so too! but I am shackled between delays and uncertainties; you have a great deal of honor here for your proceedings; go on a God's name." Until this memorable correspondence and other documents, wherein they both stand committed by their own words, can be annihilated, and all memory of it and reference to it utterly effaced, it must be absurd in any historian to attempt to soften or explain away the character and intentions of Laud and Wentworth.

These two busy and stupendous personages so completely fill the stage for several years as to leave no room for the exhibition of minor performers. Their doings, in fact, constitute the history of their country for that time; the other events, in which they were not concerned, or in which they were not principal movers, may be compressed in a very narrow space. During the whole of this interval, the apparently interminable business of the Palatinate had engaged such a portion of public attention as the people of England could spare from their home affairs. From the first entrance into Germany of Gustavus Adolphus, the champion of Protestantism, the weak Frederick had adhered to the victorious Swede, who had promised to reinstate him in the Palatinate, upon condition of his holding it as a dependency and tributary of the Swedish crown. But Gustavus Adolphus ended his extraordinary career on the 6th of November, 1632, when he was killed in the battle of Lutzen, near Leipsic. The Swedes, notwithstanding his loss, gained a complete victory; but the Palatine Frederick saw in his death the ruin of all his hopes, and exclaiming, with a broken heart, "It is the will of God!" he took to his bed, and expired eleven days after at Mentz, in the thirty-sixth year of his age. In dying he expressed a faint hope that the King of England would show his fraternal affection for his widow, and be a protector or father to his children. But Elizabeth applied in the first place to the States of Holland, as her best friend next to Heaven, imploring their protection for herself and her orphans; and the States continued to her the same pensions they had paid to Frederick. Charles sent over the Earl of Arundel to condole with his sister, and then to proceed on a mission to the emperor. Elizabeth was indignant at what she called her brother's meanness of spirit, and she predicted that Arundel's mission, which was to intercede for the restoration of the Palatinate to her innocent children, would be altogether fruitless: and so indeed it proved. The English cabinet then entertained a strange scheme for finding principalities for two of the Palatine's children on the coast of Africa and in the Caribbean seas: the eldest son, Prince Charles Louis, was to take possession of the Island of Madagascar; his brother, Prince Rupert, whose name was afterward written in English blood, was to found a colony in the West Indies. The two princes, it is said, entered readily into the project, but Elizabeth scornfully rejected it, saying that she would have no son of hers go about as a knight-errant.[1] Soon after this Charles rejected a treaty proposed by Cardinal Richelieu, in which a leading clause was the restitution of the Palatinate to his nephew, and was well nigh forming an alliance with Spain and Austria against the Dutch, his sister's only friends. In the year 1635 he, for the first time, invited into England Charles Louis and Rupert, whose conduct and behavior, particularly in church-time, was closely watched by Archbishop Laud, for their father had been hated on account of his Calvinism or Puritanism, and it was suspected that the taint was strong upon his children.[2]

In the same year the Dutch in league with the French invaded Flanders by land, and infested Dunkirk by sea. It should appear that some of the Flemish plotters, upon the failure of their secret negotiations with his English majesty, had bargained with the United Provinces; but the Dutch were very odious to the common people of Flanders on account of their religion, and both they and the French troops behaved so insolently that the country people rose against them and drove them out, while the English fleet "persuaded powerfully the Hollanders to remove from before Dunkirk."[3] In the month of December, shortly after the arrival of the princes Charles Louis and Rupert, when Henrietta Maria was delivered of a second daughter, the States "sent hither to congratulate her majesty a solemn embassy and a noble present."[1] "Some supposed that they did it to ingratiate themselves the more with our king, in regard his fleet was so powerful at sea; and they saw him resolved to maintain his right and dominion there."[2] But it was not a compliment and a present of this kind that could make up the differences between Charles and the Dutch, or between the Dutch and the English people; for the latter felt that the massacre at Amboyna, and other injuries, had not yet been avenged, and there was an old and increasing jealousy about the Hollanders fishing in their waters, and almost monopolizing the profitable trade in herrings,—circumstances which could hardly have arisen except from their own inferiority as fishermen, their want of industry and enterprise, or the want of a proper navy to protect them.[3] For a time the Dutch had paid a certain sum yearly, even to King James, for the privilege of taking herrings off the Scottish coast, but they had now not only ceased to make these payments, but had encroached in other places, and had attempted to establish as a point of international law that the seas and every part of them, wherever salt water flowed, were free to them and other nations, without any limitations as to coast-lines, &c. In this sense they had employed the great publicist Grotius to write his "Mare Liberum," a treatise against the claims of the English to exclusive rights over certain seas, which was published in 1634. Our great Selden took up his pen and answered Grotius, in his treatise (published in 1635), entitled "Mare Clausum," wherein he labored to establish the British right of dominion over the narrow seas, a right which had been asserted ever since the time of the united Saxon monarchy. But this was a question not likely to be settled by the pens even of great writers; and in the following year, 1636, Charles, who, by means presently to be described, had got together a fleet, gave the command of sixty sail to the Earl of Northumberland,[4] who seized and sunk a few of the Dutch busses in the northern seas, near to the Scottish coast.

[2] Laud says in his Diary, "December 25, Christmas Day, Charles Prince-Elector received the communion with the king at Whitehall; he kneeled a little beside on the left hand; he sat before the communion on a stool by the wall, before the traverse, and had another stool and a cushion before him to kneel at."

It is evident that the young elector knew the archbishop's consequence, and endeavored to win his favor.

After this assertion of dominion over the circumjacent seas, the States hastened to acknowledge the right of our island over its own friths, bays, and shores, and agreed to pay Charles £30,000 a-year for liberty to fish there. In the same year, Captain Rainsborough sailed with a small squadron to the Barbary coast, where, being assisted by the Emperor of Morocco, he destroyed the shipping and town of Sallee, whence daring pirates had been accustomed to watch the mouth of the Straits of Gibraltar, and even to extend their depredations to the English coast. By a secret engagement Charles's fleets were to coöperate with the naval forces of the King of Spain, ostensibly only for the protection of Spanish commerce;[1] not, however, until the King of Spain should procure from the emperor the removal of the ban upon Charles's nephew, the Prince Palatine; but this engagement was not performed on either part. In the month of February, 1637, the emperor, Ferdinand II., the inveterate enemy of the Palatine Frederick, departed this life, and was succeeded by Ferdinand III., who, it was imagined, might be more favorably disposed toward the outcasts. Therefore, Charles again dispatched the pompous Earl of Arundel into Germany, "where he stayed and treated some months about the restitution of the king's nephew, the Prince Elector; but, being opposed by the Duke of Bavaria, who had gotten possession of part of the Palsgrave's territories, and by others after their interest, and being discontented at the delays they put upon him in the treaty at the Diet, the ambassador, without taking any leave, or effecting any thing for which he was sent, returned home in much distaste and choler."[2] To free himself from the importunities of his nephews, who had now been nearly two years in England, Charles gave them £10,000, with his permission to make war in whatever manner they might think fit for the recovery of their inheritance.[3] The young men sailed to Holland with the assistance of Lord Craven, who was chivalrously attached to their mother—still the Queen of Hearts—raised an insignificant force, and threw themselves into Westphalia, where there remained about two thousand Swedish veterans still in arms against the emperor. When the princes' mercenaries joined the Swedes, they gained a few trifling advantages; but they were driven from their siege of Lippe, and in their retreat were intercepted by the imperial general, Hatzfeldt. Charles Louis, the elder brother, fled like a selfish coward, abandoning his friends on the field; but young Rupert gave proof of that fiery courage which the soldiers of the English parliament afterward experienced to their cost; he fought till victory and escape were alike hopeless, and then he would have died rather than surrender his sword, if it had not been for Lord Craven. Charles Louis, the elector, was arrested some time after, as he was attempting to pass in disguise through France; and Cardinal Richelieu, with very little regard to his quality and high connections, shut him up in the castle of Vincennes. That great master of his craft, before their hare-brained expedition into Westphalia, had endeavored to drag the English into a war with Spain, and the emperor into an alliance offensive as well as defensive with France; and Charles, who was apt to be transported with sudden passion, and who never had any fixed system of foreign policy, in his first rage at the failure of the earl-marshal's negotiations in Germany, gave ear to the charmer. He thus unbosomed himself to his oracle, Wentworth:—

"Upon Arundel's return, I have perceived that directly which heretofore I have much feared, to wit, the impossibility of restoring my sister and nephews, by fair means, at least without threatening. This has made me fall in with France in a strict defensive league (the treaties are not yet ratified by France, but I make no question of their ratifying of them): and if we and the confederates (namely, Denmark, Sweden, and the States) can agree both how and what to ask, upon refusal, or so long delay as, upon agreement set down, we shall account as ill as a denial, we are jointly to proclaim the House of Austria, with all their adherents, our enemies. But I have professed that all my warfare must be by sea and not by land. What likelihood there is, that upon this I should fall foul with Spain, you now may see as well as I; and what great inconvenience this war can bring to me, now that my sea contribution is settled, and that I am resolved not to meddle with land armies, I can not imagine, except it be in Ireland; and there too I fear not much, since I find the country so well settled by your vigilant care: yet I thought it necessary to give you this watchword, both to have the more vigilant eye over the discontented party, as also to assure you that I am as far from a parliament as when you left me."[1] The lord deputy, who was cool, and who saw farther than his master, was greatly alarmed at this warlike note: he fondly flattered himself that, when they should have perfected their scheme—gone "thorough" in England, Scotland, and Ireland—the sinews of war might be levied to any amount; but he wisely felt that this time was not yet come, and he wrote a long and very able letter to convince Charles of the danger of a premature war. To his friend Laud he spoke more frankly of his own personal danger, and of that of the lord archbishop himself. "A war," he said, "will necessarily put the king into all the high ways possible, else will he not be able to subsist under the charge of it: and if these fail, the next will be the sacrificing of those that have been his ministers therein. I profess I will readily lay down my life to serve my master—my heart should give him that very freely; but it would something trouble me to find even those that drew and engaged him in all these mischiefs busy about me themselves in fitting the halter about my neck, and in tying the knot sure, that it should not slip, as if they were the persons in the whole world the most innocent of guilt, howbeit in truth as black as hell itself, and on whom alone the punishment ought to lie."[2] In his dissuasive letter to the king he once more unequivocally stated his scheme of absolute government. He told his majesty, that the judges, in declaring the lawfulness of ship-money, had performed the greatest service, but still the crown would stand only on one leg, unless his majesty could get the like power declared for the raising of a standing army, and this he thought might be effected and won from the subject in time of peace only. "I beseech you," continues this artful reasoner, "what alliance is there, that should divert a great and wise king forth of a path which leads so manifestly, so directly, to the establishing his own throne, and the secure and independent seating of himself and posterity in wealth, strength, and glory, far above any their progenitors, verily in such a condition as there were no more hereafter to be wished them in this world, but that they would be very exact in their care for the just and moderate government of their people, which might minister back to them again the plenties and comforts of life; that they would be most searching and severe in punishing the oppressions and wrongs of their subjects, as well in the case of the public magistrate as of private persons; and lastly, to be utterly resolved to exercise this power only for public and necessary uses; to spare them as much and often as were possible; and that they never be wantonly vitiated or misapplied to any private pleasure or person whatsoever? This being indeed the very only means to preserve, as may be said, the chastity of these levies, and to recommend their beauties so far forth to the subject, as, being thus disposed, it is to be justly hoped they will never grudge the parting with their moneys."[1] These arguments were unanswerable; they pointed out the gentlest and surest way of reconciling men's minds to a specious despotism: Charles took them to his heart, and replied coldly to Richelieu's pressing instances. The cardinal, who knew his character and intentions, and who was perfectly well aware of the resistance he was likely to encounter, tempted Charles by the offer of French assistance to subdue the mutinous spirit of his subjects, an offer which Charles wisely declined. "The king and queen of England," said Richelieu, "will repent this rejection before the year is at an end." But the Spanish ambassador, who had obtained an inkling of these secret negotiations, came forward with new delusive promises about the Palatinate, and Charles remained firm to the advice of Wentworth.[2]

We may now pass to the more proximate causes of the great civil war,—the arbitrary levying of ship-money, the iniquitous trial of Hampden, and the enforcing of the reading of the Book of Common Prayer in Scotland. Noy, the turncoat and attorney-general, who, according to Clarendon, "was wrought upon by degrees by the great persons that steered the public affairs to be an instrument in all their designs, turned his learning and industry to the discovery of the sources of revenue, and to the justifying of them when found,—thinking that he could not give a clearer testimony that his knowledge in the law was greater than all other men's, than by making that law which all other men believed not to be so. So he molded, framed, and pursued the odious and crying project of soap, and with his own hand drew and prepared the writ for ship-money; both which will be the lasting monuments of his fame."[1] In hunting among the old records the attorney-general found that, not only had the sea-port towns been occasionally made to furnish ships for the service of the crown, but that even maritime counties had, in early time been called upon to do the same; and that, though few, there were instances of the like demands being made upon inland places. With the assistance of the Lord Keeper Coventry, who highly approved of the project, he induced the king to require this aid of his subjects, as a right inherent in him, and wholly independent of the parliament. And, having set on foot this arbitrary demand, Noy died almost immediately, without proposing the extreme lengths to which this scheme was subsequently carried.[2] The first writ was issued by the lords of the council "for the assessing and levying of the ship-money against this next spring," on the 20th of October, 1634. It was signed by the king, and addressed to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, and to the sheriffs and good men in the said city and in the liberties thereof. It began by reciting that, "Because we are given to understand that certain thieves, pirates, and robbers of the sea, as well Turks, enemies of the Christian name, as others, being gathered together, wickedly taking by force and spoiling the ships, and goods, and merchandises, not only of our subjects, but also of the subjects of our friends in the sea, which hath been accustomed anciently to be defended by the English nation; and the same, at their pleasure, have carried away, delivering the men in the same into miserable captivity: and forasmuch as we see them daily preparing all manner of shipping further to molest our merchants, and to grieve the kingdom, unless remedy be not sooner applied, and their endeavors be not more manly met withal; also the danger considered, which, on every side, in these times of war do hang over our heads, it behooveth us and our subjects to hasten the defense of the sea and kingdom with all expedition or speed that we can; we willing, by the help of God, chiefly to provide for the defense of the kingdom, safeguard of the sea, security of our subjects, safe conduct of ships and merchandises to our kingdom of England coming, and from the same kingdom to foreign parts passing; forasmuch as we, and our progenitors, kings of England, have been always heretofore masters of the aforesaid sea; and it would be very irksome unto us if that princely honor in our times should be lost, or in any thing diminished."[3] The writ went on to say that this charge of defense, which, concerned all men, ought to be borne by all, as had been done before; yet, considering that they, the citizens of London, were most interested in maritime commerce, and got more plentiful gains by it, they were chiefly bound to set to their helping hand; the king, therefore, commanded them to prepare and bring forth before the 1st day of March one ship of war of 900 tons, with 350 men at the least; one other ship of war of 800 tons, with 260 men at the least; four other ships of war of 500 tons, with 200 men for each; and another ship of war of 300 tons, with 150 men. They were further ordered to supply these said ships with guns, gunpowder, spears, and all necessary arms, with double tackling, and with provisions and stores; as also to defray at their charges for twenty-six weeks the men's wages and all other things necessary for war. The common council and the citizens humbly remonstrated that they conceived that, by their ancient liberties, charters, and acts of parliament, they ought to be freed from any such charges; but the privy council scorned their remonstrance, and compelled them to submit. At the beginning of the following year, 1635, the writs, after being served along the sea-board, were sent into the inland counties, with very comprehensive instructions signed by Laud, Juxon, Coventry, Cottington, and the rest of the privy council. Money was asked for instead of ships, at the rate of £3300 for every ship; and the local magistrates were empowered to assess all the inhabitants for a contribution. They were to deal lightly with the poor, and this for a very obvious reason.[1] The sheriffs were enjoined to regulate the payments so as to be most equal and agreeable to the inhabitants of their counties; but, when any person refused or neglected to pay, they were without delay to execute the writ, causing distresses to be made, and their goods to be sold for payment of their assessments and the just charges arising therefrom. If any constables, bailiffs, or other officers, refused or neglected to do their duties on the people, they were to bind them over to answer for it, and to commit them to prison if they refused to give bond or bail. His majesty had not made up his mind whether his clergy should be taxed or not, but was pleased that, for the present, they should be assessed for this service, but with great care and caution. The sheriffs were told that, in case of the constables or ordinary municipal officers not doing their duties, they (the sheriffs) were to do theirs, using such instruments as they liked best. They were not to hope, as some of their predecessors had done, that what they left unlevied during the year of their shrievalty would fall upon others,—his majesty being resolved not to put upon the successor the burden of his predecessor's neglect; but that all such sums as were left unlevied should be levied upon themselves. The money collected was to be paid from time to time.

[2] "The libeling humor was also continued after the death of William Noy, the king's attorney-general, the greatest and most famous lawyer of that age; for, after his decease (who departed this life the 9th of August this year, 1633), papers were put upon posts reflecting on him, that, his body being opened, there was found in his head a bundle of proclamations, in his maw moth-eaten records, and in his belly a barrel of soap."—Rushworth.

[1] "For," says the document, "his majesty takes notice that, in former assessments, notwithstanding the express order given in our letters to ease the poor, there have been assessed toward the service poor cottagers, and others who have nothing to live on but their daily work, which is not only a very uncharitable act in itself, and grievous to such people, but can admit no better construction than that it was done, out of an adverse humor, of purpose to raise clamor and prejudice the service." at London, to the treasurer of the navy, who would give receipts and discharges for the same.[1]

But all this gilding of the pill could not make people swallow it; and many, especially of the gentry, expressed great discontent at this new assessment, as an imposition against law and the rights of the subject.[2] For a time, however, all opposition was overpowered or intimidated by the bold front of the government. The deputy lieutenants of Devonshire wrote to the council in behalf of some inland towns, that they might be spared from this tax, which they called a novelty; they were dragged up to London, and severely reprimanded for what the council considered their impertinent interference. The people in some of the little seaports on the Sussex coast absolutely refused to pay ship-money, but they submitted when they found that extensive powers had been given to the sheriffs, and that their goods would be seized. This was at the first blush of the experiment; but when it was carried out and tried all over the country there did not appear, for a short time, any more strenuous and courageous resistance. The timid knew that to remonstrate, however respectfully, was to incur persecution,—such had been the course pursued during the whole reign; the unthinking multitude of people in easy circumstances looked at the smallness of the amount demanded from them, and considered it not worth the trouble and certain expense of a dispute with the government,—not reflecting that the present attempt was but a gentle feeling of the public pulse, an experiment to ascertain how the people of England would part with their money at the call of the crown without consent of parliament. In this sense, to a thinking patriot, a sixpence ought to have been as important as a thousand pounds; and many men presently viewed the case in its true light. In several places actions were brought against those who had forcibly collected the ship-money; and the judges of assize, who had been instructed to inculcate the duty of submission, were not listened to with much respect. Then Charles demanded from the twelve judges an extra-judicial opinion, in order that he might have the appearance of proceeding according to law. The case was submitted to them in these words:—"When the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, whether may not the king, by writ under the great seal of England, command all the subjects of our kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such a number of ships, with men, victuals, and munition, and for such time as we shall think fit, for the defense and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger and peril, and by law compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness? And whether, in such case, is not the king the sole judge both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided?" It appears that two of the judges were doubtful as to the point whether the king should be sole judge of the danger, but the rest started no difficulty of any kind, and, in the end, they unanimously returned an answer in the affirmative to every part of the royal question. It is said that the king obtained this opinion from the judges by declaring that it was merely for his own private satisfaction, and not meant to be binding or to be published; but it was forthwith, and by his order, read publicly in the Star Chamber (now the center of all business) by the Lord Keeper Coventry. Yet this publishing of the opinion of the judges of the land rather provoked than quieted resistance. Richard Chambers, that courageous London merchant, who had already suffered so much in the good cause, had brought an action against the lord mayor for imprisoning him on account of his refusal to contribute. The mayor had pleaded the king's writ as a special justification; and the plaintiff had been refused a hearing by Berkley, one of the judges of the King's Bench, who had declared that there was a rule of law and a rule of government, and that many things which might not be done by the rule of law might be done by the rule of government; and he would not suffer the point of legality of ship-money to be argued by Chambers's counsel. Charles, and Laud, and Wentworth would have canonized such an upright judge as this—who afterward declared, in a charge to the grand jury of York, that ship-money was an inseparable flower of the crown. But foul and arbitrary as was the judgment-seat, there was one, a wealthy English gentleman, of the true old Saxon stock, that was resolute to face it and expose it, and, thereby, aided by his own importance in the country, and by troops of friends entertaining the same high notions, to bring the whole question to issue. This man was the immortal John Hampden, one of the few living gentlemen of England that could trace their family in an unbroken line from the Saxon times. He was born in 1594, and in his infancy succeeded to his father's immense estates, situated chiefly in the county of Buckingham. He studied at Oxford at a time when Laud was Master of St. Johns, and then in the Inner Temple, where he made himself acquainted with the common law. His mind was well stored with literature, his manners refined, his person and countenance impressive and handsome. Even from the testimony of his bitterest enemies he may be safely set down as one of the most accomplished gentlemen of that time, as one whose great moral courage was accompanied by a most winning amiability of temper. When a mere stripling he had the good sense to despise honors and titles, which then flowed from such a sullied source, and to overrule the silly vanity of his mother, who yearned to see him made a lord,[1]—a promotion then (as his mother ought to have known, for it was in King James's time) attainable only through money or a base favoritism. In 1619 Hampden married a young lady of a good family in Oxfordshire, to whom he was ever tenderly attached; and, shunning the city and the court, he led the enviable life of a country gentleman, endeared to his tenantry and to all his neighbors, amusing himself with his books and field sports. But, in 1621, when the whole nation was indignant at the disgraceful government of James, and when that sovereign was compelled, by want of money, to meet the parliament, Hampden took his seat in the House of Commons as member for Grampound, then no rotten borough, but a place of some wealth and importance. It was at the same time that that "great, brave, bad man," Wentworth, first entered the House of Commons; and being then, or pretending to be, like Hampden, most zealous for the reform of abuses, and for securities against the encroachments of the prerogative, the two ancient-descended wealthy commoners became associates and friends. Wentworth was the more confident, boldly spoken, and eloquent of the two, and from the first he spoke frequently in the House: Hampden had a cooler judgment, and the better sagacity; he was less eloquent, a great deal less confident, and for a long time he spoke rarely and briefly, modestly attending to learn the duties of a parliamentary life, and working industriously in the committees. At the same time he cultivated the closest intimacy with the learned Selden, the indefatigable and daring Pym, the undaunted Eliot, and other men of that stamp. If, as a school, it was not perfect, this was certainly one of the most favorable and noble of schools for the training of a young patriot. In the parliament of 1624 Hampden again took his seat for Grampound. In 1625, when Charles summoned his first parliament, he was returned for the borough of Wendover, a town in the neighborhood of his paternal estates, which had just before recovered its right, partly through his own exertions, to be represented in the House of Commons. The enlargement of the representation about this time will be treated of elsewhere.

In the next parliament, which met after Buckingham's enterprise against Cadiz, Hampden was again returned for Wendover; and he was engaged on several of those memorable committees which shook both the favorite and the king. On the breaking up of that parliament, when Charles set on foot his forced loan, Hampden resolutely refused to contribute; and, on being asked why, he made this curious and striking reply:—"That he could be content to lend, as well as others, but feared to draw upon himself that curse in Magna Charta which should be read twice a-year against those who infringe it." The privy council, refusing his own recognizance to appear at the board, sent him a close prisoner to the Gate-House. After appearing before these willing tools of despotism, and refusing again to pay his money without warrant of parliament, he was relegated to one of his manor-houses in Hampshire. But in 1626, made more conspicuous by his sufferings in the cause of liberty, Hampden again took his seat for Wendover, and was one of the most important debaters and committee men during that most important and stormy session. He was associated with Selden, Pym, St. John, and the veteran Coke, in the management of several bills, and he was put upon nearly all the committees. In 1628, when the reforming party was indignant at the desertion of Wentworth, Noy, and others, Hampden took his seat again, and became more conspicuous in parliament than he had ever been before. He was now in his thirty-fifth year, in the prime and vigor of manhood; and the country had learned to consider him as a champion that no tyranny could intimidate, that nothing could corrupt or turn from his high purposes. At the end of that short session, he saw his friends Eliot, Selden, Hollis, and others committed to the Tower. Hampden again retired into private life, looking forward with a confident hope for the day when the despotic principle should be carried to its excess, and when the patriotic band should awake like giants refreshed by a long sleep, and crush the hydra for once and forever. From his pleasant, rural solitude in Buckinghamshire, he corresponded with his "honored and dear friend, Sir John Eliot, at his lodging in the Tower;"[1] and he performed almost the part of a father by the captive's two sons. He returned to the studies of his earlier life, and more particulurly to those of constitutional law and history. Foreseeing the inevitable consequences of Charles's proceedings, he made himself familiar with the works of the great Italian historians, who had treated like soldiers and statesmen, as they were, the convulsions and campaigns that had occurred in Italy, in France, in the Low Countries. "He was," says Sir Philip Warwick, "very well read in history; and I remember the first time I ever saw that of Davila of the Civil Wars of France, it was lent me under the title of Mr. Hampden's Vade Mecum." He also frequented the Lord Falkland's house at Tew,—"that college situate in a purer air,"[2]—for the high-minded Falkland and Hampden, whose names are coupled in an immortal verse, were then near and dear friends, wishing alike for the improvement of government both in church and state. At Tew, Hampden was wont to meet, among other distinguished men, the learned, witty, and original Dr. Earles, fellow of Merton College; Dr. Morley,[3] afterward the excellent Bishop of Winchester; and Dr. Hales, the Greek professor of Oxford, who was still more distinguished by his rare spirit of gentleness and toleration than by his great learning. "Nothing troubled him more than the brawls which were grown from religion; he therefore exceedingly detested the tyranny of the church of Rome, more for their imposing uncharitably upon the consciences of other men, than for the errors in their own opinions; and would often say that he would renounce the religion of the church of England to-morrow if it obliged him to believe that any other Christian should be damned; and that nobody would conclude another man to be damned who did not wish him so."[1] To men of this temper and taste, the persecution then so actively carried on by Laud must have appeared most odious and unwise.

[3] "Dr. Morley," says Clarendon, "was a gentleman very eminent in all polite learning; of great wit and readiness. . . . . He had fallen under the reproach of holding some opinions which were not then grateful to those churchmen who had the greatest power in ecclesiastical promotions; and some sharp answers and replies he used to make in accidental discourses, and which, in truth, were made for mirth and pleasantness sake (as he was of the highest facetiousness), were reported and spread abroad to his prejudice; as, being once asked by a grave country gentleman (who was desirous to be instructed what their tenets and opinions were), what the Arminians held, he pleasantly answered, that they held all the best bishoprics and deaneries in England; which was quickly reported abroad as Mr. Morley's definition of the Arminian tenets."—Life.

In 1634, Hampden lost his beloved wife, and his mind, which had always been of a religious turn, became more serious and devout under the pressure of affliction. He was taxed with Puritanism, as were all men who entertained liberal opinions in politics, or who disliked the new church ceremonies, and the inquisitorial proceedings of the primate; but though he had to act with fanatics, he was a stranger to fanaticism in his own heart. When Charles demanded ship-money, Hampden resolved to make a bold and decisive stand, and he refused payment of what he maintained was an illegal tax. He had taken advice in this great business from Holborne, St. John, Whitelock, and others of his legal friends, as to the means of trying the issue at law. Encouraged by his example, thirty other freeholders of his parish, of Great Kimble, in Buckinghamshire, refused payment. Almost as soon as the opinion of the judges on the legality of ship-money was recorded, the crown lawyers were ordered by the king to proceed in the Court of Exchequer against Hampden, as the chief defaulter. The point in law was argued in Michaelmas Term, 1637, on the part of Hampden by Oliver St. John and Robert Holborne—on the part of the crown by the attorney-general, Sir John Bankes, of Corfe Castle, and the solicitor-general, Sir Edward Littleton. The cause began on the 6th of November, and lasted to the 18th of December. All the judges were present, and particularly argued this great point on the bench. According to the courtiers, this was a miserable stir about twenty paltry shillings—for this, and no more, was the sum demanded from Hampden; but the men who loved their country looked to it as the manly assertion of a great and holy principle, as the weightiest cause that could be decided between the sovereign and the people. The crown lawyers insisted on ancient precedents from the Saxon times downward, and they dilated upon the fairness and lightness of the impost and the pittance demanded from the wealthy Mr. Hampden. It was urged, that if he were too highly assessed he might call the sheriff in question. "But," they continued, "the sheriff of Bucks is rather to be fined for setting him at so low a rate as twenty shillings. We know what house Mr. Hampden is of, and his estate, too. For any thing we know it might as well be twenty pounds."[2] On the other hand, Hampden's council maintained that the law and constitution of England had sufficiently provided for the defense of the kingdom without the novelty of ship-money. There were, for example, the military tenures, which bound a considerable part of the kingdom to military service at the charge of the possessors of estates; there were the Cinque Ports and other towns, some of them not maritime, held by an analogous tenure, and bound to furnish ships or men; there were the aids and subsidies voted by parliament; there were the king's certain revenues, the fruits of tenure, the profits of various minor prerogatives, and other means and resources bestowed by the constitution on the sovereign, and which were all applicable to the public service and defense of the realm; and there were, moreover, the customs levied on merchandise, which, it appeared, ought to be more especially applicable to maritime purposes,[1] and which, as all men knew, had been augmented far beyond ancient usage. "Of the legality hereof," says St. John, "I intend not to speak: for in case his majesty may impose upon merchandise what himself pleaseth, there will be less cause to tax the inland counties; and in case he can not do it, it will be strongly presumed that he can much less tax them." St. John went on to urge the usefulness and power of parliaments as summoned by the old sovereigns in times of danger. The kings of England, St. John observed, in moments of danger, had ever had recourse to their parliaments, and the aids demanded by them and granted by parliament were most numerous. If they had assumed the right of judging of the danger and providing for it of their own right by exacting money from the subject, this could hardly have been the case, it being "rare in a subject, and more so in a prince, to ask and take as a gift that which he might and ought to have of right, and that, too, without so much as a salvo or declaration of his right." The very asking of benevolences and loans proved that the crown possessed no general right of taxation. If it had possessed such a right it would have taxed and not borrowed. To borrow with promise to repay, or (as in the case of benevolences) to beg alms, as it were, from their subjects, was not the practice of absolute sovereigns, but of princes bound and limited by a constitution. The loans of former times had in some cases been repaid expressly to clear the king's conscience—ad exonerandum conscientiam. And that very arbitrary prince, Henry VIII., who felt it inconvenient to repay what he had borrowed, could not sit down with a comfortable mind till he had obtained from parliament acts to release him from the obligation. Hampden's advocates relied upon Magna Charta, and especially upon the Confirmatio Chartarum of Edward I., which clearly abrogated forever all taxation without consent of parliament; and they made still more account of the famous statute de Tallagio non Concedendo of Edward III. That warlike sovereign had often infringed this right of the subject, but the parliament never ceased to remonstrate, and,

[2] State Trials.

[1] St. John quoted authorities to prove that the grant of customs was principally for the protection of merchants at sea against the enemies of the realm, and against pirates, the common enemies of all nations; that these, and likewise the impositions, were for that purpose: that the aids and subsidies, and likewise the tunnage and poundage, before they were granted for life, were not only for the protection of merchants and the ordinary defense of the sea, but also for the defense thereof in times of extraordinary dangers and of invasion from enemies, as appeared by several grants of them in the parliament rolls.

in the end, the conqueror of France was obliged to conform to the law. In the second year of Richard II., when the realm was in imminent danger of a formidable invasion from France, the privy council called together the peers and other great men, who freely lent their own money, but declared that they could not provide a sufficient remedy without charging the Commons, which could not be done out of parliament, and therefore advised the immediate summoning of a parliament. This precedent was strong against the plea of peril and necessity on which the defenders of ship-money wished to make it appear that they relied. But St. John and Holborne met that specious plea more directly. They stated broadly the overwhelming force of actual war and invasion which had power to silence for the time of danger even the sacred voice of the law: they admitted that, in an invasion, or the immediate prospect of one, the rights of private individuals must yield to the safety of the whole; that the sovereign, and even each man in respect of his neighbor, might then do many things that would be illegal at other seasons. Such had been the case in 1588, when the liberties and religion of the people were put in jeopardy by the Spanish Armada. But now there was no danger; England was at peace with all the world, and the piracies of a few Turkish corsairs and the insolence of some rival states could not be reckoned among those instant perils for which a parliament would provide too late. But, after all, their great and unanswerable argument was founded, not upon precedents and rolls of ancient times, "when all things concerning the king's prerogative and the subjects' liberties were upon uncertainties,"[1] but upon the Petition of Right, which was not yet ten years old; and, as it has been well remarked, Charles himself was fully aware of the restrictions which that statute imposed when he so unwillingly but solemnly gave his assent to it and passed it into a law. By this assent he renounced all gifts, loans, benevolences, taxes, or any such-like charge without common consent by act of parliament. This was his own deed—his own contract—let the proceedings of his predecessors be what they might. It swept away all contrary precedents—it stood armed at all points against any such imposition as ship-money—its voice was so loud and clear that the meanest intellect could comprehend it. But the court lawyers thought to overlay it with words—to bury it under the weight of the late attorney-general's musty records. "I shall insist," said Sir John Bankes, "upon precedents, and herein I shall desire you to take notice that these writs have not issued out at the first upon any sudden advice, but that there was a great search made, first by my predecessor Mr. Noy, a man of great learning and profound judgment; other searches made by the king's counsel, and some others; and a great number of records were considered of, and maturely, before these writs issued; so nothing was done upon the sudden." As for invasion or imminent peril, he did not venture to assert that there was any such thing, but he said "that these writs were sent out, not in case of Hannibal ad portas, or an enemy discovered, or sudden invasion, but in case of rumors of dangers, and in that a danger might happen." He quoted instances—all very old ones—and caviled on the more modern and intelligible statutes. But this was not enough to serve their purposes, and so Bankes and his colleagues unblushingly took their stand on the position that the monarchy of England was an absolute monarchy, that the power of Charles was above all law, and statutes, and parliamentary devices. "This power," exclaimed the attorney-general, "is not any ways derived from the people, but reserved unto the king, where positive laws first began. For the king of England, he is an absolute monarch; nothing can be given to an absolute prince but what is inherent in his person. He can do no wrong. He is the sole judge, and we ought not to question him. Where the law trusts we ought not to distrust." The acts of parliament, he observed, contained no express words to take away so high a prerogative; and the king's prerogative, even in lesser matters, is always saved, where express words do not restrain it. When Charles instructed or allowed his crown lawyers to talk in this strain, he ought to have been prepared to back them with a regular army of a hundred thousand men. But Bankes was just and moderate compared to some of the judges. "This imposition," said Justice Crawley, "appertains to the king originally, and to the successor, ipso facto, if he be a sovereign, in right of his sovereignty from the crown. You can not have a king without these royal rights; no, not by act of parliament." Holborne had pleaded the constitutional doctrine and practice, that the sovereign could take nothing from the people without consent of their representatives. "Mr. Holborne is utterly mistaken therein," exclaimed Justice Berkley. "The law knows no such king-yoking policy! The law is itself an old and trusty servant of the king's; it is his instrument or means, which he useth to govern his people by. I never read nor heard that Lex was Rex; but it is common and most true that Rex is Lex." Finch, the foster-father of Noy's offspring—Finch who had brought it up to this virile state—said that there could be no doubt entertained touching the lawfulness of ship-money; or indeed of any other act of the king. "Acts of parliament," said he, "are void to bind the king not to command the subjects, their persons, and goods, and I say, their money too; for no acts of parliament make any difference." According to a courtly writer, who saw nothing wrong in these despotic pretensions, monarchy and liberty were permitted to plead at the same bar; but if it were so, it must be confessed that liberty was in many respects allowed small freedom of speech. Holborne had used that obvious argument, that, as good and just kings were not always succeeded by princes of the like nature, so it was incumbent on the people not to resign any of their rights, or over-increase the sovereign power, for fear of an evil successor. My Lord Chief Justice Finch here said, "It belongs not to the bar to talk of future governments; it is not agreeable to duty to have you bandy what is the hope of succeeding princes, when the king hath a blessed issue so hopeful to succeed him in his crown and virtues." "My lord," said Holborne, "for that whereof I speak I look far off, many ages off—five hundred years hence." And yet all the judges were not so prompt and resolute as the court wished. Even Finch and Crawley thought it decorous to prolong the discussion, and the business was dragged through the three following terms. In Hilary Term, 1638, there was an appearance of unanimity; but by Easter Term the judges differed, and Croke boldly concluded against ship-money. Croke had signed the answer to the king's question with the rest, but it was out of a fear of consequences. The loss of place was then generally attended by such persecutions as might daunt a man not constitutionally timid. The judge saw a prison for himself, poverty and want for his family, if he resisted the royal will; but his high-minded wife, who was equally aware of this danger, encouraged him to encounter it. She "was," says Whitelock, "a very good and pious woman, and told her husband upon this occasion, that she hoped he would do nothing against his conscience, for fear of any danger or prejudice to him or his family; and that she would be contented to suffer want or any misery with him, rather than be an occasion for him to do or say any thing against his judgment and conscience."[1] So long as there were English wives and mothers of this brave sort, the liberties of the country were not to be despaired of. Justice Hutton joined Croke, and when Justice Jones treated the matter somewhat doubtingly, deciding for the king, but with the condition that no portion of the ship-money should ever go to the privy purse, he manfully denied the legality of the tax, and advised that judgment should be given for Hampden. But in Trinity Term, on the 11th day of June, 1638, the attorney-general—as the sentence of the majority of the judges was still for the king—moved for judgment to be entered against Mr. Hampden; and, on the following day, judgment was entered in the Court of Exchequer.[2] The opposition, however, that had been made by two of the judges went to deepen the impression already made by the trial. The government could no longer get money from the sheriffs of counties; everywhere men took heart. "Hampden," says Clarendon, "by the choice of the king's counsel, had brought his cause to be first heard and argued; and with that judgment it was intended that the whole right of the matter should be concluded, and all other cases overruled."[3] Thus, the Lord Say, who had refused ship-money, and excited a spirited opposition in Warwickshire, was denied a trial when he asked for it. But Clarendon is fain to confess that the sentence procured against Hampden did not set the question at rest; that, on the contrary, it stirred up resistance to ship-money, or, as he expresses it—"it is notoriously known, that pressure was borne with much more cheerfulness before the judgment for the king than ever it was after." Archbishop Laud seems to have thought that this was owing to justices Croke and Hutton, who, according to him, had both "gone against the king very sourly." In writing across the water to my lord deputy, Laud says, "The accidents which have followed upon it already are these:—first, the factions are grown very bold; secondly, the king's moneys come in a great deal more slowly than they did in former years, and that to a very considerable sum. Thirdly, it puts thoughts into wise and moderate men's heads, which were better out; for they think if the judges, which are behind, do not their parts both exceeding well and thoroughly, it may much distemper this extraordinary and great service."[1]

[2] Brampton, chief justice of the King's Bench, and Davenport, chief baron of the Exchequer, had pronounced for Hampden, but merely upon technical reasons, and had joined the majority on the principal question. Denham, another judge of the same court, was more honest; being sick in his bed, he sent in a written judgment in favor of Hampden. The court majority of seven consisted of Finch, chief justice of the Common Pleas, Jones, Berkley, Vernon, Crawley, Trevor, and Weston.

The sympathizing Wentworth, it appears, thought that matters might be mended by whipping Hampden, like Prynne or Lilburne. "Mr. Hampden," says he to his dear friend the archbishop, "is a great brother;[2] and the very genius of that nation of people leads them always to oppose, both civilly and ecclesiastically, all that ever authority ordains for them. But, in good faith, were they rightly served, they should be whipped home into their right wits; and much beholden they should be to any that would thoroughly take pains with them in that sort." Nor did Wentworth become more lenient upon reflection; for he says again, "In truth I still wish Mr. Hampden, and others to his likeness, were well whipped into their right senses. And, if the rod be so used that it smart not, I am the more sorry."[3]

The court crowded a vast deal of tyranny and cruelty into the interval of time between the opening and closing of this trial, but it did not venture to scourge and mutilate the English gentleman who was now regarded as Pater Patriæ, and as the pilot who must steer the vessel through the tempests and rocks that threatened it.[4] At the same time Hampden's prudence and moderation, which are highly praised by all his cotemporaries, of whatsoever party, prevented his giving any hold to the arbitrary council, who longed at least for an opportunity of committing him to the Tower, where his honored and dear friend, Sir John Eliot, was wearing out in sickness the last years of his life. But no prudence, no moderation, no virtue, could at all times be a shield against such men as Wentworth and Laud, and their master Charles: and it is said that Hampden determined to leave England. Numbers of the English people with their persecuted ministers had had settled in the wilderness of Connecticut, where, notwithstanding the edicts of the primate, which went forth to the ends of the world, they hoped to enjoy religious liberty. Lord Say and Lord Brooke were the original projectors of a great scheme of emigration, and they had consulted respecting it with their friend Mr. Hampden. He, no doubt, suspected, what has since been proved, that the government was watching its moment and studying how it best might crush him; and though we have very great doubts that he ever intended any thing more than a short absence, it is stated, that Hampden, with Haselrig, and his own kinsman Oliver Cromwell, over whom he possessed great influence, and in whom, under an appearance of coarseness and extravagance, he had detected great talents and all-mastering energy, got every thing ready to join the pilgrim fathers in America. Nay, it is even said in this very striking, and generally received story, that these gentlemen had actually embarked, and were lying with seven other ships filled with emigrants, in the Thames, ready to make sail, when the court, jealous of the departure of so many subjects, issued a proclamation[1] forbidding any more to leave England without the royal license; and followed up this proclamation with an order in council, authorizing the lord treasurer to take speedy and effectual course for the stay of eight ships, now in the river of Thames, prepared to go to New England, and for "putting on land all the passengers and provisions therein intended for the voyage." This order, it is said, was executed in the very nick of time, and so Haselrig, Hampden, and Oliver Cromwell remained in England, and with them remained the evil genius of the House of Stuart. We confess that we have some doubts as to the whole of this story, which is not mentioned by Whitelock, who was a relation of Hampden, nor by Rushworth, nor indeed by any cotemporary writer of that party: and we are inclined to think that the question, if not quite, has almost been set at rest by an acute and spirited biographer of our own day.[1]

But by this time the storm had arisen in the north. The new service book was sent out at the beginning of the year 1637, and appointed to be read in all Scotch churches from the Easter Sunday, as the only form of prayer his majesty thought fit to be used. The Scots maintained that the sovereign could not impose a liturgy without consent of their own parliament, and their murmurs were so loud that the experiment was put off from Easter to Sunday the 23d of July, when the Dean of Edinburgh began to read the book in St. Giles's kirk, which had been recently converted by Laud into a cathedral church. The people, fully prepared, had gathered in crowds from many parts. The archbishops and bishops, the lords of session, and the magistrates were all present by command. No sooner had the dean opened the service book and begun to read out of it than the people filled the church with uproar,

[1] There are two proclamations to this effect in Rymer. One is dated the last day of April, 1637, and entitled,—"A proclamation against the disorderly transporting his majesty's subjects to the plantations within the parts of America." In this document his majesty complains that great numbers of his subjects have been, and are every year, carried to America, and "there settle themselves, some of them with their families and whole estates, among which numbers, there are also many idle and refractory humors, whose only or principal end is, to live as much as they can without the reach of authority." His majesty was also anxious to keep at home such people as could pay taxes, and was "minded to restrain, for the time to come, such promiscuous and disorderly departing out of the realm, and doth therefore straightly charge and command all and every the officers and ministers of his several ports in England, Wales, and Berwick, that they do not hereafter permit, or suffer, any persons, being subsidy men, or of the value of subsidy men, to embark themselves in any the said ports, or the members thereof, for any of the said plantations, without license." The second proclamation, which is much more simple, is dated the 1st day of May, 1638.

clapping their hands, uttering execrations and outcries, raising a hideous noise and hubbub. The Bishop of Edinburgh, who was to preach that day, stepped into the pulpit, which was immediately above the reading-desk, and tried to appease the tumult by reminding them of the holiness of the place; but this increased the storm instead of allaying it, and presently a joint-stool was thrown at the bishop's head, but diverted by the hand of one present—luckily diverted—for, though thrown by the arm of a woman, it was thrown with such vigor, that the general opinion was, that had it hit him, supposing his skull to be only of ordinary thickness, the stool must have killed the bishop. Sticks, stones, dirt followed the stool, with cries of "Down with the priest of Baal!" "A pape, a pape!" "Antichrist!" "Thrapple him!" "Stone him!" The Archbishop of St. Andrew's (Lord Chancellor), and other great persons then attempted to restore order, but they had no reverence from the multitude, who cursed them, together with the bishop and dean. Then the provost, the bailies, and others of the city authorities, came forth from their places, and with much ado and in terrible confusion cleared the church of the chief of those people that had made the tumult, and shut the church doors against them. And the dean began to read the service anew, but such were the outcries, rapping at the doors, throwing in of stones at the windows by the multitude without, who still kept crying, "A pape, a pape!" "Antichrist!" "Pull him down!" that the bailies of the city were again obliged to leave their places to appease the fury. At last the service and sermon were both ended, but not the people's rage: the Bishop of Edinburgh, who had preached the sermon, on leaving the church for his residence, distant not many paces, was surrounded by the multitude, cast down, and nearly trodden to death. He was rescued by some friends who saw his danger, and carried home breathless. The same morning the new service was read in another church adjoining to St. Giles's, yet not without a tumult, and in the Gray Friars' church the bishop-elect of Argyle, who began to read it, was hooted and threatened, and forced to give over after coming to the confession and absolution. Between morning and afternoon service the provost and bailies of Edinburgh were summoned before the privy council, who assembled at the lord chancellor's, and undertook to do their utmost for the peaceable reading of the prayers in the afternoon. Accordingly the churches were kept tolerably quiet by keeping out the people altogether; but after service the tumult was far greater than in the morning; and the Earl of Roxburgh, lord privy seal, who undertook to carry the bishop home from St. Giles's in his coach, was so pelted by stones, and so pressed upon by the mob, who wanted to drag out the "priest of Baal," that he was obliged to order his footmen and numerous attendants to draw their swords; and thus he and the bishop at last got into the palace of Holyrood, covered with dirt and curses.

On the following day the council issued a proclamation in detestation of this tumult, and to forbid all tumultuous meetings and concourse of people to Edinburgh, upon pain of death. The magistrates pretended to deplore the disturbances; and they stated that no persons of quality had appeared in them. In truth, the rioters had been for the most part women and children of the poorest condition. The town-council, however, thought fit to suspend the reading of the new service till his majesty's further pleasure should be known, seeing it was so dangerous to the readers.[1] For this they were harshly rebuked by Laud, who told them, through the Earl of Traquair, lord treasurer for Scotland, that his majesty took it very ill that the business concerning the establishment of the service-book had been so weakly carried, and had great reason to think himself and his government dishonored by the late tumult in Edinburgh. "And, therefore," continues the English primate, "his majesty expects that your lordship and the rest of the honorable council set yourselves to it, that the liturgy may be established orderly, and with peace, to repair what hath been done amiss. . . . . Of all the rest, the weakest part was the interdicting of all divine service till his majesty's pleasure was further known. And this, as also the giving warning of the publishing, his majesty, at the first reading of the letters, and report of the fact, checked it, and commanded me to write so much to my Lord of St. Andrew's, which I did; and your lordship, at the council, July 24, spake very worthily against the interdicting of the service, for that were in effect as much as to disclaim the work, or to give way to the insolency of the baser multitude, and his majesty hath commanded me to thank you for it in his name; but the disclaiming the book as any act of theirs, but as it was his majesty's command, was most unworthy: 'tis most true, the king commanded a liturgy, and it was time they had one; they did not like to admit of ours, but thought it more reputation for them (as indeed it was) to compile one of their own; yet as near as might be they have done it well. Will they now cast down the milk they have given, because a few milkmaids have scolded unto them?"[2] At the same time, several of the Scottish lords, not content with denying all share in the prayer-book, quarreled violently with the new bishops and the most stirring of the anti-Presbyterian clergy. Traquair himself complained to the Marquis of Hamilton, who was at court, and still high in the royal favor, that some of the leading men among them were so violent and forward, had such a want of right understanding how to compass business of this nature and weight, that they bred the Scottish government many difficulties, and their rash and foolish expressions, and sometimes attempts both in private and public, had bred such a fear and jealousy in the hearts of many that things could not go well. The bishops, for example, had been complaining that the Scotch reformers of the former ages had taken from them many of their rents, and had robbed them of their power and jurisdiction even in the church itself; and they had been wont to say that the Scottish reformation generally must be reformed.[1] But Laud and Charles would listen to no complaints against the new bishops; and, urged on by them, the Scottish council issued a decree of "horning," or banishment, against all such ministers as refused to receive the New Book of Common Prayer, "out of curiosity and singularity." Alexander Henderson, minister at Leuchars; Mr. John Hamilton, minister at Newburn; and Mr. James Bruce, minister of Kingsbarns, petitioned against this harsh sentence with great good sense and moderation, and with a total and most rare abstinence from fanaticism. They told the lords of secret council that they had been willing enough to receive the said books to read them beforehand, in order to see what doctrine they contained, without which knowledge they could not adopt them; that, in the matters of God's worship, they were not bound to blind obedience to any man; that the said Book of Common Prayer was neither authorized by the general assembly, the representative kirk of the kingdom, which ever since the Reformation had given directions in matters of worship, nor by any act of parliament, which had been ever thought necessary in high matters of this kind; that the liberty of the true kirk of Scotland, and the form of worship received at the Reformation, and universally practiced ever since, were warranted by acts of the general assemblies and acts of parliament; that there had been great disputing, division, and trouble in Scotland, on account of some of the ceremonies contained in the new book; that they, upon a competent allowance of time, would undertake to prove it departed widely from the doctrine of the Reformation, and in points most material came near to the church of Rome, which they held to be as idolatrous and anti-Christian now as it was when their forefathers left it; and, finally, that the people of Scotland had been otherwise taught by themselves and their predecessors in the pulpit, and, therefore, it was likely they would be found averse to the sudden change, even if their pastors adopted it. Laud's own bishop, the Bishop of Ross, gave a very short answer to these petitioners. He told them that, while they pretended ignorance of what was contained in the book, it appeared by their many objections and exceptions to almost all parts of it, that they were but too well read in it, albeit they had abused it pitifully. He asserted that not the general assembly, which consisted of a multitude, but the bishops, had authority to govern the church, and were in themselves the representative church of the kingdom. He assured the ministers that the service-book was neither superstitious nor idolatrous, but, on the contrary, one of the most orthodox and perfect liturgies in the Christian church, and that therefore they must accept it, and read it, or bide their horning.[1] During harvest-time "men were at work and quiet;" but that being ended, many resorted to Edinburgh, notwithstanding the proclamation, and got up a general petition to the Scottish council, praying that the service-book might no further be pressed upon them. But they presently found a tremendous edict against them.

Charles, to punish the inhabitants of the good old town, sent down orders for the removing of the term, or session, and the council of government from Edinburgh to Linlithgow, the next term to Stirling, the next to Dundee, &c., together with a fresh proclamation, commanding the Presbyterians to disperse immediately, and return to their homes, under pain of being treated as wicked and rebellious subjects, and with an order for calling in and burning a seditious book, entitled "A dispute against the English Popish Ceremonies, obtruded upon the Kirk of Scotland." The council would have delayed the publication of the arbitrary decrees; but Charles's orders were peremptory, and they were all read at the market-cross. The Earl of Traquair communicated a part of the immediate result to the Marquis of Hamilton. "The noblemen," says he, "the gentry, and commissioners from presbyteries and burghs, seemed to acquiesce herewith, and every man, in a very peaceable manner, to give obedience to the tenor of the proclamations; but the next day thereafter, the town of Edinburgh, or, as our new magistrates call it, the rascally people of Edinburgh (although their sisters, wives, children, and near kinsmen, were the special actors), rose in such a barbarous manner, as the like has never been seen in this kingdom, set upon the Bishop of Galloway, and with great difficulty was he rescued into the large council-house."[2] This Sydserf, bishop of Galloway, who was odious on many grounds, but upon none more than upon a popular rumor, that he wore a golden crucifix hid under his clothes, was almost strangled by the women, who were bent upon discovering this concealed relic; nor was he safe when he had escaped into the council-house; for a multitude, which seemed constantly to increase in number and fury, surrounded the house, crying for "the priest of Baal"—for all the traitors that were conspiring to ruin the old liberties and religion of Scotland. The terrified members of the council that happened to be in the house, applied to the Edinburgh magistrates for protection; the magistrates could give them none, for they were themselves beset by the rioters, who stated that the reason of their rising against their own magistrates was, because they had promised them that they should be the last in the kingdom to be harassed about the Book of Common Prayer. At last, the gentlemen and clergymen who had come up to present the petition, and who had been opprobriously ordered out of the town. used their good offices to prevent bloodshed, and, by their influence and persuasion, rescued the bishop, the council, and the magistrates from the hands of the rioters. It was observed, however, that the friends and relations of these very magistrates were in the mob; that citizens of the best repute, with their wives and their sisters, were actively engaged, and that many well-known gentlemen openly joined the people in their cries and denunciations. It was, therefore, no longer possible to represent the disaffection as a thing of no consequence—as a mere outbreak of the lowest and poorest, who might easily be brought to reason by a little hanging and scourging. And nearly at the same time the city of Glasgow became the scene of a similar rising against the prayer-book and episcopacy. But Charles and Laud, though warned by the Scottish ministers of the fierce and dangerous spirit of the people,—of the daily accession to their cause of men of rank and ability,—of the defenseless state of Edinburgh Castle and the other fortresses,—of the poverty of the exchequer, —were resolved to go "thorough," and that too without admitting of any delay. In fact, all the Scottish ministers of state, with the exception of the bishops, were themselves opposed to the service-book, though for a time none of them declared their dislike of it, but made their requests to the king for time and patience to appease the perilous hostility of the people. Traquair said that the prayer-book might possibly be submitted to in seven years' time;[1] but Laud was furious at the mention of so long a delay, and Charles resolved to enforce it at once. Apprehending that the king meant to deprive Edinburgh for ever of its honors and advantages as the seat of government, the citizens of that ancient capital became more incensed than ever, and it was soon made to appear that Charles had committed a fatal mistake in exciting their jealousy in this particular. Before the removal of the session from Linlithgow to Stirling, the "Four Tables," or Boards, as we should now call them, were established with the acquiescence of the Scottish council, which were representative committees, consisting respectively of lords, gentlemen, ministers, and burgesses, and which were to be fixed permanently in the capital. With these Tables in Edinburgh there corresponded lesser Tables, or sub-committees, in the country, a constant communication being established among them all. Above all these Tables was a general Table, which consisted of members taken from each, and which was intrusted with something very like a supreme executive power. In the course of a very few weeks these Tables were looked up to with far more respect than the paltry government, and they exercised an uncontrolled authority over the greater part of Scotland. It has been well said that a better scheme for organizing insurrection could not easily have been devised. The contrivers of it and the leading members of the permanent committee were the lords Rothes, Balmerino, Lindsay, Lothian, Loudon, Yester, and Cranston.

[1] The Archbishop of St. Andrew's also told Laud that it would take seven years to establish the service.

While the king was determined to cede nothing, the Presbyterians now almost daily advanced their demands, and pressed them with increasing pertinacity and boldness. They no longer petitioned for time, and some alterations of the Book of Common Prayer; they demanded the instant removal of the whole Liturgy, the Book of Canons, which had also been forced upon them, and of the Court of High Commission, which had been most heartily detested ever since its first establishment; they accused the bishops as the cause of all the animosities and troubles which agitated the country; they declined their authority in all matters whether civil or religious, protesting against every act of the Scottish council to which any bishop should be a party. The lord treasurer, the Earl of Traquair, was summoned up to London by Charles, who examined him sharply, and then sent him back—though his sincerity was much doubted—with still harsher and more despotic instructions. Traquair was enjoined, or bound by an oath, to keep these things secret till the very moment when they should be announced by proclamation at Stirling; but, probably through the earl himself, the contents of the proclamation were divulged immediately; upon which the Tables put themselves into a state of preparation. The members of the sub-committees were summoned from all parts to meet at Edinburgh and Stirling. To disperse them and the multitudes that flocked with them, Traquair, on the 19th of February, caused the king's proclamation to be read at Stirling, where the council was then sitting, "condemning their irregular proceedings; imputing them rather to preposterous zeal than to disaffection or disloyalty; remitting past offenses to such as should obey his majesty's commands; discharging all future meetings, on pain of treason; forbidding them to repair to Stirling, or any other place, where the council and session sat, without notifying their business, and obtaining leave from the council; and ordering strangers of all ranks to quit the place within six hours after the proclamation, under the same penalty." But the herald had scarcely done reading this proclamation, when the lords Hume and Lindsay, acting for the Tables, published, with equal solemnity, a counter-proclamation, which was then fixed to the market-cross at Stirling, and copies of it sent to be read and affixed in Edinburgh and Linlithgow. Traquair, who had foreseen the mischief, wrote to Hamilton, that his majesty must now "perceive how much all sorts and qualities of people in Scotland were commoved." "Many things," he adds, "have been complained of; . . . but the service-book, which they conceive, by this proclamation, and the king's taking the same upon himself, to be in effect of new ratified, is that which troubles them most. And truly, in my judgment, it shall be as easy to establish the missal in this kingdom as this service-book, as it is conceived."[1] The lord treasurer said again that he "saw not a probability of power within the kingdom" to force the book down people's throats, or restore tranquillity to the country. He also mentioned that the Earl of Marr had written "untimely" to his under-keeper of Edinburgh Castle, who had the reputation of a great Puritan, and had so given occasion to great alarms. Every thing, he said, that was done or intended at court was instantly carried to the ears of the committees. The bishops and lords of the council were constantly quarreling with, and accusing one another. "My own condition," he continues, "at this time is hard; for, as upon the one hand I am persecuted by the implacable underhand malice of some of our bishops, so am I now in no better predicament with our noblemen and others who adhere to the Presbyterian course; and I may truly say, the bishop they hate most is not more obnoxious to their hatred than I am at this time." But in less than a week the perplexed lord treasurer, who sent up the justice-clerk to London, had still more alarming intelligence to communicate. The Presbyterians, being now openly joined by the most powerful and popular noblemen of the kingdom, and even by several members of Charles's government, proceeded boldly to frame and subscribe their celebrated National Covenant, whereby they undertook to maintain, at all hazards, the old form of worship; to maintain the confession of faith subscribed by Charles's father and household and all ranks of people in 1580 and 1581, and again in 1590. The origin of the Covenant has been traced almost to the commencement of the Reformation in Scotland, or to the time of Cardinal Beaton, when the nobles, the friends of Wishart and Knox, who called themselves the Lords of the Congregation, undertook, by a solemn bond or covenant, to protect the persons and opinions of the reforming and persecuted preachers. The name was adopted from the covenants of Israel with God; and the nature of the obligation was derived from the bonds of mutual defense and maintenance peculiar to the nation; but the word covenant had a most significant and holy sense in the ears of the Scottish people, who knew that that form of association had carried their ancestors triumphantly through their struggle with papistry. The Tables, or standing and well-organized committees, now summoned every Scotsman who valued his kirk to repair to the capital, there to observe a solemn fast as a fitting preparation for the renewal of the covenant. The call was obeyed everywhere, and Edinburgh was presently crowded and crammed with fiery Presbyterians, who generally traveled with good broad-swords. Upon the appointed day, the 1st of March, they took undisputed possession of the High, or St. Giles's kirk, which, in their notions, had been profaned by the preaching and praying of Laud's dean and bishop. After long prayers and exhortations the new covenant was produced; the congregation rose, and nobles, gentry, clergy, and burgesses, with hands raised toward heaven, swore to its contents. This memorable deed had been prepared by Alexander Henderson, one of the four ministers whose petition had been so rudely answered by the Bishop of Ross, and by Archibald Johnston, an advocate and the great legal adviser of the party. It had also been revised by the lords Balmerino, Loudon, and Rothes. Whatever other defects there may have been in the composition, there was no want of power. It was, indeed, most skillfully adapted for acting upon a proud, a devout, and enthusiastic people, who were about equally proud of their national independence and their national kirk. It began with a clear and nervous profession of faith, and a solemn abjuration of the usurped authority "of that Roman Antichrist (the pope) upon the scriptures of God, upon the kirk of Scotland, the civil magistrate, and consciences of men; all his tyrannous laws made upon indifferent things against our Christian liberty; his erroneous doctrine against the sufficiency of the written word, the perfection of the law, the office of Christ, and his blessed evangel; his corrupted doctrine concerning original sin, our natural inability and rebellion to God's law, our justification by faith only, our imperfect sanctification and obedience to the law, the nature, number, and use of the holy sacraments; his five bastard sacraments, with all his rites, ceremonies, and false doctrine added to the ministration of the true sacraments without the word of God; his cruel judgments against infants departing without the sacrament; his absolute necessity of baptism; his blasphemous opinion of transubstantiation, or real presence of Christ's body in the elements, and receiving of the same by the wicked, or bodies of men; his dispensations, with solemn oaths, perjuries, and degrees of marriage forbidden in the word; his cruelty against the innocent divorced; his devilish mass; his blasphemous priesthood; his profane sacrifice for the sins of the dead and the quick; his canonization of men, calling upon angels or saints departed, worshiping of imagery, relics, and crosses; dedicating of kirks, altars, days, vows to creatures; his purgatory, prayers for the dead, praying or speaking in a strange language; with his processions and blasphemous litany, and multitude of advocates or mediators; his manifold orders: auricular confession; his desperate and uncertain repentance; his general and doubtsome faith; his satisfactions of men for their sins; his justification by works, opus operatum, works of supererogation, merits, pardons, peregrinations, and stations; his holy water, baptizing of bells, conjuring of spirits, crossing, sainting, anointing, conjuring, hallowing, of God's good creatures, with the superstitious opinion joined therewith; his worldly monarchy, and wicked hierarchy: his three solemn vows, with all his shavelings of sundry sorts; his erroneous and bloody decrees made at Trent, with all the subscribers and approvers of that cruel and bloody band conjured against the kirk of God." "And, finally," said the covenant, "we detest all his vain allegories, rites, signs, and traditions, brought in the kirk without or against the word of God, and doctrine of this true reformed kirk." They went on to say that they would continue in the obedience of the doctrine and discipline of their own kirk, and would defend the same according to their vocation and power all the days of their lives, "under the pains contained in the law, and danger both of body and soul in the day of God's fearful judgment;" that they were not moved to their resistance by any worldly respect, but through the persuasions of their consciences, and the knowledge of God's true religion, which some were minded to corrupt and subvert secretly till time might serve for their becoming open enemies and persecutors of the same: that they perceived that the quietness and stability of their kirk depended upon the safety and good behavior of the king's majesty, whose person and authority they would defend with their goods, bodies, and lives, so long as he defended Christ and the liberties of their country, upheld justice, and punished iniquity. A variety of Scottish acts of parliament and acts of council were next recited to justify their pretensions and their intolerance of the old religion, or of any approach to its ceremonies, which they called "the monuments and dregs of by-gone idolatry." "We, noblemen, barons, gentlemen, burgesses, ministers, and commons," continued this famous document, "considering the danger of the true reformed religion, of the king's honor, and of the public peace of the kingdom, by the manifold innovations and evils generally contained and particularly mentioned in our late supplications, complaints, and protestations, do hereby profess, and before God, his angels, and the world, solemnly declare, that with our whole hearts we agree and resolve all the days of our life constantly to adhere unto, and to defend, the aforesaid true religion, and, forbearing the practice of all novations already introduced in the matters of the worship of God, or approbation of the corruptions of the public government of the kirk, or civil places and power of kirkmen, till they be tried and allowed in free assemblies, and in parliaments, to labor by all means lawful to recover the purity and liberty of the gospel, as it was established and professed before the foresaid novations. . . . . And we promise and swear by the great name of the Lord our God to continue in the profession and obedience of the foresaid religion." . . . . They again most solemnly averred that they had no intention or desire to attempt any thing that might turn to the diminution of the king's greatness and authority, which they maintained would be sensibly increased by their proceedings. But, at the same time, they resolutely expressed their determination to carry their object, and to bide by one another; so that whatsoever should be done to the least of them for that cause should be taken as done to all in general, and to every one of them in particular. Continuing in the same high strain, they said, "And we shall neither directly nor indirectly suffer ourselves to be divided or withdrawn by whatsoever suggestion, combination, allurement, or tenor, from this blessed and loyal conjunction, nor shall cast in any let or impediment that may stay or hinder any such resolution as by common consent shall be found to conduce for so good ends; but, on the contrary, shall, by all lawful means, labor to further and promote the same. And if any such dangerous and divisive motion be made to us by word or writ, we and every one of us shall either suppress it, or (if need be) shall incontinently make the same known, that it may be timeously obviated. Neither do we fear the foul aspersions of rebellion, combination, or what else our adversaries from their craft and malice would put upon us, seeing what we do is so well warranted, and ariseth from an unfeigned desire to maintain the true worship of God, the majesty of our king, and the peace of the kingdom, for the common happiness of ourselves and posterity. And, because we can not look for a blessing from God upon our proceedings, except with our profession and subscription we join such a life and conversation as beseemeth Christians who have renewed their covenant with God, we therefore faithfully promise for ourselves, our followers, and all other under us, both in public, in our particular families, and personal carriage, to endeavor to keep ourselves within the bounds of Christian liberty, and to be good examples to others of all godliness, soberness, and righteousness, and of every duty we owe to God and man. And that this our union and conjunction may be observed without violation, we call the living God, the searcher of our hearts, to witness, who knoweth this to be our sincere desire and unfeigned resolution, as we shall answer to Jesus Christ, in the great day, and under the pain of God's everlasting wrath, and of infamy, and of loss of all honor and respect in this world; most humbly beseeching the Lord to strengthen us by his holy spirit for this end, and to bless our desires and proceedings with a happy success, that religion and righteousness may flourish in the land, to the glory of God, the honor of our king, and peace and comfort of us all."[1]

A few creatures of the court saw in all this mighty enthusiasm nothing more serious than a brief fanatic outbreak, and they assured Charles, who ought to have remembered the history of his grandmother and of his great-grandmother, that it would be easily dashed and dissipated. This was miserably to misunderstand the character of the Scottish people. The lord treasurer knew his countrymen better. On the 5th of March, writing from Stirling to the Marquis of Hamilton, he says, "It is now high time for your lordship to represent to his majesty the height of evils are like to fall upon us, if he shall not be pleased to free the subjects of the fears they have conceived of innovation of religion; and that it is not to be expected from this, that it will withstand, far less repress, the fury. The bond, whereof the justice-clerk hath the double, is subscribed by many; and all qualities of people, from all towns of the kingdom, are coming in daily to subscribe."[2] But the business was too well organized to permit the subscription to the covenant to depend upon men's making long journeys to the capital: copies of the deed itself were dispatched to the different counties in the west and north, the popular preachers were all warned, a fire of pulpit-batteries was opened from John o'Groat's House to the Cheviot hills—from Aberdeen to Tobermory, and the COVENANT was spoken in its thunder. The people were roused and excited to the utmost; all ranks, all ages hailed the pledge of liberty and salvation, and the covenant was signed on the Sabbath in every parish with shouts, tears of joy, or contrition and hearty embraces. It was a fine subject for the more eloquent of the ministers—now no longer dumb or tongue-tied by the priests of Baal; and some of them compared it in its progress to Elijah's cloud—a little cloud at first, arising out of the sea, like a man's hand, but which swelled and spread itself till the heaven was black with clouds and wind.[1] Traquair pointed out the only means of averting the storm. "If," says his lordship, "his majesty would be pleased to free them, or give them an assurance that no novelty of religion shall be brought upon them, it is like the most part of the wisest sort will be quiet; but, without this, there is no obedience to be expected in this part of the world; and, in my judgment, no assurance can be given them hereof, but by freeing them of the Service Book and Book of Canons. If the king, for the good of his own honor and service, may be moved to any thing in this kind, I wish earnestly your lordship should not spare your pains in coming home, and undertaking to do his majesty's service; but, except something of this kind be granted, I know not what further can be done than to oppose force to force; wherein, whoever gain, his majesty shall be a loser."[2]

But still Charles and Laud disregarded the warning, and were determined to impose the Common Prayer Book upon the people of Scotland by force of arms. The great meeting of the Covenanters at Edinburgh dissolved tranquilly; but they left commissioners behind them, and established such intelligence among themselves and with all parts of the country, that they could meet and come together at the shortest notice. "For any thing I can learn," writes Traquair, "they intend to prepare themselves by all possible means for the worst, but will not stir except they be pressed with the practice of those things they complain upon." The Covenanters knew their strength and the mighty power they had in the sympathies of the Puritans in the south; and they began to assert that they were as well friended in England as the king himself.[3] Wherever they encountered opposition from any Scottish subjects, they threatened them with their high displeasure and the curse of the true kirk; nor did they always limit themselves to threats, particularly when any of Laud's ministers (his bishops had all run away) fell into their hands. There were fierce riots at Lanark and other towns. In some places men were thrown into prison, or put in the stocks for refusing to sign. In the west country, where Presbyterianism was the warmest, they would give no traveler or passenger either meat, drink, or lodging for his money, until he first gave them assurance that he was an adherent to the covenant. They raised large sums by voluntary contribution for the maintenance of their commissioners, secretaries, clerks, and couriers; they took a minute list of all such as were either adverse or lukewarm, not forgetting, at the same time, to make estimate of their property, in forethought of sequestrations and forfeiture. "Before the end of April," says a favorable historian, "he was scarce accounted one of the reformed religion that had not subscribed to this covenant. And the church and state were divided into two names of Covenanters, and Non-covenanters; the Non-covenanters consisting, first, of Papists, whose number was thought small in Scotland, scarce exceeding six hundred; secondly, some statesmen in office and favor at that time; thirdly, some who, though they were of the reformed religion, were greatly affected to the ceremonies of England, and Book of Common Prayer."[1]

[1] The town of Aberdeen alone was withheld from subscribing, by the influence of the university and the power of the Marquis of Huntley, or rather the non covenanters were more numerous in that place than elsewhere.

Traquair repeatedly urged that his majesty should hear some of his Scottish ministers and servants before making up his mind, or "concluding fully" as to what course he ought to take at this crisis; but without hearing any such—nay, without advising with his English council, or with any English servant of government except his fatal Laud—Charles himself drew up a commission for the Marquis of Hamilton, who was ordered to proceed with all haste to reduce that "rascally people" to order. Hamilton was hereby instructed to read the royal proclamation which he bore to the lords of the Scottish council, previously to publishing it, and to exact, if he chose, a solemn oath from each member of that council to do his best to execute the proclamation.[2] If any body should protest against this royal proclamation, he was to treat him as a rebel, and apprehend him, if possible. He was to give a bold negative to any petitions that might be presented by the Covenanters, both in respect of the matter, and as coming from an unacknowledged and illegal association. He was not to press for the exact execution of Laud's church orders for the present, but he was to take good care not to promise their abrogation. He was to allow the Scots six weeks to renounce the covenant, and, if he found cause, less. "You shall declare," continues the king, "that, if there be no sufficient strength within the kingdom to force the refractory to obedience, power shall come from England, and that myself will come in person with them, being resolved to hazard my life, rather than to suffer authority to be contemned. You may likewise declare (if you find cause) that, as we never did, so by God's grace we never will, stop the course of justice by any private directions of ours, but will leave our lords of session and other judges to administer justice, as they will be answerable to God and us. If you can not (by the means prescribed by us) bring back the refractory and seditious to due obedience, we do not only give you authority, but command all hostile acts whatsoever to be used against them, they having deserved to be used no otherwise by us but as a rebellious people:

[2] One of the great provocations was the removal of the courts, &c. from the capital; yet Charles says,—"We give you power to cause the council to sit in whatsoever place you shall find most convenient for our service, Edinburgh only excepted, and to change the meeting thereof as often as occasion shall require." In another clause he says, "Whenever the town of Edinburgh shall depart from the Covenant, and petition for our favor, then we will that you bring back the council and session to it."

for the doing thereof, we will not only save you harmless, but account it as acceptable service done us."[1] Having received his instructions and commission, Hamilton took leave of the king, who ordered him to write often to himself and the Archbishop of Canterbury, he being the only English person intrusted with the secrets of the Scottish affairs. On the 3d of June, Hamilton arrived at Berwick, where the Earl of Roxburgh met him, and told him how small were his hopes of success; that the Scottish people would assuredly not give up the covenant; that they insisted on the abolition of episcopacy; and that, if they were not satisfied in this respect, and by the immediate calling of a general assembly and parliament, they would call an assembly themselves. The marquis, when he came to Berwick, had expected to find a great company of noblemen and others to receive him and attend him as the king's high commissioner; and he had especially counted up his own kindred and vassals, or tenantry; but all failed him, except "some very few who had not subscribed the covenant, and they inconsiderable: for the Tables of the Covenanters required that none who had taken the covenant should give any attendance upon the marquis."[2] With a heavy heart, Hamilton went on to Dalkeith, where he was received by the lords of the secret council, by some of the lords of session, and troops of the nobility and gentry who had not subscribed. Shortly after his arrival at Dalkeith, the citizens of Edinburgh requested that he would be pleased to repair to the king's palace of Holyrood House, where they might more conveniently communicate with him and receive his grace's directions. But he knew that the citizens were in warlike array round the castle to prevent his throwing in troops and ammunition; and he represented that it would not be agreeable to the king's honor that he, his majesty's commissioner with the council, should reside at Holyrood, situated at one end of the city, when the castle seated at the other end was blocked up with guards. The citizens undertook that this guard should be removed, and the Covenanters in Edinburgh kept quiet. Thereupon the marquis consented to lodge at Holyrood. On his way from Dalkeith, about two or three miles from Edinburgh, he was met by the whole body of the nobility and gentry of the Covenanters that were residents of the capital and neighborhood, who were all mounted on horseback, and consisted of several thousands—more calculated, no doubt, to overawe than to testify respect. And as the marquis drew still nearer to Edinburgh, he saw a small hill blackened all over with Geneva cloaks—for five hundred Presbyterian ministers, on foot, had their taken their post, and had appointed "the strongest in voice and austerest in countenance to make a short welcome;" but this the marquis avoided.[3]

As soon as Hamilton was settled at Holyrood, he asked the Covenanters what would satisfy them and induce them to renounce their league. They answered, nothing but a general assembly and a parliament, and instantly clapped new guards upon

Edinburgh Castle, and multiplied the guards and watches of the city. At the same time the preachers advised the people to take heed of crafty propositions; and when the marquis proposed hearing divine service in the king's chapel, they sent to tell him that he must not read the English service-book; and they nailed up the organ, which they considered as an abomination unto the Lord.[1] A few days after they wrote a letter to the marquis, admonishing him and every one of the council to subscribe their blessed covenant, as they hoped to be esteemed Christians and patriots.[2] They declared that the Scottish people would as soon renounce their baptism as their covenant, which had already secured them the favor of heaven and a regeneration in righteousness. Hamilton wisely declined publishing Charles's proclamation, and advised his master to be prepared either to grant them all their demands, or to hasten down his fleet with an army in it, to put soldiers into Berwick and Carlisle, and to follow in person with an army royal. On the 15th of June, the marquis received the following answer from the king:—"I expect not any thing can reduce that people to obedience but force only. In the mean time your care must be how to dissolve the multitude, and, if it be possible, to possess yourself of my castles of Edinburgh and Stirling, which I do not expect; and to this end I give you leave to flatter them with what hopes you please, so you engage not me against my grounds, and in particular that you consent neither to the calling of parliament nor general assembly, until the covenant be disavowed and given up, your chief end being now to win time until I be ready to suppress them. But when I consider that now not only my crown, but my reputation forever, lies at stake, I must rather suffer the first, that time will help, than this last, which is irreparable. This I have written to no other end than to show you I will rather die than yield to those impertinent and damnable demands, as you rightly call them; for it is all one as to yield to be no king in a very short time. .... As the affairs are now, I do not expect that you should declare the adherers to the covenant traitors, until, as I have already said, you have heard from me that my fleet hath set sail for Scotland, though your six weeks should be elapsed. In a word, gain time by all the honest means you can, without forsaking your grounds."

By honest means Charles meant any means that did not openly commit his own character. The Presbyterian ministers, understanding that the covenant must be given up, or no treaty made, caused their pulpits to ring with exhortations of firm adherence to the great national bond, and again all declared that they would never quit the covenant except with their lives. They presented their petition to the marquis, calling for an immediate redress of their grievances, telling him that they would no longer be put off by delays, and desiring him to propose the matter to the whole Scottish council. Hamilton, obeying the spirit at least, if not the letter, of the king's instructions to temporize and delude, promised them that he would call both a general assembly and a parliament for the redress of all grievances. It appears, however, that the Covenanters were aware of the plot contrived by the king, or were suspicious of all his intentions, for they went away dissatisfied, putting no trust in Hamilton's fair promises. The marquis, on the other hand, had found that most, if not all, the lords of the council were inclined to the granting of what the Covenanters demanded; and so he durst not summon the council, lest they should have sided with the Covenanters. He informed his master of all this, and implored him not to proceed in his warlike preparations too openly. Charles, in reply, told him that he would take his advice and stop public preparations, but "in a silent way" he would not cease, so that he might be ready upon the least advertisement. The Covenanters presented to the marquis an "explanation of the bond of mutual defense," in which they again most solemnly protested that they meant not to derogate from the king's authority or to disobey and rebel against his majesty's laws. "All our proceeding," said they, "by petitioning, protesting, covenanting, and whatsoever other way, was and is only for the maintaining of the true religion by us professed; and with express reservation of our obedience to his most sacred majesty, most humbly beseeching his majesty so to esteem and accept of us, that he will be graciously pleased to call a national assembly and parliament, for removing the fears we have, not without cause (as we think), conceived of introducing in this church another form of worship than what we have been accustomed with; as likewise for satisfying our just grievances, and the settling of a constant and solid order to be kept in all time coming, as well in the civil as ecclesiastical government: which, if we shall by the intercession of your grace obtain, we faithfully promise (according to our bounden duties) to continue in his majesty's obedience, and at our utmost powers to procure the same during our lives."[1] The marquis transmitted their paper to Charles, together with fresh desponding accounts of his own: but the answer he received was as high and absolute as ever. "As concerning the explanation of their damnable covenant," said the king, "whether it be with or without explanation, I have no more power in Scotland than as a duke of Venice, which I will rather die than suffer: yet I commend the giving ear to the explanation, or any thing else to win time, which now I see is one of your chiefest cares, wherefore I need not recommend it to you. And for their calling a parliament or assembly without me, I should not much be sorry, for it would the more loudly declare them traitors, and the more justify my actions: therefore, in my mind, my declaration should not be long delayed; but this is a bare opinion, and no command."[2]

[1] The ministers whom Wentworth had so tyrannically driven out of Ulster were now taking their revenge, and informing the people of Scotland of the crafty propositions and broken promises of Charles's government in Ireland. "The pulpits," says Traquair, "are daily filled with those ministers, who were lately put out of Ireland, who, with some of their own, and some such other as come from other places of this kingdom, preach nothing but foolish seditious doctrine." —Hardwicke State Papers.

If Hamilton is to be praised, it must be for his loyalty, and not for his patriotism: he told the Covenanters that he should leave them in order to wait upon his majesty, to explain their desires, and to return to them again within three weeks or a month. But the true reason of his going was to gain so much time, and to see in what state of forwardness were the king's warlike preparations. Previously to his departure, on the 4th of July, he presented the royal proclamation, which he had brought with him, to the Scottish council, who signed it upon omission of the command to abandon the covenant. Thereupon it was sent to the market-cross and there read aloud; but it was met instantly by a long and powerfully written protest drawn up in the name of the noblemen, barons, gentlemen, burghs, and commons. This was followed by another explanation of their covenant, which was given to Hamilton to be put into the king's hands. When the marquis came to court, he gave Charles a full account of the "strength and rage of the Covenanters," together with the "unconstancy" of many members of the Scottish council; and he proposed to his majesty, as a middle course, to renew the confession of faith which had been ratified by the Scottish parliament in 1567. Charles immediately sent back the marquis with enlarged instructions. He was to try, by all means, to make the Scottish council sign the said confession of faith, and thereby, as the court chose to argue, give up the covenant; but he was not publicly to put the proposition to vote in the council except he was quite sure to carry the point: he was to summon a general assembly, but to take good care that the sitting of the assembly should not be before the 1st of November: he was to labor that the bishops might have votes in the assembly, and that the moderator thereof might be a bishop: he was to cajole them about the Articles of Perth, giving them to believe that they were held as indifferent: if he found it expedient he might even publish the order for discharging the use of the Service Book, Book of Canons, and the practice of the High Commission. "You are to protest," continued the instructions, "against the abolishing of bishops, and to give way to as few restrictions of their power as you can; and as for the bishops not being capable of civil places, you must labor what you can to keep them free. . . . . As for the bishops' precedence, you are not to admit them of the assembly to meddle therewith, it being no point of religion, and totally in the crown. . . . . You are to advise the bishops to forbear sitting at the council till better and more favorable times for them." These better times were to be brought about by fire and sword; but Charles was not as yet ready, and therefore he concluded thus: "Notwithstanding all these instructions, or any other accident that may happen (still laboring to keep up our honor so far as possibly you can), you are by no means to permit a present rupture to happen, but to yield any thing, though unreasonable, rather than now to break."[1] Beside these instructions, Charles gave Hamilton orders that the bishops and the commissioners, or proctors, named by them, should be held necessary members of the general assembly; that all ministers turned out since these stirs began should be restored; and that all ministers admitted without the bishop's license should be prevented from exercising their functions.

But while the marquis was busy at court, in arranging these matters the Covenanters in Scotland were not idle, but pressed might and main for more subscriptions to the league. "And because the north were for the most part against the covenant, some noblemen and ministers went on the 23d of July (being that day twelvemonth the stool was thrown at the bishop's head) to Aberdeen, hoping to convince the doctors there of the lawfulness of the covenant. But the doctors violently argued against the same, because it was a combination without warrant or authority. And the Covenanters gave out to the said doctors at Aberdeen that the lord commissioner was satisfied with the covenant upon the offer of that explication (which is formerly mentioned); but, at the commissioner's return, he declared the contrary."[1] It is well known that the Covenanters, notwithstanding their pretensions to godliness, began, at a very early stage, to be almost as regardless of their word, when an advantage was to be gained by breaking it, as the king himself was of his promises; but in the present case it may be doubted whether Hamilton had not deceived them by professions of admiration of their holy league. Upon his return to Holyrood House, on the 10th of August, he found things in a much worse posture than he had left them in; for, a few days before, it had been enacted, at a convention of burghs, that none should be magistrates or occupy any municipal offices whatsoever unless they had taken the covenant; and the Covenanters had unanimously resolved that bishops should have no vote in the general assembly,—that episcopacy should be abolished, —the Articles of Perth condemned, and that all men, under pain of the curse of the kirk of Scotland, should sign the covenant. Hamilton knew not what to do, but he resolved at all hazards not to call a general assembly until he had again been to London in person to represent to his majesty the extreme hazard he was like to run. Three days after his arrival at Edinburgh, the confident Covenanters waited upon him to demand an answer to the explanation and petition they had forwarded by him to the court. He declared that the king's answer was full of grace and goodness,—that his majesty promised that he would leave nothing undone that could be expected from a just prince to save the nation from ruin,—that as soon as order and government were reëstablished as before these combustions, and obedience made to the crown, both an assembly and a parliament should be convoked. He never could have expected that men, distinguished by their sagacity and their distrust of professions, should be satisfied with vague promises like these. The Covenanters negotiated eight or nine days, and then the marquis craved again the space of twenty days to go to court and bring another answer from his majesty. Hamilton's object, as was understood by the Covenanters, was to gain more time; but before he began his journey he thought fit to consult with the earls of Traquair, Roxburgh, and Southesk, and even to join his signature with theirs to certain articles of advice to be offered to the king. In this paper Charles was most earnestly urged to revoke those innovations in religion and law which alone, without any disloyalty, had moved his subjects to their present courses. Hamilton left Edinburgh on the 25th of August: on the 10th of September he received fresh instructions from his master, who, it was said, was resolved to try "the utmost of yielding" for the recovery of his subjects' affections. In fact, Charles, who had been so averse to the slightest concession, now gave up every thing to the Scots, empowering Hamilton, by proclamation or otherwise as he should see cause, to declare that his majesty did absolutely revoke the Service Book, the Book of Canons, the Five Articles of Perth, and the High Commission. By other clauses of his instructions the bishops were given up to the vengeance of the laws,—the episcopal government was declared to be limited by the laws of the Scottish church and kingdom as already established,—and the prelates were no longer to hold any political posts. On his return toward Edinburgh, Hamilton met in Yorkshire the fugitive Scottish bishops, to whom he signified his majesty's pleasure, telling them that, though the king would maintain episcopacy, he was content that their power should be limited, and that they should no longer hold civil offices. At this the bishops were thrown into a fury, and spoke with great vehemency; but the Archbishop of St. Andrews was the most moderate of any of them, and seemed to be willing to take £2500 from the king as composition for quitting his place of chancellor. On the 17th of September, Hamilton was again at Holyrood, and, on the 21st, he received the Covenanters, and told them that the king had granted them all that they desired, and that, by his gracious permission, a free assembly and a parliament were to be called immediately. They were, or appeared to be, satisfied, until the marquis mentioned that they must sign the old Confession of Faith as adopted by King James in 1580 and 1590, which they looked upon as an artifice to set aside their new bond of the covenant. And then, upon reflection, their suspicions were excited by the amplitude of the king's concessions. If Charles had intended to keep his promises he would hardly have promised so much: and at this time, or more probably some weeks earlier, the Covenanters obtained certain intelligence that he was secretly engaged in raising an army against them, not scrupling to say among his few confidants that he should never enjoy peace of mind till he had reduced them to obedience, and again set up the bishops in their places. It was indeed impossible so to conceal what was going on in one part of the island that the Scots should get no inkling of it: this impossibility of secrecy would have existed even if the English nation had entered fully into the quarrel of their sovereign, but, as things stood, nearly every Englishman that was groaning under the church tyranny, or held a change of the established religion to be demanded by the word of God, might consider himself bound to put the Scots on their guard. It was not without reason that the Covenanters asserted that they were as well befriended in England as the king himself. Their leaders were in close correspondence with several men of the leading English patriots—practical men—men of business, who were not likely to neglect any thing which tended to strengthen them for their contest. And beside, there were several of the Scottish counselors and courtiers about the king who were suspected both of Presbyterianism and venality.[1]

On the 22d of September, Hamilton caused the proclamation to be read at the market-cross, in which the liturgy, the High Commission, &c., were given up and declared to be void and null; but, as it contained the condition of signing the old Confession of Faith, which was interpreted as implying the abandonment of their recent engagement, the Covenanters instantly protested against it. The protest, like all the papers issued by that party, was wonderfully effective and powerfully worded. It said, that it was meant by this new subscription that their late covenant and confession might be quite absorbed and buried in oblivion,—that whereas it had been intended and sworn to be an everlasting covenant, never to be forgotten, it should be never more remembered,—that the new one would be cried up, and the other drowned in the noise thereof. "This new subscription," continued the protest, "instead of performing our vows, would be a real testimony and confession before the world that we have been transgressors in making rash vows; that we repent ourselves of our former zeal and forwardness against the particulars expressed, first, in our supplications, complaints, and protestations, and next, abjured in our covenant; that we in our judgment prefer the general confession unto this, which necessarily was now made more special; and that we are now, under the fair pretext and honest cover of a new oath, recanting and undoing that which, upon so mature deliberation, we have been doing before. This, beside all other evils, were to make way and open a door to the reëntry of the particulars abjured, and to repent ourselves of our chiefest consolations, and to lie both against God and our own souls. It hath been often objected that our confession of faith and covenant was unlawful, because it wanted the warrant of public authority; and it hath been answered by us, that we were not destitute of the warrant, civil and ecclesiastical, which authorized the former covenant. And, although we could have wished that his majesty had added both his subscription and authority unto it, yet the less constraint from authority

[1] Soon after this we find a friend to Charles's government saying: "And because there be divers Scots Covenanters about court, who give intelligence (both by the ordinary, and posters, and journiers for Scotland), a course should be taken that the letters may be opened; and that the Governor of Berwick may give order for some strict searching and examining the Scots travelers; for many that go up and down England with Scots linen, &c., scatter, and sow errors, divisions, and dissensions in the hearts of his majesty's subjects, which should be prevented; and the Covenanters about court should be discharged" —Hardwicke State Papers and the more liberty, the less hypocrisy and more sincerity hath appeared. But by this new subscription, urged by authority, we both condemn our former subscription as unlawful, because alledged to be done without authority, and precondemn also the like laudable course in the like necessity to be taken by posterity." The protest pointed out to the jealous eyes of the Scots that, by subscribing the Confession as now urged, they, according to the royal proclamation, would acquiesce in that declaration to his majesty's absolute will, and submit to accept of a pardon from him, which pardon had need to be ratified in parliament; and this, they said, was turning their glory into shame, by confessing their guiltiness where God had made them guiltless, and by the fire of his spirit had accepted of their services, —was a departing from the commandment of God, the practice of the godly in former times, and the worthy and laudable example of their religious progenitors. Charles himself had signed the new bond, though it contained many clauses altogether repugnant to Arminianism, and it was subscribed at Edinburgh by Hamilton, Traquair, Marr, Murray, Haddington, Lauderdale, Southesk, Napier, Carmichael, and all the rest of the lords of secret council. On the same day the marquis proclaimed his majesty's pleasure that a free and general assembly should be indicted, kept, and holden at Glasgow on the 21st of November; and, immediately after this, proclamation was made for a parliament to meet at Edinburgh upon the 15th of May. 1639. And a day or two after these proclamations, the lords of the council published an act approving the king's discharge of the Service Book, Book of Canons, &c., and requiring all his majesty's subjects to subscribe the Confession of Faith as now offered to them. The ministers, several of the municipal bodies, and the people, hastened to make joyful acclamations, and to thank his majesty and their lordships for putting down those abominations; but as for subscription to the Confession, they would not hear of it. At first some persons offered to sign the Confession, but they were deterred by their ministers, who represented that all that was now done or promised by the king was only done to gain time,—that he was preparing worse usage than ever, and that, withal, it would be perjury for such as had taken the covenant to sign the king's confession.

