He replied, that she should do well first to know whether her mother would receive her; and he would give her a fit opportunity to know that, by sending to their home all her Portuguese servants; and that he would forthwith give order for the discharge of them all." What the threats and menaces were which Charles never intended to put in execution we know not, but he forthwith executed his cruel threat of depriving his wife of her servants—her countrymen and countrywomen, the friends of her childhood. After an interview with the chancellor, who had been again with the queen, using arguments and cajolery to overcome her natural repugnance, "he persevered in all his resolutions without any remorse—directed a day for all the Portugueses to be embarked, without assigning any considerable thing of bounty to any of them, or vouchsafing to write any letter to the king or queen of Portugal of the cause of the dismission of them. And this rigor prevailed upon the great heart of the queen, who had not received any money to enable her to be liberal to any of those who had attended her out of their own country, and promised themselves places of great advantage in her family; and she earnestly desired the king that she might retain some few of those who were known to her, and of most use, that she might not be wholly left in the hands of strangers; and employed others to make the same suit to the king on her behalf. Whereupon the Countess of Penalva, who had been bred with her from a child, and who, by the infirmity of her eyes and other indisposition of health, scarce stirred out of her chamber, was permitted to remain in the court; and some few inferior servants in her kitchen and in the lowest offices, besides those who were necessary to her devotions, were left here. All the rest were transported to Portugal." Nor did Catherine's trials end here. "In all this time," continues Clarendon, "the king pursued his point: the lady came to the court—was lodged there—was every day in the queen's presence, and the king in continued conference with her, while the queen sat untaken notice of; and if her majesty rose at the indignity and retired into her chamber, it may be one or two attended her, but all the company remained in the room she left, and too often said those things aloud which nobody ought to have whispered. . . . . She alone was left out in all jollities, and not suffered to have any part of those pleasant applications and caresses which she saw made almost to everybody else; an universal mirth in all company but in hers, and in all places but in her chamber: her own servants showing more respect and more diligence to the person of the lady than toward their own mistress, who, they found, could do them less good. The nightly meetings continued with the same or more license; and the discourses which passed there, of what argument soever, were the discourse of the whole court and of the town the day following; while the queen had the king's company those few hours which remained of the preceding night, and which were too little for sleep. All these mortifications were too heavy to be borne; so that at last, when it was least expected or suspected, the queen on a sudden let herself fall first to conversation and then to familiarity, and, even in the same instant, to a confidence with the lady; was merry with her in public, talked kindly of her, and, in private, used nobody more friendly."[1]

On the 2d of June, a few days after the king's marriage, the republican Sir Harry Vane was arraigned before the Court of King's Bench. Upon the Restoration, Vane, knowing that he had taken no share in the trial or death of Charles I., and that the new king, in his declaration from Breda, had promised a wide indemnity, continued at his house in Hampstead, near London.[2] He was allowed to remain undisturbed for about five weeks, when he was arrested and sent to the Tower, whence he had been carried from one prison to another for the space of two years. He had now been brought up from a lone castle or block-house on one of the Scilly islands. The indictment charged him with compassing and imagining the death of Charles II., and conspiring to subvert the ancient frame of the kingly government of the realm; and the overt acts to sustain this charge were, his consulting with others how to bring the king to destruction, and to hold him out from the exercise of his regal authority; and then his usurping offices of government and appointing officers of the army and navy raised against his majesty, and also his actual assembling in a warlike manner in the county of Middlesex. This indictment would have applied just as well to almost every person concerned in, or employed by, the government since the death of the late king. Vane objected that the offenses charged against him were committed either in his capacity as a member of parliament, or as a servant of government acting under the commission of parliament; and he maintained that he could be tried only by parliament, and not by any inferior tribunal. His judges, who were met to condemn, not to try him, overruled these objections, and bade him plead guilty or not guilty. Vane represented that he could not expect justice from judges who, in another place, had prejudged him and recorded their votes against him; that the length of time taken to search out matters against him, and the undue practices and courses to find out witnesses against him, were further proofs that he could not have an equal and impartial trial; that, during all that time, he had been kept in close imprisonment without being once examined, or having any question put to him whereby he might conjecture what would be charged against him; that he had been treated as a great delinquent—his rents stopped, his tenants forbidden to pay them, his very courts prohibited by officers of great personages claiming the grant of his estates; that, by these undue proceedings, he had not wherewithal to maintain himself in prison, and his debts, to the amount of above £10,000, were undischarged, either principal or interest; and that the hopes of private lucre and profit were such in his tenants and other persons, sought out for far and near to be witnesses against him, that it would be no wonder if, at last, some charges should be exhibited; but these charges were so general and vague, that nothing certain, or that applied peculiarly to himself, could be gathered out of them. "Unless," continued Vane, "some remedy be afforded by the justice, candor, and favor of this court, it may be better for the prisoner (for aught he yet knows) to be immediately destroyed by special command (if nothing else will satisfy) without any form of law, as one to whom quarter, after at least two years' cool blood, is thought fit to be denied in relation to the late wars. This may seem better than, under a color and form of justice, to pretend to give him the benefit of the law and the king's courts, whose part it is to set free the innocent, upon an equal and indifferent trial had before them, if their cause will bear it; but it is very visible beforehand, that all possible means of defense are taken and withheld from him, and laws are made ex post facto to forejudge the merit of the cause, the party being unheard." After expressing his faith and reliance on God, who now called him to suffer, as he had formerly called him to act, for the good of his country—after expressing his consciousness that for himself the issue would be good, whatever this court might make it—he continued: "Far be it from me to have knowingly, maliciously, or wittingly offended the law, rightly understood and asserted; much less, to have done any thing that is malum per se, or that is morally evil. This is what I allow not, as I am a man, and what I desire with steadfastness to resist, as I am a Christian. If I can judge any thing of my own case, the true reason of the present difficulties and straits I am in is because I have desired to walk by a just and righteous rule in all my actions, and not to serve the lusts and passions of men, but rather to die than wittingly and deliberately sin against God and transgress his holy laws, or prefer my own private interest before the good of the whole community I relate unto, in the kingdom where the lot of my residence is cast." The counsel for the prosecution were reduced to silence; but the Chief Justice Foster muttered—"Though we know not what to say to him, we know what to do with him." Vane claimed the benefit of counsel, which had been denied to Harrison and the other regicides, and which it was not usual to grant in cases of treason.[1] The court, impatient to make him plead, promised him that if he would put himself on the issue he should have counsel. He then pleaded not guilty, and was sent back to the Tower for four days. When he reappeared he claimed the promise which had been given him; on which his judges, who had received fresh instructions to condemn him, told him that they would be his counsel. The attorney-general, Sir Geoffrey Palmer, a fanatic royalist, produced his evidence, of which the principal points were, that Vane had signed warrants to the officers of the navy, commanding them to issue out stores for the service of the government; that he, with others, had given orders to suppress the attempts of any who should pretend title to the kingly government; that, in 1649, after the late king's execution, he had been a member of the council of state and treasurer of the navy, in both which capacities he had labored to keep out his present majesty; that in 1651, he had been president of the council of state, and, as such, had signed orders for military equipments; that, in 1659, after Cromwell's death, he had been a member of the provisional government or committee of safety, and, as such, had conferred with foreign ambassadors, appointed officers in the army, and acted in various other ways for the maintenance of the Commonwealth, when all good subjects were looking for the happy return of his majesty; that he had proposed a new model of government, and had declared that it would be destructive of the people's liberty to admit any king; and that he had once been seen at the head of a company of soldiers in Southwark. Vane combated these charges with great learning and eloquence. He maintained that the word king in the statute of treasons meant only a king regnant, a king in actual possession of the crown, and not a king merely de jure, who was not in possession; but the judges decided that Charles II. was king of England de facto, as well as de jure, even when he was a beggared and despised exile, and when the government of the Commonwealth was universally obeyed at home and recognized abroad. Vane justified the conduct of the Commonwealth by the inevitable necessity of the case. "This matter," said he, "was not done in a corner. The appeals were solemn, and the decision by the sword was given by God! . . . . When new and never-heard-of changes do fall out in the kingdom, it is not like that the known and written laws of the land should be the exact rule, but the grounds and rules of justice, contained and declared in the law of nature, are and ought to be a sanctuary in such cases, even by the very common law of England; for thence originally spring the unerring rules that are set by the divine and eternal law for rule and subjection in all states and kingdoms." In the course of his defense he called attention to the facts that the resolutions and votes for changing the government of England into a commonwealth were all passed before he was returned to parliament; that he was bound to obey the powers then regnant; that he had done nothing for any private or gainful ends, to profit himself or enrich his relations, as well appeared by the great debts he had contracted, and the destitute condition in which he should

[1] Formerly, it was a settled rule at common law, that no counsel should be allowed a prisoner upon his trial, upon the general issue, in any capital crime, unless some point of law should arise proper to be debated. It was not till after the Revolution that, by the statute 7 Will. III., c. 3, persons indicted for such high treason as works a corruption of the blood, or misprision thereof (except treason in counterfeiting the king's coin or seals), were allowed to make their full defense by counsel, not exceeding two, to be named by the prisoner, and assigned by the court or judge. By the statute 20 Geo. II., c. 30, the same indulgence was extended to cases of parliamentary impeachments for high treason.—Blackstone, Comment., iv. 356. Now, by statute 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 114, the privilege of making full answer and defense by counsel has been accorded to all persons tried for felony. In cases of treason, as well as in all other felonies, prisoners were always entitled to the assistance of counsel in arguing points of law, though the exercise of that privilege was hampered by so many restrictions when the court chose to tie down the prisoner to the rigor of ancient precedents, that it was of little real value.

now leave his family. "I do publicly challenge," said Vane (and all the great men of the Commonwealth might have said as much), "I do publicly challenge all persons whatsoever that can give information of any bribes or covert ways used by me during the whole time of my public acting: and therefore I hope it will be evident to the consciences of the jury that what I have done hath been upon principles of integrity, honor, justice, reason, and conscience, and not, as is suggested in the indictment, by instigation of the devil, or want of the fear of God." But the court was not to be moved by such appeals as these, and they determined that the evidence against the prisoner was good, and that the acts imputed to him amounted to high treason. Vane then offered a bill of exceptions, and claimed the benefit of the promise which the king had made to the Convention Parliament—that, if Vane should be attainted by law, he would not suffer the sentence to be executed. The solicitor-general openly declared that "the prisoner must be made a public sacrifice;" and, alluding to Vane's urgent and repeated demands for the benefit of counsel, he brutally exclaimed, "What counsel does he think would dare speak for him in such a manifest case of treason, unless he could call down the heads of his fellow-traitors, Bradshaw or Coke, from the top of Westminster Hall?" With these words thundering in their ears, the jury retired, and in half an hour returned into court with a verdict of guilty.[1]

On the morrow Charles thus wrote from Hampton Court to Clarendon:—"The relation that hath been made to me of Sir H. Vane's carriage yesterday in the Hall is the occasion of this letter; which, if I am rightfully informed, was so insolent as to justify all he had done, acknowledging no supreme power in England but a parliament, and many things to that purpose. You have had a true account of all; and, if he has given new occasion to be hanged, certainly he is too dangerous a man to let live, if we can honestly put him out of the way. Think of this, and give me some account of it tomorrow; till when, I have no more to say to you." What Clarendon's account was, we may easily divine;[2] for, on that day week (June 14th) a scaffold was prepared on Tower Hill, on the very spot where the Earl of Strafford had suffered so many years before. At an early hour Vane took leave of his wife and children, and of a few generous friends that were not afraid of incurring the hatred of government by showing a deep sympathy. He entreated them not to mourn for him. His religious enthusiasm blended itself, as it had ever done, with his republicanism and passionate love of liberty. "I know," said he, "that a day of deliverance for Sion will come. Some may think the manner of it may be as before, with confused noise of the warrior, and garments rolled in blood; but I rather think it will be with burning and fuel of fire. . . . . I die in the certain faith and foresight that this cause shall have its resurrection in my death. My blood will be the seed sown, by which this glorious cause will spring up, which God will speedily raise. . . . . As a testimony and seal to the justness of that quarrel, I leave now my life upon it, as a legacy to all the honest interest in these three nations. Ten thousand deaths rather than defile my conscience, the chastity and purity of which I value beyond all this world!" He was dragged on a sledge from the Tower to the scaffold, looking so cheerful that it was difficult to convince many of the spectators that he was the prisoner about to die. The government had been alarmed by the impression made by the dying words of Harrison, Scott, and Peters; and so they had resolved to interrupt, at all critical passages, the more dangerous eloquence of Vane.[1] When he attempted to describe the conduct of his judges, Sir John Robinson, the lieutenant of the Tower, interrupted him, saying, in a furious manner, "It is a lie; I am here to testify that it is a lie. Sir, you must not rail at your judges." Vane replied, "God will judge between you and me in this matter. I speak but matter of fact, and can not you bear that? It is evident the judges refused to sign any bill of exceptions." . . . . Here the drummers and trumpeters were ordered to come close under the scaffold, and the trumpeters blew in his face to prevent his being heard. Sir Harry lifted up his hand, laid it on his breast, and, after a mild remonstrance, silence being restored, he proceeded to detail to his fellow-countrymen and fellow-Christians some circumstances of his life and of the late civil wars. Upon this, the trumpets again sounded, the sheriff snatched at the paper he held in his hand,[2] and the Lieutenant of the Tower furiously called out for the books of some that were taking notes of Vane's solemn and last discourse. "He treats of rebellion," said the lieutenant, "and you write it." And thereupon six note-books were delivered up. Vane said, meekly, that it was hard that he might not be permitted to speak, but that this was what all upright men might now expect from the worldly spirit. Here fresh blasts were blown upon the trumpets, and fresh efforts made by the Lieutenant of the Tower and two or three efforts to snatch the paper out of his hand, "and they put their hands into his pockets for papers, as was pretended, which bred great confusion and dissatisfaction to the spectators, seeing a prisoner so strangely handled in his dying words." At last Vane gave up all hope of being allowed to

[1] The attorney-general, who had the last word, was even permitted to hold a secret consultation with the foreman as the jury were leaving the box.—See Forster's Life of Sir Henry Vane in Lives of Eminent Statesmen.

[2] Clarendon, in his Life, avoids saying a single word about the trial and execution of Vane.

[1] Burnet says—"A new and very indecent practice was begun. It was observed that the dying speeches of the regicides had left impressions on the hearers that were not at all to the advantage of the government. So, strains of a peculiar nature being expected from him, to prevent that, drummers were placed under the scaffold, who, as soon as he began to speak of the public, upon a sign given, struck up with their drums: this put him in no disorder; he desired they might be stopped, for he understood what was meant by it."

[2] Pepys, who was an eye-witness of the execution, says, "He made a long speech, many times interrupted by the sheriff and others there; and they would have taken his paper out of his hand, but he would not let it go. But they caused all the books of those that writ after him to be given to the sheriff; and the trumpets were brought under the scaffold that he might not be heard.

explain himself to the people, and, turning away from the front of the scaffold, he knelt in prayer for a few minutes by the side of the block, then laid his head upon that sharp pillow, and stretched out his arm as a signal to the executioner, who struck a good blow, which severed his neck at once. The royalists, who still held not merely that Strafford's trial and attainder had been irregular and illegal, but also that that arbitrary and dangerous man was one of the best of ministers and a pure-souled martyr, justified the execution of Vane as a proper retaliation for his conduct on Strafford's trial; and some there were that declared it was a judgment of God that he should die on the same spot where Strafford had perished. But in the mind of Charles and his ministers there were other things which weighed far more heavily against Vane than did any thing connected with the fate of Strafford; and these were his unspotted virtues and his eminent abilities. When Clarendon suggested the necessity of excluding Vane from the bill of indemnity, he did so on the avowed grounds of his being "a man of mischievous activity," whose influence was great, and might cause the court fresh troubles; and we have seen the king himself declaring that he was "too dangerous a man to let live." And yet it was doubted whether the court gained or lost more by his death. His magnanimity on the scaffold made a wonderful and lasting impression, which became the deeper when men saw more and more of the ways of the restored government and of the universal corruption, immorality, irreligion, and indecency that obtained among public men.[1] General Lambert was tried and condemned at the same time; but he had given very evident proofs that he was not a dangerous man; he pleaded guilty, threw himself abjectly upon the royal mercy, and was suffered to wear out the remainder of his days in an unhonored prison in the island of Guernsey. Other blood, however, was shed. Colonels Okey, Corbet, and Barkstead, who had been concerned in the execution of the late king, had fled to Holland, but they were hunted out by Downing, who had once been chaplain in Okey's regiment; the States basely gave them up, and they were brought to the gibbet and the knife. They died glorying in the good old cause, and Downing was held up to detestation.[2] General Ludlow, Mr. Lisle, and a few other commonwealth-men, who either had taken a part in the trial of Charles I., or had otherwise incurred the hatred of the royalists, had found an asylum among the congenial republicans of Switzerland—a sacred asylum, which was not suffered to be invaded either by the threats or promises that were repeatedly held out through a series of years by the government and family of Charles II. Not being able to obtain their expulsion or their surrender by the Swiss, the royalists had recourse to assassination in a private way. Lisle was shot in the back in the month of August, 1664, on the Lord's Day, as he was going into a church at Lausanne. He fell dead on the spot in the church-yard, and close to the church-porch; and his murderer mounted a swift horse that was held for him at hand by another villain, and the two, shouting "God save the king," galloped off and crossed the Swiss frontier into France. Other less successful attempts were made in the same detestable manner upon the life of Ludlow, who distinctly charges King Charles, his mother the queen-dowager, and his sister the Duchess of Orleans, with employing these assassins.

As the anniversary of St. Bartholomew approached, the Presbyterian ministers, threatened with deprivation, reminded the king of all they and their party had done for his restoration, and then implored his majesty to suspend the execution of the Act of Uniformity for three months longer, by his letters to the bishops, by proclamation, by an act of council, or in any other way his majesty should think fit. Charles made them a positive promise that he would do what they desired; and this promise was solemnly given to them in the presence of Monk, who was still considered as leaning toward the Presbyterians through his wife. But Clarendon stepped in and urged the absolute necessity of enforcing obedience to the Act of Uniformity without delay or connivance; and he told the king that it would not be in his power to preserve from deprivation those ministers that would not submit to it. This is Clarendon's account, almost in his own words. He tells us, indeed, that he was very tender of the king's honor, and told his majesty that, having engaged his word, he ought to perform what he had promised. But Clarendon knew that Charles never regarded his word, and he had given him a strong inducement to break it. Some of the bishops were then summoned to Hampton Court, and the question was debated in the presence of the king, the chancellor, the lord-general (Monk), the Duke of Ormond, the chief justice, the attorney-general, and the secretaries of state. "The bishops," says Clarendon, "were very much troubled that those fellows should still presume to give his majesty so much vexation, and that they should have such access to him. They gave such arguments against the doing what was desired as could not be answered; and, for themselves, they desired to be excused for not conniving in any degree at

[1] Burnet says, "It was generally thought the government had lost more than it gained by his death." The time-serving and thin-hearted Pepys, who no doubt would have witnessed the death of a dozen Vanes rather than have lost his snug place in the Admiralty, says, "The courage of Sir H. Vane at his death is talked on everywhere as a miracle . . . The Lieutenant of the Tower, upon my demanding how Sir H. Vane died, told me that he died in a passion; but all confess with so much courage as never man did. . . . W. S. told me that certainly Sir H. Vane must be gone to heaven, for he died as much a martyr and saint as ever man did; and that the king hath lost more by that man's death than he will get again a good while. At all which I know not what to think; but, I confess I do think that the bishops will never be able to carry it so high as they do."

[2] This Downing had been Cromwell's ambassador at the Hague, but, being ready to do any kind of work, he was continued in his post by Charles. He employed a perfidious artifice to get possession of his victims, who had once been his friends and patrons. Even Pepys is indignant at this "perfidious rogue." He says, "Sir W. Penn, talking to me this afternoon of what a strange thing it is for Downing to do this, he told me of a speech he made to the Lords States of Holland, telling them to their faces that he observed that he was not received with the respect and observance now that he was when he came from the traitor and rebel Cromwell; by whom, I am sure, he hath got all he hath got in the world—and they know it, too," the breach of the act of parliament, and that his majesty's giving such a declaration or recommendation (for the three months' respite) would be the greatest wound to the church, and to the government thereof, that it could receive."[1] As a matter of course, the crown-lawyers sided with the bishops; and so, "upon the whole matter, the king was converted; and, with great bitterness against that people in general, and against the particular persons, whom he had always received too graciously, concluded that he would not do what was desired, and that the connivance should not be given to any of them. The bishops departed full of satisfaction with the king's resolution."[2] Accordingly, upon the day prescribed, which the suffering Presbyterians compared to the great St. Bartholomew massacre of the French, the Act of Uniformity was enforced in all its rigor.[3] Some complied with the terms for the sake of their families, but upward of two thousand ministers refused and were thrust out of their livings. The Long Parliament had assigned a fifth of the revenues of the church for the support of the Episcopalian clergy whom they dispossessed, but now the Episcopalians allowed nothing of the sort. "This," says Burnet, "raised a grievous outcry over the nation. . . . Some few, and but few, of the Episcopal party were troubled at this severity, or apprehensive of the very ill effects it was like to have. Here were very many men, much valued, some on better grounds and others on worse, who were now cast out ignominiously, reduced to great poverty, provoked by much spiteful usage, and cast upon those popular practices that both their principles and their circumstances seemed to justify." But it was not merely the Presbyterian ministers and their flocks that suffered; all the Non-conformists (which now had become the general term, as that of Puritans had been formerly) were visited by a sharp persecution, their conventicles being everywhere suppressed and their preachers and many of themselves cast into prison as men guilty of the double sin of heresy and disloyalty. Hoping nothing from the laws or the parliament of their country, these men projected extensive emigrations to Holland, to New England, to other plantations beyond the Atlantic, to any spot where they might be safe from the "prelates' rage." Upon this the Earl of Bristol, the rash and eccentric Lord Digby of the Civil Wars, and as rash and eccentric now as ever, conceived a plan into which the leading Catholics entered very readily. This plan was to procure, under cover of indulgence to the Protestant Non-conformists, whose departure from the country would be most mischievous to trade and industry, a wide and liberal toleration, which would include all that did not conform—and themselves, as papists, with the rest. The project pleased the king, and did not displease the minor sects; but the Presbyterians preferred being persecuted to sharing in a toleration with the papists; and the bishops and the high-church party, who were for a strict conformity on the part of all sects whatsoever, had abated none of their old dread or detestation of the Roman church. Charles, however, influenced by his brother the Duke of York, by Bristol, by Secretary Bennet, and by other avowed or concealed papists, put forth a Declaration of Indulgence.[1] Whatever were his motives, this was indisputably Charles's best act; but we shall presently see that the bigotry of part of his subjects did not allow him to maintain it. In the preamble to the Declaration of Indulgence, Charles artfully, yet with some truth as far as the question of religious toleration was concerned, shifted the odium of the infractions of the Breda Declaration from himself to the parliament. He then declared that, having provided for the maintenance of the true Protestant religion, he was glad to lay hold of this occasion to renew to all his subjects concerned in his former promises of indulgence, by a true tenderness of conscience, the assurance that he would incline the wisdom of parliament at the approaching session to concur with him in making some act to enable him to exercise that power of dispensing which he conceived to be inherent to the crown, and so to allow more freedom to those who modestly and without scandal performed their devotions in their own way. But what contributed to increase the suspicion entertained as to his intentions was the length and warmth with which he spoke of his Catholic subjects, directly setting off their loyalty and devotion to his father of blessed memory, and to himself, against the disloyalty of those sectarians who, "under the name of zealous Protestants, had employed both fire and sword to overthrow the throne."[2]

Nearly at the same time the whole English na-

[3] Burnet says—"St. Bartholomew's day was pitched on, that, if they were then deprived, they should lose the profits of the whole year, since the tithes are commonly due at Michaelmas. The Presbyterians remembered what a St. Bartholomew's had been held at Paris ninety years before, which was the day of that massacre, and did not stick to compare the one to the other. The Book of Common Prayer, with the new corrections, was that to which they were to subscribe; but the corrections were so long a-preparing, and the vast number of copies—above two thousand—that were to be wrought off for all the parish churches of England, made the impression go on so slowly, that there were few books set out to sale when the day came. So, many that were well affected to the church, but that made conscience of subscribing to a book that they had not seen, left their benefices on that very account. Some made a journey to London on purpose to see it. With so much precipitation was that matter driven on that it seemed expected that the clergy should subscribe implicitly to a book they had never seen. This was done by too many, as I was informed by some of the bishops."—Own Times. There is abundance of authority to confirm this account of the indecent haste used, and the effects of it. "It is worth your knowledge that so great was the zeal in carrying on this church affair, and so blind was the obedience required, that, if you compute the time in passing this act with the time allowed for the clergy to subscribe the Book of Common Prayer thereby established, you shall plainly find it could not be printed and distributed so as one man in forty could have seen and read the book they did so perfectly assent and consent to."—Letter from a Person of Quality, in Locke's Works.

[1] It is dated the 26th of December, 1662. Clarendon attributes the blame of it to Ashley Cooper (Shaftesbury), who had passed, by turns, for Presbyterian and Independent, but who, like his master, King Charles, had neither bigotry nor any strong attachment to any religion. The chancellor also informs us that, to crown all the hopes of the papists, "the lady"—that is Castlemaine, the king's mistress, in whose apartment half the business of government was transacted—"declared herself of that faith, and inveighed sharply against the church she had been bred in."—Life. But he says nothing about the conversion of his own daughter, the Duchess of York, which took place soon after.

tion, without any distinction as to sects or parties, was disgusted by the sale of Dunkirk—that place which had been acquired by Oliver Cromwell, and which had been held of such importance even by the Convention Parliament who called home Charles, that several months after his arrival they had passed a bill annexing it to the imperial crown of this realm; being encouraged thereto by Clarendon, who, on several public occasions, both before and after the vote, dwelt with pompous rhetoric on the subject.[1] When Charles made up his mind to "chaffer away" the conquest of the "magnanimous usurper," there were three bidders in the market—Spain, from whom the place had been taken; Holland, that wished to secure it as a bulwark against the now encroaching and powerful French; and France, that longed for it as an extension of frontier, and a beginning to the occupation of all Belgium and Holland to boot. All three bid high; but Charles expected more services from the growing power of France than he could hope for from the fast-declining power of Spain or from the cautious government of Holland (he and Clarendon were actually engaged in a secret negotiation with Louis XIV. for a French force of 10,000 foot and some cavalry to subdue what remained of the liberties of England); and, after driving a long and hard bargain, Dunkirk was given up to France for five millions of livres, payable in three years by bills of different dates. It is true that the value of Dunkirk as a possession and dependency of England was exaggerated; but this exaggeration was a deep-rooted, popular belief, and, apart from their interests, the people considered themselves as wounded in their pride and honor by the abandonment of the place. Those who knew any thing of foreign affairs saw the dangerous impropriety of facilitating and forwarding the schemes of Louis's ambition; it remained for ages after as a dogma among our statesmen that the occupation of the Low Countries by France would be destructive to England; and few will, even now, admit, considering it in all its bearings, that the sale of Dunkirk to Louis was either a politic or an otherwise defensible measure. In the views of every patriot of the time it was a measure full of danger and infamy; but what would it have been had they known the diplomatic secrets which have since come to light.[1]

[1] "Whether it would really have been of great advantage to England, had it been preserved, may be doubted; as, though from its situation it might have afforded a shelter for our privateers instead of those of the enemy, a retreat for our fleets if beaten, or a safe landing-place for our armies; all these advantages would apparently have been fully balanced by the very large expense attending its preservation. These, however, are the views which a more enlightened system of policy has taught the world. In the days of Clarendon they were very much unknown. It was then thought that establishments on the continent of Europe were of the greatest importance to England, and were to be preserved as the most valuable appendages of the British crown. Hence the despair of Mary at the loss of Calais; hence the anxiety of Cromwell to obtain Dunkirk as an equivalent for that loss; and hence the universal cry of reprobation through the country when the latter place was lost to us forever."—Historical Inquiries respecting the Character of Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, by the Hon. George Agar Ellis (the late Lord Dover).

[1] See Memoires D'Estrades, the French diplomatist who negotiated the sale.—Œuvres de Louis XIV.—Clarendon's State Papers and Life. A recent writer, of strong opinions, seems to think that the sale was very justifiable, and that it was justified by the long acquiescence of the parliament. But if that parliament, which was as base as the king, said nothing of the subject for several years, its calculated silence was not imitated by the nation. Everywhere the people denounced the sale; and the merchants of London (no bad judges, by the way, of the value of Dunkirk) offered, through the lord mayor, any sum of money to the king so that Dunkirk might not be alienated. And we are disposed to believe that, but for the hopes entertained that Louis would afford him the means of making himself as absolute as his Most Christian Majesty, Charles would have turned aside from the unpopular measure, and contented himself with some large annual allowance

A.D. 1663. The parliament reassembled on the 18th of February, and presently fell with exalted zeal upon the king's Declaration of Indulgence; and the bill to give the crown a dispensing power without consent of parliament was abandoned in the Lords, where the bishops were vehement against it, and it was deprecated in both Houses, which joined in representing to Charles the alarming growth and increase of popery and of Jesuits in the kingdom. The Commons, however, voted him a grant of four subsidies, and then, their best work being done, he was about to prorogue the parliament, when the Earl of Bristol delayed that measure by suddenly impeaching the lord chancellor. But with the help of the judges, who declared against the legality of the charges, the matter soon fell to the ground: Bristol absconded; and the prorogation took place on the 27th of July. During the long holyday which followed, the court pursued their old course of revelry and riot, and a very insignificant insurrection took place at Farnley Wood in Yorkshire. "The Duke of Buckingham set to work one Gere, sheriff of Yorkshire, and others, who sent out trepanners among the discontented people, to stir them to insurrection to restore the old parliament, gospel ministry, and English liberty. which specious things found very many ready to entertain them; and abundance of simple people were caught in the net, whereof some lost their lives and others fled."[1] It appears, from other and better evidence, that the government, if it did not actually foment it, was perfectly well aware of the existence of this plot, which was promoted by religious persecution, but which did not include a single person of any rank or consequence.

A.D. 1664. On the reassembling of parliament, on the 16th of March, Charles made a great deal of the affair of Farnley Wood. He told the two Houses that that plot was extensive and dangerous; that some of those conspirators maintained that the authority of the Long Parliament still existed in the surviving members; and that others computed that, by a clause in the triennial act, the present parliament was, by lapse of time, at an end several months since, and that therefore, as the court issued no new writs, the people might themselves choose members for a new parliament. He said that he had often read over that bill, and, though there was no color (as, indeed, there was not) for the fancy of the determination of the parliament (that is, its ending in three years), yet he would not deny that he had always expected them to reconsider "the wonderful clauses"[2] in that bill, which had passed in a time "very uncareful for the dignity of the crown. He now requested them to look again at that triennial bill: he said that he loved parliaments—that he was much beholden to parliaments—that he did not think the crown could ever be happy without frequent parliaments. "But assure yourselves," said he, in conclusion, "if I should think otherwise, I would never suffer a parliament to come together by the means prescribed by that bill." In this language was implied a bolder threat than had ever been used by his father; but Charles was aware that the Hampdens and the Pyms were no more: he knew the baseness of the present parliament, which had been already nibbling at the triennial act more than once,[1] and which now, without a murmur, annihilated that bulwark of liberty. This was so grateful to Charles that he went in person to the House of Lords to pass the repealing bill, and to thank them. He told them that every good Englishman would thank them for it; for the triennial act could only have served to discredit parliaments, to make the crown jealous of parliaments, and parliaments jealous of the crown, and persuade neighbor princes that England was not governed by a monarch.[2] Such is the account of this momentous transaction as given by Clarendon, who, in his tenderness to royalty, forgets to mention that the king assured them he would not be a day more without a parliament on this account, and that the repealing bill contained a provision that parliaments should not in future be intermitted for above three years at the most. But, as an eminent living writer has observed, the necessity of the securities in the triennial act, and the mischief of that servile loyalty which now abrogated those securities, became manifest at the close of the present reign, nearly four years having elapsed between the dissolution of Charles's last parliament and his death.[3] In this same session was passed the infamous bill called the Conventicle Act. It forbade the Non-conformists to frequent any conventicles or places of worship not of the establishment, and it imposed a scale of punishments ranging from three months' imprisonment to seven years' transportation. Clarendon applauds the act, and says that, if it had been rigorously executed, it would no doubt have produced a thorough conformity. The chancellor's notions of vigor of execution must have been high indeed, if he thought that what actually took place was weak or mild. The execution of the act was not only committed to the civil authorities, but to militia officers and the king's forces, who broke open every house where they knew or fancied there were a few Non-conformists gathered together to worship God in their own way. The close, unwholesome prisons were soon crammed with conscientious victims—with men and women, from the merchants. Pepys, who hoped to get some of the French livres "to pay the navy"—a hope in which he was disappointed, for Charles employed the money on less national objects—gives several indications of the popular feeling at the time. The diarist says, under different dates—"I am sorry to hear that the news of the selling of Dunkirk is taken so generally ill as I find it is among the merchants." "Public matters are full of discontent, what with the sale of Dunkirk and my Lady Castlemaine and her faction at court."

[2] These wonderful clauses, that were wormwood to the king and all the absolutists, were to the effect that, if the king did not summon a fresh parliament within three years after a dissolution, the peers were to meet and issue writs of their own accord; if they did not within a certain time perform this duty, the sheriffs of every county were to take it on themselves; and in default of all constituted authorities, the electors might assemble, without any regular summons, to choose representatives. Clarendon can scarcely speak with decent language of this bill. He calls it "a bill that had passed in a very jealous and seditious time, when the wickedness was first hatching that ripened afterward to dismal perfection:" but he had himself voted for that bill nevertheless, when it was passed in 1641.

with old and young—while others were ruined in their estates by bribing and purchasing the insecure connivance of the most corrupt and rapacious of the myrmidons of the court. And when (as now and then happened) a few enthusiasts were driven to madness and insurrection, they were strung up on the gallows a dozen or more at a time—this good-natured king rarely or never exercising the prerogative of mercy in their behalf. In the middle of the month of May, Charles, "after giving such thanks to them as they deserved," prorogued parliament till November.[1]

In Scotland, where there were few or no conventicles or sects—the intolerance of the kirk having kept them down—the whole force of this conventicle act was turned against the Presbyterians, whose faith, whether good or bad, was decidedly the national religion. "All people," says Burnet, "were amazed at the severity of the English act; but the bishops in Scotland took heart upon it, and resolved to copy from it: so an act passed there almost in the same terms."[2] Lord Lauderdale, who had supplanted Middleton, and made himself supreme in Scotland, which he governed for many years like a Turkish pashalic, forgetting his old Presbyterianism, at the passing of the bill expressed great zeal for episcopacy and the church; and the voice of the Earl of Kincardine, an enemy to all persecution, was drowned in the plaudits of the time-serving majority. By another act the Scottish parliament made an offer to the king of an army of 20,000 foot and 2000 horse, to be ready, upon summons, to march with forty days' provision into any part of his majesty's dominions, to oppose invasions, to suppress insurrections, or to do any other duty for the authority or greatness of the crown. The Earl of Lauderdale wished by this to let the king see what use he might make of Scotland if he should attempt to set up arbitrary government in England by force of arms. The Scots—according to the reasoning of this able and resolute, but unprincipled minister—had not much money to offer, but they could send him good and hardy soldiers. Invigorated by the Scotch conventicle act, Archbishop Sharp "drove very violently," establishing what proved to be a high commission court—one of the worst tyrannies cast down by the civil war—and persecuting his former brethren of the kirk without pity, and without calculation of the personal danger he was thereby incurring. This aspiring churchman, not satisfied with his immense and unconstitutional ecclesiastical powers, attempted to get himself made the head of the law in Scotland; and, though he failed in this, his creature, the Lord Rothes, was made chancellor; and Rothes browbeat the magistrates and lawyers, and twisted the law as Sharp thought fit. The prisons in Scotland were soon crammed like those of England, the prisoners meeting with still worse usage. Sometimes they were fined, and the younger sort whipped about the streets. Troops were quartered throughout the country to force the people to respect the bishops, the liturgy, and the new-imposed Episcopalian preachers. These troops were commanded by Sir James Turner, "who was naturally fierce, but he was mad when he was drunk, and that was very often." He scoured the country, and received such lists as the new ministers brought him of those who would not go to church and use the Book of Common Prayer; and then, without any proof or legal conviction, he fined them according to their substance or his own caprice, and sent soldiers to live upon them till the fines were paid.[1] The proceedings in the law-courts, and in all the departments of government, resembled those of an inquisition; and yet Archbishop Sharp was never satisfied, but complained, like Clarendon, that there was not vigor enough. He accused Lauderdale to the king; he intrigued to bring Middleton into business again; and when he found that he could not succeed, that his plot was discovered, he fell a-trembling and weeping before the mighty and choleric pasha, protesting that he meant no harm; that he was only sorry that Lauderdale's friends were upon all occasions pleading for favor to the fanatics.

[2] Own Times

The English parliament reassembled on the 24th of November, with cries of foreign war and anticipations of victory and plunder. The Duke of York, as lord high admiral and governor of the African Company on the coast of Guinea, ordered the seizure of some Dutch settlements on that coast; the Dutch retaliated and captured a number of English merchantmen. Moved by their old commercial jealousy of the Dutch, many of the English merchants clamored for a war: the king, hoping to appropriate to himself a good part of the war-money that should be voted, fell in with their humor; peaceful negotiations, which might easily have settled the matters in dispute, were interrupted; and both countries prepared their fleets. Ministers now detailed to the Houses all the wrongs which the king and kingdom had sustained from the insolent subjects of the United Provinces; and the Commons, by a large majority, voted a supply of £2,000,000, the king protesting that, as he was compelled to enter into this war for the protection, honor, and benefit of his subjects, so he would never make a peace but upon the obtaining and securing those ends for which the war was begun. The city of London also furnished several sums of money, for which they afterward received the thanks of parliament.[2]

A.D. 1665. As soon as the war broke out, and before any battle was fought, a most terrible plague broke out also in the city of London, which scattered all the inhabitants that were able to remove elsewhere, interrupted the trade of the nation, and in the course of five months swept away about a hun-

[1] "He told me," says Burnet, "he had no regard to any law, but acted as he was commanded, in a military way: he confessed it went often against the grain with him to serve such a debauched and worthless company as the clergy generally were; and that sometimes he did not act up to the rigor of his orders, for which he was often chid both by Lord Rothes and Sharp, but was never checked for his illegal and violent proceedings. And though the complaints of him were very high, so that, when he was afterward seized on by the party, they intended to make a sacrifice of him, yet, when they looked into his orders, and found that his proceedings, how fierce soever, fell short of these, they spared him, as a man that had merited by being so gentle among them."

dred thousand souls—the greatest havoc, it was said, that any plague had ever made in England. "This," continues Burnet, "did dishearten all people; and, coming in the very time when so unjust a war was begun, it had a dreadful appearance. All the king's enemies, and the enemies of monarchy, said, here was a manifest character of God's heavy displeasure upon the nation; as, indeed, the ill life the king led, and the viciousness of the whole court, gave but a melancholy prospect." On the 3d of June, while this pestilence was raging, and half the houses in the city were marked with the ominous tablet—"The Lord have mercy upon us!"[1]—the Duke of York encountered the Dutch fleet, under the command of Admiral Opdam, off Lowestoffe. The battle was terrible: the Dutch lost Opdam, who was blown up with his ship and crew, three other admirals, an immense number of men (stated by the English at eight or ten thousand), and eighteen ships that were sunk or blown up; the English lost Rear-admiral Sansum, Vice-admiral Lawson, three captains, the Earl of Falmouth, Muskerry, and some other volunteers of rank who were serving on board the duke's fleet; but their loss in men was comparatively inconsiderable, and they decidedly had the advantage. Toward evening, the Dutch, crippled and disheartened, sheered off for the Texel, and the English stood after them under a press of sail; but the Duke of York went to bed, and Lord Brounker, a gentleman of his bedchamber, went upon deck and told Penn, the commanding officer, "as if from the duke," that he must slacken sail. Penn, to the astonishment of the fleet, obeyed this order, and thereby all hope of overtaking the Dutch was lost. The duke, whose hereditary duplicity is at least as well proved as his courage, seemed amazed at this manœuver; but it was generally believed in the fleet that he had really given the order, and neither Brounker nor Penn ever met with that punishment which his severity would have awarded if either had acted on his own responsibility. According to Burnet, Penn told the duke that, if he meant to fight again, he must prepare for hotter work, as the courage of the Dutch would grow with their desperation. The historian adds, "The Earl of Montague, who was then a volunteer, and one of the duke's court, said to me, it was very visible that made an impression. And all the duke's domestics said he had got honor enough; why should he venture a second time? The duchess had also given a strict charge to all the duke's servants to do all they could to hinder him to engage too far. . . . . . Lord Montague did believe that the duke was struck, seeing the Earl of Falmouth, the king's favorite, and two other persons of quality, killed very near him; and that he had no mind to engage again, and that Penn was privately with him." The Earl of Sandwich, who was in the action, and who had expected to have the chief command, was irritated at seeing that the printed relation published by government did not give him one word of honor. He assured Pepys that though, by accident, the prince was in the van in the beginning of the fight, yet all the rest of the day he (Sandwich) was in the van, and bore the brunt; that, notwithstanding all the noise about the duke, he had hardly a shot in his side, or a man killed, whereas his own ship had above thirty shots in her hull, had not a mast or yard left whole, but was the most battered ship of the fleet, and lost the most men, saving the Mary, Captain Smith's ship; that the most the duke did was almost out of gun-shot; but that the duke did, indeed, come up to his rescue after he had fought a long time with four of the enemy.[1] The duke and his courtiers returned from sea, "all fat and lusty, and ruddy, by being in the sun;"[1] and these gentlemen gave out that the victory was a great victory—that a greater had never been known in the world; but the English people had not forgotten Blake; and they were very critical upon the whole affair. The duke was rewarded by a grant of £120,000; yet it was thought expedient to remove him from the fleet, and to intrust the command to the Earl of Sandwich, a man whose courage and skill were not more conspicuous than his want of all principle. Sandwich got scent of a Dutch fleet from the East Indies very richly laden (the united cargoes being estimated as worth millions) which had taken refuge in the neutral port of Berghen, in Norway. The King of Denmark, the sovereign of the country, had some grounds of complaint against the Dutch government, and he was so tempted by the value of the fleet, that he agreed to allow Sandwich to capture them in his port, upon condition that he should have half of the rich prize. But Sandwich wanted the whole of the spoil; and, in spite of the warning of the governor of Berghen, who said that he could not let him enter till he received further instructions from his court, the English admiral ordered Captain Teddiman to dash into the port with twenty-two ships, and cut out all the Dutchmen. Teddiman encountered a tremendous fire, not only from the Dutch ships, but also from the Danish castle and land-batteries; five of his commanders were killed, and he was obliged to retreat with disgrace and loss. Sandwich did not repeat the attack, but went in search of easier prey, taking care to appropriate a good portion of what he got for his own private use.

As the plague still raged in London, the court had removed to Oxford, and there parliament reassembled on the 9th of October, to vote a fresh supply of £1,250,000 for the carrying on of the war. The king spoke of traitorous enemies to the crown at home, that were in league with the public enemies abroad; and Monk, who took charge of the capital during the plague, had hanged a few desperate enthusiasts that were maddened by that daily prospect of horror. The high-church party that controlled the cabinet, and that were all-powerful in the House of Commons, continued to blend the church with the state, and the state with the church, and to insist that the king would never be able to establish a truly regal authority unless he permitted the clergy to coerce the consciences of his subjects; and at Oxford, in a congenial atmosphere, they introduced and carried the memorable Five Mile Act. In the preamble to this bill they declared that the Non-conformist ministers instilled principles of schism and rebellion into the people; in the body of it they enacted that it should be penal for any Non-conformist minister to teach in a school or come within five miles (except as a traveler in passing) of any city, borough, or corporate town, or any place whatever in which he had preached or taught since the passing of the Act of Uniformity, unless he had previously taken the oath of non-resistance.[1] Having gained this triumph, the high-church party brought a bill into the House of Commons for imposing the oath of non-resistance upon the whole nation; and, but for an accident, this parliament at Oxford would have passed the bill. "And the providence by which it was thrown out was very remarkable; for Mr. Peregrine Bertie, being newly chosen, was that morning introduced into the House by his brother, the now Earl of Lindsey, and Sir Thomas Osborne, now lord treasurer (Danby), who all three gave their votes against that bill; and the numbers were so even upon the division, that their three votes carried the question against it."[2] But though the bill was lost, the bishops and parsons acted and preached as if it had been passed, and as if the people of England were slaves both by act of parliament and by the word of God. Their pastoral charges and their sermons rolled in louder thunder than that of Laud and Manwaring upon the divine right of kings, the duty of passive obedience in subjects, and the eternal damnation provided for those who should resist the Lord's anointed or the ministers of the only true church upon earth. Meanwhile the debauchery of the court continued on the increase, and Oxford became the scene of scandalous intrigues, drinking, and gaming. "The lady," though allowed to dictate to chancellors and secretaries of state, and to dispose of benefices and promotions in this loyal church, was obliged to share the king's affections with various other women; the Duke of York in these respects closely copied his elder brother; and at Oxford the duchess (Clarendon's daughter) began to retaliate in kind.[3] Well might Clarendon exclaim, "It was a time when all license in discourse and in actions was spread over the kingdom, to the heart-breaking of many good men, who had terrible apprehensions of the consequence of it!"

[3] Burnet, who mentions no name, says, "At Oxford there was then a very graceful young man of quality that belonged to her court, whose services were so acceptable that she was thought to look at him in a particular manner: this was so represented to the duke, that he, being resolved to emancipate himself into more open practices, took up a jealousy, and put the person out of his court with so much precipitation, that the thing became very public by this means."—Own Times. But Pepys gives the name at length, and allots the duchess two lovers instead of one:—"As an infinite secret, my lord (Sandwich) tells me the factions are high between the king and the duke, and all the court are in an uproar with their loose amours—the Duke of York being in love desperately with Mistress (Miss) Stewart. Nay, that the duchess herself is fallen in love with her new master of the horse, one Harry Sidney, and another, Harry Savill."—Diary. The Harry Sidney here mentioned was younger brother of the republican Algernon Sidney, who had remained abroad ever since the Restoration, and who was at this moment devising means for restoring the commonwealth. Harry Savill was one of the grooms of the bedchamber to the Duke of York and a brother to Sir George Savill, for whom the duke and his wife earnestly solicited a peerage, though, as Clarendon tells us, this Sir George was "a man of very ill reputation, and void of all sense of religion." In the case of Miss Stewart here mentioned, as in several others, the king and the duke both pursued the same woman, and were madly jealous of each other.

during the winter months, and disappeared altogether in February, after a tremendous hurricane. The court ventured as far as Hampton Court, and at last, when all danger was over, the king returned to Whitehall, to insult the miseries of his people with fresh exhibitions of riot and licentiousness.[1] During his absence the seamen of the royal navy, upon whose bravery and conduct the honor and safety of the nation depended, had been left to lie starving and moaning in the streets of London for lack of money to pay their arrears. And now the war threatened to be more formidable than it had been; for the French king, by a sudden turn in his politics, made common cause with the Dutch. De Ruyter came out of the Texel with a splendid fleet of eighty-four sail, and Louis promised to join him with a small fleet—all that he as yet possessed—which was in the Mediterranean. The English fleet, commanded by Monk and Prince Rupert, had been divided. It was not expected that the Dutch could get to sea so soon, and Rupert had steered westward with the white squadron, consisting of thirty sail, to look after the French, who were expected from the Mediterranean. Early the next morning, the 1st of June, Monk, to his great surprise, discovered De Ruyter and his fleet lying at anchor half-channel over. He called a council of war: Sir John Harman, a brave officer, and "most sober man there," urged that it would be rash to begin the fight then, with such an inferior force, and with a wind and sea that would prevent the use of their lower tier of guns; but his grace of Albemarle, who had taken to drinking to excess, and who was probably then drunk, resolved to wait neither for weather nor Prince Rupert, and he gave the signal for attack. This order was obeyed with great spirit; the English had the weather-gage, and the wind at southwest blowing a stiff gale carried them so rapidly upon the Dutch that they had not time to weigh anchor, but they cut their cables and away for their own coast. Monk followed them, though he had only sixty ships, which were so laid down by the gale that they could not open their lower portals to leeward, while the Dutch, facing them with their broadsides to windward, had the free use of all their tiers of guns. Sir William Berkley led the van. When they got off the coast of Dunkirk, Monk, to avoid running on a sand-bank, made a sudden tack, which brought his topmast by the board; this forced him to lie-to for a long time; meanwhile Berkley kept his course, knowing nothing of what had happened to Monk, got engaged in the thick of the enemy, and was killed on his quarter-deck. His ship, after a gallant fight, was taken, and so was the Essex frigate. Sir John Harman fell among nine ships of the Zealand squadron, and was grappled by two fire-ships, but he fought himself free, killed a vice-admiral, and, when all his masts were shot away by chain-shot, and himself badly wounded, he escaped under jury-masts. In this day's "mad fight" the English suffered severely, and nearly all their ships that came into action[1] were ruined in their masts and rigging by the chain-shot—a new invention attributed to the great De Witt. In the night the Dutch received some reinforcement; yet on the morrow Monk renewed the combat, and all that day the English mariners vindicated their old reputation, fighting most bravely against a far superior force. Night again separated the combatants; and again the dawn of day—the third day of carnage—saw the fight renewed. But now Monk fought retreating, and, after taking out the men, he burned several of his most disabled ships. Toward evening he espied the white squadron under Prince Rupert making toward him. Rupert, who ought not to have gone at all, had not gone farther westward than to St. Helen's, where he was stopped by intelligence that the Dutch fleet was at sea. He put about for Dover, but he did not reach that point till late on the night of the 1st of June (the first day of the battle); and when he got into the Downs he neither heard any sound of battle nor could obtain any information. He then made for the Gun-Fleet, an important anchorage near Harwich, previously appointed by Monk for their meeting; but now the wind was against him. While beating about on the 3d of June, he heard a heavy cannonading, "spread his flying canvas to the sound,"[2] and came up just in time to save Monk from destruction. That evening the Prince Royal—esteemed the best man-of-war in the world, and the best gunned—stuck on a sand-bank and was taken by the Dutch. Next day the fight was renewed, both sides fighting more desperately than ever, until a thick fog interrupted the slaughter. When the fog dispersed the Dutch were seen in retreat, but the English were in no condition to follow them. "The court," says Burnet, "gave out that it was a victory; and public thanksgivings were ordered, which was a horrid mocking of God and a lying to the world: though we had in one respect reason to thank God that we had not lost our whole fleet."[1] By the month of July De Ruyter was again at sea with a stronger fleet than ever; but Monk and Rupert gave him a decided defeat, drove him back in rage and despair to the Texel, and detached Sir Thomas Holmes with a considerable force, which scoured the coast and burned two ships of war, one hundred and fifty merchantmen and fishing craft, and one or two defenseless villages.

[1] His absence in the time of danger and his long delay in returning were much noticed. "Matters," says Pepys, "must needs go bad, while all the town, and every boy in the street, openly cries, 'The king can not go away till my Lady Castlemaine be ready to come along with him,' she being lately put to bed; and that he visits her and Mrs. Stewart every morning before he eats his breakfast."

But a mightier conflagration was at hand. The summer had been the hottest and driest that had been known for many years, and London, being then for the most part built of timber filled up with plaster, was as dry and combustible as firewood;

[1] Roger Coke, who gives a very particular account of this battle, which he says he had from Sir John Harman himself, says that Sir Thomas Teddiman, now rear-admiral of the red refused to engage.

[2] Dryden, Annus Mirabilis.

[1] In this tremendous action innumerable professional mistakes were committed by the English officers, who, for the greater part, were young men, very ignorant of sea affairs. The old officers who had served under the great Blake had been nearly all dismissed on account of their republicanism or their non-conformity; and the Duke of York had filled up their places with a set of lordlings, pages, and courtiers. Pepys, whose situation as secretary to the admiralty afforded him ample means of knowing the real state of the fleet, is full of lamentations upon this head. Among many other things, he says, "The truth is, that the gentlemen-captains will undo us, for they are not to be kept in order; their friends about the king and duke, and their own houses, are so free that it is not for any person but the duke himself to have any command over them. . . . We did begin to discourse of the young genteel captains, which he (Admiral Penn) was very free with me in speaking his mind of the unruliness of them, and what a loss the king hath of his old men. . . . He told me that our very commanders, nay, our very flag-officers, do stand in need of exercising among themselves, and discoursing the business of commanding a fleet: he telling me that even one of our flagmen in the fleet did not know which tack lost the wind or kept it in the last engagement."—Diary.

and in the middle of the night between the 2d and 3d of September, a fire broke out "that raged for three days, as if it had a commission to devour every thing that was in its way. It began at a baker's house near London Bridge, on the spot where the obelisk called the Monument now stands, and it was not stopped until it had reduced nearly the whole of the city, from the Tower to Temple Bar, to a sightless heap of cinders and ashes."[1] In the midst of this terrible conflagration a report was raised and spread that it was the effect of a conspiracy of the French and Dutch with the papists: and the people believed that all the Frenchmen in the city were drawn together to destroy with the sword such as escaped the fire. A stupefied and desperate mob ran up and down seizing upon all the foreigners and English Catholics they could find;

[1] Clarendon says, "The fire and the wind continued in the same excess all Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, till afternoon, and flung and scattered brands burning into all quarters; the nights more terrible than the days, and the light the same, the light of the fire supplying that of the sun. . . . Let the cause be what it would, the effect was very terrible; for above two parts of three of that great city were burned to ashes, and those the most rich and wealthy parts of the city, where the greatest warehouses and the best shops stood. The Royal Exchange, with all the streets about it—Lombard-street, Cheapside, Paternoster-row, St. Paul's Church, and almost all the other churches in the city, with the Old Bailey, Ludgate, all Paul's churchyard, even to the Thames, and the greatest part of Fleet street, all which were places the best inhabited, were all burned without one house remaining. The value, or estimate of what that devouring fire consumed, over and above the houses, could never be computed in any degree."—Life.

but, to the lasting honor of the London populace, desperate and bewildered as they were, and mad with excitement, they shed no blood, leaving such iniquities to be perpetrated by the fabricators of popish plots, the parliament, and the judges. A mad Frenchman, of the name of Hubert, who was taken and thrown into Newgate by the mob, and who had been for many years looked upon as insane, accused himself of having been in a plot with two other poor Frenchmen, and of having set fire to the first house. His evidence or confession plainly indicated the state of his intellect, and the chief justice told the king that all his discourse was so disjointed that he could not believe him guilty. Nor was there one man to prosecute or accuse him. According to Clarendon, neither the judges nor any person present at his trial believed his story, but all saw that he was a poor distracted wretch, weary of his life, and anxious to part with it in this way. Yet the jury found him guilty, and the king and the judges, notwithstanding their conviction of Hubert's insanity, allowed him to be executed. "Certain it is," adds Clarendon, whose account is confirmed on all hands, "that, upon the strictest examination that could be afterward made by the king's command, and then by the diligence of the House, that, upon the general jealousy and rumor, made a committee, that was very diligent and solicitous to make that discovery, there was never any probable evidence (that poor creature's only excepted) that there was any other cause of that woful fire than the displeasure of God Almighty: the first accident of the beginning in a baker's house, where there was so great a stock of fagots, and the neighborhood of much combustible matter, of pitch and rosin, and the like, led it in an instant from house to house through Thames-street, with the agitation of so terrible a wind to scatter and disperse it."[1] While the terrors occasioned by this conflagration remained on the minds of men, the bishops and magistrates suspended their persecuting rage, and many of the Non-conformist ministers preached in the midst of the smoking ruins to contrite and attentive audiences. At the same season of calamity many excellent divines of the established church exerted themselves in the most praiseworthy manner. Acts of Christian charity were performed on all sides, old animosities were mutually forgotten, nothing was remembered but the present desolation, "all kinds of people expressed a marvelous charity toward those who appeared to be undone."[2]

On the 21st of September, while the citizens were yet bivouacking on the ruins of London, the parliament reassembled, after nearly a year's recess, and voted the king £1,800,000 for prosecuting the ill-managed war. But it was soon made evident that a regular opposition to the court was gaining ground in both Houses. This opposition, though it included some few honest and patriotic men, was chiefly directed by the passions and interests of a selfish crew that were not a whit more honest or virtuous than the court, and it was headed by the profligate Duke of Buckingham, who had "a mortal quarrel with the lady." These men courted the Presbyterians and Non-conformists of all classes, got up a fresh cry against popery, and brought about the appointing a committee to examine and report on the alarming growth of that proscribed religion. Having thus disturbed the court in its religion, they proceeded to touch it in the purse; and they introduced a bill for appointing commissioners to examine the accounts of those who had received and issued the money for this war. Mistresses and ministers, and all men holding public employments, were thrown into consternation: they declared that this would be touching the royal prerogative in its most vital part; and Clarendon opposed the proceedings with all his might, exhorting the king, his master, to prevent these "excesses in parliament"—not "to suffer them to extend their jurisdiction to cases they had nothing to do with"—"to restrain them within their proper bounds and limits"—and affirming to the same eager listener that "this was such a new encroachment as had no bottom; and the scars were yet too fresh and green of those wounds which had been inflicted upon the kingdom from such usurpation." In the House of Lords an attempt was made to defeat the bill, which proposed nothing more than that those who voted the public money for the war should see how that money was spent; but the Commons hotly resented this interference with their privileges, and threatened to impeach the chancellor and the Lady Castlemaine; and thereupon Charles, in spite of Clarendon's advice "to be firm in the resolution he had taken," ordered the Lords to submit, and so the bill was allowed to pass. But the party that had won this victory knew not how to use it, or could not agree among themselves as to the division of the personal profit to be derived from it; and, in the end, it was turned into a mockery by the king's being allowed to appoint a commission of his own for auditing the accounts. Charles then told the Commons that they had dealt unkindly with him—that they had manifested a greater distrust than he deserved—that he had never broken his word; and parliament was prorogued, with evident ill humor on both sides, and Buckingham was deprived of all his places.[1]

During the session an insurrection, forced on by the detestable tyranny of Lauderdale and Archbishop Sharp, broke out in the west of Scotland, the strong-hold of the Covenanters. The people, after being ridden over by the dragoons of Turner, were excited by Semple, Maxwell, Welsh, Guthry, and other "fiery ministers;" and were told that the fire of London had put things in such confusion at court that any vigorous attempt would disorder all the king's affairs. So, on the 13th of November, they rose in a mass, seized Turner, and appointed a solemn fast-day to be held at Lanark. There they renewed the covenant, and drew up a manifesto, professing loyalty to the king, but calling for a redress of the grievances and oppression under which they groaned, and for the removal of episcopacy. Lauderdale was at court, and so Sharp managed this bishops' war with two troops of horse and a regiment of foot-guards. Dalziel, a military man of some reputation, commanded, under the archbishop, in the field. The insurgents, who now began to be called Whigamores, or Whigs, were badly officered, and had few gentlemen with them, for all the suspected had been "clapped up" long before. On the 28th of November they were attacked by Dalziel on the Pentland Hills: their ministers preached and prayed to infuse courage into them; and they sung the 74th and 78th Psalms; but, after stoutly resisting one charge of the guards, they were thrown into disorder, and then ran for their lives. Forty were killed on the spot, and one hundred and thirty were taken prisoners. Even in their first fury they had avoided the shedding of blood, and had even respected the life of the lawless Turner; but no mercy was shown to them in return. Sharp could not be mollified: ten were hanged upon one gibbet at Edinburgh, and thirty-five more were sent back to the west, and there hanged up before their own doors—the ministers of the established church treating them with great harshness, and declaring them all damned to all eternity for their rebellion. The archbishop made a keen search for all who had been in any way concerned in the insurrection; and, to extort confession, he employed a new torture of an infernal description, called the boots, in which the leg of the victim was crushed by a wedge driven in between the bone and a case or boot of iron in which it was inclosed. Though for the most part poor and obscure men, the victims bore their sufferings with heroic constancy, preferring death to the betraying of their friends. Maccail, a young preacher, was atrociously tortured and then executed under an unproved suspicion: he died in a rapture of joy, revealing nothing, and professing his adherence to the government. Dalziel, a wild drunkard, hanged a man because he would not tell where his father was, and killed many others without any form of trial. When he heard of any that would not go to church, he quartered soldiers upon them to eat them up. By these means people were forced to church; and the Episcopalian clergy began to consider that a golden age was coming. The earls of Tweeddale and Kincardine went up to court, and represented to the king that the severities were excessive and dangerous: they obtained some alleviation of them; but this was only temporary and partial.

Louis XIV., who had now other projects in hand, wished to keep out of the war; and Charles, being disappointed in his expectations of plunder and prize-money, was well disposed to peace. Negotiations between the three powers of France, Holland, and England, were opened at Breda; but hostilities were not suspended, and De Witt, being well aware of the condition of the English fleet, resolved to avenge his country for the injury it had sustained by the destructive, and, in part, wanton, expedition of Holmes. To save the money which parliament had voted, and to apply it to his own pleasures, Charles had neglected to pay the seamen and to fit out the fleet. The streets were again full of starving sailors; and only a few second and third-rate ships were in commission. In the beginning of the month of June, De Ruyter dashed into the Downs with a fleet of eighty sail and many fire-ships, blocked up the mouths of the Medway and the Thames, destroyed the fortifications at Dutch Fleet in the Medway: Burning of Sheerness. From a Drawing of the time of Charles II.

Sheerness, cut away the paltry defenses of booms and chains drawn across the rivers, and got to Chatham on the one side and nearly to Gravesend on the other. The Royal Charles, one of the best of our ships, was taken; the Royal James, the Oak, and London (all first rates), were burned. Upnor Castle had been left without gunpowder; and there was scarcely any gunpowder or shot in any of the ships. "I did hear," says Pepys, the secretary of the admiralty, "that there were many Englishmen on board the Dutch ships speaking to one another in English; and that they did cry and say, We did heretofore fight for tickets—now we fight for dollars!"[1] If De Ruyter had made for London

[1] The following are significant entries in the secretary's diary: "Several seamen came this morning to me to tell me that if I would get their tickets paid they would go and do all they could against the Dutch; but, otherwise, they would not venture being killed, and lose all they have already fought for; so that I was forced to try what I could do to get them paid. . . . And indeed the hearts as well as affections of the seamen are turned away; and in the open streets in Wapping, and up and down, the wives have cried publicly. This comes of your not paying our husbands; and now your work is undone, or done by hands that understand it not." Some time before this, while the

at once he might have burned all the shipping in the river; but while he was in the Medway, Prince Rupert threw up some strong batteries at Woolwich, and sunk a number of vessels to block up the passage. After doing a vast deal of mischief, and inflicting still more disgrace, the Dutch, at the end of June, sailed from the Downs, scoured the coast, and then returned in triumph to the Texel. In the month of August a treaty of peace was concluded at Breda. Charles had no great anxiety to redeem the honor of his arms; but he had entered into a secret treaty with the French king for the conquest of Spanish Flanders, which was to be followed, at some not distant time, by the subversion of the Dutch republic and a partition of territory. While smarting under this disgrace and loss, the people of London had clamored for "A parliament! a parliament!" The king, who had raised an army of 10,000 men without their consent, called his old parliament together on the 25th of July; but, without allowing them to proceed to any business, he dismissed them till the month of October. In the interval Clarendon was ruined by a vast cabal against him, whose proceedings were so illegal, and whose motives were so base, as almost to conceal the real iniquities of that despotic minister. The Duke of Buckingham, who had made his peace with Lady Castlemaine and recovered the king's favor, joined with Shaftesbury, Clifford, Lauderdale, Monk, Sir William Coventry, and others, in a concentrated attack upon the chancellor, and they were joined by many members of both Houses, some of whom hated him as Catholics, some as Presbyterians, and a few as patriots. The king himself had no great affection for his old servant; and Lady Castlemaine, the other mistresses, and the queen, were all his declared enemies. Even his own son-in-law, the Duke of York, was inimical to his interests, or lukewarm in regard to them;[1] and he undertook the unseemly task of intimating to him that the king thought it best and safest for himself that he should resign the great seal. Clarendon replied to this, that he knew there was a conspiracy against him, but that he would not be frightened from his post; that he could not believe he was so "very odious" to the parliament; that he would speak with the king before he returned any answer. He was sick of the gout at the time, and confined, "by the common rules of decency" (of which he was a great observer), to his house, on account of the recent death of his wife. The king promised to go to him at his own house on the morrow; but several days passed and he went not. The Duchess of York repaired to his majesty "with some passion," and the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Albemarle (Monk) accompanied her. Other friends interfered, but Charles told them all that what he intended was for the chancellor's good, and the only way to preserve him.

At his majesty's desire, Monk waited upon Clarendon and told him that what had been done had been done under a mistake; that he doubted not a private conference would settle every thing to his heart's content, and that the king would see him the next morning. Clarendon went at the appointed hour to Whitehall, and made a desperate struggle for the preservation of his posts and honors. He asked the king what fault he had committed to draw down his severity upon him. His master told him that he was assured that the parliament was resolved to impeach him as soon as they should come together; that his innocence would no more defend him against their power than the Earl of Strafford had defended himself against them; that he was sure his taking away the seal from him at this moment would so well please parliament that he would thereby be enabled to preserve him, and to provide also for the easy passage of his own business. But the chancellor said that he did not fear parliament; that he would not suffer it to be believed that he was willing to deliver up the seal or withdraw himself from office at a time when his majesty would have need of honest servants; that he could not consider a favor was meant him. He then recalled to the royal memory his long services to the crown, and the discouraging example that would be given to others if one so devoted should be cast off. The king spoke again of the great power of parliament, which he was in no condition to resist. The chancellor, after using other arguments, assured him that the power of the parliament was more or less, or nothing, as he, the king, pleased to make it, and that it was yet in his power to govern them. In the warmth of the moment he mentioned "the lady," with some reflections and cautions, which he afterward thought he would have done better to omit. The king rose and left him without saying a word; and, as the chancellor returned from Whitehall, "the lady," the Lord Arlington, and Mr. May looked together at him out of her open window "with great gayety."[1] According to Clarendon's own account, which we are following. "many members of the privy council and other persons of honor" presumed to speak with the king. and to "give testimony of his integrity;" but his majesty ended their discourse by saying that he had made himself odious to the parliament, and so was no longer capable of doing him service. On the other side, "the lady" and her friends declared that the chancellor was become so imperious that he would endure no contradiction; and that the king would be inevitably ruined by the parliament if he did not remove him. After four days Charles sent Secretary Morrice with a warrant, under the sign-manual, to require and receive the great seal. Clarendon, unable to help himself, delivered the great symbol, which was presently transferred to Bridgman, who had proved his loyalty in the trial plague was raging in London, he notes, "Did business, though not much, at the Navy Office, because of the horrible crowd and lamentable moan of the poor seamen that lie starving in the streets for lack of money, which do trouble and perplex me to the heart; and more at noon, when we were to go through them, for then above a whole hundred of them followed us—some cursing, some swearing, and some praying to us."—Diary.

of the regicides. Clarendon believed that the storm was now blown over; but he had offended too many parties, besides the king and "the lady," to be allowed to escape so easily. Very opposite parties detested him, both as a man and as a minister; the cavaliers hated him on account of the Act of Indemnity, and the Presbyterians hated him on account of the Act of Uniformity; but it appears that the Presbyterians were not so strenuous against him as the cavaliers, fearing that worse might come. The whole courtly crew hated him because he preserved decorum and dignity, and all the outward appearances of religion and virtue; the servants of government, the office and bureau-men, hated him because he was invariably stern and overbearing; and many a member of both Houses, who might have approved of a great part of his conduct and excused the rest, was enraged at his arrogance and haughtiness.

On the 10th of October the session was opened; and the Commons soon voted an address of thanks to the king for all his acts of grace,[1] and particularly for his removal of Clarendon. The Lords joined with the Commons, and Charles assured them both that he had removed the late chancellor from his service and from his councils forever. If this royal declaration were intended to cover Clarendon from further attack, it was a failure. The Commons proceeded to impeach him of treason, without examining witnesses, but simply upon the grounds of common fame, as had been done in the cases of the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Strafford. The articles of impeachment were in number seventeen. The heaviest of the charges were, that he had advised the king to dissolve the parliament, and govern by a standing army, to be maintained at free quarters and by forced contributions; that he had traitorously declared the king to be a papist or popishly inclined; that he had advised and effected the sale of Dunkirk to the French king, for no greater price than the amunition, artillery, and stores were worth; that he had betrayed the king's secret councils to the enemy; and that he had been guilty of various acts of corruption, which were assumed to be proved by the fact that his estate was greater than it could possibly be by any open or lawful means. Several things were then unknown that are now known; but, even from the materials they had before them, the Commons might have framed a closer impeachment. There was some foundation for the charge about the army; but it was exaggerated. The case was this: when the Dutch fleet were burning our ships and riding triumphantly at the mouth of the Thames, Clarendon advised levying money and provisions in the counties for the soldiers that were called out, telling the king that Queen Elizabeth did all her business in 1588 (the year of the grand Armada) without calling a parliament, and so might his majesty for any thing he saw. His remarks touching the king's religion were merely dropped in private conversation, and the charge founded upon them was not urged with a good grace by men that equally doubted the Protestantism of Charles and his brother. In the sale of Dunkirk, the whole council had gone along with Clarendon; and the Earl of Sandwich[1] and perhaps one or two others, including Monk, had more to do with that sale than the chancellor had, although it appears that the first overture, of which the French had no expectation, came from Clarendon. In his long and secret correspondence with the French court, he probably betrayed nothing that the king wished him to conceal; but he undoubtedly revealed things which the country would have concealed; and, what was worse, though not so well known then as now, was the capital misdemeanor of clandestinely soliciting pecuniary aid for his own sovereign from the King of France. Clarendon, indeed, first taught a lavish prince to seek the wages of dependence from a foreign power, to elude the control of parliament by the help of French money:[2] and we shall see in the sequel how this beginning was followed up, and what were the effects of this unnational, debasing, and most perilous system. Whether upon trial the Commons could have made good any great charges of corruption and peculation may be somewhat uncertain, as matters never came to that issue; but, it should seem, that Clarendon's grasping, money-getting disposition was sufficiently notorious, not merely among the people, but also among men of business who were conversant in all the affairs of court and government. Long before this impeachment was either begun or thought of, Pepys, who was otherwise his ardent admirer, says that, at a supper with Evelyn, Sir William D'Oyly, and Captain Cocke, wherein they discoursed of the neglect of business, the captain declared, "My lord chancellor, he minds of getting of money, and nothing else;" and, on another occasion, when calculating how he should raise himself, he tells us that Evelyn, who was personally a friend to Clarendon, assured him that my lord chancellor never did nor ever would do any thing but for money.[3] And as Clarendon was ostentatious, he built such a house, and collected such pictures and furniture, as excited the surprise of all who knew the poverty in which he had returned to England only a few years before. The great house was particularly odious; and if the people went upon a wrong scent in

[1] Ad captandum, a proclamation had been issued to enforce the laws against the Roman Catholics, and Pett, a commissioner of the navy, had been sent to the Tower.

[1] Even according to his own creature, Pepys, Sandwich himself said —"If it should in parliament be inquired into the selling of Dunkirk (though the chancellor was the man that would have sold it to France, saying the King of Spain had no money to give for it), yet he (Sandwich) will be found to have been the greatest adviser of it, which he is a little apprehensive may be called upon by this parliament."—Diary.

[3] Evelyn's cavalier principles and his friendly feeling toward Clarendon break out in many instances. The following was written after the chancellor's fall:—"Visited the lord chancellor, to whom his majesty had sent for the seals a few days before; I found him in his bedchamber, very sad. The parliament had accused him, and he had enemies at court, especially the buffoons and ladies of pleasure, because he thwarted them, and stood in their way; I could name some of the chief. The truth is, he made few friends during his grandeur among the royal sufferers, but advanced the old rebels. He was, however, though no considerable lawyer, one who kept up the form and substance of things in the nation with more solemnity than some would have had. He was my particular kind friend on all occasions."

christening it "Dunkirk House," there are good reasons for believing that that unlucky palace was built and stocked by no very honest means.[1] He was charged loosely in one of the articles of his impeachment with inflicting imprisonment against law in remote islands, garrisons, and other places, upon divers of his majesty's subjects; and of this offense he was unquestionably guilty; but it suited not his prosecutors to charge him home with his constant approbation of despotic principles and with (his worst crimes) his fierce intolerance and his persecution of the Non-conformists. On the 12th of November Mr. Edward Seymour presented the impeachment at the bar of the Lords, and, in the name of the Commons, demanded that the Earl of Clarendon should be committed as a traitor. The Lords received the impeachment, but refused to commit the earl, "because the House of Commons only accused him of treason in general, and did not assign or specify any particular treason." The Duke of Buckingham, Bristol, Arlington, and others of that party, including Monk and three bishops, entered a protest against the refusal of their House to commit upon the general charge. The Lower House was thrown into a fury, and demanded a conference with the Lords. Here Charles set some of the bishops to work to persuade the chancellor to be gone in order to save his own life and preserve his majesty's peace of mind. According to Clarendon's account, he resisted till the 29th of November, when the king told his son-in-law, the Duke of York, that he "must advise him to be gone," his majesty much blaming him for not putting trust in the bishops and in his own royal word. "The king," continues Clarendon, "had no sooner left the duke, but his highness sent for the Bishop of Winchester, and bade him tell the chancellor from him, that it was absolutely necessary for him

[1] This magnificent structure, which was begun some time after the sale of Dunkirk, occupied, together with its gardens, the site of Dover-street and Albemarle-street, Piccadilly; and the center of its front exactly answered to the top of St. James's-street, which it commanded. Evelyn, a traveler, and a good judge of such things, said he had "never seen a nobler pile"—that every part of it was stately, solid, and beautiful—that nothing in England came near to it.

According to Lord Dartmouth (note to the Oxford edition of Burnet's History of his Own Times), the furniture and the pictures—the last of all family portraits of the old nobility—were procured in the following way: "He (Clarendon), on the Restoration, undertook the protection of those who had plundered and sequestered the others, which he very artfully contrived, by making the king believe it was necessary for his own ease and quiet to make his enemies his friends; upon which he brought in most of those who had been the main instruments and promoters of the late troubles, who were not wanting in their acknowledgments in the manner he expected, which produced the great house in the Piccadilly, furnished chiefly with cavaliers' goods, brought thither for peace-offerings, which the right owners durst not claim when they were in his possession. In my own remembrance Earl Paulett was an humble petitioner to his sons for leave to take a copy of his grandfather and grandmother's pictures (whole lengths, drawn by Vandyke) that had been plundered from Hinton St. George; which was obtained with great difficulty, because it was thought that copies might lessen the value of the originals. And whoever had a mind to see what great families had been plundered during the civil wars, might find some remains either at Clarendon House or at Cornbury." (Cornbury Park, together with Wychwood Forest, in Oxfordshire, was one of the liberal grants made to the chancellor by the king.) Nor does this broad charge of Lord Dartmouth want the support of strong circumstantial evidence.

The Londoners put the main offenses of Clarendon into a couplet which was sung about the streets and chalked upon the walls—

"Three sights to be seen—Dunkirk, Tangier, and a barren queen."

For it was an article of popular belief that he had knowingly and purposely chosen a queen incapable of bearing children, in order that his own grandchildren (the progeny of the Duke of York by his daughter) might succeed to the throne. For further curious particulars relating to Dunkirk House, which was soon sold and pulled down, see Evelyn and Pepys, and the late Lord Dover's "Historical Inquiries respecting the Character of Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon."

speedily to be gone, and that he had the king's word for all that had been undertaken by the Bishop of Hereford." And that same rough November night, as soon as it was dark, the infirm old chancellor fled with two servants to Erith, and there embarked for France. When his departure and safe arrival at Calais were known to his friend the Earl of Denbigh, that peer rose in his seat and said he had an address to the House from the Earl of Clarendon, which he desired might be read. This was an apology, under the name of an humble petition and address, in which the ex-chancellor defended himself against some of the imputations, or, as he called them, "foul aspirsions," of his accusers. After the paper had been read in the Lords it was sent to the Commons, who voted that it contained much untruth, and scandal, and sedition, and that it should be publicly burned by the hand of the hangman. The Lords concurred in this sentence, and the paper was burned accordingly. A bill for banishing and disenabling the fugitive was soon passed by both Houses. By this bill, unless he surrendered himself before the 1st of February, he was to be banished for life; disabled from ever again holding any office; subjected, if he afterward returned to England, to the penalties of high treason; and rendered incapable of pardon without the consent of the two Houses of Parliament. Only Hollis and a few others of no name protested against this bill. The proud old man bore his misfortunes with little dignity, and he died an exile in France about seven years after his flight.

Sir Thomas Clifford, first commissioner of the treasury, afterward Lord Clifford and high treasurer, the Earl of Arlington, secretary of state, the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Ashley, chancellor of the exchequer, afterward Earl of Shaftesbury and lord chancellor, and the Duke of Lauderdale, now divided among them the authority and profits of government. The five initial letters of their names, put together, spelt the word CABAL, and their doings answered to this title, by which their ministry is commonly designated. Secretary Morrice, the creature of Monk, was succeeded by Sir John Trevor, a creature of Buckingham; and, under the same influence, the government of Ireland was taken from Ormond and given to Lord Robarts.

A.D. 1668. Some of the acts of the Cabal ministry were, however, such as might meet the approval of better and purer politicians than the members of the parliament of that time. They took alarm at the daring ambition of Louis XIV., who had invaded Spanish Flanders with three armies, and was threatening the independence of the United Provinces, and, by means of that able diplomatist, Sir William Temple, they opened negotiations with the great De Witt, who was still at the head of the Dutch republic. The speedy result was, the formation of the famed triple alliance between England, Holland, and Sweden, with the object of mediating a peace between France and Spain, and checking the schemes of Louis.[1] The French monarch knew that a league where Charles was concerned could not be lasting, and, setting on foot new intrigues, he, for the present, made a show of moderation, and in the month of April concluded the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, retaining Lille, Tournay, Douay, Charleroi, and other places of great strength and importance in Flanders, and giving back to Spain the whole of Franche-Compté, which he had overrun. As a sample of his public honesty, it may be mentioned that, while his minister was actually negotiating the triple alliance at the Hague, Charles was maintaining a close correspondence at Paris, and, through his sister, the Duchess of Orleans, the Duke of Buckingham, and Rouvigny, was making overtures for a clandestine treaty with Louis. The Duke of York also was bent upon this union with the despotic court of France, declaring that nothing else could reëstablish the English court.[1] In fact, it was already the cherished project of both brothers to make the power of the English crown absolute by the aid of Louis XIV. Parliament had met on the 10th of February. It was charmed with the triple league—with its essentially Protestant character, and with the recognition by Spain of the independence of Portugal. By his marriage treaty Charles had engaged to support the interests of the House of Braganza, and he had even sent a small body of English troops into Portugal, where, though left in a miserable, payless condition,[2] they had behaved very gallantly at the great battle of Evora, in which the Spaniards, under Don John of Austria, had been completely defeated. The parliament was further gratified by a treaty of commerce which had been concluded with Spain. But all their good humor disappeared at the first blush of a project of religious toleration. The king, in his speech, had recommended "some course to beget a better union and composure in the minds of his Protestant subjects in matters of religion;" and it became known that Bridgman, now lord keeper, the chief baron, Sir Matthew Hale, Bishop Wilkins, Ashley, and Buckingham had laid the foundations of a treaty with the Non-conformists, on the basis of a comprehension for the Presbyterians and a toleration for the minor Protestant sects. The orthodoxy of the House of Commons was as powerful and as intolerant as it had been in 1662. Members could not speak fast enough or loud enough. They declared that the only true Protestant religion and monarchy would be subverted; they kept back the supplies; they spoke of making a searching inquiry into the miscarriages of the late Dutch war, and into the corruptions and peculations of ministers and other servants of government. Charles wanted the money, was alarmed at their fury, and gave up the scheme of toleration. It was said at the time, that whoever proposed new laws about religion must do it with a rope about his neck! The Commons finished by continuing the Conventicle Act and increasing its rigor.[1] They adjourned on the 8th of May to the 11th of August, at the desire of the king, who wisely interrupted a struggle which had arisen between the two Houses touching a question of privilege, and a bold attempt of the Lords to extend their jurisdiction at the expense of the Commons. They had voted a supply of £310,000.

The bishops and high-churchmen were satisfied, and continued to preach divine right and passive obedience, while the court plunged more deeply than ever into debauchery and profaneness. My Lady Castlemaine was now "mightily out of request, the king going little to her." He had been captivated by Mary Davies, who danced a jig marvelously, and by Nell Gwyn, another public actress, both of whom he was accustomed to introduce at court. Lady Castlemaine retaliated; but, in spite of the king's inconstancies and her own, she retained for many years a great influence.[2] There were royal projects of abduction and divorce, adulterous if not incestuous intrigues, which might figure in the Satires of Juvenal, but which can find no place in our pages.

Parliament reassembled in October to vote the king more money, to strengthen the coercive powers of the church, and to do nothing else; for they were abruptly dissolved after a short session. They were not so liberal as was desired, and Charles was now completing his arrangements with Louis, which he hoped would render him forever independent of parliaments.[3]

A.D. 1670. When the Houses met again (on the 14th of February), Charles, contrary to English usage, and in imitation of Louis XIV., went to open the session with an escort of his guards. His whole tone, too, was changed, and he seemed to threaten where he used to cajole. Nor was there any increase of spirit on the part of the Commons to meet this absolute bearing. They allowed the king to speak contemptuously of the commission for auditing the public accounts; and, after voting some supplies, they separated like a set of venal cowards. Charles, and his brother, whose religious zeal was very different, but whose love of absolute power was pretty equal, though James was the steadier despot, and Charles chiefly loved absolutism for the command it would give him over the purses, pens, and tongues[1] of his people, conceived that it would now be an easy task to change both the religion and government of the nation. They proposed to fortify Plymouth, Hull, and Portsmouth. The fleet was under the duke, who was still the lord-admiral: the guards had been increased, and it was calculated—rather rashly, no doubt—that both the army and navy would stand by the king in any attempt. Louis stepped in with offers of assistance in men and money; but he drove a hard bargain, and involved his secret ally in a foreign scheme of gigantic iniquity. The French monarch panted to crush the independent republic of Holland, and to grasp the entire Spanish monarchy, which was then feebly held by a boy, the sickly and imbecile Charles II., who was not expected to live. He therefore proposed:—1. That he and Charles should declare and make war with their united forces by land and sea upon the United Provinces, and never make peace or truce until they had completely conquered that ungrateful and insolent republic: then Louis was to give the king of England a part of Zealand, to provide, if possible, a territory or an indemnity for Charles's young nephew, William Prince of Orange. 2. That, in the event of any new rights or titles accruing to his Most Christian Majesty (that is, on the death of the young king of Spain), Charles should assist him with all his force by sea and land, the expense of that war to be borne by Louis, and Charles to have, as his share of the spoil, Ostend and Minorca, and such parts of Spanish South America as he might choose to conquer for himself at his own expense and risk. And then came the more immediate or most tempting part of the bargain, which was, that Charles was to have an annual pension of £200,000, to be paid quarterly by the king of France, and the aid of 6000 French infantry. With this assistance he was to make a public declaration of Catholicity. Louis wished to begin with a declaration of war against Holland; Charles, with his profession of the Roman Catholic religion—or so at least he pretended.[2] He also wanted money from France before he did any thing. To remove these difficulties Louis employed Henrietta, duchess of Orleans, Charles's sister, who came over to Dover with the fascinating Mademoiselle Keronaille in her train. Charles wavered in his resolutions, and, with Clifford, Arundel, and Arlington, all Catholics (Arundel not being of the cabinet), fully concluded the treaty on this footing on the 22d of May, 1670.[3] The Duchess of Orleans returned with the treaty to France, where she died very shortly after, not without unusually strong suspicions of being pois-

[1] Pepys says, "This law against conventicles is very severe; but Creed, whom I meet here, do tell me that it being moved that papists' meetings might be included, the House was divided upon it, and it was carried in the negative; which will give great disgust to the people, I doubt. . . . And this business of religion do disgust every body, the parliament being vehement against the Non-conformists, while the king seems to be willing to countenance them. So we are all poor and in pieces, God help us!"

[2] As the king had two actresses, so "the lady" took to herself two actors—or, rather, one stage-player and a rope-dancer! She also gambled outrageously. "I was told," says the gossiping Pepys, "that my Lady Castlemaine is so great a gamester as to have won £15,000 in one night, and lost £25,000 in another night at play, and hath played £1000 and £1500 at a cast."

In the following year (1670), by which time she had had four or five children, which the king owned, he elevated her to be Duchess of Cleveland, with remainder to her natural sons. "She was," says Burnet, "a woman of great beauty, but most enormously vicious and ravenous; foolish, but imperious; very uneasy to the king, and always carrying on intrigues with other men, while yet she pretended she was jealous of him. His passion for her, and her strange behavior toward him, did so disorder him, that often he was not master of himself nor capable of minding business." This account is more than borne out by a variety of authorities.

oned by her husband. Mademoiselle Kerouaille became mistress to Charles, Duchess of Portsmouth, &c.; and, as she served his interests well in many ways, Louis XIV., in 1673, gave her a French title and estate. Of the Cabal ministry only Clifford and Arlington were admitted into the secret of the treaty; and, the better to keep Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale in the dark, they were employed upon a simulated treaty, in which Charles's change of religion was omitted.

When parliament reassembled in the month of October, the badge of corruption and slavery was still more conspicuous on the majority in the Commons. They voted an extraordinary supply for the navy, because they were told by the court that the French king was enlarging his fleet and required looking after. In providing the ways and means, they had put a tax upon land, a tax upon stock, a tax upon law proceedings, a tax upon salaries, &c. It was asked why a tax should not be put upon playhouses? It was answered, that the players were the king's servants, and a part of his pleasure. Sir John Coventry put a question, which was taken as a gross reflection on the king's amours, and the unlucky member was denounced with fury at court. It was said that, if this were allowed to pass, worse disloyalty would follow; that it would grow into a fashion, and that it was therefore fit to take such severe notice of this slip as should stop people's mouths for the future.[1] "The Duke of York," says Burnet, "told me he said all he could to the king to divert him from the resolution he took, which was to send some of the guards, and watch in the streets where Sir John lodged, and leave a mark upon him. Sands and Obrian, and some others, went thither, and, as Coventry was going home, they drew about him. He stood up to the wall and snatched the flambeau out of his servant's hand, and, with that in one hand and his sword in the other, he defended himself so well that he got more credit by it than by all the actions of his life. He wounded some of them, but was soon disarmed; and then they cut his nose to the bone, to teach him to remember what respect he owed to the king; and so they left him, and went back to the Duke of Monmouth's, where Obrian's arm was dressed. That matter was executed by orders from the Duke of Monmouth, for which he was severely censured, because he lived then in professions of friendship with Coventry, so that his subjection to the king was not thought an excuse for directing so vile an attempt on his friend, without sending him secret notice of what was designed. Coventry had his nose so well sewed up that the scar was scarce to be discerned." This outrage was so atrocious that even that parliament could not overlook it. They passed a bill, known by the name of the Coventry Act, making cutting and maiming a capital offense: but they had not courage sufficient to bring the king's bastard or any of his bravoes to trial. "Lord's noses," said Sir Robert Holt, in the course of the debate, "are even as our noses, and not of steel: it concerns the Lords as well as us—as in Lord Ormond's case." Here allusion was made to outrages committed the same year by a very conspicuous villain, the noted Colonel Blood. This desperado, with five other ruffians, had seized the Duke of Ormond as he was returning from a public dinner in the city, dragged him out of his coach, mounted him behind one of the gang on horseback, to whom they bound him fast, and rode off with him toward Tyburn, with a design to hang him there, to revenge the deaths of Blood's fellow-conspirators, who were executed for a plot to surprise the castle of Dublin in 1663: but, in the way thither, his grace made a shift to dismount his man, and while they lay struggling together on the ground, his domestics, who had been alarmed by his coachman and some people living in the neighborhood, came up to his assistance. Blood then let go his hold, and made off, firing a pistol at the duke. So villainous an attempt excited the indignation of the whole kingdom, and a proclamation was issued offering a thousand pounds reward to any man who should discover any one of the assassins; and the like sum and a free pardon to any one of the band who should betray the rest. But no discovery was made till Blood himself was taken the next year in a most daring attempt to carry off the crown of England out of the Tower. "The king," says Ralph, "had the curiosity to see a villain of a size and complexion so extraordinary; and the Duke of Ormond remarked upon it, that the man need not despair, for surely no king should wish to see a malefactor but with intention to pardon him." Blood's behavior before the king is described as being as extraordinary as his exploits. It is said that he not only avowed his crimes, but seemed to glory in them—observing that his attempt on the crown he could not deny, and that on the Duke of Ormond he would not; that, upon being asked who were his associates, he replied that he would never betray a friend's life, nor ever deny a guilt in defense of his own; that he even confessed that he had once been engaged in a plot to shoot the king with a carabine, for his severities to the godly, when his majesty went to swim the Thames above Battersea; but that, struck by an awe of majesty, his heart failed him, and he not only gave over the design, but obliged his confederates to do the same. It is added that he boasted of his indifference to life or death, but said that the matter was of more consequence to his majesty, inasmuch as there were hundreds of his friends, yet undiscovered, who were all bound to each other by the strongest of oaths to revenge the death of any of the fraternity. Charles, it is said, was touched pleasantly in his vanity and very unpleasantly in his fears, and thought it most advisable to be friends with such a desperado. Blood was not only pardoned, but his pardon was accompanied with the grant of an estate in Ireland worth £500 a-year. Nor was this all: he was admitted into all the privacy and intimacy of the court —became a personal favorite of the king[1]—was constantly seen about Whitehall—"and, by a particular affectation, oftenest in the very room where the Duke of Ormond was."[2] "All the world," says Carte, "stood amazed at this mercy, countenance, and favor shown to so atrocious a malefactor, the reasons and meaning of which they could neither see nor comprehend. The general opinion, at the time, was, that Blood was put upon the assassination by the Duke of Buckingham and the Duchess of Cleveland (late Lady Castlemaine), who both hated the Duke of Ormond mortally."[3] And it is considered probable that the ruffian acted from a double motive, and not simply out of revenge for Ormond's having hanged some of his friends seven years before. Ormond's son, the gallant, free-spoken Lord Ossory, told Buckinghom, in the king's presence, that he knew very well that he was at the bottom of the design. "And, therefore," continued his lordship, "I give you fair warning, if my father comes to a violent end by sword or pistol—if he dies by the hand of a ruffian, or by the more secret way of poison—I shall not be at a loss to know the first author of it: I shall consider you as the assassin—I shall treat you as such; and, wherever I meet you, I shall pistol you, though you stood behind the king's chair; and I tell it you in his majesty's presence, that you may be sure I shall keep my word."[1]—[Our omissions, for the sake of brevity, are numerous, but it is necessary to give a few of these details, in order to convey a true notion of this reign.]

[1] Very severe notice had been taken of other slips before this. In 1668 the Puritans and apprentices about Moorfields took the liberty to pull down certain brothels, and then to say that "they did ill in contenting themselves with pulling down the little brothels and did not go and pull down the great one at Whitehall." Eight of the ringleaders of these rioters and censors were condemned to die; but this did not prevent the composition and circulation of a bitter satire, in the shape of a petition to the king's mistress, from the poor prostitutes whose houses had been pulled down. "This," adds Pepys, "shows that the times are loose, and come to a great disregard of the king, or court, or government."

The chief state performances of the next year (1671) were a cruel persecution of the Non-conformists, "to the end that these might be more sensible of the ease they should have when the Catholics prevailed;"[2] a public proclamation made by Charles, that as he had always adhered to the true religion established, so he would still employ his utmost care and zeal in its maintenance; and hurried preparations for that joint war with Louis, who was bound to make England a Catholic and an absolute monarchy. De Witt, who suspected from the beginning where the first blow would fall, who had certainly more than an inkling of the Dover treaty, and who felt that the vaunted triple alliance was now a mockery, concluded an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the bewildered and insulted court of Spain. Louis imperiously demanded from that court a free passage through the Spanish Netherlands in order to humble the Hollanders; and told them that if they refused, he would force his way with 60,000 men.

[1] Blood was immediately admitted into what was called the very best society! On the 10th of May, 1671, when his exploits were fresh, Evelyn mentions—"Dined at my lord treasurer's, where dined Mons. de Grammont and several French noblemen, and one Blood, that impudent, bold fellow, who had not long before attempted to steal the imperial crown itself out of the Tower, pretending curiosity of seeing the regalia there, when, stabbing the keeper, though not mortally, he boldly went away with it through all the guards, taken only by the accident of his horse falling down. How he came to be pardoned, and even received in favor, not only after this, but several other exploits almost as daring both in Ireland and here, I could never come to understand. Some believed he became a spy of several parties, being well with the sectaries and enthusiasts, and did his majesty service that way, which none alive could do so well as he; but it was certainly, as the boldest attempt, so the only treason of this sort that was ever pardoned. The man had not only a daring, but a villainous, unmerciful look; a false countenance, but very well spoken, and dangerously insinuating."

A.D. 1672. Charles attempted to keep on the mask to the last moment. He offered himself as a mediator, and he probably imposed for some time both upon the Spaniards and the Dutch. But Louis was now ready, and his satellite rushed into the war like a robber and a pirate. During one of those long prorogations of parliament which were now becoming so frequent, he, with the advice of the Cabal ministers, and without the least opposition from any one member of his council, on the 2d of January, suddenly shut up the exchequer, an act which amounted to an avowed national bankruptcy, and which had the immediate effect of spreading ruin far and wide, and of entirely uprooting credit. This was the robbery; now for the piracy. Before any declaration of war, and while, as he thought, the Dutch were relying upon him as a mediator and friend, he detached Sir Robert Holmes to capture the homeward bound Smyrna fleet of Dutch merchantmen, whose freight was supposed to be worth a million and a half sterling. Holmes, afterward styled "the cursed beginner of the two Dutch wars," fell in with this rich fleet, and attacked it; but he found it so well prepared that he was beaten off, and, after two days' hard fighting, he got little or nothing save the eternal disgrace of the attempt. Then Charles, sorely disappointed of his expected prey, declared war; and his ally, Louis, put forth his ordinance, proclaiming his intention of "running down" the Dutch. De Witt was well prepared at sea; and, on the 28th of May, the brave De Ruyter attacked the combined English and French fleets at Solebay. The English were commanded by the Duke of York and Lord Sandwich; the French by D'Estrées, La Rabiniere, and Du Quesne. The battle was terrible, which never failed to be the case when Dutch met English; but the French, whose navy was in its infancy, were very careful of their ships and men, as they were afterward in other sea-fights. There appears, indeed, to have been a standing order to the French admirals that they should risk as little as possible, and promote all occasions for the Dutch and English navies to destroy each other. The Dutch vice-admiral, Van Ghent, was killed—the Earl of Sandwich was blown up by a fire-ship and perished, with nearly all his crew—and the Duke of York was well-nigh sharing the same fate.[1] After fighting from morning till evening, the fleets separated, miserably shattered, and with no very apparent advantage on either side. Meanwhile Louis, threatening to drown those shopkeepers in their own ditches, was marching to the Rhine with 100,000 men, commanded by those great and experienced generals, Turenne, Condé, and Luxembourg, and with money-chests filled with gold, to bribe and to buy. He crossed the Rhine almost without a show of opposition, overran three of the seven United Provinces, and spread such consternation in the great trading city of Amsterdam, that the municipal authorities proposed sending their keys to the conqueror. Even the great De Witt despaired, and suggested the inevitable necessity of submission. But behind the river Maas and the broad dikes of South Holland there lay a phlegmatic youth who never knew despair, and who was destined to check the proud monarch of France in his prime—to oppose him with marvelous perseverance through thirty years, and to organize a system which triumphed over him in his old age. This was William of Nassau, prince of Orange, who was then in his twenty-first year, of a sickly habit of body, and, as yet, of no experience. He was the posthumous child (by the daughter of our Charles I.) of William Prince of Orange, who had rendered the stadtholderate, which had become almost hereditary in his house, so odious by his tyranny, and close imitations of the proceedings of absolute monarchs, that, upon his premature death in the year 1650, the States had abolished for ever that supreme magistracy, and created a sort of president in the person of the pensionary John De Witt, who not only administered the affairs of government, but took charge of the education of the young prince. At the present terrible crisis the Dutch remembered that it was the princes of Orange that had first made them an independent people by rescuing them from the atrocious tyranny of the Spaniards; and as, besides the prestige of his name, young William had given indications of unusual prudence and conduct, they resolved to intrust him with the supreme command of all their forces. De Witt, who could not prevent this appointment, induced the republican party to bind the prince by an oath to observe the edict of the abolition of the stadtholderate, and never advance himself to that office. But now, the people seeing their towns and garrisons fall daily into the hands of the enemy, began to suspect the fidelity of De Witt, who, unfortunately for himself, had contracted an alliance with the French in the course of the preceding war between Holland and England, and, still more unfortunately, had now recommended treating with the haughty and ungenerous Louis. The two parties had always been inveterate against each other, and now, while the republicans blundered, the Orangeists—the quasi-royalists—who had long been deprived of the honor and emoluments of office, intrigued, and, without doubt, fanned the popular fury into a flame. At Dort, at Rotterdam, at Amsterdam, and Middleburgh, the people rose and called for a stadtholder; the pensionary De Witt and his brother were barbarously murdered at the Hague; and the Prince of Orange, being absolved from his oath both civilly and canonically, took the reins of government into his own hands. William rewarded the assassins; and then, with an undivided command, and all the resources of the country at his disposal, he made head against the French. Amsterdam was saved by inundating the surrounding country; and, wherever the enemy attempted an advance, the dikes were cut and the country laid under water. The warlike Bishop of Munster, an ally of King Louis, was foiled at the siege of Groningen; and William beat the French in several smart attacks. He already showed all the coolness, and closeness, and invincible taciturnity of his great ancestor, the founder of the Batavian independence, whom the Spaniards had used to call "Silence." His plans were never known till they were put into execution; and so close was he that, when he had done one thing, no one knew what he would attempt next. One of his colonels, after the affair of Woerden, asked him what was his next great design. "Can you keep a secret?" said the prince. "I can," said the colonel. "And so can I," said William. As the war was no longer a pleasant promenade, Louis returned to his capital, leaving Turenne to manage the war. Charles sent over 6000 English auxiliaries, under the command of his son the Duke of Monmouth. These troops did very little to assist the French, who paid them; and an attempt made upon the coast of Zealand. by the united fleet of France and England, failed altogether. Turenne remained master of many important places, but, at the end of this campaign, he was convinced that the conquest of Holland would be no easy matter.

A.D. 1673. After a recess of nearly a year and a half, parliament met in the month of February. Sir Anthony Ashley, the most crafty of the Cabal, and now Earl of Shaftesbury and lord chancellor, undertook to justify the shutting of the exchequer, and to prove that the war with Holland was a national war, which ought to be prosecuted with vigor, and never ended till the Dutch were ruined. The Commons (some of the leaders of the opposition had been bribed highly) voted £1,200,000, the sum proposed by the court; but they fell with violence upon a declaration of indulgence which the king, by the advice of Shaftesbury, had thought fit to issue during the recess. The minister saw the mighty benefit that would accrue to himself and party if he could win over the Non-conformists, and the court calculated that the papists should partake largely in the indulgence. The Duke of York, blinded by his religious zeal, was for a plain declaration of conversion to the Roman church; but Charles, infinitely less zealous, was alive to all the danger of such a step. Bound, however, as he was to France, it was necessary to do something, and he fancied that, by suspending all the penal laws in matters of religion, he was giving the papists an opportunity of recovering by degrees all that they had lost since the Reformation. Certain it is that parliament regarded the declaration of indulgence in this light, and that the Non-conformists of all sects preferred remaining as they were—oppressed and persecuted—to participating in a toleration with the Catholics. The Commons, after a stormy debate, passed a resolution, "That penal statutes, in matters ecclesiastical, can not be suspended but by act of parliament, and that an address and petition, for satisfaction, should be presented to the king."

At first Charles made a show of resistance, and was supported by the House of Lords; but his resolution soon gave way, and he not only recalled his declaration, but also assented to a bill to check the growth of popery, which was passed under the name of the Test Act. By this intolerant law, which remained to disgrace the statute-book even to our own days, all who refused to take the oaths and receive the sacrament according to the rites of the church of England, formally renouncing the fundamental Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, were debarred from all public employments. The great question of the eucharist apart, the Protestant dissenters rejected the Anglican sacrament, and therefore this test excluded them as well as the papists. For their concurrence in putting down the royal declaration, they had expected more liberal treatment from the zealots of the church of England; but they were amused and duped by a factitious bill for repealing some of the persecuting laws especially directed against their worship: the bill never came to any thing, and the Presbyterians and Non-conformists were shut out from all offices of trust more than they had been before. Upon the passing of the Test Act, Clifford, the popish lord treasurer, resigned his staff; and the Duke of York, whose religion was equally well known, gave up his office of lord high admiral. Charles thought it was absurd that his brother should not conform in all outward appearance, and take the sacrament by law established, in order to keep his command; but if James's conscience had been as pliant as his brother's, nothing that he could have done would have removed the conviction that he had set his life and soul upon the restoration of the old religion. His first wife, Anna Hyde, the daughter of the ultra-Anglican Clarendon, had died with a public and ostentatious profession of popery; and he was now, contrary to the advice of parliament, on the point of marrying an Italian princess of the very Catholic House of Este. It was during a most violent debate upon the subject of this marriage that Charles suddenly prorogued parliament, on the 4th of November. Soon after the prorogation, the king took the great seal from Shaftesbury and gave it to Sir Heneage Finch, as lord keeper. The other members of the Cabal ministry, Arlington, Buckingham, and Lauderdale, were in seeming odium at court; and Clifford, who had resigned on account of the test, was unexpectedly succeeded by Sir Thomas Osborn, "a gentleman of Yorkshire, whose estate was much sunk," but who was "a positive, undertaking man." Osborn, created lord treasurer and Earl of Danby, became in effect prime minister; and we now enter upon the Danby administration, which was, in many respects, more iniquitous than that of the Cabal. Shaftesbury at once carried his splendid abilities, his cunning, and remorselessness into the service of opposition, and became a patriot because he could not be the supreme minister of an absolute king.

A.D. 1674. The parliament reassembled on the 7th of January. The king, alarmed at the reports which had got abroad touching the Dover treaty, solemnly declared that he had been very strangely misrepresented—that he had no secret or dangerous agreement whatever with France. The Commons thanked him for his care of the Protestant religion, but spoke ominously of popish plots and desperate designs, and called for a day of fasting and prayer. Then, guided by Shaftesbury, they hurled their thunders at a part of the late Cabal ministry. Clifford was out of their reach, for he died soon after resigning the treasurer's staff; but Arlington, Buckingham, and Lauderdale were denounced as dangerous ministers and counselors that ought to be removed forever from the king's presence. But, in part through the favor of the new mistress, the Duchess of Portsmouth, in part through Charles's aversion to impeachments, and his congeniality with the debauched Buckingham, he was brought to take them all three under his protection, and to enable them to retain their places. In the mean time the war with Holland was become more odious than ever to the nation, which saw the immense sums it cost, and the slight probability there was of bringing it to an honorable issue by force of arms. In three naval engagements De Ruyter had repulsed or baffled the combined fleets of England and France; the King of Spain, the Emperor, the Elector of Brandenburg, and some other German princes, had taken up arms against Louis; and, with their assistance, the Prince of Orange had driven the French out of the United Provinces. In this state of affairs abroad, and of the public mind at home, Charles durst not reject proposals that were tendered by the Dutch for a peace, of which the treaty of Breda was the basis; and, after some shuffling, a separate peace between England and Holland was proclaimed in London, to the great joy of the people, on the 28th of February. In the month of June, Charles, who was still receiving money from France, offered his mediation anew; but the French arms were again victorious upon the Rhine; the Prince of Orange would make no disgraceful concessions, and the negotiations of Sir William Temple, who was sent to the Hague, came to nothing. The war continued to rage: the great Turenne defeated the badly amalgamated armies of the empire; and Condé gained a somewhat questionable victory over the Prince of Orange at Senef, near Mons. Notwithstanding the popularity of the recent peace with Holland, the court, and, above all, the Duke of York, dreaded the meeting of parliament; but Charles wanted money, and it was not until he had received 500,000 crowns from France—a sum granted at the earnest prayer of his brother—that he consented to put off the session five months longer.[1]

A.D. 1675. In the mean time the profligate Buckingham, having quarreled with the French mistress, had gone to join Shaftesbury in the ranks of opposition; and a regular system of attack had been organized under the management of those two pseudo-patriots. The session opened on the 13th of April, when Charles again expressed his anxious care of the Protestant religion, and Finch, who now held the seals taken from Shaftesbury, told them that "they served a prince in whose preservation miracles had become familiar, whose style, Dei gratia, seemed not to be written by a vulgar pen, but by the arm of Omnipotence itself." The Commons passed a vote of thanks for these assurances; and then demanded that the English auxiliaries under the Duke of Monmouth should be recalled from the continent; for, notwithstanding his peace with the Dutch, Charles had left these troops to assist the French. The king returned a shuffling answer. The House resolved itself into a committee, and the debate became so high, that many members were near drawing their swords on one another. But to this great heat, which is said to have been increased by Dutch money, there suddenly succeeded a cool quiet, which is attributed to a timely distribution of money made by Danby.[1] Monmouth and the troops remained where they were, and the patriots turned the artillery of their tongues against the Duke of Lauderdale. The king again sheltered this pernicious minister, who was equally abhorred by Scots and English. Sir Samuel Barnadiston and other members of the opposition threatened Danby himself with impeachment; but oil from the treasury cruise was poured upon these stormy waves also. The House of Lords was the scene of a much more dangerous tempest. Danby had resolved to take the no-popery cry into his own mouth; he had conferred with the bishops, and had made sure of them and their party, by promising measures of increased severity, which should be applied alike to the papists and to all classes of Protestant Non-conformists; and the bill which he now brought back into the House of Lords was supported by the bench of prelates—bishops Morley and Ward speaking vigorously in its favor. It was entitled, "A Bill to prevent the danger which may arise from persons disaffected to the government," and it proposed to extend to all officers of state, privy councilors, members of parliament, &c., the passive obedience oath already required to be taken by all magistrates in corporations. When Clarendon had attempted to do the same thing, Danby, then Sir Thomas Osborne, and Lord Lindsey were two of the three persons that defeated him by their votes in the Commons; but now this very Lindsey brought in the bill into the Lords, and Danby seconded him. The king himself attended every day, to encourage, by his presence, the champions of absolutism. These unworthy Englishmen represented the measure as a moderate security to the church and crown, and insisted, that, after admitting the principle of the test in corporations, the militia, &c., they could not reject its application to members of parliament, and that none could refuse it unless they entertained anti-monarchical sentiments, which made them unfit to be in parliament. The opposition, which included all the Catholic peers, and Shaftesbury and Buckingham, and some few lords who were neither Catholics nor friends to those two unprincipled drivers,[2] insisted that while the test was limited there remained the high court of parliament to define and control it, but that by this bill it was intended to silence and bind the parliament itself, and undo the whole birthright of Englishmen. As to imposing the oath on peers, they urged that every peer was born to the right of sitting in that House. And here ministers gave way, and, at the instigation of the Duke of York, adopted, as a standing order, that "no oath should ever be imposed, by bill or otherwise, the refusal of which should deprive any peer of his place or vote in parliament, or of liberty of debate therein." The debates lasted seventeen long days, during which the lords "that stood up now for English liberty, fought it out, under all the disadvantages imaginable, being overlaid by numbers; and the noise of the House, like the wind, was against them."[1] At last the bill was passed by the Lords, with the oath as amended, in the following form:—"I, A. B., do declare that it is not lawful, on any pretense whatsoever, to take up arms against the king; and I do abhor the traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person or against those that are commissioned by him according to law in time of rebellion and war, in pursuance of such commissions. I, A. B., do swear that I will not endeavor any alteration of the Protestant religion now established by law in the church of England, nor will I endeavor any alteration in the government in church or state, as it is by law established." And the penalty was fixed at £500 fine to the king, and incapacity to hold any office or commission under the crown. Peers or members of the other House were not to be unseated, but they were held to be liable to the fine at every new parliament. When the test, in this form, was sent down to the House of Commons, parties seemed so nearly balanced there as to make the opposition fear it might pass; but Shaftesbury, who often served the cause of liberty, though his motives were never pure, adroitly got up a quarrel with the Lords about privilege, arising out of a question that in itself had nothing to do with the test. The king detected the adroit hand of his former minister, and denounced the check upon the bill as a malicious contrivance of some that were enemies to himself and to the church; but he failed in his endeavors to make up the quarrel between the two Houses; and thereupon (on the 9th of June) he prorogued parliament in an ill humor. When they met again in the month of October, the Commons did not seem very ready to gratify the king's earnest longings for more money. They told him that after a careful calculation of the moneys he had received from parliament and from the Dutch upon the late treaty, they found that he ought to have a large surplus instead of being deeply in debt. They, however, voted £300,000 for building ships of war, perceiving with alarm that even the infant navy of the French king was exceeding our own. An attempt was made to check bribery and corruption, and even to put an end to this parliament, which had already lasted nearly fifteen years, but it failed; and on the 22d of November the king prorogued it for fifteen months!

Affairs had not improved in Scotland. Archbishop Sharp still tyrannized over the consciences of men, and Lauderdale and his duchess sold the honors and employments of the state. But at length the persecutions of the primate seemed to produce so much mischief and threaten so much danger, that the indolent Charles roused himself for a moment, and commanded Sharp to hold his hand and attend to spiritual concerns alone. In the year 1668 a young Covenanter named James Mitchell, who had fought in the battle on the Pentlands, and who had witnessed the horrid executions which followed it, thought himself inspired by Heaven to kill the apostate archbishop, and, choosing his time, he fired a pistol into his carriage. A cry was raised of murder, but some one said it was only a bishop; and so universally was Sharp hated, that nobody offered to seize the assassin, who stepped into a house, changed his coat and wig, and then came back and mixed in the crowd. He had, however, missed his aim; for, though the Bishop of Orkney, who was in the same carriage, was badly wounded in the wrist, Sharp was not touched. Proclamations were issued offering great rewards, but not one would betray or inform against Mitchell. In the month of October, 1669, Lauderdale held a parliament, in which the project of a union between the two kingdoms was again agitated, to be again cast aside as impracticable. But Lauderdale carried measures which he had at least as much at heart. The parliament, by one slavish vote, transferred the whole government of the church from themselves, and vested it in the king alone, who was declared to have an inherent right to it, and to an absolute and uncontrolled supremacy; and by another act they settled that the considerable Scottish army which had been raised should be kept up, and that these troops should be ready to march into any part of the king's dominions for any cause in which his majesty's authority, power, or greatness might be concerned, upon orders transmitted to them from the council-board. By these two votes Scotland was thrown prostrate, and her sons were marked out for the service of making the English as much slaves as themselves. But a little later the parliament that made these dangerous concessions took fire at monopolies and taxes upon brandy and tobacco; and they became so unruly that Lauderdale hastened to a dissolution. After this check it was considered prudent to have recourse to measures of gentleness and conciliation. In 1673 Lauderdale followed up some minor indulgences to the Covenanters by the publication of an act of grace pardoning all offenses against the Conventicle Act: but this lenity was correctly attributed to weakness; it gained no hearts; and in the increasing and multiplying conventicles the fiery preachers taught an enthusiastic multitude to hate episcopacy more than ever, and to abhor the court and government which had forced bishops upon them at such an expense of blood and suffering. Christian gentleness was not to be expected: the people made their Arminian pastors suffer almost as much as the bishops made the Presbyterians; in the greater part of the country no intrusive minister could perform service unless he were backed by dragoons; and their parish churches became like pest-houses, and were abandoned and locked up.

A.D. 1676. The war which Louis had kindled by his violent attack on the Dutch commonwealth was now become general in the Low Countries, in Spain, in Sicily, on the Upper and Lower Rhine, in Denmark, in Sweden, in the German provinces, and it was carried on at one and the same time in the Mediterranean, the Ocean, and the Baltic. France supported this war with seeming honor and advantage on nearly every side, but at a ruinous expense. She fought almost single-handed, for, of her three allies, Bavaria, Hanover, and Sweden, only the last made a diversion in her favor. What favored her more than her friends was the want of concert among her enemies, with the straggling nature of the territories of Spain and the empire, and the disaffection which prevailed in parts of those territories, and which she skillfully encouraged. Thus Messina, the second city in Sicily, had revolted against the Spanish viceroy, and Louis had sent a fleet thither; and thus the Hungarians were about taking up arms against the emperor, who had invaded their privileges, and Louis was in close correspondence with the disaffected there. De Ruyter, who was dispatched by the Prince of Orange to assist the Spaniards in Sicily, died of a wound he received off Messina. On the other hand, Louis's great general, Turenne, was killed near the village of Saltzbach, on the Rhine, and after his death the imperialist general, Montecuculi, defeated the French in several encounters, crossed the Rhine, and recovered Alsace. Directed by the genius of Vauban, who revolutionized the science of fortification, and the art of defending and attacking places of military strength, the French continued to be rather successful in their sieges; the Prince of Orange was compelled to raise the siege of Maestricht, and, in attempting to relieve St. Omer, he was defeated with great loss. In the words of Bolingbroke, this prince "raised more sieges and lost more battles than any general of his age had done; but his defeats were manifestly due in great measure to circumstances independent of him; and that spirit, which even these defeats could not depress, was all his own."[1] Under the very partial auspices of the English court, an interminable treaty had been transferred from Cologne to Nimeguen, where a sort of congress was opened in the summer of the preceding year. But the hollow talk of diplomatists did not interrupt the roar of cannon; the war went on, and during its vicissitudes Charles again sold himself to Louis, who engaged to pay him an annual pension of £100,000, and to send over French troops if required. Charles wrote this secret treaty with his own hand, and signed it with his private seal, while his brother James, Danby, and Lauderdale, all knew of the transaction. Chiffinch, the valet and back-stairs man, received the moneys from the French minister, and Charles signed the receipts.[1]

A.D. 1677. On the 5th of February parliament met in the midst of great popular excitement—for men had begun to believe that the king had made up his mind to do without parliaments. In the Lords, as well as in the Commons, the opposition began the session by questioning the legality of the long prorogation. The Duke of Buckingham maintained that, by the very length of the prorogation, this parliament had ceased to exist, and Shaftesbury and Wharton supported him. But Danby was too strong for them, and not only were they out-voted, but they were in an arbitrary manner committed to the Tower. In the House of Commons there were too many members that gained by keeping their seats, and too much French money had just been shared among them,[2] to allow that House to pronounce its own dissolution; and the country party were left in a minority of 142 to 193. The Lords now brought in a bill for the security of the church in case of the succession of a Catholic prince—for Charles, though well provided with illegitimate sons and daughters, had no children by the queen, and his brother James, the declared papist, remained heir to the crown. By this bill an immense power was to be given to the bishops.[3] The Commons, however, were indignant at its encroachments; they asserted, with some reason, that it would vest the sovereign power in the Bench; and, after two readings, they allowed the bill to sleep. The Lords originated a bill for the more effectual conviction and prosecution of popish recusants, but doing away with the awful punishment of death. The Commons threw this out in a rage, and drew up and passed a merciless bill of their own to prevent the growth of popery, and keep up hanging. The Lords refused to give it a single reading. Both Houses, however, agreed in the abolition of the detestable writ de hæretico comburendo.

Still alarmed at the growing navy of the French, the Commons voted £600,000 for building new ships; but they took care to provide security for the proper employment of this money. Fresh successes and conquests on the part of Louis created fresh alarms; they saw that the French were securing themselves in the Spanish Netherlands; that Bolingbroke adds, in explanation of some of the difficulties and peculiarities of the Prince of Orange's case:—"He had difficulties in his own commonwealth; the governors of the Spanish Low Countries crossed his measures sometimes; the German allies disappointed and broke them often; and it is not improbable that he was frequently betrayed. He was so perhaps even by Souches, the imperial general; a Frenchman, according to Bayle, and a pensioner of Louvois, according to common report and very strong appearances. He had not yet credit and authority sufficient to make him a center of union to a whole confederacy, the soul that animated and directed so great a body. He came to be such afterward; but at the time spoken of he could not take so great a part upon him. No other prince or general was equal to it; and the consequences of this defect appeared almost in every operation."