The marquis, seeing that it would be impossible to prevent a rupture at Glasgow, advised Charles to hasten his warlike preparations. The Scottish bishops, though not averse to the hastening on of a war of religion, pressed Hamilton to put off the meeting of the general assembly. The marquis acquainted the king with their desire. Charles, in reply, told him that he should soon receive a particular answer from my Lord of Canterbury to all his propositions touching the assembly, and then continued: "As for the opinions of the clergy to prorogue this assembly, his majesty utterly disliked them, for that it would more hurt his reputation by not keeping it than their mad acts could prejudice his service; wherefore he commanded the marquis to hold the day; but (as the marquis writ) if he can break them by proving nullities in their proceedings, nothing better. Lastly, concerning assessors, his majesty likes their names, and (as the marquis writ) he must not suffer his majesty to lose his privilege."[1] In another letter Charles spoke still more openly of the scheme he had arranged with Hamilton for sowing discord among the members of the assembly, and defeating their acts by protests. "As for the general assembly," writes the king, "though I can expect no good from it, yet I hope you may hinder much of the ill; first by putting divisions among them concerning the legality of their elections, then by protesting against their tumultuary proceedings." But in the leaders of the covenant Charles had to deal with enemies as wary or cunning as himself; and by this time, at the latest, the Scots were convinced that the questions at issue must be settled rather by a campaign than by an assembly. Notwithstanding the waylaying of the posts, and the carrying of all letters to Secretary Coke, their friends in England contrived now and then to send them important advices. One of these, in relating the warlike preparations of Charles, gives an account of the sympathy of his English subjects. "There be preparation," says this anonymous correspondent, "for 20,000 men, of swords, guns, &c., 40 pieces of ordnance, and 40 carriages. The Earl Marshal of England is to go into the north, there to secure those parts, where Berwick, Carlisle, and Newcastle are to be fortified; but it is thought they will not get 200 men for their 20,000 arms in this cause. You will not believe how heartily the cause is nigh to succeed among the nobility, gentry, and commonalty. The nobility have some of them labored to get a society who might petition the king for removal of such grievances as they labor under. but there can not be gotten above two of the nobility that will join in this business; you may guess who they are:[2] so as they conceive it but folly of themselves to push, whereas the rest have declared they will not join in it; but, however, they are resolved not to abide here, being indeed under such a light as must suffer extinguishment if it abide in this so dampish an air. I hear it the unanimous consent of many leading persons, that they hope to find an America in Scotland; and all designs foreign receive a stoppage until it be seen wherein yours will determine. If a liberty can be had with you, there will be hardly found receipt for those who will thrust themselves among you, such who are men of eminent rank and great estates, and those who, I dare say, will spend, a few of them, in the discharge of their ordinary affairs, more money yearly nor [than] is now to be spared in the kingdom: I could number forty or fifty of them that will allot £100,000 yearly for their expense; many there be of the like sort I know not of, but such as I have spoken with have often wished that you be sure in the close of your agreement that you make petition that there may be free traffic preserved betwixt yourselves and the other subjects of the king's dominions: you to come, drive trade, cohabit with them, and they to do the like with you, without any hindrance, as subjects of the same government and members of the same body ought to do. You, by this manner, will get their estates and persons among you, and they will take none of your gospel away, although they communicate with you. Pray consider of this; it is of much concernment both to yourselves and others here, who can not expect, from any appearance of the least motion thitherward, that there is hope of so much as any relaxation of the course begun, and unhappily brought forward in these parts. That you may taste a little of our condition, I have sent you two of your own Scots Bibles, your New Testament only, wherein they have placed such abominable pictures, that horrible impiety stares through them: these come forth by public authority; do you show them to such as you think meet; I send to each of you one of them." This skillful correspondent went on to inform the Scots, that Wentworth had made large offers of assistance to the king from Ireland,—some said an army of sixteen thousand men,—but he doubted the lord deputy's ability, seeing that that kingdom was itself in an unquiet state. The Earl of Antrim had been presented to the king as one having great power in Ireland, and the leading of a strong and numerous sept of the Mac Donnells, which were now serving under the Lord of Lorn, the son of Argyle; that Lorn was going into Ireland, to make what party he could there, and then into the Highlands of Argyle; and that shot for ordnance had been newly cast, and flat-bottomed boats prepared for the landing of men on the coast of Scotland. He says, "Wise men here do think that the king is resolved to hold you in all fair and promising ways of treaty, until he hath sufficiently fitted himself by provisions both of arms and men, and then you may look for no other language but what comes from the mouth of the cannon: be assured, if the king can bring it to this pass, he will, but most likely he will not be able: yet how far rewards, pensions, and the like, may prevail, either to separate you among yourselves, or otherways to hire a foreigner to come upon you (if his domestic subjects will not be drawn to it), it is hard to say; good wisdom, therefore, to be at a point quickly while God preserves union among you."[1]

With mingled warnings and threats like these continually ringing in their ears, with their sharp political sagacity, their confidence in their own strength and the king's weakness, it could hardly be expected from the Scots that they should pursue a a conciliating or compromising course. Although Charles had dismissed the bishops from the offices of the state, he had left them in the church; and the Covenanters held that episcopacy was incompatible with the existence of liberal institutions and the true worship of God,—a sentiment which was echoed beyond the Tweed. At the end of October the Earl of Rothes, in the name of the Covenanters, demanded a warrant for citing the bishops to appear as criminals before the general assembly at Glasgow. Hamilton replied that the law was open for citing all such as were either within the kingdom or without; but he declined giving the warrant, as being a thing without precedent; and it was enough, he said, that he did not protect them against trial. Upon this repulse the Covenanters addressed themselves to the presbytery of Edinburgh, who took upon them to issue warrants against the bishops. It would have been in vain to look for apostolical poverty, simplicity, and purity among these prelates, —some of them, we believe, had led rather a free life,—but the uncharitableness, the whole fury of political and religious partisanship, was let loose in the summons; and the bishops were cited as being notoriously guilty of heresy, simony, perjury, incest, adultery, fornication, Sabbath-breaking, &c.; and the presbytery ordered all this to be read in the Collegiate church of Edinburgh immediately after communion, and then to be read in every church in Scotland, which was done accordingly, to the edification of the people, who believed no crime too dark for "the priests of Baal."[1]

As one of the signs of his returning favor, Charles restored the session or term to his good town of Edinburgh. Hamilton, having dealt with all the lords of the session beforehand, urged them to sign the King's Confession of Faith; two of these judges absented themselves, four positively refused, but at length nine of the fifteen signed; and from that moment they durst hardly walk the streets, for fear of being torn to pieces by the people. Charles remitted to the marquis the minutest instructions as to his deportment at the assembly, and perused and revised the opening speech which he was to deliver. Hamilton required the king's advocate to prepare himself to prove that episcopacy was according to the laws of Scotland; but the advocate answered that his conscience would not permit any such thing; that he judged episcopacy to be contrary both to the laws of Scotland and to the laws of the church, and also to God's own word; and thereupon the advocate was "prevailed upon" not to attend the general assembly at all. On the 17th of November, the marquis arrived at Glasgow in a quiet and peaceable manner, none of his train carrying with them any prohibited arms. He there found letters and sundry protests from the bishops, who implored him to keep them secret, and to present them seasonably, before they or their cause should suffer any wrong from the assembly. The city of Glasgow being filled and thronged with all sorts of people, on the day appointed by the king's proclamation (the 21st of November, 1638), the general assembly began by listening to a very long sermon which occupied the whole forenoon. In the afternoon they would have proceeded to the choosing of a moderator, but Hamilton, who, as king's commissioner, was seated upon a chair "raised eminent above the rest." told them that there was something to do previously, and that was the reading of his commission, that it might be understood by what authority he sat there. The commission, in Latin, was accordingly read, and then the assembly would have again proceeded to the choice of their moderator; but the marquis again interrupted them, and desired that his majesty's letter to the general assembly should first be read; and this letter, which bore the date of the 29th of October, was read accordingly. It was very short. Charles told them that he was not ignorant that the best of his actions had been mistaken by many of his subjects in his ancient kingdom, as if he had intended innovation in religion and laws; yet, considering it to be the special duty of a Christian king to advance God's glory and the true religion, forgetting what was past, he had seriously taken into his princely consideration such particulars as might settle religion and satisfy all his good subjects of the sincerity of his intentions, and had therefore indicted this present free general assembly, appointing the marquis to attend the same, to whom he required them to give that true and due respect and obedience as if he himself were personally present.[1] When this reading was done, Hamilton stood up and made his opening speech. He told the assembly that the making of long harangues was not suitable either to his education or profession—that there had been talking enough already—that it was now time for acting. We blush for the unfortunate victim of loyalty, who knew all his master's insincerity, and who had advised or prescribed part of his conduct, when we find him pursuing his address in the following strain:—"For the professions which have been made by our sacred sovereign (whom God long preserve over us), I am come hither, by his command, to make them good to his whole people, whom, to his grief, he hath found to have been poisoned (by whom I know not well, but God forgive them) with misconceits of his intentions concerning the religion professed in this church and kingdom. But, to rectify all such misconceptions of his subjects, his majesty's desire is, that, before this assembly proceed to any thing else, his subjects may receive an ample and clear satisfaction in these points, wherein his majesty's gracious intentions have been misdoubted or glanced at by the malevolent aspects of such as are afraid that his majesty's good subjects should see his clear mind through any other glasses or spectacles than those they have tempered and fitted for them. These sinistrous aspersions, dispersed by surmises, have been especially two. First, as if there had been in his majesty, if not some intentions, yet at least some inclination, to give way, if not to alterations, yet to some innovations in the religion professed in, and established by the laws of this church and kingdom. I am confident that no man can harbor or retain any such thought in his breast any more, when his majesty hath commanded that Confession of Faith, which you call the negative, to be subscribed by all his subjects whatsoever, and hath been graciously pleased to put the execution of this, his royal command, in your own hands. The next false, and indeed foul and devilish surmise, wherewith his good subjects have been misled, is, that nothing promised in his majesty's last most gracious proclamation (though most ungraciously received) was ever intended to be performed, nay, not the assembly itself; but that only time was to be gained, till his majesty, by arms, might oppress this, his own native kingdom; than which report hell itself could not have raised a blacker and falser. For that part which concerneth the report of the intention of not holding the assembly, this day and place, as was first promised and proclaimed, thanks be to God, confuteth that calumny abundantly; for the other, making good what his majesty did promise in his last gracious proclamation, his majesty hath commanded me thus to express his heart to all his good subjects. He hath seriously considered all the grievances of his subjects, which have been presented to him by all and several of their petitions, remonstrances. and supplications exhibited unto himself, his commissioner, and lords of his secret council, and hath graciously granted them all; and as he hath already granted as far as could be by proclamation, so he doth now desire that his subjects may be assured of them by acts of this general assembly, and afterward by acts of parliament respective."[1]

He told them, moreover, that his majesty not only desired, but commanded that every thing he had promised should first be taken in hand by the assembly and enacted, and that afterward other things which his subjects might desire should be thought upon; so that it might be known to God and the whole world, and particularly to all his good subjects, how careful his majesty was to perform all his gracious promises. The noble marquis knew that while he was making these solemn assertions his master was preparing gunpowder and ball for his good subjects; and so also knew many of those whom he addressed. The assembly then proceeded to elect their moderator, but Hamilton stopped them with a protest, that their act should neither prejudice the king's prerogative nor the laws of the kingdom, nor bar the king from taking legal exceptions against the person elected or the irregularity of his election. After this delay they chose Alexander Henderson, minister of Leuchars, in Fife, who in many essentials was the John Knox of the day. Hamilton would here have read his declinator or protest against their authority, but they proceeded to the election of a clerk-register. The person chosen was Archibald Johnston, clerk of their Tables at Edinburgh. Hamilton protested against his election, but the assembly adhered to their choice; and Johnston, after making a short speech, declaring that he was unworthy of the charge, yet would not be wanting to do his best for "defense of the prerogative of the Son of God," began to perform the duties of clerk. On the following day Hamilton entered a fresh protest against the return of lay elders to the assembly. Charles had reflected deeply upon the jealousies likely to arise between laymen and clergy; and, as lay elders, who, at the Reformation, had attended all general assemblies, had been displaced by his father, he thought to make their election on the present occasion appear like an innovation. But the Lords of the Tables, who had organized this mighty resistance, were resolved not to trust entirely to the spirit and courage of the preachers; and, beside, they were not very anxious that the tyranny of the presbytery should be substituted for the tyranny of episcopacy. They had, therefore, taken care to preserve that part of the original constitution of the reformed national church, by which the laity were associated with the clergy in its government. Hereupon the proctor, or commissioner for the bishops, declined the jurisdiction of the assembly, as not being a purely ecclesiastical body. Regardless of this declinator, the assembly proceeded to open their accusation, the moderator Henderson, in a short speech, deploring the obstinacy of the bishops' hearts, who had betrayed no sign of remorse and sorrow for their wicked courses. Hamilton, after insisting on the reading of their protest, called the charges a libel against the bishops, an infamous and scurrilous libel. On this, one of the clerks of session thundered out a verbal protestation that they would pursue these charges against the bishops so long as they had lives and fortunes. Thereupon Hamilton protested in his turn, and discharged the bishops' proctor from giving appearance for the bishops before the assembly; and, finding the utter impossibility of shielding those prelates from the prosecution, he determined to dissolve the assembly on the very next day. In the course of this same day he wrote a memorable letter to the king, cursing his country for its non-compliance with his majesty's will. The sincerity of Hamilton has been called in question, but we think upon insufficient grounds. The fact is, he was afterward hated and calumniated by the royalists, who thought that he had done too little; and he was hunted to the scaffold by the parliamentarians and the Presbyterians, who felt that he had done too much.

"Most sacred Sovereign," says the marquis, "when I consider the many great and most extraordinary favors which your majesty hath been pleased to confer upon me, if you were not my sovereign, gratitude would oblige me to labor faithfully, and that to the uttermost of my power, to manifest my thankfulness. Yet so unfortunate have I been in this unlucky country, that, though I did prefer your service before all worldly considerations, nay, even strained my conscience in some points, by subscribing the negative confession, yet all hath been to small purpose; for I have missed my end in not being able to make your majesty as considerable a party as will be able to curb the insolency of this rebellious nation, without assistance from England, and greater charge to your majesty than this miserable country is worth. As I shall answer to God at the last day, I have done my best, though the success has proven so bad as I think myself of all men living most miserable, in finding that I have been so useless a servant to him to whom I owe so much. And, seeing this may perhaps be the last letter that ever I shall have the happiness to write to your majesty, I shall, therefore, in it discharge my duty so far as freely to express my thoughts in such things as I do conceive concerneth your service. And because I will be sure that it should not miscarry, I have sent it by this faithful servant of your majesty's, whom I have found to be so trusty as he may be employed by you, even to go against his nearest friend and dearest kindred. Upon the whole matter your majesty has been grossly abused by my lords of the clergy, by bringing in those things in this church not in the ordinary and legal way. For the truth is, this action of theirs is not justifiable by the laws of this kingdom; their pride was great, but their folly greater; for, if they had gone right about this work, nothing was more easy than to have effected what was aimed at. As for the persons of the men, it will prove of small use to have them characterized out by me, their condition being such as they can not be too much pitied; yet, lest I should lay upon them a heavier imputation, by saying nothing, that I intend, therefore I shall crave leave to say this much. It will be found that some of them have not been of the best lives, as St. Andrew's, Brechin, Argyle, Aberdeen; too many of them inclined to simony; yet, for my Lord of Ross, the most hated of all, and generally by all, there are few personal faults laid to his charge, more than ambition, which I can not account a fault so it be in lawful things. But, sir, to leave them, and come to those whom I conceive it is more necessary you should know, your officers and counselors, of whom I shall write without spleen or favor, as I shall answer to Him at the last day to whom I must give an account (I know not how soon) of all my actions."

Hamilton then proceeds to draw characters of these officers and counselors, which are not without point. The Lord Treasurer Traquair is set down as having great ambition and a laboring after popularity, which had prejudiced his majesty's service. My Lord Privy Seal Roxburgh, who had been so well known to his majesty's father, of blessed memory, had declared himself for episcopal government; but Hamilton likes not his limitations; yet the king, he observes, must make use of him, for he was a powerful man in the country. The Marquis of Huntley was much misliked, "traduced not only to be popishly inclined, but even a direct Roman Catholic; nay, they spared not to tax him with personal faults:" "but howsoever," continues Hamilton, "this I am sure of, since my coming here, he hath proved a faithful servant to you; and I am confident will be of greater use, when your majesty shall take arms in your hand." The Earl of Argyle, whom Charles had recently offended in a willful and absurd manner, was the only man cried up in Scotland as a true patriot, a loyal subject, a faithful counselor, and, above all, rightly set for the preservation of the purity of religion. With a correct estimate of Argyle's character and means, Hamilton goes on to say, "he must be well looked to; for it fears me he will prove the dangerousest man in this state: he is so far from favoring episcopal government, that, with all his soul, he wishes it totally abolished." The Earl of Perth was taxed with being a Roman Catholic, but Hamilton declares that he had a loyal heart, and was no great politician, nor of much power out of the Highlands, but, as he might contribute to the curbing of Argyle, he ought to be encouraged. Tullibardine he took to be honest, a man of abilities, and a true hater of Argyle. The earls of Wigton and Kinghorn were gone clearly the wrong way: Haddington had too much the humor of the times, but he had sworn to Hamilton that he would fight for the king, and never ask what his quarrel was; yet Hamilton greatly feared that few of his friends would go along with with him in the quarrel in defense of episcopacy. Lauderdale was a man of no great power, but truly honest and most rightly set. Southesk had shown himself forwardly stout: he was a man of great power, rich, and had been extremely beloved; but was now as much hated by all the Scots. Therefore he deserved his majesty's favor; and Hamilton, who had studied at court, thought that none would be fitter to be made lord chancellor of Scotland. Kinnoul, Finlater, Linlithgow, and Dalzell were true, but not very powerful; "and, as for the rest of the council," continues Hamilton, "they are either of no power to serve you, or totally set the Covenanters' way. . . . Now, for the Covenanters, I shall only say this in general—they may be all placed in one roll as they now stand. But certainly, sir, those that have both broached the business, and still hold it aloft, are Rothes, Balmerino, Lindsay, Lothian, Loudon, Yester, Cranston. There are many others as forward in show; among whom none more vainly foolish than MONTROSE.[1] But the above-mentioned are the main contrivers. The gentry, burghs, and ministers have their ringleaders too. It will be too long to set down all their names. Those who I conceive to be the most inclined, the clerk-register (who is a faithful servant to the crown), if I miscarry, will give you information of them; yet, I fear him, poor man, more than myself. But they are obvious and known to all. This is all that I will say concerning the persons of the men in this kingdom; wishing, sir, in my heart, those whom I misdoubt, I may be deceived by their future carriage; and that their loyalty may appear, which will blot out of your majesty's memory what my duty and fidelity to you has caused me to write thus of them. It is more than probable that these people have somewhat else in their thoughts than religion. But that must serve for a cloak to rebellion, wherein for a time they may prevail; but, to make them miserable, and to bring them again to a dutiful obedience, I am confident your majesty will not find it a work of long time, nor of great difficulty, as they have foolishly fancied to themselves. The way to effect which, in my opinion is briefly thus: their greatest strength consists in the burghs; and their being is by trade; whereof a few ships of your majesty's, well disposed, will easily bar them. Their chiefest trade is in the eastern seas and to Holland, with coal and salt, and importing of victual, and other commodities from thence; whereof if they be but one year stopped, an age can not recover them; yet so blinded they are, that this they will not see. This alone, without further charge to your majesty, your frontiers being well guarded, will work your end. This care should be taken, that when particular burghs can be made sensible of their past errors, and willing to return to their allegiance, they be not only then not barred from trade, but received into your majesty's favor and protection."[1] He proceeds to tell the king that this would certainly so irritate the Covenanters, that all those who stood for his majesty would be in great and imminent danger; but this he thought might be provided for, at least in the north, by appointing the Marquis of Huntley his majesty's lieutenant there, with full power to raise as many troops as he should think fit. South of the Forth the danger would be still greater; but there also the king might appoint his lieutenant with the same powers of raising troops and carrying on war. He observes that the presence of a commissioner or lord deputy in Scotland was indispensable; "where," he continues, "you will find a man I can not possibly say, unless your majesty send the Duke of Lennox: as for the Marquis of Huntley, certainly he may be trusted by you, but whether fitly or no, I can not say. If I keep my life (though next hell I hate this place), if you think me worthy of employment, I shall not weary till the government be again set right; and then I will forswear this country. As for your majesty's castle of Edinburgh, it was a most shameful thing it should have been so neglected. I can not promise that it shall be defended, yet I hope that they shall not take it but by an hostile act. Some few men I have stolen in, but, as yet, can not get one musket put there, nor one yard of match. I have trusted, for a time, the same man that was in it, and perhaps your majesty will think this strange that I have done so; yet necessity forced me to it. For thither Ruthven would not go without arms and ammunition; and, indeed, he is not to be blamed therefore: but, sir, I have that in working, that, if I can accomplish, may, for a time, secure that place. And for my trusting that man, I can only say this, that if he deceive me, we were in no worse condition than when it was in Lord Marr's hands; safe only for the giving him £2000, which, if lost by the default of him whom I have trusted, your majesty shall not be burdened by the payment of this money, for I deserve to lose it for my confidence. He is no Covenanter, and hath solemnly sworn to me to lose his life before he quit it. As for Dunbritton

[1] In reading this expression we are to remember Hamilton's own character, which was reserved and severe, and altogether opposite to that of the fiery, impetuous Montrose.

[1] Hamilton gives the king his notions as to the best method of managing this blockade:—"In my opinion your ships would be best ordered thus—eight or ten to lie in the Firth. There should be some three or four plying to and again betwixt the Firth and Aberdeen, so long as the season of the year will permit them to keep the seas; and when they are not longer able they may retire into the Firth, in which there are several places in which they may ride in all weathers. Those ships which lay in the Irish seas will be sufficient to bar all the trade on the west of Scotland. The fittingest places are between Arran and the coast of Galloway. When the weather is foul there is an excellent road in Galloway called Lochyen, and another in Arran, called Lamlash, or the Holy Island, where they may ride in safety. That is all I shall say concerning the barring them of trade."

[Dunbarton], the way is easy to put as many men there as you please, with victual and ammunition; from Ireland they must come, and at the castle they must land: one hundred men will be sufficient, provided with ammunition and victual for three months; and the sooner this be done the better. Thus, sir, your majesty hath the humble opinion of what I conceive of the affairs of the kingdom. What I have said I humbly submit to your majesty. I have now only this one suit to your majesty, that if my sons live they may be bred in England, and made happy by service in the court; and if they prove not loyal to the crown, my curse be on them. I wish my daughters be never married in Scotland. I humbly recommend my brother to your favor."[1]

The morning after writing this very un-Scottish letter to the king, Hamilton summoned the lords of the council and told them, with very little periphrasis, that he was necessitated to dissolve the assembly, and then tried hard to make them all concur with him as to the necessity. The Earl of Argyle asked if he, the lord commissioner, was to desire the Scottish council's approbation of what he intended, or not? The marquis replied that his instructions from his master were clear and positive, and therefore it was not in his power to permit any debate as to what he should do or not do, but he only desired their concurrence and advice as to the manner of doing it. After two hours of discourse, which elicited no clear advice from any member of the council, he proceeded to the church where the assembly sat. There he remained for some time a silent witness of their debates; but when they were about to put it to the vote, whether that assembly was not free and perfect, notwithstanding the bishops' protest, knowing well how the vote would run, he suddenly rose up, and, in a speech of great length and considerable eloquence —not wholly destitute of home-truths—in his majesty's name dissolved them, and forbade their further proceedings, under pain of treason. Henderson, the moderator, and the Earl of Rothes, told him that they were sorry he was going to leave them, but their consciences bore them witness they had done nothing amiss, and therefore they would not desert the work of God; albeit, "in its due line and subordination they acknowledged their duty of obedience to the king." Hamilton then hastened back to the council. The Earl of Argyle told him in plain language that he would take the covenant and recognize the assembly; but most of the council pretended to be satisfied with the conduct of the marquis; and yet he durst not offer to their signature the proclamation for dissolving the assembly, for fear of a refusal, "not having tried them all in it beforehand." The next morning, however, he got them all to sign it, except Argyle, and then sent it to be read at the market-cross at Glasgow. But again the Covenanters were ready with their protest, which was read and affixed immediately after it. "The protestation of the general assembly of the church of Scotland," as the document was called, stated that his grace, his sacred majesty's commissioner, had never allowed any freedom to the assembly, competent to it, to the word of God, to the acts and practice of this church, or to his majesty's summons; but had labored to restrain the same by protesting against all the acts made therein, and against the constitution thereof by such members as by all law, reason, and custom had ever been admitted to their free assemblies. After a deal of assertion and reasoning of the same kind, the protesters declared that if the commissioner, his grace, should depart and leave this church and kingdom in the present disorder, it was both lawful and necessary, notwithsanding his dissolution, for the assembly to continue to sit till they had tried, judged, and censured all bygone evils; that, accordingly, they would continue to sit; and that their assembly was and should be esteemed and obeyed as a most lawful, full, and free general assembly of the kingdom, and that all acts, sentences, censures, &c., passed by it should be obeyed by all the subjects of the kingdom, and all the members of the true church.

Hamilton now urged the king to complete his preparations. Laud, however, in a letter, dated the 7th of December, told him that "the jealousies of giving the Covenanters umbrage too soon had made preparations so late," but that he, the archbishop, had called, and was daily calling upon his majesty to make more haste. Laud was furious against the assembly. "Never," he says, "were there more gross absurdities, nor half so many, in so short a time committed in any public meeting: and, for a national assembly, never did the church of Christ see the like." After thanking his grace for the care he had taken of the persons of two bishops whom he had secretly conveyed to Hamilton Castle, and condoling with him on his own great peril from the inexpressible fury of the Scottish people, Laud adds, "But I trust in God he will preserve you, and by your great patience, wisdom, and industry, set his majesty's affairs in a right posture once again; which, if I might live to see, I would be glad to sing my Nunc dimittis."[1]

Meanwhile the assembly continued its prosecution of the bishops. Upon the departure of Hamilton, the Earl of Argyle openly declared himself their head, and sat constantly with them in the assembly, not as a member, but as their chief director. In brief time they condemned all the Arminian tenets whatsoever,—declared episcopal government to be abolished forever—and passed many other acts of equally sweeping character. Not satisfied with merely depriving the bishops, they excommunicated the greater part of them, together with the few preachers that adhered to them, and all their fautors or abettors. The downfall of episcopacy, in a political sense, was acceptable to every patriot in Scotland, for Charles and his father had contrived to center nearly the whole power of the parliament in the bishops. For example, eight of them were what were called Lords of the Articles, having power to choose eight of the nobility whom they knew to be "addicted to his majesty," and these sixteen had the power of choosing all the rest, so that all depended upon the bishops as the bishops depended upon the king.[1] It was on this ground, perhaps, more than upon any other, that the nobility made their decided stand against prelacy. In spite of Hamilton's real or affected dread of assassination, the Covenanters quietly allowed him to return to England, whither he went to direct the hostile preparations against them. Charles thundered out fresh proclamations, annulling all the proceedings of the assembly, which were met, as usual, by counter-protests. Nor were the Covenanters slower than the king in their military preparations. As early as the month of July, they had made a magazine of pikes, halberts, and muskets. Early in December, it was known that one Barnes, a merchant of Edinburgh, had brought some 6000 muskets out of Holland: the ship which carried these arms was stopped by the government of the United Provinces; but the King of France, the loving brother of Charles's queen, got the vessel freed and sent to a French port, as if the muskets were for his own use, and, from the French port, ships and arms were forwarded to Leith. "It is strange," says the reporter of these facts, "if his majesty of France, or any prince, should further the arming of subjects against their prince."[2] But, if strange, it was not rare, and Cardinal Richelieu, who felt like a spider every line or thread of the political web woven over Europe, had strong reasons for finding Charles employment at home. It is indeed proved that, from a very early stage of these troubles, he cautiously but eagerly offered some of the Scots assistance. But their best strength was in the zeal of their own preachers and the steady determination of their own hearts, which would have been most noble and glorious but for the admixture of fanaticism and intolerance, and no small proportion of cant and hypocrisy. The artillery of the kirk was louder than that of armies. One minister of repute declared that all Scotsmen who had not subscribed to the Covenant were atheists; another in his sermon wished that he and all the bishops were at sea together in a rotten boat, for he could be content to lose his own life so that the priests of Baal should perish; another preached that, as their author, God, was never diverted from his chosen people until the seven sons of Saul were hanged up before the Lord in Gideon, so the wrath of God would never depart from the Scots till their twice seven bishops were hanged up before the Lord there; another declared that the bloodiest and sharpest war was to be endured rather than the the least error in doctrine and discipline. They refused the communion to such as had not subscribed their covenant, nor would they permit baptism to be administered by any but ministers of their own body. At the same time the supreme Table, or committee in Edinburgh, issued its instructions to the provincial tables and presbyteries, all so thoroughly organized that the business was transacted with more than the regularity of an old government; every man of an age to bear arms was taught the use of them, drilled and trained to the duties of a soldier; the Scottish officers, whom poverty or love of adventure, or the religious enthusiasm, had carried abroad to fight for the Dutch, for the Protestants of Germany, for the glorious Swede—the men who had grown gray in arms, who had witnessed and contributed to the dazzling victories of the Lion of the North—hastened back to their native hills and gave all the weight of their military experience to the popular party. The article in which Scotland had ever been most deficient was money; but on the present occasion, excited by their preachers, the citizens of Edinburgh and other towns gave in voluntary donations; the nobility in many instances sent their plate to be coined; the merchants settled in foreign countries, particularly in France and Holland, remitted specie, or ammunition, or arms. The worldly wise among them suggested that aid might be obtained from the Lutheran princes of Germany—from the kings of France and Spain; but the preachers and the godly declared that it would be refusing the protection of Heaven, and leaning to the broken reed of Egypt, to accept assistance from heretics and Roman Catholics. Still, however, some of the leaders thought that some French money would do no harm to the cause, and it was secretly arranged with Richelieu that the French ambassador at London should pay 100,000 crowns to General Leslie, whom they had appointed their commander-in-chief.

A.D. 1639. And in what state were the finances and the other means of the king? We are told very clearly by the Earl of Northumberland, in a letter addressed to Wentworth, and dated in the month of January:—"I assure your lordship, to my understanding, with sorrow I speak it, we are altogether in as ill a posture to invade others or to defend ourselves as we were a twelvemonth since, which is more than any man can imagine that is not an eye-witness of it. The discontents here at home do rather increase than lessen, there being no course taken to give any kind of satisfaction. The king's coffers were never emptier than at this time, and to us that have the honor to be near about him, no way is yet known how he will find means either to maintain or begin a war without the help of his people. . . . In a word, I fear the ways we run will not prevent the evils that threaten us."[1] Cottington before this had told Wentworth—"We are almost certain it will come to a war, and that a defensive one on our side, and how we shall defend ourselves without money is not under my cap. My lord, assure yourself they do believe they shall make a conquest of us, and that an easy one; they speak loud, yea, even they that are here, and do despise us beyond measure. No course is taken for levying of money, the king will not hear of a parliament, and he is told by a committee of learned men that there is no other way."

[1] Strafford Letters

By the beginning of the year Charles had named his captains and general-officers, had issued orders to the lords-lieutenants to muster the trained bands of their several counties, had borrowed money from all that would lend, had suspended the payment of all pensions and allowances. On the 15th of February he addressed a letter to the nobility, telling them that the late disorders in Scotland, begun upon pretense of religion, but raised by factious spirits and fomented by some few treacherous, ill-affected persons, whose aim was, by troubling the peace of that kingdom, to work their own particular ends and shake off all monarchical government, was now grown to such a height that he had reason to take into his consideration the defense and safety of his kingdom of England; that, therefore, upon consultation with his privy council (he did not even name a parliament), he had resolved to repair in his own royal person to the northern parts of this his kingdom, to resist any invasion that might happen. After mentioning the directions he had given for the levying of a considerable army to attend him in this expedition, he added, "and withal [we] hereby do require you to attend our royal person and standard at the our city of York, on the 1st day of April next ensuing, with such equipage and such forces as your birth, honor, and interest in the commonalty doth oblige you to, &c. And we do, and have reason to expect from you a performance hereof, and these our letters shall be as sufficient and effectual a warrant and discharge unto you to put yourself and such as shall attend you, into arms and order as aforesaid, as if you were authorized thereunto under our great seal of England."[1] He made an attempt through the agency of Colonel Gage to procure a foreign army of six thousand foot and four hundred horse from the archduke, in return for which he engaged to permit the raising annually in Ireland recruits for the armies of Spain; but this negotiation failed because the archduke could not spare so many disciplined troops. He called upon the judges, and lawyers,[2] and servants of the crown to contribute to the expenses of the war out of their salaries; and he required from many of the gentry payments to excuse their personal attendance in the campaign. The clergy of the establishment were tolerably liberal[3]—in some places exceedingly so — for they considered the war, which some irreverently called a war about lawn sleeves, a holy war; and they felt that it involved the not unimportant question, whether they or the Puritans should hold the livings and the supremacy of England. The name of every clergyman who refused or was unable to contribute was especially certified and returned to Archbishop Laud. And while Laud and the king called upon the clergy and all good Protestants, the queen called upon all the English Catholics. "We," said Henrietta Maria, in a sort of public proclamation to those of her religion, in which the regal style was assumed in all its forms, "have so good a belief in the loyalty and affection of his majesty's Catholic subjects, as we doubt not but upon this occasion that hath called his majesty into the northern parts, for the defense of his honor and dominions, they will express themselves so affected as we have always represented them to his majesty. So in this common consent, which hath appeared in the nobility, judges, gentry, and others, to forward his majesty's service by their persons and estates, we have made no difficulty to answer for the same correspondency in his Catholic subjects as Catholics, notwithstanding they all had already concurred to this his majesty's service, according to the qualities whereof they are, when others of the same quality were called upon; for we believe that it became us, who have been so often interested in the solicitations of their benefits, to show ourselves now in the persuasion of their gratitudes. . . . . We have thought fit (to the end that this our desire may be the more public and the more authorized) hereby to give you commission and direction to distribute copies under your hand of this testification thereof unto those that have met in London by our direction about this business, and unto the several collectors of every county. And as we presume the sum they will raise will not be unworthy our presenting to the king, so shall we be very sensible of it, as a particular respect to ourselves, and will endeavor, in the most efficacious manner we can, to improve the merit of it, and to remove any apprehension of prejudices that any (who shall employ themselves toward the success of this business) may conceive by this; and be assured that we will secure them from all such objected inconveniences. And we are very confident that this our first recommendation will be so complied withal as may not only afford us particular satisfaction, but also facilitation toward their own advantages."[1] How soon this circular was known to the Puritans does not appear, but it was probably discovered by them immediately. Nothing could be more calculated to increase their indignation and fury, and their old jealousies of the queen. We have already shown how the religious intolerance of the Puritans prevented the Catholics from becoming patriots. The latter were exceedingly well inclined to assist the king against the Scots, and disregarding the danger they thereby incurred, they held a public meeting in London for the purpose of recommending all their brethren to subscribe. The

[2] The contribution of the doctors of civil law at Doctors' Commons, as appeared by several notes under Sir John Lambe's own hand, found among his writings, amounted to £671 13*s*. 4*d*. paid in.

[3] The clergy at Bedford were found to be "willing to contribute as much as was propounded. The poorest that gave any thing at all gave no less than 3*s*. 10*d*. in the pound, without deducting of tenths: the most gave 4*s*., some 5*s*., some 6*s*. in the pound." "I doubt not," says Dr. John Pocklington, who communicates this intelligence to Sir John Lambe, "but the clergy of England will teach the ministers of Scotland duty and obedience; and if their laity will be taught the like by ours, his majesty, I hope, will have a loyal and joyful progress into Scotland, which God grant." The worthy doctor, however, did not neglect this occasion of pressing for his own advancement in the church, and that also of his old acquaintance and very good friend Dr. Micklethwait, if it might please God that he might be better accommodated. "No parsonage of England," he says, "could fit me better than Sandy: it is of good value, it would draw me out of this corner, where my stirring for church rights makes me less acceptable with some great hands."—Rushworth.

pope's nuncio presided at this meeting, and thus more than ever gave a papistical character to the war.

Charles, though himself a born Scot, seems to have thought it would be no difficult matter to revive those national jealousies and animosities which, for so many centuries, had kept the countries near the borders wet with blood: but he was mistaken,—the religious feeling triumphed over the national one; and every Englishman that disliked Laud and Arminianism looked upon every Covenanter as a friend, as a brother confessor, as a brother in Christ. In vain were royal proclamations issued to show that the Scots were traitors, rebels,—that their object was to uproot monarchy,—to insult, invade, and plunder the good and plentiful land of England. The secret correspondence established between the Covenanters and the English patriots became closer and more active than ever: the Scots had friends and agents in London, in all the counties, in the army, and in the very court: their counter proclamations were circulated throughout England; their proceedings in the general assembly, in council, and in the field, were all reported in the minutest detail to patient and sympathizing auditors.[1] The silenced ministers—silent no longer—proclaimed that the Scots had begun the good fight; and that it was the duty of every English subject that loved liberty and the true religion, to make common cause with them, instead of opposing them. Nor were Charles's endeavors to sow dissensions among the Scottish nobles who had taken the covenant attended with much more success. Even English gold lost its value in their eyes when put in the scale with religion; and it must be remembered Charles had not much gold to give. We possess many remarkable papers, both of a public and private nature, in which the Presbyterian ministers exhort the nobility to firmness and unanimity, and the nobles exhort one another to constancy in this great cause; but, perhaps, though many of them are written with extraordinary power and eloquence, none is more remarkable than the exhortatory letter from the Laird of Wariston to Lord Johnston. It appears that the Lord Johnston had been somewhat lukewarm in the cause,—had shunned "either to meat or meal" with the Covenanters after frequent invitations; and it was apprehended that, as he was going to court, he might be won upon to swear to the king's confession of faith. "If," says Wariston, "you take this oath, then you renounce the covenant with God; you draw down his vengeance visibly upon you, your house and your name, good fame, yourself, and your posterity, with that stigmatizing blot and blunder of a traitor to your religion, the kirk, the liberty and freedom of this kingdom; you will be infamous in all stories, and contemned both at home and abroad, whereof I am very confident you abhor the very thought worse nor [than] death. Mistake not my forewarning you of these consequences, as if I believed your lordship would fall in them, for I protest I am not capable, as yet, of such an imagination: but you know my license and liberty to be free, in this business, with all I love and respect; and therefore I would seriously, from the earnest desire of my heart to your welfare and good name, advise your lordship not to make this voyage, in this way, after such dryness with the lords, and such suspicions among the people. But, if really your lordship's particular enforceth you, then rather do nobly, as my noble Lord of Montrose has done; who, having received a letter from the king himself to go up with diligence to his court, convened some of the nobility, showed upon them both his particular affairs and the king's command, and that according to his covenant of following the common resolution, and eschewing all appearances of divisive motion, nobly hath resolved to follow their counsel, and has gone home to his own house, and will not go to court at all. . . . . . I do faithfully counsel you, and really forewarn you, as in the presence of the great God, before whom your lordship and I will both answer, that, as you love your own soul, your name, your state, your country and religion, you neither by word, oath, nor writ, undertake either to assist the king in his own course against your fellow Covenanters, whom, by your solemn oath, you are obliged to maintain; or else to lie by, and not to assist them in the defense of their religion and liberty against foreign and intestine invasion, which you are bound before God to do, and entered in; and if you do either by commission or omission (which are alike before God and in the Covenant) thus prejudice yourself, remember a true and faithful, albeit a plain and outspoken friend forewarned and foretold your lordship that Christ will be seen to crush and trample under his foot more visibly those that thus betray him nor [than] these that aye have opposed him, especially seeing that their desertion gives courage, life, being, and rejuvation; and that you will find it so, in your own sensible experience, here and hereafter, when even this forewarning of you shall stand up in judgment betwixt you and me, as the discharge of my duty of a trusty friend, and as the aggravation of your conviction. My lord, again let me say, be not offended with this my freedom on the one part, seeing I am really engaged by often answering for you, as I will yet continue, till you break under, and so break my credit with them; so, on the other, let them not deceive you either with pretense of reason; for I, who am the weakest of the thousand of Israel, offer me, upon my head, to justify, in writ or print, all our proceedings in assembly and parliament, from the principles of our late, our old acts of parliament, from the records of parliament, from all processes of parliament, in all our historians, from the books of council, assembly, and session, which are all the best warrants of our actions in this kingdom, if either in writ or print they will set down their objections. Your lordship knows I am no braggadocio. . . . . And albeit all the lords of Fife, Lothian, and the west. would concur in defection with these in the north

[1] "Their remonstrances, declarations, and pamphlets were dispersed, and their emissaries and agents insinuated into the company of all who were in any way discontented or galled at the proceedings of the state of England. The gentlemen who had been imprisoned for the loan, or distrained for the ship-money, or otherwise disobliged, had applications made to them from the Covenanters, and secretly favored and assisted their designs; so did many others, especially those inclined to the Presbyterian government, or whom the public proceedings had anywise distasted."—Whitelock.

and the south, I make not question but the great God, the patron of this work, will trample them down, and erect over their bellies the trophies of his victory. God has said it, and he will perform it. Antichrist shall fall, and Christ rise; none shall hold the one up or the other down. It shall be seen, even it shall be seen in this world, that the Lord will fight for his people, and rather work miracles before he desert them, and suffer his work to be destroyed. Neither let us be deceived with vain brags of English faces—we saw what they were before; they will not really ever be so great again; and albeit they were, took not God both heart and hand from them? Neither be deluded with their suggestions, that this nobleman will fall away, and that man will turn unto the king; that has been aye their policy, to draw the party himself away. In the mean time, let every one of us be sure of himself, and warn and encourage one another; and God, who knit our hearts and our hands together, will be found to keep the knot he fastened with his own hand. Neither be deceived with great hopes there; non habent, neither is this a time for giving. They may well love the treason, they will never love the traitor, but even in their own hearts they will abhor, unrespect, contemn, and condemn them; as, on the other part, I am persuaded God will be seen ever even in this to perform his promise, honorantes me honorabo, and will build their houses, who hazard themselves and their house for the building of his house."[1]

It was the burning zeal and eloquence of men like these that kept the covenant together, and that impelled the people to daring and extreme acts. Without awaiting the attack of the king, they fell upon every castle and stronghold he possessed in Scotland, and took them all with the exception of Caerlaverock. As early as the month of March, before Charles had begun his journey to York, General Leslie, with a thousand musketeers, surprised and took Edinburgh Castle without losing a single man. On the next day Dumbarton Castle, the second, or rather, in strength, the first fortress of the kingdom, was delivered over to the provost of the town, a zealous Covenanter; and the castle of Dalkeith, wherein were lodged the regalia, together with a store of ammunition and arms, was surrendered by Traquair, the lord treasurer, "who was no soldier nor expert in military capitulations," and who was in this, as in every thing else, left alone, without the help either of countenance or advice; "few or none daring so much as appear to give advice in any thing that might seem against the Covenanters."[2] The people, who were chiefly led in this enterprise by the earls of Rothes and Balmerino, seized the crown, scepter and sword, and carried them away in great joy and triumph,—Traquair admits, with all the reverence they could show,—and deposited them in Edinburgh Castle. The Marquis of Huntley, who had undertaken to secure all the north for the king, had risen in arms; but seven thousand men collected from the counties near the Tay, and commanded by Leslie and Montrose, soon overthrew him. Leslie forced the covenant upon the University of Aberdeen, and returned to Edinburgh, carrying Huntley with him as a hostage. The Marquis of Hamilton was sent into the Frith of Forth with a considerable fleet and five thousand land troops. He had engaged to take Leith, the port of Edinburgh; but the Covenanters, well aware of his coming, had prepared him a hot reception. The fortifications of Leith had been much neglected: now volunteers of all ranks hurried to repair them; men of the noblest birth worked like masons on the bastions, and ladies assisted them in carrying materials. When Hamilton appeared, Leith was safe, and so was the capital, at least on that side. He reconnoitered both sides of the Frith, but saw no hopes of effecting a landing any where, for twenty thousand armed men were distributed along the coasts, the seaports and inlets were protected by batteries, and he was soon fain to land his troops, which had already become very sickly and very mutinous, on the Isle of May and the other islets in the Frith, where there were no inhabitants, no enemies to encounter, but solan geese and other sea-fowl. Here, again, great pains have been taken to prove that Hamilton was betraying the king. It is said, for example, that he was holding a secret correspondence with the Covenanters,—that he received a visit from his mother, herself a rigid Covenanter, which caused the rest to believe that the son of such a mother would do them no harm. But it appears to us that Hamilton, who had never shown any great military talent, and who was leading a small and wretched force, which had been pressed and carried on board a ship as soon as caught, was really not in a condition to do much more than he did. Even my Lord Deputy Wentworth had been unable to do what he had engaged for—nay, he could not even spare, in time, five hundred musketeers. He was terrified at the notion of his majesty's going in person into Scotland, and he strongly advised Charles to secure Berwick and Carlisle with strong garrisons, to exercise his raw troops in the use of arms, to cover his English frontier, and by all means to avoid fighting this year. But there were cases in which Charles would not be advised even by Wentworth: he had resolved to chastise immediately his rebellious subjects; and on the 27th of March, the anniversary of his coronation, he began his journey northward, traveling in a coach with the Duke of Lennox and the Earl of Holland. On the 30th he arrived at York, where the nobility attended with their armed retinues according to his summons, and where Sir Thomas Widderington, the recorder, delivered to him a most fulsome speech, telling him that he had established his throne upon two columns of diamond, namely, piety and justice—the one of which gave him to God, the other to men,—and that all his subjects were most happy between the two columns.[1]

"This king's good-nature," says a somewhat ill-natured historian, "never more appeared than in his necessities; so that when he came to York, by proclamation he recalled thirty-one monopolies and patents, formerly granted by him, he not before understanding how grievous they were to his subjects."[1] Whitelock says that these grants and patents which Charles had formerly passed, to the great grievance of his people, were mostly in favor of Scotchmen. He also at York exacted an oath from all the nobility and officers about him, whether Scotch or English, that they would be faithful and obedient, that they abhorred all rebellions, and more especially such as rose out of religion, and that they had not and would never have any correspondence or intelligence with the rebellious Covenanters. This oath was taken by all except the lords Saye and Brook, who positively refused, in the king's own presence, to make any such protestation, offensive to the common liberty. Charles thought it best to dismiss them, and to require them to return to their homes.[2] On the 29th of April the king took his farewell of York, telling the recorder and the municipal authorities in set speech, that he had never found the like true love from the city of London, to which he had given so many marks of his favor. At Durham he was welcomed by the bishop, who feasted his majesty for some time. At Newcastle he was most magnificently entertained by the mayor and magistrates. At every resting-place he was joined by a certain number of horse and foot, levied in those parts; but the progress was more illustrious than the march, and the soldiers were the least part of the army, and least consulted with. From the time he advanced to the right bank of the Tweed, and encamped with his army in an open field near Berwick, some days were spent in reviews and parades, and altercations and quarrels among the leaders. He had chosen to make the Earl of Arundel, the bashaw, his general—"a man," says Clarendon, "who was thought to be made choice of for his negative qualities. He did not love the Scots; he did not love the Puritans; which qualifications were allayed by another negative—he did not much love any body else; but he was fit to keep the state of it; and his rank was such that no man would decline the serving under him."[3] The lieutenant-general was the Earl of Essex, one of the most popular men in the kingdom and the darling of the soldiery. The Earl of Holland, "a man fitter for a show than a field," was general of the horse. The latter force was estimated at 3260, the infantry at 19,614, without counting the foot companies under Hamilton, or the two garrisons at Berwick and Carlisle, and there was an abundant supply of warlike stores and a good train of artillery. To the eye, all this formed an imposing force, but there was disaffection and contrariety of opinion at head-quarters, and the majority of the men were altogether averse to the war and to the system which had produced it. On the other side the Scots were unanimous, and Leslie, as a commander, was certainly superior to any of the English generals. Having secured the country behind them, he boldly advanced to the Borders, and on the 30th of May he took up a position within a few miles of Charles's camp. Thence, that the English people might have no jealousy of an invasion, he issued proclamations, repeating that the Scots had no intention of doing harm,—had every wish to do good,—that they implored the good opinion of their brethren in England, and that, for the present, they would not cross the frontier line of their own country. At first, when Leslie arrived at Dunglas and Monroe at Kelso, they scarcely had between them 8000 men, but they were reinforced every day, the preachers being the best of recruiting sergeants. They called upon every true Scot, in the name of God and his country, to seek the enemies of their king, as well as of themselves, the prelates, and papists; they denounced the curse of Meroz against all who came not to the help of the Lord and his champions. They had chosen for the motto on their new banners, "For Christ's crown and the Covenant;" and as Charles hesitated and wavered, they were allowed time to collect 20,000 men under this ensign. Leslie drilled them, and the ministers preached to them, and there was a wonderful singing of psalms, and praying, and reading of Scripture, particularly those chapters which detailed the miraculous victories of God's chosen people. All this time communications, both public and secret, were carried on between the two camps, and several Scottish lords left the king, promising to use their best endeavors to show the Covenanters the wickedness of their ways. At last, on Monday, the 3d of June, the Earl of Holland, "that ill-chosen general of the English horse," crossed the Tweed near Twisell—once famed for a more heroic warfare[1]—to fall upon the division of the Scots that lay at Kelso. He took with him nearly all the cavalry and 3000 foot, but he left the infantry three miles behind him. When he reached Maxwellheugh, a height above Kelso, he perceived what he considered or affected to consider a very great army, advantageously posted. The Scots threw out 150 horse, and 5000 or 6000 foot to bar his farther progress. Holland thereupon sent them a trumpet, commanding them to retreat, and not cross the Borders, which they had promised not to do by proclamation. They asked whose trumpet this was? The man said, my Lord Holland's. Then, said the Covenanters, he had better begone; and so my Lord Holland made his retreat, and waited upon his majesty to give this account.[2] In fact, during this march and counter-march, the English soldiers, who behaved as they had never done before, scarcely drew a sword or fired a musket or a carbine. Charles now began to perceive that the nobility and gentry of England were not inclined to invade Scotland at all, and a morning or two after he was alarmed for his own camp by the closer approach of Leslie. He then complained bitterly of the rebels being allowed to march and encamp within sight of him, and he have no notice taken of it, till the body of their army gave the alarm. The Lord General Arundel blamed the scout-master; the scout-master blamed the soldiers that were sent out as scouts, and brought in no intelligence. Charles, in a hurry, threw up some works to cover his camp, intending, with the advice of many of his council, to keep himself there upon the defensive; but, already the men were complaining that the biscuit was moldy, and drink altogether wanting; that they could get nothing out of Scotland except a few lambs. On the 6th of June, a Covenant trumpet, and the Earl of Dunfermline, arrived at the royal camp, with a humble petition to his majesty, entreating him to appoint some few, of the many worthy men of the kingdom of England, to meet with some few of them (the Scottish leaders), that they might the better know their humble desires, and make known his majesty's pleasure, so that all mistakings might be speedily removed, and the two kingdoms kept in peace and happiness. Before this, the Covenanters had addressed separate letters to the three English generals, Arundel, Essex, and Holland. Clarendon says, that "the Earl of Essex, who was a punctual man in point of honor, received the address superciliously enough, sent it to the king without returning any answer, or holding any conference, or performing the least ceremony with or toward the messengers."[1] But, according to the same narrator and to other authorities of different parties, Arundel, and, still more, Holland, gave a very different reception to the letters they received, and forthwith became pressing advocates for an immediate accommodation with the Covenanters. To Dunfermline's petition Charles at first gave an answer, signed by Secretary Coke: the Lords of the Covenant returned it, humbly entreating that his majesty would sign the answer to their petition with his own hand, for, although they themselves did not mistrust his majesty's word, signified to them by the secretary, yet the people and army would not suffer their deputies to come without his majesty's own hand and warrant. Charles then signed the paper, and on the 11th of June, the deputies of the Covenanters arrived at the royal camp, where they were received in the lord general's tent by the English commissioners whom Charles had selected to treat with them. The Scottish deputies were the earls of Rothes and Dunfermline, the Lord Loudon, and Sir William Douglas, sheriff of Teviotdale, to whom were afterward added, sorely against the king's inclination, the leading minister, Alexander Henderson, late moderator of the general assembly, and Mr. Archibald Johnston, the clerk register; the king's commissioners were the earls of Essex, Holland, Salisbury, and Berkshire. Sir Henry Vane, and Mr. Secretary Coke. But when they were ready to begin their conference, Charles came unexpectedly among them, took his seat, and told the Scottish deputies that he was informed that they complained they could not be heard; that, therefore, he was now come to hear what they would say, and to take the negotiation upon himself. The Earl of Rothes, speaking for the Covenanters, said, that they only wished to be secured in their religion and liberty. Lord Loudon began to offer an apology for their brisk manner of proceeding, but Charles interrupted him, and told him that he would admit of no excuse or apology for what was past; but if they came to implore for pardon, they should set down their desires in writing, and in writing they should receive his answer. In the course of the negotiation, several attempts were made at overreaching the Scots, but the Covenanters, without any pretension to the meekness of the dove, had certainly the wisdom of the serpent. Hamilton arrived at the camp, and hastened, it is said, the conclusion of the treaty, which was signed by Charles, on the 18th of June, and published, with a royal declaration, in the Covenanters' camp, on the 20th. The articles agreed upon were few, and some of them loosely expressed. The king, though he could not condescend to ratify and approve the acts of what he called the pretended general assembly, was pleased to confirm whatsoever his commissioner had granted and promised, and to leave all matters ecclesiastical, to be determined by the assembly of the kirk, and all matters civil, by the parliament and other inferior judicatures. The assemblies of the kirk were to be kept once a year, or as often as might be agreed upon by the general assembly; and for settling the general distractions of the kingdom, it was appointed, that a free general assembly should meet at Edinburgh, on the 6th day of August, and that the parliament for ratifying what should be concluded in the said assembly, and for settling such other things as might conduce to the peace and good of the kingdom, should be held at Edinburgh, on the 20th day of August, and that therein an act of oblivion should be passed. It was agreed that the troops, on both sides, should be recalled and disbanded; that his Majesty's castles, forts, ammunitions of all sorts, and royal honors, should be delivered up to the king, who, thereupon, was to withdraw his fleet and cruisers, and deliver up whatever Scottish goods and ships, or whatever else, had been taken from them. The king stipulated that there should be no meetings, treatings, consultations, or convocations of the lieges, but such as were warranted by act of parliament; and he agreed to restore to all his good subjects of Scotland, their liberties, privileges, &c. &c. Not a word was said by the king touching the abolition of episcopacy. By his express orders the term bishop was never introduced. He still clung to Laud and the hierarchy; and, as usual, he was anxious to say as little as possible in a pacification, which he made with the most unpleasant of feelings, and which he was fully determined to break as soon as possible. The Covenanters more than suspected his meaning and intentions, and both parties openly betrayed their mutual distrust before the ink was dry on the parchment: the two armies, however, were disbanded by the 24th of June, when his majesty took up his quarters in the town of Berwick. He summoned fourteen of the principal Covenanters to attend him; but they declined the dangerous honor, fearing the Tower of London. They sent however the earls of Lothian, Loudon, and Montrose, the last of whom appears to have been lost to the covenant and gained by the king from that moment. While at Berwick, Charles decided about the high commissioner to be sent into Scotland to open the parliament, &c.; for he was anxious to get back to the south, where he had left many fiery spirits, and Wentworth had again warned him, after "so total a defection as had appeared in that people," not to go to them himself; or, to use my lord deputy's expression, "not to trust his own sacred person among the Scots over early, if at all." It is said, that his majesty greatly pressed the Marquis of Hamilton to go upon that employment once more, and that the marquis implored to be excused. After the affair of Dalkeith and his easy losing or surrendering the regalia, it could hardly have been expected that Traquair should be named commissioner, yet he was the man appointed to succeed Hamilton, and represent the king. Charles then took post at Berwick, and rode to London in four days, arriving there on the 1st of August.

Traquair's instructions passed the seal on the 6th of August, when he was immediately dispatched to meet the general assembly at Edinburgh. That convocation opened on the 12th of August, every member of it having previously bound himself by an oath to support the acts of the late assembly at Glasgow. Traquair's instructions from the king were very artfully conceived; but it was scarcely possible that they should have much effect upon such a body of men as these Covenanters. Charles had written to the dispersed and afflicted Scottish bishops, to assure them that it should be his chief care to establish their church aright, and repair their losses, and to advise them to enter into a formal protest against the proceedings of this assembly and parliament, which he promised "to take into consideration, as a prince sensible of his own interest and honor, joined with the equity of their desires."[1] But in his instructions to Traquair, he consented that episcopacy should be utterly abolished in Scotland, for satisfaction of the people, provided that the act of abolition should be so conceived and worded, that episcopacy should not be called a point of popery, or contrary to God's law, or the Protestant religion, but merely contrary to the constitution of the church of Scotland. "And," continued the king, who was eager to secure for himself the parliamentary influence of the church at least, "in case episcopacy be abolished at this assembly, you are to labor that we may have the power of choosing of so many ministers as may represent the fourteen bishops in parliament; or, if that can not be, that fourteen others, whom we shall present, be agreed to, with a power to choose the lords of the articles." The bishops, or at least seven of them, signed a protest, and got it presented to the lord commissioner by a mean person, as the king had desired. They called the Covenanters refractory, schismatical, and perjured men, having no office in the church of God, who had filthily resiled, and so made themselves to the present and future ages most infamous, &c. "And this, our protestation," they said, "we humbly desire may be presented to his majesty, whom we do humbly supplicate, according to the practice of Christian emperors in ancient time, to convene the clergy of his whole dominions, for remedying of the present schism and division, unto whose judgment and determination we promise to submit ourselves and all our proceedings." It was well that this petition was not to be read in the assembly, but kept quiet between Traquair, the bishops, and the king! The Covenantors, however, wanted no fresh provocation to go lustily to work. Without naming the Glasgow assembly, they adopted and confirmed all its acts, whether against the bishops, service-book, book of penance, or high commission; and all that Charles thought it expedient to do at the moment, was to stickle about words. Thus he was very averse that, in treating of episcopacy, they should be allowed to use the words "unlawful and abjured." Traquair, as commissioner, gave the royal assent to the acts, and signed the covenant, which was now retained as a legitimate national bond, being somewhat softened in its tone, and made more palatable by the introduction of certain reservations of the royal authority. One Scottish bishop, George Graham, who called himself "some time pretended bishop of Orkney," abjured episcopacy; and his deed was recorded on the journals of the general assembly, "in eternam memoriam."

Having done its work, and received Traquair's promise that its acts should be confirmed in parliament, the assembly was quietly dissolved, and the

[1] See the king's letter "To our right trusty, and well-beloved counselor, and reverend father in God, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's," in Rushworth. The bishops had advised him to put off the assembly and parliament. Charles said, that he must acknowledge this advice to be very reasonable, but, considering the present state of his affairs, and his recent promise in the articles of pacification, he could not, without great prejudice to his own interests, comply with it. He told them that he was "rather necessitated to hold the assembly and parliament at the time and place appointed;" but he had instructed Traquair to have a special care of their lordships, and those of the inferior clergy who had suffered for their duty to God, and obedience to the royal commands. He provided for the difficulty of getting their petition presented. "It may be sent," says Charles, "by any mean man, so he be trusty, and deliver it at his entering into the church; but we would not have it to be either read or argued in this meeting, where nothing but partiality is to be expected, but to be represented to us by him, the commissioner." He absolutely commanded them, on no account, to think of attending themselves. "In the interim," he says, "your best course will be to remain in our kingdom of England, till such time as you receive our further order, where we shall provide for your subsistence, though not in that meas ure as we could wish, yet in such a way as you shall not be in want." The bishops, therefore, staid in England, though as close to Scotland as possible. Some were in Berwick, some in Holy Island, others at Morpeth, from which places it was easy to correspond with such few friends as they had among the Scots. The more fiery of the prelates had exclaimed against the pacification, and thought it both dishonorable and sinful in the king not to restore their order by force of arms, not reflecting that Charles had tried that process to the utmost of his power.

members of it returned to their homes, accompanied by the applauses and blessings of the people, who fondly fancied that they were freed of bishops forever, and of the present evils of war. But the king was all this while preparing measures for a new war, which he flattered himself would be conducted with better success. The Covenanters had kept their agreement in giving up the fortresses; they had surrendered Edinburgh Castle, and twenty other castles; and Patrick Ruthven, afterward earl of Brentford, the new governor for the king, was getting artillery, ammunition, arms, and men into Edinburgh Castle, and repairing the breaches which time rather than war had made. Charles commanded Traquair to take in general the like care of all his houses and forts in that kingdom; and likewise to advertise all such who were affected to his service, that they might secure themselves in good time. The Scottish parliament met on the day appointed, the 20th of August, and consented that for that time Traquair, as commissioner, should name those lords of articles that had formerly been named by the bishops; but they protested that this should be no precedent for the future, and they went on roundly to remove the lords of articles totally, as a body of necessity at all times subservient to the crown. Charles knew that their project, if effected, would wholly emancipate the Scottish parliament from the shackles and trammels which had been imposed upon it, chiefly by his own father, and he had declared that he would never give up his prerogative on this point. Traquair saw no other means than the dangerous one of stopping proceedings by a prorogation, and, accordingly, he prorogued parliament to the 14th of November.[1] The Covenanters protested against the legality of any prorogation without consent of parliament (and in fact the principle differed from the English). They, however, rose quietly after entering this protest, and sent up a commission, headed by the lords Dunfermline and Loudon, to wait upon the king. When these deputies arrived at Whitehall they were rudely asked whether they had any warrant from the king's commissioner; and, as they had none, they were in disdain commanded home again without audience or any access to majesty. The return of these noblemen to Scotland was soon followed by the summoning of Traquair to court. This nobleman, by royal instructions, had in many respects been playing a double part; and, as invariably happens in such cases, his employers had become jealous and doubtful of his real feelings and intention. But he averted Charles's wrath from himself by producing a letter secretly addressed by several lords of the covenant to the King of France, and imploring his protection. This letter had been written before the late pacification at Berwick, and addressed "Au Roi." It bore the signatures of seven lords; but the address, which in itself was made matter of treason, was in a different hand from the body of the letter, and the thing had never been sent, evidently through the aversion of the ministers and the mass of the Covenanters. At the same time Traquair told the king that it was impossible to prevail with the Scots except by force or a total compliance; and having, as he fancied, furnished the king with grounds for justifying such a proceeding, he recommended him to take up arms again without loss of time.

The Covenanters desired permission to dispatch some of their own number for their own vindication; and, when Charles granted their request, they again sent up the earls of Loudon and Dunfermline. Loudon was instantly seized, and examined touching the letter "Au Roi." The Scottish lord said that it was written before the late agreement, and never sent; that, if he had committed any offense in signing it, he ought to be questioned for it in Scotland, and not in England; nor would he make any other answer or confession, but, insisting upon the king's safe-conduct which had been given to him for this journey, he demanded liberty to return. Charles sent him to the Tower of London.[1] This effectu-

[1] The parliament during its short sitting had entered upon several other unwelcome subjects. They had proposed that Scottish titles and patents of peerage should no longer be given to persons not in actual possession of estates in the country of the yearly value of 10,000 marks; that no proxies should be admitted; that every act formerly passed in favor of episcopacy should be formally repealed; and that none but native Scotchmen should ever be intrusted with the keeping of Edinburgh, Dunbarton, and Stirling castles.

[1] The Scottish lords resented the arrest of Loudon, as a violation of the law of nations, he having come as an ambassador, and with Charles's safe conduct. "There were some ill instruments," says Burnet, in his Memoirs of the Duke of Hamilton, "about the king, who advised him to proceed capitally against Loudon, which is believed went very far; but the marquis (of Hamilton) opposed this vigorously, assuring the king that, if it were done, Scotland was forever lost." Crawfurd (the author of "Ludlow no Liar"), Oldmixon, and other writers, have asserted that Charles absolutely sent an order to the Tower for the private execution of Loudon. The last named of these authors, an over-heated and somewhat prejudiced man, says,—"Sir William Balfour, governor of the Tower when Loudon was committed, some days after received a warrant from the king for the beheading that lord the next day within the Tower, for fear of any disturbance if it had been done openly on the hill. The lieutenant, who was at cards with Loudon, changed countenance, and, holding up his hands in amazement, showed his lordship the warrant; who said to him, Well, sir, you must do your duty; I only desire time to make a settlement on some younger children, and that you will let my lawyer come to me for that end: to which Balfour consented; and the lawyer carried away with him a letter to the Marquis of Hamilton, informing him of the matter, and telling him he was a Scotchman, and must answer it to his country. Balfour followed the lawyer to the marquis, whom they could not presently find, it being night, at last they found him at Lady Clayton's, and having delivered him the Lord Loudon's letter, which Balfour further explained, the marquis took Sir William with him to court, not staying for his coach, and desired admittance about a business of very great importance to his majesty. He was told the king and queen were in bed, and had given positive orders not to admit any one. The marquis in vain insisted on his own right as one of the lords of the bedchamber, and the right of the Lieutenant of the Tower, especially when he had any state prisoner: upon which Sir William knocked at the king's bedchamber door, which being opened to him, he fell upon his knees, and having just mentioned the warrant, his majesty stopped him saying, 'It shall be executed.' Upon which the marquis enters, and falling on his knees, humbly expostulated with the king concerning it. The queen expressed great displeasure at his intrusion; but the marquis, taking her up short, let her know that she was a subject as well as himself; and that the business he came about was of the highest concernment to his majesty, to herself, to the whole nation, and to himself in particular. He then spoke with great earnestness to the king, and used all the arguments he could think of to dissuade him from the execution; but all to no purpose. Sir, says he, if you persist in this resolution, no Scotsman will ever draw a sword for you: or, if they would, who should command them? The king replied. Yourself. No, sir, said Hamilton, I dare never appear in Scotland afterward. The king, nevertheless, swore twice, By God, Loudon shall die. Then the marquis, craving leave to speak one word more, ally stopped the arrival of any more Scottish commissioners; but it was evident to both parties that they must again take the field; and the Covenanters, by more secret agents, concerted measures with the patriots and the disaffected of all classes. Secret councils were held in London, and a coalition of all the various sections of the discontented was effected. There were those who favored presbytery, or had suffered from the high practices of the Star Chamber, the High Commission Court, the Exchequer, and other judicatures; there were the friends of the men who had been scourged, branded, and mutilated; there were also those who already inclined to a republic; and the earls of Essex, Bedford, and Holland, the Lord Saye, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Pym, and divers other lords and gentlemen of great interest and quality, "were deep in with them."

About a month after the king's return from Berwick his authority had been defied, and his flag insulted, by a foreign power, under his own guns. A great Spanish fleet was discovered beyond the Land's End by the vice-admiral of Holland. At the first sight the Spaniards appeared like the Invincible Armada of 1688; but, when their ships were counted, there were only seventy sail. The Dutch followed them, with seventeen good ships, into the narrow seas, keeping up a heavy fire, in order not merely to annoy their rear, but also to give warning to their high-admiral, the celebrated Van Tromp, who was lying before Dunkirk. Their signal was heard; Van Tromp came up with a few ships of the largest size; and then the Dutch, having got the weather-gage, attacked the Spaniards smartly. Sixteen Spanish ships, with four thousand land troops on board, made the coast of Flanders; the rest, under their admiral, Oquendo, sought an asylum in the Downs, and came to anchor near Dover, making sure of protection while they lay in "the King of England's chamber." Charles, at first, had not been without uneasiness as to the real destination of this Spanish fleet, thinking it might be meant for Scotland, or for his equally disaffected subjects in Ireland: he sent the Earl of Arundel to Oquendo for a sight of his commission, and the earl apparently was fully satisfied that there was no evil intention toward his master, and that the fleet and the troops embarked in it, were really destined for Flanders, where the King of Spain was still hard pressed by the Dutch. There are several variations in the story, nearly all tending to increase the dishonor of the transaction on the part of the English government. It is confidently said, for example, that Charles, urged on by the need of money for his Scottish war, demanded from the Spanish admiral £150,000 in cash as the price of his protection; and that the proposal was entertained, and an order issued by the court of Brussels, for payment of the money, when Van Tromp, who had blockaded Oquendo, and who had received so many reinforcements that his fleet now amounted to a hundred sail, interrupted the bargain, and, disregarding the warning of the English flag, fell upon the Spaniards as they lay at anchor in the English roadstead. Charles's vice-admiral, Pennington, the man who had been engaged at the beginning of the reign in the affair against the Protestant Rochellers, lay close at hand with an inferior, yet still a considerable fleet; but he offered no opposition, apparently no remonstrance, while the Dutch cannonaded and attacked the Spaniards with fire-ships. Five tall Spanish ships, one of them a great galleon, were sunk and burned; twenty more ran ashore; and the rest left the profaned asylum, and put out to sea, followed by Van Tromp and De Witt, who allowed only ten of them to escape. So lasting was the hatred, so powerful the tradition, of the Armada, that the English people, though they had no great affection for the Dutch, witnessed the destruction of the Spanish papists with joy and exultation. But the king had to feel the bitterness of disappointed hope in losing the money, and the disgrace and dishonor (for such it was in the eyes of Europe) of permitting the fleet of a friendly power to be destroyed in his port, and in presence of his own fleet. "If," says a royalist writer, who rather absurdly attributes the whole affair to the treachery of the Earl of Northumberland, then high-admiral, "if we had been resolute, and strengthened our fleet, as those

said, Sir, I desire your majesty to look out for another house, for within four-and-twenty hours there will not be one stone of Whitehall left upon another. This touched the king more than all the arguments of pity, justice, or distant danger. He called for the warrant, tore it, and dismissed the marquis and lieutenant somewhat sullenly. This incident being not in Bishop Burnet's Memoirs of the Duke of Hamilton, he was asked why he did not insert it, and replied, I knew it, but durst not tell it. He owns, there, that the king was advised to proceed capitally against Loudon, but Lord Hamilton opposed it. The late Duke Hamilton owned it to be true in the late queen's time, adding, I will print it if I outlive her. And this story is so well known to all the people of the first quality in North Britain, that I am not afraid to conclude from thence there was no passion so strong in King Charles the First as the desire of arbitrary power and revenge on those whom he took to be his enemies. The origin of this story is a memorandum note written by Dr. White Kennet, then bishop of Peterborough, in a blank leaf of a copy of Burnet's Memoirs of the Hamiltons. Kennet gives it only as a hearsay from a Mr. Frazier, secretary of Chelsea College, and a friend of Burnet's, who is made to say that, in a company of several English peers, he (Frazier) heard one noble peer charge Burnet with having left out several things for fear of offending the court; Burnet, according to Frazier, or Dr. Kennet's report of Frazier's story, said he could not possibly put down every thing he had found in the papers committed to him for the composition of his Memoirs, because some things would not bear telling; and then he gave, as an instance, this story about the order for Loudon's execution. But, in this account, there is no mention of the lawyer, the queen, the difficulty of obtaining admission into the royal chamber, and the marquis's discourse and threat differ materially. For, here, Hamilton is made to say, "Well, then, if your majesty be so determined, I'll go and get ready to ride post for Scotland to-morrow morning; for I am sure, before night, the whole city will be in an uproar, and they'll come and pull your majesty out of your palace. I'll get as far as I can, and declare to my countrymen that I had no hand in it. The king was struck at this, and bid the marquis call the lieutenant again, who coming back to the bedside, the king said, give me the warrant; and, taking it, tore it in pieces." Kennet continues,—"Hearing this story," says Mr. Frazier, "with mine own ears, I once related it to the late Duke of Hamilton, who was killed in a duel; and his grace said that he had often run over the papers from which Dr. Burnet drew out his materials, and he had them now in his custody in Scotland, and he well remembered that there was such a relation there given, and that he verily believed it to be true." We confess that we have some doubts as to the whole story—the evidence is insufficient. We can believe, however, that Loudon, who obtained his liberty by promising to espouse the king's party in Scotland, may have been thr atened in the Tower; and even that Charles, who maintained that no quality or consideration could justify the letter "Au Roi," may, in the first heat of his indignation, have thought seriously of proceeding to extremities.

of Holland did theirs, that admiral would have considered twice before he had acted once; and a true-spirited English admiral would have reflected more on his master's, his nation's, and his own honor, than to be so unconcerned as ours was."[1]

But every proceeding of government was now a failure, and every failure caused fierce dissensions among the cabinet ministers and the chief officers of the crown: every one labored to exonerate himself at the cost of his comrades. This is one of the saddest and surest indications of a nation's decay. Almost as soon as the pacification of Berwick was signed, all of the English party engaged in it were irritated and ashamed; and the king himself, according to Clarendon, "was very melancholic, and quickly discerned that he had lost reputation at home and abroad; and those counselors who had been most faulty, either for want of courage or of wisdom (for at that time few of them wanted fidelity), never afterward recovered spirit enough to do their duty, but gave themselves up to those who had so much over-witted them; every man shifting the fault from himself, and finding some friends to excuse him. And it being yet necessary that so infamous a matter should not be covered with absolute oblivion, it fell to Secretary Coke's turn (for whom nobody cared), who was then near fourscore years of age, to be made the sacrifice; and upon pretense that he had omitted the writing what he ought to have done, and inserted somewhat he ought not to have done, he was put out of his office."[2] Old Coke, the scapegoat, was succeeded by Sir Harry Vane, previously treasurer of the household, who, as Clarendon, Warwick, and other writers of that party maintain, became secretary of state through the queen's too powerful influence and the dark contrivance of the Marquis of Hamilton.

During his inglorious campaign, Charles was in constant correspondence with Wentworth, who had given him better advice than he would take, and who continued raising and organizing ten thousand Irish troops, for service in Scotland, even after the pacification. Not long after his return from the Tweed, "as if the oracle of Delphos had been to be consulted, he sent for his great Lord Deputy of Ireland."[3] Wentworth came, but, "instead of being made a dictator, he found himself but one of a triumvirate," being joined with Archbishop Laud and Hamilton, neither of whom had lost one particle of the king's favor and confidence. Although he had not come very willingly, apprehending danger to himself—and although he was hampered by Hamilton, the more timid of his colleagues, and by the queen, who could never agree with him—Wentworth imparted a new vigor to the king's councils; he recommended a loan among the great lords and officers of the crown, and urged a war with the Covenanters, which he was to manage, and the instant issuing of writs of ship-money to the amount of £200,000. With his old confidence in his own power of seducing, deceiving, or terrifying a parliament, in a blind forgetfulness of the difference between English parliaments and Irish parliaments, he ventured to recommend the calling of one. This resolution was adopted in a committee, consisting of Archbishop Laud, Bishop Juxon, the Earl of Northumberland, the Marquis of Hamilton, Cottington, Windebank, and Vane; but the chief actors after Strafford were Laud and Hamilton. Charles, upon finding the committee unanimous, put this significant question—"If this parliament should prove as untoward as some have lately been, will you then assist me in such extraordinary ways as in that extremity shall be thought fit?" They all promised to assist him, and then Charles reluctantly agreed that a parliament should be called. But Wentworth thought it would be well to try an Irish parliament beforehand; and Charles consented that there should be an Irish parliament also. To reward his past services, and to give him additional weight and splendor, the king now bestowed on him that earldom for which he had so long been sighing, and, instead of lord deputy, named him Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. On the 12th of January, 1640, Wentworth became earl of Strafford; on the 17th of March he obtained from the trembling Irish parliament a grant of four subsidies, with a promise of two more, if they should be found necessary; and by the middle of April, in spite of a distressing and most painful malady, he was back at court, to show Charles how to manage his English House of Commons and his Scottish Covenanters. Before his arrival, his majesty, sitting in council, communicated the great contentment he had received by the proceedings of his subjects of the kingdom of Ireland, assembled in parliament, and, for their lordships' information, he made Secretary Windebank read the letters he had newly received from his lord-lieutenant in council there,[1] together with the declaration of the Irish House of

[3] Warwick.—"Great was the expectation of all the English, what might be the effect of his coming over; great was the opinion which men in general had conceived of his ability and parts, looking at him as the only hinge on which the state was now likely to turn. But very different and various were the conjectures of gentlemen at that time, in their ordinary discourses (for I will relate the truth), what use this great statesman could make of his ability and favor. Some (as they wished) did seem to hope, when they considered his first right principles, that whatsoever he had acted since his greatness, was to ingratiate himself perfectly with the king; that, so at last by his wisdom and favor, he might happily prevail both upon the king's judgment and affection, and carry him from those evil counsels which he had long been nurtured in, to such ways as should render him most honorable and happy; that the earl was so wise as to understand what most became a wise man, and what would make greatness beloved and permanent. But others durst not hope so much from him, when they considered his government in Ireland, and the ambition of the man: they feared that neither his virtue was great enough to venture his own fortunes, by opposing any evil counsels about the king, nor his favor great enough to prevail in overruling; that he was sent for only to complete that bad work, which others of less brain than he had begun. Which he would sooner venture to do, than to make himself the author of a new and good one; seeing it hath been observed that few statesman have ever opposed princes, but rather seconded and assisted them in their bad inclinations."—May, Parl. Hist.

[1] The king took this course by the advice of Strafford himself who appealed to the Irish votes and letters as a confutation of the slanderous accusations of his enemies, that he had become "a most hated person—indeed, a busier bashaw or any thing that might be worse;" and he requested his master to give all the publicity possible to these recent proceedings, as an encouragement and intimidation for England and Scotland.

Commons, touching the grant of the four subsidies without cavils or conditions, the unanimous expression of their loyal affection to his majesty's service and person, and their humble acknowledgment of the great favors and blessings they enjoyed through his majesty's gracious and happy government. When Windebank had done reading, Charles told the lords of the council that the Irish Upper House had shown themselves equally exemplary and loyal, and that he hoped others would follow these good examples. Their lordships were filled with joy, and his majesty, by their advice, ordered that the letters from Ireland should be entered in the council register, to remain there, as a record to all posterity; and that copies of the loyal Irish declaration should on no account be refused to any that desired them. The privy council and the king proceeded to get ready all things necessary for carrying on the war against the Scots, whatever the issue of the parliament about to be called in London might prove to be; and it is curious to observe letters directed to the several counties, for the providing of horses and carts for carriage of the train of artillery, and other documents of a like warlike nature, signed by the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury alone.[1]

At last, on the 13th day of April, 1640, an English parliament assembled at Westminster. The king opened the session, with a very brief speech, in which, however, he admitted (what every body knew) that nothing but necessity had induced him to call them together. Then Sir John Finch, formerly speaker of the Commons, but now lord keeper, delivered a very long speech, in which he endeavored, above all things, to convince them that the Scots had grossly insulted and injured the English nation, as well as their sovereign—"the most just, the most pious, the most gracious king that ever was, whose kingly resolutions were seated in the ark of his sacred breast." "And," continued this slavish adulator, who even at this crisis would be preaching about the divine right, and the ineffable majesty of kings, "it were a presumption of too high a nature for any Uzziah, uncalled, to touch it; yet his sacred majesty is now pleased to lay by the shining beams of majesty, as Phœbus did to Phaëton, that the distance between sovereignty and subjection should not bar you of that filial freedom of access to his person and councils; only let us beware how, with the son of Clymene, we aim not at the guiding of the chariot, as if that were the only testimony of fatherly affection, but let us ever remember, that, though the king sometimes condescends to lay by the beams and rays of majesty, he never lays by majesty itself." All that had happened through Charles's persisting in not calling together, or agreeing with, the representatives of his people—the extorting of money by illegal means, the torturing of the subject, the disgraces sustained by the national arms at home and abroad, the flames in Scotland, which had almost severed the two kingdoms—was so glaring, that it required all the audacity of a Finch to make the king's disuse of parliaments a subject of panegyric, and that to a parliament itself. The bronze-faced lord keeper told them that, in former times, indeed, they had been advised with for the preventing and diverting of foreign and domestic dangers; "but herein," said he, "his majesty's great wisdom and providence hath for many years eased you of that trouble; his majesty having all the while not only seen and prevented our danger, but kept up the honor and splendor of the English crown, of which at this day we find the happy experience, Almighty God having vouchsafed such success to his majesty's counsels, that our fleece was dry, when it rained blood in all the neighbor states." Every thing, he maintained, had gone on happily and gloriously until some men of Belial had blown the trumpet in Scotland, and induced a rebellious multitude to take up arms against the Lord's anointed, their rightful prince, and most undoubted sovereign. He related the events of last summer's campaign, telling them that his majesty had entered into a pacification with the Scots, not through fear or weakness, but out of his piety and clemency; that, however, it had since been found by numerous acts, that that stiff-necked people, in signing the treaty, had but prevaricated with it, in order to divert the storm which hung over their heads; that it had come to his majesty's certain knowledge that they had addressed themselves to foreign states, and treated with them to deliver themselves up to their protection and power. Nothing, therefore, was left, but to reduce these sons of Belial to obedience by force of arms; and to that end an army had been raised, the charge of which would be heavy, and therefore his majesty did now at this time call this parliament, the second means, under God's blessing, to avert the calamities threatened to all his kingdoms, by the mutinous behavior of the Scots. "This summer," said Finch, "must not be lost like the last, nor any minute of time unbestowed to reduce those of Scotland; lest by our delay they gain time to conclude their treaties with foreign states. His majesty, therefore, desires and expects that you will for awhile lay aside all other subjects and debates, and that you will pass an act for such and so many subsidies, as in your hearty affection to him, and your common good, you shall think fit and convenient. . . . . . Such is the straitness of time, that unless the subsidies be forthwith passed, it is not possible for him to put in order such things as must be prepared before so great an army can take the field; and, indeed, had not his majesty, upon the credit of his servants, and security out of his own estate, taken up and issued between £300,000 and £400,000, it had not been possible for his majesty to have provided those things to begin with, which were necessary for so great an enterprise." He went on to tell them, "that, to avoid all unpleasant question and dispute touching his majesty's taking of tunnage and poundage, his majesty had commanded him to declare that he had taken it only de facto, according to the example of former kings;" but of the odious ship-money neither lord keeper nor king said a a single word. Finch concluded by telling them that they must pass a bill, granting tunnage and poundage from the commencement of his majesty's reign, vote the subsidies instanter, and accept his majesty's promise, who was most graciously pleased to give them his royal word, that afterward he would allow them time to consider of such petitions as they might conceive to be for the good of the commonwealth, assuring them that his majesty would go along with them in redressing just grievances, like a just, a pious, and gracious king, to the end that there might be such a happy conclusion of this parliament, that it might be the cause of his meeting many more parliaments. The king himself then produced the letter of the Scottish lords to the French king, and said, "My Lords, you shall see he hath spoken nothing hyperbolically, nor nothing but what I shall make good one way or other. And because he did mention a letter, by which my subjects in Scotland did seek to draw in foreign power for aid, here is the original letter, which I shall command him to read unto you. And because it may touch a neighbor of mine, whom I will say nothing of but that which is just—God forbid I should; for my part I think it was never accepted of by him: indeed it was a letter to the French king, but I know not that ever he had it; for, by chance, I intercepted it as it was going unto him and therefore I hope you will understand me right in that." Charles then delivered the letter to Finch, who observed, "The superscription of the letter is this—'Au Roi.' For the nature of this superscription, it is well known to all that know the style of France that it is never written by any Frenchman to any but their own king, and therefore being directed 'Au Roi,' it is to their own king, for so in effect they do that by that superscription acknowledge." He then read the letter as translated into English from the original French, which ran thus: "Sir—Your majesty being the refuge and sanctuary of afflicted princes and states, we have found it necessary to send this gentleman, Mr. Colvil, by him to represent unto your majesty the candor and ingenuity as well of our actions and proceedings as of our intentions, which we desire should be engraven and written to the whole world, with the beams of the sun, as well as to your majesty. We most humbly beseech you, therefore, to give faith and credit to him, and all he shall say on our part concerning us and our affairs, being most assured of an assistance equal to your accustomed clemency heretofore, and so often showed to this nation, which will not yield to any other whatsoever the glory to be eternally your majesty's most humble, obedient, and affectionate servants. (Signed) Rothes, Montrose, Leslie, Marr, Montgomery, Loudon, Forester."[1] Then the king added, "Of these gentlemen, who have set their hands to this letter, here is one, and I believe you would think it very strange if I should not lay him fast; and therefore I have signed a warrant to lay him close prisoner in the Tower. My lords, I think (but that I will not say positively, because I will not say any thing here but what I am sure of) I have the gentlemen that should have carried the letter fast enough; but I know not, I may be mistaken."

When the king had thus spoken, the lord keeper dismissed the Commons to their own House, there to make choice of their speaker. In the Lower House were many of the patriots, or, as the king had styled them, "the vipers," that had so disturbed his equanimity in the last parliament; but one of the greatest and highest-minded was not there. Of those who had been cast into prison, all had been liberated upon bail, after a detention of about eighteen months, with the single exception of the bold and eloquent Sir John Eliot, the man whom Charles most hated or feared. When he had lain four years in the Tower, the patriot's health began to decline rapidly, and his friends prevailed upon him to petition the king. "Sir," said Eliot, "your judges have committed me to prison here in your Tower of London, where, by reason of the quality of the air, I am fallen into a dangerous disease. I humbly beseech your majesty you will command your judges to set me at liberty, that, for recovery of my health, I may take some fresh air," &c. To this petition which was presented by the hand of the Lieutenant of the Tower, Charles's only answer was—"It is not humble enough." Then Eliot sent another petition by his own son, expressing his hearty sorrow for having displeased his majesty, and humbly beseeching him once again to command the judges to set him at liberty; and when he had recovered his health he might return back to his prison, there to undergo such punishment as God had allotted him. The Lieutenant of the Tower took offense at his sending the petition by another hand than his, which, by right of office, delivered all petitions of his prisoners; but the high functionary told him, that if he would humble himself before his majesty, acknowledging his fault, he would deliver another petition for him. Sir John, thanking

[1] Beside this letter, it is possible that Charles knew, at least in part, the other negotiations between the Covenanters and the French court. Lord Hailes (Memorials) has published a letter from General Leslie and the Earl of Rothes to the French king, and also instructions from the Covenanters in Scotland to their messenger to Louis. The letter, it appears, was not sent, because the rest of the Covenanting leaders refused to sign or sanction it. There are several striking passages in the instructions, but nothing very treasonable. The messenger was instructed to assure the French court, that their intentions were no ways against monarchical government,—that they were most loyally disposed toward his sacred majesty King Charles, whose person and authority they would maintain with their lives and fortunes. "Seeing," said the Covenanters, "that we have many times supplicated his majesty and have not prevailed, therefore we entreat the king of France to intercede and mediate with our sovereign to lay down his arms, intended and raised against us, and to suffer this his ancient and native kingdom to enjoy her religion and liberties; .... the true state of the question betwixt the king and this kirk and kingdom being, whether this shall continue a free kirk and kingdom to be ruled by the laws of both, or now, in the absence of our sovereign from us, whether we shall in effect, contrary to both, be enslaved to the passions of a foreign prelate, the Bishop of Canterbury and his supporters, whom he sends here to govern by their will and pleasure; and whether this ancient kingdom shall be like a conquered province, as Ireland under subjection of England, to receive what laws, civil or ecclesiastical, in religion or policy, they please to prescribe, and when, upon our refusal of this slavery, a foreign army threatens and invades us, whether the whole body of a kirk and kingdom shall lay down their necks to the sword, or their consciences to the yoke, or cast up a buckler of defense."

him for his friendly advice, told him that his spirits had grown feeble and faint—that when he recovered his former vigor he might think about it. Cottington, Wentworth, and others exulted over the intelligence that Sir John was very like to die—and die he did, a prisoner in the Tower, on the 27th of November, 1632! But Charles's revenge was not satisfied by mournful decay, a perishing by inches, nor by death itself. One of his victim's sons petitioned his majesty that he would be pleased to permit the body of their father to be carried into Cornwall, there to be buried, in his native soil, among his ancestors. Charles wrote at the foot of the petition, "Let Sir John Eliot's body be buried in the church of that parish where he died;" and accordingly it was thrust into an obscure corner of the Tower church.[1] Sir Edward Coke had gone to his grave about two years after Eliot, full of years and honors, having effaced the recollection of his early career by his manly struggles on the patriotic side. He also, in a manner, had been persecuted to the death. When he was lying on his death-bed, Secretary Windebank went with an order of council to search his house for seditious papers, and carried off his Commentary on Lyttleton, an autobiography, and many other manuscripts, among which was his will. None of these papers were restored until the Long Parliament, in 1641, made an order that they should be delivered to his heir; and then several of them, with his last will, were missing, and were never heard of more. It has been said and proved that, on the whole, this present House of Commons was well disposed toward the king's service, and as little influenced by their many wrongs as any man of ordinary judgment could expect: yet there were undoubtedly many faithful, affectionate, and bold hearts that burned and flamed with the memory of the wrongs done to Eliot. And foremost among these was his bosom friend Hampden, who had taken his seat for the town of Buckingham. The most conspicuous of the other old members were Denzil Hollis, Maynard, Oliver St. John, Pym, Strode, Corriton. Hayman, Haselrig, and OLIVER CROMWELL, who now sat for the town of Cambridge.

The Commons chose for their speaker Mr. Sergeant Glanvil, who was presented to his majesty seated on his throne in the House of Lords, where he made a very humble and pedantic speech, talking about the learned age wherein they lived, the most peaceful and flourishing government, aud the House of Commons being not merely the representative body, but the abstracted quintessence of the whole commonalty of this noble realm of England. Charles was silent; but my Lord Keeper Finch told Glanvil that his speech was full of flowers of wit, of flowers of eloquence, and flowers of judgment, and that his majesty had listened to it with a gracious ear and a princely attention. This was a curious prelude to the loud music that followed. The Commons, who knew what the king's word was worth, resolved not to take it, or to depart from their old practice of making the redress, or at least the discussion, of grievances precede their votes of supply. They took up the questions of religion. privileges of parliament, abuse of justice, and the infringement of the common liberties of the land, and, as formerly, they settled committees for examining these high matters. Some of them had suggested the petitioning of parliament against the impost of ship-money; several petitions from the counties were consequently received, and the practice of petitioning, a progress in constitutional liberty, began to be common. Arthur Capel delivered in the first petition, which was from the freeholders of the county of Hertford, complaining of ship-money, monopolies, the Star Chamber, the High Commission Court, &c. The first who stood up boldly to speak upon it was Harbottle Grimston. "In these great cases of danger," said Grimston, "we ought to do like skillful physicians, that are not led in their judgments so much by outward expressions of a disease as by the inward symptoms and causes of it. . . . . The case is this—the charter of our liberties, called Magna Charta, was granted unto us by King John, which was but a renovation and restitution of the ancient laws of this kingdom. This charter was afterward, in the succession of several ages, confirmed unto us above thirty several times; and in the third year of his majesty's reign that now is, we had more than a confirmation of it, for we had an act declaratory passed; and then to put it out of all question and dispute for the future, his majesty by his gracious answer, Soit droit fait comme est desiré, invested it with the title of Petition of Right. What expositions contrary to that law of right have some men given to the undermining of the liberty of the subjects with new invented subtil distinctions, and assuming to themselves a power (I know not where they had it), out of parliament to supersede, annihilate, and make void the laws of the kingdom! The commonwealth hath been miserably torn and massacred, and all property and liberty shaken, the church distracted, the gospel and professors of it persecuted, and the whole nation overrun with swarms of projecting canker-worms and caterpillars, the worst of all the Egyptian plagues." Harbottle Grimston was followed by Sir Benjamin Rudyard, who congratulated the House on their being called together. "We are here," he said, "by the blessing of God and our king. Parliaments have of late days become unfortunate; it is our duty, by our good temper and carriage, to restore them to their ancient luster. . . . . A parliament is the bed of reconciliation between king and people, and therefore it is fit for us to lay aside all exasperations, and carry ourselves with humility." And it must be be confessed that, though firm and decided, their whole tone and carriage was humble and respectful. "Princes," continued Rudyard, "are and will be as jealous of their prerogative as the people of their liberties, though both are then best when kept within their several bounds. Levying of money without consent of the people is a great disturbance to the subject, and so will be the scarcity of the king's revenues, unless they be supplied. But before the ending of this parliament (the untimely breaking whereof would be the breaking of us) I doubt not but his majesty's revenue may be so settled that he may live plentifully at home and abroad. . . . . In former parliaments the carriage of some hath been so haughty as though parliaments would last always, and the carriage of others as if there would be never any again; and therefore a moderation, if we love ourselves, is requisite. . . . . Men and brethren, what shall we do? If it were for my life, I would desire nothing more than that we proceed with moderation, that so we may have many happy parliaments, and that no dismal events may happen to any; for when parliaments are gone we are lost." The House on the following day (April 17th) fell again upon the subject of grievances in general, in consequence of petitions brought in by the members for Essex, Suffolk, and other counties; and upon that day the learned and laborious Pym delivered a speech of extraordinary length and still more extraordinary ability. "The first of grievances," said he, "are those which, during this interval of eleven years, have been directed against the liberties and privileges of parliament. . . . . I will show that the permission of them is as prejudicial to his majesty as to the commonwealth. I will show what way they may be remedied, and in all these I shall take care to maintain the great prerogative of royalty, which is, that the king can do no wrong." And throughout his discourse, he steadily kept the line which separates the king from his ministers, urging the responsibility of the latter. On the next day, the 18th, many members spoke, and the House voted that the proceedings remaining upon record in the King's Bench and Court of Star Chamber against Sir John Eliot, Mr. Hollis, and the other imprisoned members of the parliament of 1628 should be sent for and referred to a committee. They also ordered that the records in in the case of ship-money, which concerned Mr. Hampden, should be brought into the House. On Monday the 20th, after examining the conduct of Sir John Finch in the last parliament, they resolved that it was a breach of privilege for the speaker not to obey the commands of the House; and that it appeared the speaker, Finch, did adjourn the House by command of the king, without consent of the House, which also was a breach of privilege, and one that ought to be presented to his majesty. The very next day Charles, irritated as much as ever with the most moderate mention of the word grievance, summoned both Houses before him in the Banqueting Hall. He did not speak himself, but stood by, while my Lord Keeper Finch schooled the Commons. Finch told them that they ought to remember the causes of calling this parliament, which were for obtaining of assistance and supplies of money; that such and so great were his majesty's necessities that if they did not vote the supplies speedily they might as well not vote them at all.[1] "When you have voted," said he, "his majesty will give scope and liberty to present your just grievances, and then he will hear them, with a gracious ear." He paused; and then adverted, for the first time, to the irritating question of ship-money. "Herein," said he, "his majesty hath commanded me to declare thus much unto you: first, his majesty never had it in his royal heart to make an annual revenue of it, nor ever had a thought to make the least benefit or profit of it; but whatsoever he did or intended in it, was for the common good of you all; for the honor, glory, and splendor of this nation; and that every one of us should be made sharers and partakers in the benefits, fruits, and successes of it, of which otherwise you would have felt the woes. He hath been so far from making the least benefit of it, that he hath expended great sums of money out of his own coffers, to work with, to those necessary ends I have named unto you. The accounts of such moneys so received have been brought to the council-table, the monyes delivered to Sir William Russell, the treasurer of the navy; and by them all it may appear, whether there hath been a fullness and clearness of truth in the disbursements thereof, for the good and safety of the kingdom." He said that his majesty was once resolved not to send out shipping-writs this year, but he was forced to do it for their good and for his own honor, it being necessary for him to reduce his disaffected subjects of Scotland, and to guard against neighboring princes, who were all preparing great fleets. "Another reason," said he, "for shipping-writs this year, is, that those of Algiers are grown to that insolency, that they are provided of a fleet of sixty sail of ships, and have taken divers English ones, particularly one called the Rebecca of London (well known to the merchants upon the Exchange), taken upon the coast of Spain, worth at the least £260,000; and therefore the writs having gone out upon those weighty reasons before it was possible the parliament could give any supply to provide for those things, his majesty can not this year forbear it: but he doth expect your concurrence in the levying of it for the future." Once more the lord keeper recommended to their admiration and their imitation, the conduct of Wentworth's brow-beaten Irish parliaments. "Of all his kingdoms," said he, "this of England ought to be the nearest and dearest unto the king; yet for his kingdom of Ireland, the last parliament before this, the very second day of the parliament they gave him six subsidies; they relied upon his gracious word, and the success was, that before the end of that parliament they had all they did desire granted. (The truth being, as the reader will remember, that as soon as the money was voted, Wentworth and Charles broke all their promises, and refused to entertain the question of grievances.)[1] This last parliament there, it is well known unto you all, what a cheerful supply they have given unto his majesty, for their hearts went with it; and let it not be apprehended that subsidies there are of small value; there is not a subsidy that is granted but is worth £50,000 or £60,000 at the least: consider that kingdom how small proportion it holdeth with this of England; and you will find, that it is as considerable a gift as hath been given in many years.[1] It hath wrought this effect—that certainly his majesty will make it apparent to all the world, what a good construction, and how graciously he doth esteem and interpret this act of theirs."[2]

But the Commons would not be cajoled; and, on the following day, when Finch's speech in the Banqueting House came to be discussed, Edmund Waller, the poet, a member of the House, and of many succeeding parliaments, eloquently claimed precedence of grievances over supplies. "Look back," said Waller, "upon the best parliaments, and still you shall find that the last acts passed are for the gifts of subsidies on the people's part, and general pardons on the king's part: even the wisest kings have first acquainted their parliaments with their designs, and the reasons thereof; and then demanded the assistance, both of their counsels and purses. . . . . Nor shall we ever discharge the trust of those that sent us hither, or make them believe that they contribute to their own defense and safety, unless his majesty be pleased first to restore them to the propriety in their own goods and lawful liberties, whereof they esteem themselves now out of possession. One need not tell you that the propriety of goods is the mother of courage, and the nurse of industry; it makes us valiant in war, and good husbands in peace. The experience I have of former parliaments, and my present observation of the care the country has had to choose persons of worth and courage, make me think this House, like the Spartans, whose forward valor required some softer music to allay and quiet their spirits, too much moved with the sound of martial instruments. 'Tis not the fear of imprisonment, or (if need be) death itself, that can keep a true-hearted Englishmen from the care to leave this part of his inheritance as entire to posterity, as he received it from his ancestors." Waller said, that the person of no king was ever more beloved, and yet no people were ever less satisfied with the present ways of levying money; that neither the admiration of his majesty's natural inclination to justice and clemency, nor the pretended consent of the judges, could make them willingly submit to this late tax of ship-money; that his majesty's wants were not so great, but that they might find means to supply him, nor their desires so unreasonable, but that his majesty might satisfy them; that experience ought to teach his majesty how little that money prospered that was gotten without the concurrent good-will of his people; that never had more money been taken from the subject, yet never more want in the exchequer; that though the king had gotten little, the subjects had lost all. "But," continued the orator, "his majesty shall hear the truth from us, and we shall make appear the errors of divines, who would persuade us that a monarch must be absolute, and that he may do all things ad libitum. . . . . . I am sorry these men take no more care to gain our belief of those things which they tell us for our souls' health, while we know them so manifestly in the wrong in that which concerns the liberties and privileges of the subjects of England. But they gain preferment, and then it is no matter though they neither believe themselves, nor are believed by others. But since they are so ready to let loose the consciences of their kings, we are the more carefully to provide for our protection against this pulpit law, by declaring and reinforcing the municipal laws of this kingdom." This discourse, in the keen feeling of Charles and Laud, must have made the crown and mitre totter on their heads. In the afternoon the Commons sent up to desire a conference with the Lords; but their messengers found the door of the Lords closed against them. On the following day the Lords sent a message to excuse their refusal, upon the grounds of having had weighty business on hand, and his majesty present among them. In fact, Charles had gone down to the House of Lords and taken them by surprise, in order to induce them to interefere about the moneys; and it appears that the Commons had sent to request the conference at the moment they did, in order to show that they were aware of this visit. On Saturday the Lords desired a conference with the Commons, and, on the Monday following, Mr. Herbert, the queen's solicitor-general, reported the matter of the conference, which was mainly about the quickening speech which the king had delivered during his sudden visit to the Lords. This speech was a studied laudation of the Peers, and an angry rebuke of the Commons. Charles gave the Lords to understand that the necessity of his affairs would bear no delay; that he must have the subsidies; that he thought that, in civility and good manners, it was fit for him to be trusted first; that the Commons' considering their grievances before his wants was putting the cart before the horse; that the war was begun; that the men of Scotland had pitched their tents at Dunse, and threatened an invasion in Northumberland, having already taken prisoners some English troopers. Then followed the old promises and assurances about religion, tunnage and poundage, and ship-money. And now the Lords told the Commons, that, having the word of a king—and, as some of their lordships were pleased to say, not only of a king, but a gentleman—they would no more be guilty of distrusting him, than they would be capable of the highest undutifulness toward him. And upon all these considerations, though their lordships would not meddle with matters of subsidy, which belonged properly and naturally to the Commons—no, not so much as to give advice herein—yet, being members of one body, subjects of the same king, and equally concerned in the nation's safety, in their duty to his majesty, and in their natural love to their country, themselves, and their posterity, they had declared and voted in their own House that they held it most necessary and fit that the matter of supply should have precedence of every other matter or consideration whatsoever. The Commons, after long debate, resolved, that herein the Lords had violated the privileges of their House; and they immediately referred the matter to a committee, which declared that the Lords' voting about supplies was a most grievous breach of privilege.[1] They then demanded another conference, and having obtained it, they insisted, not only that the Lords should never meddle with matter of supplies, but also that they should not take notice of any thing debated by the Commons, until they themselves should declare the same to their lordships—a rule, they said, which the Commons would always observe with their lordships' proceedings. The Lords protested, not without signs of fear, that they had no intention whatever of invading any of the privileges of the Commons; but the court soon determined again to put the Upper House in a false position.

[1] Notwithstanding this bold assertion, it may be doubted if an Irish subsidy was usually worth more than the tenth part of the sum here mentioned.

Upon Thursday, the 30th of April, the Lower House resolved itself into a grand committee concerning ship-money, upon a full report made of that business by Mr. Maynard; and the records where the judges' opinions were entered were ordered to be sent for. In the very midst of this debate—and of course expressly to stop it—the Lords sent to demand another conference. The majority of the members seemed unwilling to be diverted from the debate; and upon a division, in a very full house, 257 voted against, and 148 for a present conference. This division showed the temper of the House, and the relative strength of parties. The conference was put off till the morrow, and they proceeded with the grand business of ship-money. On the following day the Lord Keeper Finch, at the conference, told the Commons again that their lordships well knew and infinitely respected the privileges of their House: that they had only stepped forward out of affection to his majesty, and consideration of the great evils and calamities that were hanging over their heads; that his majesty, on his late visit to their Lordships' House, had taken notice of somewhat that had been voted in the Commons' House concerning religion, property, and liberty of parliament, whereby his majesty considered the matter of his supplies set aside, which he had so often desired might have precedence; that his majesty had then expressed his royal intentions about ship-money, which he found so much stood upon; and had desired their lordships, as persons nearest to him in honor, and most concerned in the safety and prosperity of his kingdom, to use their counsel and persuasion to incline the Commons to give him a speedy answer and resolution in the matter of supply. Finch then endeavored to show that the Lords were bound to gratify the king, and that their voting the precedency of supply was no infringement of the Commons' privilege. "Their advice therein," said he, "they do not, nor ever did, hold derogatory to yours, or exceeding the privileges of their own House; for, as you frequently impart your grievances to them, so it is all the reason in the world they should communicate their fears and foresights of dangers to you, their lordships being a body that moveth in an orb nearer unto the royal throne than you do, and thereby the likelier to communicate in the councils and secrets of state; and, for their persons and fortunes, at least as considerable in point of danger." The whole of this speech had a most mischievous effect, and, notwithstanding its disclaimers, the Commons suspected that all their other privileges were to be swallowed up, and they made wholly subservient to the Peers.[1] More resolute than ever in their purpose of not voting the money till they had obtained a redress of grievances, and even a formal reparation from the Lords, they continued in committee. On Saturday, the 2d of May, Charles sent Sir Henry Vane, now secretary of state as well as treasurer of the household, to tell them that the danger of the nation would be greatly increased if more time were lost; that he had received no answer at all from them, though he had already told the House that delay would be as destructive as a denial; that he once more desired an immediate answer concerning his supplies, he being resolved, on his part, to make good all his promises made by himself or by the lord keeper. The House debated upon this message till the then unusually late hour of six in the evening, but came to no resolution. Secretary Vane, Clarendon says, treacherously, and without the king's orders (which is very improbable, and seems to be disproved by attending circumstances), assured the Commons that the king would accept of nothing less from them than an immediate granting of twelve subsidies. Many of the members observed that, if they were thus to purchase a release from an imposition very unjustly laid upon the kingdom, they should in a manner confess it had been a just tax. Some said that twelve subsidies would be more than the whole stock in money of the kingdom amounted to, and founded their opposition on the exorbitance of the demand. As to the king's constant assertions about the great danger of the nation, there was hardly a man in the House of Commons that believed them—there were many who looked to the Scotch Covenanters as their best friends. These men had represented, both in the House and out of it,

[1] "Though the parliament had not sat above six or seven days, and had managed all their debates, and their whole behavior, with wonderful order and sobriety, the court was impatient that no advance was yet made toward a supply: which was foreseen would take up much time, whensoever they went about it, though never so cordially; and therefore they prevailed with the House of Peers, which was more entirely at the king's disposal, that they would demand a conference with the House of Commons, and then propose to them, by way of advice, that they would begin with giving the king a supply, in regard of the urgency and even necessity of his affairs, and afterward proceed upon the grievances, or any thing else they thought fit; and the House of Peers accordingly did give their advice to this purpose at a conference. This conference was no sooner reported in the House of Commons, than their whole temper seemed to be shaken. It was the undoubted fundamental privilege of the Commons in parliament, that all supplies should have their rise and beginning from them; this had never been infringed or violated, or so much as questioned in the worst times; and that now, after so long intermission of parliaments, that all privileges might be forgotten, the House of Peers should begin with an action their ancestors never attempted, administered too much cause of jealousy of somewhat else that was intended; and so, with an unanimous consent, they declared it to be so high a breach of privilege, that they could not proceed upon any other matter until they first received satisfaction and reparation from the House of Peers."—Clarendon, Hist.

that the English people had no reason to pay for a war which was never caused or desired by them, and that the people would undoubtedly pay with more willingness as many subsidies to prevent that unhappy war. "Among all the gentlemen of the House of Commons who spoke to that purpose, the Lord George Digby, son to the Earl of Bristol (a young nobleman of extraordinary abilities), was eminent for a speech there, wherein complaining that the House was required to give present answer concerning supplies to the king, to engage himself in a war, and that a civil war: for, said he, so I must needs call it, seeing we are of the same religion and under the same king."[1]

The day after the delivery of Vane's first message was a Sunday, but on Monday (the 4th of May) the king sent Sir Henry to the House of Commons with a second message, which was delivered in these words:—"Whereas, upon Saturday last, his majesty was pleased to send a message to this House desiring you to give a present answer concerning his supply; to which, as yet, his majesty hath had no other answer but that, upon this day, you will again take it into further consideration: therefore his majesty, the better to facilitate your resolutions this day, hath thought fit to let you know that, of his grace and favor, he is pleased (upon your granting twelve subsidies to be presently passed, and to be paid in three years, with a proviso that it shall not determine the sessions), not only for the present to forbear the further levying of any ship-money, but will also give way to the utter abolishing of it by any course that yourselves shall like best. And for your grievances his majesty will (according to his royal promise) give you as much time as may be now, and the next Michaelmas; and he expects a present and positive answer upon which he may rely, his affairs being in such a condition as can endure no longer delay."

The Commons went again into a committee of the whole House to consider his majesty's messages; and the sergeant was sent to the several bars in Westminster Hall to summon the absent members to come in to the service of the House. But though they spent the whole day till six at night in busy debate, they came to no resolution, and separated with desiring Sir Henry Vane to acquaint his majesty that they would resume the question at eight o'clock on the following morning On that morning, at an earlier hour than eight, the king, for very obvious purposes, sent Secretary Windebank to the house of Sergeant Glanvil, the speaker, who lived in Chancery-lane, with a command to bring him to Whitehall. The Commons met at the appointed hour, and were alarmed at the nonappearance of their speaker; and, while they were discoursing with one another, James Maxwell, gentleman usher, came with the black rod to let them know that his majesty was in the House of Lords, and expected their coming thither. Charles, in effect, by the advice of Laud and of all his council, with the exception of the earls of Northumberland and Holland, had resolved upon an immediate dissolution; for Vane and the solicitor-general, Herbert, on the preceding evening, had told him that the Commons, if permitted to sit again, would pass such a vote against ship-money as would blast not only that revenue (we should have thought it had been blasted enough already), but also other branches of the king's receipts.[1] Left without their speaker, whom Charles, no no doubt to Glanvil's own satisfaction, had made fast in the palace, the Commons could neither vote nor protest as a House; and so they rose quietly, and followed black rod to the House of Lords. When they appeared at the bar, Charles pronounced their sentence of dissolution in a speech of some length. As on a former occasion, he praised the Upper House at the expense of the Lower one, telling the Lords that it was neither their fault nor his that this parliament had not come to a happy end; and, praising their lordships' willing ear and great affection, he bade them remember the commands he had given at the opening of this parliament, and then complained of the Commons not taking his promises in exchange for instant subsidies. "I know," said he, "that they have insisted very much on grievances: I will not say but there may be some, though I will confidently affirm that there are not by many degrees so many as the public voice doth make them. Wherefore I desire you to take notice, now especially at this time, that out of parliament I shall be as ready (if not more willing) to hear and redress any such grievances as in parliament." This time, however, he did not call the opposition "vipers." "I will not," he said, "lay this fault on the whole House of Commons; I will not judge so uncharitably of those whom, for the most part, I take to be loyal and well-affected subjects; but it hath been the malicious cunning of some few seditiously-affected men that hath been the cause of this misunderstanding.' He then thanked the Lords for the care they had had of his honor and affairs; desired them to go on and assist him in the maintaining of his government and that regal power that was truly his; and he concluded with saying, "As for the liberty of the people, that they now so much startle at, know, my lords, that no king in the world shall be more careful in the propriety of their goods, liberty of their persons, and true religion, than I shall. And now, my lord keeper, do as I have commanded you." Then Finch stood up, and added, "My lords, and you, the gentlemen of the House of Commons, the king's majesty doth dissolve this parliament." This, the last dissolution which Charles was to make, took place on the 5th of May, 1640. Even in the eyes of the king's friends he had committed a most lamentable mistake. According to Clarendon, "there could not a greater damp have seized upon the spirits of the whole nation than this dissolution caused, and men had much of

[1] May, Hist. of the Parl.

[1] Clarendon, Hist. The noble historian adds—"What followed in the next parliament, within less than a year, made it believed that Sir Henry Vane acted that part maliciously, and to bring all into confusion: he being known to have an implacable hatred against the Earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, whose destruction was then upon the anvil the misery in view which shortly after fell out. It could never be hoped that more sober and dispassionate men[1] would ever meet together in that place, or fewer who brought ill purposes with them; nor could any man imagine what offense they had given which put the king upon that resolution." But, in truth, though it suited Clarendon, in reference to the circumstances of his own course, to profess this wonderful ignorance, the offense given by parliament was as clear at the time when it happened, as the sun at noon-day. The Commons, who held ship-money to be the great crime of Charles's administration, and the judgment against Mr. Hampden the infamy of those who pronounced it, were resolute that the tax should be annihilated, the judgment formally reversed, and the judges brought to punishment: that that right of taxation, which had been claimed as an absolute prerogative so inherent in the crown, that no act of parliament could take it away, should be blasted for once and forever, to the confusion of king, court divines, and court lawyers; and Charles was a prince to peril his crown rather than submit to these things. But, besides, there was ground of offense enough, in the Commons persisting in pressing the questions of grievance before supply, in their refusing to take the king's tarnished word for their moneys; and this, in effect, was the grand cause of quarrel from the first of his parliaments to the last.

Clarendon tells us that, within an hour after the dissolving of the parliament, he met Mr. St. John, "who had naturally a great cloud in his face, and very seldom was known to smile," but who then had a most cheerful aspect, and, seeing him melancholy, asked what troubled him. Clarendon, then Mr. Hyde, answered, that the same that troubled him, he believed, troubled most good men; that, in such a time of confusion, so wise a parliament, which alone could have found remedy for it, was so unseasonably dismissed. The other answered, with a little warmth, that all was well, and that it must be worse before it could be better. But if his enemies rejoiced and his friends grieved at the measure, Charles himself either felt no regret or concealed it. He put forth a Declaration to all his loving subjects of the causes which moved him to dissolve the last parliament, in which he charged the Commons with venting their own malice and disaffection to the state, instead of using dutiful expressions toward his person and government; with their subtil and malignant courses, intending nothing less than to bring all government and magistracy into contempt, and all this, in spite of his own piety and goodness; with presuming to interfere in acts of his government and council, taking upon themselves to be guiders and directors in all matters both temporal and ecclesiastical; and, "if kings were bound to give an account of their royal actions, and of their manner of government to their subjects assembled in parliament," in a very audacious and insolent way, censuring the present government, traducing his majesty's administration of justice, rendering his officers and ministers of state odious to the rest of his subjects, and not only this, but his majesty's very government, which had been so just, so gracious, that never was the like in this or any other nation; with having delayed the supplies in spite of all his promises, and introducing a way of bargaining and contracting with the king, as if nothing ought to be given him by them but what he should buy and purchase of them, either by quitting somewhat of his royal prerogative, or by diminishing and lessening his revenues; which courses of theirs were repugnant to the duty of subjects, unfit for his majesty in honor to permit and suffer, and hazardous and dishonorable to the kingdom, as all men might easily judge."[1] And, as if the unconstitutional practice of imprisoning members for words spoken in the House had not made bad blood enough,—as if the case of Sir John Eliot had been forgotten by the nation, and those bosom friends who were morally strengthened by his martyrdom in the Tower,—Charles committed several members the very day after the dissolution. Mr. Bellasis and Sir John Hotham were sent to the Fleet Prison by a warrant signed by Laud, Strafford, Hamilton, Windebank, Goring, and sixteen other ministers or members of the council. The only offense alleged against them was their speeches. Mr. John Crew, afterward Lord Crew, was committed to the Tower by a warrant signed by Laud, Strafford, Windebank, Goring, and six other members of the council. His offense was the not discovering or delivering up certain petitions, papers, and complaints which he had received in parliament, being in the chair of the committee for the redress of religious grievances.[2] The house of the Lord Brook was searched for papers, and his study and cabinets were broken open.

Previously to the meeting of parliament, Laud had summoned a convocation of the clergy, and this body continued to sit in spite of the dissolution of parliament, which was considered very illegal.[3] Nor would Laud, and those who acted under him in this assembly, be warned by the signs of the times and the spirit shown by the dissolved parliament: oppressors to the last, they enacted a number of new constitutions, which were all shattered at the first meeting of the Long Parliament. They ordered that every clergyman should instruct his parishioners once a-quarter in the divine right of kings, and the damnable sin of resistance to authority. They added canons charged with exaggerated intolerance against Catholics, Socinians, and Separatists. By their sixth canon of this year, 1640, they required that every clergyman and graduate in the universities should take an oath that all things necessary for salvation were contained in the doctrine of the Church of England, as distinguished from Presbyterianism and Papistry. This oath was "to be

[1] Mr. Hallam has shown that all the principal men who headed the popular party in the Long Parliament were members of this—that the difference was not so much in the men as in the times; the bad administration, and bad success of 1640, as well as the dissolution of the Short Parliament, having greatly advocated the public discontents in the interval that elapsed between the dissolving of this and the summoning of the next parliament.—*Const. taken heartily and willingly," and yet those that refused it were threatened with severe punishment. They further required all clergymen to swear not to consent to the alteration of the government of the church by archbishops, bishops, deacons, &c., as it was by law established, and by right ought to stand. From Northamptonshire, Kent, Devonshire, and other counties, spirited petitions and exceptions were sent up against these canons; the nation was in a ferment; but Charles obtained from the gratitude of Laud and his clergy, in convocation, a grant of six subsidies, each of four shillings in the pound, which money was expressly destined for the scourging of the stiff-necked Scots, and the uprooting of Presbyterianism.[1] But this was not money enough for such great undertakings, and Charles "fell roundly to find out all expedients for the raising of more."[2] Fresh collections were made by means of the queen and Sir Kenelm Digby among the Roman Catholics; writs of ship-money were issued in greater numbers and enforced with more severity than ever, merchants and gentlemen of landed property being almost daily Star-chambered on this account; great loans were attempted to be drawn from the city of London, for which purpose the names of the richest citizens were, by royal command, returned to the council-board; and, all these extraordinary ways being insufficient, others were made use of, of a nature more unusual. Bullion was seized in the Tower, bags of pepper upon the Exchange, and sold at an under rate. A consultation was held about coining £400,000 of base money; but here the merchants and other intelligent men stepped in to show the great inconveniences and perils which always attended a depreciation of the coinage, and Charles for once listened to good advice and held his hand, notwithstanding the precedent quoted by his council.[3] Goods were bought on long credit and sold at a loss for ready money; large sums were raised in the counties where troops were quartered for the northern wars by actual violence, or horses, carts, provisions, and forage were taken from the people at the sword's point. Whenever any one stepped forward to represent these doings to his most sacred majesty, he was set down as a foe to monarchy—as one bent upon bringing all government into contempt by exposing its officers and instruments. The mayor and sheriffs of London were dragged into the Star Chamber for slackness in levying ship-money; and Strafford observed, that things would never go right till a few fat London aldermen were hanged. Four aldermen, Soames, Atkins, Rainton, and Geere, were committed by warrant of the privy council, because, being summoned before the board—his majesty present in council—they had refused to set down the names of such persons within their several and respective wards, who, in their opinions, were able to lend his majesty money for the safeguard and defense of the realm, &c. The effect of this "setting in motion all the wheels of the prerogative"[1] was inevitable. "It is impossible," wrote a noble lord to his friend, "that things can long continue in the condition they are now in: so general a defection in this kingdom hath not been known in the memory of any."[2] And it is generally admitted that it was now that the discontented English drew closer their bonds of friendship with the Covenanters, and that many of the king's own officers, and some of his ministers, concerted measures with Loudon, and Leslie, and other Scottish leaders. Laud's friend Pierce, bishop of Bath and Wells, had called this Scottish war "bellum Episcopale" (a war for episcopacy), and such the English people were disposed to consider it. Indeed by this time they had set down the primate and his bishops as the main cause of all their misfortunes; and Laud's robes and sleeves—perhaps his life—were in danger from the popular fury. During the sitting of the convocation, a libel, or paper, was posted up at the Royal Exchange, inviting the London apprentices, who were rather prone to mischief, to rise and sack the archiepiscopal palace of Lambeth. The invitation was accepted, and, on the night of the 11th of May, a mob, consisting almost entirely of apprentices and youths, fell upon the said palace. But Laud had had time to garrison and fortify his residence; the rioters were not very numerous, and he "had no harm."[3] "Since then," he says, "I have got cannons and fortified my house, and hope all may be safe; but yet libels are constantly set up in all places of note in the city."[4] Ten days after, this gentle representative of the apostles enters in his diary—"One of the chief being taken, was condemned at Southwark on Thursday, and hanged and quartered on Saturday morning following." The victim, it appears, was a stripling, and the horrid punishment of treason was awarded to him by the court lawyers, because there happened to be a drum with the mob; and the marching to beat of drum was held to be a levying of war against the king. Many others were arrested; but "some of these mutinous people came in the daytime, and broke open the White Lion Prison, and let loose their fellows, both out of that prison and the King's Bench, and the other prisoners out of the White Lion."[5] Clarendon says that "this infamous, scan-

[3] Queen Elizabeth had debased the coinage during the Irish wars. Sir Thomas Roe, or Rowe, made an excellent speech before Charles's privy council on the danger and absurdity of debasing the coinage. Rushworth gives it at length. "Experience has taught us," said Sir Thomas, "that the enfeebling of the coin is but a shift for a while, as drink to one in a dropsy to make him swell the more."

[5] Laud's Diary. Such a riot was in itself a serious offense, and the leaders of it subjected themselves to punishment, though no harm was done, beyond threatening and hard words. But it is atrocious to see the cold-blooded manner in which the head of a Christian church and the model historian of the royalists can speak of the hanging and quartering of the offender. Clarendon says that the man was a sailor; but neither he nor the archbishop relates the worst part of the story. Miss Aikin, in her interesting Memoirs of the Court of King Charles, makes up for this deficiency, and corrects some of their mistakes or dalous, heedless insurrection, quashed with the deserved death of that one varlet, was not thought to be contrived or fomented by any persons of quality," though it was afterward discoursed of in the House of Commons by Mr. Strode, and mentioned in the first draft of the first remonstrance, as brought in by Mr. Pym, "not without a touch of approbation." According to the same authority, the primate was not the only great man threatened: "cheap, senseless libels were scattered about the city, and fixed upon gates and public remarkable places, traducing and vilifying those who were in highest trust and and employment;" as if it were possible to traduce or speak too harshly of the scoundrels that were banded against the liberties of the country—that (even in this historian's showing) were plundering the people day by day, and doing violence to their consciences. But, at this early stage, we may remark that Clarendon's facts are an antidote to his reasoning.

All this time Charles was indulging in dreams of conquest and glory; for in his eyes it was glorious to vanquish by the sword his own countrymen and subjects, the Scots—and he confidently calculated that when he should return from the Forth and the Tweed, with these blood-sprinkled laurels, he should be enabled to have his will, and reign like a real king by the Thames. Yet if he had paused for a moment to reflect upon the spirit of both nations, upon the disaffection now manifest, which pervaded country, court, and camp in England, and on the unanimity that prevailed among the Covenanters, he must have been convinced of the utter groundlessness of these sanguine hopes. Regardless of his prerogative, the Scottish parliament met on the 2d of June, and put forth a series of manifestos, which had more weight in England, as well as in Scotland, than all the royal proclamations. But they had not waited so long to organize their resistance: they called out their levies in March and April, and, having retained their superior officers and their skillful commanders from abroad when they disbanded their army the preceding year, they were soon in a condition to act on the defensive; for again they did not wait for attack, but struck the first blow themselves.[1] Leslie was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of the Covenant, and, being resolved not to move southward till he was master of Edinburgh Castle, he laid siege to that fortress; but Ruthven, the governor, a man of known courage, made an obstinate resistance. Leslie intrusted the conduct of the siege to some of his best officers, and went southward, and it was not till he was victorious on the Tyne that he learned that Ruthven, being "somewhat straitened for want of ammunition and victuals, and the falling away of the water into the rock of the castle, by the often discharging of his great guns," was constrained to capitulate, and deliver up the castle to the Covenanters. The parliament imposed a tax of a tenth upon every man's rents, and the twentieth penny of interest on loans, &c., throughout the kingdom of Scotland; and before they adjourned they appointed a standing committee of estates, to superintend the operations of the campaign, to sit in the cabinet at Edinburgh, to move with the troops, to be in the camp or wherever else their presence should be most required. They entered into a solemn bond to support the authority of parliament, to uphold the statutes recently passed, and which were asserted to be legally defective for want of the touch of the scepter. In fact, the whole executive power of the state was fixed by this parliament in their standing committee. Having got all things ready, the Covenanters resolved to enter England with a sword in one hand and a petition in the other, signifying, in the mean time, to the English people, what their intentions were, and the reasons of their invasion.

Charles, Strafford, and the Earl of Northumberland thought that they had provided for the worst in making the Lord Conway general of the horse, instead of the Earl of Holland. "The war," says Clarendon, "was generally thought to be as well provided for, as after the last year's miscarriage it could be, by his (Conway's) being made general of the horse; and no man was more pleased with it than the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had contracted an extraordinary opinion of this man, and took great delight in his company, he being well able to speak in the affairs of the church, and taking care to be thought by him a very zealous defender of it; when they who know him better, knew he had no kind of sense of religion, and thought all was alike. He was sent down with the first troops of horse and foot which were levied to the borders of Scotland, to attend the motion of the enemy, and had a strength sufficient to stop them, if they should attempt to pass the river, which was not fordable in above one or two places, there being good garrisons in Berwick and Carlisle."[2]

Conway was in cantonment between the Tweed and the Tyne by the end of July. According to willful misrepresentations. She says:—"This person, named John Archer, was a drummer in the north; but, having obtained leave of absence immediately after the dissolution of parliament, he joined in the attack on Lambeth Palace, and was taken into custody. Being rescued from prison by his comrades, he was subsequently proclaimed as a traitor. The captain of his troop in the north, seeing the description of his person in the proclamation, wrote to the council to inform them where he was to be found. Upon this the poor drummer was arrested, and paraded through the city by a troop of train-bands to the Tower." "On the Friday following," says a cotemporary, "this fellow was racked in the Tower to make him confess his companions. I do fear he is a very simple fellow, and knows little or nothing, neither doth he confess any thing save against himself. But it is said, there will be mercy showed to save his life; but this is more than I am yet certain of. The king's sergeants, Heath and Whitfield, took his examination on the rack last Friday." It will be recollected that, in the case of Felton, the judges had solemnly decided against the use of torture as always, and in all circumstances, contrary to the law of England. Its subsequent employment in this case was therefore an enormity destitute of all excuse, and it can scarcely be doubted that it was perpetrated by the direction of Laud himself. In all probability the execution of the wretched victim preserved the atrocious secret in few hands, or it would surely have attracted the notice of the Long Parliament. The circumstance is mentioned by no historian, but the warrant for applying the torture still exists in the State Paper Office." It has been printed by Mr. Jardine in his interesting tract on the Use of Torture in England, 8vo. 1837, pp. 108, 109.

[1] It should be mentioned, however, that Charles, long before this, had prohibited all trade with Scotland; that his men-of-war and cruisers had been making prizes of Scottish merchantmen wherever they could find them.

[2] Hist.

Clarendon, who constantly accounts for failures by treachery, his lordship had assured the king that the Covenanters would be in no condition to enter England that year; but Charles could not possibly be deceived by any such assertion, supposing it to have been made: he had plenty of means for obtaing more correct information, and would hardly have trusted implicitly to letters from the Tyne for what was passing beyond the Tweed. But on the 15th of August, Conway wrote to Windebank that his spies reported that the Scots were on the point of advancing into the heart of England; that they would, upon Saturday next, be before the town of Newcastle, which they said they would take, or there be broken. and that from Newcastle they intended to go into Yorkshire.[1] Upon the 20th of August, Charles began his journey from London toward York in some haste: and on that very day Leslie dashed across the Tweed with his Covenanters.[2] Charles, on the same day, published a proclamation, declaring the Scots, and all who in any way assisted them, to be rebels and traitors, and to have incurred the penalties of high treason; yet he declared that he would forgive the Scots if they would "acknowledge their former crimes and exorbitancies, and in humble and submissive manner, like penitent delinquents, crave pardon for the past, and yield obedience for the time to come." He also declared himself generalissimo of his own army, and claimed the attendance of all the tenants of the crown, as upon a war waged by the sovereign in person. Numerically the royal army actually collected was an imposing force: without counting the train-bands of the northern counties, or the Irish troops brought over by Strafford, or about to be sent over by the Earl of Ormond, it was 20,000 strong, and provided with 60 pieces of artillery. But it was imposing in numbers only: discipline, which can make ten men more effective than a hundred, and the hearty zeal in the cause, and attachment to the banner of their leaders, which can almost do as much, were altogether wanting. "It was a marvelous thing to observe in divers places the averseness of the common soldiers to this war. Though commanders and gentlemen of great quality, in pure obedience to the king, seemed not at all to dispute the cause or consequence of this war, the common soldiers would not be satisfied, questioning, in a mutinous manner, whether their captains were papists or not, and in many places were not appeased till they saw them receive the sacrament; laying violent hands on divers of their commanders, and killing some, uttering in bold speeches their distaste of the cause, to the astonishment of many that common people should be sensible of public interest and religion, when lords and gentlemen seemed not to be."[3] The Earl of Northumberland had been offered the post of commander-in-chief, under the king; but he declined the dangerous honor, on the ground of a very doubtful sickness, and it was conferred upon Strafford, who had really risen from a sick bed, and was not yet cured of a dreadful attack of his old enemy the gout. Strafford, knowing that his undisciplined levies and wavering officers would be no match for the well-drilled Scots, and the experienced captains that commanded them, had ordered Lord Conway not to attempt to dispute the open country between the Tweed and the Tyne, but at all hazards to make good his stand at Newburn, and prevent the Covenanters from crossing the latter river. But before Charles could get farther north than Northallerton, or Strafford than Darlington, Conway was in full retreat, and the Scots upon the Wear, and "that infamous. irreparable rout at Newburn had fallen out."[1] Upon Thursday, the 27th of August, Leslie and his Scots encamped on the left bank of the Tyne, a very short distance from Newburn, at a spot called Heddonlaw. That night they made great fires round about their camp, coals being plentiful thereabout, so that the camp seemed to be of great compass and extent. During the night they suffered any Englishmen that chose to visit them, making them welcome, and assuring them that they only came to demand justice from the king, against incendiaries—men that were a still greater curse to the English than they had been to the Scots. In the course of the following day, Conway drew up the king's army, consisting of 3000 foot, and 1500 horse, in some meadow-ground close on the south bank of the river, between Newburnhaugh and Stellahaugh, which faced two fords, passable for infantry at low water, and which were both protected by sconces or breast-work, there being four pieces of ordnance in each sconce. Conway's cavalry was drawn up in squadrons, and with the foot it covered the right bank. During the forenoon the Scots watered their horses at one side of the river, and the English at the other, without any attempt to annoy each other—without exchanging any reproachful language. The Scots brought down cannon into Newburn town, and planted some in the church at a short distance from the river's brink, and they distributed their musketeers in the church and in the houses, lanes, and hedges, to guard against any attack. For many hours the two forces looked at each other calmly, and without any apparent anxiety to engage. The old fury of the Scots, the ancient animosities of the English, had no longer an existence; if it had been otherwise, no treachery, no management could have kept them

[3] May.—That thorough-going royalist, Sir Philip Warwick, who, when the tragical drama was all over, and many more years had elapsed, could see no provocation on the part of the court, who maintained that the levying of ship-money was strictly legal, and branding and mutilation a very proper means of establishing Laud's Anglican church, gives a very indifferent character of some of the principal officers of this ill-affected army. The Lord Conway he describes, oddly, as a "man of epicurean principles, and a great devourer of books and good cheer, and who lay under some reflection since the action at the Isle of Rhé." "The rest of the chosen military men," he adds, "as Wilmot, and Goring, and Ashburnham, and O'Neal, &c., were merry lads, and none of them good willers to Strafford, but more the Lord Holland's dependents—a greater man on the queen's side, than his, which made them so froward toward him."—Memoirs.

from falling upon each other. At last a Scottish officer, well mounted, wearing a black feather in his hat, came out of one of the thatched houses in Newburn to water his horse in the river Tyne, as his countrymen had been doing all that day; and an English soldier, seeing this officer fix his eye on the English trenches fired at him, whether in earnest, or to scare him, was not known, but the shot took effect, and the officer with the black feather fell wounded off his horse. Thereupon the Scottish musketeers opened a fire across the river upon the English, and Leslie ordered his artillery to play. Some of his guns are said to have been merely of leather, capable only of some ten or twelve rounds, but he had other regular pieces of ordnance, and his guns were served by men who had learned the use of them under the Lion of the North, or in the sieges and campaigns of the Dutch: whereas the English soldiers were unacquainted with their cannon.[1] The Scots played upon the English breast-works, and the king's army played upon Newburn church, till it got to be near low water, by which time the Scottish artillery had made a breach in the greater sconce, where Colonel Lunsford commanded. The colonel had great difficulty to keep his men to their post, for several had been killed, and many wounded, and when they saw a captain, a lieutenant, and some other officers slain, they began to murmur that they had been put upon double duty, and had stood there all night and all day, without being relieved from Newcastle. Lunsford again prevailed with them not to desert their position, but presently a well-directed shot hit the work in the midst, fell among the men and killed some more of them; and then the rest threw down their arms and ran out of the fort, Leslie, from the rising hill above Newburn, plainly perceived this evacuation, and it being then low water, he commanded his own body-guard—a troop of twenty-six horse, and all Scotch lawyers—to pass the ford, which they did with great spirit, and having reconnoitered the other sconce, they rode back without coming to close quarters. Still keeping up his fire, he at length made the English foot to waver, and finally compelled them to abandon that work also. Then Leslie played hard with nine pieces of cannon upon the king's horse, drawn up in the meadow, and so galled them that they fell into disorder, which was greatly increased when the Scottish lawyers charged again with a body of cavalry under Sir Thomas Hope, and two Scottish regiments of foot, commanded by the lords Lindsay and Loudon, waded through the river. Presently Leslie threw more troops, both horse and foot, on the right bank, and then Colonel Lunsford drew off all his cannon, and a retreat was sounded by the English trumpets. Only one gallant attempt was made at resistance: Commissary Wilmot, son to the Lord Wilmot, Sir John Digby, a Catholic recusant, and Daniel O'Neal, an Irish officer, charged the Scots, and drove some of them back into the river, but, not being seconded, they were recharged, surrounded, and taken prisoners, with their men.[1] Leslie treated these three officers nobly in his camp, and afterward gave them their liberty freely to return to the king's army. After this short struggle, the English fled in the greatest disorder to Newcastle. Nor did they consider themselves safe there, for the Lord Conway called a council of war, and it was resolved, at twelve o'clock at night, that the town was not tenable,[2] and that the whole army, with the train of artillery and stores, which had been there collected, should fall back instantly upon Durham. In the whole battle—if battle it may be called—there fell not above sixty Englishmen; it was evident that they had no mind to fight the Scots in this quarrel. But, at the same time, it may be observed, that there were circumstances sufficient to account for their defeat, without reference either to their lukewarmness or the treachery of their leaders. Conway had only some 4000 troops of the rawest kind. Leslie had from 20,000 to 22,000; and though his cavalry was weak, his infantry was excellent. Besides, the river Tyne was fordable at eight or ten places, a little above or a little below those two points guarded by the sconces or breastwork, the only works erected on the river. To defend that line against such a force and so skillful a general as Leslie, Strafford, at least ought to have been up with all the force he was leading.[3]

By five o'clock on the following morning, August the 29th, Newcastle was evacuated, and all that part of the English army in full retreat. For a time it appears the Scots could scarcely believe their good fortune, or that so important a town could be abandoned without a blow; but, in the afternoon, Douglas, sheriff of Teviotdale, rode up with a trumpet and a small troop of horse to the gates of Newcastle, which, after some parley were thrown open to him. The following day, being Sunday, Douglas and fifteen Scottish lords dined with the mayor, Sir Peter Riddle, drank a health to the king, and heard three sermons preached by their own divines. On Monday, Leslie pitched his tents on Gateside Hill, half a mile south of Newcastle, whence he issued orders for supplies of bread and beer, for which he paid partly in money and partly in bills. He permitted no man to take a crust of bread without paying for it, and his troops were kept in an admirable

[2] "By all their consents, it was agreed that the town should be quitted because it was not tenable, being altogether unfortified on the the bishopric's side, and the fortifications on the other side were very inconsiderable. To stay there would but increase the loss; it would not save any thing. The gaining of two or three days could not much strengthen the town, there being not any place that could be made defensible in that time, and the loss of our men would greatly lessen the king's army; and this was agreeable to that which was thought fit at court; for, with all speed orders were dispatched by several ways to command the bringing of the army from Newcastle."—Rushworth. This laborious writer was on the spot at the time.

[3] Leslie, moreover, had the advantage of ground: the left bank of the Tyne, at that point, was higher than the right, and from the church of Newburn, the Scots could clearly discern every movement in the English positions, and rake them with a sure fire.

state of discipline by his own drilling and vigilance, and by the constant prayers and sermons of their preachers. Conway did not consider Durham more tenable than Newcastle: he pursued his retreat to Darlington, where he met the fiery Strafford, who, however, was fain to turn with him, and fall still farther back to Northallerton, where the standard of Charles was floating.[1] Leslie soon quitted Newcastle, and was marching after them, it was said, as fast as he could: so, having hastily reviewed their forces, and found them greatly diminished by desertion, the king, Strafford, and Conway all moved together from Northallerton, and fell back upon the city of York, with the intention of intrenching close under the walls of that town, and sending back their cavalry into Richmond or Cleveland, to guard the river Tees and keep the Scots from making incursions into Yorkshire. Leslie took Durham as he had taken Newcastle; and the Scots entered without opposition into Shields, Teignmouth and other places. Without losing twenty men, they became masters of the whole of the four northern counties of England. But though the road to York seemed open to them, though the disaffection of the inhabitants was well known, they paused upon the left bank of the Tees. On the 11th of September, when the Londoners were already greatly dismayed by the notion that they should get no more coals from Newcastle, his majesty took a view of his army under the walls of York, and found that it still consisted of 16,000 foot, and 2000 horse, besides the trained-bands of Yorkshire. "Braver bodies of men, and better clad," wrote Sir Henry Vane to Secretary Windebank, "have I not seen any where. . . . For the horse, they are such as no man that sees them, by their outward appearance, but will judge them able to stand and encounter with any whatsoever. Sure I am that I have seen far meaner in the King of Sweden's army do strange and great execution; and, by the report of all, they are far better than those they are to encounter, being but little nags most of them, and few or none at all armed but with lances and Scots pistols, of which I can not learn they are above 1600. So, if God sends us hearts and hands . . . . and so as you do provide us moneys in time, I do not see (though it must be confessed they have made but too far and prosperous advance already into this kingdom) but that, God being with his majesty's army, success will follow."[2]

But, to say nothing of God's blessing, which his preachers said he had, heart and money were both wanting; and the unwelcome conviction induced Charles to turn a ready ear to those who urged the necessity of temporizing with the Scots. He condescended to receive as envoy and negotiator the Lord Lanark, secretary of state for Scotland, and brother to the Marquis of Hamilton, who presented the petition of the Covenanters to his majesty. Lamenting their many sufferings in times past, they told Charles that extreme necessity had constrained them for their relief, and obtaining their humble and just desires, to come into England, where, in all their march they had lived upon their own means, victuals, and goods brought along with them; neither troubling the peace of the kingdom of England, nor hurting any of his majesty's subjects; having carried themselves in a most peaceable manner till they were pressed by strength of arms to put such English forces out of the way as did, against their own consciences, oppose their peaceable passage into Newburn-upon-Tyne, bringing their own blood upon their own heads. They expressed their anxiety to prevent the like inconveniences, or greater, for the future; assured his majesty that, as most humble and loyal servants, they did persist in that most humble and submissive way of petitioning which they had kept from the beginning, hoping to obtain admittance to his majesty's presence, and that his majesty, in the depth of his royal wisdom, would consider at least their pressing grievances, and provide for the repair of their wrongs and losses, and, with the advice of the states of the kingdom of England assembled in parliament, settle a firm and durable peace between the two kingdoms. Charles, on the 5th of September, gave a gentle but evasive answer to the Earl of Lanark, telling him that he was always ready to redress the grievances of his people; that the petition he had presented was conceived in too general terms, but that, if he would return with a more specific statement of their grievances, he would give them his earliest attention. As to "the estates of the kingdom of England in parliament assembled," he said nothing; for, even at this extremity, he was most averse to the summoning of a parliament; but he thought, most unreasonably, to satisfy the Scots by telling Lanark that he had already issued summonses for the meeting of the peers of England, in the city of York, on the 24th day of September, by whose advice he hoped to give such full answers to their petition as should most tend to his own honor, and the peace and welfare of his dominions. In the mean time, his majesty expected and commanded that the Scots would advance no farther into England. On the 8th of September the Covenanters sent Lanark a list of their grievances and conditions, expressing their great joy at learning that his majesty was beginning again to hearken to their humble petitions and desires. They were as follows:—1. That his majesty would be graciously pleased to command that the last acts of parliament may be published in his highness's name as our sovereign lord with the estates of parliament convened by his majesty's au-

[1] Strafford, according to Clarendon, had brought with "a body much broken with his late sickness, a mind and temper confessing the dregs of it, which, being marvelously provoked and inflamed with indignation at the late dishonor, rendered him less gracious,—that is, less inclined to make himself so to the officers upon his first entrance into his charge; it may be, in that mass of disorder, not quickly discerning to whom kindness and respect were justly due. But those who, by this time, no doubt were retained for that purpose, took that opportunity to incense the army against him; and so far prevailed in it, that in a short time it was more inflamed against him than against the enemy; and was willing to have their want of courage imputed to excess of conscience, and that their being not satisfied in the grounds of the quarrel was the only cause that they fought no better. In this indisposition in all parts the earl found it necessary to retire."—Hist. We learn from a letter of Sir Henry Vane (in Hardwicke Papers) that Strafford at this time was troubled with the stone as well as the gout. Charles, it appears, thought to revive him and reward him by giving him the blue ribbon, which was done on the 13th of September.

thority. 2. That the castles of Edinburgh, and other strengths of the kingdom of Scotland, may, according to the first foundation, be furnished and used for our defense and security. 3. That our countrymen in his majesty's dominions of England and Ireland may be freed from censure for subscribing the covenant, and be no more pressed with oaths and subscriptions unwarrantable by their laws, and contrary to their national oath and covenant approved by his majesty. 4. That the common incendiaries, which have been the authors of this combustion, may receive their just censure. 5. That all our ships and goods, with all the damage thereof, may be restored. 6. That the wrongs, losses and charges, which all this time we have sustained, may be repaired. 7. That the declarations made against us as traitors may be recalled. In the end that, by the advice and counsel of the estate of England convened in parliament, his majesty may be pleased to remove the garrisons from the Borders, and any impediments which may stop free trade, and, with their advice, to condescend to all particulars that may establish a stable and well-grounded peace, for the enjoying of our religion and liberties against all force and molestation, and undoing from year to year, or as our adversaries shall take advantage."

These demands, though respectfully expressed, were not altogether moderate; but Charles read them, pretended to entertain them, and, with indignant pride, turned to Strafford to know whether 20,000 men could not be brought over instanter from Ireland, and looked to other quarters, to see whether there were not means for resisting and chastising the Scottish rebels. But there were none: the whole nation was in discontent and ferment, and the provinces occupied by the Scots cried with an alarming voice to be released from the burden of supporting them. At the same time Charles was beset by English subjects, who clamored for a new parliament and the redress of their own crying grievances. Twelve peers—Bedford, Essex, Hertford, Warwick, Bristol, Mulgrave, Say and Sele, Howard, Bolingbroke, Mandevill, Brook, and Pagett—presented a petition to the sovereign, telling him that his majesty was exposed to great hazard and danger by this war—that his revenue was much wasted—that his subjects were burdened with coat and conduct money, billeting of soldiers, and other military charges—and divers rapines and disorders committed by the soldiery raised for this service, so that the whole kingdom was becoming full of fear and discontent. They then proceeded to enumerate the grievances of innovation in matters of religion; the oath and canons lately imposed by the convocation; the great increase of popery, and the employing of popish recusants in places of power and trust, and especially in military commands, whereas, by the laws, they were not permitted to bear arms; the great mischief which might befall the kingdom through the intended bringing in of wild Irish troops; the urging of ship-money; the Star Chamber proceedings; the heavy duties and charges put upon merchandise; and the great grief of the subjects caused by the intermission of parliaments. After which, these twelve lords represented a parliament as the only prevention of the great danger, and besought him to summon one within some short and convenient time, whereby these ills might be removed, the authors and counselors of them brought to legal trial and condign punishment, and the present war composed without bloodshed. At the same time the citizens of London prepared a petition to the same effect. Laud and the privy council, sitting in the capital, got sight of a copy of this petition as it was being circulated for signature, and thereupon they endeavored to stop the proceeding and terrify the subscribers.[1] But the citizens disregarded their letter, put nearly 10,000 names to the petition, and dispatched some of the court of aldermen and common council to present it to the king at York. Also the gentry of Yorkshire, when called upon to pay and support the trained-bands for two months, agreed to do their best therein, but most humbly besought his majesty to think of summoning parliament. Strafford, who received their answer, proposed that, in reporting it to his master, he should leave out the words of advice about a parliament, as he knew it was the king's full purpose to call one; but the Yorkshire gentlemen's hearts and the voice of the whole kingdom being fervent for a parliament, they would not consent that those words should be left out, and therefore they delivered their answer themselves; and Charles thought it prudent to seem to take it in good part.[2] He now, indeed, saw that a parliament was inevitable; and before the meeting of the peers, who had been really summoned to York as a great council, he issued writs for the assembling of parliament on the following 3d of November. Meanwhile, upon the appointed day—the 24th of September—the great council of peers assembled in the dean's house near the Minster at York. There Charles told them that he had called them together, after the custom of his predecessors, to ask their advice and assistance upon sudden invasions and dangers which had not allowed time for the calling of a parliament; that an army of rebels was lodged within the kingdom; that he wanted their advice and assistance, in order to proceed to the chastisement of these insolences. "I must let you know," continued the king, "that I desire nothing more than to be rightly understood of my people; and to that end I have of myself resolved to call a parliament. . . . . . And if my subjects bring those affections which becomes them toward me, it shall not fail on my part to be a happy meeting." He then asked what answer he should give to the petition of the rebels, and in what manner he should treat them, and how he should keep his own army on foot and maintain it until supplies might be had from a parliament. (If Charles could have dealt with the Scots in his own way—if he could have maintained his army, and been sure of its loyalty—if he could have obtained the Irish troops, he would have contented himself with his council of peers, and we should have heard no more of his promises of calling a parliament.) The Earl of Bristol proposed to continue and conclude the treaty with the Scots. He and other lords were confident that they could make peace upon honorable terms. Bristol said, indeed, that if his majesty were in case, it were best to bring the Scots on their knees; but, as matters stood, considering their strength, and that they had taken Newcastle and two whole provinces, it would be better to speak of the business as to men that had gotten these advantages. While they were speaking a packet was brought from the Covenanters to Lord Lanark, with a new petition to his majesty, "supplicating in a more mannerly style than formerly." Beside Lanark, the Scottish earls of Traquair and Morton were both present; and Traquair was commanded to make the same relation to the peers which he had formerly made to the king and privy council, and which was the ground of the advice of the lords of the council, to reduce the rebels by force rather than to yield to their demands. On the following day (the 25th of September), the Lords delighted with his majesty's assurance of calling a parliament, entered into debate with great cheerfulness and alacrity. Northallerton had been agreed upon for a place of meeting between the English and Scotch commissioners, but now it was declared that Ripon would be a better place; and the English peers unanimously resolved to hold the negotiations at Ripon. Sixteen of the English peers were to act for Charles;[1] eight Scottish lords and gentlemen for the covenant.

Charles, having settled about the commissioners, desired the Lords to proceed to the great business of the day, which was the second proposition, or how the army should be supplied with money; and, after a little time spent in debate, it was unanimously resolved that £200,000 should be borrowed from the city of London, upon the joint security of the privy council and the peers. To get rid of the Scottish claims for supplies of money, Charles consented that they might make levies themselves in the counties beyond the Tees. He attempted to transfer the conferences from Ripon to the city of York; but the Scots, who were very cautious—who, in the midst of all their civility, had shown that they had not the slightest confidence in his royal word—objected to putting themselves so completely in his power. Here, also, their jealousy and hatred of Strafford blazed forth. "We cannot conceal," they said, "what danger may be apprehended in our going to York and surrendering ourselves, and others who may be joined with us, into the hands of an army commanded by the Lieutenant of Ireland, against whom, as a chief incendiary (according to our demands, which are the subject of the treaty itself), we intend to insist, as is expressed in our remonstrance and declaration; who hath in the parliament of Ireland proceeded against us as traitors and rebels (the best titles his lordship in his common talk doth honor us with), whose commission is to subdue and destroy us, and who by all means and upon all occasions desireth the breaking up of the treaty of peace; the army being commanded also by divers papists, who conceive our pacification to be their ruin and dissolution; and, when there, by divers godless persons doing the worst office about his majesty, and waiting the occasion of expressing their malice and revenge against us and their own nation."[1] If the loose and inaccurate minutes of the proceedings of the great council of peers at York may be trusted, Strafford did not advise his master at this juncture to break off all negotiation and trust to force of arms; he was too keen-sighted a person not to perceive the great and growing disaffection of the English army; but another peer certainly gave something very like this resolute advice. Edward Lord Herbert, commonly called the Black Lord Herbert, irritated at the Scots' demand of £40,000 per month, advised the king to fortify York, and dissuaded his majesty from yielding to that demand, giving his reasons for both proceedings. Regarding the first, he said, "First, that Newcastle being taken, it is necessary to fortify York, there being no other considerable place betwixt the Scots and London, which might detain their army from advancing forward. Secondly, that reason of state having admitted fortification of our most inland towns against weapons used in former times, it may as well admit fortifications against the weapons used in these times. Thirdly, that towns have been observed always averse to wars and tumults, as subsisting by the peaceable ways of trade and traffic, insomuch that when either great persons for their private interest, or the Commons for their grievances, have taken arms, townsmen have been noted ever to continue in their accustomed loyalty and devotion." Black Herbert knew the value of pacifications and agreements of this kind. "Treaties," said he, "are like thin, airy things, that have no real being in themselves, but in the imaginations of those who project them; they may quickly dissolve and come to nothing; and to give so great a sum of money for the treating only of a peace might be loss of the money, time, and many advantages." He said he had never read that ever prince bought a treaty of his subjects at so dear a rate; that it would reflect upon the honor of his majesty abroad, when foreign nations should learn that he could not find means of treating with his subjects for a peace but by giving money to their army which ought to be employed in paying his own army: that his majesty should try whether the Scots meant really a treaty, and not an invasion, by moving his commissioners to propose the immediate disbanding of both armies, all things else remaining in statu quo until the negotiations at Ripon should be concluded. But this advice, though in all respects it coincided with the feelings of the king, was too dangerous to be adopted. The commissioners labored with little effect from the 1st of October till the 16th, when they agreed upon articles for the quiet maintenance of the Scottish army for two months, for the opening of the sea-ports in the north and the renewal of free trade and commerce by sea and land, as in time of peace, and for the cessation of hostilities. and nothing more was settled, for all the grievances and important clauses of a definitive treaty were left untouched; and, on the 23d of October—the time of the meeting of parliament approaching—it was agreed that the negotiations should be transferred from Ripon to London. The Scots were to receive or levy the sum of £850 per diem for the space of two months, beginning from the 16th of October; they were to content themselves with this maintenance, and neither molest papists, prelates, nor their adherents;[1] and by this arrangement Leslie and the Covenanters were left in undisturbed possession of Durham, Newcastle, and all the towns on the eastern coast beyond the Tees, with the single exception of Berwick. "Upon such terms," says a cotemporary, "was this unnatural war (although the armies could not as yet be disbanded) brought to a cessation; and both nations rested in assured confidence that a peace must needs follow, since the whole matter was now to be debated in the English parliament, which was to begin about a fortnight after, for it was likely that a parliament should put a period to that war which could never have been begun but for want of a parliament. They were also confident that that freedom which the fundamental laws and constitutions of the kingdom of England allow to parliaments could not be denied to this (though to many others it had long been), as being that parliament to which the king was necessitated, and the only way which was now left him to tread, after so many deviations unfortunately tried, and upon which the people had set up their utmost hope, whom it seemed not safe after so long a suffering to provoke any further."[1]

The Scottish commissioners were the lords Dunfermline and Loudon, Sir Patrick Hepburn, Sir William Douglas, Alexander Henderson the celebrated preacher, Johnson the clerk of the general assembly, Wedderburne, and Smith.

Upon the 3d of November, 1640, Charles, in evident depression of spirits, opened in person the ever-memorable Long Parliament.[1] He told the Houses that the honor and safety of the kingdom being at stake, he was resolved to put himself freely and clearly on the love and affection of his English subjects—that he was exhausted by charges made merely for the security of England, and therefore must desire them to consider the best way of supplying him with money, chastising the rebels, &c., and then he would satisfy all their just grievances. And at the end of his speech, he said, with great emphasis—"One thing more I desire of you, as one of the greatest means to make this a happy parliament, that you on your parts, as I on mine, lay aside all suspicion one of another: as I promised my lords at York, it shall not be my fault if this be not a happy and good parliament."[2] But this invitation to a mutual confidence came many years too late. The court had signally failed in its endeavors to influence the elections; the people every where had been eager to return patriotic members, men tried in the furnaces of former parliaments, or known for their opposition in private life to the encroachments of the prerogative, and the innovations in the church. Of Charles's chief servants only two, Vane and Windebank, had obtained seats; and the first of these was suspected of treachery, while Windebank was so odious to the people as a creature of Laud, that his presence in the House was rather hurtful than beneficial. For a long time it had been usual with the Commons to bow to the king's inclinations in the choice of a speaker; even in the preceding parliament they had chosen a courtier: but now, instead of Gardiner, the recorder of London, the man of the king's choice, Lenthall, a practicing barrister, was hastily chosen; and the choice was approved by Charles, in ignorance of the man. Hampden, Pym, St. John, and Denzil Hollis again took their seats, and their party was wonderfully strengthened by the election of Mr. Henry Vane, the son of Sir Henry Vane, and one of the most remarkable men that sat in that parliament—so wild an enthusiast in religion as to excite a suspicion of his sanity or sincerity—so acute a politician, so accomplished a statesman, as to challenge the admiration of all parties. The first thing these men did was to move for the appointment of committees of grievance, and the receiving of petitions praying for their removal. Mr. Edward Hyde, still on the patriotic side, brought up a crying grievance in the north, which was none other than Strafford's Court of the President of the North, or, as it was more usually called, the Court of York, which, he said, by the spirit and ambition of the minister trusted there, or by the natural inclination of courts to enlarge their own power and jurisdiction, had broken down the banks of the channel in which it was meant to run, had almost overwhelmed that country under a sea of arbitrary power and involved the people in a labyrinth of distemper, oppression, and poverty. The eccentric George Lord Digby, son of the Earl of Bristol, brought up the grievances of the west—Sir John Colpepper the grievances in the south—Waller, the poet, a fresh denunciation of ship-money, subservient judges, and the intermission of parliaments. Other petitions were presented in a more startling manner. "The first week," says Whitelock, "was spent in naming general committees and establishing them, and receiving a great many petitions, both from particular persons and from multitudes, and brought by troops of horsemen from several counties, craving redress of grievances and exorbitances, both in church and state." The Lord Falkland, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Sir Edward Deering, Mr. Harbottle Grimston, and other leading members, fell vigorously upon the system of episcopacy, and the House presently denounced all the acts and canons which Laud had hurried through the late convocation. They attacked every part of church government—every proceeding of the primate in matters of religion and conscience. "He is a great stranger in Israel," exclaimed Lord Falkland, "who knoweth not that this kingdom hath long labored under many and great oppressions both in religion and liberty; and his acquaintance here is not great, or his ingenuity less, who doth not both know and acknowledge that a great, if not a principal, cause of this have been some bishops and their adherents. Under pretense of uniformity, they have brought in superstition and scandal; under the titles of reverence and decency, they have defiled our church by adorning our churches. . . . . They have tithed mint and anise, and have left undone the work of the gospel. . . . They have made the conforming to ceremonies more important than the conforming to Christianity."[1] Mr. Bagshaw

[1] Charles would not open parliament with the usual state. He, as it were, skulked to the House. "The king," says Laud in his Diary, "did not ride, but went by water to King's Stairs, and through Westminster Hall to the church, and so to the House." Clarendon says with more solemnity—"This parliament had a sad and melancholic aspect upon the first entrance, which presaged some unusual and unnatural events. The king himself did not ride with his accustomed equipage, nor in his usual majesty, to Westminster, but went privately in his barge to the Parliament Stairs, and after to the church, as if it had been to a return of a prorogued parliament."—Hist.

[2] Charles was followed by the Lord Keeper Finch, who made an elaborate speech to show that, with the exception of the impious troubles in the north, the country was in a blessed state—that things never had been so well, and never could be better. It was deemed necessary to bring in the name of the queen, who was excessively unpopular, and to declare that she was the paragon of queens. Charles, in his previous declaration of the motives which induced him to summon this parliament, had said nothing of the kind, but it was now thought fit to report that the wise and generous counsels of his wife had led him to this healing measure. "Behold the king," said Finch, "in another part of himself, in his dearest consort, our gracious queen, the mirror of virtue, from whom, since her happy arrival, now after three lusters of years, never any subject received other than gracious and benign influence; and I dare avow, as she is nearest and dearest to our sovereign, so there is none whose affections and endeavors (his majesty only excepted) have, or do, or can coöperate more to the happy success of this parliament, and the never-to-be-equalled joy and comfort of a right understanding between the king and his people! Behold him in his best image, our excellent young prince, and the rest of the royal and lively progeny, in whom we can not but promise to ourselves to have our happiness perpetuated. From the throne, turn your eyes to the two supporters of it; on the one side, the stem of honor, the nobility and clergy; on the other side, the gentry and commons! Where was there, or is there, in any part of the world, a nobility so numerous, so magnanimous, and yet with such a temper that they neither eclipse the throne nor overtop the people, but keep in a distance fit for the greatness of the throne? Where was there a commonwealth so free and the balance so equally held as here? And certainly so long as the beam is duly held it can not be otherwise."

[1] Falkland also said that, while masses had been celebrated in security, a conventicle had been made a great crime. To conceive said that there were two sorts of episcopacy—the first in statu puro, as it was in the primitive times; the second in statu corrupto, as it is at this day; that it was maintained by the Bishop of Exeter in a book, that episcopacy, both in the office and in the jurisdiction, is jure divino—of divine right—which position was directly contrary to the laws of England, which plainly showed that the bishops had their episcopal jurisdiction from the kings of England, and not jure divino. "It is holden at this day," said he, "that episcopacy is inseparable from the crown of England; and, therefore, it is commonly now said, no bishop, no king—no miter, no scepter; which I utterly deny—for it is plain and apparent, that the kings of England were long before bishops, and have a subsistence without them, and have done, and may still depose them." After quoting a number of statutes, the same orator said, "I am for a thorough reformation of all abuses and grievances of episcopacy; which reformation may, perhaps, serve the turn, without alteration of the government of England into a form of presbytery, as it is in other kingdoms—of Scotland, France, Geneva, and the Low Countries; which, for mine own part, had I lived in those kingdoms, I should have been of the opinion of the Protestant party in point of presbytery." Sir Benjamin Rudyard, however, thought it expedient that they should bethink themselves whether a popular democratical government of the church, though fit for other places, would be either suitable or acceptable to a regal, monarchical government like that of England. Sir Edward Deering compared the modern episcopacy to papistry, and attacked that tyrannical court which was so dear and essential to Laud. "With the papists," said he, "there is a severe inquisition, and with us there is a bitter high commission; both these, contra fas et jus, are judges in their own case. . . . . With the papists there is a mysterious artifice; their index expurgatorius. To this I parallel our late imprimaturs, or licenses for the press, which are so handled that truth is suppressed, and popish pamphlets fly abroad cum privilegio. . . . . Nay, they are already grown so bold in this new trade, that the most learned labors of our ancient and best divines must be new corrected and defaced by the supercilious pen of my lord bishop's young chaplain." He went on to show how nearly Laud's notions of supremacy and infallibility approached to those of the pope. "And herein," added he, "I shall be free and clear—if one of these must be, I had rather serve one as far off as the Tiber, than to have him come to me so near as the Thames: a pope at Rome will do me less hurt than a patriarch at Lambeth." It may readily be conceived how these things affected Laud, who shortly before had been visited by omens and misgivings, and who clearly saw ruin approaching.[1] It was indeed, evident that the Commons believed, with Pym, that "they must not only make the house clean, but pull down the cobwebs."[1] They debated with the same fearlessness and the same high eloquence on the other grievances of the country; but for many days they constantly returned to the subject of religion and to the evil counselors about the king. "We well know," said Rudyard, "what disturbance hath been brought upon the church for vain, petty trifles; how the whole church, the whole kingdom, hath been troubled, where to place a metaphor, an altar. We have seen ministers, their wives, children, and families undone against law, against conscience, against all bowels of compassion, about not dancing upon Sundays. What do these sort of priests think will become of themselves, when the master of the house shall come and find them thus beating their fellow-servants? . . . . They would be at something very like the mass; they want a muzzled religion. They would evaporate and dispirit the power and vigor of religion, by drawing it out into solemn and specious formalities, into obsolete antiquated ceremonies, new furbished up. . . . . They have so brought it to pass, that, under the name of Puritans, all our religion is branded, and under a few hard words against Jesuits, all popery is countenanced. Whoever squares his actions by any rule, either divine or human, he is a Puritan: whosoever would be governed by the king's laws, he is a Puritan: he that will not do whatsoever other men would have him do, he is a Puritan. Their great work, their master-piece, now is, to make all those of the religion to be the suspected party of the kingdom." Then passing to the obnoxious ministers, the same orator said, "His majesty hath freely put himself into the hands of this parliament; and I presume there is not a man in this House but feels himself advanced by this high trust; but if the king prosper no better in our hands than he hath done in theirs who have hitherto had the handling of his affairs, we shall for ever make ourselves unworthy of so gracious a confidence. . . . . His majesty is wiser than they that have advised him, and therefore he can not but see and feel their subverting, destructive counsels, which speak louder than I can speak of them; for they ring a doleful, deadly knell over the whole kingdom. His majesty best knows who they are. For us, let the matters bolt out the men, their actions discover them. They are men that talk largely of the king's service, and yet have done none but their own, and that is too evident. They speak highly of the king's power; but they have made it a miserable power, that produces nothing but weakness, both to the king and kingdom. They have exhausted the king's revenues to the bottom, nay, through the bottom, and beyond. . . . . It hath heretofore been boasted, that the king should never call a parliament till he had need of his people:

that the toleration he claimed for the latter should be extended to the former was above even his elegant and high mind.

[1] "October 27, Tuesday, Simon and Jude's Eve, I went into my upper study to see some manuscripts, which I was sending to Oxford; in that study hung my picture, taken by the life, and coming in, I found it fallen down upon the face, and lying on the floor, the string being broken by which it hanged against the wall. I am almost every day threatened with my ruin in parliament; God grant this be no omen."—Diary. A few days before, the archbishop notes in the same private record—"The high commission sitting at St. Paul's, because of the troubles of the times, very near two thousand Brownists made a tumult at the end of the court, tore down all the benches in the consistory, and cried out, they would have no bishop, nor no high commission."

these were words divisive and of malignity. The king must always, according to his occasions, have use of the people's power, hearts, hands, purses; the people will always have need of the king's clemency, justice, protection; and the reciprocation is the strongest, the sweetest union. It hath been said, too, of late, that a parliament will take away more from the king than they will give him. It may be well said, that those things which will fall away of themselves will enable the subjects to give him more than can be taken any way else. Projects and monopolies are but leaking conduit-pipes; the exchequer itself, at the fullest, is but a cistern, and now a broken one; frequent parliaments only are the fountains; and I do not doubt but in this parliament, as we shall be free in our advices, so shall we be the more free of our purses, that his majesty may experimentally find the real difference of better counsels, the true, solid grounds of raising and establishing his greatness, never to be brought again (by God's blessing) to such dangerous, such desperate perplexities."[1]

From speaking, the Commons soon proceeded to action—not always bearing in mind the strict limits of their power and jurisdiction. On the 7th of November, the fourth day of their sitting, they passed a resolution that those victims of Star Chamber tyranny and cruelty, Mr. Burton, Dr. Bastwick, and Mr. Prynne, should be sent for forthwith by warrant of the House, and made to certify by whose warrant and authority they have been mutilated, branded, and imprisoned. And, being liberated from their distant dungeons by this warrant of the House, the three Puritans, upon the 28th day of November, came to London, being met upon the way and brought into the city by five thousand persons, women as well as men, all mounted on horseback, and wearing in their hats and caps rosemary and bays, in token of joy and triumph. The discourses of men upon this triumphant entrance varied: "some of the court, as well as clergy and other gentlemen besides, did not conceal their dislike of it, affirming that it was a bold and tumultuous affront to courts of justice and the king's authority: others, who pitied the former sufferings of those men, and they that wished reformation in matters of justice, were pleased with it; hoping that it would work good effects in the king's mind, and make him sensible how his people stood disaffected to the rigor of such proceedings, and esteemed it as a good presage of the ruin of those two courts, the High Commission and the Star Chamber."[2] The latter class were indisputably the more numerous, and now the more powerful. Happy had it been if the released captives and sufferers for conscience sake, and those who triumphed with them in their release, had learned to tolerate others, or had ascertained the great fact, that persecution and cruelty defeat their own objects! Within a month after the return of the three Puritans, their business was referred to a committee, and, upon the report of that committee, it was voted by the House that their several judgments were illegal, unjust, and against the liberty of the subject; and, about a month after this, it was further voted that they should receive damages for their great sufferings, and that satisfaction should be made them in money, to be paid by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the other high commissioners, and those lords who had voted against them in the Star Chamber, and that they should be restored to their callings and professions of divinity, law, and physic. The damages were fixed for Burton at £6000, for Prynne and Bastwick at £5000 each. As these men were comforted after their sufferings, so other divines, followers of Laud's orthodoxy, after a brief triumph, were brought to their torment. The Committee of Religion was indefatigable, and certainly neither tolerant nor merciful. "Their first care," says May, "was to vindicate distressed ministers, who had been imprisoned or deprived by the bishops, and all others who in the cause of religion had been persecuted by them: many of those ministers within few weeks after the beginning of the parliament were released from durance, and discharged to their charges, with damages from their oppressors; many doctors and other divines that had been most busy in promoting the late church innovations about altars and other ceremonies, and therefore most gracious and flourishing in the state, were then questioned and committed; insomuch as the change, and the suddenness of it, seemed wonderful to men, and may worthily serve as a document to all posterity—quam fragili loco starent superbi (in how insecure a position stood they that were so proud)."[1] The committee proceeded to inquire concerning scandalous ministers, which are described as being of two kinds:—1. Loose livers, and men of debauched behavior, who had gotten into good preferment, and been countenanced in insulting the Puritans. 2. Men who had offended in the way of papistical ceremonies and superstition. Among all the men of his rank, Laud's friend and pet author, Dr. Cousens, master of St. Peter's Cambridge, was most noted for what were termed superstitions and curious observances. "He was not noted," says May, "for any great depth of learning, nor yet scandalous for ill living, but only forward to show himself in formalities and outward ceremonies concerning religion, many of which were such as a Protestant state might not well suffer." Cousens was imprisoned and bailed, and though deprived of some of his preferments, yet escaped without any great punishment, being one of a crowd that had reason to rejoice that the parliament had so much business on hand. On the 18th of December, Cousens's friend and patron, William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, &c., &c., was singled out for the crushing thunderbolts of the House. It was resolved that a message should be sent to the Lords to accuse him, in the name of the House and of all the Commons of England, of high treason, and to desire that he might be forthwith sequestered from parliament, and committed. Denzil Hollis carried up this message. Evidently to his surprise, the Lord Keeper Finch told him, that the Lords would sequester the archbishop from their House, and commit him to the custody of their gentleman-usher.[1] Laud desired leave to speak, and dropped some unguarded expressions, which he afterward begged leave to retract, but was refused by their lordships. He then requested permission to go to his house to fetch some papers, that might enable him to make his defense. This permission was granted, provided he did nothing but in sight of the gentleman-usher, in whose custody he was ordered to remain, and in whose custody he did remain for ten weeks, when he was committed to the Tower. In his speech on the motion of impeachment, Mr. Grimston desired the House to look upon Laud's colleagues and dependents. "Who is it but he only," exclaimed the orator, "that hath brought the Earl of Strafford to all his great places and employments? . . . . Who is it but he that brought in Secretary Windebank into that place of trust—Windebank, the very broker and pander to the whore of Babylon? Who is it but he only, that hath advanced all our popish bishops? I shall name but some of them: Bishop Mainwaring, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Bishop of Oxford, and Bishop Wren, the least of all these birds, but one of the most unclean."[2] On the morrow of Laud's arrest, (the 19th of December), this Wren was smitten on the hip, it being ordered that a message should be sent to the Lords, that there were certain informations of a high nature against Dr. Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, concerning the setting up of idolatry and superstition; and that the Commons, having information that he was endeavoring an escape, desired their lordships that care might be taken that he should give good security to abide the judgment of parliament. Mr. Hampden went up with this message. The Lord Keeper Finch, who must have seen that his own hour was at hand, assured the House of Commons, through Mr. Hampden, that the Bishop of Ely should give bail for ten thousand pounds.

[1] Rudyard said, in one part of this remarkable speech, "I have often thought and said, that it must be some great extremity that would recover and rectify this state; and when that extremity did come, it would be a great hazard whether it would prove a remedy or ruin. We are now, Master Speaker, upon that vertical turning point, and therefore it is no time to palliate, to foment our own undoing." There were many that thought with Rudyard, and it would be idle to doubt the fact (as it would be difficult to condemn its authors) that some of these had helped to make the present crisis, believing, with St. John, that things must be worse before they could be better.

[2] May. This author, who must have known very well how it wrought upon Charles, says, "How it wrought at that present upon the king is not known. But actions of that nature, where the people of their own accords, in a seeming tumultuous manner, do express their liking or disliking of matters in government, can not always produce the same success, but work according to the disposition of the prince or governor either to a sense causing reformation, or to an hatred of them as upbraiders of his actions;—aut corrigunt aut irritant."

[1] Hist. Parl.—If the Commons had wanted a quickening, they certainly had it from without. Their table was absolutely loaded with petitions, some of which were presented by multitudes, vociferating "No bishops, no high commission, no Star Chamber." On the 11th of December, Alderman Pennington, with some hundreds following him, presented a petition from the citizens of London, with fifteen thousand subscriptions, against the discipline and ceremonies of the Church.—Whitelock.

But before these churchmen were stricken in their pride of place, Strafford had been denounced, formally accused, and safely lodged in the Tower. When the king left York, his lieutenant remained behind him, to take charge of what remained of the army in the north. It is proved by many concurrent witnesses that Strafford was averse to coming to London and meeting the parliament. His friends told him, that to appear in his place as a peer would be to hazard his life. He humbly represented to his master, that it would be better to leave him where he was, as he could not hope to be able to do his majesty any service at Westminster, where he felt he should rather be a hindrance to his affairs, as he foresaw that the great envy and ill-will of the parliament and of the Scots would be bent against him. He told Charles, that if he kept out of sight, he would not be so much in their mind; and if they should fall upon him, he, being at a distance, might the better avoid any danger, having liberty of going over to Ireland, or to some other place where he might be most serviceable to his majesty. The king, notwithstanding these weighty reasons, continued very earnest for Strafford's coming up to the parliament. Charles had a wonderful notion of Strafford's powers of imposing on parliaments, and his own less daring spirit stood in need of his servant's resoluteness; and in the end he laid his commands upon him, pledging himself for his safety, and assuring him that, as he was king of England, he was able to secure him from any danger, and that the parliament should not touch one hair of his head. Strafford made haste to thank his majesty for these assurances, but, still unconvinced, he once more represented the danger of his coming, saying, that if there should fall out a difference between his majesty and his parliament concerning him, it would be a very great disturbance to his majesty's affairs; and that he had rather suffer himself, than that the king's affairs should suffer on his account. But Charles would not be moved by these representations, or by the prospect of the danger which must attend his favorite minister; he repeated his injunctions, saying that he could not want Strafford's valuable advice in the great transactions of this parliament; and in obedience to these reiterated commands, the earl came up to London.[1] Strafford assumed a bold bearing, and a confidence which his inmost heart denied. "A greater and more universal hatred," says a noble cotemporary, "was never contracted by any person, than he has drawn upon himself. He is not at all dejected, but believes confidently to clear himself in the opinion of all equal and indifferent-minded hearers, when he shall come to make his defense. The king is in such a strait, that I do not know how

[1] At the same time, Laud was denounced as "the great incendiary in the national differences" by the Scotch commissioners, who had come up to London, and were residing in the city—"much frequented by the disaffected."

[2] Mainwaring, who had made such a noise by his writings in favor of absolutism and the divine right of kings, was now bishop of St. David's; the bishop of Bath and Wells was William Pierce; the bishop of Oxford was Dr. John Bancroft; Matthew Wren, now of Ely, had been bishop of Norwich, and had distinguished himself in that diocese by his violent persecution of Puritans and his expulsion of the industrious clothiers—foreigners, or descendants of foreigners, who would not renounce the religion they had brought with them into England (See ante, p. 158). Bishop Wren was the uncle of the celebrated Sir Christopher Wren.

he will possibly avoid, without endangering the loss of the whole kingdom, the giving way to the remove of divers persons, as well as other things that will be demanded by this parliament."[1] Strafford arrived in town on Monday night; on Tuesday he rested from the fatigues of the journey; on the Wednesday he went to parliament, "but ere night he was caged."[2]

"It was about three of the clock in the afternoon," says Rushworth, "when the Earl of Strafford (being infirm, and not well disposed in his health, and so not having stirred out of his house that morning), hearing that both Houses still sat, thought fit to go thither. It was believed by some (upon what ground was never clear enough), that he made that haste then to accuse the Lord Saye, and some others, of having induced the Scots to invade the kingdom; but he was scarce entered into the House of Peers, when the message from the House of Commons was called in, and when Mr. Pym, at the bar, and in the name of all the Commons of England, impeached Thomas, earl of Strafford (with the addition of all his other titles) of high treason, and several other heinous crimes and misdemeanors, of which, he said, the Commons would in due time make proof in form; and, in the mean time, desired, in their name, that he might be sequestered from all counsels, and be put into safe custody." Pym, who carried up the impeachment, had, according to Clarendon, announced his determined hatred to Strafford many years before. "You are going to leave us," said Pym, when Wentworth first went over to the king's party, "but we will never leave you, while your head is upon your shoulders." On the present occasion Strafford had gone in haste to the House. "He calls rudely at the door; James Maxwell, keeper of the black rod, opens: his lordship, with a proud, glooming countenance, makes toward his place at the board head; but at once many bid him void the House; so he is forced in confusion to go to door till he was called. After consultation, being called in, he stands, but is commanded to kneel, and on his knees to hear the sentence. Being on his knees, he is delivered to the keeper of the black rod, to be prisoner till he was cleared of these crimes the House of Commons had charged him with. He offered to speak, but was commanded to be gone without a word. In the outer room, James Maxwell required him, as prisoner, to deliver his sword. When he had got it, he cries, with a loud voice, for his man to carry my lord lieutenant's sword. This done, he makes through a number of people toward his coach, all gazing, no man capping to him, before whom, that morning, the greatest of England would have stood uncovered, all crying, 'What is the matter?' He said, 'A small matter, I warrant you.' They replied, 'Yes, indeed, high treason is a small matter.' Coming to the place where he expected his coach, it was not there; so he behooved to return that same way, through a world of gazing people. When at last he had found his coach, and was entering, James Maxwell told him, 'Your lordship is my prisoner, and must go in my coach;' so he behooved to do."[1] A few days after his arrest, Strafford requested to be admitted to bail, but this was refused him, and he was safely lodged in the Tower.