[3] The Lords' bill, which Danby is said to have concerted with the bishops themselves provided, among other things, that on the demise of the king the bishops should tender a declaration against transubstantiation to the successor, and certify into Chancery whether he had subscribed the declaration or not. If he had not subscribed, then they were empowered to appoint to all bishoprics and to present to all benefices in the gift of the crown, and they were to take charge of the education of the children of the king.

the Prince of Orange was being again driven behind his dikes; and by means of some who are said to have "touched the moneys of Spain," the Commons voted an address, praying the king to take such steps as might be necessary to check the rapacity of the French monarch, and preserve the Netherlands.[1] If Charles could have gained by it, he would have broken his secret bargain with Louis; but the Commons had bound him more and more to the French interests, by tying up the £600,000, and betraying, on other occasions, a great shyness of trusting him with money. After some parliamentary manœuvers, when the whole nation began to cry for war with France, the Commons pledged themselves to supply the necessary funds. Thereupon the king demanded an immediate grant of £600,000 at the least. To forward this grant the emperor's ambassador and the ambassador of the King of Spain distributed £22,000 among the patriots in the House of Commons, while, to prevent it, the envoy of the King of France spent probably a larger sum in the same manner. In the end, the Commons refused the £600,000; upon which Charles refused to declare war without it, adjourned parliament from the 28th of May to the 16th of July, and applied to the King of France for an increase of his pension. Louis offered two millions of livres, making about £150,000; Charles demanded £200,000; and, after a good deal of chaffering, obtained the latter sum—in return for which he kept off the meeting of parliament for nearly a whole year. This was done, not by prorogation, but by adjournment, in order to keep the four lords in the Tower. Ill brooking so long a confinement, the Duke of Buckingham, Salisbury, and Wharton, made their humble submission, and were released. But Shaftesbury would not submit: he appealed to the law, and was heard in the King's Bench; but the judges refused to admit him to bail, and then, having made a noise by his long holding out, Shaftesbury submitted, and was liberated some six or seven months after Buckingham and the rest.[2]

During the long recess, Charles not only permitted his nephew, the Prince of Orange, to come over to England, but hastily made up a marriage between the prince and his niece, Mary, the elder daughter of the Duke of York by Anne Hyde.[3] James submitted reluctantly to this sudden union; and when Barillon, the French envoy, remonstrated, Charles told him that the measure was forced upon him by the jealous fears of the nation, particularly since the Duke of York had declared himself a Roman Catholic.[4] James afterward made a merit to himself of this Protestant marriage, and expressed his hopes that now none would suspect him of any intolerance or of any design to change the religion of the country. So essential was the neutrality of England to Louis, that he was obliged to conceal his resentment, lest his unsteady pensioner should go farther; and he condescended to listen patiently to terms of peace, which Charles proposed in the interest of his nephew. But at the same time Louis poured fresh troops into Flanders and invested Guislain. The excitement produced in England seemed dangerous, and Charles and his brother, who seldom agreed except in leaning to the French king, now went together into a treaty with the Prince of Orange and the States-General; and the English troops under the command of young Monmouth were recalled from the service of France. Then Louis stopped Charles's pension, and employed his money in bribing the leaders of the opposition in the House of Commons, who undertook so to limit the grants of public money as to make a war impracticable or little dangerous to the French king. These intrigues, however, would have failed, or could never have existed, but for the instinctive hatred of the English people to a standing army, and the suspicions spread far and wide that Charles and his brother intended to employ any army that might be raised, not in curbing the ambition of the French, but in destroying the liberties of the English people, and altering their religion by force.

A.D. 1678. The English parliament met sooner than had been appointed, and the king, announcing a treaty offensive and defensive with Holland, spoke roundly of a war with France, and of the necessity of putting ninety sail of ships in commission, and raising an army of 40,000 men. The opposition, who were afraid to make a too open resistance to a grant of money for this ostensibly Protestant war, attempted to embarrass the court with conditions and restrictions; but these manœuvers failed, and a supply was voted in general terms for the maintenance of a fleet of ninety sail and an army of 30,000 men. The victorious career of the French, who had now taken Ghent, Ypres, and other places, and had opened a road into the heart of Holland, set home jealousies to sleep for a time; regiments were raised with alacrity, and, to prove the sincerity of the court's intentions, two or three of them were sent instantly to protect Ostend against Louis. But still Charles refused to declare war; and a few must have known that he continued a secret correspondence with Louis all the while.[1] The Prince of Orange had no great confidence in his uncle the king, or in his uncle and father-in-law the duke; and the States-General, tired of their costly alliance with Spain and the emperor, were disposed to make a separate treaty without any very scrupulous regard for either of their allies. Still, however, Charles and his brother urged on the levies; and still the jealousies of the uses for which this army was really intended increased, and very naturally. Lord Russell, the purest of the patriots, though his patriotism was perhaps dimmed by religious intolerance, inveighed in the House of Commons against the dangers of popery and of a standing army; Sir Gilbert Gerard said pretty plainly that this army would never be employed in any other work than in putting down the liberties of the country; and an address was voted calling upon the king to declare himself. The French agents, who had paid money to some of the men who drove on these measures in the House, were astonished and irritated; but they were given to understand by the patriots, that if Charles could render them (the opposition) unpopular, as averse to the pretended Protestant war, he would be enabled to crush them, and command, by the help of his army, a slavish parliament to do whatever he chose; and though Ruvigni and Barillon knew that their master, Louis, hated parliaments in the abstract, they were perfectly well aware that he relied very little upon Charles. They, therefore, pretended to be satisfied, and continued their intrigues both with the king and the patriots. The Lords rejected the address of the Commons which was carried up to them by Lord Russel, maintaining that, as the intentions of Spain, the empire, and Holland were not really known, it would be folly for the King of England to commit himself by a declaration of war. The Lords were right; but those who carried the House with them, and who knew that the allies were in reality ready to conclude a peace, ought also to have known that the king could have no foreign use for the army he was raising. The French ministers, at the congress of Nimeguen, had already offered a peace upon condition of being allowed to retain two of the five towns they had taken in Flanders—Tournay and Valenciennes; and now the emperor, the court of Spain, and the Prince of Orange, intimated to the King of England that they were ready to treat upon that condition. Charles made haste to communicate secretly with Louis, and to ask a pension of six millions of livres for the three following years, as the price of his guarantying the acceptance of the treaty by the allies.[1] But Louis, flushed with his recent successes in the field, told Montague that he must have Ypres and Condé as well as Tournay and Valenciennes, and that he would satisfy his English majesty through orders he would send to Barillon; and, in effect, Barillon fully satisfied Charles with a new money bargain; and another infamous treaty was concluded, wherein the King of England agreed, for six millions of livres, to break with the States-General if they did not accept the terms offered by France—to recall his troops from Flanders—to observe a strict neutrality—to disband his army—and to prorogue, and then dissolve, the present parliament. In the mean time the Commons had required that Charles should either pay off the troops that had been raised, or join the allies and declare war against France. On the 4th of June they voted the sum of £200,000 upon condition that the troops should be paid off with it immediately. They also granted £200,000 for the navy; but they voted that no question of further supplies should be entertained that session. Charles summoned them before him in the House of Lords, and endeavored to cajole them out of £300,000 per annum as an addition to his fixed revenue; but the Commons were firm, and all that could be obtained from them was a new bill consolidating the grants they had made in a general supply. Then, on the 15th of July, he prorogued the parliament.

[1] In all these transactions there was complicated trickery. Secretary Coventry was instructed to write a dispatch directing Montague, the ambassador at Paris, to sound the French court, and to do nothing more. This dispatch was probably submitted to the whole of the council. But, in addition to the dispatch, there was a secret money-letter to which Charles put a postscript in his own handwriting to assure the French king that the letter was written by his own order. Danby was the penman, and the letter was not forgotten in his impeachment.—Dalrymple.

The diplomatists at Nimeguen had settled a peace upon the conditions offered by Louis, and an armistice for six weeks was proclaimed to allow the reluctant government of Spain time to make up its mind. But, on a sudden, the French commissioners declared that, their master being bound to see an entire restitution made by the emperor to his ally, the King of Sweden, of all he had lost in the war, he could not restore the towns in Flanders to the Spaniards till his ally the Swede was satisfied.

The States-General, who had driven for a separate peace sorely against the will of the Prince of Orange, were confounded by this pretension of making their frontier answerable for places which had been taken from the Swede by the emperor, the King of Denmark, and the Elector of Brandenburg; and, not knowing to whom else they might address themselves, they applied to the King of England. Charles chuckled over the deepening game, fancying that he must get more money out of its difficulties. It was natural for one who associated so much with players to acquire some skill in acting. He put on a virtuous indignation at the bad faith and rapaciousness of his brother of France; while the Duke of York declared that Louis was seeking the dominion of all Europe, and that England alone could check him. More English troops were shipped for Flanders, and Sir William Temple was sent to the Hague, where, within a week he concluded with the States a treaty binding England to enter upon the war instantly, if Louis did not give up his pretension of keeping the towns in Flanders as security for Sweden. But, while this was a-doing, Charles, in the apartments of his French mistress, the Duchess of Portsmouth, was laughing, with his brother James and Barillon, at the credulity of those who believed that he was in earnest,[1] and was telling Barillon to write for more French money; and shortly after he dispatched the Earl of Sunderland to negotiate with Louis for the dissolution of the alliance just made by Temple, and for satisfaction to Sweden, moyennant subsidies to himself. But Louis, who was at least his match in cunning and duplicity, secretly revealed these proposals to the States-General, to show them what reliance they could place on such an ally as his English majesty; and then, impelled by the commercial impatience of Amsterdam and the other great cities, which were, moreover, jealous of the growing power of the Prince of Orange, which they fancied might subvert their liberties, the States hurried to sign a separate treaty with Louis, that completely broke the coalition. By this treaty the Spanish Netherlands—the rampart by land of Holland—were left at the mercy of the French; but the Prince of Orange boldly resolved to do something with his sword in spite of the pen of Beverning and his colleagues at Nimeguen. The treaty between the States and France was concluded on the 10th of August; and as it was known in London, it must have been known in the neighborhood of Brussels, where the prince then lay with his army. Yet, on that day, the not over-scrupulous William fell upon the French, and gave them such a beating as they had not suffered for several years. The Duke of Luxembourg was besieging Mons, a most important frontier town of Flanders, and he had not, it appears, suspended his operations very strictly during the armistice. It was of the utmost importance to preserve the place; and the Prince of Orange, collecting the Spanish confederates under the Duke of Villahermosa, and some of the English auxiliaries commanded by the gallant Lord Ossory, and all very ready to fight the French, took Luxembourg by surprise, and forced him into a battle under the walls of Mons, and in the midst of his own beleaguer. After a dreadful conflict, in which five thousand brave men, of all sides, bit the dust, night separated the combatants. It was generally believed that if the Prince of Orange had been at liberty the next day to pursue his advantages, he might not only have relieved Mons, but have made a long-desired incursion into France. But on the morrow, Luxembourg, at a conference, announced the conclusion of peace between France and Holland; and William, "bound by a limited authority," was obliged to retire toward Nivelles. Charles now endeavored to make the States-General break the treaty, and he invited his nephew to join him in a bonâ fide war. "Was ever any thing so hot and so cold as this court of yours?" said the Prince of Orange: "Will the king never learn a word that I shall never forget since my last passage to England, when in a great storm, the captain was all night crying out to the man at the helm, Steady! steady! steady? If this dispatch had come twenty days ago, it had changed the face of affairs in Christendom, and the war might have been carried on till France had yielded to the treaty of the Pyrenees, and left the world in quiet for the rest of our lives: as it comes now, it will have no effect at all."[1] Charles then turned to Louis, who, for the present, suspended the wages of his infamy. The States-General stepped into his post of mediator, and, under their management, both Spain and the empire were included in the treaty, and peace was restored to the continent in the month of October. By the peace of Nimeguen, Holland recovered all she had lost, and made very advantageous commercial arrangements with Louis. Spain ceded to France the province of Franche-Compté, which naturally belonged to her, and twelve fortresses in Flanders: the Empire gave to Louis Fribourg instead of Philipsbourg; the King of Denmark and the Elector of Brandenburg restored their conquests to Sweden; and Louis XIV. became the arbiter of Europe.[2]

Before this temporary settlement of the affairs of the continent, England became involved in fresh disgrace—in a plot which has not a parallel in the annals of civilized mankind. Many adroit politicians had long been convinced that the only lever by which to raise up a stern, popular opposition to the encroachments and schemes of the court, was the old and sturdy hatred to popery—that there would be no chance of keeping the people free, unless they could convince them that there was a design on foot to make them Catholics at all hazards, and at any cost of blood and crime. There had been one or two little preludes; but on the 12th of August, 1678, while the king was walking in St. James's Park, he was accosted by one Kirby, who told him that his enemies had a design upon his life, and that he might be shot in that very walk. Charles stepped aside, and appointed Kirby to meet him at the house of Chiffinch, where his majesty was accustomed to meet a very different kind of company—his panders and his women. There Kirby informed him that two persons named Grove and Pickering had engaged to shoot him, and that Sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, had undertaken to poison him. All this intelligence Kirby said he had received from his friend Dr. Tonge, a divine of the church of England, who was well known to several persons about the court. Charles agreed to see the doctor, and Tonge presented him with an immense roll of papers which contained the full particulars of the plot drawn out under forty-three heads. This was too much for the patience of the king, who referred the parson with his papers to Danby, the treasurer and prime minister. Danby asked Tonge who had written the papers? The doctor answered that they had been secretly thrust under his door, and that, though he guessed, he did not exactly know by whom. After a few days, however, Tonge told the treasurer that he had ascertained his suspicions as to the author to be well founded; that he had met the individual in the streets, who had given him further particulars of the horrible conspiracy, desiring that his name might be concealed lest the papists should murder him. Danby went to the king, and proposed the instant arrest of the alledged assassins; but Charles, who is said to have believed from the beginning that the whole thing was a gross imposture, declined taking this step, and requested that the matter should be kept secret even from the Duke of York, saying that it would only create alarm, and might perhaps put the notion of murdering him into some head that otherwise would never have thought of it. But Tonge, the chief performer in this ante-piece, soon waited upon Danby with information that there was a terrible packet going through the post-office to Bedingfield, the Duke of York's confessor, then at Windsor. The lord-treasurer posted down to Windsor to intercept this packet; but he found that the letters were already in the hands of the king. Bedingfield had shown them to his penitent, who had delivered them to his brother; and the king, the duke, and the Jesuit had examined them together, and his majesty had been convinced that they were forgeries sent on design to be intercepted, to give credit to the revelations of Kirby and Tonge: but the duke's enemies, on the other hand, gave out that he had got some hints of the discovery of the real plot, and brought those badly-forged letters as a blind to impose on the king, while the real Jesuit letters were destroyed as soon as received by his confessor and himself. Charles would still have treated the whole story as the awkward plot or intrigue of an ill-constructed comedy; but James, seeing that the Jesuits, and even his own confessor, were accused, insisted upon a searching inquiry. It is not clear, however, that "the drivers" of the plot would have let the matter drop if the duke had been ever so still. Kirby, who had first warned the king in the Park, appeared repeatedly at court; and, failing to attract attention there, the mysterious friend of Dr. Tonge, who had written the forty-three articles, presented himself to Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, a magistrate of Westminster, and not only made his affidavit to those charges. but also to thirty-eight more articles which had been added to the original list. The magistrate perceiving that Coleman, an agent and factotum of the duke, and a personal friend of his own, was set down as a chief conspirator, immediately warned his friend, and Coleman communicated with his master, the Duke of York. It was now impossible to keep the business a secret; and Dr. Tonge, being summoned before the council, was commanded to produce his informant. Thereupon, on the 28th of September, Titus Oates appeared before that board in a new suit of clothes and a clerical gown. With the most marvelous self-possession and fluency he commenced and continued his incredible story. He stated — 1. That the pope claimed possession of these kingdoms on account of the heresy of the people, and had delegated his supreme authority to the society of Jesuits. 2. That the Jesuits had undertaken to expel this heresy, and reëstablish the Catholic faith. 3. That, in furtherance of this plan, some of the society were employed in Ireland, some in Scotland (under the disguise of Covenanters), some in Holland, and some in England, where they were not only plotting the murder of the king but of the duke also, if his highness should oppose their attempt or refuse his concurrence. 4. That these Jesuits had £100,000; that they were in the receipt of £60,000 a-year in rents; and had obtained £10,000 from the confessor to the French king, and the promise of an equal sum from the provincial of New Castile. 5. That a man named Honest William, and Pickering, a lay-brother of the order, had been repeatedly commissioned to shoot the king, and had been punished for their neglect. 6. That, in the preceding month of April, a grand consult of Jesuits from all parts had been held at the White Horse Tavern in the Strand, and had there provided three sets of pistol-assassins; and had, besides, offered £10,000 to Sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, if he would do the thing quietly by poison: Oates pretended not to know how Wakeman behaved, but swore that he had often seen him with the Jesuits since that meeting at the White Horse. 7. That he had been himself urged to shoot the king. 8. That a wager was laid that the king should eat no more Christmas pies: and that, if he would not become R. C. (Rex Catholicus), he should no longer be C. R. 9. That the Jesuits had been the authors of the great fire of London, and were now concerting a plan for the burning of Westminster, Wapping, and all the shipping in the river; and that he (Oates) had a post assigned him among the incendiaries. 10. That the pope had already, by a secret bull, filled up all the bishoprics and dignities in the church, and had appointed Lord Arundel to be his chancellor, Lord Powis treasurer, Sir William Godolphin privy seal, Coleman secretary of state, Langhorne attorney-general, Lord Bellasis general of the papal army, Lord Petre lieutenant-general, Lord Stafford paymaster; and that other well-known Catholics, of less rank, had received inferior commissions from the provincial of the Jesuits.

To account for the means by which he was let into all these dangerous secrets, Oates affirmed that, as a convert to the Catholic religion, he had been admitted into the Jesuits' houses abroad; and this part of the story was true. His real and infamous history appears to have been simply this:— Titus Oates was the son of an Anabaptist preacher; his father had been chaplain to that Colonel Pride who purged the House of Commons; but Titus, when he saw how the restored government was purging the church and persecuting and impoverishing Non-conformists, conformed forthwith, and got himself ordained a minister of the establishment. This was a time of sudden conversions: the timid and the unscrupulous took refuge from the tyranny of intolerance in cunning, lying, and perjury. The son was sent to Cambridge, and took orders in the established church. Being obscure and friendless, he could obtain no living: and he pined on the scanty pay of a country curate. While in this condition he was twice convicted of perjury. He was afterward a chaplain on board a man-of-war; and from that situation he was dismissed with an increase of infamy. According to his own account, in the year 1676, he was admitted into the service of the Catholic Duke of Norfolk, and there became acquainted with one Byng, "that was a priest in the house," and with Kemish and Singleton, who told him "that the Protestant religion was upon its last legs," and that it behooved him and all men of his coat to hasten betimes home to the church of Rome; and thereupon, he, having had strong suspicions of the great and apparent growth of popery, to satisfy his curiosity pretended some doubts in his mind. But, upon conversation with these men, he found they were not men for his turn. Afterward he met with one Hutchinson, a saint-like man, or one that was religious for religion's sake; and him he found not for his turn either, "for his design was to deal with their casuists, that is, those of the society." But after Hutchinson had introduced him to a Jesuit, he found "they were the men for his turn, because they were the cunning, politic men, and the men that could satisfy him." He pretended to be convinced by the Jesuit's arguments, and he was reconciled to the church of Rome on Ash Wednesday, 1677. But Oates laid his hand upon his breast, and said God and his holy angels knew that he had never changed his religion, but that he had gone among them on purpose to betray them. After his reconciliation with the church of Rome, he was sent, as catechumen, over to the continent, and was admitted into the Jesuits' College at Valladolid in Spain. There Oates stayed about five months, when he was disgracefully expelled. He recrossed the Pyrenees, and appeared as a mendicant at the gate of the Jesuits' College at St. Omer, and was not only received but entertained there for some time, during which he lived among the students and novices. But he was again expelled with shame, and then he came home without coat or cassock, and either made or renewed an acquaintance with Dr. Tonge, rector of St. Michael's, in Wood-street, a great Protestant alarmist. This Tonge and Kirby clothed and fed him while he was writing out his plot; and they bought him the clerical gown and new suit in which he appeared before the council.

The members of that board heard his revelations with silent astonishment; but the Duke of York pronounced them a most impudent imposture. There were, however, several members of the council, moved by different motives and feelings, that were resolved to proceed with the inquiry. They asked Oates for documents—for letters or papers of some kind. He, who pretended to have been the bearer of Jesuit dispatches and letters innumerable, had not a scrap to produce; but he engaged to find abundance of documentary evidence if they would assist him with warrants and proper officers. And the council agreed to let him have both. On the morrow Oates was again brought before the council, and this time the king was there. Charles, who did not believe one word of the whole story, was afraid of opposing his ministers in such a matter as this; but, on one or two occasions, he could not wholly conceal his feelings. He desired that Oates might be made to describe the person of Don Juan, to whom, as he said, he had been introduced during his travels. The informer said that Don Juan was tall, thin, and swarthy. Here Charles turned to his brother, the duke, and smiled; for their old acquaintance, the Spanish bastard, showed the Austrian breed more than the Spanish, being short, fat, and fair. Charles also asked where Oates had seen the king of France's confessor pay down the £10,000. The informer replied, in the Jesuits' house, just by the king's house. Here Charles, who knew Paris rather better than Oates, exclaimed: "Man, the Jesuits have no house within a mile of the Louvre." But, notwithstanding all this, Charles posted off to Newmarket races, leaving the council to make what it would of the plot, and Oates to be lodged at Whitehall under his royal protection.

It is maintained by most writers, upon a variety of cotemporary authorities, that Danby, the prime minister, if he did not help to originate it, was anxious to encourage the ferment, which might absorb men's minds and prevent or delay the impeachment with which he was threatened in the next session of parliament. In ordering the arrest of the denounced Coleman, the agent of the Duke of York, the minister gave instructions that his papers should be seized; and this measure, with a variety of additional circumstances which came out one upon the other, contributed to make up a strange body of presumptive evidence, and to convert what at first seemed a wild vision into something like reality. Indeed the framers of the popish plot (supposing it to have been an invention) must have felt, in the end, something like the conjuror, who, while attempting to delude some old women by raising a sham devil, suddenly saw the real fiend grinning at his elbow. Coleman, who had absconded after the warning given to him by his friend Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, had destroyed or removed some of his papers, but enough were left and secured to prove that both he and his master the duke had been engaged in a dangerous correspondence with the French king, with that king's confessor (Father La Chaise), and with the pope's nuncio at Brussels, and that they had solicited money from La Chaise at Paris, and from the pope at Rome, for the purpose of changing religion in England. A few days after this discovery the popular ferment was increased tenfold by the disappearance of Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, who had taken the deposition of Oates, and who was supposed to have received confidential communications from Coleman. This magistrate left his house at Windsor on the morning of the 12th of October, and never returned more. He had been for some time greatly depressed in spirits, and had entertained apprehensions that he would be the first martyr in this plot. As soon as he was missed, the people unanimously hurried to the conclusion that he had been trepanned and murdered by the papists; and the papists, in self-defense, perhaps, but certainly to the injury of their own cause, gave out that he had run away for debt—that he had withdrawn to contract an indecorous marriage—that he had run away with a harlot—and, at last, that he had killed himself in an excitement, working upon an hereditary disposition to insanity. His brothers, who lived in the city, and his numerous friends, made search in all directions, but no traces of him could be found until the evening of the sixth day, when his body was discovered in a ditch by Primrose Hill, not far from Old St. Pancras Church: it was pierced through and through with his own sword, which came some inches out at the back, behind the heart. There was no blood on his clothes, or about him; his shoes were clean, as if he had not walked to that country spot; his money was in his pocket, and his rings were on his fingers; but there was nothing about his neck, and a mark was all round it an inch broad, which showed he was strangled: his breast, also, was marked all over with bruises, and his neck broken. "All this," says Burnet, "I saw, for Dr. Lloyd and I went to view his body; and there were many drops of white wax on his breeches, which he never used himself; and, since only persons of quality or priests use these lights, this made all people believe in whose hands he must have been; and it was visible he was first strangled and then carried to that place, where his sword was run through his dead body. . . Dr. Lloyd went and told the king what he had seen. The body lay two days exposed, many going to see it, who went away much moved with the sight; and, indeed, men's spirits were so sharpened upon it that we all looked on it as a very great happiness that the people did not vent their fury upon the papists about the town." According to one account, when the sword was drawn, there followed a copious discharge of blood, which could not have been the case if the weapon had been thrust into a dead body; but two surgeons, who had examined the body, afterward deposed that there was no evacuation of blood —that the breast was beaten as if with some obtuse weapon—and that the neck was broken. It has been said that these two surgeons betrayed profound ignorance of the phenomena attending sudden and violent death; but surely it required no great learning or science to speak to outward and visible circumstances like these: the most ignorant barber-surgeon of that day—the veriest clown among the host of spectators—was competent to tell whether the neck were broken, and whether the breast were bruised and beaten, or not. The coroner sat for two whole days on the body, and the finding of the inquest was, that Sir Edmondbury Godfrey had been barbarously murdered by some person or persons unknown. To those who reflected coolly upon all the circumstances of the case, Godfrey's murder must have appeared then, as it has ever since remained, a perplexing mystery; but, in that universal excitement, few or none were cool, while there were many who, for selfish or political ends, were resolved to fasten the murder upon the Catholics, and to make it a means of revolutionizing court and government. The ghastly body was carried from Primrose Hill to the habitation of the deceased, and there exhibited to many thousands who shuddered and wept over the Protestant martyr. The funeral was attended by an immense procession, having at their head seventy-two Protestant divines in full canonicals. Dr. Lloyd, the friend of the deceased, preached the funeral sermon, having "two other thumping divines standing upright in the pulpit, one on each side of him, to guard him from being killed, while he was preaching, by the papists."[1] And at this time so widely and wildly had the panic spread, that all Protestants, clergy or laity, Conformists or Non-conformists, royalists or republicans, of the court party or of the country party, considered their lives in danger, and, in many instances, adopted the most ridiculous precautions against an unseen enemy.

It was in this state of the public mind, when "reason could no more be heard than a whisper in the midst of the most violent hurricane,"[1] that (on the 21st of October) the parliament reassembled. After explaining to the House why he had not yet disbanded the army, and why he was so much in debt as to require immediately fresh grants, Charles adverted to the popish plot, stating that it was his intention to leave it to be investigated by the ordinary courts of law. Both Houses and some of his own ministers were dissatisfied with this light mention of the plot, and they soon made up for the king's coolness by their own scorching heat. They called before them Titus Oates, who never appeared without making copious additions to his original disclosures: they committed the Catholic lords Stafford, Powis, Petre, Arundel, and Bellasis to the Tower: they crammed the commoner prisons with papists; they declared "that there hath been, and still is, a damnable and hellish plot, contrived and carried on by the popish recusants, for assassinating the king, for subverting the government, and for rooting out and destroying the Protestant religion:" they proclaimed the great Titus the Saver of the Nation, and got him a pension of £1200 a-year. In these and other proceedings of the kind Shaftesbury was indefatigable, and his masterly hand was visible in what followed. Yielding to the storm, and never struggling with it to the risk of his personal convenience and pleasure, Charles commanded his brother to retire from the council, and assured the Commons that he would pass any bills they might present for present security against popery, or for future security in the reign of his successor, provided only they did not impeach the regular right of succession. But this was not enough, and a bill, passed in the Commons, to disable papists from sitting in either House, reached a third reading in the House of Lords. The Duke of York, who felt that the main object of this bill was to disqualify him, as a preliminary to his exclusion from the throne on account of his religion, made an earnest appeal to their lordships, shedding tears as he spoke. He said he now cast himself upon their favor in the greatest concern he could have in this world; he spoke much of his duty to the king, and his zeal for the good of the nation; and he solemnly protested that, whatever his religion might be, it should only be a private thing between God and his own soul, and that no effect of it should ever appear in the government. To save him, a proviso was introduced that the bill should not extend, in its operation, to his royal highness;[2] but, in the House of Commons, this saving proviso was carried by a majority of only two; and thus, after many attempts, the Catholic peers were excluded from their seats, which their successors did not regain till the year 1829. The doors of the Commons were already closed by the act passed in the preceding session, imposing upon members the oath of supremacy and the declaration against transubstantiation;[1] and thus it became the practice, as it had long been the principle, of the constitution that those who professed the ancient religion should have no voice in the state.

The trade of a Protestant witness had proved so profitable to Oates that it was not likely he should be left in the monopoly of it. His first rival, who almost immediately became a partner with him in the business, was William Bedloe, a worse-conditioned scoundrel than the great Titus himself—a regular jail-bird, a swindler, and a convicted thief. In his origin he was a stable-boy, but he had risen to be a gentleman's courier; and, still aspiring to higher things, he had put captain before his name, and traveled on the continent, making "a shift to live, or rather to exist, by his cheats." He had been recently liberated from Newgate, when the reward of £500 was offered for the discovery of the Primrose Hill murder. On his first appearance before the council, Bedloe pretended to no acquaintance with Oates, and to no knowledge of the main plot: all that he came to speak to was the murder; and he affirmed that he had seen the dead body of Godfrey at Somerset House, where the queen resided; that Lefevre, a Jesuit, had told him that he and Walsh, another Jesuit, with the assistance of my Lord Bellasis's gentleman and of a waiter in the queen's chapel, had smothered the magistrate between two pillows; and that, several nights after the horrible deed, three of the queen's retainers had removed the body from Somerset House. But as Oates, in defiance of common sense and common decency, had been allowed a regular crescendo, Bedloe proceeded to revel in the same indulgence; and on the very next morning, when introduced to the House of Lords, he recollected that the Jesuits Lefevre and Walsh had spoken of commissions given to the lords Powis, Bellasis, and Arundel. The king exclaimed, "Surely the man has received a new lesson during the last twenty-four hours." Bedloe again denied all acquaintance with Oates. Presently after he changed the two pillows, with which he said Godfrey had been stifled, into a linen cravat, as strangling answered better with the appearances about the neck exhibited by the dead body. In this fashion he altered, as well as added, with the least possible regard to verisimilitude. His crowning revelation, delivered on the 12th of November, seemed to be this: overlooking the material circumstances of his having denied all knowledge of the main plot, he said that, during his travels abroad, he had associated with English monks, Jesuits, nuns, &c., from whom he had learned that the king was to be murdered—that ten thousand men were to be embarked from Flanders, and landed on the coast of Yorkshire—that twenty or thirty thousand religious men and pilgrims were to sail from St. Jago, in Spain, and to land at Milford Haven—that the dukes of Monmouth, Ormond, and Buckingham, the lords Shaftesbury and Ossory, were to be murdered as well as the king—that the present army, the citizens of London, and all obstinate Protestantse, wre to be "utterly extinguished" —and that all the considerable Catholics in England not only knew of this plot, but had been sworn upon the sacrament to assist in its accomplishment. Perhaps Titus Oates was afraid of being left behind—perhaps the conjecture is well founded that, on the failure to exclude the Duke of York from the House of Peers, "the drivers" considered it expedient to prompt the witnesses to lay their accusations higher than they had hitherto done, in order that the king, freed from his present unfruitful marriage, might have a chance of legitimate children (with his illegitimates the court was stocked) by another wife. Whatever were the motives, Oates proceeded to accuse the neglected scion of the House of Braganza: he swore that he had seen a letter wherein Wakeman stated that the queen had given her assent to the murder of her husband; and that he himself had heard her exclaim, "I will no longer suffer such indignities to my bed: I am content to join in procuring his death and the propagation of the Catholic faith." When the witness told this new tale to the king he certainly knew that a project of dissolving the royal marriage had been entertained before by several of the king's ministers, and he imagined that the king would eagerly grasp at this fine opportunity; but Charles had still some remnant of conscience, or some lingering respect for the opinion of the world: he heard Oates with indignation; and he told Burnet that, considering his faultiness toward the queen in other things, he thought it would be a horrid thing to abandon her now. Oates, however, swore to the new story before the council, and then Bedloe came in to corroborate it. The Duke of Buckingham had once proposed to the king something very like the murder of his wife—that is, a plan for carrying off the queen to some plantation in the West Indies; and Charles suspected that, in this particular matter, in accusing her majesty, the duke had been more busy than any one. He had not courage to declare his conviction, and to proclaim Oates an impostor and the mouthpiece of a foul cabal; but he ordered that his papers should be seized, and that no person should be admitted to communicate with him in private. But Charles could not prevent his appearing at the bar of the Commons, where, on the 28th of November, he raised his voice as became the solemnity of the matter, and said, "I, Titus Oates, accuse Catherine, queen of England, of high treason." The Lords, however, would not join the Commons in an address for the removal of the queen, and the accusation was allowed to drop. At the same time the Upper House, so far from expressing any doubt as to the main plot, voted an address for the apprehension of all papists, and received impeachments of high treason against Stafford and the other four lords in the Tower. The king, wherever he durst venture, continued to declare that he did not believe a single word that Oates and Bedloe had advanced. One of his profligate courtiers,[1] who at times spoke unpalatable truths, said that his majesty knew a good deal more about the popish plot than the witnesses or than any one else; and Charles could scarcely have forgotten how far he had gone in plotting with the French king for the subversion of the religion and the constitution of his country. But neither these recollections and convictions, nor any others, could impel that thoroughly selfish man to make any effort to stop the shedding of blood, and cool the popular frenzy and that bloodthirstiness which happily never lasted long with the English people. The first victim was Stayley, the Catholic banker, who had not been mentioned by Oates and Bedloe, but who was denounced by a new witness—a destitute Scotchman—as being guilty of telling a Frenchman, in a public tavern or eating-house, in Covent Garden, that the king was the greatest rogue in the world, and that he would kill him with his own hand. Burnet, who knew Carstairs, this witness from Scotland, informed the lord chancellor and the attorney-general what a profligate wretch he was; but Jones, the attorney-general, took this in ill part, and called it disparaging the king's evidence;[2] and the unfortunate banker was condemned, and executed as a traitor at Tyburn. The case of Coleman was far more important, and admitted of better proof; and whether his offenses amounted to treason or not, and whether they were or were not connected with such an extreme and horrible plot, they were misdemeanors of a deep and traitorous die. Part of his papers he had destroyed, but enough remained to prove that he and his master (the duke) were undeserving of the name and rights of Englishmen.

[2] During the furious discussions the papist waiting-women of the queen and Duchess of York were not forgotten. A noble peer, supposed to be Lord Lucas, exclaimed—"I would not have so much as a popish man or a popish woman to remain here; not so much as a popish dog or a popish bitch; not so much as a popish cat to pur or mew about the king." Burnet says that the queen proposed that all her ladies should cast lots to see which should be included in a small number that she was to be allowed to retain; "only she named (her husband's mistress) the Duchess of Portsmouth as one whom she would not expose to the uncertainty of a lot, which was not thought very decent in her, though her circumstances at that time required an extraordinary submission in every thing."

It appeared from these letters that, in the years 1675 and 1676, Coleman had been in close correspondence with Father La Chaise, and had asked him repeatedly for money to forward a project in England, which "would give the greatest blow to the Protestant religion it ever had received." "We are," said Coleman, in another of his letters to the French confessor, "about a great work—no less than the conversion of three kingdoms, and the total and utter subversion and subduing of that pestilent heresy which has domineered over great part of this northern world a long time; there never was such hopes of success since the death of Queen Mary as now in our days. God has given us a prince who is become (I may say by miracle) zealous of being the author and instrument of so glorious a work; but the opposition we are sure to meet with is also like to be great; so that it imports us to get all the aid and assistance we can." In a letter addressed to the pope's nuncio, Coleman said that they had great designs in agitation—designs worthy of being supported by the nuncio and his friends with all their power. "We have no doubt," added Coleman, "but to succeed; and it may be to the utter ruin of the Protestant party, if you join with us in good earnest, and cordially second our interest." It was fully proved then by his own letters, and admitted by his own confessions, that he had received money from France; and it is known now,[1] from others of his letters, that he had asked money from the pope. He said on his trial, that the French money was to bribe members of parliament to do the will of Louis, or to reward himself for sending secret information of what was passing in England. But what was the pope's money to have been for? He maintained that the great project for which he had solicited foreign money and coöperation was nothing more than to restore the Duke of York to his post of high-admiral, and to procure a toleration for the Catholics; but he failed to convince the jury; and we confess that, without sharing in their heat and prejudices, we share in their incredulity, feeling perfectly convinced that Coleman could not have been working for less than the king, who had bargained with Louis for the forcible imposition of popery upon an enslaved nation. The attempt to connect Coleman with the alledged design of murdering the king appears in the cool eye of reason to have been an absolute failure; and here, as in all the other cases, Oates and Bedloe were guilty of blundering perjury. Scroggs, the chief justice, and a scoundrel, was as violent and partial as possible; but his summing up, in reference to the famous passage in the letters, was acute and convincing; it not only convicted Coleman, but raised a general conviction of the truth of a plot—and a plot there was, though not Oates's[2]—a plot where the king would have been the proper witness, and where the evidence would have fallen on his own head. Coleman had always passed for a busy, intriguing, vain, frivolous man; but he died like a brave man, resisting all temptations to save his life by accusing his master and his friends. Father Ireland, who was said to have signed, with fifty other Jesuits, the great resolution of killing the king, was then tried, together with Grove and Pickering, who were said to have undertaken to carry the resolution into effect. The jury, upon the perjured and contradictory evidence of Oates and Bedloe, returned a verdict of guilty against all three. "Gentlemen," said the brutal Scroggs, "you have done like very good subjects, and very good Christians, that is to say, like very good Protestants; and now much good may their thirty thousand masses do them." The victims died pro-

[2] "The thing," adds Burnet, "grew public, and raised great clamor against me. . . . I had likewise observed, to several persons of weight, how many incredible things there were in the evidence that was given; I wished they would make use of the heat the nation was in to secure us effectually from popery; we saw certain evidence to carry us so far as to graft that upon it; but I wished they would not run too hastily to the taking of men's lives away upon such testimonies. Lord Hollis had more temper than I expected from a man of his heat; Lord Halifax was of the same mind; but the Earl of Shaftesbury could not bear the discourse: he said we must support the evidence, and that all those who undermined the credit of the witnesses were to be looked on as public enemies."

fessing their innocence; but the received opinion about Jesuitism prevented alike any belief and any pity. Bedloe had played second to Oates; but Oates could not or would not support Bedloe in his original part, and therefore a second witness was wanted to prove the murder of Sir Edmondbury Godfrey. There was one Prance, a Catholic and a silversmith, who frequently worked for the Queen's chapel, and who had absented himself from his house for two or three days, about the time when the murder was committed—at least so deposed a lodger in his house. Upon this information Prance was seized and carried to Westminster. Bedloe swore that he was one of those whom he had seen about Godfrey's body in Somerset House. Prance denied all knowledge of the murder, and it was proved that he had left his house, not at the time, but a week before. This, however, served him nothing; he was thrown into a dungeon, and loaded with irons—some say he was tortured. In a few days he confessed he was concerned in the murder, and charged Hill, Green, and Berry, three obscure men who were employed about Somerset House and the queen's chapel there. Prance said that they had had several meetings in a certain ale-house, where the priests persuaded them it would be a meritorious action to dispatch Godfrey, who had been a busy man in taking depositions against them; and that the taking him off would terrify others. The people of the ale-house confirmed the fact of their meetings, but nothing more. Prance further stated that, the morning before they killed Godfrey, Hill went to his house to see when he was going out, and spoke there to his maid. The maid, upon being examined apart, stated that, on the morning in question, a person had really called, and, upon being conducted to Newgate, she pointed out Hill, who was mixed in a crowd of prisoners, as the person that had asked for her master the morning before he was lost. Prance gave a minute account of the manner the murder was committed, and the body afterward conveyed to the spot where it was found.[1]

Some days after this, he desired to be carried to the king. Charles would not see him alone, but assembled the council, before whom Prance denied all that he had formerly sworn, and said his whole story was a fiction. Yet, as soon as he was carried back to prison, he sent the keeper of Newgate to the king to assure him that all he had sworn was true. But again he retracted and denied every thing. Then Dr. Lloyd, who had preached the funeral sermon of the deceased magistrate, was sent to talk with him. At first Prance denied every thing to the divine. "But," adds Burnet, "Dr. Lloyd said to me that he was almost dead through the disorder of his mind, and with cold in his body; but, after that Dr. Lloyd had made a fire, and caused him to be put in a bed, and began to discourse the matter with him, he returned to his confession, which he did in such a manner, that Lloyd said to me it was not possible for him to doubt of his sincerity in it. Upon their trial, Green, Hill, and Berry brought witnesses to prove that they were at home by an early hour on the nights when the murder and the removal of the body were alledged to have taken place; that no dead body could have been concealed in the house mentioned by Prance; and that no sedan-chair had come out of Somerset House. There was also in favor of the prisoners a wide difference between the depositions of Prance and those of Bedloe; and Hill did not neglect to lay hold of the equivocation and wavering of the former witness. He pleaded that Prance had retracted his first story, and, being thereby perjured, was an incompetent witness; but this was explained away by Chief Justice Scroggs, who said Prance had accused the prisoners upon oath, but had not retracted that accusation upon oath, and, therefore, could not be called perjured. Mrs. Hill, who was in court, where she distinguished herself by her spirited and sensible efforts to save her husband, asked Prance why he had denied all this. Prance replied that it was because of his trade, and for fear of losing his employment as silversmith to the queen and the Catholics, and because he had not received a pardon. "Were you not tortured?" asked Mrs. Hill. Prance answered in the negative. "It was reported about the town," said Mrs. Hill, "that he was tortured. There are several about the court that heard him cry out." She exclaimed, with good reason, "My witnesses are not rightfully examined; they are modest, and the court laughs at them." The three prisoners received sentence of death; and they all three died at Tyburn with solemn asseverations of their innocence. As Berry was a Protestant, the arguments against the Catholics, grounded on their alledged habits of equivocation, and the power of absolution held to belong to their priests, as well as on the spirit of partisanship which might lead them to deny the truth in this case, did not bear upon him; and it was well known that he was respited a week, and might have had his life if he would have confessed. But these circumstances appear to have had no effect upon the madness of the time. As is observed by one of the best narrators of these events—an historian no less industrious than acute—"a strong faith in the plot was the test of all political merit; not to believe, was to be a political reprobate; and according to the zeal was the cruelty of the times. The terror excited by the plot had caused such a thirst of revenge that nothing but blood could satiate; every supposed criminal was precondemned; and, no sooner did the victim appear, but the people called out for the sacrifice: pity was looked upon as not only impertinent, but almost criminal; and even the great prerogative of mercy lodged in the crown was of no use."[1] The Protestant pulpit gave forth no note of peace and mercy; on the contrary, the preachers opened the graves of the Catholic dead, and put them to a second death, expounding to ignorant hearers how the casuistry of the Jesuits justified the most atrocious means by the end, and insisting that the dying words of a Catholic, where his church was concerned, merited no credence or attention whatsoever.

[1] This is the substance of Prance's deposition:—"1. The papists, because Sir Edmundbury seemed an enemy to the queen's servants, and would not consent to discharge one Girald from parish duties (as another justice did) resolved and contrived to take away his life. 2. Pursuant to which design they hired (for what reward the deponent doth not know) Hill, Green, Kelly, the deponent, Girald, and Berry, to do the fact. 3. Accordingly, the above-named persons trepanned Sir Edmundbury into Somerset House, about eight or nine o'clock at night; but the deponent doth not well remember the day. 4. This trepan was effected thus: Green gave the deponent notice that he and Girald had set Sir Edmundbury in St. Clement's; and Hill decoyed him down to the Water-gate under pretense of parting a fray between two fellows quarreling in the yard. 5. When they had him near the rails by the queen's stables, Green strangled him with a twisted handkerchief; then, finding him still alive, wrung his neck quite round, and punched him with his knee in the open yard; which done, they dragged him into Dr. Godwin's lodgings. 6. On the Monday following, precisely between nine and ten o'clock at night, the body was shown to the deponent by Hill, Green, and Girald, in a room in the back square court below stairs, next the garden; there it was (by the help of a dark lantern) that he, deponent, saw the body in the company of the said Hill, Green, and Girald, who were only present. 7. On the next Wednesday after, about twelve o'clock at night, the dead body was put into a sedan, and carried out by the deponent and Girald into Covent Garden, where Green and Kelly took him up, and carried him to Long Acre. There the deponent and Girald resumed their burden, and carried him to the Soho; from thence he was conveyed astride on horseback, before Hill, into the fields, where they thrust his sword through his body, and cast him into a ditch." Ralph gives in a parallel column the deposition of Bedloe. It seems to us that no inequality [illegible], nor any other circumstance or accident whatsoever, can be possibly made to reconcile or explain the discrepancies between the two papers.

While these events were in progress, a variety of intrigues hastened the dissolution of this longest parliament. Shaftesbury had resolved to ruin Danby; and Danby had quarreled with Montague, the ambassador at Paris, who knew all the secret treaties with Louis, having been an active agent himself in these nefarious transactions. Accident made this Montague figure as a patriot; but he was more the slave of the court, and more meanly corrupt, than the minister he attacked; and if he had not offended the king as well as Danby, we should have heard nothing of his patriotism at this time. The Duchess of Cleveland, though now a cast-off mistress, still claimed and obtained a great share in the royal regard. She had removed her person and her vices to the congenial atmosphere of Paris, where she intrigued with various Frenchmen, amorously as well as politically, being protected by Louis, who thought to make her useful by means of her connections in the English court. Montague, after making love to herself, made love to her daughter,[2] and then replied to her furious reproaches by threatening to disclose her intrigues to his master. Thereupon the duchess denounced the ambassador, trusting to have the first word and the best argument with her old lover. Her letter to Charles was a compound of debauchery, intrigue, and superstition; and as Charles had a superstitious belief in astrology, all these ingredients had their effect. She told the king how Montague had behaved as a lover; that Montague hated him and despised both him and his brother; that he had said he wished the parliament would send them both to travel again, for that the king was a dull, governable fool, and the duke a willful fool; that the king always chose a greater beast than himself to govern him; that he would do any thing for money and pleasure; that, so long as he was furnished with money for his pocket and his wenches, he might be led by the nose; that he (Montague) had plotted against Danby and the Duchess of Portsmouth, now maîtresse en chef, against whom she (the cast-off mistress) had no malice whatever; that he had bribed a conjurer, or fortune-teller, in whom the king "had great faith, for that he had at several times foretold things to him that were of consequence," in order to make the man, who was poor, shape his predictions according to his (Montague's) desires and schemes, &c., &c.[1] Of a sudden his excellency the ambassador, in spite of the express orders of the court, came over to England, placed himself in the most intimate relations with Barillon, the intriguing French ambassador, with Shaftesbury and his party, and got himself returned to parliament for the borough of Northampton. The prime minister thought it better to commence the attack than to wait for it; and on the 19th of December his chancellor of the exchequer signified that he was commanded by his majesty to inform the House of Commons that his majesty had received information that his late ambassador in France, Mr. Montague, a member of their House, had held several private conferences with the pope's nuncio there without any direction or instruction from his majesty, and that his majesty, in order to know the truth of that matter, had given order for seizing Mr. Montague's papers. The House attempted to screen Montague with the privileges of parliament, but it was too late: the king had got the papers, and treated their remonstrances with contempt. Montague, however, soon told the House the whole affair was a mere artifice contrived by the treasurer, Danby, to save himself; but that his lordship had deceived himself, for, though most of his papers had been seized, he had by good luck saved some very important letters which might tend to the security of the king and kingdom. Hereupon the Commons sent some of their members to bring the said papers before them. A small dispatch-box was brought, and from it Montague produced two letters written to him by Danby, soliciting money from Louis in the name of the king. The second of these letters was that infamous one already mentioned, with the postscript in Charles's own hand: "This is writ by my order." The speaker read both letters to the House, which "served as a lighted match to the train which had been long laid to blow up the treasurer." In the midst of the most violent excitement, the House voted, by a majority of sixty-three, that these letters contained sufficient matter for an impeachment; and they immediately appointed a committee, of which Montague was one, to draw up the articles. These articles, which as usual contained several absurdities and falsehoods, were carried up to the Lords, and the Earl of Danby was impeached in the usual forms. A motion was made that his lordship should withdraw from his seat; but this was overruled by a majority of twenty, and Danby rose in his place to rebut the charges. He pleaded the duty of obedience to the king, who had dictated the letter; that he had never been either a papist or a friend to the French, though he had reason to believe that the principal informer of the House of Commons had been assisted by French advice in getting up this accusation. He well knew, however, that, besides the correspondence with the French king, he had been guilty of several serious unconstitutional offenses, and he took shelter under an admission of such misdemeanors to avoid the capital charge of treason. The question whether he should be committed to the Tower as a traitor was, however, fiercely debated in the Lords; and the motion of his committal was rejected only by a very narrow majority. Besides this troublesome impeachment, Charles had many other reasons for dissolving this parliament, which he could no longer manage. He therefore prorogued it on the 30th of December, and dissolved it by proclamation on the 24th of January. This Pension Parliament had sat more than seventeen years. Shaftesbury had called it the king's wife, and the dissolution was called a divorce. In the royal proclamation the cause assigned was, "the many inconveniences arising from the overlong continuance of one and the same parliament." Ralph says, with some quaintness and considerable spirit, "His majesty, in the course of many years' experience, had, without doubt, found equal cause to like and lothe it. While the first flame of their mutual affection lasted he was all grace and goodness, and they all submission and compliance: they were prodigal of their favors; he was as lavish of his thanks: he declared their approbation should be the standard of his government; they avowed an unalterable attachment to the prerogative: the full power of the scepter and sword they restored to him, and only reserved that of the purse, by way of security for their own privileges. But even in the midst of all those professions and acknowledgments on both sides, it appeared that each had a rival: his majesty cast an amorous eye toward popery; his parliament made an open tender of their affections to the church of England: jealousies and heart-burnings ensued; the king found it his interest to give way; the people paid for his concessions; and the church had the benefit. And now, his majesty having felt the curb, grew out of humor with the bridle, and called upon France to set him free. France promised fair: the king believed, and threw off all restraint, in the presumption that he was now the master; but necessity opened his eyes, and compelled him once more to court the assistance of those he had disobliged; who, having now got the better of their fondness, took advantage of that necessity, and now resolved to make a sale of their favors. Henceforward their intercourse was mutually mercenary: the king chaffered for a supply, and the party leaders set their prices; but, though willing to be bought, they were afraid to trust him with the purchase-money. Hence the very means of corruption failed, and they began to dread the power they had bestowed. Hence all their subsequent endeavors were to undo their own work, and reduce their monarch once more to the servant of the commonwealth; not, however, from honest motives, or by honest means, but by any means indiscriminately, and as our own barbarians on the sea-coasts hang out lights in tempestuous times, to mislead the mariner, that they may prey on the wreck. Good often rises out of evil: had not the king slighted this parliament, and had not they shown a proper resentment, the constitution had been long ago at an end: though their opposition was in many instances extravagant, and always partook of the leaven of faction, it served to awe the throne and keep the flame of liberty alive among the people."[1] But many things have since been brought to light which this writer knew not, or saw only, as through a glass, darkly. Not satisfied with adopting the spirit and using all the resources of faction at home, the patriots maintained a clandestine intercourse with the French ambassador, in order to detach Louis from Charles, to crush the Duke of York and the popish faction, and to procure the dismissal of Danby and the disbanding of the standing army, the existence of which was at times agreeable to the French monarch, while at others it was odious and alarming to him. The King of England began these un-English practices with the old enemy of the country's religion, liberty, and honor, in order to establish a despotism; the opposition in parliament entered upon them to preserve freedom; and as their manœuvers with the French court seem actually to have compelled the reduction of the army—though at the price of some national honor abroad, and a sacrifice of European policy, as, by the reduction, a check upon the dangerous ambition of Louis XIV. was removed—their error or their crime in engaging in this perilous intercourse and unnatural alliance has been palliated by some, and even faintly and timidly justified by others.

[1] Harris, Life of Charles II., Appendix.—Burnet, who knew nothing of this letter, says—"Montague, who was a man of pleasure, was in an intrigue with the Duchess of Cleveland, who was quite cast off by the king, and was then at Paris. The king had ordered him to find out an astrologer, of whom it was no wonder he had a good opinion, for he had, long before his restoration, foretold he should enter London on the 29th of May, 1660. He was yet alive, and Montague found him, and saw he was capable of being corrupted; so he resolved to prompt him to send the king such hints as should serve his own ends. And he was so bewitched with the Duchess of Cleveland that he trusted her with this secret; but she growing jealous of a new amour," &c.

But there is worse remains behind: some of the leaders of these patriots soiled their hands and their souls with French gold! And for this charge we can admit of no possible palliation, unless we take refuge in a bold denial of the authority and evidence (generally admitted as valid ever since Dalrymple discovered them) upon which the whole charge rests. "When," says the discoverer, "I found in the French dispatches LORD RUSSELL intriguing with the court of Versailles, and ALGERNON SIDNEY taking money from it, I felt very nearly the same shock as if I had seen a son turn his back in the day of battle."[2] For the baseness of Montague

we are prepared. It appears he was promised 100,000 crowns for ruining Lord Danby; but as far as Dalrymple could discover from the papers at Versailles, he did not actually receive more than 50,000 crowns. But Montague's sister, Lady Hervey, and several of his friends, received gratuities from time to time. The Duke of Buckingham asked for money much more frequently than he got it, though it should seem he obtained various payments. Lord Hollis (the Presbyterian Denzil Hollis of former times) refused a diamond snuff-box of the value of £1500, though he was willing to take it with the privity of his master, Charles, as a present (not unusually made in such cases) at the termination of his embassy to the French court; and he died before he could be tempted with a second offer. The diamond snuff-box was afterward given to Lord St. Albans, who had expressed his expectation of receiving a present for the services he had done King Louis. Charles's French mistress was frequently coupled with his minister, the Earl of Sutherland, as an impatient claimant for similar rewards. In the following year we find Barillon proposing that Louis should give both the Duchess of Portsmouth and the Lord Sunderland regular pensions.[1] Sir Thomas Littleton, Hampden, Foley, and others of these patriot members of the House of Commons were men of very large property; so that an hypothesis has been resorted to to explain their meanness—"that they agreed among themselves not to run the chance of offending Louis, or exciting his distrust, by a refusal of his money."[2] This seems to us rather ingenious than convincing. Another hypothesis started by the same eminent writer is, that Barillon, who was notoriously a man of expensive habits, applied to his own uses many of the sums which he charged his master with as secret outlays among the English patriots, &c. And we have heard in recent times of an eminent foreign diplomatist who annually charged his court with considerable sums for diamond snuff-boxes that were never received, or even seen, by those to whom they were assigned in the peculating ambassador's dispatches. In Barillon's practice there is another loophole; but it does not admit the man of the best reputation—Sidney. There were two classes of those who were alledged to have received the money: one consisting of persons that were in actual communication with himself, like Algernon Sidney; the other consisting of men that Sir John Baber, a secret agent, dealt with for Barillon, who knew them not, or who never pretended to any direct personal dealings with them. In this second class were Littleton, Hampden, Sacheverel, and others; and the proof of their corruption rests on the assertion of a professional intriguer like Baber, who was "well known for a busy-body in tricking affairs."[1] The falsehood either of Baber to Barillon, or of Barillon to the French court, would acquit these considerable men. In secret transactions like these, which can only be conducted by knaves, we are justified in suspecting all kinds of knavery and mutual deception. Coleman, the Duke of York's creature, when on his trial for the popish plot, deposed that he had received £2500 from Barillon to be distributed among members of parliament, but had converted the money to his own use; and though Coleman had, seemingly, a motive to tell a lie, he yet may posssibly have spoken the truth in that matter.[2] These and other suggestions merit a deep consideration; but, after all, the decided bias of the generous mind which proposed the hypothesis was, that Barillon's accounts were true accounts—that the money was really paid and received! Louis XIV. had an obvious motive for these intrigues: their clandestine dealings made him, in a manner, master of both parties in England; and he might either embarrass the king through parliament, if Charles should pretend to an independent course of policy, or cast off and betray parliament when Charles should return to his base subservience.[3]

A.D. 1679. The elections for the new parliament were conducted with unusual heat and animosity. The court and the court party neglected no possible bribery, no exertion; but the country party were equally active, and, by making an extravagant use of the popish plot, they had the advantage over their opponents. To avert the storm Charles induced his unpopular popish brother to retire to Brussels; but before James went to the continent he exacted from the king a formal declaration of the illegitimacy of the young Duke of Monmouth, of whose popu-

[1] Roger North, Examen.—This high Tory's account of Baber is bitter, and yet true, in the main, as appears by a variety of cotemporary authorities. Roger says that he was "a man of finesse, and in possession of the protectorship at court of the dissenting preachers;" that the king, finding the dissenters ever active against him and his interests, "thought it the cheapest way to take off (as they called it) those bell-wethers, the teachers," and employed Sir John Baber to bribe these leaders "with good annual pensions," &c.

All his letters were full of their being able to do nothing for want of money; and he made the French ambassador believe he could do his master great service if he was well supplied: he got 2500 guineas from him, to gain his master some friends, and he applied it all to furnish out his own expense."—Own Times.

larity he was already excessively jealous. The new parliament met on the 6th of March. The first thing the Commons did was to quarrel with the king about the election of their speaker; the next, to renew the attack upon Danby. The Lords resolved the curious constitutional question—and their resolution has in modern times been adopted as a principle—that the proceedings on impeachments begun in one parliament are not affected by a dissolution, but may be taken up and continued in the succeeding parliament, as if no such interruption had taken place. Charles summoned the Commons to Whitehall, where he told them that the two letters taken out of the box were really written by his orders; that he had, therefore, given a full pardon to Danby, but, at the same time, for certain other reasons, he had dismissed him from his service. Although there was no want of precedents in former reigns, the Commons voted an address to the king against the validity of a pardon before trial, and they sent up a message to the Lords demanding justice. The Lords, who were devising how to throw aside the capital charge of treason, had issued a warrant for taking him into custody; but Danby had absconded. The Commons forthwith passed a bill of attainder, to take effect on the 15th of April, if the fallen minister did not previously appear to stand his trial; and the Lords, after some hesitation, adopted the bill. But on the 10th of April, Danby surrendered himself, kneeling at the bar of the Lords, who sent him to the Tower. The popular Lord Essex was put at the head of the treasury; but the chief management of affairs was left to the Earl of Sunderland, now secretary of state, who kept himself in favor by condescensions and connivances with the Duke of Monmouth and the Duchess of Portsmouth. But, by the advice of Sir William Temple, Charles constituted a new council of thirty persons, into which were admitted the most daring and the most popular leaders of the opposition, with the versatile Shaftesbury for their president.[1] Notwithstanding this calculated kindness, Shaftesbury urged on the Commons to vote the exclusion of the Duke of York from the throne. The accidental burning of a printing-house in Fetter-lane, and a report that the banished James was about returning with a French fleet and army, hastened the blow. And out of doors the great mass of the nation echoed from their hearts the position which Shaftesbury had delivered in parliament a few weeks before: "Popery and slavery, like two sisters, go hand-in-hand; and sometimes one goes first, and sometimes the other; but wheresoever the one enters, the other is always following close behind." The Commons, without losing much time, resolved, nemine contradicente, "That the Duke of York being a papist, and the hopes of his coming such to the crown, had given the greatest countenance to the present conspiracies and designs against the king and Protestant religion." They also voted addresses requesting his majesty to banish all papists twenty miles from London, and to put all sea-ports, fortresses, and ships into trusty hands; and, in conclusion of this day's work, they ordered that their Secret Committee should prepare to bring before them all such letters and papers as they had in their custody relating to the Duke of York. Lord Russell, though one of the new council of thirty, was selected to desire the concurrence of the Lords. The latter took time for consideration. Sir William Temple lays these exclusion proceedings to the charge of the aspiring Duke of Monmouth (who had been for some time plotting to prove a lawful marriage between his mother, Lucy Walters, and the king) and the Earl of Shaftesbury, between whom there existed a perfect union, and a supposed compact. that, if Monmouth should become king by right of birth and religion, Shaftesbury should drive the chariot of government by right of these dangerous services. Charles, in spite of his affection for his natural son, was, for many reasons very distinct from any generous fraternal affection, not disposed to sacrifice his brother; and all the new council, except two,[1] went with him into a scheme for quieting the religious fears of the nation, without proceeding to the extreme measure of an alteration in the order of succession. On the day when the Commons were to resume that question, and the Lords were to consider whether they should concur, the king, in a speech to both Houses, recommended the prosecution of the popish plot, the disbanding the standing army, and the providing a fleet for the national security; and then he told them that the lord chancellor had communications to make to them which would prove how his thoughts had been employed for the preservation of their religion, &c. The chancellor then propounded the medium scheme, which was, that provision should be made by parliament to distinguish a papist from a Protestant successor; that the authority of a popish prince should be limited and circumscribed so as to disable him from doing harm; that, under him, the whole patronage and management of the established church should be vested in Protestant trustees, and no ministers admitted to livings except the most pious and learned Protestants; that the judges, justices of the peace, lord-lieutenants, privy councilors, and officers of the navy should neither be appointed nor removed but by consent of parliament! Such provisions as these would scarcely have left the shadow of the royal prerogative, and would, most assuredly, never have been observed by James. The Commons rejected the scheme altogether, and proceeded with their famous bill of exclusion by which the crown was to pass to the next Protestant heir, as if the Duke of York were dead. At the second reading of this bill (on the 21st of May) 207 voted for, and 121 against it.[2]

[1] One of the great recommendations of this new council was, that, collectively, the members of it were worth a very large sum of money —"so that they might out of their own stock, upon a pinch, furnish the king, so as to relieve some great necessity of the crown." This was specially pointed out by Temple, the author of the scheme.—Sir W. Temple's Works.

[1] The two were Shaftesbury and Temple.

[2] It was also resolved, nemine contradicente, "That, in defense of the king's person, and the Protestant religion, they would stand by his majesty with their lives and fortunes; and that if his majesty should come by any violent death, they would revenge it to the utmost on the papists."—Parl. Hist.

These proceedings, together with an attack upon the obnoxious Duke of Lauderdale, the perseverance in the principle that the king could not pardon Danby before trial, and a searching inquiry about pensions and secret-service money made the king hasten to a prorogation. This sudden measure took the exclusionists completely by surprise; and Shaftesbury was so transported with rage, that he exclaimed in the House of Lords that he would have the heads of those who had been the king's advisers upon this occasion. Charles, however, had not courage to act upon his pardon, and release Danby, who remained a prisoner in the Tower for five years.[1] It was in this stormy session, when some of the worst of passions made the tempest, that one of the greatest blessings we enjoy was secured to the nation. This was the habeas corpus bill, which, after being agitated and frustrated for nearly five years, was carried through the influence of Shaftesbury. The key to the perplexing character and actions of that extraordinary man appears to be simply this:—in spite of his blind, headlong ambition and profound selfishness, he had a real anxiety for the good of his country and a regard for liberty; but these noble feelings were made secondary to his passion for aggrandizement and control: he would have had England the greatest country in the world, but then he must be the greatest man in it; and, upon any decline from power and trust, his very country dwindled in his eyes, and he cared not if he ruined her in his attempts to reëstablish himself.

While in England papists had been sacrificed to the popish plot, in Scotland a Protestant archbishop had been sent to a bloody grave. Sharp, after six years, had caught Mitchel, who had fired the pistol into his carriage, and that enthusiast had been put to death, with some revolting circumstances; but the persecutions carried on against the Conventiclers called up other assassins. In fact, the archbishop and the Duke of Lauderdale had carried tyranny to its utmost stretch. An army of wild Highlanders was let loose in the west country, to live upon free quarter, and, being very unruly, the men robbed and stole everywhere. The gentlemen were required to deliver up their arms upon oath, and to keep no horse that was worth more than four pounds. The country gentlemen hesitated, which put Lauderdale in such a frenzy, that, sitting at the council-table, he made bare his arm above the elbow, and swore by Jehovah he would make them enter into those bonds. Dragoons were employed to dissipate the field-meetings, and many a moor and hillside was made wet with the blood of the Covenanters. These religious enthusiasts, for self-defense, began to carry broadswords as well as bibles to their meetings, and at times the praying and preaching ended in a regular combat. In these circumstances, whenever the king's troops were victorious, they were merciless. It was said that they killed in cold blood, at one field-conventicle, upward of a hundred men. In Fife, where the archbishop of St. Andrew's chiefly resided, the persecution was as keen as in the west country, and it produced one more terrible effect. A small band of men, united by a common enthusiasm and suffering, resolved, after fasting and prayer, to take the life of one William Carmichael, "a cruel, bloody man," said to have been once a bailie of Edinburgh, where he had carried on business as a merchant and become bankrupt, but who had now, through the patronage of Sharp, obtained a commission from the council to seek out and apprehend all Non-conformists and intercommuned persons in the shire of Fife. Headed by Hackston of Rathillet, these men, on Saturday, the 3d of May, this year, attempted to surprise Carmichael while he was hunting on the moors; but they missed him. In the midst of their fury at this disappointment, a little boy cried out, "There goes the bishop!" They looked as the boy pointed, and saw, at a little distance, a coach drawn by six horses. "Truly," exclaimed the fanatics, "this is of God: the Lord has delivered the wretch into our hands." Rathillet would not be the leader in the attack, because he had some personal enmity, and might be accused of seeking revenge; but John Balfour, of Kinloch, put himself in the van, and the nine horsemen pushed across Magus-Muir, about four miles west from St. Andrew's, in pursuit of Sharp. As soon as the archbishop saw them he felt that his hour was come; and, turning to his daughter, Isabel, who was with him, he said, "The Lord have mercy on me, my dear child, for I am gone!" The coachman urged his horses to the top of their speed; but it was in vain: the murderers' light nags were soon up with him, the postillion was wounded, the traces were cut, and James Russell, an inhabitant of Kettle, standing by the coach-door, roared "Judas, come forth!" The old man, who had never shown mercy to them or their brethren, implored mercy from them, and offered money and a full pardon. His daughter knelt on the ground with him, wept, and prayed, and tried to shield him with her own person; but the hearts of these men were rendered obdurate by fanaticism; they pulled her away, and Balfour, with one stroke, laid the archbishop at his feet. But life was not extinct. Russell finished the horrible work by hacking the skull to pieces, and then ordering the servants to take away their priest. The band withdrew no farther than to a cottage on the other side of the muir, where they spent the remainder of the day in prayer and thanksgiving, blessing their God for the accomplishment of this glorious work. A few days after the assassins were in the west country, where the effect of their presence was soon manifested. At Glasgow they met Cargill and Spreul, two preachers as fanatic as themselves, and Hamilton, a young man of good family, who had often urged his oppressed brethren to redress their grievances and put down idolatry with the sword. On the 29th of May, the anniversary of the Restoration, about sixty armed men rode into the little burgh of Rutherglen, near Glasgow, put out the bonfires, heard a sermon preached, burned the acts of parliament hostile to the kirk, and fixed a declaration upon the market-cross. On the Sunday following they held a field-conventicle; and they were so well prepared, that they beat off with loss three troops of horse that were led against them by the celebrated Graham, of Claverhouse. By the advice of Lauderdale, the army in Scotland was concentrated near Edinburgh; and the king sent down the Duke of Monmouth, who had lately married the great Scottish heiress of Buccleugh. The Covenanters had taken Glasgow, had made proclamation that they fought against supremacy, popery, and prelacy, and had issued their commands to the magistrates, to turn out all archbishops, bishops, curates, "and their bairns;" and, on the 22d of June, when Monmouth came in sight with 5000 regular troops, they had posted themselves, not unskillfully, behind the river Clyde. But they took to praying and preaching when they ought to have stood to their arms, and Monmouth forced the passage of Bothwell-bridge and brought his artillery to play upon them. When some fifteen of their men had fallen they retreated to Hamilton Heath, an eminence at a quarter of a mile's distance. There they repulsed one or two charges, and broke a body of Highlanders; but their ammunition beginning to fail them, and the duke's artillery to ply them afresh, they quitted their position in disorder, and could not be brought to rally again. What followed was flight and slaughter; four or five hundred were killed, and about twelve hundred were taken prisoners. Under Lauderdale and Sharp the gibbet would have finished what the sword had spared; but the Duke of Monmouth, not less through policy than temper, was disposed to mercy, and the prisoners were treated with comparative humanity. It is maintained by many writers that Shaftesbury and his party encouraged this insurrection, in the hope of seeing the Scots repeat what they had done against Charles I.

[1] According to Algernon Sidney, Danby, in taking office, had engaged to make the parliament submissive, to pay off the king's debts, increase his revenue, and render him considerable among the neighboring princes—"Which are verified," says he, "in his leaving twenty-two shillings and tenpence in the exchequer, two-and-forty hundred thousand pounds of passive debts, the revenue anticipated for almost a year and a half, and the account his lordship was pleased to give, in his speech to the peers, of the esteem the King of France had for his (majesty's) person and government."—Sidney's Letters.

It might have been expected that the popish plot in England would now fall to the ground; but the king, through personal fears and a selfish policy, permitted it still to take its sanguinary course. On the evidence of Oates, Bedloe, Prance, and one Dugdale, who had taken up the profitable trade of a witness, five Jesuits, Whitbread, Fenwick, Harcourt, Gavan, and Turner, with Langhorne, a famous Catholic lawyer, were condemned by the brutal Jeffreys, now recorder of London, and a Protestant jury, amid the shouts of a Protestant audience, and they were all executed. Sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, and three Benedictine friars, were, however, acquitted by the jury, after a trial in which Oates was convicted of barefaced perjury. Yet, a few weeks after this acquittal, eight priests and monks were executed in the provinces for merely exercising their functions.

In the month of August, Charles fell sick of a fever at Windsor; and the Duke of York, traveling in disguise, came over to look to his interests. The duke found that the king had recovered, and that his son Monmouth was intrusted with the command of the army, was more than ever popular, and was backed by a powerful and intriguing party. A violent quarrel between the two dukes was the consequence; and Charles, to preserve his own tranquillity, sent his son to Holland and his brother to Scotland. Monmouth submitted with great reluctance; but his ally, Shaftesbury, consoled him with the assurance that his temporary exile would give him the merits of a martyr in the eyes of the people, and that parliament would insist on his recall. Charles, in dissolving one parliament and proroguing another, had counted upon a pension of 1,000,000 livres from the French king;[1] but Louis, who had no present occasion for his services, and who feared not his enmity, but knew his weakness, appended some unpalatable conditions to this new money-treaty, which caused it to drop. The Duke of York advised him to make up for the loss of the French livres by a strict economy of his English guineas, so as to be still in a state to do without parliament; and, in the month of October,[2] when parliament was to meet, he prorogued it again, and announced to his council that he would have no session for a year to come. About the same time Shaftesbury was deprived of the presidency of the council; Lord Halifax, Lord Russell, and Sir William Temple retired, and Lord Essex threw up the treasury in disgust. Essex was succeeded by Hyde, one of the sons of Clarendon, and brother to the Duke of York's first wife; and Hyde, with Sunderland and Godolphin, managed a weak and distracted government. Having lost the king, Louis and Barillon renewed their connection with the patriots, fancying that matters in England would inevitably end in a civil war. We must pass lightly over the disgraceful plots and intrigues which followed. Mrs. Cellier, a Catholic midwife, who was employed by ladies of quality in various capacities, and among others in distributing alms among the distressed prisoners for conscience' sake, found among the inmates of Newgate a very handsome young man named Dangerfield. She discharged the debts for which he was in durance, and introduced him to Lady Powis. Dangerfield, who had led a most profligate life, and had been branded, whipped, and pilloried as a felon, was not very nice as to the means by which he testified his gratitude or procured a livelihood. He turned Catholic, and pretended that, by visiting the coffee-houses in the city, he had discovered a dangerous conspiracy of the Presbyterians against the king's life and government. Lady Powis and the active midwife introduced him to Lord Peterborough; and his lordship conducted him to the Duke of York, who had lately returned from Scotland. The duke, who had suffered so much from popish plots, turned a ready ear to this Protestant plot, which might bring ruin on his bitterest enemies, the Puritans. He gave Dangerfield twenty guineas, and sent him to the king, who gave him forty. Being thus regularly installed in his new trade, Dangerfield, a few days after, gave information that papers and documents of the most convincing kind would be found in the possession of Colonel Mansel, who was to be quartermaster of the Presbyterian army. Mansel's lodgings were searched, and a bundle of papers was found behind his bed. But the forgery was clumsy; Mansel proved that the informer had put the papers in his room, and Dangerfield was sent back to Newgate. But the times were favorable for men of his genius; and, shifting his ground with alacrity, he declared that he had been induced by the midwife and Lady Powis to fabricate a plot for the purpose of covering a real one, conducted, not by the Presbyterians, but by the Catholics; that notes and the documents on which the sham plot was founded were concealed in a meal-tub in Mrs. Cellier's house. And, upon search there, the meal-tub was found and the papers in them. The tables being thus turned, the midwife was sent to Newgate and Lady Powis to the Tower. But the grand jury ignored the bill against the lady, and the midwife was acquitted upon trial at the Old Bailey.

Alarmed at the long recess, people from all parts of the country began to petition the king for the speedy meeting of parliament; and seventeen peers of the realm joined in this prayer. The court issued a proclamation against improper petitions, and canvassed for counter-petitions with very considerable success.

A.D. 1680. Encouraged by the passionate expressions of loyalty and attachment to regular succession set forth in these counter-petitions, Charles ventured to recall his brother from Scotland, and to declare, upon oath before the privy council, that Monmouth was illegitimate. To drive that prince away, Shaftesbury presented the Duke of York to the grand jury of Middlesex as a popish recusant; but the judges balked him by instantly discharging the jury. The Duke of Monmouth, by Shaftesbury's desire, had returned suddenly and secretly to London, some time before the Duke of York. It was midnight when he reached the city; but as soon as his name was heard he was enthusiastically welcomed by the people, who regarded him as their best shield. Charles ordered him to quit the kingdom, but Shaftesbury kept him where he was; and as the king could no longer help meeting parliament, the Duke of York was sent back to Edinburgh.

[1] Charles had told Barillon, the French ambassador and money agent, that this would be the sure way, "de mettre pour toute sa vie l'Angleterre dans sa dependance."—Dalrymple. . . . This precious business was carried on by the king, the Duke of York, the French Duchess of Portsmouth, Sunderland, and Churchill (afterward the great Duke of Marlborough), who was sent to Paris by his master, James, to drive on the bargain. Barillon repeatedly hints to his master that the Duchess of Portsmouth and Lord Sunderland expected gratifications for themselves—that Sunderland could not be secured without a great deal of money; and subsequently, Louis ordered the payment of 10,000 pistoles to his lordship, and 5000 to the Duchess of Portsmouth, with a promise of a renewal of these presents if they would keep Charles in the interests of France.—Dalrymple, Appendix.

[2] At this moment, when Charles was so bold, he did not foresee the failure of his treaty with Louis—he was still counting on the livres.

James departed full of rage and resentment, and with the conviction that his brother would give him up to ruin to preserve himself. The session was opened on the 21st of October. The Commons instantly began to wreak their vengeance on the counter-petitions, to fondle the old popish plot, and to patronize Dangerfield and the meal-tub plot. Thus encouraged, the felon accused the Duke of York of having instigated him not only to frame his first story against the Presbyterians, but also to murder the king. On the 26th of October, Lord Russell carried a motion that the House should take into consideration how to suppress popery and prevent a popish successor; on the 2d of November the exclusion bill against the Duke of York was introduced, and it was reported on the 8th. The king, who, however, would have sold his brother for £600,000, tried to divert the storm; but the bill passed the Commons on the 11th of November; and on the 15th, Lord Russell, escorted by the exclusionists, carried it to the Upper House. The king was present at the debate, and personally solicited the peers, who threw out the bill by a majority of 63 to 30. The Commons then turned back to the popish plot, to keep the rancor of the people alive; and Lord Stafford, one of the five lords in the Tower, was brought to trial before his peers, who in such a case were quite ready to concur with the Commons. The witnesses against him were Oates, Dugdale, and Tuberville—a new witness, as deeply sunk in villainy and infamy as either of the old practitioners. After Oates and Dugdale had sworn to consultations and commissions from the pope, this Tuberville swore that, five years before, Stafford, being at Paris, had engaged him to assassinate the king. The old earl—he was in his seventieth year—made an excellent defense, and, by himself and witnesses, proved discrepancies, flat contradictions, and perjury in the evidence of his accusers; yet the Lords found him guilty by a majority of 55 to 31.[1] Charles, who had been present at the trial in Westminster Hall, and who was convinced that Stafford was innocent of the imputed treason, yet signed the death-warrant with no other mitigation than that he should be simply beheaded. The sheriffs of London (Bethell and Cornish) questioned whether the king had the power to alter the sentence of the Lords, which included or implied all the horrid formalities of hanging, boweling, &c., and they applied to the two Houses; but Charles was firm; the Lords told the sheriffs that their scruples were unnecessary, and that the king's warrant ought to be obeyed. And, accordingly, on the 29th of December, the old nobleman was decapitated upon Tower Hill. All this time Charles "seemed quite free from care and trouble, though one would have thought he should have been overwhelmed therewith; for everybody now imagined he must either dismiss the parliament in a few days or deliver himself up to their pressing desires; but the straits he was in seemed no ways to embarrass him."[1]

A.D. 1681. The House of Commons withheld the supplies, and assailed the embarrassed and beggared court with various bills, for banishing "the most considerable papists;" for getting up a Protestant association against popery and a popish successor; for making the raising of money without consent of parliament high treason; for securing the regular meeting of parliament; and for dismissing corrupt judges. These bills were followed up by a remonstrance, in which the Commons required his majesty's assent to the exclusion of his brother. On the 7th of January, Charles, by message, told the Commons that he could never consent to the bill of exclusion which had been thrown out by the Lords; that in other precautionary measures for the security of their religion he was ready to go along with them, and that immediate supplies were indispensable. This message threw the House into a fury. Lord Russell, his relative Lord Cavendish, Montague, the ex-ambassador, Sir Henry Capel, Mr. Hampden, Colonel Titus, and others, moved and carried in a series of votes that no supply should be granted without the bill for excluding the Duke of York;[2] that the Earl of Halifax and other ministers were promoters of popery, &c.; and that whosoever should lend the king money on security of the revenues of the state, or accept or buy any tally in anticipation, should be held guilty of hindering the sitting of parliament, and be made responsible for the same in parliament. That night Charles made up his mind to dissolve this parliament; and, to take the Commons by surprise, he stole into the House of Lords at an early hour on the following morning. But the Commons got notice, and in one short quarter of an hour they tumultuously voted that those who attempted to defeat the exclusion bill were traitors sold to France; that the papists were the authors of the great fire of London; that the Duke of Monmouth had been deprived of his offices through the Duke of York, and ought to be restored to them; that the city of London had merited the thanks of the House; that the infliction of the penal laws upon Protestant dissenters was giving encouragement to popery. Here the usher of the black rod knocked at the door, and summoned

[1] In the rage of her disappointment because the exclusionists had not succeeded, the Duchess of Portsmouth attended Stafford's trial, "dealing sweetmeats and smiles among his prosecutors." This French mistress had been flattered by the hope—if not by a positive promise—that, if the Duke of York should be set aside, her own children, after some unexplained process of legitimation, should succeed to the throne. Shaftesbury, Halifax, and Sunderland deluded her, by turns, in this strange way; and it appears certain that, under her influence, the king several times was more than half disposed to go along with the exclusionists, even without their money.

[1] Letters of Algernon Sidney.—In the course of this year (1680) Barillon informed his court that Charles was entertaining a project of making a Protestant league with the Dutch and Swiss against France, and that Mr. Herbert, whose wife was cousin-german to Lady Sonderland, was to go ambassador to Switzerland to conduct it: but that Herbert had offered, for £5000, to serve the interests of France in his embassy. Well might Dalrymple exclaim that "this profligacy was extending itself!"

[2] "I hope," said Colonel Titus, "we shall not be wise as the frogs, to whom Jupiter gave a stork for their king. To trust expedients with such a king on the throne would be just as wise as if there were a lion in the lobby, and we should vote to let him in and chain him, instead of fastening the door to keep him out." Before this the anxious eyes of many politicians had been turned toward Holland. In the course of the debate Sir Robert Markham proposed that, upon the death of the present king, the Prince of Orange should rule conjointly with James, his father-in-law.

them to attend his majesty in the other House. Charles then prorogued the parliament to the 30th of the month, and a few days after dissolved it by proclamation, appointing the new parliament to meet on the 21st of March—not at Westminster, but at Oxford, a place considered as conspicuous for its loyalty as the capital was for its opposition to the royal power.[1]

In the short interval Charles made some changes in his cabinet, and opened another negotiation with the French king for more money. In the preceding year, in his irritation at Louis's parsimony, he had concluded a treaty with the Spanish court for the maintenance of the peace of Nimeguen; but now, in consideration of two millions of livres for the present year, and a million and a half for the three following years, he engaged to abandon Spain and do the will of France.[2]

Sixteen peers petitioned the king against holding the parliament at Oxford, a place where the two Houses might be deprived of freedom of debate, and exposed to the swords of the papists, who had crept into the ranks of the royal guards. It appears, indeed, that the popular party feared the king and his troops, and that the king feared them and the people: both went to Oxford as if they were going to a battle—the king surrounded by his guards of horse and foot, and the exclusionists by hosts of servants, friends, and armed bravoes. Shaftesbury alone—who was supposed to have raised or increased the prevailing alarm—went to Oxford in a borrowed coach, with two footmen belonging to another gentleman mounted behind it. The retainers wore ribbons round their hats with inscriptions of "No popery!" "No slavery!" The king opened the session in a confident tone; but it was soon found that, in the fierce struggle at the elections, the Whigs had had the better of the Tories (these terms were now becoming the common designations of the two great parties), and that the present parliament was as resolute as the last to exclude the Duke of York. The king proposed that, upon his decease, the powers of the crown should be vested in the duke's daughter, the Princess of Orange, during the life of her father; but this proposition was made in bad faith: nor was the Prince of Orange willing to enter into any such arrangement, and nothing would satisfy the Commons save an absolute exclusion. On the morning of the 28th of March, when the parliament was a week old, the king put the crown and robes of state into a sedan-chair, got into it himself, hastened privately to the place where the Lords met, and dissolved this his fifth and last parliament. And after this step both the sovereign and the representatives of the people scampered away from the learned city of Oxford as if they were retreating from some furious enemy. The Whigs put forth "A Modest Defense of the Late Parliament," and proclaimed everywhere that its dissolution was intended as a prelude to the entire subversion of the constitution. The Tories, on the other side, showered congratulatory addresses upon the sovereign; and the clergy and the two universities descanted on the divine right, and declared that it belonged not to subjects either to create or censure, but to honor and obey their king, whose fundamental right of succession no religion, no law, no fault, no forfeiture could alter or diminish.[1] Shaftesbury was committed to the Tower upon a charge of instigating insurrection; and two Londoners, who had great influence among the poorer classes of citizens—Stephen College, a joiner, commonly called, from his zeal against popery, "the Protestant joiner," and John Rouse, described as a Wapping follower of my Lord Shaftesbury—were made fast. The court expected to get evidence from these poor men against the "great driver;" but they were disappointed. Among the witnesses against them were Dugdale and others, who had been believed when they swore away the lives of papists, but who now found no credit. The grand jury threw out the bills of indictment. Rouse escaped; but, as College was charged with treasons committed in Oxfordshire as well as in Middlesex, he was sent down to trial at the assizes in Oxford, "because the inhabitants of that city were more in the interests of the court." And there, upon evidence which the grand jury at London had rejected, the poor "Protestant joiner" was condemned and executed as a traitor, for having accused the king of tyranny and popery, and conspired to seize his person during the sitting of the late parliament at Oxford. The gowned men there had scarcely done shouting for this sentence and execution when the Londoners raised their shouts of joy for the acquittal of the Earl of Shaftesbury. The court had scrupled at no measure that might tend to insure his conviction: all the arts which Shaftesbury had employed, or was believed to have employed, in getting up and supporting the evidence in the popish plot, were now turned against him. In the heat of that combustion it was wondered how the papists, who were said to have been so enterprising and active in England, where their number was so small, should have been so inactive in Ireland, where their number was so great. But a few months before Shaftesbury's committal to the Tower, "some lewd Irish priests, and others of that nation, hearing that England was at that time disposed to hearken to good swearers, thought themselves well qualified for the employment: so they came over to swear that there was a great plot in Ireland to bring over a French army and to massacre all the English. The witnesses were brutal and profligate men; yet the Earl of Shaftesbury cherished them much: they were examined by the parliament at Westminster, and what they said was believed. Upon that encouragement it was reckoned that we should have witnesses come over in whole companies."[2] Upon the evidence of these scoundrels, Oliver Plunket, titular Romish Archbishop of Armagh, an amiable old man, was condemned as a traitor for having collected money and troops, and invited the French into Ireland in order to extirpate the Protestants; and Charles, in order to carry on the affectation of his belief of the popish plot, had, even after the dissolution of the Oxford parliament, permitted his execution to take place. And now he employed those same brutal and profligate men to swear against Shaftesbury. But in spite of those Irish witnesses, and all the other resources of the court, the grand jury ignored the bill. From this moment Charles entertained the most violent animosity against popular sheriffs, who could return popular juries, and began to entertain the project of depriving the city of its charter.[1] At this critical season, William Prince of Orange, proposed to pay a visit to England. Both Charles and his brother the duke believed that he intended to take a near view of the strength of the Whig party, and to see whether he could turn it to his own advantage. The duke advised his brother to decline the visit altogether, for James already trembled at the thought of his son-in-law; but the king, though he gave him little encouragement, allowed the prince to come over. William had several motives and aims, some secret, some apparent. He wished to bring England into a league against France, and to induce his uncle Charles to summon a parliament, without which he knew that his power as an ally would be null. With or without his uncle's consent he made some attempts to mediate between the king and the popular party, and he frequently visited Lord Russell, the Duke of Monmouth, and others. The effect on the mind of Charles was inevitable. "I wonder," said he, "why the Prince of Orange and the Duke of Monmouth are so fond of each other, when they both aim at the same mistress." In the course of conversation William observed that the Whig party was most numerous. The significant reply of Charles was, "That is because you speak with none else." The prince accepted an invitation to dine in the city, which was sent to him by the sheriffs, who were so odious at court. His uncle hastened to call him to Windsor, and in a very few days they parted, Charles promising to have once more recourse to a parliament if Louis XIV. should attack the Low Countries, and William being convinced that some mighty convulsion was approaching in England. As soon as William's back was turned, Charles apologized to the French ambassador for seeing his nephew, and accepted a bribe of a million of livres from France for allowing Louis to attack Luxemburg, one of the keys of the Low Countries.[2]

In all this Charles was counseled by his brother, who, soon after the departure of the Prince of Orange, was recalled to court. James had not been idle in Scotland, where, in spite of his religion, which by law excluded him even from being a common justice of the peace, he had been allowed to exercise the high functions of a viceroy, under the title of King's Commissioner. After their defeat at Bothwell-bridge, a band of the most enthusiastic of the Covenanters rallied round Cameron, a preacher, from whom they afterward derived the name of Cameronians. They wandered from place to place, or lay hid in the wilds, till the imposition upon the country of the idolatrous duke seemed to offer a favorable opportunity of raising the whole of the indignant people. Then Cameron came forth, with his followers, and affixed to the market-cross of Sanquhar "A Declaration and Testimony of the true Presbyterian, Anti-prelatic, Anti-erastian, and persecuted Party in Scotland." In this document they renounced and disowned Charles Stuart, and under the banner of the Lord Jesus Christ declared war against him as a tyrant and usurper; and they also disowned and resented the reception of the Duke of York, a professed papist, in Scotland, as being repugnant to their principles and vows to the Most High God. Then, with a mere handful of men, Cameron took the field. He was surprised by three troops of dragoons, and died fighting, with his brother and ten of his followers. A few were made prisoners; the rest escaped with Donald Cargill, another preacher as enthusiastic as Cameron, who soon reappeared at Torwood, in Stirlingshire, and there, as a minister of Jesus Christ and the true church, pronounced excommunication against Charles II., king of Scotland, for his mockery of God, his perjury, adultery, incest, drunkenness, and dissembling with God and man; against James, duke of York, for his idolatry; against James, duke of Monmouth, for his invasion of the Lord's people at Bothwell-bridge; against John, duke of Lauderdale, for blasphemy, apostasy, and adultery; and against the Duke of Rothes, and other ministers of the crown, for various heinous offenses. Upon this affront the government began to execute the prisoners they had taken in the affair with Cameron, and to seize more victims. These enthusiasts, whether men or women, suffered imprisonment and torture without flinching, and went to the gallows in an ecstasy. To some the Duke of York sent offers of pardon if they would only cry out "God save the king;" but with the rope about their necks they all refused, and died for their "good old cause," rejoicing that they would sup that night in Paradise. Donald Cargill was taken; and he and four of his disciples, on the 26th of July (1681), were condemned for rebellion and disowning the king, and hanged the next day. A considerable number of the west country fanatics were, by orders of the duke, drafted into a Scottish regiment serving abroad under the popish banner of the King of Spain. As king's commissioner, James opened a Scottish parliament in the month of July, 1681, having previously obtained some credit by checking the corruptions of Lauderdale, and displacing many of his hungry satellites. The papist promised to maintain episcopacy and put down conventicles, against which there was now a renewed persecution in England as well as in Scotland. The parliament, in reply, coupled the dangers of popery with those of Cameronianism. He brought in the scheme of an oath or test to be taken by all in public stations, who were to swear to maintain the supremacy of the king, and the doctrine of passive obedience. The celebrated Fletcher, of Saltoun, after opposing the bill with great spirit and eloquence, moved that the defense of the Protestant religion should be made a part of the test. The court party, slavish as it was, could not in decency oppose this; and the drawing up of the clause was committed to Lord Stair, who had had the boldness to warn the duke publicly on his arrival in Scotland to beware of attempting to weaken the Protestant faith. Lord Stair so worded the new clause as to make the Protestant religion to be that which was contained in the first Scottish Confession of Faith made in the year 1560, and which, although it did not directly meddle with the question of church government and the royal supremacy, was certainly in spirit Calvinistic, and at least opposed to the exclusive claims of prelacy as well as to the divine right of kings. The clause was allowed to pass in parliament. To save the Duke of York from that part of the test which provided for the Protestant religion, it was proposed, while the bill was under debate, that the princes of the blood should not be obliged to take the test at all. Lord Belhaven stood up and said, that the chief use of the test was to bind a popish successor. His lordship was instantly sent prisoner to the castle by the parliament; and the lord advocate announced that he would impeach him. Notwithstanding these high courses, the Earl of Argyle, son to him who suffered at the beginning of the reign, and formerly known as Lord Lorn, avowed the same sentiments as Belhaven; and his speech was believed to have sunk the deeper into the mind of the duke, because he was silent about it. Soon after the duke removed Lord Stair from his high office of president of the court of session, and instituted prosecutions against him and Fletcher of Saltoun, which induced them both to fly their country, where neither the lords nor the parliament would have afforded them any protection. To hit Argyle, James called upon him at the council-table to take the test. Argyle took it, but added to his oath this limitation, "That he took the test, so far as it was consistent with itself; and that he meant not to preclude himself, in a lawful way, from endeavoring to make alterations in church and state, so far as they were consistent with his religion and loyalty." James permitted this explanation to pass without remark, with a smiling countenance invited Argyle to sit beside him at the council-board, and, in the course of the day's business, frequently whispered in his ear, as if in friendly confidence. Two days after, nevertheless, he was committed to the castle of Edinburgh, and charged with treason for making and uttering the limitation. The captive earl wrote to the duke, hoping that he had not deserved his highness's displeasure, expressing his loyalty and obedience to his majesty and his royal highness, and begging to know what satisfaction was expected from him, and where and how he might live with his highness's favor. James left the letter unanswered, but some of the court cabal sent to inform Argyle, secretly, that no more was designed than to humble him, decrease his feudal power in the western highlands, and deprive him of his heritable and other offices; and James himself, when some at court spoke as if it was intended to threaten life and fortune, exclaimed "Life and fortune? God forbid!" Nevertheless, on the 12th of December, Argyle was brought before the slavish and venal lords of justiciary, who, by a majority of three to two, found that the offenses charged against him did really amount to treason and lesing-making, and, with indecent haste, sent the case to the assize or jury. Good and wise men had been suggesting for years measures to abate these hereditary hates and feuds, which were one of the greatest curses of Scotland; yet, by the special selection of the court, the Marquis of Montrose, the grandson of him who had been hanged by Argyle and the Covenanters, the hereditary and implacable enemy of all that bore the name of Campbell, sat there as chancellor, or foreman of the jury, and delivered the hurried sentence of guilty. And, on that very day, that no time might be lost, "the dark cabal" dispatched a letter to the king, which, without giving any particular account of the proceedings, represented that, after a full debate and clear probation, Argyle had been found guilty of treason, and urged "that it was usual, and most fit for his majesty's service and the advantage of the crown, that a sentence be pronounced upon the verdict of the assize, without which the process would be still imperfect; after which his majesty might order all further execution to be sisted (suspended) during pleasure." "This letter," says Ralph, "was signed by the whole council, not at discretion, after the usual form, but by special command laid on every member, the clerk going about with the letter from man to man, and extorting every subscription by pleading that command, and making complaint to the duke if any scrupled to yield obedience. Hence, some bishops thought themselves obliged to forget their function, and soil their hands in this cause of blood; and even some of the earl's own friends and relations had not the firmness to decline what they blushed to perform."[1] Previously to his mock trial, the earl had been warned that close conference had been held among the duke's "familiars," who recalled how the earl had been pardoned by his majesty in 1663, after he had been found guilty by the Earl of Middleton and the parliament: and how it was then esteemed a capital error in Middleton, that he had not proceeded at once to execution in spite of his majesty's order to the contrary—for though this might have cost Middleton a frown, it would have cost him no more. And it was reasoned among the familiars, that if a proceeding of that nature would have been so lightly resented then, it would be altogether overlooked now, when the Duke of York was, as it were, on the throne of Scotland. And they further concluded, that to postpone the death of the earl would look like diffidence, whereas his instant execution would have a very salutary effect. At the same time that these secret particulars were poured into the ear of the prisoner, he was told that nothing but fair weather would appear toward him till his doom was sealed; and, after his trial, he was warned of the letter of the council to the king signed by special command. Argyle became convinced that nothing short of his life would satisfy the rage of his enemies; and that he had no way to escape their cruelty except by flight.[2] Yet, the day after his conviction, and the dispatch of the letter to the king, he applied to the Duke of York for a short audience. The duke replied, "That it was not usual to speak with criminals, except with rogues concerned in a plot, when discoveries might be expected; but that he would consider of it." On the morrow he refused to grant the audience. Argyle applied again, and James again refused. A day or two after, some troops of horse and a regiment of foot were marched into Edinburgh, and the earl was informed that he was to be brought down from the castle to the Tolbooth, whence criminals were usually carried to the scaffold. Argyle then begged to see his daughter-in-law, Lady Sophia Lindsay, disguised himself as that lady's page, and succeeded in following her out of the castle. He fled to London, where he lay concealed for some time, and then crossed over to Holland, where he found many friends and countrymen, fugitives, like himself, enjoying the protection of the Prince of Orange. Immediately after his evasion, the lords of justiciary decreed and adjudged that, as a traitor convict, he was liable to all the penalties of treason: that he should be put to death when apprehended, at what time and in what place and manner his majesty should think fit to ordain; that his name, memory, and honors should be extinct; that his posterity should be incapable of honor, place, or office: and that his estates, goods, and chattels should be forfeit. The apology made for the irregularity and severity of these proceedings, which astonished and terrified all Scotland, and deeply affected every man in the three kingdoms who was not an idolater of the prerogative, and ambitious of being a slave, was simply this—that they were only intended to force the Earl of Argyle to surrender some hereditary jurisdictions which were incompatible with those of the crown, and with the regular administration of justice by the national courts. The king having made large deductions for the satisfaction, as it was said, of the earl's creditors, and for the support of the younger branches of the family, afterward restored the forfeited estates to Lord Lorn, the earl's eldest son: but he retained all the hereditary jurisdictions as rights of the crown; and these, with others which were wrenched from their possessors, or resigned in fear, were shared among the creatures of James's court, to be holden during the royal pleasure. But the Duke of York procured from the terrified parliament an act far more important to himself: for it was declared to be high treason to maintain the lawfulness of excluding him from the succession, either upon account of his religion, or upon any other ground whatsoever. This act he obtained, to show the exclusionists in England that a civil war must be entailed upon the two kingdoms if they persisted in their scheme, or succeeded in barring him from the English throne. James then gave loose to his

[1] Hist.

[2] Argyle had been guilty of several offenses which, in the eyes of the Duke of York, were unpardonable. He was the only man of quality in Scotland who, after the discovery of the popish plot, took out a commission to disarm the papists (whether out of public zeal or private animosity, is hard to decide); and, under the same authority, having summoned the chief of the Macdonalds to surrender his arms, it drew upon him a little war: Macdonald thereupon entering Argyleshire with an armed force, and committing hostilities on all sides on the earl's lands and tenants; and when a herald was sent to him from the privy council, requiring him to disband his force, instead of obeying, he tore the coat from off the herald's back, and sent him back to Edinburgh. And, as if in this whole proceeding he had acted by authority, not in defiance of it, he was never called in question either for his insolence or his treason. This, however, happened before the duke's arrival in Scotland.

natural temper, which, from his youth upward, had been severe and unforgiving; and so thoroughly had the cruelties of Lauderdale and Sharp, and the religious animosities, brutalized the people, and set them like wild beasts against one another, that it seemed impossible to govern them either by mercy or severity; and hence James had in the Tories eager instruments to cut deeper than he might order, and a standing excuse for all the cruelties that might be committed.[1]

The permission to return to England after the departure of the Prince of Orange had not been obtained by James without the disgraceful intrigue in which his brother's French mistress and the perfidious Earl of Sunderland had been principally engaged. Sunderland, then secretary of state, had, by the king's express commands, voted for the bill of exclusion in the House of Lords; but, for his present successful intrigue, he was restored to the favor of the duke and to his former office. Charles, however, betrayed more uneasiness of mind than fraternal affection when his brother waited upon him at Newmarket.[2] James, to remove his anxiety, told him that he had no ambition to meddle again in the affairs of England, but that he wished to be intrusted with those of Scotland. And Charles received this declaration with thanks, having in vain endeavored to make James conform outwardly to the established church. With full liberty to dispose of all power and places in Scotland as he pleased, the duke, after about two months' stay in England, took leave of the king, in order to return to Scotland, to settle the government there, and then bring up his family to court. On his voyage a disastrous accident had well-nigh relieved both nations from all the fears they entertained on his account. The Gloucester frigate, which carried him and his retinue, struck upon a sand-bank called the Lemon and Ore, about twelve leagues from Yarmouth. It was night; the duke was in bed; and there was nine feet water in the hold, and the sea fast coming in at the gun-ports before he threw on his clothes and got upon deck. The seamen and passengers were in no command, running hither and thither, and every man studying how to save his own life. "This forced the duke to go out at the large window of the cabin, where his little boat was ordered quietly to attend him, lest the passengers and seamen should have thronged so in upon him as to overset his boat. This was accordingly so conducted as that none but Earl Winton and the President of the Session, with two of the bedchamber men, went with him. They were forced to draw their swords and to hold people off." Other boats were put out and crammed, people leaping pêle-mêle from the shrouds, the yards, and the deck of the frigate, which was sliding off the sand-bank, and going down in deep water. One boat was upset by being overloaded; the persons in the other boats saved themselves by beating off the desperate swimmers that would cling to their sides. The royal yachts in attendance on the frigate came up in an opportune moment, and took the duke and the rest of the survivors on board. Lord O'Brien, the Earl of Roxburg, Sir Joseph Douglas, one of the Hydes, who was lieutenant of the Gloucester, Sir John Berry, the captain, and above one hundred and thirty more persons perished. Among the survivors, who amounted to about a hundred persons, was Captain Churchill, for whose preservation James is said to have taken great care.[1] His royal highness went on to Edinburgh, called the council, and declared, as the king's will, that the administration of affairs should be in the hands of his three creatures, the earls of Perth, Queensberry, and Aberdeen, who adopted the most arbitrary system, not only punishing the Covenanters and Cameronians, but all who were suspected of keeping company with them, or of giving them any merciful assistance in their hour of need. Courts of judicature, which had their boots and their other tortures, and which differed very little from the Inquisition, were erected in the southern and western counties. Above two thousand individuals were outlawed, and the soldiers were authorized to shoot any delinquents that would not renounce Cameron's and Cargill's declaration against the king, and pray God to save him. Thousands of Presbyterians, who had taken no part with those desperate enthusiasts, began to think of emigration to America.

In the mean while the Duke of York had returned with his wife and family to England, and had been reappointed lord high admiral, and lodged at St. James's. As soon as all this was known to the Duke of Monmouth, who had gone abroad upon the king's promise that James should be kept at a distance, in Scotland, that over-confident person came again hastily over, in defiance of Charles's command. He was received in the city of London with an enthusiastic welcome. As in the year 1679-80, Monmouth set out with a train and equipage little less than royal, to make a progress through the kingdom. He was followed by a retinue of a hundred or more persons, all armed and magnificently accoutred. In Lancashire, Staffordshire, Worcestershire, and Cheshire, he was treated like a king or heir-apparent. The lords Macclesfield, Brandon, Rivers, Colchester, Delamere, Russell, and Grey, Sir Gilbert Gerard, and many others of the high gentry of the Whig party, met him at the head of their tenants in different places. And, as the ancient manners of England were not at that time laid

[2] While James was at Newmarket he was waited upon by the vice-chancellor of the neighboring university, who, in the name of that learned body, congratulated him on his return, and bepraised his royal highness's good government of Scotland both in church and state. The papist prince replied "that he would ever stand by the church of England as now established, and countenance the members of it; as having seen, by experience, that they were the best supporters of the crown." Immediately after this interview and speech, the king signified his will and pleasure that the university should choose another chancellor in the room of his natural son, whose election he had formerly urged. At this moment the Duke of Monmouth had been deprived of all his honors except the peerage, the Order of the Garter, and this chancellorship. The gowned men could hardly elect the Duke of York (the Duke of Albemarle, the stupid son of Monk, was chosen); but, to show their reverence for his highness, they took down Monmouth's portrait, which had been hung up with great ceremony not long before in their schools, and publicly burned it with many insults.

aside, most of those who came to meet him were armed. When he approached a town, he quitted his coach, and rode into it on horseback; the nobility and gentry went foremost in a band; at a distance and single rode the duke; and, at a distance behind him, the servants and tenants. When he entered the towns, those who received him formed themselves into three ranks—the nobility, gentry, and burghers being placed in the first, the tenants in the next, and the servants in the last. He gave orders for two hundred covers to be prepared wherever he dined. At dinner, two doors were thrown open, that the populace might enter at the one, walk round the table to see their favorite, and give place to those who followed them by going out at the other: at other times he dined in an open tent in the field, that he might the better see and be seen. At Liverpool he even ventured to touch for the king's evil. He entered into all country diversions; and, as he was of wonderful agility, even ran races himself on foot: and, when he had outstripped the swiftest of the racers, he ran again in his boots, and beat them, though running in their shoes. The prizes which he gained during the day he gave away at christenings in the evening. The bells were rung, bonfires made, and vollies of firearms discharged wherever he came—the populace, waving their hats in the air, shouted after him, "A Monmouth! a Monmouth!"[1]

All these proceedings, together with some of a more private nature, were watched by a well-organized body of spies, who had been collected and drilled, through a series of years, by Mr. Chiffinch, and who now sent hourly reports to court. The king and his brother were the more alarmed, because they knew that in the time of the Commonwealth the plotting royalists had held their meetings and consultations at horse-races, cock-matches, and similar sports, which, upon that account chiefly, had been prohibited and put down by Cromwell. The notorious Jeffreys was at this time "with his interest on the side of the Duke of York," chief justice of Chester, having caused the removal of Sir Job Charleton, who is described by a Tory friend as "an old cavalier, loyal, learned, grave, and wise." Taking advantage of some disturbances which happened at Chester, Jeffreys got from court a commission of oyer and terminer, and began to make use of it against the admirers and friends of the Protestant duke.[2] Monmouth himself was arrested at Strafford, where he had accepted an invitation to dine in the public streets with all the inhabitants en masse. A single messenger from London entered the town, and showed the warrant for his apprehension, on the charge of "passing through the kingdom with multitudes of riotous people, to the disturbance of the peace and the terror of the king's subjects." He submitted at once, in the midst of his friends, relying upon his tutor Shaftesbury's salutary provision of habeas corpus: and in London he was immediately admitted to bail.[1] The king and the court party had long complained that they could have no chance at law against their opponents so long as the city was allowed to appoint Whig sheriffs.[2] Emboldened by the passive-obedience addresses, which still continued to arrive in shoals, and by the evident consternation and despondency of the Whigs, and encouraged by the supple character of Sir John Moore, the then lord mayor, they resolved to get these important appointments, with the selection of juries, into their own hands. In the olden times, as a compliment to the first magistrate of the city, it had been usual for the lord mayor, at the Bridge House feast, to drink to a citizen, who, on Midsummer-day, was approved as one of the new sheriffs, as a matter of course, by the livery, who then elected the other sheriff by themselves. Ever since the commencement of the struggle of the parliament with Charles I., the nomination by drinking had been put down, and both sheriffs had always been elected by the common hall. But now the court lawyers represented that obsolete custom as a right in the lord mayor; and Sir John Moore, at the request of the king, drank to Dudley North, a brother of Francis North, the chief justice, whose Tory principles were generally known, and whose abilities and decision of character were reasonably feared. The Whigs insisted that the nomination of Dudley North was illegal, and, a poll having been demanded, Papillon and Dubois were returned by an immense majority. But the lord mayor complained of irregularity and riot; the Chief Justice North and the council backed him; and Dudley North and Rich, a man almost equally devoted to the prerogative, were illegally thrust into the offices of sheriffs of London and Middlesex. It is indisputable that the Whig sheriffs—more particularly in the business of the popish plot—had acted and induced juries to act with extreme partiality; but it was not the intention of government to secure impartiality; it was their wish, as it was afterward their

[2] Mr. Booth, afterward Earl of Warrington, has left a striking portrait of Jeffreys, as he appeared at this time as chief justice of Chester:—"His name is Sir G. Jeffreys, who, I must say, behaved himself more like a jack-pudding than with that gravity that beseems a judge. He was mighty witty upon the prisoners at the bar. He was very full of his jokes upon people that came to give evidence, not suffering them to declare what they had to say in their own way and method, but would interrupt them, because they behaved with more gravity than he. But I do not insist upon this, nor upon the late hours he kept in our city. It was said he was every night drinking till two o'clock, or beyond that time, and that he went to his chamber drunk; but this I have only by common fame, for I was not in his company—I bless God I am not a man of his principles or behavior—but in the mornings he appeared with the symptoms of a man that over night had taken a large cup."

[2] Shaftesbury, after his release, had brought actions for defamation and conspiracy against one Cradock, who had called him a traitor, and against Grahame, the solicitor of the Treasury, who had been employed in suborning, or at least collecting, witnesses against him. Cradock, by the advice of the crown lawyers, moved that the writ of summons for a jury should be transferred from London to some other county, that the return might be fair and impartial; and the court insisted "that it was not likely to be an indifferent trial in the city." Shaftesbury, on the other side, declared "That he could expect no justice elsewhere; that, so many counties having reflected upon him in their addresses, he could not expect any justice from them; and, therefore, he should withdraw his action." The chief justice, Francis North, retorted that his lordship's resolution did greatly confirm the opinion of the court that it ought not to be tried in London, seeing his lordship would not trust any other jury in England with his cause. Thus each party criminated the other, and both were so far in the right.

boast, that Tory sheriffs and Tory juries should retaliate in kind, or passively give whatever verdicts the king might require against the popular party.[1] The court and the Duke of York lost no time in availing themselves of these advantages, and pursuing the war of factions by means of the courts of justice. The duke brought an action under the statute de scandalis magnatum against Pilkington, one of the late Whig sheriffs, who had named the juries which had ignored the bills against Shaftesbury and the Protestant joiner, and who had refused to join a city deputation to congratulate his highness on his happy return from Scotland. The words specially charged were, that Pilkington madly said "The Duke of York fired the city at the time of the great fire, and he is now coming with his papists to cut our throats." The damages were laid at the enormous amount of £100,000. Two brother aldermen, Hooker and Tulse, had the honor of being witnesses against him, and swearing to the scandalous words. For this they received the smiles of the court; but a third witness, Sir Patience Ward, who did not swear as was wished, but, on the contrary, attempted to palliate the evidence, and save Pilkington, was afterward prosecuted with peculiar malevolence, was found guilty of perjury, and sentenced to the pillory. In the main case, so forward were the juries now chosen in finding verdicts as the court wished, Pilkington was sentenced to pay the £100,000 damages. This showed that his utter ruin was aimed at; and, to prevent it, he was forced to surrender himself a prisoner in execution, in discharge of his bail, without a prospect or hope of release. In all these proceedings, and in others of a similar character, Sir George Jeffreys, who was now recorder of London and high in the Duke of York's favor, bore a very conspicuous part. Before the system of Tory sheriffs and packed Tory juries was organized, it had been determined to strike a death-blow at all the corporations of the kingdom by means of quo warrantos; but, having secured one grand means of attack and defense, the court took time to mature the latter scheme, to prepare men's minds for the important change, and to procure, from the slavish, the timid, and the time-serving, voluntary offers to surrender the charters of boroughs, the municipal liberties of the nation, which were the foundation and the bulwark of all other liberties. When the trimming minister Lord Halifax saw how affairs went in the city of London, he said that there would be hanging; and his uncle and opponent Shaftesbury felt that his own neck was in danger, and that nothing less was intended than the entire destruction of the leaders of the Whig party, and the establishment of a fierce and bloody despotism. In this state of mind he withdrew to his house in Aldersgate-street, and called around him all the disaffected and desperate people in the city, still hoping to accomplish his former boast—"That he would walk the king leisurely out of his dominions, and make the Duke of York a vagabond upon the earth, like Cain:" or, failing in this, at least to manage matters in such a way that he and his party should not perish without a blow, or be led like sheep to the slaughter—which, in the end, they were. Not knowing that his Absalom, the Duke of Monmouth, who was alike contemptible for intellect and for heart, had already more than half betrayed him and the secrets of his party to the king, he clung to that paltry reed. At the same time Shaftesbury concerted his measures with Lord Russell, Lord Essex, Mr. Hampden, and Algernon Sidney. These men were hearty in the cause, thoroughly determined to risk life and fortune in a struggle against the bold-faced and advancing tyranny; but they neither agreed as to their ultimate end, nor as to the means by which the end was to be brought about. The extremes were represented by Lord Russell and Algernon Sidney: Russell was for gentle remedies, for a correction of the constitutional monarchy by law established, for the utter extirpation of popery, and for the establishment of one national church, which, if not Presbyterian, would have been very like it: Sidney was undisguisedly for the entire destruction of royalty, for the reëstablishment of his darling Commonwealth, and for the widest and most perfect toleration, to include the Catholics and all sects and denominations of men, without any state church or privileged clergy whatever. Honesty of purpose and a mediocrity of talent were common to the two; but it is difficult to conceive a more infamous scoundrel than Russell's kinsman, Lord Howard, or than Ford, Lord Grey, who were both admitted into the confederacy. Nor can much be said in favor of other members of the secret conclave in Aldersgate-street. Sir Thomas Armstrong had been a favorite of the king and the companion of his worst debauches; Wildman was one that merited the name, for he had constantly lived, for thirty years and upward, in plots and agitations that had never come to good; and Trenchard was "a battered parliament-man," high in talk, but low in courage. Shaftesbury was no fighting man; and yet it appears that he had more boldness and decision than any of them, or than all of them put together. He recommended the immediate taking up of arms, and spoke confidently of his ten thousand brisk boys in the city that were ready to rise at the moving of his finger; but Monmouth pretended to despise the citizens as compared with regular troops, and proposed that the insurrection should be begun, not in town, but in the country; "because, if the king's troops, which were only about five thousand men, and at that time all quartered in London, should march out to quell the insurrection, the capital would be left unguarded; or, if they continued in town to overawe it, the insurgents would increase in numbers and courage in the country." So contradictory is the evidence, and so evident the falsehood of most of the witnesses, that there is scarcely a part of the story

[1] The court operators gave, of course, a better color to the matter. "It was," says Roger North, "of the last consequence to the crown at that time; for the question was, whether treason and sedition, in London and Middlesex, were criminal or not; and this in a time when it was believed, though not so soon evidentially discovered, that a rebellion was ready to break out."—Life of the Lord Keeper.

free from doubt. According, however, to the most generally received account, it was agreed that the rising should take place or be attempted simultaneously in town and country; and it appears that Shaftesbury undertook to raise the city; that Monmouth engaged to prevail upon Lord Macclesfield, Lord Brandon, Lord Delamere, and others to rise in Cheshire and Lancashire; that Lord Russell corresponded with Sir Francis Drake and other disaffected gentlemen in the west of England; that Trenchard engaged to have all the inhabitants of his town of Taunton up in arms at a minute's notice; and, lastly, that Shaftesbury, disappointed in his expectations of the ten thousand brisk boys, despairing at the returning want of concert and spirit among his friends, and dreading to be betrayed, either purposely or by imbecility, into the hands of his enemies, threw up the game as lost, and secured his neck by flight. Shaftesbury certainly retired to Holland on, or a day or two before, the 19th of November (1682), and died at Amsterdam, with rage and fear in his heart and gout in his stomach, about six weeks after his flight. His old adversary, the Duke of Ormond, said of his death, "that those of his own party extenuated the loss of him by saying he did them more hurt than good; and that the court would not acknowledge it to be any advantage to them, as being of opinion he did them more good than hurt: so that his departure was neither lamented by his friends nor rejoiced at by his enemies." But Shaftesbury, with all his vices and errors, deserved in some things a different kind of epitaph; and, though there is truth, there is more point than truth, in Ormond's smart saying; for the flight and death of the veteran plotter struck a damp to the heart of his party, and raised the confidence of their opponents. Many resigned themselves to what seemed a destiny, forsaking altogether the projects and by-paths he had chalked out as leading to civil and religious liberty; while some few, perhaps, rushed into mad and sanguinary schemes of their own devising.[1]

A.D. 1683. On the 12th of June, about six months after Shaftesbury's evasion, Josiah Keyling, a salter, formerly a flaming Whig, and who had been so daring as to lay hands upon the loyal lord mayor for his conduct in the business of the sheriffs (for which he now feared the visitations of a Tory jury), waited upon the Duke of York's favorite, Lord Dartmouth, and informed his lordship that there was a terrible plot a-foot in the city against the king's life. Dartmouth carried the informer to Sir Leoline Jenkins, a secretary of state, "who had labored in the great work of new-modeling the city, the sheriffs. and the court of aldermen."[2] Jenkins suggested that a second witness would be necessary, and Keyling went away and got his brother to overhear a terrible conversation between himself and one Goodenough, late under-sheriff, a busy man in the city, and described as being formerly a satellite of my Lord Shaftesbury. Having done this, he led his brother, who, it is said, went very unwillingly, to the secretary, at Whitehall. In the mean time some of Keyling's associates chanced to see him lurking about the palace, and charged him with a design to betray them. One of them, said to have been Rumbald, whom he afterward charged so capitally, proposed that they should instantly make sure work by seizing and dispatching him; but his tears, protestations, and oaths of fidelity prevailed upon the rest, and they let him go. And thereupon he went straight to the secretary's office, and there made still more ample disclosures. Keyling's narrative at this stage was, in substance, as follows: About a fortnight or three weeks before the king went last to Newmarket, which was in the month of March, Goodenough, after some introductory discourse on what would be the sad, slavish condition of the citizens of London, in case they should lose their charter, asked him how many men he could procure to take away the lives of the king and the Duke of York; and while his majesty was actually at the Newmarket meeting, Goodenough repeated the same question, and this time succeeded in inducing him to join the plot. Keyling was then introduced by Goodenough to several of the conspirators, and engaged others himself, as Burton, a cheesemonger; Thompson, a carver; and one Barber, an instrument-maker, all of Wapping. At a meeting, by appointment, with Rumbald, the malster, at the Mitre tavern without Aldgate, it was agreed that the party should go down to a place called the Rye, near Hoddesden, in Hertfordshire, where Rumbald had a house, and there cut off his majesty and his brother on their return from Newmarket. The manner of doing it was proposed to be thus: Rumbald's house being by the highway-side, the undertakers were to hide themselves under a wall or pale; and when his majesty's coach came opposite to them, three or four were to shoot with blunderbusses at the postillion and horses; and, if the latter did not drop, two more of the party, dressed like laborers, were to rush out of a lane near the place with an empty cart, which they were to draw athwart the way, in order to stop the horses, while several others of the gang fired on the king and his guards. At a subsequent meeting at the Dolphin, behind the Exchange, they spoke with uncertainty of the time when the king might choose to come up from Newmarket. Rumbald had heard that he would return that very night; but Hone, the joiner, and West thought he could not come for several days; and West, a lawyer, said, "If he do not, how many swan-quills, how many goose-quills, and how many pair of crow-quills (meaning, in their plot-jargon, blunderbusses, muskets, and cases of pistols) must you have?" Rumbald said that they should require six swan-quills, twenty goose-quills, and twenty or thirty pair of crow-quills, with ink and sand (powder and bullets) proportionable. The malster, however, went down to his house at Rye,[1] without any of his associates, without arms, or any actual preparation; and while he was there the king and the duke passed close by his house on their way to London with only five of the life-guards. Rumbald afterward told Keyling that if he had had but five men with him he could have done their business. The conspirators, however, remained inactive, making no preparations, and only indulging in talk. But about a fortnight before Keyling made the discovery to government he had received a paper from Goodenough, containing the names of certain streets and alleys in the city, wherein he was invited to make, with the assistance of nine or ten others, an inquiry as to what number of housekeepers, journeymen, and apprentices might be raised upon occasion, either to justify the assassination, in case it should take place, or to coöperate in an insurrection, in case it should not take place, or be given up. Goodenough had divided the city and suburbs into twenty parts or districts; but, according to Keyling, he himself refused to meddle, and so did Rumbald's brother, and one Helby, a carver. Afterward Keyling met Goodenough, Wade, Nelthrop, West, Walcot, and one they called the Colonel, at the Salutation tavern, in Lombard-street, where, having asked Goodenough and West what care was taken for arms, he was told that a good provision was already made; and that he must above all things be secret and cautious, for if the present design miscarried they never should be able to retrieve themselves. Rumbald declared that to take off the king and duke would be a keeping, not a breaking, of one of the ten commandments; since it would prevent a civil war, in which abundance of blood must have been shed. West, after the king's safe return from Newmarket, proposed that the thing should be done of a sudden, between Windsor and Hampton Court, a road which the royal brothers often traveled. Such was the informer Josiah Keyling's first disclosure; but, following the example of those great professors of the art, Oates and Bedloe, he subsequently went into a regular crescendo movement, adding new circumstances, and giving more weight and circumstantiality to the old ones. After producing his brother John as a witness to the conversation into which he had beguiled Goodenough at the tavern behind the Exchange, he made it appear (and his brother swore with him) that Goodenough had succeeded in organizing the twenty districts in the city; that £20,000 were promised, and would be issued on demand to the twenty persons who undertook for those districts; that the Duke of Monmouth and all his friends were concerned in raising this money; that the Duke of Monmouth was, moreover, to be at the head of the insurrection; that the person called the Colonel would advance £1000 toward paying for arms; that Wade, of Bristol, kept £200 or £300 in town, and that he himself (Goodenough) had about £60 in plate and about as much more of his own gold for the same service; that a hundred horse were ready and men to mount them; that nothing was wanting but arms and ammunition, and if there was faith in man there would be no want of money to procure both; that that very evening there was to be a meeting of the persons principally concerned; but that now the thing was no longer to be done between Windsor and Hampton Court, but at the next bull-feast in Red Lion Fields. Two days after this significant addition, the two Keylings deposed that they had had another meeting with Goodenough at another tavern behind the Exchange; that they there had asked him what persons of quality would be concerned; and that he had answered that William Lord Russell would be concerned to his utmost, and use all his interest to accomplish the design of killing the king and the Duke of York.[1] This was precisely what the Duke of York and most at court (out of old hatred to Russell) most wanted; and a few days after a proclamation was issued for apprehending Goodenough, Rumbald, Colonel Rumsey, Walcot, Wade, Nelthrop, Thompson, Burton, and Hone, for high treason. According to Lord Keeper North, or rather his brother, Roger North, "John Keyling had most perfidiously, and to the intent that his discovery might be public, gone to divers of the party, and told them what he had done. So that it began to be discoursed in town that there was a discovery of a plot against the king's life; whereby the principal conspirators came to be assured of it, and none could be apprehended but one Barber, a poor instrument-maker at Wapping. This poor fellow discovered the whole material part of the discovery with very little difficulty, whereby it was plainly understood that there was a reality in the design, and Keyling an honest man."[2] Burnet also says that John Keyling, who had been drawn into the snare by his brother, "sent advertisements to Goodenough and all the other persons whom he had named, to go out of the way." This Barber, the poor instrument-maker at Wapping, was not in the proclamation, nor had his name been mentioned by Keyling, otherwise than as that of a person to whom he had himself spoken about the plot; and though he was brought by warrant before the council, it was rather to make use of him as a witness than to proceed against him as a criminal. On the very day that the proclamation was issued, this man gave in his evidence, which differed in many respects from that of Josiah Keyling. "I never heard," said Barber, "that this was intended against the king, for he never was mentioned in any respect, that I did understand; but I did verily believe that it was meant by his royal highness." According to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, the discovery was still imperfect, and more evidence was wanting. He had no sooner made the remark, than one of the lords of the council declared that a friend of his had received overtures from

[1] At this stage of the plot-discovery Josiah Keyling averred that Goodenough and Rumbald had told him "there was a remonstrance or declaration ready drawn up, which would be printed against the day that their designed commotion was to be, wherein they would ease the people of chimney-money, which seemed to be most grievous, especially to the common people; and that they would lay the king's death upon the papists as a continuation of the former plot.