Having thus secured the greatest incendiary, and appointed a committee to collect and arrange the charges against him, the Commons fell upon some inferior instruments—inferior in all respects to Strafford, but still far from insignificant. Sir Francis Windebank, one of the secretaries of state, the friend and creature of the primate of the English Protestant church, and yet a concealed Catholic, was charged with illegally releasing recusants and Romish priests from prison. He avoided arrest and trial by flight: protected by the queen, he escaped to Paris, where he was received with honor, and where, eventually, he made a public profession of Catholicism. The Lord Keeper Finch was proceeded against as an avowed factor and procurer of the odious judgment against Mr. Hampden, and for his numerous abuses of power in the matter of ship-money. Finch was a supple rogue, and a wonderful rhetorician: he petitioned to be heard for himself at the bar of the House of Commons, "whereby, against all order, he was to take notice of what was handled in the House concerning himself."[2] His prayer having been granted, Finch, bearing the seals in his own hand, entered the Lower House; and when the speaker told him that his lordship might sit, he made a low obeisance, and laying down the seals and his hat in the chair, himself leaning on the back of the chair, he made a very elegant and ingenious speech in his own vindication, "et captare benevolenciam."[3] But though his deportment was very humble and submissive, and his speech full of persuasive rhetoric, it could not prevail or prevent the Commons from voting him a traitor, though many in the House were moved to a kind of compassion. On the next day his impeachment was carried up to the Lords, who ordered his commitment; but he had taken timely warning—Finch was fled into Holland. Clarendon hints that Finch had come to a compromise with the popular party, "it being visible he was in their favor;" and he expresses his surprise at their suffering Windebank to escape their justice, "against whom," he says, "they had more pregnant testimony of offenses within the verge of the law, than against any person they had accused since this parliament, and of some that, it may be, might have proved capital, and so their appetite of blood might have been satisfied."[4] But the Commons of Eng-

[4] Hist. It is curious to observe what sort of offenses in Windebank Clarendon sets down as so heinous; the passage is a comment on the barbarous intolerance of the times. "For," said the royalist historian, "beside his frequent letters of intercession in his own name, and signification of his majesty's pleasure, on the behalf of papists and priests, to the judges, and to other ministers of justice, and protections granted by himself to priests, that nobody should molest them, he harland were not remarkable for their appetite for blood; they wanted the heads of Strafford and Laud, and no more, and probably connived at, or were glad to see, the flight of their satellites. What they had already done was well calculated to strike terror into the hearts of all worshipers of the despotic principle. "Within less than six weeks," says Clarendon, "for no more was yet elapsed, these terrible reformers had caused the two greatest counselors of the kingdom, whom they most feared, and so hated, to be removed from the king, and imprisoned under an accusation of high treason; and frighted away the lord keeper of the great seal of England, and one of the principal secretaries of state, into foreign kingdoms, for fear of the like; besides preparing all the lords of the council, and very many of the principal gentlemen throughout England, who had been high sheriffs and deputy lieutenants, to expect such measure of punishment from their general votes and resolutions, as their future demeanor should draw upon them for their past offenses."[1] It was, indeed, wonderful to see how all the advocates and instruments of despotism, ship-money, and all kinds of illegal taxation, fell at the first blow, and crouched at the feet of their victors. The whole fabric of absolutism was shattered like a house of glass, or melted like a fabric of ice and snow on the return of the summer sun. Charles was helpless, hopeless, at once; there seemed to be scarcely a man in the land to raise sword or voice in his favor; nor did he gain any thing like a formidable party till these first terrors had subsided, and the parliament had stepped beyond that line of reform which the general opinion held to be necessary.

It was not possible for the Commons to overlook the slavish judges who had upheld ship-money, and condemned Mr. Hampden. They sent up Waller with a message to the Lords, and their lordships forthwith ordered that Bramston, Davenport, Berkeley, Crawley, Trevor, and Weston should find heavy bail to abide the judgment of parliament. Berkeley, whose speeches will be remembered, was impeached of high treason, and, to the great disturbance of his brethren, both judges and lawyers, he was arrested while sitting, with his ermine on, on the bench, and brought away like a common felon. But the Commons were certainly not anxious for his blood; and after some time he was permitted to withdraw himself, having, it is said, being forced to give a free gift of £10,000 for the public service.

A.D. 1641. On the 19th of January, Mr. Prideaux brought in a bill for preventing the dangers and inconveniences happening by the long intermission of parliaments. He proposed that the parliament should be held yearly. In committee the House rejected that proposition, and followed the example which had been set them by the Scots a few months before, in voting for regular triennial parliaments. At the same time, to guard against the statute becoming a dead letter, they directed that the issuing of writs at the fixed time should be imperative on the lord keeper or chancellor; that if he failed, then the House of Lords should issue the writs; if the Lords failed, then the sheriffs were to do it; and if the sheriffs neglected or refused, then the people were to proceed to elect their representatives without any writs at all. They moreover provided, that no future parliament should be dissolved or adjourned by the king, without its own consent, within less than fifty days from the opening of its session. Charles here attempted to make a stand. On the 23d of January he summoned both Lords and Commons to Whitehall; there he reproved the latter for their long delays; and spoke of their connivance, which suffered distraction to arise by the indiscreet petitions of men who, "more maliciously than ignorantly, would put no difference between reformation and alteration of government." He assured them again, that he would concur in abolishing all novelties both in church and state; would join in reforming the courts of justice; and would even surrender such portions of his revenue as should be found illegal or heavy on his subjects. But after this, he said that he would show them what they (the Commons) should eschew. "I can not but take notice," said Charles, "of these petitions (I can't tell how to call them) given in the name of several counties, against the present established government of the church, and of the great threats that are given, that bishops shall be no better than ciphers, if not clean done away. Now I must tell you, that I make great difference betwixt reformation and alteration of government: though I am for the first, I can not give way to the latter. I will not say that bishops may not have overstretched their power, or encroached upon the temporal; which if you find, correct and reform the abuse, according to the wisdom of former times; and so far I am with you. Nay, further; if, upon serious debate, you shall show me that bishops have some temporal authority, inconvenient to the state, and not so necessary to the church for the support of episcopacy, I shall not be unwilling to persuade them to lay it down; yet by this you must understand that I can not consent to the taking off their voice in parliament, which they have anciently enjoyed under so many of my predecessors, even before the Conquest, and ever since, and which I conceive I am bound to maintain as one of the fundamental institutions of this kingdom. There is but one other rock, and that not in substance but in form, yet that form is so essential, that, except it be reformed, it will mar the substance. There is a bill given in for frequent parliament:—the thing I like, that is to say, to have frequent parliaments: but to give power to sheriffs and constables, and I know not whom, to do my office, that I can not bored some priests in his own house, knowing them to be such: which, by the statute made in the twenty-ninth year of Queen Elizabeth, is made felony; and there were some warrants under his own hand, for the release of priests out of Newgate, who were actually attainted of treason, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; which, by the strict letter of the statute, the lawyers said, would have been very penal to him."

yield unto. But, to show you that I am desirous to please you in forms which destroy not the substance, I am content you shall have an act for this purpose, but so reformed, that it neither intrench upon my honor nor that inseparable right of the crown concerning parliaments: to which purpose I have commanded my learned council to wait on you, my lords, with such propositions as I hope will give contentment; for I ingenuously confess that frequent parliaments are the best means to preserve that right understanding between me and my subjects which I so earnestly desire."[1] The king, however, was now unable either to uphold bishops or resist the Commons in any other particular; and he shortly after reluctantly gave his consent to the bill for triennial parliaments, which was received by the country with demonstrations of joy and triumph. At this time both Houses had complained concerning seminary-priests, &c. As soon as the Commons had withdrawn from Whitehall, Charles told the Lords, who remained behind, that he had heard of their agitating the business of Goodman, the priest, and that in a day or two he would send them satisfactory reasons for what he had done in that matter. What he had done in this case was only a laudable exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy, in reprieving the victim of a savage statute,—that is, he had reprieved John Goodman, condemned to death as a seminary-priest. The Commons were not satisfied with the assurance he had given the Lords; and on the 29th of January a remonstrance of both Houses was presented to his Majesty, reciting the penal statutes; stating that of late years, about the city of London, eighty priests and Jesuits had been discharged out of prison; that they were credibly informed that, at the present moment, the pope had a nuncio, or agent, resident in London; that the papists went as publicly to Denmark House and St. James's to mass as good Protestants went to their parish churches; that the non-execution of the penal statutes was a principal cause of the increase of popery; that therefore, they humbly desired the execution of the laws against priests and Jesuits, and that Goodman, the priest, should be left to the justice of the law. On the 3d of February Charles replied to this remonstrance. He assured the Lords and Commons that it was against his mind that popery or superstition should increase; that he would drive the Jesuits and priests out of the kingdom within a month, by a proclamation; that, as for the nuncio, Rosetti, the queen had always assured him that he had no commission, but only resided near her to entertain a correspondence between her and the pope in things requisite for the exercise of her religion, which was warranted to her by her marriage-articles, which gave her liberty of conscience; yet, as his presence gave offense, her majesty would, within a convenient time, remove him. Charles moreover declared that he would take especial care to prevent his subjects from resorting to mass; and he ended by giving up poor Goodman. "Lastly," said he, "concerning John Goodman, the priest, I will let you know the reason why I reprieved him. I am informed, neither Queen Elizabeth nor my father did ever avow that any priest in their times was executed merely for religion; which seems to me to be his particular case: yet, seeing I am pressed by both Houses to give way to his execution, and because I will avoid the inconvenience of giving so great discontent to my people as I conceive this mercy may produce, therefore I do remit this particular case to both the Houses; but I desire them to take into their consideration, the inconvenience, as I conceive, may, upon this occasion, fall upon my subjects and other Protestants abroad, especially since it may seem to other states to be a severity; which suspicion having thus represented to you, I think myself freed from all the ill consequence that may ensue upon the execution of this person."[1] On the next day the queen thought proper to send a letter to the Commons by Sir Henry Vane. Her majesty assured them that she had ever been ready to do her best for the removing of all misunderstanding between the king and people; that at the request of the lords who petitioned for the calling of this parliament, she had written effectually to the king, and sent a gentleman to York expressly to persuade him to the holding of a parliament; that having taken knowledge that the having one sent to her from the pope was distasteful to this kingdom, she was desirous to give satisfaction to the parliament. She repeated the promises made by Charles about Rosetti and mass-hearing; and then she referred to the collections of money for the Scottish war, which she had set on foot among the Catholics, excusing her conduct therein on the ground of her ignorance of the laws, and promising to be more cautious hereafter.[2] The Commons returned their humble thanks to her majesty for her gracious letter; and doubtless despised the king for putting forward his wife in this public manner: at all events it was a sign and symptom of the weakness of the court party. A day or two after Charles sent the Commons "a petition of John Goodman, condemned," wherein the priest prayed his majesty rather to remit him to the mercies of the discontented than let him live to be the cause of so great a discontent; that, if the storm was raised for him, he would be cast into the sea, that others might avoid the tempest; and that he should esteem his blood well shed, to cement the breach between his majesty and his subjects. The Commons, however, did not shed his blood; and it should appear that Goodman knew they would not shed it.

All this time the Scottish commissioners were residing in the heart of the city, near London-stone, in a house so near to the church of St. Antholin's, a place made famous by some Puritan or seditious preacher, that there was a way out of it into a gallery of the church. "This benefit was well foreseen on all sides in the accommodation, and this church assigned to them for their own devotions, where one of their own chaplains still preached, among whom Alexander Henderson was the chief, who was likewise joined with them in the treaty in all matters which had reference to religion; and to hear those sermons there was so great a conflux and resort by the citizens out of humor and faction, by others of all qualities out of curiosity, by some that they might the better justify the contempt they had of them, that from the first appearance of day in the morning of every Sunday to the shutting in of the light, the church was never empty; they (especially the women) who had the happiness to get into the church in the morning (they who could not hung upon or about the windows without, to be auditors or spectators) keeping their places till the afternoon exercise was finished."[1] Clarendon adds, that, whether morning or afternoon, the service was the most insipid and flat that could be delivered; but the historian is prejudiced, and certainly has not hit upon the characteristic defects of these Presbyterian devotions. When Alexander Henderson held forth the preaching was not likely to be flat and insipid; and the general tendency of puritanic preachers was to the opposite extreme. Nor does the historian allow for one of the strongest reasons which induced the Londoners so to crowd that place of worship. The conventicles had been put down by the iron hand of Laud; and now, for the first time these many years, thousands of citizens could hear, in St. Antholin's church, the Word propounded in their own way, without any of those rites and ceremonies, altars, and lawn-sleeves, that had so irritated all the more devout classes. Clarendon, however, could hardly overrate the influence exercised in the city by these Scottish preachers, and by the lord commissioners. Some of the latter were very acceptable upon other grounds besides those of religion; they were men of the world, and men of business, pleasant in conversation, and of great address: moreover, the English reformers were bound to them by the double conviction that they could not have achieved what they had done had it not been for the bold march of the Covenanters, and that they could not be sure of their victory if the Scottish army were withdrawn from the northern provinces. Baillie, one of the commissioners, who knew as well as any man the state of affairs and of public opinion, said, in the course of the negotiations, which were protracted for six months—"This we will make long or short, according as the necessities of our good friends in England require, for they are still in that fray, that if we and our army were gone they were yet undone." It was therefore not surprising that the new committee of the members of both Houses, appointed to renew the treaty with the Scots which had begun at Ripon, was composed of men very acceptable to them. It is said that these managers of the English parliament were exceedingly vigilant in preventing the Scottish commissioners from entering into any conversation or familiarity with such as were not fast to the opposition party; but it may be doubted whether the Scots had any very decided inclination for the society of those who held them to be traitors and rebels. The patriots, on the contrary, promised them high rewards, and heaped all possible honors upon them; they were caressed in both Houses of parliament; and an order was entered, that upon all occasions they should be styled "our brethren of Scotland." Charles, on the other hand, saw clearly that there was no hope of restoring the old order of things until the Scottish army should be beyond the Tweed, and disbanded; and he complimented and cajoled the commissioners, and in his eagerness yielded many points in the treaty, in the design of being the sooner rid of them and their army. He consented, for example, with little hesitation, to confirm all the acts passed by the late Scottish parliament; that native Scotsman alone should have the command of the fortresses of their kingdom; and that neither in England nor in Ireland Scotsmen should be harassed with unusual oaths; but he assumed some of his old sternness and resolution when they spoke of the odious incendiaries, and required that they should be left to the judgment of parliament. They advanced claims for the immediate restoration of all Scottish ships and merchandise which had been taken by the English cruisers, and were gratified by a ready compliance. They also claimed indemnification for the charges they had sustained; and Charles referred this money-question to the English House of Commons, who speedily voted £125,000 for the expenses of the Scottish army during five months, and £300,000 as "a friendly relief for the losses and necessities of their brethren of Scotland." Before this sum could be paid, they got large sums for the Covenanters, by way of loan; and there appears to have been no difficulty in raising money in this way in the city of London whenever the proceeds were to go to their brethren of Scotland; for the citizens knew as well as the statesmen how necessary it was to keep the Scottish army together in good condition and in good humor. There remained to settle the last clause of the treaty, touching the establishment of a lasting peace between the two nations; and this clause the Scottish commissioners made so difficult, that there was no way of settling it for the present. On one or two occasions the ancient national animosities and jealousies produced a coldness—almost a rupture—between the English and the Scots. The latter were over-hasty in pressing for the total abolition of episcopacy in England as well as in Scotland, and thereby gave some embarrassment to the House of Commons, who considered the step premature. On the 11th of March, however, it was resolved, in the Lower House, "That for bishops or any other clergyman whatsoever, to be in the commission of the peace, or to have any judicial power in the Star Chamber, or in any civil court, is a hindrance to their spiritual function, prejudicial to the commonwealth, and fit to be taken away."

Too late, Charles tried the efficacy of concession. The forest laws had been greatly abused, and had excited violent murmurs: he sent down the Earl of Holland to tell the Lords that, out of his grace and goodness to his people, he was willing to lay down all the new bounds of his forests in this kingdom, and that they should be reduced to the condition they were in before his late encroachments. On a former occasion, when he drew Wentworth, Noy, and Digges from the opposition, he had felt the benefit of tampering with, and employing some of the patriots; and he now fondly hoped that a similar experiment on political integrity would be attended with the like success. Whitelock says that there was a proposal (the subject of much discourse) to preserve the Earl of Strafford, by converting his enemies into friends by giving them promotion; that, according to this plan, one should be made lord treasurer, the Lord Saye master of the wards, Mr. Pym chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Hollis secretary of state, Mr. Hampden tutor to the prince, &c. And he adds that Juxon, the bishop of London, resigned his treasurer's staff, the Lord Cottington his place of master of the wards, the rest being easily to be voided. "But," he says, "whether upon the king's alteration of his mind, or by what other means it came to pass is uncertain, but these things were not effected: and the great men baffled thereby became the more incensed and violent against the earl, joining with the Scots commissioners who were implacable against him."[1] The authority of Whitelock is generally entitled to the highest respect, but in this particular it requires confirmation —something more definite to make us believe in the motives imputed to the greatest of the patriots. Even if we could accept as truth the unfavorable characters drawn by royalist writers of Lord Saye and Hollis, we should hesitate long ere, upon a single assertion, we could make up our minds to believe that the contented poverty and enthusiasm of Pym, or the lofty and wealthy independence of Hampden, could be tempted by offers of place, or changed in their habits and course of mind by the withhholding of it. Some of their party, indeed, accepted employment, and among them was the Lord Saye: but this was when the old placemen abandoned their posts through fear; and Saye, though suspected for a time, did not commit his principles, and he threw up the high office of master of the wards when the king declared himself for civil war by retiring to Oxford. Clarendon mentions a design of giving some of the great offices of the state to some heads of the popular party; but he says, distinctly, that their continued violence in the prosecution of Strafford was the reason for which Charles decided "that the putting of those promotions in practice, should be for a time suspended." This is very different from Whitelock's implication, it goes to show that the leaders of the opposition, or the drivers of parliament, as they were called, did not follow up the great incendiary because they had been refused the places, but, on the contrary, that they were refused the places because they steadily persisted in the prosecution of Strafford. Hence a base and selfish motive is removed, and that, too, by the champion of the royal party, who is always ready to impute the worst of motives to his opponents.

Pym, whom, as we believe, no earthly consideration could have turned from his purpose of having the head of the greatest and most dangerous enemy to the liberties of his country, had been laboriously employed for more than three months in preparing the charges and proofs against Strafford.[1] That fallen lord had now to feel by what an insecure tenure he had held the brow-beaten parliament of Ireland. As soon as his sword of strength was shivered by the Commons of England, the Irish parliament sent over a committee, and showed themselves no less intent upon his ruin than the English and Scots, In Ireland he had carried his tyranny to its greatest height; and the English Commons welcomed with affection and joy the committee that came to depose against him, and give the weight of one of the three kingdoms to his prosecution.

Strafford's trial, which had long been the most absorbing subject, now came on.[2] In Westminster Hall there was a throne erected for the king, on each side whereof was a cabinet inclosed about with boards, and hung in front with arras; before the throne were placed seats for the peers and sacks of wool for the judges; and before these seats and woolsacks, were nine stages of seats extending along the hall for the gentlemen of the House of Commons.[3] At the end of all was a desk or dock closed in for the prisoner and his counsel. On Monday morning, March 22d, about seven o'clock, Strafford came from the Tower, accompanied by six barges, wherein were one hundred soldiers of the Tower, all with partisans, and fifty pair of oars. At his landing at Westminster, he was attended by two hundred of the trained-band, who guarded him into the hall. "The entries at Whitehall, King-street, and Westminster, were guarded by the constables and watchmen, from four of the clock in the morn-

[1] The select and secret committee appointed by the Commons consisted of Pym, Hampden, Hollis, Lord Digby, Strode, Sir Walter Earl, Selden, St. John, Maynard, Palmer, Glynne, and Whitelock. These were to consider the informations against the earl, to arrange the evidence, and with the occasional assistance of Lord Falkland, Colpepper, and Hyde, to manage the conferences with the Lords, and conduct to its close this solemn and long-protracted trial.—Lord Nugent.

[2] "But, now," says May, "a greater actor is brought upon the stage —Thomas Earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, a man too great to be let escape; no sooner accused but surprised, and secured for a trial: which trial of his, if we consider all things,—the high nature of the charge against him,—the pompous circumstances and stately manner of the trial itself,—the time that it lasted,—the preciousness of that time so consumed,—and, lastly, of what moment and consequence the success of it must prove, I may safely say that no subject in England, and probably in Europe, ever had the like. So great it was, that we can hardly call it the trial of the Earl of Strafford only—the king's affections toward his people and parliament, the future success of this parliament, and the hopes of three kingdoms depending on it, were all tried when Strafford was arraigned. Many subjects in Europe have played louder parts upon the theater of the world, but none left it with greater noise. Nor was the matter of his accusation confined within one realm;—three whole kingdoms were his accusers, and eagerly sought in one death a recompense of all their sufferings." —Hist. Parl.

[3] Both the Scotch and Irish commissioners were present. "Seven of the nine stages of seats," says May, "were appointed for the members of the House of Commons to sit on, who were all there in a committee; the two upper degrees of the scaffold were appointed for the commissioners of Scotland and the lords of Ireland, who were then come over."

ing, to keep away all base and idle persons. The king, queen, and prince came to the house about nine of the clock, but kept themselves private within their closets, only the prince came out once or twice to the cloth of state, so that the king saw and heard all that passed, but was seen of none. Some give the reason of this from the received practice of England in such cases; others say that the Lords did intreat the king either to be absent, or to be there privately, lest pretension might be made hereafter that his being there was either to threaten or some other way to interrupt the course of justice; a third sort, that the king was not willing to be accessory to the process, till it came to his part, but rather chose to be present that he might observe and understand if any violence, rigor, or injustice happened." When Strafford entered the hall, the porter, whose office it was, asked Master Maxwell, the usher of the black rod, whether the ax should be carried before the prisoner or not; and black rod answered that the king had expressly forbidden it. The Earl of Arundel, "being," says Clarendon, "a person notoriously disaffected to the Earl of Strafford," was appointed high steward, and the Earl of Lindsay high constable, for the trial. It had been debated whether the bishops should have voices in the trial; and upon the preceding Saturday the startled prelates voluntarily declined voting, being ecclesiastical persons, and so prohibited by the canons from having their hands in blood.[1] Exceptions had also been taken to some recently-made peers, who were all friends to the prisoner; and the Commons demanded that no peer created since the day upon which the Earl of Strafford was impeached of high treason should sit on his trial. The Lord Littleton, who had since that date been made a baron at the entreaty of Strafford, for the reason that, if he were a peer, he would do him notable service, was the first to quit his right to judge; but the Lord Seymour and one or two others of the recently-created, insisted upon their rights, and were allowed to sit.[2]

The Earl of Arundel, as lord high steward of England, sat apart by himself, and, at Strafford's entrance into the dock, he commanded the House to proceed. Then the impeachment, which consisted of twenty-eight capital articles, was read, with Strafford's reply to it, in two hundred sheets of paper. This occupied the first day. The queen left the house about eleven o'clock, the king and Prince Charles stayed till the court rose, which was after two, when Strafford was sent back to the Tower, and appointed to return upon the following morning at nine o'clock. The crowd was neither great nor troublesome; they saluted the fallen nobleman as he passed, and he returned their salutes with great humility and courtesy. At the appointed hour Strafford again appeared at the bar, and again the king, queen, and prince took their seats in court.[1] The lord steward having commanded the committee of the Commons who were to manage the evidence to proceed, Pym stood up, and said:—"My lords, we stand here by the commandment of the knights, citizens, and burgesses, now assembled for the Commons in parliament, and we are ready to make good that impeachment whereby Thomas Earl of Strafford stands charged in their name, and in the name of all the Commons of England, with high treason. This, my lords, is a great cause, and we might sink under the weight of it, and be astonished with the luster of this noble assembly, if there were not in the cause strength and vigor to support itself, and to encourage us. It is the cause of the king; it concerns his majesty in the honor of his government, in the safety of his person, in the stability of his crown. It is the cause of the kingdom; it concerns not only the peace and prosperity, but even the being of the kingdom. We have that piercing eloquence, the cries, and groans, and tears, and prayers of all the subjects, assisting us. We have the three kingdoms, England, and Scotland, and Ireland, in travail and agitation with us, bowing themselves, like the hinds spoken of in Job, to cast out their sorrows. Truth and goodness, my lords, they are the beauty of the soul, they are the perfection of all created natures, they are the image and character of God upon the creatures. This beauty, evil spirits and evil men have lost; but yet there are none so wicked, but they desire to march under the show and shadow of it, though they hate the reality of it. This unhappy earl, now the object of your lordships' justice, hath taken as much care, hath used as much cunning, to set a face and countenance of honesty and justice upon his actions, as he hath been negligent to observe the rules of honesty in the performance of all these actions. My lords, it is the greatest baseness of wickedness, that it dares not look in its own colors, nor be seen in its natural countenance. But virtue, as it is amiable in all respects, so the least is not this, that it puts a nobleness, it puts a bravery upon the mind, and lifts it above hopes and fears—above favor and displeasure;—it makes it always uniform and constant to itself. The service commanded me and my colleagues here, is to take off those vizards of truth and uprightness, which hath been sought to be put upon this cause, and to show you his actions and his intentions in their own natural blackness and deformity." Pym then enumerated the pleas in Strafford's reply, denouncing them all as false or insufficient. Strafford maintained that he had supported

[1] Clarendon says that this was done by the Bishop of Lincoln, old Williams, who was still alive and active, and burning with revenge against his cruel persecutor, Archbishop Laud; but it should appear that nearly all the bishops were hopeless of doing Strafford any good, and really averse to being present; and it is quite certain that the canons excluded priests from capital trials. The prelates, however, gave in a protest, that their absence should not prejudice them in their privileges as the lords spiritual in parliament.

[2] And so, no doubt, says Clarendon, might the bishops too, if they would.

[1] "The tirlies (trellis)," says Baillie, "that made them (the king and queen) to be secret, the king brake down with his own hands; so they sat in the eyes of all, but little more regarded than if they had been absent." The Covenanter's description of the scene in Westminster Hall is striking and curious, and not altogether honorable to the good feeling and decency of those present. "It was daily the most glorious assembly the isle could afford, yet the gravity not such as I expected. . . . . After ten, much public eating, not only of confections but of flesh and bread; bottles of beer and wine going thick from mouth to mouth without cups; and all this in the king's eye. . . . There was no outgoing to return; and oft the sitting was till two, three, or four o'clock at night."

religion; that he had endeavored the honor of the king, the increase of his revenue, the peace, and honor, and safety of the kingdom, and the quiet and peace of the people. "For religion," said Pym, "we shall prove that he hath been diligent to favor innovation, to favor superstition, to favor the encroachments and usurpations of the clergy. For the honor of the king, we say, my lords, that it is the honor of the king that he is the father of his people, that he is the fountain of justice; and it can not stand with his honor and justice to have his government stained and polluted with tyranny and oppression for the increase of his revenue. It is true there may be some additions of sums, but we say there is no addition of strength nor wealth, because in those parts where it hath been increased, this earl hath taken the greatest share himself; and when he hath spoiled and ravened on the people, he hath been content to yield up some part to the king, that he might with more security enjoy the rest. For the strength, and honor, and safety of the kingdom, my lords, in a time of peace he hath let in upon us the calamities of war, weakness, shame, and confusion. And for the quiet of the subjects, he hath been an incendiary; he hath armed us among ourselves, and made us weak and naked to all the world besides. This is that I shall answer to the second head of his apology." Pym then went at length into Wentworth's abuses of power in Ireland, where chiefly he had earned his bad preëminence, and where it was sufficiently proved that he had arrogated an authority beyond what the crown had ever lawfully enjoyed, and even beyond the example of former viceroys of that island, where the disorganized state of society, the constant occurrence of insurrections and rebellions, and the distance from control, had given rise to such a series of arbitrary precedents, as would have covered and almost excused any ordinary stretch of power.[1] Pym produced his witnesses; Sir Pierce Crosby, who, for speaking against a bill in the Irish House of Commons, had been driven from the council-table, and committed to prison; Sir John Clotsworthy, who had been threatened with loss of property; Mr. Barnwell who had been threatened with a regiment of horse to be quartered in his house; the Lord Ranelagh and the Lord Mountnorris, both for their discourses in parliament. The managers then desired that the remonstrance from Ireland might be read. The prisoner opposed this, as something containing new matter not in the original charge, but brought over since his impeachment; but they replied, that the subverting of laws and corruption of government, was in general laid in their charge; and upon the Lord Battinglass and the Lord Digby of Ireland vouching for the truth of the copy, the powerful remonstrance of the Irish parliament was read. Strafford, in answer to it, said that it was the produce of faction and confederacy, and a strong conspiracy against him. These last expressions put the managers into a heat, and Mr. Glynne exclaimed, "My lords, these words are not to be suffered." Strafford craved time to recollect himself, and make his defense to certain charges, protesting, by the Almighty God, that he never had other intentions than to be true and faithful to his majesty and the commonwealth. The managers insisted that he had had time enough, and ought to answer instantly: the lords adjourned for half an hour, and at their return, ordered him to make his answer presently. The prisoner then replied, in a long and able speech, to every article contained in the Irish remonstrance, taking shelter more than once under his commission, and the king's warrants and express commands. Pym replied to this defense; maintained that it did not make my Lord of Strafford more excusable; and that he and the other managers for the Commons of England could make good their charges against him. And hereupon the court was adjourned to the following day. On the morrow, the third day of the trial, Maynard, one of the managers and an expert lawyer, continued the accusations about the tyranny exercised in Ireland, and produced other witnesses. Strafford was permitted to interrupt the witnesses, and to speak at length, which he did frequently, with great eloquence, and an admirable show of modesty and equanimity. This was the case on nearly every day of his long and remarkable trial. "The Earl of Strafford," says May, "answered daily at the bar, while the whole House of Commons, having put themselves into a committee, had liberty to charge him, every man as he saw occasion: but though many of them did sometimes speak, yet the accusations were chiefly managed by two expert lawyers, Master Glynne and Master Maynard, both members of the House. Many foul misdemeanors, committed both in Ireland and England, were daily proved against him: but that ward which the earl, being an eloquent man, especially lay at, was to keep off the blow of high treason, whatsoever misdemeanors should be laid upon him; of which some he denied, others he excused and extenuated with great subtilty; contending to make one thing good, that misdemeanors, though never so many and so great, could not, by being put together, make one treason, unless some one of them had been treason in its own nature. Every day the first week, from Monday to Saturday, without intermission, the earl was brought from the Tower to Westminster Hall, and arraigned many hours together; and the success of every day's trial was the greatest discourse or dispute in all companies. For by this time the people began to be a little divided in opinions. The clergy in general were so much fallen into love and admiration of this earl, that the Archbishop of Canterbury was almost quite forgotten by them. The courtiers cried him up; and the ladies, whose voices will carry much with some parts of the state, were exceedingly on his side. It seemed a very pleasant object to see so many Sempronias (all the chief court ladies filling the galleries at the trial) with pen, ink, and paper in their hands, noting the passages, and discoursing upon the grounds of law and state. They were all of his side; whether moved by pity proper to their sex, or by ambition of being thought able to judge of the parts of the prisoner.

[1] Hallam, Const. Hist.

But so great was the favor and love which they openly expressed to him, that some could not but think of that verse—

> "Non formosus erat, sed erat facundus Ulysses; > Et tamen æquoreas torsit amore Deas."

But the spectacle of one man resisting, as it were, three nations, without confidence in the master he had served, and with scarcely a resource or a hope except such as he drew from his own abilities, was calculated to impose on others beside court gentlemen and ladies—on the mass of the people, who have been in all ages most honorably distinguished by their love of an equal combat, and their dislike of seeing one man beaten by many. The two managing lawyers, moreover, Glynne and Maynard, insisted too much upon vague and general clauses, and overdid their part with the quibbles and forced constructions of the legal profession. Again, though many of the deeds proved against the prisoner were despotic and detestable, there was scarcely one taken singly that came within the verge of treason, and the managers heaped the charges together in the design of making what was called accumulative treason. "There is nothing in this," cries Strafford, "that can be treason, and, when one thousand misdemeanors will not make one felony, shall twenty-eight misdemeanors heighten it to a treason?" They possessed not many of the letters which are now open to every reader, and which prove beyond a doubt, that he was a systematic enemy of his country's liberties, a minister that would, indeed, have "gone thorough"—who would scarcely have hesitated at any state crime. His opinions delivered in council were tolerably well known, but he maintained that the worst of these did not amount to treason. "Opinions," said he, "may make a heretic, but that they made a traitor, I have never heard till now." On the first day when he entered the hall but few of the lords returned his salute, and most of them looked angrily upon him; but this feeling afterward seemed to give way to emotions of a gentler kind.

On the 10th of April, Pym, Strafford's evil genius, intimated to the Commons that he had to communicate a matter of the last importance. Instantly an order was given that the members should remain in their places and the doors be locked; and then Pym and Harry Vane the younger were called upon to declare what they knew of the matters contained in the 23d article of the impeachment. Pym produced and read "a copy of notes taken at a junto of the privy council for the Scots affairs, about the 5th of May last." These notes had been taken by the elder Vane, one of the secretaries of state; but there are different accounts of the way in which his son got possession of them. Clarendon says, that Pym, some months before the beginning of this parliament, had visited the younger Vane, who was then newly recovered from an ague, and that they two being together, and lamenting the sad condition of the kingdom, young Vane told Pym that if he would call upon him next day he would show him something that would give him much trouble, and inform him what pernicious counsels were likely to be followed to the ruin of the kingdom, as he (Vane), in perusing some of his father's papers, had accidentally met with the result, or summary, of the consultations of the cabinet council upon the dissolution of the last parliament. "The next day he showed him (Pym) a little paper of the secretary's own writing, in which was contained the day of the month and the result of several discourses made by several councilors; with several hieroglyphics, which sufficiently expressed the persons by whom those discourses were made. The matter was of so transcendent a nature, and the counsel so prodigious, with reference to the commonwealth, that he desired he might take a copy of it; which the young gentleman would by no means consent to, fearing it might prove prejudicial to his father. But when Mr. Pym informed him that it was of extreme consequence to the kingdom, and that a time might probably come when a discovery of this might be a sovereign means to preserve both church and state, he was contented that Mr. Pym should take a copy of it, which he did in the presence of Sir (Mr.) Henry Vane;[1] and having examined it together with him, delivered the original again to Sir Henry. That he had carefully kept this copy by him, without communicating the same to any body till the beginning of this parliament, which was the time he conceived fit to make use of it; and that then meeting with many other instances of the earl's ill disposition to the kingdom, it satisfied him to move whatsoever he had moved, against that great person."[2] Whitelock, who was actively engaged on the trial, says, that Secretary Vane, being out of town, sent his son the key of his study, that he might look into his cabinet for some papers which the secretary wanted; that the son, in looking over many papers, lighted upon these notes, which being so decisive against Strafford and so important to the public, he held himself bound in duty and conscience to discover them; and that thereupon he showed them to Pym, who urged him, and prevailed with him, that they might be made use of in the evidence. Others assert that the papers were purposely put in the way of his son by the elder Vane because he hated Strafford; while others again affirm, that the son purloined them, to the sore displeasure of his father. The weightiest part of these private notes of the council was this—"Your majesty," Strafford was made to say, "having tried all ways, and being refused, shall be acquitted before God and man. You are absolved and loosed from all rule of government and free to do what power will admit: and you have an army in Ireland that you may employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience; for I am confident that the Scots can not hold out five months." Upon the 12th of April, this additional proof was brought forward in court, when Strafford replied to it, that, as to the words that the king had an army in Ireland to reduce this kingdom, they were only proved by the unsupported testimony of one man;

[1] Clarendon says "Sir Henry;" but he is no doubt describing, in his loose way, the younger Vane by his latter style. Old Harry could hardly have been present.

that the law, even in a matter of debt, much less in a point of life and death, required two witnesses; that the Secretary Vane had been examined and his deposition found very dubious; for, on his first examination, he said he could not remember any such words spoken in council, and even on his third examination, he merely said, that he (Strafford) had spoken those words or the like; that there were present at the debate eight privy councilors; two of them, the archbishop and Secretary Windebank, could not be produced; but, beside himself and Vane, there remained four for evidence—the Marquis of Hamilton, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Treasurer Juxon, and the Lord Cottington, who had all declared, upon their honors, that they had never heard him speak those words, nor any the like. "And suppose," continued the prisoner, "I spake the words (which I grant not), yet the word 'this,' can not rationally imply England, because England was not out of the way of obedience, and because there never was any the least intention of landing the Irish army in England, as the lords of the council are able to attest." It was suggested by Lord Hollis, Strafford's father-in-law, that "this kingdom" might very well mean Scotland, and Strafford himself had asked Vane whether he had used the demonstrative pronoun "this," or "that." The sending of an Irish army into Scotland by an English minister, was not treason, but the project which this interpretation of the words would have intimated was one of the things which made the now powerful Scots clamor for Strafford's blood.

After his reply to this additional proof, Arundel, the lord steward, told him if he had any thing further to say in his defense he should proceed, because the court intended to prepare for their speedy judgment. The prisoner, though suffering greatly in body as well as mind (for his old enemies, the gout and stone, had revisited him in the Tower), made a summary of the several parts of his former defense, and concluded with these eloquent and pathetic words: "It is hard to be questioned upon a law which can not be shown. Where hath this fire lain hid so many hundreds of years, without smoke to discover it, till it thus burst forth to consume me and my children? Punishment should not precede promulgation of a law: to be punished by a law subsequent to the fact, is extremely hard: what man can be safe if this be admitted? My lords, it is hard in another respect, that there should be no token set by which we should know this offense, no admonition by which we should avoid it. If a man pass the Thames in a boat, and split himself upon an anchor, and no buoy be floating to discover it, he who owneth the anchor shall make satisfaction; but if a buoy be set there, every man passeth upon his own peril. Now, where is the mark, where the token, upon this crime, to declare it to be high treason? My lords, be pleased to give that regard to the peerage of England as never to expose yourselves to such moot points, such constructive interpretations of laws: if there must be a trial of wits, let the subject matter be of somewhat else than the lives and honors of peers. It will be wisdom for yourselves, for your posterity, and for the whole kingdom, to cast into the fire these bloody and mysterious volumes of constructive and arbitrary treason, as the primitive Christians did their books of curious arts, and betake yourselves to the plain letter of the law and statute, that telleth us what is and what is not treason, without being more ambitious to be more learned in the art of killing than our forefathers. It is now full two hundred and forty years since any man was touched for this alledged crime, to this height, before myself; let us not awaken these sleeping lions to our destruction, by raking up a few musty records that have lain by the walls so many ages forgotten or neglected. May your lordships please not to add this to my other misfortunes; let not a precedent be derived from me so disadvantageous as this will be in the consequence to the whole kingdom. Do not, through me, wound the interest of the commonwealth; and howsoever these gentlemen say they speak for the commonwealth, yet, in this particular, I, indeed, speak for it, and show the inconveniences and mischiefs that will fall upon it. For, as it is said in the statute 1 Henry IV., no man will know what to do or say for fear of such penalties. Do not put, my lords, such difficulties upon ministers of state, that men of wisdom, of honor, and of fortune may not with cheerfulness and safety be employed for the public. If you weigh and measure them by grains and scruples, the public affairs of the kingdom will lie waste, no man will meddle with them who hath any thing to lose. My lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of these dear pledges a saint in heaven hath left me.[1]—[At these words he stopped awhile, letting fall some tears at her memory: then he went on.]—What I forfeit myself is nothing: but that my indiscretion should extend to my posterity woundeth me to the very soul. You will pardon my infirmity: something I should have added, but am not able; therefore let it pass. And now, my lords, for myself, I have been, by the blessing of Almighty God, taught that the afflictions of this present life are not to be compared to the eternal weight of glory which shall be revealed hereafter. And so, my lords, even so, with all tranquillity of mind, I freely submit myself to your judgment; and, whether that judgment be of life or death, Te Deum laudamus." "Certainly," adds Whitelock, "never any man acted such a part on such a theater with more wisdom, constancy, and eloquence; with greater reason, judgment, and temper; and with a better grace in all his words and gestures." He moved many men to pity: but Pym was pitiless;

[1] The bitter Baillie says,—"At the end he made such a pathetic oration for half an hour as ever comedian did on the stage. The matter and expression was exceedingly brave. Doubtless, if he had grace and civil goodness, he is a most eloquent man. One passage is most spoken of: his breaking off, in weeping and silence, when he spoke of his first wife. Some took it for a true defect in his memory, others for a notable part of his rhetoric; some, that true grief and remorse at that remembrance had stopped his mouth; for they say that his first lady being with child, and finding one of his mistress's letters, brought it to him, and chiding him therefor, he struck her on the breast, whereof she shortly died."

he considered the life of the great criminal, in any circumstances, as dangerous to the liberties of his country; and he and Glynne learnedly aggravated his offenses, and maintained that they should be punished as treason. On the 17th of April the point of law was argued for the earl by Mr. Lane, the prince's attorney; Mr. Loe, Mr. Gardiner, and Mr. Lightfoot being also present as counsel—for Strafford was allowed counsel, which had not always been the case in prosecutions for high treason. But by this time the Commons had changed their tack, fearing the increasing good feeling of the peers toward the prisoner, and the royal prerogative of pardoning him after sentence. "The Lower House," says Wariston, one of the Scotsmen who were pressing for an execution, "if they see that the king gains many of the Upper House not to condemn him, they will make a bill of teinture (attainder), and condemn him formally in their own House, and send it up to their House, as any other act of parliament, to be voiced formally. The town of London will give no money to the parliament till they do justice." And, therefore, and for other reasons of great weight, the Commons had resolved to proceed with a bill of attainder against Strafford for endeavoring to subvert the liberties of his country. This bill encountered a much stronger opposition in the Commons than had been expected. Upon the 19th of April, upon the motion for the engrossment of the bill, there was a sharp debate; the eloquent Lord Digby, hitherto one of the most popular members, speaking vehemently against it. His lordship admitted that Thomas Earl of Strafford was a name of hatred in the present age by his practices, and fit to be made a terror to future ages by his punishment. "I believe him," said he, "still that grand apostate to the commonwealth, who must not expect to be pardoned in this world till he be dispatched to the other." But then he objected to the validity of the evidence, which he thought had altogether failed to establish treason as the law then stood. He would not say but that Strafford was a man as worthy to die, perhaps worthier than many a traitor; he would not say but that they might enact that such doings as his should be treason for the future. "But God keep me," said his lordship, "from giving judgment of death on any man, and of ruin to his innocent posterity, upon a law made à posteriori. Let the mark be set on the door where the plague is, and then let him that will enter die. . . . . To condemn my Lord of Strafford judicially as for treason, my conscience is not assured that the matter will bear it: and as to doing it by the legislative power, my reason can not agree to that; since I am persuaded neither the Lords nor the king will pass the bill, and consequently that our passing it will be a cause of great divisions and combustions in the state. And therefore my humble advice is, that, laying aside this bill of attainder, we may think of another, saving only life, such as may secure the state from my Lord of Strafford, without endangering it as much by division concerning his punishment as he hath endangered it by his practices."

In law, in reason, in humanity, Digby's speech was conclusive: but others saw no security to the state except in the block; and the violent passions of some within the House, stimulated and encouraged to action by the still more violent passions of many without, opposed themselves to his lordship, who, moreover, was now suspected, and upon very good grounds, of being won over to the court through the fascinations of the queen. On the 21st of April the bill of attainder was passed in the Commons by an immense majority,[1] and sent up in the afternoon to the Lords. The peers showed no great haste in dispatching the bill. To quicken them, mobs gathered round the parliament-house, crying for Strafford's blood; and a petition to the same effect, and signed by many thousands, was presented by the city of London. The Commons sent up Mr. Hyde, afterward Lord Clarendon, to acquaint their lordships that they had heard that the Earl of Strafford was designing to escape; that he had ships at sea at command; that the guards put over him were weak; and to desire that he might be made a close prisoner, and the guards strengthened. It is indeed quite certain that several attempts were made to release the prisoner, and that schemes were entertained, which, if they had succeeded, would have sent the leaders of the Commons to take his place in the Tower. Charles had hastened to assure Strafford that, though he might be forced to make some sacrifices to the violence of the times, he would never consent that so faithful a servant should suffer in life, fortune, or honors. The king entertained a plan, which seemed feasible: one hundred trusty soldiers were to be suddenly introduced into the Tower; and these men, it was calculated, would give him the entire command of that fortress. Another project was, for the king to order the removal of Strafford to some other prison, and then to rescue him on the road. But there was one calculation in which the devisers of these various designs were at fault. Balfour, the lieutenant of the Tower, without whom nothing could be done, was proof to bribes and royal promises: he was attached to the popular cause,—perhaps intimidated by the formidable aspect of the city of London, and by the prospect of danger to himself;—he refused to obey the royal warrant, and turned scornfully away from Strafford, who offered him twenty-two thousand pounds, and (it is said) a matrimonial alliance. But there still remained one desperate hope more: the English army in the north had been irritated at seeing that, while their arrears were left to accumulate, the Commons had taken care to supply the Scottish forces in England with money. If these English troops could be brought up of a sudden to London, they might over-awe the parliament, and give to Charles the ascendency which he had lost,— at least so thought the king, who entered into this project without reflecting sufficiently on the spirit and power of the citizens of London, who of themselves would have been sufficient to repel the weak, and disheartened, and still badly-disciplined army. Secret overtures were made to the principal officers at York, who entered into the scheme readily enough, but who betrayed their motives, and made the measure hopeless, by the avidity with which they claimed high promotion and other rewards, and by their fierce jealousy of one another. Colonel Goring, and Percy, brother of the Earl of Northumberland, headed a consultation with the officers; all that were admitted into the plot, took a solemn oath of secrecy; but these two hotheaded and unprincipled men, who in their hearts cared neither for their king nor for their country, quarreled, and almost fought. Jermyn, now the queen's especial favorite (afterward her lover and her husband), was deputed to reconcile the rivals, but he failed; and Goring disclosed the whole plot to Lord Newport,—"that silly and faithless Earl of Newport," as Warwick calls him,[1] who blabbed it, or purposely revealed it, to Lord Saye and others, through whom it reached the quick ear of Pym—a man all eyes, all ears, till he should see his threat or prediction verified in the severed neck of the renegade.

[1] Only fifty-four, or, as Whitelock says, fifty-nine members of the Lower House voted against the bill; and on the following morning the names of these gentlemen were placarded in the streets as Straffordians, who, to save a traitor, were willing to betray their country. Nalson says that exceptions were taken in the House at Digby's eloquent speech upon the Friday following, when his lordship explained; that for the present there was nothing done, though afterward the sleeping revenge roused itself, and upon the 15th of July the speech, by order of the House, was burned by the common hangman.—An Impartial Collection of the Great Affairs of State, &c.

After the utter failure of these and other schemes, Charles resolved to try whether he could not prevail over the Commons in an audience, and on the 1st of May he called both Houses of parliament before him, and passionately desired of them not to proceed severely against the earl. He told them that originally he had not had any intention of speaking in this business, but now it had come to pass, through their proceeding by attainder, that he, of necessity, must have part in the judgment; he told them that they all knew he had been present at the hearing of the trial, from the one end to the other, and so was conversant with all their proceedings that way, and the nature of their evidence; that in his conscience he could not condemn him of high treason. "'Tis not fit for me," continued Charles, to argue the business: I am sure you will not expect it. A positive doctrine best comes out of the mouth of a prince; yet I must tell you three great truths. First, I never had any intention of bringing over the Irish army into England, nor ever was advised by any body so to do. Second, there never was any debate before me, either in public council, or in private committee, of the disloyalty and disaffection of my English subjects. Third, I was never counseled by any to alter the least of any of the laws of England, much less to alter all the laws. I think nobody durst ever be so impudent as to move me to that; for if they had I should have put a mark upon them, and made them such an example, that all posterity should know my intention by it; for my intention was ever to govern according to the law. I desire to be rightly understood: I told you in my conscience I can not condemn him of high treason; yet I can not say I can clear him of misdemeanors: therefore I hope that you may find a way to satisfy justice and your own fears, and not to press upon my conscience. My lords, I hope you know what a tender thing conscience is. To satisfy my people I would do great matters; but in this of conscience, no fear, no respect whatever, shall ever make me go against it. Certainly I have not so ill deserved of the parliament this time, that they should press me in this tender point." He assured them that as to Strafford's being guilty of misdemeanors, he was quite clear in that; and therefore he thought that my Lord of Strafford was not fit hereafter to serve him or the commonwealth in any place of trust, no, not so much as to be a high constable. He left it to their lordships (he never mentioned the Commons in this injudicious address) to find some way or other to bring him out of this great strait, and yet keep themselves and the kingdom safe; and he proposed that Strafford should be punished as for misdemeanors and not treason.[1]

On their return to their own house, the Commons testified their discontent at the king's interference, and his invasion of their privileges. The following day was a Sunday, which gave the Puritan preachers the opportunity of inflaming the popular mind, by preaching the necessity of justice upon great delinquents, and proving by Scripture texts that Heaven would be highly gratified by a bloody sacrifice. Their discourses produced the desired effect: on the following morning a fierce rabble of about 6000 issued from the city, and thronged down to Westminster and the houses of parliament, with clubs and staves, crying out for justice against the Earl of Strafford. At the same time there was almost as great a ferment within the Commons' house, where Pym and his friends were imparting information about some practices in the north, "to distract the English army, and to debauch them against the parliament;" asserting that these combinations at home had a correspondency with practices abroad; that the French were collecting forces on the opposite coast, with the intention of invading England; and that divers persons of eminence about the king were deeply engaged in these plots, and in a design upon the Tower to liberate the great traitor. The Commons soon voted that it was necessary to close the seaports, and to desire his majesty to command that no person attending upon himself, the queen, or prince, should depart without leave of his majesty, granted upon the humble advice of his parliament; and, after further debate, they resolved that a "Solemn Protestation" should be taken by the whole House, promising, vowing, and protesting, in the presence of God, to maintain, with their life, power, and estates, the true reformed Protestant religion against all popery and popish innovation;

[1] Sir Philip, whose testimony and word are as questionable as Goring's, says,—"But Goring is said to have betrayed them all as he did; but he swore to me (which was no great assurance) that he never revealed it till he certainly knew that the chief members of both Houses were before acquainted with it."—Memoirs. Goring, with others, was examined before parliament, and made ample disclosures, showing that the king was privy to the whole plot. If the Commons had placed no confidence in Charles before, it was not likely that they should trust him after these discoveries!

to maintain and defend his majesty's royal person and estate, as also the power and privilege of parliaments, the lawful rights and liberties of the subject; to oppose and bring to condign punishment all such as should, by force, practice, counsels, plots, conspiracies, or otherwise, do any thing contrary to this present Protestation; to endeavor to preserve, in all just and honorable ways, the union and peace between the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and neither for hope, fear, or any other respect relinquish this promise, vow, and protestation. Mr. Maynard read, and probably composed this bond, which, though less emphatic, and far shorter, was an evident imitation of the Scottish Covenant. It was instantly subscribed by the speaker, and by every member present.[1] Forthwith they dispatched a message to the Lords, to acquaint them with their alarms, arising out of the secret practices to discontent the army, &c., and to request that a select committee might be appointed to take examinations upon oath, concerning desperate plots and designs. And at the same time the Commons agreed upon a letter to the army in the north, to assure them that they should have money, and that the House could not doubt of their affections to the parliament, notwithstanding the efforts made to corrupt them. Nor did they stop here: to provide against foreign invasion, they ordered that the forces in Wiltshire and Hampshire should be drawn toward Portsmouth, and the forces in Kent and Sussex concentrated at Dover; and they declared that any man advising or assisting the introduction of any foreign force should be reputed a public enemy to the king and kingdom.[2] These resolutions were sent up to the Lords in the afternoon, together with the protestation, which the Commons desired might also be taken by every member of their lordships' House. Hollis, in delivering this message, told their lordships that parliament and the country were absolutely surrounded with plots and dangers—that justice was obstructed—that the same evil counsels which first raised the storm, and almost shipwrecked the commonwealth, still continued to blow strong, like the east wind that brought locusts over the land—and that it was time they should unite and concentrate themselves to defeat the counsels of these Achitophels, that would involve their religion, their king, their laws, their liberties, all that could be near and dear to an honest soul, in one universal desolation. On the morrow, the 4th of May, the Lords desired a conference with the Commons; and when the two Houses met, the lord privy seal stated that his majesty had taken notice how the people assembled in such unusual numbers (while he was speaking the Houses were surrounded by another mob from the city), that the council and peace of the kingdom might be thereby interrupted, and, therefore, as a king that loved peace, and made it his care that all proceedings in parliament might be free, his majesty desired that these interruptions might be removed, and wished both Houses to devise how this might be done. The lord privy seal also communicated to the Commons a petition which had been thrust into the hands of the Lords by some of the multitude the day before, praying for the speedy execution of justice upon the Earl of Strafford, and announcing that plots and designs were on foot for delivering that great offender out of the Tower. The Commons were assured that six peers were sent to keep the Tower, and assist the faithful lieutenant there. The Lords further declared, at this conference, that they were drawing to a conclusion of the bill of attainder, but that they were so encompassed with multitudes of people, that their lordships might be conceived not to be free, unless those multitudes were sent to their homes. This was soon done; for the Lords having agreed to and taken the Protestation, Dr. Burgess, a popular preacher, went out and addressed the mob. The doctor acquainted them with the Protestation, read that bond to them, and besought them in the name of the parliament to retire quietly to their houses; and they all departed forthwith. Soon after, the protestation was tendered to the whole kingdom, as the covenant had been in Scotland, with the same intimation, that whosoever refused it should be set down as an enemy to his country's liberties and religion.[1] It was at this crisis that the Commons went into committee upon the additional bill, that parliament should not be dissolved without the consent of both Houses.

Men's minds were now so over-excited by constant talk and rumors of desperate plots, that the slightest circumstance sufficed to create perilous alarm. On the 5th of May, Sir Walter Earle was making a report to the House of some fabulous plot to blow them all up after the fashion of Guido Fawkes, some members in the gallery stood up, in their great anxiety, and Mr. Moyle, of Cornwall, and Mr. Middleton, of Sussex, two very corpulent members, broke with their weight a board in the gallery, which gave so great a crack, that some thought there was a plot indeed, and Sir John Ray cried out that he smelled gunpowder. Upon this, some members and others, in great fear, ran out of the House, and frightened the people in the lobby, and the people in the lobby ran into Westminster Hall, crying that the Parliament House was falling, and the members slain. Sir Robert Mansell drew his sword, and bade them stand for shame, telling them that he saw no enemy, nor heard any noise; but some of the people hastened by water to the city, and there created a strange hubbub upon this false alarm. The citizens collected in immense numbers; one regiment of the train-bands, commanded by Colonel Mainwaring, armed upon beat of drum, and they all proceeded together toward Westminster to secure the parliament; but, finding there was no cause, they returned again. It may possibly be that some men looked upon this false alarm as a good experiment on the devotion of the citizens to the parliament; and the consequences were certainly well calculated to warn the king. On the following day the House was informed that six or eight dangerous conspirators—among whom were Henry Jermyn (the queen's favorite), and Henry Percy, both members of the House of Commons—had fled, and that the queen was preparing to go after them. On Friday, the 7th of May, the Lords passed the bill abrogating the king's prerogative to dissolve parliament, and also the bill of attainder against Strafford. Both were passed in a thin House—for the Catholic peers would not take the protestation, and kept away, and the friends of Strafford, it is said, were afraid of the mob. Those present voted, that the 15th and 19th articles had been fully proved, and that Strafford, as therein charged, had levied money in Ireland by force, in a warlike manner; and had forcibly imposed an unlawful oath upon the subjects in Ireland.[1] They consulted the judges, and the judges unanimously declared that these offenses amounted to treason! These high functionaries, these interpreters and guardians of the law, had been bred in an infamous school, and they were now as base under the power of parliament as they had been before under the absolutism of the king. The bill was passed in the Lords by a majority of twenty-six to nineteen. On the morrow, the 8th of May, the Commons requested the Lords to join with them to move his majesty for his consent to the bill of attainder, as they conceived that the peace of the kingdom depended upon the immediate execution of that bill; and the Upper House agreed to their request, and sent a certain number of peers to wait upon his majesty. Charles was now without hope and without help. His own feeling, his pride, his honor, suggested that he ought to risk any extremity rather than seal Strafford's doom; but he had not courage for this course—youth or man, he was utterly destitute of heroism or high-mindedness. The prisoner in the Tower held his life by a thread. But still, to do something for his servant, or to salve over his own conscience, Charles on the morrow—it was a Sunday—summoned his privy council together at Whitehall, called in some of the judges and bishops, propounded several scruples, imparted his doubts and misgivings, and asked their opinions. Honest, plain-spoken Juxon, bishop of London, who had wielded the staff of lord treasurer without reproach, and laid it down without regret, boldly advised him not to consent to the shedding of the blood of a man whom in his heart he believed to be innocent. Williams, the old bishop of Lincoln, and now about to be archbishop of York,[1] was of a very different opinion. He told Charles "that there was a private and a public conscience; that his public conscience as a king might not only dispense with, but oblige him to do that which was against his private conscience as a man; and that the question was not, whether he should save the Earl of Strafford, but whether he should perish with him; that the conscience of a king to preserve his kingdom, the conscience of a husband to preserve his wife, the conscience of a father to preserve his children (all which were now in danger), weighed down abundantly all the considerations the conscience of a master or a friend could suggest to him, for the preservation of a friend or servant; and by such unprelatical, ignominious arguments, in plain terms, advised him, even for conscience' sake to pass that act."[2] Three "others of the same function, for whose learning and sincerity the king and the world had greater reverence"—Usher, primate of Armagh, Moreton, bishop of Durham, and another bishop, advised Charles to guide his conscience by the opinion of his judges. The judges, it is said, refused to give any reasons for their opinion, and merely stated that the case of Strafford, as put to them by the Lords, was treason. The majority of the council pressed upon him the votes of both Houses of parliament and the imminent danger of a refusal; and, late on Sunday evening, Charles reluctantly subscribed a commission to give his assent to the bill. According to one account, he shed tears; according to another, he exclaimed that the condition of the doomed Strafford was happier than his own.

[1] It was a full house, wanting only a very few members; four hundred and fifteen took the protestation. Rushworth gives the list. We know not why many historians state the number at three hundred.

[2] Among these resolutions was one, "that strict inquiry be made what papists, priests, and Jesuits be now about town."

[1] "This they conceived to be a true test of every good subject, a Shiboleth to distinguish the Ephraimites from the Gileadites; that whosoever was well affected in religion, and to the good of the commonwealth, would make this protestation; and on the other side, who would not make it was not well affected."—Rushworth.

On the preceding Tuesday the prisoner had addressed a remarkable and a very touching letter to the king. After protesting his loyalty and his innocence, Strafford said:—"Now I understand the minds of men are more and more incensed against me, notwithstanding your majesty hath declared that, in your princely opinion, I am not guilty of treason, and that you are not satisfied in your conscience to pass the bill. This bringeth me in a very great strait. There is before me the ruin of my children and family, hitherto untouched, in all the branches of it, with any foul crime: here are before me the many ills which may befall your sacred person and the whole kingdom. should yourself and parliament pass less satisfied one with the other than is necessary for the preservation both of king and people: here are before me the things most valued, most feared, by mortal men—life or death. To say, sir, that there hath not been a strife in me were to make me less man than, God knoweth, my infirmities make me; and to call a destruction upon myself and young children (where the intentions of my heart at least have been innocent of this great offense), it may be believed, will find no easy consent from flesh and blood. But with much sadness I am come to a resolution of that which I take to be best becoming me, and to look upon it as that which is most principal in itself, which doubtless is the prosperity of your sacred person and the commonwealth—things infinitely before any private man's interest. And, therefore, in few words, as I put myself wholly upon the honor and justice of my peers, so clearly as to wish your majesty might please to have spared that declaration of your's on Saturday last, and entirely to have left me to their lordships; so now, to set your majesty's conscience at liberty, I do most humbly beseech your majesty for prevention of evils which may happen by your refusal to pass this bill; and by this means to remove (praised be God), I can not say this accursed (but I confess), this unfortunate thing, forth of the way toward that blessed agreement, which God, I trust, shall ever establish between you and your subjects. Sir, my consent shall more acquit you herein to God than all the world can do beside: to a willing man there is no injury done; and as, by God's grace, I forgive all the world with a calmness and meekness of infinite contentment to my dislodging soul, so, sir, to you I can give the life of this world with all the cheerfulness imaginable, in the just acknowledgment of your exceeding favors; and only beg that, in your goodness, you would vouchsafe to cast your gracious regard upon my poor son and his three sisters, less or more, and no otherwise than as their (in present) unfortunate father may hereafter appear more or less guilty of his death. God long preserve your majesty.

[1] We here follow Whitelock, who was one of the managers of the trial for the Commons. Ratcliffe says, that the 15th article and the 23d, containing the advice to bring the Irish army into England, and perhaps one more, were voted by the Lords to be proved, but, as his memory might deceive him he refers to the Journals. Unfortunately the Journals give no information, for, after the Restoration, the proceedings were erased. Rushworth says, simply, that the Lords passed the bill of attainder; and, whatever the articles were upon which their lordships decided, it is certain that they passed the bill as it came up to them from the Commons, without any alteration. May, another good authority, confirms the statement of Whitelock, saying, distinctly, "The Lords voted him guilty of high treason upon the 15th article, for levying of money in Ireland by force of arms; and upon the 19th, for imposing an oath upon the subjects of Ireland."

"Your majesty's most faithful and humble subject and servant,

"Strafford."

Some writers are of opinion that, in writing this letter, Strafford was heroically sincere; that the prisoner was willing to throw off his afflicted mortal coil, and that his life should be a peace-offering: but we confess we can not entertain this notion, but are rather inclined to regard the letter as having been written to work upon the feelings of the king, who might probably have been expected to use it as he had used the letter of Goodman (which had saved that priest's life), and without any intention or expectation on the part of Strafford that his life should be sacrificed by his master. One of the best of cotemporary authorities we have to follow says, that the king sent Carleton to the prisoner to acquaint him with what he had done, and the motives of it, especially the earl's own consent to die; that Strafford then seriously asked whether his majesty had passed the bill or not,—"as not believing, without some astonishment, that the king would have done it,"—and that, being again assured that the bill was really passed, he rose from his chair, lifted up his eyes to heaven, laid his hand upon his heart, and said, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men, for in them there is no salvation."[1]

Two days after the fatal Saturday, on Monday, the 10th of May, the commission empowering the Earl of Arundel (the lord privy seal) and two other lords to give the royal assent to the bill for the execution of the Earl of Strafford upon the Wednesday following passed the great seal; and the Commons were sent for to the Lords, to be present at the giving the royal assent to that bill, and to the bill for doing away with the prerogative of dissolving parliament. And on the same day Charles sent to inform both Houses that the Irish army, which had caused so great an alarm, should be instantly disbanded; in return for which gracious message the Commons assured Charles that they would make him a glorious potentate and as rich a prince as any of his predecessors, "his majesty continuing still to take the advice of his great council, the parliament, in the management of the great affairs of the kingdom." On the morrow, the 11th of May, only one day before that fixed for the execution, Charles sent a letter to the Lords by the hands of the young Prince of Wales. The royal breast must have been occupied by greater fears than ever—Charles must have been selfishly indifferent by this time to the fate of his satellite; for it is scarcely possible to conceive a more trembling and miserable petition for mercy, and the concluding words made the doom of death prominent, and, as it were, inevitable.

"My lords,—I did yesterday satisfy the justice of the kingdom by passing the bill of attainder against the Earl of Strafford; but, mercy being as inherent and inseparable to a king as justice, I desire at this time in some measure to show that likewise, by suffering that unfortunate man to fulfill the natural course of his life in a close imprisonment; yet so, if ever he make the least offer to escape, or offer directly or indirectly to meddle in any sort of public business, especially with me, either by message or letter, it shall cost him his life, without further process: this, if it may be done without the discontentment of my people, will be an unspeakable contentment to me; to which end, as in the first place, I by this letter do earnestly desire your approbation, and, to endear it more, have chosen him to carry it that of all your House is most dear to me; so I desire that, by a conference, you will endeavor to give the House of Commons contentment, assuring you that the exercise of mercy is no more pleasing to me than to see both Houses of parliament consent for my sake that I should moderate the severity of the law in so important a case. I will not say that your complying with me in this my intended mercy shall make me more willing, but certainly 'twill make me more cheerful, in granting your just grievances. But, if no less than his life can satisfy my people, I must say, 'fiat justitia.' Thus, again, recommending the consideration of my intention to you, I rest,

"Your unalterable and affectionate friend,

"Charles R.

"Postscript.—If he must die. it were charity to reprieve him till Saturday."

By this strange postscript Charles indeed manifestly surrendered Strafford, and gave the Lords cause to suspect that he was doing something for decency but nothing in earnest. The contemptible letter was twice read in the Upper House, and after "serious and sad consideration," twelve peers were sent to tell the king that neither of the two intentions expressed in the letter could, with duty in them, or without danger to himself, the queen, and all the young princes, possibly be advised. Without permitting the twelve noble messengers to use any more words, Charles said, "What I intended by my letter was with an 'if' it might be done with contentment of my people. If that can not be," he added, "I say again fiat justitia! My other intention, proceeding out of charity for a few days respit, was, upon certain information that his estate was so distracted that it necessarily required some few days for settlement." To this the lords replied, that it was their purpose to be suitors to his majesty, that favor might be showed to Strafford's innocent children, and that if the prisoner had made any provision for them the same might hold.[1] Then Charles turned away from the lords who stayed him to offer into his hands the letter which he had just sent to them. "My lords," said Charles, "what I have written to you I shall be content it be registered by you in your House: in it you see my mind, I hope you will use it to my honor." The next day was the fatal Wednesday. During the preceding night, the last of his stormy career, Strafford received the visit of Archbishop Usher, whom he requested to go to his old friend and now fellow-prisoner Laud, and beg him to lend him his prayers that night, and give him his blessing when he should go abroad on the morrow. He tried hard to obtain a personal interview with the fallen "summus pontifex," but this was denied him by the unrelenting Lieutenant of the Tower. "Master lieutenant," said he, "you shall hear what passes betwixt us: this is not a time either for him to plot heresy or for me to plot treason." Balfour replied, that his orders were strict, and that the prisoner might petition parliament for that favor. "No," said Strafford, "I have gotten my dispatch from them, and will trouble them no more. I am now petitioning a higher court, where neither partiality can be expected, nor error feared." On the morrow morning, when he came forth to die, he said, as he drew near to that part of the Tower where the archbishop was confined, "Master lieutenant, though I do not see the archbishop, give me leave to do my last observance toward his rooms." But in the mean time Laud, advertised of his approach, came up to the window. Then the earl bowed himself to the ground, and said, "My lord, your prayers and your blessing." The archbishop lifted up his hands and bestowed both, but overcome with grief he fell to the ground, and the procession moved onward. But after he had proceeded a little farther, Strafford bent himself a second time, and said, "Farewell, my lord; God protect your innocence." As in other memorable cases, death was less dreadful when near than when at a distance. According to the laborious Rushworth, the clerk of the parliament, and one of the innumerable eye-witnesses, he marched toward the scaffold upon Tower Hill more like a general at the head of an army than like a condemned man. At the Tower gate the lieutenant desired him to take coach, lest the people should push in upon him and tear him to pieces. "No, master lieutenant," said he, "I dare look death in the face, and I hope, the people too. Have you a care that I do not escape, and I care not how I die, whether by the hand of the executioner or the madness and fury of the people: if that may give them better content, it is all one to me." He was attended upon the scaffold by Archbishop Usher, the Earl of Cleveland, and his brother, Sir George Wentworth; and other friends were present to take their last leave. The multitude collected to see him die was estimated at 100,000 men, women, and children; but all preserved a respectful and awe-struck silence. He had prepared the heads of a speech, which he now delivered.[1] He said, that he was come to submit to the judgment passed against him; that he did submit with a quiet and contented mind, freely forgiving all the world. His conscience, he said, bore him witness that he was innocent, although it was his ill-hap to be misconstrued. He added,—and the words, with the time, place, and occasion, carried a solemn weight with them like the voice of a holy oracle,—"One thing I desire to be heard in, and do hope that for Christian charity sake I shall be believed: I was so far from being against parliament, that I did always think parliaments in England to be the happy constitution of the kingdom and nation, and the best means, under God, to make the king and people happy." He then said a few affectionate words about his fourth wife and his children, took off his doublet, did up his hair with his own hands, put on a white cap and laid his head upon the block. The executioner severed his neck at one blow, and holding up the bleeding head toward the people, cried, "God save the king." The people scarcely believed what they saw; they shouted not, they gave way to no malignant or triumphant feelings; but in the evening they testified their joy and satisfaction by lighting bonfires in the streets.[2]

The advancing spirit of mildness and mercy, the dislike of blood and all capital punishments which is now entertained by all enlightened and thinking persons (our fathers were strangers to it—the feeling was hardly known, even among the best and wisest, two centuries ago), would of itself lead us to disapprove of the execution of Strafford, although we feel perfectly convinced that that proud, and daring, and unscrupulous minister was a systematic and most dangerous enemy to the liberties of his country. This is proved by his correspondence, which has since been brought to light, and to which we have repeatedly referred. But that correspondence was little known at the time of the trial; it was not produced in evidence, nor would the production of it have established the fact of active and overt treason; and it has been doubted by a numerous class of writers, whether any evidence that was brought against him, or all that evidence put together, could convict him of absolute treason, except through a dangerous latitude of construction. Some allowance, however, is to be made for the vices of the judicature of those times, when men's minds were still familiar with the arbitrary treason-processes of Henry VIII., of Edward VI., of Elizabeth, and James, and the evidence which, to us, seems to fall short of high treason, might, in the apprehension of that age, bear a very different weight and interpretation. It should, moreover, always be remembered that the Commons had fully made up their minds never to believe or trust the king, that the revolution had begun, that the attainder was a revolutionary measure, deemed necessary by many good and great men,—"by the greatest geniuses for government the world ever saw embarked together in one common cause,"[1]—who held that there would be no safety for the country while Strafford breathed. We almost blush at this exaggerated tribute paid to the might of one man, at the notion of a nation—and it was then a nation of enthusiasts—standing in dread of a single, disgraced, and fallen minister; but we can believe the feeling to have been perfectly sincere on the part of those who professed it. We are strangers in our hearts to the violence with which the question has been agitated by either party; we feel that Strafford should not have been put to death; but at the same we detest many things in the man's life and character, and make large allowances for that majority of the Commons of England who sent him to the scaffold—a majority which consisted of by far the most respectable portion of the House, which included those patriots to whom the nation is forever indebted.[2] But whatever may have been the irregularity of the Commons' proceedings, the infamous baseness of the king in delivering up the minister, who in all things had acted in strict accordance with his will, stands out in such glaring colors as to soften and obscure all the other harsh features of the transaction. Throughout Europe there was but one opinion, and it was an opinion withering and fatal to the character of Charles, who should have gone to the same scaffold rather than have given Strafford up.

[1] Almost immediately after the execution the Commons passed a bill relieving Strafford's issue from all consequences of the attainder.

[1] This paper was picked up on the scaffold after his head had fallen.

[2] Rushworth.—Nalson.—May.—Sir Philip Warwick says, "And to show how mad this whole people were, especially in and about this then brutish and bloody city (London), in the evening of the day wherein he was executed, the greatest demonstration of joy that possibly could be expressed ran through the whole town and countries hereabout; and many that came up to town on purpose to see the execution, rode in triumph back, waving their hats and with all expressions of joy, through every town they went, crying, 'His head is off; his head is off!' and in many places committing insolences upon, and breaking the windows of, those persons who would not solemnize this festival with a bonfire; so ignorant and brutish is a multitude."

The death of Strafford completed the panic among the old placemen, most of whom now abandoned office in the hope of escaping impeachment. St. John had already been made attorney-general, and one of his first offices as such had been to drive on the trial of the great earl. On the 17th of May, the Lord Cottington gave up his place as master of the wards, which was conferred upon the puritanic and patriotic Lord Saye. The Marquis of Hertford was made governor to the prince, the Earl of Essex lord chamberlain, and the Earl of Leicester, another nobleman of the popular party, was made lord lieutenant of Ireland. All these men were strong in the confidence of the House of Commons; but, from their first moment of entering upon office, they were intolerable to the king, who never trusted them, and who pursued so many by-paths with them, that they ended (possibly they had begun) by never trusting him. It has been conjectured that a different line of conduct on the part of Charles, and an honest confidence between the king and these ministers, might yet have secured the country from revolution and war: but it was idle to expect any thing of the kind from the confirmed character and habits of the wretched prince: and it may be at least doubted whether any concession or conciliation could stop the onward march of that revolution, which had, in fact, begun with the trial, or at latest with the bill of attainder against Strafford. The new ministry, however, gave a new spirit to the Upper House, and the Lords, who, for some time, had been as timid as the old placemen, boldly threw out two bills sent up to them by the Commons, one to exclude the bishops from sitting in parliament, the other about a new form of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. On the 22d of June the Commons presented to the king their grant of tunnage and poundage, which he now accepted as a gift from his people. Six subsidies had also been voted. Three other acts were likewise presented, one imposing a poll-tax for the defraying the charges of the armies, the second and third putting down forever the High Commission Court and the detestable Star Chamber, which had, in fact, both fallen into decrepitude at the opening of the present parliament. On the 2d of July, Charles gave his assent to the poll-tax bill, probably hoping that it would disgust the people, and turn them against their new legislators or rulers; but he demurred upon the other two acts. The Commons voted that he should pass all three, or none at all; and Charles, alarmed at their tone, on the 5th of July passed the other two also. "Many of the courtiers," says May, "and the nearest servants about the king, were very sorry that his majesty, seeing that he passed those two bills so soon after, had not freely done it at the same time with the poll-money; because it might be thought an unwillingness in him, and that his heart (which was then feared) did not perfectly concur with his people's desires; whereby much of the thanks, which so great a grace, freely and forwardly expressed, might have deserved, did seem in a manner lost." Charles, in passing the bills abolishing the two strongholds and laboratories tyranny and oppression, alluded to the reports of discontent, and expressed his surprise that two things of so great importance should have been expected from him without an allowance of time to consider of them; and he reminded the Commons of the great things he had already done this parliament, as granting that the judges hereafter should hold their places during good behavior; limiting the forest laws; taking away ship-money; establishing the subjects' property in tunnage and poundage; granting triennial parliaments, &c. The Commons replied to all this with compliments, but they knew that all these concessions had been wrung from him against the very grain of his heart.

[2] The readers of Clarendon may find their admiration cooled for his pathetic narrative of Strafford's death, when they know that the noble historian (then Mr. Hyde) took an active part, not merely in the original prosecution, but in the act of attainder, and that it is at least negatively proved that he voted with the majority for the earl's death. The minority of fifty-nine members who voted against the bill of attainder were publicly placarded, as we have seen, as Straffordians. The list has been preserved in many books: the name of the great Selden is in it, but not the name of Edward Hyde.

The important events which we have had to condense have carried us over some family incidents which were far from being of insignificant moment. In the autumn of 1638, the intriguing, turbulent, conscienceless, Mary de Medicis, queen-dowager of France, and mother to Henrietta Maria, arrived in England, and was conducted in great state through London. Cardinal Richelieu, after a hard contest, had driven her out of France with disgrace and in poverty. Her daughter, the Queen of Spain, could not, or would not, grant her an asylum: the Queen of England had more filial tenderness, or more power, and after long entreaties she prevailed upon Charles to receive and maintain her. The country, the religion, the manners of this royal refugee, all rendered her obnoxious to the people. The sailors who brought her over called the equinoctial gales which raged during her passage "queen-mother-weather;" and popular superstition connected the coming of the papist and idolatress with a pestilence that was then raging. Nor were these prejudices removed by the liberality of the king, who granted her an enormous pension and a patent or monopoly upon leather.[1]

[1] Her allowance is stated to have been as high as £100 per diem.

Whenever the popular excitement was great, Mary de Medicis and her train of priests came in for a large share of abuse. At the time when Charles passed the bill of attainder against Strafford, her case was brought before the House of Commons, which was informed that she was terrified at the great crowds and tumults, and therefore desired a guard for her security. The Commons, saying that they were bound in honor not to suffer any violence to be done to her, referred the business to a committee to consider what was best to be done. Mr. Henry Martin reported that the committee had agreed to provide for her safety by all good ways and means; being, however, of opinion that the best thing she could do was to be gone out of England as the said means might possibly prove ineffectual for her protection; he moved that, therefore, the House would entreat the Lords to join with them in a petition to his majesty that the queen-mother might be moved to depart the kingdom, the rather for the quieting those jealousies in the hearts of his majesty's well-affected subjects, occasioned by some ill instruments about the queen's person, by the flocking of priests and papists to her house, and by the use and practice of the idolatry of the mass.[1] Charles, however, held out; but Mary de Medicis was made restless and wretched by constant alarms, and soon showed that she was more anxious to leave England than ever she had been to come to it. The only thing that was wanting was money for her journey, and the Commons gladly voted her £10,000 out of the poll-tax. In the month of July she took her departure, to become again a homeless wanderer; but she did not wander far, dying at Cologne shortly after. The pompous Earl of Arundel, the premier peer, the first nobleman of England, disgusted with the abolition of his marshal's court, and discerning that the repose of his country was like to be disturbed, took the opportunity of getting himself appointed to escort the queen-mother on her journey; and he presently proceeded to Italy, where he forgot his native land and its troubles in the pursuit of arts and antiquities, and where, according to Clarendon, he died with the same doubtful character as to religion in which he had lived. To the honor of the English nobility his was almost a solitary case: the rest stayed to brave the tempest, to fight for their principles of loyalty or of patriotism.

Henrietta Maria would gladly have accompanied her expelled mother, for she, too, was irritated to madness by the abolition or restriction of so much of the royal prerogative; and it might be, as was strongly suspected, that she was also eager to go in quest of foreign aid to restore the absolute sovereignty. Knowing that to depart the land without their permission would be dangerous or impracticable, she desired the House of Commons to allow her to go to Spa, for the recovery of her health, which she alledged was much impaired "by some discontents of mind, and false rumors and libels spread concerning her." The Commons desired a conference with the Lords, who agreed with them to desire his majesty to persuade her to put off that journey abroad. A committee of both Houses waited upon Charles in the Banqueting House, and presented their considerations against her majesty's going. These considerations were founded upon "the great activity observed among English papists in foreign countries; on the great quantity of treasure in jewels, plate, and ready money packed up to be conveyed away by the queen; on the dishonor to the nation, if her majesty should, at this unseasonable time, go out of the kingdom upon any grief or discontent received there," &c.[1] Charles pretended to be well satisfied with these considerations, and the queen soon after sent a message to both Houses to thank them for their care of her health, which alone could have make her resolve upon this journey; to assure them that she would serve the king and kingdom at the hazard of her life; and to express a hope that they believed her to have so much interest in the good of this kingdom, that she could never wish any thing to the prejudice of it. And, for the present no more was said about her majesty's journey.

On the 4th of August, Sergeant Wild, in the name of the Commons of England, presented at the bar of the Upper House charges of impeachment against thirteen bishops[1] who had been most active in pursuing Laud's system, and who were especially charged with contriving, making, and promulgating, in the late convocation, several constitutions and canons ecclesiastical, contrary to the king's prerogative, the laws of the realm, the rights of parliament, and the properties and liberties of the people. By this measure, though the bill for depriving prelates of their seats had been lost, thirteen bishops were kept away from parliament.

The Scottish Covenanters, on the whole, had had a very comfortable time of it in the north of England: it had been for the interest of the Commons to keep them well supplied with money, and to administer to their comforts in other respects. The military duty was light, allowing an abundance of time for preaching and praying; and the English people had before, or they then contracted, an affection for the Calvinistic doctrine, which went far to subdue their old antipathies against the Scots. As long as the royal army was kept on foot at York, the parliament considered it unsafe to permit the departure of Leslie's army; and it was very easy for them to prolong the negotiations: but at length, in the beginning of August, the treaty of pacification was concluded—Charles agreeing, not merely to disband his army at York, but also to withdraw the strong garrisons which he had thrown into Berwick and Carlisle. He also gave an amnesty to the Scotch, and pledged himself in the most solemn manner to injure or molest no man for what was past. The Scots obtained the security of the English parliament for payment of a balance of £220,000 of the "brotherly assistance," and "with store of English money and spoils, and the best entertainment, they left their warm and plentiful quarters" —not, however, until Leslie had seen that Charles's army was really disbanding.[2] During the negotiations, Charles had offered to go into Scotland, and to meet the Scottish parliament for the better settlement of sundry matters; and as early as the month of June he had announced his intention of making this journey. But it in no way suited the English parliament to let him go at this moment, nor could his utmost efforts obtain their permission until the 10th of August. There was a great variety of opinion, and on all sides, about this

[1] The Commons said, "Because we understand, by Sir Theodore Mayern, that the chief cause of her majesty's sickness and distemper proceeds from the discontent of her mind, the House of Commons hath thought good to declare that, if any thing within the power of parliament may give her majesty contentment, they are so tender of her health, both in due respect of his most excellent majesty and herself, that they will be ready to further her satisfaction in all things, so far as may stand with the public good, to which they are obliged."—Rushworth.

[1] They were Winchester, Coventry, Gloucester, Exeter, St. Asaph, Bath and Wells, Hereford, Ely, Bangor, Bristol, Rochester, Peterborough, and Llandaff; and the name of William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, was put at the end of the list. The Commons did not forget to take notice of their bribes to the king. They said, in their impeachment, "And to add more weight and efficacy to this their monstrous design, they did, at the same synod, under a specious and fair title, grant a benevolence or contribution to his majesty, to be paid by the clergy of that province, contrary to law."

[2] On the conclusion of the treaty, the Earl of Bristol said in the Lords, "that he had something to deliver concerning the treaty of Ripon, of the reasons which moved those commissioners to agree unto it; and, though it might not be accounted so full of glory and honor to this nation as the like had been in former times, yet, considering the strait that some persons have put this kingdom into, he said it was a happy conclusion, both for the king and kingdom; but it had cost this kingdom £1,100,000, beside damages; and desired that some writing might be drawn concerning this treaty for satisfaction to posterity of the carriage of this business."—Rushworth.

expedition. Old Bishop Williams, now in favor, and consulted by Charles on account of his sagacity and proficiency in manœuver and intrigue, advised him to take heed of the Scots, who would be sure to discover to the English Commons any overtures he might make to them; and he told his majesty that he would do better to stay by Westminster, and corrupt or inveigle the English House of Commons. On the other side the popular party considered the journey as rife with danger and intrigue; and some of them, even at the last moment, would have prevented it. They desired the king to appoint a regent during his absence; but Charles got over this difficulty by naming commissioners, and, having given the command of all the forces on this side Trent to the popular Earl of Essex, he got into his carriage ruminating deep things, being attended by none in the coach but by his nephew, Charles Louis Elector Palatine, who had got out of Richelieu's clutches, by his cousin the Duke of Lennox, created Duke of Richmond, and by the Marquis of Hamilton. He had not been gone a week when the Earl of Holland, formerly the queen's favorite, but now irritated against her and the whole court, sent a letter to the House of Peers "with some obscure words, as if there were new practices and designs against the parliament." The Lords imparted the contents of the letter to the Commons, who forthwith appointed commissioners to go into Scotland, ostensibly to superintend the ratification of the recent treaty, but in reality to keep watch over the king, and, in the language of their instructions, "to certify the parliament from time to time of their proceedings, and of all occurrences which shall concern the good of this kingdom." The persons appointed for these delicate offices were, the Earl of Bedford, Edward Lord Howard, Nathaniel Fiennes, Sir William Armyne, Sir Philip Stapleton, and Mr. Hampden; and a draft of a commission was sent after the king for him to sign, empowering the said commissioners to treat, confer, and conclude with such commissioners as should be named by the Scottish parliament. Charles, very anxious to avoid this surveillance, refused to sign the commission, and told the English parliament that he did so because the treaty was already ratified by the parliament of Scotland. "This commission," said his majesty, "would beget new matter, and be a means to detain his majesty longer than he intended." The Scottish army was over the Tweed, and the lord-general had almost disbanded all the English army; and therefore his majesty saw no necessity for such commission, yet, in the end, was pleased to give leave to the members named to come and attend him in Scotland, &c. This answer was not written till the 25th of August. For reasons not explained, the Earl of Bedford did not go, but Lord Howard, Mr. Hampden, and the rest, hastened into Scotland to make sure of a good understanding with the parliament there.[1]

In the mean time the king had made a pleasant journey, and met with a kind reception. He dined with Leslie in his camp, caressed that old soldier of fortune, and endeavored to corrupt his officers.[1] At Edinburgh, bowing to the prevalent intolerance, and forgetting his own, and the lessons of Laud, he listened with an approving countenance to the Presbyterian preachers, and outwardly conformed to their simple or bare ceremonies. It was a curious, and, for him, a humiliating sight! The Scots could hardly forget how, a few months before, he had endeavored to drive them from that worship by cannon-balls. And as it seemed necessary for the king of the Presbyterian Scots to have a Presbyterian chaplain, Charles appointed to that office Alexander Henderson, the man who had had a principal hand in overthrowing the bishops and writing the bond of the covenant.[2] At the same time, so far from showing any ill will toward the chiefs of the Covenanters, he treated them all, whether lay or clergy, nobles or burghers, with a great show of respect and even affection. Some he gratified with titles, some with employment, all with promises. In his opening speech to the parliament, he declared that affection for his native land had brought him hither, where he hoped to remedy all jealousies and distractions; and he engaged cheerfully to fulfill all that had been stipulated in the treaty. He reminded them, however, of his ancient descent, and of the rights and high standing which that circumstance ought to give him. Not looking at history with a critical eye, which would have upset the fact, and shortened his genealogy, he told them that he claimed their allegiance as the descendant of one hundred and eight Scottish kings; and he offered to ratify the acts of their last session in the old form by the touch of his scepter. The Covenanters, not much moved by the oratorical part of the address, told him that the acts of the Scottish parliament were valid without any such assent.

In consequence of the death or the prosecution of the incendiaries, as Charles's former ministers were called, the chief offices of the state were vacant; and parliament claimed the right of appointment to the places, or at least insisted that they should not be filled except by their advice. Charles struggled hard to save this last or only remaining prerogative in Scotland: but the Covenanters, and the Scottish nation in general, were not only suspicious of the king's appointments, but anxious to keep their government independent of the [1] Among their instructions were these three important clauses:—"4. To clear the proceedings of the parliament of England toward the parliament of Scotland, if they shall find any false reports which may breed a misconstruction between both kingdoms. 5. To assure them of the good affection of the parliament of England in all things, so far as concerns the service of his majesty, and peace and prosperity of both nations. 8. That they proceed not in the treaty with the parliament of Scotland till warrant and commission be sent down unto his majesty, by a messenger of purpose, and return with the warrant to pass the Commons, under the great seal of England.