[2] Examen.—There are other observations about the Keylings in Roger North's Lives of the Three Norths.

West, one of the conspirators, who offered to surrender himself if he might have hopes of pardon; and as soon as Barber was sent out, this new witness was brought in. West, who, it is said, had previously consulted and arranged his story with Josiah King, deposed that there had been for many months a plot; that Ferguson, a Scottish minister and bosom friend of Shaftesbury and Argyle, was deep in it; that after Ferguson's return from Holland there had been many discourses about destroying the king as well as the duke; that Ferguson, Goodenough, Rumbald, Rumsey, and Walcot, sometimes met at his (West's) chambers, he being a lawyer; that Rumbald was the most active for the murder, but the reason why the thing had not been done on the king's return from Newmarket was, that, on account of a fire which broke out in his lodgings, his majesty had returned to Whitehall several days before the assassins were ready at the Rye House. "This," says Burnet, "seemed to be so eminent a providence, that the whole nation was struck with it, and both preachers and poets had a noble subject to enlarge on, and to show how much the king and the duke were under the watchful care of Providence."[1] West further deposed that, after the king's return from Newmarket, Ferguson, Rumbald, and Goodenough charged him with the office of providing arms, and that he had accordingly bespoke thirty cases of pistols, thirty carbines, and ten blunderbusses, of one Daft, a gunsmith, in Shire-lane; that at a tavern, about three weeks or a month before Keyling discovered the plot, he (Keyling) had been very earnest, and had said that, for all their jesting, he and some few more might yet save the city charter and the whole nation. West afterward delivered in no fewer than thirteen other informations, at so many several times, each deposition going further than the preceding ones, and filling up gaps in them, after the fashion of the popish plot witnesses. North, who has no mercy on Oates and Bedloe, finds this conduct justifiable and perfectly natural in West and the other witnesses for the court against the patriots; and he says, very coolly, that West, not being quite sure of his pardon, put his memory to the rack to deserve it.[2] It would be tedious to give even the substance of these thirteen successive depositions: the principal points, as brought out from time to time by the racked invention rather than memory of West and his advisers, were, that he had received money from Ferguson on account of the arms he had bespoke, and was assured that there would be no want of men of quality to join the insurrection; that Wildman had money to buy arms; that Lord Howard of Escrick had communicated to him a project for making an insurrection; that in their jargon the conspirators called the assassination "the lopping point," and the insurrection "the general point," &c.; that they had consulted on a model of government to be adopted after the king's death, and that the fundamentals of this new constitution were presented to Lord Russell; that Algernon Sidney and Wildman held a close correspondence with the traitors in Scotland; that there had been meetings of the conspirators at the Devil Tavern, and projects to shoot the king and duke on their return from the playhouse in the narrow part of the streets; that Ferguson had mentioned something, but not assassination, to the Duke of Monmouth, who had answered him sternly, "You must look upon me in the capacity of a son;" that this answer damped their designs; but at last it was resolved, that if Monmouth should become troublesome, he too should be killed; that Ferguson, the preacher, did all he could to keep the conspirators to the "lopping point," and often complained of their want of spirit, saying, "These are weak, silly men, and not fit for these things, who can not distinguish between destroying a prince merely for his opinion in religion, and destroying tyrants who design to overthrow the laws, the Protestant religion, and all civil rights;" that (the crescendo did not reach this pitch of bold absurdity till the tenth and eleventh depositions) the conspirators had made up their minds to kill the loyal lord mayor, and Dudley North and Rich, the two intrusive sheriffs, and to hang up the skin of North, stuffed, in Guildhall; that most of the judges were to be killed, and their skins stuffed and hung up in Westminster Hall; that some of the principal reputed pensioners' skins were to be stuffed and hung up in the Parliament House, &c., &c.; that Mr. Carleton Whitelock and Mr. Edmund Waller (the son of the poet) knew of the plot, and that Colonel Rumsey had assured the deponent that the Duke of Monmouth was inclinable to answer the people's expectations, and submit, if placed upon the throne, to be little more than a duke of Venice, though Rumsey said that Sir Thomas Armstrong and the great lords about Monmouth, designing great offices to themselves, would not hear of these restrictions upon the prerogative royal, and were for leaving every thing to the decision of a parliament; but Rumsey added that the people were not worth venturing for; that the "lopping" would bring a great distress to the Protestant cause all the world over, and agreed with West, that, but for the shame of the thing, it would be well to turn informer. Thus introduced, Rumsey, an old soldier of fortune, who had greatly distinguished himself at the beginning of the reign in Portugal, surrendered himself, and desired that he might first be permitted to speak privately with the king and the Duke of York. One of his objects in this was (at least according to North) to ascertain whether the king was willing the Duke of Monmouth should be accused, that he might shape his evidence accordingly.[1] Rumsey named the late Lord Shaftesbury, Lord Russell, Mr. Trenchard, Roe, the sword-bearer of Bristol, and most of the other persons already named by Keyling and West; he asserted that nothing less was intended than the killing the king and his brother, and changing the whole government; that he himself had been appointed to make an offer of the command to the Duke of Monmouth, as soon as the levies should be completed; but, as the said levies never were completed, he had said nothing at all to his grace. But Colonel Rumsey, as well as West and Keyling, had his recollections and amplifications to get up at leisure. According to his "further information," about the beginning of November last he went from the Earl of Shaftesbury to the house of Mr. Shepherd, a wine-merchant, near Lombard-street, where he met the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Russell, Lord Grey, Sir Thomas Armstrong, and Ferguson, whom he told, in Lord Shaftesbury's name, that it was high time to come to some resolution about the rising. They answered, by Mr. Ferguson and Lord Grey, that Mr. Trenchard, who had promised a thousand foot and two or three hundred horse, had written from Taunton to require more time; and that so they could not stir for the present. "I returned," continued Rumsey, "with this message to my Lord Shaftesbury, and upon it my lord resolved to leave England." In this third information Rumsey said, moreover, that Ferguson had promised the assistance of three hundred Scots, who were in London, and who would be ready at a day's warning; stating, at the same time, that there were in all England twelve hundred Scots who had all been out at Bothwell-bridge, and who could be depended upon, some of these being gentlemen's sons, though now transformed into pedlers for disguise and subsistence. He added that he had been told by Roe, the Bristol sword-bearer, that Gibbons, the Duke of Monmouth's footman, had said that nothing but taking off the two brothers would do the business, and that the best place to effect it would be from a mount in the Earl of Bedford's garden, looking into Covent Garden; and that he had heard other things which convinced him that Sir Thomas Armstrong and the Duke of Monmouth were deep in the worst parts of the plot. Here Rumsey prevaricated most pitifully; but Shepherd, the wine-merchant, was now brought in to support his crazy evidence, and to swear expressly "against the grandees of the party." Shepherd, giving a different account of the meeting from what Rumsey had done, deposed that, some time before Shaftesbury fled to Holland, the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Grey, Lord Russell, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Colonel Rumsey, and Ferguson, met at his house in the city, where they discoursed about the means of securing his majesty's guards; and that, in order thereto, as he was informed at their next meeting, Monmouth, Grey, and Armstrong walked about the court end of the town by night, and found the guards very remiss, so that the securing of them would be feasible enough, provided they could only have a certain force; but, Shepherd added, that finding such a force was not to be had, the project of securing the guards was wholly laid aside, as far as he knew. The merit of his evidence consisted in his so expressly charging the grandees: and though Shepherd swore Rumsey was present at this conference about seizing the guards, which Rumsey himself had as yet made no mention of, and though Rumsey had sworn that his business there was to deliver a message from Lord Shaftesbury, which Shepherd had made no mention of, the disagreement was overlooked; and on the 26th of June, the day after Shepherd's first appearance as a witness, a proclamation was issued for the apprehension of Monmouth, Grey, Russell, Armstrong, Walcot, and others. Monmouth immediately absconded, showing in this, as in all other crises, a delicate regard for his own personal safety, and an ungenerous disregard for the safety of his friends. Doubts have been started as to Monmouth's real father, but the paternity of Charles seems strongly marked in the disposition, habits, and manners of the selfish young man.[1] Lord Russell was the first of the grandees that was secured. He was taken into custody in his own house by a messenger, who had walked for some time before his door, either, it is supposed, from the man's own desire to warn him of his danger, or from the wish of the court to frighten him away, in order to interpret his flight into a confession of guilt. Russell was found neither preparing for flight nor hiding himself, but sitting tranquilly in his study; and when the single messenger—for only one was employed—showed him his warrant, he made no effort of any kind to escape, but obeyed as if it had been backed by an army. As soon as he was in custody he gave up all hopes of life, knowing how obnoxious he was to the Duke of York, and only studied to die with decency and dignity. According to the Tories, his behavior before the king and council was weak and undignified, and he appeared in very great confusion.[2] According to the Whigs, it was not very firm, but still generous and high-minded with relation to his friends; and there is good evidence to show that he refused to answer any thing that might affect others. According to Burnet, the king told him that nobody suspected him of any design against his person, but that he had good evidence of his being engaged in designs against his government. Every question put to Russell was a snare, and his greatest folly was his answering at all. When asked whether he had ever been at Shepherd's, and when last, he replied that he had been there frequently to taste and buy wines, &c., but he could not say when he was there last. He acknowledged that he had gone thither with the Duke of Monmouth; but as to the rest of the persons then present, he conceived he ought not to answer, as dangerous constructions had been put upon their meeting. In reply to other questions, he denied that there was ever any discourse about a rising in the west, or about surprising the king's guards, or about Taunton or Mr. John Trenchard, or about any design for a rising in Scotland: only he had heard "general discourses of many distressed people, ministers and others, of the Scottish nation, and that it would be a great charity to relieve them."[1] After this examination he was committed to the Tower. Upon entering the dismal gate, he said that "he was sworn against, and they would have his life." His faithful servant hoped that matters were not so desperate; but his lordship rejoined, "Yes! the devil is loose."[2] Lord Grey next appeared before the council, where, according to Roger North, "he did not at all decline answering, but, with the greatest clearness in the world, made professions of loyalty, and denied all practice against the king: but, when Rumsey was produced face to face, he was dashed; but, presently recollecting his spirits, said he knew well enough he must be committed, as the testimony against him was upon oath, though never so false; and desired he might be permitted to live in his own lodgings instead of being sent to prison so late: and though this was refused, he was so far gratified as to be permitted to lie in the sergeant's house." "This liberty," continues North, "he made use of so that he conferred with his friends, and, it is likely, provided for his escape; for the sergeant was made drunk, or pretended to be so; and, just as he should have entered into the Tower, he left the sergeant asleep, and walked away, took boat and crossed the Thames, and from thence escaped to his own house at Hastings, and afterward found a vessel that carried him into Holland; and the sergeant was committed to the Tower in his stead."[3] The king, it is said, wondered that Lord Howard was not in the plot; but admitted that he was so great a rogue that the party might well have been afraid of trusting him. "Lord Howard," says Burnet, "was still going about, and protesting to every person he saw that there was no plot, and that he knew of none; yet he seemed to be under a consternation all the while. Lord Russell told me he was with him when the news was brought that West had delivered himself, upon which he saw him change color, and he asked him if he apprehended any thing from him? He confessed he had been as free with him as with any man. Hampden saw him afterward under great fears: and upon that, he wished him to go out of the way if he thought there was matter against him, and if he had not strength of mind to suffer any thing that might happen to him." Though Howard was his relative, Russell had always regarded him with distrust and aversion: but the scoundrel had captivated Algernon Sidney with enthusiastic professions of republicanism; Sidney had introduced him to Lord Essex; and, between them, Russell's objections were removed. At first, West, of whom Howard was so much afraid, did not bring any serious charge against him; but after being laid in irons, and threatened with the gallows, West "told all he knew, and, perhaps, more than he knew." In his new story he said that Lord Howard had proposed, as the best way of killing the king and the duke, that Monmouth should fall into Newmarket with a body of three or four hundred horse, and so take them all in their sleep.[1] Howard had now for some time been on the alert, and it is said, and almost positively proved, that he had made secret offers to the court to sacrifice Russell as the price of his own life. At last, four days before Russell's trial, and the day after Walcot[2] had been examined, the sergeant-at-arms, attended by a squadron of horse, was sent to his house at Knightsbridge to apprehend him; and apprehended he was accordingly, though not till after a long and curious search; for he had hid himself in a chimney which was concealed by a tall cupboard which stood before it; and probably he had not been taken if the warmth of his bed and the sight of his clothes scattered about the room had not made it evident that he was not far off.[3] He was taken in his shirt. Few chimney-sweeps would have behaved so basely: he trembled, sobbed, and wept. When carried before the council, he offered to confess in private to the king and to the Duke of York. The secret audience was granted to the kneeling, puling caitiff, and immediately after it the Earl of Essex, Algernon Sidney, and Hampden were clapped up in the Tower. Essex was brought up from his house at Cassiobury by a party of horse, and seemed so little apprehensive of danger that even his wife did not imagine he had any trouble on his mind. Others, who knew more of his doings, or of the intentions of the court, offered to secure his escape; but, out of tenderness for his friend Russell, he would not stir, lest his flight might incline the jury unfavorably. He was firm before the council, but this was followed by a confusion of manner; and in the Tower he fell under great depression of spirits. He was constitutionally a melancholy man; and the closeness of his prison, the memories about it,[4] the critical situation of himself and his best friends were sufficient to convert even a gay and sanguine man into a sad and hopeless one. He wrote to his wife to express his sorrow at having ruined her and her children; but the high-minded lady begged that he would not think of her or the children, but only study how to support his own spirits and keep his secret. Algernon Sidney preserved a sort of Roman fortitude and self-collectedness both in the Council Chamber and in the Tower: he told Charles and his ministers that he would not answer their insnaring questions; that they must seek evidence against him from some other man. Hampden also refused to answer interrogatories; and Armstrong and many others, Scots, as well as English, that were seized, behaved with great constancy, and were true to the edge of the ax to their friends and party. When Baillie of Jerviswood was offered his life if he would turn evidence, the proud Scot smiled, and said, "They who can make such a proposal know neither me nor my country."

[1] Bishop Sprat's eloquence may serve as a specimen: "But while they were thus wholly intent on this barbarous work, and proceeded securely in its contrivance, without any the least doubt of a prosperous success, behold! on a sudden God miraculously disappointed all their hopes and designs, by the terrible conflagration unexpectedly breaking out at Newmarket: in which extraordinary event there was one most remarkable passage, that is not so generally taken notice of as, for the glory of God and the confusion of his majesty's enemies, it ought to be: for after that the approaching fury of the flames had driven the king out of his own palace, his majesty at first removed into another quarter of the town, remote from the fire, and as yet free from any annoyance of smoke and ashes. There his majesty, finding he might be tolerably well accommodated, had resolved to stay, and continue his recreations as before, till the day first named for his journey back to London. But his majesty had no sooner made that resolution, when [than] the wind, as conducted by an invisible power from above, presently changed about, and blew the smoke and cinders directly on his new lodgings, making them in a moment as untenable as the other. Upon this, his majesty being put to a new shift, and not finding the like conveniency elsewhere, immediately declared he would speedily return to Whitehall, as he did; which happening to be several days before the assassins expected him, or their preparations for the Rye were in readiness, it may justly give occasion to all the world to acknowledge what one of the conspirators could not but do, that it was a providential fire."—True Account, &c.

Meanwhile, petitions were presented from the city of London, which had been gagged and terrified into loyalty, and from the magistrates of Middlesex, praying for the suppression of dissenting conventicles; for justice upon "atheistical persons, rebellious spirits, infamous miscreants, monsters," &c.; and for the condign punishment of those "execrable villains and traitors" convicted of a design against his majesty's precious life.[1] Walcot, who had played away his life through a returning love of honor and fair fame—Rouse, who had only been saved by the Whig sheriffs and a London jury from being hanged like his friend College—and Hone, a joiner, were brought to trial; and upon the elaborated, yet still contradictory evidence of Rumsey, Keyling, and West, they were condemned and executed as traitors. Walcot and Rouse died protesting their innocence of any design of murdering either the king or the duke; but Hone, the joiner, who had pleaded guilty to part of the indictment, confessed that he had spoken with Goodenough about killing the blackbird and goldfinch (the king and his brother), though no arms had ever been provided or any preparation made.[2] After their trial[3] it was resolved to proceed with that of Lord Russell; and a Tory jury was selected by the Tory sheriffs, and sworn, notwithstanding strong legal objections. According to Burnet, "they were picked out with great care, being men of fair reputation in other respects, but so engaged in the party for the court that they were easy to believe any thing on that side." No time was lost; and Russell was brought to trial, at the Old Bailey, on the 13th of July, for conspiring the death of the king, and consulting how to levy war against him. He desired the postponement of his trial until the afternoon, or the next day, because some of his witnesses had not had time to arrive in town, and because some mistake had been committed in furnishing the list of the jury-men. "You," cried the attorney-general, Sir Robert Sawyer, "would not have given the king an hour's notice for saving his life—the trial must proceed." Russell asked for the use of pen, ink, and paper, and for permission to use such papers as he had with him; and these requests being granted, he, wishing to have notes of the evidence taken, asked whether he might have somebody to write for him to help his memory. The attorney-general replied—"Yes, a servant;" and the chief justice, Pemberton, added, "Any of your servants shall assist you in writing any thing you please for you." "My lord," said Russell, "my wife is here to do it."[1] And when the spectators turned their eyes, and beheld the devoted lady, the daughter of the virtuous Earl of Southampton, rising up to assist her lord in this his uttermost distress, a thrill of anguish ran through the assembly.[2] The first witness produced was Rumsey, who swore that Russell had been present at Shepherd's when the grandees were proposing to surprise the king's guards, &c. The next witness was Shepherd himself, who confirmed Rumsey, though not without wavering and trepidation, and an avowal that his memory was very defective. The third and fatal witness was the infamous Howard, "who, in all but the nobility of his birth, was the reverse of the prisoner at the bar—a man of outside only, who made the best pretenses subservient to the worst purposes; who was distinguished by high rank, quick parts, and happy address, only to be the more emphatically despised; and whose whole life was so thoroughly profligate, that his turning evidence against his best friends has been represented by some as the least exceptionable part of it."[3] This noble Howard began to improve upon the deposition he had made before the king and council, adding fresh circumstances or speaking confidently of what he had before expressed doubtingly; but he had not proceeded far when his voice faltered so much that the jury said they could not hear his words. Then Howard, probably with sincere emotion, announced a horrible fact. "There is," said he, "an unhappy accident which hath sunk my voice: I was but just now acquainted with the fate of my Lord Essex." Instantly a murmur ran through the court that the noble Essex had committed suicide. At an early hour on that same morning the king and the Duke of York took a fancy to visit the Tower, where, it was said, they had not been for several years before. It is represented by some narrators of these events that they were led thither by an unmanly desire of seeing Lord Russell pass; but, whatever was their motive, thither they went; and, as they were leaving the Tower to go back to their barge, a cry followed them that my Lord Essex had killed himself."[4] According to the Tories, the news of the dismal event came into court as the air at the doors, and neither direct nor indirect use was made of it to affect the prisoner at the bar; but the Whigs maintained that the news was studiously brought in at a fixed moment; and there is unquestionable evidence to prove that the lawyers made all the use they could of the incident to the prejudice of the prisoner. "My Lord Russell," said the attorney-general, "was one of the council for carrying on the plot with the Earl of Essex, who has this morning prevented the hand of justice upon himself:" and Sir George Jeffreys, who was acting as counsel for the crown, brutally said, "Who should think that the Earl of Essex, who had been advanced so much in his estate and honor, should be guilty of such desperate things; which had he not been conscious of, he would scarce have brought himself to this untimely end to avoid the methods of public justice!"[1] This was infamous enough, and certain; but the Whigs made a bold plunge into the depths of uncertainty or untruth, and at once whispered that the Earl of Essex had been murdered by the procurement of the king and the Duke of York; and, in defiance of the evidence on the other side, this belief gained ground among the people.

[4] Essex was confined in the same chamber or cell in the Tower from which his father, the loyal Lord Capel, had been led to execution in 1649 by the commonwealth-men (see ante, p. 387); and in which his wife's grandfather, the Earl of Northumberland, had either committed suicide or been murdered in the days of Elizabeth. (See vol. ii. p. 631.)

[1] The Middlesex justices calculated that his majesty's life was worth just a hundred million of theirs. London and Middlesex had the honor of taking the lead; but almost every corporation in the kingdom took their turn to manifest the extravagance of their loyalty, and to heap reproaches on all the enemies of the court.

But to return to Lord Russell. Howard swore, among other things, that he heard from Monmouth, Walcot, and others, that Lord Russell had been frequently with Lord Shaftesbury, and that he had seen him himself at two conferences held in the house of Mr. Hampden, where insurrections had been spoken of, and a treasonable correspondence arranged with the fugitive Earl of Argyle and the disaffected in Scotland. The latter affair, he said, they had agreed to leave to Colonel Algernon Sidney, who had afterward told him that he had sent one Aaron Smith into Scotland, and had given him sixty guineas for his journey. He did not attempt to alledge, even on hearsay, that Russell had ever taken part in any consultations about assassination; and it almost appears that none, even of the second class of conspirators, ever spoke of murdering either king or duke, except Rumsey, Keyling, West, and the others who had turned evidence for the crown. It is said that Howard was not desirous of revealing all he knew; that he merely disclosed what he considered to be enough as a price for his own recreant life; but there are no circumstances to warrant a belief that he knew more than that there had been for several months in agitation a scheme for stopping tyrnny by insurrection, from [4] "The astonishing news was brought to us of the Earl of Essex having cut his throat, having been but three days a prisoner in the Tower, and this happening on the very day and instant that Lord Russell was on his trial, and had sentence of death. This accident exceedingly amazed me, my Lord Essex being so well known by me to be a person of such sober and religious depertment, so well at his ease, and so much obliged to the king. It is certain the king and duke were at the Tower, and passed by his window about the same time this morning, when my lord, asking for a razor, shut himself into a closet, and perpetrated the horrid act. Yet it was wondered by some how it was possible he should do it in the manner he was found, for the wound was so deep and wide, that, being cut through the gullet, windpipe, and both the jugulars, it reached to the very vertebræ of the neck, so that the head held to it by a very little skin, as it were; the gaping, too, of the razor, and cutting his own fingers, was a little strange; but more, that, having passed the jugulars, he should have strength to proceed so far, that an executioner could hardly have done more with an ax. There were odd reflections on it. This fatal news, coming to Hicks's Hall upon the article of my Lord Russell's trial, was said to have had no little influence on the jury, and all the bench, to his prejudice. Others said that he had himself, on some occasions, hinted that, in case he should be in danger of having his life taken from him by any public misfortune, those who thirsted for his estate should miss of their aim; and that he should speak favorably of that Earl of Northumberland and some others who made away with themselves; but these are discourses so unlike his sober and prudent conversation, that I have no inclination to credit them. What might instigate him to this devilish fact I am unable to conjecture. My Lord Clarendon, his brother-in-law, who was with him but the day before, assured me he was then very cheerful, and declared it to be the effect of his innocence and loyalty; and most people believe that his majesty had no severe intentions against him, though he was altogether inexorable as to Lord Russell and some of the rest."—Evelyn, Diary.

which scheme Russell had certainly receded upon weighing the chances of civil war, and reflecting upon the desperate counsels of Shaftesbury. No pains, however, were spared by the crown lawyers to lead Howard into wider admissions. He was asked, in a series of leading questions, whether, at the meetings held at Shaftesbury's, at Shepherd's, at Hampden's, my Lord Russell sat like a cipher? —whether he did not give his assent to all that passed there? Howard replied to this prompting, that every one knew my Lord Russell was a person of very great judgment, and not overlavish of discourse; that there were no formal questions put; but then there was no contradiction; and, as he took it, all gave their consent. The prisoner acknowledged that he had been present at some meetings, but insisted that the company had met upon no fixed design. He also insisted—and with perfect truth—that Lord Howard's evidence consisted chiefly of hearsay. Upon this the bench made a recapitulation of the things which Howard had deposed on his own knowledge; and, to give these things greater weight, the attorney-general called upon the messenger, who had some of the Scottish gentlemen in custody, to prove the matter of fact; and also called upon West to satisfy the court that he and his associates had always looked to some of the lords for their concurrence. West said that Lord Russell was certainly the lord they had most depended upon, because of his sobriety. The prisoner then alledged that, though the persons that testified against him might be accounted legal, they were not credible witnesses, because they swore against him to save their own lives. He proved that Lord Howard had denied the existence of any plot, and had sworn to his (Lord Russell's) innocence. Here, at the request of the jury, the chief witness was reëxamined; but Howard said that, until he was arrested himself, it was natural that he should ridicule the plot, and call it a forgery; and that what he had said about Lord Russell's innocence was simply this—that when the design of assassinating the king was mentioned, he had asserted, with an oath, that Lord Russell was innocent of any such offense as that. The prisoner urged that, according to the statute of treason of Edward III., upon which he was avowedly tried, a design to levy war at some future time did not amount to treason unless that design was accompanied and rendered manifest by some overt act. The attorney-general replied, that to prepare forces to fight against the king was, by that statute, a design to kill the king; that a design, at any time, to depose the king, to imprison him, or to raise his subjects against him, was within that statute, and, in itself, evidence of a design to kill the king. Before the jury withdrew, Lord Russell said to them: "Gentlemen, I am now in your hands eternally—my honor, my life, and all—and I hope the heats and animosities that are among you will not so bias you as to make you in the least inclined to find an innocent man guilty. I call heaven and earth to witness that I never had a design against the king's life. I am in your hands; so God direct you." But, at four o'clock in the afternoon, the jury brought in a verdict of guilty; and Treby, the recorder of London, who had formerly been an exclusionist, and who had been deeply engaged with Lord Shaftesbury in all his city schemes and plots, pronounced the horrible sentence of death for high treason.[1]

Lord Russell knew from the beginning that nothing but his death would satisfy the deep revenge of the Duke of York; and, without any parade of heroism, he could look death in the face, and feel happy in the reflection that he had done nothing to sacrifice his friends. But he was a man most tenderly beloved by all that were near to him, and he had a father and a wife who were more anxious for his life than he was himself. The Earl of Bedford offered £100,000 to the king, through the Duchess of Portsmouth; but Charles, it is said by the advice of his brother James, rejected that tempting offer. The old earl, in a more direct and public petition, told his sovereign that he should think himself and wife and children much happier to be left but with bread and water, than to lose his dear son for so foul a crime as treason; and he prayed God to incline his majesty's heart to the prayers of an afflicted old father, and not bring his gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. But, after resisting the earl's money, Charles was not likely to be overcome by his prayers. It appears, indeed, that the king was afraid of his condemned captive: for, when Lord Dartmouth represented to him that some regard was due to Lord Southampton's daughter and her children—that to pardon Lord Russsell would lay an eternal obligation on a very great family, while the taking of his life would never be forgiven—Charles replied, "All that is true; but it is as true, that if I do not take his life he will soon have mine."[2] At the prayer of his sad old father and affectionate wife Lord Russell himself petitioned the king. He solemnly disclaimed the least thought against the king's life, or the least design to change the constitution; he confessed that he had been present through ignorance and inadvertence at meetings which he afterward learned were unlawful and justly provoking to his majesty; and he offered, if his life was spared, to spend the remainder of it wherever his majesty might appoint, engaging never more to meddle in political matters. It is said that Russell never indulged any hope of the success of this petition; and yet, at the earnest solicitation of his wife, he wrote another letter, which he must have regarded as still more hopeless. This letter was to the Duke of York, who had never yet been known to pardon an injury; but it may well be that Russell was glad of an opportunity to declare that, personally, he bore no unchristian malice or ill-will against James. But, while folding the letter, he could not help saying to his friend Burnet, "This will be cried about the streets as my submission when I am led out to be hanged." He assured the Duke of York in this letter that no part of his opposition to his highness had arisen from any personal malice or evil design; that in the business of the Bill of Exclusion he had acted from a sincere conviction that that bill was the best means of preserving the established religion; but that now, if the duke would interfere on his behalf, he would engage never more to oppose him. The letter was presented to the Duchess of York by Lady Russell herself; and, as matter of course, produced not the least effect upon James. For some time the ministers of the Protestant church had been arrogating to themselves certain rights and practices which did not differ very materially from those of the father-confessors of the Roman church, with only this significant exception, that the Protestants made public the matter confessed, while the Catholic priests, at least to all appearance, kept it secret. Certain divines flattered Lord Russell that he might still save his life if he would disavow his political principles and acknowledge that he believed the subject had in no case any right to resist the sovereign. He nobly replied, "I can have no conception of a limited monarchy which has not a right to defend its own limitations: my conscience will not permit me to say otherwise to the king."[1] Dr. Burnet, however, who was not then so thoroughly a Whig as he became after the Revolution of 1688, when it was both safe and profitable to be so, and who was probably apprehending danger to himself from his close connection with many of the Whig party, undertook to convert his lordship to the creed of passive obedience, and argued with him on the question, whether the people might or might not defend their religion and liberties, when invaded and taken from them, though under pretense and color of law. Burnet even believed that he had convinced him they might not, and, with his usual bustling self-confidence, he imparted his fancied success to Tillotson, then dean of Canterbury. Tillotson hastened to communicate with Lord Halifax, and Halifax with the king, who is said to have been more impressed by this intelligence than by any thing that had been said or done for the prisoner. But when Tillotson waited upon Russell he found that Burnet had misled him, that Russell was still firm to his principles, and that the most he could extract from him was, that he hoped he should be pardoned in another world if he was in error as to political matters.[2] Tillotson, apparently with reluctance, administered the sacrament to him; but the evening before his execution this churchman wrote, and delivered himself to his lordship, a remarkable letter, reasserting that resistance to authority was contrary to the general doctrine of Protestants, and warning him that he was about leaving the world in a delusion and false peace, to the hinderance of his eternal happiness. "In a churchman of the church of Rome," says a recent writer, with whom, on this point, we entirely agree, "this would be called priestcraft;"[3] and Tillotson must indeed have been thinking more of fortifying a dogma of the high church than of saving the life of Lord Russell.

When there remained no other hope, his friend, Lord Cavendish, offered to manage his escape by changing clothes and remaining at all hazards to himself in his place; but Russell nobly refused, and prepared to die with Christian piety. He considered himself a much happier man than Howard, who had purchased a few years of life and ignominy by betraying his friends; and, when he had taken leave of his high-minded wife, he said, "Now the bitterness of death is past." The morning after this parting—on the 21st of July—he was led to the scaffold, which was not erected upon Tower Hill, but in Lincoln's Inn Fields, "in order that the citizens might be humbled by the spectacle of their once triumphant leader carried in his coach to death through the city—a device which, like most others of the kind, produced an effect contrary to what was intended: the multitude imagined they beheld virtue and liberty sitting by his side."[1] In passing he looked at Southampton House, the paternal home of his lady, and the sight brought a few tears to his eyes. He was attended by Tillotson and Burnet, and while Tillotson prayed, Burnet held the pen to record his lordship's last words. These words were few, and were addressed to Sheriff Rich, who superintended the execution, though he had once been an anti-courtier, and had voted with Russell for the exclusion. His lordship said, that, because he had never loved much speaking, and could not expect now to be well heard, he had set down in a paper, which he handed to the sheriff, all that he thought proper to leave behind him; adding, "God knows how far I was always from designs against the king's person, or for altering the government; and I still pray for the preservation of both. I forgive all the world; I thank God I die in charity with all men; and I wish all sincere Protestants may love one another, and not make way for popery by their animosities." He then prayed, embraced the two divines, and without any visible change of countenance, laid himself down and fitted his neck to the block. Like Lord Stafford, he refused to give the sign to the executioner, who chose his own moment, and severed his neck with two or three clumsy strokes. "And now," says Ralph, "it became again observable, as in the case of Lord Stafford, that, though the people of England crowd to these horrid spectacles, it is rather to gratify their curiosity than their cruelty; for now, as then, when the bleeding head was exposed with the usual proclamation, no shout of applause ensued; on the contrary, a general groan went round the scaffold, and in every face was to be read the anguish which had taken possession of every heart." The execution was scarcely over when every corner of the town rung with Russell's last paper,[2] which he had delivered to the sheriff in manuscript, but which was already in print and in circulation, through the industry of Lady Russell, and probably of Burnet, who is more than suspected of having had a principal hand in its composition, notwithstanding his offering to take an oath before the council that the speech was penned by Lord Russell himself. His lordship said, or was made to say (for ourselves we believe all that is contained in the first clauses to have been his real sentiments), that he had lived and now died a true and sincere Protestant, and in the communion of the church of England, "though he could never yet comply with, or rise up to, all the heights of many people; that, for popery, he looked upon it as an idolatrous and bloody religion, and therefore thought himself bound, in his station, to do all he could against it; that he had foreseen all along that this would procure him great and powerful enemies; that he had been for some time expecting the worst, and now blessed God he was to fall by the ax, and not by the fiery trial; that, whatever had been his apprehensions of popery, he never had a thought of doing any thing against it basely or inhumanly, or that did not consist with the Christian religion and the laws and liberties of the kingdom; that he appealed to Almighty God for the truth of this; that he had ever proceeded sincerely without passion, private ends, or malice; that he had always loved his country much more than his life, and had always looked upon the constitution as one of the best governments in the world; and that he would have suffered any extremity rather than have consented to any design to take the king's life. "Neither," continued the paper, "had ever any man the impudence to propose so base and barbarous a thing to me. And I look on it as a very unhappy and uneasy part of my present condition, that in my indictment there should be so much as mention of so vile a fact; though nothing in the least was said to prove any such matter, but the contrary, by the Lord Howard. Neither does any body, I am confident, believe the least of it." After praying for the king, and wishing that he might be indeed the defender of the faith, the paper went on to explain his conduct in regard to the popish plot—the darkest stain on the character of Russell. We believe his assertions, but that belief must be coupled with, and made dependent upon, rather a low estimate of his intellect and penetration. "As for the share I had in the prosecution of the popish plot, I take God to witness that I proceeded in it in the sincerity of my heart; being then really convinced, as I am still, that there was a conspiracy against the king, the nation, and the Protestant religion. And I likewise profess that I never knew any thing, either directly or indirectly, of any underhand practice with the witnesses, which I look upon as so horrid a thing that I could never have endured it; for, I thank God, falsehood and cruelty were never in my nature." He then proceeded to justify his conduct about the bill of exclusion. "I thought the nation was in such danger of popery, and that the expectation of the popish succession put the king's life likewise in such danger, that I saw no way so effectual to secure both as such a bill. As to the limitations which were proposed, if they were sincerely offered, and had passed into a law, the duke then would have been excluded from the power of a king, and the government quite altered, and little more than the name of a king left. So I could not see either sin or fault in the one, when all people were willing to admit of the other; but thought it better to have a king with his prerogative, and the nation easy and safe under him, than a king without it; which must have bred perpetual jealousies and a continued struggle. All this I say only to justify myself, and not to inflame others; though I can not but think my earnestness in that matter has had no small influence in my present sufferings." His conspiring to seize the guards was again solemnly denied; but it was admitted that once at Shepherd's, and several times by accident in general discourses elsewhere, there had been some talk of the feasibleness of it; that he had heard it mentioned as a thing that might easily be done, but had never consented to it as a thing fit to be done; and that once, at my Lord Shaftesbury's, he flew out and exclaimed against it, and asked, if the thing succeeded, what must be done next but massacring the guards in cold blood, which he looked upon as so detestable a thing, and so like a popish practice, that he could not but abhor it. It was further admitted that he had been warned that my Lord Shaftesbury and some hot men were engaged in schemes that would undo them all,[1] and that he had himself heard things said by some with more heat than judgment. "But this," continued the paper, "is but misprision of treason at most: so I die innocent of the crime I stand condemned for; and I hope nobody will imagine that so mean a thought could enter into me, as to go about to save myself by accusing others. The part that some have acted lately of that kind has not been such as to invite me to love life at such a rate. As for the sentence of death passed upon me, I can not but think it a very hard one; for nothing was sworn against me (whether true or false I will not now examine) but some discourses about making some stirs. And this is not levying war against the king, which is treason by the statute of Edward III., and not the consulting and discoursing about it, which was all that was witnessed against me. But, by a strange fetch, the design of seizing the guards was construed a design of killing the king; and so I was in that cast." After praying God not to lay his death to the charge of the king's council, or the judges, sheriffs, or jury, and expressing pity for the witnesses, he added, "From the time of choosing the sheriffs I concluded the heats would produce something of this kind; and I am not much surprised to find it fall upon me."[2]

[1] "For my part," says Evelyn, "I believe the crafty and ambitious Earl of Shaftesbury had brought them into some dislike of the present carriage of matters at court, not with any design of destroying the monarchy, but perhaps of setting up some other (prince) whom he might govern and frame to his own platonic fancy, without much regard to the religion established under the hierarchy, for which he had no esteem. . . . Every one deplored Essex and Russell, especially the last, as being thought to have been drawn in on pretense only of endeavoring to rescue the king from his present counselors, secure religion from popery, and the nation from arbitrary government, now so much apprehended: while the rest of those who are fled, especially Ferguson and his gang, had doubtless some bloody design to set up a commonwealth, and turn all things topsy-turvy. Of the same tragical principle is Sidney."—Diary.

[2] It ought never to be forgotten that Russell, though he intrigued

On the same memorable 21st of July, when Russell perished and this paper was printed, the University of Oxford, which, with a saving of the established religion, would have sanctioned every stretch of arbitrary power, published its decree in support of passive obedience and of the right of kings to govern wrong without resistance or challenge from their suffering subjects.[1] It was entitled "The Judgment and Decree of the University of Oxford, passed in their convocation, against certain pernicious and damnable doctrines, destructive to the sacred persons of princes, their state and government, and of all human society." For the honor of the holy and undivided Trinity, for the preservation of truth in the church, and for securing the king's majesty against the attempts of open bloody enemies and the machinations of treacherous heretics and schismatics, these gowned men formally condemned and anathematized a long series of political propositions collected out of the works of Buchanan, Bellarmin, Milton, Dolman, Goodwin, Hobbes, Owen, Knox, Baxter, Jenkins, and other writers. Among these propositions were several which were the mere spawning of fanaticism; as, for example, that all political dominion is founded in grace—that the powers of this world are usurpations upon the prerogative of Christ—that the Presbyterian government is in itself Christ's scepter, to which kings, as well as others, are bound to submit, &c. But, high above these vagaries, which were every day becoming more harmless, there were certain axioms, derived from master-minds, which are sacred to all lovers of liberty, and without which there could be no constitution like our own. The chief of those were, that all civil authority is derived from the people, and is to be exercised for the good of the people; that if lawful governors become tyrants, they forfeit their right of governing; that the king of England has but a coördinate power with the other two estates, the Lords and Commons; that birthright gives no title unless the sovereign has the other qualities necessary to a Protestant king; that passive obedience was a new and insane doctrine which laid no obligation upon Christians, &c. But the Oxford decree pronounced "all and every of these propositions false, seditious, and impious; most of them heretical and blasphemous," and ordered all the books containing them to be burned. It also enjoined that "that most necessary doctrine which in a manner is the badge and character of the church of England" (that is, passive obedience) should be diligently taught by all readers, tutors, and catechists.

with the French court, is never charged with taking French money, like Sidney. Barillon, indeed, tells his master that he durst not make his base proposals to his lordship.

[1] A few days after (on the 27th of July), the king ordered a declaration, which was to explain the great dangers he had been in, and to appoint a day of thanksgiving for his happy deliverance. Having received the sanction of the cabinet and privy council, this declaration was ordered to be made public, not only by the press, but by all the parish clergy in the kingdom, who had been found by experience to be as prompt in their obedience as a standing army. According to a champion of the Tories, it was complete and authentic, having no syllable expressed whereof the sense was not vouched. According to common sense, it abounded in lies, or truths tortured and disfigured.

In Trinity term, when the court was making as much of the Rye House Plot as ever its opponents had made of the Popish Plot, judgment was given against the city of London on the quo warranto: and, in the following month of September, the king was allowed to regulate the government of the city, changing the old aldermen and officers, and appointing new ones at his pleasure. Eight aldermen were deprived at once of the honors they had received by election of their fellow-citizens, and "were all turned out for lying under the horrid suspicion of loving their country better than king." On the 7th of September, Algernon Sidney was brought to trial at the bar of the King's Bench, where Jeffreys now presided as chief justice. This bravo in law mounted the ladder of promotion by wonderfully rapid strides; but he seemed made for despotism and its particular exigencies at that time, and he had nerve and face to "go thorough," to undertake and drive to a conclusion of some sort any work the court might wish to be done by law. He was, in fact, as unflinching, as confident, and, in outward bearing, as heroic in the performance of villainy and in breaking the laws as was ever upright judge in supporting them. He was as bold with the law-books and statutes as Charles's other personal favorite, Colonel Blood, was with pistols, and daggers, and dark-lanterns.[1] Hence Jeffreys was prized and promoted. The nerve of that otherwise weak republican, Algernon Sidney, was well known; and it was fitting to oppose to him a man with nerve equal to his own. As in Lord Russell's case, Rumsey, Keyling, and West gave little more than a rambling, hearsay evidence, and the death-thrusts were left to be dealt by the hand of the noble Howard, whom Sidney had taken to his heart as a pure republican, and had forced upon the unwilling confidence of Essex and Russell. When Howard had stated what he knew of Sidney's conduct at the meetings at Shepherd's, and his engaging an agent to deal with the disaffected in Scotland, the prisoner was asked whether he would ask Lord Howard any questions. "No!" said he, with withering scorn, "I have no questions to ask such as him!" The attorney-general chose to consider this as a confession of guilt, and said, "Silence —— you know the rest of the proverb." Several other witnesses proved words spoken, and that the prisoner had corresponded with some gentlemen in Scotland; but, with the exception of Lord Howard, there was no living witness that both could and would swear to overt acts of treason, or that the conspiracy really aimed at insurrection, levying war, &c. In no sense was this single witness enough to take away life for treason; and, to make up weight, the attorney said, "Now, to show that while his emissary was in Scotland, at the same time the colonel (which will be another overt act of treason) was writing a treasonable pamphlet;" and he then called the clerk of the council to prove that when he was sent to seize Sidney's papers he had found the said pamphlet lying upon his table. After this deposition, three persons were called up to prove, or, rather, to swear, that the pamphlet was in Sidney's own handwriting. One of these precious witnesses was Shepherd, the wine-merchant, who said that he had seen Sidney write several indorsements, and believed this writing to be his hand. Another of the witnesses, who had never seen Sidney write at all, and the third, who had only seen him write once, deposed that the manuscript was like his handwriting, which they had seen upon some bills. Sidney urged that the mere comparison of handwriting was not to be trusted, and that some men's hands might be very much alike. But this objection was overruled; and then, to prove the treasonableness of the manuscript, a selected section was read in court, and, by the torture of inuendoes, was made to apply to the particular reign of Charles II., though it might have answered equally well for that of Henry VIII. When this reading was finished the sheets were handed to the prisoner under the pretense of a favor done him, or that he might select passages to prove that the anti-monarchical argument did not run through the whole composition, and that there were other passages which would explain away the malignity of those referred to by the attorney-general; but what was really designed was, that the prisoner, thus taken by surprise, might say or do something that would prove him to be the author of the pamphlet. Sidney, though no lawyer, and not very acute, saw the snare, and put back the book. But Jeffreys made another attempt, saying, as he turned over the pages in seeming carelessness, "I perceive you have disposed your matter under certain heads; so, what heads will you have read?" "My lord," answered Sidney, "let him give an account of it that did it." Finding that this stratagem had failed, the attorney-general closed his evidence with the record of the conviction of Russell, which, in the eyes of the law, was of no more weight against Sidney than the story of Essex's death was against Russell. In his defense the prisoner asked, with scorn and derision, whether a paper found in his study against Nero and Caligula would prove that he had conspired and compassed the death of Charles II.; whether any credit was due to a man like my Lord Howard, who had betrayed and cozened his friends, who deposed differently now from what he had deposed against Lord Russell, who had denied the plot before his arrest, and who had said since that he could not get his pardon till he had "done some other jobs"—until "the drudgery of swearing was over." "Besides," added Sidney, "this Howard is my debtor for a considerable sum; his mortgage was forfeit to me; and, when I should have taken the advantage the law gave me, he found out a way to have me laid up in the Tower. His lordship is a very subtil man; for as, at Lord Russell's trial, he said he was to carry his knife between the paring and the apple, so for this he had so managed as to get his pardon and save his estate." He further said that the ink of the manuscript was visibly so old that it might be presumed the paper had been written these twenty years; and, be the author of it who or what he might, there seemed no treason in answering polemically such a writer as Filmer, who, among other paradoxes, had maintained that possession was the only right to power. He asked the attorney-general how many years ago that book of Filmer's, to which the pamphlet was evidently an answer, was written. Jeffreys answered for the attorney, telling the prisoner that they had nothing to do with Filmer's book; that they were not there to waste their time upon a subject that served only to gratify a luxuriant way of talking. "Answer," proceeded this marvelous lord chief justice, "answer to the matter you are indicted for. Do you own that paper?" Sidney replied, "No." "Go on, then," said Jeffreys. "I say first," continued Sidney, "the paper is not proved upon me; and, secondly, it is not a crime if it be proved." Nothing could be clearer or more true and convincing than this; and here Sidney ought to have closed his defense. But the chief justice instantly tried to excite his angry passions, which would lead him to some less tenable position. It was enough for him to speak of Howard and his evidence: Sidney took fire at the name of the traitor, and proceeded to apply the brand. Nor was he unprovided with witnesses of high rank to assist him in making good his charges and deepening the furrows on the front of the miscreant. These witnesses were the Earl of Anglesey, Lord Clare, Lord Paget, Mr. Philip Howard, and Mr. Edward Howard (the two last Howard's relations), Burnet, Monsieur du Cas, a Frenchman, one Mr. Blake, and two of Sidney's own servants. They all swore that his lordship had declared there was no plot; and Mr. Edward Howard said he believed in his conscience that this denial was the truth without any equivocation or mental reservation, because he had no occasion to make use of any to him; and that, from the knowledge he had of his lordship, it was his opinion that if he had been in any such secret he would not have staid to be taken, or have made his application to the king in a manner so unsuitable to his quality. Here Jeffreys exclaimed, "No reflections upon any body!" But Edward Howard, who had been bullied into silence on Lord Russell's trial, was now put upon his metal and refreshed in his memory. "Since," he exclaimed, "your lordship has given me this occasion, I will speak now what I omitted then." And he proceeded to affirm that Lord Howard had told him that, even to his own knowledge, it was a sham plot, forged in the dark by priests and Jesuits, and that he had himself gone to Lord Halifax, in Lord Howard's name and by his authority, to assure that minister that he, Lord Howard, was willing to express his detestation under hand and seal, and to declare there was no such thing as the plot to his knowledge. "I must needs add," proceeded this spirited witness, "from my conscience and from my heart, before God and

[1] Jeffreys's manners had not improved under promotion. According to Burnet, he "was drunk every day." Roger North says, "His friendship and conversation lay much among the good fellows and humorists; and his delights were all the extravagances of the bottle. His weakness was, that he could not reprehend without scolding, and in such Billingsgate language as should not come out of the mouth of any man. He called it giving a lick with the rough side of his tongue. He seemed to lay nothing of his business to heart, nor care what he did or left undone."

man, that if my lord had spoken before the king sitting on his throne, abating for the solemnity of the presence, I could not have more believed his lordship from that confidence he had in me: and I am sure, from what I have said, if I had the honor to be of this gentleman's jury, I would not believe him now." At these words the court was much offended, and the attorney-general said that the witness ought to be bound over to his good behavior. Sidney then resumed his address to the jury. He was answered by Finch, the solicitor-general, who maintained that the prisoner was mistaken in his law; that there needed not two witnesses to every particular fact; that one witness to one fact, and another witness to another fact, were the two witnesses required by law; that the testimony of the several persons who appeared in behalf of the prisoner had not in the least impeached the credit of Lord Howard as a witness; that writing the pamphlet was an overt act; that, as to the objection made by the prisoner that no judgment could be passed without reading the whole of that composition, what had been already read contained the whole series of arguments, which, coupled with the other evidence against him, was quite sufficient to prove his compassing the king's death, "inasmuch as he had, in particular, taught, that when kings broke their trust they might be called to account by their people, and that the calling and dissolving of parliaments was not in the king's power; that in this he did as good as affirm the king (then reigning) had broken his trust; for everybody knew the king had dissolved parliament, and, considered with this circumstance, what was there matter of argument became affirmation." In the end Finch declared that Algernon Sidney was to be looked upon as the most dangerous of all conspirators, because he acted upon principle and not passion, which was the motive that usually actuated other men. My Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys declared that neither the king nor any of his judges desired to take away the life of any man not forfeited by law; that for himself he had rather many guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer; but after this exordium he told the jury that the evidence before them was quite enough—that scribere est agere; and the jury brought in a verdict of guilty.[1]

On the 26th of November the prisoner was brought up to receive judgment. It was not the usage for the chief justice to pass sentence; but on this occasion Jeffreys, who knew that there would be a stir in court, charged himself with the office. Sidney said, in arrest of judgment, that he conceived that he had had no trial, for some of his jury were not freeholders; that there was a material defect in the indictment, which made it absolutely void, for the king was deprived of a title in it, the words defender of the faith being left out. The chief justice exclaimed, "In that you would deprive the king of his life, that is in very full, I think." The prisoner rejoined that, in a case of life and death, such things were not to be overruled so easily. "Mr. Sidney," roared Jeffreys, "we very well understand our duty; we don't need be told by you what our duty is: we tell you nothing but law; the treason is well laid." The prisoner again insisted that the papers had not been proved upon him—that there was no treason in that manuscript written long ago. The chief justice insisted that there was scarcely a line in the book but what was treason. The prisoner said, "My lord, there is one person I did not know where to find, but everybody knows where to find him now; I mean the Duke of Monmouth; let him be sent for, and if he will say there was ever any such plot I will acknowledge whatever you please." "That is over," cried Jeffreys; "you have been tried for this fact: we must not send for the Duke of Monmouth." One Mr. Bampfield, a barrister, interposed, modestly and timidly, as amicus curiæ, and humbly hoped his lordship would not proceed to judgment while there was so material a defect in the indictment. "There remains nothing for the court to do," bellowed Jeffreys, "but to pass sentence." "I must appeal to God and the world I am not heard," said Sidney. "Appeal to whom you will," said Jeffreys, who then, after reproaching the prisoner with ingratitude to the king and censuring the pamphlet anew, sonorously pronounced the horrible words. As soon as he had finished, the prisoner said, with a loud and firm voice, "Then, O God! O God! I beseech thee to sanctify my sufferings, and impute not my blood to the country or the city: let no inquisition be made for it; but, if any day the shedding of blood that is innocent must be revenged, let the weight of it fall only on those that maliciously persecute me for righteousness' sake." The chief justice, half enraged and half confounded, thought himself obliged to put up his prayer also, which he did in these words: "I pray God to work in you a temper fit to go unto the other world, for I see you are not fit for this." "My lord," replied Sidney, stretching out his arm, "feel my pulse, and see if I am disordered. I bless God I never was in better temper than I am now." Sidney afterward sent a paper to the king by Lord Halifax—still a favorite minister—who was his nephew by marriage. In this paper, which has been called a petition for justice rather than mercy, he gave a brief account of his trial, explained all its irregularities, and asked for admission into the king's presence. "And," he concluded, "if he does not show that it is not for your majesty's interest and honor to preserve him from the said oppression, the petitioner will not complain though he be left to be destroyed." Charles replied to the petition by signing the death-warrant. In consideration to his noble family the ax was substituted for the halter; and, on the 8th of December, he mounted the scaffold on Tower Hill with the air of one who came to triumph, not to suffer. His parting words were few, his prayers short; and, having placed a paper in the hands of the sheriff as his last legacy to the world and last testimony to the good old cause, he laid his head upon the block, and was happily dispatched at one blow.[1] Thus perished the last of the commonwealth-men, who would certainly have tried again, at all hazards, that great experiment in government which had utterly failed when tried by men who were immeasurably his superiors, and which would have failed again, and for the same reason, namely, that the people of England were not fitted for any such system. If Algernon Sidney had perished under a less infamous government, and in a less base and slavish time, his fate would have excited infinitely less interest.

Before Algernon Sidney was put upon his trial his grace of Monmouth was taken back to his father's heart. This was not entirely owing to Charles's fondness. The Lord Halifax, seeing that things were running much farther than suited his particular interests and politics, and that, from the growing indolence of the king, the Duke of York was acquiring immense influence, resolved, at all hazards, to bring the Duke of Monmouth again into favor. Halifax, accordingly, induced Monmouth, who had absconded, to sign some penitential letters to the king, which he (Halifax) had written for him. Charles admitted the penitent to a private audience on the 25th of October, and received him pretty well. On the 4th of November the king became "very kind," and gave Monmouth directions how to manage his business and to make his peace with the Duke of York. Nothing would be required of him but what was safe and honorable, only something must be done to blind his royal highness. Halifax, who went and came between the king and Monmouth, drew up a letter of acknowledgment and confession. At first Monmouth hesitated, but when Halifax assured him that the original should be deposited in no hands but the king's, and that the Duke of York should only have a copy, he signed the confession. On the 25th of November the Duke of Monmouth surrendered to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, and desired to speak alone with the king and the Duke of York. Up to this moment the negotiation had been carried on very secretly, and, as Sidney remarked on being brought up to receive judgment, nobody had known where Monmouth was. The Duke of York was therefore taken by surprise when Monmouth threw himself at the king's feet, and then confessed himself faulty to his highness, and asked his pardon also. There is no possibility of ascertaining what really passed in that strange scene; but it appears that Monmouth made another ample confession, only desiring that his majesty would not oblige him to be a witness, or in any way publish his confession; that he gave an account of the conspiracy, mentioned several names which had hitherto escaped suspicion, and added that Dr. Owen and all the considerable Non-conformist ministers knew of the conspiracy; and that he solemnly denied any knowledge of any design in any of the conspirators to assassinate either the king or the Duke of York. A day or two after this scene his majesty declared, in full council, that the Duke of Monmouth had made a full declaration about the late conspiracy, had expressed extraordinary contrition, and had made a particular submission to his royal highness his brother, at whose prayer a full pardon had been granted. And a paragraph was inserted in the Gazette, which proclaimed in other words that Monmouth was a mean scoundrel, like Howard, that had purchased his own safety by sacrificing his friends. Monmouth was enraged at this paragraph, which probably came too near the truth; but he did nothing, said nothing, until his pardon had passed the seal. Then he set his friends to work, who declared, in all directions, that the paragraph in the Gazette was utterly false. Upon being told that the king had said that he had confirmed all that Howard had sworn about the plot, Monmouth denied it, and called Lord Howard a liar and a rogue. And this, too, was sent round the town by his creatures, who ran with it from coffee-house to coffee-house. When his pardon was passed it was inserted in the Gazette that it had been given on his confessing the late plot; and Charles, who cared not about having broken his promise not to make any public use of the confession, was incensed at Monmouth's denials. It was proposed to bring Monmouth before the council, and cause him to make some regular declaration, which might be entered there, and afterward published; but Charles rejected this scheme, saying that he was such a blockhead that there would be mistakes, and that he would not speak as he ought. Then the Duke of Ormond proposed that something should be put in writing by the Duke of Monmouth, to prevent mistakes on all sides; and Monmouth accordingly wrote or signed a paper confessing the plot in general terms, and presented it himself to the king in the Duchess of Portsmouth's apartments, where he declared before all the company (the French mistress's boudoir was Charles's usual council-chamber) that he was a blockhead for being so long "in ill company" with "a parcel of fools." Neither Ormond nor the king, however, was satisfied with this paper, for there was no plain confession of any conspiracy in it. Another paper much more explicit was then drawn up by order of the king, who materially corrected it with his own hand. After some hesitation, Monmouth made a copy from this draft, and presented it to the king as his own free deed. In doing so, he said, "This paper will hang young Hampden." Charles replied it would not, nor should it ever be produced for such a purpose; but that "a better man than he (Gaston, duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XII., king of France) could not otherwise make his peace, and had been forced to hang his comrades, as he, if rightly served, should have been obliged to do. That night Monmouth supped with the elder Hampden and Mr. Trenchard of Taunton. The next morning he waited upon the king in a state of great excitement, and demanded back the paper. After some attempts at persuasion, which were followed by hard and coarse words, the king said that he should have it, but that he must restore to him the original draft whence he had copied it. Monmouth at first said he had burned it, but, seeing that it was the only way to get back that which he had signed, he went and brought the draft, and the papers were exchanged. But by this measure Monmouth again lost himself at court, for the vice-chamberlain was sent to forbid his reappearing there.[1] He retired to the country; but, steady to no principles, and fixed in no course, he again offered to lodge the signed paper, as his real confession, in the king's hands. It is said that herein he followed the advice of his wife, the heiress of Buccleugh, who seems always to have had more anxiety about the preservation of their united property than about the honor of her husband, who had very little affection for her. Instead of receiving an invitation back to court, Monmouth got a subpœna to attend as a witness for the crown on the trial of Mr. Hampden. Thereupon he fled to Holland, where he was kindly received by the Prince of Orange, whose court now swarmed with disaffected Scots and English of all classes and all colors of politics.

[1] Jeffreys, whom his royal master had once twitted for not being "parliament-proof," was proof to all compunctious visitings—to all decency. Between the trial and execution of Sidney he drank and danced at a city feast. The following extract from Evelyn's Diary is interesting in more respects than one:—"5 Dec. I was this day invited to a wedding of one Mrs. Castle . . . a jolly friendly woman. There was at the wedding the lord mayor, the sheriffs, several aldermen, and persons of quality; above all, Sir George Jeffreys, newly made lord chief justice of England, with Mr. Justice Withings, danced with the bride, and were exceeding merry. These great men spent the rest of the afternoon, till eleven at night, in drinking healths, taking tobacco, and talking much beneath the gravity of judges that had but a day or two before condemned Mr. Algernon Sidney, who was executed the 7th on Tower Hill, on the single witness of that monster of a man, Lord Howard of Escrick, and some sheets of paper taken in Mr. Sidney's study, pretended to be written by him, but not fully proved, nor the time when, but appearing to have been written before his majesty's restoration, and then pardoned by the Act of Oblivion; so that, though Mr. Sidney was known to be a person obstinately averse to government by a monarch (the subject of the paper was in answer to one of Sir R. Filmer), yet it was thought he had very hard measure."

A.D. 1684. When Hampden was brought to trial it was for a misdemeanor, which required but one witness, and not for treason, which required two; and this was because the court could only find one witness to swear against him—the infamous Lord Howard, who had not yet finished "the drudgery of swearing." As a matter of course the jury found for the king: the court set the fine at £40,000, and moreover ordered Hampden to be committed till it was paid, and to find sureties for his good behavior during life. Two others of the Rye House plotters —Holloway, a merchant of Bristol, and Sir Thomas Armstrong—were condemned to death by Jeffreys, in defiance, not of one, but of many laws, and were both executed. No more blood was shed on this occasion in England; but there were several executions in Scotland, where the atrocities generally exceeded those of the English courts of law. All the Scottish plotters, or friends of Shaftesbury, Russell, and Sidney, that were arrested in London, were sent down for trial to Edinburgh. Baillie of Jerviswood was the first victim. Contrary to the laws of Scotland, written depositions, which had been partly extorted by torture out of court, were read to the jury, as were other depositions taken from the record of the trials of Russell, Sidney, and others in England. Being broken down by infirmities and long suffering, Baillie was executed on the same day he was condemned, lest a natural death in his dungeon should have disappointed his judges of a public execution. Several others were put to death in Scotland; but many more escaped into Holland, where, like their precursors, they were kindly received by the Prince of Orange, who must have been fully convinced by this time that tyranny and popery were opening his way to the throne of England and Scotland, to which, as yet, his wife Mary was next in regular order of succession to her father, the Duke of York. The most eminent of these last Scottish refugees were Lord Melville, Lord Loudon, and Sir Patrick Hume. The abuse of torture in Scotland at this time appears to have been greater than it had been even in the days of the Duke of Lauderdale. Spence, the fugitive Earl of Argyle's secretary, and Carstairs, a Presbyterian clergyman, who had been seized in London, were sent to Edinburgh to be tortured and tried. Spence endured the torture twice, and Carstairs bore it for a full hour without confessing or revealing any thing. Their thumbs were crushed and their sleep was interrupted for many days and nights.[1] At last nature could bear no more, and Spence consented to read some letters in cipher that treated of (or so, at least, it was represented) a projected rising in Scotland, the landing of Argyle, Stair, and other of the fugitives in Holland, and of aid to be received from the Whigs in England. This was on the 23d of August; and on the 5th of September Carstairs, to avoid further torture, confessed before the secret committee of council that there had been a current plot in Scotland for the ten last years for keeping out the Duke of York, and preserving the reformed religion; and he denounced the Earl of Tarras, Murray of Philiphaugh, Pringle of Torwoodlee, Scott of Galashiels, and many other gentlemen of rank, as being privy to it. Several of these lairds were threatened with the boots, and

[1] Under date of the 5–6 of December, Evelyn says, "The Duke of Monmouth, now having his pardon, refuses to acknowledge there was any treasonable plot, for which he is banished Whitehall. This was a great disappointment to some who had prosecuted Trenchard, Hampden, &c., that, for want of a second witness, were come out of the Tower upon their habeas corpus." The king had now augmented his guards with a new sort of dragoons, who carried also granades, and were habited after the Polish manner, with long-peaked caps, "very fierce and fantastical."—Diary.

[1] Sir John Lauder, of Fountainhall, gives the following atrocious details:—"July, 26th, 1684. Mr. W. Spence, by order of the privy council, is tortured and put in the boots, to force him to reveal what he knows of the earl's and other persons' accession to the late English fanatic plot, and the association and design of rising; and in regard he refused to depone upon oath if he had the key whereby he could read some letters of the earl's, produced by Major Holmes, written in ciphers, and seeing he would not say upon oath that he could not read them, and that they offered to secure him by a pardon for his life, it rendered him very obnoxious and suspect of prevarication; so that, after the torture, he was put in General Dalziel's hands; and it was reported that, by a hair-shirt and pricking (as the witches are used), he was five nights kept from sleep, till he was turned half distracted. He eated very little, of purpose that he might require the less sleep; yet all this while he discovered nothing, and though he had done it, yet little credit was to be given to what he should say at such a time."—"August 7th, 1684. At privy council, Spence (mentioned 26th July) is again tortured, and his thumbs crushed with thumbikins: it is a new invention used among the colliers when transgressors, and discovered by General Dalziel and Drummond, they having seen them used in Muscovy. After this, when they were about to put him again in the boots, he, being frighted, desired time, and he would declare what he knew; whereon they gave him some time, and sequestrated him in the castle of Edinburgh, as a place where he would be free from any bad advice or impression, to be obstinate in not revealing."

others were actually tortured with worse instruments. "Duke Hamilton," says the cool-blooded Lauder, "opposed this torturing much, and alledged that, at this rate, they might, without accusers or witnesses, take any person off the street and torture him; and he retired and refused to be present, on this ground, that, if the party should die in the torture, the judges were liable for murder, or, at least, were severely censurable. It was doubted how far these testimonies, extorted per torturam, could be probative against third parties, seeing that witnesses should be so far voluntary and spontaneous as to be under no impressions or terrors of fear of life or limb. . . . . Some thought our privy council would have been at some loss, and contracted some tash[1] by this cruel torture, had they (the prisoners) suffered it as they did the boots (which they regarded not, their legs being small) without discovering or revealing this conspiracy; but their confessing tended to justify the privy council's procedure." Gordon of Earlstone, a man of family and fortune, had been condemned to die; but, upon information that he had been intrusted with important secrets, the council wrote to the Scotch secretary of state at London to know whether they might put him to the torture while he was under sentence of death. The Lord Advocate of Scotland opined that he might be tortured; and the king gave orders that he should. Thereupon Gordon was brought before the privy council and their accursed engines of torture, the sight of which drove him raving mad. "Through fear and distraction he roared like a mad bull, and cried and struck about him, so that the hangman and his man durst scarce lay hands on him. At last he fell into a swoon, and then, reviving, he told that General Dalziel and Drummond were to head the fanatic party, and Duke Hamilton was on their side; which improbable things made some call it revery, and others a politic design to invalidate all he should say; and the physicians were ordained upon soul and conscience to report his condition, if they judged him really mad, or only feigned, as David at Gath with Achish, as also to prescribe him a diet for curing him; and, for more quietness, they sent him to the castle."[2] He was afterward reprieved by the council till the last Friday of the month of January following. (It was on the 23d of November, 1683, that he was brought up for torture.) "They thought once to have given way to his execution; but, being furious, others thought it cruel then to bereave a man of his life, and endanger his soul, when he could not repent: though the king's advocate alledged that the end of the punishment of malefactors was not only for their own good, but in emendationem et terrorem aliorum, which end held even in decapitating a traitor, though from horror and fear turned mad."[3] Worse tortures were prepared for Ferguson, the minister, who had been actively employed in London, who had fled to Holland with Shaftesbury, and who had attended him on his death-bed there. This Ferguson, who was a man of great activity and address, had ventured to return in disguise to Edinburgh; but he was traced thither; the gates of the city were shut and the strictest search was made for him in every part of the town. Disguised and unknown, he ran to the prison under pretense of visiting a friend in confinement, and there he remained for some time, because he knew that there only no one would expect to find him.[1]

The unusual mildness shown by Monmouth toward the prisoners taken at Bothwell-bridge had been succeeded under the Duke of York by detestable cruelties. Not only were those punished who had been in arms, but also those who gave them shelter or betrayed any sympathy in their after-sufferings; and this, too, without any distinction as to the ties of blood and close relationship. In many cases the wife was persecuted for concealing her husband, the father for harboring his own son; men were tortured and then hanged for refusing to call that insurrection a rebellion, and the killing Archbishop Sharp a murder. Witnesses were tortured as well as prisoners.[2] Sentences of forfeiture were pronounced upon presumptive evidence, or upon no evidence at all, and the estates were divided among the ministers of state of the Duke of York's appointing, their retainers, and the commanders of the troops. In this way Graham of Claverhouse, afterward the celebrated Viscount Dundee, and the favorite hero of the Tories, was enriched by the lands of a suspected Covenanter. The narrow and solitary fortress of the Bass Rock, Dunbarton Castle, and other places the most difficult of access, were crowded with Covenanters and Cameronians, who were made to endure the extreme of cruelty and hardship.

In England, Judge Jeffreys continued to rise in the royal favor. When he was about to depart for the circuit, to give the provinces "a lick with the rough side of his tongue" (a favorite expression of his), the king took a ring from his own finger, and gave it to him, as a token of his particular regard. At the same time Charles bestowed upon him a curious piece of advice to be given by a king to a judge; it was, that, as the weather would be hot, Jeffreys should beware of drinking too much. The people called the ring "Jeffreys's blood-stone," as he got it just after the execution of Colonel Armstrong.[3] The lord chief justice's grand aim was to push the quo warranto, and to obtain, through terror or cajolery, a surrender of the corporation charters; and this war against civic rights was driven on with such vigor and success, that almost all the municipalities were prevailed on, eventually, either to suffer judgment against them by default, or to surrender their charters in hope of conciliating the favor of the despot.[1] An attempt has been made by certain writers, who treat of the iniquities and atrocities of this disgraceful reign with a coolness astonishing in Englishmen, to excuse, nay, even to justify, these proceedings, upon the ground of defects and abuses in the corporations. It is quite true that those franchises, inherited from the Saxon times, had contracted some rust, and had lost some of their original virtues; and that a corporation reform, which has been reserved for the legislators of our own day, would have been a merit in Charles II.; but it was avowedly not a reform that he wanted, but a total destruction of municipal institutions, which, more than any other single cause, secure men in their liberty, and fit them for the enjoyment of it, and for the self-legislating (in minor points) and business habits of freemen. And whenever that Saxon spirit of municipal government is destroyed, either by an overextension of the French principle of centralization, or by any other whim of rash legislators or embryo tyrants, the parliament of England will be worth less than a village vestry.

[2] Under date of the 14th June, 1681, Lauder of Fountainhall has this horrible entry:—"It was moved by my Lord Haddo, and approven of by the king's advocate, that witnesses, in such a case, might be tortured, when they vary, as well as parties. This is, indeed, agreeable to the Roman law, but does not suit the genius of our nation, which looks upon the torture of the boots as a barbarous remedy; and yet of late it hath been frequently used among us."—Decisions.

In the beginning of this year (1684) Sir Samuel Barnadiston, the foreman of the grand jury which had ignored the bill against Lord Shaftesbury, was condemned for a libel, and sentenced to pay a fine of £10,000, and to give security for good behavior during life. Williams, the speaker of the House of Commons, was severely prosecuted for what he had done in parliament, that is, for having signed the votes of the House, which he was bound to do by his office. In defiance of the authority of the parliaments which had committed them, and continued their imprisonment, Danby and the surviving Catholic peers, lords Arundel, Powis, and Bellasis, were released from their long captivity in the Tower by sentence of the judges, who declared, and correctly, that, "in justice and conscience," they ought to have been admitted to bail long ago. But, as well in what was just as in what was unjust, Charles was now proving to the world that he had no intention of ever again meeting parliament. Halifax ventured to propose such a meeting, but Charles had now resigned himself to the will of his brother. The duplicity of Halifax hardly saved him from the duke's vengeance; and, during the few months that remained of this reign, the duke and minister were alternately engaged in united intrigues against other ministers, and in intriguing the one against the other. The whole business of the admiralty was again placed in the hands of James; and presently after, in defiance of the Test Act, he was readmitted as a member of the council. It was scarcely to be expected that he who never pardoned any one should overlook his arch-enemy, the Rev. Dr. Titus Oates. That great hero of the popish plot was brought before Jeffreys, upon whom, in former days, he had adventured his wit,[1] charged with sundry libels under the statute

[1] Penny Cyclopedia, Article Borough.—Willcock, Law of Municipal Corporations.

[1] This was upon the trial of College, the Protestant joiner, when Oates appeared to prove that subornation had been practiced against the Protestants. He appealed to Jeffreys, then sergeant, as to his knowledge of Alderman Wilcox: Jeffreys exclaimed that he did not intend to be an evidence for such as he. "I do not desire," said Titus, "that Sir George Jeffreys should be an evidence for me; I had credit in parliaments, and Sir George had disgrace in one of them." Jeffreys was cowed, and merely said, "Your servant, doctor; you are a witty man and a philosopher." In fact, in November, 1680, the House of Commons had voted that Sir George Jeffreys, the recorder of the city of London, by traducing and obstructing petitioning for the sitting of this parliament, had destroyed the right of the subject. They had, moreover, petitioned the king to remove him out of all public offices, and had brought him upon his knees at the bar of the House. Jeffreys de scandalis magnatum. Witnesses swore that the doctor had said that the Duke of York was a traitor, that "the Duke of York, before the succession should come to him, should be banished or hanged, but hanging was fittest." Damages were awarded to the duke to the amount of £100,000, which was equivalent to a sentence of perpetual imprisonment against the doctor.

Jeffreys, who had first been promoted at court by James, who had employed him as his solicitor-general, seems to have undertaken the most difficult and dangerous task of stretching the limits of toleration, but with the sole view of benefiting the Catholics. One morning he brought to the council-table, at which he now sat, an enormous roll of papers and parchments, and, turning to the king, he said—"Sir, I have a business to lay before your majesty, which I took notice of in the north, and which will deserve your majesty's royal commiseration. It is the case of numbers of your good subjects that are imprisoned for recusancy. I have the list of them here to justify what I say. They are so many that the jails can not hold them without their lying one upon another." The Lord Keeper North, who hated Jeffreys worse than popery, because he knew that Jeffreys was trying hard to get the seals, and who, moreover, dreaded the responsibility of passing an indulgence and general pardon without consent of parliament, perceiving that Halifax, Rochester, and the other lords "eminently Protestant," were silent, took courage to say—"I humbly entreat your majesty that my lord chief justice may declare whether all the persons named in those rolls are actually in prison." Jeffreys retorted that he did not mean that, that all the prisons in England could not contain them, but that the fate of those not under actual restraint was little better than that of the captives, seeing that they were liable "to be worried and taken up by every parish justice, and mulcted of fees to the ruin of their families." North, though professing the most intolerant Protestantism, was not bold enough to fall upon the papists; but he assailed with all his fury the Dissenters, who, for the occasion, were to be coupled with the Catholics as deserving the royal commiseration and mercy. Turning to the king, he said, "I beg your majesty will consider what little reason there is to grant such a general pardon as this is at this time; for they are not all Roman Catholics that lie under sentence of recusancy, but sectaries of all kinds and denominations; perhaps as many, or more, who are all professed enemies to your majesty and your government in church and state. They are a turbulent people, and always stirring up sedition; and if they do so much when they lie obnoxious to the laws, which your majesty may inflict upon them at your pleasure, what will they not do if your majesty gives them all a discharge at once? That would be to quit the greatest advantage you have of securing the peace of the nation. Is it not better that your enemies should live under some disadvantages, and be obnoxious to your majesty's pleasure, who may, if they are turbulent and troublesome, inflict the penalties of the law upon them? And, as to the Roman Catholics, if there be any persons to whom your majesty would extend the favor of a pardon, let it be particular and express, but not universally, to set your enemies as well as friends at ease." The king paid great attention; the lords of the council wondered; but nothing more was said about the indulgence, and they proceeded to other business.[1]

In his bold intrigues Halifax included a secret correspondence with the Duke of Monmouth, with some others of the exiles at the court of the Prince of Orange, and also with William himself; but though the Duke of York knew or suspected this, he was unable to deprive him of the favor of the king, who liked the minister more for his ready wit and talent for satire than for any other quality. Lord Rochester, the second son of the late Chancellor Clarendon, after a vain rivalship, was appointed to the presidency of the council, a post of nominal dignity rather than of power or great emolument. This his rival Halifax called kicking a man up stairs. Subsequently, Rochester was appointed to the government of Ireland, in the room of the Duke of Ormond, the old and steady friend of his father, who was abruptly recalled to make room for him and for a scheme which it was fancied Ormond would not go into. This was the raising of a Catholic army in Ireland, to be employed, if necessary, in England.[2] Godolphin, that adroit trimmer, who retained place and favor under three successive princes of very opposite characters, after being promoted to one of the two secretaryships of state, was removed to Rochester's place. Sunderland, as adroit as Godolphin, remained in office, and kept up a very friendly understanding with the French mistress. The foreign transactions of this cabinet were sufficiently base; but they were unimportant, being merely a continuation of Charles's old system. Among these transactions may be classed the marriage of the Princess Anne, the Duke of York's second daughter. This young lady, it is said, had been, for prudential reasons, always destined to a Protestant prince; and, it is added, that the court of France, which exercised their influence in all things, had consented to that arrangement, with the proviso that they should have the naming of the person. It was on this errand that George (afterward George I.), the son of the Elector of Hanover, came over to England, in was also frightened into a surrender of the recordership of London. Charles made a mockery of his terror, and told him he was not parliament-proof!

[1] Roger North, Life of the Lord Keeper. Roger continues:—"That night his lordship came home full of melancholy; and it was some time before any person near him knew the occasion of it. But he would sometimes break out in exclamations, as, 'What can be the meaning! Are they all stark mad!' and the like. That very night he took his pocket-almanack, and, against the day, wrote

'Motion, cui solus obstiti.'
Motion, which I alone opposed.

For he accounted this action of his the most memorable that he had ever done. He was not without a jealousy that one great end of that pestilent, absurd motion was, to put a thorn in his foot, and, by way of dilemma, leave him out of his place. For, if the king had commanded, and he refused to put the seals to such a pardon, then he deserved to be removed by a just displeasure. If he had complied, then the parliament had effectually done it."

1682. Burnet intimates that this wooer was recalled by his father, who had changed his mind, and settled that he should marry the Princess of Zell, his first cousin; but it is insinuated by others that the Hanoverian was fastidious; that the Lady Anne had not the fortune to please him; and that, like other great ladies, she never forgot or forgave the affront to her dying day.[1] On the 19th of July, 1683, two days before the beheading of Lord Russell, and in the midst of the public excitement about the Rye House plot, George Prince of Denmark, brother to his Danish majesty, arrived to marry the Lady Anne; and, as he was backed by France, and all the preliminaries had been settled, the marriage took place at Whitehall a week after. According to one account, this match was Charles's own act, against the inclination, design, and interest of the duke; and the marriage was highly acceptable to the nation. But Burnet affirms, on the contrary, that it did not at all please the nation, for that it was known that the proposition came from France, and apprehended that the prince would change his religion. Others, again, who believe that the duke fully approved of the match, give this reason for it: James calculated that this Protestant alliance would more and more persuade people that they had nothing to apprehend from a popish successor.

WHITEHALL AND ADJOINING BUILDINGS, WITH A ROYAL AQUATIC PROCESSION.
From Pictures of the Period engraved in Smith's Westminster.

Meanwhile, Louis XIV., regardless of the treaty of Nimeguen, and of the rights of nations, was continuing his career of encroachment and aggression. Upon the Rhine, at the foot of the Pyrenees, and across the Alps, the might of his arms or of his gold and intrigues was felt. Genoa, the superb, was bombarded, and her doge compelled, in person, to implore the pardon of the Grand Monarque at Versailles. It seemed that England had resigned the sovereignty of the seas; France had now a magnificent fleet manned by 60,000 sailors, and the French flag exacted homage in all directions. Across the Mediterranean the corsairs of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli were severely chastised, and the liberated Christian slaves sang the praises of the great Louis. The Prince of Orange, who again found Holland exposed by Louis's capture of Luxemburg, Courtray, Dixmude, and other places in Flanders, and who had never ceased laboring to form a coalition against the French, now united with the courts of Madrid and Vienna in urging Charles to take part in a league for the preservation of the independence of Europe; but Charles knew that he could not figure as a belligerent without calling a parliament for money, and a parliament he was resolved never to call. He therefore continued to receive his pay from France, which became less liberal and regular as Louis perceived his real condition. In the preceding year (1683) Lord Dartmouth was sent with a squadron to Tangier, with a secret commission to blow up the mole, the fortifications, and all the works, which had cost England immense sums, to bring home the garrison, and to leave the ruins to the Moors. No material benefit had been derived from the occupation of that African port: but a wiser government might have rendered it something like what Gibraltar has become in our hands, and made it a nucleus of African commerce and civilization.

By its abandonment a very important saving was made to the revenue, and a considerable accession to the standing army; and Charles, in his scheme for doing without parliaments, wanted both money and troops. The French, who had long been jealous of seeing the English there in a position whence they might have commanded the Straits, were very anxious for the demolition, and it is suspected that Louis furnished the money for Lord Dartmouth's inglorious expedition. According to Burnet, the Portuguese ambassador "took fire upon it; and desired that, if the king was weary of keeping Tangier, he would restore it to his master, undertaking to pay a great sum for the charge the king had been at; but the king believed that, as the money would never be paid, so the King of Portugal would not be able to maintain that place against the Moors."

A.D. 1685. In rendering himself absolute, Charles had failed to increase his happiness: his usual gayety forsook him, and he became morose, gloomy, and dejected, unable to find any solace except in sauntering away his time among his women. A variety of causes has been assigned for this change of temper in the constitutionally gay and thoughtless monarch, and there were many causes to account for it; yet, probably, after all, his dejection arose more from his declining health than from any intensity of moral feeling or anxiety. It was, perhaps, nothing more than the heaviness and gloom which generally precedes apoplexy. In the midst of the fiercely renewed conflicting intrigues of Halifax and the Duke of York, who each wished to banish the other, Charles, who had wavered and lied to both, promised to make up his mind to some certain course; but, on Monday, the 2d of February, after passing a restless night, his face was observed to be pale and ghastly, his head drooped, and his hand was fixed on his stomach. Dr. King, an eminent chemist and physician, who was in waiting that day by the particular order of the king, who had a taste for experimental philosophy, ran out of the room, and meeting the Earl of Peterborough, told him that his majesty was in a strange humor, for he did not speak one word of sense. The earl returned with the doctor into the chamber, and they had scarcely entered when Charles fell on the floor as if dead. Dr. King then resolved to bleed him at all hazards; and, after bleeding, the king came to himself. The royal physician afterwards approved of King's promptitude, and the council ordered £1000 for his good service, which was never paid. As soon as the report of this illness got abroad the people were thrown into a great ferment. According to one party, this was simply the effect of their wonderful love to Charles's person; but the other party hinted that the dread of his successor did not a little contribute to swell their sorrow. On the third day of the king's illness the lords of the council inserted a bulletin in the Gazette, stating that his physicians conceived that he was now out of danger, and that in a few days he would be freed from his distemper.

But this bulletin was scarcely made public when the king had a second fit, and then the physicians gave him over, and consigned him to the spiritual care of the bishops. Barillon, the French ambassador, hastened to Whitehall to speak with the Duke of York. "The doctors," said James, "believe that the king is in extremity. I beg you to assure the king your master, that he will ever have in me a faithful and grateful servant." The ambassador went for a moment into the apartment of his countrywoman, the Duchess of Portsmouth. "Instead of speaking to me," says Barillon, "of her grief and of the great loss she was about to sustain, she entered into a private cabinet, and said, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, I am going to tell you the greatest secret in the world, and my head would be in danger if it were known here. The king, in the bottom of his heart is a Catholic, and nobody tells him the state he is in, or speaks to him of God. I can no longer, with propriety, enter his chamber, where the queen is almost constantly with him. The Duke of York thinks about his own affairs, and has no time to take the care which he ought of the king's conscience. Go and tell him that I have conjured you to warn him to do what he can to save the soul of the king, his brother. He is master in the royal chamber, and can make any one withdraw from it as he lists. Lose no time, for if you delay ever so little it may be too late." Barillon hurried to the duke, who recovered himself as if from a profound lethargy. "You are right," said James; "there is no time to lose. I will hazard all rather than not do my duty." But as the duke had no intention of proceeding openly, there were several difficulties to overcome. The bishops hardly ever left the bedside of the dying monarch, and they had even pressed him to receive the sacrament according to the rites of their own church; and then, by the law of the land, it was still death for a native Romish priest to present himself, and Charles, it appears, could confess himself in no other language than English. James, however, went to his brother, and, returning an hour after, he told Barillon that he had spoken to the king, and found him resolved not to take the sacrament, which the Protestant bishops had pressed him to receive; that this had surprised the bishops much, but that one or other of them would still remain always in the room, if he (the duke) did not find some pretext to make everybody leave it in order to get the opportunity of speaking to his brother with freedom, and disposing him to make a formal renunciation of heresy, and confess himself to a Catholic priest. Various expedients were thought of by the duke and the ambassador. James proposed that Barillon should ask leave to speak to the king to tell him something in secret from his master, and that everybody should go out of the room. The ambassador represented that this would make a great noise in court, and that there was no likelihood of his being allowed to remain in private with the king of England long enough for what he had to do. The duke then thought of sending for the queen, as if to take her last farewell, and to ask pardon if she had ever in any thing disobeyed the king, who was on his part to go through the same ceremony to her. But at last it was resolved that the duke himself should speak to the king in whispers, so that no person in the room might hear what he said. It was thought that this course would remove suspicion, and that it would be believed that the duke spoke only of state affairs. "Thus," continues Barillon, "without any further precaution, the Duke of York stooped down to the king his brother's ear, after having ordered that no one should approach. I was in the room, and more than twenty persons at the door, which was open. What the Duke of York said was not heard; but the King of England said from time to time, very loud, Yes, with all my heart. He sometimes made the Duke of York repeat what he said, because he did not easily hear him. This lasted near a quarter of an hour. The Duke of York again went out as if he had gone to the queen, and said to me, The king has consented that I should bring a priest to him: but I dare not bring any of the duchess's, they are too well known: send and find one quickly." Barillon told the duke that he would do it with all his heart; but he believed that too much time would be lost, and that he had just seen all the queen's priests in a closet near the bedchamber. At that moment James perceived Castelmelhor, a foreign nobleman, well acquainted with the court, and begged him to find a proper confessor. The count warmly engaged to do this, and to speak with the queen; but he came back in an instant, saying, "Should I hazard my head in this, I would do it with pleasure; but I do not know one of the queen's priests that understands or speaks English." Upon this, it was resolved to send to the Venetian resident for an English priest; but as time pressed, the Count of Castelmelhor went into the closet where the queen's priests were assembled, and unexpectedly found among them one Huddleston, a priest, who had saved the king's life after the battle of Worcester, and who, by special act of parliament, had been exempted from all the laws made against the Catholics. They put a wig and gown upon this man to disguise him. Castelmelhor took him to be instructed by a Portuguese monk of the order of the Barefooted Carmelites in what he had to do on such an occasion; for Huddleston was no practiced confessor, or, in the words of Barillon, "of himself he was no great doctor." Then Castelmelhor conducted him to the door of a room that adjoined the sick chamber; and the Duke of York, being warned by Barillon that all was ready, sent out Chiffinch of the back stairs, who had been accustomed to bring Charles his women, to bring in Huddleston and the Host. The Duke of York exclaimed aloud, "The king wills that everybody should retire except the earls of Bath and Feversham." The physicians went into a closet, the door of which was shut upon them; and Chiffinch came back with the disguised priest. In presenting Huddleston, James said, "Sire, here is a man who once saved your life, and who is now come to save your soul." The king answered, "He is welcome." He then confessed himself with seeming sentiments of devotion and repentance: and the Duke of York assured Barillon that Huddleston had acquitted himself very well as a confessor, and made the king formally promise to declare himself openly a Catholic, if he recovered his health. After confession Charles received absolution, the Romish communion, and even extreme unction. During the three quarters of an hour that all this lasted the courtiers, attendants, Protestant bishops, and others in the antechamber gazed at one another; none said any thing except with their eyes, or in low whispers. According to Barillon, the presence in the sick room of lords Bath and Feversham, who were Protestants, satisfied the bishops a little; but the queen's women and the other priests saw so much going and coming that it was impossible the secret could be kept long.[1] After Charles had received the communion the violence of his disorder seemed to abate, and he spoke more intelligibly than he had done for some time. He sent for his natural children, gave them his dying blessing, and recommended them to his successor. But of the absent Duke of Monmouth he made no mention, good or bad. As he was pronouncing his blessing on his illegitimate sons, the bishops observed that he was the Lord's anointed, and the father of his country; and thereupon all present fell upon their knees, and Charles raised himself in his bed, and very solemnly blessed them all. The queen had sent to excuse her absence, and implore his pardon for any offense that she might have given him. "Alas! poor woman," said Charles, "it is I that should ask her pardon; and I do it with all my heart." He spoke repeatedly to the Duke of York in terms of tenderness and friendship; he twice recommended to him the Duchess of Portsmouth and his son by her, the young Duke of Richmond; he begged kind treatment for the Duchess of Cleveland: nor was his stage-mistress forgotten. "Do not," said he, "let poor Nelly starve." At these words the bishops were much scandalized. The king often expressed his confidence in God's mercy. Ken, the orthodox bishop of Bath and Wells, read some prayers, and spoke to him of God; "but the bishop," adds Barillon, "was not officious in saying any thing particular to him, or proposing that he should make a profession of his faith; he apprehended a refusal, but feared still more, as I believe, to irritate the Duke of York."[2] Charles was perfectly sensible

[1] All this time, and from the king's being in danger to his death, "prayers," says Evelyn, "were solemnly made in all the churches, especially in both the court chapels, where the chaplains relieved one another every half quarter of an hour from the time he began to be in danger till he expired, according to the form prescribed in the church offices. Those who assisted his majesty's devotions were, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of London, Durham, and Ely, but more especially Ken, the bishop of Bath and Wells. It is said they exceedingly urged the receiving the holy sacrament, but his majesty told them he would consider of it, which he was so long about, that it was too late. Others whispered that the bishops and lords, except the earls of Bath and Feversham, being ordered to withdraw the night before, Huddleston, the priest, had presumed to administer the popish offices."—Diary.

[2] It is said by James himself, or at least by the writer of his memoirs, compiled from his own papers, that "when the king's life was wholly despaired of, and it was time to prepare for another world, two bishops came to do their function, who, reading the prayers appointed in the Common Prayer Book on that occasion, when they came to the place where usually they exhort a sick person to make a confession of his sins, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who was one of them, advertised him, it was not of obligation; and, after a short exhortation, asked him if he were sorry for his sins? Which the king saying he

the whole night, and spoke upon all things with great calmness. At six o'clock in the morning (it was the 6th day of February) he asked what hour it was, and said, "Open the curtains that I may once more see daylight." He was then suffering great pain, and at seven o'clock they bled him, which seemed to give him relief. But this did not continue. His pains returned, and he began to speak with great difficulty, struggling for breath. At ten o'clock his senses were quite gone, and he died half an hour before twelve, without any struggle or convulsion.[1] Charles was in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-fifth of his reign de facto from the Restoration, in 1660, though the formal mode of reckoning in acts of parliament and legal documents is from the death of his father, which makes the duration of his reign thirty-six years.

It was instantly "ventilated abroad" that his death was caused by poison administered to make way for the succession of his popish brother; but it appears to us that this foul rumor, of which we shall soon hear more, rested upon the slenderest of foundations, and that James, with all his faults and hardness of heart, was utterly incapable of committing or permitting any such crime.

was, the bishop pronounced the absolution, and then asked him if he pleased to receive the sacrament? to which the king made no reply, and, being pressed by the bishop several times, gave no other answer but that it was time enough, or that he would think of it." "James," this account continues, "stood all the while by the bedside, and, seeing the king would not receive the sacrament from them, and knowing his sentiments, he desired the company to stand a little from the bed, and then asked the king whether he should send for a priest; to which the king replied, For God's sake, brother, do, and lose no time. The duke said he would bring one to him; but none could be found except Father Huddleston, who had been so assistant in the king's escape from Worcester: he was brought up by a back stair-case, and the company were desired to withdraw, but he (the Duke of York), not thinking fit that he should be left alone with the king, desired the Earl of Bath, a lord of the bedchamber, and the Earl of Feversham, captain of the guard, should stay; the rest being gone, Father Huddleston was introduced, and administered the sacrament."—Life of James II., 2 vols. 4to. [1] Depêche de M. Barillon au Roi, dated February 18 (new style), 1685.—Huddleston's Brief Account in State Tracts, and in Sir H. Ellis's Letters.—Evelyn's Diary.—Letter to the Rev. Francis Roper, Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, in Sir H. Ellis's Collection. This last epistle is attributed to the chaplain of the Bishop of Ely, who watched one night by the king's bedside. The writer, a furious high churchman seems to have had no glimpse of Huddleston's doings. He says, "I do believe the most lamented prince that ever sat upon a throne, one of the best of kings, after near five days' sickness, left the world, translated, doubtless, to a much more glorious kingdom than all those which he has left behind him now bewailing of their loss. It was a great piece of providence that this fatal blow was not so sudden as it would have been if he had died on Monday, when his fit first took him; as he must have done, if Dr. King had not been by, by chance, and let him blood. By these few days' respite, he had opportunity (which accordingly he did embrace) of thinking of another world; and we are all prepared the better to sustain so great a loss. He showed himself, throughout his sickness, one of the best-natured men that ever lived; and, by abundance of fine things he said in reference to his soul, he showed he died as good a Christian: and the physicians, who have seen so many leave this world, do say, they never saw the liks as to his courage, so unconcerned he was at death, though sensible to all degrees imaginable, to the very last." The writer, like a man looking to promotion, says, however, a great deal more about the new king than about the dead one. After mentioning that the archbishop and bishops had waited upon James, and in a private audience had requested him "to patronize the church as his royal brother of blessed memory had all along done; giving him all assurances of loyalty in the clergy, as what he might depend upon, as it is both the doctrine and practice of our church, beyond any church in the world," this correspondent exultingly tells Mr. Roper that his majesty King James had declared that "he would never give any sort of countenance to dissenters;" "and so," he concludes, "God continue him in his good resolutions, and make us all live peaceably and happily under him, and may his reign be always answerable to this auspicious beginning!"

James II.

A.D. 1685. As soon as his brother was dead, James hastened to the council, and thus addressed the members of it:—"My lords, before I enter any other business, I think fit to say something to you. Since it hath pleased Almighty God to place me in this station, and I am now to succeed so good and gracious a king, as well as so very kind a brother, it is proper for me to declare to you that I will endeavor to follow his example, and particularly in that of his great clemency and tenderness to his people. I have been reported to be a man fond of arbitrary power; but that is not the only falsehood which has been reported of me; and I shall make it my endeavor to preserve this government, both in church and state, as it is now by law established. I know the principles of the church of England are favorable to monarchy; and the members of it have shown themselves good and loyal subjects; therefore I shall always take care to defend and support it. I know, too, that the laws of England are sufficient to make the king as great a monarch as I can wish; and, as I shall never depart from the just rights and prerogative of the crown, so I shall never invade any man's property. I have often before ventured my life in defense of this nation, and shall go as far as any man in preserving it in all its just rights and liberties." On the same afternoon, at four o'clock, James was proclaimed in the very same forms as his grandfather, James I., after the death of Queen Elizabeth. The people answered with acclamations, and not a shadow of opposition appeared anywhere. In the evening there was a great kissing of hands at Whitehall, the queen being in her bed, but putting forth her hand. Evelyn, who went with the rest to perform this ceremony, says, "I can never forget the inexpressible luxury and profaneness, gaming, and all dissoluteness, and, as it were, total forgetfulness of God (it being Sunday evening), which this day se'nnight I was witness of, the king sitting and toying with his concubines—Portsmouth, Cleveland, Mazarine, &c.—a French boy singing love-songs, in that glorious gallery, while about twenty of the great courtiers and other dissolute persons were at basset round a large table, a bank of at least £2000 in gold before them; upon which two gentlemen who were with me made reflections with astonishment. Six days after was all in the dust!" James, though little less vicious than his brother, was more quiet in his pleasures, and was possessed of a strong sense of decorum and stateliness. "The face of the whole court," adds Evelyn a few days later, "was exceedingly changed into a more solemn and moral behavior, the new king affecting neither profaneness nor buffoonery."

When the ministers and great officers waited upon James, to surrender their offices and charges into his majesty's hands, he returned them all back to them with gracious words. By the advice of the council, his first declaration was printed and dispersed all over the country, as containing matter of great satisfaction to a jealous people: and a proclamation was set forth to continue all magistrates and authorities whatsoever; thus making the transition of government almost imperceptible, and causing the new reign to appear no more than a continuation of the former one. But all these and other measures began to lose their value when the king was seen, on the first Sunday after his brother's burial,[1] going to mass publicly with all the ensigns of royalty, and

ordering the doors of his Romish chapel to be set wide open. The Duke of Norfolk, who carried the sword of state, stopped at the unlawful threshold. "My lord," said the king, "your father would have gone farther." "Your majesty's father would not have gone so far," replied the duke. He ordered Huddleston, the priest, to publish a relation of Charles's dying in the communion of the church of Rome, and he himself became the publisher of two papers, which he declared in his own royal name, and under his signature, were found by him in his brother's strong box; their tendency being to establish that there could be but one true church, and that that was the church of Rome; that whosoever set up their own authority against that one true church, whether individuals, nations, or governments, fell immediately into fanaticism; and that, consequently, the church of England lay as open to that imputation as any of the sects which had arisen out of and separated from it. James triumphantly showed these two papers to Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, who said that he did not think the late king had been so learned in controversy, but that the arguments in the papers were easy to refute. James challenged the archbishop to confute them in writing, if he could; but Sancroft, not anxious to incur the martyrdom of court displeasure, said that it ill became him to enter into a controversy with his sovereign. Nor could James, as king, magnanimously overlook the affronts which had been offered to him as Duke of York, or treat with decent civility any of his old opponents, except such as laid their principles and their honor at his feet. When the leading Whigs came up to pay their court in common with the rest of his subjects, most of them were but coldly received; some were sharply reproached for their past behavior; and others were denied access. When the versatile, intriguing, and most capable Halifax apologized for his opposition to his majesty in the latter part of the late reign, James told him that he would forget every thing except his behavior in the affair of the exclusion, when he had combated and defeated his uncle Shaftesbury, Lord Russell, and the whole Whig party. But this royal gratitude in the one direction intimated as deep a resentment in the other, and an undying hatred of all who had voted for the exclusion. But another more decided symptom of James's remembrance of past injuries appeared in his ordering Sprat, bishop of Rochester, to publish a full narrative of the Rye-House Plot, under the royal authority. "This relation was written with great virulence of expression upon past heats; and in it an averment was made that James knew of 20,000 persons who had been engaged in that plot—an implied menace, which, by the ambiguity of its object, caused every Whig in the nation to think it was leveled at him."[1] James, moreover, though he had promised to call a parliament, had not patience to wait for its assembling, but proceeded at once to stretch the prerogative in regard to points where the nation was most sensitive. Those branches of the revenue which consisted of the customs and of part of the excise, having been granted to the late king for life, stopped by law at his death. The commissioners waited in a body upon the Treasury to know what was to be done. The Treasury, not willing to incur the heavy responsibility of ordering the levy of duties without act of parliament, told them that the laws lay before them, and they might judge for themselves. The important question was then carried before the privy council. The Lord Keeper North advised that the duties should be levied as in the late reign, and be paid into the Exchequer, but kept there separate from all other moneys until the next parliament should dispose of them. Others suggested that bonds only should be taken for the duties, to stand in force until the same period. But Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys moved that, without further ado, the king should instantly issue a proclamation commanding the revenue to be levied and employed as in the former reign; and James followed this congenial advice. To cover this stretch of arbitrary power, the court procured addresses from many public bodies. The barristers and students of the Middle Temple thanked his majesty for extending his royal care to the preservation of the customs, and prayed that there never might be wanting millions as loyal as themselves to sacrifice life and fortune in support of his majesty's sacred person and prerogative in its full extent; and the University of Oxford hastened to declare their faith and true obedience to their sovereign without any restrictions or limitations of his power.[1] But all these addresses could not blind men to the illegality of the measure, or make them forget the civil wars and the miseries produced by the attempt of this king's father to levy part of the same duties without consent of parliament; and "compliments by public bodies to the sovereign for the breach of the laws only served to remind the nation that the laws had been broken."[2] Humanity, justice itself, would make us approve and applaud the object of another of James's proceedings by prerogative, but the nation was not then in a state for the exercise of this humanity and justice, and the measure was clearly contrary to law and the constitution, which had repeatedly repudiated this dispensing power in the sovereign. By his royal warrant he threw open the prisons of England to thousands of dissenters and

[1] Cambridge, "that other light of the nation," seemed determined to blaze as high as Oxford. "Considering," said her reverend sons, "that, in spite of all the violence and treachery of turbulent men, who maliciously endeavored to turn the stream of lineal succession out of its proper and ancient channel, God has been pleased to provide a lasting security for these nations, as well by preserving the sacred life and person of your majesty, as also by your rightful and peaceable accession to the imperial crown of these kingdoms, we do rejoice with all our souls, and bless God for these singular mercies, which have as fully repaired our former inestimable loss as our hearts could hope or desire; and we do, with all humble submission, present to your sacred majesty our most unfeigned loyalty, the most valuable tribute that we can give or your majesty receive from us. This is a debt which we shall be always paying and always owing; it being a duty naturally flowing from the very principles of our holy religion, by which we have been enabled, in the worst of times, to breed as true and steady subjects as the world can show, as well in the doctrines as practice of loyalty, from which we can never depart."

papists, who had been enduring a horrible captivity for conscience' sake. James had taken the earliest opportunity of assuring his friend Barillon, that his trust, after God, was in the French king. Louis, to secure him, as he had done his brother, sent him 500,000 livres, which James received with tears of gratitude. Rochester plainly told Barillon, "Your master must place mine in a situation to be independent of parliaments;" and James renewed his abject prayers for more money. At the same time he outwardly affected an equality with Louis—declared that he would not be governed by French councils, and that he would maintain the balance of Europe with a steady hand. Captain Churchill, now a lord, and in the highest favor, was sent to Paris to announce in form the accession, and had orders to observe and report exactly all the circumstances of the ceremonial of his reception. Louis received Churchill seated and covered; and, when the Marshal de Lorge came over to return the compliment, James received him in the same manner. Louis laughed at him, and said, "The king, my brother, is proud, but he loves the pistoles of France nevertheless."[1]

Many scruples were entertained both by James and his wife touching the coronation, which ceremony it was necessary should be performed by a Protestant prelate. Priests, and even the pope himself, was consulted. A quibble was resorted to in order to justify the oath which had to be taken to maintain the Anglican church; and, after taking the solemn vows, the king and queen, upon St. George's Day, were crowned in Westminster Abbey by Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury. As the crown was put upon James's unhappy head it tottered and almost fell; and it was observed that, during both the coronation and the banquet, he was ill at ease. His conscience, his superstition, would sufficiently account for this inquietude: but he told Barillon that every thing made him believe that there was some design formed against him. The Bishop of Ely preached a sermon; but, says Evelyn, "to the great sorrow of the people, there was no sacrament, as ought to have been."

On the 7th of May, a fortnight after the coronation, Titus Oates was again brought up to the bar of the Court of King's Bench; for James was not satisfied with the perpetual imprisonment to which he was already doomed. This time the "saver" of the nation was tried, not for libels, but for perjury. A vast number of Roman Catholics assembled in Westminster Hall, "in expectation of the most grateful conviction and ruin of a person who had been so obnoxious to them." Jeffreys was again his judge, and this time his brutal severities were unchecked. People expected to see the Protestant champion cower like a whipped spaniel; but it was not so. This exemplary witness boldly challenged the veracity and the character of the witnesses brought against him, particularly objecting to Lord Castlemaine as a papist. "I wonder," cried Jeffreys, "to see any man that has the face of a man carry it at this rate, when he has such an evidence brought in against him." But in impudence and strength of face Oates was a match even for the redoubtable Jeffreys; and the scoundrel had a sort of spirit which the wonderful change in his circumstances could not depress. "I wonder," said he, in reply, "that Mr. Attorney will offer to bring such evidence—men that must have malice against me as papists." "Hold your tongue," roared Jeffreys: "you are a shame to mankind." "No, my lord," said the imperturbable Titus, "I am neither a shame to myself nor mankind. What I have sworn is true; and I will stand by it to my last breath, and seal it, if occasion be, with my blood." "'Twere pity but that it were to be done by thy blood," responded this decent lord chief justice. Oates was convicted upon two indictments, and this was his sentence:—1st. He was to pay a thousand marks upon each indictment. 2d. To be stripped of all his canonical habits (a sentence the right of pronouncing which belonged only to the courts ecclesiastical). 3d. He was to stand twice in the pillory. 4th. To be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and two days afterward from Newgate to Tyburn; and, 5th. He was to stand in the pillory on five days in every year as long as he lived. The sentence was executed without mercy as long as James and Jeffreys had the power to inflict torture.[1] The most severe death would have been preferable; but Titus's body was as tough as his soul, and he survived to be pardoned and rewarded at the Revolution. Nor did the sight of these humiliating sufferings altogether throw him from that pedestal on which religious zeal had placed him. "There are still thousands," says one of his biographers, writing in this same year, "of those unthinking, unconverted animals, that have that veneration still for their darling Titus, that they pay him even a wild Indian adoration, and make a god of the devil himself."

Bedloe was safe in his grave, and others of the Protestant witnesses had either hid themselves or entered into the pay of the court; but Dangerfield was caught and tried at the King's Bench for writing and publishing a villainous and scandalous libel called his "Narrative." He received judgment to stand twice in the pillory; to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate on one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn on another, and to pay a fine of £500. This handsome scoundrel was not made of such materials as Titus. He "was struck with such horror at this terrible sentence that he looked on himself as a dead man, and accordingly chose a text for his funeral sermon; but persevered in asserting that all he had delivered in evidence before the House of Commons was true. The whipping was executed in full rigor, as before upon Oates; and it was scarce over before one Mr. Robert Frances, a barrister of Gray's Inn, gave him a wound with his cane, in or near the eye, which, according to the deposition of the surgeons, was the cause of his death."[2] This furious barrister, Mr. Frances, was tried for murder: and as the popular feeling was violent against him, it was judged proper to permit his conviction and execution.

The Scottish parliament assembled on St. George's Day, the day of their majesties' coronation; and the Scots, priding themselves on being the first parliament called by the new king, voted the excise and customs to him and his successors forever, and a further sum of £25,000 a-year for his life. The Duke of Queensberry, the king's commissioner, and Lord Perth, the chancellor, told them that the king would never alter the established Protestant religion.

[1] The gentle Evelyn has this entry in his Diary on the 22d of May, which, it should be remarked, was the day when parliament opened:—"Oates, who had but two days before been pilloried at several places and whipped at the cart's tail from Newgate to Aldgate, was this day placed on a sledge, being not able to go by reason of so late scourging, and dragged from prison to Tyburn, and whipped again all the way, which some thought to be very severe and extraordinary; but if he was guilty of the perjuries, and so of the death of many innocents, as I fear he was, his punishment was but what he deserved. I chanced to pass just as execution was doing on him—a strange revolution!"

[2] Ralph.

The English parliament assembled on the 22d of May; and, as the elections had gone greatly in favor of the Tories, it was expected that it would be as prompt and obedient as the Scotch. But not even the Tories were prepared for the repeal of the Habeas Corpus Act, for a general toleration, or for the promotion of popery; and it was well known that James was aiming at all three. The bishops all took their places; "and after a short space," says an eye-witness, "came in the queen and Princess of Denmark (Anne), and stood next above the archbishops, at the side of the House on the right hand of the throne. In the interim, divers of the lords, who had not finished before, took the test and usual oaths; so that her majesty, the Spanish and other ambassadors, who stood behind the throne, heard the pope and worship of the Virgin Mary, &c., renounced very decently, and the prayers which followed, they standing all the while. Then came in the king, with the crown on his head, and, being seated, the Commons were introduced, and, the House being full, he drew forth a paper containing his speech, which he read distinctly enough."[1] He told them that he had resolved to call a parliament from the moment of his brother's decease, as the best means of settling all the concerns of the nation, so as to be most easy and happy to himself as well as to his subjects: he repeated almost word for word the assurances which he had given to the council on the morning of his brother's death, that he would defend and support the church of England, and govern according to law; and then continued: "Having given this assurance concerning the care I will have of your religion and property, which I have chosen to do in the same words I used at my first coming to the crown, the better to evidence to you that I spoke them not by chance, and, consequently, that you may firmly rely on a promise so solemnly made—" Here he was interrupted by a murmur of satisfaction; and men who had hitherto had their eyes fixed upon him now gazed at one another with surprise, joy, and triumph. Resuming his speech, the king told them that he might now reasonably expect a revenue for life such as had been voted to his brother. Here was another murmur, which expressed universal assent. But James, who could not control his arbitrary temper, and who was wholly unfit to manage popular assemblies, continued, "There is one popular argument which I foresee may be used against what I have asked of you; the inclination men have for frequent parliaments some may think would be the best secured by feeding me from time to time by such proportions as they shall think convenient; and this argument, it being the first time I speak to you from the throne, I will answer once for all, that this would be a very improper method to take with me, and that the best way to engage me to meet you often is always to use me well. I expect, therefore, that you will comply with me in what I have desired, and that you will do it speedily." At these words every face was covered as it were with a cloud.[2] But the royal bird of bad augury had not yet done; and he proceeded to announce that news had reached him that very morning that Argyle, with a rebel band from Holland, had landed in the Western Islands, and had proclaimed him a usurper and tyrant. But both Houses, however, pledged themselves to assist his majesty to the utmost; and, according to Evelyn, "there was another shout of Vive le Roi, and so his majesty retired."[1]

As soon as the Commons returned to their own House they took into consideration the king's speech, voted him thanks for it, granted the revenue of £1,200,000 for his life, and every thing else that was demanded, as if they were more forward to give than the king was to ask. Lord Preston, who had been for some years ambassador in France, was set up by the court as a sort of manager in the Commons; and his lordship told them that the reputation of the nation was beginning to rise abroad, under a prince whose name spread terror everywhere; and that, if his parliament would but repose entire confidence in him, England would again hold the balance, and his majesty would be indeed the arbiter of Europe. The courtiers said everywhere that James was a prince that had never broken his word, and that the word of a king was the best security a people could have for their religion and laws. But, when certain petitions concerning the late elections were presented, Sir Edward Seymour made a bold speech, and proposed that several members should withdraw till they had cleared the matter of their being legally returned. "The truth is," says a zealous Tory, "there were many of the new members whose elections and returns were universally censured, many of them being persons of no condition or interest in the nation or places for which they served, especially in Devon, Cornwall, Norfolk, &c., but said to have been recommended by the court, and returned from the effect of the new corporation charters changing the electors. It was reported that Lord Bath carried down with him into Cornwall no fewer than fifteen charters, so that some called him the Prince Elector. Seymour told the House, in his speech, that if this was digested they might introduce what religion and laws they pleased, and that, though he never gave heed to the fears and jealousies of the people before, he now was really apprehensive of popery."[1] Not a single voice was raised in support of Seymour's motion; but his words about popery sunk into the hearts of the majority. Two days after, a very full committee unanimously resolved to "move the House to stand by the king in the support and defense of the reformed religion of the church of England, with their lives and fortunes;" and to address him "to put the laws in execution against all dissenters whatsoever from the church of England." James instantly summoned some of the leading

It was whispered he would not be long in that situation; and many believe the bold chief justice, Jeffreys, who was made Baron of Wem, and who went thorough-stitch in that tribunal, stands fair for that office. members to his presence, and told them harshly that they must present no such address. A vehement debate ensued in the House; but, in the end a compromise was hit upon, and the resolution was put in these words:—"The House relies on his majesty's word and repeated declaration, to support and defend the religion of the church of England, as it is now by law established, which is dearer to us than our lives." The speaker, who presented this resolution, together with the money-bill "without any appropriating or tacking whatever," dwelt with particular emphasis on the last words of the resolution—"dearer than our lives." The king did not bestow one syllable upon the subject in his answer to the speaker; but to others he complained that the Commons would have him in his own person to be the persecutor of the Catholics. On the 14th of July certain intelligence was received of the landing of the Duke of Monmouth with an armed force. Both Houses forthwith attainted the duke as a traitor, and the Commons voted an extraordinary supply of £400,000. James then, on the 2d of July, adjourned parliament to the following November. By this time, though Monmouth had set up his standard as King of England, Argyle had been routed and put to death.