[1] Leslie himself was a man not very likely to fall into the trap Some time before he had expressed to a friend his sense of Charles's good intentions toward him. "His majesty," said he, "with all reverence would see me hanged." And then the old campaigner referred to his easy means of living well elsewhere. "Last of all," said he, "I can live abroad, and get preferment with honor."—Dalrymple, Memorials.

cabinet of St. James's, to which it had been subservient—occasionally to the detriment of Scottish interests and national honor—ever since James had succeeded to the throne of Elizabeth; and they opposed with all their might the assumption of the prerogative. There was, however, one gleam of comfort for the king in this long struggle about offices; he saw many noble Scots so fiercely bent on the obtaining of places for themselves, that he fancied they must break out into feuds and parties, some of which might yet rally round him. According to an eye-witness, he promised on all sides, and granted, at least in words, whatever was asked. "What will be the event of these things," says the same observer, "God knows; for there was never king so much insulted over. It would pity any man's heart to see how he looks; for he is never at quiet among them, and glad he is when he sees any man that he thinks loves him; yet he is seeming merry at meat." What gave the Covenanters a great power in driving for the parliament's nomination to the state-offices was this,—they held in their hands the incendiaries, whom they threatened with condign punishment; and the king was anxious to save the lives of these old servants. In the end the parties came to an accommodation; the Covenanting leaders in parliament agreed to reduce the number of incendiaries to five, to release the incendiaries and plotters from prison, and to refer their trial to a committee, their sentence to the king; and Charles agreed that the appointment of ministers, judges, and privy-councilors should be by and with the approbation of the estates while parliament was sitting, and of the privy-council when it was adjourned or dissolved. But still the matter was far from being settled: Argyle, the great champion of the Covenant, desired the post of chancellor; Charles preferred giving it to Loudon, whom he had committed to the Tower for the famous letter "Au Roi." While the discontent was great, and intrigue in full activity, there happened what Scottish historians significantly call "The Incident." Argyle, who was feared and detested by the king, and Hamilton, who had incurred the royal suspicion ever since he had consented to play that double part with the Covenanters, which Charles had put upon him as a proof of his loyalty and affection, were the most powerful men in the Scottish parliament. If they could be crushed the king might yet raise his head—or so he fondly fancied. There was a third noble Scot involved in "the incident" —a man far more remarkable than the former two: this was the brave, adroit, and unprincipled Earl of Montrose, who had already been, by turns, courtier and Covenanter, and then king's man again. He had marched into England with the army of Leslie; he had enjoyed, as we have seen, the entire confidence of the Covenanters; he had been appointed one of their commissioners to treat with the king at Ripon and York; and, in the latter place, he had been won over by the graces, the arts, and promises of Charles to betray his colleagues. It was agreed between them that Montrose, in order to be more useful, should continue to play the part of a zealous Covenanter. Charles, with all his cunning, was at times very careless: he kept in his pocket, at York, a letter, in which Montrose engaged to do his service; and this letter was stolen out of his pocket, copied, and sent to the Covenanters. Whitelock says, that this was done by Hamilton. While Montrose had time he assured the king by letter that there were men in Scotland who, if supported by his majesty's presence, would both make and prove a charge of treason against Hamilton and Argyle; but he and some of his associates were soon arrested, and committed to the castle of Edinburgh as plotters and banders. It was observed, however, that Charles did not treat Hamilton with his former respect or favor; and one day the Lord Kerr sent him a charge of treason. Hamilton appealed to the parliament, which declared him innocent, and compelled Kerr to make an apology. Montrose, from his dungeon, found means of communicating with the king, and he repeated his charges against Hamilton and Argyle; and, according to Clarendon, who does not appear to have been much shocked at the proposal, "frankly undertook" to make away with them both.[1] About a fortnight after this Hamilton was warned of a plot to have him seized, as he entered the presence-chamber, by an armed band, under the command of the Earl of Crawford—the man who had carried to him Kerr's challenge of treason, and who was to convey him and his brother Lanark, and the Earl of Argyle, on board a king's ship which was lying in Leith roads, or to kill them in case of resistance or difficulty. Hamilton had time to communicate with his friends; and then he, his brother, and Argyle secured themselves as well as they could, and their associates in Edinburgh fortified their houses, and spread the alarm among the citizens, who flew to arms, and paraded the streets all night. On the following morning Hamilton and the other noblemen wrote to inform his majesty of the reasons of their absenting themselves the preceding night from court, and desired to know what his majesty would be pleased to command them to do: but Charles was not satisfied with their letters; and in the afternoon he proceeded to the parliament-house with near "five hundred soldiers, and the worst affected men about him, with their arms in a menacing way." "To prevent tumult in the streets," says Lanark, "we resolved to leave the town, which could not have been shunned if we had gone to the parliament-house with our friends at our backs, who would by no means condescend to leave us."[2] "The king's array," Baillie writes, "broke in near-hand to the parliament's outer hall. The states were mightily offended, and would not be pacified till Leslie had got a commission, very absolute, to guard the parliament, with all the bands of the city and regiments yet on foot, and some troops of horse."

[1] Clarendon says, that Montrose informed the king of many particulars from the beginning of the rebellion; and that the Marquis of Hamilton was no less faulty and false toward his majesty than Argyle, and offered to make proof of all in the parliament; but rather desired to have them both made away, which he frankly undertook to do: "but the king abhorred that expedient, though, for his own security, he advised that the proofs might be prepared for the parliament."—Hist.

Charles complained of the absence of the three noblemen, and of the vile slander which their needless flight and fear had brought upon him. "He professed to detest all such vile treacheries as were spoken of; urged a present trial, in face of parliament, for the more clearing of his innocency."[1] The states hesitated, and proposed the appointing of a committee for a more accurate trial in private than could have been had in public. It has been asserted that the objection to a public investigation was, that the king's presence would overawe the freedom of inquiry; but it should seem to us that the humbled king had then little power to overawe any body in Scotland. The parliament made fast the Earl of Crawford, Colonel Cochrane, and Colonel Stewart, who were accused of being the principal instruments in the plot; and the king departed dissatisfied. But, for several days, Charles repeated his demand for a public trial, even shedding tears to obtain it; but the more popular party insisted on a private investigation; and Charles was at last obliged to give up the point to a committee. "Many evil-favored things," says Baillie, "were found; yet in the papers that went abroad we found nothing that touched the king." The investigation was so secret in all respects that no records or reports of its proceedings have been preserved, and, together with the rest of the story of "the incident," it still remains an historical mystery. The end of it was, that, after some two or three weeks absence, upon the king's and parliament's letters, the fugitive lords returned, and at once seemed to have as much of the king's confidence as ever. "Sure," says Baillie, "their late danger was the means to increase their favor with the parliament; so, whatever ruling they had before, it was then multiplied." Shortly after Hamilton was made a duke, and Argyle a marquis.[1]

But, after this satisfactory adjustment was brought about, "the incident" produced great suspicions and stirs in London. The English parliament, which had sat for eleven months, adjourned from the 9th of September to the 20th of October, taking care, however, to leave a standing committee of both Houses to act during the short recess. On the appointed day the Houses met again; and the Lords, observing Palace-yard to be full of armed men, moved to know the reason thereof. The Earl of Essex, captain-general of the South, signified to their lordships that the committee of the House of Commons which sat during the recess had desired that there might be a guard of soldiers set about the parliament, to prevent the insolence and affronts of the disbanded soldiers about town, and to secure the Houses against other designs which they had reason to suspect. In effect, Lord Howard, Hampden, and the other parliamentary commissioners sent into Scotland, had instantly communicated the affair of "the incident," and this was interpreted into a vast conspiracy, which was to embrace the three kingdoms, and which was, as usual, denominated a plot of the papists. And thereupon the Commons had sent to the lord mayor to secure the city of London, and had required the justices of Middlesex and Surrey to obey such orders as the Earl of Essex might think fit to give them for the public safety. Now they desired a conference with the Lords, to express their sense of the great danger to the nation from a conspiracy with many ramifications, and from the old design of seducing the English army. The Lords, in conference, fully agreed with the Commons, and thereupon new instructions were sent down to Howard and Hampden, and their brother-commissioners. Those gentlemen were desired to acquaint his majesty that both Houses had duly considered the late tumultuous design, affirmed to be undertaken by the Earl of Crawford and others, against the persons of the Marquis of Hamilton and the earls of Argyle and Lanark, and that they had cause to doubt that such ill-affected persons as would disturb the peace of that kingdom were not without their malicious correspondents in England. They were also to declare to his most excellent majesty, that the English parliament held it a great matter of importance

"Upon tha second of this current, General Leslie sent to the Parliament House, to desire my brother and the Earl of Argyle, before their return to court, to come and speak with him at his house with as great privacy as could be, which they did; and with him they found one Lieutenant Colonel Hurrie, to whom the general said my brother and Argyle were much obliged, and desired Hurrie to acquaint them with that particular which he had already discovered to him; which Hurrie did, and told them that he was informed there was a plot that same night to cut the throats both of Argyle, my brother, and myself. The manner of the doing of it was thus discovered to him by one Captain Stewart, who should have been an actor in it, and it should have been done in the king's withdrawing chamber, where we three should have been called in, as to speak with his majesty about some parliament business; and that immediately two lords should have entered at a door which answers from the garden with two hundred or three hundred men, where they should either hava killed us or carried us aboard a ship of his majesty's which then lay in the road. This was only the deposition of one witness; on which my brother and Argyle would not so far build as to form any accusation, nor yet so far undervalue it as not to labor to bring it to light if any such thing there were. Therefore, my brother, when he spoke to the king, told him only, in general, that he heard there was some plot intended against his life, the particulars whereof he could not then condescend upon, because he could not sufficiently prova it; but thereafter, Captain Stewart being sent to him, confirmed all Hurrie had said in his name: there were likewise great presumptions found from the depositions of one Lieutenant Colonel Hume, and divers others, who had been spoke to, to be in readiness against that night, and promises made to them of making their fortunes if they would assist in a design which was intended. These were motives enough to move my brother and Argyle to look to themselves, and not to return to court that night. They immediately sent thereafter for me (for the hour was near past that this should have been put in execution), who was altogether ignorant of all those passages; and after I had refused four several times to come to them (for I was engaged in some company I was loth to leave), I went, and found them in my brother Lindsay's house, where they acquainted me with every particular; and Captain Stewart and Hurrie, being present, said they would make good their deposition with the hazard of the last drop of their blood."—Letter of Lord Lanark, in Hardwicke State Papers.

[1] Balfour.—Malcolm Laing.—Baillie's Letters.—Hardwicke Papers.—Clarendon, Hist.—It appears that the Scottish Committee of Investigation declared that Hamilton and Argyle were falsely accused by Montrose, and also that they (Hamilton and Argyle) had good reasons for fleeing from Edinburgh. Evelyn says that, subsequently, the English privy council examined the matter, and declared that no imputation could be cast upon the honor of the king for any thing done by himself therein.

that the religion, liberty, and peace of Scotland should be strictly preserved according to the late treaty, and confirmed by act of parliament: and to request the king, as he valued the preservation of three kingdoms, to suppress all such conspirators as should endeavor to disturb the peace of Scotland. And the commissioners were further to represent, that five companies of foot had been detained in Berwick by his majesty's special command, after the time appointed, with consent of parliament, for disbanding the garrisons of Carlisle and Berwick; that six ships had been sent by order of parliament for bringing away his majesty's munition and other provisions in Berwick and in the Holy Island, at a very great charge to the commonwealth; and that the Commons would no longer be answerable, or furnish money for the longer stay and entertainment of those troops, or for the demurrage of the ships sent to bring them away.[1] It was suspected that these five companies had been kept together for the purpose of assisting in the recent plot, by marching suddenly into Edinburgh. But every thing that Charles now did, or left undone, was made an object of doubt and suspicion, and guarded against by the vigilance of the popular party. It seemed to all men a strange circumstance that he should prolong his stay in Scotland, when his presence was so much required in England; and many, both friends and foes, were murmuring at it. He had most of the crown-jewels with him, and it was thought that he had endeavored to bribe some of the Scottish leaders with them—the said jewels to be afterward redeemed by money; and by this time it was known that the great collar of rubies had been conveyed into Holland, and there pawned. General Leslie, who a short time before had expressed his assurance that the king would hang him if he could, was created a Scottish peer, with the title of Earl of Leven. It is said that the soldier of fortune was profuse in his expressions of gratitude, and promised never again to take up the sword against his sacred majesty. One or two other earldoms were conferred on Covenanting leaders; and out of the revenues of the dissolved bishoprics, &c., the king dispensed gratuities to many individuals, including, it is said, his Presbyterian chaplain, Henderson. But presently there came a blast from Ireland, which caused all men to turn their eyes solely to that country.

The Irish people, far more oppressed than ever the Scots had been—for they had been deprived not only of their religious freedom, but of their rights in their own property—were encouraged by the example of the Scots, and the successful issue of that struggle, to contemplate the possibility of a similar victory in their own case over the tyranny that bound them. It was not merely their religion that tempted them—it was also a prospect of recovering the broad acres which they had once possessed, and which were now in the hands of the descendants of the foreign invaders and Protestant colonists. Theirs was a struggle, not merely for the eucharist, but for loaves of bread; and, like all subsequent insurrections in that unhappy country, the territorial question—or whether the Irish or the English and Scotch settlers should occupy the best parts of the kingdom—was prominent, and in itself sufficient to give ferocity to the contest. But then there was certainly superadded the conflicting bigotry, the superstition, the woful ignorance of the masses, which converted them into savages, and made their warfare not a campaign, but a vast butchery. Roger Moore, a gentleman of Kildare, of ancient descent, who saw the patrimony of his ancestors in the hands of English and Scotch settlers, was one of the first and most active agents in the present rising. Within narrower limits Moore had played the part of John of Procida: he had visited most parts of Ireland, and secretly harangued the discontented natives, who generally agreed to rise when called upon. In Ulster, Cornelius Maguire, Baron of Inniskillen, and Sir Phelim O'Neal, who, after the death of the son of Tyrone, became chieftain of his sept, entered with ardor into all the views of Roger Moore; and it was agreed among them to prepare for a general insurrection. At the same time, some of the lords and gentlemen of the pale, and all the Anglo-Irish Protestants, who, though Irishmen born, were English in descent, manners, and religion. rejoiced in the overthrow of Strafford; and their good intelligence with the English parliament, had there been none but Protestants in Ireland, might have advanced the condition of the country. Strafford had held that the best card the king had to play, was the Irish army which he had raised; and Charles had sent instructions (he hoped secret ones) to the earls of Ormond and Antrim, to secure this army, to recruit it, and, if possible, to surprise the castle of Dublin, where they would find ammunition, stores, and arms, for twelve thousand men. But this Irish army, this last card of a desperate gamester, consisted almost entirely of Catholics, and was an object of dread or suspicion, not only to the English parliament, but also to all Irish Protestants. With great difficulty, an order was wrung from the king for the disbanding of this force; but, in remitting the order to Ireland, Charles sent with it a secret message to Ormond and Antrim, to keep as many men together as they possibly could, using their ingenuity to devise pretexts for so doing, and to lull asleep the suspicions of the Protestant Irish. Previously to his departure from Scotland, Charles had signed two bills, one confirming the titles to lands after a sixty years' uninterrupted possession; the other, renouncing all claims on the part of the crown founded on the tyrannical inquisition held in 1638 by Strafford: but the Irish parliament was prorogued a few days before the arrival of these bills, which, therefore, were not passed into laws. As the two bills would have gone far to attach the native Irish to the king, it has been supposed, if not proved, that the Irish ministers—the friends of the English parliament. rather than of Charles—purposely hastened the prorogation. One of the plans hit upon for keeping the Irish troops together was, to pretend that they were to be allowed to enter the service of the Spanish government of Flanders, and regular commissions were sent to certain picked officers to enlist the whole body, as if for the King of Spain. Of the two higher agents, Antrim was the more active: he intrigued with these picked officers, and these officers intrigued with some of the members of the Irish parliament, who were glad to learn that the army was not, in reality, maintained for service abroad, but for the king's service at home. The English, the Scots, had disobliged his majesty: if the Irish could restore him to his former state, what might they not expect from his gratitude? If the Catholic Irish loved their religion, what had they to expect from the parliament of England, which was fiercely Protestant—which denounced the papists at every move they took—which coerced alike the king's prerogative and the conscience of the subject? Appeals like these produced a wonderful effect. In a short time, though their views were different, some of the officers and men were in intelligence with Cornelius Maguire, Sir Phelim O'Neal, and the other chieftains of Ulster, with Roger Moore, and with the converts he had made in all parts. Some intimations were given by Sir William Cole, in a letter to the lords justices of Ireland, Sir William Parsons and Sir John Borlase, concerning dangerous resorts and secret meetings, but no one received any certain notice of the conspiracy till the very eve of its execution. It had been agreed that the plot should take effect upon the 23d of October, when the castle of Dublin should be surprised, a simultaneous assault made along the whole line of the English pale, and all other forts and magazines of arms attacked, and all Protestants that would not join with them cut off. On the 22d, many of the Irish gentry of great quality went into Dublin, but many failed the rendezvous, and, of a forlorn hope appointed to surprise or storm the castle, only eighty men appeared. In the course of that night Hugh MacMahon got drunk in a tavern, and revealed the great design to one Owen O'Connelly, of Irish extraction, but a Protestant, and servant to Sir John Clotworthy, a member of the English parliament. This Owen hastened to reveal what he had heard to Sir William Parsons; and Dublin Castle was saved. But in other parts the bloody rising took place without check or warning, and on the following day, English Protestants fleeing into Dublin, carried the most frightful intelligence. The Ulster chieftains and their associates fell furiously upon the towns: Sir Phelim O'Neal took Charlemont and Dungannon; O'Quin took Mountjoy; M'Ginnis, Newry; and O'Hanlan took Tanderage. No man made head against them; the Protestant settlers were robbed and butchered almost without resistance. No capitulation or agreement signed by the chiefs and officers could rescue them from the fury of the more than half-naked Irish peasantry. The flames spread far and near, and in a few days all the open country in Tyrone, Monaghan, Longford, Leitrim, Fermanagh, Cavan, Donegal, Derry, and part of Down, was in the hands of the insurgents. In the course of a few weeks the English and Scottish colonies seemed to be almost every where uprooted. The Protestants exaggerated their loss, but it still remains certain that the massacre was prodigious. Some royalist writers and most Catholic writers have taken great pains, and have shown great impudence, in reducing the number, and in extenuating the horrors of the massacre. It has been said generally (perhaps falsely), that the Irish priests encouraged the ignorant peasantry in their work of slaughter; and therefore it is, we suppose, that a modern writer of their communion omits all mention of the massacre in the body of his narrative, and in a note seems to hint that there was no massacre at all. Yet nothing but a frightful butchery could have made such an impression, or produced such traditions; and there is most abundant cotemporary evidence to prove that the loss of life, by assassination alone, was immense. The colonists of Ulster, a brave and active set of men, but who were taken completely by surprise, as they were living at the time in seeming good fellowship with the natives, were so reduced in numbers by the first onslaught, that they could make no head for a considerable time after. Sir John Temple,[1] who was at that time master of the rolls and a member of the Irish privy council, describes the insurgents as murdering or stripping and driving out men, women, and children, wherever their force or their cunning prevailed. The Earl of Castlehaven, a Catholic, says, that all the water in the sea could not wash off from the Irish the taint of that rebellion, which began most bloodily on the English in a time of settled peace. Clarendon says that forty or fifty thousand were murdered in the first insurrection; and if, instead of first insurrection, we read during the whole insurrection, that is, from the breaking out, in October, 1641, to the cessation, in September, 1643, this number will not be exaggerated; nor will it include the Protestants who fell in regular warfare, with arms in their hands. "They who escaped best," says Clarendon, "were robbed of all they had, to their very shirts, and so turned naked to endure the sharpness of the season; and by that means, and for want of relief, many thousands of them perished by hunger and cold." Well might the imagination of the horror-stricken Protestants picture the long bridge at Cavan as covered with the ghosts of their murdered friends and kindred![2]

The local government of Dublin was paralyzed with horror and affright. During the night that the discovery was made to them by O'Connelly, they arrested the drunken MacMahon and the Lord Maguire, but the rest of the conspirators escaped out of Dublin. They closed the gates of the city, put the castle in the best possible state of defense, and gave a shelter to the fugitives who came in from all parts, generally wounded and stripped, and leaving their towns and villages wrapped in flames. The conduct of the Irish government at this crisis has been severely criticised by some who have not paid sufficient attention to the tremendous difficulties of their situation. They had no money in the exchequer:[1] arms they had for 10,000 men, nor did they want for ammunition or for artillery; but among the regular soldiers they had hardly ten men they could trust, and they timely and most wisely suspected the fidelity of many of the Catholic lords of the pale, who, by the beginning of December, rose to a man in open rebellion again. As it has been observed by Mr. Hallam, the Catholic party in the Irish House of Commons were so cold in their loyalty, to say the least, that they objected to giving any appellation to the rebels worse than that of "discontented gentlemen."

On the last day of October, O'Connelly "the happy discoverer of the first plot," arrived in London with letters from the lords justices, and gave a full account of all particulars within his knowledge to the House of Lords. The Lords forthwith desired a conference, and the House of Commons resolved that they should forthwith sit in committee to consider of the rebellion in Ireland, and to provide for the safety in England. In committee they voted that £50,000 should presently be provided for the local government, the money to be raised in the city of London upon public security; that a select committee of both Houses should be appointed to consider of the affairs of Ireland; that O'Connelly should be rewarded with £500, in ready money, and an annual pension of £200; that papists of quality in England should be looked after and secured;[2] that none but merchants should be permitted to go over to Ireland without a certificate from the committee of both Houses. The Lords readily agreed in all this. It was also voted, that a pardon should be offered to the insurgents upon their laying down their arms within a given time. This tragical business occupied the House of Commons nearly the whole of the month of November. They showed a rare vigor and alacrity. Within a week they resolved that £200,000 should be set apart for the Irish government; that ships should be provided for guarding the Irish coasts; that 6000 foot and 2000 horse should be raised for the Irish service; that the lord lieuten-

Sir John Temple reckons the number murdered or destroyed in some manner, or expelled out of their habitation in the whole two years, at 300,000, a figure so enormous that it has even been suspected that a cipher has dropped in by mistake in the printing of his account. Sir William Petty sets down the number massacred at 37,000: Warner reduces the number to 12,000; but surely even this is a slaughter not to be spoken of slightingly. The massacre famed through all ages by the name of the Sicilian Vespers, and which in many respects resembled this Irish massacre, did not include 12,000 lives

Parl.

[2] They also resolved that the custody of the isle of Wight should be put into better hands; that the house of Capuchins in London should be suppressed, and the monks sent away; that foreign ambassadors should give up such Catholic priests of the king's subjects as were in their houses; that a list should be brought in of the queen's priests and other servants; and that a proclamation should be issued, commanding all strangers, not of the Protestant religion, to deliver in tickets of their names, and an account of their stay here, &c ant, the Earl of Leicester, should present to both Houses a list of such officers as he thought proper for holding commands; that provisions should be collected at West Chester, to be sent over to Dublin; that magazines of arms, ammunition, and powder should be sent forthwith into Ireland; that a sum of money should be appointed as a reward for such as should bring in the heads of the principal rebels; and that the committee of Irish affairs should consider in what manner this kingdom might make the best use of the friendship and assistance of Scotland in the business of Ireland.

Charles had received the dreadful news in Scotland before O'Connelly arrived in London, the Marquis of Chichester having sent over intelligence from Belfast. In Scotland, as in England, the effect produced was appalling, and in both countries, from the very beginning, the general feeling connected the bloody massacre with the intrigues of the king and queen. Charles produced Chichester's letter in the parliament, still sitting at Edinburgh, and desired their advice and assistance. A committee was forthwith appointed, and the Scots pledged themselves to furnish men and money to their utmost ability. At the same time they opened an active correspondence upon this absorbing subject with the English parliament, not neglecting to affirm that this was a visible rising of Antichrist against the true faith and all that professed it. Charles named the Earl of Ormond lieutenant-general of all his forces in Ireland; and, at last, at the end of November, he took the road for London, where people continued to wonder at his protracted absence. Upon his arrival in the city he was received with some congratulations, and was sumptuously feasted by the citizens; all which led him to hope that he might again be a king indeed. In return he banqueted the citizens at Hampton Court, and knighted several of the aldermen. He instantly took offense at the Houses surrounding themselves with an armed guard. The Earl of Essex acquainted the Lords that he had surrendered his commission of captain-general of the south into his majesty's hands, and therefore could take no further order for these guards. The intelligence was communicated by their lordships to the Commons. Then Charles informed the Houses through the lord keeper, that as he saw no reason for any such guards, it was his royal pleasure that they should be dismissed, hoping that now his presence would be a sufficient protection to them. As soon as this order was communicated to the Commons, they proposed that both Houses should petition the king for the continuance of the guard till they might satisfy his majesty why a guard was necessary. After some dispute the Lords consented, and the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Digby waited upon the king, who thereupon said, that he would command the Earl of Dorset to appoint some of the train-bands, only for a few days, to wait upon both Houses. The Commons, not satisfied, considered the matter in committee, and drew up reasons to prove the necessity of a protection. Those reasons were—1st, the great numbers of disorderly desperate persons, especially Irish, that were lurking about London and Westminster; 2d, the jealousies conceived upon the discovery of a design in Scotland (the incident) to surprise several of the nobles, members of the parliament there, which had been spoken of in London some days before it broke out at Edinburgh, with intimation that the like was intended against divers persons of both Houses here, which was the more credible from the former attempts to bring up the army and overrun and disturb this English parliament; 3d, the conspiracy in Ireland, which had been so secretly managed, that, but for the providential discovery at Dublin, it had been executed in one day throughout that whole kingdom;[1] 4th, the advices received from beyond seas, that there would be great alteration in religion shortly in these kingdoms, and that the necks of both the parliaments in England and Scotland should be broken; 5th, the dangerous speeches of the popish and discontented party; and, 6th, the secret meetings and consultations of the papists in several parts, and their frequent devotions for the prosperity of some great design in hand.[2] They then frankly told the king that they could not trust him with the nomination of the commander of their guard, who must be a person chosen by themselves.

Two days after this, the Commons presented to the king their celebrated "Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom." This paper was brought before the House on the 22d of November. The House had sat from eight o'clock till about noon, the hour at which the members usually retired to dine. Then there was a loud call for the remonstrance. Some would have postponed it, at so late an hour, but Oliver Cromwell, and some others, insisted that they should proceed with it. Oliver Cromwell, who at that time was little taken notice of, asked the Lord Falkland why he would have put it off, for that day would have settled it. Falkland answered, that there would not have been time enough, "for sure it would take some debate." Cromwell replied, "a very sorry one;" for he and his party had calculated that very few would oppose the remonstrance.[3] But Cromwell was disappointed, for there was a formidable opposition, consisting of men who considered the remonstrance as an extreme measure, appealing too openly to the people against the king and government; and so fierce and long was the debate about it, that it took up not only the day, but a good part of the night also; and though the popular party carried it at two o'clock in the morning, it was only by a majority of nine, or, according to another account, of eleven. At the beginning of the debate there was a full House, but before its close many of the members had retired from exhaustion; and hence the decision was compared to the verdict of

[3] Clarendon. This writer thus, not very incorrectly, describes the remonstrance:—"It contained a very bitter representation of all the illegal things which had been done from the first hour of the king's coming to the crown to that minute; with all the sharp reflections which could be made upon the king himself, the queen, and council; and published all the unreasonable jealousies of the present government, of the introducing popery; and all other particulars that might disturb the minds of the people; which were enough discomposed."

a starved jury.[1] So important a trial of strength was it deemed, that Oliver Cromwell is said to have declared after the division, that he would have sold his estate, and retired to America if the question had been lost. A violent debate then followed, on the motion of Mr. Hampden, that there might be an order entered for the present printing of their remonstrance; and the excitement became so great, that several members were on the point of proceeding to personal violence. "We had sheathed our swords in each other's bowels," says an eye-witness, "had not the sagacity and great calmness of Mr. Hampden, by a short speech, prevented it." Mr. Hyde (Clarendon) maintained, that to print and publish the remonstrance without the consent of the Peers, was illegal; and upon a division, the popular side lost this question by 124 to 101. Hyde also claimed the privilege of protesting against the vote of the majority on the former question, and Mr. Palmer stood up and said that he would likewise protest. Others followed in the same line, but the popular party spoke sharply against them all, asserting that such protests were directly against the order and privilege of the House of Commons, and tending to the frustrating of all their proceedings. But about three o'clock the House adjourned till the next day, when they committed Mr. Palmer to the Tower.[2]

The remonstrance thus carried, was certainly put forward to stem the returning tide of loyalty, by men who felt that the king's love of arbitrary dominion was much better proved than his sincerity in relinquishing it;[3] who were informed on all sides that Charles deplored the restrictions put upon him by the parliament, and was constantly making efforts or forming designs to shake off those restrictions. The paper consisted of a long preamble, and 206 several clauses. From the lending of English shipping to the papist forces proceeding against the Protestant Rochellers to the rumored popish plots of the day—from the imprisonment of Sir John Eliot to the late army plot—nothing was omitted that told against Charles and his government. All the calamities of the nation were traced to the existence of a coalition of papists, Arminian bishops and clergymen, evil counselors and courtiers, who, for private ends and passions, would ruin the liberties of their country. The Commons recited all the remedies which they had recently applied to the multiplied evils and corruptions of sixteen years, strengthened by custom and authority, and a concurrent interest of many powerful delinquents who were now to be brought to justice. Ship-money, coat and conduct money, all the monopolies that they had suppressed, all the illegal taxation which they had put an end to, figured on the list in striking relief. "And," they added, "that which is more beneficial than all this is, that the root of these evils is taken away, which was the arbitrary power pretended to be in his majesty, of taxing the subject, of charging their estates without consent in parliament." Then they proceeded to state another step that had been of great advantage —"the removal of the living grievances;" the quelling of the actors of these mischiefs; the justice done upon the Earl of Strafford; the flight of the Lord Finch and Secretary Windebank; the accusation and imprisonment of the Archbishop of Canterbury; the impeachment of divers other bishops and judges; their extorting of the new law that they should not be dissolved or adjourned without their own consent; their suppressing forever the Star Chamber, the High Commission, the Presidency in the North, which were "so many forges of misery, oppression, and violence, but now all happily taken away;" their curbing the immoderate power of the privy council, and the exorbitant power of bishops; their "blasting," by the votes of their House, the unholy canons, and the power of canon-making. "Other things," added the framers of this remarkable paper, "of main importance for the good of this kingdom, are in preparation." And then they proceeded to denounce, with words of fire, the oppositions, obstructions, delays, and difficulties which they had constantly encountered, and which still lay in their way—all the devices of that malignant party, which unhappily surrounded the throne, and cast suspicion and calumny on their best intentions. And the remonstrance ended with prayers that his majesty would avoid papists, and favorers of papists, employing only such counselors, ministers, and ambassadors as might enjoy the confidence of parliament, being sworn to observe those laws which concerned the subject and his liberty, and to take no reward or pension from any foreign prince.

Sir Ralph Hopeton presented this paper to the king at Hampton Court, on the evening of the 1st of December. Charles, at the reading of it, hesitated at the charges respecting a malignant party, and the design of altering religion, and said, "The devil take him, whosoever he be, that hath a design of that sort. He also stopped at the reading of that part of the remonstrance which gave the lands of the rebels in Ireland to those who should suppress the rebellion, and said, "We must not dispose of the bear-skin till the bear be dead." When the petition was read, Charles asked several questions, but Hopeton told him that he had no power to speak to any thing without the permission of the Commons. "Doth the House intend to publish this declaration?" said Charles. Again Hopeton said that he could not answer. "Well, then," continued his majesty, "I suppose you do not expect a present answer to so long a petition: but this let me tell you, I have left Scotland well in peace; they are well satisfied with me, and I with them; and though I staid longer than I expected, I think if I had not gone, you had not been so soon rid of the army."

On the following day he sent to the Commons his answer to the petition which accompanied the remonstrance. He told them that he thought their declaration or remonstrance unparliamentary; that he could not at all understand what was meant by a wicked and malignant party; that the bishops were entitled to their votes in parliament by the laws of the kingdom, and that their inordinate power was sufficiently abridged by the taking away of the High Commission Court; that he would consider of a proposal for the calling of a national synod, to examine church-ceremonies, &c.; that he was persuaded in his conscience that the church of England professed the true religion with more purity than any other; that its government and discipline were more beautified and free from superstition; and that, as for the removing of evil counselors, they must name who they were, bringing a particular charge, and sufficient proofs, against them, and forbearing their general aspersions. On the same day he went down to the House of Lords, and, the Commons being summoned, he told them significantly that he had left the Scottish nation "a most peaceable and contented people;" so that, although he had a little miscalculated the length of his absence, he had not failed in obtaining his end. "But," continued he, "if I have deceived your expectations a little in the time of my return, I am assured that my expectation is as much, and more, deceived in the condition wherein I hoped to have found business at my return; for since that, before my going, I settled the liberties of my subjects, and gave the laws a free and orderly course, I expected to have found my people reaping the fruits of these benefits, by living in quietness and satisfaction of mind; but, instead of this, I find them disturbed with jealousies, frights, and alarms of dangerous designs and plots, in consequence of which guards have been set to defend both Houses. I say not this as in doubt that my subjects' affections are in any way lessened to me in this time of my absence, for I can not but remember, to my great comfort, the joyful reception I had now at my entry into London, but rather, as I hope, that my presence will easily disperse these fears; for I bring as perfect and true affections to my people as ever prince did, or as good subjects can possibly desire; and I am so far from repenting me of any act I have done in this session for the good of my people, that I protest, if it were to do again, I would do it, and will yet grant what else can be justly desired for satisfaction in point of liberties, or in maintenance of the true religion that is here established." He recommended Ireland to their attention, telling them that their preparations were going on but slowly; and he concluded his speech by assuring them again that he sought his people's happiness.

Two Scotch commissioners came up to concert measures with the English parliament for the suppression of the Irish rebellion; but they had many tales both to tell and to hear, which had no reference to that business. On the 8th of December the Commons debated upon certain propositions about to be offered to his majesty by the Irish rebels, who, as a preliminary, asked for a full toleration of the Catholic religion; and it was resolved, both by the Lords and Commons of England, that they would never give consent to any toleration of the popish religion in Ireland, or in any other of his majesty's dominions! This decision, no doubt, squared with the popular prejudices; but many of the members of the popular party gave their votes, not from bigotry, but from policy. During the debate a great stir was caused by the report that a guard had been set near the parliament without their privity. Forthwith the Commons sent a sergeant-at-arms to bring the commander of that guard to their bar. The officer said that the sheriff had received a writ to that purpose, and that the soldiers had a warrant from the justices of the peace. The Commons immediately resolved that this was a dangerous breach of the privileges of their House, and that the guards should be discharged. The generality of our popular historians take no notice of these fears and jealousies—of these too open attempts of the king to place a force of his own round the Houses; nor is sufficient weight allowed to the excitement and popular panic produced by the Irish plot and massacre, frightful details of which were now every day brought to London. There can be no doubt that many members of the House of Commons really believed that plots were agitating against their liberties or lives; and as for the people whose credulity was great, and whose means of information as to what was passing were most scanty, they could swallow entire a story of a Catholic conspiracy to destroy the whole nation. Nor, putting aside these exaggerations, can it be proved that the apprehensions of the Commons were wholly unfounded. The queen took no pains to conceal her ill-humor; all the persons nearest to Charles were notoriously averse to the recent changes; and their threatening speeches were collected and repeated. The "incident" in Scotland also remained a mystery of alarming import.

On the same day (the 8th of December) Charles put forth a proclamation commanding obedience to the laws established concerning religion, and forbidding the introduction of any rite or ceremony, other than those established by the laws and statutes.[1] "At this time," says Whitelock, "this was held by many to be very seasonable, but divers were offended at it." On the same day, also, he published another and an unusual proclamation, requiring all members to repair to the parliament by or before the 12th of January next, to the end that the kingdom might fully enjoy the benefit and happiness intended it by his majesty by the summoning and continuing of this parliament.[2] Six days after (on the 14th of December) he again spoke to both Houses upon the business of Ireland. He again complained of the slowness of their proceedings, and recommended dispatch. These delays had in part arisen out of the Commons' jealousy of the royal prerogative of levying troops. Charles spoke directly to this point, and told them that he had taken notice of the bill for pressing of soldiers, now debating among the Lords; and that in case the bill came to him in such a shape as not to infringe or diminish his prerogative, he would pass it as they chose. "And, further," said he, "seeing there is a dispute raised (I being little beholden to him whosoever at this time began it) concerning the bounds of this ancient and undoubted prerogative, to avoid further debate at this time, I offer that the bill may pass with a salvo jure both for king and people, leaving such debates to a time that may better bear them. If this be not accepted, the fault is not mine that this bill pass not, but theirs that refuse so fair an offer."[1] Parliament took fire at this speech, and Lords and Commons instantly joined in a petition touching the privileges of parliament, the birthright and inheritance not only of themselves, but of the whole kingdom. They declared, with all duty, that the king ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation and debate in either House, except by their information; that he ought not to propose any condition, provision, or limitation to any bill in debate or preparation, nor express his consent or dissent, approbation or dislike, until the bill was presented to him in due course; that he ought not to express his displeasure at any debate of parliament, they being the proper judges of their own errors and offenses. They complained that his majesty had broken these privileges in his speech, particularly in mentioning the bill of impress, in offering a provisional clause before it was presented, and in expressing his displeasure against such as moved a question concerning the same: and they desired to know the names of such persons as had seduced his majesty to that item, that they might be punished as his great council should advise.[2] The parliament at first resolved not to proceed with any business till they had a satisfactory answer to their petition; and, during their heat, hints were thrown out that the Irish rebels were actually favored by some about the queen; "and divers went yet higher."

On the very next day (the 15th of December) the motion for printing the remonstrance, which had been lost on the 22d of November, by a majority of 23, was triumphantly carried by 135 to 83. This striking paper, when distributed through the country, was of more effect than an army could have been. "It was alledged by many gentlemen," says the comparatively mild and judicious historian of this parliament, "that such a remonstrance might be of good use, and that the king, having perchance been ignorant in some degree how much evil had formerly been wrought, might by this remonstrance be not only brought to a knowledge of his past errors, but to a salubrious fear of offending again, by considering how public and manifest to the world the defaults of princes, in point of government, must needs appear. The other side were of opinion that this remonstrance, instead of directing him for the future, would teach him only to hate the makers of it as upbraiders of his crimes, and those that went about to lessen or blemish (and so the king seemed to relish it, as appeared in his answer printed) his reputation with the people. They held it fitter at such a time, when the king's affections were dubious toward the parliament, to win him by the sweeter way of concealing his errors, than by publishing of them to hazard the provocation of him, with whom it was not behooveful to contest, unless they were in hope to change his disposition for the future, or ascertained of their own power, and resolved to make full use of it. . . . . . At this time began that fatal breach between king and parliament to appear visibly, and wax daily wider, never to be closed until the whole kingdom was by sad degrees brought into a ruinous war. From henceforth no true confidence appeared between him and that high court; every day almost contributed somewhat to the divisions; and declarations upon several reasons were published to the world, of which, though the language of the most part was fairly couched and sweetened with frequent intermixtures of gracious expressions from the king and affectionate professions from the parliament, yet the substance was matter of expostulation; and many intervening actions (which we shall endeavor to express particularly) which did so far heighten them and sharpen by degrees the style, till those paper contestations became a fatal prologue to that bloody and unnatural war which afterwards ensued."[1]

Charles, moody and discontented, withdrew to Hampton Court to prepare an answer to the remonstrance in the shape of a declaration. He chose this very moment of doubt and suspicion for an attempt to get the Tower of London into his hands by changing the governor or lieutenant. Upon the 20th of December, a report was made to the vigilant Commons that his majesty intended to remove Sir William Balfour, the sturdy lieutenant, who had secured Strafford for them; and they ordered that Sir William should appear before them the very next day, Balfour attended, and was examined touching the causes of his removal; after which the House fell into debate about a petition to be presented to his majesty for continuing him in his charge. But on the following day Sir William resigned the keys of the Tower to the king, who forthwith appointed Colonel Lunsford, who took the oaths, and entered upon the charge. The very day after this appointment, the common councilmen and others of the city of London, petitioned the House of Commons against it, representing this Colonel Lunsford as a man outlawed, most notorious for outrages, and therefore fit for any desperate enterprise,[2] and

[2] "Divers indifferent men," says Whitelock, "wondered both at the king's speech, which gave the cause of exception, and was indeed notoriously against the course and privileges of parliament, that his council should not inform him thereof; and they also apprehended this petition to be somewhat too rough in the expressions of it to their king; but the general fate of things drove on this way to increase the jealousies betwixt king and people." Clarendon says that St. John, now attorney-general (and one of the historian's scarecrows), insidiously suggested Charles's interference.

[1] May.

[2] "1. Because the said Colonel Lunsford is a man of a decayed and desperate fortune, and so may be tempted to undertake any ill design, and they conceive it will be very prejudicial to the king and kingdom for him to be in that place in this time of fears and jealousies; especially to the Mint, in this time of great occasions to use moneys, for it will discourage merchants and strangers from bringing in their bullion into the Mint. 2. That the said Colonel Lunsford is a man of a desperate condition, he having been formerly censured in the Star Chamber, for lying in wait and besetting Sir Thomas Pelham, knight, as he came in his coach upon a Sunday from church, and did discharge two pistols into the coach; also, being challenged into the field by one Captain Buller, upon some injury offered to him by the said Colonel Lunsford, Colonel Lunsford refused to answer him, but sent him word he would cut his throat, and would meet him with a pistol, and put reminding the House that they (the citizens) had lately been put into fear of some dangerous design from that citadel. The Commons demanded a conference with the Lords, and communicated to their lordships the petition from the city, representing the unfitness of Lunsford for a place of such great trust, and desired their lordships to concur in a remonstrance, and in a prayer to the king to recommend Sir John Conyers to be lieutenant, under the command of that honorable person the Earl of Newport, who was constable of the Tower. The Lords declined doing any thing, conceiving the proposed interference would be an intrenchment on his majesty's prerogative. Then the Commons passed the following vote:—"Resolved, neminé contradicente, that this House holds Colonel Lunsford unfit to be, or continue, lieutenant of the Tower, as being a person whom the Commons of England can not confide in." When this was done, they sent to desire a second conference with the peers upon the same subject. The managers of this conference, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Pym, Mr. Strode, Sir Edmond Montfort, Mr. Glynne, Sir Philip Stapleton, Mr. Martin, and Sir John Hobham, importuned their lordships to join in their petition for removing Colonel Lunsford, alledging that they already found the evil consequence of his being lieutenant, inasmuch as merchants had already withdrawn their bullion out of the Mint, and strangers who had ships lately come in with great store of bullion, forebore to bring it to the Mint, because he held the Tower; and by this means, they said, money would be scarce, which would be prejudicial and obstructive to the pressing affairs of Ireland. Still the Lords refused to join. Then the managers for the Commons told them that they had made a declaration and protest upon this refusal, and desired that the same might be entered on the journal of the House of Peers, as it was already entered on their own journal. This paper being read in the Upper House, it was moved to adjourn the debate till Monday; and this was carried by a majority; but the earls of Northumberland, Essex, Pembroke, Bedford, Warwick, Saye, Holland, and fourteen other peers, protested against the delay. That same evening, being Christmas-eve, the Commons ordered that Sir Thomas Barrington and Mr. Martin should that night repair to the Earl of Newport, constable of the Tower, and desire him, in the name of their House, to lodge and reside within the citadel, and take the custody and entire care of that place. The two members went, but the Earl of Newport was not to be found. The second day after this, being Sunday, the 26th of December, the lord mayor waited upon his majesty, to tell him that the apprentices of London were contemplating a rising, to carry the Tower by storm, unless he should be pleased to remove his new lieutenant. That same evening Charles took the keys from Colonel Lunsford.[1] On the morrow Sir Thomas Barrington reported to the Commons that the Earl of Newport had been with him on Sunday evening, to tell him that the king had discharged him from the constableship of the Tower. This earl, though very acceptable to the citizens, was odious to the king, who, at this moment—this critical moment—had an altercation with him, which was reported to the House of Lords on the same Monday morning. It was stated that some of the peers had been injured by false reports and rumors at court; and the following story was told. During the king's absence in Scotland, somebody had informed the queen, that at a meeting at Kensington, where the Earl of Essex, the Earl of Newport, the Lord Saye, the Lord Mandeville, the Lord Wharton, members of the House of Peers, and the Lord Dungarvon, Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, Sir John Clotworthy, and Mr. Pym, members of the Commons, were present, there occurred a discourse about some plots against parliament, that were hatching in this country or in Scotland; and that the Earl of Newport said, "If there be such plots, yet we have his wife and children,"—meaning thereby that the persons of the queen and her children should be seized. When the story was ended, the Earl of Newport stood up and gave the Lords this account:—that, upon hearing that such a report had been presented to the king, he went with some other lords and waited upon her majesty, and assured her that never any such words had been spoken; that the queen then seemed to rest satisfied; but, upon Friday last, his majesty asked his lordship suddenly whether he had heard of any debate at Kensington, about seizing upon the queen and her children; that he had denied the rumor again, and that thereupon his majesty had told him, that he was sorry for his lordship's memory. The House of Lords, upon this information, applied to the Commons for a conference, that they might jointly proceed against these scandalous reports which concerned both Houses.[1]

out his other eye. 3. That they are informed that Colonel Lunsford is not right in principles as to religion, for they understand that when he was a commander in the north, in the king's army, he did not go to church, though he was desired."

[1] On the preceding Thursday a number of young men had presented to the House of Commons a petition, running in the name of the apprentices and others whose times are lately expired in and about the city of London; and this petition had been read in the House. The apprentices complained that trade was decaying, that they were "nipped in the bud, when first entering into the world," the cause of which mischief they could attribute to none but the papists and prelates, and that malignant party which adhered unto them: that they, the apprentices, by the late protestation, stood solemnly engaged in the presence of Almighty God, by all lawful means to defend his sacred majesty, the liberties of parliament, and all his majesty's subjects, against papists and popish innovators, such as archbishops, bishops, and their dependents. The petition, which could hardly have been the production of a London apprentice, alluded to the most barbarous and inhuman cruelties perpetrated by the papists in Ireland, whence there arose a new spring of fears and jealousies as to what the issue of these things might be in England; and it expressed a hope that his majesty would agree with his honorable court of parliament in providing for the danger, in narrowly looking into and securing the popish lords and other eminent and dangerous papists in all parts of the kingdom, in fully executing the laws against priests and Jesuits, and in utterly rooting out prelacy, so that the reformation might be prosperously carried on, trade flourish, &c., &c.—Rushworth

[1] On the 30th of December Charles returned an answer to the petition of the Lords and Commons by the mouth of the Earl of Bath, in which he as good as called Newport a liar. The answer, as recorded by Rushworth, was in these words:—"My lords and gentlemen, it is true that I have heard rumors of some proposition that should have been made at Kensington for the seizing of the persons of my wife and children; and in things of so high a nature, it may be fit for any prince to inquire; even where he had no belief nor persuasion of the thing; so I have asked Newport some questions concerning that business, but far from that way of expressing a belief of the thing; which New-

All this day the Houses of parliament were surrounded by tumultuous multitudes—for it was not yet publicly known that the king had removed Colonel Lunsford. The citizens that had petitioned against that officer, collected at Westminster for an answer to that petition, and the London apprentices were there also for an answer to their petition. It was a Monday morning, and they made of it a most noisy St. Monday, crying out, "Beware of plots! No bishops! no bishops!" Old Bishop Williams seems to have lost his coolness and circumspection with increase of age. On his way to the House of Lords, with the Earl of Dover, observing a youth crying out lustily against the bishops, he stepped from the earl, rushed into the crowd, and laid hands upon the stripling. Thereupon the citizens rescued the youth, and about a hundred of them coming up so hemmed in the lord bishop, that he could not stir; and then all of them with a loud voice, cried out "No bishops!" The mob let old Williams go, apparently without injuring him; but one David Hide, a reformado in the late army against the Scots, and now appointed to go upon some command into Ireland, began to bustle, and to say that he would cut the throats of those round-headed dogs[1] that bawled against bishops. Nor did this David Hide stop at threats, for he drew his sword, and called upon three or four others with him to second him; but his comrades refused, and he was soon disarmed by the citizens, and carried before the House of Commons, who first committed him, and afterward cashiered him. On the same stormy Monday, Colonel Lunsford went through Westminster Hall, with no fewer than thirty or forty friends at his back. A fray ensued, the colonel drew his sword, and some hurt was done among the citizens and apprentices. Presently there came swarming down to Westminster some hundreds more of apprentices and others, with swords, staves, and other weapons. The Lords sent out the gentleman-usher, to bid them depart in the king's name. The people said that they were willing to be gone, but durst not, because Colonel Lunsford and other swordsmen in Westminster Hall were lying in wait for them with their swords drawn, and because some of them that were going home through Westminster Hall had been slashed and wounded by those soldiers. With great difficulty, the lord mayor and sheriffs appeased this tumult, which caused the loss of some blood, and which was the prelude to the fiercer battles that soon followed between the Roundheads and Cavaliers. In the evening, the king, who had come to Whitehall, commanded some of the train-bands of Westminster and Middlesex to guard the palace, and thenceforward one or two companies remained on duty both day and night. On Tuesday morning, the citizens and apprentices flocked anew to Westminster. Some of them were detained in the abbey and examined before the Archbishop of York (our old friend Williams). Their fellow-apprentices would have set them at liberty, and threatened to pull down the organs; but the doors were secured against them, and some persons from the abbey leads, endeavored to beat them off with stones, whereby several of the citizens were hurt, and among the rest, Sir Richard Wiseman, who, it was said, died of the injuries he there received.

The thirteen bishops impeached for their share in the obnoxious canons and Laud's last convocation, had been admitted to bail, and, after a short time, to their seats in the House of Lords. Now twelve of them drew up a protest and petition to the king, stating, that they could not attend in their places in parliament, where they had a clear and indubitable right to vote, because they had several times been violently menaced, affronted, and assaulted by multitudes of people, and had lately been chased away from the House of Lords, and put in danger of their lives—for all which they could find no redress or protection, though they had lodged several complaints in both Houses. "Therefore," continued the document, "they (the bishops) do in all duty and humility protest before your majesty and the peers against all laws, orders, votes, resolutions, and determinations, as in themselves null and of none effect, which in their absence have already passed; as likewise against all such as shall hereafter pass in the House of Lords, during the time of this their forced and violent absence from the said most honorable House; not denying but, if their absenting themselves were willful and voluntary, that most honorable House might proceed in all these premises, their absence or this their protestation notwithstanding." To the surprise of most men, the first signature to this protest and petition was that of old Williams, who had been translated to the archbishopric of York a very few days before. The other eleven bishops that signed were Durham, Lichfield, Norwich, St. Asaph, Bath and Wells, port hath had the boldness and confidence to affirm; which I could easily make appear, but that I think it beneath me to contest with any particular person. But let this suffice, that I assure you, I neither did nor do give credit to any such rumor. As for telling the name of him who informed me, I do stick to the answer which I gave to your last petition upon the like particular." The whole message gave great offense.

[1] Rushworth attributes the origin of the term Roundhead to this David Hide:—"Which passionate expression," says he, "as far as I could ever learn, was the first minting of that term or compellation of Roundheads which afterward grew so general."

Clarendon says, with more pomposity, "All this time the king (who had been with great solemnity invited by the city of London, and desired to make his residence nearer to them than Hampton Court) was at Whitehall, where, beside his ordinary retinue and menial servants, many officers of the late disbanded army, who solicited their remainder of pay from the two Houses, which was secured to them by act of parliament, and expected some further employment in the war with Ireland, upon observation and view of the insolence of the tumults, and the danger that they might possibly bring to the court, offered themselves for a guard to his majesty's person; and were with more formality and ceremony entertained by him, than, upon a just computation of all distempers, was by many conceived seasonable. And from these officers, warm with indignation at the insolences of that vile rabble which every day passed by the court, first, words of great contempt, and then, those words commonly finding a return of equal scorn, blows, were fastened upon some of the most pragmatical of the crew. This was looked upon by the House of Commons like a levying war by the king, and much pity expressed by them that the poor people should be so used, who came to them with petitions (for some few of them had received some cuts and slashes that had drawn blood), and that made a great argument for reinforcing their numbers. And from those contestations, the two terms of Roundheads and Cavalier grew to be received in discourse, and were afterward continued for the most succinct distinction of affections throughout the quarrel; they who were looked upon as servants to the king being then called Cavaliers; and the other of the rabble contemned and despised under the name of Roundheads."—Hist.

Hereford, Oxford, Ely, Gloucester, Peterborough, and Llandaff. If the Lords had acquiesced in the views of the petitioners, the Long Parliament might have been ended now, in so far at least as the Upper House was concerned, and the slur of illegality might have been cast upon all the acts that had been passed during the last year in the frequent absence of the lords spiritual. The move on the part of the court was a bold one; but the revolution was now in progress, and without even offering to provide for the bishops' safety, so that they might come to their House, or be accused of staying away willfully and voluntarily, the Lords desired a conference with the Commons, and denounced the petition and protest as highly criminal, and subversive of the fundamental privileges and the very being of parliament. We have seen what was the affection of the Commons toward bishops: they instantly re-echoed the charge, accused these twelve bishops of high treason, and sent Mr. Glynne to the bar of the Lords, to charge the prelates in the name of the House of Commons, and all the Commons of England, and to desire that they might be forthwith sequestered from parliament, and put into safe custody. As soon as Mr. Glynne had delivered this message at the bar, "the Lords sent the black rod instantly to find out these bishops and apprehend them; and by eight o'clock at night they were all taken, and brought upon their knees to the bar, and ten of them committed to the Tower; and two (in regard of their age, and indeed of the worthy parts of one of them, the learned Bishop of Durham) were committed to the black rod."[1] Thus ten more prelates were sent to join Laud in his captivity—twelve votes were lost to the court party in the House of Lords.

On the last day of this eventful year the Commons sent Mr. Denzil Hollis to the king, with what they called an Address to his majesty, praying for a guard, and an answer without delay. Hollis told the king, by word of mouth, that the House of Commons were faithful and loyal subjects, ready to spend the last drop of their blood for his majesty, but that they had great apprehensions and just fears of mischievous designs to ruin and destroy them; that there had been several attempts made heretofore to bring destruction upon their whole body at once, and threats and menaces used against particular persons; that there was a malignant party daily gathering strength and confidence, and now come to such height as to imbrue their hands in blood in the face and at the very doors of the parliament; and that the same party at his majesty's own gates had given out insolent and menacing speeches against the parliament itself. And in the end Hollis informed him, that it was the humble desire of the Commons to have a guard to protect them out of the city, and commanded by the Earl of Essex, chamberlain of his majesty's household, and of equal fidelity to his majesty and the commonwealth. Charles desired to have this message in writing; the paper was sent to him accordingly, and he replied to it, not without delay, as the Commons had requested or enjoined, but three days after. In the interval the Commons had ordered that halberts should be provided and brought into the House for their own better security. The halberts were brought in accordingly, and Rushworth informs us that they stood in the House for a considerable time afterward. Then understanding that the Lords would not sit on the morrow, which was New Year's Day, they adjourned till Monday, the 3d of January, resolving, however, that they should meet on the morrow, in a grand committee at Guildhall, leaving another committee at Westminster, to receive his majesty's answer to their petition, if it should come in the mean time."[1]

[1] Rushworth

On the 3d of January the Commons, meeting in their usual place, received the king's tardy and unsatisfactory answer to their petition for a guard. Charles expressed his great grief of heart at finding, after a whole year's sitting of this parliament, wherein so much had been obtained for the happiness and security of subjects, that there should be such jealousies, distrusts, and fears; he protested his ignorance of the grounds of their apprehension, vowing before Almighty God, that if he had any knowledge of the least design of violence against the Commons, either formerly or at this time, he would pursue the plotters to condign punishment. And he continues, "We know the duty of that place where God hath set us, the protection we owe to all our loyal subjects, and most particularly to you, called to our service by our writs: and we do engage unto you solemnly the word of a king, that the security of all and every one of you from violence is, and shall ever be, as much our care as the preservation of us and our children; and if this general assurance shall not suffice to remove your apprehensions, we will command such a guard to wait upon you as will be responsible for you to Him, who hath charged us with the safety and protection of our subjects." A guard of the king's appointing was precisely the thing that the Commons did not want. While they were debating upon the message they received a communication from the Lords, the effect of which was galvanic. That morning Herbert, the king's attorney, was admitted into the House of Lords at the request of the lord keeper, and approaching the clerk's table (not the bar),[2] Herbert said that the king had commanded him to tell their lordships that divers great and treasonable designs and practices, against him and the state, had come to his majesty's knowledge. "For which," continued Herbert, "his majesty hath given me command, in his name, to accuse, and I do accuse, by delivering unto your lordships these articles in writing, which I received of his majesty, the six persons therein named of high treason, the heads of which treason are contained in said articles, which I desire may be read."

[1] Rushworth. This establishing a committee in the city before the king's violent act of attempting to seize the five members has been generally overlooked.

[2] The attorney and solicitor-general are legally considered to be attendants upon the House of Lords, and have, as well as the judges, their regular writs of summons issued out at the beginning of every parliament, ad tractandum et consilium impendendum, though not ad consentiendum, with their lordships.—Blackstone, Com. i. 168.

The Lords took the articles, and commanded the reading of them. They were entitled "Articles of high treason, and other high misdemeanors, against the Lord Kimbolton, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Arthur Hazlerig, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hampden, and Mr. William Strode." These memorable charges were presented in the following words: — "1st. That they have traitorously endeavored to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England, to deprive the king of his royal power, and to place in subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties, and estates of his majesty's liege people; 2d. That they have traitorously endeavored, by many foul aspersions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious unto them; 3d. That they have endeavored to draw his majesty's late army to disobedience to his majesty's command, and to side with them in their traitorous designs; 4th. That they have traitorously invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majesty's kingdom of England; 5th. That they traitorously endeavored to subvert the rights and the very being of parliaments; 5th. That, for the completing of their traitorous designs, they have endeavored, so far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them in their traitorous designs, and to that end have actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and parliament; 7th. And that they have traitorously conspired to levy, and actually have levied, war against the king." Lord Kimbolton, who was in his seat, stood up, and expressed his readiness to meet the charge, offering to obey whatever the House should order; but praying that, as he had a public accusation, so might he have a public clearing. None of the courtiers had courage to move his arrest as a traitor. The Lords wavered, stood still, and then appointed a committee, consisting of the lord steward, and the earls of Essex, Bath, Southampton, Warwick, Bristol, and Holland, to consider precedents and records touching the regularity of this accusation, and to discover whether such an accusation might be brought by the king's attorney into their House against a peer, &c. Thus they avoided committing themselves, gained time, and no doubt made sure that the Commons, whom they warned by message, would take the affair upon themselves.[1] And nearly at the same moment that their message was delivered in the Lower House, information was also carried thither that several officers were sealing up the doors, trunks, and papers of Hampden, Pym, and the other accused members. Upon which the Commons instantly voted, "That if any person whatsoever shall come to the lodgings of any member of this House, and offer to seal the trunks, doors, or papers of any of them, or seize upon their persons, such member shall require the aid of the constable to keep such persons in safe custody till this House do give further order; and that if any person whatsoever shall offer to arrest or detain the person of any member without first acquainting this House, it is lawful for such member, or any person, to assist him, and to stand upon his or their guard of defense, and to make a resistance, according to the protestation taken to defend the privileges of parliament."[1] They also ordered that the sergeant-at-arms attending their House should proceed and break open the seals set upon the doors, papers, &c., of Mr. Hampden and the rest; and that the speaker should sign a warrant for the apprehension of those who had done the deed. The House then desired an immediate conference with the Lords; but, before they could receive an answer, they were told that a sergeant-at-arms was at their door, with a message to deliver from his majesty to their speaker. Forthwith they called in the said sergeant to the bar, making him, however, leave his mace behind him. "I am commanded by the king's majesty, my master," said the sergeant, "upon my allegiance, to come and repair to the House of Commons, where Mr. Speaker is, and there to require of Mr. Speaker five gentlemen, members of the House of Commons; and those gentlemen being delivered, I am commanded to arrest them, in his majesty's name, of high treason: their names are Denzil Hollis, Arthur Hazlerig, John Pym, John Hampden, and William Strode." When he had delivered this message the House commanded him to withdraw, and sent Lord Falkland, and three other members, to acquaint his majesty that the matter was of great consequence, and that the House of Commons would take it into their serious consideration, holding the members ready to answer any legal charge made against them.

All this was on the 3d of January. "The next day after that the king had answered the petition of the House (about the guard), being the 4th of January, 1642," says May, "he gave, unhappily, a just occasion for all men to think that their fears and jealousies were not causeless." He spent the preceding evening in making preparations. Arms were removed from the Tower to Whitehall, where a table was spread in the palace for a band of rash young men, who were ready to proceed to extremities for the reëstablishment of royalty in its pristine state. Charles had determined to charge the five members with private meetings and treasonable correspondence with the Scots (a case met and provided for by the amnesty which had been procured both in Scotland and England), and with countenancing the late tumults from the city of London; and now he resolved to go in person to seize the five members of the House of Commons. It is not very clearly stated what led him to adopt this desperate design: according to one account he was urged on by the violence of his wife, who said to him, "Go, you coward, and pull those rogues out by the ears, or never see me more; according to others, he apprehended that the Commons, if not stopped, would impeach the queen. On the morn-

[1] Rushworth.—Parl. Hist.—Clarendon says, "The House of Peers was somewhat appalled at this alarum, but took time to consider of it till the next day, that they might see how their masters, the Commons, would behave themselves; the Lord Kimbolton being present in the House, and making great professions of his innocence; and no lord being so hardy to press for his commitment on the behalf of the king."

ing of the 4th, the five accused members attended in their places, as they had been ordered. Lord Falkland stated, that he was desired to inform the House that the serjeant-at-arms had done nothing the preceding day but what he had it in command to do. Then Hampden rose, and powerfully repelled the vague accusations which had been brought against them by the king. If to be resolute in the defense of parliament, the liberties of the subject, the reformed religion, was to be a traitor, then, he acknowledged he might be guilty of treason, but not otherwise. Hazlerig followed Hampden: he maintained that one of the worst kinds of treason, or of attempts to subvert the fundamental laws, was that which should be aimed against the privileges of parliament; that his acts, and those of the gentlemen with him, particularly with reference to Scotland, had been in accordance with votes and resolutions of that House; and that the charge of promoting tumults and insurrections was utterly groundless. The House being informed that it was Sir William Fleming and Sir William Killigrew, with others, who had sealed up the studies and papers of the five members, ordered that they should be forthwith apprehended, and kept in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms till further notice. They also voted that a conference should be desired with the Lords, to acquaint them of a scandalous paper, published, with articles of high treason, against their five members, and the Lord Kimbolton, a peer; and, forasmuch as the paper was against both Houses, to desire their lordships that right might be done, and inquiries instituted as to the authors and publishers, in order that they might receive condign punishment, and that the commonwealth might be secured against such persons. The House rose at the usual dinner-hour, but met again immediately after. They had scarcely taken their seats when intelligence was brought by Captain Langrish, who had passed the party in the streets, that the king was advancing toward Westminster Hall, guarded by his gentlemen-pensioners, and followed by some hundreds of courtiers, officers, and soldiers of fortune, most of them armed with swords and pistols. The House was bound by its recent and solemn protestation to protect its privileges and the persons of its members: there were halberts, and probably other arms at hand; but could they defend their members against this array, led on by the king in person? Would it be wise, on any grounds, to make the sacred inclosures of parliament a scene of war and bloodshed? They ordered the five members to withdraw; "to the end," says Rushworth, "to avoid combustion in the House, if the said soldiers should use violence to pull any of them out." Four of the members yielded ready obedience to this prudent order, but Mr. Strode insisted upon staying and facing the king, and was obstinate till his old friend Sir Walter Earle pulled him out by force, the king being at that time entering into New Palace Yard, and almost at the door of the House. As Charles passed through Westminster Hall to the entrance of the House of Commons, the officers, reformados, &c., that attended him made a lane on both sides the hall, reaching to the door of the Commons. He knocked hastily, and the door was opened to him. Leaving his armed band at the door and in the hall, he entered the House, with his nephew Charles, the Prince Palatine of the Rhine, at his side. He glanced his eyes toward the place where Pym usually sat, and then walked directly to the chair, saying, "By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I must borrow your chair a little." Lenthall, the speaker, dropped upon his knee, and Charles took his seat; the mace was removed; the whole House stood up uncovered. Charles cast searching glances among them, but he could nowhere see any of the five members. He then sat down and addressed them with much agitation:—"Gentlemen," said he, "I am sorry for this occasion of coming among you: yesterday I sent a sergeant-at-arms upon a very important occasion. to apprehend some that upon my commandment were accused of high treason, whereunto I did expect obedience, and not a message; and I must declare unto you here, that, albeit no king that ever was in England shall be more careful of your privileges, to maintain them to the utmost of his power, than I shall be, yet you must know that in cases of treason no person hath a privilege, and, therefore, I am come to know if any of those persons that I have accused, for no slight crime, but for treason, are here. I cannot expect that this House can be in the right way that I do heartily wish it. therefore I am come to tell you, that I must have them wheresoever I find them." Then he again looked round the House, and said to the speaker, now standing below the chair, "Are any of those persons in the House? Do you see any of them? Where are they?" Lenthall fell on his knees, and told his majesty, that he had neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak in that place, but as the House was pleased to direct him. Then again casting his eyes round about the House, Charles said, "Well, since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect from you, that you do send them to me as soon as they return hither. But I assure you, on the word of a king. I never did intend any force, but shall proceed against them in a legal and fair way, for I never meant any other. And now, since I see I can not do what I came for, I think this no unfit occasion to repeat what I have said formerly—that whatsoever I have done in favor, and to the good of my subjects, I do mean to maintain it. I will trouble you no more, but tell you I do expect, as soon as they come to the House, you will send them to me; otherwise I must take my own course to find them." With these words the disappointed king rose, and retired amid loud cries of "Privilege! Privilege!" and the House instantly adjourned. "This action of the king," says Whitelock, "filled the discourses of all people; and it was much wondered at by many sober men, and judged extremely to his prejudice, and to the advantage of those that were disaffected to him. The notorious breach of the privilege of the House of Commons by that action could not but be foreseen by any who had knowledge of parliament affairs: and to advise the king to such a sudden and intemperate act, so justly liable to exception, and without any probability of service to himself, was held very strange.[1] . . . . None could make a satisfactory apology for it, and the king himself afterward acknowledged his too much passion in it. . . . . It was believed that if the king had found them there, and called in his guards to have seized them, the members of the House would have endeavored the defense of them, which might have proved a very unhappy and sad business: and so it did, notwithstanding that was prevented; this sudden action being the first visible and apparent ground of all our following miseries."

In the mean while the five members were safe in the heart of the city of London, where a committee of parliament was appointed to meet during the recess. "The same evening his majesty sent James Maxwell, the usher of the House of Peers, to the House of Commons, to require Mr. Rushworth, the clerk-assistant, whom his majesty had observed to take his speech in characters at the table in the House, to come to his majesty; and when Maxwell brought him to the king, his majesty commanded him to give him a copy of his speech in the House: Mr. Rushworth humbly besought his majesty (hoping for an excuse) to call to mind how Mr. Francis Nevil, a Yorkshire member of the House of Commons, was committed to the Tower but for telling his majesty what words were spoken in the House by Mr. Henry Bellasis, son to the Lord Falconbridge: to which his majesty smartly replied, 'I do not ask you to tell me what was said by any member of the House, but what I said myself.' Whereupon he readily gave obedience to his majesty's command; and in his majesty's presence, in the room called the Jewel House, he transcribed his majesty's speech out of his characters, his majesty staying in the room all the while; and then and there presented the same to the king, which his majesty was pleased to command to be sent speedily to the press; and the next morning it came forth in print."[2] That night the city was a gayer place than the court. Early on the following morning the Commons, safe in "that mighty heart," sent Mr. Fiennes with a message to the Lords, to give them notice of "the king's coming yesterday," and to repeat their desires that their lordships would join with them in a petition for a guard to secure them, and also to let them know that they were sitting at Guildhall, and had appointed the committee for the pressing Irish affairs to meet there. The Commons then appointed that a permanent committee should sit at Guildhall, in the city of London, with power to consider and resolve of all things that might concern the good and safety of the city; and thereupon adjourned till Tuesday, the 11th of January, at one in the afternoon. In the mean time Charles had sent orders to stop the sea-ports, as if the five members could be scared into a flight. It is said that the Lord Digby offered to go into the city with Colonel Lunsford and his band, and there seize them alive or dead, and that the king rejected this perilous advice. On the morning, after a night of painful doubt and debate, Charles set off to the city in person, with his usual attendants, but without any reformados or bravoes. On his way he was saluted with cries of "Privileges of parliament! Privileges of parliament!" and one Henry Walker, an ironmonger and pamphlet-writer, threw into his majesty's coach a paper, whereon was written, "To your tents, O Israel."[1] The common council had assembled at Guildhall, and they met the king as he went up to that building almost alone. Concealing his ill-humor and his irritation against the citizens, he thus addressed them: "Gentlemen, I am come to demand such persons as I have already accused of high treason, and do believe are shrouded in the city. I hope no good man will keep them from me; their offenses are treasons and misdemeanors of a high nature. I desire your loving assistance herein, that they may be brought to a legal trial. And whereas there are divers suspicions raised that I am a favorer of the popish religion, I do profess in the name of a king, that I did, and ever will, and that to the utmost of my power, be a prosecuter of all such as shall any ways oppose the laws and statutes of this kingdom, either papists or separatists; and not only so, but I will maintain and defend that true Protestant religion which my father did profess, and I will continue in it during life."[2] This conciliatory speech produced little or no effect; Charles did not get the five members, but he got a very good dinner at the house of one of the sheriffs, and after dinner returned to Whitehall without interruption or tumult.

The Lords, on receiving the Commons' message, had also adjourned to the 11th of January. The permanent committee, which sat sometimes at Guildhall, sometimes at Grocers' Hall, proceeded actively in drawing up a declaration touching his majesty's intrusive visit to their House; and this occupied them till the 9th of January, many witnesses being examined to prove the words, actions, and gestures of that array of men who had followed his majesty and stood near the door of the House of Commons. Papers and records were also sent for. It was reported to them, that on the 4th of January the Lieutenant of the Tower had permitted one hundred stand of arms, two barrels of powder, and match and shot proportionate, to go out of the Tower to Whitehall; and the committee, upon examination, found this report to be true. The common council, who went hand in hand with the committee, drew up a petition to the king, repre-

[1] Whitelock adds—"The five members received a secret notice from a great court lady, their friend, who overheard some discourse of this intended action, and gave timely notice to those gentleman, whereby they got out of the House just before the king came." Warwick says that "Charles's going to the Lower House was betrayed by that busy stateswoman, the Countess of Carlisle, who had now changed her gallant from Strafford to Mr. Pym, and was become such a she-saint that she frequented their sermons and took notes; and so he (the king) lost the opportunity of seizing their persons." But the French ambassador, Montreuil, says that he was the first to warn the members of their danger. It appears, however, that the warning was really given by Captain Langrish; and we know from Rushworth, who was in the House at the time, that the five members did not quit their seats till the king and his armed followers were close to the House.

senting the great dangers, fears, and distractions of the city, by reason of the prevailing progress of the bloody rebels in Ireland; the dangerous putting out of persons of honor and trust from being constable and lieutenant of the Tower; the fortifying of Whitehall; the wounding of unarmed citizens in Westminster Hall; the strange visit paid to the House of Commons by his majesty, attended with a great multitude of armed men; and the effect these fears produced upon the trade of the city and kingdom, &c.; and in the end, the petitioners prayed his sacred majesty to put the Tower into the hands of persons of trust; to remove from about Whitehall and Westminster all doubtful and unknown persons; to appoint a known and approved guard for his own safety, and for the safety of parliament; to give up his intention of arresting the Lord Kimbolton and the five members, and not to proceed against them otherwise than according to the privileges of parliament. Charles, in his answer to this petition, justified his late proceedings, and declared that, as for the accused gentlemen, he ever intended to proceed against them with all justice and favor, according to the laws and statutes of the realm. At the same time he published a proclamation, charging the Lord Kimbolton and the five members with high treason, and commanding the magistrates to apprehend them, and carry them to the Tower. Forthwith many mariners and seamen went to the committee with a petition signed by a thousand hands, tendering their services and offering to escort the committee by water to Westminster on the appointed day. The committee accepted their offer, and ordered them to provide such artillery as was necessary, and to take care that all great guns and muskets in their vessels should be cleared beforehand, to the end that there might be no shooting that day, except in case of great necessity. When the sailors were gone, the London apprentices flocked in great numbers to the committee, and offered their services as guards for the journey from the city back to Westminster. Sergeant Wild gave the apprentices thanks for their affection and willingness to serve the parliament, but told them that they were already provided with a sufficient guard. At this critical moment a ship from Berwick, with arms and ammunition, arrived off the Tower. The committee instantly commanded her to fall down the river out of the reach of the Tower guns, and at the same time ordered the captain to call in the assistance of sailors and others, if any one should offer to take arms or ammunition out of her. On Saturday there was a rumor that the king intended paying the committee a visit in person. Thereupon they ordered the captains of the city train-bands that now attended them as a guard, to take especial care that his majesty and the nobility should have way made for them to come in, and all duty and respect shown to them. But the captains were also ordered not to suffer any other sorts of persons to come in. On the Monday following the committee declared that the proclamation of treason was a great scandal to his majesty and his government—a seditious act, manifestly tending to the subversion of the peace of the kingdom, and to the injury and dishonor of the accused members, against whom there was no legal charge or accusation whatever. And they further added, "that the privileges of parliament and the liberty of the subject, so violated and broken, can not be fully and sufficiently vindicated, unless his majesty will be graciously pleased to discover the names of those persons who advised his majesty to the sealing of the chambers and studies of the said members, to send a sergeant-at-arms to the House of Commons to demand the said members, to issue several warrants under his majesty's own hand to apprehend the said members, his majesty's coming thither in his own royal person, the publishing of the said articles and printed papers in the frame of a proclamation, against the said members (in such manner as is before declared); to the end such persons may receive condign punishment."[1]

On the afternoon of the same day, Charles, with the queen, his children, and the whole court, left Whitehall and went to Hampton Court. He never entered London again until he came as a helpless prisoner, whose destinies were in the iron hand of Oliver Cromwell. On the morrow afternoon the committee, together with the Lord Kimbolton and the five accused members, took water at the Three Cranes, attended by thirty or forty long boats, with guns and flags, and by a vast number of citizens and seamen in other boats and barges; and thus they proceeded triumphantly to their old port at Westminster, some of the train-bands marching at the same time by land, to be a guard to the two Houses of parliament. The next day they received a very humble message from Hampton Court: "His majesty, taking notice that some conceive it disputable whether his proceedings against the Lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, Sir Arthur Hazlerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, and Mr. Strode, be legal and agreeable to the privileges of the parliament, and being very desirous to give satisfaction to all men in all matters that may seem to have relation to privilege, is pleased to waive his former proceedings; and all doubts by this means being settled, when the minds of men are composed, his majesty will proceed thereupon in an unquestionable way, and assures his parliament that upon all occasions he will be as careful of their privileges as of his life or his crown." On the same day, "divers knights, gentlemen, and freeholders of the county of Bucks, to the number of about four thousand, as they were computed, came to London, riding every one with a printed copy of the protestation lately taken in his hat."[2] These countrymen of Hampden presented a petition, not to the House of Commons, but to the House of Peers, praying them to coöperate with the Lower House in perfecting the great work of reformation, in bringing to exemplary punishment wicked counselors, evil plotters and delinquents, in relieving Ireland, in fortifying the privileges of parliament against all future attempts, &c. At the same time, these Buckinghamshire petitioners, who received the thanks of both Houses, acquainted the Commons that they had another petition which they wished to present to his majesty on behalf of their loyal countryman, neighbor, and member, Mr. John Hampden, in whom they had ever found good cause to confide. They asked the Commons which would be the best way of delivering this petition; and the Commons selected six or eight of their members to wait upon his majesty with it. These members accordingly went to Hampton Court; but Charles was not there, having gone on to Windsor Castle. The members followed him to Windsor, and presented the paper, which told him that the malice which Hampden's zeal for his majesty's service and the service of the state had excited in the enemies of king, church, and commonwealth, had occasioned this foul accusation of their friend. Charles instantly repeated his determination of waiving the accusation. And yet this was not done very clearly or very graciously. On the following day he sent another message to the two Houses, assuring them that he had never the least intention of violating the least privilege of parliament, &c. But notwithstanding these assurances, the House of Commons proceeded against Herbert, the attorney-general, who had presented the articles of impeachment against Lord Kimbolton and the five members. At their instigation Herbert was examined before the Lords, where he pleaded in excuse the duty of obedience which he owed to his master, and professed his ignorance of the grounds of the charge of high treason. On the morrow, the 15th of January, it was resolved by the Commons that Herbert had violated the privileges of parliament in preferring the articles of accusation; and that a charge should be sent up to the Lords against him, to have satisfaction for this great scandal and injury, unless he could prove the said articles within six days. The charge was a regular impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors. Herbert put in an answer, solemnly averring that he had no hand in contriving the articles against the members; that he was so far from any malice, falsehood, or scandal in the advising and contriving of the same, or any of them, that he never knew or heard of them until he received them from his majesty's hands ready engrossed on paper. He referred to a letter written by the king to Lord Littleton, wherein his majesty took the whole of the unfortunate transaction upon himself. But these excuses were not admitted, and, after many months, the House of Lords declared—"1. That Sir Edward Herbert, his majesty's attorney-general, is, by sentence of this House, disabled, and made incapable of being a member, assistant, or pleader, in either House of parliament, and of all offices saving that of attorney-general, which he now holds. 2. That Mr. Attorney-General shall be forthwith committed to the prison of the Fleet during the pleasure of this House."[1]

On the 12th of January, the day after Charles's departure from Whitehall, information was brought to the House of Commons, that the Lord Digby and Colonel Lunsford, with other disbanded officers and reformados, were gathering some troops of horse at Kingston-upon-Thames, and appearing in arms there in a disorderly manner, and, moreover, that there were two cart-loads of ammunition going to them. The alarm was the greater, because the magazine of arms for that part of Surrey was at Kingston. The Lords and Commons ordered the sheriffs and justices of peace to suppress the gathering with the train-bands, and secure the magazine. The like orders were soon sent into every part of the kingdom; and nearly every where they were readily obeyed. Lord Digby escaped and fled beyond sea; Colonel Lunsford was taken and safely lodged in the Tower. The parliament sent for Sir John Byron, the new lieutenant of the Tower, to question him concerning his sending arms to Whitehall; but he refused to attend, telling the messenger that he had an order from the king not to stir out of the Tower, and giving him a copy of a royal warrant, which was to that purpose. He was then sent for again, and ordered to come at his peril. Byron now attended, gave an account to the Lords of what arms and ammunition he had sent, and afterward he gave the same account to the Commons—first kneeling at the bar of both Houses for his contempt in not attending to the first summons; and so he was dismissed. On the same day (the 12th of January) the lord steward reported to the Lords that his majesty would command the lord mayor to appoint two hundred men out of the train-bands of the city to wait on the two Houses, under the command of the Earl of Lindsay, his chamberlain. The House of Commons, without regarding this message, called up two companies of the train-bands of the city and suburbs, and placed them under the command of Sergeant-major Skippon. They also ordered, in conjunction with the Lords, that the Earl of Newport, master of the ordnance, and the Lieutenant of the Tower should not suffer any arms or ammunition to be removed without their express orders; and that, for the better safeguard of the Tower, the sheriffs of London and Middlesex should appoint a sufficient guard to watch that fortress both by land and water. Their minds, indeed, were now almost wholly occupied by the thoughts of arsenals, arms, and ammunition. Mr. Bagshaw of Windsor informed the Commons that he had seen several troops of horse gathering in that town, where the court still was, and that there had gone in there a wagon loaded with ammunition. Sergeant-major Skippon was hereupon ordered to send out troops of horsemen as scouts from time to time, to give intelligence if any force should approach the city; and at the same time a number of boats and small vessels were sent up the river beyond Kingston for the like service. Information was given that some ships laden with arms, ammunition, and provisions for the rebels in Ireland, were about to sail from Dunkirk: both Houses represented this dangerous circumstance to the Dutch ambassador, who undertook that the Dutch ships that were lying before Dunkirk should intercept any vessels so laden.

An order was sent from both Houses to Colonel Goring, who was then governor of Portsmouth, requiring him not to deliver up that town, nor receive any forces into it, without their authority. The Commons sent a message to the Lords, informing them that there was at Hull a magazine of arms of the king's for sixteen thousand men, with ammunition in proportion; that the country adjacent was full of papists and ill-affected persons; and that, therefore, they desired their lordships' concurrence in an order that some of the train-bands of Yorkshire should be put into the town of Hull, under the command of the trusty Sir John Hotham. Their lordships consented; and, that their order might make the greater speed down to Hull, the Commons requested Mr. John Hotham, a member of their House, and son to Sir John, to go immediately with it. This service was not wiht-out danger; but young Hotham stood up in the gallery, and exclaimed, "Mr. Speaker! fall back, fall edge, I will go down and perform your commands." A committee was then appointed to attend especially to the best means of putting the kingdom in a posture of defense. The members of this committee were Mr. Pierpoint, Sir Richard Carr, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Glynne, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir Henry Vane, the chancellor of the exchequer, and the solicitor-general, St. John. The Lords, however, refused to join with the Commons in the petition to the king for the removal of Sir John Byron from the lieutenancy of the Tower.

A few days after his majesty's departure from Whitehall, the Earl of Essex acquainted the Lords that the king had laid his commands upon him as lord chamberlain of the household, and upon the Earl of Holland as groom of the stole, to attend his majesty at Hampton Court; but the House would not dispense with their absence at a moment when so many great and urgent affairs were depending; and thereupon Essex and Holland excused themselves to his majesty as well as they could, telling him that, in obedience to his own writ, they were obliged to assist in parliament, and that their attendance there would be truer service to his majesty than any they could do him at court. Charles, some weeks after, sent a messenger to demand the staff of the one, and the key of the other, which the two lords resigned accordingly.

It was now apparent to most men that the kingdom was about to blaze with the long-conceived flame of civil war.[1] The Scottish commissioners, raised into vast importance by their skillful management of affairs, chose this moment to offer their mediation between the king and his English parliament. On the 15th of January they presented a paper of humble desires to Charles, telling him that the disturbances of England must needs disquiet and distemper the peace of Scotland—that the two countries were mutually bound to maintain the peace and liberty of one another—that they (the commissioners) conceived that the present distractions were maintained by the wicked plots and practices of papists, prelates, and their adherents, whose aim was to prevent all further reformation, and to subvert the purity and truth of religion, for which end they had constantly labored to stir up divisions, by their questioning the authority of parliaments, the liberties of the subject, &c. "And to acquit ourselves of the trust imposed in us," said the Scottish commissioners, "and to testify our brotherly affection to this kingdom, we do make offer of our humble endeavors for composing of these differences; and to that purpose do beseech your majesty, in these extremities, to have recourse to the sound and faithful advice of the honorable Houses of parliament; and to repose thereupon as as the only assured and happy means to establish the prosperity and quiet of this kingdom; . . . . . and we are confident that, if your majesty shall be graciously pleased to take in good part, and give ear to these our humble and faithful desires, that the success of your majesty's affairs, howsoever perplexed, shall be happy to your majesty and joyful to all your people."[1] On the same day the Scottish commissioners sent a paper to the parliament, offering their mediation with the king, and thanking them for their assistance lately given to the kingdom of Scotland, in settling the troubles there. They declared that next to the providence of God, and his majesty's justice and goodness, they were most beholden to the mediation and brotherly kindness of the English parliament. They told them that they had "taken the boldness" to send their humble and faithful advice to the king, and that they hoped the two honorable Houses would "think timeously" of the fairest and fittest ways for composing all present differences. On the 19th of January, Charles, in a letter from Windsor, let the Scottish commissioners know that he had expected, before they should have intermeddled, that they would have acquainted him with their resolution in private; and that he trusted that, for the time coming, they would no way engage themselves in these private differences, without first communicating their intentions to him in private. He also wrote to the Earl of Lanark, now secretary for Scotland, to whom he bitterly complained of the course pursued by the commissioners in meddling and offering to mediate betwixt him and his English parliament. The letter was sent down by his confidential servant Mungo Murray, who was to tell Lanark some things which his majesty did not think fit to write. The House of Commons, of course, received the offer of mediation in a very different manner. On the day after it was presented they ordered Sir Philip Stapleton to return thanks to the Scottish commissioners, assuring them that what they had done was very acceptable to the House, who would continue their care to remove the present distractions, as also to confirm and preserve the union between the two nations. A few days after this the commissioners concluded an arrangement for the sending of 2500 men of the Scotch army into Ireland, to make head against the rebellion, which now threatened the entire loss of that country.

The Lords joined the Commons in petitioning the king to proceed with the impeachment of Lord Kimbolton and the five members. Charles again offered a free pardon. With this the two Houses would not rest satisfied: and they both demanded justice against the informers on whose testimony his majesty had acted. On the 20th of January the king, by message, desired the parliament to digest and condense into one body all the grievances of the kingdom, promising his favorable assent to those means which should be found most effectual for redress; but the Commons scarcely heeded this message, knowing at the moment that Charles had already sent Lord Digby abroad in search of foreign assistance.[1] Charles's conduct with regard to the Irish rebels also excited their discontent and vehement suspicions. "It was then also generally talked, and much complained of among the well-affected people, that the king had been so backward in proclaiming those barbarous Irish rebels; and not only talked among the people, but alledged by the parliament itself (in their own declaration afterward, when the breach between king and parliament grew greater) as a sign that those inhuman rebels had been countenanced by the court of England, in that the proclamation whereby they were declared traitors was so long withheld as to the 1st of January, though the rebellion broke forth in October before, and then no more than forty copies were appointed to be printed, with a special command from his majesty not to exceed that number, and that none of them should be published till the king's pleasure were further signified, as by the warrant appears (a true copy whereof was printed), so that a few only could take notice of it. And this (say they) was made more observable by the late contrary proceedings against the Scots, who were in a very quick and sharp manner proclaimed, and those proclamations forthwith dispersed with as much diligence as might be through all the kingdom, and ordered to be read in every church, accompanied with public prayers and execrations."[2]

The Irish insurgents, or rebels, had styled themselves the queen's army, and professed that the cause of their rising was to maintain the king's prerogative and the queen's religion against the Puritan parliament of England. There was also observed, on the part of Charles, a backwardness to send over assistance to the Protestant party in Ireland, who were as much Puritans as his English subjects, and a forwardness to expedite men who were notorious for their attachment to the old Roman church. Some of the incidents that came to light are not of the greatest importance, but every indication of a leaning to the insurgents now excited suspicion in the minds of the English people. When the Earl of Leicester, the new lord lieutenant, waited upon his majesty to receive his instructions, he was for a long time put off with excuses. The ships directed to lie upon the coast of Ireland to annoy the insurgents, and prevent the introduction of ammunition, arms, and other assistance from foreign parts, were called off, and powder and arms were actually thrown in during their absence, and it was afterward shown that Charles himself had withdrawn the ships. Great numbers of papists, both English and Irish, some of whom had served the king in his unlucky campaigns against the Scottish Covenanters, went out of England immediately before or shortly after the insurrection, and joined their coreligionists in arms; others remaining in England prepared, or were said to be preparing, arms, ammunition, money, corn, and other victuals for the assistance and encouragement of the Irish. On the 29th of January the Lords and Commons issued strict orders to the sheriffs, justices of peace, &c., to stay and prevent these perilous enterprises. At the same time the Commons plainly asserted that Charles had granted licenses to papists of this class to pass over to Ireland, in doing which they only echoed the opinion expressed in petitions from the city of London, from the knights, gentlemen, ministers, and others of the counties of Essex, Hertfordshire, &c. The Commons had found it necessary to apply to the city for a loan of £100,000 for the service in Ireland; and the citizens, after reminding them that they had not yet been paid for money already lent, complained bitterly that the brotherly offers of Scotland to send troops into Ireland had been shamefully rejected, or the acceptance of them deferred, while their brethren were yet daily massacred there; that commissions to proper officers were slowly issued; that the money already sent thither had been exhausted in maintaining forces which were so situated as to be of little use; that the malignant faction of papists here were encouraged, and the Irish rebels so much emboldened as to boast that they would first extirpate the British nation there, and then make England the seat of war; that the not disarming of papists in England, after so many discoveries of their treacheries and bloody designs against parliament—that the great decay of fortifications, block-houses, and other sea-forts—the not placing all of them in the hands of men in whom the parliament might confide—the not removing the present Lieutenant of the Tower, the maintenance of whom in his command had caused merchants to desist from bringing money to the Mint,—all tended to overthrow trade more and more, and to make money scarce in the city and kingdom; that the king's ships, which ought to be a wall of defense to the kingdom, were not employed as they ought to be, but used for the conveying away of delinquents, who durst not abide the test of the parliament; that the not questioning those many thousands of unknown persons who were collected and sheltered in Covent Garden and thereabouts, without any lawful calling, and probably with a design of lying in readiness for some desperate attempt, was a thing that might endanger the welfare and safety of his majesty, the parliament, and city; that the misunderstanding between the king and parliament, the not vindicating the privileges of parliament, the not suppressing of protections, the not punishing of delinquents, and the not executing of all priests and Jesuits legally condemned, while others, contrary to the privilege of parliament, had been illegally charged with treason, did most exceedingly fill the minds of men with fears and discouragements, and so disable them from lending that cheerful assistance which they were well inclined to. The citizens of London, and the petitioners of Essex, Hertfordshire, &c., humbly conceived that the great evils under which they labored and languished had sprung from the employing of ill-affected persons in places of trust and honor, and near to his majesty's person, and were still continued by means of the votes of bishops and popish lords in the House of Peers. And they begged leave to protest before God and the high court of parliament, that if any further miseries befell their brethren in Ireland, or any mischief broke in upon England, it ought to be imputed wholly to such as endeavored to hinder the effectual and speedy cure of these state evils.

[1] Admiral Pennington was examined by the Commons about the flight of Lord Digby; and the admiral declared that his lordship had produced to him his majesty's warrant, dated the 13th of January, at Windsor, signed with his majesty's own hand, and commanding him (the admiral) to carry the Lord Digby to any place beyond sea, either in France or Holland.