The leading facts of this double invasion are soon told. The Scottish refugees in Holland fancied that neither England nor Scotland would tolerate the government of the papistical and idolatrous James; and they were encouraged by many suffering Presbyterians and Covenanters to strike a blow for liberty and the kirk. Argyle opened a correspondence with Monmouth, and it was arranged between them that two expeditions should be made simultaneously—one to Scotland, under Argyle, the other to England, under the duke. Money and nearly every thing else was wanting, and Monmouth was dilatory and diffident of success. But at last two handfuls of men were got together, and some arms were purchased and some ships freighted. Argyle sailed on the 2d of May, with Sir John Cochrane, with Ayloffe, and Rumbald, the maltster, two Englishmen, who had been made famous by the parts attributed to them in the Rye-House plot, and with about a hundred followers. Monmouth promised to sail for England in six days; but he wasted his time—loth to tear himself from a beautiful mistress, the Lady Henrietta Wentworth, who had been living with him at Brussels. In the mean time Argyle shaped his course for the Western Highlands. The first land he touched at was Kirkwall, in the Orkneys, where the people whom he put on shore for intelligence were seized, and whence advice was given to the government of his arrival. While he was beating round the northern capes and headlands the government had leisure to make their preparations; and, as it was known that he would land on the western coast, where both his family strength and that of the Covenanters lay, two ships of war were stationed there to watch his motions. The whole militia of the kingdom, consisting of 20,000 men, was put under arms; and a third part of it, with 3000 regular troops, was marched into the western country. At the same time all such as were suspected of favoring him were seized, and the king's proclamations and the declarations of parliament were published to the people, who stood in awe of James's well-known severity. Argyle, however, effected a landing, sent the fiery cross from hill to hill, from clan to clan, and got about 2500 Highlanders to join him. He published two declarations, one in his own name, complaining of his own wrongs, the other setting forth that the miseries of the nation arose out of the breach of the Covenant; that the king had forfeited the crown by the crimes of popery, prelacy, tyranny, and fratricide; and that he was come to suppress alike prelacy and popery. His standard bore the inscription, "Against Popery, Prelacy, and Erastianism." He lost some time in expecting to be joined by more of the Highlanders, and to hear of Monmouth's landing upon the western coast of England, as had been agreed upon; and when he pushed forward for Glasgow he was betrayed by his guides and wagon-men, deserted by the greater part of his followers, and confronted by Lord Dunbarton with a force in every way far superior to his own. Hume and Cochrane, who were among those whom he afterward accused of ignorance, cowardice, and faction, left him almost alone, and crossed the Clyde in safety with two or three hundred men. Attended only by Fullarton, Argyle, in disguise, endeavored to elude pursuit; but was tracked by some militia-men, overpowered, made prisoner, and carried back to his old cell in Edinburgh Castle on the 20th of June, having his hands tied behind him, his head bare, and the headsman marching before him. His life was held to be forfeited without any trial by his former sentence; and James sent down his death-warrant, allowing him three days, to be employed in "all ways" that might make him confess the full particulars of his defeated plan. It is generally understood that James meant by this that Argyle should be put to torture; but it does not appear that the noble prisoner was either booted or thumbscrewed, and it is certain that he betrayed none of his friends. He was beheaded on the 30th of June, and died with admirable courage. Many were sorely disappointed that he was not hanged like Montrose; but they had some satisfaction in seeing his head stuck up on the Tolbooth. The two Englishmen, Ayloffe and Rumbald, who had accompanied Argyle from Holland, were both taken, after a desperate resistance, in which they were dreadfully wounded. On the 26th of June the doctors reported to the privy council that Rumbald "was in hazard of death by his wounds; so the council ordained the criminal court to sit on him the next morning, that he might not prevent his public execution by his death."[1] This Richard Rumbald, maltster, and formerly master of the Rye House, was an English yeoman of the true breed. His indictment bore that he had designed to kill the late king at the Rye, or Hoddesdon, on his return from Newmarket to London. He positively and most solemnly denied, as a dying man, the whole of this charge; and so "the king's advocate passed from that part, lest it should have disparaged or impaired any thing of the credit of the said English plot."[1] But when they charged him with having joined Argyle, a forfeit traitor, and invaded Scotland, and commanded as a colonel in the rebel army, he readily confessed all this, signed his confession, and justified his deeds by the sacred duty imposed upon all freemen to resist tyrants, saying, in rough but significant words, that he did not believe that God had made the greater part of mankind with saddles on their backs and bridles in their mouths, and some few booted and spurred to ride the rest.[2] An attempt was made to prove that he was one of the masked executioners of Charles I.: but he declared he was not, though he was one of Oliver Cromwell's regiment, and was on horseback at Whitehall that day, as one of the guard about the scaffold. He further declared that, as a lieutenant in Cromwell's army, he had fought at Dunbar, Worcester, and Dundee (words unpleasant to Scottish ears[3]), and that he had foreseen Argyle would ruin the late attempt by lingering in the Isles and Highlands, instead of marching at once into the inland country. Being asked if he owned the present king's authority, he craved leave to be excused from answering, seeing he needed neither offend them nor grate his own conscience, as they had enough already to take his life. He was sentenced to be executed that same afternoon. He was drawn on a hurdle; "for, laying aside the ignominy, he was not able to walk, by reason of the wounds he got when he resisted Raploch and his men." The undaunted yeoman suffered ten times the pain of Argyle with as much heroism. "He was certainly," says the cool and circumspect lawyer that narrates all the atrocities of his execution,[4] "a man of much natural courage: his rooted, ingrained opinion was for a republic against monarchy, to pull which down he thought a duty and no sin. And on the scaffold he began to pray for that party which he had been owning, and to keep the three metropolitan cities of the three kingdoms right; and if every hair of his head were a life, he would venture them all in that cause: but the drums were then commanded to beat. Otherwise he carried himself discreetly enough, and heard the ministers, but took none of them to the scaffold with him."[5] Colonel Ayloffe was sent up to London in the hope that some fuller discovery of the plot, and who had underhand been concerned in it, might be drawn from him. James, who had an unroyal fondness for such practices, examined him in person; but the colonel was as firm as the maltster, and the king got nothing from him except a cutting repartee. "You know, sir," said James, "that, if you desire it, it is in my power to pardon you." "It is in your power, but not in your nature," replied Ayloffe. The colonel was nephew by marriage to the late Chancellor Clarendon, and it was thought that the nearness of his relationship to the king's children (by Anne Hyde) might have moved his majesty to pardon him, which would have been the most effectual confutation of the bold repartee; but he signed his death-warrant instead.[1] Sir John Cochrane, who had also been taken, was condemned to be hanged at the cross of Edinburgh; but he seemed "timorous and penitent;" he made some disclosures, was sent up to London, and, after he had been for some time closeted with the king, it was given out that the matters he had discovered were of such importance as to have merited the royal pardon. "It was said," adds Burnet, "he had discovered their negotiations with the Elector of Brandenburg and the Prince of Orange; but this was a pretense only to conceal the bargain, for the prince told me he had never once seen him." According to the same authority, the bargain was an offer of £5000 to James's priests, who wanted a stock of money, and so interposed. Some other executions took place in Scotland on account of Argyle's wretched incursion; and the Earl of Balcarras was sent into Galloway, and the other western shires, with a commission of fire and sword against the "resetters" of the rebels. All matters were conducted in the most savage and brutal spirit; the old feuds of the rival clans were encouraged, and hereditary enemies, scarcely more civilized than the red Indians, were let loose upon one another. Charles Campbell, Argyle's second son, was taken, lying sick of a fever in Argyleshire; and the Marquis of Athol, the hereditary enemy of the Campbell's, by virtue of his justiciary power, resolved to hang him, though still in a raging fever, at his father's gate at Inverary; but the privy council, at the intercession of sundry ladies, including his wife, Lady Sophia Lindsay, who had contrived his father's escape from Edinburgh Castle, stopped this execution, and ordered the prisoner to be brought to Edinburgh. His brother, Mr. John Campbell, and one of his cousins, finding that they could no longer conceal themselves, went disguised in women's riding-habits to my Lord Dunbarton, and, falling at his feet, discovered themselves. This general, who had some humanity, signed an order constituting them prisoners in Stirling, with the liberty of the whole castle, and trusted them with the carrying of the order without any guard: at which the secret committee were sorely offended. Some of the common prisoners and other Highlanders were by the privy council delivered to Mr. George Scott, of Pitlochy, and other planters in New Jersey, Jamaica, &c.; "but, considering that some of them were more perverse in mincing the king's authority than others, they ordained these, to the number of forty, to have a piece of

Instead of six days, it was a month before the lingering Monmouth set sail from the Texel, with about eighty officers and a hundred and fifty followers of various kinds, Scotch and English. Lord Stair, who had fled from the tyranny of James when Duke or York and commissioner in Scotland, did not join the expedition; but Fletcher of Saltoun, a fugitive for the same cause, Sir Patrick Hume, and Lord Grey, who had escaped from the very gates of the Tower when arrested for the Rye-House plot, embarked with Monmouth. It is said that Fletcher, who had far more head and heart than any of his adherents, dissuaded the duke from the enterprise, as being desperate and premature, and that the infamous Lord Grey urged him to it. There is a suspicion, amounting almost to a certainty, that James's son-in-law, the Prince of Orange, encouraged underhand the expeditions of Argyle and Monmouth. Insignificant as were the preparations, some rumors of them had reached England; but when James's ambassador remonstrated, the prince pretended to give no credit to the reports. James then insisted with the Dutch that they should seize all the British rebels who had at any time taken refuge among them; but Fagel in public, and the prince in private, opposed this application, which few independent states would have listened to. He then applied for the British regiments which had been left in the service of the Dutch; but here William contrived to throw difficulties and delays in the way; and, soon after, he offered to go himself into England, with his own guards, to assist his dear father-in-law. James, who probably suspected from the beginning that William was aiming at the power and consequence which would have attended his becoming an umpire in this quarrel, sent him this ambiguous answer —"that it was more for the king's interest he should remain where he was."[2]

Six days before Argyle's capture, Monmouth and his small band landed at Lyme, in Dorsetshire. It was a beautiful day in June, and no enemy was in sight. They landed about nine o'clock in the evening, and Monmouth, as soon as he set foot on shore, fell upon his knees and returned thanks for the dangers they had escaped. Having collected his little band on the sands, he marched into the town and set up his standard in the market-place. Upon being asked what was the object of his expedition, he replied that it was to secure the Protestant religion and to extirpate popery. Allured by this assurance, and by his agreeable person and manners, people began to flock to him in great numbers, demanding arms and officers. No time was lost in spreading abroad "The Declaration of James, duke of Monmouth, and the noblemen, gentlemen, and commons now in arms for the defense of the Protestant religion and vindication of the laws, rights, and privileges of England from the invasion made upon them, and for delivering the nation from the usurpation and tyranny of James, duke of York." This declaration is attributed to the bitter pen of Ferguson. It set forth that, for many years past, the power of the crown had been applied wholly to the destruction of the people's liberties; that this notorious perversion was mainly owing to the Duke of York, a man of immoderate ambition, who was panting after absolute dominion, and desiring to introduce popish idolatry in order to obtain it; that the constitution itself had given way and sunk under the weight of his oppressive administration; that parliaments had been corrupted; that a bribed parliament had surrendered the command of the militia, while the people had been made to part with the power of electing the sheriffs, and that by these two causes the people had become naked of all defense; that the laws intended for the preservation of Protestantism and the suppression of popery had, through the corruption of judges, been turned against Protestants; that corrupt sheriffs had procured corrupt or slavish juries; that by these and other means, such as placing and displacing judges, proroguing and dissolving parliaments at their will and pleasure, the said Duke of York and the rest of the conspirators had been enabled to prosecute their arbitrary and tyrannical purposes without fear of punishment. Then, descending to particulars, it charged James, duke of York, with the burning of London (it was well they did not charge him with the plague); with the shutting up of the Exchequer, whereby the people were defrauded of £1,200,000 and upward; with the breach of the triple league, whereby Europe had been involved in a bloody and expensive war, and the Protestant interest on the continent almost ruined; with the popish plot, and the murder of Sir Edmondbury Godfrey; with the many forged plots turned against the patriots; with the violent seizing of charters of corporations; with the barbarous murder of Arthur, earl of Essex, in the Tower, and of several other persons, to conceal that murder; with the most unjust condemnation of William Lord Russell, and Colonel Algernon Sidney; with the illegal delivery of the popish lords out of the Tower; with the unparalleled execution and murder of Sir Thomas Armstrong, without a trial; with the eluding and breaking through the act for calling and holding a parliament once in three years; and, finally, with poisoning the late king, Charles II., to prevent the discovery and punishment of the murder of the Earl of Essex, and to make way for the said Duke of York to the throne. In these charges falsehood was mingled with self-evident truths, yet the document was not the less suited to the passions and intellect of an ill-informed people. It went on to declare that the whole series of James's life had been one continued conspiracy against the people and their religion; that through his means Englishmen had become the scorn and reproach of surrounding nations; that since his intruding into the throne he had made an impudent and barefaced avowal of the Romish religion in defiance of the laws and statutes of the realm, had arbitrarily seized the customs, had attempted the utter subversion of all law and liberty by packing together, through illegal charters, false returns, and other corrupt means, a company of men which he styled a parliament. (By this last clause the existing parliament was incensed against the invader.) The declaration then called upon all patriots and Protestants to have recourse to arms as the sole means of redress; affirmed that Monmouth and his friends had not rushed on that cruel experiment from any corrupt or private motive, but, as was known to Almighty God, the searcher of hearts, out of necessity, for self-preservation and to preserve their country from utter ruin; that for these causes they proclaimed the Duke of York a traitor, a tyrant, a popish usurper, a murderer, and an enemy to all things that are good, and had come to an engagement never to capitulate or treat with the duke, nor separate themselves or lay down their arms till they had restored liberty and the Protestant religion, and secured these rights and privileges: 1. That no Protestant of what persuasion soever should be molested for the exercise of religion. 2. That parliament should be annually chosen and held, and should not be prorogued, dissolved, or discontinued within the year till petitions were answered and grievances redressed. 3. That sheriffs should annually be elected by the county freeholders—that the Militia Act should be repealed, and some way found for settling the militia, which should be commanded by the sheriffs; and that no other standing force should ever be allowed without consent of parliament. 4. That the Corporation Act should be repealed, and the corporations restored to their ancient charters and freedoms. All the late quo warranto judgments, and all surrenders of charters made by a corrupt and perjured faction, were declared to be null and void in law, and the old charters still good and valid; all honest burgesses and freemen were invited to reassume the rights and privileges which belonged to them, and were assured that they would now be delivered from those court parasites and instruments of tyranny that had been set up to oppress them; destruction was denounced against all that continued to adhere to the tyrant and usurper, but mercy promised to any of his former tools who should atone for their past misconduct by joining in the present great work of redeeming their country. After all this it was declared, in the name of the Duke of Monmouth, and as by and for himself, that, though it had been, and still was, believed that he had a legitimate right to the three crowns, of which he made no doubt to be able to give the world full satisfaction, notwithstanding the means used by the late king his father, upon popish motives, and at the instigation of the Duke of York, to weaken and obscure it; yet such was the generosity of his own nature, and the love he bore the nation, whose welfare and settlement he infinitely preferred to what merely concerned himself, that he would for the present wave all disputes as to that matter, and leave his rights and pretensions and the settling of the government to the wisdom and justice of a properly elected and free parliament. This revival of a most idle and exploded pretension was calculated to make Monmouth many implacable enemies in Holland as well as in England; but hundreds of the unthinking men that surrounded him at this moment were encouraged and flattered by the belief that Lucy Walters had been the late king's wife, and that the legitimate blood of royalty ran in the veins of Monmouth. The adventurer had flattered himself with hopes of being instantly joined by the lords Macclesfield, Brandon, Delamere, and other noblemen and gentlemen of Whig principles; but none appeared. Trenchard, of Taunton, who was afterward secretary of state to King William, fled into Holland, instead of going, as he had promised, to Monmouth; and even Wildman, that wild plotter who had escaped with difficulty from the Rye-House plot, failed in his appointment. With money the adventurer was wholly unprovided, and his supply of arms was very insufficient. But the yeomanry and peasantry were enthusiastic, and a man of more military genius and superior daring might have done wonders with the first heat of this enthusiasm. One of James's favorites, the French Earl of Feversham, had thrown a detachment of regular troops into Bridport, a town about six miles from Lyme. Monmouth detached about three hundred men to storm that town, which they did with admirable spirit. But the infamous Lord Grey, who was intrusted with the command, deserted his men at the first brush; and, galloping back to Lyme, carried the news of a defeat, when his party had actually obtained a victory. Monmouth, astonished, exclaimed to Captain Matthews, "What shall I do with Lord Grey?" Matthews replied like a soldier, "You are the only general in Europe who would ask such a question." Monmouth, however, dared not venture to offend the man of greatest rank and property he had with him; and, even after this disgraceful exhibition, he intrusted Grey with the command of his cavalry.[1] But after thus trusting the worst man with him, he lost his best man by a circumstance over which he had no control. This was Fletcher of Saltoun, who was equally able with the sword and the pen, who was at once a soldier and scholar, an orator and a statesman, with notions far above the low level of the age in which he lived. In the general want of the matériel for a campaign, Fletcher wanted a war-horse, and laid claim to one which was mounted by Dare of Taunton, who had escaped from the persecutions of the court in 1682, and who had now come to join Monmouth with a considerable body of volunteers.

[2] Dispatches of D'Avaux and Orleans, as quoted by Dalrymple. It is certain, however, that some of the British troops came over from Holland, though in a disaffected humor, and too late to take any part in the campaign. On the 3d of July the king, in writing to the Prince of Orange, mentions the arrival of some Scotch troops, which, it appears, had just been landed at Gravesend. They were to march on the 4th to Hounslow, and so forward, according to the movements of the rebels. But the battle of Sedgemoor was fought on the 5th. Under the date of the 31st of July, Lauder of Fountainhall has the following significant entry: "The king having called over the three Scots regiments in Holland to England, to assist him against Monmouth, and they being now on a dry march, many of the common soldiers deserted, and ran away with their officers' clothes, money, and arms, after they had been at the expense of taking them on; therefore the privy council, by an act, discharged any, and especially the commanders of the standing forces in Scotland, to receive or take in any of these runaways and deserters without passes from their commanders, and to keep them prisoners till they be redelivered to these captains seeking recruits."—Decisions.

A quarrel ensued, and Dare not only used very provoking language, but also made use of his cane; upon which the proud Scot presented his pistol and shot him dead on the spot. Dare's followers went in a body to the duke to demand vengeance; and Monmouth was obliged to dismiss Fletcher and to have him smuggled on board a vessel. The catastrophe was, of course, attended by other bad consequences. Nevertheless, on the 15th of June, four days after his landing, the duke marched from Lyme with a force that had increased to near three thousand men. His progress was watched by several bodies of militia, who had no inclination to engage, and whom he was equally disinclined to attack; conceiving it, as he said, to be his business not to fight, but to march on. He passed through Axminster, and encamped in a good position, between that town and Chard, in Somersetshire. On the 16th he was at Chard, and there, it appears, the first proposition was made for proclaiming him king by right of birth. It is said that Ferguson made the proposal, and that Lord Grey, Monmouth's evil genius, seconded it; but that it was easily run down then by those who were against it. From Chard the insurgents, whose leaders were already distracted by conflicting views, proceeded to the pleasant town of Taunton, where the Protestant dissenters were numerous and enthusiastic, and the king and his masses held in abhorrence. Here Monmouth's reception was flattering in the extreme. All classes of the inhabitants welcomed him as a deliverer sent from Heaven: the poor rent the air with their joyful acclamations; the rich opened their houses to him and his followers, and supplied his little army with meat and drink. His path was strewed with flowers—the windows were crowded with ladies waving their handkerchiefs—and a lovely deputation, more pleasing to young eyes than aldermen in coats of scarlet or than judges in their ermines, waited upon the handsome hero. It consisted of twenty-six young maidens of the best families in all Taunton, who presented him, in the name of their townsmen, with colors and emblems wrought by their own fair hands, and with a Bible, kneeling as they gave them. The course of his life had been neither very moral nor very devout, but Monmouth kissed the holy book, and said that he had come to defend the truth contained in it, and to seal it with his blood if there was occasion. From thus taking the title of Defender of the Faith, a part of the style-royal, it was but a step to take the title of King, and this, either through his own impatience or the advice of evil counselors, Monmouth did at Taunton on the 20th of June. At the same time he wrote to the Duke of Albemarle, who had collected the militia to oppose him, intimating that it was his royal will and pleasure that he should desist from all hostility and force against him and all his loving subjects, and repair immediately to his royal camp, where he would not fail of meeting with a very kind reception. The alternative was, of course, treason and its penalties against Albemarle and all in arms under his command. By the same trumpet which carried Monmouth's letter Albemarle sent his answer "For James Scott, late Duke of Monmouth," telling him that James II., brother to his late dear master King Charles, was lawful king; and that, whenever they met, he doubted not the justice of his cause would sufficiently convince Monmouth that he had better have left this rebellion alone, and not have put the nation to so much trouble. On the 21st of June, the invader declared Albemarle a rebel, &c.[1] Several reasons were urged for Monmouth's assuming the title of king,[2] but there were indisputably many and much more cogent reasons against that vainglorious assumption. Many of those who followed him, or who favored him in secret, still worshiped the hereditary rights of kingship, and not a few retained a lingering and desperate affection for republican institutions. These opposite classes were equally dissatisfied. "The commonwealth-men," says Mr. Fox, "were dissatisfied, of course, with the principle of the measure; the favorers of hereditary right held it in abhorrence, and considered it as a kind of sacrilegious profanation; nor, even among those who considered monarchy in a more rational light, and as a magistracy instituted for the good of the people, could it be at all agreeable that such a magistrate should be elected by the army that had thronged to his standard, or by the particular partiality of a provincial town." Moreover, the partisans of the Prince of Orange, who were already pretty numerous, considered it as an inexcusable infringement of the rights of James's eldest daughter, Mary, princess of Orange, who, by birth and by Protestantism, stood indisputably next in order of succession; for the story of Monmouth's legitimacy

[1] Letters from MSS. in the British Museum, published in Sir Henry Ellis's Collection.

[2] Ferguson states that it was not from ambition that Monmouth chose, at that juncture, to take the royal style, but that it proceeded from a necessity he conceived himself under in order the better to attain the ends of his declaration; and that he judged it to be giving the enemy too much advantage to leave the Duke of York, de facto king, in undisputed possession of his title, &c. "For whatever men's inclinations were toward us, yet, if they were any ways sagacious, they could not but see a vast difference between adhering to the Duke of York, which the Duke of Monmouth, without assuming the name of king, could not threaten to punish as a crime and the promoting his grace's interest, while it was branded with the name and stood liable to the penalties of high treason. Accordingly he had not only messages from great gentlemen, but was told by several non-conforming ministers that came into the camp, that, unless he took the style of king, none who had estates to lose would venture themselves in his quarrel. This I heard often said by many." Mr. Fox reasons that, as the present coldness visible among the Whig nobility might be imputed to the indistinctness of Monmouth's declarations with respect to what was intended to be the future government, it was natural for him to attempt to remove this by fuller explanation. "Men zealous for monarchy might not choose to embark without some certain pledge that their favorite form should be preserved. They would also expect to be satisfied with respect to the person whom their arms, if successful, were to place upon the throne. To promise, therefore, the continuance of a monarchical establishment, and to designate the future monarch, seemed to be necessary for the purpose of acquiring aristocratical support. Whatever might be the intrinsic weight of this argument, it easily made its way with Monmouth in his present situation. The aspiring temper of mind, which is the natural consequence of popular favor and success, produced in him a disposition to listen to any suggestion which tended to his elevation and aggrandizement; and when he could persuade himself upon reasons specious at least that the measure which would most gratify his aspiring desires would be, at the same time, a stroke of the soundest policy, it is not to be wondered at that it was immediately and impatiently adopted."—History of the Early Part of the Reign of James the Second.

was too gross to impose on any but the vulgar. If this weak and unhappy man got himself called king for the reasons assigned by Ferguson, and fancied by Fox, the effect of that measure must have been a cruel disappointment. The nobility and wealthy gentry still stood aloof. Not a single nobleman repaired to his banner. Yet, still indulging in one of the worst prerogatives of royalty, Monmouth, on the 21st of June, proclaimed all the members of the parliament then sitting as traitors, and issued a declaration about collecting the revenue. Another fatal mistake arose out of his notions about the art of war, in which he considered himself a great proficient. He lost time in drilling his raw levies, not knowing, or not reflecting upon the fact, that a very little drilling is infinitely worse in such cases than none at all; he stopped his men in the ardor of the march to form them in lines and columns, and to teach them tactics and discipline which only puzzled them. The days he thus lost were altogether insufficient for converting mechanics and farmers' men into disciplined troops; but they were sufficient to allow the already disciplined troops of the king to concentrate. On the 22d of June he advanced from Taunton to Bridgewater, where he was proclaimed a second time, the mayor and burgesses assisting in their formalities. Here he divided his forces into six regiments, and formed two tolerably good troops out of about a thousand horse that followed him. But still none of the grandees either joined him or sent him money and arms, for the want of which he was every day forced to dismiss hundreds or thousands of the populace who crowded to his quarters. It was said that he was more discouraged with the disappointments that befell him on the one hand—that is, in the shyness of the Whig nobility—than he was elated with the successes and plaudits he met with on the other. From Bridgewater he marched to Glastonbury, and thence to Wells, where he was again proclaimed. Here he resolved to cross the Mendip Hills, and to push forward for Bristol, in the hope of taking that important city by a coup de main, if not without any opposition. He halted at Shipton Mallet, and communicated his project to his officers, who, after some discussion, agreed that the attack should be made on the Gloucestershire side of Bristol, and, with that view, that the river Avon should be passed at Cainsham, or Keynsham-bridge, a few miles from Bath. On their march from Shipton Mallet, the stragglers in the rear were harassed by a party of horse and dragoons, who, however, cautiously and even timidly avoided any serious engagement. At night the Monmouthites lodged quietly at the village of Pensford. On the following morning, before sunrise, a detachment was thrown forward to secure Keynsham-bridge, and, upon their approach, a troop of the Gloucestershire militia fled with precipitation, leaving two horses and one man behind them. The bridge had been broken to prevent the passage; but it was soon repaired, and before noon Monmouth and his army crossed the Avon, and were in full march to Bristol, which he determined to attack the ensuing night; but, presently, he called a halt. According to some accounts he was deterred by learning that the Duke of Beaufort had declared to the citizens of Bristol that he would set fire to their town if they attempted an insurrection; according to others, heavy rains, and the hopes of lulling the enemy by a retrograde movement into a false security, determined the retreat. Some of the active partisans said the finger of God was in it—that their consultations were overruled to their own ruin; for this was the top of their prosperity, and yet all the while not a nobleman or gentleman more had come to their assistance. They fell back into Keynsham, where their quarters were beat up by two strong detachments of horse, who entered the town unawares from two opposite quarters. Monmouth lost fourteen men and a captain of horse; but the royalists were obliged to retire, leaving three or four prisoners. That evening it was resolved to abandon the enterprise upon Bristol, and to make for Wiltshire, where Monmouth expected to be joined by such numbers as would enable him confidently to offer battle to the royal army. Passing by Bath, they summoned that place; but the people not only refused but treated the herald with great barbarity. Monmouth then wheeled about for Philips Norton, hoping to strengthen himself by deserters from the several bodies of county militia that hovered round him under the commands of the dukes of Albemarle, Somerset, and Beaufort, lords-lieutenants of the western counties. At Philips Norton the insurgent horse, consisting of men of rather better condition, were quartered inside the town, and the foot in the fields outside. On the preceding day (the 25th of June) there had been a considerable rising in Frome, headed by a bold constable, who posted up Monmouth's declaration in the market-place; and many people flocked in from the neighboring towns of Westbury and Warminster, most of them armed with no better weapons than scythes, plowshares, and pitchforks. But the Earl of Pembroke, entering the town with a hundred and sixty horse and forty musketeers, completely dispersed this rabble rout, and threw a damp upon the spirits of the peasantry. By this time, however, the chill had reached the never overconfident heart of Monmouth himself, and at Philips Norton he began bitterly to complain of broken promises and a want of resolution. Though now upon the confines of Wiltshire, none of those bodies of horse upon whose junction he had calculated made their appearance, and some of those already with him began to desert. On the morning of the 27th he was roused by a brisk attack of the royalists, led on by his half-brother, the young Duke of Grafton—another of the late king's illegitimate sons. The engagement ended in the retreat of Grafton, who lost forty men, and who was nearly taken prisoner himself; but Monmouth, on the other side, lost several of his best officers.

Feversham, who had moved from Bath, now drew up on an eminence about a mile from Philips Norton with nearly the whole of his forces and a small train of artillery. Monmouth, who had only four field-pieces, put them in position and opened a fire which was returned by Feversham with the same arm. Neither horse nor foot charged; and the artillery kept at such long shot, and fired so badly, that, though the cannonading continued nearly six hours, Monmouth only lost one man, and Feversham not one. The rain again fell in torrents; and the royalists, having, besides, an aversion to engaging among hedgerows and inclosed fields, beat a retreat, after the least bloody battle that was ever fought by Englishmen. Monmouth, instead of harassing their rear, lit a large fire, and then, under cover of night, marched away to Frome, where he quartered his troops for two whole days. Here he first heard certain news of the ruin of Argyle, which had the effect of sinking his spirits even lower than they had been at Philips Norton. Other men, as despondent as himself, now proposed that he and his officers should leave the army to shift for itself, and fly back to the continent. Monmouth certainly entertained this pusillanimous and dishonorable project; but, when submitted to his council of officers, it was condemned by all except one, and was particularly inveighed against by the recreant Lord Grey. Wavering and uncertain, Monmouth then proposed proceeding to Warminster; but, deterred by the near presence of the king's troops, and flattered by an assurance that there was a great force of club-men in the marshes to the westward, ready to join him, he gave up his march upon Warminster, and returned to Shipton Mallet. On the 1st of July he entered Wells, and took some carriages belonging to the royal army: on the 2d he marched toward Bridgewater in search of the club-men, and found, instead of ten thousand, only one hundred and sixty. On the 3d of July he entered Bridgewater, whence many of his followers went to Taunton, and other places in the neighborhood, to see their friends. It is said that almost all of these returned according to their promise; but a day or a day and a half had been lost, and apparently no fixed plan of operations was adopted, when, on the morning of the 5th, accounts were received of the close approach of Feversham, who had been considerably reinforced. Monmouth then thought of retreating, and of getting, by forced marches, into the counties of Chester and Shropshire. In this intention orders were given and preparations made; but on the same afternoon he learned—what he had not known before—the true situation of the royal army, which lay encamped upon Sedgemoor, apparently with little order. A council was then called, and a night-attack suggested, provided only there were no intrenchments round the camp. Scouts and some country people reported that there was no appearance of intrenchments on Sedgemoor, and the nocturnal attack was settled. The troops were summoned to the rendezvous in the castle-field at Bridgewater, and by eleven at night they were formed and put upon the march without beat of drum, having received express orders not to fire a musket till they were within the enemy's lines. The command of the horse was still intrusted to Grey. Captain Matthews remonstrated, and reminded Monmouth of that nobleman's misconduct in the affair of Bridport; but Monmouth replied, "I will not affront my Lord Grey, and what I have given him in charge is easy to be executed." Grey rode on at the head of the cavalry boldly enough until he came to a ditch: for though there were no intrenchments, there was a broad ditch, which served as a drain to the moor, and of which no mention had been made by the unskillful men who had surveyed the ground. The attacking cavalry were brought to a halt, the slumbering royalists were in part roused by the noise, a loose fire was opened across the ditch, and Grey in a very short time turned his back. Monmouth threw forward the van-guard of the foot commanded by Colonel Wade; but, instead of reserving their fire until they had crossed the ditch, the men began to fire long shots, loosely and blindly, for the night was dark: this allowed Feversham time to mount his horse and to advance his foot and artillery to the inner edge of the ditch. Day soon began to dawn, and the royal artillery did dreadful execution upon Monmouth's foot; while his horse still kept out of the reach of the guns, and could never be brought up to charge the artillerymen, though a passage by which they might have easily made their way had been discovered lower down the ditch. The royalists, both horse and foot, sallied from their position on Sedgemoor, and, crossing the ditch, fell upon the insurgents, flank and rear. These victims were for the most part armed with rustic implements, and those who had guns had soon no powder, for the drivers drove away the ammunition-wagons after the cavalry. Notwithstanding all these disadvantages the poor peasants fought most bravely with the butt ends of their muskets or with their scythes and forks; and they continued to fight long after Monmouth had abandoned the field. The story is variously told, but in no instance very favorably to the valor of Monmouth, who seems to have been all along haunted by a dread of being taken prisoner. According to the more generally received account. Grey rode up to him at the height of the action, when nothing was decided, and told him that all was lost—that it was more than time to think of shifting for himself. And nearly all accounts agree in stating that Monmouth rode off the field with Grey and a few other officers, leaving the poor enthusiasts, without order or instructions, to be massacred by a pitiless enemy. Fifteen hundred were killed and five hundred made prisoners; but the loss of the royalists was also very considerable.[1] "Now," says Barillon, the attentive reporter of these events "all the zealous Protestants will put their hope in the Prince of Orange." Meanwhile, Monmouth fled for Wales; but, ever undecided, he listened to Lord Grey, and changed his course for the New Forest, in Hampshire. On the evening of the 7th, the second day after the battle of Sedgemoor, Grey, disguised as a peasant, was taken, and on the following morning a Brandenburg officer in the same disguise was also captured. This foreigner confessed that he had parted from Monmouth only a few hours before. The neighboring country was thoroughly searched, and before night the Duke of Monmouth, in the same lowly disguise as his last two companions, was found in a ditch, half buried under fern and nettles. He had wandered far on foot, and, to appease the cravings of hunger, had gathered some pease in the fields. If this showed the hard condition to which he had been reduced, there were other things found upon him which seemed to prove his weak and frivolous character. These were papers and books. One of the books was a manuscript of spells, charms, and conjurations, songs, receipts, prescriptions, and prayers, all written with his own hand. Two others were manuscripts about fortifications and the military art, and a fourth consisted of computations of the yearly expense of his majesty's navy and land forces. Utterly prostrated in body and in mind, he wrote an imploring letter to the unforgiving king.[1] After staying two days at Ringwood, Monmouth and Grey were escorted to London, where they arrived on the 13th of July. Besides writing to James, Monmouth from Ringwood had addressed the Queen Dowager, the widow of Charles II., imploring her, as the only person that might, to have some compassion for him, and, "for the last king's sake," to intercede for him, assuring her majesty he would not write this if he were not convinced, from the bottom of his heart, how much he had been deceived and how angry God Almighty was with him.[2] And it is said that Catherine of Braganza, who had always treated him with kindness, earnestly pressed James to admit his nephew to an audience, in the confident hope that the meeting would lead to at least such a pardon as should save his life. It is, however, consonant with James's character, and it is the opinion entertained by many, that he required no pressing to grant this interview, being sufficiently urged thereto by his dark suspicions and his anxiety to know that one word which his captive said he had to impart. On the very day of their arrival in the capital both Monmouth and Grey were carried to Whitehall, and introduced, not both together, but separately, to the king, in the apartment of Chiffinch, the minister of Monmouth's father's pleasures and debaucheries. James was attended by no one except Sunderland and Middleton, the two secretaries of state; and the precise particulars of what passed can never be ascertained. The arms of the prisoners were pinioned; and if we may believe the memoirs drawn up from James's own notes, Monmouth abjectly crawled upon his knees to embrace those of his majesty. On the day after the interview, the king, who had punctually informed the Prince of Orange of Monmouth's proceedings, from his landing down to his defeat at Sedgemoor, sent William a very laconic account of what had passed at Whitehall. "The two," said he, "first desired very earnestly to speak with me, as having things of importance to say to me, which they did, but did not answer my expectations in what they said to me: the Duke of Monmouth seemed more concerned and desirous to live, and did behave himself not so well as I expected from one who had taken upon him to be king. I have signed the warrant for his execution to-morrow. For Lord Grey, he appeared more resolute and ingenuous, and never so much as once asked for his life: his execution can not be so soon, by reason of some forms which are requisite to be complied with." Another account, which has been more generally followed—not because its truth is more susceptible of proof, but because it is more striking and dramatic—is that of Bishop Kennet. "This unhappy captive," says the bishop, "by the intercession of the Queen Dowager, was brought to the king's presence, and fell presently at his feet, and confessed he deserved to die; but conjured him, with tears in his eyes, not to use him with the severity of justice, and to grant him a life, which he would be ever ready to sacrifice in his service. He mentioned to him the example of several great princes, who had yielded to the impressions of clemency on the like occasions, and who had never afterward repented of those acts of generosity and mercy; concluding in a most pathetic manner, Remember, sir, I am your brother's son, and if you take my life, it is your own blood that you will shed. The king asked him several questions, and made him sign a declaration that his father told him that he was never married to his mother; and then said, he was sorry, indeed, for his misfortunes, but his crime was of too great a consequence to be left unpunished, and he must of necessity suffer for it. The queen is said to have insulted him in a very arrogant and unmerciful manner. So that when the duke saw there was nothing designed by this interview but to satisfy the queen's revenge, he rose up from his majesty's feet with a new air of bravery, and was carried back to the Tower."[1] Mr. Fox rejects as improbable this account of the barbarous behavior of the queen, and of James's extracting from Monmouth the declaration of his illegitimacy. Though Mary of Este was a misera-

[1] "Sir,—Your majesty may think it the misfortune I now lie under makes me make this application to you; but I do assure your majesty it is the remorse I now have in me of the wrong I have done you in several things, and now in taking up arms against you. For my taking up arms, it was never in my thoughts since the king died. The Prince and Princess of Orange will be witness for me of the assurance I gave them, that I would never stir against you. But my misfortune was such, as to meet with some horrid people, that made me believe things of your majesty, and gave me so many false arguments, that I was fully led away to believe that it was a shame and a sin before God not to do it. But, sir, I will not trouble your majesty at present with many things I could say for myself, that I am sure would move your compassion; the chief end of this letter being only to beg of you, that I may have that happiness as to speak to your majesty; for I have that to say to you, sir, that I hope may give you a long and a happy reign.

"I am sure, sir, when you hear me, you will be convinced of the zeal I have of your preservation, and how heartily I repent of what I have done. I can say no more to your majesty now, being this letter must be seen by those that keep me. Therefore, sir, I shall make an end, in begging of your majesty to believe so well of me, that I woold rather die a thousand deaths than excuse any thing I have done, if I really did not think myself the most in the wrong that ever a man was, and had not from the bottom of my heart an abhorrence for those that put me upon it, and for the action itself. I hope, sir, God Almighty will strike your heart with mercy and compassion for me, as he has done mine with abhorrence of what I have done: wherefore, sir, I hope I may live to show you how zealous I shall ever be for yoor service; and could I but say one word in this letter, you would be convinced of it; but it is of that consequence that I dare not do it. Therefore, sir, I do beg of you once more to let me speak to you; for then you will be convinced how much I shall ever be

"Your majesty's most humble and dutiful,

ble fanatic, we have no right to suppose her capable of the gratuitous inhumanity with which she is here charged; but, notwithstanding the public declaration which Charles II. made before his council, in 1679—that he was never married to Monmouth's mother—we can conceive that James might deem it expedient to force such a confession from the lips of the young man himself, who had so recently assumed the title of hereditary king and proclaimed his uncle an usurper and murderer. Speculation has wearied itself in surmises as to the one word which was to procure pardon; but it seems to be a rational belief (positive proof is out of the question) that Monmouth had either no important disclosure to make, or had too much honor left to betray his friends for the merest chance of life. A writer who was generally well informed of what was passing in court says, distinctly, that he named nobody but the Earl of Argyle and Ferguson, about whom James required no information.[1]

From the presence of the hard-hearted king Monmouth was conveyed to the Tower. On his way he implored Lord Dartmouth, who escorted him, to intercede for his life; but that nobleman answered that he had put himself out of the reach of mercy by assuming the royal title.[2] The bill of attainder, which had been hurried through parliament on his first landing was held to supersede the necessity of any kind of trial, and his execution was fixed for the next day but one. This time was too short even for the worldly business he wished to settle; and on the morrow (the 14th of July) he wrote another imploring letter to the king, desiring some short respite.[3] This favor was sternly denied by James. We come again to clashing and contradictory accounts; for those who best knew the exact circumstances disagree in their accounts of Monmouth's last moments in the Tower. According to James's statement in his Memoirs, he refused to see his wife, the great heiress of Buccleugh; while, according to Burnet and others, she positively refused to see him, unless in presence of witnesses, who might hear all that passed, and justify her and preserve her family. Burnet says that they met and parted very coldly, Monmouth merely recommending to her the bringing up of their children in the Protestant religion. Bishop Kennet says that he was told by Dr. Tennison that he (Tennison) advised him to be better reconciled to the duchess; and that he excused himself, saying, that his heart was turned against her, because in his affliction she had gone to plays and into public companies. Dalrymple states that he wrote a third letter to the king, in which he warned his majesty against his intriguing minister, Sunderland; and that Colonel Blood, or that bravo's son, who then held an office in the Tower, got possession of the letter before it could be carried to the king, and carried it to Sunderland, who destroyed it. Burnet and several others agree in stating that the wretched captive believed, on the authority of a fortune-teller, that if he outlived the 15th he was destined for great things. For the sake of his children, who had been clapped up in the Tower,[1] he signed a paper renouncing his pretensions by birth to the crown. As long as he fancied there was any hope of life he was weak and unsettled; but when he was convinced of his inevitable doom, he, according to every account, collected his energies to die like a man.[2] He passed the night of the 14th with Turner, bishop of Ely, and Ken, bishop of Bath and Wells, who at an early hour on the morning of the fatal 15th were joined by Dr. Hooper and Dr. Tennison. The two bishops teased and tormented him rather than comforted him; nor does it appear that the two doctors were much more considerate of the feelings of a dying man, or more sensible of the monstrosity of the politico-religious dogmas which the church in an evil hour had taken to her bosom. "Certain it is," says Mr. Fox, "that none of these holy men seem to have erred on the side of compassion or complaisance to their illustrious penitent. Besides endeavoring to convince him of the guilt of his connection with his beloved Lady Harriet—of which he could never be brought to a due sense—they seem to have repeatedly teased him with controversy, and to have been far more solicitous to make him profess what they deemed the true creed of the church of England, than to soften or console his sorrows, or to help him to that composure of mind so necessary for his situation. He declared himself to be a member of their church; but they denied that he could be so, unless he thoroughly believed the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. He repented generally of his sins, and especially of his late enterprise, but they insisted that he must repent of it in the way they prescribed to him—that he must own it to have been a wicked resistance to his lawful king, and a detestable act of rebellion."

At ten o'clock on the morning of the 15th, Monmouth was put into the carriage of the lieutenant of the Tower, and doubly and trebly surrounded with guards, for fear the despair of his friends, or the compassion of the populace should have prompted an attempt at rescue. The two bishops went in the carriage with him, and one of them told him that their controversy was not yet at an end, and that upon the scaffold he would be expected to make some more satisfactory declarations. They soon arrived at the destined spot on Tower Hill, which was surrounded by bars and strong palings to keep off the multitude. All the avenues leading to Tower Hill were filled with soldiers; and all the open space, the windows, and the house-tops were crowded with

[3] According to a manuscript of Dr. Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph, quoted by Echard, "the duke made another experiment on the king by letter, representing how useful he might and would be, if his majesty would be pleased to grant him his life; and beseeching, in case that was refused, that he might be allowed a little longer time, and to have another divine to assist him—Dr. Tennison, or whom else his majesty should appoint: and his majesty, by way of answer, sent him Bishop Ken, with notice that he must die the next day."

[1] Barillon, in a letter to Louis XIV., dated the 23d of July (new style), says, "His children are in the Tower. The duchess would follow them there. It is believed that they will not get out for a long time, on account of the title of king which their father has taken."

[2] According to Bishop Kennet, Monmouth spoke with great indignation of Shaftesbury and of Ferguson, calling the first a tricking man and the second a bloody villain.

spectators. He descended from the coach, and mounted the scaffold with a firm step. The bishops followed him. A loud murmur of sighs and groans went round the assembled multitude, and by degrees sunk into an almost breathless silence. He saluted the people, and said that he should speak little; that he came to die, and should die a Protestant of the church of England. Here he was interrupted by one of the bishops, who told him that, if he was of the church of England and true to his profession, he must acknowledge the doctrine of non-resistance to be true; and when they could not prevail upon him to adopt this political article of divinity, they both of them baited him with arguments and remonstrances, which, however, had no effect. To silence them on this point, and to defend the reputation of the lady he loved, Monmouth spoke of Lady Harriet Wentworth, calling her a woman of virtue and honor, and insisting that their connection was innocent and honest in the sight of God. Here Gosling, one of the sheriffs, who did not reflect upon the domestic arrangements, not merely of the late, but of the present king, whose mistresses were probably among the spectators, rudely interrupted the duke, by asking if he had ever been married to the Lady Harriet. Monmouth was silent, and then this Gosling said, "I hoped to have heard of your repentance for the treason and bloodshed which had been committed." The victim mildly replied, "I die very penitent." But the bishops again called upon him for particular acknowledgment and confession. He referred them to a paper he had signed in the Tower.[1] The bishops told him that there was nothing in that paper about resistance, and inhumanly and indecently pressed him to own that doctrine. Worn out by their importunities, he said to one of them, "I am come to die. Pray, my lord!—I refer to my paper." But their zeal would not be silenced even by this touching appeal, which the victim was heard to repeat from time to time as they persevered in their inquisitorial office. They were particularly anxious that he should call his late invasion rebellion; and at last he said aloud, "Call it by what name you please; I am sorry for invading the kingdom; I am sorry for the blood that has been shed, and for the souls which have been lost by my means. I am sorry it ever happened." These words were echoed to the people by Vandeput, the other sheriff, and then the divines plied him with fresh exhortations to atone for the mischief he had done by avowing their great principle of faith and government. Monmouth again regretted whatever had been done amiss, adding, "I never was a man that delighted in blood. I was as cautious in that as any man was. The Almighty knows I die with all the joyfulness in the world." And here, if the bishops had had any bowels, they would have left their victim to the merciful ax. But, instead of so doing, they expressed a doubt whether his repentance were true and valid repentance or not. "If," said Monmouth, "I had not true repentance, I should not so easily have been without the fear of dying. I shall die like a lamb." "Much," rejoined his persecutors, "may come from natural courage." "No," replied Monmouth, "I do not attribute it to my own nature, for I am as fearful as other men are; but I have now no fear, as you may see by my face. There is something within which does it; for I am sure I shall go to God." "My lord," said they, "be sure upon good grounds! Do you repent of all your sins, known or unknown, confessed or not confessed—of all the sins which might proceed from error of judgment?" He replied that he repented in general for all, and with all his soul. "Then," said the bishops, "may Almighty God of his infinite mercy forgive you! But here are great numbers of spectators—here are the sheriffs who represent the great city, and in speaking to them you speak to the whole city: make some satisfaction by owning your crime before them." Monmouth was silent. Then the churchmen fell to prayers, in which he joined with fervor and devotion. They repeated twice over the versicle in the liturgy, "O Lord, save the king," to which, after some pause, he said "Amen." Monmouth then began to undress himself, refusing to have a cap over his eyes. Even during this last sad ceremony the bishops molested him anew. "My lord," said they, "you have been bred a soldier—you will do a generous, Christian thing if you please to go to the rail, and speak to the soldiers, and say, that here you stand a sad example of rebellion, and entreat them and the people to be loyal and obedient to the king." At this the dying man waxed warm, and he said, in a hasty tone, "I have told you I will make no speeches—I will make no speeches—I come to die." But even this was not enough to silence the bishops, who renewed their attack by saying that the speech need not be a long one—that ten words would be enough. Monmouth turned away, gave a token to a servant for Lady Harriet, and spoke with the executioner. As was usual, he gave the headsman some money, and he then begged him to have a care not to treat him so awkwardly as he had done my Lord Russell. He felt the edge of the ax, and said he feared it was not sharp enough, but, being assured that it was of proper sharpness and weight, he laid his neck across the block, the divines bestowing their parting ejaculation, and praying God to accept his imperfect and general repentance. The headsman, who might be discomposed by the very warning which the duke had given, and who probably entertained the prevalent notion of the sanctity of royal blood, fell into a fit of trembling, and struck so faint a blow, that the victim, but slightly wounded, lifted up his head and looked him in the face. Two other blows were almost equally ineffectual; and then the man threw down his ax in horror, crying out, "I can not finish this work." But, being brought to himself by the threats of the sheriffs, he took up the ax again, and, with two other strokes, separated the head from the body. And thus perished, in the thirty-sixth year of his age, James Duke of Monmouth. "He died," says Barillon, "with sufficient firmness, as Englishmen generally do. . . . The people of London showed great dejection and grief at his death. The court industriously circulates whatever can injure his memory in the mind of the church of England Protestants, by comparing his discourses to those of the fanatics, and in the mind of the people by taxing him with cowardice, and with having retired too soon from the battle of Sedgemoor. . . . There are some people here who believe that Monmouth said something to the king against the Prince of Orange; but I have not been able to penetrate this matter, and, from all that I can learn, Monmouth said nothing very important. He had made up his mind to do what he could to save his life, but as soon as he had spoken with the king, he had no longer any kind of hope, and he afterward showed a deal of firmness and resolution."

[1] It was in the following words:—"I declare, that the title of king was forced upon me; and that it was very much contrary to my opinion, when I was proclaimed. For the satisfaction of the world, I do declare, that the late king told me he was never married to my mother. Having declared this, I hope the king who is now will not let my children suffer on this account. And to this I put my hand this 15th day of July, 1685. "Monmouth."

It was expected by most men that the execution of Lord Grey would closely follow that of Monmouth; but Grey was respited for his natural life. As this was so marked an exception to James's general rule various reasons have been assigned for it. It is said, for example, that he had been given, as the phrase then went, to my Lord Rochester, one of the brothers of James's first wife, and that it was found his estate was so entailed, that no forfeiture for treason could prevent its descending to Grey's brother; and that therefore his life was spared, that the grantee, Rochester, might have the benefit of it.[1] That caitiff, moreover, obeyed the command of James, and wrote in the Tower "a Secret History," or "a Confession," in which he made disclosures, which, under the circumstances, are not entitled to the slightest credit, respecting the Rye-House plot, &c. The German officer who had been taken after Grey, and who had contributed to the taking of Monmouth, was let go. Of the rest who had accompanied the hapless expedition from Holland, some made their escape out of the country, and some remained to fall among the hecatombs offered up by Jeffreys, to glut the vengeance of an unforgiving court, who made no distinction between artifice and credulity, between ambition and delusion.

The French Lord Feversham, immediately after the battle of Sedgemoor, had hanged up, without any trial, twenty of his prisoners; and Colonel Kirk, upon entering Bridgewater and Taunton, had executed some nineteen in the same manner. This Kirk had served for a long time at Tangiers, and, according to Burnet, had become "savage by the neighborhood of the Moors there." His regiment carried the standard they had borne in the war against the infidels, which had upon it the figure of a lamb—the emblem of Christian meekness; and hence, in sad irony, the people of Somersetshire called his plundering and butchering soldiers "Kirk's lambs." Poetry and tradition have both exaggerated and invented facts, yet the authenticated horrors committed by these lambs and their leader were enormous.[1] The chief service in which they were engaged was to search for rebels, as well those that favored and assisted the combatants at Sedgemoor as those who had fought there. Their search was directed by mercenary spies, and by personal enmities; for any man in the west that wished to ruin another had but to denounce him to Kirk as a partisan of Monmouth, and the lambs did the rest. Feversham was called up to court to receive thanks and honors, no attention being paid to the remonstrance of Bishop Ken, who told his lordship that, the battle being over, he ought to have tried his prisoners before putting them to death. Kirk had, therefore, the field to himself. His love of money, however, somewhat balanced and controlled his love of blood; and, following the examples of ministers and magistrates, he sold pardons to many prisoners who were rich enough to buy them at a high price. His summary executions and all his illegal proceedings were notorious in London, and excited disgust and comment; yet the king, through Lord Sunderland, informed Kirk that he was "very well satisfied with his proceedings;"[2] and, subsequently, this officer declared that his severities fell short of the orders which he had received. On the 10th of August, Kirk was summoned to court to give particular information on the state of the west; but the system of terror was not changed, and Colonel Trelawney, who succeeded him, illegally executed at Taunton, on the 1st of September, three persons for rebellion, and pillage and martial law continued to be exercised without compunction either in the government or in its savage instruments. Some allowance might be made for the passions, and habits, and ignorance of the soldiery; but it was soon found that lawyers like Jeffreys could commit far greater atrocities than the military.

Four other judges—Montague, the chief baron, Levinz, Watkins, and Wright — were joined in commission with the lord chief justice, who had recently been raised to the peerage under the title of Baron Jeffreys of Wem.[3] An order was issued in the king's name and authority to all officers in the west, "to furnish such parties of horse and foot as might be required by the lord chief justice on his circuit, for securing prisoners, and to perform that service in such manner as he should direct."[4] From thus having troops at his command, it was said that the lord chief justice had been made a lieutenant-general; and, from the whole character

[1] Bishop Burnet says, "He had a great estate that by his death was to go over to his brother: so the court resolved to preserve him, till he should be brought to compound for his life. The Earl of Rochester had £16,000 of him: others had smaller shares. He was likewise obliged to tell all he knew, and to be a witness in order to the conviction of others, but with this assurance, that nobody should die upon his evidence."

[1] Among the inventions, the story forming the subject of Pomfret's well-known poem of "Cruelty and Lust," which first appeared in print in 1699, is now universally classed, though the popular tradition still prevails at Taunton.

[2] In other dispatches Sunderland censured Kirk for setting some rebels at liberty (alluding perhaps to those who had purchased their lives), but he never censured him for having put others to death.

of the circuit, it was nicknamed "Jeffreys's campaign"—a name which the king himself had the folly and brutality to give it in writing to the Prince of Orange.[1] The suffering people in the west still more correctly called the circuit "the bloody assize." Jeffreys (the other judges were mere ciphers) took the field on the 27th of August, at Winchester, where his whole fury was directed against an aged and infirm woman. This was Mrs. Alicia Lisle, widow of Mr. Lisle, one of the Commonwealth judges of Charles I., whose murder in Switzerland by royalist assassins has been recorded.[2] She was charged with having given shelter in her house, for one night, to Hickes and Nelthorpe, two fugitives from Sedgemoor—"an office of humanity," says Sir James Mackintosh, "which then was and still is treated as high treason by the law of England." She had no council to assist her; she was so deaf that she could very imperfectly hear the evidence, and so lethargic from advanced age as frequently to slumber at the bar where the remnant of her life was called for. A poor peasant who had guided the fugitives to her house was the principal and unwilling witness against her. Jeffreys and three counsel bullied and terrified the confused rustic. "It is infinite mercy," roared the lord chief justice, "that for those falsehoods of thine, God does not immediately strike thee into hell." The poor fellow at last admitted some facts which afforded reason to suspect, though they did not prove, that Mrs. Lisle knew that the sufferers to whom she had extended her charity and hospitality were fugitives from Monmouth's army. The unfortunate lady said in her defense that she knew Mr. Hickes to be a Presbyterian minister, and that she thought he was flying from the warrants that were out against him and all Non-conformist ministers on account of their profession. Jeffreys declared that all Presbyterians had had a hand in the rebellion. The jury hesitated, and asked the chief justice whether it were as much treason to receive Hickes before as after conviction? He told them that it was; and this, it appears, is literally true in law; but he willfully concealed from the ill-informed jury that, by the law, such as it was, the receiver of a traitor could not be brought to trial till the principal traitor had been convicted or outlawed.[3] The four scoundrels in ermine, who sat by Jeffreys's side, said not a word about this designed suppression of the truth. The jury retired, and remained so long deliberating upon their verdict as to provoke the wrath of the chief justice. When they returned into court they expressed a doubt whether the prisoner really knew that Hickes had been in Monmouth's army. The chief justice assured them that their doubt was unfounded and the proof complete. They retired again, and again returned into court with the doubt on their lips and with human feelings in their hearts. Jeffreys again sent them out in a fury; and a third time they returned still unsatisfied. At this critical moment the defenseless prisoner made an effort to speak; but she was instantly silenced by Jeffreys, who at last bullied and overawed the jury into a verdict of guilty. "Gentlemen," exclaimed this bravo in law, "had I been among you on the jury, and had she been my own mother, I should have found her guilty." In pronouncing sentence on the following morning he let loose all virulence and invective against the Presbyterians, to which sect he supposed Mrs. Lisle belonged; yet, mixing artifice with his fury, he tried by ambiguous phrases to lure her into discoveries. His atrocious sentence was, that, according to the old law relating to female traitors, she should be burned alive on the afternoon of that very day. The clergy of the cathedral of Winchester had the rare merit of interfering with this monster's decree; and they succeeded in obtaining a respite for three days. During this interval powerful and touching applications were made to the king: the aged victim was obnoxious on account of her husband, who had been sent to a bloody grave twenty-one years ago; but testimony was borne to her own loyalty or exceeding humanity: the Lady St. John and the Lady Abergavenny testified "that she had been a favorer of the king's friends in their greatest extremities during the late civil war," among others, of these ladies themselves; and upon these grounds, as well as for her general behavior, they earnestly recommended her to pardon. Her son, so far from taking arms for Monmouth, had served in the royal army against that invader; she herself had often declared that she shed more tears than any woman in England on the day of Charles I.'s execution; and it was a fact notorious to all, that, after the Restoration and the attainder of Mr. Lisle, his estate had been granted to her, at the intercession of Chancellor Clarendon, for her excellent conduct during the prevalence of her husband's party. As it was perfectly well known to the friends of the aged victim that money was more powerful at court than mercy, a thousand pounds were promised to Lord Feversham for a pardon, but the king declared to this favorite that he would not reprieve her for one day. A petition was then presented from Mrs. Lisle herself, praying that, in consideration of her ancient and honorable descent, she might be beheaded instead of being burned alive. A careful search was made for precedents, and the utmost extent of the royal mercy was to sign a warrant for the beheading, which was performed at Winchester on the 2d of September, the venerable matron laying her head on the block as serenely as if it had been her pillow, and pray-

[1] James gave it this name to the prince more than once. On the 10th of September he says, "I have now but little news to tell you, all things being very quiet at present here, though the Presbyterian and republican party are still very busy, and have as much mind to rebel again as ever. Lord chief justice is making his campaign in the west, and when the parliament meets, some of the peers which are in custody will be tried." Again, on the 24th of September, after telling the prince that he had been "a-fox-hunting on Tuesday last," and "was this day at the same sport, the weather being now very proper for it and stag-hunting over," James says, "As for news, there is little stirring, but that lord chief justice has almost done his campaign; he has already condemned several hundreds, some of which are already executed, more are to be, and the others sent to the plantations."—Dalrymple, Appendix.

[3] "A provision," says Sir James Mackintosh, "indeed so manifestly necessary to justice, that, without the observance of it, Hickes might have been acquitted of treason after Mrs. Lisle had been executed for harboring him as a traitor."

ing with her last breath for the preservation of the Protestant religion and of the cold-blooded tyrant then on the throne.[1]

Hickes, the Presbyterian preacher, who had been the cause of these atrocities, but whose name was not in any proclamation when Mrs. Lisle received him into her house, and Nelthorpe, whom she did not know, and who had been involved in the Rye-House plot, were executed afterward in different places.

From Winchester, with a train of guards and prisoners at his heels, Jeffreys proceeded on to Salisbury, and thence (having increased his train) he went to Dorchester, and there hoisted his bloody flag.[2] The fierce nature of the chief justice was made fiercer by an agonizing disorder, which was probably brought on and increased by excess of drinking. In writing to Sunderland from Dorchester, on the 16th of September, he says, "I this day began with the rebels, and have dispatched ninety-eight; but am at this time so tortured with the stone, that I must beg your lordship's intercession to his majesty for the incoherency of what I have adventured to give his majesty the trouble of.[3] But if honors and promotions could have soothed the pangs of disease, Jeffreys was not without those lenitives. On the 5th of September, Lord Keeper North departed from life and office together; and three days after—that is, between the execution of Mrs. Lisle, at Winchester, and his arrival at Dorchester—he was raised by his applauding and grateful sovereign to be lord chancellor. At Dorchester, this chancellor and chief justice, to save time, began to declare that if any of the prisoners would repent and plead guilty, they should find him a merciful judge; but that those who put themselves upon their trials should, if found guilty, be led to immediate execution. And the matter was afterward managed in this way: two officers were sent together to the accused with the alternative of mercy or certain death; and, as many were induced to accept the proffered mercy, these officers were employed as witnesses of their confession, in case of their retracting—and at times without any retracting, but merely to satisfy the thirst for blood.[4]

[1] Mackintosh.—Ralph.—Roger Coke. Some of the reasoning of this last writer, who was living at the time, is superlatively pedantic. "She had sentence passed upon her," says Coke, "which in women is to be burned, but the execution was by beheading of her; so that, whether the sentence was just or not, the execution was unjust; for though the king may pardon or mitigate the punishment of any crime against him, as to pardon treason, or to mitigate the execution to beheading, which is part of the sentence, yet he can not alter the punishment into any other sentence than the law prescribes."

[3] From the last clause of the sentence quoted in the text, and from several expressions in other letters, we are justified in giving credit to the assertion of Burnet, that the king had a particular account of these proceedings written to him every day. Jeffreys concludes this present epistle to Sunderland in a very characteristic manner. "My dearest lord, may I ever be tortured with the stone if I forget to approve myself, my dearest lord, your most faithfully devoted servant," &c. Sunderland, in reply, assured the chief justice that the king approved of all his proceedings.

[4] According to a poem of the time called "Jeffreys's Elegy."

> "He bid 'em to confess, if e'er they hope > To be reprieved from the fatal rope:
> This seemed a favor, but he'd none forgive;
> The favor was a day or two to live;
> Which those had not that troubled him with trial—
> His business blood, and would have no denial.
> Two hundred he could sentence in an hour," &c.

Those who had accepted the terms offered were not afterward permitted to plead. Any evidence was held to be sufficient; and to a constable of Chardstock, who objected to the witnesses—a prostitute and a papist—Jeffreys exclaimed, "Villain! rebel! methinks I see thee already with a halter about thy neck;" and the prisoner was soon hanged. The judge had declared, in his facetious manner, that if any lawyer or parson came in his way they should not escape him; and, accordingly, Matthew Brag, an attorney, was executed without reprieve. In all, eighty persons were hanged at Dorchester in the course of a very few days: the remainder were transported, severely whipped, or imprisoned. Those transported were sold as slaves, and the bodies of those that were executed were quartered and stuck upon gibbets. Jeffreys then proceeded to Exeter, where another red list of two hundred and forty-three prisoners was laid before him. One man, upon pleading not guilty, was condemned and sent out to be hanged on the instant, which so terrified the rest that they thought it advisable not to exasperate him by putting him to the trouble of doing his duty; so all that he had to do was to consign them in a body, on their own confessions, to the executioner. But, as he was less fatigued with long hearings than he had been at Dorchester, he was not altogether so prodigal to the hangman. He then went into Somersetshire, the center of the late insurrection, where, at Taunton and Wells, nearly eleven hundred prisoners were arraigned for high treason. One thousand and forty confessed themselves guilty; only six ventured to put themselves on their trial; and two hundred and thirty-nine, at the very least,[1] were executed with astounding rapidity. In order to spread the terror more widely and to appal the neighbors, friends, and relatives of the victims, these executions took place in thirty-six towns and villages. The dripping heads and limbs of the dead were affixed in the most conspicuous places, in the streets, by the highways, over the town-halls, and over the very churches devoted to a merciful God. "All the high roads of the country were no longer to be traveled, while the horrors of so many quarters of men and the offensive stench of them lasted."[2] Sunderland apprised Jeffreys of the king's pleasure to bestow a thousand of the convicts on several of his courtiers, and one or two hundred on a favorite of the queen, upon condition that the persons receiving them thus as a gift should find

[1] The names of two hundred and thirty-nine are preserved; but as no judgments were entered it is not known how many more may have suffered. Three persons were executed in the village of Wrington, the birthplace of Mr. Locke, whose writings have tended to lessen the misery suffered by mankind from cruel laws and unjust judges.—Mackintosh.

[2] Lord Lonsdale's Memoirs. Other writers, who were eye-witnesses, though violent men, and given to exaggeration, have left still more horrible pictures. Shirley, the author of "The Bloody Assizes," which was published after the Revolution, says, "Nothing could be liker hell than these parts: cauldrons hissing, carcasses boiling, pitch and tar sparkling and glowing, bloody limbs boiling, and tearing, and mangling."—"England was now an Aceldema; the country for sixty miles together, from Bristol to Exeter, had a new and terrible sort of sign-posts and signs, gibbets, and heads and quarters of its slaughtered inhabitants. Every soul was sunk in anguish and terror, sighing by day and by night for deliverance, but shut out of all hope by despair."—Oldmixon.

security that the prisoners should be enslaved for ten years in some West India island, where, as James must have known, field-labor was death to Europeans. The chancellor remonstrated with his majesty, directly, against this giving away of the prisoners, who, he said, would be worth ten or fifteen pounds a-piece.[1] In a subsequent letter from Bristol he yields to the proposed distribution of the convicts; boasts of his victory over that "most factious city," and pledges his life, and that which was dearer to him, his loyalty, "that Taunton and Bristol, and the county of Somerset too, should know their duty both to God and their king before he leaves them."

With the evidence of these letters alone we may confidently reject the dreams of those who pretend that James was unacquainted with his judge's manner of proceeding; and, if other proofs were wanting to prove the want of heart and feeling in this wretched prince, they are assuredly to be found in the gazettes of the day that report his progresses and amusements. He went to Winchester soon after the iniquitous execution of Mrs. Lisle, and there he remained, diverting himself with horse-races, during the hottest part of Jeffreys's campaign.[2] But there is still further an indisputable proof of James's approbation of Jeffreys's proceedings; for when (on the 30th of September[1]) that precious new chancellor returned to court his promotion was announced in the Gazette with an unusually emphatic panegyric on his person and services; and some months after this, when Jeffreys had brought on a dangerous attack by one of his furious debauches, James expressed great concern, and declared—with perfect truth—that such another man would not easily be found in England. Besides, wherever the king was directly and personally concerned, there was the same unflinching severity. When Holmes, an old republican officer, was brought into his presence, at London, James offered to spare his life if he would renounce his principles and engage to live quietly. Holmes answered, that he still must be a republican from his firm conviction that that form of government was the best; that he was an old man, whose life was as little worth asking as it was worth giving: and thereupon he was instantly sent down to Dorchester to be hanged. Cornish, formerly sheriff of London, was brought to trial, at the Old Bailey, for the Rye-House plot, to which so many victims had been already sacrificed: the trial was conducted with illegal haste, which rendered it impossible for the prisoner to procure witnesses or prepare a defense; he was convicted upon the evidence of Rumsey (who owned that on the trial of Lord Russell he had been guilty of perjury); and, James having signed his death-warrant, he was executed in sight of Guildhall and almost before his own door. On the very same day, and also by a warrant signed by the king,

[1] Letter from Jeffreys to the king, dated Taunton, 19th September, from MSS. in State Paper Office, as cited by Mackintosh. In the same letter Jeffreys returns thanks for his majesty's gracious acceptance of his services in the west.

[2] According to Burnet, James took pleasure in relating all the particulars of this campaign to foreign ministers; speaking of all that was done in a style that neither became the majesty nor the humanity of a great prince; and the historian adds that Dyckvelt, the Dutch ambassador, afterward told him "that the king talked so often of these things in his hearing, that he wondered to see him break out in these indecencies."—Own Times.

[1] Here Sir James Mackintosh remarks, "Had James been dissatisfied with the conduct of Jeffreys, he had the means of repairing some part of its consequences, for the executions in Somersetshire were not concluded before the latter part of November."

Elizabeth Gaunt, of Wapping, was burned alive at Tyburn, and one Lindsey was hanged on Tower Hill. The offense with which the poor woman was charged was, having compassed the king's death, by favoring the escape of one Burton, accused of participation in the Rye House plot, into Holland, and giving succor to the same Burton after the battle of Sedgemoor; and the principal witness against her was the execrable Burton himself, whose life she had twice saved.[1] The offense of the man who was hanged at Tower Hill was desertion—an offense not then provided for by any recognized martial law. Mrs. Gaunt died like a primitive martyr, declaring at the stake that she had only obeyed the sacred precepts which commanded her to hide the outcast, and not to betray him that wandereth.[2] Two other persons of humble condition were executed in London, where the outrages offered to the remains of the dead were carried to an unusual height, and where the dying speeches of all the prisoners were arbitrarily suppressed. Even the dismembered body of Rumbald was brought up from Scotland; and the slavish sheriffs of London received a royal warrant to set up one of the fetid quarters over one of the city gates, and to deliver the remaining three quarters to the sheriff of Hertford, who was directed by another royal warrant to place them, one at the Rye House, one at Hoddesdon, and the other at Bishop's Stortford.[3]

In London, as in the west, corruption and bribery were the only checks to infernal cruelty. Thus, Prideaux, who was thrown into the Tower by an arbitrary warrant, upon mere suspicion, bought himself off with £1500; and Hampden, still in prison for his misdemeanor, put aside the new and capital charge of high treason by paying £6000, to be divided between Jeffreys and Father Petre, the king's confessor and chief adviser. The queen's maids of honor, as pocket-money, were allowed to take from £50 to £100 from each of the fair damsels of Taunton who had presented Monmouth with flags and a Bible, and who thus were saved. In consequence of the suspicions of the court and of the disclosures made by Lord Grey, the lords Brandon, Delamere, and Stamford were proceeded against for high treason. Brandon was convicted by perjured witnesses; but, having a sister-in-law in favor at court,[4] he escaped, not being, however, enlarged upon bail till fourteen months, nor receiving his pardon till two years after his trial. Delamere, who was tried before the Lord Steward, Jeffreys, and thirty peers, was unanimously acquitted, though the falsehood, and infamy, and perjury of those who swore against him were not more conspicuous than the same vices in the evidence upon which many obscurer persons had been hanged and quartered. Stamford took the benefit of a subsequent amnesty.

The Marquis of Halifax had remained in the ministry during all the atrocities of Jeffreys's campaign, sitting at the council-board with Sunderland, with Rochester, whose vices of drinking and swearing did not prevent his being considered as the head of the high-church party, and with Godolphin, whose business habits were held to be indispensable. Halifax, however, to use his own witticism, had been "kicked up stairs" into the sounding but empty office of president of the council; and now it was resolved to deprive him of office altogether: for James suspected him of a determination to oppose the repeal of the Test and Habeas Corpus Acts, and he had not penetration enough to perceive the danger he ran in driving that crafty and able politician to extremities. Nor would the despotic blunderer delay this dismissal till the approaching session of parliament should be over. That session, as appointed, opened on the 9th of November. Uplifted with his mighty doings during the recess, and with the appearance of universal timidity and submission, James now presumed that the parliament of England would bend before him, and, like the parliament of Paris, content themselves for the future with the honor of receiving his commands and registering his decrees. After speaking briefly of the storm that was past, he told them, in a dictatorial style, that the militia, which had hitherto been so much depended on, was an inefficient force, and that there was nothing but a standing army of well-disciplined troops that could secure the nation at home and abroad. He then stated how he had augmented the army during the late wretched attempt, and called for a supply answerable to the increased expense. "And," continued he, "let no man take exception that there are some officers in this army not qualified, according to the late tests, for their employments. The gentlemen, I must tell you, are most of them known to me; and, having formerly served me on several occasions, and always approved the loyalty of their principles by their practices, I think them now fit to be employed under me: and I will deal plainly with you, that, after having had the benefit of their services in such time of need and danger, I will neither expose them to disgrace nor myself to the want of them, if there should be another rebellion to make them necessary to me." Without this declaration both Lords and Commons knew very well that he had commissioned Catholic lords to levy Catholic troops against Monmouth, and in the choice of officers had shown a marked preference for men of the ancient religion: and now the old hatred of popery came in to revive the languishing cause of civil liberty, and high-churchmen and low-churchmen, Tories and Whigs, became for a season united. The Commons, in coming to a resolution about a supply, voted an address to his majesty for the discharge of all such officers as refused the Protestant test. James, in reply, said, "Whatever you may do, I will adhere to all my promises." The House was thrown into a ferment, and Mr. John Kok, member for Derby, said, "I hope we are Englishmen, and not to be frightened out of our duty by a few high words." But the majority of the Englishmen there committed him to the Tower for his speech. Still, however, with all their servile loyalty, they were resolute about the popish officers; and the Lords showed equal or superior zeal. The ex-minister Halifax led the van against the court; and Jeffreys, the chancellor and main manager, was checked in his high career of insolence and arrogance, and made to crouch in the dust. On the eleventh day of the session, James, disappointed and furious, prorogued the parliament, which never met again for the dispatch of business; and the houses were deserted and silent till they echoed his expulsion and dethronement, as pronounced by the Convention.

A.D. 1686. James had not obtained a sixpence from the late session, but, for a time, he counted upon money from France; his minister, Sunderland, accepted a French pension of 25,000 crowns; and, after some shuffling and an attempt to save a sort of false pride and dignity, the King of England tied himself to the triumphal car of Louis XIV., by which he made his political existence absolutely incompatible with that of his son-in-law, the Prince of Orange, and at the same time rendered himself doubly odious to his Protestant subjects, as the ally and tool of one who had waged a most pitiless warfare against the reformed religion in France; for it was just at this critical moment, when Englishmen were filled with doubts and terrors as to the intentions of their popish king, that Louis revoked the tolerant edict of Nantes,[1] and drove many thousands of his Huguenot subjects to exile. The accounts which these fugitives brought into England added fresh fuel to the fire which was about to break out and consume James and his insane projects. It was known at the time that he and Father Petro were busily engaged in attempts to convert many of the Protestants about court; and, with a standing army encamped upon Hounslow Heath, and which kept still increasing, it was reasonably apprehended that such zealots would not always confine themselves to polemical arguments, persuasions, and promises. Sunderland had privately embraced Catholicism, and, in appearance, adopted all his master's partiality in favor of Roman Catholics. Other converts, both male and female, more openly proclaimed their abandonment of the Protestant faith; and the poet Dryden, the greatest writer of the day, recanted, and wrote, with very unchristian violence, against the Reformation and the established church.[2] Some of these proceedings are a com-

[1] The edict of Nantes, which is said to have been composed by the great historian De Thou, was passed by Henry IV. in the year 159[illegible]. It was suddenly repealed by Louis XIV., on the 18th of October, 1685, just three weeks before the meeting of the English parliament. The cruelties which immediately preceded and followed that measure were atrocious. At Nismes alone 60,000 Protestants were forced, in three days, to abjure their religion. Louis's missionaries were dragoons, whence the proceedings obtained the name (forever memorable, and forever infamous) of dragonnades.

[2] James, however, failed in many instances where he had probably expected immediate success. Jeffreys would not change, and it is said of Kirk, that, when urged by the king to turn Catholic, he excused himself by saying, that when in Africa he had given a promise to the Emperor of Morocco that if he ever changed his religion he would turn plete banquet to the cynic. James, like Louis XIV., reconciled his breaches of the seventh commandment with his ardent religionism. His reigning mistress was Catherine Sedley, who had some of her father's wit, though no pretensions to personal beauty.[1] She was installed at Whitehall, and created Countess of Dorchester; but James and his priests failed in converting her to popery; and the champions of the Protestant church did not disdain to pay court to the orthodox mistress. Rochester, that other pillar of the church, clung to her, while his rival, Sunderland, made common cause with the queen, who was jealous, and, with the confessor, who considered a mistress of such decided Protestantism a very dangerous appendage. Between them, the queen, confessor, and prime minister prevailed upon the king to send his mistress into Ireland, where a good estate had been given to her. The convert, Sunderland, then rose, and his rival, Rochester, sunk. The ministry was, in fact, converted into a close cabal of seven persons: the king, Sunderland, Father Petre, and the Catholic lords, Bellasis, Powis, Arundel, and Dover, who assembled sometimes in Sunderland's house and sometimes in the apartments of Chiffinch, of the backstairs. Roger Palmer, earl of Castlemaine by right of his wife's prostitution to the late king, was sent on an embassy to Rome, and an ambassador from the pope was openly received in London. After a few preludes in the courts of law, where it was endeavored to convert the Test Act into a dead letter, James, with blind and headlong haste, proceeded to assert a dispensing, a suspending, and a repealing power over all laws or acts of parliament whatsoever, and to put Catholics into the highest civil and military offices, from which the Protestants were dismissed. By means of quo warranto writs the corporations throughout the kingdom were remodeled; papists were admitted into all of them, and papists were made lieutenants of counties, sheriffs, and justices of the peace. In Scotland, where the parliament had been dissolved because it betrayed the same dread of popery as that of England, the same measures were resorted to, and the high-church Tory ministry was dismissed to make room for one of an entirely Catholic complexion. In Ireland the Protestants, who alone had been intrusted with arms, were disarmed by Tyrconnel, who was declared, even by one of his own party, to be "madman enough to ruin ten kingdoms." Indeed, in that country the scales were entirely turned, and the Protestants were treated in all things as badly as they had been accustomed to treat the papists ever since the days of Elizabeth. The revenues of the church were in good part given to popish bishops and priests, who were not merely permitted but commanded to wear their canonicals in public. Four thousand Protestant soldiers were cashiered, stripped of their uniforms, and left to wander, hungry and half naked, through the land. Their officers, for the most part, retired into Holland, and gathered round the Prince of Orange.

All this was too much for the endurance even of Tories and high-churchmen, and, in despite of the dogma of passive obedience, the pulpits began to resound with warnings and denunciations. To quench the flame in its infancy, James issued letters mandatory to the bishops of England, prohibiting the clergy to preach upon points of controversy, and establishing an ecclesiastical commission with more power than had been possessed by the abominable court over which Laud presided. It was authorized to search out and call before it "even those who seemed to be suspected of offenses;" and to "correct, amend, and alter the statutes of the universities, churches, and schools; or, where the statutes were lost, to devise new ones;" and the powers of the commission were declared to be effectual, "notwithstanding any law or statute to the contrary."[1] But James could not fill this court with men of the same views. The Archbishop of Canterbury (Sancroft) would not act at all; upon which the less scrupulous Cartwright, bishop of Chester, was put in his place: the other members were Crewe, bishop of Durham, who was more than half a papist; Sprat, bishop of Rochester, who preferred the king to the church; Rochester, the head of the high-church party; Sunderland, the concealed papist; Jeffreys, and Lord Chief Justice Herbert. With this court, such as it was, James ventured to issue a mandate to Compton, bishop of London, who had declared boldly, in the House of Lords, against the popish standing army, to suspend Doctor Sharp, who had preached in the pulpit against popery in general. Compton replied, through Lord Sunderland, that he could not legally punish Sharp without hearing him in his own defense. Upon this the new commission was put into play, and the bishop himself was summoned before it. At first Compton argued that the court was illegal; that he was subject, in ecclesiastical matters, to his metropolitan and suffragans alone; that he was a prelate of England, a lord of parliament, and could be tried only by the laws of his country: but he added that he had enjoined Sharp to desist from preaching, who was himself willing to make reparation and beg his majesty's pardon. James ordered the commissioners to suspend him; and, after some differences among themselves, the Bishop of London was suspended accordingly. Rochester, who had been averse to this extreme measure, and who is said to have affronted the king in a personal conference and argument about the merits of their respective religions, was turned out of the commission and his other offices shortly after; but he received a pension of £4000 a-year on the post-office, together with a regular grant of an annuity of £1700 a-year out of the estate of Lord Grey;[2] and, after all, his

Charles II., who had more taste in female beauty, used to say that one might fancy his brother's mistresses were given to him by his father confessor as penances, they were all so ugly. According to Horace Walpole, Miss Sedley (ennobled into the Countess of Dorchester) was accustomed to wonder what James chose his mistresses for. "We were none of us handsome," said she; "and if we had wit, he had not enough to find it out."—Reminiscences.

plotting rival, Sunderland, was disappointed, for his lucrative office of lord treasurer was put into commission. Nearly at the same time Rochester's brother, Lord Clarendon, was recalled from Ireland, and Tyrconnel, with the title of lord deputy, was left to govern that country. Even D'Adda, the pope's minister, saw clearly that James was ruining his cause by precipitation; and the wary Italian informed his court that men's minds were imbittered by the belief that Rochester had been dismissed because he would not turn Catholic, and that there was a design for the extermination of all Protestants.[1] Yet still James kept his course, and looked, with satisfaction and pride, to his encampment on Hounslow Heath, in which were now inclosed 15,000 men, horse and foot. He caused Samuel Johnson, a clergyman of the establishment, who had been chaplain to Lord Russell, to be sentenced to pay a fine, to be pilloried three several times, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, for writing an address to the soldiers to remind them that they were freeborn Englishmen. He attempted to convert his daughter, the Princess Anne, and to deprive his daughter Mary, the princess of Orange, of her right of the succession; and, looking neither to the right nor to the left, he went on more openly to assail the chartered rights of public bodies.

A.D. 1687. One of his great objects was to obtain the control of the seminaries and schools. Of these the Charter House in London was a very important one; and, accordingly, he commanded the governors of that establishment to admit into it one Andrew Popham, a papist, without test or oath. But the majority of the governors, headed by the Duke of Ormond, Compton, the suspended bishop of London, and the ex-minister, Lord Halifax, resisted the mandate. Yet, after failing in this attempt, he demanded from the University of Oxford that they should acknowledge a right in Father Petre to name seven Fellows of Exeter College,[2] and from the University of Cambridge the degree of master of arts for one Alban Francis, a Benedictine friar. Both those learned bodies, in spite of their recent declarations of non-resistance, resisted to the very utmost; the Oxford question was referred to the courts of Westminster, but the new ecclesiastical commission took up the Cambridge case, and summarily deprived Pechell, the vice-chancellor, of his office, and suspended him from the mastership of Magdalen College. James then commanded the Fellows of Magdalen to elect as their master one Antony Farmer, a concealed papist. The Fellows petitioned his majesty, but finding him not to be moved, they exercised their own undoubted right, and elected Doctor Howe. The ecclesiastical commission declared this election to be void, and then a new mandate was issued to the college to elect Parker, bishop of Oxford, who had several qualifications which Farmer had not, but who was also suspected of being a papist in disguise.[1] The Fellows, with unexpected spirit, stuck to the master of their own choosing, and Howe exercised his authority in spite of the ecclesiastical commission and the king. In the course of a summer progress, James arrived at Oxford, summoned the members of Magdalen into his presence, chid them for their disobedience, and told them to go away and choose the Bishop of Oxford, or else they should certainly feel the weight of his sovereign displeasure. Here was a call upon passive obedience from the very lips of the Lord's anointed; but still the Fellows insisted on their right, and answered him respectfully but firmly. Then they were privately warned that, like the corporations, they would be proceeded against by quo warranto, and inevitably lose every thing. But still the gownmen were firm. The tyrant, astonished and enraged, issued a commission to Cartwright, bishop of Chester, Chief Justice Wright, and Baron Jenner, to examine the state of the college, with full power to alter the statutes and frame new ones. The commissioners arrived at Oxford on the 20th of October, when Cartwright thundered at the devoted college; but Howe maintained his own rights and the rights of the body which had elected him with decorum and firmness; and when, on the second day, the commissioners deprived him of the presidency and struck his name off the books, he entered the hall and boldly protested against all they had done. The chief justice bound him in a thousand pounds to appear in the King's Bench, and Parker was put into possession by force. Then a majority of the Fellows were prevailed upon to submit "as far as was lawful and agreeable to the statutes of the college." But the weakly, arrogant king would not be satisfied with this; he insisted that the Fellows should acknowledge their disobedience and repentance in a written submission. Upon this the Fellows withdrew their former submission, and declared, in writing, that they could not acknowledge they had done any thing amiss. On the 16th of November, Bishop Cartwright[2] pro-

[2] "The noble family of Petre (of whom Father Edward Petre was one) in January, 1687, claimed the right of nomination to seven fellowships in Exeter College, which had been founded there by Sir W. Petre, in the reign of Elizabeth. It was acknowledged on the part of the college, that Sir William and his son had exercised that power, though the latter, as they contended, had nominated only by sufferance. The Bishop of Exeter, the visitor of the college, had, in the reign of James I., pronounced an opinion against the founder's descendants, and a judgment had been obtained against them in the Court of Common Pleas about the same time. Under the sanction of these authorities, the college had for seventy years nominated to these fellowships without disturbance from the family of Petre. Allibone, the Catholic lawyer, contended that this long usage, which would otherwise have been conclusive, deserved little consideration in a period of such iniquity toward Catholics that they were deterred from asserting their civil rights." Before this attempt James had obtained the appointment of one Massey, a Catholic, as dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and had obtained a dispensation for Obadiah Walker, master of University College, Oxford (long a concealed papist), and for two of his fellows of the same faith, together with a license for publishing books of Catholic theology. And Walker had had the courage to establish a printing press and a Catholic chapel in his college.

[1] Parker had passed through the phases of a fanatical puritan preacher during the Commonwealth, and a bigoted high-churchman at the Restoration, when he defended the persecution of his late brethren, and reviled the most virtuous men among them. As soon as he was made bishop of Oxford he was ready to transfer his services to James and the church of Rome. He was a drunkard and many things worse.

[2] Cartwright, bishop of Chester, was a pretty good parallel to his brother Parker of Oxford. He, too, had originally been a puritan and had become a flaming high-churchman at the Restoration. He drank as much as Parker, but was not so witty in his cups.

nounced the judgment of the commission in the shape of a general deprivation and expulsion. This was followed up, in December, by the sentence of the ecclesiastical commission, which incapacitated all and every the Fellows of Magdalen from holding any benefice or preferment in the church—a decree, however, which passed that body only by a majority of one. The intention was to defeat the project of some of the nobility and gentry, who had intended to bestow livings in the church on some of the ejected Fellows. James himself declared that he would look upon any favor shown to the Fellows as a combination against himself; but, notwithstanding his threats, considerable collections were made for them, and his own daughter, the Princess of Orange sent over £200 for their relief; and in the end, though they obtained the honors of martyrdom, they experienced little of its sufferings. Their places in the university were filled by avowed papists or by very doubtful Protestants.

But long before this result the king had issued "A Declaration for liberty of conscience;" by which all the penal laws against Protestant Non-conformists as well as Catholics were to be suspended.[1] "We have thought fit," said James, "by virtue of our royal prerogative, to issue forth this our declaration of indulgence, making no doubt of the concurrence of our two Houses of Parliament when we shall think it convenient for them to meet." The preamble was in other respects irreproachable—it laid down the great and saving virtue of toleration; and the declaration gave leave to all men to meet and serve God after their own manner, publicly as well as privately; it denounced the royal displeasure and the vengeance of the laws against all who should disturb any religious worship; and it granted a free pardon to all the king's loving subjects from penalties, forfeitures, and disabilities incurred on account of religion, the penal laws, &c. But this power of suspending the laws was not to be tolerated by any people pretending to freedom and a constitution; and it was understood by nearly every dissenting Protestant in the land, that the Non-conformists were only coupled with the Catholics for policy and expediency, and that the toleration of the Catholics was only intended as a preparatory step to the triumphant establishment of the church of Rome, which had never yet in any European kingdom tolerated the doctrines and practices of any other church whatsoever. The recent example set by Louis in the neighboring kingdom had more power to alarm than James's declaration, promises, and professions had power to lull and console; and the character, the habits, the habitual conversation of the king and his chief favorites furnished arguments innumerable and unanswerable against the sincerity of any professions of kindness toward the Protestant Dissenters. James's conduct in Scotland could not be forgotten; and Jeffreys's loud denunciations of all the Presbyterians and Non-conformists as king-haters, rebels, and republicans were still ringing in the ears of the nation. With remarkably few exceptions the large but disunited body of Dissenters rejected the boon as a snare, and prepared to stand by the lately-persecuting but now threatened Episcopal church; and not only the result, in which, as in all human affairs, there was much that was accidental or unforeseen, but also the coolest reasoning on all the circumstances of the case, will justify their preference, and prove that they acted wisely and politically. When the declaration was published, James told the pope's nuncio that he had struck a blow which would make a great noise—that in a general liberty of conscience the Anglican religion would be the first to decline; and the nuncio informed his court that the established church was mortified at the proceeding; that the Anglicans were "a ridiculous sect, who affected a sort of moderation in heresy, by a compost and jumble of all other persuasions; and who, notwithstanding the attachment which they boast of having maintained to the monarchy and the royal family, have proved on this occasion the most insolent and contumacious of men." In other directions James manifested an increasing and an emboldened hatred, not merely of high-churchmen, but of all Protestants whatsoever, except such as were timid and wavering and ready to do his will. The Dissenters opened their long-closed places of worship, grudging in their intolerance the same boon to the papists; the Presbyterians, the most numerous and influential of all the sects, resisted the solicitations of the court to sanction the dispensing power in the king by sending him addresses of thanks for the benefit allowed them; and many of the minor sects confined themselves to thanks for toleration, and assurances that they would not abuse it.

On the 3d of July James obliged the timid and more than half-unwilling ambassador of the pope to go through the honors and ceremonies of a public introduction at Windsor. Crewe, bishop of Durham, and Cartwright, bishop of Chester, were ready instruments in this parade; but the Duke of Somerset, the second peer of the kingdom, who was selected to introduce D'Adda, besought his majesty to excuse him from the performance of an act which by the laws of the land was still considered an overt act of treason. "Do you not know," said James, "that I am above the law?" The duke replied, "Your majesty is so, but I am not." The Duke of Grafton, however, did what Somerset would not, and introduced the nuncio. On the day before this public reception, the parliament, which had been kept from meeting by repeated prorogations, was

[1] The declaration came out in the Gazette on the 4th of April, 1687. To prepare the way for it, a declaration of indulgence, expressed in much loftier and more absolute language, had been issued by proclamation at Edinburgh: "We, by our sovereign authority, prerogative royal, and absolute power, do hereby give and grant our royal toleration. We allow and tolerate the moderate Presbyterians to meet in their private houses, and to hear such ministers as have been or are willing to accept of our indulgence, but they are not to build meeting-houses, but to exercise in houses. We tolerate Quakers to meet in their form in any place or places appointed for their worship: and we, by our sovereign authority, &c, suspend, stop, and disable all laws or acts of parliament made or executed against any of our Roman Catholic subjects, so that they shall be free to exercise their religion and to enjoy all; but they are to exercise in houses or chapels: and we cass, annul, and discharge all oaths by which our subjects are disabled from holding offices." The proprietors of church lands were confirmed in their possession, which seemed to be unnecessary so long as the Protestant establishment endured.

absolutely dissolved, notwithstanding the opinion of Sunderland that this step would prevent James's taking part in foreign affairs and lead to the ruin of the monarchy. Nothing was to be hoped from the enslaved law, from the corrupt and time-serving judges, who had given their sanction to the dispensing and suspending power of the prerogative: the liberty of the press was completely extinguished by the revival (by the late parliament) of an act originally passed for two years, in 1662, and afterward extended for seven years, in 1664: the bishops and the church, who would have assisted the king in establishing a despotism if he had not trenched upon their own rights, were left to head the war against him. Nor can it be fairly said that they took up arms upon slight provocation. Four popish bishops were publicly consecrated in the chapel royal; were sent to their dioceses with the title of vicars apostolical; and their pastoral letters were licensed, printed, and dispersed through the kingdom. The regular clergy of Rome, in the habits of their order, constantly crowded the court and its purlieus; and these priests too soon forgot their recent danger and distress, and became in many instances overconfident and insolent in their sudden prosperity. Some of them laid claim to public buildings, which they intended to convert into monasteries, seminaries, and chapels. The members of the French Protestant church in the Savoy carried their complaints to Halifax, who was now in strenuous opposition to his late master. "Let the priests turn you out," said the nephew of Shaftesbury, "for that will the sooner do your business and that of the nation." Even in those days there were Catholic Spaniards that were no bigots. Ronquillo, the Spanish ambassador, ventured to represent to James the danger of these proceedings; and when asked whether it was not the custom of his country for the king to consult his priests and confessors, he replied "Yes; and for that reason our affairs succeed so ill."

But James had by this time most fully proved his arbitrary temper and despotic principle in civil affairs as well as spiritual. His project was to reduce all the business of the state under his own immediate control, and to make both executive and legislative power center in the sovereign. When he dismissed Rochester and put the treasury into commission, he declared that he did so because too much power was committed to the lord high treasurer; and at the same time he proclaimed his intention of taking also into his own keeping the offices of high admiral and commander-in-chief of the land forces. He even stretched his prerogative across the Atlantic ocean, and directed quo warrantos against the charters of the proprietors and corporations in the Anglo-American colonies.[1] At home he commissioned a set of "regulators" to interfere still further with the corporations, and he attempted, through the lords lieutenants of counties, to exact engagements from the freeholders not to oppose the repeal of the penal laws and Test Act, but to support all his majesty's measures.

Mary of Este had had repeated miscarriages, but had never borne a living child to continue and complete the great work of Catholic conversion. The papists, who could not do otherwise than look with sad misgivings to a Protestant successor in the person of Mary, the wife of the Prince of Orange, the real head of the Protestant interests, had long been offering prayers and vows to Heaven; but at last the pilgrimage made by James during this summer to St. Winifred's Well in Wales, and the votive gifts of the queen and her mother to the shrine of Loretto, were supposed to have had their effect; and at the end of the year, on the 23d of December, the queen's pregnancy was announced in the Gazette, together with an order for a day of thanksgiving for the same. Every thing which the king had been doing had tended to alarm and irritate the Prince of Orange and his wife; but this prospect of a Catholic heir male vastly increased their discontent, and gave a new energy to the intrigues of the cautious but resolute William. But not merely their partisans, but nearly every Protestant in England, declared from the beginning that a trick was planned to defraud the Princess Mary of her rights: and the proclamation in the Gazette was treated with ribaldry and indecent wit, which gave a fresh bitterness to the temper of the king.[1]

[1] Books of Privy Council, as cited by Dalrymple.

[1] Early in December surmises of imposture had begun to circulate at court: and in the middle of the same month the queen's symptoms were represented by the physicians as still ambiguous, in letters which (in the cautious words of Sir James Mackintosh) the careful balance of facts on both sides, and the cautious abstinence from a decisive opinion, seemed to exempt from the suspicion of bad faith. The statements were signed by Sir Charles Scarborough, and another physician whose name Mackintosh is unable to decipher. On the 15th of January Lord Clarendon remarked "that it was strange to see how the queen's pregnancy was everywhere ridiculed, as if scarce anybody believed it to be true." But Clarendon, of course, would not very willingly believe in its truth, for he was one of the chiefs of the high-church party, and, what was more, uncle to the two Protestant princesses, Mary and Anne. Nor could the latter lady, though present at court, be altogether a dispassionate observer. In the month of March, Anne wrote to her sister Mary—"I can not help thinking Mansell's wife's (i. e., the queen's) great belly is a little suspicious. It is true, indeed she is very big, but she looks better than ever she did, which is not usual; for people when they are so far gone, for the most part, look very ill. . . . (There are several things in the correspondence of this royal lady that would shock moral decency.) Her being so positive it will be a son, and the principles of that religion being such that they will stick at nothing, be it never so wicked, if it will promote their interest, give some cause to fear there may be foul play intended. I will do all I can to find it out if it be so." A few days after Anne asks her sister to let her know what she would have her friends in England to do "if any alteration should come by a son being produced." "Methinks," she continues, "if it were not a feigned pregnancy, there having been so many stories and jests made about it, she should, to convince the world, make either me or some of my friends feel her belly; but, quite contrary, whenever one talks of her being with child, she looks as if she were afraid one should touch her and whenever I have happened to be in the room as she has been undressing, she has always gone in the next room to put on her smock. These things give me so much cause of suspicion, that I believe when she is brought to bed nobody will be convinced 'tis her child except it prove a daughter. For my part I declare I shall not except I see the child and she parted." Copies of these curious letters, taken from the originals by Dr. Birch, were given to Sir John Dalrymple by the Earl of Hardwick, and were published by Dalrymple, in his Appendix. The pope's nuncio expressed to his court his satisfaction at the pregnancy, as likely to tend "to the reëstablishment of the Catholic religion in these kingdoms," and in the month of February, he had pronounced to her majesty the solemn benediction of the pontiff upon an occasion so auspicious to the church. Barillon, the French ambassador, on the other hand, had reported to Louis "that the pregnancy was not believed to be true in London; and that, in the country, those who spread the intelligence were laughed at." With the Protestant English time [illegible] but increase the foul suspicion and even the loyal Evelyn [illegible] intimates his doubts.

A.D. 1688. At a moment when the nation was filled with doubt and dread as to the king's extreme intentions, and when it was universally admitted that he who had invaded, or was invading the constitution in its most vital parts, was not to be trusted in any thing, James, upon the 27th of April, not only published a new declaration of indulgence, but also commanded all the clergy to read it in their churches. This was the spark that set fire to the train which had been accumulating for many months. "By this," says the Princess Anne, writing to her sister in Holland, "one may easily guess what one is to hope for henceforward, since the priests have so much power with the king as to make him do things so directly against the laws of the land, and, indeed, contrary to his own promises. It is a melancholy prospect that all we of the church of England have. All the sectaries may now do what they please. Every one has the free exercise of their religion, on purpose, no doubt, to ruin us, which, I think, to all impartial judges is very plain. For my part, I expect every minute to be spoke to about my religion, and wonder very much I have heard nothing of it yet." Many churchmen would have obeyed even this mandate, and colored their obedience with the dogma of non-resistance, but the majority were resolved not to read the declaration. Six of the bishops, and no more, Lloyd of St. Asaph, Ken of Bath and Wells, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, White of Peterborough, and Trelawney of Bristol, met the primate Sancroft at his palace at Lambeth; and there, on the 18th of May, with the assent of the ex-minister, Lord Clarendon, and of Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Patrick, Tennyson, Grove, and Sherlock, esteemed the best preachers and writers in the church, it was privately resolved that a petition prepared and written by Sancroft, the primate, should be forthwith presented to his majesty. The six bishops (Archbishop Sancroft being sick) undertook to deliver the petition in person, and at about ten o'clock in the evening they knelt before the monarch at Whitehall. "This," said James, "is my lord of Canterbury's handwriting." The petition humbly showed that the great aversion of the clergy to distribute and publish in their churches the late declaration for liberty of conscience proceeded neither from any want of duty and obedience to his majesty, nor yet from any want of tenderness to dissenters, in relation to whom they were willing to come to such a temper as should be thought fit, when the matter should be considered and settled in parliament and convocation; but that, among many other considerations, they demurred because that declaration was founded upon a dispensing power which had been often declared illegal in parliament; and because in a matter of so great moment and consequence they could not in prudence, honor, or conscience, make themselves parties to it in the manner required by the king, but must most humbly and earnestly beseech his majesty not to insist upon their distributing and reading the said declaration. When he had read and coolly folded up this paper, James said, with disdain and anger, "This is a great surprise to me. Here are strange words. I did not expect this from you. This is a standard of rebellion." Lloyd of St. Asaph, who was the boldest of the bishops, and who had handed the paper to the king, replied, "We have adventured our lives for your majesty, and would lose the last drop of our blood rather than lift up a finger against you." "I tell you," rejoined James, "this is a standard of rebellion. I never saw such an address." Then Trelawney of Bristol fell upon his knees and said, "Rebellion, sir! I beseech your majesty not to say any thing so hard of us. For God's sake do not believe we are or can be guilty of rebellion!" ("It deserves remark," says Mackintosh, in his mild manner, "that the two bishops who uttered these loud and vehement protestations were the only prelates present who were conscious of having harbored projects of more decisive resistance.") The bishops of Chichester and Ely professed their unshaken loyalty, and were afterward true to their profession. Ken of Bath and Wells said, pathetically, "Sir, I hope you will give that liberty to us which you allow to all mankind." James kept muttering, "Is this what I have deserved from the church of England? I will remember you who have signed this paper; I will keep this paper; I will not part with it; I did not expect this; I will be obeyed." "God's will be done!" ejaculated Ken in a low voice. "What's that?" exclaimed the enraged king. Ken and his brethren only repeated "God's will be done!" James then dismissed them with violent and incoherent language. "If I think fit to alter my mind," said he, "I will send to you. I tell you God has given me this dispensing power, and I will maintain it. I tell you there are seven thousand men, and of the church of England too, that have not bowed the knee to Baal." On the morrow, as he was on his way to mass, he met the Bishop of St. David's. "My lord," cried he, "your brethren have presented the most seditious paper that ever was penned. It is a trumpet of rebellion." And he frequently repeated a saying of Lord Halifax, that his father, Charles the First, had suffered for the church, and not the church for him. Before this time the bishops' petition was before the world; by means not clearly explained it had been printed and circulated in the night. In the course of a few days six more bishops, London, Norwich, Gloucester, Salisbury, Winchester, and Exeter, publicly declared their concurrence with the petitioners; and the Bishop of Carlisle lamented that his not being in the province of Canterbury prevented his subscribing. On Sunday, the 20th of May, the day appointed for the first reading of the declaration in London, only seven out of a hundred clergymen obeyed the order; and those who obeyed did so with fear and trembling, being groaned at by the people. On the following Sunday there were not more signs of obedience in this respect: a newly-appointed reader at the chapel royal was so much agitated that he could not read the declaration so as to be heard. None were bold on the king's side except bishops Sprat, Cartwright, Crewe and Watson. In the provinces the mass of the clergy were quite as disobedient as in London; and it is said that of the entire number in the kingdom, being more than ten thousand, not more than two hundred in all complied with the royal will. The nuncio clearly saw the danger. "The whole church," says he, "espouses the cause of the bishops. There is no reasonable expectation of a division among the Anglicans, and our hopes from the Non-conformists are vanished."

To advance or retreat was now about equally dangerous. James resolved to advance, notwithstanding the misgivings of Jeffreys, who spoke of moderate counsels, and declared that some men would drive the king to destruction.[1] After some anxious deliberation, in which Sunderland wavered, it was resolved to prosecute the bishops in the Court of King's Bench. Previously, on the 8th of June, they were summoned before the privy council, to answer a charge of high misdemeanor. The prelates attended at Whitehall, and were received by the king with a show of graciousness. The chancellor (Jeffreys) asked the archbishop whether the petition which was shown to him was not written by him. Sancroft, turning to the king, answered, "Sir, I am called hither as a criminal, which I never was before; since I have that unhappiness, I hope your majesty will not be offended if I am cautious of answering questions which may tend to accuse myself." "This is chicanery," said James; "I hope you will not deny your own handwriting." Sancroft rejoined, that he knew the only reason for putting the question was to draw an answer which might be made a ground of accusation; and Lloyd of St. Asaph added, that all divines were agreed that no man in their situation was obliged to answer such questions. Yet still James impatiently pressed the archbishop to acknowledge his writing. "Sir," said Sancroft, "though not obliged to answer, yet, if your majesty commands it, we are willing to obey, trusting to your justice and generosity that we shall not suffer for our obedience." James said he would not command. Jeffreys told them to withdraw for a while. On being called back to the council-chamber they were commanded by the king to answer; and then they owned the petition. They were again sent out of the room, and on their third return they were told by Jeffreys that they would be proceeded against, not by the ecclesiastical commission (which had become as impotent as it was odious), but "with all fairness in Westminster Hall." Jeffreys then desired them to enter a recognizance to appear. The bishops said they would appear without a recognizance, and insisted on their privilege as peers not to be bound by recognizance in misdemeanor. The dispute on this point ended in a warrant committing them to the Tower, which was signed by all the privy councilors present except Lord Berkeley and Father Petre. Never since the first introduction of the miter was episcopacy so popular as on that day. "The concern of the people," says Evelyn, an eye-witness, "was wonderful; infinite crowds on their knees begging their blessing, and praying for them as they passed." They were conveyed from Whitehall by water. As they took boat they were followed by the tears and prayers of thousands, and some persons ran into the river to implore a blessing on the captives. Both banks of the Thames were lined with multitudes, who fell on their knees beseeching Heaven to protect the sufferers for religion and liberty. The very soldiers in the Tower acted as mourners; nay, even the Non-conformists, who had felt all the bitterness of episcopal persecution, sent a deputation of ten of their ministers to wait upon and condole with the prisoners. The king was so incensed at this last proceeding that he personally reprimanded the ten Non-conformist ministers, who boldly told him that they could not but adhere to the bishops, as men constant to the Protestant religion. Nor was there wanting other comfort to the captives in the Tower: twenty-eight peers were ready to bail them if they should require bail; messages were brought over from Holland, assuring them that the Prince and Princess of Orange took a lively interest in their fate, and approved of their firmness; and one or two of the bishops (Lloyd of St. Asaph, and perhaps Trelawney of Bristol) were not without expectations that the Prince of Orange would take them out of the Tower.

[1] Jeffreys was clearly in a fright. He even made offers of service to the bishops through Lord Clarendon.

On the other side, James was buoyed up by encouragements, and promises of assistance in arms, men, and money, from Louis XIV.; and, unmindful of the energetic character of the people who had brought his father to the block, he persevered in his fatal course, and assumed language more haughty and insolent than ever. On the 15th of June the bishops were brought before the court of King's Bench by a writ of habeas corpus. As they were going out of their prison, Sir Edward Hales, the lieutenant of the Tower, demanded fees. He would not have had that place in those times if he had been a man of humane and gentle feelings: he had treated his prisoners churlishly; and when they refused to give him the money, he said, in his passion, that the fees were a compensation for the irons with which he might have loaded them, and the naked dungeon into which he might have thrown them. The bishops answered, "We lament the king's displeasure, but every other man loses his breath that attempts to intimidate us." They proceeded up the river and landed near Westminster Hall. "Of the immense concourse of people," says the nuncio, "who received them on the bank, and followed them to the Hall, the greater part fell upon their knees, wishing them happiness, and asking their blessing; and the Archbishop of Canterbury laid his hands on those that were nearest, telling them to be firm in their faith: and the people cried aloud that all should kneel; and tears were seen to flow from the eyes of many."[1] Within the court the bishops found the peers who offered to be their sureties, and a crowd of gentlemen attached to their interests, or to the cause of liberty, which could hardly fail of being benefited by their resistance. The attorney-general moved that the information against them, charging them with a seditious libel, should be read, and that the bishops should plead forthwith. The counsel for the prelates, among whom was John Somers, objected to reading the information, because the prisoners were not legally before the court; because the warrant, though signed by privy councilors, was not stated to be issued by them in that capacity; and, thirdly, because the bishops, as peers of parliament, could not be committed for a libel. But, after long debate, the court overruled these objections, and the bishops pleaded. Their plea was, "Not guilty:" the court offered to take bail for their appearance to take their trial in a fortnight; but this they refused, and they were at last enlarged on their own recognizances, of £200 for the archbishop, and £100 for each of the bishops. As the prelates left the court they were again surrounded by multitudes who begged their blessing; and this was accompanied and followed by loud huzzas, the joyful ringing of the Abbey bells, and execrations against Sprat and Cartwright, and all false bishops. In the evening bonfires were lighted in the streets, and some outrages committed upon Roman Catholics.

On the 29th of June the bishops again entered Westminster Hall, surrounded by lords and gentlemen, and followed by blessings and prayers. The king made no doubt of getting a verdict; for he thought all the judges were his slaves, and, by means of Sir Samuel Astrey, he fancied he had made sure of a subservient jury. But "how secure soever the king and chancellor thought themselves of the judges, and though Sir Robert Wright, chief justice, and Sir Richard Allibone, a known papist, were two of them, yet they were not all of a piece; for Mr. Justice Powell both learnedly and stoutly defended the bishops' cause."[1] Holloway, who had been placed on the bench purposely to betray the law, backed out of his engagement to the king, and spoke also in favor of the bishops. The attorney-general disclaimed all attack on the prelates in their episcopal character, and artfully left out their disobedience in refusing to read the declaration. "The bishops," said he, "are accused of censuring the government, and giving their opinion about affairs of state." This was a strange crime to be imputed to Englishmen—to peers of England. But the court lawyer went on to show that it was really a heinous offense. "No man," said he, "may say of the great officers of the kingdom, far less of the king, that they act unreasonably; for that may beget a desire of reformation, and the last age will abundantly show whither such a desire doth tend." But now the doctrines of the divine right of kings and of passive obedience were in abeyance; and the attorney-general's sentiment found no echo in that crowded court. Witnesses, though secured by the crown, would scarcely open their lips against the prisoners; and at every check sustained by the chief justice or by the counsel for the crown the audience shouted for joy or laughed. At a certain stage of the proceedings the minister Sunderland was unexpectedly called upon to give his evidence. He was so alarmed that he caused himself to be carried through Westminster in a sedan-chair, the head of which was down; but he was recognized by the mob, who hooted, hissed, and cried out "Popish dog!" He entered the court pale and trembling, and, with eyes bent on the ground, deposed that the bishops came to him with a petition to the king, which he declined to read, and that he introduced them immediately to his majesty, and nothing more. While this was doing, the counsel for the bishops resolved to take their stand on the illegality of the king's dispensing power, and on the lawful right of

[1] Estratti delle lettere, etc. (in Mackintosh, Appendix.) In the next paragraph of this letter the nuncio says, "His majesty told me the other day that they wrote to him from Holland, that there were strong signs of the Prince of Orange's meditating to put into execution his perverse designs, under the pretext of religion, aiming particularly at this country (havendo in mira questa parte). I answered, that I hoped that, when the news of the birth of a Prince of Wales should arrive there, it would make the Prince of Orange change his language, and dissipate the machinations of his majesty's enemies abroad as well as those of his enemies at home."

[1] Roger Coke. This observer of the trial was struck by some very dramatic mutations. "If we down to the bar," says he, "we shall see as strange a mixture as on the bench; for the late Attorney-General Sawyer, and Solicitor Finch, who were so zealous to find my Lord Russell, Colonel Sidney, Mr. Cornish, &c., guilty of high treason, and for surrender of charters, now they are turned out, are as zealous for the acquittal of the bishops; and the then solicitor-general, of a most zealous prosecutor of abhorrers, and searcher into the bottom of the popish plot, now as zealous for finding the misdemeanor."

the subjects to petition. The chief justice, speaking aside with his brethren on the bench, said, "I must not suffer them to dispute the king's power of suspending laws;" but Judge Powell answered, "They must touch that point; for if the king hath no such power—as clearly he hath not—the petition is no attack on the king's legal power, and therefore no libel." And the bishops' counsel, continuing their argument, tore this new assumption of the prerogative into tatters; and, in the end, Powell, regardless of the menaces of his superiors on the bench, laid it down as a maxim, that "if such a dispensing power be allowed, there will need no parliament; all the legislature will be in the king." The trial had begun at nine o'clock in the morning, and it was seven in the evening when the jury retired to consider their verdict. As they remained long absent the court was adjourned to nine the next morning, and the jurymen were locked up all that time. At six o'clock in the morning the single but obstinate opposition of one Arnold, who was brewer to the king, was subdued; and at nine o'clock, when the court opened, Sir Robert Langley, the foreman, pronounced the verdict, "Not guilty." Then there arose a loud huzza from the noblemen, gentlemen, and people within the court, which anon was echoed back by a louder huzza from those without, which sounded like a crack of the ancient roof of Westminster Hall, and which was passed on from group to group to Temple Bar, and unto the heart of the city. There was a lane of people to the waterside, all on their knees as the bishops passed and repassed, to beg their blessing. The delivered prelates bade them fear God and honor the king. As the obnoxious Cartwright went from the hall to his carriage the people shouted, A wolf in sheep's clothing! and, as he was very fat, some of them, inclined to be witty, cried out, room! room for the man with a pope in his belly! No fewer than sixty earls and lords were among those who rejoiced with heart and voice at this acquittal; money was thrown among the mob to drink the healths of the king, the bishops, and the jury, to which toasts the people spontaneously joined, Confusion to the papists! At night London was again lighted from one end to the other with blazing bonfires, and, to the ringing of all the church bells, the pope was burned in effigy before the windows of the king's palace. There were insults and gross ribaldry and threats used toward some of the most noted papists; but no blood was shed except that of a parish-beadle, and he was shot by the servants of Lord Salisbury, a recent convert to the church of Rome, who at their master's commands went out to quench a bonfire opposite his house. On the critical morning James was at Hounslow Heath, reviewing his army. That "very rebellion in noise," which arose from the vast capital, soon ran to the very camp, where it was echoed back by what seemed a universal shout. James, it is said, was startled, and asked Lord Feversham the meaning of that noise. The general replied that it was nothing but the soldiers shouting for the acquittal of the bishops. "And call you that nothing?" said James—"but so much the worse for them."

In the midst of these stormy transactions "the son of prayer" was brought into the world. On the 10th of June, two days after the sending of the bishops to the Tower, upon Trinity Sunday, between the hours of nine and ten in the morning, the queen was delivered, in presence of the queen dowager, several ladies of quality—among whom, however, the vigilant Princess Anne was not present—and of most of the privy council, the usual witnesses on such occasions; but the Archbishop of Canterbury was absent. Some of these actual witnesses were Protestants, some papists; and Dr. Chamberlain, the eminent obstetrical practitioner, who was sent for, was not only a Protestant, but a noted Whig, who had experienced the persecuting humor of the king. The parturition was a fine, healthy boy. Instantly the cannons of the Tower were set firing; a general thanksgiving was ordered, and the lord mayor was enjoined to provide bonfires and other public rejoicings. But there were no bonfires now except for the bishops; and at once the whole affair was pronounced to be a gross imposture and a verification of all the suspicions which had been entertained since the first announcement of Mary d'Este's pregnancy, and the first boast of the papists that a Catholic heir-male was assuredly coming. The indisputable presence in the bed of a promising child was accounted for in a variety of ways; the story most generally received was, that it had been adroitly conveyed thither in the interior of a warming-pan.[1] By order of council a solemn day of thanksgiving was appointed, and a form of prayer was set forth to be used on the following Sunday in all churches and chapels within the cities of London and Westminster and ten miles round, and by the 1st of July next in all other places throughout the kingdom. Letters were sent to announce the birth to the lords-lieutenants of counties, signed by Jeffreys, Sunderland, and the lords Bath, Powis, Middleton, Craven, Castlemaine, Dover, and Dartmouth:[2] and on the 29th of June an order of council was issued for inserting the name of the Prince of Wales in the Common Prayer-book.[3] But still the Protestant unbelief continued unshaken; the pains taken to dissipate it increased it; and accidental circumstances were laid hold of by the national antipathy and credulity. On the night when fireworks were let off the sky was black and gloomy, except when vivid lightning made the artificial fire ineffectual: this, according to the populace, was a clear sign of the wrath of the Almighty, at the imposture put upon the Protestant heirs to the throne. At the same time it was believed by many of the mob that, under the color of rejoicing and feux de

It may be it is our brother, but God only knows, for she never took care to satisfy the world, or give people any demonstration of it. It is wonderful, if she had really been with child, that nobody was suffered to feel it stir but Madame Mazarine and Lady Sunderland, who are people that nobody will give credit to."—Letter from Princess Anne to her sister, in Dalrymple, App. [2] Ellis's Letters.

joie, it was intended to bombard the city of London for its lively demonstrations upon the deliverance of the bishops.

The eyes of the Protestants were now never turned from the Prince of Orange, and Tories as well as Whigs looked to William as their only hope. And if that prince were invited by friends and admirers on the one side, he was not less impelled into the course he took by enemies on the other. Louis XIV. had heaped every possible injury and insult upon him; and his father-in-law, James, from whom at one time he had expected countenance and assistance, had become the vassal of the overbearing monarch of France. The courts of Madrid and Vienna were equally exasperated against Louis, and, having failed in gaining over James, they were ready to favor any project against him; and it became a general axiom of state, that the downfall of this worst of the Stuarts was essential to the welfare and independence of Europe. We can touch but lightly on the intrigues and by-paths by which the great plan was pursued; but we may observe, generally, that on all sides there was a wonderful deficiency of honor, principle, and spirit. Count Zuleystein, who was sent ambassador by the States to felicitate James upon the birth of a son, returned in a few weeks with an invitation, in form, from a great number of noblemen and gentlemen, for the Prince of Orange to come over with an armed force to call the legitimacy of the child in question, and redress the grievances of the nation. Officers of the army and navy, men in high civil trusts and employments, even personal friends and favorites of the king, joined secretly in the prayer to William, and every secret of the court and government was betrayed to the prince and his emissaries. Even Sunderland, seeing the inevitable convulsion, prepared for his own safety by betraying his imbecile master. Admiral Russell, the cousin of the late Lord Russell, and Vice-admiral Herbert, bold and experienced seamen, encouraged the discontents of the navy; and, after carrying on a furtive correspondence, going and coming between England and Holland, Herbert threw off the mask, and took refuge with the Prince of Orange, who, from that moment, forbade any mention of the young Prince of Wales in the prayers used in his chapel for the royal family of England. The vice-admiral was soon followed by the brave and indefatigable Lord Mordaunt, who pressed William to an immediate expedition into England; by the Earl of Shrewsbury, who threw up his regiment, mortgaged his estate for £40,000, and offered his sword and his money to the prince; and by other men of name and influence from Scotland as well as from England.

Fletcher of Saltoun, who since the unfortunate affair at Lyme had been serving as a volunteer in Hungary, hastened to Holland to be ready with his sword and his counsels; and, generally, the Protestant lords and gentlemen who had been obliged to fly to the continent flocked to William with reviving hopes that through his means they might recover their property and their homes, and restore liberty and Protestantism to their country. A regular intercourse was established between London, Edinburgh, Dublin, and the Hague. In England this was chiefly managed by Lord Danby, the Earl of Manchester, and the friend of the unfortunate Russell, Lord Cavendish, now Earl of Devonshire; in Scotland by Lord Stair, his son, Sir John Dalrymple, the Lord Drumlanrig, son to the Duke of Queensberry, and General Douglas, that duke's brother. But to few was William more indebted than to the Lord and Lady Churchill, who had tasted, to an unusual degree, of James's favor and bounty. Henry Sidney, brother to the republican Algernon, Hampden, and others who had felt like him the weight of the perverted laws, determined to run one more risk, and were active and eager like men that knew this must be their last cast. Secret meetings were held in various places to mature the scheme. One of the most conspicuous was the old mansion called Lady Place, or Hurley House, which is situated on one of the most picturesque windings of the Thames between Maidenhead and Henley. According to the tradition, there, in a gloomy Norman vault, which had once been the burying-place of the Benedictine friars, to whom the house belonged, the great movers of the Revolution held their secret consultations,[1] and signed the papers transmitted to the Prince of Orange.

Favored not less by events and circumstances on the continent, which completely covered his design till it was ripe for execution, than by the almost unanimous feeling of impatience at the tyranny of the government in England, William drove on his preparations for an actual invasion, and by the month of August he had collected fifteen thousand land troops, a fleet of seventy sail, a capital train of artillery, flat-bottomed boats for effecting a landing, and all other materials and provisions necessary. From the state of the continent it was easy for him to make it appear that these preparations were intended merely for the defense of Holland and her allies against France. The Elector of Brandenburg, the Elector of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, other German princes confederating against Louis XIV. and the governor of the Spanish Netherlands, all played into William's hands, and helped to conceal the real destination of the armament. With his usual silence and caution, William intrusted the particulars of his design to five or six persons at most. The king of France sometimes thought that William meant to attack his ally, the king of Denmark, sometimes that the blow was merely intended against the liberties of Holland; and the king of Eng-

[1] The circumstance is recorded in an inscription on the wall of the vault. After mentioning the foundation of the monastery of Lady Place at the Norman Conquest, it goes on: "Be it also remembered, that in this place six hundred years afterward, the Revolution of 1688 was begun. This house was then in the possession of the family of Lord Lovelace; by whom private meetings of the nobility were assembled in the vault; and it is said that several consultations for calling in the Prince of Orange were held in this recess. On which account this vault was visited by that powerful prince after he had ascended the throne." Lord Lovelace was rewarded by King William with the post of Captain of the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners. He was probably not the less disposed to revolution from being in embarrassed circumstances. A short account of Lady Place, with correct views of the house and vaults, is given in the Penny Magazine, No. 377, for February, 1838. We copy these views on the opposite page.

land believed that the fleet and army were intended against France. Attempts, however, were not wanting to warn James of his danger: but Sunderland, who had the command of the foreign correspondence, is said to have concealed these communications from his master. By every party recourse was had to a wholesale system of lying and deception, for in this "glorious revolution" nothing was glorious but the result. When James wrote to his daughter, the Princess of Orange, to complain of their no longer praying for the Prince of Wales, that lady answered that the omission had arisen out of a mistake or negligence, and she said other things to dispel her father's suspicions. Even Louis XIV., who had a game of his own to play, and who was ready enough to sacrifice the king of England, if by so doing he could gain more than by supporting him, shifted and changed his position and professions, and bewildered and deluded that woful blunderer, who never had head enough to govern a society of monks, much less a nation. But at last—about the middle of September—it suited Louis to impart by letter positive information about the intended invasion. The contemptible tyrant turned pale and stood motionless; the letter dropped from his hand and womanly tears from his eyes. At the same time Louis made an offer of French ships and French troops; but everybody near James advised him to reject this perilous assistance, and he rejected it accordingly. Yet, as soon as he had done so, he repented, and clandestinely begged Louis to keep a fleet and army ready for him at Brest. A few days before this the Duke of Berwick, one of his illegitimate children, attempted to introduce a number of Irish Catholics into his regiment; and, because the lieutenant-colonel and the officers would not receive this illegal reinforcement, the king sent a troop of horse to bring them before him, and cashiered them all. This proceeding had the worst possible effect upon the army, among which vehement Protestant pamphlets and broadsheets had long been circulated in spite of all the precautions of the Catholic party. When too late, James attempted to disarm the animosity of his people by concessions; he even condescended to consult the Protestant bishops whom he had so recently persecuted; he replaced the Protestant deputy-lieutenants and magistrates; he stopped the quo warranto war against municipal institutions; he gave back to the city of London its old charter; he restored Compton, the bishop of London, to his episcopal jurisdiction; and, though under present circumstances, he said that he was obliged to revoke the writs for the meeting of parliament in November, in his proclamation for that purpose, he spoke most respectfully of parliaments as the best means of settling all differences. On the 3d of October, the Archbishop of Canterbury and eight bishops waited upon the king, presented him with their advice in writing, and sought to bring him back "to the religion in which he had been baptized and educated." But just at this critical moment the infant whose birth had hurried on the storm was baptized, with great pomp, according to the rites of the church of Rome, the pope, represented by his nuncio, being the godfather. The baptism of James Francis Edward, with the particulars of the ceremony, was madly published in the Gazette, and added fresh elements to the tempest. A few days after, when there was "a wonderful expectation of the Dutch fleet," and when the bastardy of the unlucky child was sung in scurrilous songs in the streets of London, James summoned an extraordinary council, at which were present the Archbishop of Canterbury, the judges, the lord mayor, the queen dowager, and all the lords and ladies who had been present at the queen-consort's labor and delivery. "The procedure," says Evelyn, "was censured by some as below his majesty to condescend to on the talk of the people; and it was remarkable that, on this occasion, the archbishop, the Marquis of Halifax, and the earls of Clarendon and Nottingham refused to sit at the council-table among papists, and their bold telling his majesty that whatever was done while such sat among them was unlawful and incurred premunire—at least if what I heard be true."[1] "I have called you together," said James, "upon a very extraordinary occasion, but extraordinary diseases must have extraordinary remedies. The malicious endeavors of my enemies have so poisoned the minds of some of my subjects, that, by the reports I have from all hands, I have reason to believe that many do think this son, which God has pleased to bless me with, to be none mine, but a supposed child. But, I may say that, by a particular Providence, scarce any prince was born where there were so many persons present." He then caused to be examined upon oath upward of forty witnesses, including twenty-two females, some of them waiting-women about the queen, some ladies of the highest rank, and nineteen noblemen, gentlemen, and physicians. As far as evidence for such a case could go, their depositions, which were enrolled in chancery, proved that the queen had been delivered of the child in the regular manner; but the nation would not be bound by the common rules of evidence. The Princess Anne, who seems never to have called the child Prince of Wales but once, when she fancied it was dying, avoided by a trick being present at this truly extraordinary council to which she had been invited, though she had not witnessed the birth. By the king's orders some of the lords waited upon her with a copy of the evidence. "My lords," said Anne, "this was not necessary, the king's word is more to me than all these depositions:" and yet, according to her own uncle, the Protestant Clarendon, Anne continued to talk of the birth of the boy with bitter derision. "And the truth is," says the quick-sighted Barillon, "she favors the party of the Prince of Orange as much as she dares without openly declaring herself." At this moment Sunderland was suddenly dismissed. "It is conceived," says Evelyn, "that he had of late grown remiss in pursuing the interests of the Jesuitical counsels; some reported one thing, some another; but there was doubtless some secret betrayed which time may discover." The fallen minister told Barillon that his sole offense was seeing things as they were—in extremity; but James told the adroit Frenchman, from whom he had just received a hundred thousand crowns, that Sunderland "was afraid;" that he thwarted and offended his majesty's most faithful servants, and that his services were no longer satisfactory. Sunderland soon went over to Holland and carried all his state secrets with him.

[1] Diary, 29th October. On the preceding day there had been a tumult in the city, where the rabble demolished a popish chapel which had been recently set up. The same diarist notices that, on the 14th of October, the king's birthday, no guns were fired from the Tower as usual, that the sun was eclipsed at its rising. "This day," he says, "was signalized for the victory of William the Conqueror, near Battle, in Sussex." It appears that people were expecting upon that anniversary the landing of William Prince of Orange.

Before this selfish politician got to the Hague, the Prince of Orange was safe in England, the game was up, and Sunderland's treachery no longer worth the purchase. Yet the first move seemed inauspicious. On Friday, October the 16th, William embarked with Count Solmes, Count Stourm, Marshal Schomberg, Bentinck, Overkirk, and many British noblemen and gentlemen. His ship bore the flag of England and his own arms, with this motto—"I will maintain the Protestant religion and the liberties of England." The whole fleet weighed anchor during the night, and stood over for the English coast; but the winds, which had been so long contrary, veered round to the old quarter, and blew such a hurricane that the immense fleet was driven from its course, scattered, and materially injured. William put back into Helvoet, and employed his scouts in collecting the scattered transports. News of this check was soon carried to James, who devoutly said, it was no wonder since the Host had been exposed for several days. But he was deluded as much by Dutch gazettes as by his own superstition. Those papers exaggerated the damage done, so as to make him believe that the expedition would be deferred till the following spring. A declaration from William was already circulated through the country, and a man was taken prisoner in London with various papers and a printed manifesto, and, after an examination before the cabinet council, he was committed to Newgate. There were expressions as if the lords, both spiritual and temporal, had invited him over. "This," says Evelyn, "made his majesty convene my Lord of Canterbury and the other bishops now in town, to give an account of what was in the manifesto, and to enjoin them to clear themselves by some public writing of this disloyal charge." Sancroft, with the bishops of Durham, Chester, and St. David's, expressly denied any such invitation, of which, indeed, they had known nothing; but Compton, the bishop of London, who had subscribed the invitation to the Prince of Orange, said, evasively, "I am confident the rest of the bishops will as readily answer in the negative as myself." James, dreading the men whom he had attempted to crush, mildly requested to have their denial in writing, together with an "abhorrence" of the designs of traitors and of the Prince of Orange, and he dismissed them with an order to draw up such a paper as he might publish to the nation. The prelates were in no hurry to obey, for they expected every day that the landing of the prince would rescue them from the penalties of disobedience and from all fear of James. He urged them on by impatient messages. The prelates at last returned to court and again protested their innocence of treasonable plots. "But," said James, "where is the paper?" The primate replied that they had brought no paper, and that they did not think any was necessary, for since his majesty had been pleased to say that he thought them guiltless, they despised what all the world besides might say. "But," continued James, "I expected a paper—I take it you promised me one." "We assure your majesty," said the bishops, "that scarce one in five hundred believes the manifesto to be the prince's true declaration." "But five hundred," said James, "would bring in the Prince of Orange upon my throat." "God forbid," ejaculated the bishops," who, after some more urging, said, "Truly, sir, this is a business of state which does not properly belong to us;" and Sancroft reminded him of the recent imprisonment of the bishops for touching on matters of state. At this he was exceedingly irritated, and told the archbishop that he was making a mad quarrel.[1] But nothing would move the bishops, great abhorrers as they had been whenever the church was not concerned, to express their abhorrence of the present scheme; and the conference ended in their affirming that, as bishops, they could only pray, but that, as peers, they might serve the king in parliament.[2]

But by this time the lawn sleeves were safe, for the Dutch fleet had passed the straits of Dover, and was steering for the western coast. On the 1st of November, William set sail a second time, and with a fair wind and a brisk gale. He steered for about twelve hours to the northward, in order to create a belief that he intended to land in the north of England. But, as soon as the light English vessels which watched his progress had disappeared, to convey this erroneous information, he tacked about. On the second morning the people on the Kentish coast discovered his fleet, which stretched as far as the eye could see. The English fleet, which had suffered in a recent storm, was lying in the Downs with their yards and topmasts struck, and, from the nature of the wind and other circumstances, they were unable to get to sea or molest the prince with a single shot. James had intrusted the important command to Lord Dartmouth, who was true to him; but more than half the captains had secret engagements with Admiral Herbert; and it is extremely doubtful whether the men would have fought their ships. About noon, the Dutch fleet, amounting in all, in ships of war, transports, and sloops, to nearly seven hundred sail, was off Dover, saluting with their great guns, and gladdening the ears of the spectators with the distant sounds of music. And of the many thousands of English that gathered on the coast to watch its progress there were but few that did not regard it with joy and gratitude. It bore away under light and favorable breezes to the westward, and, on the 4th of November, came safe to anchor at Torbay. William was anxious to land immediately, because that day was the anniversary of his birth and also of his marriage with the Princess Mary of England; but the English rejoiced that the landing could not be effected until the 5th, which was the anniversary of the discovery of the gunpowder treason. William immediately marched with his army to Exeter. He had about fifteen thousand men, of whom some two thousand were

English, Scotch, and Irish Protestants, who had been serving on the continent. The recent butcheries of Jeffreys had left such a dread and horror that few of the people joined the invaders; and the city of Exeter, though it could not resist, did not at first seem to welcome the invaders. The clergy would not attend a sermon preached in the cathedral church by Burnet, who had come over with William; and even the dissenters refused to admit the Scottish preacher, Ferguson, into their meeting-house. This veteran revolutionist called for a hammer, and, saying, "I will take the kingdom of heaven by storm," broke open the door. William's intention had been to march at once into the heart of the kingdom, but he was embarrassed, if not discouraged, by the appearance of lukewarmness and timidity, and he continued more than a week at Exeter close to his shipping, which still lay unmolested by the English fleet. It is stated that he more than once thought of reëmbarking, and that he threatened to publish the names of all those who had invited him over, as a proper reward for their treachery, folly, and cowardice.[1] But, though it might have suited him to make some such threat, we doubt very much whether he ever really entertained any such intention, or despaired of his success.

Meanwhile, James was trembling and wavering, and touching people in London for the king's evil, being assisted therein, not by a Protestant priest, as the law prescribed in those miracles, but by Piten, a Jesuit. If he could have counted on the men he was not without the means of defense. Besides the regular army which had been so long encamped at Hounslow, he had 3000 Irish troops in Chester, nearly 3000 Scottish troops in Carlisle, and the militia of several counties were under arms. But all the common soldiers that were not papists were disaffected, and some of the principal officers were in league with the Prince of Orange and his friends. Lord Colchester, a friend of the late Duke of Monmouth, was the first that openly deserted. He carried with him a few of his men; but Lord Cornbury, son of the Earl of Clarendon, who was lying at Salisbury with three regiments of horse, attempted to go over with all that force. He found unexpected obstacles in the military honor of his subalterns, and was obliged to fly to the prince almost alone; but he was soon followed by most of the men, and the rest were scattered and rendered useless to James. The city of London, meanwhile, was in disorder, and the mob pulled down the nunnery recently opened at St. John's, Clerkenwell. A council of war was called at Whitehall on the 16th of November. The members of it were assured that a parliament would be called as early as possible, and they recommended his majesty to put himself at the head of his faithful army. The little Prince of Wales was sent for safety to Portsmouth, and there was a sudden and great flight of the priests and monks who had occasioned all this calamity. On the morning of the 18th the king set out for the army; but he returned and received an address from the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, some of the bishops, and such of the peers as were in London, who all prayed for the calling of parliament. On the following morning he set out for head-quarters, now at Salisbury, with Barillon, the French ambassador; but, whereever he advanced, he found unequivocal symptoms of disaffection; and, fearing (probably not without reason) to be betrayed into the hands of his son-in-law by his favorite Churchill, he in five days began to retrace his steps toward the capital. Churchill and the Duke of Grafton, one of Charles II.'s illegitimates, went over to the Prince of Orange, who by this time had no cause to complain of lukewarmness, and who, encouraged by risings in his favor in Cheshire, in Derbyshire, and in the North, had advanced from Exeter to Wincanton. Captain Churchill, brother to Lord Churchill, had joined the Dutch fleet with his ship. The king, in the midst of these difficulties, was visited by a violent bleeding of the nose, and, if he had ever had any courage, he was now wholly deserted by it. As he was retreating from his own army he stopped on the evening of the 24th at Andover, where he invited his son-in-law, Prince George of Denmark, and the young Duke of Ormond, whom he had recently gratified with the Order of the Garter, to sup with him. The very next morning both the prince and the duke were missing; they had gone straight from the royal table to horse, and had ridden to the Prince of Orange with Lord Drumlanrig and Mr. Boyle. The illustrious Dane had been wont to say, when he heard of the desertion of any of those whom James had delighted to honor, "Est il possible?" (Is it possible?) The king now said "Est il possible gone too?" But when, on the morrow, he arrived at Whitehall, and found that his daughter Anne had imitated her husband's example, he exclaimed, in an agony and with tears, "God help me! my very children have forsaken me." Anne had absconded from the palace in the night with the fascinating Lady Churchill, who is generally accused of inducing the princess to make up her mind.[1] The two ladies slept in the city at [1] This is the account given, many years after, by Lady Churchill, then Duchess of Marlborough:—"Upon the landing of the Prince of Orange, in 1688, the king went down to Salisbury to his army, and the Prince of Denmark with him; but the news quickly came from thence that the Prince of Denmark had left the king, and was gone over to the Prince of Orange, and that the king was coming back to London. This put the princess into a great fright. She sent for me, told me her distress, and declared, that rather than see her father, she would out at window. This was her expression. A little before a note had been left with me, to inform me where I might find the Bishop of London (who in that critical time absconded) if her royal highness should have occasion for a friend. The princess, on this alarm, immediately sent me to the bishop. I acquainted him with her resolution to leave the court, and to put herself under his care. It was hereupon agreed that, when he had advised with his friends in the city, he should come about midnight, in a hackney-coach, to the neighborhood of the Cock-pit, in order to convey the princess to some place where she might be private and safe. The princess went to bed at the usual time, to prevent suspicion. I came to her soon after; and by the back stairs which went down from her closet, her royal highness, my Lady Fitzharding, and I, with one servant, walked to the coach, where we found the bishop and the Earl of Dorset. They conducted us that night to the bishop's house in the city, and the next day to my Lord Dorset's, at Copt Hall . . . As this flight of the princess to Nottingham has by some been ignorantly, not to say maliciously, imputed to my policy and premeditated contrivance, I thought it necessary to give this short, but exact relation of it. It was a thing sudden and unconcerted, nor hav

the house of Compton, the bishop of London, who, the next morning, with the Earl of Dorset, escorted them to Lord Dorset's mansion at Copt Hall, whence they repaired to the Earl of Northampton's. They afterward went to Nottingham, where a small army of volunteers gathered round the orthodox but unfeeling daughter of James. Compton, the bishop of London, who had been a sailor in his youth, put on his harness again, and rode before the princess with a drawn sword in his hand and with pistols at his saddle-bow. It was considered that the decencies were preserved by Anne's not going directly after her husband to the enemy's camp; but the companion of her flight assures us that the princess did not think herself safe till she saw that she was surrounded by the Prince of Orange's friends. By this time Plymouth had declared for the prince, and so had Bath and Bristol, York and Hull; and all the chief nobility and gentry were flocking to his standard, and aiding in the composition or publication of manifestoes and declarations. The Dutch army was joyfully expected in the ultra-loyal city of Oxford; and the university, to complete their recantation, sent to make William an offer of all their plate. There was a fresh flight of priests, and Jesuits, and court favorites, among whom was the obnoxious Father Petre. All that remained of the council in London were distracted and panic-struck; and Chancellor Jeffreys saw the gallows or a worse death before him. Unmeaning proclamations were issued, and negotiations were set on foot with the Prince of Orange; a general pardon to offenders was passed under the great seal, and promises and professions were lavished to an incredulous and now triumphant people. "Addresses," says Evelyn on the 2d of December, "come up from the fleet not grateful to his majesty; the papists in office lay down their commissions and fly; universal consternation is among them; it looks like a revolution!"

But by this time James himself was convinced that nothing was left to him but flight. The officers of the navy prevented the embarkation of the little Prince of Wales at Portsmouth. The child was brought back to London, and, on the night of the 10th of December, the queen, disguised as an Italian lady, fled with it across the river to Lambeth, lighted on her doleful way by the flames of burning popish chapels. From Lambeth the queen and prince were conveyed in a coach to Gravesend, where they embarked in a yacht, which landed them at Calais. Within twenty-four hours the stupefied king followed them. He canceled the patents for the new sheriffs, with the writs issued for calling a parliament; and, taking away the great seal with him, he fled with Sir Edward Hales across the Thames to Lambeth, throwing the seal into the river as he passed. Relays of horses had been provided by Sheldon, one of the equeries, and they rode with all speed to Feversham, where they embarked in a custom-house hoy. But it blew a strong gale, and the master of the little vessel, seeing that he wanted more ballast, ran into the western end of the Isle of Sheppey, where the people seized the disguised king as a fugitive Jesuit, treated him with proportionable rudeness, and carried him back a prisoner to Feversham. Then he made himself known; told the rabble, who had been calling him "a hatchet-faced Jesuit," that he was their king, procured pen, ink, and paper, wrote a note to Lord Winchelsea, the lieutenant of the county, who hastened to him to rescue him out of the rude hands of that rabble rout of fishermen, sailors, and smugglers, who took his money but refused to let him go. Never, perhaps, did a fallen despot present so miserable a spectacle. His mind was a complete wreck: he alternately implored and threatened; he told the mob that the Prince of Orange was seeking his life, and he screamed for a boat! a boat! that he might escape. When he was conducted by Lord Winchelsea from the public-house to a private house in the town, he fell a-weeping, and deplored his great misfortune in losing a piece of the wood of the true cross, which had belonged to Edward the Confessor. When the news of his capture was carried to the Prince of Orange, who was then at Windsor, the messenger was referred to Burnet, who exclaimed, "Why did you not let him go?"

I any share in it further than obeying my mistress's orders in the particulars I have mentioned; though, indeed, I had reason enough on my own account to get out of the way, Lord Churchill having likewise, at that time, left the king, and gone over to the other party."

As soon as the king's flight from his palace was known in the city, the populace proceeded to very violent extremities, being excited and maddened by all kinds of reports, some if not all of which were invented by those who were managing or favoring this revolution. It was reported, for example, that the Irish part of the now disbanded army had begun a massacre of the Protestants; and this was sufficient to set the bells a-ringing and the beacon-fires blazing in all directions. In this frenzy they destroyed more popish chapels, broke open the houses of some of the foreign ambassadors, and made search for Father Petre and his Jesuits. Petre was safe in France; but the pope's nuncio was fain to disguise himself as a footman. In the midst of this search a wretch fell into their hands, whose life would not have been safe for an instant with any other people in Europe in a similar state of excitement. This was Lord Chancellor Jeffreys, who was found in Wapping, disguised as a sailor. They cudgeled him, it is true, but they drew no knife or mortal weapon against the butcher. With a rare reverence for the forms of justice, they carried him before the lord mayor, who committed him for safety, and at his own request, to the Tower. In the midst of these tumults a provisional government was formed in a council of about thirty of the bishops and peers that were in London; the governor of the Tower was changed; and the Prince of Orange was invited into the capital. This council also ordered Lord Feversham to repair to his helpless master with two hundred of the life-guards and no more, and to leave it to his majesty either to return to his good city of London or to retire to the continent, as he should think fit. The provisional government and the Prince of Orange made no doubt that James would instantly turn his face toward France; but, to the astonishment of all, James, either by choice or compulsion, or through some deceptions practiced upon him, came back to London, and invited his son-in-law, the Prince of Orange, to meet him at Whitehall, that they might there amicably settle the distractions of the nation. But William had certainly no wish for any such interview, and he and his friends were probably alarmed by the commiseration which the Londoners had testified for the fallen sovereign on his passage through the city. What William and his party wanted was the immediate expatriation of the king, which could be converted into a virtual abdication; and to this end they drove, being assisted by some whom James still considered as his personal friends. And, as if to revive that intolerance of all popery to which immeasurably more than to any other cause he owed his ruin, he, on the day of his arrival at Whitehall, went to mass, and then, dining in public, had a Jesuit to say grace.[1] He, however, resumed some of the functions of royalty, and showed no inclination to be gone. To quicken him, four battalions of the Dutch guards and a squadron of horse were marched into Westminster; and James's ex-minister Halifax and the lords Shrewsbury and Delamere waited upon him with a peremptory message. Lord Craven, who was at

Whitehall with a few of the guards, declared that the Dutch should not enter there as long as he had breath in his body; but James had none of the spirit of this octogenarian noble, and resistance was clearly worse than useless. The English guards were withdrawn, and the Dutchmen surrounded the palace. Then Halifax waited upon James, who was in his bed, and coolly told him that he must go to Ham, a house belonging to the Dowager Duchess of Lauderdale, as the Prince of Orange intended to enter London on the following morning. James merely said that Ham was cold and damp, and that he should prefer going to Rochester. As this was a step toward France, he was soon informed that his son-in-law agreed; and about noon on the following day James embarked in the royal barge for Gravesend. He was attended by the lords Arran, Dunbarton, Litchfield, Aylesbury, and Dundee, and followed and watched by a number of Dutch troops in other boats.[1] The people of London almost forgot the past, and many of them were so much affected as to shed tears, and to implore blessings on his dishonored head. That night he slept at Gravesend, and on the morrow he proceeded to Rochester, where he spent four days, still watched by Dutch troops, who, of course, favored rather than obstructed that flight which his fears and every thing he saw and heard urged him to. On the night of the 23d of December he rose from his bed, dressed himself, walked through the garden of the house down to the Medway, and put off in a boat with his natural son the Duke of Berwick, two ex-captains of the navy, and a groom of the chambers. On the following morning he reached a fishing-smack, which had been hired for the voyage, and, passing the guard-ships at the Nore without molestation or challenge, he landed, on the morning of the 25th, at the small town of Ambleteuse. And thus was Britain happily delivered from the perverse and incurable dynasty of the Stuarts, and (in the words of a true though in some respects mistaken patriot, who lived in his exile to rejoice at this revolution) "freed from those pestilential vapors which poisoned it in the late reigns."[1]

CHAPTER II.

THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

HE four terms, Absolutism—Constitutionalism — Republicanism—Democratism—may serve, with a little explanation, to designate the successive stages in the growth of opinion upon the subject of civil government, or the successive forms which Civil Government naturally assumes in a revolution directed by opinion. 1. By Absolutism we understand every form of government in which the whole power of the state is placed in the hands, whether of one person or of a body of persons, not responsible to the rest of the community: its most perfect form may be that of a monarchy, but its principle and essence may equally subsist in an aristocracy or government of nobles, in a theocracy or government of priests, or in any other oligarchy or government by a particular class. And although, again, the absolutism is most perfect when the governing power does not even derive its authority in the first instance from the will of the people, but perpetuates itself either by natural descent or by its own independent nomination or election of its successors, even this is not necessary to constitute its essential character: the Roman dictatorship, for instance, so long as it lasted, was a species of absolutism, although the dictator derived all his power originally from the appointment of the senate; and so is the papal power in modern Rome, although each successive pope owes his elevation to his election by the college of cardinals. The most absolute of despotisms, indeed, might be erected by the widest popular suffrage either exercised once for all at the first institution of the government, or periodically, or as the necessity recurred of making a new delegation of the supreme power. In most long-established absolutisms, however, the government is renewed and continued without any reference to the popular will in that any more than in its other acts; it is an autocracy, or self-instituted, at least self-maintained, power, as well as an absolutism, or uncontrolled and irresponsible power. 2. When an absolute government breaks up, the form into which it always resolves itself in the first stage of the revolution is that which we have called Constitutionalism, and which may be described as an intermixture of the elements of absolutism and of popular control. The absolutism is not extinguished; it is only mitigated or checked. Men do not at once leap forth from those bonds of custom and authority by which they have been held up as well as restrained, but, influenced partly by affection, partly by fear or prudence, partly by mere use and wont, strive to retain as much as they can of the ancient system even while venturing upon a new one. The idea upon which they set to work is, that that system requires to be reformed or lieberalizd, not that it must be destroyed. They do not attempt to remove the absolutism, but only to balance it—to introduce a new force of an opposite kind which, acting in combination with that, shall, as with opposite forces in mechanics, produce what may be called a diagonal or intermediate resultant, or shall correct and guide it, even as the spirit of the horse is not quenched, but only tamed and directed, by the bit that is put in his mouth. As contrasted with the simplicity and headlong, unresisted course of absolutism, this system of government may be styled organized or constitutional; and it may also be so designated with nearly equal propriety as contrasted with the simplicity of the other forms to be presently mentioned: but its distinguishing characteristic is, as we have explained, the intermixture of the two elements or principles of absolutism and popular control. 3. In Republicanism, the next phasis which the revolution assumes, there is no such intermixture: here the principle of absolutism is wholly abandoned and exploded; and the single mainspring of the government is the will of the people, as expressed by the majority. The people are in this form of government what the crown is in an absolute monarchy, or the nobility in an aristocracy. In so far as the moving force is concerned, it is equally simple with any of the forms of absolutism. 4. The last aspect which the revolution turns up we have called, for the want of a better word, Democratism, or, as it may be translated, the sovereignty of the rabble. Properly speaking this is not a form of government at all, but only the morbid exaggeration and abuse of the last-mentioned form, from which it is distinguished by signs of the same kind that distinguish a healthy from a diseased activity in the human mind or frame. As republicanism wholly rejects the absolute principle, so democratism, or rabble sovereignty, renounces even the established regularities of republicanism—those institutions and rules of procedure which tend, even with the widest and most equal and indiscriminate diffusion of political rights, both to maintain the ascendency of worth and intelligence, and to give steadiness to the movement of the vessel of the state. In a republic the popular will is theoretically and ultimately the regulator of public affairs; but it is in fact itself regulated by certain fixed principles which have at all times been the loadstones of the national policy, and is drawn along, as it were, in channels hollowed out for its currents to flow in. But a democratism, wanting all these guiding and restraining influences, is all incoherency, instability, disorder, and violence—in short, is merely republicanism gone mad, and not a government, but an explosive anarchy.

The parallelism is very striking that subsists between these successive developments of the principle of liberalization in Civil Government and the successive developments of the same principle in Religion. Absolutism, Constitutionalism, Republicanism, and Democratism, have their respective representatives in Popery—Protestant National-Churchism—Independency—Fanaticism. We are now speaking, it will be observed, not of forms of church government, but of modes of doctrinal belief. 1. With the papist the authority of the church, whether it be considered to reside in the pope or in general councils, is of the same absolute character with that of the governing power in any political absolutism: it may, when it chooses, profess to found its decrees upon Scripture, or tradition, or custom, or reason, or any other ground it may think most creditable or convenient; but it claims, nevertheless, to stand above even the highest of these things; for the fundamental pretension of the Romish church is nothing less than that it is in the department of theological opinion the one permanent organ or interpreter of the Deity—the power to which is committed the function of declaring his will to men without the liability of being called to account, questioned, or contradicted by any other authority whatsoever. This is the essential and distinguishing character of Romanism. 2. What we have called Protestant National-Churchism differs from Romanism simply in this, that, still maintaining the supreme and absolute authority of the church, it limits the range or jurisdiction of that authority to the interpretation of the written Word of God or the canonical Scriptures. Within this narrower field it attributes the same infallibility to the church that is claimed for it by Romanism itself. It has merely set up a barrier to restrain the absolutism of the church within certain bounds, as constitutionalism in civil government does with absolutism there. In neither case is the absolutism destroyed; it is only subjected to a check or counterpoise. Here the check or antagonist principle is, that all theological truth necessary to be believed is contained in the Holy Scriptures, and that the church, therefore, must ground all its decrees upon that authority. This is, as it were, the consent of the House of Commons, which is made necessary in constitutional governments to enable a law to be passed by the sovereign. But still the church remains the sole interpreter of the language of Scripture; and in that act of interpretation its authority is uncontrolled and supreme. This principle both the Church of England and the Church of Scotland hold against Independency, as stoutly as they do the other principle of the sufficiency of the Scriptures against Popery. 3. The distinguishing principle of Independency, again, under which term may be comprehended the chief descriptions of Protestant Dissent, is the right of the private interpretation of the Scriptures. In this scheme the element of absolutism is wholly extinguished, in the same manner as it is in the form of civil government to which we have given the name of Republicanism. The authority of the church, that is, of the clergy, goes here for nothing. Independency, indeed, recognizes no church, in the sense in which that term is understood and used both by Popery and by Protestant National-Churchism. Advancing from the ground taken up by the latter to a still higher station in the ascent of liberalism, it proclaims not only the sufficiency of Scripture as interpreted by the church, but its sufficiency as interpreted by the private judgment of every individual. It makes every Christian man in this sense a church to himself. 4. But Fanaticism, which we do not here use at all as a term of obloquy or disparagement, goes a stage still beyond Independency, discarding even the principle of confining itself to the interpretation of Scripture, and asserting the right of each individual to make up his creed not only from that, but also from such visions or private inspirations as he may suppose himself to have been specially favored with from Heaven. It thus resembles the most transcendental liberalism in civil government, or that which we have called Democratism, in rejecting all restraint or guidance whatsoever, and reducing matters to such a state that the chances are against so many as even any two individuals being of the same religion. It is Independency, as that is Republicanism, run wild in the fullness of freedom and power.

One thing is well worth noting in regard to this course which the spirit both of civil and of religious liberalism is destined to run when it is once set a-going. How strongly does that in which it ends resemble that from which it began! After all, one kind of Absolutism has only been exchanged for another—that of the monarch, or the aristocracy, or the priesthood, for that of each individual's own will and fancy. As Democratism makes each man a king to himself, so Fanaticism makes each man a pope to himself. No sort of government has ever been found long practicable under the former, even with the aid of the indispensable contrivance by which, in coming to a decision, the majority is held to represent the whole; as little, probably, could religion long subsist in the form of mere fanaticism in any community. The tendency of both these anarchies is alike to fall back into the first form of absolutism, not only because the advantages of that form are exaggerated, and its evils diminished, to the imagination, by experience of the opposite extremes, but also from a real sympathy there is between the spirit of anarchy and that of absolutism, notwithstanding the opposition between their outward manifestations. The one as well as the other, in truth, is, as we have said, a spirit of absolutism, that is, of unqualified unity of essence, and unbalanced, unlimited willfulness. Both, accordingly, are equally one-sided and egotistical: equally exclusive and intolerant; equally vain, insolent, fierce, and unreasoning: so that the temper generated in the one state of things becomes the most natural preparative for the other.

This short exposition of general principles may help us to detect, under deceptive external appearances, the real characters of the several religious parties that appear upon the scene in the last and the present periods of our history, and to understand some of their movements that might otherwise seem inconsistent and unaccountable. It will be found that, notwithstanding any tacking and winding which may have been enforced by the pressure of circumstances, the main course and ultimate objects of each were what the chart we have given would indicate.

The most remarkable phenomenon connected with the history of religion in England in the seventeenth century is the appearance of the numerous brood of minor varieties of dissenters styled the Sectaries. These were the natural progeny of Independency, and some of them, indeed, as, for instance, the Baptists, or Anabaptists, as they were then commonly called, were simply Independents, distinguished only from the general body bearing that name by some peculiar tenets not affecting either the essential principle of belief upon which the above classification is founded, or even the superficial characteristic of church polity. The greater number, however, range under the more advanced principle which we have called Fanaticism, and were only the offspring of Independency, inasmuch as the latter phasis of religious liberalism was that which immediately preceded and may be said to have led the way to the former. The Sectaries began to make their appearance immediately after the assembling of the Long Parliament in November, 1640, serving for the same diagnostic, or performing the same functions, with the political societies which sprung up in the French Revolution on the opening of the Constituent Assembly. At this date the parliament itself was almost to a man episcopal. One of the earliest votes of the Commons was a resolution that none should sit in their House but such as would receive the communion according to the usage of the church of England; nor had any other kind of dissent taken root till now even in the country, except that sort of primitive Puritanism which consisted chiefly in an aversion to some of the rites and ceremonies of the established worship. Presbyterianism, whose quarrel with Episcopacy, fiercely as it had been carried on, was merely about the external matters of church government and forms of worship, was as yet confined to Scotland: it does not appear that even those of the English Puritans, who were most dissatisfied with some things in the constitution of the established church, and would have gone farthest in restraining and curtailing the power of the bishops, had generally made up their minds to the entire abolition of the order. Circumstances, indeed, had been for some time preparing the way for a union between the Puritanical party in England and the Scotch Presbyterians, even before the course of political events threw them into each other's arms; in particular, the prevalent doctrinal theology of the Puritans tended to alienate them from the growing Arminianism of the English church, and to turn their regards and sympathies to their brethren of the same Calvinistic faith in Scotland. But it was the visit of the Scotch commissioners to London, about the same time with the assembling of the Long Parliament, that properly planted Presbyterianism in England. "The king retires to London," writes Sir Philip Warwick, "and Scotch commissioners are sent up thither, and they, both by the parliament and city, are looked upon as angels of light: and they frequent the congregations of the chief dissenting presbyters, who from all quarters of the kingdom flow up to this city, as if they were to convert an unsanctified, heathen nation; and Timothy and Titus are upon all occasions proved not to have been bishops, as a distinct order from presbyters; and the rites of the church of no better appellation than superstitions; and the bowing at the name of Jesus hath a book written against it with no less title than Jesus-worship Confuted; so as, if a Mohammedan had heard it cried in the streets, as it was, as I heard a gentleman say passing by, surely he might justly have thought this nation at that time was denying its Savior."[1] Thus furiously blown upon, the flame of the new religion spread with wonderful rapidity; the city of London very soon became generally Presbyterian; a large section of the House of Commons caught the same spirit; the Assembly of Divines began their deliberations in the summer of 1643, and there Presbyterianism speedily acquired so complete an ascendency as to be enabled, from that strong-hold, to force the recognition of itself by the parliament and the country as the national profession of faith. By this time, however, both Independency and the many-headed strength of Sectarianism had also arisen out of the great deep sea of opinion which the storm was now tossing; and their united mass formed a gathering wave close behind presbytery, which already felt no little uneasiness at being so pursued and pressed upon. In 1646 the Reverend Thomas Edwards, a zealous Presbyterian minister of London, published a strange work under the title of "Gangræna, or a Catalogue and Discovery of many of the Errors, Heresies, Blasphemies, and pernicious practices of the Sectaries of this time, vented and acted in England in these last four years"—the three parts making a thick little quarto of above six hundred pages—in which he enumerates no fewer than sixteen distinct species of heretical sects then flourishing in England; namely, Independents, Brownists, Millenaries, Antinomians, Anabaptists, Arminians, Libertines, Familists, Enthusiasts, Seekers, Perfectists, Socinians, Arians, Anti-Trinitarians, Anti-Scripturists, and Skeptics.[1] The Independents and Sectaries not only had now many congregations in London and other towns in all parts of the kingdom, but, besides maintaining an active, obstinate, tormenting opposition in the assembly of divines itself, were fast advancing to become the dominant party in the parliament, and in the army were already omnipotent. This last result had been chiefly brought about by the remodeling which the army had undergone the preceding year after the breaking up of the negotiations at Uxbridge. "When the old regiments were broken," to quote the account of the modern Historian of Puritanism, "the chaplains, being discharged, of course returned to their cures; and, as new ones were formed, the officers applied to the parliament and assembly for a fresh recruit; but the Presbyterian ministers, being possessed of warm benefices, were unwilling to undergo the fatigues of another campaign, or, it may be, to serve with men of such desperate measures. This fatal accident proved the ruin of the cause in which the parliament were engaged; for, the army being destitute of chaplains, who might have restrained the irregularities of their zeal, the officers set up for preachers in their several regiments, depending upon a kind of miraculous assistance of the Divine Spirit, without any study or preparation; and, when their imaginations were heated, they gave vent to the most crude and undigested absurdities. Nor did the evil rest there; for, from preaching at the head of their regiments, they took possession of the country pulpits where they were quartered, till at length they spread the infection over the whole nation, and brought the regular ministry into contempt."[2] "It was the ministers that lost all by forsaking the army," says Baxter, himself a Presbyterian, "and betaking themselves to an easier and quieter way of life. When the Earl of Essex's army went out, each regiment had an able chaplain; but after Edgehill fight most of them went home, and left the army to their own conduct."[3] The victory at Naseby, and the other successes which immediately followed "the new model," raised the fame and influence of the army to the highest pitch: in part by moral, in part by material force, the Independents and Sectaries, with Cromwell at their head, carried every thing before them, in parliament and elsewhere; the Presbyterian members were thrust out from the House of Commons—the Presbyterian ministers were forced to forego the exclusive possession of the church livings—presbytery, erst pursued and pressed upon, was now overwhelmed and swallowed up by Independency. The collision of the two forces may be dated from the impeachment of the eleven members by the army, and their secession from the House in June, 1647, and the catastrophe from the execution of the king about eighteen months afterward.

Then commenced the reign of a general, and, practically, almost universal toleration, which subsisted till the Restoration, a space of nearly eleven years. The principle of religious liberty could hardly have suggested itself to any speculators before the Reformation; but it was taken up and maintained with more or less reservation by various writers not long after that event. Upon the burning of Servetus, at Geneva, in 1553, a controversy arose on the expediency of attempting to repress heresy by the arm of the civil power, which was strenuously denied in a work published in Latin, at Basil, the following year, under the fictitious name of Martinus Bellius, and which was attributed by Beza, who answered it, to the celebrated Sebastian Castalio. The author, a French translation of whose work was soon after published at Lyons, cites several preceding writers as having promulgated the same opinions. A more famous defense of the same or similar views appeared also at Basil, in 1565, the treatise of James Acontius, or Aconzio, entitled De Stratagematibus Satanæ, of which an English translation by John Goodwin, the Independent minister, was published at London, in 1648, with the title of "Satan's Stratagems, or the Devil's Cabinet Council Opened;" and reissued in 1651, with that of "Darkness Discovered, or the Devil's Secret Stratagems Laid Open." Acontius, however, excepts atheists and apostates from the toleration which he would accord to mere heretics; and even these latter he does not deny the abstract right of the magistrate to punish, but only endeavors to show that it is much the wiser as well as the safer course—more reasonable as well as more in accordance with the spirit of Christianity—to leave them alone. But the earliest vindication of the principle of religious freedom, in its widest extent, that appeared in the English language, seems to have been a tract entitled "Religious Peace, or a Plea for Liberty of Conscience, long since presented to King James and his High Court of Parliament, by Leonard Busher," which was first printed in 1614, and again in 1646. Busher would extend the most perfect toleration not only to all forms of Christianity, in other words, to all diversities of heresy, but also to every other religion as well as to the Christian; nor would he have any punishment or restraint applied even to persons of no religion at all.[1] But this and the other schemes that have been noticed were nothing more than the speculations of individual writers: the honor of having founded the first church or sect that made universal toleration one of the articles of its creed and practice has been claimed for the Reverend Roger Williams, who was born of a reputable family in Wales, in 1598, and was educated at the University of Oxford; but, after having been ordained in the established church, embraced the principles of the Puritans, and emigrated, in 1631, to the young colony of Massachusetts, in New England, from whence, however, he was banished, three or four years afterward, "as a disturber of the peace of the church and commonwealth," and driven to take refuge with a few followers among the Indians of what is now called Rhode Island, where he founded the settlement of Providence on a tract of territory purchased from the native inhabitants. The settlers were afterward joined by other exiles from Massachusetts; and, in 1643, Williams proceeded to England, and, principally it is said by the aid of the younger Sir Henry Vane, obtained from the Earl of Warwick, then governor and admiral of all the plantations, a charter of incorporation for the new colony, under the name of "the Incorporation of Providence Plantations in Narragansett Bay." In 1662, a second charter was obtained from Charles II., in which the incorporation was styled "the English Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations in New England:" and by this, more especially, the most ample and unrestricted religious freedom was made a fundamental principle of the constitution. It was declared that religion should be wholly and forever free from all jurisdiction of the civil power; so that not only were all varieties of sects tolerated, but no dominant or favored sect was established. Of this latter peculiarity the state founded by Roger Williams probably afforded the first exemplification in Christendom; and he may be considered to have thus planted the germ of the subsequent entire and universal religious liberty of the American states. In Rhode Island itself, however, the results have been described as not altogether satisfactory in some respects. One writer, in the beginning of the last century, briefly characterizes the country by the words bona terra, mala gens (the land good, but the people bad), and affirms that the colony was "a colluvies of Antinomians, Familists, Anabaptists, Antisabbatarians, Arminians, Socinians, Quakers, Ranters, and every thing but Roman Catholics and true Christians."[1] "So little," says Dr. Morse, "has the civil authority to do with religion here, that no contract between a minister and a society (unless incorporated for that purpose) is of any force. It is probably for these reasons that so many different sects have ever been found here, and that the Sabbath and all religious institutions have been more neglected in this than any other of the New England States."[2] The same writer observes that, besides the numerous religious sects in Rhode Island, "there is a considerable number of the people who can be reduced to no particular denomination, and are, as to religion, strictly Nothingarians;" and that, although in some parts, "public worship is attended with punctuality and propriety, in others they make the Sabbath a day of visiting and festivity, and in others they esteem every day alike, having no place of meeting for the purpose of religious worship." He admits, however, that, although the clergy are dependent wholly on the integrity of the people for their support, their salaries not being recoverable by law, yet they "are in general liberally maintained, and none who merit it have reason to complain for want of support."[1] A later writer informs us that the favorite tenet of the first clergymen of the state, "that human learning is no way necessary to a gospel preacher," appears to have operated with an unfortunate effect on the diffusion of literary knowledge among the people; so that "only a small part of the people have a Bible in their houses, and a very great proportion of them are unable to read or write."[2] Morse, in like manner, had long before stated that, with the exception of the inhabitants of the towns of Newport and Providence, the bulk of the people were "involved in greater ignorance, perhaps, than in any other part of New England."[3] Williams himself is said to have become a Baptist a few years after his settling at Providence, and to have founded there a church of that persuasion, which remained united till 1653, when a dispute about some rite or doctrine divided the congregation into two. The same fate also befell a Baptist church established at Newport by Williams's chief coadjutor in all his proceedings, a Mr. or Dr. John Clarke, who was at once preacher, physician, and politician. Williams himself survived till 1683, by which time his colony, which is said to have originally consisted of only forty individuals besides himself, had grown to a population of several thousands: in 1730, the number of souls in the state, according to Morse, was 17,935 (including 985 Indians and 1648 negroes), produced "chiefly by the natural increase of the first settlers." Williams is the author of two publications in support of his favorite principle; the first entitled "Bloody Tenent of Persecution for Cause of Conscience, discussed between Truth and Peace," Lon., 1644; the second, a vindication of the former against an attempted refutation by a Mr. Cotton, a Boston clergyman, Lon., 1652.[4]

At the time when the patriarch of Rhode Island made his stand in this bold manner for the widest religious liberty, intolerance, bigotry, and superstition nowhere held more potent sway than among the Puritan colonists of New England—themselves fugitives from the ecclesiastical tyranny of their native land. Williams, as we have seen, had been driven from Massachusetts, in 1634, for his dissent from the religion of the dominant party; but his expulsion procured the colony only a very brief respite from such troubles and distractions. In 1633 there had arrived from England, along with some other ministers, the Mr. Cotton who has just been mentioned as many years afterward the opponent of Williams in the controversy about toleration; and in his company a Mrs. Hutchinson, a lady possessed by some very singular and enthusiastic notions, which she soon began to publish abroad with great zeal and activity. Among other crotchets she is said to have maintained that the Holy Ghost dwelt personally in every justified man or woman. This and above eighty other peculiar opinions of hers were at length, after three weeks' debating, condemned as erroneous and heretical in a synod or general meeting of the clergy of the colony held at Cambridge, in August, 1637, her friend, Mr. Cotton, alone dissenting; and she and some of her principal followers were thereupon sentenced to banishment. Mrs. Hutchinson, with her husband and family, took refuge in the first instance with Roger Williams, in Rhode Island, and there they remained for five or six years; but a disagreement then took place, upon which she removed to the Dutch country beyond New Haven, and there she and all her family, amounting to sixteen persons, were, the year following, massacred by the Indians, with the exception of one daughter, whom they carried away with them into the woods. This was in 1643, and that same year either Mrs. Hutchinson's religion, or some kindred species of Antinomianism, again sprung up in Massachusetts, under a leader of the name of Gorton, and threw the colony once more into a ferment. Gorton and many of his followers were sentenced to imprisonment, with hard labor in irons, a severer punishment being threatened in case of a repetition of the crime. Meanwhile the orthodox Puritanism of the colony was every day becoming more fierce and rampant; the despotic majority, which imposed all its own whims and prejudices upon the whole community, now came to hold that the wearing of uncropped hair was an offense against the word of God, and that to put a pipe of tobacco to the lips was nothing less than to inhale the smoke of the bottomless pit. Upon this latter piece of daring profanity a penalty was actually imposed by the government. There were, besides, laws by which whosoever should not communicate with the state church, which was a species of Independency, was deprived of all civil franchises; by which the worship of images was made punishable with death, and by which banishment was proclaimed against heretics of every description. Under the last-mentioned law a hot persecution of the new sect of the Quakers was begun, in 1656, in the summer of which year the first of them that made their appearance in the colony are said to have arrived, some from England, some from the neighboring island of Barbadoes. They were immediately brought before the authorities, committed to prison, and some books they had brought with them seized and burned; and in the end they were banished from the colony in terms of the law. Afterward some additional laws were made specially directed against Quakerism. It was enacted that any Quaker, after the first conviction, if a man, should lose one of his ears—if a woman, should be severely whipped; for the second offense should, if a man, have his other ear cut off—if a woman, should receive another severe whipping; for the third, whether man or woman, should have the tongue bored through with a red-hot iron. Even these severities, however, being found insufficient to eradicate the obnoxious sect, it was at last enacted that every Quaker returning to the country after banishment should be put to death; and several persons were actually executed under this monstrous law. The persecution of the Quakers in Massachusetts continued with no abatement till after the Restoration, when it was at last put a stop to by an order obtained by their friends in England from the king. in September, 1661, prohibiting the infliction upon them either of death or of any other corporal punishment on account of their opinions. The spirit of intolerance had nowhere else been carried to the same height of sanguinary fury; but in a more mitigated degree it had pervaded others of the New England settlements as well as Massachusetts. In Connecticut, for instance, it was also the law that none but church members should vote at elections; and, in 1658, the general court of New Haven, the presiding authority in that state, passed an act or ordinance declaring that, "whereas there is a cursed sect of heretics lately sprung up in the world, commonly called Quakers, who take upon them that they are immediately sent from God, and infallibly assisted by the Spirit, who yet speak and write blasphemous opinions, despise government and the order of God in church and commonwealth, speaking evil of dignities," &c.; therefore, whosoever should bring or cause to be brought into the colony any known Quaker, or other blasphemous heretic, should forfeit the sum of fifty pounds; if a Quaker should come into the colony on civil business, he should be bound, as soon as he arrived, to make his appearance before a magistrate, from whom he should obtain license to pass on his business for a certain limited time, having one or more persons to attend upon and watch his proceedings, at his own charge; if he disregarded this requirement, he should be punished with whipping, hard labor, and solitary confinement. for the first offense; for the second, should be branded in the hand, as well as imprisoned and put to labor; for the third, should, along with a new consignment to solitary imprisonment and hard work, be branded in the other hand; for the fourth, should have the tongue bored through with a red-hot iron, imprisoned and kept to labor again, and at last sent out of the colony at his own cost.

It ought not to be overlooked, however, that even in England at this time, where, under the government of the Protector, a practical toleration was extended, as we have stated, to all sorts of religionists, so long as they refrained from disturbing the government or the peace of the community, the Quakers exposed themselves, by the excess of their zeal, to a good deal of suffering. The founder of this sect was George Fox, who was born at Drayton, in Lancashire, in 1624. His father followed the trade of a weaver, and he himself, when he reached the proper age, was put apprentice to a shoemaker, who also dealt in wool and sold cattle, so that a good deal of money passed through Fox's hands. "While I was with him," says Fox, "he was blessed; but after I left him he broke, and came to nothing. . . . While I was in that service I used in my dealings the word 'verily;' and it was a common saying among people that knew me, If George says 'verily,' there is no altering him. When boys and rude people would laugh at me, I let them alone and went my way; but people had generally a love to me for my innocency and honesty."[1] The following is his own account of the incident by which his first strong impressions of religion were awakened:—"When I came toward nineteen years of age, being upon business at a fair, one of my cousins, whose name was Bradford, a professor, and having another professor with him, came to me, and asked me to drink part of a jug of beer with them, and I, being thirsty, went in with them: for I loved any that had a sense of good, or that did seek after the Lord. When we had drunk a glass a-piece, they began to drink healths, and called for more drink, agreeing together that he that would not drink should pay all. I was grieved that any that made profession of religion should do so. They grieved me very much, having never had such a thing put to me before by any sort of people; wherefore I rose up to go, and putting my hand into my pocket, I took out a groat and laid it upon the table before them, and said, If it be so, I will leave you. So I went away, and when I had done what business I had to do I returned home, but did not go to bed that night, nor could I sleep, but sometimes walked up and down, and sometimes prayed and cried to the Lord, who said unto me, Thou seest how young people go together into vanity, and old people into the earth; thou must forsake all, both young and old, and keep out of all, and be as a stranger unto all."[2] In obedience to this supposed voice from heaven, he made himself a dress all of leather, as the most durable material he could procure, and commenced a wandering life, reading the Scriptures, as he went about from place to place, and extracting from them many new and true meanings, as he imagined, by the illuminating aid of the Holy Spirit. He also saw many visions, prophetic, as he believed, of things that were to come to pass. Having at last reached London, after residing there for a short time he determined to return home to his friends; this was in 1645; but, after a few months, he again set out on his travels, more fixed in his peculiar notions than ever. It seems to have been now that he began to put in practice most of those singularities of outward demeanor by which his followers still continue to be distinguished. "When the Lord sent me forth into the world," he says in his Journal, "he forbade me to put off my hat to any, high or low; and I was required to thee and thou all men and women, without any respect to rich or poor, great or small. And, as I traveled up and down, I was not to bid people good-morrow or good-evening; neither might I bow or scrape with my leg to any one; and this made the sects and professions to rage."[1] He now also gave up all attendance upon the services of religion in the public churches. He began to preach in 1647 at Duckenfield, near Manchester; and soon after several of his disciples, both men and women, followed his example, according as they conceived themselves to be moved by the Spirit. In 1649 Fox got into his first trouble with the constituted authorities, by his conduct in interrupting the public service in a church at Nottingham, where, upon the clergyman telling the people in the course of his sermon that they were to try all doctrines by the Holy Scriptures, he stood up in the middle of the congregation, and exclaimed, "Oh, no! it is not the Scripture, but it is the Holy Spirit, by which opinions and religions are to be tried; for it was the Spirit that led people into all truth, and gave them the knowledge of it." As he persisted in continuing his speech, the officers removed him from the church, and carried him away to the jail, from which he was brought the same evening before the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs. The result was a short imprisonment. On some subsequent occasions on which he conducted himself in the same way he was put in the stocks; and at last the magistrates of Derby sent him to prison for six months. These punishments, however, instead of putting down the new sect, or checking their zeal, had the very opposite effect. "By this time," to quote the summary of a modern ecclesiastical historian, "there began to appear some other visionaries, of the same make and complexion with George Fox, who spoke in places of public resort, being moved, as they said, by the Holy Ghost; and even some women, contrary to the modesty of their sex, went about streets, and entered into churches, crying down the teaching of men, and exhorting people to attend to the light within themselves."[2] The name Quakers was first given to Fox and his followers, as he himself informs us in his Journal, in October, 1650, by Gervas Bennet, esq., a justice of Derby, before whom he had been brought, on his bidding the justice and those about him "tremble at the word of the Lord." Being considered to be descriptive of the emotion with which they were wont to pronounce their public addresses, it was eagerly caught up and spread among the people. "At length," continues Neal, "they disturbed the public worship by appearing in ridiculous habits, with emblematical or typical representations of some impending calamity; they also took the liberty of giving ministers the reproachful names of hirelings, deceivers of the people, false prophets, &c. Some of them went through divers towns and villages naked, denouncing judgments and calamities upon the nation."[3] It does not follow, however, that, although these extravagances may have been committed by persons calling themselves Fox's disciples, they were approved either by him or by the generality of his followers. It was a tenet of the new sect, that no one day, any more than one house or building, was more sacred than another; but, although thus disowning any particular sanctity in the Christian Sabbath, they early began, on grounds of expediency, to make that their principal day of meeting for religious worship. Quaker meeting-houses were first established in Lancashire and other parts of the north in 1652, and soon after in the city of London: but it was not till some years subsequent to the Restoration that the congregations were all organized into one body. Meanwhile the members of the sect suffered a world of tribulation, partly from the hostility of the populace, partly from the oppressive conduct of the government and the magistrates, which, whether or not provoked in some degree by their own indiscretion, they generally endured both with fortitude and meekness. "A Christian exhortation to an assembly, after the priest had done and the worship was over," says one of their historians, "was denominated interrupting public worship, and disturbing the priest in his office; an honest testimony against sin in the streets or markets was styled a breach of the peace; and their appearing before the magistrates covered, a contempt of authority: hence proceeded fines, imprisonments, and spoiling of goods. Nay, so hot for persecution were some magistrates, that, by an unparalleled misconstruction of the law against vagrants, they tortured with cruel whippings the bodies of both men and women of good reputation, merely because they went under the denomination of Quakers."[1] Fox himself was repeatedly subjected to imprisonment and other ill usage, sometimes on the charge of merely disturbing the peace, sometimes on that of uttering heresy and blasphemy. Even the tolerant and liberal government of Cromwell, under which most other sects enjoyed tranquillity and protection, did not, as we have intimated, put a period to the persecution of the Quakers. In 1656, Fox and two of his friends were taken up at St. Ives on the charge of distributing papers tending to the disturbance of the public peace (the papers consisted merely of an exhortation to the people to fear God and learn the light from Christ, which Fox had written); and, having been brought to their trial after nine weeks' confinement, although nothing illegal could be proved against them, were fined twenty marks a-piece for coming into court with their hats on, and, on refusing to pay their fines, were committed to a lothsome dungeon, where they remained thirty weeks, until released by an order from Cromwell, obtained only after repeated applications. The protector, however much disposed to interfere sooner, appears to have been deterred from doing so by the fear of offending the popular feeling. The same year two other Quakers, respectable tradesmen, having been apprehended as vagrants at Exeter, and afterward brought to trial at the assizes, were, although nothing was proved against them, fined forty pounds each for contempt of court because they did not take off their hats, and detained above a year in prison for non-payment of their fines. Many others, both men and women, about the same time, were fined, imprisoned, whipped, or set in the stocks, generally for being found wandering about as vagrants, or for being found traveling to their places of worship on the first day of the week, which was called breaking the Sabbath. It appeared, by an account presented in parliament in 1657, that there were then one hundred and forty Quakers in prison in different parts of England, and that one thousand nine hundred had been apprehended and punished in the preceding six years, of whom twenty-one had died in confinement. Still, it does not appear that any of them were punished at this time on account of any peculiar opinions they held, so long at least as they refrained from publicly attacking certain points of the common belief, their doing which, indeed, sometimes exposed them to the charge of being guilty of the crime of blasphemy. On the contrary, it was now, as has been stated, that they began to assemble openly for religious worship in meeting-houses of their own. Their first place of meeting in London is said to have been the dwelling-house of Robert Dring, in Watling-street; it began to be made use of for that purpose in 1654. Soon after, on their numbers becoming too large to be accommodated in a private house, they hired the Bull and Mouth inn, in St. Martin's le Grand, "where," says Neal, "women as well as men spoke as they were moved; and when none were moved there was no speaking at all. The novelty of this assembly drew great numbers of people thither out of curiosity; nor did any give them disturbance as long as they continued quiet within themselves. But in several places, where they had no business, the extravagance of their speakers was insufferable. One of them interrupted the minister in Whitechapel church, and disturbed the whole assembly. A female came into Whitehall chapel stark naked, in the midst of public worship, the lord protector himself being present.[1] Another came into the parliament-house with a trenchard in her hand, which she broke in pieces, saying, 'Thus shall ye be broke in pieces.' Thomas Aldam, having complained to the protector of the imprisonment of some friends in the country, and not finding redress, took off his cap, and tore it in pieces, saying, 'So shall thy government be torn from thee and thy house.' Several, pretending an extraordinary message from heaven, went about the streets of London, denouncing the judgments of God against the protector and his council. One came to the door of the parliament-house with a drawn sword, and wounded several who were present, saying he was inspired by the Holy Spirit to kill every man that sat in the house. Others, in their prophetic raptures, denounced judgments on the whole nation, and frequently disturbed the public assemblies where the chief magistrate himself was present. Many opened their shops on the Lord's Day, in defiance of the laws, and were so very obstinate and intractible that it was impossible to keep the peace without some marks of severity."[1]

The famous case of James Naylor furnishes the most remarkable example that has been recorded at once of the occasional extravagance of the first Quakers, and of the sanguinary bigotry of those times. Naylor, having been apprehended at Bristol, about the beginning of December, 1656, was sent up, by the magistrates of that city, to the parliament, then sitting, which immediately appointed a committee to investigate the case. He told the committee that he was a native of the parish of Ardisloe, near Wakefield, in Yorkshire, and that he had lived there till he was married, "according to the world," when two or three and twenty. When the war began, he entered the army, and became a quartermaster in Major-general Lambert's troop. In the course of the debate to which the report of the committee gave rise, Lambert afterward bore strong testimony to the correctness of Naylor's conduct and the worth of his character at this time. "He was," said he, "two years my quartermaster, and a very useful person. We parted with him with great regret. He was a man of very unblamable life and conversation."[2] He left the army in consequence of being disabled by illness, and returned home; "about which time," continues the report, "he was a member of an Independent church at Horbery, in Yorkshire, of which church Mr. Christopher Marshall was pastor; and by the same church since cast out, as himself confesseth he hath heard; by which church he was charged as guilty of blasphemy, and uncivil and wanton carriage with one Mrs. Roper, a married woman, as that she should sit on his knee and kiss him, before divers other persons." With regard to the blasphemy for which he was apprehended at Bristol, it was clearly enough proved, by the admissions of the parties themselves, that as he rode

[1] Neal, however, has quoted no authority for this story, and his editor, Dr. Toulmin, has been unable to discover where he got it. It is not to be found either in Sewel's History of Quakerism or Gough's History of the Quakers. But there are other instances in which primitive Quakerism is asserted to have made this extraordinary exhibition of itself. Dr. Morse mentions the following facts as having taken place in New England about the time we are now treating of: "Thomas Newhouse went into a meeting-house at Boston with a couple of glass bottles, and broke them before the congregation, and threatened, Thus will the Lord break you in pieces. Another time M. Brewster came in with her face smeared as black as a coal. Deborah Wilson went through the streets of Salem as naked as she was born." (Amer. Geog. p. 189.) The passago is apparently given as a quotation from some other work, the title of which, however, is not mentioned. Fox himself, in his Journal, has the following entries:—"1660. A Friend went naked through the town (of Skipton), declaring truth, and he was much beaten." (i. 511.)—"William Sympson was moved of the Lord to go, at several times, for three years, naked and barefoot before them, as a sign unto them, in markets, courts, towns, cities, to priests' houses, and to great men's houses, telling them, So shall they all be stripped naked, as he was stripped naked. And sometimes he was moved to put on hair sackcloth, and to besmear his face, and to tell them, so would the Lord besmear all their religion as he was besmeared. Great sufferings did that poor man undergo, sore whippings with horse-whips and coach-whips on his bare body, grievous stonings and imprisonments in three years' time before the king came in, that they ought have taken warning, but they would not; they rewarded his love with cruel usage. Only the mayor of Cambridge did nobly to him, for he put his gown about him, and took him into his house." (i. 543).

from Exeter to that city, while some women led his horse, others spread their scarfs and handkerchiefs before him, singing the words "Holy! Holy! Holy!" and other ejaculations of praise appropriated in Scripture to the Savior. The committee found "that the said James Naylor assumed the name and the incommunicable attributes and titles of our blessed Savior, as the Fairest of Ten Thousand—the Only begotten Son of God—the Prophet of the Most High God—the King of Israel—the Everlasting Son of Righteousness—the Prince of Peace—the One sent to judge and try the cause of Israel—Jesus—He in whom the hope of Israel standeth." As far as any thing can be made of the somewhat evasive and unintelligible answers of Naylor himself, it should seem that he considered these epithets and laudatory exclamations to be addressed not exactly to himself, but to Christ dwelling in him; he earnestly disclaimed any intention of assuming to himself the honor due to the Creator; but, although he admitted that he did not check the adoration of his female admirers, he professed to have paid very little attention to it, and to have no distinct recollection of what the words were that they used in their letters and oral addresses. "One thing, also," say the committee in their report, "being part of the matter of fact, we think worthy your knowledge, though much stress will not be laid on it; and that is, that the description of our Savior by Publius Lentulus to the Senate of Rome in writing (which is also imprinted) was taken upon one of James Naylor's attendants..... And for Naylor's hair, both color and manner of wearing it, as also the fashion of his beard, and feature and person, did much agree with that description; which also was taken notice of by many of the committee, how much he resembled (as they apprehended, with some affectation) the picture usually drawn for our Savior." One ardent devotee, Dorcas Erbury, who had particularly distinguished herself in singing hosannahs to the prophet, and spreading her garments before him in his progress through Somersetshire, affirmed that she had lain dead in Exeter jail for two whole days, and that Naylor had restored her to life by laying his hand upon her! Naylor himself, when questioned touching this transaction, was more than usually ambiguous and obscure; he was rather disinclined to say any thing on the subject, but, upon being pressed, admitted that he conceived there was a power in him from above; "and it is the same power," he continued, "whereof you read in the Scriptures. that hath raised the dead." He appears to have believed that he possessed the power of recalling the dead to life, but to have had doubts as to its having been actually exercised on this occasion. One of the most curious passages of the evidence taken by the committee is the following:—"John Baynham, deputy to the sergeant of the House, to whose custody Naylor and his company are committed, informed, That the usual posture of James Naylor is sitting in a chair, and his company, both men and women, do sometimes kneel; and when they are weary of kneeling they sit upon the ground before him, singing these and divers other words to the like purpose, namely, Holy, holy, to the Almighty, to the true God, and great God! and glory to the Almighty, &c. And thus they do usually all the day long; but the informer never heard Naylor sing as aforesaid. And saith, there is great resort to the said Naylor by divers persons, who, most of them, do kneel before him in the manner aforesaid. And Martha Simmons (one of the Bristol worshipers), in the posture aforesaid, sung, This is the joyful day! Behold, the King of Righteousness is come! And further, the informer saith, that he never knew the said Naylor show any dislike, either by reproof or otherwise, of that honor or worship which John Stranger and his wife, Martha Simmons, and Dorcas Erbury, and the rest gave him as aforesaid. And a member of the House, being lately at the place where Naylor is now a prisoner, informs the committee that he saw Naylor and his company in the posture aforesaid, and heard John Stranger and one of the women sing, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God! and Holy, holy, to thee, thee, thee, Lord God! And while John Stranger sung these words he did sometimes look upward, and sometimes upon James Naylor. Another member informed us, as upon his own view, to the same purpose. And at Naylor's last examination before the committee, being Wednesday, the 3d instant (December), one William Piggot did inform that, Naylor sitting in a chair where he is now a prisoner, one Sarah Blackbury came to him, and took him by the hand, and said, Rise up, my love, my dove, my fair one, and come away: why sittest thou among the pots? and presently put her mouth upon his hand, and sunk down upon the ground before him." Naylor denied that the woman had either bowed down, as thus stated, or touched his hand with her mouth; she had only, he said, taken his hand in hers. It is very plain, however, that, owing perhaps in great part to his imposing presence, Naylor exercised a wonderful influence over the imaginations of the female enthusiasts with whom he came in contact; the few male followers he had seem to have been mostly led after him by their wives: he was emphatically a ladies' prophet.

By the House of Commons, however, he was regarded as a personage of the first national importance; his case kept them in hot debate from morning to night from the 5th till the 17th of December inclusive, and called forth an absolute inundation of the learning and eloquence both of theology and of law, much of it foaming with a fury and rancor of fanatic zeal, compared to which the worst extravagances imputed to the poor, half-crazy Quaker were decent and respectable.[1] First, after three day's wrangling, it was voted "That James Naylor, upon the whole matter of fact, is guilty of horrid blasphemy;" and "That James Naylor is a grand imposter and seducer of the people." Then came the question of the punishment to be inflicted, when it was actually moved that he should be put to death, and that a bill should be prepared and brought in for that purpose! The debate upon this question lasted above a week, at the end of which the atrocious proposition was only defeated by a majority of fourteen, the numbers being eighty-two for, and ninety-six against it. Among other speeches delivered against the motion was a most elaborate one by the Lord Commissioner Whitelock, overflowing not only with law and Latin, but still more with theology and Hebrew, in which, among other things, it was solemnly put and discussed whether it was "necessary for the being and preservation of the people and commonwealth of England that James Naylor should be put to death!" Finally, it was resolved, on Wednesday, the 17th, "That James Naylor be set on the pillory, with his head in the pillory, in the Palace Yard, Westminster, during the space of two hours on Thursday next; and shall be whipped by the hangman through the streets, from Westminster to the Old Exchange, London; and there likewise be set on the pillory, with his head in the pillory, for the space of two hours, between the hours of eleven and one, on Saturday next; in each place wearing a paper, containing an inscription of his crimes; and that at the Old Exchange his tongue be bored through with a hot iron; and that he be there also stigmatized in the forehead with the letter B; and that he be afterward sent to Bristol, and be conveyed into and through the said city on horseback, bareridged, with his face backward, and there also publicly whipped the next market-day after he come thither; and that from thence he be committed to prison in Bridewell, London, and there restrained from the society of all people, and there to labor hard till he shall be released by parliament; and during that time to be debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper, and shall have no relief but what he earns by his daily labors." This sentence was executed in all its parts; and Naylor endured his sufferings with the courage of a martyr. "This day," says Burton, under date of 27th December, "B. and I went to see Naylor's tongue bored through, and him marked in the forehead. He put out his tongue very willingly, but shrinked a little when the iron came upon his forehead. He was pale when he came out of the pillory, but high-colored after tongue-boring. He was bound with a cord by both arms to the pillory. Rich, the mad merchant, sat bare at Naylor's feet all the time. Sometimes he sang and cried, and stroked his hair and face, and kissed his hand, and sucked the fire out of his forehead. Naylor embraced his executioner, and behaved himself very handsomely and patiently. A great crowd of people there; the sheriff present, cum multis, at the Old Exchange, near the conduit."[1] According to the account in the State Trials, "some of his followers were so prodigiously impious and silly as to lick his wounds, kiss his feet, lean in his bosom," &c. At first, when he was consigned to Bridewell, he refused to work, and of course, in terms of his inhuman sentence, was left to starve; but, after fasting for three days, he submitted to the only means by which he could procure a little food. He lay in prison for two years, when his enthusiasm at last cooled so far as to induce him to admit that he had done wrong in receiving the honors that were paid to him in his progress to Bristol. "All those ranting, wild spirits," he says, in one of the papers written by him in prison, and published after his death, "which gathered about me at that time of darkness, with all their wild arts and wicked works against the honor of God and His pure spirit and people, I renounce; and whereas I gave advantage, through want of judgment, to that evil spirit, I take shame to myself." On this, the Rump Parliament that assembled after Oliver Cromwell's death allowed him to go at large; and he afterward published some tracts or papers in defense of the Quakers, who still acknowledged him as one of their body. He survived his restoration to liberty, however, only a few months. In the latter end of the year 1660 he was found in a dying state in a field in Huntingdonshire, and, being carried home, soon afterward expired, being, it is supposed, in the forty-fourth year of his age. His last hours were breathed away in the expression of a mild, benevolent, and humble piety; and we are told that, after his fall, Naylor was a man of great self-denial, and very diffident and jealous of himself.[1]

The leading principle of Quakerism, the paramount authority attributed to the suggestions of what is assumed to be the divine spirit, or a voice from heaven speaking within the heart, being in fact the distinguishing characteristic of what we have called the last of the four modes of religious belief, was adopted in this time of teeming sectarianism by several other denominations besides the Quakers, each holding it in combination with some other peculiar tenet, by which it was modified into a new system of faith and practice. The Millenarians, or Fifth-Monarchy men, for example, united it with the belief in the immediate coming of Christ to reign personally for a thousand years upon the earth, with the saints for his ministers and local vicegerents. The Ranters added to it the persuasion that a main part of religion consisted in vociferation and violence of bodily excitement. The Behmenists, or disciples of Jacob Behmen (properly Böhme), styled the Teutonic Philosopher, who had preached the doctrine of the inward light even in England long before Fox, held it of course along with the other parts of their master's complicated system of theological metaphysics. The Vanists, or followers of the younger Sir Harry Vane, otherwise called the Seekers, seem to have conjoined with it the notion that an essential attribute of religious truth was a certain mistiness or vagueness, eluding distinct apprehension, and rather to be groped after in a sort of continual half-skepticism than ever properly found out and embraced by the mind as a solid and satisfying conviction. And another sect called the Muggletonians, who professed to be believers in "the two last prophets and messengers of God, John Reeve and Ludowick Muggleton," found in the great Quaker principle an assurance of the incarnation of the Prince of Darkness as well as the Divinity, and of many other peculiar crotchets. These last were among the fiercest antagonists, both of the Quakers and the Behmonists, apparently for no other reason so much as on account of the contiguity of their respective creeds, or what they all three had in common. "Knowledge of the true God and the right devil," writes Muggleton, in 1661, in a letter to one of his female devotees (they seem, like those of Naylor, to have been mostly of that sex), "with the knowledge of the place and nature of heaven, and the place and nature of hell, with the persons and nature of angels, and the mortality of the soul; upon the knowledge of these six principles dependeth the eternal happiness of man, in which Jacob Bemon was utterly ignorant; yet he doth talk of a God, and a devil, and of angels; but knows nothing of the person and nature of them. Yet his philosophical light was above all men that doth profess religion, until this commission of the Spirit came forth, which hath brought Jacob Bemon's light, and many other high lights, down very low within these ten years."[1] "I make no question," he writes to another disciple, also a woman, "but that you shall increase in faith, light, and life, to the opposing of all those blind and dark lights, the Quakers, that have no God but what is within them, and that light within them will be found in the end to be but darkness; and then how great will that darkness be! For their God and their light within themselves will perish to eternity; for, though they seem to be the best of all the seven churches in righteousness of life, and do suffer more by the powers of the nation than any other, yet they are the worst of all the seven churches in point of doctrine; for they are absolutely the spirit of Antichrist, which denieth both the Father and the Son."[2] His letters and other works are full of passages to the same effect; but the most extraordinary of his effusions in this strain is his "Sentence of Damnation" upon twenty-six Quakers at Cork, who, at a quarterly meeting held there in July, 1673, had thought it necessary to vindicate themselves from the imputation, which it seems had got abroad, that they had gone over to the Muggletonians, as a good many of their brethren had done, by publishing what they called their testimony against the errors of that sect. The testimony is a short and comparatively mild protestation; Muggleton's reply extends to thirteen quarto pages, and in scorn and arrogance, though not perhaps in dignity, might match any fulmination of Hildebrand himself. One paragraph of it is curious, as entering with some minuteness into the history both of Muggletonianism and of Quakerism:—"Whereas you say, this spirit, meaning Reeve and Muggleton, hath been lurking in secret places for a season; to this I say it hath been almost as openly declared as the Quakers' spirit hath, and almost as long it hath appeared in this last age of the world, for matter of time, as the Quakers' antichristian spirit hath appeared. It is almost twenty-two years since this commission of the spirit hath appeared; and the spirit of Antichrist in the Quakers hath appeared but few years more. And when Reeve and Muggleton [the repetition of this mercantile-firm-looking designation for the new religion has an odd effect] did appear at the first, this declaration and doctrine was far more public than the appearance of the Quakers: why? because we wrote our faith, doctrine, and commission, and printed it to the world, whereby the people took more public notice of us than of the Quakers; for at that time there were but few Quakers of note: neither did they print any thing of their faith and doctrine, what they would have people to believe; and I suppose that, if the first book the Quakers wrote to vindicate the principles of the Quakers' doctrine could be produced, it would not bear so long a time as Reeve's and Muggleton's commission-book doth. But, however, the Quakers at that time had witchcraft fits, which did rather fright the beholders of them than inform their judgments. But since that, Muggleton hath cast out that devil out of many of them, by the sentence of damnation upon the chief of them; so that it hath eased the whole body of the Quakers of those witchcraft fits, that were formerly very rife in the Quakers' people; so that now there is hardly a witchcraft fit can be procured among them. I do believe that we have written and printed, if it were possible to gather them all together in public, more than most of the Quakers in England have written; however, our books trouble the world more than any Quakers' books do whatsoever. Likewise, we were public enough twenty years ago with you Quakers, when we gave sentence of damnation upon four of your chief leaders, if not the first broachers of the Quakers' antichristian doctrine: viz., George Fox, the elder and younger both, Francis Howgell and Edward Burroughes: these four, as I remember, were the first Quakers that were damned for denying that God hath a body of his own, distinct from man and all other creatures. . . . . So that you Quakers, of all people in the world, have the least cause to say this spirit hath lain lurking in secret places. Indeed, we have not followed the practice of you Quakers, to compass sea and land to gain proselytes, as many of you have. . . . . The antichristian spirit in the Quakers hath enlarged itself very much within these fifteen years, which hath been the cause that the spirit of the true Christ in us hath enlarged itself, in opposition to the spirit of Antichrist in the Quakers, and more especially since John Reeve's death; for in his time there were but few Quakers in comparison to what are now, and little notice taken of them in his time; but since they have increased and multiplied exceedingly. But, since Muggleton began to oppose them, by writing against their bodiless God within them, it hath put a great stop to them; and not only so, but this doctrine of Reeve and Muggleton hath delivered many innocent souls out of the snares of the Quakers. Besides, the spirit did not lurk in any secret place when I wrote to Edward Bourne, Samuel Hooton, William Smith, Thomas Taylor, and several others, which is near twelve years ago, wherein they were damned to eternity for despising that doctrine you call erroneous; and ever since that letter to Samuel Hooton and William Smith, I have not been suffered to lurk in secret places. For you Quakers have caused me to be the publickest man in the world. . . . . I am not only hated of you Quakers, but am hated of all the speakers and ministers of all the seven churches of Europe, besides thousands of their hearers; so that it is an impossible thing that I should have lain in any secret place."

He afterward boasts that it had never been his custom to compel people to enter the kingdom of heaven, whether they would or no, as the Quakers, he asserts, were in the habit of doing. "You Quakers," he goes on, "keep a great bustle to keep your disciples to you, for fear of losing them; I never did endeavor to get your disciples from you, yet there are many of them that are come to the life of this doctrine of Reeve and Muggleton, which you call erroneous. And, if they could not have found rest in this doctrine and commission, they had liberty to return to you again. And can you Quakers tell the reason why so many of your disciples that were absolute of you should come to me and never return to you again. And it is a more admirable thing that there should not be one of Muggleton's disciples, or true believers of him, to fall from him to the Quakers not this fifteen years; I know not one; neither do they stumble or startle any more, if they truly believe Reeve and Muggleton's doctrine." These ten years and better, he adds, had he been engaged against the whole host of Quakers, they being many, and he but one man; yet he had broken the jawbone of their strength to pieces, and shattered them in confusion. Many of their mightiest men of valor had come against him, but he had overcome them all, and scattered their followers, as David did Goliath and the Philistines. William Penn, indeed, he admits, still survived, and "hath been more zealous for the spirit of Antichrist than the former that went before him. But "for this," exclaims the prophet, "he is damned, body and soul, to eternity; and it will not be long before he shall possess the reward of his blasphemy; which is this:—his soul, which he saith can not die, it shall die two deaths; it shall pass through this first death, which is natural and appointed unto all men once to die, and enter into the second death, which is eternal, in utter darkness, where he shall never die, nor never live in comfort, even a living death and dying life; this is the second death, which God hath prepared for the seed of the serpent, such as Penn and others that despise such a God as hath a body, form, and shape like man; and he shall remember that he was told so by me." The virulence and fury of fanaticism have probably never outdone this coarse and daring effusion; but it is scarcely possible to believe that Muggleton was a genuine fanatic. He appears rather to have been, in the greater part, if not altogether, an unprincipled impostor, who, by dint of sheer impudence and assumption, succeeded in deceiving others without deceiving himself, and, by considerable sagacity and tact in the art of managing vulgar minds, and the most inordinate self-reliance, contrived to turn the folly and fanaticism of others to good account in the gratification of his own ambition and worldly interests. The most intense love of power breathes, or, rather, snorts, in every sentence he utters; and his letters furnish, also, abundance of evidence that his trade of a prophet was by no means an unproductive one in a worldly sense. He has frequently occasion to acknowledge remittances of money and other presents from his admirers and followers. Of all prophets, popes, or oracles, great or small, pagan or Christian, Roman, Protestant, or sectarian, Muggleton has certainly the readiest knack of consigning his adversaries to perdition. The unceremonious way in which he lanches his edicts to that effect is at once horrible and ludicrous. We have already seen some specimens of his performances in this line; he concludes his letter to the Quakers of Cork, after quoting their denunciation of his doctrine as erroneous, in the following fashion: "These words are the sin against the Holy Ghost; and, inasmuch as God hath chosen me on earth to be the judge of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, therefore, in obedience to my commission from the true God, I do pronounce all those twenty-six persons whose names are above written cursed and damned in their souls and bodies, from the presence of God, elect men, and angels, to eternity." And the same summary mode of proceeding is resorted to with bodies of persons and particular individuals in numbers of other instances.[1]

[1] Thus, having a dispute with one John Hyde, a bookseller, about the binding of some books, he concludes a long letter to him on the subject, with the same solemn curse, and adds, "You may now shake hands with Mr. Colebrooke, for your portions will be both alike. Only, I would advise you to take the money for binding the books, there is 7*s.* 6*d.* inclosed in your letter; you had as good receive it as not, for God hath rejected it, and I have rejected it." (Epistles, p. 212.) Hyde, he maintains, had originally agreed to take payment for his work in books. Another very long letter is addressed to Mr. Edward Delamain, a Baptist preacher, living in Marlborough, a brother of Alexander Delamain, one of Muggleton's most zealous disciples. Among other "blasphemies" of which this Baptist is accused of having spoken are these:—1. That the letter of the Scriptures ought to be credited as if God did speak himself. 2. That he preferred the words of Peter and Paul, being dead so many hundred years, as of more consequence now than the voice of God's word spoken to John Reeve. "These things considered," concludes Muggleton, "in obedience to my commission from God, I do, for these your wicked speeches afore written, pronounce Edward Delamain, Baptist preacher, cursed and damned, both in soul and body, from the presence of God, elect men, and angels, to all eternity. And it will be a marvelous thing if you do escape a mean, low, even almost a vagabond condition in this life, besides your damnation hereafter; for this I must tell you, that sins of this nature seldom escape a double curse. But now you may go see if you can preach and pray this curse off you again; and, if your will had any power in it, now you had best bestir yourself." (Ibid., p. 239.) Muggleton had evidently a real, hearty enjoyment in dooming his fellow-creatures to eternal torment. On the other hand, his theory of the felicity of a future state is probably the grossest ever propounded. "All of us," he says in one of his letters, "that have eat of the flesh of God, and drank his blood by faith here in the state of mortality, we shall be gathered together in the resurrection as the fowls, to fly in the midst of heaven, and being immortalized shall come to the supper of the great God, that we may eat of the same flesh that he eateth of, which is the flesh of persecuting kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, even of judges, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all freemen, and bondmen, and of small and great, that is, all wicked, reprobate men, that have persecuted and hated the Lord's prophets, apostles, and messengers, which he sent in this world. Oh! how blessed are we that shall sup with the great God of heaven, in the destruction of our enemies; for, as God was hated when he was on earth, so are we for his sake; and as God is pleased to make his supper with the destruction of the souls and bodies of the seed of the

The Restoration was, on the face of it, a victory over both the Independents and the general swarm of the Sectaries; and that catastrophe had, accordingly, been resisted to the last by the united efforts of almost the whole of these two great bodies. The Quakers, alone, of the crowd of minor sects, prepared to welcome, or, at least, to acquiesce in, the coming change, influenced not only by their distinguishing principle of passive obedience in all such cases, but also by the sufferings they had endured under the republican government, while all other denominations of religionists remained unmolested. George Fox and his followers, indeed, seem to have been generally looking for the return of the king some years before it happened. He tells us himself that it was a common surmise among the republicans, before the death of Oliver Cromwell, that the Quakers held meetings to consult about bringing in Kiog Charles.[1] "I had," he adds, "a sight and sense of the king's return a good while before, and so had some others. I wrote to Oliver several times, and let him know that, while he was persecuting God's people, they whom he accounted his enemies were preparing to come upon him. When some forward spirits that came among us would have bought Somerset House, that we might have meetings in it, I forbade them to do so; for I then foresaw the king's coming in again." He then tells a story of a woman who came to him in the Strand with a prophecy concerning King Charles's coming in, three years before he came: "I saw," he says, "her prophecy was true, and that a great stroke must come upon them in power; for they that had then got possession were so exceedingly high, and such great persecution was acted by them who called themselves saints, that . . . , in my great suffering and travail of spirit for the nation, being grievously burdened with their hypocrisy, treachery, and falsehood, I saw God would bring that a-top of them which they had been a-top of."[1] "There had been tenderness," he says elsewhere, "in many of them formerly, when they were low; but when they were got up, had killed and taken possession, they came to be as bad as others; so that we had much to do with them about our hats, and saying Thou and Thee to them. They turned their profession of patience and moderation into rage and madness; and many of them were like distracted men for this hat honor."[2] He particularly mentions Sir Harry Vane as insisting, in his character of chairman of the parliamentary committee appointed for the trial of Quakers, upon their putting off their hats. "Many of us," adds Fox, "having been imprisoned upon contempts (as they called them) for not pulling off our hats, it was not a likely thing that Friends, who had suffered so long for it from others, should put off their hats to him."[3] And, if we may believe Fox, the Independent ministers, after getting possession of the benefices of the national church, inconsistent as such proceedings should seem to be with the fundamental principle of Independency, were not behind their Presbyterian brethren in compelling those who belonged to other persuasions to contribute to their support. "Great spoiling also," he writes, under date of 1655, "there was of Friends' goods for tithes, by the Independent and Presbyterian priests, and some Baptist priests, that had got the steeple-houses."[4] For Cromwell, who although himself as little inclined to persecute the Quakers as any other sect, was annoyed by their unnecessary pertinacity, as he deemed it, in small matters of form, and did not care to risk much in protecting them, generally professing to disbelieve the accounts of their sufferings that were laid before him, Fox felt manifestly very little real regard, though the humble Quaker and the lord protector always kept outwardly on good terms. One day, in 1656, Fox and two or three of his friends, having rode from Kingston, were approaching London: "When we came near Hyde Park," says Fox, "we saw a great concourse of people, and, looking toward them, we espied the protector coming in his coach. Whereupon I rode to his coachside; and some of his life-guard would have put me away, but he forbade them. So I rode by his coachside with him, declaring what the Lord gave me to say unto him of his condition, and of the sufferings of Friends in the nation; showing him how contrary this persecution was to Christ and his apostles, and to Christianity. When we were come to James's Park gate I left him, and at parting he desired me to come to his house." What follows affords an interesting glimpse of Cromwell's familiar domestic habits:—"The next day, one of his wife's maids, whose name was Mary Sanders, came to me at my lodging, and told me her master came to her and said he would tell her some good news. When she asked him what it was, he told her serpent to eternity, and he hath invited us, the fowls of heaven, to sup with the great God, why should not we rejoice in this supper which the great God hath made, even in the destruction of this wicked world; for this earth is a habitation of devils while the world doth endure. And for my part I could willingly sup with the great God of heaven, that hath redeemed my soul in the destruction of this world, that I might eat the flesh of mighty men—mayors, judges, juries, small and great devils, that have hated me without a cause, &c., &c." (Letter to Colonel Phaire and the rest of the Believers, dated London, 16th Feb., 1680, in A Stream from the Tree of Life, or The Third Record Vindicated, 4to. 1758, p. 28.) Muggleton, it appears, had smarted more than once under the lash of the laws; he speaks in various places both of having been imprisoned and of having stood in the pillory. He and his friend Reeve, it seems, were originally two tailors. One of the charges made against Muggleton by his enemies was, that he contradicted, in some things, the doctrine of his deceased associate, Reeve. "To this I say," he writes in one of his letters, "I have power so to do, and I had power so to do when he was alive, and did contradict him in some things when he was alive; and John Reeve wrote some things that was error to me, and error in itself, which I did oppose him in to his face, and he would not deny it. And yet, notwithstanding, John Reeve was infallible, and did write by an unerring spirit." This last assertion he explains by the distinction, that, the things in which Reeve's judgment and experience were in error "being of no consequence as to eternal happiness, they were let pass. Besides," he adds, "none can judge of a prophet's writing or judgment, but he that is equal in power and judgment with him. Being chosen of God, I had power to contradict him in his judgment; and, though it was error, it would have been rebellion in any believer to do as I did. And now, I being the last liver, it is rebellion in you to call any thing lies or error that I do justify to be true; for none is to call me to an account, or to resist my judgment in spiritual things or matters, but God only." (Ibid., p. 14.) We do not know whether this coarse impostor has still any believers or disciples; but the Muggletonians, it should appear, were still a sect among us within the latter half of the last century, when some of the prophet's writings were reprinted, and others published for the first time from his manuscripts.

George Fox was come to town. She replied, that was good news indeed (for she had received truth); but she said she could hardly believe him till he told her how I met him, and rode from Hyde Park to James's Park with him."[1] Soon after, Fox, accompanied by a friend, went to Whitehall, where they found Dr. Owen, vice-chancellor of Oxford, with the protector. They spoke to him of their inward light, which, he said, was a natural light; "but we," says Fox, "showed him the contrary.... The power of the Lord God arose in me, and I was moved in it to bid him lay down his crown at the feet of Jesus. Several times I spoke to him to the same effect. Now I was standing by the table, and he came and sat upon the table's side by me, and said he would be as high as I was; and so continued speaking against the light of Christ Jesus; and went away in a light manner." Fox adds, that, nevertheless, the Lord's power came over Cromwell, so that when he came to his wife and other company he observed that he had never parted so from them before; but this finish of the story, or at least the interpretation put upon the words said to have dropped from the protector, may be fairly set down to the account of the narrator's power of self-delusion, or what in ordinary cases would be called vanity, a quality which is legible on every page of the good man's journal, often peering out, very amusingly, from the midst of his pious gravity and earnestness.

Two years after, and very shortly before Cromwell's death, Fox had another interview with him, having come from Kingston to Hampton Court to speak with him about the sufferings of the sect. "I met him," he writes, "riding into Hampton Court Park, and before I came to him, as he rode at the head of his life-guard, I saw and felt a waft (or apparition) of death go forth against him; and when I came to him, he looked like a dead man. After I had laid the sufferings of Friends before him, and had warned him, according as I was moved to speak to him, he bid me come to his house. So I returned to Kingston, and the next day went up to Hampton Court, to speak further with him. But when I came he was sick; and —— Harvey, who was one that waited on him, told me the doctors were not willing I should speak with him. So I passed away, and I never saw him more."[2] He was very indignant at the honors paid to the protector's remains; and the terms in which he expresses himself upon this occasion may lead us to suspect that a dislike to the man, as well as to the ceremony, had some share in provoking his wrath:—"Now was there a great pother made about the image or effigies of Oliver Cromwell lying in state; men standing and sounding with trumpets over his image after he was dead. At this my spirit was greatly grieved; and the Lord, I found, was highly offended."[3] In the plotting and counter-plotting of the various factions which immediately followed the departure of the great moderator and controller, Fox thought it necessary to indite a general epistle to his followers, warning them against taking any part on the one side or the other. Soon after, when the royalist insurrection, headed by Sir George Booth, broke out in Cheshire, some foolish, rash spirits, he tells us, that came sometimes among them, were ready to take up their arms; but he was moved of the Lord to warn and forbid them, and they were quiet. "In the time of the Committee of Safety (so called)," he adds, "we were invited by them to take up arms, and great places and commands were offered some of us; but we denied them all, and declared against it both by word and writing."[1] The historians of Quakerism inform us that the society generally considered the Restoration as a single instance of the interposition of Providence to restore peace and order to a distracted nation; and in this light it is viewed by Fox in a paper which he wrote, some time after it took place, from Lancaster jail. Referring to his having been charged with being an enemy to the king, he declares this to be false: "and I can say," he adds, "it is of the Lord that he is come in, to bring down many unrighteously set up; of which I had a sight three years before he came in. . . . I have been often imprisoned and persecuted, these eleven or twelve years, by them that have been against both the king and his father; . . . but not by them that were for the king."[2] Indeed, in the knowledge of this friendly disposition of the Quakers, Charles II., very soon after his return, at an audience which he granted to Richard Hubberthorn, an eminent member of their society, had given his royal assurance, in the strongest terms, that they should not be molested for their religious opinions so long as they lived peaceably. "Some Friends also," Fox tells us, "were admitted into the House of Lords, and had liberty to declare their reasons why they could not pay tithes, swear, nor go to the steeple-house worship, or join with others in worship; and they heard them moderately. And there being about seven hundred Friends in prison in the nation, who had been committed under Oliver's and Richard's government, upon contempts (as they call them), when the king came in he set them all at liberty. There seemed at that time an inclination and intention in the government to grant Friends liberty, because they were sensible that we had suffered as well as they under the former powers."[3] The mad attempt of Venner and the Fifth-Monarchy men, however, drew down, very undeservedly, the violence of the government upon the Quakers, who, in the confused and altogether erroneous notions that were entertained of their principles, were supposed to be at the bottom of that wild project for overturning the new government and substituting the dominion of the saints; and they were immediately in great numbers thrown into prison. "Upon this insurrection of the Fifth-Monarchy men," says Fox, "great havoc was made both in city and country, so that it was dangerous for sober people to stir abroad for several weeks after; and hardly could either man or woman go up and down the streets to buy provisions for their families without being abused. In the country they dragged men and women out of their houses, and some sick men out of their beds by the legs. . . . Now were the prisons everywhere filled with Friends and others, in the city and country; and the posts were so laid for the searching of letters that none could pass unsearched. We heard of several thousands of our Friends that were cast into prison in several parts of the nation; and Margaret Fell (the widow of Judge Fell, whom Fox afterward married) carried an account of them to the king and council. The next week we had an account of several thousands more that were cast into prison; and she went and laid them also before the king and council. They wondered how we could have such intelligence, seeing they have given such strict charge for the intercepting of all letters: but the Lord did so order it that we had an account, notwithstanding all their stoppings."[1] It is stated that there were imprisoned in Bristol nearly 190 Quakers; in Lancaster, 270; in Westmoreland, 116; in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 229; and in the North Riding, 126.[2] It was soon discovered that these unfortunate persons had had nothing to do with the outbreak of the few insane enthusiasts in the city of London, which had thrown the government, and indeed the whole nation, into such needless alarm; and upon this they were all discharged, an order being issued that they should be set at liberty without payment of fees; but other pretenses were soon found for gratifying the popular feeling by the persecution of the Quakers, who, more than any other of the numerous rival sects of the day, seem to have had their hand against every man, and every man's hand against them. The old laws against the non-payment of tithes and non-attendance at the parish churches on Sundays and holydays were revived and enforced against them at the will of every bigoted magistrate or interested informer; and the tendering to them of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, which of course they refused to take, was always a ready way of procuring their consignment to durance, on the statutes enacted in the reigns of Elizabeth and James. In 1662, Fox and his friend Hubberthorn drew up "a list of some of the sufferings of the people of God, in scorn called Quakers," which they forwarded to the king, along with a letter beginning, "Friend, who art the chief ruler of these dominions;" and from which it appeared that there had been imprisoned in the time of the Commonwealth, for Quakerism, 3173 persons, of whom 32 had died in their dungeons, and 73 still remained in confinement; and that since the Restoration there had been imprisoned 3068 more. Fox himself was soon after added to the number.

Meanwhile, the other bodies of religionists had also all had their hopes and fears from the restored government set at rest. It was clear from the first, as we have observed above, that the return of the king must prove fatal to the ascendency of the Independents and the general mob of the minor Sectaries; and equally clear that some form of episcopacy would now be the established form of church government. The Independents and Sectaries, with the exception of the Quakers, had, in fact, resisted the restoration of the monarchical constitution to the utmost of their power and to the last moment; and, when it was brought about in spite of them, they could lay their account with nothing else than to be treated as the beaten party. They, who, in their instrument of government, in the year 1653, had expressly excepted popery and prelacy from the toleration which was then established for all other forms of Christianity, could not expect that prelacy, now that it had gotten the upper hand, should allow them to retain any place in the national church. The utmost they could look for was such a toleration in their character of dissenters as they had themselves in their day of power denied to even the most modest profession of episcopacy. But, although this was the situation of the Independents, the Presbyterians might very naturally seem to themselves to be differently circumstanced, and to have a reasonable claim not only to toleration, but to a participation with the Episcopalians in the remodeled establishment. It is true, they also, as well as the Independents, had, in their hour of triumph, hurled against episcopacy their edicts of fiercest excommunication; they had turned the Episcopalian clergy out of every living in the church, and had done what they could to drive popery and prelacy out of the land—proclaiming the persecution of both to be one of the most sacred duties of true religion. True, likewise, prelacy and presbytery had in these kingdoms been engaged in an almost incessant contest for each other's extirpation ever since the Reformation; the strife between them had raged in Scotland for sixty years before it had begun in England; and the longer it had lasted it had only grown the more furious and deadly. All this might seem, at first sight, to make any union between them a thing not to be thought of. On the other hand, however, it was to be remembered that the opposition between them in past times had, after all, arisen rather out of circumstances than from any hostility inherent in their natures, and that it had been exasperated to the pitch to which it had gone by long habits of contention from a comparatively moderate beginning. They had not at first either denounced each other as absolutely unscriptural and intolerable, nor had either asserted any exclusive divine right in its own favor. These were late pretensions, into which both parties had been hurried by the mere ardor of conflict. Originally, all that either claimed was a preference over the other, in certain circumstances, on grounds, not of absolute right or principle, but only of expediency. In fact, the differences between them, coolly considered, could hardly in any view be called differences of principle. Long opposition and controversy had led gradually to some divergence of doctrinal profession; but, according to their ancient and admitted standards of faith, English episcopacy and Scottish presbytery were nearly as one in all the fundamental points of doctrine. At least, if Calvinism was the avowed creed of the latter, it was also the not disavowed creed of the former. Both likewise belonged to what we have called the second class of the forms of religious opinion, occupying the same midway ground of Protestant Established-Churchism, by which they were separated from the Romanists on the one hand and the Independents on the other. They agreed in the cardinal point of neither holding the authority of the church to be absolute with the former, nor of rejecting it altogether with the latter. The motto of the one as well as of the other was, neither the infallibility of the church with the Romanists, nor the right of private judgment in the interpretation of the Scriptures with the Independents, but the Scriptures as interpreted by the church—the determination of the church as avowedly and exclusively founded on the warrant of the Scriptures. Holding this great distinguishing principle in common, they might be divided and set against each other by their clashing interests at particular emergencies, and might fight all the more fiercely when they had once begun, by reason of their very affinity, as is the wont of nations and of private individuals as well as of religious sects; but, in circumstances favorable to their reconcilement and union, their agreement upon so fundamental a matter would tend to draw them closer together, and to fit them the better for coöperation, and, if necessary, for mutual concession and compromise. Had not this been seen of late, when, after the lengths to which they had gone in concert with the Independents and the Sectaries in pursuit of their first object—the overthrow of episcopacy—the Presbyterians, both in England and in Scotland, had cordially and eagerly united with the Episcopalians against their former allies for the attainment of their next object—the bringing back of the king? So that, on the whole, we may say the two churches, or systems of religious opinion, were really at one, or nearly at one, in regard to every thing, excepting merely the external forms of worship and the matter of ecclesiastical government; nor was there any apparent reason for concluding that either would refuse to forego, if necessary, part of its own views on these surely secondary and non-essential portions, if they were not to be considered rather accessories and outlying territories than integral portions of their common Christianity.

It was evident, however, as we have said, that, in so far at least as England was concerned, the restoration of monarchy would prove substantially the restoration of episcopacy also, and that all, therefore, that the Presbyterians could hope for would be such a modification or relaxation of the ancient Episcopalian polity as would obviate their more serious scruples, and enable them to conform to the government of bishops and a book of common prayer. It is admitted, indeed, by the Puritan historians themselves, that at this moment the national wish was decidedly for the reëstablishment of episcopacy—nay, that, as Calamy and the other Presbyterian ministers of London informed their brethren, when some of them talked absurdly of setting up or maintaining their own system, the general stream and current was for the old prelacy in its pomp and height.[1] In these circumstances the hottest of the Presbyterians very soon saw the necessity of making up their minds to be satisfied with such a scheme of comprehension, if they could get even that, as should suffer some few of the forms of presbytery to subsist in combination with the essence and power of episcopacy. The wisest among them saw from the first that even this was of very unlikely attainment. "These divines," writes Richard Baxter, speaking of the Dutch and French Protestant clergymen, who, immediately before the Restoration, had sent letters to their Calvinistic and Presbyterian brethren in England, advising them to unite with the royalist party—"These divines knew nothing of the state of affairs in England. They knew not those men who were to be restored with the king. . . . They pray for the success of my labors, when they are persuading me to put an end to my labors, by setting up those prelates who will silence me and many hundreds more. They persuade me to that which will separate me from my flock, and then pray that I may be a blessing to them!" "And yet," he adds, "I am for restoring the king, that, when we are silenced, and our ministry at an end, and some of us lie in prisons, we may there, and in that condition, have peace of conscience in the discharge of our duty, and the exercise of faith, patience, and charity in our sufferings."[1]

The mixed scheme which the Presbyterians now determined to support was that many years before propounded by Archbishop Usher, and commonly called his reduction of episcopacy. Its principle was the combination with the episcopal office and authority of a system of church courts composed of the body of the clergy, by which the affairs of the church should be chiefly regulated. It was proposed that—the primate or archbishop continuing to preside over each province as heretofore, and the bishops over their several dioceses—a number of new suffragans, or inferior bishops, should be created equal to the number of rural deaneries; that a synod of the clergy of each such subdivision should be assembled every month by the suffragan; a diocesan synod once or twice a-year by the bishop; and a provincial synod, consisting of all the bishops and suffragans, and delegates from the clergy of each diocese, every third year by the archbishop: if the parliament should be sitting, the two provincial synods might join together and form a national synod, wherein all appeals from inferior synods might be received, their acts examined, and all ecclesiastical matters whatsover finally determined. This was a close imitation of the Scottish system of presbyteries, synods, and general assemblies, with this difference only, that it made the suffragans, bishops, and archbishops constant moderators or presidents of these several church courts, instead of leaving the members to elect their own president.

We have given, in the preceding chapter, an account of the conference that was held on the 22d of October, 1660, at the house of the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, in the presence of the king, between the bishops and the representatives of the Presbyterian clergy, which was followed, three days after, by the publication of "His Majesty's Declaration to all his loving subjects of his kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, concerning ecclesiastical affairs," commonly called the "healing declaration."[1] The royal assurances contained in this paper, although they did not go so far as the Presbyterians could have wished, were yet so satisfactory to the generality of that party, that, if they had been fulfilled, presbytery and episcopacy in England might perhaps have embraced one another, and become united in one comprehensive national establishment. The Presbyterian clergy in and near London presented an address of thanks to his majesty for an announcement of his royal intentions, which they found to be "so full of indulgence and gracious condescension;" and they assured him that, although all things in the proposed frame of ecclesiastical government were not exactly suited to their judgment, yet his majesty's moderation had so great an influence on them, that they would, "to the utmost, endeavor the healing of the breaches, and promoting the peace and union of the church." Soon after, Dr. Reynolds, one of the most distinguished of the Presbyterian ministers, accepted the bishopric of Norwich; and another of them, Dr. Manton, being presented to the living of Covent Garden by the Earl of Bedford, consented to receive episcopal institution from the hands of the Bishop of London. Others, however, were more suspicious or less ready for preferment; Calamy declined the bishopric of Litchfield and Coventry till the king's declaration should be passed into a law; Baxter retained his fears or his disinclination to the episcopal office, and refused the bishopric of Hereford; and Dr. Bates and two others, to whom deaneries were offered, after some hesitation, eventually followed his example. Even Manton, seeing how things were going at court, now refused the deanery of Rochester.

After a few months, the bill which was brought into the House of Commons for giving legal effect to the "healing declaration" was defeated, as has been related in the last chapter, not without strong reasons for believing that the court itself, at whose instance the measure had been professedly brought in, was at the bottom of the opposition which succeeded in throwing it out.[2] This was in November, 1660. Baxter, however, admits that at this time the general body of the people, as well as the parliament, were ripe for any thing the court might propose;[3] and Burnet tells us that "the joy spread through the nation had got a parliament to be elected of men so high and hot, that, unless the court had restrained them, they would have carried things much further than they did against all that had been concerned in the late wars."[4] After rejecting the Declaration Bill, this parliament, or convention, passed an act directing that every sequestrated minister who had not justified the late king's murder, or declared against infant baptism, should be restored to his living before the 25th of December following, the present incumbent quitting it, and being accountable for all dilapidations and all arrears of fifths not paid.

This act at once dispossessed some hundreds of ministers brought into the church in the time of the Commonwealth. Among others, Baxter was obliged to resign his living of Kidderminster, where he had labored for many years among a people that adored him, to the old vicar, who had been ejected in 1640.

In the concluding clause of the "healing declaration," it had been announced that the final determination of all matters appertaining to the establishment of "a perfect and entire unity and uniformity throughout the nation" should be left to the advice of a national synod, to be duly called after a little time should have cooled men's tempers down to the requisite calmness for such consultations.[1] Accordingly, royal letters patent were issued at Westminster on the 25th of March, 1661, appointing twelve bishops, with nine clergymen as assistants, on the side of the Episcopal church, to meet with an equal number of Presbyterian divines in the Savoy, at the lodgings of Dr. Sheldon, bishop of London and master of the Savoy, "to advise upon and review the Book of Common Prayer, ... and to take into their serious and grave consideration the several directions and rules, forms of prayer, and things in the said Book of Common Prayer contained; and to advise and consult upon the same, and the several objections and exceptions which shall now be raised against the same; and, if occasion be, to make such reasonable and necessary alterations, corrections, and amendments as shall be agreed upon to be needful and expedient for the giving satisfaction to tender consciences, and the restoring and continuance of peace and unity in the churches under his majesty's government and protection; . . . . and to certify and present to his majesty in writing, under their several hands, the matters and things whereupon they shall so determine, to be by his majesty approved and established." Among the Episcopalian commissioners were Frewen, archbishop of York, Sheldon, bishop of London, Cosins of Durham, Morley of Worcester, Walton of Chester, Gauden of Exeter, Reynolds of Norwich, &c.;[2] among their assistants, Dr. Peter Heylin, Dr. John Barwick, Dr. Peter Gunning, Dr. John Pearson, and Dr. Thomas Pierce. Their opponents were the most eminent of the Presbyterian clergy—William Spurstow, Edmund Calamy, and Matthew Newcomen, names famous ever since the Smectymnuus controversy;[3] the learned Richard Baxter, styled "Clerk, late of Kidderminster;" the great mathematician, Dr. John Wallis, then Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, &c. The conference was to be brought to a termination within four months from the date of the commission.

The commissioners assembled for the first time on the 13th of April, when Sheldon opened the Neal, who rarely quotes any authority for his most questionable statements, and who mangles every document he professes to transcribe, places the name of Bishop Reynolds at the head of the list of Presbyterian divines.—(Hist. Pur., iii. 85.) Reynolds appears certainly to have acted with the Presbyterian party. [3] See ante, p. 592.

discussion with a short speech in which he observed that the Episcopalian party, being perfectly satisfied with the established forms of worship, had nothing to propose; and would, therefore, expect any objections that might be entertained to the existing order of things, and any innovations that might be desired, to be stated by their opponents. He further suggested that the other party should bring forward all they had to offer at once; and also that, for greater clearness, their propositions should be presented in writing. The Presbyterian commissioners, on the other hand, urged the expediency of proceeding by the method of oral debate, or what they called an amicable conference. At last it was agreed that the business should be begun by written papers, and that a debate might be allowed afterward upon any points that seemed to require it. "Papers," says Burnet, "were upon this given in. The Presbyterians moved that Bishop Usher's reduction should be laid down as a groundwork to treat on; that bishops should not govern their dioceses by their single authority, nor depute it to their lay officers in their courts, but should, in matters of ordination and jurisdiction, take along with them the counsel and concurrence of the presbyters. They did offer several exceptions to the liturgy, against the many responses by the people; and they desired all might be made one continued prayer. They desired that no lessons should be taken out of the aprocryphal books; that the psalms used in the daily service should be according to the new translation. They excepted to many parts of the office of baptism that import the inward regeneration of all that were baptized. . . . They insisted mainly against kneeling at the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, chiefly against the imposing it; and moved that the posture might be left free, and that the use of the surplice, of the cross in baptism, of godfathers being the sponsors in baptism, and of the holydays, might be abolished."[1] In answer, however, to the demand for the adoption of Archbishop Usher's scheme, it was pointed out to them that the king's commission gave them no authority even to take into consideration any questions relating to the government of the church. Struck dumb upon the main subject about which they were come to talk by this discovery, which they ought to have made sooner, the Presbyterian divines were further embarrassed and disheartened by other circumstances in their position: they were neither at one among themselves, nor had they any authority to act for the general body which they were considered to represent. "Sheldon," continues Burnet, "saw well what the effect would be of putting them to make all their demands at once. The number of them raised a mighty outcry against them, as people that never could be satisfied. But nothing gave so great an advantage over them as their offering a new liturgy. In this they were divided among themselves. Some were for insisting on a few important things, reckoning that, if they were gained, and a union followed upon that, it would be easier to gain other things afterward. But all this was overthrown by Mr. Baxter, who was a man of great piety, and, if he had not meddled in too many things, would have been esteemed one of the learned men of the age. He writ near two hundred books; of these three are large folios: he had a very moving and pathetical way of writing, and was his whole life long a man of great zeal and much simplicity; but was, most unhappily, subtil and metaphysical in every thing. There was a great submission paid to him by the whole party. So he persuaded them that, from the words of the commission, they were bound to offer every thing that they thought might conduce to the good or peace of the church, without considering what was like to be obtained, or what effect their demanding so much might have in irritating the minds of those who were then the superior body in strength and number." It was in this chivalrous spirit that the resolution was adopted of settling all questions about the alterations to be made in the liturgy at once, by bringing forward an entire new one. Baxter took upon himself the task of preparing it, and his flying pen produced the finished work in a fortnight. It was composed entirely in the language of Scripture, and entitled the Reformed Liturgy; and, after having been approved of by the other Presbyterian commissioners, it was presented to the bishops for their acceptance. "This," says the historian of Puritanism, "gave great offense, as presuming that a liturgy drawn up by a single hand in fourteen days was to be preferred, or stand in competition with one which had been received in the church for a whole century. Besides, it was inconsistent with the commission, and the bishops' declaration of varying no further from the old standard than should appear to be necessary; and, therefore, the Reformed Liturgy, as it was called, was rejected at once without being examined." The Presbyterian brethren had recourse to remonstrances and expostulations; but their adversaries were inflexible. At last, when it was within ten days of the time fixed in the commission for the close of the conference, it was agreed that there should be a vivâ voce debate upon the single question of whether or not it was lawful to determine the certain use in the worship of God of forms and ceremonies to which some objected, even supposing them really and properly to belong to the class of things indifferent. Three champions of each side were appointed to manage the argument: Drs. Pearson, Gunning, and Sparrow, for the Episcopalians: Drs. Bates and Jacomb, and Mr. Baxter, for the Presbyterians. "The two men," continues Burnet, "that had the chief management of the debate were the most unfit to heal matters, and the fittest to widen them, that could have been found out. Baxter was the opponent, and Gunning was the respondent, who was afterward advanced first to Chichester, and then to Ely: he was a man of great reading, and noted for a special subtilty of arguing: all the arts of sophistry were made use of by him on all occasions, in as confident a manner as if they had been sound reasoning: he was a man of an innocent life, unweariedly active to very little purpose: he was much set on reconciling us with popery in some points; and because the charge of idolatry seemed a bar to all thoughts of reconciliation with them, he set himself with very great zeal to clear the church of Rome of idolatry: this made many suspect him as inclining to go over to them; but he was far from it, and was a very honest, sincere man, but of no sound judgment, and of no prudence in affairs; he was for our conforming in all things to the rules of the primitive church, particularly in praying for the dead, in the use of oil, with many other rituals: he formed many in Cambridge upon his own notions, who have carried them perhaps further than he intended. Baxter and he spent some days in much logical arguing, to the diversion of the town, who thought here were a couple of fencers engaged in disputes that could never be brought to an end, nor have any good effect." The battle of words, it is to be observed, was carried on in the presence of a numerous audience, which, however, is said to have consisted principally of the adherents of the Episcopalian party—another circumstance that is complained of as having contributed to the discouragement of their opponents. In the end, the two parties separated, when their commission would not allow them to wrangle any longer, without having concluded or agreed upon any thing.

On the 20th of November following, however, the king sent a letter to the convocation, which was then sitting, commanding them to review the Book of Common Prayer, and to propose such additions and amendments as they might think necessary, to be afterward "exhibited and presented for his majesty's further allowance and confirmation." The convocation was occupied a month in this review of the service-book, and it is said that their additions and alterations altogether amounted to about six hundred. Most of them, however, were extremely insignificant. Among the few that seem to have been more than mere amendments of style or grammar, the following may be noted:—the lessons were directed to be read, instead of being sung; some collects that had been objected to were omitted and others substituted; private baptism, which had been allowed to be performed, in cases of necessity, by midwives, was directed not to be administered except by a lawful minister; readiness or desire to be confirmed, as well as actual confirmation, was made a sufficient qualification for admission to the communion; in the order for visitation of the sick, absolution was only enjoined if it was the desire of the sick person; the minister was allowed to use his discretion as to the cases in which he should administer the communion to the sick; and it was directed that the burial service should not be used for any that died unbaptized, or that had laid violent hands on themselves. Additions were also made of a new office for the administration of baptism to grown-up persons, of forms of prayer to be used at sea, and of forms for the 30th of January and the 29th of May. At this time, also, were added the General Thanksgiving, the prayer for all conditions of men, and that for the High Court of Parliament, in which last the king was styled "most religious"—an epithet which, according to Burnet, "gave great offense, and occasioned much indecent raillery." The number of holydays, instead of being diminished, was increased by the addition of one commemorative of St. Barnabas, and another of the conversion of St. Paul. Many new lessons also—among others, the story of Bel and the Dragon—were introduced from the Apocrypha;

but it was arranged that no apocryphal lessons should be read on Sundays. The Common Prayer Book, with these alterations, by which it was considered by the generality of the Presbyterians to have been made more objectionable than before, was unanimously adopted by both Houses of Convocation on the 20th of December, and, having been approved of by the king, was transmitted to the House of Peers on the 24th of February, 1662, along with a message from his majesty, recommending that the book so altered should be that "which in and by the intended Act of Uniformity shall be appointed to be used by all that officiate in all cathedrals and collegiate churches and chapels, &c., and in all parish churches of England and Wales, under such sanctions and penalties as the parliament shall think fit." The bill here alluded to had been read a first time in the Commons on the 14th of January, and, having been finally passed in that House, after several debates, by a majority of 186 to 180, was afterward agreed to by the Lords, and received the royal assent, as has been related in the preceding chapter, on the 19th of May.[1] By this statute, the 14 Car. II., cap. 4, entitled "An Act for the Uniformity of Public Prayers and Administration of Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies, and for establishing the form of making, ordaining, and consecrating Bishops, Priests, and Deacons in the Church of England," it was directed that all ministers should henceforth use the amended Book of Common Prayer, and that all persons enjoying any ecclesiastical benefice or promotion within the realm of England should publicly declare their assent to the use of the same, and their approval of every thing contained in it, by reading before their congregations a certain formula to that effect, on some Lord's Day before the Feast of St. Bartholomew, or 24th of August next, on pain of deprivation. It was further enacted, by other clauses, that no person should continue to hold any benefice in the church who either was not already in holy orders by episcopal ordination, or should not be episcopally ordained before the said day of St. Bartholomew; and, besides a declaration of unfeigned assent and consent to all and every thing prescribed and contained in the Book of Common Prayer, and subscription to the oath of canonical obedience, the terms of conformity were now made to include the abjuration both of the Solemn League and Covenant, and of the lawfulness of taking up arms against the king, or any commissioned by him, on any pretense whatsoever, or, in other words, the taking of the new oath imposed in the Corporation Act passed in the preceding session.