Upon these remarkable petitions the Commons desired a conference with the Lords, and appointed Pym to manage it. The Lower House had been for some time apprehensive of a falling off on the part of the Upper House. Pym now flatly told their lordships that they must either join the Commons in the cure of this epidemical disease, whereof the commonwealth lay gasping, or be content to see the Commons do without them. "I am now," said Pym, "come to a conclusion, and I have nothing to propound to your lordships by way of request or desire from the House of Commons: I doubt not but that your judgments will tell you what is to be done; your consciences, your honors, your interests, will call upon you for the doing of it: the Commons will be glad to have your help and concurrence in saving of the kingdom, but, if they should fail of it, it shall not discourage them of doing their duty. And whether the kingdom be lost or saved (as, through God's blessing, I hope it will be), they shall be sorry that the story of this present parliament should tell posterity that, in so great a danger and extremity, the House of Commons should be enforced to save the kingdom alone, and that the House of Peers should have no part in the honor of the preservation of it, you having so great an interest in the good success of those endeavors, in respect of your great estates and high degrees of nobility. My lords, consider what the present necessities and dangers of the commonwealth require, what the Commons have reason to expect, to what endeavors and counsels the concurrent desires of all the people do invite you; so that, applying yourselves to the preservation of the king and kingdom, I may be bold to assure you, in the name of all the Commons of England, that you shall be bravely seconded."[1] The House of Commons forthwith ordered that the speaker, in the name of all, should give thanks to Mr. Pym for his able performance of the service in which he had been employed; and they further desired that Mr. Pym would deliver in writing to the House the speech he had made at this conference, in order that it might be printed.

A few days after Charles sent a message to the Commons, telling them that he had taken notice of a speech pretending in the title to have been delivered by Mr. Pym, and printed by order of their House, in which it was affirmed that, since the stopping of the ports, many of the chief commanders now at the head of the Irish rebels had been suffered to pass by his majesty's immediate warrant. Charles said that, having been very certain of having used extreme caution in the granting of passports for Ireland, he conceived either that this printed speech had not been so delivered, or that the House had received some misinformation; that he wished to know from them the truth, and called upon them to review their information, that either it might be found to have been false and injurious both to the House and to his majesty, or that he might know by what means and by whose fault his authority had been so highly abused as to be made to conduce to the assistance of that rebellion which he so much detested and abhorred. The Commons instantly replied that they acknowledged that the said speech was delivered by Mr. Pym, and printed by their order; that its contents were agreeable to the sense of the House, which had received advertisements concerning several Irish papists and others who had obtained his majesty's immediate warrant for their passing into Ireland since the orders issued by both Houses of parliament, and that they had been informed those men had since joined the rebels and become commanders among them. The Commons added, that others had been stayed, and were yet in safe custody, particularly the Lord Delvin and some other persons in his company, including, as was thought, a priest; one Colonel Butler, brother to the Lord Minyard, now in rebellion; Sir George Hamilton, a known papist, like the rest; and a son of Lord Nettersfield, whose father and brother were both in rebellion. "We, your most faithful subjects," said the Commons, "are very sorry that the extreme caution with your majesty hath used hath been so ill-seconded by the diligence and faithfulness of your ministers, and that your royal authority should be so highly abused, although, as it was expressed in that speech by Mr. Pym, we believe it was by the procurement of some evil instruments too near your royal person, without your majesty's knowledge and intention." And, in the end, the Commons called upon Charles to vindicate his honor for the time past, and secure his kingdom from like mischief for the time to come. Charles replied, that no such persons as those complained of had passed into Ireland with his warrant or privity; that there were not grounds enough for such a direct and positive affirmation on their parts, that Pym's speech, in respect of the place and person, and its being now acknowledged to be agreeable to the sense of the House, might injure his majesty in the affections of many of his good subjects, considering the many scandalous pamphlets imputing to him in like manner an indifference in regard to that rebellion, so horrid and odious to all Christians. He called upon them to name the persons who, by his license, had passed into Ireland to join the rebels; he asked them again to reëxamine their evidence; and, as he was confident they could never prove what they had asserted, he trusted they would publish such a declaration as might discover their mistake and exculpate his majesty, who, from his soul, was resolved to discharge his duty for the relief of his poor Protestant subjects in Ireland. It was true, he said, he had given his warrants to Colonel Butler and the son of Lord Nettersfield; but this was when he was in Scotland, and long, as he thought, before the order of the parliament for closing the ports. Butler, he said, was uncle to the Earl of Ormond, a good Protestant: and, to his majesty's knowledge, there was no suspicion attached to the son of Lord Nettersfield. As for the others, he said it might be they had obtained warrants from him since the order of the two Houses: but he assured the parliament that he had no intimation of any such order till their arrest of Sir George Hamilton, the last he had licensed to pass into Ireland. He had examined his own memory, and the notes of his secretaries, to find what other warrants had been granted, but could find none for Irish, except to the Earl of St. Albans and two of his servants, and to one Walter Tyrrell, a poor man, none of whom, he was assured, were with the rebels. It might be that the persons named by the Commons were papists; but the local government of Ireland, whose letters were not disapproved by the parliament here, had thought fit to arm several Catholic noblemen of the pale, who had made professions of their loyalty, and therefore he could not imagine it unsafe to give licenses to some few, who, though papists, professed due allegiance. The Commons rejoined that it was notorious, both in England and Ireland, that many priests, Jesuits, and popish commanders had passed over to the latter country; that Colonel Butler, who had been opportunely stayed, was expected and much desired by the rebels, who for a long time kept a regiment to be commanded by him; that the colonel's brother was general of the rebels in Munster; that the colonel's friend and traveling companion, one Captain Sutton, had actually got over to Ireland, and obtained the place of a colonel among the rebels; that all the sons of Lord Nettersfield were dangerous persons, papists bred in the wars in the service of the King of Spain, and one of them lately become a Jesuit; that two of these, the Jesuit and a soldier, had passed into Ireland by virtue of his majesty's warrant, as they had cause to believe. They hinted that a warrant made for one or two might, by the subtilty of the enemy, be extended to many: that warrants might have been obtained without the king's knowing of them or being fully aware of their intention; and they hoped that all this would be sufficient to convince him that, as they had some cause to give credit to the information they received, so they had no intention of making any ill use of it to his majesty's dishonor, but imputed the blame to his ministers. This exchange of messages was prolonged for many weeks. It ended (at the end of March, when Charles was at York) by the king's declaring that he should expect the House of Commons to publish a declaration that they had been deceived, that his majesty had been very cautious in giving passes, and that his ministers had not abused his trust by granting surreptitious warrants; and on the other side, by the Commons persisting in their disbelief of all his protestations. We believe that in some respects their suspicions were unfounded; but it is extremely difficult, with all the evidence we have before us, which is probably more than what was in the hands of the Commons, to separate Charles's dislike of the monstrous massacre by the infuriated papists, from his hopes and designs of strengthening himself by Irish means; and there were indisputably constantly recurring circumstances which tended to keep alive all kinds of jealousies and alarms, particularly in a state of the public mind which had long ceased to respect the royal word in any thing.

A few days after Lord Digby's escape, a packet, addressed by his lordship to his brother-in-law, Sir Lewis Dives, was intercepted and read in the House of Commons.[1] A letter for the queen, inclosed in the packet, was opened and read with just as little ceremony. In the letter Digby said, "If the king betake himself to a safe place, where he may avow and protect his servants (from rage I mean, and violence, for from justice I will never implore it), I shall then live in impatience and misery till I wait upon you. But if, after all he hath done of late, he shall betake himself to the easiest and compliantest ways of accommodation, I am confident that then I shall serve him more by my absence than by all my industry." At the very opening of this letter was an offer to correspond with the queen in ciphers, and to do service abroad, for which the king's instructions were desired. The Commons were naturally thrown into a great heat by the strain in which their proceedings were now spoken of by one who, like Strafford, had formerly been among the most zealous asserters of popular rights. They appointed a committee to consider the intercepted letters, and, with little loss of time, both Houses joined in the following representation to his most gracious majesty: "Most gracious sovereign, your majesty's most loyal and faithful subjects, the Lords and Commons in parliament, have received your message sent at the instance of the queen's majesty, and upon consideration thereof, to our great joy and content, find therein clear expressions of grace and favor from both your majesties, for which we return our most humble thanks, and have herewithal sent the transcript of that letter required by your majesty, as likewise of two other letters directed to Master Secretary Nicholas and Sir Lewis Dives, all of which were brought to us under one cover, endorsed to Mr. Secretary, with information that they were written by the Lord Digby; who, being a person fled from the justice of parliament, and one who had given many evidences of disaffection to the public good, we conceived it necessary to open the two former; and finding sundry expressions in them full of asperity and malignity to the parliament, we thought it very probable that the like might be contained in that to her majesty, and that it would be dishonorable to her majesty, and dangerous to the kingdom, if it should not be opened, wherein we were not a whit deceived, as your majesty may conceive by the contents thereof. And although we can not but be very sensible of the great dishonor therein done to your majesties, and the malicious endeavors of fomenting and increasing the jealousies betwixt your majesty and your people, yet we are far from reflecting any thing upon the queen, or expecting any satisfaction from her majesty, but impute all to the bold and envenomed spirit of the man; only we most earnestly beseech your majesty to persuade the queen that she will not vouchsafe any countenance to, or correspondence with, the Lord Digby, or any other the fugitives or traitors, whose offenses now depend under the examination and judgment of parliament; which we assure ourselves will be very effectual to further the removal of all jealousies and discontents betwixt your majesty and your people, and the settling the great affairs of your majesty and the kingdom in an assured state and condition of honor, safety, and prosperity."

[1] According to Clarendon, Digby's letter was brought to the House of Commons by the treachery of the persons to whose care it was intrusted for conveyance. We learn from Rushworth that, beside writing to Dives, Digby also wrote to Secretary Nicholas, who was now trusted with most of the secret plans of the court.

This was worse than gall and wormwood to the court. Nor did the parliament stop here: a committee of the Commons drew up a charge of high treason against Lord Digby. Henrietta Maria, who never was the heroine that some have delighted to picture her, who in no particular of her life showed any high-mindedness, was terrified almost out of her senses by the notion that the Commons meant to impeach her, and self-preservation, and wounded pride, and an indefinite hope of doing great things against the parliament of England among the absolute princes on the continent. all prompted her to be gone. Both Houses intimated to her, through the Earl of Newport and the Lord Seymour, that there was no ground for the fears they were aware she entertained of the intention of the Commons to accuse her of high treason. She replied that she had, indeed, heard a general report of an accusation intended against her, but that having seen no articles in writing she gave little credit to such rumors, and would now give less, as the House of Commons seemed to assure her that they had never entertained a thought of any such proceeding. But there was now an excellent pretext for Henrietta Maria's departure. In the midst of this unhappy turmoil with his parliament, Charles had married his daughter Mary to the young Prince of Orange, and it seemed proper and expedient that the young lady should be conducted by her mother to her betrothed husband. The king readily entered into the scheme of this journey. but it was necessary to obtain the consent of the parliament. He therefore acquainted both Houses with the matter; and, as neither of them raised any very strong opposition, the royal party got ready for the coast, Charles resolving to accompany them as far as Dover. The plate of the queen's chamber was melted down for the expenses of the journey, and the whole of the crown jewels were secretly packed up, to be converted on the other side of the water into arms and gunpowder. On the 9th of February Charles, with his wife and children, came back from Windsor to Hampton Court; on the 10th he proceeded to Greenwich: on the morrow to Rochester, and so, by slow stages, to Dover, where the queen and princess embarked for Holland on the 23d of February.[1]

While he was yet at Canterbury, and his wife with him, Charles's assent was demanded to two bills which the Commons had got carried through the Lords; the one was to take away the votes of the bishops in parliament, and to remove them and all others in holy orders from all temporal jurisdiction and offices whatsoever; the other for pressing of soldiers for the service of Ireland. The latter, after reciting that. by the laws of the realm, none of his majesty's subjects ought to be impressed or compelled to go out of their country to serve as soldiers. except in urgent necessity, or in case of their being bound by tenure of their lands, enacted that. for the prevention of the plots and conspiracies in the kingdom of Ireland, and also in that of England, it should be lawful, from the 1st of December. 1641, to the 1st of November, 1642. for the justices, &c., to raise as many men, by impress, for soldiers, gunners, and chirurgeons, as might be appointed by his majesty and both Houses of parliament. Charles passed the two bills, and, in a message to both Houses, said he felt assured that his so doing (the bill about the bishops he had formerly declared he would die rather than pass) would convince them that he desired nothing more than the satisfaction of his kingdom. He then spoke of his zeal for executing the penal statutes against recusants; of his determination to banish by proclamation all Romish priests within twenty days; of his readiness to refer all matters concerning the troubles likely to arise in the hearts of the people about the government and liturgy of the church to the sole consideration of the wisdom of his parliament. He desired that they would not press him to any single act on his part, till the whole church system should be so digested and settled by both Houses, that he might clearly see what was fit to be left, as well as what was fit to be taken away. But of the bishops, whose political existence was annihilated by the passing of the first of these two acts,—of Laud, who lay in the Tower uncertain of his fate,—Charles breathed not a syllable. And, from his promptness in passing the bill, and his unmurmuring silence upon it, all thinking men concluded that he was acting with mental reservation, and with the determined purpose of declaring that bill and others null and void. and his consent as a painful but necessary sacrifice to the present violence and strength of the parliament, as soon as ever he should be in a condition to do so. The Lords and

Commons, however, professed to acknowledge, with much joy and thankfulness, his majesty's grace and favor in giving his royal assent to these two bills. But on the morrow a committee of the Lords, appointed to discover and prevent evil counselors about his majesty, passed several stinging votes, which were all reported to the Commons. They proposed that all privy councilors and great officers of state, except such as held their places by inheritance, should be removed. and that none should be received into those places but such as should be recommended by the humble advice of both Houses of parliament; that Endymion Porter, William Murray, Sir John Winter, and others, should be removed forever from the persons of the king and queen. On the next day the House of Commons suggested new modes of raising money for the reduction of Ireland, grandly proposing to apply to that purpose a million of money—the first time, we believe, that so large a sum was ever mentioned in a parliamentary estimate. On the 17th of February they went into a committee on a bill for the suppressing of innovations in the church, for the abolishing of superstitious and scandalous ministers, and all idolatrous practices, for the better observance of the Lord's Day called Sunday, and for the settling of preaching and preachers. By these and the like proceedings the religious zeal of the people was kept warm and active, and the petitions and addresses of the masses, in town and country, encouraged the Commons by the agreeable consciousness of their own power.

But there was another bill which the Commons had at heart, and which Charles was resolute not to pass, wishing, however, it should seem, to get the queen safely out of the country before he should declare this resolution. The Commons felt that they could never be safe until they had the whole power of the sword in their own hands. It was undeniably Charles's attempt to seize the five members, which induced them to insist peremptorily upon vesting the command of the militia in officers of their own choice and nomination. There had been a strong tendency this way before: for example, on the 5th of May, 1641, upon the discovery of Percy's and Jermyn's conspiracy to ride over the parliament with the army of the north, an order was made that the members of each county, &c., should meet to consider in what state the places for which they served were in respect of arms and ammunition, and whether the deputy lieutenants and lord lieutenants were persons well affected to religion and the public peace; and the members were also to present the names of these lord lieutenants, &c., to the House, and to report who were the governors of the forts and castles in their respective counties.[1] On the 7th of December, 1641, when the storm was thickening and the whole atmosphere overcast by the horrors from Ireland, Hazlerig brought in a bill for appointing certain persons, whose names were left in blank, to the offices of lords general of all the forces within England and Wales, and lord admiral of England. The bill, however, was laid aside, and a new plan devised, it being ordered, on the 31st of December, that the House should resolve itself into a committee on Monday next, to take into consideration the militia of the kingdom. That Monday—that black Monday—was the day on which Charles sent his first message by the attorney-general, Herbert, about Lord Kimbolton and the five members. On January the 13th, of the present year, 1642, the second day after the triumphant return of the Commons from the city, a declaration, as we have mentioned, was passed for providing for the defense of the kingdom, by which all officers, magistrates, &c., were enjoined to take care that no soldiers should be raised, nor any castles or arms given up without his majesty's pleasure signified to both Houses of parliament. The Lords at first refused to concur in this declaration;[1] but when the danger thickened, their lordships changed their minds, and only a few days after their refusal (on February the 16th) they resolved to go along with the other House. This ordinance concerning the militia, however, had not even been carried through the Lower House without opposition, for while the majority maintained that the power of the militia was not in the king but solely in the parliament (and that if the king refused to order the same according to the advice of his parliament, they might then lawfully do it without him), the minority insisted that the power of the militia was solely in the king, that it ought to be left to him, and that the parliament never did or ought to meddle with it. Whitelock gave it as his humble opinion that the power of the militia was neither in the king alone nor in the parliament alone; but if any where in the eye of the law, it was in the king and parliament both consenting together. He afterwards said that he could not join in advice with those who wished to settle the militia of themselves without the king, but rather went with those who moved that they should again petition his majesty that the militia might be settled in such hands as both he and his parliament might agree upon to trust, and who, it was hoped, would be more careful to keep the sword sheathed than to draw it. But this proposition was about the most impracticable that could be made; for those whom the king trusted the parliament distrusted, and those who enjoyed the confidence of parliament were objects of hatred and disgust to the king. In fact, the entire business was now in such a state that the appeal to the sword was inevitable, and, constitutionally or unconstitutionally, parliament determined not to resign the command of troops who might on the very morrow be employed against them. They therefore resolved to place the command of the sword in the hands of those whom they could both trust and control, and they nominated in their bill the lord lieutenants of all the counties who were to obey the orders of the two Houses of parliament, and to be irremovable by the king for two years. This was an open death-blow to the prerogative; but it is difficult to conceive by what other fence the members of that parliament could have secured their existence, or guarantied for a week the many great and many good things they had obtained for the nation.[1]

[1] Thirty-two peers declared that the demand of the Commons was reasonable and necessary, and protested against the vote by which their lordships rejected the declaration about the militia. These protesting peers were Essex, Warwick, Pembroke, Holland, Stamford, Bedford, Leicester, Clare, Lincoln, Sarum, Bolingbroke, Peterborough, Thanet, Nottingham, Saye and Sele, Conway, Paget, Kimbolton, Brook, Roberts, North, Wharton, St. John, Spencer, Newnham, Willoughby, Bruce, Dacres, Howard de Escrick, Grey de Werk, Chandos, Hunsdon.

The Militia Bill was tendered to Charles on the 19th or 20th of February: he was then on the Kentish coast, and the queen had not yet got off. On the 21st the Lord Stamford reported to the House of Peers the king's answer to their petition respecting the ordering of the militia of the kingdom, which was, that this being a business of the highest importance, not only for the kingdom in general, but also for his majesty's regal authority, he thought it most necessary to take some time to advise thereupon, and that therefore he could not promise a positive answer until he should return, which he intended to do as soon as he should have put his dearest consort the queen, and his dear daughter the Princess Mary, on board. When this message was brought down to the Commons, though it fell far short of an absolute refusal (and that, we believe, solely because the queen was not safely off), it excited great discontent, and led to the immediate drawing up of another petition more energetic than its predecessor. The Lords joined in this petition, and it was ordered to be presented by the Earl of Portland and two members of the Lower House. Charles was told that they had, with a great deal of grief, received his last answer; that his majesty, by a gracious message formerly sent unto them, had been pleased to promise that the militia should be put into such hands as parliament should approve of or recommend unto him, the extent of their power and the time of their continuance being declared; that after that was done, and the honorable persons who should hold the command nominated by both Houses, his majesty nevertheless was now deferring his resolution to a longer and very uncertain time, which delay in the midst of the present dangers and distractions, was as unsatisfactory as an absolute denial; that they once again besought him to give them such an answer as might raise in them a confidence that they should not be exposed to the practices of those who were thirsting after the ruin of the kingdom; that nothing but the instant granting of their humble petition could enable them to suppress the rebellion in Ireland, or secure themselves; and that the laws both of God and man enjoined them to put this bill in execution, as several counties by their daily petitions had desired them to do, and in some places were beginning already to do it of themselves.[1] Charles was now less courteous than before, for by the time this petition was presented, the queen was on ship-board.[2] On the day on which she sailed, the 23d of February, he wrote an extraordinary letter to the Earl of Berkshire, who produced it in the House of Lords, where several other peers affirmed that they had received letters from the king to the same effect; whereupon the House went into committee to consider what ill counsels had been given to his majesty, &c. On the 25th Charles returned to Canterbury, and sent orders that the Prince of Wales should meet him at Greenwich. This order was instantly communicated to parliament, apparently by the Marquis of Hertford, the governor of the young prince. Both Houses joined in a message, representing that the prince might not be removed from Hampton Court, and that for these reasons:—that they had conceived that the prince was to stay at Hampton Court until his majesty's return; that the Lord Marquis of Hertford, appointed by his majesty to be governor of the prince, and approved of and commanded by the parliament to give his personal attendance on the prince, was now so indisposed in his health that he was not able to attend the prince to any other place; and that the removal of the prince at this time might be a cause to promote jealousies and fears in the hearts of his majesty's good subjects, which they conceived it very necessary to avoid. To this Charles answered, that the prince's going to meet him at Greenwich was no way contrary to his former intention,—that he was very sorry to hear of the indisposition of the marquis,—and that as for the fears and jealousies spoken of, he knew not what answer to give, not being able to imagine from what grounds they proceeded. In the mean time Hertford, who had got as suddenly well as he had fallen sick, had been at Greenwich, and, in defiance of parliament, had put the young prince into his father's hands. On Sunday the 27th of February, some of the Lords were sent to Greenwich to endeavor to bring the prince back to London; but the king told them haughtily, that he would take charge of the prince himself, and carry him along with him wherever he went, repeating that he knew not the grounds of such fears and suspicions. Charles then moved from Greenwich to Theobalds, being now, as he conceived, ready for a longer journey. He was followed to Theobalds

[1] Clarendon himself says, that Charles's violent proceedings in the case of the five members made the House feel that they had no security except in this militia bill. "When this bill had been with much ado accepted, and first read, there were few men who imagined it would ever receive further countenance; but now there were very few who did not believe it to be a very necessary provision for the peace and safety of the kingdom. So great an impression had the late proceedings made upon them that, with little opposition, it passed the Commons, and was sent up to the Lords."—Hist.

[2] His answer, usually called the king's final answer, was not received in parliament till the 28th of February. In it Charles referred at some length to his mad attempt to seize in person the five members, and labored to excuse his conduct in that particular. He said, "For the persons nominated to be lieutenants of the several counties of England and Wales, his majesty is contented to allow that recommendation; only concerning the city of London, and such other corporations as, by ancient charters, have granted unto them the power of the militia, his majesty doth not conceive that it can stand with justice or policy to alter their government in that particular. (He was suspected at that very moment of a design of getting the train-bands of the city of London at his disposal.) . . . . As to the time desired for the continuance of the powers to be granted, his majesty giveth this answer; that he can not consent to divest himself of the just power which God and the laws of this kingdom have placed in him for the defense of his people and to put it into the hands of others for any indefinite time."

by an urgent petition of both Houses, entreating him to yield the point about the militia, and telling him that if he did not they should be compelled, and were resolved, to take that matter into their own hands for the safety of the kingdom. They moreover besought him to return to his capital and parliament, and not to remove the young prince to a distance from them. "And they beseech your majesty," continued this petition, "to be informed by them, that, by the laws of the kingdom, the power of raising, ordering, and disposing the militia, within any city, town, or other place, can not be granted to any corporation, by charter or otherwise, without the authority and consent of parliament; and that those parts of the kingdom which have put themselves in a posture of defense against the common danger have therein done nothing but according to the declaration and direction of both Houses, and what is justifiable by all the laws of this kingdom." This was plain speaking. Charles also thought that the time was now come for him to adopt the same kind of language. He said hastily, "I am so much amazed at this message that I know not what to answer. You speak of jealousies and fears: lay your hands to your hearts and ask yourselves whether I may not likewise be disturbed with fears and jealousies; and, if so, I assure you this message hath nothing lessened them. For the militia, I thought so much of it before I sent that answer, and am so much assured that the answer is agreeable to what in justice or reason you can ask, or I in honor grant, that I shall not alter it in any point. For my residence near you, I wish it might be so safe and honorable that I had no cause to absent myself from Whitehall; ask yourselves whether I have not. For my son, I shall take that care of him which shall justify me to God as a father, and to my dominions as a king. To conclude: I assure you, upon my honor, that I have no thought but of peace and justice to my people, which I shall, by all fair means, seek to preserve and maintain, relying upon the goodness and providence of God for the preservation of myself and rights."[1] As soon as this answer from Theobalds was made known in the House, the Commons resolved that the kingdom should be forthwith put into a posture of defense by authority of parliament alone; and that a committee should be appointed to prepare a declaration laying down the just causes of their fears and jealousies, to clear their House from any jealousies conceived of it, and to consider and declare their opinion as to all matters that might arise out of this crisis. Then the Commons demanded a conference with the Lords, and invited them to join in these their resolutions. The first resolution about putting the kingdom on its defense was carried in the Upper House, but not till after a serious debate, nor without some protests; the second resolution was adopted unanimously. Instantly an order was issued by the two Houses for fitting out the entire fleet, and for putting it under the command of the Earl of Northumberland, lord high admiral of England, who was instructed to see all the royal ships rigged and put in readiness, and to make known to all merchants, masters, and owners of trading-vessels, that it would be an acceptable service to the king and parliament if they likewise would cause all their ships to be rigged and equipped, so that they might put to sea at the shortest notice. Both Lords and Commons then adjourned for two days to give time for their joint committee to meet at Merchant Tailors' Hall, and there prepare other matters. On the 5th of March the former militia ordinance was read again in the Lords; but this time the king's name and authority were wholly left out, and the blanks for the names of the lord lieutenants were all filled up by noblemen and gentlemen who had been recommended by the Commons. Many of these lieutenants of counties who were to have command of the militia were royalists,—nearly all were men of the highest rank and attached to monarchy; but then there were many hated names in the list, and Charles was convinced, and probably upon good grounds, that, in the case of a civil war, the majority of them would lean rather to the parliament than to him. He seems to have felt that the array of the aristocracy would have been against him in any attempt to restore the old despotism. To strengthen the ordinance, the Commons sent up to the other House the following resolutions:—That the commissions recently granted under the great seal for lieutenancies for counties were illegal and void; that such commissions should be all called in and canceled; and that whosoever should attempt to execute any such power without consent of parliament should be accounted a disturber of the peace of the kingdom;—and these resolutions were adopted by the Lords with a feeble murmur of dissent from three voices. After this the Commons sent up their famous Declaration, setting forth the causes of their fears and jealousies, linking the king and the court with the Irish rebellion and massacre, asserting that all along there had been a plan for the altering of religion and breaking the neck of parliament,—that the kings of France and Spain had been solicited by the pope's nuncio to lend his majesty 8000 men, to help to maintain his royalty against the parliament; and in the end, inviting his majesty to return to Whitehall, and bring the prince with him, as one of the best ways of removing their apprehension. The Lords, after some debate, resolved that they agreed with the House of Commons in this declaration, and that it should be sent after the king. But fourteen peers entered their names as dissenting from this vote.

The king had removed from Theobalds to Royston on the 3d of March, and, on the 7th, he proceeded from Royston to Newmarket, many persons joining him on the road. On the 9th his "revolted courtiers," the earls of Pembroke and Holland, were after him, and presented at Newcastle this unreserved declaration of the parliament. Holland, it appears, the man who had formerly been the queen's favorite, read the provoking paper. When he came to the passages which related to the royal warrants granted to the two fugitives from parliament, the Lord

Digby and Mr. Jermyn, Charles interrupted him by crying, "That is false!" and when Holland went on and touched again upon the same subject, his majesty exclaimed, "'Tis a lie!" He said that it was a high thing to tax a king with breach of promise; that, for this declaration, he could not have believed the parliament would have sent him such a paper if he had not seen it brought by such persons of honor. "I am sorry for the parliament," continued he, "but am glad I have it (the declaration), for by that I doubt not to satisfy my people. Ye speak of ill counsels, but I am confident the parliament hath had worse information than I have had counsels." He then asked them what he had denied the parliament. The Earl of Holland instanced the militia. "That was no bill," cried the king. "But it is a necessary request at this time," said Holland. "But I have not denied it yet," retorted Charles. On the following day the king delivered his deliberate answer to the declaration. Holland read it, and then endeavored to persuade his majesty to return to his capital. "I would," said Charles, "you had given me cause, but I am sure this declaration is not the way to lead me to it. In all Aristotle's rhetoric there is no such argument of persuasion as this." Then the Earl of Pembroke told him that the parliament had humbly besought his majesty to come near them. "I have learned by their declaration," said Charles, "that these words are not enough." Pembroke then entreated him clearly to express what he would have. "I would whip a boy in Westminster School," said Charles, "who could not tell that by my answer." The king was coarsely oracular, and inclined to play at cross purposes—that wretched game which had brought him to his present straits. Presently he told the messengers of parliament that they were much mistaken if they thought his answer a denial. "Then," said Pembroke, "may not the militia be granted as desired by the parliament for a time?" "No, by God!" exclaimed Charles, "not for an hour. You have asked that of me that was never asked of any king, and with which I will not trust my wife and children."[1] Charles then turned to Ireland, saying, "The business of Ireland will never be done in the way that you are in. Four hundred will never do that work; it must be put into the hands of one. If I were trusted with it, I would pawn my head to end that work; and, though I am a beggar myself, by God I can find money for that." He proceeded to observe, that this declaration of parliament was strange and unexpected, and said he would take time to answer, particularly concerning the grounds of their fears and jealousies. "In the mean time," he continued, "I must tell you that I rather expected a vindication for the imputation laid on me in Master Pym's speech, than that any more general rumors and discourses should get credit with you. For my fears and doubts, I did not think they should have been so groundless or trivial, while so many seditious pamphlets and sermons are looked upon, and so great tumults are remembered, unpunished, uninquired into: I still confess my fears, and call God to witness, that they are greater for the true Protestant profession, my people, and laws, than for my own rights or safety; though I must tell you, I conceive that none of these are free from danger. What would you have? Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to pass any bill for the ease and security of my subjects? I do not ask you what you have done for me. Have any of my people been transported with fears and apprehensions? I have offered as free and general a pardon as yourselves can desire. All this considered, there is a judgment from heaven upon this nation, if these distractions continue. God so deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright, for the maintenance of the true Protestant profession, and for the observation and preservation of the laws of this land; and I hope God will bless and assist those laws for my preservation." These were solemn asseverations: nevertheless at that very moment, the queen was selling and pawning the crown jewels of England, in order to purchase arms and ammunition, and to bring in a foreign army upon the English people.[1] There was truth in the assertion that he had passed many bills for the ease and security of his subjects—that he had made great and valuable concessions; but then, unfortunately for him, it was equally true—as it was equally well known—that he had yielded later than at the eleventh hour, and only in the face of a power rising paramount to his own—that, as long as he could, he had proudly and scornfully resisted the slightest concession. Could such a prince get credit for a sudden conversion? The thing was scarcely to be expected, even had there been no circumstances to provoke suspicion; and there were a thousand such circumstances. Every wind that blew from the continent brought reports of foreign alliances and projected invasions. The fanatics of royalty did not scruple to assert, in safe places, that a foreign army would soon reduce this rebellious people to a proper submission to the crown.

[1] Rushworth.—May says, "The king expressed much indignation when he received this remonstrance, complaining of the manner of it, that it was only an upbraiding, not an invitation or persuasion of him to return to the parliament; and told them that in all Aristotle's rhetoric there was no such argument of persuasion; and that he would answer it in another declaration, which, within a few days after, was drawn up, and published; wherein, with deep protestations, he vindicates the truth of his religion, and justifies his other proceedings, denying those warrants for transporting Master Jermyn and others, in that manner which they urge them; taxes them with their needless fears and uncertain expressions of advertisements from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other places; recites the many gracious acts which he had already passed this parliament, to satisfy his people; and protests, in conclusion, that he is most desirous to reside near his parliament, and would immediately return to London, if he could see or hear of any provisions made for his security."

[1] "It was not unknown to the parliament, at least not unsuspected (for it was usually talked among the people of that time), that the queen, when she passed into Holland, carried with her the crown jewels to pawn or sell there: which, if she did, they could not be ignorant what the intention was, or what the effect was likely to prove; nor could it be unknown to them how unlawful the act was, and therefore how fit to be prevented; for they indicted her afterward of high treason for that fact, and were able to tell the world, in a declaration, how great a crime it is in a king himself to make away the ornaments of the crown, and in particular the jewels of it; yea, in such kings as did it only to spend or give away, not to maintain war against their own people, for whose preservation not only those, but whatsoever they possess, was first bestowed on them."—May

At the same time Charles edged away to the northeast, toward the very coast which had been mentioned as the spot selected for the landing of the invading army. On the 14th of March he went from Newmarket to Huntingdon, whence he dated an elaborate message to the two Houses, and then proceeded to Stamford. In this message he announced to them that he intended fixing his residence for some time in the city of York. He again exculpated himself at the expense of parliament; forbade them to presume upon any pretense to settle the militia, and protested that all their acts to which he was no party, would, and must be illegal and void. Thereupon it was voted by both Houses—"1. That the king's absence so far remote from his parliament is not only an obstruction, but may be a destruction, to the affairs of Ireland. 2. That, when the Lords and Commons in parliament shall declare what the law of the land is, to have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, and a command that it should not be obeyed, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament. 3. That they which advised the king to absent himself from the parliament are enemies to the peace of this kingdom, and justly to be suspected as favorers of the rebellion in Ireland." On the same day (the 16th of March) the Commons voted that the kingdom had been of late, and still was, in imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and from faction at home; that, in this case of extreme danger, seeing his majesty's refusal, the ordinance agreed upon by both Houses for the militia, ought to be obeyed according to the fundamental laws of the kingdom; and that such persons as should be nominated to take the command should execute their office by the joint authority of the two Houses. The Lords agreed; and the lieutenants and deputy lieutenants of the counties began to organize the militia. On the 18th of March, Charles was at Doncaster; on the 19th at York, where he began to organize a separate government. On the 26th, the Lord Willoughby, Lord Dungarvon, and Sir Antony Ereby, arrived at York to present to him the parliament's justification of their late declaration. This document accused him of being the cause of all the troubles, by resisting the militia bill; told him that his fears and doubts were unfounded; besought him to remember that the government of the kingdom before the beginning of the present parliament, consisted of many continued and multiplying acts of violation of the laws; "the wounds whereof were scarcely healed, when the extremity of all those violations was far exceeded by the strange and unheard-of breach of law, in the accusation of the Lord Kimbolton and five members of the Commons' House," for which they had as yet received no full satisfaction. With much thankfulness, they acknowledged that his majesty had passed many good bills, full of contentment and advantage to his people; but truth and necessity enforced them to add, "that ever in or about the time of passing those bills, some design or other had been on foot, which, if successful, would not only have deprived them of the fruit of those bills, but would have reduced them to a worse condition than that in which this present parliament had found the nation." They threw back his offer of a pardon with cold disdain, telling him that it could be no security to their fears and jealousies, which arose, not from any guilt of their own, but from the evil designs and attempts of others. "To this our humble answer," continued the document, "we desire to add an information, which we lately received from the deputy governor of the merchant adventurers at Rotterdam, in Holland, that an unknown person, appertaining to the Lord Digby, did lately solicit one James Henely, a mariner, to go to Elsinore, and to take charge of a ship in the fleet of the King of Denmark there prepared, which he should conduct to Hull; in which fleet likewise he said a great army was to be transported: and, although we are not apt to give credit to information of this nature, yet we can not altogether think it fit to be neglected, but that it may justly add somewhat to the weight of our fears and jealousies, considering with what circumstances it is accompanied, with the Lord Digby's preceding expressions in his letters to her majesty and Sir Lewis Dives, and your majesty's succeeding course of withdrawing yourself northward from your parliament in a manner very suitable and correspondent to that evil counsel, which we doubt will make much deeper impression in the generality of your people." They ended by advising and beseeching his majesty to return to his capital and parliament with all convenient speed, where he should find dutiful affections and earnest endeavors to establish his throne upon the sure foundation of the peace and prosperity of all his kingdoms. In his reply, Charles assumed a haughty and sarcastic tone, telling them that they need not expect his presence until they should both secure him concerning his just apprehensions of tumultuary insolences, and give him satisfaction for those insupportable scandals that had been raised against him. He, however, again protested that he neither desired nor needed any foreign force to preserve him from oppression. But about Hull he said not a word. The fact was, that he and his parliament were now scambling for arms and warlike means, and, having entirely failed in getting possession of the Tower of London, Charles had his eyes fixed upon Hull, as a place, in present circumstances, more important than his capital. Nor was that city, with its magazines of arms, much less important in the eyes of parliament. The reader will remember the appointment of Sir John Hotham to be governor there, and the zeal with which the younger Hotham undertook in the House of Commons to carry down their orders. Nearly at the same moment the king hurried off the Earl of Newcastle, with most gracious letters in his majesty's name, full of clemency and fine promises to the townsmen of Hull, who were commanded to deliver instantly to the said earl the keys of the ports, magazines, block-houses, &c. Newcastle, whose heart misgave him, assumed the name of Sir John Savage, and tried to pass into the town unknown; but he was recognized by some bystanders, and presently forced to own both his name and his errand. The mayor, aldermen, and townsmen of Hull, foreseeing the coming tempest, and knowing that the parliament had resolved to place the government of their town in the hands of Sir John Hotham, resolved upon a petition to beseech his majesty to be pleased to agree with his parliament in this business, that so, without breach of fealty or incurring the displeasure of either king or parliament, they might know in whose hands they were to intrust that strength of the kingdom, and their own lives and property. The king took no notice of this petition; but the House of Lords instantly summoned the Earl of Newcastle to attend at his place in parliament. Charles, it appears, then requested the townsmen to keep Hull themselves, with their mayor as sole governor; and the earl and Captain Legg bestirred themselves among the people: but all was of no avail; the courtiers were driven out, and the younger Hotham was received in the town with three companies of train-bands. The authorities freely surrendered into his hands the magazines and block-houses, and shortly after Sir John Hotham arrived with more companies of the train-bands of Yorkshire. The garrison of Hull was thus raised to about eight hundred men. Parliament then sent a petition to the king for the removal of the stores of arms and ammunition from Hull to the Tower of London, where they might be kept with less charge and more safety, and transported with much more convenience to Ireland, where they were most wanted.[1] Charles, in reply, told them that he rather expected they would have given him an account of their conduct in placing a garrison and a governor in his town of Hull; that he could not think it fit, or consent to the removal of the magazine; that Hull was a more convenient port for shipping for Ulster or Leinster than London; and that they would do well to leave him to look after his own magazines, which were his own property. At the same time, a counter-petition was got up among the royalists of Yorkshire, who prayed that the arms and ammunition might be left at Hull for the better securing of the northern parts; "and the rather," said these petitioners, "because we think it fit that that part of the kingdom should be best provided, where your sacred person doth reside —your person being like David's, the light of Israel, and more worth than ten thousand of us." From the 19th of March to the 22d of April, Charles resided at York: a court was formed around him; a crazy, tottering, timid ministry was put in action, and nights as well as days were spent in deep deliberation, and in the drawing up of declarations, protestations, and other state papers. On the 24th of March, the day on which the act granting him tunnage and poundage expired, Charles issued a proclamation, commanding the continuance of the payment of that tax or duty, and charging all his customers, controllers, collectors, searchers, waiters, &c., and all justices of the peace, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, headboroughs, and others, his majesty's officers and ministers, to take care that the proclamation should be fully executed and the orders performed. Upon the very same day the Lords and Commons published an order, retaining to themselves the entire control of that source of revenue.[1]

[1] In the same petition the Lords and Commons call for the immediate execution of six condemned priests in Newgate, who had been reprieved by the king.

[1] The order of parliament was in these words :—"Whereas the bill of tonnage and poundage is this day expired, and a new bill passed both Houses for the continuance of those payments until the 3d day of May, which can not as yet receive the royal assent, in regard of the remoteness of his majesty's person from the parliament, which moneys to be collected by that bill are to be employed for the necessary guarding of the seas and defense of the commonwealth; it is, therefore, ordered by the Commons now assembled in parliament, that the several officers belonging to the Custom House, both in the port of London and the out-ports, do not permit any merchant or other to lade or unlade any goods or merchandises before such persons do first make due entries thereof in the Custom House and it is also declared by

On the 8th of April Charles sent to acquaint the parliament with his resolution of going into Ireland for suppressing the rebellion there, being most tenderly sensible of the false and scandalous reports dispersed among the people, which not only wounded his honor, but likewise greatly retarded the reducing of that unhappy kingdom. He assured them, and all his loving subjects, that he would earnestly pursue the design for the defense of God's true religion, not declining any hazard of his person; and he called God to witness the sincerity of his professions, and the further assurance that he would never consent to a toleration of the popish profession in Ireland. He then lamely reintroduced the great subject of Hull, telling them that he intended forthwith to raise, by his own commissions, a guard for his person, which was to consist of 2000 foot and 200 horse, all to be armed from his magazines at Hull. He added that he had sent dispatches into Scotland to quicken the levies there making for Ireland, and that he hoped the encouragement given to adventurers would facilitate the raising of men and money for that service. He then spoke once more of the great matter in debate, telling them that he had prepared a bill, to be offered to them by his attorney-general, concerning the militia, whereby he hoped the peace and safety of the kingdom might be secured to the satisfaction of all men, without violation of his majesty's just rights, or prejudice to the liberty of the subject: if this should be thankfully received he would be glad of it; if refused, he called God and all the world to judge on whose part the fault was. Charles was perfectly well aware that the Commons would oppose with all their might his entrance into Hull. Days wore away, and he received no answer to this his last message. On the 22d of April he sent the young Duke of York, his nephew the Prince Palatine, the Earl of Newport, the Lord Willoughby, and "some other persons of honor," but without any armed force, to see the town of Hull. These visitors were respectfully received and entertained by the mayor and the governor, Sir John Hotham. They spent that day in viewing the beauty and the strength of the place, and partaking of a banquet prepared by the mayor and aldermen of Hull. On the morrow, the 23d of April, being St. George's Day, they were all invited to dine with the governor; but a little before dinner-time, Sir John Hotham, being busy in discourse with their highnesses, was suddenly saluted by Sir Lewis Dives, the brother-in-law and correspondent of the fugitive Lord Digby. Sir Lewis delivered to Sir John a message from his majesty, purporting that his majesty also intended to dine with him that day, being then within four miles of Hull with an escort of 300 horse and upward. Old Hotham was startled; but, perceiving what was intended, he hastened to consult with Mr. Pelham, a member of the House of Commons and alderman of Hull, and with some others who were equally pledged to the parliament side. These gentlemen presently decided (there was short time for deliberation) that a messenger should be sent to his majesty, humbly to beseech him to forbear to come, forasmuch as the governor could not, without betraying his trust, admit him with so great a guard. As soon as this messenger had returned, and had brought certain information of the king's advance, Hotham drew up the bridge, shut the gates, and commanded his soldiers to stand to their arms. This was scarcely done when Charles rode up to Beverley gate, called for Sir John Hotham, and commanded him to open the gate. To that frequently repeated command Sir John's only answer was, that he was intrusted by the parliament with the securing of the town for his majesty's honor and the kingdom's use—that he intended, by God's help, to do his duty—that his majesty ought not to misinterpret his conduct into disloyalty—that, if his majesty would be pleased to come in with the Prince of Wales and twelve more, he should be welcome. The king refused to enter without his whole guard. The altercation began at eleven o'clock; at one o'clock the Duke of York, the Elector Palatine, and their attendants, were allowed to go out of the town to join the king. Charles stayed by the gate till four o'clock, when he retired, and gave Sir John Hotham one hour to consider what he did. Perhaps, by thus exhibiting himself, the king hoped to work upon the feelings of the people; but the townsmen of Hull rather offered the parliament soldiers encouragement and assistance. At five o'clock Charles returned to the gate, where he received from the governor the same answer. Thereupon he caused two heralds-at-arms to proclaim Sir John Hotham a traitor; and then, disappointed, enraged, humiliated, he retreated to Beverley, where he lodged that unhappy night.[1] The next morning he sent a herald and some others back to Hull to offer the governor a pardon and tempting conditions if he would yet open the gate. Hotham replied as he had done the day before; and Charles then rode away to York, whence he dispatched another message to the parliament. He began with a ridiculous allusion to the petition of the Yorkshire gentry, who had desired the stay of his majesty's arms and ammunition in his magazines at Hull. He told them that he had thought fit to go in person to view his said arms and ammunition, but, contrary to his expectation, he had found all the gates shut upon him; that he had offered to go into the town with only twenty horse, &c.; and that he now thought it expedient to demand justice of his parliament against Sir John Hotham, who had seditiously and traitorously rejected him, and disobeyed his orders. On the next the said Commons that such officers, upon the respective entry made by any merchant as aforesaid, shall intimate to such merchant that it is the advice of the Commons, for the better ease of the said merchants, and in regard the respective duties will relate and become due as from this day, that the said merchants, upon entry of their goods, as usually they did, when a law was in force for that purpose, would deposit so much money as the several customs will amount unto in the hands of such officers, to be by them accounted to his majesty, as the respective customs due by the said bill, when the said bill shall have the royal assent; or otherwise, his majesty refusing the passing thereof, the said moneys to be restored, upon demand, unto the several merchants respectively."

[1] "The news of Sir John's behavior was carried up by his own son, Mr. John Hotham, unto the two Houses: whom I heard in the House of Commons give the relation of what his father had done; and he concluded with this—Thus hath my father and myself served you, full back, full edge!"—Sir Philip Warwick's Memoirs.

day (the 25th) he sent another message to parliament, and a very gracious letter to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Hull. Both were worse than useless. The Lords and Commons declared instantly that his stopping up the passages between Hull and the parliament, and intercepting of messengers employed by parliament,[1] was a high breach of their privileges; that the sheriffs and justices of the peace of the counties of York and Lincoln, and all other his majesty's officers, should be called upon to suppress all forces that should be raised in those counties, either to force the town of Hull, or to stop passengers to and from it; that Sir John Hotham had done nothing but in obedience to the command of both Houses of parliament; that the declaring Sir John a traitor, he being a member of the House of Commons, was a high breach of the privileges of parliament, and, being without due process of law, was against the liberty of the subject and the law of the land. On the same day that these last resolutions were carried, they drew up a petition against his majesty's going over to Ireland, telling him plainly that they could never consent to any levies or raising of soldiers to be made by his majesty alone for this his intended expedition, or to the payment of any army except such as should be employed and commanded according to the advice and direction of parliament; that he was bound to leave the management of that war to them by his promise pledged unto them; that his presence was required much more in his capital with his parliament than in Ireland, where they had made a prosperous beginning by many defeats of the rebels, who would soon be disheartened if the proceedings of parliament should not be interrupted by his protracted absence. And all this was accompanied by an energetic declaration, in which they insisted that their precaution in securing Hull had been necessary to the safety of the country; and that it was the king and his adherents, and not Sir John Hotham, that had transgressed. This petition was delivered to his majesty by the Earl of Stamford, who was also intrusted with other duties; for this earl, with the Lord Willoughby, Sir Edward Askell, and three other commissioners, was appointed to act in concert with Sir John Hotham and a committee sitting in Hull, and carried with him the parliament's order for aid and assistance, directed to the lord lieutenant, deputy lieutenants, sheriffs, justices, constables, &c., of the county. On the 4th of May Charles gave a long answer to the petition and to the declaration of the two Houses. He began by complaining that his message demanding justice for the high and unheard-of affront offered to him at the gates of Hull by Sir John Hotham had not been thought worthy of an answer, but that, instead thereof, parliament had thought it fit, by their printed votes, to own and avow that unparalleled act as being done in obedience to the command of both Houses of parliament. All this, he said, he knew to be very unsuitable to the modesty and duty of former times, and unwarrantable by any precedents but what themselves had made. He claimed an entire right of property in the towns, forts, and magazines of the kingdom. "And we would fain be answered," said he, "what title any subject of our kingdom hath to his house or land that we have not to our town of Hull? Or what right hath he to his money, plate, or jewels that we have not to our magazines or munition there? . . . . We very well know the great and unlimited power of parliament, but we know as well that it is only in that sense, as we are a part of that parliament. Without us, and against our consent, the votes of either or both Houses together must not, can not, shall not, forbid any thing that is enjoined by the law, or enjoin any thing that is forbidden by the law." He said that Lord Digby's intercepted letters, wherein mention was made of his retreat to a place of safety, ought not to hinder him from visiting his own town and fort; and, quitting this ticklish point with the fewest words possible, he protested with all solemnity that his heart bled at the apprehension of a civil war, and that, if any such should arise, the blood and destruction must be laid to the account of parliament, his own conscience telling him that he was clear. He reasserted the notorious falsehood, that he had offered to go into Hull with twenty horse only, his whole train being unarmed. As for Hotham, he said, "We had been contemptibly stupid if we had made any scruple to proclaim him traitor. . . . . And that, in such a case, the declaring him traitor, being a member of the House of Commons, should be a breach of privilege of parliament, we must have other reasons than bare votes to prove." He had rather happily quoted before from Pym's speech on the trial of Strafford, and he ended his answer with another extract from the same "great driver:"—"We conclude with Mr. Pym's own words. If the prerogative of the king overwhelm the liberty of the people, it will be turned to tyranny; if liberty undermine the prerogative, it will grow into anarchy."

On the 26th of May the parliament sent him their remonstrance, or declaration, in answer to his declaration concerning the business of Hull. The royal declaration, which like most of these papers, is supposed to be composition of Hyde, was considered by the two Houses in the light of an appeal to the people, and a declining of further negotiation between the king and them. "Therefore," said they, "we likewise shall address our answer to the people, not by way of appeal, but to prevent them from being their own executioners, and from being persuaded, under false colors of defending the law and their liberties, to destroy both with their own hands, by taking their lives, liberties, and estates out of their hands whom they have chosen and intrusted therewith, and resigning them up to some evil counselors about his majesty, who can lay no foundation of their own greatness but upon the ruin of this, and in it of all parliaments, and in them of the true religion and the freedom of this nation. And these are the men that would persuade the people that both Houses of parliament, containing all the peers and representing all the Commons of England, would destroy the laws of the land and the liberty of the people, wherein beside the trust of the whole, they themselves in their own particulars have so great an interest of honor and estate, that we hope it will gain little credit with any that have the least use of reason, that such as must have so great a share in the misery should take so much pains in the procuring thereof, and spend so much time, and run so many hazards, to make themselves slaves, and destroy the property of their estates." They then defended the instructions which they had given to Sir John Hotham, the conduct of that governor, and their own subsequent votes of approval. They next announced, in the highest and most intelligible tone, their conceptions as to the king's right of property. Referring to Charles's assertion that he had the same property in the town of Hull, and in the magazines there, that any of his subjects had in their houses, lands, or money, they said, "Here that is laid down for a principle which would indeed pull up the very foundation of the liberty, property, and interest of every subject in particular, and of all the subjects in general; . . . . for his majesty's towns are no more his own than the kingdom is his own; and the kingdom is no more his own than his people are his own; and, if the king had a property in all his towns, what would become of the subjects' property in their houses therein? And if he had a property in his kingdom, what would become of the subjects' property in their lands throughout the kingdom? or of their liberties, if his majesty had the same right in their persons that every subject hath in their lands or goods?" They went on to observe that the erroneous notion being infused into princes that their kingdoms were their own, and that they might do with them what they would—"as if their kingdoms were for them, and not they for their kingdoms"—was the root of all their invasions of their subjects' just rights and liberties; and that so far was the notion in question from being true, that in fact their kingdoms, their towns, the people, the public treasure, and whatsoever was bought therewith, were all only given to them in trust: by the known laws of England, the very jewels of the crown were not the king's property, but were only confided to his keeping for the use and ornament of his regal dignity. They argued that the trust so given for the public advantage ought to be managed by the advice of parliament, whose duty it was by all means to prevent its abuse. On that principle they hoped that in what they had done in regard to the town of Hull, it would appear clearly to all the world that they had discharged their own trust, and not invaded that of his majesty, much less his property, which which in this case they could not do. This was flat blasphemy to the fanatic royalists, who had swallowed the dogmas of King James and of the court bishops; but it sounded like right and reason to the ears of the mass of the people, whose descendants have adopted at least the general principles of the reasoning of the parliament on this occasion into their political creed as incontrovertible and sacred truths. The remonstrance of the two Houses went on to affirm that they had given no occasion to his majesty to declare with so much earnestness that their votes would be nothing without or against his consent; that they were very tender of the law themselves, and so would never allow a few private persons about his majesty, nor his majesty himself out of his courts, to be judge of the law, and that, too, contrary to the judgment of the highest court of judicature; that it might be that his majesty had not refused to consent to any thing which he considered proper for the peace and happiness of the kingdom, but that he had taken the measure of that peace and happiness from some few ill-affected persons about him, contrary to the advice and judgment of his great council of parliament; that of late the advice of both Houses had been undervalued, rejected, and absolutely refused; and that this obliged them to declare and explain to the nation what was the privilege of parliament, what the duty of the king. They then returned to Lord Digby's intercepted letter. "We appeal," said they, "to the judgment of any indifferent man that shall read that letter, and compare it with the posture that his majesty then did and still doth stand in toward the parliament, and with the circumstances of that late action of his majesty in going to Hull, whether the advisers of that journey intended only a visit of that fort and magazine?" They told the king that it was a resolution most worthy of a prince to shut his ears against any that would incline him to a civil war; but they could not believe that spirit to have animated those that came with his majesty to the House of Commons; or those that accompanied him from Whitehall to Hampton Court, and appeared in a warlike manner at Kingston; or those that followed him to Hull; or those that, after that expedition, drew their swords at York, demanding who would be for the king; or those that advised his majesty to declare Sir John Hotham a traitor. And then they imitated Charles in casting the weight of blood from themselves, declaring that they stood acquitted by God and their consciences if those malignant spirits should ever force them to defend their religion, their country, the privileges of parliament, and the liberties of the subject with their swords. They placed the conduct of the Earl of Newcastle at Hull in a very humiliating light; and they contended that ever since the failure of the attempt to seize the five members, there had been a design to get possession of the arms and ammunition in that town. They declared it to be a notorious fact, that Sir Lewis Dives, a person that had not the least part in this late business of Hull, was dispatched presently after into Holland, where his near relative the Lord Digby had continual recourse unto and countenance from the queen, and they left the world to judge for what purpose this was. To this long paper Charles returned a still longer reply, and both were printed and published in the form of pamphlets. The two Houses again took up the controversial pen shortly afterward; but their rejoinder was of such a length as to appear very tedious, even to the patient and long-winded Rushworth. Of course neither party thought to finish the war upon paper. Each was making active preparation for a contest in which blood was to be shed, not ink. Charles issued a proclamation stating that, for some months, his town and county of Kingston-upon-Hull had been withheld from him, and his entrance traitorously resisted, by Sir John Hotham; and charging and commanding all his loving subjects not to aid, or abet, or assist in conveying into the said town men, money, arms, ammunition, or victuals, or in any other way contribute toward the keeping or defending Hull against his majesty, or any force which he might think fit to send against it, to drive out the unlawful band there, and take possession of his own fort, port, arms, and ammunition there. But not hoping to gain so important a prize by a proclamation, the royalists had recourse to stratagem and bribes. There was one Fowkes, a lieutenant of Captain Lowinger, a Dutch soldier of fortune, who was serving in Hull under Sir John Hotham, and this Lieutenant Fowkes had married the daughter of a Mr. Beckwith, of Beverly, who was occasionally with the king's friends at York. About the middle of May, Fowkes received a letter from his father-in-law, earnestly requesting him to give him a meeting. The lieutenant showed this letter to Hotham's secretary, who laid it before the governor. It was arranged that the lieutenant should go to the meeting with his father-in-law, and return next day with a true account of what had passed. On his arrival at his father-in-law's, the poor lieutenant was kindly received; but, in the parlor, he found about fourteen or fifteen gentlemen, one of whom had a visor on. This masked gentleman was supposed to be Sir Jocelyn Percy, a papist that dwelt in Beverly: the rest were all strangers to him. After many civilities and assurances of their belief that neither Fowkes nor his captain could possibly have any design of disloyalty to the king, but merely did what they were doing in Hull for their better support as soldiers, they made him an offer of £500 in money and £500 per annum for himself, and £1000 in money and £1000 per annum for his captain, if they would think of some safe way to deliver up Hull to the king. The lieutenant seemed to comply—took fifty pieces of gold as an earnest—agreed to correspond with them through his father-in-law, and then hastened back to old Hotham with intelligence of all that had passed at this secret meeting. The governor made Fowkes write a letter to say that he had found his captain compliable, and that Hull should be the king's. Several letters were permitted to pass and repass to humor the design, till Sir John thought fit to bring it to an issue by making the lieutenant write to the royalists that, on Tuesday night, he and his captain would be upon guard, and would open the gates if the king would send 1000 horse and 500 foot to ride behind the horse for expedition, so that they should be at Hull by two o'clock in the morning. An answer was received through the lieutenant's father-in-law, Beckwith; the king's troops would be there at the time appointed. Then Hotham opened the matter to a council of war. The majority of the officers wished to carry on the stratagem, to admit the royalists and then cut them to pieces; but Sir John said he would not shed blood when he could save it, and rather chose to give notice to his majesty that the plot was discovered. The parliament had probably instructed him to avoid the collision. He sent his secretary post-haste to York to deliver a letter into the royal hands. On reading the letter, the king seemed pleased at the timely warning, for some gentlemen of quality were already on horseback for the intended surprise of Hull. The parliament voted thanks to Sir John Hotham, and dispatched a messenger for Beckwith of Beverly, who was arrested at York by virtue of an order of both Houses. But Beckwith was taken out of the hands of the messenger by the followers of the king, who said, that when the parliament gave him justice against Sir John Hotham, he would deliver Beckwith to them. Seeing that the king's troops were daily increasing at York, and that they were bent upon the capture of Hull, Hotham, for his own security, and to prevent any practices of bribery within the town, exacted from the inhabitants a solemn protestation or oath that they would faithfully maintain Hull for the king and parliament and kingdom's use. The greater part of the inhabitants took the protestation willingly, and those that refused it were expelled the town. As the great aim of Charles was to get possession of the magazines, Hotham, by order of parliament, sent all the great ordnance and most of the arms and ammunition back to the Tower of London. Hotham was authorized by his warrants to raise some of the train-bands in Yorkshire, who were to march with their arms into Hull; but it was the arms, not the men, that were wanted, and as soon as they were within the town, the governor disarmed them all and sent them back to their homes.

Charles now issued a proclamation, forbidding the muster of any troops or any militia without his commands and commission; but several days before this (on the 5th of May) the parliament had issued a declaration, in which, after condemning the king's refusal to give his assent to an amended bill for settling the militia, they stated that they should forthwith carry into effect their own ordinance respecting the militia, and required all persons in authority to put the said ordinance into execution. They grounded the indispensable necessity of this measure upon the king's prolonged absence, his gathering of warlike forces around him, and the evident intentions of his evil counselors to bring back popery and tyranny. But the most powerful and active members had protested, in the debate upon the measure, that they had not the least purpose or intention of any war with the king, arming only for self-defense. The lords lieutenants being named for their several counties, nominated their deputy lieutenants, subject to the approbation of parliament. Thus the Lord Paget being named in the ordinance for Buckinghamshire,[1] he named Hampden, Goodwin, Grenville,

[1] "The Lord Paget, not long after this, began to boggle, and was unfixed in his resolutions; and upon the king's publishing of his commission of array, and declaration against the ordinance of parliament for the militia (his lordship's heart failing him, and being unsatisfied in his judgment), he revolted from the parliament and went to the king."—Whitelock.

Tyrrell, Winwood, and Whitelock as his deputy lieutenants; and these gentlemen, being approved by the two Houses, entered upon the command of the Buckinghamshire militia. St. John, Selden, Maynard, Glynne, Grimston, and many other members of the House of Commons accepted the like commissions, and turned their attention from oratory and debate to drilling and tactics. The king declared that there was now no legal power in the Houses to do what they had done, commanded all men to refuse obedience to the parliament's "pretended ordinance," and summoned a county meeting at York for the purpose of promoting the levy of troops for his own service. But there were more men attended this meeting than Charles had wished; and Sir Thomas Fairfax boldly laid upon the pommel of the king's saddle the warm remonstrance and petition of the lesser gentry and farmers and freeholders of Yorkshire, who asserted their right of being present, and desired the king to agree with his parliament. Even the aristocracy of the county were divided, and all that Charles obtained was one troop of horse, composed of gentlemen volunteers, who were nominally to be under the command of the boy Prince of Wales, and a foot regiment formed out of some of the train-bands. This paltry gathering at York was no sooner reported in parliament than the three following resolutions were hurled at the king and his throne: 1. That the king, seduced by wicked counsels, intended to make war on the parliament. 2. That whensoever the king made war upon the parliament, it was a breach of the trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to the dissolution of the government. 3. That whosoever should assist him in such war were traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom. After this the Houses published another remonstrance, exposing the king's misdeeds, and explaining their own privileges and intentions. Charles answered, and they rejoined, and then they ordered that all sheriffs, justices of the peace, &c., within 150 miles of that city, should stop all arms and ammunition going to York, and apprehend the conveyers, and also suppress all forces coming together by the king's commission. "This," says Whitelock, "was an unhappy condition for the poor people, none knowing what to do or whom to obey, nor what would be the consequence of these thwartings between the great powers and authorities of king and parliament." The ordinance of parliament was more effective than the proclamations and summonses of the king. In London alone a little army was raised. In the month of May the train-bands had a general muster in Finsbury Fields, where Major-general Skippon appeared as their commander, and where tents were pitched for the accommodation of the members of both Houses. Eight thousand men were under arms. These were divided into six regiments, and officered by men hearty in the cause. The civic review ended in a great dinner, given at the expense of the city of London.

The king, it is said, had given offense to the English sailors by calling them "water-rats," and whether the story be true or not, it seems certain that his government was unpopular with the navy. It will be remembered that the Houses had commissioned the lord high admiral, the Earl of Northumberland, to put the fleet into a warlike attitude. This nobleman, who enjoyed the confidence of neither party, was, or pretended to be, very sick. The Commons voted that he should be desired to appoint the Earl of Warwick to the command of the fleet, and requested the concurrence of the Lords. The Lords scrupled and hesitated, objecting that the appointment required the sanction of the king. But thereupon the Commons, without the consent of the Lords, and against the command of Charles, compelled Northumberland to depute his authority to Warwick, and actually put Warwick, who was acceptable to the sailors, into the command of the fleet. Charles revoked Northumberland's commission, and appointed Pennington to the command of the fleet; but the sailors would not receive this officer, and the parliament declared his appointment to be illegal. Charles, according to Clarendon, concealed his displeasure at the conduct of Northumberland, thinking it not then seasonable to resent it, because he had nothing to object against him but his complying with the command of the parliament, who would have made it their own quarrel, and must have obliged that earl to put his whole interest into their hands, and "to have run their fortune, to which he was naturally too much inclined; and then his majesty foresaw that there would have been no fleet at all set out that year, by their having the command of all the money which was to be applied to that service. Whereas, by his majesty's concealing his resentment, there was a good fleet made ready, and set out; and many gentlemen settled in the command of ships, of whose affection and fidelity his majesty was assured that no superior officer could corrupt it, but that they would at all times repair to his service whenever he required it. And, indeed, his majesty had an opinion of the devotion of the whole body of common seamen to his service, because he had bountifully so much mended their condition, and increased their pay, that he thought they would have even thrown the Earl of Warwick overboard when he should command them, and so the respiting the doing of it would be of little importance."[1] All this means that the king hoped to gain over the fleet as he had hoped to gain possession of Hull by a ruse; but the event showed that he had widely miscalculated the temper of the English seamen. If we are to believe the royalist historian, the king had not at this time one barrel of powder nor one musket, nor any other provision necessary for an army; and, what was worse, he was not sure of any port at which warlike stores might be safely landed from the continent. "He expected with impatience the arrival of all those necessaries, by the care and activity of the queen, who was then in Holland, and, by the sale of her own as well as of the crown jewels, and by the friendship of Henry Prince of Orange, did all she could to provide all that was necessary."[2] The parliament, well aware of these preparations in Holland, decreed that whosoever should lend or bring money into the kingdom raised upon the crown jewels, should be held as an enemy to the state. Some weeks before this, when the act was passed for the speedy reducing of the rebels in Ireland, and the immediate securing the future peace and safety of England, many members of parliament voluntarily subscribed large sums of money, and their example was followed by other gentlemen and freeholders, who set on foot subscriptions in their several counties. The county of Buckingham, for example, advanced £6000. Foremost in the list of the subscribing members in the Commons, we find the names of Sir Henry Martin for £1200, Mr. Walter Long, Sir Arthur Hazlerig, and Sir John Harrison for the same sum each, Mr. Oliver Cromwell for £500, John Pym for £600, John Hampden £1000, Bulstrode Whitelock £600, &c.

While the king was lying at York, he was writing hard and working by other means to interest the Scots in his favor, and to get up a strong party among them. From the Scottish council he received a dutiful and affectionate answer, and he also got a petition from divers of the nobility and people there, full of expressions of zeal and loyalty.[1] But the English parliament, hearing of these proceedings, "took a course to turn the balance," and, within eight days after, the Scottish council declared both to king and parliament their earnest desire to see them reconciled with one another; and they moreover humbly desired his majesty "to hearken to his greatest, his best, and most unparalleled council." They also dissuaded the king from his journey into Ireland, and prayed that a mediation between him and his English parliament might be set on foot at home ere the breach grew wider; and, in the end, the Scottish council came "to a large manifestation of their true and hearty affection to the parliament of England," protesting that they would never do any thing contrary to them or their privileges. The Scottish ministers, indeed, were checked in any exuberance of loyalty by the stern spirit of the people, who still looked upon the king as the enemy to their kirk and their liberties, and upon the English House of Commons as their best friends. No sooner had the people of Edinburgh heard of the correspondence carrying on between Charles and the council than they petitioned the latter not to take part, by any verbal or real engagement to the king, against the parliament of England. "These passages in Scotland" were of much advantage to the affairs of the English parliament, who still protested their fidelity to the king, at the same time that they courted the Scots with very kind expressions.[2]

Several members of both Houses—some who were in the service of the court, others who believed that the parliament was going too far or too fast—now withdrew to the king at York. For the present, the Commons satisfied themselves with passing an order that every member should be in his place by a certain day, or forfeit a hundred pounds to the Irish war. The way in which most of the ministers and old servants of the crown had sneaked off to the north seemed to betray, not only a wonderful fear of the parliament, but also a want of confidence in the legality or purity of the cause to which they were about to commit themselves for better or for worse. On his first arrival at York, Charles was attended by no other ostensible minister than Secretary Nicholas, a timid and wavering old man, who never knew half of his master's mind, or saw the full intention of any measure proposed by the king. Lord Falkland, Hyde, and Culpeper, who had abandoned the parliament, and pledged themselves to the court,[1] and who were, in fact, the chief directors of the royal councils (though they again scarcely knew more of Charles's mind than Nicholas), remained in London to watch the proceedings of the House of Commons, and to perform secret services of various kinds. According to Clarendon's own account, the Commons had "long detested and suspected Mr. Hyde (himself), from the time of their first remonstrance down to his framing the king's messages and answers, which they now every day received, to their intolerable vexation, yet knew not how to accuse him. But now that the earls of Essex and Holland had discovered his being shut up with the king at Greenwich, and the Marquis of Hamilton had once before found him very early in private with the king at Windsor, at a time when the king thought all passages had been stopped, together with his being of late more absent from the House than he had used to be, and the resort of the other two every night to his lodging, satisfied them that he was the person; and they resolved to disenable him to manage that office long."[2] That is, the Commons now suspected not only that he was the writer of the king's declarations, &c., but that he was also engaged in conducting secret manœuvers in and about London and the parliament. Sir John Culpeper, according to the royalist historian, had as many eyes upon the Commons as they had upon him (Hyde), and an equal animosity against them; and, what was a better service to the triumvirate, Sir John "had familiarity and friendship with some persons, who, from the second or third hand, came to know many of the greatest designs before they were brought upon the stage."[3] By these indirect sources of information, Culpeper learned (or so says Clarendon) that it was the intention of the Commons to send himself, Lord Falkland, and Hyde to the Tower, upon the charge of giving evil counsel to the king, and preparing those answers and messages they received from his majesty, whenever they should find them all three in the House together. And hereupon, according to the same authority, the triumvirate agreed that they would never be there

[1] They had all three been in very decided opposition to the court; they had all been actively concerned in the impeachment of Strafford, and they had all, it should appear, voted for his bill of attainder—certainly not one of the three had voted against it. Hyde, so much better known by his title of Lord Clarendon, had been eloquently fierce against the council of York; Lord Falkland, the idol of his party, had voted for the exclusion of the bishops from the House of Lords. In fact, up to the end of the preceding year, Hyde, Falkland, and Culpeper, were all and each of them as enthusiastic on the side of the parliament as Hampden or as Pym.

altogether, and seldom two at a time; and that when they were in the House they should only listen, and speak no more than was of absolute necessity. "For now," says Clarendon, "it was grown a very difficult thing for a man who was in their disfavor to speak against what they proposed, but that they would find some exception to some word or expression: upon which, after he had been called upon to explain, he was obliged to withdraw; and then they had commonly a major part to send him to the Tower or to expel him the House, or at least to oblige him to receive a reprehension at the bar upon his knees. And so they had used Sir Ralph Hopeton at that time; who, excepting to some expression that was used in a declaration prepared by a committee, and presented to the House, which, he said, was dishonorable to the king, they said it was a tax upon the committee, caused him to withdraw, and committed him to the Tower, which terrified many from speaking at all, and caused more to absent themselves from the House, where too small numbers appeared any day." About the end of April, Hyde received a letter from the king, commanding him to repair to York as soon as he could be spared from his business in London. The historian says that he communicated this letter to his two friends, Lord Falkland and Sir John Culpeper, who agreed with him that he should defer that journey for some time, there being every day great occasion of consulting together, and of sending dispatches to the king[1]—which dispatches, like nearly all the state papers, were written by Hyde, the great penman of the royalist party. "And," adds Clarendon himself, "it was happy that he did stay; for there was an occasion then fell out, in which his presence was very useful, toward disposing the Lord Keeper Littleton to send the great seal to the king at York."[2] It appears that Charles wanted the great seal, but not the lord keeper—for Littleton had made himself very obnoxious to the court, by swimming with the strong stream of parliament. Besides other offenses, he had recently voted in favor of the militia ordinance, and had learnedly insisted both on the expediency and on the legality of that measure. Clarendon, however, says that he had always been convinced of Littleton's loyalty, and he describes him as an honorable and noble person. The historian, however, admits that Charles had reason for suspecting this loyalty of his lord keeper. He says, "From his recovery of a great sickness (which seized on him shortly after he was preferred to that great place, and which, indeed, robbed him forever of much of that natural vigor and vivacity of mind which he had formerly enjoyed) his compliance was so great and so visible, not only in not opposing that prevalent sense of the House which was prejudicial to the king, but in concurring with it in his own vote, very much against what his friends thought was agreeable to his understanding, insomuch as the potent and popular Lords looked upon him as their own; and the king was so far unsatisfied with his carriage, that once, after his majesty's being at York, he resolved to take the great seal from him, but was contented to be dissuaded from that resolution, partly from the difficulty—it being probable that the attempt would not have succeeded by the interposition of the extravagant authority of the two Houses—partly that it was not easy to make choice of another fit for that trust who was like to be more faithful in it—the terror of parliament having humbled all men to a strange compliance and submission—but especially that his majesty was assured by some whom he trusted, that the affection of the Lord Littleton was very entire to his service, and his compliance only artificial to preserve himself in a capacity of serving him, which was true."[1] The copious and magniloquent historian goes on to say, that while Littleton was playing this part, he called upon him one evening, and spoke very freely with him; which, he says, Littleton always encouraged him to do, as well knowing that he (Hyde) "was not without some trust with his majesty, and of much intimate friendship with some that had more." He told Littleton of the censure and hazard he incurred by his notable compliance and correspondence with "that party" which the king construed to be factious against his just regal power, and that some votes in which his lordship had concurred, and which were generally understood to be contrary to law, in which his lordship's knowledge was unquestionable, were very notorious and much spoken of.[2] The lord keeper then told Hyde the straits he was in—"that the governing lords had a terrible apprehension of the king's sending for the great seal, and that nothing but his fair deportment toward them, and seeming to be of their mind, prevented their taking the seal into their own custody, allowing it only to be with him while he sat in the House and in the court; that they had made some order to that purpose, if, by his interest with them, he had not prevented it, well knowing that it would prove most fatal to the king, who, he foresaw, must be shortly compelled to wish the great seal with him, for many reasons. Now," said he "let it be considered whether my voting with them in such particulars, which my not voting with them can not prevent, be of equal prejudice to the king, with the seals being put into such a condition that the king shall never be able to get it when it is most necessary for him, which undoubtedly will be the case when, by my carriage and opposition against them, the confidence toward me shall be lessened." The end of this long conversation was, that Littleton promised to serve the king "in that article of moment," and even to go to him at York. Hyde and his compeers communicated the happy intelligence to their master, who thereupon dispatched Mr. Eliot, a forward young man and a groom of the bedchamber, with a warrant to receive the great seal, and a very kind letter to the lord keeper, requiring him to make all possible haste to York. Littleton gave up the great symbol to Eliot, who posted back to York with it; and then Littleton posted after the seal, and, though he was indisposed, and a much less active traveler than the groom of the chambers, he arrived at York the next day after that gentleman had delivered the seal to his majesty. This is Clarendon's account—or rather, we should say, one of Clarendon's accounts—and, according to this narrative, he contributed mainly to the great event, by his ingenious conversation with the lord keeper. But Eliot, the active groom of the chamber, told the king a very different story, affirming that he had found the lord keeper altogether averse to the measure, that he had locked the door upon him, and had got the great seal from him only by threatening to blow out his brains. The historian says that Mr. Eliot did this, and told many stories to magnify his own service, not imagining that the lord keeper intended to follow him to York. But may we not, on the other side, suspect that Clarendon magnified his service in this particular, as he obviously does in many other cases? His reasoning, indeed, shows, that for Eliot to have acted as he said he had done would have been hazardous and rash, but many a desperate or daring young man would have done as much, and many a timid, wavering old man, like Littleton, might have been terrified with two pistols at his breast, though he had a houseful of servants, or might have been induced wholly to make up his already half-made-up mind by this exhibition of boldness. May, an excellent authority, says that the lord keeper had continued, in all appearance, firm to the parliament for some space of time after the rest were gone to York; "insomuch that there seemed no doubt at all made of his constancy; till, at the last, before the end of the month of June, a young gentleman, one Master Thomas Eliot, groom of the privy chamber to the king, was sent closely from York to him; who, being admitted by the lord keeper into his private chamber, when none else were by, so handled the matter, whether by persuasions, threats, or promises, or whatsoever, that, after three hours' time, he got the great seal into his hands, and rid post with it away to the king at York. The Lord Keeper Littleton, after serious consideration with himself what he had done, or rather suffered, and not being able to answer it to the parliament, the next day, early in the morning, rode after it himself, and went to the king. Great was the complaint at London against him for that action; nor did the king ever show him any great regard afterward. The reason which the Lord Keeper Littleton gave for parting so with the great seal, to some friends of his who went after him to York, was this: that the king, when he made him lord keeper, gave him an oath in private, which he took—that, whensoever the king should send to him for the great seal, he should forthwith deliver it. This oath (as he averred to his friends) his conscience would by no means suffer him to dispense withal; he only repented (though now too late) that he accepted the office upon those terms." Whitelock says, simply, "The Lord Keeper Littleton, after his great adherence to the parliament, delivered the great seal to Mr. Eliot, whom the king sent to him for it; and shortly after Littleton followed the seal to the king, but was not much respected by him or the courtiers." And all that is perfectly clear in this strange manœuver, which, like most of Charles's measures, and all other manœuvers, is liable to contrariety of doubts, is, that a groom of the chamber carried off the seal, and that the lord keeper stole out of London, and by by-roads got to York, where he was regarded but coldly by his majesty. Clarendon says that the king was not satisfied with Littleton, protesting that he did not like his humors, and knew not what to make of him;[1] that his majesty would not for a long time redeliver the seal to him, but always kept it in his own bed-chamber, and that men remarked "a visible dejectedness" in the lord keeper. The historian tells us that all this gave him much trouble, as well it might, if his own story were the true one; and he takes to himself the credit of procuring better treatment for the keeper. It is quite certain, however, that Charles never placed any confidence in Littleton—that that adroit lawyer met with the usual fate of double dealers, was despised by both parties, lost all spirit and talent for business, and concluded his career about two years after at Oxford, in neglect, poverty, and mental wretchedness.

[1] "And it was a wonderful expedition that was then used between York and London, when gentlemen undertook the service, as enough were willing to do; insomuch as when they dispatched a letter on Saturday night at that time of the year, about twelve at night, they always received the king's answer, Monday, by ten of the clock in the morning."—Clarendon, Life. According to this statement, the couriers must have ridden at the rate of twelve miles an hour at the least, an expedition which seems, in the circumstances, not merely wonderful, but incredible.

But it was now time for Clarendon himself to steal away to York. Shortly after Littleton's departure, the king told him that he would find him much to do there, and "that he thought now there would be less reason every day for his being concealed."[2] Before Littleton's flight, Clarendon had arranged all matters for the journey, resolving with Lord Falkland to stay at a friend's house near Oxford, a little out of the road he meant to take for York, till he should hear of the keeper's motion; and to cover his absence from the House of Commons, he had told the speaker that it was very necessary he should take the air of the country for his health. As soon as the keeper had flown, notice was taken in the House of the absence of his friend Hyde; inquiries were made what was become of him, and it was moved that he might be sent for. The speaker said that that gentleman had acquainted him with his going into the country to recover his health by fresh air, and that Dr. Winston, his physician, had certified that he was troubled with the stone. Mr. Peard said, confidently, "that he was troubled with no other stone than the stone in his heart, and therefore he would have him sent for wherever he was; for he was most confident that he was doing them mischief wherever he was." The House, however, who probably did not consider the historian of quite so much importance as he considered himself, neglected to take any steps for his apprehension for the present; and when (as he says) "they had resolved upon his arrest, he was warned thereof by Lord Falkland, and judging it time for him to be gone," he then left Ditchley, the house of the Lady Lee (afterward Countess of Rochester), and traveled by unusual ways through Leicestershire and Derbyshire, until he came to Yorkshire. At first he fixed himself at Nostall, within twenty miles of the city of York, and there lay close and secret, corresponding daily or hourly with the king, and preparing answers in his name to the papers and manifestos of the parliament. It should appear that even the courtiers and ministers at York were kept in ignorance as to his whereabout; for he says that when, shortly after, he was summoned to York, the king received him very graciously, and asked some questions aloud of him, as if he thought he had then come from London. But it was thus that Charles dealt even with the instruments of his plans and intrigues, concealing from the rest what was done by one, and never imparting to the whole body the schemes in which all were to work blindly, or at least seeing nothing beyond their own fixed path. After this public reception and masking of circumstances, the king called Hyde aside into the garden, saying that they need not now be afraid of being seen together; and he walked with him in consultation for a full hour.[1]

Clarendon arrived in Yorkshire at the end of May; on the 2d of June the ship "Providence," freighted by the queen in Holland, escaped the Earl of Warwick's cruisers, and ran ashore on the Yorkshire coast, with sixteen pieces of artillery and great store of arms and ammunition, which had long been expected by the royal party, and the want of which had delayed the king's design of attempting Hull by a siege. The cannon, muskets, and gunpowder were all safely landed and carried to York. At this crisis the arrival of such a supply was of more consequence in the eyes of Charles than the coming of a great penman. The parliament, however, by this time began to be excited and convulsed by the great defection that was taking place, particularly among the lords. "They concluded," says May, "that no other way could have been found out to endanger the overthrow of that parliament, which many open attempts and secret conspiracies could not do: that as the ruin of England could not in probability be wrought but by itself, so the parliament could not be broken (a prologue to the other ruin) but by her own members." "Beside," says the same narrator, "there are many whose callings make them capable of easier and greater gratifications from the king than other men, as lawyers and divines, who will therefore be apt to lean that way where the preferment lies." On the 30th of May the parliament, by an order, summoned nine peers, the first that had gone away to York, to appear at Westminster. These nine peers utterly refused to quit the king, returning a slighting and scornful answer to the parliament.

[1] Life. It seems quite certain that Clarendon's evasion was not considered so very important a matter by the parliament. Neither Whitelock nor May thought it of weight sufficient to merit any particular notice.

York.—Micklebar Gate, with the arrival of the Royalist Baggage Train

The Commons instantly took their resolution, and on the 15th of June sent Denzil Hollis up to the House of Lords to impeach the whole of them. In an eloquent speech Hollis dwelled upon the history of the earlier parts of this reign—showed that it had ever been the policy of the court "to strike at parliaments, keep off parliaments, break parliaments, or divide parliaments"—related the succession of designs recently entered into against parliament, the terrors of the army, the actual assault made in the Commons' House, the flame of rebellion purposely kindled in Ireland, the forces now gathered at York, the declarations, and messages, and bitter invectives against the parliament sent out in his majesty's name. "A new plot," said Hollis, "is this: the members are drawn away, and persuaded to forsake their duty, and go down to York, thereby to blemish the actions of both Houses, as done by a few and inconsiderable number, a party rather than a parliament, and perhaps to raise and set up an anti-parliament there. My lords, this is now the great design against this parliament, which is the only means to continue us to be a nation of freemen, and not of slaves—to be owners of any thing: in a word, which must stand in the gap to prevent an inlet and inundation of all misery and confusion." He, then, in the name of all the Commons of England, impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors, Spencer Earl of Northampton, William Earl of Devonshire, Henry Earl of Dover, Henry Earl of Monmouth, Charles Lord Howard of Charleton, Robert Lord Rich, Charles Lord Grey of Ruthven, Thomas Lord Coventry, and Arthur Lord Capel. The lords that remained made little or no attempt to screen the lords that had fled; and, shortly after, "being in their robes," they adjudged the fugitives never to sit more as members of that House, to be utterly incapable of any benefit or privileges of parliament, and to suffer imprisonment during their pleasure. It would perplex the reader to detail all the orders and counter-orders of the king and of the parliament; all the messages and answers, manifestos and counter-manifestos; and the story will be far more intelligible if we keep to the main points of this paper prelude to a war of bullets and pikes. On the 2d of June the Lords and Commons sent a petition to the king with nineteen propositions, as the basis of a treaty of concord and lasting peace. They demanded that the king should dismiss all such great officers and ministers of state as were not approved of by both Houses of parliament, and that an oath should be taken by all future members of the privy council; that the great affairs of the kingdom should not be transacted by the advice of private men or by any unknown or unsworn counselors; that he or they unto whom the government and education of the king's children were committed should be approved of by both Houses; that the church government and liturgy should undergo such a reformation as both Houses of parliament should advise; that his majesty should contribute his best assistance for the raising of a sufficient maintenance for preaching ministers throughout the kingdom, and give his consent to laws for the taking away of innovations, superstitions, and pluralities; that he should rest satisfied with the course that the Lords and Commons had taken for ordering of the militia until the same should be further settled by a bill, and that he should recall his declarations and proclamations against the militia ordinance made by parliament; that such members of either House of parliament as had, during this present parliament, been put out of any place and office, might either be restored to that place and office, or otherwise have satisfaction for the same upon the petition of that House of which they were members; that all privy councilors and judges should take an oath for the maintaining of the Petition of Right, and of other wholesome statutes made by this present parliament; that all the judges, and all the officers appointed by approbation of parliament, should hold their places during good behavior; that the justice of parliament should be left to take its course with all delinquents, and that all persons cited by either House should appear and abide the censure of parliament; that the forts and castles of the kingdom should be put under the command and custody of such persons as his majesty should appoint, with the approbation of parliament: that the extraordinary guards and military forces now attending his majesty should be removed and discharged, and that for the future he should raise no such guards or extraordinary forces, but, according to the law, in case of actual rebellion or invasion; that his majesty would be pleased to enter into a closer alliance with the states of the United Provinces and the other neighboring princes and states of the Protestant religion, for the defense and maintenance of the true faith against all designs and attempts of the pope and his adherents;[1] that he should, by act of parliament, clear the Lord Kimbolton and the five members of the House of Commons, so that future parliaments might be secured from the consequences of that evil precedent; and that he should pass a bill for restraining peers made hereafter from sitting or voting in parliament, unless they were admitted thereunto with the consent of both Houses of parliament.[2]

Charles, with lords about him, with arms and gunpowder, and with the prospect of more from Holland, thought himself as strong as the parliament: he received these propositions with great indignation, and, in replying to them, he taxed the parliament as caballists and traitors, as the makers of new laws and new constitutional doctrines: and in the end he told them that their demands were unworthy of his royal descent from so many famous ancestors—unworthy of the trust reposed in him by the laws; protesting that, if he were both vanquished and a prisoner, in worse condition than any of the most unfortunate of his predecessors had ever been reduced to, he would never stoop so low as to grant those demands, and make himself, from a King of England, a Doge of Venice.

[1] In this, their seventeenth proposition, the parliament alluded to the old, and now almost forgotten, subject of the Palatinate; telling the king that his subjects would be much encouraged by these close Protestant alliances, and enabled in a parliamentary way to give him aid and assistance in restoring his royal sister and her princely issue to those dignities and dominions which belonged to them.

And now "the fatal time was come when those long and tedious paper conflicts of declarations, petitions, and proclamations were turned into actual and bloody wars, and the pens seconded by drawn swords."[1] Charles sent out commissions of array,[2] beginning with Leicestershire, and enjoined or invited all men to bring him money, horses, and arms, on security of his forests and parks for the principal and eight per cent. interest. He forbade all levies without his consent, and called upon his subjects to be mindful of their oath of allegiance, and faithful to his royal person. It was now found that he had a strong party in the country: the church, the universities, the majority of the nobles, and perhaps of the country gentlemen—the loyalty of the latter class being generally great in proportion to their distance from the court and their ignorance of court life—rallied round him. The austerity of the Puritans' manners, their gloomy doctrine, and coarse fanaticism, drove most of the gay and dissolute, and many who were gay without being dissolute, into his party, which was further strengthened by many good, virtuous, and moderate men, who disliked his former conduct, who dreaded his tyrannical disposition, but dreaded the untried democratic violence still more. Nor was Charles wanting in solemn protestations and assurances. To the lords who had gathered around him at York, and to the members of his privy council there, he made a short and comprehensive declaration. "We do declare," said he, "that we will require no obedience from you but what is warranted by the known laws, as we expect that you shall not yield to any commands not legally grounded or imposed by any other authority. We undertake to defend from all danger whatsoever all you, and all such as shall refuse any such commands, whether they proceed from votes and orders of both Houses, or in any other way. We will defend the true Protestant religion established by the laws, the lawful liberties of the subjects of England, and just privileges of all the three estates of parliament; and shall require no further obedience from you than as we accordingly shall perform the same. We will not (as is falsely pretended) engage you in any war against the parliament, except it be for our necessary defense against such as do insolently invade or attempt against us or our adherents." And it was upon this express declaration that those lords contracted a solemn engagement, and signed a bond to stand by him, to defend his majesty's person, crown, and dignity, with his just and legal prerogative, against all persons, parties, and powers whatsoever.[3]

At the same time the parliament, declaring all these measures to be against law and the national liberties, made their preparations with at least equal vigor. On the 10th of June an order was made by both Houses for bringing in money and plate to maintain horse, horsemen, and arms, for the preservation of the public peace and defense of the king's person; for the parliament, down to the appointment of Oliver Cromwell to the chief command, always joined this expression with that of their own safety. The two Houses engaged the public faith, that whosoever should bring in any money or plate, or furnish men or arms, should be repaid with eight per cent. interest; and they appointed four treasurers, Sir John Wollaston, alderman of London, Alderman Towes, Alderman Warner, and Alderman Andrewes, to grant receipts to the lenders, and certain commissaries to value the horses and arms which should be furnished for the national service. All men living within eighty miles of the capital were invited to bring in their money, &c., within a fortnight. Those living farther off were allowed three weeks; and those who, for the present, were not provided with ready money, arms, or horses, were requested to set down what they would provide when able. Forthwith a great mass of money was heaped up in Guildhall, and daily increased by the free contributions of the people. The poor contributed with the rich. "Not only the wealthiest citizens and gentlemen who were near-dwellers brought in their large bags and goblets, but the poorer sort, like that widow in the gospel, presented their mites also; insomuch that it was a common jeer of men disaffected to the cause to call this the thimble and bodkin army."[1]

Charles wrote a letter to the Lord Mayor of London, the aldermen and sheriffs, forbidding these contributions, and inveighing bitterly against the parliament. This letter was wholly without effect, as was an attempt made at the same time to win over the fleet. Clarendon says that this latter scheme only failed through a mistake or blunder of the king's agents; but it appears evident that the cause of its failure really was the devotion of the captains and seamen to the popular cause. The Earl of Warwick, a great lover of the sea-service and highly popular as a commander, called a council of war, and laid before his officers both the ordinance of parliament which appointed him to the command, and the letters of the king which required him to surrender that command to Sir John Pennington. With the exception of five, all the sea-captains agreed with the earl that at this crisis the orders of the two Houses were more binding than those of the sovereign, and that the fleet could not be put into the hands of Pennington without the greatest peril to the nation's liberties. The five dissenters, the

[2] In these commissions the king set forth the parliament's own declaration, using their very expressions—"that, whereas it has been declared by votes of both Houses of parliament, that the kingdom hath of late been, and still is, in imminent danger both from enemies abroad and a popish discontented party at home, the king concludes that, for the safeguard both of his own person and people, there is an urgent necessity of putting the country into a posture of defense, &c." "And thus," says May, "did the parliament's prologue to their ordinance of militia serve the king's turn for his commission of array, totidem verbis."

Rear Admiral, Captain Fogge, Captain Baily, Captain Slingsby, and Captain Wake, put their ships in order of battle, with the intention of resisting the earl; but Warwick presently surrounded them and summoned them to surrender. Three of them instantly submitted, but Slingsby and Wake stood out stoutly. The earl then let fly a gun over them, and, turning up the hour-glass, sent his own boat, with most of the boats of the fleet, to let them know their danger if they did not come in before the sand was run out. Slingsby and Wake were so insolent in their answer, that the officers and sailors sent in the boats lost their patience; and, although they had no arms, they fell upon them on their own quarter-decks, pinioned them, struck their yards and topmasts, and carried them on board to the lord admiral, who had all his guns shotted, and every thing ready to open his fire upon their ships. A few days after this most important transaction a great and strong ship of the king's, called the Lion, carrying forty-two great brass guns, and a smaller vessel, a tender laden with gunpowder, were driven out of their course, which was from Holland to Yorkshire, and obliged by stress of weather to put into the Downs, where Warwick was lying with his fleet. Captain Fox, of the Lion, saluted the lord admiral, who presently acquainted him with the ordinance of parliament. The captain at first refused to yield, but he was presently clapped in hold, and his officers and men submitted, and struck their topmasts in token of obedience to parliament. Prince Rupert ran a narrow chance of having his career stopped in the beginning; for he, with the Prince Maurice and several other officers raised by the queen in Holland, had embarked on board the Lion, but had landed again after a storm, and the disheartening pangs of sea-sickness.

On the 12th of July, the parliament, thus masters of the navy, voted that an army should be raised for the safety of the king's person and defense of the country and parliament; that the Earl of Essex should be captain-general of this army, and the Earl of Bedford general of the horse. They appointed a committee of both Houses to assist the Earl of Essex, and to nominate colonels, field officers, and captains to this army, "which, considering the long peace that had prevailed in England, and the unprovided state of the country in respect of military stores, was not only raised, but also well armed, in a short time." Many of the lords, who still sat in the House at Westminster, took commissions as colonels under Essex, and many gentlemen of the House of Commons, of greatest rank and quality there, entered the service, some in the cavalry, some in the common foot regiments. Among these latter were Sir John Merrick, the Lord Grey of Groby, Denzil Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Bulstrode Whitelock, Sir William Waller, and the excellent Hampden, who took a colonel's commission, and went into Buckinghamshire to raise a regiment of infantry among his own tenants and servants, friends, and neighbors. Hampden's regiment was known by its excellent appointments, its green uniform, and its standard, which bore on one side the watchword of the parliament, "God with us," and on the other the patriot's own motto, "Vestigia nulla retrorsum." This high-minded commoner, who had been bred up in wealth and in peace, and who had studied the art of war only in books, presently became one of the best officers in the parliamentary service, and he made his regiment one of the very best. He made himself thoroughly master of his military duties, and, according to Clarendon, he performed them upon all occasions most punctually. He became as conspicuous in the roar and heat of battle as on the drill-ground or exercising-field, and he exposed his person in every action. "He was," says Clarendon, "of a personal courage equal to his best parts; so that he was an enemy not to be wished wherever he might have been a friend, and as much to be apprehended where he was so as any man could deserve to be."

Meanwhile the king was moving about from place to place to gather forces and draw over the people. His commission of array and the parliament's ordinance of militia were jostling together in nearly every county in England—the greatest of the nobility upon both sides coming forward personally to seize upon those places which they were appointed to look after either by the king or by the parliament. The one party held the ordinances to be illegal, the other denounced the royal proclamations. Yet in some counties there was no struggle at all, but one party wholly prevailed from the beginning. Generally speaking, the more commercial, more civilized and thriving districts were for the parliament, the more remote, the less prosperous, and less civilized, were for the king; but this general rule had its exceptions. In Lincolnshire the Lord Willoughby of Parham, who was appointed lord lieutenant by the parliament, raised the militia with great vigor and success, and was foremost in securing the services of that portion of the army. In Essex the Earl of Warwick, whose care was not confined to the navy, but who had been also appointed lord lieutenant, soon completed the levy of militia, which was increased by volunteers in unusual numbers. In Kent there was cheerful obedience shown to the ordinance of parliament. In Surrey and Middlesex the militia was raised with enthusiasm. The eastern part of Sussex, or all that portion which lay upon the sea, was firm to the parliament; but the western part of that county stood for the king, under some lords and members who had deserted the parliament. The eastern counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, and Cambridge were kept quiet from the beginning, chiefly through the great wisdom and indefatigable industry of Oliver Cromwell, who had taken out a commission as colonel of horse. There, too, many of the gentry rather inclined in their affections to the king's commission of array; but the traders, the freeholders, and the yeomen in general liked the ordinance, and the militia they raised was too strong to permit the other party to engage in a war; those gentlemen that attempted to raise men or provide arms for the king were crushed at the beginning, and from first to last one of the greatest supports of the parliamentary cause was found in the county of Cromwell's birth. In Berkshire the Earl of Holland, the parliament's lord lieutenant, raised the militia, in spite of the faint resistance of the Earl of Berkshire, the Lord Lovelace, and others. Hampden fell upon the Earl of Berkshire soon after, made him prisoner while engaged in an attempt to seize the magazine of arms, ammunition, &c., gathered at Watlington, in Oxfordshire, and sent him up to the parliament. Buckinghamshire, Hampden's county, was true, almost to a man, to the parliament. The county of Southampton was divided at first, and long continued to be so. Colonel Goring, who had disclosed in the House of Commons the conspiracy for bringing up the northern army the year before, and who had been most unwisely trusted and employed by the parliament, seized an early opportunity of making a bargain with Charles; and at the critical moment he declared that he should hold Portsmouth, its fortifications, arsenals, &c., for the king, having previously received a large sum of money from the parliament to put the fortifications into a better state of repair. But the parliament arrested the Earl of Portland, Goring's friend, and governor of the Isle of Wight, and committed the care of that island to the Earl of Pembroke, who had settled the militia in Wiltshire with little trouble. In Warwickshire the Earl of Northampton stood for the king, and the Lord Brooke for the parliament, with forces and party affections nearly equal. In Staffordshire and Nottinghamshire there was a similar equality. In Leicestershire men ranged themselves under the banners of the House of Huntingdon for the king, or under the Earl of Stamford for the parliament. In Derbyshire, where many great lords and gentlemen dwelled, not one of note stood for the parliament, except Sir John Gell and his brother. Farther north the king's party was very prevalent: the Earl of Newcastle kept the town of Newcastle with a strong garrison for the king; and the Earl of Cumberland, Charles's lord lieutenant of Yorkshire, actively pressed the commission of array, although resisted by the Lord Fairfax and other parliamentarians. In Lancashire the Lord Strange, son to the Earl of Derby, whom Charles had appointed lord lieutenant of Lancashire and Cheshire, endeavored to put in action the commission of array, while Sir Thomas Stanley, the Egertons, and others, urged forward the ordinance. On the 15th of July, Lord Strange made an attempt to gain Manchester; a skirmish ensued, and one man was slain, "which," says May, "was the first blood shed in these civil wars." Some time after, Strange returned to Manchester with 3000 men, but he was beaten off, and that time with considerable loss. Nor was he more successful in Cheshire, where Charles had joined in commission with him the Roman Catholic Earl of Rivers. It was in Lancashire and Cheshire that the papists were most numerous: in the first they kept quiet, in Cheshire they were disarmed by the parliamentarians. In the west of England, especially in the extreme west, the king's party was numerous. Charles, in his commission of array, appointed the Marquis of Hertford to be lord lieutenant general of Cornwall, Devonshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Gloucester, Dorsetshire, Southampton, Berkshire. Oxfordshire, Herefordshire, and seven counties within the principality of Wales. The holder of this high command was opposed by most of the burghers of considerable towns, but he was assisted by the Lord Paulet, Sir Ralph Hopeton, Sir Richard Slany, Sir Bevil Grenville, the Earl of Bath, and other lords and squires too numerous to recount. The most considerable skirmish that occurred before Charles's raising his standard was in Somersetshire, where the Marquis of Hertford was opposed by the deputy lieutenants of the county, and where ten men were slain and many wounded.[1]

About the end of July the parliament had sent a commission to the king, who was then at Beverley, to entreat him to forbear his hostile preparations and dismiss his garrisons. His reply was, that they ought to lay down their arms first; and he ordered this answer, which contained many bitter reflections on their proceedings, to be read in all churches. They replied, ordering their answer to be read in churches and every where else. A few days after, Charles published a declaration to all his loving subjects, concerning the proceedings of this present parliament. This paper occupied fifty large and close quarto pages of print: it contained a kind of history of all that had passed between him and the Houses, vowed a wonderful love to parliaments, but required that the Lord Kimbolton and the five members of the House of Commons before accused, and two other members, Mr. Henry Martin and Sir Henry Ludlow, should be given up to the king's justice. Charles also desired to have delivered up to him Alderman Pennington, the new lord mayor of London,[2] and Captain Venn, an officer of the city train-bands, and he required that indictments of high treason should be drawn against the earls of Essex, Warwick, and Stamford, the Lord Brooke, Sir John Hotham, and Sergeant Major-General Skippon, as likewise against all those who should dare to raise the militia by virtue of the ordinance of parliament. The royal pen was, indeed, "very quick upon all occasions;" and, the day after the publication of this long declaration, Charles sent a message upbraiding both Houses for borrowing a sum for their present uses out of a loan made by adventurers for reducing Ireland, and affirming that they were the cause of prolonging the bloody rebellion in that country. This was turning upon parliament one of the heaviest accusations they had made against the king. They replied vehemently, and yet circumstantially, calling to remembrance the many particulars of their care for the relief of Ireland, and the many instances in which the king had hindered it. They told the king that, but for his leaving his parliament and making war upon it, a million of money might have been raised at this time by the adventure of private men: that when, at the sole charge of the adventurers, 5000 foot and 500 horse were designed for the relief of Munster, and nothing wanted but a commission to the General Lord Wharton, he had refused that commission, by reason whereof Limerick was lost and the province of Munster left in great distress; that he had purposely delayed the sailing of twelve ships and six pinnaces, with a thousand land forces, for the service of Ireland; that he had stopped artillery, ammunition, horses, baggage-wagons, clothes, and equipments, intended by parliament for the poor Protestant soldiers in Ireland; that he had treated with and received petitions from those confident rebels, who had presumed very lately to call themselves his majesty's Catholic subjects of Ireland, to complain of the Puritan parliament of England, and to desire that, since his majesty could not go over to them according to their expectations, they might be permitted to come over into England to his majesty.[1]

Charles flattered himself that, if he could only obtain possession of Hull, he might soon be undisputed master of all the north. A secret correspondence was opened with Sir John Hotham, who so far departed from his former line of conduct as to allow the royalists to entertain hopes that he would betray the parliament and deliver up that important city. The king posted Lord Lindsay at Beverley, with 3000 foot and 1000 horse, to carry the place by siege, if Hotham should not keep his engagement; and in the mean time he himself visited other points; "and, within three weeks, both in his own person and by his messengers, with speeches, proclamations, and declarations, he advanced his business in a wonderful manner. At Newark he made a speech to the gentry of Nottinghamshire in a loving and winning way, commending their affections toward him, which was a great part of persuasion for the future, coming from a king himself. Another speech he made at Lincoln, to the gentry of that county, full of protestations concerning his good intentions, not only to them, but to the whole kingdom, the laws and liberties of it."[2] From Lincoln Charles went to Leicester, where the Earl of Stamford was executing the parliament's ordinance of the militia. He hoped to take the earl in the fact, but that nobleman fell back upon Northampton, whither Charles durst not follow him; for Northampton was a town so true to the parliament that it would have shut its gates against the king, as Hull had done. The king, however, seized that noted victim of Laud's barbarity, Dr. Bastwick, who had taken a commission under the Earl of Stamford, and remained doing his duty in levying men when his general beat a retreat. Charles would have had him instantly indicted of high treason at the assizes then sitting, but the judge entreated his majesty not to put a matter of so great moment upon one single judge, but to cause the law in that case to be declared by all the twelve judges. The latter course, he said, might do his majesty good, whereas the publishing of his particular opinion could only destroy himself, and nothing advance his majesty's service. This judge also expressed his doubts whether any jury suddenly summoned at that moment would have courage to find the bill; and upon this suggestion Charles gave up the idea of hanging, drawing, and quartering the doctor, who had already been scourged, pilloried, mutilated, and branded by Laud. There is a great deal in this little transaction to show that the character of the king had undergone no change. The night before his leaving Leicester, the judge and the gentlemen of the county, including even those that were the most loyal, waited upon him with a request that he would liberate the prisoner, or suffer the judge to do so upon his habeas corpus. Charles told them "he would think of it till the next morning;" and in the mean while he directed a messenger of the chamber, very early, with such assistance as the sheriff should give, to carry Bastwick away to Nottingham; and, by the help of the sheriff there, to the jail at York: all which was executed accordingly with expedition and secrecy, for fear of a rescue.[1]

Returning to Beverly, Charles received a letter from Lord Digby, who had returned from the continent in disguise, and smuggled himself into Hull, where he had voluntarily discovered himself to the governor for the purpose of tampering with him. But now Digby, the daring and restless head of the queen's faction, informed Charles that he found Hotham much shaken in the resolution of delivering Hull—seeing, as Sir John said, that his officers were of a temper not to be relied upon, and his own son, the younger Hotham, was grown jealous of some design, and was counter-working it. Presently after this information, the king's army, not confident of carrying the town by open force, and no longer counting on the treachery of the governor, had recourse to another plot; and, knowing some men within the walls fit for their purpose, they arranged that Hull should be set on fire in four several places, and that, while the parliament soldiers and inhabitants were busied in quenching the flames, 2000 men should assault the walls. The signal to those within the town was to be a fire lighted in the night on Beverley Minster; but the plot was discovered by one of the instruments, and it so provoked the townsmen of Hull that the walls could not contain them; but 500 of them, conducted by Sir John Meldrum, made a sortie, and fell fiercely upon the beleaguerers. The king's soldiers seemed inclined to fight bravely, but the train-bands of that county were not forward to be engaged against their neighbors, and horse and foot fled as fast as they could to Beverley. Sir John Meldrum followed in their wake, killed two, took thirty prisoners, and carried some important magazines which the king had placed between Beverley and Hull, where again the train-bands and other Yorkshiremen, bearing no great affection to that war, ran away and left their arms behind them. The king now called a council of war, wherein it was resolved to break up the siege of Hull and march away. Meldrum, that fiery Scot, got back to Hull with a good prize in ammunition and arms; but the elder Hotham, who was still wavering, and who evidently wished to keep well with both parties, safely dismissed to the king the Lord Digby and that other active servant of royalty, John Ashburnham.[1] Charles dismissed the train-bands, and returned to York, in much less credit than when he came from thence. But his spirits were revived by the news "that so notable a place as Portsmouth had declared for him, . . . and that so good an officer as Goring was returned to his duty, and in possession of that town." Clarendon adds, that the king was not surprised at this matter; it would have been strange if he had, seeing that he had been for some time in correspondence with Colonel Goring. Hereupon he published a declaration in which he recapitulated all the insolent and rebellious actions of the two Houses, forbidding all his subjects to yield any obedience to what was no longer a parliament, but a cabal and faction. And at the same time he issued his proclamation requiring all men that could bear arms to repair to him at Nottingham by the 25th of August.

"According to the proclamation," proceeds the noble historian, "upon the 25th day of August, the standard was erected about six of the clock in the evening of a very stormy and tempestuous day. The king himself, with a small train, rode to the top of the castle-hill—Varney, the knight-marshal, who was standard-bearer, carrying the standard, which was then erected in that place with little other ceremony than the sound of drums and trumpets. Melancholy men observed many ill presages about that time. There was not one regiment of foot yet brought thither, so that the trained-bands which the sheriff had drawn together were all the strength the king had for his person and the guard of the standard. There appeared no conflux of men in obedience to the proclamation; the arms and ammunition were not yet come from York, and a general sadness covered the whole town. The standard was blown down the same night it had been set up, by a very strong and unruly wind, and could not be fixed again in a day or two, till the tempest was allayed. This was the melancholy state of the king's affairs when the standard was set up."[2]

The king's dejection of spirits was increased by the failure of an attempt which he had made two or three days before upon the town of Coventry. Learning that Hampden's regiment and some other corps of parliamentarians were marching, by order of the Earl of Essex, to garrison Coventry, he had struck aside in that direction at the head of his cavalry, amounting to about 800 men, not doubting that he should secure the town, provided only he could arrive before the parliamentarian foot. But the people of Coventry, like those of most manufacturing places, loved their parliament and their Puritan preachers; and, though he did arrive first, the gates were shut in his face and some shots fired from the walls, by which some of his attendants were wounded. He had then retired to Stoneleigh, near Warwick, to pass the night there; and in the morning he had seen his horse in an open plain decline giving combat to Hampden's foot, and retreat before them without making a single charge for the honor of arms. Discouraged, hopeless, and wavering, the royalists at Nottingham proposed the king's immediate return to York, conceiving that not even his person was secure at Nottingham, as Essex was concentrating his forces at Northampton, where, in fact, that earl soon saw himself surrounded by an army of 15,000 men, composed of substantial yeomen and industrious burghers, the inhabitants of trading and manufacturing towns.[1] Charles would

[2] Clarendon, Hist.—Rushworth says that the standard was raised, not on the twenty-fifth of August, but on the twenty-second. His account differs in other essentials:—"Monday being the 22d of August, in the morning his majesty left his forces before Coventry, and with some lords and others in company, rode to Leicester, where he dined that day at the Abbey, the Countesss of Devonshire's house. Presently after dinner the king again took horse, and with his company rode to Nottingham, where was great preparation for the setting up of the standard that day, as was formerly appointed. Not long after the king's coming to town, the standard was taken out of the castle, and carried into the field a little on the back side of the castle wall. The likeness of the standard was much of the fashion of the city streamers used at the lord mayor's show, having about twenty supporters, and was carried after the same way; on the top of it hangs a flag, the king's arms quartered, with a hand pointing to the crown, which stands above with this motto—Give Cæsar his due. The names of those knights-baronets who were appointed to bear the standard, namely the chief of them, were Sir Thomas Brooks, Sir Arthur Hopton, Sir Francis Wortley, and Sir Robert Dadington. Likewise there were three troops of horse to wait upon the standard, and to bear the same backward and forward, with about 600 foot soldiers. It was conducted to the field in great state, his majesty, the prince, Prince Rupert (whom his majesty had lately made Knight of the Garter), going along with it, with divers other lords and gentlemen of his majesty's train, beside a great company of horse and foot, in all to the number of about 2000. So soon as the standard was set up, and his majesty and the other lords placed about it, a herald-at-arms made ready to publish a proclamation, declaring the ground and cause of his majesty's setting up of his standard, namely, to suppress the rebellion of the Earl of Essex, in raising forces against him, to which he required the aid and assistance of all his loving subjects; but, before the trumpeters could sound to make proclamation, his majesty called to view the said proclamation, which, being given him, he privately read the same over to himself, and seeming to dislike some passages therein, called for pen and ink, and with his own hand crossed out and altered the same in some places, and then gave it the herald, who proclaimed the same to the people, though with some difficulty, after his majesty's corrections; after the reading whereof, the whole multitude threw up their hats, and cried God save the King, with other such like expressions. Not long after the reading of the said proclamation, it being toward night, the standard was taken down, and again carried into the castle with the like state as it was brought into the field; and the next day it was set up again, and his majesty came along with it, and made proclamation as the day before; and the like was also done on Wednesday, his majesty being also present; but after that it was set up with less ceremony."

[1] The instructions given by parliament to the Earl of Essex contained the following clauses:—

"1. You shall carefully restrain all impieties, profaneness, and disorders, violence, insolence, and plundering in your soldiers, as well by strict and severe punishment of such offenses, as by all other means which you in your wisdom shall think fit.

"2. Your lordship is to march with such forces as you think fit toward the army raised in his majesty's name against the parliament and kingdom. And you shall use your utmost endeavors, by battle or otherwise, to rescue his majesty's person, and the persons of the prince and the Duke of York, out of the hands of those desperate persons who are now about them.

"3. You shall take an opportunity, in some safe and honorable way, to cause the petition of both Houses of parliament, herewith sent unto you, to be presented unto his majesty; and if his majesty shall there-not hear of this retreat; and when some of his council urged the expediency of making overtures for an accommodation with his parliament, he was so offended with the advice that he declared he would never yield to it, and hastily broke up the council, that it might be no longer urged. The next day, however, the king yielded to the earnestness of the Earl of Southampton, who suggested to his majesty that if the parliament should refuse to treat, as it was thought they would, they would render themselves odious to the people, and thus dispose men to serve the king. It was upon this plea that Charles reluctantly agreed to send the earls of Southampton and Dorset and Sir John Culpeper to London on the third day after raising the standard at Nottingham. Culpeper was very obnoxious in the capital, for he was one of those who were considered as renegades; but all three of the king's messengers were watched very supiciously, and all the answer they could get was, that the parliament would enter upon no negotiations whatever until the king should have taken down his standard, and called in those proclamations by which he had declared the Earl of Essex and his adherents to be traitors, and had put the two Houses out of his protection, proclaiming their actions to be treasonable. Another message was sent from the king to the two Houses; but, on every ground, it was now hopeless to think of a peaceful arrangement; and Charles's nephew, Prince Rupert, who had at last arrived in England, insulted all the royalists that still ventured to recommend pacific measures. This rash young man, who was instantly appointed to the highest command, so excited some of the principal officers with indignation at the thought of the overture recently made to parliament, that they were well-nigh offering personal violence to the members of the council who had recommended that measure. Rupert, whom the English people soon learned to call Prince Robber, was accompanied by his younger brother, Prince Maurice, and both "showed themselves very forward and active . . . and if more hot and furious than the tender beginnings of a civil war upon please to withdraw himself from the forces now about him, and to resort to the parliament, you shall cause all those forces to disband, and shall serve and defend his majesty with a sufficient strength in his return.

"4. You shall publish and declare that, if any who have been so seduced by the false aspersions cast upon the proceedings of the parliament as to assist the king in the acting of those dangerous counsels, shall willingly, within ten days after such publication in the army, return to their duty, not doing any hostile act within the time limited, and join themselves with the parliament in defense of religion, his majesty's person, the liberties and laws of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament, with their persons and estates, as the members of both Houses and the rest of the kingdom have done, that the Lords and Commons will be ready upon their submission to receive such persons in such manner as they shall have cause to acknowledge they have been used with clemency and favor; provided that this shall not extend to admit any man into either House of parliament who stands suspended, without giving satisfaction to the House whereof he shall be a member; and except all persons who stand impeached in parliament of treason as have been eminent persons and chief actors in those treasons; and except the Earl of Bristol, the Earl of Cumberland, the Earl of Newcastle, the Earl Rivers, Secretary Nicholas, Mr. Endymion Porter, Mr. Edward Hyde (Clarendon), the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Caernarvon, the Lord Viscount Newark, the Lord Viscount Falkland, one of the principal secretaries of state to his majesty.

* * * * * * * *

"7. You shall carefully protect all his majesty's loving subjects from rapine and violence by any of the cavaliers or other soldiers of his majesty's pretended army, or by any of the soldiers of the army which you command; and you shall cause the arms and goods of any person to be restored to them from whom they have been unjustly taken."

would seem to require, it may be imputed to the fervor of their youth, and great desire which they had to ingratiate themselves to the king; upon whom, as being no more than soldiers of fortune, their hopes of advancement wholly depended."[1] Prince Rupert, the elder brother, and the more furious of the two, within a fortnight after his arrival at Nottingham took the command of a small party and scoured through divers counties, hoping to roll himself, like a snow-ball, into a larger bulk, by the accession of recruits. He flew rather than marched through parts of Nottinghamshire, Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Worcestershire, and Cheshire, not so much inviting the people by fair promises and kind deameanor, as compelling them by extreme rigor to take his side. "Many towns and villages he plundered, which is to say robbed (for at that time first was the word plunder used in England, being born in Germany, when that stately country was so miserably wasted and pillaged by foreign armies), and committed other outrages upon those who stood affected to the parliament, executing some, and hanging up servants at their masters' doors for not discovering of their masters."[2]

Charles vainly loitered at Nottingham, few or none joining his standard, or seeming likely to do so, when Essex was at hand with such a superior force. About the middle of September he began to move toward the west of England, where the Marquis of Hertford engaged to do great things, and where several regiments were actually raised for his service. Essex had tendered to him the parliament's petition, praying for his return to his capital, and for the disbanding of his army; but Charles had refused to receive what he termed the insulting message of a set of traitors. On his march westward, the king did not act like the fierce Rupert, but in a gentler and calmer way. "Professions of love, persuasions, and protestations of his affection to his people were the chief instruments which he used to raise himself a strength, with complaints against the proceedings and actions of the parliament."[3] Between Stafford and Wellington he halted his troops, and, having caused his orders of the day to be read at the head of each corps, he advanced to the front, and told the men, for their comfort, that they should meet no enemies but traitors, most of them Brownists, Anabaptists, or Atheists, who would destroy both church and commonwealth. He then made one of his solemn protestations, imprecating the vengeance of Heaven upon himself and his posterity if his intentions were not solely for the maintenance of the true reformed Protestant religion established in the church of England, the laws and liberties of the kingdom, and the just privileges of parliament. He had already, at York, issued a proclamation against papists, forbidding the resort of any men of that religion to his camp; and yet at this moment he was surrounded by Catholics, and on his way to meet many more. His protestation and declaration only tended, therefore, to confirm his reputation for habitual falsehood and duplicity; but at the same time we can not pass without reprobation the religious intolerance of the parliament and the great mass of the nation, which seemed in Charles's eyes to render this double course necessary. In the end he told his troops that they were already condemned to ruin for being loyal to him; that, after what they had heard, they must believe they could not fight in a better quarrel, in which he promised to live and die with them.[1] Clarendon intimates that this conduct, and addresses of this kind, had a wonderful effect in increasing the king's party; but Charles could not always adhere to the line of mildness and persuasion. In part of his march he courteously summoned the county trainbands to attend him and guard his royal person; and, when they were met, he expressed doubts of their loyalty, forcibly disarmed them, gave their arms to others, and sent them away. Beside, he levied contributions, or, to use the quaint language of a cotemporary, "he got good sums of money, which, not without some constraint, he borrowed from them." On the 20th of September he reached Shrewsbury, where he was cordially received. There he made a very courteous speech to the gentlemen, freeholders, and other inhabitants of the county, telling them that he had sent for a new mint—that he would melt down all his plate, and offer all his lands to sale or mortgage, in order to press the less severely upon them for the support of his army. He implored them, however, not to suffer so good a cause to be lost for want of supplying him with that which would be taken from them by those who were pursuing him with such violence. "And," continued Charles, "while these ill men sacrifice their money, plate, and utmost industry to destroy the commonwealth, be you no less liberal to preserve it, assuring yourselves, if it please God to bless me with success, I shall remember your assistance." With fresh protestations on his lips that he would never suffer an army of papists to be raised, he wrote away to the Earl of Newcastle in the north, bidding him raise as many men as he could, without any regard to their religion;[2] and at this moment, or a little later, he sent over to Ireland for Anglo-Irish troops, or for troops of native Catholics. Considerable quantities of plate were brought in, both voluntarily and by force; and a mint having been erected, money was struck with great rapidity. The Catholics of Shropshire and Staffordshire advanced the king £5000 in cash, a country gentleman paid him £6000 for the title of baron, and a few sums were secretly remitted by his partisans in London. And, presently, a royal lord had to report that Charles was very averse to peace; that it was con-

"Newcastle,

"This is to tell you that this rebellion is grown to that height that I must not look what opinion men are who at this time are willing and able to serve me. Therefore I do not only permit, but command you to make use of all my loving subjects' services, without examining their consciences (more than their loyalty to me), as you shall find most to conduce to the upholding of my just regal power.

ceived that he had taken a resolution not to do any thing in that way till the queen should come; and that people advising the king to agree with the parliament, was the occasion of the queen's return, an event which was now daily looked for. The same noble writer also affirmed that the discontent which he and other men received from those about the king was great beyond expression—that, if the king and the papists should prevail, the country would be in a sad condition.[1]

In the mean time the Earl of Essex, having secured the country round Northampton, put a good garrison into Coventry, and taking possession of Warwick, struck off to the west, in order to throw himself between the king and the capital, and get possession of the important city of Worcester. Prince Rupert and a detachment of the parliamentarians had a struggle for the possession of Worcester, before Essex, whose movements were generally slow and formal, could come up. Colonel Sandys, a gallant officer, fell in charging Rupert up a narrow lane; but, in the end, the prince was driven from the town and across the bridge, leaving twenty dead, and thirty prisoners behind him. Essex appeared almost immediately after this fight, and took an assured possession of Worcester; Prince Rupert rode back to the king. For three weeks Essex lay at Worcester doing nothing.[2] Encouraged by this strange inaction, and by his own great accession of men, arms, and money, Charles quitted Shrewsbury on the 20th of October, with the intention of turning Essex's army, and marching straight upon London by Wolverhampton, Birmingham, and Kenilworth. Essex, it appears, was wholly ignorant of his movements till the king had got behind him; but he then followed with some alacrity, and entered the village of Keinton, in Warwickshire, on the 22d, the same evening that the royalists halted at Edgehill, a very little in advance. Charles, by the advice of a council of war, resolved to turn round and face his pursuers, who, in their late and sudden movement, had left whole regiments behind them. The night passed tranquilly. On the following morning, Sunday, the 23d of October, when Essex looked toward Edgehill, he saw that the royalists had not retreated, but were there drawn up in order of battle. He presently arranged his own forces, placing the best of his field-pieces upon his right wing, guarded by two regiments of foot and some horse. But the parliamentarians liked not to charge the royalists up hill, and the royalists seemed determined not to quit their advantageous position. It might well be, too, that other considerations, apart from merely military ones, imposed a long and solemn pause. Many generations of men had gone peacefully to their graves since the last day on which Englishmen had stood opposed to Englishmen on the battle-field; and, from the spirit that animated either party, both must have known that, begin when it would, this would be a bloody conflict. It is also said by one of the royalists, that the king had given orders not to begin, nor engage in any way until the enemy should first have shot their cannon at him;[1] and it is very probable that Essex had an equal reluctance to fire the first shot. But whatever were the causes of the delay, it is certain that the two armies spent many hours in gazing at each other—long hours, infinitely more trying than the heat and hurry of actual combat to the spirits of men, particularly to men newly, and for the far greater part for the first time in their lives, under arms. Charles was on the field in complete armor, wearing a black velvet mantle, with the star and George, and he addressed an encouraging speech to his soldiers. He had retained to himself the title of generalissimo, naming the Earl of Lindsay, a brave and experienced old soldier, who in former times had been the comrade of Essex in the foreign wars, chief general under him: but Lindsay, disgusted with the petulance and impertinence of Prince Rupert, regarded himself as only a nominal chief, and took his place, pike in hand, at the head of his own regiment. Sir Jacob Astley was major-general under the Earl of Lindsay. Prince Rupert commanded the right wing of the horse, and Lord Wilmot the left, and two reserves of horse were commanded, the one by Lord Digby, and the other by Sir John Byron. The royalists exceeded the parliamentarians in total number and in horse, but Essex had the better train of artillery. Pike in hand, Essex advanced into the broad plain at foot of Edgehill, called the Vale of the Red Horse—"a name," says May, "suitable to the color which that day was to bestow upon it, for there happened the greatest part of the encounter." Sir John Meldrum's brigade was posted in the van; three regiments of horse were on the right wing, commanded by Sir Philip Stapleton and Sir William Balfour. The left wing, consisting of about twenty troops of horse, was commanded by Sir James Ramsay; the foot were considerably behind the cavalry, and the center was occupied by Colonel Essex's regiment; in the rear were Lord Brooke and Denzil Hollis, who were flanked by two reserves of horse. At last, about two o'clock in the afternoon, the Earl of Essex commanded his artillery to fire upon the enemy, and, according to Ludlow, this was done twice upon that part of the army wherein the king was reported to be. The royalists presently replied with their cannon, and "the great shot was exchanged for the space of an hour or thereabout." Then the royalists began to descend the hill, and their main body of foot, surrounding the king's standard, advanced within musket-shot. The parliamentarians made a charge to break them and seize the standard, but they were repulsed with some loss by their pikes. Then Prince Rupert with his cavalry charged the left wing of the parliamentarians, broke it, and pursued it like a madman, as far as the village of Keinton, where his men took to plundering, instead of thinking of the main body which they had left. Though their left wing was thus broken, the right wing of the parliametarians was intact, and a charge from that quarter, under Sir William Balfour, was so successful, that the king's artillerymen were driven from their guns, and several of the cannons spiked. After this brilliant charge, Sir William Balfour fell back upon the main body, whence the Earl of Essex advanced two regiments of foot to attack the mass of infantry which surrounded the royal standard. This body of royalists stood firm, and fought most gallantly; but presently Balfour came up with his horse, turned them, and attacked them in the rear, while some other squadrons of parliamentarians threatened them in flank; and then the royalists broke and ran back toward the hill. Many of them were killed upon the spot, and among these were Sir Edward Varney (who was engaged on that side, not out of any good opinion of the cause, but "on the point of honor") and Colonel Munro. The Earl of Lindsay, the nominal general-in-chief under the king, was mortally wounded and taken prisoner, together with his son and Colonel Vavasour. The parliamentarians took many colors, and Lieutenant Middleton seized the royal standard and carried it to the Earl of Essex, who delivered it to his secretary, Mr. Chambers, who suffered it to be taken from him, and so "privately conveyed away." The royalists, however, rallied on the hill top, and kept up a fire till nightfall. Rupert returned with his sword red with English blood, with his horses loaded with plunder; but he found the king's left wing broken, and the center in the greatest confusion, nor could he recover his position on the right wing without sustaining a terrible charge from the parliamentarian horse, led on by Sir Philip Stapleton.[1] It is said that the parliament foot now began to want gunpowder, and that this was the only reason which prevented Essex from charging up the hill with his whole force of cavalry and infantry. He retained possession of the ground which his enemies had chosen to fight upon—the Vale of the Red Horse—during the night; but the royalists did not move from the top of the hill, where they made great fires all the night long. Great military faults had been committed on both sides, but there was certainly no deficiency of courage on either. In the confusion and excitement of the combat, the parliamentarians had more than once fired upon their own men, mistaking them for the enemy. The substantial yeomen, the burghers, the artisans, were new at the bloody game; but in this first great encounter they taught the cavaliers to respect the valor of the "thimble and bodkin" army. There is a great variety of statements as to the actual number of the slain; but, taking a medium calculation, it appears that 4000 men lay dead that night in the Vale of the Red Horse. The loss of the royalists was greater than that of the parliamentarians, and Charles lost many distinguished officers, while Essex lost only two colonels, the Lord St. John and Colonel Walton. Captain Austen, an eminent merchant of London, was badly wounded, and died in Oxford jail, through the harsh usage he received from the royalists, into whose hands he fell. "It was observed," says Ludlow, "that the greatest slaughter on our side was of such as ran away, and on the enemy's side of those that stood; of whom I saw about three score lie within the compass of three score yards upon the ground whereon that brigade fought in which the king's standard was." On the following morning the parliamentarians, who had lain all the night on the ground without covering and without provision, received supplies of meat and beer, and shortly after they were reinforced by three regiments commanded by Hampden, Denzil, Hollis, and Lord Willoughby. "We hoped," says Ludlow, "that we should have pursued the enemy, who were marching off as fast as they could, leaving only some troops to face us upon the top of the hill; but, instead of that, for what reason I know not, we marched to Warwick; of which the enemy having notice, sent out a party of horse, under Prince Rupert, who on Tuesday night fell into the town of Keinton, where our sick and wounded soldiers lay, and, after they had cruelly murdered many of them, returned to their army." Hampden, Hollis, Stapleton, and other members of parliament commanding militia regiments, urged Essex to follow up the king and renew the battle; but the military men by profession—the officers who had served in regular wars on the continent—thought that enough had been done by an army of recruits, and that it would be wiser to accustom the men by degrees to warfare, and not to risk every thing at once. Colonel Dalbier, an old soldier of fortune, who was suspected of a wish to prolong the war, is said to have prevailed with Essex, who loitered far in the rear of the royalists. The king, as if master of the field—and he claimed as a victory the battle at Edgehill—marched to Banbury, and summoned it; and though about a thousand parliamentarians were in the town, they surrendered to him apparently without a blow.[1]

Charles then proceeded to Oxford, where he was welcomed by the University, which was enthusiastically loyal from the beginning.[2] "Then, too, many of the greatest gentlemen of divers counties began

[1] Both parties agree in opinion as to Prince Rupert's headlong rashness. Sir Philip Warwick, who was in the battle, says that the cavalry pursued the chase contrary to all discipline of war, and left the king and his foot so alone, that it gave Essex a title to the victory of that day, which might have been his last day, if they had done their parts and stood their ground. Ludlow says, "And if the time which he spent in pursuing them too far, and in plundering the wagons, had been employed in taking such advantages as offered themselves in the place where the fight was, it might have proved more serviceable to the carrying on of the enemy's designs." May describes his conduct thus: "The parliament army had undoubtedly been ruined that day, and an absolute victory gained on the king's side, if Prince Rupert and his pursuing troops had been more temperate in plundering so untimely as they did, and had wheeled about to assist their distressed friends in other parts of the army; for Prince Rupert followed the chase to Keinton town, were the carriages of the army were, which they presently pillaged, using great cruelty, as was afterward related, to the unarmed wagoners and laboring men."

[2] About a month before, however, when Bulstrode Whitelock and the Lord Saye were at Oxford for the parliament, the mayor, aldermen, vice-chancellor, heads of houses, and proctors, all protested their duty to the parliament, and their desires of peace, and engaged not to act any thing against the two Houses, nor to send their plate to the king, which they did two or three days after. But the Lord Saye had then with him 3000 horse and foot! Whitelock blames him for not having secured the place as well as the plate, which would have prevented his majesty making it his place of arms and head garrison.

to consider the king as one that in possibility might prove a conqueror, and many of those who before had stood at gaze as neutral, in hope that one quick blow might clear the doubt, and save them the danger of declaring themselves, came in readily and adhered to that side where there seemed to be least fears and greatest hopes: for from the parliament's side the encouragements were only public —nothing was promised but the free enjoyment of their native liberty—no particular honors, preferments, or confiscated estates of enemies; and on the other side no such total ruin could be threatened by a victorious parliament, as by an incensed prince, and such hungry followers as usually go along with princes in those ways."[1] The cavaliers that flocked to Oxford were generally well mounted, and this allowed Charles greatly to reinforce the cavalry under his nephew, who, though (at this time at least) wholly deficient in the qualities of a general, possessed those of a dashing cavalry officer in great perfection. Issuing from Oxford, Prince Rupert scoured the country, visited Abingdon, Henley, and other towns, and returned with great booty. Within a few days he made still nearer approaches toward London, penetrating as far as Staines and Egham, but with a flying army, resting in no place, but moving like a free corps of the partisans of the famous Count Mansfeldt in the Palatinate, the tradition of whose exploits was likely to be deeply impressed on the mind of Rupert. The parliament and the city of London were thrown into consternation, but they provided with spirit for their defense. Trenches were dug, and ramparts thrown up round the capital; seamen were embarked in boats and small vessels, and sent up the river; forces were detached to possess and fortify Windsor Castle. The train-bands of London, Middlesex, and Surrey were concentrated, and kept continually under arms. A declaration was published for the encouragement of apprentices that would enlist, who were to have the time they served in the army allowed in their apprenticeship; and as the London apprentices were very stirring and bold, this little measure contributed greatly to reinforce the parliament army. Associations of counties for mutual defense had already been allowed and recommended by the two Houses, and those bonds were now drawn closer at the approach of danger. In the eastern counties the association, which had been mainly organized and directed by Oliver Cromwell, was exceedingly formidable. The parliament, taking notice that the king had, by a formal commission, empowered Sir William Gerrard, Sir Cecil Trafford, and other popish gentlemen, to take arms with their tenants and servants, resolved to strengthen themselves by the Presbyterian interest, and they applied to the Scots for immediate assistance. Many disaffected persons were seized in the city of London, where plots were suspected similar to those which had been detected at Hull, and preachers and proclamations kept alive the enthusiasm of the citizens. Very varying news blew hot and cold among the Londoners: it was rumored that Essex was entirely defeated; that he had wavered and gone over to the king; that the king was marching with the two united armies to wreak his vengeance on the capital: but, at last, the Earl of Essex reached the neighborhood of London, with his army in good condition and disposition; and, quartering his men about Acton, he himself (on the the 7th of November) rode into Westminster to give the parliament an account of his campaign. It was clear to most men that Essex had been far from doing the best that might have been done; but the two Houses wisely welcomed him, voted him thanks, and presented him with a gift of £5000, as an acknowledgment of his care, pains, and valor.

[1] May.

The earl had scarcely arrived in the capital when the king, quitting Oxford, marched upon Reading. Mr. Henry Martin, one of the most remarkable men in the House of Commons, commanded at this town; but, considering the place untenable with the forces he had with him, he evacuated it at the king's approach, and fell back upon London. Charles then advanced to Colnbrook, where he was met by the Earl of Northumberland and three members of the House of Commons, who presented a petition for an accommodation. Charles seemed to receive their address with great willingness, and he returned them a fair and smooth answer, calling God to witness that he was tenderly compassionate of his bleeding people, and so desirous of nothing as for a speedy peace. The deputation, well pleased, returned to the parliament, where the king's gracious answer, wherein he promised to reside near London till commissioners might settle the existing differences, was read to both Houses. Thereupon the Earl of Essex rose, and asked whether he was now to pursue or suspend hostilities? Parliament ordered the earl to suspend them, and dispatched Sir Peter Killigrew to require a like cessation on the part of the royalists, not having, however, the smallest doubt that Charles would consider himself bound by his entertaining their propositions of an accommodation, and by his gracious message of the preceding evening, to remain in a state of truce. But Killigrew was scarcely gone when the loud roar of cannon was heard in the House of Lords. The Earl of Essex rushed out of the House, mounted his horse, and galloped across the parks and through Knightsbridge, in the direction of the ominous sound. As he approached Brentford the earl learned, to his astonishment, the trick had been played. Prince Rupert, closely followed by the king in person and by the whole royal army, taking advantage of a dense November fog, had advanced and fallen unexpectedly upon Brentford, which was occupied by a broken regiment of Colonel Hollis's, "but stout men all, who had before done good service at Edgehill." The royalists fancied they should cut their way through Brentford without any difficulty, get on to Hammersmith, where the parliament's train of artillery lay, and then perhaps take London by a sudden night assault. But Hollis's men, with unspeakable courage, opposed their passage, and stopped their march so long at Brentford, that the gallant regiments of Hampden and Lord Brooke had time to come up. These three regi ments, not without great loss, completely barred the road; and when Essex, who had gathered a considerable force of horse as he rode along, came to the spot, he found that the royalists had given over the attack, and were lying quietly on the western side of Brentford. Charles had kept himself safe at Hounslow, and there he lay that night. "All that night," says May, "the city of London poured out men toward Brentford, who every hour marched thither; and all the lords and gentlemen that belonged to the parliament army were there ready by Sunday morning, the 14th of November." The city bands had marched forth cheerfully under the command of Major-general Skippon, who enjoyed the entire confidence of parliament and the extraordinary favor of the Londoners.[1] The Earl of Holland, who showed excessive zeal and good skill in martial affairs, assisted Essex, who found himself in the course of this Sunday at the head of 24,000 men, who were drawn up in battle array on Turnham-green—"stout, gallant, proper men; as well habited and armed as were ever seen in any army, and of as good courage to fight the enemy."[2] Hampden, with his brave men of Buckinghamshire, by the Lord Essex's orders, began to make a detour with the intention of falling upon the king's rear, while the rest of the parliamentarians should attack him in front and turn his flanks; but they had scarcely marched a mile when Sir John Merrick, Essex's major-general, galloped after them, and told them that the general had changed his mind as to dividing his forces, and ordered them back. Hampden and his green coats, exceedingly troubled, fell back accordingly. If the business had been conducted with only moderate skill and decision, the king must have been surrounded, and his retreat to Oxford cut off. Three thousand parliamentarians had taken post at Kingston-bridge, but these, too, were removed from the king's rear, and brought round by London-bridge to join Essex and cover the western approaches to the capital. "The reason of that strange command," says May, as "afterward given, was, that the lord-general was not assured of strength enough to stop the enemy from London, nor could beforehand be assured of so great an army as came thither to join him." And, thus, leaving the king's rear unencumbered, the parliamentarians stood at gaze, facing the royalists, but doing nothing. At last it was consulted whether the parliament army should not advance and fall upon the king's forces, as was advised by most of the members of parliament and gentlemen who were officers; but the soldiers of fortune, who love long campaigns as physicians love long diseases, were altogether against it; and, while they were consulting, Charles drew off his carriages and ordnance, and, when every one had spoken his opinion, the general gave his orders as he thought best. The good wives of the city and others, mindful of their husbands and friends, sent many cartloads of provisions, and wine and other good things, to Turnham-green, with which the city soldiers refreshed themselves and made merry; and Whitelock slily adds, that they made merrier still when they understood that the king and all his army were in full retreat. Upon this there was another consultation, whether the parliamentarians should pursue. Again, Hampden, Hollis, all the members of parliament, all the gentlemen who had become soldiers only for their principles, were for the bolder course, and all the old soldiers of fortune—the men who had made war their regular trade and profession—were against it, representing that it would be too hazardous to follow the enemy, and that the king's retreat was honor and safety enough to the parliament. Charles, scarcely crediting his good luck, got safe to Kingston, and crossed the bridge there without opposition, and without ammunition enough in his own army to have lasted a quarter of an hour. He then retired more slowly to Reading, and from Reading he repaired to Oxford, his most convenient quarters.[1]

The parliament, in their indignation, voted that they would never again treat with the king or enter into any accommodation; yet at the opening of the following year (1643) they entertained more pacific notions, and in the month of March they began a hopeless treaty at Oxford, where Charles still lay, to the delight perhaps of the very loyal university, though certainly not to the comfort of the neighboring country, which was swept, ravaged, and pillaged in all directions by the flying squadrons of Prince Rupert. The parliament commissioners were the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Holland; the viscounts Wenman and Dungarnon; Sir John Holland, Sir William Litton, knights; William Pierpoint, Bulstrode Whitelock, Edmund Waller, and Richard Winwood, esquires. These noblemen and gentlemen had their first access to the king in the garden of Christchurch, where he was walking with the young prince. All of them kissed his hand according to their several degrees, for the court, even in these extremities, was mindful of etiquet; thus, Mr. Pierpoint kissed hands before the knights, because he was an earl's son; and Mr. Winwood kissed hands before Mr. Whitelock, he being the eldest knight's son. The last to perform the ceremony was Edmund Waller the poet, who was least in rank. The king said graciously to him, "Though you are last, yet you are not the worst, nor the least in my favor." We shall find an explanation of this courtesy to Waller presently. But to the very noble Earl of Northumberland, who read the parliament's propositions with a sober and stout carriage, Charles was much less courteous, interrupting him frequently. The blood of the Percy took fire, and the earl said, smartly, "Your majesty will give me leave to proceed?" Charles replied, "Aye, aye!" and so the earl read the proposition all through. The heads were these—that Charles should disband his army and return to his parliament, leaving delinquents to trial and papists to be disarmed; pass a bill for abolishing bishops, &c., and such other bills as should be presented for reformation; consent to the removal of malignant counselors, the settling the militia as parliament desired, &c.; and, further, that he should pass a bill to vindicate the Lord Kimbolton and the five members; that he should enter into an alliance with his Protestant neighbors; grant a general pardon, excepting therefrom the Earl of Newcastle, the Lord Digby, and others; and restore parliament members to their offices, and recompense them for the losses they had sustained. Charles, on the other side, made his demands in the following terms:—"That his revenue, magazines, towns, ships, and forts be restored. That what hath been done contrary to law and the king's right may be recalled. That all illegal power claimed, or acted by order of parliament, be disclaimed. As the king will consent to the execution of all laws concerning popery or reformation, so he desires a bill for preserving the Book of Common Prayer against sectaries. That all persons excepted against in the treaty may be tried per pares, with a cessation of arms, and for a free trade." After the negotiations had been drawn through several weeks they ended in nothing. They had not, however, interrupted the progress of hostilities; and the warlike operations in the interval had, on the whole, been favorable to the parliamentarians. The Earl of Essex took Reading after a siege of ten days. Then Hampden, ever the proposer or advocate of bold measures, recommended the immediate investing of Oxford, hoping to finish the war at once by the capture of Charles and his court. Clarendon confesses that, if this measure had been adopted, it could scarcely have failed of success; for Oxford was not even tolerably fortified, nor was that over-crowded city supplied with provisions to stand a siege: but, again, the the Earl of Essex, who must ever be suspected of being averse to pushing the war to an extremity, objected, and consulted his professional officers, who agreed in representing the enterprise as too hazardous; and nearly six weeks were wasted in the neighborhood of Reading. The king, who had already deliberated respecting a retreat into the north, took fresh courage. The parliament at this time, or a little before, entertained the project of superseding Essex, and intrusting the conduct of the war to Sir William Waller, who had driven Goring out of Portsmouth, and taken Winchester, Chichester, and Hereford. His valor and his activity had acquired him such reputation, that Waller was popularly nicknamed William the Conqueror: but the change did not take place, and the favorite general continued to serve under Essex, declining rather than rising in reputation.

[1] Skippon was a character. He was accustomed to make very short, pithy, and homely speeches to the train-bands and cockney troops, the most zealous of which were, of course, all Puritans. On this occasion, Whitelock tells us, his speech was to this effect:—"Come, my boys, my brave boys, let us pray heartily, and fight heartily. I will run the same fortunes and hazards with you. Remember the cause is for God, and for the defense of yourselves, your wives, and children. Come, my honest, brave boys, pray heartily and fight heartily, and God will bless us." "Thus," continues Whitelock, "he went all along with his soldiers, talking to them, sometimes with one company, sometimes to another; and the soldiers seemed to be more taken with it than with a set, formal oration."

Before the beginning of the treaty at Oxford the queen had arrived in Burlington Bay, on the coast of Yorkshire, where the Earl of Newcastle waited upon her with his army to conduct her to York. She remained four months in Yorkshire, exerting herself to the utmost, and in all directions, to strengthen the royalist party. Again overtures were made to Sir John Hotham and to many of the officers serving under him in Hull; and the Earl of Newcastle was so considerably reinforced (partly by papists, who joined the queen with enthusiastic haste), that Lord Fairfax, the general for the parliament in the north, could scarcely make head against him. A fierce war of outposts ensued between these two commanders; and Sir Thomas Fairfax, then a young man and general of the horse to his father, began to acquire in this service that military skill and experience which subsequently rendered him one of the best officers in England. By the month of May Henrietta Maria was enabled to send arms and ammunition to her husband at Oxford, who had for some time been lying inactive for want of gunpowder. Charles then prepared to act; but, that he might commence a sanguinary campaign with peaceful professions, he sent a message to the parliament to speak again of accommodation. The Lords, or that minority of them which remained in London, received his message with respect: the Commons threw his messenger into prison, and then impeached the queen of high treason. Pym carried up the impeachment to the Lords, "where it stuck many months." The Commons and the city were at this moment much excited by the discovery of an extensive and formidable conspiracy, headed by Waller the poet, who had been for some time in communication with Lord Falkland, now the king's secretary, and had engaged to do the king's will. The poet, in conjunction with Tomkins, who was his brother-in-law, Challoner, Blinkhorne, and a few others, had undertaken to seize the persons of the leading members of the House of Commons, and to deliver up the city to Charles, who had sent in a commission of array very secretly by means of the Lady Aubigny, whose husband had fallen at Edgehill. A servant of Tomkins overheard the conversation of the conspirators, and revealed what he knew to Pym, who presently seized their chief, and brought him to trial, where he confessed every thing with amazing alacrity, and crawled in the dust in the hope of saving his life. The jury in Guildhall found a verdict of guilty against all the prisoners: Tomkins and Challoner were hanged, the one in Holborn, the other in Cornhill—both within sight of their own dwelling-houses; Blinkhorne, Hasell, White, and Waller were, by the mercy of parliament and the lord-general, Essex, reprieved, and eventually saved. Waller, the chief of them, was detained in the Tower; but about a year after, upon payment of a fine of £10,000, he was pardoned, "and released to go travel abroad."[1]

About the same time, in the busy month of May, the Commons unanimously took a solemn vow never to consent to lay down their arms so long as the papists in open war against the parliament should be protected from the justice thereof, made a new great seal, and passed the act for an assembly of divines to settle religion. The Lords, who now went with them reluctantly in most things, offered some resistance to these measures, but in the end they concurred with the Commons. Commissioners were appointed to execute the office of lord keeper, and the first day that the seal was brought into play, which was not until several months after, no fewer than five hundred writs were passed under it. An important plot had also been discovered at Bristol, where Robert Yeomans, late sheriff, William Yeomans, his brother, and some other royalists, had engaged to deliver that city to the king's forces under the command of Prince Rupert. Colonel Fiennes, the governor, son of the Lord Saye and Sele, discovered this plot in good time, apprehended the conspirators, and brought them to trial before a council of war, which condemned four of them to the gallows. The king interfered to save their lives, telling the governor of Bristol that Robert Yeomans had his majesty's commission for raising a regiment for his service; that William Yeomans and the two others had only expressed their loyalty to his majesty, and endeavored his service; and that if he presumed to execute any of them, he (the king) would do the same by four prisoners taken in the rebellion and now at York. Governor Fiennes replied, that if Robert Yeomans had made use of his commission in an open way, he would have been put into no worse condition than others; but that the laws of nature among all men, and the laws of arms among soldiers, made a difference between open enemies and secret spies and conspirators. "And we do further advertise you," continued Fiennes, "that if by any inhuman and unsoldierlike sentence, you shall proceed to the execution of the prisoners by you named, or any other of our friends in your custody that have been taken in a fair and open way of war, then Sir Walter Pye, Sir William Crofts, and Colonel Connesby, with divers others whom we have here in custody, must expect no favor or mercy."[1] The king ordered the mayor of Bristol to hinder the murder of his loyal subjects; but Fiennes forthwith hanged Robert Yeomans, the chief conspirator, and George Bourchier. Luckily the king did not retaliate as he had threatened. But before this correspondence took place, Charles had been obliged to acknowledge the laws of war, and to treat his prisoners, not as captured rebels, but as soldiers fighting with a sufficient commission. Among the prisoners he had taken at Brentford was that dare-devil, John Lilburne—our old acquaintance "Free-born John"—whom the parliament had liberated from the Fleet prison. Free-born John, then a captain, was obnoxious on many accounts; and he probably, as was his wont, incensed his captors by the violence of his language and his denunciations of all royalty, all power, and dominion, except such as was exercised by and for the people. Charles ordered him to be proceeded against as a traitor: but the parliament instantly declared that they would retaliate, and so no beginning was made

[1] Whitelock.—May.—Journals.—May thus comments on the conduct of the poet, who, as the reader will remember, had been one of the most eloquent champions on the popular side in the Lower House:—"It was much wondered at, and accordingly discoursed of by many at that time, what the reason should be why Master Waller, being the principal agent in that conspiracy (where Master Tomkins and Master Challoner, who were drawn in by him, as their own confessions even at their deaths expressed, were both executed), did escape with life. The only reason that I could ever hear given for it was, that Master Waller had been so free in his confessions at the first, without which the plot could not have been clearly detected, that Master Pym, and other of the examiners, had engaged their promise to do whatever they could to preserve his life. He seemed also much smitten in conscience, and desired the comfort of godly ministers, being extremely penitent for that foul offense; and afterward, in his speech to the House (when he came to be put out of it), much bewailed his offense, thanking God that so mischievous and bloody a conspiracy was discovered before it could take effect."

in a system which would have rendered the war atrocious.[1]

By means of the supplies which he had received from the queen, Charles was enabled to renew active operations; and Prince Rupert and the cavalry, during the month of June, swept the whole country between Oxford and Bath on one side, and on the other, where Essex's lines were too much extended, broke through and pillaged in Berkshire and in Buckinghamshire. At this time Colonel Hurry, or Urrie, one of the lord-general's soldiers of fortune, deserted to the king, and informed Prince Rupert that two parliament regiments, detached and open to attack, lay at Wycombe. The prince resolved upon a night-attack. On Saturday, the 17th of June, about four o'clock in the afternoon, his trumpets sounded through the streets of Oxford to boot and saddle; and in less than half an hour his cavalry crossed over Magdalen-bridge, and, being joined by some infantry, pushed on rapidly toward the parliament country. They were 2000 men, but they were allowed to pass within two or three miles of Thame, where Essex now lay with the main body of the parliament army, without interruption or challenge. They crossed the Cherwell at Chiselhampton-bridge, and, stealing through the woodlands about Stokenchurch, they got to the quiet little hamlet of Postcombe at about three o'clock in the morning. There, apparently to their surprise, they found a troop of horse, who mounted, and, after a slight skirmish, retired in good order, beating up the people, and giving the alarm to other pickets and outposts. Thereupon, instead of pushing forward to the two regiments at Wycombe, Rupert turned aside with his whole force of cavalry to Chinnor, where he slaughtered some fifty parliamentarians, and dragged away, half naked, at the horses' sides about sixscore prisoners. The sun now rose, and a party of the parliament's horse appeared on the side of the Beacon Hill. It was led on by the patriot Hampden, who had slept that night at Watlington, in the neighborhood, and who had vainly urged Essex the day before to strengthen his line by calling in the remote pickets from Wycombe, from Postcombe, and Chinnor. On the first alarm of Rupert's night-irruption, he dispatched a trooper to the lord-general at Thame, advising him

[1] The royalists at Oxford had also resolved to treat as traitors captains Clifton, Catesby, and Vivers, who had been made prisoners with Lilburne, and used, as the parliament said, most barbarously. Both Houses had then regularly voted that, if the said persons, or any of them, or any other, should be put to death, or otherwise hurt, or violently treated, the like punishment should be inflicted upon such prisoners as had been or should be taken by the forces raised by parliament.—Rushworth to detach a force of infantry and cavalry to Chiselhampton-bridge, the only point at which the royalists could recross the Cherwell. And, this done, Hampden, against the advice of his friends, who were entertaining the hope of seeing him speedily appointed by parliament commander-in-chief of the army, instead of Essex, and who thought he ought not to expose himself in an affair of outposts, instantly mounted his horse, and rode with a troop of Captain Sheffield's horse and some of Gunter's dragoons, to keep the royalists in play till the slow Essex should have time to come up or send his column to Chiselhampton-bridge. Hampden found Rupert on Chalgrove-field, and there, among the standing corn, which covered an uninclosed plain of several hundred acres, the prince hastily formed in order of battle. In the mean time, Major Gunter, having joined three troops of horse and one of dragoons that were spurring on from Easington and Thame, descended Golden Hill, got among the inclosures on the right of Rupert's line, and opened a fire from behind the hedgerow which formed, and still forms, the boundary on that side of Chalgrove-field. Colonel Neale and General Percy brought round the left wing to support the right, and after a fierce conflict Gunter was slain, and his party made to give way. Hampden, who expected every moment to see the head of Essex's column, rode up to rally and support the disordered horse of Gunter; and, putting himself at the head of a squadron, he charged Rupert's right. But, as he was spurring up to the royalists, he was struck in the shoulder with two carabine-balls, which broke the bone and entered his body. The reins fell from his disabled arm, and, with his head bent in agony over his horse's neck, he turned away from that fatal charge. His friends then fell into disorder, and, looking in vain for the tardy Essex, they commenced a retreat, leaving many officers and men dead on the field. Rupert pushed on for Chiselhampton-bridge. There was no Essex there, nor any troops of his sending. The royalists recrossed the Cherwell, and hurried back with their prisoners and booty to Oxford. Meanwhile Hampden was seen riding off the field before the action was quite over—"a thing," says Clarendon, "he never used to do, and from which it was concluded he was hurt." At first he moved in the direction of his father-in-law Simeon's house at Pyrton, where he had in his youth married the first wife of his love, and whither he would fain have gone to die; but Rupert's cavalry covered the plain in that direction, and so he turned his horse's head and rode toward Thame. There was a brook intervened—a gentle little brook, which he had often leaped in his field sports—but now, disabled and in anguish, it made him pause; but, summoning all his strength, he clapped spurs to his horse and cleared the brook. Fainting with pain, he reached Thame, and was conducted to the house of one Ezekiel Browne. The surgeons at first gave him hopes of life, but he felt himself that his hurts were mortal. The pain of the wounds was excruciating, yet he almost immediately occupied himself in writing letters to the parliament concerning public affairs, which seemed desperate in his eyes, unless the irresolute and lazy spirit which had directed the army should give place to more manly resolutions and more active operations. He again sent to head-quarters, earnestly to recommend the correction of those military errors to which he had fallen a sacrifice; to implore Essex to concentrate his army, so as to cover London and set at defiance the flying incursions of Rupert's horse. After nearly six days of suffering, he felt that the weakness and decay of the body were prevailing over the strength of his soul, and he prepared to die like a Christian. About seven hours before his death he received the sacrament, declaring (according to Baxter) that, though he could not away with the governance of the church by bishops, and did utterly abominate the scandalous lives of some clergymen, he thought the doctrines of the church of England in the greater part conformable to God's word. He was attended by his old friend Dr. Giles, the rector of Chinnor, and by Dr. Spurstow, an Independent minister, the chaplain of his Buckinghamshire greencoats, and his spirit passed away in fervid prayers for his country. He expired on the 24th of June, and was buried a few days after in the parish church of Hampden. His gallant greencoats—one of the best regiments that as yet bore arms for the parliament—bareheaded, with their arms reversed, their drums and ensigns muffled, followed him to the grave, singing the 90th Psalm, which in a lofty strain dwells on the immutability of the everlasting God, in whose sight a thousand years are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night, and on the weakness and brief existence of us mortal men, who flourish and fade like the grass, and spend our years as a tale that is told. And when those hardy soldiers had seen the dust heaped upon him who had been the friend of all of them from their youth upward, they returned chanting a more hopeful strain, calling upon the God of their strength to plead their cause, to send out his light and truth, and prevent their soul from being disquieted.[1] Never in the memory of those times had there been so general a consternation and sorrow at any one man's death as that with which the tidings were received in London, and by the friends of the parliament all over the land;—the consternation was as great to all of that party as if their whole army had been defeated or cut off.[2]

But other misfortunes came thick upon the parliament about the same time. The Earl of Newcastle had grown so strong in the north, that, on the 30th of June, he entirely defeated the parliamentary army under Lord Fairfax and his son, Sir Thomas, at Atherton Moor; while, in the mean time, he had opened a secret correspondence with

[2] Clarendon.—In the account of the battle or skirmish, and of the death of Hampden, we have chiefly followed Lord Nugent (Memorials of John Hampden, his Party and his Times), whose descriptions are the more valuable from his perfect acquaintance with the scene of the fight and all the localities in Buckinghamshire. His lordship, too, quotes valuable cotemporary documents. Mr. Foster (Lives of Eminent British Statesmen) has collected a variety of very interesting particulars concerning the last hours of Hampden and the impression made by his death the Hothams, who had conceived a great jealousy of the younger Fairfax, who had been spoken of as the successor of Sir John in the governorship of Hull. They agreed to shut out the Fairfaxes, and admit Newcastle, who was to garrison the town for the king. If this plot had succeeded, the parliament must have lost the whole northern country; for, from Berwick to Lincoln, the only place of strength they retained was Hull. But some members gained timely intelligence of the plot, seized the two Hothams, fettered and chained them like the worst of malefactors, and put the Lord Fairfax into the town. Both father and son had done the parliament rare service at the beginning of the war; but their present offense—which was fully proved by intercepted letters and by other documents—could not be forgiven: they were both put on ship-board, carried to London, and committed to the Tower on the 15th of July. A few months after, they were tried and convicted of high treason. On the 1st of January, 1644, the younger Hotham was brought to the scaffold on Tower Hill: this time it "fell edge;" and his father, Sir John, was executed at the same place the day after.

Oliver Cromwell, marching at the head of a thousand horse of his own raising, had before this time fallen upon Newark-on-Trent, where the Earl of Newcastle had introduced a formidable garrison, which kept Nottinghamshire and a great part of Lincolnshire in check. Cromwell failed in his assault; but he gained several advantages in the field, defeating detached bodies, and disarming and dispersing the levies that were repairing to the Earl of Newcastle's standard. At the same time he gave new life to the dispirited levies of the parliament, and with their assistance he gained what may be called a brilliant victory near Grantham. Shortly after the battle at Atherton Moor, Lord Willoughby and the parliamentarians carried the important town of Gainsborough by assault, taking its numerous garrison prisoners. Newcastle presently advanced southward to the scene of action, and, but for the timely arrival of Cromwell, Lord Willoughby had been cut to pieces. Together the two parliamentarian generals defeated the first division of Newcastle's army; but this nobleman, coming up in full force soon after, changed the fortune of the war, and Cromwell was obliged to retreat in his turn, leaving Newcastle to take possession, not only of Gainsborough, but also of Lincoln. Nor was the parliament much more successful in the west, where Sir William Waller was defeated and his whole army dispersed, near Devizes, by the royalist general, Wilmot. And shortly after this serious loss, Prince Rupert, having hovered about Bristol till he found, by his correspondents—whereof he had many in the city—the points at which it was worst provided for resistance, fell upon it with all his fury. Nathaniel Fiennes, the parliamentary governor, was a better debater in the House than military commander, and he surrendered Bristol after a siege of only three days. For this he was afterward sentenced by a council of war to lose his life; but he was pardoned by the Earl of Essex, and gave up his military service, which he ought never to have undertaken. Exeter, whither the queen had retired to be delivered of a daughter, was strongly fortified, and the wild and hardy men of Cornwall were furiously loyal. The only strong place in the west which held out for the parliament was the city of Gloucester, wherein lay for some weeks the whole fortune of the war. In her way from the north, the queen, bringing very considerable reinforcements, among whom were many French and Walloons, had passed through Oxford, and spent some time there with her husband. At this moment it was apprehended that Charles would make another attempt upon the capital, and the Londoners set themselves to work to fortify the city. "The example of gentlemen of the best quality, knights and ladies, going out with drums beating, and spades and mattocks in their hands to assist in the work, put life into the drooping people;"[1] and in an incredibly short space of time intrenchments, twelve miles in circuit, were thrown up round London. Essex, at this crisis, addressed a letter to the Lords, recommending an immediate accommodation with the king; and the Lords forthwith voted a petition to his majesty, which was, however, indignantly rejected by the Commons, and reprobated by the citizens of London and by their preachers in the pulpit. Four lords had been appointed to recruit the parliamentary army; three of them, Pembroke, Bolingbroke, and Lord Howard of Escrick, now declined their commissions; but the fourth peer, the Lord Kimbolton (become Earl of Manchester by the death of his father[2]), accepted and executed his.[3] In other respects the section of the lords that yet remained with the parliament in London or in its armies began to betray a very alarming vacillation; and Bedford, general of the horse, Northumberland, Holland, and Clare, the father of Denzil Hollis, were suspected at least of trimming. Essex had already given manifold grounds of complaint, but his name and influence were still considered important; and when the Commons sent him large reinforcements, and a committee of the House waited upon him, even the suspicious St. John and the sagacious Pym were satisfied as to his devotion to the cause. The spirit shown by the people of London was a very discouraging symptom, and Charles, instead of advancing into the south, struck away to the west, to lay siege to Gloucester. Essex soon followed him to relieve that important place; and, by an admirably-conducted march, during the greater part of which he had Prince Rupert and Lord Wilmot, each in command of a formidable force, on his van or on his right flank, he got from Hounslow to Gloucester, just in time to save that city, which had made an heroic defense under Colonel Massey. The royalists raised their siege on the 3d of September, and the cause of the parliament was saved.

Leaving a good garrison and all necessary supplies in Gloucester, Essex turned back to recover his position in front of London. This retrograde march was as well conducted as the advance had been; but, when he got near Newbury, he found the king strongly posted there, and drawn up to cut off his retreat.[1] The river that ran through the town defended the royalists, so that the parliamentarians could not easily come at them, and on the northwest, within cannon-shot, lay Donnington Castle—famous for having been the seat, in his old age, of Geoffrey Chaucer—in which Charles had placed a

[1] Prince Rupert, who had marched day and night over the hills to get between London and the enemy, attacked Essex with 5000 horse as he was crossing Awborne Chase the day before the battle of Newbury. According to Clarendon, he routed the rear of the parliamentarians, and did good execution; but the thing appears to have been a mere skirmish, in which the royalists got as good as they gave. A French marquis, a very gallant gentlemen, who had come over with the queen from Holland, and was serving as a volunteer in the regiment of the Lord Jermyn, her majesty's favorite or lover (he was afterward her husband by a left-hand marriage), was killed. Many officers were hurt, among whom were the Lord Jermyn himself, who owed his life to the excellent temper of his armor; and the volatile Lord Digby, who got a strange hurt in the face.—Clarendon.

garrison and artillery. The only feasible approach to the town was from the northeast; but there, too, the royalists had made formidable preparations, throwing up a breastwork, and furnishing some houses with musketeers. "The king," says Clarendon, "seemed to be possessed of all advantages: . . . . so that it was conceived that it was in the king's power whether he would fight or no, and therefore that he might compel them to notable disadvantages, who must make their way through or starve; and this was so fully understood, that it was resolved over-night not to engage in battle but upon such grounds as should give an assurance of victory. But, contrary to this resolution, when the Earl of Essex had, with excellent conduct, drawn out his army in battalia, upon a hill called Bigg's Hill, within less than a mile of the town, and ordered his men in all places to the best advantage, by the precipitate courage of some young officers who had good commands, and who unhappily always undervalued the courage of the enemy, strong parties became successively so far engaged that the king was compelled to put the whole to the hazard of a battle, and to give the enemy at least an equal game to play." The king's horse, with a "kind of contempt" of the enemy, charged with wonderful boldness; but, though successful at some points, they were in general thrown off from the sharp points of Essex's pikes, and the parliamentarian foot behaved admirably, giving their scattered horse time to rally. "For," says Clarendon, "though the king's horse made the enemy's horse often give ground, yet their foot were so immovable that little was gotten by the other." Night at last came on, and separated the combatants. During the darkness the royalists removed their cannon and other carriages to Donnington Castle, and, having lodged them there, marched off toward Oxford. "At this time," says Clarendon, "Sir William Waller was at Windsor, with about two thousand horse and as many foot, as unconcerned for what might befall the Earl of Essex as the earl had formerly been on his behalf at Roundway Hill; otherwise, if he had advanced upon the king to Newbury (which was not above twenty miles), when the earl was on the other side, the king had been in great danger of an utter defeat; and the apprehension of this was the reason, or was afterward pretended to be, for the hasty engagement in battle." In the morning Essex entered Newbury, whence he proceeded without opposition to Reading, where he was met by a congratulating deputation. In the battle of Newbury, which was fought on the 20th of September, Essex's men "were full of mettle;" and the London recruits, the apprentices, the artisans, and the shopkeepers of London, particularly distinguished themselves.[1] The parliamentarians lost some five hundred men and very few officers: the king lost treble the number of men and many officers of rank; but the greatest loss of all was estimated to be the accomplished Lord Falkland, then Charles's secretary of state, who was struck with a musket-ball, and died on the field, only three months after the death of his opponent, but once bosom friend, Hampden.

[1] May mentions that the two train-bands of London were often charged by both horse and foot, but stood to it with undaunted resolution. Clarendon pays the same compliment, stating that all Essex's foot behaved themselves admirably. He adds—"The London trained-bands and auxiliary regiments (of whose inexperience of danger, or any kind of service beyond the easy practice of their postures in the Artillery Garden, men had till then too cheap an estimation) behaved themselves to wonder, and were, in truth, the preservation of that army that day; for they stood as a bulwark and rampire to defend the rest, and, when their wings of horse were scattered and dispersed, kept their ground so steadily, that, though Prince Rupert himself led up the choice horse to charge them, and endured their storm of small shot, he could make no impression upon their stand of pikes, but was forced to wheel about—of so sovereign benefit and use is that readiness and dexterity in the use of their arms which hath been so much neglected."—Hist.

According to Clarendon, from the first entrance into this unnatural war, Falkland's natural cheerfulness and vivacity grew clouded, and a kind of sadness and dejection of spirit stole upon him which he had never been used to. After the retreat from Brentford and the declaration of the two Houses not to admit of any treaty of peace with the king, his melancholy increased, growing into a perfect habit of uncheerfulness—"and he who had been so exactly easy and affable to all men that his face and countenance was always present, and vacant to his company, and held any cloudiness and less pleasantness of the visage a kind of rudeness or incivility, became on a sudden less communicable, and thence very sad, pale, and exceedingly affected with the spleen. In his clothes and habit, which he had minded before always with more neatness, and industry, and expense than is usual to so great a soul, he was not now only incurious but too negligent; and in his reception of suitors, and the necessary or casual addresses to his place, so quick, and sharp, and severe, that there wanted not some men (strangers to his nature and disposition) who believed him proud and imperious, from which no mortal man was ever more free. . . When there was any overture or hope of peace, he would be more erect and vigorous, and exceedingly solicitous to press any thing which he thought might promote it, and, sitting among his friends, often, after a deep silence and frequent sighs, would, with a shrill and sad accent, ingeminate the word 'Peace! peace!' and would passionately profess, 'That the very agony of the war, and the view of the calamities and desolation the kingdom did and must endure, took his sleep from him, and would shortly break his heart.'"[1] At Newbury, Charles lost two other lords, the Earl of Sunderland, who, having no command in the army, attended upon the king's person "under the obligation of honor," and putting himself that day in the king's guard as a volunteer, was taken off by a cannon-ball; and the Earl of Caernarvon, another young and accomplished nobleman, who, after making a brilliant charge and routing some of the parliamentarian horse, was run through the body with a sword by a trooper as he was returning carelessly back to his position.[2]

Some mistakes committed by Charles in his court and cabinet were as fatal to his interests as the battle of Newbury—perhaps more so. The great Earl of Northumberland withdrew (in disgust with the parliament, or in the hope of seeing on which side victory would lean) to his castle of Petworth in Sussex; but the other three suspected noblemen, the earls of Clare, Bedford, and Holland, went to Oxford to join the king. Instead of receiving them with kindness and conciliation—instead of treating them as policy should have dictated, like men who had discovered their mistake and turned penitently from the error of their ways—Charles regarded them with suspicion and distrust, treated them like condemned traitors, and permitted his courtiers to heap insults upon them. The three earls presently fled back again to parliament, which consented to receive them and overlook their backsliding. The people said that the three earls had done good service by showing that, after trying both sides, they preferred that of the patriots; but this escapade tended, with a thousand other things and circumstances, greatly to sink the House of Lords in public estimation.

In the preceding year, when London seemed to be threatened by the king, the parliament had made certain applications for aid to the Scots; but it was not till the middle of the present year (1643) that those negotiations were pressed with any earnestness. In the mean time Charles, by means of the Duke of Hamilton,[1] had required, as the only thing he would ask of them, that his native subjects, the Scots, would not rebel. But Hamilton had failed, and Montrose had again accused him and his brother, the Earl of Lanark, of treason. Charles hereupon had laid his hands upon Hamilton, but Lanark had the good fortune to escape. After a time the duke was sent a close prisoner to the castle of Mount St. Michael in Cornwall; his brother, Lanark, joined the English parliament, and assisted them in their difficult negotiations with the old Covenanters. Those zealots, who were then the masters of Scotland and of its resources, insisted, as a preliminary, that the English parliament should take their covenant, and bind themselves to the preservation of the king's person, and to the reducing the doctrine and discipline of both churches to the "pattern of the best reformed," which latter clause meant that the English were to adopt the Presbyterian Kirk of Scotland with all its bigotry and intolerance. But by this time the Independents, who hated Presbyterianism almost as much as Arminianism and Prelacy, were becoming powerful as a party; and Harry Vane, the younger, one of the chiefs of that sect, and one of the most adroit of men, was the negotiator at Edinburgh, charged with the settlement of the treaty.[2] Vane, [1] Clarendon, Hist. There are some little traits in Whitelock's account of Lord Falkland's death quite as touching as any thing in the full, eloquent outpouring of Clarendon.

"The Lord Falkland, secretary of state, in the morning of the fight, called for a clean shirt, and, being asked the reason of it, answered, that, if he were slain in the battle, they should not find his body in foul linen. Being dissuaded by his friends to go into the fight, as having no call to it, and being no military officer, he said he was weary of the times, and foresaw much misery to his own country, and did believe he should be out of it ere night, and could not be persuaded to the contrary, but would enter into the battle, and was there slain. His death was much lamented by all that knew him or heard of him, being a gentleman of great parts, ingenuity, and honor, courteous and just to all, and a passionate promoter of all endeavors of peace betwixt the king and parliament."—Memorials.

[2] Clarendon.—Ludlow.—Warwick.—May.—Whitelock. Whitelock mentions the following irritating fact:—"Among the colors taken at Newbury, one cornet was the figure of the Parliament House, with two traitors' heads standing on the top of it, and by them this word ut extra sic infra; but the parliament nevertheless exposed them to public view and censure."

[1] The Marquis of Hamilton had been made a duke by Charles, at Oxford, in April of this year.

[2] Vane was accompanied by three other commissioners, Armyn, Hatcher, and Darley, and by two ministers of the Gospel, Marshall a Presbyterian, and Nye an Independent. We learn from Baillie's Letters that the Scots were ill pleased at the parliament sending Nye, and beside getting the word "League" inserted in the title, with the view of giving the engagement a civil as well as a religious character, contrived somewhat to liberalize its original form by the addition to the first clause about the king's person, of the words, "in preservation of the laws of the land and liberty of the subject;" and to the second clause about doctrine and discipline, of the words, "according to the word of God;" which, being explanatory expressions that could hardly be refused, were, in the end, accepted by the Scots. Charles sent down his commands to the Scots not to take this covenant: they humbly advised him to take it himself. The English parliament sent down £100,000, and then the Scots prepared an army to march into England and recover the whole of the north country for the parliament. The covenant was taken in London on the 25th of September, the day on which the Earl of Essex returned to London and received a vote of thanks from parliament. "Both Houses," says Whitelock, "with the assembly of divines and Scots commissioners, met in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, where Mr. White, one of the assembly, prayed an hour to prepare them for taking the covenant; then Mr. Nye, in the pulpit, made some observations touching the covenant, showing the warrant of it from Scripture, the examples of it since the creation, and the benefit to the church. Mr. Henderson, one of the Scots commissioners, concluded in a declaration of what the Scots had done, and the good they had received by such covenants; and then he showed the prevalency of ill counsels about the king, and the resolutions of the states of Scotland to assist the parliament of England. Then Mr. Nye, in the pulpit, read the covenant, and all present held up their hands in testimony of their assent to it; and afterward, in the several houses, subscribed their names in a parchment roll, where the covenant was written. The divines of the assembly and the Scots commissioners likewise subscribed the covenant, and then Dr. Gouge, in the pulpit, prayed for a blessing upon it. The House ordered the covenant to be taken the next Lord's Day by all persons in their respective parishes, and the ministers to exhort them to it." From this date the original National Covenant of the Scots comes to be known as the Solemn League and Covenant of the two kingdoms.

Long before the parliament had settled these arrangements for calling in the Scots, the king had been laboring to bring over the Irish, and to obtain for his own service the troops which the Houses had sent to Ireland and maintained for the suppression of the rebellion there. As we have mentioned incidentally, the parliament, notwithstanding the troubles at home, had succeeded in checking that mighty insurrection, which at that moment threatened the entire expulsion of the English. Badly armed, and scarcely organized at all, the native Irish had nowhere been able to stand in a regular battle against the English army. They had been beaten from post to post; and the victors, animated by religious intolerance, and by the memory of the barbarities practiced by the papists at the commencement of the war, seldom or ever gave quarter, but butchered the vanquished. The conquerors were to be paid by the forfeited and escheated land; and two millions and a half of acres, to be taken out of the four provinces, was set down by the English parliament as a proper reward for the Protestant soldiers, and those private adventurers who chiefly defrayed the expenses of the war. Many Englishmen of rank, tempted by the rich bait, engaged in the undertaking; and General Monro led over a large body of Scots, consisting of gentlemen adventurers, volunteers, and others, who were all infuriated by the massacre of their countrymen in Ulster. By a series of manœuvers Charles had prevented the Earl of Leicester, appointed lord lieutenant with the approval of the English parliament, from going over to Ireland, and had placed the governing power, on the part of the Protestant interest there, in the hands of Ormond, a determined royalist, whom he had recently gratified with the title of marquis, and with other honors and advantages. Ormond, who hoped, when he had restored tranquillity in Ireland, to be able to assist his master in England with men and arms, entered into negotiations with the Catholics, who by this time had been made humble and reasonable in their demands by repeated defeats. The English Commons perfectly well understood this plan; and, moved by the instinct of self-preservation, and by their intolerance of all papistry, they sent over emissaries to talk with the Protestants and Puritans in Ormond's army, and to confirm their aversion to all conciliation with the insurgents. But without their interference, and even without the fanaticism of the Protestants serving in Ireland, the anxiety of the latter for extensive confiscations and seizures of territory was perhaps quite enough to make them averse to any pacific arrangement. If the papists were allowed to treat they would also be allowed to retain some of their lands, and the English and Scottish Protestants wanted among them nearly every estate in Ireland. In the autumn of 1642 the parliament sent over two of its members to examine into the real state of affairs, and to coöperate with the lords justices, and with other Puritans and officers that inclined rather to the English House of Commons than to the king. But, after they had resided some four months in Ireland, the Marquis of Ormond sent the two commissioners back to England, and shortly after he dismissed Parsons, one of the lords justices, substituting a royalist in his place; and threw Sir John Temple, master of the rolls, and two other officers of state, into prison. From the moment of his retiring to York, Charles had maintained an active correspondence with the confederated Irish Catholics, by means of the lords Dillon, Taaffe and Castlehaven, and one Cole, a doctor of the Sorbonne. Toward the end of the year 1642 the confederated Catholics of Kilkenny transmitted a petition to the king, professing great loyalty, and imploring him to appoint certain persons to hear what they had to propose and what to offer for his service. Ormond recommended this petition to Charles; and in January, 1643, a commission was issued to Ormond, conformably to its prayer; and in the month of March commissioners, regularly appointed by Ormond or the king, met the deputies of the Catholics at Trim, and entered upon negotiations. At this juncture, when envoys were continually passing to and from the king and the Irish, the queen arrived at York, and there, in her court, two extraordinary men, the Scottish Earl of Montrose and the Irish Earl of Antrim, found themselves together, and admitted to those conferences wherein Henrietta Maria was wont to devise every extreme measure. Antrim, an unprincipled adventurer, had alternately served the king and the insurgents. He was caught with the red hand in the province of Ulster by the Scottish general Monro, and sent a prisoner to Dublin; but supple, adroit, and a great master of the arts of persuasion and cajolery, he had made his escape and got over to York. Now, under the auspices of the queen, he concerted daring measures with Montrose; and it was agreed between them that Montrose should excite the royalists to take up arms in different parts of Scotland, while Antrim should go over and raise an army of Irish Catholics to make a descent upon the Scottish coast. But, in addition to this last service, Antrim, who must have had a wonderful share of confidence, undertook to bribe and debauch General Monro and his Presbyterian army, which by this time amounted to nearly 10,000 men, and to induce them to make a simultaneous descent upon the English coast, and then join the king against the parliament. Unsuccessful attempts have been made to throw the odium of these precious arrangements entirely upon the queen; but it appears indisputable that Charles knew of and approved the scheme, the worst feature of which was the proposed bringing over the Irish hordes into Scotland, and that, too, when he was flattering the Scottish nation with promises and protestations, and when that nation as yet remained quiet, throwing its sword neither into the scale of the one party nor of the other. But this scheme fell to the ground. Antrim was again seized and thrown into prison by General Monro; and Montrose, who afterward met with different success, found the Scottish royalists timid and lukewarm. In the mean time the Marquis of Ormond had continued his negotiations with the confederated Catholics at Kilkenny, and, after many impediments and delays, a truce for a year was concluded on the 15th of September, 1643.[1] In the month of November following, Ormond shipped off five regiments to join the king. These men had been raised or commissioned by the English parliament, against which they now came to fight; but, during a bloody and demoralizing service, they had contracted the habits and feelings of mere soldiers of fortune, and Ormond had introduced into their ranks a very considerable number of native Irish. The greater part of them, landing at Chester, enrolled themselves under Lord Byron, the royalist governor of that city, whom they enabled to resume the offensive, and to gain several advantages in the field. But, about six weeks after their arrival, Sir Thomas Fairfax fell upon them at Nantwich, and completely defeated them. Two hundred were killed, and fifteen hundred threw down their arms and were taken prisoners.[1] Among the officers taken was Monk, who had been serving in Ireland, and who was then, if any thing, a royalist in politics. The effect of the manœuvers in Ireland was in all respects detrimental to the royal cause. As soon as the news of the treaty with the papists at Kilkenny reached the Earl of Newcastle's army in the north, many of the men threw down their arms, and refused to fight any longer for the king. Sir Edward Deering, one of the members who had deserted to Oxford, returned to London and threw himself upon the mercy of parliament, protesting that, seeing so many papists and Irish rebels in the king's army, and a popish party governing his counsels, he could no longer in conscience stay with him.[2]

At the close of the present year, 1643, the parliament sustained a great loss in the death of Pym, who had been one of the most popular men of his day, and one of the most distinguished for ability, eloquence, and untiring activity. He died literally worn out by labor, and as poor as he was when he commenced his career. The House voted a sum of money to pay his debts and bury him honorably in Westminster Abbey.

We may, without injury to the narrative, entirely overlook many of the minor operations in the field; but there were some civil matters transacted during this eventful year which demand particular attention.

The national synod, for the purpose of settling the government and form of worship of the church of England, met at Westminster in the month of July.[3] The assembly consisted of one hundred and twenty-one clergymen; and, in imitation of the Scottish system, ten members of the House of Lords and twenty members of the House of Commons were joined with them as lay assessors. Their first meeting was in King Henry VII.'s Chapel, where a long sermon was preached by Dr. Twiss, their prolocutor, both Houses of parliament being present. On the 19th of July the Assembly of Divines, styling themselves divers ministers of Christ, delivered a petition to both Houses of parliament. They said that it was evident that God's heavy wrath was lying on the nation for its sins, and that they considered it their duty, as watch-

[1] There were also taken in this battle one hundred and twenty women, many of them had long knives, with which they are said to have done much mischief. [2] Whitelock.