The Act of Uniformity, comprehending as it did lecturers and all other descriptions of ministers as well as beneficed clergymen, and being withal so stringent and so incapable of being evaded in its conditions and requirements, at once winnowed the church of England of Presbyterianism and Puritanism to the last particle. "The Presbyterian ministers," says their own historian, "had only three months to consider what to do with themselves and their families. There were several consultations both in city and country, to know each other's sentiments; and it happened here, as it did afterward about taking the oaths to King William and Queen Mary: some, who persuaded their brethren to dissent, complied themselves, and got the others' livings. It is not to be supposed they all had the same scruples. Bishop Kennet says that renouncing the covenant was the greatest obstacle of conformity to the Presbyterians. But his lordship is mistaken: for, if abjuring the covenant had been omitted, they could not have taken the corporation oath. Some could not in conscience comply with the very form of the hierarchy. Great numbers scrupled the business of reordination, which implied a renouncing the validity of the former ministrations. But that which the dissenters of all denominations refused, was giving their assent and consent to all and every thing contained in the Book of Common Prayer. This they apprehended to be more than was due to any human composure."[1] Other accounts assert that the generality of them were long before they could make up their minds as to what course they should take. Echard, the Episcopal church historian, states that a continual intercourse of letters passed between those in the city of London and the others in the country; and that, as he had been assured by the best authority, the leaders at one time were for compliance, and then, upon further consideration, changed their minds. "Besides their consciences," he adds, "they were much encouraged by the greatness of their numbers, and were made to believe that, if they unanimously stood out, the church must come to them, since the people would never bear so shocking a change. Besides, they had great expectations from several friends at court, and particularly the popish party, who gave them great encouragement, not only by a promise of pensions to some, but also by a toleration, and a suspension of the act itself, which not long after was partly made good." Burnet also tells us that "those who led the party took great pains to have them all stick together: they infused it into them that, if great numbers stood out, they would show their strength, and produce new laws in their favor; whereas they would be despised if, after so much noise made, the greater part of them should conform. So, it was thought that many went out in the crowd, to keep their friends company."[2] There can be little doubt, however, that the more zealous and distinguished Presbyterian ministers had taken their resolution from the first as to how they themselves should act. Baxter, who, although ejected, as already mentioned, from the living of Kidderminster by the act for confirming and restoring of ministers, had been allowed to remain in the place as a lecturer on a small salary to be paid by the restored vicar, resigned that appointment some time before the day of St. Bartholomew; and others of his brethren followed his example, by way of making distinct proclamation to the rest of their body of the determination they had embraced. Most of the doomed ministers, however, both in London and in the country, preached their farewell sermons on the Sunday immediately preceding the 24th of August. It is asserted by their own historians, that on that fatal day about two thousand of them resigned their livings in the national establishment. "The numbers, however," as Burnet observes, "have been much controverted." "This," he adds, "raised a grievous outcry over the nation, though it was less considered at that time than it would have been at any other." Baxter, he says, told him, that if the terms of the king's declaration —that called the Healing Declaration seems to be meant—had been adhered to, he did not believe that above three hundred of the two thousand would have declined conforming.

No difference of opinion can be entertained as to either the inhumanity or the impolicy of this treatment of the Presbyterian clergy: admitting their ejection from the church to have been expedient or indispensable, it is impossible not to wish that a course of more lenity and indulgence had been pursued in regard to them. At the same time it must be confessed that the case was one surrounded with difficulties. The different measure dealt out to the Episcopalian clergymen ejected in the time of the Commonwealth, to whom the parliament made a show of allowing a fifth part of their former livings for their support, has been often contrasted with the conduct of the opposite party at the Restoration; but not much can be founded upon that view of the matter. In the first place, the rights acquired by the Presbyterian clergy from a possession of a few years can not in fairness be considered the same with those that had belonged to the ancient clergy: at the era of the Restoration, indeed, the former were naturally enough regarded by the dominant party as no rights at all—as merely the temporary success of rebellion and robbery—a view which never could have been taken of the latter. Then, it is admitted on all hands, that the allowances which the parliament had professed to make to the ejected Episcopalian ministers were in many, perhaps in most, cases rather nominal than real. Walker, the historian of Independency, asserts that scarcely one in ten ever had them without trouble, and to the full value; and nothing is better attested than the severe suffering and oppression which many of these sequestrated clergymen underwent. The commissioners of sequestration, in fact, were only empowered, not absolutely directed, to suffer them to retain a certain portion of their incomes, and that portion was not to be in all cases a fifth, as is commonly represented, but only never to exceed a fifth.[1] It was to be granted, too, not to themselves, but to their wives and children, a mode of dealing which in other cases has been justly characterized as one of the most infernal refinements of an intolerant and persecuting policy. But the chief difficulty in the present case was how to pension the ejected Presbyterian clergymen upon any terms or conditions to which they would themselves have submitted. Of course, common decency and common sense were not to be revolted by an arrangement which should have supported them out of the revenues of the church, and at the same time permitted them to declaim every Sunday from the pulpits of dissenting meeting-houses against the whole order of its worship and government. But would they have consented to forego the liberty of so lifting up a conscientious testimony in behalf of what they believed to be the cause of truth and pure religion? Would they have come under an engagement to cease from all exercise of their clerical functions for any pension? The Long Parliament made short work of this difficulty in the case of the Episcopalian clergy by absolutely prohibiting the ancient mode of worship: so long as the Presbyterians held sway, the open profession of episcopacy, in the face of the Solemn League and Covenant, was as much out of the question as the open profession of royalism; and even after Cromwell and the Independents obtained the ascendency, popery and prelacy, as we have seen, were specially exempted from the toleration granted to all other forms of Christianity.

On the whole, objectionable as was much in the spirit and manner of the proceeding, the complete extinction of Presbyterianism within the national church, which was the aim and effect of the Act of Uniformity, was probably in itself the wisest and most fortunate policy that could have been adopted in the circumstances. Had it not taken place, the struggle between the two hostile factions would not only have kept up a rent in the edifice of the establishment, extending from its summit to its base, and widening every day, but, after defeating for many years all the best purposes of a national church, would, there can hardly be a doubt, have resulted in a still more disastrous expulsion or subjugation of Presbyterianism than it now underwent. In truth, that religion appears to have no congeniality with the English mind and character. Extraordinary circumstances for a short time gave it a sort of feverish popularity; but, notwithstanding the learning, piety, and other high merits of many of the Presbyterian ministers who obtained possession of the church livings in the time of the Commonwealth, and even the strong attachment of their congregations to particular individuals among them, the country in general had evidently become disgusted with the dominion of the Directory and the Assembly of Divines long before the Restoration; and the tumultuous and universal joy which it showed when that event promised to put an end to the reign alike of Presbytery and of Independency sufficiently evinced how completely, by that time, it had got tired of both. When we think, too, of the ejection of the Presbyterian ministers, in 1662, by the Act of Uniformity, we ought not to forget that, even if they themselves had had the framing of the act, they would most certainly have made it such as to exclude the Independents and the Sectaries—nay, that they would only have forborne to attempt the exclusion of the Episcopalians, too, because they were not so strong as when they effected that object some years before. They could, in truth, expect little forbearance from those to whom they would have shown none in the same circumstances—whom in other times they had denounced as unfit to be suffered to live in the land, and had refused to tolerate in the most modest public observance of their form of worship, although now so willing and anxious, if they could have done so without an utter abandonment of character and decency, to remain associated with them in the same national church establishment, and to divide with them its loaves and fishes.

As in England, so also in Scotland, presbytery was put down at the Restoration, and the Episcopalian church reëstablished in more absolute supremacy than it had ever before enjoyed, in the manner that has been already fully detailed in the preceding chapter.[1] In that part of the island, however, Presbyterianism had a hold over the popular mind which it never had acquired in England; and its extinction there, in consequence, instead of being carried by the national voice, was an act of mere force and violence done by the government against the almost unanimous wish of the country. It was an act which a native government, however anti-popular in its constitution and sympathies, never would have attempted; for, even with the nobility and higher classes in Scotland, the reestablishment of episcopacy was the reverse of being generally an object of desire, jealous as they were of a church in which they apprehended they would find a rival political power, without being attached to it by any of those bonds of habit and a common interest which had so long in England connected the church with the aristocracy. At the same time, Presbyterianism in Scotland had the whole field of popular display and excitement to itself: it continued to be almost the only form of Puritanism known there, notwithstanding the swarms of Sectaries that overrun the neighboring kingdom. But, in reality, Scotland was now become a mere province of England; and the government of the latter country was strong enough to bear down the opposition of all these adverse circumstances, and to set up episcopacy for a time in the north as well as in the south.

In Ireland, also, in which episcopacy had been abolished by the Long Parliament, it was now restored in the same manner as in England and Scotland. On the 17th of May, 1661, both Houses of the Irish parliament united in a declaration of their high esteem of episcopal government, and of the Book of Common Prayer, according to the use of the church of England. In that enslaved country, the change, which was indeed of little interest to the great body of the people, was managed, of course, without difficulty or opposition from any quarter.

The Presbyterians, Independents, and other sects conscientiously opposed to the episcopal office and the ancient ritual were only placed in their proper position by being thus excluded from an establishment founded on principles to which, whatever outward conformity they might affect, they could give no cordial or genuine assent. Better for them, as well as for the national church, that both parties should stand out distinctly for what they were, and be openly divided—nay, if it must be, opposed—than that a formal, hollow union should have been patched up between them, which, after all, would have left the one only a lurking enemy or eating disease in the bosom of the other, so long as it lasted, and which, that being the case, could hardly have lasted long. But, although disqualified by the principles which they conscientiously held for any real comprehension within the pale of the national church, the opponents of episcopacy and the Prayer Book were entitled to perfect freedom in the profession of their opinions and the observance of their own modes of worship out of that pale; and the policy of leaving them thus undisturbed would, on the part of the government and the now triumphant hierarchy, have been as wise as just and humane. Another course, unfortunately, was adopted, under the influence of various coöperating causes. First, and chiefly, the great doctrine of religious toleration was not in that age generally received or understood by any of the great bodies into which the religious world was divided: on the contrary, even those which had suffered most from persecution themselves still held it to be a sacred duty to employ coercion, whenever they had the power, for putting down what they considered to be error or heresy—that is, to persecute others. Juster views, indeed, had now made considerable progress among the Independents and some of the Sectaries, more especially the Quakers, disciplined as they had been by the struggle they had had to maintain, almost ever since their first appearance for the liberty of worshiping God according to their conscience; but, however far the speculations of some individuals among them may have gone, it may be questioned if any of the more considerable even of these bodies had as yet adopted the principle of toleration in its full integrity and comprehensiveness. The enlightened and intrepid mind of Milton would still have had the law to denounce and punish what he deemed the idolatry of the Romanists; and in this notion, there is little doubt, ninety-nine out of every hundred of the Protestant dissenters or Non-conformists of that day went along with him. The Independents, however, except for the few years during which they were placed in a false position by the admission of many of their clergymen under Cromwell to livings in the church, had had so far an advantage over the Presbyterians in learning this great lesson of toleration, inasmuch as they had never had their views upon the subject confused or biassed by looking to an establishment for themselves, the object for which the Presbyterians had all along struggled, as long as there was any hope of attaining it, as eagerly even as the Episcopalians. The utmost that the Independents had ever demanded, or that their principles allowed them to aspire after, was that there should be no established church at all. To such an arrangement as that the Presbyterians were wholly opposed, and would only have been driven reluctantly to acquiesce in it, in the most adverse circumstances, as still preferable to the establishment of any other sect than their own. It was a principle with them that the state was in duty bound to maintain the supremacy of the true church: this general principle they clung to at least as zealously as the Episcopalians; they only differed from the Episcopalians on the question of which was the true church. Both these great denominations, therefore, as we have observed, were embarrassed and impeded in their acquisition of correct views on the subject of toleration by certain interests or views that did not trouble the vision of the Independents or the generality of the Sectaries; they had to acquire not merely the simple notion of religious freedom for themselves and all others, but the comparatively complex idea of perfect toleration or religious freedom for others combined with an establishment for themselves. They, as well as the other descriptions of dissenters, with whom they were now driven by their common sufferings in some degree to make common cause, were most cruelly persecuted by the reëstablished Episcopalian church throughout the reign of Charles II.; but there is no reason whatever to believe that, if the same power had been in their own hands that was then placed in that of their adversaries, they would have employed it at all more mildly. Persecution, or, as they designated it, the suppression and extirpation of error by force, if nothing else would do, was still their principle as much as it was that of the Episcopalians. It was, indeed, still the popular and national feeling; for, after all, nothing is more incontestible than that all the severe laws which were passed against non-conformity, between the Restoration and the Revolution, were in accordance with the sentiments of the great majority of all classes of the English population.

These laws, and the sufferings to which they subjected papists and Protestant dissenters alike, have been necessarily detailed in the last chapter, in the general history of the period, of which they constitute a principal part; and it is, therefore, unnecessary to go over them again here. But it will be found that, throughout the whole course of this legislation, the House of Commons, the representative of the general voice of the community, constantly outran the court and the government—nay, repeatedly urged them forward, when they would have turned back, in the career of coercion and persecution. While the court, in fact, was inclined toward a tolerant policy by its secret regard for the Catholics, the parliament and the nation were hurried in the opposite direction, not only by their dread and hatred of popery, but also, to a considerable degree, by a dislike of Puritanism, Presbyterianism, Independency, sectarianism, and all kinds of Protestant dissent or non-conformity. The national hatred of popery was a feeling that, having been first excited by the great religious struggle of the preceding century, and having been fostered and strengthened by the whole course of events throughout the reign of Elizabeth, till it was inflamed to fury by the affair of the gunpowder-plot in the beginning of that of James, had been since deepened and diffused by a succession of influencing causes, which, diverse and sometimes even contradictory as they may have been in their character and operation in other respects, had, by means of this very diversity and contradiction, coöperated here. First came the rise and spread of Puritanism; then the contest, at once religious and political, with the Arminianism and semi-popery of the established church in the time of Charles I. and Laud, followed as it was by the complete subjugation both of popery and prelacy under the Commonwealth; and then, last of all, the anti-puritanical reaction which took place at the Restoration, and its speedy combination, in consequence of the measures of the court, with what was at once a vehement anti-popish feeling and an almost equally strong enthusiasm in favor of the established church. For herein lay the great distinction between the state of things in the reign of Charles I. and their state in the reign of Charles II.: in the former the established church made common cause with the court; in the latter it more wisely took up a position of its own. And every thing that fell out, from the Restoration to the Revolution, contributed to strengthen that position. The universal weariness and disgust with the gloom and severities of Puritanism, and the extravagances of the rampant sects, had laid a broad foundation for the restored hierarchy in the affections of the people from the first, placed on which it was at least secure, for many years to come, from being again overthrown by either Presbytery or Independency. But the unpopularity of Puritanism did not make popular its extreme opposite, popery: if there had been any tendency to that result, the alliance formed with popery by the court would have effectually checked it. That alliance made popery as unpopular as Puritanism. Fortunately for the established church, it saw this, and took the course which interest, if not also principle, pointed out in the circumstances. Notwithstanding its habitual and characteristic gravitation toward the court, and even abundance of ultra-loyalty in the way of talk and profession, it kept steadily aloof from coalescing with or countenancing the popery of the court, taking part in this respect, not indeed noisily or violently, but yet substantially and firmly, with the most resolute section of the parliamentary and popular opposition. Dexterously availing itself of its peculiar facilities as a sort of midway or neutral religion, oscillating rather than fixed between the two extremes of popery and Puritanism, it now took care to keep sufficiently before the public eye its non-identity with the one as well as with the other. By the attitude which it thus assumed as the opponent instead of the ally of popery, the established church gathered around it, after the Restoration, an extent and warmth of popular attachment such as it had never before enjoyed. It was the refuge and cherished palladium at once of all who hated Puritanism and of all who dreaded popery—that is to say, of nearly the whole nation, including the great majority even of the Puritans and papists themselves; for it was one of the main advantages of the position occupied by the established church, that, while standing dissociated from and opposed to each of these extreme parties, it yet secured to itself the support of both, each looking upon it as its strongest bulwark against the other. Had there been any apprehension of another inundation of Presbytery or Independency, the papists would undoubtedly have joined with the establishment in the endeavor to stem that torrent. As things actually went, the danger or fear was not of the return of Presbytery, but of the return of popery; and we have seen what took place. The established church took up its station in the van of what was as much a battle for the civil as for the religious liberties of the nation; and the whole country rallied around it. Equally without as within the walls of the House of Commons, all the great denominations of the Protestant dissenters, and more especially the Presbyterians—the most considerable of them all—forgot every thing but that aversion to popery which was common to them with the establishment—their differences with it alike as to discipline and as to doctrine—their old struggle with and triumph over it—their recent persecutions and sufferings under it—and willingly gave their consent to any laws, to any measures, by which the common foe might be crushed or cramped, nay, clamored in some instances for disabling and coercive enactments against the papists, although they themselves, the Protestant Non-conformists, should in some degree be disqualified along with them. All this, as we have said, placed the established church upon a rock of strength such as it had never stood upon since the Reformation. It was by far the most popular of the national institutions; the crown, the House of Lords, the House of Commons, would, any one of them, in an encounter with it, have gone to the wall; in regard to each and all of these other powers in the state, the tide of the popular favor ebbed and flowed during the whole of the reigns of the two last Stuarts as the established church stood affected or gave the signal. It is remarkable how much misgovernment in every other way, how long and various a course of despotism and oppression, the nation endured without being roused to any strenuous or general effort to right itself, till the church was attacked. The persecution of the Non-conformists, both in England and in Scotland, although in the latter country that was a war against the great body of the population, produced even there only some petty local revolts, the miserable efforts of utter bewilderment and despair, which the government crushed with a few squadrons of horse; the profligate and disgraceful misadministration of public affairs throughout the last twenty years of the reign of Charles, including the actual abrogation of the constitution by the extinction of parliamentary election, provoked nothing beyond some little temporary effervescence; the avowed Catholicism and arbitrary principles with which James began his reign called forth no general resistance, although two simultaneous foreign invasions gave the signal and led the way; even the atrocities of Judge Jeffreys, which made the land a shambles, and turned the law itself into the bloodiest of tyrannies, awoke only groans, and unuttered curses, and thoughts of revenge; but the imprisonment of the seven bishops at once brought about a revolution. Truly, the established church stood in a different position now from that which it occupied when the ten protesting bishops were sent to the Tower by the House of Lords in December, 1641, in the first scene of the long drama which was now arrived at its last.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION, GOVERNMENT, AND LAWS.

THE restoration of the monarchy, in 1660, was held to be also the restoration of all the ancient laws down to the last act of parliament to which Charles I. had given his assent, in the usual form, immediately before his leaving London, in January, 1642.[1] All the legislation of the successive parliaments and governments that had subsisted since that date was considered to be annulled and swept away by the single fact of the return of the king. In truth, however, the republican legislation, which was thus suddenly all repealed at once, was much less considerable in amount, and also in importance, than would readily be suspected either from the number of years during which the ancient constitution of the supreme government had been in abeyance, or from the extent of the change that had been made in one or two leading particulars. One reason of this was, that many of the most important of the reforms or innovations urged by the Long Parliament had been carried by them before their final quarrel with the late king, and had been regularly established by statutes passed in the usual form. This was the case with the prevention of the intermission of parliaments for more than three years—with the regulation of the privy council, and the abolition of the Court of Star Chamber—with the extinction of the ecclesiastical commission—with the declaration of the illegality of ship-money—with the reform of the Stannary Courts—with the limitation of the forest laws—with the abrogation of the old law or custom compelling persons to receive knighthood—and with the ejection of the bishops from the House of Lords and the privy council, and of all churchmen whatever from offices of temporal authority or jurisdiction. After these changes, and the overthrow of the monarchy, the church, and the House of Lords, in which the Revolution mainly consisted, the few other changes that were made by the Long Parliament and its successors were extremely insignificant.

[1] See ante, p. 257.—The last act passed by Charles I. was the 16 Car. I., cap. 37, entitled, "For the further advancement of an effectual and speedy reduction of the Rebels in Ireland to the obedience of his Majesty and the Crown of England;" to which his assent was given 24th December, 1641. We do not know upon what principle the Record Commissioners, in their edition of the Statutes of the Realm, have, contrary to their uniform practice elsewhere, printed at full length among the public acts of this parliament the act for the attainder of the Earl of Strafford, the title of which they also afterward give in their list of private acts. Nor does it appear why they headed it "Chapter xxxviii." It received the royal assent on the 10th of May, 1641.

The successive "shiftings" of the supreme authority from the meeting of the Long Parliament till the termination of the Protectorate have been stated by Hobbes, in a passage of his Behemoth, with his characteristic precision:—"First, from 1640 to 1648, when the king was murdered, the sovereignty was disputed between King Charles the First and the Presbyterian parliament.—Secondly, from 1648 to 1653 the power was in that part of the parliament which voted the trial of the king, and declared themselves, without king or House of Lords, to have the supreme authority of England and Ireland. For there were in the Long Parliament two factions, the Presbyterian and the Independent: the former whereof sought only the subjection of the king, not his destruction directly; the latter sought directly his destruction; and this part is that which was called the Rump.—Thirdly, from April the 20th to July the 4th, the supreme power was in the hands of a council of state constituted by Cromwell.—Fourthly, from July the 4th to December the 12th of the same year, it was in the hands of men called unto it by Cromwell, whom he termed men of fidelity and integrity, and made them a parliament, which was called, in contempt of one of the members, Barebone's Parliament.—Fifthly, from December the 12th, 1653, to September the 3d, 1658, it was in the hands of Oliver Cromwell, with the title of Protector.—Sixthly, from September the 3d, 1658, to April the 25th, 1659, Richard Cromwell had it as successor to his father.—Seventhly, from April the 25th, 1659, to May the 7th of the same year, it was nowhere.—Eighthly, from May the 7th, 1659, the Rump, which was turned out of doors in 1653, recovered it again, and shall lose it again to a committee of safety, and again recover it, and again lose it to the right owner." The Rump was turned out the second time, by Lambert and the council of officers, on the 13th of October; from which time the government was in the committee of safety till the restoration of the Rump on the 26th of December. The members excluded in 1648 were restored to their seats by Monk, on the 21st of February, 1660. The Long Parliament, thus reëstablished, sat till the 16th of March; and the next parliament, which restored the king, commonly called the Convention Parliament, met on the 25th of April.

The laws made by these various governments being, as we have observed, on the reëstablishment of the monarchy held to be no laws at all, do not appear among the collected statutes of the realm; and they have received very little attention from any of our legal historians. The royalists, indeed, have been accused of a design or a desire to suppress altogether the legal history of the Commonwealth: Clarendon is said to have proposed at the council-table to destroy all the public documents connected with that period; but if the intention of concealing the proceedings of the republican parliaments from the knowledge of posterity was ever entertained, there was no danger of such an attempt being successfully made. If all the papers and parchments in the public offices had been given to the flames, the legislative as well as the other public transactions of the twenty years from 1640 to 1660 would have remained on record in many other forms. Besides the numerous histories, memoirs, diurnals or newspapers, and other cotemporary productions of the press, which had already spread the knowledge of them over the world, laborious transcribers, like Rushworth and Thurloe, and pains-taking diarists, such as Whitelock and Burton, had already stored up the amplest details of every thing material that had been done, written, and spoken, in parliament and out of it, by those concerned in public affairs during that period. The acts and ordinances of the legislature had all been printed and dispersed over the kingdom, by authority, at the time when they were passed; and all those of importance had been, besides, preserved in the two collections of Husband and Scobell, both published in the time of the Commonwealth.[1]

By far the larger portion even of Scobell's Collection, which professes to contain only such acts and ordinances as remained of importance at the time when it was published, all those of a merely temporary character being discarded,[2] consists either

[1] Collection of all the Public Orders and Declarations of both Houses of Parliament, from March 19, 1642, to December, 1646: by Edward Husband (Printer to the Parliament). Folio. Lon. 1646.

Collection of Acts and Ordinances of General Use made in the Parliament begun and held at Westminster, the third day of November, 1640, and, since, unto the adjournment of the Parliament [illegible] and holden the 17th of September, 1656, and formerly published in print; by Henry Scobell, esq., Clerk of the Parliament; printed by special order of Parliament. Folio. Lon. 1658.

[2] Scobell tells us, in his Preface, that his first intention was to have collected all the acts and ordinances which had been made and published in print from the beginning of the Long Parliament; but, he adds, "upon the perusal of all those acts and ordinances, I found them very numerous, and the major part (especially from the year 1641 to 1648) occasioned by and having reference to the late troubles and the

of legislation of the most objectionable, or, at least, questionable kind, or of matter not involving any thing that can properly be called a principle of legislation at all; acts for the raising of subsidies, contributions, loans, and other taxation and money acts; acts for the raising and provisioning of forces; acts for sequestrating the estates of delinquents, and for the sale of the property of the crown and of the church; acts for the regulation of printing—that is to say, for the establishment of a censorship of the press: acts for the pharisaical observance of the Sabbath, &c., &c. Mixed with these are a number of commercial regulations—among the rest the first navigation act—already noticed in our account of the national industry in the last Book.[1] The new impost of the excise also produced several voluminous acts.[2]

Of all that is of any value or permanent interest in what remains an account may be given in a very few sentences. It is impossible, after an examination of the legislative remains of the Long Parliament, to refuse assent to what has been affirmed by a distinguished modern historian of the constitution:—"It may be said, I think, with not greater severity than truth, that scarce two or three public acts of justice, humanity, or generosity, and very few of political wisdom or courage, are recorded of them from their quarrel with the king to their expulsion by Cromwell."[3] In truth, the circumstances in which the several republican parliaments and governments were all placed were such as almost to preclude any attempt at legislation, except for the moment. Till the execution of the king, the war or the work of fruitless negotiation left them scarcely any time for remoter cares. No sooner was the war of arms over than the war of factions commenced; and that was put an end to or suspended only by the despotism—the necessary despotism, we believe—of the Protectorate. After that, all the genius and vigor even of Cromwell was required to enable him merely to keep his seat; till, at his death, the vessel of the state, amid universal confusion and uproar, began to fall to pieces, like a ship that had struck upon a rock.

It will be found, we believe, that the only real reforms of the law that were made in the time of the Commonwealth were the following:—

By an act passed in November, 1650, it was directed that all report books of the resolutions of judges, and other books of the law of England, should be translated into the English tongue, and that all such books as should be printed after the 1st of January ensuing should be in the English tongue only. "And be it further enacted," continues the statute, "by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the first return of Easter term, which shall be in the year 1651, all writs, process and returns thereof, and all pleadings, rules, orders, indictments, inquisitions, certificates, and all patents, commissions, records, judgments, statutes, recognizances, rolls, entries, and proceedings of courts-leet, courts-baron, and customary courts, and all proceedings whatsoever in any courts of justice within this commonwealth, and which concern the law and administration of justice, shall be in the English tongue only, and not in Latin or French, or any other language than English, any law, custom, or usage heretofore to the contrary notwithstanding. And that the same and every of them shall be written in an ordinary, usual, and legible hand and character, and not in any hand commonly called court-hand."[1] The translation of the old report books, though specially committed by a subsequent act to a board composed of the Speaker of the House of Commons, the lords commissioners of the great seal, &c.,[2] was never executed. The use of English, and of the common character, in law proceedings, after having been given up at the Restoration, was again enforced in 1730 by the statute 4 Geo. II., c. 26; but the innovation has not been universally approved of. Blackstone endeavors to make out that it has been attended with various inconveniences.[3]

Another act of the year 1650 abolished the fee called damage cleer, or damna clericorum, which was originally a gratuity given to the prothonotaries of the courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, and their clerks, for drawing special writs and pleadings, and which had become an assessment of a certain portion of all damages exceeding five marks recovered in any of these courts, which the plaintiff was obliged to pay to the chief officer of the court before he could have execution. This reform was also reënacted in 1665 by the statute of 17 Car. II., c. 6.

In August, 1653, an important act was passed establishing in every parish a register of marriages, births, and burials, to be chosen by the inhabitant householders, and allowing marriages to be solemnized before justices of the peace, and by a mere declaration of the parties that they took each other for husband and wife. The act further declared that no marriage otherwise celebrated after the 29th of September ensuing should be held or accounted a marriage according to the laws of England; but this clause was repealed in 1656.[4] The Commonwealth law of marriage, therefore, in the state in which it was finally left, may be considered as the same in principle with that established by the act passed for the relief of dissenters in 1836. The machinery provided for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages, by the act of 1653, could have been of little or no use.

managing of the war; some of which had their determination as soon as they were put in execution; others of no long continuance, but for the present emergency: and, among the rest, many were temporary and long since expired, and not a few respecting only particular persons, places, or occasions, which, if printed, would have swelled this book, and have been of little or no use other than to preserve the memory of what was done in those times upon exigencies, the memorial whereof will be continued in a great measure by the books formerly printed, and yet extant in particular hands. He therefore "determined to lay aside all such acts and ordinances as had sole relation to the then present times, and particular occasions, and such as respected some one or a few counties, cities, towns, garrisons, or persons only, together with such as were for a limited time, and so expired without being continued or revived." Of all these he gives only a catalogue of the titles.

In March, 1654, an act was published by the lord protector and his council, prohibiting cock-matches; and in June, the same year, another, prohibiting challenges to fight duels, on pain of the offender being committed to prison for six months, and being bound in recognizances to be of good behavior for a a year thereafter. A clause of this latter act also prohibited the use of provoking words or gestures, directing that any person so offending might be indicted at the jail delivery or general sessions of the peace; and, if found guilty, bound to good behavior, fined, and, moreover, compelled to make reparation to the party wronged, as to the judge or justices should seem meet, "upon consideration had both of the quality of the person injured and the offense committed."[1] The principle of this enactment has been partially adopted in the late new police bill.

Among the last acts of the Long Parliament had been a vote (carried on the 19th of August, 1652, by 46 to 38 against Cromwell and his party) abolishing the Court of Chancery. No act, however, seems to have been founded upon this resolution.[2] But in August, 1654, Cromwell and his council promulgated an act for limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and regulating the proceedings therein. It consists of sixty-seven clauses, together with a table of fees. This act, in the framing of which he had not been consulted, so much offended Whitelock, the chief commissioner of the great seal, that he resigned his office.

An ordinance abolishing the court of wards and liveries had been passed by the Lords and Commons on the 24th of February, 1645; but it seems to have taken no effect: the government had still continued to collect the dues of wardship, &c., as had been done before the abolition of the monarchy.[3] In the end of 1656, however, the Barebones Parliament, "for the further establishing and confirming" the former ordinance, enacted "that the court of wards and liveries, and all wardships, liveries, primer-seizins, and oustrelemains, and all other charges incident and arising for or by reason of any such tenure, wardship, livery, primer-seizin, or oustrelemains, be taken away" from the said 24th of February, 1645; "and that all homage, fines, licenses, seizures, pardons for alienation incident or arising for or by reason of wardship, livery, primer-seizin, or oustrelemain, and all other charges incident thereunto, be likewise taken away" from the same date; and that all tenures in capite and by knight's service of the late king or any other person, and all tenures by soccage in chief, be taken away; and all tenures turned into free and common soccage," from the same date. The wonder is that this abolition of the feudal dues formerly appertaining to the crown should have been so long deferred. It is also worthy of observation that, notwithstanding this apparently sweeping destruction of feudalism, all heriots and other feudal dues payable to mean (that is, intermediate) lords or other private persons were reserved, and ordered to be still paid as usual.[1] By another act of this parliament, purveyance and compositions for purveyance were taken away.[2] Both these reforms were re-enacted after the Restoration, by the statute 12 Car. II., cap. 24.

We may here also mention, as it would seem to have escaped notice, a clause in an act for the regulation of officers of the navy and customs, passed in January, 1648, by which all taking of fees from merchants or others by officers of the customs is abolished, and compensation ordered to be made to them by an increase of their salaries.[3] The principle of this enactment has been adopted in several recent statutes.

The introduction of new trials has been dated from the time of the Commonwealth. "There are instances," says Blackstone, "in the Year Books of the reigns of Edward III., Henry IV., and Henry VII., of judgments being stayed (even after a trial at bar) and new venires awarded, because the jury had ate and drank without consent of the judge, and because the plaintiff had privately given a paper to a juryman before he was sworn. And upon these the chief justice, Glynn, in 1655, grounded the first precedent that is reported in our books for granting a new trial upon account of excessive damages given by the jury; apprehending, with reason, that notorious partiality in the jurors was a principal species of misbehavior. A few years before, a practice took place in the Common Pleas of granting new trials upon the mere certificate of the judge (unfortified by any report of the evidence) that the verdict had passed against his opinion; though Chief Justice Rolle (who allowed of new trials in case of misbehavior, surprise, or fraud, or if the verdict was notoriously contrary to evidence) refused to adopt that practice in the Court of King's Bench."[4]

It is believed, also, that another very important alteration in our judicial procedure—the introduction of special juries—can not be traced beyond the Commonwealth. The earliest instances we have met with are about the same date with the above-mentioned first-reported new trial.

At the same time that the Convention House of Commons assembled, in the end of April, 1660, the few Presbyterian peers who had constituted the House of Lords when it was abolished in 1649 also met, and were soon after joined by the others whom they had excluded, although those who had sat in the Oxford parliament, and also those who had received their patents after the commencement of the civil war, abstained for the present from taking their seats. The House of Lords may, therefore, be said to have been restored before the monarchy. On the king's return, the remaining peers took their seats without question, and as of course. The Episcopal church was reëstablished by the act of the Convention Parliament, "For the confirming and restoring of ministers" (12 Car. II., c. 17); and the next parliament, which met in May, 1661, repealed (by stat. 13 Car. II., c. 2) the act disabling persons in holy orders from exercising any temporal jurisdiction or authority—thereby restoring the bishops to their seats in the Upper House; and also (by stat. 13 Car. II., c. 29) reversed the attainder of the Earl of Strafford. Finally, in 1664 (by stat. 16 Car. II., c. 1), so much of the act for preventing the intermission of parliaments for more than three years as gave power to the peers to issue out writs for one, if the king neglected to do so, and to constituencies to meet and elect members without writs at all, if the peers neglected to issue them, was repealed; and though it was still declared and enacted that the sitting and holding of parliaments should not be intermitted or discontinued above three years at the most, no provision was made for insuring the observance of the rule. Thus, within a few years after the Restoration, all the most important of the concessions which had been extorted by the Long Parliament from the late king were annulled. The courts of High Commission and Star Chamber, however, were not revived; and the oppressive feudal prerogatives of wardship and purveyance were, as already mentioned, expressly abolished. These were the most valuable permanent amendments for which the constitution was indebted to the civil war and the republic.

On the other hand, the Restoration brought with it several new laws, which considerably augmented the ancient legal authority of the crown, or otherwise abridged the rights of the subject. Of this description were the several acts relating to religion, of which the principal were—the Corporation Act, passed in 1661, requiring all persons holding office in any municipal corporation to take the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the rites of the established church, and to subscribe the declarations abjuring the Solemn League and Covenant, and the lawfulness of taking up arms upon any pretense whatsoever against the king;[1] the Act of Uniformity, passed in 1662, by which all persons enjoying any preferment in the church were obliged to declare their assent to every thing contained in the Book of Common Prayer, and all teachers of youth were obliged to have a license from the bishop;[2] the Act against Seditious Conventicles, passed in 1664, making the being present at any meeting for religious worship, except according to the usage of the established church, where five persons besides the family should be assembled, punishable for the first and second offense by a fine or three months' imprisonment, for the third by transportation for seven years;[3] the Act for restraining Non-conformists from inhabiting in Corporations, passed in 1665, by which all dissenting ministers who should not take an oath similar to that imposed by the Corporation Act were prohibited from approaching within five miles of any borough or of any place where they had ever preached, under a penalty of £40;[4] the second Act for preventing and suppressing Seditious Conventicles, passed in 1670, by which every person above the age of sixteen present at a conventicle was made punishable by a fine of five shillings for the first, and of ten shillings for every subsequent offense; while the penalty for teaching or preaching in a conventicle was made £20 for the first, and £40 for every subsequent offense; persons suffering conventicles to be held in their houses were made liable to a fine of £20, and justices of the peace were empowered to break open doors where they were informed conventicles were held, and take the offenders into custody;[1] and, lastly, the Act for preventing dangers which may happen from Popish Recusants, commonly called the Test Act, passed in 1673, which required all persons bearing any office, civil or military, under the crown, to take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, to subscribe a declaration against transubstantiation, and to take the sacrament according to the usage of the church of England.[2] To these may be added two acts, both passed in 1661: that entitled An Act against Tumults and Disorders upon pretense of preparing or presenting public petitions or other addresses to his majesty or the parliament, by which the soliciting or procuring of more than twenty signatures to any petition to the king or the parliament for alteration of matters established by law in church or state, unless the petition should have been previously consented to by three justices of the peace or the majority of the grand jury of the county, was made punishable by a fine of £100 and three months' imprisonment, the number of persons allowed to attend on the presenting of any such petition being at the same time limited to ten;[3] and that declaring the sole supreme government, command, and disposition of the militia, and of all forces by sea and land, and of all forts and places of strength in the kingdom, to be the undoubted right of the crown.[4]

The greatest constitutional measure which distinguishes the legislation of the present period is the celebrated statute of the 31st Car. II., c. 3, commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act. The history of this statute, or, rather, the history of the Writ of Habeas Corpus, has been lately traced with much minuteness in the Introduction to the Report of the Case of the Canadian Prisoners, by Mr. Fry, of Lincoln's Inn, one of the counsel in the case; and we shall avail ourselves of the information on the subject which he has collected and arranged. It appears that the practice of taking pledges or bail for persons accused of felony was known to the law of England from the earliest times. Glanville, who wrote in the reign of Henry II., states that in all cases of felonies the accused was generally dismissed on pledges, except in a plea of homicide; in which case, he says, persons accused were not discharged unless in compliance with the king's pleasure. The two great securities for personal liberty in ancient times were, the writs De Odio et Atiâ and De Homine Replegiando, the precise nature of which it is unnecessary to explain here. Mr. Fry gives the following account of the first appearance of the writ of Habeas Corpus, as far as he has been able to trace it:—"The writ of Habeas Corpus is found in operation at a remote period of the English law. It was anciently called Corpus cum Causâ, from the words of the writ requiring the party to return not only the body of the person detained, but the cause of the capture and detention. It gradually superseded the old writs De Odio et Atiâ and De Homine Replegiando, probably from its superior efficacy as a prerogative writ. It required immediate obedience from the party to whom it was directed, and enforced it by attachment. The earliest reign in which I have been able to trace its frequent appearance is that of Henry VI. At that period it seems to have been familiar to, and well understood by, the judges." From this date its progress can be distinctly followed. It "was, in its early history," continues Mr. Fry, "used between subject and subject, the one detained invoking the power of the sovereign to interpose and protect him from the unwarrantable interference of a fellow-subject. At what period it first began to be used against the crown it is difficult to say. In the great case of Sir Thomas Darnell and others,[1] in the reign of Charles I., the first case in which the nature of the writ of Habeas Corpus appears to have been thoroughly discussed, and which eventually produced, indeed, the Petition of Right, its use as a means of asserting the liberty of the subject against the crown was distinctly felt and asserted. . . . . . . The earliest precedents I find cited in that case, where the subject sued the writ against the crown, are in the reign of Henry VII.;[2] afterward it became pretty frequent, and in the time of Charles I. was held an admitted constitutional remedy." Sir Thomas Darnell, Sir John Corbet, Sir John Heveringham, and Sir Edmund Hampden, were committed to the Fleet in 1627, for refusing to contribute to a general loan. They obtained a writ of Habeas Corpus to bring them before the Court of King's Bench; but, on the warden returning that they were detained by virtue of a warrant of the privy council, which stated that they were committed by the special command of his majesty, the judges of that day, notwithstanding the great learning and ability with which their case was argued by Sergeant Bramston, Noy, Selden, and Calthorp, decided that the return was good, and remanded the prisoners. This case, as Mr. Fry observes, produced the Petition of Right, passed into the statute 3 Car. I., c. 1 by the parliament which met the following year.[3]

Two years after the passing of this statute occurred the memorable case of Sir John Elliot, Selden, and the other members of the House of Commons, who, on the dissolution of the parliament, were sent to the Tower by warrants of the privy council, for notable contempts committed against his majesty and his government—their real offense being the freedom of their speeches in the House: and who, upon being brought up by Habeas Corpus, were remanded to prison by the judges on their refusal to give security for their good behavior.[1] This decision gave rise to the statute 16 Car. I., c. 10, s. 8, whereby it is enacted, to quote the summary given by Blackstone, "That if any person be committed by the king himself in person, or by his privy council, or by any of the members thereof, he shall have granted to him, without any delay, upon any pretense whatever, a writ of Habeas Corpus, upon demand or motion made to the Court of King's Bench or Common Pleas, who shall thereupon, within three court days after the return is made, examine and determine the legality of such commitment, and do what to justice shall appertain in delivering, bailing, or remanding such prisoner."

The next case that merits attention is that of Jenkes, which has been commonly, though erroneously, supposed to have given rise to the Habeas Corpus Act. It occurred in 1676. "Jenkes," says Mr. Hallam, "a citizen of London, on the popular or factious side, having been committed by the king in council for a mutinous speech in Guildhall, the justices at quarter-sessions refused to admit him to bail, on pretense that he had been committed by a superior court, or to try him, because he was not entered in the calendar of prisoners. The chancellor, on application for a Habeas Corpus, declined to issue it during the vacation; and the chief justice of the King's Bench, to whom, in the next place, the friends of Jenkes had recourse, made so many difficulties, that he lay in prison for several weeks. This has been commonly said to have produced the famous Act of Habeas Corpus. But this is not truly stated. The arbitrary proceedings of Lord Clarendon were what really gave rise to it. A bill to prevent the refusal of the writ of Habeas Corpus was brought into the House on April 10, 1668, but did not pass the committee in that session. But another to the same purpose, probably more remedial, was sent up to the Lords in March, 1669–70. It failed of success in the Upper House; but the Commons continued to repeat their struggle for this important measure; and in the session of 1673-4 passed two bills, one to prevent the imprisonment of the subject in jails beyond the seas—another to give a more expeditious use of the writ of Habeas Corpus in criminal matters. The same or similar bills appear to have gone up to the Lords in 1675. It was not till 1676 that the delay of Jenkes's Habeas Corpus took place; and this affair seems to have had so trifling an influence that these bills were not revived for the two next years, notwithstanding the tempests that agitated the House during that period. But in the Short Parliament of 1679 they appear to have been consolidated into one; and that, having met with better success among the Lords, passed into a statute, and is generally denominated the Habeas Corpus Act." "It is a very common mistake," adds Mr. Hallam, "and that not only among foreigners, but many from whom some knowledge of our constitutional laws might be expected, to suppose that this statute of Charles II. enlarged in a great degree our liberties, and forms a sort of epoch in their history. But, though a very bene ficial enactment, and eminently remedial in many cases of illegal imprisonment, it introduced no new principle nor conferred any right upon the subject. . . . . . . It was not to bestow an immunity from arbitrary imprisonment, which is abundantly provided in Magna Charta, if, indeed, it were not much more ancient, that the statute of Charles II. was enacted, but to cut off the abuses by which the government's lust of power, and the servile subtilty of crown lawyers, had impaired so fundamental a privilege."[1]

This statute "is frequently considered," says Blackstone, "as another Magna Charta of the kingdom; and, by consequence and analogy, has also, in subsequent times, reduced the general method of proceeding on these writs, though not within the reach of that statute, but issuing merely at the common law, to the true standard of law and liberty."

The general provisions of this celebrated statute have been thus summed up by Sir William Blackstone.[2] "The statute itself enacts:—1. That on complaint and request in writing, by or on behalf of any person committed and charged with any crime (unless committed for treason or felony, expressed in the warrant, or as accessory or on suspicion of being accessory before the fact to any petit-treason or felony, plainly expressed in the warrant, or unless he is convicted or charged in execution by legal process), the lord chancellor, or any of the twelve judges in vacation, upon viewing a copy of the warrant, or affidavit that a copy is denied, shall (unless the party has neglected for two terms to apply to any court for his enlargement) award a Habeas Corpus for such prisoner, returnable immediately before himself or any other of the judges, and, upon the return made, shall discharge the party, if bailable, upon giving security to appear and answer to the accusation in the proper court of judicature. 2. That such writs shall be indorsed as granted in pursuance of this act, and signed by the person awarding them. 3. That the writ shall be returned, and the prisoner brought up within a limited time according to the distance, not exceeding in any case twenty days. 4. That officers and keepers neglecting to make due returns, or not delivering to the prisoner or his agent, within six hours after demand, a copy of the warrant of commitment, or shifting the custody of a prisoner from one to another without sufficient reason or authority (specified in the act), shall, for the first offense, forfeit £100, and for the second offense £200, to the party grieved, and be disabled to hold his office. 5. That no person once delivered by Habeas Corpus shall be recommitted for the same offense, on penalty of £500. 6. That every person committed for treason or felony shall, if he requires it, the first week of the next term, or the first day of the next session of oyer and terminer, be indicted in that term or session, or else admitted to bail, unless the king's witnesses can not be produced at that time; and if acquitted, or if not indicted and tried in the second term or session, he shall be discharged from his imprisonment for such imputed offense; but that no person, after the assizes shall be open for the county in which he is detained, shall be removed by Habeas Corpus till after the assizes are ended, but shall be left to the justice of the judges of assize. 7. That any such prisoner may move for and obtain his Habeas Corpus as well out of the Chancery or Exchequer as out of the King's Bench or Common Pleas, and the lord chancellor or judges denying the same, on sight of the warrant or oath that the same is refused, shall forfeit severally to the party grieved the sum of £500. 8. That this writ of Habeas Corpus shall run into the counties palatinate, cinque ports, and other privileged places, and the islands of Jersey and Guernsey. 9. That no inhabitant of England (except persons contracting, or convicts praying to be transported, or having committed some capital offense in the place to which they are sent) shall be sent prisoner to Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, or any places beyond the seas, within or without the king's dominions, on pain that the party committing, his advisers, aiders, and assistants shall forfeit to the party aggrieved a sum not less than £500, to be recovered with treble costs, shall be disabled to bear any office of trust or profit, shall incur the penalties of præmunire, and shall be incapable of the king's pardon."

Among the other beneficial acts passed in the reign of Charles II., Blackstone reckons the abolition of the writ De Hæretico Comburendo, in 1677, by the 29 Car. II., c. 9; the statute for the better settling of intestates' estates (22 and 23 Car. II., c. 10), commonly called the Statute of Distributions; the 16 and 17 Car. II., 8. one of many statutes which have been passed for preventing arrests of judgment or the stoppage of justice by accidental and immaterial mistakes in pleadings, and one which has been called "an omnipotent act;" and the statutes of frauds and perjuries, which he describes as "a great and necessary security to private property." This last, the 29 Car. II., c. 3, embraces a great variety of subjects that have little or no connection with each other. The two leading provisions of the act require that the disposition of lands and certain personal contracts shall be evidenced by writing, signed by the party conveying or contracting, and that wills of land shall be attested by witnesses. With respect to the clause concerning the attestation of wills, Lord Mansfield has observed, that "the whole clause which introduces a positive solemnity to be observed, not by the learned only, but by the unlearned, at a time when they are supposed to be without legal advice in a matter which greatly interests every proprietor of land, when the direction should be plain to the meanest capacity, is so loose that there is not a single branch of the solemnity defined or described with sufficient certainty to convey the same idea to the greatest capacity."[1] But all this has been altered by the late act "For the Amendment of the Law with respect to Wills." (1 Vict., c. 26.)

The reign of Charles II. is a period of great importance in the history of the government and constitution; the novel position, in various respects, in which the crown, the Lords, and the Commons all found themselves in consequence of the Restoration and the events of the preceding twenty years having led to the agitation of several of the most fundamental and difficult questions connected with the jurisdiction and general powers and rights of each.

On the part of the crown, however, certainly more old claims were abandoned than new ones put forth. Extraordinary as the statement may seem at the first view, it is yet strictly true, as Mr. Hallam has observed at the commencement of the very masterly chapter he has devoted to this subject, "that the fundamental privileges of the subject were less invaded, the prerogative swerved into fewer excesses, during the reign of Charles II., than perhaps in any former period of equal length." "Thanks," he proceeds to remark, "to the patriot energies of Selden and Elliot, of Pym and Hampden, the constitutional boundaries of royal power had been so well established that no minister was daring enough to attempt any flagrant and general violation of them. The frequent sessions of parliament, and its high estimation of its own privileges, furnished a security against illegal taxation. Nothing of this sort has been imputed to the government of Charles, the first king of England, perhaps, whose reign was wholly free from such a charge. And as the nation happily escaped the attempts that were made, after the Restoration, to revive the Star Chamber and High Commission Courts, there was no means of chastising political delinquencies except through the regular tribunals of justice, and through the verdict of a jury. Ill as the one were often constituted, and submissive as the other might often be found, they afforded something more of a guaranty, were it only by the publicity of their proceedings, than the dark and silent divan of courtiers and prelates who sat in judgment under the two former kings. Though the bench was frequently subservient, the bar contained high-spirited advocates, whose firm defense of their clients the judges often reproved, but no longer affected to punish."[1]

The crown, indeed, did make various attempts to check or destroy what was now become the chief protection of the liberty of the subject—the activity of the press. But this was no new exertion of the prerogative. Ever since the introduction of the art of printing, the crown had in England assumed an absolute control over it. The regulations upon the subject, which were in force down to the destruction of the monarchy, limited the number both of presses and of working printers, and prohibited the publication of any thing without the imprimatur of the licenser. "The Long Parliament," continues Mr. Hallam, "did not hesitate to copy this precedent of a tyranny they had overthrown, and, by repeated ordinances against unlicensed printing, hindered, as far as in them lay, this great instrument of political power from serving the purposes of their adversaries. . . . . We read the noble apology of Milton for the freedom of the press with admiration; but it had little influence on the parliament to whom it was addressed."[1] Indeed, no attention was paid to it. The publication of printed papers and pamphlets on the great events and questions, political and religious, of the day had, as we have already had occasion to state, increased immensely after the meeting of the Long Parliament. In June, 1643, the year before the appearance of Milton's eloquent appeal, an act had been passed by the Lords and Commons "for redressing disorders in printing," the preamble of which states that, notwithstanding divers good orders lately made by both Houses on the subject, very many persons had "taken upon them to set up sundry private printing-presses in corners, and to print, vend, publish, and disperse books, pamphlets, and papers in such multitudes, that no industry could be sufficient to discover or bring to punishment all the several abounding delinquents." It is thereupon ordered that no books should henceforth be printed without being first approved of and licensed under the hands of such person or persons as both or either of the Houses of Parliament should appoint to that office; and the master and wardens of the Company of Stationers, the gentleman usher of the House of Peers, the sergeant of the Commons' House, and their deputies, together with the persons formerly appointed by the committee of the House of Commons for examinations, are authorized and required from time to time to make diligent search in all places where they should think meet for all unlicensed printing-presses, and all presses any way employed in the printing of scandalous and unlicensed papers, pamphlets, or books, and to seize the presses, the books, the authors, the printers, and all other persons whatsoever employed in compiling, printing, stitching, binding, publishing, or dispersing of the said scandalous, unlicensed, and unwarrantable papers, &c., "and to bring them afore either of the Houses or the committee of examinations, that so they may receive such further punishments as their offenses shall demerit, and not to be released until they have given satisfaction to the parties employed in their apprehension for their pains and charges, and given sufficient caution not to offend in like sort for the future." In case of opposition, the searchers are authorized to break open doors and locks.[2] By another act, passed by both Houses in September, 1647, the maker, writer, or composer of any book, pamphlet, treatise, ballad, libel, sheet or sheets of news whatsoever, not licensed by both or either House of Parliament, or the persons thereunto authorized by them, with the name of the author, printer, and licenser thereunto affixed, was made liable to a fine of forty shillings, or imprisonment not exceeding forty days in the common jail; the printer to a fine of twenty shillings, or twenty days' imprisonment, and to have his press and implements seized and broken in pieces; the bookseller to a fine of ten shillings, or imprisonment for ten days; and the hawker, pedler, or ballad-singer to forfeit all his books, pamphlets, and printed papers exposed to sale, and also to be whipped as a common rogue. The offender might be convicted, on the oath of a single witness, by any justice of the peace, or any head officer of a corporation, or member of the committees for the militia in London, Middlesex, and Surrey; and it was especially provided that the penalties expressed in the present ordinance should not acquit any person of such other penalties for the publication of seditious, treasonable, or blasphemous matter, as by the laws of the land were or should be adjudged for such offense.[1] Nor was the House of Commons more lenient or liberal after it had got all the power of the government into its own hands. In September, 1649, another very long act was passed by "the parliament of England," by which the several fines imposed two years before were raised to ten times the amount, with the addition that the buyer of any scandalous book or paper, if he did not, within four-and-twenty hours after knowledge thereof, bring it to the lord mayor of London or some other justice of the peace, should forfeit twenty shillings for every such omission. The many evils occasioned by the said books and pamphlets, the act declares, had proceeded from "the irregularity and licentiousness of printing, the art whereof in this commonwealth, and in all foreign parts, hath been and ought to be restrained from too arbitrary and general an exercise;" but still it is admitted that there are some "occurrences and news, the truth whereof may be fit to be known and published, for the satisfaction of all the good people of this commonwealth therein interested, and of all the well-affected thereto;" wherefore it is enacted that no person whatsoever shall compose, write, print, publish, sell, or utter any book or pamphlet, treatise, or sheet of news, unless licensed under the hand of the clerk of the parliament, or of the person authorized by the Council of State, or of the secretary of the army for so much as may concern the affairs of the army. The great numbers of objectionable pamphlets that had lately appeared are attributed to "the multitude of printing-houses and presses erected in by-places and corners, out of the eye of government, contrary to the custom and practice of former times;" wherefore it is ordained that, for the future, no printing shall be used anywhere else throughout the kingdom save only in the city of London and the two universities. All printers in London, it was further enacted, should enter into bond, with two sureties, to the amount of £300, not to print any thing against the government, nor any thing without the name of the author, or at the least of the licenser, on the title-page, in addition to their own. Subsequent clauses ordered that no house or room should be let to a printer, and no printing implements, presses, or letters made, founded, or imported, without notice being given to the master and wardens of the Stationers' Company. "And whereas," says another clause, "divers vagrant persons of idle conversations, having forsaken their usual callings, and accustomed themselves, after the manner of hawkers, to sell and cry about the streets and in other places pamphlets and other books, and under color thereof are found to disperse all sorts of dangerous libels, to the intolerable dishonor of the parliament and the whole government of this commonwealth; be it ordained and enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that no such hawkers shall be any more permitted; and that they, and all ballad-singers, wheresoever they are or may be apprehended, shall forfeit all books, pamphlets, ballads, and papers by them exposed to sale, and shall, by such as shall by virtue of this act seize upon them, be conveyed and carried to the House of Correction, there to be whipped as common rogues."[1] This stringent act was only passed in the first instance for two years; but having, as it is stated, "appeared by experience to be a good and profitable law for the ends therein expressed," it was renewed in January, 1652, with some additional clauses. By one of these the Council of State was empowered to suppress any of the existing printing-presses at its discretion; and "forasmuch," says another, "as the life and growth of all arts and mysteries consisteth in a due regulation thereof, be it therefore enacted that the government and regulation of the said mystery of printing and printers shall from henceforth be and remain in the Council of State for the time being, and that the master, wardens, and assistants of the Company of Stationers, London, shall follow and observe such rules, orders, and directions concerning the regulating of printing as they shall from time to time have and receive from the said council." Another restriction now imposed was, that every person taking upon him the trade or mystery of printing as a master-printer should "use and exercise the same in his and their respective dwelling-houses, and not elsewhere, any law, statute, privilege, usage, or custom, to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding, under the penalty of £40 for every month, and so proportionably for any shorter or longer time, to be forfeited by every person offending against the provision aforesaid."[2] The state of slavery and degradation, therefore, to which the press had been reduced under the Protectorate could hardly be made worse by the Restoration, by which all these jealous and oppressive enactments were at once annulled. The royal prerogative, however, immediately resumed its ancient jurisdiction. So early as the 7th of June, 1660, within little more than a week after the king's return, an order of council was issued to the Stationers' Company to seize and deliver to the secretary of state all copies of Buchanan's History of Scotland and treatise De Jure Regni apud Scotos, as works "very pernicious to monarchy and injurious to his majesty's blessed progenitors." But afterward it was thought expedient that the printing and publishing of books should be made the subject of parliamentary regulation; and, accordingly, in 1662 an act was passed (the 14th Car. II., c. 33) which, after reciting that "the well-government and regulating of printers and printing-presses is matter of public care and of great conernment, especially considering that, by the general licentiousness of the late times, many evil-disposed persons have been encouraged to print and sell heretical, schismatical, blasphemous, seditious, and treasonable books, pamphlets, and papers, and still do continue such their unlawful and exorbitant practice, to the high dishonor of Almighty God, the endangering the peace of these kingdoms, and raising a disaffection to his most excellent majesty and his government," went on to enact, among other things, that all books and pamphlets, before being printed, should be licensed—books on the common law by the lord chancellor, either of the lords chief justices or the lord chief baron; books on history or affairs of state by one of the secretaries of state; books of heraldry by the Earl Marshal, or by Garter and one other of the Kings of Arms; and all other books by the archbishop of Canterbury or the bishop of London;—that printers should not only put their names upon every book or pamphlet printed by them, but also declare the name of the author, if required by the licenser; that for the time to come no man should be admitted to be a master-printer until the actual number of master-printers should be by death or otherwise reduced to the number of twenty; that no master-printer should keep more than two printing-presses, unless he had been a master or upper warden of the Stationers' Company, in which case he might keep three; and that nothing should be printed out of London except at the universities, and books of divinity, duly licensed by the archbishop, at one press in York. But, comprehensive as this statute seems, it was not held to do away with the ancient prerogative of the crown. "This day," says a notice in the London Gazette, under date of 5th of May, 1680, "the judges made their report to his majesty in council, in pursuance of an order of this board, by which they unanimously declare that his majesty may by law prohibit the printing and publishing of all news-books and pamphlets of news whatsoever not licensed by his majesty's authority, as manifestly tending to the breach of the peace and disturbance of the kingdom. Whereupon his majesty was pleased to direct a proclamation to be prepared for the restraining the printing of news-books and pamphlets of news without leave."[1] Such continued to be the state of the law and the practice on the subject of the press down to the Revolution. Here, therefore, it may be said the civil war had accomplished nothing for the improvement of the constitution; and no wonder, seeing that the principles maintained and the course pursued by the Commonwealth in regard to this matter had been to the full as illiberal and despotic as those of the worst times of the monarchy.

In regard to another important matter, the long contest between the prerogative and the popular power had been attended with a different result. Royal proclamations setting aside the law, which almost formed the ordinary mode of government in the reign of Charles I., were nearly unknown after the Restoration. Of two or three that are mentioned, one was issued in 1665, in the time of the Great Plague, requiring "all disbanded officers and soldiers who had served in the armies of any of the late usurped powers to depart the cities of London and Westminster, and not to return within twenty miles of the same till November following."[1] This Mr. Hallam conceives to have been connected with the well-grounded apprehension of a republican conspiracy. The most remarkable was one issued in December, 1675, ordering all coffee-houses to be shut up, "because," as it was asserted, "in such houses, and by occasion of the meeting of disaffected persons in them, divers false, malicious, and scandalous reports were devised and spread abroad, to the defamation of his majesty's government, and to the disturbance of the quiet and peace of the realm."[2] But this was recalled, on the judges being consulted, and intimating to the council that they were not agreed in opinion upon the most material of the questions submitted to them. "In this essential matter of proclamations, therefore," as Mr. Hallam observes, "the administration of Charles II. is very advantageously compared with that of his father; and, considering at the same time the entire cessation of impositions of money without consent of parliament, we must admit that, however dark might be his designs, there were no such general infringements of public liberty in his reign as had continually occurred before the Long Parliament."[3] This, then, was one great and enduring victory for the cause of law and right which the Long Parliament had achieved.

When we add to this the effective abolition of illegal or arbitrary imprisonment by the Habeas Corpus Act, and the extinction of the practice of torture, noticed in the last Book,[4] it will be perceived that the paring the talons of the prerogative had undergone in the period now under review was far from inconsiderable. The scandalous practice of coercing or intimidating juries by fine or imprisonment, which had been of occasional occurence in former times, may also be said to have been put down in the reign of Charles II. Two or three attempts were made to exercise this power; but they were effectually checked by the interference of parliament, and also by the supreme courts of law. The last recorded instance is the case of Bushell, one of the jurors who, in 1670, having acquitted the Quakers, Penn and Mead, on an indictment for an unlawful assembly, were fined by the Recorder of London forty marks each. Bushell being committed for non-payment of this fine, sued his writ of Habeas Corpus from the Court of Common Pleas: it was returned that he had been committed for finding a verdict against full and manifest evidence, and against the direction of the court; but Chief Justice Vaughan held the ground to be insufficient, and discharged him. Even Jeffreys, with all his savage violence and unscrupulous stretching of the law, did not afterward venture to revive this practice.

It was a consequence of the long suspension of the ancient constitution that, after it was reëstablished, both the Lords and Commons endeavored to extend their powers beyond their ancient limits. The former, as Mr. Hallam has remarked, "returned to their own house, on the Restoration, with confused notions of their high jurisdiction, rather enhanced than abated by the humiliation they had undergone."[1] They succeeded, however, in establishing some claims which had till now been contested. Of these the principal was their right of ultimate jurisdiction both in causes brought before them by writ of error from the common law courts and in appeals from the Court of Chancery. The doctrine generally held by lawyers upon this subject, we believe, is, that the House of Lords, in exercising its judicial functions, acts as a representative of the whole parliament; and there is certainly something in the forms observed, according to which the judgment pronounced is styled, not that of the Lords alone, but that of the High Court of Parliament, which seems to sanction this view. It has not, however, been generally admitted either by the historians and theorists of the constitution, or by the House of Commons itself. Blackstone considers the House of Lords to have succeeded to the authority of the supreme court of judicature in the kingdom, as of course, upon the dissolution of the ancient aula regia, of which the barons of parliament were constituent members.[2] Mr. Hallam conceives their ultimate jurisdiction to be founded on a paramount judicial authority delegated to them by the crown.[3] However this may be, they appear to have exercised such jurisdiction from a very ancient date, although it certainly lay very nearly dormant from the beginning of the fifteenth till toward the end of the sixteenth century, and was not much resorted to again till the commencement of the reign of Charles I. Its legal existence, however, seems always to have been known; and it is very expressly recognized, though under the name, be it observed, of the jurisdiction of "the High Court of Parliament," in a well-known statute passed in 1585.[4] Some disposition was shown by the House of Commons to resist its resumption after the Restoration; but the practice of the early part of the preceding reign was too clear to allow the claim of the Lords to be disputed here. The case was by no means so clear in regard to their claim of judging in appeals from the courts of equity. Such appeals do not appear to have ever been entertained till after the accession of Charles I., and were very rare during the greater part even of that reign. Nevertheless, no serious opposition was made to their revival after the Restoration till the year 1675, when a case arose that gave rise to a violent conflict between the two Houses. This was the appeal of Dr. Thomas Shirley against Sir John Fagg, who was a member of the House of Commons; and nothing can be clearer than that the interference of the Commons in this instance began altogether, as Mr. Hallam remarks, on the score of privilege, the only objection they made at first to the proceedings of the Lords being, that their compelling members of the Lower House to appear as respondents in cases of appeal was a violation of their exemption from legal process during the session by the general privilege of parliament. Two other cases of the same kind took place about the same time; and we shall avail ourselves of Mr. Hallam's summary of the proceedings to which they gave rise. "Four counsel, who had pleaded at the bar of the Lords in one of the cases where a member of the other House was concerned, were taken into custody of the sergeant-at-arms by the speaker's warrant. The gentleman usher of the black rod, by warrant of the Lords, empowering him to call all persons necessary to his assistance, set them at liberty. The Commons apprehended them again, and, to prevent another escape, sent them to the Tower. The Lords dispatched their usher of the black rod to the lieutenant of the Tower, commanding him to deliver up the said persons. He replied, that they were committed by order of the Commons, and he could not release them without their order, just as, if the Lords were to commit any persons, he could not release them without their lordships' order. They addressed the king to remove the lieutenant, who, after some hesitation, declined to comply with their desire. In this difficulty they had recourse, instead of the warrant of the Lords' speaker, to a writ of habeas corpus, returnable in parliament—a proceeding not usual, but the legality of which seems to be now admitted. The lieutenant of the Tower, who, rather unluckily for the Lords, had taken the other side, either out of conviction or from a sense that the Lower House were the stronger and the more formidable, instead of obeying the writ, came to the bar of the Commons for directions. They voted, as might be expected, that the writ was contrary to law and the privileges of their House." The king then endeavored to quiet the ferment by a prorogation for three months. "This period, however, not being sufficient to allay their animosity, the House of Peers took up again the appeal of Shirley in their next session. Fresh votes, and orders of equal intemperance, on both sides, ensued till the king, by the long prorogation from November, 1675, to February, 1677, put an end to the dispute. The particular appeal of Shirley was never revived, but the Lords continued without objection to exercise their general jurisdiction over appeals from courts of equity." In the heat of the contest the Commons had passed a resolution treating this jurisdiction as an usurpation; but this, as Mr. Hallam observes, "was evidently rather an act of hostility arising out of the immediate quarrel than the calm assertion of a legal principle."[1]

A few years before this, however, the Lords had been defeated on another point, after an equally keen and protracted struggle. From the first day of the Restoration, and indeed before the actual return of the king, they had begun to issue what were called

"orders" in cases in which any of themselves was a party, many of which were actual interferences with the course of law, others of an essentially legislative character, affecting whole classes of persons and descriptions of property. At length they distinctly put forward a claim to an original jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever, by entertaining, in 1667, the petition of Thomas Skinner, a merchant of London, who complained of having been injured by the East India Company, and, conceiving that he could have no sufficient redress in the ordinary courts of law, had applied for justice to the king, who transmitted his petition to the House of Lords, with a recommendation to them to inquire into and decide upon the case. Their lordships, thereupon, called upon the company for their defense, overruled their objections to the jurisdiction of the House, and, after an inquiry into the facts and some other proceedings which protracted the matter till the next session, gave judgment, awarding £5000 damages to Skinner. The Commons, who had been petitioned by the company, now took up the question, and, on the report of a committee, resolved, 2d of May, 1668, that the Lords taking cognizance of the matters in dispute between Skinner and the East India Company, "the said cause coming before their House originally, only upon the complaint of the said Skinner, being a common plea," was not agreeable to the laws of the land, and tended to deprive the subject of his right, ease, and benefit due to him by the said laws. They also voted that Skinner, in commencing and prosecuting a suit by petition in the House of Lords, and in procuring judgment against the governor of the company, who was a member of the House of Commons, had been guilty of a breach of privilege; and they ordered him to be taken into custody of the sergeant-at-arms. The Lords, on their part, met these resolutions by voting that the House of Commons' entertaining the scandalous petition of the East India Company against the Lords' House of Parliament was a breach of the privileges of the House of Peers, whose taking cognizance of the cause of Thomas Skinner was "agreeable to the laws of the land, and well warranted by the law and custom of parliament, and justified by many parliamentary precedents ancient and modern." Several conferences between the Houses, that followed, only exasperated the quarrel. The Commons now voted that, whosoever should be aiding and assisting in putting in execution the order or sentence of the Lords against the company should be deemed a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the Commons of England, and an infringer of the privileges of their House; and they sent up a message to the Lords, acquainting them that, in their opinion, the best expedient for preserving a union between the two Houses was, that all proceedings should be forborne upon the said sentence, and Sir Samuel Barnardiston, the chairman of the company, and other persons, whom the Lords had committed, set at liberty. The king now interfered: by his advice or command both Houses adjourned for three months; and they were prevented from meeting again by successive adjournments and prorogations till October, 1669.[1] As soon as they reassembled, however, the Commons again took up the matter. Sir Samuel Barnardiston being called upon, stated, that as soon as the Commons, according to his majesty's command, had first adjourned themselves on the 8th of May in the preceding year, he had been called as a delinquent on his knees to the bar of the Lords, and sentenced to pay a fine of £300 to his majesty, and to lie in custody of the black rod till the money was paid. He remained, accordingly, in confinement till the evening of the 10th of August, the day before the next adjournment, when the black rod came to him, and told him he was discharged, and might go where he pleased. On his asking to whom he was beholden for his release, he was told that he was discharged upon honorable terms. "But pray," continued black rod, "ask me no questions, for I must make you no answer; yet, if I see you to-morrow, after the House is adjourned, I will tell you more: there is a mystery, but I have sufficient authority for what I do." In fact, it appears that, probably by the command of the king, the fine had been entered as paid on the records of the exchequer. Some more warm debates and conferences now ensued; and at last the Commons voted another string of resolutions, in one of which they laid down the principle, "That the House of Peers, as well as all other courts, are in their judicial proceedings to be guided and governed by law: but if they give a wrongful sentence, contrary to law, and the party grieved might not seek redress thereof in full parliament, and for that end repair to the House of Commons, who are part of the legislative power, that either they may interpose with their lordships for the reversal of such sentence, or prepare a bill for that purpose, and for the preventing the like grievances for the time to come, the consequence thereof would plainly be that their lordships' judicature is boundless and above law, and that the party grieved shall be without remedy." At the same time they resolved that the Lords should be desired to vacate or annul both the judgment against Barnardiston and that against the East India Company: and they afterward passed a bill to that effect, and sent it up to the other House, by which, however, it was, as might be expected, thrown out. So also was another bill by the Commons, which came down from the Lords, having for its object to settle the matter of privilege and judicature in parliament. In this state the controversy stood when the Houses were prorogued in December. Meanwhile, no further steps had been taken by the Lords to enforce their judgment against the company. At last the affair was ended by the interposition of the king, who, when parliament met again in February, summoned both Houses to Whitehall, and, informing them that he would himself give present order to erase all records and entries of the case in the books of the council, and the exchequer, proposed that they should do the like in their journals. This proposition was very gladly embraced by the Commons, and was not rejected by the Lords; and the latter have from this time tacitly abandoned all pretensions to an original jurisdiction in civil suits.

The most important right established by the Commons within the present period was that of being not only the originators, but also the entire framers, of all money-bills, and of all clauses in any bills imposing any pecuniary burden upon the subject. Grants of supply appear to have been anciently made by the two Houses separately; nor were they for a long time put into the form of statutes or considered as laws. It was not till about the middle of the fourteenth century that the practice began of the Lords and Commons joining in such grants; nor was it till nearly two centuries later, toward the close of the reign of Henry VIII., that they generally assumed a complete legislative form. Throughout the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. the usual enacting words were to the effect that the Commons made the grant with the assent of the Lords. In the first parliament of Charles I. the Commons began, in the preamble of bills of supply, to recite the grant as if wholly their own, but in the enacting words introduced the name of the Lords, as in other statutes; and this has ever since continued to be the practice.[1] No dispute arose after the Restoration about the right of the Commons to originate all bills that were really bills of supply and taxation; but the Lords demurred when, in the parliament of 1661, the other House refused to entertain a bill which was sent down to them for paving the streets of Westminster, on the ground that it went to lay a charge on the people. This bill, or, rather, another which the Commons substituted for it, and in which the Lords made an amendment, was ultimately dropped; and, "for a few years after," according to Mr. Hallam, "though the point in question was still agitated, instances occur where the Commons suffered amendments in what were now considered as money-bills to pass, and others where the Lords receded from them rather than defeat the proposed measure." In April, 1671, however, a case occurred in which the principle contended for by the Commons presented itself in a new shape. A bill having been brought up to the Lords imposing a tax upon sugar, the Lords reduced the amount of the tax; on which the Commons resolved, "That in all aids given to the king by the Commons, the rate or tax ought not to be altered by the Lords." This brought on three successive conferences between the Houses, in which the question at issue was discussed with a great profusion of learning as well as of logic, but, as Mr. Hallam thinks, "with a decided advantage both as to precedent and constitutional analogy on the side of the Peers." This controversy, like the others about the jurisdiction of the Lords, was only at last terminated for the present by a prorogation of the Houses, which were not suffered to meet again for the dispatch of business for nearly two years."[2] "I must confess," says Mr. Hallam, in winding up his account of the progressive development of these claims of the House of Commons, "that, in applying the wise and ancient maxim, that the Commons alone can empower the king to levy the people's money, to a private bill for lighting and cleansing a certain town, or cutting dikes in a fen, to local and limited assessments for local benefit, as to which the crown has no manner of interest, nor has any thing to do with the collection, there was more disposition shown to make encroachments than to guard against those of others. They began soon after the Revolution to introduce a still more extraordinary construction of their privilege, not receiving from the House of Lords any bill which imposes a pecuniary penalty on offenders, nor permitting them to alter the application of such as have been imposed below. These restrictions upon the other House of Parliament, however, are now become, in their own estimation, the standing privileges of the Commons. Several instances have occurred during the last century, though not, I believe, very lately, when bills, chiefly of a private nature, have been unanimously rejected, and even thrown over the table by the speaker, because they contained some provisions in which the Lords had trespassed upon these alledged rights. They are, as may be supposed, very differently regarded in the neighboring chamber. The Lords have never acknowledged any further privilege than that of originating bills of supply. But the good sense of both parties, and of an enlightened nation, who must witness and judge of their disputes, as well as the natural desire of the government to prevent in the outset any altercation that must impede the course of its measures, have rendered this little jealousy unproductive of those animosities which it seemed so happily contrived to excite. The one House, without admitting the alledged privilege, has generally been cautious not to give a pretext for eagerly asserting it; and the other, on the trifling occasions where it has seemed, perhaps unintentionally, to be infringed, has commonly resorted to the moderate course of passing a fresh bill to the same effect, after satisfying its dignity by rejecting the first."[1]

As connected with this subject we may present a short account of the origin and progress of the appropriation of parliamentary aids and supplies for particular services, which we take chiefly from Mr. Hargrave's tract on that subject, published in the first volume of his Juridical Arguments.[2]

In the more ancient times the usual course of parliament, on granting taxes and aids to the crown, was, to leave the application of the money wholly to the discretion of the king and his ministers. Some comparatively early instances, however, of granting taxes, with appropriation of them to particular purposes, and with provisions to prevent a different application, are cited by Mr. Hargrave from the rolls of parliament. He observes that it has been asserted, in debate in parliament, that appropriations were frequently practiced even in the reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII.[3]

[2] The prorogation took place 22d April, 1671, to 16th April, 1672, on which day the Houses were further prorogued to the 30th of October; and, again, from that day to the 4th of February, 1673.

[3] The authority quoted by Mr. Hargrave is Gray's Debates, vol. iii. pp. 317, 318, and 447.

"A much more recent instance," he continues, "of granting a supply with appropriations, appears in the statute of 21 James I., c. 34. By that act there was a grant to the king of three subsidies and three fifteenths and tenths, with an appropriation of £18,000 for repair of certain decayed cities and towns,[1] and of the residue for managing the then expected war with Spain. Also, to guard against any other employment of the supply, the act appointed eight citizens of London treasurers, and ten others to be of the king's council for the war; of whom the former were to make oath that none of the moneys should issue out of their hands without warrant from such council of war, and the latter that they would not make warrant except for the ends before mentioned, and both treasurers and council were to be accountable to the Commons. The act of supply on this special plan of appropriation was founded on King James's own proposition in a speech to the Commons in March, 1623. . . . But this taking the receipt and application of a tax out of the hands of the crown was deemed so extraordinary, and gave such an alarm to the Lords, that before they passed the bill they took the opinion of the judges upon it. Indeed, on consideration of all the circumstances, and especially that the Lords were joined with the Commons in the commission for executing the act, the judges resolved that there was nothing in the act to impeach the privilege or power of the Higher House, or to add to the privileges of the Lower House beyond the particular case in question. But though the Lords concurred in this resolution, yet, before reading the act the third time, they entered into a protestation, which recited the bill to be in many things different from the ancient usual form of subsidy bills, and guarded against its being construed to give or to take from any jurisdiction, power, or privilege of either House."

This instance was made a precedent of, in the Long Parliament, in the several acts of supply passed before the rupture with the king. According to Clarendon, Cromwell would not permit any clauses of appropriation in the supplies given to him by his parliaments.[2]

On the Restoration, parliament more usually granted their aids to the crown without clauses of appropriation. But, in 1665, a precedent of appropriation was again established; for the stat. 17 Car. II., c. 1, by which £1,500,000 was granted, contained a clause which provided that a separate account should be kept of the money leviable, and that no part of it should be issued out of the Exchequer during the then war but by order mentioning that it was for that service. Some instances of supplies granted to Charles II. after 1665, without any appropriation, occur; but the precedent of appropriation was in general followed during the remainder of his reign, as appears by the statutes 19 Car. II., c. 8; 20 Car. II., c. 1; 22 Car. II., c. 3; 29 Car. II., c. 1; 29 and 30 Car. II., c. 1; 30 Car. II., c. 1; and 31 Car. II., c. 1. In the last-named statute the provision was carried so far as to make it punishable as a præmunire to misapply the money appropriated, or to advise the king to it.

In the reign of James II. the few parliamentary aids to him were made without appropriation.

From the Revolution, the appropriation to certain services of the supplies granted became the common practice. In the conclusion of the stat. 9 and 10 Will. III., c. 44, there is an appropriation of all the supplies of the session. "This is the first instance," observes Mr. Hargrave, "I have observed of a general appropriating act for the session, such as is now in use."

The representation of the people in the House of Commons, as it remained down to the union with Scotland, was completed within this period, by the right of returning members being granted by statute,[1] in 1672, to the county and city of Durham, and, in 1673, by charter, to the borough of Newark. This was the last occasion on which the crown exercised the ancient prerogative of creating a parliamentary borough; and, although, on the question being raised in March, 1677, the right of Newark to return members in consequence of the charter was affirmed in the House of Commons by a majority of 125 to 73, it is probable that any further such attempts to alter the representation would have been more effectually resisted.

From the very able and valuable Report of the Select Committee appointed by the House of Commons in 1837 to examine precedents with respect to the circulation and publication of papers printed by order of the House,[2] it appears that the earliest entry contained in the Journals of the Commons relating to the printing of any parliamentary papers is on the 30th of July, 1641, when the House adopted certain resolutions, and ordered that they should be printed. It scarcely admits of a doubt, however, in the opinion of the committee, "that from a much earlier period parliament must occasionally have found it necessary or expedient that particular proceedings should be made public, although the means by which it was done can not be traced." The committee do not notice the assertion of Coke, Prynne, and other legal authorities or constitutional antiquaries, that, in early times, down at least to the reign of Henry VII., the Commons never printed or published any act or ordinance whatsoever relating either to public affairs or to their own proceedings without the approbation and concurrence of the other House.[3] "From 1641 to 1680," the Report continues, "there are various resolutions for the printing of specific votes and papers. In

[1] Probably from not having the words in full before him, but trusting to the erroneous abridgment of them in the common editions, Mr. Hargrave has here been led into a mistake about the import of the statute of 21 Jac. I. We have already had occasion to point out that that statute says nothing whatever about the repair of any towns. (See ante, p. 637, col. 2, note.) If this was an instance of appropriation, there was the same appropriation in every act granting a subsidy, at least from the beginning of the reign of Henry VIII. In the statute 3 Hen. VIII., c. 22, may be seen a list of the decayed towns in the case of which allowances or deductions were to be made in collecting the tax, according to the form of words constantly repeated in every one of these statutes, "after such rate as was and hath before this time been had and made in every shire."

1680–1, a general resolution was adopted for printing the votes and proceedings of the House; and from that year such general order has been renewed every session, and a printer appointed for the purpose by the speaker, an occasional prohibition being added against all other persons printing the same; reports and miscellaneous papers have also been from time to time printed under distinct orders of the House. The practice thus detailed has been continued up to the present time." The only interruption of this regular printing of the votes occured in 1702, on the 25th of February, in which year the Commons resolved that none of their votes should be printed without the order of the House—the reason given in the journals being, "that the House have found great inconveniences attending the printing of the votes." This alludes to an interference by the Lords in an address voted by the Commons to the queen. But, on the 23d of November, 1703, it was, after debate, carried by a majority of 177 to 147, that the votes should again be printed as usual.[1] No doubt, the committee conceives, can exist, that the practice of printing papers was introduced by the Long Parliament for the purpose of their general publication. "This is shown," they observe, "by the subsequent proceedings of the House with regard to the order for printing of 1641, above referred to, and by the appointment of a committee in the subsequent year, to consider, among other things, the best way of divulging, dispersing, and publishing the orders and votes, and also the declarations of the House, through the kingdom, and of the well and true printing of them. This committee presented, on the 6th of June, an order for dispersing and divulging the orders and declarations of the House through the sheriffs, under-sheriffs, constables, headboroughs, and tithingmen of the several counties, with directions for the speedy publication to the inhabitants; and, on the 9th of June the committee made reports, whereon it was resolved that certain examinations, remonstrances, orders, votes, and declarations should be printed and published, and an order was made for the payment of the expense." It may fairly be assumed, therefore, that whatever occasional printing of legislative enactments there may have been in earlier times, the regular practice of printing and publishing notices of all the proceedings of the House of Commons was an innovation for which we are indebted to the Long Parliament. The anxiety thus evinced on the part of that assembly to enlist public opinion in its support began, it will be observed, at an early stage of its deliberations, and a considerable time before there was any thought, at least generally entertained, of an appeal to arms. The same feeling, however, continued throughout all the violence of the contest that ensued; in the midst of the roar of artillery the printing-press still plied its office as actively as ever, and on both sides the sword and the pen were wielded together. For it must be admitted that the king and his advisers were, from the first, not less alive than the leaders of the popular cause to the importance of the latter weapon; the royal declarations and other state papers drawn up by the persuasive pen of Clarendon were dispersed over the country in as great numbers as were the adverse proclamations of the parliament. It was a tribute to the public intelligence extorted from both parties by the general advancement of the popular mind.

We have seen how eager also the republican government very soon showed itself to put down all printed accounts of public transactions except those drawn up by its own authority. Much of this jealousy, mixed with other feelings about the dignity of the legislature being comprised by the publication of its proceedings, survived throughout the present period. After the Restoration, many orders, declarations, and other parliamentary proceedings continued to be printed and published by order of the House of Commons;[1] but it does not appear to have been till the 30th of October, 1680, that the first general order for printing its votes was made by the House. A debate took place upon a proposal for the renewal of this order in the next parliament, on the 24th of March, 1681, of which the committee have given a report from a rare volume in the library of the House of Commons, and in which a few facts were adverted to that are worth quoting. Sir John Hotham, the mover, observed, that the last parliament had found the printing of their votes to be for the security of the nation, that it had prevented disadvantageous representations of them to the world by false accounts of their proceedings. "That which put me upon moving the printing your votes the last parliament," said Sir William Cowper, "was false papers that went about in former parliaments of the votes and transactions of the House." Mr. Secretary Jenkins having objected that the printing was against the gravity of the House, and a sort of appeal to the people, Mr. Boscawen replied, "If you had been a privy council, then it were fit what you do should be kept secret; but your Journal-books are open, and copies of your votes in every coffee-house, and, if you print them not, half votes will be dispersed to your prejudice." The unauthorized copies of the votes that were to be found in the coffee-houses appear to have been only written copies, as, indeed, most of the newspapers at this time were. "I find," said another speaker (Mr. L. Gower), "that those who write our votes and transactions, and send them all England over, are favored." The copies were probably obtained through the clerks of the House. It was stated by Sir Francis Winnington, that "in the Long Parliament it was a trade among clerks to write votes;" and he added, that one clerk who had been so employed, having been brought before the House, "was sent away and nothing done to him." Colonel Mildmay said well in the course of this debate, "It is fit that all Christendom should have notice of what you do, and posterity of what you have done."

Among the lawyers of this period there are several of distinguished name. After the Restoration the great seal was committed to the Earl of Clarendon, who had withdrawn from practice as a lawyer; and afterward to the Earl of Shaftesbury, who, though a lawyer by education, had never practiced at all. The character of Clarendon, as a lawyer, is thus summed up by Lord Mansfield in a few words: "The civil war prevented his laying deep the foundations of law, and the avocations of politics interrupted the business of the chancellor."[1] Of the Earl of Nottingham, who succeeded these, Sir W. Blackstone gives the following high character: "Sir Heneage Finch, who succeeded in 1673, and became afterward Earl of Nottingham, was a person of the greatest abilities and most uncorrupted integrity, a thorough master and zealous defender of the laws and constitution of his country, and endued with a pervading genius that enabled him to discover and to pursue the true spirit of justice, notwithstanding the embarrassments raised by the narrow and technical notions which then prevailed in the courts of law, and the imperfect ideas of redress which had possessed the courts of equity. The reason and necessities of mankind, arising from the great change in property by the extension of trade and the abolition of military tenures, coöperated in establishing his plan, and enabled him, in the course of nine years, to build a system of jurisprudence and jurisdiction upon wide and rational foundations, which have also been extended and improved by many great men who have since presided in Chancery; and from that time to this, the power and business of the court have increased to an amazing degree."[2] On the subject of the great talents and legal learning of Lord Chancellor Nottingham there can be no difference of opinion; but many will demur to Blackstone's panegyric on his zeal in defense of the laws and constitution. He was, throughout his life, a devoted adherent of the court and the Tory party; and even in his own court, if we may take the opinion of Roger North, one of the same side in politics, it was rather the business than the practice of the court that flourished under this eminent chancellor, who was, according to this writer, a formalist, and took extreme pleasure in encouraging and listening to nice distinctions of law, instead of taking a broad view of the equity of each case. Roger, however, it must be admitted, is no great authority as to such matters.

Of Sir Orlando Bridgman, who held the great seal as lord keeper for the interval of five years between the dismissal of Clarendon and the appointment of Shaftesbury, there seems nothing particularly worth relating in a work such as the present, further than that he had been a very eminent lawyer, particularly in conveyancing,[3] to which

[1] Reply to the usual complimentary speech delivered to him on his taking leave of the Society of Lincoln's Inn. [2] 3. Com., p. 55.

[3] He has been styled by Mr. Sergeant Hill the "Father of Conveyancers."—Dougl. 568. In Parnassi Puerperium, published in 1659, occur the following lines on a subject which would, at first sight, seem but little susceptible of poetical ornament or illustration:—

"To those excellent Conveyancers, Sir Orlando Bridgman and the worthy Mr. Geoffry Palmer.

"Wise Greece and Rome did this in both combine,
To make addresses to the Delphian shrine;
And with divine Apollo to advise
Was the preludium of an enterprise.
Few Englishmen dare purchase an estate
Unless your wisdoms unsophisticate
The title vouch. You can stop Hymen's way:
For portions, jointures, both sexes must pay
Due thanks. Wise fathers ranters keep in awe, Craving from ye (the oracles of law)
Help to entail their lands; while yourselves be Tenants of riches of renown in fee."

he devoted himself entirely during the period of the Commonwealth, being attached to the royal cause. After the Restoration he was raised to the place of lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, where he sat, says Roger North, with high esteem.[1] "The removing him," adds Roger, "from thence to the Chancery did not at all contribute any increase to his fame, but rather the contrary, for he was timorous to an impotence, and that not mended by his great age."[2]

Of Lord Keeper Guilford an ample account has been given by his brother, Roger North, which, however, is of little value in reference to his professional merits. He was not quite so great a lawyer, still less so great a man, as his brother Roger's ardent and enthusiastic brotherly love and admiration of him would represent him to have been. He appears to have been a prudent, cautious, hard-working, perhaps somewhat cunning and time-serving lawyer, with nothing very great or very profound about him. One seldom sees his judgments quoted; and the relative places of him and Lord Chancellor Nottingham would probably be very different in the estimation of most lawyers from what they might be in the partial fraternal opinion of Roger North, who, as we have seen, speaks disparagingly of Lord Nottingham.

Hale, Jeffreys, and Saunders have also been portrayed by the graphic hand of Roger North; and we shall transfer to our pages a few of his characteristic traits—only premising that his character of Hale is to be taken cum grano salis, as being drawn by a political adversary, and a writer, moreover, who has been termed, not inappropriately, one of the "most interesting and prejudiced writers of that time."

Of Lord Chief Justice Hale he writes:—"It was the Lord Keeper North's good fortune to enter his practice in the circuits under this judge, whose reputation for his great ability in the law and rigorous justice will be very long-lived in Westminster Hall and the Inns of Court and Chancery; for there was a conjunction of characters, his and the times conspiring to aggrandize it. After having improved his knowledge as a student, by reporting from him when he sat as judge of the Common Pleas and as a practicer in the northern circuits, it so happened that, in the unaccountable rolling of preferments in the law, it became his lordship's province to judge of and (for cause apparent) to correct the errors of that great man. The truth is, his lordship took early into a course diametrically opposite to that approved by Hales;

[1] We have also Lord Ellenborough's authority to the same effect, 14 East, 134.

[2] Life of Lord Keeper Guilford, vol. i. p. 167. Burnet's account seems to corroborate this.—Own Times, i. 464.

for the principles of the former, being demagogical, could not allow much favor to one who rose a monarchist declared. Then, after the latter, by being made chief justice of the Common Pleas, together with the other judges of that court and those of the Exchequer, had jurisdiction of errors in judgment given by the Court of King's Bench, the separation was wider; and the old judge, by a certain formal overlooking of him, and refining of arguments against all he appeared for, affected to show it. And, to say truth, that judge had acquired an authority so transcendent that his opinions were, by most lawyers and others, thought incontestable; and he was habituated in not bearing contradiction, and had no value for any person whatever that did not subscribe to him. His lordship knew him perfectly well, and revered him for his great learning in the history, law, and records of the English constitution. I have heard him say that, while Hales was chief baron of the Exchequer, by means of his great learning, even against his inclination, he did the crown more justice in that court than any others in his place had done with all their good will and less knowledge. But his lordship knew also his foible, which was leaning toward the popular; yet, when he knew the law was for the king (as well he might, being acquainted with all the records of the court, to which men of the law are commonly strangers), he failed not to judge accordingly.

"He was an upright judge, if taken within himself, and when he appeared, as he often did, and really was, partial, his inclination or prejudice, insensibly to himself, drew his judgment aside. His bias lay strangely for and against characters and denominations, and sometimes the very habits of persons. If one party was a courtier, and well dressed, and the other a sort of Puritan, with a black cap and plain clothes, he insensibly thought the justice of the cause with the latter. If the dissenting or anti-court party was at the back of a cause, he was very seldom impartial; and the loyalists had always a great disadvantage before him. And he ever sat hard upon his lordship in his practice in causes of that nature. It is said he was once caught. A courtier, who had a cause to be tried before him, got one to go to him as from the king, to speak for favor to his adversary, and so carried his point; for the chief justice could not think any person to be in the right that came so unduly recommended.

"He became the cushion exceedingly well: his manner of hearing patient, his directions pertinent, and his discourses copious; and, although he hesitated often, fluent. His stop for a word, by the produce, always paid for the delay; and on some occasions he would utter sentences heroic. . . . . Whatever his courage or fear was, it is most certain his vanity was excessive, which grew out of a self-conversation and being little abroad. But when he was off from the seat of justice, and at home, his conversation was with none but flatterers. He was allowed on all hands to be the most profound lawyer of his time, and he knew it; but that did not serve him, but he would be also a profound philosopher, naturalist, poet, and divine, and measured his abilities in all these by the scale of his learning in the law, which he knew how to value; and if he postponed any, it was the law to all the rest; for he was so bizarr in his dispositions, that he almost suppressed his collections and writings of the law, which were a treasure, and, being published, would have been a monument of him beyond the power of marble."[1]

In the last expression, "a monument beyond the power of marble," Roger rises above himself in felicity of expression.

Of that man "damned to fame," or, rather, infamy, by the name of Judge Jeffreys, Roger North gives the following particulars:—"To take him from his beginning, he was a gentleman's son in Wales, of whom it was reported that he used to say, George (his son) would die in his shoes. His beginnings at the inns of court and practice were low. After he was called to the bar he used to sit in coffee-houses, and order his man to come and tell him that company attended him at his chamber: at which he would huff, and say, Let them stay a little, I will come presently. This made a show of business, of which he had need enough, being married, and having several children. One of the aldermen of the city was of his name, which probably inclined him to steer his course that way, where, having got acquaintance with the city attorneys, and drinking desperately with them, he came into full business among them, and was chosen recorder of the city. That let him into knowledge at court, and he was entertained as the Duke of York's solicitor, and was also of the king's counsel. He continued recorder till the prosecution of abhorrers, and saved himself (as he took it) by composition for his place. Thereupon, having surrendered his recordership, he obtained the place of chief justice of the King's Bench; and, after the death of the Lord Keeper Guilford, the great seal, which he held till the Prince of Orange landed, and then he absconded in disguise, in order to fly beyond sea; but, being discovered at Wapping, escaped narrowly being torn in pieces by the rabble. He was secured by the lord mayor, and sent to the Tower, where he died."[2]

The following passage gives a fearful picture of those times—so bad that, if it came in a less questionable shape, it might be rejected as untrue. "There is one branch of that chief's expedition in the west, which is his visitation of the city of Bristol, that hath some singularities of a nature so strange

[1] Life of Lord Keeper Guilford, vol. i. p. 111, et seq. Instead of publishing his "Collections and Writings of the Law, he ordered them," adds Roger, "to be locked up in Lincoln's Inn Library; and made no scruple to send forth little tracts in philosophy, as the Non-gravitation of Fluids, Difficiles Nugæ, prosecuting the same nugæ, or trifles, upon the baroscope; which made Sir William Jones say that his whole life (meaning in private, as I suppose) was nugarum plena, or made up of trifles: his Origination of Mankind, in appearance a great work, with nothing in it, and that which scarce any one ever read or will read; and, what is very remarkable, the very childish ignorance of his subject, showed in these books, is dressed in most accurate method, proper expression, and significant English style, better than which one need not desire to meet with as a temptation to read."

that I think them worth my time to relate. There had been an usage among the aldermen and justices of the city (where all persons, even common shop-keepers, more or less, trade to the American plantations) to carry over criminals, who were pardoned with condition of transportation, and to sell them for money. This was found to be a good trade; but not being content to take such felons as were convict at their assizes and sessions, which produced but a few, they found out a shorter way, which yielded a greater plenty of the commodity. And that was this:—The mayor and justices, or some of them, usually met at their tolsey (a court-house by their exchequer) about noon, which was the meeting of the merchants, as at the Exchange of London, and there they sat and did justice business that was brought before them. When small rogues and pilferers were taken and brought there, and, upon examination, put under the terror of being hanged, in order to which mittimuses were making, some of the diligent officers attending instructed them to pray transportation, as the only way to save them; and, for the most part, they did so. Then no more was done, but the next alderman in course took one, and another as their turns came, sometimes quarreling whose the last was, and sent them over and sold them. This trade had been driven for many years, and no notice taken of it. Some of the wealthier aldermen, although they had sat in the court and connived, as Sir Robert Cann, for instance, never had a man; but yet they were all involved in the guilt when the charge came over them. It appears not how this outrageous practice came to the knowledge of the lord chief justice, but when he had hold of the end, he made thorough-stitch work with them, for he delighted in such fair opportunities to rant. He came to the city, and told some that he had brought a broom to sweep them. The city of Bristol was a proud body, and their head, the mayor, in the assize commission is put before the judge of assize, though, perhaps, it was not so in this extraordinary commission of oyer and terminer. But, for certain, when his lordship came upon the bench, and examined this matter, he found all the aldermen and justices concerned in this kidnapping trade, more or less, and the mayor himself as bad as any. He thereupon turns to the mayor, accoutred with his scarlet and furs, and gave him all the ill names that scolding eloquence could supply; and so, with rating and staring, as his way was, never left till he made him quit the bench, and go down to the criminal's post at the bar; and there he pleaded for himself, as a common rogue or thief must have done; and, when the mayor hesitated a little, or slackened his pace, he bawled at him, and, stamping, called for his guards—for he was general by commission. Thus the citizens saw their scarlet chief magistrate at the bar, to their infinite terror and amazement. He then took security of them to answer informations, and so left them to ponder their cases among themselves. At London, Sir Robert Cann applied, by friends, to appease him, and to get from under the prosecution; and, at last, he granted it, saying, Go thy way; sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. The prosecutions depended till the Revolution, which made an amnesty; and the fright only, which was no small one, was all the punishment these judicial kidnappers underwent, and the gains acquired by so wicked a trade rested peacefully in their pockets."[1]

Next we have a picture of Sir John Trevor:—"He was a countryman of the Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys, and his favorite. It may not be amiss to show a little of him, that it may appear what sort of men that chief brought forward. He was bred a sort of clerk in old Arthur Trevor's chamber, an eminent and worthy professor of the law in the Inner Temple. A gentleman that visited Mr. Arthur Trevor, at his going out, observed a strange-looking boy in his clerk's seat (for no person ever had a worse sort of squint than he had), and asked who that youth was? A kinsman of mine, said Arthur Trevor, that I have allowed to sit here, to learn the knavish part of the law. This John Trevor grew up, and took in with the gamesters, among whom he was a great proficient; and, being well grounded in the law, proved a critic in resolving gaming cases and doubts, and had the authority of a judge among them; and his sentence, for the most part, carried the cause. From this exercise he was recommended by Jeffreys to be of the king's counsel, and then master of the rolls, and, like a true gamester, he fell to the good work of supplanting his patron and friend; and had certainly done it if King James's affairs had stood right up much longer, for he was advanced so far with him as to vilify and scold with him publicly in Whitehall. He was chosen speaker in King James's parliament, and served in the same post after the Revolution. Once, upon a scrutiny of bribery in the House of Commons, in favor of one Cook, a creature of Sir Josiah Child's, who ruled the East India Company, it was plainly discovered that the speaker, Trevor, had £1000.; upon which the debate run hard upon him, and he sat above six hours as prolocutor in an assembly that passed that time with calling him all to naught to his face; and at length he was forced, or yielded, to put the question upon himself, as in the form, As many as are of opinion that Sir John Trevor is guilty of corrupt bribery by receiving, &c., and, in declaring the sense of the House, declared himself guilty. The House rose, and he went his way, and came there no more. But whether the members thought that the being so baited in the chair was punishment enough, or for his taking such gross correction so patiently and conformably, or else a matter once out of the way was thought of no more, it is certain that he never was molested further about that matter, but continued in his post of master of the rolls, equitable judge of the subjects' interests and estates, to the great encouragement of prudent bribery forever after."[2]

Upon the following short note of his brother, the lord keeper, on the character of Jeffreys—"Noisy in nature—turbulent at first setting out—deserter in difficulties—full of tricks—helped by similar friendships—honesty, law, policy, alike," Roger has the following comment: "This, to conclude, is the summary character of the Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys, and needs no interpreter. And, since nothing historical is amiss in a design like this, I will subjoin what I have personally noted of that man, and some things of indubitable report concerning him. His friendship and conversation lay much among the good-fellows and humorists; and his delights were, accordingly, drinking, laughing, singing, kissing, and all the extravagances of the bottle. He had a set of banterers for the most part near him, as in old time great men kept fools to make them merry. And these fellows, abusing one another and their betters, were a regale to him. And no friendship or dearness could be so great, in private, which he would not use ill, and to an extravagant degree, in public. No one, that had any expectations from him, was safe from his public contempt and derision, which some of his minions at the bar bitterly felt. Those above, or that could hurt or benefit him, and none else, might depend on fair quarter at his hands. When he was in temper, and matters indifferent came before him, he became his seat of justice better than any other I ever saw in his place. He took a pleasure in mortifying fraudulent attorneys, and would deal forth his severities with a sort of majesty. He had extraordinary natural abilities, but little acquired, beyond what practice in affairs had supplied. He talked fluently, and with spirit; and his weakness was that he could not reprehend without scolding, and in such Billingsgate language as should not come out of the mouth of any man. He called it giving a lick with the rough side of his tongue. It was ordinary to hear him say, Go, you are a filthy, lousy, nitty rascal, with much more of like elegance. Scarce a day passed that he did not chide some one or other of the bar when he sat in the Chancery; and it was commonly a lecture of a quarter of an hour long. And they used to say, This is your's; my turn will be to-morrow. He seemed to lay nothing of his business to heart, nor care what he did or left undone, and spent in the Chancery Court what time he thought fit to spare. Many times, on days of causes at his house, the company have waited five hours in a morning, and, after eleven, he hath come out inflamed, and staring like one distracted. And that visage he put on when he animadverted on such as he took offense at, which made him a terror to real offenders, whom also he terrified with his face and voice, as if the thunder of the Day of Judgment broke over their heads; and nothing ever made men tremble like his vocal inflictions. He loved to insult, and was bold without check; but that only when his place was uppermost. To give an instance: a city attorney was petitioned against for some abuse; and affidavit was made that when he was told of my lord chancellor, My lord chancellor! said he, I made him: meaning his being a means to bring him early into city business. When this affidavit was read, Well, said the lord chancellor, then I will lay my maker by the heels. And, with that conceit, one of his best old friends went to jail. One of these intemperances was fatal to him. There was a scrivener at Wapping brought to hearing for relief against a bummery-bond; the contingency of losing all being showed, the bill was going to be dismissed. But one of the plaintiff's counsel said that he was a strange fellow, and sometimes went to church, sometimes to conventicles; and none could tell what to make of him; and it was thought he was a trimmer. At that the chancellor fired, and A trimmer! said he, I have heard much of that monster, but never saw one. Come forth, Mr. Trimmer; turn you round and let us see your shape! And at that rate talked so long that the poor fellow was ready to drop under him; but, at last, the bill was dismissed with costs, and he went his way. In the hall, one of his friends asked him how he came off! Came off! said he, I am escaped from the terrors of that man's face, which I would scarce undergo again to save my life; and I shall certainly have the frightful impression of it as long as I live. Afterward, when the Prince of Orange came, and all was in confusion, this lord chancellor, being very obnoxious, disguised himself in order to go beyond sea. He was in a seaman's garb, and drinking a pot in a cellar. This scrivener came into the cellar after some of his clients, and his eye caught that face, which made him start; and the chancellor, seeing himself eyed, feigned a cough, and turned to the wall with his pot in his hand. But Mr. Trimmer went out, and gave notice that he was there; whereupon the mob flowed in, and he was in extreme hazard of his life; but the lord mayor saved him, and lost himself: for the chancellor being hurried with such crowd and noise before him, and appearing so dismally, not only disguised, but disordered, and there having been an amity betwixt them, as also a veneration on the lord mayor's part, he had not spirits to sustain the shock, but fell down in a swoon; and, in not many hours after, died. But this Lord Jeffreys came to the seal without any concern at the weight of duty incumbent upon him; for, at the first, being merry over a bottle with some of his old friends, one of them told him that he would find the business heavy. No, said he, I'll make it light. But, to conclude with a strange inconsistency, he would drink and be merry, kiss and slaver with these boon companions over night, as the way of such is, and the next day fall upon them, ranting and scolding with a virulence unsufferable."[1]

[1] Life of Lord Keeper Guilford, ii. p. 111.
[2] Ibid., ii. p. 113.

We conclude with the following most strange account of Chief Justice Saunders, whose Reports are still held in high estimation in the profession:

"The Lord Chief Justice Saunders succeeded in the room of Pemberton. His character and his beginning were equally strange. He was at first no better than a poor beggar boy, if not a parish foundling, without known parents or relations. He had found a way to live by obsequiousness (in Clement's Inn, as I remember) and courting the attorneys' clerks for scraps. The extraordinary observance and diligence of the boy made the Society willing to do him good. He appeared very ambitious to learn to write; and one of the attorneys got a board knocked up at a window on the top of a stair-case, and that was his desk, where he sat and wrote after copies of court and other hands the clerks gave him. He made himself so expert a writer that he took in business, and earned some pence by hackney writing. And thus, by degrees, he pushed his faculties, and fell to forms, and, by books that were lent him, became an exquisite entering-clerk; and, by the same course of improvement of himself, an able counsel, first in special pleading, then at large. And, after he was called to the bar, had practice, in the King's Bench Court, equal with any there. As to his person, he was very corpulent and beastly—a mere lump of morbid flesh. He used to say, by his troggs (such an humorous way of talking he affected) none could say he wanted issue of his body, for he had nine in his back. He was a fetid mass that offended his neighbors at the bar in the sharpest degree. Those whose ill fortune it was to stand near him were confessors, and, in summer-time, almost martyrs. This hateful decay of his carcass came upon him by continual sottishness; for, to say nothing of brandy, he was seldom without a pot of ale at his nose, or near him. That exercise was all he used; the rest of his life was sitting at his desk, or piping at home; and that home was a tailor's house in Butcher Row, called his lodging, and the man's wife was his nurse, or worse; but, by virtue of his money, of which he made little account, though he got a great deal, he soon became master of the family; and, being no changeling, he never removed, but was true to his friends, and they to him, to the last hour of his life.

"So much for his person and education. As for his parts, none had them more lively than he: wit and repartee, in an affected rusticity, were natural to him. He was ever ready, and never at a loss; and none came so near as he to be a match for Sergeant Mainard. His great dexterity was in the art of special pleading, and he would lay snares that often caught his superiors who were not aware of his traps. And he was so fond of success for his clients that, rather than fail, he would set the court hard with a trick; for which he met sometimes with a reprimand, which he would wittily ward off, so that no one was much offended with him. But Hales could not bear his irregularity of life; and for that, and suspicion of his tricks, used to bear hard upon him in the court. But ill-usage from the bench was too hard for his hold of business, being such as scarce any could do but himself. With all this he had a goodness of nature and disposition in so great a degree that he may be deservedly styled a philanthrope. He was a very Silenus to the boys, as, in this place I may term the students of the law, to make them merry whenever they had a mind to it. He had nothing of rigid or austere in him. If any near him at the bar grumbled at his stench, he ever converted the complaint into content and laughing with the abundance of his wit. As to his ordinary dealing, he was as honest as the driven snow was white; and why not, having no regard for money or desire to be rich? And, for good-nature and condescension, there was not his fellow. I have seen him, for hours and half hours together, before the court sat, stand at the bar, with an audience of students over against him, putting of cases, and debating so as suited their capacities, and encouraged their industry. And so in the Temple, he seldom moved without a parcel of youths hanging about him, and he merry and jesting with them.

"It will be readily conceived that this man was never cut out to be a presbyter, or any thing that is severe and crabbed. In no time did he lean to faction, but did his business without offense to any. He put off officious talk of government or politics with jests, and so made his wit a catholicon, or shield, to cover all his weak places and infirmities. When the court fell into a steady course of using the law against all kinds of offenders, this man was taken into the king's business, and had the part of drawing and perusal of almost all indictments and informations that were then to be prosecuted, with the pleadings thereon if any were special; and he had the settling of the large pleadings in the quo warranto against London. His lordship (Lord Guilford) had no sort of conversation with him but in the way of business, and at the bar; but once, after he was in the king's business, he dined with his lordship, and no more. And there he showed another qualification he had acquired, and that was to play jigs upon an harpsichord, having taught himself with the opportunity of an old virginal of his landlady's, but in such a manner (not for defect, but figure) as to see him were a jest. The king, observing him to be of a free disposition — loyal, friendly, and without greediness or guile — thought of him to be the chief justice of the King's Bench at that nice time. And the ministry could not but approve of it. So great a weight was then at stake as could not be trusted to men of doubtful principles, or such as any thing might tempt to desert them. While he sat in the Court of King's Bench, he gave the rule to the general satisfaction of the lawyers. But his course of life was so different from what it had been, his business incessant, and withal crabbed, and his diet and exercise changed, and the constitution of his body, or head rather, could not sustain it, and he fell into an apoplexy and palsy, which numbed his parts; and he never recovered the strength of them.

"He outlived the judgment in the quo warranto, but was not present otherwise than by sending his opinion by one of the judges to be for the king, who, at the pronouncing of the judgment, declared it to the court accordingly, which is frequently done in like cases."[1]

At the Restoration properly begins the modern history of the public revenue. On the 31st of August, 1660, the Convention Parliament, on the report of a committee which had been appointed to inquire into the then state of the income of the crown, voted that its amount should be made up, for the lifetime of the king, to £1,200,000 a-year. To raise this sum several acts were passed. By the 12 Car. II., c. 4, the subsidy called tunnage levied upon foreign wines, and also the other subsidy called poundage, consisting of certain duties, payable according to a schedule of rates annexed to the act, upon the export and import of a great number of other commodities, were conferred upon the king for life. This act, as being the foundation of our modern system of Custom House duties, is known as the great statute; and the rates which it imposed used to be distinguished from other rates imposed under subsequent acts by the name of the old subsidy. The old subsidy of tunnage and poundage is estimated to have produced to Charles about £400,000 a-year. The excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors sold within the kingdom, which had been introduced in the time of the Commonwealth, was, by the 12 Car. II., c. 34, granted to the king and his heirs and successors forever, "in full and ample recompense and satisfaction," as it was expressly declared, for the profits of the court of wards and of the prerogative of purveyance, which the same act took away, together with all arrears any way due for the same. Hence this branch of the royal revenue received the name of the hereditary excise: its produce, along with the profits of wine licenses, which were conferred by another act, was estimated at about £300,000. By another act, the 13 and 14 Car. II., c. 10 (not passed till 1662), a duty of two shillings upon "every fire, hearth, and stove," in all dwelling-houses worth more than twenty shillings per annum, was in like manner granted to the king and his successors forever.[1] This tax of hearth-money, on its first imposition, was calculated to produce an annual revenue of about £170,000. In addition to these three great branches, the king derived from the ancient landed property or domain of the crown about £100,000 a-year; from the Forest of Dean, £5000; from the post-office, £26,000; from the first fruits and tenths of church benefices, £18,000; from the coinage and preëmption of tin, as Duke of Cornwall, £12,000; and from a variety of miscellaneous sources, £55,000. His entire ordinary revenue at this time, therefore, was rather less than £1,100,000. Considerable additions, however, were afterward made to this sum. Further duties were imposed on the importation of wine and the sale of excisable liquors; for subsidies (the last example of that ancient tax) were granted by parliament, in 1663; various sums were raised in subsequent years by taxes upon land, under the name of monthly assessments, as had been first practiced in the time of the Commonwealth;[1] in other cases poll-taxes and taxes upon personal property were laid on; and a duty was for the first time imposed upon stamps, in 1671, by the 22 and 23 Car. II., c. 9, entitled "An Act for laying Impositions on Proceedings at Law." In all, it is calculated that the parliamentary grants in the course of this reign amounted to about £13,414,868.[2] To this are to be added the money dower of Queen Catherine, nominally £500,000, but of which it is said only £250,000 was actually paid; the sum derived from an arrangement made in 1670, by the 22 Car. II., c. 6, for disposing of certain fee-farm rents belonging to the crown, which some accounts make to have amounted to nearly two millions, others to not more than £100,000; the £400,000 obtained by the sale of Dunkirk; the prize-money acquired in the first Dutch war, amounting to £340,000; and the £300,000 paid by the Dutch on the conclusion of the second. The act of public robbery committed in 1672 by the shutting up of the Exchequer is admitted to have brought a gain to the crown of £1,200,000 at the least. Something was also obtained at the close of the reign from the corporations for the restoration of their charters, forced from them by writs of quo warranto. Finally, there were the infamous pensions and bribes received from the French king, which altogether are supposed to have amounted to not much less than a million sterling. The produce of all these miscellaneous sources is calculated to have exceeded four millions, which, added to the twenty-six millions and a half, or thereabout, derived in the twenty-four years of the reign from the customs, excise, and the other permanent sources of the royal revenue, and to the thirteen millions and a half of parliamentary grants, make a sum total of about forty-four millions, or an average yearly income of above £1,800,000 a-year.

This was probably twice the income that had been enjoyed by Charles I. before the breaking out of the civil war. But the regular expenses of the crown after the Restoration were also considerably greater than they had been in former times. A regular naval and military force was now kept up for the defense of the nation in peace as well as in war, a change made necessary partly by the state of affairs at home, partly by the adoption of the same system by foreign powers. The annual expense of the navy, even in time of peace, was now £300,000, and that of the army and ordnance above £250,000. The garrison of Tangiers cost nearly £60,000 a-year. Large arrears of pay were due to the republican army, which had to be discharged before it was disbanded. Of the parliamentary grants nearly five millions and a half were voted for carrying on the first Dutch war, and above £1,200,000 for the second. The preparations made in anticipation of a rupture with France, in 1678,[1] also cost a considerable sum. The peculiar circumstances in which Charles found himself at his accession also involved him in considerable expenses, independently of those habits of profusion in which he soon came to indulge. The debts of the late king amounted to a considerable sum; and a large expenditure had to be incurred in purchasing jewels for the crown and furniture for the royal palaces. The ordinary expenses of the crown, or what was afterward called the civil list, amounted to between four and five hundred thousand pounds; the principal items, according to an estimate drawn up by the council for the year 1676, being—for the household, £52,247; buildings and repairs, £10,000; privy purse, £36,000; for the queen, £23,000; the treasurer of the chamber, £26,000; the great wardrobe, £16,000; ambassadors, £40,000; the judges, £49,000; secret service-money, £20,000; management of excise and customs, £63,000. The pensions, including the allowances to the Duke of York and the queen-mother, are set down in this account at £87,000; but Charles's liberality to his mistresses and other favorites may be supposed to have considerably outrun this allotted sum. It will be observed that some items were included at this date under the civil list, such as the expenses of managing the excise and customs, which have long ceased to be reckoned up with that branch of the public accounts: the salaries of the judges and ambassadors have only been removed from it within these few years. In addition to the ordinary expenses of the household and the government, this estimate sets down the interest of the king's debts at £100,000; from which it would appear that the entire amount of what we should now call the national debt, the legal rate of interest being six per cent., did not as yet much exceed a million and a half. The greater part of this sum seems to have consisted of the money seized by the crown on the shutting up of the Exchequer in 1672, upon the whole of which interest continued to be paid to the owners till the last year of his reign.

[1] The carelessness and inaccuracy with which the subject of the revenue has been treated by our historical and other writers are strikingly exemplified by the variation and contradiction of their accounts of the first imposition of hearth-money. Jacob, who in his Law Dictionary notices hearth-money under its other name of chimney-money, states that it was first imposed by the 14 Car. II., c. 2 (edit. of 1732). Hume (Hist., vii. 377) states that the tax was only granted during the king's life. Sir John Sinclair, writing a History of the Public Revenue, corrects Hume by informing us that the first act by which hearth-money was granted was the 13 (instead of 13 and 14) Car. II., c. 10 (i. 301, 3d edit.). But the most discreditable errors are those that disfigure the standard edition of the Statutes of the Realm, printed under the care of the Record Commission. In the first place, on turning to the word Hearth-money, in the Index to Vol. V., we find the first act upon the subject there mentioned to be the 15 Car. II., c. 13, although the very title of that act, "For the better ordering and collecting the revenues arising by hearth-money," implies the existence of an earlier hearth-money act. On the margin of this act of the 15 Car. II., in the body of the volume, accordingly, stands a reference to the preceding act under the title of the 13 and 14 Car. II., c. 10. But this edition of the Statutes, nevertheless, contains no act under that title: what in all preceding collections is called the session of the 13 and 14 Car. II. is here changed into the session of the 14 Car. II., without even any intimation of the change, that we can discover. The change appears to be wrong; for the acts in question were passed in the session which commenced on the 10th of January, 1662, which was in the thirteenth year of the king's reign, and lasted, without interruption either by prorogation or adjournment, till the 19th of May, which was in his 14th year, each regnal year in the time of Charles II. commencing on the day of his father's death, the 30th of January. Such blunders or contradictions as these, in a work published by authority, must tend to confuse law as well as history.

Besides the innovation introduced in the mode of appropriating the supplies, of which an account has been given in a preceding page, the financial history of the present period is distinguished by the abolition of the ancient practice of the clergy taxing themselves. Although the convocation was restored with the rest of the old constitution after the Restoration, the clergy were by no means anxious to recover their former privilege of separate taxation, under which, in fact, they had always paid a much higher proportion upon their estates than the laity: they therefore willingly agreed to be included along with the laity in the subsidies and other assessments voted by parliament. The last subsidies granted by the convocation were confirmed by statute 15 Car. II., c. 10; "since which," says Blackstone, "another method of taxation has generally prevailed, which takes in the clergy as well as the laity: in recompense for which the beneficed clergy have from that period been allowed to vote at the electión of knights of the shire; and thenceforward also the practice of giving ecclesiastical subsidies hath fallen into total disuse."[1] This arrangement is said to have been made in 1664 by a private arrangement between Archbishop Shelden and Clarendon.[2]

James II., upon coming to the throne, proceeded with great rashness to imitate Charles I., by continuing to levy, as usual, all the taxes that had constituted the ordinary revenue of the crown in the preceding reign, including those that had been granted only for his brother's life. The parliament, however, confirmed this assumption by passing an act settling on him for life the same revenue which his brother had enjoyed (1 Jac. II., c. 1), which was followed by other acts granting further impositions on tobacco and sugar, and on French linens and wrought silks. According to a statement laid before the House of Commons at the Revolution, the revenue of the crown for the year 1688 exceeded two millions, so considerable was the increase that had taken place in the produce of most of the taxes. The customs now produced £600,000 a-year; the excise, £666,000; the hearth-money, £245,000; the post-office, £65,000; the wine licenses, £10,000: the new duties on wine and vinegar, £173,000; the duties on tobacco and sugar nearly £149,000; and those on French linens and silks nearly £94,000. Among other acts passed by James's only parliament was one (the 1 Jac. II., c. 10) partially restoring the old prerogative of purveyance, by authorizing the seizure or compulsory hire of such carts, carriages, and cattle as his majesty might at any time require in his royal progresses and removals. James's financial administration, however, is admitted to have been careful and economical. His comparatively large revenue was chiefly expended in maintaining a powerful navy and army: he had 30,000 regular troops in his pay in England alone at the moment of his downfall.

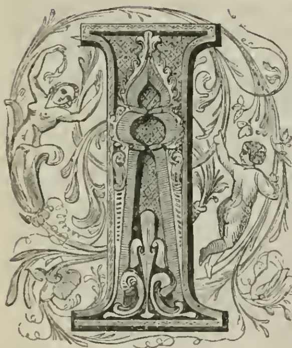
CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF THE NATIONAL INDUSTRY.



IN the interval between the Restoration and the Revolution the increase of our trade appears to have been both more considerable upon the whole, and more steady in its progress, than in any former period of the same length; and the same thing may probably be affirmed of the national industry in all its great branches. The hurricane of the civil war, disastrous as it may have been in its immediate operation, had yet put a new life into the air, the inspiration of which, on the return of a settled condition of things, was felt by our commerce and manufactures, as well as by all other parts of our social system; the very gap that remained to be filled up, in consequence of the partial suspensioo of mercantile and other industrial activity during the war, quickened that activity when the war was over; the government of the Protectorate exerted itself to promote the trading interests of the country; and the impulse thus given continued to carry forward the spirit of enterprise after the Restoration, in a state of greater public security, and circumstances otherwise much more favorable than had existed previous to that event.

The best evidence of the regular growth and general prosperity of English commerce throughout the present period is afforded by the returns of the custom-house duties, an account of which we have for its whole extent.[1] From this account it appears that the produce of this branch of the public revenue from the 24th of July, 1660, to the 29th of September, 1661, was only £421,582, or, for the twelve months, only about £361,356; that the an-

[1] First published in Chalmers's Estimate, p. 49 (edit. of 1804) Mr. Chalmers observes, that "there was an additional duty on wines imposed in 1672, and an impost on wine, tobacco, and linen, in 1685; but, as these duties were kept separate, they appear neither to have swelled nor diminished the usual receipt of the custom-house duties in any of the years, either of peace or of war." We understand the sums given in the account, therefore, to be the produce of the rates which used to be called the Old Subsidy.—See ante, p. 826.

nual average of the next four years, ending with Michaelmas Day, 1665, was about £509,774; of the next five, ending with 1670, about £475,018 (here we may perceive the effect of the great plague and the fire of London, the returns being, for 1666 only £303,766, for 1667 only £408,324, but rising in 1668 to £626,998); of the next five years, ending with 1675, £581,429; of the next five, ending with 1680, £640,231; of the next five, ending with 1685, £722,933; and of the three remaining years, ending with Michaelmas, 1688, and all comprehended within the reign of James, about £815,874, or fully double the receipts for the first year or two after the Restoration. The amount for the year ending 29th September, 1662, was £414,946; that for the year ending Michaelmas, 1687, was £884,955. For the next year, the last of the present period, it was £781,987.[1]

The few notices that have been preserved of our general exports and imports during this period go to confirm the evidence of the progressive extension of the commerce of the country afforded by the foregoing account. We have seen that the entire value of the exports and imports in 1613 was £4,628,586, and in 1622, £4,939,751.[2] It is stated that, in the year ending Michaelmas, 1663, the imports amounted to £4,016,019, the exports to £2,022,812; and that in the year ending Michaelmas, 1669, the imports were £4,196,139, the exports £2,063,274. The value of the exports and imports together, therefore, for the first of these years was £6,038,831, and for the second £6,259,413. Those figures indicate a steady progress of mercantile activity and of national wealth, whether we take the sums of the exports and imports at the four successive dates, as has just been done, or confine our view to the imports alone, as best marking the national power of expenditure or purchase. They were £2,141,283 in 1614; £2,619,315 in 1622; £4,016,019 in 1663; and £4,196,139 in 1669.[3]

The terms in which the great Dutch minister De Witt speaks of the hostility or rivalry to be apprehended from England, in his work entitled "The Interest of Holland," published in 1669, show the estimation of the commercial greatness of this country which was now prevalent on the continent; and the passage is also worth quoting, from the sketch it gives of the rise and progress of our manufactures and trade. "When the compulsive laws of the Netherland Halls," he observes, "had first driven the cloth-weaving from the cities into our villages, and thence into England, and that by the cruelty of the Duke d'Alva, the say-weaving went also after it, the English by degrees began to vend their manufactures throughout Europe; they became potent at sea, and no longer to depend on the Netherlands. Also, by that discovery of the inexpressibly rich cod-bank of Newfoundland, those of Bristol in particular made use of that advantage. Moreover, the long persecution of Puritans in England has occasioned the planting of many English colonies in America, by which they derive a very considerable foreign trade thither. So that this mighty island, united with Ireland under one king, seated in the midst of Europe, having a clear, deep coast, with good havens and bays, in so narrow a sea that all foreign ships that sail either to the eastward or westward are necessitated, even in fair weather, to shun the dangerous French coast, and sail along that of England, and in stormy weather to run in and preserve their lives, ships, and merchandise in its bays—so that England now, by its conjunction with Scotland, being much increased in strength, as well by manufactures as by a great navigation, will in all respects be formidable to all Europe. For, according to the proverb, a master at sea is a master at land; and more especially a king of England, seeing he is able, both by whole fleets and private ships of war, at all times to seize on ships sailing by the coast—the westerly winds, which blow for most part of the year on this side of the tropic, giving the English great opportunities to sail out of their numerous bays and harbors at pleasure to infest our navigation."

Many particulars with regard to the state of the different branches of our foreign commerce about [1] This account, however, it will be observed, seems to differ from that given at p. 826. Chalmers does not state upon what authority, or from what materials, his table is drawn up. He merely describes it as an authentic account.

[2] See ante, p. 522.

[3] The authority for the statement of exports and imports in 1663 and 1669 is the First Part of a Report made to the Commissioners of Public Accounts in 1711, by Dr. Charles Davenant, who then held the office of inspector-general of customs. (See Lord Whitworth's edition of Davenant's works, Lon. 1771, vol. v., p. 376, where, however, there is a misprint, third line from the bottom, of "exports" for "imports," and of "imports" for "exports.") Davenant says that he takes the statement from "a manuscript remaining in the custom-house, which appears to be an authentic copy of what had been offered to the House of Commons," but in what year he can not find. (p. 351). From the manner in which he expresses himself, however, he has left it somewhat doubtful whether the sums he has put down are the value of the total exports and imports of the kingdom, or only of those of the port of London, which he seems to intimate bore the proportion of between three and four to one to those of the rest of the country (p. 352). The statement has been generally assumed to be that of the total exports and imports. It is repeatedly quoted or referred to in the work entitled The British Merchant, a series of papers first published in 1713, with the object, in which it succeeded, of defeating the proposed treaty of commerce with France which was to have followed the peace of Utrecht, and afterward collected in three vols. 8vo., in 1743. The principal author of The British Merchant was Henry Martin, esq., who succeeded Davenant as inspector-general of the customs; but Anderson (Chron. Deduct. of Com., ii. 496), and after him Macpherson (Annals of Com., ii. 534), are mistaken in supposing the account for the year 1668–9 to rest upon his authority; for it is given by Davenant, along with that for 1662–3. The authors of The British Merchant, who are sturdy upholders of what has been called the Mercantile Theory, maintain that the balance against us indicated by these two statements, or the "great national loss," as they term it, was occasioned by our having then a full trade with France; "which full trade," say they, "being afterward prohibited, the general balance in the year 1699 was got to be so far in our favor as £1,147,660 10*s.* 9*d.* (that is to say, such was now the excess of exports over imports): total gained by us from having no trade with France in the year 1699, £3,280,525 8*s.* 9*d.*; which balance in the year 1703 was so considerably increased as to be no less than £2,117,523 3*s.* 10½*d.*: total gained by us from having no trade with France in the year 1703, £4,250,388 1*s.* 10½*d.*: a most interesting consideration." All this declamation, in which the figures of arithmetic are made to play as wild a part as ever did those of rhetoric, is gravely repeated and adopted by Anderson (ii. 496). The statement for the year 1662–3 he had previously characterized, in the same spirit, as "a most melancholy account, truly," "more especially," he adds, "as coming from this able author, who possessed that important office (of inspector of the customs) in the reigns of King William and Queen Anne." (p. 478.) But if he had gone to Davenant's own Report, he would have found wherewithal to console himself. "Here you may please to observe," remarks that writer, after having transcribed the two accounts, "what an appearance there is of an excess against us all the world over those two years, in which no man in his right senses will deny but that we carried on a thriving traffic." (p. 377.)

this time are to be collected from Sir Josiah Child's New Discourses on Trade, written in 1665 (at his country-house, "in the sickness year," as he informs us), and first published in 1668. A second and greatly enlarged edition appeared in 1690. Child was an eminent London merchant, and his views on many subjects were in advance of his age; but there is certainly no soundness in the leading doctrine of the present work, which is, that the principal cause of national wealth is a low rate of interest established by law, the fact being, that the national rate of interest, being merely another name for the price of credit, is always dependent upon the state of the market of credit—that is to say, upon the supply of disposable capital, and the demand for it by borrowers; and that all that the establishment of a legal rate of interest can do is in some degree to impede and disturb the course of the influences which regulate the natural rate, and which, if they were left to themselves, would determine the actual rate. In other words, a low rate of interest, instead of being, as Child imagined, a cause of national wealth—by which he meant the accumulation of capital—might more truly be said to be a consequence of such accumulation; for if the rate of profit, and consequently the demands of borrowers, should continue the same, the rate of interest would be brought down by the mere growth of disposable capital. But, notwithstanding this fundamental mistake of the book on a theoretical point, it may, from the position and opportunities of the author, be safely taken as a trustworthy authority in regard to most of the statements as to matters of fact contained in it. The branches of English commerce which Child speaks of as having been most extended in his time are the trade with Spain and Portugal and with the East Indies. In his preface he asserts that, since the year 1640 our exports of native commodities to the Peninsula had not been more than trebled. He was himself a director of the East India Company, and he strenuously insists upon the great national profits and advantages of the trade with that region in opposition to the outcry raised against it, principally on the ground of its carrying a large balance of specie out of the country—the simple test by which the common prejudice of the time at once decided whether any trade was profitable or the reverse. Child, without having very clear notions on the subject, is much inclined to qualify the vulgar doctrine on the balance of trade generally; but in this particular case his chief argument is, that, although the imports of the company were in great part paid for in money, the same money, or, rather, a larger sum, would otherwise have had to be paid to the Dutch for the same commodities. We should have had to buy from them the saltpetre necessary for the making of gunpowder, as well as our pepper and calicoes, for which they would have made us pay as dear as they did for nutmegs, cinnamon, cloves, and mace, of which they then had the monopoly; or, if we did not use calicoes, we should have been obliged to resort to foreign linens. The company, he states, then employed from thirty-five to forty sail of the most warlike mercantile ships of the kingdom, with from sixty to a hundred men in each; and, besides supplying the country with saltpetre, pepper, indigo, calicoes, and several useful drugs, to the value of between £150,000 and £180,000 yearly, for home consumption, procured us calicoes, printed stuffs, and other merchandise for our trades to Turkey, France, Spain, Italy, and Guinea; most of which trades, according to this author, could not then be carried on with any considerable advantage but for those supplies; "and those goods exported," he adds, "do produce in foreign parts, to be returned to England, six times the treasure in specie which the company exports from England to India." In other branches of trade he represents the Dutch as going far a-head of us. A great trade was carried on by them to China and Japan, in which the English had no share. In the Russia trade, he says, the Dutch, the year before he wrote, had twenty-two great ships employed, and the English but one. In the Greenland whale-fishery the Dutch and Hamburghers had annually four or five hundred sail employed, while the English had only one ship the preceding year, and the year before that not one. The white-herring fishery upon our own coasts was almost wholly in the hands of the Dutch; and so was the export of salt from Portugal and France. To the Baltic, or Eastland countries, the English had not now half so much trade as formerly, while the Dutch had ten times more than they used to have. The Norway trade, again, was in great part in the hands of the Danes, Holsteiners, &c.; our exportations to France had greatly fallen off; and the English ships employed in the Newfoundland fishery had decreased from two hundred and fifty, which was their number in 1605, to eighty, when Child wrote. In many of these instances, however, the country had probably only disengaged itself from an old trade, that it might enter into and carry on some other, which it found more to its advantage. Child admits that the general commerce of the country was never before either so extensive or so profitable. The Turkey, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese trades, by means partly of our Indian commodities, partly of our native wool, were more active and prosperous than at any former period. The trade with our American plantations was a new branch of commerce, of great and rapidly growing importance, which was wholly in our own hands. Accordingly, in proof of the general fact of the vast increase of the wealth of the country within the preceding twenty years, Child adduces the following particulars:—"First," he says, "we give generally now one third more money with apprentices than we did twenty years before. Secondly, notwithstanding the decay of some, and the loss of other trades, yet, in the gross, we ship off now one third more of our manufactures, and of our tin and lead, than we did twenty years ago. Thirdly, new-built houses in London yield twice the rent which they did before the conflagration in the year 1666; and houses immediately before that fire generally yielded one fourth more rent than they did twenty years ago. Fourthly, the speedy and costly rebuilding, after that great fire in London, is a convincing, and to a stranger an amazing, argument of the plenty and late increase of money in England. Fifthly, we have now more than double the number of merchants and shipping that we had twenty years ago. Sixthly, the course of our trade, from the increase of our money, is strangely altered within these twenty years; most payments from merchants and shopkeepers being now made with ready money, whereas formerly the course of our general trade ran at three, six, nine, and eighteen months' time." He admits that people complained, notwithstanding, very greatly of the scarcity of money; but "this humor of complaining," he replies, with much truth, "proceeds from the frailty of our natures, it being natural for men to complain of the present and to commend the times past." "And I can say, with truth," he adds, "upon my own memory, that men did complain as much of the scarcity of money ever since I knew the world as they do now; nay, the very same persons who now complain of this, and commend that time." Plenty or scarcity of money, indeed, has no necessary connection with a prosperous condition of commerce, or the reverse, any more than plenty or scarcity of leather or of hats. In so far as the fact is general, it is merely a consequence of the existing condition of the market of money, which is affected by the same causes that produce fluctuations in all other markets, and also by some peculiar to itself, arising out of the financial institutions and arrangements of different countries. With regard, again, to the scarcity of money felt by individuals, that is a complaint likely, for obvious reasons, to be just as rife in a time of active and profitable commercial speculation, when every man able to procure the command of capital can turn it to good account, as in a stagnant or decaying state of trade, when capital can be employed with comparatively little advantage.

Some further information in proof of the continued increase of the trade and wealth of the kingdom is supplied to us, at a date a few years later, by another eminent authority, Sir William Petty, in his Political Arithmetic, first published in 1676. This writer's statements and conclusions with regard to the progress of the national prosperity for the preceding forty years strikingly coincide with and confirm those of Sir Josiah Child. He observes that in these forty years the taxes and other public pecuniary levies in the three kingdoms had been much greater than they ever were before, and yet they had undeniably all three gradually increased in wealth and strength within that space. The number of houses in London was double what it was forty years before; and there had also been a great increase of houses at Newcastle, Yarmouth, Norwich, Exeter, Portsmouth, and Cowes; as also in Ireland, in the towns of Dublin, Kinsale, Coleraine, and Londonderry. Then, with respect to shipping, the royal navy was now double or quadruple what it had been forty years ago; and the coal-shipping of Newcastle now amounted to about 80,000 tuns, or probably four times what it then was, seeing that London did not then contain more than half the inhabitants it now did, while the use of coals was also doubled—"they being heretofore," says Sir William, "seldom used in chambers, as they now are, nor were there so many bricks burned with them as of late, nor did the country on both sides the Thames make use of them as now. Above 40,000 tun of shipping," he continues, "are now employed in the Guinea and American trade, which trade in those days was inconsiderable. The quantity of wines imported was not then near so great as now. And, in short, the customs did not then yield one third of their present value. The number and splendor of coaches, equipages, and household furniture have much increased since that period. The postage of letters is increased from one to twenty; and his majesty's revenue is now trebled." The exact amounts specified in some of these necessarily, in part, conjectural estimates may not be entitled to absolute confidence; but there can be no question that the general bearing of the facts is correctly given.

But the most comprehensive view of the progress of the commerce and wealth of England during the present period is that given by Dr. Davenant, in one of his Discourses on Trade.[1] Davenant, we may premise, has not the clearest notions on some of the fundamental points of political economy; but he has sense to perceive the absurdity of the principles advanced by some writers of his time, whose assertions, indeed, might well have startled the dullest understanding. Mr. Pollexfen, in a publication to which he particulary addresses himself, had actually maintained gold and silver to be "the only things that deserve the name of treasure, or the riches of a nation;" and to this Davenant answers, very well, "that, in truth, money is at bottom no more than the counters with which men, in their dealings, have been accustomed to reckon;" adding, "When a country begins to thrive by trade, it must not be imagined that the increase and profit is presently converted into coin or bullion; and a great ready cash is not the only sign of a thriving people, but their growing wealthy is to be discerned by other symptoms." Just before, however, his partial entanglement in the prejudices of his age has led him to admit that the precious metals, though not the spring and original, are yet the measure, of trade in all nations; which, except in a very qualified sense indeed, and in reference to mere convenience of calculation, they really no more are than any other species of merchandise. Pollexfen also contended that there had been a regular annual decrease of the wealth and trade of the country ever since the year 1666—a position taken up about this time by various popular writers, among others by the author of a famous discourse entitled "Britannia Languens," published in 1680, who, by not only confining his view to one side of the question, but by looking at that through the medium of a false theory, contrived to make out to his own satisfaction, and doubtless also to that of many of his readers, that the country had been advancing toward ruin at a round pace for many years. The main argument of this writer is, simply, that there had been less money coined from 1657 to 1675 than in any former period of the same length from the beginning of the century—a fact which, if it could have been ever so conclusively established, had no more to do with the subject of debate than a similar calculation of the comparative quantities of rain that had fallen in the several periods fixed upon would have had. This test, as applied by the author of Britannia Languens, would have proved a rapid decline of national prosperity indeed; for, whereas, according to his showing, the value of gold and silver coined from 1600 to 1619 had been nearly £4,800,000, and from 1619 to 1638 £6,900,000 and from 1638 to 1657 above £7,700,000, the amount from 1657 to 1675 had only been about £2,239,000; and even of that, he observes, about a million had been partly harp-and-cross money, partly old money recoined. So that by this measure, the trade of these last eighteen years must have fallen to a fourth or a fifth of what it had been before! This was a "languishing" state of things truly. Davenant first shows, by the increase in the value of landed property, from twelve years' purchase in ancient times, to fourteen, sixteen, and, in the best counties, eighteen and twenty years' purchase about 1666, and by the great increase in the produce of the taxes in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., and in the time of the Commonwealth, that the country must have been growing rich from the beginning of the century up to that year. So much, perhaps, would not be disputed by his opponents. But he contends, on the same or similar grounds, that the same progress continued to go on, and, in an augmented ratio, after 1666. Since that year, he affirms, the price of land in the best counties had risen from twenty to twenty-six and twenty-seven years' purchase, and elsewhere from fourteen years' purchase to seventeen or eighteen. "From that year," he adds, "there were apparently more improvements made in land than had been known in fifty years before, by inclosing, manuring, taking in of waste ground, and meliorating what was poor or barren; and yet great improvements had been made in the crown-lands during the civil war." He calculates, from the best observations he has been able to make, "by comparing the ancient subsidies with the present aids and taxes on land," that the general rental of England for land, houses, mines, &c., before the country became considerable by trade—that is to say, about the year 1600—did not exceed six millions per annum; whereas, in 1688, he takes the rental of the kingdom to have been about fourteen millions. So that, in 1600, the whole land of England, at twelve years' purchase, was only worth £72,000,000; and in 1688, at eighteen years' purchase, was worth £252,000,000, or three and a half times as much as before. As for the mercantile shipping of the kingdom, old and experienced merchants all agreed that its tunnage in 1688 was nearly double what it had been in 1666; and it appeared, by authentic accounts, that the royal navy, which in May, 1666, amounted only to 62,594 tuns, was now grown to 101,032 tuns in December, 1688. We pass over a long calculation and argument about the amount of gold and silver coined at different periods, as tending very little to elucidate the matter in hand. The statement then proceeds:—"As to plate, it may be safely affirmed that there was more wrought for use in families from 1666 to 1688 than had been fabricated in two hundred years before. . . . As to the common people, there is no country in the world where the inferior rank of men were better clothed and fed, and more at their ease, than in this kingdom, nor, consequently, where they propagate faster. As to buildings, during that time not only many stately edifices, both public and private, have been erected, but farm-houses have been kept up; and besides, from the books of hearth-money, and for other reasons, it appears that, of smaller tenements, from 1666 to 1688, there have been about 70,000 new foundations laid, of which the country has not wanted its proportion." In 1666 the customs, according to Davenant, were farmed for no more than £390,000; but from Michaelmas, 1671, to Michaelmas, 1688, they had yielded to the crown an average annual return of £555,750. This statement, it will be observed, does not agree with the account given in a preceding page on the authority of Chalmers; but the fact of the increase in the produce of the customs is equally attested by both. "Upon a general view and inspection into the kingdom's state," Davenant calculates that the value of the whole stock of England, by which he explains himself as meaning "the coined silver, coined gold, bullion, wrought plate, rings, &c.; jewels, furniture, apparel, &c.; stock for trade, consumption, &c.; and the live stock in cattle, &c."—that is, apparently, every thing in the kingdom besides what the lawyers call real property—was in 1600 about £17,000,000; that in thirty years it nearly doubled, and in 1630 was about £28,000,000; that in the next thirty years it fully doubled, and in 1660 was about £56,000,000; and that from 1660 to 1688 it above half doubled, and was, in the last-mentioned year, about £88,000,000. Of this calculation he maintains that "every article may be made out and justified by as plain demonstration as any thing of this nature is capable of." The stock of the kingdom, he thinks, would have fully doubled itself in the last period as well as in those of the same length that preceded, had it not been that "a stop was put to our career by the great plague of 1665; by the fire of London, which consumed a great part of the present stock; by our wars abroad; and by our growing luxuries, which drew to other uses what formerly was left wholly to run in the channel of trade." "However," he adds, "when the kingdom had recovered these losses and shocks, which we have reason to think it had perfectly done about 1680 (trade augmenting all the while, and becoming more extensive), its wealth grew faster toward the latter end of this last era of thirty years than before: so that there is more than probable room to conjecture that about 1688 it came to reach the annual increase of two millions." There is much, of course, that is merely theoretical, and far enough from conclusive, in these speculations; but they are curious at least, if not perfectly convincing, and may be admitted to have a general, though not an exact and absolute truth.

Of the measures affecting commerce that were passed by the legislature in the present period, the most important was the statute of the 12 Car. II., c. 18, entitled An Act for the Encouraging and Increasing of Shipping and Navigation, and popularly known by the name of the Navigation Act. This famous statute was in the main merely a re-enactment of a statute passed by the Rump Parliament in October, 1651;[1] the principle of which was, as explained in the former Book, to confine absolutely to English ships the carriage of all goods imported into any part of the dominions of England from Asia, Africa, or America; and to English ships, or ships of the particular country from which the goods were imported, the carriage of all goods brought into England from any other country of Europe. In the new act, the latter and most important provision was so far modified as to be confined to goods imported from Russia and Turkey, and to certain goods only from other European countries. But this was in reality a very slight mitigation of the restriction; for the articles in question comprised all the most important English imports, such as timber, salt, pitch, tar, hemp, raisins, figs, oils, grain, wines, spirits, &c.; so that it was scarcely possible that a full cargo of goods could be made up for England in any country of Europe without some of the articles which could thus only be imported in English or native bottoms.[1] On the other hand, the restrictions of the act of 1651, as to importation into England, were now made equally applicable to the exportation of goods from England to other European countries.[2] A Navigation Act similar to the English one was passed by the parliament of Scotland the following year; and the English statute was altered, and in some respects made still more rigid or more comprehensive, by subsequent acts, of which it is not necessary to give any particular account. We may merely mention that, by a clause in an act for regulating the cus-

[1] See Scobell, ii. 176.

[1] Some modern accounts of the Navigation Act state that the goods thus forbidden to be brought from any part of Europe except in English ships, or ships of the country, were those that came to be known in commerce by the name of enumerated articles. But this is a mistake: what were formerly called enumerated goods, an expression used in many subsequent acts of parliament, were certain articles, the produce of the English plantations, with regard to which it was provided by the act (sec. 18) that they should not be conveyed to any part of the world whatsoever without first being shipped to England, and brought on shore there.

[2] This important extension of the first Navigation Act has not usually been noticed. But it is common to speak of a provision in the act of the 12 Car. II. making it necessary that, in addition to the ship being English property, the master and at least three fourths of the sailors should be Englishmen, as a new regulation and a very material improvement upon the old law (see Blackstone, Com., i. 419); the fact being, that the act of 1651 demands very nearly the same thing—it requires that the majority of the crew shall be English.

toms, passed in 1662 (13 and 14 Car. II., c. 11, s. 23), it was enacted that no sort of wines other than Rhenish, no sort of spicery, grocery, tobacco, potashes, pitch, tar, salt, rosin, deal-boards, fir, timber, or olive oil, should be imported from the Netherlands or Germany, "upon any pretense whatsoever, in any sort of ships or vessels whatsoever, upon penalty of the loss of all the said goods, as also of the ships and furniture."

The navigation laws are admitted to have been framed in a spirit of violent animosity against the Dutch, and to have had for one of their principal objects the depression of the mercantile superiority of that people, then in possession of the greater part of the carrying trade of the world. The Dutch were, in fact, deprived by these acts of so much of their carrying trade as consisted in importing goods to England and in exporting to other countries English home and colonial produce and manufactures: and the greater part of what they thus lost the English ship-owner gained. The English consumer—in other words, the English public—was, in a pecuniary sense at least, a gainer of nothing, but a considerable loser: the monopoly of the ship-owner was, of course, a tax upon the rest of the community. This tax, however, it has been said, was paid for the essential object of the national defense—for the creation and maintenance of a naval strength which the country would not otherwise have possessed. The exact operation of indirect methods of procedure, such as the policy of the navigation laws is here assumed to be, will always afford matter for difference of opinion, and hardly admits of being satisfactorily determined; but it is certain that, however much commendation these laws have received in later times, the greatest doubts were entertained as to any public benefit being attributable to them by some of the ablest observers who had an opportunity of witnessing the effects they produced when they first came to change the natural course in which the commerce of the country was previously proceeding. Roger Coke, in his "Treatise on Trade," published in 1671, maintains that, by lessening the resort of strangers to our ports, they had had a most injurious effect on our commerce: he states that, within two years after the passing of the first partial Navigation Act in 1650 (the progenitor of that of the following year), we had lost through their operation the greater part of our Baltic and Greenland trades. Sir Josiah Child, although decidedly approving of the principle of the Navigation Act, corroborates Coke in so far by admitting, in his "Treatise on Trade," published in 1698, that the English shipping employed in the Eastland and Baltic trades had decreased two thirds since the passing of the act, and that the foreign shipping employed in these trades had increased in a like proportion.[1] It is plain, indeed, that this law, by raising their freights in the home trade, of which it gave them a monopoly, must have disabled English ship-owners from competing with foreigners in every other trade of which they have not a like exclusive command.

[1] See these and other authorities collected by Mr. M'Culloch, Dict. of Com., p. 819.

The most remarkable outbreak in the course of this period of the old commercial jealousy which, in contradiction to the first principle of commerce, used, in its fits of fury, to be continually striving to exclude from the kingdom the productions of foreign countries, in the notion of thereby putting down their commercial rivalry, was the entire prohibition of trade with France in 1678. On this occasion, indeed, national hatred and religious excitement lent their aid to strengthen and envenom the feelings arising from rivalry in trade, for it was the time of the popular ferment about the designs of France, out of which sprung immediately afterward the wild delusion of the popish plot;[1] but the chief motive of the prohibition, nevertheless, was undoubtedly the prevalent notion that the country was suffering an annual pecuniary loss to a vast amount by the balance of trade, as it was called, being turned against us in consequence of our large importation of French commodities. The act of parliament (the 29 and 30 Car. II., c. 1, § 20) declares that it had been by long experience found that the importing of French wines, brandy, linen, silk, salt, paper, and other commodities of the growth, product, or manufacture of the territories and dominions of the French king had much exhausted the treasure of this nation, lessened the value of the native commodities and manufactures thereof, and caused great detriment to the kingdom in general. It therefore proceeded to enact that, for three years from the 20th of March, 1677 (1678), and to the end of the next session of parliament, no French wine, vinegar, brandy, linen, cloth, silks, salt, grapes, or other product or manufacture of the dominions of the king of France should be imported in any sort of vessel whatsoever into any part of England, and that the importation or vending of any such French goods should be adjudged "to be a common nuisance to this kingdom in general, and to all his majesty's subjects thereof." The adherents of the balance of trade theory at the time, and long afterward, all looked upon this prohibition as a most wise and salutary act of national policy, and were in the habit of referring with much triumph to its effects in proof of the correctness of their views. Indeed they had long been clamoring for something of the king before the measure was adopted by the legislature.

The House of Commons, which met in the latter part of the year 1675, had, upon an examination of the trade between England and France, come to a resolution that the former country was annually a loser in the said trade to the amount of a million sterling, and had thereupon ordered a bill to be brought in to put a stop to it, as was actually done two years after. The following are the terms in which Anderson, writing nearly a century after 1678, speaks of the act then passed against commerce with France: "The immense importation into England of French wares of various kinds gave just umbrage to all wise people, as occasioning a vast annual loss in point of the general balance of England's trade; some say, to at least one million sterling, others to considerably more; because, while we were wantonly and without measure importing and using the produce and manufactures of France, the wiser French ministry were from time to time lying heavier duties upon the English manufactures and produce. . . . . Hereby the English foreign trade in general languished, rents fell, and all ranks began sensibly to feel its bad effects. Yet they at first imputed this misfortune to a wrong cause, which made the merchants and traders petition the parliament against the East India and Levant companies. In conclusion, they discovered the true cause; whereupon they made such earnest application to the parliament as influenced the House of Commons to come to a vote, that the trade with France was detrimental to the kingdom. . . . . It was, indeed, more than time for England to interpose and save the almost expiring liberties of Europe, while at the same time she put some stop to an inundation of French wines, brandies, silks, linen, paper, salt, and an innumerable variety of frippery, millinery, and haberdashery wares. toys, &c.; which prohibition, and that of the wear of East India manufactures, brought the general balance greatly in our favor in the course of twenty years. The authors of this time say that, until after this prohibition, the annual exports of England, on an average, did not exceed three millions sterling; but that, in about twenty years after, the exports had gradually increased to near seven millions yearly, which vast increase was principally occasioned by the great increase and exportation of our own woolen, silk, linen, iron, and other manufactures, since the prohibition of commerce with France; and partly also to the prohibition, some years after enacted, of the wear in England of East India manufactures; and likewise in part to the enlarged demand from our own American colonies of all sorts of manufactures and necessaries."[1] As Charles II. never again assembled a parliament after the 20th of March, 1681, the act prohibiting the importation of French merchandise remained in force till it was repealed in the beginning of the next reign by the act 1 Jac. II., c. 5. "Whereupon," says Anderson, "ensued an inundation of French commodities, to the value of above four millions sterling, within the compass of less than three years' time, whereby all the evils formerly complained of were renewed, so that the nation would have been soon beggared, had it not been for the happy Revolution in the year 1688, when all commerce with France was effectually barred."[2] The proof of a nation being on the road to beggary, which is derived from its purchasing every year between one and two millions' worth of commodities from another country, is not particularly convincing. But, as usual in cases of this kind, even the facts as to this matter appear to have been grossly misstated. Davenant, in his First Report to the Commissioners of Public Accounts, sensibly observes—"It has never been popular to lay down that England was not a great loser by the French trade; but, in inquiries of this kind, truth should be more hunted after than popularity, and I shall endeavor to set this matter in as true a light as the nature of it will admit of, and which lies so obscure for want of knowing right of matter of fact. As to the importations and exportations of commodities between the respective kingdoms, so far is beyond contradiction, that all the while England flourished and grew rich by an extended traffic (which was by Queen Elizabeth's reign down to the year 1640), the two countries did not load one another with prohibitions of, or high duties upon, each other's product or manufactures, which that country would certainly have done that had found itself any considerable loser by their mutual dealings, which must have been seen and felt in so long a tract of time; so that during this space it is rather to be presumed both kingdoms reciprocally found their account by the commerce that was between them. During the afore-mentioned period the strength and power of France was not become formidable, and the prodigious growth of the House of Austria was what employed all our fears; but, as you know, about the year 1660, the face of affairs in Europe changed. the Spanish monarchy was declined, and France became the rising empire. And it rose so fast as to beget just apprehensions to England for our future safety. In the mean while, several good patriots, perceiving the court then fatally running into French interests and measures, and finding it would be difficult to engage the people (newly come out of a civil war) to follow and join with them in more national councils by speculations merely political concerning the progress of the French arms and power, they thought the best course to awaken Englishmen was to alarm them about the danger they were in to lose their trade, and for this reason nothing was so common as to cry that England was undone by the prodigious overbalance the French had upon us." To prove this, divers estimates were drawn up and laid before the king, the committees of council. and the House of Commons. With regard to these estimates, Davenant remarks, in the first place, that whatever may have been the case as to the trade with France, it is evident, beyond all dispute, that. from the Restoration to the Revolution, our trade with the whole world must have been a most gainful one, even in the sense of those who will admit nothing but an overbalance of gold and silver to be a gain in commerce, seeing that, in that space of time, there was actually coined at the Mint, as appears from the Mint-rolls, above six millions of gold and above four millions of silver. "If England," he proceeds, "had suffered such a drain as the loss of a million per annum by its dealings with one single country, there could not have been such an immense coinage in those years, nor could the bullion we received from Spain, returned as the overbalance of the trade we had with the Spaniards, have answered and made good such a constant issue: from whence follows, that this balance against us of a million yearly, which has been asserted in several books, and in memorials laid down before the king and council, and both Houses of Parliament, must have been chimerical, for by-ends advanced by some, and ignorantly followed by others." He then states various facts which go to show at least that considerable exaggeration had been used in making up the accounts which appeared to prove so great an overbalance of imports from France; and, on the whole, he comes to the conclusion, that if the goods sent from England to France, and those brought from France to England, had been fairly valued, there would be found to have been no considerable difference between the money amount of the one and of the other. But, after all, he goes on to remark, the question remains, "how far the excess between the exports and imports may be deemed a certain rule, whereby to judge whether a country gets or loses by its trade?" And upon this point he adduces some startling facts. Both in 1663 and 1669, as we have already seen, the imports very greatly exceeded the exports on our trade with the whole world: yet in both those years it was not to be disputed by any man in his senses that we carried on a thriving traffic on the whole. On the other hand, in five more recent years, for which he presents from the custom-house books an abstract of the exports and imports between England and all foreign countries, it appears that the exports regularly exceeded the imports in a very high degree; "and I believe," he says, "it has been the same from 1688, to the time the books of my office began: however, it can hardly be affirmed, and the merchants upon the Exchange will scarce agree, that during this time England has carried on a profitable trade; at least there appears no overbalance returned to us in bullion, to set the Mint at work; contrariwise, our specie of gold and silver, since that time, is by degrees visibly diminished." In fine, from these and various other considerations, Davenant is led to have strong doubts whether the popular notion of England having been a loser in her trade with France from the Restoration to the Revolution, or to the passing of the prohibitory act in 1678, be not a mere popular delusion. "Great Britain at that time," he observes, "had no marks upon it of a nation declining in wealth and commerce: the interest of money was low, the species of gold and silver abounded; the middle ranks of men had a large proportion of plate among them; after a general conflagration the city was rebuilt in a few years, magnificent public edifices were erected, the farm-houses everywhere were in good repair." He adds, that the tunnage of mercantile shipping infinitely exceeded what it was when he wrote, in 1711, and that even at the low duties then in force, the customs for the year ending Michaelmas, 1678, produced no less than £828,200.[1] All this he justly considers to have been the fruits and the evidence, not of a decaying, but of a prosperous and extending trade.

[1] Chron. of Com., ii. 548.

The reduction of the legal rate of interest to six per cent., which had been made by the Rump Parliament in 1651,[1] was confirmed, after the Restoration, by the act 12 Car. II., c. 13, entitled An Act for restraining the taking of excessive Usury. "The abatement of interest from ten in the hundred in former times," the preamble declares, "hath been found, by notable experience, beneficial to the advancement of trade and improvement of lands by good husbandry, with many other considerable advantages to this nation, especially the reducing of it to a nearer proportion with foreign states with whom we traffic; and in fresh memory the like fall from eight to six in the hundred by a late constant practice hath found the like success, to the general contentment of this nation, as is visible by several improvements." In Scotland, the reduction was not made till 1672. To the reduction of interest to six per cent., Sir Josiah Child, in his "Brief Observations concerning Trade and Interest of Money," first published in 1688, ascribes the most important effects in the augmentation of the national wealth; and, although his notion upon this point is a mere fallacy, some of the facts which he mentions, and with regard to which his authority is unquestionable, however much he may be mistaken as to the cause to which he would trace them, are curious. When he wrote, he asserts there were more men to be found upon the Exchange of London worth ten thousand pounds than were worth one thousand when the reduction was first made by the Rump Parliament. He adds, that five hundred pounds with a daughter, sixty years before, was esteemed a larger portion than two thousand pounds now; that gentlewomen in former times esteemed themselves well clothed in a serge gown, which a chambermaid would now be ashamed to be seen in; and that besides the great increase of rich clothes, plate, jewels, and household furniture, there were a hundred coaches now kept for one that was kept formerly.

Of the great chartered associations which in earlier times used to monopolize the commerce to different foreign regions, the East India Company is the only one which demands any particular notice in the present period. While the others, as trade outgrew the need of such shelter and propping, were gradually losing their exclusive privileges, and sinking toward decrepitude and insignificance, it was fast surmounting the impediments of various kinds, both abroad and at home, that had hitherto entangled its progress, and becoming every day more prosperous and more firmly established. Although the charter the company had obtained from Cromwell in 1657[2] was not yet expired, it was thought advisable, in the change that all things had undergone, to get a new one from the restored king; and they were accordingly reincorporated by Charles, on the 3d of April, 1661, with a full confirmation of all their ancient privileges, and the important additional rights:—1. Of erecting so many forts as they pleased in India and St. Helena, and appointing judges to try both civil and criminal causes; 2. Of making peace and war with any people, not Christians, within the limits of their trade: 3. Of seizing all English subjects found without their license in India or in the Indian seas, and sending them home to England. In 1669, the island of Bombay, which Charles had received from Portugal as part of the dower of Queen Catherine, was made over by him to the company, to be held by them "in free and common soccage, as of the manor of East Greenwich, at an annual rent of ten pounds." The trade of the company now became so lucrative, that in 1676 they were enabled to double their capital out of their accumulated profits, on which the market price of their stock immediately rose to 245 per cent. A view of the state of the commerce with India about this time is very fully given in a publication which appeared in 1677, entitled "The East India Trade a most profitable Trade to this Kingdom," and which is supposed to have been written by Sir Josiah Child. The company, this writer states, then employed from thirty to thirty-five ships, running from 300 to 600 tuns burden, and carrying, or capable of carrying, from forty to sixty or seventy guns each. Their annual exports amounted to about £430,000; namely, £320,000 in bullion, and the remainder in cloth and other goods. Their imports in calico, pepper, saltpetre, indigo, silk (raw and wrought), drugs, &c., had in the year 1674-5 produced £860,000, and often yielded a much larger sum. Besides this, the private trade allowed by the company to owners of ships, commanders, and seamen, as well as to their own factors, for diamonds, pearls, musk, ambergris, &c., occasioned an annual export of from £80,000 to £100,000 in bullion, and about £40,000 or £50,000 in goods, and brought returns to the amount of £250,000 or £300,000. Of the £110,000 worth of goods exported by the company, £40,000 or £50,000 worth consisted of foreign commodities, the rest of home produce and manufactures, such as drapery, tin, and lead. Of the imports, there might be consumed in England, pepper to the value of £6,000; saltpetre to that of £30,000; silks (raw and manufactured) to that of £30,000; calicoes to that of £160,000; and indigo and other drugs to that of from £10,000 to £15,000. "All the rest of the returns above mentioned," the statement proceeds, "amounting to £630,000 value, are transported to foreign markets, as is also most part of the private trade. The pepper I reckon at 8*d.* per pound weight, so necessary a spice for all people, which formerly cost us 3*s.* 4*d.* per pound, being nowhere to be had but in India; and, were we obliged to have it from the Dutch, they would probably raise it as high as they do their other spices; yet, supposing it so low as 1*s.* 4*d.* per pound, it would be a further annual expense of £6000 to the nation. Saltpetre is of that absolute necessity, that without it we should be like the Israelites under the bondage of the Philistines—without the means of defending ourselves. Possibly, even if we had no Indian trade, we might, in time of peace, purchase it, though it would cost us double what it now does. But, in case of war, where could we have sufficient? Not, surely, from our enemies. Or, would our gentlemen, citizens, and farmers, be willing to have their cellars and rooms dug up, as in King Charles I.'s reign, and be deprived of freedom in their own houses, exposed and laid open to saltpetre-men? Which method would be, besides, by no means equal to the affording us the necessary supplies. Raw silk we might possibly be supplied with from other parts, though not so cheap as from India. And India-wrought silks serve us instead of so much Italian or French silks, which would cost us almost treble the price of Indian silks, to the kingdom's loss of above £20,000 yearly. Calicoes serve instead of the like quantity of French, Dutch, and Flemish linen, which would cost us thrice as much; hereby £200,000 or £300,000 is yearly saved to the nation. And if the linen manufacture were settled in Ireland, so as to supply England, our calicoes might be transported to foreign markets." At this time the linen manufactured at home probably did not supply a thousandth part of the consumption. Female dresses had been wont to be principally made of French cambrics, French and Silesia lawns, and other flaxen fabrics of Flanders and Germany; but these fabrics were now beginning to be pretty generally supplanted by the muslins of India. Plain calicoes were also now brought in considerable quantities from India to be printed in England, in imitation of the Indian printed chintzes, the bringing home of which was at last prohibited altogether, for the better encouragement of the English printing business.

It was during the present period that tea was first brought to England. Known from the remotest antiquity in China and Japan, tea is mentioned under the name of sah as the common beverage of the Chinese, by the Arabian merchant Soliman, who wrote an account of his travels in the East in the year 850. The earliest European writers, however, by whom it is mentioned, are some of the Jesuit missionaries who visited China and Japan a little before the middle of the sixteenth century, and who describe it in their letters under the names of cha, cia, tchia, and thee. It appears to have been first imported, at least in any quantity, by the Dutch East India Company soon after the beginning of the seventeenth century; and by them the small demand of Europe during the greater part of that century was principally supplied. Tea is not enumerated, any more than coffee or chocolate, in the table of rates appended to the tunnage and poundage or customs' dues act passed by the Convention Parliament in 1660 (12 Car. II., c. 4); but it is mentioned in the act passed in the same year imposing an excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors (12 Car. II., c. 23); two of the rates or duties there enacted being, "For every gallon of coffee made and sold, to be paid by the maker, 4*d.*;" and "For every gallon of chocolate, sherbet, and tea, made and sold, to be paid by the maker thereof, 8*d.*" And the tax upon tea continued to be an excise duty, that is to say, to be levied not upon the imported commodity, but upon the liquor made and sold, till the Revolution.

At this time the beverage was only just beginning to be known in England. Pepys, in his Diary, under date of September 25th, 1661, records, "I sent for a cup of tea (a Chinese drink), of which I had never drank before." The poet Waller has lines on the birthday of Queen Catherine, which he entitles, "Of Tea, commended by her Majesty;" and from which it should seem that her example had brought the new drink into fashionable use, if, indeed, the poet is not to be understood as (by a courtly compliment not strictly true) attributing to her majesty, who came over here in 1662, the introduction of it for the first time into the country:—

> "The best of queens and best of herbs we owe
> To that bold nation, which the way did show
> To the fair region where the sun does rise,
> Whose rich productions we so justly prize.
> The muse's friend, Tea, does our fancy aid;
> Repress those vapors which the head invade;
> And keeps that palace of the soul serene,
> Fit on her birthday to salute the queen."

For some time after this, however, the quantity of tea brought to Europe continued to be very small. In 1664 the East India Company could only procure two pounds and two ounces, which cost them forty shillings a-pound, when they wanted to make a present of some rarities to the king; and in 1666 they had to pay fifty shillings a-pound for twenty-two pounds and three quarters, which they in like manner presented to his majesty. Their own first importation was in 1669, when they received two canisters containing 143½ pounds from Bantam, which they did not sell, but partly gave away in presents, partly used in the House for the refreshment of the committees. After this, however, they gradually increased their importations, though still making the purchases generally at second-hand in Madras and Surat, having only once gone for the article to the port of Amoy, in China, till, in the year 1678, they brought home 4713 pounds—a quantity so large that it glutted the market, so that in the six following years their importations in all amounted only to 410 pounds. It was not, therefore, till after the Revolution that the consumption of tea began to be at all general in this country.[1]

St. Helena, the possession of which had been confirmed to the company by their last charter, was taken by the Dutch in 1665, but was regained in 1672, and the following year regranted by the crown to the company forever. On the 5th of October, 1677, they also obtained a new charter from Charles II., empowering them, among other privileges, to coin money at Bombay and their other possessions in India. In 1680 the first notice occurs of a ship sent by the company to China. In 1683 they lost their factory at Bantam in the island of Java, one of their oldest and best establishments, in consequence of having taken the unsuccessful side in a quarrel between the king and his son, the latter of whom was assisted by the Dutch, who, on their victory, obtained possession of the factory, which, with the exception of a few years during the last war, they have continued to hold ever since. On this the English established a new factory, which they fortified at a great expense, at Bencoolen, near the southern extremity of Sumatra—by this means preserving the pepper trade, which would otherwise have all fallen into the hands of the Dutch. On the 3d of August, 1683, Charles II. granted the company another charter, conferring upon them some new powers, in particular the right of exercising martial law in their garrisons in India, and of establishing courts for the trial of crimes committed on these as within the limits of their trade. They afterward obtained another charter, still further enlarging their privileges, from James II., on the 12th of April, 1686. In India, in the mean while, they had become involved in a quarrel with the Nabob of Bengal, within whose government they had had a flourishing factory at Hooghly, a town on the west branch of the Ganges, and the chief port of the province; the result of which was, after some fighting, that they removed, in 1687, from Hooghly to Sootanutty, a place twenty-three miles lower down, and situated on the east bank of the river. From this village sprung the magnificent modern capital of Calcutta.

There remains to be shortly noticed a comparatively new branch of commerce, which was already rising into importance—that carried on with the settlements in North America, commonly in those days called the Plantation Trade. Davenant tells us that, according to "an account from such as have formerly perused the custom-house books with great care," the average annual value of exports from England to America, in provisions of all kinds, apparel, and household furniture, in the six years, from 1682 to 1688, was about £350,000; while that of the imports, consisting of tobacco, sugar, ginger, cotton wool, fustic wood, indigo, cocoa, fish, pipe-staves, masts, furs, &c., together with fish from Newfoundland, was not less than £950,000. Of the imports he calculates that about the value of £350,000 might be retained for home consumption; so that there would remain about £600,000 worth to be exported.[1]

It was the new direction given to trade on the one hand by the East India Company, on the other by the interchange of commodities thus carried on between the mother-country and her Transatlantic colonies, to which is chiefly to be ascribed the eager agitation that now began of many of the principles of what has, in more recent times, been termed the science of Political Economy. It is hardly correct to state that the birth of this science in England is to be dated from the present period; for it had, in fact, been a subject of occasional speculation for at least a century before, in proof of which we need only refer to the very remarkable tract entitled "A Compendious or Brief Examination of certain ordinary Complaints of divers of our Countrymen in these our Days, by W. S." (said to mean William Stafford), which was published in 1581, and which discusses, with a great deal of acuteness, some of the most difficult questions connected with the subject of the origin and distribution of wealth.[1] But the subject of foreign trade at least had never before been so systematically examined as it now came to be by a crowd of writers in the disputes that arose between various rival commercial interests. We have already had occasion to exhibit some specimens of the reasonings and general views of several of these early speculators, divided as they already were into a number of hostile schools and factions. The prevalent or more popular theories were what have been called the mercantile and manufacturing systems, which, although distinct, were so far from being opposed, that a belief in the one led naturally to the adoption of the other. The manufacturing system, however, was held by some who were not among the adherents of the mercantile system; and, of the two, it certainly was by far the least unreasonable. The mercantile system assumed, as we have already had occasion to explain, that nothing was really wealth except gold and silver; and that consequently the sole test of the profitableness of any branch of trade was whether, on the whole, it brought more money into the country than it took out of it.[2] The fundamental principle of the manufacturing system was, that a trade was profitable to the public whenever, by means of any restrictions or exclusive privileges, it could be made gainful to the capitalists by whom it was carried on, and their equally protected allies, the raisers and manufacturers of the merchandise, the export of which it encouraged. The interest of the purchasers and consumers of the commodities brought home by the trade, that is, of the great body of the community, this theory entirely overlooked, or at any rate treated as a matter of very secondary importance. If the restrictions under which the trade was carried on could be shown to be advantageous for those actually engaged in it, that was enough—it was assumed that they must be beneficial for the public generally. There was, at any rate, nothing in all this repugnant to, or irreconcilable with, the above-mentioned principle of the mercantile system; on the contrary, the doctrine that nothing was a gain in common except a balance in money, or an excess of exports over imports, agreed very well with the further notion that such balance and excess were to be best secured, not by leaving commerce free to flow in its natural channels, but by forcing it in particular directions through all sorts of embankments and artificial conduits.

The most noted among the theoretical writers on the subject of trade in this age, in England, were Mr. Thomas Mun, Sir Josiah Child, and Sir William Petty. The immediate object of most of the publications both of Mun and Child was the defense of the East India Company, both against the assailants of its exclusive privileges and against other parties who denounced the Indian trade altogether as bringing a heavy annual loss upon the nation. It is curious to remark the gradual dawning upon men's minds of just views as to this matter with the advance of discussion and experience. Before the controversy about the trade with India, the almost universally received belief had been that the exportation of gold and silver ought, as far as possible, to be prevented altogether. This was what our old laws had constantly attempted to do: and, in fact, it was not till the year 1663 that, by a clause in an act for the encouragement of trade (15 Car. II., c. 7, s. 9), it was made lawful to export foreign coin or bullion—"forasmuch as several considerable and advantageous trades can not be conveniently driven and carried on without the species of money or bullion, and that it is found by experience that they are carried in greatest abundance (as to a common market) to such places as give free liberty for exporting the same, and the better to keep in and increase the current coins of this kingdom." Here we find apparently a partial recognition of the principle, which was properly the distinguishing principle of the mercantile system, that a trade, though occasioning the export of bullion, might still be profitable, if its imports, by being reëxported, brought back to the kingdom more bullion than had in the first instance been carried out. It was upon this consideration that Mun first, and afterward Child, endeavored to establish the profitableness of the trade with India: they did not, and could not, deny that it was only to be carried on by a regular annual exportation of treasure to a considerable amount; but they contended that, although, looked at by itself, it thus showed an unfavorable balance, or, in other words, might be called a losing trade, yet it became, in the end, greatly the reverse by the much greater amount of treasure which it enabled us every year to draw back from other European countries, which we supplied, after satisfying our own consumption, with eastern commodities. As an answer to the particular objection which it professed to meet, this reasoning was sufficiently conclusive; and the mercantile system, in so far as it opposed the old prejudice against the exportation of gold and silver in any circumstances, was undoubtedly in the right, and was a step in advance. It was even in advance of the law of 1663, which only permitted the exportation of foreign bullion; for the argument urged by Mun and Child implied no limitation of that kind. Mun published his Defense of the East India Trade in 1621; his Treasure by Foreign Trade, his principal work, did not appear till 1664, some years after the author's death, but had probably been written about 1635 or 1640.[1] Child's New Discourse of Trade, the principal object of which was to urge the reduction of the legal rate of interest, was first published, as already stated, in 1668, and republished in 1690; the anonymous pamphlet attributed to him in defense of the East India Company appeared, as we have also mentioned above, in 1677. These works of Mun and Child, mistaken as the writers are in some of their leading principles, contain many incidental arguments and remarks of great value, and which must have materially helped to advance the science of which they treat, notwithstanding their fundamental errors. The principal work of Sir William Petty, besides his Political Arithmetic, which treats chiefly of the subject of population, is his "Quantulumcunque," a treatise on money, published in 1682, in which there are also many sound observations, though even he had not altogether emancipated himself, any more than his predecessors and cotemporaries, from the false notion that there was something about gold and silver distinguishing them as articles of commerce from all other commodities. The first promulgation of perfectly sound views upon this subject was reserved for a date a few years beyond the close of the present period.

A pretty full account of this tract (which at one time used to be attributed to Shakspeare, and was, indeed, reprinted with his name in 1751) may be found in the Penny Magazine for 1836, pp. 130, 148, 164, and 190. We may add, here, that according to a notice in Reed's Catalogue of Law Books, 1809, p. 36, it is said, in the "Memoirs of William Lambarde, in Append. in Bibl. Brit. Top.," to have been really written by Sir Thomas Smythe or John Yates, in the reign of Henry VIII. or Edward VI.

[2] "Even jewels, tin, lead, or iron, though durable, do not deserve to be esteemed treasure," says one of these writers, Mr. Pollexfen, in a publication entitled "England and East India Inconsistent in their Manufactures," quoted by Davenant, Works. i. 382.

In 1655, Cromwell had appointed his son Richard, and many other lords of his council, judges, and gentlemen, together with about twenty merchants of London, York, Newcastle, Yarmouth, Dover, and other towns, "to meet and consider by what means the traffic and navigation of the republic might be best promoted and regulated." and to make a report to him on the subject.[1] But the first permanent Board of Trade appears to have been that established, on the recommendation of Ashley, by Charles II., in 1668, under the name of the Council of Commerce, consisting of a president, vice-president, and nine other members, with regular salaries. The Earl of Sandwich was appointed the first president; and after his death, in the sea-fight of 1672, Ashley himself, now Earl of Shaftesbury and lord chancellor, was nominated as his successor in a new commission, in which the reasons of establishing the council were stated to be the considerable enlargement that had of late years taken place in his majesty's dominions, "by the occasion of many great colonies and plantations in America and elsewhere," and the increase that the customs and royal revenues had received, as well as the trade and general wealth of the kingdom, by the mutual commerce and traffic between England and the said colonies and plantations. This Council of Commerce, however, remained in existence only a few years, Charles probably finding the expense inconvenient.

According to the account laid before the House of Commons, in 1791, as made up at the Navy Office, the tunnage of the royal navy was, at the Restoration, 57,463 tuns; in 1685, at the end of the reign of Charles II., 103,558; and at the revolution, in 1688, 101,892. Notwithstanding the attention, therefore, which James II. is said to have paid to maritime affairs, and the liberal expenditure on this branch of the public service for which it is customary to give him credit, the royal navy would appear to have been diminished rather than augmented in the course of his short reign.

Among the acts of the Convention Parliament, in 1660, was one (the 12 Car. II., c. 35) giving a new establishment to the post-office, or, rather, continuing the regulations which had been established by the Commonwealth ordinance in 1656. The lowest rate fixed by this act was twopence, which was the charge for a single letter between places not more than eighty miles distant from each other. There is nothing said about franking in the act, although a resolution brought up by a committee of the House of Commons on the 28th of March, 1735, and agreed to by the House, affirms that the privilege of franking by the members of that House "began with the erecting a post-office within this kingdom by act of parliament." In 1663, the post-office revenue, along with the produce of the wine licenses, was settled by another act (15 Car. II., c. 14) on the Duke of York and his heirs male; at which time it appears, from a clause in the act, that the office of postmaster-general was farmed at a yearly rent of £21,500. On the accession of James II. the revenue of the post-office was estimated at £65,000 per annum. As connected with this matter it may be here mentioned that the first toll-gates or turnpikes erected in England are supposed to have been established in 1663, by the act 15 Car. II., c. 1, entitled An Act for Repairing the Highways within the Counties of Hertford, Cambridge, and Huntingdon. They were ordered to be erected at Wadesmill in Hertfordshire, at Caxton in Cambridgeshire, and at Stilton in Huntingdonshire. The preamble of the act recites that "the ancient highway and post-road leading from London to York, and so into Scotland, and likewise from London into Lincolnshire, lieth for many miles in the counties of Hertford, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, in many of which places the road, by reason of the great and many loads which are weekly drawn in wagons through the said places, as well by reason of the great trade of barley and malt that cometh to Ware, and so is conveyed by water to the city of London, as other carriages, both from the north parts, as also from the city of Norwich, St. Edmondsbury, and the town of Cambridge, to London, is very ruinous. and become almost impassable, insomuch that it is become very dangerous to all his majesty's liege people that pass that way."

The growth of London during the present period, notwithstanding the ravages of the great plague and fire, still proceeded at an accelerating rate. We shall briefly note down, in their chronological order, a few of the facts which more distinctly indicate this continued extension of the English metropolis. An act passed in 1662 (the 13 and 14 Car. II., c. 2), for repairing the highways in London and Westminster, supplies us with various particulars as to its state at that time. The preamble of the act recites that "the common highways leading unto and from the cities of London and Westminster and the suburbs thereof, and other places within the present weekly bills of mortality, by reason of the multitude of houses lately built, and through the stopping and filling up the ditches and sewers, and neglect of timely reparations, are at present, and for some years past have been, so miry and foul as is not only very noisome, dangerous, and inconvenient to the inhabitants thereabout, but to all the king's liege people riding and traveling to and from the said cities." The following "common highways and new-built streets" are particularly ordered to be immediately repaired, new-paved, or otherwise amended, namely, "the street or way from the end of Petty France to St. James's House, and one other street from St. James's House up to the Highway (the present St. James's-street), and one other street in St. James's Fields, commonly called the Pall Mall, and also one other street beginning from the Mews up to Piccadilly (the present Haymarket), and from thence toward the Stone Bridge to the furthermost building near the Bull, at the corner of Air-street." The number of hackney-coaches now allowed to be licensed, it appears from another clause of the act, was four hundred, or one hundred more than in 1654.[1] Another clause, on the ground that "great quantities of seacoal ashes, dust, dirt, and other filth, of late times have been and daily are thrown into the streets, lanes, and alleys" of the capital, directs the inhabitants to sweep the streets before their respective houses twice a-week, under a penalty of 3*s*. 4*d*. for every instance of neglect. Every person whose house fronted the street was also ordered to "hang out candles or lights in lanterns or otherwise in some part of his house next the street" every night, between Michaelmas and Lady-day, from dark until nine o'clock in the evening, under the penalty of 1*s*. So that at this time the streets of London were not lighted at all during the summer months, and not after nine o'clock even in winter. Finally, a list is given of streets which the lord mayor and city authorities are authorized to receive subscriptions for repairing, as being "so narrow that they are incommodious to coaches, carts, and passengers, and prejudicial to commerce and trading:" these were, "the street or passage at or near the Stocks in London, the street and passage from Fleet Conduit to St. Paul's Church in London, the passage through the White Hart Inn from the Strand into Covent Garden, the street and passage by and near Exeter House and the Savoy (being obstructed by a rail and the unevenness of the ground thereabout), the passage and street of St. Martin's-lane out of the Strand, the passage or street of Field-lane, commonly called Jack-an-apes-lane, going between Chancery-lane and Lincoln's Inn Fields, the passage and gatehouse of Cheapside into St. Paul's Church-yard, the passage against St. Dunstan's Church in the west (being obstructed by a wall), the street and passage by and near the west end of the Poultry in London, and the passage at Temple Bar." After the great fire, in 1666, various additional streets in the part of the city that had to be rebuilt were ordered to be widened by two other acts (the 18 and 19 Car. II., c. 8, s. 21, 22; and the 22 Car. II., c. 11, s. 1). This terrible visitation, and the pestilence by which it was preceded, instead of half destroying and depopulating the metropolis, only gave a new impulse to its increase both in size and in number of inhabitants. After a few years the portion of it that had been laid waste rose again from its ruins greatly improved in many respects—with the old, narrow, and crooked streets for the most part straightened and made comparatively spacious and airy, and with the substitution everywhere of houses of brick, separated by substantial party-walls, for the former tenements of wood that offered one continued dry forest to whatever chance spark might at any time fall among them. New buildings also continued to spread faster than ever beyond the ancient limits. In 1674 an order in council was issued to restrain such extension—for the last time, it is believed, that that exercise of the prerogative was attempted. The increase of the west end continued to proceed at so great a rate that, in the first year of the next reign (1685), acts of parliament were passed erecting two new parishes in that quarter: the one, that of St. Anne's, Westminster, consisting principally of streets that had recently been erected on a piece of ground formerly called Kemp's Field; the other, that of St. James's, Westminster, comprehending Jermyn-street and other neighboring streets, lately erected on what used to be called St. James's Fields.[1] Both these districts had been till now included in the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. Sir William Petty, we may observe, in his Political Arithmetic, published in 1687, estimates the population of London at 696,000. He founds his calculation on the number of burials within the bills of mortality, the annual average of which he makes to be 23,212; and on the assumption that one person in every thirty died in the course of the year. Ten years later, Gregory King, calculating from the number of houses as ascertained from the hearth-money returns, made the population of London to amount only to about 530,000.[2] This estimate is probably as much too low as that of Petty may be too high.

The money of the Commonwealth was all called in after the Restoration, and a new gold and silver coinage immediately struck, similar to that of the preceding reign. In this first coinage of Charles II. the pieces were formed by the ancient method of hammering; the minters who had been employed in coining Cromwell's milled money having, it is supposed, withdrawn or concealed themselves, in apprehension of punishment, and probably also carried their machinery away with them. Milled money, however, was again coined in 1662, and of a sort superior to any that had as yet been produced, having graining or letters upon the rim, an improvement which had not appeared upon the milled money either of Queen Elizabeth or of Charles I. The new gold coin called the guinea was first struck in 1662, without graining on the rim, and with graining in 1664. It was so called as being made of gold brought from Guinea by the African Company, who, as an encouragement to them to bring over gold to be coined, were permitted by their charter to have their stamp of an elephant impressed upon whatever pieces should be struck from the metal they imported. On all the English money of Charles II., coined after 1662, his head is made to look to the left, being the opposite direction to that in which his father's head is placed; and ever since it has been observed as a rule to make two successive sovereigns look in opposite ways on their respective coinages. Private halfpence and farthings of copper and brass, such as were formerly common,[1] had again come into use in the time of the Commonwealth; and they continued to circulate after the Restoration till they were supplanted by an issue of the same descriptions of money from the Royal Mint in 1672—a previous coinage of the year 1665 having been called in after only a very small portion of it had got into circulation. In 1684, the last year of his reign, Charles coined farthings of tin, with only a bit of copper in the middle. The figure, still retained, of Britannia sitting on a globe, holding in her right hand an olive-branch, and in her left a spear and shield, first appears on the copper coinage of this reign—having been modeled, it is said, after the celebrated court beauty, Miss Stewart, afterward Duchess of Richmond.

[1] See ante, p. 539.

The money of James II. is of the same kind with that of his brother. His only farthings and halfpence, like those struck by Charles in the last year of his reign, are of tin, with a bit of copper in the center. After his abdication he coined money in Ireland out of old brass guns and kitchen utensils, and attempted to make it current as sterling silver. Afterward even the brass failed, and he was obliged to fabricate crowns, halfcrowns, shillings, and sixpences out of pewter.

The most important circumstances that occurred during the present period which materially affected the progress of the useful arts was the revocation of the edict of Nantes, by Louis XIV., in 1685,[1] which compelled many thousands of French artisans to seek refuge in England. A numerous body of these emigrants settled in Spitalfields as silk-weavers; and their superior taste, skill, and ingenuity were displayed in the richness and variety of the silks, brocades, satins, and lutestrings which the looms of England soon afterward produced. Fine paper for writing, which had been formerly imported, chiefly from France, was manufactured in England about the close of the period; and for the introduction of this improvement in the art of paper-making we were probably indebted to the refugees. The manufacture of glass was also greatly improved by foreign artisans whom the Duke of Buckingham brought from Venice about 1670.

[1] See ante, p. 763.

With a view to extend the woolen-cloth manufacture—the great staple of the country—the exportation of wool and all materials used in scouring wool continued to be prohibited during the whole of the period. A singular law was passed in 1666 (the 18 Car. II., c. 4) for the encouragement of the woolen manufacture, by which it was directed that no person should be buried in any sort of grave-dress not entirely composed of wool, under a penalty of five pounds, to be paid to the poor of the parish; and this having been found inadequate, another was passed in 1678 (the 30 Car. II., c. 3), which required persons in holy orders to take an affidavit in every case from a relative of the deceased, at the time of the interment, showing that the statute had been observed. In 1666 a person from the Netherlands came over with several of his countrymen, and set up an establishment for dyeing and dressing white woolen cloths, in which we had been surpassed by foreigners. About the same time, or perhaps a few years afterward, an improved weaving-machine, called the Dutch loom, was brought into England from Holland.[1]

[1] The following extract, from a work published in 1677, will perhaps be interesting to those who have a technical knowledge of the woolen manufacture:—"Every 2 lbs. of wool, which is worth about 20*d.*, will make a yard of kersey worth about 5*s.* or 6*s.*; and every 4 lbs. of wool, worth about 3*s.* 4*d.*, will make a yard of broadcloth worth about 11*s.* or 12*s.*"—Ancient Trades Decayed.

Guernsey and Jersey, with the other Channel Islands, were partially exempted from an act passed in 1660, prohibiting the exportation of wool from England, being allowed to receive under license 3300 tods of uncombed wool, the weight of each tod not to exceed thirty-two pounds. The manufacture of stockings and hosiery, for which these islands have since been celebrated, soon became very flourishing; and it is said that those engaged in this branch of industry in other parts of England, particularly in Somersetshire, complained of the privileges their competitors enjoyed in being allowed to import wool in the raw state.

In 1666 an act was passed for encouraging the manufacture and making of linen cloth and tapestry, and extraordinary encouragement was offered to those who set up the trade of hemp-dressing, or any others connected with the manufacture of linen. Foreigners, after being engaged in these trades for the space of three years, were to be considered as natural-born subjects on taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy.[1] In 1669 certain French Protestants settled at Ipswich, and manufactured fine linens, which were sold as high as 15*s.* an ell. During the present period the manufacture of linens, introduced by the Scotch into the north of Ireland, was gradually rising into importance.

The printing of calicoes was commenced in London in 1676, in imitation of the fabrics of India, which were now in very general use. A writer of the day remarks that, "instead of green say, that was wont to be used for children's frocks, is now used painted and Indian and striped calico, and instead of a perpetuano or a shallon to line men's coats with, is used sometimes a glazed calico, which, in the whole, is not 12*d.* cheaper and abundantly worse."[2]

London continued to be almost the only place in which the silk manufacture was carried on, though a writer in 1678 observes that there was to be found "here and there a silk-weaver (of late years) in small cities and market-towns." In reply to a petition of the weavers, complaining of the importation of silk goods from India, the East India Company put forth a statement, in 1681, showing that since they had begun importing raw silk the manufacture in England had increased three fourths. By an act passed in 1662, silk-throwsters were required to serve an apprenticeship of seven years to their trade.[1] About 1680 it is noticed that there had been "engines of late invented that do weave only narrow ribands;" but these were of such inferior quality that none but hawkers and pedlers would have any thing to do with them.

By an act passed in 1662 the importation of foreign bone-lace, cut-work, embroidery, fringe, band-strings, buttons, and needle-work was prohibited, on the ground that many persons obtained a living in England by making these articles, in which they used a large quantity of silk.[2]

In the metallic manufactures we have to notice the introduction of the art of tinning plate-iron from Germany, by Andrew Yarranton, an ingenious man who was sent over by a company to learn the process. He brought some German workmen back with him, and the manufacture was proceeding very successfully, when, as it is stated, a person enjoying favor at court having made himself acquainted with Yarranton's process, obtained a patent, and the first undertakers were obliged to abandon their enterprise. The first wire-mill in England is said to have been erected during this period by a Dutchman, at Sheen (Richmond), in Surrey. A yellow metal resembling gold was also made for the first time. The inventor being under the patronage of Prince Rupert (Duke of Cumberland), the name given to this material was "prince's metal," by which name it is still known.

A floating-machine, worked by horses, for towing large ships against wind and tide, and a diving-machine, were among the mechanical inventions which obtained Prince Rupert's patronage. The latter was soon turned to profitable account, Sir William Phipps employing it in bringing up treasure from a Spanish ship which had been lost in the West Indies.

Since the cities and incorporated towns had been gradually losing their exclusive privileges, the number of persons living by trade and industry had greatly increased. During the present period complaints are made of "petty shopkeepers living in country villages;" and it is stated by one writer that "now, in every country village where is, it may be, not above ten houses, there is a shopkeeper, and one that never served an apprenticeship to a shopkeeping trade whatsoever." They are described as "not dealers in pins only," but as carrying on a good trade. The "ruin" of cities and market-towns was predicted from this cause.

CHAPTER V.

THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND THE FINE ARTS.

HE age of the Civil War and of the Commonwealth does not present an absolute blank in the history of our highest literature; but, unless we accept the Areopagitica of Milton, the Liberty of Prophesying, and a few other controversial or theological treatises of Jeremy Taylor, and the successive apocalypses of the imperturbable dreamer of Norwich,[1] no work of genius of the first class appeared in England in the twenty years from the meeting of the Long Parliament to the Restoration, and the literary productions having any enduring life in them at all that are to be assigned to that space make but a very scanty sprinkling. It was a time when men wrote and thought as they acted, merely for the passing moment. The unprinted plays of Beaumont and Fletcher, indeed, were now sent to the press, as well as other dramatic works written in the last age, the theaters, by which they used to be published in another way, being shut up—a significant intimation, rather than any thing else, that the great age of the drama was at an end. A new play continued to drop occasionally from the commonplace pen of Shirley—almost the solitary successor of the Shakspeares, the Fletchers, the Jon-sons, the Massingers, the Fords, and the rest of that bright throng. All other poetry, as well as dramatic poetry, was nearly silent—hushed partly by the din of arms and of theological and political strife, more by the frown of triumphant Puritanism, boasting to itself that it had put down all the other fine arts as well as poetry, never again to lift their heads in England. It is observable that even the confusion of the contest that lasted till after the king's death did not so completely banish the muses, or drown their voice, as did the grim tranquillity under the sway of the parliament that followed. The time of the war, besides the treatises just alluded to of Milton, Taylor, and Browne, produced the Cooper's Hill and some other poetical pieces by Denham, and the republication of the Comus and other early poems of Milton; the collection of the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher, and Cowley's volume, entitled "The Mistress," appeared in 1647, in the short interval of doubtful quiet between the first and the second war; the volume of Herrick's poetry was published the next year, while the second war was still raging, or immediately after its close; Lovelace's first volume in 1649, probably before the execution of the king. Hobbes's Leviathan and one or two other treatises of his, all written some time before, were printed in London in 1650 and 1651, while the author was resident in Paris. For some years from this date the blank is nearly absolute. Then, when the more liberal despotism of Cromwell had displaced the Presbyterian moroseness of the parliament, we have Fuller's Church History, printed in 1655; Harrington's Oceana, and the collection of Cowley's poetry, in 1656; Browne's Hydriotaphia and Garden of Cyrus, in 1658; Lovelace's second volume, and Hales's Remains, in 1659; together with two or three philosophical publications by Hobbes, and a few short pieces in verse by Waller, of which the most famous is his Panegyric on Oliver Cromwell, written after the Protector's death, an occasion which also afforded its first considerable theme to the ripening genius of Dryden. It is to be noted, moreover, that, with one illustrious exception, none of the writers that have been named belonged to the prevailing faction: if Waller and Dryden took that side in their verses for a moment, it must be admitted that they both amply made up for their brief conformity; Denham, Browne, Taylor, Herrick, Lovelace, Fuller, Hales, Hobbes, Cowley, were all consistent, most of them ardent, royalists; Harrington was a theoretical republican, but even he was a royalist by personal attachments; Milton, alone, was in life and heart a Commonwealth-man and a Cromwellian.

From the appearance of his minor poems, in 1645, Milton had published no poetry, with the exception of a sonnet to Henry Lawes, the musician, prefixed to a collection of Psalm tunes by that composer in 1648, till he gave to the world his Paradise Lost, in Ten Books, in 1667. In 1671 appeared his Paradise Regained and Samson Agonistes; in 1673, a new edition of his minor poems, with nine new sonnets and other additions; and in 1674, what is properly the second edition of the Paradise Lost, now divided into Twelve Books. He died on Sunday, the 8th of November, in that year, when within about a month of completing the sixty-sixth year of his age. His prose writings have been already noticed in the preceding Book.[1] Verse, however, was the form in which his genius had earliest expressed itself, and also that in which he had first come forth as an author. Passing over his paraphrases of one or two Psalms done at a still earlier age, we have abundant promise of the future great poet in his lines "On the Death of a Fair Infant," beginning,

> O fairest flower, no sooner blown but blasted, written in his seventeenth year; and still more in the "College Exercise," written in his nineteenth year. A portion of this latter is almost as prophetic as it is beautiful; and, as the verses have not been much noticed,[2] we will here give a few of them:—

> Hail, native Language, that by sinews weak
> Did'st move my first endeavoring tongue to speak,
> And mad'st imperfect words with childish trips,
> Half-unpronounced, slide through my infant lips:
> * * * * * *
> I have some naked thoughts that rove about,
> And loudly knock to have their passage out;
> And, weary of their place, do only stay
> Till thou hast deck'd them in their best array.
> * * * * *
> Yet I had rather, if I were to choose,
> Thy service in some graver subject use,
> Such as may make thee search thy coffers round,
> Before thou clothe my fancy in fit sound;
> Such where the deep transported mind may soar
> Above the wheeling poles, and at heaven's door
> Look in, and see each blissful deity
> How he before the thunderous throne doth lie,
> Listening to what unshorn Apollo sings
> To the touch of golden wires, while Hebe brings > Immortal nectar to her kingly sire:
> Then passing through the spheres of watchful fire,
> And misty regions of wide air next under,
> And hills of snow, and lofts of piled thunder,
> May tell at length how green-eyed Neptune raves,
> In heaven's defiance mustering all his waves;
> Then sing of secret things that came to pass
> When beldam Nature in her cradle was;
> And last of kings, and queens, and heroes old.
> Such as the wise Demodocus once told
> In solemn songs at King Alcinous' feast,
> While sad Ulysses' soul and all the rest
> Are held with his melodious harmony
> In willing chains and sweet captivity.

This was written in 1627. Fourteen years later, after his return from Italy, where some of his juvenile Latin compositions, and some others in the same language, which, as he tells us, he "had shifted in scarcity of books and conveniences to patch up among them, were received with written encomiums, which the Italian is not forward to bestow on men of this side the Alps;" and when, assenting in so far to these commendations, and not less to an inward prompting which now grew daily upon him, he had ventured to indulge the hope that, by labor and study—"which I take," he nobly says, "to be my portion in this life"—joined with the strong propensity of nature, he "might perhaps leave something so written in after-times as they should not willingly let it die"—he continued still inclined to fix all the industry and art he could unite to the adorning of his native tongue—or, as he goes on to say, "to be an interpreter and relater of the best and sagest things among mine own citizens, throughout this island, in the mother-dialect; that what the greatest and choicest wits of Athens, Rome, or modern Italy, and those Hebrews of old, did for their country, I, in my proportion, with this, over and above, of being a Christian, might do for mine; not caring to be once named abroad, though perhaps I could attain to that, but content with these British islands as my world;" and he again, more distinctly than before, though still only in general expressions, announced the great design, "of highest hope and hardest attempting," which he proposed to himself one day to accomplish—whether in the epic form, as exemplified by Homer, Virgil, and Tasso, or after the dramatic, "wherein Sophocles and Euripides reign," or in the style of "those magnific odes and hymns" of Pindarus and Callimachus—not forgetting that of all these kinds of writing the highest models are to be found in the Holy Scriptures: in the Book of Job, in the Song of Solomon, and the Apocalypse of St. John, in the frequent songs interspersed throughout the Law and the Prophets. "The thing which I had to say," concluded this remarkable announcement, "and those intentions which have lived within me ever since I could conceive myself any thing worth to my country, I return to crave excuse that urgent reason hath plucked from me by an abortive and foredated discovery. And the accomplishment of them lies not but in a power above man's to promise; but that none hath by more studious ways endeavored, and with more unwearied spirit that none shall, that I dare almost aver of myself, as far as life and free leisure will extend; and that the land had once enfranchised herself from this impertinent yoke of prelaty, under whose inquisitorious and tyrannical duncery no free and splendid wit can flourish. Neither do I think it shame to covenant with any knowing reader, that for some few years yet I may go on trust with him toward the payment of what I am now indebted; as being a work not to be raised from the heat of youth or the vapors of wine, like that which flows at waste from the pen of some vulgar amorist, or the trencher fury of a rhyming parasite; nor to be obtained by the invocation of dame Memory and her Siren daughters; but by devout prayer to that eternal Spirit, who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out his seraphim, with the hallowed fire of his altar, to touch and purify the lips of whom he pleases. To this must be added industrious and select reading, steady observation, insight into all seemly and generous arts and affairs. Till which in some measure be accomplished, at mine own peril and cost I refuse not to sustain this expectation from as many as are not loth to hazard as much credulity upon the best pledges that I can give them."[1]

Before this, Milton had published of his poetry only his Comus and Lycidas—the former in 1637, the latter with some other Cambridge verses on the same occasion, the loss at sea of his friend Edward King, in 1638; but, besides some of his sonnets and other minor pieces, he had also written the fragment entitled Arcades and the two companion poems, the L'Allegro and the Il Penseroso. These productions already attested the worthy successor of the greatest writer of English verse in the preceding age—recalling the fancy and the melody of the minor poems of Spenser and Shakspeare, and of the Faithful Shepherdess of Fletcher. The Comus, indeed, might be considered as an avowed imitation of the last-mentioned production. The resemblance in poetical character between the two sylvan dramas of Fletcher and Milton is very close, and they may be said to stand apart from all else in our literature—for Ben Jonson's Sad Shepherd is not for a moment to be compared with either; and, in the Midsummer Night's Dream, Shakspeare, ever creative, passionate, and dramatic beyond all other writers, has soared so high above both, whether we look to the supernatural part of his fable or to its scenes of human interest, that we are little reminded of his peopled woodlands, his fairies, his lovers, or his glorious "rude mechanicals," either by the Faithful Shepherdess or the Comus. Of these two compositions, Milton's must be admitted to have the higher moral inspiration, and it is also the more elaborate and exact as a piece of writing; but in all that goes to make up dramatic effect, in the involvement and conduct of the story, and in the eloquence of natural feeling, Fletcher's is decidedly superior. It has been remarked that even in Shakspeare's early narrative poems—his Venus and Adonis, and his Tarquin and Lucrece—we may discern the future great dramatist by the full and unwithholding abandonment with which he there projects himself into whatever character he brings forward, and the power of vivid conception with which he realizes the visionary scene, and brings it around him almost in the distinctness of broad daylight, as shown by a peculiar directness and life of expression evidently coming everywhere unsought, and escaping from his pen, one might almost say without his own consciousness, without apparently any feeling, at least, of either art exercised or feat achieved.[1] In the case of Milton, on the contrary, his first published poem and earliest poetical attempt of any considerable extent, although in the dramatic form, affords abundant evidence that his genius was not dramatic. Comus is an exquisitely beautiful poem, but nearly destitute of every thing we more especially look for in a drama—of passion, of character, of story, of action or movement of any kind. It flows on in a continued stream of eloquence, fancy, and most melodious versification; but there is no dialogue, properly so called, no replication of divers emotions or natures; it is Milton alone who sings or declaims all the while—sometimes, of course, on one side of the argument, sometimes on the other, and not, it may be, without changing his attitude and the tone of his voice, but still speaking only from one head, from one heart, from one ever-present and ever-dominant constitution of being. And from this imprisonment within himself Milton never escapes, either in his dramatic or in his other poetry; it is the characteristic which distinguishes him not only from our great dramatists, but also from other great epic and narrative poets. His poetry has been sometimes described as to an unusual degree wanting in the expression of his own personal feelings; and, notwithstanding some remarkable instances of exception, not only in his minor pieces, but in his great epic, the remark is true in a certain sense. He is no habitual brooder over his own emotions, no self-dissector, no systematic resorter for inspiration to the accidents of his own personal history. His subject in some degree forbade this; his proud and lofty nature still more withheld him from it. But, although disdaining thus to picture himself at full length, either for our pity or admiration, he has yet impressed the stamp of his own individuality—of his own character, moral as well as intellectual—as deep on all he has written as if his theme had been ever so directly himself. Compare him in this respect with Homer. We scarcely conceive of the old Greek poet as having a sentient existence at all, any more than we do of the sea or the breezes of heaven, whose music his continuous, undulating verse, ever various, ever the same, resembles. Who in the delineation of the wrath of Achilles finds a trace of the temper or character of the delineator? Who, in Milton's Satan, does not recognize much of Milton himself? But, although the spirit of his poetry is thus essentially egotistic, the range of his poetic power is not thereby confined within narrow limits. He had not the "myriad-minded" nature of Shakspeare—the all-penetrating sympathy by which the greatest of dramatists could transform himself for the time into any one of the other existences around him, no matter how high, no matter how low: conceive the haughty genius of Milton employed in the task of developing such a character as Justice Shallow, or Bottom the weaver, or a score of others to be found in the brilliant throng, every man of them of nature's producing, headed by Falstaff and ending with Dogberry! Nothing of this kind he could have performed any better than the most humbly-gifted of the sons of men; he had no more the wit or humor requisite for it than he had the power of intense and universal sympathy. But his proper region was still a vast one; and there, his vision, though always tinged with the color of his own passions and opinions, was, notwithstanding, both as far-reaching and as searching as any poet's ever was. In its style or form, his poetry may be considered to belong rudimentally to the same Italian school with that of the greatest of his predecessors—of Chaucer, of Spenser, and of Shakspeare. But, as of each of these others, so it is true of him, that the inspiration of his Italian models is most perceptible in his earlier and minor verses, and that in his more mature and higher efforts he enriched this original basis of his poetic manner with so much of a different character, partly derived from other foreign sources, partly peculiar to himself, that the mode of conception and expression which he ultimately thus worked out is most correctly described by calling it his own. Conversant as he was with the language and literature of Italy, his poetry probably acquired what it has of Italian in its character principally through the medium of the elder poets of his own country; and it is, accordingly, still more English than Italian. Much of its inner spirit, and something also of its outward fashion, is of Hebrew derivation; we should say that from the fountain of no other literature did Milton drink with so much eagerness as from this, and by no other was his genius so much nourished and strengthened. Not a little, also, one so accomplished in the lore of classic antiquity must needs have acquired from that source; the tones of the poetry of Greece and Rome are heard more or less audibly everywhere in that of the great epic poet of England. But in what he has actually achieved the modern writer rises high "above all Greek, above all Roman fame." Nothing in the poetry of the ancient world approaches the richness and beauty, still less the sublimity, of the most triumphant passages in Paradise Lost. The First Book of that poem is probably the most splendid and perfect of human compositions—the one, that is to say, which unites these two qualities in the highest degree; and the Fourth is as unsurpassed for grace and luxuriance as that is for magnificence of imagination. And though these are perhaps the two greatest books in the poem, taken each as a whole, there are passages in every one of the other books equal, or almost equal, to the finest in these. And worthy of the thoughts that breathe are the words that burn. A tide of gorgeous eloquence rolls on from beginning to end, like a river of molten gold, outblazing, it may be safely affirmed, every thing of the kind in any other poetry. Finally, Milton's blank verse, both for its rich and varied music and its exquisite adaptation, would in itself almost deserve to be styled poetry, without the words; alone, of all our poets, before or since, he has brought out the full capabilities of the language in that form of composition. Indeed, out of the drama, he is still our only great blank-verse writer. Compared to his, the blank verse of no other of our narrative or didactic poets, unless we are to except a few of the happiest attempts at the direct imitation of his pauses and cadences, reads like any thing else than a sort of muffled rhyme—rhyme spoiled by the ends being blunted or broken off. Who remembers, who can repeat, any narrative blank verse but his? In whose ear does any other linger?

The poetry of Milton, though principally produced after the Restoration, belongs, in every thing but in date, to the preceding age; and this is also nearly as true of that of Cowley. Abraham Cowley, born in London in 1618, published his first volume of verse, under the title of "Poetic Blossoms," in 1633, when he was yet only a boy of fifteen: one piece contained in this publication, indeed—"The Tragical History of Pyramus and Thisbe"—was written when he was only in his tenth year. The four books of his unfinished epic entitled "Davideis" were mostly written while he was a student at Trinity College, Cambridge. His pastoral drama of Love's Riddle, and his Latin comedy called Naufragium Joculare, were both published in 1638. In 1647 appeared his collection of amatory poems entitled "The Mistress," and in 1653 his comedy of "The Guardian," afterward altered and republished as "The Cutter of Coleman-street." After the Restoration he collected such of his pieces as he thought worth preserving, and republished them together with some additional productions, of which the most important were his "Davideis," already mentioned, and his "Pindarique Odes."

Few poets have been more popular, or more praised, in their own time than Cowley. Milton is said to have declared that the three greatest English poets were Spenser, Shakspeare, and Cowley, though it does not follow that he held all three to be equally great. Sir John Denham, in some verses on Cowley's "Death and Burial among the Ancient Poets," in Westminster Abbey, sets him above all the English poets that had gone before him, and prophesies that posterity will hold him to have been equaled by Virgil alone among those of antiquity. For a long time, too, his works appear to have been more generally read than those of any other English poet, if a judgment may be formed from the frequency with which they were reprinted, and the numerous copies of them in various forms that still exist.[1] This popular favor they seem to have shared with those of Donne, whose legitimate successor Cowley was considered; or, rather, when the poetry of Donne became obsolete or unfashionable, that of Cowley took its place in the reading and admiration of the poetical part of the public. Cowley, indeed, is, in the main, a mere modernization and dilution of Donne. With the same general characteristics of manner, he is somewhat less forced and fantastical, a good deal less indecent, but unfortunately also infinitely less poetical. Every thing about him, in short, is less deep, and strong, and genuine. His imagination is tinsel, or mere surface gilding, compared to Donne's solid gold; his wit little better than word-catching, to the profound meditative quaintness of the elder poet; and of passion, with which all Donne's finest lines are tremulous, Cowley has none. Considerable grace and dignity occasionally distinguish his Pindaric Odes (which, however, are Pindaric only in form and name); and he has shown much elegant playfulness of style and fancy in his translations from and imitations of Anacreon, and in some other verses written in the same manner. As for what he intends for love verses, some of them are pretty enough frost-work; but the only sort of love there is in them is the love of point and sparkle.

This manner of writing is more fitly applied by another celebrated poet of the present period, Samuel Butler, the immortal author of Hudibras. Butler, born in 1612, is said to have written most of his great poem during the interregnum; but the first part of it was not published till 1663. The poetry of Butler has been very happily designated as merely the comedy of that style of composition which Donne and Cowley practiced in its more serious form—the difference between the two modes of writing being much the same with that which is presented by a countenance of a peculiar cast of features when solemnized by deep reflection, and the same countenance when lighted up by cheerfulness or distorted by mirth.[1] And it may be added, that the gayer and more animated expression is here, upon the whole, the more natural and attractive. The quantity of explosive matter of all kinds which Butler has contrived to pack up in his verses is wonderful; it is crack upon crack, flash upon flash, from the first line of his long poem to the last. Much of this incessant bedazzlement is, of course, merely verbal, or otherwise of the humblest species of wit; but an infinite number of the happiest things is also thrown out. And Hudibras is far from being all mere broad farce. Butler's power of arguing in verse, in his own way, may almost be put on a par with Dryden's in his; and, perseveringly as he devotes himself, upon system, to the exhibition of the ludicrous and grotesque, he sometimes surprises us with a sudden gleam of the truest beauty of thought and expression breaking out from the midst of the usual rattling fire of smartnesses and conundrums—as when in one place he exclaims of a thin cloud drawn over the moon—

> Mysterious veil; of brightness made,
> At once her luster and her shade.

Edmund Waller, born in 1605, had announced himself as a writer of verse before the close of the reign of James I., by his lines on the escape of Prince Charles at the port of San Andero, in the Bay of Biscay, on his return from Spain, in September, 1623; and he continued to cultivate the muse occasionally till after the accession of James II., in whose reign he died, in the year 1687. His last production was the little poem concluding with one of his happiest, one of his most characteristic, and one of his best-known passages:

> "The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decay'd,
> Lets in new light through chinks that time has made:
> Stronger by weakness, wiser men become
> As they draw near to their eternal home:
> Leaving the old, both worlds at once they view,
> That stand upon the threshold of the new."

Fenton, his editor, tells us that a number of poems on religious subjects, to which these verses refer, were mostly written when he was about eighty years old; and he has himself intimated that his bodily faculties were now almost gone:

> When we for age could neither read nor write,
> The subject made us able to indite.

Waller, therefore, as well as Milton, Cowley, and Butler, may be considered to have formed his manner in the last age; but his poetry hardly belongs to the true English school, even so much as that of either Butler or Cowley. The truth is, that the influence of the literature of France had begun to be felt by our own at an earlier date than is commonly assumed. The court of Charles I. was far from being so thoroughly French as that of Charles II.; but the connection established between the two kingdoms through Queen Henrietta could not fail to produce a partial imitation of French models both in writing and in other things. The distinguishing characteristic of French poetry (and, indeed, of French art in general), neatness in the dressing of the thought, had already been carried much farther by Malherbe, Racan, Malleville, and others, than among ourselves; and these writers are probably to be accounted the true fathers of Waller, and also, in great part, of Carew and Lovelace, the cotemporaries of the earlier portion of his poetical career, and with whom, in respect of poetical style and manner, he may be classed.[1] Both Lovelace and Carew, however, as has been already intimated, have more passion than Waller, who, with all his taste and elegance, was incapable of either expressing or feeling any thing very lofty or generous —being, in truth, poet as he was, a very mean-souled description of person, as his despicable political course sufficiently evinced.[2] His poetry, accordingly, is beyond the reach of critical animadversion on the score of such extravagance as is sometimes prompted by strong emotion. Waller is always perfectly master of himself, and idolizes his mistress with quite as much coolness and self-possession as he flatters his prince. But, although cold and unaffecting at all times, he occasionally rises to much dignity of thought and manner. His panegyric on Cromwell, the offering of his gratitude to the Protector for the permission granted to him of returning to England after ten years' exile, is certainly one of the most graceful pieces of adulation ever offered by poetry to power; and the poet is here probably more sincere than in most of his effusions, for the occasion was one on which he was likely to be moved to more than usual earnestness of feeling. A few years after, he welcomed Charles II. on his restoration to the throne of his ancestors, in another poem, which has been generally considered a much less spirited composition; Fenton accounts for the falling off by the author's advance in the mean while, from his forty-ninth to his fifty-fifth year—"from which time," he observes, "his genius began to decline apace from its meridian;" but the poet himself assigned another reason: —when Charles frankly told him that he thought his own panegyric much inferior to Cromwell's, "Sir," replied Waller, "we poets never succeed so well in writing truth as in fiction." Perhaps the true reason, after all, might be that his majesty's return to England was not quite so exciting a subject to Mr. Waller's muse as his own return had been. One thing must be admitted in regard to Waller's poetry; it is free from all mere verbiage and empty sound; if he rarely or never strikes a very powerful note, there is at least always something for the fancy or the understanding, as well as for the ear, in every expression. He abounds also in ingenious thoughts, which he dresses to the best advantage, and exhibits with great transparency of style. Eminent, however, as he is in his class, he must be reckoned among that subordinate class of poets who think and express themselves chiefly in similitudes, not among those who conceive and write passionately and metaphorically. He had a decorative and illuminating, but not a transforming imagination.

Sir Charles Sedley stands in something like the same relation to Waller as Sir John Suckling stood in to Carew and Lovelace. Sedley is the Suckling of the time of Charles II., with less impulsiveness and more insinuation, but a kindred gayety and sprightliness of fancy, and an answering liveliness, and, at the same time, courtly ease and elegance of diction. King Charles, a good judge of such matters, was accustomed to say that Sedley's style, either in writing or discourse, would be the standard of the English tongue; and his cotemporary, the Duke of Buckingham (Villiers), used to call his exquisite art of expression Sedley's witchcraft. Sedley was a very young man when he attained his high reputation, having been scarcely twenty when the Restoration took place. He survived both the Revolution and the century, dying in the year 1701. Of the other minor and court poets of that age, the celebrated Earl of Rochester (Wilmot)—although the brutal grossness of the greater part of his verse has deservedly made both it and its author infamous —was undoubtedly the greatest. There is a strength and pregnancy of expression in the best of Rochester's compositions which has seldom been surpassed. Rochester was still younger than Sedley when he had acquired the reputation of one of the most brilliant wits and poets of the day, not having completed his thirty-third year when he died, in July, 1680. Of the poetical productions of the other court wits of Charles's reign, the principal are, the Duke of Buckingham's satirical comedy of The Rehearsal, which was very effective when first produced, and still enjoys a great reputation, though it would probably be thought but a heavy joke by most readers not carried away by the prejudice in its favor; the Earl of Roscommon's very commonplace Essay on Translated Verse; and the Earl of Dorset's lively and well-known song, "To all you ladies now on land," written at sea the night before the engagement with the Dutch, on the 3d of June, 1665, or, rather, professing to have been then written, for the asserted poetic tranquillity of the noble author in expectation of the morrow's fight has, we believe, been disproved or disputed. The Marquis of Halifax and Lord Godolphin were also writers of verse at this time; but neither of them has left any thing worth remembering.

[1] We have possibly done some injustice to Waller by assuming, as we did, in the last Book (see ante, p. 588), that Carew, whose death preceded his by so many years, was a writer of verse before him. Carew died, Clarendon says, at the age of fifty, in 1639; but the earliest known edition of his poems was only published the year after his death, and he may not have written any thing of earlier date than Waller's lines on the prince's escape in 1623.

[2] See ante, p. 292. After his narrow escape, in 1643, he went abroad, "and, traveling into France," says Kennet, "improved himself in good letters: and for the rest of his life, which was very long, he chose rather to be admired for a poet than to be envied for a politician." They print among his works some of his speeches in parliament—among the rest his address on Tuesday, July 4th, 1643, when he "was brought to the bar, and had leave given him by the speaker to say what he could for himself before they proceeded to expel him the House," which is throughout one of the most abject prostrations ever made by any thing in the shape of a man.

Among the minor poets of the time, however, we ought not to forget Charles Cotton, best known for his humorous, though somewhat coarse, travesties of Virgil and Lucian, and for his continuation of Isaac Walton's Treatise on Angling and his fine idiomatic translation of Montaigne's Essays, but also the author of some short original pieces in verse, of much fancy and liveliness. One entitled an "Ode to Winter," in particular, has been highly praised by Wordsworth.[1] We need scarcely mention Sir William Davenant's long and languid heroic poem of Gondibert, though Hobbes, equally eminent in poetry and the mathematics, had declared that he "never yet saw poem that had so much shape of art, health of morality, and vigor and beauty of expression;" and has prophesied that, were it not for the mutability of modern tongues, "it would last as long as either the Æneid or Iliad."[2] Alas! the English of the reign of Charles II. is not yet obsolete, nor likely to become so; Homer and Virgil are also still read and admired; but men have forgotten Gondibert, almost as much as they have Hobbes's own Iliad and Odyssey.

By far the most illustrious name among the English poets of the latter half of the seventeenth century—if we exclude Milton as belonging properly to the preceding age—is that of John Dryden. Born in 1632, Dryden produced his first known composition in verse, in 1649, his lines on the death of Lord Hastings, a young nobleman of great promise, who was suddenly cut off by small-pox, on the eve of his intended marriage, in that year. This earliest of Dryden's poems is in the most ambitious style of the school of Donne and Cowley: Donne himself, indeed, had scarcely penned any thing quite so extravagant as one passage, in which the fancy of the young poet runs riot among the phenomena of the lothsome disease to which Lord Hastings had fallen a victim:

> "So many spots, like naeves on Venus' soil,
> One jewel set off with so many a foil;
> Blisters with pride swell'd, which through 's flesh did sprout
> Like rose-buds stuck i' the lily skin about.
> Each little pimple had a tear in it,
> To wail the fault its rising did commit;"

and so forth. Almost the only feature of the future Dryden which this production discloses is his deficiency in sensibility or heart; exciting as the occasion was, it does not contain an affecting line. Perhaps, on comparing his imitation with Donne's own poetry, so instinct with tenderness and passion, Dryden may have seen or felt that his own wanted the very quality which was the light and life of that of his master; at any rate, wiser than Cowley, who had the same reason for shunning a competition with Donne, he abandoned this style with his first attempt, and, indeed, for any thing that appears, gave up the writing of poetry for some years altogether. His next verses of any consequence are dated nine years later—his "Heroic Stanzas on the Death of Oliver Cromwell,"—and, destitute as they are of the vigorous conception and full and easy flow of versification which he afterward attained, they are free from any trace of the elaborate and grotesque absurdity of the Elegy on Lord Hastings. His Astrea Redux, or poem on the return of the king, produced two years after, evinces a growing freedom and command of style. But it is in his Annus Mirabilis, written in 1666, that his genius broke forth for the first time with any promise of that full effulgence at which it ultimately arrived; here, in spite of the incumbrance of a stanza (the quatrain of alternately-rhyming heroics) which he afterward wisely exchanged for a more manageable kind of verse, we have much both of the nervous diction and the fervid fancy which characterize his latest and best works. From this date to the end of his days, Dryden's life was one long literary labor; eight original poems of considerable length, many shorter pieces, twenty-eight dramas, and several volumes of poetical translation from Chaucer, Boccaccio, Ovid, Theocritus, Lucretius, Horace, Juvenal, Persius, and Virgil, together with numerous discourses in prose, some of them very long and elaborate, attest the industry as well as the fertility of a mind which so much toil and so many draughts upon its resources were so far from exhausting, that its powers continued not only to exert themselves with unimpaired elasticity, but to grow stronger and brighter to the last. The genius of Dryden certainly did not, as that of Waller is said to have done, begin "to decline apace from its meridian" after he had reached his fifty-fifth year. His famous Alexander's Feast and his Fables, his greatest poems, were the last he produced, and were published together in the year 1700, only a few months before his death, at the age of sixty-nine.

Dryden has commonly been considered to have founded a new school of English poetry; but perhaps it would be more strictly correct to regard him as having only carried to higher perfection—perhaps to the highest to which it has yet been brought—a style of poetry which had been cultivated long before his day. The satires of Hall and of Marston,[1] and also the Nosce Teipsum of Sir John Davies,[2] all published before the end of the sixteenth century, not to refer to other less eminent examples, may be classed as of the same school with his poetry. It is a school very distinguishable from that to which Milton and the greatest of our elder poets belong, deriving its spirit and character, as it does, chiefly from the ancient Roman classic poetry, whereas the other is mainly the offspring of the middle ages, of Gothic manners and feelings and the Romance or Provençal literature. The one, therefore, may be called, with sufficient propriety, the classic, the other the romantic school of poetry. But it seems to be a mistake to assume that the former first arose in England after the Restoration, under the influence of the imitation of the French, which then became fashionable; the most that can be said is, that the French taste which then became prevalent among us may have encouraged its revival, for undoubtedly what has been called the classic school of poetry had been cultivated by English writers at a much earlier date; nor is there any reason to suppose that the example of the modern poetry of France had any share in originally turning our own into that channel. Marston and Hall, and Sackville in his Ferrex and Porrex, and Ben Jonson in his comedies and tragedies, and the other early writers of English poetry in the classic vein, appear not to have imitated any French poets, but to have gone to the fountain-head, and sought in the productions of the Roman poets themselves—in the plays of Terence and Seneca, and the satires of Juvenal and Persius—for examples and models. Nay, even Dryden, at a later period, probably formed himself almost exclusively upon the same originals and upon the works of these his predecessors among his own countrymen, and was little, if at all, indebted to or influenced by any French pattern. His poetry, unlike as it is to that of Milton or Spenser, has still a thoroughly English character—an English force and heartiness, and, with all its classicality, not a little even of the freedom and luxuriance of the more genuine English style. Smooth Waller, who preceded him, may have learned something from the modern French poets; and so may Pope, who came after him; but Dryden's fiery energy and "full-resounding line" have nothing in common with them in spirit or manner. Without either creative imagination or any power of pathos, he is in argument, in satire, and in declamatory magnificence, the greatest of our poets. His poetry, indeed, is not the highest kind of poetry, but in that kind he stands unrivaled and unapproached. Pope, his great disciple, who, in correctness, in neatness, and in the brilliancy of epigrammatic point, has outshone his master, has not come near him in easy, flexible vigor, in indignant vehemence, in narrative rapidity, any more than he has in sweep and variety of versification. Dryden never writes coldly, or timidly, or drowsily. The movement of verse always sets him on fire, and whatever he produces is a coinage hot from the brain, not slowly scraped or pinched into shape, but struck out as from a die with a few stout blows or a single wrench of the screw. It is this fervor especially which gives to his personal sketches their wonderful life and force: his Absalom and Achitophel is the noblest portrait-gallery in poetry.

It is chiefly as a dramatic writer that Dryden can be charged with the imitation of French models. Of his plays, nearly thirty in number, the comedies for the most part in prose, the tragedies in rhyme, few have much merit considered as entire works, although there are brilliant passages and spirited scenes in most of them. Of the whole number, he has told us that his tragedy of All for Love, or the World well Lost (founded on the story of Anthony and Cleopatra), was the only play he wrote for himself; the rest, he admits, were sacrifices to the vitiated taste of the age. His Almanzor, or the Conquest of Grenada (in two parts), although extravagant, is also full of genius. Of his comedies, the Spanish Friar is perhaps the best; it has some most effective scenes.

Many others of the poets of this age whose names have been already noticed were also dramatists. Milton's Comus was never acted publicly, nor his Sampson Agonistes at all. Cowley's Love's Riddle and Cutter of Coleman-street were neither of them originally written for the stage; but the latter was brought out in one of the London theaters after the Restoration, and was also revived about the middle of the last century. Waller altered the fifth act of Beaumont and Fletcher's Maid's Tragedy, making his additions to the blank verse of the old dramatists in rhyme, as he states in a prologue:

> "In this old play what's new we have express'd
> In rhyming verse distinguish'd from the rest;
> That, as the Rhone its hasty way does make > (Not mingling waters) through Geneva's lake,
> So, having here the different styles in view,
> You may compare the former with the new."

Villiers, duke of Buckingham, besides his Rehearsal, wrote a farce entitled the Battle of Sedgmoor, and also altered Beaumont and Fletcher's comedy of The Chances. The tragedy of Valentinian of the same writers was altered by the Earl of Rochester. Sedley wrote three comedies, mostly in prose, and three tragedies, one in rhyme and two in blank verse. And Davenant is the author of twenty-five tragedies, comedies, and masques, produced between 1629 and his death, in 1668.

Of the remaining dramatic writers of the period, we must also confine ourselves to little more than a mere catalogue. The most eminent names are those of Thomas Otway, Nathaniel Lee, John Crowne, Sir George Etheridge, William Wycherly, and Thomas Southerne. Of six tragedies and four comedies written by Otway, his tragedies of the Orphan and Venice Preserved still sustain his fame and popularity as the most pathetic and tear-drawing of all our dramatists. Their licentiousness has necessarily banished his comedies from the stage, with most of those of his cotemporaries. Lee has also great tenderness, with much more fire and imagination than Otway; of his pieces, eleven in number — all tragedies — his Theodosius, or the Force of Love, and his Rival Queens, or Alexander the Great, are the most celebrated. Crowne, though several of his plays were highly successful when first produced, was almost forgotten, till Mr. Lamb reprinted some of his scenes in his dramatic specimens, and showed that no dramatist of that age had written finer things. Of seventeen pieces produced by Crowne, between 1671 and 1698, his tragedy of Thyestes and his comedy of Sir Courtley Nice are in particular of eminent merit, the first for its poetry, the second for plot and character. Etheridge is the author of only three comedies, the Comical Revenge (1664), She Would if She Could (1668), and the Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter (1676); all remarkable for the polish and fluency of the dialogue, and entitled to be regarded as having first set the example of that modern style of comedy which was afterward cultivated by Wycherly, Farquhar, Vanbrugh, and Congreve. Wycherly, who was born in 1640, and lived till 1715, produced his only four plays, Love in a Wood, The Gentleman Dancing Master, The Country Wife, and The Plain Dealer, all comedies, between the years 1672 and 1677. The two last of these pieces are written with more elaboration than any thing of Etheridge's, and both contain some bold delineation of character and strong satiric writing, reminding us at times of Ben Jonson; but, like him, too, Wycherly is deficient in ease and nature. Southerne, who was only born in the year of the Restoration, and lived till 1746, had produced no more than his two first plays before the close of the present period—his tragedy of the Loyal Brother, in 1682, and his comedy of the Disappointment in 1684. Of ten dramatic pieces of which he is the author, five are comedies, and are of little value; but his tragedies of the Fatal Marriage (1692), Oroonoko (1696), and the Spartan Dame (1719), are interesting and affecting.

It is hardly worth while to mention, under the head of the literature of the age, the seventeen plays of King William's poet laureate, Thomas Shadwell, better remembered by Dryden's immortal nickname of MacFlecnoe; or the equally numerous brood of the muse of Elkanah Settle, the city poet, Dryden's

"Doeg, whom God for mankind's mirth has made;"

or the nine of Shadwell's successor in the laureateship, Nahum Tate, the author of the worst alterations of Shakspeare, the worst version of the Psalms of David, and the worst continuation of a great poem (his second part of the Absalom and Achitophel) extant; or, lastly, although she had more talent than any of these, the seventeen pieces of the notorious Mrs. Aphra Behn—Pope's Astraea,

"Who fairly puts all characters to bed."

This Mrs. Behn, besides her plays, was the authoress of a number of novels and tales, which, amid great impetuosity and turbulence of style, contain some ingeniously-contrived incidents and some rather effective painting of the passions.

Eminent as he is among the poets of his age, Dryden is also one of the greatest of its prose writers. In ease, flexibility, and variety, indeed, his English prose has scarcely ever been excelled. Of our other most celebrated prose-writers belonging to the present period, Clarendon may be first mentioned, although his great work, his History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars, was not published till the year 1702, nor his Life and Continuation of his History before 1759. His style can not be commended for its correctness; the manner in which he constructs his sentences, indeed, often sets at defiance all the rules of syntax; but yet he is never unintelligible or obscure—with such admirable expository skill is the matter arranged and spread out, even where the mere verbal sentence-making is the most negligent and entangled. The style, in fact, is that proper to speaking rather than to writing, and had, no doubt, been acquired by Clarendon, not so much from books as from his practice in speaking at the bar and in parliament; for, with great natural abilities, he does not seem to have had much acquaintance with literature, or much acquired knowledge of any kind resulting from study. But his writing possesses the quality that interests above all the graces or artifices of rhetoric—the impress of a mind informed by its subject, and having a complete mastery over it; while the broad, full stream in which it flows makes the reader feel as if he were borne along on its tide. The abundance, in particular, with which he pours out his stores of language and illustration in his characters of the eminent persons engaged on both sides of the great contest, seems inexhaustible. The historical value of his history, however, is not very considerable; it has not preserved very many facts which are not to be found elsewhere; and, whatever may be thought of its general bias, the inaccuracy of its details is so great throughout, as demonstrated by the authentic evidences of the time, that there is scarcely any other cotemporary history which is so little trustworthy as an authority with regard to minute particulars. Clarendon, in truth, was far from being placed in the most favorable circumstances for giving a perfectly correct account of many of the events he has undertaken to record: he was not, except for a very short time, in the midst of the busy scene: looking to it, as he did, from a distance, while the mighty drama was still only in progress, he was exposed to some chances of misconception to which even those removed from it by a long interval of time are not liable; and, without imputing to him any further intention to deceive than is implied in the purpose which we may suppose he chiefly had in view in writing his work—the vindication of his own side of the question—his position as a partisan, intimately mixed up with the affairs and interests of one of the two contending factions, could not fail both to bias his own judgment, and even in some measure to distort or color the reports made to him by others. On the whole, therefore, this celebrated work is rather a great literary performance than a very valuable historical monument.

Another royalist history of the same times and events to which Clarendon's work is dedicated, the Behemoth of Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury, introduces one of the most distinguished names both in English literature and in modern metaphysical, ethical, and political philosophy. Hobbes, born in 1588, commenced author in 1628, at the age of forty, by publishing his translation of Thucydides, but did not produce his first original work, his Latin treatise entitled "De Cive," till 1642. This was followed by his treatises entitled "Human Nature" and "De Corpore Politico," in 1650; his Leviathan, in 1651; his translations in verse of the Iliad and Odyssey, in 1675; and his "Behemoth, or History of the Causes of the Civil Wars of England, and of the counsels and artifices by which they were carried on, from the year 1640 to the year 1660, a few months after his death, at the age of ninety-two, in 1679. Regarded merely as a writer of English, there can be little difference of opinion about the high rank to be assigned to Hobbes. He has been described as our first uniformly careful and correct writer;[1] and he may be admitted to have at least set the first conspicuous and influential example, in what may be called our existing English (for Roger Ascham, Sir Thomas Elyot, and one or two other early writers seem to have aimed at the same thing in a preceding stage of the language), of that regularity of style which has since his time been generally attended to. This, however, is his least merit. No writer has succeeded in making language a more perfect exponent of thought than it is as employed by Hobbes. His style is not poetical or glowingly eloquent, because his mind was not poetical, and the subjects about which he wrote would have rejected the exaggerations of imaginative or passionate expression if he had been capable of supplying such. But in the prime qualities of precision and perspicuity, and also in economy and succinctness, in force and in terseness, it is the very perfection of a merely expository style. Without any affectation of point, also, it often shapes itself easily and naturally into the happiest aphoristic and epigrammatic forms. Hobbes's clearness and aptness of expression, the effect of which is like that of reading a book with a good light, never forsake him—not even in that most singular performance, his version of Homer, where there is scarcely a trace of ability of any other kind. There are said to be only two lines in that work in which he is actually poetical; those which describe the infant Astyanax in the scene of the parting of Hector and Andromache, in the Sixth Book of the Iliad:

> Now Hector met her with their little boy,
> That in the nurse's arms was carried;
> And like a star upon her bosom lay
> His beautiful and shining golden head

But there are other passages in which, by dint of mere directness and transparency of style, he has rendered a line or two happily enough—as, for instance, in the description of the descent of Apollo at the prayer of Chryses, in the beginning of the poem:

> His prayer was granted by the deity,
> Who, with his silver bow and arrows keen,
> Descended from Olympus silently,
> In likeness of the sable night unseen.

As if expressly to proclaim and demonstrate, however, that this momentary success was merely accidental, immediately upon the back of this stanza comes the following:

> His bow and quiver both behind him hang,
> The arrows chink as often as he jogs.
> And as he shot the bow was heard to twang,
> And first his arrows flew at mules and dogs.

For the most part, indeed, Hobbes's Iliad and Odyssey are no better than travesties of Homer's, the more ludicrous as being undesigned and unconscious. Never was there a more signal revenge than that which Hobbes afforded to imagination and poetry over his own unbelieving and scoffing philosophism by the publication of this work. It was almost as if the man born blind, who had all his lifetime been attempting to prove that the sense which he himself wanted was no sense at all, and that that thing, color, which it professed peculiarly to discern, was a mere delusion, should have himself, at last, taken the painter's brush and pallet in hand, and attempted, in confirmation of his theory, to produce a picture by the mere senses of touch, taste, smell, and hearing. The great subject of the merits or demerits, the truth or falsehood, of Hobbes's system of metaphysical, ethical, and political philosophy of course can not be entered upon here. His works certainly gave a greater impulse to speculation in that field than those of any other English writer had ever before done; even the startling paradoxes with which they abound, and their arrogant and contemptuous tone, coöperated with their eminent merits of a formal kind to arouse attention, and to provoke the investigation and discussion of the subjects of which they treat. It must also be admitted that scarcely any writings of their class contain so many striking remarks—so much acute and ingenious, if not profound and comprehensive, thinking—so much that, if not absolutely novel, has still about it that undefinable charm which even an old truth or theory receives from being born anew in an original mind. Such a mind Hobbes had, if any man ever had. Moreover, it is not necessary to deny that, however hollow or insufficient may have been the basis of his philosophy, he may have been successful in explaining some particular intellectual phenomena, or placing in a clearer light some important truths both in metaphysics and in morals. But as for what is properly to be called his system of philosophy—and it is to be observed that, in his own writings, his views in metaphysics, in morals, and in politics are all bound and built up together into one consistent whole—the question of the truth or falsehood of that seems to be completely settled. Nobody now professes more than a partial Hobbism. If so much of the creed of the philosopher of Malmesbury as affirms the non-existence of any essential distinction between right and wrong, the non-existence of conscience or the moral sense, the non-existence of any thing beyond mere sensation in either emotion or intelligence, and other similar negations of his moral and metaphysical doctrine, has still its satisfied disciples, who is now a Hobbist either in politics or in mathematics? Yet, certainly, it is in these latter departments that we must look for the greater part of what is absolutely original and peculiar in the notions of this teacher. Hobbes's philosophy of human nature is not amiss as a philosophy of Hobbes's own human nature. Without passions or imagination himself, and steering his own course through life by the mere calculations of an enlightened selfishness, one half of the broad map of humanity was to him nothing better than a blank. The consequence is, that, even when he reasons most acutely, he is constantly deducing his conclusions from insufficient premises. Then, like most men of ingenious rather than capacious minds, having once adopted his hypothesis or system, he was too apt to make facts bend to that rather than that to facts; a tendency which in his case was strengthened by another part of his character which has left its impression upon all his writings—a much greater love of victory than of truth.

The most illustrious antagonist of Hobbism, when first promulgated, was Dr. Ralph Cudworth, the First Part of whose "True Intellectual System of the Universe, wherein all the Reason and Philosophy of Atheism is Confuted," was first published in 1678. As a vast store-house of learning, and also as a display of wonderful powers of subtil and far-reaching speculation, this celebrated work is almost unrivaled in our literature; and it is also written in a style of elastic strength and compass which places its author in a high rank among our prose classics. Along with Cudworth may be mentioned his friend and brother Platonist, Dr. Henry More, the author of numerous theological and philosophical works, and remarkable for the union of some of the most mystic notions with the clearest style, and of the most singular credulity with powers of reasoning of the highest order. Other two great theological writers of this age were the voluminous Richard Baxter and the learned and eloquent Dr. Robert Leighton, archbishop of Glasgow. Bishop Burnet's account of the former has been quoted in a preceding chapter:[1] of the latter, whom he knew intimately, he has given a much more copious account, a few sentences of which we will transcribe: "His preaching had a sublimity both of thought and expression in it. The grace and gravity of his pronunciation was such that few heard him without a very sensible emotion. . . . . It was so different from all others, and indeed from every thing that one could hope to rise up to, that it gave a man an indignation at himself and all others. . . . . His style was rather too fine; but there was a majesty and beauty in it that left so deep an impression that I can not yet forget the sermons I heard him preach thirty years ago."[2] The writings of Archbishop Leighton that have come down to us have been held by some of the highest minds of our own day—the late Mr. Coleridge for one—to bear out Burnet's affectionate panegyric. But, perhaps, the greatest genius among the theological writers of this age was the famous Dr. Isaac Barrow, popularly known chiefly by his admirable sermons, but renowned also in the history of modern science as, next to Newton himself, the greatest mathematician of his time. "As a writer," the late Professor Dugald Stewart has well said of Barrow, "he is equally distinguished by the redundancy of his matter and by the pregnant brevity of his expression; but what more peculiarly characterizes his manner is a certain air of powerful and of conscious facility in the execution of whatever he undertakes. Whether the subject be mathematical, metaphysical, or theological, he seems always to bring to it a mind which feels itself superior to the occasion, and which, in contending with the greatest difficulties, puts forth but half his strength. He has somewhere spoken of his Lectiones Mathematicæ (which it may, in passing, be remarked, display metaphysical talents of the highest order) as extemporaneous effusions of his pen; and I have no doubt that the same epithet is still more literally applicable to his pulpit discourses. It is, indeed, only thus that we can account for the variety and extent of his voluminous remains, when we recollect that the author died at the age of forty-six."[3]

Such were the great lights of the literature of the present period. Many minor names necessarily remain unnoticed, such as John Bunyan, the author of the Pilgrim's Progress, the most interesting of allegories, and of various other religious works; Isaac Walton, the mild-natured angler and biographer; Sir William Temple, the lively, agreeable, and well-informed essayist and memoirist, &c. But our space will not allow us to extend our account; and the same reason compels us to defer, till the next Book, the retrospect of the progress of the mathematical and physical sciences in England during the seventeenth century.