[3] The ordinance of parliament summoning this assembly was entitled—"An ordinance of the Lords and Commons in parliament, for the calling of an assembly of learned and godly divines and others, to be consulted with by the parliament for the settling of the government and liturgy of the church of England, and for vindicating and clearing of the doctrine of the said church from false aspersions and interpretations." Rushworth gives the whole document, together with the names of the preachers, who were all appointed by parliament. Before the meeting of this assembly the parliament had ordered the Book of Sports to be burned by the common hangman, had shut up all playhouses and other places of amusement, and had otherwise deprived the people of a deal of enjoyment.

men for the good of the church and kingdom, to present certain earnest requests. The first of these was for a public and extraordinary fast, that every man might bitterly bewail his own sins, and cry mightily unto God: the second was, that the parliament would vouchsafe instantly to take into their more serious consideration how they might set up Christ more gloriously. They prayed for the removing of the brutish ignorance and palpable darkness possessing the greatest part of the people in all places of the kingdom, by a speedy and strict charge to all ministers constantly to catechise all the youth and ignorant people within their parishes. But, immediately after this, they intimated that they alone had the light proper for the dispelling of this darkness—that they alone possessed the right of telling the people what was black and what white. The following clause of their petition was directed, not so much against the preachers of Laud's school, who were pretty well silenced in most parts of the country, as against the variety of sects classed under the general head of Independents, each and all of which pretended at least to hold, with more or less of limitation, the doctrine of liberty of conscience, and of the right of every man to expound the Scriptures according to the light of his own reason or imagination: "That the bold venting of corrupt doctrines directly contrary to the sacred law of God and religious humiliation for sin, which open a wide door to all libertinism and disobedience to God and man, may be speedily suppressed everywhere, and that in such manner as may give hope that the church may be no more infected with them." The church, of course, was now the Presbyterian, and these men unchurched all the rest of the Protestant world. Their doctrine, their discipline were perfect, their decisions infallible! Every thing else was heretical and damnable! After all, the bigotry of Laud was a small matter compared to theirs; for he enlarged the bounds of salvation, while they extended in all directions the limits of eternal damnation. Yet even in this assembly the Presbyterians were not without their opponents. Some eight or ten of the members were Independents or other sectaries; about twenty were Episcopalians; and Selden and Whitelock, who were present among the twenty members of the House of Commons, who had all the same liberty with the divines to debate and give their votes, frequently resisted their gloomy doctrine and their grasping at a spiritual despotism. "Mr. Selden," says Whitelock, "spake admirably, and confuted divers of them in their own learning. And sometimes, when they had cited a text of Scripture, to prove their assertion, he would tell them—Perhaps, in your little pocket Bibles, with gilt leaves (which they would often pull out and read), the translation may be thus, but the Greek or the Hebrew signifies thus and thus; and so would totally silence them."[1] It was lucky that the parliament did not allow this synod to do more than counsel and advise—that their power was not legislative—that their decrees required the confirmation of the two Houses. "The Presbyterians," as Baxter observes, "drew too near to the way of prelacy by grasping at a kind of secular power, not using it themselves, but binding the magistrate to confiscate or imprison men merely because they were excommunicated." "I disliked, also," he continues, "some of the Presbyterians, that they were not tender enough to dissenting brethren, but too much against liberty of conscience, as others were too much for it, and thought to do by votes and numbers what should have been done by love and reason."[1] The Independents, on the other hand, few as they were, pleaded for such a toleration as would include at least all those who held what were regarded as the doctrines of orthodox Protestantism. Even this amount of liberality sounded like horrid blasphemy in the ears of the Presbyterian majority. "Toleration," cried one of their number, "will make the kingdom a chaos, a Babel, another Amsterdam, a Sodom, an Egypt, a Babylon: toleration is the grand work of the devil, his master-piece and chief engine to uphold his tottering kingdom: it is the most compendious, ready, sure way to destroy all religion, lay all waste, and bring in all evil. As original sin is the fundamental sin, having the seed and spawn of all sin in it, so toleration hath all errors in it, and all evils." The whole body of them some time later joined in a protest against what they called the great Diana of the Independents—toleration. "We detest and abhor," said these intolerant preachers, "this much-endeavored toleration. Our bowels are stirred within us, and we could even drown ourselves in tears when we call to mind how long and sharp a travail this kingdom hath been in for many years together to bring forth that blessed fruit of a pure and perfect reformation; and now, at last, and after all our pangs, and dolors, and expectations, this real and thorough reformation is in danger of being strangled in the birth of a lawless toleration, that strives to be brought forth before it." Even when defeated in their first attempt, the Independents insisted that, whatever the established or dominant religion might be, there should be a provision for the toleration of those who conscientiously dissented from it. Presbyterians might hold the livings and revenues which had been held by the Arminians; but the sectarians, they contended, ought to be allowed to support ministers of their own. But this, of a certainty, would not have been granted but for the rapid rise of Cromwell and the battle of Naseby.

[1] The Scottish ministers and political agents were exceedingly angry with Selden's oriental learning. Baillie says, "This man Selden is the head of the Erastians; his glory is most in Jewish learning; he avows everywhere that the Jewish church and state were all one; and so in England it must be, the parliament being the church. If l'Empereur would beat down this man's arrogance, as very well he can, to show, out of the Rabbins, that the Jewish state was diverse from the church, and that they held the censure of excommunication among them, and a double sanhedrim, one civil and another ecclesiastical—if he would confound him with Hebrew testimonies—it would lay Selden's vanity, who is very insolent for his oriental literature."—Letters.

ment at Oxford. At first he had fancied that a dissolution of the parliament sitting at Westminster would be a better thing. "The king," says Clarendon, "called the Chancellor of the Exchequer (that is to say, Clarendon himself) one day to him, and told him that he thought there was too much honor done to those rebels at Westminster, by his mentioning them as part of the parliament: which as long as they should be thought to be, they would have more authority, by their continuing their sitting in the place whither they were first called, than all the other members, though so much more numerous, would have, when they should be convened anywhere else; . . . . . and therefore he knew no reason why he should not positively declare them to be dissolved, and so forbid them to sit or meet any more there." Clarendon, according to his account, told his majesty that he was better prepared for that weighty argument than he, his minister, was; adding, however, "that it was of a very nice and delicate nature, at which not only the people in general, but those of his own party, and even of his council, would take more umbrage than upon any one particular that had happened since the beginning of the war. That he could not imagine that his forbidding them to meet any more at Westminster would make one man the less to meet there; but he might forbid them upon such grounds and reasons as might bring more to them; and that they who had severed themselves from them, upon the guilt of their actions, might return and be reconciled to them upon their unity of opinion. That it had been the first powerful reproach they had corrupted the people with toward his majesty, that he intended to dissolve this parliament, notwithstanding the act for continuance thereof; and if he had power to do that, he might likewise, by the same power, repeal all the other acts made this parliament, whereof some were very precious to the people: and as his majesty had always disclaimed any such thought, so such a proclamation as he now mentioned would confirm all the fears and jealousies which had been infused into them, and would trouble many of his own true subjects." How Clarendon could arrive at the conclusion that the summoning a minority as a new parliament, while the majority forming the old was sitting, was more legal than a dissolution, we can not conjecture; but he takes credit to himself for recommending that measure. Charles so hated parliaments that he would not have summoned even this Oxford mockery of one had he not been fully assured that they would be very submissive, and altogether averse to forcing him into a treaty of peace with the Commons at Westminster.

A.D. 1644. The anti-parliament—"the mongrel parliament," as Charles himself contemptuously and ungratefully called it—met at Oxford on the 22d of January, 1664. It consisted of the members who had deserted the parliament at Westminster, or had been disabled by it. Forty-three peers and one hundred and eighteen commoners were all that gathered round the king. According to Whitelock, the peers at Westminster were more numerous, while the commoners more than doubled those at Oxford. In the proclamation by which the Oxford parliament had been called, Charles had said that it was upon occasion of the invasion of England by the Scots, and on account of the treason and disloyalty of a few members remaining at Westminster, who had grossly imposed upon his people, and expelled by the faction of their malignant party all such as were loyal and wished to do their duty toward him.[1] He opened the session with a long speech, telling his Lords and Commons that he had called them together to be witnesses of his actions and privy to his intentions; that he doubted not that their concurrence with him would set all things right, and place him above the reach and malice of those who had hitherto had too great an influence over the people. "My hope was," said he, "that, either by success on my part or repentance on theirs, God would have put an end to this great storm; but guilt and despair have made these men more wicked than ever I imagined they intended to be; for, instead of removing and reconciling these bloody distractions, and restoring peace to this languishing country, they have invited a foreign power to invade this kingdom." Four days after—on January the 26th—the Oxford parliament resolved nemine contradicente, that all such subjects of Scotland as had consented to the present expedition into England had thereby denounced war against the kingdom of England, and forfeited all the advantages of the late act of pacification; that all such of his majesty's subjects of England as did not resist the Scots should be treated as traitors and enemies to the state, &c. On the morrow the Lords and Commons at Oxford drew up a declaration, that they were there to prevent the further effusion of Christian blood; that they and his majesty desired peace above all things; and this was accompanied by an overture for peace addressed to the Earl of Essex, signed by the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, and forty-three dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons of the House of Peers, and one hundred and eighteen members of the House of Commons, there present. The profession thus made was a mere feint. They described the parliament at Westminster as those by whom Essex was trusted. Essex told them that they must acknowledge the two Houses at Westminster as the true parliament of England, and that he could not deliver their letter. Charles then directed a letter "To the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Westminster." This address was unexceptionable; but not so were the contents, wherein the king, "by the advice of the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Oxford," requested them to appoint commissioners to settle their differences, and the manner "how all the members of both Houses may securely meet in a full and free convention of parliament, there to treat, consult, and agree upon such things as may conduce to the maintenance and defense of the true reformed Protestant religion, with due consideration to all just and reasonable ease of tender consciences,[1] to the settling and maintaining of the king's just rights and privileges, the rights and privileges of parliament," &c.[2] The two Houses looked upon the king's letter as an insult. "We conceive," said they, "that it was intended for us, and we have resolved, with the concurrent advice and consent of the commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland, to represent to your majesty, in all humility and plainness, that as we have used all means for a just and safe peace, so will we never be wanting to do our utmost for the procuring thereof." They then expressed their sorrow at the persons assembled at Oxford—the deserters from the parliament—being put on an equality with it; and they ended their letter by reminding the king of the happy union existing between England and Scotland, and of their late solemn league and covenant. A few days after, the two Westminster Houses addressed a large declaration to the kingdom, in which they denounced this Oxford proposal of a treaty as "a popish and jesuitical counsel." In this they published at length another intercepted letter of the Lord Digby, written from Oxford on the 27th of December, and which they considered as sufficient proof of the evil designs of that popish party, as well as of the existence for some time of this plan to undo the existence of the parliament. Digby's letter, indeed, explained that it was a sine quâ non with Charles to get the parliament disowned both abroad and at home. The Lords and Commons at Oxford issued a counter-declaration—the strongest argument in which was, that they had been threatened and coerced when at Westminster by the London populace. They also voted levies of men and money for the king, but these could only be raised in those parts of the kingdom where the royalists were indisputably the strongest; and it appears that Charles got some more money by the issuing of privy seals and contracting loans; and about the middle of April he dismissed his "mongrel parliament"—for so, as before noticed, he himself called it.

Meanwhile the fortune of war was setting strongly against the royalists. That tried soldier of fortune, old Leslie, who now rejoiced in the title of Earl of Leven, once more led a Scottish army across the borders, and advanced without opposition, or without delay, though the winter was dreadful, the roads almost impassable, to the banks of the Tyne. Newcastle, however, was this time well fortified, and, after an ineffectual summons, old Leslie crossed the river and marched upon Sunderland. There he found himself opposed by Newcastle, who had taken up an advantageous position. The Scot took up as good ground, resolving to remain on the defensive till the English parliamentarians of the north should form a junction with him. But the Fairfaxes were engaged elsewhere, and for some time Leslie was obliged to lie inactive between Sunderland and Durham, having, however, secured his communications by sea with Scotland, and presented too formidable a front for the marquis to attack. But the defeat of Lord Byron, with his Irish and Anglo-Irish, forced Newcastle to move off toward York, which was then threatened by Lord Fairfax. Leslie followed, sorely harassed Newcastle's rear, and joined Lord Fairfax under the walls of York.

Charles was still lying at Oxford with about ten thousand men. A combined attack which was made upon that place by Essex and Waller would have fully succeeded, but for the disagreement of those two generals, which allowed the king to escape by night between the two armies, and to get to Worcester by forced marches. Essex then turned to the west, leaving Waller to pursue the king. At Copredy-bridge, near Banbury, Charles, who had led Waller a strange dance, who had got some reinforcements, and who had arrested a number of country magistrates for having expressed too much kindness to the parliament, turned upon his pursuer, and gained some advantage over him. The affair was a trifle; but Charles was enabled to move toward the west, and join his nephew, Prince Maurice. Some advised him to try London once more.

Fourteen thousand men had been placed by parliament under the command of the Earl of Manchester and his lieutenant-general, Oliver Cromwell, who was rising rapidly in the service, but who for some time set a very laudable and rarely-followed example of subordination to his superior. This division, which was regarded with pride and hope by at least all the Independents, was sent northward to coöperate with Lord Fairfax and Leslie in the siege of York. The two commanders were accompanied by the sagacious Sir Henry Vane, who was then alike the bosom friend of Manchester and of Cromwell. When this force arrived, York was completely invested. Newcastle drew off his army toward the west, and Prince Rupert, resolute to raise the siege, advanced from Cheshire and Lancashire in great force, and joined Newcastle. The united royalist army in the north thus amounted to upward of twenty thousand men, the cavalry being numerous and well appointed. The parliamentarian generals and the Scots raised their siege in presence of such a force, and, on the last day of June, placed themselves in battle array on Marston Moor, on the banks of the Ouse, about five miles to the southwest of the city. Rupert threw troops and provisions into York, and then proposed giving a general battle. Newcastle was of a different opinion, and the two royalists, as they had often done before, come to a violent altercation. In the end, the English nobleman told the proud German that, if he would fight, it would be upon his own responsibility. Some of his friends advised the earl not to appear in the battle, since the command was thus taken from him; but Newcastle replied, that, happen what would, he would not shun the fight, having no other ambition than to live and die true to his king.[1] The parliamentarians evidently did not expect to be brought to action; for, after staying a day on Marston Moor, they, early on the morning of the 2d of July, began to march off their foot and artillery and their Scottish allies toward Tadcaster; and they were in the disorder of this movement when old Leslie, in the van, received news that Rupert had fallen upon the rear that was still on the Moor. The trumpet sounded a halt along the whole line of march, and the Scots, the English foot, and the artillery turned about, endeavoring to get the best ground on the Moor, and prevent Rupert from outflanking them. A large rye-field on a rising ground was fiercely contested, but the parliamentarians kept it, and secured the additional advantage of a broad drain or ditch, which covered part of their front from cavalry or foot charges. In spite of their efforts, however, the royalists outflanked them somewhat; but Leslie attempted to remedy this defect by posting some Scottish dragoons on the left flank. It was three o'clock in the afternoon before these preludes were finished. Then the prince gave his word, "God and the king," and the other party gave theirs, "God with us;" after which they shot at one or another with their great guns, but not very fiercely or effectually. This lasted till about five o'clock, when there was a general silence through both armies, each expecting which would begin the charge. In this posture they continued a considerable time, so that it was believed there would be no action that night; but, about seven o'clock in the evening, the parliament's generals resolved to fall on, and, a signal being given, the Earl of Manchester's foot and some of the Scots ran to the ditch or drain in their front, made their way over it, and made a smart charge. This attack of infantry led to two grand charges of cavalry. The left wing of the royalists charging the right wing of the parliamentarians, where Scots were mixed with English, almost totally routed them, and drove the three generals, the Lord Fairfax, the Earl of Manchester, and old Leslie, in the direction of Tadcaster and Cawood Castle. But, at the same time, the left wing of the parliamentarians, where Cromwell charged with his excellent horse—his "Ironsides"

[1] Dr. Lingard properly remarks, "The reader will notice this hint of religious toleration, the first which had yet been given from authority, and which a few years before would have scandalized the members of the Church of England as much as it did now the Presbyterians and Scots. But policy had taught that which reason could not. It was now thrown out as a bait to the Independents, whose apprehensions of persecution were aggravated by the intolerance of their Scottish allies, and who were on that account suspected of having already made some secret overtures to the court."—"Bristol, and his band, gives them a full assurance of so full a liberty of their conscience as they could wish, inveighing withal against the Scots' cruel invasion, and the tyranny of our presbytery, equal to the Spanish Inquisition."—Baillie's Letters.

[1] "If Prince Rupert, who had acquired honor enough by the relief of York in the view of three generals, could have contented himself with it, and retreated, as he might have done, without fighting, the reputation he had gained would have caused his army to increase like the rolling of a snowball; but he, thinking this nothing unless he might have all, forced his enemies to a battle against the advice of many of those that were with him."—Ludlow

—was completely successful. "The horse," says Ludlow, "on both sides behaved themselves with the utmost bravery; for, having discharged their pistols, and flung them at each other's heads, they fell to it with their swords. The king's party were encouraged in this encounter by seeing the success of their left wing; and the parliament's forces that remained in the field were not discouraged, because they knew it not—both sides eagerly contending for victory; which, after an obstinate dispute, was obtained by Cromwell's brigade, the enemy's right wing being totally routed and flying, as the parliament's had done before, our horse pursuing and killing many of them in their flight." As each victorious wing wheeled round upon its own center, right and left, they clashed against each other, each fondly fancying that the business was over, "both sides being not a little surprised to see they must fight it over again for that victory which each thought they had already gained." The encounter was dreadful; and for a time Cromwell, who was wounded, was in great danger. But he was presently backed by some reserves of horse and foot, and Manchester had begun to rally part of the broken wing. "The face of the battle was exactly counter-changed; for now the king's forces stood nearly on the same ground, and with the same front that the parliament's right wing before stood in to receive their charge; and the parliament's forces stood on the same ground, and with the same front, as the king's did when the fight began." At ten o'clock at night the victory was decided by charges of the reserves of Oliver Cromwell's brigade, backed by General David Leslie. Rupert fled headlong with his broken and disordered cavalry, his infantry threw down their arms to run the faster, all his artillery, ammunition, and baggage fell into the hands of the parliamentarians, who, moreover, took about one hundred colors and standards—the prince's own standard, with the arms of the Palatinate, being among them. The victors followed with great slaughter to within a mile of York, and then slept on the ground on Marston Moor. On the following morning the Marquis of Newcastle resolved to forsake the kingdom, and, taking short leave of the prince, he escaped from York to Scarborough, where he embarked for the continent, coming no more back to England till the Restoration.

On the morrow Prince Rupert drew off from York a few troops of horse, and galloped to Boroughbridge, where he was joined by Colonel Clavering, who proposed a marauding expedition into Cheshire and Lancashire. On the morning of the 4th of July the parliament men again sat down before York, and summoned the garrison to surrender at discretion. The royalist officers refused to yield upon such terms: the beleaguerers pressed their siege, only resting upon Sunday, the 7th of July, and giving a public thanksgiving for their late success at Marston Moor. By the 11th of July they had made their approaches almost up to the very walls, and prepared their ladders and all things requisite for storming: but then Glenham, the royalist governor, begged to treat, and the prayer was seconded by many of the chief inhabitants of the city of York. Articles of surrender were agreed upon on the 15th, and on the 16th the parliamentarians marched into York, and the royalists marched out of it with colors flying and drums beating. The three chief generals, Fairfax, Manchester, and Leslie or Leven, proceeded directly to the glorious minster, where a psalm was sung, and thanks returned to God by a Presbyterian preacher, Mr. Robert Douglas, the Earl of Leven's chaplain.[1]

The battle of Marston Moor gave parliament the command of the entire north, where the Scots soon stormed the town of Newcastle. But, in the west, Essex was getting into a position which eventually led to humiliating defeat. The lord-general, after the frustrated attempt upon the king at York, had marched through the western counties with the confident hope of reducing them all. The queen, who had just got up from her confinement in the city of Exeter, asked him for a safe conduct to Bath or Bristol, that she might drink the waters and recover her health. Essex offered her a safe conduct to London, where she might have the advice of the best physicians; she preferred making her way to Falmouth and sailing back to France, which she did upon Sunday, the 14th of July. "The Earl of Warwick had ordered several ships to attend at Torbay to intercept and hinder her passage; yet her majesty, with a Flemish man-of-war, and ten other ships, adventured out, and by the advantage of the wind avoided any annoyance from the parliament fleet, who yet pursued with all the sail they could make, and one frigate came up and discharged several shots at them; but her majesty's ships, coming out fresh tallowed and trained for so important a service, had the advantage of them in sailing; and to prevent the worst, there was provided a galley with sixteen oars, which might have carried off her majesty if they could have come up; but without needing to make use thereof, her majesty landed safely at Brest, in France, and resided in that, her native kingdom, from henceforth, till after the restoration of the royal family."[2] The lord-general, Essex, meanwhile kept advancing into the west, ignorant of the storm that was gathering in his rear, and apparently blind to the fact, that the farther west he went the more he found the people disposed to royalty. Blake, who was afterward to distinguish himself in a larger theater and on a different element, was besieged by Prince Maurice in the unimportant town of Lyme Regis, which he made tenable, and put in fighting order like a ship. Maurice raised the siege on the approach of Essex, who, within three weeks, occupied Taunton, Tiverton, Weymouth, and Bridport. But the king, who had given Waller the slip at Copredy-bridge, and who had reinforced his army with a wonderful accession of enthusiastic royalists, was now in full march after him, and driving him into a corner, the narrow extremity of Cornwall, where the fierce natives, except in the sea-ports and trading towns, were exceedingly hostile to the parliament. Prince Maurice also joined his forces to the king's, and a strong hope was entertained of destroying the whole of the parliamentarian army in the west. Charles, at this crisis, sent tempting offers to Essex; but that nobleman would not listen to them, but referred his majesty to the two Houses sitting at Westminster. His honesty was therefore more conspicuous than his ability in this campaign. Waller, after the affair at Copredy-bridge, ought to have followed westward; but he remained almost inactive, only sending Middleton, with about two thousand horse, after the king; but Middleton kept at such a distance from him that he never afforded Essex much help. If the earl had given the king battle on his first making his appearance, and before he was joined by the bands of west-country royalists, his chance would have been a good one; but he, on his side, expected to be joined by Middleton, perhaps by Waller, and so lay doing nothing, and allowing his men to be cooped up between Liskeard and the sea. Then Sir Richard Grenville came up with a wild force of Cornwall levies, and cut off some of the parliamentarian foraging parties. Captain Edward Brett arrived with the queen's body-guard, which she had left behind her when embarking for France, and Sir Jacob Astley manœuvred round Essex "with a good party of horse and foot." Other corps gathered at other points, and all supplies of forage and provisions were soon cut off. But the sea as yet was open, and the Earl of Warwick, who attended the motions of the army, was on the coast. "It was therefore now resolved to make Essex's quarters yet straiter, and to cut off even his provisions by sea, or a good part thereof." The little town of Foy, or Fowey, which covered and commanded a convenient harbor, was in Essex's possession—"and it was exceedingly wondered at by all men, that he being so long possessed of Foy, did not put strong guards into that place, by which he might have prevented his army's being brought into those extreme necessities." Sir Richard Grenville possessed himself of Lanbetherick, a strong house belonging to the Lord Roberts, and lying between Essex's camp and the little harbor, and Sir Jacob Astley made himself master of View-hall, which belonged to the Lord Mohun, and which was opposite to Foy. Sir Jacob put two captains, two hundred soldiers, and two great guns into View-hall, which in a short time rendered the town and position of Foy almost useless to Essex, and prevented the passage of provisions from the sea-bord. "Now the king had leisure to sit still, and warily to expect what invention or stratagem the earl would make use of to make some attempt upon his army, or to make his own escape. In this posture both armies lay still without any notable action for the space of eight or ten days: when the king, seeing no better fruit from all that was hitherto done, resolved to draw his whole army together, and to make his own quarters yet much nearer, and either to force Essex to fight or to be uneasy even in his quarters. And it was high time to do so: for it was now certain that either Waller himself or some other forces were already upon their march toward the west."[1] Charles therefore drew closer the toils in which he held the army of Essex; he drove them from a rising ground called Beacon-hill, and immediately caused a square work to be there raised, and a battery made which shot into their quarters with a plunging fire, and did great hurt. And then Goring was sent with the greatest part of the royal horse, and fifteen hundred foot, a little westward to St. Blaze, to drive the enemy yet closer together, and to cut off the provisions they received in that direction. The dashing, daring Goring, the bloodiest hand that waved a sword in these civil wars, executed the commission with entire success; and the parliamentarians were reduced to that small strip of land that lies between the river of Foy, or Fowey, and that of St. Blaze, which was not above two miles in breadth, and little more in length, and which had already been eaten bare by the cavalry. On the 25th of August the royalists made an attempt, which very nearly proved successful, at blowing up Essex's powder magazine by treachery.[2] On the 27th the lord-general informed parliament that several skirmishes had lately taken place between him and the royalists, wherein generally his forces had the better; but at the same time he earnestly pressed for provisions and some fresh forces, concluding his letter with these words:—"If succor come not speedily we shall be put to great extremity. If we were in a country where we could force the enemy to fight, it would be some comfort; but this country consists so much upon passes, that he who can subsist longest must have the better of it, which is a great grief to me, who have the command of so many gallant men."[3] At length the state of the army being desperate, and famine staring them in the face, it was determined that Sir William Balfour should try and break through the king's lines with all the horse, and that then Essex should endeavor to embark the foot at Fowey, and escape by sea. A Frenchman, who deserted from the parliamentarians, went over by night and acquainted the king with these two desperate plans. Instantly an order was given that both royal armies[4] should stand to their arms all that night (the night between the 30th and 31st of August), and that if Essex's cavalry should attempt an escape, they were to be fallen upon from both quarters—the passage between them through which the parliamentarians must go being but musket-shot over, and having in the midst a house well fortified and supplied with musketeers. Warning was sent to Goring and all the royal horse, and further orders were given or renewed for the breaking down the bridges, and cutting down the trees to obstruct the passage. "The effect of all this providence," says Clarendon, "was not such as was reasonably to be expected. The night grew dark and misty, as the enemy could wish; and about three in the morning the whole body of the horse passed with great silence between the armies, and within pistol-shot of the cottage, without so much as one musket discharged at them. At the break of day the horse were discovered marching over the heath, beyond the reach of the foot; and there was only at hand the Earl of Cleveland's brigade—the body of the king's horse being at a greater distance. That brigade, to which some other troops which had taken the alarm joined, followed them in the rear, and killed some, and took more prisoners; but stronger parties of the enemy frequently turning upon them, and the whole body often making a stand, they were often compelled to retire; yet followed in that manner, that they killed and took about a hundred, which was the greatest damage they sustained in their whole march. The notice and orders came to Goring, when he was in one of his jovial exercises, which he received with mirth, and slighting those who sent them, as men who took alarms too warmly; and he continued his delights till all the enemy's horse were passed through his quarters; nor did then pursue them in any time. So that, excepting such who, by the tiring of their horses, became prisoners, Balfour continued his march even to London, with less loss or trouble than can be imagined, to the infinite reproach of the king's army, and of all the garrisons in the way. Nor was any man called in question for this supine neglect: it being not thought fit to make severe inquisition into the behavior of the rest, when it was notoriously known how the superior officer had failed in his duty." Having stayed to see the full success of Sir William Balfour's movement, which saved the most valuable part of the army, Essex fought his way to the shore near the mouth of the Fowey, and there, with his friend the Lord Roberts, and with many of his officers, he embarked on board a ship which Warwick had sent round, and sailed away to Plymouth on the 1st of September, leaving his foot, cannon, and ammunition to the care of the gallant and faithful Skippon, who had nothing left for it but to make the best capitulation he could. The staying of Essex would only have rendered the treaty more disadvantageous to the parliamentary cause. Before laying down arms, however, Skippon called a council of war, and proposed to the officers a desperate attempt. "You see," said Skippon, "our general and some chief officers have thought fit to leave us, and our horse are got away; we are left alone upon our defense: that which I propound to you is this, that we, having the same courage as our horse had, and the same God to assist us, may make the same trial of our fortunes, and endeavor to make our way through our enemies as they have done, and account it better to die with honor and faithfulness than to live dishonorable." But few of the officers went with him in this resolution, alledging that the horse had many advantages which the foot had not, and the king had offered good terms of surrender. On the evening of the 2d of September the common men laid down their arms (the officers retaining their swords), delivered up their cannon and ammunition, and were conducted toward the posts of their army at Poole and Portsmouth. They had been promised the safe possession of whatever money and goods belonged to them; but before they were quit of the royalist escorts they were stripped even of their clothes.[1]

[2] "The Earl of Essex sent a letter to the parliament, acquainting them with the plot, lately discovered, to blow up his magazine: for which purpose, into two wagons filled with barrels of powder there were two engines privately conveyed, and put among the barrels, and were so near doing execution, that the lighted match that was fastened to the end of one of the engines was burned within an inch of the wild-fire when it was discovered, and the other match was burned to the very neck of the engine where it was to give fire; but it happened not to take, and so the coal was gone out of itself; one of which engines he sent up (and it was showed in the House of Commons)."—Rushworth.

Essex wrote from Plymouth on the 3d of September to his friend Sir Philip Stapleton, deploring what had passed, and "how his poor army had been neglected and overpressed by so great powers." "Never," said he, "were so many gallant and faithful men so long exposed without succor!" If we are to believe certain respectable authorities, Vane, St. John, Ireton, Cromwell, and the other leaders of the Independents, anxious to see the disgrace and ruin of Essex, purposely prevented the marching of reinforcements, or the making of a diversion; but it may have been, nevertheless, the feeling of parliament, and of those who directed the war, that the cavalry marching under Middleton would be succor enough—and so in all probability it would have proved, if that officer had avoided skirmishes by the way, and gone straight to Bodmin. On the other side there are authorities of equal weight that lay the entire blame upon Essex and upon the Lord Roberts, who, it is affirmed, for selfish motives, tempted the lord-general into Cornwall. One thing seems certain—that, as Roger Coke remarks, the ill success of Essex in this expedition was the cause of Essex's fall, and of the rise of Cromwell. At first, however, the disposition of the parliament did not seem to portend this issue. Indeed, for the present, the two Houses made a rare show of magnanimity and of respect for the unfortunate general. In their letter of the 7th of September, they told Essex that they had received his letters from Plymouth; that, as they understood "the misfortune of that accident, and submitted to God's pleasure therein, so their good affections to his lordship, and their opinion of his fidelity and merit in the public service, were not at all lessened." "And," continued the Lords and Commons, whose votes were certainly not directed by that vulgar class of minds that become cowardly, and cruel, and insolent at all such unfortunate crises, "they are resolved not to be wanting in their best endeavors for repairing of this loss, and drawing together such a strength under their command as may, with the blessing of God, restore our affairs to a better condition than they are now in: to which purpose they have written to the Earl of Manchester to march with all possible speed toward Dorchester, in Dorsetshire, with all the forces he can of horse and foot. Sir William Waller is likewise ordered to march speedily into Dorchester, with all his horse and foot. The Houses have appointed six thousand foot arms, and five hundred pair of pistols, and six thousand suits of clothes, shirts, &c., to meet your lordship at Portsmouth, for the arming and encouragement of your forces."

If Charles had remained in Cornwall he would soon have been cooped up in his turn. He preferred marching off in great triumph into Devonshire, and, after resting a short time in that plentiful country, he pushed forward for Oxford, in the hope of recovering his old quarters without a battle. But in the mean time the forces of Essex, Manchester, Waller, and Cromwell were concentrated near Newbury; and, on reaching that spot where he had been so fatally engaged the preceding year, the king, who got possession of the town, and who had many other advantages, found himself obliged to consent to a general action. On this occasion no great honor was gained by any of the parliament generals, except Oliver Cromwell. Essex was ill, or pretended to be so, and, keeping out of the action, he left the command to fall to the Earl of Manchester, who had with him Cromwell as general of his cavalry. Some sharp skirmishing began on the afternoon of the 26th of October, the parliamentarians endeavoring to drive the enemy from the town. Night set in, and the weather was very cold: the parliamentarians slept on the field, the royalists in the town, and in good strong houses round about. On the morrow morning (it was a Sabbath morn), Manchester renewed the attack far more vigorously, his men going on to the charge "singing of psalms," as was usual with them. On their left the parliamentarians were completely successful, but on their right the royalists nearly balanced their advantages. The affairs were prolonged till night, when the king, fearing that before the next morning he might be compassed round, threw his artillery into Donnington Castle, and stole away toward Oxford. As soon as his evasion was known, Cromwell proposed following him up with the whole of the horse; but this was opposed by the Earl of Manchester. "The next morning," says Ludlow, "we drew together, and followed the enemy with our horse, which was the greatest body that I saw together during the whole course of the war, amounting to at least 7000 horse and dragoons; but they had got so much ground of us, that we could never recover sight of them, and did not expect to see them any more in a body that year: neither had we, as I suppose, if encouragement had not been given them privately by some of our own party." The fact to which Ludlow alludes, and which indeed seems to justify suspicion, is this:—twelve days after this indecisive second battle of Newbury, the king was allowed to return to Donnington Castle, close above the town, and, in the face of the parliament's army, to carry off the artillery, which he had deposited in that castle.[1]

Cromwell now began to murmur, not only against his own general, the Earl of Manchester, but also against Essex, Waller, and all the rest of the chief commanders. It may be, or it may not be, that this was part of a regular plan concerted long before by the Independents, who were intent upon getting the command of the army wholly out of the hands of the aristocracy and into their own, in order to make it the instrument for achieving a thorough revolution; but it must nevertheless be confessed that the conduct of the parliament's generals on many occasions was calculated to provoke suspicions, if not of treachery, of military incapacity, and that few popular bodies would have borne so long and so patiently with them as the parliament of England did. But now the House of Commons was so much dissatisfied at this last business of Donnington Castle, that they ordered an inquiry, and then Cromwell exhibited a formal charge against Manchester, in the following terms:—"That the said earl hath always been indisposed and backward to engagements, and against the ending of the war by the sword, and for such a peace to which a victory would be a disadvantage; and hath declared this by principles express to that purpose, and a continued series of carriages and actions answerable. And since the taking of York (as if the parliament had now advantage full enough) he hath declined whatever tended to further advantage upon the enemy, neglected and studiously shifted off opportunities to that purpose (as if he thought the king too low, and the parliament too high), especially at Donnington Castle. That he hath drawn the army unto, and detained them in such a posture as to give the enemy fresh advantages, and this before his conjunction with the other armies, by his own absolute will, against or without his council of war, against many commands from the committee of both kingdoms, and with contempt and vilifying of those commands; and since the conjunction, sometimes against the councils of war, and sometimes persuading and deluding the council to neglect one opportunity with pretense of another, and that again of a third, and at last by persuading that it was not fit to fight at all." The Earl of Manchester, in reply, sent up to the House of Lords a long narrative, which is supposed to have been written by Denzil Hollis, the implacable enemy of Cromwell, and one of the leaders of that violent Presbyterian party which already considered the Independents as men to be more detested and dreaded than the royalists. Manchester justified his conduct as a general at the second battle of Newbury, saying that it pleased God, through the valor of the Lord-general Essex's foot, and some horse, to give a very happy success to that service. "But," continued Manchester, or Hollis for him, "where the horse were that Lieutenant-general Cromwell commanded, I have as yet had no certain account." (There was boldness in accusing Oliver Cromwell of cowardice, but this was the intention, and Denzil Hollis afterward repeated the charge circumstantially.)[1] Manchester went on to say that he received intelligence of the king's intention to relieve Donnington Castle, and carry off his artillery there.

—"Wherefore," he continued, "I sent unto Major-general Skippon to consult what was fittest to be done: and we both resolved that, in regard all our horse were quartered so far from us, it was necessary to call them to a rendezvous the next day, that so they might be nearer to us, and readier for any present service: hereupon Major-general Skippon and myself writ to Sir William Balfour, that he would please to command my lord-general's horse to rendezvous the next day, which he accordingly did. I sent likewise unto Lieutenant-general Cromwell to give the like orders to my horse, for, if I called them to a rendezvous, I might have their skins, but no service from them." Manchester asserted that Cromwell had not brought up his horse when the king made a sudden charge to cut his way through the parliament lines to Donnington Castle; and that in not following the king's army, he (Manchester) had been guided by the opinion of most of his officers and of the members of the House of Commons who were present;—in particular, he said, Sir Arthur Hazlerig represented that they should run a greater danger than the king, for, if they beat him, his army would not be ruined, but he, being king still, and retreating to his garrisons, would recruit his army, it being now the winter season; but, if the king had the better of them, their whole forces would be ruined, and the kingdom in extreme hazard, having no considerable reserve on this side Newcastle, so that the enemy might without any opposition march up to the very walls of London. But, not satisfied with this recrimination, the Earl of Manchester, a Presbyterian, and led by the Presbyterian party, jealous of the Independents, delivered to the Lords on the same day (the 2d of December) another paper which was meant to heap fuel on the fire, to consume Cromwell in the flames of Presbyterian wrath, by accusing him of a fixed design against the aristocracy and the church of Christ. This latter paper purported to contain a statement of certain speeches uttered by Mr. Oliver Cromwell, who had said "that it would never be well with England until the Earl of Manchester was made plain Mr. Montague; that the assembly of divines was a pack of persecutors; and that, if the Scots crossed the Tweed only to establish Presbyterianism, he would as soon draw his sword against them as against the king."

The Earl of Essex was far more bitter against Cromwell than Manchester could be, for the latter nobleman's temper was naturally amiable and generous. The great Presbyterian general-in-chief went down to the House of Lords on the day appointed for reading Manchester's narrative. He had not been there since his return from Cornwall, but he continued to attend in his seat while this business was discussing, and at the same time he opened private consultations in his own house upon the delicate question of the expediency and safety of proceeding against Cromwell as an "incendiary" between the two nations of England and Scotland. The managers of these debates at Essex House were the Scottish commissioners, Hollis, Sir John Meyrick, Sir Philip Stapleton, and other Presbyterian chiefs, who were alike anxious for the preservation of monarchic and aristocratic institutions, and for the establishment of one sole and exclusive form of worship, church government, doctrine, and discipline. Doubting of their own knowledge of constitutional law, these gentlemen very late one evening induced the Earl of Essex to send for Maynard and Whitelock, two able English lawyers, and members of the Commons. Whitelock says "that there was no excuse to be admitted, nor did they know beforehand the occasion of their being sent for." The lord-general made the two lawyers a very flattering speech, and asked them for their opinion; the Lord Chancellor of Scotland, who was one of the commissioners sent up by the Scottish parliament, assuring them also of the great opinion both he and his brethren had of their worth and abilities. "You ken vary weel," said his lordship, "that General-lieutenant Cromwell is no friend of ours, and since the advance of our army into England, he hath used all underhand and cunning means to take off from our honor and merit of this kingdom,—an evil requital of all our hazards and services; but so it is, and we are nevertheless fully satisfied of the affections and gratitude of the gude people of this nation in the general. It is thought requisite for us, and for the carrying on of the cause of the twa kingdoms, that this obstacle or remora may be removed out of the way, who, we foresee, will otherwise be no small impediment to us, and the gude design we have undertaken. He not only is no friend to us, and to the government of our church, but he is also no well-willer to his Excellence, whom you and we all have cause to love and honor: and, if he be permitted to go on in his ways, it may, I fear, endanger the whole business; therefore we are to advise of some course to be taken for prevention of that mischief. You ken vary weel the accord 'twixt the twa kingdoms, and the union by the Solemn League and Covenant, and, if any be an INCENDIARY between the twa nations, how is he to be proceeded against? Now the matter is, wherein we desire your opinions, what you tak the meaning of this word Incendiary to be, and whether Lieutenant-general Cromwell be not sik an incendiary as is meant thereby, and whilk way wud be best to tak to proceed against him, if he be proved to be sik an incendiary, and that will clip his wings from soaring to the prejudice of our cause. Now you may ken that by our law in Scotland, we clepe him an INCENDIARY whay kindleth coals of contention, and raiseth differences in the state to the public damage, and he is tanquam publicus hostis patriæ; whether your law be the same or not, you ken best, who are mickle learned therein, and therefore, with the favor of his Excellence, we desire your judgment in these points." Whitelock tells us that he told my Lord Chancellor of Scotland and the rest of the commissioners, that the word INCENDIARY meant just the same thing in English as it did in Scotch, but that whether Lieutenant-general Cromwell was such an INCENDIARY between the two kingdoms was a thing that could be known only by proofs of his particular words and actions; that it would ill suit persons of so great honor and authority to bring forward any such public accusation unless they could see beforehand that it could be clearly made out and brought to the effect intended; that it would reflect upon their honor and wisdom if they should begin a business of this weight and fail in it, and that it would be wise to consider Cromwell's present condition, parts, and interest, his weight in the House of Commons, his influence in the army. "I take Lieutenant-general Cromwell," continued Whitelock, "to be a gentleman of quick and subtil parts, and one who hath (especially of late) gained no small interest in the House of Commons, nor is he wanting of friends in the House of Peers, nor of abilities in himself to manage his own part or defense to the best advantage. If this be so, my lords, it will be the more requisite to be well prepared against him before he be brought upon the stage." He told them that he had not yet heard any particulars mentioned by Essex or by the Scottish commissioners, or any other, nor did he know of any thing himself by his own observation, which would amount to a proof clear enough to satisfy the House of Commons; and he again advised them above all things not to attack Cromwell rashly. Whitelock's companion and friend, Maynard, spoke in the same sense. "Lieutenant-general Cromwell," said Maynard, "is a person of great favor and interest with the House of Commons, and with some of the House of Peers likewise, and therefore there must be proofs the most clear and evident against him to prevail with the parliament to adjudge him to be an INCENDIARY." Mr. Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, and some others of the Presbyterian conclave, "spake smartly to the business," and recommended an immediate accusation; but the Scottish commissioners, wisely cautious, "were not so forward to adventure upon it, and this blow was given up for the present." Whitelock says that he and Maynard were dismissed at about two hours after midnight, with compliments and thanks, adding—"They had some cause afterward to believe that, at this debate, some who were present were false brethren, and informed Cromwell of all that passed among them; and, after that, Cromwell, though he took no notice of any particular passages at that time, yet he seemed more kind to Whitelock and Maynard than he had been formerly, and carried on his design more actively of making way for his own advancement."[1]

No doubt the hatred of the Scottish commissioners, and of the Presbyterians generally, had been much sharpened by the boldness with which Cromwell had stood forward in the House of Commons in defense of religious liberty with Selden, St. John, Vane, and Whitelock: he had combated fearlessly for a toleration to be extended at least to all such Protestant sects as acknowledged the general scheme of Christianity. But for a vote moved and carried in the House of Commons by Cromwell and Vane, before the taking of the covenant, the intolerant Scots, and the no less intolerant Presbyterians of England, would have carried all questions concerning religion in their own way, and men might have doubted of the blessings of civil liberty on seeing it accompanied by such a coarse, dark, and unornamented spiritual tyranny.

But now, while the Scottish commissioners, and Essex, and Hollis, and the others that loved the Geneva cloke and the doctrine of exclusive salvation—hungering at the same time with an unspiritual appetite after the possession of power, and place, and cankering riches—were plotting at midnight, and devising all kinds of means to drive Cromwell into the toils—that wonderful person, who had no pretension whatever either to the innocency of the dove or the meekness of the lamb, was planning, with infinitely better success, how he might break the neck of the Presbyterian oligarchy, and get the command of the army out of the hands of a set of men, who, as the majority of the nation now certainly believed, were in no haste to finish this desolating war. It is probable, indeed, that he anticipated both Essex and Manchester, and that, before they began, he had fully prepared the engine he intended to employ against them. For some time he and his friend, Sir Harry Vane, had been almost constantly closeted together. Compared with either of these men, the Manchesters, the Essexes, the Hollises were, intellectually, babies; and, then, Cromwell and Vane had the assistance of the deep, inscrutable, and most sagacious St. John. The effect of their deliberations was made manifest on the 9th of December, when (military operations having been suspended, and both armies having gone into winter-quarters) the Commons went into a committee of the whole House to take into consideration the sad condition of the kingdom in reference to its grievances by the burden of the war. "There was a general silence," says Whitelock, "for a good space of time, many looking upon one another to see who would break the ice and speak first on so tender and sharp a point." At last Cromwell stood up and said, "It is now time to speak or forever to hold the tongue: the important occasion being no less than to save a nation out of a bleeding, nay, almost dying condition, which the long continuance of the war hath already brought it into; so that, without a more speedy, vigorous, and effectual prosecution of the war, casting off all lingering proceedings, like soldiers of fortune beyond sea, to spin out a war, we shall make the kingdom weary of us, and hate the name of a parliament. For what do the enemy say? Nay, what do many say that were friends at the beginning of the parliament? Even this—that the members of both Houses have got great places and commands, and the sword into their hands; and, what by interest in parliament, and what by power in the army, will perpetually continue themselves in grandeur, and not permit the war speedily to end, lest their own power should determine with it. This I speak here to our own faces is but what others do utter abroad behind our backs. I am far from reflecting on any: I know the worth of those commanders, members of both Houses, who are yet in power; but, if I may speak my conscience without reflection upon any, I do conceive, if the army be not put into another method, and the war more vigorously prosecuted, the people can bear the war no longer, and will enforce you to a dishonorable peace. But this I would recommend to your prudence, not to insist upon any complaint or oversight of any commander-in-chief upon any occasion whatsoever; for, as I must acknowledge myself guilty of oversights, so I know they can rarely be avoided in military affairs: therefore, waiving a strict inquiry into the causes of these things, let us apply ourselves to the remedy which is most necessary; and I hope we have such true English hearts, and zealous affections toward the general weal of our mother-country, as no members of either House will scruple to deny themselves and their own private interests for the public good, nor account it to be a dishonor done to them, whatever the parliament shall resolve upon in this weighty matter." Another member, whose name ought to have been preserved, followed Cromwell, and said—"Whatever be the cause, two summers are passed over, and we are not saved. Our victories (the price of blood invaluable), so gallantly gotten, and (which is more pity) so graciously bestowed, seem to have been put into a bag with holes; what we won one time we lost another; the treasure is exhausted, the country wasted: a summer's victory has proved but a winter's story; the game, however shut up with autumn, was to be new played again the next spring, as if the blood that has been shed were only to manure the field of war for a more plentiful crop of contention. Men's hearts have failed them with the observation of these things." The cause of all this, he thought, lay in the forces of the parliament "being under several great commanders," who had no good correspondence or understanding with one another. But the first that proposed expressly to exclude all members of parliament, whether of the House of Lords or House of Commons, from commands and offices, was Mr. Zouch Tate, who moved for the bringing in of the ordinance to that effect which was afterward so celebrated under the name of the Self-denying Ordinance. Zouch Tate was seconded by Vane, and the unexpected motion was carried. The ordinance was reported two days after, on the 11th of December, when a solemn day of fast was appointed for imploring a blessing on the intended new model of the army. On the morrow, the 12th of December, a petition was presented to the Commons "by the well-affected citizens and inhabitants of London," who thanked them for the care their House was taking of the commonwealth, and expressed their resolution to assist them to the utmost of their power, in prosecution of their vote of the 9th. On the 14th of December the Commons resolved themselves into a grand committee, wherein the ordinance was canvassed very seriously on both sides. Many weighty reasons were urged by the proposers of the measure. It was represented, for example, that this would be the only way of settling the differences which had unhappily arisen between commanders that were parliament men, and of either House; that the commanders would be less able to make parties for themselves when they should be men having no interest or seat in either House, "and so become more easily removable or punishable for their neglects and offenses; that, by passing this ordinance, the members taken off from other employments would be better able to attend to their duties in parliament, whereby the frequent objection of the thinness of the House at the passing of important votes would be obviated, as would also that other capital objection—that the members of parliament sought their own profit, honor, and power, which would be no longer believed when the world saw them so ready to exclude themselves from all commands and offices."[1]

But all these reasons failed to satisfy many members, who spoke against the self-denying ordinance as a perilous and uncalled-for novelty. Whitelock, who did not see into the future, objected that it would lay aside as brave men, and as wise, and as faithful, as ever served their country. "Our noble general," said he, "the earls of Denbigh, Warwick, Manchester, the lords Roberts, Willoughby, and other lords in your armies, beside those in civil offices; and your own members, the Lord Grey, Lord Fairfax, Sir William Waller, Lieutenant-general Cromwell, Mr. Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Brereton, Sir John Meyrick, and many others, must be laid aside if you pass this ordinance."

But a majority of the House of Commons did pass the ordinance on the 19th of December;[2] and on the 21st they sent it up to the Lords. There the bill met with many delays and much opposition, for their lordships would not enter upon the subject till the 30th of December, and they then committed the consideration of it to a committee of eight lords, four of whom were persons most interested in opposing the ordinance—namely, the earls of Essex, Manchester, Warwick, and Denbigh. This committee drew up a paper, representing that the bill would deprive the peers of that honor which in all ages had been given to them, since they had evermore been active, to the effusion of their blood, and the hazard of their estates and fortunes, in regaining and maintaining the fundamental laws of the land, and the rights and liberties of the subject; nor was there ever any battle fought for these ends, wherein the nobility were not employed in places of chiefest trust and command. They added, what was perfectly true, and what was of vital importance to their whole caste, that the self-denying ordinance was by no means equal in its operation to Lords and Commons, since, though some of the gentry and commons were comprehended in it as sitting members of parliament, yet the rest were left free to serve either in civil offices or in the field; whereas the ordinance would operate as a disqualification of the whole hereditary nobility of England. Upon this the Commons, who twice before had sent up

[1] Rushworth. Another reason given was, "That by the new model designed, the former weights that obstructed being taken off, the progress of the army upon new wheels will be more swift, and a speedy period put to the war, which is the general desire of the nation."

[2] A motion was made in committee, that Essex, the commander-in-chief, should be exempted from the operation of the new law. If this exception had been carried, a main object of the Independents would have been lost; but it was negatived.—Journals of Commons.

urgent messages representing that any delay would be dangerous, and might be destructive to the country's liberties, appointed a committee to prepare reasons to satisfy their lordships; and on the 13th of January, 1645, the whole House, with the speaker at their head, went up to the Lords about the same business. But the Lords, that same day, finished debating, and rejected the ordinance. In the mean time the Commons went on forming the new model of the army, which they agreed should consist in the whole of 21,000 effective men,—namely, 6000 horse, 1000 dragoons, and 14,000 foot, to be placed under the command of one general-in-chief, one lieutenant-general, one major-general, thirty colonels, and regimental officers in the usual proportion. And they settled that the whole charge of this army, estimated at £44,955 per month, should be raised by assessment proportionably throughout the kingdom. Nor did they stop here; for, on the 21st of January, eight days after the Lords had rejected the self-denying ordinance, the Commons proceeded to nominate the chief commanders of the new modeled army. Sir Thomas Fairfax was named general-in-chief, in lieu of Essex; Skippon, who had begun by commanding the train-bands of the city of London, was made major-general; and the post of lieutenant-general was purposely and artfully left vacant. On the 28th of January, having completed the ordinance for raising and maintaining the army under the supreme command of Sir Thomas Fairfax, the Commons sent it up to the Lords, who, on the 4th of February, returned it passed, but not without additions and alterations; the Lords insisting that all colonels, majors, captains, and other officers, should be nominated and approved by both Houses; that all officers and soldiers should take the covenant, or be forever made incapable of serving; and that the lord lieutenant of every county should be a member of the committee of that county, as to this ordinance, &c. The Lower House hereupon demanded and obtained several conferences, in the course of which they consented that Sir Thomas Fairfax should nominate all the officers, who were to be selected from any of the armies under the command of parliament, and to be approved by both Houses; as also that no commander should be appointed, but such as should take the covenant within twenty days. But the Commons, herein expressing the sense of the Independents, who had no reverence or affection for that Scottish league and bond, could not agree with the Lords that those persons that made a scruple of conscience to take the covenant, "not out of any disaffection to it, or to the parliament," should be forever made incapable of serving in the army—"since it might happen they might hereafter be satisfied, and take the said covenant." Whereupon the word incapable was left out, and the army ordinance was passed on the 15th of February.[1]

Three days after this Sir Thomas Fairfax, who had been invited to come up to the parliament, arrived in London in a private manner, attended only by Sir William Constable and a few other officers; and on the morrow, the House of Commons sending four of their members to him, he was by them conducted into the House, where a seat of honor was placed for him. But Fairfax modestly refused the chair, and stood uncovered while the speaker complimented him on his past services, his valor, conduct, and fidelity, gave him thanks in the name of the House, and encouraged him to go on as he had begun. On the 24th of March the Commons resumed the debate on the self-denying ordinance, and consented to several material alterations. The bill now discharged the present officers from their commands, without disqualifying them for the future, and forever, as was at first proposed. The measure, in short, was made to assume a temporary character, to look like an extraordinary arrangement made necessary by the extraordinary circumstances of the times. Exceptions were also voted, as in the first self-denying ordinance, in favor of the commissioners of the great seal, the commissioners of the admiralty and navy, and of the revenue, who, though all members either of the Lords or Commons, were to remain in office. The bill in this state was sent to the Upper House on the 31st of March. On the 2d of April the Lord-general Essex, the Earl of Manchester, and the Earl of Denbigh, in the House of Peers, voluntarily offered to surrender their commissions. This offer was accepted and approved of by the House; and a conference being desired with the Commons, their lordships there read a letter written by Essex, who calmly stated that he had been employed for almost three years, as lord-general of all the parliament's forces "raised for the defense of the king, parliament, and kingdom," that he had endeavored to perform his duty with all "fidelity and sedulity;" yet considering, by the ordinance lately brought up to the House of Peers, that it would be advantageous to the public, he now desired to lay down his commission, and freely to render it into the hands of those from whom he received it. Similar declarations were read from Manchester and Denbigh; and on the following day, the 3d of April, the self-denying ordinance was freely passed by the peers. Some things that immediately preceded this tardy consent of the Lords are full of significance. On the 24th or 25th of March, while the Commons were making their last alterations in the ordinance, they sent up Sir John Evelyn to their lordships to say—"that when

[1] Rushworth. The clause about the covenant was, however, tolerably exclusive as left. It was to this effect:—"Provided further that all commanders and officers that shall be employed in this army, and to be approved of by both Houses of parliament, as aforesaid, shall take the national league and covenant of both kingdoms within twenty days after they shall be listed in the said army, which solemn league and covenant shall be tendered as aforesaid unto all the officers before mentioned, by some minister whom the commander-in-chief shall choose, in the presence of him the said commander-in-chief, or the major-general: and a return to be made by them unto the two Houses of parliament from time to time, of the names of all such as shall take the same; and all such as shall refuse to take the solemn league and covenant shall upon their refusal be displaced, and shall not be admitted to any office or command in the said army, until they shall have taken the said solemn league and covenant, in manner and form as aforesaid, and such their conformity certified and approved of by both Houses of parliament."

the Commons received the last message and satisfaction from their lordships, in passing the list of the officers for Sir Thomas Fairfax's army, the House of Commons took special notice that their lordships desired that all united correspondency might be between both Houses; and that he was now commanded by the House of Commons to express their desire of a happy occurrence, being very sensible that it was the greatest endeavor of some persons ill affected to foment discontents, and to report that the House of Commons aimed to undermine their lordships' privileges, which intention they disclaimed and abhorred. Also, that they did acknowledge the many noble and renowned actions performed by their lordships' ancestors in defense of the liberty of the Commons, and did take notice of the labors and unwearied endeavors of their lordships in assisting them in the present great affairs of the kingdom, for the safety of it, without respect to themselves or their particular safeties, and wished that punishment might be inflicted on those that endeavored to raise up such a confusion as must ensue the disjoining or putting variance between the two Houses; against which the Commons did protest, and therefore desired that their lordships would concur with them to find out the raisers and spreaders of such false and mischievous reports." Then a declaration of the House of Commons was read:—"That whereas many disaffected persons had endeavored to foment jealousies and divisions, by raising a report that the House of Commons had an intention to subvert the peerage of England, the House of Commons do declare that they do so far detest any such design or intention, that they will use all possible means for the discovery of the authors of such report, and to bring them to condign punishment. And do further declare, that as they have bound themselves by several protestations, so will they ever be as tender and careful to maintain the honor and rights of the Peerage of England as their own." Which declaration being read, was left with their lordships.[1]

On the same third day of April, on which the Lords passed the self-denying ordinance, Sir Thomas Fairfax went from London to Windsor, which he had appointed his head-quarters, having previously, as commander-in-chief, summoned all his officers and soldiers to rendezvous there by the 7th of April. He continued at Windsor till the end of the month, diligently employed in remodeling the army. He of course encountered some discontent and obstructions; for some of the men were unwilling to be placed under new officers, and some that were wholly dismissed wished to continue in the service; but with the assistance of old Skippon, the most popular of commanders, he overcame all these difficulties, reduced the old army into new companies and regiments, as if they had been newly raised, and recruited the whole with a new and valuable stock.[2] Dalbier, that soldier of fortune, who had repeatedly given timid counsel to the Earl of Essex, stood off for some time with eight troops of horse, as if balancing between Oxford and Windsor; but at last he went to the latter place and submitted to the parliament. Thus the parliament was secured;—thus "the Independents cut the grass under the Presbyterians' feet."[1] [2] Rushworth has preserved a speech of Skippon to five regiments of the Earl of Essex's forces, quartered at Reading, one of which was Essex's own regiment. The speech is admirable—being full of meaning and character.

[1] Rushworth.

Before following Fairfax to the field, we must take up certain matters which reflect disgrace on the parliament. The synod of divines still continued to sit, and to urge the high doctrines and practices of intolerance and infallibility. The Scottish commissioners and most of the English Presbyterians would fain have introduced into England, without change or variation, the practice of the kirk of Scotland; but they were forced to submit to several modifications, rejoicing that at all events the abhorred liturgy, which Charles and Laud had attempted to force down the throat of the Scots with cannon-balls, was effectually set aside and abolished. This synod, as we have seen, was wisely prevented by parliament from arrogating to itself any legislative or judicial authority; but if they did not of themselves send their old enemy, the Archbishop of Canterbury, to a bloody grave, they certainly promoted with heart and soul that execution, which could hardly have taken place but for their vehement hatred, and unevangelical revenge. "As yet," says Sir Philip Warwick, "the Scots and Presbyterian party seem to be the ruling interest in the two Houses, and the Scotch covenant to be the idol; and in order to get this form of church service allowed by the king, Archbishop Laud must be taken out of the way." The republican Ludlow says, that it was expressly for the encouragement of the Scots that the Lords and Commons sentenced and caused execution to be done upon William Laud, their capital enemy; but it does not appear that the Scots either were, or possibly could be, more eager for the old man's death than were the English Presbyterians, and the many victims in London of the episcopal rage.

Diseased, helpless, apparently almost friendless, the summus pontifex of former days might have lain forgotten in the Tower, and wound up the story of his days in that dismal place, like many better men; but a dispute about church livings forced him into notice, and precipitated his end. The Lords remaining with the parliament claimed the right of nominating to the benefices that fell vacant; and still pretending to respect the archiepiscopal functions of the captive, they called upon Laud to collate the clergymen of their choice. The king, who probably cared little for the danger in which he was thus placing the primate, commanded him not to obey the Lords; and Laud loyally bowed to this order. In the month of April, 1643, the Lords issued a peremptory order; Laud tried to excuse himself again; then the Commons received an acceptable message from the Lords to proceed with the charges already laid against him, and expedite his trial. The Commons appointed a committee, and selected

Prynne to collect and prepare evidence—Prynne, who had been so barbarously treated by the prisoner, and whose soul yearned for an equally barbarous revenge. Much anxiety has been shown to exonerate the Independents from any share in these transactions; but we do not find that that party ever made any laudable effort to save the doomed life of the wretched old man. On the 23d of October, 1643, ten new articles of impeachment were added by Prynne to the fourteen already on record; and on the 23d of the same month the archbishop was ordered by the two Houses to put in his answer in writing within a week. Laud replied by a petition, wherein he prayed to have counsel assigned him, to have some money allowed him out of his estate to fee his counsel and defray his other charges; to have his papers and books, which Master Prynne had taken from him, and to have also time and means to send for his witnesses. Upon reading this petition, the Lords allowed him six days more time, and counsel, and some money. They afterward allowed him another week, and then another; and the trial did not in reality begin till the 12th of March, 1644, when the archbishop was brought by the Lieutenant of the Tower, and the usher of the black rod, to the bar of the House of Lords, where he was made to kneel a little space. Sergeant Wild opened the accusation in a speech of great length, some ability, and no charity. He charged the sick and tottering priest with all manner of crimes, both political and religious (it had been well for Laud if there had not been a substratum of truth in every thing the sergeant said!)—he charged him with "high treason; treason in all and every part; treason in the highest pitch and altitude; with the fixed design of subverting the very foundations of the subject's liberties and religion, with being the author of all the illegal and tyrannical proceedings in the Star Chamber, High Commission Court, and other courts, of all the innovations in doctrine and discipline, and of the suppressing of godly ministers, and godly preaching; and he ended with these words, "Naaman was a great man, but he was a leper: this man's leprosy hath so affected all, as there remains no other cure but the sword of justice, which we doubt not but your lordships will so apply, that the commonwealth shall yet live again and flourish." When the sergeant had done, the fallen archbishop desired permission to speak a few words, to wipe off that dirt that had been cast upon him. These few words were, in fact, an eloquent and most skillful oration, which he delivered from a written paper he held in his hand. He said, that in state affairs he had always leaned to that part of the cause where he found law to be, never having any intention to overthrow the laws. About liberty he said not a word; but he spoke at great length concerning what were called his innovations in religion. "Ever since I came in place," said the archbishop, "I have labored nothing more than that the external public worship of God (so much slighted in divers parts of the kingdom) might be preserved, and that with as much decency and uniformity as might be; for I evidently saw that the public neglect of God's service in the outward face of it, and the nasty lying of many places dedicated to that service, had almost cast a damp upon the true and inward worship of God, which while we live in the body needs external helps, and all little enough to keep it in any vigor. And this I did to the uttermost of my knowledge, according both to law and canon, and with the consent and liking of the people." Seventeen whole days were spent in producing and commenting on the evidence, and then the archbishop requested that he might have liberty to make a general recapitulation of his defense before the Lords, which was granted. On the 2d of September, 1644, Laud again appeared at the bar, and delivered his general recapitulation to the Lords. Mr. Samuel Brown, a member of the House of Commons, and one of the managers of the trial, replied at full length on the 11th of September, summing up the principal parts of the evidence and endeavoring to invalidate the defense put in. Then Laud prayed that his counsel might be heard on the point of law; and their lordships consenting, the managers for the House of Commons desired that they might first have notice what matters of law his counsel would insist upon, in order that they (the managers) might prepare themselves to make reply. And thereupon it was ordered that the archbishop's counsel should speak to this point of law—whether in all or any of the articles charged against him there were any treason contained. On the 11th of October, Laud's counsel accordingly spoke to that matter, maintaining that not one of the offenses alledged against him, nor all those offenses accumulated, amounted to that most capital crime of high treason. To this, Samuel Brown and the other managers for the Commons. replied, maintaining that the contrary was fully proved. A few days after this, the Commons, apparently doubting the Lords, gave up their impeachment as they had done in Strafford's case, and passed an ordinance of attainder. On the 2d of November, after the second reading of this precious ordinance, the Commons brought the prisoner to the bar of their own House. There Mr. Samuel Brown, in the archbishop's presence, repeated the sum of the evidence given in before the Lords; and when Brown sat down, the Commons ordered the prisoner to make his answer viva voce, and at once. This was refining in barbarity—a measure scarcely ever surpassed either in the Star Chamber or the Court of High Commission; and those courts only sentenced to fines, imprisonment, scourging, ear-cropping, and nose-slitting, while this took the life. Laud, sinking under the weight of years and infirmities, prayed that he might have some convenient time allowed him, in respect of the tedious length and weight of the charge; and the House at last, and not without difficulty, allowed him eight days. On the 11th of November the prisoner was brought again to the bar of the Commons, where he spoke for some hours in his own defense, and where Mr. Samuel Brown replied in his presence. Then Laud was sent back to the Tower, and (on the same day) the House passed the ordinance of attainder for high treason, with only one dissenting voice. On the 16th of November they transmitted this bill to the House of Peers, which, because some of the lords were not present at the giving in of all the evidence during this long trial, took time to consider, and on the 4th of December ordered that all books, writings, and other documents concerning the trial, should be brought in to the clerk of the parliament. It is evident that the Lords were averse to the execution, and were laboring to gain time; for on the 24th of December (it was no longer to be kept as Christmas-eve) their Lordships, at a conference, acquainted the Commons that they had found the archbishop guilty as to matters of fact, but were yet desirous of some further satisfaction on the point of law, ere they could decide that the said matters were treason. Upon the 26th of December the Commons sent Sergeant Wild, Mr. Samuel Brown, and Mr. Nicholas, to satisfy the Lords therein, and to show them, in a conference, that a man might incur the guilt of high treason as much by offenses against the nation as by offenses against the sovereign; that there were two kinds of treasons, those which were against the king, and cognizable by the inferior courts, and those that were against the realm, and subject only to the judgment of parliament. On the 4th of January, 1645, a very few lords passed the bill of attainder, whereby it was ordered that Laud should suffer death, as usual in cases of high treason. Urged on by the Commons, the Upper House, on the 6th of January, agreed in fixing the day of slaughter for Friday the 10th. But the Lords made yet another feeble effort to save the old man's blood; and on the 7th of January, at a conference, they acquainted the Commons with a letter and petition from the archbishop, as also with a pardon to him from the king, dated the 12th of April, and of which he (Laud) desired the benefit; but this pardon was overruled and rejected; and on the morning of the 10th of January Laud was conveyed from the Tower, where he had been confined for more than three years, to the scaffold and the block upon Tower-hill.[1] Upon the scaffold he delivered a long speech, or, as he called it, his last sermon, which he had written out in the Tower, and in which he endeavored to excuse himself for all the matters charged against him, protesting that he had always professed the religion of the church of England, as it stood established by law, that he held his gracious sovereign to have been much traduced by some, as if laboring to bring in popery, though he was as sound a Protestant, according to the religion by law established, as any man in his kingdom, and one that would venture his life as far and as freely for it; that he, his faithful servant, had endured clamors and slanders for laboring to maintain a uniformity in the external service of God, and was now at last brought to die for high treason (a crime which his soul abhorred), as a foe to the church, and an enemy to parliaments. In the end, he said—"I forgive all the world, all and every of those bitter enemies, which have any ways persecuted me in this kind, and I humbly desire to be forgiven, first of God, and then of every man, whether I have offended him or no, if he do but conceive that I have." He then read a prayer which he had written for the occasion. The scaffold was crowded, not so much by his friends as by his unrelenting enemies, who were anxious to see him die, or, according to their disgusting cant, moved by their Christian bowels to show him his spiritual blindness in that his last stage. "I did think," said Laud, "here would have been an empty scaffold, that I might have had room to die." When room was made, he said, "Well, I'll pull off my doublet, and God's will be done. I am willing to go out of the world: no man can be more willing to send me out, than I am willing to be gone." Then Sir John Clotworthy, one of those puritanic bigots that would have had a Star Chamber of their own, asked what text of Scripture was most comfortable to a man in his departure. The departing archbishop, who probably galled the Puritan's ears with his Latin, which had long since been set down as the mother tongue of the whore of Babylon, said, calmly, "Cupio dissolvi et esse cum Christo." "That is a good desire," rejoined this clodpole divine, "but there must be a foundation for that desire, an assurance." "No man can express it," replied Laud; "it is to be found within." "It is founded upon a word, though," continued the pertinacious fanatic, "and that word should be known." "It is the knowledge of Jesus Christ, and that alone," replied Laud; and, turning to the headsman, he gave him some money, saying, "Here, honest friend, God forgive thee, and do thy office upon me in mercy." He knelt down, said another short prayer, made his sign, and the executioner did his office at one blow; —"and instantly," says Fuller, "his face, ruddy in the last moment, turned pale as ashes, confuting their falsehoods, who gave it out that he had purposely painted it, to fortify his cheeks against discovery of fear in the paleness of his complexion." Some few friends carried his body to Barking church, and decently interred it there, reading over his grave the service for the dead appointed by that liturgy which we must believe he had conscientiously held to be essential to salvation.[1]

[1] Laud's last petition to parliament was, "That in case he must die, Dr. Stern, Dr. Heywood, and Dr. Martin might be permitted to be with him before and at his death, to administer comfort to his soul, and that the manner of his execution might be altered unto beheading. To which the Lords agreed, but the Commons then refused both, and only granted that Dr. Stern, and Mr. Marshall, and Mr. Palmer should go to him, one or both of the latter to be constantly present while Dr. Stern was with him. But the next day, upon another petition of his, setting forth reasons, from his being a divine, a bishop, one that had the honor to sit in the House of Peers, and of the king's most honorable privy council, &c., and praying in those regards not to be exposed to such an ignominious death, the Commons consented to remit the rest of the sentence, and that he should suffer death by being beheaded."

Four years almost had this unhappy old man been a prisoner, yet not enjoyed so much as the quiet of a prison; for sometimes (about fourscore days he was carried from the Tower to Westminster, and there arraigned in the House of Lords. So the fates were pleased, in a sad compensation, to equal his adversity even in length of time with his prosperity. This January he was beheaded, his life being spun out so long, till he

The Scots, who exercised so great an influence over the English parliament, and whose country had at length been made the scene of civil war by the daring Marquis of Montrose, recommended a new treaty of peace with the king; and as early as the month of November of the preceding year (1644), propositions running in the name of both kingdoms were drawn up by Johnston of Wariston, one of the most distinguished of the Scottish commissioners. The parliament sent to Oxford for a safe-conduct for the commissioners they had appointed to carry these propositions to the king, namely, the Earl of Denbigh, the Lord Maynard, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Whitelock, and the Lord Wenman (English) and the Lord Maitland, Sir Charles Erskine, and Mr. Bartlay (Scotch). Prince Rupert sent the safe-conduct under the hand and seal of the king, who did not notice them as members of parliament, but merely as private gentlemen. The parliament, however, submitted to this slight, and dispatched the commissioners. Charles or his officers most unwisely kept these noblemen and gentlemen for some hours outside the gates of Oxford, in the wet and cold; and when they were admitted into the town, they were escorted like prisoners by a troop of horse, and lodged in a very mean inn.[1] The Earl of Denbigh read the propositions for peace. "Have you power to treat?" said Charles. The commissioners replied, "No; but we are to receive your majesty's answer in writing." "Then," replied the king, coarsely, "a letter-carrier might have done as much as you." "I suppose," said the Earl of Denbigh, "your majesty looks upon us as persons of another condition than letter-carriers." "I know your condition," replied the king; "but I say that your commission gives you power to do no more than a letter-carrier might have done." In the evening the loyal Earl of Lindsay, who was sick in his bed, invited Hollis and Whitelock to visit him. These two important members of the House of Commons had not been a quarter of an hour in the earl's chamber when the king and Prince Rupert, with several persons of prime quality, entered; and the king not only saluted them very obligingly, but also began to discourse with them. "I am sorry, gentlemen," said Charles, "that you bring me no better propositions for peace, nor more reasonable, than these are." "They are such," said Hollis, "as the parliament thought fit to agree upon. I hope a good issue may be had out of them;" and Whitelock added, that they were but the servants of parliament, and very willing to be messengers of peace. "I know," said Charles, "you could only bring me what they chose to send; but I confess I do not a little wonder at some of these propositions, and particularly at the qualifications." The propositions excepted several persons about the court, and in the king's army; among these were Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, who were present, and who laughed in scorn and contempt, for which, however, their uncle rebuked them.[1] The evident intention of the king was to win over Hollis and Whitelock. "Your service, Mr. Hollis," said he, "and that of the rest of those gentlemen whose desire hath been for peace, hath been very acceptable to me; and out of the confidence I have of you two that are here with me, I ask your opinion and advice, what answer will be best for me to give at this time to your propositions?" Hollis hoped his majesty would excuse them: Whitelock said, "We now by accident have the honor to be in your majesty's presence, but our present employment disables us from advising your majesty." But Charles, not easily repelled, required their advice as friends—as his private subjects. To this Hollis said, "Sir, to speak in a private capacity, I should say that I think your best answer would be your coming among us;" and Whitelock told his majesty that his personal presence at his parliament would sooner put an end to their unhappy distractions than any treaty. "But how can I go thither with safety?" said Charles. "I am confident," replied Hollis, "that there would be no danger to your person to come away directly to your parliament." "That may be a question," rejoined the king; "but I suppose your principals who sent you hither will expect a present answer to your message." They both represented again, that the most satisfactory answer would be his majesty's presence with his parliament. "Let us pass by that," said the king; "and let me desire you two to go into the next room, and confer a little together, and set down something in writing which you apprehend may be fit for me to return as an answer, and which, in your judgment, may facilitate and promote this good work of peace." Hollis and Whitelock withdrew, and, being together by themselves, upon discourse concluded that it would be no breach of trust in them to write as the king desired them, but rather might prove a means of promoting the work they both came about. And accordingly Whitelock wrote down what they thought would be the king's best answer; and the paper so written they left upon the table in the withdrawing-room, and the king went in and took it, and with much favor bade them farewell.[2] But the answer suggested by these two members was not such a one as the king wished for; and seeing he had failed in bringing them over to his party, he made an end of the useless parade of compliment and cajolery. On the 27th of November he sent them his reply sealed up. Hollis, and Whitelock, and the other commissioners thought it not fit for them to receive an answer in that manner, without being acquainted with the contents, or furnished with a copy, as was usual in such cases, and they desired to be excused from receiving that answer so sealed up, requesting at least to have a copy of it. His majesty insultingly replied, "What might see (which was the observation of many) some few days before his death, the Book of Liturgy abolished, and the Directory composed by the synod at Westminster and established."—Breviary of the History of the Parliament.

[1] Rushworth says, "His majesty received them very obligingly on the next day, and gave to every one his hand to kiss, but seemed more to slight the Scots commissioners than any of the rest."

[1] Whitelock says, "At the reading of the excepted persons' names, which the Earl of Denbigh read with great courage and temper, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, being present when their names were read as excepted persons, they fell into a laughter, at which the king seemed displeased, and bid them be quiet."

is that to you, who are but to carry what I send; and if I will send the song of Robin Hood and Little John, you must carry it!" The commissioners contented themselves with saying, that the business about which they came was of somewhat more consequence than an old song. Charles then condescended to send them a copy of his answer: but here, again, another difficulty was started. They observed that the said answer was not directed to any body whatsoever, and that the parliament, so far from being acknowledged, was not even named in it. Charles insisted that the answer was delivered to them, the parliaments' commissioners, which was sufficient; and some of his lords told them that they could not get it otherwise, chiefly because they were there as commissioners for both kingdoms, for England as well as for Scotland, and earnestly entreated the commissioners, for peace sake, to receive the answer as it was sent to them. Thereupon the commissioners, considering that they must take it upon themselves to break off this treaty if they should refuse the king's paper, and that it would be wiser for them to leave it to the judgment of the whole parliament, consented to receive the answer without any address upon it.[1]

On the 29th of November (1644) this singular document was produced at Westminster, and on the following day the same was read at a conference of both Houses. Great exceptions were made, and there was much debate against the form and want of direction; but at last it was carried that those objections should be laid aside, that the treaty should be proceeded with, and that thanks should be returned to the commissioners who had been at Oxford. Charles had now agreed to send the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Southampton to London, with a fuller answer and an extended commission; but the Earl of Essex, who as yet held the supreme command, would not grant a safe-conduct to these two noblemen, unless he was acknowledged as general of the army of the parliament of England; and the Commons were resolute on the same point, insisting that his majesty should send as to "the parliament of England assembled at Westminster, and the commissioners of the parliament of Scotland." On the 5th of December, Prince Rupert sent a letter with the required recognition;[2] and at the same moment the king, to excuse himself with his wife, addressed her a letter containing these memorable words, which fully proved with what mental reservation he had acknowledged the parliament: "As to my calling those at London a parliament, if there had been two beside myself of my opinion, I had not done it; and the argument that prevailed with me was, that the calling did nowise acknowledge them to be a parliament; upon which condition and construction I did it, and no otherwise: and accordingly it is registered in the council-books, with the council's unanimous approbation." The king's envoys, the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Southampton, arrived in London on the 14th of December, and were honorably conducted to Somerset House, where they were well entertained, and allowed on the morrow—a Sunday—to hear divine service according to the liturgy, which parliament and the synod of divines had suppressed. The two noblemen, adhering to their master's instructions, acted as secret emissaries in the city of London, and intrigued with the two factions of Presbyterians and Independents, offering the latter liberty of conscience, &c., &c. And as Richmond and Southampton were found to have no higher faculty than that of proposing the nomination of commissioners, the parliament made haste to get rid of them, being well informed as to all their doings in the city.

After many tedious preliminaries, it was agreed that the king's commissioners should meet the commissioners of the Lords and Commons at Uxbridge, within the parliamentary lines; that Charles should be represented by the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Chichester, the Earl of Kingston, the lords Capel, Seymour, Hatton, and Culpeper, Secretary Nicholas, Sir Edward Hyde, chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edward Lane, Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Sir Thomas Gardiner, Mr. John Ashburnham, Mr. Geoffrey Palmer, and Dr. Stewart;[1] and that the parliament should be represented by the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Salisbury, and Denbigh, the Lord Wenman, Denzil Hollis, Pierpoint, Sir Harry Vane, junior, Oliver St. John, Bulstrode Whitelock, John Crew, and Edmund Prideaux; and that the estates of the parliament of Scotland should be represented by the Earl of Loudon, the Marquis of Argyle, the lords Maitland and Balmerino, Sir Archibald Johnson, Sir Charles Erskine, Sir John Smith, George Dundas, Hugh Kennedy, and Mr. Robert Berkely, or Barclay—"together with Mr. Alexander Henderson." These commissioners met on the day appointed (the 29th of January) in the little town of Uxbridge. "This place being within the parliament's quarters, their com-

[2] This was Rupert's letter to Essex, punctuated as we find it in Rushworth:—

"MY LORD,

"I am commanded by his majesty to desire of your lordship safe conduct for the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Southampton, with their attendants, coaches, horses, and other accommodations fitting for their journey in their coming to London, during their stay, and in their return, when they shall think fit; from the Lords and Commons assembled in the parliament of England at Westminster, to bring to the Lords and Commons assembled in the parliament of England, and the Commissioners of the kingdom of Scotland now at London, an answer to the propositions sent to his majesty for a safe and well-grounded peace.

"Your lordship's servant,
"RUPERT.

"Oxford, December 5th."

[1] The new titles conferred since the great seal had been carried away from parliament gave great offense, and several conferences were held between the Lords and Commons about this matter, the Lords insisting that the safe-conduct should give them all their titles as specified by the king; the Commons urging that they could not condescend to admit those new titles, as it would be directly opposite to one of the propositions of both Houses to the king, which was, that all titles of honor whatsoever conferred by his majesty since the carrying away the great seal should be void. At last it was agreed that the new titles of the lords should be omitted, but that those of the knights, not being honors under the great seal, should be inserted; and accordingly the safe conduct was thus sent away, and his majesty was pleased to accept the same, notwithstanding such alteration.—Rushworth.

missioners were the more civil and desirous to afford accommodation to the king's commissioners, and they thought fit to appoint Sir John Bennet's house at the farther end of the town to be fitted for the place of meeting for the treaty."[1] There, on the morrow, deliberations were opened, it being agreed beforehand that every thing should be set down in writing. John Thurloe, afterward secretary to Oliver Cromwell—Thurloe, the bosom friend of Milton,—acted as secretary for the English parliament, being assisted by Mr. Earle; and Mr. Cheesly acted as secretary for the commissioners of the Scottish parliament. The first point debated was that which was sure to make the worst blood, and defeat the whole treaty—if, indeed, there had ever been a hope or an intention to conclude a treaty. The parliament's commissioners delivered the propositions and votes of both Houses concerning the settling of religion in a Presbyterial way; and this matter was appointed for the debate of the three first days. The king's commissioners asked what was meant by the expression "Presbyterial government?"—and Dr. Stewart, of the school of Laud, spake very learnedly, though somewhat warmly, against any alteration of the system of episcopacy, which he thought to be best suited to the church of England, and also to be "jure divino." Alexander Henderson, the champion of Presbyterianism, the framer of the covenant, spoke with equal warmth against episcopacy. At length the Marquis of Hertford, wearied out with this unprofitable dispute on a point of mere speculative theology, proposed that they should leave this argument, and proceed to debate upon the particular proposals. The Earl of Pembroke agreed with the noble marquis, and the lay part of the commissioners, particularly on the king's side, would willingly have passed over this point altogether; but the parsons were of a different opinion, and Dr. Stewart desired that they might dispute syllogistically, as became scholars. Henderson told him that he, in his younger days, had been a pedagogue in Scotland, and had also read logic and rhetoric to his scholars; that of late he had wholly declined that kind of learning; that he hoped, nevertheless, he had not forgotten all of it, and therefore he agreed to dispute syllogistically. "And in that way," says Rushworth, "they proceeded. . . . . . But the arguments on both parts were too large to be admitted to a place in this story." The parliament commissioners presented four propositions concerning religion:—that the king should consent to the taking away the Book of Common Prayer; that he should accept the directory for worship, which had been substituted for the liturgy; that he should confirm the assemblies and synods of the church; and, lastly, that he should take the covenant of the two kingdoms. On none of these points would either party yield a hair's breadth; and the royal commissioners objected in limine that the king's conscience would never allow him to consent to these changes in religion. But there were also other articles about which Charles was equally tenacious, and the parliament equally resolute—such as the command of the army and navy, the conduct of the Irish war, the pacification Ormond had made with the Catholics, &c.; and, after twenty days of debate and wrangling, nothing was settled, nothing made clear to both parties, except that they must again have recourse to the sword; and at the expiration of those twenty days, the term originally fixed for the duration of the negotiations, the parliament recalled their commissioners.

[1] The commissioners for the parliament were lodged on the north side of the town, and those for the king on the south side. The best inn on the one side was the rendezvous of the parliament's commissioners, and the best inn on the other side of the street was for the king's commissioners. No intermixture was allowed between the attendants of one party and the attendants of the other party, but "the evening that they came to town several visits passed between particular commissioners of either party; as Sir Edward Hyde came to visit Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelock; the Lord Culpeper visited Sir Henry Vane; and others of the king's commissioners visited several of the parliament's commissioners, and had long discourses about the treaty, and to persuade one another to a compliance: so also Mr. Whitelock visited Sir Edward Hyde and Mr. Palmer, Sir Richard Lane, and others, and several other of the parliament's commissioners visited divers of the king's commissioners, and had discourse with them tending to furtherance of the business of the treaty. The town was exceedingly full of company, that it was hard to get any quarter, except for the commissioners and their retinue, and some of the commissioners were forced to lie two of them in a chamber in field-beds, only upon a quilt, in that cold weather, not coming into a bed during all the treaty." Great attention was paid to diplomatic etiquet, and the pas was given to the royalists. "The foreway into the house was appointed for the king's commissioners to came in at, and the back way for the parliament's commissioners; in the middle of the house was a fair great chamber, where they caused a large table to be made like that heretofore in the Star Chamber, almost square, without any upper or lower end of it. The king's commissioners had one end and one side of the table for them, the other side was for the parliament's commissioners, and the end appointed for the Scot's commissioners to sit by themselves. Behind the chair of the commissioners on both sides sat the divines and secretaries, and such of the commissioners as had not room to sit next to the table. At each end of the great chamber was a fair withdrawing-room and inner chamber, one for the king, and the other for the parliament's commissioners to retire unto and consult when they pleased."—Rushworth.

If either party was disappointed at the result, it was certainly not the king, who was wonderfully buoyed up by the brilliant successes obtained by the Marquis of Montrose, in the Highlands of Scotland, over the Earl of Argyle and the Covenanters, and who, at the very commencement of the negotiations, wrote to his wife to assure her that she had no need to doubt the issue of this treaty, for his commissioners were so well chosen that they would neither be driven by threats nor arguments from the positive grounds he had laid down for them, and which were such as he had formerly agreed upon with her majesty. The pledges which the queen had given to her partisans, the Catholics, would of themselves have been sufficient to prevent any treaty with the parliament.[1]

While the Episcopalians and Presbyterians were disputing syllogistically at Uxbridge, their respective parties had many fierce skirmishes in the field; for though the main army on either side lay inactive in winter-quarters, there was no restraining the animosity of partisans, who carried on an incessant but petty warfare in most parts of the kingdom. There was a perplexing series of sieges and assaults—night surprises and pitched battles between small troops of Roundheads and Cavaliers, men that took their instructions from no one but themselves, and that fought whenever they found an opportunity. The town, the village, was often enthusiastic in the parliament's cause, while the neighboring castle or manor-house was just as enthusiastic for the king. At times a sortie from the castle or manor-house would disturb the burghers and yeomen at dead of night, and leave them to lament the burning of their houses and barns, the carrying off of their cattle; and then there generally followed a siege of the castle or manor-house, which, from want of artillery and military skill, would often be prolonged through tedious months, and fail at last, and be raised at the approach of Prince Rupert and his flying squadrons of horse, or of some other body of the king's army. Many of these episodes were interesting and romantic in the extreme: in some of them the high-born dames of the land, whose husbands were away following the banner of their sovereign, made good the castle walls against the parliamentary forces, and commanded from tower and barbican like brave soldiers. But we must confine ourselves to the greater operations which decided this war. "When the spring began," says the somewhat partial May, "the war was renewed on both sides with great heat and courage. . . . . Sir Thomas Fairfax went to Windsor to his new-modeled army; a new army indeed, made up of some remainder of the old one, and other new-raised forces in the countries; an army seeming no way glorious either in the dignity of its commanders or the antiquity of soldiers. For never hardly did any army go forth to war who had less of the confidence of their own friends, or were more the objects of the contempt of their enemies, and yet who did more bravely deceive the expectations of them both, and show how far it was possible for human conjectures to err. For in their following actions and successes they proved such excellent soldiers, that it would too much pose antiquity, among all the camps of their famed heroes, to find a parallel to this army. He that will seriously weigh their achievements in the following year, against potent and gallant enemies, and consider the greatness of the things they accomplished, the number of their victories, how many battles were won, how many towns and garrisons were taken, will hardly be able to believe them to have been the work of one year, or fit to be called one war. But whosoever considers this must take heed that he do not attribute too much to them, but give it wholly to Almighty God, whose providence over this army, as it did afterward miraculously appear, so it might in some measure be hoped for at the first, considering the behavior and discipline of those soldiers. For the usual vices of camps were here restrained; the discipline was strict; no theft, no wantonness,

[1] Rushworth.—Whitelock.—May.—Clarendon.—Warwick.—May says (and most of his assertions are borne out by abundant evidence from other quarters), "that the king, before the treaty began, used all means to assure himself of foreign aid. By letters he urged the queen, who was then in France, to solicit that king and other Catholics to assist him, and that the queen-regent would detain the parliament's ships in France. He was very earnest, likewise, for assistance from the Duke of Lorrain, that he might get into England that wicked army of his, so notorious through Germany and Flanders for all villainy. . . . . At last, hope was given him from the Duke of Lorrain of 10,000 men; and, for bringing of these soldiers into England, Goffe was sent into Holland to negotiate for shipping and other necessaries. The king likewise desired assistance at that time from the bloody Irish rebels, and, by his letters, commanded Ormond to make a peace with those rebels, and to promise and grant to them a free exercise of their popish religion, and to assure them that if, by their assistance, he could but finish his war in England, he would abrogate all those laws which had been heretofore made against the papists there: he gave thanks likewise to Muskerry, Plunket, and others of those rebels, promising a pardon for all that was past. . . . . The queen, also (remaining in France), writing to her husband, seemed to grieve much that, at Uxbridge, they were to treat of religion in the first place, affirming that, if any thing severe against the Catholics should be concluded, and yet a peace should not be made, the king could not hope hereafter for any assistance from the Catholic princes or from the Irish, who must needs think that, after they had done their best, they should at last be forsaken. She often entreats the king that he would never forsake the bishops, the Catholics, nor those faithful friends of his that served him in his wars; and the king promiseth her that he would never forsake his friends for a peace; and continues to persuade her to hasten as much as she can the aids from France, saying, that while London is distracted between the Presbyterians and Independents, both may be ruined."—Breviary of the Hist. of the Parl.

no oaths, nor any profane words, could escape without the severest castigation; by which it was brought to pass that in this camp, as in a well-ordered city, passage was safe, and commerce free."[1] This was the army that emulated the heroic and devout forces which had followed the great Swede to victory and glory. The king's forces were much less religious and decent; the royalist officers, the Cavaliers generally, the more to distinguish themselves from the Puritan Roundheads, gave way to blasphemy and swearing, drinking and gambling, and to all those vices which had distinguished the ungodly armies of Wallenstein. The officers prided themselves in their profligacy, considering all decency of behavior the merest hypocrisy, and altogether unfit for soldiers; and their men showed a great aptitude in following the example of their superiors. If we are to believe several cotemporary authorities, the royal camp itself, or the more permanent head-quarters of Charles, was not exemplary in point of morals. At the opening of the campaign, however, the king, to all appearance, had many advantages over the parliament. His troops, though frequently mutinous as well as disorderly and dissolute, were well trained and tried in the field; his fortresses were very numerous; from Oxford, in the center of the kingdom, he controlled the greater part of the midland counties; the west was almost wholly for him; he still retained some places in the north; and he was undisputed master of the principality of Wales. But while the forces of the parliament were attaining a tenfold vigor and efficacy from a unity of purpose, and from something like a unity of command, the royalists were distracted and weakened by diverging views and by jars and jealousies innumerable. In fact it at times required all the authority of Charles to prevent these factions and sub factions from turning their arms upon one another. Fairfax's first operation was to detach 7000 men to the relief of Taunton, where Blake, the heroic defender of Lyme, was hard pressed by the royalists. Colonel Welden led the detachment, and at his approach the beleaguerers of Taunton fled without fighting. On the other side, Prince Rupert, advancing from Worcester to join the king at Oxford, defeated Colonel Massey, who tried to bar his passage with a part of the garrisen of Gloucester, drawn out at Ledbury. Upon this reverse, the committee of both kingdoms recommended that Oliver Cromwell should be employed pro tempore, in spite of the self-denying ordinance, and dispatched with part of the cavalry to guard the roads between Ledbury and Oxford.