The history of the fine arts during the present period may be dismissed with a very short notice. The important architectural era which was opened by the great fire of London, and illustrated by the genius of Sir Christopher Wren, may be referred more properly to the ensuing period to which the greatest works of that distinguished architect belong; and, on the subject of the higher branches of painting, there is little room for comment in treating of a dependent school during a period of general mediocrity. In Italy, the silver age of art was on the wane. Facility in composition and readiness in the mechanism of the art, were almost the only qualifications inherited from the master-spirits of the great schools of painting by their successors, who decorated the churches and palaces of Italy with the meretricious productions of the seventeenth century; and it strongly marks the pollution of taste at the fountain-head, that such painters as D'Arpino and Luca Giordano were as highly esteemed in their own day as Titian, Rafaelle, and Michel Angelo. Encouragement was still abundant, but quality was absorbed in quantity, and the labor of study was not to be expected from artists who could satisfy the popular expectation without it. In this state of the art the French school was enabled to raise itself into comparative eminence, though not with success equal to its ambition.

It would be but a useless repetition to offer in this place any remark upon the effects of French influence in the court of Charles II. It operated no less upon the arts than upon politics and literature; and the encouragement afforded to the higher branches of painting by the king was limited to the imitation of Louis XIV., not in the enlightened patronage which sought and rewarded the native talent of Charles Le Brun, but in covering the walls and ceilings of Windsor with the same jumble of history, mythology, and allegory which pervades the works of the great French painter (great with all his faults and sins against good taste) at Versailles.

For this purpose, Charles invited to England Antonio Verrio, a Neapolitan by birth, but settled in France, and known by some public works executed at Thoulouse. "An excellent painter," says Walpole, "for the sort of subjects on which he was employed; that is, without much invention, and with less taste, his exuberant pencil was ready at pouring out gods, goddesses, kings, emperors, and triumphs over those public surfaces on which the eye never rests long enough to criticise, and where we should be sorry to place the works of a better master—I mean ceilings and stair-cases. The New Testament and the Roman history cost him nothing but ultra-marine; that and marble columns and marble steps he never spared." Happily as this passage describes the style, not only of Verrio, but of the whole class of artists to which he belongs, the writer is most unjust, in this and other observations of similar tendency, in the disposition he shows to pass a sweeping condemnation on a mode of applying the art of painting which had not only exercised but called forth the talents of the greatest Italian masters, and established the sublimest monuments of their fame. It was of good augury for England that a day had arrived for appreciating and patronizing the arts in its most imposing costume of grandeur; but that day had been fatally retarded until historical painting, as we were now obliged to receive it, had contracted an inseparable alliance with bad taste, and its employment as "the handmaid of architecture" had degenerated into an abuse. Such is the decoration of the saloon at Montague House (the British Museum), one of the few works of this class spared by time and neglect to which it is possible to refer the reader, where the pencil strays beyond its legitimate office to create a heavy mass of columns and entablatures, to the total exclusion of the art of the sculptor and architect. Unsupported by any original talent to atone for the defects with which it had been loaded in the French school, it is not, therefore, surprising that the grand style of painting in England should have ended, as it began, in a caprice of fashion, which, during its prevalence could blind even the accomplished Evelyn to bestow his unqualified praise on the productions of a Verrio.

The most important of Verrio's works at Windsor—the decorations of St. George's Hall and the Chapel—were mercilessly destroyed in the late alterations; but some of his ceilings remain. There is also much by his hand at Burleigh and Chatsworth. He lived till 1707; but at the Revolution, being a zealous papist, he refused all employment under King William. He at length consented to paint at Hampton Court, where, among other things, he executed the stair-case, "as ill," says Walpole, "as if he had spoiled it on principle."

That the mediocrity of the fashionable foreign artist enabled several English painters to obtain notice and employment in the same department is a circumstance which, in a better age, might have operated greatly to the advantage of native art; but, under the influence of the causes already alluded to, the opportunity failed to produce any permanent result. The works of all who followed in the footsteps of Verrio and the French school have been abandoned to indiscriminate neglect, and their names (with one eminent exception belonging to the next period) may be passed over rapidly. Among the numerous foreign painters whom the success of Verrio attracted to England, the most distinguished were Jacques Rousseau and Charles de la Fosse, who came over in the reign of James II. to assist in the decorations of Montague House, to which reference has just been made. The latter executed the paintings in the dome of the Invalides, and is accounted (no very high praise) one of the best colorists of the French school. Among the native painters of this class may be mentioned Isaac Fuller, who had studied in France, and appears to have been a respectable artist. A relic of his pencil still remains in the dome of St. Mary Abchurch in the city of London. Walpole mentions some extensive works on which he was employed in the great taverns. John Freeman is recorded as a rival of Fuller. He painted scenes for the theater. Whatever may be the absolute merits of these artists, they enjoyed a reputation in their day; and that they were thus engaged would seem to imply more of a popular feeling for art than is generally attributed to the period. Robert Streater was appointed to the office of sergeant painter to the king upon the Restoration. He executed many painted ceilings, of which that of the theater at Oxford is a favorable specimen of his talents. He was an artist of undoubted ability, and attempted every style, from history to still life, with a certain degree of success.

In portrait-painting, the reign of Charles II. was illustrated by the works of Sir Peter Lely. This artist, the most distinguished portrait-painter of his time, was a native of Westphalia. He came to England in 1643, and, seeing the works of Vandyke, his emulation was roused, and he quitted his former style and subjects, which were landscapes and small histories, and gave himself entirely to portraits, in imitation of that great master, to whose preëminent station in the arts he became the legitimate successor at the Restoration.

Lely was formed for the court of Charles II. In the delicacy and softness of his flesh he perhaps excels Vandyke; but he is greatly his inferior in the higher qualities of art. "If in nothing but simplicity," to use again the apt critical language of Walpole, "he falls short of his model, as Statius or Claudian did of Virgil. Lely supplied the want of taste with clinquant. His nymphs trail fringes and embroidery through meadows and purling streams. Add, that Vandyke's habits are those of the times; Lely's, a sort of fantastic nightgown fastened with a single pin. The latter was, in truth, the ladies' painter; and, whether the age improved in beauty or flattery, Lely's women are certainly handsomer than those of Vandyke—they please as much as they are evidently meant to please: he caught the reigning character, and ——— on animated canvas stole

The sleepy eye that spoke the melting soul.

Lely, in short, was a mannerist: whoever sat before him, the model was in his own mind, and there is sufficient evidence that he did not scruple to sacrifice likeness to the peculiar expression which he conceived to be graceful. Hence it arises that his works are less unequal than those of Vandyke, and, if he never falls much below his general level, he never excels himself in any striking work. An anecdote is recorded of him which does equal credit to his candor and his knowledge of art:—A nobleman is said to have addressed him, "How came you, Sir Peter, to have so great a reputation? You know that I know you are no great painter." "My lord," replied Lely, "I know that I am not, but I am the best you have."

The superior talent of Sir Peter Lely is sufficiently attested by the number and merit of contemporary portrait-painters who measured themselves by his standard. The example of Vandyke had not been thrown away upon our native artists; but it is a misfortune of art to be dependent on fashion, and the affected attitudes and fluttering draperies of Lely seem to have been obligatory upon all who aspired to be his rivals. Pepys, in his Diary, says, upon sitting for his portrait to Hayls, "I do almost break my neck looking over my shoulder to make the posture for him to work by." And again—"To Hayls's, and there did sit till almost dark upon working my gown, which I hired to be drawn in, an Indian gown." Hayls, however, was an excellent painter, and copied Vandyke with great success. Michael Wright was a Scotchman. He was chosen, upon Lely declining the commission, to paint the portraits of the judges in the Guildhall of London, where they are still preserved in the city collection. His portrait of Lacy, the actor, in three characters, at Windsor, is a picture of no common degree of excellence. Henry Anderton was a pupil of Streater. He afterward studied in Italy, and, on his return, painted portraits in a style which interfered with the practice of Lely himself. With the names of Thomas Flatman, a respectable painter, though better known as a poet, and John Greenhill, who was the most promising pupil of Lely, but died young, the present list of English painters may be concluded. From a swarm of foreigners, who flourished here during the same period, we may select the names of Henry Gascar, James Huysman, and Gerard Soest, all excellent portrait-painters, and rivals of Lely. Netscher visited England for a short time only. Sunman, a Dutch painter, executed the portraits of the founders in the gallery at Oxford. Philip Duval was a pupil of Le Brun. They were all surpassed by William Wissing, a native of Amsterdam, who came into vogue at the death of Lely, in 1680, and disputed the vacant throne with Kneller, then fast rising into reputation; but his death, in 1687, left the latter without a competitor.

Paintings of still life were as much in fashion as portraits. Pepys, who looked at every thing with courtly eyes, speaking of the incomparable pictures he saw in the king's closet at Whitehall, where the remains of the magnificent collection of Charles I. had been reunited, particularizes, as most worthy of notice, "a book upon a desk, which I durst have sworn was a real book." Several eminent Dutch painters in this style—Vansoon, Hoogstraaten, Roestraten, and Varelst—found encouragement at the court of Charles II. Few artists have ever equaled Varelst as a flower-painter. He was patronized by the Duke of Buckingham, who encouraged him to attempt portraits; and, such is the influence of fashion, he obtained extensive employment and high prices in a style for which he was totally unfitted, to the great disgust of Lely. To these names may be added Abraham Hondius, the animal-painter; the landscape-painters, Danker, Vosterman, and Griffiere; Lankrink, who painted the landscapes for Sir Peter Lely's backgrounds; and, lastly, the two Vandeveldes, who passed many years in this country, to the great honor of their patrons.

Sculpture during this period was almost exclusively applied to decoration, and we find but two artists worthy of record as having risen above the mediocrity which is a sufficient merit in that class of art. Caius Gabriel Cibber was a native of Holstein. He was extensively employed at Chatsworth, and executed the bas-reliefs on the London Monument, and numerous other works which have fallen into oblivion. His fame rests upon the two figures personifying raving and melancholy Madness which surmounted the gateway of the Old Bethlehem Hospital, and are now in the hall of the modern building in St. George's Fields. The knowledge of art and the truth of expression displayed in these justly celebrated statues place the name of Cibber in the foremost rank of his profession, and leave us to regret that we have no other memorial worthy of his genius.

Grinling Gibbons, though a sculptor of a high class—as his marble statue of Charles II. in the area of the (late) Royal Exchange, and the bronze of his successor in the Privy Garden at Whitehall, sufficiently prove—is best known by his carvings in wood, which he carried to a perfection that has never been equaled. He rivals the lightness and delicacy of nature itself in his representation of birds and flowers in this material. This great and original genius was first drawn from obscurity by Evelyn, who found him in a cottage at Deptford, carving his well-known work of the stoning of St. Stephen, after Tintoretto. The circumstances of his introduction to the king are too characteristic of court patronage, such as it ever was and is, to be omitted. "The king," says Evelyn, "saw the carving at Sir R. Brown's chamber, and was astonished at the curiosity of it, but was called away and sent it to the queen's chamber. There, a French peddling-woman, who used to bring baubles out of France for the ladies, began to find fault with several things in it, which she understood no more than an ass or a monkey. So, in a kind of indignation, I caused it to be taken back and sent down to the cottage again." Charles, however, in whom a genuine taste for the arts was one of many good qualities obscured by indolence and self-indulgence, was sensible of the merit of the artist. He gave him an appointment in the Board of Works, and employed him at Windsor. Burleigh and Chatsworth can boast of a profusion of his exquisite carvings. He also executed the beautiful foliage in the choir of St. Paul's, and the influence of his style may be traced in the woodwork of many of Sir Christopher Wren's churches. Gibbons lived till 1721.

The progress of engraving during this period is highly honorable to English art. William Faithorne was undoubtedly the best artist of the age. This eminent engraver, having drawn the sword in the royal cause during the civil war, was associated with Hollar in the noble defense of Basing House, where he was taken prisoner, and remained some time in confinement in London. Being at length permitted to retire to France, he took the opportunity of studying under Nanteuil, and formed a style peculiarly adapted to portrait-engraving, in which few artists have ever equaled him. Avoiding the timid finish of the French school, he united freedom with softness, and force with delicacy. His works, of which Walpole gives a catalogue of about one hundred and fifty, are unequal, but his best display an extraordinary clearness and brilliancy, and are full of color. Returning to England in 1650, he opened a print-shop, and worked at his profession, to which he added the art of drawing in crayons, which he had learned of Nanteuil. This excellent artist died in 1691. His life was supposed to have been shortened by his affliction for his son, who was his pupil and an engraver of merit, but was negligent, and died early. John Filian was another of his scholars.

The other engravers worthy of mention at this period were principally foreigners. David Loggan, a Dantzicker, said to be a pupil of Simon Pass, engraved views of the public buildings of Oxford and Cambridge, but his works consist chiefly of portraits. With him came Abraham Blooteling and Gerard Valek. Peter Vanderbank is remarkable for the softness of his style, and the large scale on which he engraved his heads. Robert White was a pupil of Loggan, and a very excellent engraver of heads, many of which are from his own drawings. He was distinguished for his success in likenesses. Two hundred and fifty-five of this artist's works are enumerated in Walpole's catalogue.

The invention of mezzotint is an epoch in the art of engraving which must not be entirely passed over—the merit of the discovery having long been attributed to Prince Rupert, whose pretensions might be sufficiently borne out by his zealous and successful cultivation of the arts and sciences. But, although this discovery has been circumstantially related as having occurred to the prince during his exile abroad, from the accidental observation of the effect of rust on a gun-barrel which a soldier was endeavoring to scrape clean, yet more careful inquiry has invalidated his claim, and carried the invention of mezzotint as far back as the year 1643. There can be no doubt, however, that its introduction into England is due to this accomplished prince, and that he applied himself sedulously to its improvement. The superior excellence of our engravers has made it an English art; and in fact it has never been practiced with success in any other country.

The coinage both of Charles and James is well worthy of notice on the score of art. John and Joseph Rotier, who were appointed to the Mint at the Restoration, in consequence of a promise made by Charles to their father, a Dutch banker, who had supplied him with money, were excellent medalists, though by no means equal to Simon, whom they most unjustly superseded. There was a third brother, Philip, who also worked at the Mint, and caused great scandal by representing the Duchess of Richmond in the character of Britannia on the reverse of a large medal with the king's head. At the Revolution John Rotier was suspected (and probably with reason) of coining money for the service of the exiled king. Norbert Rotier, the son of John, was also a medalist, and shared in the public employment.

Among the earliest measures of Charles II., after his restoration, was the reëstablishment of cathedrals, accompanied, as a matter of course, by a return to that choral service to which the music of modern ages is so deeply indebted. Of the bishops, only nine out of six-and-twenty survived the interregnum; no difficulty, however, occurred in speedily filling the vacant episcopal thrones. But it was not so easy a task to replace the organs—which, by an ordinance made in 1644, had all been taken down,[1] and several were destroyed—or to collect again the organists and lay-vicars, of whom many had been driven to seek other means of subsistence, some in their own country, some in foreign climes. The Puritans had been so successful in decrying all music, except their own nasal psalm-singing, that at the Restoration the art seemed to be in an almost hopeless state; for of those professors who had been obliged to abandon their calling, some were dead, and a few were too far advanced in years to recur to their former pursuit, while others were unwilling to resume an occupation which the gloomy religion or the hypocrisy of the times had compelled them to relinquish.

The first step toward a return to choral service was the furnishing the cathedrals with organs. For this purpose the only four makers of any name who remained were actively employed to repair such of the old instruments as could be found, and to build new ones. In the mean time, musicians of any pretensions to eminence were invited to assist in qualifying proper persons for the duties of the various choirs. Of the gentlemen of the chapel, and others on the musical establishment of Charles I., not many appeared to claim their former appointments; but among the survivors who presented themselves were Dr. Child,[2] Dr. Christopher Gibbons, Dr. Rogers, Dr. Wilson, Low, Henry Lawes,[3] Bryne, and Captain Cook. Child, Gibbons, and Low were made organists of the Chapel-Royal. Cook became master of the children, and to Lawes was assigned the office of clerk of the cheque. Rogers, a pleasing composer both of sacred and secular music, was appointed to the place of organist of Eton; Wilson, author of some very agreeable part-songs, or glees, to a situation in Westminster Abbey; and Bryne was made organist of St. Paul's Cathedral.[4] The two universities were anxious to promote the study of church music, and, in furtherance of this object, a book was published at Oxford, in 1661, by Low, under the title of "Some Short Directions for the Performance of Cathedral Service," and reprinted three years after, with a preface, stating that the versicles and responses given by him were the same as those composed by Marbeck at the Reformation.[1]

By these and other efficient measures the different choirs in the kingdom were soon filled with persons more or less competent to the duties of the church; but, as was to be expected, the King's Chapel took the lead, and was distinguished from all the rest, both by the great and acknowledged superiority of its officers, and by the number of excellent composers which almost immediately arose out of it: for, so well were the children of the chapel, or boy-choristers, instructed in music, that some of them, even before their voices had changed, produced anthems which are still esteemed and in use. Pepys, in his Diary, speaks of a new anthem, for five voices, which he heard at the Royal Chapel in 1663, "made by one of Captain Cook's boys, a pretty boy;" "and they say," he adds, "there are four or five of them that can do as much."[2]

Cook, to whose devotedness to the duties of his office the church is indebted for some of its best musicians, had been a chorister in the chapel of Charles I. During the civil war he joined the royal army, in which he held a captain's commission, and ever after retained his military title. Pepys makes favorable mention of him as a singer in the King's Chapel, and also of some "new musique" by him, performed in that place.[3] We have no means of judging of his ability as a composer, for not one of his productions is extant: we can only estimate his merit by that of his pupils, whose works lead us to suppose that their master must have possessed great knowledge of his art, and no less skill and zeal in communicating it. Among those who received their musical education in the Chapel-Royal under Cook, it would be an act of injustice to him not to name Pelham Humphrey, Michael Wise, John Blow, and Henry Purcell.

Pelham Humphrey composed anthems for the Chapel-Royal while a boy in the choir. This early manifestation of genius induced Charles II. to send him to Paris, to study under the celebrated Lulli, and on his return he was admitted a gentleman of the chapel. On the death of his master, Captain Cook, he succeeded him, but lived only two years to enjoy his office. In Dr. Boyce's Collection are several anthems by Humphrey; besides which he contributed much to the secular publications of the day. Michael Wise, whose anthems are still the delight of all who have any taste for English church music, became organist of Salisbury Cathedral soon after quitting the Royal Chapel, and returned to the latter as one of the gentlemen. He was a favorite of Charles II.; but in one of the royal progresses offended the king by an act of indiscretion, and was for a time suspended from his office. Genius and prudence are not always in alliance; and this very elegant composer lost his life in a street-quarrel in 1687. John Blow, on whom Archbishop Sancroft conferred the degree of Doctor in Music, was one of the boy-composers alluded to by Pepys. He soon obtained appointments in the Royal Chapel as gentleman, master of the children, and composer. He was also organist of Westminster Abbey. His compositions, both for the church and chamber, are very numerous; some few of the former are vigorous, dignified, and original; the rest are harsh, and, though labored, often incorrect. He published a volume of secular music under the title of Amphion Anglicus, in which are a song and a duet that still are heard with pleasure.[1] Except these, its contents are now forgotten. Blow, however, like his master, had many pupils in the King's Chapel who soon distinguished themselves by their talents, and to those much of the reputation of their teacher must be ascribed.

The works of Henry Purcell form a part of our national wealth: they far surpass every thing of the kind that England had before produced, and several of them yet continue unrivaled by any musician of British birth. Indeed, when compared with the cotemporaneous productions of Italy, Germany, and France, Dr. Burney does not hesitate to consider Purcell's superior to all—to those of Carissimi, Stradella, Alessandro Scarlatti, Keiser, Lulli, and Rameau.[2] But the historian might have gone further without risking his critical credit, and have included every composer who preceded our countryman, as well as those of his own time; for, "take him for all in all," he had no equal up to the period of his decease. Much of his sacred music reaches a very high degree of excellence, especially his grand Te Deum and Jubilate, as well as some anthems printed in Boyce's collection; but his great power is shown in his secular compositions, particularly those for the theater, which display an originality in design, an energy and tenderness in expression, and a beauty in effect, which are as much the admiration of modern connoisseurs as they were of those at the close of the seventeenth century. Purcell's music, however, was not faultless; but his errors were those of the age in which he lived, and he was probably led into them by submission to custom, the influence of which few have the courage to defy. This great genius was born in Westminster, in 1658. His father was one of the gentlemen of the Chapel-Royal, in which school Henry was, as before stated, educated.[3] At the early age of eighteen he was made organist of Westminster Abbey, and six years after was appointed to the same situation in the King's Chapel. He died in 1695, in his thirty-seventh year, and was interred in the north transept of the abbey, where a tablet to his memory, with the well-known inscription attributed to Dryden, was placed by the Lady Elizabeth Howard.

[1] The song is set to Waller's words, "It is not that I love you less;" and is republished in the first vol. of the Musical Library. The duet "Go, perjured man," from Herrick's Hesperides, originated in the following circumstance:—Charles II. admired a duet by Carissimi, and asked Blow if he could imitate it? The young musician modestly answered that he would try; and produced, in the same measure and key, the ingenious composition in question.—See Hawkins, iv. 448.

[3] It seems past all doubt that Purcell was indebted to Captain Cook for his musical education; though to Dr. Blow, from whom he received a few lessons, the merit of instructing him has most unfairly been ascribed.

Whether arising from a taste for superior harmony, or from an anti-puritan spirit, it is impossible now to determine, but it clearly appears that cathedral music was in high favor with the educated and upper classes at the period of the Restoration. Both Evelyn and Pepys seem to have been constant attendants at Whitehall Chapel—at that time the Chapel-Royal—which Charles regularly frequented, who certainly gave great encouragement to the composers on the establishment, as well as to those who aspired to what then was an honorable and comparatively profitable appointment. But the king's predilection for French customs was apparent even in his place of worship: he there introduced his band of twenty-four violins, modeled after that of Louis XIV., though there is reason to suppose that, from some cause unexplained, he soon withdrew them.[1] Evelyn speaks in angry terms of this royal attempt. In his Diary, under date December 21, 1662, he says that at the Chapel-Royal, "instead of the ancient, grave, and solemn wind-music accompanying the organ, was introduced a concert of twenty-four violins between every pause, after the French fantastical light way, better suiting a tavern or a play-house than a church. This was the first time of change; and now we heard no more the cornet, which gave life to the organ, that instrument quite left off, in which the English were so skillful."[2] At that time, says Hawkins, "it was very common for persons of rank to resort, in the afternoon, to St. Paul's, to hear the service, particularly the anthem; and to attend a lady thither was esteemed as much an act of politeness as it would be now to lead her to the opera."[3] The brave Admiral Edward Montague, first earl of Sandwich, who so heroically lost his life in the great naval engagement at Solebay, in 1672, was a composer of church music. Pepys mentions, in terms of praise, an anthem by this gallant officer, written for the use of the Royal Chapel, in 1663:[4] and we shall presently show that other noblemen, his cotemporaries, were deeply learned in the science of music.

The efforts made to raise the art from its fallen state were not confined to the music of the church. At Oxford an association was formed of many of the heads of houses, fellows and others, to promote the study and practice of vocal and instrumental harmony in the university: the music-school was refurnished with a new organ, harpsichord, and violins, together with the works, in manuscript, of the best composers.[5] In London, the first assembly deserving the name of a concert was of a most remarkable kind, having been projected and established by a person of the lowest class, in a remote part of the town, difficult of access, unfit for the resort of persons of condition, and in a room that scarcely afforded them decent accommodation when they had escaped the dangers of reaching it. "It was in the dwelling of Thomas Britton—one who gained a livelihood by selling about the streets small-coal, which he carried in a sack on his back—that a periodical performance of music in parts took place, to which were invited people of the first consequence. The house was in Aylesbury-street, Clerkenwell; the room of performance was over the coal-shop; and, strange to tell! Tom Britton's concert was the weekly resort of the old, the young, the gay, and the fair, of all ranks, including the highest order of nobility."[1] Music-houses were soon opened in different parts of the metropolis, but chiefly in the east. Among these was Sadler's Wells, which, rebuilt, and in a very different form, still resounds with song.

One of the immediate consequences of the Restoration was the opening of the theaters, where music, in various shapes, always formed a part of the performance. Purcell's admirable compositions, however, did not grace the stage till after the Revolution; but Matthew Lock's music to Macbeth, as the tragedy was altered by Davenant, was produced in 1674. Of this, considering the state of the orchestra at the time it was written, we can scarcely speak too highly; the irrefragable proof of its intrinsic merit is that, through all the fluctuations of taste, during so long a period, it has never lost its power to please, and is as fresh and charming to the present age as to that which witnessed its birth. Lock wrote the music for the public entry of Charles II., to whom he became the composer in ordinary, in which capacity he produced a service and some few anthems. He also composed the music to Shadwell's opera, Psyche; and his name appears to many songs, &c., in the collections of the day. It is to be lamented that a man of so much genius should have put himself forward as the principal antagonist of a clever and feasible plan proposed by the Reverend Thomas Salmon, M.A., a good mathematician, and among the original contributors to the publications of the Royal Society, for reducing the clefs to one—an improvement of incalculable value, had it been adopted at the time, but which was too successfully opposed by blind prejudice and narrow-mindedness. Lock commenced life as a Protestant, but became a convert to the Romish communion; was then appointed organist to Catherine of Portugal, consort of Charles; and died a papist in 1677.

On the death of Laniere,[2] who lived some years

At these concerts Dr. Pepusch, and frequently Handel, played the harpsichord: Mr. Needler, accountant-general of the Excise, Hughes the poet, Woolaston the painter, and many other amateurs, were among the performers. Walpole, in his Anecdotes of Painting, says that Britton latterly took money from his visitors, but Sir John Hawkins, on the authority of "a very ancient person now living" (in 1776), denies this most unequivocally.

after the Restoration, Lock received the appointment of director of the king's music, with a salary of £200; and in this office he was succeeded by Cambert, a French composer, who produced an English opera, and introduced some improvements in violin music. He was followed by Lewis Grabut, also a French musician, who set Dryden's Albion and Albanius, and in the poet's preface is much complimented. This piece, a satire on Lord Shaftesbury, failed, because, Downes tells us, it was brought out on the very day when the Duke of Monmouth landed in the west.[1] But an inspection of the printed score of the opera is alone sufficient to account for its ill success.[2]

Toward the close of Charles's reign whatever was French became unpopular, the music of that nation among other things, and the productions of Italy began to be fashionable. Roger North, in a manuscript Memoir of Music, speaks at large of an Italian, Nicola Matteis, "an excellent musician, who performed wonderfully on the violin," and who seems, by his example and publications, to have much improved the practice of that instrument in this country.

Charles II. had some knowledge of music. Sir J. Hawkins tells us that "He understood the notes, and sang—to use the expression of one who had often sung with him—a plump base. In a letter to Bennet, afterward Earl of Arlington, dated Bruges, 1655, he says, Pray get me pricked down as many corrants and sarrabands and other little dances as you can, and bring them down with you, for I have got a small fiddler that does not play ill on the fiddle."[3] From this we are led to conclude that his taste in music was not of a very refined description. But many of the nobility during his reign were skillful in the art, and some very learned in the science. Among these Sir Francis North, chief justice of the Common Pleas, and subsequently lord keeper of the great seal, published "A Philosophical Essay of Music, 1677," a work which justly entitles him to be considered as the father of musical philosophy in England. It would appear that his delineation of the harmonical vibrations of strings was adopted by Euler, in his Tentamen novæ theoræ Musicæ. His brother, Roger North, above mentioned, says that he had "an exquisite hand on the lyra and bass-viol, and sang any thing at sight: that he turned composer, and from raw beginnings advanced so far as to complete divers concertos of two and three parts," &c.[4]

Lord Brouncker, the first president of the Royal Society, translated and published, in 1653, Descartes's Musicæ Compendium, "with necessary and judicious animadversions thereon," the latter displaying a thorough knowledge of the subject, geometrically considered, and correcting some of the erroneous views of the French philosopher. The preface to this work, in the form of an address from "The Stationer to the ingenious Reader," is a literary curiosity. The writer's notion of the qualifications of a "complete musician" never has been and never can be realized.

Marsh, bishop of Ferns, and afterward archbishop of Armagh, was one of the first to treat the theory of acoustics methodically.[1] Anthony Wood says that he was well skilled in the practical part of music, and, while principal of Alban Hall, had weekly concerts in his apartments.[2]

The eminent mathematician, John Wallis, D.D., a king's chaplain, and one of the founders of the Royal Society, published, in 1682, an edition of Ptolemy's Harmonics, with notes and a very learned appendix, in which ancient and modern music are compared, and the near resemblance of the modes and scales is clearly demonstrated. He was also the author of many papers, in the Philosophical Transactions on musical subjects. John Birchensha,[3] Thomas Mace,[4] Christopher Simpson,[5] and John Playford,[6] also published practical treatises on the art, which contributed to its improvement in this country.

The popular English songs, ballads, &c., of this period are certainly not inferior to the cotemporary productions of any foreign country, while some few of them possess never-fading beauties;[7] though, from the return of the "Frenchified Charles" up to the Revolution (and indeed long after), the tide of fashion set strong against the productions of British composers. Our national anthem, as it is called, "God save the King," had its birth, there is reason to believe, in the reign of James II.;[8] and the air "Lilliburlero," which Bishop Burnet says "the whole army and all the people, both in city and country, were perpetually singing,"[9] is still a favorite with the multitude, though the original words are forgotten, and all political feelings connected with it died away soon after James's abdication.

James II. was too much absorbed in his arbitrary and religious designs to have either leisure or inclination to think of the fine arts; music, therefore, continued stationary during his brief reign, and until the settlement of public affairs after the Revolution restored tranquillity to the public mind.

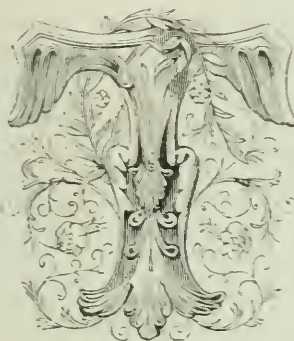
CHAPTER VI.

THE HISTORY OF MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.



HERE is not much for us to chronicle in the way of novelty in the household furniture of this period. The famous manufactory of Gobelin tapestry was established in France in 1677, and specimens of it soon appeared on the walls of our palaces and of the mansions of our nobility. Turkey carpets were advertised for sale in 1660; but they were still used for covering tables more than floors; matting of various colors, and rushes, being more generally employed for the latter purpose.

Oilcloth was now known and made in England. In the "Mercurius Politicus" for February 2d, 1660, is the following advertisement:—"Upon Ludgate Hill, at the Sun and Rainbow, dwelleth one Richard Bailey, who maketh oilcloth the German way; and is also very skillful in the art of oiling of linen cloth, taffeta, woolen, &c., so as to make it impenetrable that no wet or weather can enter."

The form of the chairs remained much the same as in the last period; the backs were rather higher, and, as well as the seats, occasionally composed of cane. In Mr. Shaw's work on furniture the artist will find a succession of them. Tables, cabinets, wardrobes, clock-cases, &c., about this time begin to exhibit that beautiful workmanship still known by the name of Marqueterie, from its inventor, a M. Marquet.

The magnificent carved and gilt furniture commonly called "à la Louis Quatorze," which has never gone wholly out of fashion in England, and during the last few years has become again the rage, made its appearance toward the close of the seventeenth century, but did not come into general use till after the accession of Louis XV. in France, and of Queen Anne in England. Our specimen of it will, therefore, be reserved for our next notice of this subject.

The great change that took place in the female costume of the reign of Charles II. was confined almost entirely to the dress of the upper classes. Citizen's wives and countrywomen continued to wear the high-crowned hat, the French hood, the laced stomacher, and the yellow-starched neckerchief. In the play of "The Blind Lady," printed in 1661, a serving-man says to a lady's maid, "You had once better opinions of me, though you now wash every day your best handkerchief in yellow starch." The beauties of the court of Charles II., however, and those whose rank or fortune enables them to follow the fashion of the day, discarded the strait-laced dresses with the strait-laced manners of their puritanical predecessors; and, although the voluptuous paintings of Sir Peter Lely represent in general rather more of a fanciful costume than the exact dress of the day, bare necks and arms, and full and flowing draperies, and trains of the richest satins and velvets, form the entirely new and characteristic features of the female habits of this licentious period. A work published at this time by a Non-conformist divine is entitled "A Just and Seasonable Reprehension of the enormity of Naked Breasts and Shoulders," and contains an indignant censure of the long trains of the ladies.

which are spoken of as "a monstrous superfluity of cloth of silk that must be dragged after them."

For the minutiæ of female fashions we can not do better than quote, in chronological order, some passages from the veracious diaries of Evelyn and Pepys.

The former remarks, May 11th, 1654, "I now observed how the women began to paint themselves, formerly a most ignominious thing, and used only by prostitutes;" and in 1660, Pepys speaks of "the Princess Henrietta" (sister of Charles II.), "with her hair frizzed up to her ears." Black patches were also worn by ladies as early as this date. Mrs. Pepys wore one "by permission," November 4th, 1660.

Perukes appear to have been adopted first by the ladies; for, under the date of 1662, Pepys records, "By-and-by came La Belle Pierce to see my wife, and bring her a pair of peruques of hair as the fashion now is for ladies to wear, which are pretty, and one of my wife's own hair, or else I should not endure them." In April following we find "petticoats of sarcenet with a broad, black lace printed round the bottom and before," mentioned as a new fashion, and one that found favor in the eyes of Mrs. Pepys. On the 30th of May, in the same year, the court was astonished by the monstrous fardingales or "guard-infantas" of the newly-arrived Queen Catherine of Braganza and her ladies, the Portuguese having not yet abandoned those monstrosities. "Her majesty's foretop" is also described by Evelyn "as long and turned aside very strangely."

In 1663, Pepys tells us that vizards had of late become a great fashion among the ladies, and he bought one for his wife accordingly.

Under the date of July 13th, 1663, we have the following graphic account of the appearance of the queen and court riding in Hyde Park: "By-and-by the king and the queen, who looked in this dress (a white-laced waistcoat and a crimson short petticoat, and her hair dressed à la negligence) mighty pretty, and the king rode hand-in-hand with her. Here was also my Lady Castlemaine rode among the rest of the ladies; she looked mighty out of humor, and had a yellow plume in her hat (which all took notice of), and yet is very handsome. . . . . . I followed them up into Whitehall and into the queen's presence, where all the ladies walked, talking and fiddling with their hats and feathers, and changing and trying one another's by one another's heads, and laughing. . . . . But, above all, Mrs. Stewart, in her dress, with her hat cocked and a red plume, with her sweet eye, little, Roman nose, and excellent taille, is now the greatest beauty I ever saw, I think, in my life." Silver-lace gowns are mentioned by the same authority as a revived fashion in 1664; and yellow bird's-eye hoods were in vogue May 10th, 1665.

The riding-habits of the ladies were, as usual, fashioned after the garb of the other sex. In 1666 Mr. Pepys says, "Walking in the galleries at Whitehall, I find the ladies of honor dressed in their riding garbs with coats and doublets with deep skirts, just for all the world like men, and buttoned their doublets up the breast, with periwigs and with hats. So that, only for a long petticoat dragging under their men's coats, nobody could take them for women in any point whatever; which was an odd sight, and a sight that did not please me. It was Mrs. Wells and another fine lady that I saw thus."

Evelyn also says, September 13th, 1666, "The queen was now in her cavalier riding-habit, hat, and feather, and horseman's coat, going to take the air."

In 1669 we first hear of the sac, or sacque, "My wife," says Pepys, "this day (March 2d) put on first her French gown called a sac, which becomes her very well."

During the short reign of James II. some of the fashions which characterized the accession of William and Mary began to appear, but they will be fully described in our next notice of this subject.

The reign of Charles II. presents us with three distinct fashions of male costume, with their several varieties. The first is to be seen in the curious original painting at Goodrich Court of the triumphal entry of Charles II. into London at his restoration, and in the print of his procession through Westminster, engraved in Ogilvy's work on the coronation of this king. It is described by Randal Holmes, whose notes on dress, in the Harleian Library, were written at this period. Under the date of 1659 he gives the following description of a gentleman's dress: — "A short-waisted doublet and petticoat breeches; the lining, being lower than the breeches, is tied above the knees; the breeches are ornamented with ribbons up to the pocket, and half their breadth upon the thigh: the waistband is set about with ribbons, and the shirt hanging out over them." The hat was high-crowned, and ornamented with a plume of feathers. Beneath the knee hung long, drooping lace ruffles, and a rich falling-collar of lace, with a cloak hung carelessly over the shoulders. High-heeled shoes, tied with ribbons, completed the costume of the English gallant. The hair was again worn very long, and flowing in natural ringlets on the shoulders; and to such an extent did this fashion obtain, that in 1664 the ample periwig or peruke was introduced from the court of Louis XIV., no natural English head of hair being sufficiently luxuriant. The minute Pepys informs us that the Duke of York first put on a periwig on the 5th of February, 1664, and that he saw the king in one for the first time on the 18th of April following. About the same period the crown of the hat was lowered, and the feathers laid upon the brim.

The first great change in costume took place in 1666, when the king declared, in council, his design of adopting a certain habit which he was resolved never to alter! It consisted of a long, close vest of black cloth or velvet, pinked with white satin; a loose surcoat or tunic over it, of an oriental character; and, instead of shoes and stockings, buskins or brodequins: and on the 18th of October, says Evelyn, the king put on his new dress "solemnly." Pepys says, under the date of the day before—"The court is all full of vests, only my Lord St. Albans (Jermyn) not pinked, but plain black; and they say the king says the pinking on white makes them look too much like magpies, so hath bespoke one of plain velvet."

Randal Holmes, in his Accedence of Armory, gives us a rude figure of a vest in one of his diagrams, and a detailed description of it in the text, as follows:— "He beareth argent a vest azure, lined sable. This was the form of the Russian ambassador's loose coat when he came first to England, shortly after Charles II.'s return from exile, which garb was so taken to that it became a great fashion and wear both in court, city, and country. The several parts of the fashion are these:—The vest, a side-deep, loose coat, almost to the feet, with short sleeves. The tunic, a close-bodied coat, the skirts being down to the knees. The sash, the girdle by which the tunic was tied to the body, so called because it hath a round button and tassel hanging at the end of it. The zone is a girdle of silk without buttons and tassel, which is tied in a long knot before."

Evelyn tells us that divers courtiers and gentlemen gave the king gold, by way of wager that he would not persist in his resolution of wearing this peculiar habit, and of course they must have won their bet, for the fashion does not appear to have lasted two years, its abandonment being accelerated perhaps by the insolence of Louis XIV. and his courtiers, who, in contempt of Charles, put all their servants into his newly-fancied costume. The only representation we remember to have met with of an English gentleman so attired is the portrait of Henry Bennett, earl of Arlington, published by Mr. Lodge in his Collection of Illustrious Personages, and which, from the appearance of the broad and richly-embroidered shoulder-belt, introduced, according to Pepys, in 1668, we must presume was executed just before the change of fashion.

The vest, however, seems to have originated the long square-cut coat which succeeded it, and the tunic the waistcoat, nearly as long, which was worn under the coat, and almost entirely concealed the breeches. The sleeves of the coat came no farther than the elbows, where they were turned back and formed a large cuff, those of the shirt bulging forth from beneath, ruffled at the wrist and adorned profusely with ribbons. Both coat and waistcoat had buttons and button-holes all the way down the front. The stiff band and falling-collar were superseded by a neckcloth or cravat of Brussels or Flanders lace tied with ribbons under the chin, the ends hanging down square; and the broad hat, which had already been turned up, or "cocked" behind, in 1667,[1] was sometimes entirely surrounded by short feathers, which fell curling over the brim. A round hat, with a very small brim, ornamented with a cockade or favor, appears in the print of the funeral of General Monk, 1670; and the marble statue of that celebrated general in Winchester Cathedral presents him to us in something like the jockey-cap which is now worn by the royal state-footmen, trumpeters, watermen, &c. Small buckles, instead of shoe-strings, were worn by Charles II., in 1666, when he assumed the fanciful dress before mentioned; but the shoe-buckle, as known to us at present, appears to have been introduced about 1680. It was not general, however, till the reign of Anne.

The fashions of the later years of Charles II. continued, with little variation, during the short reign of his brother James. The brims of the hats were frequently turned up on both sides; and each gallant cocked his hat according to his own fancy, or after the style of some leader of fashion. One mode was called the Monmouth cock, after the unfortunate Duke of Monmouth.

Defensive armor was now falling into disuse. The statute of the 13 and 14 Car. II., c. 3, orders the defensive arms of the cavalry to consist simply of a back and breast-piece and a pot helmet; the breast and pot to be pistol-proof. The offensive arms were to be a sword and a case of pistols, the barrels of which were not to be under fourteen inches in length. For the foot, a musketeer is ordered to have a musket, the barrel not under three feet in length, a collar of bandeliers, and a sword. Pikemen are to be armed with a pike made of ash, not under sixteen feet in length, with a back, breast, head-piece, and sword.

Officers wore the helmet, with a corslet or cuirass, and sometimes only a large gorget over the buff coat.

The bayonet was invented in this reign, at Bayonne, whence its name. It was sometimes three-edged, sometimes flat, with a wooden hilt like a dagger, and was screwed or merely stuck into the muzzle of the gun. Numbers may be seen disposed in fanciful shapes in the armory at the Tower, and the guard-rooms at St. James's, Hampton Court, &c. The bandelier was superseded, toward the close of Charles's reign, by a cartridge-box of tin, strongly recommended by Lord Orrery.

The names of regiments as they still exist in the British army were first given in this reign. The Coldstream Foot Guards date their formation from 1660, when two regiments were added to the one raised about ten years previously by General Monk, at Coldstream, on the borders of Scotland. To these were added the 1st Royal Scots, brought over from France at the Restoration. The Life Guards were raised in 1661; the Blues, called Oxford Blues, from their first commander, Aubrey, earl of Oxford, in the same year; also the 2d, or Queen's (foot). The 3d, or Old Buffs, so called from their accoutrements being formed of buffalo leather, were raised in 1665; the Scotch Fusileers (now 21st Foot), so called from their carrying the fusil, a lighter firelock than the musket, in 1678. In this year we learn from Evelyn that grenadiers were first brought into our service: they were so called, he says, "because they were dextrous at flinging hand-grenades, every one having a pouchful; they had furred caps with coped crowns, like Janizaries, which made them look very fierce; and some had long hoods hanging down behind, as we picture fools; their clothing being likewise piebald, yellow and red." In 1680, the 4th, or the King's Own, were raised.

James II. added to the British cavalry the 1st, or King's regiment of Dragoon Guards, June 6th, 1685; and the 2d, or Queen's Dragoon Guards, in the same year: to the infantry also, in 1685, the 5th and 7th regiments (the latter called the Royal Fusileers); and in 1688, the 23d, or Welsh Fusileers.

The peculiarities of demeanor and outward appearance by which the English Puritans of the seventeenth century were distinguished took their rise no doubt, in the main, from the principles they held in religion and morals, which were in a high degree rigid, austere, and enthusiastic, and naturally produced a corresponding severity of manners, and a disregard of, and contempt for, many things which were generally reckoned among the tempering and softening influences, or at least the agreeable decorations, of social life. But part of their sternness or sourness may also be attributed to the spirit of contradiction excited by the prevalence of the opposite temper among their opponents; just as the excessive levity and recklessness of the Cavaliers, on the other hand, was in part provoked by their disgust at the demureness, and, as they deemed it, hypocritical sanctimoniousness of the Puritans and Roundheads. The two parties were separated from each other, in all their ways and habits, by feelings of mutual aversion.

The Cavaliers ruffled in gay clothing, rich lace, and jewelry, and the Puritans could not find garments sufficiently sad in color and homely in cut. The royalists were almost as much devoted to the dressing of their long hair and the curling of their love-locks, as to the crown which they fought to uphold; and, therefore, the Puritans shore their hair so close to the skull that their ears stood out in strong relief, while their naked countenances were rendered more grim and ghastly. So particular were the latter party in regard to these ridiculous externals, that they looked upon their brethren who were so unfortunate as to have ruddy cheeks as very doubtful characters; and even the brave and faithful Hutchinson was considered as a lukewarm adherent, because he dressed well and wore long hair.[1] Upon the same principle of separation from the worldlings, the Puritans affected a slowness of speech that frequently ended in drawling, and a solemnity of tone that often degenerated into a snuffle or nasal twang, while their talk, even upon the most ordinary occasions, was liberally dovetailed with texts of Scripture. Music and dancing, merry-meetings and festivals, and all sports and games, whether out-door or domestic, were classed with the excesses of drinking healths, brawling, and profane swearing, as unworthy of Christians, and meriting the most unqualified condemnation.

The Puritans, however, were not so ignorant as not to know that men must have social excitement, even though they should only meet to groan; and they endeavored to extract from religious observances a compensation for their unsparing proscription of all ordinary amusements. The church-bell was their harp and cittern, and psalms were their roundelays; the mustering of the congregation sufficed them for a merry-meeting; and nothing that Shakspeare ever penned was equal, in their eyes, to a sermon of length and pith, that soared to the highest heights, or plunged into the deepest abysms of theology. This last enjoyment was their feast of fat things; and the Puritan clergy were not slow in feeding their congregations to the full. Besides unriddling those mysteries which reason can not fathom, and expatiating largely upon those spiritual joys and terrors that never fail to excite an audience, they stimulated the people with political sermons, in which "the good old cause" was glorified, the measures of state canvassed, the news of the past week detailed, and the events of the next anticipated, or even prophesied. The eager congregation hung upon the lips of such a preacher; they projected their heads, and put their hands behind their ears, and bent them forward, that they might not lose a single word: some took down the sermon in short-hand; and at those passages which were particularly gratifying the audience expressed their delight by a loud buzzing hum.[1] Sometimes the preacher, when he meant to give a very vigorous sermon, prepared for action in the pulpit by throwing off his cloak, after which he laid about him like a thresher; and this was called "taking pains."[2] On some occasions, too, the orator would enliven his auditory by what was intended for a stroke of wit: in this case he would select a text that bore some whimsical or unexpected allusion to his subject; and thus the congregation were electrified into a sudden grin. The popular Hugh Peters was the most celebrated of these ecclesiastical buffos, and it is said he was much indebted for his success to his experience as a player before he became a divine.[3]

The devotedness of the Puritans to Scripture language was so strong, that the names which they selected for their children in baptism were either expressive of a Christian quality, or proper names taken from the Old Testament, while those that in any way savored of paganism or popery were lothingly rejected. Many of them even held, besides, that the Scriptures were so full and express upon every subject, that every thing must be necessarily sinful which was not enjoined there.[4] War itself, as well as politics, was attempted to be carried on upon Scripture principles; and men who fought with the musket and cannon were drilled, exhorted, and led on, as if they wielded lamps and pitchers, or pebbles and slings. A curious instance of this veneration for the Old Testament mode of warfare was exhibited in the trial of Colonel Fiennes for his cowardly surrender of Bristol. He declared before the court-martial that he had surrendered the town because it was untenable; but he was told that, in this case, he should have fortified himself in the citadel—even as did the men of Thebez, who betook themselves to their tower, when their city was taken by Abimelech, the son of Gideon. Who knew, it was added, but that some women of Bristol, after the example of her of Thebez, might have thrown down a piece of a mill-stone, or a tile that would have broken Prince Rupert's skull?[1] Heresy in a soldier was also to the full as great a crime in the eyes of the Puritans as cowardice itself: on one occasion an officer, for having speculated too freely on the nature of sin, had his sword broken over his head by sentence of a court-martial.

But the Puritans were not the only fanatics of this period of religious and political excitement. When the crawling and foot-licking age of loyalty succeeded, with the Restoration, there was exhibited by right reverend and most learned prelates a fanaticism less fervid indeed, but far more profane and mischievous, than that of the Commonwealth —and God, the Church, and the King, became their Trinity, while it was hard to tell which person of the three was the most devoutly worshiped. Then, too, the duties of non-resistance and passive obedience were inculcated as the golden rule of Christian practice, while opposition to monarchy was represented as a crime in which, if the sinner died, his salvation was hopeless. In the same way, Charles and his brother were fanatics, who vibrated to the very last between their confessors and their mistresses; and those gay and guilty courtiers were fanatics, who, even amid their excesses, would sometimes fast and pray, and be visited by superstitious impulses more ridiculous than the worst that have been fabled of Cromwell himself.

The unfortunate peculiarities of manner by which the Puritans were distinguished obscured the noble moral qualities they unquestionably possessed; and the majority of the nation soon became heartily tired of the gloom and constraint of the Commonwealth. The reaction of feeling, therefore, with which the restoration of the monarchy was welcomed was an absolute national frenzy. When Charles arrived, bonfires were kindled in such multitudes in the metropolis, that fourteen blazed between St. Dunstan's and Temple Bar, and thirty-one could be seen at once at the Strand Bridge. The populace set up their old May-poles; rung the church-bells; paraded rumps in derision, which afterward they providently roasted and ate; drank the king's health upon their knees in the streets; and broke the windows of Praise-God Barebones.

[1] State Trials, vol. iv. p 274.

Determined, also, that their military saviors should not go unrewarded, they made the soldiers of Monk happy after the popular fashion, by plying them with strong liquors, so that they were drunk every day.[1] The reign of the saints was at an end: they stole into corners, too happy to escape notice, amid the general confusion.

In this temper of the public mind the Restoration brought with it a tide not only of levity but of licentiousness—an inundation of all the debauchery of the French court, in which Charles and his followers had chiefly spent their exile. The strangest scenes were exhibited in the Duchess of Portsmouth's dressing-room, where Evelyn saw this worthless Cleopatra in her loose morning-garment, as she had newly got out of bed, while his majesty and the court gallants were standing about her. In some other points Charles's domestic habits were also very singular. His especial favorites were little spaniels, of a breed that still retains his name: to these he was so much attached, that he not only suffered them to follow him everywhere, but even to litter and nurse their brood in his bed-chamber; on account of which the room, and, indeed, the whole court, was filthy and offensive.[2] Court language was in no better taste. Charles, in quarreling with Lady Castlemaine, called her a jade, and she, in return, called him a fool; and the first English phrase which the queen learned, and which she applied to her husband, was, "You lie!"[3] The levity of the court is strikingly exemplified in the anecdote told by Pepys, that on the evening of that day of national disgrace, when the Dutch fleet had blocked up the mouth of the Thames and burned the English shipping, Charles was supping with Lady Castlemaine at the Duchess of Monmouth's, where the company diverted themselves with—hunting a moth![4] Matters were not mended when the king repaired to the council: he could not even affect a decent show of interest in public affairs, and, instead of attending to the business in hand, he would play with his favorite dog.[5]

Sanctioned and encouraged by the royal example, the upper classes now resumed, with double ardor, various immoral practices which Puritanism had held in check. Swearing, which during the Commonwealth had been punished by a fine,[6] and profligate conversation, were now so prevalent, that a young nobleman or man of family was accounted "no gentleman, nor person of any honor, that had not, in two hours' sitting, invented some new modish oath, or found out the late intrigue between the Lord B. and the Lady P., laughed at the fopperies of priests, and made lampoons and drolleries on the sacred Scriptures themselves."[7] The lives of Buckingham, Rochester, and Sedley show how fearlessly all common decency could be set at naught; while their writings evince how talent was employed, among the highest ranks, in bedizening the carrion carcass and rouging the yellow cheek of the foul goddess they had set up. Pride of birth had hitherto been a characteristic of the English aristocracy, which made them solicitous for stainless and becoming alliances; but, now, royal and noble concubines and worthless actresses became the patronesses, and even the wives, of the highest nobility. Gaming, also, in the absence of nobler excitements, became a fashionable frenzy, so that a noble house was incomplete without a basset-table; and, in the turning of a die or a card, such sums disappeared as nothing but the leveling of whole forests could supply.[1] In this way, Lord Caernarvon's definition may be said to have been practically adopted by many great landed proprietors:—"Wood—an excrescence of the earth, provided by God for the payment of debts." The court ladies, as might be expected, were not proof against the examples of a profligate king and equally dissolute nobility; and they became so equivocal in character that few cared to venture the selection of a wife from among them.[2] Some of their frolics, too, were as coarse and as wild as those of the other sex. A choice specimen in this way was the exploit of Mrs. Jenyngs, a maid of honor, afterward Duchess of Tyrconnel. She dressed herself like an orange-wench, and cried oranges about the streets. On occasions of public rejoicing ladies and gentlemen threw fireworks at the crowd, or at one another, and burned each other in sport; they also smutted each other's faces with candle-grease and soot, "till most of them were like devils." Gentlemen, too, dressed themselves like ladies, and ladies disguised themselves like gentlemen, clapping periwigs upon their heads.[3]

A spirit of licentiousness is generally combined with cruelty and recklessness of life; and the rage for dueling during the reign of Charles II. had increased beyond all former precedent, so that fatal encounters were of daily occurrence from the worst of causes or for no cause at all. An atrocious instance was that of the duel fought between the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Shrewsbury: the duke, after having wronged the earl in "the nicest point," encountered and slew his injured antagonist, the countess standing by the while in the disguise of a page, and holding the horse of her paramour, after whose victory she welcomed with open arms the blood-stained murderer of her husband. Another specimen of a different character is detailed by that prince of gossips, the lively Pepys, in a passage so dramatic, and so illustrative of the manners of the age, as to deserve being quoted at length. "Here Creed did tell us," he says, "the story of the duel last night, in Covent Garden, between Sir H. Bellasses and Tom Porter. It is worth remembering the silliness of the quarrel, and is a kind of emblem of the general complexion of this whole kingdom at present. The two dined yesterday at Sir Robert Carr's, where, it seems, people do drink high, all that come. It happened that these two, the greatest friends in the world, were talking together; and Sir H. Bellasses talked a little louder than ordinary to Tom Porter, giving of him some advice. Some of the company standing by said, What, are they quarreling, that they talk so high? Sir H. Bellasses, hearing it, said, No, says he, I would have you know I never quarrel, but I strike; and take that as a rule of mine! How, says Tom Porter, strike? I would I could see the man in England that durst give me a blow! With that, Sir H. Bellasses did give him a box of the ear; and so they were going to fight there, but were hindered. And by-and-by Tom Porter went out, and, meeting Dryden the poet, told him of the business, and that he was resolved to fight Sir H. Bellasses presently, for he knew that, if he did not, they should be friends to-morrow, and then the blow would rest upon him, which he would prevent, and desired Dryden to let him have his boy to bring him notice which way Sir H. Bellasses goes. By-and-by he is informed that Sir H. Bellasses's coach was coming; so Tom Porter went down out of the coffee-house, where he stayed for the tidings, and stopped the coach, and bade Sir H. Bellasses come out. Why, says H. Bellasses, you will not hurt me coming out, will you? No, says Tom Porter. So, out he went, and both drew: and H. Bellasses having drawn, and flung away his scabbard, Tom Porter asked him whether he was ready. The other answering him he was, they fell to fight, some of their acquaintance by. They wounded one another, and H. Bellasses so much, that it is feared he will die; and, finding himself severely wounded, he called to Tom Porter, and kissed him, and bade him shift for himself; for, says he, Tom, thou hast hurt me; but I will make shift to stand upon my legs till thou mayest withdraw, and the world will not take notice of you, for I would not have thee troubled for what thou hast done. And so, whether he did fly or not, I can not tell; but Tom Porter showed H. Bellasses that he was wounded too; and they are both ill, but H. Bellasses to fear of life." The result of this encounter was, that Bellasses died ten days afterward.

Politics had now become in England an important element in the common business of life; and here, too, we find the same spirit and fashions which were predominant everywhere else. The debates of parliament were grown to be so protracted, that many of the members adjourned to refresh themselves at taverns, from which they returned, half-drunk, to finish the discussion. Coffee-houses were the favorite resort of those who wished either to gather or retail the political news of the day. Political clubs were also abundant, where the middle classes attended, and took a share in the discussions, to the great wonderment and wrath of the aristocracy. "Yea," says a Cavalier writer, alluding to these clubs, "they have of late made our citizens statesmen, too, whose business lies quite another way, one would think; every little ale-draper now can tell what the privy council intend to do a month hence, and what the king ought to do. . . . . Very fine, by my troth!"[1] The most noted institution of this kind during the reign of Charles II. was that consisting of the friends of the Earl of Shaftesbury, called the King's Head Club, the members of which met at the King's Head tavern over against the Inner Temple gate; and, that they might not fall foul of each other in the frequent street scuffles of the period, each wore a green ribbon on his hat, from which the club was sometimes called the Green Ribbon Club. As the founders were eager to make proselytes, they freely admitted all strangers, and especially young gentlemen of property newly come to town; and the chief topics they discussed were, the horrors of slavery and popery, and the best means of defending the country from these calamities. This their guardianship over pure religion, however, was not of that lugubrious kind which the Puritans had formerly affected; for the house was double-balconied in the front, "for the clubsters to issue forth in fresco, with hats and no perukes, pipes in their mouths, merry faces, and diluted throats, for the entertainment of the canaglia below."[1] The great Protestant aim of these Shaftesbury politicians was, the exclusion of the Duke of York from the succession; and to enlighten the populace upon the subject of popery in general, they were wont to make huge bonfires, in which the pope and the King of France were burned in effigy. In these popular ovations the puppets were paraded through the streets by tumultuary multitudes, and amid shouts and vociferous clamors that might have woke the dead; after which, they were solemnly committed to the flames, amid volleys of squibs and fireworks.[2]

But it was while Oates and his fellow-witnesses frightened the isle from its propriety with their revelations of plots and conspiracies that the anti-popish horror attained its height. Men walked the streets as if they moved under the paroxysm of a nightmare; they turned a corner as cautiously as if they expected to stumble headlong upon the famous army of Compostella pilgrims. All those, too, who thought themselves of sufficient consequence to be marked by the church of Rome for assassination—and such persons were not few—at length bravely determined not to sit down to be quietly strangled, and have their own swords thrust through their bodies, like Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, and the expedient they adopted was worthy of their valor and the occasion. "There was much recommendation of silk armor, and the prudence of being provided with it against the time that Protestants were to be massacred. And, accordingly, there were abundance of those silken back, breast, and head-pots made and sold, that were pretended to be pistol-proof: in which any man dressed up was as safe as in an house, for it was impossible any one could go to strike him for laughing, so ridiculous was the figure, as they say, of hogs in armor. . . . This was armor of defense; but our sparks were not altogether so tame as to carry their provision no farther; for, truly, they intended to be assailants upon fair occasion, and had, for that end, recommended also to them a certain pocket weapon, which, for its design and efficacy, had the honor to be called a Protestant flail. It was for street and crowd work; and the engine, lurking perdue in a coat pocket, might readily sally out to execution; and so, by clearing a great hall, or piazza, or so, carry an election by a choice way of polling called knocking down. The handle resembled a farrier's blood-stick, and the fall was joined to the end by a strong nervous ligature, that in its swing fell just short of the hand, and was made of lignum vitæ, or, rather, as the poet termed it, mortis."[1]

Quarrels between foreigners of different nations also sometimes enlivened the streets of London. The most remarkable of these disputes was one in 1661, between the French and Spanish ambassadors, upon the ticklish question of precedence. A regular conflict took place in Cheapside between the followers of both, which was carried on so fiercely that all the military, and many of the train-bands, had to be ordered out on the occasion. In anticipation of the affray, the Spaniards had cunningly lined their coach-harness with chains of iron, so that it could not be cut asunder; they had also mounted an armed guard upon each horse, and upon every coach, and by these contrivances they gained the victory, although their adversaries were four to one. A good deal of bloodshed was the consequence, and the crowd huzzaed at the discomfiture of the French.[2] When ambassadors thus belabored each other it was not to be expected that their sacred persons would be always respected by the populace; and, accordingly, in 1683, when the national heat against the United Provinces was at the height, the London mob attacked the Dutch ambassador's carriage, and discharged into it a volley of stones, squibs, and firebrands, by which his lady was dangerously wounded.[3]

The 'prentices, too, were still as turbulent as ever, and ready to brawl against all authorities, to show their love of liberty and pure religion. On one occasion, some of their number, having cudgeled their masters, were set in the pillory; upon which the rest assembled, tore down the pillory, and rescued their companions. The pillory was again set up, and the culprits exposed in it, upon which the fraternity once more demolished it, in reckless defiance of all the power of the law.[4] Then there were furious street encounters between the butchers and the weavers, in which the former were distinguished by their blue or green aprons, and the latter by their sleeves. Even the bear-gardens were not without their feuds and factions. At these places of public amusement, sword-fighting as well as bear-baiting was exhibited; and the spectators sometimes quarreled so fiercely upon the merits of their favorite gladiators, that a single combat would swell into a general pell-mell encounter.[5]

A numerous set of characters that still remain to be noticed chiefly consisted of the younger sons of good families, the heirs of wealthy citizens, and raw young squires from the country—men who lived only for to-day, and knew no happiness or comfort out of London. Most of them, full of the fashionable horror at the remembrance of the days of the Rump, identified liberty of political sentiment with rank rebellion, and confounded monarchy with a sanction for every excess; swearing by the new order of things, and brawling against innovation, without understanding any thing about the matter. These were the "dear hearts," the "heroics," the "honest men,"[1] who, in the time of the civil war, would have joined the Babe-eaters or swelled the ranks of Goring's troopers; but, in this piping time of peace, they showed their loyalty more cheaply by huzzaing for the king, drinking for the king, and breaking the king's peace to prove their love to the king. As refinement was now as common a cant word as loyalty, others set up for wits or geniuses; and, to establish this character, they damned plays, patronized actors, haunted the coffee-houses to which the choicest authors resorted,[2] and repeated the last good saying of Rochester, Sedley, or Dryden. Others, more audacious still, sometimes composed verses on their own account, which they carried about like an infection, and inflicted upon all who had ears to hear. But the most boisterous class were the Scowerers, the legitimate successors of the Roaring Boys and Bonaventors of the former age. These gentlemen scoured the streets during the night in bands, stormed taverns, broke windows, wiped out milk-scores, wrenched off door-knockers, daubed and defaced the gilt signs, routed the apple-merchants, fishmongers, and butter-women, with whose commodities they bestrewed the market-place, attacked and knocked down all chance passengers, or even gave battle to some body of rival scowerers, and generally ended by a conflict with the watch, in which the rioters, after their heads and swords were broken, were carried to the watch-house, and, in the morning, before a magistrate, who, if the offenders were of wealth or worship, dismissed them with a gentle admonishment, that only recruited them for the campaign of the following night.[3]

But gallantry was the grand predominant agent, that, like a chemical spirit, extracted all the folly and flagitiousness of the age, and placed them before the eye in full and strong individuality. Not to love, was not to be: and, therefore, all were lovers, from the half-fledged stripling fresh from the teacher's rod to the hoary veteran whose dim eyes could scarcely discern the charms with which his heart was smitten, from the impoverished swain whose last sixpence was bent into a To-and-from-my-love[4] to him who could buy a heart with coronets, crown jewels, and pensions. Foppery in dress was the natural result of this overweening desire to please, and gallants endeavored to make themselves irresistible by the newest cut of a French suit, or an enormous fleece of periwig. Foppery in speech was also as natural as foppery in dress: and it was now so much the fashion to interlard conversation with French phrases, that it was "as ill-breeding to speak good English as to write good English, good sense, or a good hand."[1] But the charm of charms was, for a lover to possess the reputation of a wit; and, if he could pen a few smooth verses on the attractions of his mistress, the success of his suit was sure to answer his utmost wishes. Many, who sought the reputation, without the trouble, of gallantry, had their pockets stuffed with billets-doux, addressed to them, which they had forged for the nonce; and these they paraded before company with as much pride as Caligula, when he led Roman slaves in his triumphal procession, disguised like German warriors. Those who sought random love-adventures repaired to the theater, where they might accost a visor in the pit without fearing to put it to the blush; or they could ascend to the gallery, which was the chosen place for such intrigues, and where every masked she-adventurer might pass for a countess, or a goddess in a cloud. Even the penetralia of the theater were not sacred from intrusion; and it was the fashion for gallants to haunt the stage behind the scenes, and invade the tiring-rooms of the actresses. The other resorts for such adventures were, the masquerades, which were now convenient places of assignation; Spring Garden, which enjoyed a double portion of its former bad repute; or the New Exchange, which, since Paul's Walk was no more, was become the fashionable covered lounge, and where the little millinery shops, that were profusely sprinkled about the piazzas, were kept by beautiful young women.[2] When love, however, was made in a more formal and open fashion, the lover sallied forth in the evening at the head of a band of fiddlers, and serenaded under the window of his mistress with some choice sonnet. When courtship ended in matrimony, the wedding made the whole street ring with crowding, fiddling, and dancing; and the loud flourish of fiddles was the first sound by which the happy pair was awoke on the following morning. The chief fashionable matrimonial markets in the metropolis were Hyde Park and Mulberry Garden; at the last of which places, especially, lovers nourished their mutual affection and plighted their troth over collations of cakes and syllabubs.[3]

Notwithstanding all this frivolity and profligacy, however, of the higher classes, the bulk of the community still retained much of the good old English spirit. Independently of the Puritans, whose stern, self-denying manners have been already described, there were many royalists who still exhibited the best traits of the period of "Good Queen Bess," and regarded with contempt the Frankism and frivolity that had now become so fashionable. Persons of this class adhered to the primitive hours of their forefathers in rising, transacting business, and going to rest; and in diet they stoutly stood by English fare, notwithstanding the French cookery that had now become prevalent. Before they repaired to the more weighty duties of the day, they adjourned to some ale-house or tavern, and took their morning, which consisted of a cup of ale or wine; and when business was over they had their favorite club or coffee-house to which they repaired to discuss the affairs of religion, politics, or literature. The temperate beverages of tea, coffee, and chocolate, which were introduced into England during this period, soon came into such general use that even already they were beginning to supersede those fiery or heavy liquors that had hitherto accompanied every meal; and we now read of the social tea-table in the domestic history of the people.[1] The English at this period also seem to have been a more musical people than ever they were afterward; almost every person of education could sing by the scale, and play upon some instrument; and, accordingly, social parties of music were common, where the violin, the flute, and the spinnet found no lack of skillful performers. Cheerful parties by water were also usual; and the company, after sailing as far as Greenwich, would ascend the hill, and enjoy themselves with games at cards upon the grass, after which they returned at evening, singing all the way up the river.[2] These were days when the banks of the Thames were as melodious as the shores of the Adriatic. Even on the merriest occasions, too, of junketing and holyday-keeping, there prevailed among these sober classes a dread of late hours that sufficed to close up the festival at ten o'clock at night; and Pepys describes, with laughable simplicity, the consternation of some ladies belonging to a noble family who were detained upon one of these occasions till midnight, when they found the gates of their mansion closed, and the inmates gone to sleep.

While such remains of the old simplicity of living were still to be found in the metropolis in spite of evil example, they were still more plentiful in the country, where the court contagion was as yet unfelt. The baronial table was still heart of oak, and laden with the old festive hospitality; and the huge sirloins and mighty plum-puddings that smoked upon it seemed to laugh to scorn the innovations of French cooks that had become so fashionable in London. The guests were waited upon by a throng of blue-coated servants, who still preserved the ancient "yea forsooth" simplicity of manner; and the walls of the hall were still garnished with a forest of stags' horns and other relics of the chase, in preference to more fashionable ornaments. The country squires also gave annual feasts to their tenants, and, by other acts of kindness, made the tie between landlord and tenant a sort of family relationship; while the farmers, in similar fashion, gave jolly harvest-homes, sheep-shearings, and the other old set feasts to their laborers and dependents. Such pleasing pictures of rural life are plentifully interspersed in the plays of the period, but are only introduced upon the stage to be ridiculed. We shall find them again, however, in a still more attractive fashion under the days of "good Queen Anne." As abhorrence of the drama had been one of the chief distinctions of Puritanism, a habit of play-going became a badge of loyalty after the Restoration. The theaters, therefore, were reopened, and their benches crowded more eagerly than ever. Movable scenery is said to have been first introduced upon the English stage, a few years before the Restoration, by Sir William Davenant; and after that event it was produced at the Theater Royal, in Drury-lane.[1] This and other novelties at first startled the proprietors of theaters, by the expense they occasioned; but when they found that such lively additions to the play drew full houses, and yielded large profits, they lanched fully into the speculation, and rivaled each other in the splendor and richness of stage decorations. As the whole power of mechanical ingenuity was thus brought to bear upon theatrical representations, a love of rich scenery and surprising transformations became predominant with the public, in consequence of which the opera, which had been previously introduced by Davenant, was revived; and its gorgeous materials at first threw into the shade the more sober productions of the regular drama; so that Shadwell and Settle, who wrote for this operatic taste, were for a short time more popular than Dryden himself.[2] Music and dancing were soon as much in requisition as splendid scene-painting, and the most celebrated foreign singers and dancers were hired by the London theaters, at an immense expense.[3] In other less important points a similar change had taken place. The stage, instead of being "half in glimmer and half in gloom," as before the civil war, was lit up by a blaze of wax candles; the orchestra was furnished with some nine or ten fiddles; and greater attention was paid not only to the rich but appropriate costume for the characters that were represented.[4] But among all the additions now made to the attractions of the theater, none equaled the introduction of women upon the stage as actresses.[5] Hitherto the female characters had been performed by boys; but now taste was gratified by seeing female feelings judiciously represented by the tender sex, and depravity was pampered by the amorous speeches and Sybarite attitudes of bonâ fide women. As if even this had not been enough, too, several plays (and these of the lewdest description) were sometimes exhibited by female performers only.[6] The complaint was loud and general during this age, that the actresses only added to the general depravity; and the host of royal and noble concubines that was supplied from their ranks attests the truth of the accusation. In consequence of the crowds that now resorted to the theaters, actors were no longer the humble showmen and needy dependents of aristocratic caprice. They waxed rich, and became proud: they felt themselves necessary to an age that was devoted to amusement, and began to divide the town with their trumpery quarrels and factions. The license of the stage also in political matters occasionally went beyond the patience of the court, and bitter side-remarks were frequently vented through the medium of a play against the conduct of those in power. To prevent these excesses, the theaters were sometimes shut up, and the actors themselves committed to prison, to learn a little wholesome moderation.[1]

From the liberality with which the public taste was regaled, both in the variety of plays and the exciting manner in which they were represented, the audiences soon became so fastidious, that many a piece was damned which scarcely deserved that fate. But it was not mere taste that formed the criterion of judging and condemning. Personal pique and political prejudice were too often allowed to interfere; and such influential wits as Buckingham and Rochester could frequently confer popularity upon the dullest, as well as bring disgrace upon the best written piece.[2] It was not always, however, that a dramatic poet was in the humor of succumbing to such a tyrannous process; and, while a critic was whizzing a catcall in Drury Lane, he might be stopped by a hostile invitation of the author to take a walk into Covent Garden. On this account, a beau is directed, in the preface to the Reformation, a play acted at the Duke's Theater, in 1673, only to abuse a new play when he knows that the author is no fighter. Sometimes the influence of a dramatic writer was so strong, that he could pack the house with a numerous jury in his favor, in which case the right to condemn was by no means the safest of privileges. When the United Kingdoms was brought upon the stage, its author, the Honorable Edward Howard, had filled the house with a strong phalanx of supporters, to insure success: the malicious Buckingham headed a rival party for the purpose of condemning the play; but, scarcely had the work of hissing commenced, when all the Howards rose in an uproar; the duke himself was compelled to retreat, and, as his enemies waylaid him at the door, he only escaped a severe cudgeling, or something still worse, by stealing off in the confusion.[3]

As the public theater now absorbed the chief taste and talent of the country, the court pageants did not keep pace with dramatic representations. Although they had, indeed, inevitably improved, with the improvement of shows in general, they still, in some measure, smacked of the rudeness of the old times. This will appear by the following account of a royal procession from the Tower to Whitehall, in 1660, by Pepys—a description which rivals that of the coronation by Beau Tibbs, in Goldsmith's Citizen of the World. "It is impossible," he says, "to relate the glory of this day expressed in the clothes of them that rid, and their horses, and horsecloths. The Knights of the Bath was a brave sight of itself, and their esquires. Remarkable were the two men that represent the two dukes of Normandy and Aquitaine. The bishops came next after barons, which is the higher place; which makes me think that the next parliament they will be called to the House of Lords. My Lord Monk rode bare after the king, and led in his hand a spare horse, as being Master of the Horse. The king, in a most rich-embroidered suit and cloak looked most noble. Wadlow, the vintner, at the Devil in Fleet-street, did lead a fine company of soldiers, all young, comely men, in white doublets. Then followed the vice-chamberlain, Sir G. Carteret, a company of men all like Turks; but I know not yet what they are for. The streets all graveled, and the houses hung with carpets before them, made brave show; and the ladies out of the windows. So glorious was the show with gold and silver, that we were not able to look at it, our eyes at last being so much overcome." Here the pageant-dukes of Normandy and Aquitaine, and the company of Turks, remind us of the dragon and unicorn, and the Faith, Hope, and Charity of the old masques and processions. To this scene we may add the description of a state supper in the Banqueting-House, Whitehall, given by the sovereign to the companions of the Order of the Garter, on the evening of the anniversary of St. George. "The king," says Evelyn, who describes the scene, "sat on an elevated throne, at the upper end at a table alone; the knights at a table on the right hand, reaching all the length of the room; over against them, a cupboard of rich gilded plate; at the lower end, the music; on the balusters above, wind-music, trumpets, and kettle-drums. The king was served by the lords and pensioners, who brought up the dishes. About the middle of the dinner, the knights drank the king's health, then the king their's, when the trumpets and music played and sounded, the guns going off at the Tower. At the banquet came in the queen, and stood by the king's left hand, but did not sit." All this was noble and imposing; but the spirit of coarse revelry soon broke out. "Then was the banqueting stuff flung about the room profusely. In truth, the crowd was so great, that though I stayed all the supper the day before, I now stayed no longer than this sport began, for fear of disorder." The same want of taste that made a scramble for the banqueting stuff converted the king and these noble Knights of the Garter into coxcombs; so that on one occasion, according to Pepys, they wore their official robes all day, and then rode about with them in the park in the evening. The chief palace amusements were masques and dancing, in the last of which the poor queen seemed to find abundant solace for the neglect of her husband, and for which she was severely blamed by the splenetic pamphleteers of the day.

One grave piece of English court mumming has not yet been noticed, although it commenced in the days of Edward the Confessor, and continued almost to our own times. This was the royal practice of touching for the evil or scrofula—a divine gift of healing supposed to be inherent in the legitimate kings of England, and in them only. When the set day arrived for the performance of this miracle, the king was seated in state in the Banqueting-House, and the patients were led up to the throne by the physician. The king then stroked their faces or cheeks, with both hands, as they knelt, while a chaplain, standing by in full canonicals, repeated over each that passage of Scripture, "He put his hands upon them, and healed them." When they had all been touched or stroked in this manner, another chaplain, kneeling, and having angel-pieces of gold strung on white ribbons on his arm, delivered them one by one to his majesty, who put them upon the necks of the touched as they passed before him, while the first chaplain repeated the passage, "That is the true light which came into the world." As the reading of a gospel commenced the service, an epistle concluded it, with the prayers for the sick, a little altered from the liturgy, and the blessing; after which the lord chamberlain and controller of the household brought a basin, ewer, and towel, for the king to wash his hands.[1] The mercurial Charles II. was wont to laugh heartily, even in church, when an anthem was sung out of tune, or a court vice preached at;[2] how he was able to preserve the needful gravity of countenance during this absurd ceremony is not easy to understand. The popular belief in its efficacy was as strong during his reign as it had ever been during the darkest ages. A disastrous proof of this was afforded on one occasion when the crowd of people with their diseased children was so great at the court surgeon's door, applying for tickets to be admitted to Whitehall, that six or seven persons were pressed to death in the confusion.[3]

Other shows and exhibitions, which are only tolerated by the mobs of the nineteenth century, were at this time the most acceptable even to the highest ranks. Of these the puppet-shows were most conspicuous, where, besides the adventures of Punch, the spectators were regaled with the pathetic drama of Patient Grizzle, or some edifying incident from Scripture.[4] Monkeys were clothed in appropriate costume, and taught to perform in little pantomimes, as well as to dance, and play diverting tricks upon the tight-rope.[5] Then there were plays composed by bankrupt authors, and exhibited by fourth-rate or discarded actors, in temporary booths at the city fairs: to this complexion poor Elkanah Settle, once the civic poet laureate, came at last. After having triumphed for a time as the successful court rival of Dryden, he finally sunk into a dramatist for Smithfield, and performed the part of a dragon in one of his own pieces.[6] Men who exhibited feats of strength or dexterity, and jugglers of every description, were now plentiful in London: and the mention of a few of their feats will indicate the character of the public taste. There was one Florian Marchand, who, drinking only fountain-water, refunded it from his mouth in the form of all kinds of wine and sweet waters. There was a Turk, a rope-dancer, who walked barefooted up a rope that was almost perpendicular, by merely taking hold of it with his toes: he also danced, blindfold, on the high (tight) rope, with a boy about twelve years old tied to his feet, about six or seven yards below, dangling as he danced, and with whom he moved as if the boy's weight had been but a feather. Such athletic feats as a man raising a cannon of about four hundred pounds weight with the hair of his head seem to have been common. It was a golden age for such performers, when chairs and chariots thronged to their places of exhibition. These shows were concentrated into one huge mass of amusement at such fairs as St. Margaret's at Southwark, and St. Bartholomew's in Smithfield. An Italian Scaramouch had sometimes the honor to perform before his majesty at Whitehall; but, shameful to tell, the courtiers had to pay at the door for admission. These various performers exhibited privately as well as publicly; and sometimes, when a gentleman gave a dinner to his friends, a juggler or a fire-eater was hired to entertain the company.[1]

Although the old active amusements and athletic sports of the country were necessarily becoming less popular, from the change of manners, yet even among the aristocracy certain rough exercises were still in vogue that form a strong contrast to the effeminacy of the nobles in other respects. Thus, swimming had become a favorite amusement, and prodigious feats in the way of wager and competition were performed in this department by Rochester and his companions. Foot-racing was also a courtly amusement, which Charles II., himself a first-rate pedestrian, greatly patronized; and Pepys, among other facts of the kind, mentions the exploit of two young noblemen who, upon a wager, ran down and killed a stout buck in St. James's Park, in presence of the king. Tennis, as a court game, was so keenly pursued by Charles II. that, having a steel-yard, in which he weighed himself after the sport was over, on one occasion he found that he had lost four pounds and a half in weight at a single bout."[2] Skating, also, was a newly-introduced, or, rather, perhaps a revived amusement in England at this time, and was performed "after the manner of the Hollanders."[3] One principal place for this practice, as at present, was the canal in St. James's Park. There were also certain athletic exercises, chiefly of a military character, that seemed to have formed a regular part of a fashionable education. These consisted of running at the ring, throwing a javelin at the figure of a Moor's head, firing pistols at a mark, and taking up a gauntlet upon the point of a sword; all which exercises were performed on horseback, and at full speed.[4] The truly English sport of boat-racing and yacht-racing was now extensively practiced, and, as well as horse-racing at Newmarket, greatly occupied the time and money of the courtiers.[5] Bowls also continued to be a favorite game with ladies as well as gentlemen.[6] Bear-baiting and bull-baiting, which had been so rigidly put down during the Commonwealth, were resumed at the Restoration. Pepys observes, however, that these sports were gradually becoming less fashionable among the higher classes; and, if such accidents as one recorded by Evelyn were of frequent occurrence, it was full time that they should be so. A mastiff, he informs us, was tossed sheer over the barriers into a lady's lap who sat at a considerable distance from the arena. One infamous sport of this period was that of baiting horses with dogs—a piece of ruffianism that disgraced the darkest periods of Anglo-Saxon barbarity. Evelyn describes an event of this kind, where a gallant steed was devoted to death for the popular amusement, under the false pretense that it had killed a man—the real purpose being to get money by the exhibition. The horse beat off every assailant, and at last had to be stabbed to death with swords.

The in-door sports of the wealthier classes, besides card-playing, consisted of billiards, chess, backgammon, cribbage, and ninepins. Upon occasions of social merry-meeting the company would often divert themselves with such homely games as blindman's buff and handycap. Besides banquets and convivial meetings, masques and private theatricals frequently enlivened the mansions of the wealthy.[1] Sometimes, too, a piece of furniture was contrived to afford a rational pleasure by its elegance and ingenuity, or excite mirth by some sudden practical joke. We are told of a specimen of the first kind, which was a portable cabinet containing a well-executed painting of the great church of Haarlem, in Holland, and which was viewed through a small hole at one corner.[2] This seems to have been a miniature diorama. Another article of furniture, belonging to Sir W. Penn, was a seat called King Harry's chair, upon which, when a stranger sat down, he was suddenly clasped round the middle by two iron arms, and held fast, to the great mirth of the on-lookers.[1]

[1] Pepys [2] Evelyn.

Many of the old holydays were still observed according to the old English fashion. On Valentine's Day gentlemen sent such presents as gloves, silk stockings, garters, or even splendid jewelry, to their fair valentines, whether married or single. On the morning of the 1st of May, young ladies, and even grave matrons, repaired to the fields to gather May-dew, with which to beautify their complexions: milkmaids danced in the streets, with their pails wreathed with garlands, and a fiddler going before them. New-year's Day was also observed as a season of presenting gifts from inferiors to their patrons. On this occasion the nobles did homage to the king by an offering in money: that of an earl was usually twenty pieces of gold, in a purse.[2] In this way, also, the nobility were enriched by their clients; and Pepys informs us that some courtiers had their whole fortune in this custom. It is pleasing to observe that the intellectual accommodation of circulating libraries had already commenced, for the benefit of those who could relish something better than the vulgar amusements of the period. At the end of the play of the Thracian Wonder, printed in 1661, and sold by Francis Kirkman, at the sign of John Fletcher's Head, without Temple Bar, is the following intimation:—"If any gentlemen please to repair to my house aforesaid, they may be furnished with all manner of English or French histories, romances, or poetry; which are to be sold, or read for reasonable considerations."

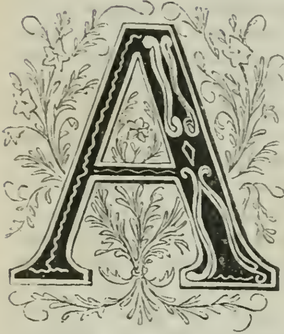
CHAPTER VII.

HISTORY OF THE CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.



CONSIDERABLE amount of information with regard to the condition of the most numerous classes of the English population in the latter part of the seventeenth century is supplied by various cotemporary publications, which were drawn forth principally by the still increasing pressure, though in a somewhat new way, of the old national evil of pauperism, or the greater attention that now began to be paid to that as well as to other subjects connected with the new science of political economy. The most important of these publications have been reviewed by Sir Frederic Eden, in his work on the State of the Poor; and, with the assistance of his pages, we shall proceed to extract and arrange the most material facts preserved in them that come under our present head.

The earliest written, though not the earliest published, of the tracts in question, is one which is attributed to the pen of the eminent judge, Sir Matthew Hale. It is entitled, "A Discourse touching Provision for the Poor," and did not appear till 1683, but was in all probability written in 1659 or early in 1660, certainly before 1662. Its references, therefore, are to the state of things at the very commencement of the present period, or, rather, at the close of the last. One assumption upon which the author proceeds in his calculations, as upon a supposition that would be universally admitted, is rather remarkable, namely, that the family of a working man, consisting of himself, his wife, and four children, could not be supported "in meat, drink, clothing, and house-rent," under ten shillings a-week. "And so much," he adds, "they might probably get if employed," if two of the children as well as their mother were able to contribute something by their work to the family income. The value of money a hundred and eighty years ago was undoubtedly much greater than it now is; and yet the wages of agricultural, and even of some descriptions of mechanical, labor do not at the present moment exceed, if they reach, this amount. From a subsequent statement, however, it should seem that, in manufactures at least, this sum of ten shillings a-week could only then be raised by the united industry of all the four working members of the family. He had, the author says, ascertained, by actual trial, what were the expenses of making "a common coarse medley cloth of Gloucestershire wool," of thirty-two yards in length: from which it appeared that the cost of production was altogether £11 15*s.*; namely, for ninety pounds of wool at 1*s.* a-pound, £4 10*s.*; for cards and oil, £1; and for the wages of three weavers and spoolers, two breakers, six spinners, one fuller and burler, one sheerman, and one paster and picker, fourteen persons in all, £6 5*s.* He calculates, further, that sixteen such pieces might be made in a year by this number of workmen; consequently the wages earned by them in the year would amount to £97. But this is not quite £7 for each; so that, to make up the 10*s.* a-week, or £26 a-year, previously assumed to be required for the maintenance of the working man and his family, his wife and his two elder children would in this case have to be included among the fourteen persons employed, as well as himself. To reconcile the two statements, therefore, we must suppose that every laborer having so many as four children, without the two elder being yet able to earn any thing, would at this time have to receive more or less assistance from the rates, or at least would be considered as standing in need of such assistance; for, indeed, Hale, or whoever was the author of the present tract, complains that, after all the legislation that had taken place on the subject, the provision made for the poor in many parts of the country was still miserably inadequate. "Let any man," he says, "look over most of the populous parishes in England: indeed, there are rates made for the relief of the impotent poor, and, it may be, the same relief is also given in a narrow measure to some others that have great families, and upon this they live miserably, and at best from hand to mouth, and if they can not get work to make out their livelihood they and their children set up a trade of begging at best." This writer's views with regard to the practicability of finding profitable employment for all the poor do not lead him to foresee any inconvenience from an over-plentiful provision for them. He is sanguine enough to think that pauperism, properly so called, might be almost extirpated, and that, if the parish would in all cases merely supply the requisite stock or capital, every pauper in it might be transformed into a laborer earning full support for himself by his own hands. All the burden to be borne by the parish, he calculates, after the first contribution, which might be equivalent to the amount of four years' rates, would be the expenses of management, which could not amount to much. "There be many poor and honest men," he observes, "who, for a small salary, and a room or two to work and lodge in, in the workhouse, would be fit enough to undertake the employment of a master; and yet he would have no great trust upon him; for the stock would be lodged in the hands of the overseers, and they to deliver it out, and take weekly or monthly accounts; which overseers may be substantial men, and at no great trouble; and eligible either by the justices of peace, or parishioners, yearly, or once in three years; and their trouble would be no greater than the trouble of overseers of the poor or church-wardens in any parish." The prospect of any profit upon the capital thus invested by parishes is not represented as very tempting. The piece of woolen cloth, which it cost £11 15*s.* to make, was then selling at no more than £12; and if sixteen such pieces were to be produced in the year, so as to afford full employment to the fourteen workmen, the capital required to keep the loom going would be £100. This would be a return of only four per cent., which would scarcely be enough to defray the cost of management. If trade were brisker, however, he says, the cloth might bring £13 the piece, or even more. He states, incidentally, that the manufacture of serges, kerseys, and baizes was at this time confined to Devonshire, Norfolk, and the town of Colchester; and he speaks of the manufacture of various kinds of linen cloth as being already carried on in some degree in Lancashire.

In 1662, under pretense of providing for the better relief of the poor, an act was passed which may be said to have at once reduced the great body of the laboring population of England to their ancient condition of ascripti glebæ, or fixtures each to the soil of some one particular parish. This was the famous statute of the 13 and 14 Car. II., c. 12,[1] the foundation of the modern law of settlement. The preamble of the act testifies to the fact of pauperism continuing to make head against all the previous attempts at restraining it. "The necessity, number, and continual increase of the poor," it is asserted, "not only within the cities of London and Westminster, with the liberties of each of them, but also through the whole kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, is very great and exceeding burdensome, being occasioned by reason of some defects in the law concerning the settling of the poor, and for want of a due provision of the regulations of relief and employment in such parishes or places where they are legally settled, which doth enforce many to turn incorrigible rogues, and others to perish for want, together with the neglect of the faithful execution of such laws and statutes as have formerly been made for the apprehending of rogues and vagabonds, and for the good of the poor." For remedy of these evils it was now enacted, in substance, that it should be lawful for any two justices of the peace, upon complaint made by the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, within forty days after the arrival of any new-comer in the parish, to remove him by force to the parish where he was last legally settled, either as a native, householder, sojourner, apprentice, or servant, unless he either rented a tenement of £10 a-year, or could give such security against becoming burdensome to the parish where he was living as the two justices should deem sufficient. By a subsequent act—the 1 Jac. II., c. 17—it was provided, in order to prevent the evasion of the new law by the party contriving to effect a clandestine residence for the forty days, that that term, necessary to give him a legal settlement, should only be counted from the time of his delivering a notice in writing of the place of his abode and the number of his family (when he had any) to one of the church-wardens or overseers. So long as this law lasted—which it did till the year 1795,[1] it was rendered almost impossible for a poor man to transfer himself from one parish to another; for that space, of above a hundred and thirty years, a man's parish was, in the generality of cases, almost literally his prison. It seems impossible to refuse assent to what Adam Smith, writing while it was still in force, has said of this most oppressive law:—"To remove a man who has committed no misdemeanor from the parish where he chooses to reside, is an evident violation of natural liberty and justice. The common people of England, however, so jealous of their liberty, but, like the common people of most other countries, never rightly understanding wherein it consists, have now for more than a century together suffered themselves to be exposed to this oppression without a remedy. Though men of reflection, too, have sometimes complained of the law of settlement as a public grievance, yet it has never been the object of any general popular clamor, such as that against general warrants—an abusive practice undoubtedly, but such a one as was not likely to occasion any general oppression. There is scarce a poor man of England of forty years of age, I will venture to say, who has not in some part of his life felt himself most cruelly oppressed by this ill-contrived law of settlement."[2] To this may be added the remark of Sir Frederic Eden on the main enactment of the statute of 1662, that "this single clause of a short act of parliament has occasioned more doubts and difficulties in Westminster Hall, and has perhaps been more profitable to the profession of the law, than any other point in English jurisprudence."[3] Another galling part of the law was, that, while so severely circumscribing the liberty of the native poor, it left strangers from Scotland and Ireland unmolested; a Scotchman or an Irishman might set himself down in any part of England he pleased, or move about at his convenience from one parish to another, and no overseer or justice of the peace could, under this act, interfere with him.[4] On the other hand, indeed, such strangers had no legal claim upon parish support, in case of destitution: but probably few of them would have willingly purchased that right at the cost of the peculiar advantages which they enjoyed without it. It is to be remembered, too, that by the undisturbed freedom in which they were left they could obtain a settlement for their children, born in England, their servants and apprentices, if not for themselves, in any parish they pleased. Besides, they might in general confidently rely upon the common humanity, if not the law, of the country preventing them from absolutely perishing of want.

[4] It is only within the last twenty years that, by the act 59 Geo. III., c. 12, natives of Scotland, Ireland, the isles of Man, Jersey, and the other Channel islands, have been made removable with their families from any parish in which they are actually chargeable, to the place of their birth.

The act of 1662, while it thus authorized the removal of persons only likely or asserted to be likely to become chargeable, considerably altered the old law as to the ways by which settlements might be obtained. Till now, a man's settlement was either the parish in which he had been born, or that in which he had resided as an impotent pauper for three years, or as a vagabond for one year. The statute of the 13th and 14th of Charles II., taken along with that of the first of James II., gave a man a settlement in a parish by a residence, unobjected to by the church-wardens, of only forty days after publication of notice in writing; and also by renting a tenement of the annual value of £10. And subsequent statutes passed in the reign of William and Mary, in completion of the same system, established the following additional ways of acquiring the same right — namely, the being charged to the public taxes and paying them; the executing an annual office in the parish, and serving in it a year; the serving an apprenticeship in the parish; the being lawfully hired into any parish for a year, and continuing in the same service a twelvemonth. But the rule is, that in all cases the last-acquired settlement takes away any settlement previously acquired.

The act of 1662, it thus appears, commences a new era in the history of the poor-laws. "It will be seen," observes a late writer, "that at this stage the struggle of the poor-laws against vagrancy as a national evil ceased, and the efforts of the legislature were henceforth directed against the somewhat contrary habits generated by a state of permanent and settled pauperism. The general improvements in the habits, intelligence, and wealth of the people had, doubtless, had the chief effect in reducing the former evil, although it is clear that a considerable effect was constantly operated by the poor-laws toward reducing the poorer part of the population to a settled condition, which eventually terminated in a state of things in which the laborer resisted a change of place as the last extremity of evil, thinking the loss of his settlement ill compensated by the certainty of immediately bettering his condition, in as far as his condition depended on his own industry. The cause at the bottom of each of these evils was obviously the same—that is, the desire which men have to live in ease; which object was at one time most easily obtained by vagabondage, at another by acquiring a fixed settlement in a parish."[1] But, while there is some truth in this view, in so far as it distinguishes between the character of the early and of the more recent legislation in regard to the poor, it is to be remembered that the change of place which the laborer is asserted to resist as the last extremity of evil is in reality nothing else than his removal back again to a parish which he had left in violation of the law, or at least in the hope of being able to make good a transference against which the law sets its face; so that he may be more truly said to resist confinement to one place than a change of place. The acts of 1662 and 1685 were undoubtedly passed with the main object of preventing and checking, not permanent and actually-settled pauperism (a matter which none of their provisions affects to touch), but locomotive and intrusive pauperism—the attempts of stranger paupers to make their way into parishes to which they did not properly belong. When a man who has broken prison struggles against being carried back into confinement by the constable who has found him standing on the king's highway, he may, indeed, be quaintly said to resist a change of place as the last extremity of evil; but he would himself probably declare that the liberty of change of place was what at that particular time he above all things desired.

Some glimpses at the state of the pauper population a few years after the new law of settlement came into operation are afforded by an inquiry "Concerning the Relief and Employment of the Poor," which forms one of the chapters of Sir Josiah Child's New Discourses of Trade, written in 1665, and published in 1668. Sir Josiah describes the condition of the poor at this time as sad and wretched in the extreme; and the details he gives seem to show that a great part of their misery was the consequence of the late act. In illustration of the combined cruelty and inefficacy of "the shifting off, sending, or whipping back, the poor wanderers to the place of their birth or last abode," which was then continually going on in all parts of the kingdom, he gives the following instance:—"A poor idle person that will not work, or that nobody will employ in the country, comes up to London, to set up the trade of begging; such a person, probably, may beg up and down the streets seven years, it may be seven-and-twenty, before any body asketh why she doth so; and, if at length she hath the ill-hap in some parish to meet with a more vigilant beadle than one in twenty of them are, all he does is but to lead her the length of five or six houses into another parish, and then concludes, as his masters, the parishioners, do, that he hath done the part of a most diligent officer. But suppose he should yet go farther, to the end of his line, which is the end of the law, and the perfect execution of his office—that is, suppose he should carry this poor wretch to a justice of the peace, and he should order the delinquent to be whipped, and sent from parish to parish to the place of her birth or last abode—which not one justice out of twenty, through pity or other cause, will do—even this is a great charge upon the country, and yet the business of the nation itself wholly undone; for no sooner doth the delinquent arrive at the place assigned, but, for shame or idleness, she presently deserts it, and wanders directly back, or some other way, hoping for better fortune; while the parish to which she is sent, knowing her a lazy, and perhaps a worse qualified person, is as willing to be rid of her as she is to be gone from thence." This author has a plan of his own for affording profitable employment to the poor of every parish in the kingdom—the favorite idea of all the economical speculators of that day—in which he proposes that the government of parishes in all matters relative to the poor should be put into the hands of a body of persons to be incorporated by act of parliament, under the title of Fathers of the Poor, each of whom, it is oddly added, should wear some honorable medal, "after the manner of the Familiars of the Inquisition in Spain."

The earliest information that has been found with regard to the amount of the poor-rates is a statement in a pamphlet published in 1673, entitled "The Grand Concern of England explained in several Proposals offered to the consideration of the Parliament," &c.[1] This author estimates the sum then expended on the relief of the poor at nearly £840,000 a-year. Another writer of about the same time, who will presently be noticed, estimates the poor-rate at upward of £700,000.[2] But probably the account most to be relied upon is that given by Davenant, in his Essay upon Ways and Means (first published in 1695), the particulars of which, he says, "were collected with great labor and expense by Mr. Arthur More, a very knowing person." It presents an "estimate of the poor-rates, upon each county, by a reasonable medium of several years, made toward the latter end of King Charles II.'s reign;" and makes the total amount for all England and Wales £665,362. The highest assessments in the account are, for Devonshire £34,764; Essex £37,348; Lincolnshire £31,500; Norfolk £46,200; Somerset £30,263; all Wales (estimated according to the proportion the principality bore to the rest of the kingdom in other taxes, the particulars not having been obtained) £33,753; and Middlesex, including the cities of London and Westminster, £56,380. The assessment of Surrey, including the borough of Southwark, is set down at only £15,600; that of Kent at £39,875; that of York at £26,150. Among the smallest assessments are those of Cheshire, £5796; of Lancashire, £7200; and of Westmoreland, £1890.[3] The money, at this comparatively early stage of the poor-rates, was by no means universally considered to be beneficially expended in a public point of view. "It is employed," says the author of the Grand Concern of England, "only to maintain idle persons; doth great hurt rather than good; makes a world of poor more than otherwise there would be; prevents industry and laboriousness; men and women growing so idle and proud that they will not work, but lie upon the parish wherein they dwell for maintenance; applying themselves to nothing but begging or pilfering, and breeding up their children accordingly; never putting them upon any thing that may render them useful in their generations, or beneficial either to themselves or the kingdom." A strange notion of the author of this pamphlet is, that the distress of the laboring classes has been chiefly occasioned by the diminution that has taken place in the number of saddle-horses in consequence of the introduction of stage-coaches. One of his proposals is, "that the multitude of stage-coaches and caravans now traveling upon the roads may all, or most of them, be suppressed; especially those within forty, fifty, or sixty miles of London, where they are no way necessary; and that a due regulation be made of such as are thought fit to be continued." His argument in support of this crotchet, if it has no other merit, supplies us with some curious information respecting the conveyances and accommodations for traveling which the English public now enjoyed. The stage-coaches, he states, enabled any Londoner, whenever he had occasion, to step to any place where his business lay, "for two, three, or four shillings, if within twenty miles of London, and so proportionately into any part of England." In these circumstances, exclaims our patriotic author, "will any man keep a horse for himself and another for his man, all the year, for to ride one or two journeys—unless some noble soul that scorns and abhors being confined to so ignoble, base, and sordid a way of traveling as these coaches oblige him unto, and who prefers a public good before his own ease and advantage?" The number of coach-horses, he goes on to observe, under the new system, is much less than that of the saddle-horses that used to be kept: "for formerly every man that had occasion to travel many journeys yearly, or to ride up and down, kept horses for himself and servants, and seldom rid without one or two men; but now, since every man can have a passage into every place he is to travel unto, or to some place within a few miles of that place he designs to go unto, they have left keeping of horses, and travel without servants; and York, Chester, and Exeter stage-coaches, each of them with forty horses a-piece, carry eighteen passengers a-week from London to each of these places, and in like manner as many in return from these places, to London; which come, in the whole, to 1872 in the year." Now, even admitting the passengers brought back from these places to be the same persons that were carried from London thither, still, he maintains, were it not for the coaches, at least five hundred horses would be required to perform the work. "Take," he continues, "the short stages within twenty or thirty miles of London; each coach with four horses carries six passengers a-day. . . . .Then reckon your coaches within ten miles of London, that go backward and forward every day, and they carry double the number every year; and so proportionably your shorter stages within three, four, or five miles of London. There are stage-coaches that go to almost every town within twenty or twenty-five miles of London, wherein passengers are carried at so low rates that most persons in and about London, and in Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, gentlemen, merchants, and other traders, that have occasion to ride, do make use of them—some to keep fairs and markets, others to visit friends, and to go to and from their country-houses, or about other business—who, before these coaches did set up, kept a horse or two of their own, but now have given over keeping the same." It thus appears that, more than a century and a half ago, the inhabitants of the metropolis were already tolerably well provided with the means of transference to places in the country within twenty or thirty miles around them. Regular traveling by stage-coach to more distant parts would seem to have been as yet confined to the three great lines of road leading to Exeter, Chester, and York. The fare to any one of these towns, it is stated, was 40*s.* in summer and 45*s.* in winter; "besides," continues the account, "in the journey they change coachmen four times; and there are few passengers but give twelve pence to each coachman at the end of his stage; . . . . and at least three shillings comes to each passenger's share for coachmen's drink on the road."

In 1677 appeared Andrew Yarranton's work entitled "England's Improvement by Sea and Land: To outdo the Dutch without fighting, to pay debts without money, to set at work all the poor of England with the growth of our own lands; To prevent unnecessary suits in law, with the benefit of a voluntary register; Directions where vast quantities of timber are to be had for the building of ships, with the advantage of making the great rivers of England navigable: Rules to prevent fires in London and other great cities; with directions how the several companies of handicraftsmen in London may always have cheap bread and drink." Of himself, and of the circumstances that led him to write his book, Yarranton gives the following account:—"I was an apprentice to a linen-draper, and so I knew something of linen; and, finding the poor unemployed, I, with my wife, did promote the making of much fine linen with good success. And being employed, and my charges borne, by twelve gentlemen of England, to bring into England a manufacture out of Saxony and Bohemia made of iron and tin, there I did see what I here set down; and in Holland and Flanders I tried and observed their way and manner of trade in the linen manufacture." Yarranton estimates the number of the unemployed or destitute poor at a hundred thousand, each of whom, he calculates, costs the public fourpence a-day for food, while, if they were employed, they might earn eightpence a-day each; but he forgets that many paupers, aged and infirm persons and young children, were, of course, incapable of doing any work. His calculation of a hundred thousand paupers, each costing fourpence a-day, would make the entire yearly outlay upon the poor £608,333 6*s.* 8*d.*, a sum not very much under what appears to have been the actual amount of the rate. The project for supporting the poor upon which this writer places his chief dependence is to employ them in the linen and iron manufactures. The best districts in which to establish the former he considers to be the counties of Warwick, Leicester, Northampton, and Oxford. "First," he argues, "their land is excellent good to produce flax. Secondly, they are inland counties, and have no staple manufacture at present fixed with them, whereby their poor are idle and want employment. Thirdly, they are counties the best furnished at all times with corn and flesh of any counties in England, and at cheapest rates. Fourthly, they are in the heart of England; and the trade, being once well settled in these counties, will influence their neighboring counties in the same manufacture in sending their flax and threads with ease and cheapness down the rivers Thames, Avon, Trent, and Soar; all which navigable rivers come into these counties. And I affirm it is not possible to set up this trade in any part of England with success but in these places, because in most parts of England there are fixed manufactures already that do in great measure set the poor at work. In the west of England clothing of all sorts, as in Gloucester, Worcester, Shropshire, Staffordshire, and a small part of Warwickshire; in Derby, Nottingham, and Yorkshire the iron and woolen manufacture; in Suffolk, Norfolk, and Essex the woolen manufacture; in Kent, Sussex, and Surrey some cloth, iron, and materials for shipping. Then the counties to raise provisions, and to vend them at London, to feed that great mouth, are Cambridge, Huntingdon, Buckingham, Hertford, Middlesex, and Berks." Seven or eight years before, he says, it had been proposed to set up the linen manufacture in Ipswich and the neighborhood, and he was consulted on the subject; but he adds, "after I had rid about the town as far as Cattaway Bridge, and observed the influence that the Colchester trade had there, as also the stuff and say trade, whereby the poor were comfortably supplied, I then found it was impossible to go on with success, and gave my reasons; upon which all was laid aside, and my reasons approved of." Of the iron manufacture, as it then existed, he gives a full and minute account, which is so interesting that we will extract the greater part of it:—"First," says he, "I will begin in Monmouthshire, and go through the Forest of Dean, and there take notice what infinite quantities of sow iron is there made, with bar iron and wire. And consider the infinite number of men, horses, and carriages which are to supply these works, and also digging of iron stone, providing of cinders, carrying to the works, making it into sows and bars, cutting of wood and converting it into charcoal. Consider, also, in these parts the woods are not worth the cutting and bringing home by the owners to burn in their houses; and it is because in all these places there are pit coals very cheap. Consider, also, the multitude of cattle and people thereabout employed, that make the land dear; and, what with the benefit made of the woods, and the people making the land dear, it is not inferior for riches to any place in England. And if these advantages were not there, it would be little less than a howling wilderness. . . . . Moreover, there is yet a most great benefit to the kingdom in general by the sow iron made of the iron stone and Roman cinders in the Forest of Dean; for that metal is of a most gentle, pliable, and soft nature, easily and quickly to be wrought into manufacture over what any other iron is, and it is the best in the known world; and the greatest part of this sow iron is sent up Severn to the forges, into Worcestershire, Shropshire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, and Cheshire, and there it's made into bar iron; and, because of its kind and gentle nature to work, it is now, at Stourbridge, Dudley, Wolverhampton, Sedgeley, Walsall, and Burmingham, and thereabout, wrought and manufactured into all small commodities, and diffused all England over, and thereby a great trade made of it; and, when manufactured, sent into most parts of the world. And I can very easily make it appear that, in the Forest of Dean and thereabout, and about the materials that come from thence, there are employed, and have their subsistence therefrom, no less than sixty thousand persons. . . . . And now in Worcestershire, Shropshire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, and Derbyshire there are great and numerous quantities of iron-works; and there much iron is made of metal or iron stone of another nature, quite different from that of the Forest of Dean. This iron is a short, soft iron, commonly called coldshore iron, of which all the nails are made, and infinite other commodities; in which work are employed many more persons, if not double to what are employed in the Forest of Dean. And in all those counties the gentlemen and others have moneys for their woods at all times when they want it, which is to them a great benefit and advantage; and the lands, in most of these places, are double the rate that they would be at if there were not iron-works there. And in all these counties now named there is an infinite of pit coals, and the pit coals being near the iron, and the iron stone growing with the coals, there it is manufactured very cheap, and sent all England over, and to most parts of the world. And if the iron-works were not there, the woods of all these counties to the owners thereof would not be worth the cutting and carrying home, because of the cheapness of the coals and duration thereof."

The last of these publications that we shall notice is a tract entitled "Proposals for the Employing of the Poor, especially in and about London," by Mr. Thomas Firmin, a London merchant, which appeared in 1678. It is written in the form of a letter to a friend, who is understood to have been Dr. (afterward Archbishop) Tillotson. Firmin was a person of distinguished public spirit and philanthropic zeal; and, although a Socinian, or Arian at least, in religion, and strongly attached to his opinions, Tillotson —some sermons by whom in defense of the Trinity he was the first to answer—was not the only intimate acquaintance he had among the heads of the established church. He died in 1697, at the age of ninety-six, and was attended, we are told, in his last illness by his friend Dr. Edward Fowler, then bishop of Gloucester. Burnet represents Firmin as having been the most active propagator in his day of the peculiar theological creed he had embraced: "He studied," says this historian, "to promote his opinions, after the Revolution, with much heat; many books were printed against the Trinity, which he dispersed over the nation, distributing them freely to all who would accept of them." He afterward tells us that "Mr. Firmin's death put a stop to the printing and spreading of Socinian books."[1] "He was," he admits, however, "in great esteem for promoting many charitable designs; for looking after the poor of the city and setting them to work; for raising great sums for schools and hospitals, and, indeed, for charities of all sorts, private and public; he had such credit with the richest citizens, that he had the command of great wealth as oft as there was occasion for it; and he laid out his own time chiefly in advancing all such designs. These things gained him a great reputation."[2] The plan for employing the poor which his pamphlet describes, and which he had reduced to practice in the parish of Aldersgate, London, is said to have been originally set on foot by the Rev. Thomas Gouge.[3] It consisted in buying up hemp and flax, and giving it out, ready dressed, to be spun in their own houses by such poor people as either could spin or were willing to learn. For this purpose, Firmin, at his own expense, erected a building in Aldersgate, to which he directed all the poor who came to him to go and receive flax, and when they had spun it to carry it back and receive their money for it; "which I found," he says, "to be very much for the help and relief of many poor, some of them being able to earn threepence and some fourpence a-day, working only at such times as they could spare from their other necessary occasions; who, being to work in their own houses, and when they could with most convenience attend it, many of them became so much pleased with it, that so much money given them for doing nothing would not have done them half so much good as that which they got by their own labor in this employment." As may be supposed, a spinning business thus conducted did not turn out a profitable speculation; on an expenditure of about £4000, for the year 1677, the loss had been about £200; and Firmin acknowledges that it would have been greater but for the kindness of several persons who took off some of the cloth he had manufactured at cost price: in particular, the East India and Guinea companies had, for his encouragement, ordered from him their Allabas cloths and coarse canvas for their pepper-bags, which they used to have from abroad. "However," says the benevolent projector, "this doth greatly satisfy me, that every penny that hath been lost by it, either by myself or by those friends who have helped to bear it, hath been many times gained to the poor and to the public. Neither hath the loss been so great as to affright any man that is able, and hath a good mind, from undertaking the like." To provide against the worst, he tells us, in case he should not be able to go on with the spinning of flax, he had made a good progress in the manufacture of woolens also; but it is, nevertheless, the making of linens that he considers to be best suited for the employment of the poor. "There is no commodity I know of," he says, "of the like value, that can be set up with less stock; three parts of four, even of that cloth which comes not to above two shillings an ell, will be paid for work to the spinner and weaver; and many times a woman will spin a pound of flax, that cost but sixpence or sevenpence, to that fineness that she will receive twelvepence or fourteenpence for her pains, which will make an ell of cloth worth three shillings, at which rate five parts of six will be paid for labor; nay, sometimes I have seen a pound of flax, not worth above 1*s.* 6*d.* at most, spun to that fineness that the pound of thread made of it hath been worth eight or ten shillings; and in other (he means foreign) parts I have seen a pound of flax, not much higher in value, spun to that fineness that it hath been worth three or four pounds sterling." Afterward he says, "When I first began to employ the poor in spinning, the best direction I could receive was to pay for spinning the same price that the flax and hemp stood me in, or what those sorts were generally sold for; but this I soon found to be in a very unequal way, forasmuch as some people would spin a much finer thread than others, and better deserve eightpence for spinning a pound of flax that cost but sixpence than another fourpence; so that after a little time I brought all the poor people to spin 600 yards for a penny, were the thread finer or coarser; . . . . and since then, with much ado, finding the loss to be great, I have brought them to 50 yards more, which yet is much less than is spun in other places." He goes on to state the cost of the raw material, and of dressing and weaving: "For Riga hemp at this day I pay 20*s.* a hundred, which is very low; for Quinborough about 22*s.*, which is cheap; for Muscovia flax about 44*s.* a hundred, for Quinborough about 40*s.* a hundred, for Holladay, about 36*s.*, for Paternoster flax about 30*s.* (all which prices are very high to what they are at some times); for English flax about 5½*d.* a pound undressed. . . . For beating of hemp I pay 4*s.* 8*d.* a cwt.; for dressing hemp, long and short, 11*d.* a dozen pound; for dressing flax I give 3*d.* a stone, accounting eight pound to the stone. For weaving cloth I pay the several prices following:—for yarn spun to 6*d.* and 7*d.* a pound; for every ell of cloth half ell wide, 2½*d.*; for that which is three quarters and a half wide, 3½*d.*; for that which is yard wide, 4*d.*; for that which is ell wide, 5*d.* For yarn spun to 9*d.* and 10*d.* a pound I pay ½*d.* more for every half quarter of an ell, rising as before in that of 7*d.* or 8*d.*, and the like in that which is still finer; for coarse cloth, yard and half quarter wide, I pay 3*d.* an ell; and for sacking about 3*d.* a yard."

Another scheme of Firmin's was, the establishment in parishes of institutions such as in our own day have been called schools of industry, for teaching the children of the poor to work at various businesses. "I myself," he says, "have at this time some children working to me, not above seven or eight years old, who are able to earn 2*d.* a-day, and some that are but a little older, 2*s.* a-week; and I doubt not to bring any child about that age to do the like; and still as they grow up and become proficients, even in this poor trade of spinning, they will be able to get more and spin better than older people. Neither would I have these schools confined only to spinning, but to take in knitting, and making of lace or plain work, or any other work which the children shall be thought most fit for; and this is that which (as I am informed) is practiced in other countries with so great advantage, that there are few poor children who have attained the age of seven or eight years that are any charge to the parish or burden to their poor parents; and Mr. Chamberlain (in his book entitled The Present State of England, p. 137) hath observed, that in the city of Norwich it hath been of late years computed and found that, yearly, children from six to ten years of age have gained £12,000 more than what they have spent, and that chiefly by knitting Jersey stockings." The meaning of this last statement probably is, not that the children had earned so much in wages, but that such had been the value of their labor to their employers.

Almost our only information respecting the wages of labor in the present period, as in the last, is derived from the rates as arbitrarily settled by the magistrates. According to a table of rates fixed by the justices of the county of Essex in 1661, common laborers, fellers and makers up of wood, ditchers, hedgers, and threshers, were to have per day 8*d.* with food, or 1*s.* 2*d.* without, from the middle of March to the middle of September, and 6*d.* with, or 1*s.* without food, for the other half of the year. A man haymaker was to have 8*d.* with, or 1*s.* without food; a woman haymaker 5*d.* with, or 10*d.* without food (which seems to be allowing 5*d.* for the day's maintenance of a woman, while only 4*d.* is allowed for that of a man); a weeder of corn 4*d.* with, or 9*d.* without food; a mower of corn or grass 10*d.* with, or 1*s.* 6*d.* without food; a fallower 6*d.* with, or 1*s.* 3*d.* without food; a man reaper 1*s.* with, or 1*s.* 10*d.* without food; a woman reaper 8*d.* with, or 1*s.* 2*d.* without food. These rates may be compared with those that were in force during the greater part of the last period.[1] They are, however, much higher than those established at a quarter-sessions held at Bury St. Edmonds, we presume for the county of Suffolk, in 1682.[2] By these, besides meat and drink, a man haymaker was to have only 5*d.* a-day; a woman haymaker 3*d.*; a man reaper in harvest 10*d.*; a woman reaper 6*d.*; a common laborer, not in harvest, 6*d.* in summer, and 5*d.* in winter; and women "and such persons, weeders," 3*d.* Without meat and drink the wages were to be doubled. The yearly wages of a bailiff in husbandry were at the same time fixed at £6; of a chief husbandman or carter at £5; of a second hind or husbandman, or common servant, above eighteen years of age, at £3 10*s.*; if under eighteen, at £2 10*s.*; of a dairymaid or cook at £2 10*s.* In 1685, at the close of the reign of Charles II., the Warwickshire justices directed that throughout that county a bailiff of husbandry should have, by the year, £4; a chief hind, or the best ploughman and carter, £5 15*s.*; a shepherd £5; an inferior servant man £2 10*s.*; "the woman servant that is able to manage a household," £1 15*s.*; a second woman servant £1

6s. 8d.; a dairymaid or wash-maid, £1 10s.; and that the daily wages of artificers and laborers should be—of a free-mason, a master brick mason, a master carpenter, his servant or journeyman if above eighteen, a plowwright and cartwright, a master bricklayer, a tiler, plasterer and shingler, a master thatcher, a mower, and a man reaper, 6d.; of a mason's servant or apprentice, if above eighteen, a carpenter's servant or apprentice under eighteen, a master plasterer, a thatcher's servant, a feller of wood, thresher, or common laborer, not in time of harvest, a man haymaker, and a woman reaper, 4d.; of a plasterer's servant or apprentice, if above twelve, and a reaper in corn-harvest, 3d.; of a woman haymaker, and a weeder of corn, 2d.; all with meat and drink. Without food, they were to have exactly double these sums, all except the free-mason, who, if the account be correct, was in that case to have 1s. 4d. Richard Dunning, in a tract published this same year, entitled "A Plain and Easy Method, showing how the office of Overseer of the Poor may be managed whereby it may be £9000 per annum advantage to the County of Devon, without abating the weekly relief of any Poor," calculates that a Devonshire agricultural day laborer could earn 5d. a-day all the year round, besides his diet, worth as much more; and that women in that county could earn their diet, worth 1s. 6d. a-week, and 6d. a-week wages.

The notices of prices that have been collected are very few. It is said, but upon uncertain authority, that the mean price of mutton from 1660 to 1690 was 1s. 4d. the stone of 8 lbs. The price of wool, as usual, fluctuated greatly; in 1671 it was 1s. the lb.; in 1677, 5d. the lb.; in 1680, from 12s. to 13s. the tod; in 1681 from 18s. to 19s. the tod. Wheat was considerably steadier than in the preceding period, and also considerably lower upon the whole: in 1661 it was £3 10s., and in 1662, £3 14s.; but, afterward, with the exception of a small number of years, it was seldom above £2 5s. or £2 6s. In 1674 it was £3 8s. 8d., and in 1675, £3 4s. 8d.; but in 1676 it was only £1 18s.; in 1686, £1 14s.; and in 1687, £1 5s. 2d. Its average price for the twenty years from 1666 to 1685 was £2 6s. $3\frac{3}{4}$d.
